brought to an end, by the passing thereof through the House of Commons, to the satisfaction of all." Now, if so much good, present and prospective, is to spring from this comparatively slight impetus given to the value of property in one particular locality of our town, how great would be the benefits and advantages generally conferred upon all property in this neighbourhood, and all classes of the community, by the abolition of the Corn Laws! Such a boon to the trade and commerce of the country would give an impulse to every interest connected with the port of Hull, which it is impossible to estimate too highly. Our merchants would become the great carriers between this country and the continent of Europe. The shipping interest would be greatly benefited, and, of course, every branch of trade connected with and dependent upon shipping would share in the advantage—carpenters, sailmakers, riggers, painters, lodging-house keepers, and all the humble classes of operatives, who must come in for the harvest gained by an increased demand for work and labour. Property also in the town would be greatly improved in value, while land adjoining it, being required for building ground, would be raised immensely in price. We just mention these items in order to show our readers how much more, in all likelihood, than they have even thought of, is involved in the struggle for Free Trade. It is not, to use the fancy word of the President of the Board of Trade, a mere struggle for advantages "in the abstract," but for real bond fide benefits, of which all classes are robbed as long as they are victimised upon the shrine of monopoly; and we recast these things, we return to them so frequently, we dwell upon them so seriously, in order, if possible, to rouse the people of Hull from the almost miraculous apathy into which they have been plunged on the subject of Free Trade. It is true that something has been done; we may say much, for the first step has been taken, and that is much in every matter; but still Hull has not yet advanced to that position which she ought to occupy in the great struggle which is going on.—Hull Advertiser.

THE SOUTH DURHAM ANTI-LEAGUERS.—We understand that sub-agents of some of the monopolists are employed in certain parts of South Durham, to obtain the names of "tenant-farmers" to the Anti-League subscription list, with a promise that those who sign shall not be called upon for the money put down on the paper. This is, certainly, a very "ingenious device;" and so perhaps the "tenant-farmers" may find to their cost some fine morning when they least expect it. Let them beware lest the "subscription" is deducted from the next "generous return of rent" by those over-kind protectors, their landlords.—Durham Chronicle.

AWKWARD "FACTS" FOR A GREAT DUKE.—Mr. Thomas Fox, solicitor, Beaminstor, Dorset, in his evidence to Mr. Austin, says:—"I regret that I cannot take you to the parish of Hook (near here)—the whole parish belonging to the Duke of Cleveland, occupied by a tenant of the name of Rawlings—where the residences of the labourers are as bad as it is possible you can conceive, many of them without chambers, earth floors, not ceiled or plastered; and the consequence is, that the inhabitants are the poorest—the worst off in the country." He is asked—"Are you of opinion that such a want of proper accommodation for sleeping must tend very much to demoralize the families of the labouring population?"—"There can be no doubt of it; and the worst consequences have arisen from it, even between brothers and sisters." [The Duke of Cleveland, at the late farmers' meeting in Durham, told the persons present that he wished the labourer to have 12s. per week. Are the labourers on the Raby estate paid at that rate? Or is the labourage on the duke's property there let by contract, at prices so screwed down that, let the labourers work their blood and bones out, they cannot make more than 9s. per week? We shall wait to see what answer can be made to these inquiries before we notice the subject further.—Ed. Ibid.]

BLOWING HOT AND COLD ON THE CORN LAWS.—The Monopolist newspapers have lately been in exceeding glee at a letter written in favour of the Corn Laws, by a Mr. Joseph Sanders, a corn dealer, or ex-corn dealer, of Liverpool, and addressed to Earl Talbot, the President of the Staffordshire Agricultural Association, in which letter Mr. Sanders vainly strives to prop the monster grievance by every kind of fallacy and sophistry. But what will his new friends say of this gentleman, when we tell them that in 1833, he gave the following evidence on the same subject before the Commons' Agricultural Committee?—"I consider a fixed duty," he said, "wholly impracticable. While the manufacturing and commercial interests think they have not justice done to them, the question cannot rest. I confess that, from the present disposition that exists throughout the country, and seeing that the whole course of legislation now is to take away from the few to give to the many, I should think it a matter of extreme doubt whether any Corn Law can be preserved at all. No measure or course of conduct on the part of the Government, except that of repealing the Corn Laws altogether, can put a stop to the agitation. I consider the presence of a protecting duty on corn as inconsistent with the general principles of our commercial legislation as adopted of late years. I think that protection to corn is now carried to a greater length than protection to anything else; that the whole course of legislation is to destroy monopoly of every kind; and I do not see what is to resist it." And why this altered tone? It is, we believe, capable of explanation. In 1833 Mr. Sanders was a plodding man of business in Liverpool; but, in 1844 we find him master of a competent fortune, residing in Staffordshire, and anxious to sink the citizen in the country gentleman. We know, then, which of his opinions to look upon as his real and sincere one. We take the first to spring from his genuine conviction, and the last to be a mere bid for country society, and a stretching of his legs under Earl Talbot's mahogany.—Hull Rockingham.

PROTECTION WARFARE.—As part of the warfare now going on betwixt the Leaguers and Anti-Leaguers, in Lancaster, we have been favoured with the sight of a pamphlet, with the signature, "Old England," abusing the League in first-rate style, a copy of which has been addressed and forwarded to every elector in the borough. The League, alive to all their movements, has brought out a clever reply, which is to be delivered equally extensively.—Preston Guardian.

The "farmers' friends," with rarest Knatchbull tact And truth unconscious, own the "monstrous fact," Then is revenge (the only way to treat it) Got up a still more "monstrous lie" to meet it.

A FEW DAYS IN ESSEX.

BY ADAM BROWN.

Colchester, and round about it—now and five hundred years ago.

I went from London to Colchester on the 11th of March, by the eight o'clock morning train on the Eastern Counties Railway. It was Sunday. It was wet—drowning wet. The streets of London, which, at other times stream with business and busy people, ran now like mill-dams, or stood under water like a thousand narrow lakes, and I, and the cabman who drove me, and the horse that dragged us both, and the amphibious wheels of the cab which now paddled in the water, now rattled on the stones, now sank in the mud and got out again, to rattle, were the only discernible things, save the streams of rain, that moved and made a noise. All things else which should have been moving and making a noise were out of sight and out of hearing. It would have required no great effort of a gloomy imagination to have seen in that dark smothering cloud which had come down and settled upon the roofs of London in blackness, coldness, and wetness, while the great city lay asleep, an angel of doom with death in his hand, spreading himself out like a vast monster to drown or burk everybody in their sins before they could repent.

But such was not the thought that took possession of my mind at that time. I thought not of a city sleeping in its sins. I thought of a multitude of human beings, a vast family, each member of which had toiled during the week, and now reposed and rested, while Betty the housemaid, taking advantage of their being in bed, had got up with her mop and pail and scrubbing-brush—had ordered all the cabmen to get inside their cabs to be out of the way—all the policemen to retreat into archways and entrances—all the street coffee-makers to put out their fires and move home—all the venders of "spring water-cresses" not to come out—all the dogs and the cats which come out of houses to ramble on the streets, and the poor, who, worse than dogs and cats, have no house to come out of—that she had ordered all these to stand out of the way while she gave everything a thorough good cleaning, to make tidy for the ensuing week.

At the station the passengers were few—very few. We went away with as many as would pay for coals to the engine, but not more. This was not entirely the result of the wet morning, nor of the early hour, nor of the day being Sunday; it was owing to the same cause which makes this a railway with little income at all times—the fact of its having only a commercial community at one end, and of its running through a purely agricultural country its whole length of fifty miles.

Essex, I may remark for the information of those not acquainted with it, is a large agricultural county, with a fine soil, in most parts better than the soil of the best of the Lothians in Scotland, and in all parts good. It enjoys the advantage of the best of markets, having London at its western extremity. It has the noblest river of England—the greatest commercial conduit of the world, together with the German Ocean elbowing it for a space of one hundred miles, nudging it on the side, telling it, beseeching it, to give up its produce,—to make haste, and rear more; to send up to London, down to Hull, and from Hull on to Wakefield, and the great manufacturing marts of Yorkshire, and bestir itself, and make haste. The Yorkshiremen come for Essex corn, and Essex gives what she has to give; but that is not much for a county having 979,000 acres, most of it rich land.

Nothing struck me so forcibly as the lowness of rent in Essex. Such soils as pay £3 and £4 an acre in East Lothian, without the advantage of the Essex markets, pay here 16s., 20s., and rarely as much as 25s. an acre. If the special burdens be added which are not known in Scotland, the whole rent will be 20s., 25s., and 30s. an acre. Some of the marshes are rented higher; and some ground, let to seed-growers and market-gardeners, is let at £3 and £4 an acre. I heard of some at £5; but none of the regular farmers pay such rents.

Another thing which excited my curiosity, indeed I may say filled me with a pleasing hope of gratification, was the expectation of seeing all the labouring population well employed, well paid, and well fed. I had read and listened to reports which proclaimed to the world that everybody was well fed in Essex, and I did not doubt it for a moment. I could not believe that the gentleman, Mr. Baker, of Writtle, who spoke so positively upon that point, was correct as regarded other parts of England, and of Scotland, for personal observation had convinced me to the contrary; but not being acquainted with Essex, and believing it very likely that so good a soil, so well situated as I knew it to be from report, enabled its working population to live well, I believed Mr. Baker's statement. I found, however, that even in Essex there were many exceptions to this statement, and no where more distinctly than in Mr. Baker's own parish. But I am raising this subject prematurely.

There are several towns in Essex of considerable size, and many villages. The towns have some local manufactures, but not of much extent. There are soap and silk factories at Colchester; and between Colchester and the sea, fifteen miles, there is a trade carried on in feeding and improving the breed of oysters. The fishermen go to the Channel Islands and elsewhere, and, after fishing, bring home cargoes of lean oysters, which they empty into the Colne river, as also into other rivers and inlets of the Thames in Essex and Kent; and after some months they again fish for these oysters, and find them fat and ready for the London market.

Essex is not so level as one, sailing along its shores, would suppose. Travelling by railway we see none of those deep cuttings, tunnels, and embankments which we see on other lines. Yet, there is a succession of eminences and declivities seen on each side; and, save in the marshes near the Thames, there is no difficulty in draining the land where draining is requisite. The soils are of that variety—clay uppermost here, and uppermost there, sand and clay mixed at another place; and all of the soils most useful to agriculture—to be found by digging—that variety which bountiful Providence has brought within our reach, but which the farmers cannot take advantage of; which they must grieve over, and lament and complain of as obstinate contrarieties over which they have no power!

And they have no power over the soils. I have seen no county in Scotland where the farmers are more powerless than in Essex. Their farms are held at the caprice of the landlord and his agents. They have no capital as a class, and if they had they could not safely use it. There are three-fourths of them (I say this upon good authority) who, if pressed to pay their debts, must be distrained upon; and this notwithstanding their low rents, rich soil, and markets unequalled for ready demand and ready money! What, then, is the cause? The feebleness of agricultural knowledge and energy, and their inability to acquire and apply either.

I did not see much of Chelmsford going down, nor, indeed, in returning; but as the train halted there, I pulled down the window, put out my head, and saw that the nearest house of a row which stretches by the side of the railway was,—so the large letters on the end of it indicated,—the office of the Essex Society for Protection to Agriculture. Chelmsford is somewhere about half way between London and Colchester. It is a genteel place, with whole streets of new houses in process of erection. Writtle, where Mr. Baker lives, is about three miles distant, north-west. One of the builders of new houses in the suburbs of Chelmsford is John Thorogood, a shoemaker, who was imprisoned at the suit of the Ecclesiastical Court for the non-payment of church-rates two or three years ago, and who was put in possession of a considerable sum of money by the subscriptions of those who sympathized with him. There are either five or six goodly brick cottages in his lot. He has named them after the churchwarden who prosecuted him, whose name I did not take a note of, but the name is in large letters on the houses in the possessive case, with the word folly added.

I arrived at the present end of the railway (for it is not completed), half a mile from Colchester, fifty miles from London, and found the rain pouring down as before. In some places it seemed to have melted the railway. The earth was washed away, and the bare rails left standing like a skeleton. We went along safely enough; and if we had not—if the whole train had gone over into the mud which had once been the embankment, and we had been all suffocated—there would have been no "awful sacrifice of life" for the newspapers. So far as I could see, when we got out, there were only three passengers in the whole train besides myself.

I got into an omnibus, and was taken to a very comfortable inn, where I found a good breakfast and a history of Colchester. What could be more appropriate to a wet day? I learned from the history that Colchester is a very ancient place; that it was a Roman town, and ever since a place of considerable wealth; with many privileges conferred on it by the sovereigns of England when they were in prosperity; with many taxes imposed on it when they were in adversity, or when they were poor enough to need extra taxes, and powerful enough to enforce their payment. Its situation is good, whether for war in warlike times—it stands on an eminence surrounded by flat meadows; whether for the peaceful pursuits of trade—it has a river-outlet to the sea, and stands surrounded by a country highly fruitful; whether as respects a mere residence for pleasure—it stands in a beautiful country, where health is as little disturbed by local causes as in any part of healthful, beautiful England.

What its trade might have been at this day, had it not been so peculiarly protected by its corporation, cannot be easily determined. Its present shipping port is at Hythe, three miles down the Colne, and twelve miles from the sea. It was once at Colchester itself; but the very extensive powers conferred on the corporation for the protection of its trade have had the natural and invariable result of all such protection; the corporation has neglected the navigation of the Colne, and as nobody could meddle with it, it has decayed, and the tide, finding nothing to do when it comes to Colchester, has left off coming at all.

I found from the history that in the reign of Edward I. there was a property-tax of one-fifteenth, imposed on Colchester, as on other towns, to raise money for that king's aggressive wars. The record of the articles taxed does not throw much light on the condition of the Essex working population of that day; still it is interesting and suggestive of useful reflections. The following inventory refers to three classes of persons—the Abbot of St. John's, a landowner; Roger the dyer, and William the miller, master tradesmen; and John Fitzelis, the weaver, a journeyman operative:—

"The Abbot of St. John's had, on Michaelmas-day last, at Greenstead, eight quarters of rye, price 24s., at 3s. a quarter. Item, four stallions, at 24s., each 6s.; four oxen, price 40s., each 10s.; twenty four sheep, 24s., each 12d., &c." (This list is not completed, but these prices are worth notice to be compared with the prices of clothes which follow:—)

"Roger the dyer had on Michaelmas-day last in his treasury or cupboard, one silver buckle, price 18d.; one cup of mazer (maple), price 18d. In his chamber, two gowns, price 20s.; two beds, price half a mark; one napkin and one towel, price 2s. In his house, one ewer with a basin, price 14d.; one hand iron, price 8d. In his kitchen, one brass pot, price 20d.; one brass skillet, price 6d.; one brass pipkin, price 8d.; one trivet, price 4d. In his brewhouse, one quarter of oats, price 2s.; wood ashes, price half a mark; one great vat for dying, price 2s. 6d. Item, one cow, price 5s.; one calf, price 2s.; two pigs, price 2s., 12d. each; one sow, price 15d.; billet wood and fagots for firing, price half a mark. Sum 71s. 5d.: fifteenth of which, 4s. 9d."

"William the miller had the day aforesaid, in ready money, one mark of silver. In his cupboard, a silver buckle, price 9d.; one ring, price 12d. In his granary, one quarter of wheat, price 4s.; one quarter of barley, price 3s.; two quarters of oats, malted, price 4s., each quarter 2s.; two pigs, price 3s., each 18d.; one pound of wool, price 3s."

"John Fitzelis the weaver had the day aforesaid, one old coat, price 2s.; one lamb, price 6d. Sum, 2s. 6d.: fifteenth of which, 2d."

Thus, it seems in those "good old days," before machinery and tall chimneys reared their heads to put humanity out of joint and blast the nation with cheap clothing, cheap iron, and cheap everything save cheap provisions; in those days, when the soil of Essex was what it is now, and the climate the same, one quarter of wheat was valued at the price of two napkins and two towels. It appears that all clothing not actually worn when the inventory was taken was taxed; that all clothing so worn was not taxed. It is, therefore, possible that all the spare clothing does not appear in this inventory; more of it may have been worn than usual to cheat the surveyors. But, whether so or not, the household wardrobes and furniture of those "good old days," when the country was purely agricultural, was mean enough. In fact, no working people whatever, and no master tradesman save the very highest class—of which

Roger the dyer is one—had any bed or bedding save dried rushes or hay or straw spread on the floor; and no clothing whatever except what they wore, and that was mean enough.

How could it be otherwise? Mrs. Roger, the dyer's wife, had two spare gowns, value 20s., being 10s. each. Thus two gowns were valued at the price of five quarters of wheat! which is now equal to twenty delaine dresses, making included; or sixty common cotton-print dresses, making included. The two gowns were also of the value of twenty sheep! equal at the present day to seventy delaine dresses, or two hundred dresses of cotton print. The two gowns were also of the value of three stallions and two pigs, equal at the present day to at least one hundred and seventy delaine dresses, or five hundred dresses of cotton print!

There were also in the dyer's chamber one napkin and one towel, value two shillings. Thus, the towel at one shilling, was of the value of two bushels of wheat, which would now procure from twenty to thirty towels; or of four bushels of oats, which would nearly purchase the same; or of one sheep, which would now procure sixty, seventy, or eighty towels; or of one pig, which would now procure as many; or of the fifth part of a cow, which would do the same; or the tenth part of an ox, which also would do the same, nearly if not quite; or, lastly, of one-sixth of the value of a stallion, which would now purchase two hundred towels, without rating horse-flesh at more than the price of good working horses. No one need question whether the towels of our day are equal in quality to that of Roger the dyer; the intrinsic value is to be judged of by the use to which they are put. I speak of the article which would be found in a tradesman's bed-chamber now, as the towel belonged to the bed-chamber of a tradesman then.

It is certainly worthy of notice that, by the manufacturing and commercial industry of England, such a greater number of people, who must eat and pay for what they eat, are employed now over what were employed in those days, that a cultivator of the soil who owns what he occupies, not only gets fourteen times more for his wheat, forty times more for his sheep and pigs, thirty times more for his cows and oxen, and one hundred times more for his horses; but when he goes with the money received for these to a clothier's or mercer's shop, he gets, and his family and servants get, through the agency of those factories which, in some people's eyes, are such a curse to England, a vast variety of articles, all necessary to human comfort now, but which did not exist in the days of Edward I. and of Roger the dyer; and he pays for them, and for articles similar to those which did exist then, sometimes only one-half, and sometimes only one-hundredth part of what was paid then, even in money.

By little and little at first, and by great strides subsequently, manufacturing and commercial enterprise have brought the products of other lands to this, in exchange for those products to which we have added value by the work of our hands; and thus national wealth has accumulated.

I heard a curious story at Colchester about Sir John Tyrrel having bought a piece of gingerbread in a confectioner's shop on the day of a public meeting held last summer to discuss the Corn Law. Sir John held the gingerbread up to the people, and asked if they would like to be reduced to the level of labourers on the Continent, who were fed on black rye bread like that!

This reminds me that the Abbot of St. John's had at Greenstead, on which he paid tax, eight quarters of rye, and no wheat at all. And it is certainly curious that, in those days, when the soil was as rich as it is now, but when manufactures and commerce had not enriched the nation, the people of Colchester did eat black rye bread,—not gingerbread from a confectioner's shop, but actual rye bread. And in those countries where rye bread is now used, it is not less curious that there are neither manufactures nor commerce; in short, there are no markets for the produce of the soil. Clothing, furniture, food, every thing is of the meanest kind, just as it was in Essex when a woman's gown cost 10s. and a sheep 12d.

The land which belonged to the Abbot of St. John's is now part of the estate of Earl de Grey, the lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He has much land in this neighbourhood let to tenants-at-will at about 20s. an acre. Farther down, Lord Ashburton has an estate let to tenants on lease at 16s. an acre. If, however, the account of the leases which was given to me be correct, I should not like to farm under such a tenure. The covenants are impracticable.

At a place called Parson's Heath, two miles or so from Colchester, there are over a space of half-a-mile a considerable number of houses, probably fifty, which are inhabited by labourers. I visited some of them, and found that everybody was employed, at least all the men. On Lord de Grey's estate there is a great deal of woodland being broken up and turned into farm fields; and this is at present absorbing all the surplus labour of the neighbourhood. There is also a number of men more than usual employed close by on the farm of Mr. Biggs, a man of remarkable enterprise. I had not an opportunity of seeing him, which I much regret; but from what I saw of his farm, and I saw it before I heard a word spoken of him, I said, "That man is a national benefactor, whoever he is." This sentiment was prompted from seeing a crop of turnips in one part, and preparations for turnips in another part, so entirely different from anything I had seen in the neighbourhood—where, indeed, the common style of farming is much the same as when the Abbot of St. John's had his rye on Greenstead farm—so entirely different from what is usually to be met with in England.

About an hour after seeing this farm, I met some labourers who were usually employed stubbing up the roots in the woodland reclamation. I put some questions to them about Mr. Biggs, to which one of them replied, "Ah, Sir, if every farmer employed as many men on the same acres of land as Mr. Biggs do, there wouldn't be third part enough of men in the country. He has five-and-twenty to my knowledge, and some say as how he has thirty one place and t'other; and he has not two hundred acres altogether. Mr. G—, who has five hundred acres, have not half so many men at work."

"He seems to make composts with earth and gas tar and chalk, and all that sort of thing; do you know if his profit has been sufficient to justify his expense for all this extra labour?"

"Why," replied the man, "I cannot tell that; but if he did not think it would pay, he would not do it, you may depend. I only know this, that when a man needs a job, and goes to him, he sets him on to something; something as nobody but himself would ever think of having done. You look at his farm and his men, and you say to yourself he have enough of hands, I need not go there; but you try for all that, and, though every place be full, he finds something. There are men on tramp coming out of Suffolk all up here and to London—they are bad off in Suffolk. Some of them go to him as they come to beg a bit of bread or a sixpence to help them on their way, and he at once sets them to work. He pays them, if they be men as will work; if they aint, why they are of no use. Ah! Mr. Biggs make a stir in a place, he do!"

Mr. Biggs, I believe, is only a tenant-at-will, and his enterprise in the practical reformation of agriculture may enable some people to say that the tenant-at-will is no barrier to good cultivation and an expenditure of capital. But Mr. Biggs is not an ordinary tenant-at-will. A good many years ago he was but a common working man. He performed an act of service in behalf of Lord de Grey, or rather his agent, which marked him as a man of superior energy and address. He was appointed to the situation of gamekeeper. He fulfilled the duties of that office in a satisfactory manner, and has now been succeeded by his son; he himself choosing to become a farmer. Such a man is altogether different, especially with such a landlord, from an ordinary tenant-at-will.

Earl de Grey has never been known by the common people to visit his estate at Colchester, consequently, if he has been there, he cannot have made many visits. He is well spoken of as an easy, kind-hearted man in respect of his tenantry; so much so that he will hardly let them be disturbed, no matter how imperfectly they may perform their duty as tenants and cultivators of the soil. One of them who held a fine farm, just out of Colchester, at a low rent, and who could not pay his way for a number of years, got notice to quit, but had also an annuity of £50 a year conferred on him at the same time by his lordship. The farm is now let to a tenant who seems likely to make it answer. It is finely situated. The railway from London, when extended to Harwich and Ipswich, will pass through it.

If Lord de Grey were to let his land in such quantities as would suit the seed-growers and market-gardeners, all this farm would be readily taken by such people, so I was told at £4 an acre. The rent and tithe are now about £1 10s. an acre. Such land, in such a situation, would let readily at £4 an acre in Scotland for common farm purposes. What the objection to letting the land in small quantities to seed-growers and gardeners may be I am not able to say. His lordship is not under any necessity of pushing for money. He has very extensive estates in different parts of the kingdom; is rich; and, being a kindly-disposed man, likes to take things easy. Perhaps there are also political considerations. All those small holders would become borough voters for Colchester; and to make their holdings pay so high a rent they must of necessity be leaseholders. In that case they might also be of different politics from his lordship and the member who so snugly enjoy the borough and support his lordship's party.

I shall make a pause here, for I am now about to change the topic, and the new one is both important and lengthy.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE LEAGUE AGITATION.—What a fact it is! How it grows—bigger and bigger every week—under all sorts of circumstances. High prices and low prices, bad harvests and good harvests, manufacturing distress and revival of manufacturing prosperity, the inertness of opponents and their virulent antagonism—all help; nothing comes amiss to the League; it can digest and assimilate anything, lives and thrives on anything, and keeps working away with a force, a continuity, a steam-engine precision and regularity, and a progressive expansion of effort, which bring everything within its sweep, and make its eventual and not remote success as sure as though the act for total and immediate repeal were already in the hands of the Queen's printer. This League is doing a great work with a strong heart. It produces the doctrines of Adam Smith on the stage of the patent theatres, preaches them in the market-places of country towns, heads the poll with them at city of London elections, and gets votes of thanks for them from county meetings. It drags the aristocracy of Great Britain down from the seventh heaven of the Upper House, where they sat like Epicurus' gods, to the bar of public opinion, where they are but as men; and makes the proud and lazy culprits acknowledge the jurisdiction, and plead to the indictment like any other criminals. These lords and gentlemen are certainly playing high for their chance of two or three years more of Corn Law. Their Anti-League agitation is not a wise proceeding. It evokes a power that will soon break loose from any control or guidance of theirs; already has the People's Charter more than once divided votes and speeches with "protection to native industry." It shows the world, too, in the most edifying way possible, what manner of men they are, in intellect and temper, who dare to chain down the industry and limit the franchises of this mighty British people. Perhaps the most noticeable result as yet of the Anti-League movement is, that it supplies the heavily-taxed inventive powers of League orators with a perpetual variety of stimulating texts and topics, and saves Covent-garden meetings from all possibility of growing dull. They had better have stuck to their majorities, and let well alone.—Tail's Magazine.

THE FREE-TRADE QUESTION IN ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND AMERICA.—It is curious to observe how the agitation of a particular question in one country raises similar agitation on the like subject in other and remote quarters of the world. A striking instance of the truth of the remark is presented at this time in the fact, that the question of Free Trade is causing great and constant controversy and commotion in England, France, and the United States. To use an American phrase, the wordy controversy, set on foot by speculators and politicians principally, appears to be "in full blast" in these three countries. To speak of the proceedings here, pro and con, in favour of the Free-Traders, or Anti-Corn-Law party (for the agitation is, in England, chiefly confined to the price of bread and to a tariff on foreign corn, provisions, and "bread stuffs"), and, on the other hand, in support of agricultural protection, to speak of these would be perfectly useless. Each day exhibits such proceedings, and the papers of the kingdom are teeming with reports of them. Then, with respect to France, the same subject is discussed, though, by no means to the like extent. The politicians in that country seem to be equally in favour of what is termed protection to native industry, or a protective tariff, as here. The commercial and manufacturing interests (which, since the revolution of 1792, have possessed a monopoly of government and its influence, to the exclusion of the small landed proprietors, who took the place of the more powerful representatives of the old landed aristocracy, under the then existing feudal system)—these commercial and manufacturing interests are in favour of protecting French industry to a certain extent, though not to the same degree as is contended for in America as well as in this country. Lastly, in the United States, this question is also in an extremely interesting position. It is stated in the late-received American papers, that the approaching Presidential election will be determined in a great measure on this point; indeed, the recent election in Maryland, in which the Free-Trade party abandoned the field, and gave the victory to the "Whig and high-tariff party," seems to be a very powerful and significant symptom of what is to be expected during the coming year, and so it is generally regarded among our trans-Atlantic brethren. In America, however, as it is truly remarked, the contest is waged by different parties from those engaged in it here, and resembles more the state of affairs in France. The high-tariff men in the United States are led chiefly by the manufacturers, the northern merchants, and southern landowners, the latter, from the nature of their staple productions, being opposed to contrary principles. But there the materials on which the law operates are altogether different from those in France or in this country, and that difference gives a peculiar character to the contest. "The subject must excite," says an American paper, "a great deal of agitation in America 'up to November next,' while in England, as well as in France, it is likely to do likewise long after that period has elapsed."—Economist.

INCREASE IN THE VALUE OF LAND.—Some idea may be formed of the very great advantage which the landowners of England derive from the aggregation of our population in commercial and manufacturing towns from the fact that, at a recent visit made by the tithe commissioners to a village about five miles west of London, to which an omnibus runs hourly, the tithes were commuted for a yearly payment of 14s. per acre! The parish is a small one, containing only 2260 acres, and it was made to appear that the present incumbent, a venerable gentleman, whose care for his own temporal interest has made him well acquainted with the course of trade at Covent-garden Market, has drawn from it nearer £2000 than £1500 per annum. Let us consider for a moment what must have been the condition of this parish, with its population (in 1841, 2665 souls), and its venerable rector, if, instead of the present condition of England as respects its commerce and manufactures, our forefathers had been foolish enough, and selfish enough, and powerful enough, to repress the industry of the country, and to confine it, as the measures of the present race of monopolists inevitably would, to pursuits of agriculture. Would its 2260 acres support 2665 inhabitants? Would it afford its rector a commuted income of £1582 per annum, in addition to fees and offerings? Would the profits attending upon its cultivation—not the tithe, but the whole produce—reach to 14s. per acre? We think not. What egregious stupidity is it, then, on the part of those who have got possession of the land, to place restrictions upon that industry through which alone they prosper, and by means of which alone they can hope to hold their station in the community. Let the advocates of protection have their will, and what must become of the national increase of the 2665 men and women now inhabiting this prosperous parish? Must they not become a burden upon the owners of its 2260 acres, until these will have, not 14s. per acre wherewith to fatten a rector, but scarcely a cabbage or a potato to satisfy the cravings of their own hunger?—Ibid.

A FREE-TRADE PARADISE.—Jersey, with a population of about 47,000, and enjoying all the advantages of British protection, is entirely exempted from taxes, and has only some trifling rates. No assessed taxes, no income or property tax, no house or window tax, no stamps, no customs, no excise, no toll-bars—horses, dogs, servants, carriages, all free. What a blessed country! says the well-taxed Englishman. But Jersey owns other blessings. Upon neither the importation nor the exportation of articles of any description is there any restriction. Trade is free. It is very pleasant to know that there is at least one spot on God's earth not blighted with the curse which commercial restrictions have everywhere else imposed. Ships from all countries sail into St. Heliers, and pour forth their stores unchallenged, subject to no other charge than that for harbourage. The corn, wines, and liquors of continental Europe, the sugars of the West Indies, the tobacco and cotton of Virginia, the timber and drugs of South America, the tea of China, the spices of Java, and the silk of Hindostan—all enter this happy little port free of any kind of duty. Besides the advantages derivable from the freedom of import trade, the inhabitants enjoy the privilege of exporting their produce unrestrictedly to England—a boon of incalculable value. The chief exports are cows, potatoes, butter, cider, and apples. It is stated that 8000 tons of potatoes, 15,000 gallons of cider, and 20,000 pounds of butter are exported annually. A considerable trade is carried on in the Newfoundland fisheries. Vessels engaged in these fisheries take with them from Jersey woollen manufactures, cordage, nets, and some other articles of island manufacture; and having obtained a cargo either by fishing or purchase, they proceed with it to various ports in Spain, the Mediterranean, or North and South America. Sales being there effected, the vessels return with the produce of these markets either to England or Jersey; if to the former, they make a fresh exchange, and bring to the island the articles required by the inhabitants. In this way the trade of Jersey, export and import, affords a miniature example of what would arise in any other country—could such a happy country exist below—where neither were prohibitory duties exacted nor duties for revenue required. As might be expected, all articles of foreign growth are disposed of in Jersey at but a small and reasonable advance on their first cost. An English housewife gets quite beside herself on entering a grocer's shop in St. Heliers. All her previous knowledge of marketing is upset. What visions of bargains rise in her imagination! We entered one of the largest in the town, and first addressed ourselves to the article sugar, of which the capacious window boasted numerous specimens. "What is the price of that very fine-looking loaf sugar?" "5d. a pound, but here is sugar nearly as good for 4d." "Show us some brown sugar—say, that light-looking kind, what is it per pound?"—8d.; but here is some at 2½d. "Just so; now tell us the price of tea." Here is some good black tea at 2s. 6d. a pound, and green tea from 3s. to 5s. "Now for coffee." We can supply the best India coffee at from 8d. to 11d. per pound, and Mocha for about 1s. 6d.—These prices we learned were Jersey money, by which is meant that 1s. English will be taken for thirteen pence; and the weight of the pound being an ounce and a half heavier than it is in England, the purchaser has two important deductions in his transactions. In the same shop we learned that the price of Cognac brandy is 6s.; old Jamaica rum, 7s. 6d.; Hollands, 3s. 6d.; and whiskey 8s. per gallon. Port and sherry wines were from 20s. to 25s. per dozen; and clarets from 12s. upwards. In the butcher market we found the price of meat of various kinds much the same as it is in England and Scotland, and so likewise was the bread; but this was not reckoning the advantages from over-weight and over-value of money. House rent, we learned, is nearly the same as in the outskirts of London. Newcastle coal is considerably cheaper than in London. Fish is not supplied regularly, being caught chiefly by fits and starts by the peasantry. Notwithstanding the general lowness of the price of the articles of consumption, the wages of labour are about the same as with us. In all our perambulations we never saw either a rag or a beggar. Left to take their fair course, population and the means of subsistence have evidently adjusted themselves; and the consequence is, we see a spectacle of peace and plenty, which I am well assured could not be discovered in any other part of Europe, or perhaps in the world.—From an article in Chambers's Journal, entitled "Summer Loiterings in France."

DISTRIBUTION OF CAPITAL.—Capitalists do not easily enter a trade or withdraw from it. In a country so exquisitely organized as England, it is true that capital moves with velocity, where the capitalist cannot move; and of this we have a luminous explanation in Ricardo. Ricardo, who, as a stockbroker, stood in the very centre of the vast money-machinery accumulated in London, had peculiar advantages for observing and investigating the play of this machinery. If our human vision were fitted for detecting agencies so impalpable, and if a station of view could be had, we might sometimes behold vast arches of electric matter continually passing and repassing between either pole and the equatorial regions. Accordingly, as the equilibrium were disturbed suddenly or redressed, would be the phenomena of tropical hurricanes or of auroral lights. Somewhat in the same silent arches of continual transition, ebbing and flowing like tides, do the re-agencies of the capital accumulated in London modify, without sound or echo, much commerce in all parts of the kingdom. Faithful to the monetary symptoms, and the fluctuations, this way or that, eternally perceptible in the condition of every trade, the great moneyed capitalist, standing at the centre of this enormous web, throws over his arch of capital, or withdraws it with the precision of a fireman directing columns of water from an engine upon the remotest quarter of a conflagration. It is not, as Ricardo almost professionally explains to us, by looking out for new men qualified to enter an aspiring trade, or by withdrawing some of the old men from a decaying trade, that the equilibrium is recovered. Such operations are difficult, dilatory, often personally ruinous, and disproportionately noisy to the public ear in the process of execution. But the true operation goes on as silently as the growth of light. The moneyed man stands equidistantly related to many different staple interests—the silk trade, the cotton trade, iron trade, the timber and grain trade. Rarely does he act upon any one of them by direct interpolation of new firms, or direct withdrawals of old ones. An effect of this kind is generally as much beyond his power as beyond his interest. Not a man has been shifted from his station; possibly not a man has been intruded; yet power and virtue have been thrown into vast laboratories of trade like shells into a city. But all has been accomplished in one night by the inaudible agency of the Post-office, co-operating with the equally inaudible agencies of capital, moving through banks and through national debts, funded or unfunded. Such is the perfection of our civilization. By the simple pressure of a finger upon the centre of so vast an organization, a breath of life is hurried along the tubes—a pulse is enlivened or depressed—a circulation is precipitated or checked, without those ponderous processes of change indispensable on the Continent, and which so injuriously disturb the smooth working of general business.—De Quincy's Political Economy.

INDUSTRY AND SKILL IN PROTECTION.—Lord Ducie's experiment on his farm at Whitfield, in Gloucestershire, is an apt illustration of the principle for which we contend. Before Lord Ducie took it into his own care, it yielded a rent of £200, gave labour to two men, one boy, two women, and four persons additional at harvest time, and yielded for profit and interest of capital the sum of £28 per annum. By a judicious outlay of capital, and by general improvements, the same farm employs constantly eleven men, four boys, and five women; and the net profit, in addition to a charge of 10 per cent. for the capital invested on the improvements, is £161 16s. per annum, or, including the interest, £368 5s. This farm is now valued for the poor-rate at £584, formerly it was valued at £200. Herein lies the true source of increased employment and wages to the labourer; of good, permanent, and steady profit to the farmer; of the highest rents that can safely be relied on by the landlord, and all consistent with the true interests of the consumer; but these improvements and advances in agriculture will never be general so long as we teach men to rely on the false and delusive protection of acts of Parliament, instead of skill, industry, and ingenuity.—Economist.

GRAIN AND FLOUR.—Mr. Hawes, M.P., has obtained a return of an account, showing the total quantities of foreign and colonial grain and flour entered for home consumption, at each rate of duty, from the 5th of January, 1843, to the 5th of January, 1844, &c. We find, from this paper, that the total quantity of foreign wheat entered for home consumption in the United Kingdom, during the past year, under the act of the 5th Victoria, sess. 2, cap. 14, was 814,319 qrs., at rates of duty extending from 14s. to 20s. per qr.; 731,298 qrs. were entered at the lower duty (14s.), and 17,824 qrs. at the highest of all (20s.). The quantity of wheat flour entered during the same period was 30,393 cwt. 12,407 of British colonial wheat (and 176,367 cwt. of British colonial flour) were entered at duties ranging from 1s. to 5s. per qr. The quantity of foreign barley imported, amounted to 222,745 qrs. at duties ranging from 6s. to 10s. per qr. The total quantity of foreign oats, to 41,479 qrs. at duties of 6s., 7s., and 8s. per quarter. The quantity of rye imported was 2,724 qrs.; that of peas, 36,184 qrs.; and that of beans, 45,702 qrs. The quantity of wheat imported from Canada under the new act, 6 and 7 Victoria, c. 29 (which came into operation last October), amounts to 12,412 qrs., at a duty of 1s. a quarter; and the quantity of wheat flour to 220,117 cwt.

SIR EDWARD COKE ON FREEDOM OF TRADE.—In the third Parliament of James I., which assembled in 1620, Sir Edward Coke appeared as one of the representatives of Liskeard, in Cornwall. His character, age, and experience, added to the ability and zeal with which he devoted himself to the service of the country, gave great weight to all the measures which he supported. He exerted himself particularly to procure the abolition of the many injurious monopolies which had been lately granted, and to bring to punishment the persons who, under colour of them, had oppressed the country. In almost every debate of importance the name of Sir Edward Coke appears as a speaker, supporting, on all occasions, the cause of freedom and liberality. He was one of the very few persons of that age who had the capacity to perceive the injurious nature of those restrictions with which, at that period, almost every branch of trade was fettered. On a bill being brought in "for the Free Trade and traffic of Welsh cloths, cottons, plains, &c., in and through the kingdom of England and principality of Wales," Sir Edward Coke said, "Whereas it is alleged that, for a reason of state, there was a restriction on the buying of those Welsh cloths, &c., a reason of state is often used as a trick to put a man out of the right way; for when a man can give no reason for a thing, then he flings to a higher strain, and saith it is a reason of state. Freedom of trade is the life of trade, and all monopolies and restrictions of trade do overthrow trade."—(Proceedings and Debates, &c., vol. i., p. 308; and see vol. ii., p. 155.) On another occasion we find him opposing the first project of a Corn Law which was ever proposed in Parliament. A bill having been brought in under the title of "A Bill against the Importation of Corn," was opposed by Mr. Towerson, Sir Dudley Digges, and Sir Edward Coke. Sir Dudley Digges said that if we bar the importation of corn when we have no need of it, we shall not have it imported when we want it. Sir Edward Coke said that he never heard of any bill that was ever preferred in Parliament against the importation of corn; that he loved to follow ancient precedent; that he thought the bill spoke Dutch, but that it was certainly for the benefit of the Low Countrymen.—(Proceedings and Debates, vol. ii., p. 87).—Roscoe's Life of Coke: Cabinet Cyclopaedia.

EFFECTS OF DRAINAGE ON HUMAN LIFE.—The Rev. Professor Buckland, at a public meeting held in Oxford last week, said that in the parish of St. Margaret, Leicester, containing 22,000 inhabitants, it appeared that one portion of it was effectually drained, some parts but partially so, and others not at all. In the latter the average duration of life is 13 years and a half, while in the same parish, where the drainage is only partial, the average is 22 years and a half, thereby showing the frightful effects of a bad atmosphere.

MACHINERY AND THE FACTORY SYSTEM.—In modern times, a means has been discovered of producing power which can be applied to various processes of manufacture, so as greatly to facilitate manual labour. Steam has become man's fellow-workman, taking from him the more fatiguing portions of his toil, and leaving him only such parts of the process as require the exertion of skill and ingenuity. There has been thus a further division of labour introduced; not only are the several processes assigned out to separate workmen, but the execution of each process is further subdivided between man and machinery. We have said that the effect of the introduction of mechanical power is to facilitate, not to supersede, labour; and this obviously follows from the principle already established, that in proportion as labour is subdivided among separate operatives, in the same proportion must a power of combination be established to make all these several processes concur in producing the same result. Such combination requires no small exercise of mind, and no conceivable adaptation of wood and iron will produce a machine that can think. Never was there a more monstrous delusion than that machinery displaces or supersedes human labour; every fact with which we are acquainted proves the very contrary. The influence of machinery has been no where more extensively felt than in the cotton-trade, which directly and indirectly gives employment to about two millions of our countrymen: before mechanical invention was applied to spinning, it is questionable if the cotton-trade employed one-fourth of the number. The production of books employs a hundredfold more printers than would have been engaged as scribes or copyists had the art of printing not been invented. The number of persons engaged as pressmen in London at this hour is greater than it was before the steam-press was invented; and the number of calico-printers has been increased greatly since the introduction of printing by cylinders. No branch of trade can be pointed out in which the number of operatives engaged in that trade, taken as a whole, has been diminished by the introduction of machinery; and there are countless branches of trade in which the number has been undeniably and very greatly increased. A very little consideration, indeed, would show that the introduction of machinery has necessarily and largely increased the demand for labour. Every hundred pounds' worth of human labour employed in the production of that machinery; labour for which there would have been no demand if such machinery had not been invented. If, on the other hand, the steam-press throws off three times as many sheets, with the same amount of manual labour as the hand-press, it necessarily provides three times as much employment for folders, stitchers, bookbinders, and bookellers. If the power-loom produces four times as much sheeting, or the cylinders print four times as much calico as the block printer, they create in the same proportion employment for the warehouseman, the sempstress, and the milliner. If experience did not prove to us that the perversity of men in their senses often exceeds the wildest extravagance of insanity, we should be justified in stigmatizing the clamour against machinery as the very consummation of human absurdity.—Dr. W. Cooke Taylor.

Have the low wages of the Irish, Poles, and Hindoos made them industrious? or the high wages of the Americans, English, and Hollanders made them lazy, riotous, and profligate? Just the contrary. The former are as notoriously and proverbially indolent as the latter are laborious, active, and enterprising.—M'ulloch.

ERRATUM.

In LEAGUE, No. 27, for "The Labourer is worthy of his hire, Chorlton-on-Medlock, Manchester, £1," read 2s. 6d.

SPINNERS AND MANUFACTURERS' SUBSCRIPTIONS TO THE LEAGUE FUND.—Some friend of monopoly has inserted a letter in the Morning Post, in which he professes to contrast the number of spinners and manufacturers in Preston who have contributed to the League Fund with those who have not given anything. Upon this letter we beg simply to spend two remarks. The monopolists have hitherto taken every occasion to assert that the repeal of the Corn Laws is a manufacturers' movement, to enrich themselves at the expense of the landlords. Now, here they cut their own throats, by attempting to show how very few of this class are supporters of the League. Again, the writer divides the firms in Preston into "Leaguers" and "Anti-Leaguers." Now, when we see his favourite firms subscribing more than £530 to the Anti-League, then we will allow him the triumphs of his comparison. No doubt many of the twenty-two "Anti-League" firms will subscribe more than £200 each, and few will come as low as £20! And, as closely connected with the subject, he will, perhaps, inform us how many of the firms he names are not Free-Traders; and also write another letter to the Morning Post with a return of those firms in Preston who have subscribed to the Anti-League, and those who have not. If "A. B." declines this task, we will undertake it for him.—Preston Guardian.

MANUFACTURERS' CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE LEAGUE.

—We referred in our last to the great mistake made by Colonel Fullerton, in his speech at Rotherham, in advising the magistrates to go out of their way in disputes between masters and men, to inquire what deductions the masters made from wages, to pay their contributions to the League. We have received a communication to the effect that Colonel Fullerton is supposed to have alluded to the firm of Messrs. Joseph Twigg and Brothers, earthenware manufacturers, of Newhill and Kilmhurst, their premises at the latter place adjoining the property of Colonel Fullerton. It is only at the Newhill pottery that the men have subscribed to the League, those at Kilmhurst not choosing to do so. This fact is of itself sufficient to show that the subscriptions are not exacted by the masters, but are the voluntary offerings of the men. The Messrs. Twigg have subscribed to the League themselves. The men, too, have subscribed in their own name, and we find one of their remittances thus acknowledged in the last number of the LEAGUE:—"The work-people of Joseph Twigg and Brothers, Newhill pottery, near Rotherham, from John Twigg, 6th subscription since July, £1 10s." The mode in which these subscriptions are raised may serve as a hint to the masters and work-people of other manufactories. The Newhill potters have a club, to which each man earning less than 10s. pays 1d. weekly, and each earning more than 10s. pays 2d. a week. By this means a fund is maintained that enables them to allow to any sick workman, for six weeks, 3s., if he have paid the penny, and 6s. if he have paid the twopenny contribution. It is found, however, that the contributions are more than adequate to this rate of allowance, there having been very little sickness among the men; and they have, therefore, remitted, from time to time, portions of the accumulated fund to the League, their employers contributing ten per cent. on all such remittances. Such, we are informed, is the system pursued at the Newhill pottery, and we have no doubt our readers will deem it honourable alike to the masters and the men.—Sheffield Mercury.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SUGAR MONOPOLY.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—In my first letter on the Sugar Monopoly, I stated, on data that I believe to be incontrovertible, that by reducing the duties to one-half of that now imposed on British plantation, and allowing free importation, the cost to the consumer would be reduced one-half, or that double quantity could be purchased for the same money, and that the increase in the consumption would more than make up the present amount of revenue.

The consumers of Great Britain are now paying three times the price for their sugar of its value in the market of the world, in consequence of monopoly and high taxation. Good sugar can be purchased at 2d. to 2½d. per lb., without duty, equal to what is now selling at 7d. to 7½d. per lb., duty paid, and when the amount of this is put down, it really appears perfectly enormous.

Amount paid to East and West India proprietors annually, for 200,000 tons of sugar, about .. £28,000,000
Amount of duty on same .. 5,000,000

Value of 200,000 tons in the market of the world .. 13,000,000
4,000,000

Extra cost to the consumer .. £9,000,000

I am quite aware that I will be met in the above statement by the answer, that we must be taxed, and that it is quite as just to tax sugar as anything else. This I readily admit. What I contend for is, that, in consequence of the monopoly, which limits the supply and restrains the consumption, this tax is unnecessarily and exorbitantly high, and presses with undue severity on all classes.

I have stated that the duty might be brought down from 25s. 3d. to 12s. 7½d. without risk to the revenue; nay, more, if the trade were open, I have little doubt the duty might be only 8s. per cwt., and in two or three years hence, the present amount of revenue would be made good; and how would the price then stand to the consumer?

Price of 1 cwt. good Havannah sugar, 18s. £0 18 0
Duty on do, 8s. .. 0 8 0

£1 6 0 or 2½d. per lb.

I have shown that we pay four millions too much for our sugar to the colonists, and if we add to this the double tax we are forced to pay in consequence of their monopoly, it will then appear that the sugar monopoly costs the country no less a sum than 6½ millions annually, independent of paying a duty of 12s. 7½d. per cwt.

Now, if they are perfectly sincere in their anxiety to put down slavery, the straightforward course would be to take this 6½ millions, the greater proportion of which they now get, and I have little doubt it would purchase freedom to the whole of the slaves in the Brazil; and thus, by one year's sacrifice, we would get quit of the evil for all time coming. This proposal, although quite reasonable, will be very unpopular. In truth, they have no anxiety about either slaves or slavery, unless when they interfere with their own interest; and if they can only get their monopoly continued, slavery may go on interminably, so far as they are concerned.

I may also state that, as we cannot prevent our Continental neighbours from consuming slave sugar, the only effect of our present system is to withhold our competition for that article, which enables them to consume it at a cheaper rate than they would otherwise do; and it certainly is a most astounding fact, in illustration of what I have now stated, that, in the years 1840 and 1841, the operative in this country was paying the same price per lb. for the lowest description of treacle or molasses as the labouring man on the Continent paid for the pound of the finest description of double-refined sugar. I ask, will such a system be any longer tolerated?

I have not yet done with the evils of this monopoly: there is yet another branch of our national industry that has been fettered, cramped, and borne down by its influence, viz., sugar refining. I demand to know what would have been the state of our cotton manufacture if it had been limited in its supply of the raw material to the East or West Indies? Where would have been those gigantic undertakings in which such splendid fortunes have been so honourably acquired, and by which our rapidly-increasing population have found constant and profitable employment, if the colonists had enjoyed a monopoly in cotton? and, I may ask, what might have been the situation and fortune of the Premier himself if his father had only had such a limited sphere to operate within? Sugar refining, in this country, ought to be second only in importance to cotton spinning; but has it increased in anything like the same ratio as the cotton trade? No. If the statistics of this trade were taken, and compared with those of forty or fifty years ago, I believe there would be found no increase; on the contrary, from the number of sugar-works in London and elsewhere, on which large amounts of capital have been expended, standing idle, I have little doubt they have rather decreased; and how can it be otherwise? The supply of raw sugar is less than it was forty years ago. The effect of the high duty and protective system on sugar refining is to limit its field of operation, to lower or keep down the taste for the finer qualities of its produce, and greatly to increase the cost of manufacture.

Were the trade in sugar free, Great Britain would become the emporium of the world for that article. Exporting her manufactures direct to every sugar-growing country, she would necessarily import that commodity as a return cargo, if the home market were open for its consumption; and, having a profit both on the export and import, she would thus be enabled to sell cheaper than any other country; and, as few of the continental states trade with the tropics, they would find it more convenient and profitable to draw their supplies from this country. Great Britain would thus have the whole carrying trade; and is it too much to suppose that, this being the great market of the world for raw sugar, the refiners here, with the most approved machinery and modes of working, would not be enabled greatly to extend their trade, and to supply advantageously many of the markets of Europe.

To show the increased expense to the refiner in consequence of the high prices as compared to low, I have given a statement from an authentic source, based on the present prices, say 63s. per cwt., and also at 31s. 6d., the latter being rather above what sugar would now cost at a reduced duty of 12s. 7½d., as stated in my first letter. The quantity of waste on a sugar-house of ordinary size may be about 2 tons weekly, or 104 per annum:—

|---|-------|---|
| Say 104 tons waste, lost in manufacture, at 63s. £6532 | 0 | 0 |
| 300 tons in stock, at 63s., £18,900; interest on this capital, at 4 per cent. | 756 | 0 |
| For insurance on stock | 200 | 0 |
| Say 2 per cent. commission and guarantee on purchase and sale of £100,000 | 2000 | 0 |
| | £9508 | 0 |

| | | |
| 300 tons in stock, at 31s. 6d., £9150; interest on capital, 4 per cent. | 378 | 0 |
| For insurance on stock | 100 | 0 |
| 2 per cent. commission and guarantee on £50,000 | 1000 | 0 |
| | 4754 | 0 |

or nearly £5000 per annum; and if we suppose 50 sugar-houses to be in full work, the above shows a loss to the refiners and to the country of no less than £250,000 per annum, without a single countervailing advantage either to the revenue or to the consumer. I believe it would be a great improvement if the refiners were allowed to work under bond, and the duty paid on all goods when brought to market. By such a plan a great proportion of the above loss would be saved, while they would be enabled to sell cheaper, without any disadvantage to the revenue.

Were the sugar question one of revenue only, I think I have completely demonstrated, that by Free Trade and low duties the present amount would be paid into the Exchequer, with immense advantage to trade and to the consumer; then who are the parties who stand in the way of a change so beneficial? If it were put to the voice of the 26,000,000 or 27,000,000 of this country's inhabitants, how many would vote against it? I believe not more than 2000 or 3000 East and West Indian proprietors; and what are they, and what are their interests against so many? The East Indian has no right to object; he has labour cheaper, and more plentiful than the cheapest slave labour—land almost without limit—soil of the very richest kind, and climate exceedingly favourable to the production of sugar; and if he does not avail himself of these great advantages, by the application of British capital and science, he has no right to ask his fellow-countrymen to submit to additional taxation for his benefit. Has the West Indian any claim—has the exclusive monopoly of the home market for half a century not contented him; or has he forgotten the recent splendid gift of £28,000,000; and for very shame can he hold up his face and ask his fellow-citizens not only to be taxed, but submit to loss of trade for his especial behoof?

Tea does not come within the category of "protected articles;" and, therefore, if I have succeeded in my letter on "tea duties," in showing that that article is capable of such vast extension, that even at a duty of 1s. per lb. the revenue would very soon be equal to what it now is, I do not think that such a measure would possibly meet with any opposition; on the contrary, I am quite satisfied it would be hailed as a great boon by every individual in the United Kingdom.

A reduction in the duties on tea must be accompanied by a corresponding reduction on sugar, otherwise it will fail in producing the desired effect. I anticipate these reductions would produce greatly extended consumption, but this will be brought about only by a sweeping change, something that will be quite obvious to the consumer, and materially alter the retail prices.

By a singular concatenation of events the present Ministry have a golden opportunity vouchsafed to them of immortalizing their names, by making the trade of the country at once prosperous—extended—permanent. I cannot think they will allow the opportunity to slip: the opening to the hundreds of millions in China,—the termination of the Brazilian treaty,—the overflowing of the Exchequer, and the state of the public mind on the absolute necessity of greatly enlarged commerce, all point out the present moment as the time when the trade in the two great staples of tea and sugar ought to be opened up; not by an alteration this year to be better done next, but by one master-stroke of policy: by a great reduction of duties, which will then be so moderate that they will never again require to be unsettled.

The combined operation of the opening of the markets of the world, and a large reduction in the duties on tea and sugar, would do more to ameliorate the condition of all classes than any measure that has been carried during the present century. I cannot think that any Ministry will shut their eyes to its importance. To be the means of giving an additional export to our manufactures of probably seven millions sterling, and of stimulating our home trade to an almost equal amount—to add from three to five hundred ships to our mercantile navy—to give a healthy and constant demand to all descriptions of agricultural produce—to spread happiness and plenty over the land—and to receive the blessings of every family as it daily sits down to its cheap beverage of tea and sugar, is worthy the ambition of the greatest statesman that ever held the reins of the government of this great country.

March 22, 1844.

A FREE-TRADER.

The following pithy reply was sent by the writer, a tenant-farmer, in answer to a circular issued by the Ely Protection Society, soliciting subscriptions:—

Upwell, March 31.

"DEAR SIR,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th, respecting 'Agricultural Protection.' Having maturely considered the subject, I am quite convinced that the only 'protection' we want as 'tenant-farmers' is,—1st. Long leases, with liberal covenants, which would create a great demand for labourers and very much improve their general and, at present, wretched condition. 2ndly. A removal of all restrictions, thereby enlarging the field of commerce, and making all classes consumers of our increased agricultural produce, which is of far more benefit to 'tenant-farmers' than any 'Corn Law' that can be made, particularly the 'sliding-scale.'

"I am, my dear Sir, yours respectfully,

"G. WOOLFE.

"Thos. Archer, Esq., Solicitor, Ely."

EFFECTS OF THE PRICES OF FOOD ON SHOPKEEPERS.

To the Editor of the Bolton Free Press.

SIR,—A linendraper was complaining to me the other day that he was doing less business now than during the two or three months previous to last Christmas, and that his neighbours were in the same position. This led to inquiry into the cause. We both agreed that the working classes were as fully employed now, and at as good wages, as at the latter end of last year, and that they ought now to be better able to purchase clothing than at that time, inasmuch as they might be supposed to be more recovered from the debts and difficulties of the last few years. After failing to discover any sufficient cause, we at last thought there might be something in the prices of food at the two periods which might explain it. We set to work to calculate, and on inquiry found that flour is now fourpence a dozen, and oatmeal about two-pence a dozen, higher than in November and December: still this seemed a little matter at first, but when we recollected that at least a hundred thousand were fed out of the Bolton market, we thought it might be worth while to see how much the difference would amount to. Reckoning five to a family, there would be twenty thousand families; and supposing each to require flour or oatmeal equal to two dozen of flour a week, this would make eightpence a week for each family. Now twenty thousand eightpences amount to six hundred and sixty-six pounds thirteen shillings and fourpence, probably about as large a sum as a concern of the magnitude of Messrs. Bollings pay in a week. The effect upon the shopkeeper, therefore, by this small advance in the price of food, we concluded was quite sufficient to account for the complaints we heard on all sides, particularly amongst the drapers and shoemakers, and the sellers of clothing generally. We thought it worth while to send you the calculation, by way of showing you how intimately the prosperity of the shopkeeper is connected with a low price of food.

Your finding room for this in your next paper will oblige,

Yours respectfully,

A CORN-LAW REPEALER.

THE HARD CASE OF THE TENANT FARMER.

To the Editor of the Hull Advertiser.

SIR,—As a plain free-speaking farmer, and not a man of the world, I was last week requested to attend before a party of gentlemen belonging to the Anti-Corn-Law League to expose the gullibility of the English tenant-farmer, which I had done previously in a letter to Mr. Cobden, M.P. I then stated to them as follows:—

"Gentlemen,—Although proving, in a letter to Mr. Cobden in September last, the delusion practised upon the farmer under the mask of Corn-Law protection, I will now before you, gentlemen, prove that the farmers are not only ridiculously but conspicuously bamboozled by hirelings in the garb of gentlemen's stewards. As a proof look at the covenants and restrictions which have been everywhere inserted in leases and in yearly agreements. They are so absurd and so contrary to common sense and reason, at the same time of no good to the landlord, and a very great injury to the tenant by cramping him, as to be utter bars to good husbandry; and, gentlemen, the fact is not contradicted, though it has been brought so clearly before the public. The Anti-Corn-Law League, by their speeches and writings to tenant-farmers, say, and so do I, that when the Corn Laws are repealed, and landlords cannot get high rents out of their tenants' capital through the agency of the Corn Laws, these agricultural absurdities, these traps and snares to cajole us tenant-farmers—these farming monstrosities will speedily be abandoned. At present any land-surveying dipod is made a land-steward, to frame leases for practical farmers, I compare such Jack-a-Dandy lease-framers to schoolmaster lawyers, who make work for wiser men; let such counterfeits get themselves well informed in the cultivation of the soil, before they attempt to make leases for farmers. They may, perhaps, when they begin their stewardships, know an acre of turnips from an acre of wheat, or an acre of beans from an acre of cabbages. Then follows the overreaching, plundering Game Laws, by which the right of the game is reserved to the owner of the farm, unless expressly granted to the tenant, and the game forms a great obnoxious burden to nineteen tenants out of every twenty throughout the country. In some instances the game is farmed by Messrs. Steward, Gamekeeper, and Co. Not 200 miles from Benefield and Rookingham Forest, an upstart steward and puppy-looking gamekeeper have enriched themselves at the expense of the tenants by keeping the two bugbears, game and rabbits, until the gamekeeper has become a great grazer, and the best and oldest tenant turned out of his farm to put the man-eating gamekeeper in; the said farm has been in the turned-out farmer's family for near 300 years. So much for stewardism, keeperism, and peacockism. It is admitted by all men who know the cultivation of the soil, that good farming cannot coexist with a maintenance of a large stock of game; and the same rational view which the tenant-farmer everywhere takes of the game nuisance is that urged by the League. They say, and I agree with them, when the farming business is in a natural state—when the delusion of the Corn-Laws has ceased—the landlords will find that they cannot have both rent and game. Farmers may well say, as a friend of mine did to a noble lord, a game-preserver, who wanted to let a farm overrun with game: 'My lord,' said the bold, non-heated farmer, 'it appears to me that your lordship stocks the farm I came to look at, and I will decline to embark my capital unless I can obtain complete possession of the farm, for no man can be said to be in possession of a farm whose landlord retains a right to keep game upon it, or to give that power to your steward, who was a few years back your lordship's woodman,—then, my lord, in his proper station,—with his bill and mittens hanging by his side, and a short pipe stuck in his mouth. Pardon me, my lord, when I say that I understand that your lordship's father had a steward who had for many years been his woodman. After enjoying his stewardship a few years, and wearing ten times the hats out that he would have done had he continued woodman,—for every one when they met him in the great market-town, near the hall, touched their hats at him and to him; of course, my lord, as a well-bred man, he touched his in return, and so much touching and taking off of his hats wore an excessive quantity out,—he died worth £30,000. Who does your lordship think was entitled to the old woodman and steward's heap of pelf, obtained the Lord above knows how? I suppose, my lord, that he did not only gauge game and rabbits kept by the tenants, but occasionally an oak tree, or any thing else that was not too heavy and big. The old adage is, my lord, that no stock thrive upon the land like gentlemen's stewards.'

"I need not add that his lordship was struck with admiration and amazement to hear such bold information from a brave, straightforward, old English farmer. His lordship now examines the steward's accounts regularly himself, like a certain marquis, of not the highest birth, who has been plundered by several stewards, one a relation. I told the League, after I stated my friend the strong-nerved farmer's case, that it was neither just nor fair that the landlord should grow for his own benefit, enormous quantities of hedgerow timber, to the detriment of the tenants' crops, and on land for every foot of which the tenant pays rent. I will finish to-day, gentlemen, by begging of you to excuse my straightforward, free speaking, as facts are stubborn things to get over. At the same time, gentlemen, I say that I can give you fifty times more information on the mischiefs practised upon the cultivators of the soil. I am to be found, in person or by letter, at Mr. Ward's, Royal Oak Inn, Tooley-street, Borough, or at Ringwood, New Forest, Hampshire.

"I beg to remain, Mr. Editor, a friend to my country at large, and at the same time,

"Your humble servant,

"S. A. FORESTER."

AGRICULTURE.

FOREIGN COMPETITION FALLACY.

If anything was required to prove the dishonesty of the arguments used in support of the Corn Laws, it would be found first in the exaggerated statements made respecting foreign competition, and next in the perverted ingenuity by which the more blatant agents of the landlords seek to show that some leading Free-Trade speaker has, at one time or one place, said something which is inconsistent with what he may have said, on some other occasion, at some other place. This is generally sought to be effected by dovetailing together scraps of speeches and bits of sentences, and by so doing to give, apart from the original context, an appearance of inconsistency. Now, if this apparent inconsistency were as real as it is illusory, what would it prove? It might show that some Free Trader had mistaken a fact, or over-estimated or under-estimated the effect of Free Trade on the price of grain. It might prove that the community has been robbed for the purpose of keeping up rents to a greater extent than the most sober-minded advocates of Free Trade have believed. But would the utmost success in such personal argument advance the Monopolist a step in his attempt to prove monopoly a good, and artificial scarcity a national benefit? The very fact that the most acute of the Monopolist speakers and writers are compelled to resort to such a mode of defence, is decisive as to the weakness of their case. The ingenuity which may recommend a sharp lawyer or talkative land-agent to the mortgaged and aced classes who employ them, only requires to be observed to be treated with the contempt it deserves when applied to the discussion of a great public question. Amongst the most notable dealers in such small wares is a Mr. George Game Day, an attorney of Huntingdonshire, who has published in the Morning Post a letter addressed to Mr. Cobden, for the purpose of showing that the statements of the great Free-Trade leader as to the prices of foreign corn have not been consistent with each other. Our readers will recollect the hearty shake this Monopolist lawyer received from Mr. Cobden in his speech at Covent-garden, wherein he showed that Mr. Day's mare's nest was made to bear the semblance of a discovery, and to serve for even a Monopolist claptrap, simply by the reputable device of confounding dates and prices; by representing a statement made when wheat was 70s. a quarter as having been applied to a time when it had fallen to 47s. a quarter, and vice versa.

The miserable special pleading by which this man now tries to show that on a given day Mr. Cobden overstated or understated the price of wheat by some one or two shillings a quarter, proves the severe effect of the castigation administered to the Monopolists' creature. We have from high authority the injunction not to put trust in princes; but we believe experience has led farmers to put very little trust in lawyers. So much for Mr. George Game Day. Nevertheless, it may be useful to improve the idea which his letter suggests, by placing before the public a brief summary of the stages by which the argument against the Corn Laws has arrived at its present favourable position, and to show to the farmers why such extraordinary pains are taken by their landlords to frighten them with threats of cheap foreign corn.

The Corn Laws originated in the desire of the owners of land to keep up rents during peace by means of an artificial scarcity, created by prohibiting the importation of foreign corn, which peculiar and political causes had unnaturally advanced during the French war. For it was only the unnatural and accidental additions to rent, caused by bad seasons and difficulties in the way of importation, which the Corn Laws sought to perpetuate; the natural increase which had arisen from the increase of national wealth having never been in the slightest danger from foreign imports. About the objects of the Corn Law and its supporters there was not, originally, the slightest disguise: high rents, higher rents than natural rents, were the avowed motives for the law of 1815. The farmers were only induced to come into the scheme from being under engagement to pay war rents. Against the iniquity of such a law public indignation was naturally directed, and whenever the prices of food rose above the natural price,—that is, whenever wheat tended to advance beyond 50s. a quarter,—an Anti-Corn-Law sentiment and complaints of the artificial-scarcity law immediately prevailed. Though men of reflection, at all times and under all circumstances, condemned the Corn Laws and the restrictive system of which they are the keystone, the mass of the people and mere commonplace politicians thought but little of the Corn Laws whenever corn, from domestic competition or abundant seasons, had become cheap. Thus, from 1825 to 1831, a very decisive Anti-Corn-Law agitation existed, though complaints against the monopoly were unheard during the cheap years 1821, 1822, and 1823. So again from 1833 to 1836, a period of the greatest abundance ever known in this country, when wheat was at one time as low as 36s. a quarter and was extensively used in feeding cattle, when the Corn Law was, in fact, totally inoperative, there were no general complaints heard against that law. Nature had, for the moment, entirely suspended the law, and landlords began to look to other means than monopoly for keeping up rents; while farmers became convinced that improvements in husbandry and a nation of prosperous consumers would prove a firmer basis for profit than small crops and high prices. Next followed the scarcities of 1838, 1839, 1840, and 1841, and the most fearful commercial depression which had ever visited this nation, and then commenced that organized opposition to the Corn Laws and the whole restrictive system, of which the League is the organ and the type.

The leaders of the movement were men deeply impressed with the necessity of Free Trade to the very existence of the nation, and most of them had obtained their experience in the busy lives of manufacturing and commercial industry. They viewed the subject in a large and comprehensive way, and therefore they commenced an agitation, which superficial thinkers and men having less reliance on the force of right principle then thought almost chimerical, in favour of a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. The result, however, has proved the accuracy of their judgment. When the Free-Trade movement commenced, the community was groaning under an artificial famine—a landlord-created scarcity. Wheat was, for three or four years, from one-fourth to one-third above the natural price at which it would have been had the trade in corn been free. An act of Parliament, passed to keep up rents, alone stood between the industrious people of Britain and a supply of bread. The necessary direction which the Free-Trade movement first took was against the Corn Laws, as being restrictive of the supply of food. But the experience of the previous ten years had created a new class of Free Traders—men born in the agricultural districts, mixing with landowners and farmers—whose interests were identified with the prosperity of agriculture and the rural classes, had become convinced that the "protection" promised by the Corn Laws as a benefit to the agricultural interest had in reality proved its bane. The evidence given before the agricultural committee of 1836 had placed this fact beyond question, and all those landowners and farmers who regarded the Corn-Law question in its economical bearings began silently to prepare themselves for Free Trade by improving their property and their husbandry. Of this the establishment of the English Royal Agricultural Society may be taken as conclusive evidence. The more energetic and independent agricultural Free-Traders soon joined or co-operated with the commercial Free-Traders of the League, and the movement became, in the strictest and best sense, a national one. Mr. Cobden, perhaps from early associations, at once apprehended the full force of the arguments for Free Trade derived from the condition of agriculturists and the experiences of agriculture, and became the unanswerable expounder of Free-Trade doctrines to agricultural audiences. This was the last stronghold of Monopoly. Every fallacy by which the question of Free Trade as regards trade and manufactures had been completely refuted and exposed; but the landlords believed they had an impregnable fortress in their political power, and an unassailable army of monopolists in their tenants-at-will. In insolent reliance on their own power, they were half indifferent to, half amused by, the occurrence of Free-Trade speeches to farmers. But to their dismay they soon found that farmers were rapidly becoming Free Traders, and "something more;" for they began to discover that many burdens and oppressions which they endured at the hands of their landlords were not very remotely connected with these very Corn Laws. In every county a minority of the farmers—invariably the most intelligent men and most successful cultivators—became active Free Traders; a larger number began to doubt the soundness of the policy of "protection," and all began to think and discuss and read about a question, upon which they had previously believed that, amongst farmers at all events, there could not be two opinions. The result of this has been the formation of "protection" societies, under the temporary ascendancy of the political landlords, the men of mortgaged estates, the shadows of men of property, the alieni appetens sui profusus class, for the purpose of upholding a monopoly which Queen, Lords, and Commons, in their collective character of a Legislature, feel cannot be much longer upheld.

The one sole topic of these societies is to exaggerate the cheapness of corn abroad, and to alarm the more ignorant farmer with the most nonsensical statements as to foreign competition. There is one short and simple process by which the farmer, who desires to ascertain the truth in this matter, may disperse all such illusions—that is by a reference to the reports—the true reports—of foreign and English grain markets. Thus, if he will look at the Review of the Foreign Corn Trade in the last Mark-lane Express, he will find the best qualities of wheat at Dantzic quoted at 40s. and 41s. a quarter, and the inferior kinds at 38s. and 39s. a quarter, and that at a time when, according to the appearance of our crops, the prospect of admission of foreign grain to our market is very remote. Let him add 10s. a quarter as the expense of transport and incidental expenses, with a very slight rise in the foreign market as the consequence of our demand there, and he will have a close approximation to English prices. Such a business-like examination and comparison of the foreign competition fallacy would at any moment show that fallacy to be a complete bugbear. Indeed, it is only created by such ingenious transpositions of dates and prices as those by which Mr. George Game Day attempted to prove Mr. Cobden's inconsistency.

AGRICULTURAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The following letter, detailing a course of agricultural improvement which has been adopted by Mr. Meehi, in Essex, is just a specimen of the way in which landowners of sense and capital will deal with their possessions as soon as the incubus of the Corn Law has been removed:—

"SIR,—As agricultural improvement is the order of the day, allow me to mention an extreme case—the expenditure of £5200 on a farm of mine, 130 acres (Tiptree Hall, near Kelvedon, Essex), that only cost £3250. In due course, when the results are accurately ascertained, I shall deem it my duty to submit statistical details and drawings of the buildings to every agricultural society in the kingdom, in the hope it may give confidence to those who, having the means to improve their property, are doubtful as to such improvements paying a remunerating profit to both landlord and tenant. The expenditure above mentioned has been appropriated to—1st. The perfect and permanent drainage of the land with stones and pipes, 4 yards apart, and 32 inches deep; between 80 and 90 miles of drains.—2nd. To the entire removal of all timber trees, which cannot be profitably grown in cornfields.—3rd. To the removing of all old, crooked, and unnecessary banks, fences, and ditches.—4th. The cutting new parallel ditches and fences, so as to avoid short lands.—5th. The enclosure of waste, and conversion of useless bog into good soil.—6th. The economising time and distance by new roads, arches, and more direct communications with the extremities of the farm.—7th. The erection of well-arranged farm-buildings built of brick, iron, and slate, in a continuous range, excluding all cold winds and currents of air, but open to sunny warmth.—8th. The building a substantial and genteel residence, with all due requisites for domestic comfort and economy.—9th. The erection of an efficient thrashing-machine, and needful apparatus for shaking the straw, dressing the corn, cutting chaff, bruising oats, &c., so constructed as not to injure the straw; avoiding, by its perfect action, that immense waste of grain visible in almost every truss of straw we examine.—10th. The avoidance of thatching and risk of weather, by ample barn room, with convenience for its-door horse labour at thrashing, &c., when not employable without, so as to have no idle days for man or beast.—11th. The saving of every pound or pint of manure by a tank (90 feet long, 6 feet deep, and 8 feet wide, with slated roof facing the north, and with well and pump), into which is received the whole drainage from the farm-yard and stables.—12th. The conveyance by iron gutters and pipes of every drop of water from the roofs of each building, so as in no manner to dilute the manure in yards.—13th. The perfect drainage of the foundations of the barn, and every building on the farm.—14th. A steam-house to prepare food for cattle.—I am thus particular in detail, because it is from each of the above branches of expenditure that some portion of remuneration is expected. But, during the progress of my undertaking I have been warned, entreated, and dissuaded by my farming friends, who protested that a profitable return for such an enormous expenditure was impossible; my calculations, however, were made, and mere assertions without facts and figures weighed nothing with me. Although the operations were only commenced early in 1843, the results, so far as they go, are gratifying and convincing. As one instance of success, a field of oats, sown on the 16th of May, after drainage, was harvested and stacked, before another (sown two months earlier on better but undrained land) was ready to cut. Hereafter you shall have detailed statistics of every department in which saving is effected and increase produced. In a moral and social point of view, these improvements have acted beneficially. They have excited the energies of the tenant and his labourers, stimulating them to think, compare, and improve. They have awakened the attention and curiosity of the neighbouring farmers, who are watching the result, and already have they caused many undertakings in drainage, which otherwise would not have been thought of. Had I invested my money in the funds, there would have been an end of the matter; but now I have the satisfaction of having fulfilled a public duty (without injury to myself) by calling into action, temporarily and permanently, a considerable amount of labour. I conceive that the highest order of charity, which, by providing employment to the willing labourer, confers a favour unseen, and leaves uncompromised (his most valuable privilege) his self-dependence.

"If every one who has the means follows my example, where requisite, there will be little need to complain of the want of employment for our peasantry or our capital. Whilst everything has been done for the farmer's profit and comfort, the cottagers have not been forgotten. A few gutters and pipes to their residences, and some drains in their gardens, have rendered the former dry and healthy, and the latter productive; and this at the trifling cost of a few pounds. I may be asked, 'What can you, as a Londoner, know about farming?' I will answer, 'I always loved the beauties of nature, the pure air of heaven, the sports of the field, and the hospitality of our honest yeomen. I have seen one farmer making a fortune, and his next neighbour losing one. I have seen one field all corn, and another nearly all weeds.'

"I asked, 'How is this?' I inquired into the causes: I noted the results. I obtained from all the best farmers, and all the best agricultural books within my reach, every information bearing on agricultural pursuits. I practised on my own little garden, on a small scale, a variety of experiments; and, after carefully weighing the evidence, I come to the conclusion, that want of drainage both in land and buildings, waste of manure, shallow ploughing, and short leases, are amongst the greatest curses to this country; and I, as far as my individual means will permit, am resolved on remedying them.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"I. J. MECCHI.

"4, Leadenhall-street, London, March 15, 1844.

"P.S. As Tiptree Heath is notorious for poor land, and as the Essex farmers, generally, are extremely sceptical as to these improvements answering, I would recommend their inspecting the crops (there will be no long fallow) about July next; and then, having the facts before them, they will be enabled to draw correct conclusions. I may as well add, it is intended to trench, plough, and disturb the soil to the depth of fourteen or sixteen inches. The implements used on this farm are Crosskill's clod-crusher, roller, and liquid-manure cart; Lord Ducie's drag; and Barrett, Exall, and Co.'s sub-soil plough. The thrashing-machine is constructed under my own direction, by Mr. Bewley, of Chelmsford, on the Scotch principle.

Now, if Free Trade should compel the mortgaged landowners to sell off a large portion of their present nominal estates, do farmers think they would suffer much in exchanging serfdom under a Duke of Buckingham or a Marquis of Salisbury for a beneficial business-like engagement with such a man as Mr. Meehi, to occupy his farm?

PEARLS OF GREAT PRICE.

BEING LANDLORD PLEAS FOR HIGH PRICES.

We think it a pity that the lights of the monopolists should be hidden under a bushel, and therefore have we rescued the following most modern instances of landlord rhetoric from the obscure and class circulation of the Morning Post. At Brecon, Mr. Joseph Bailey, M.P., having been eloquent on the exclusion of "pig iron," of which he is or was a considerable maker, from America, and, after referring to the tariffs of Germany and France said:—

"That those countries, since the permission given to export machinery from England, had become nearly as competent to manufacture as ourselves: was it then right or reasonable to throw out of employment a large population under such a prospect? It was, he said, more a labourer's question than a farmer's, and more a farmer's than a landlord's, and he would explain this. If rents were reduced to such an extent as to enable a landlord from living as he did at present, he would be compelled to farm his own land, to kill his own meat, and grow his own corn; what, then, would become of the tenants?"

It is clear this M.P. has not studied logic to much purpose, for it is not very intelligible how persisting in the policy which produced those foreign tariffs is to prevent their operation. How are labourers to be thrown out of employment they have been prevented from enjoying by the Corn Laws? The landlords are to become, what some fashionable novelist designates, "kill-your-own-mutton kind of men;" and take their farms into their own hands, leaving all their tenants to go landlordless and farmless upon the mercy of the cruel world. This is the way the Corn-Law question is attempted to be shown to be more a tenant and a labourer's question than a landlord's! Can anything be more ridiculous? Why, Mr. Joseph Bailey's cook-weench, if he has an English meal in his kitchen, would laugh to hear such an argument seriously propounded. Then Mr. Stretton, a landowner, said:—

"There was nothing in the resolution about landlords; their enemies might say, 'away with the plough,' but on the plough depended all the work which they called upon the labourers of this county to do (hear, hear, hear); without the plough the blacksmith, the wheelwright, the carpenter, and mason, and all who formed the machinery of the country would get no employment."

"It is a pity to spoil such a nicely-turned sentence, but, unhappily for this squire's argument, the Free-Traders don't say, 'away with the plough,' but they say, 'use it more and use it better.' Falling the basis, the incumbent assertion about blacksmiths, carpenters, &c., falls also. Then Mr. Stretton's simplicity in saying there is nothing in the resolution about the landlords. Of course there is not; there lies the fraud. But in the next sentence Mr. Stretton shows that he does not himself believe anything of the kind; for he says:—

"If wheat could be grown on our lands to compete with foreigners, what class would be benefited? The small tenant-farmers would be first ruined, because it would be absurd to suppose that a landowner would let small farms of £30 or £40 per annum if obliged to reduce the rents 50 per cent., or that he would keep up a hundred barns without use for them. No; they would cut down their buildings, and would be compelled to throw their lands open into wide tracts of pasture; who, then, would give them work?"

Here we have a distinct assertion that domestic improvement in agriculture is as little desired by the monopolist landowners as foreign importation; their beau ideal of rural prosperity is low produce with high prices. The above is an appeal to the lowest prejudices of the most ignorant class of farmers; but recent events in Wales show that the Welshmen know something of the landlord fallacies. Then he seeks to frighten them with this buggaboo:—

"Were they prepared to spin cotton for sixteen hours a day? and, if they were, their hands were hardly fine enough for the loom, coming from the culture of the fields. But he trusted he should never see the old farmers of Breconshire begging their bread in the streets of Manchester. If manufacturers did support one-half the unemployed, Mr. Cobden would soon discharge those men working for 4s. per day, to get others at 1s. 6d."

Oh! why is this nation to be ruled by its blockheads?

Next we have Viscount Hereford saying:—

"The attempts of the League to carry out its ends are here most justly termed mischievous, for, in my opinion, its chief aim appears to be to set the farmers against the landlords, and the labourer against both landlord and tenant, for the purpose of arriving at some unjustifiable conclusion."

The conclusion at which the League aims to arrive is obvious enough, and is admitted by all men to be "in the abstract" desirable. Again his lordship utters the following unadulterated silliness:—

"First and foremost, I entreat you to use your best exertions in favour of the labouring man, as most deserving of your protection, because Providence has placed him in a lower walk of life, and he is less able to protect himself—(loud cheers)—next in favour of the tenant-farmer; and, lastly, in favour of the landlords of the country. I call upon you to maintain inviolate the relations which exist between us all; and as you value the domestic and local happiness of your own families and friends, so likewise regard the happiness and comforts of others, and more especially of those fellow-creatures who are your inferiors through circumstances."

Ask the west of England labourers, ask the half-employed peasantry of all agricultural England, how the landlords have hitherto protected them?

Then Mr. Ansdell tried to look practical and business-like when he said:—

"The League boasted of having raised a large sum of money, and no doubt they had done so. It was for the present meeting to take a note from their book, and as money was the sine qua non of war it might be well for them to arm in like manner."

It has been said to require some talent to spend a large income with credit, and so far as we have observed the monopolists have not made much use of the large sums of money which the landowners have subscribed—upon paper. As far as we know, or the rest of the public know, all the great men of "Central Protection Society" have yet done, has been to take two rooms in Bond-street, and three lawyers' opinions to prove they really are very harmless creatures.

Then we have Col. Pearse's peninsular experiences. He said:—

"On the Continent, wheaten bread is seldom used in the rural districts, and never eaten by the labourer. (Hear.) During the peninsular war it had often been his lot to see a family sit down round a brown panella of roasted chestnuts and boiled olives, and when they did add to that the luxury of bread, it was that of Indian corn with the bran in it, which would choke an Englishman. In extensive rural districts of France, peas, beans, and similar pulse are mixed with the bread of the peasant; and if we look further north, and to those wheat-growing countries which are to save England the trouble and expense of furnishing her own supplies, is the labourer's bread better there? It is an incoherent fact that wheaten bread forms not only the fare of the labourer, but of the upper classes of society; and as an Englishman, when travelling in those countries, he had often been favoured with a small plate of very thin slices of wheaten bread from our well-known natural prejudice in its favour. Why, your very paupers in the union would rebel if such a fare was offered to them as is supplied to the labourer of the Continent."

To be sure they would; but has Col. Pearse's thoughts during travel never led him to ask why? Is it not because the standard of living is, or rather was, higher in England than on the Continent? And does not that arise from our superior wealth, the direct products of commercial and manufacturing industry? Col. Pearse's description very accurately shows the state of a peasantry in a purely agricultural community. Such arguments, if at all applicable, prove too much. Then, he pretended to believe the Free-Traders don't wish for Free Trade in anything but corn. Now, every speaker and writer on the side of Free Trade has advocated free trade in corn as a good in itself, but most especially as leading to a free trade in everything else. These monopolists have a habit of raising up giants for the purpose of slaying them.

Next, Dr. Bower said:—

"Depend upon it, my friends, all their chattering is intended for one object only, and that is to obtain cheap labour by means of cheap bread, unmindful of the ruin in which millions of their fellow-countrymen would be involved."

If Dr. Bower does not know more of the science of medicine than he does of political economy, we caution the Welshmen against throwing away a fee upon him. Wages are regulated by the demand for the products of labour, not by the cost of food; and our charge against the Corn Laws is, that they lessen in every direction the demand for the products of labour. If the monopolists have any answer to that charge, let us hear it. Hitherto they have been remarkably abstemious in argument upon the point.

CULTURE OF FLAX.—A LANDLORD'S FACT.

At a recent meeting of monopolists at Selby in Yorkshire, one Squire Burton made the following startling statement as an illustration of what would be the effect of free trade in corn:—

"There were particular descriptions of produce which might be pointed out as illustrating the effects of a repeal of the Corn Laws, as they were virtually in the situation which corn would be with Free Trade. He would appeal to every farmer present, and he saw many in the meeting, whether the cultivation of flax in this country was not, in consequence of the duty being repealed, a dead letter? Where was the man in this kingdom who could grow it with advantage? No one could, because it was known perfectly well that the price of the labour requisite in the dressing of flax was equal to one-half its value, and the reason that they could grow it abroad was because the price of labour there is so much below what it is in this country. This was one instance of 'Free-Trade' benefits; and if there were to be a repeal of the Corn Laws, depend upon it corn would be in the same condition as flax is now."

Now, the cultivation of flax was not discontinued by reason of any fiscal changes, but it being supposed to be a very exhausting crop, landlords have almost universally interdicted its culture. The fact of the prohibition to grow flax which is contained in most English leases goes far to show that it really might be grown with advantage to the farmers. And if that is so, its introduction into English agriculture would be a very desirable measure.

Mr. Warnes, jun., of Norfolk, who has exerted himself with great energy to promote the culture of flax, says that flax will flourish upon soils where beans, peas, and potatoes cannot be advantageously cultivated; and he adds:—

"That flax impoverishes the soil is a mere vulgar notion, devoid of all truth. The best historical relations, and the verbal accounts of honest, ingenious planters, concur in declaring it to be a vain prejudice, unsupported by any authority; and that these crops really meliorate and improve the soil."

And he further says:—

"I have grown flax for three years in various fields without perceiving any deterioration of soil or exhausting effect. On the contrary, I considered the land improved by the change of rotation, and by the effect of the crop on after tillage. Nor has a complaint of this kind been made by any one who grew flax for the sake of the seed in 1842. Fifty-six acres were, that year, grown in different parts of Norfolk; and nearly all who then tried the experiment upon a small scale increased it last year, when about 400 acres were grown."

We know that several first-rate farmers in other counties are directing their attention to the growth of flax, both for the sake of its seed and its fibre; and the truth is, that an article open to the fullest competition, and to the culture of which there are various obstacles from prejudice, or the want of convenience, experience, or capital, is likely in a few years to supersede to some extent the growth of wheat, of which the growers have as strict a monopoly as acts of Parliament can give them.

Such is a specimen of the instructive facts which monopolist landowners think fit to bring under public notice as arguments against free trade in corn.

WHAT IS PROTECTION?

If there was at one time any question that "protection" meant living at other people's expense, all doubt has been removed by the arguments the protectionists have thought fit to use in support of their plea for a monopoly of the supply of corn. At the St. Alban's Pro-Corn-Law meeting, one speaker was particularly pathetic over the hard case of those landlords "who are mortgaged to two-thirds of the value of their estates," should free trade in corn produce, as was assumed, a fall in rents. But one of the most striking examples of the disregard of common honesty which a desire for "protection" begets, we have met with, in a letter by a Mr. Thomas Bates, of Kirkclevington, who has "compressed his thoughts" into four long columns of a newspaper; from that repository we shall cull a few specimens of landlord reasons and reasoning. This gentleman starts with the assertion of the existence of a vastly depreciated currency previously to 1819—always a favourite notion with most deeply-indebted landlords—and having gone through a column of what we suppose is intended for calculations to work out that theory, he says:—

"I have hitherto considered the landed proprietor as free from all other demands than that arising from his altered situation since 1815; but where an heir to landed property came into possession with jointures and annuities settled on the property previous to 1815, to half the amount of the then rental, he has long since ceased to have any interest left in the property, and the same may be said of all others, whose estates were, previous to 1815, mortgaged to half their value, and so distress has been increased in proportion to the payments that have been to make out of landed property. These facts are evident to every one, but have never yet been prominently brought before the public; the sufferers have hitherto borne their distress patiently."

Landowners are notoriously improvident; living as they do upon the industry of other people, and being elevated without any exertions of their own, as the community of which they form part increases in wealth and population, they seem to imagine that everything is to be made to subservient to their aggrandizement. In the foregoing extract those "patient sufferers," the landlords, whose estates were burdened with charges to the extent of half their value calculated on the prices previous to 1815, are said to have been greatly distressed; but Mr. Bates has forgotten to state that, in the twenty years preceding 1815, rents had increased three, four, and five fold, or even more in many cases! And now, though prices of produce are but not much higher than they were in 1792, rents are little, if at all, reduced below the standard of 1815. This has been effected in part by improvements in husbandry made by farmers under the pressure of necessity, and in part out of the capitals of tenant-farmers. Yet, notwithstanding such advantages, what is the present condition of the landlord interests? According to Mr. Bates:—

"The change of proprietors has been great within the last twenty-five years; but were all estates to be wound up, with their present burdens upon them, far more than half the landed property of the kingdom would inevitably change hands."

After all, it seems "protection" has not done much for the landlords themselves. Then we have the remedy, which shows the confusion of meum and tuum we have alluded to, and which a hankering after special advantages is sure to create:—

"It is surely, then, time that the landowner should be relieved, and the fundholder made to bear some portion of the burden, after having been so great a gainer for above twenty-five years, and even having profited by the distress brought on the landowners, by purchasing agricultural produce at such greatly reduced prices."

This claim to perpetuate against the public the high prices of the war, which resulted from a combination of peculiar causes, is as reasonable as if the owners of land who had once got a high price for their produce during a famine, should claim a vested right to famine prices ever afterwards. That is indeed the principle on which our Corn Law is founded.

The same writer asserts, that if the trade in corn were free, "30s. to 32s. a quarter for wheat might be looked to as average prices," and this is the way he sets about proving it:—

"Who would believe, when they were warned of the consequences of the bill of 1828 (as proposed by the late Mr. Canning, till altered by the Duke of Wellington) till the year 1835 proved it, that the average price of wheat for the whole year would be only 39s. 4d. per quarter? The duty on importation at that price was, by the bill of 1828, 4s. 8d. per quarter."

What absolute trash. The low price of 1835 was caused by the very abundant production of wheat in that and the two preceding years; this was admitted by every witness examined by the Agricultural Committee of 1836, and is an established historical fact. Yet this is the stuff with which a furious monopolist London paper fills its columns, and to which it points in a leading article as specially deserving attention.

INCENDIARISM AND THE CORN LAWS.

There is no more fearful symptom of the extent to which the system created by the Corn Laws has demoralized the rural population than the prevalence of incendiarianism in the eastern counties. The subject was referred to by the chairman of quarter sessions in Suffolk; and the judge of assize, Lord Abinger, in his charge to the grand jury of the same county, says:—

"He was sorry to hear the complaints which had been made, and to see the great loss that had been sustained throughout the county by the burning of agricultural property. It was extremely difficult to suggest a cause for this, and more difficult to find a remedy. He had bestowed some attention to the subject, and he owned he did not see any particular difference in this county compared with others where there had been less fires, to cause the commission of this crime. He could not conceive how the agricultural labourers could be so blind to their own interests as to suppose they would in any way benefit themselves by committing crimes of this nature; they might ruin the farmers and starve the populace, but he was unable to understand how they could benefit themselves; some fatal delusion on the subject prevailed, which he hoped the laws, in time, would have power to check."

Now, though Lord Abinger could find no cause and suggest no remedy for the crime, the chairman of the quarter sessions did not hesitate to ascribe it to the low wages and irregular employment of the agricultural population, and to suggest more employment at better wages. In the parish of Hitcham, Suffolk, where more than one dreadful incendiary fire has recently occurred, there are more than forty labourers unemployed! Here, then, we have the cause of these fires; and the reckless indifference with which the peasantry have talked of such deeds amongst each other is one of the worst signs of demoralization.

And this shocking state of things is directly traceable to the Corn Laws. The counties in which these fires prevail are chiefly cultivated for the growth of wheat and barley. Now, the direct tendency of the Corn Laws is to offer a premium on grain-growing, and, by artificially raising prices of corn in some years, to induce farmers to repeat a corn crop too often, and with too little preparation. This is a permanent cause for the employment of a comparatively small number of labourers. A certain amount of corn, say from 16 to 21 bushels of wheat per acre, according to the natural quality of the soil, may be grown by a low system of husbandry, requiring little labour, but unless the prices of grain be very high, the farmer cannot with such crops pay his way. For instance, when his rent is calculated according to a price of about 60s. a quarter for wheat—as is the case with most of the land in the eastern counties—should the price fall, as it has lately done, to 50s. or less, one of two things must happen: either the landlord must go without his rent, or some of the labourers must be discharged or underpaid. Now, the landlord never does go without his rent, for the power of distress which he possesses secures him; consequently the loss falls on the labourer. The fall is looked upon by both landlord and tenant as only temporary, and consequently the one makes no final adjustment of rent, though he may "throw back" some 10 per cent., and the other makes no permanent change in his system of cultivation. Indeed, in many cases, the farmer actually endeavours to make up for the low price of corn by increasing his yearly breadth of it, and thus increases the evil. The tenant is misled by his landlord to attribute the fall in price to any rather than the right cause, usually either an abundant season, or diminished consumption in the manufacturing districts; and is urged to blame the tariff, or the new Corn Law, or Sir Robert Peel's plans, or the Anti-Corn-League, or any other of the symptoms, not the causes, of a state of distress and fluctuation. And it must be remembered that nothing but the belief on the part of the farmers that the low prices would only be temporary, could throw this loss off the landlords, who ought to bear it, upon the labourers who ought not; for if farmers did not expect prices to rise again to the extent of Parliament limit, they would either adopt an improved course of husbandry, and employ many labourers, or they would require their rents to be adjusted to actual prices, and would demand a further reduction equivalent to the increase of poor-rates. To enable the former alternative to take place landlords must grant leases of considerable duration, and upon terms adapted to the best systems of modern husbandry; and the consequences to themselves of the second alternative would be so serious that, except while following the will-o'-the-wisp of protection, the withholding leases would never occur. Total and immediate and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws would at once place the tenant and the landlord upon a safe footing; agriculture would become a business in which skill, industry, and capital might be employed with the certainty of reward, instead of being, as at present, a hazardous speculation; labourers would be regularly employed, and, as the object of every farmer would be to increase production, more labourers in husbandry would be constantly wanted; then no more incendiary fires would take place, and the remedy which judges and magistrates now profess to seek for in vain would be found in a FREE TRADE IN CORN.

GROWING OPINION AMONGST TENANT-FARMERS.

Landlords will soon find that the power over their tenants, which it is one of the great objects of the Corn Laws to perpetuate, will slip from their hands in the very struggle now making to support their monopoly. As evidence of the extent to which the expression of their sense of the wrongs under which tenant-farmers labour, even the blindest monopolist journals which have any dependence upon the tenantry of England are compelled to admit such correspondence as the following:—

"HINTS TO LANDLORDS."

"To the Editor of the Farmers' Journal."

"Sir,—It cannot have escaped you (though it may less observant persons), that a gradual and scarcely perceptible, though no less important, change has taken place in the social condition of this country. Population presses now as close on the heels of subsistence, that it is no longer prudent (if it were desirable) to withhold from cultivation any portion of the soil, either for the maintenance of covers for game, or ornament. The consuming classes have a right to insist, that the owners of the soil should no longer alienate it from its natural and legitimate channel, viz.—the production of food;—and the 'masses' begin to feel that the time has now arrived that field sports (when carried to excess) and the enjoyments of the few must yield to the exigencies of the many. A late duke kept several hundred acres of 'wood' solely for the preservation of foxes; but the tide has now turned, and we see a good example in the Prime Minister, who recommends the destruction of hares and rabbits, as detrimental to agriculture."

So Mr. West, a land-agent, writes in the Mark-lane Express:—

"I consider the subject of leases to be one of peculiar importance at the present time. Much has been written in your valuable journal both for and against leases. It has always been a subject of great practical concern to all the different classes who are interested in the due cultivation of the soil, but never was it, in my opinion, in any degree so important as it is at this time. Still, Mr. Editor, even practical men are, as you are well aware, ranging themselves on opposite sides as to the argument. This is, however, to me no matter of surprise. It arises from the peculiar circumstances in which such persons are or have been placed. Either the bad working of an ill-constructed lease, some political difference, an extraordinary change in the value of money, or the fact of the existence of what I call hereditary occupation, or all these causes together, operating upon their minds, have caused those gentlemen who are adverse to long leases to come forward with an expression of their opinions; but, with all due deference to them, I hesitate not to assert that, however difficult it may be to some to draw up the necessary clauses of a nineteen years' lease, so as to recognise the interests of both the contracting parties, a faithful history of all the leases that have ever been taken or given upon the principle of 'live and let live' would most decisively settle the point in their favour. Such a report would abundantly prove that immense advantage had resulted both to landlord and tenant."

And perhaps still more decisive proof of the necessity the more far-seeing landlords feel themselves under of endeavouring to conciliate their tenants, and induce them to expend their capital in good husbandry, is to be found in the bill which has been brought into Parliament by Lord Portman, whereby it is proposed to enact—

"It shall be lawful for any tenant of any farm or lands, holding the same from his landlord with or without any lease or agreement in writing respecting the same, who shall intend to make any permanent improvements thereon, to give notice in writing to his landlord, or to the agent of such landlord, of his intention, with a specification in detail of the nature of such intended improvements."

"And that in case such landlord, or his agent, shall not, within the space of three months then next following, signify in writing, to be given to the said tenant or left for him on the premises occupied by him as aforesaid, his dissent thereto, it shall, for the purposes herein mentioned, be considered that the landlord assents to such proposed improvement."

"And that in case such improvement shall have been made, and such tenant shall be compelled, by notice from his landlord, to quit the said premises, or at the expiration of the term of his lease shall cease to occupy the said premises, before he shall have been remunerated for the expenses of such improvement, the said tenant, or his executor or administrators, shall be entitled to claim compensation of his landlord for the amount of loss incurred by quitting the said premises so improved."

The amount of compensation to be settled by arbitration in the mode pointed out by the bill. This measure has, probably, no chance of becoming law, and if it did it would be utterly nugatory; for wherever the tenant is sufficiently independent to give a notice of improvement under the bill, he would be in a position to demand a lease, and in the majority of cases the landlord would dissent from the improvement.

The law "relating to landlord and tenant" unquestionably requires alteration, but such a scheme as that embodied in Lord Portman's bill, as applied to the agricultural body politic, is like washing a deep-seated ulcer with a wet sponge, when, to effect a cure, it requires probing to the bottom, combined with a decisive action upon the whole system of the patient. The time is coming when it will be obvious to all that rents can only be maintained by inducing farmers to apply their skill and capital to land in a way quite inconsistent with yearly tenancies. For this, however, the Corn Laws must be first repealed, and then all parties will have a firm basis for their calculations.

"HINTS TO LANDLORDS."

SELF-REFUTATION.—It was said of that now eminent monopolist Lord Ashburton, when, as Alexander Baring, he spoke in the House of Commons, that he usually contrived to answer himself; but in that intellectual exercise the editor of the Mark-lane Express beats his lordship hollow. In a recent leading article of his, which was upon Mr. Cobden's motion, that writer says:

"We must confess we do feel a considerable degree of regret that an inquiry, which we are persuaded would result in favour of a certain amount of protection to the British farmer, could not have been gone into; still, seeing the baneful effects of suspense and uncertainty arising from the unsettled state of our agricultural and commercial relations, we are well pleased that the motion was refused."

The beautifully-balanced see-saw of the above passage must be a wonderful help to the bewildered farmer who tries to puzzle out the truth amidst the assertions and predictions and oburgations of his monopolist instructors. May not this apparent inconsistency on the part of the writer—who has usually more acuteness than all the rest of the pack of monopolist writers—be explained by the supposition that the first branch of the sentence is dictated by his own sense, which involuntarily desires a full and fair examination of the operation of the Corn Laws on the interests of tenant-farmers and farm-labourers; while the latter branch indicates the measure of monopolist nonsense down to which he feels bound to write?

THEIR IS JEST.—It was said the other day by a shrewd observer of passing events, "That to advise the use of gunno, or to recommend draining, was prima facie evidence of being a Leaguer, and worthy of all condemnation in protectionist society." And it is certain that the out-and-out Monopolists contend—as in consistency they must—that improvements in agriculture which would reduce prices are as much to be deprecated as foreign importation. But the truth of the above biting jest is rather laughably shown by the following passage from a letter of Mr. J. West—who seems to be a land-agent—in the Mark-lane Express. After asking that the advocates of Free Trade "will weigh dispassionately and refute, if they can, by fair argument," certain puerilities such as are put forth by accredited Monopolists in remote districts, intended to prove that the landlord's interest in maintaining the Corn Laws was secondary to that of the tenant and labourer, Mr. West says:—

"I am quite ready to admit, that, as far as it is a question between landlord and tenant, there is a strong necessity for reduction in some cases within my own knowledge; but, to whatever obloquy I may expose myself, I hesitate not to avow, that it is my firm conviction, founded on an experience of many years in the management of property, that in a large majority of instances the proprietors of estates would do much more good to their tenants, to the labouring poor, and to the community at large, if they would, as quickly as possible, carry out to the greatest practicable extent the improvement of the land, than they would do by the reduction of any amount of rent whatever. Such a course as this would infuse life and activity through all the ramifications of society, and would so much increase production as to cheapen the price of bread far below what it can ever reach by any other means whatever."

Here we have the clear admission of a monopolist land-agent, who, of course, is anxious to curry favour with monopolist landowners, that to "avow" what every good farmer and every honest land-agent has long since stated, that liberty to improve, not charitable abatements of rent, is required by farmers, subjects the avowant to "obloquy" in monopolist circles! Have we not again and again said just what this monopolist valuer is compelled to reiterate, with the addition that the total abolition of all restrictions on the trade in corn is an indispensable preliminary to the general adoption of such improvements?

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We insert "Sledgehammer's" Letter to Lord Steeplechase on REPUDIATION; it was accidentally omitted in our last number:—

"MY LORD,

Your lordship, I notice, is fond Of reviling the Nabobs of Lash, Your cousin, who cut such a dash On the opposite side of the pond,— Who, when we presented their bond, Presented no signs of the cash. Excuse me for being so rash,— But, as to the debt of our nation, A trick have the men of your station Worth two of a 'repudiation.' Instead of just paying your share, Like gentlemen, honest and fair, Of the debt of which you were the makers, By the gauge of your purses or acres, You only come in as part-takers In the bills of your grocers and bakers! And while you are chasing your foxes, You stand—by your mercenary proxies— By a million of tables, or more, On the pleasureless hard-working poor; And ere they can draw up a seat, Both out of the solids they eat, And out of the liquids they quaff, You take by your taxes ONE-HALF! And this is the way that you get The 'pewter' to honour the debt! I'm ashamed of your honour, my lord; Your lordship could better afford To pay on the nation's demand One-half of your money and land, Than can a poor worky like me One-half of his sugar and tea— One-half of the blessed brown bread On which his poor children are fed! Don't speak of the thousands you pour Through the Downing-street Treasury door: I see, by your name on the docket, They more than flow back to your pockets. Your cousin we just spoke about Are the sneakingest rascals, no doubt; But, excuse me, I cannot make out Your right to the honour which decks The name of our honest John Bull, While you slip out your delicate necks From the terrible load he must pull; While, first having stolen our votes, You cancel your national notes By cheating our famishing throats!

My lord, I am,—and I am not a sham-er,

Your lordship's best friend,

"March 26, 1844." "A SLEDGEHAMMER."

"A Subscriber in Lambeth."—The laws preventing the acquisition of land in small quantities take away from the industrious one of the great incentives to the accumulation of small capitals. Small landed proprietors are the most truly Conservative portion of a nation; they stand between the "Have-nots" and the "Haves"; their sympathies with both enable them to mediate and prevent the collision menaced by a Jaquerie on one side, and an oligarchy on the other.

"J. H."—We cannot at this moment lay our hands upon the letter. Mr. Cathoun's advocacy of slavery would not justify a repudiation of his support of Free Trade; it is unfortunate that he should not perceive the value of free labour, but his having sound economic views on one subject affords reasonable hope that he will discover his error on another.

"F. A. P." has sent us an example of the tender mercies of Monopolists to the pretended objects of their care—the farm-labourers. It is the case of a poor man at Leek, in Staffordshire, who was mulcted in a fine of £5, and £7 18s. costs, on a mere suspicion of having been in pursuit of game. This is one of the many exemplifications of the case of "Peasantry versus Pheasantry," which will, we fear, prove eventually one of the most perilous trials ever hazarded by an oligarchy.

"S. R."—The quotation has already appeared in our columns.

"Mr. Francis, of Brompton," inquires, 1. "Would a repeal of the Corn Laws cause an increase of the corn grown in this country, and to what amount?"—To the amount of capital which the landlords would allow to be invested in the soil by letting farms at an equitable rent, and on a secure tenure.—2. "What would be the number of quarters imported, and the average price per quarter?" The number of quarters imported would be the quantity requisite to feed that portion of our population which has now an insufficient supply of food; the price must, of course, depend on circumstances of demand and supply; but, judging from the Channel Islands, where there is Free Trade, the price may be taken as from 48s. to 52s. per quarter.—3. "With what countries would our foreign trade be extended if the Corn Laws were abolished?" With all countries where there is a superabundant supply for the belly, and an insufficient supply for the back, such as the western States of America, the Crimea, &c.—4. "What effect would the repeal of the Corn Laws have on wages?" The rate of wages has no more to say to the price of food than to the age of the moon; it is determined solely by demand and supply; now, as more trade must create more employment, and more employment must produce a greater demand for labour, it is perfectly clear that the opening of our ports would raise the rate of wages in nearly the exact proportion of the extent to which commercial restrictions are removed.—We have answered these questions without any reference to the captious form in which they have been put; and if the querist be sincere in his inquiry after truth, we recommend him to procure Archbishop Whately's "Easy Lessons on Money Matters," which contain, in a simple and concise form, the elementary principles of economical science; a slight knowledge of these principles would have enabled Mr. Francis to solve his four problems without our aid.

"S. T."—The incident is instructive; but there are circumstances which render its publication questionable.

"J. C."—The hint is worth attention.

The following specimen of the protection given to infant labour by the monopolists is very instructive at the present crisis:—"A man of the name of M— is a labourer, with a large family. He resides in K—, and works for J. W—; as likewise does his son, a boy thirteen years old (not more), who is employed keeping birds off a field of 100 acres or so. On Sunday the 24th of March, this year, after this worthy magistrate had been to church, and learned that divine precept of doing to others as he would wish to be done unto him, he went to where the boy should have been keeping birds, and found him asleep, and he gave him what we in this county call a good thrashing; and, not satisfied with that, the next day he sent a policeman for him, who handcuffed this child, and brought him to T—, and took him before the said J. W—, Esq., and L. T. B—, Esq., another worthy magistrate of the same kidney, and by them he was committed for the remainder of the week to Swaffham Bridewell, where his hair was cropped, and he was put upon the treadmill, and all for the heinous crime of going to sleep."

"LINES WRITTEN AT THE TIME WHEN CHURCH EXTENSION WAS UNDER THE CONSIDERATION OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS."

"Give us this day our daily bread;
This our most righteous Master said;
Then how can sinful mortals dare
Refuse a nation's humble prayer?
The starving thousands of this land
Look up unto the ruling hand,
And pray for bread with begging tone;
What do they get? Behold, a stone!"

"S. D." of Hillacombe, sends the following exquisite lines; they do high honour to her head and heart:—

"SPRING COMETH, BUT MAN SUFFERS."

"Spring comes, and lo! the green buds swell,
The primrose lifts her head;
Nature, revived beneath the spell,
Comes breathing from the dead."

"The butterfly floats o'er the mead,
The bee hums round the bower;
God will His smallest creatures feed,— There's honey in the flower!"

"There's honey in the flower! and see
The dewdrops round it cling;
Come forth, bright butterfly and bee!
Rejoice ye in the spring!"

"Tarry not, insect, bird, and beast,
Attend your Maker's call!
Earth spreadeth forth His bounteous feast,
More than enough for all."

"But man! man only looketh on,
Mournful and sunken-eyed,
What hath God's noblest creature done,
That food should be denied?"

"Famine is on his thin-worn brow,
He sees the spring, yet sighs,
Lovely are earth and heaven,—but lo!
Man's burning tears arise."

"Oh God! dost Thou deny us bread?
Thou God of earth and heaven!
All else 'I'hou madest Thou has fed,
For all Thy care has striven."

"Raiment and shelter they receive,
Insect, and beast, and bird;
Cold and unsheltered, wilt Thou leave
The creature first preferred?"

"We watch the life-restoring spring
Reclothe the field and grove;
Sunshine and shower, and beauty bring
New witness of Thy love."

"Oh God! not Thou,—but evil men
This deadly wrong have brought;
Thou saw'st Thy work was good—how then
By Thee was misery wrought?"

"It could not be! Is not! Men slay
Their fellow-men, and smile;
Thy children's bread they take away,
And reckless feast the while."

"They take our food—our raiment take—
Scarce roofed the peasant lies;
And bitterer grows the heart whose ache
The proud oppressor eyes."

"Scorns, too, while eying! Yes, in vain
Each suppliant word was said;
Useless to ask, or to complain
To them who stint us bread."

"Bread—life—all, all, they swallow up,
Though hopeless millions pine;
Oh God, our God! remove this cup,
And be the glory Thine!"

"Give victory to the patriot band,
The many o'er the few!—
Join suffering nations hand-in-hand,
Till peace and right subdue!"

"Then shall the foodful earth increased,
Her corn and olive bring;
And man, no less than bird or beast,
Be gladdened by the spring."

To haud them up we would be blythe,
Gin just-e didna' thraw that;
For a' that, an' a' that,

An' we maun bear, an' a' that."

"To you, ye owners o' the soil,
They raise their cry an' a' that,—
'O gie us bread, and we will toil
To haud ye braw, an' a' that;
For a' that, an' a' that,
Nae mair be't said for a' that,—
Ye feed your packs o' useless hounds,
An' starve the poor, an' a' that."

"It's no the farmer that we blame,
They are but dupes an' a' that;
It's you that has the sin an' shame
To answer for, an' a' that;
For a' that, an' a' that,
The time is come, for a' that,
When justice true, 'twixt us an' you,
Maun be the law an' a' that."

"W. CALDER."

"A Lover of Fair Play" sends the following example of the paternal love and affection of landlords for their tenants:

"C. G., Esq., the honourable member for B— has a tenant by the name of White, who rents a small farm under him, which is exceedingly overstocked with game; and about the middle of last month the son of Mr. White was caught while in the act of taking from a trap one of the numerous hares with which the farm abounds to such an alarming extent that the crops are frequently much injured by their rapacity. A summons was served on him by the laying landlord, to appear at the bench; and the consequence was, the young man, whom the local papers represent as a very respectable character, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, to hard labour, or pay a larger sum than he had in his possession; and not willing to take from his father that which, it may be presumed from the terms on which farms are generally let, he had but a short supply of, submitted to the punishment of the law and was taken to Petworth prison for three months to hard labour! But did it rest here? Did Mr. G— feel that he had succeeded in punishing the offending culprit, that the requirements of the law were satisfied, and himself sufficiently avenged? No! he must go to the whole length; not satisfied with the punishment of the guilty, the innocent must be made to suffer; the young man's crime has rendered criminal in the sight of the arbitrary aristocrat the whole family, and father, mother, sisters, and brothers, are all obliged to sacrifice the endearments of home,—the beautiful green meadows, and luxuriant corn fields, so long the subjects of their daily toil, their watchful care, and their anxious solicitude, must be left for ever,—for a notice to quit has been served on the innocent, unoffending family.

"O," of Salisbury, has taken the same subject as our fair correspondent of Billacombe; there is, however, sufficient variety in the coincidence to justify the insertion of his lines; and we think that our readers will be pleased to see the agreement of thought between a poet and poetess, writing on the same subject, unknown to each other:—

VERNAL THOUGHTS.

"Is this a time to be cloudy and sad,
When our mother, Nature, smiles around;
When even the deep blue heavens look glad,
And gladness breathes from the blossoming ground?"
BRYANT.

"A time for smiles! a time for smiles!
The laughing Spring comes gaily on;
Who would be sad while she beguiles
All beings from her flowery throne?
'All hail to thee! sweet Spring, all hail!'
Swells vocal from each fragrant vale,
I join the general hymn to thee,
And cry, 'All hail, thou great restorer!
Thy blessings fall on flower and tree,
And earth revives from storms past o'er her:
The heart breathes gladness in thy voice,
That cries to all around—rejoice!
All nature thrills at thy glad sounds,
And with new life man's spirit bounds."

"A time for gloom! a time for gloom!
For sad thoughts rush upon the mind
Of those pale tenants of new shrouds,
Whose wallings on the winter's wind
Spoke the wild tones of dark despair.
Their voice is hush'd; where are they—where?
Where plenty is, they died of want;
Died—broken-hearted and subdued—
Beseeching Heaven with prayers to haunt
The TANNERS OF THE PEOPLE'S FOOD.
And shall those prayers unheeded fall?
Can dying lips no curses call?
Bethink ye, Starvers of the Poor!
Can ye their Maker's frown endure?"

"Go to yon bread-taxed wanderer,
Tell him to smile his gloom away,
For Spring's soft voice salutes his ear
With gladness, and bids him be gay.
What doth he answer thee?—'Tis this:—
'True, spring's a time for general bliss;
It was so with me once;—but now
'Tis so no more. Last spring I had
A wife and babes; but, sure and slow,
WANT did his work, and they are dead!
With others I roam'd forth, to find
The bread for which in vain I pined;
But they before the storm fell, one by one,
And I am left to starve, and die—alone!"

"Salisbury, April 1, 1844." "O.

"A Landowner at the Cape."—The matter is not worth notice. An unknown correspondent sends the following ballad, which reminds us of the early labours of Southey and Coleridge:—

Stimula similibus curantur;
OR, THE HOMŒOPATHIC DOSE—A PARABLE.
Showing how one grief may be cured by means of another.

By a Non-elect.
Mono-Polly sat weeping and wiping her eyes:
"Oh, it grieves my heart to see
These poor little objects of girls and boys
Trudge on to the factory!"

"I wonder how Bright can sleep at night,
And think on the wrongs of the poor,
When a ticket for soup would set all right,
And away with his Free-Trade bore!"

"Brazilian commerce, these spouters crave;
O horrid!—A saint would weep
For the wretched slave, while they bully and rave,
'Let sugar and corn be cheap.'"

But a plain old man his story began:
"There was a ship, quoth he,
Laden with wheat; a precious freight,
And brought from a far country;

"Where the merchants said, 'We've plenty of bread,
But our people lack clothes to wear;
We'll send this grain to the spinners of thread,
For the poor are famishing there.'"

"When the breezes fair the good ship bore
To the Isles of the Ocean Queen;
The ports were closed on every shore,
As though dearth they had never seen.

"For the lords of the isle a law had made,
That corn should be scarce and dear,
That the extra price, to the farmer paid,
High rents and tithes might bear.

"So the ships lay rotting, the looms were still,
The workmen no bread could buy;
And hush'd was the clang of the busy mill,
And grievous the children's cry.

"Their lot grew worse with every year,
Yet the landlord no want could see;
For the pheasant, the grouse, and the fallow-deer
Were as fat as fat could be.

"But blind to the cause of all their woes,
The ploughmen the spinners would blame,
Till the wall of despairing thousands rose,
Like the roar of the mighty main.

"Then the troops came down, with bayonet and gun,
And cannon, and grape-shot keen;
They drove the starving rebels along,
Till the streets were all swept clean.

* Ancient Mariner.

"When the Esquimaux dog the nearest dog,
He bites the dogs before;
So the lord screw'd hard the farmer to rob,
And the farmer squeak'd his boor.

"A mother chid her babes, who cried
For food with a blither wail—
'You must learn,' she said, 'these pangs to hide,
Or your father must go to gaol.'

"The father, sore griev'd for many days,
Rash'd out, and a bird he kill'd;
'For I've labour'd hard,' said he, 'to raise
'The grain which this pheasant hath fill'd.'

"Now, a man who kept your father's game
Attack'd him on his way;
And they struggl'd sore, till the man was slain,
Who had snatch'd his prize away.

"When'er a good deed of the nobles I hear,
To their praise I'll speak it out;
Though justice be dear to the rich man here,
Yet they'll hang the poor for nought.

"So justice condemn'd this man to die—
To swing from the gallows tree;
And the judge made a solemn and warning cry
Against murder and felony.

"The mother broke her heart and died—
Her troubles soon were o'er;
But few would relieve a felon's child,
As they wander'd from door to door.

"Oh Christ! 'tis a cutting thing to say,
How they perish'd one by one;
How they wither'd, like autumn leaves away,
When their spring was scarce begun.

We have not separately noticed a large number of communications from farmers and agricultural labourers, complaining of the wrongs and oppressions to which they are subjected by the severity with which the game laws are enforced, and by the destruction of their green corn by hares and rabbits. Some of these correspondents have taken the pains of collecting names, dates, and facts; and we have given two examples of such authenticated statements in this day's paper. It is a proof of the little effect which the slanders on the League have produced, that it is to our paper the farmers instinctively turn when they wish to bring their grievances before the public.

Would take the food he cannot buy—

'Give us our daily bread!'

"He must not beg; he shall not steal,

Though stores before us spread;

But we will work with earnest zeal—

'Give us our daily bread!'

"Famine hath laid his withering hand

Upon each sufferer's head;

Oh, Christ! is this a Christian land?—

'Give us our daily bread!'

"Thy kingdom come! Father, receive

Our souls when we are dead;

In Heaven we shall not pine and grieve,

Or want our daily bread!"

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, April 6, 1844.

The labouring classes of this country have as many friends as the hare in Gay's fable. Philanthropic landowners propose laws for their protection, busy bishops patronise charitable collections, and the Times writes leading articles; and yet with all this sympathy and bustle, we still find that, as Carlyle said long ago, "man is not helped." The secret of which we take to be, that there is too little disposition to put man into a condition to help himself. To give the labourer his rights is little glorification for anybody. That plan is too simple for the ostentation of beneficence. Surface morality is all the go. Be very generous, and forget the plain dictates of common honesty. Subscribe for the poor man's spiritual instruction, be loud for his political rights, and regulate his hours of work that he may not toil overmuch; but don't knock off the fetters of industry, perhaps it may walk alone and take care of itself, which would supersede a world of patronising and advocacy.

Sir James Graham, with a caution that Conservatism might have been expected to applaud, shrinks from a new principle of legislation which would lead to interminable interference with all those social relations of employers and employed which have hitherto been left to adjust themselves; and which, in a state of commercial freedom, will be sure of adjusting themselves much better than by legislative intermeddling. Hereupon the Times discovers that we actually are in a new state of society, which requires a new set of legislative principles. Steam "has done it all." The workpeople must be protected against steam. And as "Heaven has sent" this mighty power of change, we suppose the devil must be invoked for its restraint. But our cotemporary shall expound his own theory:—

"A new power of nature has suddenly started up in the midst of us, as if it were a mighty river suddenly gushing out of the earth, or a new order of existences, half brutal half rational, with which we suddenly found ourselves allied. The whole nation feels its benefit; industry its aid; but the labourer its competition. At the same time our population has fearfully increased far beyond our natural capabilities. These changes are not of our making: Heaven has sent them. We cannot close our eyes to the fact. Though we tried to reject the fact as a whole, still we should be obliged to encounter it in a thousand details. The disorders of the country are new. Their symptoms are anomalous and monstrous, if we look only to what has been before. The learned practitioner cannot find them in the old works of pathology; or, if he thinks he has identified the new with the old, is set right at last by the discovery that he has made some fatal blunder. A vast and friendless population, driven through the most miserable straits of life, thronging, and crushing, and treading on one another, pass between the Scylla of excessive working and the Charybdis of destitution. Where shall we find the like of this in history? Then, why are we to insist on the necessity of a legislative precedent, if there be none exactly to the purpose?"

This philosophy is struck off rather hastily. How "the whole nation" should feel the benefit of steam, and yet damage fall on "the labourer" by "its competition"; or how it should at once "aid" industry, and yet hurt the industrious, are points on which a little explanation might advantageously have been bestowed. However, the comparison with a new river is a good one. Were such a boon granted by bountiful Nature, would the Times forthwith limit the time when its waters might irrigate the garden or satisfy the thirst?—restrict the number of vessels and quantity of goods that might pass along this natural highway?—or, better still, petition Providence that its waters should only flow ten hours a day, so as to diminish its competition with pumps, carriers, and turnpike trusts? For that is what the Times seems to be driving at with the metaphorical river. Steam works too much for its liking. Will the beast never tire?—Then he must be stopped. Down, sir, down! Though unexhausted, you shall be idle, that the operatives may be idle too; you doing nothing, and they helping you; you corroding with rust, and they pinching with hunger. O this Philanthropy!

The "vast and friendless population" find their best friends, we take it, in those who give them work and pay them wages; and their worst enemies in those who, for their own profit, diminish the amount of work and the worth of wages in the market. The novelty of the case is quite capable of being dealt with on sound old principles. It is a novelty of degree only; the feudal and industrial principles, long at war in society, are now face to face in a grapple for ascendancy. An oppression, which the world never willingly endured, has assumed its most sordid and grinding form; and the objects of that oppression have, more than in any past time, developed their resources and social importance. The last and greatest victory of many, by national industry over class domination, has to be gained, and must be gained, or all that has been done is done in vain, and the ruinous consequences must be endured. As the evil, so the cure, differs only in degree from former appliances; more trade requires more freedom, as more oppression has generated more wretchedness. Voila tout. There is little occasion for novelties, and less for quackeries. Freedom is the old prescription; it agrees with the patient's constitution; there is only to increase the dose in proportion to the emergency, and recovery is sure. Probatum est.

ANTI-CORN-LAW PAPERS.—The Anti-Laguers are not likely to have it all their own way. The walls of this town, and all the district round, have been placarded with an address to farmers, showing the fallacy of protection, and calling upon them to ask themselves what benefit they have derived from the Corn Law. This address, printed on a sheet along with Mr. Cobden's last speech on the effect of protection upon the tenant-farmer, was given to every person as he entered the Anti-League meeting at Garatung, on Thursday.—Preston Guardian. PROTECTION TO AGRICULTURE.—The Hereford Agricultural Protection Association has offered a premium of £10 to the writer of the best pamphlet on the advantages of a protective duty.

REVIEW.

The History of Holland, from the Beginning of the Tenth to the End of the Eighteenth Century. By C. M. Davies. London: Parker.

Ancient alliances and ancient rivalries equally render the history of Holland interesting to Englishmen; similarity of commercial pursuits, social habits, and, to some extent, of language, united England and Holland by bonds which have often been loosened but never wholly broken. The author is the first English writer who has written the history of this great commercial state with a spirit of sympathy for mercantile industry and trading integrity; most of those who have discussed the history of the Netherlands despised trade, or at least affected to despise it; they bestowed their sympathies on the counts, barons, and knights of Burgundy, but had very little feeling for the struggles of boors and fishermen. In consequence of this "aping of chivalrous romance in sober history," as Dewey well expresses it, the early struggles of the Dutch were passed over in silence, or with slight notice, and no value seemed to be attributed to the history of Holland until it became a province of the Dukes of Burgundy. But, interesting to every lover of freedom as is the record of the glorious struggle made by the United Provinces against the Burgundian dukes and their heirs the kings of Spain, additional importance is given to the contest, when it is known that the Hollanders contended for no novel system, demanded no unprecedented privileges, but took up arms to defend an inheritance of liberty derived from a long line of gallant ancestry,—a system of constitutional freedom which had been cradled in morass and forest, which had acquired strength as labour developed the resources of the country, and which unbroken tradition had so interwoven with the mind of the country, that it formed a part of individual existence.

The early constitution of Holland deserves greater attention than it has hitherto received from students of general history, because in it the system of municipal government was more fully developed than in any other European state, and was also more demonstrably original, for no traces of Roman institutions can be found in their ancient laws. These municipalities exhibited in their outward form the framework of an associated aristocracy rather than that of a pure republic; but the spirit by which they were animated was thoroughly popular; for though magisterial power was intrusted only to a few, yet these rulers were for the most part men engaged in trade, mixing on equal terms with the rest of their fellow-citizens, and holding office for so short a term and on so uncertain a tenure, were thus prevented from forming themselves into an oligarchy or establishing an exclusive spirit in the government. To these municipalities the feudal nobles in the interior were strongly opposed. Holland, in the fourteenth century, like England, Germany, and France, was distracted by the dissensions between the feudal nobility, beginning to feel an uneasy consciousness of declining power, and the commons, who were fast acquiring a sense of their increasing strength. It must, however, be observed that the nobles were losing nothing but the power of committing wrong with impunity; in real wealth, income, and honourable greatness they advanced with the general progress of the rest of the community; but they felt that others were rising into an importance which would lead to rivalry, and they resolved to check the growth of mercantile wealth, not because that wealth in any way tended to their impoverishment, but because it threatened to create a power able to check their exorbitant privileges, and interested in restraining their plundering propensities. These parties existed, agitated, and hustled each other for many years before either became conscious of separate existence. The commons revolted against class-legislation, without distinctly seeing from what class the obnoxious laws proceeded; and the feudal lords battled against each instance of the assertion of equal rights, without clearly comprehending that they were standing by their order. Under such circumstances, a banner and a cry were alone wanting for the several partisans to find their places in the battle-field. A dispute with the Princess Margaret was the electric spark which sent the discordant elements to their opposite poles; it supplied them with an excuse for war, and, what in civil dissensions is scarcely less important, with characteristic names.

"The nobles espoused the side of William, while the people and inhabitants of the towns, with the exception of the larger and more aristocratic cities, adhered to Margaret, who was supported besides by the Lord of Brederode, and a few others of the most popular nobility. The former were called by the party name of 'Cods,' because the cod devours all the smaller fish; and the latter by that of 'Hooks,' because with that apparently insignificant instrument one is able to catch the cod. It does not appear what occasion gave rise to these very primitive appellations, so characteristic of the people and their pursuits."

At first the aristocratic "cods" seemed likely to carry everything before them; their vessels were trained to war—at least to so much of warlike pursuits as troops of banditti can learn, for freebooting was at this period a recognised aristocratic pastime—their names and titles had a strong hold on the imagination of their adversaries, and had they exhibited but a moderate portion of justice and forbearance, no "hooks" would ever have been fixed in their gills. But the commons were beaten into the art of beating in their turn; the nobles gradually trained their opponents into strength, while their sources of income being cut off, they found their mercenaries quite as dangerous as their open enemies. So impoverished was the state in this struggle that Albert, the sovereign of Holland, died insolvent, and his widow was obliged to go through a strange process of law, called "boedelafstandt," by which she was exonerated from responsibility for his debts by renouncing the succession to his estates. The particulars of this ceremony, which appears not to have been uncommon in the Netherlands, are thus described:—

"The widow, having chosen a guardian, demanded, through him, permission, before a court composed of the bailiff of the place and four assessors, to renounce the hereditary estate of her husband, according to the law of Rhyndland. Permission being given, the body of the count was placed on a bier and brought before the door of the court: the lady then, dressed in borrowed clothes, and retaining nothing in her possession which she had received from her late husband, went out with a straw in her hand; this she gave to her guardian, who threw it on the bier, renouncing and surrendering in her name the right of dower, and all interest in the estate of the late count, and in all debts due to or from him."

The struggle between feudalism and commerce changed its aspect when the county of Holland was joined to the duchy of Burgundy. Barante's delightful volumes have rendered us familiar with the gorgeous pageantry and brilliant magnificence of the Burgundian court, but they pass lightly over the taxes on industry, the imposts on trade, and the sale of commercial monopolies, by which such luxury and extravagance were supported. Charles the Bold, who had strong claims to the additional title of Bad, was the Rehobom of the Burgundian line: he answered the remonstrances of the commercial cities with fresh imposts, and the complaints of an over-taxed people with new exactions. His feudal chivalry cheered him in his mad assaults on the sources of his own and their greatness, but the progress of civilization had greatly diminished their barbarous strength; the successful revolt of the Swiss had brought forward infantry as the most powerful arm of war, and shown that mail-clad chivalry could be turned back by the pikes of naked peasants.

Charles of Burgundy hated the very name of liberty; he resolved to crush the rising freedom of the Swiss, and, as he could not trust his own subjects, he hired a body of Italian mercenaries. To their treachery he fell a victim; and, on his death, the Dutch and Flemings for a brief space recovered their former freedom. This, however, only aggravated their misery when the sovereignty of their country was annexed to the monarchy of Austria, and subsequently to that of Spain. Among other acts of tyranny a tax was levied on food, and this led to an insurrection, which received the significant name of the "Cassebrotspeel," or "bread and cheese sport;" for it was a struggle on the part of the people to obtain the means of subsistence.

The great religious movement which had been long at work in the human mind before the voices of Luther and Calvin were found to give utterance to its demands, began to agitate Holland at a time when political disputes had prepared men to look for a better system both in Church and State. The Reformation in Holland was more purely the work of the people than in any other European country; no where else had the Catholic clergy so completely identified its cause with that of the ascendant oligarchy, and perhaps no where else had bishops and priests so ostentatiously disregarded the instruction of their congregations. It was commonly said that they had misinterpreted Christ's injunction to St. Peter, and read the text "Shear my sheep." This religious contest was closely connected with a struggle for the repeal of the obnoxious Corn Laws, which had been renewed by the Emperor Charles V. This greatly overrated monarch imposed a tax on the export and reshipment of corn:—

"Hardly was the permit money begun to be levied, when the pernicious effects of the measure appeared. One hundred and fifty Baltic ships, accustomed to trade with Holland, sailed westward without coming into port. In Amsterdam it gave rise to some tumults, in which the receiver narrowly escaped with his life. The states, understanding that great difficulty was found in filling the office of receiver, since men feared to undertake it in the present temper of the people, again sent to petition the governess for a repeal of the obnoxious impost. She agreed to it on condition that 25,000 gilders should be paid to the emperor as an indemnification for the loss he would sustain. The states gladly accepted her proposal, Amsterdam consenting to pay a third of the required sum, and thus Holland was again relieved for some years from this injurious restriction on her trade."

Philip, the successor of Charles, and the husband of our Queen Mary, by his religious persecutions and fiscal exactions, spread misery throughout Holland and Belgium;—trade declined, manufactures stopped, operatives starved, distress spread everywhere, and discontent followed in its train. At this crisis Philip intrusted the administration of the Low Countries to Cardinal Granville, a statesman equally remarkable for his love of Corn Laws and his hatred of Dissenters. The new governor devised a most ingenious remedy for the disorders of the Netherlands, viz., the creation of fourteen new bishoprics; thus anticipating the worthies who propose to heal the distress of England by the erection of new churches. The popular opinion respecting the cardinal's mode of cure was whimsically expressed by the H. B. of that day:—

"The cardinal had, one day, thrust into his hand a picture of himself sitting on a nest of eggs, from which bishops were hatching; over his head was a devil, saying, 'This is my beloved son, hear ye him.'"

Philip's ministers zealously seconded his edicts of persecution, but here the ancient municipal institutions of Holland proved a valuable defence against bigotry; the popular magistrates protected the Reformers, and, by various artifices, rendered the penal edicts a mere dead letter. It deserves to be remarked that, when these municipalities, in a later age, attempted to persecute those who had embraced the tenets of Arminius, they found themselves embarrassed by their former honourable proceedings in defence of the persecuted. We may further remark that these circumstances took a strong hold on the popular mind, and rendered corporations the most generally loved of all the institutions of Holland.

"The efforts of the magistrates to shield their fellow-citizens of the Reformed religion from the effects of these edicts were various and unceasing. Sometimes they induced them to attend mass once or twice for appearance sake, and then appealed to the circumstance as a proof of their being good Catholics; often, when they knew an accusation was likely to be brought against them, they gave them timely warning, or provided them with a place of concealment. The method adopted on one occasion by the magistrates of Hoorn was rather curious. The government of that town being accused before the Council of Holland, by one Dirk, a hot-headed meddling priest, of remissness in the punishment of heretics, a commissioner, named Charles Smyter, was sent to inquire into the matter. On his arrival at Hoorn, he was received with great courtesy by the burgomasters and principal members of the government, who took it by turns to entertain him, which they did so effectually, that the only movement he was able to make was 'from bed to table, and from table to bed.' The answers, therefore, to all such as came to give information concerning heretics, was either that the commissioner was engaged at meals, or that he was asleep. Having spent a week in this manner, and hearing no accusation, he returned to the Hague, lauding to the skies the religious disposition of the good citizens of Hoorn, against whom, he said, he had not heard the slightest complaint of heresy during the whole time he had been there. The chief burgomaster had not forgotten to recommend his hospitalities still further, by a liberal present of money."

Philip, disappointed by the ill success of his exterminating measures, began insidiously to profess more tolerant principles in religion, and a more equitable course in policy; he promised to grant what he was pleased to call "a moderation," but which, in fact, was a fraudulent aggravation of tyranny.

"The joy caused by the relaxation of persecution consequent on the orders of the governess soon gave way to renewed fear and suspicion. When the moderation (or, as the populace called it, 'murderation') devised by her and the privy council became known, it was found to be such as to excite the indignation of many, and the contempt of all. Priests, teachers, and those who exercised any office among the Reformers, the composers, printers, or sellers of any pamphlet, song, or pasquinade, were to be hanged instead of burnt alive; the punishment of death being changed to banishment, in favour of the common people only."

The administration of the Duke of Alva soon brought matters to a crisis; he not only expelled the discontented Hollanders, whom he contemptuously called Gueux, or "beggars," but he menaced war against any nation which would afford them shelter. But despair is often the parent of hope, and what was designed to crush the Gueux became the great impelling cause to their career of present revenge and future glory.

"His remonstrance, which bore somewhat the appearance of a menace, induced Elizabeth, who feared to draw on herself the enmity of Philip, to issue an order commanding the Gueux to quit the ports, and strictly forbidding any one to harbour, or supply them with food or other necessities. Thus driven from their last refuge, and left without a single spot of earth in Europe whereon to set their foot, the Gueux, under the command of the admiral, William van der Mark (one of those who had sworn to let their hair and beard grow till the death of Egmond was avenged), set sail in their vessels, twenty-four in number, for the Texel, purposing to attack the duke's ships of war which were then lying there. On their way they captured two large Spanish vessels, and being driven by stress of weather into the Meuse, presented themselves suddenly before Briel. The town being destitute of a garrison, and the poorer people favourably inclined to the Gueux, the more wealthy inhabitants fled precipitately, and Van der Mark took possession in the name of the Prince of Orange as stadtholder, with little opposition. The lives and property of the citizens remained untouched; but the Gueux, wreaking a cruel vengeance on the priests and monks, hanged no less than thirteen of them; they likewise stripped the churches, and broke all the images."

From the moment that the Gueux had regained a footing in their native country, they devoted all their efforts to achieving its independence, and the exploit just recorded may be taken as the first blow struck in that great war between Commerce and Feudalism, in which the English and Dutch, as leaders of the mercantile interests of the world, rent in sunder the restrictions which the court of Madrid, aided by the Bulls of the Vatican, attempted to impose on European intercourse with Asia and America. In spite of what appeared to be the most fearful odds, England and Holland, fighting under the banner of Free Trade, beat down to the dust the overwhelming power of Spain. Alas! that we should add the lamentable fact that both subsequently abandoned the principle which led them to victory, and frittered away the high destinies which had been placed in their hands, for the petty chicanery of monopoly and its delusive gains!

Let us, however, keep our eyes on the animating example given by the Free-Traders in their early career, and for a time forget their subsequent errors. When the Dutch first raised the standard of revolt they literally were the beggars (Gueux) that they were called. On the other hand, Philip, their oppressor, wielded not only the vast resources of the entire Spanish peninsula, then the most productive country of Christendom, but also the treasures imported from Peru, the profits of the commerce with the East and West Indies, the trade of the Mediterranean, and an entire command over the intercourse between Northern Europe and the Levant. When the war closed, Holland took the lead of all Europe in commercial wealth, and Spain was bankrupt.

"It cannot be supposed for a moment that the inhabitants of a small and impoverished nook of land, such as Holland and Zealand, were possessed of more resources to pay and provide for their troops than a monarch who had the wealth of both worlds at his command; on the contrary, their trade and manufactures had decayed in consequence of the war; many of the richest families had fled during the persecutions of Alva, taking with them a large portion of their property, and the best of their lands were laid under water by the cutting of the dykes; but they found, in this time of trial and distress, an inexhaustible mine of treasure in their unsullied national probity, their unimpeachable public credit. During the long sieges, when specie failed, the States or municipal governments were in the habit of issuing promissory notes, or coining money of tin, and this money was received in payment by the foreign troops, as well as the natives, without the slightest hesitation; nor was such traffic as remained ever embarrassed for an instant by want of confidence in a circulating medium so wholly destitute of intrinsic value. The holders of it implicitly relied on the conviction that no plea of distress, no complaint of usury or extortion, would stand in the way of their receiving the full amount it promised, as soon as circumstances permitted; nor did they doubt that nothing but the utter destruction of the Government would prevent its fulfilling to the letter every engagement it had entered into. It was this perfect integrity, this unbounded confidence between man and man, which enabled Holland to protract the war until the resources of her adversary were completely exhausted. A striking contrast in this respect was presented by the conduct of the King of Spain, who, having incurred a debt of 14,500,000 ducats to the merchants of Spain and Genoa, obtained from the Pope a dispensation, permitting him to revoke all his promises and engagements, lest he should be ruined by usury while combating the heretics."

English historians have, for the most part, omitted mention of the service rendered by the Dutch to this country when menaced by the Spanish Armada. It ought to be known that, while our admirals were defeating the Duke of Medina Sidonia, the Dutch blockaded the Prince of Parma, and prevented his making, as he intended, a dash on the Thames, while the fleets were engaged in the Channel.

"During the whole of the time consumed in that glorious contest, the image of which is fresh and bright in the mind of every English reader, the great commander was kept in a state of helpless inactivity on the shores of Flanders. Justin of Nassau, with thirty-five Holland and Zealand vessels, well armed, and containing, besides their complement of seamen, 1200 skilful musketeers, effectually blockaded the harbours of Dunkirk and Nieuport, so that not only the ships of Parma were debarred from egress, but the smaller vessels of the Spanish fleet were prevented from entering to afford them any assistance, the approach of the larger being impossible from the shallowness of the water. The fleet of Parma meanwhile, though infinitely superior in number, yet being equipped for convenience of transport rather than for battle, was scarcely fit to sustain a regular engagement; to which, also, an additional obstacle was found in the ill disposition manifested by the crews. The memory of the old 'Water-gueux,' of whom the rear-admiral in command, Justus le More, was a remnant, had not yet faded away from men's minds; and the terror excited by the Holland and Zealand mariners was so excessive, that all the efforts of Parma were unable to check the desertion among his men, which continued day and night without intermission. In vain, therefore, did the Spanish admiral, having reached the port of Calais, urge him to effect a junction without delay; he could do no more than hurry from place to place in an agony of impatience; at one time offering up bootless vows at the shrine of Notre Dame de Halle; at another giving orders to his troops to embark and set sail at all hazards; and then again countermanding them, as dreading to trust that army on which the hopes of Spain depended, to the mercy of the tempestuous waves and the enemy, who lay in wait for their destruction. Eighteen thousand troops were already on board the vessels at Nieuport, and had been two days eagerly awaiting the signal for departure, when they were ordered to reland."

"Empire would be eternal," said the first of Roman statesmen, "if the arts by which it is gained continued to be used for its conservation." Holland and England soon abandoned the principles which led them to glory, and adopted those very monopoly lies which had cankered the strength of their Spanish adversary. It is not necessary to pursue the history of Holland farther at present; we may return to it at another period. But we cannot part from the author of the volumes before us,—a lady, as we are informed,—without saying that we have rarely met a historical work exhibiting more diligent research, honest statement, and judicious inference. On the illustrations it affords of the great struggle for Free Trade against the monopoly of an oligarchy, we shall now only say (for we intend to revert to the subject,) that it shows how a nation holds, even under the most adverse circumstances, mastery over its own destinies; and that if England fails abroad, it will be only the consequence of corruption at home. If the only hope of salvation for a commercial country—perfect emancipation of its industry—be refused or delayed until the concession is unavailing, the future historian may tell the tale in the words of our immortal bard:—

"That England, wont to conquer other nations,
Has gained a shameful conquest o'er herself."

Antigua and the Antiguan; a full Account of the Colony and its Inhabitants. London: Saunders and Otley.

These volumes contain a very lively and interesting account of the past state and present condition of the island of Antigua; internal evidence shows them to be the production of a lady whose powers of observation and reflection have been sedulously cultivated, but who has not had much practice in literary composition. There is a tropical luxuriance in the style characteristic of a first essay in authorship, and a tendency to sentimental digression which evinces more good feeling than good taste. We note these trifling defects in no unkindly spirit; taken as a whole, the work displays information, intelligence, and high moral purpose; there is little to censure, and much to praise; indeed, we know not any other publication which contains so vivid a description of the physical aspect and social condition of any of the West India islands.

Antigua has some honourable peculiarities in its history: it was uninhabited when first discovered, and thus no stain of injustice to aborigines rested on the early settlers; the Antiguan planters generally abstained from the importation of negroes before the slave trade was abolished by law; they were, for the most part, merciful masters, and when emancipation was granted, they voluntarily surrendered the "apprenticeship" which proved so heavy a deduction from the intended boon in several of the other islands. From private sources we can add that the landholders resident in Antigua have entered on a vigorous course of agricultural improvement, that they are seeking earnestly the scientific and mechanical means best adapted to the cultivation of the soil; and that Mr. Walker, of the Marshal's Office, Antigua, a gentleman long and honourably connected with the scientific societies of London, has begun, in their name, to open a communication with all the public bodies and private individuals likely to assist in the improvement of the various processes of production. Already a marked change has taken place on the island; lands long practically abandoned to sterility have been brought into cultivation; the cottages of the negroes have improved in cleanliness and comfort; the value of landed property is rising in the market; crimes of violence have greatly diminished in frequency; and crimes against property have not increased in the ratio of property itself.

All these gratifying signs of improvement are obviously the result of FREE LABOUR, and are, therefore, evidences of the national value of FREE TRADE, for labour is as much an article of trade as cloth or corn. Now, it is edifying to find that free labour in the West Indies was opposed by the very same parties, and with the very same fallacies—we cannot call them arguments—which are now brought against Free Trade in England. The slave-trade was defended on the same ground as the corn-monopoly, consumption of British manufactures, peculiar burdens, protection of British industry, and vested interests. Lord Mornington, afterwards Marquis Wellesley, assailed those who proposed the abolition of the slave-trade in terms almost identical with those directed against the enemies of monopoly, so that Cobden seems only to have inherited the epithets of Wilberforce. Those friends of humanity who protested against the compulsory enslaving of their fellow-men were stigmatised as Jacobins, fanatics, abettors of assassination, selfish speculators, and enemies of Church and State. It was confidently predicted that the West India islands would revert to primitive desolation if kidnapping and man-hunting should be abandoned, and it was virtually asserted by majorities of the British Legislature, that the laws of God were inconsistent with the welfare of man. Long and arduous was the struggle, but at length the cause of justice and humanity prevailed; the infamous slave-ship was wrecked in St. Stephen's amid the cheers of a large majority, though a minority of enslavers, including Castlereagh, Eldon, Hawkesbury, and Sidmouth, clung desperately to her shrouds; and well would it have been for England if they, with her, had sunk for ever below the level of political existence.

The abolition of slavery was not less fiercely resisted than that of the slave-trade. Journals were found as unscrupulous in the support of the West-India interest as they are now in the maintenance of the so-called landed interest; and, with significant identity, the "Bible and Crown" formed the cognizance of those who "protected" the labourer, by denying him the right of selling his labour in open market, as these same symbols decorate the papers which "protect" the labourer, by denying him the right to purchase his food in open market. In both instances protection signified "the plunder of the class pretended to be protected;" and we may be well surprised that such cognizances were assumed by the advocates of hypocritical robbery.

And yet these symbols had their significance; the Bible was always depicted shut, intimating that its name was to be used and its contents disregarded. Just in the same way that a block of wood bound as a Bible was borne in procession before Lord Sandon at Liverpool, the undesigned emblem of sanctimonious monopoly—hypocrisy outside and stupidity within. The crown was represented alone; and this, perhaps, may be interpreted as symbolic of the party which has ever maintained its existence by widely separating the sovereign from the people.

FREE LABOUR was obtained in spite of the bel-lowings of the Bull, the ponderous prophecies of the Standard, the still more ponderous jokes of the Age, and the waiting-maid horror of "niggers" evinced by the Morning Post. Fallacy and falsehood, cant and calumny, the arts of the hypocrite and the sophist were unavailing when fairly brought into collision with the sound sense and good feeling of the English people. The monopoly of labour capitulated, and its mercenary supporters would have been left without employment had not such an unscrupulous army of defence been wanted for the monopoly of food. We now see the precise fallacies, which events have so decisively refuted in the West Indies, again brought forward to maintain the slavery laws of England;—we say "slavery laws" because it is equally an interference with natural right to restrict buying as to restrict selling;—and we therefore point to the volumes before us as a recorded refutation of the hackneyed sophisms by which monopoly has invariably defended injustice.

An Inquiry into the Accordancy of War with the Principles of Christianity. By Jonathan Dymond. London, Gilpin.

We propose, at an early opportunity, to review Mr. Dymond's "Essays on Morality;" but the importance of the subject he has specially discussed in the work before us, and its immediate connexion with the subject of Free Trade, induces us to give this volume the precedence. It is unnecessary to follow the author in examining the various pretences which statesmen in various ages have assigned for war; monopoly has been the cause of all the wars that ever existed, and perfectly Free Trade has been the surest bond of peace that ever united nations. In ages of barbarism bands of robbers preferred plunder to labour; conquerors were nothing but robbers on a large scale; and what are called "war-like states," such as the republics of Rome and Sparta, were nothing better than joint-stock associations for obtaining profit from rapine and murder.

As civilization advanced men became unwilling to confess the mercenary motive of mere conquest, and sought to disguise it by a variety of pretexts which received the name of political causes. Now, each and every one of these so-called political causes will be found to be nothing more than a varied form of monopoly, and this will be found to be the case even in those wars which are usually regarded as defensive. The point of most practical importance to be established is, that every monopoly has a tendency to excite hostility, and that every one who supports a monopoly as a monopolist, virtually gives his adhesion to a declaration of war.

It is not necessary to encumber this inquiry by entering into any discussion of the legality of war under any circumstances, nor to inquire whether hostilities of every kind are forbidden by the Christian dispensation; Mr. Dymond on this head goes so far as to denounce resistance to wrong, by violent means, under any circumstances, and to deny the individual right of self-defence; but this is an abstract refinement which need not now be discussed, because it is sufficient for our purpose to take the more commonly recognised principle, that war is in itself an evil. It is expensive, as we have discovered to our cost; it produces habits of public profligacy, as the records of our naval and military departments amply show; it demoralizes those engaged in it, as the criminal records of the country prove; and even in the higher class of officers it has a tendency to substitute false honour for true virtue, as society has felt by melancholy experience. Let us now inquire for whose advantage this vast amount of evil is incurred, and let us take for example the greatest war of modern times.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 29.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1844.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive a copy, weekly, of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND, are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council respectfully request that their friends, in all places where committees for raising subscriptions to the £100,000 Fund have not been already formed, will proceed to their formation as soon as possible, and transmit their names to the LEAGUE Offices, Manchester.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

THE LEAGUE AND THE COMING ELECTIONS.

We need scarcely state, what must be obvious to every one, that the total and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws cannot be expected from the present House of Commons. The hopes of the Free-Traders rest not on the winning over of members, but on the conversion of constituencies; and this conversion must be a work of some difficulty, because at the last election a greater amount of bribery, of intimidation, and of corrupt influence was brought to bear on the electoral body of England than at any other period of our parliamentary history. It is, however, a gratifying fact, that a reaction against corruption has commenced, and is rapidly gaining strength; the League, under these circumstances, has come forward to offer its aid in purifying the constituencies, not by dictating to any electoral body whom it should choose or whom reject, but by affording an opportunity to the Free-Traders in every borough, whether they be few or many, of evidencing their principles by their votes, and forming a nucleus around which the friends of truth, justice, common honesty, and common humanity may rally. It was while men slept that the enemy sowed tares, and it was at a time when the honest and sound portion of the electoral body was in a state of ositancy and apathy that monopolists gained their majority at the last election. The League has to rouse the sleepy, to encourage the timid, to fix the wavering, and to strengthen the weak. Its duties are both sanatory and educational, and in many cases it must have to deal with reluctant patients and refractory pupils.

It could not be expected that purity and principle should immediately and everywhere triumph over inveterate corruption and selfish interest. On the contrary, defeat in the first struggle was to be anticipated in almost every instance. Those who are accustomed to sell their votes naturally feel exasperated when an association is formed to deprive them of their unhallowed gains; they are likely, in the first battle, to vote against the League which closes the market where they trafficked their consciences; and it is not until the heat of guilty resentment subsides that they will begin to reflect on their responsibility to God and their country.

In performing its educational functions, the League must seize the golden moments when the constituencies are in the best state for receiving instruction; at the time of an election men's minds are excited to the subjects at stake in the Legislature; the ground is open for the reception of the seed, and the sower should avail himself of the opportunity. It is true that some of the seed may fall by the wayside, and some may fall on the stony ground, where there is not depth of character for it to strike root; the thorns and thistles of bribery, intimidation, and corrupt influence may choke many plants after they have grown; but where the seed of sound principle falls upon honest hearts it is sure to produce such a luxuriant crop as will amply atone for the deficiency of the rest.

The League is most securely fixed in those boroughs where it first encountered defeats; Stockport, Durham, and Walsall were lost before they were won. Salisbury and Devizes have a growing spirit of emancipation from thralldom which promises, at no distant date, to lead to the establishment of their independence; everywhere we find an increasing determination in the constituencies to redeem themselves from the yoke to which they submitted in the hour of their delusion, and the League is a ready ally to cheer their exertions and to aid their efforts.

The death of Lord Abinger is likely to lead to the vacating of several seats. Let the constituencies in all these places be up and stirring; there is wisdom in the proverb, that "God helps those who help themselves;"—let them, without delay, select their own candidate, organize their own committees, and guard against their own peculiar dangers. The League is ready to aid every struggle against monopoly, and is more anxious to act as the ally of the Free-Traders in each borough than to assume the place of principal. To those constituencies which in a few days will be called upon to pronounce their opinion on the great question of our time, and to decide between Free Trade and Monopoly, the Council earnestly and respectfully recommends an early organization of all the strength which can be brought to aid in the emancipation of British industry. Let no man be ashamed of incurring the risk of present defeat. There is a recuperative energy in sound principle which sends it aloft the moment it has touched the earth with a rebound more than proportionate to its apparent abasement; and those who do not know how to endure defeat are deficient in one of the most essential qualifications for winning victory.

GENUINE PHILANTHROPY.

A story is told of a French princess, who, having heard that the poor were famishing for want of bread, proposed that they should be fed on plum-cake, her royal ignorance leading her to believe that because cakes were more common in the palace than plain bread, they must, therefore, be cheaper, and more easily procured. Philanthropists exist in England, who, with less excuse, propound schemes of relief for the misery of the nation infinitely more preposterous than that of the French princess, and who, when the absurdity of their remedies is demonstrated, accuse logic of cruelty, and science of hardness of heart. In their view, consummate ignorance is the first and greatest qualification for the administering of relief, and the exercise of judgment in the ministrations of mercy is a crime and a grievance. Pauperism is spreading through our towns and villages; "vote money for its support," exclaims the pseudo-philanthropist; "give out-door relief with a lavish hand, feed the pauper better than the independent labourer." The man of economic science agrees with the pretended philanthropist, that relief should be given to immediate necessity; but he goes a step farther, he asks, "Why does such a mass of pauperism exist, and why is it manifestly on the increase?" He finds that our fiscal laws render food dear and labour cheap, thus doubly robbing those who depend on their daily toil for their daily bread; he finds Corn Laws preventing the labourer from buying means of support from those who are anxious to sell, and from selling the produce of his skill and industry to those who are anxious to buy. He speaks, as science teaches, the obvious truth, that such a system must, by its double wrong, continually thrust down the labourer from depth to depth; must increase the number of the unemployed, and decrease the profits of the employed, not merely by enhancing the amount of his outlay for food, but also by bringing every one of the unemployed as a competitor against him in the labour-market. Level as is this reasoning "to the meanest capacity," the pretended philanthropist vows that he cannot understand it, avers that it belongs to the cold calculations of political economy, and designedly misrepresents it as a proposal "to make those work more who work more than enough already."

It is quite true that the rule of the economist is to give the means of support in exchange for labour only, admitting but the exceptional cases where persons are incapacitated for work by disease or old age. It is not less true that this is also the rule of real benevolence and genuine philanthropy; for pauperism is a moral evil, which requires prevention, not aliment; and industry is a moral good, which no legislature can fetter or control without generating a mass of misery which grows by what it seeds upon. It is right to save the poor man from starving; but it is not only right, but pre-eminently benevolent, to save him from the degradation of receiving alms. Independence is the poor man's birthright; it was for its maintenance that God endowed him with the capacity for labour, and pronounced as his blessing, "In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread." Labour is not a curse, nor is the labourer a degraded being; toil was enjoined before the fall, for Adam was placed in Eden "to dress and to keep the garden." The economist seeks to secure for the labourer the heritage of remunerative toil bestowed upon him by his Creator; the pretended philanthropist would consent to see him stripped of his heritage, and then fed only by the crumbs which fall from monopoly's table.

Overworking, toiling for a length of time disproportioned to the powers of endurance, and in particular the lengthened toil of women and children, are grievances which justly call for commiseration and redress. "The remedy is easy," says the pseudo-philanthropist; "limit their hours of work, and the business is done." The economist cannot accept such a remedy without inquiry. He sees that this overworking is clearly the result of an inadequate remuneration for labour; and he therefore sees that the cause of the evil would be greatly aggravated by adopting a scheme whose first and most obvious result would be to diminish that remuneration still further. It is because wages are already too small that women and children work as milliners, as lacemakers, as miners, or as factory hands, for a longer period than is desirable; but if these wages be further diminished, to what must the sufferers have recourse in order to supply the deficiency? There are worse evils than overwork to which the craving stomach and the empty pocket may drive the female or the youthful operative. Destitution and depravity are too closely allied to allow the man of prudence and of science to abridge their present means of support; but he seeks out the way for trying the experiment of the pretended philanthropist with safety. He desires to increase the remuneration for labour, to raise the rate of wages, to deliver industry from the bondage and subjection in which it is held by monopoly, to strike off the manacles and fetters which restrain the healthful interchange of the products of industry between nations which are mutually in want of each other.

These pretended philanthropists affect to be exceedingly generous at the expense of other people: they would, as they confess, throw the burden of supporting those whom their selfish and restrictive laws have pauperized on the merchants, the manufacturers, and the capitalists, and they almost point out this class as fair spoil to those whom iniquitous monopolies impoverish. But the economist, seeing that capital is absolutely necessary for the employment of a dense population, declares to the operative that any attempt on his part to force a higher rate of wages from capital than the rate of profit allows is a suicidal policy, worse than that of the man who killed the goose that laid golden eggs. It is the clear interest of every workman to encourage the investment of capital in the branch of industry to which he belongs, for every such investment is a bond, with a heavy penalty attached to the breach of its conditions, into which the manufacturer enters for continuing to give employment.

There is so much of mock philanthropy and mawkish sentimentality abroad—there is so much of hypocritical and affected sympathy for the poor "canted in this canting world"—that it is time to apply some test by which sincerity may be determined, and by which genuine benevolence may be distinguished from the counterfeit either of fraud or fatuity. Such a test is not far to seek—"What is the cause of pauperism but an inadequate supply of the necessities of life? What is the cause of overworking but inadequate wages for fair labour?" The remedy, then, is to increase the supply of food and to increase the demand for labour, for that alone can raise the rate of wages.

Industry, under the natural conditions to which it was subjected by the Creator, would provide employment for all, adequate remuneration for all, and proper means of support for all. To deny this would be to pronounce a sentence of condemnation on Providence, and to imitate the blasphemy of the ignorant Monarch who, referring to the Ptolemaic system, declared that he could have made better physical laws for the universe than had been devised by the Deity. If industry has failed to accomplish this end—and that it has done so is proved by the misery of our towns and the wretchedness of our rural districts, by the houseless outcast of London, and the equally destitute denizen of the hovels of Dorsetshire—this lamentable result must have followed from its being subjected to unnatural laws, different from those which the Creator had established. An eminent prelate has said that a man's opinions on the Corn Laws may be taken as a fair test of his pretensions to a character for genuine benevolence. Does a man vote for continuing the restrictions on the supply of food? Then is he a propagator of pauperism, and his asserted sympathy for the poor is a mockery and a delusion, and an impudent fraud. His aims are an insult, his pity a lie, and his charity a wrong. It is he who compels the needlewomen of London to "work—work—work," until the frame is distorted, the sight ruined, and the heart broken; it is he who compels the mill to be open for twelve hours, and the iron-worker's shed to re-echo the sound of toil late in the night. His commiseration for the overworked is like the kindness of the Spanish friar who picked the pockets of the rustic while pretending to bestow upon him a benediction. In the repeal of the Corn Laws justice and benevolence are equally interested—in the advocacy of "Free Trade" the rights of industry and the relief of the industrious are equally advanced; and when this great object is accomplished, as it must be at no distant date, the Psalmist's beautiful picture will be realized—"Truth and justice have met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other."

THE FRUITS OF EXPERIENCE.

(From a Correspondent.)

"Heaven be praised!" exclaims a metropolitan historian, "Old London was burned!" In this somewhat paradoxical way he conveys his opinion that that prodigious calamity was a very great blessing. The generation that endured it might not think so, especially when surveying the smoking ruins of the city; but in spite of obstinacy, perverseness, and an eager haste to build it up as before, the Great Fire was a great benefit, and London has been a better, if not a wiser, city ever since.

For, though we are apt to look back upon our forefathers as sturdy and stalwart—men of a blunt character and a determined spirit—they could exhibit a stolid fatalism worthy of the Turk. There they were, nestling in their crooked lanes and wooden houses, enduring their periodical visits of fire and plague, and attributing them to inscrutable causes, over which they had no control. When a fire burned down the wooden houses in a crooked lane, they sighed over the calamity, and built up again their wooden houses in exactly the same crooked way as before. Field-lane, now tottering to its fall, seems to have remained to the present day, in order to give Londoners some idea of the dwellings and streets, and the filth which our wise forefathers endured. The grim Plague used to come, sometimes once a year, to pick out its victims; but no inhabitant of the wooden houses in the crooked lanes ever seemed to imagine that he was one of the causes which procured the visitations. No; they sighed; shook their heads; said it was all Divine Providence, and that they must submit; and digging graves at their very doors, filled them full with their dead, and folding their hands, hoped that the mysterious and awful Plague, coming as they thought without cause, and departing as they imagined without reason, would be mercifully considerate, and give them a long day, without paying them another visit.

