THE EDITOR.

CITIZENNESS Roland, the wife of a man of fcience, was perfuaded, that the celebrity of a woman ought to be confined to the efteem arifing from the practice of domeftic virtues. On this account fhe always refufed to publifh writings, which would have procured her literary fame. It was even neceffary to be intimately acquainted with her, and enjoy her confidence, to be enabled to form a just estimate of her native merit, her acquired talents, and the ftrength of her character.

Citizennels Roland, the wife of a minister, retained the fame principles. She uffifted her husband in his political labours, as she had before affisted him in his fcientific pursuits, without suffering her name to appear. But her fituation was changed. Before the was confined within a narrow circle of friends: now, become the centre of a numerous group, the enthuliaftic admiration of her friends, and the invidious malevolence of her enemies, foon combined to give her that renown, which the was ftill far from feeking.

Imprifoned, calumniated on all fides, having nought but the fcaffold before her, citizennefs Roland could not avoid feeking the efteem of posterity, to confole her for the injustice of her contemporaries, and future glory, as an indemnification for premature death.

Then alone the appeared to feparate her reputation from that of her hufband: then alone the affumed the pen, to make herfelf known as an individual, and to furnith materials for hiftory in her own name. It will be feen, however, that the fole defire of her own reputation, and her own fame, determined not her refolution: every page will thow, that the was particularly animated with the duty of repelling the calumnious charges accumulated againft her hufband, and revenging the memory of Roland, if he fhould not have it in his power, to write or publith his laft juftification.

The public, already prejudiced in her favour, will judge judge from a perulal of her writings, whether the were really deferving of the commendations befowed on her by her friends, and whether fhe did not deferve the hatred of the villains, who finally condemned her to the block.

[iii]

Malevolence, alluming the malk of criticism, will endeavour, no doubt, to depreciate this monument erected by a woman to the glory of her fex; but the impartial reader will difcover her traits. I will only fay, as an excuse for some superfluous relations, and fome negligences of ftyle, that citizenness Roland compoled the part entitled Hiltorical Memoirs, two thirds of which, and those the most interesting, are lost, in the fpace of one month, and all the reft in two and twenty days, in the midit of vexations and disquietudes of every kind; and that the manufcript had very few corrections.

Many perfons, whole characters citizennels Roland has given, will have to complain of her. Posterity must decide, whether she have judged them well or ill. I have confined myfelf firifily to the office of an editor; and not permitted myself to make the least alteration in the text, even when it was evident, that the had been miltaken. There is a pallage, for infance, where the feems to call fulpioions on citizen Dulaure,

[iv]

Dulaure, which I believe him far from deferving, and which every true republican will be eager to repel. It may not be amifs here to relate the caufe of her errour.

Dulaure, a patriotic journalist, and a writer of courage, vifited Roland, whole principles were analogous to his own, and whole conduct he efteemed. Dulaure, a deputy to the convention, thought it incumbent on bim, as a matter of delicacy, to defift from frequenting the houle of a minister, of whole actions he was conftituted a judge. Citizennels Roland attributed this referve to a change of opinion in politics, and to the infligation of the mountaineers: hence the gall, which feems to have predominated, when the wrote the article concerning him; but in which, notwithstanding, she does his character the justice it deferves. The courage with which citizen Dulaure has printed all the complaints of citizenness Roland fince the 31ft of may; the honourable profcription he has undergone; and his last publication, entitled, Supplement to the Crimes of the late Committees of Government; render farther justification unnecelfary.

It was my intention, to have given the public the whole of the work at once; but the delays of of the prefs at the prefent moment, and the observations of fome good citizens, have determined me to publish it in parts. There will be four; which will follow each other, as fpeedily as circumstances will permit. The fecond will be filled with feveral detached pieces, respecting the events of the revolution, and the papers that relate to her death, or immediately preceded it. The third and fourth will contain her private life, written precifely after the manner, and with the intentions, of the Confessions of Rouffeau: to which will be added fome familiar letters, which I have found amongst my papers. I much lament, that I have not a more complete feries of her correspondence to publish*: it is in the effusions of friendship, that the mind displays itself fully, and our opinions, inclinations, and acquirements, exhibit themfelves unveiled. Hence I confider these letters. though at first view they appear to concern only our friendship, tastes, and studies, as necessary supplements to her private memoirs. In them will be feen how ardent a republican fhe was from the first : and certainly, on the 28th of august, 1792, she could

* This correspondence was very active for feveral years, frequently diurnal during her abode at Amiens. My memory retraces imperfectly fome very interesting letters. I cannot now find them : possibly they are with feveral others in the hands of Lanthenas, to whom that correspondence was frequently common. He then confidered it, and with reason, as of great importance ; but now!----- not possibly foresee, that France would become a republic; still less that she was defined, to act a part in it.

Citizennels Roland was very fond of exercifing her pen in epistolary writing. She employed it on all subjects with incredible facility, and much grace. As a letter-writer she was superiour, in my opinion, to a Sevigné or a Maintenon: because she was far better informed than either of those two celebrated women, and her correspondence consisted of things, not words.

I wish to collect all her letters, that may have been preferved; which I here request them, who are in possession of them, to fend me, in the original, free of expense as far as possible; and I propose to publish them at the end of several literary productions of citizenness Roland, which are known to me, and which I think worthy of seeing the light.

Roland, during his retreat, had also composed fome historical memoirs; but they were configned to the flames, the moment the courageous woman, who concealed him, was taken into custody. At the conclufion of his first ministry, he published a collection of pieces, calculated to make known to posterity his conduct conduct in office; and I intend to continue it, by collecting fuch as relate to his fecond ministry.

But that I may be enabled to accomplift this object, as well as the preceding one, it is requifite, that the national convention, either by a general law, folicited by all the friends of juffice, or a private decree, defired by every true friend of liberty, reftore to the daughter of Roland the property, to which fhe has a juft claim. I muft have liberty to fearch amongft the papers ftill under feal at Villefranche, as well as those taken from the house at Paris, after the fale of the furniture by the agents of the national domains. It is the part of all fincere republicans, victims of tyranny, perfecuted for their virtues or talents, as Roland and his wife, to favour my withes with their influence, and promote the reftoration of my engaging ward to all her rights.

Let me be permitted to conclude with a fingle obfervation, perhaps not unneceffary. This work is, at leaft at prefent, the fole fortune of Eudora, the beloved daughter, the only child of Roland. Woe be to the villain who dares to pirate it ! For certainly he would not be able to fell one copy of it, yet I would not fail to call down upon him all the vengeance of the law. The portrait of citizennels Roland, engraved by the worthy Palquier, the countryman of Roland, and the friend of them both, ought to have been placed at the beginning of the first part; but it cannot be gotten ready for delivery, till the publication of the last.

HISTORICAL MEMOIRS.

Prifon of the Abbey, june, 1793.

Now on a throne, to morrow in a prifon.

CUCH is the fate of virtue at the period of revo-Jutions. After the first commotions of a people, wearied out with the abuses, with which it had been aggrieved, have fubfided, the fages, who have inftructed it in it's rights, and affifted it in regaining them, are called into places of authority: but thefe they cannot long occupy, for the ambitious, eager to avail themselves of circumstances, foon millead the people by flattery, and turn it against it's real defenders, to raife themselves into confequence and power. This has been the progress of things, particularly fince the tenth of august. Some day, perhaps, I shall take them up from an earlier date, to retrace with my pen what my fituation has enabled me to know: at prefent my fole object is to commit to paper the circumstances of my arrest; an amufement natural to the folitary, who pourtrays what affects himfelf, and expresses what he feels.

The refignation of Roland appealed not his enemies. He had quitted the ministry, in spite of his refolves to lay the storm, and brave every danger; B because because the state of the council, when he became fully acquainted with it, and his weakness, continually increasing, and strongly marked about the middle of january, presented nothing to his view but faults and follies, of which he must participate the disgrace. He was not even allowed to enter on the register of the deliberations his opinions, or his motives, when they were contrary to the determination of the majority.

Thus from the day of that pitiful decree refpecting the piece of l'Ami des Loix, ' the Friend of the Laws,' which he would not fign, because the fecond branch of it was at least ridiculous, he no longer affixed his fignature to any of the deliberations of the council, This was the fifteenth of january. In the convention he discovered nothing to afford him encouragement. There his very name was become the fignal of difcord and disturbance: it was no longer permitted to be pronounced without uproar: if a member ventured to answer the odious accusations gratuitously preferred against the minister, he was treated as an instrument of faction, and compelled to be filent. Yet Pache in the war department was committing every fault, into which his weakness and implicit fubmilfion to the jacobins, or the perfidy and audaciousness of his agents, could lead him : and the convention could not obtain the difmiffal of Pache, for the moment a fingle voice lifted itfelf against him, the barkers retorted the name of Roland. Thus the continuation of his courageous contest in the ministry could no longer reftrain the faults of the council, whilst it became an additional motive of diforder in the convention. He gave in, therefore, his refignation. That the found found part of the legislative body, thoroughly convinced as it was of the virtues and talents of the calumniated minifter, durft not make a fingle obfertion on the subject, sufficiently proves it's necessity. This was unqueftionably weaknefs: for it needed a firm and honeft minister in the home department, who would have been it's most powerful stay; and losing this it must fubmit to the yoke of the extravagants, who fought to raife up and maintain an authority capable of rivalling the national reprefentation.

Roland fupported an ufurping commune: Roland impressed on all the administrative bodies an uniform, harmonious, and regular motion: he watched over the fupply of provision to the grand family: he had established peace in all the departments; and inspired them with that order, which fprings from justice, that confidence, which arifes from vigilant administration, an affectionate correspondence, and the communication of knowledge. Roland, therefore, ought to have been fupported: but weaknefs refused the means; and he, who knew well that weaknefs, had nothing left him to do, but, to withdraw.

The timid Garat, an amiable man in fociety, of moderate talents as a man of letters, and contemptible as a member of administration; whole being chofen minister of justice proved the want of men of capacity, a want which they only can know, who, occupying places of importance, have coadjutors to feek; had not fenfe enough to remain in that office, where there is leaft to be done, and in which his infirmhealth, natural indolence, and incapacity for bufinefs, must have been least confpicuous : he removed to the branches of knowledge it demands, not only with respect to politics, but in regard to commerce, the arts, and innumerable minutiæ, that come under it's cognizance: with his ignorance and inactivity he attempted to fupply the place of the most active man in the republic, and the beft informed in all these points. The loofeness of the machine soon disjointed it's parts, and proved the weakness of the regulator: the departments were thrown into commotion, fcarcity was felt, and the flames of civil war were lighted up in Vendée ; the authorities of Paris began to encroach; the jacobins affumed the reins of government; the puppet Pache, difmiffed from the department, which he had unhinged, was raifed by the cabal to the mayoralty, where his fuppleness was wanted, and replaced at the council-board by the idiot Bouchotte, as fupple as he, and even exceeding him in flupidity.

Roland gave a terrible blow to his adverfaries, by publifhing, on his retirement, fuch accounts, as no minifter before him had furnished. To have examined them, and fanctioned them by a report, was a piece of juffice, which he must have folicited in vain: for that would have been, to acknowledge the falfehood of the obloquy thrown on him, the infamy of his detractors, and the weaknefs of the convention, that durft not undertake his defence.

It was neceffary to perfevere in flandering him, without coming to the proof; to blind and miflead rne public opinion with refpect to him, fo as to be able to ruin him with impunity; and thus to remove a troublefome a troublefome witnefs of fo many atrocities, which must be concealed or justified, to preferve to those who committed them that wealth and authority, in the acquirement of which they were inftrumental. In vain did Roland intreat, publish, and write feven times in four months to the convention, to demand an examination and report on his conduct in the ministry: the jacobins continued to employ their fatellites, to proclaim him as a traitor: Marat proved to his fellows, that his head was necessary to the tranquillity of the republic: confpiracies, frustrated, renewed, strangled in the birth, yet again revived, terminated at length in the infurrection of the 31ft of may, when the good people of Paris, with a fixed determination to maffacre no one, did every thing it's audacious directors, it's infolent commune, and the revolutionary committee of mefficurs the jacobins, become fools, madmen, or the hirelings of the enemy, chose to dictate. Roland had written the eighth time to the convention, which did not even deign to read his letter. I was preparing to get paffports figned by the municipality, that I might go with my daughter into the country, to which I was called by domestic business, the state of my health, and many good reafons. Amongst other things I confidered, how much more eafy it would be for Roland alone to withdraw from the purfuit of his enemies, should they proceed to the last excess, than if he were with his little family; prudence urged the diminution of the points in which he could be attacked *. My paffports had been delayed at the fection, through the chicanery of fome zealous maratifts, in whole eyes I was an object of fuspicion; and they were but just delivered to me, when a fit of the nervous colic, attended with violent convultions, the fole indifpolition to which I am liable, and to which the vehement affections of a strong mind ruling a robust frame expose me, confined me to my bed. Six days thus elapfed, and I purposed to go out on friday, to repair to the municipality. The found of the alarm-bell informed me, that it was not a proper time. Every thing had long foretold a crifis necessary. This, it is true, threatened, from the ascendency of the jacobins, to be unfavourable to the real friends of liberty: but energetic minds deteft uncertainty : and the debafement of the convention, with it's daily acts of weaknefs and flavery, appeared to me fo diffrefsing, that I almost deemed the utmost excesses preferable ; for these mult have opened the eyes of the departments, and determined their conduct. The alarm gun, and the commotions of the day, awakened in me that interest, which grand events infpire, without any painful emotion. Two or three perions came to vifit us; and one, in particular, preffed Roland to make his appearance at his fection, where he was well effeemed, and the prudent precautions of which were the beft warrants of his fafety. It was agreed, however, that he should not sleep at home the following night:

juffice might reach, but could not degrade me; and to fuffer it, was a trial, in the thought of braving which I felt pleafure: but another reafon, altogether perfonal, and which fome day perhaps my pen will difclose, determined me to depart. though nothing was talked of but the good intentions of the citizens, who arranged themfelves under arms, in order to oppose every act of violence; but it was not added, that they would permit all the preparations for acts of violence to be made.

The blood boils in my veins, when I hear the goodnels of the parifians vaunted, who would have no more fuch days as the 2d of feptember. Just heavens! you are not wanted to execute another, you have only to fuffer it as before : but you are neceffary to collect the victims, and you civilly lend your hands to apprehend them; you are necessary to give the appearance of a legitimate infurrection to the tribunes, who fway you, and you approve their undertakings, you obey their orders, and take the oath of fealty to the monstrous authorities they create; you furround the legislative body with your bayonets, and you permit the decrees, it is wanted to pass, to be dictated to it. Boaft, then, no more, of being it's defenders: it is you, who bind it in chains; you, who deliver into the hands of oppression it's members most diffinguished for their virtues and their talents, and with equal cowardice fee them brought to a fcaffold, by proceedings fimilar to those which destroyed Sidney; you, who will answer for fo many crimes to indignant France, who ferve the caufe of her enemics, and prepare the way for federalism. Think you, that the proud Marfeilles, and fage Gironde, will pass over the affront done to their representatives, or ever fraternife with your city black with guilt? You are the destroyers of your country, and foon will lament in B 🛦 vain.

vain, in the midst of it's ruins, your infamous pufillanimity.

It was half after five in the evening, when fix men armed came to our house. One of them read to Roland an order of the revolutionary committee, by the authority of which they came to apprehend him. 'I know no law,' faid Roland, 'which conftitutes the authority you cite to me, and I shall obey no orders proceeding from it. If you employ violence, I can only oppose to you the resultance of a man of my years; but I shall protest against it to the last moment.'—'I have no order to employ violence,' replied the person, ' and I will leave my colleagues here, whilst I go and report your answer to the council of the commune.'

Immediately it occurred to me, that it would be well to announce this circumstance to the convention with fome noife, in order to prevent the arrest of Roland, or to obtain his prompt release, if this should be carried into execution. To communicate the thought to my hufband, write a letter to the prefident, and fet out, was the business of a few minutes. My fervant was absent; I left a friend, who was in the house, with Roland; and stepped alone into a hackneycoach, which I ordered to proceed as fast as possible to the Carrouzel. The court of the Tuileries was filled with armed men. I croffed, and flew through the midft of them like a bird. I was dreffed in a morning gown, and had put on a black shawl, and a veil. On my arrival at the doors of the outer halls, which were all shut. I found sentinels, who allowed no one to enter, or fent me by turns from one door to another. In vain I infifted on admiffion: at length I bethought bethought myfelf of employing fuch language, as might have been uttered by fome devotee of Robefpierre: 'but, citizens, in this day of falvation for our country, in the midft of those traitors we have to fear, you know not of what importance fome notes I have to transfmit to the president may be. Let me at least fee one of the messengers, that I may entrust them to him.'

The door opened, and I entered into the petitioners hall. I inquired for a mellenger of the house. 'Wait till one comes out:' faid one of the inner fentinels. A quarter of an hour paffed away: I perceived Rôze, the perfon who brought me the decree of the convention, which invited me to repair to the bar, on occasion of the ridiculous accufation of Viard, whom I overwhelmed with confusion: now I folicited permission to appear there, and announced Roland to be in danger, with which the public weal was connected. But circumftances were no longer the fame, though my rights were equal: before invited, now a fuppliant, could I expect the fame fuccefs? Roze took charge of my letter; underflood the fubject of my impatience; and repaired to lay it on the table, and urge it's being read. An hour elapsed. I walked haftily backwards and forwards : every time the door opened my eyes were caft towards the hall, but it was immediately shut by the guard: a fearful noife was heard at intervals: Rôze again appeared .---"Well!"-" Nothing has been done yet. A tumult I cannot defcribe prevails in the affembly. Some petitioners, now at the bar, demand the two-and-twenty to be apprehended: I have just affisted Rabaud to flip out without being fcen: they are not willing he fhould fhould make the report of the commission of twelve: he has been threatened: feveral others are efcaping: there is no knowing what will be the event.'-- 'Who is the prefident now?'-- 'Héraut-Séchelles.'-- 'Ah! my letter will not be read. Send fome deputy to me, with whom I can fpeak a few words.'-- 'Whom?'--' Indeed I have been little acquainted, or have little efteem for any, but them, who are proferibed. Tell Vergniaux I am inquiring for him.'

Rôze went in quest of him. After a confiderable time he appeared. We talked together for ten minutes. He went back into the hall, returned, and faid to me: 'In the prefent state of the assembly, I dare not flatter you, you have little to hope.' If you get admiffion to the bar, you may obtain a little more favour as a woman; but the convention can do no more good.'---'It can do every thing :' exclaimed I : ' for the majority of Paris feeks only to know what it has to do. If I were admitted, I would venture to fay, what you could not without expoling yourfelf to an acculation. I fear nothing; and if I cannot fave Roland, I will utter with energy truths, which will not be useless to the republic. Inform your worthy colleagues: a burft of courage may have a great effect, and at leaft will fet a great example.'-In fact, I was in that temper of mind, which imparts eloquence: warm with indignation, fuperiour to all fear, my bofom glowing for my country, the ruin of which I forefaw, every thing dear to me in the world exposed to the utmost danger, feeling strongly, expressing my fentiments with fluency, too proud not to utter them with dignity, I had fubjects in which I was highly interested to difcufs, poffeffed fome means of defending them, and was in a fingular fituation for doing it with advantage.— But, at any rate, your letter cannot be read this hour or two: a plan of a decree, forming fix articles, is going to be difcuffed: petitioners, deputed by the fections, wait at the bar: think what an attempt !'— I will go home, then, to hear what has paffed; and will immediately return: fo tell our friends.'— Moft of them are abfent: they flow themfelves courageous, when they are here; but they are deficient in affiduity.'— That is unfortunately too true.'

I quitted Vergniaux : I flew to Louvet's : I wrote a note to inform him of what was going on, and what I forefaw. I flung myfelf into a hackney-coach, and ordered it home. The poor horfes answered not the fpeed of my wifnes. Soon we were met by fome battalions, whole march stopped us : I jumped out of the coach, paid the coachman, rushed through the ranks, and made off. This was near the Louvre. I ran to our house, which was opposite St. Côme, in Harp-flreet. The porter whifpered me, that Roland was gone into the landlord's, at the bottom of the court. Thither I repaired, in a profuse perspiration. A glass of wine was brought me, and I was told, that the bearer of the mandate of arrest having returned, without being able to procure a hearing at the council, Roland had perfifted in protefting against his orders; and that these good people had demanded his proteft in writing, and had then withdrawn: after which Roland went through the landlord's apartment, and got out of the houfe the back way. I did the fame to find him, to inform him of what I had done, and to acquaint him with the steps I meant to purfue. At the first house to which I repaired, I found him not : in the fecond I did. From the folitarinefs of the ftreets, which were illuminated. I prefumed it was late; yet this did not prevent my defign of returning to the convention. There I would have appeared ignorant of Roland's escape, and spoken as I had before intended. I was about to fet off on foot, without being confcious, that it was past ten o'clock, and that I was out that day for the first time fince my illnefs, which demanded reft and the bath. A hackneycoach was brought me. On approaching the Carrouzel, I faw nothing more of the armed force : two pieces of cannon, and a few men, were still at the gate of the national palace: I went up to it, and found the fitting was diffolved !

What, on the day of an infurrection, when the found of the alarm-bell fcarcely ceafes to ftrike the ear, when forty thoufand men in arms furrounded the convention only two hours before, and petitioners threatened it's members from the bar, the affembly is not permanent!—Surely then it is completely fubjugated! it has done every thing, that it was ordered! The revolutionary power is fo mighty, that the convention dares not oppofe it, and it has no need of the convention !

^c Citizens,' faid I to fome fans-culottes collected round a cannon, ' has every thing gone well?'—^c O wonderfully! they embraced, and fung the hymn of the marfeillefe, there, under the tree of liberty.'— 'What, then, is the right fide appeafed ?'—^c Faith, it was obliged obliged to liften to reafon.'- ' And what of the committee of twelve?'- ' It is kicked into the ditch.'-"And the twenty-two?"-" The municipality will caufe them to be taken up.'- ' Good : but can it ?'- ' Is it not the fovereign? It was necessary it should, to fet those b----- of traitors right, and support the commonwealth.'- ' But will the departments be well pleafed to fee their reprefentatives * * * * *'- ' What are you talking of? the parifians do nothing but in concert with the departments: they have faid fo to the convention.'- ' That is not too clear, for, to know their will, the primary affemblies should have met.'-"Were they wanting on the 10th of august? Did not the departments approve what Paris did then? They do the fame now: it is Paris that faves them.'-"That ruins them rather, perhaps."

I had croffed the court, and arrived at my hackneycoach, as I finished this dialogue with an old fansculotte, no doubt well paid to tutor the dupes. A pretty dog preffed clofe at my heels :-- ' Is the poor creature your's?' faid the coachman to me, with a tone of fenfibility very rare amongst his fellows, which ftruck me extremely .-- ' No : I know nothing of him:' answered I gravely, as if I were speaking of a man, and already thinking of fomething elfe: ' you will fet me down at the galleries of the Louvre.' There I intended to call on a friend, with whom I would confult on the means of getting Roland out of Paris. We had not gone a dozen yards before the coach ftopped. "What is the matter?' faid I to the coachman.-'Ah, he has left me; like a fool; and I wanted to keep him for my little boy. He would have been highly highly pleafed with him. Wheugh! Wheugh! Wheugh !'-I recollected the dog: it was gratifying to me to have for a coachman, at fuch an hour, a man of a good heart, of feeling, and a father. ' Endeavour to catch him :' faid I: ' you shall put him into the coach, and I will take care of him for you.'-The good man, quite delighted, caught the dog, opened the door, and gave him to me for a companion. The poor animal appeared fentible, that he had found protection and an afylum: I was greatly carefied by him, and I thought of that tale of Sandi, in which is defcribed an old man, weary of his fellow creatures, and difgusted with their paffions, who retired to a wood, in which he constructed himself a dwelling, of which he sweetened the folitude by means of fome animals, who repaid his cares with testimonies of affection, and with a species of gratitude, to which he confined himfelf, for want of meeting with it's like amongst mankind.

Pasquier had just gone to bed. He role: I proposed to him my plan. We agreed, that he should come to me the next day after feven o'clock, and I would inform him where to find his friend. I returned to my coach: it was stopped by the fentry, at the post of the Woman of Samaria. ' Have a little patience:' whifpered the good coachman to me, turning back on his feat : ' it is the cuftom at this time of night.'-The ferjeant came, and opened the door. "Who is here? - 'A woman.'- 'Whence do you come ?'- ' From the convention.'-- ' It is very true :' added the coachman, as if he feared, I should not be credited .- "Whither are you going ?'-- ' Home.'-- ' Have you no bundles? -'I have nothing. See.'-' But the affembly has broken broken up.'-- 'Yes: at which I am very forry, for I had a petition to make.'-- 'A woman! at this hour! it is very ftrange: it is very imprudent.'-- 'No doubt it is not a very common occurrence: I must have had ftrong reasons for it.'-- 'But, madam, alone?'--'How, fir, alone! Do you not fee I have innocence and truth with me? what more is neceffary?'-- 'I must fubmit to your reasons.'-- 'And you do well:' replied I, in a gentler tone: ' for they are good.'

The horfes were fo fatigued, that the coachman was obliged to pull them by the bridle, to get them up the hill, in the fireet in which I refided. I got home: I difmiffed him: and I had afcended eight or ten fteps, when a man, clofe at my heels, who had flipped in at the gate unperceived by the porter, begged me to conduct him to citizen Roland.—' To his apartment, with all my heart, if you have any thing of fervice to him to impart: but to him is impoffible.'—' This evening he will certainly be apprehended.'—' They muft be very dexterous, who accomplifi it.'—' You give me great pleafure; for it is an honeft citizen who accofts you.'—' I am glad of it:' faid I, and went on, without well knowing what to think of the adventure.

Why, under fuch circumstances, did you enter into your house? perhaps the reader will ask.

The queftion is by no means out of place: for flander had attacked me too, and malevolence might have exercifed itfelf against me: but to give a proper anfwer to it, the state of my mind must be completely unfolded, and this would require details, which I referve for a future period: their refults will be all I shall notice at present. I have naturally an aversion to every thing inconfistent with the grand, bold, and ingenuous course of innocence: the exertions necesfarv to withdraw myfelf from the hand of injuffice would be to me more painful, than any thing it could inflict. In the last two months of Roland's ministry, our friends often urged us to quit the hotel, and did perfuade us thrice to fleep from home; each time against my consent. An assalination was then apprehended : but it was my opinion, that no perfons could eafily be induced to violate the afylum of a man invefted with a public office; and if there were fuch wretches, it appeared to me, that the perpetration of fuch an act would be productive of beneficial confequences. At all events, it was incumbent on the minister to be at his post: for there his death would cry aloud for vengeance, and all the republic would know it: whilft it was poffible to reach him in his goings out or comings in, with equal advantage to the perpetrator of the act, and lefs effect for the public weal. lefs glory for the victim. Such reafoning, I am aware. will be deemed abfurd by them, who prefer life to all things: but he, who fets any value on his life in a period of revolution, will fet none on virtue, on honour, or on his country. In the month of january, therefore. I would on no account leave the hotel: the bed of Roland was in my chamber, that we might both undergo the fame fate: and under my pillow I kept a piftol, not to kill them, who might come to affaffinate us, but to fecure myfelf from any indignity, if they offered to lay hands upon me.

Out of place the obligation was no longer the fame, and I thought it right in Roland, to fhun the fury of the populace, and the talons of his enemies. To injure me, could not be to them a matter of equal importance: of my death they would not incur the odium; and to imprifon me would be to them of little fervice, and to me no great misfortune. Were they poffeffed of fufficient fenfe of fhame, to attempt to proceed according to form, and examine me, I should find no difficulty in confounding them; and this might ferve to undeceive those, who were really misled with respect to Roland. If they began anew a fecond of feptember, the honeft deputies would be also in their power, and all would be loft at Paris. In this cafe I would have preferred death, to living a witnefs of my country's ruin; and been proud of being comprised amongst the glorious victims facrificed to the fury of guilt. That fury, glutted on me, would be lefs violent against Roland, who, if faved from this crifis, might still render great fervices to the public in some part of France. Thus, either I rifked only imprifonment, and a trial, which I could turn to the advantage of my husband, and of my country: or if I must perish, it would be under circumftances, by which life would to me be rendered odious.

I have an amiable daughter. I fuckled her at my own breaft. I brought her up with the enthuliaftic anxiety of maternal love. I have fet before her fuch examples, as at her age will not be forgotten: and fhe will be a good woman, with fome talents. Her education may be completed without my affiftance; her life will afford confolation to her father; but the will never feel my ftrong affections; fhe will never know my pains, or my pleafures: yet were I to be born again, С again, and to have my own choice of difpolitions, I would not change my frame, but would demand of the gods to make me, fuch as I am now formed. Since the refignation of the minister, I had lived fo retired from the world, that I faw fcarcely any perfon: the occupiers of one house, in which I might have concealed myfelf, were in the country: in another there was a fick perfon, which rendered the admission of a new guest too troublesome: that, in which Roland was concealed, could not accommodate me without great inconvenience; befides, it would have been too fufpicious, perhaps impolitic, for me to have been in the fame place with him: finally, it would have been painful to me, to have abandoned my fervants : and therefore I returned home, quieted their uneafinefs, already grown to a confiderable pitch, embraced my child, and took up my pen, to write a note, which I intended to dispatch early in the morning to my husband.

Scarcely had I fitten down, when I heard a knock at my door. It was about midnight. A numerous deputation of the commune appeared, and inquired for Roland.— 'He is not at home.'— 'But,' faid the perfon, who wore an officer's gorget, to me, 'where can he be? when will he return? You know his way of life, and can judge when we may expect him.'— 'I know not,' replied I, 'whether your orders authorife you to put fuch queffions to me; but this I know, that nothing can oblige me to anfwer them. Roland quitted his houfe, whilft I was at the convention : he could not then make me his confident: and I have nothing more to fay to you.'

The troop withdrew much diffatisfied. I perceived, that that a fentry was left at my door, and a guard at that of the house. From this I inferred, that I must fummon ftrength to support whatever might happen. Exhaufted with fatigue, I ordered supper, finished my letter, entrusted it to my faithful nurse, and retired to bed. I had flept foundly about an hour when my fervant entered my chamber, to inform me, that the officers of the fection requefted me to go into the adjoining apartment. ' I understand them,' replied 1: ' go child, they shall not wait for me long.' I jumped out of bed, and dreffed myfelf. My nurfe came in, and was furprized, that I should take the trouble to put on any thing more than a wrapping gown .-- ' A proper drefs is neceffary to go out in,' observed I.-The poor woman looked in my face, and the tears guihed into her eyes. I went into the next room.