It would almost seem as if Providence got tired of a perverseness which attributed evils arising from slothful ignorance to the merciful Being who, in kindness to his creatures, causes his sun to shine impartially on the evil and the good, and sends fertilizing showers alike to benefit the just and the unjust. A Great Fire was permitted to come, which swept the City from the Tower to the Temple, burning out the receptacles where the plague used to find annual board and lodging; but at the same time devouring, in its fury, cathedral, church, Guildhall, and Exchange. The citizens were not all taught by the awful lesson. Many of them set to work to build new London like the old. Some, from mere habit, were so attached to wooden houses and crooked lanes, that they preferred them to spacious streets and brick buildings. Others, looking to more immediate profit, stuck to crooked principles, and thought that immediate personal advantage was a greater good than general utility. But in spite of all this, the Great Fire was a Great Fact, and triumphed over the London Richmonds and Buckingham of the day. It gave us a noble St. Paul's, and many churches; cleared the ground for a better city; and, above all, banished the Plague, bidding it come back no more.

We, too, have endured a great calamity, which, like the Great Fire, has burned down all dependence on the narrow, crooked principles which hitherto have subjected us to periodical visitations of distress. Ever since 1815, we have been patching up our restrictive policy—widening it a little here, narrowing it a little there, but never getting out of the crooked line on which the whole proceeds. From 1817 to 1819 (especially in the latter year) we had fearful commercial distress, which fell with terrible weight on the working classes. What was the cause? Oh, said the solemn big wigs, "It is caused by a transition from War to Peace," and when the working classes got troublesome, and could not comprehend the meaning of a transition from war to peace, to keep them quiet, they gave them "Six Acts," suspension of Habeas Corpus, special commissions, fines, and imprisonment. After 1819, good harvests came, prices fell, wages rose, and prosperity ensued. But the farmers, who, on the faith of a Corn Law, thought that they would get perpetual high prices, and agreed to give high rents, were nearly all ruined. The year 1822 was a terrible year for them. Again, the big wigs were asked what was the cause, and they again solemnly shook their big wigs, and said, it was all owing to "Peel's Bill," which brought about the hard necessity of paying gold for paper. Deficient harvests began to show themselves once more, and the country got worse as the farmers got better. Down went the country banks; down went commercial firms; people ran for gold; and thousands of industrious workmen were poured out into the streets, roads, lanes, highways, and byways, seeking for employment during many long months, and literally finding none. What caused the "panic" of 1825, and the misery of the following year? Once more the big wigs spoke, and they said that it was "over-speculation," for there were people foolish enough to send skates to the Brazils, and frying-pans to Kamschatka, and therefore the whole country was ruined.

No doubt there were wise people in old London who pointed to the crooked lanes and the dirty, dilapidated wooden houses as the true causes of the periodical visits of the plague. And ever since 1815 there have been wise people continually pointing to the Corn Law and other monopolies, as the true causes of our periodical visits of distress. But as it required the sweeping influence of a great fire to give effect to the reasons of the one, so it has required the full force of a long-continued disastrous period to make the nation feel the other. Hitherto, there have been not a few, counting themselves very wise, who have looked on periodical visitations of commercial distress as being as inevitable as the changes of the seasons or the fluctuations of the barometer. Besides, there were great questions which absorbed the public attention, Catholic Emancipation, the Reform Bill, and other measures had to be carried; and, without irreverence, we may say, that it seems as if Providence had permitted the good seasons from 1832 to 1836 in order to give us room and margin enough to prepare for a great change in our commercial policy, as the fitting accompaniment to the acquisition of political power.

But we were not wise enough to take advantage of it. We fell asleep in the interval between 1832 to 1836. Then came the greatest of all our commercial calamities, the longest in duration, the severest in operation, the most wide-spread in extent, which we have endured since 1815. The period from 1836 to 1842 will be memorable in our future history, because, like the great fire, it has swept the ground for a larger and a better policy. True, we have no great statesman in office, ready to take advantage of the occasion, and, like Sir Christopher Wren, to write his name on the fabric of his country's greatness—"Si monumentum queris—circumspice!" But, nevertheless, we have not endured the calamities of 1837 to near the end of 1843, for nothing. There is a limit to public forgetfulness as well as to public endurance. Even stanch Conservatives feel that a period of returning prosperity is the most fitting of all periods in which to settle the question of Free Trade; and, by settling, prevent the return of another period of national disaster. Go amongst them, and you will hear all sensible commercial Conservatives freely proclaiming that they will never do as they have hitherto done; that the first alarm of a deficient harvest will send them to their "pigeon holes," contracting their engagements, watching their resources, and preparing for the storm which must ensue, if there be no previous alteration in our commercial policy.

Let Free Traders save them the trouble, by saving the country from the fearful experiment. As noon follows morning—as night follows day—so sure will like consequences ensue from like causes. Let our commercial policy remain unchanged, and the next period of commercial distress will bring about changes more serious than we can now venture to hint at. Now, therefore, is the time to effect the great change—a time of slow revival, which it would accelerate and perpetuate. If the people, true to themselves, and taught by the dear experience of the past, will determine the reign of party and of class, and, by acting on their representatives in the House of Commons, infuse into our legislation some of that common sense which ought to be the distinguishing characteristic of a commercial people, then we may have reason to "thank Heaven" that we endured the disasters of 1837-1843; and when the Anti-Corn-Law League shall have done its work and departed, its memory, like that of the architect of St. Paul's, will be associated with its one great achievement—that of the noble fabric of commercial prosperity by which England, like London, may be marked out during future ages.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEMORIALS.—The memorials to the borough members to vote for Mr. Villiers's motion, which are now being handed about amongst the electors, are receiving numerous signatures, and already bear the names of many Tories, whose perceptions of commercial expediency are too clear to be blinded by the haze of party predilections.—Leeds Times.

The Bradford memorial from the electors to the members of the borough, requesting them to vote for Mr. Villiers's motion for Free Trade, has received within the last few days upwards of 400 signatures.—Leeds Mercury.

MEETINGS.

WOLVERHAMPTON.

One of the most numerous attended, respectable, and influential meetings, held for many years past in this borough, took place on Monday, for the purpose of receiving a deputation from the Anti-Corn-Law League, and giving expression to the oft-repeated opinion of the inhabitants, that the Corn Law monopoly was, of all others, the most ruinous and destructive to the trade and commerce of the district. For some days past the town was extensively placarded, announcing the intended visit of R. Cobden, Esq., M.P.; J. Bright, Esq., M.P.; and the Hon. C. P. Villiers and J. Thorneley, Esq., the two respected borough members. The interest which this announcement excited was very great; indeed, so great that it soon became pretty evident that there was not a building in the town adequate to hold the numbers desirous of attending the demonstration. It therefore became necessary to provide a suitable place of meeting, and the erection of a pavilion in Howley-field was accordingly resolved upon, and speedily prepared in the most commodious and substantial manner. The building was in length about 100 feet by 80 feet wide, and capable of containing 3000 persons. On each side and one end commodious galleries were erected, to which admission was obtained by paid tickets. At the other end a large platform, extending the width of the place, was raised for the accommodation of the speakers, and the whole pavilion was covered over with new canvas. About half an hour before the meeting the building began to fill, and in a short time the galleries were occupied by a great number of respectable inhabitants. On the platform there were also a great number of gentlemen of respectability of the town and neighbourhood, amongst whom we noticed the following:—

J. Barker, Esq., B. Walton, Esq., J. Walker, Esq., W. Clarke, Esq., S. Cartwright, Esq., E. Edmonds, Esq., of Iron bridge; S. Horton, Esq., Prior Lee; — Demark, Esq., of Bilston; H. Southall, Esq., J. Gates, Esq., Bilston; J. Darby, Esq., Sedgley; — Harris, Esq., S. Blackwell, Esq., Dudley; H. Hall, Esq., Sedgley; T. and C. Clarke, Esqrs., J. Bradshaw, and R. Thacker, Esqrs., Dr. Bell, Dr. A. Bell, Dr. Simkin, Rev. H. Smith; Rev. Messrs. Prigg, Hill, Gornal, Hunter; Mr. W. Lowe, Mr. Charles Daniels, Mr. J. A. Lander, Mr. J. Longman.

A few minutes before two o'clock, Mr. Cobden, accompanied by the borough members, J. Walker, Esq., and a number of other gentlemen, arrived at the place, and was received with tremendous cheering, which continued for some time; after which, on the motion of Mr. Walker, seconded by Mr. Cartwright,

JOHN BARKER, Esq., magistrate, took the chair, and opened the business of the meeting. He said he was not insensible to the honour they had done him in nominating him to take the chair on that occasion. He felt sensibly that there were individuals present much better qualified to discharge the duties of chairman than the individual who had then the honour of addressing them. He felt it necessary to solicit their forbearance, their sympathy, and their support. He should, therefore, without preface, briefly occupy their attention while he opened the business of the day, leaving it to the gentlemen who favoured them with their presence to fill up the details. That was not a political meeting; they were not met to discuss political subjects; they were not met to discuss universal suffrage, or household suffrage, or vote by ballot. No, none of these topics would be put before them, because it was exclusively a Free-Trade meeting. They were met for the purpose of receiving a deputation from the Anti-Corn-Law League, the members of which were banded together to counteract the operation of a law, the principles of which were opposed to the great interests of the country. (Hear.) They were met to enter their protest against one of the greatest impositions that was ever practised upon any country, and in doing so they would be testifying their approbation of the conduct of their two excellent members, Messrs. Villiers and Thorneley (cheers)—who had so eminently distinguished themselves by their uncompromising opposition to the grievous impost of a bread tax. The supporters of the Corn Law said that it was necessary that agriculture should be protected in consequence of burdens being imposed upon the land which were not imposed upon other property. He had in vain looked to the right hand and to the left, but he could not find the burdens complained of, but he certainly could find burdens imposed upon the commerce of the country, from which agriculture was free; but as it was more than probable some of those burdens would be particularly enumerated by gentlemen who would follow him, he would not trouble them at length on these points. He felt the deep importance of the home trade as well as any man, and most certainly he was not disposed to overrate it; but he was most decidedly of opinion, that it was impossible for this great country to go on, and retain its position as a commercial nation, if they were to be prevented from exporting the products of their industry. It was indispensably necessary that they should export their manufactured goods to those countries that stood in need of them, and take in return the articles of utility which were the growth of those countries. He (the Chairman) thought he could not do better on that occasion than read to the meeting a few extracts from the pen of a living author. The writer so fully and entirely represented his feeling, that he could not do better than read these extracts to the meeting. Before, however, doing so, he thought he should not be discharging his duty conscientiously, if he did not state that he did not believe the Corn Law was at the root of all the evils of this country; he believed the laws affecting the currency must be altered to ensure a better state of things. If, however, they altered the Corn Laws, an alteration of the currency would inevitably follow; and he was in favour of a removal of this very unjust restriction upon the introduction of the essential article of life. He would now read the extracts to which he referred. The hon. gentleman then read the following extracts from a pamphlet called "Corn and Currency":—"It may be doubtful even whether the existing system of prohibition be so entire a benefit to the landowner himself as he would seem to imagine, for in the variety of seasons it is impossible that the land cultivated within these islands can, year by year, from one harvest to another, produce a supply of corn exactly commensurate with the demand. At one time the prohibitory system is unjust to the grower, and at another time to the consumer. The grower is injured when, after a harvest somewhat deficient, the ports are opened by a sudden rise of price, and a large accumulation of foreign corn is poured at once into the country, bringing on the farmer the loss incurred in over-production, and ultimately on the landlord a corresponding decline of rent. The consumer is injured in the interval between the rise of price and the importation of foreign grain; he is even exposed to the horrors of famine, for, in proportion as the demand for foreign grain is unusual, the supply in case of emergency must be precarious. Farming is thus made a 'gambling' and a 'hazardous speculation.' No caution can guard against ruinous losses, for no prudence can foresee the chances on which they depend—whether the price of wheat will rise to 78s., when the profit to the farmer would be enormous, or touch the maximum of 80s., when, by the opening of the ports and of the granaries in bond, wheat would instantly fall at least 50 per cent., to his entire ruin, is a matter almost entirely of accident, frequently influenced by fraud; thus the full operation of the present Corn Laws exposes agricultural capital to losses rather incident to the hazard-table than to fair mercantile speculations. Rents must also certainly vary, together with the lowest quality of the soil, which the hope of profit may force into cultivation. The landowner can never know beforehand what is his real income; he cannot regulate with certainty his expenditure with wheat at 70s.; his farmers pay their rent with wheat at 80s.; on the opening of the ports the price falls at once to 40s., and the rent, calculated on the moderate scale at 56s., cannot be paid. Thus revenue from the soil is literally made the sport of wind and weather. The landlord's best customer is the manufacturer; but his property depends entirely on high profits, which it is the avowed object of high prices to reduce. If corn be dearer in England than elsewhere, wages must be higher, profits must be lower. Thus our foreign competitors obtain the greatest possible advantage, and, if the system become permanent, manufacturing employment, except from the home market, must cease in this country. And surely it is not the intent of any class so to enhance the price of labour and provisions as to secure to the foreigner successful competition, and to choke with obstructions the principal channels of native industry. The feeling of the people must be hostile to the present Corn Law. The receivers of rent are a very small body; backed by public opinion they are almost omnipotent; in violation of public opinion they cannot long retain an exclusive advantage. The contest is fearful, for on what ground will it be decided? On the very topic which inflames to madness: that hunger which breaks through walls will be arrayed against them, reason will be heard no longer, the barriers of society will be broken down, and estates, distinctions, and honours swept away in one resistless torrent." And now (continued the Chairman), who did they think was the writer of the language he had just read? Was he a Destructive!—No. Was he a Leaguer?—No. Who then was he?—Why, he was no other than a member of the present Cabinet. The writer was no other than Sir J. Graham, her Majesty's Secretary of State. (Cries of "Hear, hear," and loud cheers.) Having read the opinion of such a man upon the subject, and that opinion being so fully in accordance with his own, he should not detain them one moment longer, but introduce a gentleman, well known, and no less respected by the inhabitants of that borough. He meant the Hon. Mr. Villiers. (Cheering.)

Mr. VILLIERS, who was received with tremendous cheering, after alluding to his own indisposition, expressed great pleasure in observing the number that had gathered together on that occasion, for, assembled as they were to receive and welcome, and give their cordial thanks to the distinguished men then present, whom he might term the apostles of freedom of commerce, it was a sign to the world that they were constant to the cause for which they had themselves so long contended (hear, hear), and that they were found in politics, as in business, ever steady and true. (Cheers.) Lucky, indeed, would it have been for the country had other towns and other places acted and thought as Wolverhampton had done. What misery, what ruin, what sacrifice of life, might have been spared (hear, hear)—for these calamities are the offspring of scarcity of food and want of employment (hear, hear); and when they prevail, the Corn Laws answer their purpose (hear, hear); for it was no matter of opinion, but the undisputed fact, that the law was passed to produce scarcity (hear, hear); it was without object or meaning if it did not exist for that purpose (hear, hear)—it was passed to prevent food coming in that would otherwise enter, in order by scarcity to enhance the price at home, and it would have come in for no reason but because it was wanted by the people who had not enough. (Cheers.) They had been early here in the field on this question, seeing its true character, and denouncing such a law as opposed to nature's law, and to every want and interest and policy connected with the wellbeing of this nation. (Cheers.) They were never deceived here by the jargon of monopoly, which sought to prove, if it proved anything, that scarcity was a blessing. It was attempted to persuade the working men that when food was dear the reward of labour was great, or, as they say, when the price of bread is high, wages are high. Now, the first answer which they did and could give to that was a short one, namely, that it was false (hear, hear)—a deliberate falsehood,—and he challenged all denial of the fact, that there never had been a period when food was scarce or dear that was not a period of peculiar suffering and distress for the working class. (Hear, hear.) He did not say whether it stood to reason or not that it must be so, but it was the fact, and they need not talk about what would or would not be the case under a Corn Law; experience, unfortunately, had settled that (hear, hear);—22 years was enough to show what good and what harm would happen under any law (hear, hear), and there need be no question, therefore, about their effect on wages. There was a shorter answer still, however, to the fallacy, which was better than all the rest; and he heard a working man give it in this town once with great effect; which was, that if scarcity was such a good thing for his class, what a blessing no food at all must be! (Loud laughter and cheers.) The conclusion was quite logical (hear, hear), and illustrated well the stupidity of the argument. (Hear, hear.) Every one has seen that when food was dear, men worked harder and longer to obtain the same amount of it, and that the same labour being done by fewer hands, more were thrown out of employment, and wages were thus made to fall. (Hear, hear.) The trading classes had never either been deluded in this town by what the monopolists directed to their understandings, which was, that if the rich were made richer by a Corn Law, they would spend their fortunes upon the shopkeepers, and that their custom, which they call home trade (a laugh), would be better for them than foreign trade. (Hear, hear.) Now, they had taken the just view here of that matter, as well as of the other, and had said, be so good as to leave us alone (laughter); take your hand out of our pockets if you please (loud laughter), and we shall get on in our own way, which we understand better than you can understand for us. We do not see the sense of giving what we have to those who have no right to it, for the chance of getting some of it back again. (Cheers.) Fancy a shopkeeper here being told that it was for his advantage that a man should take half the goods out of his shop, and then, being the richer for it, should promise some day to come and buy what was left in the shop. (Laughter.) Would not the shopkeeper, think you, hand such a customer over to the police, to transmit him to the county gaol or the lunatic asylum? (Hear, hear.) Well, but that is how the monopolists commonly defend the Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) Your complaint, however, against them was, that they had by their mischievous meddling with the trade deprived you of many excellent customers, and had not supplied their place themselves, and had caused trade seriously to decline. (Hear, hear.) What had been done in the case of the foreign trade in this country was just as if some four or five wealthy men had wished to spend their fortunes in this town, and that the high constable or the magistrates of the place had driven them away, saying that they should employ and deal with their own people themselves—that they were the natural customers for the people—that if the strangers were allowed to buy your goods it must be on very particular terms, and which they knew they could not accept. (Hear, hear.) They would surely think it very cruel if they saw these strangers driven away, if these great men who had sent them away did not fully supply their places, and provide the town on as good terms with the articles that the foreigners had offered in exchange for your goods. (Hear, hear.) This was exactly what they had done, however: if they would suppose these strangers' names to be Russia, Prussia, Germany, and the United States, and the authorities to be the landlords of this country, the illustration would be exact. (Hear, hear, hear.) Each of these foreigners had implored the landlords to be allowed to deal with the people of this country on fair terms, and had given distinct warning that, if they were not, they must go to another shop, or manufacture at home. The result was that they had done what they had threatened, and that, though formerly good customers, they had either made for themselves or become rivals (cheers); and they knew the landlords had done nothing to supply the place of their former customers, either in trade or the employment of the people; they had, on the contrary, made them give double the quantity of goods for the same amount of food. (Hear, hear, hear.) Nor had they been cured yet. (A laugh.) They were going on with the same system; and the people would suffer much more if they did not bestir themselves. They had not yet lost the Brazilian customer; but, like all the others, they wanted to pay for the goods they took from England in what they could spare most of from their own country, and in what was most wanted here. They had warned them, like all the others, that they would go to another shop if they did not comply; and which they would do. A valuable trade would then be lost. The pretext was a little different from the other cases, that was all. They had pretended before it was all for the good of the people that they made food dear and trade less; but in this case all the people who used to support the slave trade, and all the people who used to have slaves, have united to resist the trade with Brazil, not for the sake of the people of this country, and of course not on their own account, but because their hearts do bleed so for the poor slave in Brazil, and that it would be so shocking for you to eat the slave-made sugar. (Laughter.) If they succeeded in stopping the trade with Brazil, it would be done after their eyes had been opened. They knew the interest of this country was to allow no obstacle to the imports from other countries. They were the means by which foreigners paid for their goods; and anything that stopped the imports deprived the hard-working people of this district of their customers. (Hear, hear.) He would not, however, discuss this further—it was carrying coals to the north to argue that question here. They understood the question better than he did. He had himself learnt much from them on this matter. He had seen the full importance to the working classes of the foreign trade clearer than he had ever done before. He was hardly aware, before he had seen its practical working in this district, what numbers of our fellow-subjects depended for the means of life on the continuance, and, he should say, the extension of the trade with foreign states, how the more or fewer orders from abroad, or the more or less competition with nations abroad in the neutral markets, immediately determined for how much and how long thousands and tens of thousands here should toil in the day (hear, hear)—the utter ruin to the place and to the people which would follow the loss of any customer abroad. (Hear, hear, hear.) He had heard here more than he had elsewhere how competition with foreigners had increased, and how each year the foreign merchants, or the factors, were obliged to get their orders executed at lower and lower prices, or not to execute them at all; and on every occasion the unfortunate people of this district were compelled to work longer for less reward. (Cheers.) He had often thought how cruel he should think it, if he were a working man, that men who knew nothing of trade—nothing of the interests of the productive classes, and who did nothing themselves—should pass laws to create and encourage this competition, and thus deprive him and his family of the means of existence, but on the terms that made life a curse. (Cheers.) It was when he reflected on the sufferings of the working classes, and when he knew how much more they must suffer from such a cruel obstruction to their trade as the Corn Law than any other class, that he was able to treat with contempt and indifference the reproach that was so often made, that he was eternally and exclusively, on their account, for the repeal of those laws. (Hear, hear.) He knew that he was only asking that the working classes might not be further oppressed and degraded (hear, hear); and while the law continued he would continue to make the same demand. (Cheers.) He should like to put some of those fine gentlemen who regarded all mention of the Corn Laws as a bore upon short commons themselves (laughter), and then, if they began to cry out lustily (which they would) for their equal fare, tell them to think of many other things but their dinner—that it was not by bread alone that men lived, and to think of their immortal souls, and cultivate their minds and improve themselves generally. (Loud laughter.) They would take it very quietly, wouldn't they? (Laughter.) And then, after vexing and injuring them in every way, issue a commission to inquire into the cause of their degradation. (Loud cheers.) They had no reason to care for the taunts of ignorant, selfish men; they had been right on this question from the first, and their opinions were daily gaining ground; and they had reason to be proud that they had done everything which the constitution allowed them to obtain their object. (Hear, hear.) There was near him a gentleman who had drawn up the strong petition against the law in 1815, which was presented to Parliament (hear, hear); and when first the franchise was extended to them, they did not, as some did, select men to rivet the chains by which they were bound (hear, hear); or, what was more foolish still, choose one man to unbind their fetters, and another to fix them on again. (Cheers.) They sought and returned two of the most determined enemies of monopoly that the country contained—he alluded to Mr. Fryer and Mr. Whitmore. (Cheers.) When those gentlemen retired, the borough was famous for its opinions on this great subject, and he owed his connexion with it to that circumstance (hear, hear, hear); and it was their intelligence and constancy on that subject that gave Mr. Thornely and himself such pride and satisfaction in being their representatives. (Cheers.) He thought that they were acting in perfect consistency with all their former conduct in now giving a cordial hand of fellowship to the League. He believed that there was no way in which any man could support the cause more effectively now than by aiding the League, and he knew that they were too honest and too anxious in the cause not to hail their visit with joy and with gratitude. (Hear, hear, hear.) Ten years ago there were, perhaps, not two boroughs in the country so well informed as Wolverhampton on the subject; now there were at least fifty. He ascribed that chiefly to the knowledge that had been diffused in the country through the operations of the League. (Hear, hear, hear.) Let them rescue fifty men from the enemy and they would succeed. He believed it was to be done. (Hear, hear, hear.) Perseverance in a good cause would do anything. (Hear, hear.) The League was now everywhere. It was a body composed of men drawn from every part of the country, and of those who had the heart and the spirit to determine that their fellow-subjects should not longer starve, that commerce should not decay, and the country decline, while they had the smallest means within their power to prevent it (cheers); and they had the fortune to find the leaders of that League, animated by the right spirit, resolved to vindicate the rights of commerce and the rights of industry, and no longer suffer them to be trampled upon, insulted, and despised, as they had hitherto been. (Loud cheers.) No revival of trade, no improvement of revenue, no good harvest, would ever induce them to relax their unceasing hostility to this unrighteous law. (Hear, hear, hear.) They were like their old member, Mr. Fryer, who always said let them have but one thing to do with the law—which was to abolish it. (Hear, hear.) He remembered at the general election in 1837 he requested him (Mr. Villiers) to bring forward the total repeal the year following: he had assented, but he said that the harvest had been so good as to deprive it of the usual interest. "Good harvests, sir!" he said; "what had that to do with it? A good harvest will not make a bad law a good one." (Cheers.) It is a bad law, and will bear bad fruit as long as it lasts, and it will do much more harm yet, and he (Mr. Fryer) was a true prophet. In the year following, 1838, the prices rose, and in consequence of these laws the whole commerce of the country was disturbed, and a period, he believed, quite unexampled of misery and distress to the productive classes ensued for the five following years (hear, hear); and as sure as we are here this day will everything recur that has ever occurred before. (Hear, hear.) There is no reason why it should not. Sir Robert Peel's Corn Bill was not proposed to prevent it. Even the squires say it will do no harm, by which they mean that it will do you no good. ("Hear, hear, hear," and a laugh.) Would it not be madness to give it what they call a trial, when its principle has been long tried and has been so justly convicted? (Hear, hear.) There is only one thing to do, depend on it, which is, to get rid of every vestige of it, and this will be done at last by agitation. Justice is only rendered in this country by making the ruling classes uneasy. (Hear, hear.) If the agitation stops, they say the people are indifferent; if it perseveres, they yield. (Hear, hear.) Then, he said, there never was a machine more complete for this purpose than the League, and it was a duty to support it. (Hear, hear.) He spoke feelingly on this subject, for if the interest was not maintained out of doors it was intolerable to move, and not possible to succeed within. They knew that their late member, Mr. Whitmore, had retired from the house in disgust at the impossibility he found of making any impression upon the question of Free Trade. He complained of the interest that resisted him within, and the apathy which did not support him from without. (Hear, hear.) Had such a body as the League been in existence the cause might still have retained the service of a valued friend. (Hear, hear.) The League were now grappling nobly with their three great opponents, namely, interest, ignorance, and fear. They were facing those who asserted their interest in this law, and they told them that they were foolish as well as wrong. They sought to enlighten the ignorant, and to infuse a little spirit into the souls of those that dared not say they were their own. (Hear, hear.) They had drawn the great men from their retirement, had brought them before the public, and had made them speak out, and show cause why this law should not be abolished (hear, hear, hear); and a very pretty thing they had made of it (a laugh)—the wisdom of their former silence had become very striking, he should think, even to themselves. ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) When men were not guilty they might talk at random, but not when they were so, and had been caught. ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) They had all seen men brought before the bench, and, if they had the luck to be advised at the time, they were always told not to say anything, lest they should commit themselves. (A laugh.) Sir Robert Peel had, he believed, given his friends this advice (a laugh), but the League had driven the squires mad, and they won't be advised, and they will talk. (A laugh.) Now, formerly, they could say many things in Parliament which did not signify, for nobody cared; they did what they liked, and they used to tell the House how prosperous the farmer was, and how happy and contented the labourers were, and how they loved their lords (a laugh); the farmers and labourers never heard what they said, and the members for Wolverhampton were told that they knew nothing of the farmers and labourers. (A laugh.) Lately, however, they have been saying these things in the counties, and within earshot of the farmers; the poor farmers have been roused into thinking all over the country (laughter), and they are now asking themselves and one another how it is that the Corn Laws can have done them so much good, seeing that no good at all has ever been done them (laughter); that for the last 28 years they have been very ill off—never certain of anything; and, in short, worse off than their neighbours. It is a little more than they can stand to be told that the law passed to keep up rents is all for their good, and that the landlord cares nothing about his rent. (Laughter.) They have been talking and thinking now for the last year about this, and at last, as if they could stand it no longer, a thing happened, the like of which, I suppose, never happened in this country before; two real live farmers (laughter), from two different parts of the country, not known to each other, but both precisely the kind of farmer said to be benefited by the law, came to London, and told Mr. Cobden that, if there was an opportunity, they should be perfectly ready to state the real case of the farmers at Covent-garden Theatre, at one of the great meetings held there by the League; and accordingly, about a fortnight ago, they did so; and a very pretty tale they did unfold about the blessings to them of Corn Laws. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) Such a tale, that if there is any modesty in the composition of landlords, they will never mention the farmers again as long as they live as an excuse for their monopoly. (Hear, hear.) It is impossible to do justice to their narration of all the mischiefs which upon them especially, as farmers, they declared the Corn Laws had inflicted (hear, hear), but they defied contradiction to anything that they said, and they have received none. (Cheers.) They are notorious as good farmers in their counties, and are well known as respectable and able men (hear, hear). Even the poor agricultural labourer has found some friends who will not allow his name to be used for the support of what oppresses him. (Hear, hear.) Even the clergy have been speaking and writing on his behalf, declaring that his condition cannot be worse, and if the landlords would but pay half the attention to feeding him that they do to fattening their cattle, that they might then venture to speak of him as the subject of their solicitude. (Cheers.) At present he was starving, neglected, and degraded, and he felt an hostility to all above him. (Hear, hear.) This was the clergyman's statement, not his. (Hear.) So much for the blessings of scarcity in the agricultural districts. (Hear, hear.) These things are now being revealed, and if the League had no other claims to the gratitude of the country, they would deserve it on the ground that they had raised discussion and spread general interest on the condition of the people. (Hear, hear.) A more important subject could not now be discussed (hear), and by discussion the truth would be elicited. His friend Mr. Cobden did not even despair of convincing the landlords themselves that they were as foolish as regarded themselves as they were said to be unjust with regard to others. (Hear, hear.) He trusted he might succeed. Nothing to him on the subject ever appeared more clear than that. (Hear, hear.) They all knew that their rents had increased enormously during the present century, and it was difficult to believe that they could mistake the cause, and, forgetting that they had done nothing themselves to produce it, that they should overlook in their measures for injuring commerce and manufacture, the real cause and sources of all their wealth. (Cheers.) That the truth, however, should be elicited in time, and justice should be done, was his fervent prayer; it was in hopes of this being effected by the efforts of the League that he urged upon his friends to assist it. (Hear, hear.) He had attended there that day out of respect to the borough, and he was sure they would believe him when he said that the same feeling would prevent his advising them to any course that he did not think right and honourable. (Cheers.) Let anybody suggest any other course than that the League was pursuing, and he would attend to it and adopt it if proper; but, till he heard of something more likely to bring about the repeal of this law, he should do all in his power to support that body. Let them only remember that, during the three years since he last had the honour of addressing them, the population had increased one million (cries of "hear, hear"); that, for forty years past, this country had been unable to raise food sufficient to feed the people; and that the law in question was one to prevent the exchange of the labour of the people of this country for the food of other countries which they did not raise in this. (Cheers.) Could this go on safely, and could any man, who believed the contrary, conscientiously abstain from doing something towards its removal? (Hear, hear.) He said, then, let those who had not leisure to act for themselves in this cause, contribute to aid those who could act for them, and thus relieve themselves from any participation in continuing such an absurd, mischievous, and ill-suited enactment as that of the Corn Law. (Immense cheering.)

Mr. THORNTON, on being introduced by the chairman, was well received, and in the course of his speech said he verily believed if no Corn Law existed at present there was not a man in the country who would be bold enough to petition for its enactment. (Cheers.) When he and his colleague (Mr. Villiers) accompanied a deputation of the iron trade to Sir Robert Peel in autumn last, one gentleman on that occasion remarked upon the importance of the American trade. When this subject was mentioned he (Mr. Thornton) told Sir Robert Peel that he went along to the full extent with his colleague (Mr. Villiers) upon the subject of the Corn Laws—that he objected not only to a sliding scale, but to a fixed duty—and that, in his opinion, so long as a protective duty on corn was maintained, the American tariff would exist in full force, but so soon as that protective law was repealed the tariff would be abolished.

The CHAIRMAN then rose, and said the meeting was, as he had before stated, purposely called for discussing the principles of Free-Trade; but all political topics were advisedly excluded. If, however, any gentleman present differed from the opinions of previous speakers upon the subject of Free Trade, he would now, under the restriction adverted to, if he thought proper, have a right to address the meeting. All he (the chairman) would say was, that if there were any such gentleman present, he would do all in his power to obtain for him a fair, silent, and impartial hearing. He would now call upon any opponent of Free Trade to come forward and state his views. [The chairman paused for a short time, but no person took up the challenge.] It appeared (continued the chairman) the meeting was unanimous upon the subject. (Cheers.) He would now introduce to them their distinguished friend Mr. Cobden. (Great cheering.)

Mr. COBDEN, upon being introduced by the chairman, was received with vociferous cheering. Since their worthy chairman had made an offer of discussion, and it had not been accepted, it might be said that they were all agreed upon the question under argument. But he (Mr. Cobden) was told, that, although silent, there were gentlemen present who, from timidity or from other reasons, objected to enter upon a public discussion. He would therefore attempt, if possible, to convert one of these stray sheep, and, if possible, send him as an apostle or missionary of Free Trade into the agricultural districts. (Cheers and laughter.) Mr. Cobden proceeded to show that the agriculturists, instead of being taxed beyond the manufacturers, were exempted from a great portion of the imposts paid by the latter classes of the community. He enumerated the farmer's dog-tax, horse-tax, dairy and cheese-room window-tax, toll on manure, &c. He (Mr. Cobden) was engaged in a manufacture which required a large quantity of a certain description of manure. If hundreds of loads passed through turnpike-gates to his works in the course of a year, he was, as a matter of necessity, compelled to pay a heavy amount of tollage. Now, the same description of manure, when at other times passed through turnpike-gates, paid no toll at all; and why? Because it was placed upon the lands of the great squires and landlords. (Cheers and laughter.) Speaking of the Corn Laws generally, Mr. Cobden said there was not a man of intellect in the House of Commons who was not ashamed to advocate them. He admitted that Graham and Gladstone, Stanley and Peel, were intellectually able and distinguished men; but it was impossible to sit opposite to them and not perceive that it was nothing but the force of circumstances which induced them to maintain their present position—it was as clear as day that they were ashamed of the humiliating task which they had to perform. (Cheers.) No doubt, while they were saddled and bridled by the Duke of Richmond and the Duke of Buckingham, they would continue their present policy, but they might rely upon it, on the first opportunity which presented itself, the Ministers to whom he had referred—by far the ablest members of the Cabinet—would bolt out of the course, and run in an opposite direction. (Cheers and laughter.) After contending that agriculturists themselves would have no reason to complain of a repeal of the Corn Law, Mr. Cobden next proceeded to show that low prices of bread had always a beneficial effect upon the labourer. He put it to the labourer how high prices had benefited him during the last five or six years. They had received less wages, obtained less employment, and in many cases the unfortunate workpeople had had no employment at all. (Hear, hear.) They had had their wages reduced to the lowest ebb in 1839, 1840, and 1841, when corn was high, but when prices became more natural and free, when wheat was reduced to 50s. 8d., then trade gradually revived; iron, as it had done recently, rose 20s. a ton; employment became more general, and wages were augmented. Were not these facts? No man could deny but that trade, especially in Lancashire, was in some degree improving; and he (Mr. Cobden) would go further—he would prophesy that if corn kept at no higher price than 50s., trade and commerce would continue to improve; but if it got up as before to 60s. and upwards, then wages and employment would be as low and as scarce as before. (Hear, hear.) They had been told that if they reduced the duty on corn this step would be followed by a reduction of wages. He (Mr. Cobden) came there to prove that what their opponents said was not true. (Hear, hear.) Again, they had been told the working men of the kingdom derived no benefit from foreign trade; but if they did not others did. There were classes of the community who derived considerable benefit from the importation of the luxuries of life; and why did not the poor and working man enjoy with the rich equal benefit? Because there was a law to prevent the free importation of bread, pork, and other necessities of life. (Hear, hear.) He knew what was passing in the minds of farmers, who were then listening to him. "Yea," said they, "but every sack of flour and cask of pork brought to this country will be to our injury; it will by so much reduce the price of my stock and the amount of my gains." But the farmers should recollect that the people of this country were not all fed. It was because not less than 10,000,000 of the population of Great Britain and Ireland—for he always considered Ireland a part of his own country (cheers)—scarcely ever tasted wheaten bread, and were never fed at all upon meat, that he and his friends of the League advocated the entire removal of all taxes upon human food. (Cheers.) He knew no place in the kingdom where all the elements of prosperity showed themselves so clearly, so manifestly, as they did in Wolverhampton and its neighbourhood. Free Trade was all that was wanted. (Cheers.) Why, they had everything about them. They in Manchester had to go to America for every ounce of cotton they used before they could begin to work; they in Wolverhampton had their materials at their very door; at every step they kicked them before them. (Cheers.) They had skilled hands and skilled fingers, able to manufacture articles from a steam-engine to a grate, and down to a needle, and yet here they were with all these advantages with their hands tied behind them, by a parcel of monopolist squires who knew nothing and cared nothing for either them or their interests. (Cheers.) It was true, however, that they had even amongst themselves people who stood by the Corn Law, and why? Because it was termed a party question. There would be just as much sense in maintaining the old system in astronomy, that the sun goes round the world, and not the world round the sun, because Newton, Copernicus, and Laplace made it a party question, as making the repeal of the Corn Law a party question. He could only compare it to an absurdity which occurred in their own House of Commons. A discussion took place upon the subject of lighting the house. Some hon. members maintained the superiority of the Bude light, and others contended for a different mode of illumination. However, at length a division occurred, and strange to say, the Tories walked out at one door, and the Whigs at another. It was a party question. (Laughter and cheers.) Mr. Cobden concluded by saying, they knew the object of the League. Too many kind things had been said of himself and his friends. They had certainly done what they could; but the League would be entirely powerless unless supported by such gentlemen as those by whom he was then surrounded. But the question was not, as stated by their opponents, whether the League was good or bad, but whether the Corn Law was good or bad. (Cheers.) Really, as a farmer's son, he was ashamed to see how the farmers throughout the country were bamboozled on this point; he confessed he was ashamed of his order. (Cheers.) It was not the League, but the Corn Law, which was on its trial. (Cheers.) They might say that what Cobden now said was inconsistent with what he said in 1840; but he repeated it was not Cobden or the League, but the Corn Law, which was on its trial. (Cheers.) Now, he would advise the farmers present, if at any future meeting of the landlords they heard the speakers begin to abuse Cobden, to interrupt them by saying, "Please tell us how we are benefited by the Corn Laws—that is what we want to know—we want to hear nothing of Cobden." (Cheers and laughter.) He (Mr. Cobden) cared little for the abuse heaped upon him. Such scolding as generally proceeded from the squires was, indeed, entirely unworthy of the tea-table of a ladies' boarding-school. The squires, on these occasions, were the laughing-stocks of the whole kingdom. (The hon. gentleman concluded a long speech amidst vociferous cheering.)

Mr. MOORE detailed the progress of the League, its labours, and successful operations; after which he appealed to the meeting for support, and was responded to by a splendid subscription of nearly £800, including £150 from Messrs. Villiers and Thornely.

Colonel THOMPSON, who arrived late, addressed the meeting; after which thanks were given to the chairman, and the meeting separated in the most orderly manner.

BRISTOL.

GREAT ANTI-CORN-LAW TEA MEETING.

Another of these splendid demonstrations of public feeling took place last evening at the Public Rooms, in Broadmead. The meeting was announced for six o'clock, the doors to open at five; and by the first named hour every seat in the spacious building was occupied, a large portion of the company being ladies. The meeting was presided over by that consistent friend to Free Trade, and ornament of his order, Earl Ducie, who took the chair at a few minutes after six. The deputation consisted of R. Cobden, Esq., M.P.; W. J. Fox, Esq.; and R. R. Moore, Esq. It was expected that J. Bright, Esq., would have been present, but he was unable to attend from a reason subsequently explained. It was also anticipated that G. Thompson, Esq., would have accompanied the other distinguished visitors, but he was unavoidably prevented from fulfilling his intention. On the platform were the principal gentlemen of this city friendly to the cause of Free Trade.

Tea was served with the order and alacrity which has always characterised their proceedings; and the refreshing beverage, together with its more substantial accompaniments, having been discussed, the company addressed themselves to the intellectual treat about to be set before them.

The noble CHAIRMAN rose, and was received with loud and long-repeated cheering. Silence having at length been procured, he said:—Ladies and gentlemen—and I am very glad that I have to say "ladies," as well as "gentlemen," for on previous occasions upon which I have attended meetings on this subject we have generally been deprived of the presence of the fair sex. (Hear.) In opening the business of the meeting, or I should, perhaps, rather say the consequences of that business, for its being advertised as a "tea meeting," I should say the tea was the great business,—well, ladies and gentlemen, that part of the business being over, I hope that the ladies will go home feeling that both the bread and the sugar should be looked after. (Applause.) Although we are met to-night on behalf of the Anti-Corn-Law League, so also are we here as friends to the general question of Free Trade. (Hear.) And I call upon all, and I call upon the ladies in particular, to urge that question on all over whom they have any influence. (Cheers.) In the few observations I shall address to you this evening, I shall be extremely brief, and that for several reasons. In the first place I am extremely anxious that you should hear the talented gentlemen who are coming here as a deputation from the League (cheers) with ears unwearied. I am desirous not to fatigue you by my arguments in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws, that you may hear untired the addresses of Mr. Fox and of his friends Mr. Cobden and Mr. Moore. (Cheers.) Another reason why I shall be short is, that upon a question so much used, and which has been so widely and continuously discussed, I feel unable to give to the subject that novelty which would be required to amuse and instruct you. It requires all the talents of such men as Fox, and Cobden, and Bright—talents rendered more illustrious by their perseverance, their integrity, and their zeal—to give to this question novelty and interest; and even they, I am confident, feel a difficulty, with all their talents, to bring forward fresh arguments in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws, or amuse and improve such an assembly as this. There is, too, another reason which will prevent my using many words—it is this:—If I belong to any class—except that in which I have been placed by the unmerited circumstance of birth—I belong to the cultivators of the soil. (Applause.) The farmers hitherto have not shown any great degree of common sense, they have not manifested much knowledge of the subject, and have not shown any very clear perception of their own interests. I shall, therefore, be very brief. Ladies and gentlemen, the gentlemen who will address you this evening, as well as myself, will do so as members of that much vituperated body the Anti-Corn-Law League—(hear)—and our object in coming forward to-day is to ask you to become members of that body, and to aid it with your purse and your person. (Applause.) We are not afraid, nor ashamed, of asking you to join that body, although we know that there is no word so bad that has not been applied to it, and there is no mischief which can be done which it is not said the League will do. (Hear.) We are told, ladies and gentlemen, that its days are numbered—(a laugh)—that we have aroused the British lion. (Laughter.) I hope that we have aroused something better—that we have aroused that which will be found far more powerful to do good—far more powerful to advance the good of the country. I hope that we have aroused the common sense of the nation. That it is which we have aroused, and the common sense of the country when once awakened will be found more potent to do good than any other power which we could call into action. (Cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, the Anti-Corn-Law League would deserve your best thanks and support, even were they on the subject of the repeal of the Corn Laws mistaken in their views. If it should be found that the great advantages we expect to flow from a repeal of the Corn Laws should not be realised—if the benefits which we anticipate as the results of their abolition should not come—still I say the Anti-Corn-Law League has rendered services which will entitle it to the best thanks of the nation, for it has brought the masses of the people to think, to reason, and I trust to act, for themselves. (Cheers.) I remember, in past days, when I was a candidate for the other House, that when I canvassed the electors I always met with one of two answers—it was either, "Oh! I must look to my own interests," or else it was, "I have always voted blue or yellow, and I intend to stick to my colours." (Laughter.) Since then the Anti-Corn-Law League has induced the masses of the people of this country to consider and reason on the things that are passing in the world; and I say, that through thus having so agitated and invited them to think for themselves, and to use their own minds, that hereafter, when any person shall canvass them for their votes, in whatever part of the country it may be, the answer which the people of England will give will be more suited to common sense, and they will say that they will be guided in all things in accordance with common sense. (Cheers.) We have been told by our opponents, that supposing the Corn Laws were repealed, the land would go out of cultivation. (Hear.) Now, I don't think greater nonsense was ever talked. Ever since the peace, the price of corn has been gradually reduced, while the cultivation of the soil has been gradually extended; but, as far as my experience goes, I do not know that rents have been reduced. (Hear.) I am not aware that such has been the fact; if anything there has been a contrary tendency; rents have inclined to rise. (Cheers.) The repeal of the Corn Laws might have the effect of putting a stop to the practice of persons, without adequate capital, taking to very large farms, and that I cannot consider any injury: at present, from the gambling nature of the business, such parties are tempted to put into the lottery, and the consequence is that the land is not properly cultivated, and they themselves are ruined. (Hear.) If farmers with a small capital were by a repeal of the Corn Laws induced to take smaller farms, farms to which their capital is adapted, I believe the result would be a much better cultivation, and I refer you as a proof to the farms, generally small, in the vicinity of large towns. Call to mind the spots of many such a farmer who has little else than his own labour to depend on,—a man holding but few acres,—and compare the state of it with that of some other man who holds a large tract of land—you may see such instances in the neighbourhood of your own town—and then say who has been first in the race of improvement? The man who holds the larger or the man who is possessed of the smaller? (Hear.) We are further told that, if the Corn Laws were repealed, the land could not be cultivated even rent free. (Hear, hear.) When I heard this, I took the trouble to look into my own farming accounts, to see what proportion rents and parochial taxes bore to the other expenses of producing corn. I found that the rent and taxes amounted now to one-third of the expense of producing a bushel of wheat. Now, if the price of corn will fall with the repeal of the Corn Laws, why, certainly, the expenses of production will fall with it. (Hear, hear.) Take simply the question of seed-corn and horse-labour. Horses will become cheaper, and, as their food would be cheaper also, they would be kept at a much less expense. Thus there are two grand expenses lessened in the cost of production. But these are not the only items of expenditure which would be reduced; the reduction would not stop there; many other things could be mentioned, I need only state the parochial taxes. (Hear.) Supposing these reductions to take place, the rent and taxes would then be in a proportion of two-fifths to all the other expenses. In speaking about rents, I quote from my own books, which tell that all the charges on my land are paid. (Hear, hear.) I am satisfied that wheat could be grown in this country at a lower price than the average of the last 10 years in Jersey (which is generally taken as the criterion), and yet pay a fair rent to the landlord, and give a remunerating profit to the farmer. I am supposing, of course, that the landlords would meet their tenants fairly, and give them leases long enough to enable them to make the necessary improvements—(cheers)—and expend their capital with advantage to themselves. I have already trespassed too long on your attention, but just before I began to address you my friend Mr. Hunt made some few remarks to me on the subject, and I could not resist the temptation of making an observation on it. I will now conclude by simply saying that I hope and trust that you, ladies and gentlemen, before you leave this place, will add both your mites and names to the League. I now beg to introduce to your notice W. J. Fox, Esq. (Great cheering.)

W. J. Fox, Esq., on rising, was received with the loudest acclamations. He said:—My Lord Ducie, in opening this meeting, has (if I may be allowed on the part of this meeting, as well as on mine own, to say so) greatly underrated his own powers as an advocate in this great cause. (Cheers.) I, for one, have been exceedingly interested and instructed by the exposition which he has just given us. I am instructed by it as coming from such an authority; as being the testimony of a noble landowner whose charges are all paid, and one, therefore, which bears down the whole mass of testimony from landowners whose charges are not paid, who are only the nominal proprietors of the broad acres over which they profess to have the mastery, who have to meet the difficulties of mortgages and marriage settlements (hear), and who tax the country to enable themselves to meet those difficulties. (Hear.) But it is not only the testimony of the noble lord which is valuable: his arguments are so in an equal degree. With the economical part of the question he has fairly grappled. He has taken that part of the Anti-Corn-Law League's reasoning where it was supposed to be the weakest, and he has shown its power and strength. He has touched on the most important part of the whole subject. He has shown the substantial good which the League has effected; that good which will endure when the Corn Laws are matter of history; that good which is beyond all economical good; that good which springs from arousing the mind of the country, calling forth its spirit and independence, without which prosperity itself is a mere transitory enjoyment, and without which freedom is only an empty name. Mr. Fox having pointed out with his usual felicity of diction the benefits which the League agitation had already conferred on the country, in having taught the people to think, in the diffusion of information, and in calling into activity their energies, principles, and patriotism. He contended that if there was anything more extraordinary than this agitation it was that the necessity for it should exist. Why was it necessary that they should leave their homes, and hold meetings? Why all this toil and sacrifice and outlay for a matter so plain and simple as the right of the tradesman to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market,—for the right of the labourer to exchange the produce of his toil for the bread he had fairly earned? They were compelled to agitate,—they were driven to it; and if the Duke of Richmond thought the country should not be troubled with agitation, let him suffer justice to be done. Mr. Fox next ably replied to some strictures of the Times upon the League; and having spoken at considerable length on various branches of the question, concluded as follows:—In every view, direct or indirect, which can be taken, the Anti-Corn-Law League is entitled to your support. It is so entitled for having brought into exercise the intelligence and intellect of the country; for having taught to listening thousands the lessons of truth, of knowledge, and of science; for having placed the advocacy of its principles on the broadest basis, and for having pursued as its policy the plan marked out by Providence itself, which has given to the different regions of the earth different products, that the necessities of the one might be furnished from the superfluities of the other. (Cheers.) We appeal to you as the grand jury of the electors of the country, and ask at your hands a verdict in favour of that body by whom so much has been already achieved, and by whose ultimate success thousands of other blessings will be procured. For these reasons I hold that the League is worthy of all support, is worthy not only of your best wishes, but of your most earnest and unceasing aid. If, as the wise man said, there is a time for everything,—a time to be silent and a time to speak,—then the time to speak is whilst we have health and strength and life; the time to be silent is only when we lie unconscious in the grave. (Loud and long-continued cheering greeted the speaker on his resuming his seat.)

The CHAIRMAN then said:—I have now to introduce to you our tried and valued friend, Richard Cobden, Esq. (Loud cheers.)

R. COBDEN, Esq., on rising, was received with rapturous applause. We give the honourable member's very happy remarks on Mr. Cayley's pamphlet recently issued by the Protection to Agriculture Society:—I just now put into the Chairman's hands a little pamphlet which I purchased just before I left London, and which is quite a curiosity in its way. It is the first tract of the Protection to Agriculture Society, written by Mr. Cayley, member for the North Riding of Yorkshire, giving reasons for such protection. A man should be cautious in not giving reasons until they are called for, and then he should be careful in seeing what reasons he gives, and whether they may not furnish pegs for an opponent to hang his arguments on. Now, I must say, I don't think Mr. Cayley has been very successful in this instance. Of the twenty-four pages, of which the pamphlet consists, there is only one page and a half about farmers; not a word how they have been benefited by the Corn Laws; nor, as their pockets have been nearly emptied by the operation of those laws, any instruction where they are to find money to fill them. I have before had occasion to remark how the arguments of the Monopolists are generally couched in the future tense—it is always with them, "may," "might," "could," "would," or "should." I will read you a specimen from the pamphlet in my hands:—"With many of the advantages, however, of a home trade, a system of Free Trade would at once interfere. Especially would it interfere to endanger the interests of that great variety of occupations among the handicrafts of a country, which, in the aggregate, form a nation's surest source of employment. Because the probable (laughter) result of a real Free Trade would be that all, or most of the smaller occupations, which a protected home trade affords to a people, after a short competition, would (cheers) be absorbed and distributed among those countries which had no great manufacture. Each of these countries would then apply its undivided powers to produce some small article of trade, whilst such countries as were favoured by nature for some manufacture, might in the end possess the monopoly of supplying the produce of that manufacture to the rest of the world. The countries which in this deadly strife would be the most favoured, and in the long run would possess a monopoly, would be those which at the same time grew the raw material, and possessed coal and iron in that near neighbourhood necessary to its cheap manufacture." (Shouts of laughter accompanied and followed the reading of this extract, from the humorous emphasis laid by Mr. Cobden on the repeated contingents.) I have somewhere read (continued the hon. member) that Mahomet in his youth asked his mother what profession he should follow. She advised him to turn prophet. But if the prophecy should fail (rejoined he), what would the learned say? Oh! (she replied) if you can carry the ignorant with you, you needn't fear the learned, for they are but few. (Cheers and laughter.) She knew the secret how to sway the minds of the ignorant, and to make them fear and tremble, is to prophesy terrible things. Mr. Cayley has taken similar counsel; he works on the ignorance of the farmers by dealing in awful prognostics. (Renewed laughter.) But in this book he takes up still safer ground—he adopts the subjunctive mood—the prophecy, hypothetical. (Laughter.) I will read you a passage more ingenious than the other, for it begins with an "if." "If" is a great peacemaker, Shakspeare says. (Loud laughter.) "If the natural tendency of Free Trade must be, in the long run, to encourage, more or less, in each nation one great absorbing species of industry, to which all the energies, both of the mind and the body, of a nation would be exclusively applied; then, if each country had its fair share of work allotted to it in the scramble for custom, oftentimes on one manufacture alone might a whole people be dependent for employment. At the present day, in Great Britain, we may suppose that the cotton manufacture might temporarily occupy such a position, if other countries would allow it. Still, if even sixfold the present population employed in the cotton manufacture could, in exchange for foreign corn under an entire Free Trade, find work in cotton factories, there would only be employed a sixth part of our whole population; whilst the rest of the industry of the country might all be paralysed. But let us suppose such a state of things in real operation: what might be the result? Professor M'Culloch tells us: 'Some day, on a sudden, foreign countries might cease to take our cotton manufactures, at a time when we were depending for our daily supply of bread from our foreign customers.' With what commodity could we then buy bread corn, when our cotton, our only money, was refused? If our cotton could not then be sold, in what state would our population then be placed? In one of absolute starvation! For, under this perfectly Free Trade, our growth of corn at home would be so diminished as to afford only, perhaps, half a supply for the whole people. But even supposing other nations would continue their demand for our cotton," &c. &c. &c. [This extract, like the other, gave rise to continued merriment.] This reminds me (continued Mr. Cobden) of an answer given by Saddletruss, a great metaphysical disputant, in the "Heart of Mid-Lothian," when brought to a hard fix by his opponent in argument—"Can you contradict that?"—"Na, na, but I'm not going to admit it." (Shouts of laughter.) I will now hand the pamphlet over to the gentlemen with nimble fingers below me, that they may verify the extracts I have read, that I may not be thought guilty of libelling such a respectable body, which numbers amongst its officers five dukes, as many earls and lords, and half-a-dozen members of Parliament, and who, after racking their brains with months of painful cogitation, have put forth as their first publication, a pamphlet which, with its "reasons" for protection, rivals Tom Thumb's ministerial exposition. "As near as I can guess, I can't tell." (Laughter.) I think my friend Hunt [alluding to Mr. Hunt, tenant-farmer, who spoke at the recent Gloucester county meeting, and subsequently in Covent-garden Theatre, and who was present on the platform in the earlier part of the evening] and others are quite safe whilst in the company of such people. (Laughter.) It would be rather humiliating for a fine lusty fellow as he is to seek for the protection of Mr. Cayley, who is a very humane man, and quite as harmless in his person as in his arguments (laughter); but any one who saw him walking across the floor of the house would hardly think him the man to protect our friend Hunt. I wonder the farmers are not ashamed to seek protection. I would scorn to let any one protect me, though I am not so stout as the great brawny fellows, with faces like the rising sun, and with shoulders capable of bearing a quarter of a ton, who are dragged out by these societies as seeking protection. Protection is only wanted for superannuated persons, and young children of three or four years old, and those protectors are generally called nurses. (Loud laughter and cheers.) They tell us 7-9ths of the population are farmers or dependent on farmers, and yet they tell us they want protection! Who is to protect them;—and from whom? From an American, a Pole, or a Russian? Surely not, according to their own representations, the poor and sickly manufacturers who form only 2-9ths of the numbers, and possess but 1-20th of the capital, of the kingdom. (Cheers and laughter.) I am glad to find our noble chairman repeating his efforts to put down a system injurious to the landowner and to the tenant-farmer, as well as to every other class. I regret that I had no opportunity of summoning him to give evidence before the committee of the House of Commons, for which I moved. (Loud cheers.) If it had been allowed me to bring forward evidence I should have produced such an array as must have carried conviction even to the Duke of Buckingham himself. Out of the mouths of farmers and landowners would I have condemned them. But now you will allow me to say that we have met for business. I have brought you down from the height of Mr. Fox's eloquence to the proper level for proceeding with it. I will leave to Mr. Moore to explain what we have done, and are doing, with the money; but there is one other point to which I wish to advert. We have lately been taking part in some election contests, which, from not having turned out favourable, our friends may deem discouraging. I wish to disabuse your minds of an impression which may be the natural result of defeat in elections as you have seen them conducted. When we hear of an approaching election in a borough where there is no chance of winning, we transfer our lecturers and our tracts just at the moment when the people are most anxious to learn,—when public interest is concentrated on the question. We do not spend money in bribing, or coaching, or treating, as you may have seen done, but we go to prevent these things being done by others. (Cheers.) And wherever we are invited, wherever there are 50 or 100 sincere friends of the cause, thither will we go, and although for the time the result may be disastrous, we feel assured we have laid the foundation of future triumph. (Loud cheers.) I will now leave you in the hands of Mr. Moore, and thank you cordially for the patience with which you have listened to my thrice-told tale. (The hon. member resumed his seat amidst enthusiastic applause.)

The Noble CHAIRMAN then called on R. R. R. MOORE, Esq., who, on rising, was received with much cheering. He said:—Ladies and gentlemen, I have, as usual, here as elsewhere, but little to do in making speeches. You have so often heard this question urged here, and you have had it laid before you with so much power and ability to-night, that I think you are ready to subscribe your portion to the £100,000 fund. (Hear.) I confess that it is not a task of which I am particularly fond, that of being continually asking people for subscriptions for the League. But it so happens that it almost always falls to my lot to be the collector and announcer of the contributions at every meeting; I believe, however, that in any other cause but that of Free Trade I should not take that position. And I feel I am not here to ask you for your subscriptions, for I know that you will give them freely, and with a good will; but I am here to announce what you take the opportunity of giving to the League; and I am sure that it would be a matter of regret to you if that opportunity were not afforded to you. Mr. Moore then gave a lucid and forcible statement of the past proceedings of the League, and concluded with an eloquent appeal to the meeting to sustain it by their subscriptions. He then proceeded to announce the collection made in the room, slips of paper having been previously handed round for individuals to fill up with whatever sums they thought fit. Previously to announcing the following, he said, their noble Chairman had already given in his subscription, and was a constant annual subscriber. Amongst the sums announced were—E. Thomas, 100l. (loud cheers); G. Thomas, 100l.—(loud cheers); J. Eaton, 50l.—(loud cheers); W. Tothill, 50l. (loud cheers). It is not necessary to repeat the applause which followed the announcement of almost every sum, large or small. J. Charleston, 25l.; W. Willis, 20l.; Thomas, Fripp, and Co., 10l.; Lang and Sons, 10l.; a Friend, 10l.; E. Kidd, 20l.; S. P. J., 10l.; C. Tothill and Co., 15l.; D. Wheeler, 10l.; R. Bruce, 5l.; G. Tovey, 5l.; J. Eyre, 5l.; T. and H. J. Mills, 5l.; W. H. Somerton, 5l.; J. Hale, 5l.; Stephens, Brothers, 5l.; H. Viger, 101.; a Friend, per S. P. Jackson, 51.; Z. Fry, 51.; Summers Harford, 51.; W. Fry, Banwell, 51.; George Jones, 51.; P. D. Tuckett, 51. "per annum till Free Trade is obtained," J. Wetherman, 31.; H. E., 21.; J. G., 21. 2s.; E. Hunt, 11. 1s.; Mary Hunt, 11. 1s.; T. Rankin, 21. 2s.; W. H. Castle, 21.; T. Davies, 21.; A. Tunstall, 21. 2s.; J. W. Cash, 21. 2s.; a Friend, 21. 2s.; E. Halsall, 21.; R. M. Ring, 21.; J. Prowse, 21.; Rev. J. Burder, 31. 3s.; L. Jackson, 11. 1s.; H. S. Nash, 11. 1s.; T. Woodhall, 11. 1s.; J. R. Joy, 11. 10s.; J. Randle, E. Humpage, J. Mensies, C. Price, C. Price, jun., Rev. G. Annasley, J. Davis, F. Ashton, Foster, J. Whorast, S. Brett, J. Brayley, W. Hedges, Sales and Solomon, Rev. G. Armstrong, W. Knowles, Mrs. Knowles, Miss Knowles, T. Warren, A. Warren, J. Cox, J. H. Allis, W. Wood, H. Jennings, S. Stokes, T. Bale, W. Butler, Robert Ellis, H. Lee, J. W. Newcombe, T. Bromhead, W. H. Terrell, F. Terrell, J. Rider, W. Pollard, 11. each. There was also an infinity of sums from 11. down to 6d. In announcing particular sums Mr. Moore kept the audience in a continued roar by a quaint commentary on any peculiar signature adopted. Amongst some of these were—"A contribution towards mowing the grass on Bristol Quays." "Ah! (said Mr. M.) I hope some persons will get ships into your docks and out of them."—"A voice from Agraman's empty warehouses;" "The ghost of the Great Britain going to Liverpool;" "One who thinks Brazilian sugar will not poison colonial coffee." One contribution accompanied with half-a-dozen lines of very passable poetry. "That (said Mr. M.) I call Rhyme and Reason." A subscription being signed "Where's Bright?" Mr. Moore said—"I'll tell you; he has been working so hard that he has almost lost his voice, and if he attended too many meetings there would be a chance of his losing it altogether. As there is a meeting at Liverpool on Friday, he was unable to attend both." "A testimonial to Rowland Hill" called forth a warm eulogium on that gentleman. "The Penny Postage (said Mr. M.) enables us to carry on our correspondence, and the distribution of our publications, to an extent that we could not have done without. I hope Mr. Rowland Hill will be supported, loved, and cherished as one of the greatest benefactors the human race ever had." (Loud cheers.)

The total amount subscribed in the room was £624 1s. 10d., made up before the close of the proceedings to £630.

G. THOMAS, Esq., said he would not trespass on their time beyond reading the resolution he held in his hand:—"That this meeting, in thanking the members of the deputation for the readiness with which they acceded to the invitation to be present on this occasion, and for the high gratification which their addresses have afforded, pledges itself in proof of its sincerity to co-operate with the League in the peaceful agitation of the great question of Free Trade, until its principles are fully incorporated with the law of the land." He thought, from what Mr. Moore had stated, there were certain gentlemen who had taken up and persevered in the cause to a degree to injure their health. Mr. Bright was suffering from his exertions, and he hoped the young men of the city would come forward, and not let the burden rest on a few shoulders.

G. GOLDNEY, Esq., seconded the motion, which was put and carried amidst reiterated acclamations.

R. COBDEN, Esq., returned thanks on behalf of his colleagues and himself, who would feel fortified in their future course by the cordial manner in which they had been received. (Cheers.)

Earl Ducie having vacated the chair, it was taken by G. Thomas, Esq., when

H. VINCER, Esq., said he had much pleasure in moving the following resolution, which he was sure would meet with their unanimous concurrence:—"That this meeting desires most earnestly and cordially to express the sense which it entertains of that patriotic feeling which has induced the Right Hon. the Earl of Ducie to honour these proceedings by presiding over them; and, in recording its thanks for his lordship's kindness, this meeting begs to assure him of its entire conviction that the honour of the peerage, and the prosperity of the people, are best supported and served by that interchange of good feeling and mutual respect which his lordship has over so nobly and consistently encouraged."

G. E. SANDRUS, Esq., seconded the resolution, which on being put,

Mr. COBDEN said, "Let me see if the men of Bristol know how to cheer. I'll be the fagman." The hon. member accordingly led off the cheering, which was of a deafening description, accompanied by waving of hats, &c.

Earl Ducie, on rising, was received with renewed applause. He said—"In returning thanks for the honour you have done me in passing this resolution, I have but one remark to make. In that resolution you refer to the best possible terms between the people and the peerage. It is impossible they can work together for the good of the community if one class is sacrificed to another. (Loud and continued cheers.) If you wish all to go on for the good of all, continue as you have done to-night, in support of the Anti-Corn Law League. (Renewed applause.)

Three rounds of tremendous cheering were given in succession for Messrs. Cobden, Fox, Bright, and Moore, followed by three others for Free Trade; and the meeting separated, close upon eleven o'clock, highly delighted with the evening's proceedings.—Bristol Mercury.

NEW MILLS.

A deputation from the Anti-Corn-Law League, consisting of John Bright, Esq., M.P., Mr. W. Rawson, and Mr. A. Prentice, attended at New Mills on Monday evening last; and, in one of the rooms of Mr. Schofield's new factory, addressed an assemblage of from 600 to 800 persons. Thomas Gisborne, Esq., M.P. for Nottingham, was unanimously called upon to preside.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the business of the meeting, expressed the pleasure he felt in presiding on that occasion, especially at witnessing the interest they took in a subject with which the welfare of all classes was intimately connected. He proceeded to commend the exertions made by the Anti-Corn-Law League, who, he said, would take care of the food of the people, and let all have plenty; and concluded a speech which was received by general cheering, by introducing Mr. Prentice to the meeting.

Mr. PRENTICE said, the question of the Corn Laws was now so simplified that any one could understand it. The world could produce a hundred times more than it did now, so that all our people might have enough, but for the absurdity of man's legislation. He (Mr. Prentice) always thought of Smithy Door, when he came into that district; for there, on a fine June morning, they would see the whole question illustrated at once. On the one side the market was filled with vegetables and fruit from Cheshire, and all the places westward of the county; and, on the other side, carts from Ashton, Bury, Rochdale, which had come laden with cotton goods, and which took back loads of the vegetables of Cheshire. There was the principle of perfect freedom of trade carried out. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Prentice afterwards alluded to the fallacy of the notion of our being independent of foreigners; and, after a general enunciation of the principles of the League, he proceeded to show the manner in which it was proposed to make them operate on the country, and concluded amid loud cheers.

Mr. BRIGHT was then introduced by the chairman, and commenced by explaining the object of the deputation, which was to convince those who were not already convinced, and to confirm others, that, in opposing the present restrictive policy, they were advocating a principle which must tend to the good of all classes of the country. Mr. Bright afterwards alluded to the sugar question, and also to the common notion that machinery was the cause of all our distress, and concluded by remarking that, in advocating the great question of Free Trade, they were merely desirous of doing justly to all, and of carrying out the fiat of God, "in the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread."

Mr. JOHN KERSHAW, of Hurst, and Mr. JOHN YATES, of New Mills, afterwards addressed the meeting; and a vote of thanks to the deputation was proposed by Mr. JOHN CAIRNS.

The following subscriptions were afterwards handed up, and read by the Chairman: T. Lloyd, Esq., £30; John and Charles Yates, £25; J. Walsh, Furness, £10; T. Gisborne, Esq., M.P., £10; T. Waller, Mellor, £5.

To give £1 my heart is willing;
But niggard pocket cries a shilling.
I've lost, heart cries, without dejection,
I'll vote trade's freedom next election! Enclosed 1s.

Mr. YATES came forward and said, that he believed the subscriptions then amounted to £95; but he had said they could raise £100 before the meeting began, and therefore in order to make good that sum, and to stick to his word, he would give the odd £5. (Cheers.)

A vote of thanks was afterwards passed to the Chairman, and the meeting then separated.—Manchester Guardian.

STOKESLEY.—On Tuesday evening last, a meeting of the friends of Free Trade was held at Stokesley, in Cleveland, the centre of an agricultural district. As all the usual places of meeting in the town were refused to be lent for the purpose, and having no Free-Trade Hall, as in Manchester, in which to expound our views, we were obliged to put up with such accommodation as was to be had. In Stokesley the very rooms commonly used on these occasions are a monopoly. The old proverb says—"When there's a will there's always a way;" and the meeting was not to be prevented for want of a proper place in which to assemble. A large building was obtained, formerly used as a dye-house. With the exception of the distribution of the League publications, and the humble but persevering advocacy of the Stokesley News, no steps had been taken to crush the hydra in this stronghold of monopoly. At seven o'clock in the evening the room began to fill, and a few minutes after Mr. Plint, of Leeds, attended by Mr. George Twedell, editor of the Stokesley News and Cleveland Reporter, entered the building. It was then proposed, seconded, and carried unanimously, that Mr. Twedell take the chair. The chairman having stated the object of the meeting, introduced Mr. T. Plint of Leeds, one of the deputation of the National Anti-Corn-Law League. Mr. Plint rose and delivered an excellent address, characterised throughout by sound argument and research. During Mr. Plint's address Colonel Thompson entered the room, and was received with loud and long-continued cheering. The chairman then introduced Colonel Thompson, who, on rising, was received with loud cheers. He delivered a humorous speech, full of pungent illustrations. His appeal to the working classes was powerful, and will not soon be forgotten. At the conclusion of the gallant colonel's address, some interruption was attempted by a few of the O'Connorites, but was instantly suppressed by the working men in the body of the meeting, who promptly supported the chairman in the discharge of his duty. A vote of thanks was then given to Col. Thompson and Mr. Plint, with three cheers, after which the meeting separated.

SUNDERLAND.—On Monday evening, the 1st instant, a meeting of the inhabitants of this town was held in the Athenæum, for the purpose of hearing addresses by Colonel Thompson, and Thomas Plint, Esq., of Leeds, a deputation from the League. The attendance was not so numerous as usual—the reason being, no doubt, a charge of 3d. admission to the gallery, and 1d. to the body of the hall. On the platform was Mr. Dickenson, a Chartist of the O'Connor school (who has recently taken up his abode here), and in the room were several working men who appear to hold the same sentiments. On the motion of D. Jonassohn, Esq., the chair was taken by Joshua Wilson, Esq., the head of the largest mercantile firm in the town. After Colonel Thompson and Mr. Plint had addressed the meeting in their usually effective style, Mr. Dickenson made a long speech, in which he avowed himself a Free-Trader, though he opposed the League; but he was supported by a very small number of persons. Mr. Jonassohn moved a vote of thanks to Colonel Thompson and Mr. Plint, for their able and instructive addresses. Half-a-dozen "Whole-hogs" had the good manners and good sense (1) to hold up their hands against Mr. D. Jonassohn's resolution. Colonel Thompson briefly acknowledged the compliment, and the meeting separated at a late hour.—Sunderland Herald.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETINGS.—On Wednesday, the 3rd inst., two meetings were held in the Union-hall, Barnard Castle. In the afternoon the chair was taken by Mr. Jacob Allinson, of Cotharstone; and in the evening by Mr. J. Rogers, of Barnard Castle. The company in the evening was much more numerous than that in the afternoon, for, although it was the market-day, comparatively few farmers were in the town, the weather being so favourable for sowing seed, &c. The addresses, which were given by Thomas Plint, Esq., and by Col. Thompson, a deputation from the League, were such as need no eulogising. They were listened to with deep attention, and met with great applause; all present seeming to be convinced of the soundness of their arguments and the necessity of obtaining a repeal of all monopolies. It was also resolved that an address, signed by as many electors of the township as could be obtained, should be sent to the hon. members for the south division of this county, praying them to support Mr. Villiers's motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws. Thanks were unanimously voted to the gentlemen of the deputation and chairmen.—Leeds Mercury.

WHITBY.—The same deputation attended at this town on Thursday evening, the 4th inst., and addressed the inhabitants in the Temperance Hall. The room was crowded, a considerable number being unable to obtain seats. A majority of the audience consisted of the working classes, of both sexes, with a fair proportion of tradesmen and professional men, and amongst the two latter classes a good many who supported the present monopolist member at the last election. Col. Thompson made one of his happiest speeches, and was enthusiastically cheered throughout his address. Mr. Plint dwelt on the statistics of the question; his statements and reasonings were heard with close attention, and made a strong impression on the meeting. At the conclusion it was announced that in the course of the summer a deputation from the League would hold an open-air meeting in Whitby,—an announcement which gave great satisfaction, and was received with acclamation. Thanks to the deputation were voted with three times three and one cheer more, which were heartily given.

WHEATHAMSTEAD.—PROGRESS OF PUBLIC OPINION.—AN EXAMPLE WORTH FOLLOWING.—On Thursday evening, the 28th ult., a meeting was held at the Swan Inn, Wheathamstead, for the purpose of forming a club, to assist in furthering the objects of the GREAT FACT with which "all Europe rings from side to side." Hemel Hempstead, St. Alban's, Kimpton, and other places sent their quota of supporters of Free Trade, most of whom departed thoroughly convinced of the justice and propriety of the steps taken, and resolved upon instant imitation of them. Mr. Charles Lattimore took the chair, and commenced the business of the evening with a speech of great length and eloquence, doing full justice to the subject, and illustrating it with a variety of details, to which the company listened with deep interest, and which they frequently interrupted by enthusiastic cheers. In the course of his speech, Mr. Lattimore humorously disposed of the cant about landlord-claims to compensation, in case they should be deprived of the "protection" they have extended to themselves, and which means the robbery of all other classes; exposed very felicitously the fallacy of protection; proved that the people themselves were not blameless in this matter; showed forcibly where their power lay, and pointed out the means of applying it. He concluded with a powerful appeal to his hearers, as they valued civil and religious liberty, never to cease striving for commercial freedom—the three blessings being inextricably linked together. Resolutions in accordance with the object of the meeting were proposed, seconded, and carried unanimously. A vote of thanks was passed to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

FREE-TRADE MEETING AT MORPETH.—On Wednesday evening, Mr. Liddell, of Newcastle, delivered a lecture in the Town Hall, Morpeth, on the Corn Law, and the general question of Free Trade. The room was crowded; and at the conclusion of Mr. Liddell's address, Mr. Soulsby, in opposition, showed that high duties are levied upon some articles which are wholly consumed by the aristocracy. A discussion ensued, in which Mr. Proggatt, Mr. Watson, and other gentlemen, took part.—Tyne Mercury.

RENFREWSHIRE FARMERS AND THE CORN LAWS.—From all that we can learn, the requisition for the Renfrewshire Anti-League meeting has been abandoned. The farmers of this county, as we anticipated, have had too much experience of the bad effects of the Corn Laws to run the risk of injuring themselves farther by lending aid for their continuance. By the last accounts that we heard of the Renfrewshire requisition, it had got up the country to Bridge of Weir and its neighbourhood, but, after making all possible inquiry, we have been unable to trace it further; and we presume the unfortunate document has been lost, without getting to Kilmacolm.—Renfrewshire Reformer.

PROVINCIAL PRESS.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN IN AGRICULTURE.—In the course of the discussion which took place on Lord Ashley's amendment on Friday week, Sir Robert Inglis said, "The supporters of the ten hours' proposition had been taunted with the sufferings of the agricultural population. They had been told of English women being kept labouring in the fields during seven or eight hours on a winter day, without the opportunity for change of clothing. He would be glad to hear the county pointed out in which that occurred." We should be glad to know the agricultural county in which it has not occurred. If the right honourable baronet will only take the trouble to refer to a report laid before Parliament last session, on the employment of women and children in agriculture, he will find the following remarks, by Mr. Austin, relative to the female population of Dorset, Devon, Somerset, and Wilts:—"The clothing of women employed in field-labour would appear to be inadequate for their work, but the deficiency is not complained of by them. A change of clothes seems to be out of the question, although necessary not only for cleanliness, but for convenience and saving of time. The upper parts of the under-clothes of women at work, even their stays, quickly become wet through with perspiration, whilst the lower parts cannot escape getting equally wet in nearly every kind of work they are engaged in, except in the driest weather. It not unfrequently happens, that a woman on returning home from work, is obliged to go to bed for an hour or two to allow her clothes to be dried. It is also by no means uncommon for her, if she does not do this, to put them on again the next morning nearly as wet as when she took them off. It does not appear that any ill consequences to the health have been observed to arise from this cause, unless rheumatism be partly attributable to it." Here, then, is a statement as to the condition of female labourers in the agricultural districts, which we would recommend to the special consideration not only of Sir Robert Inglis, but of all those supporters of Lord Ashley who have been so loud in their condemnation of the factory system, on account of the amount of toll to which females employed in mills are said to be subjected. Mr. Austin seems inclined to believe that change of clothes has "no ill consequences to the health."

but there are others who hold a very different opinion. Thus we find from the report of Mr. Deacon on the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, and Lincoln, that, although all his informants (with one exception) agree that out-door labour is "conducive to health," the single witness to the contrary is perhaps more worthy of credit than the whole host of those who differ from him. The Rev. E. J. Howman, rector of Bexwell, in Norfolk, who is said to have paid great attention to the condition of the labouring classes, makes the following statement:—"As far as I have been able to form an opinion, I am satisfied that out-door labour is prejudicial to the health of females; and this opinion has recently received confirmation in the inquiries I have made on the subject amongst my medical friends. There are very few at the age of fifty who are not affected with rheumatism in its various shapes. A young man, who has recently come from town to assist one of our surgeons, was particularly struck with the prevalence of scrofulous complaints amongst the women." Much stress was laid by Lord Ashley and his supporters on the ignorance of domestic duties among the females employed in factories; but this evil, we fear, is one which prevails to quite as great an extent among the female population of Dorsetshire, and other agricultural counties, as it does in the manufacturing districts. In the report to which we have already referred, Mr. Austin, one of the assistant commissioners, states that, "among the women of the agricultural labouring class, ignorance of the commonest things, needlework, cooking, and other matters of domestic economy, is described as nearly universally prevalent. A girl brought up in a cottage until she marries is generally ignorant of nearly everything she ought to be acquainted with, for the comfortable and economical management of a cottage." Mr. Austin remarks that, in consequence of their ignorance of domestic economy, such girls are prevented from getting out to service. We rather fear that, even though they were ever so well trained, it would still be impossible for them all to find situations in the country. The only two modes by which the great mass of them can earn an independent livelihood are in the field or in the factory. Lord Ashley and his followers seem resolved to exclude them from the one mode of occupation; but his lordship obstinately shuts his eyes to the obvious fact that, by so doing, he would, in the first place, render the condition of the female population of Dorsetshire, and other agricultural counties, still more wretched than it is at present.—Manchester Guardian.

AGRICULTURAL PROPHECIES.—A few days ago, the Standard, in calling attention to the account recently published, of the trade and navigation of the United Kingdom for 1843, took occasion to show that the agricultural interest had very little ground for the alarm raised respecting the effect of the new tariff on the importation of agricultural produce. It might have added, that there was no better ground for Sir Robert Peel's statement, that the reduction of the duties on foreign provisions would diminish the cost of living to most people to an extent equal to the amount paid by them as income-tax. If the timid landowners and farmers are to be laughed at for the panic which prevailed among them in consequence of the alteration of the tariff, they have a good right to reply that their apprehensions were warranted by the Premier's own declaration. Were the Standard an honest, independent journal, it might have been expected to warn its readers against placing much reliance on any future predictions of Sir Robert Peel and his agricultural supporters, seeing that they have been so very much at fault in their late calculations. Instead of doing so, however, it endeavours to show, that because the landowners had no sufficient cause to be alarmed about foreign competition, therefore the manufacturers who oppose the Ten Hours' Bill from a very natural fear that such a measure would endanger our foreign trade, are equally mistaken in their apprehensions on that score. Having mentioned a few of the articles of food imported, with a view to show how insignificant the total quantity has been, compared with what the agriculturists anticipated, the Standard makes the following remarks:—"We recommend these facts to the attention of the farmers throughout the country, and more especially to the notice of the editor of the Mark-lane Express, who laboured weekly, with commendable assiduity, nearly all last year, to convince the occupiers of the land that they were irretrievably ruined by the facilities given to foreign competition. If the subject be fairly scanned, without any preconceived opinion or prejudice, it will be found that there is as little ground for the present alarm attempted to be set up, that our manufacturers will be swamped and extinguished by foreign competition if Parliament enforce a Ten Hours' Bill, as that the cultivation of the land would be impossible under the now existing tariff of duties upon imports." "We recommend these facts to the attention of those farmers" who attend Anti-League meetings, where they hear noble landowners asserting, that, were the Corn Laws repealed, half the arable land in the United Kingdom would be thrown out of cultivation. Men who have been mistaken in their predictions regarding the probable operation of the new tariff and sliding scale should be very backward as to what they say about the effects of an abolition of the Corn Laws.—Ibid.

THE "ABSTRACT" FREE TRADERS.—It will be remembered by all the world, that the slippery and sophistical Sir Robert, in imitation of the lawgiver of old, retired from the public gaze, and, in the shady solitude of Drayton Manor, or the official privacy of Downing-street, originated and matured the benevolent design of an Income-tax, and produced that ne plus ultra of the pedlar's art, the alterations in the tariff. It will be further remembered that, when an anxious senate congregated round the man whom Canning has aptly described as the "sublime of mediocrity"—whose lips were never touched by fire from Heaven, nor moved in obedience to the inspiration of genius—he solemnly announced, "that the doctrine of Free Trade was the doctrine of common sense, and that its obvious corollary, to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market, was the undeniable dictate of policy and prudence." Gladstone has stated the same principle, again and again, uque ad nauseam; and any member of the party possessing a single idea having the slightest reference to legislation, has signified his adherence to the truth which (thanks to the League!) has been spread throughout the length and breadth of the land—not fitfully, but copiously and universally, like light itself. It has filled, not the rich man's palace only—it has descended to the lowly cottage. Wherever a little group of humanity has existed, either, like the dew of early morn, has it been attracted and deposited, vivifying into green and vigorous life the long-dormant elements of social usefulness and prosperity. These are no high-flown figures of speech; they but faintly shadow forth the spread of truth, and the extinction of that preference of class which our rulers have hitherto so shamefully exhibited. It is true, no straggling ray of intelligence has penetrated the more than primeval darkness of his Grace of Alnwick's intellect; it is more than probable that such an event is an optical impossibility. The Hon. H. T. Liddell will continue to see, in the grey gloaming, the giant proportions of the Free-Trade spectre. Sir Charles Monck will be for ever affected with incurable jaundice. And (to descend to "meaner things") the moral apothecosis of "honest John" from that dark abyss of infamy in which he has long been cast, "full many a fathom deep," is not seriously to be anticipated. But these dark shadowings do not mar the general effect; this is but discord in harmony. Burke has said, that "obloquy and abuse are essential parts of triumph;" the Roman conqueror forgot not to introduce them into his ovation; and why should the progress of this great question be removed from the operation of ordinary laws? Why should the stupid, the selfish, the depraved, not attempt to return to its source the irresistible stream of enlightenment and truth? But, leaving folly and faction to pursue their course, we seriously ask, what prevents the application of the plain and evident principles which the Ministry have admitted? They have indicated the truth. The mysterious, oracular Sir Robert, in his incubation of the tariff and income-tax, permitted himself to re-hatch the principles of Free Trade. The gallant Premier rushed into the Senate, and exclaimed, "I have found it! I have found it!" You have, Sir Robert, found it, explained it, and laid it down as your rule of faith; and from its inferences there is no escape. Mr. Gladstone may exhaust all the resources and all the graces of a maître d'épée; but he is always bound—he is like one of his former unhappy slaves, dancing in chains. And you, Sir Robert, are perfectly safe in similar toils. And if these principles are announced for any other object than that of deception, why not carry them into operation? Why urge so many specialities? Why hypocritically talk of slavery? Why talk of expediency when this is an inference from unbending principle? Why adopt the Jesuitical and false pretence of alleged necessity, "the tyrant's plea"? Why make eternal, immutable justice dependent on temporary and changeable conditions? Was Christianity taught in this way? Were its holy precepts so constructed that they could be disobeyed at pleasure? Or was the "vested interest" of vice and superstition regarded as sacred? Men of strict integrity, who wear not their principles more loosely and capriciously than their garments, under these circumstances would have exclaimed with the ancient satirist, "Let justice be done on earth, though Heaven itself should perish."—Gateshead Observer.

BRISTOL PRO-CORN-LAW MEETING.—An advertisement appeared last week in the Tory journals of this city, notifying that a meeting "for the purpose of forming an agricultural protection society for Bristol and its environs," would be held on Thursday, the 4th of April, at the White Lion, Broad-street, and calling upon "those friendly to the cause of British agriculture" to attend. We desire the attention of our readers to the particulars of the case. The meeting was regularly advertised; the day fixed upon was the one for holding both the corn and cattle markets; Bristol was swarming with farmers; and yet (tell it not in Gath!) only thirty, or it might be two-and-thirty, individuals "friendly to the cause of British agriculture"—that is, as understood by the getters-up of "protection societies"—could be prevailed upon to make their appearance at the meeting! The failure was signal and complete. One of the parties present attempted to account for the absence of the tillers of the soil. The reason he gave was curious, as illustrating the advantages which practical agriculturists in this locality have derived from "protection." The farmers in Bristol and its environs were too poor to subscribe; but when it should be known how low was the amount of subscription which would be accepted—"the smallest donations thankfully received"—he was sure they would come forward. Perhaps! They may, it is true, make themselves members of this potent society by paying half-a-crown a year. But why should they be guilty of such needless extravagance? Why should the farmers throw away half-a-crown a year? Have they ever benefited half-a-crown a year, or do they ever expect to benefit half-a-crown a year by "protection"? On the contrary, has not "protection" gradually depreciated their capital? Have they not been rented at legislative prices, and have they not had to pay their rents at market prices—a difference of 10s., 20s., and sometimes 30s. per quarter? This is the sort of "protection" which has been extended to them, and they are evidently tired of it. At all events, they do not think it worth half-a-crown a year! Another delusion attempted to be got up by those who wish to let their land for more than its real value is, that the formation of Anti-League societies is a tenant-farmers' movement. Let us analyze the Bristol meeting, and we dare say it will be found a fair specimen of the class. The following were the individuals who took part in the proceedings, as speakers, or as proposers and seconders of resolutions:—John Scandrett Harford, Esq., chairman—landowner; Richard Mullins, Esq.—landowner and farmer; Hugh Vaughan, Esq.—landowner; Colonel MacLaine; Dr. Wallis—doctor of physic; J. Marmont, Esq.—land-surveyor; E. Sampson, Esq.—landowner. A pretty tenant-farmers' meeting, truly! We never see an attempt made to put the tenant-farmers forward for landlord purposes, but it reminds us of Landseer's clever print of "the Cat's Paw," where the cunning monkey is using poor puss's paw in order to get the roasted chestnuts off the hot stove. The farmers in Bristol and its environs, however, seem to have very little inclination to be used as "cat's paws." We think they show their sense by keeping their "half-crowns" in their pockets, and by allowing those exclusively interested in "protection" to subscribe for its maintenance.—Bristol Mercury.

In the year 1834 a public meeting was called in Norfolk to petition upon the subject of agricultural distress. The writer of this article was, at the time, on a visit to the late Earl of Leicester. Their first subject of conversation was this meeting and its cause. He asked the earl's opinion as to both. "I will not answer you to-day," said his lordship, "but I will show you to-morrow." The morning came, and they drove to a principal tenant near the park. They met him in the yard, when the earl gravely said, "That man is the greatest enemy I have on earth."

The good farmer very earnestly inquired what his landlord meant, perceiving that there was some covert design in his attack. "Why I mean," said his lordship, "that you buy all the Wells manure out of my hands." "Ah," said Mr. M., "you do not like me the worse for that." "Perhaps not; but tell me, have you spent £500 or £600 this year in this way?" "Sir, if you will believe me, Sir!" "And do you think the land is the best bank in which you can place your money?" "I do, Sir." "There," said his lordship, "there's agricultural distress for you!" This anecdote, which is related verbatim as it passed, was strongly recalled by the quotation in the "Quarterly Review" of "Lord Stanley's wise and important declaration at Liverpool, in July, 1841, that 'there was no bank in the whole country—no commercial speculation—no investment—so safe, so sure, and profitable as that in which even borrowed capital may be engaged by investing it under the ground.'" It was the universally expressed opinion of this venerable agriculturist above-cited, that "no land was so bad that it would not pay for cultivation."—Sussex Advertiser.

THE LATE ELECTION FOR CHRISTCHURCH.—The vacancy caused by the resignation of Sir George Rose—who took care to have his Tory successor ready for the struggle—took the electors of Christchurch completely by surprise. The addresses of Sir George Rose resigning the honour of his seat, and of Captain Harris soliciting the honour to be elected (they are all honourable men!) adorned the walls of Christchurch on the selfsame night, and revealed the true state of things to the admiring inhabitants on the selfsame morning. The Liberal electors were completely unprepared. They were not alone taken by surprise, and found unprovided either with a candidate, or with the other materials for a successful contest, but they were unprepared upon the great questions and principles on which they were hastily called upon to decide. The Anti-Corn-Law League entered the field in a hurried, and perhaps inconsiderate, manner. The constituency is small, and in the midst of a district purely agricultural—surrounded, and of course much influenced, by that class in the state which Lord Stanley describes as being most sensitive and fearful of change and innovation. The candidate put forward by the League at last, almost openly avowed that he came forward not with any sanguine hopes of success, under such untoward circumstances, but in order to enable every independent elector to register his vote, and in fact to make a beginning. Accordingly a beginning has been made, which has only to be properly followed up. There is to be found in Christchurch a band of independent electors, which must be extended and increased. Although not possessed of much commercial enterprise, or directly engaged in extensive trade, there is enough of intelligence to be taught the lessons of true commercial principles, and to learn wherein the true greatness and prosperity of the whole empire, and of every class therein, must eventually be centered. The Anti-Corn-Law League has entered Christchurch. It should pursue its operations there as it did at Salisbury, undaunted by the first sudden repulse. It should register electors—found an association—lecture and instruct the people—disseminate its useful publications—and in every way enlighten and prepare the public mind for future struggles against monopoly of all sorts—whether in the food or in the representation of the people. It cannot be that the independent electors of Christchurch will always allow themselves to be handed over, tied neck and heels, from one powerful family to another—made the mere stepping-stones to promotion, and to enable lazy sinecurists to pocket more and more of the people's money. The electors of Christchurch, as well as of other places, must be prepared for that awakening of popular opinion, which is sure to follow the present lethargy of the public mind.—Hampshire Independent.

HASTINGS ELECTION.—We are neither surprised nor disappointed that the Hastings election should have terminated in the return of Mr. Briscoe. No one at all acquainted with the history of the contests in that borough could contemplate any other result at present. A constituency demoralized by continual bribery, and of whom no mean portion have been habitually taught to look upon candidates for representation merely as candidates to be plucked, pulled at, and plundered,—such a constituency could be hardly expected, on a first application of principles instead of purses, to be sufficiently purged from the old leaven, to have sufficiently overcome the effects of former demoralization, to welcome a candidate who came forward upon principles so entirely opposed to the past predilections of the men he addressed, and so utterly subversive of all hope of future plunder, as those upon which Mr. Moore took his proud stand upon this occasion. We are therefore, we repeat, not surprised at Mr. Briscoe's return, but we are surprised that, out of such a constituency, so large a number as 174 men should have been found to record their votes under circumstances of the greatest discouragement, in the teeth of widely-extended and powerfully-exerted local and personal influence, and in spite of that prejudice which must attend a League candidate in such a town as Hastings. We say again, we are surprised that so large a number should have been found to record their votes for a stranger, who came in avowed and open hostility to the "good old system," and whose sole influence resided in the truth of the cause he espoused, and in the force, earnestness, and ability with which he advocated its principles. Such a defeat is no discouragement, but is, in fact, a great moral victory. It is the herald of future triumph—of the triumph of principle, and the downfall of those foul practices which have delivered over the constituencies of England to venal and self-abandoned thralldom, converted the representatives of the people into the wolves of the flock, and perverted one of the noblest gifts of the constitution into one of its darkest, deepest, and most pernicious curses. But the good seed has been sown, and we look with confidence for its vigorous growth, spite of the tares among which it may peradventure have fallen.—Sussex Advertiser.

The truth is, that the voting in Hastings is an anomaly and a puzzle, and has ever been, to every politician that has yet attempted to comprehend it; and Mr. Moore coming late into the field against such tremendous odds, as would have deterred any but so dauntless a champion of an oppressed and starving people, has done wonders indeed, in the strong footing he has gained in the borough, the improved political morality he has engendered, and the lesson he has taught the corruptionists, that seats in Parliament will no longer be suffered to be bartered from one to another, in the old quiet way, without an honest Leaguer to thwart their plans and expose the juggle.—Dover Chronicle.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

Great Houghton, near Barnesley, April 3.

MR. EDITOR,—I think the enclosed might be useful if printed in the LEAGUE. You, perhaps, will think otherwise; and, if so, of course you will not print it. I approve of the tactics of the League generally; but if oil smooths water, firetames aquafortis; and the milk-and-water cautery in a good cause wastes time: it may prevent something, but it does nothing. There is all the difference in the world between falsehood calling a spade a picklock, and truth calling a picklock a picklock. But I do not wish the League to answer for the extreme opinions which I have expressed. You may print this prose with my rhyme if you please. I am, Sir, your obliged friend,
EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

SNIVEL, SNAP, PUNCH, AND CO.

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

Snivel! ask yon little toiler,
Who makes laws to starve her sire?
Seeth her master in his boiler,
O'er the engine fire!
Pity her—the Snivels need her;
Ye are conscientious men.
Twelve hours' labour will not feed her,
Let the child try ten.

Snap and Snivel! deadly triflers!
Hawking pity! taxing food!
Turning workers into nifters,
All for England's good!
When ye dog from sheds and bushes
Victims of your righteous way,
Name the colour of your blushes,
Be it blue or grey.

Crime-creators, ruin nursing!
Rear'd to keep despair alive!
Are ye, thirty thousand, cursing
Millions twenty-five?
Till blind men instruct blind leaders,
Till oppressors cease to crush,
Till the kept respect their feeders,
Blush! if brass can blush.

Breeding rogues for exportation,
Weep, for happier slaves than they;
Raising brutes to sink a nation,
Throw your men away!
Stealing kingdoms, shipping Bibles,
Scourge mankind in every clime;
Building churches, preaching libels,
Manufacture crime!

Victim-rogues who slich old pillions
Die, or cross the briny lake;
Why should they who murder millions
Judge the crime they make?
Petty ruffians, taught by greatness,
Dangle from the hangman's tape;
Why should rascalries completest,—
Why should you escape?

One among you cares a tester
Whether labour sink or swim;
God be thank'd for ruin's jester!
We can laugh at him!
Let no prying wretch uncivil
Pray his pendent jig to see;
Who would hang Saint Humbug's devil?
No, let Punch go free.

For though Half-face seems to flout him
Sometimes, when your dupes are nigh,
Brass-face cannot do without him,
Mountebank knows why:
Devil's dust may blind suspicion,—
While Sangrado gilds a pill,
Monkey, calling truth, sedition,
Robs the list'ners' till.

But when rascal-famish'd bound yells,
"Rich Big-begger is a knave,"
"Vulgar villain!" cry you scoundrels,
"Jail him for the grave."
You're not vulgar, not quite honest,
And ye call the honest knaves!
Be it so. The stars shine lonest
Over good men's graves.

Lone they rest: nor Snap, nor Snivel
Robs or pities virtue's dust!
Marble insults, Cant and Drivel
Build not o'er the just:
Them, in thought, the honest only
Visit, while they toil as slaves:
Oh, 'tis true! the stars shine lonely
Over good men's graves,

All in silence, not in sorrow,
Reading on the hallowed sod,
"Great deeds ended, teach to-morrow"—
These are words of God,
Read in heav'n with tears of gladness,
To be read from pole to pole,
Till each living clod of sadness
Rise, a living soul.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—Allow me to draw your attention to the following hard case (and if you should deem it worth recording in the LEAGUE, I should be pleased) which appeared in the Chelmsford Chronicle of Friday last, April 5.

"Dunmow (Essex) Petty Sessions, April 1. Present—J. M. Wilson, Esq., the Rev. George Leapingwell, the Rev. J. P. H. Cheshire, the Rev. H. L. Majendie, and the Rev. C. Clarke, J. M. Wilson, Esq., in the chair.

"David Patient, of Great Easton (near Dunmow), was charged with wilfully damaging underwood growing in Dow Wood, on Bigod's estates in that parish, on the 20th ult. It was proved by Poulton Trubshaw, that he had seen him committing the offence; but as the prisoner pleaded having a large family, he was fined only 10s. 6d., including costs, to be paid within a month."

As I happen to know the situation of the house, and the circumstances of the said David Patient, I will endeavour to vindicate (but not encourage) him in his transgression, and respectfully ask his accuser, were he placed in circumstances similar, if he would not, in all probability, commit as heinous an offence?

The man, David Patient, is a poor agricultural labouring man, working from morning until night for 8s. per week; has a wife now ill in confinement with her sixth child, all living, the oldest of which is only eleven years of age. That child of eleven earns 1s. a week by keeping sheep, &c.; so that the family have just 9s. a week coming in, and no more, to support eight in number.

The wife was taken ill (in labour) on Wednesday the 20th ult., in which state, poor creature, she remained until the following Monday morning, when she gave birth to her now surviving sixth child.

The husband, in the evening of the 20th, on getting home from his labour, finding his wife in the state described, being unprepared for the event, not having any wood or coal to make a fire for the nurse who was to sit up, started off to a wood, which is contiguous to his home, to cut a little to bring home to make a fire with. He is there seen by a man, more cruel than forgiving, who, to gain a trifling reward and the commendation of the owner of the wood, lodges an information, takes out a summons, and gets the man fined as reported.

I wish this were the only case of the sort that I am acquainted with. Is the occurrence surprising? Ought we to wonder that agricultural labourers are not, as a body, honest in their dealings when we take into consideration how badly they are paid for their toil? Here is a family (and many such others I know of,) of eight in number who live, or rather exist, upon 9s. a week, and who pay a rent of 1s. to 1s. 6d. a week out of that sum; of course the house and the household exhibit no other appearance than that of wretchedness; have but little furniture, and that very common; children in rags, idle and ignorant, the parents not having the means of sending them to school; windows broken; the ceiling and sides of the house once plastered, the plaster much off; an empty pigsty; and the father is scarcely able to plant his little plot of ground with potatoes for the use of the family.

It does appear to me, Sir, that we English people are strangely charitable. We subscribe annually immense sums of money for various foreign charitable purposes, institutions, and operations, but neglect too much the work of charity at home. Why not look at home first, if we would avoid the charge of inconsistency, and improve the condition of the labouring community by paying them better, that they may be happy in their labour, and with their families, and be enabled to bring up their children as they would do, and that with pleasure too, by giving them what they cannot give them now, owing to their poverty, a little education.

Yours, &c.,

April 8, 1844.

A READER OF THE LEAGUE.

REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS, AND THE CULTIVATION OF LAND.

There has now existed for a considerable time, as our readers are well aware, an important controversy on the probable effect of repealing the Corn Laws in forcing land out of cultivation. One party contends that the fall of prices consequent on such a repeal would make many farmers give up cultivation, and throw many labourers out of employment. Another party, on the contrary, says that no land would drop out of cultivation from any fall of price which is likely to ensue from repealing the Corn Laws. We remind our readers of this controversy, to quote, in favour of the Repealers, the unexceptionable testimony of a Pro-Corn-Law journal. The length of time which this controversy has been carried on has familiarised it to the mind of every writer. The bearings of every opinion on the subject must have been weighed; and, under these circumstances, at this time, therefore, the following testimony in the recent number of the "Quarterly Review" is extremely important.

In the article on agriculture the writer says:—
"As prices have decreased, the spirit and energy of the British farmer have been forced into fuller activity to devise new expedients to meet and conquer the discouragement of low prices by increased productiveness; and the country has been, and is still, in the main part supplied with food from its own resources."

We must, also, on this opportunity, quote a similar testimony in another Pro-Corn-Law journal. In the fourth volume of the "Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society," published at the close of last year, in an article on the "Past and Present State of Agriculture in Ireland," written by Mr. Blacker, another Pro-Corn-Law and protectionist writer, is this passage:—

"The fall, therefore, in prices of agricultural produce, and the reluctance of tenants to give up their holdings, when no better prospect appeared elsewhere, had the natural effect of turning the attention of farmers to increase the produce of their farms, as the only means of meeting the change of circumstances that had taken place."—Page 440.

In the same journal a practical illustration of this "natural effect" is given by Mr. Pusey in his admirable article on the agricultural improvements of Lincolnshire. Speaking of some warrens which, in the time of Arthur Young, were let for 2s. to 3s. 6d. per acre, he says:—"This very land was enclosed by the present Mr. Chaplin, as lately as the year 1823, a year of the lowest depression for agricultural prices and spirits, so that his undertaking was spoken of as an act of absurdity; but Mr. Chaplin was not disturbed nor discouraged." He was rather stimulated by the low prices, and he seems to have been amply rewarded; for the farm is now, and has been for many years, occupied by a respectable tenant, who farms it, Mr. Pusey says, in an admirable manner, and no doubt pays his landlord an adequate rent. In these instances we have a practical proof that depression of prices, so far from forcing land out of cultivation, forces farmers and landowners to cultivate more extensively; and we have also the theory of the practice brought distinctly before us. The necessity of making head against falling prices, when men can by no other means better their condition, rouses the spirit and energy of the farmers, and "naturally" makes them, as Mr. Blacker and the "Quarterly Review" assure us, increase the produce of their farms to meet the change of circumstances.

This is no new discovery of Mr. Pusey, Mr. Blacker, or the "Quarterly Review"; it has been repeatedly stated before the committees which have sat at different times to inquire into agricultural distress; and the increased production, which was the result of the exertions of the farmers, was recognised as adding to their difficulties till the market had expanded to a level with their increased produce. That the truth is old, though apparently it has been lost sight of by the Pro-Corn-Law party, does not detract from its value now that they have again found it and displayed it to such advantage.

We are not acquainted with a single fact which tends to justify the assertion that land would go out of cultivation from prices falling, except the solitary fact that some land which was overburdened with poor-rates in Berkshire was given up after wheat had fallen from 150s. the quarter to 45s. The assertion, therefore, is altogether born of the apprehensions of the landowners, or it is used as a pretext, and is not warranted either by any rational theory, or by the practices of the agriculturists.

The latter part of the paragraph we have copied from the "Quarterly Review" suggests a very striking illustration of the important fact stated in the first part of it:—"The country, we are told, has been, and still is, in the main supplied with food from its own resources." But the vastly increased supply required by our increasing population has been brought forward in the face of a continual decline of prices. Since the peace, the price of wheat has sunk successively from 150s. to 112s., to 80s., to 60s., to 56s., to 50s. per quarter; and instead of the continual reduction in price having led to withdrawing land from cultivation, according to the assertion, there is at this moment more land under the plough, and sown with wheat, in England than ever there was before. No more idle and silly terror, therefore, ever entered the heads of unthinking men than the terror, real or pretended, that land will go out of cultivation, and labourers want employment, from a fall of price, so long as manufactures and trade raise up a population requiring to be fed, and supply them with something to give in exchange for food.—Morning Chronicle.

PROPORTIONS OF THE PEOPLE ENGAGED IN MANUFACTURING AND AGRICULTURAL OCCUPATIONS.

The public has been so long accustomed to hear of the great bulk of the people being engaged in agricultural occupations, and of the comparative handful employed in trade and manufactures, and, in the absence of statistical data, it has been so difficult to disprove an assertion as bold as it is unwarranted, that at length the public generally has come to believe what we must call this "false fact." In proportion to the extent and prevalence of such belief, should be the publication of the "facts and figures" which show it to be wholly unfounded; and, therefore, although we have already briefly stated the results and totals of the official returns for the census of 1841, as to the occupations of the people, so far as relates to 27 English counties out of 40,—the returns as to the other 13 not being yet completed,—we propose to go a little more into detail, that there may be no doubt left on this important subject. We find in the Derby and Chesterfield Reporter a table, entitled "An extract from the population returns of the census taken in the year 1841," which we have no doubt is authentic and faithful; but which, nevertheless, a presented in a somewhat inconvenient and unsatisfactory form, so that the most important facts which the table is capable of yielding are not to be obtained, without, for instance, adding two columns together, and deducting a third. The first column of figures exhibits the numbers of the population of each of the 27 counties engaged in "trades and other occupations," including farmers and agricultural labourers; the second column gives the numbers engaged in trades not specified; the tenth column gives the total number of farmers, graziers, yeomen, and agricultural labourers in each county. We have therefore (without knowingly varying a single figure in the table) added the two first of these columns together to obtain the total amount of persons in each county engaged in occupations of all kinds, trading and agricultural, and then deducted from these amounts the total numbers of persons engaged as masters and labourers in agricultural pursuits; and thus we obtain the numbers engaged purely in trade and manufactures. The following table exhibits the results of this operation on the official returns of this portion of the census of 1841:—

Now, to show the value of this table, it is only necessary to state that at the late monopolist and Anti-League meetings the speakers have dwelt much on the necessity of the agricultural interest having every encouragement and support from the Legislature, because, as they confidently assert, it is at once not only the most important interest in the country, but, numerically speaking, the largest; including, as some of these unscrupulous orators unblushingly allege, "almost seven-ninths of the entire population." Others state it rather lower; but all these monopolist advocates assert its great numerical majority over all that portion of the population employed in trade, commerce, and manufactures. When Mr. Brotherton, in his speech on the recent debate on Mr. Cobden's motion in the House of Commons, expressed his belief, that the agriculturists, instead of constituting, as had been asserted, seven-ninths of the population, did not form even one-tenth, he was met with "loud cries of 'oh, oh!'" and derisive cheers from the Ministerial benches. It appears, however, from the above table, which, in this respect, is strictly official, that instead of one-tenth, the agriculturists, so far as regards the 27 counties (most of them, be it remembered, purely agricultural, and excluding the great manufacturing counties of York, Lancaster, Warwick, and Stafford), really do not amount to quite eight per cent. of the whole population (including, of course, their own wives and children, as shown by the above table), whilst the persons engaged in other trades and occupations constitute 28½ per cent., or more than three times the number of those engaged in agricultural pursuits! This is the main fact evolved from this portion of the tables, and it shall not be our fault if it be lost sight of. But it is not the only important fact they contain; and we request a little attention to the last column of the above table, from which it will be seen that, even in Buckinghamshire, the agriculturists are only 13½ per cent. of the whole population of the county. In Bedfordshire they are little more than 13 per cent.; in Devon they are only 9½ per cent.; and in Dorset, 10½ per cent. In Middlesex, the agriculturists do not amount to one in a hundred of the entire population. The total number of the agriculturists in these 27 counties is not equal to the population of the Salford hundred; the farmers, graziers, yeomen, and agricultural labourers of all kinds in the 27 counties, numbering only 640,222, while the population of this hundred (having an area of little more than 210,000 acres), by the census of 1841, amounted to 704,654. But we pass on to the other classes of occupations amongst the population. These are the following:—

It will be seen that the column headed "residue of the population" comprises more than half the population of the counties; this arising, doubtless, from its including the females and children not classed under any of the foregoing occupations. The following gives the results of the two previous tables, in a popular and intelligible form:—

|---|-----------|
| Trades and other occupations, including farmers, &c., and agricultural labourers..... | 2,902,388 |
| Add—Trades not specified..... | 36,997 |
| Total in all occupations..... | 2,977,000 |

| Residue of population (including women and children of no occupation)..... | 4,755,402 |
| Total population of the 27 counties..... | 8,048,314 |

To this we may add, what has already appeared in our columns, the decimal proportions of the different classes of occupations:—

|--|---------------|
| Farmers and agricultural labourers..... | 8 per cent. |
| Persons employed in trade and other occupations..... | 28.50 " |
| Persons of independent means..... | 3.14 " |
| Residue of population..... | 60.36 " |
| | 100 per cent. |

Here we must stop for the present; but we shall probably resume the consideration of the subject in an early number.—Manchester Guardian.

WEEKLY COST OF PROTECTION TO SUGAR AND WHEAT.

(From the Economist of the 6th inst.)
SUGAR.—Since last week the relative prices of Porto Rico and Jamaica Muscovado sugars have continued exactly the same; and therefore the difference of the cost of our weekly consumption of 77,792 cwt., above what the same would be on the Continent, and paying the same amount of duty to the State that our colonial sugar does, amounts to £70,003 for the whole country, and to £5833 for the Metropolis alone, to be added to the respective balances of last week.

A FEW DAYS IN ESSEX.

BY ADAM BROWN.

Colchester, and round about it—The Farm-labourers and their domestic affairs.

I met a butcher at Parson's-heath, and entered into conversation with him. He lived in Colchester, and was out, he told me, looking at a fat pig which a woman, who lived in one of the cottages there, had ready to be killed. I asked him if he was going to buy it. He said, no; that the woman was then in Colchester, he believed, disposing of it in quarters or other quantities to some of her acquaintances there, and that he was to kill it for her when it was so bespoken. He had expected she was at home, else he would not have come at that time. He was also going somewhere else to inquire about pigs to kill. He seemed to be a jobber at such work.

I asked if the woman who was selling her fat pig was the wife of a farm-labourer, and if she had a family. He said her husband worked on a farm about a mile from Parson's-heath; that he had worked there more than twenty years. I afterwards found that he had been four-and-twenty years at work there; that he had been eleven years with the present tenant, and thirteen with the preceding tenant. And this I now state particularly, because it is indicative of a sober, steady workman, and I am about to detail his domestic circumstances. His wife was the mother of seven children, the butcher told me; and, to a remark I made, he replied, "Yes, it is a pity to see a family like that selling their pig instead of eating it; but, bless you! it is nothing uncommon. It is more to be wondered at that they should have a pig at all!"

I had heard before this that it was not common for the labourers to keep pigs; indeed, most of those who live on farms are not allowed. They are supposed to steal food for it, and straw for its bed; and this is no new opinion, for the late Sir John Tyrril (so a gentleman informed me who had been personally acquainted with the baronet,) gave it as his opinion that no labourer could be honest and keep a pig! The real meaning of which opinion is, that they were too poor to feed a pig thirty years ago, when wheat was at 80s., 90s., and 100s. a quarter. High prices being said to be accompanied with high wages, this is worth notice; and the more so that it applies to the people now working on the very soil which was cultivated, and on which labourers were kept and fed as they are now—fed without butcher's meat—when wheat was 4s. a quarter, and a sheep sold for 12d. to wit, in the reign of Edward I. (See the League of 6th April.)

I told the butcher that I would like to take that opportunity, if he were going to look at the pig, to go with him and make a few inquiries. "Well," said he, after walking some distance, "here is the house. We shall just step in, and ask the children if their mother has been home."

We went. It was a low thatched cottage, the outer walls about six feet high; the doorway and the ceiling inside so low that a man of ordinary height had to take off his hat and bend himself, if standing on his feet at all. It was altogether a very mean place for human beings to live in. It was not better than the worst of the birds' houses in Scotland, and the best of them are mean enough. It was worse than the majority of the other houses at Parson's heath, but was cheaper. The common rent for a working family to pay at Parson's-heath is £5 a year. This house was £3 a year; and it was the difference of £2, and that only, which compelled this family to betake themselves to a place that had neither comfort nor convenience in its construction. A rent of £3 should afford a labourer a cottage of full and convenient size. There was no garden to this, or almost none. The little there was, including a path on a ditch bank, was only seven paces wide, and nineteen long. The house was about eleven feet wide outside, and thirty feet long. Yet I saw some worse and dearer dwellings in the neighbourhood.

We left it and proceeded towards Colchester; but, when about half way, we met the woman returning, and we returned to the cottage with her. She told the butcher she had disposed of all the pig save the offal; that she might have disposed of that too, but she was going to try to keep some small thing to eat; for it was a hard thing for her, so she expressed herself, after the toil and expense which the getting of the pig forward had cost her, to have to part with it all, and not taste a bit of it. In reply to a question from me, she said it was very seldom they had bacon, or butcher's meat of any kind. The last which they had in their house was on Christmas-day. This being the 12th of March, and no other butcher's meat being in prospect for them, save the offal of the pig, it cannot be alleged that they have enough of everything, as has been alleged of all the Essex labourers, unless, indeed, we consider butcher's meat unnecessary. This would give rise to some curious reflections. Where would prices be, and rents, if every family used as little as this family of an Essex labourer, who is but a specimen of his class?

As we approached the little house with our faces to the north, we had a hedge on our left hand just high enough to break, in a small degree, the strength of one of the most furious blasts of hail, rain, and wind which I ever felt, and which, but for its brevity, would have left many records of its fury. The cottage stood with its end outwards, fifteen or twenty yards from the road. I could see, while the hedgerow still screened us from the keen eyes that peeped forth from its door, that Daniel, who was keeping house in his mother's absence (a little boy wearing a pinafore and frock, aged six), and Robert and Mary, twins, aged five, and George, more endearingly, because he was the youngest, called "baby," aged three, were holding hard by the door that the wind might not blow them away, and looking out with their curly little heads in the pelting hail to see if any of the feet which they had just got a glimpse of through a thin part of the hedge, were mother's feet. We came full into their view round the corner. "There they are," exclaimed the mother; "thank God, I see them all safe!" At which moment they issued from the door to meet her, their little toes, which had no stockings to keep them warm, peeping through shoes that did not keep stockless feet dry; and their clothing, which, though clean and neatly mended, showing alike the mother's poverty and efforts to overcome it, made but poor covering for that day, and the winter which had lasted long and was not yet gone. "The only clothes I can afford to get for them, poor dears, is on them," she said to me afterwards. "I have no change of clothes for any of them; it is not but clothes is cheaper than they once was, but I have more of their little mouths to fill, poor dears, than I once had, and they must be filled with something, somehow, even if all our backs go bare."

We entered the house and found shelter from the hurricane. She gave the children each an apple which she had brought from Colchester, and said they should have stayed within doors on such a day as this, when the mud was so deep everywhere, the pools of water so many, and the wind so cold. To which it was replied, that "baby" would not stay in; that he would go out to see if mother was coming; that he went over the feet in the mud each time, and that the wind blew him down on his face, and he was nearly in the ditch; and, moreover, that he bit Robert's arm and made it bleed. To which the mother replied, taking him on her knee, taking off his wet shoes, and washing his feet, "You should not bite Robert, my darling, when I go out. There now; there is nice clean feet for you, and don't go out again; there is a nice little apple for yourself. Now, you won't bite Robert no more; no, my darling. I have always their feet to wash when I come home," she said, addressing the butcher and me, "for they will go out, poor things, and I cannot afford to get them shoes and stockings; I wish I could."

She then proceeded with the others in the same way, during which a conversation was continued, nearly as follows:—

"I have two other boys and a girl, Sir; seven altogether. I used to go out myself a good deal, but I had a long severe illness at the beginning of winter. I do a little washing for a young woman now that brings me in three shillings a month; and I am glad to get that, for everything helps. My husband has eleven shillings a week; it is not more than the men on the farms have just here; but they have less when you get away from this part; they have more just about Colchester than they have away from it. My husband has been eleven years with his present master; he was thirteen years with another, who had the farm before. He is in the barn. He goes away at half-past five just now, and comes home about seven."

"Now, Robert," addressing the child, "don't go out again in the wet. You know Henry is out in the wet all day, poor little fellow, and he would like to be at home; but he must stay out, and he cannot get his feet made warm and dry like yours."

"Is that your second boy you speak of?" asked the butcher.

"Yes, poor thing; he is out bird-keeping for Mr. ———. It is a long day for him to be out in such weather as this. He goes out at daylight, and is not home till dark; and he is only a child. But the eighteen-pence a week he gets for it is a help to get bread for him to eat; else I am sure I could not let him stay out in such weather as yesterday was. It poured with rain three parts of the day, and he out all the time, poor dear, wringing wet."

"Surely," said I, "there was no need for a boy to be out bird-keeping in such a rain as yesterday? The birds would not settle on the fields in such a rain. How old is your boy?"

"He is nine, Sir. His master is a very strict gentleman, and very severe. If he had missed him from the field, even though there was no birds, he would have come after him and whipped him back again with a whip. We dared not for the life of us have kept the boy at home, unless we took him away altogether, and then we might lose all our work, and what would we do then?"

"Come, Mary, let me take the mud off you," she said, taking hold of the other twin, a girl five years old, with curly hair, lighter coloured than lint, though perhaps not exactly milk white; "let me make your little feet warm and clean; and your hands, and your face. Now, my darlings" (when she had done, and set them all on their diminutive stools and chairs round the diminutive fire—coals are dear at Colchester), "there you are, all with sweet little feet and hands and faces, all clean; even though you have no stockings nor shoes to keep out the wet and the cold, you have as clean little sweet feet as them that have."

"My eldest girl, Sir," she replied in answer to me, "is fourteen; her name is Susannah. She is in service. She only went last week. My eldest boy's name is John. He goes out with his father in the morning, and comes home with him at night. He is eleven and a half years old. He has two shillings a week. Henry is nine and a half, and has eighteen-pence a week. We eat a great deal of bread; they take bread with them in the mornings; they don't have anything else all day. We have potatoes ready for them when they come home in the evening. They have the potatoes oftener without, than with anything to them. I pay 8s. 8d. for bread, just now; and I have half a peck of flour for puddings. I pay 11d. for the flour. This is what I have every week. We use one-and-a-half, and from that to two bushels of potatoes a week. They cost us 1s. a bushel; they would cost more if we had them to buy now. We have forty rod of allotment land, on the heath, for 9s. 6d., and this gets us the potatoes cheaper. We could not get what we need but for the allotment, and we could not do without the potatoes. If the allotment were near us it would be much better. It is a good way off, and my husband has to walk home a mile, and get his supper before he can go to it to work. I do not know what we would do without it to get potatoes; and without the potatoes for ourselves, and to feed the pig, to help to pay the rent and to buy shoes, we would never get on at all."

"I get half-a-pound of sugar a week, half-a-pound of butter, and half-a-pound of cheese. I have about an ounce and a half of tea, or if I have coffee I have it instead of the tea. Bread is the main thing. I have the bread from the baker. I get in half-quarter loaves for the convenience of carrying out. I do not think I could bake it cheaper myself, nor yet so cheap: I am sure I could not. Firing is very dear. If we had enough of everything as we might require, meat and butter and all that, we might use less bread, and be less particular about it; but as it is, bread is the principal thing, and they like best to take a loaf with them. My husband takes half-a-quarter loaf with him to himself, and I cut two others to the boys—they have the half of a half-quarter and a piece each of them. John likes bottom crust best, and Henry the same; so, to make them equal, I cut two loaves, and gives each a bottom half; and then I cut a top half in two, and gives each half of that. They would eat as much as their father if I could afford to give it to them, and he could eat more than he gets. It is a long time for boys to be out from half-past five in the morning to half-past six in the evening. They eat a deal of bread in that time if they can get it. They come always home hungry. Their father should have a better dinner than he has for such hard work, but we cannot afford it. It seems to me that they as work least eat the best dinners; and they as work most get least to eat. Sir Henry Smith told the people that potatoes and red herrings made a very good dinner for working men; and he did not see what people had to complain of who had herrings and potatoes. He is one of the Colchester members of Parliament, and goes to London and lives; but for all the work ever I heard of members of Parliament doing potatoes and herrings would be better for them than for hard-working men. They carried a red-herring on a pole before him at his election; and some of the women threw potato skins at him; and if most of them had had their will they would have done more to him than that. But for my part, I don't agree with that; I think it is wrong to lift hands to anybody."

"When bread was dear the wages was just the same as now. I never saw wages rise and fall with the price of bread. I never heard of such a thing. When harvest comes, or any other time that there is more work to be done than usual, wages is highest. I do not know of any other cause that makes wages higher, unless it be in the parishes where they give married men more than single men; and they only do that because married men and their families cost more in the workhouse than single men. They pay the married men more to keep them out of the workhouse. I do not know of any way that we could help ourselves if bread were a shilling a quarter loaf instead of sixpence or sevenpence. We would have to eat less of it, and try to get more potatoes or go without both. I do not know any other way."

"I wish the pig were dead. The boys say every night when they come home, they wish the pig were dead. They mean by that they would like to have some of him to eat, and that we might save the victuals he eats. I think" (speaking to the butcher), "I should manage so as to keep the sticking piece." "You should keep the head," said the butcher. "I thought of trying," she replied, "but I have so many things to get, and a half year's rent to pay, which, please God I live to Saturday, I will pay. I could not send Daniel to school for want of shoes and pin-flores; but I got my washing money last week, and bought him a pair of shoes, and some yards of print for pin-flores. I would send all four of them to school if I could afford it. It is but a penny a week for each of them; yet that comes to half-a-quarter loaf. However, it is not what I have to pay so much as it is the want of clothes for them to go in. They have nothing, poor dears, of clothing kind but what you see them standing in now, and that is thin enough, as you may see."

"What do you pay for that cotton of which you make the pinafores and your own gown?"

"I paid fivepence-halfpenny a yard for it. It is not dear, not to them as has money to buy it. Nothing is dear of clothes kind in comparison with what I have known it to be. For instance, I get shirting for my boys at threepence a yard. I had some last harvest. I had intended to get more all winter; they are all much in want of it; but I could not; there are so many open mouths to fill. Yet shirting is cheap; if it were not so cheap as it is I don't know what we would do; we should go without, I suppose; that is all."

We left this house after some more conversation to the same effect. I cannot help remarking on the household economy of the Essex labourers, that eleven shillings a week for the father and three shillings and sixpence for the children ought to secure more of comfortable warm diet than it seems to do. In Scotland there would be broth made in such a family as this; and though so much wheaten bread would not be eaten, there would be as much of substantial food; and certainly there would be more clothing. But there is no good purpose to be served in making comparisons. The people have been bred up in social customs different both in origin and practice. When Sir John Tyrrel took the piece of gingerbread from his pocket, and held it up to the people at the public meeting, asking if they would like to be reduced to the level of labourers on the Continent, to eat black rye bread like that, he elicited a cheer, and a shout of "No, no!" But had he taken a handful of Scotch oatmeal from his pocket, and asked if they would like to be reduced to the level of labourers in Scotland, to eat oatmeal porridge or brose, they would have given as loud a shout and as earnest a cry of "No, no!" And in the best cultivated districts of Scotland the ploughmen eat oatmeal once, and frequently twice a day.

It is but a silly manoeuvre to get up a prejudice about food; and it is silly and something more in those whose labourers have not enough of food of any kind, to appeal to them, and ask if they would like to be reduced to the level of those who eat rye bread. The truth is, that those Polish or German peasants and Russian serfs, who eat black bread, are better fed than the English labourers are, who do six times the amount of their labour. And when the land belonged to the Abbot of St. John's, upon which the man is working whose family circumstances I have just detailed, and rye bread was eaten in Essex, the labourer had his belly full. He has barely that now. He was meagrely clothed then. He is the same now. The classes above him, commencing with the skilled mechanic, and including the tradesmen, and all up to the owners of the soil, have advanced prodigiously since the days of the Abbot of St. John's (reign of Edward I.); but the farm-labourer is where he was. He got his belly filled then; he gets no more now.

I met a gentleman in Essex who had been in America for some years. He gave me some information as to the consumption of butcher's meat in the town of Wilmington when he was there, compared with what is now used in the town of Coggeshall in Essex. I believe it is twenty years since he was at Wilmington. The inhabitants at that time numbered 6000, and thirty bullocks were slaughtered for their consumption each week. There used to be about thirty cartloads of fish brought into the town each market day, to be eaten in addition to all that butcher's meat. But in the town of Coggeshall, with 4000 inhabitants, there are only three bullocks consumed in a week.

I notice this to show that we need have none of those fears which many indulge in about surplus produce in the event of a repeal of the Corn Law. Our population could consume, and would if they could buy, twice the quantity of flour now used, and at least six times the quantity of beef, mutton, bacon, and poultry.

Without going to a town in America to see what people eat when they can get it, we may be instructed by some of our own towns. I was lately in Brighton, and some gentlemen who had the means of ascertaining the quantity of meat killed or brought to Brighton, made out this return for me:—Beasts, in a year, 5258; calves, 3124; sheep, 51,635; and stags, 6500; besides eggs, poultry, game, and fish of all kinds, in great abundance. There are also received from London by railway, from Scotland and elsewhere, 6200 stones of meat in the carcass. But this may be subtracted from the consumption of Brighton, to balance the meat which is killed there and goes out of the town.

Now, if any one will write down the figures of the population of Brighton, 46,661, allot the butcher's meat consumed there to each individual of that number, and afterwards their individual shares to each of the inhabitants of the kingdom, or to each of the inhabitants of any other town or parish, it will be at once apparent that we have much to do before we have too much of anything. I was promised an estimate of the coals and flour used in Brighton, which are also consumed on a large scale, but by some mistake I did not get it. If each of the inhabitants of Brighton consumed butcher's meat at the same rate as the family of the labourer at Parson's-heath described in the preceding paragraphs, it would be a curious thing for rent payers and rent receivers; would it not? Or, if they consumed at the rate of any other Essex labourer or Sussex labourer, or any farm labourer whatever, it would make a singular difference for England; would it not? Suppose everybody, including Sir Henry Smith, M.P., were to follow his estimate of what constitutes a good dinner for a working-man, namely, potatoes and herrings, what a remarkable revolution there would be in agriculture! Land that grows wheat would then go out of cultivation; but it will not do so sooner. Abundance and cheapness on the part of the seller, with ability to buy on the part of the buyer, will bring land into cultivation; or, if already cultivated, into a higher state of fertility. It is dearth and poverty that throw land out of cultivation. Does the labourer's wife, with whom I have been talking, afford no proof of that? She cannot buy enough of clothing even when bread is moderate in price, because bread is too dear for her. She cannot buy clothes at all when bread is dear, nor get enough of bread itself. Of what benefit then is scarcity or dearthness to her and her family, and the millions of the population situated as she is? Is it said that prices artificially high are requisite to keep up her husband's wages? If so, he and his family are taxed for the maintenance of his wages at 11s. a week, which, after all, afford them only bread and potatoes. Is it said that the farm would go out of cultivation, and he would receive no wages at all? If so, why is it that land is coming rapidly into cultivation, in his neighbourhood, that never grew grain before? How is it that his master has a farm of 500 acres, upon which he does not employ more than the half of the men employed by Mr. Biggs, on a farm of 200 acres, adjoining? How is it that on the same kind of soil Mr. Biggs makes profit with this extra expense of labour, while his neighbour, who lets his land go out of cultivation, or who cultivates on the same principle as if he did, makes less profit?

I shall myself answer these queries; but for the present I come to a stop.

AGRICULTURE.

MONOPOLY NOT AT ALL TIMES PROFIT.

It is impossible to over-estimate the services which the "protection societies" have rendered to the cause of Free Trade and unfettered industry; for until the spectacle of lords and squires, land-agents, and tenant-at-will farmers assembled in public meetings to speak and pass resolutions in support of Monopoly had become common, the British public was only partially aware of the ignorance which prevails amongst the dominant landlord class. The Monopolist landlords, who form the vast majority of the two Houses of Parliament, had for some years past voted in silence to uphold their monopoly. They had with prudent forbearance declined to speak in its favour. Their most active personal opposition—barring their votes—to the lucid arguments of the Free-Traders in Parliament went no further than a dissentient shake of the head. They trusted for vocal defence of their Corn Laws to the vague generalities of a Peel, the plausible mystifications of a Gladstone, or the blunt appeals to ignorant prejudice of a Wellington.

The Morning Post, it is true, has long been written down to the standard of squirearchical ignorance and landowning bigotry; but who ever thought of looking at the Post? Who ever believed that the political economy of that journal was suited to any except ladies' maids? It is to the protection meetings that the intelligent classes of the kingdom owe the knowledge of the fact, that the laughable political economy of the Post is written to please the ladies' maids' masters. But the Monopolists, no longer satisfied with the makeshift and temporary advocacy of their own chosen Ministers—though, in fact, such advocacy was the only practical defence of the monopoly which could be made—determined to come bodily before the community, and to expose the arguments for restriction, which in private they deemed conclusive. We Free-Traders have no reason to regret that determination. It is no slight advantage to find a recognised organ of the Monopolists, whose nonsense is acknowledged to be their nonsense, and whose would-be arguments for restriction may be subjected to examination.

In the Morning Post of Wednesday last we find an article supposed to be written in all sober seriousness, which is a perfect reduction to absurdity of the landlord method of reasoning. After referring to an article in the Chronicle, which had quoted various admitted agricultural authorities to show that British husbandry has, for many years past, received its greatest impulses to improvement during periods and in consequence of low prices of agricultural products, the Monopolist organ says, "The result, in short, at which the Chronicle arrives, is, that low prices are a blessing." Now, however strange it may appear to the philosophers of the landlords' journal, the "blessings of plenty and peace," which imply cheapness, have been celebrated as beneficial to agriculture from the time of Old Tusser, ay, and for ages before. Having shown that some one has laid himself open to the horrible charge of assuming "that low prices are a blessing," the Monopolist writer enunciates this special specimen of landlord logic:—

"If low prices be a blessing, then, it would seem to follow that low profits in manufactures must be, equally, a national gain. If, again, low prices be a blessing, then, by necessary consequence, the prevalence of low wages is especially to be desired. But low wages, low profits, and low prices are equivalent to a state of national poverty. National poverty, then, if the Chronicle's postulate be conceded, is the greatest of blessings. So be it, if the Chronicle will; yet, somehow, the whole choir of Free Traders always appear to be chanting the praises of national wealth."

Now, had not the lords of the soil spoken at protection meetings, no one would have believed that such sentences could have been written to please sane men. If by accident such a passage had come under the notice of any person of ordinary capacity, he would have simply dismissed it with the exclamation, "Childish twaddle!" But the mischievous silliness assumes a new feature when it is known to embody the opinions (?) of the ruling class of the men of this great empire, of the men whose laws trammel the giant industry of the British nation. We may regard with pity a maudering idiot wandering about the homestead, but when we find him with a lighted match ready to burn our stacks, in obedience to his notions of right and wrong, we are bound to do more than pity; we must repress such mischievousness, idiotic and absurd though it be, with the strong hand. In the present instance little more is required than to hold up so silly and would-be-mischievous a passage to the view and reprobation of all rational persons.

So long ago as the year 1823, Mr. Huskisson said, in the course of some parliamentary discussion on the Corn Laws, "that monopoly was not at all times profit,—that restriction did not at all times amount to protection, and that that which was nominally for the benefit of the landed interest would not, in the alternations of prices in different years, be found to be consistent with their real advantage." Of the truth of those words what ample evidence has been afforded by the events of the last twenty years! Unsatisfactory as it may be to monopolists, who have tried to base their own prosperity on the maintenance of high prices and artificial scarcity, there is no doubt that low prices of food, of corn, and other agricultural produce, when permanent and the result of abundance, do constitute the greatest blessing which this nation could enjoy. And so far from "low profits in manufactures," "low rates of wages," and "national poverty," being the results of low prices of food, the truth is directly the other way. The assertions to the contrary are simple falsehoods, contradicted by everyday experience.

It may be objected that, though this is true as regards every other business, it is not so with reference to the business of farming. But a little examination will show that the farming business forms no exception to the general rule, that cheapness produces prosperity. The uncertainties and fluctuations the Corn Laws have introduced into that business are the only clouds which obscure the perception of this truth. We have so frequently stated those causes of uncertainty, that we shall here only just refer to them. They are rents and other outgoings, calculated at an arbitrarily high rate, while actual prices are frequently, nay usually, below that rate; inordinate desire to grow grain; uncertain tenures, and unwillingness on the part of both tenants and landlords to enter into permanent engagements, under which alone can husbandry be pursued with any hope of a substantial profit: these are parts of the system created by monopoly and a desire for high prices, under which the agriculture of this country languishes. As matter of historical fact it is notorious that agricultural improvements have always been most generally adopted in periods of low prices; and to all who really understand the state of British husbandry it seems only natural that it should be so. The general practice of agriculture is far below the state to which the actual skill of the most ordinary farmer could carry it if he was not taught to rely on acts of Parliament and extravagant prices rather than his own exertions, and if he could be certain of profiting by his outlay without being subject to an advance of rent.

Let us look a little into the details of farming, and we shall see that low prices, assuming them to be permanently low, so that all the farmer's calculations shall square with such prices, would be far more advantageous to the farmer than high ones. The saleable produce of most farms consists of wheat, barley, and, in some districts, oats, and of wool, sheep, and cattle; and we believe the order in which we have named those is that of their value, their money-producing power to the cultivator. Now, the good farmer's first object will be to grow the largest quantity of wheat at the least possible expense. To do this he must have his land drained (and it is the heavy land on which improvement is most wanted) and subsoil-ploughed, which will effect an amelioration of the character of the soil perfectly surprising to those who have not witnessed it. He will then grow roots in place of "a long fallow," and be thus enabled to keep a large stock of both sheep and cattle; and he will have cheap foreign beans, lentils, and so forth, wherewith to keep his stock, and, through the stock, his land in high condition. With ordinary skill and attention he will make a good profit out of his stock, let the prices of meat be ever so low; he will have his wool, and by keeping an ample stock he will grow, on land which required to be, and has been properly, drained and subsoiled, 40 and 50 bushels of wheat to the acre, where hitherto he has had only 20 and 25 bushels. The rent, the tithes, the rates, and other outgoings would be fixed with reference to a lower scale of prices, and farming would become a business in which a man of ordinary skill and means might look for a reasonable profit. It is true this implies more skill and more capital than are applied by the generality of farmers who are yearly tenants, but the extra capital and additional skill required for such improved cultivation are by no means so great as monopolists would have believed; but it does presume a degree of security of tenure which comparatively few tenant-farmers in England possess. With low prices, however, the landlord's self-interest would soon induce him to grant longer leases, and thus the pecuniary condition and personal independence of the tenant-farmers would be rather promoted than otherwise by low prices. In spite then of the logic of the Monopolists, can it be doubted that permanent low prices of agricultural produce would be a national "blessing?"

REAL FARMERS' MEETINGS.

Our readers will remember that during the autumn scarcely a week passed in which we had not to record some sound practical speech by a farmer, which directly or indirectly, intentionally or accidentally, furnished forcible testimony as to the injury the protective system had inflicted upon agriculture. Of late these rational views, and the voices of the more sensible farmers, have been borne down or drowned in the temporary Pro-Corn-Law clamour, which the political and mortgaged landlords have excited amongst certain classes of the farmers. But this artificial feeling is passing away; and the effect of the Pro-Corn-Law noise will only help to mature the opinions of tenant-farmers, that protection is required from evils much nearer home than foreign competition.

The landlords have called their tenants to the rescue of monopoly, and they will find that the only terms upon which such aid can be given, must be destructive of all for which the landowners cling to their monopoly. At a meeting of the Braintree and Bocking Farmers' Club, which was held on the 28th of February last, we find that a party of Essex farmers and land-agents talked about the conditions necessary to good husbandry like rational men of business, though some of them had previously ranted at protection like children or landlords rather than men of business. The report read to the meeting stated that it was the fourth anniversary of the club, and urged upon the members

"The necessity and importance of a regular and punctual attendance at the monthly meetings, and of exerting themselves to maintain the usefulness and efficiency of the society."

It referred to

"The paramount duty of every cultivator of the soil to endeavour to become acquainted with the means of obtaining the greatest quantity of produce at the least possible expense; thus in future, the prosperity of the farmer will mainly and essentially depend upon his adopting the most improved systems of cultivation."

And then enumerated the most important topics which had formed the subjects of discussion at the monthly meetings of the club during the past year. Amongst others was "Wheat, its history, cultivation," &c., in reference to which one of the members, in the course of an elaborate paper, quoted from a writer (Gervase Markham, 1648-9) of the middle of the seventeenth century, a passage showing that at that period wheat was but little used in the bread eaten by the common classes of the people:—

"For bread for common use, take of barley two bushels, peas two pecks, wheat or rye one peck, and of malt one peck; these to be ground together and put through a meal sieve; a mixture consisting of, at the most, but one-twelfth part of wheat. Since which time it appears that that grain has been gradually superseding the others, until it has become the only one used for domestic purposes, excepting in a few places in the northern parts of England and in Scotland."

In fact it was not until the eighteenth century, when the commercial character of the national industry had been more decidedly developed; that wheat came into general use as the food of the people.

The following passage from the report upon hedge-row timber is so just, and sets forth so clearly and so moderately—indeed so much understates—the injury caused to farmers by landlords' timber, that, though long, we shall give it entire:—

"The last discussion to which your committee refers was—'On the disadvantages of small enclosures and hedge-row timber.'"

"This was briefly opened by a member, who stated that he considered it one which required the most careful and attentive consideration of the club; that it was one of great importance, not only to landowners and their tenants, but also to the community, inasmuch as 'small enclosures and hedge-row trees' rendered the farmers' crops much less productive than, with the same expenditure of labour and manure, they would otherwise be; hence increasing the cost of production, and enhancing the price to the consumer. The immediate interest of landowner and tenant might perhaps be adjusted by a diminution of money rent, but the injury to the public was still left unredressed. He thought that if it was fairly shown to landowners, by a careful statement of facts, that the profit which they derived from hedge-row timber was very trifling compared with the disadvantages to their tenants and the community, many would be induced to remove them. In many instances where, from various causes, landowners were prevented reducing their rents to meet altered circumstances and prices, they might very materially benefit their tenants by removing useless fences, &c., as well as improve their estates. He was not desirous of seeing the country entirely denuded of timber: there were mostly places on a farm where it might be raised, doing but little injury, but he preferred having a portion set apart and planted for that purpose."

"A member stated that he considered that where enclosures were small and the trees numerous, a crop of wheat or barley was deteriorated to the extent of eight bushels, or one quarter on ten acres, which, taking the wheat at 50s. per quarter, and the barley at 30s., made 80s. on the two crops, or, in other words, an additional rent of 2s. per acre. He, in calculating the value of a farm to hire, always made that difference. He believed that many landowners would, if the disadvantages of useless fences and hedge-row trees were fairly pointed out to them, consent to their being removed. He thought it might easily be shown that the additional rent which a tenant could afford to give was more than equal to the annual value of the growth of the timber. He considered the estimate he had made a fair one. He did not wish to state the injury done more than it really was. On estates where the enclosures were very small, and trees much encouraged, he was aware the injury was much greater. He should decline such farms altogether, at any rent."

"Several members considered 2s. per acre a very low estimate of the injury done by hedge-row timber on many estates."

"Small enclosures, it was stated, might be necessary previously to under-draining being so much practised, but were now very detrimental, not only to corn crops, but to stock, the hedges and trees attracting sheep and cattle by their shade in summer, and causing an accumulation of their droppings where they are not required, besides encouraging flies, &c. In open countries the fly or maggot in sheep was scarcely known. On fair sized heavy land farms fields ought not to be less than from eight to ten acres, and on the lighter lands from twelve to twenty acres. It was further observed that, in addition to the preceding disadvantages, in a low flat situation, with small enclosures surrounded by hedge-row trees, it was very difficult to get the corn dry in harvest; that corn was frequently injured from that cause, while those who farmed more open and exposed lands were enabled to carry their crops unharmed."

"The late Mr. Comyns Parker discouraged hedge-row trees, and recommended a portion of an estate to be set apart for the growth of wood and timber, if the proprietor was desirous of growing them. Woodland timber was of much superior value to hedge-row for all purposes."

The first speaker we shall notice was Mr. Low, who had figured at some of the Essex protection meetings, and he said:—

"When this society was organised a few years ago, I certainly did anticipate highly beneficial results from it, but I regret to find that as the novelty of the society ceased, the members became lax in their attendance and lax in their exertions in reference to it. This circumstance I particularly regret, because I am convinced of the importance and the real necessity of societies of this description. * * * * * If ever there was a moment when it became the duty of the farmer to awake from his lethargy, that moment has now arrived. (Cheers.) We find that knowledge has progressed largely in the world—we find that the manufacturer has resorted to every method that ingenuity and skill can devise to produce something that shall astonish the world—we find that the mechanic and others are doing the same in their respective callings—we find that the scientific man, too, is giving to the world the result of his interesting and important pursuits; and to the farmer to remain as a drone in the human state—to be to rest on his oars, while all other classes are doing everything they can to carry out in the best possible way their concerns, and occupations?"

Here we have a distinct admission, by one of the most active, and certainly not the least able of the Pro-Corn-Law farmers, who, for reasons of their own, have submitted to become the landlord's out-paws in Essex, that while all other industrious capitalists have been as active as the bee, the farmer has "remained a drone," whilst in every other pursuit industry has crowded all sail, and has been rewarded with proportionate results, the farmer, and the farmer alone, has been "resting on his oars," and has not carried out his "concerns in the best possible way." Surely it might have occurred to Mr. Low that there must be some reason for this; some peculiar disability, some special burden pressing on the farmer! But we find that, instead of special burdens, he has, or is said to have, peculiar exemptions; he is "protected" by act of Parliament against foreign competition; yet see what one of his most ardent protectors states to have been the consequences!! Mr. Low truly says:—

"I am persuaded that the perfection of agricultural art is not yet nearly found out. I am not sure that nature in her all-wise arrangements ever intended that a large proportion of our land should be exposed for a whole year under the influence of the burning sun, the wind, and the weather without realising anything to the farmer—I am not aware whether by scientific research and practical application we may not arrive at that period when what is called a 'long fallow' will be altogether unknown. To effect this is an important object; and we must pay special attention to our system of cultivation, to our drainage, to our manures, especial attention to our ploughing, and this must be followed up by manual labour in the tillage of our land, under the secure tenure of a lease."

After all, Mr. Low is only half a protectionist, for if English farmers generally had leases they would cease to think about Corn Laws, seeing that they would undersell most other grain growers, and landlords, by losing their power over the independence of the tenant, would have lost much of that for which they desire to maintain their monopoly. One of Mr. Low's observations called up Mr. Hutley, well known as one of the best and most successful farmers in Essex. He said:—

"Feeling as I do on the Corn Laws, I must at once state that I should prefer a fixed duty to a sliding scale. I am satisfied that the present system presses heavily upon the agriculturist who is obliged to sell his corn just after harvest, while it gives a great advantage to the man of capital, who can keep his till Christmas; the man who is obliged to sell gets a small price, while the man who can keep his crop longer makes a good price of it. This is one disadvantage of the sliding scale; therefore I think, looking to all the circumstances of the case, it would be better to arrive at a certainty than to continue in an uncertainty. I should like to see every class in the community doing well, and my desire is to see all going hand-in-hand, so that we have not rival parties springing up in the country every day. At present a man cannot without fear and uncertainty invest money in agriculture, and therefore I should like the question to be settled whether we are to have a fixed duty of 10s. or 12s., or whether we are to have a sliding scale, so that a man may know how he is going on; and, entertaining this view, I have abstained from uniting myself with the protection society on that account. I think our plan ought to be to consider the good of the whole, and not to benefit by an augmentation of the cost price to those who are struggling in trades and other callings to get a living by their labour."

The last sentence bespeaks what Mr. Hutley is known to be, a man of sense and high integrity.

Mr. H. Hobbs, in reference to the prospects of the society, said:—

"I hope gentlemen will not recede from these societies, but will endeavour to increase their support; for I know in some societies individuals have withdrawn their names, and the answer to the question why they did so has been to the effect that they think they are selling the country and the landlords too much. That is an idea I scout, and which ought to be scouted. Who is the man to do business with? Is it the man who knows and understands business, or is it the novice?"

Now, though Mr. Hobbs may scout such an idea, we know that it is becoming a very common opinion amongst farmers, that these agricultural societies give the landowners an exaggerated opinion of the profits of cultivation, and induce them to apply the screw of competition with greater severity; and we are by no means sure that, under actual circumstances, they are altogether wrong. Mr. Beadel, a land-agent, in giving "liberal landlords and prosperous tenants," made the following judicious remarks:—

"I think that liberal landlords make prosperous tenants; but I have some peculiar notions on the subject of liberality, and I do not consider that, strictly speaking, to be true liberality that gives everything to the tenants. I call that a judicious liberality that will only let the land to a tenant who will well farm it, and, reduce from it all that it is capable of growing by a fair investment of capital. That would be my definition of a liberal landlord; and when I travel about this country, and sometimes find land so bedevilled as it is, I must say, if you have liberal landlords they are not men of that liberality which is calculated to benefit the country. An old friend and neighbour of ours used to say that the only way to make a man a good farmer was to make him pay a high rent. That is sharp practice; but if you would not farm well with a low rent, I would put a large one on. (Hear.) We owe it to all classes—because we are only a portion of the community—to cultivate the land well, and if we do this, our objects are attained, for does it not afford employment for the labourers? Does it not strip the poorhouses of their inmates, and will probably give you a profitable return for your capital?"

(Of one of the common causes of bad farming, taking a farm too large for the occupier's capital, he said:—

"I have a great dislike to the apology which is sometimes made for bad farming, that the party has not sufficient capital to farm well. We must be prepared to meet the truth in the face. I ask, would it be any excuse for a shopkeeper to tell us that he failed because he overtraded? (Cheers.) And why is the exception to be made in favour of the farmer in difficulties? If the landlord has been too ready to take the highest bidder and get the highest rent for his land, the tenant on his part has been too ready to take 200 acres when he had only capital sufficient for the cultivation of 100. (Hear.) And this is a mistaken course, because I contend that the proper amount of capital judiciously applied to the requisite number of acres will yield a better profit to the farmer than when spread over a larger quantity of land."

This is strictly true, and it is applicable far more extensively amongst farmers than is usually believed. In allusion to what had been said as to the state of the society, he observed:—

"The object in view is to secure benefits for ourselves and others. That is an object which ought to be attended with prosperity. We ought not to find people leaving us when the object is to benefit others as well as ourselves. The means we adopt to attain that object is to meet once a month to carry out our views by imparting and acquiring information that will be useful to us in our calling. Therefore, it cannot be our object or the means we adopt to carry it out that have produced the effect to which Mr. Low alluded, but I am afraid it arises from our apathy as a class, and I am fearful we are not sufficiently alive to our own interests; we are alive to political and exciting interests, but not to those means which, steady in their operation, are certain in their result."

Now, the notion that farmers are not sufficiently alive to their own interest may do over the dinner table though not elsewhere; but, in truth, most farmers feel, whatever may be their wishes, that their business has been rendered too uncertain, and they and their capital are too much in the landlords' power to render them very solicitous about improvement in agricultural knowledge. Indeed, not one farmer in twenty acts up to his own knowledge of what is requisite to far better husbandry than circumstances permit him to practise.

Mr. Baines, the chairman, said, in reference to security of tenure:—

"I know there are many anomalies in the tenure of land and in other things connected with farming that require alteration; but without good feeling between the landlord and tenant no good can be done. I wish to express my opinion on this point openly and fairly, for I consider that an enterprising tenant makes a good and improving landlord; on the other hand, an improving and liberal landlord makes a good and skilful tenant; and if they do not go hand in hand together, agriculture cannot succeed. There are many things that the landlord can do for the tenant. It is not exactly the money rent that the landlord can benefit the farmer by considering; there are many other things that come into the calculation; and the man who keeps a great number of hedge-fences and trees upon his estate is deteriorating the crop of the tenant, and indirectly taking a large rent. In other instances the tenant is not able to do that justice to the land that he ought to do. It is admitted, that unless stock be well sheltered it cannot be profitably grazed; and therefore, unless there be a good understanding between the landlord and tenant, and they work together, this accommodation cannot be attained. Yet it may be managed in a very simple way. A few rough poles from the hedge-rows would serve to make shade, and we know that good shade for cattle will make a heavy rent lightly felt. I agree that it is the duty of the landlord to give facilities to the tenant for growing the largest quantity of corn, and producing the largest amount of stock; it is the duty of the tenant to endeavour to give effect to the liberal ideas and wishes of his landlord; and I repeat that they must go hand in hand together, or agriculture cannot prosper."

In short, what is necessary to good husbandry is a rational lease. Mr. Fisher Hobbs, the next year's president, after alluding to a suggestion of Mr. Beadel's, to have some popular lectures, and intimating his wish to carry it into effect, said:—

"I think there are many subjects that if fairly discussed and made public would be of great benefit; and I believe if the landlords were aware of the feeling of the tenants they would come forward and assist them more. There was one thing brought forward at the last meeting which cannot be made too public—that is the disadvantage of small hedge-rows and of hedge-row timber. I think the landlords are not aware of the great loss sustained in this way by the tenants and the public at large; and if there was a good practical man to come between the landlord and his tenants, and do what was right, they would be in a better state. (Cheers.) Unhappily we have often seen that men in London have the management of estates who know nothing of land, and thus it frequently happens that the landlord is censured when it ought to be laid on the agent. I know a person in that situation who has the management of a landed estate, not fifty miles from here, who lets it on leases of four years; and I ask you if the tenant can properly cultivate land on so short a term? At the end of every four years there is some alteration, by which the tenant is put to the expense of £10 or £15, merely by a slight alteration in the lease. I think these are matters we might do good by discussing, and if laid before the public they will do good to the community at large."

How a man who so obviously understands some of the real wants of agriculture as Mr. F. Hobbs can have his own better judgment so warped as to become a co-clamourer for high prices and low produce with Mr. Baker passes our comprehension. The allotted toasts having apparently run out—

"Mr. Foster said much had been said of leases, and as Mr. Wm. Hutley had been effecting great improvements on a farm he had taken by stubbing up the small hedge-rows, and by deep draining, he thought that gentleman could give some information on the subject."

Thus called on—

"Mr. Hutley said he was an advocate for long leases, and he had had them on all the farms he occupied; he took this ground, that he never would occupy unless he had a long lease, and it behaved every one to make that stand, for then the landlords would comply. Not perhaps all, for some fancied the tenants must be slaves to them; but where a man had capital he advised him not to deal with such men, for if they went on without a good tenure it was like devouring them by piecemeal. (Cheers.) He had a feeling of independence that no man should ever subvert—he never cringed to any man; and he was sure if the farmers made a respectable stand the landlords, if they had any feeling, would make terms with them. He had followed men that had had tyrannical leases, but he found he was able to obtain liberal leases afterwards. When he lately took a farm he said, 'I will give you a good rent, but I must get rid of those nuisances, the small hedge-rows and bedgerow timber;' this was agreed to, and he had been getting rid of it, for he could assure them that 2s. per acre was not equivalent to the additional rent which they indirectly paid by the continuance of these things. It would, in the whole, make a considerably larger sum, and he was sure if this was fairly made known to the landlord he would give way. They grew timber in the hedge-rows, and what was the use of it? For the elm they could only make 1s. a foot; they could buy Melmel timber if required for repairs at 6d., and if they did not want it for repairs they could make only 1s. of the elm in the market."

But farmers must meet the landlords fairly. Mr. Hutley said:—

"In order to break this system up they must begin with the landlords by making liberal proposals to them, for they could not afford to give the tenants everything; and if they could give the landlord a better rent he would do away with the timber."

The remainder of the evening was passed in practical statements of the utility of deep draining, and the comparative merits of different roots for feeding sheep. Altogether, we do not remember to have met in any one farmers' meeting with a more rational evening's discussion, or one which more completely proves that "protection" has been the curse of the tenant-farmers of England.

MORE FARMERS' EVIDENCE.

Farmers are beginning to think and to express their thoughts upon their own business, and, like most men who speak upon that which they understand, they usually take a just and practical view of the subject; that is, always presuming they are not under the immediate pressure of landlord influence. Thus, in the last Mark-lane Express, a correspondent, who writes under the signature of "A HAMPSHIRE FARMER," tells a few home truths not altogether pleasing to landlord ears. The farmer commences with the following criticism on Mr. Cobden's statement, made on the authority of a Hampshire miller:—

"That wheat is 15s. a quarter dearer in July and August than it is in September, October, and November."

He says:—

"Now, I do not wish to question the truth of that statement, but I think the inference drawn from it by Mr. Cobden is not quite satisfactory. The substance of his speech is that, if the Corn Laws were abolished, we should not have those fluctuations. I am willing to admit that we should not have them to that extent, but still they must be almost as great as he has stated them to be—as there are other causes at work, besides the Corn Laws, that produce these excessive and hurtful fluctuations; and one principal cause is the poverty of the farmer, his inability to keep corn till the summer months."

This is a practical confirmation of Mr. Cobden's position, for he has distinctly stated that the Corn Laws have been mainly instrumental in impoverishing the tenant-farmer. They have done so in various ways—by inducing him to take land in expectation of higher prices than he actually obtains; by causing him to grow an undue proportion of grain, and to rely too exclusively on grain crops for profit; by leading him to undertake a farm too large for his capital; and, perhaps more than all, by occasioning a system of yearly tenancies under which no farmer can hope for pecuniary profit, or personal or political independence. This writer afterwards says:—

"It is no use for a man to know that a commodity will fetch so much money in July if he is obliged to sell it in October; and what I wish to impress on Mr. Cobden's mind is, that the destruction of the Corn Laws, without he can cure the excessive competition for land, will avail but little."

There is nothing so likely to cure the present unhealthy competition for land as a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. We say unhealthy competition, because it is not based upon any sober or accurate calculation. Tenants without capital, or with half capitals, seek, on any terms, to get into a farm, while landlords, relying on their power of distress, take little pains in selecting competent and skilful tenants. In the end neither party benefits by this unwise and not very honest system. Nor are the landlords altogether to blame, for they have generally bad advisers in their land-agents. Hear what the "Hampshire Farmer" says on this point:—

"I have observed that the most active men in getting up the Anti-League meetings are land-surveyors and land-stewards. These gentlemen state it is impossible that land can be cultivated with lower prices than at present; but, the moment they have a farm to let, they put on from 10 to 20 per cent. on the rent—thus belying by their actions what they are constantly inculcating to the tenantry. The truth is, that the principal cause of agricultural distress arises from the great ignorance of those who engage in land, and in those who let it. The land-values are constantly mistaking competition for value; they find, when they have a farm to let, there are a great many competitors for it, and it is difficult to put a rent in which some one man of capital is not willing to give. I do not mean to say that the tenantry have not a right to complain, and I do not admire the Anti-Corn-Law League; but I am fully persuaded the abolition of the Corn Laws will disappoint those who are advocates for prices, unless the competition for land could be cured."

The Corn Laws have imported into the business of husbandry innumerable causes of fluctuation and unsteadiness, beyond and besides those which arise from the nature of the business; let those unnatural causes be removed, and most of the existing unsteadiness will be cured.

Upon the law of distress, this practical farmer properly says:—

"Why should a landowner have preference, if his tenants get into difficulties? Why should he be secure in his twelve months' rent, and the grocer, baker, butcher, or other tradesman, be obliged to take 5s. or 10s. in the pound, and that too, perhaps, because he has for some time paid such excessive rent? If any person went without his money, it should be the landlord, for introducing such a man into the neighbourhood; at all events, he ought not to fare better than others."

There is no man of common sense—not being a landlord—who can dissent from those remarks.

We always said that the shallow, unmeaning, and unmeasured abuse of the League by the monopolist landlords would speedily bring their Pro-Corn-Law movement into contempt with the farmers themselves. Thus the writer says:—

"Sir, though I am not an Anti-Corn-Law League man, I am sorry to think there is no sincerity or honesty in the landed gentry. RENT IS THEIR ONLY THOUGHT; they do not care how much they delude or mislead their tenantry, and are constantly imputing that to the League that they are guilty of themselves. What has the League to do with the price of corn? It was 48s. a quarter in November, 1842; it was 64s. a quarter in July, 1843; it was 48s. a quarter in November, 1843; it was 64s. a quarter in July, 1844. The League agitated in November, and they agitated in July, clearly showing it is not the League that regulates the price, but the inability of the farmer to keep his corn."

Let the admirers of "mutual-confidence" tenures ponder on the following passage:—

"I really believe, from the observations I have made, that if a farmer had an old wheat-rick left at harvest he would stand a good chance of having his rent raised 20 per cent. It seems to be the business of the land-agents to hunt out for a cause to raise the rent. These people are too much trusted, and too much thought of. Who should be the parties to keep corn? Where does it keep best, in straw or in store? After the landed gentry are satisfied by the proportion they should receive in the shape of rent, every encouragement should be given to keep wheat in straw."

And let farmers observe what one of their own body says on the existing Corn Law:—

"The farmers are constantly finding fault with the law of 1842. But the only difference in the law of 1842 and 1828 is that wheat under the law of 1828 occasionally reached 70s., and under the law of 1842, 64s.; but still these parties who complain sell their wheat at 48s. to 50s., and contract to pay rent after the rate of 65s. It is no use to disguise the fact; every change that takes place must end in disappointment to all parties, because parties are constantly mistaking one thing for another. Is it a small evil that people look to Leagues, instead of the House of Commons? The day is not far distant when the landed gentry will be left by themselves, both as it regards church and state."

EVIDENCE AGAINST MONOPOLY.

One of the useful effects of the Anti-Corn-Law agitation, which has of late been going on in the rural districts, has been to bring out from tenant-farmers of all degrees, and in every part of the country, abundant testimony of the ruinous effects of monopoly rents. The following somewhat quaint epistle will find an echo in the breasts of hundreds of farmers:—

"To the Editor of the LEAGUE."

"MR. EDITOR,—Not three hundred miles from the fayed well at Oundle is an estate remarkable for ruining tenant-farmers. It was enclosed in the time of the last French war. This ruin-tenant estate was raised from 9s. per acre in the open field state to 36s. per acre. When enclosed, the common rights of large pastures for cows were taken away. The old tenant, wealthy, homely tenants were scared from this estate by high rents, and fresh tenants came. One, being a superior farmer, tried about 300 acres for a short time, losing his money fast; he gave notice to quit the farm. The steward is a blow-hot-and-cold gentleman. To get at him you must read him backwards, for when he said 'yes' he meant 'no,' he was also a remarkable man for taking care of himself. Occasionally his master promised to allow the honest farmer a fair price for some moveables which he was to leave upon the farm. The steward dallied the farmer on, with forced smiles and a smooth tongue, until after Lady Day; then he began to throw off his disguise, and bade the straightforward tenant a defiance; and told him, if he moved a single thing that he had left upon the premises, he would bring an action against him. The farmer, rather than go to law, gave up £120's worth of property, which he had left upon the farm, trusting to the steward's honour; but he never received a single shilling for them. I should be glad to know in whose pockets did this £120 go, whether into the steward's or landlord's—most probably the former. The remaining tenants got away as well as they could, some robbed and ruined, some sold up, and no account rendered of the proceeds of the sales, the lawyer being no honest man than the steward, and the landlord being deceived by them both. His lordship then procured a bailiff from the west country to farm the land for him. New brooms generally sweep clean; and this Mr. Westcountry, it was thought, was a-going to do wonders, having been a school-fellow of his lordship's. At it he went—nothing venture nothing have; and, as he took the liberty of dipping his hand into his lordship's pocket when he pleased, he farmed the land by strength of purse; he bought hundreds of pounds' worth of manure, all of which produced great crops; stubble strong, stackyard full, barns crowded, turnips large, sheep all fat, fed without stint upon oilcake, pigs fat, plenty of men kept working, and women weeding, all of which astonished the natives; until the year 1817, when wheat averaged 97s. 8d. per quarter, when his lordship let all his high-farmed land at an extravagant rent. He had no sooner let his land than the provident bailiff's wine and brandy merchants sent in their bills to his lordship, which had been standing two, three, and four years, for they knew that the money was safe, and were, therefore, in no hurry in sending in their bills. After my lord had paid the bills of his school-fellow and bailiff, and other outlays, he found himself only £2 10s. per acre out of pocket, besides losing all the rent of the estate. The tenants were all ruined in 1821, when wheat made 38s. per quarter; the seed, when they entered upon the land, cost upwards of 97s. per quarter. Another set of tenants came, and they were all ruined save one, who lived at a lodge near a wood upon a farm of 300 acres. This he cross-cropped, and had two green crops in a year, thrashed all his corn out, and put the whole of his live and dead stock into Cannis Park; he bolted, however, and bilked his landlord by a moonshine flit, and a journey to America. There were, therefore, three sets of tenants ruined, save this one, from 1817 to 1831. One tenant sank £5000, another £4000, one £3000, and others more; some of their neighbours were so simple as to think and say that the unlucky lordship was under an evil eye or bewitched. My lord again farmed the principal part of the estate himself, when he lost £1 per acre, besides the rent. He at last became surfeited with his country lawyer, steward, bailiff, and co., nay, and farming. His lordship let the land at half what it had been rented at. Since that time there have been no ruined farmers, and the evil eye and witchcraft have disappeared, having been proved when inquired into to be no other than high rents. The horse-shoes which were nailed at the stable-doors to prevent the witches coming in have been taken off. And the only evils upon the estate now are the rabbits and game. By giving the above, Mr. Editor, you will oblige, "Your humble servant," S. A. FORESTER."