"We come, citizennefs, to put you under arreft, and to affix feals on your property."—"Where is your authority?"—"Here: faid a man, taking out of his pocket a mandate from the revolutionary committee", to convey me to the Abbey, without fpecifying any motive for the arreft. "I may tell you, with Roland, that I know nothing of this committee, that I will not obey it's orders, and that you fhall not take me hence, unlefs by violence."—"Here is another order," faid eagerly, with an air of confequence, a little hard featured man; and he read me one from the commune, which directed, alfo without alleging any charge, the arreft of both Roland and his wife. Whilft it was reading, I debated with myfelf, whether I fhould carry my refiftance to the utmoft, or quietly refign myfelf into their hands. I might plead the law, which prohibited nocturnal arrefts; and if the law, which authorifes magiftrates to feize fulpected perfons were urged, I might retort the illegality of the municipality itfelf, cashiered and created anew by an arbitrary power. But then this power the citizens of Paris had in fome measure fanctioned: the law was become nothing more than an empty name, employed for the purpose of trampling more fecurely on the most acknowledged rights: and force prevailed, to which if I compelled these brutes to have recourse, they would preferve no bounds in it's application. Refistance therefore was useless, and could ferve only to expose me.

"How do you mean to proceed, gentlemen ?'---" We have fent for the justice of peace of the fection, and you fee a detachment of his armed force.'-The justice of peace arrived. They went into my falon, and fixed feals to every thing, to the windows, to the drawers for linen. One man would have had them put on a piano-forte, but he was told it was an inftrument of mufic : he then drew out a foot rule, and took it's dimensions, as if he defigned it for some particular place. I afked leave to take out my daughter's wardrobel and I made up a fmall packet of nightclothes for myfelf. In the mean time fifty or a hundred perfons were paffing backwards and forwards continually, filled two rooms, crowded every place, and might eafily conceal malicious perfons disposed either to remove or to put in any thing. The air became loaded with noifome exhalations, and I was obliged to retire retire to the window of the anti-chamber to fetch breath. The officer durft not command this crowd to withdraw: occasionally he addressed to it a slight requeft, which produced only it's renewal. Sitting down at my bureau, I wrote to a friend concerning my fituation, or to recommend to him my daughter. As I was folding it up, Mr. Nicaud, the bearer of the order from the commune, faid; ' madam, you must read your letter, and tell us to whom it is addreffed.'-' I have no objection to read it, if that will fatisfy you.'-- ' It is of more confequence, to fay to whom you addrefs it.'--' That I certainly shall not do: the title of my friend is not of a nature, at prefent, to induce me, to name to you those, on whom I bestow it:' and I tore the letter to pieces. When I turned my back, they picked up the fragments, to put them under feal, I was tempted to laugh at their ftupid cagerness, for the letter had no direction.

In fine, at feven in the morning I left my daughter and my people, after having recommended to them calmnefs and patience. By their tears I felt myfelf more honoured, than it was in the power of oppreffion to render me dejected.—'You have people there, who love you:' faid one of the commiffioners.—'I have never had any about me, who did not '' replied I; and I defcended the ftairs. From the bottom of them to the coach, which was on the oppofite fide of the ftreet, two rows of armed men were drawn up, and a crowd of curjous perfons had affembled around. I walked flowly and deliberately between them, attentively viewing the cowardly or milled multitude. The armed force followed the coach in two files: whilft the wretched populace, deceived, and malfacred in the perfons of it's true friends, ftopped as I passed by, attracted by the fight, and fome women cried out, ' so the guillotine.'-- ' Shall we draw up the blinds?' faid one of the commissioners to me very civilly .- ' No, gentlemen, innocence, however oppressed, never puts on the guife of criminality: I fear not the eye of any one, and I would not conceal myfelf from any perfon's view.' -- You have more courage, than many men : you fubmit to juffice calmly.'- ' Juffice ! Were juffice done, I fhould not now be in your hands: but fhould an iniquitous procedure fend me to the fcaffold, I would mount it with the fame firmness and tranquillity, with which I now go to a prifon. I figh for my country : I regret my miftake in fuppoling it qualified for liberty and happiness: but life I appreciate at it's due value; I have never feared aught but guilt; injustice and death I despise.'-The poor commissioners did not perfefuly comprehend fuch language, and probably thought it very aristocratic.

We arrived at the Abbey, the theatre of those bloody fcenes, the revival of which the jacobins have for fome time preached up with fuch fervour. The first objects, that presented themselves to my fight, were five or fix field beds, occupied by as many men, in a gloomy chamber. As foon as I had passed the wicket, all seemed in motion; and my guides made me ascend a dirty narrow staircase. We came to the keeper, in a fort of little falon, which was tolerably clean, where he offered me a couch. 'Where is my chamber?' faid I to his wife, a corpulent woman, with a good countenance. — Madam, I did not expect you: I have no one ready: ready: in the mean time you will remain here.'-The commiffioners went into the adjoining room, directed an entry of their mandate to be made, and gave their verbal orders. Thefe, I afterwards learnt, were very rigid, and often renewed afterwards, but they durft not give them in writing. The keeper knew his trade too well, literally to purfue, what he was under no obligation to follow. He is an honeft man, active, obliging, and in the exercise of his office leaves nothing for juffice or humanity to defire.-- What would you choofe for breakfaft?'-- A little capillaire.'

The commissioners withdrew, observing to me, that Roland ought not to have abfconded, if he had been innocent .- " When a man, who has rendered fuch important fervices to the caufe of liberty, is exposed to fuspicion; when a minister, whole conduct has been fo open, and accounts fo clear, is become an object of deteftable calumny, and the bittereft perfecution; it would be strange, if he did not withdraw himself from the last extremities of envy. Just as Aristides, severe as Cato, to his virtues he is indebted for his enemies. Their fury knows no bounds: let them fatiate it on me : I defy it's power, and to it I devote myself. It is incumbent on him, to fave himfelf for the fake of his country, to which he may yet be capable of rendering important fervice.'-The gentlemen were a little con founded; made me no answer but a bow; and departed.

Whilft I breakfasted, a bed-chamber was hastily put in order, into which I was introduced. - You may remain here, madam, the whole day; and if I cannot get ready an apartment for you this evening, as I have a great many perfons in the houfe, a bed fhall be made up in the falon,'—The keeper's wife, who faid this to me, added fome civil obfervations on the regret fhe felt, whenever a perfon of her own iex arrived, fubjoining: ' for they have not all your ferene countenance, madam.'—I thanked her with a fmile ; and fhe locked me in.

Thus, then, I am in prilon; faid I to myself. I fat down, and gave myfelf up to profound reflection. The moments that followed I would not exchange for those, which others would esteem the most happy of my life. Never will they be erafed from my memory. They enabled me to feel, in a critical fituation, with a ftormy, precarious period in view, all the value of honefty and fortitude, in the fincerity of a good confcience, and the strength of a courageous mind. Hitherto, impelled by circumstances, my actions, in this crifis, had been the refult of a lively fentiment, hurrying me away. How grateful to find it's effects justified by reason ! I recalled to my mind the past : I weighed the events of the future : and if, listening to a heart of fenfibility, I found an affection too powerful, I discovered not one, that could fuffule my cheek with a bluin, not one, but ferved as aliment to my courage, not one, but that courage could fubdue. I devoted myfelf, if I may to fay, voluntarily to my deftiny, whatever it might be : I defied it's rigour: and my mind fettled itfelf in that difpolition, where it feeks nothing more than to employ the prefent well, without anxiety about any thing farther. But this tranquillity with regard to what concerned only myself I extended not to the fate of my country, and of my friends : with inexpressible eagernefs nefs I liftened to the cries of the ftreet, and waited for the papers of the evening. However, I made inquiry concerning my new fituation, and what portion of liberty was left me.—' May I write? May I fee any perfon? What will be my expenses here?' were my first questions. Lavacquerie, the keeper, acquainted me with the directions given him, and the liberty he could take with fuch orders. I wrote to my faithful nurse, to come and see me; but it was agreed, that the should impart to no one her having the permisfion.

The first visit I received at the Abbey was from Grandpré, the day of my arrival.—' You should write to the assembly :' faid he : ' have you not yet fet about it?'—' no : and now you mention it, how shall I procure my letter to be read ?'—' I will do all I. can to promote it.'—' Very well: then I will write.'—' Do fo. I will return in a couple of hoejs.'—He left me, and I wrote.

' Citizenness ROLAND to the national convention.

Prifon of the Abbey, june 1, 1793.

" LEGISLATORS! I have just been torn from my home, from the arms of my daughter, a girl of twelve years of age, and I am detained in the Abbey, by virtue of orders, which alleged no cause for my being apprehended. These orders were issued by a revolutionary committee; and fome commissioners of the commune, who accompanied those of the committee, showed me others from the general council, which which also alleged none *." Thus I am prefumed a culprit by the public: I was conducted to prifon with great parade, in the midft of an oftentatious guard, and of a milled people, fome of whom called loudly for the scaffold; without my conductors being able to announce to any one, or inform myfelf, for what reafon I was supposed a criminal, and treated accordingly. This is not all. The bearer of the orders of the commune made no use of them except with me, and to make me fign a flatement of what paffed : when I quitted my apartment, I was delivered to the commissioners of the revolutionary committee; these conducted me to the Abbey; and on their mandate alone was I received into it. An attested copy of this mandate, figned by a fingle individual poffeffing no office, I have fubjoined. Every thing in my house has been fealed up. Whilst this was doing, which continue from three o'clock in the morning till feven, the crowd of citizens filled my apartment; and if, amongst the number, were present any malicious perfon, who entertained a defign of privately flipping papers, calculated to throw on me the imputation of guilt, into a library open in all parts, he could not fail of opportunity.

• Yesterday, the fame committee had already fought to put under arrest the late minister, whom the laws render accountable to you alone for the acts of his administration, and who has been inceffantly foliciting you to pass on them your judgment.

• The words between double commas had been changed.

Roland

* Roland protefted against the order, and the bearers of it withdrew. He left his house alone, to spare Errour a crime, whilft I had repaired to the convention, to give it information of these attempts: but I procured a letter to be transmitted to the prefident to no purpole, for it was not read. I went to demand justice and protection: I demand them again, with fresh claims, for I too am now oppressed. I demand of the convention, to order an account of the caufe and the manner of my being apprehended, to be laid before it; and to decide upon them. If it confirm my arreft, I appeal to the law, which ordains the enunciation of the crime, and the examination of the prifoner within twenty-four hours from the time of his caption. Finally I demand a report on the accounts of that irreproachable man, who exhibits an inftance of perfecution unheard of before, and who feems defined to give nations the terrible leffon of virtue proferibed by the blindness of prejudice.

' If to have thared the ftrictnets of his principles, the energy of his courage, and the ardour of his love of liberty, be my crime; I plead guilty, and await my punithment. Give fentence, legislators: France, freedom, the fate of the republic, and of yourfelves, depend neceffarily this day on the distribution of that justice, which it is yours to dispense.'

The agitation, in which I had paffed the preceding night, made me feel extreme fatigue. I defired to have a chamber that fame evening; and I obtained one, of which I took pofferfion at ten o'clock. When I entered it, and found myfelf furrounded by four dirty dirty walls, faw a bed without curtains, perceived a double-grated window, and was ftruck with that fmell, which a perfon accustomed to an extremely clean apartment always finds in those which are not fo, I was fenfible, that I was indeed to inhabit a prifon. and had no pleafure to expect from my fituation. Tt was, however, fufficiently roomy; it had a fire-place; my bed-clothes were tolerable; I had a pillow, and, estimating things in themselves, without making any comparison, I deemed myself not badly accommodated. I went to bed, fully refolved to remain in it as long as I found myself comfortable there. I had not left it at ten in the morning, when Grandpré arrived. He did not appear lefs affected, but more uneafy. than the preceding evening; and his eyes furveyed the wretched room, which already appeared to me tolerable, for I had flept in it.

"How have you paffed the night?" faid he to me, the tears gliftening in his eyes .- 'I have been often waked by the noife; but I fell asleep again as foon as it was over, even in fpite of the alarm-bell, which I think I heard this morning .- Ha !- is it not founding ftill ?'-- ' Why I thought fo :-- but it is not.'- ' Be it as it pleases heaven : if they kill me, it shall be in this bed: I am fo weary, that here I will await whatever happens. Is there any thing new against the deputies?'- 'No. I have brought back your letter. We have been thinking with Champagneux, that the beginning should be softened. Here is what we have proposed for it. Then you should write a line or two to the minister of the home department, that he may addrefs your letter officially, which would afford me another another claim to folicit it's being read.'—I took the paper; I confidered it; and faid to him: 'If I thought my letter would be read as it is, I would let it remain fo, were it to obtain no fuccefs for me, for I can fcarcely flatter myfelf with the hope of juffice from the affembly. The truths addreffed to it are not for itfelf, now incapable of putting them in practice; but they fhould be faid, that the departments may hear them.'

I was aware, that my exordium might prevent the reading of the letter, and on this account it would have been folly to have retained it: the first three paragraphs therefore I omitted, and fubstituted what was proposed to me in their stead. With respect to the minister's intervention, I was sensible it would render the proceeding more regular: and though Garat fcarcely deferved the honour of being written to by me, I knew how to do it without lessensing myfelf, and wrote the following lines.

'To the MINISTER of the home department.

^c THE post which you fill, citizen, demands, that you should watch over the execution of the laws, and denounce their violation by authorities that abuse them. I am perfuaded, your justice will be eager to transmit to the convention the complaints, I have occasion to make against that oppression, of which I am the victim.²

Rifing about noon, I confidered how I fhould arrange my new apartment. With a clean napkin I covered covered a paltry little table, which I placed near my window, intending it to ferve me for a bureau, and refolving rather to eat my meals on the corner of the fire-place than on it, that I might keep it clean, and in order, for writing. Two large hat-pins, fluck into the boards, ferved me for a portmanteau. In my pocket I had Thompson's Seasons, a work which I valued on more than one account: and I made a memorandum of what other books I wanted. Firft was Plutarch's Lives of Illustrious Persons, which, at eight years of age, I used to carry with me to the church, instead of a Prayer-book [une Semaine [ainte], and which I had not read through fince: and fecondly, Hume's Hiftory of England, and Sheridan's Dictionary, in order to improve myfelf in the english language. I would rather have continued to read Mrs. Macaulay; but the perfon, who had lent me the former volumes, was certainly not at home; and I did not know where to procure the work; as I had already fought for it in vain amongst the bookfellers. I could not avoid fmiling myfelf at my preparations; for there was a great tumult: the drums were continually beating to arms, and I knew not the occasion. They will not prevent my living to my last moment, faid I to myfelf: more happy in my own confcience, than they will be animated with rage, if they come, I will advance to meet them, and go to death as a man would go to repole.

The keeper's wife came to invite me to her apartment, where she had directed my cloth to be laid, that I might dine in better air. Repairing thither, I found my faithful nurse. When she threw herself into my arms, y 16m, 18, 1776m 22 3 arms, bathed with tears, and choked with fobs; I could not avoid melting into tendernefs and forrow, and almost upbraided myself for remaining tranquil, whilft I reflected on the anxiety of those who were attached to me; and figuring to myfelf the agony of this perfon and that, I felt an indefcribable oppreffion at my heart. Poor woman! how many tears have I caufed her to fhed! and for what does an attachment like her's atone. In the common intercourfe of life she has fometimes offended me by her bluntness; but it has been when the has thought me too negligent of what might contribute to my health or happinefs; and when I have fuffered, the office of complaining has been her's, that of confoling has been mine. Such was the cafe now. I showed her, that, by giving way to her grief, the would be lefs capable of rendering me fervice; that fhe was more ufeful to me without, than fhe could be within the walls of the prifon, where the begged me to permit her to remain; and that, upon the whole, I was far from being fo unfortunate as the imagined, which was true. Whenever I have been ill, I have experienced a particular kind of ferenity, unquestionably flowing from my mode of contemplating things, and from the precept I have laid down for myself, always to endeavour to soften neceffary ills, instead of revolting against them. The moment I take to my bed, every duty feems to me at an end, and no folicitude for any thing lays hold of me: I have nothing to do, but remain there, and remain with refignation; which I do with a good grace. I give free fcope to my imagination; I call up agree. able impressions, pleasing remembrances, and ideas of happiness; happines: all exertions, reasonings, calculations, I discard: resigning myself wholly to nature, and peaceful like her, I suffer pain without impatience, or repose myself and am cheerful. I find imprisonment produces on me nearly the same effect as disease: nothing farther is required of me than to remain here, and what great hardship is that? my own company is not fo very bad!

I foon learnt, that I must change my habitation. Victims were plentiful, and my chamber would contain more than one bed. Thus, that I might be alone. I was obliged from that evening to be flut up in a little closet, and confequently to remove my little establishment. The window of my new apartment was, I believe, over the fentry, who guarded the prifon-gate. All the night long I heard, who goes there ? -kill him !-guard !- hatrole !- called with a thundering voice. The houfes were lighted up: and from the number and frequency of the patroles it was eafy to infer, that there had been fome commotions, or that tumults were feared. I rofe early, and employed myfelf about my household affairs; that is to fay, making my bed, cleaning my little place, and rendering it and myself as neat as I could. Had I defired thefe things to be done for me, I knew they would not have been refused; but I was aware, that I must have paid for them dearly, waited a long time, and had them very fuperficially done at laft. Thus by taking the office on myself I gained much: I should be better and fooner ferved, and the trifling prefents I might give would be the more confidered, as they would be gratuitous. With impatience I waited to hear the maffy bolts bolts of my door opened, that I might alk for a newfpaper. I read it: the decree of impeachment against the twenty-two was passed: the paper fell from my hands, and in a transport of grief I exclaimed: 'my country is lost!'

Whilft I imagined myfelf alone beneath the yoke of oppression, or nearly alone, proud and tranquil I formed wilhes, and retained fome hopes, for the defenders of liberty. But now guilt and errour have obtained the afcendency: the natural reprefentation is violated, it's unity is broken, and every one in it diftinguished for probity united with talents and reputation is profcribed: the commune of Paris rules the legislative body; Paris is loft; the torch of civil war is lighted; the enemy will profit by our divisions; for the north of France freedom is no more; and the whole republic is delivered over to the most fearful ravages. Sublime illusions, generous facrifices, hope, happinefs, and country, adieu! At twelve years old I lamented, in the first expansions of my young heart, that I was not born at Sparta, or at Rome: in the french revolution I thought I faw the unexpected application of the principles, with which my mind was imbued: liberty, faid I, has two fources; good manners, which make fage laws; and knowledge, which guides us to both, by instructing us concerning our rights: my bofoin will be no longer torn by the fpectacle of mankind debafed, the human race will improve, and the happiness of all will constitute the bass and the pledge of the happiness of each. Splendid chimeras! feducing ideas, by which I have been charmed ! the horrible corruption of one vast city difpels D pels you all. I have defpifed life, your lofs makes me deteft it, and I wifh to undergo the extremes of rage. Anarchifts, favages, for what wait you? Virtue ye have proferibed, fpill the blood of them who profefs it: fhed on that earth, it will render it ravenous, and make it open underneath your feet.

The courfe of things ought to have made me forefee the event: but I could not eafily bring myfelf to believe, that the danger to be apprehended would not check the bulk of the convention, and I was aftonifhed at the decifive act, which tolled the bell of it's diffolution.

Frigid indignation now mantles all my fentiments: indifferent as ever to what concerns myfelf, my hopes for others are feeble, and I await events with more curiofity than defire: I no longer live to feel, but to know. Soon I learnt, that the tumult directed to force the decree of impeachment had given fome uneafinefs about the prifons. This was the caufe of the ftrict and noify guard during the night. The citizens of the fection of Unity, too, would not obey the beat of drum, which called them to the convention; but all remained at home, to guard their property, and the prifon within their boundaries. I now faw the motive of Grandpré's alarm and difquietude, and the next day he confessed to me his apprehensions. He had repaired to the allembly, to obtain the reading of my letter; and, during eight fucceffive hours, he, as well as feveral other deputies, had repeatedly urged it to the prefident in vain : it was evident, therefore, that I should not procure it's being read. In the Monitor, I observed, my section, that that of Beaurepaire, had expressed it's fentiments in my favour, even after my imprisonment. It occurred to me, therefore, to write to it; which I did in the following terms.

· Citizens,

'THE public papers inform me, that you have placed Roland and his wife under the fafeguard of your fection. This I knew not when I was taken from home: on the contrary, the bearer of the orders of the commune reprefented to me the armed force, with which he was accompanied, as that of the fection, which he had demanded. So he expressed it in the statement of what passed. The moment I was put into the Abbey, I wrote to the convention, and addreffed myfelf to the minister of the home-department, to convey to it my complaints. I know, that he obeyed my demand, and that the letter was delivered; but it was not read. An attested copy of it I have the honour to transmit you. If the section think it not unworthy it's dignity, to become the spokesman of oppressed innocence, it may fend a deputation to the bar of the convention, to procure my just complaints, and my demand, to be there heard. This point I fubmit to it's wildom : I add no intreaty, for truth has but one language, the exposition of fatts. Citizens who love justice, are not defirous of having fupplications addreffed to them, and innocence is unaccuftomed to fupplicate.

P.S. This is the fourth day of my detention, and I have never yet been examined. I must observe, that D 2 the the order of arrest contained no charge; but expressed, that I should be interrogated the next day.'

Some days paffed without my hearing any thing. Still I was not interrogated. However, I had received feveral visits from administrators with unmeaning faces and dirty ribands, fome of whom faid they belonged to the police, others to I know not what; great fansculottes, with matted hair, strict observers of the order of the day, coming to know whether the prifoners were fatisfied with their treatment. To them all I had expressed myself with the energy and dignity fuitable to oppreffed innocence: I had noticed two or three men of good fenfe, who underftood me, without daring to take my part: and I was at dinner, when five or fix others were announced to me in one batch. Half of them came forwards: he, who took upon himfelf to fpeak for the reft, appeared to me, before he opened his lips, one of those empty-headed babblers, who judge of their own merit by the volubility of their tongues .- ' Good morrow, citizennels.'-' Good morrow, fir.'-' Are you fatisfied with this house? Have you no complaints to make of your treatment, and no demand to make for any thing ?---' I complain of being in this place : and I demand to leave it.'-- ' Is your health impaired ? or are you a little melancholic ?--- ' I am in good health, and not in the least melancholic. The spleen is the disease of them, who have a vacuity of intellect, and whofe minds are destitute of resource. But I have a strong sense of injustice, and protest against that, which has confined me me without alleging a caufe, and detained me without examination.'-- 'O, in a period of revolution, there is fo much to be done, that there is not time for every thing.'-- 'A woman, to whom king Philip made almost the fame reply, answered him: " if thou have not time to do me justice, thou hass not time to be king." Take care you do not oblige oppressed citizens to fay the fame thing to the people, or rather to the arbitrary authorities, by which the people is misled.'--- 'Adieu, citizenness !'--- 'Adieu !'---And away went my chatterer, for want of knowing what to fay to my reasons. These people appeared to me to have come purposely to see how I should look in a cage; but they would walk a great way, before they would find in it dolts like themselves.

I have already mentioned my having inquired into the way of living in thefe places: not that I fet any great value on what people call the comforts of life, which I use without fcruple, when no inconvenience arises from their use, though always with moderation, and which I can without difficulty forego: but my natural disposition to orderlines prompts me to know what conflitutes my expense, that I may regulate them according to my fituation.

They informed me, that Roland, when minister, thought five livres [4s. 2d.] a day for each prisoner greatly too much, and reduced the fum to two [1s. 8d.]: but the exceffive rife in the price of provifion, which within a few months had been tripled, rendered this allowance very moderate: for the nation allowing nothing but straw and the bare walls, twenty fous [1od.] were deducted in the first instance, as an D₃ indemnification indemnification to the keeper, for the bed and trifling furniture of the room. The twenty fous remaining were to find candles, fire, if necessary, and meat and drink. To this, however, as was no more than equitable, every prifoner might add what he pleafed for his own expenses. On myself I am not fond of fpending much; and I take fome pleafure in exercifing my strength in supporting abstinence. I felt a desire of making an experiment, and trying how far the human will is capable of diminishing it's wants: but to go any great length, it is neceffary to proceed by degrees. At the end of four days, I began with retrenching my breakfast, and substituting bread and water in the room of coffee or chocolate : I fixed for my dinner one plain difh of meat, with fome vegetable; and for my fupper, pulfe; without any defert. To break myself from wine, I drank beer at first, and then I left off this. As this regimen, however, had a moral purpofe, and as I have as much averfion as contempt for useles economy, I gave a certain sum to those unfortunate prisoners who had nothing ; that, when I ate my dry bread in a morning, I might have the fatisfaction to reflect, the poor creatures would be indebted to me for being able to add fomething to their's at dinner. If I remain here fix months, I would quit the place with a healthy complexion, and a body by no means emaciated, having reduced my wants fo as to be fatisfied with foup and bread, and having gained fome bleffings unknown. I made fome prefents alfo, but with another intention, to the fervants of the prifon. When a perfon is, or appears to be, rigidly economical in point of expense, he must be

be generous to others, if he would not be blamed for it; particularly when from his expenses accrue the profits of those about him. I require no one to wait upon me; I fend for nothing; I have nothing bought; I employ no perfon: confequently I should be the worft of prifoners with the domestics, who make their little profits on what they are commissioned to provide or procure: it is fitting, therefore, that I fhould purchafe the flate of independance, in which I place myfelf; thus I render it more perfect, and make myfelf alfo beloved.

I received a few vifits from the excellent Champagneux and the worthy Bofc. The former, father of a numerous family, was attached to liberty from principle, and had professed it's found doctrines from the commencement of the revolution, in a newspaper, which he intended for the information of his fellowcitizens. He was diffinguished by a found judgment, gentle manners, and an aversion to idleness. Roland, when minister, placed him at the head of the first division of the home department. It was one of the best choices he made: though he was not less fuccessful in the felection of many other principals, as the active and ingenuous Camus, the able Fépoul, and fome others. Never were offices better filled; and nothing but the perfection of their establishments could enable Garat, to fupport a burden, to which he is unequal. To the honefty and capacity of fuch agents he is indebted for the tranquillity he is allowed to enjoy. Of this he is fenfible; and he faid with good reason, that he would quit the party, if he were obliged to make any change in his offices. Notwithftanding standing this, he will be forced to quit his post, for no talents in affiftants can compensate for a minister's want of firmnefs: irrefolution is the worft of faults in those who govern, particularly in the midst of factions. Garat and Barrière, as private individuals, would not be deemed deficient in fense or honefty : but the one charged with the executive power, and the other a legislator, would ruin all the states in the world by their half-measures: their fury for pursuing what they term conciliatory plans propels them in that oblique path, which leads directly to the precipice of confu-Statesmen should be conciliating only in mode, fion. I mean in their manner of behaving to those with whom they are connected: they should avail themfelves of the very pailions and faults of those whom they direct, or with whom they treat: but rigid in their principles, firm and rapid in action, no obstacle, no confideration, fhould make them bend in the former respect, or alter their course in the latter.

Could Roland unite with his extensive views, ftrength of mind, and prodigious activity, a little more artfulnefs of manner, he would eafily rule an empire: but his faults are prejudicial to himfelf alone, his good qualities are of infinite value to an administration.

Bofc, an old friend, of an ingenuous difpolition, and enlightened mind, came to me the firft day of my imprifonment, and was inftant to conduct my daughter to madame Creuzé-la-Touche; who receives her kindly, as one of her own children, with whom it was refolved fhe fhould remain under her own eyes. To be fenfible of all the value of this ftep, it is neceflary to know the perfons. It is neceflary to figure the feeling feeling and open-hearted Bofc, running to his friends, taking their child, intrufting her of his own accord to the most respectable family, as a pledge which he felt himself honoured in confiding to their hands, and which he knew would be received with the pleasure experienced by delicate minds, when an opportunity of doing good is offered them. And it is neceffary to have been acquainted with the patriarchal manners, and the domestic virtues of Creuzé and his wife, and the gentleness and goodness of their characters, to form a due estimate of the worth of this reception.

Who, then, is to be pitied in all this? Roland alone: Roland, perfecuted, profcribed: Roland, the examination of whofe accounts has been refufed; Roland, compelled to conceal himfelf as a criminal, to avoid the blind fury of men mifled by his enemies; to tremble even for the fafety ot thofe who fhelter him; to fwallow in filence the imprifonment of his wife, and the fealing up every thing belonging to him;—and to await, in a flate of incertitude, the reign of juffice, which can never indemnify him for all, that perverfity has made him fuffer.

My fection, imbibed with the beft principles, paffed, on the third, a decree, which breathed them, and which eftablished the right of citizens, to proteft against arbitrary imprisonment, and even result such as might be attempted. My letter was read there, and listened to with concern. The debate, that took place on it, being prolonged to the next day, the mountaineers concerted together: the alarm was given to their party: a number of deputations of the violent of the other sections arrived, to fetter the progress of the deliberations, and if possible corrupt the temper temper of this, or frighten it by threats, and induce a majority of the fections to dilarm it.

Whilft these things was going on, urged by Grandpré to neglect no means of shortening the term of my captivity, I wrote again to Garat, and also to Gohier. The latter, whom I have scarcely ever seen, possessed to more firmness than Garat, and has appeared to me inferiour to him in every other respect. I could not easily write to such men, without giving them lessess; and they were severe. Grandpré thought them mortifying, though just: I softened fome of the expressions; and dispatched what follows.

* Citizennels ROLAND to the MINISTER of justice.

Prison of the Abbey, june 8, 1793.

[•] I AM fuffering oppreffion : I am entitled, therefore, to remind you of my rights and your duties.

^c An arbitrary order, without fpecifying any charge, has plunged me into a place prepared for culprits. In it I have refided a week, without being examined.

' The laws are known to you. They direct you to vifit the prifons, and to fet at liberty them, who are detained without caufe. Lately, too, a decree has been paffed, which enjoins you to take care, that the orders for arrefts are flown to you, to examine whether they allege any charge, and to caufe the perfons who are imprifoned to be interrogated.