THE GAME-LAW GRIEVANCE.

The following letter, from a tenant-farmer near Barnard Castle, is so just, and so completely corroborates much we have frequently had occasion to state in connexion with the game laws, that we give it without further comment:—

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

"SIR,—Seeing a handbill, stating that a public meeting would be held, to know if it would be advisable to abolish the Corn Laws, I quite agree they should be abolished; but there are other laws more oppressive than the Corn Laws, bad as they are, to farmers and labourers—viz. the game laws, which are a disgrace to the country. If you only travel a mile from here you will find more hares in the fields than sheep; and I need not tell you who keep them, or who get the profit. Would the farmer stock his farm with hares if he were allowed the privilege to kill and sell them? Would he not rather keep sheep than hares? Is the country benefited by them? No, only the landlords; for, would you believe it, they have sold as far as three tons a week during the winter to the gamekeepers in this town; they have carried on such a wholesale trade that the market has been completely glutted with them; and, whilst mutton has sold at 5d. per lb., hares have been selling as low as 3d. per lb. Now, let us see if we can make out the loss the country sustains by them:—It is no uncommon sight to see twenty hares together; I, myself, have seen as many as twenty-four in a four-acre field. Now, if we take one hare as an average for every four acres, which is a low calculation, this will make twenty-five for every hundred acres; and allow five to consume the produce of an acre will be five acres totally waste, excepting what the landlords get by selling them. Now, let us see what is the farmer's loss:—He not only pays rent for this land, but all rates besides, and finds seed and labour, which will amount to ten pounds' loss to him for every hundred acres of land! Well may the manufacturers call us clay-headed, for we suffer all this without a murmur; well would it be for us, too, if we could stop here; but there are such men called poachers, who are detested by the landlords, for, being nearly of a trade, they cannot agree; but the farmer calls them his friends. It mostly happens when people have stock they have some one to look after them; so it is with the landlords; they have what they call watchers, who, if they meet with a poacher, take him before the magistrates, who know well what to do with him; for, being gamblers themselves, they cannot abide to have rivals; so they impose a heavy fine, which the poacher being unable to pay, he is sent to the House of Correction, and there kept at the expense of the county; his family, should he have any, are sent to the workhouse, and are maintained out of the poor rates. I was glad to see in the York Herald the other week what compassion the landlords had towards us. One of them pitied us because we would have to pay more county rates, which were increasing; he did not, however, tell us the reason; but I know they must increase as game increases. Now, if the League have the good of the country at heart, they will take the Game and the Corn Laws together; if they do this they will not find a tenant-farmer in the country but who will give them his support. I dare not mention my name, as my landlord being a very tender-hearted man, it might break his heart to know he had such a renegade of a "TENANT."

HINTS TO LANDLORDS.

THE BUBBLE HAS BURST.—It is amusing to see to what a state—a natural state—of insignificance the Pro-Corn-Law agitation has of late been reduced, even in the estimation of those at whose instigation it originated. Thus, in the Dorset County Chronicle—Mr. George Bankes' own organ,—wherein, three months ago, column after column of squirearchical ignorance and rural nonsense was reported whenever a protection meeting was held in the south-west, we find the following modest announcement of the establishment of a "protection society," with an earl in the chair:—

"AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION.—The tenant-farmers of the large district of Yeovil, in South Devon, have established a protection society, and adopted a petition to Parliament against the League. There was a large and respectable attendance at their first meeting, and the Earl of Morley, who attended to support the yeomanry, delivered a most excellent speech on the occasion against the Free-Trade doctrine, and the unconstitutional practices of the League."

Verily, these societies will soon attract as little attention in the agricultural districts as the prosecution of a poacher or the dispossession of an independent-minded tenant-farmer.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Farmer and Landowner of Northallerton."—We shall avail ourselves of his valuable information. His letter will not bear abridgment, and is too long to be published in extenso.

"A Subscriber in Leeds."—We, too, are grieved that he has such just cause of complaint; but we deem private remonstrance more likely to be efficacious than public exposure.

"J. H."—We shall look for the full report of the committee.

"R. B."—The tricks played in procuring signatures to monopoly petitions are so numerous and varied, that the letters we have received on the subject would fill our paper for several weeks.

"W. J. C."—The League feels an interest in the subject, but the prudence of advocacy is questionable.

"Perthenels" is thanked, but the verses are not quite suitable.

"J. F. M."—We shall procure the information for him.

A Farmer from the New Forest, in Hampshire, sends the following sketch of talk at the market dinners of some west-country farmers:—

"In travelling through the counties of Somerset and Devon, I purposely dined with a company of west-country farmers, whose conversation seemed to be entirely about the Anti-Corn-Law League. One said the League were trying hard to bring all the farmers and their families to the workhouse; 'For,' said he, 'look at the fires since they began their conspiracy.' Another said, 'Look at Wales and the Rebecca-ites.' 'Ah,' said a fine-looking old farmer, about 30 stone weight, 'see how they are disturbed in Ireland; our squire says they are at the bottom of all that; as a proof, O'Connell joined them as soon as he came over after his trial.' Another said, 'What does Lord Sondes say in Norfolk? Why, that they were the most dangerous association ever formed, for they were engaged in a conspiracy to ruin their fellow-subjects.' 'Ah,' said another double-cunning fellow, 'they are trying to set us farmers against our landlords; and, as the old proverb says, when a house is divided against itself, it cannot stand; and Scripture says, cursed is he that parteth man and wife, and it is the same with landlord and tenant.' After hearing all their ridiculous remarks and jargon about the League, I said, 'Gentlemen, I, as a farmer, beg to say, that you remind me of the Spartan boy, who hid the fox that was tearing out his entrails. Nay, I may compare the tenant-farmers of England to tame beasts of burden or to the milch kine, for they bear all that is laid upon them, and give all that is demanded of them. As a proof of their gullibility, from 1815 to 1828 the farmers' rents were fixed upon a calculation of 80s. a quarter for wheat, and the same price in proportion for other grain. And what were the prices you farmers actually did receive during those 13 years of gullibility? In 1820, 54s. per quarter; in 1821, 61s.; in 1822, 42s.; and in December of the same only 38s. per quarter! In 1827 wheat made 47s. per quarter. In 1828 the farmers were cajoled by the oily, shuffling, slippery, treacherous allying-scale, which was to secure to them a price of about 70s. per quarter for wheat. In 1829 the wheat was 55s. per quarter; in 1832, a little over 53s. per quarter; in 1834, 40s. 6d.; and in December, 1835, the average was as low as 38s. per quarter. Where was your farmers' Corn-Law protection in the years which I have mentioned? Have I not fairly proved the Corn Laws a delusion—a mere bottle of smoke? I am surprised that farmers should be gulled by the moonshine-tales of their landlords. I never heard yet of Lord Sondes being taken for a mathematician, philosopher, poet, or statesman.' Some of them, after scratching their heads, and others stroking down their hair, admitted that what I had said about the prices of wheat, &c. &c., was very correct (for the oldest farmer had been out of the room, and found it so in his old corn-book). 'Our landlords,' they continued, 'tell us a very different tale, but do not give us the proofs that you do.' 'Gentlemen,' I replied, 'the Anti-Corn-Law League are proving to farmers how they are deluded by the Corn Laws; injured by their crops being devoured by game and rabbits; cajoled by growing timber in hedgerows for the landlord, for every foot of which the farmer pays rent; decoyed by stewards to sign absurd covenants and yearly agreements, contrary to common sense and reason, such being utter bars to good husbandry. The parties, your landlords, who pretend to be your friends, are your enemies; and the very party whom you take to be your enemies are your friends, because they inform you how you are imposed upon. Gentlemen, have I not proved it so before you all, as a farmer?' "N. P."—The verses are not up to the mark.

"Silent from Necessity."—All personal anecdotes should be authenticated by a real signature.

"A Somersetshire Man."—The epigrams would only be intelligible in the locality where the parties are known.

"H. M. H." is thanked, but Civis' letter is too unimportant to call for any particular notice in our columns.

Our friend "O." of Salisbury, improves in every new effort; this week he sends us the following spirited lines:—

"Hereditary bondsmen! know ye not Who would be free themselves must strike the blow?"
Childs Harold.

Ocean! boundless, wild, and free,
Ever proudly, widely rolling;
Mighty in thy liberty,
Fast the power of man's controlling;
Marks and bounds are not for thee,
Chains and fetters cannot bind thee;
And must man for ever be
Thus unlike thee, thus behind thee?
He can bend thy power to bear
Fleets to every land and nation;
But he may not freely share
In the fruits of his creation;
For though hunger wild demands
Unax'd bread from other lands,
Law denies with stern commands
Trade is not free!

Stars look on thee, mighty ocean,
From their high cerulean dwelling;
Moonbeams smile on thy commotion,
List'ning to the tale thou'rt telling.
Thy hoarse voice on every shore,
Kings to the slave be free—be free!
Listen, brothers, hear his roar,
Speaks he not the same to ye?
Tells he not of glorious climes,
Plenty's fav'rite seats for ever?
Brothers, ye hear the ocean-chimes,
Rouse ye—rouse ye—now or never!
Would ye, Britons, longer lie,
Starving in hopeless slavery?
Speak the word—and it shall be,
Trade shall be free!

We shall conclude with two pieces of poetry, a "Repeal Hymn," by a Ferrarsshire Weaver, and the "Bread Cry," by January Beadle; the latter has sent his real name, but has so blotted it that we cannot make it out.

REPEAL HYMN.
God made the heaven—the stars—the earth,—
And man created. At his birth

The harp of liberty was strung,
And thus Nature's charter sung:
"Hail! welcome to the new domain!
Thine is its wealth—herb, fruit, and grain.
Hear and obey the law of Heaven—
Earth, as a mutual farm, is given
To thee, first workman, and thy heirs for ever;
Be good, be grateful to the gracious Giver."

Who are the grateful and the good?
These most who earn their daily food,
And almost all their pleasure—lo!
Who are the heirs of the first man?
The friends of Nature's primal plan;
Who peaceful live, and live to see
Their tolling brethren happy, free.
Lo! Heaven proclaims it in its sunlit dome;
Earth echoes—"I'm their birthright and their home."

Ours is a rich inheritance,
Which Heaven's kind seasons still enhance.
Yet what were this great globe of earth
Without strong labour's horny hand?
The cheerless sun would shed his rays
On mourning man, and desert ways,
And thenceless kings would be.—Why then,
Look they not to the rights of men,
Whose labour is the very prop of kings,
And to their crowns the star-bright diamond brings?

And who, from autumn's loaded wain,
The wheaten sheaf and oaten grain,
First should be served? Reason says—He,
The noble son of Industry!
It is the law of Nature's heart
To guerdon well the sons of art,
To cheer, when stormy winter comes,
With corn and oil their rustic homes.
But there are great lords in the land. What then?
We are the nation's strength—her working men.

And shall the lordly traitors still
Thus tax and starve us—as they will?
And shall the famine-laws still be
To paralyse our industry?
No! we anon shall know the worth
Of life, of labour; and go forth
Free, to the sunny summer fields,
And taste the joy which nature yields;
While the free winds of heaven the soul shall fan,
And each to each shall be a patriot man.

THE BREAD CRY.

BY JANUARY BEADLE.

"Oh God of Mercy, hear our prayer,
We cry to thee for bread!
We cry in anguish and despair,
In agony too deep to bear:
For here, oh God—starved, starved, and dead,
Our eldest-born has bowed his head—
Dead, dead."

"Oh often in the sleepless night
We heard his broken groans!
His mother wept with all her might,
And o'er him sobbed 'till morning light;
And I, too, felt his dying moans—
His cry for bread—in bitter tones—
In bitter tones."

"I felt, O God! how deeply felt,
The cry I could not heed;
But nature in me would not melt,
E'en whilst on bended knees I knelt;
But, Oh, my heart with thorns did bleed,
And fiery thoughts my brain did feed—
My brain did feed."

"We had no bread—for many a day
We all had clammed and pined,
And as our precious darling lay,
We knew what drove his life away—
And we were mad, and we were blind
With hopeless and distracted mind—
Mad and blind."

"He died! my poor, poor murdered boy,
Murder'd, alas! by me!
By me? ah no!—he was my joy—
Oh I could save, but not destroy—
He was the Corn-Law victim—he Was murder'd by Monopoly—Monopoly."

"Ah, hideous name!—Ah, monster soul!
That eatest up the poor,
Down, down, to hell, and writhe and roll
For ever there;—be thy control
Far from the weary labourer's door—
Far from his home, his child, his store—
Far from his door."

"How long, oh God! how long to thee
Shall broken-hearted men,
And childless fathers pray to be Snatch'd from their foodless misery?
Another corpse, this night again,
Have traitor lords and tyrants slain—
This night again."

"Oh, God of mercy, hear our prayer,
We cry to thee for bread;
We cry in anguish and despair,
In agony too deep to bear:
For here, oh God! starved, starved, and dead,
Our eldest-born has bowed his head—
Dead, dead."

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

THE WEEKLY MEETINGS of the LEAGUE in COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE will be RECOMMENDED ON WEDNESDAY EVENING NEXT, the 17th inst. RICHARD COBDEN, Esq., M.P., will take the Chair precisely at Seven o'clock.

The meeting will be addressed by H. G. Ward, Esq., M.P. for Sheffield, and other gentlemen.

Cards of admission may be had on application at the Offices of the League, on Monday and Tuesday, between the hours of eleven and four o'clock.

Applications for Private Boxes to be made personally or by letter on Monday.

The cards of registered Members will admit, as heretofore, to Pit and Galleries.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, April 13, 1844.

The holidays are over; Parliament will resume its labours next week, and there is not an individual within the seas of Britain who expects any good result from its deliberations. If a conspiracy had been formed to bring the Legislature into contempt, the plotters could not have contrived any measures more efficacious for the purpose than the course of conduct that has been pursued by the masters of her Majesty's Ministers. The dual dictators publicly issued their edicts to the Cabinet, and Sir Robert Peel's functions were at once reduced to procuring their registration. Debates were consequently mere farces, acted for the most part without spirit or energy, as the performers were aware that the catastrophe had been anticipated, and that the issue was a foregone conclusion. The legislators talked a great deal, but they have done nothing; they felt that they were placed in St. Stephen's to preserve absurdities and perpetuate abuses; that their first and last duty was the maintenance of monopoly, and that if they dared to listen to the dictates of justice and common sense, their bonds would be drawn tighter by their inexorable masters, and a double lock turned on their fetters by the unyielding lord of Goodwood. Instead of taking the course of independent action befitting the Prime Minister of a great people, Sir Robert Peel has been driven to enact the part of a squirrel in a cage, whirling round and round the same unvarying wheel of plausibilities, but never advancing an inch though almost continually in motion. Parliament is now about to resume, and no one seems to know, and very few care to inquire, what it is likely to do after its sittings are resumed. Never was there a period of our history when the Legislature occupied so small a share of public attention; it is universally regarded as bound by the oligarchy to prevent good, and as too weak in public opinion to perpetrate evil. All thinking men look to the people outside the walls of Parliament, and scarcely bestow a glance on what passes within. Can such a state of things continue? Is it likely that the English people will endure recognised and acknowledged grievances to be perpetuated at the behest of an oligarchy, which has established an unconstitutional power behind and above the Cabinet, and which holds the Throne in the same thrall as the people? It is pitiable to witness the trickery and shuffling by which Ministers are forced to hide their enslaved condition as much as possible from the eyes of the world. Their emancipation would be as much an act of mercy as was that of the negroes in the West Indies.

It would be a saving of time and of trouble to set aside Parliament altogether, to proclaim the Duke of Richmond dictator, and assign him over the Ministers as his copying clerks; they could not, under any circumstances, be more subservient than they are at present. But while under the leaden rule of the "incapables" who have learned nothing and forgotten nothing, all improvement is forbidden and all redress refused; the nation is doomed to see its industry paralysed, its labourers pauperised, and its capital rapidly sinking into decay. It has been justly remarked by the Morning Advertiser—

"That the several interests of the country are pressed in such narrow confines, that there is no room for enterprise—none for the suitable expansion of talent or activity. Thus, for the first time in the history of the world, industry, so far from being a sine qua non of national prosperity, is just the very reverse—is considered a grievance of the first nature. This it is to rest upon fallacious principles. England is doing this to the extent of subverting the whole fabric of effect and cause—to that of turning topsy-turvy the whole theory of our moral motives. The best citizen, with commerce hampered as it is, is the man who is entirely idle; the man who sits with his arms folded and consents to rot to death. Sir Robert Peel should establish an order of Do-nothings; bestowing the Grand Cross of the fraternity upon him who made it his rule to work least. Thus the country would become regenerated; thus there would be no more cotton manufactured than would find backs to accept it, and as little wheat grown as there were mouths ready to receive it. Thus we should recede to primeval epochs of scanty population and simplicity."

But ere this return to barbarism could be effected, there are some millions of workers and feeders to be removed by summary process. The oligarchy would have to try the Irish experiment of ejectment and clearance on a large and perilous scale. They will not venture it; but they will persevere in holding the Ministry to the "do-nothing" policy, as if the whole world would stand still when the English Parliament pleased to set the example of inactivity. It is a perilous experiment; when nothing is done at a time when much ought to be done and much may be done, we may be assured that the period is not far distant when much must be done.

REVIEW.

Ireland, Historical and Statistical. By G. L. Smith, Esq. London: Whittaker.

Ireland and its Rulers since 1829. London: Newby.

The Irish State Trials. Edited by T. Mac Nevin, Esq. The Songs of the Nation—The Spirit of the Nation—The Rise and Fall of the Irish Nation—Curran's Speeches. Dublin: Duffy.

Among the many strange arguments that have been put forth in defence of monopoly, there is none more absurd in its principles or more injurious in its consequences than that on which the Morning Post has been ringing the changes for the last three months—the supposed duty of a Government to interfere with all the relations of industry, to fix the conditions of employment, and to regulate the rewards of labour. Hitherto it has been received as an axiom that every interference of the Legislature with the concerns of trade is in itself an evil; that commerce is regulated by demand and supply, which balance themselves when left to their natural course; and that the price of labour, like that of any other commodity, must ultimately be determined by the state of the world's market. A wise ruling power has been termed a paternal Government, "because," says an old author, "a father interfereth only to check evil;" the species of ruling power advocated by the Morning Post might be termed a "maternal government," for that incomprehensible journal declares that the sovereign power should imitate the conduct of a foolish mother, petting one child, bribing another, artificially stimulating all, and leaving no development of mind or body to the healthy operations of nature. But this experiment of a meddling, interfering, and "protecting" Government has been tried; the history of Ireland for nearly seven centuries is a mere record of attempts to make people grow up to a pattern predetermined by a Legislature, and the result has been that Ireland is a perplexity to the statesman, a puzzle to the philosopher, a grief to the philanthropist, a disgrace and a peril to England.

The number of new publications on the subject of Ireland which crowd our table may be taken as a proof of the anxiety of the English people to obtain correct information respecting the social condition of that country, probably combined with a suspicion that some gross deception has been practised to hide the real state of that country from English eyes; and we rejoice at this circumstance, because on no subject has there been so much of wilful falsehood and deliberate misrepresentation printed and published as on the history and social condition of Ireland.

Knowledge exhibits itself in few and simple laws; ignorance revels in multifarious legislation; and of this truth the statutes relating to Ireland afford melancholy demonstration. Nothing was too solemn or too trivial, nothing too great or too small, for the perversity of legislative interference in that unhappy country. The State attempted to regulate the condition of the soul, and the dress of the body; there were laws fixing how the infant should be nursed, the youth trained, the maiden married, and the dead laid in their graves; the cut of the beard, the trim of the hair, and the shape of the garment were prescribed by act of Parliament; the Legislature ordained the mode of saddling the horse for a journey, harnessing him to the plough, and feeding him after his toil; it gave rules for sowing, threshing, and reaping; it even entered into the question of amusements, and declared what songs should be sung, what instruments played, and what musicians permitted to entertain a company. This was realizing the Post's theory of "maternal" government with a vengeance! Unfortunately, it was found that every such interference was productive of unmixed evil, and led to the necessity of some other interference still more mischievous than its predecessor.

Whatever may have been the condition of Ireland at an earlier period, there is no doubt that during the century preceding the English conquest it was reduced to a state of distraction and barbarism arising from the Danish invasions and the savage conflicts of its petty kings, which had scarcely a parallel in Europe. In the twelfth century the Church was the great element of civilization; papal power was the only counterpoise to military despotism and feudal tyranny, and but for the perfection to which ecclesiastical organization had been brought by the Roman pontiffs, Europe would, probably, have sunk to the melancholy condition of Asia. We are of those who hold that the overruling providence of God is as perceptible in the moral as in the physical world, and that the evidences of design can be traced in the history of our race as clearly as in the material world. The storms and tempests which spread temporary desolation over a land, purify the atmosphere and clear the way for a new growth of life and beauty; the systems permitted to be devised by selfishness and ambition root up old evils, destroy antiquated institutions which had lost all their efficacy for good, and leave the way clear for the development of future elements of civilization. Even thus the exorbitant ambition of ecclesiastics, with all its evils and all its errors, maintained the power of knowledge as an antagonist to the empire of brute force; but for the popes, England would have been another Turkey under the Plantagenets.

The Irish prelates saw the distraction of their country, but had not sufficient political influence to apply a remedy. They sought to strengthen their power by placing themselves in connexion with the Romish court; and it is unjust to say that by so doing they sacrificed the independence of their national church, for that independence was worthless which lay at the mercy of chieftains, one of whose most sanguinary wars originated in a dispute about a goose-egg. The Romish see had brought England under subjection to the Vatican by sanctioning the Norman Conquest; and it was naturally supposed that similar means would be equally efficacious in Ireland. Under these circumstances Pope Adrian issued his celebrated bull, granting Ireland as a fief of the Holy See to Henry II.; and the prelates of Ireland took measures to give efficacy to this edict many years before an English soldier had landed in their country. The repeated rebellions of his sons and continental wars prevented Henry from taking possession of the lordship thus conferred upon him; but a war between two petty kings brought a body of Anglo-Normans to Ireland as auxiliaries to the weaker party. Strongbow's handful of men gained so many victories, and acquired such extensive domains in so short a time, that Henry feared Ireland might become the kingdom of his vassal; he hastened thither, made such arrangements as time admitted, and, through the influence of the clergy, was recognised, not as king, but as lord of Ireland, with a tacit reservation of the sovereignty to the pope.

Although seven hundred years have nearly elapsed since this transaction, yet every one of its attendant circumstances has continued to influence the destinies of Ireland up to the present day; and close attention to them is requisite for understanding not only the history but the present condition of Ireland. As the Plantagenets possessed not a kingdom, but a lordship, they could not unite England with Ireland; had they made the attempt they would assuredly have been prevented by the popes; they, therefore, felt that they could only claim from the Irish an imperfect and delegated allegiance, and that their only proper subjects were the Anglo-Normans, who had settled in Ireland. Thus, at the very starting, there was a different relation to government between the native Irish and the English settlers in Ireland: the former were the vassals of the English monarch, but they were the subjects of the pope; the latter gave whole and undivided allegiance to the sovereigns of England. Now, though it is perfectly true that these arrangements and distinctions were made with the common consent of all parties, and that divided allegiance and subinfeudation of sovereignty were common at the time throughout Europe; it is equally clear that not one of the parties would fulfil the conditions of such complicated arrangements. Let us first view the condition of the king: Henry was "king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Aquitaine and Normandy, and earl of Anjou;" for Ireland he owed homage to the pope, for Normandy, &c., to the King of France. The complication of allegiance in the French provinces led to sanguinary wars, in which the real point at issue was, whether the Capets or the Plantagenets should be kings of France; and the divided allegiance of Ireland ultimately raised the question, whether the popes or the English monarchs should have the undivided sovereignty of Ireland.

Were the destinies of nations to be decided by legal technicalities, the claims of the popes would have been indisputable; Henry accepted the lordship of Ireland as a papal grant, bound himself to all the conditions of the grant, and of course assented to the penalties of forfeiture if he failed to fulfil these conditions. He could not deny the pope's right to make that grant, because he had recognised it by acceptance, and because such a denial would have involved a recognition of the invalidity of his own claim to any authority in Ireland whatever. In point of fact, from the first invasion down to the Reformation, the papal grant was set forth in successive statutes as the only ground of right for English sovereignty, and this awkward acknowledgment was only got rid of when the Irish Parliament changed the title of sovereignty, and proclaimed Henry VIII. king of Ireland.

The Anglo-Norman settlers were only a garrison in Ireland; they had, to all intents and purposes, a different monarch from the people amid whom they dwelt, and thus the distinction of races was perpetuated by a difference of government. Two nations, as distinct as the Turks and the Greeks, were thus planted on the Irish soil, and the whole course of law was directed to prevent their amalgamation. Holding the country by so uncertain a tenure as a conditional grant, it was clearly the policy of the English Government to cherish and maintain an "English interest in Ireland;" but the obvious result of such policy was to make the settlers and their descendants an ascendancy similar to that of the Turks, which the government had to maintain against the natives at all hazards. To such an extent was this felt, that the Irish natives, with the exception of five families, were wholly excluded from the protection of the law, and could recover no damages, and receive no redress from any legal tribunal. Of course the only limit to the tyranny of the Anglo-Normans was the amount of power which they had to accomplish whatever tempted their cruelty or their rapacity.

The Irish prelates were not long in discovering that they had made a very bad bargain. To be sure the Anglo-Normans were as devoted slaves to the superstitions of the age as could be found within the limits of Europe, and their benefactions to the Church in their capricious fits of generosity were even more lavish than those of their brethren in England; they erected splendid cathedrals, built monasteries and richly endowed them, never had heard the name of Wicliffe, and, so far from doubting any point of faith sanctioned by the Church, they very willingly conceded to the priests the power of believing and thinking for them. But the men of the sword would not consent to share political power with the men of the book; cedant arma togæ formed no part of their creed; on the contrary, the gown and rochet were constantly postponed to "helm, hauberk, and twisted mail." No better illustration of the mutual relations between the barons and the prelates can be found than the anecdote quoted in a former number of the LEAGUE—an Earl of Kildare excused himself for burning a church on the plea that he thought the archbishop had been in it.

As in England, so in Ireland, the Anglo-Normans were induced by obvious policy to bestow the best sees, abbacies, and benefices on foreigners connected with their race, and to exclude the native Irish as they had excluded the Anglo-Saxons. In Ireland, as in England, there was a virtual distinction between the Established Church and the National church;—a distinction which, from peculiar circumstances, led to Puritanism in England, while it brought Ireland into closer connexion with the Church of Rome. The latter result was the consequence of the divided allegiance to which we have already directed attention; when the native Irish felt oppressed by English rule, they appealed to the pope as their superior lord; their complaints were heard, and, though no efficacious steps were taken to redress their grievances, remonstrances were addressed from Rome to the English monarch, and sometimes in a tone approaching to menace. So far, then, as the papacy interfered in the government of Ireland, it appeared as an agent of redress, interposing its shield between the feudal aristocracy supported by the English Government and the suffering people.

The native Irish were naturally discontented with the anomalous position in which they were placed, and they sought to remedy it by the most sensible course that could be adopted; they petitioned to be received as English subjects, and to be admitted within the pale of English law. Edward III. was too enlightened a monarch not to discover the great advantage which his empire would derive from accepting such an offer; but, like William III. at a later period, he found that the "English interest in Ireland" derived too great a profit from exclusive loyalty to listen to such a proposal as a fusion of races under a common government with common rights. They were as averse to it as the Turks would be to an amalgamation with Rayahs, the Orangemen to an equality with Catholics, or a monopolist oligarchy of land to a participation of equal rights with merchants and manufacturers. The golden opportunity of uniting the two nations that divided Ireland was lost, and the wars of the Roses prevented the project from being renewed under the Plantagenets. During those wars a fusion of a different kind occurred; many of the Norman barons were gradually assimilated to Irish chieftains, and encouraged by the weakness of the Government to establish a kind of barbarous independence.

The battle of Bosworth Field gave the crown of England to the Tudors; but the Irish, gratefully attached to the House of York, whose progenitor Duke Richard had been the best of their governors, showed great unwillingness to submit to a change of dynasty. They supported the two impostors, Lambert Simnel and Perkin Warbeck, and it is a singular proof of the strength of popular attachment that the White Rose of York has ever since continued to be the favourite cognizance of the Irish in every struggle against the ruling powers. It was the settled policy of the Tudors to break down the old Norman aristocracy in England and in Ireland. Here they raised up a new nobility, for which the ranks of country gentlemen afforded them materials, and for whom the forfeiture of monastic lands supplied estates. A new nobility and a new proprietary, more closely identified with the body of the English nation than the old feudal oligarchy, facilitated the progress of the Reformation in England, and rendered the change not less beneficial as a political than as a religious revolution. Nothing like this was possible in Ireland; there was no middle class, no intelligent, educated gentlemen ready to start up as rivals to the Geraldines, the Burkes, and the Butlers; no lower class alienated from a church combined with a system of hereditary oppression; all the materials for the Reformation in Ireland had to be imported from England, and to be established on an alien shore in the midst of social confusion. The native Irish and the Anglo-Norman barons equally looked upon these newly-imported settlers as intruders; while the ruling powers regarded them with peculiar favour as being the persons most likely to establish and promote "an English interest in Ireland." This political motive was wholly independent of the religious considerations with which it has been studiously blended. It was as much the object of Mary as it was of Elizabeth, to give Irish lands to English settlers, in order to obtain a hold over Ireland; it was under Mary that the lauds of Leix and O'Fally (now the King's and Queen's county) were forfeited, and the Lord Deputy permitted to grant leases of them on such rents as he might deem expedient. The Act of Settlement itself, not unjustly described as the Magna Charta of the Protestants of Ireland, was passed by Charles II., whose secret attachment to Romanism is now notorious; and under that act James II. accepted a large share of those estates which had been forfeited for loyalty to his father.

Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. laboured with equal zeal to establish "an English and Protestant interest in Ireland;" on this project they expended a vast amount of blood and treasure; but the accomplishment of this object was reserved for Cromwell, and he was enabled to effect it by a combination of circumstances unparalleled in the history of nations, and for that among other reasons more studiously and flagrantly misrepresented than any series of events in the world's annals. But without a careful examination of the Cromwellian crisis in Irish history, it is utterly impossible to comprehend the subsequent events of two centuries, or to understand the complicated difficulties which still beset the English administration in Ireland. The importance of the subject need scarcely be pleaded as an excuse for resuming it an early opportunity, and we shall endeavour to discuss it without exciting angry passions and party animosities. There is probably no country but Ireland whose present condition cannot be appreciated without referring to the darkest eras of past generations; its social state is too complicated to derive much elucidation from the flippant personalities which form the staple of the flashy volumes called "Ireland and its Rulers," or the querulous vanity of the author's worthy compeer, Sir Jonah Barrington.

The Buccaneer, and other Poems. By R. H. Dana. London: H. G. Clarke and Co.

In our review of Longfellow's poems we expressed a wish for the republication of Dana's poetry in this country, and in a few weeks we were gratified by the sight of the neat and cheap edition before us. We wished Dana to be known in England because there is an originality in his conceptions, a fulness in his thought, and a depth in his reflections such as could scarcely be expected from the citizen of a young republic, where private and public life equally enjoin incessant activity, and where practical philosophy must necessarily triumph over the speculative and the ideal. Dana belongs essentially to the class of reflective poets: even his narratives give more of the poetry of thought and feeling than of incident and action. Its suggestive power is precisely similar to that of ocean scenery, when the billowing boundlessness of the calm waters leads the mind to thoughts of immensity and eternity, interrupted sometimes by the soothing sound of waves gently rippling on the beach, and sometimes by the war and dash of the breakers against the rocks, which seem to place life and its varieties in contrast with the limitless and unchanging world of waters. The circumstances of his early life rendered Dana familiar with the scenery of a rock-bound coast, such as New England possesses of unequalled sublimity and beauty. The following description of an American island is one of the best examples of writing a landscape with which we are acquainted:—

"The island lies nine leagues away;
Along its solitary shore,
Of craggy rock and sandy bay,
No sound but ocean's roar,
Save, where the bold, wild sea-bird makes her home,
Her shrill cry coming through the sparkling foam."

"But when the light winds lie at rest,
And on the glassy, heaving sea
The black duck, with her glossy breast,
Sits swinging silently;
How beautiful! no ripples break the reach,
And silvery waves go noiseless up the beach."

The lines we have quoted are the opening of "The Buccaneer," a singularly wild and powerful legend, which in some of its effects recals the memory of the impressions produced by the first reading of Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner." Matthew Lee, the buccaneer, has been guilty of a fearful murder on the high sea; a lady whose husband had fallen in defence of his country's independence seeks to escape in exile the misery of witnessing the ruin of that cause for which her lord had bled. Accompanied by a faithful attendant, and taking with her the white horse which had been the last gift of the deceased, she embarked with her treasure on board Lee's ship. No sooner had they got out to sea than the pirates resolve to make the treasure their own; the servant is murdered at once and the ruffians rush to the lady's cabin, and the catastrophe is thus powerfully told—

"A crash! They've forced the door,—and then
One long, long shrill, and piercing scream
Comes thrilling through the growl of men.
'Tis her's!—O God, redeem
From worse than death thy suffering, helpless child!
That dreadful shriek again—sharp, sharp, and wild!"

"It ceased,—with speed o' th' lightning's flash,
A loose-robed form, with streaming hair,
Shoots by,—a leap—a quick, short splash!
'Tis gone!—There's nothing there!
The waves have swept away the bubbling tide.
Bright-crested waves, how calmly on they ride!"

"She's sleeping in her silent cave,
Nor hears the stern, loud roar above,
Nor strife of man on land or wave.
Young thing! her home of love
She soon has reached!—Fair, unpolluted thing!
They harmed her not!—Was dying suffering?"

"O, no!—To live when joy was dead:
To go with one, lone, pining thought—
To mournful love her being wed—
Feeling what death had wrought;
To live the child of woe, yet shed no tear,
Bear kindness, and yet share no joy nor fear!"

"To look on man, and deem it strange
That he on things of earth should brood,
When all its thronged and busied range
To her was solitude—
O, this was bitterness! Death came and pressed
Her wearied lids, and brought her sick heart rest."

In mere wantonness of mischief Lee orders the horse to be thrown overboard:—

"Such sound to mortal ear ne'er came
As rang far o'er the waters wide.
It shook with fear the stoutest frame:
The horse is on the tide!
As the waves leave, or lift him up, his cry Comes lower now, and now 'tis near and high."

"And through the swift wave's yesty crown
His scared eyes shoot a fiendish light,
And fear seems wrath. He now sinks down,
Now heaves again to sight.
Then drifts away; and through the night they hear Far off that dreadful cry.—But morn is near."

"O had'st thou known what deeds were done,
When thou wast shining far away,
Would'st thou let fall, calm-coming sun,
Thy warm and silent ray?
The good are in their graves; thou canst not cheer
Their dark cold mansions: Sin alone is here."

The legend then declares how Lee was continually haunted by the spectral horse; and his horrors are portrayed with an intensity which renders it impossible to read the description without shuddering. We turn from this wild tale to a simple narrative of every-day life—"The Changes of Home." It relates the affection of two young persons in humble life, whose marriage is deferred until the lover shall have procured the means of subsistence. The following passage describes the growth of early love:—

"She and that fair boy
Shared with each other childhood's griefs and joy.
Their studies one. Then, as they homeward went
With busy looks, on little schemes intent,
Their earnest, happy voices might be heard
Along the lane where sang the evening bird.
—Why should I speak of what you know so well?
What chanced when you had left us let me tell."

"Time changes innocence to virtue strong,
Or mars the man with passions foul and wrong.
To warm and new emotions time gives life,
Fluttering the heart in strange yet pleasing strife,
Filling the quickened mind with visions fair—
Hues like bright clouds, that rest, like clouds on air,
Deepening each feeling of the impassioned soul,
Round one loved object gathering then the whole.
So deepened, strengthened, formed, the love that grew
From childhood up, and bound in one the two.
So opened their fresh hearts, as to the sun
The young buds open: life was just begun.
For this it is to live—the stir to feel
Of hopes, fears, wishes, sadness, joy—the zeal
Which binds us one in life, death, woe, and weal
And life it is, when a soft, inward sense
Pervades our being, when we draw from hence
Delights unutterable, thoughts that throw
Unearthly brightness round this world below;
Making each common day, each common thing,
Something peculiar to our spirit bring."

The lover dies, and the fair maiden withers away, the victim of that "fatal remembrance, to which life nothing darker nor brighter can bring":—

"A grief there is of deeper, withering power,
That feels death lurking in the springing flower—
That stands beneath the sun, yet circled round
By a strange darkness—stands amid the sound
Of happy things, and yet in silence bound;—
Moves in a fearful void amid the throng,
And deems that happy nature does it wrong;
Thinks joy unkind; feels it must walk alone,
That not on earth is one to hear its moan,
Or bring assuaging sympathies, or bind
A broken heart, or cheer a desert mind.
—And thus she walks in silent loneliness.
Sounds come, and lovely sights around her press;
Yet all in vain! She something sees and hears,
But feels not—dead to pangs, to joys, to fears;
Nor wishes aught. The mind, all waste and worn,
Lives but to faintly know itself forlorn;
Remembrance of past joys well-nigh forgot,
As if one changeless gloom had been her lot;
And, sure, had thought it strange that there should be Blessings in store for one so poor as she."

"Factitious Life" is a series of reflections on the relations between the material and the spiritual universe. We shall only take one passage from it, describing the thoughts suggested by the contemplation of the ocean:—

"Now stretch your eye off shore, o'er waters made
To cleanse the air and bear the world's great trade,
To rise, and wet the mountains near the sun,
Then back into themselves in rivers run,
Fulfilling mighty uses far and wide,
Through earth, in air, or here, as ocean-tide."

"Ho! how the giant heaves himself, and strains
And flings to break his strong and viewless chains;
Foams in his wrath; and at his prison doors,
Hark! hear him! bow he beats and tugs and roars
As if he would break forth again and sweep
Each living thing within his lowest deep."

"Type of the Infinite! I look away
Over thy billows, and I cannot stay
My thought upon a resting place, or make
A shore beyond my vision, where they break;
But on my spirit stretches, till it's pain
To think; then rests, and then puts forth again.
Thou hold'st me by a spell; and on thy beach
I feel all soul; and thoughts unmeasured reach Far back beyond all date. And, O! how old Thou art to me. For countless years thou hast rolled.
Before an ear did hear thee, thou did'st mourn;
Prophet of sorrows, o'er a race unborn;
Waiting, thou mighty minister of death,
Lonely thy work, ere man had drawn his breath.
At last thou did'st it well! The dread command
Came, and thou swept'st to death the breathing land;
And then, once more, unto the silent heaven
Thy lone and melancholy voice was given.

"And though the land is thronged again, O Sea!
Strange sadness touches all that goes with thee.
The small bird's plaintive note, the wild, sharp call,
Share thy own spirit: it is sadness all!
How dark and stern upon thy waves looks down
Yonder tall cliff—he with the iron crown.
And see! those sable pines along the steep
Are come to join the requiem, gloomy deep!
Like stoled monks they stand and chant the dirge
Over the dead, with thy low beating surge."

The religious sentiments which give spiritual life to this magnificent survey of inanimate nature are reproduced with great power in a simple poem called "The Husband's and Wife's Grave." The passage is the Christianized expression of "the pleasing hope and fond desire, the longing after immortality," which philosophy recognised, but failed to realize in such a form as to satisfy the anxious cravings of the soul. Dana's reasoning is as close as that of Doctor Young in his well-known lines on the subject in the "Night Thoughts," but are far superior in poetic vigour:—

"O, listen, man!

A voice within us speaks the startling word,
'Man, thou shalt never die!' Celestial voices
Hymn it around our souls: according harps,
By angel fingers touched when the mild stars
Of morning sang together, sound forth still
The song of our great immortality:
Thick clustering orbs, and this our fair domain,
The tall, dark mountains, and the deep-toned seas,
Join in this solemn, universal song.
—O, listen, ye, our spirits; drink it in
From all the air! 'Tis in the gentle moonlight;
'Tis floating in day's setting glories; Night,
Wrapt in her sable robe, with silent step
Comes to our bed and breathes it in our ears:
Night, and the dawn, bright day, and thoughtful eve,
All time, all bounds, the limitless expanse,
As one vast mystic instrument, are touched
By an unseen, living Hand, and conscious chords Quiver with joy in this great jubilee:
—The dying hear it: and, as sounds of earth
Grow dull and distant, wake their passing souls
To mingle in this heavenly harmony."

The specimens we have quoted are amply sufficient to justify Dana's claims to admission into every standard collection of English poetry. It is interesting to find that our American brethren have not forgotten their intellectual descent from the Elizabethan age, and that the models chosen by the transatlantic bards are principally those in which the spirit of piety is united in glowing harmony with the spirit of poetry.

THE LOZENGUE TRADE.—The committee of the lozenge manufacturers and confectioners of London have presented an important memorial to the President of the Board of Trade, setting forth the anomalous condition in which they are placed by the operation of the duties levied on colonial produce. It appears large quantities of lozenges have been imported from Halifax and other British settlements at a duty of 9s. 10d. per cwt., and that the cost to the importers is 73s. 10d. per cwt.

| | Per cwt. |
|--|----------|
| Refined sugar in bond | 27 0 |
| Freight to and from Halifax | 4 0 |
| Duty on importation at Halifax | 8 0 |
| Ditto, at home | 9 10 |
| Commission, insurance, and incidental expenses | 5 0 |
| Cost of sugar | 53 10 |
| Cost of manufacture | 20 0 |
| | 73 10 |

whilst the cost of refined sugar to British manufacturers is 80s. per cwt. on the average; so that it is impossible to compete with the foreigner, even if the Halifax legislature should not grant the prayer of a petition, presented to it by the manufacturers, for a drawback on exportation equal to the duty levied on its importation into that colony. It further appears, that succade and elecampane can be imported and refined at a profit.

| Made from the Succade. | Per cwt. |
|--|----------|
| Foreign raw sugar | 19 0 |
| Freight to Halifax and England | 5 0 |
| Duty at Halifax | 8 0 |
| Ditto, at home | 9 10 |
| Commission, insurance, and incidental expenses | 5 0 |
| Expense and labour in forming the succade, refining in England, loss, &c. | 15 0 |
| Add one-third as water, having paid the duty of 9s. 10d. on importation into England | 3 4 |
| | 58 2 |

| Made from the Elecampane. | Per cwt. |
|---|----------|
| Foreign raw sugar | 12 0 |
| Freight to Halifax and England | 5 0 |
| Duty on importation at Halifax | 8 0 |
| Ditto, at home | 9 10 |
| Commission, insurance, and incidental expenses | 5 0 |
| Expense of labour in forming into elecampane, and refining in England, with loss, &c. | 15 0 |
| | 54 10 |

These statements show not only the critical condition of the British confectioners, but the incongruities of the British tariff, which it has been our lot to point out—sometimes with effect, and sometimes without. To one remarkable thing we wish to advert. The price of refined sugar in bond is stated at 27s., refined sugar duty paid 80s., difference 53s., duty paid by the British consumer 26s. 6d., to colonial planters 26s. 6d. per cwt., being a robbery of nearly 3d. a pound; and it is a fact beyond dispute or denial, that the colonial planters have an effective protective duty on sugar of their production of one hundred and twenty per cent. How long this state of things is to be submitted to we cannot tell; but it is sufficient to cause a rebellion, and we have no doubt will ultimately have the effect of breaking up all political parties, if a remedy be not soon applied.—Commercial Daily List.

THE TWO LEAGUES.—The League is powerful because it repeats and spreads the ideas of Adam Smith. Ninety years ago a young professor in the moral philosophy chair of Glasgow stated the principle now enforced from the Ministerial benches by Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Gladstone, and from the stage of Covent Garden by the eloquence of Richard Cobden, Milner Gibson, John Bright, and W. J. Fox; principles which now fill all newspapers, and crowd all meetings. The old story in Hierocles of the reflection of the fox on seeing the mask—"What a pity that such a pretty face has no brains!" is applicable to every Anti-League Society. What a pity that presidents, and secretaries, and speechifiers, and pamphleteers, and journalists, should have got no ideas to disseminate! The Anti-League Societies are farther from being efficient opponents of the Anti-Corn Law Associations than the bishop in the story was from having shirts. "Please, my lord, your shirts are worn out," was the announcement of the servant to his master. "Very well," the Bishop replied, "tell them to go and sow flax." The Anti-Leaguers should begin by educating their philosophers. Until a genius shall arise, who shall prove it to be injurious to produce goods, corn, wine, cloth, or hardware, in the spots nature has pointed out for them, the most fertile fields, the sunniest valleys, the most convenient and neighbouring mines of iron and coal, the lecturers of the Anti-League Societies must remain preachers without a doctrine. Had there not been an Adam Smith, there never could have been a Richard Cobden. About the end of the last century a book was published, entitled "The Wealth of Nations," but for that book there could not have been this League.—Westminster Review.

CHINA TRADE.—BRITISH MANUFACTURES.—To show the extent of trade now opening up between this country and China, we have been favoured by a Liverpool correspondent with details of one export entry at the Custom-house, viz.:—On the 16th instant, per ship Patna, for Hong-Kong, shipped by Richard Allison, cotton cloth, 3,012,147 yards, value £45,000; the raw material of this shipment would be under £5000. Here, then, are £40,000 of wages and profit secured to Britain, not one shilling's worth of which said manufacture would have been exported if tea could be grown in any of the British colonies;—a strong proof in favour of Free Trade, either in manufactures or grain.—Scotsman.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, April 8.—The supply of Wheat from Essex and Kent to this morning's market was short; yet the millers exhibited no eagerness to purchase, and we cannot report any improvement on the prices of last week. The demand for Free Foreign Wheat is very limited, and in one or two instances where sales were forced, rather lower terms were accepted. Notwithstanding a short supply of Barley, the trade for that article was dull, and last week's prices were with difficulty supported. There was a short supply of Beans and Peas, but there is no alteration to notice in the value of either. The return shows a very short arrival of Oats during the week; a few Scotch and English vessels arrived in time for this morning's market; though the demand was not brisk, former prices were well supported. Flour, 3830 sacks.

FRIDAY, April 12.—The supply of English Wheat since Monday is moderate; the trade is slow, but Monday's prices are fully supported. There was a little business doing in free foreign at former rates. Several cargoes of foreign Barley have arrived during the week; the trade was, in consequence, exceedingly dull, and secondary qualities 1s. per quarter cheaper. The supply of Oats was moderate; there was a fair sale at fully as good terms as Monday. No alteration in Beans and Peas. The duty on Oats fell to 6s. yesterday.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive a copy, weekly, of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 87, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND, are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council respectfully request that their friends, in all places where committees for raising subscriptions to the £100,000 Fund have not been already formed, will proceed to their formation as soon as possible, and transmit their names to the LEAGUE Offices, Manchester.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

THE FIRST "PROTECTION SOCIETY" TRACT.

The mountain has brought forth its first-born mouse. With the voice of E. S. Cayley, Esq., M.P., the mouse squeaks, on authority, in a shilling pamphlet, the "reasons for the formation of the Agricultural Protection Society," and addresses them "to the industrious classes of the United Kingdom." More industrious must they be than the famous individual who actually picked out two grains of corn from a bushel of chaff, if they detect as many reasons in the twenty-four pages of words which constitute this first protection tract. For ourselves we confess to having gone through it repeatedly without being able to retain a single definite impression of what the writer would be at, in the way of argument. This blank result may be in part owing to such a confusion of style, if style it can be called, as is rarely allowed to achieve its passage through the press. An extract in Mr. Cobden's speech at Bristol, reported in our last number, has perhaps given the reader some notion of the mode in which Mr. Cayley heaps, not Pelion upon Ossa, but the optative mood upon the potential, and both upon the subjunctive; building a possibility upon a contingency, and resting the contingency upon a hypothetical prophecy. We cannot grapple with what Mr. Cayley has said, but only with what he would have said if he could have said it as he should say it, and might have said it if brains and language had been propitious.

If—for we must speak with becoming hesitation—we can fix on any one semblance of an argument as the leading thought of this tract, it is that from alleged experience:—"It is impossible to deny that British agriculture, manufactures, and commerce have been gradually growing up to their present height, for many centuries, under protective laws." (P. 12.) Something to the same effect is, to use a favourite phrase of Mr. Cayley's, and of Tony Lampton's, "more or less" distinctly, repeated in almost every page. We guess, therefore, that Mr. Cayley thinks he thought so, and that Duke Chair and Duke Deputy Chair sanctioned the hallucination. The argument would be as good for the old Game Laws, under which, as a county member once told the House of Commons, we put down Napoleon Buonaparte and perfected our glorious constitution; or for capital punishments; or for the laws against betting on racehorses. What is the illustration immediately subjoined by Mr. Cayley? "When by tyranny and intolerance the artisans of other nations were driven from their own lands, they were received with open arms and protected in this." Indeed, Mr. Cayley: and were they not pelted, and hunted, and harried by the protectionists of native industry? So says the history. Fortunately, they were not entirely squashed, although they were foreigners, and imported their foreign skill and labour; and so it happened that, in opposition to the protective system and spirit, "the result is, that great bodies of the people are now engaged, and a large amount of capital is invested, in producing their respective fabrics." The instance is a pregnant refutation of the purpose which it was adduced to support.

Nor is it the fact that the growth of manufactures, or of agriculture, has been the "gradual" result or accompaniment, through centuries, of what are called protective laws. It has been a comparatively recent and rapid development. It chiefly dates from after the middle of the last century. Steam and mechanical invention made our manufactures, and they have aggrandised agriculture. If "protection" did not act as preventive and limitative, still its powerlessness as a cause had been previously exhibited. The "many centuries" had only brought us to the threshold of that age of invention. At the commencement of the reign of George III., a very large majority of the population never tasted wheaten bread. Agricultural produce was not more than one-third of its present amount. And although Mr. Cayley affirms that the British grower "has been protected, more or less, for the last two centuries, up to 48s.," from 1771 to the French war, he did not make 48s. two years out of three. From 1716 to 1755, the average was under 46s. And we were then an exporting country, with a bounty. Then followed increased manufactures, importation of grain, and higher prices for home-grown produce than "protection" had ever given.

But Mr. Cayley and the Anti-League, which makes itself responsible for his production, are by no means particular as to facts. He says, "it was the unprofitable price of wheat for four or five years together which, causing the farmers to turn off their labourers, produced the agricultural labourers' disturbances in 1830. Their distress arose from cheap bread, which they could not buy." (P. 19.) We turn to Sparkman, and find the average price of wheat from 1824 to 1830 inclusive, to have been 63s. 11d.; 68s. 6d.; 58s. 8d.; 58s. 6d.; 60s. 5d.; 66s. 3d.; 64s. 3d. So much for the "cheap bread which they could not buy." False facts for years assort well with a false history for centuries.

Both are matched with false quotations; always false in spirit, and generally garbled in the letter. It is rare to meet with literary dishonesty so glaring as that of Mr. Cayley in his professed quotations from Adam Smith. Nor is the dishonesty that of an opponent, who, in the eagerness of discussion, perverts the arguments he would demolish. It is of deeper die. The "Wealth of Nations" is many times quoted that Mr. Cayley's conclusions may be "confirmed by the authority of a writer in whom all parties place greater confidence than in any other." The charge of unfaithfulness in these quotations is a grave one. We shall prove it; and if Mr. Cayley had favoured his readers with references, we know enough of Adam Smith to be quite sure the proof might be extended.

"Of this law, although not favourable to restrictions in theory, yet never for a moment, throughout his great work, contemplating the displacement of labour engaged in the agriculture of this country, Dr. Adam Smith says, 'as defence is of much more importance than opulence, the Act of Navigation is, perhaps, the wisest of all the commercial regulations of England.'" (Pp. 21, 22.)

Had the word "however" ("as defence is, however, &c.") not been omitted from this citation, the reader might have guessed, what now he will see no trace of, that Adam Smith condemns commercial regulations as generally unwise; and considers this, in particular, as a double tax on the country, enhancing the price we pay for foreign commodities, and reducing that which we obtain for our own. The praise bestowed on the act has exclusive regard to the training of seamen for manning the navy, and thus defending the country from invasion. The "displacement of labour engaged in the agriculture of this country" is not amongst the evils from which Adam Smith looked for "defence" to the Navigation Act. That is an economical consideration; and economically, Adam Smith most distinctly condemns, and assigns his reasons for condemning, the tendency of the act. His language refers, not to working men, but to fighting men; not to labourers, but to sailors. Instead of the act putting the "working classes" in a "happier or more comfortable" condition, which is Mr. Cayley's argument, Adam Smith's is, that a naval school may be worth paying for, though it is costly to the entire population. Whether Adam Smith was right or wrong herein is a question into which we need not enter. That has nothing to do with the perversion of the passage. This very misrepresentation, which was started by Mr. Baring, has been exposed before. But

"Destroy his web of sophistry—in vain,
The creature's at his dirty work again."

At pp. 7-8 Mr. Cayley speaks of the national debt as a burden upon the industry of the country. That it falls, or that taxation for its payment is levied, exclusively or disproportionately upon agriculture he does not affirm. But the falsehood which in his own person he avoids (except by inuendo) he endeavours to put into the mouth of Adam Smith, whom he cites as saying "it will be generally advantageous to lay some burden upon foreign for the protection of domestic industry, when some tax is imposed at home on the produce of the latter."

Now, mark here:—

1. The word protection is not Adam Smith's, but Mr. Cayley's. "Encouragement" is in the text, but the substitution of "protection" strengthens the case, and it is substituted very unwarrantably.

2. Adam Smith does not assert the general advantage of the process; his words are, "the second case, in which it will generally be advantageous," &c.; the two cases being merely exceptions to the real generality as contemplated by Adam Smith. Mr. Cayley has foisted the excepted case into the place of the general rule.

3. The context demonstrates that Adam Smith intends, not the taxation which the National Debt requires upon all classes of the population, but a specific tax upon some commodity, such as would be an excise duty upon home-grown wheat. This is the very instance sometimes mentioned by Mr. Cobden; a tax at the mill on all corn ground into flour, whether British or foreign; from which he allows that the latter should not, in that case, be exempt. What Adam Smith would have thought of Mr. Cayley's gross perversion of his meaning is clear from a passage which speedily follows, upon the very same point of argument.

"Taxes upon the necessaries of life have nearly the same effect upon the circumstances of the people as a poor soil and a bad climate. Provisions are thereby rendered dearer in the same manner as if it required extraordinary labour and expense to raise them. As in the natural scarcity arising from soil and climate it would be absurd to direct the people in what manner they ought to employ their capitals and industry, so is it likewise in the artificial scarcity arising from such taxes. To be left to accommodate, as well as they could, their industry to their situation, and to find out those employments in which, notwithstanding their unfavourable circumstances, they might have some advantage either in the home or in the foreign market, is what, in both cases, would evidently be most for their advantage. To lay a new tax upon them, because they are already overburdened with taxes, and because they already pay too dear for the necessaries of life, to make them likewise pay too dear for the greater part of other commodities, is certainly a most absurd way of making amends."—Book iv., c. 2.

In p. 6, Mr. Cayley gives the following as "the words of an authority much quoted on this subject, Dr. Adam Smith." The passage is printed consecutively, without any breaks, as if it so stood in the original.

"That the whole annual produce of the land and labour of every country divides itself into three parts, and constitutes a revenue to three different orders of people: to those who live by rent, to those who live by wages, and to those who live by the profits of stock. The interest of the first of these great orders, those who live by rent, is strictly and inseparably connected with the general interest of the society. Whatever either promotes or obstructs the one, necessarily promotes or obstructs the other. The interest of the second order, that of those who live by wages, is as strictly connected with the interest of the society as that of the first. The interest of the third order has not the same connexion with the general interest of the society as that of the other two; master manufacturers and merchants are of this order."

The falsifications and omissions are here so manifold, that we must give up an undue portion of our space for the best mode of showing them; that of reprinting the entire passage from which Mr. Cayley has, with a purpose worthy of the process, picked, culled, and arranged what suited his object. We begin where he does, and end with the last sentence from which he has selected.

* "The whole annual produce of the land and labour of every country [or, what comes to the same thing, the whole price of that annual produce naturally] divides itself [it has already been observed] into three parts: the rent of land, the wages of labour, and the profits of stock; and constitutes a revenue to three different orders of people: to those who live by rent, to those who live by wages, and to those who live by profit (the profits of stock). [These are the three great, original, and constituent orders of every civilized society, from whose revenue that of every other order is ultimately derived]."

* We put Mr. Cayley's omissions [in brackets] and his insertions (in italics).

"The interest of the first of those three great orders (those who live by rent), it appears from what has been just now said, is strictly and inseparably connected with the general interest of the society. Whatever either promotes or obstructs the one, necessarily promotes or obstructs the other. [When the public deliberates concerning any regulation of commerce or police, the proprietors of land never can mislead it, with a view to promote the interest of their own particular order; at least, if they have any tolerable knowledge of that interest. They are indeed too often defective in this tolerable knowledge. They are the only one of the three orders whose revenue costs them neither labour nor care, but comes to them, as it were, of its own accord, and independent of any plan or project of their own. That indolence, which is the natural effect of the ease and security of their situation, renders them too often not only ignorant, but incapable of that application of mind which is necessary in order to foresee and understand the consequences of any public regulation.]

"The interest of the second order, that of those who live by wages, is as strictly connected with the interest of the society as that of the first. [The wages of the labourer, it has already been shown, are never so high as when the demand for labour is continually rising, or when the quantity employed is every year increasing considerably. When this real wealth of the society becomes stationary, his wages are soon reduced to what is barely enough to enable him to bring up a family, or to continue the race of labourers: when the society declines, they fall even below this. The order of proprietors may, perhaps, gain more by the prosperity of the society than that of labourers; but there is no order that suffers so cruelly from its decline. But though the interest of the labourer is strictly connected with that of the society, he is incapable either of comprehending that interest, or of understanding its connexion with his own. His condition leaves him no time to receive the necessary information, and his education and habits are commonly such as to render him unfit to judge, even though he was fully informed. In the public deliberations, therefore, his voice is little heard and less regarded, except upon some particular occasions, when his clamour is animated, set on, and supported by his employers, not for him, but their own particular purposes.]

"[His employers constitute the third order, that of those who live by profit. It is the stock that is employed for the sake of profit which puts into motion the greater part of the useful labour of every society. The plans and projects of the employers of stock regulate and direct all the most important operations of labour, and profit is the end proposed by all those plans and projects. But the rate of profit does not, like rent and wages, rise with the prosperity, and fall with the declension of the society. On the contrary, it is naturally low in rich, and high in poor countries; and it is always highest in the countries which are going fastest to ruin.] The interest of this third order, [therefore], has not the same connexion with the general interest of society as that of the other two. Merchants and master manufacturers are in (of) this order [the two classes of people who commonly employ the largest capitals, and who by their wealth draw to themselves the greatest share of the public consideration. As during their whole lives they are engaged in plans and projects, they have frequently more acuteness of understanding than the greater part of country gentlemen]."—Book I., c. 2.

The conclusion of the passage is a censure upon merchants and master manufacturers for their attempts to narrow competition, and so create an artificial profit to the damage of the community; i.e., for their then aiming at the very thing which many of them now oppose in the landlords. They are rebuked by Adam Smith as Protectionists and would-be Monopolists; and, on that account, they are said to have a distinct interest from the society. A fortiori, the landlords, if the Corn Laws be their interest, as they imagine, have a separate interest from society.

The first deception attempted by Mr. Cayley in his garbled version of the foregoing extract is, that Adam Smith regarded the landlord interest as identified with that of the community when it aims at artificial profits by narrowing competition; the very point on which turns his condemnation of the mercantile classes.

The second deception is, that the cultivators of the soil—the tenant-farmers—the real agriculturists, belong to either the first or second class, whereas Adam Smith obviously includes them in the third class, which, in his arrangement, comprises all the employers of labour.

A third deception is, that Adam Smith selected merchants and master manufacturers, as distinguished from others who live by the profits of stock, for specially insisting on the inferior connexion of their interest with that of the society under any other circumstances than that of their striving for some kind of monopoly analogous to the Corn Laws.

Some comments appended in the pamphlet prove, either that the concoctor of this tract took his extracts at second hand without ever consulting the original at all, or that he has the weakest and most confused head that ever ennobled the imitation of a brain; or that a more arrant knave never put pen to paper.

The frauds we have exposed are "published by the Society," "the Agricultural Protection Society," "President, the Duke of Richmond; Vice-President, the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos; Trustees, the Duke of Norfolk, the Duke of Rutland, the Duke of Cleveland, the Earl of Yarborough;" and with twenty M.P.'s on its Committee. The public has a right to hold them all responsible so long as their sanction continues to this publication. They may regard such perversions, in support of a false claim to the high authority of Adam Smith, for that by which they profit, as fair play in the game of discussion. Society will not take the matter quite so easily. The days are gone when the condescension of dukes in quoting a philosopher, might have palliated deceptive quotations. They are in the arena of discussion, and must fight it out fairly, or endure the disgraceful consequences. Very valuable must the reputation of Adam Smith be to lords and gentlemen who can allow themselves to be parties to its temporary purchase at the expense of their own.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1844.

Tenth Week, ending Saturday, April 20.

Parliament re-assembled, after the Easter recess, the House of Lords on Tuesday, and the House of Commons on Monday last. With the exception of the very brief discussion which took place on Thursday evening, nothing of importance has occurred in relation to FREE TRADE, or, in fact, in relation to anything, except the voting of the supplies.

Lord Ashley has announced the course which he will adopt on the Factories Bill. He will wait till the third reading, as the stage at which he supposes he can, with most effect, bring forward his propositions; and then he will move the insertion of new clauses, the purport of which will be, that factory labour should be restricted to ELEVEN Hours for two years, commencing with October next; and that the TEN Hours should commence on and after the 1st of October, 1847.

By postponing any proceedings till the third reading of the bill, Lord Ashley gives Ministers a most decided advantage. One debate and one vote will settle the whole matter. If Ministers triumph the bill will pass, and be carried up to the House of Lords; and thus the agitation for the Ten Hours will be settled, so far as the Legislature is concerned. Should, however, Lord Ashley maintain his majority (which is not anticipated), then events of the greatest importance will ensue. Ministers will positively resign; and their resignation will be the result of that great struggle which is now going on in this country between CAPITAL and LABOUR, and which will continue to embarrass every Administration, and to distract the Legislature, until the gates are thrown open, and both capital and labour are permitted the full freedom and wide scope which active industry demands.

In the meantime, every constituency should put itself in a course of normal training for a new general election. It may come more suddenly than the country anticipates. So far as the Anti-Corn-Law League is concerned, it is to it a matter of perfect indifference what Government holds the reins of power; and it will certainly lend itself to nothing which partakes of a party character. Its banner is PRINCIPLE; its course of action is straightforward; and it will take Free Trade as readily from Sir Robert Peel as from Lord John Russell. And even if the country should be thrown into a state of confusion by the sudden resignation of the present Administration, whatever advantage or whatever damage might thereby result to mere partisans, nothing but good can arise to the question of Free Trade. Wrapped up in this "question of questions" is everything dear to an industrious and a civilized community. Beginning with the lowest consideration, we may ascend to the highest. Cheapness disengaging capital; disengaged capital stimulating industry; stimulated industry bringing profit to the capitalist, and comfort to the labourer; the labourer, more in demand and better paid, improving his own condition, regulating his own hours, laying up a store for old age, and holding up his head to his employer in all the honest dignity of manhood; the active and industrious trader, put into heart by increased gains, employing more men, paying better wages, and freely sparing his subscription to the hospital, his subscription to the school, his subscription to the missionary society, buying more books, encouraging literature, art, and science, thus, out of Free Trade, alleviating natural calamities, exalting the tendencies of human nature, and carrying civilization and religion to the remotest quarters of the globe. All this is worth overthrowing any Ministry for; and the citizen who, however strong his partisan feelings may be, cannot sacrifice Whig and Tory to FREE TRADE, is incapable of comprehending that which constitutes the very soul and life of humanity.

On Thursday, Mr. Milner Gibson brought forward the following motion:—

"That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, representing that, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to obtain authentic information upon all matters connected with the agriculture of the United Kingdom; that this information is altogether deficient, so that at this time even the extent of land under cultivation, and the amount of its produce, are subjects only of vague conjecture; that the total absence of all statistical knowledge in reference to this important subject has at various times proved detrimental to the public interests; and praying her Majesty to devise measures for supplying to Parliament, from time to time, statements of the breadth of land under cultivation for each species of produce respectively, and the amount of produce derived from the same; together with such other information as will exhibit, as far as practicable, a perfect view of the agricultural capability and production of the United Kingdom."

The way in which this motion was received marks a very considerable improvement within the House of Commons. A year or two ago, its announcement would have set every agricultural owl and bat hooting and flapping his wings; and awful danger to Church, State, and the country would have been apprehended to be lurking under it. Now, it was listened to with respectful interest; and even Mr. Christopher (who, with Lord Worsley, represents the "Parts of Lindsey"), who had seated himself on the front Ministerial benches, and looked the very picture of grim watchfulness, was compelled to admit that the motion did not menace the agricultural interest with positive peril. It is such a great thing to get even an approach to common sense on the subject of corn in the House of Commons, that we have some reason to be thankful for "sma' mercies."

Mr. Milner Gibson treated his subject exceedingly well. He protested against his motion being viewed as an oblique insinuation that we grew too little corn for our own consumption. Free Trade, he pithily observed, was a sort of quid pro quo, which could not be affected if we grew ten times more corn than we did. He placed his motion on its own independent grounds, that of its practicability, its importance, and its necessity to the advancement of that portion of statistical science connected with national progress. All statistical writers deplored the absence of the information which he sought, and pointed out the evils which this omission in the machinery of the Executive led to. McCulloch, Porter, Tooke, the author of "The History of Prices," the Speaker himself, in a pamphlet which he had published, and other authorities, had pointed out the advantages which would ensue from the collection of agricultural statistics by some department of the Government. It would solve the interesting problem of the relation between food and population; would enable us regularly to trace the connexion between produce and price; would put an end to the controversies arising out of conflicting statements, based on conjectural estimates; while the farmers, if it were properly explained to them, and backed by legislative authority, would have no rational objection to the returns from which the information would be derived. For excuse reasons, we required returns from the growers of hops, and also of the sales of grain, and, therefore, he hoped that the Government would not oppose his motion.

Mr. Gladstone, who had listened with considerable attention to Mr. M. Gibson's speech, admitted the importance and the desirableness of the objects contemplated by the motion. Perhaps, of all parties, the grower of corn would be the one most benefited by a good system of agricultural statistics; and the Government had the subject much at heart, and were actually engaged in ascertaining to what extent it was practicable to carry it into effect. It would, therefore, be imprudent in the House to pledge itself to the motion before they had really ascertained how and in what manner it could be best carried out. He hoped, therefore, that Mr. Gibson would rest satisfied with these assurances, and withdraw his motion.

Mr. Christopher, as we have said, was sitting on the front Ministerial benches, and watching, like the dragon guarding the Hesperides of agriculture, anything which might seem to threaten cornish security. Finding that the Government had sense enough to declare their intention to carry out the objects contemplated by the motion, he got up and said he was assured that it would be a very desirable thing if the farmer could know authoritatively the actual quantity of produce grown in this country, as it would tend still farther to promote steadiness of price. He, for one, as the representative of a purely agricultural district, had no objection to the motion, but he thought that it would be best left in the hands of the Government.

Mr. Brotherton recommended Mr. M. Gibson not to press his motion.

Mr. Gibson consented to its withdrawal, and the House immediately afterwards adjourned.

MEETINGS.

GREAT MEETING AT COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

The usual weekly meeting of the members and friends of the Anti-Corn-Law League was resumed on Wednesday evening, at Covent-garden Theatre. The house was crowded in every part, and the greatest enthusiasm prevailed, the announcement made by the honourable member for Stockport of the proposed bazaar to be held in the theatre being greeted with loud and continued cheering by the audience.

At seven o'clock Mr. Richard Cobden, M.P. for Stockport, took the chair, at which time we observed the following gentlemen on the platform:—

The Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, M.P.; Thomas Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P.; H. G. Ward, Esq., M.P.; George Thompson, Esq.; Colonel T. Perronet Thompson; Colonel Tucker; Dr. Cooke Taylor; W. A. Wilkinson, Esq.; P. A. Taylor, Esq.; the Rev. Mr. Clark; Dr. Girdwood; Norman Wilkinson, Esq.; S. Kennedy, Esq.; W. Harvey, Esq.; H. L. Keeling, Esq.; John Moir Ware, Esq.; J. B. Kingdon, Esq.; Peter Martineau, Esq.; R. Ireland, Esq.; R. Southall, Esq.; John Lator, Esq.; Major Red Revel; William Lockett, Esq.; Manchester; Charles A. Amber, Esq.; Charles Clifford, Esq.; R. W. Cole, Esq.; Henry Lloyd Morgan, Esq.; General Wyatt; Robert Bagshaw, Esq.; C. Jones, Esq.; J. B. Donkin, Esq.; B. D. Donkin, Esq.; John Macartney, Esq.; Manchester; John Semple, Esq.; Glasgow; John Hanning, Esq.; Stratford-on-Avon; George Peile, Esq.; Whitehaven; C. Dixon, Esq.; Wellington, Shropshire; W. Thornborrow, Esq.; L. Wiltshire, Esq.; James Bailey, Esq.; Wm. Edith, Esq.; Rev. H. Richards; George Ridout, Esq.; J. Towne, Esq.; Hugh Shield, Esq.; William Hepple, Esq.; Bishop Auckland, Durham; James Anderson, Esq.; Dr. King; W. Gresing, Esq., &c. &c.

The Secretary having read the minutes of the last meeting, on the motion of Mr. BRIGHT, M.P., seconded by Mr. VILLIERS, M.P., they were unanimously confirmed.

The CHAIRMAN then came forward, and was greeted with the most vociferous cheering from all parts of the Theatre, which having subsided he spoke as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, during the short cessation of our meetings in this theatre we have been attending a few meetings in the country, and it may be interesting to you to learn the spirit and enthusiasm which prevail elsewhere. (Cheers.) I have had the honour of attending a meeting since we last met in Bristol, and I must say that a more influential meeting, one of higher moral tone or calculated to effect greater good in that important borough, I never attended anywhere. In that meeting upwards of £600 were subscribed in the room towards our League fund. (Loud cheers.) Subsequently I attended a meeting where I had the honour of meeting Mr. Villiers, at Wolverhampton. Now, I need not tell you what the spirit of Wolverhampton is when you know that it returns Mr. Villiers and Mr. Thornely to Parliament to represent it. (Loud cheers.) No room was large enough to hold the Free-Traders who wished there to congregate; so we had a pavilion built, and there they assembled to the number of 2000 or 3000 to greet their members, and they did not separate till they had subscribed £820 to the League Fund. (Renewed cheers.) Then I had the honour of attending a meeting in the Amphitheatre at Liverpool, and there we were joined by a distinguished friend from the north, Mr. Fox Maule (cheers)—one who, unless common fame misrepresents him, is heir to some thing like 60,000 good acres under the plough; yet he came there to bear his testimony to the merits of the Liverpool, that free trade in corn was as desirable for agriculturists as it was for manufacturers or traders. (Loud and continued cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, since we last met there have been changes in political life, owing to a certain death, which will involve elections in several boroughs. But I must say I think the chapter of accidents is not very favourable to us; for if we had the choice of a battle-field with the monopolists we should not go to Horsham, or to Huntingdon, or to Woodstock. ("Hear," and cheers.) I believe that in every instance where a vacancy occurs a contest will be fought if a Free Trader can be found who will be put up by the voters, even if that candidate can only poll 20 votes. (Renewed applause.) Now, we have been charged with dictating to constituencies. (Gentlemen, we only proffer to "co-operate" with constituencies (cheers)—we go to boroughs to offer our co-operation to the local members of the League resident in those boroughs to which we go; and if you hear in any case of a contest passing over without a League candidate being proposed, you may conclude that it was because the League Council did not choose to dictate to the local Free-Traders, but deferred to their feelings, not at present to contest the borough, but to leave it for future organization. (Cheers.) In the case of Exeter there will be a contest. (Cheers.) I am happy to say that General Briggs, an officer connected with the Honourable East India Company's service, distinguished for his philanthropy, his public spirit, and his love of freedom in every form, is put in nomination as a candidate for the borough of Exeter (loud cheers); and whatever may be the result of the contest at Exeter, I am satisfied that, with a borough of 30,000 inhabitants, if we fight one battle and lose it upon League principles, we are certain to fight the next battle and win. (Renewed applause.) Now, I am anxious that our friends here and elsewhere should never feel disappointed, notwithstanding the kind advice that is given to us by some of our newspaper friends, at one repulse—for I will not call it a defeat, but simply a repulse—at an election contest. Bear in mind that a League candidate stands for the purpose of educating constituencies. (Cheers.) We go into a borough, and we merely transfer our lectures and packet of tracts to that borough, at a time when the inhabitants are all alive for politics (cheers); and it is, in fact, simply availing ourselves of that opportunity to get hearers which the excitement of an election always ensures; for we are convinced, whatever the issue of one contest may be, that we can do as much to educate a borough in one week during the excitement of an election, as we can do in a month under other circumstances. (Loud cheers.) It is like a recruiting party going into a town with drums and colours flying—it is, in fact, a recruiting party entering a town in fair time. (Renewed cheers.) And do not let us have an impression, or let the public have an impression, that the League is spending money in boroughmongering, bribery, or anything of that sort. No! We go to prevent other people spending money in bribery in boroughs. (Immense cheers.) Why, you are accustomed, from what you read of elections, to think that a contest in a borough involves an expense of something like a thousand or twelve hundred pounds. I venture to say that in a borough like Woodstock, or Huntingdon, or Horsham, if any body spend more than £100 in an election contest, he has not spent it legally. (Loud cheers.) And if we do nothing else in our visits to these boroughs, we are at least accomplishing a great good in preventing other parties pursuing that system of demoralization which makes an election contest little more or less than a trial of the length of the candidates' purses. (Cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, I have an announcement to make to you before I resume my seat. Many applications have been made to the Council of the League, requesting that they will have a bazaar in this theatre before the close of the season. (Hear, hear, hear.) Many ladies in London, and in the country also, have intimated that they are already at work to supply materials to the bazaar, in order that they may by that means—not knowing any other—assist the cause of the League by contributing in that pleasant manner to its fund. (Loud and continued cheers.) The Council have determined to adopt the suggestion of our fair friends, and I mention it now in order that all those who may feel disposed to aid in furnishing articles to the bazaar may be giving diligent attention to that object. (Renewed cheers.) I will venture to make one suggestion, as coming from me—it is as part of the exhibition for this bazaar. (Cheers and laughter.) I don't mean to exhibit myself. (Renewed laughter.) I am anxious that we should have a collection of specimens of every species of manufacture in the kingdom brought to a focus in this bazaar. (Cheers.) We will have everything made of metal, from a steam engine down to a needle. We'll have specimens of everything that can be made in silk, from the most magnificent embroidered garment down to the coarsest and narrowest ribbon; and we'll have everything that cotton can produce, and everything that the linen weaver can make; and we'll bring everything of every sort that manufactures can produce for exhibition in this theatre. (Loud cheers.) And when we have brought these materials together we'll invite the monopolists (loud cheers)—we'll invite the restrictionists to see this collection; we'll point to it as a proof of what the ingenuity, the unaided and unprotected skill of manufactures can do without the Duke of Richmond or the Duke of Buckingham to help them. (Loud cheers.) And having brought them to view this exhibition, we'll put the question to them, and this only, "Do you think that the hands which made these beautiful and ingenious articles ought to be hanging idly by the sides of men who are pining for want of bread?" (Great cheering.) Now, ladies and gentlemen, I have the honour of introducing to you, in the first place, a distinguished friend of our cause, who has often rendered good service in another way, where he has few to match him in debate, though it be the first time he has appeared upon these boards,—my honourable friend Mr. Ward, the member for Sheffield. (Great cheering.)

Mr. WARD, who came forward amidst loud cheering, then addressed the meeting as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I can assure you with perfect truth that I appear to-night, as my honourable friend the chairman has said, for the first time upon these boards with some little reluctance and a great many doubts; and I tell you honestly that these feelings have been increased instead of lessened—however ungrateful at first the expression may seem by the manner in which you have been pressed to receive the announcement of my name from the chair. I cannot but be too sensible that your kind reception of me bespeaks an impression which the next ten minutes will inevitably destroy. (Cries of "No, no.")

That is the sense in which I use the word "reluctance," because you must all feel that I should not come if I had any doubts or misgiving as to the principles which we meet here to support: on the contrary, to the fullest extent in which words can express approval, I do concur most unreservedly and unhesitatingly with my honourable friends around me in their advocacy of the principles of Free Trade (cheers)—Free Trade in everything (renewed cheers); but, if you will let me finish the sentence, above all and before all, for it is the keystone to the whole position of our opponents, free trade in corn. (Cheers.) If I feel any reluctance or doubt, if I may use the word, in presenting myself before you, it is because I know the men and the minds so well who have advocated this great national cause—for it is a "national cause"—up to the present point with a perseverance and a determination to overcome all obstacles, and an ability which are the surest pledge of its ultimate success, not to feel pretty sure that they have not left to those who come after them—the labourers at the eleventh hour, like myself—the shadow of novelty, either in argument or in facts, to avail themselves of in addressing you. Now, gentlemen, I tell you fairly I have always regarded these weekly meetings,—the constant attendance, the flattering attention which is paid by all of you to the discussion of a subject which the House of Commons esteems so dry and so exhausted that we can hardly get 60 members to sit out an Anti-Corn Law debate,—I have always regarded that as one of the most remarkable phenomena of our times. I know the pleasure which it gives to men of intellect like yourselves to watch the way in which my honourable friend the member for Wolverhampton, for instance, puts an idea into the crucible of his mind, if I may use the expression, and turns it out again, stripped of all its alloy, naked, as it ought to stand, before you, just for what it is worth; and though the subject is always the same, and discussed pretty much by the same men, still I can appreciate in common with yourselves the endless varieties which my hon. friend the chairman contrives to cast into all the details of the subjects to which he applies his powerful mind. The constant recurrence of these meetings, and the marvellous way in which I see this house now filled in spite of the thousand attractions which London presents to all of us elsewhere, are proofs of no common interest in no common cause. (Hear.) And you are right, gentlemen, you are perfectly right, to encourage by these flattering marks of your concurrence and sympathy those who are fighting your battles. I recollect the time when it was not so; when the apathy of London was constantly cast in our teeth, and we were told to look at the 300 delegates coming up here and crowding the lobbies of the House of Commons and the avenues to Downing-street, with petitions from Manchester, Glasgow, Sheffield, and all the great manufacturing towns; and to mark the way in which the Londoners stood aloof; that there was not the slightest proof of sympathy or congeniality of feeling: we were told that this was perfectly natural, that it was inevitable; that London had a separate interest in the matter; that Free Trade was a very good thing for Lancashire, but a very bad thing for Westminster or Marylebone; that you Londoners knew better what you were about than to join in a movement for cheap bread; and that a well-regulated principle of self-interest, as Sir Robert Peel told us the other night, being the moving spring, the "vivifying principle," I think he called it, of every thing in this world, my honourable friend and the whole Council of the League might waste their eloquence in London in vain; their speeches could never alter your facts. Then we were told, "This is not merely the case at the West end; look at the East. At all events you will allow that the merchants of the city of London ought to know something about commercial affairs; they are hard-headed practical men, not likely to run away with any foolish notions—not disposed to give a bird in the hand for one in the bush; and yet look how the City representation stands! Why, out of four seats you have barely got one, and that one was a sort of modified edition of Free Trade, for if Lord John Russell had held precisely the same opinions as Mr. Cobden, there is not the least doubt that he would have been thrown out at the last election." Such was the language held to us about three years ago. I do not think those people talk quite so glibly about the City election now. ("Hear," and laughter.) Somehow or other you have managed to alter the feeling on that subject. Upon the last occasion the Pro-Corn-Law party confessed they had the best candidate they could possibly have, so good that they have sent him down to Huntingdon now. (Laughter.) He was a gentleman of the highest commercial respectability, as fluent as Mr. Gladstone, and—I was going to use a very bold expression—almost as plausible as Sir Robert Peel (renewed laughter); and yet, somehow or other, things did not turn out as they anticipated; Mr. Baring was not returned for the City, but my friend Mr. Pattison was elected. Now, the difference was an enormous one. I do not mean any personal allusion to Mr. Pattison in using that word. (Renewed laughter.) Really, coupled with the constancy of your attendance here, it does bespeak a change of feeling from which I for one venture to anticipate the most gratifying results. But I was quite sure that a change of feeling would come. I know that a fallacy is sometimes the most obstinate thing in existence to deal with if it is cleverly put, because there are so few men in this world who think; they all like to follow one another, like sheep over a gap. If you apply your words properly there is nothing they will not swallow. I found an expression the other day—you will wonder at the great authority I am going to quote, but one seldom reads a book without getting something out of it—I happened to be reading a work of an exceedingly intelligent man whom you all know as "the American Clock-maker, Sam Slick." (Laughter.) There can be nothing very alarming in quoting Sam Slick. He says that there is a sort of frenzy in this country for swallowing fallacies of every kind, "that we are perfect turkeys;" and then he goes on to explain the phrase—for I did not know what he meant before—he says "they are a considerable large print, the Bull family, you can read them by moonlight; they swallow a falsehood, them fellows, as fast as a turkey does a grasshopper, taking it right down whole without winking, and then ask for more." (Loud laughter.) However, there are some falsehoods so very large that they really cannot help sticking, and I always thought the assertion that London had a separate interest in the Corn Laws was one of those things that could not be gulped for any length of time. But it was gulped at one period; the whole town swallowed it three years ago. I hold in my hand a pamphlet which almost turned the west end topsy turvey in 1841. I went into the shop this morning where it was published; some time ago I was there and they told me they had sold 42,000; to-day they said they had disposed of 50,000. It is "an Appeal to London Tradesmen, by one of themselves" (laughter); and in that appeal the whole gist and pith of the argument of the writer is to prove that London's interest in the Corn Laws is perfectly distinct from that of the country at large; that you all share in the plunder of the landowners; that they fleece others in order to enrich you. (Laughter.) When that most respectable individual, Sir Edward Knatchbull (renewed laughter), tells us from the Treasury bench that he cannot do without the Corn Laws, that he should be very willing to part with them if he knew how to provide jointures for his daughters or a dowry for his wife without them, it is quite clear that the London tradesmen must have an equal interest in these Corn Laws, because they alone enable Sir Edward Knatchbull to pay for his liveries, or for the painting of his family coach. The west-end tradesmen quite believed at that time, and, for aught I know, imagine so at the present day, that high rents in Kent meant high rents in St. James's, and that the whole existence of the London tradesmen depends on the residence of the aristocracy here; for whatever might be their gain by cheap bread, this pamphlet says a man might save £20 in the course of the year by it, but he would lose £1000 in the way of trade: that one dull season would of itself do him more harm than forty years of cheap bread would do him good. Now, that is what I venture to call a falsehood which could not be swallowed long; it was one of those fallacies that was so transparent and self-evident, that nothing but time was required to make you all aware of its monstrosity, and ashamed of its absurdity too; because the gain of a tradesman by the repeal of the Corn Laws is not to be measured by his individual savings in his own household, his advantage consists in the aggregate savings of every body else. (Cheers.) Money saved, recollect, is money spent. If a man saves money, it is spent in another sense; and if he does not mispend his money by paying too dear for his bread, he has so much more money to spend in clothes or goods. To tell me that London—which has no manufactures of her own, whose business it is to dispense and circulate everything which the industry of other people creates, that such a city as this has a separate interest in the Corn Laws from the rest of the country, and could thrive amidst its universal decay—why, it is reversing the homely fable of the Belly and the Members, and supposing that the former was conspiring against the extremities, the hands, the feet, the eyes, and the teeth, which supplied its wants. (Cheers.) Now, just let me ask you, to what is it that London owes her real greatness and prosperity? Does any sane man believe that it is to the residence of the few thousand landowning families in our streets and squares, which they leave deserted during eight months in the year? (Cries of "No, no," and cheers.) Why, if every duke was a Cæsar, and each squire a millionaire, and all the younger brothers came up with a Fortunatus's purse in their pockets, instead of an inexhaustible capacity for exhausting the purses of other people (laughter), even then how would their united efforts create such a community as this? Just let me ask, what London is? Why, in the first place it is the greatest commercial city in the world—it is the capital of the greatest empire on the face of the earth—an empire which even realizes the Spanish boast, that in the Queen's dominions the sun never sets. It is the point of inter-communication between colonies which stretch almost from the North Pole—from Canada to the Cape of Good Hope—and which bring the indigo of India, and the wool of Australia from the antipodes, to enrich the manufacturers of Leeds. It is the seat of a commerce that would seem fabulous to the merchants of Venice, Tyre, and Carthage in the olden times! Who, then, will persuade me that the landowning aristocracy has anything to do with the creation of such a community as this? You don't do yourselves justice even to imagine such an absurdity. (Hear, hear.) I don't want to weary you with description, still less with detail; but if you would allow me upon this one point just to remind you a little of what London is, then I think the 50,000 copies of this pamphlet will go afterwards for pretty much what they are worth. You have a population which has doubled since 1801; it was then 888,000 souls, it is now, by the census of 1841, 1,832,000. You have a town which is five miles and a half long, take it where you will, but if you measure it from Blackwall to Chelsea it is 7½ miles. It reaches from north to south 3½ miles; it is a perfect German principality—a Coburg if you please, or a Hesse Homburg in brick. You have a river which, from the days of the Romans, has pointed this city out as the principal seat of a great trade; and bridged over in every part. You have spent five millions sterling on your bridges alone. You have docks to hold all the ships of the world. The London Docks alone cover 100 acres of ground, and the vaults hold 65,000 pipes of wine. The West India Docks cover 295 acres, and can hold 500 large merchantmen with ease. The Commercial Dock covers 49 acres, and is, I believe, exclusively confined to the Baltic trade. There are 2950 ships belonging to the port of London alone, of 581,000 tons total burden, and manned by 32,000 seamen. The vessels engaged in the colonial, Irish, and coasting trades, including the colliers, and also 360 British vessels, were 2335. The tonnage of the foreign vessels which entered this port in 1840 from Russia, Sweden, Germany, France, the Mediterranean, China, and the United States amounted to 4,167,164 tons. Upon an average of the last ten years London alone has paid £11,000,000 in custom duties out of the £23,500,000 which the whole revenue of that department amounts to. (Loud cries of "Hear.") The value of the produce which enters and leaves her port every year is reckoned roughly at £80,000,000. There are 2000 merchants and brokers within half a mile of the Exchange. You have 100,000 houses of business, probably half of which have shops attached to them. All the details connected with London are upon the same gigantic scale. The water companies supply 237,000,000 hogsheads every year; and the gas companies furnish 10,000,000 cubic feet of gas every 24 hours. In Smithfield Market there were 180,780 head of cattle, and 1,500,000 of sheep, in round numbers, sold in the year 1839. Your very paving and sewer rates amount to £630,000 a year. The London newspapers consume 30,000,000 of stamps annually. The steamboats carry

10,000 passengers every day. There are 1000 miles of railway stretching from London into every part of the kingdom, and bringing its population into contact with all the great cities of the country, completed at an expense of nearly £50,000,000 sterling. There are 59 canals, which cost £15,000,000. The monthly business conducted by the London bankers alone averages £75,000,000, and has amounted to £87,000,000 in one month. (The recital of these statistics produced a marked sensation in the meeting.) I have gone into these details, because I do not like to use any hyperbolic language in general descriptions, which, in a case of this sort, never convey a precise idea of the truth. (Hear, hear, hear.) You must look at all the industry employed in this metropolis—the great science, capital, and intelligence which are brought together in this single spot, in order to give facilities to trade; you must observe all this in detail in order to have a conception of what the position of London really is. (Hear.) When you have done so, I ask you what a drop of water in the ocean is not the custom of the aristocracy, however rich and numerous they may be, compared with the movement resulting from such a trade as this (loud cheers)? and what a singular delusion—I will not say it is, but was—to suppose that these gentlemen, very amiable and respectable in their position in life, have created the greatness which they came to share! (Cheers.) It is evident it is you that draw them here; it is London that attracts the landowners, and not the landowners who make London what it is. (Cheers.) This is explained on a principle perfectly simple, and as old, I believe, as the days of Rome; for Mr. McCulloch has spoken of London in this respect as Seneca once described ancient Rome. He says, "The very magnitude of London is a sufficient cause of her continual increase; the greater a city becomes, the greater is the scope she affords for the exercise of every talent, the gratification of every taste, and the more powerful consequently, the motives by which she attracts individuals, whether aspiring or idle, virtuous or profligate, grave or gay." Now, that holds good with respect to London as well as Rome; and that is the reason why you have these flocks of birds of paradise coming up every spring. Their golden plumage helps to adorn your streets and parks; but I repeat, it is the greatness of London which attracts them, and not they who make London what it is. (Cheers.) You must recollect you have to deal, not with landowners in general universally, but with landowners possessed of more than £3000 or £4000 a year, because those who have smaller incomes do not venture upon a house in town. Just look at the small amount that they constitute of the landed property of the kingdom; mark the numberless deductions that you must make from the money which landowners circulate here, for all those who choose to spend at Paris, Naples, Venice, Vienna, Russia, Rome, or in the Holy Land, money which they had much better spend at home. I really put it to every person—even to those people to whom this pamphlet is addressed—the tradesmen at the west end, or the east end—to ask themselves if the pickings and cabbagings on the Duke of Northumberland's liveries, or the wax-candles burnt at Devonshire House, are to be compared for one moment with the price that you pay for them in the shape of a toll upon your bread? Because you must recollect that to all others except landowners of more than £3000 a year the gain that would result from the repeal of the Corn Laws is perfectly clear. Take your merchants, bankers, fundholders—among whom £28,000,000 are distributed annually—the public annuitants, and every kind of people interested in insurance companies; professional men, lawyers, medical men, artists, bankers' clerks, every man who has a fixed income to live upon—the whole of those individuals, who, after an adventurous career, during their early life abroad, return to London to spend the fruits of it, and to pass their old age in peace and quietness at home; to every one of those, letting alone your operatives, because I will speak of those by-and-by, the gain that would result from a repeal of the Corn Laws would be immediate and immense. (Cries of "Hear.") And only consider how many thousand families of those who fill your streets and squares are comprehended in this class. Now, I hope I shall not tire you (cries of "No, no," "Go on, go on"), but I am about to quote one more passage from my old friend Sam Slick. I always like having something lighter than Mr. McCulloch or those heavy political economical writers to quote from. Now, Sam Slick has written a work lately, in which he describes his impression as an American, on coming to England. He says nothing in the world struck him so much as an evidence of the enormous and incalculable wealth of London as the continuous line of carriages that started from the metropolis upon an Ascot race day; that, however, was before the Great Western Railway came into play. He says, that it was of all things the circumstance which most amazed him,—the vast number of carriages which were seen on that day; not merely because they were well turned out, for that might have been the case anywhere, though they are seldom so well turned out as here, but because the sight of them suggested the reflection to him,—Where could they all come from—what supported them—what made London able to produce such a magnificent display of wealth? Why, he says in this passage, supposing the coaches to speak—"Calcutta keeps me; China keeps me; Botany Bay keeps me (a laugh); Canada keeps me; Nova Scotia keeps me; the white bears keep me; and the whales keep me (laughter); everything on the earth and under the earth keeps me." (Laughter.) And one of them said, "In short, the world keeps me, for all the world is tributary, in some shape or other, to British skill and British enterprise." (Cheers.) And yet there are some wisacres who, within three years of the present time, really thought of nothing but the custom of these landowners of more than £3000 a year, quite forgetting the price they paid for it, and the additional dearth of their bread. Now, I will not give you my own opinion upon that subject, but I will put a most unexceptionable witness into the box, to show you what the additional price on bread is. It is the testimony of a man whose eulogy has come repeatedly from the lips of Sir Robert Peel in Parliament—I mean Mr. Deacon Hume—as one of the soberest and most trustworthy calculators; not a person like my honourable friends the members for Durham and Stockport, who might be supposed to be bitten with a peculiar view of particular subjects, but a sober, quiet, public servant of 30 years' standing, whose word Sir Robert Peel says may be taken for gospel, except when it happens to contradict his own views. (Cheers and laughter.) But what I am going to quote to you is very trite; you have heard it many times I dare say, but still it is a part of my case; so just bear with me while I read it. He says:—"It is generally calculated that each person, upon an average, consumes a quarter of wheat a year. Assuming, then, the amount of duty that this wheat paid, or the price enhanced by protection, to be ten shillings, it would be that amount upon the whole population. Then you can hardly say less than, perhaps, double that for butcher's meat and other matters; so that, if we were to say that corn is enhanced by ten shillings a quarter, there would be that ten shillings, and twenty shillings more, as the increase of the price of meat and other agricultural productions, including hay and oats for horses, barley for beer, as well as butter and cheese. That would be thirty-six millions a year; and the public are, in fact, paying that as effectually out of their pockets as if it did go to the revenue in direct taxes." (Hear, hear.) Now, there is a friend of yours and mine, a gentleman who has given us lately the benefit of his long experience upon those economical subjects in the shape of an admirable paper called the Economist (hear) who has followed out this calculation in what to the advocates of protection must be an extremely inconvenient shape; for he has added up and compared every week the price of Continental wheat with that of English wheat, and also contrasted the price of sugar in bond with the cost of sugar that you alone may avail yourselves of, because you cannot touch that which is in bond. This calculation is from the beginning of the present year, with the balance as against the public generally, and against you Londoners in particular. He gives first that result for the whole kingdom:—

|--|------------|
| Balance from last week for sugar and corn | £4,301,557 |
| That is pretty well for the 30th of March. | |
| £4,500,000 that you have actually thrown into the sea. (Hear.) | |
| Extra cost of sugar this week | 70,003 |
| Ditto of bread | 288,460 |
| Total extra cost from Jan. 1 to this day | £4,660,020 |
| FOR THE METROPOLIS ALONE. | |
| Balance from last week | £858,461 |
| Extra cost of sugar this week | 5,883 |
| Ditto of bread | 24,038 |
| Total extra cost from Jan. 1 to this day | £888,332 |

Now, gentlemen, I have argued this subject hitherto entirely as a London question; let me look at it now as a matter affecting land. I am interested so far in land myself that, although my property is not large, it is the only thing that I and my children have to look to hereafter. (Hear.) I have every possible inducement which a man can have to wish to arrive at a right conclusion on this subject. Your very large proprietors can afford to part with something out of their superfluities; but that is not the case with me. If I miscalculate, I do so to the serious detriment of my own interest and that of those who may come after me; and I tell you fairly I do not mean to do any such thing. (Hear.) I have the more right to speak on this question, because I acknowledge to you honestly that I at a distant time, before I began my own education, shared, to a certain extent, the errors and prejudices of my class: at that period I believed we could not farm in England without protection, and that there would be great injustice in doing away with it: but I happened to do what people in my class are not usually very fond of doing—I brought my mind to the consideration of this question; I wished to take a fair and impartial view, and therefore gave my time and attention to it. And really the clue that I tied me right, was no exceedingly simple—having happened to pass a great part of my life abroad—that I hope others may take the same clue in hand, for I believe they would thereby arrive at the same result. I asked myself this question, "What is it which causes the difference in the position of an English squire, and a German prince, or a Spanish grandee?" for I had seen both those characters in their primitive state. (A laugh.) It gave me double the interest in this question. I wanted to know what made the position of the English squire superior to that of the other two foreign landowners; and I never could for the life of me discover that there was any other source whatsoever for the superior value of his property except the fact that chance or Providence—as you may choose to call it—had thrown his acres into the midst of a community so ingenious, skilful, industrious, and rich in manufacturing science and capital, that it can, as Sam Slick says, make all mankind tributary to its industry, and consequently afford to pay a higher price than the rest of the world for everything that it wants. (Cheers.) Now, there is no other reason whatever which can be assigned for the difference. You may argue upon this matter for ever, but there is no other cause that can explain why 1000 acres of land in England should be worth more than 5000 in Hungary, or 2000 in France, where the population is quite as dense. Since I got hold of this clue I have always considered—looking at the thing on the most narrow and selfish grounds—because I do not profess any extraordinary patriotism in the matter, I look to my own interest as well as everybody else—I never could understand what could be the policy of the English landowners in drying up the sources of their own wealth. In 1815 their course was perfectly clear; we had got the start of the rest of the world and had only to keep it. If instead of Corn Laws we had opened a commercial intercourse with every country that had anything to give or take from us, I am convinced that the position of the English landowner would have been infinitely better at the present day than it now is. (Cheers.) Now, I used the words, "we had got the start;" we had it, we did not choose to keep it. (Hear.) We chose to force foreign industry into unnatural channels; we determined to make manufacturers abroad, because we refused to supply their wants; and now we have those manufacturers meeting us in the neutral markets of the world. And you are acting on the same false principle up to the present day. What you have done in Germany, you have been repeating in the United States. If, when the German agricultural interest was all-powerful, you had chosen to trade with them by receiving what they had to give in exchange for what we could supply, you would never have heard of the German Zollverein or the American tariff. All the mischief which has arisen from the false policy in which we embarked in 1815 might have been averted, if the English landowners, who then—for the misfortune of the country—possessed the monopoly of political and legislative power, had understood their own interests aright; because their prosperity is linked with that of every other class, and not only so, but no other class in England can prosper without paying some toll, in some way or other, to the owners of the soil; and the greater the prosperity, the greater the variety of enterprise, and profit, and gain, to every class and species of industry in England, the more certain is the gain of the landowners themselves. Mr. Ashworth made an estimate, some time ago, of the value of land in South Lancashire: he has shown that land which in 1692 was valued at £169, by the land-tax returns is now worth £293,916 annually by its present assessment to the county rate. I think that is an increase in value of about £54,388 per cent. (Hear, hear, hear.) To what was that owing? It was the fruit of a science, capital, industry, and skill, with which the landowner of Lancashire had nothing at all to do; is has been done for him; he had merely to stand with his hands crossed, and to give the enterprise and industry of the country fair play. (Cheers.) And if the landowners in 1815 had used their power rightly I repeat my conviction that, not only would they have been a wealthier class, but the community would have gained incalculably, morally and physically,—gained, not in mere wealth, but in everything that constitutes domestic comfort—in time, leisure, and relaxation—in opportunities for education, and for the performance of their social duties—in all those things that make a blessing and not a curse of life; the people of this country would have gained to an extent which it is impossible to calculate at the present time. Now, what we see around us to-day is the result of a bad system; and upon what miserable pleas is it defended? The landowners never talk to you of rent. I really believe they never heard the word until it was obtruded upon them somewhat uncourtously by my hon. friend in the chair. (Laughter.) They seem to have no such thing as a personal interest of their own in this matter; they were the most perfectly disinterested class of people that God ever created, for you never heard anything but the tenant-farmers' and "the labourers' interests" pass their lips. Now, you have had some of the tenant-farmers here lately. You had Mr. Lattimore. I have the pleasure of belonging to the same county as that gentleman; I know him as a very trustworthy and thoroughly respectable man. What did he tell you about the tenant-farmers' interest in this matter? Why, that the Corn Laws had made farming a lottery, in which all the prizes were for the landlords and all the blanks for the tenants. (Cheers.) I must say that my experience completely confirms his testimony; for the tenant has taken his land on a factitious and fictitious basis, if you will allow me to use the phrase. He takes his land upon the faith of prices which the law promises, but which his own industry, capital, and skill, make it impossible for him ever to realize. His task is, like that of Sisyphus, to be perpetually rolling a stone up a hill, and to see it come down upon him with redoubled force just as he seems to have got it to the top. He has no security whatever: the more his money, time, and labour are sunk on his land, the more certain is he that every body else is doing the same thing with the same hope; and their joint efforts will produce them exactly the opposite result from that which they have been led to anticipate by the law. (Hear, hear.) I do not mean to go much into detail upon this point. I will merely remind you that farmers had 80s. promised by the act of 1815, and in August, 1822, wheat was 42s. The law of 1828 promised 70s.; but in 1834 wheat was at 36s. The last Corn Law promised 56s.; but wheat is now below 50s., and has, since its enactment, been as low as 46s. (Hear, hear.) Some how or another you always see the errors of former Corn Laws admitted as soon as the country has forced upon the Government the necessity of a change. In 1827, when the sliding-scale law was introduced, I remember an answer given to Lord Clive when he was urging the common plea that agriculturists were doing well, and that Government ought to let well alone, and not interfere with vested interests and established rights in the Corn Laws. The Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day told his lordship and the other agricultural gentlemen who talked of the Corn Law of 1815, and hugged it to their bosoms with all the fatuity of misplaced affection, "One would think that in this law were locked up all the good things that farmers could desire, yet prices had fluctuated under it from 112s. to 38s." (Hear, hear, hear.) Then we come to the condition of the labourer. Two hundred years ago, in the time of Judge Hale, it was that learned individual's opinion that if an agricultural labourer, with a couple of children, could not earn more than 10s. a week, he must make his living up by begging or stealing. (Hear, hear.) There are whole counties now in England, as my hon. friend in the chair proved the other night in the House of Commons, in which the highest point of agricultural wages is 9s., and in which 7s. is the pittance to which they are much more commonly reduced. If the advocates of the Corn Laws, or rather the friends of the tenant-farmers and agricultural labourers, had a leg to stand upon, do you think that they would not have gladly accepted the challenge of Mr. Cobden to vindicate themselves from the unjust suspicion which he threw upon them? What did he ask them to do? "To appoint a select committee to inquire into the effect of the protective duty upon imports on the interests of the tenant-farmers and farm labourers of the country." Now, how was that motion met? Mr. Gladstone told him that the question was a very proper one; one that the Government would very gladly have entertained if it had not come from such a suspicious quarter; but in spite of its justice, and the perfect propriety of the terms in which it was couched, the admirable ability with which the case was argued, for I had the pleasure of hearing that speech—in spite of all these considerations, Government was so impressed with the delicate susceptibility of agricultural nerves, so afraid of frightening its supporters, so alarmed at being supposed to impinge in any way upon the unalterable compact which it has made with the Duke of Richmond and his friends, that it could not by any possibility, with any decency, however much it desired, assent to my honourable friend's motion. Upon just the same ground as this—a nervous complaint among agriculturists, which is becoming shockingly common—upon just the same ground Lord Stanley the other night refused a most just and equitable motion made by Mr. Hutt. Mr. Gladstone used in reply to Mr. Cobden a word against which we must all enter our protest. He talked of a compact. Now, there never was a compact on the subject of the Corn Law. When it was introduced, it was a despicable measure in the opinion of the country and the House, and one against which every body protested—those who thought it did too little, and those who contended that it did too much. It was a measure pre-eminently founded on false pretences, as I think, I contributed to prove; because you recollect the ground upon which that Corn Law may be said to rest. You remember Sir Robert Peel's Tamworth speech, in which he talked of the Peculiar Burdens of land, and told us it was overtaxed in this country—that landowners were kept as a sort of milch cow in the stall to be milked whenever the country needed it; that none of the other classes of the community bore anything like a fair proportion of the burdens; but they were, in point of fact, all heaped upon the unfortunate landowner, who had, therefore, upon that account a strict right to ask for protection for everything he produced. Now, I doubted that; I ventured very humbly to challenge Sir Robert Peel to the proof; I begged him to give me a committee on this very question of peculiar burdens. (Hear.) I told him I did not care of whom the committee was composed; he might have a majority in it; Colonel Sibthorp in the chair, if he pleased (laughter); it was all the same to us whether he tried to prove his own case, or we tried to disprove it; if he would give me my hon. friends the members for Wolverhampton and Stockport, we were perfectly content to take that committee, work it out, and abide the result. But no; he would not accept my challenge; he recollected that old line of Shakspeare which says,—

"A rotten case abides no handling"—(cheers)— and he very much preferred the comfortable security of a vote, upon which of course he beat me. But what is the inference? Why, that the Corn Laws were brought in by a class for the benefit of a class, against the principles laid down by the Government which supports them, and upon grounds so prejudicial to the interest of the community, that they cannot bear the light of day. (Cheers.) Now, let me ask you what would be the consequences of their repeal? The first effect—and one in which you are most interested—would be, that it would make the Thames the granary of the world. (Renewed cheers.) I suppose you will all admit that this would give a great impetus to trade. There would be an increase of business in every department; more ships and sailors would be wanting; additional wharfs would require to be built, and consequently a greater number of carpenters, bricklayers, and smiths would be employed. There would be an increase in the number of merchants, and, of necessity, of merchants' clerks. Every trade would be put in motion by the change. The mere threepence saved in every quarter loaf consumed in London would yield a million a year to spend among all the other tradesmen. (Cheers.) Then recollect that the repeal of the Corn Law would never stand alone. We attack that measure first, because it is the keystone of the arch of monopoly; break that down and you will see how the whole thing will come falling to the dust. (Hear, hear.) The very men who are now ricklers for protection, and calling on us to support their monopolies—I know them well—would be the very first to cry out for cheap tea, sugar, wine, coffee, and cheap ships also to carry them in and to insist upon good commercial treaties with every country in the world which could contribute to the supply of their wants. Now, that is what I want to bring them to; for who can estimate the effect of such a change as this upon a city like London, which may defy commercial rivalry with the establishments which already exist, and with the enormous capitals which are seeking employment at the present day? Who, above all, can estimate the effects of such a change as this upon the operative classes of the kingdom, upon the whole working population of the land? I care more for them, infinitely, than I do for all the capitalists or merchants (loud cheers), because Free Trade involves the fate of those who live by their labour, and who have nothing to spare from what it produces. What would be the influence of the change upon them? Why, everybody must feel that the condition of the working population of this country can only be permanently improved by relaxing the pressure upon the organs of industry, and by making the conditions of life, if I may use the term, less hard than they are now. God knows they are hard enough just now for all of us. It is not merely the artisan; it is the mind as well as the hand that is overtaxed in order to meet others successfully in the struggle for bread. (Cheers.) Take any trade, I don't care which or what, I give you your choice of all those which our honourable chairman hopes to unite in this theatre on the occasion of the proposed Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar—take the most delicate fabrics of your manufacturing industry, go down from them to the rude labourers that raise the coal which sets the machinery in motion by which those marvels are wrought, and you will find everywhere the same grievance, and the same complaints; you will find in all directions that people in this country are called to labour too early and forced to labour too long—that in all our manufacturing population complaints are made—that childhood is blighted by premature exertion—that youths are growing up in ignorance—that adults are not half informed, and are often debauched in consequence of the want of information—and that there is no time for the performance of social duties and the proper enjoyment and relaxation of life, that old age is too often condemned to wretchedness and want, and that no prudence, no exertion can avert those evils in many cases. Why, in Sheffield alone I have seen the savings of twenty years swept away in the last five years; and all that, mind, is not the fault of the individuals, but of the system which our legislators persist in supporting. What is the cause of this over work (that is the fashionable phrase now-a-days)? Why, simply that the whole country is underfed—that you are less food every year to divide amongst more people—and that you have less employment, because you refuse to take even the food that you want from other nations upon such terms as will form the basis of a regular trade. And what is the remedy? Why, not as some short-sighted philanthropists would have us do—to permit the excess of labour, to which nothing but necessity could drive a whole people; but to deal with the cause that creates the necessity if you can. (Vehement cheers.) And I say it is in your power to do it: it is my conviction that you can do it; not by following ignorant and spurious humanity—for nothing is cheaper than a philanthropy which is exercised at other people's expense (renewed cheering)—calling upon you and us to do the evil which their own legislation creates—we must not do that—we must go to the root of the evil; we must grapple with the disease and not with its symptoms; we must assert the right—the natural and inalienable right—of the English working man to exchange his labour for the necessities and comforts of life, wherever he can get them cheapest and best. Why, your Corn Laws make a serf of him without the privilege of a serf; for it is the poor privilege of a Russian serf, at all events, to be well clad and abundantly fed. But no one can say that such is the state of our working population. Unshackle the fetters of labour, and then you may safely let it find its own level and seek its own reward. (Cheers.) Now, my conviction is, gentlemen, that we can serve the working man in no other way. Never mind the jargon of the new philosophers, the gentlemen who talk to us about new social duties arising out of a new state of society, and tell us that we must put the world in leading-strings, because it does not know how to govern itself. I believe you will find Parliament a very bad substitute for your own discretion in these matters. I have a foolish faith, I confess, in preference to these new lights, for Adam Smith. I think that writer has told us pretty plainly that the only way of increasing the wages of labour is by increasing the demand for it; and the only way to increase the demand is by augmenting the fund out of which those wages are paid; and that fund in this country, more especially, from the peculiar constitution of our social state, depends upon the permanent expansion of our foreign trade. But then comes the great bugbear, that if you have this foreign trade, and deal with countries abroad upon their own terms—if, above all, you receive from them an abundant supply of foreign corn, wages must fall—and that, it is said, is the object of all these gentlemen around me. It is said that they are selfish speculators; they are called money-mongers, men who look to Mammon and not to mercy, people who grind up children with their calicoes. (Laughter.) My honourable friend the member for Durham was recently told by a facetious acquaintance in the House of Commons that the manufacturers actually came into the House their teeth dripping with infants' blood. (Renewed laughter.) Now, I don't believe in all this—it is a gulf-mathias that I do not understand. I look at practical things and positive facts. I see that bread was very cheap in 1835, yet wages were high, and the whole population of the country was employed. I see that bread was very dear in 1842, and that Lancashire was in a state of suffering and depression such as we have hitherto believed existed only where there has been a famine or some great natural calamity. (Hear.) I read the other day in a work, which I dare say many of you know—it is from the pen of a very distinguished man—Dr. Cooke Taylor, who visited Lancashire during the period of its greatest distress—I read a description of that distress, which went so much to my heart, that, if you have not seen it, I will try if it will not go to your hearts also. He says, as the result of his observations:—"I have seen misery in many forms; I have been in the huts and hovels of Ireland, when my native land was visited with the fearful scourge of cholera; I have visited the cellars of Liverpool, where existence assumes an aspect which ceases to be human; I have penetrated into the wynds and vennels of Glasgow, localities which would try to the uttermost the hardest of hearts and the strongest of stomachs;—but nowhere have I seen misery which so agonized my very soul as that which I have witnessed in the manufacturing districts of Lancashire. And why? Because the extreme of wretchedness was there, and there only, combined with a high tone of moral dignity, a marked sense of propriety, a decency, cleanliness, and order, the elements which produced the vast wealth I have described, and which do not merit the intense suffering I have witnessed. I was beholding the gradual immolation of the noblest and most valuable population that ever existed in this country or in any other under heaven. We are not stocks and stones: I am as firmly persuaded as I am of my own existence that, if the noble and wealthy had witnessed the scenes which I have gone through, they would fling all prejudices and selfish interests to the winds—they would stretch forth eager hands to raise the sufferers, pour oil and wine into the wounds they have inflicted, and devote the whole of their energies, heart and soul, to prevent the recurrence of such misery." (Loud cheers.) Now, gentlemen, I must ask you just to consider whence comes this anomaly, the effects of which Dr. Taylor has been describing:—dear bread and high prices, which are said to secure domestic prosperity and starving industry in the most industrious country in the world? Why, it is explained upon a principle which we can all understand, by a writer whose light, I ventured before to say, I preferred to all the crude theories of the modern philanthropists of our day,—I mean Adam Smith. It is a very short passage, and I will read it. He says, "When every year furnishes an increased demand for labour, the scarcity of hands occasions competition among masters, who bid against one another in order to get workmen. When there is a scarcity of employ, labourers bid against one another for work. Men who have been bred in superior classes are glad to seek employment in lower classes; while the lowest class of all, being now fairly overstocked with the overflowings of all other classes, the competition for employment becomes so great in it as to reduce the wages of labour to the most miserable pittance upon which life can be sustained." Now, I ask you whether those are not truths which your own every-day experience as practical men of business confirms? (Hear.) I recollect the time when so much sympathy was excited about the fate of the unfortunate women who were wasting their existence in the service of the milliners of the Court, and the slopsellers of the City. I also recollect the time when some benevolent gentleman connected with the Mansion-house—I forget his name—suggested the formation of a society by whom these poor women should be employed, but who were not to be allowed to earn more than 15s. a week. (Laughter.) But now what has become of that society? (Hear.) Why, it did not last three weeks. It is impossible anything can last in this world of manufacturing, and commercial, enterprise which does not pay. (Hear.) It is quite clear that project did not pay. However, we may sympathize with these unfortunate beings, whose fate you cannot hear of without the deepest sympathy; still you cannot relieve them by any such means as that. (Hear.) The cause of their suffering is just what Adam Smith describes. The slopselling business in which these women are employed, and hand-loom weaving in the north, are the common sewers of the unemployed, into which everything passes, and you never can raise them except by giving increased employment to feed the augmenting population. (Hear.)

But set against these plain practical principles all the rodomontade which we have heard from the gentlemen who profess to be the exclusive advocates of humanity at the present period—the short-time men, who usurp our proper rights, because we are really entitled to the appellation of short-time men more than they—(hear)—we who, by giving more abundant food to the people would enable them to work short time—(cheers)—I say, just contrast these plain principles of Adam Smith with all the unintelligible theories about a better state of things which is to grow out of the chaos, of which God knows who shall see the end, if they ever see the beginning. (Cheers.) Lord Ashley's speech the other night, full of kind feeling and humanity—spurious as I think, founded on most superficial and narrow views of the facts—was really directed against the commercial system of this country altogether, and not against any abuse that had grown up under that system—it was a speech against manufactures and trade. (Hear.) I am sorry to be compelled to say precisely the same of a friend of my own, Mr. Charles Buller, who following Lord Ashley, in a similar strain. I am not saying anything here, behind their backs, which I do not tell them when I meet them elsewhere. (Cheers.) Yet now there is a most curious combination—an organization of political men disagreeing upon every other point, and concurring most marvellously upon this. I looked at the Morning Post of this day, and found it full of eulogies of Mr. Oastler's "homely truths." Now, that individual I have always taken for a very well-intentioned firebrand—a sort of man who will set your haystack on fire without the slightest idea of what he is about. (Loud laughter.) This speech, of which the Morning Post speaks, bears out my view of the case, that there never was an unintentionally-mischievous a being as this man. He is talking of the working classes of the north; and he says it is "the demon of competition that produced that ugly monster cheapness." (Loud laughter.) But I should like to know who have an interest in cheapness equal to the working class? They are the great consumers, and you cannot make anything dear without its coming home to them at once. But Mr. Oastler calls this the ugly monster cheapness; and then he says, "Why covet a trade with China, after ruining Hindostan? Whilst starving the Chinese to death, we should be working and starving our own operatives too. Why not make clothing for ourselves, and enable our own population to wear the clothes they made, instead of stretching out our desires, with a population clothed in rags, to sell our cheap goods in China, and thus destroy both countries?" (Laughter.) Now, I always believed that a trade between two countries, in order to last, must be beneficial to both; but here we are informed that it is a mutual cutting of one another's throats; it is an act of suicide upon our part, and direct murder on that of the Chinese. The Morning Post speaks of these as "broad facts." It calls upon you "to see whether we may not, by new arrangements, give to British subjects the means of purchasing those manufactures which are now sent to rot in foreign warehouses?" (Loud laughter.) I really thought, when I read this, that the gentlemen around me here had gained a very bad character it seems for common sense; for I take it that, if they sent one cargo of goods to a foreign warehouse without receiving any produce in return, they would not send a second; it is one of those evils that very soon cure themselves. Mr. Oastler may leave it to cure itself; and as to foreign trade starving and working out our own labouring population, why it is by this foreign trade they live. Mr. Gladstone told us it was the reduction of one fifteenth on the exports of the country two years ago which produced all that climax of calamities in Lancashire which Dr. Taylor describes. It is to the foreign trade that we are indebted for the degree of comfort we possess. While trade exists on fair and equal terms, it places at the command of the wife and daughter of the Lancashire spinners articles of clothing and furniture which would have been luxuries to a Plantagenet princess, and such as were never heard of even in the days of Queen Elizabeth herself. (Cheers.) Then I told you we had a curious coalition of opponents to deal with; for we have another very great authority, the Northern Star. I have quoted the Morning Post; now let us see what the Chartists say to this matter. They assert that Lord Ashley's measure is only second in importance to the people's charter. "Not," says Mr. O'Connor, "that the ten hours bill is a proper limit of labour, or that, approving of Lord Ashley's course up to a certain point, I give an acquiescence in any such principles: far from it, for although the ten hours is a comparative improvement upon the Government scheme of fourteen hours' labour, yet I hold the imposition inflicted by Lord Ashley's amendment, though comparatively humane, is yet positively cruel and murderous. No full-grown man of any age, or any profession, can, by possibility, devote twelve hours of each day to his profession, while all require lengthened holidays for entire cessation from labour." Now, I do not want to trifle with sentiments such as these. None of us like labour; I dare say you like ten hours better than twelve, and eight better than ten; I am sure I do; but I do not know how to arrive at that: if one has got a certain amount of business to do in the world we must do it; one must work to live in this country. There is no doubt that the condition of life is harder in this country than you find it in many other countries in the world. But trace the evil to the root; do not believe you can alter it by legislative enactments; look how the thing works. Now, we will suppose for a moment that these views could be carried out. Mr. O'Connor proceeds to say that what he cordially supports in Lord Ashley's bill is "the principle of restriction;" you are to restrict everything, and to regulate all by act of Parliament; to put your whole existence into the hands of the landowning majority in the House of Commons: I think you have had enough of that. (Cheers.) He says the ten hours bill "strikes the largest rivet out of labour's fetters. It is the recognition (he says) of the great principle of restriction, which, even with the franchise, to-morrow, would, in my mind, constitute one of the principal elements of social and political economy; for, unless the labourer has the protection of restriction, he cannot successfully compete against the masters, who have the protection arising from competition in the competitive labour market."—But this only shows how one may use words in such a way that no human being can understand them. I have the most earnest desire to see the whole operative community in this country enabled to earn their livelihood on easier terms. I don't believe a greater blessing could come to them or to us, and all those around me, I am sure, share most sincerely and cordially with me in the wish; but this sort of dabbling interference with all the concerns of every-day life, I believe to be the crudest impossibility that ever passed through man's brain. Look at the effects; just work it out. We are dealing now with labour employed in factories alone. You profess to protect that; that is to say, you restrict the labour to ten hours. It is admitted that wages must fall twenty-five per cent., or else, according to the view taken by some other working men—I am happy to say not generally—there will be a greater competition for a smaller amount of goods, people will pay more for them, and consequently the masters will be able to give the same wages as they give now. (A person in the pit, "No, no!") I see you shake your head; you know that is not true, but everybody has not come to the same conclusion; I am sorry to say there are large masses of the people who most entirely believe this theory to be true. But look at the effect of it; you consider this great boon to the persons employed in factory labour—there are about a million and a half in all I believe. This must, of course, cause a rise in the price of clothing to all other working men: those other working men come to Parliament, and demand of it to confer the same benefit on them which it has given their fellow-operatives. Why, if we can do these things by act of Parliament—and I have been ten years in the House of Commons and never suspected it till now—if we can give by act of Parliament greater leisure, invigorated health, and improved morality, in God's name let us make the blessing co-extensive with the whole country at least. (Cheers.) You must do this in equity, if you do it at all. Therefore the effect would be nothing more than to make that scarce and dear which is now cheap and abundant, and, because it is cheap and abundant, consumed largely by the working men (cheers), you must have less of everything and pay more for it. And when you have constructed this new scheme, I ask you who would be the better for it at the end? I do entreat you, gentlemen, not to be misled by these vague and foolish theories, which no man of common sense ever attempted to work out in practice; I beg you not to be misled by any such experiments, which can only lead to the most fearful results. I believe to-night I may almost say that we stand at the point of a critical period, which the Germans call the Schicksal-punkt, or the dividing point—the ridge that separates the water that runs into two different seas. You must now choose between the evil and the good. You must either take that course which we recommend, and which I believe is the only one which can conduce to the benefit of the working-classes of this country; or you must embark in a system of constant interference between capital and labour, which will land you at last in a sort of chaos like that produced by the Maximum Bill in France. I will state the effect of that measure to you very briefly. The wages of labour were reduced in that country by the Government measures, which had the same effect that the Corn Law has here, by a large issue of paper money, called assignats. The working man, who was paid in paper, when he went to exchange his one or two francs for goods, was told by the shopkeeper that a franc in silver was worth six or twelve in paper, and he accordingly required as many for the same amount of food which the man formerly obtained for one franc. The Convention, which was all-powerful in those days, anxious and very shortsighted, like Lord Ashley, wanted to help the working man; and what did they do? "Why," said they, "we must make a tariff, and fix the price of every article that the working man consumes. We will take bread first, and go afterwards to leather, and wine, and coffee, and sugar, and all the other things that he may require; we will establish a tariff of prices which no body shall exceed, and we will keep the guillotine at work for all those who venture to transgress this rule." What was the consequence? All the retail shops in Paris were speedily shut up; in six weeks there was not a man who could venture to sell; the capital embarked in their trade was exhausted and absorbed, and within twelve months after the law was abrogated by common consent. Now, gentlemen, I feel very much obliged to you for the indulgence which you have extended to me to-night; I only entreat you not to be misled by any fallacious theories when you have got such a perfectly plain and simple course before you, as I believe you have. I am as desirous as any man here present can be to arrive at those blessings which we all appreciate, increased leisure, time for education, opportunity for social enjoyment, and to see these things extended to every class; and as one mode of arriving at them, I call upon you to-night to enter your protest against the new-tangled doctrines that have been circulated amongst us, and to proclaim your conviction that there is nothing in this country that can permanently improve, ennobler, or ease the condition of the working man but to enable him to exchange his labour upon fair and equitable terms in the markets of the world. (Cheers.) If I knew any more effective recipe than that, I would give it my firm and hearty support; not knowing one more, I am content to take the principles which I see laid down clearly upon the subject, instead of embarking in a route of which, I believe, if you choose to take it, you will never see the end. (The honourable gentleman sat down amid loud cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN: I have now the pleasure of introducing to you one of the oldest friends of the good cause—one to whom we owe much more, I think, than probably many of us are aware of—I mean Colonel Thompson. (Loud and long-continued cheers.)

Colonel THOMPSON, on advancing to the table, was received with enthusiastic approbation. He said:—Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it will be known to many of you that I am come "from wandering to and fro on the earth" (laughter), and examining into the feelings and till-uses which beset different portions of our community; and when I arrived here I found that during my absence you have got a new flight of grasshoppers, or locusts, let loose upon you (laughter), and I feel desirous to discuss at least one of them which has been laid before you this evening. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) Now, I surmise that I see before me an assembly of which 9-10ths would not shrink from avowing the honourable name of British tradesmen. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) You have been told that you have the custom of the rogues. (Laughter.) Don't hum me for it; it was not I that said it, it was they. Upon this I have one searching question to ask of the tradesmen here: "Would not the custom of the honest men do for you as well?" (Cheers.) It is not many years since you had a race of other splendid knaves displaying themselves upon your high roads—cavalry they were for the most part—supported by a corps on foot of a less elegant appearance. (Laughter.) These men robbed, and what they robbed they spent; many a good bottle of claret, doubtless, did they purchase from the innkeepers along the roadside, but I never heard that the citizens of London proclaimed them to be sources of wealth. On the contrary, when they caught them,—they hanged them. (Laughter and cheers.) That was your civic gratitude. (Renewed laughter.) I hope I shall meet with no more gratitude on the occasion which now presents itself. (Hear, hear.) Oh! you are a bearing people, you London citizens. You have an opportunity to an extent greater than any other part of the country, of meeting together, of obtaining knowledge, of discussing each other's wants, and yet there is no fraud thrown out before you that, at all events, you do not bear patiently. O, patience is a virtue! It has not always its reward in this world; let us hope that it may in the next. (Laughter and cheers.) We of the popular side, if I may take the liberty so to express myself, are often taunted with the misdoings of some of our prototypes in antiquity when they got the upper hand—I allude to one John Cade (laughter), a name often thrown in our teeth. (Cheers.) Look at our legislative Jack Cades of the present day; look at the Jack Cade who legislates for you, or helps to do it, by virtue of sitting for East Kent. (Hear, hear.) What says he? "There shall not a maid be married, but she shall pay to me her marriage-portion ere they have it." Thank God for one word altered in that speech in three centuries! We bow with all humility—"on our hearts' knees we do agnise" the mercy of the landed aristocracy which has indulged us with that change. It is our daughters' marriage-portions they want now, and we must be thankful. Now, does not this come home to the heart of every man among you? How many here are fathers? Nine-tenths of those I see beneath me, are so. If some of the chances and changes to which trade is always liable, should fall upon you, and you should die and leave your families scantily provided for,—see what is to come of it. This man and his fellows avow having taken the fruits of your industry to make marriage-portions for their daughters. And so the child of your affections—she that stood up before you as if it were an angel from heaven, and the eye that saw her bless'd her—

"While you, oppress'd with everlasting sleep, Shall neither hear her sigh, nor see her weep,"— that girl, shall be sent forth into a coarse, hard world, to gain her thankless bread by striving to instil some portion of her own virtues into crabbed scions of the aristocracy (hear, hear);—perhaps for some rich libertine to gloat upon. (Cheers.) Does not it make the grave feel colder? (Great cheering.) The patience that will bear that, and not now or hereafter put an end to it, is a patience beyond toleration or belief. Is there any secret about the thing? Is it not avowed? Let me, standing here—not in that other house, but in yours and mine—put the right hon. member to the test. Is there any mistake? Has he not proclaimed "the intent of robbery avow'd"? Did he not utter it with his own lips; has he not told us so expressly? Our forefathers struggled against great evils, and have left us a name that we should bless and hallow for the energies they displayed. (Cheers.) But they left something for their children to do also; it was not entirely a feather bed they left us: they have given us the chance to show that we are worthy of the descent from which we have sprung. (Hear, hear.) But it is not there only that we have these Cades present themselves. There be more of us who have read out of the said John's book. What do you think the working class, or some of them at least in the north of England, are looking after? They are offering the men who oppress them, and who cut down the recompense of their labour, to allow that oppression, if they will give them shorter hours of suffering under it—shorter hours per day, they mean; they don't say shorter hours during the whole of their short lives, for they are willing to contract for a whole life of suffering. (Hear, hear, hear.) Let me put before you a comparison which strikes me; if some of you have heard it from me before, forgive me. There was a Turkish frigate which sailed on a three weeks' voyage with only one week's water on board for 600 prisoners. The captain of the ship—like a Turk as he was—sold the water to those prisoners. Think you not the unhappy men employed themselves by day and also by night, in any species of manufacture—cutting tobacco-stoppers for instance—which they might sell to their oppressors for the drops of water that were to save their lives? (Hear, hear, hear.) Just then a Mufti (laughter) went round the decks, and said, "We pity you—we'll shorten the hours of your labour; ten hours are enough for any man to cut tobacco-stoppers, and you shall do no more." Did not these unfortunate men, think you, call out to them—"If you love us, take us under a pump!" (Laughter and cheers.) That, however, was the one thing the commander never meant to do. Now I, for my single part, will maintain neither peace nor truce with this foul hypocrisy. I pretend not to limit either the energy of vice, or the imbecility of virtue (hear, hear), nor undertake to state all the degrees of hybridization which may be exhibited between those two animals, the knave and fool. (Laughter.) I do not believe the promoters of that bill dishonest, because I have not the proof before me, and when I have, I will. (Laughter and cheers.) My mind is in the condition of a sheet of white paper on that subject, except that in one corner I find written, that in 99 similar cases out of 100, dishonesty has been the rule. (Laughter.) They must not be angry with me, but I cannot submit to begin

"With bated breath and in a bondsman's key," to avow my faith in the honesty and integrity of those who bring forward this proposal, because, in the name of Heaven before which I stand, I do not believe it. (Hear, hear.) Do not demand of me to break through my integrity. If I thought I could do the thing honestly I would, but till I can I must express my doubts—my strong suspicions—my almost certainty—bating that little chance of refuge which I mentioned, that ignorance and folly may be the excuse of those who do it. (Cheers.) See in our manufacturing districts one consequence of their laws already. Boys go about begging. Do you like begging?—No! Do you like working?—Yes, it is a great deal easier. Why do you beg then?—Because we are under the age when act of Parliament allows us to work. There is a result for you; and by such miserable quackeries are we governed, and bled to be. (Cheers.) I told you this was Jack Cade legislation, and so it is. The complaint is, that the potatoes are thin; men do not get such wholesome and heartening drink as they could desire. And what says the other Jack Cade, the right hon. member for Dorsetshire? Says he, "I will make it felony to drink small beer." And that, he thinks—if he be honest—a cure and remedy for the evil he has confessed. The noble member positively believes, that the way to make men drink strong beer, is to make it felony to drink small beer. (Laughter.) Now, what can you do with such men when they are thrown up to the top of the Legislature of the country? Oh, if it should happen that the Corn Law abolition should not wear a spencer (laughter), but should have some flaps behind (laughter) by which the abolition of other abuses besides, should afterwards climb up to heaven,—it would not be I that had deferred the removal of one abuse so long, as to bring down the others with it by the run. (Hear, hear.) Others besides Mr. Cade have been abused and vilified. The noble member have come in for their share: poor Mr. Robert Peel, benevolent as any man who ever lived on earth, having the common mark to shoot at; and where is the difference? What has he said, that these new lights have not avowed? They will put down as false and wrong the old rules of commerce which the world has lived by, and will have some four-sided invention of their own, which we may be made a great deal better off than we were before. Let us, at all events, have an even measure for all. If one side be put down, let not the other be triumphant without example. You are the jury, and must judge of all these things. Grasshoppers called ye them? The turkey-cock could swallow these, would eat a crocodile. (Laughter and cheering.) They give you in the measure of their opinion of your intellects. I think it will not be long ere we shall hear a verification of what has already been whispered in the provinces, that London will be quite up to the neck in any other place in the country, and a little beyond. (Cheers.) Where was London in the time of our forefathers, when mighty questions were fought and settled? Was it not always paying for the liber of posterity with its best blood and best exertion? Is now, when blood is not called for, when exertion is that is wanted, will London play the laggard, and let there any longer be excuse for saying the blood shall flow from the extremities to the great heart, instead of flowing from you who are the heart of all Britain, to the furthest extremity within your land? (Cries of "No, no," and applause.) You'll take your place. Look at your countenances that you are determined to press yourselves forward to advance this great cause, and—no more grasshoppers. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) Receive them you must send them to the tradesmen. Sixty thousand copies! I wonder who took them. Suppose they did so as being something of the sort. (Laughter.) When they have read them, they judge, and your judgment, and your announcement be it, be that if they send millions more, you are to return the echo of your good voices, whenever they shall be called upon to make the proclamation. I hon. gentleman was loudly cheered on resuming his seat.

The CHAIRMAN then came forward and said:—My friend whom I am about to announce is difficult to find at this time of the evening. I think there is plenty of time (cheers); and I have the pleasure of introducing to you now a gentleman, one of the most accomplished of the day, who has given ample proof of his being in the cause of humanity, second, I think, only to those which we are engaged. He mainly contributed to equipate the coloured population of our West India islands; and I never saw any difference between white men and compelling them to labour, and so the fruits of their labour. I have the pleasure of introducing to you as an ally Mr. George Thompson. (Tremendous applause.)

Mr. GEORGE THOMPSON, after soliciting the indulgence of his hearers on the plea of ill health, and with the honourable and gallant officer who spoke, said that this question of Free Trade, and the abolition of the Corn Law as the most important branch of the subject, is certainly equal in magnitude, in the social and political aspects, as it respects also the comfort and happiness of the human race, and much more, as it respects the ability as well as the honour of the British empire, to that question the discussion of which I had the pleasure of endeavouring to promote in times past. Before that man should be free, I ask now the free world to be free. (Cheers.) God meant all men to be free. I believe, too, that God meant all men to be fed. (Cheers.) I believe it to be a crime to deprive man of his food. I believe it to be equally a crime to raise the price of food, to deteriorate the quality, or to diminish the quantity of food. (Cheers.) And if I find that this Corn Law increases the supply of labour above the demand, and throws tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of employ; that it gives to those who are fortunate enough to obtain some work but half the remuneration which they obtain for it under other circumstances, and sends them into the food market to pay a price for food which would pay without the law, that the Corn Law stands before me as a stupendous crime. (Cheers.) And an abrogation of that charter which gave to man—that of the fruits of the earth—freely eat; that seed-time and harvest-time, and winter, never should cease; that no man should be out the means, so far as the fertility of the soil is concerned, of procuring the food which the earth has the power of yielding for man and for beast. (Cheers.) This is the great master principle of that system of economy which we are assembled to seek the aid of our countrymen in disseminating for the benefit of their nation, and the world? This is the doctrine which the League is a great travelling army to teach and to preach—that every class of the community should be left to its own free agency in the management of its commercial transactions, while the actions are in themselves honest and honourable. There should be no legislative interference, still less legislative control, and, least of all, any legislative pulsion in matters of labour, trade, and commerce. (Hear, hear.) We have confidence in the soundness of this doctrine. But we do not advocate it merely as an abstract. We do not put it forth as one that may be up and laid down at pleasure. We regard it as a practical and paramount importance to the nation.

country to the end of time. In its honest and impartial application, it sweeps away all those restrictions which have been so frequently exposed and denounced in this age. It opens the world to the labour of man; it releases from within the sphere and operation of British industry and skill with all nations and tribes of the earth and invites and welcomes to these shores the manly tribes of every region. Like Mercy it is twice blessed; it blesses him that gives, and him that takes. ("Hear," and cheers.) As Englishmen we cannot contemplate either the scenes that have passed before our eyes during the last two or three years, or the present circumstances and position of our country, without distress. (Hear.) When on the one side there is much to minister to our pride on the other there is far more to excite our compassion. Our greatness as a nation is undeniable. From the shores of this island we have embarked upon the wide ocean—we have spread the adventurous sail, and visited and explored the uttermost regions of the earth. We have done more; we have conquered and colonized the most beautiful and fertile tracts of every region. We have added to the number of those who owe and own allegiance to our gracious and beloved sovereign, men of every clime, and every creed, and every colour. (Cheers.) The prowess of our soldiers and sailors, by the skill of our naval and military commanders, by the enterprise of our merchants and mariners, and by the talents of our diplomatists at home and abroad, we have subdued many nations, formed alliances with all, carried the proofs of our unrivalled eminence as manufacturers to the habitations of men everywhere, and by the combined strength of our moral, our physical, and our political influence, have made the whole world tributary, and caused it to lay its varied and exhaustless treasures at our feet. (Prolonged cheering.) Our capital at this moment is superabundant, and much of it idle. Our ships are floating in all waters, and wait but the behests of this nation—the unfurling of the banner of free and unrestricted trade—to bring to our shores and pour into our laps the teeming riches of our universal mother earth. Mankind are our customers, and millions of them would pay us, in the first fruits of their civilization, for the useful, the costly, and the elaborate results of the last stage of ours. (Renewed cheering.) Here, our powers of production are immeasurable, and our facilities are commensurate with our resources. Beneath us are unfathomed beds of precious minerals, in such close neighbourhood, that metals more useful than gold may be prepared and smelted, and fashioned on the spot for the service of men in almost every country. Through our verdant valleys rush streams that will move ten thousand times ten thousand machines. Inhabiting this island is man—the lord of all—a diadem of glory o'er the whole—not barbarous, but now first in the race of civilization, though among the last to enter upon it; proving how vast was his natural capacity, and how much he has from Nature's pure beneficence derived; not ignorant of the value and the purposes of the materials at his command, but fully appreciating the worth and adaptation of all around him, with an eye for beauty, with an intellect for science, with a hand for labour, with a heart for patriotism, and with a soul for religion. (Cheering renewed.) Earth, air, and ocean, are to him familiar in all their aspects, changes, motions, uses, applications. Each to him pays tribute of the knowledge hid from uninquiring ignorance: each to him their gradual secrets, though with slow reserve, yet sure accumulation, all reveal. Here he stands the wonder of ignoble eyes, the awe of humbler mortals, the object of sublime ambition in the eyes of distant savages. On the steep eminence which he has scaled, to rise or fall are sole alternatives. He may not stand, and he declines to fall; innate magnificence of mind upholds, and buoyancy of genius bears him on. (Cheers.) These are some of the circumstances which were present to my mind when I said that, as Englishmen, we were liable to indulge in feelings of pride and national complacency. But, oh, how much there is to chasten such a feeling, and to convert it into one of deep humiliation; for, will it be believed, that England, so extensive in her sovereignty, so rich in her resources, so matchless in her armies and navies, so proud in her alliances, so unrivalled in the application of the mechanic arts to the production of almost everything the world wants—abounding in money, superabounding in labour and skill—boasting of her literature, drawn from the purest sources—of her morality, which breathes universal benevolence—of her religion, which is divine—that England cannot, and does not, feed her own children, but sees them roam in idleness and brood in despondency, and languish, and die of want, under the walls of her custom-houses, on the very steps of her palaces, and within the very porch and sanctuary of her temples. (Cheers.) Would it be believed by a stranger, it made acquainted only with the geographical position, the boundaries, and the natural riches of our vast empire—the genius, and industry, and commercial facilities of this the parent country—that here, at the head-quarters of Government—here, in the great factory of the world—here, in the emporium of trade—here, in the depository and laboratory of intellect, and skill, and wealth, there was more idleness, more poverty, more actual destitution, combined with more suffering of mind and body, than could be found in the same proportion to its population in any other country in the world. (Cheers.) Yet so, alas! it is with mighty England. Things may be better now than they were in some districts of England, and, if it be so, we thank God on behalf of the famishing poor. But even now you shall find multitudes of men standing all the day idle, while those who are at work are toiling on greatly diminished wages, and earning, after a long week of intense toil, a pittance scarcely sufficient to sustain life. You shall, if you will seek them, find thousands of houses that are desolate—where the fire has expired upon the hearth—where the cupboard is empty—where the bed clothing has been sold for food—where the mother has laid her children upon straw to cry themselves to sleep—where the father, who might, and would, if he were permitted, be an industrious, a skilful, and a cheerful artisan, is a wandering vagabond—a hungry, helpless, hopeless, desperate man—the head of a family, that when assembled in their nakedness, their filth, and their want, is a mere juxtaposition of wretched creatures, whose mutual sympathies have been destroyed by an involuntary infliction of ruin; where self-respect has been abandoned; where murmurs against God are mingled with maledictions on the heads of governors and lawmakers; where reverence for all statutes, human and divine, is almost of quite extinguished; where plans of spoliation are plotted without compunction; where the outcast beings, believing themselves forsaken alike of God and man, to be the victims of bad laws, or, at all events, feeling that they have no refuge or protection within the pale of the laws, are prepared to set them at defiance, since no fate can befall them worse than that which they now endure. (Loud cheering.) And this is in England. I want you to feel, as I think we ought all of us to feel, that for such a state of things to exist here is proof of the existence of some pernicious laws, crippling the trade of the country, barring us out of the markets of the world, prohibiting the fruits of other lands from coming here for the supply of our wants. Such intense misery, such abject indigence, such helpless and irremediable suffering, exists nowhere else. Where land is abundant it is not so; where labour is scarce it is not so; where food is plentiful and cheap it is not so. Whatever despotism or superstition may do in other countries, they do not, as our laws do, starve an industrious, ingenious, and thrifty people, who have the means of exchanging the fruits of their labour for the food which they require. (Loud and repeated cheers.) I have travelled much, and I have seen ignorance the most profound, superstition the most gloomy and terrible, despotism un-mixed and rigorous, a priesthood tyrannous and proud, but human misery like that which I have seen here, and around us, I have not seen. (Cheers.) After some further eloquent declamation against the injustice and impolicy of prohibiting the free interchange of commodities between nations, Mr. Thompson proceeded to comment upon the conduct of the Government in refusing, as they did recently, to admit wheat from India, Australia, and other colonies, on the same footing as from Canada. He recapitulated and ridiculed the grounds of their refusal, and strongly condemned their policy in regard to the Corn Laws. He then proceeded to discuss the question of admitting Brazilian sugar. Having said so much (continued the honourable gentleman) of corn, let me say a word with regard to sugar. (Hear, hear.) No one will, I think, suspect me of any wish to uphold slavery. (Cheers.) Should any individual here do so, I have only to point to the history and actions of my past life, and to say—that is my answer. (Cheers.) It is my misfortune to differ with some who, from the purest motives, are honestly opposed to the carrying out of Free-Trade principles on the subject of sugar. I have looked at this question deliberately, and for years, and have endeavoured to arrive at a sound and righteous conclusion; and I would, with all affection and respect, combat the doctrine maintained by some of my friends, that the Government of this country should prohibit the importation of slave-grown sugar into the English market, for the consumption of the people of this country. We are agreed respecting slavery. We hold it in equal abomination. We believe that the stealing of men, the holding of such as have been stolen in bondage, and the coercion of human labour, keeping back at the same time the wages which are due for that labour, that these are crimes in the sight of God, and horrible outrages upon the natural and equal rights of men. We believe, too, that it is the duty of every enlightened and Christian man to lift up his voice against slavery in all its forms, and to use all moral and legitimate means to hasten the time when slavery should end, and with the end of slavery there shall be an end of the commerce in the human species. (Hear, hear, hear.) We come, then, to consider what are the rights of the people of this country; and, in close connexion with this subject, what are the means which may be properly called rightful and legitimate, being such as, while they aim at the establishment of the claims of men abroad, do not interfere with the free agency, the civil liberty, and the just prerogatives of men at home. I admit the truth of the proposition, that men are entitled to personal liberty—that they should enjoy and fully exercise their liberty in the choice of their masters, in the nature and scene of their employment, and in making the best possible bargain for themselves, when they carry their labour to market. But to my mind it appears equally clear, that the people of this and every other country should be free, as consumers (that is, free as regards the interference of any human law), to choose between the products of the different parts of the world brought into the common market. (Loud cheers.) I see not that they can with justice be prevented from buying the products of Brazil or Cuba, on the ground that the produce of those countries is the fruit of a slave system. I see not that they can with justice be compelled, by legislative enactments, to buy the produce of the British West Indies—or be driven to the alternative of going without that which they want. (Cheers.) I admit that it is a right, and a duty, to denounce slave holding, and to disseminate information among all classes respecting the sinfulness of the system. It is a right, and a duty, to exhibit in the clearest light, the obligation of withholding all encouragement from those who commit the crime of keeping men in bondage. In every case in which, by the use of argument, persuasion, and entreaty, a man is led to act voluntarily in this matter, it may be said, in the language of Scripture, "Thou hast gained thy brother;" and so much is done, in the most legitimate manner, towards the conversion of men from an evil practice, and the extinction of the system which we alike abhor. But, legislative prohibition is coercion, not argument; it is force, not reason; it is tyranny, not persuasion. Such acts are a perversion and abuse of legislative power. There is no warrant for such an exercise of authority. It is making Parliament the usurper of power over the consciences of men, in a matter on which they have a clear right to judge for themselves, and act as moral and accountable agents. Such an act as that which I am now speaking of, and which at this moment is in full force in this country, cannot be the act of the people, or in obedience to the voice of the people; for if it were so, the act itself would be unnecessary, and the produce now prohibited, though landed upon our shores and exposed for sale, would lack purchasers, and would be abandoned in consequence of the moral pollution attaching to it. Even, as the act of a few men in Parliament, the present prohibition is manifestly insincere: for the same men allow it to be landed—they allow it to be refined here—they encourage its exportation in British vessels—they sanction our merchants in the trade which they drive in this article with other countries—they know that it is consumed abroad in a refined state, with all charges upon it, at less cost than raw sugar in our own island—they encourage the trade until it approximates the point at which it affects their own monopoly, and then they prohibit its consumption, on the plea that it is produced by slavery. Yet, during this time, they are giving all the necessary encouragement to men to purchase and consume it, excepting only the poor, the burdened, and the hungry population of our own country, whose custom they wish to retain on their own terms for themselves. (Hear, hear, hear.) Unhappily for the sincerity and consistency of these men, they were the very persons who were most eloquent in the defence of slavery in days gone by. (Hear, hear, hear.) In the Blue Book, which records the names of those who received compensation out of the twenty millions paid for the abolition of slavery, I find that they were among the largest receivers of what they would now call the wages of unrighteousness. I turn to their votes in Parliament, and I find them steadily relating, year after year, every attempt to mitigate the horrors of negro captivity, and even voting against the abolition of the practice of flogging females. (Hear.) I find that they were the very men who imposed such monstrous duties on the free-grown produce of British India, that they effectually prevented its consumption in this country save by a small number, who were willing to give a higher price for an inferior article. I find the same men giving millions annually, in the shape of drawbacks, bounties, and protections, to the slave-holding planters of the West Indies, and their supporters and copartners here. Why? They were themselves the growers of sugar then, they are the growers of sugar now. They were the growers of corn then, they are the growers of corn now. Show them an article they do not grow, and though saturated with the tears and the blood of helpless slaves, they will allow it to be imported and consumed. (Cheers.) But show them an article in which they deal, which could be imported and consumed at less than their own monopoly price, and they exclude it, no matter whether it be the corn of Ohio or India, or the sugar of Brazil or Cuba. (Hear, hear, hear.) Can this be honest humanity? (Hear, hear, hear.) Every man of right feeling must, I think, experience the sickness of unutterable disgust when he hears such men talking in Parliament, like the Elishas of the abolition cause, and sees them weeping tears of affected compassion over the miseries of field-labourers in Brazil. (Hear, hear, hear.) These are the men, too, who denied your right and power to interfere with them when they were slaveholders. They opposed us at every step when we desired to destroy, by law, that which had been created by law. (Hear, hear, hear.) They defended to the last hour the assumed rights of planters and colonial assemblies, and they refused to let the negro go free until the largest sum of money ever voted for purposes of humanity was paid down and shared among them. (Hear, hear, hear.) Nay, they even then continued slavery under another name, and overthrew the Administration for bringing in a bill to suspend the charter of Jamaica, during the cruelties of negro apprenticeship. (Hear, hear, hear.) They spoke then, as they speak now, as the organs of the monopolists, and as men deeply interested in the maintenance of restrictions. The sense of the nation was against them then; the sense of the nation is against them now. They could not be sincere, then, unless they are practising a deception now. They cannot be conscientious now, unless they are prepared to say that they were speaking and voting against their consciences before. (Hear, hear, hear.) These are the men, too, who have more recently revived the system in India of exporting men to the island of Mauritius—a system of which I shall say no more on this occasion than that it is one of semi-slavery—fraught with misrepresentation and delusion in India, and ending, in the vast majority of cases, in disappointment and suffering on the island. We occupy the same ground to-day as we did fourteen years ago. We say slaveholding is sin—and to rebuke it, and to try by all right means to abolish it, is the duty of individuals and nations. (Hear, hear, hear.) To petition for the abolition of our national system of slavery was right. For the Legislature, in obedience to the voice of the country, to abolish it by act of Parliament was right. But, to compel thirty millions of freemen to pay millions of money against their will in the shape of an extra price upon a commodity of prime necessity—to diminish the supply of that commodity one-half by sheer force—to rob men of their right of buying what is offered in the market, because in the process of its production a wrong has been committed in another and a foreign country—this is not right—it is robbery. (Loud cheers.) And to do this on the plea that it is to promote the cause of freedom and humanity, when we know (as far as it is possible to have such knowledge) that that plea is hollow, false, and hypocritical, is to add mental fraud to legislative tyranny, and to commit an act of dissimulation in the sight of God, as well as an act of injustice towards the people of this country. (Applause.) There would be a far greater show of honesty in this matter if the principle were applied impartially, but it is not. The duty on sugar grown in Brazil and elsewhere is all but prohibitory. Why is there not an increase of the duty on tobacco, until the same effect is produced upon the consumption of that article as is now produced upon the consumption of the other, which is infinitely more useful and necessary? It is because these men do not grow tobacco, and, therefore, have no personal interest in it. Why not apply their doctrine to slave-grown cotton, and bring the article from those extended plains, which I have recently traversed? We take the cotton of America, but refuse the corn. O! and inconsistency. If they allow our merchants to import slave-grown cotton, our brokers to sell it, our capitalists to erect mills to spin it, and our men, women, and children to prepare it for the consumption of the population, from the Queen upon the throne to the beggar in the streets, why, when our industrious fellow-subjects have earned a scanty pittance by a week of toil, do they deny them the right of spending a trifle on Saturday night in the purchase of cheap sugar? Why, because they do not grow cotton, and they do grow sugar; and there is no other reason. For thirty years we have been asserting and attempting to prove that free labour is cheaper than slave labour, and that the peaceful and effectual method of putting down slavery is to allow of, and encourage, a competition between the one and the other. We have circulated the writings of Fearon, and Hodgson, and Cropper, and Jeremie, and Conder, and Dickson, and others. Shall we now give a practical refutation to all that we have uttered on this subject, and call for legislative prohibitions—which are injurious to free labour itself, and an arbitrary interference with the right of private judgment, and the free agency of men? I have read with much pleasure an emphatic and official declaration on the part of some leading abolitionists, of their conviction that it is futile, expensive, dangerous, and sinful to attempt to abolish the slave trade by armed intervention. I believe it to be so. Arithmetic and history will prove the truth of the one part of the proposition, and common sense and Christianity will support the other. But is there no resemblance between armed intervention and an act of Parliament which would be nugatory if not sustained and enforced by pains and penalties—a coast blockade and a standing army? What gives such a law (framed in opposition to the rights and feelings of the people) its powers? Is it not the overwhelming physical force of the Government? What would be the consequence of disobedience? We all know that very few respect the law which compels the people of this country to see refined Brazilian sugar shipped from our ports for sale in other countries for 4d. a pound, while good raw sugar here is 8d.; but all fear to infract the law, because of the tremendous consequences that would follow. Hence, it is not the statements of the Monopoliist party that are believed; but the custom-house officer, and the Exchequer-court, and the fine, and the dungeon, that are dreaded. (Cheers.) And is it that that men are to be made abolitionists? Is it thus that the slave is to be set free? Are the maxims of our former political economy thrown overboard? Is it impossible to effect the object in view by the combined agency of free labour abroad, and honest appeals to the consciences of men at home? Is it not enough that we have the sugar-growing Antilles, the vast plains of India, and the islands of Mauritius, and Ceylon, and Pulo-Penang, all our own; and Java and Manila to trade with; but we must add to all our other means and resources a legislative enactment that is abhorrent to the feelings and an invasion of the rights of the people of this country? (Hear, hear.) I will admit that, as an exhibition of consistent principle and a means of putting down slavery, men who profess to abhor slavery should refrain from the use of the produce of slavery; but I utterly deny the right of the Legislature (unopposed by the voice of the people,) to force me or any other man to abstain from the use of it. To me I confess it appears a glaring inconsistency, to seek to maintain one principle by the violation of another—to defend the rights of men in one direction, and to invade them and utterly destroy them in another. (Hear, hear.) How much more noble would it be to say, our ports are open—to the produce of every clime, that our people may buy that which is the cheapest and the best. We will interfere with no man's conscience. We will force no man to buy this, or to abstain from that. (Hear, hear.) We will say to other countries that continue slavery—we will not fight with you, for that would be doing evil that good may come. We will not levy prohibitory duties, for that would be a violation of the principle of Free Trade, and a coercive measure in reference to the population of this country. But we will not cease to hold up your slave systems to censure and execration. We will remonstrate as individuals, as societies, and as a nation. (Cheers.) We will encourage in every quarter your free-labour competitors. We will, as a government, do justice to our own magnificent dependencies. Instead of impeding the progress of native industry in India, we will stimulate and reward it. We will welcome the sugar, the rice, the cotton, and the tobacco of the lands where the sigh of the slave mingles not with the whispers of the breeze, but where the friendly voices of willing labourers are heard in uncursed fields and free and happy homes. Sell your sugar and your coffee while you can; but while you do so, we will train the consciences of men until they shall voluntarily reject that which you grow, and everything which bears the taint of slavery about it. (Cheers.) Yes, and we will attack your consciences, too. We will let you have no rest. Our cannon shall be spiked, and left to rust, but we will open our moral batteries, and fire shots which break no bones, and spill no blood; but which, reaching the hearts of men, shall lead them to yield the claims of justice, and teach them that honesty is the best policy. ("Hear," and cheers.) Our country shall not protest against prohibitory laws, and have reason to say that, even here there is a system which, if it robs not men of their persons, robs them at least of much of the fruits of their industry; there shall be no prohibitory laws. We have faith in the universal principles of a sound and honest political economy. We have faith in the power of example, unimpaired by coercion and restriction. We have faith in the productiveness of those regions to which slavery has not extended its blight and its curse, or where it has been extirpated. We have faith in the doctrine that an object which is good, needs not the agency of means that are bad. We have faith to believe that while we are providing for the wants, and jealously guarding the rights of our toiling children, and setting an example to the world by opening our own house of bondage, and widening our ports to the produce of all climes, that the hungry may be fed, and the idle employed—and that, while we are preferring that which is the fruit of freedom to that which is grown by slaves, God will grant his own blessing, and make our nation the instrument of leading other lands from crooked and wicked ways into the straight paths of justice and commercial freedom. (Cheers.) Should our opponents tell us of the consequences of a Free Trade, we are willing to meet them. We have faith in the soundness of our principles. We have faith in the Word of God. We have faith in the fertility of the soil, and in the growing, continued, and ever-increasing wants of the world's population. We have faith in the reciprocal interests of nations—in the enterprise and skill of the people. We have faith to believe that that system which is most simple, most equitable and just, and most conformable to the known condition of the world—is the system which will confer the richest blessings upon our country. (Cheers.) Let us put us every feeling of doubt or despondency respecting the issue of our enterprise. A rapid and unparalleled progress has been made. Already mountain difficulties have been overcome, and all around us are the presages of speedy success. Centuries of darkness and error—long ages of legislative blundering, and gross mistakes as to the effect of protective laws, have passed away. Our pernicious example has, it is true, led other nations, by false induction, to adopt many of our self-destructive theories; partial interests have had a protracted reign, and when assailed have frantically defended their vested rights in systems of injustice and error. The whole machinery of party strife and the weight of Government influence has been engaged to uphold the cause of monopoly. But the day has dawned. Truths, hidden for ages, have been brought to light; the world, through all the beautiful and unending varieties of soil, climate, productions, wants, and interests, has been viewed through the medium of common sense, and a reverential desire to read the will of God, as revealed in the works of his hand, and the dispensations of his providence. The profoundest maxims of political economy have been found to harmonise with the noblest plans of a religious and peace-breathing philanthropy. Nor this alone. There have appeared those who may with justice be designated the apostles of Free Trade. (Hear, hear, hear.) They have taken the truths discovered by the philosopher in his closet, or derived by men of the world from an enlightened observation of the situation, peculiarities, and mutual dependence of men and nations, and they have gone abroad to proclaim them through the length and breadth of the land. The living voice of the preacher of these truths has fallen upon the ear of millions of our countrymen. The pulpit, the exchange, the market-place, the crowded hall, the farmers' dining-room, the ladies' drawing-room, the county meeting, the open field, the highways and byways of the country—all have been made the scenes and theatres of an animated and instructive discussion of these doctrines. (Loud cheers.) No part of our population has been forgotten, or overlooked, or neglected. The Free-Trade Almanac is on the wall of the cottage, and he who could not read letters has been taught by speaking pictures. The Free-Trade tract is on the table of the humblest citizen, and he has studied and understood the philosophy of labour, and wages, and supply, and demand. Light has been carried where it was most needed—into the Senate. A political economist has appeared, who has clothed these truths in language the most convincing, arranged his arguments with a degree of simplicity and perspicuity never witnessed before, has expounded great principles in the hour of violent party strife, with a temper and spirit that has extorted the admiration of his opponents, who would have rushed to his banner but for the fetters of mortgages and jointures about their limbs, or an unconquerable love of high rents. That man has demanded and enforced audience of the upholders of monopoly in their loftiest seats, and they have sat mute while he spoke, and have remained mute when he sat down; because, alas for them! they knew not how to meet him, and were afraid to yield. (Loud cheers.) Be of good courage, then. Fling away the trammels of party and expediency. Let principles have their due weight, and consideration, and influence. When the hour of trial comes, be just and fear not. Duty is ours—consequences are God's. He who follows the dictates of conscience, the laws of nature, and the commands of Heaven, may safely leave the rest, and, dying, be satisfied with this verdict—returned by his own mind upon a review of his actions—I saw my duty, and I did it. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. COBURN then announced that the next meeting of the League would be held on Wednesday next; and the assemblage separated.

WINCHESTER.—A meeting of the Winchester Free-Trade Association, and of the friends of Free Trade generally, in that city, was held at the St. John's Rooms, on Monday evening, the 8th inst., for the purpose of hearing an address from W. J. Fox, Esq., of London. Mr. Childell, a tenant-farmer, took the chair, and made some observations in which he strongly condemned the Corn Laws and advocated freedom of trade.—The Rev. W. Thorn said they were most of them aware that an association, designated the "Winchester Free-Trade Association," had been established, and that the present meeting was called by the association. Its object was to enlighten their minds on the subject of Free Trade, and to induce as many of their fellow-townsmen as they could to enrol themselves as members. A great many persons had already joined; the rules were printed, and there was a very appropriate engraved card for the members, the subscription being 1s. or upwards for the year.—Mr. Frampton said that the Anti-Corn-Law League recommended as one of the means by which to obtain the speedy repeal of the Corn Laws, that the non-electors in every borough should get up a requisition to the electors, to request their representatives to support the motion of the Hon. C. P. Villiers, for a total repeal. He approved of that mode of proceeding, for it paid homage to the principle of which he was the humble but devoted advocate, viz., the right of every man to a voice in making the laws which all were bound to obey. He begged to move, "That it is the opinion of this meeting that the non-electors of Winchester should present a memorial to the parliamentary electors, requesting them to use their best efforts with the representatives of the borough to induce them to support the motion of the Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, to be submitted to the House of Commons during the present session in favour of the total repeal of the Corn Laws."—Mr. Johnson seconded the motion.—The Chairman then introduced to the meeting W. J. Fox, Esq., who, on rising, was received with loud applause. He proceeded to address the meeting, and in an able speech gave a lucid exposition of Free-Trade principles, defending the League from the charges of its opponents, while he exposed and refuted their fallacies, and concluded with an eloquent appeal to the meeting to unite with the League. (Mr. Fox resumed his seat amidst loud cheers.)—W. Bird, Esq., proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Fox, which was seconded by Mr. H. Moody, and carried by acclamation; and with three cheers for Free Trade, the proceedings terminated.—Abridged from the Hampshire Independent.

WHITEHAVEN.—On Wednesday the 10th instant, the first of a series of lectures to the Young Men's Free-Trade Association was delivered by Thomas Ainsworth, Esq., of Floss, in the Temperance Hall, Whitehaven. The chair was occupied by J. P. Ley, Esq., who made a brief introductory speech. Mr. Ainsworth presented himself amidst loud cheers, and proceeded with his lecture, in which he undertook to prove, 1st. That labour is lightened by the introduction of machinery. 2nd. That by the introduction of machinery the demand for labour has been considerably increased. 3rd. That the cost of all materials in which machinery is employed have been reduced in value, and thus through cheapness benefited the community at large. Mr. Ainsworth supported these propositions by a copious array of facts, and many conclusive arguments. He concluded amidst loud applause. Messrs. Barker and Nelson assisted at the meeting. The unanimous vote of the meeting was given in favour of Free Trade; after which a vote of thanks was presented to the chairman, and the meeting dispersed.—Whitehaven Herald.

THE PENDING ELECTIONS.

The state of Horsham at the present moment, as explained in the annexed resolution, is a type of the electoral condition of many of the small rural boroughs. Mr. Hurst, formerly the Whig member, who was considered the Liberal leader of the borough, in which he owns a large amount of property, having conciliated the Duke of Richmond by a subscription to the Anti-League Fund, is brought forward upon the joint support of Whig and Tory Monopolists; and the few earnest Free-Traders in the place suddenly find themselves without organization or leaders. Under these circumstances they declined the offer of the Council of the League to furnish them with a candidate, preferring to organize themselves for a future effort. We have been requested to publish the following:—

At a public meeting of the electors and other inhabitants of the borough of Horsham, held at the Assembly Room of the Richmond Arms this 18th day of April, 1844, it was proposed, on the motion of Mr. Robert Ashdown, seconded by Mr. John Browne, and unanimously resolved—

"That, by a coalition betwixt both political parties of the landed proprietary of this neighbourhood in support of monopoly, and the personal possession of large property in this parish, Mr. Robert Henry Hurst has been enabled temporarily to secure the representation of this borough, while many of the Free-Trade electors have incautiously precluded themselves by premature pledges from the present exercise of a free choice.

"That the inhabitants of this borough repudiate the representation of Mr. Hurst as being virtually that only of his and his landed supporters' interests, whose exercise of political power controls, for the present, our freedom of election.

"And that, to prevent all mistake on the subject of our real opinions, this meeting denounces all taxes on human food, and restrictions on the exercise of industry; and we hereby declare our readiness at any future election to record our votes in favour of that candidate who will support the total and immediate repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws."

The foregoing resolution having been unanimously carried by the meeting, I hereby certify the same on behalf thereof.

JAMES AGATE, Chairman.

Huntingdon is another illustration of the way in which the League agitation is testing the character and exposing the objects of self-styled liberal politicians. One of the noisiest and most unscrupulous tools of the aristocratic Monopolists of that county is a person who was formerly considered a Liberal of the first water, and the champion of religious freedom! Parties and leaders are in a state of confusion there, which precludes the possibility of a Free-Trader being at present returned. An application has been made to Mr. Downes Martin (chairman at Mr. Acland's triumphant discussion), who has hitherto resisted the pressing invitation of his friends to allow himself to be put in nomination. Although, from his high character in the neighbourhood, he would certainly poll more than any other League candidate, still we hope, if he declines, that the Free-Trade electors will allow the Council of the League to redeem its pledge by finding a candidate to oppose Mr. Thomas Baring. There is no mode of reconstructing parties so effectual as that of a vigorous election contest upon League principles.

Woodstock is another beautiful illustration of our electoral system. Mr. Thesiger, who sat for that pocket-borough as the nominee of the Duke of Marlborough, having resigned (according to the constitutional rule) upon receiving the appointment to the office of Solicitor-General, expecting, no doubt, to be re-elected as a matter of course, finds the Marquis of Blandford, the duke's eldest son, in the field before him. This is a second edition of the Durham squabble. Our readers will recollect that the candidate is son-in-law of the Marquis of Londonderry, and was intended by him for the representation of that city. Should there be a similar rupture between the Government party and the Marlborough men, there will be a Leaguer ready to carry off the prize.

Our accounts from Exeter represent the steam as rising. The Free-Traders are fortunate in having for their candidate so excellent a man, one so unexceptionable in every respect, as General Briggs; and aided by the eloquence of his friends, Mr. Geo. Thompson and Mr. Moore, who are daily addressing the electors of that city, we feel confident that such an impression will be made as will eventually, if not immediately, rescue its representation from the hands of the Monopolists.

Let our friends everywhere be on the alert, so as to prevent their being taken by surprise. Above all things let them watch the registration, and trust to nothing but the battle of the registration courts.

LIVERPOOL.

THE GREAT FREE-TRADE BANQUET.

The Great Free Trade Banquet at the Amphitheatre took place on Friday, the 12th inst., Thomas Thornely, Esq., M.P. for Wolverhampton, in the chair. Placards had some days before been posted, announcing that the Right Hon. the Earl of Ducie; the Right Hon. Fox Maule, M.P.; the Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P.; William Ewart, Esq., M.P.; Colonel Perronet Thompson; Henry Ashworth, Esq.; W. J. Fox, Esq.; Robert R. Moore, Esq.; George Thompson, Esq.; and George Wilson, Esq., of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and several other distinguished advocates of Free Trade, would attend.

The meeting was most animated throughout, and the enthusiasm which the principles of Free Trade, as enunciated by the eloquent speakers, excited, showed how strong is the hold which they have taken upon the public of Liverpool.

The orchestra was placed on an elevation at the extreme end of the stage, and Mr. Parker's band played during the evening a number of appropriate tunes, in a style which reflected credit on the talent of their leader and the capacity of his musicians. Beneath the orchestra were four lights, reflected through pink shades, with gilt edges, which had a pleasing and harmonious effect, bearing flags underneath, on each of which, in pink and green, was inscribed the name of some popular leader of the Free-Trade movement—"Thompson," "Cobden," "Bright," "Villiers." The gallery beneath the president's chair bore a series of inscriptions, such as the following:—"The Corn Law is a bread law;" "For God's sake don't tax the bread of the people;" "A protected trade is a useless trade." The chandelier in the centre of the building was gaily decorated for the occasion. It was enveloped in a covering of variegated colours—crimson, white, purple, and pink,—and the effect was extremely pleasing. Over the stage boxes there were magnificent circular transparencies, upon one of which was "London," and upon the other "Durham," in allusion to the great victories achieved by the patriotic energy of the League over obstinate monopolist confederacies. To the right of the chair, along the upper gallery, were a series of beautiful transparencies, on which were inscribed the following appropriate mottoes:—"The Corn Law increases the price of bread; the Corn Law keeps up the price of food, but not of wages;" "Free Trade! shoulder to shoulder!" "Commerce is barter." On the opposite side, in similar devices, were the following:—"A tax on bread is a poll tax;" "If one man receives protection, another pays for it;" "Your device is to create artificial scarcity;" "Free-Traders are of no party." In the gallery, fronting the president's chair, was a magnificent flag, upon which, most beautifully worked, was an allegorical representation of Britannia weeping over the Corn Laws; on one side of this flag were inscribed, in coloured letters, the words, "The Corn Laws are opposed to the will of God and the happiness of man;" and, on the other side, from Mr. Huskisson's speech in the House of Commons, on the 26th of March, 1832, "It is my decided conviction that we cannot uphold the Corn Laws now in existence, together with our present taxation, and at the same time increase our national prosperity, and preserve public credit." Beneath every box on the lower tier, the gas-lights were encircled by elegantly-framed devices, in the shape of shells, tastefully ornamented and gilded, supported on either side by flags of various colours. The tout ensemble was very picturesque. The tables, about ten in number, were ranged in parallel lines across the stage and pit, down to the boxes. The boxes were appropriated to the use of the ladies, who were elegantly dressed, and took a warm interest in the proceedings. They were well filled, except in one or two of the centre boxes; and during the evening the fair occupants were supplied with jellies, iced creams, and other delicacies by the stewards, the refreshments being provided by Mr. Lynn, of the Waterloo Hotel, whose talents as a caterer are familiar to such of our readers as have been in the habit of attending public banquets in this town. The dinner was excellent in quality, and abundant in quantity; the waiting was everything which the most fastidious could desire; and on the present, as on former occasions, we have to record our obligations to the worthy caterer, Mr. Lynn, for his attention and politeness, not less to ourselves than to all who were partakers of the evening's festivities. There were present several strangers and a large number of the most influential, commercial, and professional men of Liverpool.

THOS. THORNEY, Esq., M.P., the chairman, having proposed in succession the usual preliminary toasts, —“her Majesty the Queen,” “the Queen Dowager, Prince Albert, and the rest of the royal family,” which were drunk with loud cheers,—rose and said, that the meeting was not upon any particular occasion, but that it had been thought desirable that occasional meetings should be held by the Free Traders of Liverpool, from which great good would be the inevitable result. He felt great pleasure at witnessing the attendance of so many strangers, because he wished them to know that, although the voice of Liverpool as now expressed in Parliament was exercised on the side of monopoly, yet in this community there was a body of enlightened intelligence which earnestly sought the extension of commerce, and desired to enforce on Parliament the principles of Free Trade. The chairman then congratulated the meeting on the great extension of those principles, referring for proof to the appointment of the Import Duties Committee, upon which he and Mr. Ewart had served, which had shown what a deal of embarrassment the commerce of the country laboured under from its being restricted, and which had enlightened the public mind on the subject of such restriction; and also referring to the labours of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, the mention of whose names elicited loud cheers. Having read a letter from Earl Ducie expressing his inability to attend, he said that the toast he was about to give had been intended to be given in the presence of that noble earl, but, as he was not present, he would take the liberty of introducing the name of another distinguished nobleman, the Marquis of Westminster. (Loud cheers.) The chairman then gave “the Marquis of Westminster, the Earl Ducie, and those peers who support the principles of commercial freedom, seeking no advantage for their order at the expense of the community at large.” (Great cheering.) The chairman also read a letter of apology from Mr. Villiers, expressing his regret that, owing to indisposition, he was unable to be present. He begged to introduce to the meeting their respected friend Mr. Ewart. (Great cheering.) The chairman then gave the following toast:—“The Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, M.P., and those members of the House of Commons who have recorded their votes in favour of Free Trade,” with three cheers for Mr. Villiers. (Three tremendous cheers were then given for that distinguished gentleman.)

WILLIAM EWART, Esq., M.P., rose, and was received with loud and long-continued cheering. Mr. Ewart began his address by referring to Mr. Villiers, upon whom he passed a warm eulogium. In responding to the toast on behalf of the other Free-Trade members of the House, he expressed his regret that they were not more numerous; but they were making progress in the country, and eventually the country would ensure a final and effectual triumph to the principles of Free Trade. He wanted words to express his sense of the services of some of those distinguished men, amongst whom was his friend the chairman, and those whom he might truly call the apostles of Free Trade—Messrs. Cobden and Bright. He saw around him some of the real representatives of Free Trade, but there were no latent or concealed representatives who ought by proxy to thank the meeting? Why, the Prime Minister, the Secretary for the Home Department, and the President of the Board of Trade, were “Free Traders in the abstract;” they only wanted moral courage to carry out their principles; and if they would come forward with some great and comprehensive measure, they would carry with them all the sympathy, as well as the support, of the present generation, while they would commend the gratitude of posterity. Mr. Ewart then referred to the state of the question in the House, where, he contended, the majority were one-sided advocates—one-eyed judges, who would never have their vision completely restored until purged by the invigorating influence of the public mind. The Anti-Corn-Law League, that unjustly derided, but justly popular body, had achieved a great triumph; it had broken down the false barrier which had so long separated the manufacturing and rural inhabitants of the country, and had shown that their interests were one. It had appealed to the tenant-farmers to be no longer serfs, but to demand that just protection which the law ought not to deny to any man; and it had not appealed in vain, for the farmers were now determined that they would have that protection of long leases which was given in Scotland, and which sound policy denied to no man. The League had gone further; it had shown that the agriculturists were worse off than the manufacturing population; and had asked the peasant whether it was not his interest to have cheap bread, cheap clothing, and other articles. Having again expressed his thanks at the great spread of Free-Trade principles, he said:—“This is a happy consummation; but I turn round, and ask, what effect has this advance in the principles of Free Trade produced within the town of Liverpool (hear, hear), the town which gave me birth—the birthplace of most of us—our mother town of Liverpool? (Cheers.) I lament to state, and I grieve to reflect, that this town—the Tyne of modern times—that this town, far surpassing in wealth and magnificence all that the most celebrated cities of ancient days could boast, still remains blind to those principles which Adam Smith in his writings inculcated, whose successor William Pitt followed, and which were taught and impressed upon its inhabitants by the late Mr. Huskisson (hear, hear), principles which first brought the town to its present eminence, and which give confidence of future greatness. (Hear, hear.) But what must be the feelings of the distinguished foreigner, when he visits our port, and finds her merchants hand-bound and manacled with the chains of commercial intolerance and despotic tyranny. (Loud cries of “Hear, hear.”) Gentlemen, we have had anything but the principles of Free Trade prevailing in this town for a long period. At one time we had the West India interest predominant—an interest which exercised what it was pleased to call the right of holding the bodies of their fellow-creatures in commercial thralldom; and we have long had an interest which unjustly employed its power and influence in upholding and binding together an unholy alliance against the principles of Free Trade. (Hear.) They for a long time have impressed the town with those principles of commercial turpitude which debased the population; but I trust a brighter period now awaits us—I trust an era is now about to dawn upon us, at least upon our younger population, which will dispel our apprehensions for the future. (Loud cheers.) Mr. Ewart concluded with an eloquent appeal to the meeting to give to the Free-Trade members of the House of Commons not only their approbation, but their determined and persevering support; and resumed his seat amidst loud and repeated cheers.

The CHAIRMAN, after a few introductory remarks, proposed “The Right Hon. Fox Maule, M.P., and those landowners who recognise the principle, that the interests of agriculture are best promoted by unrestricted trade.”

The Right Hon. Fox MAULE rose amidst loud plaudits, and having acknowledged the very flattering reception he had met with, said he cordially responded to the sentiment of the toast. With no other prospects to look to than those which emanated from land, he entirely concurred in the view that the interests of the position he might be called upon hereafter to occupy could only be promoted to their utmost extent by unrestricted commercial intercourse with all the world. He deserved no credit for uttering this sentiment, because, in adopting it, he was only seeking his own personal ends; and he felt surprised that those situated as he was did not view the matter in the same light. If they did inherit lands, what was that if, at the same time, they were viewed as an incubus in the country? As a body, they had always stood in the way of improvement to the commercial intercourse of the world, and of the habits and condition of their countrymen. He wished to be distinguished not by nobility of title, or the accident of birth, but by doing as much good to others as he could. He noticed the rapid spread of Free-Trade principles in Scotland, which he attributed to the greater independence of the tenant, arising from their possessing longer leases. Mr. Maule then referred to the system of corn rents, another advantage possessed by farmers in Scotland; and to the obstacles they had to encounter in a stern climate, which led them to study the utmost economy, by which they were enabled to pay the rents they did. He expressed the hope that Free-Trade principles would spread still more in Scotland, for he was quite sure that there was no system so bad as that which led the farmers to consider themselves as a distinct body from the rest of the community. After a warm eulogium on commerce, whose great advantages he pointed out, Mr. Maule said:—“When I landed upon these magnificent docks, and saw the flags of every different nation floating, and the mercantile marine upon them, I could not help saying to myself, ‘Is it possible that this great city, instead of being the beacon-light of Free Trade, should be one of the closest and restricted with respect to commerce of any city in the world?’ I look around and see little knots of monopolist interests in various quarters. I see the sugar frightened for its existence on the one hand, and I see the timber trembling on the other. (Laughter.) I see various interests all at work, and I see them uniting together to support in the main the most object of all monopolies—the monopoly of food. (Hear.) But I trust the day is coming when public opinion, which, as history tells us, must sooner or later prevail, will wipe away the stains which now exist upon our commercial statute book. It is truly impossible that those who are engaged in commerce in this community—those who are the owners of capital, and those who can command the wealth and resources of the land—it is truly impossible that they will sit quietly by, be their politics called by what name they please, and see market after market stolen and wrested from this country by our own foolish acts and wretched legislation. (Tremendous cheering.) I think I can trace—without pretending to see further than my neighbours—I think I can see a latent disposition in certain quarters—I think I can see certain signs of the times which convince me that the loss of foreign markets is coming somewhat home to the consideration of the powers that be. (Hear.) When we see our busy neighbour anxious—and I do not blame her for that—to take advantage of every opening for her infantile commerce—when we see that busy neighbour nibbling at the Brazils—a market which, if we were to lose (and we might retain it with the utmost ease)—a market which, if we were to lose, there are many in Liverpool would rue their obstinacy. (Tremendous applause.) When we see that busy neighbour at work, it behoves us to put all our energies to work, and it behoves the people of this country to ring—by agitation if you please—in the ears of the Government of the day, that such things will not be submitted to. (Cheers.) Mr. Maule having mentioned the names of several distinguished noblemen, landowners, holding Free-Trade principles, concluded by again expressing his thanks for the reception he had met with, and sat down amidst loud cheering and waving of handkerchiefs.

The CHAIRMAN, in introducing the next toast, “The Anti-Corn-Law League, and thanks to them for the zealous and persevering endeavours to liberate British industry from the bondage of monopoly,” said that the printed list stated that the toast would be responded to by George Wilson, Esq., but he was unfortunately absent in Manchester, labouring under indisposition. Having the honour of being their chairman, he might also consider himself a sort of stage manager; and it therefore behoved him to look about for some one to take the part. (Cheers and laughter.) He begged to propose as a substitute his respected friend, Richard Cobden, Esq. (Great cheering, the whole company rising.) He would only say, as the Speaker says, “The eyes have it.” (Cheers and laughter.) In connexion with the Anti-Corn-Law League, he begged to propose “The health of Richard Cobden, Esq.” (Great cheering, the company again rising.)

Mr. COBDEN, on rising to respond to the toast, was received with many rounds of most enthusiastic applause, which it seemed very difficult to restrain. Silence being obtained, the hon. gentleman, after two or three introductory remarks, said: I regret exceedingly that our friend, Mr. Wilson, is not here to return his thanks for the honour you have done him. In his absence I should be very sorry to let the occasion pass of joining in my humble tribute to his great worth and usefulness in this great cause. (Hear.) He is not much accustomed to public exhibitions, but to those who have been constantly and actively engaged in this cause for the last five years, like myself, Mr. Wilson’s merits are known and well appreciated. (Hear.) I have no hesitation in saying that without his calm and cool judgment, his clear sagacity, his great perseverance and his courage, which never knows what it is to be beaten—if we had not had his power of combination, his suggestive mind to have guided us in our operations, the League would not have been what it is at the present day. (Cheers.) For myself it may be said of Mr. Wilson, as applied to me, “Go, and he goeth; come, and he cometh:” for I am always perfectly safe when I am at his disposal, because I am sure, if he has made an engagement for me, it is always to do good to the cause. (Hear.) Mr. Cobden then addressed himself to the general question, in a speech of great length, which was loudly cheered throughout. The following just observations on the character of a considerable portion of our parliamentary representation are deserving of the notice of constituencies:—“If I find a borough degraded in its habits, drunken, profligate, I know the members come in upon the beer barrel—(cheers)—and when I see them in the House I am quite sure they will be as often in Bellamy’s, or at the club, as in the House giving their votes. (Hear.) If I come to a borough of larger dimensions, and I find there a community which runs to extremes in religion, I make up my mind that that borough, much as it may be celebrated for commerce, or however advantageous in other respects it may be, I am quite sure that borough will be likely to limit its own commerce, and restrict the prosperity of its population, by carrying narrow-mindedness and bigotry into political voting, and sending men to Parliament who will put fetters upon their own commerce. Mind, there is one saving clause to the theory I set up. There is also a transition state. There are some boroughs which have given examples of bad habits and morals, therefore we may expect their representatives to be the same; but there are others in a state of transition from bad to better. Now I firmly believe, whatever Liverpool has been in times past, Liverpool is in a process of change to something better. There may be discouraging men among you, but there is a young party in this town to which you owe much. I am glad that this cause of Free Trade has fallen mainly into the hands of the young men of this town. (Cheers.) They cannot be much known in your parish or municipal squabbles, and the less they are known the better. (Hear.) They cannot be much tainted with Whiggery or Toryism, and I am glad of it. I care nothing about Whig or Tory in the settlement of this question of Free Trade. The hon. gentleman concluded by expressing his conviction that the state of affairs in this borough would speedily be changed; and that the next time they met he should be able to say “Young Liverpool did it.” (Tremendous cheering.)

WM. RATHBONE, Esq., was received with loud and long-continued applause. When silence was restored, he said, he ventured to propose the health of the chairman. (Cheers.) He cheerfully paid that compliment to his much respected friend—a man who ought to have been their representative. (Loud applause.) Mr. Rathbone having made some observations on the causes which affected the representation of Liverpool, passed a warm eulogium on the chairman, who, by his consistency, freedom from crochets, and daily attendance in the House of Commons, had nobly done his duty. (The toast was drunk with three times three and continued cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN acknowledged the compliment, and concluded by proposing “The total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Law, and the abolition of all other commercial monopolies,” and by informing the meeting that John Bright, Esq., M.P., would respond to the toast. (The toast was drunk with three times three.)

JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., M.P. for Durham, rose, and was received with several rounds of applause. After the cheering had subsided, the hon. gentleman said that, with reference to what the chairman had stated as to his (Mr. Bright) being there upon that occasion, it would appear that he had understood his own importance—coming down to supply the place of some gentleman whose absence they all regretted. The exact truth was, that he (Mr. Bright) had come down to Liverpool without knowing that the gentleman would be absent, but with the full understanding that he was not to speak that night, but that he was to take part in a meeting to be held in that place to-morrow (Saturday) night. Having been there, however, he felt no objection to take such part in the proceedings as the committee of management had assigned to him. Mr. Bright then delivered an able address, and concluded amidst loud cheers.

The CHAIRMAN proposed “Speed the Plough! May British agriculture soon be relieved from the ‘peculiar burden’ of protection, and keep pace in the march of improvement with British manufactures.” He had great pleasure in introducing to them a gentleman who would respond to it—an old friend, whose exertions in the cause of Free Trade he should never forget—he meant Colonel Thompson. (Tremendous cheers.)

Colonel THOMPSON, on coming forward, was greeted with hearty plaudits. He delivered one of his usual happy speeches, which repeatedly drew forth loud laughter and applause.

Mr. COBDEN, after paying a handsome compliment to the exertions of the young gentlemen who managed the Anti-Monopoly Association, concluded by proposing “Success to that Institution.”

Mr. RAWLINS briefly responded to it amid loud cheers.

The Right Hon. Mr. F. MAULE proposed “The Lancashire Witches,” which was drunk with great enthusiasm.

The immense assemblage separated at a quarter-past eleven.—Abridged from the Liverpool Chronicle.

HUNTINGDON.

DISCUSSION BETWEEN DR. SLEIGH AND MR. ACLAND.

Saturday having been appointed for the grand discussion of the Corn Law, in the large room of the Huntingdon Literary Institution, the fame of which had been spread far and wide through the country, the town presented a very crowded and excited appearance. Although the discussion was announced not to take place until four o’clock, the door of the Institute was besieged by crowds as early as half-past two; and the streets adjacent were thronged with eager faces hastening to the point of attraction. At half-past three the doors were opened, and the large room, which is calculated to hold rather above 1000 persons, was soon densely thronged, every corner being made available that could hold a listener. On the platform were placed a table in the middle for the two chairmen, and a seat for the Mayor, Dennis Herbert, Esq., the umpire; on the chairman’s left was the table of Mr. Acland, and Dr. Sleigh was placed on the right; the remaining portion of the platform was occupied by gentlemen who were admitted by tickets. About five minutes before four o’clock Dr. Sleigh entered the room, and amidst much applause took his seat on the platform. He was followed immediately after by Mr. Acland, whose entrance was also greeted with loud and prolonged cheers. On reaching the platform Mr. Acland advanced to Dr. Sleigh, and cordially shook hands with him, that gentleman returning the salute with equal good nature. This action elicited vociferous applause. The disputants then returned to their seats, and at four o’clock exactly the proceedings commenced. Throughout the discussion the behaviour of the audience was characterized by much courtesy and moderation, and a great desire was evident to learn the real merits of the question. It was composed of persons of all classes; farmers of every grade, from him of 1000 acres to the 50 acre man. Agricultural labourers showed their honest weather-exposed faces; and the soiled jacket and pale, but intelligent countenance of the artisan mixed in the group. All seemed deeply interested and attentive, sincerely desirous and hopeful that the coming discussion would elicit the real truth concerning this important question. The result, which was not anticipated, was a majority, to the best of the judgment of our reporters, of three to one in favour of Free Trade. We have no time for comment now; but no doubt this meeting and its result will be alluded to and quoted with exultation by the advocates of Free Trade for many a long day. Although we do not pretend to have reported every word that was spoken during a five hours' debate, still we have studied to be strictly impartial, and fairly to give the arguments of each speaker.

On the platform with the disputants were seated Geo. Thornhill, Esq., M.P.; Dennis Herbert, Esq., Mayor of Huntingdon and umpire; Downes Martin, Esq., chairman for Mr. Acland; David Vasey, Esq., chairman for Dr. Sleigh; George and James Rust, Esqrs.; M. Newton, Esq., of Alconbury; James Torkington, Esq.; R. H. Hussey, Esq., Ald. Ward; Rev. Messrs. Leven-thorpe, Haworth, and W. Wright; Charles Vasey, Esq.; — Hammond, Esq.; and — Hickin, Esq., secretary to the League; Mr. G. M. Fox, secretary to the Huntingdon Protection Association; Captain Duberley; P. Tildard, Esq.; Messrs. Garner, Barnes, Boyer, and Elgood.

The discussion was commenced at four o'clock, by Dr. Sleigh, who spoke for an hour; then Mr. Acland spoke for the same period. At six o'clock, the time allowed to each disputant, by the mutual arrangements which had been made, was limited to half an hour; and from eight to half-past eight, each had a quarter of an hour. In his closing speech, Mr. Acland said, that as the question of the Corn Laws had hardly been touched upon, he proposed to his honourable opponent to adjourn the same to Tuesday (the 16th inst.). Dr. Sleigh declined. Some discussion having taken place as to the propriety of an adjournment, D. Vasey, Esq., said that his honourable colleague and himself were both of opinion that a division should be come to.—Mr. Warsop, of Alconbury, here rose with a paper in his hand, and was about to address the assembly, but was prevented by the chairman.—Mr. D. Vasey read the printed programme of the proceedings, after which he called upon all those who were in favour of Dr. Sleigh's assertion to hold up both hands.—About one-third of the meeting signified their acquiescence with Dr. Sleigh.—Mr. Vasey then requested all those who were of opinion that Dr. Sleigh had failed to maintain his assertion, to hold up both hands.—In reply to this, a complete forest of hands was raised, constituting 3 to 1 in favour of Free Trade. As soon as the shouts which greeted this display had subsided, Mr. D. Martin advanced to the edge of the platform, and said, "I thank you, gentlemen; we have beaten them by 3 to 1."—Mr. Acland then came forward and proposed the thanks of the meeting, for the kind, able, and impartial conduct of the gentlemen who had presided over the proceedings.—Dr. Sleigh seconded the proposition, which was carried by acclamation, and the meeting separated at a quarter past nine.—(Abridged from a second edition of the Cambridge Independent Press.)

Speaking of the discussion, the Morning Advertiser says:—"Previous to its commencement, the great majority of the audience were in favour of the Corn Laws; but on a show of hands being taken at the close, 3 to 1 declared themselves in favour of Free Trade. So signal a triumph over the monopolists, and that, too, in one of their strongholds, needs no comment. The fact speaks for itself: it is pregnant with meaning, and is especially important when considered in its probable bearings on the forthcoming election."

ANTI-CORN-LAW LECTURES.—On Monday and Tuesday evenings, the 8th and 9th instant, Mr. Falvey delivered lectures against corn and other monopolies, and in favour of Free Trade, to attentive and respectable audiences, at the Temperance Hall, Ipswich. The lecture of Monday was of a more elementary character than that of Tuesday, but that portion of it which showed the value of machinery to extend trade, employ labour, and increase the comforts of man, excited the opposition of a stranger who gave his name Isaac Levy, and who attempted to engage in an argument. The adventurous knight, however, who had rushed into combat so unceremoniously, was soon unhorsed. On Tuesday evening, Mr. Falvey showed that although the farmers of the country were now loud in their outcries against the agitation going forward, yet they were, nevertheless, the parties who originated the movement, and even Free Trade itself had in 1817 been promulgated from the throne itself. Such being the case it was not altogether reasonable and consistent in them to return men to Parliament pledged to keep up monopoly both in corn and trade. After detailing all the evils falling on farmers, trade, manufacturers, and the nation generally, through the Corn Laws, he showed that a very different state of things would result from the adoption of Free-Trade principles—principles which, incontrovertible in their nature, must eventually prevail. At the close of the lecture, Mr. M'Pherson said, that though he was of course opposed to the continuance of Corn Laws, yet he disagreed with the lecturer if he contended that a remedy was to be found in a Parliament constituted as the present. The only remedy was universal suffrage. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") Mr. Falvey begged the speaker to understand, that if he supported the Corn Laws, he was ready to enter upon a discussion with respect to them, but on no other subject. The chairman (Rev. Mr. Middleditch) said, of course he should not allow the introduction of any subject apart from that of the evening. The meeting then separated, but not without much expression of dissatisfaction by the supporters of universal suffrage, that their champion was not allowed to state his views. Mr. Falvey's lectures were very effective efforts of reasoning, and the lecturer appeared fully acquainted with all the ramifications of his subject.—Suffolk Chronicle.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETING, PONTEFRAC.—On Thursday evening, April 11, Colonel Thompson, Mr. Charles Morton, and Mr. T. Plint, attended as a deputation from the League, to address the inhabitants of Pontefract on the Corn Laws and Free Trade. In consequence of the refusal of the use of the Town Hall by the Council, the meeting was held in the British School. Francis Barker, Esq., filled the chair, and after making a few pertinent observations as to the object of the meeting, was about to introduce Colonel Thompson, when a Mr. Harper, of Minskip, near Boroughbridge, rose and requested an answer from the deputation to a request which he had that afternoon forwarded to them, viz., that discussion should be allowed, as he was prepared to prove that protective laws were beneficial generally, and especially so to farmers and farm-labourers.—He was greeted with a storm of hisses, and with repeated inquiries from all parts of the meeting, "Who are you?" "Who sent for you?" "What are you?" The Chairman interfered to procure order, and announced to Mr. Harper that the deputation would speak first, and then, if the meeting thought proper, he (Mr. Harper) should speak. Col. Thompson then spoke, and with more than his usual point and effect, and was warmly applauded. He was followed by Mr. Morton in an effective speech, replete with "facts for farmers," showing the delusive character of the protection promised, but not secured, to farmers and farm-labourers, by the Corn Laws. Mr. Plint was then heard, and directed his attention principally to the examination of several little tracts, extensively circulated during the past week by the Pro-Corn-Law party, which he clearly proved to be distortions of facts, and utterly dishonest and fallacious. This exposure was received with evident approval by the meeting, and the conclusion of his speech was followed by several rounds of cheering, waving of hats, &c. Mr. Harper again attempted to address the meeting, but met with anything but a flattering reception: he was even menaced with rough treatment, and finally made his exit under the protection of Mr. Plint.

GATEHEAD FREE-TRADE SOCIETY.—The committee met at the Grey Horse Inn on Wednesday, at eight o'clock (Mr. John Fawcett in the chair). It was resolved:—1. That public meetings be discontinued during the summer months. 2. That the sense of the electors on the Corn Laws be taken, by obtaining their signatures to a requisition to the member for the borough, expressing a hope that he will be in his place to support Mr. Villiers's motion for an inquiry into the Corn Laws, with a view to their total and immediate repeal. It was observed that this was not intended to imply any doubt of Mr. Hunt's voting for the motion, the honourable member having declared his intention of so doing, but simply as a test of the feeling of the electors.—Gatehead Observer.

COUNTY MEETING.—Active preparations, we hear, are making for the intended county meeting at Jedburgh. We trust the resolutions to be brought before it will be framed so as to secure the hearty support of all who are for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. Let the voice of the people be once fairly taken. Let the thing be done decidedly and unequivocally, and there can be no dread of the result. Nine-tenths of our population are in favour of Free Trade.—Kelso Chronicle.

PROTECTION TO AGRICULTURE.—Within the last few weeks, a petition has been handed about for signatures in the neighbourhood of North Berley, praying that Parliament would continue the protection to agriculture. Two canvassers were employed for this purpose, who frequently met with persons who not only refused to sign the petition, but who gave very good reasons for their refusal. On entering one house where two or three persons were assembled, the canvassers urged them to sign the petition, but they refused, and began to argue the propriety of an immediate and total repeal of the Corn Laws, and one of them having a copy of the Leeds Mercury in his pocket, read different extracts from the letter to Lord Harewood. The result was that the canvassers became convinced that they were in the wrong, and one of them proposed to burn the petition instantly. This the other refused to do, but very few signatures to it were obtained in that neighbourhood.—Leeds Mercury.

LORD DUNCANNON AND FREE TRADE.—At the fourth anniversary of the Derby Liberal Operatives' Association, held at the Athenaeum Rooms in that town, on Tuesday, the 9th instant, Lord Duncannon, M.P., presided, and in proposing the toast of "Free Trade and no Monopoly," said:—"The toast which he had now to propose would find a ready response in the heart of every person present.—'Free Trade and no Monopoly.' (Prolonged cheering.) He was one of those whose subsistence depended on land (hear, hear); and if, therefore, Free Trade would be followed by ruin to the landowner, and the frightful consequences which had been predicted by its opponents, he would have to bear his share of the loss. (Hear, hear.) But he did not believe in anything so absurd. He believed that the agricultural and manufacturing interests were so interwoven with each other, that depression to the one would be followed by similar consequences to the other, and that those who called themselves the farmers' friends little consulted their own interest in neglecting the cause of manufactures; for if either interest was in danger from the depression of the other, he was quite sure it was on the side of the agricultural interest, which was more dependent upon the prosperity of our manufacturing population than the manufacturing interest was dependent upon the home consumption of the agricultural districts. (Hear, hear.) He congratulated them on the bright prospect before them. When they looked back upon the history of this struggle, and observed with what rapid strides the cause of Free Trade had progressed, and was now progressing, he was sure it required no extraordinary sagacity to foresee its final triumph. (Cheers.) They were undoubtedly indebted for this ripening of the question to the exertions of a body of men who, he would say, had done good service to the people of this country—he meant the Anti-Corn-Law League (loud cheers); who had gone about the country diffusing information, and rousing the people to their true interests—who had not confined themselves to any particular class or district, but had gone even into the lion's mouth, into those counties where the advocates and their principles had been unscrupulously assailed. (Cheers.) Hitherto the privileged class had enjoyed all the benefits of legislation, while the poorer classes, having no voice, had received no consideration in legislative enactments. (Cheers.) He was sure that such a system of legislation was rapidly coming to an end, and that the time was approaching when class interests would not be fostered to the injury of the community at large. (Cheers.) Our aristocracy must not be an aristocracy of rank and power merely. It must be an aristocracy of worth, setting a bright example in worth, in education, in all that should adorn a man. (Cheers.) Lord Duncannon, in subsequently returning thanks for his health, said he was a Free-Trader in the question of labour as well as of corn. (Cheers.) He did not believe that there was any disposition on the part of the manufacturers of this country to treat women and children with wanton cruelty, as had been alleged by some of Lord Ashley's supporters. (Hear, hear.) Nor did he feel that parents generally in the manufacturing districts were so utterly destitute of the best feelings of humanity—to say nothing of paternal solicitude—as, for the sake of a few pence, to turn their children into cripples. (Cheers.) He had opposed Lord Ashley's motion from a sincere conviction that, if carried into practice, injury instead of good would result from it, and because he considered that instead of interfering unnecessarily with the private arrangements between masters and men, they ought to legislate with a more enlarged philanthropy, and for more practical results, by giving free scope to commerce and to the industry of the people. (Loud cheers.)

THE BRISTOL ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETING.—The account of the Bristol meeting in our last was taken, not from the Bristol Mercury, but from the Bristol Gazette. The report we gave was necessarily an abridged one, and we think it right to mention that the report in the Gazette (forming a second edition) occupied nearly six columns of that paper, and was published by daybreak on Thursday morning, although the proceedings did not terminate till eleven o'clock on Wednesday night: this is highly creditable to the enterprising proprietors.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Letter from an English gentleman residing in the United States to a leading member of the League.

New York, February 28, 1844.

SIR,—The only apology I can offer for this letter, and for thus trespassing on your already over-occupied time, must be my zeal for the cause in which it is addressed to you. During the last two or three years, and more especially since the extraordinary success attendant upon your and your fellow-leaguers' arduous exertions for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and the general interests of mankind, I have been much, though quietly, engaged in inquiries and considerations as to the practicability of effecting something for the commonweal in this benighted land; and the conclusion to which I have been led is, that much, very much, may be done even here.

Of the people of the United States, if I may be allowed without irreverence to borrow the language of scripture, I would say, as indeed might have been said of the English two years ago, that "they are scattered abroad as sheep having no shepherd. The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few." To show the apathy, ignorance, and prejudice which at present exist on this subject, throughout the far greater portion of the union, it would be enough to say, that the only presidential candidate in favour of Free Trade (Mr. Calhoun) is compelled to withdraw from the contest for want of support; whilst Mr. Van Buren and General Cass, though repeatedly urged by the advocates of that policy to declare themselves, have held back and equivocated on the subject, thinking, no doubt, to play in America the same game which Sir Robert Peel has so frequently practised on the credulity of England.

The people of this country, as far as the question of Free Trade is concerned, may be said to stand thus:—

I. PRINCIPAL MERCHANTS—some for, and others against it; but few of them (except, perhaps, such of the New Englanders as are connected with Lowell) exhibiting anything like zeal on either side. The majority, however, I hope, incline towards us.

II. TRADESMEN AND SHOPKEEPERS—better than the greater merchants, but little disposed to any sacrifice or exertion. Free Trade, they most of them admit, would be a very good thing for America, if it could be obtained, and yet scarcely any of them will do anything to obtain it.

III. MANUFACTURERS—incorrigible protectionists, and, in feelings, principles, and argument, the very counterparts of our Knatchbulls and Buckinghamss.

IV. SUGAR-PLANTERS OF LOUISIANA—resembling, in most respects, our Goulburns, Gladstones, and other West Indian monopolists.

V. COTTON, RICE, AND TOBACCO GROWERS—zealous Free-Traders, and kindly disposed towards England, except when stirred up by anything which they choose to call "an unwarranted interference," on our part, in regard to slavery.

VI. FARMERS OR RAISERS OF CORN, CATTLE, &c.—who may be said to constitute more than three-fourths of the population, and to whom, therefore, I wish to call your attention.

It is on these men that the question of Free or no-Free Trade ultimately depends. Could they be once roused to a sense of their own just interests, the present tariff would be soon either greatly modified or totally repealed. But their present ignorance on the question is perfectly astounding; and, yet, how should it be otherwise? They can learn little or nothing from the newspapers circulating around them, the far greater portion of which, whether Loco-foco or Whig, are in the hands of illiterate printers or half-educated lawyers,—many of them paid tools of the great manufacturers, and all of them, more or less, the slaves of some petty prejudice, party mania,

* The manufacturers may be called the aristocracy of the United States, and are as zealous attackers in support of their order as any landed gentry of Great Britain in support of his. Their chief friends and advocates may be found amongst the Conservatives, one of whom, on being asked how a man of his name could uphold anything so manifestly absurd and unjust as the protective system, admitted his opponent to be right "in theory!" but added, by way of excuse, that his object in so doing was to raise up an aristocracy of some kind or other. "We cannot," he said, "have a landed aristocracy; and, unless we have a manufacturing one, we shall have none at all, but be reduced to one common mob level." The gentleman who uttered these words was a man of independent fortune, of some literary attainments, and a highly influential member of Congress. But you may think, perhaps, that the Loco-foco or Radical party, who are the sworn enemies of everything akin to aristocracy, are more liberal and enlightened on the subject; and so some few of them certainly are. Not, however, the majority, who are a set of factious brawlers, vainglorious dupes, paters of England, and bearing a much nearer resemblance to Mr. Feargus O'Connor and his Chartist followers than to any members of the Anti-Corn-Law League in England.

local job, or imaginary self-interest. Nor are their orators in any respects better; the chief object with these men being either to forge political capital, or to get into wages of eight dollars a day as members of Congress (a comfortable maintenance for most of them); they take care, however opposed to each other, to contradict as rarely as possible the prejudices of the electors. More flattery, or less truth, politically speaking, is not to be found in "the empire of the Czar" than in the republic of the United States! Scarcely a candidate but begins his harangues by telling the audience that they are "the most enlightened and independent people in the world," or (as one great man went so far as to say), "the only truly enlightened and independent people in the world!" and many members reserve their oldest and shabbiest clothes, in order not to appear too aristocratical when amongst their constituents.* From such instructors, what knowledge or good is to be gleaned by the people?

I need not trouble you with statistical details of American produce, of the number and quantities of cattle, wheat, Indian corn, &c. &c. which are now raised, or the infinitely greater numbers and quantities which might be raised here, could adequate markets be found for the disposal of them. There is no class of persons in the whole world more directly interested in low tariffs and free exchanges with the inhabitants of other countries than the farmers of this. They stand scarcely less in need of cheap clothing than we do of cheap corn. Indeed, with nothing have I been more struck amongst the people of the western states than the glaring contrast which exists between their food and their dress: the superfluity and excellence of the one, and the extreme coarseness and poverty of the other. During my excursions in the West, I have met with proprietors of lands in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, many of them possessing hundreds, and some even thousands, of acres of fine corn and pasture soil, and yet clad in garments which many of our common English labourers would be almost ashamed to wear.† Their prairies were covered with oxen, sheep, and swine; their barns overflowed with grain; but money was scarce, and they were interdicted by stupid laws from exchanging their superabundance for the superabundance of other lands. And yet these very persons seemed altogether ignorant of the great cause of their poverty and privations; insisted on the necessity of protecting home industry, of rendering themselves independent of foreign nations, and of establishing (as a certain cure for all evils) fresh manufactures on the banks of the Wabash and Ohio. I had the satisfaction, however, of convincing many of them of their errors, and of making them view the subject in a very different light from what they had been taught to do by their local newspaper editors and politicians.

Perhaps there are no people more eager after their own interests, or more likely (when once put into the right way) to pursue them with effect, than the farmers here, whether of native, English, or German birth. Could any one bring clearly before their view the impolicy of their present course, and the advantages which would result to them from an opposite one, the present tariff would not be permitted to continue for another twelvemonth. Nor is such illumination at all impracticable. It might be effected by any one doing here what has been practised so successfully by yourself and a few others in England—by letting the people hear or read (which they have rarely or ever had an opportunity of doing) the TRUTH! Could some such tracts as you have been, and are still, diffusing in England be circulated in sufficient numbers here, I cannot doubt the result. No people are more open to receive, none more sharp-sighted or quick to hear, when it can be shown that their own individual interests are at stake, than the Americans. There, too, I may add, let the good seed but once take root and sprout forth, and the work is done. Thousands will spring forward to foster and sustain its growth; nay, the very men, the demagogues, the "Stump-orators," who, for their own selfish purposes, are now vociferating against Free Trade, will then, and for the same reasons, be found amongst its supporters, and prove themselves, possibly, as active for good as they are now only puissant for evil!

What, therefore, might be done, were there funds (and very trifling ones would suffice) for the purpose, is to reprint some of your best papers, and perhaps to compose and print a few others (on the same model, but more immediately and personally applicable to the American farmer, and written in plain Cobbet-like language), and diffuse them, as widely as possible, through the corn and cattle-raising districts of the union. With the co-operation of certain excellent friends of mine here (well known for their consistent zeal and other virtues to several members of the League), I think that I could get immense numbers of them circulated through various parts of Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey, through all the great western, and two or three of the southern states—in some gratuitously, and in others at a very moderate cost. A newspaper might also be found, here and there, to contribute its aid. But I have been sadly drawing upon your time and patience in thus propounding to you a scheme, against the realization of which there are so many obvious difficulties in operation. Free Trade, however, like Freemasonry, has a secret spell for attracting its brothers towards each other (I am sure that I have experienced the fact in this country), and, right or wrong in my project, I must, therefore, be excused for unfolding it to one whom I look up to as the Grand Master of our order.

I have had much conversation lately with persons connected and well acquainted with the Brazils, and believe, from all I hear and see, that unless something be done, and done quickly, we shall be ousted from our market, or from a considerable portion of it, in that country. For some time past have the manufacturers and merchants of the United States been anticipating our loss of it, and

* This I know to be a frequent fact. One member, with whom Lord Ashburton has been long and intimately acquainted—I mean Mr. —, the high tariff man and Loco loco representative of —, always visits his constituents in patched shoes, and rusty coat and pantaloons.

† I know a family in Illinois who have nearly 3000 acres of good land, and yet are indifferently clad, half-worked to death, and, in everything, except as far as food is concerned, may be called poor people.

‡ You know the abundance of Indian corn grown in the United States. Were the British Corn Laws abolished, it might, I am sure, be imported into England at a price so low as to enable the farmer there to give it to his cattle, as is done here. Could the American farmers be shown that Free Trade was likely to open to them a market only for that one product, almost all of them would become Free Traders.

taking measures to supply our place, which, if we continue our West Indian planters in their sugar monopoly, I fear they will succeed in doing. Mr. Wise (a Virginian slaveowner, and a bitter enemy of England,) has just been appointed Minister to that country, where he will do all in his power to prevent or render nugatory any commercial treaty with Great Britain. He will be playing there the same part which General Cass has played in France, and as Mr. Cushing (who is a deeper fellow than either of them,) would have played in China, had he not been frustrated by the 8th article of Sir Henry Pottinger's Supplementary Treaty. After all, however, and whatever be the result of Mr. Wise's mission, I must confess that I have little hopes from commercial or reciprocity treaties. The only true policy of England is to abandon, with as little delay as necessary, all retaliatory, protective, or differential duties, and, regardless of hostile tariffs, to admit the products of Brazil, as well as of every other country, at the lowest possible rate of duty consistent with purposes of revenue. Our example would be sure, sooner or later, of being followed, and we owe it, in some degree, to the world as a reparation for the mischief of our Corn Laws, which have served as a pretext or precedent for three parts of the mislegislation on commercial subjects, which continues to oppress and dishonour the 19th century. I have scarcely ever heard an illiberal or absurd measure of the kind defended, either in continental Europe or America, where its advocates had not recourse for argument in support of their views to the English Corn Laws. I was particularly struck with this in a conversation which I had with Mr. Clay on the subject two years ago.

You will have heard of the loss we are about to sustain in regard to the Cuba and other foreign copper ores. In consequence of the high duties imposed upon them by the late tariff a large company has been formed, and means taken, for smelting them in America, and, I believe, also in Belgium, as I know that cargoes of ore have been shipped at Cuba for Antwerp.

I have only to add that, if you or any of your friends should stand in need of statistical returns, or other information of any kind which it is in my power to supply or procure for you, I shall have sincere pleasure in doing so, and thus contributing my poor mite to the great cause in which you have so nobly engaged.

With truest respect and best wishes, I remain, Sir, your faithful, humble servant,

P.S.—The Economist and LEAGUE have been read both with profit and pleasure by some of my friends here. Were a few of their best numbers occasionally sent to me I would get them distributed among the leading politicians of this city and Washington.

ADAM BROWN TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—I have received through you the letter of "An Essex Farmer," which my remarks on Essex farms and farming have drawn forth. I shall, as soon as possible, sit down and write replies to the several queries he puts to the advocates of Free Trade. I cannot do so this week in time for your current number, in consequence of other pressing employment. But I take this opportunity to say that, for myself, I am rejoiced to see a tenant-farmer come out with his pen in hand and freely invite us to a discussion on disputed topics. This is the course which should be taken by all who hold the opinions of "the Essex farmer," and which should be encouraged by all who are on our side. Let us enter upon a free, fair, friendly discussion, and the result must be a benefit to all concerned.

I invite the agricultural believers in the virtue of the Corn Laws to come forward and contend with us in the LEAGUE newspaper. I have your authority to say, that whatever they may write in shape of argument for the Corn Laws will be correctly printed, and fairly answered, to the best of our ability.

Erratum.—In the last number of the LEAGUE, in my letter in respect of the butcher's meat used in Brighton, the word hogs is by mistake printed stags.

AGRICULTURE.

THE CORN LAWS AND THE GAME LAWS.

From the numerous communications we receive, especially from the rural districts, upon the Game Laws, and the destruction of property, and the demoralization caused by game, we are often tempted to believe that some of our correspondents and their friends imagine that we are an Anti-Game-Law League. This is an error. Directly, we have nothing to do with the game. Individuals amongst us may have had opportunities of observing mischiefs arising out of those laws, and have denounced them accordingly; but in our public capacity we had originally no inclination to interfere with game preserves. As Free-Traders we care not whether the landowners prefer to stock their land with hares and pheasants, or with sheep and bullocks, provided always—and this proviso brings the game laws and game preserving within our cognizance—the keeping game does not interfere with the supply of the community's food.

In a natural state of things, the losses and annoyances caused by game would be matters to be settled between owners of land and their tenants, with which the public would have nothing to do. If farmers consented to pay rent and receive but scanty returns, to plough and sow that their landlords' game alone might reap, we should not interpose to ask protection for those who had so little sense as to be unwilling to protect themselves from such evils. But we are not in a natural state. We have a law made by our landlord legislators, which enacts that the British people shall be fed only by the grain which grows on British soil. Under that law, and in consequence of that law, we are occasionally, in years of average or deficient productiveness, compelled to endure famine prices before a supply of grain is admitted from abroad. Our landowners tell us, that it is not consistent with their scale of expenditure and style of living that we should have natural prices of grain in this country; that an artificial scarcity is required to keep up their rents, to keep down the interest upon their mortgages, to provide portions and settlements for their children and their wives; and that, therefore, the British landlord and grain-grower must be protected from competition by the landlords and grain-growers of the rest of the world. To the narrow area of these islands the vast and growing population of the United Kingdom is by law confined for its supply of food, and therefore it is that we, who expose the injustice of such law, claim a right to inquire how the owners of land manage their property. They say, "You shall buy corn from none but us; we, the landowners, have a right to a monopoly of the British market;" and through their own power as lawmakers their will has become law. But this law imposes on the public the necessity of requiring that all possible quantities of grain shall be raised. To destroy corn, or to prevent corn from being grown within these narrow seas—whether it be actively, by preserving game, or passively, by permitting rushes and stagnant water to keep possession of the soil—becomes a public crime, and renders the offenders amenable to public opinion. This is one reason why we denounce the Game Laws and the system of game preserving. The landlord oligarchy choose, for its own peculiar profit, to put the nation on short allowance of food; and the nation has a right to demand an account of every blade of corn which the creatures kept for landlord amusements prevent from coming to maturity. And the same reason applies to every act of ignorance, folly, or negligence, whereby the owners of land in this country retard or prevent the improvement of husbandry and the development of the powers of the soil.

Then the monopolist landlords tell us that the British farmer cannot compete with the foreigner; that with the skill, the capital, the implements, the well-bred stock of this kingdom at his command, the British husbandman is no match for the serfs of Poland and Russia in the production of grain. Farmers stand by and hear such degrading imputations in silence, or they bellow a seeming acquiescence in the foul libel. This gives the public—a public subjected to monopoly by the landlords' law—a right to ask, is this so, and if so, why? We therefore recur to our rural recollections; we go amongst our agricultural neighbours, we examine the condition of their farms, and the mode in which they conduct their business; and we find that amongst many other causes which prevent good farming—which make sixteen bushels of wheat an acre no uncommon crop, where the same land properly cultivated would produce forty—the fondness of landlords for game preserving stands out prominently. This again renders the system obnoxious to our censure. Having thus placed before our readers the ground, and the only ground, upon which we denounce game preserves and the Game Laws, we shall from time to time draw attention to the evils thence arising, without deeming it necessary on every occasion to go through the process of formally stating the strict connexion which exists between scarcity produced by the Corn Laws, and scarcity increased by the Game Laws.

Before closing this article we must notice an instance of the large amount of crime which these Game Laws produce amongst a rural population, debased and impoverished by the Corn Laws. In the "Return of Crime in the county of Wilts" (a county assumed by the Monopolists to be largely benefited by the Corn Laws), "for the quarter ending the 8th of April," we find that there were no less than eighty-seven persons imprisoned for "offences against the Game Laws." And an examination of the parts of the county in which those "offences" are most prevalent marks in strong relief how fearfully the evils of game preserves are attached to the rural districts. Thus, in the Bradford, Malmesbury, and Chippenham divisions, which are yet the seats of some considerable cloth manufactures, the number of Game-Law "offences" are respectively three, one, and five; while in the purely agricultural divisions of Hindon, Warminster, Salisbury, Devizes, and Marlborough, the number of offenders against the Game Laws varied from twelve to twenty. But the most remarkable illustration of the incidence of the evils of the Game Laws on the rural districts, is the fact that in the Marlborough division, the most thinly peopled and the worst cultivated of the whole county, the number of Game-Law-made criminals during the last quarter were TWENTY, being four more than the highest number in any other district!! Perhaps some readers may have observed, in travelling down the Bath road, that a few miles after passing Hungerford—which stands partly in Berkshire and partly in Wiltshire—the scene becomes that of a wild and woodland tract, and for several miles little is seen on either hand but stunted oaks, thorns, and beech-wood, covering land in a state of nature, and growing nothing but fern and scanty herbage. That is Savernake Forest, the property of the Marquis of Aylesbury, who, besides this forest of many thousand acres, which probably does not pay its expenses, owns nominally other lands adjoining, which produce a gross rental of £50,000 a year. We say the marquis owns this fine—or which, if cultivated, might be a fine—property nominally, because a few years ago it was, and we believe still is, in the hands of his creditors, who allowed him a comparatively small income of £9000 a year for his subsistence. Throughout this estate the game is rigidly preserved, so much so that we know many fields on which the tenants can never obtain a crop of grain, tares, or roots, everything green being devoured by the game as soon as it appears above the ground; the tenants all hold by yearly tenures only, and are subjected to the most degrading system of dependence and servility; and as necessary consequences the standard of cultivation and the rate of wages are lamentably low. If this estate, which may perhaps be roughly stated at about ten miles in length by eight in breadth, were really and completely cultivated; if the waste lands of Savernake Forest were brought into tillage, and all of it is what farmers would call "useful land," we do not hesitate to say that at least treble the quantities of grain and meat now produced there might be raised, with profit to the cultivator, advantage to the half-employed peasantry, and an improved rental to the landlord. But then to effect such a change men of capital and skill must be attracted as tenants, which implies the abandonment by the landlord of semi-feudal privileges and political domination; and we verily believe that the miserable monopolist who nominally owns the estate would rather endure his present condition—really nothing but splendid poverty—than render his property useful to himself and the community by rational and judicious improvement.

THE GRAZIER'S COMPLAINT.

A correspondent in the last number of the Mark-lane Express, who signs himself "A Leicestershire Grazier," quotes the following paragraph from the previous number of the same journal:—

"Wellington fair was exceedingly dull. The graziers do not come into the market with the spirit they used to do. Last year many of the Somersetshire men (the Marsh country graziers) sold their fat beasts at not more than 30s. each over what they cost as poor stock; there is not now above 40s. difference between a poor bullock and a fat one. This, with rents of four or five pounds an acre, which many of them have to pay, will tell tales at the year's end, and account for their want of speculation. Fat beef fetched 8s. to 8s. 6d. per score, the latter a top price, except for an extraordinary choice article, which might fetch 9s."

He then goes on to comment upon the condition of the grazing business in a way not a little instructive to those who suppose farmers have been benefited by restricted trade. He says that not only is the accuracy of the Somersetshire report confirmed by his experience in Leicestershire, but "that some of his late bought-in beasts did not make more than they cost when poor, and many did not leave above 10s. per head more than they cost when the Smithfield expenses are deducted;" and he adds:—

"How long is this delusion to last? When the grazier is paying three-fourths of his rent out of his capital, what protection has the grazier for his capital? And what has the tariff done for him? Instead, as promised him, of buying his lean foreign cattle in at a low rate, to leave him a remunerating sum to pay for his war-rented farm—instead of which there are no cheap foreign cattle for him to purchase; so that the deluded grazier is left like the fable of the goat in the well by the fox. Our graziers may well, one and all, say, What has our great cry and little wool Parliament done for us?"

Yet, probably, untaught by his former experience of political landlords, this grazier has been shouting with the loudest at protection meetings; and perhaps he has already begun to ask, "What has our 'great cry and little wool' agricultural protection society done for us?" Hitherto that mountain in labour has brought forth nothing but the tiny pamphlet of that small man Mr. Cayley, at which the genuine monopolists and their organ the Morning Post sneer, and the Free Traders laugh. But he, the grazier, again says:—

"We have been paying the same rents, tithes, and more taxes. How long will our property last, upon this two-faced rotten and ruinous system? For the men we deputed to get our grievances redressed, became, forthwith, our greatest grievance."

This is but a foretaste of the indignation which the deluded farmers will pour forth upon the heads of the monopolist landlords as soon as the delusions these high-rent gentry have put upon them shall be completely exposed. That the farmers are beginning to look upon the League as their best friend may be illustrated by the following observation of a farmer, who, up to a very recent period, never entertained a doubt of the utility of "protection," but who has recently begun to think and to doubt. He said to a member of the League, "You won't get the Corn Laws repealed just yet, but you are doing a world of good by bringing the landlords to their senses, and inducing them to grant more favourable terms to good tenants." Again, the grazier, like a man of sense, says, let us have a settlement of this vexed question, remarking:—

"What with the Anti-Corn-Law League and our landlords, the farmers and graziers are placed between two fires; whilst the two parties are wrangling about which is right and which is wrong, nineteen farmers and graziers out of twenty will be ruined; and then our landlords will say, 'Who could have thought it?' Instead of saying, 'Who could expect anything else?' The long and short of it is, are we to have a free trade for corn, and a less rental, or are we to have war-rents, with ruinous prices for bread and meat? Nothing can make the condition of the grazier worse than the present system."

Let such a feeling as is here expressed become general amongst farmers, and we know it is rapidly increasing, and the political landlords will find their monopoly slip from their grasp. Then he says:—

"The home consumption for our meat has decreased for want of means. The only thing we can sell fair is our wool. Where is that consumed? It is plain that it is of no use our feeding great quantities of cattle unless you can find consumers when they are fed. The grazier's profit depends upon his rental and the price of lean cattle, which entirely rests upon the quantity that comes to market, which is short, whilst our fat markets are glutted for want of more consumption."

Here he goes plump into the bull's-eye.

When will the landowners understand that they really had better be honest even for their own immediate profit? But they must first shake themselves free from the leadership of such poor-rich men as the Dukes of Buckingham and Richmond. Yet, though such is said to be the state of the grazing trade, the following account of a sale of grazing land shows that, though all know that the days of monopoly are numbered, the value of such land is not impaired:—

"Messrs. Harvey and George sold three hundred acres of valuable marsh land, at the Auction Mart, London, on Thursday last, April 11th, at the following high prices:—

| | |
| Lot 1. 132 acres, sold to Mr. Rowland, of Aylesbury..... | £29000 |

The above property was principally sold to purchasers for occupation; and, from the high prices realised, we may fairly judge that graziers generally are regaining confidence, and that the ensuing season will prove better than any we have experienced during the last four or five years.—Essex Mercury. And if graziers are regaining confidence, is it not because there seems a hope that trade will revive? Is it not the prospect of "more consumption?"

MONOPOLIST READINGS OF HISTORY.

In Mr. Cayley's Pro-Corn-Law pamphlet—the firstborn of the "Central Protection Society"—we find the following instance of landlord "generosity" towards the manufacturing interests:—

"It was to establish manufactures in this country, and to secure to manufacturers a fair return for their industry, that protection, as a system, first began in the reign of Edward III., five hundred years ago. The coarser woollen manufacture was then protected from Flemish competition. In the reign of Elizabeth the finer manufacture of wool was still more protected; and, as one means of effecting this protection, the British farmer, from that period to 1825, was prohibited, by penalties, from exporting his wool to foreign countries, and for a long time was subjected to capital punishment if he exported it. By similar means, and at various times, were the other manufactures of this country fostered and matured; and as, in the legislature of those times, the influence of the owners of land for the most part predominated, these laws to protect our rising manufactures certainly betray no ungenerous desire on their part to discourage the growth of trade."

It is not inconsistent in the advocates of monopoly to draw their instances of the benefits of restricted commerce from rude ages and periods of imperfect civilization; but passing that, the "generosity" of the landlords of the reigns of Edward and Elizabeth was, in truth, no generosity at all. Then the owners of land, whose "influence predominated" no less than now, were growers of wool, as at this day they are growers of wheat; Flanders was the great outlet for their commodity, and it was after cloth manufactures had been established for some time in this country, and the landowners began to imagine they could secure a better price for their wool by "protecting" the clothiers, that the landed legislators became solicitous to favour trade. Let our readers follow Mr. Cayley's lead, and trace the history of manufactures from the time of Edward III. to 1825, and they will find that it is simply one continual struggle on the part of the landed oligarchy of this country to convert to its own use, through the engine of legislation, the industry of other people. Do the dukes, earls, lords, and squires of the "Central Protection Society" really believe that such twaddle will have any influence on the great economical questions of the day? Silly as their speeches would make them seem, they know better; but while really depending upon their hold over the Government for the maintenance of their monopoly, they think it necessary to publish something. Hence Mr. Cayley's inanity.

MONOPOLIST BUGBEARS.

About the most ready way of dissipating all the imaginary evils which lords and squires pretend at monopolist meetings will come upon the agricultural body from a repeal of the Corn Laws, is to take a quiet common-sense view of any of the details of farming. Thus we find Mr. Hillyard, of Northamptonshire, who at the "protection" meeting of that county, was very loud in his Anti-League assertions, in the last number of the Mark-lane Express, gives the following as his last year's feeding account, which is not so very discouraging:—

"By buying in lean store steers in Oct., to be kept all winter on straw, giving them as many turnips as can be spared—by purchasing half or three parts fat steers—by putting these into the stalls, and those beasts which did not get fat enough at grass for market—by these means all the dung used on my farm is made. My stall-feeding account, from Michaelmas, 1842, to May, 1843, like preceding accounts, did not turn out a source of profit. Between sixty and seventy beasts went into the stalls, some for a longer time than others. They sold out for £300 more than they cost, or were valued at, when put into the stalls; but they consumed food to the value of £302, charging the mangel at £6 and the swedes at £3 an acre, hay at £3 a ton, the barley at its value, and the amount paid for linseed and cake; so that the actual cost of the manure was the extra expense of labour in the attendance on the beasts."

Thus, in a season remarkable for the low price of fat cattle, from deficient consumption, Mr. Hillyard got all his manure, which ensures him ample grain crops, for the mere cost of attending on the cattle. Our readers will perhaps remember that in Lord Worsley's account he set the value of an acre of roots at £2 10s. per acre only, whereas in the present case they are admitted to be worth £5 and £6 an acre; and we know that even is too low. But at that price, at least, the farmer gets paid for his root crop through feeding stock, while in the more inferior system of hysbandry he will incur nearly as much expense per acre in a year's naked fallow as in growing an acre of roots.

SYMPTOMS OF PROGRESS.

Amongst the evidences which daily crowd upon us of the progress of Free-Trade opinions are the many ingenious devices by which monopolists strive to delay what they see to be inevitable. Thus in a monopolist journal we find a long proposal for the gradual introduction of Free Trade, in which is the following passage:—

"The plan upon which I think a free trade of reciprocity may be safely, conveniently, and advantageously opened, is as follows:—In every case of exportation of British produce or manufactures the party exporting should be at liberty to import or clear out of bond free of duty (at least free of all duty, excepting, perhaps, a moderate ad valorem duty for revenue only) an equivalent amount of foreign merchandise of any description, the existing duties being still chargeable in all other cases."

Now, what is this but Free Trade attempted to be confined to direct exchanges, and fettered by regulations impossible to be carried into practice? But when the advocates of "Protection to British Industry" have got so far on the road towards the only real protection—protection from restraint—as such a proposition as that we have quoted implies, there is little danger in predicting they must soon come the whole length of Free Trade.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order, to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadaby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

THE WEEKLY MEETING OF THE LEAGUE will be held in the THEATRE-ROYAL, COVENT-GARDEN, on WEDNESDAY EVENING NEXT, the 24th inst. GEORGE WILSON, Esq., will take the Chair at HALF-PAST SEVEN O'CLOCK.

The meeting will be addressed by W. Ewart, Esq., M.P., J. L. Ricardo, Esq., M.P., and R. R. Moore, Esq.

Cards of admission may be had on application at the Office of the League, on Monday and Tuesday, between the hours of eleven and four o'clock.

Applications for Private Boxes to be made personally or by letter on Monday.

The cards of registered Members will admit, as heretofore, to Pit and Galleries.—DOORS TO BE OPENED AT SEVEN O'CLOCK.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, April 20, 1844.

Our readers will see, by the report of Mr. Cobden's speech on Wednesday evening, that the Council of the League has determined on holding a bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre. If the spirit with which the scheme of a Free-Trade bazaar was entered into at Manchester, and the success with which it was attended, may be taken as a criterion, we may predict a large augmentation of the League funds from this source. But a further and more important purpose was intimated by Mr. Cobden, on which we are desirous of fixing the attention of the different classes of manufacturers throughout the kingdom. Let the exhibition of articles for sale be a display of the extent, the variety, the delicacy and grace, the skill and power, or, in one word, of the genius of British manufacturing industry. Let the workers in the finer textures unfurl their colours, and those in stouter substances be put upon their mettle. Show what the people are, and what they can produce, whom a mistaken and mischievous legislation cripples by its interference and impoverishes by its restriction. It is desirable that, in this bazaar, Industry and Invention should throw down the gauntlet to Idleness, and demand what artificial prices, by act of Parliament, can put in competition. According to Mr. Carlyle's "Philosophy of History," it is by their works that our Saxon race most truly and strongly speaks. They are what we have to show in justification of our existence. In the ample collection, the formation of which will, we trust, be forthwith commenced, literature and the finer arts will doubtless have their honourable share; but work will be the characteristic of the collection, so that we may point to it and say, "England, her mark."

We have known instances in which English visitants to Paris, &c., have been struck with the classical beauty of patterns, or with the ingenious and graceful construction of ornamental articles, and have purchased and brought them home as specimens of a taste yet to be desiderated in the useful but homely products of our countrymen; and it has been afterwards ascertained that these identical articles had been manufactured at Birmingham, Sheffield, or Manchester. The blunder is not beyond the reach even of many who make, or propound, laws for the regulation of processes with which they are profoundly unacquainted. The forthcoming exhibition should leave it without excuse, in any department whatever, of British manufacturing industry. From the needle to the sledgehammer, from the factory to the foundry, let every implement be made to do its best, with all the guidance of hand, and eye, and intelligence. Our bazaar must not be a trap for idle curiosity, a meaningless display, a miscellaneous catch-as-catch-can device, resting on "illustrious patronage" for its extraneous attractiveness. It should be the unquestionable qualification, which industry produces, for fair play and freedom. The spirit of Manufacture should be able to point to it and say, "There, I can do that; thus can I earn bread and wealth; how long is law to interpose and bar me from the world's market for the supposed benefit of the landlord class?"

Of every class of producers throughout the kingdom, we seek co-operation for this noble purpose. With them rests the fact of its realization. We ask them to contribute the choicest specimens of their skill and power to the common stock of their class's reputation. The moral effect of such a display will help on the cause of Free Trade far more than the pecuniary result. An impression will be produced never to be obliterated. Intelligent foreigners who now, as a matter of course, present themselves at Covent-garden Theatre to hear the speeches delivered there, and who on returning describe in glowing terms the popularity of our cause and the enthusiasm of assembled multitudes, will eagerly resort to this different and more novel scene, and tell of it admiringly in other lands. It will speak to the eye, unobstructed by difference of language, and stamp the character of our nation in the estimate of many nations. Is not the object one which it is worth while to accomplish? Is there not a glory and a good to be shared, such as was never won on battle-field? In this mode let us pursue our agitation against Monopoly. Our multifarious appeal has been made to mind, by reiterated arguments; to the heart, by the distress of multitudes; and we will appeal to the sight of all who have eyes to see, by one grand scene of the products of skill, taste, ingenuity, and enterprise. Covent-garden Theatre shall justify the change of a word in the proud epitaph by which St. Paul's Cathedral becomes the tomb of its architect; and to the sceptics of Free Trade we will say, "Si argumentum queris, circumspice!"

So appropriate an occasion has never before happened for bringing the infinitely varied products of all classes of our manufacturing and artisan population into one magnificent coup d'œil. It is due to them, and would be most honourable to them, apart from the circumstances by which it is called for. And they will create it, not for spontaneous display or in solicitation, but in the exercise of their liberality towards the League, and in the assertion of those commercial rights which the League is instituted to obtain. The untrammelled mind of our country long ago asserted its supremacy. The pinnacle of military glory has been gained repeatedly. The task now devolves on the manufacturers to show that she is foremost in the arts of peace as in the achievements of war or the splendours of genius. Such, at least, is the view which commends itself to our minds; and which we respectfully suggest to those by whom alone it can be realized. If it find in their eyes the favour which we think it deserves, they will make this exhibition worthy of themselves, of our country, and of the cause.

THE PROPOSED BAZAAR.

London, 18, 4th month, 1844.

ESTEEMED FRIEND, Being in town with one of my sons on business, we procured two tickets for the meeting last night; and I must say that I was truly delighted to see such an audience and such enthusiasm. R. Cobden gave out that it was intended soon to have a bazaar, consisting of part of all the manufactures of the country. Allow me to say that I will be most happy to contribute a handsome table-cloth. I should be most happy to learn the time when it will be received.

John Bright, Esq., M.P. R. MERCER, of Dunfermline.

70, Strand, April 18, 1844.

SIR,—I was glad to hear you say what you did respecting British manufactures. I shall be glad to exhibit my ram for raising water, and pumps. Let me know, that I may prepare.—Your obedient servant,

To R. Cobden, Esq., M.P.

FREEMAN ROSE.

A PRAYER FOR LANDLORDS. The following beautiful prayer, applicable to all times, but to none more than the present, was one of the early productions of the Reformation, and continued in use till the accession of Mary:—"The earth is Thine, O Lord, and all that is contained therein, notwithstanding Thou hast given the possession thereof to the children of men, to pass over the time of their short pilgrimage in this vale of tears. We heartily pray Thee to send thy Holy Spirit into the hearts of them that possess the grounds, pastures, and dwelling-places of this earth; that they, remembering themselves to be thy tenants, may not rack and stretch out the rents of their houses and lands, nor yet take unreasonable fines and incomes, after the manner of covetous worldlings; but so to let them out to others, that the inhabitants thereof may be able both to pay the rents, and also honestly live to nourish their families, and to relieve the poor. Give them grace also to consider that they are but strangers and pilgrims in this world, have here no dwelling-place, but seeking one to come; that they, remembering the short continuance of their life, may be content with what is sufficient, and not join house to house, nor couple land to land, to the impoverishment of others; but so behave themselves in letting out their tenements, lands, and pastures, that after this life they may be received into everlasting dwelling-places, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."—Manchester Times.

REVIEW.

The Perils of the Nation: an Appeal to the Legislature, the Clergy, and the Higher and Middle Classes. Second Edition. Seeley, Burnside, and Seeley. London. 1843.

In a work with this title we would expect to find three things:—1st. Our dangers; 2nd. Their causes; 3rd. Their remedies; and any defeat in either of these three departments would diminish the practical value of the work. A knowledge of the existence and extent of our danger is necessary, in order to arouse our attention to the subject; and the causes of that danger must be pointed out before we are able to form a judgment on the efficacy of the proposed remedy.

The first of these is easy of execution. There always has been, and always will be, so much of evil intermixed with the constitution of every society that can be framed, inseparable as evil is from our condition here, that it is easy for any man of observation, taking his pen in hand, to delineate "the perils of a nation," to draw a picture far surpassing in gloom any which he conceived before he commenced the task. We confess, however, that we have no objection to seeing such pictures frequently presented to our view. We are naturally indifferent enough to the misery which a little observation would show us existed at our very door; and therefore, even when the picture is overdrawn, it is well for us to look at it, in order to stimulate our benevolence into active and immediate exertion. The only danger is, lest the evils may be represented to be so great as to make us inactive through the despair of being able to relieve them, or to lead us to be disgusted and discontented with a constitution of society which permits their existence. Such feelings may be silenced by a little calm reflection. We must not condemn a nation because pauperism is found within its borders, for we know from Scripture, that "the poor we shall always have with us;" and we can discern much of wisdom in the provision, affording, as it does, scope for the exercise of those feelings of love and sympathy, which it was designed we should exercise here, preparatory to their full development in another and better sphere of existence. We should also remember, that experience teaches us that there is no such wide difference between the degrees of happiness allotted to the various stations of life as at first sight we are apt to suppose. Let but a picture of the poor man's life be presented to the rich, and he will consider it to be a series of the greatest privations and the most bitter cares, because he sees an absence of all those things which habit has rendered necessary to his comfort. It is not, however, really so. The absence of what we never enjoyed rarely makes us miserable; and as to the positive ills, habit has exercised its influence there too, in rendering the man indifferent to their presence. Every schoolboy knows Pope's lines,

"Order is Heaven's first law, and this confest,
Some are, and must be, greater than the rest,
Some richer, wiser; who infers from thence
That such are happier, shocks all common sense."

There are few occupations pursued by the poorer classes which may not, without any departure from the truth, be made to appear in our eyes fraught with misery—some toilsome, some degrading, some disgusting, some unremunerating, some compounded of all these; and yet we will find that as much real happiness may be, and often is, enjoyed by those employed in them as falls to our own higher lot. Without, therefore, at all denying the truthfulness of the picture submitted to us in this work, we think it right to remind our readers of the large deduction that we must make on this score before we can form a true estimate of what the condition of the poor as experienced by themselves, not as imagined by us, is. To have no bed to lie on—nothing but the hard floor—is a miserable thing, and is brought before us as such in this very book; yet habit renders us indifferent to this. It is stated by the German tailor, in his travels, that he was quite unable to sleep in a bed because he had been so long unaccustomed to anything but the floor; the same may be said of other privations; but, in putting them in this light, we are far from saying that it is not our duty to endeavour to remove these evils, which are accidental only, and under our control, and to elevate the working classes to the enjoyment of as much comfort as it is in our power to bestow, or in theirs to possess.

Let us see, then, how the work under our notice deals with these three departments. With regard to the first, it certainly presents a very striking picture of the evils that attend the condition of the labouring classes; and, although we think that it is in some respects overdrawn,—that for some parts of the statement no authorities are quoted, and for others questionable ones, while the brighter side is not at all presented to our view,—yet, as it may with truth be said that it was not the author's object to point to more than the evils, and as there is no unfair design, for the dark colouring is made to spread equally over all the conditions of the labouring life which the author touches upon, we are satisfied, for the purposes of this notice, to take his statements to be substantially true, and to admit, as we have already done, that, if there be any exaggeration, it may serve the useful object of arousing individual sympathy to afford its timely aid.

When we read the catalogue of evils, we were anxious to see what causes would be assigned for them,—causes, did we say, nay, but what cause,—evils so pervading, so universal, common alike to "the manufacturing poor, the mining poor, the workshop labourers, the commercial poor, and the agricultural poor;"—evils, in whatever condition of life exhibited, yet so closely resembling each other as infallibly to indicate a common parentage, must not such be capable of being traced to one great origin? To the niggardliness of Nature they cannot be ascribed; she has lavished all her choicest treasures around us with a liberal hand. To the natural slowness of our people to perceive and avail themselves of these advantages they cannot be ascribed; for never was there a people more quick of apprehension, more ready of invention, or more prompt in execution. To our idleness? No; the very work before us complains that we are too hardworking. To our want of benevolence and common humanity? Is there a country in the world where national and individual kindness and love are so fully developed and in such ceaseless, unremitting operation? Whence, then, is the deadly blight which crushes the tree even when it is white with blossoms, and mars our hopes of abundant fruit? The answer rises to our lips: our readers have anticipated it. We are not silly enough to suppose, or to ask our readers to believe, that the abolition of restrictions on industry would annihilate these evils, and that none would remain to call for private and individual assistance and support; but what we do firmly believe, and what this book has confirmed us in the belief of, is, that if industry were allowed to take its natural course, the condition of every nation would be proportionate to; and would correspond with, the natural advantages possessed by its inhabitants; that the condition of a people living under laws which made life and property secure, possessing a fertile soil, themselves naturally industrious and able to produce much by their labour, would be prosperous, and that they would possess an ample supply of the necessities and comforts of life; while, on the contrary, the condition of a people deprived of these advantages would be proportionably less prosperous; whereas we see, under the present system, that the very reverse is the case—a country possessing advantages such as none other ever possessed, is shown by this work to be in the ratio of its favourable circumstances the abode of poverty rather than of wealth; while countries possessing none of these advantages exhibit amongst their humbler classes comfort and abundance.

We complain, then, that in this work no sufficient cause is assigned for the existence of this pervading distress; and those which are suggested are so erroneous, that it was in consequence of our wish to point them out and refute them that we have brought this book under the notice of our readers.

The author appears to ascribe much of the evils of the labouring classes to "the increase of capital." Thus:—

"The false notion of the necessity of protecting capital and of favouring its accumulation must be abandoned, and we must learn that it is industry, not wealth, that needs protection; and that capital requires rather to be restrained from tyrannizing over industry, than encouraged in its arbitrary course. The whole course of modern science tends to make this restraint more and more needful. The vast and almost boundless improvements in machinery all give power to the capitalist, and render the workmen more and more helpless and dependent."—Introduction, pp. 29, 30.)

In this and many other passages the author puts forward the doctrine that the increase of capital, which he complains has been hitherto falsely represented as an advantage to the labourers (see Introd. p. 11), is in truth the cause of their misfortunes; that capital should not receive encouragement, on the contrary, that "it requires restraint" (p. 33, Introd.); that "it requires to be followed, watched, and threatened with penal consequences"!! (Ibid.) We would have thought that we perhaps misunderstood the import of some of these passages in the introduction, or that the author had not in the work itself insisted on a theory so absurd, did we not find the same idea repeated throughout, as when he speaks of the propriety of employing "means to check the aggressive progress of overbearing capital" (p. 250); and again, "Machinery, multiplying and improving on every side, daily encroaches further on human industry; and with this exasperating spectacle before his eyes, the poor man knows that his demand is less likely to be listened to as the proprietor becomes more independent of his services through the active operation of wheels and pulleys."—p. 381

Until we read these passages, we did not think that, at the present day, we would ever be called upon to fight over again the battle of machinery, we might say of civilization, which has been so often won.—What is capital? This author considers it as synonymous with wealth (Introd., p. 33); we will take it so; and then the proposition contended for is, that to increase the supply of wealth is an evil to those who want some of that wealth. Strange, if this be so. The food, the clothing, which the labourer purchases, the dwelling he rents, all these are capital, and yet those who endeavour to increase the supply of them, and so cheapen them, are injuring the consumers of them! Our author will hardly maintain this, and he may say, that his theory applies only to fixed capital, or to that portion of our circulating capital which is not consumed by the labourer. With regard to the latter, we are unable to see how an increased facility of producing looking-glasses, papier-maché articles, and other luxuries, which are only used by the rich, can be anything else but a matter of indifference to the labourer, who does not use them: it will cause a change in the kind of luxuries that the rich will indulge in, but to the poor it is immaterial. But the former, "the increase of fixed capital," is the more important one to attend to, and was probably uppermost in the author's mind. Now, an increase of fixed capital, instead of being injurious to the labourer, is his very best security against any attempts to depress his wages. Fixed capital, or machinery, is used to assist the labourer, to render his labour more productive. Now, the maximum reward which the proprietor of fixed capital could exact from the labourer for its use, is the difference between the quantity he could produce by its aid and the quantity he could produce without it. Take the simplest machine, a spade. If a labourer, by his hands, without a spade, could, by tilling the ground, produce one quarter of wheat per acre in the year, and with the spade six quarters, the maximum reward for the use of the spade that under any circumstances would be paid, is five quarters; and that would not be paid unless there were a monopoly of spades, unless only a few individuals possessed them and entered into a combination to insist on this price for their use. Increase the number of spades and you break up the monopoly, for there now commences a competition among the spade manufacturers, and so the price is reduced, as we see it now, to the mere act of making the spade.

The same illustration applies to all machines, and the conclusion is inevitable that the more fixed capital increases, the greater is the competition amongst its proprietors and the lower do their profits become; and there is, therefore, no pretence for saying that the increase of capital arms it with the power of tyrannizing over industry. So obvious was this, that Dr. Chalmers (in the author's censure of whom along with the whole school of Malthus, we heartily concur) makes the absurd proposal to capitalists, to seek to raise their profits by turning their capital into revenue. The great mischief of all such statements is, that they represent the capitalist and the labourer in the attitude of enemies to each other, whose gain can only be secured by the other's loss. This opinion is, perhaps, mainly to be traced to Ricardo's doctrine of profits and wages, which we cannot now pause to refute; but how far from the truth it is to say, that the gain of the capitalist is the loss of the labourer, or vice versa, every practical man will at once tell you, for it is notorious that both prosper or sink together. The rate of profit is declining every day, and will continue to do so as long as our commercial restrictions are in existence; so that now an utter annihilation of all profit, and the addition of its amount to the wages of labour, while it would check all production, yet even as long as it lasted would make little difference to the labourer. Suppose the rate of profit in manufacturing employments to be now 8 per cent., this is so small a part of the cost of production, that the reduction of it to 4 per cent., and the increase of wages by that amount, would not confer one hundredth part of the benefit upon the labourer that the abolition of one commercial restriction would. How absurd, too, is it to speak of "machinery encroaching on human industry," and of "the proprietor becoming independent of the labourer through the operation of wheels and pulleys." The theory of machinery is, that it supersedes human labour; the result in practice has been, to call one hundred times more labour into action than was employed before its introduction into any department of industry; and the operation of wheels and pulleys is to render the capitalist more dependent upon the labourers, without the aid of a vast number of whom these wheels and pulleys cannot do the work; and if they are idle he is sustaining the loss of the profits upon a vast sum of money sunk for ever in the shape of fixed capital; whereas, if the use of fixed capital were limited, his wealth would exist in a shape in which he could easily render it available for other purposes, if he were deprived of the service of his labourers.

We would have much more to say upon the many subjects suggested by this book did space permit us, especially on the condition of the agricultural population, in many of the remarks on which we concur. We can now only say in conclusion, that, as pointing out the vastness of the field in which individual benevolence may work for the amelioration of men, this book is truly valuable.

Regard for the memory of Adam Smith compels us to hint to the author, that when he joins in censuring that great man for writing "on the wealth of nations, when their happiness would have been the wiser and more Christian topic of investigation" (Introduction, p. 14), the same argument would warrant an injunction to restrain men from studying medicine because theology is a wiser and more Christian topic of investigation, and from writing even on the temporal happiness of men at all, because their spiritual happiness is a more important topic of investigation.

Five Lectures on Political Economy, delivered before the University of Dublin. By James Anthony Lawson, LL.B. London, Parker; Dublin, Milliken.

We had prepared for this number continuations of our articles on the "History of Holland" and the "History of Ireland," but have set both aside to make room for a notice of the very important work before us, which, taken as a whole, is one of the most valuable additions that has been made to economic science in the present century. The Professorship of Political Economy in the University of Dublin was founded by the present Archbishop of Dublin, and endowed by his liberality. It has been held successively by Messrs. Longfield, Butt, and Lawson, each of whom has enlarged the limits of the science, and dissevered the discussion of its principles from the perturbing influences of party politics. It is to be regretted that the principles of political economy are too often mixed up with questions to which their relation is merely accidental; Professor Lawson justly observes:—

"As a friend of the sciences, I could wish that political economists had never lost sight of the distinction between their province and that of the politician; in that case, instead of being found ranged on different sides of contending factions, they would be in the situation of neutrals, to whom, as the proper tribunal, reference would be made to decide upon those questions which came within their province, and who, themselves taking no part in the combat, would be able to supply such weapons to the combatants as would generally be decisive of the issue; but so far is this from being the case, that we now see a battle waged about the very principles of political economy, which ought to be expressly admitted and recognised by all parties."

We shall not this week enter into any commentary on the principles enunciated by Professor Lawson, and the admirable reasoning by which they are supported; we shall best do justice to our own feelings, and best cater for the gratification of our readers, by extracting a few of those striking passages in which Mr. Lawson has either placed great truths in a new light, or exposed some of the most inveterate fallacies which still pass current with the prejudiced and the ignorant. The claims of political economy to be regarded as a science are thus ably stated:—

"There is no essential difference between the natural sciences, and a science like political economy; both are alike based upon the belief, that similar antecedents will produce similar consequents, whether that belief is to be attributed to some instinctive principle, or whether it be the result of our reason and experience. What then causes the great apparent difference that is said to exist between them? It is not that the uniformity of sequence is more doubtful in one than in the other, as I have shown; but it is, that the antecedents, or causes (to call them by the ordinary name), are more numerous, more complex, and more varying in this, than in most of the natural sciences; therefore, new circumstances are more likely to steal into the combination of causes, escaping our observation, and leading to a different result, without giving us the means of explaining how that difference arose. If any circumstance be introduced which impedes the operation of the natural laws of the universe, and leads to a result different from that hitherto experienced, it is for the most part in our power to detect the presence of that circumstance, and thus give a satisfactory explanation why the result was different. For instance, if gunpowder does not explode, the presence of damp, or the want of the due preparation of ingredients in manufacturing it, will be readily detected; but in subjects so complicated as those which political economy has to deal with, where the causes in operation are so numerous, so varied in time and place, and so remote from what is tangible and material, it is obvious that circumstances may be omitted, or new ones introduced, which may elude the most vigilant observation. Thus the causes vary, but the connexion between cause and effect is as certain and constant in the one as in the other."

The absurd cry of "dependence on foreigners" is met by the following line of philosophic argument, in which a depth of Christian feeling mingles with the logical acuteness, and furnishes food for reflection, at the same time that it enforces conviction:—

"It has been satisfactorily proved by Archbishop Whately, in his Fifth Lecture on 'Political Economy,' and more fully by the author* of the 'Natural History of Society,' who has developed this important truth, and supported it by a vast variety of proofs, that the savage state, which has been called the natural state of man, is a state most un-natural to him, for such a condition gives no room for the development of his higher faculties and instincts, affording full scope for those only which he has in common with the brute creation. It is, therefore, as complete an argument to say, that man is destined to move in society, because his faculties are suited to it, and to it alone, as it is to say that man is designed for acts of goodness and benevolence, because he is endowed with a moral nature that approves them; or, as any other argument that rests on the agreement between the constitution of our own minds and that of the world around us, numbers of which are presented to us on every side; all of which are alike founded on the truth, which we will perceive the more clearly as our knowledge increases, that 'Nature never gravitates to nought;—that our Creator never designed any of those faculties with which He has endowed us, and which may be made available to promote our good, to lie wholly dormant here, although it is only hereafter that many of them will receive their full and mature development. It is not my design to pursue this argument here; you will derive greater profit and pleasure from a reference to the works I have mentioned; but I would ask, is not every argument which establishes that social and civilized life is the state natural to man, applicable, by the most exact and striking analogy, to show that the same is natural to nations and communities? If there were not this communion between the different regions of the earth, would not some of the bounties of our common mother remain for ever unenjoyed, whilst others would never reach those who could most highly appreciate them, because not born to their possession? If we had never been allowed to taste the tea, coffee, and sugar of eastern climes, of what innocent and healthful enjoyments were we for ever debarred; and shall we say that nature endowed a few corners of the globe with the power of supplying these in abundance to all the rest of the world, and yet designed that they should never be produced, or never leave the country of their growth? Was it the design of Providence, that the cotton should yearly grow, and yearly perish, on the banks of the Mississippi? Or, is it not more in accordance with His benevolence to suppose, that He meant it to be wafted to a distant land, where, by the matchless ingenuity of a civilized people, it should be converted into a fabric for the use and comfort of millions? I am persuaded, therefore, that the savage state, either of the individual, or the community, mars the gracious designs of Providence, and cuts us off from those social, intellectual, and material comforts which are spread for our use. It is true, indeed, that commerce was not coeval with civilization; it was not then needed, because mankind, few in numbers, and placed in the most fertile region of the world, were supplied with all that their condition then required; but, as He designed our increase and multiplication, and that we should replenish the earth, the barren as well as the fertile parts, is it not reasonable to suppose that He intended the fertile regions to be called in aid to supply, from their abundance, the deficiency of those less favoured; it being otherwise impossible that the design of replenishing the earth could be accomplished, without condemning some to an almost savage state—a state which the argument already referred to shows could never have been designed for man?

"A nation, therefore, which would thus voluntarily exclude itself from the commonwealth of the world, and from the benefits of that 'territorial division of labour' which commerce and navigation effect, and, through an alleged desire to preserve simplicity or independence, reject the means of increasing its power of production, could hardly be thought wiser than the man who would select the lot of the solitary savage, and resolve never to rise in the scale of social life, because he would thus be liable to fall—resolutely denying himself all present good, in order to exclude the possibility of future evil—in fact, secure himself against ever being worse, by making himself as bad as he could possibly be."

"Experience and knowledge of human nature tell us that the desires of men increase by the very food supplied to them, and that there never was, and never will be, a community where all the desires of all its members were fully gratified. To say, therefore, that there may be too much of everything produced, amounts to an absurdity; if we mis-calculate the desires of men, we may direct our energies to the production of what will not please them, or of what they already have in sufficient abundance, but that is the only sense in which over-production can take place. But even this is a circumstance of rare occurrence; and what is generally called over-production, and which meets our eye every day, is not in truth over-production, but, if I may coin a word, under-production. When goods remain on hands for want of buyers, it is not because all the community is already supplied with them in abundance, and would reject any addition, but because they have nothing to offer in exchange for them; and why is this? Because their production has been small—all the produce of their labour has been already devoted to supply the most pressing wants of nature, and they have nothing left for the procuring further comforts. And how ought we to wish this amended? Surely not by diminishing the productive power of the one class, but by increasing that of the other. The demand for the commodities that are unsold is in existence, and if you increase the productive power of those who have the demand, you furnish them with the means of satisfying that demand. The more abundant the produce of the farmer is, the greater quantity of manufactured articles can he command; and if he has an increasing poter passu in their productive energies, the supply of the products of each, at the disposal of the other, will be increased."

"I trust, therefore, you will now see that there is no evil to be apprehended from abundance, and that though particular articles may be produced in excess, yet a universal over-production never did, and never can exist. The answer to those who ask, 'If all be manufacturers and producers, where will be the consumers,' is, that a man does not cease to be a consumer because he is a producer,—that the producers will be the consumers also; for no one can be a consumer unless he has products to offer in exchange, and he can only consume to the extent of these products. If such a state of things as is here apprehended ever takes place, every nation will not produce every thing, and consume only its own productions, but the territorial division of labour will take place, assigning to each that department of production in which it is most fitted to excel; thus producing, on the whole, the greatest possible amount of wealth which the united energies of the world can furnish."

Let us next turn to the worthy concomitant of the "over-production" absurdity: we mean the cry of "over-population":—

"Experience shows us, that an increase of population in every country has been accompanied with more than a proportionate increase of the means of subsistence; and the larger population has been ever better fed, clothed, and lodged, than the small population was. Thus, when Ireland was thinly peopled by a million of inhabitants, the supply of food was scanty and uncertain, and famines were of periodical recurrence; she is now, with a very dense population, in the position of raising more food than her population can consume; and it has been shown by Mr. Sharman Crawford, that her present agricultural population is not greater than would be required to cultivate her territory to anything like its capabilities.* Thus, too, the population of some parts of America has doubled itself in twenty-five years: but there is no reason to doubt that produce has been more than doubled there in the same period, for the increased population is supplied with all the necessities of life in profusion. The history of every civilized country supplies facts to confirm the truth of this position; but the mere circumstance, that with the advance of population the proportion which the agricultural class bears to the rest of the community has been found, not to increase, but to diminish, is conclusive upon the point: for if the difficulty of procuring subsistence increased with increasing numbers, the task of raising it would continually absorb more and more hands, and with every advance in population, less labour could be spared from agriculture to other occupations. I have already observed that the power of labour to produce more than would sustain the labourer, was the source of all civilization, and if this power in the most important of all kinds of labour were continually diminishing, there would be a check to the progress of civilization; the contrary has, however, been always found to be the case; and although it is quite true that there is that difference in the nature of the productiveness of agricultural and manufacturing labour that has been pointed out,†—there being a limit to the first, and none to the second,—yet the fact here referred to, that the agricultural class does not increase in a far greater proportion than the other classes in the progress of society (as we should expect if this difference were felt in practice to any extent), demonstrates that the difficulty in keeping up the productiveness of agricultural labour, when a greater quantity of it is called into requisition, has been hitherto at least, to a great extent, overcome by the introduction of improvements.

"As far, then, as experience goes, it shows that the fears entertained by the Malthusians—that population will outstrip the means of subsistence, and thus bring famine to thin our numbers—are groundless; that they have never been realized in any country, I have no hesitation in asserting, and that they are never likely to be realized for the world at large, a little consideration will satisfy us.

"It may be suggested as an objection to this statement,—Why then does England import corn for the use of her population? But the answer is, that she imports corn, not because she could not grow enough at home, if forced to do so, but because it is found that it can be had more easily, by sending abroad in exchange English manufactures, than by raising it from the soil at home; and any person who considers the quantity of ground that lies unproductive in England, to minister to the pleasures of its wealthy inhabitants, and the quantity of food that is consumed by horses and other animals, will conclude that the day is very far distant indeed, when she will be unable to grow food enough to sustain her inhabitants, although, if it were rendered necessary for her to do so, the effect would doubtless be, to deprive the rich of many of their present luxuries and lawful enjoyments, to diminish the comforts of the poor, and, by stinting the supply of the labour ministering to the higher wants of our nature, materially to obstruct the growth of civilization."

It is justly remarked that the error of those who describe over-population as a cause of poverty arises from their regarding men merely as consumers, forgetting that they are likewise producers.

Here we shall pause for this week; but though we shall return to the book in our next number, we cannot avoid noticing the triumphant refutation of the fallacies recently put forward by Colonel Torrens. It is gratifying to find that sound principles are everywhere making progress, and that men are beginning to discover the folly of allowing the petty prejudices of party to impede their perception of useful truths, and to prevent the adoption of such a sound commercial system as would render British resources and British industry truly available for their proper purposes—the promotion of the happiness of the British people. Professor Lawson adds one to the number of illustrious proofs that genuine philanthropy is identical with genuine philosophy, and that benevolence, in order to accomplish any good end, must be placed under the guidance of science.

PRINCIPLES AND DETAILS.—A man sure, and rightly sure, on certain main grounds, will often accommodate to them, almost any how, the practical details of a case. One and the same in his own mind, he will present different faces to different objects. We have an example in the arguments of the Free Traders as to the effect of repealing the Corn Laws. Some of them tell us that corn will be cheaper, others that it will not; some that rents will fall, others that they will rise; some that we shall import much more foreign corn, others that there is very little more foreign corn to import, and so on. We care little for these discordant predictions, and see a mean which reconciles them all. Commercial freedom is a high, a natural, and a safe principle, which does not require the aid of such calculations. Objectors, however, cavil, and so defenders come down to meet them, unnecessarily and dangerously.—Times.

* "Defence of Small Farmers," p. 32. A little work, to which let me, in passing, give my humblest of praise. It contains the soundest common sense, and the soundest political economy, and presents a happy contrast to the idle speculations of men who have written about our country, without knowing anything of the facts.

WEEKLY COST OF PROTECTION TO SUGAR AND WHEAT.

(From the Economist of the 18th April.)

SUGAR.—Since last week the relative prices of Porto Rico and Jamaica Muscovado sugars have continued exactly the same; and therefore the difference of the cost of our weekly consumption of 77,792 cwt., above what the same would be on the Continent, and paying the same amount of duty to the State that our colonial sugar does, amounts to £70,003 for the whole country, and to £5833 for the Metropolis alone, to be added to the respective balances of last week.

WHEAT.—The price of English wheat is a shade lower this week; but that of foreign wheat is also somewhat cheaper, and the difference is not changed.

It follows, therefore, that the difference of the cost of bread consumed during the last week, compared with what the same would cost on the Continent, has been £289,460 more for the whole country, and £24,038 for the Metropolis, to be added to the respective balances of last week. The account will now stand thus:—

FOR THE WHOLE KINGDOM.

|-------------------------------------|------------|
| Balance from last week | £5,018,483 |
| Extra cost of sugar this week | 70,003 |
| Ditto of bread | 288,460 |

Total extra cost from January 1st to this day £6,076,946

FOR THE METROPOLIS ALONE.

|-------------------------------------|----------|
| Balance from last week | £918,203 |
| Extra cost of sugar this week | 5,833 |
| Ditto of bread | 24,038 |

Total extra cost from January 1st to this day £948,074

INTIMATE CONNEXION OF AGRICULTURAL WITH MANUFACTURING AND COMMERCIAL PROSPERITY.—Manufacturers and merchants are to the body politic what the digestive powers are to the human body. We could not exist without food; but the largest supplies of food cannot lengthen our days when the machinery by which nature prepares and adapts it for our use, and incorporates it with our body, is vitiated and deranged. Nothing, therefore, can be more silly and childish than the estimates so frequently put forth of the comparative advantages of agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial industry. They are all intimately connected, and depend upon, and grow out of, each other. "Land and trade," to borrow the just and forcible expressions of Sir Josiah Child, "are twins, and have always, and ever will, wax and wane together. It cannot be ill with trade but lands will fall, nor ill with lands but trade will feel it." This reasoning cannot be controverted; and on its authority we are entitled to condemn every attempt to exalt one species of industry, by giving it factitious advantages at the expense of the rest, as being alike impolitic and pernicious. No preference can be given to agriculturists over manufacturers and merchants, nor to the latter over the former, without occasioning the most extensively ruinous consequences.—Encyclopædia Britannica, new edition.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, April 15.—There was a fair supply of English Wheat to this morning's market; the best samples were in request, but secondary qualities met a slow sale, and former rates were with difficulty supported. There was rather more inquiry for Free Foreign at last week's rates. In addition to a fair supply of English Barley, several cargoes of Foreign were offering, which had arrived during the week; all descriptions were in lower than last week. The supply of Beans and Peas was short, and in some cases rather improved prices were obtained. The arrivals of English, Scotch, and Irish Oats were all moderate; last week's prices were well maintained for all descriptions.

FRIDAY, April 19.—With a moderate supply of English Wheat since Monday, we have a slow trade at the rates of that day. As was anticipated the duty rose yesterday to 17s. The quantity on which the 16s. duty was paid was only 15,300 quarters. This has given rather more firmness to the holders of free foreign; and though there is no improvement in the demand, there is less disposition to press sales. The supply of English Barley is moderate, and large of foreign. The buyers are still cautious in expectation of larger arrivals, and it is with difficulty that sales can be effected at Monday's rates. We have good supplies of English and Irish Oats. Though the trade is far from brisk, Monday's prices are maintained. No alteration in Beans and Peas.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 31.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1844.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive a copy, weekly, of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 87, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND, are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council respectfully request that their friends, in all places where committees for raising subscriptions to the £100,000 Fund have not been already formed, will proceed to their formation as soon as possible, and transmit their names to the LEAGUE Offices, Manchester.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

THE ELECTIONS.

The League pledged itself to take the verdict of the constituencies on the question of Free Trade.

London and Kendal replied by polling a majority; Salisbury, Devizes, Hastings, and Exeter replied by polling a minority; Huntingdon, Horsham, and Woodstock replied by declining to go to a poll.

It is no task of ours either to magnify success or to varnish over defeat. We rest upon the justice of our cause and the progress of opinion. We can afford to be frank, for we are certain of our real strength. These are the facts. Let the foes of human rights and of human subsistence make the most they can of them. Our business is to "hold right on" till the hungry are fed with the food which Monopoly denies to those by whom it is earned.

We cannot go to the poll where the parties whose votes should make the poll protest against any such procedure. At Huntingdon, for instance, we received the following communication:—"At a meeting of the friends of the Liberal interest in the borough of Huntingdon on Friday evening, April 19, 1844, it was resolved unanimously that, in the opinion of this meeting, it is not advisable to contest the borough at this election." Had the phrase "Liberal interest" meant exclusively the Whig partisans amongst the electors, this notification would have been as little regarded at Huntingdon as similar hints, though less formally given, have been regarded elsewhere. But it was the resolution of the Free Traders. Of course it was final. And we found substantially the case to be the same at Horsham and Woodstock. Before such a declaration it becomes us to retire, and to "hide our time." We know that time will come. We only hope it may not come too late.

Let it not be forgotten that at Exeter the cause of Free Trade was injured, and at Horsham crushed, by party spirit. At the one place, the Whigs stood aloof; and at the other, Mr. Hurst was reckoned as their candidate,—a Richmondite Whig, a bread-tax Whig. For this account there were even professed friends of our cause who looked sweetly on his success. He is a Liberal, forsooth; a Pro-Corn-Law Liberal! How long are the electors to be cajoled by words? What is the Liberalism worth that taxes food and cripples commerce? What does such Liberalism mean? The lesson is being learned, but in some quarters, it seems, very slowly, that Liberalism and Whiggism are outworn things if they be not identified with commercial freedom. That is the one great popular right for which now the nation struggles. No substitute for it can be offered. Those who desire to give it are the people's friends, and those who deny it are the people's enemies. No other demarcation can be set up but what is more cogent. The borough that returns a Mono-polist to Parliament has done its worst, whether he call himself a Whig or Tory." It might as well be a pocket borough; it is a borough for aristocratical pockets.

We know this may seem harsh in relation to many such boroughs as stud the south of England; and we do not forget the mode in which the electoral system works in those boroughs. The power of wealth and station is inwrought into that system. Nothing less than the sturdiest manliness, and a bold defiance of martyrdom, can break through its shackles. In most of these localities, the tradesmen are under the screw of the farmers, just as the farmers are under the screw of the landlords. The last thing the "Protectionists" tolerate is electoral protection. "Vote, or else —," is all the protection the Monopolists afford. The dirtiest tricks are played to injure the refractory. But the days of this sordid tyranny are numbered. The sword of exposure shall strike, where the shield of the ballot is denied. If electors fail of their duty, it shall be known why they fail.

Through storm and sunshine our agitation advances. The registration plan proceeds. We are gathering strength for a trial, the result of which must not be judged of by these single elections, under circumstances against which it would be a waste of energy to struggle more than by turning them to some account for the future. Of every occasion something has been made. Where electoral pledges could not be forfeited, it was yet practicable that electoral opinions should be rectified. There are numbers with whom party spirit has polled its last vote. And in the contest which soon may come, there will be a sense of strength, founded on previously-ascertained facts, from which these local mischances will not detract. Look everywhere to the registration: that is what we ask of the friends of our cause, electors or not; and give us efficient aid in that general supervision, which will be as the final review of an army for the day of battle.

Those who live away from such localities, and wish to have a distinct conception of the infamy of a landlord-borough, should read Mr. Hume's speech at the Woodstock nomination. The numerous cases of individual oppression, and the wholesale notices to cottage tenantry, of whom 140 families are to be turned into the streets unless they pay higher rents, are quite enough to justify the indignant exclamation of the speaker, "Good God Almighty! if there is any justice in heaven or on earth, if there is any right feeling between man and man, let us join in denouncing such conduct as this." And yet the victims have sent a beardless scion of that noble house of Blenheim to be their representative in Parliament, and the juvenile protector of the landed interest and the factory workpeople! It is impossible to read the Times' report of Mr. Hume's speech without one's gorge rising, even more at the forced servility that endures such treatment than at the sordidness and insolence by which it is inflicted. We confess these transactions do not augment the hopefulness of our appeal to the electoral body. If they made us despair, we should lose faith in humanity and Providence. Nations have been saved often, ere now, by an heroic spirit rising out of the very abyss of corruption and degradation. So we work on heartily. And thanks to the 529 brave men of Exeter who voted for General Briggs and Free Trade, caring neither for Whig nor Tory. They have done their duty manfully. Let those applaud them who dare to "Go, and do likewise."

FRUITS OF RESTRICTION.

It will be seen by a conversation which took place in the House of Commons on Tuesday night, between Sir Robert Peel and Dr. Bowring, that the bitter fruits of our restrictive and selfish commercial policy are beginning to exhibit themselves. It appears that the great German confederation, known by the name of the Zoll-Verein, and the United States of North America, have concluded, and by their representatives, on the 23rd of March, signed a treaty, by which each admits the produce of the other on terms far more favourable than if the importation took place from the United Kingdom. The duty on tobacco in the German States is now 5½ dollars, or 16s. 6d. per cwt. By the treaty just completed, tobacco from the United States is to be admitted at 4 dollars, or 12s. per cwt.—(hear this, ye British consumers, who are now paying £17 12s. 8d. for the same article, being thirty times the amount of duty which is to be levied in Germany!)—that the duty on rice shall not exceed two kreukers (a merely nominal duty), while, in Great Britain (do not forget this, ye overburdened citizens!), 15s. per cwt. is taken by the Custom-house; and on cotton wool—(hear this in mind, manufacturers on both sides of the Tweed!)—on cotton wool from America it is stipulated that no duty whatever shall be levied.

And in return for these concessions the United States have agreed that linens and silks of German manufacture shall be imported at a duty not to exceed 15 per cent., while imported from England they are liable to a duty of 30 per cent.; that German woollen merinos shall also be admitted at 15 per cent., while British merinos are subjected to 40 per cent.; that German hosiery shall pay only 20 per cent., while 30 per cent. are exacted upon British; and that a variety of other German articles (including plate glass,) shall be imported at duties varying at from 10 to 15 per cent., being, in most cases, less than half the duties chargeable upon similar British productions.

Will facts like these, when they are known to the British people, produce any effect upon those who call themselves their representatives? Or will nothing awaken the Government from its sluggish indifference to the mortal blows which are being struck at our national prosperity?

A letter from Berlin says that the Prussian States, having lost all hopes of obtaining reciprocity or justice from England—having at last been painfully convinced that monopoly could not here be driven from its strongholds—being wearied with the lectures of our Government, which preached Free Trade and practised impediments and prohibitions—had turned its attention to other countries, where our obstinacy had left similar impressions, and having entered upon a path of alienation and opposition, would walk therein, farther and farther removing from amicable intercourse with us.

To the Corn Laws the correspondence points as the concentration of our selfishness and arrogance. While these remain it is idle to talk of our emancipation, or of our progress towards emancipation. It is really against Great Britain that America and Germany are turning their cruel (however unwise) reprisals. Short-sighted and self-inflictive, no doubt, is the system of differential duties. Its advocacy redounds little to the honour of statesmen on either side of the Atlantic; but it will be poor consolation for our sufferings to be told that they were inflicted not by the wisdom, but the folly, of rival nations. The grievance is, that we suffer; and what makes the suffering intolerable is, the thought that it need not have been.

We must begin a new career. We, who have given so many examples to encourage the bad principle, are now called upon to give energetic effect to the good. Let us reform our own tariffs. Let us prove that we, at least, understand what is meant by that which one Minister calls "the dictates of common sense" (Free Trade), and that we can give a practical application to the doctrine of another, that "men should buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market." The keystone of the arch of monopoly is the Corn Law. We demand its total, its immediate, its unconditional abolition.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1844.

Eleventh Week, ending Saturday, April 27.

Nothing directly in relation to Free Trade has occurred in Parliament during the past week, with the exception of some incidental matters. The Earl of Radnor, in the House of Lords, made some amusing comments on Mr. Cayley's Protection pamphlet, with its veracious citations from Adam Smith, which the Duke of Richmond, to whom they were addressed in the form of a question, evaded, by trying to laugh the matter off. There has been also some conversation in the House of Lords, on the occasion of the presentation of some petitions, respecting that now engrossing question—the limitation of the hours of labour.

Dr. Bowring, in the House of Commons, elicited from Sir Robert Peel that a favourable reciprocal treaty of commerce had been concluded between Prussia, acting on behalf of the Zollverein, or Germanic Customs Union, on the one part, and the United States on the other. The treaty, though actually signed, is not yet ratified, the assent of the Senate of the United States being required. Mr. Labouchere called Sir Robert Peel's attention to the fact that, by treaty, our manufactured goods should be admitted into the United States on the same terms as those accorded to the "most favoured nations." This jargon is the remnant of that diplomatic peddling which has hitherto characterised the commercial treaties and negotiations of enlightened countries. Free Trade would blow it all to the winds, and allow every market to find its natural level, every article of natural produce and manufactured industry to be exchanged with the greatest advantage, and every individual to get the chance of the fullest value for his capital or his labour, without the interference of acts of Parliament, or impolitic customs regulations.

Sir Robert Peel admitted that there were such conditions in our treaty with the United States; but as the subject was under the consideration of the Government, and (as he left it to be inferred) matter of negotiation with the Executive of the United States, he would not say anything more at present. How easily could all these perplexities of statesmen be removed! Open ports for American grain would enable us to laugh at all treaties with German Customs Unions, or any other nation that adopts the principles of protection; and looking to the enormous capital in this country, our unrivalled manufacturing skill, our command of machinery, everything which gives commercial power, not a year would elapse, under an honest and complete system of FREE TRADE, without reading to every nation on the globe a great "moral lesson," which they would speedily learn, and promptly practise.

Talking of "moral lessons," it reminds us of that "curiosity of literature," Mr. Disraeli, and of his protégé the honourable member for Knaresborough, for whom he made a clever and amusing apology on Wednesday night. He said that the result of all this affair, half farce, half tragedy, or in the stock language, serio-comic scenes in the House of Commons, respecting the veracity of the noble, or, rather notorious, member for Knaresborough, would teach Mr. Ferrand a "great moral lesson." We do not know that it will; but the whole matter is calculated to teach other parties a very great "moral lesson;" and, at the hazard of some prolixity and repetition, we shall recount a few of the leading particulars in Mr. Ferrand's Parliamentary career, assuring our readers that nothing is stated which has not come under the personal observation of the writer.

August 19, 1841, was a noticeable day in recent political history. On that day the new Parliament assembled, which was destined to transfer power from one set of politicians to another, and to commit the destinies of this empire to the hands of men who, for many years, had been excluded from all direct share in the executive management of our national concerns. Amongst the new men in that new Parliament, appeared two, one of whom has since acquired a universal and lasting reputation; the other became temporarily notorious in a way certainly more peculiar than creditable. Richard Cobden and William Busfield Ferrand had each acquired provincial repute before entering the House of Commons; the one as an active citizen of Manchester, foremost amongst those of his intelligent fellow-townsmen in pressing on the community the necessity of the practical application of the principles of Free Trade; the other as an agitator of comparatively slender weight, who advocated what he called the "Rights of the Poor," on Conservative principles. Nothing could be more unlike than the appearance of the two men. The one looked the very picture of a thoughtful, quiet, unassuming man, trusting implicitly to the force of truth, when enunciated with intellectual clearness and earnestness of persuasion; the other was the very personification of a roystering swaggoner, ready to play at "single stick," try a bout at wrestling, separate two pet dogs when fighting, or lay a main in the cockpit. There was an essential difference in the matter of voice. Mr. Ferrand's, not so much sonorous as powerful, was the trumpet-like medium of a rattling vocabulary—the very sort of roar which Shakspeare had in his mind's eye when he wrote about "splitting the ears of the groundlings." And, after all, there is very much in a voice, even in the cry of the cuckoo; for when there is a thundering noise in the drum of your ear, you cannot but fancy that where there is so much of sound there must be something of sense entering. And so a man with a great roar may pass off very well for a time, until it is found out that the brain, like the body, cannot subsist upon noise.

In the short session of the autumn of 1841, after the expulsion of the Wags from office, William Busfield Ferrand took his leave. The Anti-Corn-Law League, though not so powerful as it has since become, made itself felt through the exertions of Messrs. Villiers, Cobden, &c.; and the idea entered Ferrand's mind that, mounted on his Rosinante, he would play the Quixote, and slay the giants that scared the repose of the monopolists. Standing up in the House, he roared out about the rich and the atrocious milowners of Lancashire, the horrid, abominable, vile, revolutionary Anti-Corn-Law League, &c. &c. &c.; and, being pressed for a bill of particulars, he, with a classifying genius worthy of Cuvier, separated the manufacturers into two species. Those who did not belong to the League were human in principle. Conservatives in politics, men who cared little for money but much for men; who were pure to heart, peaceful in demeanour, and very, very, very kind to the poor. But those who did belong to the Anti-Corn-Law League were indeed monsters of a new and unheard-of kind. Their hearts were mere lumps of Mammon; their bowels were of cast-iron; they treated immortal beings as if they were rotatory automata; they conspired with the Poor-Law Commissioners to import helpless agricultural peasants into their dreadful dens, and, horrible to relate, supped on them; and types of the species might be seen in the Comed-room of the League, where, like ogres, they glared upon one another, saying, "An ee, let us devour much flesh!"

The short session of 1841 cut short the career of the giant-killer. But in 1842 he reappeared in full blow. The fearful vision through which we had passed had made all men thoughtful, and Monopolists uneasy; and Ferrand was called into requisition. He ran full tilt against the League, raising a great cloud of "devil's dust," and much clatter about "truck." Loud cheers burst out from the crowded Ministerial benches. Peel cheered, Graham cheered, Stanley cheered, and all the little men cheered. The country gentlemen, in raptures, praised this canine English bulldog, which was to pin the League by the nose; and not a party at the "West end" could be complete unless Ferrand was paraded for the admiration of the ladies. In an evil hour he was advised to try his hand on Mr. Cobden; for, having the look of a dog fancier, it might be supposed that he had some skill in the natural history of the canine race, and might have remembered the story of the mastiff, which, after quietly enduring the yelping of a cur until it became intolerable, took it by the neck, and dropped it in the river. Had Ferrand kept to gene-rels he might have blustered through a session with some effect, and remained a first-rate "lion" with political dowagers. But he had the vanity to try a fall with Mr. Cobden, and the misfortune to fall over him. All who witnessed it will remember it—for memorable it was. The loud-tongued imputations of the one, at once insolent and audacious; the quiet, dignified exposure by the other; the blundering bluster by which Ferrand tried to wriggle out of his gratuitous personal charges, as wanton as they were foul; and the pinning him down to matters of fact, from which there was no escape—all this left its impression on the House. Discreet Conservatives saw that their pet was dangerous; gentlemen were shocked at a mode of warfare so repugnant to the decencies of society; and even Ferrand felt the force of his fall through the triple brass which incased him.

Still, however, he was cheered; and one memorable night during the discussion of the tariff, when Sir Robert Peel was absent, he was encouraged by a few gentlemen in "white waistcoats and neckcloths," who had just dined, to get up a "scene." On that occasion Lord Stanley conspicuously patronised Ferrand, and by doing so got the House into a scene of confusion which stopped the progress of business.

Ferrand got into another scrape, which, on this occasion, was with Sir James Graham, who is not the man to permit any body to ride cock-a-hoop over him. This was all about the Keighley Union, the veracity of a Poor-Law Commissioner, and various matters of personal interest. Sir James Graham dared Ferrand to move for a select committee to inquire into the facts; he did not, or would not; Sir Charles Napier jumped up, and said he would; it was granted, and the inquiry did not particularly elevate the idea of dependence which might be reposed on Ferrand's assertions. Towards the end of that session he got completely into disgrace, was snubbed by every body, and fled into obscurity for a time.

It is needless to trace all his career. Reappearing during last recess, he returned,—"like the dog to his vomit,"—to his old tricks of unscrupulous assertion; and it having been determined on that no farther move was to be made in the direction of Free Trade, the Tory press thought that they had need of him once more. His stories about Mr. Alderman Brooks and others must be still fresh in the recollection of our readers; and how they were all eagerly copied, the Standard honouring the reckless traducer with the title of "a Christian gentleman." Emboldened by his success in his old line, he ventured, during the Easter recess, on those statements which got him into that scrape which has fairly fixed the character of this most "Christian gentleman," and left an impression respecting him in the public mind which restores him to the proper insignificance of his natural position.

On Monday night, after a speech from Mr. Ferrand in favour of the Ten Hours, Mr. Roebuck got up, and asked him if it were true that he had charged a Minister of the Crown with having used the powers of his office to get a false report from an assistant poor-law commissioner, in order to crush him—that is, Ferrand—in the House? He evaded a direct reply; blustered; said Roebuck should not school him, and that he was not a gentleman; but, being called to order by the SPEAKER, he was obliged to retract, and at last admitted, virtually, that he had made the charge. Mr. Hume again asked him if he had charged Mr. Hogg, the member for Berkeley, who was chairman of the Nottingham election committee which unseated Mr. Walter, the leading proprietor of the Times, with having been corruptly induced to make a false report, in order to aid the Home Secretary in getting rid of a man who might prove troublesome to him on the subject of the Poor Law? The result of it all was that Mr. Ferrand did not wholly deny or acknowledge the accuracy of his reported speeches; and Sir James Graham, who said (quoting Ferrand's own words) that there should be no "bigging or bagging" on the subject, proposed that he should be allowed till next day to prepare himself.

Tuesday came, and with it great expectation and a crowd of members. Mr. Ferrand was in his accustomed place, laughing, talking, and on one occasion cheering loudly at some trivial matter; putting on a forced hilarity, as the event showed. At last his turn arrived. The SPEAKER called "Mr. Ferrand!" and every face turned towards him as he rose. He began in a loud, confident way, admitting that the reports of his speeches were correct, and that he would neither deny nor retract what he had said. He claimed the sacred privilege of a free born Englishman; but if he had wounded the feelings of any one—

At this there arose a derisive cry of "Oh!" and at that sound Ferrand showed that he was a coward at heart. Like a certain biped, he showed the "white feather," defied the House, took his hat, and walked out! The amazement of the crowded House was beyond expression. Members looked after him; and, as they saw him going, sent after him a burst of derisive and scornful laughter, such as never greeted the ears of a member before. When the amazement, the scorn, the contempt, and the laughter abated, member after member arose to express their opinion of the honourable member for Knaresborough; and none were more terribly severe and bitter than the most conspicuous of those who had formerly cheered him in making his venomous statements respecting the Anti-Corn Law League and the manufacturers of the country. Sir Robert Peel compared Ferrand's disappearance with that of the conjuror, who, after gathering a great crowd by announcing that he would squeeze himself into a quart bottle, ran away. But Lord Stanley—he who had patronized Ferrand on the night of the tariff roum—now came down upon him with terrible effect. There was not a member of the House, he said, who not only believed Ferrand's statements to be false, but that Ferrand knew they were false when he made them! Alas, for the Standard's "Christian gentleman!" There he was, "deserted in his utmost need," by all who had enjoyed, in former times, the outpourings of his bountiful imagination.

But no, he was not utterly abandoned. The House, resolving to punish him according to form and precedent, adjourned the matter till the following day; and meantime "Young England," feeling that they could "better spare a better man," came to his rescue. Mr. D'Israeli made a clever and amusing speech in his behalf, and yet, after all, clever as was his speech, the sum of his defence consisted in this, that Ferrand was not worth rope enough to hang him, and therefore it would be beneath the dignity of the House to gibbet so insignificant a criminal! He is a rough-tongued blade, to be sure; and, when he uses his privilege of a "free-born Englishman," it is to say things unworthy the notice of statesmen. Mr. D'Israeli, while he was advising the House to treat Ferrand in the same way that the disappointed public treated the battle conjuror, gave some hard hits to "honourable members." You hooted the poor loose-tongued fellow down; but did you hoot and howl down Sir Robert Peel when he accused Mr. Cobden of making speeches inciting to assassination? This was spoken immediately behind Sir Robert Peel, whose face twitched convulsively; and there is a strong probability that it was this particular question which led to the amicable termination and arrangement. It was felt that further discussion would only bring up disagreeable reminiscences, more especially when Captain Berkeley reminded the party that used to cheer Ferrand on to his unenviable notoriety that he was like the dog that broke his chain, and then worried his master! So the whole matter was wound up by Sir James Graham, who remarked that he had often said things which he wished to retract; and therefore, if Ferrand would attend in his place, and express his regret that he had uttered accusations which he could not sustain, all recollection of the offence would be effaced from his mind. The House adopted this forgiving suggestion, with which, probably, the matter will be adjusted.

So ends this story of a "cock and a bull;" and the "moral lesson" which it reads to the House of Commons and the public is—that you "cannot touch pitch without being defiled"—that you cannot keep company with a scavenger and keep your fine clothes clean—and that great principles advocated by earnest men will triumph over the foulest means used for their suppression, even though the poisoned arrows be directed by gentlemen, and the quiver held by rank and fashion.

MEETINGS.

WEEKLY METROPOLITAN AGGREGATE MEETING OF THE LEAGUE.

The second meeting of the League since the Easter recess was held at Covent-garden Theatre on Wednesday evening last, and, as on previous occasions, was most numerous attended. In consequence of the continued indisposition of Mr. G. Wilson, the chair was occupied by the Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P. The meeting was addressed by W. Ewart, Esq., member for Dumfries; H. Elphinstone, Esq., D.C.L., member for Lewes; and R. R. Moore, Esq.

Among the distinguished individuals present were the following:—

The Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, M.P., in the chair; Thomas Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P.; Benjamin Smith, Esq., M.P.; William Ewart, Esq., M.P.; Howard Elphinstone, Esq., M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P.; Reginald Blewitt, Esq., M.P.; A. Collett, Esq., M.P.; R. R. Moore, Esq.; William Gordon Thomson, Esq.; Arthur Paterson, Esq.; D. Dewar, Esq.; W. A. Wilkinson, Esq.; E. Squire, Esq.; Cowden Clarke, Esq.; John Gosnell, Esq.; William Bowman, Esq.; Robert Skegg, Esq.; Norman Wilkinson, Esq.; Joseph Ivimey, Esq.; C. Bennett, Esq.; P. A. Taylor, Esq.; William Chambers, Esq.; Joseph Robinson, Esq.; Hexham, Northumberland; A. Thomson, Esq.; J. Coulthard, Esq.; Sir William Baynes, Bart.; W. Cooper, Esq.; F. Falvey, Esq.; John Chambers, Esq.; T. Pocock, Esq.; W. Shelgrave, Esq.; Thomas Hubbard, Esq.; David Parkes, Esq.; T. Macartney, Esq.; W. Kilvie, Esq.; Redruth, Cornwall; Jas. Davison, Esq., Truro; David Laurie, Esq.; T. N. Cathrall, Esq.; C. Bowring, Esq.; James Kenworthy, Esq.; W. Tweedale, Esq.; Ashton-under-Lyne; S. Fordham, Esq.; E. K. Fordham, Esq.; Charles Squarey, Esq.; Salisbury; John Somers, Esq., Bridgewater; W. Thornborough, Esq.; J. Samuda, Esq.; E. S. Robinson, Esq.; Tewkesbury; Jacob Nicuolis, Esq., Plymouth; Pres. Granger, Esq.; J. P. Burnard, Esq.; Samuel Ashton, Esq., Hyde; J. R. White, Esq., Manchester; J. Naylor, Esq., Manchester; T. Wilson, Esq., New York, &c.

The minutes of the previous evening having been read by Mr. E. J. Evans, upon the motion of Mr. BRIGHT, M.P., seconded by Mr. ARTHUR PATTISON, they were confirmed.

The CHAIRMAN then came forward amidst enthusiastic cheering, which having subsided, the hon. gentleman addressed the meeting as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, I have been requested by our friends to take the chair in consequence, as I regret to learn, of your chairman being unable to attend. It was expected that he would have occupied it this evening. He is, however, still obliged from indisposition to be absent. (Hear.) Our friend Mr. Cobden is also absent, not idle, as you may suppose (hear, hear), but discussing the question with our neighbours at Greenwich. (Cheers.) The honour of occupying the chair was proposed to me somewhat late, and I have left my avocations in another House for the purpose. (Hear, hear.) I cannot say I had much scruple in doing so (a laugh), for I begin to think that there is more good to be done here than there ("Hear, hear, hear," and a laugh), though, perhaps, some may think that the proceedings there would sometimes find a fitter stage for their performance here. (A laugh.) However, if these meetings tend, by spreading the truth, to advance our cause, I think it is a duty on us all to give them every support (hear, hear), for sure I am that the importance of the cause for which you are associated is each day becoming more manifest. (Hear.) Its close connexion is seen with that question which, to the credit of the country, is at last become of universal interest, namely, how to meet the exigencies of an increasing population, and how to raise, and how to prevent from sinking lower, the condition of that mass of our fellow-subjects who live by labour. (Cheers.) That is now engaging the attention of philanthropists and statesmen, as well as of quacks and adventurers (hear); and I cannot but believe that, when the various projects now before the country have been submitted to the test of reason and discussion, and found to be inefficient, the good sense and good feeling which excite interest in the object will assent to the truth and justice of your views. (Cheers.) All agree that some steps must be taken—all admit that the system which has existed has not prevented the evils which are complained of. (Hear, hear.) The majorities in both Houses are in the position of admitting the evil, and are ready to adopt any remedy that would not require any great sacrifice on their part. ("Hear" and laughter.) Their benevolence, indeed, always reminds me of that ludicrous illustration which Mr. O'Connell once gave of it, in a debate on the subject, in the case of his friend who the ill-fed and over-worked horse. He saw his horse suffering, and had made every experiment to cure him but one. He had bled him and blistered him, he had dined and physicked him, but he had somehow or other always forgot the somewhat more expensive experiment of feeding him more and working him less. (Great laughter.) And so it is with our great men—they listen with the deepest interest to every remedy which any one suggests, save that which we venture to say applies to man as well as to beast—namely, that when he is hungry he should be fed, and when he is overworked he should have less to do. ("Hear" and laughter.) We have benevolent men who are shocked at all the misery they witness, and to hear that people in this country work so hard and so long to gain subsistence; and they propose an act of Parliament to declare that men should not work so hard or so long; but how they are to gain subsistence without working hard and working long they never tell us. (Hear, hear.) If they would make that clear, or if their act of Parliament would accomplish what they wish and we wish—who would not be with them? (Hear, hear.) Their faith is great in the omnipotence of Parliament. I wish we could persuade them of the virtue of repealing some acts of Parliament they have passed, and trust a little to leaving people free. (Cheers.) I do not deny that men propose and support such acts as those with good intentions; I am sure they do; but good intentions will not feed a hungry man. (Hear, hear, hear.) There always have been kind people in this country who have wanted to legislate for symptoms, and to leave the root of the evil untouched, but I never see any good the people get from it. (Hear.) Horace Walpole, alluding to the tendency that existed in his time for this sort of legislation, mentions an instance of a near relation of his own, who hearing that a distiller had been burnt by the head of a still flying off, strongly urged him to get an act of Parliament passed to prevent the heads of stills flying off. (Loud laughter.) We want these philanthropists to go below the surface. (Hear, hear, hear.) Emigration is another scheme proposed to cure the evil, and against this scheme I shall say nothing, for I feel that if I was a working man, and anybody would pay my passage, I would sooner go to any other country than remain in this, if the Corn Laws are to continue (hear); for certain am I, if those laws remain, and the population increases as it has done, that there is not a working man in this country, however well off he may be now, that will not deteriorate in his condition. (Cheers.) The evils which emigration would remove from sight would soon recur if these laws continue. (Hear, hear, hear.) Some think that the evil of overwork and little food is to be cured by public charity, and they would repeal or relax the poor law. But these men would appear to think that the natural condition of the working men in this country is that of paupers. (Cheers.) I look upon pauperism as a vast misfortune, which ought to be prevented if it is possible; and all our efforts should be to secure the working men an independence of such means of living, and afford them opportunity, by honest industry, to maintain themselves. (Cheers.) Again, there are those who would treat the people homoeopathically, and who say more protection is the cure; that is, having little now by means of their protective system, they would give them less. (Laughter.) This party do not depend upon the faith the public have in their prescription; they make the laws, unfortunately, and therefore they have protection for themselves. (Hear, hear.) They know, however, how far opinion goes with them; for they attempted, as you know, to establish what they called protection societies this year, of which we heard a great deal some time ago, but very little lately (laughter); they have proved to be, I believe, as I supposed they would, utter failures. (Hear, hear.) Meeting one who knew something of their proceedings the other day, I asked him what the Great Central Society was doing, and his answer was "nothing." (Laughter.) And I then asked what the branch societies were doing, and he said, "helping the central." (Great laughter.) All that they have done, that I have heard of, has been to publish a pamphlet, with copious extracts from Adam Smith, with the words expressive of the meaning of the author carefully left out—(laughter)—which is a convenient way of creating an authority where none exists. (Hear, hear, hear.) What they have not done, as far as I can learn, is to offer any reply to the charges which the League have brought against the Corn Laws; for abuse of the leaders of the League is no argument in favour of the Corn Laws, as all the world but themselves see clearly (hear); and what is striking, and what is much observed upon, is, that though weeks have elapsed since two farmers on these boards stated the farmers' case, declaring that the Corn Laws had done them, and could do them no good, but that they had done them much mischief, yet not one word have the British Farmers' Protection Societies put forth in answer or denial of what those two farmers, in the face of the world, have published on the subject (cheers); and will anybody believe that if there had been anything to say against these men, or against their statements, that these societies, with all their machinery for the purpose, would not have done so? (Loud cheering.) It is under these circumstances that the monopolists having failed to state anything to satisfy the people that the Corn Laws ought to exist, and that there is a universal desire now to discover the means of preventing the deterioration of the people, that I do hope that the time is drawing near when there will be a general acknowledgment of the truth and justice of our views. (Cheers.) And looking at the state of opinion now on the subject, at the better information possessed by all classes, of the state and wants of the population, and at the various projects before the country, I expect that the discussion of the question will take place with greater advantage this year than it has done hitherto (cheers); I do not, therefore, regret, though, perhaps, it was opposed to my own opinion, that the question has not been moved in the House before. (Hear.) It is now my intention to raise the discussion at the first convenient day during the coming month, and to submit the same motion that I have been accustomed to do, and, as I hope, with better success than before. (Loud cheering.) I beg now to introduce to your attention our friend William Ewart, Esq. (Loud cheering.)

W. EWART, Esq., M.P., on coming forward was received with loud plaudits from all parts of the theatre. He said: Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, if I consulted my own inclination—perhaps I might say my own interest, for I do not feel very adequate to the task of addressing you this evening—I should have declined the invitation which my hon. friend Mr. Villiers and my friend Mr. Cobden have offered me; but, gentlemen, I do feel it to be an honour to be called upon to stand before you in such a cause. (Hear, hear.) With the tenor of my hon.

friend's (Mr. Villiers) observations, as with his recorded votes, I have long agreed; so also do I agree with his principles and opinions as expressed this evening, and, perhaps, with none more so than with those with which he commenced his speech. He truly said that we might be better employed in certain other scenic exhibitions than such as those that are celebrated in the political theatre, which are sometimes of a theatrical and dramatic character—in our own House of Commons (hear, hear)—a place where it might be said we see everything now and then which partakes of the dramatic art, from the super-tragic to the subcolloquial (laughter)—where we are occasionally enlightened by a scene of the most instructive pantomime, or by a no less tragic demonstration, worthy of one of the acts of Bombastes Furioso. (Renewed laughter and applause.) Pardon me, gentlemen: I mean not in the slightest degree to insinuate that these scenic representations are taking place at this moment in some other place. Heaven forefend that I should make so impossible an allusion; but it is within the range at least of imagination, if not within the reach of memory—a fact, I believe, which may be attested by many of my honourable friends who now sit around me, and who, if they are absent this evening from the House of Commons, are perhaps more tranquilly engaged, more usefully, more beneficially for the interests of the country engaged in advocating the great cause of the repeal of the Corn Laws, which have so long oppressed the people of this country—which have diminished the food of the population—which have impeded our manufactures—which have fettered our commerce—than they might be in some personal dispute, and in uttering violent expressions, which I could wish, for the sake of the House and the country, that the country and the House had alike been spared. (Cheers.) Since last myself and Mr. Elphinstone had the honour of addressing you on this important subject, a great change has come over the spirit of this country, at least in its external circumstances. We addressed you then in a moment of depression, and in the hour of severe adversity. The country was then suffering under one of those tempestuous shocks which sometimes seem to shake it to its commercial centre, and to move it, as it were, for a moment from its basis. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, to the storm which then assailed our manufacturing and our commercial interests has succeeded at last the semblance of a calm. We are indeed, at the present moment, in a state of apparent and of temporary prosperity. How long is that apparent, that temporary prosperity to last? As one of our poets has beautifully said:—

"In painted pomp the gilded vessel goes,
Unmindful of the whirlwind's stormy way,
Which hushed in grim repose expects its evening prey."

(Applause.) Gentlemen, believe not that this temporary calm is permanent; believe not that you can trust to the perfidious stillness of the atmosphere which now surrounds you. It is true that we are for a time more prosperous—but who knows whether times such as we have lately witnessed may not return, or how soon that tranquillity which at present pervades our political and commercial atmosphere may be changed into one of those sudden and violent shocks and alternations which sometimes surprise us in the calmest and apparently most silent seasons? (Cheers.) Depend on it, this country can know no real tranquillity, no permanent prosperity, until you establish laws which will permit its people to be fed, which will invigorate its commerce, and establish its manufactures upon a secure and permanent foundation. (Applause.) So long as the Corn Laws—so long as the sugar laws—so long as the laws which prohibit the larger importation of articles of household use exist—so long, in fact, as all laws which at once fetter our commerce and prevent the labouring man from cheaply obtaining all articles of subsistence, from corn down to sugar, and tea, and coffee—until these laws are altered, depend upon it, neither the security of our commerce nor the subsistence of our people stand on any foundation upon which they can permanently and enduringly rest. (Cheers.) And, therefore, I say the present calm is a perfidious calm, the present silence is a delusive silence; it is a silence which often precedes the storm—it is a silence which is oftentimes the herald of the whirlwind. (Hear, hear.) We have been accused, indeed, of somewhat adding to that storm during the late evils which have beset the country. We have been accused, at least some of my hon. friends—men whose conduct I not only vindicate but revere—my hon. friends Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and others. (Cheers.) These gentlemen, I say, have been accused of traversing the country, and of making it the scene of almost universal agitation. But my friends have done the greatest possible good they could to their country. (Cheers.) What is the agitation that they have produced? It is a wholesome agitation of the atmosphere—it is an agitation which prevents the people from being lulled into the stagnant condition of a calm—it is the agitation of the stream which, by flowing clearly, works itself into purity—it is the agitation of the tide which gives animation, and spirit, and life to the ocean of commerce over which it prevails. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, this has been the result of the efforts—of the patriotic efforts—of my hon. friends Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright. (Hear, hear.) They diffused information, they excited curiosity where information and curiosity had never spread or existed before; they have gone throughout our manufacturing districts; they have ventured even within the hitherto interdicted confines of the estates of our squires, and amongst men of such colossal magnitude as the lords of this country, and, I was going to say, of such impenetrable obscurity as our squires; and, moreover, they have gone among their tenantry and peasantry to disseminate the principles which have emanated from the Anti-Corn-Law League, and taught them that neither their tenantry nor their peasantry were interested in maintaining high prices for food. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I maintain that for doing so my hon. friends are entitled to the thanks and esteem of their countrymen. (Cheers.) I maintain that, in distant parts of this country, the tenants and peasantry had not only no idea of the importance of this question, but no idea of their own natural rights—almost as men. I maintain that the tenantry never thought, as the tenantry of Scotland thought, of looking for long leases until this Anti-Corn-Law agitation arose. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) It was that which first dispelled the darkness—the settled darkness which hitherto prevailed and obscured their minds. (Hear, hear.) It was not till then, when this agitation arose, that the peasantry of this country began to think that they might be better for the altering of the laws interdicting the supply of food, and of preventing their enjoyment of the common necessities of life. (Hear, hear.) Therefore all this enlightenment, which poured in like a flood throughout the agricultural districts of the country, is due to the efforts of the League, led on by those undaunted leaders—those indefatigable patriots—my hon. friends Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright. (Loud cheers.) Although we now appear before you in times when this agitation may not be so all-powerful as it would be in those of general distress, we do yet appear before you in times when, as we conceive, there are good and valid reasons why this agitation should continue, and why you should demand, in a firmer and a sterner manner, a repeal of the Corn Laws, and an alteration of all those laws which oppress our commerce and impede the unrestricted flow of our manufactures. I look around me, beyond the bounds of our own nation, and I ask whether I see no reason there for such a course of policy. I see the manufactures of America extending themselves with the gigantic power which always marks the onward stride of that colossal country, which almost seems too great for a country in which the free institutions of England have been carried to the excess of free democracy. Gentlemen, whatever we may think of our own manufacturing supremacy, depend upon it there is one nation whom an urgent and impetuous desire for accumulation will drive onward to follow us, if not to overtake us, in our path of advancement and in our manufacturing and commercial improvements; that country which is the offspring of our own soil—its inhabitants the descendants of our forefathers—the natives of the United States of America—men who have inherited only to extend the liberties which they originally derived from England—men of such indefatigable energy that I may venture to call them, in a short phrase, not only Englishmen, but as it were ultra-Englishmen—men who pushed forward the energies which they have derived from the soil on which we now tread, and who are destined to become our greatest rivals, as they were once in war, so also in peace, in commercial arts and manufacturing supremacy: with that nation we have now to contend as the most formidable rival in manufactures and in those articles in which we have hitherto maintained so easy an ascendancy. America, whether we regard the great coal tracts she is now opening, and in which we have hitherto stood supreme, or the extent of the iron which she is now bringing into active employment for the production of machinery—America now, in my opinion, is the most formidable manufacturing rival which this country has to fear; and at the very moment in which I am speaking—while we ourselves are not extending by a single treaty the sphere and limits of our trade—America is interchanging a commercial treaty of great advantage to herself with the whole of that which is commonly called the Zollverein, or, in other words, the great commercial confederacy of United Germany. (Hear, hear.) Thus they are linked together—thus they are making new advances, while we are slumbering; and is it to be endured that Government and Parliament should sleep while our commercial opponents are actively awake, exerting all their energies to distance us in the race of manufacturing superiority in which we have hitherto maintained, as we think, so easy a supremacy and power? (Cheers.) America thus opens to herself, at once, a market of 27 millions of people for her tobacco and manufactures. And, in the meantime, what treaty has been concluded in favour of this nation? None, absolutely none. ("Shame," and "Hear, hear.") All we say is, that we should be received on the footing—to use a common commercial phrase—of the most favoured of commercial nations: that is, that we should be received on the same footing as those who are not favoured at all. (Hear, hear.) Then what are we to expect? What resources are we to look to? Our Ministers have in vain attempted to unite our commerce with that of other nations by means of treaties—treaties which have not succeeded,—so that the only course which remains open is to adopt the policy which was not only whispered in Downing-street, but uttered in the House of Commons;—the simple policy expounded long ago by Franklin, repeated by Pitt, and at last reiterated by Sir Robert Peel;—the simple principle that we should buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest which we can find. (Hear.) Gentlemen, our Ministers are, indeed, accused sometimes by their friends, and sometimes complimented by their foes, with being Free-Traders. (Laughter.) I give them full credit for all that they do. I only wish they were more open in carrying into practice, as they do not hesitate to speculate in theory on the advantages of Free Trade. (Hear.) Gentlemen, we have one Minister who makes the declaration we have just quoted; we have another Minister who tells us that the principles of Free Trade are the principles of common sense; we may possibly have another Minister who writes in favour of the general principles of freedom of trade; and we may even have had a Minister who has declared so far as this, that even the smuggler is an instrument—an unconscious instrument—in the hands of Providence to vindicate, against the unjust laws of man, the justice of the laws of nature. (Protracted cheering.) If all these principles have been declared by all those Ministers, why are they not acted upon? (Hear.) I cannot conceive a more ridiculous position than that of a Minister who, in his own office, while writing secretly in favour of Free Trade, should perchance be visited by some of his political supporters who are the greatest opponents to the extension of commerce. I can conceive the great embarrassment which he would feel when thus writing one thing and silently listening to another. (Hear, hear, hear.) The position of such a Minister when thus surprised, possibly in writing articles in favour of Free Trade for some periodical publication, would very much resemble a scene in a play, which has often been performed on the boards of this theatre—I mean the play of "The Rivals," in which a young lady, suddenly surprised with a number of contraband works, exclaiming to her attendant on the stage, "Stow the 'Delicate Embarrassment' within 'The New Duty of Man.'" (Loud laughter.) I can conceive that this would form a fair parallel to the predicament of a Minister thus interrupted by the ingress of some monopolist who surprises him in the performance of a duty to his country in which he has forgotten his duty to his party. (Cheers.) Well then, gentlemen, I maintain not only that Government and Parliament ought to do to the abolition of the Corn Laws as the most effectual remedy which can possibly be devised for the commercial and fiscal evils of this country, but I maintain also that they ought to look to the removal of such oppressive duties as those on sugar, tea, and coffee, and the duties on all articles which contribute to the subsistence of the people; and moreover on those articles above all, which, in consequence of the high duties imposed on them, offer an absolute inducement for the natives of this country to defraud the revenue and the honest tradesman, and lead the honest peasant to become the dishonest smuggler. (Cheers.) I maintain, that the first duty of the Government and the Parliament of this country is—to watch over the subsistence, and to promote by its laws the morals of the people. (Hear, hear.) And I am the more led to insist on the iniquity of these laws, because, while we maintain oppressive duties on articles such as tea, sugar, and coffee, the burden does not in the least degree, or scarcely at all, fall on the rich man, but almost exclusively on the poor. (Hear.) These duties fall on the poor because they raise the price to them in a much more serious manner than to the rich. That is the first mode in which they oppress them; and the second mode is this: that, while the rich man has for the money which he expends in these articles a tolerably pure article, the poorer classes, and still more the poorest of all, have a mixed, a manufactured, an impure, and an adulterated article. (Cheers.) There is not one of the articles to which I have alluded, scarcely, that is not sold pure to the rich man, and impure to the poor. The poor man's sugar is mingled with ingredients of such a nature as sometimes almost to destroy its saccharine qualities; and I have seen myself and had in my hand specimens of the sugar commonly sold to the poor of this country, which exhibited some approach to the saccharine quality, but which in reality contained no produce of the sugar-cane at all. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") Now, can there be a more cruel, a more unjust contrast than this, that in the city in which we now are, the person who can afford to pay for it receives the article unmixed, while the poorest man of all receives, as we descend in the silent gradations of poverty lower and lower still, an impure and an impurer article, until at last it becomes so bad—that it is changed into another—deleterious, perhaps poisonous, but at all events deleterious; and the person is thus compelled by sad necessity of the laws of the country, to purchase it. (Hear, hear.) If we take the article of coffee, we find that of the rich man unmixed; and why? because he goes and buys, to use a common phrase—excuse me if I am necessarily obliged to be familiar on this occasion—he buys the "berry," has it ground in his own house, and enjoys the pure article. But look at the poor man:—He goes to a shop where he must buy the article ground, where it is mixed and rendered impure, or he may be compelled to take his breakfast at the corner of the street, where he gets it as impure as possible. And yet we have no means of counteracting the oppressive nature of these duties, which fall most unjustly and oppressively on the poor. (Hear, hear.) There is another article, that of tea. The rich man has his tea unmixed, and comparatively pure; he has his souehong, while the poor man has to purchase his congou. The poor man, being of a lower grade in society, is less likely to get the article pure, and is more certain to have to swallow it down impure. This, gentlemen, I say, is an injustice, a most gross injustice. (Cheers.) The first object of legislation, as Burke said, ought to be the poor; but with us they seem to be the last. (Hear, hear.) Then let us descend to another article on which these oppressive duties fall—I mean the article of tobacco—that Nicotian weed, which we owe originally to Sir Walter Raleigh, who introduced it for the amusement of the wealthy, but which is now used by the lowest class of society. Blame its use if you please—call it the noxious weed—call it by what name you like—still it is that whence the poor man derives solace and comfort; it ought to be lightly taxed, but it is taxed to the enormous amount of 800 per cent. upon its value. (Hear, hear.) I have had the honour of sitting in a committee of the House of Commons on the interesting subject of tobacco. Tobacco formed our morning's dream—tobacco formed the subject almost of our evening slumber, or, at all events, of our evening's meditation (laughter)—and on tobacco we have been hearing evidence of the various qualities, with the vocabulary of which I will not recreate your minds or entertain your ears. On this subject we have been engaged to the extent of a two months' duration inquiry; and I can only say, from all, at least, which has been shown me, that while the tobacco of the rich man comes into his hands comparatively in the nature of a pure article, the tobacco of the poor man, thus loaded with duty, is entirely changed, mixed, and adulterated: it is possibly smuggled (if it is smuggled it is the best he can get); if not smuggled it is sold in its component characteristics, and he is obliged to inhale that in its deleterious condition which the rich man inhales pure. (Hear, hear.) Well then, I would ask, are these just laws? (Cries of "No, no.") These laws are not only oppressive to the people as regards impediments to their subsistence, but, gentlemen, they are temptations to the immorality of the people. (Hear.) The people are tempted to become dishonest smugglers; and can we expect to find those who are thus led into temptation—can we expect to find in them the virtue of resistance? ("No, no," and cheers.) But these laws are not only anti-commercial and anti-social, they are oppressive on the people, taking away from them subsistence in one shape and recreation in another, and tempting them to immorality; and I hold that there cannot be a greater condemnation of the laws of any country, whether emanating from a monarchy, aristocracy, or democracy, than those laws which tempt people to do wrong, and then punish them for doing so. (Cheering.) My honourable friend Mr. Villiers, with whom I had the happiness to sit in a committee of the House of Commons touching the import duties—Mr. Villiers, I say, could show you how, in the articles of spirits and silks, the duties were so oppressive that they actually tempt the people to smuggle them into this country. (Hear, hear, hear.) Now, gentlemen, I ask, ought these temptations to continue, when, on the one hand, by removing them you remove temptation to do wrong from the people, and on the other hand, extend the sphere of commerce by allowing the people of France, Belgium, and America freely to import spirits, and silks, and tobacco into this country, thus calling into activity thousands of ships and of seamen which were unemployed before; thus extending the commerce of the country, while it tends to reduce the amount of temptation and immorality? (Cheers.) Well then, gentlemen, I would remove these duties, and I contend that we have a right to expect from Government some comprehensive plan by which such obnoxious duties may be removed. (Hear, hear.) First of all, the subsistence and the morality of the people should be attended to, and then an end should be put to monopoly. Next, all colonial monopoly should be abolished. Fifteen years have passed away since you paid compensation to the colonial monopolists, and you expected to receive your own compensation in the freedom of commerce. (Hear.) Gentlemen, you paid twenty millions, and you have received nothing. You have, indeed, received the proudest of all modern rewards—the greatest reward which can possibly be contemplated by a benevolent and enlightened mind—the emancipation of one hundred millions of your fellow-creatures. (Hear, hear.) Let it not be supposed that I place in the balance against such a consummation anything like the—I might almost call it—paltry amount with which we redeemed from slavery a long-suffering and a long-injured people. (Hear, hear.) I maintain that you not only paid that price for their liberation, but for your own. You not only paid your twenty millions sterling as the price of their emancipation, but as the price of your own. If they were to have the iron fetters for ever taken from their hands—the slaves, I mean—you should have the commercial fetters shaken off your hands. But no! while the slaves have been set free, your commerce has been restricted, and, unless you rise and demand its liberation, will continue thus shackled, and fettered, and pent up, until nothing short of compulsion induces the Government of this country to redeem the pledge which they originally gave. (Hear, hear.) Well, then, gentlemen, how are you to call into action the full force of your colonial enterprise?—how are you to bring out the latent energies which now are hidden in your colonies? By one short magic word, gentlemen—"competition." (Cheers.) They ask for immigration of labourers; they ask you to wait awhile, and pause, and continue this monopoly. Give them, if they like, the immigration of labourers; let them get them if they honestly can; give them these, if you will, but give them also competition. (Cheers.) Nothing will call into active vigour the energies of the West Indies and the resources of this country, or of any other, except the principle of competition which is the soul of all trade, the animating principle of all enterprise. (Cheers.) So long as they continue monopolists they will remain sluggards. Despotism may bind up the hands of men, but monopoly fetters, rusts, corrodes, and eats into the soul and spirit of commerce. (Cheers.) But are there no other persons to whom this principle of competition should be extended? Yes, gentlemen, I would extend it to another race of men, and that is to the landlords of this country: let them enter into the market of competition, and open it fairly with the corn-producers of other countries. (Cheers.) Until that is done you can neither know your own resources, energies, nor enterprise. Call upon them—and I trust you will do so successfully—to meet foreign nations on the free ground of competing trade, and you will then summon into active existence new energies and new powers. (Hear, hear.) Call them out, and you will see what this country will produce. Why, gentlemen, the agitation—not the thing itself—not the substance but the shadow—the name of competition has been whispered throughout the length of this land by those who have agitated in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws—the very name and shadow of competition has called out energies unknown to them before. (Cheers.) Now, gentlemen, they begin to bestir themselves, like men who long have been asleep, or, to borrow words far superior to any that I could use,

As men wont to watch,
On duty sleeping caught by whom they dread,
Rouse and bestir themselves ere well awake."

(Cheers.) So it is with the agricultural interest of this country. They have roused and bestirred themselves—they are draining and projecting improvements, and they are devising mechanical adaptations to the various exigencies of agriculture which they never dreamed of before. Why have they been roused to this sudden extent of unwonted energy? Because they hear afar off the distant murmurs of the yet remote sound of competition; they heard them in the distance, and if in the distance it produced such a wonderful result, what must it be in effect when it comes to practical application? ("Hear, hear," and applause.) Gentlemen, the Anti-Corn-Law League have raised this magic sound, and disturbed the almost perennial slumbers of the agriculturists; and the League will not recede until not only they have taught them to see the distant shadow, but to meet boldly, and like Englishmen, to contend with the formidable substance of competition; and when they have thus met it openly and like Englishmen they will vanquish. (Hear, hear.) So long as it continues the shadow of that at which, like children, they tremble, they will not exert their energies or awaken their courage, but will remain in the same passive and dormant state in which they were found when the Anti-Corn-Law League first dawned upon their slumbers. (Hear, hear.) On these grounds we call upon you to support the cause of Free Trade. I do not restrict my observations to the Anti-Corn-Law League. I hold the League to be synonymous with, and at least approximating to Free Trade. I trust that the doctrines of Free Trade generally, inclusive of the abolition of the Corn Laws, are now beginning to be received as axioms in this country. They are now no longer a problem: they are the bases of future problems. (Hear, hear.) I trust, ere long, to see Free-Trade associations, having for their object the most extensive commercial intercourse with foreign nations, the most extensive employment for our manufacturers, and, as a consequence, the most active development of agricultural industry, extending from one end of the land to the other. Gentlemen, these things all must have a beginning; this great association commenced at Manchester, it extended itself to London; it is now extending itself all over England; its principles are extending themselves all over the world; and these, gentlemen, are the principles of freedom of trade, the basis and foundation of which may be said to rest on the Anti-Corn-Law League of this country. (Cheers.) I myself have seen translated into the Spanish language all the evidence of the House of Commons taken on the subject of Free Trade, and also in the languages of other countries. I have seen the name of my hon. friend Mr. Villiers, the name of my hon. friend near him (Mr. Bright), the name of Mr. Hume, nay, I was astonished, and perhaps puzzled, to see my own name also circulated, with all the questions which were put, and all the answers which were given, throughout Spain, in a translation for the benefit of, I might almost say, that illustrious but most benighted country. (Hear, hear.) We call on you to extend commerce, manufactures, and agriculture at home, to extend the principles of Free Trade and of peace,—peace, gentlemen, which is the great consummation, the great triumph, and the glory of the principles of Free Trade. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, we Free-Trade are the friends of peace (renewed cheering); we rejoice in that title; we wish to explode the opposite anti-social notion, we wish to live together, not in the iron fetters of restriction, we wish to be linked together, but in the golden chain of mutual dependency. (Cheers.) These, gentlemen, are our doctrines; these are the doctrines which link us to foreign nations; these are the doctrines which should be our triumph and our pride. And, gentlemen, what is our triumph at home? It is this, that we maintain the principles of Free Trade, peacefully agitating, contending wisely and harmoniously from the centre to the circumference of this country. Ours are the principles of peace and of good order. (Cheers.) For we maintain that, with the extent of our commerce and manufactures, the good order as well as the enlightenment of this country is increased also. I maintain that, during the late severe trials of the manufacturing districts of this country, it was the greatest triumph which the human mind almost could conceive or human efforts accomplish, to see, notwithstanding privations and sufferings not only unfelt but also unimagined before, the quiet and peace which pervaded those districts. (Hear, hear.) I fear that, if the same temptations to disorder had existed among the ignorant and unenlightened agricultural population, they would have applied the firebrand instead of submitting with patience to their sufferings. Depend upon it, the doctrines of Free Trade are those which inculcate those principles of sound sense which teach the people that there is no rule of permanent liberty which is not consonant with good order, and that, if we are to vanquish in the strife in which we are engaged, we must vanquish with doctrines that are consonant with tranquillity and peace. (Cheers.) These are our principles—these we lay before you—these we lay before the country—and we call upon you for your sincere, enthusiastic, and almost, I might say, unanimous support. (Cheers.) If you know your own interest you will support principles such as these; but whether they be supported now or not, whether they are only destined for the present moment to have a species of temporary popularity, and afterwards to lose their impression on the minds of a portion of the people of this country, convinced I am that they will eventually triumph, and that the people of this country will not forget that their nearest and dearest interest, and that of their wives, their families, and their descendants, are intimately and indissolubly connected with the doctrines and the principles of Free Trade. (Cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN said: Our friend Howard Elphinstone, Esq., the member for Lewes, will now address you.