⁶ I transmit to you an attested copy of that, by virtue of which I have been forced from my home, and brought hither.

'I demand the execution of the law, on my own account,

count, and on your's. Innocent and firm, injustice reaches without debasing me, and I can submit to it with pride, at a time when virtue is proferibed*. Of your will, placed as you are between the law and disconsour, there can be no doubt; and you are to be pitied, if you have not courage to act according to it.'

' To the MINISTER of the home department.

June 8, 1793.

"I know you have transmitted my complaints to the legislative body; but my letter has not been read. Have you fulfilled the whole of your duties by forwarding it at my request ?---I have been apprehended, without any cause being alleged: I have been detained a week, without having been interrogated. It behoves you, filling a public post, to endeavour the delivery of that innocence, which you could not preferve from oppression.

'You are more interefted, perhaps, than myfelf, in the office I invite you to undertake. I am not the fole victim of prejudice and envy: and their prefent purfuit of every one, who unites virtue with talents, renders honourable the perfecution, of which I am the object, and which is owing to my connexion with the venerable man, whofe caufe pofterity will revenge. But you, who are now at the helm, if you be incapable of guiding it with a firm hand, will not escape the reproach of having yielded the veffel to the waves,

* Here followed originally: 'But it is incumbent on you, placed between the law and diffonour, either to fulfil the duties of your place, or relign it; elfe muft you incur that infamy, with which postetity will brand weaknefs like your's.' [44] and the difgrace of having remained at a post, the functions of which you could not execute.

Factions pass away, justice alone remains: and of all the faults of men in place weakness is the least pardoned; for it is the fource of the greatest diforders, particularly in troublous times.

• I need not add any thing to these reflections, if they reach you in time for you and for myself, or urge their application to what concerns me: fince nothing can supply the want of courage and of will.'

Minifters, who have neglected and defpifed the decrees, that enjoined them to feek out the authors of the maffacre of feptember, and the confpirators of the roth of march; men, whofe weak and unworthy conduct on those occasions emboldened guilt, favoured criminality, and affured this new infurrection, in which blindness and audacity, prefcribing laws to the national convention, call forth all the evils of civil war; will not be the impeachers of oppression. From them I expect nothing: the truths I address to them are calculated much more to show them what they ought, and what they have failed, to do; than to procure me that justice, which they are incapable of rendering, unless a little shame produce a miracle.

Elop reprefents all the animals, who ufually trembled at the afpect of the lion, coming to infult him when ill, each in his turn : thus the mob of inferiour men, deceived or jealous, attack with fury them, whom oppreffion holds captive, or whole capabilities it diminifhes, by changing the public opinion refpecting them. Of this the Thermometer of the Day, for for the 9th of june, No. 526, affords an example. There appears, under the title of examination of L. P. d'Orleans, a feries of questions, amongst which the following acculation is to be noticed: that he had been present at secret cabals, held by night at the apartment of the wife of Buzot, in the suburb of St. Germain; at which were present Dumouriez, Roland and his wife, Vergniaux, Brissot, Gensonné, Gorsa, Louvet, Petion, Cuadet, &c.'

What profundity of wickedness! and what excess of impudence! The deputies here named are precifely those, who voted for the banishment of the Bourbons. Those proud defenders of freedom never confidered d'Orleans as a leader possessed of capacity; but he always appeared to them a dangerous implement. They were the first to dread his vices, his wealth, his connexions, his popularity, and his faction; and to denounce the latter, and purfue them, whom they deemed it's agents. Louvet has marked them out in his Philippic against Robespierre; a valuable piece, as are all that have come from his pen, which hiftory will carefully preferve; in which he follows them ftep by ftep to the electoral affembly, whence d'Orleans iffued a deputy. Buzot, whole perfevering energy has drawn on him the hatred of the factions, feized the first instant he thought favourable, to demand the banishment of the Bourbons; a measure, which he regarded as indifpenfable, from the moment the convention took upon itfelf to pass judgment on Lewis. Neither Roland, nor I, ever visited d'Orleans. Even Sillery, who I am told is a good and amiable man, I have avoided admitting to my houfe, becaufe because his connexion with d'Orleans rendered me fuspicious of him. I remember two striking letters on this fubject; one of which was written by madame Sillery to Louvet, after he had supported the motion of Buzot. ' See here a proof,' faid Louvet, fhowing it to me, ' that we are not miltaken, and that the Orleans party is no chimera. Madame Sillery would not write to me in fuch terms, were the not in concert with the parties concerned: and if they be fo much afraid of banishment, it must be because exile will defeat fome of their fchemes.' In fact, the obiect of the fludied letter of madame Sillery was to induce Louvet to change his opinion : fhe endeavouring to perfuade him, that the republican principles, in which the children of d'Orleans had been educated, would render them the most zealous supporters of a commonwealth; and that it was equally cruel and impolitic, to facrifice unquestionably useful subjects to absurd prejudices.

The other letter was Louvet's anfwer, which exhibited his motives for his opinion with force, yet delivered them with politenefs. In it he obferved, that the monarchical principles, and ariftrocatical and other prejudices, which appeared in the works of madame Sillery herfelf, were far from fatisfying him with respect to those of her pupils; and with the dignity of a free man he perfisted in an opinion, which the love of his country infpired.

With refpect to the pretended cabals at Buzot's wife's, nothing in the world could be fo ridiculous. Buzot, who visited us frequently at the time of the conflituent affembly, with whom I remained in friendly intercourse, intercourfe, and whole courage, fenfibility, purity of principles, and gentleness of manners, inspired me with infinite esteem and attachment, came frequently to the residence of the minister of the home-department: his wife I visited only once, after their arrival at Paris, when he was sent up to the convention: and they had no kind of connexion with Dumouriez.

Indignant at these absurdities, I took up my pen to write to Dulaure, the editor of the Thermometer of the Day, a worthy man, who had visited me, till he was feduced by the mountain*.

Citizenness ROLAND to the deputy DULAURE, author of the Thermometer of the Day.

Prifon of the Abbey : june 9, 1793.

• IF any thing could add to the aftoni/hment of innocence, when it finds itfelf underneath the yoke of oppreffion, I would tell you, citizen, that I had just read with the greatest furprise the absurdities delivered in your paper of this day, under the title of interrogation of Philip d'Orleans, which chance has thrown into my hands. It would seem very strange, had not experience proved it to be only very audacious, that those perfons, who first feared, announced, and pursued an Orleans faction, should be represented as having formed it themselves.

'Time will unquestionably clear up this mystery of iniquity: but whilst it's justice may be tardy in the midst of such fearful corruption, it appears to me in-

• I have fince learnt, that the late excelles of the mountain have opened his eyes, and brought him to a proper scale of it's principler.

cumbent on your's, when publishing the questions of an interrogatory calculated to differinate fuspicions, to annex the answers, which must have been made, and which may enable an estimate of them to be formed

' This justice is the more strictly requisite, as calumny and perfecution follow the fteps of the perfons named in these questions, and as most of them are in the toils of a decree, fnatched by audacity and prejudice from the hands of weakness and errour. I myself have been in prifon a week, in virtue of a mandate which alleges no charge: I have never been examined: I have not been able to obtain a hearing of my complaints from the convention; and when it was announced to it, that they had been fuppreffed, it paffed to the order of the day, under pretence that they concerned it not. What, then, new authorities act arbitrarily, the conflituted authorities bow before them, and ought not the injuffices they commit to be laid before the convention? Is it not to the legislative body, that complaints fhould be addreffed, when there remains none other to hear them? It can interest itself for them, who are confined by order of the tribunal of Marfeilles; whilft I and confined here by a revolutionary committee, and my rights are no more !-And the commune makes the newspapers repeat, that the prifons of Paris contain only affaffins, thieves, and counter-revolutionists !-- Citizen, I have known you : I believe you honeft: how will you grieve at fome future day !-- I transmit to you fome notes, which I request you to peruse : and I recommend to you, to infert in your paper that letter, which I could not prevail vail on the convention to read. That you owe me this justice, circumstances sufficiently demonstrate : on which, if it be poffible for you not to perceive this, it would be useless for me to fay more.

P.S. Neither Roland nor I ever vifited Philip d'Orleans: and I ought to add, that I have always heard the deputies mentioned in the interrogatory, as quoted in the Thermometer of this day, profess for him the fame contempt as I have always felt; and if ever we have talked about him, our conversation has turned on the fears, which the true friends of liberty must experience on his account, and the necessity of banishing him for that reason.'

As circumstances have led me to mention Dumonriez, I will fay what I know of him, and what I think : but this carries me back to the first ministry of Roland, and incites me to relate here how this auftere man came to be nominated to a place, which kings feldom call a man like him to fill. I fhall take up the thread of my narrative from a period fomewhat remote; and the leifure of my captivity enables me to record facts, and recollect circumffances, which but for it, perhaps, I should never have written.

Roland executed the office of infpector of commerce and manufactures in the generality of Lyons, with fuch knowledge of the fubject, and fuch administrative views, as must have distinguished him from the bulk of infpectors, had the government known how to keep up the fpirit of the inftitution, of which Roland was almost the only one who afforded an example. Superiour to his place in every refpect, fond of E of employment, and sensible to fame, he arranged in the filence of his closet the materials, which his experience and activity had enabled him to collect; and he continued the Dictionary of Manufactures for the new Encyclopedia. Briffot prefented fome of his works to Roland, as a testimony of the esteem, with which the principles of justice and liberty he observed in his writings had infpired him. These were received with the fenfibility natural to authors, and that of a worthy man, who receives the commendations of others like himfelf: and gave birth to a correspondence, at first not very frequent; afterwards supported by that of one of our friends, who became acquainted with Briffot at Paris, and spoke of him with much praise, as applying to practice the philosophical and moral theory of his works; and ultimately cherished by the revolution of 1789: for events daily multiplying strongly exercised the minds of philosophers prepared for liberty, and produced interesting communications between those, who were enflamed with the love of their fellow-creatures, and the hope of feeing the reign of justice and happiness over all arrive. Briffot having at this juncture begun a periodical work, the excellence of the reasoning in which will make it often confulted, we fent to him every thing, of which circumstances induced us to suppose the publication ufeful. This fpeedily improved our acquaintance : and we became intimate and confidential friends, before we had feen each other.

Amidît those crises inevitable in a period of revolution, when principles, prejudices, and passions, raise insurmountable obstacles between persons, who before fore well agreed, Roland was cholen into the municipality of Lyons. His fituation in life, his family, and his connexions, were fuch as might be fuppofed to attach him to the ariftocracy : whilft his character and disposition rendered him interesting to the popular party, to which his philosophy and austerity much inclined him. No fooner had he taken a decided part. than he found enemies, fo much the more violent, as his inflexible integrity proclaimed without referve all the abuses, which had multiplied in the administration of the finances of the town. This in fact exhibited an epitome of the dilapidations of those of the state, and Lyons had it's debt of forty millions [£1,666,667]. It was neceffary to folicit affiftance, for the manufactures had fuffered, and twenty thousand workmen had been without bread during the winter. To impart the fituation of Lyons to the conftituent allembly, it was refolved to fend a deputy extraordinary, and Roland was chosen. We arrived at Paris the 20th of february, 1701; after I had been absent from the place of my nativity five years. I had followed the progrefs of the revolution, and the labours of the affembly, and had ftudied the characters and talents of it's leading members, with an interest not easy to be conceived, and fcarcely to be appreciated except by them who knew my activity and turn of mind. Ι ran to the fittings: I faw the powerful Mirabeau*,

* The only man in the revolution, whole genius could guide the reft, and fway the whole affembly. Great from his talents, little from his vices, but always fuperiour to the herd, and infallibly maflet of himfelf, whenever he would take the pains to command his paffions. He died foon after : I thought feafonably for his fame, and for freedom :

the aftonishing Cazalès, the daring Maury, the artful Lameths, the frigid Barnave: I remarked with vexation that kind of fuperiority on the fide of the blacks*, which the habit of representation, purity of language, and diftinguished manners, give in large affemblies; but the strength of reason, the courage of integrity, the lights of philosophy, the knowledge of office, and the fluency of the bar, must secure the triumphs of the patriots of the left, if they were all honess, and could remain in unifon.

Briffot came to vifit us. I know nothing fo pleafant as the first interview between perfons, who are connected by correspondence, without knowing each other's faces. With mutual curiofity they examine each other, to fee whether the physiognomy accord with the features of the mind, and the exteriour appearance confirm the opinion entertained of the perfon. The simple manners, natural negligence, and ingenuous frankness of Briffot, appeared to me in perfect harmony with the austerity of his principles: but I found in him a fort of levity of mind and dispofition, which was not equally fuitable to the gravity of a philosopher. This always gave me pain, and of this his enemies always took advantage. In proportion as I became more acquainted with him, I esteemed does : though users have influenced me to regret him more. The consterpoise of a man of fuch weight was wanting, to equiponderate the action of a pack of curs, and preferve us from the domination of Puffians.

The court party, fo called. The uniform of the emigrants affembled at Coblemz with the princes was black. Tranf.

him more. It is not in human nature to combine more complete difinterestedness with greater zeal for the public welfare, or to purfue the general good with more entire forgetfulnels of felf: but his writings are better fitted than his perfon to effectuate it.; for they carry all the authority, which reason, justice, and intelligence can impress; whilst perfonally he can affume none, for want of dignity. He is the best of men: a good hufband, an affectionate father, a faithful friend, a virtuous citizen : in fociety as gentle, as his temper is eafy, confiding to imprudence, gay, fimple, and ingenuous as at fifteen : he was framed to live with the wife, and to be the dupe of the wicked. Learned in the fcience of law, inclined from his youth to fludy the relations of fociety, and the means of human happines, he has formed a found judgment of man, yet is totally unacquainted with men. He knows, that vices exist; but he cannot believe any one vicious, who fpeaks to him with an open countenance: and when he has discovered a person to be so, he treats him as an idiot, who is to be pitied, without miltrufting him. Of hatred he is incapable: you would fay his mind, with all it's fenfibility, poffeffes not fufficient firmnels for a fentiment of fuch energy. Extensive in his knowledge, he writes with extreme facility, and composes a treatife, as another would copy a fong; hence the difcriminating eye detects in his works the hafty touch of a quick, and often light mind, though the matter is excellent. His activity and good-nature; rejecting nothing he imagines to be of utility, have given him an appearance of meddling with every thing; and have led them to accuse him of intrigues who E 3 who wanted to accuse him of fomething. It is laughable, to call fuch a man an intriguer; who never thinks of himfelf, or those belonging to him; who is equally incapable, and averfe, to ftudy his own private intereft; and who is no more assamed of poverty, than he is afraid of death, thinking both the one and the other the usual rewards of public virtue. I have seen him dedicating his whole time to the revolution, for no other end, than to forward the triumph of truth, and promote the general warfare; and, whilft affiduoufly occupied in the publication of his paper, of which he might eafily have made confiderable profit, contenting himfelf with the moderate emolument allowed him by his partner. His wife, humble as himself, a woman of good fenfe, and fome ftrength of mind, judged more feverely of things. Ever fince their marriage her views had been turned towards the United States of America, as the abode most fuitable to their tastes and manners, and where they might eafily fettle with a very moderate fortune. Briffot had made a voyage thither in consequence; and they were on the point of embarking for that shore, when the revolution chained him here. Born at Chartres, and the comrade of Pétion, who was a native of the fame town. Briffot connected himfelf still more intimately with him in the conftituent affembly, where his labours and intelligence were often of affiftance to his friend. He brought us acquainted with him, as well as with feveral other deputies, whom former acquaintance, or merely fimilitude of principles, and zeal for the public good, induced often to meet together, to converse on the common caufe. It was even fixed, that they fhould fhould come to my house four evenings in the week, because I was sedentary, and well accommodated, and my apartment was so situated, as to be at no great distance from any of them, who composed these little committees.

This arrangement fuited me perfectly: it made me acquainted with the progrefs of affairs, in which I was firongly interefted; and it favoured my tafte for purfuing political fpeculations, and ftudying men. I knew what part became one of my fex, and I never ftepped out of it. The converfations took place in my prefence, without my mixing in them. Sitting at a table without the circle, I employed my fingers in working, or writing letters, whilft the company debated: yet if I difpatched ten epiftles, which fometimes was the cafe, I loft not a fingle word of what paffed, and more than once bit my lips, to keep in my own opinion.

What ftruck me most, and gave me fingular pain, was that fort of chat and frivolity, in which men of fense passed three or four hours, without coming to any conclusion. To take things in detail, you would have heard excellent principles maintained, good ideas started, and some views opened: but taking the whole together, there was no path traced, no fixed aim, no determinate point, towards which each was to proceed in his way.

Sometimes for very vexation I could have boxed the ears of these philosophers, whom I daily learnt to efteem for the honesty of their hearts, and the purity of their intentions: excellent reasoners all, learned politicians in theory; but totally ignorant of the art of E_4 leading leading men, and confequently of fwaying an affembly, their wit and learning were commonly lavished to no end.

Yet I have known fome good decrees thus planned, which have afterwards paffed. Soon the coalition of the minority of the nobility completely weakened the left fide, and produced the evils of a revifal: there remained only a fmall number of inflexible men, who durft contend for principles; and these at length were reduced to few more than Buzot, Pétion, and Robefpierre.

At that time Robefpierre had to me the femblance of an honeft man; and for the fake of his principles I forgave the defects of his language, and his tirefome manner of speaking. I noted, however, that he was always referved in these committees: he heard the opinions of all, feldom gave his own, or did not take the trouble to deliver his reasons; and I have been told, that, the next day, the first to mount the tribune, he flourished away with the arguments, that had dropped in the evening from his friends. For this conduct he was fometimes gently reproved : when he paffed it off with a jeft; and it was forgiven him as the wile of that devouring felf-love, with which he was really tormented. This could not do otherwife than diminish in fome degree mutual confidence: for if fomething were to be proposed, and it was necessary to agree on what was to be done, or to distribute the feveral parts in confequence, there could never be any certainty, that Robespierre would not come, as it were in a freak, and throw himfelf athwart the bufinefs ; or inconfiderately bring forward the attempt before it was ripe, ripe, from a defire of afcribing to himfelf the honour of it; and thus frustrate the defign. Persuaded that Robefpierre was paffionately enamoured of liberty, I was inclined to attribute his faults to an excels of fiery zeal. That kind of referve. which feems to indicate a man's fear of fuffering himfelf to be feen through, because he is confcious it would not be to his advantage to be known, or the diftrust of one who finds in himfelf no reafon to credit virtue in another. and which diffinguishes Robespierre, gave me pain; but I miftook it for bashfulnels. Thus with a lucky prejudice in favour of a perfon, we transform the most untoward indications into fymptoms of the most amiable qualities. Never did the finile of confidence reft on the lips of Robespierre, whilst they are almost always contracted by the four grin of envy, aiming to appear difdain. His talents, as an orator, were below mediocrity: his mean voice, ill chofen expressions, and faulty pronunciation, rendered his discourse very tirefome. But he maintained principles with warmth and perfeverance; and there was fome courage in continuing to do this, at a time when the defenders of the caufe of the people were infinitely diminished in number. The court detefted and calumniated them: to fupport and encourage them, therefore, was the duty of the patriots. I effected Robefpierre on this account, and I told him fo; and when he was not a very conftant attendant at the little committee, he occafionally came to dine with me. I had been ftruck with the terrour he discovered the day of the king's flight to Varennes. That afternoon I met him at Pétion's, where he faid with alarm, that the royal family would would not having taken fuch a step, without having a coalition in Paris, to direct a maffacre of the patriots; and that he expected not to live four and twenty hours. Pétion and Briffot on the contrary faid, that this flight would be the king's ruin, and that advantage must be taken of it: that the people were excellently difpofed, and would be more clearly convinced of the treachery of the court by this flep, than they would have been by the ableft publications: that this fingle fact rendered it evident to all, that the king would not maintain the conflitution, to which he had fworn: and that this was the time to fecure one lefs heterogenous, and, in order to it, prepare men's minds for a republic. Robefpierre, with his usual fneer, and biting his nails, afked what was a republic! The plan of a paper entitled the Republican, of which two numbers only were published, was now formed. Dumont of Geneva, a fenfible man, was the editor; du Châtelet, an officer in the army, lent his name; and Condorcet, Briffot, and others, prepared to affift in it. The feizure of Lewis XVI gave Robespierre great pleafure ; for in it he faw the prevention of mischief, and ceafed to fear tor himfelf: the others were grieved at it; they perceiving the return of a peft into the go vernment, that intriguing would revive, and that the effervescence of the people, allayed by the pleasure of feeing the culprit detained, would no longer fecond the efforts of the friends of freedom. They judged rightly; and the more furely, becaufe the reconciliation of Lafayette with the Lameths proved to them the existence of a new coalition, which could not have the public good for it's foundation. It was not poffible to counterbalance counterbalance it, unlefs by the force of the general opinion difplayed in a powerful manner; for which the patriots had only their pens, and their voices; but when fome popular commotion came to their aid, they availed themfelves of it with pleafure, without inquiring how it was produced, or giving themfelves much concern about it. There was behind the curtain an interefted perfon, whom the ariftocrats accufed with fuch vehemence, that the patriots were tempted to pardon him, fo long as they perceived nothing, but what might be turned to the common good: befides, they could not perfuade themfelves, that he was any way formidable.

It is not easy to command our passions in the time of a revolution: there is indeed no inftance of one accomplified without them. Great obstacles are to be overcome : and this cannot be affected without an ardour, and a devotion to the caufe, which must either proceed from enthuliafm, or produce it. When this is the cafe, we feize with avidity what may ferve our purpose, and lose the faculty of perceiving what may prove injurious. Hence that confidence, that eagerness to profit by a fudden movement, without tracing it to it's origin, to know justly how to direct it : hence that indelicacy, if I may fo fay, in the concurrence of agents whom we do not efteem, but whom we permit to act, because they appear to promote the same end. D'Orleans standing singly was surely not to be feared : but his name, his relationships, his wealth, and his advisers, gave him great means: he acted unquestionably a fecret part in all the popular commotions: men of pure intentions suspected it, but these ferments they deemed neceffary, to raise the inert mass: they contented themfelves felves with taking no fhare in them, and flattered themfelves, that they fhould turn all to the benefit of the public: befides, they were more inclined to attribute to d'Orleans the defire of revenging himfelf on a court, which had defpifed him, and which he would be well-pleafed to humble, than the defign of his own elevation.

The jacobins proposed a petition to the assembly, to demand of it, to pass judgment on the traitor, who had fled : or to request it, to take the fense of the people on the punishment, which he might deferve; and in the mean time to declare, that he had loft the confidence of those of Paris. Laclos, a man of great parts, whom nature had formed for comprehensive views, and whose vices had dedicated all his faculties to intrigue; Laclos, devoted to d'Orleans, and of great weight in his council, made this propofal to the jacobins: who received it, and with whom it was abetted by fome hundreds of tumultuaries and street-walkers, who tumbled from the Palais-Royal into the place of their meeting at ten o'clock at night. I faw them arrive. The fociety deliberated with that mob, who alfo voted; it decreed the fubitance of the petition; and it appointed a committee to draw it up, in which were Laclos and Briffot. They were employed on it that very night: for it had been refolved, that a deputation of the fociety should carry it to the Champ-de-Mars the next day, there to be fhown to all, who might wifh to examine and fign it. Laclos pretended a head-ach arifing from want of fleep, which would not fuffer him to hold the pen, and requested Brissot to take it; and conversing with him on the composition, he proposed, for for the last article, I know not what claufe, which revived royalty, and opened a door for d'Orleans. Briffot, furprised, rejected it with eagerness; and the other. an able politician, gave it up, with the pretence of not having fufficiently weighed it's confequences: well knowing, that he could still flide it in; and in fact it did appear in the printed paper diffeminated abroad as the refolution of the jacobins. But when the fociety, affembled the next morning to examine the petition drawn up, and fend it away, was informed, that the national affembly had decided on the queftion of the king, it difpatched a committee to the Champ-de-Mars, to announce to the people, that the decree refpecting the king having paffed, the proposed petition could no longer take place. I was at the Champ-de-la-Federation *, led thither by curiofity. There were not more than two or three hundred perfons difperfed about the environs of the altar of the country, from which deputies of the cordeliers, of the fraternal focieties, bearing pikes with inflammatory infcriptions, harangued the by-ftanders, and animated their indignation against Lewis XVI. It was faid, the jacobins having suppressed their petition, it was requisite, that the zealous citizens should frame another, and affemble the next day for that purpose. At this juncture the partifans of the court, feeling the necessity of striking terrour into these, combined together the means of making a grand stroke. The trains were laid in confequence; and the unexpected proclamation of martial law, and it's prompt execution, produced what has been justly called the maffacre of the Champ-de-Mars. The terrified people durft not ftir: part of the national guard, feduced or deceived, feconding Lafayette, from obfequioufnefs to the court, or blind confidence in his pretended patriotifm, ferved as a rampart againft it's fellow-citizens: the ftandard of death was difplayed from the town-hall, and the whole of the revision was made under it's influence. The eftablifhment of the feuillans had been planned much about the fame time, to weaken the jacobins; and certainly the whole proceedings of the coalition at that period evinced, how much the court and it's partifans were fuperiour to their adverfaries in weaving a tiffue of intrigues.

I never knew affright comparable to that of Robefpierre under these circumstances. There was indeed a talk of putting him on his trial, meant probably to intimidate him; and it was faid, that there was a plot hatching at the Feuillans against him, and the committee, who drew up the petition at the Jacobins. Roland and I were really uneafy on his account. We drove to his houfe, at the farther end of the Marsh, at eleven at night, to offer him an afylum : but he had already quitted his habitation. Thence we proceeded to Buzot, to tell him, that perhaps he would do well, without leaving the fociety of the jacobins, to enter into that of the feuillans, to fee what passed, and to be ready to defend any whom they might intend to perfecute. Buzot hefitated fome time, at length he faid: fpeaking of Robefpierre: ' I would do any thing to fave that unhappy young man; though I am far from entertaining the fame opinion of him as fome others:

others: he thinks too much of himfelf, to be greatly in love with liberty; but he ferves it's caufe, and that is enough for me. Yet the public must take place of him. I should be inconfistent in my principles, and give a false idea of them, if I went to the Feuillans. I have too much repugnance to a part, that would give me two faces. Grégoire is gone thither : he will let us know what paffes : and nothing can be done against Robespierre, without the agency of the affembly. where I shall always be ready to defend him. For my part, I have feldom gone to the Jacobins of late, becaufe the fet grieves me, and appears more hideous in it's noify affemblies; but I shall be affiduous in my attendance there, as long as the voice of perfecution is raifed against a fociety, which I believe to be useful to the cause of freedom.' These words paint the mind of Buzot: he acts, as he speaks, with truth and rectitude: his character is probity itfelf, arrayed in the pleafing garb of fenfibility. I had diftinguished him in our little committee, by the foundness of his advice. and that decided manner, which characterifes a man of integrity. He lived not far from us : he had a wife, an affable woman, but not on a par with him; and we visited frequently. When the fuccess of Roland's million with respect to the debt of the commune of Lyons allowed us to return to Beaujolois, we kept up a correspondence with Buzot and Robespierre. That with the former was the more regular : between us there was greater fimilarity, a wider foundation for friendship, and an abundance of materials to support it. It became intimate and unalterable. Elfewhere I shall fay, how this connection was drawn closer.

The miffion of Roland detained him feven months at Paris. We quitted that city in the middle of feptember, after he had obtained for Lyons all it could defire; and we fpent the autumn in the country, employed in the vintage.

One of the last acts of the constituent assembly was the suppression of inspectors. We considered, whether we should determine to remain in the country, or rather spend the winter in Paris; there to prefer the claim of Roland to a pension, after having been forty years in office; and at the same time pursue his labours for the Encyclopedia, more easy in the focus of science, amidst artists and men of letters, than in the depth of a defert.

We returned to Paris in the month of december. The members of the conftituent affembly had returned to their feveral homes. Pétion had been appointed to the mayoralty, and was wholly occupied with the cares of that office. There was no particular object to rally around : and we faw Briffot himfelf much lefs frequently. The whole of our attention centred at home. Roland's industry led him to project the scheme of a journal of useful arts; and we sought in the pleasures of study to withdraw our minds from public affairs, the state of which appeared to us diftreffing. Many deputies of the legiflative affembly. however, met fometimes at the house of one of them. in Vendome square; and Roland, whose patriotism and knowledge were efteemed, was invited to make one of the party: but the distance he disliked, and feldom went. One of our friends, who was there frequently, informed us, about the middle of march, that the the intimidated court fought in it's embarrafiment to do fomething, to give it popularity; that it would have no aversion to form a jacobin ministry; and that the patriots were bufied in endeavouring to make the choice fall on men of steadiness and ability; which was of the more importance, because it might only be a fnare on the part of the court, which would not be forry to have wrong-headed perfons forced upon it, who might become just objects of complaint or fcorn. He added, that fome had thought of Roland, whofe character in the learned world, ministerial knowledge, and public reputation for justice and firmness, promifed stability. Roland at that time went pretty frequently to the jacobin fociety, and was one of it's committee of correspondence. The idea appeared to me visionary, and made little impression on my mind.

The 21st of the fame month, Briffot came to me in the evening, and repeated the fame obfervations upon a more politive manner; alking whether Roland would confent to take fuch a burden on his shoulders. I replied, that, having mentioned the fubject to him in the course of conversation, when it was first started, he had weighed it's difficulties and dangers, which his zeal and activity were not then disposed to reject; but it would be neceffary to examine the bufinefs more closely. The courage of Roland did not fhrink : his knowledge of his own strength inspired him with a confidence of being ferviceable to the caufe of freedom and his country: and this answer was given to Briffot the next day.

Friday, the 23d, at eleven in the evening, he came to our house with Dumouriez; who, having just left the the council, proceeded to inform Roland of his being appointed minister of the home-department, and falute him as his colleague. They remained a quarter of an hour; and a time was named for Roland to be fworn in the next day. That man, faid I to my hufband after their departure, speaking of Dumouriez, whom I then faw for the first time, has a subtle mind, and a deceitful look: perhaps he is more to be dillrufted, than any perfon in the world: he has expressed great pleafure at the patriotic choice he was employed to announce, yet I shall not be furprised, if some future day he procure your difmiffion .- Indeed, that fingle view of Dumouriez exhibited him to me fo very different from Roland, that I could not suppose it poslible, they should long remain connected together. On the one fide I beheld integrity and franknefs perfonified, and rigid justice devoid of all the qualifications of a courtier, and of the caution of a man of the world: on the other I fancied I difcovered a libertine of great parts, a hardy chevalier, who would make a jeft of any thing, except his own interest and fame. It was not difficult to infer, that fuch elements would repel cach other.