HOWARD ELPHINSTONE, Esq., M.P., then came forward, and on approaching the table was greeted with a burst of applause. When the enthusiasm had subsided he said:—Ladies and gentlemen, after the very able speech of our friend Mr. Ewart, I should feel, perhaps, more hesitation than I now do in addressing you upon the present occasion did not I feel convinced that I do not yield either to him or to our excellent chairman in the deep conviction which I entertain of the injustice of that system of Corn Laws which inflicts the double wrong upon the people of making their food dear, whilst by diminishing employment it renders the wages of labour cheap. (Cheers.) Now I must say, when we consider the fact that there are in this country no less than one million and a half of our fellow-subjects receiving alms in the workhouses as paupers, I think that every reflecting man must be of opinion that there is something morally wrong in the social condition of this country (cheers); and when I know, as every man here present must know, the great skill and the great industry of the working classes in this country; when I see also an abundance of capital in this country, which is only waiting for employment, I am one of those persons who think that the evils we complain of result from the bad laws and bad legislation which have been pressing for so many years upon the productive industry and productive ingenuity of this country. (Cheers.) Now, various persons who are legislators in this country, and who have an interest in the continuance of the present monopolies, have proposed different remedies against this state of things. Some persons—exceedingly well meaning, I have no doubt—have proposed what they call a system of emigration—that is to say, they wish the poorer classes in this country to leave the homes of their forefathers; and they wish you to believe, as sensible and thinking men, that it is easier to remove the men, women, and children from this country to countries where they can obtain food, than to bring the food to this country, where the people have been accustomed to live. (Cheers.) I think, before the experiment, at least, is tried, that it would be as well to try the more simple one of making use of our commercial industry by sending our ships to foreign lands, and by bringing home to this country the produce of those lands, to endeavour to give to our people the food of which they are so much in need. (Loud cheers.) This project, owing, perhaps, to the exertions of the Anti-Corn-Law League, has been what is called "blown up." (A laugh.) Another project, however, has been started. Several persons—some very well meaning and estimable in every respect—have brought forward what is termed "the factory question." Under the pretence of being the friends of the people, they have introduced the ten hours system. Now, I believe no proposition was ever made, either in the House of Commons or out of the House of Commons, more likely to do such harm to the working classes of this country. (Hear, hear.) I believe there is nothing so mischievous as to attempt any interference with industry and labour upon the part of the Legislature. (Cheers.) I need not go, before you, into all the arguments of this question; but I think there is one which is almost irresistible. Nearly all you obtain in this country is produced by the labour of your workmen. By a ten hours bill you will diminish their hours of labour, and consequently you will diminish that which they can produce by one-sixth in the course of the week; that is to say, the goods which are produced by the energies of the workmen will be one-sixth less than they would be if this mischievous enactment did not take place. The consequence is, that all other classes in the community would have one sixth less of the goods made by the workmen to enjoy for the benefit of themselves and their families. (Cheers.) It appears to me that both the nostrums of these quacks in legislation will be failures. (Cheers.) I believe that the only sound principle by which you can relieve the distresses of the working classes in this country is, by adopting a really good system of Free Trade; because, by adopting a system of Free Trade, you encourage manufactures, you give employment to the people, and, by giving them employment and finding a use for the faculties with which they are endowed, you enable them to support themselves and their families in peace, plenty, and comfort. (Loud cheers.) Now, it is rather curious that the persons who have made these laws, if you look through the different provisions in the statute-book, have, upon every occasion, endeavoured to benefit themselves at the expense of the other classes of society. (Hear, hear, hear.) I should like to call your attention, in the first instance, to what is called the "land tax." (Cheers.) You are well aware that, in almost every civilised country in Europe, the land pays the greatest part of the burdens of the state. If you take France, for instance, if you take the greatest part of the states in despotic Germany, or even if you take Italy, you will find that, in almost all, the public burdens are paid by means of the land tax; and that was originally the intention in England. (Cheers.) When the present land tax was imposed, it was imposed upon the principle that it should be at the rate of 4s. in the pound, or one-fifth of the rental; but the landowners, when they made the last enactment upon this subject, saw that the trade of the country was going to increase, and that their own rents were likely in a series of years to rise; they therefore persuaded the House of Commons and the House of Lords to pass resolutions to the intent that the land tax for the future should not be increased; so that the rental at that time being, I believe, about ten millions, they succeeded in persuading the two Houses of Parliament that the land tax should only amount for ever to the permanent sum of about two millions a year; whilst if such a law had not been passed, and the principle had continued to be acted upon the same as when the tax was originally imposed, inasmuch as the rental cannot at present be less than some forty or fifty millions, the tax would have been not less than some eight or ten millions. (Cheers.) I say that this, in my humble judgment, is a specimen of that class legislation which, upon so many grounds, has done so much mischief to the best interests of the country. (Loud cheers.) Now, if it were not troubling you too much, I would call your attention to another point somewhat connected with this subject, which I thought it my duty to bring forward in another place (hear, hear)—I mean the exemption which landowners and landed property now have from what is called "probate duties." (Cheers.) You are aware that, as the law now stands, upon the death of any person who has personal property, a large sum under the name either of "probate duty" or of "legacy duty" is taken from the family and children, and paid into the coffers of the state. That sum, I believe, annually amounts to somewhere about two millions and a quarter; and by a return which has been made to the House of Commons, since this duty was imposed in 1797, no less a sum than £66,835,000 has been taken from the pockets of the people under the name of probate tax. (Cheers.) But whilst this enormous sum has been raised from personal property, landed property has gone entirely scot free; and if you take the value of the land at the showing of these gentlemen themselves, who tell you that it is the most important interest and the most valuable property in the country—a proposition which I don't wish to deny—I want to know how, in common fairness, how in common justice, it so happens that whilst one description of property has yielded a produce of sixty six millions, the other description has paid nothing at all to the exigencies of the state? (Loud and continued cheering.) I must say it does appear to me excessively unjust, that whilst the widow or the children of some poor mechanic who has saved, perhaps, some £100 or £150 in the course of a long and laborious life, are heavily taxed, that the heir apparent to an immense property—perhaps half a million of property—is to pay nothing whatever—to contribute nothing whatever to the maintenance of the state. (Renewed cheers.) I need not multiply these instances from the statute-book, because there are many others; but I wish to say this, that you find, that whilst in all the matters in which these monopolists have a direct interest they exclaim against Free Trade, and form associations to resist the doctrines of Free Trade, yet that, in matters where they have no direct interest in monopoly, they are the very first persons to take advantage of Free Trade, and of the commerce and the mercantile property of this country. (Cheers.) We all know that to-morrow will be the birthday of our most gracious Majesty (cheers); and just let me ask you all to mark what will take place in the drawing-room which will be held at St. James's to-morrow, when the ladies of this country will, with great propriety, wait upon their Sovereign to congratulate her upon her natal day. Take the proudest duchess in the land, you will see her covered with diamonds—it is her pleasure to wear diamonds. They don't tell you, when they buy diamonds from foreign countries, that they wish to see a heavy tax imposed upon their introduction. (Cheers and laughter.) Take the article plumes, with which they will be decorated; there is no "ostrich law" against the introduction of those plumes which will wave upon that occasion. (Cheers.) Take the shoes of the ladies; you have only to walk in the city of Westminster, and you will see shop after shop filled with French shoes; you will find that the sellers of French shoes in this metropolis are driving a very flourishing trade; and I am glad they are doing so: I don't object to their driving a flourishing trade; but I do object to this, that when it suits the interest of legislators, or their families, to admit certain articles, they should not think also of the wants and feelings of the humbler classes, and extend to them the same liberty which they themselves make use of. (Loud cheers.) I was walking to-day in company with a Conservative friend of mine (a laugh, in which the hon. gentleman himself joined);—well, I am one of those who think that politics should never sever friendship (cheers);—however, I was walking down St. James's-street with a Conservative friend of mine, when he pointed out the great beauty of a very fine erection, called "the Junior Conservative Club." Now, this club, as I dare say you all know, is to be the place where the Corn-Law League, the Anti-Free-Traders, are to have their great political club;—it is here that those persons who are leagued together in supporting the present system of Corn Laws, who are leagued together to put down the doctrines of Free Trade, intend to make their common place of resort. But what did I see here? The beauty of the building was pointed out—my friend said, "What beautiful stone that building is erected with." I said, "Where did that stone come from?" Oh, the stone came from Caen, in Normandy! (Loud cheers.) So that, in the very place in which it is intended to put down the doctrines of Free Trade and of commercial prosperity, they are encouraging commercial enterprise by bringing from a foreign country stone which they cannot find in this. (Cheers.) Now, I don't blame them for doing so; I think, if they can find stone in Caen better suited for their purpose than any they can obtain here, that they are perfectly right in procuring it; but then I ask them to remember that the people of this country will consider that certain other things may be got from abroad which are better for them than what they get here (cheers); they may consider, perhaps, that we have little corn in this country, and that of so bad a description, that our poor mechanics would be greatly benefited by having the corn of Poland or America: I want them to apply to you the same doctrines which they apply to themselves. (Loud cheers.) So much has been said in relation to corn in this place that I won't weary you with any remarks upon that subject; I think every person of common sense, whether man, woman, or child, must have come to this opinion, that it is wrong to tax the first necessary of life; and that you are bound to take off entirely the duty on corn, in order to increase the employment of the labouring classes in this country. (Cheers.) I should wish to say a few words upon another matter which is almost equally a necessary of life—I mean sugar (cheers); and I wish to call your attention to the subject of sugar for this reason, that I think a great deal of very unnecessary, what we may call, "cant" has been made use of in reference to it. (Hear, hear, hear.) I believe that it can be proved by reference to any of the prices current of the day, that you are now paying for the sugar which the laws of this country compel you to take from the West Indies somewhere about 3d. per lb. more than if you bought it in the free market of the world; so that, if you take the consumption of sugar at its present amount, I believe you would find that the extra amount you pay to the West Indians for their sugar above what you would have to pay if you were allowed to buy it in the Brazils or elsewhere, is about five millions a year. (Cheers.) Now, these five millions a year are paid to those persons to whom you have already given twenty millions for getting rid of slavery; so that, in point of fact, this tax pays the same compensation over and over again to them at the end of every four years. (Cheers.) Now, when the people of this country came forward so generously to put down slavery, that foul curse of humanity, they did not mean that that sum of twenty millions was to be paid over and over again: they thought they had made a final settlement of the question (hear, hear); and I venture to say, if any person had proposed, when that sum of twenty millions was agreed upon, that an additional tax at the end of every four years to the same amount should be paid, he would have been laughed to scorn. (Cheers.) But our legislators had managed the matter in a much easier way; they did not apply to Parliament for renewed compensation, but they said, "We will take care by our laws that you don't get sugar from any country except our own, and by this means we will take care that every four years we shall put an additional twenty millions into our own pockets." (Cheers.) Now, a great deal has been said in relation to sugar upon the subject of slavery. I am one of those who wish slavery to be put down in whatever country or climate it may be found to exist. I look upon it as the foul blot and curse of humanity. (Cheers.) But I want to know how am I putting down slavery by enacting that we shall not take the sugar of the Brazils for consumption in this country, when we admit it to be refined here, and then to be exported to others, and when we bring back in return for it the money of other countries to be expended here? I say that we are doing no such thing as preventing slavery, but that we are rather setting up slavery in the Brazils; because you all know that, in addition to Brazil, where slavery exists, there are countries which produce sugar where no slavery exists. There can't be two prices for goods in the market of the world; and as I firmly believe that free labour is cheaper than slave labour, so I believe that the sugar of Manilla, and other colonies where there is free labour, might be produced cheaper than the sugar of Brazil, where there is slave labour. Then, to compete with Manilla, they would be obliged to put down slavery in the Brazils. (Cheers.) I trust that I have said enough upon the present occasion to give you good grounds, at least every one here, for being members of the Corn-Law League.

The CHAIRMAN: The Anti-Corn-Law League.

Mr. ELPHINSTONE: My hon. friend says the Anti-Corn-Law League. You all know what I mean—the League for putting down the present system of Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) Now, I have always observed that great principles in this country can only be carried by associations. In former times the great question of Catholic emancipation was only carried by the Catholic Association in Ireland. (Cheers.) The relief of the civil disabilities of Dissenters was only carried by their associating themselves together to obtain redress by every legal means. (Cheers.) The same course which succeeded in obtaining the removal of their grievances, and which afterwards succeeded to a certain extent in carrying a certain measure of parliamentary reform, is that by which we hope to obtain the repeal of those laws which now press so heavily upon the industry of the country. (Cheers.) Whatever may be the attacks that are made upon the Anti-Corn-Law League, whether through good report or through evil report, we shall still go on in the same course that we have hitherto adopted. We see that gradually larger masses of the people are becoming convinced of the soundness of our opinions, and we confidently expect that by renewed exertions, and by persevering in the duty of endeavouring to promulgate our opinions in every possible and every legal way, we shall be doing that which must prove beneficial to the interests of this great country. (The hon. member resumed his seat amidst loud and reiterated applause.)

The CHAIRMAN then came forward and said: Mr. Moore will now have the honour of addressing the meeting.

ROBERT R. R. MOORE upon coming forward was received with the most rapturous applause: silence having been obtained, the learned gentleman proceeded as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, one would think that there could scarcely be a plainer or more self-evident proposition than that we have a right to as much of the world's produce as our labour can procure for us in the open markets of the world (hear); and yet it is to carry into effect this very simple proposition that all this organisation of the League has been formed, and all its gigantic efforts are made. Our demand is, that the people of England should be allowed to carry the produce of their industry to all the markets of the world, and to purchase unhindered in the most abundantly supplied markets whatsoever of the world's produce they may require. (Cheers.) The moment we make this request, we are immediately accused of all kinds of crimes and misdemeanours (Laughter.) We are called "destructives," "revolutionists," and are represented as a violent untamed description of people, having no regard for any of the rights of property, or veneration for the sacred institutions of the country, (Renewed laughter.) One would think at first sight, too, that it was impossible to deny that it was the right of the working man that the produce of his labour should procure him as much of the world's goods as the people of the world were willing to give him. (Hear, hear.) But our opponents do not like to look at the question of Free Trade in so simple a form; they are horrified at the idea of our saying that wages are properly, and that that property is interfered with when you stand between the earner of wages and the abundant markets of the world. They endeavour to make a mystery of this plain question, and to wrap it up in all kinds of confusion; they call standing between the labourer and the best market "protection." They call sending the labourer to a bad market instead of a good one "protection to native industry." They speak in such terms as Mr. Thomas Baring (laughter), the now member for Huntingdon (hisses), used recently upon his return for that borough. That gentleman said, "There was no getting over the fact that unfettered and extensive importations of corn would diminish agricultural labour to a melancholy extent. (Renewed laughter.) And although it reduced the price of bread, what did it matter to the poor whether the loaf was 1d. or 7d. if he had not the means to purchase it?" I do not know whether Mr. Thomas Baring, in the course of the speeches he delivered during the contest in the city of London, made use of any such statement as that which I have just read. (Cries of "No, no.") Probably he reserved the real expression of his opinions in favour of monopoly for a Huntingdon audience. (Hear.) But let us examine and see what this statement means. Mr. Baring says: "There is no getting over the fact that unfettered and extensive importations of corn would diminish agricultural labour to a melancholy extent." There might be no getting over it if it was a fact, but it is not so. It is merely an assertion of Mr. Thomas Baring's, opposed to all experience and to every fact. A fact! I will tell you why this statement is called a fact, and upon what this assertion is founded. The Monopolists and Anti-Leaguers contend that, for every quarter of wheat imported from foreign countries, there would be displaced from our markets a quarter of English wheat; and that, in short, as every man, woman, and child in the country who uses wheat is supposed to consume a quarter of that grain in the year, that every quarter brought from abroad would take a customer from the English farmer; and they go on to contend that, as the customer would thus be taken from the English farmer, his land would be thrown out of cultivation, and his labourers be unemployed. That is the statement which Mr. Baring intends to make when he says there is no getting over the fact—the melancholy fact—that the labourers in this country would be damaged seriously by the repeal of the Corn Laws. But the fact which they have to get over in making that assertion, and a fact that they never will look at, do what you will, is, that there are now eight or ten millions of people in this country who are not customers to the farmer for bread. (Hear.) When Mr. Baring and others say "that there is no getting over the fact, that unfettered and extensive importations of corn would diminish agricultural labour to a melancholy extent," they should first establish it as a fact that every person in this kingdom is supplied with as much agricultural produce as he stands in need of. (Cheers.) They assume that such is the case, contrary to all fact. The report of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the condition of women and children employed in agriculture, states, that in almost all our counties—in Devon, Dorset, Wilts, Somerset, Hampshire, Northumberland, &c.—the people are ill fed, clothed, and housed, very uncertainly employed, and badly paid for their work. The commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the poor in Ireland reported that there were about five millions of people in that country living upon potatoes as their daily food; and Dr. Marsham, of notorious memory, stated that there were ten millions of people in this country who "rejoiced in potatoes," or lived upon oatmeal. (Cries of "Shame.") Now, so long as these individuals are so ill fed, while they continue to live upon coarse and inferior food, and all the wheat grown in this country is, nevertheless, consumed—so long as year by year we import grain from abroad to make up the deficiencies of our own crops, and still do not supply all our people—while this state of things lasts, I cannot see upon what ground a man can presume to say that it is a fact that every quarter of grain brought from abroad would displace a quarter of home-grown corn. (Cheers.) Take it for granted that there are ten millions of people, as Dr. Marsham said there were (and that number remains uncontradicted by any other authority), living upon oatmeal and potatoes; every man, woman, and child of that ten millions would, as all the rest of the community do, consume a quarter of wheat per annum, if they could earn wages enough to buy it; then it is plain you might bring from abroad ten millions of quarters of grain for the supply of those persons; you might bring in that ten millions of quarters, and find ten millions of customers for it who do not now purchase from the farmers of this country, and the whole of that quantity of wheat might be sold, and the English farmer not sell one quarter less than he does now. (Cheers.) But it happens that the case does not rest there. We go a little further yet. We call ourselves, and with good reason, the friends of the farmer. We say that the League is the only organisation in existence which goes the right way to work to assist the farmer, and to lift him and his labourers out of the difficulties in which they are now involved. (Cheers.) The method by which we propose to befriend the farmer is by finding him more customers. We look at these ten millions of ill-fed people, some of them paupers, supported at the farmer's cost, all of them bad customers for his produce, and we say, let us import grain to feed them. (Cheers.) Allow us, in addition to the articles we now import, to bring in grain, and we must then export, in addition to what we now export, goods to pay for that grain. To enable us to export this additional quantity of goods, we must employ a much greater amount of labour, and expend a larger sum in wages than we now do; and thus we contend that, by having liberty to bring in wheat to feed the now oatmeal-and-potato-fed people, we shall find wages for them, and, by so doing, enable them to buy from the English farmer such articles of produce as milk, butter, eggs, cheese, bacon, beef, mutton, which they never taste now. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) Now, we are borne out in this statement by facts. Two years ago we were in the midst of a period of great and bitter distress. Manufactures were at a stand; men were walking about idle and begging; persons were crawling about the workhouses as paupers, who were able, willing, and skilled to work, and the produce of whose labour the world stood in need of. At that period farmers found less sale for the live stock produced upon their farms than they find now, when trade has somewhat revived; and surely it will be admitted by every person present, that as a revival of trade takes into employment a number of people previously unemployed, and finds for the farmers a consumption of beef and mutton which did not previously exist, that an extension of manufactures which would take into employment in trade new people, would make those new people who are now living upon inferior food consumers of the farmer's live stock, and enable him to produce more of such stock, and find a more ready and more steady market. So much for what must be—not for what might be—the result of the demand in this country for the grain produced in foreign lands. (Cheers.) Let no one ever turn your mind for a moment from that fact by any mysteries they may put before you. We cannot get the wheat of Europe or America without paying for it. They will not give it us for nothing. If you repeal the Corn Laws those foreigners will not send their grain here without they are paid the cost of producing it, and also the expense of bringing it here. You cannot get it without paying those two charges, and this cannot be done without employing more people in this country than are now employed. You can pay for it in no other way than by the labour of your people. It will not do for Mr. Baring and others to say that we should not pay for it in our manufactured goods, but in gold. If we did (and I am not going into that question to-night), then we must pay for that gold with our manufactured goods. (Cheers.) And so we must just, after all, make goods to pay for the wheat that we bring into this country. They say that every quarter of wheat brought from abroad must displace a quarter of home-grown wheat. For the last five years we have brought, upon an average, a million and a half of quarters of wheat from abroad, and they do not say that it has displaced a million and a half quarters of home-grown wheat. The fact is, they have no objection to your bringing in a million and a half quarters of wheat from abroad, provided by doing so you in no way interfere with what they call their "effective customers," that is, those who are enabled to pay a high—an unnatural and unfairly high—price for their food. But when you propose to bring in some few millions of quarters of wheat from abroad to supply those who are not reached by what is now grown at home, and brought from abroad under a sliding scale, then they cry out against you, and say that the farmer is about to be ruined; that his customers are going to be taken from him; that his land will be thrown out of cultivation; and that he will be able to employ no more labourers. (Hear, hear.) Whenever any one makes such statements, you should ask them, "Are the labourers employed now?" I have been down lately into the agricultural districts. I have recently been to Exeter; I had no need to speak of manufactures there, the people knew that they once had them, but that they are now nearly extinct in that city. I appealed to the people of Exeter in ten meetings, at which I had the pleasure of addressing them during the late contest—whether the condition of the agricultural labourer was not in itself a sufficient condemnation of the Corn Laws? (Hear.) We have the Standard, the Herald, the Post (laughter), and now and then the Times, standing up and speaking of the men of the League as though they sought to damage the labourers, and as though the Corn Laws had protected the agricultural labourers—as if, under the Corn Law, they sat in the glad sunshine of happiness at their own doors, plenty and comfort smiling upon them, and wants unknown, undreamt of. (Hear, hear.) To read those papers you would imagine that it was only necessary to go into the agricultural districts to obtain evidence in support of the beneficial operation of the Corn Laws upon the agricultural labourer,—to find him in possession of high wages—to see him well clothed and housed—surrounded by well-taught, comfortable, and happy-looking children; and yet, when we go down into the agricultural districts, we find none of these signs of prosperity, but the people are sullen and discontented, and, in fact, it is evident that there is no class upon whom want so bitterly presses as upon them. (Hear, hear, hear.) In that very county to which I have just alluded as having recently visited (Devon), rich as is its land, beautiful as its scenery is, and abundant as are its productions, the average wages of the agricultural labourer is not above 7s. a week. (Hisses, and loud cries of "Shame.") So much, then, for Mr. Baring's statement, that "an unfettered and extensive importation of corn would diminish agricultural labour to a melancholy extent." Where is the proof that it would have this effect? Do these persons pretend to say that the land of this country is now cultivated to its highest extent? Are they prepared to assert that the soil now employs every labourer for which it could find employment? Why, does not the very agricultural report to which I have referred, when speaking of Calce, in North Wiltshire, state that some years ago the farmers were making improvements in their farms, but that now they have lost heart and spirit, and have left off doing so; that not nearly as many labourers are now engaged on the land as it could profitably employ if the farmer had security that his outlay of capital and skill should yield him a profitable return? (Hear, hear, hear.) I have been into nearly every county in the kingdom, and I have not seen one yet—with the exception of some part of the Lothians—of which it could be said that the land was cultivated with anything like common skill. (Hear.) The land of England cultivated to its utmost! Why, travel along the lines of railway, and, look where you will, you will see land which is half swamped—the rushes growing as thick upon it as if every bristling point was saying, "This is agricultural protection! Here, keep to it, protect the old rushes!" (Cheers and laughter.) Go over the whole country and you will find in farms innumerable acres of old pasture land which they call "old ley," which does not produce one half, or at the outside more than two-thirds, the profit to the farmer from the grass which it would do if he were allowed to plough it up and convert it into arable land. There is a gentleman—a farmer—now upon this platform, who told me to-day that on his own farm he has pasture-land which, if he were allowed to break up, would be far more productive in the cultivation of grain than it now is as grass land. (Hear.) There stands the Corn Law, made by the landlords in ignorance of the capability of the land, condemning these old pastures to remain in their present state; and there stand in a state of idleness the men who, under a system of freedom to agriculture and liberty to the farmer to cultivate his land as he thought best, would be fully employed. (Hear.) What, then, do these persons mean by saying that the repeal of the Corn Laws would throw a vast number of labourers out of employment? Why, they know that the labourers are not employed now, and that at present they go about begging for work. From week to week and day to day, in every agricultural county in England, the Poor Law contradicts the statement that all our labourers are employed. (Hear, hear.) I repeat that the labourers are not now employed. Put out of your head altogether the idea that the agricultural labourers of this country are employed as they might be; let no one persuade you that the land of these kingdoms is as well cultivated as it could be. Its cultivation is hampered by the Corn Law. In the first place, the farmer rears upon the Corn Law, satisfied that Parliament will give him certain prices; forgetting all the while that the Legislature has no power to preserve his customers in prosperity. He has thus no spur given to his exertions by competition—no inducement, by the introduction of foreign corn and the general prosperity of the country, to cultivate his land to the utmost possible extent. There he is, a mere serf to his landlord, at whose will he holds his farm, that the landlord may, through the operation of the Corn Laws, pocket all the difference of price which is caused by this false system of protection—there he is, compelled to go up to the poll when an election takes place and vote for whomsoever the landlord may direct him—there he is, exercising his skill upon the land, expending his capital upon it; and, after all, holding his farm upon the chance of the profit being his own, and at the price of the sacrifice of his conscience to the will of his landlord. (Loud cheers.) I will not occupy your time any further with this branch of the argument, which has been strongly forced upon my attention during my stay in Exeter. Let us now leave the agricultural labourers and consider a case applying to London. A society, whose professed object is "protection to British industry," has, it is said, for some time been very active among the Spitalfields weavers. At the first "great meeting" held by that body, at Freemasons' Tavern, a Spitalfields weaver was introduced upon the platform for the purpose of moving a resolution. This man was put forward with the view, first, of proving that the withdrawal of the restrictions upon the silk trade by Mr. Huskisson, in 1824, had greatly damaged the silk weavers; and, secondly, of demonstrating that the working classes of this country are opposed to the present movement in favour of Free Trade. (Laughter.) Now, I do not believe in reality that the Spitalfields weavers are against us, and I have good reason for holding a contrary opinion, for during the city of London election we held a meeting in the very heart of the Spitalfields district, and not one weaver ever stood up to oppose us, but, on the contrary, numbers of them crowded to our meeting, and gave us their hearty support. (Hear, hear, hear.) I rejoice that our opponents have introduced the subject of the effect of Free Trade upon the interests of the silk-weaver. Ever since that occasion I have been anxious for an opportunity of laying before you facts connected with the silk trade, that you might see from them that, so far as we have gone in the direction of free trade in silk, so far that trade has been benefited. (Hear.) Allow me to trouble you with a few simple facts in reference to this subject. From the year 1635 to 1692 the silk trade in this country was entirely free. The silks of the French were not then excluded from this country; they and the Italians sent to England annually from £600,000 to £700,000 worth of silk. That was in the infancy of the manufacture in this country—a period at which people tell us that protection is specially needed to preserve the young and growing manufacture—and yet during the period, from 1635 to 1692, the history of the silk trade proves that its prosperity was greater than it ever subsequently attained when protection was extended to it. (Hear, hear, hear.) In 1692, at the request of certain refugees who had established themselves here, and commenced a silk manufacture in Spitalfields, the importation of French silk into this country was prohibited. Very shortly afterwards the silk of India and China were also excluded from our markets. In 1719, Sir Thomas Lombe and his brothers set up in Derby a throwing-mill. Those gentlemen had discovered the mode of throwing silk practised in Italy. Previous to 1719 the silk throwing business was not carried on in this country at all. This firm not only got a patent from the Government to manufacture thrown silk, but very high duties were put upon all thrown silk coming into this country from Italy and elsewhere. This was done upon the ground that we would throw all the silk we needed for our own weaving, by which means it was stated that vast employment would be found for our people in throwing the silk at home, which otherwise would be imported from Italy. When this patent (which, I believe, was for fourteen years) expired, Government refused to renew it, but paid Sir Thomas Lombe and his company £14,000 as a premium for the good they had done in establishing their throwing-mill at Derby. At that period I think it will be admitted that protection was pretty close; and up to 1766 prohibitory duties remained upon thrown silk, and foreign manufactured silks were not allowed to be brought into this country. Now, to support their own theory our opponents are bound to prove that at that period the silk trade was most prosperous; when no foreign silk could come in, when the very little manufactured raw material had high duties imposed upon it, when the fully manufactured goods were prohibited altogether. Surely, if protectionists be right, then our trade should have extended itself and prospered. But how did it fare? Why, in 1766, there were 7072 looms out of employ in London. There has been no greater distress experienced in the silk trade than that which came upon it when protection was most prevalent; when the restrictive system seemed to be perfect, then you had the silk weaver in the greatest distress. In 1793—and to this I would call your particular attention, tedious as these details may appear (hear)—in 1793 there were 4000 of the Spitalfields weavers idle; and yet, just twenty years before, the Spitalfields weavers went to Parliament, represented their distress, stated that their wages were so low that they could not live upon them; and Parliament, to remedy their distress, had done what the protection-to-British-industry people would have the Legislature do now—they attempted to regulate the rate of wages by law. Parliament had followed the advice that the Post would give now, an act was passed rendering it imperative that every silk manufacturer should pay a rate of wages to be fixed by the magistrates. And they said further, if a manufacturer dared to employ a man out of Middlesex, and gave him lower wages than those settled by the magistrates, he should suffer fine, and, as the case might be, imprisonment. There could not be a more stringent act of Parliament than that to which I have just referred; and yet, twenty years after that act was passed, there were 4000 weavers idle. But there was something more than the fact of 4000 weavers idle—the very workmen who had gone to Parliament, and said, "Fix our wages, don't allow them to be settled by the fair demand for our labour, our masters are tyrants, and they settle our wages, regulate them by law"—why, these very men took themselves from out of the reach of the legislative protection they had caused to be enacted, away from the county of Middlesex—the extent to which the act applied—and went to Paisley, Glasgow, Manchester, and Macclesfield, and there established silk manufactures, and obtained work out of the reach of the very act they themselves had agitated to procure. (Cheers.) To that very Spitalfields Weavers' Wages Act we owe the early establishment of the silk manufactures in those towns. If the Post, the Herald, the Standard, and the protection society had their own way, and could get the wages of the people generally in the country settled by law, the results would be, that the people would have to quit this country and go to some land where the wages were not so meddled with. (Loud cheers.) Parliament settled the wages the weaver should receive in Spitalfields for weaving; but they could not say to men who had capital engaged in the silk trade—or who might have intended to invest their capital in it—"You must employ men at such a rate of wages;" and as they could not compel men to set up in the silk business and employ labourers, so the silk weavers had to go and look for work elsewhere, and had to run away from their own protection act. (Cheers.) Now, in 1816 there was still great protection. The duty, then, upon thrown silk, was 14s. 7½d. apound, and upon raw silk, 4s.; and French manufactured goods were prohibited. Let us see how the weaver fared in 1816. We are continually told, by these protection-to-British-industry people, that we Free-Traders, whenever we have proceeded a step in the direction of our principles, have done injury to the working classes. Let us see how the weavers stood in 1816. There was a meeting at the Mansion-house on the 26th of November, in that year, to consider the distress of the Spitalfields weavers. Two-thirds of them were stated by the secretary to be then without employment or the means of support. Recollect that that was under a system of high protection. It was further stated that some had deserted their houses in despair, unable to endure the sight of their starving families; and many pined, languishing under diseases brought on by the want of food and clothing." Sir T. F. Buxton made a speech at that meeting, in which he stated that the distress among the silk manufacturers was so intense that "it partook of the nature of a pestilence, which spreads its contagion around and devastated an entire district." (A voice: "Yes, I know that was true.") That was in 1816, under high protection; and never since that period have the Spitalfields weavers been worse off than they then were. The law made silk very dear, so that it could be worn only by the very rich. The slightest change of fashion threw upon hand the stock that the manufacturer possessed, and he had no foreign market to which he could send it. This change in fashion threw the burden upon the operative weaver; and because his customers, as those acquainted with the silk trade know to their cost, were few, the slightest change was soon felt. He had not a large market to go to and sell his goods as he now has; and periods of distress were perpetual in their occurrence, and were more bitter than they have ever been since. (Hear, hear.) Now, I ask those protectionists—those protectors of British industry—those men who would put up Spitalfields weavers at protection meetings—whether they have considered these facts? Have they looked back to the history of the silk trade, have they studied this question for themselves? What do they mean by saying that the extension in some small degree of the principles of Free Trade to the silk-manufacture has distressed the silk weaver? They never have been so distressed since the change in the duties was made, as they were in 1793, in 1815, and 1816; these were their periods of greatest depression, and at the same time of highest protection. (Hear.) Let us take one other period, and I have done with this silk question. In 1824, as I stated, Mr. Huskisson determined to make reductions in the silk duty. He was told, just as we are now when we ask for a repeal of the Corn Laws, that it would throw the spinners, throwsters, and weavers out of employment. In that year, however, he reduced the duty on thrown silk to 7s. 6d.; in 1826 he still further reduced it to 5s., and he reduced the duty on raw silk to 3d. per lb. Manufactured silks were to be admitted at 30 per cent. ad valorem. In 1825 there were 780,000 spindles employed in Manchester in throwing silk; and in 1835, ten years afterwards, there were employed 1,180,000 spindles. In 1825 the duty on thrown silk was 14s. 7½d., that high sum being intended to keep the thrown silk of Italy and France out of this country, and to give a large manufacture of thrown silk to our own people; under that high duty we employed 780,000 spindles, while under the low duty which we were told would throw the people out of work, we see that 10 years afterwards there were employed 1,180,000 spindles. In 1825 there were 10 weaving establishments in Manchester, employing 500 hands each; then the silk of France was prohibited. In 1835 there were 30 silk weaving establishments in that town, employing 500 hands each; that was under a system by which French silk was admitted into this country. So that while the high protection was on, and French silk was prohibited, there were in Manchester 3000 people employed in weaving silk; but when the protection was low and the French silk was admitted, 15,000 people were engaged in weaving silk. Now, with these facts before them, what do men mean by standing up amongst Spitalfields weavers, and trying to persuade them to join in the cry for protection to British industry? British industry wants no protection. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) British industry—from the least skilled and worst paid agricultural labourer, to the most ingenious and best remunerated maker and inventor of machinery in this country—needs no protection. It wants liberty; it requires room to work. It demands to be free, and that its share in the world's produce should be held sacred. That is its protection. It wants the protection that nature has given it, when it has made men wish to have in return for all they can make, the very best of everything they can get. (Renewed cheers.) But look again at this silk question; the case is not complete yet. In 1821, 1822, and 1823, we used in this country 2,399,000 lbs. weight of silk, for all the manufactures; and in 1839, 1840, and 1841, when the protection was diminished, we used 4,835,898 lbs. a year, being an increase of more than 100 per cent. in our consumption of silk. Now, there is another little point about this silk question, which is really interesting in a peculiar degree, and I cannot refrain from noticing it, because it settles entirely the question of "total and immediate." When, in 1824, Mr. Huskisson proposed to admit the manufactured silks of France at 30 per cent. duty, the manufacturers said, "No, give us time to dispose of our stock on hand, and let your change begin in July, 1826; during those two years we can dispose of our stock on hand, and we shall be prepared to endure the increased competition from France." Mr. Huskisson agreed to the proposition. Two results were immediately produced:—our manufacturers found it hard to sell, for shopkeepers and general purchasers only bought a small quantity, waiting for the French silks to come in and cause a reduction in price; the French, looking for the alteration in duty, and the admission of their goods to our markets, worked double tides, and laid up large stocks. Our manufacturers, about six months before Mr. Huskisson's first intended alteration was to come into operation, went to Parliament again, and said, "The French have large stocks on hand, but they are all of a particular length; prohibit silks of that length altogether, and then the French and we can start fair." (Laughter.) Mr. Huskisson agreed to the proposal; prohibited the French silks of that particular length, which the French had in stock; the French set to work again, worked harder than ever, produced silks of the required length, paid the duties upon them, and smuggled in the short lengths; so that your manufacturers, who would not let the change be made at once, stood in this position,—their own stock remained upon hand; the French short lengths were smuggled in, and the French long lengths came in under fair trade. (Laughter.) Then comes the conclusion of this silk question. In 1823 we exported £351,000 worth of silk goods; in 1836, ten years after the alteration, we exported £917,000 worth of silk goods; and we exported, in 1839—mark this!—to the United States, £410,000 worth of silk goods, which were sent to them at that rate per annum, and were progressively increasing. Now, is it not clear that our silk manufactures have improved? that they have nothing to fear from French competition? The American market is open to France, as it is to us: France can go and sell there; and yet in America—a neutral market—we can go beside the Frenchmen and sell £410,000 worth of silk goods annually. (Hear, hear.) The competition gave us an impulse. We took the French patterns and looms: our looms were first as good, and then they were better; for I should have told you that, under the old system, Mr. Ellice, the member for Coventry, said, in 1821 and 1826, in the House of Commons, that in France they produced about five times as much silk and ribbon in the loom as we did; and in Germany they produced about forty-eight times as much velvet. "Give us," said he, "protection." Mr. Huskisson said, "No; give you the impulse of competition, and that will cause you to make your machinery as good as the French." (Hear, hear.) They gave them competition; and England did make it as good as the French, but they did not stop there; they went on and made it better. They went out to America and sold nearly half a million's worth of silk beside the French in the American market. But they did more. "Do not lower the duties upon silk," it was said; "we are afraid of the French, they will sell their silks, and we shall not be able to dispose of ours; every lady in the land will be dressed in French silks, and they will wear nothing else." Men presented petitions to the House of Commons, stating that the measure would ruin the silk-trade in this country; that cobwebs would be found over the looms and shuttles in London, Coventry, Manchester, and Macclesfield. But, fortunately, none of these protection-to-British-industry people were listened to. The trade, indeed, was not made free as it ought to have been; it should have been entirely emancipated from its fetters; but still a step was taken in the direction of freedom; and in 1832 we sent to France £75,000 of silk goods, and sold them in that country beside the Frenchmen. In 1841, again, we sent £181,000 worth of our silk goods and sold them in the French markets. (Cheers.) And so the case stands: that the silk trade with manufacturing freedom established itself, and under the curse of protection declined; during a partial withdrawal of restriction, sprang up again, and that now our silks find markets and a sale beside those in dread of whom we formerly imposed a high protecting duty. What have the protection-to-British-industry people to say to this fact? How stands their case now? Do they think that they will be able to impose upon the Spitalfields weavers? They may happen to get some raw lads among them (cheers),—boys who know nothing of the history of the past; but they will get no honest Spitalfields, Manchester, or Paisley weaver, nor any hard-working man who reads, thinks, and registers his own experience; no man who has lived long enough to recollect the Corn Law of 1815, who remembers the old miseries of the silk-weavers, the uncertainty of their employment (loud and continued cheering); no man who remembers these things will be found joining in their cry for protection to British industry. And then, as to their second point—their pretended proof that the working class is not with us,—I answer them in very few words:—there are 50,000 registered members of the League in London. (Cheers.) Are they all of the upper and middling classes? (Cries of "No, no.") I have been in nearly every town in England during the last six months, holding meetings and raising contributions towards our £100,000 fund, and upon every occasion a large portion—very large in proportion to their means—of our contributions have been from the working men (cheers), given freely from the interest they felt in the cause. Twenty thousand copies of our LEAGUE paper circulate every week (renewed cheers); and a very large number of them indeed are read by working men. We know how the labouring classes stood by us in Durham and the city of London, and more recently still at Salisbury. (Hear.) I know how they stood by me when, at the request of some friends, I unfurled the banner of Free Trade at Hastings. (Cheers.) I witnessed how they rallied round my friend General Briggs, when he came forward nobly to represent the League, and stand by the cause of Free Trade in the city of Exeter. (Cheers.) I know that "the Working Men's Association" met, canvassed for us, carried about the reports of the speeches, were incessant in their efforts—that no working men, except a few who were hired to do it, and made drunk for the purpose, held up their hands against General Briggs at the nomination. (Cheers.) We do not intend to make this movement for Free Trade a class movement; we do not wish to appeal to the working people as a class—we have no desire to organize them separately from any other portion of the community. We want to teach, to arouse, to convince, and associate all;—to have the best of every class, as you know we now have, from the Marquis of Westminster and the Earl of Radnor, down to the poorest man that makes an honest living by hard toil. (Enthusiastic cheering.) And now it is time that this meeting came to a close. I will only occupy you for four or five minutes longer with one point of very great importance, and then I will take my leave. Mr. Baring, at Huntingdon, said (laughter), "He was the friend of free discussion, and he hoped it never would be put down. But with respect to the Anti-Corn-Law League, whilst he acknowledged its power and importance, he shrunk not from combating its opinions wherever he met them, nor from declaring it to be his opinion that its interference and expenditure of vast sums of money, on such occasions as they had recently witnessed, were unconstitutional." (Laughter.) He reckons our expenditure at the city of London election, and other places, by his own. (Cheers and laughter.) He seems to me to have spoken simultaneously with a writer at Exeter in a paper that goes there by the designation of "The Wool-gathering Gazette." (Laughter.) The writer says:—"Nothing can be more unconstitutional than attempts of this kind to turn the course of an election by the employment of the funds of the Anti-Corn-Law League. Surely the constitution must have given the electors of this free country some redress against such an aggression on their privileges as that which the Anti-Corn-Law League are now perpetrating in the city of Exeter. It is a matter of just complaint to be laid before Parliament, and the citizens of Exeter will show themselves wanting in spirit and indutiful if they submit to so flagrant an insult." (Laughter.) The only way in which I can understand the meaning of these two persons is, that they mean to say that the elections should be carried on in the spirit of the olden times. (Hear, hear.) I will suppose that the writer of the article in this Exeter paper and Mr. Thomas Baring were jointly to petition Parliament upon this matter—their petition must be to this effect: "Whereas elections have hitherto been conducted upon certain known and established principles—all the public-houses in the town having been freely open to all comers, and the drink duly paid for by the agents of the candidates (loud laughter); and whereas certain poor men, having votes, have been in the habit of receiving a certain consideration for their said votes; and whereas it has heretofore been considered that there was no necessity for a candidate to explain himself to his constituents, but merely to intimate that he meant to pay for his seat; and whereas certain men have gone to certain cities and boroughs, and have had the audacity to speak, print, publish, and circulate information; and whereas their meetings have been crowdedly attended, and there is not a drunken man to be seen (loud laughter); and whereas all the public-houses are absolutely deserted, and the people who heretofore attended them go to the aforesaid meetings and listen to the aforesaid men, so that we, her Majesty's liege subjects, can get up neither drunkenness, nor fights, nor riots; and whereas we are now so well observed by the aforesaid men that we cannot bribe the electors (cheers and laughter); and these Leaguers watch us so closely and offer such large rewards, that it is impossible for us in a fair and honourable way, without risk, to buy the votes of the constituencies; and whereas the humbler class of electors presume to think for themselves, and begin to assert that they vote from principle, to the sure destruction of our ancient rights of dictation (loud laughter): We therefore pray that your honourable and right honourable House will take the matter into your serious consideration, and either put down this League or provide such other convenient remedies as to your honourable house may seem fit for this unconstitutional interference with the rights and privileges of aspirants to seats in Parliament." (Loud cheers and laughter.) Now, that is precisely the way in which the case stands. "Unconstitutional!" Why, what do the League do? The only means we employ at these election contests are the same as we use elsewhere—our tongues and the printing-press. (Hear.) What real offence can they lay to our charge? What fraudulent means have we made use of? In what way have we spent our money, but in paying the expense of rooms, for the printed reports of speeches, and of persons to carry them round and distribute them among the electors? Does Mr. Baring mean to say that it is unconstitutional to spread knowledge and to denounce corruption? Has he gone to Parliament to represent a party who would maintain, as the protection-to-British-industry men do, that you should not teach the people of this country—that you have no right to go out and lecture to the people, teaching them to discriminate, and believing, as the League do in their hearts, that this Corn Law is a grievance on the people—that it limits their supply of food, interferes with every working man, and prevents him from enjoying the full fruits of his industry—do they, I say, mean to contend that we should not teach that lesson to the people? Do they call it unconstitutional to come to men about to elect a member of Parliament, and say to them, "Throw aside paltry party considerations; come out as men; be dictated to and crippled no longer; be made drunk, be bought and sold, no longer—but come out as honest, bold, independent men; attend the meetings which are being held for your information; read the speeches and tracts which are distributed among you; consider the picture that your country presents, and ask yourselves whether the franchise is not a trust reposed in you for the good of your fellow-men, and to be employed only for their benefit." Is that, I say, unconstitutional? (Loud cheers.) Do these men mean to insinuate that they would deny the right of instruction to others, because they cannot teach the people? (Hear, hear.) I have done with them. I entreat you not to let any disappointment or discouragement come upon you, because the League did not triumph at Hastings or Exeter. (Cheers.) I have been engaged in both those contests myself, and have returned from them cheered and ready for still greater exertion. There is a spirit roused at Hastings and Exeter, which will ere long win both those places for Free Trade. (Cheers.) They do not deserve to conquer who will not risk defeat. (Hear, hear.) We do not merit triumph, if we are unwilling first to go and teach the people. It is not the work of an hour's speech, now and then, to bring a constituency up from corruption, apathy, and party spirit, to purity and earnestness: it is a work of time (cheers); we have begun it; and tell those who say that the League is defeated, and that we have been beaten at Hastings and in Exeter, that we have marched into the country of our enemies, planted our standard there, and that we cannot be driven back: we have made good some ground, won friendship among the people, stirred up earnestness of spirit among them, picked out some honest men to work our cause. (Loud cheers.) Tell those who call us beaten, we have pledged ourselves that we will go again, and that the people of those places they are pledged to make the way easier for us when next we come; we have made waverers ashamed of themselves, and have broken up mere party intrigues in those places; we will march onward and onward still. Tell our opponents that, do what they will, they never can bring back people who are taught and thirsting for knowledge again to ignorance and indifference; that, strong in the goodness of our cause, and in the progress it is making amongst the people, cheered by the earnestness with which they listen, and the spirit with which they support us, we are determined every where to fight the same battle, if but ever so few men can be got to stand round us. (Cheers.) Tell them that we are come back from these contests convinced that there is much work before us, but strong enough to do it (loud cheers); that be it for one, two, three, or four years, we have devoted ourselves to this question, and put our hands to the plough to plough through this old weed-grown land of protection, and that we will never look back, or take our hand from that plough, but persevere with all our might and strength until the field is all turned, the seed sown, and a rich and abundant harvest reaped for all. (The learned gentleman concluded the above argumentative and eloquent address amidst most enthusiastic applause.)

The CHAIRMAN then came forward amidst loud cheering and said:—Ladies and gentlemen, it is now my duty to announce to you that this meeting is dissolved; but before we separate, if you will not think it impertinent in me, I cannot forbear to express my feelings of surprise and satisfaction at witnessing the numbers that have collected here this evening, and the interest and attention that have been manifested upon the occasion. (Hear, hear.) My surprise is grounded upon such numbers having gathered here, considering the season of the year, and the countless attractions that might divert people from such a scene—that such multitudes have gathered together within the walls of this theatre to mark their feeling and express their opinion upon the question of the Corn Law, which, though it may injure them indirectly, is of tenfold injury to the humbler classes who are not present. My satisfaction is grounded on knowing that there is nothing more cheering and encouraging to those who are engaged in this arduous struggle than to find that they receive the countenance and sanction of so intelligent an assemblage as the present. It has been said that the existence of the League is "a great fact;" but I must say I think that the maintenance of the interest in our meetings manifested by the metropolitan public is a much greater fact. Gentlemen, I do hope that it may be maintained. I am quite sure that a more serviceable auxiliary to the cause of Free Trade to this country and the world at large cannot exist than your support. (Cheers.) The meeting is now dissolved. I believe I may announce to you that a very patriotic friend of ours, and a large proprietor of land, will preside at the next meeting this day week—I mean Lord Kinnaird. (Loud cheers, after which the meeting separated.)

BRADFORD ANTI-CORN-LAW MEMORIAL.—The memorial to the borough members, calling upon them to attend and support Mr. Villiers in his motion for a repeal of the Corn Laws, has now received the signatures of 650 of the electors.—Leeds Mercury.

HEXHAM ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETING.—At Hexham, on Tuesday evening, Mr. Daniel Laddell, lecturer of the League, delivered an elaborate discourse on the injurious effects of the Corn Laws, and the prospective advantages of Free Trade; after which a chairman was elected (Mr. Matthew Smith), and some discussion on the proposed remedy ensued. There was, to be sure, a Chartist diversion, alike diverting and harmless; but the meeting (on the motion of Smith Stobart, Esq.) came to a very satisfactory vote, condemning the Corn Laws, and resolving to petition against them. But Hexham has another obligation to discharge. It ought to contribute something to the League Fund.—Gateshead Observer.

THE FALKIRK BURGHS.—The Falkirk burghs have memorialised their member, Mr. Baird of Gartsherrie, to support such motions as may be brought forward during the present session for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. The constituency consists of 1095 qualified voters, and 710 have signed the memorial, thus giving a majority in favour of a Free-Trade candidate, in case of a new election, of 325. Mr. Baird's majority over Mr. Gillon at last general election was 51. We understand many of Mr. Baird's former supporters, and even some members of his local committees, have given in their adhesion to the principles of Free Trade. This move, in these burghs, where Mr. Baird and his friends exercise such an amount of pecuniary and property influence, is highly illustrative of the change which has come over the minds of his constituents, as well as of the rapid spread of Free-Trade principles.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE £100,000 FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, April 24, 1844.
N.B. As the subscription list is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

EXETER ELECTION.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The election in this city terminated on Monday last. For General Briggs 529 electors voted. During this brief, but hard-fought contest, occupying only a period of about nine days, ten Free-Trade meetings were held. With one exception these meetings were all held in the Royal Subscription-room, which will hold 2500 individuals, and on some occasions the place was filled to such a degree that it was not without great difficulty that the speakers could obtain access to the platform. The meetings were addressed by General Briggs, Mr. G. Thompson, Mr. Moore, Mr. Saul, and Mr. James Brotherton. It would be next to impossible to convey an idea of the spirit and enthusiasm which prevailed in these large gatherings, the people listening for a while with intelligence beaming in their countenances, with the greatest stillness and attention, and then bursting forth into cheers which were heard far beyond the walls of the building in which the meetings were held. The interest in the meetings increased as the election proceeded; and the reports of the speeches were sought after and read with the greatest eagerness; and repeal of the Corn Laws and universal Freedom of Trade were the subjects of general conversation. The old leaders of the Liberal party stood aloof from the contest, but new leaders came forward, and nothing could exceed the spirit and energy with which they worked and with which the 529 independent men recorded their votes. Immediately on the close of the poll a meeting was held in the Subscription-room, at which votes of thanks were passed by acclamation to General Briggs and the League. It was resolved to keep the committee-room open for three or four days for the purpose of enrolling members of the League; and the election committee, with power to add to their numbers, was appointed a committee of a local Free-Trade association. It is worthy of remark, that during the whole time the city was free from the old disgraceful electioneering drunkenness and riot,—thanks to the agitation of the League and the stringent provisions of Lord John Russell's act against bribery and treating. The attention of the people of Exeter has been turned to the importance of Free Trade, and cannot again be withdrawn from it; in all future contests that question will have precedence of every other. Mere political parties can no longer divide the representation between them; the 529 are in right earnest, and will allow no such trifling with their franchise and their interests. General Briggs was an excellent candidate, and maintained the contest with the utmost spirit and good feeling: he and his cause have won good opinions from many besides those who supported him at the poll. The non-electors were active in their support of the League, and there is little doubt that in Exeter as in Salisbury the waverers and voters against conscience for interest's sake will soon be taught that honesty is the best policy.

Of the ten meetings which were held Mr. Moore addressed nine; his fervid eloquence made him a great favourite, and when he was about to leave Exeter from two to three thousand persons assembled to see him off. They pressed round the coach, eager to shake hands and have a parting word with him: every now and then hearty cheers were given for Free Trade, for repeal of the Corn Laws, for General Briggs, and for the 529 honest electors. There was no ill feeling toward the other party manifested, but a right earnest resolution to work and win at the next election. As the coach started three cheers were given for the League, for Mr. Cobden, and for Mr. Moore.

GREENWICH.

ANTI-CORN-LAW ASSOCIATION.—A general meeting of the Association took place on Wednesday, at the Lecture Hall, Greenwich, for the purpose of receiving a deputation from the National Anti-Corn-Law League, to consist of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Robt. R. Moore. The large hall was crowded to excess at an early hour with a most respectable assemblage, a goodly proportion of which, we observed, consisted of ladies. The deputation, accompanied by the President of the Society, Col. T. Perronet Thompson, who acted as chairman on the occasion, entered the hall a few minutes after seven o'clock, and were received with the most vociferous cheers by the 1200 persons assembled before them. Mr. Moore being detained at Covent-garden at the weekly meeting of the League, his place was supplied by Mr. George Thompson, who accompanied Mr. Cobden as his co-deputy. Admiral Dundas, M.P. for the borough, was also present.

As soon as the meeting was constituted, the CHAIRMAN came forward, and opened the proceedings in a brief address.

A person from the body of the meeting inquired of the chairman if those who addressed the meeting would answer any questions which might be put to them at its close? These questions would be deferred until then, as he was opposed to interruptions during the progress of the regular proceedings. (Hisses and partial cheering.)

The CHAIRMAN said he supposed that, when those whom the meeting had invited to address them had finished, they would gladly hear any question from those whom they had invited; but it was entirely, as to the latter, a question of courtesy. The meeting was not under the smallest obligation to hear any question answered which they did not like. That was a matter which he would leave to the discretion of the assembly, pledging himself to act in strict accordance with whatever opinion they should express. (Cheers.)

The Secretary then read a letter from Mr. Barnard, M.P. for the borough, apologising for his absence from the meeting, after which Admiral DUNDAS, his colleague, came forward, and was received with tumultuous cheers. He was completely committed in the cause of Free Trade in corn, and so far was in favour of the League. (Hear, hear.) He was also in favour of a Free Trade in everything else. (Renewed cheers.) He would have preferred that the League had declared themselves Free-Traders altogether, than have declared themselves the Anti-Corn-Law League solely. As it was, however, they had worked uncommonly well, and had certainly done their duty, considering the interests in array against them. There was one class of men opposed to them, however, and that was the landlords, who should be grateful to the League, for, since the present agitation commenced, the farmers had redoubled their exertions and skill. (Hear, hear.) For that alone the League deserved credit. The gallant admiral then went on to say that he considered the question involved in the agitation of the League as intimately connected with the suffrage question. (Hear, hear, hear.) The suffrage was at present upon such a footing that the peers and great people throughout the country exercised all political power—a state of things which was as impolitic as it was unjust. (Hear, hear.) After dwelling at some length upon this point, and apologizing for introducing matter which was not wholly relevant to the question before them, the gallant admiral concluded by assuring the meeting that he was always ready to give his support to Mr. Cobden and his coadjutors, both in the House of Commons and elsewhere.

Mr. COBDEN then came forward. The assembly rose en masse, and a storm of shouts burst from every quarter of the spacious hall. The cheering was again and again renewed, and, when it at length subsided, the honourable gentleman observed that he felt somewhat at a loss on entering the meeting as to how he should address them, or what he should say, believing that they were likely to be quite as well informed upon the question as he could be himself. The gallant admiral who had preceded him, however, had furnished him with a peg on which to hang a beginning, at all events. He had called them to task for not adopting the title of the "Free-Trade League," instead of calling themselves the "Anti-Corn-Law League." But he would explain to them how the League was both of these, although acting under a distinctive name. The League believed that, if they could manage to dispossess the landowners—who formed the majority in the House of Commons—of their peculiar monopoly, these landowners would save them the trouble of getting rid of all other monopolies. They (the League) believed the Corn Laws to be the keystone of the arch of monopoly, and they had only to remove the keystone and the whole structure would fall. Therefore it was that the League kept the battering-ram going against the keystone of the arch. But they might say that they had no proof that the League was in earnest in wishing for Free Trade in everything. The manufacturers had no protection which they did not want to get rid of. There were, it was true, laws on the statute-book enacting that cotton goods should not come into this country from abroad without paying a duty. But so was there also on the same statute-book a law, at one time, subjecting the importation of coals to Newcastle to a duty of 24s. per ton. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) In neither case could such a law operate as a protection. The so-called protection on cotton goods did not enable the manufacturer to sell his production at a higher price at home than he could abroad. Out of every seven pounds of raw cotton worked in England, six pounds were sold abroad, and at a better price than the remainder disposed of in the home market. The manufacturers had, therefore, no real protection, and wanted none.

Mr. Cobden concluded an able speech amidst a storm of cheering. Mr. George Thompson followed in an eloquent speech. After which the collection of subscriptions in aid of the League Fund was proceeded with.

EDINBURGH ANTI CORN-LAW ASSOCIATION.

REPRESENTATION OF THE CITY OF EDINBURGH.

Monday, the 22nd inst., the annual meeting of the above-named association was held in the Waterloo Rooms. The occasion seemed to have excited considerable interest, from the fact of its having been announced that an amendment would be brought forward to the resolution about to be proposed, pledging the meeting, in the prospect of a dissolution, to the bringing forward candidates of thorough Free-Trade principles. The large room was, accordingly, quite filled at the hour appointed (seven o'clock). On the platform we observed, amongst others, Mr. Wigham; Montgomery Bell, Esq., advocate; James Moncrieff, Esq., advocate; Edward Maitland, Esq., advocate; Duncan M'Laren, Esq.; J. F. Macfarlane, Esq.; Alexander Robertson, Esq.; Dean of Guild Dick; Bailie Gray; Councillor Stark; Mr. Archibald Thompson; Mr. Ralph Richardson, &c. &c.

Mr. WIGHAM, having been unanimously called to the chair, opened the proceedings. He adverted to the present position of the question of Free Trade, and illustrated the evils of the Corn Laws by some valuable statistics, and concluded by pointing out the evils which they inflicted on the manufacturing and agricultural interests.

Mr. MILLER, S.S.C., then read the annual report of the committee of the association, which was received with great applause.

GEORGE M'ALLAN, Esq., proposed the adoption of the report; which was seconded by GEORGE STONE, Esq., and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. J. F. MACFARLANE then came forward to propose the second resolution, which was to the effect that the meeting should express to the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay and William Gibson Craig, Esq., the members for the city, their strong hope that they, as their representatives, would now be prepared to support the immediate and entire abolition of all duties on the importation of foreign corn; and in particular that they would give their cordial and unqualified support to Mr. Villiers's motion for the immediate and entire abolition of these duties. Mr. Macfarlane remarked at some length upon the present state and prospects of what he styled this wonderful association, the Anti-Corn-Law League. He claimed for the "Edinburgh Review" the credit of having advocated the principles of Free Trade before these principles were so well understood as they are at present. The resolution he had to propose was to the effect that a copy of the report be transmitted to the hon. members for the city, with the expression of a hope that they would support Free-Trade principles. Both these gentlemen on the last occasion voted for Mr. Villiers's motion, and he (Mr. Macfarlane) trusted they would do so again. Considering that so large a proportion of the constituency of Edinburgh had met to support this resolution with calmness, he trusted that their doing so would not be in vain. (Applause.)

Mr. JAMES M'LAREN seconded the resolution in a lengthened speech.

Mr. BAILIE GRAY proposed the following resolution:—"That it be remitted to the ordinary committee, as a special instruction from this meeting, that, in the prospect of a dissolution of Parliament, they shall take care that candidates be brought forward to represent the city of Edinburgh whose views on the question of freedom of trade shall be in unison alike with the great body of the Liberal electors, and of the Anti-Corn-Law League; and, in order to carry this resolution into effect, that the committee shall have power to call a meeting of the whole Liberal electors to ascertain their opinions on the subject, and generally to take such other steps as shall seem to them proper, for giving effect to the opinions of the majority of the constituency on this great public question of the day."

He supported the resolution on the ground that it was well to be prepared should a dissolution take place. He trusted the meeting was prepared to tell their members, and to tell the United Kingdom, that no man would suit them as a representative in Parliament who was not an out-and-out advocate of Free Trade, and a total and immediate repealer of the Corn Laws. He held out no threat; he found no fault with their members for what they had done; they had, he believed, acted honestly and uprightly according to their views; but the meeting now stating their views on the great question of Free Trade was, in his opinion, a much more open and manly way of dealing, than if they concealed those views till near the day of election. He thought, in that case, that the members would have just reason to complain, and say—Why did you not tell us sooner? (Applause.)

Mr. A. THOMSON seconded the resolution in a lengthened address.

Mr. ALEX. ROBERTSON, music-seller, said he had an amendment to propose; and he proposed it, not as a Reformer of yesterday, but as one who had taken his side in politics when it was dangerous for a citizen of Edinburgh to attach himself to the cause which he had espoused. He objected to the resolution which had been proposed, because it involved a censure upon the members for the city. ("No, no.") That was undoubtedly the import of the resolution: they might put any construction upon it they pleased, but that was the conclusion to which they must ultimately come: and therefore it was that he begged to move an amendment upon it, to the effect, "that, until there shall be a nearer prospect of a dissolution of Parliament, it is inexpedient to enter upon the subject of the third resolution." Having supported the amendment, he concluded by moving its adoption.

Mr. MONTGOMERY BELL, advocate, rose to second the amendment, and he wished to preface the very few remarks he had to offer upon this subject with an expression of regret that any difference of opinion should have arisen among the members of this association. He had, for some years past, been a member of the sub-committee of the association, and he was sure that every member of committee would bear testimony to the fact, that up to this period the members had gone on together with the utmost harmony and good will. ("Hear, hear" from Mr. Wilson.) Before coming to the point of difference, he wished to notice how far, in the proceedings of this evening, one and all of the members went heartily together. In the first place, they were all cordially as one in supporting that admirable report which they had heard read. Further, they agreed in the propriety,—he would say in the duty,—of bringing their views, as expressed in that report, to bear with the utmost weight of their moral force upon the minds of their representatives. They went cordially together so far; and the only question before them was, how they were most effectually to bring their opinions before their members,—where was it that the point of difficulty lay? The point had arisen here, that, not content with bringing their moral influence to bear upon their representatives, by means of the two first resolutions, the third resolution contained—what their representatives, who were high-minded and honourable men, must hold it to contain—the elements of a threat and menace, which was brandished over them in the face of the British public; and the result of which would be, that, in place of bringing the members to acquiesce in their views, it would tend to embarrass them and keep them back. Mr. Bell then went on to contend against the resolution; but, in the course of a lengthy address, the impatience of the meeting, which had been manifested throughout, became so great as to prevent his proceeding. After several interruptions, Mr. Bell concluded by moving his amendment.

Mr. M'LAREN was received with loud cheers. He agreed with Mr. Bell, that it would be of great importance to have Mr. Macaulay on their side; and, as far as he knew the sentiments of the Anti-Corn-Law committee, he believed that they had no other feeling than a wish to convert him—to convert him if they could; and, if they could not, to cut the connexion. He denied in toto that the third resolution implied a threat or menace. The constituency had made a contract with these gentlemen during the existing Parliament. They had applied to them repeatedly to reconsider their votes; they had entreated them to give due weight to the feelings and wishes of the constituency, and the answer was that which was contained in Mr. Macaulay's letters. They now proposed to tell their members that unless they not only voted for Mr. Villiers's motion, but were prepared to give it a cordial and welcome support, the constituency must look out for other members when their term of office expired. (Applause.) He should like to know if any candid man, unbiassed by party considerations, could object to that course of conduct. He held that the members had no right to a life representation in the city of Edinburgh. (Applause.) It was generally understood throughout the city that Mr. Craig's mind was made up to take the step of voting for the immediate and total repeal. He held that that was a fixed point in his mind; and that, therefore, in point of fact, he was with them already. He hoped, or at least he wished, that Mr. Macaulay would take the same course. If he did not, their duty was to do the thing that was right, leaving him to do what he thought right. With regard to the opinions of the electors, his opinion was—and, from his position as treasurer to the League Fund, he had better opportunities than most men of knowing—he had no doubt that, in the event of a vacancy, two-thirds of the Liberal electors would support a Free-Trade candidate. With regard to what had been said by Baillie Gray, as to Mr. Macaulay being fettered by his party, he thought that he (Baillie Gray) had hit the nail upon the head. If Mr. Macaulay had not been a member of the late Government, and if he did not expect to be a member of the next, he would now have been found fighting in the highest ranks of Corn-Law repeal; and this should be a lesson to them that, in looking to fill their members' seats in case of a vacancy, they should neither look to men who were in place, nor to those who were expecting places. (Hear.) Mr. M'Laren repelled an insinuation circulated by a clique for the purpose of damaging the meeting, that he intended to put up for the representation of the city himself; and concluded by expressing his belief that if a person holding the principles which he (Mr. M'Laren) did, and having the interests of his fellow-citizens at heart, as he had on various occasions shown—if such were to come forward on Free-Trade principles, and Mr. Macaulay on fixed-duty principles, he would beat him by a majority of two to one. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. G. MAITLAND, advocate, then attempted to speak, but the interruption was so great that only fragments of sentences could be heard. He opposed the resolution.

The vote was then taken by a show of hands, when 28 voted for the amendment, and the rest of the meeting for the resolution, which was declared to be carried amidst loud cheers.

After appointing a committee, and other matters, the meeting adjourned.—Abridged from the Edinburgh Observer.

UXBRIDGE.—A public meeting of the Free-Trade Association was held at the Town-hall, on Thursday evening, the 18th instant, which was attended by a large concourse of most respectable inhabitants, and by many agriculturists of the neighbourhood, to hear addresses from Mr. Bright, M.P., and Mr. Thompson. Among the gentleman on the platform we noticed the following:—T. H. Riches, Esq., Messrs. W. Heron, W. Hall, James Smith, John Smith, — Tate, sen., Robert Tate, jun., and — Wilkinson; Revds. W. Walford, Caleb Morris, — Thomas, and T. G. Stamper. Mr. H. Hull was cordially introduced to the chair. On his right was J. Bright, Esq., M.P. for Durham; on his left, G. Thompson, Esq. The room was tastefully decorated with evergreens, and a variety of appropriate inscriptions, and there were at least 600 persons present.—The Chairman introduced the object of the meeting by saying he could have wished that some more talented individual, from their own town or neighbourhood, had been called to occupy the chair; at the same time he felt assured that he should find his task an easy one, as the subject which had called them together had been well considered, and was well understood in Uxbridge. They were still true to those principles which had been so clearly and so powerfully set before them, when favoured with a visit some time ago from Mr. Cobden, and they still maintained the position they took on that grand occasion. (Cheers.) That was the most enthusiastic meeting which ever took place in that town. He should not support this question if he did not sincerely believe that it was one which involved the best interests of all classes of the people. (Cheers.) It was based on a foundation of truth and justice, and in its aspect was most philanthropic. It was no trifling or mere political question. It aimed at the good and well-being of the whole of her Majesty's subjects—none could be injured by it. There were many agriculturists present, and he would tell them that, if he conceived it possible that their interests could be in any way injured by it, he would not have been there to advocate Free Trade. (Cheers.) Fully convinced as he was that nothing could save the country but to carry out the object of the League, he should be ashamed if he did not, both in private and in public, advocate this great principle. He should not occupy more of their time, but should call on their worthy and talented friend, John Bright, to address the meeting. (Cheers.)—Mr. Bright then rose and was received with enthusiastic cheers: he addressed the audience for more than an hour, in one of the most business-like and argumentative speeches we ever heard, even from that gentleman.—Mr. Rutter proposed the following resolution:—"That this meeting is of opinion that the Anti-Corn-Law League merits our most cordial approval and support for the manly and consistent course it has pursued during a period of five years in the diffusion of knowledge on the great and important principle of Free Trade, and also in its determination to carry out this principle by contesting the various cities and boroughs as vacancies occur; and we pledge ourselves to render it every assistance by contributing to its funds, and by every other means in our power." Carried unanimously. Mr. Bright being obliged to leave the meeting on other business, a vote of thanks was cordially passed to him amidst enthusiastic cheers.—G. Thompson, Esq., was then introduced by the chairman, and was rapturously greeted. His address, which was eloquent and argumentative, elicited repeated rounds of applause.—Mr. Wilkinson said, after what they had heard, it would gratify the meeting to hear that the principles of Free Trade had made great progress in Uxbridge, and subscriptions to the amount of nearly £80 had been raised. He then proposed that the cordial thanks of the meeting be given to Mr. G. Thompson for his company and his very able address this evening. Carried by acclamation.—Mr. Thompson briefly acknowledged the compliment.—Mr. Hull said he wished to raise the sum to £100, and he was assured that every one would be ashamed not to have his name on the list of subscriptions.—Mr. Thompson moved the thanks of the meeting to the chairman.—Mr. Wilkinson having seconded the motion, it was received with great warmth and three cheers.—Mr. Hull said, that short thanks were sometimes sweetest. He felt the greatest pleasure in having presided, and hoped their association would receive a double stimulus after the very able speeches they had heard.—The meeting was then dissolved.—Abridged from the Windsor Express.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETING AT HORSFORTH.—An interesting meeting was held on Monday se'night, in the Baptist Chapel, Horsforth, in favour of Free Trade. The building was comfortably filled by a respectable audience, whose deep attention to the various arguments adduced by the speakers indicated the interest they felt on the subject. John Marshall, Esq., of Horsforth Hall, occupied the chair, and on opening the proceedings said, he was almost a stranger amongst them at present, but he trusted times would come when they would find it their advantage to meet and consult together on topics affecting their interests; and he should then soon learn to address them as friends and fellow-townsmen. He then at some length pointed out the injustice of the Corn Laws, and urged the necessity for the removal of commercial restrictions.—Mr. Plint of Leeds, Mr. Ackroyd of Otley, and Mr. Byles of Bradford, addressed the meeting, and forcibly set forth the evil effects produced by monopoly.—Mr. William Rand, of Bradford, then moved a vote of thanks to the chairman, and in doing so read a letter from Mr. Michael Craven, a farmer and landowner of Scotland, near Horsforth, enclosing a £5 cheque as his subscription to the League Fund.—Mr. Oxley seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously; and Mr. Marshall having returned thanks, the meeting separated. Another subscription of £5 was announced; means also are to be taken to canvass the inhabitants for subscriptions.

BRIGHTON.—On Tuesday evening, the 6th instant, a special general meeting of the members of the Anti-Corn-Law Association was held at the Sussex Hotel, to receive a deputation from the Council of the Anti-Corn Law League. The meeting was numerous and attended by the influential and leading Reformers of Brighton. The chair was taken at half-past eight o'clock by Mr. Isaac Bass. The object of the meeting was to consider the most efficient steps that could be taken in respect to the registration of voters for this borough, and the return of Free-Trade members to Parliament, when it was unanimously resolved that the association in future be called the "Brighton Anti-Corn-Law, Free-Trade, and Registration Association;" that a committee of five be formed to attend to the registration; and that a subscription be raised specially for that purpose. Several questions of importance relating to registration purposes were explained by Mr. James, who attended from the League; and the meeting separated, having pledged themselves to carry out the objects for which they had met.—Brighton Herald.

MONOPOLIES AND STRIKES.—On Thursday evening, the 18th inst., Mr. D. Liddell delivered a lecture in the Assembly Rooms, North Shields, to a crowded audience, on the Corn Laws, and the causes and effects of strikes among workmen. The lecture was well received.—Gateshead Observer.

PROGRESS OF FREE TRADE.—A petition to the Queen, in favour of Free Trade, and praying for a dissolution of Parliament, to enable the electors of the kingdom to pronounce their verdict on the question, has been forwarded from the parishes of Killybeghill and Ystradgunlais, in Glamorganshire. The petition has 386 signatures, of which number 14 are landowners, 11 are freeholders, 14 are leaseholders, and 97 are tenant-farmers. The farmers of Glamorganshire are rapidly becoming convinced by the experience of the past three years that their prosperity is dependent on that of trade and manufactures,—that to "speed the plough" we must "ply the hammer." At the unanimous request of the parties who had charge of the petition, Mr. Vivian, M.P. for the Swansea boroughs, has undertaken its presentation, Mr. V. having earned this claim to their confidence by his support of Mr. Villiers's motion last year. It is a fact worthy of notice, that, when the royal commission visited Wales last December, the farmers in this district stated it as their conviction that it was useless for them to complain of local grievances—that their greatest grievance was distress, and its most effectual remedy Free Trade.

THE LEAGUE.—We rejoice to see the indifference with which the League regard the various small diversions contrived against them by their antagonists, the case with which the petty tricks are rendered innoxious, and the reckless simplicity of those whose motives in making them are so notorious and impure. Still more do we rejoice to see that, instead of the influence of this great body being in the smallest degree prejudiced by the silly attacks and unfounded statements so industriously reared up against them, every day adds weight to their political rank, and increased respectability to their social character. The experience of men who judge only by practical results is daily and hourly fortifying the doctrines of the political economist, and giving a tone to popular demands which cannot be misunderstood, and which must not be disregarded.—Dundee Advertiser.

PRO-CORN-LAW PETITION.—We understand that many of the farmers have refused to sign the Pro-Corn-Law petition adopted at the Anti-League meetings lately held at Middlewich and Tarporley. We have heard of one farmer who told the parties who called at his house with the petition that he would "sign his death-warrant" sooner than put his name to it. The same individual, who is much respected among his neighbours, tells us that four of them who signed the petition have since expressed their regret to him that they had been weak enough to act so much against their convictions, "just to please the laird." What weight ought to be attached to signatures obtained under such circumstances?—Macclesfield Chronicle.

GENTLEMANLY BEHAVIOUR OF AN ANTI-LEAGUER.—We meet occasionally with persons wearing the garb, who are too apt to forget the character, of gentlemen, but we will do the Anti-Leaguers the justice to say that we do not believe that the occasional hints from a few unreasoning ignorant men of their party to duck Mr. Cobden or Mr. Bright in the river has met with extensive sympathy. In the early part of our agitation we had frequent cause to complain of the brutal treatment of our lecturers and agents, chiefly by stewards, bailiffs, and land agents in the agricultural districts, but, on the whole, latterly, we have had little to complain of, and we the more regret to be obliged, in justice to Mr. Moorhouse, a most respectable and earnest agent of the League, at present engaged in distributing the packets of tracts in Yorkshire, to record a very unbecoming and unmerited insult from one who ought to have known better, and who, we would fain hope, is now heartily ashamed of his conduct. Mr. Moorhouse writes us from Yorkshire:—"In serving the township of Brierley on Friday (April 12) I met with one of the most brutal receptions I have met with in the West Riding. After leaving the packet with the female servant at the house of a gentleman of the name of George Andrew Helleley, the servant came after me and said, 'Master wants you, sir.' I returned up the fold, or yard, and the moment I got through the inner gate, he threw the contents of the packet, torn in pieces, in my face, and at the same time told me he would take me up if I did not leave the village. I looked at him for a moment, and then said 'I was sorry to see a person of his station in life conduct himself in that manner.' He again said, 'I'll take you up, you scamp.' I then stood still in the yard, and told him at his peril to lay a hand on me (he having sent for me back to his house). I have no doubt when he sent the servant after me that he expected to frighten me as he would the farm labourers, for from what I learnt yesterday in the township of Great Houghton he is one of our bitterest opponents in this riding, and a subscriber to the Anti-League Society. Newton one of the men out with me, saw the whole of the above occurrence." Mr. George Andrew Helleley may fancy himself a great man in his own neighbourhood, but he would have found himself in a very awkward predicament if he had ventured to carry his threat into execution. Perchance the thought crossed his mind that it was safer to bully than to assault an agent of the League.

MONOPOLY AND THE MARCH OF INTELLECT.—At the Free-Trade banquet recently held at Liverpool, Mr. Cobden, in the course of his speech, gave the following amusing illustrations of the "march of intellect" amongst the advocates of monopoly:—"Our opponents do not seem to have had very extensive reading—some of them. The other day one of my friends here, who is fond of reading from the works of an author whose name appears among the list of your invited guests, Thomas Carlyle—(cheers)—one of my friends, I say, quoted him. The next day we heard one of our opponents charging us with being infidels, and said we had been quoting a man who had been convicted and imprisoned for blasphemy! (Hear.) They do not read Thomas Carlyle, it appears! I would advise them to do so, for there is more of suggestive thought in one page of his books than in a volume of what they are ordinarily accustomed to read. (Hear, hear.) Again, our opponents—some of them—are not very learned. The other day one of the Free-Trade newspapers in Hertfordshire, in a very able leading article upon the Anti-League movement, alluded to the defection from the right cause of an old and very esteemed nobleman there, Lord Dacre, and he exclaimed, in the ordinary familiar phrase, 'Et tu, Brute!' The next day a long letter came from his lordship's land steward, an active opponent, denouncing the editor for calling Lord Dacre a brute! (Loud laughter.) I might multiply these instances, showing that our opponents are neither very good logicians nor yet very learned; but I will trouble you with only one more. It happened in a southern village where the clergyman of the parish presided at a public meeting. It was held in a small parish, and some of our friends called it 'a little go'; it was an Anti-League meeting where about a hundred people were assembled. One of the leading persons in it was the sexton. In the course of the clergyman's speech he said we were a body of Unitarians. The next day the sexton was busy spreading the report throughout the village that there was not a single Churchman amongst us; for he had heard the parson say we were all Unitarians. (Much laughter.) So you see that, when you take into account the extent of experience of our opponents, the amount of their knowledge, and the quality of their natural talents (laughter), you must make allowance for any little blunder they may fall into." (Cheers and laughter.)

Mr. R. N. Bacon, one of the proprietors of the Norwich Mercury, an able and consistent advocate of Free-Trade principles, has been declared the successful competitor for the Royal Agricultural Society's prize for the best Essay on the Agriculture of the county of Norfolk.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A VOICE FROM CANADA.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

Barnston, March 12, 1844.

SIR,—I am located in the eastern townships in Canada, quite adjacent to the north of Vermont, about one hundred miles from Montreal; and I have the pleasure to inform you that the LEAGUE frequently reaches this obscure part of the world. This statement may not be surprising at all to you; but if Mr. Baker had known the extent of the LEAGUE's circulation in the Western World, when he made the following statement, which appeared in the LEAGUE of the 27th of January, I think he must have had a hard face, indeed, to have sent them a copy of his ignorance, or, if not his ignorance, his dishonesty:—

"In America and other places, as soon as one piece of land was exhausted, they ploughed up fresh land. They could take up fresh land to any extent."

Now, Mr. Editor, I was so very much pleased with your remarks on the above sentiment that I could not refrain from sending you word to go on with the argument, for Mr. Baker's nonsense can never stand before the truth, which you have so plainly and fairly stated. Mr. Baker, poor man! oh that he was but here for one hour! we would find him work enough to do. Just at the present time most of the farms in this section are getting the worse for the wear, and it would be fine fun for the Yankees to see him take the plough and set to to break up new land. I imagine I see him entering the forest now before my eyes (it's near at hand—he would not have far to go); but before he entered he would begin to think himself, not in England, where he saw the new land he speaks of studded with maples, firs, birch, and other sorts of trees, mostly as large as English oaks, not allowing each other room to grow, and in addition to these the ground covered with small wood and underbrush; so that I fancy Mr. Baker would tire of his ploughing. The axe comes before the plough. Upon new land the axe is used by the first generation, and the second generation succeeds to the land to cultivate the soil in part; but, if the farm is to be a large one, the entire work of cultivating the soil will be reserved for the third or fourth generation.

The correctness of Mr. Baker's idea of taking up fresh land when the old is exhausted, may be known from the fact that wild land may be had in any quantity at from 4s. to 6s. an acre, while the price of cleared land is from £2 to £3 an acre. But Mr. Baker may say that this land is not worn out: this is very true, but four or five years would wear out the best of it, should the farmers neglect manuring, a thing which he speaks of as being very expensive; and if so in England much more so here; for in this part the dung is made in the barn-yard six months in the year, and the labour required to move it is expensive, for a man gets 7½d. for threshing a bushel of wheat; and I perceive by the LEAGUE, that, in England, a poor culprit's wages had been 2½d. The practice of taking up new land, so often alluded to in England, is not resorted to from motives of profit, but necessity. After the land has been under cultivation for ten or fifteen years, the wheat crop is infected with a fly called weevil, which, in most cases, nearly destroys the whole crop; in some cases one-third, in others one-half, of the crop is ruined just before coming to maturity. Owing to this destruction, the migration from the Atlantic states to the far West has been nearly equal to the emigration from Europe to America, and would have been greater had the people been similarly situated; but they are bound to live with their property as long as it retains any value; there are no buyers except the far West. If Mr. Baker, as you observe, had been much of a geographer, he would, at all events, have been able subsequently to see the truth of your remarks upon his speech: "That you could not expect grain in large quantities from America, except in times of scarcity, so as to prevent the exorbitant rise in price which is now experienced in deficient years." So true is this part of your comment, that the farmers in this section of Canada have not been able to send their grain to Montreal this year, and obtain remunerating prices; although we have a special law in favour of Canadian grain. Your readers may farther judge of its accuracy from the following fact:—If we had canal conveyance from here to Montreal, which would reduce the cost of carriage about 10s. per ton, we could then afford to send the grain at the Montreal prices this winter; but with our present conveyance, we have to pay 20s. per ton, and the consequence is, all the last year's grain is still in the farmers' granaries; at the present time not a pound has been sent from this section that I have heard of.

Yours, &c.,

J. GREEN.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—I have again letters from Berlin, the insertion of which in your paper, together with my answer, will, I trust, serve your cause, more especially as the LEAGUE is now widely circulated on the Continent.

I am, faithfully yours,

DIOGENES.

Berlin, March 31, 1844.

"You will have heard of the treaty concluded between Mr. Wheaton, on the part of the United States, and the Zoll-Verein. Here you have a practical illustration of the principles of 'giff-gaff' which you treated a few months ago with so much contempt. This is the commencement of the system which will now be acted upon, not only in Germany, but every where, in order to bring England to the resolution of meeting the interests of other nations by an adaptation of her mercantile policy to that of her neighbours.

"But in order to do this with advantage, she must reserve her concessions as a counterweight for those she requires. It is disagreeable and troublesome, but England must now pay for the selfishness of past times. The League would act more consistently if they took a more practical view of the best measures of attaining their ends. It is a painful thing to see a recurrence to differential duties at this time of day, 'mais tu l'a voulu, George Dandin.'"

Another correspondent writes as follows:—

"Whilst England refuses to treat us better, it ought to claim no concessions from us; and if, nevertheless, my Lord Aberdeen will issue strong diplomatic notes, he is only served right by these remaining unanswered. This has been truly the reward of his meddling with our duties on iron, a proceeding considered here as singularly unseemly and 'mal à propos.' If the noble lord would set us a good example, we should have great pleasure in following him. My creed, to be sure is 'the utmost freedom of commerce;' but those who deal so hard with us must expect to be paid in their own coin, even if it were only to contribute to their amendment. You will soon hear of some fresh and important steps in that direction. England was our predecessor in the system of high duties; may 'she' soon lead the way in reductions and equitable arrangements."

To these two letters, which appear to be brief chronicles and abstracts of the daily current of thought and conversation in Germany, I have replied thus:—

"DEAR SIR,—The sneap Lord Aberdeen has had to undergo pleases me well. I am fond of seeing impertinence tossed in a blanket, and like to assist in dragging thimble-riggers through horsepounds. It must have upset the gravity of the Prussian Government to receive Free-Trade lectures from an anti-commercial and notoriously most narrow-minded, double-tongued, and tricky Ministry. How droll must Peel's despatches have read, inculcating the principle 'that it is best to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market;' or Graham's stating, 'that the principles of Free Trade are the principles of common sense.' How much must your Finance Minister (on commercial and statistical matters the best informed man in Europe) have felt honoured and delighted at listening to instruction proffered by Stanley, alias the Marquis of Tamboff, who believes, and stated it publicly thrice, that thirty-eight millions of quarters of wheat had been produced in one year (1835) in the province of Tamboff, from whence St. Petersburg draws its supplies; whilst in fact only eleven bushels had been altogether exported in that, the preceding, and the succeeding year! In my mind's eye, I see 'Die Herren Presidenten und Staats-minister around their long table,' with meerschams nearly as long, well filled with excellent 'knaster, when straight up comes my Lord of Westmoreland, just stopping a bit on the threshold but to finish the last bar of a cavatina, before he advances. He means to press the Zoll-Verein's attendance on his new opera, as well as their adoption of low duties on English iron. He delivers his Free-Trade message first. The Germans, says he, politely, are a thinking, reasoning, logical, philosophical people, whose sound sense and great learning have no doubt convinced them of the perfect folly in the abstract of all protective and prohibitive measures; besides, there is but one opinion on the subject in the British Cabinet. 'Mein Gott!' exclaims Herr von Bodelschwing, puffing a cloud out of his meerscham that might do credit to my Olympian progenitor, 'why, then, don't they act up to their opinion?' 'Why, gentlemen,' replies the perplexed ambassador, in tragicomic recitative, 'our Ministers, you must see, have a difficult game to play. They have such odd people to deal with. They are, upon my honour, and ever were, at heart downright good Free-Traders, but must not stake character and place upon this matter. They only wait for the proper moment; and, to beguile the time, look like the time, letting 'I dare not wait upon I will.' They could never have got into office had they proclaimed themselves Free-Traders; but being in, and getting strong and independent, they will presently surprise the world with sweeping measures of a most liberal character.' 'Ei! Ei!' answers 'der Herr Oberpräsident,' whiffing his cloud as mightily, but more deliberately than the Minister of Finance; 'when they have done it we may follow their example; we, likewise, have odd people to deal with; and the oddest thing of all is, that they always want us to do as you do in England. In fact, my lord, we like you much, you are a most affable gentleman; you give most excellent dinners; you compose good music, and we will come to your new opera. But we can do no more for you than that. You Englishmen are too clever for us. If Sir Robert Peel can deliberately deceive his own countrymen, he may treat us honest Germans in the same way. My lord, we can no more allow you to interfere with our iron laws than you allow us to interfere in your Corn Laws. And, à propos of liberal and sweeping measures, have they not resisted the admission of wheat from the Cape of Good Hope, your own colony? That does not look like strength and independence.' But I have lost myself in fancy's regions, to the neglect of sad reality, which tells me that no such conversations took place; that those gentlemen, besides plain sense and solid knowledge, have also much of the milk of human kindness, and would not hurt the feelings of our musical representative. A dignified silence was as natural to them as these impudent meddlings to our old woman in the Foreign-office, and his drivelling comates at our council-board.

"Ah! that it should come to this! In three short years—nay, not so much, scarce two—has the great Tamworth doctor brought England down from her high station;—her notes remain unnoticed; her diplomatic remonstrances even without a reply! There is the bitter that spoils the sweetness of my satisfaction. Can I behold with pleasure the wasting of the present era, big with the fate of so many nations? Can I rejoice to see the giant thus emasculated—to see the empire brought into contempt, from whence all lovers of the human race have ever been wont to expect rules and laws and practices meet to advance the best interests, the physical and moral elevation of mankind? Heaven forbid!

"Nor do I see, though without surprise, yet not without pain, the measures taken or threatened to assert your independence and whip the British Government into more seeming conduct. If your measures are really beneficial to the Prussian people, let them be taken quite independently of the principles or doings of Great Britain or any other country. But if pernicious to Prussia, they surely ought not to be adopted either to spite us or to teach us how to be wise. Thus to play the schoolmaster is somewhat fantastical, and may become costly. Is not practice better than doctrine? You admit the correctness and desirableness of Free-Trade principles, but for the benefit of Great Britain you would castigate yourselves. Why do we laugh at Don Quixote, but that with unusual wisdom in his mouth, he took folly by the hand to battle windmills, mistaking them for giants. To coerce the English people is as chimerical; to expect anything rational from the present administration is equally so—they have no power or influence but for evil. Being gone (which may be soon), Great Britain will be herself again. But then you will be hampered by interests and monopolies, which you are now going to create and foster, and you will rue the day when you enacted restrictions and made treaties, to teach my Lord Aberdeen more modesty and better manners."

"Brother Jonathan is a cunning fellow, and being not on the best terms with his cousins this side the water, has paid his addresses to our honest but poorer neighbours of the Zoll-Verein. Your treaty will disappoint you, in the sense in which you seem to set value upon it; and if they fancy in Yankeeeland that they have not got the whip-hand of you, they will not ratify—that's sometimes done in Washington. I, for one, set no value on such affairs which always aim at that which is not worth having, and are meant to prevent that which is the only rational benefit derivable from foreign commerce. Each party wants to export, whereas imports alone are the desirable thing."

"The League will hardly follow your counsel, and recommend moderation in mercantile reform, and reserve in commercial concessions. Moderation is the very disease under which we labour here; and we do not look upon reductions of import duties as concession, nor are they such. To eat more bread and consume more sugar and coffee, will be good service to ourselves, whatever it may be to others; but that your position as a Free Trader is as yet somewhat unstable, you would see that we only mean to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market. In this there is no concession or liberality; it is only common sense and business-like conduct. Rely on it the Leaguers know well what they are about; they have a rational, honest, and tangible purpose which they mean to attain by rational, honest, and tangible means. If they were to venture upon reserves, manoeuvres, and diplomatic intricacies, such as your counsel involves, men of such various stations, habits, characters, and interests would not hold long together. Simplicity of purpose, of action, and of means is the secret of their strength and of their success."

"I understand that, at the late bidding for iron rails at Cologne, your ironmasters tendered lower than ours, and have obtained large contracts. Does this not prove the needlessness of protection? Here we are in a pretty fix, more especially in commercial affairs. Hints and rumours of large alterations of duties are abroad. Some talk of sugar, some of coffee; now it is to be wool and cotton, then tallow and soap. In the meantime all is stagnation—the perennial fruit of the restrictive system ripening every spring into high expectations, never to be gathered in; for the issue has ever been, and will be again, disappointment. The Minister dares not venture upon any great measure. He is not his own master, but the football of the landed aristocracy—of selfishness and of party spirit."

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—The Times newspaper of the 18th, in giving a brief statement of the speeches at the Great League meeting at Covent-garden Theatre on the preceding night, reports that the hon. member for Sheffield (in discussing the question as to the advantages derived to the shopkeepers of London and other places from the expenditure of the wealthier classes,) expressed an opinion that "the number of those who spend their money in foreign parts is not very great."

I cannot help thinking that Mr. Ward has underrated his estimate on this point, and that there is a far larger sum expended by our fellow-countrymen in foreign parts than is generally supposed, and that we have, in a very great degree, to thank the corn and provision monopolies for it.

In an official document, lately published in France under the authority of the Minister of the Interior, it was stated that there were then in that country 70,000 English residents—not birds of passage, but domiciled fixtures.

We may safely say that, one with another, each of these would spend three francs a day, and upon this calculation we have a sum exceeding three millions sterling annually expended by British residents in France alone. Let it be assumed (and it is far below the mark,) that there are 70,000 more British residents scattered over the other countries of the Continent, and it will be found, according to the same rate of calculation, that through their expenditure a sum exceeding six millions sterling is annually distributed amongst the tradesmen of foreign countries, instead of being spent amongst those at home.

About one-third of these persons may, however, be classed as emigrants from whom, caprice, or fashion, and not of necessity. But not so with the remainder—they have been driven from their own, to seek refuge in a cheaper country, because neither they nor any of small incomes can now hope to maintain themselves or their families in "Merry England!" where the shameless monopolist in corn, and the monopolist in every necessary of life which it is possible to monopolize will allow no one to put a piece of food into his mouth without first seizing half of it for his own share, and for no other reason that can be given than that he chooses, and has contrived to get the power to do so.

I am, Sir, yours,

A SUFFERER.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—Since the income-tax has come into operation I have lost not less than half-a-dozen good customers, who have gone to Guernsey, Jersey, or the Continent, where they can live so much cheaper than they can in England.

It is a fact that a vast number of West-end tradesmen fancy that Free Trade would injure them by reducing the rents of the nobility and gentry, thereby lessening the sums to be expended among themselves, without considering the thousands of families of little independent fortunes who are now obliged to live abroad because there they can live so much cheaper, but who, if Free Trade were carried out, would most gladly come back to England, for then prices would be so equalized that there would be no inducement for people to banish themselves from their native country. I am induced to trouble you with this, in the hope that it may convert a fellow-trader, for I feel convinced there is hardly one at this end of the town who has not lost some of his customers (and the best ones too, viz., the paying ones) in consequence of the high price of food and heavy taxation.

I remain, Sir, &c. &c.,

A LEAGUER AND WEST-END TRADESMAN.

Regent-street, April 23, 1844.

P.S. A trader is a sort of fixture. His customers can go where they can live cheapest; he must stop and pay enormous taxes and double price for his food, and this with diminished means, from excessive competition, which so often cuts down his profits that his business is hardly worth attending to.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

Dursley.

SIR,—Having received a number of Anti-Corn-Law papers, I beg leave to transmit to you the following particulars, which have not been brought before the public as I could wish:—

In 1834, the handloom weavers of the north presented a petition to the House, complaining of deep distress. To examine this petition the House appointed a committee of sixty-four of its members, Sir James Graham being among the number. This committee sat for two sessions. In 1835 they agreed to a report, and stated to the House that the distress of the petitioners was to be attributed to various causes, and, among others, to the Corn Laws; and they stated further that the handloom weavers and their families consisted of 800,000 individuals dependent on that trade for support. Here the subject dropped; but in 1837 the House addressed her Majesty to appoint a commission to inquire into the condition of the weavers of the United Kingdom. A commission of fourteen members was accordingly appointed, four of whom constituted the central board, which sat in London; the other ten travelled the country, and sent to the board the statements they collected from all parts of the United Kingdom. W. A. Miles, Esq., investigated the condition of the county of Gloucester, and he found 1135 families of handloom weavers living on a far less quantity of food than that supplied to common felons in the county gaol. But, notwithstanding this distress, out of 782 prisoners committed to Horsley gaol in two years, there were only twenty-seven weavers, of whom but four were charged with any serious offence; whereas the number of labourers amounted to 587. This statement is to be found in Mr. Miles's report, p. 413.

From the village of Uley seventy of the inhabitants emigrated to seek bread in a foreign land. In 1839 there were 180 houses without inhabitants. Since 1800, 140 manufacturers have failed in this county, the principal number, however, since 1815. Notwithstanding all this, the handloom weavers have maintained their character as a loyal though suffering body of men; for when the standard of revolt was raised by the Chartist leaders in the county of Gloucester, the handloom weavers held a county meeting, and pledged themselves to stand by the British constitution; and thus was the peace of the county preserved.

The report of the commission before referred to was completed and signed on the 19th of February, 1841, after which it was presented to her Majesty. The commissioners stated that they considered the Corn Laws, as they affected the handloom weavers, the chief object of the appointment of the commission; and they recommended their repeal for the general good of her Majesty's suffering subjects. But when her Majesty's then Government proposed a fixed duty in the place of the sliding scale, the present Government voted them out of office; and thus her Majesty's commission was made void, and the weavers disappointed and left to suffer. I think they ought to know these particulars, in order that they may see how they have been treated. This might be accomplished by a great public meeting, or through the press. I likewise think that a meeting of the Wesleyan Methodist local preachers of Great Britain, on the subject of the Corn Laws, would be beneficial. I have conversed with some of my brethren on the subject, and they are of the same opinion. I should be glad to hear from you upon the subject.

I remain your obedient servant,

TIMOTHY EXELL,

An Enemy to the Corn Laws.

N.B.—I have four volumes in my possession containing the particulars of this commission.

The following letter has been forwarded by Mr. Cobden, in reply to an invitation to discuss the Corn-Law question with Mr. Feargus O'Connor:—

National Anti-Corn-Law League,

67, Fleet-street, London, April 24, 1844.

SIR,—I have received your letter, informing me that, at a public meeting held in Stockport, at which you officiated as chairman, a resolution was passed requesting me to discuss the question of the Corn Laws with Mr. Feargus O'Connor. With all deference to the opinion of the meeting, I think my time may be better employed than in trying to convert Mr. O'Connor to the principles of the League. To confess the truth, I think the Corn-Law repealers are much indebted to Mr. O'Connor for his opposition, inasmuch as it recommends our cause to the favourable consideration of all rational politicians; and should he at any future time offer his support to the League, I trust the Free Traders will imitate the example of his own countrymen in their repeal agitation, by declining his co-operation.

As respects the opinion of the population of Stockport upon the Corn-Law question, I will venture to affirm that, with the exception of a few young persons, who will grow wiser as they grow older, there is scarcely a working man in the borough who will aid Mr. O'Connor in his efforts to maintain the landlords' monopoly.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Mr. Joseph Carter. RICHD. COBDEN.

Letter from the Rev. Braithwaite Armytage, Vicar of Peterchurch, to the Rev. Dr. Jenkyn:—

Peterchurch, March 15, 1844.

REV. AND DEAR SIR,—I have this day received the greatest possible pleasure from reading your letter to Lord Brougham upon the Corn Laws, and most fully do I agree with you in every sentiment contained therein.

It certainly is the most important question that can occupy the thoughts of a rational man; and, therefore, a question that we, as Ministers of the Gospel, ought to take the most lively interest in. I must confess that I have but very lately taken upon me that interest, but with the blessing of God I hope that I may continue so to do, and thereby "heap coals of fire" upon the heads of my poorer brethren.

May I beg of you to inform me whose publications you consider the plainest and the best for distribution among a very poor and ignorant population like my own, consisting of about 900 persons, mostly small farmers. Particularly inform me (if you please) as to any tracts upon the subject written by the clergy. The Hon. B. Noel's is the only one I have seen, and that I consider unanswerable!

Most humbly apologising to you for the trouble I am giving you, also for the liberty I am taking in addressing a perfect stranger—I remain, rev. and dear Sir,

Your obedient servant,

BRAITHWAITE ARMYTAGE, Vicar.

The following letter from the Rev. Dr. Prendergast, of the Established Church, was read at the Free-Trade meeting held at Greenwich on Wednesday last:—

Lewisham-hill, April 23, 1844.

MY DEAR SIR,—I venture to trouble you with the enclosed ten guineas, as a donation to the Greenwich branch of the Association for supplying the poor with abundant labour and cheap food, useful instruction and innocent amusement, which, by a less euphonic name, you call the Anti-Corn-Law League. And I take this opportunity of expressing the sense of obligation which every lover of even-handed justice must feel to the leaders of the League for their untiring zeal, their generous self-devotion, and, what is more, their eloquent facts, for they have brought forward in favour of Free Trade a variety of argument and illustration, of which even the wisest and best informed would scarcely have supposed the subject susceptible.

I must add, that I view with particular satisfaction the course they have adopted at the recent elections: by this course, vigorously pursued and firmly persevered in, they will carry out the intentions and give effect to the enactments of that large measure of reform at which our good friends the Whigs struggled so many years, undaunted by the frowns of the Court, and undismayed by the coldness of the people; and at length, by the providential concurrence of similar struggles in other parts of Europe, most wondrously achieved.

I am, my dear Sir, yours, very faithfully,

John Wade, Esq.

JOSEPH PRENDERGAST.

The following, among other letters, were addressed to the Chairman of the Liverpool Anti Monopoly Association, on the occasion of the late Free-Trade banquet:—

FROM THOMAS CARLYLE, ESQ.

Chelsea, London, March 12, 1844.

SIR,—With many thanks to the Council of the Anti-Monopoly Association for the honour they do me, I have to express my regret at not being able to attend on the day in question.

No man wishes better to the cause of Free Trade—which, indeed, seems to me, in itself, the cause of common sense and common honesty—a sad thing to be called upon to demonstrate at this time of day. Called upon, nevertheless, many are, and grievous obstructions on all sides do abound. These, if the cause is true, will of a very surety have to take themselves away, and the sooner the cheaper it will be for them, I believe! But, perhaps, we have not yet got at the whole truth; perhaps it is on that ground not entirely without profit to us, though at their own great peril, that they are permitted to continue yet awhile.

Wishing you and all men that mean manfully good success,

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

T. CARLYLE.

FROM MISS MARTINEAU.

Tynemouth, March 25, 1844.

SIR,—I hear with strong interest of your intended Free-Trade demonstration in Easter week.

My presence at your festival is, as you suppose, out of the question; but I shall think of you with cordial good wishes. To me it appears that the Free-Trade movements now in progress promise, not only success as to their immediate aims, but a yet greater ulterior benefit. They will assuredly give us Free Trade; and I fully believe they will give us yet more—a sound portion of national education.

Unhappily, we cannot so agree as to collect the children of the nation into school-houses, where all may be trained to intelligence and good morals; but a considerable portion of this good work seems to be done out of school-houses by Free-Trade teachers, by the discipline of thought into which they lead multitudes of the people who never before were encouraged to exercise their minds. Men who induce and enable masses of the people to examine and understand their own and others' interests, and to act upon the truths they lay hold of, are as efficient public educators as perhaps could be proposed under any view and any system. I, for one, honour them for their twofold service—for their efforts to bring food into every man's house, and for their influence in rousing every man to exercise and inform his own mind. The next generation will be indebted to them, not only for more comfort, but for more wisdom. I have not yet seen that the Free-Trade leaders are toasted or cheered as national educators; but, in my opinion, they deserve it. Believe me, with every good wish to your cause,

Very truly yours,

HARRIET MARTINEAU.

LIVERPOOL ANTI-MONOPOLY ASSOCIATION.

We have received the fourth number of "The Free-Trade Circular," which is issued monthly by this zealous and highly intelligent body of Free Traders. The "Circular" confines itself this month to two topics—the true source of agricultural prosperity, and the sugar monopoly. Its observations on the former are founded on an advertisement which recently appeared in a Liverpool paper, announcing for sale an extensive estate in the county of Renfrew, in which the proprietor sets forth, as its most prominent advantage, that "it includes a town of 1200 inhabitants, chiefly engaged in the cotton manufacture, and that there are ample means of increasing the existing, and of introducing the various other, branches of industry and manufacture." The "Circular," speaking of this advertisement, says:—

"The advertisement proceeds in a business-like way to assure intending purchasers that 'the stability of the present rental, and the certainty of a progressive advance, are strikingly established by the fact, that the rents of the estate have been steadily maintained ever since the war-prices ceased to operate, and now a unit exceed what they were twenty-three years ago, notwithstanding the general depressing circumstances of the times, and a competition which has lately arisen in the neighbourhood for the purchase of the estate.'"

The gross amount of the rent and returns from the estate, as now let, is £9420 0 0
Deduct public burdens .. 305 0 0 or nearly 8d. per £.

Remains FREE RENT .. £9115 0 0

Having noticed this remarkable admission, the "Circular" observes:—

"Nothing, indeed, can be more contradictory than the assertions of the very same monopolist landowners. They appear to have two distinct sets of facts: one for George Robins and the steward, and the other for the hucksters. As men of business, with an estate on sale, they point to the advantage of some thriving populous district; but as 'strong party men' they declaim against the extension of manufactures as inimical to the landed interest! As men of business, they proclaim to the public 'that all the new sets continue to be made at an advance on the former rents notwithstanding the depressing circumstances of the times'; but at the private county meetings for the 'protection of agriculture,' they declare their profound conviction that agriculture is not sufficiently protected! As men of business, they inform intending purchasers that the public burdens are 'extremely low,' and they are always prepared to show a very captivating amount of rent; but when the Corn Laws are discussed, out of Parliament, they are accustomed to re-assert their claim for 'protection' upon the plea that there are many 'very heavy special burdens' upon the land."

The "Circular" then points to the above statement to show that while the "public burdens" on land amount to but 8d. in the pound, or about 3½ per cent. on the entire rental, the taxes upon the chief necessities of life—bread, tea, coffee, and sugar—amount to from 50 to 200 per cent. The "Circular" concludes this subject with the following remarkable statement:—

"We have a fine specimen of the 'special burdens upon land' in the adjoining county of Chester. By a Parliamentary return (January 23rd, 1838), moved for and obtained by Mr. Thorneley, it appears that the amount received for tollage duties on the river Weaver and West-ward Canal, from 1793 to 1837 inclusive, amounted to £816,515 12s. 3d., making, with sundry other receipts of £46,846 0s. 10½d. (not including £11,910 borrowed in 1838), a total of £864,361 13s. 12½d., of which only £491,580 19s. 13d. had been 'appropriated to maintenance, repairs, and improvements,' leaving a surplus of £372,781 14s. 0½d.; which has been applied, not to the reduction of the tolls—manure never paid any toll—not for the benefit of that trade from which the vast sum was exacted. No: we quote the simple language of the return, 'paid for the use of the County of Chester, £389,155 18s. 3½d.' the whole of which must certainly have been otherwise paid by rates upon the owner and occupiers of the land; so that the advantage of a great Cheshire estate might run thus:—In addition to the other peculiar advantages of this locality, it should be mentioned that the county rates are, in part, paid by a tax levied on salt and other commodities passing along the Weaver navigation to and from Liverpool and the manufacturing districts."

THE SUGAR MONOPOLISTS.

Our readers scarcely need to be reminded of the facts in relation to our sugar colonies. Under the system of slavery, we gave them an entire monopoly of the British market. They could not compete with other countries; and, to favour their weakness, our sympathising Government laid duties on foreign sugar nearly three times as heavy as the duty on colonial. Then came the period of emancipation, and we liberally, lavishly gave 20 millions to deliver the slaves—a sum sufficient not only to free the slaves but to buy the estates also. Then came the torturing apprenticeship, and freedom at last, when it was found, that in point of fact, free labour was so much more effective than slave labour had been, that, though costing more, it was cheaper. But the planters, still relying on protection, would not improve their modes of cultivation, and adapt themselves to altered circumstances. Sugar became scarce and dear, and the Board of Trade discovered that a diminution of the discriminatory duties would not only increase the supply and reduce the price, thus saving millions to the people, but that it would also add some millions to the revenue. In 1841, the Whigs attacked the monopoly; but the old slaveholders, rallying under the anti-slavery cry, defeated the attempt; and the foundation of their case was the confident assurance given by Lord Sandon and by the Government, that the future supply of sugar from our colonies would be ample. The monopolists triumphed. The planters have had three years more of their much-loved protection—the people three years more of dear sugar, with an income-tax to make up the revenue which cheap sugar would have given. And now let us see what is the happy condition of the protected planters. We are indebted to a friend in Jamaica for a copy of the Morning Journal of the 8th of March, 1844, in which we find an important debate in the House of Assembly on the condition of the island, on a motion to memorialize the Queen for the maintenance of the differential duties. In support of this measure, the strongest statements were made as to the ruinous condition of the plantations. The mover of the memorial represented that the abandonment of the greater proportion of the properties was inevitable, unless speedy relief were afforded; and he stated that in one parish, out of 23 estates, five had been, and eight more were in course of being abandoned. Mr. Geddes was of opinion that, in the course of eighteen months, two-thirds of the estates would be abandoned. Mr. Whitelock said:—

"It was a notorious fact that most properties had drawn for three times the value of the produce shipped; the consequence was, that supplies and remittances had been stopped, and the prices at home had refused to honour any more bills, unless the attorneys would pledge that produce would be shipped to cover the amount of the same."

Mr. Sanguinetti declared the memorial to be too highly coloured, and feared that it would fail to excite sympathy for its want of truth. He doubted also whether the statement of their ruinous condition might not be used against them; for to declare that the greater number of estates were on the eve of abandonment would "furnish an argument in favour of those who clamour for cheap sugar, and insist upon having it for the starving people of England." He urged that the more politic tale to tell would be, that they were resorting to cheaper modes of cultivation, and would be able to supply cheap sugar by free labour. Mr. Osborn followed in a similar strain. He asked if it was prudent for an insolvent, applying to his friends for assistance, to represent truly his condition? "How could they expect capitalists at home would advance money, when they told them that they were abandoning their properties?" Some speakers contended that the estates of Jamaica could not be cultivated profitably, unless the owners themselves looked after their property, instead of leaving it in the indifferent and extravagant hands of attorneys and agents. Others, on the contrary, represented that, without the skill of these parties, there could be no good cultivation; and if the produce would not pay for them, the estates must be abandoned. (One gentleman mentioned the case of an estate where £600 a year are paid for management, and yet it is profitable. The conclusions to be drawn from all this are, that our protective system has utterly failed. The planters have relied on monopoly, instead of upon themselves; but even monopoly cannot support men pursuing such a policy. They complain that they are going to ruin now as fast as possible; and yet their only prayer is—perpetuate the system that has brought us to this pass. They are between the horns of a dilemma. Unless they cry "Ruin! ruin!" with all their might, they fear the Government may touch their monopoly, for the benefit, as they say, of the "starving people of England." But if they cry "Ruin!" too loudly, their creditors may lay hands on them; and the people of England, seeing through the delusiveness of the promises of abundant supplies from the colonies, may become impatient of the monopoly. If they could only tell their tales in private, how well they might manage! To Mr. Gladstone they would say, "All the West India property of your family will be destroyed, unless you keep up the monopoly;" to their creditors they would say, "We are cheapening our modes of cultivation, and shall be able to pay amply for all your advances;" while to the public they would cry, "Increase your efforts to put down slavery in other countries, and in a few years we will supply you both abundantly and cheaply." The misfortune of these planters is, that instead of telling their tales separately, each to the ears for which it is designed, they tell them all in the same place, at the same time, in the ears of reporters who convey them to the press, which sends them to England—and thus the whole game of fraud and plunder is exposed. What is the value of the West India colonies to England? Our trade with them? The fact is, that for what we export to these islands we might purchase twice as much tropical produce from other countries. If a man keeps a farm, he ought surely to eat his bread and bacon somewhat cheaper than those who buy. If a nation has sugar colonies, of what value are they unless they supply sugar at least as cheaply as independent countries do? Yet these West Indians, to whom we pay double price for every ounce of sugar, have the audacity to claim a continuance of this system of plunder, and to talk, besides, of another grant of we know not how many millions for compensation. They pretend to say that they are ruined by emancipation, which has rendered labour dear. A Mr. Osborn, who, in a very manly way, declared himself a descendant, by the mother's side, of the negro race, and who repudiated the right assumed by others to hold property in slaves, said:—

"They knew very well that, during the time of slavery, the labourers got no wages at all. They only got a small allowance of fish. They knew very well that, in times of slavery, a worn-out estate might have paid; but in a state of freedom, when money wages had to be paid for labour, it could not be carried on, and it was necessary that it be abandoned."

According to this the profit made by the planter was just that of which he robbed the labourer. But slave labour was not so cheap as Mr. Osborn represents. The fact is, that free labour is much cheaper. The hoeing of an acre which, in 1823 cost from £5 to £7, is now done by free labour for £3 10s. A chain of walling, which used to cost £5, is now done for 22s. So that, though the cost of a slave for a day was but a red herring, and the wages of a free labourer may be one or two shillings, yet, comparing the entire cost of labour with its produce, free labour is by far the cheapest. These planters pretend that they cannot compete with the slave countries. Why, one of them confessed that, while they have been trusting to protection, the slave countries having no protection, but a most costly system, have been making improvements, which have given them great advantage. Then let us apply the same discipline to the planters. Strip off their protection, regardless of their cries of ruin, and we shall soon find them in a more healthy condition, and we shall have with them a profitable, instead of a losing trade.—Sheffield Independent.

AGRICULTURE.

THE FELLAHS OF EGYPT AND THE FARMERS OF ENGLAND.

"It was most desirable for the farmer to know the actual quantity of corn grown in this country, as such knowledge would ensure steadiness of prices, which was infinitely more valuable to the agriculturist than fluctuating prices. But to ascertain this there was extreme difficulty. They could not leave it to the farmer to make a return of the quantity which he produced, for it was not for his interest to do so. If in any one or two years he produced four quarters per acre on land which had previously grown but three, he might fear that his landlord would say, 'Your land is more productive than I imagined, and I must, therefore, raise your rent.' The interest of the farmers, therefore, would be to underrate and to furnish low returns."—Mr. Christopher's speech on Mr. Milner Gibson's motion.

Scarcely can a landowner open his mouth upon the subject of British agriculture without dropping—whatever may be his intention—statements and admissions which are pearls and diamonds to Free-Traders. Of this, the passage from Mr. Christopher's speech upon Mr. Gibson's motion for returns showing the agricultural products of the kingdom, which we have placed at the head of this article, forms an apt illustration. Now, Mr. Christopher is a monopolist of the first water; he represents a Lincolnshire constituency supposed to have an ardent affection for laws restrictive of the trade in corn, and he is one of the few Monopolist members who attempt to give plausible reasons for their faith in monopoly. It therefore becomes well worthy the attention of the farmer to examine and understand the propositions which are expressed or implied in Mr. Christopher's speech. First, he says that steadiness of price is of infinite value to the farmer; and, therefore, that a knowledge of the actual state of the crops in general, which would tend to promote steadiness of price, must be beneficial to the farmer. This is what the Free-Traders have always said; and one of our proved indictments against all Corn Laws is, that they increase the fluctuations of price, which arise from variations in seasons, and prevent the correctives which a free trade in corn would supply. But "there is a lion in the path;" there is a difficulty, "an extreme difficulty," according to Mr. Christopher, in "ascertaining the quantity of corn grown in this country." Will our readers believe what it is? In Egypt, on the banks of the Nile, in the most fertile corn district of the habitable globe, the Fellahs, the cultivators of the soil, anxiously conceal the quantity of grain they produce from the knowledge of the agents of their rapacious landlord, the Pacha, lest he should exact from them the last measure of wheat on which they and their children hope to subsist. Travellers have told us that these unhappy husbandmen bury large quantities of the grain they grow, hide it under their hearthstones, and resort to all sorts of devices to make their apparent lower than their real produce; that they submit to be beaten well nigh to death before they disclose their hidden granaries; and under an instinctive fear of violent death only do they surrender to their grasping landlord their means of living. The indignation felt by the observer of these things has been communicated to his readers, until it has become a matter of surprise how the Egyptian ruler, who does these things, should venture to lay claim to be the "protector" and regenerator of Egyptian industry. But Mehemet Ali is a barbarian, his Fellahs (his tenants) are slaves, such a system of tyranny could not exist in a civilized community, will be the reflections arising in the minds of our readers. What, it will be thought or said, can such facts have to do with the state of British agriculture? Mr. Christopher the monopolist, the "farmer's friend," the "protector" of British husbandry, shall himself supply the answer:—"They could not," says the Lincolnshire representative, "leave it to the farmer to make a return of the quantity which he produced, for it was not his interest to do so!" The reader's natural exclamation is, why? And Mr. Christopher again furnishes the explanation:—"If in any one or two years he produced four quarters per acre on land which had previously only grown three, he might fear that his landlord would say, 'YOUR LAND IS MORE PRODUCTIVE THAN I IMAGINED, AND I MUST, THEREFORE, RAISE YOUR RENT.' And that such a fear is no chimera every day's experience informs the English farmers. In what does this differ from the practice of the Fellahs of the Nile? What is the difference between the Pacha of Egypt and the Monopolist landowners of England? Oh yes, there is a difference: the engine of compulsion in the valley of the Nile is the bastinado, in merry England it is yearly tenancies and the power of distress!"

In principle, the habit, the debasing habit, of misstating the amount of produce, into which the husbandman has been forced, is the same in England as in Egypt; but the moral degradation which it implies in the former country is far greater than in the latter. The Egyptian farmer is a mere slavish drudge; he has no capital, skill, or intelligence; he raises his crops almost by the spontaneous bounty of the earth and the mighty river on whose bank he dwells, without manure, without implements, and by the means of the most primitive husbandry; he is a heavily-burdened serf in a land of slaves, and he uses the slave's defence in cheating his oppressor.

On the other hand, the English farmer is always a man of some, generally of considerable, capital and skill; it is by providence, forethought, and judgment, he must seek to raise the crops necessary to meet his engagements; he uses many and highly-finished implements; he is the master and arbiter of the weal or woe of a great number of labourers; and, above all, he is an educated, responsible, freeman. Yet we are told that, under the existing system—ay, and that by one who seeks to perpetuate it—no trustworthy return of the quantity of corn grown can be obtained from English farmers, because they fear that, if landlords were aware of the actual produce grown, they would put on the screw of competition and increase their rents!! Can anything be said more condemnatory of the actual system of land tenures in England? Does not Mr. Christopher's brief speech speak volumes against those direct consequences of the Corn Laws, artificial prices and yearly tenancies?

How true it is that every step taken towards the investigation of the real condition of British agriculture brings out fresh evidence against the Corn-Law monopoly, and that usually from the mouths of the Monopolists themselves. Farmers quite understand that improvements which give increased produce are inevitably followed by an advance of rent, and this has been broadly and strongly stated by many good farmers as their reason for discountenancing agricultural associations and all societies in which the results of their cultivation are communicated by farmers to each other, and to their landlords. We know a good farmer who was induced by a friend to publish in the "Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society" the particulars of a rotation of crops he had adopted with great advantage upon a description of land difficult to manage, and who for so doing has been called by his neighbours "a fool," and taunted with "telling the landlords too much, of which advantage will be taken." But though farmers seem to understand, that if they increase their produce their rents will be raised, it seems strange that they should not see with equal distinctness that all the additional price they may obtain for their produce will with equal certainty find its way into the landlords' pockets.

Yet it is a fact that advanced prices are more regarded by the landowners as the means of raising rents than increased produce. Of this the Monopolist landlords' own organ, the Morning Post, is so fully sensible that it actually denounces "improved modes of cultivation" as no less "ruinous" than the "reduction of protection." This is very explicitly avowed in an article on Mr. Christopher's speech.

This article is so illustrative of the real principle of "protection," and so entirely proves that nothing short of an artificial scarcity will serve the purpose of the Monopolists, that we have given below a few extracts from it, with explanatory comments.

GOOD FARMING INCONSISTENT WITH PROTECTION.

The Monopolists, at all events amongst themselves, have been driven to speak out what they always assumed and acted upon, namely, that scarcity and dearth, real or artificial, are essential to their objects. This country contains a large and industrious population, whose industry is set in motion by a larger amount of capital—accumulated labour, the savings of men who, unlike the landlords, did not spend their incomes before they were received—than exists in any country in the world, and is directed by a degree of energy and skill unexampled in any other race. Such has been the effect of Anglo-Saxon industry in this country, that in spite of many untoward circumstances, in defiance of the most vicious and anti-commercial system of legislation an industrious nation ever groined under, the wealth of the community has constantly increased, while population has advanced in a ratio previously unknown except in newly-settled countries. Now, it has unfortunately happened that the laws by which the British nation is governed have not been made by those who have contributed to the national wealth, and its concomitant, a rapidly-increasing population, but by those who chanced to possess the land, and whose possessions, without any exertion of industry or intelligence on their own parts, have been made enormously valuable by the growth of wealth around them; in a word, by the landowners.

In this state of things it occurred to the landowning legislators that, though they had contributed nothing to the national wealth by their own industry, yet, being lawmakers, they might so order matters as to take a toll on the industry of all other classes.

The way they set about it was, to enact that the people should eat no food but that raised on British soil, which, as experience had shown, was, under existing circumstances, insufficient for British consumption. Foreign grain was therefore excluded until famine should have become so great as to endanger the personal safety of the lawmakers. But here, again, Anglo-Saxon energy seemed likely to counteract the project of its Norman rulers. Landowners could not themselves cultivate their lands, and husbandry became the business of a body of industrious capitalists drawn from the classes which have advanced Britain to be the commercial mistress of the earth. After trying various short cuts to success at the expense of other people, recommended by the landowners, these capitalists, the farmers, began to see that their only safe reliance was to increase the quantity and improve the quality of the commodities it was their business to produce. And upon this the farming body in general is at this time acting, with, of course, very varying circumstances of local and individual effect. But, as our landlord legislators had founded their expectations upon receiving a capitation-tax from the community, in the shape of an extra price upon all the food consumed here—such consumption being by law confined to the food raised at home—they began to discover with dismay, that if British skill, industry, and capital were applied, unfettered and untrammelled, to the culture of the soil, it would probably become so productive as to reduce the prices of grain as low, or lower, than the prices in the open markets of the world.

Hence they are now trying to found the grounds for a sort of inverse Jack-Cade legislation, by which the penny loaf is to be sold for twopence, and every one is to be obliged to buy a double quantity for the benefit of the owners of land!! This brief narrative of the progress of the Corn-Law question is necessary to make intelligible the very singular quotations from the Morning Post we propose to lay before our readers. Commenting on Mr. Christopher's speech, that journal says:—

"Mr. Christopher has, if we do not mistake, lent himself to the delusion which the Royal Agricultural Society has for some years been propagating—the delusion, we mean, that improved methods of farming will compensate the farmer for diminished legislative protection."

Practically, every farmer knows this to be untrue; for, whenever "legislative protection" has been inoperative, the farmer has endeavoured, and usually with success, to meet lower price by means of increased produce. Again, the landlords for whom this trash is written, are told:—

"Agricultural improvement is, in fact, dependent on legislative protection to agriculture—and in direct proportion to the amount of the protection will be the extent of the improvement. To urge British farmers to improve, because the protection hitherto secured to them by the Legislature has been lessened, is to urge farmers to rush upon ruin with the least possible delay."

So far is it from agricultural improvement being dependent upon "protection," that the very reverse is the truth. The great movement in husbandry now taking place, and which the mortgaged patrons of the Post contemplate with so much horror, received its impulse from the low prices of 1833, 1834, and 1835, and the complete exposure of the fallaciousness of protection made in the evidence given before the agricultural committee of 1836.

Again, see what a hideous picture of plenty it is which alarms the patrons of the Post :—

"The British farmer now finds prices unremunerating. He is urged by friends and foes in chorus to multiply the quantity of his produce, and by that process to render prices less remunerating still. Cobden and Bright tell the farmers of England to exclude foreign corn from our markets by the agency of 'scientific farming.' Cobden and Bright forget, however, to state that if 'scientific farming' shall avail to exclude foreign corn from our markets, 'scientific farming' must, in the first place, depress the price of food in England to the level of price established in the cheapest corn-growing countries in the world."

Now, to produce this result through "scientific farming," every available agricultural labourer must be constantly employed; and we know that the existing number of labourers would be scarcely sufficient for the purpose, and nothing more is required to show that the state of things the Monopolist predicts, should it really happen, must be one of joy and hope.

So, again, we are told :—

"Sir Robert Peel and Lord Stanley again have, in rivalry of the leading Leaguers, discoursed largely at agricultural meetings on the necessity of adopting 'improved modes of cultivation.' These distinguished persons always forget, however, to indicate the mode in which, under these Free-Trade schemes of legislation, an increased power of consumption is to be called into existence to counterbalance the depressing influence in prices which increased production must inevitably exercise. If the 'improved modes of cultivation' recommended by Lord Stanley and Sir Robert Peel should increase our annual growth of wheat by only one-fifth, the English farmer would find it difficult to sell it at the rate of even 30s. a quarter."

One more extract, and we have done. The Post says :—

"We are as anxious as the most devoted worshipper of Liebig can be, that 'improved modes of cultivation' should be adopted universally by the farmers of Great Britain; but if we would not confine the benefit of these improved modes of cultivation to the recipients of fixed money incomes, we must augment the 'protection' of the farmer before we call on him to increase the quantity of his produce. A new consuming power must, in short, be created, to prevent the farmer from being ruined by the increased means of enjoyment which he may place at the disposal of society. Principles of legislation—diametrically opposed to the principles of Free Trade—must be adopted. The value of labour must be raised, not lessened. To increase the market value of labour is, in fact, the most direct mode of stimulating improvements in agriculture. Increased means of consumption in the great body of labourers will, of necessity, induce the production of larger quantities of food; but the production of larger quantities of food, by means of 'scientific farming,' will not on the other hand, of necessity, secure increased means of consumption to the great body of our labourers. The advocates of 'scientific farming,' be it remembered, propose, simply, to increase the quantity of food. They do not propose to increase the means of consumption now possessed by the mass of our labourers."

We scarcely know whether the above passage is the offspring of real, stolid, squirearchical ignorance, or whether it is the cunning of the inverted Jack Cadeists, who declare the penny loaf must sell for twopence; but it is the fact that large and permanent reductions in the prices of home-grown grain could not be brought about in this country by means of improved farming without "raising the value" of agricultural labour enormously, while cheap food and unrestricted commerce would give an extraordinary increase to the means of consumption of the great body of British labourers.

Let us here note that, in reading the above extracts from the Monopolist journal, the reader must substitute the word "landlord" for the word "farmer;" and this correction must usually be made in reading or hearing the arguments of the Monopolists.

But we must do our contemporary and his patrons an act of justice, by admitting that there may be a class to whom the general adoption of "scientific farming," and the low prices of corn resulting therefrom, would possibly bring ruin—we mean those on whose lands no improvements were made. With low prices and low produce, rent, if it existed at all, would be merely nominal. To this class belong the deeply-mortgaged landlords (and some of them are the nominal owners of vast estates) who have not the means of improving themselves, and who, to ensure improvements being made by tenants, must grant leases of considerable duration at reduced rents. This appears plainly in the following sentence :—

"The advocates of 'scientific farming,' therefore, who are not also, and in the first place, advocates of a far more stringent system of protection than now exists, are (it may be unconsciously) stimulating the farmer [landlord] to ruin himself FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE CREDITOR CLASSES OF SOCIETY."

There is the rub. The true objects of the Post and its patrons' hostility are the "creditor classes of society." Let men who can pay their debts without taxing other people for the means look to this in time.

AGRICULTURAL INSTRUCTORS.

It is difficult to say whether those who take pen in hand in defence of the landlords' monopoly of corn are most obnoxious to the charge of ignorance or dishonesty. To the latter class must be referred such writers as Mr. Cayley, whose ingenious quotations from Adam Smith were last week exposed; while the correspondent of a Monopolist journal, who writes upon "the Corn Law and the tariff," offers a good specimen of the former. This writer, after rather incoherently stating that "it must be satisfactory to all the friends of British prosperity" to learn that the fears "entertained a year ago respecting the ruinous consequences" of the new Corn Law and the tariff "have been as yet nearly groundless," intimates a suspicion, nevertheless, that "this satisfaction cannot be of long duration," and, as cause thereof, this well-informed writer shows that :—

"American butter is now selling by retail at 6d. per pound, and cheese from the same quarter, fully equal to the latter, may be obtained in the greatest abundance at less than 6d. per pound."

Now, be it known to all farmers who have listened to Monopolist instructors, that the tariff made no alteration in the duties on foreign cheese or foreign butter, but only lowered those on colonial cheese and butter, there being, in fact, no butter or cheese made in any of our colonies for exportation. How is it, therefore, the writer makes out, that—

"To graziers and dairy farmers in Great Britain the alteration in our custom house duties is also already doing much injury, and it must continue to do so until their property be far better protected against foreign competition than it is under our present laws."

Though the dreaded Canada Bill has not yet produced its promised fruits, it is, according to the monopolist, yet to do so, for he says :—

"The Canada Corn Bill has not yet had time to operate; but through it we shall eventually receive all the surplus produce of the western provinces of the United States of North America, and we shall charge no duty on its importation. By the latest advices from Upper Canada, the best wheats could be purchased in Michigan, Ohio, and in the other neighbouring states under 2s. 6d. per bushel; and 2s. per bushel paid the American producers well. By the time it can now be forwarded to Montreal, and even to Great Britain, without being transhipped; and its quality is so excellent and its condition consequently so good, that little danger exists of damage, even from a long voyage."

We should like to see the adventurous vessel which could perform the voyage from Lake Michigan, down the rapids of the St. Lawrence, and across the Atlantic to Liverpool! And let us compare the above with the statements of a Canadian corn-merchant's circular, published in the Montreal Herald, and dated at Montreal on the 20th of March last, wherein he says :—

"The prices paid for wheat and flour in Canada West and the United States are, in my opinion, not justified, and will, I fear, end in disappointment and loss to buyers. The prevailing impression appears to be that flour will open here at 28s. 9d., others at 30s., and a few have carried their expectations to 32s. 6d., and wheat in proportion; but the following statement will serve to show that, without an advance in England, such expectations are likely to prove fallacious :—

and August 31 0

| | Less— | s. d. |
|---|-------|-------|
| Cartage and wharfage here 2d.; freight to Liverpool, 4s. | | 4 2 |
| Insurance, 1d. per cent. on 31s. and policy duty, 6s.; duty 7d. | | 1 1 |
| Dock and town dues, truckage, storage, insurance, &c. | | 1 0 |
| Four months' interest from date of shipment, until realized | | 0 7 |
| Commission and Del credere, 4 per cent. | | 1 3 |
| | | 8 1 |
| | | 22 11 |

22s. 11d. at 9 per cent. exchange is 27s. 9d. Halifax currency, which will vary little from the average cost on board of vessels here of purchases made in the interior. The price of American flour will be governed by the New York market. Should it rate no higher than Canadian it will be consumed almost exclusively, as it is generally preferred. My opinion is, that the price of Canada will not range above 27s. 6d. to 28s. About the 1st of June freights to Britain will probably be 4s. 6d. to 5s., or 6d. to 1s. higher than above stated."

This is a business-like and very close estimate of the probable profit of sending flour from Canada to England, which may be right or may be wrong, but it shows plainly enough that we shall NOT "eventually receive all the surplus produce of the western provinces of the United States." On the contrary, the circular tells its Canadian readers that—

"The injudicious imposition of a duty of 3s. sterling per quarter on American wheat imported to be manufactured into flour for export, has marred this important branch of trade, as the prices now current in the western states debar us from entering that market to any extent; indeed, the few who have sought to do so, to a limited extent, and such adventures may be denominated experimental speculations."

And, so far from shipments to this country proving safe speculations, we learn that—

"Shipments of wheat made during the autumn gave unsatisfactory returns generally, but some adventures made late in the season, at and under 5s. per 60 lbs., on which insurance was saved, paid very well; that item constituting about half the gain. Such as were made at 5s. 3d., and paid the regular insurance, scarcely saved themselves."

These extracts prove the absurdity of the Monopolist's statement, that—

"In a very few years, therefore, our farmers will see good reason to petition the Legislature for that protection against American produce to which they are so justly entitled instead of praying for the continuance of the laws by which the importation of colonial agricultural produce is, at present, regulated;"

while he admits that our future intercourse with the corn-growing countries of Europe cannot hereafter be rendered more restricted than at present. The truth is, that foreign competition is altogether a bugbear, by which farmers are frightened and deluded into taking farms at too high rents for yearly holdings or short leases; and even if all was true which Monopolists assert on the subject, it would only prove that the landowners and not the farmers benefit by the Corn Laws.

"TO SEE OURSELVES AS OTHERS SEE US."

It will probably not have escaped the observation of the readers of agricultural news, that there is a gentleman of the name of COLMAN who appears at most of the meetings of the Royal Agricultural Society, and wherever besides the high and mighty patrons of agriculture congregate, and who is designated as a commissioner appointed by the state of Massachusetts to collect information relative to British husbandry. This gentleman, it seems, is about to publish his "Agricultural Tour" in the "Farmer's Magazine;" and though from the society in which he has been moving, chiefly that of landowners, it is not likely that any very strong dislogistic opinions will be expressed, it is plain, from a few anticipatory extracts which are given in the Mark-lane Express, that Mr. Colman will go back to the United States with the means of correcting the notion there so erroneously entertained, that "England is only a large garden." Though Mr. Colman appears to touch his subject with the "velvet paw," and possibly the extracts offered by the Monopolist journal may not be the most forcible of the writer's remarks, they yet offer matter of observation to agricultural Free Traders. The American agriculturist says :—

"England presents at this time a more brilliant example than any age or country has before witnessed of the application, I will not say of science, for that would not comprehend the idea which I wish to express, but the application of mind to agriculture. The practice of agriculture, and the philosophy of agriculture, are matters of universal interest. Men of all grades and conditions are labouring in this great cause, and are asking for the how, and the way, and the wherefore. The brightest intellects are directing their talents to agricultural inquiries; and the humblest in their humble, but not inefficient way, are seconding their efforts. So many minds concentrating their rays upon the same point, they must be sure to illuminate it with an extraordinary brilliancy."

Though a somewhat rhetorical expression of the attention which is now being directed in this country to agriculture, it is yet in a great degree just. But in the next sentence Mr. Colman shows that he has not learnt why this great and really effective stir is making in the agricultural world of England, for he says :—

"Agriculture is now getting to be recognised as the commanding interest of the state; so it must ever be, as lying at the foundation of all others."

If Mr. Colman supposes that agriculture—that is, the interests of those who derive their incomes from land—is only "now getting to be recognised as the commanding interest of the state," we fear he has not permitted his mind to travel beyond those select agricultural circles in which we have noticed most frequently his "bodily presence." For nearly 30 years our legislators have been proving practically, that, if by agriculture is meant the landowning interest, it has been "the commanding interest in the state." But if Mr. Colman means (and it is, perhaps only fair to presume he does) that agriculture in fact, meaning improved husbandry and the interests of the industrious cultivators, is "getting to be recognised," he is right. But we are not satisfied with the meagre statement of the fact; and we will answer for it, neither Mr. Colman nor his countrymen will be satisfied, when he reports to them the results of his tour, without some explanation of the why and the wherefore. Why is it that the chemist and the philosopher, the mechanist and the man of letters, are tasking their several powers to the utmost to develop the productive powers of the British soil? Is it not because the dominant class of this country—the landowners—see that the monopoly upon which they have hitherto built or attempted to build their prosperity is breaking under them, and that, ere long, their rents must be kept up by means of a higher standard of cultivation?

But let our Monopolist landlords remember this, that unless the trade and manufactures of the country be also steadily and prosperously increasing, which must mainly depend upon the freedom of our foreign trade, the very success of their efforts would defeat their own objects. Were two-fifths of England cultivated on the best systems, the prices of grain here would be lower than in the open markets of the world, and thus rents reduced to a minimum. This indicates the insane ignorance of those landowners who are actively seeking to check and impede the progress of manufacturing industry.

But to return to Mr. Colman. In alluding to the actual condition of English agriculture he says :—

"The condition of practical agriculture in Great Britain, as far as I had an opportunity of observing it, must be pronounced highly improved. Many parts of the country present an order, exactness, and neatness of cultivation greatly to be admired; but a sky is seldom without clouds, and there are parts of England where the appearance is anything but laudable and where there are few and very equivocal evidences of skill, industry, or thrift. We are often told in America that England is only a large garden, in which art and skill and labour have smoothed all the rough places, filled up the hollow places, and brought everything into a beautiful and systematic harmony, and into the highest degree of productiveness. This is not wholly true; indeed, although there are many farms to be altogether admired for the degree of perfection to which their cultivation has been carried, yet there are not a few places where the indications of neglect and in-tolerance and unskilfulness are but too apparent; and where, in an obvious contest for victory between the cultivated plant and the weeds, the latter triumph from their superiority both in force and numbers."

Let our readers go into Essex and Hertfordshire, the two counties in which the Monopolist landowners have mustered most strongly in defence of monopoly, high rents, and low culture, and they will there see ample illustration of the truth of the last sentence. They will find, in fact, that, in many places, the "native" products, the weeds, have been completely "protected" against the "foreign" competition of the corn, and have obtained absolute possession of the land.

It is also worthy of remark, that the frequency with which property changes hands in the United States, from the fondness of cultivators for seeking fresh land after having overworked their old farms, operates against improvement in the same way that the yearly-tenant system does here. On this subject Mr. Colman says :—

"Like short leases, it has an obvious tendency to hinder or discourage improvements or a substantial and permanent character, involving a large expenditure."

Thus the same practice of temporary occupation produce in different countries precisely similar evils, though in the one case the practice is caused by the scarcity, and in the other by the excessive cheapness, of land.

THE VALUE OF LAND.

We have often had occasion to notice the foolishness of those landlords who pretend that land in this country is likely to undergo any reduction in value from Free Trade and moderate prices,—the approach of both which dreaded public benefits is now imminent;—thus we find in the Ayrshire Agricultural Report for the past month, that "Grain markets have been, if anything, tending downwards, and little animation perceptible. Beef has also been selling heavily, and, we think, at fully lower rates than during the last month. Sheep, on the contrary, are scarce, and have been selling at good prices, and much more remunerating than cattle; very few are now to be found in the county; and we should say the same remark applies to fat cattle. Fodder is everywhere abundant, and dairy stocks in fine condition. Milk cows continue to sell at very low figures."

Yet, in the face of these seeming discouragements, "Grass parks have been letting at a trifling advance on former rents. Farms out of lease (if good) are eagerly picked up, and the spirits of the farming world are far from being depressed, believing that, should the improvement in trade be permanent, its good effects must ultimately tell upon the prices of agricultural produce."

RURAL FELICITY.—An old farmer at Elswick, expressing his surprise at Mr. Cookson's statements respecting the high wages and short hours of agricultural labourers, said, "He did not tell the meeting about the ninepenny and tenpenny tickets that are given to the Layton and Marton poor labourers who are out of work, and that only for three days a week." It seems from this that some little poverty is to be found even in Mr. Cookson's own township, and that it is relieved by tickets from 9d. to 10d. a day, and that only thrice a week, which will amount to 2s. 3d. or 2s. 6d. per week at the utmost.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Adam Brown's reply to "An Essex Farmer" next week. We have received several valuable suggestions and offers of assistance for the Bazaar; we feel very grateful to our fair supporters, but beg their indulgence if replies are delayed. So many offers have come together that it would be impossible to give immediate answers.

"B. P. G." will find his suggestions attended to on the first opportunity.

"A Stan-h Free-Trader."—The materials he has supplied are valuable; but the form at present is rather objectionable.

"A Reader" is thanked, and the passage shall be looked for.

"E. B. D."—There is great power in the verses; but the stanzas are a little rough and unmusical.

"J. C."—The League cannot, at present, enter into the minute details of agricultural processes.

"W. H. A."—We should be much obliged by his sending the books with the quotations marked.

"J. B."—We regret that we must decline the insertion of his lines.

We have to apologise to the writer of the following letter, for having mislaid his communication and thus delayed the insertion of his poem:—

To the Editor of the League.

SIR,—The following lines were suggested by a very common street spectacle. The aim of the writer being to aid the cause of suffering humanity, they may possibly be found worthy of insertion in your excellent paper.

"A LITHOGRAPHIC SKETCH."

"Tis a cold and gloomy winter's day,
Heavy and damp with fog;
And a squalid wretch on the pavement way
Is crouching down like a dog:—
Like a poor and famished dog that, now,
Neither cart nor truck may draw,
That squalid wretch, with careworn brow,
Puts forth his skeleton paw.

"On the surface flat of the pavement stone—
Cleansed with his ragged cuff—
He chalks, he chalks, with moan and with groan,
Sketching his work in the rough.
Chalking—chalking—chalking away,
Characters fair, in colouring gay;
A record of misery, talent, and want,
With hungry belly and fingers gaunt.

"Passengers hurry, hurry along,
With sorrowful hearts, or gay;
Rich and poor—a motley throng—
Pass over the pavement way:
But none, save the needy, slacken their speed
To gaze on the writing there;
None, but the wretched, can tarry, to read
That famishing wretch's pray'r.

He has chalked and chalked all his chalk away,
Making the very pavement pray;
And shown us how stones may come out in print,
To soften with pity men's hearts of flint.
Mockery!—cruel mockery all!
In a land of mocking and groans,
Where the pamp'ring steed feeds high in the stall,
While Christians starve on the stones!

"One word!—only one—appears on the stone,
In characters bold and fair;
But, oh! that word is of skin and of bone!—
'Starving' is written there.
Starving, in flourishes chalked on the ground,
Starving in colours so gay,
Like the rich who can revel in luxury round,
Our furnishing forms of clay.

"Starving—starving—starving!
With maddening hunger and cold,
While the holy bishop is carving
His viands on dishes of gold!
Oh, the shivering wretch may hide his head,
And his eyes so hollow and dim,
For life to the fat church livings has fled,
And Death may grapple with him.

"Oh, land of mockery, wealth, and woe,
A land of riches and raze,
Where the alien rides in pomp and show,
And the native starves on the flags!
Mockery—mockery—mockery all!
A land of mocking and groans,
Where the pamp'ring steed feeds high in the stall,
While Christians starve on the stones!"

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, April 27, 1844.

Just as we are going to press, our attention has been directed to a letter by Mr. Cayley, in yesterday's Morning Herald, professing to be a defence of himself against Lord Radnor's charge of inaccuracy in his quotations from the great work of Adam Smith.

By implication Mr. Cayley confesses to one thing we suspected of him, viz., taking quotations, even from so accessible a writer as Adam Smith, at second hand. Referring to the substitution of "protection" for "encouragement," he says, "if the error was originally mine." The law knows little difference between the receiver of the stolen goods and the thief. Whoever changed the word committed a fraud. Such an apology as that "I paid more attention to the general spirit of my argument than to the verbal accuracy of its letter," cannot apply to falsified quotations.

Mr. Cayley seems to suppose that, in the citations on the navigation laws, and on the distribution of the produce of a country, he satisfies the justice of the case by supplying the supposed passages, and there leaving it. Is he so imbecile as not to perceive how much he perverted them? Does he imagine that, either in this journal or by Lord Radnor, he was only accused of a transcriber's or compositor's blunder? His giving the quotations in full is only the commencement of his task. Much now is required to free the use of those quotations from the imputation of gross dishonesty.

To the untoward quotations Mr. Cayley affords no clue. We again challenge him to do so, in the firm belief that, if not actually fabricated, they are egregiously perverted.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE LEAGUE.—Mr. Wilson, who has been for some time confined by serious indisposition, our readers will be happy to hear is so far convalescent as to resume his arduous and important duties. He was expected to preside at the meeting at Covent-garden Theatre on Wednesday last, but the numerous claims upon his attention at the Council prevented his departure from home.

REVIEW.

Peterchurch Conservative Festival. Report of Speeches.—Hereford Journal.

We have placed this report among our reviews because it is one of the greatest literary curiosities that has for a long time come under our notice. As a contrast to Professor Lawson's "Lectures on Political Economy" the speeches of the Peterchurch worthies are inestimable. They contain, in a condensed form, all the fallacies and falsehood, all the misconception and malignity, with which Monopoly wages war against truth; and they offer the best illustration of what George Canning used to call "mendacity in morals and mendacity in mind." The chairman was the Rev. John Hopton. He informed his auditors that "he was born a Tory." Like the infant Hercules, he began his exploits in the cradle, asserted a monopoly in the nursery, and clamoured for protection to the pap-bat. Nothing could be added to such a precocious childhood; and, in truth, the rev. orator does not seem to have made the attempt; he did not rise above the standard of baby eloquence, merely repeating the phrases picked up from the nurse or the housemaid, and affording a sad proof that the principles of childhood develop themselves only into childishness.

He was followed by Mr. Henry Lee Warner, who opened fire upon the League in the following exquisite style:—

"But now a new enemy has risen up in the shape of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and a formidable attack is being made upon the landed property of this country: call things by their right names, it is nothing more nor less than this. Sir Robert Peel said the object of his tariff was to reconcile conflicting interests, and strike a balance as far as it is possible between them; but the object of the Free-Traders is to destroy the landed interest, and raise their prosperity upon its ruins. Shortsighted and misguided men! Why, they would ruin themselves also."

It would have been kind of Mr. Warner to explain the nature of the attack which Leaguers make on landed property; it is simply a defensive alliance against being plundered for the support of a class. Valabond tells us that the pickpockets of Holland complained that their vested interests were injured when the Dutchmen began to put buttons on the pockets of their breeches; but Mr. Warner goes further, and declares that a refusal to be taxed for the benefit of an oligarchy is not only a crime, but an inexplicable infatuation. We are described both as knaves and fools for simply declaring that we prefer using our own money for our own purposes to giving it to pay dividends on the debts of the Duke of Buckingham, or to portion the junior branches of the illustrious house of Knatchbull. The orator then proceeds:—

"The ground of this Corn-Law question has been ploughed so often that we cannot turn up any new arguments. There can be no use in legislating against the grain. These Anti-Corn-Law philosophers say that foreigners would buy our manufactured goods if we could purchase their corn; but it so happens that to those countries to which we export most of our goods, from them we import the least quantity of corn; our commercial intercourse with Russia and America bears us out in the accuracy of this remark. Besides, we meet with no reciprocity from the foreigner: if we alter our tariffs to please him, he raises the duties on our manufactures."

What the orator means by "legislating against the grain" is not very clear, because it is against grain that monopoly legislation is chiefly directed. He happens to state what is directly contrary to fact when he declares that we import least corn from Russia and America; but even the falsehood is useless to his argument, for everybody knows that both countries would send abundance of corn to England if it would be admitted into our market. He then gets held of the old fallacy, that gold would be exported to pay for the corn: not seeing that such a result would only prove that this country wanted corn more than gold. Neither nations nor individuals will exchange the articles which they want most for those which they want least. But here is his climax:—

"Free Trade! what a phantom! How can a dear country like England, with high prices, loaded with debts and taxes, compete with foreigners, who have few debts and taxes, and low prices? Establish Free Trade, and abolish the Corn Laws, how will you raise the taxes when the landed interest is ruined? You cannot repeal the national debt. There it is; its principal and interest must be paid. Low prices, low wages, and great profits for the manufacturers, is a very convenient doctrine for them, but it is a very impracticable one. The public credit of the country must be supported; the public burdens must be borne. Let us hope there will be always enough of English feeling in this country to support the farmers."

His argument simply comes to this, that the English people must be enabled to bear the burden of the national debt by taking upon their shoulders the additional burden of monopoly; and that we will be better able to pay the national creditor by giving our money to the creditors of titled paupers.

But turn we from Mr. Warner to the great actor of the night, the Ursa Major of the Peterchurch constellations, the Rev. Mr. Powell. He laid hold of the reciprocity fallacy, and gave it forth with some new variations of his own, which are clearly derived from the rignarole school of eloquence. Here is an edifying specimen:—

"I remember a fable which used much to amuse me as a boy at school. A wary old fox, in making a predatory incursion in a gentleman's cover among the pheasants, was unluckily caught by a steel trap, in which he lost his tail. As soon as the cunning old fellow had sufficiently recovered both the shock of the wound and the shame of the loss, he set out on 'a tour of the provinces.' In each county he took up his abode in some large wood, whither he invited, by flaming handbills, his brother foxes to give him the meeting, and thus he addressed them:—'My friends, you have long been labouring under a heavy incumbrance. I ask you of what possible benefit to you are those long and heavy brushes which you wear? they serve but to draggle in the dirt; they impede your progress through the gorse; and, worst of all, you are at all times liable to be caught by them in a trap! Let me then persuade you, as your best friend and kind well-wisher, to do as I have done, do away with the incumbrance. Gentlemen, the League is the old fox—the Zollverein is the trap—you are the foxes—the Corn Laws are the brush.'"

According to this very original joke and aboriginal application, the League has been robbed of something by somebody. This is quite true, even though Mr. Powell has said it; but it remains to discover the robber. Now, if we read the tale aright, the Corn Laws have been the trap laid for us by the landlords; and they have not only lopped away such an appendage as a tail, but they have injured vital parts. The allusion to the preservation of pheasants in the tale might have provoked a different commentary, and certainly would have suggested a different application, if told to an assembly of farmers and farm labourers as an illustration of the Game Laws. But Mr. Powell rested his entire case on what he deemed a stronger point—he insisted that lowering the price of provisions would lower the rate of wages. He says:—

"I must, however, I believe, hasten on to say a few words upon the second proposition which the League holds out—'That by the importation duty free of foreign corn you enable the operative classes to procure bread, the staff of life, at half its usual English price; and, by way of enabling them to do this, you immediately reduce the wages of the operative by one half; for this is the real meaning of cheap bread—cheap labour! Now, to support this assertion of mine I must produce evidence, and I shall produce the best possible evidence. My first witness is Mr. Ricardo, commonly called the great. These are his words—'The Corn Laws raise the price of bread—this raises the price of flour—and this of course lessens the profit upon capital.'"

If the poor man had been able to understand Mr. Ricardo, he would have discovered that the evidence which he quoted was the strongest possible that could be given against him. Wages must be paid out of profits; we apprehend that Mr. Powell himself would not profess to have discovered the means of paying them out of losses;—consequently, whatever reduces profits must necessarily reduce wages. Mr. Powell is too ignorant to know that capability of labour is capital, that industry is capital, that the educated head and the trained hand are capital, else would he never have stated that a reduction of the profits of capital was no injury to the working man. He sets out by stating a patent falsehood, and then quotes its most direct confutation as evidence in its support.

His next assertion is that the wages of the manufacturing operatives have been continually diminishing since 1815, and his proof is that the cost of production has fallen since that period. The source of his blunder is simply his not discovering that increased power of production more than compensates for this fall, and leaves the gross sum of weekly earnings unchanged. This is a point level to the meanest capacity: if with certain machinery a piece of cloth could be woven in a given time for three shillings, and if by improved machinery three pieces of cloth are woven in the same space of time, the earnings of the workman are not changed if he is

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive a copy, weekly, of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND, are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council respectfully request that their friends, in all places where committees for raising subscriptions to the £100,000 Fund have not been already formed, will proceed to their formation as soon as possible, and transmit their names to the LEAGUE Offices, Manchester.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

THE BUDGET.

Recantation is a hard lesson; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer is an apt scholar, and, on presenting his budget, he gave as excellent a lecture on the doctrine of Free Trade as could be expected from a recent convert to sound principle. His great aim appears to have been practically to illustrate the signification of Free Trade "in the abstract," which seems to mean a recognition of its justice and its policy, united to a determination to maintain as much of the injustice and impolicy of monopoly as the patience of the nation is able to endure. Mr. Goulburn had to act a double part, to expound and reconcile the theory of Drayton Manor and the practice of Goodwood—the creed of our ostensible rulers, and the course of conduct they are compelled to pursue by their masters behind the curtain. Like many other preachers, he went on glibly so long as he kept close to the doctrines, but when he came to the application, he found that his instructions left him little or nothing to apply; like Iago, he could only conclude—

"To suckle fools, and chronicle small beer."

Small enough, indeed, was the beer which he had to chronicle in his lame and impotent conclusion; it was actually soured to vinegar. But, laying metaphor aside, it is neither uninteresting nor unamusing to compare his eloquent exposition of principles with his miserable failure in practice, amounting, virtually, to an acknowledgment that the monopolies which restrict the markets for the produce of British industry are injurious and iniquitous, but that they must be maintained in compliance with the behests of certain influential parties who afford political support to the Ministry.

Loud as is now the cry for agricultural protection in relation to corn, it is but as a whisper compared to the clamour formerly raised for protection to British-grown wool. One would almost have supposed that the destinies of the nation were carried on the backs of sheep. Protection to wool was in fact a favoured portion of the wisdom of our ancestors; not only the living but the dead were taxed for its maintenance, an act of Parliament having been passed to compel the interments of corpses in woollen shrouds. Woollens were declared to be the staple manufactures of the nation; staple towns were incorporated for its exclusive sale; mayors of the staple were chosen to regulate its markets; above all things, protecting duties were established to encourage the home-growth of wool and save "the staple" from being dependent on foreigners. When first a reduction of the wool duty was proposed, the yell of the pretended farmers' friends almost frightened the Isle from its propriety; it was averred that the admission of foreign wool would convert our sheepwalks into deserts, deprive the English farmers of the best source of their profits, send shepherds into exile or the workhouse, and overthrow Church and State for the exclusive benefit of grasping manufacturers. In short, all the nonsense now vented against the free importation of corn was then shouted against the free importation of wool, with some score of other fallacies which the slow but sure progress of public opinion has rendered too manifestly absurd to be repeated in our days. Yet the last rag of this precious monopoly and highly-prized protection—this staple which Parliament had treated like a petted child until it was almost suffocated by the over-tenderness of legislation—Mr. Goulburn flung to the winds on Monday night as recklessly as if wool was unknown to landlords, and sheep no acquaintances of farmers.

Now, we should wish to know why the application of sound principle should stop short at wool? Why should protection be taken from feeders of sheep, and continued to growers of corn? Wool, we are told, is the raw material of an important branch of British manufacture; but food is the raw material of all manufactures; the energies of industry can only be developed through the thews and sinews of the labourer; deprive him of sustenance, and you render him incapable of work. It is food, assimilated by the vital functions, that is worked into every article beautiful to the eye, comfortable to the person, or gratifying to the palate. The esculent grains must be regarded as the raw materials of all our textile fabrics, of all our mechanical products, of all our articles of glass and porcelain, of every kind of manufacture which finds its way into the market, so long as it is by eaters of bread that they are manufactured. We need not dwell on a fact, by no means unimportant, that flour is directly used as an ingredient in many processes of manufacture; this scarcely increases the impolicy of the Corn Laws as a tax on raw material, for no man can doubt that the food of the spinner and weaver is just as much a part of the material worked up in a piece of cloth as the wool that composes its warp and weft.

The duty on wool is to be abandoned because its removal, we are told, will give a stimulus to one branch of British industry. Be it so; we hail the statesman-like truth, and recognise the validity of sound principle; but British industry has many branches, some of which are in a far more deplorable condition than the woollens; and why should the boon be withheld, or, we should rather say, why should the justice be refused, which would give to the whole British community the advantages that a niggard hand now confines to the West Riding of Yorkshire?

A duty on glass is to be remitted that scarcely paid the expense of collection; let us be grateful for the boon, and say, with the child, "Thank you for nothing." Next, we are to have cheap currants. Now, as currants are only useful in cakes and puddings, it does seem rather whimsical to lower the impost on them, and retain the duties which enhance the price of the flour with which they must be combined. Vinegar, too, is to be given to us more freely, as a whet to the appetite; but the food is still to be withheld by which that appetite may be gratified.

Two items remain to be mentioned, deserving of all attention, seeing that on them the Chancellor of the Exchequer has founded a new branch of moral science, which we may very properly call the Ethics of Botany. It appears that coffee is invested with an insensibility which prevents it from receiving any taint when brought into contact with vice or immorality; even when grown in slave states, it takes with it no particle of the pollution of slavery, but may be safely roasted, ground, infused, tasted, and swallowed, without risking injury to such tender consciences as that of Lord Brougham, or even to that worthy patron of wooden imitations of the Bible, Lord Sandon. But sugar, on the contrary, appears to be one of the most susceptible substances in nature; a certificate of origin is as necessary before using it in England as a knowledge of where the pig was fed is before pork dare be eaten in India. To be sure, we moral Englishmen did for a long time use slave-grown sugar, without discovering that it tainted our moral constitution and deteriorated the spirituality of our nature, and, if pious Mr. Goulburn had been permitted to have his way, we should have gone on consuming slave-grown sugar to the present day. But who is not aware of the evils that resulted from our consumption of the dangerous article in past times. To the use of slave-grown sugar may fairly be attributed the Manchester massacre, the Six Acts, the employment of spies to foment insurrections and furnish an excuse for coercive measures, the delay of Catholic emancipation, and the maintenance of Gatton and Old Sarum. We are not the persons to deny that there was a taint of slavery in all these measures; but we are at some loss to discover by what process Mr. Goulburn has been so completely converted as to confess that during the greater part of his life he was the moral poisoner of his countrymen.

So utterly absurd is this distinction between slave-grown coffee and slave-grown sugar that it is scarcely possible to write seriously on the subject. There is no rational man within the seas of Britain who does not see that Ministers are reduced to the degradation of venting such transparent fallacies by their former adoption of the hypocritical cry against slave-grown sugar for party purposes, when a reduction of the differential duties was formerly proposed. But we wish to know how the difference between slave-grown and free-grown sugar is to be discovered, and what canons on the subject are to be issued for the guidance of the officers of the customs. Is the difference obvious by sight, taste, or smell? Or has the Chancellor of the Exchequer found out some magical means of testing those occult qualities which are referable to no category of the senses? If certificates of origin be the test, there can be little difficulty in discovering what will be the market price of such documents in New Orleans or elsewhere. Mr. Goulburn promises to make some additional revelations on the subject, which may, perhaps, elucidate some of these difficulties; but, so far as we can yet see, the worthy Chancellor has only supplied an illustration of the Swedish Chancellor's aphorism, "See with what little wisdom the world is governed."

MR. CAYLEY'S TRACT AGAIN.

We cannot allow the noblemen and gentlemen of the "Agricultural Protection Society" to forget the disgraceful position in which they stand. The brand of falsification remains ineffaced and ineffaceable upon their first tract. They are convicted of an attempt at fraud upon "the Industrious Classes of the United Kingdom," to whom it is addressed. The charge is founded upon no questionable statistics, or inferential reasonings. It is, as we have already shown, a distinct perversion and falsification of the words and opinions of Adam Smith, for the purpose of gilding their cause with the appearance of Adam Smith's authority. Such offences are not venial amongst honourable men, or in civilized society. We know of no other form of falsehood which has more moral turpitude; especially as the object is the upholding of a sordid interest.

Mr. Cayley's letter, to which we briefly adverted in our postscript last week, has not in the least mended matters. In that letter, he gives at length two quotations which had been garbled in his pamphlet, in one of which we had anticipated him, and seems to think that, by so doing, he has afforded all reasonable satisfaction. He seems quite unaware that these passages prove the case, of misrepresentation, against him. Either he has directed them to be transcribed from the "Wealth of Nations," without reading them, or his brains must be made of most impenetrable stuff, or his reliance is enormous upon the gullibility of those who read short, and skip the quotations. There they stand, however, in his letter published in the Morning Herald. If at first, as we suspect, he took them upon trust, he now knows where to find them in the original. He has stripped himself of the poor excuse of ignorance, or of having relied upon an unworthy authority. The sin devolves upon his own head.

In this attempted defence there are two instances of disingenuousness, in connexion with the quotations in question. The verbal (and they were not merely verbal) changes, which we pointed out, are silently rectified. No account is given of how or why those changes were made. The fact that they were made is, so far as Mr. Cayley can accomplish his purpose, consigned to oblivion; meanwhile, the unacknowledged falsifications are left to do their work upon the public mind—"Caveat emptor." It is not wholly unnatural that certain ruling members of the "Agricultural Protection Society" should patronise a sort of horse-jockey morality.

The other instance, in relation to these two passages, of disingenuousness, is the allegation that "it was necessary, in the space of so short a pamphlet, to condense, as much as possible, the quotations I made use of." Condensing a quotation is a novel operation in honest literature. Has Mr. Cayley to learn the force of inverted commas? Is he unaware of their amounting to a distinct pledge that no condensation has been practised, but that we have the verba ipsissima of the author named? Moreover, he did not condense. He altered and omitted, so as to vary the meaning; a very different thing from condensation. About an honest memoriter quotation, true to the author's sense, however failing in verbal accuracy, we should have given ourselves no trouble; save, perhaps, a passing rebuke on so careless a habit. Perversion was our charge, and Mr. Cayley has shown his acquaintance with the evidence by which it is thoroughly substantiated.

Mr. Cayley has not supplied, in this letter, the check of reference for several other professed quotations from Adam Smith, in some of which we believe the falsification to be as gross as in the detected instances. We again challenge him to do so. They ought to have been appended originally. This was pre-eminently incumbent upon a writer who condenses quotations. Who is to find a "condensed" passage in the original work? He was plainly not solicitous that it should be found. The obligation was not the less imperative. The character of fraud is rendered the more glaring by the systematic omission.

The Duke of Richmond is not only committed as a confederate in these tricks, together with the Duke of Buckingham, and the other managers of the Agricultural Protection Society, but also by his personal avowal of approval in the House of Lords. He declined grappling with Lord Radnor as to the facts. And yet, in the face of those uncontradicted facts, he declared that "for his own part, however, he considered the pamphlet to be a remarkably good one." Then came a selection of the usual farrago of calumnies against the League, expressed with the usual insolence of his Grace's manner. It has long been a maxim of aristocratical morality that all things are fair in love and in war. The apology means that, where lust or slaughter is the end, falsehood as a means is no dishonour to a gentleman. The reported speech of the Duke seems to imply that the maxim is applicable where the love is that of landlords for labourers, and the war is that of landlords upon the League.

By such frauds as have been detected, the Protectionists put themselves out of the pale of controversy. Before anything they can advance has the slightest claim upon respectful attention, they must purify themselves from the moral stain. In whatever relates to politics, many of them may have been bred in a school of corruption. That fact may be admitted in mitigation of punishment, but cannot stop a verdict of guilty. Even as a palliation, it should be preceded by confession. They must abide by the responsibility which they have voluntarily assumed. Unless they throw Mr. Cayley and his tract overboard, they must consent to its sinking their own characters as honest defenders of the monopoly which puts money into their own pockets, while it impoverishes the people. We have not argued that their cause is indefensible because it has been unwarrantably defended. We have not sought to damage their arguments by their proved falsifications of quotations. The question is not one of logic, but of morals. Their first business is to put themselves right as far as they now can, and then, being purged of the stain, they may claim to enter the arena of controversy. Till then the taint remains; and we tell these dukes, earls, and M.P.s, that if their chivalric ancestors (those of them who had chivalric ancestors) had behaved in tournament as their descendants now behave in argument, their spurs would have been hacked from their heels, and their banners kicked out of the lists.

IMPORTANCE OF PREPARATIONS FOR THE NEXT ELECTION.

The time is arrived when constituencies should be provided against any emergency which may arise, either by the vacation of seats in Parliament, or a general election.

It is a gratifying evidence of the progress of our cause, that memorials have been addressed by the majority of the electors of many boroughs, whose representatives have not hitherto voted for Mr. Villiers's motion for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, requesting them to support that motion when next brought forward. We take it that these memorials are sufficiently significant of the intentions of the electors of such boroughs, whenever a vacancy occurs, of their choosing members who shall represent their opinions on the vital question of Free Trade. We know that in many places there are feelings of difficulty, arising from long connexions and personal attachments; but we are arrived at that stage of our great struggle when duty calls on all men no longer to "halt between two opinions," but to decide whether they prefer principles or men.

We have been much gratified with the report of the annual meeting of the Edinburgh Anti-Corn-Law Association, held on the 22nd ult. Some of our friends there felt difficulties such as we have referred to; but we would remind them that the history of no country affords more frequent instances of personal sacrifices for the attainment of great and noble objects than theirs. Their fathers entered into a solemn league and covenant for liberty of conscience. We call on them as cordially to unite in the league to reclaim our right to exchange the products of our industry for the food and productions of the whole earth—a right as inalienable as that of life and liberty, and without which the latter is nothing but an empty name. We can make no compromise with Monopoly. Those who preach about Free Trade, but still hanker after fixed duty, are Monopolists as well as they who support the sliding scale; the difference between the two is only in degree. We are indebted to Sir Robert Peel for opposing Lord John Russell with the League arguments against his fixed-duty scheme, and showing to demonstration that, whilst an 8s. fixed duty would be valueless as a means of raising revenue, it would raise the price of all the corn consumed by the whole amount of the duty. We cannot believe that a man of Lord John Russell's shrewd judgment can adhere to the fixed-duty fallacy, and suppose himself a Free-Trader. We have, however, nothing to do with men; our warfare is waged against Monopoly and Monopolists; we cannot, therefore, but approve and admire the manly, straightforward resolutions, and the judicious course pursued at the Edinburgh meeting. By the following resolution, they express their agreement in the sentiments of the League, and respectfully hope that their representatives will be prepared to support them in Parliament:—

"That the meeting agree with the sentiments and recommendations of the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League, addressed to the people of the United Kingdom, of 28th September last, and that, in accordance with one of these recommendations, the secretary be instructed to transmit to the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay and William Gibson Craig, Esq., the members for the City, copies of the report which has been adopted by this meeting; and respectfully to express to those gentlemen that this meeting, deeply impressed as it is with the paramount importance of Free-Trade principles to this kingdom, and the benefits likely to result to the family of man from their general adoption, entertain a strong hope—in common, they believe, with a large majority of the Liberal electors of the City—that their representatives will now be prepared to support the immediate and entire abolition of all duties on the importation of foreign corn, and, in particular, that they will be prepared to give their cordial and unqualified support, both in the House and in the committee, to the motion about to be brought forward in Parliament by the Hon. C. P. Villiers for the immediate and entire abolition of these duties."

The next resolution is the most important, and one which we recommend to the adoption of every constituency who have doubts of the cordial support of their representatives on the question of Free Trade, viz:—

"That it be remitted to the ordinary committee, as a special instruction from this meeting, that, in the prospect of a dissolution of Parliament, they shall take care that candidates be brought forward to represent the city of Edinburgh whose views on the question of freedom of trade shall be in unison alike with the great body of the Liberal electors and of the Anti-Corn-Law League; and, in order to carry this resolution into effect, that the committee shall have power to call a meeting of the whole Liberal electors, to ascertain their opinions on the subject, and generally to take such other steps as shall seem to them proper for giving effect to the opinions of the majority of the constituency on this great public question of the day."

This is a plain and intelligible course, and, if representation be not a perfect farce, we do not see how electors can adopt a more appropriate proceeding. The observations of Mr. Duncan M'Laren on this resolution are so much in accordance with our own views of the rights and duties of electors, that we cannot withhold them:—

"The constituency (he said) had made a contract with these gentlemen only for the existing Parliament. They had applied to them repeatedly to reconsider their opinions—they had entreated them to give due weight to the feelings and wishes of the constituency, and the answer was contained in Mr. Macaulay's and Mr. Craig's letters. After these preliminary steps, taken upwards of a year ago, they now proposed to tell their members, that unless they not only voted for Mr. Villiers's motion, but were prepared to give it a cordial and unqualified support, the constituency must look out for other members when their term of office expired (Applause.) He should like to know how any candid man, dealing with other matters, unbiassed by party considerations, could object to such a course of conduct. He held that the members had no right to expect a life interest in the representation of the city of Edinburgh." (Applause.)

An amendment to this last resolution was proposed, but was supported by only 26 out of 600.

When the electors at large shall imitate the noble example of the electors of Edinburgh, by declaring their attachment to principles in preference to men, however distinguished by their eloquence or station, then our redemption from the thralldom of Monopoly draweth nigh.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1844.

Twelfth Week, ending Saturday, May 4.

The House of Commons on Monday night was crowded, in expectation of the announced opening of the Budget by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and here we must protest against the unconservative spirit gaining ground, by which people are induced, after the example of Sir Robert Peel, to talk, in roundabout and grand phraseology, of the annual Financial Statement "Budget," to be sure, is not an exceedingly genteel word, but it is expressive; it has the sanction of long-established use and wont; every politician has been trained up to associate a definite idea with it; and even if some people are foolish enough to suppose that on Budget day the Chancellor of the Exchequer enters the House with the national wallet on his back, it is no sufficient reason for parting with an old useful servant. If this spirit spreads we shall, by and by, have a Lord Chancellor treating it as a breach of privilege to be reported in the newspapers as having taken his seat on the "woodcock;" and about the very time that we are getting rid of the comparatively modern usurpation of the Corn Laws, we will also be getting rid of those parliamentary phrases which remind us that, for nearly all our national rights and privileges, and for the whole of our grandeur and our power, we are indebted to the fact of having been, and continuing to be, a COMMERCIAL people.

The House, as we have said, was crowded; the body of the compact little hall was filled, and all along the side galleries every seat was occupied by members eager and anxious to hear what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to say. The strangers' gallery was also overflowing; City men were there, speculating on what the Government meant to do with their "surplus capital," and guessing at all sorts of anticipated reductions of duties; while editors, reporters, and newspaper proprietors poured in torrents into the reporters' gallery, ready to set into action that simple yet marvellous machinery, by which every word spoken may be sent "flying all abroad," and, with Puck-like versatility, girdling the globe as fast as railroads carry and ships sail.

And Mr. Goulburn occupied a very proud position on Monday night, if he only really understood it. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer to a commercial people, he had it in his power to proclaim, that since he entered office in 1841 he had received daily proof of the practical utility and eternal truth of Free-Trade principles. When we say he "had the power," we use the word without reference to party associations, or party hopes and fears. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is the national treasurer; and, as the official organ of a people priding themselves on their practical tendencies, their attention to details, their business habits, and their wonderful worship of FACTS, he might be supposed to have the fear of COMMON SENSE before his eyes, and to hold HUMBUG in scorn unutterable. But we have not yet, as the Yankees in their significant familiarity would say, "toed the mark." The Anti-Corn-Law League, however, is fast bringing us up to it; and there is some reason for supposing that, at least on commercial subjects, Humbug, like Dagon, will fall prostrate at the presence of the ark of truth, and demonstrate, by his shorn dimensions and headless trunk, that the victory of the Philistines was the utter ruin of their power.

In so saying, we by no means wish to insinuate that Mr. Goulburn humbugged. In former days he was rather despised, as being a mere routine official hack, of considerable industry but no ability. Yet his "Financial Statement" on Monday night, which occupied two hours in delivering, was very clear and very able. Mr. Goulburn has nothing of the felicitous manner which renders Sir Robert Peel the very best expositor of figures in the House of Commons. But Mr. Goulburn seems to get cleverer as he gets older. The most remarkable thing about him is his approximation to Free Trade in his old age. People, when they become old, usually become opinionative; but Mr. Goulburn, who, as having through life the characteristics of a West Indian proprietor and slaveholder—a rabid High Church Tory, and a red tape official—is showing that old age presents no positive obstruction to the clarifying process of Truth. He is now a Free-Trader in the "abstract;" and though it is very doubtful if he will make an early appearance at Covent-garden Theatre, there are some reasons for supposing that, if he remain long enough in office, he will stand up in the House of Commons, and officially proclaim that it is the inalienable right of the people of the United Kingdom to buy their corn and their sugar in the "cheapest market;" and that the freedom of Capital and Labour is a rights as precious as that personal freedom and speedy justice which constitute the sole merits of Magna Charta.

Not since 1835 had any Chancellor of the Exchequer the chance which Mr. Goulburn had on Monday night. For nine years there has been no "surplus revenue." In the memorable years 1832-1835 we had abundance of supply, comparative cheapness of food, good profit for capital, excellent remuneration for labour, and a "surplus" revenue. With 1837 commenced our "decline and fall." Deficient produce and high prices broke us up; capital lost its profit, and labour could scarcely get remuneration; and for these nine long, dreary, dismal years, we have had, not a "surplus" but a "deficient" revenue. Now, the tide is turning. CHEAPNESS brings about DEARNESS—two ideas which some people cannot harbour in their brains at the same time. A fall in the prices of essential articles of consumption disengages capital; the working man, paying fivepence instead of eightpence or ninepence for his loaf, has something additional to spare for baker, butcher, tailor, railroads, steamboats, silks, and calicoes; the additional demand stimulates trade, causes a greater demand, enlarges the market both for men and money; and though, under a fair system of Free Trade, prices would never rise unnaturally high, yet an active, industrious, thriving community would always afford a fair remunerating profit, infinitely safer than the gambling chances of occasional high prices—with this addition, that this steady remunerating profit was not wrung out of the necessities, but freely afforded by the comforts of the people. In this way free cheapness brings about comparative dearness.

This process, within a limited sphere, has been going on during the last two years. Abundance has produced comparative cheapness; that cheapness is increasing consumption; and increased consumption is reviving the revenue. So, in effect, spoke the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Monday night, when he congratulated the House and the country on the reviving prosperity of the country, and told us all that the main portion of this prosperity was derived from the increased consumption of the working classes. By what means are the working classes improving in condition? By increased employment. How is increased employment obtained? By additional facilities for the profitable remuneration of capital. And therefore, on these FREE-TRADE principles, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was enabled, on Monday last, to make a "financial statement," the most gratifying which the country has had for nine years past. For instance, last year he only calculated on receiving £19,000,000 from the Customs; and he has had the agreeable disappointment to find that increased power of consumption on the part of the people has added nearly two millions and a half to his conjectural estimate. The account stands thus:—

| | Estimated produce. | Actual produce. |
|---------------------------------|--------------------|-----------------|
| Customs | £19,000,000 | £21,450,000 |
| Excise | 18,000,000 | 18,000,000 |
| Stamps | 7,000,000 | 7,000,000 |
| Taxes | 4,200,000 | 4,125,000 |
| Post office | 600,000 | 600,000 |
| Crown Lands | 130,000 | 147,000 |
| Miscellaneous estimates | 250,000 | 300,000 |
| China Money | 870,000 | 800,000 | favourable on the one side, and that of the expenditure was equally so on the other. They had received more than they calculated on, and they had spent less. The charge for the Debt, and other items belonging to the Consolidated Fund, had been much the same as usual, the difference not exceeding £30,000. There was an apparent reduction in the actual expenditure for the army, as they had estimated that department of expenditure at £6,619,000, while the amount expended was only £6,118,000. But this arose from the Indian Government having contributed a larger share of the expenses incurred, and the restoration of tranquillity in the East had rendered it unnecessary to keep very large sums in the military chests. There was also a reduction in the estimated expenditure for the naval service of £650,000. Last year there was a deficit in the revenue of no less than £2,400,000, that being the amount in which the income was behind the current expenditure. Not only had the whole of this been cleared off, but there was a surplus revenue, after paying debts, of £1,400,000. His estimate for the ensuing year is as follows:—

|--------------------------|-------------|
| Customs, estimated at .. | £21,500,000 |
| Excise | 13,000,000 |
| Stamps | 7,000,000 |
| Taxes | 4,300,000 |
| Property-tax | 5,100,000 |
| Post-office | 600,000 |
| Crown Lands | 130,000 |
| Miscellaneous | 250,000 |

Total, in round numbers .. £51,790,000

This is the estimated income for the ensuing year. The anticipated expenditure was, first, the charge for the Debt, which, last year, was £29,130,000, would be next year £27,697,000, being an apparent reduction of £1,400,000. This, however, was not a saving to the public, for it arose from the altered periods for paying the dividends, one of the consequences of the measure for reducing the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. The real saving which would result from this reduction (from which, by the way, the amount of dissentients is very insignificant, only £247,115, considering the large amount of stock, £250,000,000, to which the operation extends)—would be, for this year, only £313,000. The estimate of the expenditure for the ensuing year stands thus:—

|--|-------------|
| Consolidated Fund, including Deficiency Bills .. | £30,097,000 |
| Army | 6,616,000 |
| Navy | 6,250,000 |
| Ordnance | 1,840,000 |
| Miscellaneous | 3,000,000 |
| Extraordinaries | 400,000 |

To which add £200,000, as a provision for paying off the dissentients from the reduced Three per Cents., and also a sum of £239,000, being the remainder of the Guarantee Fund of the South Sea Company. The total expenditure, as estimated for the ensuing year, is £51,790,000, leaving an apparent surplus of £3,146,000, but a real one of £2,370,600.

Having thus got through the first part of his subject, the whole House became nervously anxious to hear what the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to do with this "surplus revenue." And though artfully contriving to mention all the insignificant matters first, and only proposing to reduce duties to a comparatively small amount, it must be confessed that the whole course of the Government is a circuitous one towards Free Trade. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that general expectation anticipating a surplus revenue, he had been overwhelmed with applications for reductions of duties on every article which contributed to the revenue. The first article he proposed to deal with was glass. There was a distinctive duty between bottle and flint glass, which the great improvements in the manufacture not only rendered useless, but led to frauds on the revenue, by the substitution of one for the other, in receiving the drawback on exportation. He proposes to equalise them, reducing the duty on flint glass to the rate on bottle glass, that is from 2d. per pound to three farthings. This will stimulate trade, but the alteration will lead to a loss of £35,000 this year, the alteration not commencing till July, but hereafter the loss on a full year is calculated at £45,000. The next article is vinegar, on which the duty is to be repealed altogether, and by which there will be a loss of £25,000. The inducement to repeal this duty is its large use in manufactures, especially in calico-printing. Next, the duty on marine insurances is to be altered and reduced. The duty was originally imposed in war time; when it was reduced by Lord Althorp the effect was favourable; at present it operates injuriously, by depriving us of the full benefit of that resort to Britain in marine insurance, which our capital and our credit entitle us to. At present, on every £100, where the premium is 15s., there is a duty of 1s. 3d.; up to 30s. a duty of 2s. 6d.; and above 30s., it is 5s. There is to be a new scale, as follows:—

|---|-------|
| On every £100, where the premium is 10s. .. | s. d. |
| From 10s. to 20s. | 0 3 |
| From 20s. to 30s. | 0 6 |
| From 30s. to 40s. | 1 0 |
| From 40s. to 50s. | 2 0 |
| From 50s. to 60s. | 3 0 |

Some minor reductions are to be made on stamps for agreements, and on proxies for voting for the election of railway directors. The next important reduction is to be made on the article of currants. This was now largely consumed in this country; it was mainly imported from the Ionian Islands; and the alteration is anticipated to be doubly favourable, both to the home consumer and a dependency in which we have a special interest. The duty is to be reduced from 22s. to 15s. per cwt. This will lead to a loss of revenue amounting to no less than £90,000; but increased consumption is expected to counteract this. Then, the duty on foreign coffee is to be altered from 8d., as fixed by the new tariff, to 6d., leaving only a differential duty of 2d. between foreign and colonial coffee. This reduction is to be accompanied by an increase of the duty on chicory, which at present is largely used in the adulteration of coffee. The reduction of the duty on foreign coffee will cause a loss of £50,000. The last article with which the Government propose to deal is wool, on which the duty is to be altogether repealed, which will cause a loss to the revenue of no less than £100,000. Altogether, the entire loss to the revenue which is anticipated will result from these various reductions is calculated at £400,000.

The Government are retaining a large surplus in their hands, with the prospect of a still greater at the termination of next year, evidently to effect one of two objects.

They are either accumulating in order to be able to take off the Income (not the Property) tax next year; or else they are intending to effect still greater reductions on Import Duties, of which the intended change in the Sugar Duties is but a foreshadowing. Mr. Goulburn on Monday night said that there was another important matter, to which though not formally before them, it was important he should advert, in consequence of the general expectation which prevailed. He meant the article of sugar. Our treaty with Brazil will expire in November next; and by this treaty we are bound to admit its produce on the same terms as those of "the most favoured nations." On the expiry of that treaty the Government propose to admit the sugar of foreign countries, where it is raised by free labour, at a differential duty of 10s.; which as the colonial duty is 24s., will admit free foreign at 34s. This would extend our trade with countries east of the Cape of Good Hope, and enlarge our commerce with China itself; and it neither involved a sacrifice of principle, nor hostility to Brazil, for the reduction of the duty on coffee was a proof of the contrary. Their object was to prevent sugar, the produce of countries tainted with slavery, from being imported into this country. But he referred all details to the time when the annual Sugar Duties Bill will be discussed; and concluded by congratulating the House on the cheering prospect of increasing prosperity which the state of the revenue afforded.

So far as can be gathered from the language used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and afterwards by Sir Robert Peel, on Monday night, we may conclude that the Government in retaining a large surplus in their hands are doing so in preparation for a great experiment next year. They will then either repeal the income (not the property) tax, or else—which is the more probable course—retain it for the full period of five years, and give compensation in the shape of great reductions of our import duties. The following passage from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems conclusive on this point; and it is also remarkable as containing a distinct intimation that, so far as the working of the new Tariff has enabled him to judge, the principles of Free Trade are not only true in theory, but in practice; not only good in the "abstract," but beneficial in actual operation. Speaking of the new Tariff, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said:—"I have no hesitation in saying, that at the present moment I cannot form an estimate of what may be the result of the reduction of duty made in 1842. Undoubtedly, when I look at the list of articles, and see the increased consumption in almost every one of them, there is ground for hope. (Cheers.) Of the thirty-three principal articles on which the duty was reduced, there are only about five of which the consumption has decreased (hear, hear), and there has been an increase, more or less, upon all the others. I am, therefore, sanguine as to the issue of the experiment; but the House will bear in mind that upon some of the main articles in the tariff, owing to the necessity of giving indulgence for stocks in hand, especially in the case of timber, the reduction did not come into full operation until the middle of last year. The experiment has thus not been fairly tried, and I am not prepared on this short experience to say what will be the view the House may be disposed to take upon the question in the course of the next year, when the property-tax must come under consideration. Such being the circumstances, I think it will be obvious to any one that I should not have acted a becoming, nay, that I should not have acted an honest part, if I had induced the House on the present occasion to consent to a large reduction of duties, which reduction could have had but one effect, viz.—that of preventing Parliament in the next session from coming to an unfettered judgment." (Cheers.)

Announcements like these coming from such a man as Mr. Goulburn are exceedingly cheering, and diminish the regret felt that the Government have not ventured this year on a bolder application of Free-Trade principles. For it is now clear that these principles have struck their roots in the soil of the routine official mind; they are demonstrating their own truth at the Custom-house, and in the Exchequer; and seeing, as Lord John Russell satirically remarked, that in 1842 Sir Robert Peel had applied the principle of "buying in the cheapest market" to onion-seed, spices, and herrings, the time is not far distant, it is to be hoped, when he will apply it to the article which constitutes the essential food of the people.

On the whole, omitting the momentous question of the SUGAR DUTIES (which will come before us again), we may characterize the "Financial Statement" as the small Free-Trade Budget of 1844, the comparative littleness of which is made up by the implied announcement that we are to have a larger Free-Trade Budget in 1845. And small as is our progress, still it is progress; every inch of ground gained is gained for ever; ere long we will have Free Trade in CORN and in SUGAR; and in a few years people will be apt to doubt their own identity, when their memory carries them back to the time when it required the continuous exercise of a great organized MORAL POWER to sweep away delusions so utterly foolish, that it will seem a miracle how they could have been so pertinaciously maintained.

MORPETH AND MONOPOLY.—Since the monopolist landlords held their exclusive meeting at Morpeth in respect of the Corn Laws, there have been open and public meetings held for "repeal" and Free Trade. On Tuesday se'nnight one of these public assemblies was held in the Town-hall—when Mr. Watson was called by acclamation to the chair. Mr. Donkin, of Bywell, first addressed the meeting; and after the delivery of his speech, an offer was made to any protectionist to reply, but not one in the crowded hall was disposed to say a word in favour of the Corn Laws. After a few remarks from Mr. Liddell on the taxes on land and on food, and votes of thanks to the Chairman, &c., the meeting separated with three cheers for Corn-Law repeal.—Gateshead Observer.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NOTTINGHAM REVIEW.—Gentlemen,—There has come again this week, what is generally called the Duke of Portland's "rent day." Thinking it a seasonable opportunity to sound a little upon the Corn Laws, I had a short conversation with one of the tenants, and he assured me that the farmers dare not open their minds too much, for fear of unpleasantness. He told me another fact, that as good a landlord as the duke had always been, many of his tenants were not twenty shillings better than they were twenty years ago! For whom, then, were the Corn Laws forced upon the country?—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant, FARM TRADER. Mansfield, April 23.

MEETINGS.

GREAT MEETING AT COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

The usual weekly aggregate meeting of the members and friends of the National Anti-Corn-Law League took place on Wednesday, at Covent-garden Theatre. The doors were thrown open at 7 o'clock, and in a very few moments every seat was occupied; the private boxes and the stage being more than usually crowded.

At half-past seven o'clock the Right Hon. Lord Kinnaird, who had undertaken to preside, entered the theatre amid enthusiastic cheering. He was accompanied by Mr. Cobden, M.P., and followed by a number of influential members of Parliament and gentlemen, supporters of Free-Trade principles. Among those present at this time we observed,

The Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, M.P., Benjamin Smith, Esq., M.P., Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., John Lewis Ricardo, Esq., M.P., Sir Wm. Baynes, Bart., J. Somers, Esq. (Bridgewater), Ralph Ricardo, Esq., A. Austin, Junr., Esq., R. R. Moore, Esq., H. R. Ricardo, Esq., Arthur Pattison, Esq., Rev. Henry Townley, General Briggs, Professor Key, Col. Tucker, A. Bauer, Esq., Rev. W. Todman, Rev. Dr. Marshall, W. A. Wilkinson, Esq., Wm. M'Call, Esq., Samuel Harrison, Esq., Norman Wilkinson, Esq., George Lance, Esq., Dr. Cooke Taylor, George Wansley, Esq., C. Foster, Esq., J. Evans, Esq., Major Reid Revel, J. B. Scott, Esq. (Manchester), R. Palmer, Esq., R. W. Cole, Esq., Peter Dixon, Esq. (Carlisle), John Egan, Esq., Thomas Egan, Esq., W. Elliott, Esq., T. Nicholas, Esq., D. Miles, Esq., W. Chambers, Esq., W. Thornborough, Esq., W. Stirling, Esq., Henry Lloyd Morgan, Esq., J. T. Clay, Esq., J. H. Hulme, Esq. (Manchester), W. Lockett, Esq. (Manchester), George Nelson, Esq. (Manchester), J. P. Nixon, Esq., T. Keeling, Esq., H. Baldwin, Esq., W. Hughes, Esq., P. Nott, Esq., Isaac Nicholls, Esq. (Plymouth), Josh. Storr, Esq. (Yorkshire), Wm. Bettison, Esq. (town council, Hull), James Eytan, Esq. (Mold, Flintshire), John Williams, Esq., W. Clarke, Esq., W. G. Mitchell, Esq., J. P. Burnard, Esq., W. Gessin, Esq., Robert Johnston, Esq. (Manchester), E. Edridge, Esq. (Mayor of Bath), John Atkinson, Esq. (Mayor of Hull).

Mr. SAUL having read the minutes of the last meeting, upon the motion of Mr. VILLIERS, M.P., seconded by Mr. WILKINSON, they were unanimously confirmed.

The Noble CHAIRMAN then came forward to the front of the stage, and the cheering with which he was again greeted having subsided, he spoke as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, I must commence by thanking you for the very kind reception which you have given me this evening. Often as I have occupied one of those benches before me which I now see so well filled, still did I ever expect that I should find myself upon the stage of Covent-garden Theatre (laughter and cheers); and I do not think that anything scarcely could have induced me to appear here but the feeling that I might in some measure be able to promote the important cause of Free Trade. (Loud cheers.) I should have appeared, ladies and gentlemen, here this evening with still greater reluctance, had I not heard from speakers who have addressed audiences in this house on former occasions, that they never addressed, I may say, more intelligent, and, at the same time, more indulgent audiences. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) Looking round on the countenances spread before me this evening, I feel that I am certain of the first, and I hope I may count on the latter. (Hear, hear.) When I look around me at the immense numbers here congregated together, I think I am justified in warning you all, that perhaps the number—which has not yet been defined by the Executive—the number of people congregated together which constitutes an illegal meeting or a conspiracy not having been defined—we may all be—yes, ladies and all—included in the category of conspirators. (Laughter.) Now, I own that, looking around me, and seeing so many ladies here present, it would have surprised me to imagine what could have induced them to come and listen to such a dry subject as that of political economy, did I not know that woman's heart is ever open to feel for the sufferings, and she is ever ready to hear how the distressed condition, of her fellow-beings may be ameliorated and improved. (Cheers.) I trust, therefore, that it is not through curiosity either to see or to hear what may be said or done this evening that they are assembled here, but that it is from a sincere desire to promote the prosperity and welfare of all classes, but particularly of the humbler classes of society. (Loud cheers.) That is the main, the principal object of the Anti-Corn-Law League; because, while the agriculturist must be benefited (and I am prepared presently to prove that the landowners must be benefited), no class, at the same time, can be so benefited as the industrious and labouring classes of the community, by opening fresh sources for the employment of honest industry; and, to use a phrase which has now become a cant phrase, but is not, I am sorry to say, acted on to the fullest extent—allowing them to buy in the cheapest and to sell in the dearest market. (Cheers.) I hope you are not here merely from curiosity, but that you are here to learn; and, if you cannot learn in one evening, we shall be glad to see you here back again for the purpose of further instructing you; or, if you apply to the Anti-Corn-Law League, they will supply you with documents proving to you the truth of that which we hold to be sound and legitimate doctrine. (Cheers.) I hope that, when once convinced, you will use your utmost influence in this righteous cause; for we know not, to the fullest extent, what influence any individual here may have. You have seen, probably, a pebble cast into a pool of water, and you have seen how gradually the circles extended until they spread round the whole surface of the stream; thus it may be with the influence of any one who is thoroughly convinced of the justice of his own cause. (Loud cheers.) This influence was remarkably exemplified in a late visit to Perthshire, from a deputation of the League, consisting of that able advocate Mr. Cobden, (loud and long cheering), and others. On that occasion there was a manufacturer who told us this fact. He said, "I reside in the midst of farmers and agriculturists. I have taken advantage of the fall of water, and I have a large spinning mill. I am surrounded by about thirty farmers, and, with the exception of one, they are all Free-Traders." (Hear, hear.) That one farmer attended the meeting at Perth, which is situated in the midst of a large agricultural district; the meeting was also attended by about 1500 or 2000 persons, a large proportion of whom consisted of tenant-farmers. I was told by a friend, who, after he attended the meeting, went into the market-place, that he saw nothing but the wan long-looking faces of the Monopolist landowners, who left their business and the market-place to hear what was going on. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) And what was the effect? Why, the manufacturer told us, that the next day he found this farmer, who was before a dissentient, eagerly engaged in arguing the question with a neighbour Monopolist farmer in favour of our system. (Loud laughter and cheers.) The manufacturer was astonished, and asked, "How is this?" The farmer replied, "I did not quite take in all that you said to me, but from what I heard at the meeting I became so satisfied of the truth of the statements made that you now have not a more zealous friend of the cause than myself. (Loud cheers.) Now, ladies and gentlemen, the study of political economy is not new to me: it has not been taken up by me for any party purpose, for those who are now no more early turned my attention to its doctrines. But, whilst studying the works of Adam Smith, Ricardo, Mrs. Marcet, and other masterly productions, not forgetting the works of Miss Martineau—the interesting tales of which extraordinary person I recommend to the ladies more especially—"hear, hear," and laughter)—while studying these I never thought that I should see so soon the extraordinary proof of the truth of their assertions as has transpired during the last two or three years, owing to the principles and exertions of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Loud cheers.) It is impossible to see any return that has been made for in either House of Parliament, or any statement that has been made by the Anti-Corn-Law League, without directly corroborating everything that has been written in those able works. (Cheers.) Now, being dependent almost, I may say, for my existence on the produce of land, I naturally have turned my attention considerably to it. I have for several years had a farm on my own hands, and a considerable quantity of land; and during the last eighteen months, not coming to town, I devoted myself to the improvement of the land to see what might be done with it, and whether I could not produce corn a great deal cheaper and with equal profit: the result is that I have come to the conclusion more firmly than I did before, that it would be better to take away the Corn Laws, which are most injurious to me as a farmer and a landowner. (Loud and long-continued cheering.) If I found myself alone in this opinion as a landed proprietor, and that it was only such as my friend Mr. Cobden, engaged in manufactures, who coincided with me, I might hesitate and think that I was wrong; but when I know the large number of landed proprietors who are in favour of these all-important doctrines, but who object to take a prominent position, or to join the ranks of the Anti-Corn-Law League, I feel no hesitation on the subject. (Cheers.) Though these men do not come forward to support the Anti-Corn-Law League, still they say, "Oh, you are quite right; but we do not like the League." There was one gentleman, however, whom Mr. Cobden met with (Mr. Murray, of Polnaisie, near Stirling), who is a large agricultural proprietor, and who devotes his whole time to agriculture; he has a large farm on his own hands, and is one of the greatest authorities on all questions relating to farming: you will see by the statements which he has given what he has made his land to produce. Mr. Murray told me himself that he has been for eighteen years engaged in agriculture, and that the only thing which interferes with him, and does him harm, is the upholding of the system of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) I have had letters from farmers on this subject. I had one not long ago from a farmer, who sent me a letter of his written in the year 1826. He had travelled over England, and had been for some time abroad: it was about two years ago that he came to me. He is a farmer holding land to the amount of £1500 a year. His uncle holds another large farm, and also his brother. He came to me and asked me for a farm, which I was but too glad to give him. This farmer showed me a letter written in 1826, wherein he said that the Corn Laws were then injurious to the land. (Loud cheers.) So that a tenant-farmer, even before this question was agitated as it now is, discovered the truth of this fact. (Hear, hear.) Well, then, there is a tenant, Mr. Watson, of Killah, one of Lord Wharnclyffe's tenants, who holds two or three farms under him. I wanted him (knowing his opinion to be that the Corn Laws are injurious)—I wanted him to be present here; but "No," said he, "I disapprove of the League; I disapprove of their agitation." But I, it so happened, was acquainted with the reason—he was under a Conservative landlord. (Loud cheers and laughter.) Thus, you see, I am myself inclined to be the more strongly convinced as to the truth and importance of my views on this question, because I find myself backed by the authority of so many practical farmers. (Cheers.) Now, I want to know for whose benefit are these laws; because we can prove, and I believe it is not denied, that many people suffer by them? One outrageous monopolist will tell you that it is better to pay so much more for bread. Another will tell you, so much the better; it will lessen wages. I have been told, "Oh, wages are too high; it would be much better if the working man had less wages." That is a fact. Others, however, say, "Oh, rent, rent! it is not that; the sacrifice would be nothing; but it is the interest of the farmers who have invested so much capital, and that of the poor agricultural labourers, whose position is to be considered." (Laughter.) It is all for that—it is all entirely for that; if it were not so, we would not think of it for a moment; oh, no! (Loud laughter and cheers.) Let them look at the history of the Corn Laws. What was the Corn Law of 1815 passed for? Why, for the purpose of keeping up rent at war prices. This law was truly said to have been passed at the point of the bayonet, because members of Parliament, in going down to vote, were obliged to be protected by the soldiery. ("Hear, hear," and hisses.) The law was passed also without giving the people time to petition against it, as I find from recently reading the debates upon the subject. The bill was hurried through both Houses of Parliament with the most indecent haste: as Mr. Horne at the time said, "It was an endeavour of the landowners"—who then, as now, I think, command a very considerable majority in both Houses of Parliament (hear, hear)—"it was an endeavour on the part of the landowners to save rents from an unavoidable fall;" and for this purpose the bill was passed. (Cheers.) And now what are we told? Oh, that so much capital has been invested in land that you will be doing the greatest injustice if you do away with the law; just as though, because you tolerate one injustice, you must continue others in succession. (Cheers.) When I came into my property, I found that many of the farms in Scotland were taken at the war prices. Well, what did the landlords do? They were obliged to consent to have large arrears. I said immediately it is a very unpleasant thing to have one's head under water (laughter); the best thing is at once to let us know what is fair; and so I had the land all valued over again. (Loud cheers.) I do not wish to take credit to myself for that, because it is merely what others did. The landlords kept these arrears hanging over their tenants, thinking, perhaps, they might make use of them in election matters. (Laughter and cheers.) I thought, however, that it would be better to start fair. But what do we see in England? If any of you here read the Morning Post (loud laughter)—I am afraid it has not such a circulation as the other papers; I do not often, but I sometimes do, look at it, to see what is said upon both sides of the question—but if you read the Morning Post you will sometimes see announced "Great Liberality of a Landlord," "Wonderful and Extraordinary Liberality," "Wonderful Reduction of Rents;" the Duke of This and my Lord That has given back ten or twenty per cent. at his last audit. What does this mean? Why, simply that he could not get it. (Great laughter.) And the consequence of his being under a belief that it was to be got caused him to live, as many have done, far beyond what he could afford. And it is a very remarkable thing that, if you go back to my friend the Morning Post (laughter), you will see that there are not so many announcements of large fêtes and balls for the last two or three years as there were formerly. (Hear, hear, hear.) You see also a great reduction in establishments. Before I took a farm on my own hands, I sent the man who was to manage it round England with an English farmer to learn a little farming; and directed him to report to him upon what he heard, and observed. He returned to me, and said that, generally speaking, nay, almost universally, he considered that land in England was underlet, in comparison with that of Scotland; that it was not made to produce the same quantity; and as the system of farming was so expensive there could not be the same profit. I maintain, then, that the landlords, like pigs swimming down a stream, are, in reality, cutting their own throats. (Loud laughter and cheers.) One or two years may be good years, but which, in reality, are years of scarcity. What they call a good year is when there is not enough food for the unfortunate families of the poor. (Hear, hear.) Providence has blessed this country with many abundant harvests; but, as in the case of Castlereagh and others on the same side, they have made that a cause of distress which should be a blessing. We state, therefore, and it must even be apparent to those people who have not looked, or will not look into the question, that there must be something wrong where such a blessing as an abundant quantity of food is denied to the people of this country. (Cheers.) If you will visit any farmer and ask him, "Well, how are you doing?" He will answer, "Oh, bad times; farming is a very bad trade, it is the worst trade in the kingdom." Well, how is that? There must be something wrong; there is nothing so protected; nothing ought to give so good a return as land, and yet you see the farmers complain. (Hear, hear.) I, who know, can safely state that in Scotland, and I believe it is the case in England, at least, one-half the farmers have been reduced from affluent circumstances to abject poverty; that they have been obliged to expatriate themselves; that they have been obliged to become labourers, where, before, they were in possession of a farm—not from any improvidence of their own, but for this reason, because by our laws they have been promised certain prices; but they took a farm calculating on getting those prices, believing what their landlords and agents had told them, but they did not get them, and so it must continue as long as a law so uncertain as the Corn Law exists. (Loud cheers.) I visited, about two years ago, several agricultural counties, and in my life I never saw such bad farming, such waste of farmyard material, labour performed so expensively, and, after all, such miserable crops compared with those that ought to be produced: so that, by keeping up the law which prevents the people from getting food from other countries, they do not even produce from the land that which otherwise they would do. Now, a few days ago, I was at a place in the neighbourhood of London, and I asked a man there what the land let for, knowing something of land and its value myself, and he said, "30s. an acre;" he was a Scotchman. I said, "Is it not underlet?" and he replied, "Yes, very much." I said, "Do not you think it is worth £3; why do not the Scotch farmers come and take it?" He said, "There are some in the neighbourhood who are making their fortunes." That was told me only a few days ago. Why, in Scotland, are we reckoned good farmers? A Scotchman, certainly, is an industrious animal (laughter); he sets his wit to work, and does not take for gospel all that is told him ("hear," and laughter); he thinks for himself; and if the farmers of England thought a little more for themselves they would do infinitely better. (Loud cheers.) Then the farmers in Scotland are indebted to the agricultural labourers, who are a superior class of men. They say that machinery, instead of injuring them, is one of the greatest boons. They are not against the employment of machinery in Scotland. They are men who are zealous for improvement, and see that it must be to their advantage. (Hear.) The whole of the Scotch farming is done better, although with a much worse climate: then we have but a short time for getting the seed into the ground, for even the delay of a day may prevent the getting of a crop; and therefore we are obliged to exert ourselves, and use the most expeditious mode to get our land in good order, sow our seed, and gather in our crops. ("Hear" and cheers.) Now, if there were a little more competition, I contend that the English farmer must soon do the same. (Hear, hear.) I think I have thus shown that neither the farmer nor the farm-labourer are at present benefited: because, read the reports of the commission which was sent down by Government, and who continued for about fifteen days or three weeks in the agricultural counties, such as Dorsetshire and Hampshire; the accounts that they give of the misery, destitution, ignorance, and immorality which prevail in those counties are such that the very thought of them harrows up the soul. (Cheers.) They have been verified by landowners themselves, although it is true enough that you find some like Mr. Bankes, who thinks to make you believe that they are perfect clyseums. (Hear, hear.) Now, I have been on Mr. Bankes's estate, and anything more miserable than the cottages I cannot conceive. (Cheers.) True it is not so much misery congregated in masses such as we lately witnessed in the manufacturing districts; but I have seen cases scattered about these cottages equally as bad. You see disease existing for want of proper food. I have seen it—for I made the experiment myself:—I gave a family who were all diseased, an order on my butcher, and in the space of six weeks or two months the change in that family was a proof that with proper food they would never have been so. (Loud cheers.) I have travelled in many countries, and in very few besides our own have I found people so charitable and anxious to do good on their own immediate properties; but no individual charity can support poor people out of employment. (Hear, hear.) For instance, I lately visited Sussex, in the neighbourhood of a large landed proprietor, a great Corn-Law monopolist. I went in at the gate of a cottage, and I saw the children there at home. I said to the woman, who did not know who I was, "How is this? There are schools close by, why don't you send your children?" She replied, "They have no clothes." "But," I said, "how is that; your husband is getting work, is he not?" "Oh yes, pretty constant, but not regularly." "What does he get?" "Oh, in winter, 6s., and in summer, 7s. a week." (Hisses and disapprobation.) Now, that is the general rate of wages: in some counties it is slightly more—perhaps 8s. a week. This woman showed me a loaf of bread, for which she said she had paid 8d. And she said, "Look at it; do you think that it is enough food for five children and two grown-up persons? There is 8d. out of this 1s. a day, nearly the 7s., leaving about 28d. to provide for every other necessary; and how can I send my children to school?" ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) If we go into the actual expense, and there have been several publications showing it, the thing is impossible. The only wonder is how they live, or rather how they starve, for it would be ridiculous to say they live. ("Hear, hear," and loud cheers.) And yet there are people who complain every day, "Oh, it is these agricultural labourers you are throwing out of employment." Now, it is a very curious thing, but many of them are led to believe that the majority of the people are agricultural; they affirm this in many of their papers and among themselves. They state that so many are manufacturers, and that all the rest are agriculturists; and so you are, though you don't know that you are, agriculturists: I confess I should be sorry to let a farm to many of you, for I fear you would not know how to set about it (laughter); but, ladies and gentlemen, according to the theory of the Protectionists you are one and all agriculturists. (Loud laughter and cheers.) Now, in a paper, a most able paper, the Economist, there is copied from the Manchester Guardian a report from twenty-seven counties, and amongst these are Essex, Norfolk, and Lincoln, being purely agricultural counties, the others not being included, owing to the return of the last census not being had: the remaining twenty-seven counties, including York, Lancaster, Staffordshire, and Warwickshire, which, as you all know, are great manufacturing and mining places, are not included in this. Well, Mr. Brotherton, I think it was, in the House of Commons, said, that instead of the numbers being 7-9ths agricultural out of the population they were not 1-10th. "Oh, oh, oh!" cried some, which means there, "You have told us what is not true, and we don't believe it." But by the returns here—and they are efficient returns as far as they go—by these returns, in the agricultural counties, it turns out that there is not 1-8th of the population employed in agriculture, including women and children. (Hear.) The persons engaged in other trades amount to 28½ per cent., while ½ per cent. only are employed in agriculture; and for this purpose you are to be blessed, or rather cursed, with a protection law to keep up prices. (Loud cheers.) But it is a curious thing that in these counties, taking all the women and children, and all the men employed in agriculture, the aggregate amounts to about 610,000, while in the Salford union, comprising 210 acres, the population amounts to 700,000; so that in these 27 counties the whole of the agricultural population does not amount to the number included in the 210 acres of Salford union; you see then what a small proportion they are making a fight about. (Hear, hear.) But then, ladies and gentlemen, the curious thing is, that as the population increases the proportion employed in agriculture diminishes. (Hear, hear.) In 1811, 352 out of every 1000 were employed in agriculture, while there were 648 in other trades; in 1821 the proportion employed in agriculture was 332, in other trades 668; in 1831 the proportion was 281, showing a gradual diminution, while in other trades it amounted to 719; and, if in 1841 it goes on in the same proportion, there will only be 240 out of every 1000 employed in agriculture, while there will be 760 employed in other trades. (Cheers.) But again, the actual number (which is another curious thing) employed in agriculture, in 1821, including women and children, was 6,500,000, and in 1831 it was 6,400,000; so that the actual numbers were diminished. (Hear, hear.) This is a very singular fact, and only to be accounted for in this way—that in farming it is naturally the landowner's interest—I mean not his individual private interest, but for the general wealth of the country—that farms should not be too small, because a small farm requires the same farm buildings—the same number of persons to be employed immediately about the homestead; so it is not for the advantage of the country generally, or for the landowners, to have too small farms; and, I believe, they have been throwing in the farms, and making them larger, thereby diminishing the numbers employed. That is one reason; there may be others why there are fewer employed in agriculture, and I believe that there will turn out to be still fewer in 1841, when the returns are made out, than there were in 1820. But then we are told, "Oh it is all very well, but the public burdens bear so heavily upon agriculture," and I dare say many of the ladies have often said, "What a wretched thing is this increase of population—what is to become of it?" Why, this very increase, if we only had free intercourse with other countries, and the means of disposing of our manufactures to other nations, would be the real wealth of the country—and particularly such a population as we possess; for I believe there is scarcely a man amongst them who would wish to be idle if he could help it. (Cheers.) I will show you briefly how the public burdens diminish per head as the population increases. In 1811, the public burdens were at the rate of £3 10s. 3d. per head; in 1821, they were £2 13s. 8d. per head; in 1831, they were £2 6s. 5d. per head; and in 1841, they were £1 18s. 10d. Now, it is true that taxes have been remitted from 65 millions to nearly 52 millions; and the population has so increased that they are enabled to bear those burdens—that is, they would be, if they were let alone. (Cheers.) But, I will show how these are pressed upon agriculture. The proportion paid by the agriculturists was, in 1811, six millions and a half, and by the other classes 12 millions. (Hear, hear.) That was the proportion of the taxes they then paid. There were 65 millions altogether: the agriculturists contributed 36 per cent., and the other classes 64 per cent. But in 1831 cent., the agricultural population, not having increased but diminished, paid £12,422,000, and the other classes £39,000,000; so that the agriculturists in 1831 contributed 24 per cent. to 76 per cent. by the other classes, instead of, as in 1811, 36 per cent. to 64 per cent. (Hear, and cheers.) The farmer does not pay duty for horses used in farm purposes, and he may keep one for riding about; nor does he pay for his dogs which look after his sheep. It is quite clear the landowners have taken care of themselves. (Hear.) We cannot blame them for it; everybody will do so if you let them. I ask you not to let them do so any longer. (Loud cheers.) If the people of this country only show a determination, peaceable, yet firm, they must yield. They are in the minority, and many of them know they are wrong. Many of them are quite willing to go with you, and, if you only show a bold front, the Corn Law must fall to the ground. (Great cheering.) Look at what the population has lately been saddled with!—an income-tax rendered necessary by restrictive laws. (Cheers.) John Bull takes things very coolly; he is a long time before he rouses himself; but when he does rouse he gives a good shake. (Hear, hear.) How long he will be subject to this tax is a question not easily answered. We were first told it was for three years, and then for five. I was in the House of Lords when Lord Melbourne, rubbing his hands, said—I don't use his own words—"It's a very good thing for a Minister to get hold of, but I wish you may get rid of it." (A laugh.) The advocates of that tax tell you that it is only taken out of the pockets of the rich, and that it is all for the benefit of the poor man. Still, if anybody with common sense were to ask them to consider that if they took £10 or £20 from a man, he could not spend it, and that the effect would be felt by every one concerned in the manufacture or sale of what he would otherwise purchase, they would not listen to him. (Hear, hear.) I will not enter into the question of political economy as to whether you should do away with direct taxation—but with the present system of taxes, when the Government boasts of having a surplus revenue, I would ask them, "How did you get it?" (Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear.") Why, by putting your hands into my pocket. (Cheers.) And that is the real truth; they have the power to do it: they make up a surplus by such means, and then boast that they have got it. (Cheers.) It has been said, if you do away with the Corn Laws you will throw the poor land out of cultivation. (Hear, hear.) Now, to grow wheat upon poor land is a clear loss of wealth, and if you impose burdens upon the people to enable the landowners to grow wheat upon poor land, there is a sacrifice of the means to the end. (Hear, hear, hear.) Many farmers, when asked what the Corn Laws are for, say to secure them high prices,—literally and truly I was told that by an intelligent farmer the other day. Now, protection is a wheat law—it is very much lower upon barley—so much so that the price of barley has risen considerably, and I have found it to pay better than wheat. In order for land to be productive it does not follow of necessity that it should grow wheat. I could show some pasture land a short time ago worth not more than from 3s. to 5s. an acre. I gave it to a man to cultivate, and in four years it was worth £1 an acre; and the man said he could make a very good thing of it; but he added, "I never think of growing wheat; I rear cattle; and, if they would only allow the consumer the means of purchasing the wool and cattle which I produce, hang all the Corn Laws." (Cheers and laughter.) But I will give you an instance to show, if I am not taking up too much of your time, how unnecessary it is, in order to make land pay, to grow a quantity of wheat. I had a farm on my own land and the tenant was always grumbling. The fact was, I saw he was a bad farmer—that he did not like to lay out his capital; so I said to him, "You had better give it up; you shall go out at a fair valuation, and let me see what I can do with it." I had it valued; the valuation was very low, as you may be sure; and now it is as high-rated a farm as any on my estate. (Cheers.) I put capital into a man's hand, and I said, "Don't come to me for any assistance; do the best you can with it." Now, what was the consequence? That farm was valued at £2 1s. 10d. an acre. It was not the best land; some of it would not let for more than 5s. or 6s. an acre in England. It contained 263 statute acres, and the produce in 1842 was 180 tons of potatoes, 42 acres of turnips, 60 tons of seeds, and 610 quarters of grain; and out of that there was of barley 213 quarters, of oats 251 quarters, of beans 45 quarters, and of wheat 71 quarters. (Hear, hear.) Now, as regards expenses, I bought manure to the value of £195; expenses of workmen and the manager's salary, £178; making £573. Its rent, at £2 1s. 10d., amounted to about £567; and the clear profit I got from the crop was £220 4s. 8d., and on the cattle land £214, making a clear profit of £134 odd. (Cheers.) Then, taking the capital invested at £2000, and allowing five per cent. for that capital to be laid back, I still had £234 clear profit. (Hear, hear.) That was a high year. Now I will take a low year. The expenses were £615; my profits were £277; and, laying by the five per cent. as before for interest on invested capital, a clear profit of £77 on that year was still left. I say, then, that farming will answer when properly managed. That year the cattle market was materially injured by destroying the trade of Dundee with South America and the Brazils, so that I could not sell my cattle. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) I think, then, I have shown you that a small portion of wheat grown on a farm is not any very great disadvantage. The only injury a farmer sustains is that, the market being destroyed for cattle, his farmyard supplies him with but a small quantity of manure to assist in growing his wheat. I asked a farmer whether if he could sell double the quantity of cattle he would keep them? He replied, "Certainly, because I should have so much manure that I should be able to grow wheat at such a price that I would defy the foreigner to bring his cattle over and compete with me." (Loud cheering.) Another farmer to whom I spoke said, "If you repeal the Corn Laws, corn will come in and ruin us." I said, "Where from?" "Oh," he replied, "I do not know;" but they had told him that all foreign countries were flooded with corn, and that you only had to go to the seashores and you could pick it up like guano on the coast of Africa. (Applause and laughter.) Now, the good the Anti-Corn-Law League do is that they go amongst the people and convince them of the real truth of the case; and when once you convince men, though the landlord has great power over them, yet when they find out that anything is to their interest, they don't easily abandon it. (Cheers.) Now, amongst other evils, these Corn Laws do is, that they render farming such a gambling transaction. The uncertainty of the weather is quite enough for a farmer to contend with, without the prices hopping up and down in consequence of these laws. (Hear, hear.) Gambling is suppressed by act of Parliament, though I dare say you may recollect that lately some gentlemen of the turf, finding themselves in a scrape, procured an act of Parliament to protect themselves from prison, and, having some influence, they said, "If you don't help us, we'll set to work against the Art-Union, for they are illegal, and we'll have Prince Albert and the Archbishop of Canterbury's wife convicted of gambling." (Laughter.) Now, in one week, what happened to me? Wheat was sold at 45s. per quarter. I said it was quite sure to rise, because no other could come in; and I was right. The price got up—56s., 58s., 60s., 68s. My agent said we had better sell. Well, I said we will; it is a very good price for July, but I think it will rise to 70s. Well, there came a fortnight of fine weather, which frightened all the holders of corn. They let it in at 8s.; and I had my wheat on hand. I lost my chance. (Hear, hear, hear.) I mentioned this in Perth to some gentlemen, and they said they had all been bitten in the same way—that is, those who could afford to keep corn on hand; but remember how hard it is on those who were obliged to sell at 45s. This shows what a gambling affair it is. (Hear, hear.) The other day I said to a gentleman, "You were promised 56s., but you won't get your price." He gravely replied, "I don't expect it exactly, but I shall get a little less." I said, "How is it you are satisfied with 54s.?" "Oh," he answered, "we are able to produce wheat cheaper now, and if you will give us time, we will produce it at 40s." "But," I said, "my dear fellow, how should you like to go without your dinner for a long time, and then be told you would get it cheaper in the end?" (Hear, hear, hear.) Now, I am sure of one thing, and that is, that the farmers' eyes are becoming daily more open to the importance—and these last few years have contributed more to that enlightenment than any previous years—of the consumers being able to pay for what they want. I took the trouble, two years ago, to inquire into this subject; and in Dundee I found that, instead of 180 cattle per week being slaughtered, as before, there were only 70; and in the small villages where there used to be two or three, there were none. (Hear.) The consequence was, the farmers became aware that by injuring the consumer you must injure the producer. (Cheers.) Before sitting down I must just make some few observations upon a pamphlet which has been written by Mr. Cayley. (Hear.) He is, I believe, an honourable man, but my impression is that he has been deceived; the quotations he has given as from my old friend Adam Smith I am quite sure he could never have seen or he would not have used them. This pamphlet has gone forth to the world under the authority and sanction of gentlemen calling themselves a protection society, though I think they might more appropriately be called a rent-league. (Loud cheers.) I think you will agree with me, when I have pointed out to you some of these misstatements and incorrect quotations, that it is a shameful thing men should seek to delude those who depend on them by such fallacies as are therein contained. He says: "The largest body of producers—the customers of farmers and the labourers—are the great support of the inland trade of the country." Now, it is quite clear that the farmers are not; the great masses congregating in the manufacturing towns, they are the great consumers. Then he states that "the agricultural labourers are at the same time the producers and the largest consumers of their own produce." If they are the largest consumers of their own produce, how are they benefited by paying so large a price for it? Here is a curious thing: he says: "To use the words of an authority much quoted upon this subject, Mr. Adam Smith, whatever tends to keep down the price of labour below what it would otherwise rise to, keeps down the revenue of the great body of the people more than it reduces that of the land." When I read that "keeps down the price of labour" I thought it wonderful that there should be such a statement in Adam Smith. What he really says is "whatever keeps down labour" not "price" at all. (Cheers.) Is it not too bad to assert things of this sort. (Cheers.) This led me to look a little further, and, strange enough, I find he goes on to state that "the whole annual produce of the land and labour of every country are divided into three parts, constituting the revenue of three separate orders—those who lived on the rent of the land—those who lived on the wages of labour—and those who lived upon the profits of stock. The interest of the first of these three great orders is strictly and inseparably connected with the general interests of the society. Whatever either promotes or obstructs the one, necessarily promotes or obstructs the other." And he is quite right, but then the quotation stopped. If the writer had read on a little further he would have found that Adam Smith said—"When the public deliberate concerning any regulation of commerce or police, the proprietors of land never can mislead it with a view to promote the interest of their own particular order, at least if they have any tolerable knowledge of that interest"—a knowledge in which they were too often defective. (Hear, hear.) "They are the only one of the three orders whose revenue costs them neither labour nor care, but comes to them as it were of its own accord, and independent of any plan or project of their own. That indolence which is the natural result of the ease and security of their situation renders them too often not only ignorant but incapable of that application of mind which is necessary in order to foresee and understand the consequences of any public regulation." (Loud cheers.) Here he stops short, and leaves the rest to be inferred. If I am not tiring you too much I will go on with the second order: "The interest of the third order has not the same connexion with the general interest of the society as that of the other two. Merchants and master manufacturers are in this order." Would you not suppose that meant that those were the only ones? Instead of that Adam Smith says that, "The merchants and master manufacturers are of that order, those who, perhaps, employ the largest amount of capital." He again imputes to Adam Smith "that it will be generally advantageous to lay some burden upon foreign for the protection of domestic industry." I thought it would be odd if I could find that in Adam Smith. What he says, is that "there seems to be two cases in which it may be generally advantageous." Mr. Cayley says it will be generally advantageous, leaving out the two cases; and that is the difference. (Hear, hear.) One of the cases mentioned by Adam Smith referred to the navigation laws; and the other was, where an article being taxed at home, it became fair also to propose a tax upon the same article coming from any other country. (Cheers.) I could show you that every quotation Mr. Cayley has made from Adam Smith is incorrect: and yet this pamphlet has gone forth with the sanction of the Protection Society, and of that party who are mainly instrumental in maintaining restrictive laws in this country. I have myself also heard it approved of by a leading protectionist in the House of Lords. (Hear, hear.) I firmly believe, and I am satisfied, that if it had not been for them the Prime Minister of this country was quite prepared, as we say "to go the whole hog" with Free Trade. (Cheers and laughter.) But he has masters who tell him that they have placed him where he is, and that if he does not do their bidding they will turn him out. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) I really must apologise for having detained you so long, and I most heartily thank you for the kindness with which you have listened to me. The noble chairman retired from the front of the stage amidst loud and protracted cheering; again advancing he said, my friend Mr. Ricardo will now address you. (Cheers.)

Mr. Ricardo, M.P., on coming forward was greeted with loud plaudits from all parts of the theatre. He said:—I am well aware how ill qualified I am to supply the place of your old and faithful friend, Mr. Cobden (cheers); a gentleman who has done so much for the cause—who has always something new to say upon it, and who will never desert it so long as it requires his assistance. (Great cheering.) I recollect an old story in which it was told how certain philosophers entered into a controversy with respect to the position of a certain building. After having expended a great deal of ingenuity of argument upon the subject, some individual suggested whether it would not be advisable to go and look at the building. (A laugh.) Now, I have heard a great deal said about the question of Free Trade in this country, and I have been told that insensibly the agitation was dying away. The answer I give to all those who are of that opinion is, to come and see. (Loud cheers.) I think the League, when it first began its agitation, told you not to be led away by any dogma of one party or of the other party—not to listen to the dictum of this philosopher or of that philosopher; but to come here, and hear with your own ears, and see with your own eyes, and judge with your own judgment, whether you are not suffering under a horrible injustice, and whether you ought not to do something to get rid of it? (Hear, hear.) And certainly it is most remarkable that this injustice is not removed, when it is considered that the League has been able to open what was before a sealed book, except to a very few in this country—when they have made thousands and hundreds of thousands of political economists, and that not by exaggeration, not by appealing to your passions, but by coolly and deliberately showing you the facts of the case, and by asking you to give your opinion upon them. (Loud cheers.) I think he must be a bold man indeed who would come here to endeavour to add anything to the convictions which the League has given to you—to endeavour to put in a different point of view those arguments which have never been refuted, or to support an injustice which it was never attempted to justify. (Cheers.) And certainly, my lord, that is not my intention to-night. I come here—and I don't mean to mince matters—disgusted and despairing of success in that place where I have endeavoured to support your cause; I come here to appeal from the oppressor to the oppressed—from the lawmakers to those who are the victims of the law. (Great cheering.) Certainly, indeed, I have heard very good political economy there upon some occasions. I heard very sound doctrines of political economy there with respect to corks (a laugh); and I was surprised at the unanimity with which those doctrines were met. (Hear, hear.) On looking round, however, I saw no corkcutters in the House. (Cheers and laughter.) So also I heard good sound doctrines with respect to straw plait; but there were no straw-plait weavers behind the Treasury benches. (Renewed cheers and laughter.) And, the other night, I was surprised to hear how well received was the doctrine of free trade in currants; only I recollected that in all my travels on all the railways about this country, I never came across a currant plantation. (Laughter.) Now, this marks to me that you may dig in the holes of poor unfortunate corkcutters and straw-plait weavers, that you may pull down their little nest of monopoly; but, touch one straw of the hive of the great monopolies, up come all the drones that have been fattening, (a burst of applause here interrupted the hon. member, which, having subsided, he continued)—up come all the drones that have been fattening upon the honey which of right belongs to you; and if their sting were as bad as their "buzz," we should be in a poor way indeed. (Cheers, and great laughter.) Now, it may be well to trace exactly how we have been treated in that House. I recollect when my hon. friend Mr. Villiers first brought forward this question, the only argument with which he was met was that of hooting, and babbling, and so forth. (Cheers.) But, as public opinion obtained in this country, and they found they were obliged to give some answer, they came down from their lofty position, and talked about vested interests; and as the question became more talked of, they began to argue; but day by day we beat them from one position to another until they had not a leg to stand upon; and, as extremes meet, they are now obliged to fall back on their old original position, and they have now nothing to talk of but vested interests. (Cheers.) Our noble chairman well exposed these vested interests; but perhaps I may be excused if I examine for an instant what they really consist of. In my idea, a vested interest is the taking by somebody of something which does not belong to him (laughter); it is purloining some property, and asserting you have a right to it because you purloined it a long time ago. (Immense cheering.) Now, I dare say, there are a great many here who have been in France, and they will recollect that, in that country, there are none of that class of people whom we term "the regular dustmen." (Laughter.) The people, therefore, are in the habit of throwing their ashes and other rubbish in the front of their houses, and there are certain people called chiffonniers, who rake up these ashes, and pick up the little bits of paper and whatever may be useful to them,

In fact, they obtained a livelihood by so doing. You may recollect that, at the time of the cholera, the Government of France thought these heaps of stuff caused the disease to spread, and endeavoured to have them carried away. Oh! then they touched the vested interests of the chiffonniers! Up started the chiffonniers, and they would hear no reason; they had vested interests in the heaps of mud, and positively the Government, being afraid of a riot, were obliged to leave them there, and there they are to this day. (Immense cheering and laughter.) The same thing happened in Madrid. There it is customary to carry water into the city from a considerable distance. It was once proposed to build an aqueduct, but the carriers of water found their vested interests touched. Nobody had a right to buy water except of them. They had a vested interest in water, and nobody should have any interest in it of them at a dear price. (Cheers.) Now, I say, absurd and ridiculous as these instances of vested interests are, they are neither so absurd nor so wicked, nor so mischievous as the vested interests which the landowners have in this country. (Cheers.) What was the origin of this vested interest? It was a dreary and long war; not the least notorious of its effects was the high price it caused of all the necessities of life. (Cheers.) A great war, though a curse to the people of this country, was a profit and a benefit to the landowners, and it taught them when, at a great sacrifice, that war was ended, to come down to the House of Commons, and by the help of those bayonets which conquered their enemies they passed a law to continue artificial scarcity, and to rob this country of one of the greatest blessings that peace can confer. (Cheers.) But they have a vested interest in scarcity. (Cheers.) Whilst the people of this country have a vested interest in plenty—a vested interest which is founded upon a far higher law than was ever passed in Parliament—a law which said that the goods of this world should be scattered about, not for the benefit of the inhabitants of any particular spot where any particular article is found, but that the inhabitants of all parts, by mutually exchanging that of which they have a superfluity for that of which they have a scarcity, shall enjoy a fair share of the blessings which it has pleased God to bestow upon this world. (Cheers.) And I say, is it not wonderful, when we know these things, when we cannot help knowing them—when there is not a tradesman, not a manufacturer, not a farmer, not a landowner, not a labourer, but these things must stare him in the face—is it not wonderful, I ask, that the people of this country remain quiet when they see the rights of labour trampled on—when they regard the distresses of the population, thousands and hundreds of thousands of their fellow-creatures starving in workhouses—when it has been said by one of the protective party (and I would not for the world be the man who could have the insolence to say such a thing), that there were millions rejoicing on oatmeal and potatoes; and when, in answer to this, a Cabinet Minister tells us that there are two millions and a quarter of quarters of corn rotting in the warehouses of America, and that he should consider it a misfortune for it to come here (applause); two millions and a quarter of quarters of corn rotting in the United States; millions of quarters rotting in the Ukraine and Pultawa! And is it said that to exchange that corn which we want for the goods which they want would be a great national misfortune? (Hear.) When they say these things openly can they consider the consequences? Can they not think it may be just possible that, while they consider they are building fortifications by iron laws round their property, they may be creating enemies to that property itself? (Cheers.) Let them recollect what was said—not by a Leaguer—not by any man in this place—but by a servant of the Government, that the people of this country have no objection to any man keeping his property; but if he tells us that his property has some peculiar attribute which enables him to take some of ours from us, which we have only earned by the labour of our hands, then it is just possible that we may begin to think that there is some anomaly and injustice in it which we may fairly endeavour to up-set and destroy. (Cheers.) These are things which I don't like to say, only I am driven to it by the way in which we are treated. (Hear, hear.) I shall only detain you a very short time longer; but before I leave off I must implore you to help us, for you, and you only, can assist us. We can insert the nail, but you must wield the hammer to drive it home. (Loud cheers.) I think it is of no use now attempting to bring fresh Free-Traders into Parliament. If we had 20 or 30, or even 40, they would be of no use to us; but there will be another election, and I say that you ought, each man in the position he holds in life, to do his utmost in support of the great principles of Free Trade. (Cheers.) Your forefathers before you gained you civil and religious liberty; they gained you that at the point of the sword, and risked their lives and properties for it. I don't ask you to make such sacrifices for it; but as they bequeathed that as a legacy to you, you should remember that there is another boon which you may bequeath as a legacy to your sons, and that is—commercial freedom. (Great applause.) If you do that, I am quite convinced there is not one amongst you who will regret any sacrifice of time or money that he may make; and think, that your names may be written in the annals of your country, that your sons, and your sons' sons may point to them with conscious pride, and say, "Those are the men that emancipated the commerce of England." The honourable member resumed his seat amidst enthusiastic cheering, which lasted for some time; when it had somewhat subsided,

The Noble CHAIRMAN again came forward, and introducing Mr. SOMERS, said, I have now the pleasure of presenting to you Mr. James Somers, an excellent tenant-farmer from Somersetshire.

Mr. SOMERS then came forward amidst great applause, and said—My lord, ladies, and gentlemen, I believe that I am justified in saying that I am now beholding a scene such as I never before beheld; and I feel also that I am now called upon to perform a task and a duty such as I have never yet performed. Yes, ladies and gentlemen, duty is a sense of that which predominates over all other considerations, and which has brought me before you this evening. (Cheers.) The task, I feel, is too much for such a humble individual as I am to undertake, but I do hope and trust, from the kind feeling that I have seen evinced since I have been in the presence of this magnificent audience, that I shall receive that kindness and sympathy which are due to an individual holding such a position in life as myself and appearing under such peculiar circumstances. (Cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, I am a person possessing but very little information, and less capability of communicating it to you. I had the pleasure of being present at Exeter Hall this day, and the impression on my mind, and the inquiry which I put to myself when a gentleman rose to address the meeting, was this: I was desirous of knowing who he was, and what he was; and therefore I am led to believe that a kindred desire exists amongst the audience I am now addressing. I would remind you that I am one among that class of society called the tenant-farmers. (Cheers.) When I use the term "farmers," I must enter somewhat more into detail, for, in the county of Somerset—I do not know whether it is peculiar or different in this respect from other counties—there are various classes of farmers. For example: I remember some years since attending a sale of farming-stock in the neighbouring county of Dorset. I understood that it was the stock of a farmer, but I found that he was also a land-agent; he had, a few years previously, been called in that capacity to value the land of which he was then the occupier. He gave in his valuation at a fair moderate rent—a rent with which a farmer might venture to expend his capital, and anticipate that it would afford him a due compensation for his skill and outlay. But the fact was that no such tenant was forthcoming, and the result was that the land-agent became the occupier of this farm. It seems that a period of two or three years elapsed, which was quite sufficient to convince him that it answered his purpose much better to value land than to occupy it himself. (Laughter and cheers.) I mention this to show you that farmers of this sort are not the characters that are likely to appear on this platform for the purpose of advocating the principles of Free Trade. Short leases and frequent changes of tenancy suit them best,—not long leases and fixed tenure. I beg, then, to observe that I am not one of that class of farmers. (Cheers.) Again, a few years since, my nearest neighbour, who was a lawyer, and also an agent for several noblemen, occupied a few acres of land of his own. We often had a friendly chat together, and sometimes, of course, the conversation turned upon the profits of the farming business. He observed that, as far as his profits were concerned, "it would be poor Farmer So and So" (I do not mention the name), "were it not for Lawyer So and So." (Laughter.) Gentlemen, it is not my good fortune to be among that class. (Renewed laughter.) Again, in the county of Somerset there are many farmers who are termed tenants-at-will. We are to understand by this, if I mistake not, that they are tenants who, when they have to exercise their franchise, and are called upon to vote for members of Parliament, generally make choice of those gentlemen whom their landlords have selected; it so happens that that is the case (hear, hear), and these do not form the exception, but I think the majority of farmers in the county of Somerset do. I am happy to say that it is not my lot to belong to that class. (Loud cheers.) There is another class of farmers to whom I will call your attention; that is, to those who are the possessors and occupiers of landed estates. I am sorry to say it is not my lot to belong to them. (Laughter.) But even were it the case I should have no objection to appear on the present occasion. But still there is another class of farmers to which I would beg leave, if it be not too troublesome to you to listen to me (cries of "No, no")—I am sorry to say there is but a poor crop, of the description which I am now about to mention—and that is those who take out a licence to think for themselves, and act upon the dictates of their own minds. (Loud cheers.) Now, it affords me much pleasure to be able to tell you that I claim for myself to belong to that class. (Renewed cheers.) I feel it an honour to be amongst them; and, if called upon to give my vote for a member of Parliament, it is not a question with me who my landlord or landlady may have selected: I think for myself, looking to measures and not to men; and not only so, but when I am called to exercise my influence, however small it may be—and I am told that every man has some little influence in reference to any public question—the question to me I trust is, and always will be, not what suits my individual interest, but what will tend to the advantage and welfare of the millions of this country. (Loud cheers.) I envy not the man, let him be who he may or what he may, who is opposed to such principles as these. Having expressed to you in the best manner I can what the class of farmers is to which I belong, it becomes me now to state to you what my feelings are in reference to Free Trade. I will relate to you a conversation I had with a magistrate in our county some little time since, whilst discharging my duty as a member of the board of guardians of the Bridgewater Union:—He said, "Somers, what are your sentiments in reference to Free Trade?" I said, "Well, if you ask me for my opinion, I will give it you candidly: I am for Free Trade in everything all over the world. (Immense cheering.) Still," I observed, "I know but little of foreign countries; but I have never yet heard that there is any land which will spontaneously produce three or four crops of grain a year; if there be such a country as this, that is the one upon which I would fix a duty to prevent it from importing, because I think we cannot compete with a country of that sort." (Cheers.) What I mean is a soil that will produce three or four crops of corn without the expense of additional seed and labour connected with its produce. This was the observation I made to that gentleman in reference to Free Trade. I am one of those who do not make assertions, and give my opinion upon any subject, merely in the manner in which farmers do in general, by saying, "I think so, because I do think so." I always feel it my duty to give a reason why I say so and so and think this or that. If, then, I am called upon to assign a reason why I support Free Trade, I say, in the first place, that I am told that at present, and for some time past, large quantities of the necessities of life have been subjected to restriction; not because there is no consumption for them, but that, while there are thousands who are craving for them, there exists at the same time a law preventing these necessities of life from being brought into this country, whereby the people would have their wants supplied. For this reason I think the Corn Law a most iniquitous system. (Hear, hear.) It is a question with me whether the farmers—the men who support such a system—are not themselves held in a bondage of a far worse description. Again, ladies and gentlemen, I advocate the principles of Free Trade under a conviction that it will tend to advance the prosperity and welfare of the industrious classes of the community. (Cheers.) I perfectly agree with Earl Spencer, when he said he believed that Free Trade would increase the quantity of labour, and consequently augment wages in agricultural districts (hear); affording the labouring classes a better opportunity of supporting themselves with a greater degree of comfort than they now possess under the present system of restriction. (Cheers.) The doctrine which the agriculturists in the county of Somerset generally put forth is this—that the farmers are a body of such importance that if they stop all other classes must stand still also; that is, if farmers are not in a prosperous state, no other class of the community will be. (Laughter.) But, gentlemen, I am one of those persons who cannot see the importance of farmers in this light; I do not believe that the agricultural part of the community are of that consequence which some people suppose them to be. My impression is this, that if farmers stop it is because all other classes have failed previously. I believe that farmers and manufacturers are united, like links in a chain. Farmers, if I may so speak, resemble animals in the plough, who are chained together; but I regard the manufacturers as the fore horse (loud cheers); and if the fore horse stops, it is more than likely that the hinder horses must stop also. What is it which now checks the farmers? Is it not that there is an insufficient consumption of the produce of their land? Will they refuse to produce beef, mutton, bread, and other necessities of life, so long as they can find a market for them? And what is the reason they do not possess that market to the extent in which they ought to do? Because the labouring classes have not their full employment at remunerating wages. (Loud cheers.) The order of the day, I believe, among protectionists, is a cry for protection. Ah! that is a word which harmonizes only in strict accordance with the situation, the wishes, and the wants of the great majority of the community. The infallible standard of Divine Truth tells us that "a tree is known by its fruits." (Hear, hear.) You know that a tree must be planted, take root, and vegetate, before it can produce fruit. Is not this the case as regards the protection of which they talk? Have we not had experience of it year after year; and what is the fruit which it has produced? I know not what may be the condition of the manufacturers, but of this I am persuaded, that, if they were in a flourishing state, we should not find them expending their capital and strength in agitating the question of Free Trade. (Hear.) I know but little of the state of the artisan; but of this I am convinced, that if it be true with reference to that class, as I was lately informed by a magistrate of the county of Somerset, that the artisans were far behind the agricultural labourers, both as regards education and the blessings of Providence (loud laughter, and cries of "Oh! oh!"),—and I have no reason to suppose for a moment that the gentleman would have stated to me a falsehood, although I believe he was labouring under a grand mistake,—if this be the case, I am satisfied, and I am sure you will be so presently when I come to the case of the agricultural labourer, that, the artisan's present state and condition would be by no means an enviable one. (Hear.) What can agriculturists say with regard to this protection which we hear so much about? Are they in a flourishing condition, and satisfied with their present state? Do we hear no murmurings and complainings among them? If there are no complaints in other parts of the country I can testify that there are in Somersetshire (hear), where the farmers are continually complaining of the times. It is true as regards the occupiers of the soil there; and although what I say may reach their ears, yet I will venture to declare my opinion, and to express my conviction, that they are convinced of the truth of what I am now stating, that their present state is a very melancholy one, for they are bordering upon insolvency. (Hear, hear.) How, therefore, can they boast of the value of this protection of which they talk so much. We will come now to its influence upon the condition of the agricultural labourers. It is said that they would be injured if we had free trade in corn. Ladies and gentlemen, is such a thing possible? It cannot be so. You will instantly perceive this when I remind you that the average wages of agricultural labourers in the county of Somerset, taking one season of the year with another, does not exceed 9s. per week. If we allow 1s. for rent, which is much below the sum actually paid in most instances, that would leave 8s. a week for the support of a man, his wife, and four children, being at the rate of 16d. for each individual per week to find them in food, raiment, fuel, and all other necessities. I ask you, ladies and gentlemen, whether it is not extreme hypocrisy to say that it is possible to injure these agricultural labourers or lower their condition? (Hear, hear.) Reduce them to pauperism!—it cannot be. I have been a guardian in the Bridgewater Union from the commencement of the present law, and I can state to you that the average expense of supporting the inmates of that house has not been less than 2s. 4d. per head per week; and I would remind you that we have the advantage of going to the wholesale market and purchasing at the cheapest rate; at the same time we find that the expense is 2s. 4d. a head, while those who are so highly favoured and protected by the Corn Laws have only three-fifths of that amount to support them. Taking into consideration the nature of the labour—tugging and toiling upon the land throughout the day—I appeal to any man of common sense and humanity, whether they do not require a larger amount of subsistence to support them than those who are confined in houses. (Cheers.) I think it is impossible to show that the farm-labourers are receiving any benefit from the present system of protection. All classes are complaining, and not without reason. It is true, the majority of farmers in the county of Somerset at the present time are opposed to the repeal of the Corn Laws. Why are they so? They are told that corn would be brought in from foreign parts to such an extent that its price would be much lower than it is at the present time, and therefore that they would be altogether ruined. Some of them look, as it were, with suspicion upon manufacturers, because they agitate for a free trade in corn. They think, and some of them say, that the manufacturer wishes cheap bread in order to keep down wages. Can there be a greater insult offered to common sense than this? (Loud cheers.) Is it not well known to every thinking man that wages are a marketable commodity, just like bread or other things? (Hear.) The price of wages does not depend upon the price of bread; the demand for labour regulates its value. Again; some of them say that they believe the manufacturers wish to destroy and lower the price of land in order that they may afterwards invest their immense capitals in it. Such arguments I consider as more characteristic of the inmates of a lunatic asylum than rational beings. (Loud cheers.) If manufacturers, by the application of their skill, capital, and industry, have, as Lord Radnor, if I mistake not, stated, for some years past fed and clothed the surplus population of the land; if they have enabled the agriculturist and others to go to the draper's shop and purchase the articles they require at a much less price than they were in the habit of paying; if they have enabled them to go to the ironmonger's for the hardware which they would require and purchase at a lower price, it is a mark of base ingratitude on the part of the agriculturists if they do not respect, co-operate with, and look upon the manufacturers as their best friends,—as the safeguard and main spring of the country,—as those to whom alone they may look for protection. (Loud cheers.) Yes, my lord, as a farmer I declare, that if I look for protection anywhere it is not to the gentlemen who assemble in the House yonder; I believe I should in vain expect it there; I would rather turn to the men who exercise skill, capital, industry, and intelligence, and who expend their wealth in employing the great mass of the labouring class (cheers); giving them wages whereby they can purchase the necessities of life. Let the manufacturer prosper, and then the farmer will have nothing to fear. (Renewed cheering.) Let the artisans have their full employment, and then we shall have no reason to complain of a want of markets for our beef, mutton, bread, and so forth. If "times be dead," as we say, it is not because there are no consumers, but because they have not the means of consuming; it is because we have these restrictive laws preventing the extension of trade and commerce. As far as the principle of Free Trade is concerned, I am persuaded that there cannot be a stronger argument to convince us of the propriety of advocating them than that of the duty upon wool. I believe it is only a few years since a large portion of the duty was taken off that article. Previous to that time, before this alteration was introduced, when it was only in contemplation, a great opposition was raised against the change; and it was said that the result would be total destruction to the wool-grower. But what has been the result? The fact is, that amongst all the articles which the farmers have to take to market, he has had nothing which has fetched a better price upon an average than that of wool. If this has been the case—and it cannot be denied—why then do not the same arguments apply as regards corn? I have no doubt but that the same result would follow with reference to that article. As a tenant farmer, therefore, I fear not the result of Free Trade. (Hear, hear.) Neither do I expect that the present Corn Law will tend to improve the state of tenant-farmers: they must take care for themselves. But there is a large class of the community who have nothing to look to but their physical powers and intellectual skill to enable them to furnish themselves with the necessities of life. (Hear, hear, hear.) This class forms a very large portion of the community; and seeing that they are in a most distressed state, surely they ought to receive our warm sympathies. They are here, and must be supported; and the question is, whether it is not more prudent to extend commerce and trade, and thus enable them to support themselves in independence; whether it would not be to the profit and credit of those in power to endeavour to benefit them in this way in preference to maintaining them in the union house? The union house with which I am connected has been so full during the past winter that we have been obliged to rent a place for the accommodation of the paupers, not having sufficient room in the workhouse itself. It is also a fact that we have a surplus quantity of labour; there are more hands than we can employ; we must, then, advocate and agitate for Free Trade, and thus enlarge our trade and commerce; by such means the manufacturer will continue to drain off your surplus population, and we shall go on prosperously. (Loud cheers.) If I mistake not, the time is rapidly approaching when the question of Free Trade will again be agitated in the Commons House of Parliament. (Hear, hear.) I have no doubt as to what the result of the motion upon that subject will be. The opponents of Free Trade will once more shout "victory." They may boast also of the number of petitions which have been presented in favour of monopoly, and endeavour to convince those who are friendly to Free Trade that they have not the people with them (laughter); but if that House places much confidence in the petitions which have been presented in support of the Corn Laws, I think it shows a great extent, indeed, of weakness and delusion. Perhaps it may not be amiss if I describe to you the manner in which some of these petitions have been got up. If I were permitted, I could prove to the honourable gentlemen who compose the House of Commons that such petitions are utterly unworthy of their notice. To my knowledge petitions have been brought into villages, and placed in the hands of some farmer who has announced that a pint of cider would be given to every man who came and signed them. (Cheers and laughter.) Perhaps you may not be aware, ladies and gentlemen, that this cider, which is an intoxicating drink, is the common beverage of, and is well liked by, the labouring classes of the county of Somerset. Such are the some of means which have been adopted for getting signatures to protection petitions. Sometimes, too, when the labourer thus presents himself for the purpose of taking the pint of cider, and signing the petition, he probably has a child—perhaps three or four—with him, whose names are also added to the list. (Hear, hear, hear.) Not merely children unable to read for themselves, but children who may be actually at the time at their mother's breast, have their names, nevertheless, appended to the petition. ("Hear, hear," and cries of "Shame.") This, ladies and gentlemen, is the kind of strength of which the opponents of Free Trade in the House of Commons boast themselves, and upon which they rely for the perpetuation of that system of Monopoly and restrictive duties which they have so long countenanced. (Hear.) From the village in which I live—Otheny, in Somersetshire—it may seem somewhat inconsistent, but it is nevertheless a fact,—we forwarded a petition to the House of Parliament, about twelve months back, praying for Free Trade in corn and all other articles. (Hear, hear.) By way of contrast to the former, I will inform you how that petition was got up. It was not, I assure you, by the plan to which I have just alluded, that of giving a man a cup of cider for his signature—(laughter)—no; we announced publicly that a meeting would be held in a certain spot; the most convenient place for the purpose being a chapel, which is in the village, we availed ourselves of, considering it would be no desecration of the building had it even been the parish church itself. (Cheers.) The stated period arrived, and the occupiers of land, together with the agricultural labourers, attended. I told the audience as much as I know upon the subject,—that they were well aware that agriculture was in a most depressed state, and that the labourers were worse off than any other class, or than ever they were; that if we wanted real protection we must look for it to the manufacturers, who employ so many labourers, giving them wages sufficient to procure the necessities of life; that such being the case, as far as I was concerned, I felt it my duty to sign a petition to Parliament in favour of free trade in corn, in order that trade and commerce might be extended. (Cheers.) The result was that a majority of the occupiers then assembled, comprising the greater part of the parish, immediately signed such petition. Not an individual among the labouring classes was allowed to put his signature to it; but it was signed solely by a majority of the occupiers and small proprietors of land of the parish in which I reside. This I am persuaded was a more straightforward and honourable mode of dealing than that adopted by the Protectionists of holding hole-and-corner meetings. An assembly of this latter description—or "protection meetings," as they call them—was lately held at Bridgewater. My friends and neighbours inquired of its conductors whether the question of the Corn Law would be allowed to be discussed, and whether parties opposed to that measure would be permitted to be heard? The reply was, "Oh, no, we want no Leaguers." When it comes to this, that a question will not bear inspection, it shows, in my opinion, the badness and weakness of the system. (Cheers.) As a proof of this dread of investigation, it is only necessary to notice that when the hon. member for Stockport, who is now present, moved for a committee of inquiry into the working of the present system of the Corn Laws, such an inquiry was not allowed by the House of Commons. Is not this another convincing proof that the system is a bad one, and will not bear the test of inspection? Therefore, ladies and gentlemen, although the friends of protection may once more shout victory in the House of Commons, I am convinced that their triumph is but temporary, and that the day will speedily arrive when the principles of Free Trade will be fully adopted in this country to its manifest advantage, welfare, and prosperity. (Loud cheers.) I am firmly convinced that the predominance of monopoly will be brief, for we are told in Scripture that the triumph of the wicked will be short in duration. My lord, ladies and gentlemen, it is now late in the evening, and I know you are anxious to hear the hon. gentleman who is to follow me, and who knows more of the subject and can speak with far greater eloquence upon it than I can. I will not, therefore, trespass longer upon your time further than to thank you for your kindness in having paid attention to an individual so humble as myself. I only wish I was capable of addressing you in a more able manner. I am firmly convinced that the principle of Free Trade is a principle of common sense and sound judgment, and which must be for the welfare of the community; and therefore the sooner it is carried into effect the better. (Mr. Somers resumed his seat amidst loud applause.)

The CHAIRMAN then announced that Mr. Cobden would address the meeting.

Mr. COBDEN upon coming forward was received with the most enthusiastic applause, cheering and waving of hats and handkerchiefs, which rendered it impossible for him to proceed for some considerable time. Silence having been restored the hon. gentleman proceeded:—My lord, ladies and gentlemen, fortunately for me, the phenologists, who have examined my head, tell me that I have neither the organ of self-esteem nor love of approbation: if I had, I am sure you would spoil me. (Laughter.) At this late hour of the meeting I should not have intruded myself at all upon you were it not for a consciousness of the duty we owe to our visitor to-night: the noble lord who has so kindly consented to fill the chair upon the present occasion (cheers), who has had the nobility and courage of nature to be the second individual who has come forth from his order to preside at our meeting, and who has furnished us with so many additional arguments calculated to cheer us on in the pursuit of our great cause. (Hear, hear.) Had it not been for the duty we owe to his lordship and to the gentleman who has just sat down, who is an occupier of land, and who I may tell you holds the situation of acting chairman of the board of guardians of the Bridgewater Union—if it had not been, I say, for the purpose of paying a tribute to this noble lord and the Somersetshire farmer, I am sure I should not have trespassed upon your time at this late hour of the evening. (Loud cries of "Go on, go on.") We have here again another answer to his Grace of Richmond, who stated in the House of Peers that the farmer to a man are with the Monopolists. I tell the noble duke, "Well, you have not yet answered the speeches of Messrs. Hunt and Lattimore, and now are you willing to reply to that of Mr. Somers?" (Hear, hear.) We will call upon his grace to notice these men, and to say whether, in the counties of Gloucester, Hertford, and Somerset, from whence these three farmers severally came, there can be found more unexceptionable witnesses, in point of talent, character, morality, and fitness in every respect; whether there could have been better witnesses brought from the counties I have named than those gentlemen. (Cheers.) These are not the description of men the Protectionists put forward at their meetings as "farmers;" their farmers generally consist of lawyers, land-valuers, and auctioneers—mere toadies and creatures of the landlords. (Hear, hear.) They are men who stand towards the real farmers in a far worse relation than the landlord himself; for they do the dirty work, to the tenant which the landlord personally would scorn to do. I will tell what kind of people the land-valuers and auctioneers are. I was once travelling in Scotland upon the banks of a loch, between Taymouth and Killen. A Highlander rode with me in the car who was a firm believer in witches and ghosts. (Laughter.) He said his father had seen many of these ghosts, and he himself had seen some; that they were exceedingly mischievous, for they actually put stumbling-blocks in the way of people going home on a dark night, and often bewitched the cattle; "in fact," said he, reasoning the matter out, "I believe they are worse than the Evil One that sends them." (Laughter.) Just, you see, as the factor over there," pointing in the direction of the marquis's factor or land-agent's mansion, "just as the factor there is waur than the laird." (Laughter.) Now, we do not bring these land-valuers and auctioneers. Mind you, the talking men in the farming districts generally are these auctioneers and land-agents. We have not too wide a choice among farmers who are Free-Tradists, and who can speak at public meetings like this; but this I can tell you from my own experience, in every county of the kingdom, wherever you find a man of original thought and independent mind, and who has where-withal [here Mr. Cobden placed his hand on his pocket] to make him independent, and enable him to stand erect in the world, that man is almost invariably in favour of Free Trade. (Cheers.) But, upon the general argument of Free Trade, what am I to say to you, ladies and gentlemen, you being all agreed on the subject? I can only congratulate you that during this present week we have not been without evidence of progress in high quarters in our question. We have had a budget—I cannot say it is a Free-Trade one, because, when we Leaguers get into power, we will bring forward a much better budget than that. ("Hear," and laughter.) But still there were some little things done in the budget on Monday night, and every thing that was done was in the direction of Free Trade. What have the Duke of Richmond and the Protection Society been about? Why, I thought they had organised themselves and assembled in his grace's parlour, and declared that their Prime Minister had gone so far that he now should go no further. But, it is quite clear to me that the Prime Minister does not dread those carpet-knights much who sit in the drawing-room of his grace; he is not very much alarmed at their chivalry. I think he has a great deal more reliance upon us than dread of them. (Hear.) There is one thing done by the present Government which has been well done, because it was totally and immediately done—I mean their abolition of the protection upon wool. Twenty-five years ago there was an uprising of all the Knatchbulls, Buckinghams, and Richmonds of that day, who said, we insist on having a 6d. duty laid on foreign wool to protect our own growth. They obtained what they asked. Five years afterwards Mr. Huskisson said he had been informed by the Leeds manufacturers that if that duty was not greatly altered, and almost taken off, all the woollen manufactures might be lost, and then the English farmers would have no market for their wool at all. By dint of great management and eloquence on his part, Mr. Huskisson was enabled to take off at that time, 5d. of the 6d. which had been laid on. And, during the past week we have got rid of the other 1d. When it was proposed to take off this duty, the agriculturists—I mean the Knatchbulls and Buckinghams of the day—declared (I have often quoted from their pamphlets upon that subject before), that if the duty was repealed there would be no more shepherds employed, but that they would all go to the workhouse; that there would be no mutton in the land, and that all the shepherds' dogs might be hanged. (Cheers and laughter.) Why, if you had heard them talk in those days you would have thought the poor sheep, instead of carrying merely its own wardrobe on its back, bore the entire wealth and prosperity of the whole nation. Now they are going to carry on the trade of sheep-rearing and wool-selling without any protection. Why should they not conduct the business of raising and selling corn upon the same principle? (Cheers.) If it is unreasonable to "totally and immediately" abolish the duty on corn, why has their own Prime Minister and Government "totally and immediately" abolished the protection on wool? We find encouragement and good argument in favour of our principles by every step that is taken, even by our professed opponents. Take the article of coffee; that matter is not entirely but it is half done. The duties on coffee formerly were—indeed, at this moment, are—1d. per lb. duty on colonial, and 8d. per lb. on foreign. That meant just 6d. per lb. monopoly to the colonial growers, because they were thereby enabled to sell their coffee at just 1d. more than they otherwise would have done. Sir Robert Peel has reduced the duty on foreign coffee, but not on colonial, leaving the latter with 2d. per lb. less protection than it formerly had. I cannot say that is rightly done, but it is half done, and we will have the other half by and by. (Cheers.) Now, the next matter is sugar. Ladies, you cannot make your coffee without you have sugar; at least, with all your most honeyed smiles you cannot make it sweet. (Laughter.) Now, we are in a little difficulty about this sugar; for there are scruples of conscience which have come over the Government of this country. They cannot take foreign sugar, because it is tainted with slavery. Gentlemen, I am going to let out a secret. There is a secret correspondence going on between the Government of this country and that of Brazil to this effect. You know that statesmen sometimes write private letters and instructions to their agents, which are not published till about 100 years after they are written, when they become curiosities. I will just give you one that will be published 100 years hence respecting our Government and the Brazils. The present Ministry turned out the late Administration on the question of sugar. Lord Sandon, when he moved an amendment to the Whig proposition to allow foreign sugar, rested his argument on the ground that it was very impious to consume slave-grown sugar. But he said nothing about coffee; the rest I will explain in the words of the supposed secret letter from our Government to their ambassador in Brazil:—"Inform the Brazilian Government that we stand pledged to the country, as regards this article of sugar, and, when we bring in our budget, we shall be obliged to tell the people of England, who are very glibly, and who will believe anything we tell them from our place in the House of Commons, that it will be very improper to encourage slavery and the slave trade by taking Brazilian sugar; but, to convince the Brazilian Government that we do not mean to do them any harm in this matter, we will preface our remarks about sugar by a declaration that we will admit their coffee at 2d. per lb. reduction on the former duty; and as four out of five of the slaves who are employed in Brazil are engaged in the coffee plantations, and as three-fifths of all the exports from the Brazils are coffee, and as sugar forms comparatively an insignificant item in their production and exports (of all which the people of England are profoundly ignorant,) this will convince them that we do not mean any injury to the Brazilian planters, and that we are not in earnest when we propose to stop the slave trade; we are simply bound to exclude the sugar by the exigencies of our party and our peculiar position. But tell them, at the same time, how cleverly we have tripped up the heels of the Whigs by the manœuvre." (Cheers and laughter.) That is the description of despatches which will be published 100 years hence, as having been sent by our present Government to their envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Brazil. No doubt there are people who have been taken in by this cant about slave produce: honest, well-meaning philanthropists, if I must call them so, although I find it difficult to treat men as philanthropists who merely revel in the enjoyment of an unreasoning conscience, because true philanthropists have always something like a show of reason to guide their benevolence. (Hear.) There is a class of individuals who have come into considerable notoriety of late in this country, who wish to subject us, not to the dictates of an enlightened benevolence, but to the control of mere fanaticism. They are men who, under the plea of being anti-slavery advocates, petition the Government that they should not allow the people of this country to consume sugar unless they can prove that it had not "the taint of slavery," as they call it, upon it. Is there anything in morals which answers to the principle in material nature that there should be one thing which is a conductor of immorality, and another a non-conductor (laughter)? that coffee is a non-conductor of the immorality of slavery, but that sugar is a conductor, and therefore you must not take it? I have personally met with some of these unreasoning philanthropists, and have been called upon by them to meet their objections relative to slave-grown sugar. I remember in particular one very benevolent gentleman in a white muslin cravat with whom I discussed this question. (Laughter.) I met him this way:—"Before you say another word to me on the subject strip that slave-grown cotton from your neck." (Loud cheers.) He replied that it was not practicable to do so. (Cries of "Oh, oh.") I rejoined, "I demand it; it is practicable; for I know one gentleman who has dispensed with wearing cotton stockings in the summer (laughter), and will not allow his garments to be put together with thread if he knows it." (Renewed laughter.) It is, I assure you, a fact that I know one philanthropist who has made that sacrifice. "But," said I, "if it is impracticable for you, who stand up before me now with slave-grown cotton round your neck, to abstain from slave-grown commodities, is it possible for the people of England to do it? Is it practicable for us as a nation to do so? (Cheers.) You can, if you please, pass a law prohibiting the importation of slave-grown sugar into England, but will that accomplish your object at all? You receive free-grown sugar in England; that leaves a vacuum in Holland and elsewhere, which is filled up with slave-grown sugar." (Cheers.) Before men have a right to preach such doctrines as these, and call upon the Government and the nation at large to support them, they ought to give evidence of their sincerity by the self-denying quality of abstaining from those articles which are already consumed in this country. (Hear, hear, hear.) What right have a people who are the largest consumers and distributors of cotton goods to go over to the Brazils with their ships full of cotton, then turn up the whites of their eyes, shed crocodile tears over the slaves, and say, "Here we are with a cargo of cotton goods, but we have qualms of conscience, religious scruples, and cannot take your slave-grown sugar in return for our slave-grown cotton." (Loud cheers.) In the first place the thing is inconsistent, and in the next it is hypocritical. Mark me, clever knaves are using fanatics in order to impose upon the people of England a heavy burden. (Hear, hear.) That is just what it amounts to. Cunning and selfish men are tampering with the credulity of what used to be the reasoning benevolence of the people of England. We must put down this sort of dictatorship, which has no rational judgment to guide it. (Cheers.) Will they venture to assert that I am an advocate for the continuance of slavery because I maintain the principle of Free Trade? No; I assert here, as every where, that one good, sound, and just principle never can be at war with another of a similar character. If you can show me that Free Trade is promotive of slavery, and that it is calculated to extend or perpetuate it, then I should doubt, pause, and hesitate whether freedom of trade and personal freedom are equally consistent and just in their principles; and, as I say, prima facie there can be no question but that the possession of human beings as goods and chattels is contrary to the first Christian precepts, therefore I say at once that slavery is unjust; and, if you can show me that Free Trade would promote that diabolical system, then I should be prepared to abandon Free Trade itself. (Enthusiastic cheers.) But I have always been of opinion with the most distinguished writers who have ever treated upon this subject—such men as Adam Smith, Burke, Franklin, Hume, and others, the greatest thinkers of any age—that slave labour is more costly than free labour—that if the two were brought into fair competition free labour would supersede slave labour. I find this view so strongly put and clearly borne out by a body of men whom I should think ought to be considered as authorities on this matter—I mean the anti-slavery body themselves—that I will venture to read just three or four lines out of this volume, which is a record of the proceedings of the General Anti-Slavery Convention, called by the committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and held in London in 1840. It was denominated the "World's Convention of Anti-Slavery Delegates," for its members assembled from all parts of the globe. They appointed a most intelligent committee to make a report as to the relative value of free and slave labour, and here is their declaration, unanimously agreed to by the conference, with Thomas Clarkson at their head. They say, "Resolved—That, upon the evidence of facts to which the attention of this convention has been directed, it is satisfactorily established as a general axiom that free labour is more profitable to the employer, and consequently cheaper, than slave labour." They go on to say—"That of all kinds of slave labour, that of imported slaves has been demonstrated to be the most costly and the least productive." And they wind up thus:—"That the advantages of free-labour cultivation cannot be fairly attested or fully realised under a system of husbandry and general management which has grown up under the existence of slavery, and which is attested by a waste of human labour, that, but for monopoly prices, must have absorbed all the profit of cultivation. That the unrestricted competition of free labour in the cultivation of sugar would necessarily introduce a new system, by which the cost of production would be further diminished, and the fall of prices that must ensue would leave no profit upon slave-grown sugar." I will only quote one other passage of three lines from this report. There was a long debate upon the subject; many intelligent witnesses from all parts of the world bore testimony to that principle, and the committee passed those resolutions unanimously. I will only read from the report of the discussions a few words of the speech of Mr. Scoble, in speaking of the difference of the price of sugar then in the market. In alluding to the price of slave sugar being 23s. per cwt. in the market, while that of free-grown sugar was 47s., he says:—"Now, what is it that makes the difference in price between these two classes of colonial produce but what is usually termed the West Indian monopoly? Let the monopoly be got rid of, and I will venture to say, that free-labour will compete with slave-labour sugar of any kind." That is the testimony of Mr. Scoble, who, I believe, is the accredited agent of the present London anti-slavery body. Now, I ask these gentlemen to do that which we Free-Traders do, to have faith in their own principles (cheers); to trust a great truth, that it will carry them safely through whatever there may be of apparent difficulty in their way. We, as Free-Traders, do not ask for the free admission of slave grown sugar because we wish to consume the produce of slaves rather than of freemen, but because we object to the infliction of a monopoly upon the people of England under the pretence of putting an end to slavery. We deny that that is an effectual or a just mode of extinguishing slavery. On the contrary, it is subjecting the British public to a species of oppression and spoliation second in injustice only to slavery itself. We maintain, with Mr. Scoble and the Anti-slavery Convention, that free labour, if placed in competition with slave labour, will be found cheaper and more productive, and that it will, in the end, put down slavery and the slave trade, by rendering it unprofitable to hold our fellow-creatures in bondage. (Cheers.) Why, would it not be a monstrous thing if we found that in the moral government of this world it was so contrived that a man should have a premium offered him for doing injustice to his fellow-man! Plenty and cheapness have been the reward promised from the beginning of time to those who do well; but if the greater cheapness and plenty should be the reward of him who seizes on his fellow-man and compels him to work with the whip, rather than for the man who offers a fair recompense for the willing labourer, I say, if that were found to be true, it would be at war with all we hold most just, and which we believe to be true of the moral government of the universe. (Loud cheers.) If, then, free competition be wanted to overturn slavery, I ask this anti-slavery body how they can consistently present petitions to the House of Commons praying that this free competition shall not be allowed, and therefore that the very means they recommend for abolishing slavery shall not be carried into effect in this country? I am willing to believe many of these individuals to be honest; they have proved themselves to be disinterested by the labours they have gone through; but I warn them against being made the unconscious instruments of subtle, designing, and thoroughly selfish men (loud cheers), who have an interest in upholding this monopoly of sugar, which is slavery in another form, for the consumers of sugar here; and who to carry their base object will tamper with the feelings of the people of this country, and make use of the old British anti-slavery feeling, in order to carry out their selfish and iniquitous objects. (Loud cheers.) Now, ladies and gentlemen, before I sit down I wish to say a word to you on a truly practical part of the question. Some allusion was made by my friend Mr. Ricardo to the probability of an election, and the necessity of being prepared for it. I am desirous, particularly in this place, where what we say goes out to the whole world—our own organ, the LEAGUE, conveys every syllable of our speeches to 20,000 persons in all the parishes in the kingdom—I say I want to dwell especially here upon what I conceive it is necessary the people of this country should do to carry out the principles of Free Trade. They must simply adopt the plan which Sir Robert Peel recommended to his party—"Register, register, register!" (Cheers.) Without a single public meeting or demonstration of any kind at all comparable with this, that party went to work, and in the course of four or five years placed their chief, who had given that good advice, in a majority in the House of Commons. Now, we have infinitely more scope for work than ever he or his supporters had. (Hear, hear.) Are you aware of the number of people who are voluntarily disfranchised in this country at this moment? You will be astonished when I tell you that in the metropolitan boroughs alone there are from 40,000 to 50,000 people who might register and vote for members of Parliament if they chose, but who neglect to do so. (Hear, hear.) In every one of the large boroughs, such as Birmingham, Manchester, and Leeds, there are thousands of people entitled to vote for members of Parliament, but who yet do not make the necessary claim for that purpose. Why, within the walls of the city of London, I will venture to say that there is not one house which is paying a lower rent than £10. Every man with a roof over his head there can, and ought to, be a voter. How will you carry your Free-Trade ticket at the next city of London election, unless you all register yourselves, for we do not then intend to go for one, but for all the four members together? (Vehement cheering.) I will in a few words state to you, and all our friends in the country, exactly how we stand at this particular moment. In about ten weeks the time will have elapsed which will give the people an opportunity of claiming to vote for the next year. Then, observe, that in order to have a vote you must have occupied a £10 house for twelve months previous to the 31st of July, and have paid all rates and taxes due up to the 6th of April, upon or before the 20th of July. Having done this, you will be entitled to register your names as voters, and be in a position to exercise the elective franchise the next year should there be a dissolution of Parliament, and a contest for Free Trade. (Hear.) Mark me! By a late decision in the Court of Common Pleas, every man who rents a room in a house, if the apartment be a separate tenement—that is, if the lodger has the key of it, and has ingress and egress at the outer door when he likes—if that room be rented at £10 a year or upwards, he will be entitled to a vote; and, if his landlord pays the rates, it is a sufficient rating provided his own name be put down along with his landlord's on the books of the overseers. (Hear, hear.) Now, that decision alone has given the franchise to perhaps 1500 or 2000 people in the city of London, and an immense number throughout the whole metropolitan boroughs. But lodgers who are boarded and lodged in a house, and who have not a separate room, as is the ordinary way with young persons, are not entitled to a vote. I wish they were, for I have no doubt we should get most of them. How is it that there are 40,000 or 50,000 people in the metropolis, and many thousands in all large towns, that are not on the electoral lists? I will tell you why. In the first place, I am sorry to say that a vast number of people in this country, who would be shocked and offended if we called them "slaves," or did not compliment them under the title of "free-born Englishmen," will not take the trouble to walk across the street in order to obtain for themselves votes, even where there is no expensatending it. In very many cases the difficulty is this, that in a great number of the smaller class of houses the landlords owning them compound for the rates, and pay them in a lump, whether the houses be empty or not, and by so doing pay a somewhat less amount than they would do if they paid for each house individually. If a tenant under such circumstances tells the overseers he wishes to be put down in the rate-book to get a vote, the overseers are required by law to put their names upon the rate books with that of their landlords. That is the condition in which thousands, nay, tens of thousands, of people in this country are situated who might have votes for members of Parliament if they adopted the proper means. I do hope that all who hear me, and those who will read what I am saying, will feel that now the time is come when every individual in his locality will be called on to make an effort to enrol his own and his neighbours' names on the register, against a future electoral combat. Come when it may, our victory will depend on the force we can bring on paper before we come into the field. It is of no use going to a contest if we have not previously been to the registration court. I would counsel our friends, the non-electors in any borough, and point out to them how much they can do by looking after their neighbours; and, when they see a man just balancing and doubting whether he will or not claim to vote, to urge upon him the duty which he owes to the cause we advocate of having his name placed on the register. (Cheers.) If they do not do so, the time will come when they will bitterly regret it. It was only the other day that our friend General Briggs, at Exeter, where he nobly did the work for us (cheers), found that he could not walk the streets of that city without being followed by crowds of non-electors, saying, "I will show you, sir, where there is a man who will give you a vote." Another would say, "I have been looking after three votes for you." A third would exclaim, "I wish I had a hundred votes, you should have them all." One honest man who kept a turnpike-gate—and we are often told that turnpike-keepers are misanthropes—positively would not receive toll from the general, stating that as he had not a vote to register for him he would give him what he could. (Loud laughter and cheers.) Persons of this description, if they will take my advice, instead of reserving all their enthusiasm until the time of contest, will during the next ten weeks do their utmost to influence every one of their neighbours whom they can to be enrolled. It is by these means, and not by talking, that the victory will be won. I have over and over again told you that I have no faith in talking; it is not by words but by deeds, by pursuing a course such as I have been describing, that when the day of battle comes we shall be prepared with a majority on the electoral lists to meet our opponents in that constitutional fight in which the question must be decided; and if we are true to our principles, and show but ordinary zeal in their behalf, we shall not have another general election without finding a triumphant majority in favour of Free-Trade principles. (The honourable gentleman resumed his seat amidst enthusiastic cheering.)

The CHAIRMAN then said:—Ladies and gentlemen, it is my duty to state that the proceedings of the evening have come to a close, and I must say that, if I had not witnessed it, I could not have believed that in a theatre, crowded to this extent, the people would have listened so attentively, and with such zeal. I say this augurs well for the cause of Free Trade; and, if you will go on persevering in this manner, it will strike terror into the hearts of our opponents. Some of you probably recollect the fable of the fox that had his tail cut off; now, if you will only cut off the landlords' tail, they will soon cut off the tails of the other monopolists, and we shall have Free Trade.

Three cheers were then given for the noble chairman, and the meeting separated.

LIVERPOOL OPERATIVES' FREE TRADE SOCIETY.—The members and friends of the above Society held a meeting in the large room, Roe-street, on Tuesday evening last, which was both numerously and respectfully attended; Mr. John Critchley in the chair. The speakers were Messrs. Fitzsimons, Skidmore, Duddy, and M'Gregor. Mr. M'Gregor said that many were opposed to Free Trade, lest it should make us dependent upon foreigners, and, in the event of war, we should be deprived of food. Now, he would ask those parties who used this argument, whether they had made provision to grow cotton in England? for, in case of war with the United States, we should be deprived of that article for clothing. He would also ask for what purpose we sent out vessels on voyages of discovery? He conceived the reason to be, to endeavour to find out new markets for our trade and commerce. Why had we gone to war with China, and why concluded a treaty with China, if it had not been for the purpose of forcing a trade to the advantage of England? In the event of war, the protectionist would be deprived of those luxuries which were of foreign growth and manufacture; and, therefore, he came to this conclusion, that, if Free Trade with all the world became the law of the land, the divine principles of Christianity, "Peace on earth and good will to man," would be to the interest of every class in this vast empire, and the blessings of peace and plenty would be felt in every portion of the habitable globe. Mr. M'Gregor sat down amidst great and prolonged cheering. Other speakers followed, and clearly showed the necessity of the operatives joining together and using every lawful means in their power to obtain a removal of all restrictions on trade and commerce. Too much praise cannot be given to the worshipful the mayor and to Mr. Rushton, for the courteous manner in which they received the deputation from this body, and the prompt measures they have adopted to prevent outrage at these meetings. Inspector Savage and the police force under his command attended, and were active in their endeavours to preserve order.—Liverpool Mercury.

ment of harsh terms against landlords, and said that the warfare of Free-Traders should be against principles, not men. He also suggested the desirableness of excluding politics from their discussions. After some further observations, the chairman concluded amidst loud cheers.

Mr. W. H. HOLDSWORTH proposed the first resolution, which, after denouncing protective duties and restrictive policy—especially in articles of food—was highly pernicious, stated the propriety of addressing the borough members, and calling on them to vote in favour of Free Trade. Mr. Holdsworth took a review of the several progressive states of mankind, and showed that the commercial state was that in which man had exhibited his highest powers. He then went on to show how man's energy and enterprise were now restricted by a principle of selfishness which was at work in the minds of those who had the power of controlling a nation's operations, and how his noblest powers, which would have been awakened and expanded in the natural course of events, became crippled and confined by a restrictive, or, as it was falsely called, protective commercial policy, the pernicious tendencies of which he exposed. This led him to consider the beneficial effects on all classes which an abolition of these laws would have; and he concluded a long and impressive address with a brief glance at past struggles for freedom, the results of which, he said, ought to serve as beacons to warn those now in power from pursuing their present dangerous course.

The Rev. E. HIGGINSON seconded the resolution. He said the question of Free Trade ought not to require advocacy; the onus of proof was on the party who argued that trade ought not to be free. It was a natural law that trade should be free, and they ought to require good arguments for its restriction. (Applause.) All men had a right to go to the best markets for the sale and the purchase of commodities of life. That was a principle which could not be disputed, and which infringed on the rights of no one. But, though this was a moral right, it was not a legal one, and he was sorry to have to draw the distinction. It was a legal right for a certain class of men to compel others to buy from them what they could purchase with greater benefit elsewhere. (Cheers.) The rev. speaker then went on at some length to show that in the present Free-Trade movement it was not sought to abolish duties laid on for revenue purposes merely, but to do away with the—so called—"protective" or restrictive duties.

The first resolution having been unanimously carried amidst loud cheers.

Mr. Alderman COOKMAN, in the absence of Mr. Alderman Thompson, who had been called away upon special business, moved an address to Sir John Hammer and Sir Walter James, calling upon them to vote for Villiers's motion for the total repeal of the Corn Laws.

Dr. GORDON seconded the address. He said it was somewhat singular that he, a professional man, should be called upon to advocate Free Trade, a subject in which those connected with commerce were so eminently interested. Were the merchants become so rich—had the coffers of the manufacturer become so crammed—that they felt no longer any interest in the trade and prosperity of their country? (Cheers.) If so, he was glad of it, because he knew that if the place wherein he lived prospered, he too, if industrious, must become prosperous; and the converse was equally true—no man could be prosperous long when all around him were borne down by adversity. (Cheers.) It was under a conviction of that truth that he had come forward this evening. The whole social economy was under the guidance of natural, inevitable, and unerring laws; and he knew that if the people became overwhelmed with poverty, misery, and disease, he too would suffer. He had come forward, then, to save himself, and to assist those present to save themselves. (Cheers.) They were all dependent one upon another, and must rise and fall together. There was implanted in man a feeling of sociability, of mutual dependence and assistance. It had been so arranged by the Divine Creator, that what one country produced another was deficient in, and thus opportunities were given for the cultivation of this feeling of sociability. Free Trade then appeared to be the law of nature; and if it were true that they could not violate a law of nature without causing injury and sorrow, then was any violation of the principle of Free Trade calculated to cause embarrassment, sorrow, and ultimately ruin. (Cheers.) Dr. Gordon showed the utter futility of passing measures for restricting labour and promoting education among the poor, unless Parliament first removed those oppressive burdens which, in the shape of the Corn and the Sugar Laws, were imposed on the shoulders of the people, and the removal of which alone could give to labour its due value, and effectually remove that "tyranny of masters" which those now in power affected to deprecate. (Loud cheers.)

The address was unanimously carried.

The CHAIRMAN having said he should be glad to hear any gentleman in the room disposed to speak on the question,

Mr. JOSEPH JONES ascended the platform, and in the course of a few observations on the importance to the Free-Trade movement that the three great ports of Liverpool, Hull, and Bristol should declare in favour of it, said he had not the least doubt that if Mr. Cobden were solicited to stand for Hull at the next election, and consented, he would be triumphantly returned. (Loud and long-continued cheers.) And he had no fears of being able to send with him a colleague of congenial sentiments. (Rapturous cheers.)

Mr. COULSON, one of the secretaries to the Free-Trade Council in this town, explained the plan of operations intended to be pursued: he said the address which had been carried would be sent round the town to receive the signatures of the Free-Trade electors; and a second address would also be signed by the non-electors, as it was absolutely necessary that the Free-Trade strength of the borough should be ascertained before anything else was done.

It was unanimously resolved, amidst rapturous applause, that other meetings of a similar character should be held; and a vote of thanks having been passed to the chairman, the meeting, which was a most pleasant and enthusiastic one, dispersed. — Abridged from the Hull Advertiser.

HONITON.

The deputation from the League left this city (Exeter) on Tuesday afternoon (the 23rd ult.), on their way to Honiton, where Mr. Brotherton, Mr. Saul, and Mr. Harvey delivered addresses to a numerous audience in the British School-room. R. H. Aberdell, Esq., in the chair.

Mr. BROTHERTON said he would endeavour to place before them the cause of which they were the advocates. They were the opponents of all monopoly, but they especially directed their efforts against that giant monopoly, the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) It was asserted by the monopolists that these laws were necessary for the protection of the farmers and the farm-labourers. But there never was a greater delusion practised upon any set of men than the attempt to persuade the tenant-farmers and the farm-labourers that these laws ever afforded them any protection whatever. In order to prove this part of the case, it would be only necessary to state that during the twenty-nine years the sliding scale had been in existence no less than five parliamentary committees had been appointed to inquire into the causes of agricultural distress. It was said by their opponents that Free Trade would stop the revenue of the country and prevent the payment of taxes. The removal of the Corn Laws could not affect the revenue, because there was no revenue anticipated from its importation; and the only way in which it could affect the revenue would be to increase it, by the increased consumption among the people of excisable articles. The gentleman then proceeded to show how unequally the burden of the bread-tax fell on the working classes. It was most unequal and unjust. The principles of Free Trade were the principles by which mankind must be extensively benefited, and the nations of the world be united in their best and peaceful interests. Mr. Brotherton gave some details of the principles of Free Trade: he concluded amidst warm plaudits, and was followed by—

Mr. SAUL, who addressed the meeting for an hour and 20 minutes. He explained the way in which monopoly inflicted injury upon the trade and commerce of the country generally, diminishing the trade, and reducing the profits of the commercialist and manufacturer, limiting the field of labour, making it superabundant, and consequently reducing the wages of the operative. He then illustrated the working of the Corn Laws on the interest of the farmer. The occupation of the agriculturist, said he, is based on the same principles and governed by the same laws as those which regulate trade and commerce. A farmer has two considerations to look to—first, he has to produce; secondly, he has to sell. His success in the first depends on the employment of his capital, the seasons, and his own exertions; but the second depends on the condition of those who have to buy. Useless will have been his toil and anxiety if, when the golden grain is reaped and harvest is past, he has no market for his produce. Now, monopoly produces this effect. It cuts off the resources of those who should be the farmers's customers. It makes bankrupt the manufacturer and tradesman, and pauperises the operative; and when the farmer brings his produce to sell, he finds the people wanting his commodities, but unable to buy. If the landlord lawmakers were sincere in offering protection to the farmer they might do it by moderating their rents; the fact is, however, that they pass laws which they call protection to the farmers, and then in consequence of that protection raise their rents. It was protection for the landlord if it raised rents; but it could be no protection to the farmer, if, for an imaginary advantage, they had their rents increased. There can be no doubt that the sliding scale was concocted for the purpose of making the farmers believe that they should be benefited by it, that they should have high prices for their produce. But how does it work? It is well known that, just before the harvest is ripe in this country, the stocks of wheat in the hands of the farmers are very low; prices go up, and the duty is reduced by the sliding scale, and importations are made of foreign wheat. And, as these importations are made just before harvest, by the time the English farmer has his wheat ready for the market, the foreign wheat is in at the same time, depressing the price, and thus ruining the small farmer, who is obliged to sell his wheat to meet his payments. The speaker attacked the fallacies brought against the principles of Free Trade, and earnestly appealed to the audience to exert themselves to put an end to those starvation laws which have so long disgraced the statute-book, and inflicted such misery upon the country. The talented speaker sat down amidst loud and hearty cheers.

Mr. HARVEY addressed the meeting upon the sugar question, and pointed out the great inequality of the tax paid by the poor man upon his tea, and that paid by the rich man upon his tea. While, also, we paid 9d. and 10d. per lb. for our sugar from the West Indies, the people of the West Indies were allowed to receive Brazilian sugar, which had been refined in this country, and for which they only paid 4d. to 5d. per lb. It was a well-known fact, that we have no more sugar now supplied to this country than we had twenty years ago, consequently those who come short of supply must be the poor. He (Mr. H.) hoped they would all use their efforts to rid the country of a system that was fast weighing it down, and which, unless abolished, would ultimately lay it prostrate at the feet of its enemies.

L. J. COX, Esq., proposed a vote of thanks to the deputation from the League, for their addresses delivered this evening.

Captain GROOME, R.N., seconded the proposition, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. BROTHERTON acknowledged the compliment, and proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman; which Mr. ABERDELL acknowledged in his usual appropriate and felicitous manner, and the business of the meeting terminated. — Abridged from the Devonshire Chronicle.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEMORIALS.

SOUTHAMPTON. Memorials to Messrs. Hope and Midlam, the borough members, requesting them to vote in favour of Mr. Villiers's motion for repeal of the Corn Laws, are now in course of signature by the registered electors. These memorials have been got up by the Free-Trade Association, in pursuance of the recommendation of the Anti-Corn-Law League. The plan was followed in several boroughs last year, and was attended with a considerable degree of success, and this year it is intended to be carried into effect in every borough in the kingdom. The opinions of the honourable gentlemen who at present represent Southampton will not probably be much affected by this appeal from their constituents; but if, as it is anticipated, a large number of signatures be attached to the memorials, it must have a great moral effect at the next election, in securing the triumph of Free-Trade principles in the borough. There is another great object, too, which will be subserved. There can be little doubt that the aggregate number of signatures to all the memorials, from the various constituencies, will form a large majority of the electors of the United Kingdom, and this "great fact" will materially strengthen the position which the friends of Free Trade in Parliament will take in the coming debate. We therefore urgently call upon every elector who has become convinced—in the words of the memorial—"that the law which imposes restrictions on the importation of foreign corn is unjust in principle, and destructive of the industrial interests of the empire, whether agricultural, commercial, or manufacturing," at once to sign his name. The sheets are lying for signatures at different parts of the town, preparatory to a general canvass of the electors; but the friends of Free Trade will perceive that by promptly signing, without waiting to be canvassed, they will greatly lessen the labours of the committee who have taken this matter in hand, and facilitate the accomplishment of the object which they have to carry out. — Hampshire Independent.

Huddersfield. — On Thursday week, a memorial, signed by a great majority of the electors of Huddersfield, was transmitted to the borough member, requesting him to support Mr. Villiers' motion for a total repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws.

Pontefract. — A memorial from the borough of Pontefract is getting numerous and respectfully signed, and will soon be presented to the two members, in support of Mr. Villiers's motion.

Bradford. — The Anti-Corn-Law memorial to the members for the borough of Bradford has received nearly 700 signatures. 800 will be a certain majority, but the canvassers hope to obtain 1000 signatures before it is sent off to the members.

ADAM BROWN AND AN ESSEX FARMER.

An "Essex Farmer," who sends his name privately, puts several questions, desiring answers, because, as he says, "I am in opposition to Free Trade until I can see it will be for good, but quite open to conviction if facts can be shown to me." Another reason for his questions is, that, in my published account of a late visit to Colchester, I noticed his farm amongst others, and paid him a well-deserved compliment as an excellent farmer. Speaking of his employment of nearly treble the number of people on the same acres of land which others employed, and of his greatly enlarged crops, I called him a "public benefactor." So far it is necessary to explain who the "Essex Farmer" is, else several of his remarks, suggestions, and arguments would not be clearly intelligible. If they were made, or believed to be made, by an ordinary farmer, they would be without meaning or purpose.

Besides his questions, I here give his other remarks; and as the whole, questions and remarks, resolve themselves into one, and can be answered as one, it will be fairest to let him speak for himself, by printing them as they stand, without the intervention of separate comments, save in one part where an omission is made, and a reason given for making it:—

Colchester, April 12, 1844.

"Sir.—Having read your statement in the LEAGUE newspaper of April 6, I feel desirous to ask you a few questions, if I may be allowed."

"First. What is your motive in making such an inquiry respecting the mode of farming, and whether the labourers are all employed, in these parts?"

"Second. What interest will it be to the manufacturing community if our labourers are employed on the land, as it appears the manufacturers wish for a free trade in corn; and if so, they wish to have the corn from the Continent in exchange for their goods; if so, the less quantity grown by us farmers the better, as it will better suit their purpose?"

"Third. Would it not be better for the machinery to be laid aside, and men employed that are accustomed to the trade, and paid so as to be able to earn the necessary food for themselves and families; for until the machinery reached to so large a head, we did not hear of so much distress among the labouring class; at that time we were secure, and all were employed? What advantage will it be if it is true that manufacturers are erected on the Continent, and many of our best mechanics are employed there already, and the goods are equal to ours, and cheaper than we can make them?"

"Fourth. Would it not be better if the land were well cultivated in England; and if so the labourers will be wanted; and many of those who have left the agricultural districts for Manchester and other places, might return to the cultivation of the soil, and a large increase of corn be produced, and the labourer be paid so as to have sufficient to live on and be satisfied? For, after all, this class of people are a happy people—plain food is all they wish for, and no more. I think, if the land were to be cultivated well, there are not enough labourers to do the work. I only speak of this part. For the farmer's happiness consists in being able to produce more and more by improvements; and that in part by labour; and in his improvements he feels a great pleasure."

Here the "Essex Farmer" digresses into the subjects of moral and intellectual improvement. His remarks on the high value of temperance and self-denial are exceedingly good; but they are not a part of the main subject, and are too lengthy for present use. Speaking of some labourers, who, by most people are considered too bad to be employed, he observes:—

"These, of all persons, should be employed; for these men by mixing with the sober and industrious in employment, will be shamed out of their evil practices. When there is no employment the mind is unoccupied, and all kind of evil and base thoughts are generated; and, in many instances, put into practice."

This "Essex Farmer" does not merely write this benevolent philosophy on paper; he practises what he writes. Some of the working-men about his farm told me when I was there, that such was his practice. If he saw an out-cast—a man fresh from a prison, it might be—whom no other farmer would employ, he took that man and put a spade or a hatchet in his hand, after filling his belly, and sent him to work, and paid him for his work, and tried to reclaim him. This is noble philanthropy.

He proceeds, after making other excellent remarks on the duty which devolves on a farmer—and he might have added, upon every other employer, in respect of training the young to habits of industry, and watching their rising talents and dispositions—he proceeds to say, in opposition to a free trade in corn:—

"About eight years since I was in France, and attended Calais market, and was surprised at the change which was presented to my sight. I had never seen a pitched market before; and was very much struck at the quantity of females that attended to sell the wheat and rye for grist; and to see the miller canvassing the women for the grist. Some brought one, some two, and others more. The miller attended to take it to the wagon. I will give a brief description of the wagon, &c."

"It had only two wheels, and was built with a corria or round pole, which I think might cost about 7s. This I am sure, with the exception of the wheels, was the utmost value. The harness was made of ropes, and not worth more than

2s. 6d.; and the two horses not more than £10. The dress of the miller was as follows:—Wooden shoes; blue stockings; leather small clothes; pepper and salt jacket, with no handkerchief. The hat was about worth 1s. 9d.; and his whole kerchief. I consider the value to have been not more than 17s., dress included, the value of the women into the country. There were about sixteen women and five sacks of corn, and all upon the above-mentioned waggon, if so it may be called.

"I then took a diligence to Paris; and on the road saw several mills, and there was not a mill but was propped up with poles, and did not appear at all safe. This is an account of the state of the mills and millers of France. Upon inquiry I found that their food consisted of rye bread, water-cress, apples, and very poor soup. And the houses were of a humble description as the mills. The farmhouses were hardly to be distinguished from the piggeries in the yards, for there are many buildings which form the square, and at a distance it could not be distinguished from the others. Notwithstanding all this appearance of poverty they were happy in their situation. I next speak of the manner in which the labour is performed. It is principally performed by the women. The man stays at home and attends to the family. The food is rye bread, similar to a flat pancake, as dark as ginger-bread; but nothing mixed with it. Their clothing is of the best kind: no shoes nor stockings for the children; and nothing upon the head. Their dwelling-houses are thatched hovel, with no floors or windows, but a hole cut in the thatch for light; no bedding or bed, but they lay just where they can.

"Such appears to me to be the hard fate of the labourer in France. But still they appear to be happy and contented. This called aloud to me to be grateful for the state of the poor labourer in England. Our labourers are comparatively kings.

"Supposing we were to have a Free Trade, will not our labourers, millers, and farmers have to come to this state? And how can they come to this? It is enough to break their hearts at once. After having lived in so much luxury, ease, and pleasure, I say it is what we cannot bear. Let us resist it, and improve our lands, and employ the poor, for in so doing we shall hope to escape this horrid state; we had better give up a part than a whole. If I spent in labour bring 1d. profit, and feed the poor, let us spend it in time and make no delay; for four bushels per acre increase at 15s. per acre for labour is worth trying for. In so doing many are employed in getting the articles for manure, which imparts more good to the land than we can be aware of. At present I am in opposition to Free Trade, until I can see it will be for good, but quite open to conviction if facts can be shown to me."

This extract from the "Essex Farmer" is at present enough. He proceeds to the condition of the seed-growers around Colchester, and shows what they have suffered by a "free trade in seeds." His observations on this point shall be stated at length hereafter, and answered. At present I shall only observe that a partial reduction of a duty on one article is not Free Trade.

He assumes, at the outset, that the manufacturers want to have corn from abroad in exchange for their goods to the exclusion of home-grown corn. Instead of which the manufacturers care not where the corn comes from so as it comes. The "Essex Farmer," if he has read anything on the Corn-Law controversy at all, can only have read one side, else he would know that it has been again and again repudiated by the manufacturers who advocate Free Trade, that they wanted foreign corn admitted merely to feed their own workpeople cheaper, that they might have goods produced at a cheaper rate to send abroad in payment of that corn. For my part I never saw such a statement put forth save in the columns of newspapers which defended the corn monopoly. On the contrary, the interest of the manufacturer is the very reverse of this supposition. His interest is in not having the population of England reduced to the state of those millers and farmers, and women and children whom the "Essex Farmer" saw in France, because they are not good customers to a manufacturer. His interest consists in having the population so well fed that they may be able to buy clothes and furniture. He knows that food is the first necessary of life, and that food must be obtained before clothes. He knows that bread is the prime article of food, so he first turns his eyes to the producers of corn to see if they can not produce more, because he knows there is not enough. He sees that, whenever food is scarce and dear, the working population leave off buying clothes, shopkeepers leave off selling, merchants leave off buying, and he is obliged to leave off making. If they do not all stop entirely, they stop partially: and all the intermediate persons whom they employ,—the merchant, shopkeeper, warehouseman, shipper, carrier (by road, rail, and canal); the builder and all his men, bricklayers, carpenters, plasterers, glaziers, painters, and miners, colliers, iron-founders, machine-makers; and all the shoemakers and tailors who again make clothes for them,—the manufacturer sees all these arrested in their career of industry by the scarcity and excessive price of food; and he says, if it were more plentiful this stagnation of trade would not occur.

But he sees more. He sees that, when two or three years of scarcity follow each other, the great mass of the population, the working people first, and the trading class and the gentry immediately above them in their turn, become too poor to be good customers even to the farmers. When an abundant harvest does come the mass of the people are too poor to buy a sufficiency of food for their wants, and hence prices of farm produce fall much below what they would be if there was not so much poverty.

Thus the farmer in his turn becomes distressed. He is distressed in a threefold degree. He has a bad market for a good crop. He has contracted to pay a rent on the faith of high prices promised by the delusive Corn Law, and now he has low prices; and though the Corn Law has deluded him, he is bound to support his landlord who supports it; and to do so he is a tenant-at-will; he is without a lease to enable him to cultivate well if he had capital, but without capital because he has to pay what little he has in rent.

What the manufacturer wants is a steady demand for his goods, and he cannot get that unless the population are able, first to feed, and then to clothe, themselves. He knows that much more might be produced on the English soil, as the "Essex Farmer" himself knows well and admits; but to a population, increasing at the rate of a thousand a day, the manufacturer knows that enough cannot be produced in this country, not even under the most favourable circumstances, and certainly not while land is held under such tenures as it is now held under, and the farmers are, as a body, so utterly unable to apply capital and science to agriculture as they are now.

The manufacturer, therefore, looks to other countries where articles of food are produced, as tea, coffee, sugar, and corn, and where articles of British manufacture find a ready market, if we choose to take in return those things which we need, and which are to spare. No circumstances could ever possibly exist under which we could derive all our supplies of corn from those countries to the exclusion of our own. On the contrary, our population are under-fed by one half at the present moment; and a larger supply of bread, or of sugar, would only create a greater demand for beef, and mutton, and bacon, and butter, and cheese, and eggs, and poultry, and give more wages to buy. A larger supply of food than we now have would enable our people to keep up a steady demand upon our own food markets; and a steady demand would enable our farmers to cultivate with a certainty, and that being the case, at a profit. Their bane is now, and has ever been, and under the Corn Law ever will be, fluctuation and uncertainty.

It is to keep our people from ever falling into the barefootedness and general misery of those whom the "Essex Farmer" saw in France that Free Trade is requisite. Commerce and manufactures have elevated English agriculture to what it is. Whatever eminence it may have attained to over the continental agriculture, it has attained to that through the superiority of English markets—through the largeness of the number of the buyers of farm produce, who are not themselves earning their means of buying by agricultural employment, over the same class of persons in any other country. Having attained to this, we might remain where we are, if our population did not increase in number, and if we could be stationary. We cannot stand still, we must advance; and we cannot advance without freedom of commerce.

Is the "Essex Farmer" afraid of competition with foreigners? Surely, having seen what continental agriculture is, he is not afraid to compete with it! Surely he is not afraid of the rope harness worth 2s. 6d.; the two horses worth £10; the waggon worth 7s. 6d.; the women who till the land while their husbands do the indoor work, sixteen of them coming to market with five sacks of corn! Surely he is not afraid to compete with them! No; nor need he be afraid to compete with any cultivator in Europe. The national taxes of France are nearly all borne by the land; so are they in Germany and Russia; not so here. The market price of a German peasant's or a Russian serf's food may be less than that of an English labourer's; but an English labourer will do six times the work of any of them. A difference on the same principle may be seen in various parts of England. In those countries where wages are habitually lowest labour is worst performed, and is in fact dearest. Wages are highest in amount nearest the manufacturing towns; in a manufacturing county even agricultural wages are highest; and in a purely agricultural county they are lowest. So in nations. Commercial England pays higher wages than agricultural Poland or Russia or Austria.

The "Essex Farmer" raises the question of machinery. He cannot have any practical knowledge of the machinery employed in manufactures, else he could not—with so much good sense on other subjects—suggest the abrogation of machinery, to return to the feeble and expensive and tedious modes of working. The vast number of people employed now in conjunction with machinery,—making it, mending it, working with it, but more especially in obtaining and preparing the materials with which it works, and in disposing of its products,—the vast number of those people over what could have been employed without its aid, is a sufficient answer on this point; to say nothing of the superiority of the clothing which the English peasantry obtain from it at a low price; that clothing which makes them look like kings compared with the peasantry of the Continent. The rope harness, and wooden shoes, and feeble waggon of the French miller are indicative of poor agriculture in France, compared with the more effective implements and harness of England. But the transcendent beauty and usefulness of the machinery now used in spinning and weaving, over the old spinning-wheel and the handloom, exceeds out of all proportion the superiority of English agricultural implements (and implements are machinery) over those of France.

At another time I shall be glad to renew this subject, more particularly by adducing figures in support of what has been now stated. Meantime, I must come to a close. I am answering this at a considerable distance from London, without having left myself time, and without having documents at hand, to do it as completely as I could wish.

ADAM BROWN.

AGRICULTURE.

EDUCATION OF FARMERS.

That the farmers, as a body, are far less educated than any other class of industrious persons who employ capital in this country, is universally admitted; and that deficiency exists not merely in respect to general knowledge, but in the knowledge connected with their own business. The gross impositions which have been with some success practised upon large numbers of farmers by the lords and squires who have of late discoursed at "Protection" meetings, sufficiently prove the absence of that ordinary stock of general information on the circumstances affecting their own peculiar commodities which all other tradesmen possess. No assertions as to the productiveness of foreign land, or the effectiveness of foreign labour employed in agriculture, have been deemed by the Monopolist landowners too extravagant to be made to farmers. So absolute has been the Monopolists' reliance on the want of knowledge amongst the farmers that falsification of facts, figures, and dates have been the staple of Protectionist speeches, while the principles laid down have been the most ludicrous self-contradictions. Could Mr. Cayley's silly but dishonest tract have been written had farmers in general been sufficiently informed to have read Adam Smith, and mastered the elements of economical science?

Yet it is by reason of this rural ignorance alone that the Corn Laws continue to exist. As Free-Traders, we are deeply interested in every movement towards the education of the farmers. Moreover, as agriculturists, we are most anxious for the elevation of our own class. It was, therefore, with pleasure we noticed the manly and judicious remarks of Earl Ducie at the recent meeting held in Gloucestershire, for the purpose of establishing an "Agricultural College." His lordship earnestly inculcated that healthy feeling of self-reliance amongst farmers which alone could make such a college successful. He said:—

"Throughout the whole of the preliminary proceedings, I have always entertained and expressed the opinion, that unless the farmers—the agriculturists themselves—would come forward liberally and generally, it would be almost impossible for any extraneous support to be sufficient to accomplish the object."

This is just and true. Farmers must feel the value of a higher standard of education than has been common amongst them, in order to keep alive such an institution as that proposed to be established at Cirencester. It is hopeless to expect much good to result from the patronage or subscriptions of landowners, unless the farmers themselves embark heartily in the cause.

Perhaps there is no business which affords more room for the aids which education brings to practical pursuits than that of a farmer. In his farm he has an instrument to which he may apply with profit to himself chemical, botanical, and geological knowledge. System and order, the first consequences of education, are nowhere more valuable than in husbandry. The power of observing with accuracy, the capacity for combining and distributing the living and mechanical powers at his command, the ability to control and encourage the labourers in his employ, the habits of calculation and forethought, which are so essential to eminent success in husbandry, are only fully possessed by the educated farmer. Lord Ducie well alluded to the come-by-chance way in which farmers at present obtain professional instruction when he said:—

"The only opportunity that you have of teaching them their business is, when they come home from school, perhaps at 14 or 15 years of age; you then instruct them in what you know yourselves; or it may be place them, with a large premium, into the hands of some neighbouring agriculturist, of whose practical and scientific knowledge you entertain a higher opinion than you do of your own. But no man can teach more than he knows himself; the person to whom you may send your sons may know a good deal, he may be a good farmer and a good breeder of stock, but still unable to communicate the degree of scientific knowledge which is necessary for the successful prosecution of agriculture; and although a farmer qualified in all respects was found, it is to be supposed that he could accommodate as many pupils as required his instruction? In all points of view, therefore, it is necessary that you should support this college which will afford you an opportunity of giving your sons a sound practical education on all subjects relating to their occupation."

And his lordship concluded by saying:—

"I hope the resolution will be seconded by a tenant-farmer, who will tell you of the bearing of the question upon agricultural pursuits generally, better than I can. As far as I am concerned, I will be happy to give the scheme my best support, and I hope the farmers will do the same, as, without question, their best and most lasting interests are involved in it."

Such are the views of one of the best practical agriculturists, and one of the most thorough Free-Traders in the kingdom, upon the advantages of education to the farmers, and the necessity of improved arrangements for affording it.

Another good which education will confer on the farmer will be mental and personal independence. The landlords will no more think of dictating to an educated tenant in the way many of them have been accustomed to do, than they would to a man of their own order. Indeed, so much has this been felt by landlords disposed to retain a dependent tenantry, that they invariably object to "gentlemen" tenants, who, though in every respect more eligible than the uneducated men preferred, will not so well submit to the cap-in-hand system in which so many landlords delight. Such landlords, however, are beginning to see, that if they are to keep up their rents they must have skilful and intelligent tenants; for at the meeting to which we have referred the Monopolist Earl Bathurst presided, and several other Monopolist landowners took part. The following ebullition of ignorance, by Mr. John Nicholls, a farmer, which not long since would have been applauded to the echo, was simply laughed at. This is a good sign. Mr. Nicholls said:—

"I am sorry, my lord, to oppose anything which appears under your lordship's patronage—but this is a humbug all about your college—it's all fudge, and I'll not allow it to pass without raising my face against it. And who are the proposers of this college? Mr. Brown and Mr. Bowly. And, with great respect, who is Mr. Brown? a very respectable gentleman, no doubt, but as an agriculturist, not known. And who is Mr. Bowly?—a very respectable gentleman, too, but who is known only within this year or two as an agriculturist by the field which he obtained at the Cirencester exhibitions. I think it is too bad to represent farming as being behind—in this quarter it was never so good from the time of the Romans as now. With regard to what Mr. Kearsey said about farmers' boys not being put to the plough, I can tell him that nothing will do but industry and frugality—it's all gammon to say otherwise—there is not a lad who comes to Cirencester market who has not as much learning as will take him through the world. (Cries of 'No, no!') I say yes, yes. (Continued cries of 'No, no!') Well, produce him then," exclaimed Mr. Nicholls, amidst a burst of merriment from all parts of the room.

And why, it might have been asked, was "farming never so good as now," but because circumstances have taught a great many farmers the necessity of applying intelligence and energy to their business? What is required is, to raise the standard of husbandry to the level of that pursued by the best farmers. But this will never be done, nor do we believe that farmers will ever fairly put their shoulders to the wheel, either to improve their farming or their education, until the uncertainties and delusions caused by the Corn Laws have been removed.

Dr. Daubeny referred to the advantages derived from agricultural colleges on the Continent, and observed:—

"Those who look forward to the day when the means of supplying our population shall be provided from our own soil must feel anxious for the advance of agricultural knowledge, and this becomes the more indispensable when it is considered that the population is increasing at the rate of 700 a day. It is evident that unless skill and science be increased, the necessary supply of the necessities of life cannot be produced; but were such increase to take place, it could not be otherwise than beneficial, as the industry of the country is taxed to its utmost extent. I think a lesson may be taken by the agriculturists from the manufacturers, whose skill, as is well known, exceeds the skill of all the manufacturers in the world; but if you go into the manufacturing districts, you will find that the manufacturers, without gradual improvement, are not able to retain their position; and yet the farmers of this country rent contented with going on in the same way that their forefathers did. I think these are reasons why we should endeavour to advance in practical knowledge, and in some degree in theoretical. I do not mean that farmers should become practical chemists; but I hope the institution will be the means of supplying a number of individuals in every district, who can be appealed to on chemical subjects; but farmers generally, when anything new is presented to their notice, such, for instance, as liquid manures, should be aware of the principles by which their value is to be tested, and this degree of knowledge I wish every farmer's son to obtain."

This is practically a lecture on Free Trade, for we have seen that the genuine Monopolists denounce improvement in husbandry and "scientific farming" with as much vehemence as they declaim against Free Trade. Indeed this meeting offers fresh proofs that all the best and most intelligent agriculturists are to be found in the ranks of the Free-Traders.

PROTECTION OF FARMERS.

Amongst the various ways in which the owners of land in this country have secured to themselves peculiar advantages from their exclusive power of making laws, there is none more injurious to the agricultural capitalist, the farmer, than the law which enables the landlord to levy his rent—even to six years' arrears—by distraining and selling all the property on his tenant's farm. The evil of this law is not to be measured by the cases in which it is actually enforced, but it is in its indirect effect upon the relation of landlord and tenant that it is most seriously detrimental to the farmers and the community. This has begun to be understood by farmers, and the question has of late undergone considerable discussion—if that can be called discussion where there seems to be scarcely a difference of opinion—in the agricultural newspapers. Thus we find in the last Mark-lane Express a correspondent refers with approval to a letter which had previously appeared upon the subject of the "law of distress," and adds some practical expositions of the effect of that law. He says:—

"I hasten to offer to 'Cincinnatus' my tribute of thanks for having taken up this question, and with him earnestly urge upon you the advocacy of the repeal of this most obnoxious and injurious law, which does more to retard improvement in farming than any statute now in existence."

If the writer had excepted the Corn Law, we believe he would have been right in saying that the law of distress does more to retard improvement in farming than any other existing law. And the reason is perfectly obvious, for by removing from the landlord the risk of loss from taking reckless or unprincipled tenants, he is enabled to get a higher rent than the fair value at the expense of the other persons with whom such tenants may have pecuniary dealings.

This is well touched upon by the writer we have above mentioned, who says:—

"I will not now enter into the many evils arising from this law, but leave it to the hands of yourself and your able correspondent from York-shire, who has recently touched upon a few of them, but would, with suzerainty, beg to call his attention to its injurious effects in the competition for farms; for, however much landlords may repudiate the idea that competition has any effect on them in fixing the rent of their land, still I am prepared to prove that there are landlords who have said it matters not to them how their land is farmed, providing they get their rent; the tenant cannot take the soil away."

Now, though few landlords say this, they all act upon it. In fact, it is by means of competition alone that nine land-agents out of ten estimate the value of land. Those agents who really understand land and its capacity for production are few and far between. The addition of so much to the old rent as anybody will offer is a short and simple cut to a valuation of an estate and the favour of most landowners. Indeed many, perhaps most, landlords select their agent, not from their knowledge of their profession, but from their readiness to do their masters' behests. We know an instance in which the principal agent of a grandee, whose rental is said to be £70,000 a year, was originally a drill-sergeant. And, on being offered the agency, the worthy sergeant, with a degree of modesty which we have no doubt his subsequent experience of "with how little knowledge land may be valued" has subsequently worn off, intimated that, though he could keep the accounts of a troop of horse, he really knew nothing of the management of landed property. To which his lordship said, "You can do what I tell you, can't you?" and, on receiving an assurance that there would be no difficulty in the performance of that part of an agent's duties, he added, "Then that is all I want!"

It will surprise no one to hear that this landowner, a few years ago, was obliged to take several large farms into his own occupation, from inability to obtain tenants.

But to return to the Mark-lane Express correspondent, and the effects of the law of distress in stimulating an unhealthy competition for farms:—

"Now, sir, there is a large class of men always ready to avail themselves of this feeling on the part of landlords or agents, and will take farms, regardless of amount of rent, well knowing that land in tolerable condition will bear the whip for three or four years, which is about the average term of tenure of such tenants."

Ay, and many will enter farms with means which the slightest calculation would tell them could lead to nothing but failure, and are ultimately made victims to the law of distress and the practice of competition; and the writer justly asks.

"What chance, then, has a man of capital and honest intention by entering into competition with such men? And this accounts for the slow progress improvements in farming make on some estates, notwithstanding the well-directed efforts of the Royal Agricultural Society of England. But repeal the law of distress—give the tenant a property in his improvements—throw the landlord upon the respectability and responsibility of his tenant for the security of the rent—and I venture to assert that in a few years we shall hear no more of that bugbear—the necessity of importing foreign grain."

Or of that more absurd "bugbear" the necessity of protecting the British agriculturist from foreign competition.

MORE GAME-LAW CRIME.

The makers of our laws, dissatisfied with the extent of crime and misery their game-laws have inflicted upon the rural population, have just passed a new act to prevent night poaching, of which we take the following description from a Monopolist journal:—

"THE NIGHT POACHING ACT.—The Night Poaching Act, which has just passed the House of Commons, greatly extends all the pains and penalties imposed by the 9th Geo. IV., usually called the 'Night Poaching Act.' It is not now necessary that a poacher should be found on 'land, open or enclosed'; if he is found at night, armed, with 'gun, net, or other engine,' for the purpose of destroying game, 'in or upon the alder of any public road, highway, road, or path, or at the openings, outlets, or gates leading from any such lands into such public roads,' he is liable to be apprehended and punished as a 'night poacher.' It will henceforth be impossible for the poacher to evade punishment, for he cannot set out on his predatory excursions without rendering himself liable to be apprehended."—Gloucestershire Chronicle.

Now, none can depreciate poaching more than we do; we know it to be the beginning of all crimes of magnitude committed amongst the peasantry; but such harsh and stringent enactments as those above described must and will deepen the character of the crime, but will not diminish its frequency. Poaching will be common so long as the agricultural classes are so partially employed and so wretchedly paid as at present; and we confidently predict that more murderous conflicts and more wretchedness and crime will result from this statute, which is literally a revival of the old forest laws. This act will be a new engine of oppression in the hands of the landed aristocracy, of which they have already more than enough. In connection with this subject we may notice the following passage from the report of the proceedings of the Quainton petty sessions (in Buckinghamshire), where—

"The following sums were awarded for activity to the following constables for past services:—Grendon Underwood, Richard Head Holt, £1 10s., and William Sare, 10s., for capturing a notorious poacher, William Sims, of Shipton Lee, 10s., for capturing a poacher."

This is one of the ways in which the county-rates are made contributory to the maintenance of aristocratic sport and rural crime. From crime to crime, from poaching, attempted to be suppressed by such Draconic laws as that above mentioned, to arson, the crime of fiends rather than of men, the transition is so natural that the following passage from a provincial journal, published in Suffolk, where game preserves and "protectionist" landowners abound, seems a fit pendant to the previous extracts:—

"SUFFOLK LENT ARSIZES.—ARSON.—Leech Borley, for setting fire to the barn and corn-stacks of John Gayford; Wm. Giff, for setting fire to the barley-stack of John Ragnam; Jabez Copsey and Stephen Borcham, for setting fire to a barn in the occupation of James Allen; and John Double, for setting fire to a stack of straw, the property of Isaac Everett, were severally found guilty, and sentenced to be transported for life."

Oh, what a mockery it is, to hear Monopolists canting about their anxiety to protect the labourer from foreign competition, when they deliberately inflict upon him—for the sake of their own mere amusements—miseries of the fearful character indicated by the foregoing scraps of ordinary news!

MONOPOLIST INFLUENCE.

That the influence of the Monopolist landowners is confined to that direct species of control which may always be exerted by those who may have the power of injuring a humble man, and who are known to be unscrupulous in the use of it, is notorious. For instance, in the following paragraph from the local paper we learn the way in which the recently-elected Monopolist member for North Wiltshire gets up Pro-Corn Law demonstrations:—

"PRO-CORN-LAW PETITION.—The petition in favour of the Corn Laws, which is being hawked about for signatures, was sent last week to Mr. Coward, of Roundway, principal tenant of Mr. Sothron, M.P. The occasion of advancing the wages of the labourers from 7s. to 8s. a week was thought a favourable opportunity, and, on its being announced to them, they were requested to sign. To a man they refused. Mr. Sothron's boast, that he would gladly have let his election to the votes of the poor within ten miles of Devizes, may, after this, be set down as mere moonshine. It is said that at Bishop's Cannings the labourers had no choice in the matter; their names being put down by their masters for them."—Wiltshire Independent.

We have talked with some hundreds of agricultural labourers on this question, and we have no hesitation in saying, that amongst no class of uneducated men are the evils of the Corn Laws, and of the high prices and the fluctuating prices those laws occasion, more readily understood. Nor is this surprising, seeing the farm-labourers have always borne the first brunt of those evils, and have suffered more deeply from landlord legislation than even the farmers themselves.

In the New Farmers' Journal we find a droll explanation of the Huntingdon disaster. In the first place, Mr. Acland, it seems, did not argue the case so clearly as Dr. Sleight, and therefore the majority voted against the doctor! In the second place, Acland and the doctor, between them, talked the farmers out of the room, and therefore the doctor was defeated!—Gateshead Observer.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We continue to receive offers of contributions to the bazaar, answers to which will be sent by the Secretary. A needlewoman is thankfully informed that what she proposes to send will be acceptable.

"R. F." has enclosed us a whole bundle of extracts from the Morning Herald and the Northern Star; but, as he has not marked the distinction on the slips, we find it impossible to discover which is which; there seems to be as perfect an identity between the papers as exists between the Herald and Standard, the alter and idem of the London press.

"D. J."—If foreigners want our manufactures they will buy them; if they do not they will let them alone. To his second question, we answer that improvement in agriculture, as in everything else, can only be the result of free competition.

"J. J."—In the LEAGUE we know nothing about Tories, Whigs, or any other party distinctions. Ours is a national combination for a national object, and appeals for support to all who have national feelings, irrespective of their class, sect, or party.

"J. J. C."—We had some doubts of his lines, and could wish even now some alteration in the form of his stanzas, but probably our readers will excuse slight deficiencies of expression for the sake of the sentiments which the verses contain:—

O England! my country, thy state is alarming,
And dimm'd are thy prospects, once cheering and bright;
The nations around will from thee take a warning,
For dark are thy councils, withdrawn is thy light.

Amid the disasters which now all surround thee,
Can the sweet seraph Hope e'er appear to thy sight?
Amid dangers and fears which, alas! now confound thee,
O yes, sweet Hope appears—behold Cobden and Bright!

Thy famishing millions! brought low by taxation,
By Corn Laws, by plunder, O horrible sight!
Yet, amid all this turmoil, and strife and vexation,
They turn to brave Wilson and Cobden and Bright.

Thy statesmen bewildered! thy rulers decided
To pursue the wrong course quite regardless of right;
Thy sages insulted, defamed, and derided:
Sage Wilson, brave Cobden, and honest John Bright.

Thy rickyards in flames! thy great trade fast declining!
Thy paupers increasing, O, terrible plight!
Thy workmen industrious, in misery pining,
Can expect no relief but from Cobden and Bright.

Oh, Brougham! thy morning of life was most cheering,
The promise thou gavest to shed forth the light
To enlighten our path; but, thy conduct now veering,
We scorn thee, and turn to friend honest John Bright.

Oh Peel! thy "bold measure," as Cobbett foretold thee,
Thy country has brought into pitiful plight;
The result is now seen, which thy father oft told thee
Would follow thy "Bill of Cash-payment," so bright.

Distress and distraction o'er suicide bending!
The result of Peel blunders in currency's fight;
And ruin must finish the course thou art wending,
If not rescued by Villiers and Cobden and Bright.

Oh Villiers! thy conduct doth prove the exception
To men of thy order, in heraldry's sight;
Thou art honest and just, and doth scorn a deception:
Hail, worthy companion of Cobden and Bright.

As honest and fearless are those who now guide us,
We intrust our just cause in the forthcoming fight;
We cast off all tricksters who scorn and deride us,
And trust Cobden undaunted, and honest John Bright.

Then success to bold Cobden, whose mind high aspiring
Now leads the grand contest for "justice and right!"
And his worthy colleagues in the good cause ne'er firing:
Then hurrah for brave Wilson and Villiers and Bright!

J. J. C.
"J. G."—We are not acquainted with Mr. Harwood's address, and had not the pleasure of hearing his lectures on political economy.

"T. P."—The Duke of Cleveland is not called upon to pay his labourers a higher price than their labour would bring in open market. There ought to be nothing of patronage in wages, it is a mere matter of bargain and sale in which the hirer is as much or as little of an obliged party as the hired.

"Free-Trader"—The sentence was awkwardly expressed, but its purport is sufficiently clear; it simply asserts that a chance from a titled to an untitled landlord cannot injure a tenant-farmer.

We gladly comply with the request of our esteemed correspondent who begs us to republish the following from a magazine of very limited circulation:—

AN ANTI CORN-LAW RHYME.

BY THE REV. R. E. B. MACLELLAN, OF BRIDPORT.

"I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat.  Verily, I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto ME."—Matt. xxv. 35, 40.

Alone, alone, beside the way
A Poor Man in his misery lay;
His cheek was sunk and very pale,
Weak as a child's his wasted limb,

Low words he spoke of plaint and wail,
The light within his soul was dim;
But no one asked what did him ail,
And no one seemed to care for him.

WANT bowed that frame was once so brave,
And dragged it near the loathsome grave;
WANT had debased his godlike mind,
And its proud thoughts to earth confined;

WANT had his spirit's pinions rive,
And kept its soaring hopes from heaven.
Alas! that one a little lower
Than the rejoicing angels made,

Fitted with them on high to soar,
And, in bright garniture arrayed,
With them the courts of heaven to tread,—
Should thus bedimmed, debased, expire,

His mind's, his heart's, his soul's desire,
Merged in one wish—for BREAD, for BREAD!

He pined for Bread. Around him lay
Fair fields with golden harvests bright;
The corn-stalks g'addened, and away
Tossed their brown heads amid the light.

A voice around him seems to go
And poison in his ear instils;
'Tis the sheep's bleating, and the low
Of cattle on a thousand hills.

Oh! 'twas a mockery of hell,
That he upon the parched ground
Should there be slain by Famine fell,
While Plenty smiled and danced around!

He turned his weak and bloodshot eye
On fields and pastures stretching by;
He strained his dull and sickened ear,
The sounds that spake of Food to hear;

Hope lent one brief and flickering ray—
He roused him with convulsive start,
And towards the CORN he crawled, to stay
The vulture gnawing at his heart.

He would have eaten—but upspring
A band, who with fierce haughty tongue,
And brow that gloomed in thunder mood,
And heart that 'gainst all ruth was armed,

And hand whose grasp broad swords uprear'd,
Buck drove him from his food,
And who were they? Upon their head
Bright coronets a glory shed;

He would have eaten—but upspring
A band, who with fierce haughty tongue,
And brow that gloomed in thunder mood,
And heart that 'gainst all ruth was armed,

And hand whose grasp broad swords uprear'd,
Buck drove him from his food,
And who were they? Upon their head
Bright coronets a glory shed;

He would have eaten—but upspring
A band, who with fierce haughty tongue,
And brow that gloomed in thunder mood,
And heart that 'gainst all ruth was armed,

And hand whose grasp broad swords uprear'd,
Buck drove him from his food,
And who were they? Upon their head
Bright coronets a glory shed;

He would have eaten—but upspring
A band, who with fierce haughty tongue,
And brow that gloomed in thunder mood,
And heart that 'gainst all ruth was armed,

And hand whose grasp broad swords uprear'd,
Buck drove him from his food,
And who were they? Upon their head
Bright coronets a glory shed;

Titles were theirs of ermined state;
They were of gentle blood, the great,
The proud the highly-born, the grand,
The scutcheon'd Nobles of the land!
God in his kindness forth did pour
All living things that grow or roam,
To be of plenteous food the store—
They kept them from that Poor Man's home.
God on each creature he hath made
Alike his benediction shed,
On every clime and creed and grade:—
They kept it from that Poor Man's head.
God bade the soul-rejoicing light
(Of his own countenance) spread from high,
To make all nature glad and bright:—
They kept it from that Poor Man's eye.
God cast his bounties far and wide,
And bade the famishing eat and sip:—
They rose, they madly drove a-ide
THE HAND OF GOD FROM THAT POOR MAN'S LIP.

A Patriot came. Not with the drum
Or the stirring fife did that Patriot come;
Not with banners flaunting far,
Not with the "circumstance of war,"
Not with hosts and not with arms,
Not with shouts nor loud alarms:
He came with words full soft and smooth;
He came with the spear and the shield of Truth;
He came with pity about his heart;
And love to God was his only dart;
And love to man was his only helm:—
Yet he came to defeat, disperse, o'erwhelm.
Saw the nobles are gone, are melted away
Like noisome mists fore the rise of day!
Nor Noble nor King hath e'er withstood,
Nor can, the march of the True and the Good.

The Patriot nigh that Poor Man came,
And raised from the ground his wasted frame:
As a mother beareth her only child,
With accents loud and whispers cheering,
He bore him from the road-side wild
To the fields where Plenty was then appearing.
He led him there; he bade him roam
In those most gladome lands for ever;
And told him that Man again should come
"Twixt him and his God—oh! never! never!
Heaven shield us well! That Poor Man's face
Did shine as the very sun for brightness;
And his rags put on a celestial grace.
That eclips'd the nontide ray in whiteness.
And he looked and spake as the Son of Him
That dwelleth amid the cherubim.
Yes; there he staid, the Galilean mild,
And thus proclaimed in voice most sad and sweet,
As on the homaging Patriot soft he smiled,—
"I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat.
When to my humblest brother thus ye do,
The act of love and ruth is done to me:
Come, blessed of my Father! come and view
The thrones prepared in heaven for such as ye!"

A correspondent, whose hand-writing is not very legible, requests us to republish the following stanza, taken from a paper whose name we cannot clearly make out, but which we guess to be the Spectator. We concur in the sentiments with which the lines were originally introduced to the public.

A NEW PLATONIC DIALOGUE.

[Besides its general satire, the following jeu d'esprit, by a writer of mark, very cleverly points the moral of mental submission. We know not that we ever saw the argumentum ad absurdum much better exemplified than in the closing stanza.]

"Good gentleman in velvet, no doubt 'tis kind of you
To give my children tracts so neatly stitched in blue;
But as, poor things, they have not a stitch upon themselves,
They'd care more for your wardrobe than for your bookcase-shelves."

"Poor man in rags, blaspheme not; for all we suffer, surely,
Is less than we deserve, and should be borne demurely.
But 'tis, I own, our duty to be poor neighbour's plight,
And so there's exence for you, a sinner's worthless mite."

"Good gentleman in velvet, 't will buy a loaf of bread,
The first we've had these two days, and now we're almost dead."

Here, Mary, crawl and fetch it, for your mother is too ill;
And I'll look to Bill and Tommy, and keep the baby still."

"Poor man in rags, believe me, there's the poorhouse free to you,
That handsome house and grounds, and all so large and new—
There's a doctor there and chaplain, and guardians meeting weekly;
And when last I saw the inmates, they were shining all quite sleekly."

"Good gentleman in velvet, 'tis a life too fine for me
To live like a great man, and no wife nor child to see.
I've heard that there's a place so grand no tongue can tell,
All silver, gold, and jewels—the place that they call hell."

"Poor man in rags, your notions are as scanty, torn, and thin,
As the clothes upon your body; but 'tis all the fruit of sin.
You should go to church on Sunday and hear our worthy pastor—
An estimable man, very fit to be your master."

"Good gentleman in velvet, I once did go to church;
But the man who built it somehow had left me in the lurch:
I found no seat, but stood, the ceremonies viewing,
And wondered what the people who look'd so snug were doing."

"Poor man in rags, and heard you no profitable truth,
To light your soul's dark places and make the broken smooth?
What said the worthy rector, so learned and so kind,
With whom and his good lady on Friday last we dined?"

"He simper'd out long stories of Noah and his ark,
And of Jonah who was swallow'd by some shovel-hatted shark;
And by all his talk of deluges, he made it clear as mud,
That he was safe within the boat, and I was in the flood."

"Poor man in rags, I fear that you want the gospel pearl,
The doctor is a dean and the cousin of an earl:
And heard you then no word that, spoken in due season,
At once was Christian doctrine and gentlemanly reason?"

"Good gentleman in velvet, all who left his church behind,
The church of him the doctor, were spiritually blind;
But the Catholics were worse, for they had an Inquisition,
And called him a Dissenter, him who held dissent perdition."

"Poor man in rags, what truth to wisdom can be clearer?
The voice of Heaven is sounding, and only wants a hearer.
But truth must be believed, and not question'd without shame;
And 'tis thinking for yourself that incurs your Maker's blame."

"Good gentleman in velvet, to learn a little more,
And to pass away my time, for the hunger pinched me sore,
I went to hear a lecture last night on the Corn Law,
And though I own it puzzled me, I join'd in the applause."

"Poor man in rags, what listen to such lying tongues as those—
Those enemies of property and of the world's repose!
Your common sense alone should have told you they were wrong:
And you should have confuted them in face of all the throng."

"Good gentleman in velvet, I'm ignorant and rough,
And d-d-d not answer Parson Whate, although he talked such stuff;

And when they spoke of Corn Laws, and put the squire to shame,
I feared that thinking for myself would earn my Maker's blame."

Applications for Private Boxes to be made personally or by letter on Monday.

The cards of registered Members will admit, as heretofore, to Pit and Galleries.—DOORS TO BE OPENED AT SEVEN O'CLOCK.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, May 4, 1844.

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

BAZAAR AND EXHIBITION OF BRITISH ARTS AND MANUFACTURES, TO BE HELD IN COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE, LONDON, JULY, 1844.

The Council of the League, at the earnest entreaty of a number of ladies of distinction, have determined upon holding a Bazaar in the Theatre Royal Covent-garden, London, during the month of July in the present year, in aid of the £100,000 Fund now in course of collection. This mode of assisting the efforts of the Council has been suggested by ladies, who consider it the most appropriate method of expressing their sympathy with the objects of the League, and their approval of its proceedings. In accepting the co-operation so nobly proffered, the Council cannot omit publicly to record their grateful acknowledgments to the ladies by whose exertions alone the Bazaar held in Manchester, in the early part of the year 1842, was begun, carried on, and brought to a most triumphant conclusion, giving an impulse to the public mind on the subject of the Corn Laws of greater and more permanent value than the pecuniary results of that undertaking, unprecedentedly large as they were.