The incredible industry of Roland, his readiness in business, and his great propensity to method, soon enabled him, when minister, to arrange in his head all the branches of his department. But the principles and habits of the chief clerks rendered his employment extremely laborious. It was necessary for him to be continually on his guard, and extremely attentive, to let nothing contradictory pass; and he had perpetually to contend with his agents. He strongly felt felt the necessity of changing them : but he was too prudent to do this, before he had become familiar with affairs, and fecured perfons to fupply their places. With respect to the council, it's fittings refembled rather the converfations of a private company, than the deliberations of statesmen. Each minister carried to it orders and proclamations to be figned; and the minister of justice prefented decrees to be fanctioned. The king read the gazette; put queftions to each, refpecting his own concerns, thus artfully difplaying that kind of interest respecting them all, of which the great know how to make a merit; talked like a good fort of man about affairs in general; and at every turn professed, with an air of frankness, his defire to maintain the conflitution. I have feen Roland and Claviere almost enchanted for three weeks with the king's disposition, crediting him on his own word, and rejoicing, like honest-hearted men, at the turn things must take. 'Good God!' faid I to them: ' when I fee you fet out for the council in this unfufpecting disposition, you always feem to me on the brink of committing fome folly.'-I could never put faith in the conflitutional vocation of a king born and brought up to defpotifm, and accustomed to exercise it. Lewis XVI must have been a man far beyond the common race of mortals, to be fincerely the friend of a conftitution, that reftrained his power: and had he been fuch a man, he would never have permitted the arrival of those events, which brought on the conflitution.

The first time Roland appeared at court, the plainnefs of his apparel, his round hat, and shoes tied with ribbands. ribbands, aftonished and offended all the valets; those beings, who, their existence depending folely on etiquette, believe the fastety of the state depends on it's prefervation. The master of the ceremonies, approaching Dumouriez with an alarmed countenance and contracted brow, whispered him, glancing a look at Roland from the corner of his eye: 'why, fir! he has no buckles in his shoes!'—' Ah! fir: all is lost !' answered Dumouriez, with a gravity fit to make any one burst with laughter.

A council was held four times a week : the minifters having agreed to dine together in turn on these days, on friday they met at my table. Degrave was then minister at war. He was a little man, in every fense of the word: nature had formed him gentle and timid; his prejudices prompted him to be lofty; his heart infpired him with the defire of being amiable; and endeavouring to reconcile thefe, he became in reality nothing. Methinks I fee him walking with the gait of a courtier, his head erect on his flight body, difplaying the whites of his blue eyes, which he cannot keep open after dinner without the aid of two or three cups of coffee, fpeaking little, as through referve, but in reality for want of ideas; and at length fo bewildering himfelf in the affairs of his department, as to alk leave to retire. Lacofte, a true clerk in office of the ancient order, of which he had the infignificant and awkward look, frigid air, and dogmatic tone, wanted none of those advantages which arise from being hackneyed in busines: but his close exteriour concealed a violence of temper, the excelles of which when he was contradicted were ridiculous: and he had had neither the activity, nor extensive views, necessary for a minister. Duranthon, who had been called from Bourdeaux to be made minister of justice, was an honest man, they fay, but very indolent. His air was vain; and his timid disposition, and pompous tattle, made him always appear to me an old woman. Clavière, reputed able in finance before he was minister, has skill in that subject, I believe, of which I am no judge. Active and industrious, naturally irafcible, obstinate, as most men are, who live much in the retirement of the closet, cavilling and fliff in debate, could not avoid clashing with Roland, dry and peremptory in difpute, and not lefs attached to his opinions. These two men were formed to esteem, without ever loving each other; and they did not belie their deftiny. Dumouriez had of what is called parts more than all, and of morality lefs than any one of them. Diligent and brave, a good general, an able courtier, writing well, delivering himfelf with fluency, and capable of great undertakings, he wanted only more confiftency of mind, or a cooler head to follow the plan he had conceived. Pleafant with his friends, and ready to deceive them all; gallant with women, but by no means calculated to fucceed with thofe, whom a tender intercourfe might feduce; he was formed for ministerial intrigue, and a corrupt court. His brilliant qualities, and the interest of his fame, gave room for a perfuasion, that he might be employed with advantage in the army of the republic : and perhaps he would have proceeded in the right path, if the convention had been prudent; for he is F 2 t00 too able not to act like an honeft man, when it would promote his interest and reputation.

Degrave was fucceeded by Servan, an horeft man, in the fulleft fignification of the term, of an ardent temper and pure manners, with all the aufterity of a philofopher, and the benevolence of a feeling heart, an enlightened patriot, a brave foldier, a vigilant minifter, he needed only more coolnefs of mind, and more ftrength of character.

The troubles on the fcore of religion, and the difpolitions of foreign enemies, calling for decilive decrees, the refufal of fanctioning them completely ftripped off the veil from Louis XVI; whole good faith was already ftrongly fulpected by thole of his minifters, who had been induced to believe it real. At first the refufal was not politive: the king would confider the fubject: he put off the fanction till the following council, and always found reafons still to defer it. These procrastinations gave the ministers room to declare their fentiments boldly. Roland and Servan, in particular, infisted without ceasing, and uttered the most ftriking truths with great energy.

Their fituation became critical: the commonwealth was in danger: it was requifite, that the really patriotic minifters fhould obtain what was neceffary to fave it, or retire, that they might not be affifting in it's ruin. Roland proposed to his colleagues a letter to the king to this effect. Claviere cavilled at it's expressions. Duranthon, who liked his place, was unwilling to rifk it's loss, if he could retain it, without being a traitor confest. Lacoste did not approve of ftrong meafures; and the will of the king appeared to him, at bottom, bottom, the beft of all rules. Dumouriez left them to debate, and attended to his own cards. He meditated revenge, for what he confidered as a trick: the fact was as follows.

A certain rumour, which is not indeed the opinion of the public, but which precedes and indicates it, prevailed against Bonnecarrere, whom Dumouricz had made director-general of the department of foreign affairs. He had the reputation of an intriguer, and possessed the talents, disposition, and manners of one: at leaft fo I have heard men of probity fay, who related fome circumstances of his life, and lamented the choice Dumouriez had made.

The report was fpread of fome place being beflowed, or affair fettled, by Bonnecarrere, at the price of a hundred thousand livres [£4167], part of which was to be given to madam de Beauvert, the mistrefs of Dumouriez; who lived in his house, and prefided at his table, to the great difpleafure of men of fenfe, who were friends to morals and to liberty. For this licentioufnefs in a fervant of the public, charged with affairs of state, too strongly showed a contempt of decorum; and madam de Beauvert, fister of Rivarol, well known to his difcredit, was furrounded with imps of the aristocracy, little to be commended on any account. Had not the conduct of Dumouriez been blamable on principle, it was impolitic, and calculated to excite fufpicion.

I was frequently vifited by Briffot, and feveral other members of the legislative affembly. At my house they frequently met the ministers; and kept up that kind of intimacy with them, which is requisite amongst men, men, who, devoted to the caufe of the public, have need of understanding and informing one another, to ferve it the more effectually. The ftory of Bonnecarrere was related to one of them: the perfon told the names of the parties concerned, and the notary in whole hands the money was depolited, or who was appointed to receive it. The particulars have escaped my memory. I only recollect, that two men of character came to my house to aver them in the presence of three or four deputies, one of whom, a friend of Dumouriez, had defired to hear the whole from their mouths. It was refolved to repeat to Dumouriez, with a degree of folemnity, what had already been reprefented to him in private, on the necessity, both for the public good and his own, of making his conduct, and the choice of his agents, more conformable to the political principles, which he professed to entertain. The conversation in confequence took place in the prefence of his colleagues and three or four deputies. Roland, availing himfelf of the liberty, to which his years and character entitled him, pointed out to Dumouriez the importance of his conducting himfelf with more flrictness and prudence. Every one agreed, that this action of Bonnecarrere ought to open his eyes respecting the director-general, and determine him to beflow the place on another. Dumouriez, whom the talents of Bonnecarrere wellfuited, and who gave himfelf little concern on the fcore of morality, liftened to the remarks of his friends with great indifference, and at length rejected them with anger. From that moment he difcontinued to fee the deputies, was more cool to his colleagues, and

and no doubt thought only of difplacing thofe, whofe gravity most difpleased him. I forefaw the effect of this conference, and faid to Roland: ' if you were an intriguer, capable of modelling your conduct after the errours of the ancient court and it's practice, I would fay, that the moment is come, to ruin Dumouriez, left he play you fome ill turn.' But honess men understand not this petty warfare; and Roland was as incapable of having recourss to it, as ill-fitted to conduct it.

The postponement of the fanction became a refusal: the utmost verge of delay was at hand. We felt, that, the council not possessing fufficient unity and vigour to deliver it's fentiments in a body, it besitted the integrity and courage of Roland, to advance alone; and between us we concluded on his famous letter to the king. He had carried it with him to the council, to read it openly, the very day when the king, prefied anew for his fanction, required each of his ministers to give him his opinion written and figned, and quickly diverted the conversation to other affairs. Roland returned home, added a few missive lines to his letter, and delivered the whole into the hands of the king the 1 th of june in the morning.

The next day, the 12th, in the evening, Servan came to our houfe with a fmiling countenance, and faid to me: ' give me joy: I have the honour of being difmiffed.'--' My hufband, then, ' replied I, ' will foon fhare it; and I am a little piqued, that you take the lead.'--He related to me, that, having gone to the king in the morning on fome private affairs, he had fpoken to him with warmth on the neceffity of the camp of twenty twenty thousand men, if he meant fincerely to oppose the defigns of the enemy; that the king turned his back upon him in very ill humour; and that Dumou. riez, at the inftant, came from the war-office, whither he had gone to take his portfolio, in virtue of an order, of which he was the bearer .- ' Dumouriez ?' - Yes: he is acting a vile part; but I am not furprifed at it.'-The three preceding days Dumouriez had been frequently at the Tuileries, and held long conferences with the queen; with whom, it may not be impertinent to observe, Bonnecarrere had some interest, through the women. Roland, informed that Servan was in my apartment, quitted the perfons to whom he was giving audience, heard what had occurred, and invited his colleagues, Dumouriez excepted, to come to him.

It was Roland's opinion, that they fhould not wait for their difmiffion: but, that of Servan being profiounced, it became all, who profeffed the fame principles, to offer their refignations; unlefs the king recalled Servan, and difmiffed Dumouriez, with whom they could no longer fit at the council-table. Had the four minifters afted thus, the court, I have no doubt, would have been a little embarraffed to replace them, Lacofte and Duranthon would have been rendered more flriking to the public: but it became fo in a different manner.

The ministers arrived, and deliberated together, without coming to any refolution, except that they should meet the next morning at eight, and Roland should prepare a letter in the mean time. I could never never have believed, had not circumstances brought me to experience it, how rarely correctness of judgment and firmness of character are to be found ; confequently how few men are fit for the management of affairs, and still lefs to govern. Would you have these two qualities united to perfect difinterestedness in one man, he is the phenix, fcarcely poffible to be found. It is no longer furprising to me, that men fuperiour to the vulgar, and placed at the head of empires, commonly entertain a fovereign contempt for their fpecies: it is the almost inevitable confequence of an extensive knowledge of the world; and to escape the faults, into which it may lead them, to whom the happiness of nations is entrusted, requires an extraordinary fund of philosophy and magnanimity.

Their appointment the ministers kept. They hefitated about the letter; and at length concluded, that it would be better to go to the king, and declare their fentiments in perfon. This expedient appeared to me a mode of eluding the bufinefs: a man cannot speak so forcibly as he can write to a person, whom, from his rank, and the power of cuftom, he would treat with great respect. It was agreed to call on Lacoste, who had not yet made his appearance, and to take him with them, or at least to propose to him to join the reft. Scarcely had these gentlemen affembled together at the navy-office, when a meffage came from the king to Duranthon, ordering him to repair alone to the palace immediately. Claviere and Roland faid, they would wait his return at the chancery. It was not long before Duranthon arrived; and filently, with with a long face; and an hypocritical appearance of forrow, drew flowly from his pocket an order from the king for each of the other two.—' Give them us;' faid Roland, with a fmile: ' I perceive our dilatorinefs has made us lofe the flart.'——In fact he brought their difmiffions.

'I am difmiffed too:' faid my hufband to me on his return.---'1 hope,' replied I, ' that you merit it more than any other: but do not by any means allow the king to announce it to the affembly: and fince he has not profited by the leffon given him in your letter, it fhould be rendered ufeful to the public, by making it acquainted with it's contents. Nothing appears to me more confiftent with the courage of having written it, than the hardihood of fending a copy of it to the affembly: in hearing of your difmiffion, it fhould be acquainted with it's caufe.'

This idea could not be other than highly pleafing to my hufband. It was adopted : and the world knows how the affembly honoured the three minifters, by declaring, that they carried with them the regret of the nation; as it approved the letter, by ordering it to be printed, and fent to the departments. In my own mind I am convinced, and I think the event has demonstrated, that the letter of Roland contributed greatly to enlighten France : it exhibited to the king, with fo much force and wildom, what his own interest required him to perform, that it was natural to infer, he would not have refused his compliance, were he not determined to oppose the maintenance of the constitution.

When I recollect, that Pache was in Roland's clofet, when when we read the copy of that letter, and deemed it a bold ftep; when I reflect how often that man has witneffed our enthuliafm in the caufe of liberty, and our zeal to ferve it; and now fee him at the head of that arbitrary authority, which oppreffes us and perfecutes us as the enemics of the republic: I afk myfelf, whether I be awake, or whether the dream muft not terminate in the punifhment of that infamous hypocrite.

Thus we returned to private life. Perhaps I shall be asked, whether I never had any more circumstantial account of the manner, in which Roland was called to the ministry. This I can affirm I have not; and even that it never occurred to mc, to inquire further concerning it: for it appeared to me to be brought about in the fame way, in which fo many other things are in this world; the idea occurred to fome one, many approved it, and thus supported it reached fome perfon capable of carrying it into effect. I faw, that it had ftruck fome of the deputies: who first proposed it, I know not, or by whom it was imparted to the court. Roland neither knew more of it, nor gave himfelf farther concern about it, than I. When a fucceffor to Degrave was thought of for the war department, the ministers and patriotic deputies did not know whom to felect. Almost all the officers of the army, of any repute, were fuppoled enemies to the conflitution. Roland thought of Servan, who was in the fervice, and had obtained the crofs of St. Lewis; and whole principles were not dubious, for he had difplayed them before the revolution, in a performance much applauded, The Citizen zen Soldier: we knew him perfonally; having feen him at Lyons, where he had the not unmerited reputation of an active and fagacious man: finally, in 1790 he had loft a place at court, where his civifm was not agreeable to Guynard-St.-Prieft. Thefe confiderations led the members of the council to join in propofing him to the king, by whom he was accepted.

When my hufband became minister, I imposed it on myself as a law, neither to pay or receive visits, nor invite to my table any female. I had no great facrifices to make on this head: for, not reliding conftantly at Paris, my circle was far from extensive; and befides, I had no where kept a great deal of company, for I am as fond of fludy, as I am averfe to cards, and the fociety of filly people affords me no pleasure. Accustomed to spend my days in domestic retirement, I fhared the labours of Roland, and cultivated my own particular taftes. The eftablishment of this firict rule, therefore, sheltered me from the inconveniences, to which an interested crowd exposes perfons connected with great places, and enabled me to live in my own way. Of company I had never, to fpeak properly, any circle. Twice a week I received at my table fome of the deputies, and of the ministers, and perfons with whom it was necessary for my hufband to converse, or keep up his connections. Business was talked of before me; because I had no defire of interfering in it, and was not furrounded with company to occafion diffruft. From all the rooms of a spacious apartment I had chosen, for my common habitation, the smallest falon, forming a closet, in which I had placed my books and a bureau. It often happened, that that fome of the friends or colleagues of the minifter, wanting to fpeak to him privately, would come to my apartment, inftead of going to his, where he was furrounded by his clerks or the public, and requeft me to fend for him. Thus I was acquainted with the courfe of affairs, without intrigue or idle curiofity. Roland alfo took pleafure in conversing with me about them afterwards in private, with that confidence, which always reigned between us, and made of our knowledge and opinions one common flock. It happened, too, fometimes, that friends, who had only a piece of information to communicate, or a word to fay, always fure of finding me, came to defire me to communicate it to him the first opportunity.

It had been found necessary to counterbalance the influence of the court, the ariftocracy, the civil lift, and the papers on their fide, by popular inftructions of great publicity. A daily paper, to be posted up in the ftrects, feemed well calculated for this purpofe: but then it was necessary to find a judicious and enlightened man, capable of following up events, and exhibiting them in their proper colours, to conduct it. Louvet, already known as an author, a man of letters, and a politician, was mentioned, approved, and accepted the office. A fund allo was requilite for it's fupport : this was another affair. Petion himfelf had none for the police: yet this was indifpenfable in a city like Paris, and in fuch a state of things, when it was of importance to have people in pay, in order to be informed in time of what might happen, or what was contriving. To have obtained any thing from the affembly would have been difficult; as the demand would would have given the alarm to the partifans of the court, and met many obftacles. It occurred, that Dumouriez, who had a fund for fecret expenses in the department of foreign affairs, might allow a monthly fum to the mayor of Paris for the police, and that from this should be defrayed the cost of the paper, of which the minister of the home department should have the superintendance. The expedient was simple, and was adopted. This was the origin of the Sentinel.

In the course of july, perceiving affairs daily grow worfe through the perfidy of the court, the progrefs of the foreign troops, and the weakness of the assembly, we confidered where threatened liberty could take refuge. We frequently conversed with Barbaroux and Servan on the excellent disposition of the fouth, of the energy of the departments in that region. and of the advantages it's fituation afforded for eftablishing a republic, if the triumphant court should subjugate Paris and the north. We took a map, and traced the line of demarcation. Servan studied the military politions it offered: we calculated it's firength: we investigated the nature of it's produce, and the means of altering it : each recollected places, or perfons, of whom we might expect the fupport; and inlifted, that, after a revolution affording fuch grand hopes, we must not relapse into flavery, but strain every nerve to establish somewhere a free government. ' That must be our refource,' faid Barbaroux, ' if the marfeillefe, whom I accompanied hither, be not fufficiently feconded by the parifians to fubdue the court. I hope, however, that they will effect effect it, and that we shall have a convention, which will give a republican government to all France.'

We immediately perceived, without his explaining himfelf farther, that an infurrection was ripening; which appeared inevitable, fince the court was making preparations, that indicated a defign of enforcing fubmiffion. There are, who will fay, thefe were made in it's own defence: but the idea of attack would not have entered into the imagination of any one, or at leaft would not have been embraced by the people in general, if the court had fincerely cooperated in carrying the conflictuation into effect: for, though aware of all it's defects, the most firenuous republicans defired nothing more than that conflitution at the moment, and would have quietly awaited it's improvement from time and experience.

It is true, that, at the period of a revolution, there will always be found, particularly amongst a corrupt people, and in large cities, a class of men destitute of the advantages of fortune, yet covetous of her favours, and eager to extort them at any price, or accustomed to fupply them by means little confonant with equity. If a daring mind, courageous disposition, and some native talents, diffinguish one of these, he becomes the chief, or leader, of a turbulent band; quickly recruited by all those, who, having nothing to lose, are ready to attempt any thing; by all the dupes, they have art to make; and by certain individuals, diffeminated among them by domestic politicians or foreign powers, interested in fomenting divisions, to weaken those who are agitated by them, and afterwards turn them to their own advantage.

The patriotic focicties, those collections of men affembled to deliberate on their rights and interests, have exhibited to us a picture in miniature of what paffes in the great fociety of the nation.

First we have a few men of ardent dispositions, ftrongly penetrated with a fense of the public danger, and feeking with fincerity to prevent it. These the philosophers join, from a persuasion, that this junction is neceffary, to overturn the dominion of tyranny, and propagate principles benchicial to their In effect, grand truths are unfellow-creatures. folded, and rendered common; generous fentiments are roufed and diffused; the impulse is given to men's heads and hearts. Then come forward individuals. who, reclothing principles, and adopting a language calculated to procure their reception, feek to captivate the favour of the public, in order to obtain confequence or places. These refine upon truths, to render themfelves more confpicuous; heat the imagination by exaggerated pictures; flatter the paffions of the populace, ever ready to admire the gigantic ; urge it to measures, in which they make themselves ufeful, that they may be always thought necessary; and finish with endeavouring to excite suspicion against those prudent or enlightened men, of whose merit they are afraid, and with whom they could not fland in competition. Calumny, at first employed by them without art, learns, from the humiliation it receives, to erect itself into a system : it becomes a profound science, in which they and their fellows alone can fucceed.

Unqueffionably many of this ftamp threw themfelves felves into the popular party against the court; ready to ferve it for money, and as ready to betray it, if it should become the weaker fide. The court pretended to believe all fuch who opposed it's defigns, and was fond of confounding them under the appellation of the factious. The true patriots fuffered this noify pack to take it's courfe, as fo many fetting dogs; and perhaps were not forry to employ it as a forlorn hope, that facrificed itself to the enemy. Their hatred of defpotifm allowed them not to reflect, that, if it be allowable in politics, to fuffer good things to be effected by ill men, or to profit by their excelles for fome ufeful end; it is infinitely dangerous, to afcribe to them the honour of the one, or not to punish them for the other.

All the world is acquainted with the revolution of the 10th of august. I know no more concerning it than the public : for, though I was instructed in the grand course of affairs whilft Roland was in office, and attended to it with interest when he was no longer in place, I never was a confidant of what might be termed little manœuvres, as he was never an agent in fuch.

Recalled to the ministry at that period, he entered it with fresh hopes for liberty. It is great pity, faid we, that the council is fpoilt by that Danton, who has fuch a bad repute. Some friends, to whom I whifpered the remark, faid : ' what would you do? he has been of fervice in the revolution, and the people love him : we have no occasion to create malecontents, and we must derive from him all the good we can.'-It was well faid : but it is much eafier not to afford a man the means of influence, than to prevent his abusing it.

it. There began the faults of the patriots : the inftant the court was fubdued, an excellent council should have been formed, all the members of which being irreproachable in their conduct, and diffinguished for their knowledge, should have fet forward the government with dignity, and impressed foreign powers with respect. To admit Danton into office, was to deluge the government with the men I have depicted above; who harafs it, when not employed by it, and corrupt and debale it, when they participate in it's operations. But who was there, to make these reflections? who would have dared to communicate, and openly maintain them? The choice was determined by the affembly, or it's committee of twenty-one; in which there were many men of merit; but not one leader; not one of those beings such as Mirabeau, formed to command the vulgar, to condenfe into one focus the opinions of the wife, and to prefent them with that force of genius, which compels obedience the moment it is difplayed.

They did not know whom to place at the head of the navy. Condorcet mentioned Monge, becaufe he had feen him folve geometrical problems at the academy of fciences; and Monge was chofen. This was a fort of original, very well calculated to play tricks in the manner of the bears, that I have feen dance in the ditches of the town of Berne. There cannot be a clumfier jack-pudding, or lefs formed for pleafantry. Formerly a ftone-cutter at Mézières, where abbe Boffuet encouraged him, and fet him to ftudy mathematics, he advanced himfelf by dint of induftry, and ceafed to vifit his benefactor, as foon as he began to entertain entertain hopes of becoming his equal. A good kind of man, however, or knowing enough to acquire the reputation of being fo, in a little circle, the moft fatyrical members of which would not have amufed themfelves with holding him up as merely poffeffing a dull and confined understanding. Still he passed for an honest man, and a friend of the revolution: whilst it was fo difficult to find people of capacity, and fo many had proved traitors, that it began to be deemed fufficient, if dependance could be placed on a man's principles. I need not speak of his ministry: the deplorable state of our navy too plainly evinces his incapacity and nothingnes.

The first care of Roland was to make that reform in his office, of which he had felt the neceffity. He collefted about him industrious, enlightened men, of firm principles: and, had he accomplished nothing more, he would have done great benefit in that branch of administration. He bastened to write to all the departments, with that force which reafon gives, that authority which belongs to truth, and that patheticalnefs which refults from feeling. His letters difplayed to them the new deftiny of France, in the revolution of the tenth of august; and the necessity for all parties to rally round juffice, which prevents all exceffes; liberty, which produces the happiness of all; good order, which alone can infure it; and the legislative body, as charged with the expression of the common will. Those administrative bodies, which appeared to helitate, were fuspended, or broken. Great dispatch in bufinefs, and the most active and extensive correspondence, diffused through all parts a fimilar spirit, reftored G₃ fored confidence, and re-animated the interiour of the kingdom.

Danton fcarcely fuffered a day to pass without visiting me. At one time he would come to the council a little before the time, and would enter my apartment; or would stay a little after it, commonly with Fabre-d'Eglantine: at another he would invite himfelf to dinner with me, on days when I was not accustomed to see company, to converse with Roland about some busines.

It is impossible to show more zeal, or a greater love of liberty, and defire of unanimity with his colleagues to ferve it most effectually, than he displayed. Contemplating his forbidding and favage features, though I would fay to myfelf, that no one should be judged at fight, that I was not certain of any thing against him, that the most honest man mult have two characters when party ran high, and that appearances were not to be trusted, I could not bring myfelf to affociate the idea of a good man with fuch a countenance. I never faw any thing, that fo perfectly characterifed the violence of brutal paffions, and the most astonishing audacity, half cloked under a jovial sir, with the affectation of frankness and a fort of fimplicity. My lively imagination represents to me every perfon, with whom I am ftruck, in the action I think fuitable to his character. I cannot fee for half an hour a face a little out of the common track, without arraying it in the garb of some profession, or giving it fome part, the idea of which it revives or imprefies on my mind. This imagination has often figured to me Danton, with a dagger in his hand, encouraging by his his voice and action a troop of affaffins, more timid or lefs ferocious than himfelf: or, fatisfied with his crimes, indicating his habits and propensities by the gestures of a Sardanapalus. I would defy an expert painter, not to find in the person of Danton all the requisites for such a composition.

Could I confine myfelf to a regular path, inftead of abandoning my pen to the wandering courfe of a mind, that ranges at large over the field of events, I would have taken up Danton at the beginning of 1789, a poor counfellor, more burdened with debts than caufes; and whofe wife has faid, that she could not have kept house, without the affistance of a guinea a week from her father. I would have exhibited him just coming out at the feelion, they termed the diffriel, and making himfelf noticed by the ftrength of his lungs: a great fectary of the Orleans party; acquiring a fort of competence in the course of that year, without his being perceived to do any thing to gain it; and obtaining a little celebrity by excesses, which Lafayette would have punished, but which he artfully turned to his own advantage, by procuring himfelf to be protected by the fection, which he had rendered turbulent. I fhould remark him declaiming with fuccefs in the popular focieties, fetting himfelf up for the defender of the rights of all, and declaring, that he would accept no place of profit, till after the revolution; yet filling that of substitute to the folicitor of the commune; preparing to build his influence at the Jacobins on the ruins of that of the Lameths; appearing on the tenth of august with those who returned from the palace"; and arriving at the ministry, as a tribune in favour with the people, to whom it was necessary to give the fatisfaction of feeing him hold a share in the government. From that period his progress was as rapid as bold. He attached to himfelf by largeffes, or protected by his influence, those greedy and miserable men, who are the flaves of vice or want: he pointed out the men he dreaded, that their ruin might be effected: he paid the writers, and fet on the enthuliasts, whom he deftined to worry them : he refined on the revolutionary inventions of blind patriots, or adroit knaves : he framed, decreed, and caused to be carried into execution. schemes capable of striking terrour, removing numerous obstacles, amalling heaps of wealth, and misleading the public opinions on all these things. By his intrigues he formed the electoral body, which he openly fwayed by his agents, and named the deputation from Paris to the convention, of which he became a member. To Belgium he went to augment his treasures; and had the boldness to avow a fortune of 1400000 livres [[.58333], wallow in luxury, whilf preaching up fans-culolitme, and sleep on mountains of dead bodies.

As to Fabre d'Eglantine, muffled in a cowl, armed with a dagger, employed in laying fnares for the innocent, whofe character he would defame, or to deftroy the rich, whofe wealth he covets, he is fo perfectly in his character, that whoever would paint the most abandoned hypocrite, need only draw his portrait thus accoutred.

These two men sought much to make me deliver my fentiments by talking patriotifm. On this subject I had nothing to conceal, or diffemble : I avow my principles ciples equally to thole, whom I fuppole to participate in them, and thole, whom I fufpect of others lefs pure: to thole from confidence, to thele from pride; for I difdain to practife referve, even under the pretence or hope of better penetrating the mind of another. I form an opinion of men from their appearance; and I judge of them by their conduct at various times compared with their language: but myfelf I exhibit entire, and leave no room to doubt of what I really am.

As foon as the affembly had paffed of it's own accord a decree, which allowed the minister of the home department 100000 livres [£.4167], to defray the expenfes of uleful publications, Danton, and Fabre particularly, afked me by way of converfation, whether Roland were prepared on that point, had writers in readiness to employ, &c. I answered, that he was no ftranger to those, who had already made themselves known: that fuch of the periodical works as were of a right temper would point out the publications, which it was proper to encourage: that it would be adviseable to see their authors; to form a meeting of them fometimes, that they might be acquainted with facts, the knowledge of which it would be useful to diffeminate, and agree on the most efficacious method of leading men's minds to the fame point. That if either of them, Fabre or Danton, knew any in particular, they fhould mention them, and come with them to the minister; where they might converse, once a week for inftance, on what ought more efpecially to occupy their pens under the existing circumstances.

'We have a fcheme,' answered Fabre, 'for a paper to be posted up, to be entitled Compte rendu au Peuple fonverain, "An Account to the fovereign People," which shall exhibit a sketch of the late revolution. and in which Camille-Defmoulins, Robert, and fome others, will write.'-- ' Very well! you must introduce them to Roland.'-This he took care not to do, and fpoke no more of the paper; which however was begun, as foon as the affembly had given the council two millions [£.83333] for secret expenses. Danton faid to his colleagues, that it was fit each minister fhould have the employment of a portion of this fum in his own department; but those of the home department and foreign affairs having already fimilar funds, this should be at the disposal of the other four, who would thus have each fo many hundred thoufand livres. Roland strongly objected to this proposal. He showed, that the defign of the affembly had been, to give the executive power, at this critical period, all the necessary means of acting with promptitude: that the council collectively was to decide on the employment of this fund, at the demand, and on the objects brought forward by each: and declared, that, for his own part, he would never make any use of it, without the approbation of the council, to whom the fum was intrusted, and to whom it belonged to know how it was applied*. Danton replied, fwore according to cuftom, and talked of the revolution, of grand meafures, of fecrefy, and of freedom. The others, feduced

• He expended of this fund only 1200 l. [£ 50], in an order payable to Hell, who had been member of the conflictment affembly, for the expense of a body of inftraction for the people, in the gerwave language, for the departments of she Rhine.

perhaps by the pleafure of playing each his own game. declared for his opinion; contrary to all juffice, delicacy, and found policy; and in fpite of the protefts of Roland, and his refolute oppolition, the rigidity of which gave displeasure. Danton quickly drew his hundred thousand crowns [[.20833] out of the public treasury, and did with them what he thought proper: yet this did not prevent his obtaining from Servan 600001. [£2500], and from Lebrun more, out of the secret funds of their departments, under different pretences. To the affembly he never gave any account; contenting himfelf with affirming, that he had accounted to the council: and to this council he only faid, at a meeting at which Roland was not prefent on account of indifpolition, that he had given twenty thousand livres to one, ten to another, and so of the reft, on account of the revolution, for their patriotifm, and the like.

Thus Servan related the ftory to me. The council, interrogated by the affembly on the fubject, to the queftion, whether Danton had given them any account, answered simply yes. But Danton had acquired so much power, that these timid men were asraid to offend him.

Immediately after the retirement of Servan, Danton, no longer finding any oppolition from the war-office, poifoned the army with cordeliers, as cowardly as avaricious; who promoted plunder and devaltation; rendered the foldiers as ferocious to their countrymen as to their enemies; made the revolution odious to the neighbouring people, by exceffes of all kinds, which they practifed in the name of the republic; and, every where where preaching infubordination, prepared the misfortunes fince experienced.

After this no one will be aftonished to hear, that Danton, wanting to fend into Brittany one of his creatures, under pretence of visiting the sea-ports and examining the infpectors, prevailed on the navy-minister to give him a commission. But commissions of this kind required the fignature of all the members of the council, and Roland refused his. ' Either,' faid he to Monge, ' they, whom you employ, do their duty, or they do not; and of this you are competent to judge. If they do not, difmifs them without hefitation : if they do, why damp their zeal and infult them, by fending to them a stranger, who has no connexion with the office, and would only prove your diffruft. Such a proceeding is by no means fitted for the character of a minister; and I will not fign the commiffion.' The fitting of the council was drawn to fome length: towards the end papers to be figned became numerous: Roland perceived, that he had put his name, after those of all his colleagues, to the commission he had refused to fign, which had been slidden into his hand. He cancelled it, therefore, and upbraided Monge, who whilpered him : ' it is Danton's defire : if I refuse, he will denounce me to the commune, to the cordeliers, and will get me hanged.'-"Well! I, a minister, would die before I would yield to fuch confiderations."

The bearer of this commission was arrested in Brittany, by order of an administration offended with his conduct. The cancelled fignature of Roland appeared to it a fufficient motive, to examine the conduct of the the bearer narrowly; and there were heavy complaints againft him: but it was at the end of the year, when the mountain openly took the part of all anarchifts; and it procured a decree, that Guermeur fhould be fet at liberty.

I have fuffered myfelf to be hurried away by circumftances; let me now refume the chain of facts.

Danton and Fabre ceafed to vifit me towards the latter end of august. No doubt they were cautious of exposing themselves to attentive eyes, when they chanted the matins of feptember; and they were fufficiently informed of the disposition of Roland and those about him. A firm, noble, and open disposition, strict principles, displayed without oftentation, vet unconstrained, and an even and regular conduct, were confpicuous to every eye. Hence they concluded, that Roland was an honeft man, with whom there was nothing to be done in enterprifes like their's : that his wife had no weak place, by means of which he could be fwayed: that equally firm in her principles, the posselfed perhaps more of that penetration peculiar to her fex, which deceitful people have most reason to fear. Perhaps too they guessed, that fhe could fometimes wield a pen; and that fuch a couple, of strong reason, firm character, and some talents, might be injurious to their defigns, and were fit only to be ruined. The course of events, illustrated by a number of circumstances, which it would be difficult for me to detail at prefent, but of which a lively impression remains on my mind, gives to these conjectures all the evidence of demonstration.

One of the first measures thought proper to be taken by the council was, to dispatch to the departments commissioners, instructed to explain the events of the 10th of august, and particularly to rouse the minds of the people to prepare for defence, be expeditious in raifing the neceffary recruits for the armies oppofed to the enemy on the frontiers, &cc. When it was agreed to fend them, and the fubject of choosing proper agents came to be discussed, Roland demanded to have till the next day to confider whom he could propofe .- 'I will take it all upon myfelf:' cried Danton: " the commune of Paris will furnish us with excellent patriots.'-The indolent majority of the council intrusted to him the care of pointing them out : and the next day he came to the council with commillions ready made; fo that nothing more was neceffary, than to fill them up with the names he prefented, and fign them. The council examined them very little, and affixed their fignatures, without debating the fubject. Thus a fwarm of men scarcely known ; intriguers of fections, or bawlers of clubs; patriots from fublimation, and still more from interest; for the most part destitute of any mode of getting a livelihood, except what they might affume, or hope to acquire, in public commotions; but completely devoted to Danton their protector, and enamoured of his manners and licentious doctrines; became the reprefentatives of the executive council throughout the departments of France.

This buliness always appeared to me one of the grandest party-strokes of Danton, and most humiliating lessons for the council.

It is neceffary to reflect, how fully each minister was already already occupied in the affairs of his own department, in those turbulent times, to conceive how it could be possible, that honest men, by no means destitute of capacity, could have acted with fuch inconfideration. The fact is, the ministers of the home, naval, and military departments, were fo burdened with multiplicity of buliness, that particular affairs too completely abforbed their thoughts, to allow them time to reflect on the grand outlines of the political fystem. The council ought to have been composed of men, whole fole employment should be to deliberate on affairs, not to carry them into execution. Danton filled thar post, where least was to be done: befides, he gave himfelf little concern about executing the duties of his office, which he fcarcely permitted to occupy any part of his attention. His clerks turned the wheel, he trusted to them his hand, and the machine went on, just as it could, without giving him any anxiety. All his time and attention were dedicated to intrigues, and calculations, to promote his views of augmenting his wealth and power. At the war-office he was continually procuring his own creatures to be placed with the armies: he found means to get them concerned in the contracts for it of every kind : he neglected no quarter, in which he could advance these men, the dregs of a corrupted nation, of which they role the fourn during the political ferment, at the top of which they must fiim for a time: with these he augmented his credit, and made himself a faction, that foon became powerful, for it is now paramount.

The enemy advanced on our territories. It's progrefs

gress became alarming. Men, who would lead the people, and who have studied the means of fwaying them, know fear to be one of the most powerful. This affection places them, who experience it, in complete subjection to them, who permit it to have no influence on their minds. How great the advantage of those, who designedly inspire it by false rumours or pretences! This calculation had affuredly been made by the infligators of the proceedings of feptember: they must have had the twofold object of producing a tumult, under favour of which, the violation of the prifons, and maffacre of the prifoners, would afford them an opportunity of fatiating their private animofities, and gratifying their avarice by plunder; and at the fame time of fpreading abroad that kind of flupor, during which the little band of daring and ambitious men might lay the foundations of their power. Inferiour agents were not difficult to be gained by the lure of profit: the pretence of immolating fuppoled traitors, from whom confpiracies would be professed to be dreaded, must feduce some weak heads, deceive the people, and ferve to justify the action : whence the directors would obtain the blind devotion of their amply-paid fatellites, the attachment of all who flared the profits with their leaders, and the fubmillion of the intimidated people, furprifed at the energy, or perfuaded of the justice of an operation, to which it would be enchained, by having it reprefented as it's own work. Thus whoever durft afterwards reprobate these crimes was proclaimed a calumniator of the city of Paris, pointed out as fuch to the fury of a certain class of it's inhabitants, and styled a federalist, and a con[pirator.

confpirator. Such was the crime of the storaty-stor, joined to the unpardonable guilt of superiority.

A report of the taking of Verdun was loudly propagated on the first of september, with great alarm. The officiating preacher to the mob affirmed the enemy to be in full march to Châlons. To listen to them it would be at Paris in three days: and the people, who confidered nothing but the distance, without estimating every thing necessary to the march of an army, for it's provision, baggage, and artillery, and all that render it's progress fo very different from that of an individual, already beheld the foreign troops pillaging the smoking ruins of the capital.

Nothing was neglected, that could inflame the imagination, amplify objects, or augment the apprehenfion of danger. It was not difficult to obtain from the affembly fome measures adapted to promote the defign. Domiciliary vifits, under the pretence of fearching for arms concealed, or difcovering perfons fuspected, which have become fo frequent fince the tenth of august, were decreed as general procedures, and executed in the dead of the night. They gave occasion to fresh and numerous captions, and unheard of vexations. The commune of the tenth; composed in great part of those men, who, having nothing to lofe, have every thing to gain by a revolution; already guilty of a thousand enormities; had need of committing more; for the accumulation of crimes alone can fecure impunity. The misfortunes of the country were folemnly announced. The fignal of diffrefs, the black flag, was holfted on the tower of the metropolitan church. The alarm-gun was fired. The com-Н mune mune proclaimed, by found of trumpet, a general affembly of the citizens, on funday, the 2d, in the Champ-de-Mars, to rally round the altar of the nation thofe zealous patriots, who would immediately fet off for it's defence. Yet it directed the gates to be fhut, and no one was ftruck with the contradictorinefs of thefe proceedings. The talk was of a confpiracy forming in the prifons by the ariftocrats (or the rich), who were confined in them in great numbers; and of the uneafinefs and repugnance of the people to quit their hearths, and leave behind them thofe ravenous wolves, who, foon unchained, would fall upon all they had left behind them moft dear.

At the first fymptoms of commotion, the minister of the home-department, whole it is to watch over the general tranquillity, but who has not the immediate exercise of power, or employment of force, wrote in a preffing manner to the commune, in the perfon of the mayor, to urge on it the vigilance, it ought to display. He contented himself not with this: he addreffed himfelf to the commandant-general, to exhort him to strengthen the posts, and keep an eye on the He did more, hearing, that the prifons prifons. were threatened, he officially required him to guard them with care, making his head responsible for events: and to give more efficacy to a requifition, to which his authority was reftrained, he caufed it to be printed and posted up at the corner of every street. This was directing the citizens, to guard them themfelves, if the commandant fhould neglect his duty.

At five in the evening of funday, nearly at the very moment when the prifons were furrounded, as I have fince fince been informed, about two hundred men came to the office of the home-department, loudly calling for the minister, and for arms.

From my own retired apartment, I thought I heard fome noife. I quitted it, and, from a room looking into the great court, I perceived the mob. Thence I repaired to the anti-chamber, to inquire the caufe. Roland was gone out: but they, who demanded him, were not fatisfied with this, but were determined to speak to him. The servants refused them admission. perfifting in the truth. I ordered them to go, and invite ten of them in. They entered. I asked them calmly what they wanted. They told me, they were honest citizens, ready to depart for Verdun, but in want of arms; for which they came to alk the minifter, and they must fee him. I observed to them, that the minister of the home-department never had arms at his difpofal : and that they fhould demand them at the war-office, from the minister at war. They replied they had been there; and were told there was none: that all those ministers were f---- of traitors, and they wanted Roland.- '. I am forry he is gone out, for his folid arguments would have weight with you: come and go through the house with me, and you shall fatisfy yourfelves, that he is not at home, and that he has no arms, which, on reflection, you will be convinced he ought not to have. Return to the war-office, or carry your just complaints to the commune: or, if you will speak to Roland, repair to the navy-office, where all the council is affembled.'-They withdrew. I went into the balcony over the court, and thence I beheld a furious fellow in his shirt, H 2 with with his fleeves tucked up to his floulders, fabre in hand, declaiming against the treachery of the minifters. My ten deputies dispersed themselves amongs the crowd, and at length determined it to retreat with drums beating, and carrying away the valet-de-chambre as an hostage; who was forced to pace the streets for an hour, when he was permitted to depart.

Immediately I got into a coach, and haftened to the navy-office, to inform my hufband of what had paffed. The council was not yet formed. I found a numerous circle, in which were feveral deputies. The minifters at war and of juffice not being arrived, the others were in the falon as a private company. I related the ftory, on which each made his remarks. Moft fuppofed it the fortuitous refult of circumftances, and the effervefcence of the people's minds.

What was Danton then doing? I knew not till feveral days after: but it may be proper to mention it here, in the order of facts. He was at the refidence of the mayor, in the committee of fuperintendance, as it was flyled, from which iffaed the orders for the arrefts. which had been to numerous within a few days. There a reconciliation had just taken place between him and Marat, after the parade of a feigned quarrel for fourand-twenty hours. He went to Pétion's apartment. took him afide, and faid to him, in his ftrong language: " can you guess what they have taken into their heads? Would you have imagined that they had iffued a mandate to apprehend Roland?'- 'Who have?'- 'That furious committee. I have laid hold of the mandate : fee. here it is. We cannot fuffer them to act thus. What, the devill against a member of the council !'---Pétion took the mandate, read it, returned it to him with a smile, and and faid: 'let them do it: it will have a good effect.'---'A good effect !' replied Danton, inquilitively examining the mayor's countenance : 'O, I will not fuffer it: I will go and make them liften to reafon.' The mandate was not carried into execution. But who is there, that does not fee, that the two hundred men were fent to the minister of the home department by the authors of the mandate? Who is there, that does not fufpect, that the inutility of their attempt, delaying the execution of their project, might occasion them, who conceived it, to hefitate? Who is there, that does not perceive, in the conduct of Danton with the mayor, that of a confpirator who would found the effect of fuch a ftroke, or take to himfelf the honour of having parried it, when he found it had failed, or been rendered dubious by accidental delay.

The ministers left the council a little after eleven. It was not till the next morning we learnt the horrours, of which the night had been witnefs, and which fill continued to reign in the prifons. Our hearts burfting with the thoughts of these abominable crimes, the inability of preventing them, and the evident accord between the commune and the commandantgeneral*, we were perfuaded, that nothing remained for a virtuous minister, but to announce them with the greatest vehemence, to engage the assessment of the them, to raife the indignation of all honest men against them, and thus to wash away the dishonour of having shared in them by filence; nay, to expose himself, if fo it must be, to the daggers of the assessment of the guilt and shame of being in any measure their accomplice.—" It is equally true,' faid I to my husband, ' that the resolutions of courage are not more consonant to justice, than they are conducive to fastery. Firmness alone can repress audacity. If the denunciation of these enormities were not a duty, it would be an act of prudence. The perpetrators of him : he told him what he had feen, and related what had been done, the requisitions made to the armed force by the minister of the home-department, the little regard apparently paid to them, the alarms of the prisoners, and the care which he, being minister of justice, ought to take of them. Danton, vexed at this unlucky representation, cried with his bellowing voice, and appropriate geftures : ' devil take the prifoners! what care I, what becomes of them ?' and went on his way in a rage. This was in the fecond anti chamber, in the prefence of twenty people, who fluddered to hear fuch a favage speech from the minister of juffice. Danton enjoys his crimes. After having attained fuceeffively the feveral degrees of influence; and perfecuted and proferibed the probity, which declared war against him, and the merit, of which he dreaded the afcendency; he reigns. His voice actuates the affembly; his intrigues keep the people in motion; and his genius rules the committee, called of public fafety, in which refides all the power of the government. Thus diforder every where prevails: the men of blood rale; the most rigid tyranny crashes the people of Paris; and France, torn, degraded, under fuch a mafter, can no longer do more, than change it's oppressers. I feel his hand rivet the fetters that bind me; as I perceived his infpiration in the first attack of Marat against me. It is necessary for him to ruin them, who know him, and refemble him not.

* Grandpré, who, by his office, is obliged to give an account of the flate of the prifons to the minister of the home-department, had found their fad inmates in the greatest affright, in the morning of the 2d of feptember. He had taken various measures to procure the liberation of many of them, and had facceeded with respect to a confiderable number; but the rumous, that prevailed, kept those what remained in the greatest consternation. This worthy citizen, having returned to the hotel, waited to fee the miniftern at the breaking ap of the council. Danton first made his appearance. He went up to him:

them must hate you, for you have endeavoured to prune their wings: nothing remains for you; but to infpire them with fear.' Roland wrote to the affembly his letter of the third of feptember; which became equally celebrated with that he had addreffed to the king. The affembly received it with transport: it ordered it to be printed, posted up, and fent to the departments: it applauded it, as weak men applaud acts of courage they cannot imitate, but which affect themfelves, and infpire them with fome hope.

I remember having read a little work, ftrongly ariftocratic, published fome time fince at London, I believe by Pelletier; the author of which is greatly aftonished, that the fame man, who had fo audaciously affended his king, afterwards displayed fo much justice and humanity. Either the spirit of party must render a man extremely inconsistent; or virtue is fo rare, that it's very existence is become questionable. The friend of freedom and his fellow-creatures detests with equal vehemence, and proclaims with equal energy, the tyranny of a mob, and the tyranny of a king, the despotism of a throne, and the disorders of anarchy, the willness of courts, and the ferocious for obbers.

That fame day, the 3d of feptember, a man, formerly a colleague of Roland, and to whom I thought I owed the civility of inviting him to dinner, took it into his head to bring with him the orator of the human race, without mentioning it to me, or afking my permiffion. This breach of politenéfs appeared to me the venial offence of an honeft man, dazzled by the orator's fame. I received with civility Clootz, of whom I knew nothing more than his bombaft orations, and of whom I had no unfavourable memorandum: but one of my friends feeing him, whilpered in my ear: 'your guest has introduced to you an infufferable parasite, whom I am forry to fee here.'---

The conversation turned on the events of the day. Clootz pretended to prove, that they were indifpenfable and falutary measures; uttered many common-place observations on the rights of the people, the justice of their vengeance, and it's fubserviency to the happiness of mankind; spoke loud, and long; ate still more than he spoke; and tired more than one auditor. Soon after appointed deputy, he returned occafionally of his own accord; feating himfelf in the first place, and helping himself to the nicest diffes, without ceremony. My extreme and cold politeneis, accompanied with the care I always took to help feveral perfons before him, foon gave him to understand, that he held no high place in my esteem. He perceived it, came no more, and revenged himfelf by calumnies. I should not have mentioned this contemptible fellow, but for the diftinguished part he acted amongst the slanderers of good men, and the art with which he joined in making of federalifm a fcarecrow for fools, or a title of profcription for those of good understanding, who embraced not his chimera of an universal commonwealth.

The laft time he came to visit me, he mounted his hobby-horfe, and repeated all his extravagancies on the poffibility of a convention formed of deputies from every corner of the world. Some of the company answered him with a jeft. Roland, tired of the noise and pedantry, with which Clootz maintained his his opinion, and pretended to make converts to it, had the civility to flourish an argument or two with him, and then turned away to another part of the room. The conversation cooled, and broke off into different Buzot, whole folid understanding never. fubiects. amufes itfelf long with attacking caftles in the air, was aftonished, that federation should be treated as a herefy in politics. He observed, that Greece, fo celebrated, fo prolific of great men and heroic actions, was composed of finall confederate republics: that the United States, which in our own days exhibit the most interesting picture of a good focial organization, form a composition of the same nature: and that Switzerland prefented a fimilar example. That in truth, at the prefent moment, and in the actual fituation of France, it was important for it to maintain unity; because thus it formed a mass more likely to be refpected by foreign powers, and possesfield a finglenefs of action, which would be of precious account for the completion of the laws, that must infure it a conftitution: yet it could not be diffembled, that there would ever be a laxity in the political bands, which united a fleming and a native of Provence; that it was difficult to make that attachment. in which the ftrength of a republic confifts, reign over a furface fo extensive; for the love of our country is not strictly that of the land we inhabit, but of the citizens with whom we dwell, and the laws by which they are governed, otherwise the athenians could not have transferred their existence as such from their city to their ships; that we can never thoroughly love any but those whom we know; and that the enthuliafm of men feparated feparated by a diffance of fix hundred miles can never be general, uniform, and vivid, like that of the inhabitants of a fmall territory.

These fage reflections, so esteemed by most of those who heard them, were traduced and denounced by Clootz, as a confpiracy to federate France, and detach it from the department of Paris. He reprefented Buzot as the most dangerous of the conspirators, Roland as their chief, and the deputies who visited me most frequently as partizans of this liberticide project. I know not whether a madman like Clootz can have been fincere in his apprehensions: but I cannot bring myself to believe him fo; firmly perfuaded, that he faw, in the fabrication of his lie, an opportunity of revenging his felf-love, offended at not being admired : a fubject for declaiming in his own way, extremely fuitable to the turgidity of his style, and the diforder of his imagination: and a mean of injuring men, whole understanding must displease him, and making a common cause with those, in whose vices he delights : even fuppoling him to have no fecret million to embroil France, by the help of the bedlamites, to fmooth the way for his countrymen, the pruffians.

The maffacres, notwithstanding, continued: at the Abbey, from funday evening till tuesday morning; at the bridewell, longer; at the Bicêtre, four days; &c. To my present abode, in the first of these prisons, I am indebted for particulars, which would make the reader thrill with horrour, but which I have not courage to write. One circumstance, however, I will not pass over in filence, because it tends to demonstrate, that it was a deep-laid scheme. In the suburb of St. Germain Germain there is a house of confinement, to receive prifoners which the Abbey cannot admit, when it is already full; and the police chofe funday evening to remove them, the inftant before the general maffacre began. The affaffins were ready; fell upon the hackney coaches, of which there were five or fix ; and flabbed, and murdered, with fabres and pikes, all that were in them, in the middle of the ftreet, and unchecked by their doleful cries. All Paris witneffed these terrible scenes, perpetrated by a small number of cut-throats: fo fmall, that there were fcarcely more than a dozen at the Abbey, the gate of which was defended, notwithstanding the requisitions made to the commune and the commandant, only by two national guards. All Paris fuffered them to go on-all Paris was accurfed in my eyes, and I could no longer cntertain hopes of the eftablishment of liberty amongst cowards, infenfible to the last outrages against nature and humanity, frigid spectators of crimes, which the courage of fifty armed men could with eafe have prevented.

The public force was badly organized, as it is fiil: for the mifcreants take great care, when they would reign, to oppofe all kind of order, that might tie their hands. But is it neceffary for men to know their captain, and march in regular order of battle, when they have to fly to the affiftance of victims about to be murdered? The fact is, the rumour of a pretended confpiracy in the prifons, completely improbable as it was, and the affected enunciation of the uneafinefs and rage of the people, held every one in a ftate of flupor; and perfuaded him, flut up in his houfe, that the the people were the actors; when, from all accounts, there were not two hundred villains in the whole, employed on this infamous purpole. It is not the first night, therefore, that astonishes me: but four days!—and curious people went to see this spectacle!—No! I know nothing in the annals of the most barbarous people, to be compared with this atrocious deed.

The health of Roland was impaired by it. The disturbance of the nervous system was so great, that his ftomach could bear nothing, and the bile, obstructed in it's course, diffused itself on the surface of the fkin. He was yellow and weak ; yet his induftry was not diminished : unable to eat, or sleep, he defisted not from his labours. He was still ignorant of his having been the object of arreft, though I had heard of it; for I could by no means think of acquainting him with what would have only tended to exafperate a complaint already ferious: fome one, however, I know not who, mentioned it to him the week following. It must be confessed, that he afterwards spoke of the fubject fometimes: fo that his enemies affected to repeat, that he declaimed against these executions only from the fear he had of being comprehended in the number of their victims: whilft, in reality, to the juft horrour, with which they had infpired him, he only added indignation, at having been reckoned amongst those, who were destined to fall by them.

Danton was the man, who most endeavoured to represent the opposition of Roland to these events, as the fruit of an ardent imagination, and the terrour with which he feigned he was struck. I always thought much might be inferred from this circumstance.

Hiftory

Hiftory no doubt will preferve the infamous circular letter of the committee of fuperintendance of the commune, containing an apology for the transactions of feptember, and an invitation to perpetrate the like throughout all France; a letter of which numbers were expedited from the office of the minister of justice, and counter-figned by him.

Circumstances indicating the inconvenience of bringing to Paris the prifoners from Orleans, whofe removal had been decreed, and who were already on the road, the minister of the home department gave orders, by advice of the council, to conduct them to Verfailles; and a numerous effort was fent for this purpofe. Certain men, pretending to be penetrated with horrour at the assistant of Paris, infinuated themselves into it under this cloak, and were the authors of the butchery perpetrated on the prifoners in the waggons, on their arrival at Verfailles.

The money, notes, jewels, and other valuables, of which there was abundance in the prifons at that time; from the wealth and condition of those, by whom they were filled; were pillaged, as may be fupposed.

Much more confiderable had been the plunder made by the members of the commune after the 10th of august, at the palace of the Tuileries, or in the royal houses near it, to which it fent commissioners, or in the houses of private perfons faid to be sufficient, on whose property it had affixed feals.

The commune had received confiderable deposites, and it had removed much treasure. No account appeared, and the minister of the home department could could not obtain the information he had a right to demand concerning them. He complained to the affembly; as he did alfo of the negligence of the commandant-general, from whom he requefted in vain a more numerous guard for the poft of the Jewel-office. Villains in the meantime hefitated at nothing: watches, fhoe-buckles, ear-rings; were taken from people in the market-places and public walks, in broad day. The affembly, as ufual, commended the minister's zeal; directed him to make a report of the state of Paris; and took no measures whatever.

The pillage of the Jewel-office was effected. Millions fell into the hands of perfons, who would naturally employ them to perpetuate anarchy, the fource of their power.

D'Eglantine, who had never visited me after the matins of feptember; who, the last time I faw him, faid to me, as from a profound fense of the critical ftate of France; ' things will never go well, without a concentration of powers: the executive council must have the dictatorship, and it's president must exercife it :' came to me the morning after this important robbery, at eleven o'clock. He came, but I was not at home, for I had just gone out with madam He waited for me two hours: I found him Pétion. in the court at my return : he went in with me, uninvited : he remained an hour and half, unafked to fit down. With an hypocritical tone he lamented the robbery of that night, which deprived the nation of real wealth: he inquired, whether no information of it's authors had been obtained : and he professed aftonishment at it's not having been forefeen. Then he talked of Robefpierre and Marat, who had begun to revile Roland and me; and called them hot-headed men, who must be permitted to go on their own way, wellmeaning, extremely zealous, who were startled at every thing, but whose conduct ought to create no alarm. I suffered him to talk as he pleased, faid little, and expressed my opinion of nothing. He withdrew; and I have not seen him fince. The purpose of this singular visit has never yet been known to me: it remains for time to unfold.

I have faid, that Marat began to revile us. It should be told, that, the moment the affembly had decreed a fum at the disposal of the minister of the home department for printing useful works, Marat, who, the day after the 10th, had caufed four preffes to be taken from the royal printing house by his people, to indemnify him for those, which the hand of justice had taken from him, wrote to Roland for fifteen thoufand livres [f.625], to enable him to publish fome excellent things. Roland answered, that the fum was too great to be delivered, without knowing the object, on which it was to be employed ; and if Marat would fend his manufcripts to him, he would not take upon himfelf to decide on them, but would lay them before the council, to determine whether they ought to be printed at the expense of the nation. Marat replied rudely enough; of which he is extremely capable, and fent a heap of manufcripts, the very fight of which was enough to frighten any one. There was an effay on the chains of flavery, and I know not what befides, quite in his own style, which is faying fufficient.

I had fometimes doubted, whether Marat were not a fictitious a fiftitious perfon: but then I was convinced, that fuch a being really exifted. I fpoke of him to Danton, expressed a defire of feeing him, and begged he would introduce him to me: for it is not amils to have a knowledge of monsters, and my curiosity was excited to learn, whether he were a man who had lost his wits, or a well-prompted actor. Danton excused himsfelf, under pretence of it's being completely useless, and even disagreeable, as it would only present me an original answering to nothing. From the tone of his excuse, I guessed he would not have gratified my fancy, had I insisted upon it; fo I did not appear, to have thought of it feriously.

The council decided, that the manufcripts of Marat fhould be put into the hands of Danton, who would know how to fettle the matter with him. This was cutting the gordian knot, inftead of untying it. It was not proper for the minifter of the home department, to expend the public money in feeing a madman; it was not prudent for him, to make him an enemy: a fimple flat refufal from the council would have removed every difficulty. Entrufting this office to Danton was affording him a fresh opportunity of attaching to himself this mad dog, that he might fet him on to bite and worry whom he pleafed.

Three weeks and more had paffed away, and the transactions of september were at an end. Marat had the impudence to post up a demand of sisteen thousand livres from d'Orleans, with a complaint of the incivism of the minister in refusing him that sum; and published a libel against me personally. I did not give into the fnare.—' This', faid I to my husband, ' is Danton downright : right : he wants to attack you, and begins by prowling round you. He has the folly to suppose, that these filly things will affect me, and that I shall take up the pen to answer them; so that he will bring forward a woman upon the stage, and thus render ridiculous the man to whom I am allied. These fellows may form fome opinion of my qualifications, but of my mind they can frame no judgment. Let them flander me as long as they pleafe, they will never move me to complain, or to regard them.'

Roland made his report of the flate of Paris on the 22d of september. It was exact and spirited: that is to fay, it depicted the diforders, that had been committed, and the imprudence of leaving the conftituted authorities any longer in the greatest infubordination, and the most dangerous exercise of arbitrary power. He did justice to the zeal of the commune of the 10th, and the fervice it did the revolution on that day: but he flowed, that the prolongation of the employment of revolutionary measures would produce exactly the reverse of what was hoped from them; fince the purpole of deftroying tyranny was to introduce the reigh of justice and order, with which anarchy was equally incompatible: and he demonstrated the equity of demanding, and the difficulty of obtaining accounts from that commune, from which he had required them in vain.