From the commencement of the Anti-Corn-Law agitation, no point has been more scrupulously adhered to than its entire disavowal from all party or political connexion whatever. Of the wisdom of this determination every day's experience furnishes additional evidence; and this, coupled with the oft-repeated determination still to adhere to it under all circumstances, renders the co-operation thus gracefully tendered not an unnatural intrusion into the arena of politics, but an evidence of active humanity and generous zeal which form some of the highest embellishments of human character.

The objects of the League and its proceedings are now matters of daily discussion, so that a momentary reference to them here will be all that is necessary. To give to labour its just remuneration for reasonable exertion, to give to commercial skill and enterprise a fair field for their employment, are in themselves noble objects, and may appear to some the only principles involved in the present controversy; but it ought never to be forgotten, that until the monopoly in the food of the people, with others of a kindred character, are abolished, the best sustained and most judiciously directed efforts for the social and intellectual improvement of the great body of our countrymen must prove abortive. The settlement of this great question involves a nation's prosperity; and the Council hope that the efforts of those who have suggested the holding of the present Bazaar will receive support proportioned to the importance of the movement to which it is auxiliary.

The first particular requiring the attention of those who may be desirous of assisting the promoters of the Bazaar will be, the formation of a Ladies' Local Committee in each town, whose names should be immediately transmitted to London or Manchester, distinguishing that of the Secretary, in order that a correspondence may be opened and carried on between such Committee and the Council during the preparations for the Bazaar.

Each town should, if practicable, endeavour to furnish a stall entirely; and the Committee are requested to depute one or more ladies to superintend its arrangements, and the disposal of the various articles during the days of sale.

The Council would also recommend the formation of a Committee of Gentlemen, whose names should also be transmitted to London or Manchester, a part of whose duty will be to canvass for contributions of various fabrics to be worked into useful and ornamental articles.

It is respectfully suggested that, if the contributions from each town were to consist in a great degree of articles for the manufacture of which it may be celebrated, this would secure a suitable variety, and, by so doing, contribute to the success of the undertaking. This, the Council are aware, cannot be always accomplished, but they consider it worthy of some attention.

There will, doubtless, be many places where the formation of a Local Committee will be found impracticable, but the Council trust that this will not deter individuals from assisting the ladies at whose instance the undertaking has been commenced, and upon whom, from that circumstance, some slight responsibility rests. The Council will be happy to correspond with such persons, from whom they hope to receive timely notice of their intentions, in order that the necessary directions may be given for the transmission of the contributions to London.

It now only remains for the Council to observe, that any article that the taste or ability of the donor may suggest or dictate will be most cheerfully and gratefully accepted, although the following classification specifies the articles most suitable for such an occasion:

1. Articles usually contributed to Bazaars
2. Articles of Manufacture, British and Foreign.

3. Models of Mechanism, &c.
4. Designs, Architectural and Fancy.
5. Specimens of Coins, Minerals, Birds, Insects, &c.
6. Books and other Publications from Authors, with Autographs.
7. Autograph Letters from celebrated Men and Women of the present and former times.
8. Portraits, Pictures, and Illustrated Works.
9. Philosophical Instruments.
10. Music.
11. Original Poetry and Tales.
12. Pecuniary Contributions.

The Council would, in conclusion, beg respectfully to request, that, as the time for preparation is comparatively limited, immediate attention may be given to the subject, in order that the full and complete success of the undertaking may be secured.

Particulars of the proposed Exhibition of British Arts and Manufactures will be transmitted to the different Committees so soon as the preliminary arrangements are completed.

By order of the Council,

GEORGE WILSON, Chairman.

67, Fleet-Street, London, April 20, 1844.

The above circular is commended to the prompt attention of our readers. We repeat the intimation of the Council, that "the time for preparation is comparatively limited;" very limited, when we advert to the character and magnitude of the great exhibition of national industry that is contemplated. But the zeal and ardour of our friends will only be stimulated by this circumstance. The announcement of the proposed Bazaar by Mr. Cobden at a late meeting has already led to most acceptable proffers of service. On this, as on many previous occasions, we find an earnest spirit waiting to ascertain how efficient aid may be rendered to so good a cause, and, as soon as the suggestion is given, outrunning the slower pace of the practical directions. The League, whenever it requires a more than usually active co-operation from its friends and supporters, can say of them as the conquering Harry of his soldiers—"I see them stand like greyhounds in the slips, ready to start." We have no pressgang of agents and stewards to fill our ranks and enforce discipline. Our vessel is manned with volunteers. We find the advantage of it. The cause is their own, and their hearts are in the work, and they watch any signal for action.

By the Bazaar, opportunity is afforded for a very important species of co-operation, which is not usually available. The meetings at Covent-garden Theatre, as well as many provincial meetings, have been honoured by the presence of large numbers of ladies, whose heartfelt accordance in the just and humane purposes for which the League is constituted was very apparent. This was to be expected, however unusual the fact of the women of this country presenting themselves at public meetings. They came to aid, or be complacent in, no vulgar strife of party, no factious clamour for factious purposes. The direct tendency of an extension of trade, by its freedom, is to extend that relief to the misery of multitudes, and effect that amelioration in the condition of the struggling industrial classes, with which the purer morale of their gentler nature is sure to be in sympathy. It would be an insult to imagine that the glistening eye or the applauding hand will satisfy the interest excited in their minds for the great act of justice and the noblest of charities which we struggle to obtain. They have shown, many of them have distinctly and earnestly intimated, that such is not the case. They are generously anxious to assist. And the formation and arrangements of a Bazaar furnish a mode, sanctioned by custom and high example, whereby their aid may be combined with that of their fathers, husbands, brothers, and friends; superseding no exertion on the part of others, but enhancing and enriching the worth of all. It would be alone a sufficient reason for holding the proposed Bazaar, that in no other way, conformably with prevalent usages, can the women of Great Britain so distinctly, expressively, or generally, demonstrate their perception of the value of that concession which Humanity and Justice claim from the sordid class policy of Legislation, and the spirit of Christianity demands of the Demon of Monopoly.

There are others who will also, we apprehend, rejoice in the opportunity for co-operation which this project will afford them. In many classes, from the artisan to the author, there are those who can give other and better things than money, and which for our purpose, eventually, are liberal pecuniary donations. In times of public danger, ladies have offered their jewels to replenish an exhausted treasury. And though the League Fund, however yet inadequate to the mighty task for which it is destined, is not an exhausted but a growing treasury, yet its occasion is the imminent peril of industry, both material and intellectual. Let mind and labour, therefore, record their protest and assert their claims by the contribution of their several productions. There, literature, which is the shrine of thought, shall have its honourable niche; and right welcome shall be the curious toy which the cunning hand of the workman, forbidden to figure in subscription lists, has ingeniously carved in his scanty leisure. There are few, indeed, however limited may be the amount of money which circumstances allow them to bestow, even upon a cause so important, who may not find means of augmenting the disposable stores of the Bazaar, and contributing to the amplitude and diversity of its display.

We cannot conclude without very earnestly requesting attention to the suggestion of the Council that, if practicable, the contributions from each town should include specimens of the manufactures for which it is celebrated. So far as this hint is realised, the Bazaar will be a demonstration of the utility and grandeur of that power which Monopolist policy undervalues, oppresses, and cripples. Peers, on state occasions, array themselves in their robes and coronets. Industry points to the works of its toil, capital, and intelligence. They prove its right of existence in God's world. They are its trophies of the past, its pledges for the future; and in their presence an anti-trade policy and a starvation-creating legislature should stand abashed.

ANTI-CORN-LAW BAZAAR.—We perceive with pleasure that the friends of Corn-Law repeal are projecting a bazaar on an immense scale in the Metropolis, the proceeds of which will serve to promote the national agitation against the taxation of food. Of all the means adopted to promote objects of public good, bazaars have been found to be the most elegant and agreeable, and frequently the most successful. In their formation they appeal not to ostentatious liberality, nor to the impulse of feeling uncontrolled by judgment. They call forth, rather, private exertion; they exercise at once the taste, skill, and industry of many; and they afford, during the time required for the preparation of articles for exhibition, many opportunities of reflection upon the purposes to which the results of generous labour will be applied. Thus, let a lady commence a task of embroidery, to be devoted to a cause of charity, and her mind will frequently be irresistibly influenced by pity for the poor, and as often as she plies the needle will her thoughts be engaged upon the suffering ones whose sorrow she is labouring to assuage. Such projects, therefore, as the one now under notice, have not their power determined by pecuniary results alone, but they exercise a moral influence which passes from breast to breast, pervading families, and mingling with every sentiment of private life.—Preston Guardian.

REVIEW.

Five Lectures on Political Economy, delivered before the University of Dublin. By J. A. Lawson, LL.B. London, Parker; Dublin, Miliken.

In his fourth lecture Professor Lawson examines the effects which human laws and institutions exercise upon the distribution of wealth. He very justly exposes the errors which arise from misapprehending the real nature and significance of wealth. The great and small herds of vulgar thinkers estimate wealth by the amount possessed of gold and silver, forgetting that the value of the precious metals arises not from any inherent or intrinsic value which they possess, but from what has been called their forensic value, that is, from the amount of other kinds of wealth which they can purchase when exchanged.

"It requires but few words to point out the absurdity of the opinion, that wealth, either individual or national, consists merely in gold and silver: it needs not the fable of Midas, to convince us that a man may possess gold and silver enough, and yet languish for the necessities of life: it is indeed true, that any individual possessing a quantity of gold and silver is justly considered wealthy, because they afford him the means of procuring other articles of wealth in exchange; but to suppose that none other are wealthy, and that the best mode of increasing a man's wealth is, to prevent him from parting with any of his gold and silver, and even to compel him to turn everything else he has into gold and silver, involves the most obvious absurdity: and yet this was precisely what the mercantile system proposed to do—to prevent us from exporting gold, and to tempt us to export everything we had, and bring back gold in exchange, was its avowed object; thus rendering us a nation of misers, who had gold and silver enough in our coffers, but would not send any of it to a neighbouring shop to procure the necessities and comforts of life for our families. It was the common fallacy of mistaking effect for cause; a nation has gold, because it is wealthy; but it is not wealthy, because it has gold. The possession of gold and silver is a symptom and index of general wealth, and will increase or diminish with it; but to compel either an individual or a nation to part with every other article of wealth for one that affords in itself no substantial enjoyment, is an extraordinary mode of increasing their supply of necessities and comforts; in the words of Adam Smith, 'To attempt to increase the wealth of any country, either by introducing or detaining in it an unnecessary quantity of gold and silver, is as absurd as it would be to attempt to increase the good cheer of private families, by obliging them, to keep an unnecessary number of kitchen utensils.' Experience at length taught mankind that this end was unattainable by these means, for the precious metals managed to evade their restrictions, and even to the extent that the attempt was successful, it did not increase the national wealth, but the reverse, of which Spain and Portugal were signal instances. The spirit, too, of awakening commercial enterprise struggled to shake off the fetters which checked it, and the result was, that new chains were forged, allowing it, indeed, a more extensive range, but retaining, alas! a firmer hold. Gold was now permitted to be sent abroad, but only in the hope that it might return with interest; and the new criterion applied to determine the merits of every trade was, whether, by means of it, we exported more than we imported; for, if so, it was presumed that the difference found its way back to us in gold; and this, and this only, was our profit upon the transaction: and this was called 'THE BALANCE OF TRADE.' Every branch of commerce, no matter what useful articles it supplied us with, was considered a losing and a ruinous one, if it did not stand this singular test, and every expedient which tended to bring about this result, no matter how much it deranged our commercial interests, and diminished the supply of useful articles, was at once adopted by Government: exportation was encouraged by bounties, and importation checked by restrictions; in other words, we paid foreigners for taking our goods, and we could not receive the balance from them without paying a penalty to our own Government."

The system thus exposed has still many advocates in both Houses of Parliament, whose declamations and harangues would sometimes almost lead us to suspect a more intimate connexion between St. Luke's and St. Stephen's than is accordant with the notions generally entertained of legislative wisdom. There are persons who oppose the abolition of the Corn Laws on the ground that the country would be drained of its gold to pay for foreign corn. But no man gives gold in exchange for any article unless he has more need of the article than of the gold; in ordinary affairs a man would be hooted who told his neighbours that they ought to keep their money and go without the necessities of life; but this is precisely the lesson which the advocates of the mercantile system wish to teach nations; they tell them to keep their gold and do without foreign corn; and their idea of national prosperity is a plethora of coin and the destitution of everything else. But the wealth, that is, the wellbeing, of a nation depends obviously on the proportion between its production and its consumption, and the distribution of that production so as to meet the wants of all classes of consumers. Everything that increases production or improves distribution advances the wealth of the nation; and there are no other conceivable means by which such an object can be promoted. Professor Lawson applies this reasoning with admirable force to the great commercial question which now engages the attention of the country:—

"The mode in which commerce increases the production is obvious enough: no man will go indirectly to get what he could get directly, unless he has some motive of interest or gain to urge him to it; it is not because we could not make a thing at home that we get it from abroad, but because we could not make it so well or so cheaply at home. Commerce is nothing but an application, on a larger scale, of the common principle which gives rise to all division of labour; we do not each of us make our own coats and shoes; not because we could not manage to do so if we had no other way of getting them, but because we find that we can employ our time at something else, from which we will derive a fund that will get us coats and shoes, and leave us a surplus besides. England imports some corn every year from this country and from the Continent; but that is not because she could not raise enough at home, for I showed you, in my last lecture, that she could with ease support much more than her present population; but simply because experience proves that the same amount of labour and capital that would be required to raise a certain quantity of corn in England will produce, when devoted to some other occupation, a quantity of articles which will procure in exchange a greater quantity of corn than could have been raised by employing it at home for that purpose; if it procured less, it would be better for them to raise it at home, and the trade would at once be discontinued; and if it only procured the same, the trade would never be carried on, for there would be no motive to induce men to incur additional trouble in procuring the article from abroad which they could have as easily at home. It is equally obvious, that those who give England the corn would not give it to her unless they got something for it that they valued more; for, if they did not, they would keep their corn, and let England keep her manufactures and grow her own corn. Commerce, therefore, is not, as has been said, a mere exchange of equivalents,† and, therefore, incapable of rendering any real service to a nation: such a supposition would involve the absurdity of imagining that ships and warehouses would be built without any remuneration, and, therefore, without any motive; nor, on the other hand, is it a means of enriching one country at the expense of another. For, suppose that in England a certain quantity of labour and capital employed in some branch of manufacturing industry would produce twice as many products as the same labour and capital employed in France upon the same branch; and, on the other hand, suppose the same amount of labour and capital employed in raising corn in France would produce twice as much as the same quantity employed in raising corn in England, then England and France, by exchanging their corn and manufactures, will each double its own power of production; France will have double the quantity of manufactures that she would have if she insisted on manufacturing for herself, and England will have double the quantity of corn that she would have if she insisted on growing all her own corn. I only use this illustration to show how each country is benefited by adopting that branch of industry in which its labour is most productive; just as each individual is by embracing some one trade or profession for which he presumes himself to be best adapted, while, if each resolved to confine itself to its own products, its supply of wealth would be diminished by one-half."

* "In Anderson's 'History of Commerce,' a very intelligent work, published in 1763, ten years before the 'Wealth of Nations' appeared, in reviewing the different trades which were carried on at the time, the author determines the advantage or disadvantage of each by this test. Speaking of our commerce with France, he says that the balance of trade was once in our favour, but our commerce with her is now very disadvantageous to us. 'Yet, too many of our people are so regardless of their palpable interest, as to take off very great quantities of their wines and brandies, and more clandestinely, of their gold and silver lace.' In like manner he condemns the trade with Russia as a losing one, and regrets that we cannot do without it, as it supplies a heap of naval stores."

† "The fallacy of this argument consists, as the logician will at once observe, in the ambiguous use of the word equivalent, which is the middle term; in one part of the argument it signifies value in use, in the other, value in exchange."

Incidentally, the professor discusses one of those clap-trap fallacies by which the monopolists have often attempted to dupe the operatives, namely, the absurd assertion that lowering the price of food would produce a corresponding fall in the rate of wages.

"Labourers do not receive their wages from compassion, nor are they raised because the labourer cannot live comfortably on what he has, nor, as would follow from the same principle, are they (fortunately for the labourer) diminished because he could live on less than he has: he is paid because he produces something, and because that product possesses a certain value to his employer; the greater that value is, the more he will be paid, and the less, the less he will receive; if what he wants to purchase with his wages is made dear by a tax, he, like the rest of the community, can get but a smaller quantity of it; and I know of no privilege which he has of going to his employer and saying, 'Soap or tobacco is dearer than it was last week, you must raise my wages.' His employer would answer, 'You do no more work for me now than you did last week, and that work is not considered now more valuable by the community, and out of what fund then am I to raise your wages, who am myself a sufferer by this very tax of which you complain.' The consumers of the commodity produced by the labourer would not be disposed to give more for it than before; on the contrary, as their income too is reduced by having to pay more for the taxed article, they will be likely to diminish their consumption of other things. In truth, the reasoning I am opposing supposes that there is a minimum of wages, and that wages are actually at that minimum, and that if this were reduced lower the labouring population would actually die off, and that by the diminution of their numbers, wages would rise."

We shall again return to these lectures; but in the meantime we earnestly recommend them to the attention of all who wish to comprehend the great principles which are in issue, and the great interests which are at stake, in the present struggle to deliver British industry from the fetters of monopoly.

Walks in South Lancashire and on its Borders. By Samuel Bamford. Published by the Author.

Bamford's name is already favourably known to the readers of the LEAGUE as a poet, and as a sound thinker, and keen observer of the social influences of British industry and its present scale of remuneration. We gladly meet him again chronicling the condition and the feelings of the operative class, viewing external nature with all the enthusiasm of a poet, examining the condition of his fellows with all the sympathy of a philanthropist; and tracing the probable results of such conditions of existence with all the energy of a philosopher. As we have only the first number of his new work before us, we shall not enter into any critical discussion of its merits, but merely give a few extracts which will, we are assured, not only gratify our readers, but also afford them materials for pleasing meditation and useful reflection. We shall first take a graphic sketch of that locality which is the principal seat of the cotton manufacture.

"What a naturally fine country is this south Lancashire! and what an interesting people inhabit it! let us approach nearer, as it were; let us cast an observant eye over the land; let us note the actions, and listen to the conversation of the people, and endeavour to express in writing our impressions as to both the country and its inhabitants."

"From Liverpool to Manchester the land is generally level, and is almost wholly applied to agriculture; but in traversing the country from Manchester to Todmorden, which is on the extreme northern verge of the district, probably not one mile of continuously level ground will be passed over. Betwixt Bury on the western, and Oldham on the eastern verge, some comparatively level tracts are found, as those of Radcliffe, Whitmos, and Falsworth; but they are small as compared with the distance, and all the remaining parts of this northern district are composed of ups and downs, hillocks, and dells, bent, twisted, and turned in every direction. Take a sheet of stiffened paper for instance, crumple it up in your hand, then just distend it again, and you will have a pretty fair specimen of the surface of the northern part of South Lancashire. The hills are chiefly masses of valuable stone and coal; on the north some heathlands overlap them, but their sides are often brilliant with a herbage that yields the best of milk and butter, whilst of all the valleys you shall traverse none where a stream of water does not run at your side, babbling all manner of imaginary tidings, and asking unthought of and unanswerable questions. To be sure, during six days out of the seven, the brooks and lowland waters are often turbid and discoloured with the refuse of manufactures; but, steal along one of these quiet dells on a Sunday morning, go over the shallows where the loaches used to lie basking, and look into the deeps, and quiet pools, and shady spots, where the trout were wont to be found, creep under the owers, and through the hazels, when their golden blossoms are hung in the sun; go plashing among the willows, and over the hippin-stones, and along the gravel-beds, where the pebbles lie as white as hail turned to stone. Go mauling, solitary and thoughtful, for an hour or two amid these lonely haunts, and you shall confess that our country is not rest of all its poetry, and its fairy dells, and its witching scenes."

"Then, the meadows and fields spread fair and green betwixt the towns. Clean, sleek milk-kine are there, licking up the white clover and tender grass. Small farms are indicated by the many well-built and close-roofed homesteads, contiguous to which are patches of potatoes, corn, and winter food for cattle. A farmer's man is never met with here whose cheek does not show that he lives far above want, and that, if he dines not on delicacies, he feeds on rude plenty."

"The smoke of the towns and manufactories is somewhat annoying certainly, and at times it detracts considerably from the ideal of the landscape; but, bad as it is, it might have been a great deal worse, for we may observe that the smoke only goes one way at one time; that the winds do not divide and scatter it over all the land; it sails far away in streams towards the north, east, west, or south, and all the remainder of sky, and hill, and vale, are pure and cloudless.

"From the top of one of the moor-edges, Old Birkle, for instance, on a clear day, with the wind from the south-west, we may perceive that the spaces betwixt the large towns of Bury, Bolton, Manchester, Stockport, Ashton, Oldham, Rochdale, Middleton, and Heywood, are dotted with villages, and groups of dwellings, and white detached houses and manufactories, presenting an appearance somewhat like that of a vast city scattered amongst meads and pastures, and belts of woodland; over which, at times, volumes of black furnace clouds go trailing their long wreaths on the wind."

Bamford is justly proud of the class to which he belongs, and omits no opportunity of bearing testimony to the high character of the Lancashire operatives, a class of men with whom the rest of their countrymen are far too slightly acquainted.

"What shall I say of the working class?"

"That they are the most intelligent of any in the island—in the world. The Scotch workers are the only ones who approach them in intelligence; they are the greatest readers; can show the greatest number of good writers; the greatest number of sensible and considerate public speakers. They can show a greater number of botanists, a greater number of horticulturists, a greater number who are acquainted with the abstruse sciences, the greatest number of poets, and a greater number of good musicians, whether choral or instrumental. From the loom they will bring out anything that has ever been worked in Europe; in mechanics they are nowhere surpassed, and in mining take rank with the best. They probably turn out a greater amount of work than any other equal number of people under the sun. They are ardent in temperament, which helps them to support their heavy labour, but which also tends to lead them into ill-considered schemes and projects, and into the traps and snares of designing political quacks. Being of honest intention themselves, they have seldom paused to examine the pretensions of those who sought to become their leaders, hence they have been miserably duped. The late Henry Hunt was the first who obtained their blind devotion; some of his distinguished followers also shared his popularity, but of those, Hunt, as is well known, was jealous, and if any copatriot received more attention than the leader liked to spare, he kicked the aspirant, or tried to do so, and there was a feud; his own train, however, at last dwindled into something more like a country stang-riding than a gathering of Radicals."

"After him followed successive contentions about wages. Combinations, conspiracies, and turn-outs, came in their turn, and some of them were stained with blood. Each event had its leader, who, for the time, occupied a share of the public notice. Then came the three glorious days, and Parliamentary Reform, and when O'Connell deemed it needful to whisk off a joint or two from his tail, he did so, and Mr. Feargus O'Connor appeared on our stage. He has tried to enact the English Hunt and the Irish O'Connell over again before us, and he has failed in both characters, not having the nerve of the one, nor a tithe of the talent of either. Latterly, he has been holding forth about the purchase of land by a class who cannot entirely purchase bread; just at present, I understand, he is experimenting amongst the colliers; and thus the miserable deluder is hastening through life to find himself at last deluded."

We quote a passage in which there is much truth, though it is rather harshly expressed:—

"But, the Christianity of our days is, I fear, too etherealized, too intangible for the requirements of mankind. We may climb to the top of Mont Blanc, but we cannot remain there, you know: the air is too attenuated for our bodily life; we must have something of more substance to breathe, or we die. Even so is our modern Christianity: it is far too high-flighted for our common comprehensions; it is so fine-spun that we can't lay hold of it, and feel it, and appropriate it, and keep it, and love it: it escapes us, whether we will or no. The body of our Christianity—if I may be allowed the expression—is so slim and unsubstantial, that the soul dies in it, for the want of earthly, as well as heavenly warmth: it is all faith! faith! faith! our ministers forgetting, or nearly so, that faith without works is dead: forgetting that, 'it is not he that saith, Lord! Lord! but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven;' forgetting, that of faith, hope, and charity—the greatest is charity: forgetting that Dives—whatever faith he had—was damned for his want of works; forgetting that the first thing Christ prayed for, was bread; and that the last thing he blessed on earth was that same essential body sustainer, and soul comforter."

There is a tale commenced in this number which displays considerable power, so far as it has gone; and when we receive the continuation we shall take an early opportunity of bringing it under the consideration of our readers.

THE DEEDS OF MARLBOROUGH.

A few days ago there was an election at Woodstock, the Duke of Marlborough's borough. The duke's son was of course returned, vice Mr. Thesiger, refused by his grace. Mr. Humfrey, who appeared to oppose the Marquis of Blandford, addressed the people, detailing to them the deeds of the duke. We carefully extract such doings from the lengthened oration, that at one view the reader may observe the amount of debt due by the people of Woodstock to the worthy Duke of Marlborough. Yes, we give the duke's bill:—

To turning away Mr. SMALLBONES, farmer; the said SMALLBONES having, in his better days, lent money to the Dukes of Marlborough when they knew not where to get a shilling.

To raising the rent of 140 families, who paid 30s. per annum for cottages, but were suddenly charged from 60s. to 80s., and turned out on refusing my terms.

To prosecuting a man named HARRIS, who watered his horse illegally, at a pond in Woodstock. The said HARRIS was summoned for pound-breach; fined 1s., with 19s. 6d. expenses. He was sent to goal; when there, his goods were taken in execution; and he is now working on the roads (doubtless thinking of the virtue of the Dukes of MARLBOROUGH).

To the prosecution of a man named WILKES, who found a piece of "buck's-horn" (value 8d.) in Blenheim-park, and was fined in 7s. 6d. costs.

To the prosecution of a man named BARTLETT, who on the public road picked up and took away with him a rabbit half eaten by a weasel. BARTLETT was fined 15s.; in default of payment was sentenced to 14 days' solitary confinement; he had just recovered from the cholera.

To stopping a pension of 10s. a week to a man named GRAHAM, of 90 years' old—a pensioner on my father and grandfather.

To the prosecution of Mr. JARDINE, tradesman, of Woodstock, who, his wife suffering from severe illness, took her into Blenheim-park in a garden chair. "She complained of being shaken, by being drawn over the gravel." Her husband drew her on the grass, when a fine of one farthing was inflicted, with costs, upon her husband, the offender.

To the nailing up of a gate which led from certain almshouses—endowed by a former DUCHESS of MARLBOROUGH—to Woodstock-park, allowing the old almshouse entry into the said park.

And finally, to refusing to pay a man named CASTLES for the coffin of my father, because I did not order it,—my father, notwithstanding, being buried in the same coffin.

Such is the DUKE of MARLBOROUGH's bill—such his claims upon the respect and affections of the country at large, and of the people of Woodstock in particular. The bill has been harshly criticised. Now, we defend it throughout.

As to the DUKE's treatment of Mr. SMALLBONES, that, in a common man, would be an act of vulgar ingratitude, mere plebeian thanklessness: in his grace, it can be nothing more than aristocratic eccentricity—a bit of wayward humour, in no way implicating the goodness of the dual heart.

And then for raising the rent of 140 pauper families; why, the DUKE, in his palace of Blenheim, knows the comforts of a roof, and very properly lays the highest price upon the accommodation.

As for the man HARRIS, what business had he to trespass on the DUKE's water, when sure we are that the DUKE has proved a full right to the horsepond all to himself?

Again, if a man is to be pardoned for carrying away a bit of "buck's-horn," because it is worth only three-pence, is the DUKE himself safe? The bit of "buck's-horn" may be thought by vulgar people to have no value whatever; but no man better than the DUKE knows how to prize a thing which all the world beside deems utterly worthless.

In the next case, one BARTLETT carries away a half-eaten rabbit, theavings of a weasel. Now, there is but little doubt that the defrauded weasel intended to return to its repast. The DUKE knew this, and, by fining BARTLETT, only showed an acute sympathy for the vermin that cumber the land.

As for stopping the weekly pension to a pauper of ninety, the DUKE did perfectly right. The natural life of man is fourscore, and GRAHAM had outraged human nature—the DUKE is a good judge of the offence—full ten years.

Next, Mr. JARDINE draws his sick wife on the soft grass of Blenheim Park, and is fined a farthing, with expenses, for the inquiry. The DUKE, by such charge, shows his delicate value of green provender; no wrothier judge of grass since NEBUCHADNEZZAR!

Again, the DUKE nails up a door, shutting out old women from Woodstock Park. Very proper. What has poverty to do with the sun, the sky, and the fresh breath of heaven? Its only right to the earth is to be found some three or four feet under it.

The DUKE refuses to pay for the coffin of his father. Now, this refusal must arise from some misapprehension of His GRACE, who, we fear, is not sufficiently impressed with the benevolent intentions of his neighbours. What! DUKE of MARLBOROUGH! refuse to pay for the coffin of your deceased sire? Nay, pull out your purse—discharge the bill. For who, when fate shall call you from this vale of tears,—who, we ask, would for a moment regret to pay the like account for you?—Punch.

LABOUR THE ONLY SOURCE OF WEALTH.—It is to labour that man owes everything possessed of exchangeable value. Labour is the talisman that has raised him from the condition of the savage—that has changed the desert and the forest into cultivated fields—that has covered the earth with cities, and the ocean with ships—that has given us plenty, comfort, and elegance, instead of want, misery, and barbarism.—Encyclopædia Britannica.

THE BLESSINGS OF PROTECTION.—THE BLACK BREAD OF HAMPSHIRE.—Amongst the many claptrap absurdities put forward by the advocates of protection, it has been continually asserted at meetings of agriculturists, that a repeal of the Corn Laws would reduce our peasantry to the condition of the wretches of Poland and Russia, who, they say, are compelled to eat black rye bread. They forget to tell their gobe manché audiences that these Polish and Russian labourers eat rye bread because they like it, and that they have enough of it and to spare; whilst even, according to the statement of one of these doughty champions of monopoly, Dr. Mursham, five millions of our labouring population "rejoice" on potatoes, and would think themselves comparatively happy were they even able to procure a sufficiency of that miserable food. It may not be generally known, however, that the peasantry of the county of Hampshire do not all get wheaten bread to eat. We have now in our possession proof that there are Hampshire labourers who fare worse than Poles or Russians, although they work six times as hard. We have been supplied, by favour of a friend (who obtained it from the waggoner of a farmer residing in the parish of Hambledon), with a piece of bread, or rather of a nondescript article called by that name, said to have been prepared on that person's premises for the use of the portion of his labourers who board at the farm-house. We invite the curious to inspect this delicate morsel, which may be seen in the window of our Portsea office, 108, Queen-street. No one who has yet seen it has been able to guess at its probable composition or use. It is nearly black, and in appearance resembles a cinder more than anything else. We should imagine it to be composed nearly, if not all, of bad rye. Nothing can equal the astonishment of persons here, when told that it is bread, and designed for human food. The man from whom it was obtained was eating a part of it on Monday last for his dinner, with a small portion of coarse fat pork, and stated the bread to be quite equal to what he and his fellows were usually supplied with. We are in possession of the name of the man's employer.—Hampshire Independent.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AMERICA AND FREE TRADE.—Our farmers are weighed down by external taxation. Their powers of consumption are paralysed by the embargoes laid on the productions of their industrious time. Before they can buy at home they must sell abroad. This is a positive necessity, and when they reach it, it remains for expediency and taste, and not for imperative taxation, to decide whether they shall buy home or foreign manufactures. Nothing can be more absurd than our attempting to foster manufactures under a system which has failed in every point of view in other countries, except in the creation of class powers, which in this country would be fatal to our institutions. Nor are the social evils which it has brought on other countries to be more dreaded than their political tendencies. In the old world these evils have been partially evaded by stratagem and by means to which we cannot have recourse. There, labour is transferable from one artificial pursuit to another, and their powers defy competition, owing to the vast capital and appliances of commerce at hand; and the only embarrassment that is felt by the masses are such as arise from a sudden transition from one employment to another. But in this country, nature has dictated very different circumstances, and distinctly exhibits to the view of every rational being, the fact that our people must look mainly, if not wholly, to their lands for their prosperity, and leave the development of their manufacturing capabilities to that natural necessity which the geometrical increase of the population will produce for the introduction of the various pursuits of a more matured state of existence. Every nation must see that we must one day be a great manufacturing country, and they do also see the absurdity of taxing 16,975,115 souls, at the rate of 60 per cent. for 9-10ths of their absolute necessities of life, on the specious plea of protection for their manufactures, which, if, encouraged to the utmost extent, would involve us merely in a very precarious competition with other countries. In agriculture, America can compete with the whole world, and when we consider that this has ever been the true source of national greatness, who will question its results in this country? When we speak of American agriculture, we do not mean the mere raising of potatoes, or the cultivation of cabbages, but we are looking at the production of staples, without which the manufacturing power of Europe would be useless to the civilized world, and the great physical energies of our own country also. Of these we have seen apparent premature developments. We have heard of over production, short prices followed by long credits, and all finally ending in utter bankruptcy. This is what must attend every country that is deluded into the fallacy of crushing the many for the benefit of the few; and that the American farmers have been cruelly sacrificed to the manufacturing bugbear, nobody can deny. And so great is the fraud and imposture laid upon him, that he is sunk so far in the depths of despair that he seems to have forgotten that the remedy is in his own hands. His wants are simply a wider market and a better price for his merchandise. Can any intellectual being be so lost as to want to be told how these desiderata are to be obtained? To such a query the simple answer would be—cut the strings of fallacy which bind your hands—abolish your tariff on the industry of other countries, and thus stimulate their powers of consumption and your own capabilities of production. Let the sixty per cent. which the sturdy farmer pays, as tribute, to the home manufacturer, in the shape of tariff taxation, be expended by the people in articles of comfort in the market, for the consumption of their cotton, corn, and sugar, and the consumers of these products will return us the tax of fifty per cent. placed on our industry—return it to us in the shape of increased consumption, higher prices, and no credits. But the tariff-mongers will say: Oh, you throw open your market to Europe to the prejudice of native industry! Poor little politicians! Who pays for the monopoly? who pays the duties? The native producer, and not the foreign consumer. We shall have no revenue unless we tax the shirts, stockings, and coats of our citizens, says another class of great men with little minds.—From the New York Republic.

The advocates of the Corn Laws seem to us to fail entirely in substantiating the fundamental position upon which all their arguments depend, that the present system works well for the agricultural interest. The agricultural interest consists of three classes: first, the agricultural labourers, forming, with their families, a population of upwards of 5,000,000; secondly, the farmers, or agricultural occupiers employing labourers, of whom there were 187,075 in Great Britain in 1831; thirdly, the landowners, of whom there are not above 200,000, including all the petty statesmen and cock-lords, of whom a large proportion are rather labourers than landed proprietors, leaving not above 30,000 or 40,000 to divide among them the great bulk of the landed rental of Great Britain, of £30,000,000 or £40,000,000 per annum. Now, the utmost that can be said of the Corn Laws is, that their operation has been beneficial for the class of landed proprietors, and to a certain very limited extent for the class of farmers. The latter position may well be denied, since there is abundant evidence to show that the farmers of England have not thriven better than other classes under the Corn Laws, and since every plentiful harvest brings with it a loud cry of agricultural distress. However, even if it were established that both farmers and landlords have been benefited by protection, the fact would still remain that nine-tenths of the population who live by the culture of the soil have been reduced from a comparatively flourishing condition when food was cheap, to that which we have had occasion in a former chapter to investigate. A system under which the bulk of the agricultural population live, without hope, without prospect of advancement, or even of providing for sickness of old age, upon weeks' wages about half the amount of what it would cost society to keep them in the prison or workhouse, has certainly little claim to be considered a protection to the agricultural interest. Already we see that agricultural wages are at a point at which any attempt at further reduction is met by incendiary fires and prebendal murder. Lower than this they cannot well go; and if the Corn Laws are to be continued under the pretext of benefiting the agricultural population, we ought in common justice to bargain that wages shall be raised. The truth is, the agricultural interest has hitherto meant the interest of those who have parliamentary influence, and can command votes at elections; the interest, in fact, of not one-hundredth part of those who live by land.—Laing's Essay on the Distress of the Country.

THE TRUCK SYSTEM.—A case recently reported of a manufacturer, at Oseott, near Wakefield, in a very small way of business, having been convicted of paying his wages in goods instead of money, has been laid hold of by some of the monopolist newspapers of the riding as a charge against the Anti-Corn-Law League! The absurdity of the charge renders it almost unnecessary for us to say anything on the subject, because our readers would at once discern the very wide difference between a great party committing a wrong, and any single individual of that party so acting; in the one case, where the whole body were concerned, their acts might fairly be charged upon them, but on the other it would be a monstrous perversion of right to fix a stigma on the whole for the fault of an individual. But how stands the fact: a weaver, named Brook, summons his employer, a Mr. Fearnside, for paying his wages in goods. The case is proved, and two Tory magistrates, displaying a good deal of feeling, inflict a penalty of ten pounds, at the same time declaring that "the bench were determined to do the same in any case which could be proved before them;" and not content with this, awarded five pounds to the informer, on the understanding that it should be expended in putting down the system. This Fearnside is, we have no doubt, in his station of life, a respectable man. But what is his station? What his connexion with the League? The evidence against him said, that on 7th Feb. he had working for him—400? or 40? No, but four workmen. Here is a great Leaguer employing four men, and also a workman himself, whose acts are to throw discredit on the great party with which, for evil purposes, it is attempted to identify him. What, then, has he to do with the Anti-Corn-Law League? Is he an elector? No. Is he a member of the committee of his district? No. Is he not, then, an agent of theirs? No. The only connexion, if there be any in the world, between the Anti-Corn-Law League and Mr. Fearnside, is that he, perhaps,—for we are unable to ascertain the fact—subscribed to its funds; but if he did subscribe, so small was the amount of his donation, that the League has not acknowledged it, except among other sundry small sums. The impudence of the attempt to injure the League by such charges as these can only be matter of amusement. Nothing could more clearly show the weakness of its opponents than their thus catching at straws. We hope the Oseott committee will persevere, and, if possible, put down the ruinous truck system in their neighbourhood; but in doing so let them not be blinded by party feelings, or allow themselves to be made the tools of political partisans. [Since writing the above, we have heard the particulars of a case in which the Messrs. Charlesworth, the great coal masters and leading members of the Yorkshire Agricultural Protection Society, have been charged before the magistrates, at Rotherham petty sessions, with similar practices. We have not heard the result, but the only defence that could be set up was that the summons ought to have been issued against their foreman instead of themselves. This was a mere technicality, but which might, in point of law, prove successful, although the act of Parliament against trucking, even by a servant, is very clear.]—Leeds Mercury.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.—Measures are to be taken for the immediate establishment of an Agricultural College in Wiltshire. [Agriculture is greatly indebted to the League for this and similar efforts for her advancement.]—Gateshead Observer.

LEGISLATION.—The powers of legislation are like a portion of divine prerogative, delegated in trust; and they ought to be wielded with a large impartiality of view, a transparent disinterestedness of purpose, a serene, passionless justice, akin to that with which Deity rules the worlds. Any the slightest admixture of personal and private aims in the discharge of this high public trust; any diversion of legislative power to ends of individual interest is a crime of first magnitude against society. It is treason to the community. It destroys the very idea of community. That is not a community in which such things are done, but a mere juxtaposition of distinct castes held artificially together by force and fear. To think of men making money for themselves under show of governing and legislating for a people! It is not legislation: it is not government; it is neither more nor less than larceny.—Harwood's Lectures.

OCCUPATIONS OF THE POPULATION OF THE COUNTY OF LANCASTER.—The returns for this county, in this branch of the census, being now completed, we proceed to lay the general results before our readers. The total population of the county, according to the census of 1841, was 1,667,054. That population is thus classified as to occupations:—

|---|-----------|--|
| Farmers and graziers | 16,691 | |
| Agricultural labourers | 30,237 | |
| Total Agriculture | 46,928 | |
| Trade, &c. occupation specified | 640,617 | |
| Ditto, not specified | 9,582 | |
| Total trade, &c. | 649,629 | |
| Total employed | 696,557 | |
| Persons of independent means | 33,207 | |
| Almspeople, pensioners, paupers, and beggars | 9,310 | |
| Other persons, not described | 4,943 | |
| Residue of population, including women and children | 923,005 | |
| Total population of the county | 1,667,054 | |

The decimal proportions may be stated as follows:—

| | |
|---------------------|--------------|
| Trade, &c. | 39 per cent. |
| Agriculture | 28 " |
| Independent | 2 " |
| Residue | 36 2 " |

It is a fact worthy of notice, that the proportion of the population employed is greater in Lancashire than in any other county of England. There is nearly 41.7 per cent. of the whole population of this county employed, and it may well deserve the epithet so often applied to it, of "the hive of industry." It will be seen that the proportions differ very considerably from those in the 27 counties referred to in an article in our number of Wednesday week. The average proportions of those counties were—trade, &c., 28.50 per cent.; agriculture, 8 per cent.; independent, 3.14; residue, 60.36. So that upwards of 10 per cent. more of the population of Lancashire is engaged in trade, &c., than in the average of the 27 counties. This is the more important when it is borne in mind that the population of the single county of Lancaster is more than one-fifth of the aggregate population of the 27 counties. We shall resume this subject in an early number.—Manchester Guardian.

WEEKLY COST OF PROTECTION TO SUGAR AND WHEAT.

(From the Economist of the 27th ult.)

SUGAR.—Since last week the relative prices of Porto Rico and Jamaica Muscovado sugars have continued exactly the same; and therefore the difference of the cost of our weekly consumption of 77,792 cwt., above what the same would be on the Continent, and paying the same amount of duty to the State that our colonial sugar does, amounts to £70,003 for the whole country, and to £5833 for the Metropolis alone, to be added to the respective balances of last week.

WHEAT.—The price of English wheat is a shade lower this week; but that of foreign wheat is also somewhat cheaper, and the difference is not changed.

It follows, therefore, that the difference of the cost of bread consumed during the last week, compared with what the same would cost on the Continent, has been £289,460 more for the whole country, and £24,038 for the Metropolis, to be added to the respective balances of last week. The account will now stand thus:—

FOR THE WHOLE KINGDOM.

|---------------------------------------|------------|
| Balance from last week | £5,735,409 |
| Extra cost of sugar this week | 70,003 |
| Ditto of bread | 288,460 |

Total extra cost from January 1st to this day £6,093,872*

FOR THE METROPOLIS ALONE.

|---------------------------------------|----------|
| Balance from last week | £977,945 |
| Extra cost of sugar this week | 5,833 |
| Ditto of bread | 24,038 |

Total extra cost from January 1st to this day £1,007,816

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, April 29.—With a fair supply of English Wheat we have had a slow trade for all descriptions of English and Foreign at the prices of this day week. Several cargoes of Foreign Barley arrived since Friday; the supply of English was small, the prices of this day week were well maintained for all descriptions. Beans were 1s. dearer, the supply being short. Peas the same as last week. There was a moderate supply of Oats from Ireland, and short from Scotland and coastways; last week's prices were firmly supported, and in some instances a little advance was obtained.

FRIDAY, MAY 3.—There is very little English Wheat offering to-day. The little business doing is at Monday's rates. There is a fair retail demand for foreign at former rates. The supplies of Barley from abroad are large, but there is scarcely any English. Monday's prices are firmly maintained. There is more inquiry for Beans for the country; and the supply continuing small, rather higher prices are obtained. Peas are firm at Monday's rates. We are very moderately supplied with Irish Oats; and the arrivals from Scotland and coastways are very scanty. There is a steady sale, at rather better prices than Monday. There was no alteration in the duties yesterday.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 33.]

SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1844.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive a copy, weekly, of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND, are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council respectfully request that their friends, in all places where committees for raising subscriptions to the £100,000 Fund have not been already formed, will proceed to their formation as soon as possible, and transmit their names to the LEAGUE Offices, Manchester.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

THE COMING ELECTION.

ADDRESS OF THE COUNCIL OF THE NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE TO THE ELECTORS OF SOUTH LANCASHIRE.

"Free Trade is of no Party, but for the Equal Good of all Parties."

GENTLEMEN,—A vacancy has most unexpectedly occurred in the representation of this important division. We feel it incumbent upon us to address you on this deeply momentous occasion, when your voice is to be given either for or against the great commercial and manufacturing interests of this county, and of our country at large.

For several years the attention of the public has been turned to a consideration of the question of Free Trade, with an extending belief that on its solution depend the security and prosperity of our national interests. In this county especially has the principle of monopoly been repudiated, and that of perfect freedom of industry recognised as the only safe basis of legislation. It is to the electors of the most important division of this county that we now appeal. The monopolists ask your support, to enable them, by law, to make certain articles of common and extensive consumption dearer than they would be if not interfered with by the law; for example, they would maintain a Corn Law, so that, when we have deficient harvests in this country, we are shut out from supplying ourselves from abroad, except at most extravagant prices, under which vast multitudes of the poorest of our population suffer grievous privations; they would maintain monopolies also in the articles of sugar and coffee, by which prices are raised about one-third, and a large portion of the people are cut off from their fair and natural supply. It is not, however, in the increase of price that the most destructive features of these monopolies are seen, but in their operation upon trade—in their limiting trade; in their shutting some foreign markets against us, and injuring all; in their direct results in diminishing the demand for labour, and reducing at once the profits of capital and the wages of the workman.

Lancashire is the great home of the manufacturing industry of Great Britain; it is in this county that its greatest triumphs have been gained; it is here that the struggle for its emancipation must be manfully carried on. We offer you a principle and a policy the very opposite to that on which monopolies are based. Free Trade is recommended to you, not as a system by which particular interests will prosper at the expense of other interests, but as a system by which all industry, and skill, and capital are left free to find their own channels of employment and reward, without the mischievous intervention of laws passed to keep down one class that another may rise upon its ruin. Free Trade in all things, and especially in articles of food, would be to us more trade, more employment, more wages, more revenue, without increase of taxation; less of poor-rates, without hardship to the poor; more of social harmony, and more of security to all than are even possible under a policy of restriction, which all experience condemns as absurd in principle, and most unjust and mischievous in practice.

But we do not deem it needful in this brief address to enter at length into the arguments on behalf of Free Trade. We are convinced that a very large majority of you agree with the opinion we have formed on that question, and that the voice of each individual elector be taken un-influenced by other motives, there would be a decision all but unanimous in its favour. What are these other motives? Among these, perhaps, the strongest is the adherence to party ties and party leaders. We have long ago abandoned party names and party warfare; they are for the most part a delusion, and serve only to lead the people away from the substantial, to pursue, at best, an imaginary good. Free Trade is strictly of no party, and yet of all parties; it is a beneficent and just principle offered to all, promising good to all, without the sacrifice of any, and may be espoused by the intelligent and the honest of every party.

This election has come upon us wholly without warning; but it does not find us unprepared. The seed has been sown widely, almost universally, in this county; it has sprung up, and gives promise of fruit in minds which heretofore have viewed each other with hostile feelings. The past is gone: let us avoid its jealousies; let us forget its errors, except to shun them. A season of terrible distress has visited us since our last exercise of the electoral franchise. We have seen trade prostrated, capitalists ruined, farmers and shopkeepers sinking, multitudes of honest artisans of every kind beggared, the hives of industry a scene of threatened tumult and danger, and every man asking of his neighbour, "What is the cause of these calamities?" And the future is before us, less clouded for the moment, but promising greater perils, if our course be marked by no greater wisdom than the past.

ELECTORS! we ask you to think on these things. Government can only be what you make it. It is a being of your own creation. Send honest and enlightened men to Parliament, and you will have a Parliament that will pursue an honest and enlightened policy. Be no longer the sport of party names; they can never save you. Be united, as a great commercial and industrious, and intelligent community, and your free voice, given at this election, shall go far to determine the duration of that system under which your country has suffered, and is still suffering, such heavy misfortunes.

In conclusion, we implore you at this election to weigh well the principles of the candidates who offer themselves for your suffrages, and to vote only for the man whose votes in Parliament will be given in favour of the abolition of all monopolies, and for the full adoption of the great and just principles of FREE TRADE WITH ALL THE WORLD.

By order of the Council,

GEORGE WILSON, Chairman.

Manchester, May 7, 1844.

In the foregoing address the Council of the League faithfully adheres to the course hitherto pursued, not only of avoiding the remotest semblance of dictation, but of abstaining from direct and specific recommendation to the electors in the choice of a candidate. It simply offers friendly and earnest co-operation for any electoral struggle on behalf of its own great object of Free Trade. The charge of interference may be made now as it has been made before; but the shadow of foundation for any such charge is effectually precluded. The action of the League is not directed towards the elevation of persons or parties, but the legislative triumph of a principle.

It would be a neglect of duty in the Council not to appeal to the electors of South Lancashire on this occasion. The League is native born to the district. Its founders, its most active leaders, and its earliest members are mixed up with the electoral body by the various relations of neighbourhood and business or social intercourse. They cannot be called "strangers." The taunt often repeated during the London election, "persons whose homes are in Lancashire," becomes, in this instance, not an objection, but a recommendation. Instead of pointing a sarcasm, it indicates a right, and should bespeak a kindly hearing. It is the League at home. The oneness of locality may, perhaps, render more apparent than at a distance the identity of interest. The anomaly would be a strange one for the cause which has been successfully pleaded in London, to be nonsuited in Lancashire.

Free-Traders throughout the district are requested to weigh well the importance of their conduct in this crisis. The worth of particular elections is not so much at present in the numerical strength they bestow as in the moral influence they exercise. No contest which has yet occurred, unless that in the metropolis be an exception, can in the slightest degree approach to the interest which the public mind will feel in the South Lancashire election. It is related to counties as that of London was to towns and cities. The result will be a verdict on the Free-Trade question from a jury, towards whose deliberations and decision the whole country will look with lively concern. The return of a Free-Trade candidate will scatter dismay and panic through the hosts of Monopoly. It is a prize worth the utmost efforts that can be honourably made. "Up to your duty," all who can contribute towards a result so brilliant and decisive.

Remember you are a county, the first contested county, in this great struggle. You have had better means than any other county electors in the kingdom for a sound judgment on its merits. How the prosperity or the depression of trade and manufactures affects your agricultural interests is to you matter of experience and observation. You can tell much better than speculative men in their seclusion, or the partisan writers of a hireling press, whether it would be a real good for agriculture, or for anything else, that Manchester and Liverpool should be desolate, and have to be sought for in the map as the petty villages from which manufacturing enterprise has raised them to their present wealth and magnitude. Better than the landlords of the southern counties can you tell whether your industrious neighbours are customers worth having—customers in whose thriving you have an immediate interest; as, in the injury and ruin wherewith Monopoly threatens them, you would suffer with a severity for which no misnamed "Protection" could possibly compensate. Your position is midway between such constituencies as that of the metropolis and those of what are called the purely agricultural counties. You are on a commanding eminence, to which both classes will look; and as your decision on behalf of Free Trade will confirm that of the one, it will stimulate the other to the acquirement of better information, and the conquest of cherished prejudice. All eyes are on you. Be truthful, vigorous, and—triumphant!

With you, first, the question is thoroughly isolated from party. The proffered co-operation of the League comes to you entirely irrespective of the distinction of Whig and Tory. The Council deem it an advantage that they have had the opportunity of volunteering the best aid they can render before you have made choice of a candidate. A trustworthy Free-Trader is all they ask. His party is nothing to them, nor, in their apprehension, to you or to the country. However that may be, they leave it to those who still feel an interest in worn-out lines of political demarcation, only desiring its paramount place for the one great practical question of the day. That question they will not compromise, and they trust that in future no constituency will compromise it for the sake of any party predilections or antipathies whatever. A Tory Free-Trader is as welcome as a Whig; a Whig Monopolist as objectionable as a Tory. "Give us Free Trade" is what we ask of the Legislature, collectively and individually. The party which will do that is our party; the leaders who will conduct to that are our leaders. We have no side aims, concealed purposes, or ulterior objects. Free Trade is first and last of what we seek; and you, men of South Lancashire, may render most essential services towards its attainment.

This is no request for you to become martyrs in your own interests; though it may and does imply in you the energy of heroism, and that moral courage which leads the way in a new path of wise and beneficent policy. Free Trade is the interest of all classes. It is the national want. In all the variety of your occupations and connexions, we believe the unrestricted interchange of commodities will prove a benefit. Amongst you, more than in most other districts, are the pursuits of agriculture and manufacture followed contiguously. You represent the blended interests of the community. There is consequently more of genuine sympathy and less of that factitious jealousy which has been elsewhere cherished. The senseless charge of either of the great industrial classes seeking the ruin of the other, will find no credence in your neighbourhoods. You know better. Should the calumny be repeated, that the League desires the destruction of agriculture, you will silence it with the scorn it merits. With fair play and a secure holding, your farmers know that they are able, side by side with your manufacturers, to defy the world's competition. It is for yourselves, then, that you will struggle; for yourselves and your country; for the cause and rights of honest industry all the world over.

The speech of Mr. Villiers at the recent meeting of the League in London well described the effect of the metropolitan election on remote nations. Everywhere it animated the friends of Free Trade, and inspired the expectation of the general adoption of a more just and generous policy. In the interval, that effect may have cooled and subsided; you will revive it with tenfold power. The return of a Free-Trade candidate for South Lancashire will mark progress. It will show the onward march of our principles, and be hailed in all countries as the brightest omen of coming success. Strive for it, then, with cordial union, regardless of class or party. It is an object too good and great to be sacrificed either for fear or favour. Be united, and it is within your grasp. It only requires, in the old and homely, but expressive phrase, "A long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together!"

EXETER ELECTION.

The following case of oppression and intimidation will provoke an indignant comment from every right-minded reader which we need not anticipate. We shall keep a careful record of all such cases brought to our notice, and take care to expose the petty tyranny of those "Tritons of the minnows" who can mimic nothing of aristocracy but its tyranny, and who can ape fashion in nothing but oppression. Such persons are too contemptible to be hated, but unfortunately they are also too mischievous to be utterly despised.

Mr. Chas. Snowdon's statement, taken by C. Richards, solicitor, 8, Bedford-circus, Exeter, May 2, 1844.

Mr. S. stated that on Saturday, the 20th of April, he was in the employ of Messrs. Hayman, coach-builders, Exeter. Mr. Snowdon served his apprenticeship of seven years with Messrs. H., and has worked at different periods altogether, since, one year and five months in the saddlery and harness department, without the slightest complaint ever having been made against him. On the 20th of April last Mr. Wm. Tancock, the foreman over the saddlery department, called Snowdon into the front saddlers' shop, and asked him if he had promised his vote, to which he replied, "I have." Tancock then said, "Do you intend to vote?" Snowdon said, "I do." Tancock then said, "Shan't you change your mind?" Snowdon said, "I shall not—I see no occasion for it." Tancock said, "I am very sorry for it, Mr. Hayman thinks it is sadly against his interest, and, if you intend to vote that way on Monday morning, you must leave to-night." Snowdon said, "As that is the case I certainly shall vote." Wm. Ballwinson and Edward Rowe (an apprentice), neither of whom are voters, were present in the shop and heard the foregoing conversation. Mr. Snowdon went to work on Monday morning, 22nd of April, as usual (the day of election), and saw Tancock, who again said, "Messrs. Hayman will not keep any one who votes that way;" and Snowdon said, "I shall vote." Tancock then paid Snowdon his wages and discharged him.

Snowdon has been out of employment ever since, and is not now in prospect of any work, but would not like to leave Exeter if it could be so arranged.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1844.

Thirteenth Week, ending Saturday, May 11.

Last week we had the pleasing satisfaction of exhibiting Mr. Goulburn, in his official capacity, as an embryo or novitiate FREE-TRADER, and demonstrating to the House of Commons and the country, that the beneficial results of the partial Free-Trade experiment in the new tariff were so unequivocally displayed at the Custom-house and in the Exchequer as to justify further progress in the same direction. This week we have the additional pleasure of seeing Sir Robert Peel acting as the NATIONAL LECTURER on Economical Science; and conveying to the whole country recondite matters in a popular form, rendering that intelligible to the meanest capacity, from which, but a few years ago, even very clever men shrunk, in despair of being able to comprehend.

For all who are familiar with the FREE-TRADE agitation cannot but recollect how "CORN and CURRENCY" were regarded as linked together by a bond far more mysterious and inscrutable than that by which the Siamese twins were knit. Talk to people about "Corn," and they would shake their heads, and say, "Ah, true, but then there's the Currency!" Reverse the matter, and talk about "Currency," and they would again shake their heads and reply, "Yes, but there's the action of the Currency on Corn!" Within these two awful words, Corn and Currency, there appeared to lie an impenetrable mystery, which baffled even the acutest intellects. This was the great difficulty which beset the Anti-Corn-Law League in the outset of its career. People would have it that the subject was mysterious and beyond their comprehension; and it was only by iteration and reiteration—by "line upon line, and precept upon precept"—that the imaginary difficulties disappeared, that the clouds of fancy rolled away, that foolish fallacies were dissipated, and fraudulent arguments shattered to pieces, and the simple truth about corn stood revealed in all its easily comprehended simplicity. And now we have the aid of Sir Robert Peel to do a similar thing for currency. His speech, delivered by him with all the weight of his station as head of the Government, will do much to unravel the tangled skein in the national mind. It is now beginning to be clearly understood that the only cause of the near relationship of corn with currency is the simple fact, that corn is the main article of subsistence; and therefore the thing with which we buy, and the article of which we buy the most, must have a greater affinity than any other. Were it not for this greater necessity, this greater consumption, we might just as well talk of "Currency and Sugar," or "Currency and Tea," or "Currency and Hats," as of "Currency and Corn."

The speech of Sir Robert Peel, on Monday night last, occupied (calculated by a critic's stop-watch) exactly three hours in delivery; for he rose at ten minutes past five, and sat down at ten minutes past eight o'clock. During all this time the House was full; and, with the exception of a few whose stomachs always get uneasy at the hour of dinner, which is recognised as seven o'clock, there was no weariness, no inattention. In truth the speech, as a work of art, was an admirable one. A very clever reporter, who was taking notes of it, said to the writer, "This is like reporting mathematics!" meaning thereby that there was such a continuity both of style and argument, that not a sentence could be omitted without spoiling the sequence. It was not a profound speech; it was a practical one: for Sir Robert Peel expressly declared that he would avoid all subtleties, refinements, and acute puzzles, and deal in a common-sense way with the matter in hand. As a statesman, with a practical measure before him, he evinced in this skill and sagacity. For it is all very well for your MILLS and your TOOKES—clever men, undoubtedly—to sit in their closets, and try, with their piercing eyes, not only to reach the verge of the horizon, but even to see over it; but a Minister of the State, making a great change, has conflicting interests to reconcile, vested interests to conciliate, and passions to soothe, otherwise his measure will be overthrown. It was Burke who remarked, "A statesman differs from a professor in a university: the latter has only the general view of society; the former, the statesman, has a number of circumstances to combine with those general ideas, and to take into his consideration. Circumstances are infinite, are infinitely combined; are variable and transient; he who does not take them into consideration is not erroneous, but stark mad—metaphysically mad. A statesman, never losing sight of principles, is to be guided by circumstances; and, judging contrary to the exigencies of the moment, he may ruin his country for ever."

Gold, as it has been received from the earliest, so is it likely to be acknowledged till the latest period, as the great and universal medium of exchange amongst civilized men. Whatever aid may be derived from the junction of silver, or the assistance of copper or other metals, gold must still retain its place as the sovereign of metals, the monarch of money, the universal standard, to which all nations must bring their transactions, and regulate by it their commercial intercourse. Gold, therefore, must be a prime article of import and export in all countries with a particle of foreign trade; its value will rise and fall, like the value of other articles, according to the rate of supply and demand; but wherever intercourse is free, that value will remain tolerably steady, because those who make profit by the merchandise of bullion are ever on the watch to restore the balance by export or import.

But paper money is a modern creation, whose uses have hitherto blinded us to its abuses; a power which we can instantly summon to our presence and service, but, like the novice with the enchanter's book, have hitherto shown how little able we are to control. Paper money, unlike gold, has scarcely any intrinsic value; it can be promptly and cheaply manufactured; and it has conveniences which render its use essential in the services of mercantile life. Its value is based on FAITH; its use is derived from "suspicion asleep;" and hitherto all experience has shown that we can in no manner sustain its credit, or prevent it from doing mischief, except by effectually controlling its issue, and securing its prompt convertibility into CASH. For a "bank note" is a PROMISE TO PAY, taken on the faith that the man or men who has or who have put it out, have lands, goods, ships, gold, or valuable securities with which to redeem their credit. These notes are exchanged, like gold, for labour, materials, or pleasurable enjoyment; they pass from hand to hand as payment for an equivalent in bread, meat, liquors, or other valuable considerations; but the last hand into which they come must also have the power to reconvert the "promise to pay" into cash, or else the bank note loses its value, and a practical fraud has been committed.

There are a number of people who think that the trade in bank notes should be as free as the trade in anything else; and that no more danger will arise from a free manufacture of paper money, resting on mutual credit and confidence, than from the free manufacture of any other article. But experience tells against this opinion; and within the last half century three nations have felt, in tremendous force, the evils arising from the abuse of paper money. These nations are France, Britain, and the United States: France, during the first revolution, when the over issue of the state paper money, called assignats, caused fearful havoc; Britain, during the war, when the Bank Restriction Act, though giving, in the first instance, an unnatural expansion of trade, and a fictitious prosperity, entailed evils on us under which we are suffering at the present moment; and the United States at different periods, but especially within the last eight or nine years. Their experience ought to sink deep into every commercial nation the lesson which has been taught through so much suffering—a lesson which proclaims emphatically that, though paper money may be, like fire, a necessary agent and a useful servant, it is also, like fire, a terrible master,—as a river carefully held within embankments, it may serve as a convenient medium of transit, but when it rises as a flood, it sweeps everything valuable away exposed to its resistless fury.

In order fully to understand Sir Robert Peel's speech, we must bear in mind that he is the author of the bill of 1819, by which the Bank of England was compelled to return to cash payments; and in his speech of that year, so far back as twenty-four years ago, he uttered precisely similar sentiments, the only difference being that the opinions of 1819 appear more matured, if not more decided, than in 1819. The act of 1819 was a measure essentially required by every consideration of public duty, and by the dictates of common sense, as well as of common safety. It ought, indeed, to have been accompanied with a measure of FREE TRADE; and freedom of industry, resting on a currency secured from unnatural expansion and contraction, would have spared us nearly all the commercial evils we have since endured.

With these introductory remarks we may proceed to give as brief a summary as possible of the speech of Monday last. The first portion of it was occupied in enunciating those "elementary principles" on which Sir Robert Peel considered the whole of this important subject to rest, and the statement of which, on great occasions, was useful, in recalling to the public mind the true nature of the basis of a system involving every transaction of which money forms a part. In 1833 the charter of the Bank of England was renewed, and continued till 1853, with the proviso that at the end of the first ten years, Parliament might interfere, on a six months' notice, to be given through the medium of the Speaker. That period expires in August next, and the Government, availing itself of that opportunity, now came forward, in the discharge of a great public duty. He asked for no decision that night; he would merely move his resolutions pro forma, and leave the matter to the calm consideration of the House and the country, satisfied that this great question would not be prejudiced by party predictions or hasty conclusions. The first principle he laid down, was the importance of being agreed as to what constitutes the measure of value, and what the standard. What was the meaning of a pound sterling? Was it a mere imaginary quantity, or a definite signification? According to the ancient monetary policy of the realm, a pound meant a certain defined weight in gold, of a certain fineness, and a note representing a pound on paper must, therefore, signify a promise to pay a certain amount in the precious metals.

From the fatal period of the Bank Restriction Act, in 1797, the public mind had not been directed to the monetary controversy till 1810, when the difference between the value of paper and gold raised that great controversy on the subject, in which the names of the first Earl of Liverpool, Francis Horner, David Ricardo, and others, are noted as having announced sound views at a time when the wildest speculations were afloat. Some of these latter he quoted, and raised great laughter by the absurdity of the sentiments. One writer talked of the sense of currency as compared with commodities; another that currency was neither gold nor silver, but a something set up in public imagination; and so forth. If he were to judge from the terminable pamphlets, and even handsome octavo volumes, which now issued from the press, he must draw the conclusion that at the present day there was as little agreement on, or comprehension of, the nature of the standard of value. Producing one volume, the letters of the Birmingham "Gemini," he once more excited loud laughter, by intimating his opinion that no town but Birmingham could produce such a work, and no one man could write such an amount of nonsense as it contained; for instance, "Gemini" laughed at the idea of using the same standard of value as was in use 300 years ago, for the increase of population and property required a different one; a proposition about as reasonable as to say, that, on account of the increase of railroads, the foot measure should be increased to a foot and a half. What was the true reason why the ounce of gold was fixed at £3 17s. 10½d.? Because that was the exact relation which gold bore to silver; and it would be found that in the bullion market the relation between gold and silver was the same as it was a century and a half ago. In truth, gold and silver would defy all legislation, in order to alter their permanent value in commerce. Some argued for a double standard of gold and silver; but, with the increasing supply of gold from Russia and elsewhere, he doubted the policy of this. Bullion was a commercial article, regulated by commercial laws; it was distributed according to reasons the causes of which we could not dive into, but which enabled each country to command so much of it as its necessities required. And coin must be held to be identical with bullion, and to be subjected to the same general law. Exceptions might be taken, which we might find difficult to explain, just as Sir Isaac Newton found phenomena adverse apparently to his great theory; but these did not invalidate the general principles. In a new state of society it might be very expedient, either to erect a double standard, to abolish bank-notes altogether, or to adopt Ricardo's proposition, of paying notes in gold bars of a certain specified weight and fineness; but in our present condition the measure of value, gold, which we have had for the last century (with the exception of the period of the Bank Restriction), was the most expedient. Seeing, then, that most of the great writers on the subject were in favour of a single standard; and that in practice our standard was gold, with silver as a mere ancillary coin; he thought it the most convenient course for the public safety, as well as the most consistent course, to adhere to it. Money he would define to be "the coin of the realm;" and bank-notes to be promissory notes payable in the same coin. He would not encumber himself with the consideration whether or not deposits, checks, and bills of exchange performed the functions of money. He looked upon promissory notes payable on demand as having a wholly distinct character. They were a substitute for money, passing from hand to hand, operating on prices as money does, and performing all similar functions. Their use was to economize the use of metallic money; and if by bank-notes we dispensed with five or six millions in the precious metals, we only sent them to other countries or to other uses. It had been supposed that an issue of bank-notes did not affect the foreign exchanges; but facts had settled that long ago. A century ago the Bank of England had found that a reduction of its circulation had rectified the exchanges; and there was a remarkable Parliamentary Report, as far back as 1804, on the state of the exchange between England and Ireland, which afforded an instance, that by a reduction of the circulation of the Bank of Ireland the exchange was restored to par. The first Lord Liverpool had pointed out that it was a common artifice to confound paper credit with paper circulation. The unquestionable characteristic of paper money was its convertibility into coin at the will of the holder; and having established this, we need not be afraid of any quantity of bills of exchange. Some great writers, as Adam Smith and Ricardo, took the fact of immediate convertibility as the sufficient security of a paper circulation. But they overlooked an important consideration. Immediate convertibility was no security against excess of issue; and, therefore, no security against loss. Country bankers, holding the opinion that they had no direct control over their issues, and regulated by rise in prices, and consequent active speculation, were under the influence of a system by which they were led to increase their circulation at the very time when they ought to diminish it. Immediate convertibility, therefore, stimulated by unlimited competition and without control, was no security; of which the United States, in the derangement of its monetary concerns and the destruction of its public credit, afforded a recent and striking proof. In addition to immediate convertibility, there must be some check on or control over issue. He agreed generally with Lord Althorp, that a single bank of issue, under the control of the Government, might be rendered far more mischievous than beneficial; and, considering it true policy to work with such instruments as we have, he proceeded to state the intentions of the Government.

The Bank of England is to retain its present privileges; but there is to be a complete and distinct separation between its two departments of issue and banking, which are to be managed by different officers, and under a different system. The issue department is to be under the controlling influence of the new powers of supervision and publication which are to be conferred; the banking department is to be unrestrained, and left to free competition; the issue department is to be based on public securities to the amount of £14,000,000; and there is to be a weekly publication, full and complete, of accounts, comprising the notes in circulation, the quantity of bullion, and the extent of fluctuation. This weekly publication of accounts is a most important feature. It will entirely break up the old vicious habit of concealment which used to be carried to a most ludicrous extent. Turning to other banks, he proposes to draw a distinction between the business of issue and of banking; the one to be controlled, the other to be thrown away.

open to competition. No new bank of issue to be constituted; but existing banks of issue are to retain their privileges, though they are not to be allowed to exceed a certain rate of circulation, to be ascertained by averages of their previous issues, and are to be subjected to the weekly publication of their liabilities. Joint-stock banks are to be enabled to sue and be sued; the acts of directors are to bind the concerns, but shareholders are to be freed from the responsibilities of the law of partnership, to which they are at present exposed, of being liable for the acts of individual shareholders. At present joint-stock banks are prohibited from accepting bills under six months; they are henceforth to be placed on a perfect equality with other banks in this respect. But if the privilege be abused, by the multiplication of small bills, he gave distinct notice that he would be ready to come down to Parliament to ask for power to put a stop to the abuse. All banks of issue are also to be compelled to make a periodical publication of the names of all partners, so that the public may have opportunity of knowing from time to time who are responsible; which, with weekly publications of issues, would be a great public benefit. But he would not call for balance sheets, as these were delusive; nor set a minimum to the value of shares; nor require that existing banks should invest a portion of their paid-up capital in Government securities. But with banks to be hereafter established they were free to act as they pleased. No new joint-stock bank can be constituted without the sanction of the Government, in order to registration, with a defined form of trust deed, and a regular audit of accounts.

Returning to the Bank of England, he explained, once more, that the security for its future issues is to be £14,000,000, of which £11,000,000 is to be the debt owing to it by the Government, and the remaining £3,000,000 on Exchequer bills and other Government securities. The Bank may increase its circulation beyond the £14,000,000; but it must be with consent of three members of the Government, and all profit on that increased issue is to be transferred to the state. The legal tender clause is to be continued; the charter to run for twenty-one years, with liberty at the end of the next ten years for Parliament to interfere, on notice given, should the public mind, on experience, determine to have only one bank of issue; and though, by the new plan, the profits of the Bank on its issues will be considerably reduced, the amount paid by Government for the management of the national debt is not to be increased, a proposition with which the governor and deputy-governor have expressed, on behalf of the directors, their cordial acquiescence.

Sir R. Peel does not intend at present to meddle with the banking system of Ireland or Scotland, and will say nothing at present about "small notes," being unwilling to raise a storm about his head, or to encumber the present measure with details which may be reserved for future consideration. The only exception to this is the extension of the restriction to Ireland and Scotland of erecting new banks of issue, and subjecting future joint-stock banks to the new regulations. He concluded by referring to the past monetary crisis in this country, which his measure will tend to control and prevent, by giving steadiness to the measure of value, diminishing inducements to fraud, speculation, and gambling, and giving a healthy action to commerce.

On Monday, before the House resolved itself into committee on the Bank Charter, Lord John Russell rose, and in a few words alluded to the present critical state of the affairs of India, expressing his opinion that the transactions between the Government and the East India Company ought, without delay, to be brought under the consideration of Parliament, and he concluded by a kind of appeal to those members who had notices of motion on the paper for the following day to give way, in order that Mr. Hume might have precedence for his motion for copies of the correspondence between the Board of Directors and the Cabinet respecting the recall of Lord Ellenborough. At the House seemed to concur in the suggestion, Mr. Cobden and Lord John Manners, whose motions stood first upon the notice paper, gave way, and in consequence the motion of the hon. member for Stockport did not come on for discussion on Tuesday. Our readers will remember that this motion was for an inquiry into the effects of Protective Duties on the National Revenue.

As there is sometimes a little disappointment felt when some important motion, which appears in the papers to be fixed for a particular day, fails to come under discussion, we think it may not be amiss to explain the mode of proceeding in the House in reference to such matter. The rules preclude a member from giving more than fourteen days' notice of a motion. Formerly it was the practice to write the notices in a book which lay upon the table of the House, and, as the names were called in the order in which they were inserted, there was always a great rivalry to be first on the list. Hon. members went down to the House before prayers, and took their seats as near as possible to the table, and just as the Speaker took the chair a general scramble occurred, in which not unfrequently half-a-dozen hands were grasping the notice-book at once. These unseemly exhibitions led to a reform; and the practice now is for members to write their names on separate bits of paper, which are put in a ballot-box, and each name is called by the Speaker as it is drawn by the clerk. There are frequently a dozen and sometimes a score of notices for the same day; and if the first on the list should involve a long debate, the rest are liable to be dropped; in which case the notices must be renewed in the same way as before. It should also be added, that these notices of motions are restricted to Tuesdays and Thursdays only; Mondays and Fridays being at the disposal of the Government, and Wednesday being, by general assent, a kind of half-holiday.

HIGH PRICE OF LAND.—Since the sale by public auction, at the Mart, London, by Messrs. Harvey and George, on April 11th, of about 300 acres of valuable marsh grazing land, the property of Henry King, Esq., of East Ham, Essex, much of which realised upwards of £100 per acre, the remaining part of that gentleman's marsh land, situate in East Ham, has been sold by private contract, comprising about 200 acres freehold, and land-tax redeemed, which has realised upwards of £21,000; thus together making a total of about 500 acres of land, possessing no local advantage beyond that of grazing cattle, which has realised upwards of £50,000. The land is of first-rate quality, and most of it within six miles of Smithfield. The 200 acres have been bought by a brother of the late Lord Russell.—Special Enquirer.

MEETINGS.

GREAT MEETING AT COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

The usual weekly aggregate meeting of the members and friends of the Anti-Corn-Law League took place on Wednesday evening in Covent-garden Theatre. Henry Warburton, Esq., M.P. for Kendal, in the chair.

The doors were thrown open at seven o'clock, and in a very few minutes every seat in the spacious building was occupied. At half-past seven o'clock the Chairman, attended by several influential members of Parliament, and other supporters of the cause of Free Trade, entered the theatre amid the enthusiastic cheering of those assembled. At this time, among others on the platform, we observed the following gentlemen—(Mr. Bright, M.P. being unfortunately absent through a severe domestic affliction):—

Henry Warburton, Esq., M.P., in the chair; Hon. C. Pelham Villiers, M.P., Benjamin Smith, Esq., M.P., Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., the Lord Provost of Glasgow, John Wilson, Esq. (Dundee), Professor Lieber, Robert R. Moore, Esq., Hon. Edward P. Bouverie, Colonel Tuckett, W. A. Wilkinson, Esq., P. A. Taylor, Esq., W. S. Burton, Esq., William Hawes, Esq., William Graham, Esq., John Evans, Esq., Dr. Cooke Taylor, T. Sharwood, Esq., G. Dunn, Esq., — Chapman, Esq., J. Coulthard, Esq., C. J. Broome, Esq., T. Poulter, Esq., John Lalor, Esq., William Leaf, Esq., Major Reid R-vell, Press Granger, Esq., Rev. E. Muscutt, J. B. Scott, Esq. (Manchester), Thomas Allen, Esq., James Carke, Esq., Thomas Brown, Esq., Mr. John Gibbs (Aylesbury), R. G. Welford, Esq., William Elliott, Esq., Samuel King, Esq., W. A. Smith, Esq., Michael Seward, Esq., Samuel Watson, Esq., A. Coquihoun, Esq., J. Chambers, Esq., John Brown, Esq. (Wareham), Richard Forrest, Esq., Henry L. Keeling, Esq., Rev. Richard Fodman, Rev. H. Miram, Lawrence Rawstron, Esq. (Manchester), Henry Rawson, Esq. (Manchester), Samuel Harrison, Esq., James Brotherton, Esq., William Henry Burke, Esq., J. T. Burke, Esq. (Tottenham), Thomas Turner, Esq. (Bridgewater), H. R. Marriott, Esq., W. Thornbrough, Esq., W. Green, Esq., John Macfarlane, Esq. (Edinburgh), S. Holbein, Esq., R. O. Fuller, Esq., Robert Bagshaw, Esq., Rev. W. J. Masie (Manchester), &c.

The CHAIRMAN having advanced to the table, said:—I believe my first duty as chairman is to call upon the Secretary to read the minutes of the last meeting, which I now desire him to do.

Mr. SAUL then read the minutes of the last meeting.

The CHAIRMAN again came forward, and spoke as follows:—Gentlemen and ladies, this is the first of the meetings of the Anti-Corn-Law League assembled in this place which I have had the honour of attending. You are not to suppose from that that I am a novice in my opposition to the Corn Laws (cheers); because, if anybody has traced the progress of the opposition to the Corn Laws, he will find that ever since the year 1826, when I first entered Parliament, I never ceased in my hostility to that measure, and down to the most recent periods I have continued to give to it my unswerving opposition. (Great cheering.) As this is the first meeting at which I have had the honour of meeting the League since I was returned for the borough of Kendal (cheers), I take this opportunity of thanking the League for the sympathy which they evinced upon that occasion for my return. (Cheers.) Not that their aid was necessary, because I am happy to say that the electors of Kendal, of their own accord, entertained such strong opinions upon Free Trade, and such abhorrence of the Corn Laws, that I believe any candidate opposed to those Laws, without the aid of the League, coming forward upon Free-Trade principles would have succeeded; but, nevertheless, as they were kind enough to show their sympathy for my success, and to attend Anti-Corn-Law meetings whilst the election was proceeding, I take this opportunity of returning them in public my best thanks for their conduct upon that occasion. (Great applause.) Now, you have been so often lectured upon the history of the Corn Laws, and all their abominations, that it is rather difficult to find any new topics connected with this subject on which to address you; I will, therefore, go back to my first recollections of the subject—to the carrying of these Corn Laws in 1815. You all know the history of it (hear, hear); and I recollect the state of public opinion at the time. (Hear, hear.) The feeling at the time was, that, as the ports of the Continent by the substitution of peace for war had generally been thrown open, the price of imported corn would be much lower than it had been during the war. (Hear, hear.) The general belief of all thinking men then was that the new Corn Laws were passed in order to throw an impediment in the way of the introduction of foreign corn. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen who were charged with supporting a change of the law upon these grounds defended themselves against any such imputation; but I only speak of what I know to have been the state of public opinion at the time, not among the working classes, nor among the middle classes only, but among all thinking and reasonable men, from the lowest to the highest grades of society; not men taking part merely in an agitation, but calm philosophers, men of thought and intellect, equally with the masses participated in the abhorrence felt for the conduct of the Legislature upon that occasion. (Cheers.) I remember the whole of the agitation against the new law; and, as far as an individual in private can join in an agitation against a measure, I joined in that (cheers); and from that period down to the present time I never ceased to declare my abhorrence for that law. (Renewed cheers.) The conduct of the landlords at the period referred to reminds me of a saying attributed to a general, "Give me men, and I'll get money; and give me money, and I'll get men." (A laugh, and cheers.) So with regard to the great landed proprietors; their vast possessions give them influence over the acts of the Legislature, and they make use of that influence in the Legislature in order to add to their property. (Cheers.) The conduct of the landlords and of the general, it seems to me, is very much on a par. There were slight alterations in the law at various periods, as in 1826. At length, in the year 1840, I think it was this League arose (great cheering); first among the manufacturers in the great manufacturing district of Lancashire; and gradually it extended itself among the whole of the middle classes in every town in the empire. (Great applause.) I am very glad to find that the conduct of the League has excited an antagonist principle, and that you not only have an Anti-Corn-Law League, but that you have Protection Societies also establishing themselves among the farmers in the different agricultural districts. I am glad of it, I say, because I know that the more this subject is discussed the better for our cause: only once reduce it to argument, and there cannot be a doubt which side will triumph. (Loud and continued cheering.) We see the great landlords, who, I must say, attend these meetings in much larger numbers than the farmers, occasionally let out their real intentions; they say, "No surrender—no surrender to arguments; let us stick to our rights and privileges." (Cheers.) Well, no doubt they have the power, no doubt they are strong in the Legislature and out of the Legislature—they are strong in having numbers on their side who are sufficiently under their influence to give them a majority in the Legislature; but in spite of this, looking at the progress which the question has made, I have no doubt that ere long the result will be such as you wish it to be. (Cheers.) Why do I say so? Why, only look at the conduct of the Legislature some three years ago. There was a gentleman brought in a bill to allow bonded corn to be baked under bond and made into biscuits; a majority of the Legislature voted against that measure, which, to the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, would not have given an additional pound of bread, the object being only to bake it under bond to go abroad. Yet even so trumpery a measure as that, because it was supposed that to the extent of some few pounds the law might possibly be evaded, was supported by but a small minority. Now, when I look to what has been the effect of agitation since, when I consider that we have at least under the new Corn Law, obtained some abatement of the duties, I cannot but anticipate a great hereafter. (Loud applause.) Then look at the recent budget. It has been said that hypocrisy, by its counterfeiting virtue, pays homage to virtue (cheers); so it is with regard to these half or quarter measures that have been proposed in the budget. What are they but so many acknowledgments upon the part of those in power, that the principles which you and the League advocate are correct? (Cheers.) There's the article of wool for example. In wool, in the year 1802, there was a perfect free trade. It was imported in 1802 subject to no duty whatever. Then, I think, in the intermediate years, it was subject to increasing duties till, in the year 1819, all foreign wool imported into this country was made subject to a duty of 6d. per lb.; that is, 6d. per lb. on some of the lowest descriptions, being equivalent to a duty of 200 per cent. I don't mean to say that that was the duty on all wool, though it was on a very large quantity; on many descriptions it was equivalent to 100 per cent., and on the average of wools it was equivalent to a duty of 50 per cent. Well, that was the way in which the manufacture of wool was encouraged by the landlords at the time when peace was universally established upon the Continent, and when woollen manufactories were being established in almost every civilized country in Europe—that was the way, I say, in which the manufacture of wool was at that time encouraged in this country. (Cheers.) Two or three years afterwards, in 1825 I think, the effect of these high duties beginning to be felt, they were certainly very materially reduced. The duties imposed then were, for the best description, 1d. per lb., and upon the most inferior 3d. per lb.; still these very low duties upon the different descriptions amounted to not less than 25 per cent. Now, I am very glad to observe that, with regard to this wool, your doctrine of "total repeal" has been carried into effect. (Loud cheers.) There has been no shred or vestige of duty left with regard to wool imported—a protection to the home growers of the article. I hope, therefore, that we may in future quote this as a precedent why the total abolition of duty should in all cases be preferred to retaining even a small protective duty. (Great cheering.) Again, we have a very material improvement certainly in the reduction of the duty on foreign coffee (cheers), which has been reduced from 8d. to 6d. per lb., the duty upon British colonial coffee being 4d. per lb. That is no doubt a step in the right direction; and, as I told you before, it is homage paid to your principles. It admits that all the principles which you have been advocating are right ones, only it stops half way (loud cheers); and it rests for you, by continuing your peaceful agitation, to carry, I hope at no distant period, a still further repeal of the duty upon that article, so essential to the comforts of the labouring classes. (Loud cheers.) Well, the duty upon foreign sugar is to be subjected to a reduction from 63s. to 34s. per cwt., the duty on sugar imported from the British colonies being 21s. A protective duty will therefore be still left upon that article of 10s. a cwt. I think we may expect a considerable reduction of price in consequence of even that partial reduction of duty; because it is stated that, whereas the whole of the sugar imported from the British possessions amounts to 200,000 tons a year, the whole quantity grown in those countries from which, under the proposed change of law, sugar will be permitted to be imported, is about 90,000 tons, being nearly half of the whole quantity that is imported from the British possessions. (Cheers.) Now, as the price of sugar is much higher in England than it is in countries which are open to the introduction of sugar from all parts of the world, the probability is, that the greater part of that 90,000 tons of sugar will be imported (though subject to a higher duty than British) into this country (cheers); and as there has been a difference of not less than 20s. in price between British colonial sugar and that of foreign colonies while the absolute monopoly of the British colonies was preserved, and as there will only, when that 90,000 tons is admitted, be a difference of 10s. in the duty, I think it is quite certain that the admission of that 90,000 tons, or some portion of it, at a differential duty of 10s., will have the effect of materially reducing the price of sugar to the British consumer. (Cheers.) Here, therefore, is another instance in which I think there is cause for congratulation that you have not only got an acknowledgment of the principles which you advocate, but that, in the reduction of the price of sugar to the consumer, you are about to reap part of the benefit of those principles. (Loud cheers.) I say this, because I do think that, considering all the opposition that the landlords and the West Indians give to the principles of Free Trade, we ought not to bear too hardly upon a Ministry which even partially carries them into effect. (Cheers.) I do not go into the question whether upon a former occasion, by opposing those very principles, they did not supplant their predecessors (cheers); what I say is, do not let us mix ourselves up with agitating for the reduction of such duties with any party questions. (Great cheering, which lasted some time.) Let us endeavour by our reasons, and by the power of truth with which we propose them, to gain bread from all parties to the doctrines of Free Trade. (Cheers.) By that course, I am persuaded, we are most likely, in some reasonable period of time, to carry into effect our own principles. (Loud cheers.) The greatest opponents that we have, unfortunately, had upon many occasions to the carrying into effect of these principles, as I have always stated both in and out of Parliament, are a section of the working classes. If the middle and working classes were unanimous in opposing all differential duties, and in opposing the sliding scale—if, I say, they would unite with us cordially—the thing is done. (Loud cheers.) I cannot really conceive by what process of reasoning any portion of the working classes can persuade themselves that they are benefited by monopoly. It really comes to this sort of argument: "The greater the quantity of any commodity there is to divide among the whole community, the less a particular part of that community will have." (Cheers.) Or, just as if I were to say to you, "The larger the room, the larger the space in which this assembly is collected, the less room is there for any one of you." (Cheers and laughter.) One proposition is just as absurd as the other—there is no difference at all between them. If there were a larger quantity of corn, a larger quantity of sugar, and a larger quantity of coffee to divide among the millions of which the population of the united empire consists,—and if there is every year more, and every year a greater facility for introducing more,—is it not as clear as daylight that this greater abundance would reduce the price, and that the ability to purchase any given quantity would be brought more within the reach of every member of the community? (Loud cheering.) What effect can the introduction of a greater quantity of coffee, or of sugar, or of corn, have in depressing money wages? A great authority—Sir R. Peel—upon one occasion, said that "wages were determined by the competition of all the labour of the world;" and that is the case. When you come to talk of the price by which any article of general consumption is regulated, it is manifest that it depends upon the competition of the whole world what that price shall be; and it is the same with labour as with any other commodity. (Cheers.) Well, then, there's another fallacy which I am sorry to say finds its advocates amongst a portion of the middle classes—though not with many, I acknowledge, because I believe that the great mass of the middle classes are with you. (Cheers.) Some of that class think that a very large portion of the prosperity of the middle classes depends upon the high rents of gentlemen with large fortunes. Now, I think it is very easy by an arithmetical argument to settle that question. (Cheers.) What proportion of the whole population do you suppose the gentlemen of easy fortunes, who live upon their rent, and their incomes without following any description of labour, business or profession—what per centage of the whole population do you suppose them to make up? Three and a quarter per cent! (Cheers.) Three and a quarter per cent of the whole population of the united empire; such, at least, is the result as tested by the population of twenty-seven counties, partly agricultural and partly manufacturing, of which the details have been thoroughly investigated; and I think we may presume that, as the gentlemen in easy circumstances form 3½ per cent. of the whole population of those 27 counties, there cannot be much difference in this proportion as regards the population of the whole empire. (Cheers.) The supposition then that the prosperity in business of all the middle classes of this country, of the shopkeeper and the trader, can depend upon the custom of only 3½ per cent. of the whole population, even admitting them to have larger fortunes than the rest of the community, is too absurd to require a moment's refutation. (Great cheering.) The argument of the persons who reason in that way is very much like that of the boy who robbed his master's till, and who when charged with the theft, and brought up for judgment, said, "Well, didn't I lay out my thievings at your shop?" (Great cheering and laughter.) Precisely of the same kind is the argument employed by those gentlemen who would persuade us just to let the landlords rob us a little now, in order that we should get back a portion of it by charging them higher prices when we get them as customers. (Cheers.) But there is another fallacy which has a certain portion of truth in it. It is said that the agriculturists (meaning thereby, I presume, rather the landlords than the farmers,) and the manufacturers and the traders of the country have all one common interest; and, therefore, the inference is this, that if by any alteration of the Corn Laws you render one class a little poorer, you by necessity render the other classes a little poorer. If we all well and thoroughly understood our own interests and acted upon them, I admit we all would have a common interest. So England and France—they have a common interest and ought to remain at peace—they sacrifice the interests of both, if they foolishly go to war; but no one would with reason contend that France cannot reap some advantage in which England does not participate, or that England cannot reap some advantage in which France does not participate. (Cheers.) No doubt, in the long run, if we follow a wise course of policy, that policy which benefits one country will benefit the other; but if you mean to say that you can't rob one party in order to give the robbery to another, I must deny the proposition. (Cheers.) Take a case in which the whole public generally has been greatly benefited—the case of railroads. When you consider the great number that travel by railroads, you cannot doubt that the public has been greatly benefited by them; but do you mean to say that those who had money invested in turnpike trusts, or that the innkeepers who had great establishments upon the roads, have not been injured by the construction of railroads? (Loud cheers.) Just so with regard to the question of the Corn Laws. It is very true that we have all a common benefit in our mutual prosperity; but it does not follow that you can't take from one in order to give to another, and thereby injure one to the benefit of the other. (Cheers.) The argument is couched in ambiguous language, and, therefore, leads to misapprehension. (Cheers.) I am very happy, however, to see that a very considerable and an important section of the landed interest, headed as it is by such great names as those of Lord Spencer (cheers), and Lord Fitzwilliam (cheers), and Lord Radnor (cheers), and Lord Ducie (cheers), and Lord Kinaird. (Cheers.) I hope I have made no omissions. (A voice: "Westminster.") Ay, and the Marquis of Westminster. (Loud cheers.) I was about to say that I am very happy to see that a section of the landowners, headed by such men as those, are beginning to perceive what their real interest is. (Cheers.) Why, even their own organs have lately promulgated that it is in consequence of the stimulus which the great decline in the prices of agricultural produce has given to the farmer—that it is in consequence of this stimulus that the whole farming world is now thinking of nothing but agricultural improvements; that draining is going on, and they are introducing manure from the other hemisphere. (Cheers.) What is that but a proof that monopoly, in the case of landlords and farmers as in everything else, leads to idleness and to ignorance, and prevents the people finding out those real advantages which their position would otherwise give to them? (Cheers.) What is it but this, which, gradually presenting itself to their minds, is convincing them that their real defence is not to be found in protective duties, but in their own industry and in the enlightened study and pursuit of agriculture. (Cheers.) I am sorry to say, that there are certain parties who very much wish to see a decline in manufactures. They think that by reducing the magnitude of towns—by rendering the population of the manufacturing towns less than it is—it would be possible to make of England a very Arcadia. (Cheers and laughter.) They think that all the simplicity of country life is to be introduced into the interior of towns, provided that, by certain measures which they are endeavouring to carry gradually, they can discourage manufacturing industry. Now, how is it possible that a country like England can engage in such a career as that? (Cheers.) Why, our happiness in a great measure depends upon our political power. If our political power is diminished don't you suppose that we have enterprising neighbours who will step in and endeavour to wrest from us many of those advantages which we now possess as a manufacturing country? (Cheers.) When you look at the large masses of the population engaged in the various branches of manufactures, how are you to discourage them without introducing a dreadful state of pauperism into the country? (Cheers.) How will your workhouses be filled, if by any measure of legislation you throw discouragement upon the great branches of manufacture in which this country so pre-eminently excels? (Cheers.) One of our modes of providing occupation for labourers is, to allow them, if they will, to expatriate themselves to distant colonies; and you are constantly called on, not merely to allow them to expatriate themselves, but to defend them in the distant parts of the world to which they have expatriated themselves. How are you to afford them the protection you do in those distant parts unless the profits of the manufactures which you export to distant countries enable you to pay the expense of that protection? (Hear.) You have entered on that course; other countries have also entered upon it, and if we lag behind they will wrest from us that superiority which we now enjoy. (Cheers.) The sense of that superiority forms part of the English character, and every man I now address would feel himself degraded if he saw this country reduced to the state of a second-rate power. (Cheers.) Therefore I say, whether you look at the comfort of our people or the articles that they consume; or whether you look at their high-mindedness, it is essential that the greatness of the manufacturing and commercial power of this country should be preserved; and the most effectual way to preserve it is for us so to persevere until we are successful in our advocacy of the doctrines of Free Trade. (The Hon. Chairman resumed his seat amid the most enthusiastic applause.)

Mr. VILLIERS then came forward amidst enthusiastic cheering. Silence having been at length obtained, the honourable gentleman spoke as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, the reason why the Chairman has requested me to address you on this occasion is not for the purpose of inflicting a long speech upon you, which I have too often done before—(cries of "No, no"); but for the purpose of accounting for the absence of some friends whose attendance was expected. As you are aware, Mr. Bright, the member for Durham, intended to have the honour of addressing you this evening, he is, I regret to say, prevented from so doing by a serious domestic affliction which has visited his family. (Hear.) Others of our constant friends are also absent, and amongst them the Chairman of the Anti-Corn-Law League, who would otherwise have been here; but they are, you will be happy to learn, now remaining in Lancashire for the purpose of assisting and devoting their whole power and energy to promote the success of a Free-Trade candidate, who is drawn into the field there by the recent death of the sitting member. (Loud cheers.) It would be, I am sure, useless for us to say with what interest and anxiety we shall watch the result of that election. (Cheers.) A more important event in the progress of our cause could not have occurred. (Hear, hear.) It is hardly equalled by the contest which took place in the city of London during the last autumn. (Hear.) You remember what vast importance was attached to that election, and what an impression was produced by its result, not only in the country, but almost throughout the world: for when we consider the single question that was at issue upon that occasion, and the parties by whom it was decided, it is not too much to say that wherever British commerce had made England known, the importance of that event was felt. (Cheers.) That Free-Trade victory was accepted as a sign in all foreign countries of the approaching fall of this protective and restrictive system, and one, as proving the spirit of the people, far more to be trusted than the admissions of our Ministers of the wisdom in the abstract of the opposite principle. (Hear.) It showed a sense among the citizens of this metropolis of the humiliation to which the commercial classes had been subjected in modern days. It formed the prominent topic of speculation in all the leading journals of Europe and America, and those who wished well to England hailed the event with joy. People abroad, who view us from a distance, who know our history, who see the sources of our power, see distinctly the enormous folly of which we are guilty in fettering our trade, and enemies like to see our progress as a nation checked; they like to see our peace threatened from within by a constant cause of discord and distress. (Hear.) [Mr. Villiers was here interrupted by the appearance upon the platform of Mr. Moore, who was received with loud applause.]

Mr. VILLIERS resumed. Wherever the beauty and value of the great principle of Free Trade between the various people of the earth is acknowledged, the event of that election was hailed as a cheering sign of a better example coming from this country to the world. (Hear, hear.) In support of that opinion he would read a short extract from the address of one of the ablest men in the United States, an advocate of Free Trade, and lately a candidate for the presidency of the States (Mr. Calhoun). [Hear, hear.] It was in his retiring address, when speaking of Free Trade, he said—"I, who upheld it against monopoly and plunder in the worst of times, and braved the menaces of administrations when backed but by a single state (South Carolina), will not, cannot abandon the glorious cause now, when its banner waves in proud triumph over the metropolis of the commercial world." And he concluded by saying—"No; I shall maintain immovably the ground I have so long occupied, until I have witnessed its great and final victory, if it shall please the Disposer of events to spare my life so long. It will be indeed a victory—the harbinger of a new, and brighter, and higher civilization." (Cheers.) He read that to show in what esteem the example of this country is held in the world, and what power the electors of this kingdom have yet, if they will only do themselves justice and use their privilege with that spirit and judgment which became them as men. (Hear, hear.) My particular object in alluding to the city election is that a precisely similar struggle is now about to be entered upon in Lancashire. (Cheers.) The constituency there, certainly, is partly agricultural and partly commercial, which it was not in London; but that would only make victory doubly useful, should it be attained. (Hear, hear.) I do not say these interests are in conflict, for the man is not fit to be loose who can suppose that the agriculture of Lancashire can have a higher interest than the prosperity of the manufactures and commerce of Lancashire (cheers); but there is a powerful class there, as elsewhere, whose hearts I fear are less in the weal of their country, with its commerce and manufacture, than in continuing their own domination. (Hear, hear.) Their influence is great, no doubt, and would be used in the mode with which the country is now familiar; their object is to resist what they style the encroachments of commerce, which seems to spring from a jealousy of those results of industry and commerce which threaten them with rivals in wealth and station. But really there is something in the name and circumstance of Lancashire that would seem to preclude the possibility of defeat on this occasion. When one reflects on its progress, the occupation of the people, its commercial importance to the whole kingdom, and the question it has to decide, namely, whether commerce should be free, one should feel at a loss for an apology to the world if the electors on this occasion should disappoint the expectations of the country. (Hear, hear.) I will not even contemplate such an event. (Cheers.) Notwithstanding the severity with which the conduct of the commercial classes is sometimes treated on these occasions, I do not believe, when they are not blinded by the party zeal which misleads us all at times, that they are more treacherous to their order, more servile to the upper classes, or less intelligent with respect to their real interests than other men (cheers); and I expect success the more on this occasion that there is only the question of the future commercial policy of the country at issue, and that no party spirit or feeling is necessarily mixed up with it. (Hear, hear.) Free Trade has nothing to do, as the Chairman justly said, with party. It never has been so viewed—its oldest advocates have never made it subservient to party. (Hear, hear.) I remember when I first attended a public meeting in Lancashire that I saw there, and was pleased to see, gentlemen of influence, of strong Conservative views, joining in the proceedings, and as eager for Free Trade as any man present. (Hear, hear.) I remember, a few years ago, the late Mr. Courtenay, who had been President of the Board of Trade, who was a strong Tory, but most hostile to the existing Corn Laws, and a great advocate for Free Trade,—he told me that he contemplated standing for a metropolitan borough, and intended to announce his views on Free Trade; and he asked him (Mr. Villiers) what he thought the Anti-Corn-Law Associations, or the leading friends of Free Trade, would do upon the occasion, and whether they would give him support; and he (Mr. Villiers) consulted several gentlemen who were then taking an active part in the agitation on the subject, and they were all of opinion that, such was the paramount importance of the adoption of that policy, they should not consider that his politics on other subjects was the slightest objection to him. (Hear, hear.) He would not believe, then, that divested as the question was of all party feeling, that the manufacturers and capitalists of Lancashire would, upon this occasion, prove themselves so faithless to their country, so false to their real interests, and so forgetful of what was due to those for whose benefit they held the franchise, as to support any man who would perpetuate by his vote that curse and grievance of the country—the monopoly in food. (Cheers.) Lancashire is now the seat of that gigantic business from which England has received such a vast accession to her resources, and has been enabled so wonderfully to extend her trade with the world; her continued prosperity is essential to support our vast revenue, and to provide for those masses of the people who are without employment; and it is impossible to contemplate without horror and alarm anything calculated seriously to injure or impair that great interest. (Hear.) Grounds for alarm on this account, however, are rapidly increasing. Her position has been gained and hitherto maintained by the superiority of her manufactures, and by the facilities and cheapness of their production, enabling millions at home and abroad to have access to their consumption. (Hear, hear, hear.) They are now exposed to an eager rivalry abroad, which is hourly profiting by the restrictions which we impose on ourselves; each day, therefore, it becomes more important that we should relieve the trade from all senseless trammels, and suffer fresh customers to approach our shores; and thus, by extending the demand for our production, give increased value to the ill-requited labour of our working classes. (Hear.) We maintain our position now by ruinous competition among capitalists, and by incessant toil among the working classes. Lancashire, then, the great seat of production and trade, the great sufferer from restriction, is now asked to pass an opinion on this system. (Hear.) The capitalist, the manufacturer, the employer of labour, are now called upon to prove their sincerity in what they have alleged and what they have professed. (Hear.) They complain of restriction, that it limits the demand for the produce of their capital, reduces the rate of profit, and compels them to reduce the wages of labour. They say, let us deal with those who will deal with us; let the field for the employment of capital be widened, and we will be able to improve the condition of our working people. (Hear.) We object, under the present system, say they, to limit the hours of labour by act of Parliament, for that would only limit the number employed, or lessen the wages of those who work (hear, hear); but let us exchange more freely with other countries, and the people will work less or receive more. (Hear, hear.) I say that the goodwill of the capitalists to the working class will be proved by their votes at this election; working class will be proved by their votes at this election; poor or dependent men cannot resist intimidation or corruption; but those who are in any way connected with trade and manufactures will have an opportunity of recording their vote in favour of freedom to trade. Will they vote for a Monopolist? I believe they will not. (Cheers.) The excuse was never less for the continuance of this system. It is no novelty. Sad and ample experience has been had of it; it is everywhere discredited by experiment (hear, hear); and, as the chairman has truly said, many honourable men among the proprietors are now coming forward to acknowledge the error and injustice of the law; and, what is more important, no week now passes that those for whose interest we all feel sympathy—I mean the capitalists who cultivate the soil—do not avow that this law has done them no good—is of no advantage to them, and that they are as ready as ourselves for the immediate adoption of Free Trade. (Loud cheers.) No answer has been made to the statements of those farmers who have spoken here; they defied reply; they stated facts, and proved what has long been seen by others, that the tenant-farmer cannot benefit by a Corn Law. (Cheers.) I believe, and hope, and expect that the commercial classes will really do their duty upon this occasion, and I am glad now to give way for one of the class of farmers to address you, who will assure you on their part that they may do so without fear. (Loud cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN then said, a Buckinghamshire farmer, Mr. Gibbs, of Aylesbury, is now about to address you. (Cheers.)

Mr. Gibbs, on coming forward, was received with loud cheers. He said—Ladies and gentlemen, I believe that the stage of this theatre has furnished this large metropolis with a great deal of information and amusement for very many years past. A variety of different characters have stood before you; but I think that in myself you behold at least a fresh one to-night. (Loud cheers and laughter.) I have been introduced to you as a Buckinghamshire farmer. (Renewed cheers.) I am a Buckinghamshire farmer, and a native and resident of the principal town of the county, under the immediate influence of the great duke whose name has so often been brought before you. (Cries of "How is the duke?") I have been introduced to you as Mr. Gibbs, and, though it is rather a delicate matter to introduce oneself (laughter), I find it necessary to give you some further introduction. (Hear, hear.) I must lay aside the usual coyness observed on similar occasions, and as a plain-speaking, unlearned man, address you in my own way. (Cheers.) I must moreover claim a greater degree of privilege, or what is generally called greater latitude, than those speakers who have preceded me, and who are much better acquainted with the routine of public speaking than myself. (Hear, hear.) I propose to commence by giving you a short history of myself: first, to encourage young and wavering tradesmen; and, secondly, to prepare older ones not to expect anything but plain Buckinghamshire facts in plain Buckinghamshire language. (Laughter and cheers.) Allow me to say, then, that about 33 or 34 years ago I became a commercial man and a man of business, under rather adverse circumstances; and I ought to tell you that, though I have been introduced as a farmer, I am not a large farmer—that I am only farming sufficient to keep a small family; I stand before you in a character which has hitherto been considered as one of your greatest enemies—I am rather a large land-agent. (Cheers.) My constant employ is to dispose of the stock of farmers—to help the unfortunate out of their farms that somebody may succeed them, who soon wants my assistance again. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) But I will not go from the subject. I commenced my public and commercial life about the same time with very bad prospects; I was situated in a country town, where, what a learned man has called, "the country monster's foot" covers the whole borough, and where the little privilege which is to be obtained in the way of business is only given to those who will deserve it by means such as I never yet stooped to. (Laughter and applause.) I ought not, perhaps, to go back to my ancestors—but I may be allowed to say that my father was what was called in his day, a Jacobin. (Cheers and a laugh.) I have myself been proud of the name of Radical, which is a little more softened term. (Cheers.) I began—as I have stated—I ought not to speak thus in praise of myself—and, thank God, I have hitherto resisted temptation—I have kept my integrity—I have preserved my character without a quarrelsome or mischief-making disposition—and in no one case have I ever yet sacrificed my political principles for any profit which might arise to me in my business (cheers); and I can say now with confidence, that there is not a great Tory Protectionist in Buckinghamshire who wants his property turned into cash, but I have his full confidence independent of my politics. (Applause.) Gentlemen, bear that in mind if you please. (Hear, hear.) I have also tried what Solomon has recommended, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." I may tell you, and many of you, I am proud to say it, know that my elder son, having had better advantages than myself, is now editor of the Aylesbury News, and has done much more towards converting Buckinghamshire farmers to Free-Trade principles than the great duke and all his party have during the last forty years in favour of protection. (Loud cheers.) Having thus introduced myself, I feel the truth of one of Solomon's proverbs, "Out of the plenitude of the heart the mouth speaketh." Your kind countenances have removed the only objection I felt: it was diffidence, and I think I have now got rid of it. (Loud cheers.) I will now give you some of my opinions, supported by facts (and the Times allows the League to be supported by facts), to bear out my assertions, and which will be better than all the oratory that I might be master of. (Cheers.) I have always viewed the conduct of the Monopolists in a broad light, and I have lost sight of many of those little petty reckonings which some people are apt to see when they are speaking upon the Corn Laws and their effects. (Hear, hear.) God Almighty in his providence has well supplied the earth; and man, through his ingenuity, has introduced steam, by which he has obliterated distance and brought the world as it were all together. I believe all men reckon right when they say that trade in corn, like every other article, ought to be free; that they who can live by their estate or by the culture of their land should live; and that they who cannot should sell, the same as I should in my own business. (Hear, hear.) I know no reason why any man should ask for protection. (Hear, hear.) Some time since, when at a distance of some miles from home, on taking up our own newspaper I saw an advertisement to the effect that a meeting of agriculturists would be held in the County-hall at Aylesbury to pray for agricultural protection. I immediately wrote and enclosed, by the night's post, an advertisement, stating that a meeting of tailors would shortly be held in the same place, to pray also for protection. (Laughter.) The agricultural meeting certainly did take place, and a most excellent meeting of tailors too, at which speeches were made to show that they were quite as useful in clothing the back as the others were in feeding the belly. (Laughter.) I thought that they, equally with the agriculturists at any rate, had a right to protection. I did not select the trade by way of ridiculing it, but as one which had as much right to parliamentary protection as that of the farmer. (Hear, hear.) I don't know why the farmer has a greater right to it. Is he a more useful man? Is he a more useful member of society? Has the one a greater right than the other to go to Government and ask for protection? Suppose my business were to fall off, and I were to go to Government and ask for a rise of £10 per cent. on my commission, what should I be called? (Laughter and cheers.) But, gentlemen, I must confine myself to the real state of the question—to the condition of the small farmer and the farm-labourer. (Hear.) No man is more mixed up with them, or knows more of their pecuniary affairs, of their gains and losses, than myself. The small farmers have, for the last few years, gone on tolerably well; some of them who have deprived themselves of the common comforts of life may have made a little money; others, who have thought proper to take the comforts as they came, in moderation, as long as prices were up, kept level; but during the last year or two the scale has been going the other way. Those who have not been provident enough to lay by have already moved off. The labourer cannot be paid for the simple reason that the farmer is unable to pay him. The labourer is working with a large family for from 8s. to 10s. a week, and has, possibly, to pay 1s. 6d. or 2s. out of that sum for rent; then how could he be expected to make a decent appearance at all? (Hear.) I, for one, believe that a repeal of the Corn Laws would at once improve the condition of the labourer. (Cheers.) A gentleman with whom I rode in a railway carriage this afternoon (I found out by accident he was a Monopolist) took a double line of argument on this question, and blew hot and cold in the same breath. He first said the repeal of the Corn Laws would sink the labourer, while he admitted that the demand for labour would be increased. Now, plenty of labour means plenty of work, and we are all old enough to know that it is scarcity which governs prices, and that the manufacturer would have fresh zest given to his business by an increased demand for his commodities. (Hear.) The effect of this was seen some time since in my own country when Manchester was flourishing, and we sent scores of families down to Manchester, where there was plenty of work, and where they were better situated altogether. (Hear.) One of the great evils of Buckinghamshire is its surplus labour. There may be seen numbers of industrious, well-meaning men standing together in the market place with their arms folded, and asking for a day's work. I pity these men. I do not blame them. If they pick or steal a hare (or only half a one, as you have heard of lately) they are sent to prison for two or three months by the very man who calls himself the proprietor of the hare. (Cheers.) I would not sanction poaching, but I think every man is entitled to a hare who can catch it without trespassing. (Laughter and cheers.) Gentlemen, I was going on to speak of the state of the farmers in Buckinghamshire. In certain villages, belonging almost exclusively to the great Duke, he has got little agents and great agents, and agents who always report every circumstance which occurs—so much so that when the popular newspaper turned the people's attention to Free Trade it was prohibited according to orders. Very lately a farmer's wife let out that Mr. So-and-so walked through the village in which she resided every Saturday morning to see who had got the paper; she added that she liked to look at it herself, but when she saw the gentleman approaching she put it in the dresser drawer and shut it up. (Laughter.) Speaking of the moral state of Buckinghamshire farmers, with a few exceptions, I am pleased to say that the question of Free Trade is now being thoroughly agitated among them. In the first place it was ably introduced by our worthy friend Mr. Cobden (cheers), and to his great pleasure and my great surprise, we were able to carry, at a county meeting, a regular good Free-Trade resolution. (Cheers.) Since then an impudent fellow has presumed to call a public meeting of the electors of Aylesbury in their own election-room, under the pretence of assisting a protection-to-labour society, I think it is called; I refer to Dr. Sleight—or Dr. "Sly" if you please. (Laughter.) We Free-Traders issued, in consequence, a counter advertisement, stating that he might come to our election-room, but we would take the liberty of moving any resolution which might fairly arise out of the proceedings. Upon electing our chairman (of course we did not allow Dr. Sleight to name him) we had the majority. The chairman said the meeting should take the regular course. The Doctor spoke in his usual flowery way—a vast quantity of words without any substance. I and those who went to the meeting unprepared gathered from his observations sufficient sense to get him voted out of the room, and some present were so unconvicted that they what is called bonneted him as he made his exit. (Loud laughter.) Gentlemen, I don't know that I can go much farther into the state of our farmers and labourers: I have spoken of the distress of the latter, and I have done so with sorrow, that honest, well-intentioned men have no work, no out-door relief, but such as the workhouse (which they call a prison) affords; the only other alternative they have being either to steal or starve. (Cheers.) Now, who would not lend a hand to help them? (Cheers.) Though a repeal of the Corn Laws might not give them more ploughing, I believe it would give them more weaving and sledgehammer work, and that employment would be found for all. I believe also that it would materially improve the condition of the farmer. (Cheers.) I myself am a farmer, and would to-night not only sign a petition for a repeal of the Corn Laws, but take a hundred acres of arable land at the present price and sign a lease for them with the same dip of ink. (Loud cheers.) I am of opinion that a repeal of the Corn Laws, and Free Trade generally, would, by instilling fresh life into the manufacturing districts, take off our surplus labour, and enable the poor labourers to fill their bellies; and that all that corn which we have to spare would be eaten to sustain human nature, instead of being, as it is sometimes, cast into the sea. (Loud cheers.) I have several proofs of this from the farmers themselves. I had hoped to have introduced to you this evening a landowner, keeping his own estate—a regular yeoman—not a green-coated or a red-coated yeoman, as is often understood. I regret, however, that accident prevented his accompanying me. But I was going to tell you that the farmers were not so much opposed to a repeal of the Corn Laws as is generally imagined. They all admit the necessity of the question being settled, and declare that, until it is, they have no sound foundation to go upon. (Loud cheers.) I believe they admit the necessity of change, though they do not see the utility of a repeal of the Corn Laws. I will give you a proof of it. You know facts are stubborn things, as stubborn as the League itself, which will never give way. (Cheers.) So late as Monday evening last I met a respectable farmer, about my own age; he introduced himself by saying, "You are, I suppose, aware that I must leave my farm; I am come to ask your assistance in getting me out." The question naturally turned on the state of agriculture, and the great question of the repeal of the Corn Laws. He stated with reserve (and I think my memory serves me right), that about twenty-five years ago he took an uphill farm on the Chiltern Hills, near the borders of Buckinghamshire. He took the farm on the strength of an act of Parliament, at that time recently passed, which proposed to secure to him 10s. per bushel, or £20 per load, for his wheat. He took the farm, made an effort among his friends, and invested his capital. The first year's crop, under this erroneous supposition, averaged scarcely 6s. per bushel. (Hear, hear.) I cannot go into detail like some of those who have preceded me, but I have studied the question sufficiently to corroborate what has often been said, that by every act passed on this subject the farmer has lost something like 30 per cent. on the return of his farm, which must ruin him in about three years. While I was speaking to the farmer I have alluded to, there was brought in a requisition to the League, numerous signed, praying they would furnish the borough of Aylesbury with a Free-Trade candidate: without hesitation, he affixed his name to it, and I believe there are hundreds more who would do the same. (Hear, hear.) I believe in the neighbourhood of Aylesbury the several classes in the agricultural villages around are reading, hearing, assembling, and agitating by the best means in their power; they are being converted by hundreds: soon the scale will turn, and it will be surprising then to consider how the question should have been so long in being decided. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I had intended, if I did not intrude (cries of "Go on"), to speak of a few of the means used by the protective monopolists in our neighbourhood. I believe the motive which impels them to exertion is not a public one, is not an uninterested one. (Cheers.) It comes to this: "God bless you, keep up my rental in order that I may pay my mortgages." I will adduce an instance which came to my knowledge yesterday. A widow, who lately became so, who occupied a farm under our great duke, made application to renew the tenure under which her husband held; there was no objection raised to that, but they must take her son as a joint partner, in order that he might vote for as well as pay rent to the landlord. (Cheers.) There is a place called Aston Clinton near Aylesbury, about four miles from us, recently purchased by the same proprietor, and on every little piece of land of four or five acres, and which amounts to £8 or £9 annual value, he has set up a cowshed or something of that sort, to make it worth £10, thereby getting in that place alone twenty or thirty votes. (Cheers.) No man whose cause was just would or could stoop to accomplish such an object by such means. I ought not, perhaps, to introduce an author who is not political, but, when I think of the many deceptive means employed to ensnare unwary voters, I am strongly reminded of two lines from Dr. Watts, which may be admirably applied here:—

"Satan's a sower, who betrays Unwarded souls a thousand ways."

Then there is another little distich (I do not know to whom I am indebted for it) which, speaking of the servile conduct of these time-serving men who will stoop to anything so that they carry their object, may be applied with equal felicity:—

"When the Devil was sick,
The Devil a monk would be;
When the Devil was well,
The Devil a monk was he."

(Cheers and laughter.) The chairman, in his opening speech, alluded to some subjects to which, perhaps, I may again be allowed to allude. He spoke of the proud position in which he stood, by the support he received from his own constituents, independent of what was afforded by the League. I am very sorry to stand here just in the reverse position. I do hope, at the first opportunity that offers, that we shall find support of which we shall make the best use. The chairman referred to two or three items upon which the duties had been relaxed, and especially on wool. Now, the farmers in our market, on Saturday last, said, "Why, Robert Peel has repealed the whole duty on wool." They call it "wool" in Buckinghamshire. (A laugh.) Now, that was a staple article a few years ago, and was looked upon as next to corn in importance. Some large graziers, who kept farms, were dependent on wool for their rent—I am not saying that the remission of a little duty will injure them; but to have heard the conversation over the market table, where I took care to have the subject mooted,—why, their jealousy was so great that they said there was no more dependence to be placed upon Peel, and they would have no more of him. (Cheers and laughter.) They said, he had first diminished the duty on corn, and now he had removed it altogether from wool. For my part, I believe the Premier, in his heart, to be a Free-Trader, and that if he will only act openly, and come out untrammelled, he will give all we expect and no more than we want. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I have exceeded my own intentions: there are other subjects which might have been touched upon—the sweet subject of sugar, and the sour subject of vinegar, for example—but I must now retire.

expressing my obligations to you for the kind attention which you have afforded me. (Cheers.) I believe that success is at hand. An improvement in our circumstances has filled us with fresh zeal. I have been the "Uriah" of free opinions in the neighbourhood I come from; and I shall be proud to become the "Uriah" of the League, and to put myself, if necessary, in the forefront and in the heat of the battle. (Cheers.) I have stood it pretty well hitherto, for their shot is not lead, and their words will not kill an honest man. (Loud and continued cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Fox will next address you.

Mr. W. J. Fox on presenting himself was received with reiterated and most enthusiastic bursts of applause, which having subsided, he addressed the meeting as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I address you this evening under the disadvantage of not having been present at the early part of the proceedings, from a cause which I must make a plea for your indulgence as regards what I do address to you, namely, personal indisposition, which presses on me even in sight of so inspiring and magnificent an assembly as the present. And what can be imagined more inspiring or magnificent than these meetings? (Hear.) The long series of them that has now been held with unabated attention and zeal—meetings of individuals gathered together to listen either to those elementary and simple truths which every one knows, or to the recondite speculations and laborious researches of political economy not often found to gain the attention of multitudes—meetings in which every heart glows with as burning a sense of the wrong we denounce as ever nerved those who took the field to contest against injustice with muskets on their shoulders and swords by their sides, and yet which has blended this sense of wrong with a prudence as wise and a forbearance as dignified as ever marked the best school of philosophers (cheers)—meetings which have made this place an asylum of truth and justice, at a time when those qualities have been banished from the mansions of the men whose stations ought to have made them the leaders of the people, and when they have been violated in those legislative halls which ought to have been their sacred shrine, where their blessings were worked out for the entire mass of the community. (Cheers.) I confess that for myself I sometimes weary of the statistics of this question, interesting as they are. The list of deaths which a rise in the price of food has occasioned—the long muster-roll of pauperism kept up by the continued pressure from year to year—commitments for crime bearing their constant proportion to the fluctuations in the price of food—calculations of the number of poor children that die above those of the rich in consequence, not of the hard bearing of natural causes, but of artificial laws in aggravation of the disparity of condition,—these, and all the other fearful items in that account, although they are of a nature to harrow up the soul, yet the continuous detail drives us back upon that one plain simple truth in which the whole question is involved, and which contains all its merits, I mean the fact that "the labourer is worthy of his hire." (Loud cheers.) There is the beginning, and the end of the argument in my view of the matter. It is a question of justice—of simple, impartial, universal justice. (Hear.) The doom of mankind is toil, and the labourer is worthy of his hire—worthy of it undiminished by trick, rapacity, or oppression;—worthy of his hire for whatever it will fetch in the world's market;—worthy of his hire to lay it out with whomsoever he may please, and for whatsoever he will;—worthy of it undiminished by any interference except that only which takes from him his proportion of the national expenditure, of that which is fairly necessary for the carrying on the Government, and for the defence of the community. (Loud cheers.) Indeed, all other matters, although upon many accounts it is worth while to go into their consideration, are but incidental to this great controversy: here is its essence. We affirm that the labourer is worthy of his hire: the monopoly that levies taxation for class profit and not for national objects, in fact, denies that proposition, tramples on it, spurns it as if it were a mere cobweb, and not a primary law of human society, and one of the first dictates of nature and of Providence. (Cheers.) It is an accident that the manufacturer thinks the violation of this law diminishes his profits—it is an accident that the landlord thinks that the violation of this law enlarges his rents. Were it directly the reverse—did justice to those who toil, by allowing them the full results of their toil, injure the manufacturer and benefit the landlord—I should still say precisely the same—let justice be done. The difference in the class makes no difference in the principle; we must not regard these temporary and subordinate considerations; here is the first obligation of society and of law—the recognition of a title as sacred, nay, more so than that by which any species of property whatever is held, by which any titles or estates are bequeathed or inherited. (Loud cheers.) I see why none should regard them, because in the whole history of mankind, at least of peaceful legislation, I believe no class was ever ruined by justice unless it deserved that fate by crime. (Hear, hear, hear.) So linked together is the order of things in nature that the dictates of equity are never violated with impunity: they who have gone on in that road should look about them and return as soon as possible; and they who hold property, and depend on the enactments of society for the security of their possessions, of all people should be tender of the labourer's right, and regard that as specially sacred, for without it their title-deeds are but so much parchment. A man's right in his limbs is beyond and above any one's right in his land. Those who will not allow him to say his soul is his own must at least allow that his body is his own; and what he wins from his fellow-men in the supply of their wants, or from Nature in its fertile returns to the application of human toil, is his by the first of all titles; and those who trample on it endanger the entire order of society, and do that which, if carried out to its consequences, would break down all safety in property, annihilate all successions in honours, and shake thrones to their very foundations. (Cheers.) It is important in one point of view, however much to be regretted on account of its evils in another respect, that this first ground of justice cannot be reached for the purpose of hostile invasion but by passing over other grounds; and that those who interfere with the right of the workman to what he earns in the sweat of his brow, also meddle with the tradesman, the merchant, the capitalist, and the large manufacturer; and in the wrong inflicted on these a spirit has been raised, an organization produced, a machinery set up and put to work, which shows those who toll their way to the peaceful acquisition of what is due to them in combination with other classes of society suffering similar injuries, and having to assert analogous rights. (Cheers.) It is well even for the enemies of justice, for its violators, that there is this breakwater between them and the toiling multitudes; that they have to deal, in the first instance, with the League, combined of all classes, and having for its leaders men of station, ability, wealth, and extensive influence; that they have to deal with this combination, and not merely with the labouring multitude disunited from others, and who in such a state of society, if they were left to fight the conflict with the aristocracy by whom they are injured, would give us only the prospect of confusion and desolation; who would either break out into that violence which would make one great ruin of much of the beauty and ornament of our country, or else, turned aside from their legitimate mode of obtaining subsistence, would spread over the land like swarms of locusts, devouring every green thing, incapable of being driven back or cooped up by all the severities or imprisonments of the poor-law system which a landed aristocracy could apply. (Cheers.) There is little occasion for me to attempt any array of details, when not only at the early meetings of the League in this place you have heard the commercial part of this question so ably and amply argued, but when at its more recent meetings, at three or four in succession, you have heard the agricultural division of it as thoroughly entered into—at once from members of the landlord and those of the tenant class of agriculturists—you have heard statements showing that some amongst them are alive to their own interests, that they see that honesty is the best policy, and sympathize with those who are claiming their rights against the body to which they nominally belong, and have voluntarily proffered here the results of that inquiry which in another place was asked for and superciliously refused. (Cheers.) You have had your open committee on this portion of the subject. Evidence has been adduced here which might well settle the question, and opposed to which certainly we find no particle of contradictory evidence from the rival and antagonistic society. In fact, all the arguments of what calls itself the "Agricultural Protection Society" appear to have evaporated in the production of one tract in three months, and that tract chiefly characterized by the disgraceful peculiarity of being the most dishonest publication that has issued from the press for many a long year. (Cheers.) While there is not a position in it bearing the semblance of reasoning that has not been over and over again discussed, refuted, and exploded on these boards,—while it is fallacious in its logic, untrue in its history, false even in its contemporary facts, it is above all glaringly and outrageously false in its attempt to pervert the highest authority of this country—the patriarch of its political economy—to bring him into court as a witness in the cause of monopoly. (Cheers.) An attempt so impudent as this I believe never to have been made in any court of justice for any cause, however desperate. In the face of the whole tendency of his system, in the teeth of his well-known principles reiterated from book to book and chapter to chapter of his great work, the "Lords and gentlemen of the committee of the Agricultural Protection Society" have called—not a false witness into court—but have called Adam Smith into court as their witness, putting their false words into his mouth. (Loud cheers.) This is beyond the plea of mere literary license. There is not a gentleman connected with the press here or anywhere else who would be capable of committing such a fraud, or, if such an one was found, who would not be discharged from his employment for so doing, and be denounced by his fellow-labourers. (Hear, hear.) It is an attempt to impose in this great cause the highest authority on one side as an authority on the other. That individual members of that committee should say they disown the pamphlet, and wash their hands of it, as I understand some of them have said in private, is not enough; there is much more than this due to the sense of public justice and decency. It is a violation—we will say nothing of Christian morality—but it goes very far indeed to touch the honour of a British gentleman that his name is in any way mixed up with such a subornation of false testimony. (Loud cheers.) The proceedings of these meetings have attracted animadversion in one particular which is, perhaps, better worth adverting to than anything which has been urged by the Protection Society. It has been said, and in quarters seemingly not unfriendly to our objects, that too much of a tone of exaggeration has been indulged in here as to the benefits that may accrue from Corn-Law repeal. We are alleged to have represented the results of such a measure as constituting a perfect millennium on earth, as healing all the evils and wretchedness of society, and creating such a state as the poets might sing of as the return of the golden age on earth. Now, how much reason for this imputation may have been given I do not know; but I think the general representation here of the repeal of the monopoly laws has been rather as a cure for an evil than as the production of all this amount of virtue and happiness. Our first business is to struggle with the acknowledged mischiefs that are abroad in society; to apply something like mitigation to the aggravated horrors that have existed in manufacturing towns at particular seasons, and that are found to a large extent in great cities at all times; to assist the great body of society by enabling them to help themselves; and it is surely no objection to a medicine to say that, though it may cure a disease, it will not confer the gift of immortality. (Hear.) But, besides this, there is, I think, demonstrably a large amount of practical good which may be most confidently anticipated from the extension of Free-Trade principles. It is said that, were these barriers thrown down, there would be a great amount of speculation—there would be an immediate amelioration of the working classes; but that it would be found that behind these artificial barriers there are natural obstructions which cannot be passed, and that the world, or our own country, would still exhibit in a short period of time very much the same amount and degree of suffering as had been temporarily relieved by this legislative measure. Now, I demur to there being such natural barriers to be speedily reached after the first influx of good from the practical establishment of Free-Trade principles. Where are those barriers? So long as there is but the most insignificant fraction of the land of Europe which is well cultivated, what an indefinite increase of progress is to be found there at our very doors! Then there are interminable forests and prairies to the world's end which are ready to yield their produce to the hand of the cultivator. We reach not the natural limits of man's progress whilst there are climates abounding in rich fruits and in natural products of various descriptions, which may be readily exchanged for the products of the human labour and ingenuity of other countries. We are in no danger whilst the tropical regions are in all their richness—whilst there are lands so fertile that sometimes their pork is spoiled by being fattened too much on peaches—while there are millions yet destitute of that convenient clothing and of those dwellings which should be the lot of every inhabitant of this world—while out of its 900,000,000 not 200,000,000 are yet reached by the manufacture of articles deemed essential to a comfortable existence—while in all countries there is a fund of power which may be stimulated to action, and while free interchange has its full room for coming ages and ages, to promote the good of each from the resources of all,—we may look onwards, I think, to such an advancement as we need feel no discouragement if there be some eventual limit thereto; we may anticipate that the triumph of Free Trade would give an impetus to the world analogous to that which Europe experienced at the great period of the Reformation, when it shook off the fetters of feudalism in which it had been so long cramped and enslaved—of that feudalism which is mimicked now by the men who make their landlords' titles a trade and not a dignity, and who keep up that trade by means which depress all other classes whatever. (Cheers.) It is in this direction that I look for the true greatness—for the real independence of our country—that sort of independence which the patriot will desire, and, in desiring which, he will have the satisfaction of feeling that he is cherishing no narrow purpose, but that his patriotism is in harmony with the most extensive philanthropy. Independence is universal dependence—the mutual interchange of good, in whatever quarter that good can be realized. (Hear, hear.) Of all schemes of national independence, the most puerile and paltry, as well as the most fallacious, is that which is sought for through the medium of protective duties on the importation of food. Modern Greece won independence by the remains of its original freedom of spirit, and the traditions of its ancient glory. (Hear.) Switzerland achieved her independence by tenacity for its simple and pure manners when they were outraged by its subjugators. (Hear.) The United Provinces won their independence by their regard for the rights of conscience and liberty of religion. The little republic of San Marino, amidst Europe's convulsion, maintained its independence by moderation. The United States of America won their independence by resistance to taxation without representation. (Cheers.) By a variety of pure principles have noble actions been called forth, and national independence achieved or preserved, leaving it for the proud nobility of England, with their Norman titles and their long pedigrees, to dream of securing national independence through the agency of custom-house officers. (Loud Cheers.) Oh, when the author of our national song delighted in the contemplation—the proud contemplation—of British independence—when Thomson sang of his country—

"Still more majestic shalt thou rise,
More dreadful from each foreign stroke,
As the loud blast that tears the skies Serves but to root thy native oak;"

he little thought that anybody would ever have imagined that that oak was most safely rooted in the dangle of protective duties. (Loud cheers.) Let the independence of Britain be a relying upon her own skill, not attempting to creep under any safeguard of this description; applying the capital she has amassed, exercising the intellectual acuteness and vigour which has ever distinguished her inventors, and displaying that indomitable power of labour which marks her multitudes, she makes herself independent of all, by rendering to all those services which they cannot do without; and in the necessity of such services for their well-being amply will she reap in return from them what is most important to her well-being, and thus regain and exercise what Milton calls "her ancient prerogative" of teaching the nations how to live. (Loud cheers.) I believe we have present in this meeting, and the time of year makes it to be expected that it should be so—a more than usual proportion of friends from different parts of the country (hear); and I cannot conclude without a few remarks having special reference to them. I wish them to take back into the country, as the practical lesson which the League at this moment is most desirous of enforcing, the necessity of attending to the registration. (Hear, hear.) Never yet have the people worked the machinery of the Reform Bill; from its first enactment it has been managed by parties for party purposes; but never by the people for their own benefit. (Hear.) You must remember that the bill which makes this machinery necessary, has destroyed the old opportunity of popular enthusiasm carrying a point suddenly at an election. It is of no use now that you are enthusiastic; when the time of election comes, if the registration has been neglected, you are only like the unarmed warrior, who, whatever the intensity of his interest in the conflict, and how great soever the power he might have had with his weapon of turning the tide of battle, can only look helplessly on, a forlorn spectator, with no small self-accusation in his own bosom. (Cheers.) In no place, even where the registration has been most attended to, has anything like the entire number of qualified persons been put on the list. The investigation which has been carried on in London shows that there are tens of thousands whose claims have every probability of being established. Look after this, friends from the country, and see to it in your own localities. Remember that the elections which occur now, from time to time, are not a true test of what our question will be when its forces are in the field. We look to the elections that pass now as to their moral, not as to their numerical results. We have no dream in the present Parliament of adding such a number of Free-Traders upon these particular occasions as can make any impression whatever on the divisions there. Our time will come by-and-by. Now, the occasions are to be taken when victory, as it was in London, is great by its moral strength, by the electrical stroke which it gives the country. Such another occasion has occurred in South Lancashire, and that county will be fought, and fought with a spirit proportioned to the emergency of the occasion. There the friends of Free Trade—Leaguers or not Leaguers—will take the field, though the county may be partitioned between large landlords, every one of whom stands aloof or looks on with hostility, yet the battle will be fought with an energy that will make them tremble for the fate of the county, if it does not bear away the prize before their eyes. (Cheers.) Think of these things, I say again, as you return into the country. Have the hundred eyes of Argue for the registration lists, and that will give you the hundred arms of Briareus for the elections, every one striking a deathblow at monopoly. (Renewed cheers.) I know how much there is to contend with in these matters. The Western Times told us the other day of a young man in a workshop at Exeter in which there were ten workmen: the foreman announced to them authoritatively that they were all to vote for the Attorney-General; five of them being Tories obeyed the mandate of the master; the other five were of a different description, four of them did not vote at all, but one voted according to his conscience, and he, we are told, was discharged (cries of "Shame"), though bearing the best of characters, and having a poor mother dependent on him for subsistence. (Loud hisses and groans.) Such is protection at election times! (Hear, hear.) And then some monopoly-lord looks tenderly on; and while the son, perhaps, is compelled to have recourse to the dietary of the poorhouse, the mother, if she is fortunate, may obtain a pittance from "the Benevolent Society for the Protection of Poor Needlewomen." (Cries of "Shame.") Such is the result of the interference with which, in all localities, and among almost all classes, the friends of truth and justice in this Free-Trade question, and in so many other public contests, will have to struggle. I confess I cannot contemplate without disgust the amount of crime which is perpetrated by those who pass for respectable, moral, and even religious members of society, but who seem to think that all principle is superseded by the struggle of an election, and by the prospect of seats in Parliament. Why, the landlord who purchases land, reckoning that he buys votes at the same time—whose tenants polling according to his order are a portion of the rent that is paid for the farm—who exercises the cruelty of his authority by a threat of dismissal from the holding of those who are not obedient—who, directly and indirectly, applies the screw to tradespeople and labourers—who is connected with those operations by which integrity is broken down, and the poor man taught the first lesson of guilt in an offer so large as to dazzle and bewilder him, and who, perhaps, is led by this into a long course of corruption and iniquity—that conduct which makes the noblest of institutions (the representative) the means of manufacturing baseness, to support which too often would merit the stigma of being a subverter of ruffianism, and missionaries of demoralization,—this is a guilt for which, in my view, no palliation can be offered by the greatness of the prize, or the frequency of the custom. Compared with this, I do not hesitate to say that the poor outcast who walks the Strand for the wages of infancy contributes less to the amount of public vice than many persons who are dignified as "nobles," and would less pollute by her presence the circle of a court or the presence of royalty. (Prolonged and vehement cheering.) I have another thing to say to our friends from the country; and that is, let them take care of the tricks which are practised here. There is thimble-rigging and ring-dropping in other places besides Epsom or the pothouses of the metropolis. (Laughter.) Let them beware of kvavish humanities. I would not utter one syllable to steel any man's heart against a grief that should be felt, or to close his pocket from liberal almsgiving; but when it is attempted to blind the country to the claims of justice by introducing some show of alleged charity—when comparatively imperfect, pitiful, and paltry donations are set up in the room of giving to every one that which is rightfully their own (hear, hear)—when the enumeration of these is made boastfully to turn us away from the real and only cure for the country's misery, and the distress of so large a portion of its inhabitants,—why, then, I say it is time to cry "Beware!" and to expose the sophism and the duplicity, whatever aristocratic names may adorn the lists. It is a false and bastard charity; I mean that which, while it gives to this or that particular class of the poor something just to lighten the day's pressure, denies them that good by which they could serve themselves from year's end to year's end, a charity which would cut down the hours of work in the mill, and at the same time the worth of wages in the market (hear, hear); a charity which gives guineas to individuals while it draws millions from the community (hear, hear); a charity which bestows a square half inch of court-plaster to the scratch-on-the-finger of society, while it drives the iron of oppression into the very soul of the country (hear, hear); a charity that gives hundreds of children a penny bun, while it makes millions of men pay 9d. for the 6d. loaf (hear, hear); a charity that, having created a configuration of misery and wretchedness, brings its silver thimble to put its drop of water on the flames. I say that this charity is unworthy of absorbing the regard of right-minded men; it is a sort of faddling man-millinery of humanity that should not stand in the way of the greatest philanthropy of all, that which renders impartial justice to every man who labours. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) Let them give over talking sensibility and voting monopoly; let them render justice to the poor—and they will then take care of their own children; they will pay their own workwomen, select their own schools, do that for themselves, and do it very much better than any self-appointed patron can; and will realize, in the comfort of their dwellings, and in the progress of their condition, that which they deserve by their toil, but which no charity ever has supplied or ever can. (Cheers.) Those who are present at such a time as this from the country, perhaps, have some of them come to London in connexion with many of the institutions that are now holding their anniversaries. They have come to talk of subjects more sacred than that which occupies us here; but I would say to them that, if such have been the topics of their attention and the tone of their minds, I desire no better state of mind for our meetings, because I believe that the doctrines of Free Trade are essentially connected with the giving place on earth and diffusing good will among mankind. (Cheers.) What indeed is a greater bar to the progress of religion in the land than monopoly? It interferes with devout associations even in those natural scenes that excite them almost instinctively in the human bosom; in all the richness of harvest, when golden fields are waving in heaven's light, and you see the peasant or the poor labourer look on, and when thankfulness to Providence should arise in his heart, there comes the shadow of the dark cloud of Monopoly brooding over the scene, and interposing between him and the sunshine of God's bounty. Feelings have not their full, free, and fair play, even on the most sacred points; nor can they, for we may be assured that there will be no rest; there can be only one incessant struggle until the claims of justice are conceded by the possessors of power. In promoting this they will be cooperating with a moral and religious work, one which deserves to be classed with those which made illustrious such names as those of Howard and Clarkson, for bringing emancipation to slavery, the light of heaven into the dreariest and darkest regions of wretchedness, the song of gladness to the tongue of the widow and the orphan, and kinder feelings of social order where now all is strife and contention. As a good work, then, let them promote it by their concurrence while they are here, and by their co-operation when they return to their several places of abode. (Cheers.) And now, for myself, I have to thank you for the cheering sympathy which may seem in some measure to have rendered unnecessary the apology with which I commenced; but whether in sickness or in health there is no cause which lays stronger grasp upon the heart and mind than does this great cause of justice and humanity. It is one for which the exertions of a life would be well spent, and dying breath could scarcely be poured forth more appropriately than in a last protest against that injurious system which denies to man the rights of his labour, the charter of his being, and the bounty of his Creator. (Mr. Fox retired amidst enthusiastic applause.)

The CHAIRMAN then stated that the usual weekly meeting would be held on Wednesday evening next.

At the suggestion of Mr. Gibbs, three cheers were given for Free Trade, and the meeting separated.

FROME.

In accordance with announcement an Anti-Corn-Law demonstration was held in the Market-place, Frome, on Friday, the 3rd instant, at three o'clock in the afternoon, which was numerously attended. Messrs. Cobden and Bright had been announced to attend; but the latter gentleman, from a loss of voice, had been professionally instructed to abstain from speaking at public meetings, especially in the open air. Mr. Moore, however, supplied the place of Mr. Bright. Previous to the public meeting a preliminary meeting of the electors was held in the Assembly-room, at the George Inn, where Mr. Cobden strongly enforced the necessity of attending to the registration; and Mr. Moore having followed upon the same point, the meeting adjourned to the Market-place. Upon the motion of Mr. Coombes, seconded by Mr. Gregory, Mr. Wood was unanimously called to preside.

The CHAIRMAN said, he felt unworthy the honour they had been pleased to confer upon him; but, since they had appointed him to preside on that occasion, he would take the duty willingly, and, to the best of his ability, see that every speaker should have a fair hearing. He explained the cause of Mr. Bright's absence; and said, as Messrs. Cobden and Moore would, no doubt, occupy their attention for a considerable time, he would at once call upon the Rev. Mr. Ferney to read the letters received from gentlemen who had been invited to attend the meeting.

The Rev. Mr. Ferney then read letters excusing several gentlemen, from personal or relative affliction, attending the meeting, amongst whom were the Earl of Cork, Hon. Capt. Boyle, Sir Henry Strachey, W. Gore Langton, Esq., Col. Bouverie, &c.

Mr. COOMBS came forward amidst great cheering. Having explained the object of the visit of the deputation, who appeared before the meeting as "Free-Trade missionaries," and what was meant by Free Trade, he said he would direct their attention to Frome:—

"Has Frome prospered by the Corn Laws? It was once the distinguished seat of woollen manufactures, and it was a quiet town. Why are things now worse than formerly in Frome? You want a member. (Cries of 'No, not we!') Well, I see better for the future. (Cheers.) You want a member who is in favour of monopoly; a member who votes for little trade, instead of more trade. Is this calculated to maintain the character of your town? I may be told your trade has not dwindled away. To this I can only reply, that in the last 300 years the trade has not increased. Frome has little to boast of. (Hear, hear.) Other towns do not stand still. Your member does not say you shall not make goods; but he says you shall not sell them, or if you sell them you shall not receive payment for them. You must teach your member to vote for Free Trade, for the interest of Frome is not against it."

He then proceeded to show that the Corn Laws were opposed to the interest of the labouring classes, and contrasted the average amount of their wages with that paid to artisans in the manufacturing districts. He next contended that these laws had not benefited but injured the tenant-farmer: the question was therefore exclusively a landlords' question; they were the only class who received any benefit from them. Landlords denied this:—

"I have proved that the Corn Laws do neither farmer nor labourer any good, and the landlord says they do not benefit him. There must be something wrong here. Let us find out the evil and put the saddle on the right horse. Does not rent depend on produce? Is not the evil weapon made as to the quantity of wheat grown on the soil? If you were to cut to take a farm whilst corn sold at 80s., think you it would be valued as when wheat is at 40s.? (Cries of 'No, no!') If the lack of this town became as valuable as front streets, how long would the present occupiers remain in the land at the same rent as now? Why, till quarter-day. They would have notice to quit, and the rents would be raised. So it is with the land. If Government make wheat high, the rent will be raised. (A voice, "That is not the landlords' fault.") A gentleman says the landlords are not to blame for raising their rents. I was not so complaining of the raising of rents; every one has a right to get as much as he can for his property. What I complain of is, that the landlords say they get no benefit by the Corn Laws."

Mr. COBDEN, at considerable length, here showed the evils of competition for farms which led to the landlord getting the uttermost farthing, and sometimes more for a farm than it was worth. It was, therefore, the interest of the farmer, in order to diminish competition, that trade and commerce should flourish, so that he might find a better source of employment open to his sons than running after farms. Mr. COBDEN ably exposed the fallacy that Free Trade would throw land out of cultivation. Having touched upon several other branches of this subject, which he discussed and illustrated with great force and clearness, he said he should be happy to hear any question calculated to elicit information; and, thanking them for the kind hearing he had obtained, would beg leave to retire. (Mr. Cobden sat down amidst great cheering.)

A Mr. CANDY here put several questions to Mr. Cobden, which he answered to the satisfaction of the meeting.

ROBT. R. R. MOORE, Esq., came forward, and was enthusiastically received. He replied to the questions of Mr. CANDY, dwelling particularly on the subject of machinery: he showed that where most machinery was employed there the greatest increase had taken place in the number of labourers, and that higher wages were paid now than before machinery was employed. He denounced the monopoly of it, and desired that the whole people should be benefited by this great boon, which did the working man's drudgery, and diminished his labour. He exposed the West India monopoly in sugar; and, having entered into the question of general monopoly at great length and with much ability, he concluded a most eloquent address amidst the plaudits of the whole assembly.

The Rev. Mr. GRIFFITHS then moved—

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, the principles of Free Trade are in unison with the beneficent designs of the Creator, and calculated to benefit all classes of the community, especially the working class, and that, therefore, all laws which interfere with the free exchange of the commodities of this country for the productions of other nations ought to be abolished."

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Brown, and carried with only two hands held up against it.

Votes of thanks to Messrs. Cobden and Moore, and to the chairman followed, together with three cheers for the League; despite the efforts of the deputation to prevent it, a hearty groan or two for Monopoly succeeded, and the meeting separated.—Abridged from the Bath Journal.

MITCHAM ANTI-CORN-LAW ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this association was held at the Nelson's Arms, Merton, on Tuesday evening, the 7th instant, for the purpose of receiving the committee's report. On the motion of Mr. Holt, seconded by Mr. Penfold, Mr. Richard Aitkin was called to the chair. The Chairman, after opening the meeting with some suitable observations, called upon Mrs. Barter to read the report, which, having been duly moved and seconded, was unanimously adopted.—Mr. Saul, of the League, then rose and explained the effects of monopoly upon the interests of the different classes of the community; and with considerable effect pointed out that the working classes were specially interested in its removal. They were really the producers of all the consumable articles that were brought to market. To produce either manufactures or agricultural commodities labour was as necessary as raw materials or capital. It was therefore the interest of the operative to have a Free Trade, and unrestricted outlets to the productions of his skill and industry. The demand for goods and the demand for labour must be in the same proportion; and according to the demand for labour would be the amount of its value in wages. Corn was the raw material of labour. The strength of the operative could not be sustained without it; it was as necessary as the cotton or wool upon which his fingers might be employed. The Corn Law was not so injurious in raising the price of bread as in destroying trade and taking away the means of the people to purchase the necessities of life. The speaker concluded a lengthened and argumentative address amidst loud cheers.—Dr. Epps next addressed the meeting in his usual and pleasing style, showing the effect of the war in raising rents, and proving that the Corn Laws had been detrimental to the interests of the farmer, and were only sustained for the benefit of the aristocracy. He argued that an improvement in trade and manufactures would draw off the surplus population from the agricultural districts, diminish the competition for employment, and cause wages to rise. He concluded amidst great applause.—Thanks were unanimously voted to the speakers, and, on the motion of Dr. Epps, seconded by Mr. Saul, to the Chairman. Several subscriptions were announced on the spot, to which others are expected to be added.—Morning Advertiser.

GALASHIELS.—On Monday forenoon Mr. Prentice arrived at Galashiels, and immediately proceeded to Dryburgh Abbey, the beautiful residence of the Earl of Buchan. On Tuesday night a large Anti-Corn-Law meeting was held in the Relief Church, Galashiels. His lordship having been called to the chair, was received with the warmest plaudits. He said if any one had a direct interest in high prices he had, for most of his tenants paid corn rents; but he would not let his interest prevail over his conscience. He thought no cause could be advanced by severity and abuse, of which too much had fallen from gentlemen who had, in that neighbourhood and lately, advocated protection to agriculture. He knew that Mr. Prentice would address them in another way, and that they should hear nothing from him but sound and legitimate argument. His lordship's few remarks were loudly cheered.—Mr. Prentice commenced his speech by congratulating the meeting that they had the Earl of Buchan in the chair, "not," said he, "because he is of a family one of the most ancient and illustrious in the Scottish peerage, for rank alone is not entitled to much respect; but as an advocate of civil, religious, and commercial liberty,—I do congratulate you on having in the chair the descendant of the great and good Lord Cardross, who, after the conflicts of Drumclog and Bothwell Brig, in 1679, generously afforded his protection to the men who had fought in defence of the religious liberty of their country. I do congratulate you on having in the chair the son of Henry Erskine, who was the brightest ornament of the Scottish bar, an ardent friend of civil liberty, and who, if he had lived till now, would have been like his son, a warm friend to Free Trade,—and I do congratulate you in having in the chair a nobleman who stands out from amongst his own order to advocate commercial liberty, and the cause of justice and humanity." Mr. Prentice proceeded, in an address of considerable length, to show the manner in which the Corn Laws affected the interest of farmers. He was greeted at its conclusion with three hearty cheers. Three cheers for the Earl of Buchan and three for the League followed, and then the meeting separated.

Mr. Falvey, of the Anti-Corn Law League, is still actively and usefully engaged in Essex. During the past week he has delivered lectures at Romford, Billericay, Rayleigh, Rochford, Dunsbury, Braintree, and Halstead.

HUNTERSFIELD.—The electors in the township of Honley have this week been supplied with packets from the Anti-Corn-Law League. There is a large number of electors in this township. Of course the information will be read by a goodly number of the inhabitants, so that they will have a chance of learning the cause of the suffering from want of work, depressed wages, and high-priced food, which they have so long endured.—Leeds Times.

Five large bales of Anti-Corn-Law League pamphlets were landed at Wighton on Wednesday, per Warrington, consigned to Mr. W. M'Master, Castle Douglas, for distribution in the county.—Dumfries Courier.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE £100,000 FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, May 8, 1844.

N.B. As the subscription list is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

ERRATUM.
In LEAGUE No. 32, for "H. Bertram Evans, 32, Hertford-street, May-fair, £4 4s." read "W. Bertram Evans."

LANDLORD'S LIBERILITY.—We hear that Edward Holland, Esq., of Dumbleton, with that generosity and good feeling which so abundantly distinguish him, has abandoned his reserved right to the game upon all his farms to the several tenants thereof. The fact deserves to be made known, not only to the honour of Mr. Holland, but that, by so liberal an example becoming public, other landlords may be induced to imitate it. — Worcester Journal.

DIRECTIONS TO BE OBSERVED BY ALL PERSONS ENGAGED IN THE REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS FOR CITIES AND BOROUGHES.

ISSUED BY THE NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

The battle of Free Trade and the rights of industry must be fought in the registration courts; and we therefore publish the following condensed summary of the laws relating to the elective franchise, with plain directions for the guidance of those who have claims to be registered as voters. A corrupt Parliament is the result of previous corruption in the electoral body; to purify the Legislature we must, therefore, commence with the purification of the constituency; and the directions we subjoin explain the means that must be employed for this desirable purpose.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS.

The importance of the most earnest and unremitting attention to the registration of parliamentary electors cannot be too highly estimated. No law, however oppressive, can be removed from the statute-book but through the Legislature, which enacts all laws.

The National Anti-Corn-Law League, established to obtain the abolition of the Corn and Provision Laws, has, during the six years of its existence, laboured incessantly to inform the public mind on this momentous question. During that period millions of the people have petitioned the Parliament for the repeal of these laws, and have petitioned in vain. The House of Commons has refused even inquiry into their pernicious effects.

The Council of the League now turns from Parliament to those who make the Parliament; it appeals to the constituencies. To give effect to that appeal, the number of the friends of commercial freedom in the electoral body must be greatly increased. This can only be done by a more searching and close attention to the registration. Every Free-Trader should put his hand to this work; but, to do it effectually, he must make himself acquainted with the points necessary to be attended to, and the practical details of the law on the subject. To enable him to do this is the object of the following pages.

ELECTORS FOR CITIES AND BOROUGHES.

OF THE QUALIFICATION.

Since the passing of the Reform Act, electors for cities and boroughs consist—

First:—Of those who possess the franchise created by the Reform Act. This class consists exclusively of the £10 occupiers.

Second:—Of the possessors of the franchise by ancient right. These are freeholders and burgage tenants, freemen, liverymen, or burgesses; voters by various rights of inhabitancy, such as potwallers, inhabitant householders, and inhabitants paying scot and lot.

TEN POUND OCCUPIERS.

Any person occupying, either as owner or tenant, any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building, or any of them, together with any land occupied therewith, will be entitled to be registered, provided the premises are either separately, or together with the land, of the clear yearly value of ten pounds.

Joint occupiers may be registered if the yearly value of the premises, when divided, will give to each the sum of ten pounds.

If a house be divided into separate rooms, each person occupying a room, and having the entire use of that room, provided it be of the required annual value, and also properly rated, may be registered. But a mere lodger, provided with board by his landlord, will not be so entitled. His occupation must be an entire and separate occupation, with the exclusive use of his room and the key to the door of it. He must also have the power of entry to the outside or street-door in common with his landlord.

THE FOLLOWING CONDITIONS ARE NECESSARY TO ENTITLE THE VOTER TO BE REGISTERED:—

1. He must have occupied during the twelve months previous to the 31st of July. A successive occupation of different premises, each of ten pounds' yearly value, will be sufficient.

2. He must have been rated for the premises to all rates for the relief of the poor made during the twelve months. Joint occupiers must each be separately rated.

If the premises are partnership property, it is enough if the rating be in the name of the firm.

Any person not on the rate-book, being a separate or joint occupier, may claim to be rated; and on paying or tendering all arrears (if any) then due, he will be entitled to be rated.

If the overseer omit to enter the claimant's name on the rate-book, the person claiming will be deemed to be rated from the time the rate was made on which he claimed to be inserted.

3. The voter must have paid, on or before the 20th of July, all poor rates and assessed taxes due from him in respect of the premises during the twelve months previously to the 6th of April then next preceding.

When the rates or taxes are paid by the landlord in consequence of his receiving a higher amount of rent, the payment may be considered as having been made by the tenant.

No remission by the parish, or delay granted by the collector, will dispense with the necessity for payment. The full amount of rates and taxes must be paid, whether any demand has been made by the collector or not.

4. The voter must have resided for six months before the 31st of July within the city or borough, or within seven statute miles thereof. The distance to be measured in a straight line.

Occasional absence will not prevent a party from being considered a resident.

ANCIENT RIGHTS.

1. FREEHOLDERS and BURGAGE TENANTS in cities and towns, being counties, retain their ancient right in perpetuity, when the freehold is held for a life or lives, and the property is of the yearly value of ten pounds; and where it previously existed, the right is extended to persons within the new boundary.

To be registered, such persons must have been in possession of the property twelve calendar months previous to the 31st of July, unless acquired by descent, succession, will, marriage, or promotion to an office or benefice.

They must have resided within the city or town, or within seven miles thereof, for six months previous to the 31st of July, the distance to be measured by a straight line from the place where the poll has usually been taken.

In cities and boroughs, not being counties, the ancient right is preserved only where the property was in possession of the voter on the 1st of March, 1831, or accrued to him between that day and the 7th of June, 1832, by descent, succession, marriage, will, or promotion. No property since acquired can confer the right.

2. FREEMEN, LIVERYMEN, or BURGESSSES retain their right in cities or boroughs—

If admitted on or before the 1st of March, 1831—

If admitted since in respect of servitude—

If admitted since by right of birth, derived from any person who was admitted, or entitled to be admitted, in respect of birth, on the 1st March, 1831, or who has been admitted since in respect of servitude.

To be registered, this class must have a complete title on the 31st July, and must have resided six calendar months before the 31st of July, in, or within seven statute miles of, the city or borough, as before named.

3. INHABITANTS GENERALLY: POTWALLERS, INHABITANT-HOUSEHOLDERS, INHABITANTS paying SCOT and LOT.

A scot and lot voter must have been assessed to all rates made for the relief of the poor within six months before the 31st of July. He must have paid all rates demanded of him. Non-payment will not disqualify unless a demand has been made.

The rights of all these voters by inhabitancy is only preserved to such as were qualified on the 7th of June, 1832, and only so long as they remain qualified according to the former usage of the borough.

These rights will be lost if the voter's name is omitted from the register for two years successively, unless the omission is in consequence of the receipt of parochial relief, or of the voter having been absent on the King's service in the army or navy.

Six months' residence within the same distance required as in the case of freemen, &c.

REGISTRATION.

LISTS TO BE MADE OUT BY OVERSEERS ON OR BEFORE THE 31ST OF JULY.

An alphabetical list of £10 occupiers entitled to vote in boroughs.

Another and separate list, in each parish, of all other persons (except freemen and liverymen) entitled to vote in boroughs in respect of ancient rights.

These lists are to be signed by the overseers, and affixed on the doors of every church and chapel within each parish during a period including the two first Sundays in August.

LISTS TO BE MADE OUT BY TOWN CLERKS.

An alphabetical list of all freemen entitled to vote to be fixed on or near the town hall, or some public situation, during a period including the two first Sundays in August.

Town-clerks and overseers are to keep copies of all lists made by them respectively, for the perusal of any person, without the payment of any fee.

Every person should see for himself that his name is inserted in the list of that class of voters to which he belongs. If he have a twofold qualification, he should see that his name is on both lists. This is of great importance, as the voter may lose one qualification between the registration and election, and may still vote for the other.

Any person whose qualification consists of a successive occupation of different premises should be careful to observe that each set of premises is inserted in the list. If this should not have been done, he must send in a claim to the overseers, as below, describing all the premises.

CLAIMS BY PERSONS OMITTED FROM THE LISTS.

Persons omitted from the overseers' lists should give notice, on or before the 25th of August, to the said overseers, in the following form. If the claim be for a successive occupation of different premises, each of such separate premises must be described:—

To the overseers of the parish [or township] of — I hereby give you notice, that I claim to have my name inserted in the list made by you of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member [or members] for the city [or borough] of —, and that the particulars of my qualification are stated in the columns below.

Dated the — day of —, one thousand eight hundred and —.

| Christian name and surname of the claimant at full length. | Place | Nature of Qualification. | Street, lane, or other place in the parish [or township] where the property is situate, and number of the houses, if any (when the right depends on property). |
|--|-------|--------------------------|--|

(Signed)

A. B.

Persons omitted from the list of freemen should give notice to the town-clerk in the following form:—

To the town-clerk of the city [or borough] of —.

I hereby give you notice, that I claim to have my name inserted in the list made by you of persons entitled as freemen to vote in the election of a member [or members] to serve in Parliament for the city [or borough] of —, and that my qualification is as freeman of —, and that I reside in — street, in this city [or borough].

Dated this — day of —, one thousand eight hundred and —.

(Signed)

A. B.

Notices of claims must be delivered on or before the 25th of August.

OBJECTIONS TO PERSONS ON THE LISTS.

It is of importance that every voter should carefully examine the lists made by the overseers and town-clerk, to ascertain if any person has been inserted who is not entitled to vote. If there be any such, he is to give to the overseers or to the town-clerk a notice of objection, in the following form:—

To the overseers of the parish [or township] of (or to the town-clerk of the city [or borough] of) —.

I hereby give you notice, that I object to the name of — being retained in the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member [or members] for the city [or borough] of —.

Dated this — day of —, one thousand eight hundred and —.

(Signed) A. B., of [place of abode.]

On the list of voters for the parish of —.

The notice must also be given to the person objected to, as follows:—

To Mr. —.

I hereby give you notice, that I object to your name being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members [or a member] for the city [or borough] of —.

Dated this — day of —, one thousand eight hundred and —.

(Signed) A. B., of [place of abode.]

On the list of voters for the parish of —.

In all notices of objection, the christian name and surname of the person objected to, exactly as it appears in the list, should be written at full length. The christian name and surname, and place of abode of the objector, who must be a voter, must also be written at length, or the notice will be void.

If there be more than one list of voters, the notice should specify the list to which the objection refers; and if the list contains two or more persons of the same name, the notice should distinguish the person intended to be objected to.

The above notices must be given on or before the 25th of August. Copies of the notices should be kept by the person objecting.

Notices of objection may now be sent by post; but care must be taken to have a duplicate copy of such notice, stamped by the postmaster. Such duplicate will be good evidence of the service of the notice. The notice must be posted, so that the person objected to may get it on or before the 25th of August, or the objection will fall to the ground.

It is of importance that none but well-founded objections should be made, as the revising barrister has now the power, in cases of frivolous objections, of awarding the payment of costs to the amount of not more than 20s. in each such case.

GROUND OF OBJECTION TO £10 OCCUPIERS.

That the person does not occupy as owner or tenant; in other words, that he occupies by permission only.

That the property is not of the required value.

That the person has not occupied for twelve months before the 31st of July.

That he had not been rated twelve months before the 31st of July.

That he had not, on the 20th of July, paid all poor rates or assessed taxes payable before the 6th of April.

That he has not resided six months, before the 31st of July, within seven miles of the borough.

GROUND OF OBJECTION TO A SCOT AND LOT VOTER.