The affembly, capable of perceiving the right, but from weakness unable to pursue it, applauded the report, ordered it to be printed, decreed little, and rectified nothing. It is fcarcely possible to conceive a fituation more painful, than that of a firm and upright man, man, who, at the head of a great administration, in which he appears to have confiderable power, and is actually burdened with high refponfibility, daily witneffes difgufting abuses, which he can do no more than denounce, and to remedy which, the legislative authority he informs of them can or dares do nothing. To cashier the commune, order a new municipality to be elected according to the forms prefcribed by law, to organize the common force, and caufe a commander to be appointed it by the fections, were the only measures that could establish order in Paris; without which the laws would be appealed to in vain, and for want of which a convention there must necessarily be fubject to the municipal authority, which knew no reftraint. In fuch a flate of things, I would rather, that Roland dedicated his talents to his country as a deputy, than as member of a council without energy, and minister of a government without a capacity of acting. I did not conceal these sentiments from some, who were capable of appreciating them : but the vulgar could not have comprehended the preference of an humble fphere to the honours and throng of ministerial office, and for want of this comprehension would have formed unlucky conjectures.

The department of the Somme, in which Roland had long refided, chofe him for it's reprefentative. This choice excited almost universal regret. It appeared inconfiderate and absurd to take from the helm a man of integrity, courage, and understanding, whom it would be difficult to replace; in order to put him into an affembly, where numbers could ferve the state by their votes, without possessing his capacity. Roland land made no hefitation. He wrote to the affembly in confequence, requefting it to appoint him a fucceffor, and mentioning a perfon, whom he thought qualified to fill his office. This news occasioned great agitation: exclamations arole against it on all fides. and a motion was made, that he should be invited to retain his office. The convention was already formed by the number of deputies to the legislative affembly who were chosen members of it also, and those who first arrived from the country; or the latter had taken their places in the legislative assembly. Which of the two was the cafe I do not perfectly recollect at this moment, and I have nothing to confult for information: but Danton was prefent*, and role to oppole this invitation with great warmth. His impetuolity betrayed his rancour, and led him to fay many ridiculous things: amongst others, that they ought to addrefs the invitation to me alfo, for I was by no means unimportant to the administration of Roland. Murmurs of difapprobation attended his invidious remarks: but the decree did not pass, though the general with was ftrongly expressed. The minister's refignation, however, was not accepted, and he was ftill left free to make his option. A crowd of deputies repaired to his house, to prevail on him not to quit the ministry. It was strongly urged on him as a facrifice he owed his country; and it was reprefented to

• I remember, that, for more than a month, he continued to officiate at the council, whilf he went and voted in the affembly. This coalition of powers appeared highly culpable to Roland, who, during the last fortnight of Danton's proceeding thus, refrained from attending a council, influenced by a man who had no right longer to fit in it. him. him, that the convention, when once complete, would give affairs a grand and decifive courfe, in which his activity and disposition were necessary, and by which he would be supported. Two days passed in these folicitations, when he was informed, that his election was void, because it had been made to replace another supposed null, but in reality not fo; and therefore he had no reason to quit the ministry.

Accordingly he refolved to remain in it; and wrote to the affembly in a ftyle of courage and dignity, which was crowned with the plaudits of the majority, and made his enemies tremble. His election was indeed not valid: but the party of Danton strove to conceal this till he had quitted the ministry, that he might be thrown out of every fituation. From that time the party purfued him without remiffion ; every day there was fome fresh attack: the journal of Marat, pamphlets composed for the purpose, and denunciations at the Jacobins, inceffantly repeated calumnies and acculations, each more stupid or more atrocious than it's predeceffor. But effrontery and perfeverance in things of this kind have always fuccefs with a people naturally fickle and fuspicious, They went fo far even as to impute to him as a crime, what ought to have procured him praise: and had the art to infpire honest men void of courage with alarm at that very folicitude, which was most conducive to the fafety of the common wealth: I mean the care of inftructing the public opinion. It requires no profound skill in politics to know, that from public opinion arifes the ftrength of a government : all the difference in this refpect, that exifts between a tyrannical administration, and one which which takes justice for it's basis, is, that the former is employed wholly in narrowing the sphere of light, and suppressing truth, whils the latter makes it a law, to diffuse them as widely as possible.

The affembly had rightly judged, that the events of the roth of august would produce different impressions, according to the prejudices or interests of individuals, and the manner in which they were represented. It directed a narrative of the facts therefore to be drawn up, decreed it should be printed, supported it by the publication of all the documents necessary to prove it's accuracy, charged the minister of the home department to expedite it together with these throughout all France, and enjoined him to promote the writing of pamphlets conducive to the fame end.

Roland felt, that, in the prefent circumstance, the act of diffusing information needed improvement, and that it was requilite to form a ftream of light, to fupply in fome measure the want of public instruction, ever too much neglected. He made inquiry in the departments, and fecursd there a small number of zealous and enlightened men, on whole fidelity, in diftributing fuch writings as might be fent them, he could depend. He made it a rule, to answer every thing, and to keep up a correspondence with all the popular focieties, country clergymen, and private perfons, who should write to him. To the focieties he fent a circular letter, reminding them of the fpirit of their inftitution, and inculcating into them the fraternal care of instructing and enlightening each other, from which they had too great tendency to fwerve, in order to deliberate and rule. He selected out of his offices three or four perions of good fenfe, to keep up this patriotic correspondence, and dispatch the printed tracts, under the direction of him amongst them, who had most fenfibility of heart, ftrictnefs of principle, and amenity of style. This correspondence he frequently animated with his own circular letters, dictated by circumftances, and always breathing that morality, and that charm of affection, which engage men's hearts. The excellent effect refulting from this cannot eafily be conceived : troubles of every kind fubfided : the administrative bodies executed their functions with regularity: five or fix hundred focieties, and a confiderable number of country clergymen, employed themfelves with affecting zcal to diffuse instruction; and to render interested and concerned for the public welfare men hitherto occupied wholly in their manual labours, abandoned to ignorance, and more difposed to receive chains, than to maintain that freedom, of which they knew neither the extent, nor the limits, neither the rights, nor the duties.

This patriotic correspondence is a valuable monument, equally attefting the pure principles and enlightened vigilance of the minister, the good will of a great number of prudent citizens, and the admirable fruits of wisdom, patriotism, and reason.

In the thing itfelf, and in it's effects, fufpicious and jealous men faw lefs the triumph of freedom, the mainter ance of tranquillity, and the confolidation of the republic, than the fame and reputation that might accrue from them to the first mover. From that moment Roland was represented as a dangerous man, who had offices of public opinion; and foon as a corruptor ruptor of the people's judgment, a man ambitious of the fupreme power; and finally, as a confpirator.

It was only neceffary to read his writings, and examine his correspondence. The departments, that received his letters, answered him with their warmess thanks: but the banditti of Paris still perfevered in stander, without proving any thing; and excited, by a thousand arts, a fort of missival mission, and of popular opinion, which the jacobins seconded with all their power, for they were wholly stand by Danton, Robespierre, and Marat.----

Note.

St. Pélagie, august 8, 1793.

MORE than two months have I been imprifoned, because I am related to a good man, who took it into his head to retain his virtue in a revolution, and give in exact accounts being a minister. For five months he had folicited in vain the fettlement of his accounts. and the passing of judgment on his administration. They have been examined : but, as nothing has been found in them to blame, it has not been thought proper to make any report, and he has been flandered. The activity of Roland, his multifarious labours, and his enlightened writings, acquired him a degree of reputation, which has been thought dangerous: or at least envious men have made it believed fo. to effect the downfal of a man, whose integrity they detested. His ruin was refolved: and an attempt was made to take him into cuftody at the time of the infurrection on the 31ft of may; the epoch of the complete debalement and violation of the reprefentative body of the nation, and the the fuccefs of the decenvirate. He has escaped: for rage they have feized me: though they would have apprehended me otherwise; for our perfecutors, if they know my name has not the influence of his, are perfuaded, that my temper posses not less firmness, and they are almost equally desirous of my ruin.

The first part of my captivity I employed in writing. This I did with fo much rapidity, and was fo happily disposed for it, that in less than a month I had manuscripts sufficient to have formed a duodecimo volume. Under the title of Historical Memoirs, they confisted of details relative to all the facts, and all the perfons, connected with public affairs, that my fituation had brought to my knowledge. I related them with all the freedom and energy of my character, with all the negligence of frankness, the unconstraint of a mind superiour to felfish considerations, the pleafure of defcribing what I had felt or experienced, and finally in confidence, that, whatever might happen, the collection would form my moral and political testament.

I had completed the whole, bringing things down to the prefent moment: and I had entrusted it to a friend, who fet upon it the highest value. On a fudden the florm burst over him. The instant he faw himfelf put under arress, he thought of nothing but the danger, he felt only the necessity of parrying it, and, without ruminating on expedients, he threw my manuscript into the fire. This loss agitated my mind more than the rudess thad ever done. It is not difficult to conceive this, if it be recollected, that the crisis approaches; that I may be massared to-morrow, or dragged, I know not how, before the tribunal employed by those who rule, to rid them of persons they find troublesome: and that these writings were the anchor, to which I entrusted the justification of my memory, and that of many other persons, for whom I am deeply interested.

Yet, as we should not fink under any event, I shall employ my leifure hours in fetting down, without form or order, what occurs to my mind. These fragments cannot supply what I have lost, but they will ferve to recal it to my memory, and affist me in replacing it fome future day, if the power of doing it be left me.

CHARACTERS

CHARACTERS and ANECDOTES.

Buzor,

OF a lofty character, proud mind, and boiling courage, fufceptible, ardent, melancholy, and indolent. cannot but fometimes run into extremes. A paflionate admirer of nature, feeding his imagination with all the charms it offers, and his mind with the most affecting principles of philosophy, he seems formed to tafte and impart domeflic happinefs: he would forget the whole world in the placid enjoyment of private virtues with a heart worthy of his own. But, thrown into public life, he is fenfible only to the laws of rigid equity, and defends them at all hazards. Eafily roufed to indignation against injustice, he attacks it with ardour, and is incapable of making terms with guilt. The friend of human nature fusceptible of the tendereft feelings, capable of the fublimeft flights and most generous refolutions, he cherishes mankind, and can facrifice himfelf as a true republican: but a fevere judge of individuals, and difficult in the choice of the objects of his efteem, he bestows it on very few. This referve, added to the energetic freedom, with which he expresses himselt, has made him be accused of haughtiness, and begotten him enemies. Mediocrity crity fcarcely ever forgives merit : but vice detefts and perfecutes that courageous virtue, which declares war against it. Buzot is the gentlest man on earth to his friends; and the roughest adversary to knaves. Whilst yet young, the ripenefs of his judgment, and purity of his morals, obtained him the effeem and confidence of his fellow-citizens. Both their confidence and effeem he justified, by his devotion to truth, and his firmnefs and perfeverance in fpeaking it. Ordinary men, who depreciate what they cannot attain, treat his penetration as refvery, his warmth as paffion, his ftrong ideas as flights of fancy, and his opposition to every kind of excels as a revolt against the majority. He was accused of royalifm, because he afferted, that morals were necessary in a republic, and that nothing fhould be omitted to maintain or correct them; of eatumniating Paris, because he abhorred the massacres of feptember, and afcribed them folely to a handful of cut throats hired by robbers; of ariftocracy, becaufe he would have called the people to the exercise of it's fovereignty in paffing judgment on Lewis XVI; of federalifm, because he claimed the maintenance of equality between all the departments, and flood up to oppole the municipal tyranny of an ulurping com-These were his crimes. He had also his mune. faults. Possessing a nobleness of countenance, and elegance of shape, in his dress he preferved that attention, neatnefs, and decorum, which announce a love of order, a tafte and feeling of propriety, and that refpect which a man of education [l'homme honnéte] owes to the public and to himfelf.

Thus, when the four of the nation lifted to the helm helm mcn, who made patriotifm confift in flattering the people, in order to guide it; in overturning and invading every thing, to procure themfelves wealth and confequence; in flandering the laws, to obtain rule; in protecting licentioufnefs, to fecure impunity; in cutting throats, to ftrengthen their own power; and in fwearing, drinking, and drefting like porters, to fraternife with their fellows: Buzot profeffed the morals of a Socrates, and retained the politeness of a Scipio .--What a villain !---Hence the upright Lacroix, the fage Chabot, the gentle Lindet, the modelt Thuriot, the learned Duroi, the humane Danton, and their faithful imitators, declared him a traitor to his country : they caufed his houfe to be razed, and his property to be confiscated, as formerly Ariflides was banished, and Phocion condemned to die. I am altonified they did not decree, that his name should be forgotten. It would have been more confiftent with their views. than to pretend to preferve it attached to epithets, which the evidence of facts difproves.

They cannot obliterate from the page of hiftory Buzot's conduct in the conftituent affembly; or fupprefs his fage motions, and vigorous flights, in the convention. However his opinions may be falfified in papers devoid of impartiality, the principles by which they are fupported will fill be perceptible. Buzot frequently fpoke off-hand, and this conftituted the greater part of his labours: but he never failed to ftand up against every crooked fystem, against every ftep detrimental to liberty. His report on a departmentary guard, a project fo much decried, contains arguments, that have never been answered. That against inftigators infligators to murder difplays the foundeft policy : and philosophy true as that nature, ftrong as that reafon, on which it is founded. His propofal for the banifhment of the Bourbons is detailed with precifion. defended with juffice, and written with warmth and elegance. His opinion on the judgment of the king, abounding with facts and arguments, has nothing of that pathos and rambling from the fubject, in which fo many haranguers indulged on the occasion. In fine, his letters to his constituents, of the 6th and 22d of january, paint his mind with fuch truth, as will make them fought after. A few wreitlers of his ftrength might have given the convention the impulse it wanted : but the reft of the men of talents, keeping themselves back as orators for great occalions, were too neglectful of common daily contests, and not fufficiently wary of the arts of their inferiour adversaries.

Pétion.

A TRULY honeft and good man, he is equally incapable of doing the leaft thing repugnant to juffice, and inflicting the flighteft injury, or occasioning the leaft uncafines to any one. For himself he can neglect many things, yet he knows not how to refuse a favour to any person in the world. The ferenity of a good confcience, and mildness of an easy temper, with frankness and cheerfulness, distinguish his countenance. He was a prudent mayor, and faithful representative: but he is too unsufpicious, and too peaceable, to forefee or allay a florm. Sound judgment, pure intentions, and what is termed jufinefs of thought, characterife his opinions and writings, which bear flronger marks of good fenfe than of talents. As an orator he is cold, as a writer his flyle is loofe : an equitable minifler, and a good citizen, he was formed for the exercife of virtue in a republic; not to found a republican government amongft a corrupt people, who for fome time idolized him, and then rejoiced at his profeription, as at that of an enemy.

At the time of the conflituent affembly, during the revision of the laws, I was one day with the wife of Buzot, when her hufband returned from the affembly very late, bringing with him Pétion to dinner. It was the period when the court treated them as factious men, and defcribed them as intriguers completely occupied in exciting diffurbances. After dinner, Pétion, fitting on a large fopha, began to play with a little dog, with all the earneftnefs of a child, till they both grew tired, and fell afleep together. The conversation of four perfons did not prevent Pétion from fnoring. . Look at that fower of fedition :' faid Buzot, with a fmile: • we were eyed afkance as we quitted the hall ; and our acculers, greatly alarmed for their party, imagine we are bufily occupied in intrigue.'

The circumstance, and the remark, have often recurred to my remembrance, fince those unfortunate times when Pétion and Buzot were accused and profcribed as royalist, with as much reason as they were then accused of intrigue by the court. Always alone; imbued with fuch principles; conferring with men, who professed the fame, only to converse on relative opinions; opinions; they deemed it fufficient to contend for juftice obfinately, to fpeak the truth conftantly, and to facrifice themfelves, or expose themfelves to every danger, rather than betray them: and they are declared traitors to their country.

I will here record a striking fact. It has elsewhere been feen, that, during the first patriotic administration, it had been fettled, that the minister of foreign affairs (hould take from the fund allotted to his department for fecret fervices certain fums, which he should put into the hands of the mayor of Paris, as well to maintain the police, which was reduced to nothing for want of means, as for publications to counterbalance those of the court. Dumouriez having quitted that department, the matter, that is as far as it regarded the police alone, was mentioned to d'Aban-He would do nothing in it himself: but he court. pretended, that it was a business, which the king might be brought to approve, as he could not fail to fee it's justice. The king did not approve the propofal, and answered, in direct terms, that he would not buy rods to whip himfelf. In this he fpoke fenfibly enough, as he was not fincerely a friend to the conftitution; and fuch an answer might have been expected. But a few days after, Lacroix, the prefent colleague of Danton, in concert with whom he is the plunderer of Belgium, the perfecutor of honeft men, and the fovereign of the day; who then had a feat in the legiflative affembly, and who was known to frequent the palace; went to Pétion to promife him the free disposal of three millions [f.125,000], if he would employ them fo as to fupport his majefty. This propofal muft must necessarily have been even more affronting to the mayor, than the other was displeasing to the king. It was rejected therefore : notwithstanding he was received with particular gracioufnefs at the fame time by the king; for, his attendance being requested at the palace, inflead of finding the king furrounded as ufual, whom he had never before feen alone, he was introduced into his clofet, where there appeared to be no one elfe, and Lewis XVI was lavish to him of marks of affability and regard, and even of those little captivating cajoleries, which he well knew how to employ when he pleafed. A flight found of filk ruftling behind the hangings informed Pétion, that the queen was prefent without being visible, and the careffes of the king convinced him of his hypocrify: he remained firm, without fuffering his honefty to yield to the king, who would have feduced it : in the fame manner as afterwards, without flattering the people, he would have deferred to it the judgment of that fame king; whilft Lacroix, who had ferved him, and probably been paid for his fervices, thought he could not too fpeedily be condemned to death.

Рлсне.

IT has been faid with reafon, that the talent of knowing men ought to be the first with them who govern: their errours of this kind are always the most fatal. But the exercise of this difficult talent is much K more

In my youth, I had met, at the houfe of one of my relations, Gibert, who held a place in the post-office. An honeft man, an affectionate father, he amufed himfelf with painting, cultivated mulic, poffeffed that degree of fuavity, which is the ufual companion of a tafte for the fine arts, and rendered himfelf esteemed by his acquaintance for his probity. Gibert was extremely attached to a man, his molt particular friend, whofe extraordinary merit he extolled with the height of enthulialm, and the modelty of one who thought himfelf far inferiour. I fometimes faw this friend : in whom, at the first view, you would perceive nothing but extreme fimplicity. I had, however, no opportunity of forming a judgment of him, for I met him feldom, and did not often fee Gibert himfelf. From the latter I only learnt, that his friend, who was Pache, enamoured of a country life, the only one fuited to his patriarchal manners, and of liberty, all the advantages of which his understanding enabled him duly to prize, refigned a genteel place under the french government, to fettle with his family in Switzerland. I afterwards learnt, that, having loft his wife, finding his children figh after Paris, and perceiving the revolution about to effectuate the liberty of the nation, he refolved to return to the capital; and that being fatisfied with the independence he enjoyed from the fale of his former property, and the purchase of a national estate. estate, he had refigned into the hands of a quondam minister a pension that he had procured him.

It was not neceffary to be often in the company of Gibert, and know his intimacy with Pache, to be informed of every thing, that could be faid to Pache's advantage. In the month of january 1792 he introduced him to us, and I faw him from time to time. Pache, as I have already obferved, wears an appearance of the utmost modesty. It is fo great indeed, that you would be tempted to adopt the opinion he appears to have of himfelf, and conceive him to be nothing extraordinary: but this modefty you would fet down to the account of his virtues, when you difcovered him reafoning juftly, and by no means defiitute of acquirements. As he is extremely referved, and never unbofoms himfelf freely, you would foon fufpect him to know more than he fays, and end with afcribing to him fo much the more merit, as you had been near committing the injuffice of allowing him none. A perfon, who talks little, liftens intelligently to every fubjest that may be difcuffed, and ventures a few welltimed observations, easily passes for an able man. Pache was connected with Meuniers and Monge, both members of the academy of fciences. They had formed a popular fociety in the fection of Luxembourg, the objects of which they faid were knowledge and civifm. Pache was very affiduous in this fociety; and appeared to dedicate to his country, as a citizen, all the time he did not beflow on his children, and which intervened between the lectures of the public courfes to which he led them.

I have elfewhere related how Roland was called to the ministry, at the end of march, in that year. The offices were filled with clerks of the old ftamp, little disposed to favour the new system: but they were habituated to the course of business; and it would have been wrong to hazard unhinging the whole of a great machine, in those troublesome times, for the fake of changing these agents. All that ought to be done, therefore, was to watch over them, and prepare to remove them in due time. But in the multiplicity of bufinefs, the daily current of which hurries along a man in place with inconceivable rapidity, it is not to be denied, that he may eafily be involved in difficulties, if he pay not a fcrupulous attention to every thing, which is infinitely irkfome, when it is infpired by mistrust. In this situation, Roland was defirous of a man, on whom he could depend, to have always about him in his clofet : capable of reading over a letter, or a report, on fome preffing fubject, which another still more pressing would not permit himfelf to read over fo foon; not to adjust it, but to fee that the adverse principles of the clerks had not influenced the manner of reprefenting facts or fludving motives : and that could be employed to fearch out a particular paper, in a particular office, or deliver a verbal meffage on any thing of importance. The idea of Pache occurred. Pache had been in the navy-office: he knew the practice of bufinefs: he had good fenfe, patriotifin, morals that do honour to the choice of a man to an office, and that funplicity which never excites ill-will. The idea appeared excellent. It was mentioned to Pache: who immediately expressed the greateft greateft eagernefs to ferve Roland, in being ufeful to the flate; but on condition of preferving his independence, without having either title or falary. This was a noble commencement. Roland fuppofed, that, when a new arrangement took place in the office, it would be eafy to fee for what he was more particularly adapted: and Pache came to him, being in his clofet every morning at feven, with his morfel of bread in his pocket, and remaining till three, without ever being prevailed on to take any thing; attentive, prudent, zealous, executing his office well, making an obfervation, putting in a word, to bring a fubject to the point in queftion, and foothing Roland, fometimes irritated by the ariftocratical contrarieties of his clerks.

Roland, very irritable, and warm to excefs, fet an infinite value on the mildnefs and complaifance of Pache, and treated him as a valuable friend : whilft I, delighted with the fervice I fuppofed him to render my hufband, lavifhed on him marks of effeem, and proofs of attachment. Pache had no ftyle : he could not be employed to compose a letter, as he would have made it dry and flat: but he was not wanted for this purpofe, and he was ufeful for that, for which the attention of a trufty perfon was required. Our friend Servan, appointed minister at war, was alarmed at the complication and derangement of certain offices, and envied us Pache. ' Let that honeft man come to me :' faid he to Roland: ' you have no farther occasion for him, you are far fuperiour to your business, and the chaos of the first outset once put in order, you no longer need the fuperintendance of another; whilft I am overwhelmed with bufinefs, and have a great hatred of perfons, in whom I can truft.'—Thefe minifters thought, too, that places required capacities in thofe who filled them; and that a man could not be put into an office, without reafonable grounds to fuppofe him qualified for it. Roland gave his confent. Pache, being confulted, yielded with a good grace, on the fame conditions as he had made with Roland. After this removal, we fearcely ever faw him; but Servan commended him highly.

A change in the ministry took place. Roland retired to private life; and Pache returned to his fection. The tenth of august came; and the legislative assessment and the patriotic ministers. Roland arranged his offices: Pache persisted in refusing any place, and Roland gave a situation to Fépoul, whom Pache had introduced to him. Fépoul was an intelligent, industrious, and accurate man, very well calculated for superintending the accounts, adroit, never opposing any one, and approving the stronger party.

Roland, nominated to the convention, and difgufted by the horrours of feptember, would have given in his refignation as minister: and, knowing the extreme embarrassment prudent men would have found in appointing him a fuccessor, he thought he should render the public fervice by mentioning Pache. This he did with the frankness of his character, and the incaution of a fusceptible mind, proud of acknowledging merit, wherever he supposes it to refide.

Pache, to whom he had not hinted his intention, and who had a little before refufed the fuperintendance of the jewel-office, for which he recommended Reflout, whom whom Roland appointed in confequence, appeared well fatisfied to remain difengaged. Yet he accepted a miflion for Toulon from Monge, repaired thither, and played fome foolith tricks, as I have fince been informed.

Servan's health obliging him to quit the war-office, Roland recommended to fucceed him a perfon, of whofe principles there could be no fufpicion, and who was not deflitute of talents. He was accordingly approved ; and we wrote to Pache, to inform him of his appointment, prefling him to accept it. But this did not appear to be neceffary : for, jealous as he was of his independence, he appeared not to have the leaft uneafinefs about the burden to be laid on his flouiders. and took it without hefitation. On his return to Paris he came to fee us. We converfed with him freely on the difpolitions of people's minds; the party formed by the parifian deputies; the enormities of the commune; the dangers, that appeared to threaten the liberty of the convention, and particularly those, which might arife from the fway of immoral and guilty men, who fought to acquire power only to escape punishment or gratify their pations; of the eftablishment of order in his department; and of our joy at feeing him in the council, where his prefence would preferve unanimity of will and concurrency of action. Pache liftened to the overflowings of confidence, with the filence of a man who difguifes his own fentiments; oppofed every opinion of Roland at the council-table; and came to fee him no more.

At first we imagined, that this conduct arose from a movement of felf-love, a fort of fear of appearing the the creature of Roland. But I learnt, that this man, who never accepted the invitations of his colleague, under pretence of the retirement in which the multiplicity of his business obliged him to live, received at his table Fabre, Chabot, and other mountaineers; furrounded himfelf with their friends; and took into office their creatures, all of them actors of the loweft clafs, ignorant perfons, or intriguers like themfelves; and that honeft men began to murmur and lament. I thought it right to attempt one final ftep, to open his eyes, if he were only milled, and to detect him, if he were infincere. I wrote to him, on the 11th of november, in a friendly ftyle, to acquaint him with the murmurs railed against him, the causes to which they were owing, and what his own interest feemed to require. I reminded him of what had been faid to him in confidence on his arrival at the ministry; and I faid a word or two of the unequivocal fentiments we had expressed to him, the unanimity they gave reason to hope, and the flate of things altogether opposite to what might have been expected.

Pache made me not the leaft anfwer: and we foon heard, that his first clerks, Haffenfratz, Vincent, and the reft, inconfiderable beings, whom I would not name, had not their enormities already configned their names to the historic page amidst the late popular commotions, declaimed at the Jacobins, and elfewhere, against Roland, and held him up for an enemy of the people. Thus there could no longer be any room to doubt, that Pache fought his downfal. The atrocity and baseness of this conduct infpired me with indignation and contempt: fentiments, in which I preceded preceded feveral, who knew Pache from us, and who were then inclined to charge me with levity, though they have fince gone beyond me in avertion to him. His mifconduct, or at leaft the way in which the pub lic money was fquandered in the war-department during his ministry, was horrible; every thing was unhinged, owing to the bad choice of perfons employed; it was proved, that regiments reduced to a fmall number of men were paid as if complete ; it was not only impoffible to produce a fair account, but even to make out any account at all, for more than 1 30 millions [near five millions and half fterling]. In the twenty-four hours following his difaiilion, which fo many ills rendered indifpenfable, he nominated, to fixty places, all the acquaintances he had left bafe enough to make their court to him, from his fon-in-law, who from a curate was made commiffary-general with a falary of 19000 livres [[, 792], to his hair-dreffer, a boy of nineteen, appointed a muster-master. These are the exploits, which the people of Paris rewarded by calling him to the mayoralty; where, supported by the Chaumets, Heberts, and other tatterdemalions, he favoured the oppression of the legislative body, the violation of the national reprefentation, and the profeription of all virtuous men, and confirmed the ruin of his country.

And this was the man who fought a free country, gave up a penfion, and refufed a place! But Pache went into Switzerland, his native country, and thus enabled his father to keep up at Paris the port of a great man, where he hoped to fpend his time more agreeably, than in a place which would have recalled to him his origin: and Pache received from Caftries a penficn, penfion, which flowed how far he had been a dependent on him, and might have excited fufpicion, when the nobles and ministers of the old fystem were objects of perfecution. This fide of him I had never feen; and this is no way inconfistent with Pache returning to France after the taking of the Baftille, courting votes in a little popular fociety ably contrived for the acquisition of influence, obstinately refusing fecond-rate places, and not hesitating a moment to become a member of the council, and take upon himfelf that department in the administration, which circumstances rendered most important. He was in politics the Tartuffe* of Moliere.

Whilft I am writing this, Biron is confined in the fame prifon as I inhabit. Towards the end of Pache's ministry, Biron came to impeach him before the affembly, and of course provided with documents capable of proving his milconduct. Biron faw him; was feduced by his air of fimplicity; perfuaded himfelf, that his maleadministration was owing more to want of knowledge than difhonefty; thought it cruel to bring to the fcaffold a man, who might have been imposed upon; relinquished his defign; and then mentioned it to Pache himfelf. Pache came to an explanation; drew from Biron all his papers, and every information, respecting the complaints against himfelf; and procured him to be fent to the army of Italy, where he was left in want of every thing. Biron obtained fome advantages; they were never mentioned : he made complaints ; no attention was paid to them: time ran on, the evils increafed, he was urgent; an order was fent him, to repair to Paris: as foon as he arrived, he was feized, and confined at St.-Pélagie. In this ftroke he difcovers the hand of Pache, and the tyrant by whom he is oppreffed.

GIRONDE.

GUADET and GENSONNE

LOVE each other, probably becaufe they bear no refemblance. Guadet is as impetuous as Genfonné is cool: but the paroxyfms of his ebullient vivacity are never followed by fournefs, and to the intention of offending he is a ftranger. Nature has made Guadet an orator; Genfonné, a logician. This frequently lofes, in deliberating, the time, which ought to have been employed in action: that diffipates, in happy, but fhort and transfent, flights, the warmth, which fometimes requires concentration, always longer continuance, to produce a durable effect.

Guadet has had brilliant moments in each of the two affemblies, the legiflative and conventional; owing to the fway of honefty, feconded by talents: but too fufceptible to wreftle long without fatigue, he has acquired the hatred of the wicked, without being very formidable to them; and he has never poffeffed the degree of influence, which his enemies were fond of afcribing to him, in order to render him an object of jealoufy. jealoufy. Genfonné, ufeful in debate, which however he has the fault of drawing out too long, has laboured in different committees, and drew up part of the plan of the propofed conflitution. His fpeech on the bufinefs of the king is feafoned with farcaftic ftrokes, to which an apparent coolnefs gave an edge, and which the fons of the mountain will never forgive.

Both tender hufbands, good fathers, excellent citizens, virtuous men, fincere republicans, they funk under the accufation of the confpirators, merely for want of having formed an union in favour of the good caufe, for which alone they contended, for which alone they were worthy to exift.

WAS, perhaps, the most eloquent orator in the affembly. He did not speak without any preparation, like Guadet: but his made speeches, strong in argument, animated with fire, abundant in matter, sparkling with beauties, and supported by a dignified delivery, are still to be read with great pleafure.

Yet I do not love Vergniaux: I perceive in him a philosopher absorbed in felf. Disdaining mankind, affuredly because he knows it well, he gives himself no concern on it's account: but he who does this should remain a private individual, without employment; otherwise idleness is a crime; and in this respect Vergniaux is highly culpable. What pity, that talents talents like his have not been employed with the ardour of a mind devoured by the love of the public weal, and with the perfeverance of an industrious mind!

GRANGENEUVE

IS the beft of mankind, with a countenance of the least promife. His understanding is of the common level; his mind, truly great: and he performs noble actions with fimplicity, and not in the leaft fufpecting, what they would coft any other than himfelf.

In the course of july, 1792, the conduct and disposition of the court indicating hoftile defigns, every one talked of the means of preventing or fruftrating them. On this fubjest Chabot faid, with the ardour which proceeds from a heated imagination, not from ftrength of mind, it was to be wifhed, that the court might attempt the lives of fome of the patriotic deputies; as this would infallibly caufe an infurrection of the people, the only mean of fetting the multitude in motion, and producing a falutary crifis. He grew warm on this head, on which he made a copious harangue. Grangeneuve, who had liftened to him without faying a word, in the little fociety where the discourse took place, embraced the first opportunity of fpeaking to Chabot in private. ' I have been ftruck with your reafons;' faid he: ' they are excellent: but the court is too fagacious, ever to afford us fuch an expedient. We must make it ourfelves. Find you men to firike the blow: I will devote myfelf as the victim.'-- 'What! you will * * * * ?'-- 'Certainly, What is there fo firange in it? My life is of no great utility: as an individual I am of little importance: I fhould be very happy, to facrifice myfelf for my country.'---- 'Ah, my friend, you fhall not do it fingly :' exclaimed Chabot, with a look of enthufiafm : 'I will fhare the glory with you.'-- 'As you pleafe: one is enough : two may be better. But there will be no glory in the bufinefs; for it is neceffary, that it remain a fecret to all the world. Let us think, then, of the means of carrying it into execution.'

Chabot took upon himfelf this charge. A few days after, he informed Grangeneuve, that he had found instruments for the purpose, and all was ready .---Very well: let us appoint the time. We shall be at the committee tomorrow evening: I will leave it at half after ten: we must go through some street little frequented, in which you must post your men. They must take care to shoot us dead at once, and not maim us only.'-The hour was fixed : the circumstances were fettled. Grangeneuve went to make his will, and arrange fome domeftic concerns, without any bufile; and was punctual to the appointment. Chabot did not yet appear. The hour came; and he did not arrive. Grangeneuve concluded, that he had given up his defign of taking a fhare in the bufinefs: but fuppofing, that it would be carried into execution on himfelf, he departed, took the road agreed on, traverfed it flowly, met no perfon, repaffed it a fecond time, for fcar of any miftake, and was obliged to return home fafe and found, diffatisfied with having made made all his preparations in vain. Chabot framed fome paltry excufes, to prevent Grangeneuve from upbraiding him; and fully difplayed the poltronry of a prieft, with the hypocrify of a capuchia.

BARBAROUX,

WHOSE features no painter would difdain to copy for the head of an Antinous, active, laborious. frank, and brave, with all the vivacity of a young marfeillese, was destined to become a man of merit, and a citizen as ufeful as enlightened. Enamoured of independence, proud of the revolution, pregnant with knowledge, capable of affiduous attention, habituated to application, and fenfible to glory; he is one of those men, whom a great politician would feek to attach to himfelf, and who must shine with lustre in a happy republic. But who would venture to fay, to what point premature injuffice, profcription, and miffortune, may reprefs fuch a mind, and tarnish it's good qualities? Moderate fuccefs would have animated Barbaroux in his career, becaufe he loves fame, and possession possible of the product o a very respectable reputation: but love of pleasure is at hand; and if it once take the place of glory, from vexation at obstacles, or difgust at miscarriage, it will corrupt an excellent temper, and lead it to betray it's noble defination.

During the first time of Roland's being in administration, ftration. I had an opportunity of feeing feveral letters from Barbaroux, addreffed rather to the man than to the minister; the object of which was, to lead him to judge of the method most proper to be employed, to keep in the right way ardent and irritable minds, like those of the department of the mouths of the Rhone. Roland, a strict observer of the law, and rigid as it, knew but one language, when charged with it's exccution. The administrators had gone a little astray: the minister had chidden them with feverity; and their minds were irritated. On this occasion Barbaroux wrote to Roland, to vindicate the purity of his countrymen's intentions, excufe their errours, and convince Roland, that gentler methods would bring them back to a proper flate of fubordination with more promptitude and certainty. These letters were dictated by the best intentions, and confummate prudence. When I faw their author. I was aftonified at his youth. They had that effect, of which they could not fail with an equitable man, who fought only to do good : Roland relaxed his aufterity, affumed a more brotherly than ministerial tone, brought back the marfeillese to their duty, and gave Barbaroux his effeem.

After Roland quitted the ministry, we faw him more frequently. His open disposition and ardent patriotism inspired us with confidence. It was then, that, reasoning on the bad state of affairs, and the apprehension of despotism in the north, we formed the conditional project of a republic in the fouth.---' That will be our last stake:' faid Barbaroux with a simile: ' but the marseilles here will prevent our being reduced reduced to it.'-From this speech, and some others of a fimilar turn, we conjectured, that an infurrection was preparing : but his confidence leading him no farther, we asked no more. Towards the latter end of july, Barbaroux nearly difcontinued his vifits; telling us, at last, that we must not judge of his sentiments towards us from a confideration of his abfence, which arole folely from a defire of preventing our being involved in any difficulty. After the tenth of august he departed for Marfeilles, and returned a deputy to the convention. There he did his duty as a man of courage. Many of his printed speeches display excellent argumentation, and confiderable knowledge with refpect to the regulation of commerce : that on the fupply of provision is, next to the work of Creuze-la-Touche, the best of it's kind. But he would require fome pains, to become an orator.

The animated and affectionate Barbaroux is attached to the delicate and fusceptible Buzot: I would flyle them Nyfus and Euryalus. May they have a better fate than those two friends! Louvet, more acute than Barbaroux, more gay than Buzot, and in goodness of heart equal to either, is intimate with both; but more particularly with Buzot, who ferves as a link to bind him to Barbaroux, of whom Buzot's natural gravity renders him in fome fort the Mentor.

WITH whom I became acquainted during the first L ministry ministry of Roland, and whole agreeable fociety I always fought, may fometimes, like Philopæmen, well pay the interest of his indifferent appearance. Little. flender, fhort-fighted, and negligent in drefs, he appears nothing to the vulgar, who remark not the noblenefs of his countenance, and the fire which animates his eyes and features at the utterance of a grand truth, a fine fentiment, a fally of wit, or delicate raillery. His pleafing romances, where the graces of imagination are combined with fluency of ftyle, the maxims of philosophy, and the falt of criticism, are known to all men of letters and perfons of tafte. Politics are indebted to him for more ferious works: the matter and manner of which depose equally in favour of his head and heart. He has shown, that his able hand can alternately jingle the bells of folly, direct the graver of hiftory, and launch the thunders of eloquence. It is impossible to unite more wit with lefs pretention, and more fimplicity. Bold as a lion, fimple as a child, a man of feeling, a good citizen, and a vigorous writer; he can make Catiline tremble in the fenate, dine with the graces, and fup with Bachaumont.

His Philippic, or Robefpierride, deferved to have been pronounced in a fenate posself of ftrength to do justice. His Confpiracy of the 10th of March is another piece of value to the history of the times. His Sentinel is a model for those bills to be possed up, those daily instructions, defigned to impart just ideas of facts to a populace, which it is meant to influence folely by reason, to move only for the good of all, and to inspire with the happy-fentiments that honour human man nature. It forms an excellent contrast to those atrocious and difgufting papers, the coarfe ftyle and filthy expressions of which are answerable to the fanguinary doctrine, and impure falschoods, of which they are the common-fewer; those audacious performances of calumny, hired by difhonest intrigue to accomplifh the ruin of public morals, and by the aid of which the gentleft people in Europe has feen it's difpolition perverted to fuch a degree, that the peaceable parifians. whole kindnels of heart was held up as a pattern, are become the rivals of those ferocious pretorian guards, who fold their votes, their lives, and the empire, to the beft bidder. Let us difmifs thefe fad images, and revert our attention to the Observations on St. Just's Report against the confined Deputies, by a Society of Girondines, printed at Caen the 13th of july. In it I discovered the ftyle, the acuteness, and the gaiety of Louvet: it is Reafon in difhabille, fporting with Ridicule, without derogating from her ftrength or dignity.

LAZOWSKI.

BY birth a polander, Lazowski came to France no one knows how, without fortune, but under the protection of the duke of Liancourt; whether he were a relation of fome perfon in his fervice, or a dependant on him in any other way.

Lazowski had been appointed inspector of manufactures: one of those very inferiour offices of administration. ministration, which confer no authority; the falaries of which were moderate : to fulfil the duties of which. it was fufficient to have honefty, and to have deferved them; and which, therefore, appeared adapted to any one, or for which at least every one thought himself They were in the gift of the council, at the prefit. fentation of the minister of the finances, and subordinate to the superintendants of trade. The persons who filled these posts were little magistrates with great pretensions; who made themselves of some little confequence, people having the goodnefs to credit them, like many others, on their own words; and who in reality, from the multitude of affairs that came before them, had extensive connexions, and gave audiences, at which great lords fometimes took the trouble to be prefent.

Lively, enterprizing, and paffing himfelf off for a man of understanding, Lazowski had perfuaded his patron, that he ought not to remain a fimple infpector of manufactures. It is true, that, in order to find him employment, an infpectorship had been created at Soiffons, where there was fcarcely any manufacture but of priefts, and fcarcely any objects of infpection except nuns: for it was a town of convents without trade, and in which no business was carried on except in the absolute necessaries of life. Mr. de Liancourt, who was excited to the advancement of his dependant by the ufual vanity of courtiers, engaged in it alfo from the honeft fimplicity of his nature. He was prefling with the minister, and particularly with the fuperintendants of commerce; for the fecondary agents are always the really effective men. Calonne was was comptroller-general: he had an inventive mind, ready at feizing ingenious ideas. The creation of a travelling infpectorship was hinted. This was no effort of genius: fuch a place had already exifted, and it's inutility had been evinced: but it's fecond creation was not without motive; it afforded the means of obliging a perfon of confideration, and the number of places, carried as far as four, gave it the air of an administrative operation, without reckoning the advantage of three places remaining for favour and intrigue. They were foon filled. The infpectors had falaries of 8000 livres [£333, 6, 8] a year; they were to refide in Paris four months of the twelve, and travel over the provinces the remaining eight; at the deaths of the infpector-general, they were to fucceed to their places; and they were allowed to folicit gratifications in proportion to the importance of their It is true, this fapped the foundations of an fervices. inftitution, the fpirit of which was excellent. It took from the infpectors of the generalities the hope of arriving at the infpector-generalfhip by merit or feniority: it difcouraged them by fending into their refpeclive departments men for the most part strangers to the business: and it deprived the minister of the poffibility of being well-informed of the ftate of arts, manufactures, trade, and in short all the objects of industry; of which a much better account might be given by men fettled in the feveral generalities for the purpole, than by these birds of passage, employed in traversing them all. But the views of the old system reached not fo far: and who knows whether, under the

the new, individuals have more extensive views, and particularly more disinterested ones?

This happened in the fpring of 1784, when I was at Paris on family affairs. I heard talk of a change in the infpections; and I learnt, that the ambitious Briffon had given up that of Lyons for a travelling infpectorship, and that it was conferred on a very young man. I reflected, that Roland always longed to retire, and intended to folicit leave, as foon as he had finished his labours in the Encyclopedia, that he might go into his own country, to forget Paris, and the meanneffes to which a man must stoop, who would obtain preferment refused to merit. I thought it would be better for him to go to his native home with a place, than without one; and it occurred to me, to folicit the exchange of that of Amiens, where we then were, for that of Lyons, which would fix him in his own country. This trifling favour I fuppofed would eafily be granted to an old fervant, whole knowledge and character the fuperintendants of commerce dreaded enough to be pleafed with his removal. The commissions were already made out. I urged my reasons with all the advantage a woman then had with people, who piqued themselves on their politeness: to these were objected the difficulties, which I frankly appreciated at their due value : and I obtained the change, almost as foon as my huflend was informed of the request I intended to make.

On that occasion I met Lazowski in the office, then a fine gentleman, his hair well powdered, dressed with great care, strutting as he walked, rounding his shoulders fhoulders and fwelling out his cheft, in fhort, giving himfelf those little airs of consequence, which fools then took for claims to respect, and men of sense ridiculed.

The conftituent affembly, having difcarded the nobles and fuppreffed the infpectorships, deprived Lazowski of his place and patron. Not daring to hope for a pension, which must have been reduced to a cipher, confidering the little time he had been employed, and finding himself without a penny, he turned patriot, wore his hair about his ears, became a bawler at a section, and made himself a fans-culotte; when indeed he was really in danger of being forced to go without breeches.

Young and vigorous, with good lungs, and able at intrigue, he was foon diftinguifhed, and became a ward-captain [capitaine de quartier] in the national guard. In this quality he ferved on the 10th of auguft, and availed himfelf much of the dangers of that day, like many others, who mixed in the tumult to reap fome profit, and afterwards prefented themfelves boldly as the faviours of their country. But his exploits date from the 2d of feptember, and the activity he continued to keep up in the fection of Finiftere, which was his, in maffacreing the priefts at St.-Firmin. He was of equal utility in the affair of the prifoners of Orleans.

He had occasion to come, as deputy of his fection, to the minister of the home department, where I faw him, and was enabled to judge of his astonishing transformation. The pretty gentleman, with his affected finiles, had assumed the favage aspect of a furious patriot; the purple face of a drunkard; and the haggard eye of an affaffin.

Dear to the jacobins, who knew how to value his merit, and defined him for fomething great, he was intended to direct the confpiracy of the 10th of march; but on a fudden he died, at Vaugirard, of an inflammatory fever, the fruit of debauchery, bad hours, and brandy.

All the world knows the grief of the band at this unexpected lofs; the funeral oration delivered by the high-prieft Robefpierre, his affecting lamentations, and his pompous eulogium of the great man unknown; the fplendid funeral celebrated by the venerable commune, and the holy focieties; the adoption of his child, embraced in the town-hall by papa Pache; and finally the interment of Lazowski near the tree of liberty, in the fquare of the Carrouzel, where his humble grave, covered with turf, is ftill to be feen.

Let them, who are aftonished at his posthumous importance, recollect, that it emanated from the focus of the jacobins, when they were become as formidable to the timid parisians as atrocious, when Marat was in all his glory, and Danton in all his power.

Affuredly the people, that takes the one for it's lord, the other for it's prophet, may well honour Lazowski as a faint or a hero, which are both the fame thing in the religion of the septembrist.

Robert.

WHAT have you done to Robert?' faid a perfon to me lately: 'his wife and he revile you more virulently than any of your enemics.'--'I have vifited them but feldom: I have done them fervice: but I have not confented, to flatter their ambition. That is all.'

When I departed from Lyons for Paris, in 1791, Champagneux afked me, whether I knew madam Robert, a woman of fenfe, an author, and a patriot. —' No. I understand, that mademoitelle Keralio, whole father is a writer, has lately married M. Robert, and that together they compose the Mereure national, of which I have feen a few numbers. I know nothing more of her.'——' Do you with to fee her? If you do, I will give you a letter of introduction to her; for we are connected as writers [journalifles].'—' Why truly, a woman of fense, an author, and a republican, it is enough to excite my curiosity. Give me a letter.'

I arrived at Paris: I had been there about fix weeks, when one of our friends, fpeaking to me of madam Robert, whom he had had occasion to see, brought to my remembrance, that I had a letter for her. I told him of it: he offered to accompany me to the house: and we went.

I faw a little lively woman, quick, and haughty, who gave me a very pleafing reception: and I found her clumfy hufband with a face like a bifhop, broad, beaming health and felf-complacency, the ruddinefs of which no deep study had faded. They returned my visit; and I urged our acquaintance no farther. The 17th of july, coming from the Jacobins, where I had been witnefs to the agitation produced by the mournful events of the Champ-de-Mars, when I arrived at home, at eleven at night, I found there M. and madam Robert .- ' We come,' faid the wife to me, with the confidence of an old friend, ' to intreat of you an afylum. There is no necessity for having feen you often, to be perfuaded of your franknefs and patriotifm. My hufband drew up the petition on the altar of our country: I was by his fide: we have efcaped the flaughter, and dare not retire to our own house, or that of any known friend, which may be fearched for us.'-' I am much obliged to you,' replied I, ' for having thought of me on fuch an occasion, and I am happy to receive them, who are perfecuted : but you will be badly concealed here;' I was at the British hotel, in Guénégaud ftreet; ' this houfe is much frequented, and the master of the house is a great partisan of Lafayette.'-' It is only for this night: to-morrow we will bethink our. felves of fome retreat.'

I fent to inform the miftrefs of the hotel, that a relation of mine, juft arrived at Paris in this flate of tumult, had left her baggage at the place where the diligence put up, and would pafs the night with me; and therefore begged fhe would make up a couple of camp beds in my apartment. Thefe were placed in a falon; and in them our hufbands flept, whilft madame Robert flept in my hufband's bed, adjoining minc, in my own chamber. The next morning, I rofe early, and was eager to write letters, to inform my-diftant friends of the events of the preceding evening. M. and madam Robert, who, I fuppofed, muft be very active, and have a much more extensive correspondence, as journalist, dreffed themselves leifurely, chatted after the breakfast I had ferved up to them, and placed themselves in the balcony facing the street. They even went fo far as to call out of the window to an acquaintance, who passed by, to come up to them.

This conduct appeared to me very inconfiftent for people who were hiding themfelves. The perfor, whom they called in, converfed with them warmly ou the events of the day before, boafting that he had run his fword through the body of a national guard, and talking very loudly, though the room was adjoining to a large anti-chamber common to my apartment and another.

I called madam Robert .- ' I received you, madam, with that interest, which justice and humanity feel for honeft perfons in danger : but I cannot give an afylum to all your acquaintance. You expose yourfelf by converfing as you do, in a houfe like this, with a perfon fo indifcreet. I am continually vifited by deputies, who would run the hazard of being brought into trouble, if they were feen to enter my doors, when there is a perfon here, who boafts of having yesterday committed acts of violence. I beg you will defire him to withdraw.'--Madam Robert called her huf-I repeated my observations, in a somewhat band. higher tone, fuppoling the thicker head required the ftronger impression. The man was disinisfed. I found his name was Vachard: that he was prefident of a fociety, fociety, called paupers: and much was boafted of his excellent qualities, and ardent patriotifm. I fighed within myfelf, at the price it was neceffary to attach to the patriotifm of a perfon, who had every appearance of what is termed a wrong head, and whom I fhould have taken for a man with a bad heart. Since

I have learnt, he was a hawker of Marat's paper, who could not even read, and who is now an adminifirator of the department of Paris, where he makes a very good figure amongft his fellows.

At noon M. and madam Robert talked of going home, where every thing must be in confusion. I told them, as that was the cafe, if they would accept of a dinner with me before they went, I would order it early. They replied, they would rather return, and thus engaged themselves as they were going. In effect, before three o'clock they returned. They were dreffed: the wife had long plumes, and plenty of rouge: the hufband was equipped in fky-blue filk, with which his black hair, falling down in large curls, formed a fingular contrast; and a long fword by his fide added every thing to his drefs, that could make him remarkable .- ' My god !' faid I to myfelf : ' are thefe people mad?' and I liftened to their difcourfe, to fatisfy myfelf, that their brains were not turned. The jolly Robert ate wonderfully; and his wife prattled as freely. At length they took leave, and I never faw them after, or spoke of them to any one.

On our return to Paris the following winter, Robert, meeting Roland at the Jacobins, made him fome civil reproaches, or polite complaints, for the interruption of our acquaintance: and his wife visited me feveral feveral times, inviting me in the moft prefling manner to go to her houfe two days in the week, when the received company, where I thould find men of merit belonging to the legiflature. I did go once. There I faw Antoine, whofe mediocrity I knew, a little man, well enough to place on a toilette, a pretty maker of verfes, an agreeable writer of trifles, but defititute of any decided character. I faw fome other patriotic deputies of the ftandard, as obfervant of decorum as Chabot: and a few women ardent in civifm, with fome honourable members of the fraternal fociety, completed a circle, which fuited me little, and to which I never returned.

A few months after Roland was called to the ministry. Four-and twenty hours had fcarcely passed after his nomination, when madam Robert came to vifit me .-. 'So, your hufband is in place: patriots ought mutually to ferve each other: I hope your hufband will no. forget mine.'- 'I fhould be happy, madam, to render you any fervice : but I do not know how it is in my power; and certainly M. Roland will negled no opportunity of ferving the public by employing perfons of capacity. In four days time, madam Robert returned to pay me a morning visit; and, in a few days after, another: always infifting much on the neceffity of putting her hufband in fome office, and his claim to one on account of his patriotifm. I informed madam Robert, that the minister of the homedepartment had no places in his appointment, except those in his own offices, which were all filled: that, notwithstanding the advantage, which might accrue from changing fome of his agents, it behoved a prudent Madam Robert laid close fiege to Dumouriez and Briffot: and three weeks after the returned, to tell me, that the former had given her a promife, which the begged me to recall to his memory, when I thould fee him.

That fame week he dined with me. Briffot and fome others were prefent.—' Have you not promifed a certain very preffing lady,' faid I to Dumouriez, ' to give her hufband a place without delay? She has requefted me to remind you of it; and her activity is fo great, that I fhall not be forry to have it in my power to quiet her with refpect to myfelf, by telling her, that I have done as fhe defired.'—' Is it not Robert, of whom you fpeak?' afked Briffot immediately.—' It is.'—' Aye!' refumed he, addreffing himfelf to Dumouriez, with his characteriftic fimplicity: ' you ought to put that man in a place. He is a fincere friend of the revolution, a warm patriot, and not very happily circumftanced: circumflanced : the reign of liberty ought to be beneficial to it's friends.'- 'What ?' faid Dumouriez, interrupting him, with equal gaiety and quickness: ' do you speak of that little black-headed man, as thick as he is long? Faith, I have no with to difgrace myfelf. I would not fend fuch a hob-nail to any place.'----"But,' replied Briffot, ' among the agents you have to employ, all do not require equal capacity.'- ' Do you know this Robert?' afked Dumouriez .- ' I am well acquainted with Keralio, his wife's father, a very respectable man. At his house I have seen Robert. I know he is charged with fome defects: but I believe him to be honeft, poffeffing an excellent heart, imbued with the true fpirit of civifm, and in want of employment.'-- ' I cannot employ fuch a madman.'--"But have you not promifed his wife?'--' Certainly : an inferiour place, with a falary of a thoufand crowns; which the refuted. Do you know what the afks? the embaffy to Constantinople.'-- ' The embaffy to Conftantinople!' exclaimed Briffot laughing: ' impoffible !'-- ' It is the fact.'-- ' I have nothing more to fay.'- 'Or I:' added Dumouriez: ' except, that I will order that hoghead to be tumbled into the fireet, if he come to me, and forbid my door to his wife.'

Madam Robert returned to my houfe again. I wished to get rid of her altogether, but without noife, and I could employ no method inconfistent with my natural frankness. She complained greatly of Dumouriez, for his tardincis. I told her, that I had spoken to him; and I ought not to conceal from her, that she had enemies, who propagated ill reports concerning her; and I would advise her, to trace them to their fource, in order to ftop them; that a man in a public capacity might not be exposed to the detraction of the malevolent, for employing a perfon, againft whom there muft neceffarily be unfavourable prejadices; and this required nothing more than certain explanations, which I recommended to her to give. Madam Robert repaired to Briffot, who ingenuoufly told her, that fhe was mad to afk an ambaffador's appointment, and a perfon, who made fuch pretenfions, would ultimately obtain nothing.

We faw her no more: but her hufband wrote a pamphlet againft Briffot, to denounce him as a diftributor of places, and a deceiver, who had promifed him the embaffy to Conftantinople, and then forfeited his word. He flung himfelf into the cordeliers, connected himfelf with Danton, fubmitted to be his clerk when Danton became minifter on the 10th of auguft, was pufhed up by him to the electoral body, and the deputation from Paris to the convention, payed his debts, lived expensively, gave entertainments to d'Orleans, and a thoufand others, is now rich, calumniates Roland, and reviles his wife. All this is eafily conceivable : he follows his trade; and gets money.

CHAMPFORT AND CARRA.

CHAMPFORT, a man of letters, living in the world, familiar with the great of the ancient school, connected with men of talents who have made fome figure figure in the revolution, has become better acquainted with the court and the city, characters and intrigues, politics and men, than with the age in which he lives.

That extreme confidence, with which I have always reproached those philosophers, who were active in the new order of things, Champfort partook. He could not credit the afcendancy of fome perverfe heads, and the confusion they would be capable of producing .----' You carry things to an extreme :' he would fay to me fometimes : ' becaufe, placed in the centre of the movement, you suppose it's fphere of action extensive. It appears to you animated; and you deem it formidable. These fellows will ruin themselves by their own intemperances: they will not be able to imprefs a retrograde courfe on the light of eighteen centuries.'-Yet thefe fellows rule; and Champfort is now a prisoner, with all those who do not worship their empire.

Abundance of wit, a fufficiency of morality, the graces of good breeding, the acquirements of literature, and the philosophy of a found and cultivated mind, rendered Champfort's conversation equally folid and entertaining. At first I thought he talked too much: and I accused him of that exuberance of fpeech, and that fort of fuperiority, which our men of I liked him letters very commonly take upon them. better in a felect fociety of five or fix perfons, than in a mixed company of fifteen or twenty, of which I had to do the honours. But, to fay the truth, I forgave him for fpeaking more than another, for he amufed me more: he abounds in those happy fallies, which make make you laugh, and afford you matter for reflection at the fame time, and which are very rare.- ' Do you think Champfort a thoroughly fincere patriot?' faid to me, one day, a man of fpartan aufterity .- ' Let us not mifunderstand one another:' replied I. ' Champfort fees clearly, and judges rightly : he has a found head, and does not err with regard to principles : he understands and reveres those of public freedom, and human happiness, and will not betray them. But that he would facrifice to them his peace, his enjoyments, and his life, is another queftion; on which, I believe, he would deliberate.'- You fee plainly, then, he is not a virtuous man.'- Why he is virtuous, as Ninna was chafte : and amidft the corruption, which erodes our vitals, we should be happy, if we had many such virtuous men.'-Our hypocrites and enthuliafts would never admit, that men fhould be employed according to the compound ratio of their civilm and talents, fo that they should be interested in employing these to the advantage of that. I have feen Servan enraged, that excellent engineers, whom he employed in the camp near Paris, were rejected, under pretence of their not being ardent republicans, whilft flout patriots, but confummate blockheads, who did not know how to draw a line, were fubfituted in their room.- 'I would not fend for them,' faid he very juftly, ' to give their opinions on the form of a government : but I am convinced they will ferve him well, who knows how to employ them. We want redoubts, not motions.'-This was too reafonable: it was talking like the fallion of flatefmen: and thus men of wildom acquired the title of conspirators.

When

When Roland was recalled to the ministry on the 10th of august, it was necessary to change the superiour of the national library : at that time one d'Ormeffon, whole name was obnoxious to the new fystem, and whole mediocrity gave no room for regret. The minifter of the home department thought of dividing the function of librarian between two perfons: reducing the falary from twelve thousand livres [f. 500] a year to eight [f.333, 6s. 8d]; and having the library open every day: thus the public would have gained on the fcore of inftruction; the nation, on that of acconomy; and the government, by the employment of two ufeful fubjects. With regard to the choice of perfons, he fixed on Champfort, who, being a man of letters and a philosopher, was one of those of that class, who had openly declared themfelves for the revolution; and on Carra, already employed in the library, whofe extreme zeal, if not his talents, feemed to entitle him to this reward. He had never feen either of the men, and was determined folely by these confiderations, added to the necessity of making a choice agreeable to the public. I received the vifits of both thefe men, in confequence of their places, and the connexion they gave them with the minister: and I should have continued to fee Champfort with pleafure, if circumftances had not kept us at a diftance.

Carra, become a deputy, has appeared to me a very good man, with a very indifferent head. It is impossible for a man to be more enthuliaftic in favour of the revolution, liberty, and a commonwealth; or a worfe judge of men and things. Giving way entirely to his imagination, reckoning from it rather than from facts, arranging in his mind mind the interests of foreign powers as best fuited our fuccefs, feeing every thing firewed with flowers, he dreamed of his country's happiness, and the emancipation of all Europe, with inexpreffible complacency. It must not be denied, that he contributed greatly to our political commotions, and to the infurrections of which the object was the overthrow of tyranny. His Annals fucceeded wonderfully with the populace, from a certain prophetic caft, which always has weight with the vulgar. And when we behold fuch a man brought to trial, as a traitor to the republic, we are tempted to afk, whether Robefpierre be not labouring in the fervice of Austria: yet it is very evident, that he labours for himfelf; and that, in his greedy ambition to pass for the fole deliverer of France, he would remove out of the way all, who have in any manner ferved their country, with a fort of noise or reputation.

DORAT-CUBIERES

IS a name I had fo often feen in the Almanac of the Mafes, and fimilar compilations, that I could not avoid laughing, when I found joined to it the title of fecretary-register of the municipality. They feem incongruous; and fo they really are. Cubières, faithful to that double character of infolence and bafenes, which his revolting features wear in a supreme degree, preaches fans-culotism as he sung the graces, makes verses to Marat as he did to Iris, and fanguinary without out rage, as he was apparently amorous without teadernefs, he proftrates himfelf humbly before the idol of the day, be it Venus or Tantalus. Provided he creep through life, and get bread, what matters it how? yefterday it was by writing a fong, to-day it is by copying a report, or figning an order of the police.

Getting admission into my house, I know not how, when my hufband was minifter, I knew him only as a wit, and I had an opportunity of making him a prefent. He dined with me twice : the first time I thought him odd; the fecond, infupportable: a flat courtier, an infipid complimenter, confequentially flupid, and meanly polite; he aftonishes good fense, and offends reafon, more than any other being I ever faw. I foon felt the neceflity of giving my open manner that air of folemnity, which hints to a perfon, of whom you would get rid, what he has to do. Cubières underflood it : yet, after fome time, he wrote to me, to beg permiflion, to introduce to me a prince, who was defirous of being admitted to my acquaintance. The ftrefs he laid on this title of prince was completely laughable; and to this he added the most difgusting flattery to myself. I answered in the manner of which I am sufficiently capable, when I would call people to order, without enraging them, and make a jeft of them, without giving them a right to complain. As to the prince, and his introduction, I contented myself with observing, that, in the retired life I led, quite foreign to every thing that might be termed a circle, and avoiding company, I faw only fuch perfons, as bufinefs or ancient friendship led my husband sometimes to wish to meet at his table. Cubières replied with long excuses, as te-M 3 dious dious as his eulogics, requefting a fingle moment to explain himfelf at my feet. I gave him no anfwer, and thought no more of him, till the day I was apprehended, when I perceived his fignature on the order of the commune: for there were two, one from the committee of infurrection of the faid 31ft of may, the other from the commune. Both were flown to me, left I fhould object to that of the committee: yet this alone was ufed by my guards with the keeper of the Abbey, to which I was conveyed.

The request of Cubières led me to suspect some private intereft : I diverted my hufband at the time, by relating to him what had paffed : and in fact I learnt, that the prince of Salm-Kirbourg, the perfon in queftion, was then importuning the ministers, in order to obtain from the council an indemnification for I know not what poffeilions in Alface. Hence I concluded I had gueffed aright, and that he fought to fee me only from an idea, that the new fystem might refemble the old, when women were engaged to plead with their hufbands. I was pleafed with what I had done, and found in this anecdote a fresh trait of the character of Cubières. It would be ferving him properly, to publifh his fervile letters, as contrafts to his affectation of ingenuousness and freedom. I should have had some curious pieces of that fort, if I had preferved the far-How many relations and admirers, of whom I rago. had never before heard, fprung up on a fudden, as foon as I was the wife of a minister !- As I admitted no company, they wrote to me. I had enough to do to read their letters ; which I answered briefly and politely, but fincerely, to fupprefs every thought, that I either either could or would interfere in any thing, and to convince them of the perfect inutility of paying me compliments, or calling themfelves relations.

The moft curious circumftance is, that fome were angry, and replied in fevere terms. I remember one M. David, who had planned fome eftablifhment, in behalf of which he would have interefied me. It availed me nothing to anfwer, that he would obtain his purpofe by applying directly to the minister; that my interference would anfwer no end; and that I never employed it, as it would be making myfelf a judge of fubjects, to which I was incompetent: he found my principles abominable, and wrote to me with great anger.

Thus in private I was perfecuted for my perfeverance in confining myfelf to my own fphere of duty : and in public I was flandered by envy, as having taken upon myfelf the direction of affairs. Yet people think it very pleafing and defirable to fill places of eminence !—No doubt the wife of a good man devoted to the public, who is proud of his virtues, and feels herfelf capable of fupporting his courage, taftes fome pleafure, and enjoys fome glory : but they are not gratuitous, and few would undergo what they coft, without regretting their price.

ANECDOTES.

WHEN I quitted the Abbey, I left there the family of Defilles, which was foon after removed to the Conciergerie, whence many concerned in the confpiracy in Brittany were conducted to the scaffold. Angelica Defilles, the wife of Roland de la Fouchais, the fimilarity of whole name to mine occasioned one of my friends, who wanted to carry me off, to make fome fingular mistakes, was one of the victims. Her fisters were acquitted, and confequently ought to have been fet at liberty; but, as a measure of general fafety, they were immediately arrefted, and conveyed to St. Pélagie, where I faw them. We fometimes converfed together. They were both young, mild, and good. The elder, a widow of twenty-feven, wanted neither amiablenefs, nor a decided character: the younger was of a very delicate conftitution. At first, overwhelmed with grief, it appeared as if they must fink under it: but both mothers of unfortunate children of the tendereft years, they had to live for their fakes, and fummoned up all their courage.

They feveral times mentioned to me the bafe treachery of Cheftel, a man of wit, known at Pàris, where he practifes phyfic, a breton by birth, who had infinuated himfelf into the moft intimate confidence of Defilles the father, knew his wifhes, and appeared to aid his fchemes: but, connected at the fame time with Danton, he received through his means commiffions from the executive power, repaired to Britanny, to pay his court to his friend, taking up his abode at his country houfe, feafted by his relations, encouraging his defigns, and giving them fresh activity by his afliftance. The moment that appeared to him moft fure, he fecretly informed against him, and brought the parties concerned together, that they might be feized.

Defilles efcaped. All his family were apprehended. His His effects were fealed up. The places where his papers might be concealed, which Cheftel had pointed out, were fearched. The young women, who ftill thought him a friend to the family, begged his advice, and implicitly followed his directions. Embarraffed with a purfe of two hundred louis intended for their father, they put it into his hands, ordered the beft horfe in their stable to be faddled, and pressed Cheftel to depart, that he might not be taken. He profeiled himfelf determined to fhare their fate; indeed accompanied them, but not as a prifoner; and would always have perfuaded the commander of the armed force, charged with the conveyance of the prifoners, to contrive, that they should enter the great towns by day .---Surely you cannot mean any fuch thing :' faid the commander : ' it would endanger their lives.'

They arrived at Paris. The trial commenced. The name of Cheftel was erafed from the correfpondence, becaufe he had difclofed the plot; and the poor victims then difcovered the ferpent they had entertained. Tried, acquitted, yet confined, and without moneythe two young women recollected the purfe of louis. They confided this circumftance to a man of courage and probity, who went to Cheftel, and demanded the two hundred louis. Cheftel, taken by furprife, at firft denied the fact; but, terrified at the firmnefs of the demander, who threatened to expose him to the whole world, he hefitatingly confessed the receipt of half that fum: which he repaid in affignats, though not till after repeated interviews.

Cheftel, formerly phylician to madam Elizabeth",

* The king's fifter. Tranf.

affiduous in purfuit of fortune, had in like manner gained the confidence of a wealthy private gentleman, whofe name was I think Paganel, or fomething like it, and who, amongft other poffeffions, had immenfe eftates in Limoufin. Paganel, defirous of emigrating, to fhun the forms of the revolution, made a fiftitious fale of his property to Cheftel. He departed, and reckoned upon the income, which his faithful friend was to remit to him: but Cheftel kept it for himfelf, and enjoys with Danton the pleafures of an opulence, which both have acquired by fimilar means.

At length repeated folicitations, perhaps affifted by more valuable offers, procured the two fifters their liberty. I faw them depart : but I did not know their fecret on this head. I have just feen Castellane, however, quit this prifon, at the price of 30000 livres [f.1250], paid to Chabot. Dillon got out of Magdelonettes in the fame manner. Both were involved in a charge of a counter-revolutionary plot. This very moment, august 22, I have under my eyes one mils Briant, living at No. 207, St. Bennet's cloifter, a woman of the town, whole keeper is a forger of affignats. An information has been lodged against him, and a purfuit has been pretended to be fet on foot : but gold has rained into the hands of the administrators: he, who directs the perfons appointed to difcover and feize him, knows where he is concealed : his miftrefs is apprehended for form's fake: the administrators, who pretend to come and interrogate her, bring her news of her keeper: and they will foon be together at liberty, as they have money to purchase it.

Fouquai-Tainville, public accufer to the revolutionary tribunal, notorious for his diffolute life, and impudence in making out articles of impeachment without any caufe, is in the habit of receiving money from the parties. Madam Rochechouart payed him $000 livres [6.3333] for Mony the emigrant. Fouquai-Tainville pocketed the fum: Mony was executed: and it was hinted to madam Rochechouart, that, if the opened her mouth about the affair, the thould be inftantly clapped into prifon, never more to behold the face of day. it poffible? the reader may exclaim .- Do you doubt it? hear more. In the hands of a late prefident of the department of the Eure there are two letters from Lacroix the deputy, formerly judge fifcal of Amet. One contains an engagement for five hundred thousand livres [£.20333], for the purchase of national domains : the other is to withdraw the engagement, and affigns for his reafon the decree, which obliges deputies to justify any increase of their fortune fince the revolution. But this decree has been fuffered to fleep, fince the troublefome twenty-two were expelled : Lacroix holds cftates as well as Danton, after having pillaged like him.

Lately a dutchman went to the commune of Paris for a paisport to return to his own country. It was refused. The dutchman made no complaint; but, feeing which way the wind blew, he took out his pocket-book, and placed an affignat of a hundred crowns on the desk. This language was well understood, and he received his paisport.

Here Marat will be quoted to me, at whofe death, according to the public papers, no more than a fingle affignat of 25 fols [13. cd. $\frac{1}{2}$] was found in his houfe. What

What edifying poverty! Let us however examine his habitation, borrowing the description of a lady. Her hufband, a member of the revolutionary tribunal, is confined in the house of correction, for differing in opipion from the rulers : she has been put into St. Pélagie, as a measure of fafety, it is faid; but probably because the active folicitations of this little woman from the fouth of France were dreaded. Born at Touloufe, the has all the vivacity of that ardent climate where the first faw the light, and a few months ago the was difconfolate at the imprisonment of a coufin, to whom fhe was tenderly attached. She had given herfelf much pains to no purpofe, and knew not where farther to apply, when the bethought herfelf of Marat. She knocked at his door, and was told he was not at home : but he heard a female voice, and came out. He had on boots, without flockings, an old pair of leather breeches, and a white filk waiflcoat. His dirty fhirt, open at the bosom, exhibited his skin of yellow hue; long and dirty nails marked the ends of his fingers; and his frightful vifage was perfectly in unifon with this firange drefs. He took the lady by the hand; led her into a falon newly fitted up, furnished with blue and white damafk, and decorated with filk curtains elegantly drawn up in festoons, a splendid chandelier, and fuperb vafes of porcelain filled with natural flowers, then fcarce and of high price; fat down by her fide on a voluptuous fopha; liftened to her tale; kiffed her hand; fqueezed her knees a little; and promifed her, that her coufin flould be fet at liberty .---" I would have let him even kifs my lips, if he had pleafed;' faid the little woman gaily, with her touloufan fan accent; ' but upon condition of washing them afterwards: provided he restored to me my cousin.'— That very evening Marat went to the committee, and the next day her cousin left the Abbey. But ere four and twenty hours had passed, the friend of the people wrote to the husband, sending him a person who stood in need of a certain favour, which he took care not to refuse.

One M. Dumas, a natural philosopher by profession, or a man of learning by trade, prefented himfelf before the famous committee of public fafety, fome time in the month of june, to make it fome important propofals. He offered to reconnoitre the army of the rebels in Vendée, and to give an exact account of it's fituation and numbers; circumstances concerning which the utmost ignorance has prevailed fince the commencement of the war. M. Dumas pretended most accurately to inspect the whole, by taking a bird's eye view of it from a balloon .- " Why, indeed, it is an ingenious thought :' faid fome of the profound politicians of the committee .- 'Yes:' replied citizen Dumas: ' and it may be quickly put into execution. I know there is a balloon, to be found, with all it's appendages, in the hotel of an emigrant: fo that the nation need not be at the expense of the purchase..'-Bravo! He gives the necessary information. It is received with transport, and officially sent to the minister of the home department, for him to find the balloon without delay. The minister fets his people in motion. They repair to the emigrant's hotel, which was an inn; and the apartment he occupied was one fmall chamber, where there remained not a fingle rag. A report report was made in confequence: the committee was disconfolate : Dumas was clamorous : and a fresh injunction was issued to the minister, to make a stricter fearch after the balloon. On this the minifler confults his fecretary; and it is refolved to have recourfe to grand measures. A letter is written to the department : the department fends to the municipality : and the municipality puts the affair into the hands of it's magistrates of police. Here the business was lost to the public functionaries; and I laughed heartily at the Abbey with Champagneux, who wrote the miniflerial letter, at the charlatanry of the brazen-faced Dumas, the fottilhnefs of the committee, the complaifance of the minister, and the whole category of follies: but I found the clew of the hiftory at St. Pélagic.

Citizen Jubert, a magistrate of the police, one of those who figned the contradictory orders for apprehending me and fetting me at liberty, a fat man, with a hoarfe voice, a true fection-prater, with a difgufting face, and awkward gait, difcovered one mifs Lallement, a tall pretty girl of fifteen, kept by St. Croix, an eminent officer, in the fervice, I think, of Philip She was taken up, and fent to St. Pélad'Orleans. gie. In her apartment were found the cover of a balloon, it's net, and other things belonging to it. This was the very prize defcribed by Dumas : but the committee had forgotten the expedient; the philosopher had loft all hopes of making himfelf of confequence; the minister cared little about the refult of the orders he had given; and the magistrates had no objection to take take into their own possession what was now a thing of fome value.

Jubert thought the little Lallement handfome. He had laid hands on feveral of her effects, amongst which was a portrait of St. Croix, and he deemed it very filly for her to pretend to be faithful to him. At length imagining, that kindness would render her more tractable, he procured an order for her difcharge, came to fetch her in a carriage, conducted her to her home, where he ordered a dinner, reftored to her after much folicitation the portrait of St. Croix, the eyes of which he had fpoiled, and expected a reward. The young girl laughed at his expectations, as the ridiculed his manner, flowed him the door, and repaired to the police-office, to upbraid him publicly with his attempts, whilft fhe claimed the other effects, that had been taken from her. The adventure made fome noife : but the colleagues of Jubert were not like to condemn it : and the paffed through many others, flill more difgufting or atrocious; of which the legislators of the 2d of june daily offer examples to all the conflituted authorities.

August 22.

TO-DAY a mifunderstanding has broken out between the tyrants. Hebert diffatisfied at not being appointed minister, sets his father Duchesne upon the makers, attacks the enriched patriots, names Lacroix, and is undermining Danton. Danton, more wicked than any one of them, but more circumspect, whils he endeavours to keep fome measures in the course of affairs, is already styled a moderate man: the committee tee of public fafety has rejected him: Robefpierre, moved by jealoufy, exclaims againft him: and the cordeliers and jacobins are on the point of coming to a rupture. A grand fpectacle for us victims is preparing: the tigers are going to worry one another; perhaps they will forget us, unlefs the fury of their laft moments impel them to exterminate all in their power before their own fall.

Chabot is for transporting all fuspected perfons: of course the wives of Petion and Roland, confined under that appellation, are threatened with a voyage to Cayenne. A pleasant destination !

September 23.

HAVE not my ears deceived me?—What! that woman who lived unknown, buried in the country, arrived at Paris folely to folicit for her daughter, is condemned to die!—How profoundly iniquitous fuch a condemnation!

Pétion; proferibed as a royalift, exhibited a phenomenon of the late revolution. His wife, whom calumny had never reached, had retired to Féeamp, amongft her own relations, there to await happier days feeluded from the world: flue went to the fea-fide with her fon, a pretty boy, ten years of age, the fole fruit of her marriage, that he might bathe in the falt water. She was taken up, and made a prifoner, with the child; and both have been brought to Paris, and confined at St. Pélagie. Daily examples teach the wives of them, who are proferibed, to expect perfecution: and Pétion's has fufficient ftrength of reafon to fupport her own misfortunes: but the fituation of her fon fon afflicts her; it is equally detrimental to his heakh and his education. She would make complaints : yet how could flie render them interesting? and above all, whom could fhe get to liften to them? She wrote to her mother, who lived at Chartres, to request her to make those folicitations, to which her relationship gave her a fufficient title. She came : appeared at the bar; prefented her petition with tears; was referred to the committee; and waited upon all the deputies, who composed it. Some of these seemed to give her hope, but from the greater number the experienced a very unfavourable reception. The inutility of her folicitations becoming evident, fhe refolved to depart, and repaired to her fection, to get her paffport figned. There she was impeached, and apprehended. She was carried before the mayor: a man, who refided in the hotel where fhe lodged, deposed, that she had faid, the french had need of a king: two hired witneffes, deferters, belonging to Liege, attested it: she was condemned to lose her head, and is now going to the fcaffold.

I have feen the unfortunate woman, madam Lefevre, feveral times, when the came to her daughter. She was in her fifty feventh year: she had been handfome, and her face still showed, that her features had been regular: she had preferved a fine head of hair, and her shape, though far from slender, was by no means clumfy. The defire of pleafing had occupied the greater part of her life, yet it had not led her to make any acquisitions: nothing appeared in her, therefore, but the remains of her former pretentions, and a fund of felf-regard, which was perceptible on every every occasion. She had no political opinion: indeed the was incapable of forming any, for the could not reafon two minutes together. It is pollible, that, in a converfation excited by fome ill-defigning people, the may have faid, it would be indifferent to her if the french had a king, provided they had peace; or fome words of a like nature may have been laid hold of, in order to bring her to trial. But who perceives not, in this falfe and atrocious application of the law, a fcheme to miflead the people, by making them fuppofe the family of Pétion royalifts, and it's perfecution confequently juft?

Fearful days of the reign of Tiberius, we fee your horrours revived; but multiplied in proportion to the number of our tyrants and their favourites! This unfortunate people, whofe morals are deftroyed and difpolition perverted, requires blood; and every thing, except juffice, is employed to fatisfy it's demand. I have feen in the prifons, during the four months that I have been their inhabitant, malefactors defignedly forgotten: and they are in hafte to put to death madam Lefevre, who has committed no crime, becaufe fhe is guilty of being the flep-mother of the honeft Pétion, detefted by tyrants !

I can conceive nothing more ridiculous than the quackery, with which are vaunted the benefits of a conflictution decreed with equal zeal and rapidity. Yet did not the very people, who made it, foon after decree, that France was, and remained, in a flate of revolution? and what is the conflictution but a nonentity, fince no part of it is obferved? Of what advantage, then, is it to us, to have fuch a thing? It is a piece a piece of waste paper, which ferves only to attest the impudence of them, who would make a merit of it, without concerning themselves about securing to us it's benefits.

They who, in the multitude, accepted it without examination, merely through weaknefs and indolence, from the hope of feeing peace, which they would not take the pains to deferve, are well rewarded for their upathy. Unfortunately it is with nations and their affairs, as with individuals and their undertakings: the folly and fears of the many produce the triumph of the bad, and the ruin of the good. Pofterity will affign to each his place; but it is in the temple of Memory: Themistocles died never the lefs in exile, Socrates in prifon, and Sylla in his bed.

September 26.

THE decree, that ordains the act of impeachment againft Briffot to be prefented tomorrow, was paffed in the fame fitting, in which it was proposed to florten the forms of trial before the revolutionary tribunal, and in which the four fections of that tribunal were organised: fo that the means of trying are multiplied, fentence is enjoined to be paffed more speedily, and the defence of the accused is curtailed, at the fame moment, when it is resolved to destroy Briffot, and the rest of the imprisoned deputies, that is to fay, those men of talents, who might have confounded their accusers.

Four months have paffed, without their being able to draw up that act of impeachment, the formation of which has repeatedly been decreed in vain. An N 2 augmentation augmentation of power, and the universal sway of terrour, were necessary, to enable them to facrifice the founders of liberty. But when the arbitrary imprifonment of a fourth part of France, under the appellation of fuffuetted perfons, has been determined; after an imbecile people has been rendered fanatic. to ruin Lvons, as if the fecond city in the republic belonged to the emperour, and those whom it thinks proper to ftyle muscadines were wild beafls; after an iron sceptre, stretched out over all France, has establifhed the reign of guilt and fear; after it has been made a law for those who are accused, to answer fimply yes, or no, without faying any thing in their defence; they may fend to execution those guiltless victims, whole eloquence they still dread, fo redoubtable does the voice of Truth appear even to thofe, who are fufficiently powerful not to liften to it's commands.

What care is not taken to fliffe this voice? But Hiftory remains. Her hand flill holds the graver, and prepares filently, though flowly, to revenge the imitators of Barnevelt and Sidney.

October 3.

I PERUSE the public papers, and I perceive Robefpierre accufe Roland and Briffot of having fpoken ill of d'Aubigny, who ftole 100000 livres [£4167] from the Tuileries on the tenth of august, after whom pursuit was made, and whose wise, in his absence, brought the 1000001 to the commune. I see Robefpierre assert, that Roland appointed Restout to the Jewel-office, to pave the way for it's being robbed: though though it was Pache, whom Roland chofe, who refufed it, and who prefented Reflout to the minister; and the hall of the convention resounded with the complaints of Roland against the commander of the national guard, for his neglect to strengthen the post at the Jewel-office, in spite of the minister's repeated injunctions.

That Robefpierre, whom once I thought an honeft man, is a very atrocious being. How he lies to his own confeience! How he delights in blood!

Infirmary of St.-Pélagie. October 23.

WITHIN thefe folitary walls, where opprefied innocence has now dwelt near five months with filent refignation, a stranger appears .- It is a physician, brought by my keepers for their own tranquillity; for to the ills of nature, as to the injustice of man, I neither can nor will oppose aught but calm fortitude. When he heard my name, he faid he was the friend of a man, whom I perhaps did not like .- " Why do you think fo? Who is he ?'- ' Robespierre.'- ' Robespierre ! I have known him well, and effected him much: I have thought him a fincere and zealous friend of freedom.'--'Is he not fo?'--'I fear he loves power too: perhaps from an idea, that he knows how to do good as well as any man, and wills it not lefs. I fear he loves vengeance too much, and particularly to exercise it against them, by whom he fuppofes himfelf not admired. I believe he is very fusceptible of prejudice; eafily moved to paffion in confequence; too ready to think every one guilty, who does not agree in all his opinions -You have not feen him twice !-- I have feen him much oftener !---N 3 oftener !-- Afk him: let him lay his hand on his heart; and fee whether he can fpeak any ill of me.'

Robefpierre, if I deceive myfelf, I put it into your power to convince me, that I am wrong. To yourfelf I repeat what I have faid of you, and I will deliver to your friend a letter, which perhaps my keeper will fuffer to pafs, on account of him to whom it is addreffed.

I write not to entreat you, as you may fuppofe. I have never yet entreated any one: and certainly I fhall not begin from a prifon, and to him who has me in his power. Prayer is for the guilty, or the flave: innocence teftifies, which is quite fufficient; or complains, to which fhe has a right, when opprefied. But even complaints fuits not me: I can fuffer, without being afraid of what may happen. I know, too, that, at the birth of republics, revolutions almoft inevitable, unfolding the paffions of mankind too much, frequently expofe them, who beft ferve their country, to become the victims of their own zeal, and of the errours of their contemporaries. Their confciences will afford them confolation, and hiftory will be their avenger.

But from what fingularity am I, a woman, incapable of any thing but wifnes, exposed to those florms, which usually fall only on active perfons? And what fate is in referve for me? These are two questions, which I address to you.

I deem them of fmall importance in themfelves, and with regard to myfelf perfonally: for what is a fingle emmet more or lefs, crushed by the foot of the elephant, in the general fystem of the world? But they are of infinite concern, with regard to the prefent liberty liberty and future happinels of my country. For if it's declared friends, and avowed defenders, be confounded together with it's confeft enemies, without diffinction; if the faithful citizen and generous patriot be treated in the fame manner as the dangerous regarder of felf, and perfidious ariflocrate; if the woman of fenfe and virtue, who is proud of having a country, and, in her humble retirement, or whatever her fituation, makes to it every facrifice in her power, find herfelf affociated in punithment with the vain or haughty female, who curfes equality; furely juffice and freedom do not yet reign, and future happinels is doubtful.

I fpeak not here of my venerable hufband. His accounts flould have been examined, when they were delivered in : instead of refusing to justify him at first, in order to accufe him after having envenomed the public mind against him by flander. Robelpierre, I defy you not to believe, that Roland is an honeft man. You may be of opinion, that he does not think juftly, with refpect to this meafure, or that : but your confcience must fecretly do homage to his integrity and civifm. He needs to be feen little, to be thoroughly known: his book is always open, and it is intelligible to every one. He has the ruggedness of virtue, as Cato had its tartacfs : his manners have procured him as many enemies as his inflexible equity: but thefe inequalities of furface difappear at a diffance, and the great qualities of the public man will remain for ever. It has been reported, that he fanned the fiames of civil war at Lyons: and the reporters have dared to allege this pretext as the caufe of my apprehension! The fuppolition fuppofition was not more just than it's confequence. Difgusted with public affairs, irritated at perfecution, tired of the world, finking under the burden of his toils and his years, he could do no more than groan in obscure retirement, and bury himself in filence, to spare the world a crime.

-He has corrupted the public mind, and I am his accomplice!---Surely this is of all reproaches the most curious, of all imputations the most abfurd. You, Robefpierre, cannot defire me, to take the trouble of refuting them here: the tafk would be too eafy; and you cannot be of the number of those good people, who believe a thing because it is in print, and because it has been told them. The pretention of my being an accellary would be laughable ; were not the whole rendered atrocious by the cloudy afpect under which it is prefented to the people, who, feeing nothing, forms to it's imagination fome monftrous figure of it knows not what. They must have an extreme thirst of injuring me, who can hedge me thus, with premeditated brutality, into an accusation, strongly refembling that charge of high-treafon, fo often repeated under the reign of Tiberius, to destroy all, whom, guilty of no crime, it was refolved to facrifice. Whence, then, arifes this animofity? I cannot conceive : I, who never injured any one, who know not how even to with harm to them, who injure me.

Brought up in retirement; educated in those ferious studies, which have unfolded my mind, and enabled it to display fome character; addicted to fimple enjoyments, which no circumstances have prevailed to alter; an enthusiastic admirer of the revolulution, [185] lution, and giving a loofe to the energy of the generous fentiments it infpires; remote from public tranfactions through principle as well as fex, but converfing on them with warmth, becaufe the interefts of the public become of all the first as foon as they exist; I regarded the first calumnies vented against me as contemptible follies; I deemed them the neceffary tribute claimed by envy from a fituation, which the vulgar had still the imbecility to confider as exalted, and to which I would have preferred the peaceful state, in which I had spent for many happy days.

These calumnies, however, have increased with effrontery proportionate to my ferenity and exemption from fear: I have been dragged to prison: and in confinement I have remained near five months; torn from the embraces of my young daughter, who can no longer recline her head on that bosom, from which, the drew her first nourishment; far removed from every thing dear to me; the butt of all the envenomed shafts of an abused people, that believes the loss of my head would be conducive to it's happines; hearing the guards, who watch under my grated window, fometimes amuse themselves with anticipating my punishment; and reading the offensive libels published against me by writers, who never faw my face, any more than those, of whose hatred I am an object.

I have wearied no one with my remonstrances: from time I expect justice, and the termination of prejudice: wanting many things, I have asked for nothing: I have made up my mind to misfortune, proud of opposing my strength against her's, and keeping her at my feet. My necessities becoming urgent, and and afraid of involving in trouble them, to whom f might have addreffed myfelf, I wifhed to fell the empty bottles in my cellar, which had not been fealed up, becaufe it's contents were of fo little value. Immediately the whole quarter was in motion! the houfe was furrounded; the proprietor was taken into cuftody; the guards were doubled; and perhaps I have reafon to fear for the liberty of a poor nurfe, who has committed no crime but that of having ferved me with affection thirteen years, becaufe I made her life comfortable. So much does the people, flunned with the cry of confpiracy, and mifled with refpect to me, fuppofe me deferving the appellation of a confpirator.

It is not to excite pity in you, Robefpierre; to which I am fuperiour, and which perhaps I fhould deem an infult; that I prefent to you this picture, which I have confiderably foftened: it is for your infruction.

Fortune is tickle; and popular favour is not lefs addicted to change. Contemplate the fate of them, who have agitated, pleafed, or governed the people, from Vifcellinus to Cæfar, and from Hippo, the haranguer of the fyracufans, to our parifian orator. Juftice and truth alone remain, and afford confolation for whatever may happen, even for death itfelf; whilft nothing can thelter men from their ftrokes. Marius and Sylla proferibed thoufands of knights, numbers of fenators, and a multitude of unfortunate wretches. But could they fliffle the voice of hiftory, which has devoted their memories to execration? or could they tafle the cup of happinefs?

Whateves

Whatever fate be referved for me, I can fubmit to it in a manner worthy of myfelf; or foreftal it, if I think proper. After having received the honours of perfecution, are those of martyrdom to crown the whole? am I deftined to languish in protracted captivity, exposed to the first catastrophe, that it may be judged requisite to excite? or am I to be fentenced to nominal transportation, to experience, when a few leagues at fea, that trifling negligence on the part of the captain, which rids him of the trouble of his living cargo, to the profit of the waves? Tell me which: for it is fomething to know our fate, and a foul like mine is capable of looking it in the face.

If you will be just, and read with reflection what I write, my letter will not be useles to you, and in that cafe it may possibly be of fervice to my country. Be that as it may, Robespierre, I know, and you cannot but feel, that a perfon, who has known me, cannot perfecute me without remorfe.

ROLAND, formerly Phlipon.

Note. The idea of this letter, the defign of writing it, and the intention of fending it, have remained in my mind for four-and-twenty hours: but what effect can my reflections have on a man, who facrifices colleagues, of whose integrity he is fully assured?

[r88]

If my letter will do no fervice, it would be ill-titted. It would only embroil me to no purpose with a tyrant, who may factifice, but cannot debase me. I will not fend it.

END OF THE FIRST FART.