That he has not been rated to all rates made for six months before the 31st of July, or has not paid any of such rates demanded from him.

That he has not resided during the time or within the distance required.

GROUND OF OBJECTION TO A FREEMAN OR BURGESS.

That he was not duly admitted by the 31st of July; or, if the freedom is in right of birth, that it has not been derived from or through a freeman admitted before the 1st of March, 1831, or admitted since that period in respect of servitude.

That he has not resided during the time or within the distance required.

DISQUALIFIED ON ACCOUNT OF PERSONAL INCAPACITY.

Persons under twenty-one years of age; persons of unsound mind; persons convicted of felony, perjury, or bribery; commissioners and officers of excise, customs, and stamps; collectors of house and window duties, unless appointed by commissioners of the land-tax; all persons employed by the Post-office; police magistrates, police officers, and all persons employed in the Thames and Metropolitan police.

Also all persons who have received parochial relief within twelve months previous to the 31st of July.

PUBLICATION OF LISTS.

The lists of claimants and of persons objected to, made out by the overseers, are to be fixed on the doors of churches and chapels, in their respective parishes, during a period including the two first Sundays in September.

The lists of freemen claiming, or objected to, to be affixed by the town-clerk, during the same period, on the townhall or other conspicuous place.

Overseers and town-clerks must keep copies of each of their own lists for perusal by any person, without fee, from the 1st to the 15th of September.

SALE OF LISTS.

By the new Registration Act, passed in the session of 1813, overseers and town-clerks are required to keep copies of their lists for sale to any person demanding them, at the following scale of charges:—

| | |
|--|---------|
| Not exceeding 100 names | 0s. 6d. |
| Exceeding 100, and not exceeding 200 | 1 0 |
| 200, and not exceeding 300 | 1 6 |
| 300, and not exceeding 400 | 2 0 |
| 400, and upwards | 2 6 |

REVISING BARRISTERS' COURTS.

These courts are held between the 15th of September and the 31st of October—the particular day when, and the place where, may be ascertained from the newspapers of the county, or from the town-clerk or overseers of the parish where the qualification is situate.

It is of the greatest importance—

1. That every person claiming to be registered should attend the barrister's court in person, to prove his qualification.

A person objected to must, in like manner, appear to prove his qualification, or his name will be struck out of the list.

The person objecting must, in like manner, appear, or the objection will fall to the ground.

2. A voter is competent to give evidence in support of his own claim. If he should not be able to attend, any other person acquainted with the facts will be sufficient to prove his qualification. Without such proof, the claim will fall to the ground.

The law requires that copies of the revised register of each city and borough shall be kept for sale. Any person, on application to the town-clerk, may obtain a copy of the whole, or of any particular parish at the following price:—

| | |
|---|---------|
| If not exceeding 1000 names | 1s. 0d. |
| Exceeding 1000, and not exceeding 3000 .. | 2 6 |
| 3000, and not exceeding 6000 .. | 5 0 |
| 6000, and not exceeding 9000 .. | 7 6 |
| 9000, and upwards | 10 0 |

NOTE.—By the new Registration Act, any person considering himself aggrieved by the decision of the revising barrister may appeal to the Court of Common Pleas against such decision. Several points have been thus recently brought before that court, and the following relating to cities and boroughs have been decided:—

1. "That any number of rooms in a building, such rooms being each of £10 annual value, and let separately to different occupiers, is sufficient to confer a qualification."
2. "That the name of such occupiers, being inserted in the rate-book jointly with that of the landlord, is sufficient rating, and the payment of the rates by the landlord is sufficient payment on the part of such occupiers."
3. "A servant occupying a house not used for the purpose of his employer's business, but occupied by him for his own use, the rent being paid by him in his services, is held to be tenant, and entitled in respect of such occupation."
4. "The payment of rates by the landlord, in consideration of services performed by the occupier, who is rated, is held to be a sufficient payment by the occupier himself."
5. "A cowhouse or stable, of sufficient value, will give a qualification."
6. "Property situated in a borough, and of a description that will not give a qualification for the borough, will, if it be such as is required for county voters, confer on the owner the right of voting for the county."
7. "In cases of successive occupation of different premises, the voter must have all such premises as are required to make up the twelve months' occupation inserted in the list of voters."
8. "Delivering to the postmaster's managing clerk the duplicates and objections, for the purposes of posting, stamping, and comparing, is a delivery, for the purposes of the Registration Act, to the postmaster."
9. "Where a servant rents a house belonging to the master, but which he is permitted to occupy only for the more efficient discharge of the duties of his situation, there is no relation of landlord and tenant, and he will be disqualified from voting in the borough in which such house is situated."

SOUTH LANCASHIRE ELECTION.

As we are obliged to go to press before any definitive answer can be obtained from the committee of management in Lancashire, it is not in our power to announce the name of the Free-Trade candidate, but it will be known long before this paper (a copy of which will be sent to every registered elector of the division of South Lancashire) reaches the hands of our readers. As this is a contest not for a man but a principle, the organization of the Free-Traders has gone on continuously irrespective of the person on whom the choice may ultimately fall. We trust that this spirit will continue, and that this principle will be maintained throughout the approaching contest. Free-Traders must work, not only collectively, but individually, for every man should feel that his own interest and, what is more, his own personal honour is involved in the issue. We call upon every voter for his individual and spontaneous co-operation with the Free-Trade committee, and to give his undivided energies to ensuring success during the next week. Each has something more than his vote to give: he can look after the votes of his neighbours, he can persuade the doubtful and confirm the wavering.

All communications or suggestions likely to be useful in the election should be sent, with the least possible delay, to the Central Free-Trade Committee, King-street, Manchester; those who know of voters residing in their neighbourhood, but having their qualifications at a distance, should transmit the names of such persons with as much accuracy as is attainable. We trust that no Free-Trader who has a vote for South Lancashire, who is within the seas of Britain, no matter what may be the distance or what his occupation, will be absent on the polling day; and we earnestly hope that an effort will be made by all to poll early, so as to prevent the issue of the contest from being doubtful for a single moment. This is the great crisis of the cause with which the name and fame of Lancashire must for ever be identified. The nation looks to the men of South Lancashire to hold the lead in the struggle which they were the first to commence and are the most strenuous to maintain. Up, then, men of South Lancashire, your character is staked on the issue.

Strive till the monster-tax expires;
Strive for your altars and your fires;
Strive for the green graves of your sires,
God, and your native land!

"CARRYING CORN TO EGYPT.—Trojan always kept in the public granaries of Rome a supply of Egyptian corn equal to seven times the canon, or yearly gift to the poor citizens; in which prudent course he was followed by all his successors, till the store was squandered by the worthless Elagabalus. One year, when the Nile did not rise to its usual height, and much of the corn land of the Delta, instead of being moistened by its waters, and enriched by its mud, was left a dry sandy soil, the granaries of Rome were unlocked to feed the city of Alexandria. The Alexandrians then saw the unusual sight of ships unloading their cargoes of corn in their harbour, and the Romans boasted that they took the Egyptian tribute in corn, not because they could not feed themselves, but because the Egyptians had nothing else to send them.—Sharpe's Egypt under the Romans.

WESTBURY.

On Saturday last, pursuant to advertisement, Mr. Cobden, accompanied by Mr. Moore (as a deputation from the Anti-Corn-Law League), visited the ancient town of Westbury, where a public meeting was held for the purpose of enabling these gentlemen to explain the principles of Free Trade. The meeting was presided over by the Right Hon. the Earl of Radnor, who was supported by some of the most influential gentlemen in the neighbourhood. Considerable excitement prevailed in the usually quiet town of Westbury in consequence of the visit of the above distinguished advocates of commercial freedom. Early in the morning a band of music entered the town from Lavington, a distance of nine miles, with colours flying, bearing the mottoes, "Our Queen and our country," and "Freedom and happiness to every British subject," with the union flag, &c.

Shortly after three o'clock Lord Radnor, accompanied by the deputation of the League and several other gentlemen, entered the field, preceded by the Lavington band, and were received with loud cheering by the assembled multitude, which by this time must have amounted to nearly 2000. Among other gentlemen present were—

J. L. Phillips, Esq.; W. Matrauers, Esq.; F. Smith, Esq.; R. Edmunds, Esq.; W. Pawcett, Esq. (Salisbury); N. Overbury, Esq.; L. Overbury, Esq.; Messrs. A. E. Sanders, P. Anstey, J. W. Wilkins, Mr. Butcher, the Rev. R. Harris and Mr. Howe; Dr. Willett, Mr. Singer, Mr. Price, and Mr. Hewett.

There were also present several clergymen, amongst others the Rev. Messrs. Cartwright, Strickland, and Dyer, the two latter of whom, although declining to accede to the invitation of the chairman openly to defend the Corn Laws, nevertheless were extremely active as prompters to Mr. Webb, who at their instigation attempted, not to defend protection, but to attack the manufacturers and malign the League.

The Noble CHAIRMAN (who, upon rising, was received with great applause) stated that, although unconnected with that part of the county of Wilts, he was, nevertheless, deeply interested in the promotion of the agricultural interest, and was, therefore, most anxious to promote the cause of Free Trade. (Cheers.) It had been asked why Mr. Cobden should come down into the country to attempt to enlighten the agriculturists upon the subject of the Corn Laws, agriculturists being so much better able to understand and support their own interests? The reason was this:—Some years ago manufactures flourished for a season in an extraordinary degree. All at once that state of prosperity came to an end, the change being contemporaneous with an increase in the price of corn. Upon inquiring into the cause of this distress the manufacturers discovered that the only payment which other countries—America for instance—could give for manufactures was in corn, the importation of which was prevented by law. At that period corn was very abundant in America; and if England could have received the wheat of America that country would have been able to pay her debts, and have kept our manufactures in a thriving condition. The manufacturers having made this discovery, immediately began to agitate for a repeal of the Corn Laws, and were promptly opposed by the occupiers of land. Upon further inquiry it turned out that the agriculturists themselves were as deeply injured by the Corn Laws as the manufacturers; and, therefore, the gentlemen of the League thought it right to endeavour to convince the agriculturists of the fact, and Mr. Cobden and Mr. Moore had, to their great credit, at the expense of excessive labour, gone into different parts of the country for that purpose. It was his (Lord Radnor's) firm belief that those gentlemen were right, and that the Corn Laws were prejudicial to the agricultural interest; but were they not so, whatever his own interest might dictate, if they were injurious to the people in general, he trusted he should advocate their repeal. (Loud cheers.) But fortunately for him, his whole dependence being on land, he believed his interest would be promoted by the repeal of those laws. It was more especially for the protection of agriculture that the League wished to repeal the Corn Laws. The Protection Society recently established professed to answer the arguments put forward by the League in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws; but they had been unable to do so, as those arguments were based on the truest philosophy and the soundest principles of political economy. Mr. Cayley had recently published a pamphlet in defence of the Corn Laws, under the sanction of the new Protection Society, which had the noble Duke of Richmond for its head, and the Duke of Buckingham and Chancery as vice-president; and if ever there was a signal triumph to a cause, that pamphlet gave it to the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Hear.) He (Lord Radnor) had in his place in Parliament asked the Duke of Richmond whether he countenanced that pamphlet; and, although that nobleman was careful not to admit that he had done so, yet he asserted that it was a very good pamphlet. In nearly every instance where Mr. Cayley had professed to cite passages from Adam Smith and other authors, there were misquotations: for the future no person, whether favourable or opposed to the Corn Laws, could place any confidence in that pamphlet. Mr. Cayley, alluding to the riots in this country in the year 1830, stated that they were owing to the price of corn having been so low for the four or five previous years that the farmers had driven away their labourers, who, being unable to buy the cheap bread, embarked in those riots; but the fact was, that during the period mentioned in the pamphlet, corn, instead of being cheap, had actually been dear. (Hear, hear.) His lordship here went on to refute several other of Mr. Cayley's statements, and continued:—To show that foreign countries were not averse to the principle of Free Trade, he would state that in 1826 a proposition was made by the Prussian Government, to the effect that, if we would modify our Corn Laws, they would lower their duties on the reception of our goods. (Cheers.) After deliberation by the Cabinet, at the head of which was Mr. Canning, the Prussian Government was informed that the proposition could not be entertained, as it would interfere with the financial regulations of the country. It was said that foreigners would take our gold; but we must get our gold first from a foreign country, and in exchange for goods sold to that foreign country. (Cheers.) Another objection was, that it was of no use to agree to take foreign goods as foreigners would not receive ours without heavy duties. But what was the fact with respect to France? The duties had been relaxed on French goods, and the result was that between 1830 and 1842, the value of English manufactured goods exported to France rose from £475,000 to upwards of £3,000,000. (Loud cheers.) He had detained them longer than he ought to have done (cries of "No"); but he had felt anxious to explain how it happened that he presented himself there on that occasion, and what was the ground on which he had claimed their attention. Above all, he had been desirous of expressing his opinion as clearly and distinctly as he could, and to caution them against putting faith in the pamphlet which came forth with such high authority, which purported to be the emanation of the society, but which he was convinced none of the members of the society had really examined; their only blame was that they had allowed it to come forward without any examination. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. COBDEN then addressed the meeting at considerable length, and with his accustomed ability.

Mr. MOORE followed in an eloquent and admirable speech; at the conclusion of which,

W. MATRAUERS, Esq., moved the following resolution:

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, the principles of Free Trade are in accordance with the obvious designs of the Creator, and conducive to the best interests of mankind; and therefore, all monopolies, whether of corn or other commodities, which interfere with the full exchange of the manufactures of this country for the productions of other nations, ought to be immediately abolished."

The Noble CHAIRMAN then announced that if any gentleman had any observations to make on what had been said, or an amendment to move on the resolution which had been proposed, he should be most happy to hear him.

Mr. WEBB, of Trowbridge, stepped forward, and said he had one question to propose. He held in his hand a paper bearing date the 14th of April instant, headed "Home Trade compared with Foreign," and which stated that, according to Mr. McCulloch, the total value of the woollen manufactures of the country was £21,000,000, of which there was purchased in the home market £17,209,768; and the declared value of that exported was only £3,790,232. Now, he would ask, which were the largest figures. (A voice in the crowd, "How should we have a home trade unless we had a foreign trade.") Now, he would tell them about the foreign trade in a few minutes; he had a secret which the gentleman had not brought forward. He was at that moment £2000 worse than if he had never sent a yard of goods over to Jonathan's land. ("You should have taken corn for it.") Why, he would have had their corn, or their pork, or anything else, if they would have sent it. ("The Corn Laws prevented them.") Mr. Webb, amidst much laughter, proceeded to argue against a foreign trade and machinery.

Mr. COBDEN rebutted Mr. Webb's assertions as to the valuelessness of a foreign trade; it was unfair in that gentleman to complain of its insignificance while he helped to put restrictions upon it. He (Mr. C.) had been into the largest manufactories in Westbury and examined the wools, and he found that they came from Odessa or Saxony, or somewhere else abroad; they did not confine themselves to working up home wool; they were as much dependent on the foreign trade as though the factories and the men were all in Germany or in Russia. (Cheers.) Did not Mr. Webb, he asked, make up foreign wool himself? He (Mr. Cobden) would be bound to say that he was clothed from top to toe in foreign wool. (Loud laughter.)

Mr. MOORE believed that machinery was the greatest blessing ever given to mankind, and that the worse people's circumstances were the more they owed to machinery. Look at Ireland: wages there were 4½d. a day, but they had no machinery, and no manufactures; and there all the people were looking for employment on the land, and bidding down one another in wages. Mr. Webb had asked them to look at the ploughmen; and how were they paid? Why, according to the evidence given before the commissioners for inquiring into the employment of women and children in agriculture, the labourer was paid in Somersetshire from 8s. 3d. to 9s. 6d. per week. Now, ten acres of land would employ two men a year, and at 8s. a week their wages would not amount to £50 a year. Mr. Cobden's works, at Stockport, covered ten acres of ground; he used the most perfect machinery, and employed 600 persons, paying £20,000 a year in wages. The whole objection as to machinery was answered by that one statement. Machinery put men out of work! Look at the cotton trade. Eighty years ago but 40,000 persons were employed in it, whose wages amounted to £200,000; now, the same manufacture employed 1,500,000, and their wages amounted to £22,000,000. If there were no machinery, would there be the same demand for goods there now? Did not men like to buy everything cheap? And what made things cheap but the power, the economy, and the skill of machinery? Mr. Moore detailed many other striking facts, illustrative of the benefits resulting from machinery, and concluded an able speech amidst loud cheers.

Mr. WEBB next read an extract from a letter from Thomas Howarth, of Rochdale, which appeared in the Times of the previous Wednesday, in which he stated he was prepared to prove that one hand now produced as much as three produced 20 years ago, and that now they were only paid 8½d., whereas they formerly received 1s. 6d.

The Noble CHAIRMAN, after noticing some parts of Mr. Webb's previous speech, said that, with respect to the extract Mr. Webb had read from the Times as to the machinery that performed three times the quantity of work it did 20 years ago, for which 1s. 6d. was paid then, and only 8½d. now, it appeared to him (the noble lord) quite the contrary. Three times 8½d. was 2s. 1½d., and therefore, according to that statement, the man who before earned 1s. 6d., now earned 2s. 1½d. (Cheers and laughter.) If machinery was objected to, where was it to stop? Was not a spade a machine, and a plough, and a knife and fork? Were they to go back to the days when persons ate with their fingers? It would not do to declaim against machinery without stating the limit to which it was to be put.

Mr. MOORE said that Lord Radnor had given an answer to one portion of the argument: he (Mr. Moore) did not intend to contradict the statements contained in the letter which had been read, but rather to show how they proved his case. The hand loom weavers, 20 years ago, got 8s. a week. Mr. Howarth said that the power-loom weaver now turned out nine cuts at 1s. 2d., which gave him 10s. 6d. a week; so that he now had 2s. 6d. more than the hand-loom weaver 20 years ago.

A WEAVER: See how many hands that turned out; that is the way to put it.

Mr. MOORE: There was no satisfying some people.

First it was argued that fewer hands were employed; and then he showed that, instead of 40,000 hands, 1,500,000 were employed. Next he was told that wages were down; and he showed that, instead of £200,000, the wages paid amounted to £22,000,000. They were then told that machinery lowered wages; but he had proved that the power-loom weaver got 2s. 6d. weekly more than the hand-loom weaver in the best of times. Now they cried out, how many are put out of employment? [Some further discussion followed.]

The Noble CHAIRMAN then read the resolution, and, having put it to a show of hands, both for and against, said the motion was carried with only two dissentients. (Loud cheers.)

N. OVERBURY proposed a vote of thanks to the noble lord for his services in the chair; the resolution was seconded by A. E. SANDERS, Esq. of Lavington.

Mr. COBDEN said it was unnecessary to put such a resolution formally. The meeting could not fully appreciate the value of the services rendered by the noble lord in taking the chair on such an occasion. He gave the meeting a sanction by his presence, such as no other individual could give. He (Mr. Cobden) felt that they were indebted to him for all the noble lord had previously done, for what he had done that day, and for what they expected he would further do for them: he (Mr. Cobden) would lead them in giving three hearty cheers, such cheers as should be heard over at Trowbridge. (Loud laughter.)

The cheers having been most enthusiastically given, The Noble Lord said he was much obliged for their kindness. He had the object of the meeting much at heart, and was ready to do what he had done that day, and a great deal more, in order to promote it. They ought not, he thought, to separate without presenting their thanks to Mr. Cobden and Mr. Moore for the trouble they had taken in coming there, and the addresses they had delivered.

Three cheers were then given for Messrs. Cobden and Moore, and the assemblage dispersed.

At the conclusion of the meeting a number of gentlemen dined together in a room at Mr. Jones's factory, which was tastefully decorated for the purpose. Lord Radnor presided, and appropriate toasts were given, and supported in most able speeches by his lordship, Messrs. Cobden, Overbury, R. E. Sanders, and Paul Anstey.

BRISTOL.

A meeting of the Bristol branch of the Anti-Corn-Law League was held at the public rooms, Broadmead, on Friday se'night, and was numerously attended. The chair was taken by George Thomas, Esq.

The CHAIRMAN opened the business by saying that the observations he had to make would be very few, as he should be followed by the Rev. Thomas Spencer. (Cheers.) A tea meeting had been held lately, at which £630 had been subscribed, for the purpose of furthering the objects of the Anti-Corn-Law League; those objects being to instruct the people of this country in matters connected with their welfare. There was no question more important to the community at large than that of obtaining employment for the working classes. They knew that previous to the last two years there was a great difficulty in so doing; and he was fully persuaded that that difficulty was created solely by the folly of our legislators; had it not been for their unwise enactments there would not have been such masses of people asking for employment without obtaining it as there were at the present time. He was satisfied that all legislative interference with industry of any kind created evils instead of lessening them. He thought the Legislature, too, had seen this, when they attempted to find a remedy for the existing evils by an unnatural attempt to regulate the hours of labour. (Hear.) If they were to unshackle the trade of this country, and to take off the restrictions that were now imposed on it, there would be no necessity for any interference with the hours of labour, for the working classes would regulate them themselves. The chairman then exhorted the friends of Free Trade to continue their efforts; for though there was not much to complain of in the present prices of provisions, yet the evils of the Corn Laws were working silently, causing much mischief to this country. All men in business must be aware that, when they had a good connexion, if they neglected it they would be sure to lose it, and that it caused them a great deal of trouble to get it back again. England had been losing her former connexions, and her prohibitory laws had stimulated nations that were her best customers to turn to manufacturing for themselves, instead of exchanging their produce for her own manufactures. (Hear.) Another reason why their exertions should not be relaxed was, that should we have a bad harvest the same evils would be experienced as in 1828, 1829, 1830, and 1831; therefore, he impressed on them the necessity of renewed activity. He referred to the activity of the friends of the League in London, and concluded by calling on

The Rev. THOMAS SPENCER, Rector of Hinton Charterhouse, who, on rising, was received with much applause. He commenced by saying that the question of Free Trade was one of the great questions of the time in which we live; a question on which every man was called on to form an opinion, and to adopt a decided course, either for or against it, according to his conscience. Freedom of trade, as far as he knew the rights of man, was a birthright which no power could justly take away. Many persons interested themselves about the condition of the slave, and bemoaned the hardships of his lot, but took no part in the question of Free Trade. Those persons committed two great blunders—in the first place, their charity was always abroad, never at home; and in the next place, they did not understand the evil they tried to remedy. (Hear.) Let any Government begin with interfering with trade, to make laws affecting wages, to make the people educate their children in a manner prescribed by law, and they would only have to go a little farther to bring the people into a state very little superior to that of a vassal or a slave. (Cheers.) It was never sufficiently alluded to, that slavery was only the carrying out of the principles of restriction; if the principles of Free Trade were to be carried out, men would be ashamed to interfere with the rights of those whom they are called to protect. (Hear.) The speaker then alluded to the occupations of men; and proceeded next to illustrate the question of Free Trade from the history of Cain and Abel, arguing that though both pursued different occupations, yet both were equally dependent on the soil for maintenance—Cain being most intimately connected with it, he being a cultivator; Abel in a re-motor degree, as he was only a keeper of sheep. But it was necessary that a good understanding should subsist between them, as, if laws such as our Corn Laws had been made to prevent the free interchange of their respective commodities, each would have suffered by it, and they would have been deprived of the comforts which each could have afforded the other. (Hear.) After further illustrating the question, the speaker explained the proper province of Governments, which was to protect the property and persons of the people, and not to be interfering in matters which were foreign to the welfare of the nation. Governments ought to leave perfect freedom in all matters concerning religion, politics, charity, and trade. Religion was also connected with the question of Free Trade. Formerly it was thought to be nothing but a mere squabble between Manchester men and the landed proprietors, and, if anybody interfered, he was told that he was interfering with what did not concern him; now, Free Trade was allowed by those who had considered the subject to be well adapted to bring about the accomplishment of that blessed precept of Christianity, "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will towards man." (Hear.) Throughout the world each country produced something which another could not, and all countries possessed the common power of conferring benefits, and gave abundant evidence of the power and glory of Him who called forth the treasures of India, the fruits of Spain, the sugar of the West Indies, and the different productions of America and England, all of which the Divine Being, who made all and who ruled over all, has given to man that he might enjoy them. (Cheers.) To the lovers of peace Free Trade ought to be found acceptable. It was a great peacemaker. A spark thrown into the quarrel which existed between this country and America some years ago, would have set fire to the gunpowder, and there would have been an explosion. What prevented them from coming to open war. He would tell them: the manufacturers of England had their best customers in the United States, the operatives were dependent on the manufacturer for employment, and the tradesman on the operative, while the farmer was dependent on them all, and the landowners received their rents from the farmers. Thus all classes in England were interested in preserving peace with America, because of trade. (Hear.) On the other side of the Atlantic there were a number of men with wise heads and large purses, who said:—"If we are the best customers to England, England is also our best customer; if we take her cloth and her cutlery, does she not take our cotton and tobacco? What, then, is the use of quarrelling with them; we might as well cut our own throats as do that." (Great cheering.) It was also frequently said that it would not be for the advantage of England to make the nations round her richer, but that it would be better for her if they were poor; and some persons felt annoyed at America taking £50,000,000 from this country. That could be easily proved to be the contrary. Suppose a person keeping a shop,—would he prefer living in a poor place, where nobody was worth 6d., or would he not rather live where his neighbours had pounds to lay out with him? (Cheers.) Would it not be better for England if France were richer, and Spain quiet? It was far more honourable for a nation to seek to elevate itself, at the same time giving a helping hand to her neighbours, than to wish to rise in consequence of their degradation. (Cheers.) Free Trade was favourable to religion in another respect: persons who interested themselves in missionary proceedings were not sufficiently aware that the traders of England were mainly instrumental in ensuring the success of missions, the scenes of which lay at a distance of more than ten thousand miles away from home. It had been found that in proportion as the missionary had a practical sense of Free Trade, so did he prosper. John Williams, who was usually called the martyr of Erromanga, from his having been killed by the natives of that island, was a man of good sense. When he went to the various islands in the South Seas to prosecute the objects of his mission, he did not begin by preaching, but he first endeavoured to get the attentive ear and the willing mind of the untutored children of nature: he wished to get them favourably disposed towards him; and therefore, whenever he went among them for the first time, he always took cloth and other articles of British manufacture, to barter for such things as they had to offer in return. They found the cloth very useful to them, they set an equal value on the knives, and other hardware articles; they learnt a great deal by observing the movements of the vessel which brought Williams to them, and found that they derived many benefits from their intercourse with him. (Hear.) They were prepared to listen to what he had to say to them about other things; and Williams, like a discreet man, after he had ministered to their physical wants, poured into their open ears the words of truth and gladness that are in the Scriptures. Mr. Spencer instanced cases of a similar nature which happened in South Africa to the Rev. Mr. Moffat. The success of the mission there was getting doubtful, when the opportune arrival of a British ship, laden with articles of British manufacture, gave a new aspect to affairs, and the mission prospered (hear), just in proportion as they were enabled to supply the people with clothing. (Hear, hear.) The advocates of Free Trade were also frequently told that the principles they recommended might be right in the selves, and might work for the good of mankind, but that they never could be acted on in this country because of the enormous national debt. How could we, it was asked, with a heavy debt of £800,000,000, trade on equal terms with a country which had no debt, or had one comparatively small? Now, he thought the argument would prove the reverse. Suppose two men set up in business, say in the drapery line. One man is provident, cautious, and frugal, and has managed to keep out of debt; for, speaking generally, our debts were contracted through our own misconduct. The other man has not been so prudent, nor has he managed so well as the other, having got into debt, and incurred a mortgage on his premises for nearly the whole amount of their worth. He goes to the mayor of the town, and asks for some protective law in favour of himself, because he is not able to sell goods on equal terms with the man who has no mortgage, and, therefore, he ought to have a higher price than such. But no man thinks so but himself. The public do not think so; they would buy the goods according to their value, and have nothing to do with the private concerns of one whose stock is mortgaged. (Hear.) The wisest course of the mortgaged man would have been, instead of wishing to raise his prices, to lower them, and thus, by increasing the number of his customers, to be better able to compete with the man who had no mortgage. Mr. Spencer then considered the Free Trade question as a question of charity connected with justice; and severely censured those persons who had no objection to give their £3 or £10 towards the temporary relief of the poor; but when asked to give their support in endeavouring to find employment for the starving people by means of a repeal of the Corn Laws, invariably refused, because, they said, the question assumed a political aspect, and they never meddled with politics; yet, when an election came round, they would exercise their chief political right, and give their vote generally for the wrong candidate. After remarking on the folly of considering the question as one in which the manufacturers were alone interested, Mr. Spencer concluded his lecture, of which the above is but an outline, by alluding to the opinions held on the subject by the clergy. Whatever those opinions might be, they were bound, if opposed to Free Trade, not to give them expression, as their prayer-book contained prayers to the Almighty that he would bless this land with peace and plenty; so that they, in effect, prayed for Free Trade, as that was the only means whereby we could obtain what was asked. (Cheers.) He thanked the meeting for the kindness and patience they had manifested during his address, and sat down amidst great cheering.

A vote of thanks was then proposed to Mr. Spencer for his able lecture; which, having been seconded by the chairman, was carried by acclamation.

Mr. Spencer briefly returned thanks. He should not have been there that evening had he not promised their worthy chairman some weeks ago that he would attend. He was suffering from indisposition, and should be obliged to retire from active life for a time to recruit his strength. He begged to thank the meeting for the reception they had given him.

The meeting then broke up.—Bristol Gazette.

KINGSBRIDGE.—On the evening of Wednesday the 1st inst., the Rev. Thomas Spencer met the friends of Free Trade at Burgoyne's Commercial Hotel, where the assembly-room was crowded to excess, there being present above 600 persons. Some of the opulent classes, and a great many ladies, who seemed to take the warmest interest in the proceedings, were present; but the most remarkable feature of the assembly, as indicative of the "signs of the times," was the presence of many of the most intelligent and influential of the yeomanry of the surrounding district, who frequently joined in the warm applause by which the reverend lecturer's convincing arguments were received. The proceedings were commenced by R. Peck, Esq., who moved that Mr. Nicholas Gillard take the chair; this was seconded by the Rev. Mr. Miles. Mr. Gillard, who is a staunch advocate of Free Trade, then took the chair amid loud applause. The lecture was a most convincing refutation of the general arguments against Free Trade, whose benefits to all classes were clearly pointed out. Mr. Spencer was attentively listened to, and warmly applauded throughout and at the close. On the motion of Mr. Peck, a vote of thanks was unanimously given him for his able lecture. The chairman announced that a lecture would shortly be given here on the same subject by G. W. Soltan, Esq., of Plymouth, and that in all probability the town would shortly be favoured with a visit from Messrs. Cobden and Bright; the latter announcement was received with a burst of applause.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEMORIALS.

LEEDS.—As we anticipated, the electors of Leeds have given a most decisive testimony in favour of Free Trade, a decided majority of the entire constituency having already appended their signatures to the memorials to the borough members, calling upon them to support the motion which the Hon. C. P. Villiers proposes to submit to the House of Commons during the present month, for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Law. The canvass is not yet completed, but, so far as it has proceeded, the result is highly satisfactory, and may be thus stated:—

| Total number of electors who can vote | 4976 |

The numbers who have signed the memorials is 2578, being a majority of the entire constituency of 90, and more by 509 than voted for either of the sitting members at the last election, the numbers who then polled being, for Mr. Beckett, 2073; for Mr. Adam, 2013. But it must not be supposed that all who have not signed are in favour of monopoly; on the contrary, a considerable number of them distinctly state themselves to be Free-Traders, but, for various reasons, excuse themselves from signing the memorials. Upwards of 50, who have left the town, cannot be seen, and, as one-half of these are probably Free-Traders, the testimony of this constituency is beyond all dispute already given in favour of perfect freedom of trade.—Leeds Mercury.

WIGAN.—A memorial to the members, C. Standish and P. Greenall, Esqrs., requesting their votes in favour of Mr. Villiers's motion for the abolition of the Corn Laws, to be signed by registered electors only, is now in course of signature.

ANTI-LEAGUE PETITIONS.

GARSTANG.—Nicholas Drinkall, a small farmer, living in Bulk, has been employed by Mr. W. Garnett, the rejected candidate, to obtain signatures to the protection petition in Bulk. Honest Nicholas, in the course of his peregrinations, called on Mr. John Hargreaves, formerly of Leonard-gate, who requested to look at this product of monopolist wisdom, and, observing that it purported to be the petition of the inhabitants of Bulk, asked how the names of several persons who neither lived in, nor owned a lot of land in that township, came to be inserted in it. Nicholas, not in the least abashed, replied, "Oh, it makes no matter; if I can only catch them in Bulk, that's quite enough; I shall get paid for't job all same." So far so good. Master Drinkall was candid enough in this instance, but he did not condescend to explain how it came to pass that, in several cases which were pointed out to him, half a dozen separate petitions had been signed by the same individual. This, we are assured, is an undoubted fact.—Leicester Guardian.

BURNLEY.—A respectable correspondent at Burnley writes as follows:—"An instance of trickery and deception in obtaining signatures to a Pro-Corn-Law petition, has just come to light. The agent of one of our great monopolist landowners, accompanied by another person, were a few days ago engaged in obtaining signatures to a petition for 'Protection to British agriculture,' in a district near this, called 'Pendle Forest.' Among those on whom they called was a shoemaker in the village of Higham; when he inquired what the petition was for, he was told that it was 'to obtain a reduction of the duties on foreign commodities, and to extend our commerce; and with this understanding he signed the petition; but on discovering, during the day, the deception that had been practised upon him, he went and demanded of the aforesaid person that his name might be erased, which was done on the following day. Four respectable persons, neighbours to the man imposed upon, will make affidavit to the truth of this statement.'—Leeds Mercury.

STANDISH.—On Monday, the 29th ult., a person bearing the cognomen of "the parish clerk of Standish," was busily engaged in that neighbourhood in collecting signatures to a petition, as he said, "to keep up land." The worthy, it appears, had been pretty successful in his undertaking in the environs of the parsonage, but, on coming more out into the open air, he found some difficulty in obtaining signatures; and one of the farmers, we understand, candidly told him that it was quite against his principles to make bread either scarce or dear, therefore he could not conscientiously sign the petition, for he wanted cheap land that the people might be enabled to obtain cheap provisions.—Liverpool Mercury.

REPRESENTATION OF EDINBURGH.

The following resolution of the Council of the League has been transmitted to the secretary of the Edinburgh Anti-Corn-Law Association:—

"At a meeting of the Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League, held this day (30th of last month), it was resolved unanimously that the best thanks of this Council be, and are hereby given to the chairman of the annual meeting of the Edinburgh Anti-Corn-Law Association, held in that city on the 29th ult., and to the movers, seconders, and supporters of the resolutions then adopted, for this additional evidence of their firm adherence to principles, the recognition of which the League was embodied to secure. By order of the Council, GEORGE WILSON, Chairman."

AGRICULTURE.

THE CROPS AND THE CORN TRADE.

The laws which prohibit the importation of foreign grain into this country, except when we are visited by a serious dearth, render any marked peculiarity of the seasons which may affect the crops and the corn trade matter of anxious public concern. But if the weather and the aspect of the season be watched anxiously by the consumer, how much more cause has the farmer for regarding the prospects of the coming harvest with anxiety! Subjected to a law which places his business in an artificial state, the British farmer often finds that plenty brings him no prosperity, and that the comparatively high price occasioned by a deficiency has been estimated, so far as his outgoings are concerned, to be the ordinary and permanent selling price of his produce.

We shall see how this artificial state of things tells against the industrious agriculturist.

The present season has hitherto been a most remarkable one; after a very mild winter we had a cold and wet March, which has been followed by upwards of six weeks of very dry hot weather. Already has great apprehension been excited as to its effect upon the spring corn. The Mark-lane Express says:—"So protracted a drought at this season of the year may be regarded as altogether an unusual circumstance, and it is not improbable that more or less of mischief has already been done; this much is certain, that, unless the country be speedily refreshed by copious warm showers, barley, oats, and peas will receive serious injury."

The Bedfordshire report, contained in the same journal, says:—"The spring cropping has done badly of late, more particularly upon the chalky soils; there is much barley which cannot be sown till we get rain, and much of that which is put in will only partially vegetate, consequently will be very irregular, and, if the rain hold off much longer, must be a very bad crop." Again, we learn that "the land is too dry for planting mangel wurzel and potatoes." So, upon all except the very best lands, "the trefoil is going off into the flower, but will produce, in all probability, a very scanty crop of hay." Moreover we learn "that the young clover recently sown with the spring corn scarcely anywhere comes up; the chances are greatly against the young seeds planting at all well this year." The same view is taken in Messrs. Sturge's circular, dated the 1st of May, where they say, "Should the drought continue a fortnight longer, accompanied, as at present, by easterly winds, the growing crops of oats, beans, peas, and barley must sustain serious injury." Already ten days have elapsed since the above was written, and no rain has fallen, while a dry north-east wind and a hot sun have steadily prevailed. To the observant farmer this state of the weather promises inconvenience and loss; oats, beans, peas, roots, and hay, all, in short, upon which the farmer depends for feeding his stock, on his ability to feed which his future crops of grain again depend, will certainly be scarce and dear, possibly they may prove almost total failures. Very much the same thing occurred in the year 1826, when the spring corn, hay, and leguminous products were so seriously deficient, that the Monopolist Government of that day admitted those commodities from abroad at low rates of duty. Now, under such circumstances as the present prospect of what we may call the stock-feeding crops afford, the farmer will lessen his stock of fattening cattle and sheep, because the high prices of provender leave him but slight chances of profit from feeding stock; this will react upon the breeders, who will find their lean stock a drag in the market, while the consumers of meat will have that important necessary of life considerably advanced in price. The absence of his usual amount of stock will reduce the fertility of the wheat land for, perhaps, several years to come; and the foundation of a future deficiency of the most important kind is laid, and thus the perpetual fluctuation to which British agriculture has been subjected is kept up.

If the trade in grain had been free the deficiency in our own growth of cattle food would have been made up by importation; oats, beans, and peas would come in from various countries; linseed and oilcake, rye and lentils from abroad, would in some measure have supplied the vacuum occasioned by the deficiency of our root crops, and the steady, regular amount of gain which the farmer ought to calculate upon from feeding stock would be obtained. At the same time the fertility of the future wheat land would be kept up. For the profit of the farmer the price of the inferior grains and pulse which feed his stock can never be too low, as that will enable him to furnish a considerable supply of meat at a comparatively low price, which will have the effect of extending the consumption of animal food amongst the labouring classes. And we must remember that the more stock the farmer keeps the larger will be his crop of saleable corn—his barley and wheat. For instance, suppose a farmer, by feeding ten head of cattle, could clear, after paying for the food consumed and the labour of attending to them, a profit of £5 each, or £50; he would be benefited and not injured by a state of prices which induced him to feed twenty head for the sake of a profit of £2 10s. each, or £50 for repayment of food and labour, inasmuch as in the latter case, having obtained as much profit from feeding at low as he could do at high prices, he would have double the quantity of manure to apply to his money-returning crops. It is therefore plain that in dry seasons like the present, when provender is scarce in this country, the prohibition to import foreign provender is a direct and permanent loss to the farmer. If, on the other hand, our cattle crops here are abundant, the same valuable results accrue to the farmer with less aid from importation.

But then the dry season which destroys spring corn and pulse is favourable to wheat. Thus we find from the Mark-lane Express, that the reports of the appearance of the wheat "are upon the whole far from unfavourable;" while the Bedfordshire report, to which we have before alluded, says, "the wheat has gone on admirably, and at present shows no sign of being thirsty." Messrs. Sturge say, "the growing wheats are generally spoken of as very promising." In Scotland also the wheat is said to be "looking beautiful." Our own observations—which have been chiefly confined to the clay districts round London—confirm this view of the wheat crop, for where the land is in moderately good condition, there is a full, but not too luxuriant, plant, which, with a warm summer, will certainly produce a very abundant crop. From the fineness of the autumn a large breadth of wheat has been sown, and not a few farmers—chiefly yearly tenants—have been trying to make up for the low prices of last year by putting into wheat all the land on which there appeared to be any hope of obtaining a crop. Everything, therefore, tends to render it probable that the next harvest's produce of wheat will be large, and the price low. The farmers, therefore, who have been induced by the Corn Laws to place their main dependence on their wheat crop, and to look for only a small acreable return—and who form, perhaps, seven-tenths of all English farmers—will, therefore, become distressed from the effect of an abundant harvest. While they have been frightened by the bugbear of foreign competition, which could not by possibility have injured them, their Protectionist landlords and legislators have produced by means of home competition the very consequences they affect to dread from foreign importation. In such a season, therefore, as the present promises to be, the farmer is doubly injured by the Corn Laws: first, in losing the profit on his stock and the fertilizing power to which stock-keeping gives occasion, by the exclusion of cheap provender; secondly, in causing an unnatural home competition amongst wheat-growers, and so reducing the price of wheat lower than under a Free Trade could occur, while rents and burdens remain according to the promised act-of-Parliament price.

WHERE ARE THE "FARMERS' FRIENDS?"

The ludicrous figure which the dukes, marquises, earls, baronets, members of Parliament, and squires cut in the eyes of their own adherents is forcibly illustrated by the following comments of the agricultural journals on the Ministerial proposal to take off all duty on the export and import of wool. Even the alarmist monopolists can scarcely raise a cry against the practical effect of this measure, but they exclaim against the "principle of Free Trade" which it sanctions, and call their parliamentary advocates, who bluster so fiercely in the country, and become so tame and docile in the metropolis, to account for not vigorously resisting the measure. Thus the Mark-lane Express, after referring to the Free-Trade party and other real parties in the House of Commons, says:—

"But where is the country party? Where were they last Monday night? Where were they when the wool-growers were threatened with diminished protection, as the corn-growers had been before? Echo answers, 'Where!'"

And then the following picture of the political monopolists is drawn by one of themselves:—

"Well, there was a time—but no matter—there were 'farmers' friends,' who stuck to their 'order,' from which nothing seduced them; but they are gone. There is now no voice from Lincolnshire, none from Leicestershire, none from the South Downs of Sussex, none from any other wool-growing district."

And, again—

"We are to have a reduction on coffee—good. On sugar some changes in the differential duties—good. We do not object to either of them, ipso. Something, however, lurks behind: these are straw, Free-Trade straw; Free Trade in corn is to follow, provided rents can be kept up. The whole question is that of rents and patronage. 'Humbly the farmer as much as you like, but keep up our rents—let us have the sweets of place and patronage from the Government of our own creation. We will sacrifice British wool as we have sacrificed British corn, provided we can do so without loss to ourselves.'"

This is certainly drawing from life. The farmers have much reason to complain of being called upon to put themselves into an Anti-League fever, when the dukes, lords, and squires who raised all the hullabaloo, quietly sit by and see their own Minister doing—by slow and imperfect measures, but certainly—the League work. Oh, false Buckingham! oh, faithless Richmond! oh, recreant Christopher!—where are you? Can't you get up even a few sham motions? Monopoly is in danger; the case of wool has been a standing one against the Corn Laws, and the present instance furnishes a new precedent in favour of Free Trade; for the wool markets are actually rising in consequence of the anticipated abolition of the "protecting" duty. Thus we find it recorded in the very same paper from which we have extracted the howl against Free Trade, that at Leeds inquiry for British wool amongst the manufacturers had increased during the week succeeding the announcement of free trade in wool. Again, we see that at

"LIVERPOOL, May 4.—SCOTCH.—The announcement of the duty being entirely taken off all foreign wool has had a good effect on our market, and we experienced a good demand for laid Highland wool at former rates."

And afterwards the same reporter says:—

"FOREIGN.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken the trade rather by surprise in taking the duty entirely off wool; there are conflicting opinions as to the effects, but ultimately the most favourable results must be the consequence, as we shall now be able to get our supply of low foreign on as good terms as the Belgians and Americans."

In a commercial community like Liverpool, which allows itself to be represented or misrepresented by two such monopolists as Lord Sandon and Sir Howard Douglas, there must, indeed, be conflicting opinions; and the blockheads have for the present—if the parliamentary representation affords a fair test—the ascendancy.

"IT IS A LABOURERS' QUESTION."

Monopolist Landlords omnes.

The lords and squires who have got up the "Protection" meetings in the rural districts have anxiously and eagerly asserted that the question of Corn Laws or Free Trade is a labourers' question. That is a position we do not deny. On the contrary, we have asserted it with unflinching constancy, and we have invariably endeavoured to bring the facts as well as the arguments, pro and con, to the attention of the labourers themselves. This view of the question has always formed an important one in all the addresses of the Free-Trade speakers when in the rural districts, and nothing more broadly the dishonesty of the advocates of Monopoly than the fact that, though in their packed meetings they talk glibly about the labourers' interest in the question, they take especial care to prevent the labourers themselves from discussing the subject in their own way. Our readers will recollect a paragraph we extracted from a Wiltshire paper, in which the mode of getting up labourers' Pro-Corn-Law petitions was exposed; and from the same source we this week obtain some further illustrations of the same topic. First, we find the following:—

"CONDITION OF THE LABOURERS.—We are glad to find that the working classes in this county are beginning to inquire into the causes that have brought them into their present deplorable condition. We understand that the letters of Mr. Arkell, which have for some weeks appeared in this paper, have had a singular effect on the labourers in many places. The meeting at Pewsey, which is recorded in another column, is a striking proof of this. Should the feeling spread, and if properly cultivated it must do so, class legislation and its train of evils, including the tax on bread, the most cruel of all imposts, will soon be driven from this once happy land."—Wiltshire Independent.

Perhaps some of our readers may require to be told that Mr. Arkell is a tenant-farmer of Wiltshire, who has for many weeks past published long letters in favour of free trade in corn. That these letters have an effect upon the minds of the labourers will surprise no one who learns that Mr. Arkell is an excellent farmer, an improving farmer, one who really cultivates his land, and of course is the real friend of the labourer. As evidence of Mr. Arkell's ability in his occupation we may mention that he last year obtained the Royal Agricultural Society's prize of £50 for the best essay on draining. The following passage from his last letter may be taken as a specimen of his matter and his manner:—

"Some of your masters will, I dare say, advise you to be quiet and let things alone, and not trouble yourselves about voting at elections or striving for a repeal of the Corn Laws or anything else, but still to leave your affairs to them. I say do no such thing; as your duties as servants towards those persons who employ you for hire are of one kind, and your duties towards your God and your country are quite of another kind. While you are on your master's service, you are bound in conscience and in justice towards him to labour with your hands, and not grudgingly alight his work or neglect his interests, but to perform that which he fairly requires of you, and to behave yourselves as the Scriptures advise servants to behave towards their masters—civilly and respectfully. And as freeborn Englishmen your masters have no more to do with your rights and privileges than you have with theirs: slaves are under their masters' will and leave a all time and in all seasons; but freemen who are bound to maintain themselves in sickness and health, are not at all obliged to listen to the advice of their masters, unless they find the interest of the master goes with their own, and that he is both honest and firm in the cause he espouses."

This cuts away the ground from the Monopolist squires, who fancy they can put the screw upon their tenants, and compel them again to put their screw upon their labourers, for the purpose of getting up a show—and it is a mere mirage—of public support of artificial scarcity. Yet this must be the way in which the labourers will discuss the question, for they have no high rents or high wages under the present system of monopoly to blind them from perceiving its true bearings. Again, Mr. Arkell says:—

"I see that the people of Wiltshire are about to hold an open-air meeting in the fields for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and which I think is both wise and just, as you will then see the feelings of the great body of the people upon it. Let there be open meetings in every town and village throughout the county; and if in any villages the authorities of the parish should not allow of an open-air meeting, collect yourselves together in some friend's house, field, or barn, as it matters not where you meet, so that you behave yourselves peaceably, and keep away from the property and persons of those who are opposed to you. Let angry feelings should arise between your masters and yourselves. It is the right which the constitution of the country gives us all, both masters and men, that enables us to meet freely together and discuss our grievances and oppressions; and those are the real enemies to their country who are for the putting down of such public meetings, or for suppressing the voice of the people by force. I firmly believe that a total and an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws would be the greatest good to yourselves which could be brought about in the shortest time."

And how do the Monopolists treat such appeals to the labourers, when really and fairly made? Let the following paragraph, from the local newspaper, answer that question:—

"PEWSEY.—On the 22nd ult. a meeting was held at the Royal Oak Inn, Pewsey, for the purpose of considering the state of the labouring classes in this country. It was numerously attended by the tradesmen, mechanics, and labourers of the place. Mr. Arkell's letter 'To the Labourers of Wiltshire,' which appeared in the Wiltshire Independent of the 18th, was read, and a discussion on its contents occurred. Such was the satisfaction at the truths it contained and the sentiments it expressed that an address to Mr. Arkell (thanking him for it, and requesting him to continue to expose the grievances arising from bad government), signed by upwards of 50 persons, was unanimously agreed to. To such an extent is tyranny carried in this village, and so great is the fear which the 'little great' entertain lest the distresses of the poor and the rights of labour should be discussed, that it has been endeavoured to prevent any future meetings of the kind by persecuting those persons who attended this. Some workmen have already been discharged from their employment, and loss of custom has been threatened to tradesmen if they attend any more such gatherings. Notwithstanding these untoward circumstances the industrious classes at Pewsey talk of forming a society for mutual instruction."—Wiltshire Independent.

This is the way the Monopolists deal with the labourers when they seek themselves to investigate that which is so loudly proclaimed on all hands to be their own question. Do the Protectionists really imagine the monopoly which requires to be upheld by such professions and such practices can long be maintained? Such acts and such sayings will not be lost upon the industrious classes of Wiltshire. Now, Pewsey is a large agricultural village, in the midst of a tract of most fertile land, which is cultivated in a very slovenly way; and where, while the farming labourers are most wretchedly paid and most irregularly employed, there are hundreds of acres which, by mere draining, might be made to double their present produce. Instead of adopting such rational means of improving their land, the Monopolists resort to such schemes as are alluded to in the following paragraph to bolster up a rotten system:—

"PRO-CORN-LAW PETITIONS.—We noticed, last week, the tricks the Monopolists were having recourse to in order to obtain signatures to their petitions in favour of the Corn Laws, that is to say, for dear bread, and low wages. They continue at their dirty work, using fraud where they cannot succeed by finesse. The means adopted to swell the 'monster' requisition to Mr. Solheron, which we exposed at the time, are being brought into play to give these petitions the semblance of popularity, and the grossest frauds are unblushingly perpetrated, names being put down in numbers without the consent of the parties, and, in many instances, against their consent! We are acquainted with cases where this dishonest course has been pursued, and are in possession of the names of the parties implicated, who may rely upon it the rascals, however cleverly done, will not escape detection."—Wiltshire Independent.

We trust the writer of the above will publish the names of the individuals alluded to, that they may be held up to the scorn and contempt of the community. It seems that from the "Central Protection Society" down to the Monopolists of an obscure Wiltshire village—from Mr. Cayley down to the getters-up of rural petitions—the Monopolists can only maintain the appearance of support or the semblance of a case by the grossest acts of fraud and misrepresentation. The Monopolists must be moonstruck not to see that they are working out most speedily their own discomfiture. In the following passage Mr. Arkell records the receipt of the Pewsey address to himself:—

"This morning I have received an address from about fifty of the tradesmen of Pewsey, Wiltshire, thanking me for the letter which I addressed to you this day fortnight, and the bearer of it informs me that he was discharged from his work because he entertained notions of Free Trade, and was at the meeting held at the Royal Oak Inn, Pewsey, on Monday last, when this address was got up and the letter publicly read over! Here is tyranny with a vengeance! And who can wonder at the bare bones and ragged backs, when a poor journeyman tailor cannot venture out to a meeting at the Royal Oak Inn, Pewsey, without being discharged from his labour?"

When Monopoly is thus attempted to be maintained, it is as plain as the sun at noonday that the end draweth nigh.

ARE THE TABLES TURNING?

Our readers have heard much of the competition for farms which exists amongst farmers, and we have frequently shown how the landowners, by availing themselves of that competition, have obtained rents higher than are warranted by the state of their farms and the conditions upon which they are let. But of late many circumstances have come to our knowledge which show that, apparently, the competition exists with undiminished intensity; yet it is only amongst an inferior class of farmers, or for farms which offer considerable advantages. Indeed we incline to the opinion that the tables are turning upon the landlords; and that they can no longer get men of capital and skill to enter upon their farms as yearly tenants, or as rents estimated on act-of-Parliament-promised, but not real prices, or under burthensome and restrictive covenants. We know that a nobleman, who has long enjoyed the same of being one of the worst and most arbitrary landlords in England, has lately granted several fourteen and twenty-one years' leases, upon terms which are said not to be unreasonable, and by which he has abandoned all interest in the game. This is significant. Let the fortunate farmers thank the League for their security from oppression and spoliation. Still there is an active demand for good farms upon fair terms; and every owner of land who is willing to grant a long and a rational lease may have the choice of many skilful and responsible farmers. When, therefore, we find a landowner compelled to resort to public advertisements to obtain tenants, we may be sure that there is something vicious in the way in which he deals with his property. This seems to be the case with the Earl of Hardwicke, to whose advertisement of three farms to let a correspondent draws our attention in the following facetious note:—"Earl Hardwicke will thank Mr. Cobden to find him tenants! Lord H. is so ESTIMABLE a LANDLORD, that he feels obliged to advertise for tenants, as the applicants are so very numerous that he knows not how to choose!!"—whereupon he encloses the advertisement, which runs thus:—

"To let, Wimpole Valley Farm, consisting of about 350 acres of land, situate in the parishes of Wimpole and Arrington. For information apply to Captain Hart, R.N., Arrington-bridge. Also, Evereden Hill Farm, of about 100 acres, in the parish of Evereden. Also, Hedge Hill Farm, of about 80 acres, in the parish of Bourne.—For information apply as above."

It will be seen that his lordship's agent is a captain in the navy, who, like the drill sergeant we mentioned last week, has probably been appointed to the agency on account of his quarter-deck habits of obedience to command, rather than from his knowledge of the management of landed property. This ignorance in the choice of agents is one of the most fatal evils which beset our landed aristocracy. A drill-sergeant or a led captain, a stud-groom or a favourite footman, can, as most landowners imagine, easily be converted into stewards and land-agents; but with what calamitous results to their tenants and to agriculture let the English farmers declare! Lord Hardwicke has been a sailor, and we should like to know what he would think of a proposal to appoint the first obsequious land-surveyor he met with, to pilot a ship! Yet this would not be a whit more absurd than to select a sea-captain as a land-agent.

At all events, the simple fact that a landowner is obliged to advertise for tenants for three farms is decisive evidence that from some cause or other his property is mismanaged.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Notices to Correspondents deferred till next week.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order, to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one-quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

THE WEEKLY MEETING of the LEAGUE will be held in the THEATRE-ROYAL, COVENT-GARDEN, on WEDNESDAY EVENING NEXT, the 15th of MAY. GEORGE WILSON, Esq., will take the Chair precisely at HALF-PAST SEVEN O'CLOCK.

The meeting will be addressed by James Wilson, Esq.; Rev. John Burnett, of Camberwell; Mr. Turner, of Othry, Somersetshire, farmer; and other gentlemen.

Cards of admission may be had on application at the Offices of the League, on Monday and Tuesday, between the hours of eleven and four o'clock.

Applications for Private Boxes to be made personally or by letter on Monday.

The cards of registered Members will admit, as heretofore, to Pit and Galleries.—DOORS TO BE OPENED AT SEVEN O'CLOCK.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, May 11, 1844.

The Council of the League, in pursuance of its great object—the Emancipation of British Industry from the Commercial Restrictions to which it is subjected—has resolved to combine, with the Free-Trade Bazaar about to be held in Covent-garden during a part of this summer, an Exhibition of the Products of British Arts and Manufactures. It has long been desired by all who take an interest in the intellectual and mercantile progress of the nation that England, like France, should have a periodical exposition of the artistic condition of the different branches of industry, so as to afford the means of judging how far intellectual refinement has kept pace with the advance in physical comforts. As the League is the only great body before the country which has no connexion with party politics, it is peculiarly fitted to undertake the task, and is, indeed, to some extent bound to do so; for it is believed that very few Englishmen are aware of the wonders that have been wrought by British skill and industry, particularly in the ornamental manufactures; and still fewer are aware of the vast and varied advantages we possess for commanding pre-eminence in the world's markets if they were opened to our free competition.

No existing edifice could enable the Committee, under whose superintendence the Exhibition has been placed, to display all the processes of the various manufactures; they trust, however, to be able to show their unrivalled results, and to illustrate them by specimens of the articles in their various stages of manufacture. In Cotton, for instance, the progress of the industry exercised upon the material will be illustrated by specimens of the change wrought in every stage, from the growing plant to the finest lace.

An effort will also be made to exhibit, historically, the progress of art in various manufactures; thus the Potteries will give specimens of all the stages of their progress from the coarse butter-pots of Plot's age to the beautiful porcelain of our own day.

The beneficial effects resulting from the removal of protection will be illustrated in various manufactures, but more particularly in that of silk, which has made such wondrous progress since it has been partially emancipated from the withering influence of the pretended protective laws which discouraged ingenuity and prohibited invention. In this branch of industry specimens will be exhibited of the products of British looms which more than rival the boasted productions of France and Italy. New inventions in machinery, engineering models, new patterns and designs in the various branches of artistic production, are among the objects which it is the desire of the Committee to collect and exhibit. They wish to direct public attention both to what British industry has already effected, and to what it holds out a promise of further accomplishing; gold and silver medals and certificates of honour will be given to the exhibitors of the best articles in design and execution in each branch of British manufactures, and the adjudication of these prizes will be intrusted to gentlemen of acknowledged eminence both in general taste and in knowledge of the several branches specially submitted to their judgment.

It is the object of the League to render this exhibition truly national, and they therefore respectfully solicit the aid of all persons engaged in manufactures to render this exposition worthy of a great nation. Skill and industry belong to no party, are connected with no politics, and take a share in no controversies; whatever other opinions a man may hold, he cannot be insensible to the advantages that must result from bringing together the practical triumphs of British mind, so as to afford incontrovertible proof of British eminence in the arts that adorn, as well as in those that sustain, human existence. A national good is sought, and it is hoped that it will be supported by all who lay claim to national feeling.

As such an undertaking cannot be successfully carried into effect without the general and zealous co-operation of those who are largely engaged in the various departments of British industry, the Committee request that all who are willing to give their aid will communicate their intention by letter, addressed to "The Directors of the National Exhibition of British Arts and Manufactures, 67, Fleet-street, London." At the same time it is the pleasing duty of the Committee to acknowledge that they have already received valuable tenders of assistance from eminent manufacturers in various parts of the country; and that they have every reason to expect that the exposition will be worthy of the British Nation.

THE BAZAAR.

We are glad to perceive that the ladies are again actively evincing their interest in the efforts of the League, for freeing our commerce and industry from the laws which at present repress them, and thereby produce so large an amount of poverty, want, and misery. They have determined on holding a Bazaar in Covent Garden Theatre, London, in aid of the £100,000 fund. This is a mode of assisting the great cause of Free Trade to which all may contribute without inconvenience. Needlework, toys, drawings, music—all will go to advance the emancipation of our countrymen and countrywomen, of boys and girls, from the thralldom of under-feeding. This is the true philanthropy. Lord Ashley and his friends seek to reduce the hours of work, for such as can find employment, at the expense of diminishing their wages. The enemies of monopoly are struggling to increase the means of employment, and thus to raise wages; a result which could not fail to adjust the hours of labour to the wishes and wants of the working class, by increasing their independence. The ladies, consequently, who have set the bazaar on foot, to improve the resources of the Free-Traders, have engaged in a work of Christian benevolence and public good. We trust to see numerous contributions from Kendal in the lists of presented articles,—and not from Kendal alone, but from the country at large. Committees should be formed at once for the purpose of collecting donations for transmission. There are few but might send something—some superfluous article of unused finery, some trifle of handiwork, some example of skill, in art or science, some specimen for the curious, or some useful or ornamental thing. Even the cottagers of Shap might do themselves and their fellow-creatures a service by combining to forward a few loaves of the black rye bread, and a sample or two of the tough blue-milk cheese—tenacious as Indian rubber, when new, and hard and brittle as flint, when old—which constitutes part of their common daily food. This would, at all events, exhibit the sort of luxuries for which agricultural labourers are indebted to "protection;" and the people of London would have an opportunity of learning how little better the peasants of Westmoreland can afford to live, within view of the palace of the Lowthers, than live the serfs of Russia, who have been so often referred to by the landlords as the most oppressed and degraded beings of their kind. The articles would sell, as curiosities worth preserving.—Kendal Mercury.

We noticed last week, at some length, the intended Bazaar and exhibition of British arts and manufactures to be held in Covent-garden Theatre in July next, in aid of the £100,000 fund now in course of collection by the Anti-

Corn-Law League. The ladies in many towns, considering this a proper occasion to express their sympathy with the objects of the League, have gracefully tendered their services to aid the Council in carrying out their object. This humane and generous co-operation, it is believed, will be proffered from almost every town in the kingdom; and in the hope that the ladies of Southampton will furnish a stall on the occasion, worthy of the town and the cause for which it is required, we would suggest to some of our "fair friends" the course recommended by the Council to be pursued. The first particular requiring attention is the formation of a "Ladies' Local Committee," and the transmission of their names to the League office, London, distinguishing that of their secretary, in order that a correspondence may be opened between the Committee and the Council during the preparations for the bazaar. The arrangements should then be made with the view that Southampton should furnish a stall entirely, and the committee will be requested to depute one or more ladies to superintend its arrangements, and the disposal of the various articles during the days of sale. We trust that some of our townswomen will immediately take the first preliminary step in the matter, as the time between this and July is but short for preparation. They should recollect that the bazaar held in Manchester in 1842 was begun, carried on, and brought to a most triumphant conclusion, entirely by ladies; and that it gave an impulse to the public mind, on the subject of the Corn Laws, of greater and more permanent value than the pecuniary results of that undertaking, unprecedentedly large as they were.—Hampshire Independent.

REVIEW.

A Selection from the Speeches and Writings of Lord King, with a Short Introductory Memoir by Earl Fortescue. London, Longman and Co.

"It is a misfortune to be in advance of one's age," said Grattan; "but the wisdom of an enlightened statesman, like the words of the prophet, die not with the holy man, but survive him." Lord King was one of the few who foresaw from the beginning all the evils that would result from the iniquitous Corn Laws, and raised his warning voice to expose their mischievous consequences. His denunciations fell on dull ears; the commercial classes were either apathetic, or were deluded by the grant of some petty monopoly by which each hoped to gain at the expense of the rest; and the operative portion of the community, feeling severe pressure without being able to discover the precise cause of their sufferings, sought for relief in remedies which excited alarm, not only in the ruling powers, but in those who, to some extent, suffered as well as themselves, and yet preferred endurance to the perils of political agitation. It was and is the artifice of the Monopolists to set the class of employers against the employed; to divide the capitalist from the operative, and set the manufacturer in opposition to his workmen. In Lord King's day this was accomplished by appealing to the mercantile pride of the wealthier class; opposition to monopoly was stigmatized as "radicalism," and "radicalism" was hooted down as something low and vulgar. Now that the mercantile classes have discovered the gross deception that has been practised upon them, and have formed a League for the recovery of their rights, the Monopolists have adopted a different course of policy, and commenced a system of coquetry with the operative classes. We have Lord Ashley lending his aid to the disciples of Feargus O'Connor and Robert Owen, fraternizing with Chartists and Socialists, and proposing various schemes for relieving the pressure upon industry, but studiously avoiding the most obvious and simple—a diminution of its burdens and a removal of its fetters. It was from his knowledge of such artifices that Lord King wrote the following remarks, which in their prophecy have been fulfilled to the letter:—

"It requires, on the most moderate calculation, somewhere about a quarter of a century to overturn a bad system wherever the private interests of powerful classes are concerned. For instance, the great City job, the Bank Restriction Act, continued in force for nearly that period of time, and its worthy condutor the great land job, the Corn Bill, may probably require the same time before its iniquity can be fully explained to the dull English understanding, and be made to take its proper place in the records of the wisdom of Parliament.

"The statutes at large are a most useful as well as voluminous collection, and perhaps nothing could contribute more to the instruction of the rising generation than a museum or infirmary of all the pernicious abrogated statutes, where, amongst all the numerous specimens of the folly of over-legislation, that monster, the Bank Restriction Bill now dead, and the Corn Bill hereafter destined to the same fate, will furnish the most prominent and instructive specimens.

"It is wonderful, says Dr. Franklin, how preposterously the affairs of this world are managed. Naturally, one imagines that the interests of a few individuals should give way to the general interests; but individuals manage their affairs with so much more application, industry, cunning, and address than the public do theirs, that general interest must commonly give way to particular. We assemble parliaments and councils, to have the benefit of their collective wisdom; but we necessarily have at the same time the inconveniences of their collective passions, prejudices, and private interests: by the help of these, artful men overpower their wisdom, and dupe its possessors; and if we may judge of the acts, arrêts, and edicts, all the world over, an assembly of great men is the greatest fool upon earth; unless, as the case may be, this is too charitable a supposition, and that the assembly of great men in question, instead of being the greatest fool, is the greatest knave upon earth."

His brief summary of the effects of the Corn Laws is equally simple and striking:—

"In fact, the existing Corn Laws are a pure unmitigated evil; they prohibit the supply of foreign corn except when the price of grain shall have risen to an extravagant height in the home market; they cause an unnecessary waste of labour in the cultivation of poor lands; they enhance the cost of food; they diminish the profit of stock; they tend to drive capital abroad; they are highly detrimental to trade, by limiting the beneficial exchange of foreign raw produce with the manufactured produce of British industry; and, lastly, they are unjust, inasmuch as they deprive the people of the supply of the first necessary of life at the cheapest market."

As a true lover of his country, Lord King lost no opportunity of denouncing the gigantic and iniquitous monopoly which both renders food scarce, and, at the same time, limits the amount of the employment required to procure sustenance. He showed that it was a law which both raised the price of food and diminished the ability to buy. This is ably put in part of his speech at the opening of the session in 1826. Speaking of the corn monopoly, he stated:—

"It was the most gigantic job ever practised. It was difficult to say which was greatest, the unfeeling avarice which suggested it, or the bold impudence which stated that it was for the public good. It was the most enormous job ever heard of in the whole history of misrule. The West India job only made us pay more for our sugar. The East India job, when Leadenhall-street was in the fulness of its power, and monopolised all the trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope without a rival, was in comparison nothing to the job of the Corn Laws. Many references had of late been made to that branch of the legitimate house of Bourbon which ruled in Spain, and which had been held up as the most foolish of all God's viceroyants on earth; but what had they done equal in folly to our Corn Laws? They had given to one man the monopoly of the trade of Buenos Ayres; they might have given to one city the monopoly of all the trade of Mexico and Peru; but the Spanish monarchs, who were held up as a sort of scarecrows to bad governments, and were of more use dead than living, had granted no monopoly half so monstrous or half so mischievous as the monopoly of food. This was a job of the hundred interest; and he would repeat, that it was the most gigantic job to be found in the whole history of misrule. It was not possible the Corn Laws should be continued. Both justice and policy required their repeal. He believed that to be the only assembly on the face of the earth in which it was necessary to prove the advantages of cheap food. Their lordships were sharp-sighted enough on some occasions, and had speedily perceived the necessity of a law to punish those who broke machines. But why were the breakers of machines to be put down? because machines save labour: all our wealth, all our productive power, depended on the employment of machines: and if they were valuable, how was it that cheap food was an injury? If food was cheap, labour was cheap; but the Corn Laws compelled us to have recourse to more labour to produce food; this must be the case while we were obliged to cultivate bad soils, when we might obtain food from good soils: and the Corn Laws ought to be put down like machine-breakers. It was stated by some that the difference of prices was so great upon the Continent, as compared with this country, that ruin must be the consequence of allowing an unrestricted importation to take place. But he would deny the fact. If they could show him that there was a considerable difference in the prices, which he did not believe, then he would say, that in proportion as the landlord gained, the consumer lost, and that by persisting in restrictive measures, in order to keep up the price, they proclaimed their own avarice and injustice. Their lordships were all aware that that celebrated voyager, Mr. Lemuel Gulliver, on giving an account of that august assembly to the king of Brobdingnag, had told him that they were always occupied for the good of the country. Now if, instead of such an account, he had informed him that they were always occupied in contriving to keep up the price of corn, then, indeed, his majesty's answer would have been a just one, when he observed that we were the most contemptible race of little reptiles, and our rulers the most selfish and unjust. As to the prosperity of the country, he believed the one thing needful with respect to it was a revision of the Corn Laws. Indeed, he felt the conviction of its necessity so strongly, that he felt himself bound to move an amendment expressive of an opinion to that effect. His lordship, accordingly, concluded with an amendment, pledging the House to take into consideration at an early period the propriety of revising the Corn Laws, as the best means of securing the prosperity of the country."

His history of the origin of the Corn Laws, forming part of a speech delivered in the same session, contains some amusing hits:—

"Turning to history, he must remind their lordships of the period when the Corn Laws were passed. That event took place in those dark ages of legislation, in those times of ignorance, when it was gravely declared that a one pound note was equal in value to a sovereign. Then it was, when our political sun was in obscurity, that a law was passed to make corn and bread dear. Tradition said, that after a very expensive war the landlords objected to pay their share of the expense. They liked the war very well, but they did not like to be called upon when the bill came to be settled. They then took counsel how to avoid paying their part of the bill. Two ways occurred to them of accomplishing that object. The first was by defrauding the public creditor; the second by taxing the consumers of corn. Now, it happened that to the first course the Government objected; the public creditor was therefore saved, but the consumer of corn was sacrificed. It appeared that at this time a close alliance had been formed between the Government, the landlords, and the clergy. The object of the Government was high taxes, the object of the landlords high rents, and the object of the clergy high tithes. Now, he believed that, with regard to rents and tithes, the landlords and the clergy were as obdurate as ever; but he was persuaded that the Government would break the compact if they could. They would willingly abandon this mode of taxing for one which would work more easily and with better effect. But it was said, how is it possible to obtain high taxes without high prices? To this he would answer, that high taxes could be paid with much greater ease if the high prices were got rid of; for the Corn Laws formed a grievous addition to the other burdens of the country, and, if the public had not to pay so dear for corn, the weight of the other taxes would be more easily borne. This dead weight, thrown on the first necessary of life, reminded him of an awkward method which had been resorted to in its production. A practice, it was said, once prevailed in Ireland, of fastening the plough to the horse's tail, and in that way making him drag it along. Perhaps the noble earl opposite (Lord Limerick) would stand up in defence of that ancient and venerable practice; but he would advise the noble earl to consider the difference between a field ploughed by the miserable Irish horse of antiquity, with the plough at his tail, and another ploughed by a well-harnessed and a well-fed horse, who could put his shoulder to the work. If he looked well to this point, he would find that the horse yoked as horses were elsewhere, ploughed with great ease six inches deep, while the jaded animal with the plough at its tail could barely scratch the ground. Now, it was precisely the same thing with the Corn Laws. Like the plough at the horse's tail, they were a dead weight on the public, and drained the energies of the country. If their lordships were really desirous that it should be enabled to support a great amount of taxation, they would lose no time in repealing those laws."

His warning to the hereditary legislators contains a historical allusion of deep import:—

"What right had that House, or any legislative assembly, to devise means to raise the price of food? It would be a breach of trust, if it could be supposed that so monstrous a proposition was acted upon by any parties in Parliament, as to make corn dear for their own advantage. Such a course, if persisted in, was calculated to bring on one of those political convulsions, in which a lawless power might step in, as was once done in another place, and say to one, 'You are an extortioner,' to another, 'You are a tithemonger.' Get you gone, and give place to honest men."

We have some difficulty in selecting a characteristic specimen of his zealous advocacy of the principles of Free Trade, because, in nearly all his speeches, the subject is brought forward and felicitously illustrated. We take one passage, not so much for the superiority of its reasoning as for its manageable length:—

"He knew many noble lords who were averse to Free Trade,—many who were averse to free air (of which there was not then much in that House),—and many who were averse to free conscience. He was a friend both to free air and to Free Trade. He also looked forward to a better state of things, when men would enjoy free conscience. Many noble lords were averse to Free Trade, and at the close of the last war, propositions had been made to exclude all raw produce. One said, exclude butter; another said, exclude corn; another said, exclude wool;—that was the codex regius of the honourable members for Somerset and Suffolk, who joined in the cry, that this country ought to be a nation of sellers, and not a nation of buyers; but those who maintained that doctrine did not state how a nation could sell without buying something in return from the nations to which they sold. A question had been asked, whether this country could produce sufficient corn for its own consumption. No doubt this country could. But then another question arose,—at what price could we produce that corn? How much labour and capital would be lost in producing this corn? When the good corn-land should be exhausted, bad land must be brought into cultivation, at a great sacrifice of capital and labour. A noble earl had said, that he wished to renounce all paradoxes in the discussion of this question; but that noble earl immediately afterwards had said, that a low price of corn would be productive of general distress. That statement appeared to him paradoxical. He could not see how a low price of corn could be productive of distress to the consumer. On the contrary, he thought that excluding foreign corn, and thereby compelling the consumer to pay a higher price than he could procure foreign corn for, was a tax upon his labour. They were told that it would be a great misfortune to be dependent upon foreign supplies. He was satisfied that those who made those statements were actuated solely by a wish for the prosperity of the consumer, uninfluenced by other personal considerations. Those persons said, 'Oh, if you allow foreign supplies, we must live like Dutchmen, dependent upon the other nations, who might, if they pleased, combine and stop the supplies.' In answer to that argument, he would refer their lordships to the period when Napoleon's power was at its height, and when he had opportunities (such as would probably never again exist) of injuring this country. What was the fact then? Foreign corn was supplied to this country upon paying a good price. Whilst it was the interest of the nations of Europe to sell their produce, there was not the most distant chance of a combination. One noble lord had urged, as an argument against this measure, that the landowners paid the tithes; but he begged leave to inform the noble lord that the tithe was as much paid by the consumer, as it the clergyman, after the loaf was purchased at the baker's shop, were to cut off one-tenth part of it. He liked this bill, because it made an inroad upon the Corn Laws. He was glad to get at them in any way, or by any means; and he trusted that next year the call of the country for an alteration in those laws would be irresistible."

His exposure of the deceitful pretence of protection is very powerful:—

"He did think, that under the word 'protection,' if carefully considered, they could have a history of the folly of people, of parliaments, and of governments all over the world. Under this word 'protection,' governments had in all times oppressed the industry of the countries over which they presided. Under the pretence of protection, the industry of France had been oppressed from the time of Colbert downwards. The history of Spain consisted of nothing but protections. Little Holland alone, in its best times, was not so protected; and while it was not its history might shame the greatest monarchies in the world. In England, we had been protected from the days of Charles II. down to the time of the present lord protectors. At one period of the history of the country bounties were the principal feature of our Corn Laws. At that period we paid others for being good enough to eat our food. Now, on the contrary, we had turned round, and imposed restrictions on foreign corn. When we wanted manufactures we excluded them; now that we wanted corn we excluded that. There was, unfortunately, one point in which these two principles agreed—the country paid and suffered for both of them. Here he would leave the subject of protection; he might be asked, however, whether it would be possible to admit the principle of Free Trade? He begged to inquire whether it was possible for the country to go on without it? He was persuaded that the prosperity of this country depended upon unrestricted commerce. What was Free Trade but a saving of labour? And what was restriction but a waste of it? The principle of the prosperity of a country was the perfection of the economy of labour, producing the greatest quantity of goods with the least amount of labour. That state of things could not be established without admitting foreign produce in return for our manufactures; and at this moment we were competing with the foreigner who had cheap corn on his side, while on our side we had machinery and capital. Capital was daily increasing abroad, and machinery was in the course of introduction; so that, unless we had corn as cheap as our neighbours, we must in the end be beaten in the contest. Those who decried the principles of Free Trade, meant that every country should do everything for itself. America, according to them, should not cultivate her soil, but make cottons and hardware. France ought, by the same rule, to neglect the culture of the vine and the olive, and strive to surpass England in making iron. England, instead of endeavouring to buy corn with cotton and hardware, should forego the use of steam and machinery, and employ all her artisans to dig up the heaths of the country. The principle of these gentlemen pushed to its full extent would prevent division of labour, and would compel every man to procure everything he wanted for himself. But, foolish as was the principle when pushed through all its consequences, it was not equal to the wisdom of a young statesman of three-score, called the pope; his holiness beat all the sages of our country hollow, and deserved to be held up as a model for imitation. Sensible of the necessity of employment, he issued a decree to prevent the importation of all iron implements for tillage; and no doubt his holiness boasted that he had provided employment for all the starving peasantry of the Campagna di Roma, and so, perhaps, he did, but it was by adding to their trouble. His holiness was not aware that such labour was a painful waste; and, but for the decree of his holiness, more would have been obtained at a less cost. His conduct was like the memorable scheme of digging holes and filling them up."

We have extracted so largely from Lord King's speeches on the Corn Laws that we have not left ourselves room for quoting any of his admirable remarks on other topics. In all his speeches he exhibits a profoundness of view and a clearness of statement worthy of John Locke, from whom he was lineally descended, united to the contempt for humbug and courage in its exposure such as his ancestor, Peter, the first Lord King, manifested at Sacheverel's trial. We feel grateful to Earl Fortescue for this very reasonable publication. The biographer has himself been a faithful soldier in the war against Monopoly, and before he went to the House of Peers rendered the name of Ebrington the type of pure philanthropy and sound philosophy. He is in himself a proof that all useful benevolence is based on economic science; and, small as his share has been in the present volume, it is sufficient to prove that he has a good claim to Cicero's boast, Defendi rempublicam adolescens, non deseram senex. May the descendants of the author and of his hero be enabled to make the same declaration after having similarly served the same cause.

English Songs, and other Small Poems. By Barry Cornwall. London: Moxon.

Mr. Moxon has rendered acceptable service to all lovers of pure poetry by this cheap and beautiful edition of Barry Cornwall's songs and dramatic fragments. No lyrical effusions of modern times are so deeply imbued with the spirit of the Elizabethan age; they are just such inartificial strains as might be expected from Shakspeare, or Fletcher, or rare Ben Jonson. The sentiment gushes forth in a stream unchecked by verbiage; thought seems to mould its own expression, and no adventitious ornament interferes with the language of the heart. While the dazzling brilliancy of Moore's lyrics reminds us of the exotics in the conservatory, these songs are like the wild flowers of our fields, bearing the impress of spontaneous growth and unconstrained productiveness. They appeal to the heart without passing through the medium of fancy; we feel them rather than admire them; they bring us to that happy state which Sterne believed it impossible for critics to attain: we are pleased without inquiring why, or caring wherefore. Barry Cornwall—we cannot part with the name although it be a fiction—is full of generous sympathy with his kind; he has a heart for the outcast not less than for the prosperous, or rather human suffering seems to be the strongest tie of brotherhood that he recognises; his scorn for the oppressor rarely rises to indignant bitterness; but his tenderness for the oppressed gushes forth free and unrestrained, giving a loveliness to tears and a beauty to sorrow. Take the following as an example:—

"WITHIN AND WITHOUT.

A London Lyric.

(WITHOUT.)

"The winds are bitter; the skies are wild;
From the roof comes plunging the drowning raid;
Without—in tatters, the world's poor child
Sobbed abroad her grief, her pain;

No one heareth her, no one heedeth her;
But Hunger, her friend, with his bony hand,
Grasps her throat, whispering huskily—
'What dost Thou in a Christian land?'

(WITHIN.)

The skies are wild, and the blast is cold;
Yet riot and luxury brawl within;
Slaves are waiting, in crimson and gold,
Waiting the nod of a child of sin.
The fire is crackling, wine is bubbling
Up in each glass to its braded brim;
The jesters are laughing, the parasites quaffing
'Happiness,'—'honour,'—and all for him!

(WITHOUT.)

'She who is slain in the winter weather,
Ah! she once had a village fame;
Listened to love on the moonlit heather;
Had gentleness—vanity—maiden shame;
Now, her allies are the Tempest howling;
Prodigal's curses; self disdain;
Poverty; misery: Well—no matter;
There is an end unto every pain!

'The harlot's fame was her doom to-day,
Disdain—despair; by to-morrow's light
The ragged boards and the pauper's pall;
And so she'll be given to dusty night!
Without a tear or a human sigh,
She's gone, poor life and its 'fever' o'er!
So let her in calm oblivion lie;
While the world runs merry as heretofore!

(WITHIN.)

'He who yon lordly feast enjoyeth,
He who doth rest on his couch of down,
He it was, who threw the forsaken
Under the feet of the trampling town;
Liar—betrayed—false as cruel,
What is the doom for his dastard sin?
His peers, they scorn?—high dames, they shun him?
Unbar yon palace, and gaze within.

'There—yet his deeds are all trumpet-sounded;
There, upon silken seats recline
Maidens as fair as the summer morning,
Watching him rise from the sparkling wine.
Mothers all proffer their stainless daughters;
Men of high honour salute him 'friend';
Skies! oh, where are your cleansing waters?
World! oh, where do thy wonders end?'

As a contrast, we take the cheering song after labour:—

"SONG, AFTER LABOUR.

'Labour's strong and merry children,
Comrades of the rising sun,
Let us sing some songs together,
Now our toil is done.

'No desponding, no repining!
Leisure must by toil be bought.
Never yet was good accomplished,
Without hand and thought.

'Even God's all holy labour
Framed the air, the stars, the sun;
Built our earth on deep foundations;
And—the World was won!'

We know not the date of the powerful poem called "The Rising of the North," but it is fraught with solemn warning of the danger that laws restricting food, and condemning the industrious to seek vainly for employment, may produce at some crisis, such as monopolies are sure to produce at periods of uncertain recurrence:—

"THE RISING OF THE NORTH.

'Hark to the sound!
Without a trumpet, without a drum,
The wild-eyed, hungry millions come,
Along the echoing ground.

'From cellar and cave, from street and lane,
Each from his separate place of pain,
In a blackening stream,
Come sick, and lame, and old, and poor,
And all who can no more endure;
Like a demon's dream!

'Starved children with their pauper sire,
And labourers with their fronts of fire,
In angry hum,
And felons, hunted to their den,
And all who shame the name of men,
By millions come.

'The good, the bad come, hand in hand,
Linked by that law which none withstand;
And at their head,
Flaps no proud banner, flaunting high,
But a shout, sent upwards to the sky,
Of 'Bread! bread!'

'That word their ensign—that the cause
Which bids them burst the social laws,
In wrath, in pain:
That the sole boon for lives of toil,
Demand they from their natural soil:
Oh, not in vain!

'One single year, and some who now
Come forth, with oaths and haggard brow,
Read prayer and psalm,
In quiet homes; their sole desire,
Rude comforts near their cottage fire,
And Sabbath calm.

'But Hunger is an evil foe:
It striketh Truth and Virtue low,
And Pride elate:
Wild Hunger, stripped of hope and fear!
It doth not weigh; it will not hear;
It cannot wait.

For mark, what comes:—To-night, the poor
(All mad) will burst the rich man's door,
And wine will run
In floods, and rafters blazing bright
Will paint the sky with crimson light,
Pierce as the sun!

'And plate carved round with quaint device
And cups all gold will melt, like ice
In Indian heat!
And queenly silks from foreign lands,
Will bear the stamps of bloody hands,
And trampling feet:

'And Murder—from his hideous den
Will come abroad and talk to men.
Till creatures born
For good (whose hearts kind Pity nursed)
Will act the direst crimes they cursed,
But yester-morn.

'So, Wealth by Want will be o'erthrown,
And Want be strong and guilty grown,
Swollen out by blood.
Sweet Peace! who sitt'st aloft, sedate,
Who bind'st the little to the great,
Canst Thou not charm the serpent Hate?
And quell this feud?

'Between the pomp of Croesus' state,
And Iruis, starved by sullen Fate,—
'Tween 'thee' and 'me,'—
'Tween deadly frost and scorching sun—
The thirty tyrants and the one—
Some space must be.

'Must the world quail to absolute kings,
Or tyrant mobs, those meaner things,
All nursed in gore—
Turk's bowstring—Tartar's vile Ukase—
Grim Marat's bloody band, who pace
From shore to shore!

'Oh, God! since our bad world began,
Thus hath it been—from man to man
War to the knife!
For bread—for gold—for words—for air!
Save us, O God! and hear my prayer!
Save, save from shame—from crime—despair,
Man's puny life!'

But the poet does not always look on the operatives with alarm. He knows that there is a poetry in manufacturing, as well as in the other forms of industrial life. The proof is in the following spirited lines:—

"THE WEAVER'S SONG.

'Weave, brothers, weave!—Swiftly throw
The shuttle athwart the loom,
And show us how brightly your flowers grow,
That have beauty but no perfume!
Come, show us the rose, with a hundred dyes,
The lily, that hath no spot;
The violet, deep as your true love's eyes,
And the little forget-me-not!
Sing—sing, brothers! weave and sing!
'Tis good both to sing and to weave:
'Tis better to work than lie idle;
'Tis better to sing than grieve.

'Weave, brothers, weave!—Weave, and bid
The colours of sunset glow!
Let grace in each gliding thread be hid!
Let beauty about ye blow!
Let your skein be long, and your silk be fine,
And your hands both firm and sure,
And Time nor chance shall your work untwine;
But all, like a truth, endure!
So—sing, brothers, &c.

'Weave, brothers, weave!—Toil is ours;
But toil is the lot of men:
One gathers the fruit, one gathers the flowers,
One soweth the seed again!
There is not a creature, from England's king,
To the peasant that delves the soil,
That knows half the pleasures the seasons bring,
If he have not his share of toil!
So—sing, brothers, &c.'

Our limited space will not allow of our extracting all the passages we had marked; but we the less lament their omission, as we are sure that many of our readers will make themselves possessors of this cheap and beautiful work. The author intimates that he has laid down the lyre; we should remonstrate with him did we not believe that a poet of such noble feelings and generous sympathies cannot remain silent; his impulses are too powerful not to find voice; his fire is too bright to be obscured at pleasure.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MONTHLY CORN CIRCULAR.—The following is the corn circular of the Messrs. Sturge for the present month:—"The past month has been unusually fine and dry, and agricultural operations have proceeded under very favourable circumstances; most of the spring sowing, except on very late and stiff soils, being already completed. Hitherto the want of rain has been comparatively little felt, but should the drought continue a fortnight longer, accompanied as at present by easterly winds, the growing crops of oats, beans, peas, and barley must sustain serious injury. The young wheats are generally spoken of as very promising, but we do not consider their appearance upon the whole so favourable as might have been anticipated from the late fine weather, more particularly the spring sown, few fields presenting so luxuriant an aspect as was witnessed in the same districts at this time last year, not having started or thickened on the ground so much as usual; still there is sufficient plant, with few exceptions, to produce an abundant crop, if we have a favourable summer. Notwithstanding this beautiful weather, the drooping state of the London and several other leading markets, and the liberation of about 70,000 quarters of foreign wheat, the price of this grain has been firmly sustained in this district, with a free sale for Polish Odessa and other descriptions of fine wheat, which may be chiefly attributed to our having received a short supply of English from the farmers and dealers who frequent this and the neighbouring country markets. Although there is no probability of much reduction before the approach of another harvest, under any circumstances, consequently but little danger of loss, yet the prospects at present, it must be admitted, do not afford sufficient encouragement for a liberal importation of foreign wheat; and, unless there is an early and considerable advance, it is doubtful if the whole arrivals from abroad, including near 200,000 quarters now in bond, will much exceed half a million of quarters before harvest, as the demand for Sicily and Naples appears likely to absorb the greater proportion of the shipments from the Black Sea and Mediterranean ports, on much better terms than would be realized in this country, with our present currency and duty. France is also taking from the Baltic a considerable share of the wheat that at an earlier period was destined for England. The British market will, however, during the ensuing three or four months, be so much influenced by the weather, and a variety of other contingencies which it is impossible to foresee, that there are no means of arriving at certain or correct data on which to ground an estimate of future prices; but the small stocks universally admitted to be held by millers, bakers, and dealers, favour the probability of an advance rather than the contrary. The reports of the corn trade at Dantzic have recently been somewhat gloomy, and that market at present appears decidedly the most favourable for foreign purchases, and orders for good mixed wheat would probably be executed at 32s. to 33s. per imperial quarter, free on board, with a freight of 3s. and 4s. per quarter; English red wheat sells at 7s. 2d. to 7s. 8d.; white, 7s. 6d. to 7s. 10d. per 62lbs. at Birmingham; Polish, 7s. to 7s. 4d.; Dantzic, 7s. 6d. to 7s. 9d.; hard, 6s. to 6s. 6d. per 60lbs., at Gloucester; and of Polish Odessa there is little or none remaining unsold."

THE CORN LAWS.—The proprietary right which a man has in the fruit of his own labour, or in what he may have acquired by the price that he has given for it, seems to have in it as much the character of a first principle of justice as the proprietary right of a landlord in the soil which belongs to him. And yet what is the effect, or rather what is the express aim and intention of a Corn Law? It is not to defend the latter from any inroad made upon him from the former; but it is to enable the latter, the landlord, and this is for the declared purpose of keeping up or raising the value of his property, to make what, but for law, would be felt and resented as a most violent inroad on the natural rights of the manufacturer or merchant. That a man shall work up goods in this country, either by his own labour, or by labour which he has paid for—that he shall place them in a ship which he has freighted—that he shall carry them beyond seas, and, after having disposed of them in a foreign market, shall, with the price which he has gotten for them, load his vessel with a cargo, from the sale of which he anticipates a profit in his own land—that if this cargo should happen to be corn, on the moment of its touching the shore, it shall be seized upon and wrested from its owner, as if it had been made up of stolen goods found in his possession, and now to be restored to its lawful owners—why, it does thwart and come into painful collision with every natural apprehension of justice, when, instead of being thus laid hold upon for the indemnification of those to whom it properly belongs, it is forcibly torn from the proper and rightful owner, and that for the enrichment of another party who has no claim upon it whatever. Instead of a robbery by him against the landed proprietor, it has far more the appearance and character of a robbery upon him, and in behalf of the landed proprietor. One cannot wonder, in these circumstances, at the sensation so prevalent and powerful of a great wholesale outrage inflicted upon one class for the benefit of another; or that such exasperation should be now abroad, both against the Government which legalises this iniquity, and against the order in society who profit by it; and that, not because of its conflicting with the principles of sound economical science, but because of its felt and palpable violence against the original and inalienable rights of humanity. * * * The crowded manufactories of Britain have enhanced the price of British corn just as the wants of the teeming population in London have prodigiously added to the value of all the produce that is yielded by the estates in Middlesex—that is, have raised it above the produce of the other counties by all the expense of conveyance from the places at a greater distance. It were a strange return on the part of the landholders of Middlesex to London, for all the benefits of their contiguity to the great metropolis, should they prefer a demand for a tax on all the produce brought from other parts of England—and this that they might furthermore add the tax, too, to a price which has already risen so much in their favour. But this is the very character of the demand preferred by British landlords in the matter of the Corn Laws. There is in it a barefacedness which, of itself, is sufficiently irritating; but when to this we add the outcry of starving multitudes for food, and the quieter, but not less influential, demand of merchants for relief to their glutted warehouses, and a profitable outlet for their idle and overgrown capitals—we cannot but wonder that a system of such unnatural violence and constraint should have stood so long against the righteous indignation of all the parties who feel themselves aggrieved by it. And yet, after all, we are strongly persuaded that the gloomy fears of our landlords, just as much as the sanguine hopes both of our manufacturers and our general population, will turn out to be visionary.—From an article said to be written by Dr. Chambers in the first number of the North British Review.

TO THE FARMERS OF KENT.—"Brother Farmers, —It seems that we must shortly be prepared to take our stand under one or the other of the banners now fully unfurled. FREE TRADE or PROTECTION are the watchwords which will divide the population into two great opposing armies. Your homely proverb of 'Look before you leap,' is now, if ever, needful. Let us consider the subject, then, by 'Looking on this picture, and on that.' In the first place, when we are called on to make a change, we ought to examine our present system, to see how it works, and whether a change be necessary or not. I put it, then, at once to you, whether the present system has worked well for you? Has farming, as a profession, been a profitable one? Are we now in a prosperous state? I presume there will be but little difference of opinion as to the reply to these queries. As far as my opinion extends, and my rather extensive reading, the profession of farming has been the reverse of profitable. It has starved the labourer, and beggared the farmer. If we look at the fluctuation of prices, and the miserable effects of the yearly tenancy-at-will system, we see the causes of the farmers' embarrassments. Trade (and farming is but a trade) requires the outlay of capital to ensure profit. What security have the tenants-at-will to expend capital? Or who will lend the farmer money, while he has no security? Security of tenancy, by equitable leases, is the first requisite. This attained, capital will flow in; and, directed by skill and industry, the British farmer will commence his course of prosperity, fearless of all foreign competition. I repeat it, that with leaves, skill, and capital, the British farmer can beat the whole world, his customers being at home, his manures (now wasted) being almost inexhaustible and close to his land, his country abounding in capital, at the lowest rate of interest ever known in the world. Farmers, think of these things! Above all, train up your sons to scientific farming, and to business-like habits, and you will cease to be ruined by 'protection.'—I am, yours, &c., A MAN OF KENT.—Kent Herald.

EXCLUSIVE BURDEN ON LAND.—It is very common for the Monopolists to allege that poor-rates are a burden which falls heavier on the farmer than on other classes of the community. In order to show how utterly this assumption is at variance with fact, we may cite the case of the township of Tunstall, in the Sunderland Union. This township contains the village of Tunstall, with neighbouring farms, comprising several hundred acres of land, yet the whole charge for the maintenance of the poor of this district for the year ending the 25th of March, 1844, was only £12 17s., actually less than was levied for this purpose on the occupant of a potato warehouse in one of the back streets of the parish of Sunderland! and less than a tithe of the amount that some of the larger rate-payers have to contribute as their share to the parochial funds. We may add that, to our certain knowledge, there are several agricultural parishes in this county where the poor-rates are even higher than in Tunstall. The question naturally occurs, why should the agricultural parishes in this county be so lightly burdened with poor, when the farmers in Dorsetshire and other agricultural counties are so heavily taxed for the support of the poor? The answer is obvious. The children of the inhabitants of Tunstall, whose services are not required to till the ground, find situations as apprentices in the neighbouring commercial towns, and are not left to grow up as a burden on the land; and if the present hateful and injurious restrictions were removed from trade, we have no doubt that the surplus population of those counties which are further removed from the seats of manufactures and trade would find employment in the towns by the increase of commerce, which would inevitably result from its becoming free.—Sunderland Herald.

BRITISH FREE TRADE.—England, while preaching Free Trade to all other countries, takes good care not to practise it herself. She looks one way and rows the other. She has arguments enough at hand to show why the United States should admit the fabrics of her pauper labour free; but when asked to reciprocate such an arrangement—oh, that is quite a different affair! Johnny Bull don't understand what reciprocity means. He has cut the word out of his dictionary, and turns a deaf ear whenever it is mentioned. To show this let us appeal to facts. Facts are stubborn things. One authentic fact is worth all the visionary theories in the world. We showed a day or two since, by a table taken from the report of a committee of the American Institute, of which Mr. Jas. Talmadge was chairman, that on forty-seven articles, comprising the great staple products of the United States, among which are cotton, wheat, Indian corn, flour, hemp, beans, tobacco, rice, whisky, beef, pork, lard, bacon, butter, tallow, cheese, feathers, fish, oil, &c., England levies, even under her new reduced rates, an average duty of 289 per cent. The duties upon lumber and many other articles are prohibitory. We also showed by another table from the same report that on thirty-six articles, embracing the principal fabrics and manufactures of Great Britain, such as the manufactures of woollens, cottons, linens, hemp, silk, flannels, baizes, carpeting, paper, books, leather, earthenware, glass, hardware, iron, steel, tin, brass, copper, jewellery, drugs, salt, &c., the duty levied by our present tariff averages only 32 per cent. We also showed that by the English tariff the discrimination in favour of her colonies is 102, giving to British bottoms the entire carrying trade. This is reciprocity with a vengeance! Can any man, with these facts before him, who is not insane or a dishonest politician, contend for Free Trade and the repeal of our tariff? And ought not every American to blush at the folly of his weak brother when he hears him quoting the doctrines of Englishmen upon "Free Trade"?—Daily Cincinnati Atlas (America).

FOREIGN CORN TRADE.—Mr. Wawn, the active member for South Shields, has obtained a parliamentary return of the number of ships laden with foreign corn entered inwards at the ports of the United Kingdom between the 5th of January, 1843, and the 5th of January, 1844. The return shows that 655 British vessels, and 1220 foreign vessels, have been employed during that period in the corn trade. To Sunderland, 2275 qrs. 3 bushels have been imported in British ships, and 2989 qrs. 7 bushels in foreign ships, the ports of landing being Altona, Brake, Bremen, Cotingseil, Dantzic, Stettin, and a small quantity of flour from Quebec. The shipowners complain of lack of trade, and doubtless their complaints are just. They suffer severely from a scarcity of employment; the value of their vessels has been depreciated from 50 to 100 per cent., freights have been ruinously low, and in many instances they have conveyed cargoes from place to place, not only without profit, but at a positive loss to themselves. Yet, some of the shipowners of this and the neighbouring ports support and approve a course of policy which gives a portion of the trade which they ought to possess to the foreigner; for (as the Morning Chronicle well observes) there is no man with the slightest acquaintance with mercantile operations who does not know that corn is struck out of the catalogue of articles looked to as returns for exports, simply because no merchant can calculate upon what duty he may have to pay when he lands his cargo. And hence, when there is a prospect of importing corn at a low duty, the first ship is taken up which can be found in the nearest port from whence it is profitable to import grain, in order that the golden opportunity may not be lost. In this manner the shipowner is the victim of the sliding scale, and he too frequently exhibits the anomaly of applauding a measure which is injurious to his own interest and detrimental to the country at large.—Sunderland Herald.

BLACK BREAD.—The Irish generally assure the stranger, when they show him their oat-cakes, that these are a particularly wholesome, nourishing, and strengthening kind of food, which can be true only when they are compared with the watery, tasteless, and meagre potatoes upon which the Irish have to subsist. The English, generally very curious about our black bread, and to whom the word "black" seems to convey a kind of horror, often repeat that with them people would never think of giving such a mess to any but horses; forgetting that with us nobody would think of giving oats to any but horses, and forgetting how many millions of hungry poor there are in this empire who would be most thankful for this despised black bread, and whom it would certainly nourish much better than the oat-paste, which they call cake, and the nourishing qualities of which they praise so highly.—Kohl's Ireland.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO PERSEVERANCE.—We have been labouring, along with a number of our friends, for thirty years, at least ever since the peace of Paris, in and out of Parliament, to obtain the repeal of the duty on the importation of foreign wool; and at one time with so little success that this impolitic impost was advanced from one penny to sixpence a pound; but at last we have the pleasure to see the wool-tax swept away, root and branch. The advantage will, we have no doubt, be felt not only by the manufacturing, but also by the agricultural interest, in the increased consumption of wool, to which the removal of the duties both on import and export will give a salutary impulse. The shipping interest, as well as the interests of trade and agriculture, will be essentially benefited by the repeal of the duties on the importation and exportation of wool, the latter of which amounts to one shilling per cwt. The trade being thus entirely free, England will, from its capital, its manufactures, and its commercial marine, become the great wool market of the world.—Leeds Mercury.

The Duke of Richmond has "recorded a vow in Heaven," never to cease from agitation until the League is put down. The Yankees have a story of a racoon, which, seeing an unerring marksman take aim at him, exclaimed—"Stop! I know you, Major Scott: I give in!" Even so Mr. Cobden. He has written to the Duke of Richmond, intimating to his grace that he "gives in." The lad at the League office has "put up the shutters," and the Anti-Corn-Law agitation is at an end!—Gateshead Observer.

The bakers of Coblenz have lately been prosecuted for combining to keep up the price of bread, and, being convicted, have been condemned to two months' imprisonment, and a fine of 1000f. each.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, May 6.—There was a fair supply of Wheat this morning from Essex, but short from Kent; it was taken off early at fully the prices of this day week. There was a pretty good demand for Free Foreign in small quantities at last week's rates. With large supplies of Barley last week's prices were supported, but the trade was not brisk. The price of Peas was fully maintained. Beans were a dearer. The same advance was established on Egyptian in Bond. The supplies of Irish Oats last week were moderate, and only a few vessels arrived fresh to this morning's market. We are very scantily supplied with English and Scotch. The trade was not brisk, but at an advance of 6d. on the prices of last Monday was obtained for all descriptions. S. H. Lucas and Son.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 34.]

SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1844.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive a copy, weekly, of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND, are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council respectfully request that their friends, in all places where committees for raising subscriptions to the £100,000 Fund have not been already formed, will proceed to their formation as soon as possible, and transmit their names to the LEAGUE Offices, Manchester.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

MR. MACAULAY'S LETTER TO HIS CONSTITUENTS.

With the recently-published letter of Mr. Macaulay, as part of a correspondence between a representative and his constituents, we have little to do. As an exposé of the course to be pursued, in order to obtain the repeal of the Corn Laws, it concerns us much. It is in this point of view that we make it the subject of comment. The letter was obviously intended as something more than a communication to Edinburgh electors. It is not a family epistle, but a public document, a sort of Whig manifesto; and though the writer has no authority to speak on behalf of a great political party, yet he evidently assumes that others are in sympathy with him, and that, if he may not say his "name is legion," it is nevertheless a respectable number. Moreover, he expounds a philosophy of political action; and if in that he is right, the League is wrong, for the text of his homily is compromise, a word which we hold in abhorrence.

"We have," says Mr. Macaulay, "two questions to consider—a question of political economy, and a question of practical prudence. The first question relates to ends, the second to means."

"The first question is this—On what footing would it be best for the country that the Corn Laws should be placed?"

"The second question is this—By what line of conduct are we most likely to succeed in placing the Corn Laws on a good footing?"

To this statement we have no material objection. And, as Mr. Macaulay professes to answer the first question by "perfectly Free Trade," excluding the idea of a fixed duty, as well as that of a sliding scale, we will regard that point as not necessary to be argued. His declaration is distinct. "I have come to the conclusion that it is not desirable to lay a tax on foreign corn for the purpose of raising revenue. It is clear that such a tax would, in this country, take out of the purse of the consumer a sum many times greater than the sum which would come into the purse of the State; and this I think is an insurmountable objection." We think so too; and as it is "not desirable" that "insurmountable objections" should ever be surmounted; as honest statesmen never do get over objections of that class; we should have been better satisfied had Mr. Macaulay not evinced a disposition, in the subsequent part of his letter, to perform so anomalous a feat. But alas! his answer to the second question is little else but a string of arguments for surmounting the insurmountable, which he not very unreasonably anticipates may be viewed as "the cant of party, the shuffling of a man who wishes to compound matters between his convictions and his interests." He calls this "detraction" beforehand; while it only exists in the whisperings of his own mind; to prove it so, rests with himself.

Without indicating any particular compromise as likely to be offered, or worthy to be accepted, Mr. Macaulay proceeds to panegyric compromise in the abstract, and designates it the means by which "all the important reforms in our legislation have been carried." This, then, he thinks should be our aim. Instead of Corn-Law repealers, we should be Corn-law compromisers. Our fight should be for a partial failure. The struggle should not be for justice, but for a compound of justice and injustice, the proportion of the ingredients to be varied according to circumstances. Putting principle out of question; looking only at the policy of the thing; we hold this to be very contemptible. What agitation for a compromise could ever keep alive? Without agitation, what chance of change? If, instead of the League converting Mr. Macaulay as to the end, Mr. Macaulay were to convert the League as to the means, all that could possibly result would be the extinction of the agitation and the undisturbed perpetuity of the Corn Laws.

But, says Mr. Macaulay, compromise effected the abolition of the Test Act, sixteen years ago. The repeal was attended by the introduction of another test, the official pledge "on the faith of a Christian;" but, nevertheless, the measure was gratefully accepted by Dissenters, for "they knew that it made an irreparable breach in an unsound system, and that such a breach, when once made, would gradually be widened." We demur to this statement. The Dissenting grievance was got rid of altogether. The Church test was abolished, which was all the great body of Dissenters wanted then; or, we presume, would desire now. The Anti-State-Church Conference, which sat recently, imposed a voluntary test, which excluded all Jews, and some who call themselves Christians. The case, as cited by Mr. Macaulay, is not in point. Had it been more so, would it have furnished encouragement? The breach has not been "gradually widened." There is no better chance for now "removing the grievances of the Jew" than at that time. The event is nearer, just as all events that are to come are brought nearer by the lapse of time. No otherways. Mr. Macaulay's instance breaks down in both views. It was not a compromise; nor did it accelerate the more extended application of the principle of religious equality.

And is it not true that, as to the removal of Dissenting disabilities, a compromise was, after the first triumphant division, suggested by the Whig leaders to the Dissenting committee? That such compromise would have delayed the full accomplishment of the object for years? That the committee refused to entertain it? That they resolved to go for everything or nothing, and so got everything? Mr. Macaulay's first case is not an example for his counsel but for ours. It warns us against his guidance.

The Reform Bill is an instance pretty much in the same predicament. With the exception of the Chandos clause, on which the Whig Ministers were beaten by a Radical blunder, they carried out their own views of Parliamentary reform. The national movement which enabled them to carry those views would equally have enabled them to carry a larger measure, had they chosen. They were not stopped by a compromise, but by their own convictions. The friends of more extensive reform have not since found in this instance, any more than in the other, that "such a breach, when once made, would gradually be widened." On the contrary, the Reform Act has been, and is, the great barrier to further organic changes. We say nothing now of the expediency of such changes. Be they good, bad, or indifferent, the argument is not affected. Mr. Macaulay says the Reform Bill was a compromise, by which the attainment of such changes is facilitated. We reply, that it stands in their way, and was no compromise, but all that the Whigs intended.

Much of Mr. Macaulay's reasoning turns on the alleged weakness of the League, and the prediction that the Free-Trade cause will not have a majority of the constituent body at the next election. We battle not with the spirit of prophecy. The League is working out this problem practically. We are polling the constituencies now.

The results are more decided than Mr. Macaulay finds to his liking. His own constituency is too uncompromising for his taste. He very needlessly takes offence at their earnestness on behalf of his own professed opinions. The Edinburgh people say they will have a member who votes for that which Mr. Macaulay declares wise and right. And such a determination he complains of as a persecution! To hold him fast to the wise and right in legislation is intolerant and intolerable. He will be a martyr first. His "mind is made up to the consequences." Of martyrs who have died rather than compromise their principles, there are many "illustrious examples" in the page of history. A martyr who will perish rather than not compromise, is a novel specimen of magnanimity in the annals of persecution.

Our strength is not sufficient to satisfy our professed fellow-believer in Free-Trade principles. How does he help us to augment it? He sees what is wanting. His own splendid talents and high position would enable him to do very much towards supplying the deficiency. There is no lack of zeal in his constituents. They are ready to back him in the full exercise of his great powers to give efficiency to his avowed convictions. He is almost thrust forward in the path towards his professed object. And then he turns round to pick a quarrel with his followers. He will not help along, nor will he be helped along, towards the right. He knows that the creed of compromise is the worship of weakness, and so he becomes its missionary. His admonition to Edinburgh is, that it should look at Exeter. In the same spirit he would expatiate on North Wiltshire to the electors of South Lancashire. No Free Trader is wise or warranted in exaggerating successes or extenuating reverses. We quarrel not with Mr. Macaulay for not being as rhetorical in our cause as he usually is in his advocacy. But we look at the animus of his lamentation over our insufficient strength. If it were too little, his letter would tend to make it less. This is not just towards his constituents. They have a right to his best services, to his zealous labours, for a consummation which he agrees with them in deeming "devoutly to be wished." The more he sees of weakness in a good cause, the more imperative his duty of hearty co-operation; the more inexcusable his wet blanket of compromising counsels.

It is argued that "a change in the views" of the agricultural population "must be gradual." If by this Mr. Macaulay means that landowners and farmers may be won—first to consent to a sliding scale a little lower than the present; then to another sliding scale somewhat lower than that; afterwards to a fixed duty of rather a high figure; in process of years to a lower fixed duty; and thus, eventually, about the period of the millennium, to a free trade in corn—we can only say that his prophetic inspiration as to futurity seems well matched with his observance of the past, and of human nature. The prophecy and the philosophy may go together. Except in his own imagination, the practical question is everywhere between the present law and Free Trade. No class wants this prolonged unsettlement. The farmers are sick to the heart of change and experiment. By common consent "protection" is on its last legs, whether they serve it for a long time or a short. If Free-Traders be but true to themselves and their cause, they will get everything as soon as they can get anything. The next move will be final, unless it be perplexed by some dirty littleness of political party. Sir Robert Peel evidently perceives this, and, with his characteristic caution, holds himself unpledged accordingly. Mr. Macaulay foresees that "the day may come when the difference between the supporters of Free Trade and the supporters of a fixed duty will be a serious practical difference." For that day he reserves to himself the privilege of voting against what he professes to think the best. In plain terms, his Free-Trade principle is bound for sacrifice on that altar at which Whig partisanship and agricultural monopoly shall, by the device of a fixed duty, ratify their covenant of compromise. Sir Robert Peel is not the fool to let that day arrive; or, if he should, the knavery on the other side will take little by its motion but speedy discomfiture and disgrace.

Very different is the co-operation we receive from the people of Edinburgh from that which is afforded by their representatives. From the former, it is munificent, hearty, consistent, decided, and energetic. To the latter we may say "Thank you for nothing," except the attempt to sow doubts, fears, and disunion, fomenting the weakness they magnify, and postponing the result they profess to desire. Our question can only be carried by becoming the national question, on which all elections turn, and to which all party objects are postponed. That is exactly what Mr. Macaulay protests against and endeavours to obstruct. He seems ready to compromise with everything, except uncompromisingness. Even that he will allow to be good "in the abstract;" very well in a Free-Trade lecture, but not "the business of a member of Parliament."

We have dwelt the longer on this document because false friends and a compromising spirit are much more perilous to our cause than the hostility we encounter. With Mr. Macaulay individually, his constituents know how to deal. Our task has been to analyze his false philosophy and pernicious counsel. The exposure may serve every popular struggle for the legislative recognition of a just principle as well as this agitation for Free Trade. Little of real or enduring good do we ever expect from the voices or hands of Reformers whose hearts bear not inscribed the motto of Kiat Justitia.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1844.

Fourteenth Week, ending Saturday, May 18.

The Factories Bill is now in the House of Lords, where it is likely to be safe from those "untoward" accidents which its predecessor encountered in the House of Commons; and this seems, therefore, a suitable opportunity for briefly reviewing the history of its progress.

The current opinion in political circles respecting the defeat of the Government on the first Factories Bill is this:—A number of the usual supporters of the Government were entangled with their constituents by pledges on the "Ten Hours;" and Lord Ashley himself had refused a subordinate office in the Administration when it was first formed on account of the determination of Sir Robert Peel not to sanction the "principle" of such a limitation of the hours of factory labour. The Government, however, having adopted the "principle" of limiting the labour of females and young persons to Twelve Hours (thereby practically limiting all factory labour to that period), a very fair opportunity was afforded of trying the question of the "Ten Hours." Sir James Graham, it is said, calculating on the undivided support of the Liberal party in the House, caused it to be intimated to the supporters of the Ministry, that, if they felt themselves in any difficulty about the "Ten Hours," they might support Lord Ashley, because the Government, reckoning on the support of what is termed "The Opposition," would have a sufficient majority to carry them through all attempts to substitute "Ten" for "Twelve" hours. On this understanding a great number of the regular Ministerialists left town, as the Easter holidays were nigh at hand; and the Government, not anticipating either a mutiny or a surprise, "dwelt careless, after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure."

Certain members of the Opposition, who, like the children of Dan, as recorded in the book of Judges, were "seeking an inheritance," spied out the "careless and secure" attitude of the Ministers, and resolved to strike them a fatal blow. In this movement, according to the prevalent opinion, there was craft on both sides. It is attributed to Sir James Graham, that he calculated that, by permitting his "Ten Hours" supporters to vote as they pleased, he would conciliate them as friendly adherents, while by recording their harmless vote for the Ten Hours, they would gain great credit with their constituents; and, at the same time, all the odium of opposing a popular demand would fall on the "Opposition," which, acting according to principle, could not but support the Government in resisting a limitation of the hours of labour. Those members of the Opposition who joined Lord Ashley were not disposed to let Sir James Graham buy them "in the dearest" and sell them "in the cheapest" market. All of a sudden, they resolved to support Lord Ashley; and the moment being favourable, in consequence of the absence of a great number of members, a serious, though a temporary, blow was struck. The public, unprepared for such a result, were startled by the announcement that the Ministry had been defeated; but, though the defeat of the Government was a damage to them, the temporary triumph of the Ashleyites was a damage greater still; for it has conveyed to the public the idea, that the atmosphere breathed in the House of Commons is saturated with insincerity, and that both the press and the constituencies are used as the mere instruments of men who, instead of looking to high objects and straightforward principles, are impelled by the vulgar feeling that anything is fair which will gain them notoriety, distinction, or power.

We recorded the fact, at the time, that when it was found that Ministers were likely to be defeated, every effort was made to alarm the country gentlemen by the suggestion that the restriction to "Ten Hours" must inevitably involve the repeal of the Corn Laws and all other monopolies. This was the leading idea in the speeches of Sir James Graham and Sir Robert Peel, on that occasion; but the "country gentlemen" who supported the "Ten Hours" were (as Mr. Galley Knight has since confessed) in a kind of intoxication, and would not listen to consequences. Ministers were, therefore, twice defeated on the question of "Twelve Hours;" though, on a third division, the House also rejected Lord Ashley's proposition of "Ten Hours," this awkward result being brought about by what we may term the casting votes of some five or six members favourable to the adoption of eleven hours.

The result must be in the recollection of our readers. The Government withdrew their bill, and introduced a new one, almost identical with it, on which they proposed to take "the sense of the House" after the Easter holidays, when they knew that a much greater number of members would be in town. And Lord Ashley (by what influence we know not) was induced to postpone his proposition until the bill had arrived at the third reading—that is, when the measure had got through all its difficulties, had been debated on all its stages, had got over the tedious discussions, clause by clause, in Committee, and was merely waiting on the question, "That this bill do pass," when one debate and one vote would settle the whole matter.

During the progress of the bill, there were some curious exhibitions both of character and of argument. Mr. Roebuck boldly raised a discussion on the proposition that it was impolitic for the Legislature to interfere with adult labour at all. This drew an excellent speech from Sir Robert Peel, which, if it had been spoken in favour of Mr. Roebuck's motion instead of against it, would have been quite consistent. But both he and Sir James Graham were constrained to admit that, in limiting labour to twelve hours, they differed in degree from the advocates of the ten hours—that degree, however, as they showed, being exceedingly important. But the speeches of the political economists, such as Lord Howick, Mr. Hawes, and others, who advocated the "Ten Hours," presented a far more startling array of self-contradictions. The condition of the manufacturing population required improvement; to bring about that improvement, they would limit the hours of labour; and, if that limitation were injurious, they would compensate for the injury by compelling the repeal of the Corn Laws and all other monopolies. In other words, they would "put the cart before the horse;" in order to pave the way for the enlargement of our foreign market, they would run the risk of first destroying it; in order to redeem, they would take their chance of ruining.

The most consistent motion on the subject was that made by Mr. Thomas Duncombe, who moved that the bill be referred to a Select Committee, for the purpose of taking evidence. Mr. Duncombe cautioned the House against deceiving itself; he was for the "Ten Hours," but he warned them that the working classes did not think that the limitation would lower their wages. On the contrary, they imagined that a limitation of the quantity produced would inevitably raise wages. He asked, therefore, for a Select Committee in order to inquire into the conflicting allegations on both sides; there was no hurry with the bill; let them call master manufacturers and operatives, in order to give evidence: and thus, in this kind of judicial way, something like the TRUTH might be arrived at. A number of Free-Traders supported this motion. Mr. Ward, Mr. Villiers, and Mr. Cobden spoke in favour of it; and the sum of their arguments may be stated thus:—We cannot vote for the Ten Hours, because, on principle, we are opposed to restriction, and we dread the responsibility of adopting the fatal policy of still more restricting our productive industry in its present restrictive field, and struggling as it is with foreign competition. But our sympathies are with the working classes; if they could subsist comfortably on eight hours' labour instead of ten, we should be exceedingly glad. We see, however, no way to this but through FREE TRADE; by enlarging the field of consumption, we add to the value of the working man's time and labour, and give him a greater power to help himself, without your interference; but as there are conflicting opinions on this, let us have a Select Committee, before which masters and men may alike be examined; and, as impartial legislators, we shall then have some chance of arriving at TRUTH, of discovering and weighing what is best for the community, instead of blindly adopting either a "twelve" or a "ten" hours bill.

This reasonable proposition was rejected; and the bill having been carried through the Committee of the whole House, with considerable discussion on details, was brought at last to its third reading, at which stage Lord Ashley brought on his motion. This was on Friday week; and the noble lord, in his speech, went over nearly the same ground as before, alleging the injury which long hours caused, the want of time for moral, social, and domestic duties, and combating the allegations that any serious injury would be inflicted, either on capital or wages, by the limitation. He concluded with a remarkable quotation, that he had succeeded in "lighting such a candle in England, as, by God's blessing, would not be easily put out" (a somewhat incendiary mode of misapplying the words of a great man), and then proposed his motion, which was to limit labour in factories to eleven hours up to 1847, and then to make ten hours permanent.

Sir James Graham opposed the motion in a very able speech; and the debate then went on pro and con until past twelve o'clock. At that hour the House was crowded; and it could be easily seen that a large number of members had come up to town who had not voted on the question before. An adjournment was proposed; but this was a disappointment to those who had come down to vote; and there was consequently a loud clamour for a division. But the adjournment was carried, and on Monday night the debate was resumed. Nothing could exceed the sameness of the arguments urged on both sides; the difference being that, while the opponents of the "Ten" hours went upon logical principles and arithmetical calculations, the advocates of it talked widely and wildly about this great nation, which had paid twenty millions for the emancipation of our black slaves, being able also to pay handsomely for the freedom of our white population. One of the most striking speeches was that made by Mr. Ward, who traced through all its ramifications the probable effects of what Sir R. Peel truly called an "enormous experiment." Mr. Hawes attempted a vindication of himself and friends for having, in the face of their political economy, voted for the Ten Hours; Lord John Russell did the same thing; Mr. Bright exposed the worthlessness of Lord Ashley's chief informants, and the incredible nature of their allegations; and Sir Robert Peel showed that the reduction of the two hours would strike of £36,000 a week from wages, would lay a tax of upwards of sixteen per cent. on the labourer, and that the loss would fall, not merely on the manufacturer, abridged in his profits, but on the shopkeepers, traders, and merchants of the country. He also intimated that he would resign, if beaten on what he considered to be a matter of so much importance to the welfare of the country. The result of all this was seen in the division. A majority of ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-EIGHT supported the Government, the numbers being 297 to 159; and the announcement caused great cheering and laughter. Lord Ashley looked exceedingly crest-fallen on rising to quit the House: but we believe he was suffering from indisposition.

If the debates on this Factory Question do not immeasurably advance the question of FREE TRADE in the national mind, then are the people of this country the obtusest under the sun. But it has already advanced the question; and in nothing more than in showing the working man that the two extra hours about which so much has been said are essential to the maintenance of the Corn Laws.

TESTIMONIAL TO ROBT. R. R. MOORE, Esq.—An elegant silver inkstand will be presented to Mr. Moore on his next visit to Exeter with Mr. Cobden. It has been purchased by a subscription among the admirers of his eloquent advocacy of Free-Trade principles during the late contest in this city.

MEETINGS.

AGGREGATE WEEKLY METROPOLITAN MEETING OF THE LEAGUE.

The customary weekly meeting of the League was held at Covent-garden Theatre on Wednesday evening last; and notwithstanding the fineness of the weather, and advance of the season, which is usually deemed unfavourable for such gatherings, the building was completely crowded.

The chair was occupied by J. Bright, Esq., M.P., who addressed the meeting in an able speech, having reference almost exclusively to Lancashire and the important election now pending in that county, every allusion to which elicited enthusiastic bursts of applause, showing that in the present contest the citizens of London reciprocate the deep interest which the men of Lancashire not long since manifested in their noble struggle for Free Trade. The meeting was subsequently addressed in powerful speeches by J. Wilson, Esq., Mr. Turner (a tenant-farmer from Othry, Somersetshire), and the Rev. J. Burnet.

Among the gentlemen present were—

John Bright, Esq., M.P., in the chair; the Hon. C. Pelham Villiers, M.P., Major-General Briggs, James Wilson, Esq., Rev. J. Burnet, John Travers, Esq., Wm. Leavers, Esq., Dr. Cooke Taylor, George Offer, Esq., R. S. Johnson, Esq., John Lambert, Esq. (Salisbury), Samuel Wilson, Esq. (Colonel Tucker), Isaac Mollett, Esq., R. Woodgate, Esq., R. Jupp, Esq., Francis Stokes, Esq., Pressa Granger, Esq., Charles Gresh, Esq. (Birmingham), Thomas Gammon, Esq. (Birmingham), Martin Thackeray, Esq., Henry Gunning, Esq., T. Bailey, Esq. (Calne), Thomas Bealey, Esq., David Blyth, Esq., Robert A. Blyth, Esq., Walter Little, Esq., Samuel Tomkinson, Esq. (Liverpool), Thomas Rozerson, Esq. (Liverpool), Mr. Turner (Othry, Somersetshire), W. D. Starling, Esq., Rev. Richard Fletcher (Manchester), W. Geevin, Esq., J. B. Scott, Esq. (Manchester), F. Scheer, Esq., Edward Foster, Esq. (Cambridge), J. P. Burnard, Esq., J. Brownell, Esq., Leslie, Esq., J. W. Langtree, Esq., John Pike, Esq. (Oxford), John Pike, Junr., Esq., John Poulton, Esq., Mr. John J. Eyles (Southampton), John Watkins Drew, Esq. (Southampton), James Sharp, Esq. (Southampton), Wm. Lang, Esq. (Prestonmouth), &c.

The minutes of the previous meeting having been read by Mr. SAUL, upon the motion of Mr. Geach, of Birmingham, seconded by General BRIGGS, they were unanimously confirmed.

The CHAIRMAN, on approaching the platform, was received with loud and long-continued demonstrations of applause, which having subsided, he addressed the meeting as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, it was intended that the Chairman of the Council of the League should have presided over the meeting this evening, but, when I explain the cause of his absence, I am quite sure the meeting will be satisfied that he is as usefully employed where he is as he could possibly have been if he had been present here to-night. (Hear.) He is engaged at this moment in the preparations which are being made in South Lancashire for the very important contest about to ensue there (applause); and knowing, as I do, how extraordinary are his qualifications for conducting an election contest, I am quite certain that there is no man connected with that contest who could be worse spared than could George Wilson. (Loud cheers.) And when I look around upon this crowded meeting, and think how often many of you have been here, and how often this building has been thronged with an enthusiastic audience, assembled, not for the purpose of being delighted with the charms of oratory, but that you might proclaim to the world your full conviction that the Anti-Corn-Law League is right in the position it has taken up,—I am quite certain there are thousands of hearts within these walls at this hour who are anxious that the great contest about to commence in Lancashire should end in a signal triumph for the Free-Trade cause. (Loud cheers.) There are certain small boroughs in which any, or from which any, independent voice is scarcely to be expected. We view this contest, then, as one of infinitely greater importance than contests in a dozen or a score of boroughs like Woodstock or like Abingdon. ("Hear" and cheers.) And this meeting sympathizes with that contest; this meeting is anxious to convey to the electors of South Lancashire its sense of the importance of that contest; and I fear that even we, anxious as we are, do not regard this struggle with all the interest which it merits. (Hear.) I have met persons in the south of England who, when speaking of Lancashire, spoke of it as if it were a county of no more than ordinary importance, as if they knew only this—that there were a number of grasping and avaricious, and some of them rich, manufacturers there, with rather a dense population of working-men—brutalized, ill paid, and degraded; that Lancashire was a county in which there were several considerable towns of a very dull character, connected by railroads (laughter); that, in fact, every feature of the county afforded rather pain than pleasure; and that it was to be looked at as a county only valuable for what could be got out of it, and as one which the tourist and lover of the picturesque should on all occasions carefully avoid. (Loud laughter and cheers.) Now, I was born in that county, and have lived there for something like thirty years, and I know much of its population, and much of its trade, and much of its resources; and I am quite convinced, I am perfectly sure, that there is no other county in England which can compare with it in its real importance as affecting the welfare and the power of this great empire. (Loud cheers.) It is the most populous county in England (hear, hear); it is the most manufacturing county; as far as its productive power goes, it is the richest county in England. (Hear, hear.) And what has it done? Time was when it presented a very different aspect from what it now presents. Some 240 years ago it was considered a wilderness. Camden in his survey, after having travelled the country from York to Durham, proposed to enter Lancashire, and his mind was filled with apprehension at the prospect. His remark is—"And first, of the people of Lancashire, whom I approach with a kind of dread"—in these latter days, too, there are some people who look upon Lancashire with dread—(laughter and cheers);—"may it forebode no ill. However, that I do not seem wanting to this county, I will run the hazard of the attempt, hoping that the Divine assistance which has favoured me in the rest will not fail me in this." (Hear, hear.) He mentions some towns—Rochdale, which he first came to from York; Bury, Blackburn, Preston, and Manchester; but he speaks of these only as being towns of any trade, and that principally connected with the woollen manufacture. He mentions Liverpool—"Litherpool," or abbreviated "Lerpool"—as a small place on the seacoast, and as the most convenient point for setting sail to Ireland; but of Ashton, Bolton, Oldham, and Salford, with other towns now existing in Lancashire, he does not say one word; and there is no reason to believe that these towns were known at that time. (Hear, hear, hear.) It may be worth while for a few moments to examine or to see how wonderful has been the increase of the value of property in that county. In 1692, one hundred and fifty years ago, the whole value—the whole annual value—was £7,000. In 1811 the annual value was £6,192 0/0. (Loud cheers.) Thus there has been an average increase throughout that county in 150 years of not less than six thousand three hundred per cent. (Renewed cheering.) Now, the land-owners should look to this, as showing how trade is advantageous to them. (Hear, hear.) Lancashire has, for its size, just as much land in it as any other county—that must be clear to all. (A voice—"No, no.") I recollect a person standing upon a piece of rising ground, and, looking over the surrounding country, remarking to an inhabitant of the district, who stood near him, that they seemed to have a great deal of land in the neighbourhood, which remark occasioned the individual some surprise; and I suppose it might be made with equal truth in every neighbourhood. (Hear, hear.) Lancashire has landowners; that county is divided into districts called hundreds—(A voice—"Yorkshire.") [Some interruption followed this remark, which appeared to emanate from the same individual who before interrupted the speaker, and several persons were desirous of having him turned out; but Mr. Bright observed, "Oh no, he does not understand me," and then proceeded.]—Of these hundreds three may be considered agricultural, and three manufacturing. The improvement in the value of the agricultural portions of the county has amounted to three thousand five hundred per cent. in that period (hear, hear), while the manufacturing districts have improved to the amount of seven thousand per cent. (Cheers.) There is one estate in the neighbourhood of Manchester—the Chorlton Hall estate—which shows a remarkable increase in value. In the year 1590 it was sold for £320. In 1614—that is, fifty-four years later—it was sold for £300, its value not having increased at all in that time. In 1794 that same estate was sold for £70,000 (loud cheers); and of the township in which that estate is situated, and of which I believe it forms a chief part, I may remark that in 1815 the annual value of that township was £19,000; in 1829, £66,000; and in 1811, £137,000. (Tremendous cheering.) In a space of time less than 200 years, the value of that township has increased, or the estate, rather, has increased from £300 to £137,000. (Applause.) There is another district of Lancashire which it may be well to spend a moment in speaking of, and that is the district called the Forest of Rossendale, containing some twenty-two or twenty-four square miles. In the early part of the sixteenth century, there were only 80 persons living in this district; now there are more than 21,000. (Cheers.) The land for farming purposes in that district now lets for ten times as much rent per year as it did 100 years ago; and there are men now living who can recollect the time when, in their youth, they farmed certain farms which are now paying seven or eight times as much rent as they were paying at that time. (Hear, hear.) The district in which Liverpool is situated—the West Derby hundred—was formerly assessed to the land-tax at £35,000 a year; its annual value now is £2,124,000 per annum, being an advance of more than 5900 per cent. (Cheers.) Liverpool, 150 years ago, was valued as a smaller place than Wigan; it was a mere fishing village some 200 years ago, and now is the largest seaport probably in the whole world. (Hear, hear.) Now, who is it that has made this wonderful change in Lancashire, and what is it? (Loud cheers.) Is it the landed proprietors who have effected this great change? (Loud cries of "No, no.") Forty-four years ago, Dr. Whittaker, the antiquarian, in his history of Whalley, described the landed proprietors of Lancashire to be much in the same state that they had been for 200 years before. He says, "They are men fond of married life"—(laughter)—meaning a great deal of quiet and domestic comfort:—"they are possessed of little curiosity or ambition; they reside much at home; they pursue domestic amusements, which are more gross than costly; and he states that he 'only met with one literary character, who was possessed of the family estate.'" (Laughter.) Well, then, the landed proprietors, if they were men of this character, have not made Lancashire what it is. (Hear.) There are in that county a number of very old houses, and houses where the old families resided; these families are for the most part extinct; they have been passed in the race by a new class of men; their mansions are now inhabited by thriving manufacturers, and the old families have been almost swept away from the southern division of the county; not that there was any war against them, for they had the same chance as other men; but, "born to broad acres," they did not think it necessary to cultivate their minds; they did not think it necessary to use much exertion. Other men sprung up among them—the inventions of Watt and Arkwright gave these other men great opportunities, which these men neglected to seize upon; and thus they who were once the magnates of that county are now nowhere to be found, and a new class of men have sprung up to lead this dense population. (Loud cheers.) It is the industry, the diligence, the perseverance of that population which have combined to make Lancashire what it is. Its minerals are invaluable; but they were underneath its surface for ages and for thousands of years past; and it was only in these latter days, and in the rank of a new generation, that there were found men ready to bring them to light and to transform them into that wonderful machinery which some men so greatly despise—a machinery which is the agent by which the population of these districts stretch out their hands to every region of the earth, and pour them profusely into the laps of their own population. (Tremendous applause.) And that little, soft, flaky substance which is taken from the pod of the cotton tree, and which, some 70 or 80 years ago, was first imported into Lancashire—that is the material, the fibre upon which they have worked—that is the material which has given to that county its greatness and its grandeur. (Loud cheers.) Lancashire, then, is the child of trade and of industry in their most remarkable and magnificent forms. (Cheers.) That trade was not long ago an infant and struggling into life; it is now great and powerful, and, in no longer period than suffices for the child to become a man, it has sprung up into a giant of enormous proportions; and yet that giant, powerful as it is, lies well-nigh prostrate under the letters, and shackles which a benighted, an ignorant, and a thoughtless policy has bound around its muscular form. (Loud and continued applause.) The question now for the electors of South Lancashire is, shall these shackles be continued for ever? ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) Shall they by their voices at this election rivet anew the fetters which have already been imposed upon their trade, or shall they manfully snap them asunder; shall they allow the great and extraordinary character which that trade has assumed to become less great, less powerful, and less energetic—instead of, by giving a still greater impetus to that trade, affording a more extended blessing to the population of that county and of this vast empire? (Loud cheers.) If these electors knew how much depends upon their votes at this election, would there be a man in that county or any other who would go there and ask them for their suffrages in favour of that most pestilential of all curses—the Corn Law and its attendant monopolies? (Tremendous cheering.) If these electors were conscious (and I believe many of them are) that the distresses of the last five years owe their origin to that law—if they knew that it is that law which has precipitated their honourable merchants from prosperity to ruin, which has hurled many a thriving shopkeeper and manufacturer from a comfortable home to misery, and it may be to expatriation, which has desolated thousands of cottages in this country, and carried sorrow and misery into the hearts of millions of our people—if they knew that, and I believe they do know it—do you think they would give their voice on this occasion in favour of a perpetuation of the most blind and most bigoted folly that ever entered into the mind of the legislature of any country upon earth? (Loud and continued cheering.) And if these electors could see this meeting, if every man of them could stand before you, pass across this platform, and have the eyes of 4000 or 5000 of his countrymen upon him—eyes that were looking into his very heart and conscience to see if he had any care for his country and his country's good—I ask you if there is any one of these men who would have the callousness and the hardness to go to the hustings and poll for the perpetrators of this frightful evil? (Loud cheers.) But I have hopes—better hopes than these—hopes that the result of this struggle will be glorious for this great cause. (Cheers.) Free Trade is gaining everywhere. It may be for a while that you have not successful elections—it may be that you do not find in Parliament a minority now which very soon may become so large as to threaten speedily to form a majority—it may be that there are of the public press who sneer at our efforts, who would, if they durst, wholly deny that we are making any progress, and who would, if they could, extinguish our efforts—it may be that all these things may come before you; but the wave which is in motion is gradually swelling onwards, and, in public no less than in private life, wherever we meet and wherever we mix, we find that the delusion of "protection" is being exploded and dispelled, and that the truth of Free-Trade principles is becoming everywhere paramount and apparent. (Loud and long-continued cheering.) Moreover, there is one subject for congratulation in looking at this contest which is now going on in South Lancashire. The candidate—the Free-Trade candidate—is, perhaps, the most extensive merchant in this country, and almost in the whole world. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) He is a merchant of long standing, of long experience, great wealth, and of high character. His property is large, both in commercial undertakings and as a proprietor of the soil in this country. (Hear, hear.) His business is mainly connected with the United States of America. I like him as a candidate for that. (Cheers.) He has lived for years in America. He has an extensive establishment there; he knows how gloriously, how abundantly, Providence has given to that country the means of supplying and reciprocating the wants of this, and how wonderfully, on the other hand, our ingenuity and our manufacturing capital and skill are calculated, in return, to give abundant blessings to that country. (Loud cheers.) He is one of the very men who stand, as it were, on the shore of this island the representative of the working manufacturing millions; he is their agent to hand, as it were, over the Atlantic all that they make and manufacture to clothe the inhabitants of the vast regions of America. (Cheers.) And he stands there, also, to receive in return that which America on her part offers, and that which we in our turn ask for; and were it not for this law—which he will only go to Parliament to assist in uprooting for ever—were it not for this law, he would not only bring cotton and rice and tobacco and other articles from America, but that which is more valuable than them all—food—substantial food for the people and for the many thousands of his countrymen who are suffering under the deepest privation. (Loud and continued cheering.) I think, then, that, from the response which has met the sentiments I have uttered here to-night, we may conclude that there is within the walls of this theatre a deep and an earnest feeling for the success of this great struggle (cheers); that we, who are more immediately connected with them, may, in the meetings which we hold there, in the speeches which we make, in the letters which we write, communicate to the 18,000 electors of that county, who are now intrusted with this most momentous decision, that the citizens of this metropolis, represented by their thousands in this meeting, pray them, implore them, beseech them, exhort them, by all that is sacred and all that is valuable, to cast aside all their old trammels of prejudice and party feeling; that they will step nobly and manfully forward, and that the flag under which they fight shall be that inscribed "FREE TRADE WITH ALL THE WORLD, AND PERFECT JUSTICE TO THE INDUSTRY OF THE PEOPLE OF THIS COUNTRY."

At the conclusion of the hon. member's brilliant address (which had been repeatedly interrupted by demonstrations of applause), the house rose en masse, and cheered vociferously for several minutes, during which Mr. Bright resumed his seat. After a pause, he again advanced to the table, and said: The meeting will now be addressed by Mr. James Wilson, whom I have the pleasure of introducing to you as one of the very best political economists of the day; by Mr. Turner, a tenant-farmer, residing in the parish of Othory, in the neighbourhood of Taunton (cheers); and by the Rev. John Burnet (loud cheers), a gentleman whom, I believe, is well known to you all. I will now call on Mr. James Wilson to address you.

Mr. JAMES WILSON then came forward amidst loud cheers, and addressed the meeting as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, for those who have taken for many years a deep interest in the progress of this question, there is, perhaps, no sight that could possibly be so gratifying as that which we are in the habit of witnessing at these meetings. At the same time we must always bear in mind that the whole country, and the large bulk of the electors of this kingdom, and unfortunately, perhaps, a larger portion of its legislators, have not so conclusively made up their minds on this subject as we have; and we must recollect that they have still lingering in their minds with reference to this subject a great number of delusive fallacies which it is our duty to endeavour by every reasonable means to remove as far as we can. One of those fallacies which, perhaps, more than any other at this particular moment, is injuring the progress of the Free-Trade cause is a charge of inconsistency in the statements which we are in the habit of making. It is an accusation which is reiterated in the Legislature and throughout the country, and is found in the mouth of every person who supports the opposite opinion; and which charge I think, without some explanation has, perhaps, sometimes a degree of apparent reasonableness. Upon that account it is that we should take more pains to remove that fallacy. I am not in the habit of looking upon these meetings as opportunities for amusement, but rather for instruction, if we can possibly derive it. (Hear, hear.) Therefore, if I should aim only to elucidate one or two points which to me may appear to be making against the progress of our question in the social circle at the present moment, I trust you will excuse that effort rather to confine my remarks to what may afford instruction, than to that which might minister to excitement or amusement. The particular inconsistency to which I allude as having been charged against us is, that we are in the habit, when we address large multitudes of the manufacturing or mercantile classes, of representing the effects of the Corn Laws as disastrous to trade in consequence of the high prices for the first necessary of life which they inflict on the consumer; and that when we address, on the other hand, the agricultural and farming population, it is said we are in the habit of telling them that Free Trade will not injure their interests in actual price, and perhaps much less in relative price. Now, these are the statements which I am willing to admit on the face of them do bear some appearance of inconsistency; and yet I believe there is nothing more capable of being proved than that both are correct. It should always be borne in mind that "dearness" and "cheapness" may be produced from two distinct causes. Dearness may be produced, on the one hand, by scarcity, and, on the other, by a large consumptive ability on the part of the community. If dearness be caused by scarcity, then prices keep above the relative means of the community of purchasing the article. If, on the other hand, dearness be only the effect of a large demand for a commodity, it argues, in the first place, great consumptive ability and the wealthy condition of the consumer, in order to have brought about that dearness. Cheapness, on the other hand, may be produced from two causes. It may be the result of plenty, and it is then a blessing to every one; but, on the other hand, it may be produced, as we have seen during the last two or three years, from inability on the part of the consumer to purchase the first necessary of life. Now, what I contend is, that the principles of restriction and monopoly have a tendency to create the dearness, which is objectionable, because it arises from scarcity; and that Free Trade, on the other hand, if followed out, would ultimately, perhaps, produce dearness, but only in consequence of increased wealth and greater means of consumption; that restriction has also a tendency to produce cheapness, but not that which is derived from plenty, but from diminishing the means and ability on the part of the consumer. Therefore, I say, that the very tendency of our Corn Laws, and the very object and aim of our restrictive commercial legislation, generally, are to limit quantity. If they restrict quantity, the first operation may be, I admit, to raise prices; but the next tendency of limited quantity is, to reduce trade: this is followed by decreased employment; the next tendency is, restricted means of consumption; and the next and last effect is, an impossibility among the people to consume, and, consequently, a decreased price. (Loud cheers.) Upon this ground, therefore, I contend that the Corn Laws, or any commercial restriction, never ultimately did benefit to any party for whose particular advantage it was intended. In the first place, therefore, I say this system produces a high price, which is delusive because it cannot be maintained; it tempts people into bargains which cannot be fulfilled; contracts are entered into which end in nothing but disappointment; the means of the community are rapped to the foundation by destroying the ability and interest of the consumer. How clearly and palpably do we see this take place with regard to the very restriction of which we are now speaking—the Corn Law. It has a tendency to limit the quantity of food, and consequently cause high prices; but the next tendency is to destroy trade. The farmer in the meantime has made his contract for rent, calculating upon the high price which the Legislature has promised him; but in the progress of events the trade of the country is destroyed; the means of the consumer are limited; and at last the prices fall, to the disappointment of the farmer, and to the ruin of all that are around him. (Cheers.) On the other hand I contend, that had we a free trade in corn—and every other article—but had we a free trade in corn only, the first tendency would be to increase the quantity, and that would perhaps diminish the price. But with an increased quantity you would have an increased trade; and with an increased trade a greater amount of employment for your ships, more demand for your sailors and millers at home, an increase in internal communication, in the distribution of that additional food in all the different parts of the country; and then increased employment caused by producing those goods which you must necessarily have to give in exchange for the corn or the sugar which you may import from other places. Therefore I contend that, with Free Trade, although the first tendency may be to reduce prices, yet that the ultimate effect is to make better prices than can possibly be sustained under a system of restriction. Perhaps there is no greater error into which we are all apt to fall than that of attributing too much importance to mere prices. We are constantly told, when we talk about reduction of duty, that it will be an injury. People say, "It will only make a farthing or a penny a pound difference; and what is that in the consumption of an individual?" Now, if it made no difference at all, and sugar re-maintained at the same price as it is, but if at the same time you can show me that there will be a great additional quantity of sugar in the country, it cannot but be a benefit to the whole community. In short, if you can import a larger quantity of sugar, and pay the same price for that increased amount which you did for the smaller quantity, nothing, to my mind, is so strong an evidence of the advantage which that additional import of sugar will afford to the community; because it proves that, with the increased trade which has been created by this import of sugar, you have actually augmented the wealth of the community so much that they can afford to pay for the large quantity the same rate which they paid for the smaller. (Cheers.) We have seen some of these principles illustrated during the last twelve months in a rather a remarkable way. We began last year with extraordinarily low prices in every thing. Agricultural produce of all descriptions was very cheap; manufactured goods of every kind were extremely low; and raw materials of every sort were almost cheaper than were ever known. In consequence of this extreme cheapness, according to our principles—which for many years now have acted almost as true as a barometer does in indicating the state of the weather—in consequence of that cheapness we had a revival of trade, which had a great influence on prices. During the last year you have had a very considerable increased import of many of the first and most important raw materials, and one which bears on a question which is before the Legislature at this moment, and is a most triumphant evidence of the truth of our principles. The Duke of Richmond complains very severely that Sir Robert Peel should propose to reduce the duty on wool (laughter): that nobleman cannot be persuaded but that the introduction of foreign wool, more freely than it has hitherto been, must tend to diminish the price of the fleeces which are cut from the backs of his flocks in the north of Scotland. (Hear.) Now, if the Duke of Richmond had taken any trouble whatever (and he certainly has not pretended to do so) to look into the statistics of the trade of this country, he would have found that it was just in proportion as the price of wool was high that we imported largely from abroad, and that, in those very years when our imports were the smallest, the price of home-grown wool was lowest. In 1819, wool was subject to a duty of 6d. per lb., and then our import of foreign wool was only about 19,000,000 lbs. Mr. Huskisson induced the Government and the Legislature of that day to reduce the duty to 1d. per lb.; the consequence was, that in a few years the import of wool increased from 19,000,000 lbs., until, in the year 1836, it amounted to 64,000,000 lbs. (Hear.) During that period the price of home-grown wool, instead of falling in consequence of this increased import, actually rose from 13d. to 19d. per lb. Since 1836 (and this is very remarkable), during the bad years of trade the imports of foreign wool fell from 64,000,000 lbs. to 40,000,000 lbs. in 1842; and during that period the same wool fell, in the absence of 20,000,000 lbs. foreign competition, from 18d. to 10d. per lb. Now, during the last year, we have had a little change. I hold in my hand a return of the comparative trade of the three first months of last year, with that of the corresponding period of the present year. I find the wool we imported last year in the first three months, 4,500,000 lbs.; but in the first three months of this year, 9,500,000 lbs.; and at the present moment the English grower, in the presence of the increased quantity of 5,000,000 lbs. during the present spring, receives 25 per cent. more in price than he did last year. (Cheers.) So true are these principles, that they even appear, the more we examine the condition of this and every country, to operate almost as a certain index from month to month. But I will refer the noble duke, and all those who are against the reduction which the present Ministry have proposed on wool, to a fact which will be a solution of this question. We last year imported 4,500,000 lbs. of wool, and the price of that article was then about 10d.: we have imported 9,500,000 lbs. this year, and the price is 13d. (Hear, hear.) But I turn to another feature in the same account: I look to the export of our woollen manufacture, because, after all, there comes the question. We contend that you cannot buy abroad without selling. If you increase your purchases you must of necessity increase your sales. One thing is quite obvious, that you do not get anything from abroad for nothing, and if you can buy you may be quite sure that you must sell. (Loud cheers.) I find that in the first three months of last year, when we were importing very little wool, that that article fell very low in price, and that we exported of woollen manufactures only to the amount of £1,300,000; but this year, when we have imported 9,500,000 lbs. at a much higher price, it turns out that this £1,300,000 exports of woollen manufacture last year are now increased to £1,700,000. (Hear, hear.) This, therefore, is the explanation. Your increased imports were the cause of your enlarged exports, with a corresponding additional price (Hear, hear, hear.) I should like to ask the Duke of Richmond, and those who agree with him in opinion upon this subject, to what condition they would bring the trade of this country if they were to carry out their own principles of restriction? If they say, "We will confine the trade of this land to that which is produced at home," the consequence would be that every day we should have a smaller and smaller stock of commodities to exchange; and if so, it must follow that we must have a smaller and smaller quantity of business, a less amount of employment, and consequently a proportionate increase of poverty in the country. (Hear.) On the other hand, if you will act upon your own principles, the longer and the further you work them out the more perfect they become. The more you import the greater your amount of exports; there is no end to it. The more you add to the wealth and comforts of the human race all over the world, the better are they able and the greater is their willingness to add to your riches and comforts. (Cheers.) There is a system which, if acted upon, becomes more and more difficult at every stage; while ours is a principle which at every step becomes more and more capable of benefiting the human family. (Renewed cheers.) There appears to be a most extraordinary perverseness in the principles upon which all governments are and ever have been carried on with regard to commerce, and a perverseness which it is most difficult to account for. It is not that the principles for which we have been contending are new; for every great statesman, philosopher, merchant—nay, I will even say landowner—all men of any vastness of mind, for centuries past have repeated in their writings and speeches the very words that are now pronounced from these boards, meeting after meeting. (Hear.) And proofs of this fact on every hand. I yesterday accidentally met with a speech delivered in the House of Lords eighty years ago by Lord Chatham, who employs language which might have been appropriately used upon this stage. In reference to this very subject—extent of our trade—he says:—"I do not despair of my country; and I have no objection to state what, in my opinion, would restore the kingdom to its once flourishing condition. Give freedom to commerce, and lighten the pressure of taxation, and you will have no complaining in your streets. As commerce is always a change of equivalents, a nation that will not buy cannot sell; and every restriction upon import is an obstacle to export. On the other hand, the more we admit the productions of foreign countries, the more extensive becomes their demand for our commodities. Let the absurd system of our Corn Laws be gradually and cautiously abolished, and allow the cheap agricultural produce of the north of Europe, and of the continents of America and Africa, to be freely introduced, and we shall obtain an unlimited vent for our manufactures. A rigid and efficient system of retrenchment, allowing us to take off the taxes upon salt, upon soap, upon leather, upon iron, and a few other articles of subsistence, our advantages from position, from coal mines, and from the skill and energy of our people, are so considerable, that, were it not for unwise laws and overstrained taxation, Britain, for ages to come, might continue to be the great workshop of the world." (The reading of this extract was frequently interrupted, and followed by loud cheers.) So that these principles have been reiterated by almost every man whose name is celebrated in history as a statesman or philosopher; and yet, down to this very day, we find the greatest perverseness manifested by almost all governments upon the face of the earth. What greater evidence can we have of the absurdity of their conduct than this fact, that the principle upon which almost every government and legislature acts is—that the thing of which the country has the greatest deficiency shall be most rigidly excluded (hear, hear), and that that of which they have the greatest abundance is allowed to be imported as freely as you please. (Hear, hear, hear.) We have a most extraordinary example of this palpably absurd mode of acting in the case of France. Perhaps it will be as good an instance of the folly of this principle upon which governments act as we can have; for we can always judge of anything with more calmness, coolness, and less prejudice when seen in others than we can when we have to look to ourselves. About three or four years ago a friend of mine was sent by our late Government to France to make a commercial treaty with that country. They agreed to admit our hardware, cutlery, and linen goods upon more favourable terms; but the chief thing which the French stipulated for in return was this, that they should be allowed to have our flax machinery. That admission was deemed to be a very great boon to France. They did not care about the cotton machinery, because they had had that for a considerable period, and could make it as well as ourselves; but the flax machinery, a description of business in which we were making very great progress, they were very anxious to have. The stipulation was, however, made; the manufacturers in this country having been consulted, were liberal enough to say that they had no objection to the exportation of flax machinery. (Hear.) Last year, our Government, irrespective of any treaty, liberated the trade of machinery, as all other trades ought to be set free. They disabused our mercantile code, or tariff, of that which had always been a very great disgrace to it—the prohibition against the exportation of machinery. Notwithstanding the importation of flax machinery into France was the very thing that the French stipulated for in the treaty three years ago, what was the first step taken by them upon our liberating all machinery? Why, in this very session, at the present moment, they are legislating to place a duty upon our machinery; and what is the most singular and perverse part of their conduct in, that upon cotton machinery, which they said they did not care at all about, they are about to impose a duty of 30 francs per hundred kilograms; but upon flax machinery, which they were so particularly desirous of having, they are now going to place a duty of 50 francs per hundred kilograms. (Hear, hear.) Now, how do they justify such unreasonable conduct? If you talk to a Frenchman upon the subject, you will find his explanation to be this: "England has grown great by machinery; machinery must, therefore, be a very good thing for a country to possess; because it is so beneficial we will place a high duty on foreign machinery in order to encourage our own mechanists to become machine-makers." However extravagantly perverse this principle appears on the part of the French, and however ridiculous it may seem in them to have made a treaty three years ago for the introduction of that machinery which they are now trying to prohibit, yet the same perverseness and absurdity is observable in every one of the restrictions which we have placed upon commerce. (Hear, hear, hear.) Look through our Custom-house list, and select therefrom the articles we are most in want of, and upon them you will find the greatest restrictions placed; then turn to those things which we do not require as necessities, and there you will find no restrictions at all. (Hear, hear, hear.) Agricultural produce, of which we are notoriously most deficient, and of which we are obliged periodically to import large quantities at a very great national sacrifice, even of our trade, morals, and everything else—this very agricultural produce is excluded with the greatest care; and nothing but a little safety-valve in a sliding-scale is allowed to remain open, lest the steam-boiler should become too hot and explode. (Cheers.) In seasons of our greatest emergency this agricultural produce is allowed to come into this country. Upon articles of which you have an abundance there is no restriction whatever placed. This very perverseness on the part of foreign governments, respecting which our own Ministers talk, and write diplomatic despatches, is the very same perverseness which is practised upon our own people. (Loud cheers.) The same perverseness which leads to the taxation of articles grown in abundance abroad, and greatly wanted at home, has been applied also to articles produced in our own colonies. If you find an article raised in our colonies which is not produced in sufficient abundance at home for the consumers, that is the very article upon which a high duty will be placed in order to create increased prices. (Hear.) There is sugar, for example, a chief article which our colonies have not for several years produced in sufficient quantities for consumption; and yet that is the very article upon which our Government has placed the greatest prohibition and imposed the highest duty. But we have before us at this moment what I consider a very great triumph in Free-Trade principles. The present Ministry, after having turned out the late Whig Government upon the sugar question, have been obliged by the necessities of the country to act upon the principles of Free Trade in this matter; and the progress of public opinion upon the subject has at length compelled them to bring forward a measure relative to sugar. (Hear, hear.) It is not my intention to depreciate the value of this proposed alteration, because I am rather disposed to appreciate it a little more highly than I believe would be convenient for the Minister to admit, or for the West India planters to believe. I regard this measure as the same, or even better; inasmuch as 34s. is lower than 36s.—the very identical proposition upon which Lord Sandon and Sir Robert Peel turned out Lord John Russell and his fellow-ministers two years ago. It is quite true that there is a pretended difference in the two measures—that there is an attempt to support a distinction between free-labour sugar and that which is slave-grown (hear, hear); but a very little inquiry into the measure will show that this pretended difference does not in reality exist. Had they proposed a plan the same as Mr. Hawes proposed last year in the House of Commons, without any reference either to free-labour or slave-grown sugar, that, in fact, would have been precisely the same; and, as far as I am concerned, I am exceedingly glad it should be found to be so; because, had it been otherwise, there would have been a greater amount of restriction reserved. However, it is perhaps worth while to examine a little into the operation of this pretended difference. We are told that it would be inconsistent with our professions of morality, and with what we have done for the purpose of extinguishing slavery in our own colonies, to encourage the introduction of sugar produced by slavery in other countries. I believe that those who advocate Free Trade are also, and always have been, the greatest advocates for personal liberty (loud cheers); therefore, in any remarks that I may make on that subject, let it never be supposed for one moment that I am in favour of maintaining slavery in any part of the world. It is only that we believe this is not a straightforward or likely means of abolishing slavery; that it is only holding us up as a nation to the contempt of the other countries of the world, when we are pretending to do that which every man must know can have no such effect—doing, in a roundabout and indirect way, that which we dare not do in a straightforward manner. (Cheers.) We are told that we may bring as much free-labour sugar into this market as we like. Upon a very close examination of the quantity of free-labour sugar which is available for our market, I find that the whole quantity produced in Java, Sumatra, and Manila is about 93,000 tons annually. I am quite satisfied that we cannot, at the proposed duties, consume more than 40,000 tons out of 93,000; and consequently upwards of 50,000 tons of that sugar must still be disposable in the markets of the world, and sold at the same price as other sugar upon the Continent and elsewhere. Thus you perceive that the sugar that we bring here will be precisely the same price as that for which the slave-grown sugar will sell on the Continent; and every cwt. of sugar that we import, that would have otherwise gone to Holland, Germany, or the Mediterranean, must be supplied by the slave-grown sugar which we refuse from South America. Therefore what we say in fact is simply this: we take the sugar that was destined for Holland and Germany; that will create a vacuum there, to be filled up by the slave-grown sugar which we will not allow to come directly to England: we send it in our own ships, purchased with our own capital, through the medium of our own merchants, paid for by our own goods in the Brazils—in every respect our own, only that we will not let it go to our own consumer. (Cheers.) We send that sugar to supply the place of the free-grown article which they will allow us to import here. Are we not then as much identified with the transaction, and are we not as much the actual people who are carrying on the transaction, as if we brought it into our own warehouses in London? (Hear, hear.) Yes, and we do actually bring it into London; and we refine it in the bonded warehouses on the side of this river. We are becoming the laughing-stock of the Continent of Europe. (Hear, hear.) I spoke recently to a French gentleman, a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and it was with a smile of incredulity that he listened to the proposition. Therefore, as far as the slavery question goes, it is a mere pretence—it is a deception of the grossest description. Then, as far as regards the West India planter, although I am not a monopolist, I do not wish to deceive the West India planter. The Government of this country came forward and told him, "We will give you a limited competition,"—for that is the reason assigned; they pretend that by prohibiting the trade for slave-grown sugar, that thereby the competition with the West India planter will be limited; but in the meantime the operation of the law is not limited: we will import as much as if no such restriction had existed. What is the essential difference between the two propositions of the late and the present Government? Why, there is the essential difference in our trade, but none as to the consumer. The average exports per annum to Java, Sumatra, and Manila have been £350,000; but during the same years your average exports to Brazil, Cuba, and other places from which you are now debarred from bringing your sugar, have been three millions and a half, or just ten times the amount of that which you export to free-labour states. Therefore you are told that you are to confine yourselves to dealing with these small markets in the distant parts of the globe which can take no portion of your manufactured goods worth speaking of, and be debarred from dealing with those larger and nearer markets which are the best customers you have. There is no difference, whatever, I contend, in the two measures; there is no difference comparatively in the West India competition; but the distinction really is, that you are to sacrifice your largest and best foreign markets for mere whim and caprice, for a difference without distinction, in order that the Government shall appear to retain a consistency, when it was obvious that nothing but faction, or something worse, induced them to oppose that measure. I fear that I am detaining you too long. (Cries of "No, no.") Go on, go on, and cheers.) But, great as we may be disposed to think this boon with regard to the sugar question, let us not forget that there is still a very large amount of protection retained by the West India Islands.

We have been in the habit of viewing this question in such exaggerated forms of protection that we look on this—which is still a very enormous amount of protection—as comparatively trifling. (Hear, hear, hear.) Let it be remembered that the consumption of colonial sugar in this country is four million cwt. per annum, and that the Government propose to retain a protection of 10s. per cwt., equivalent to £2,000,000 a year, which you will have still to pay to the West India planter for the privilege of retaining your colonies. You have paid twenty millions for the emancipation of your slaves; you pay two millions a year now, even under this modified form, which is equivalent to the interest on a debt of seventy millions at 3 per cent. If you had paid the planter a hundred millions instead of twenty millions, by so doing you would have been considerably in pocket before now. Much as we think of that £20,000,000, I am sure that the effect of this protection and indirect charge upon the consumer at home has done more injury than the £20,000,000 which you gratuitously gave him. (Hear, hear.) If I am not detaining you too long, there is one subject upon which I would wish to offer a few remarks. (Hear, hear.) We are not met this evening for the purpose of discussing the currency question. I should be sorry to introduce any subject which had not a direct reference to the question for which we are assembled. But though we have not met here for the purpose of discussing the currency question, as a currency question, yet it is, perhaps, particularly appropriate that we should view the point as connected with Free Trade and the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear.) A great deal has been said, and very justly, during the last week of the very important measure which the Prime Minister is about to introduce for the purpose of regulating the currency. I am not about to enter into the question as to whether he is correct or not in his view, or whether he is right in the principle on which he has framed that measure; but I would have the public of this country, and especially the commercial portion of it, not look on that or any other currency measure which can be proposed, although it may be the most perfect that human or superhuman ingenuity could devise, as being a cure for the disastrous evils and fluctuations which have taken place in the commerce of this country for the last few years. (Hear, hear, hear.) I am quite willing to admit that a great deal upon the surface of our social state appears to be connected with the operation of the currency; but it is very easy to show that what appears to be so connected with that subject is rather a symptom of the public malady than the disease itself. The principle on which the Bank of England have professed to regulate their currency for the last ten years has been this:—they have professed, though they have never acted up to that profession, to control the currency in proportion as their bullion showed a tendency to go out of the country, and to expand it in proportion as it came in. In any remarks that I make I will follow the very laudable example set by Sir Robert Peel, of avoiding altogether technical language, and not making use of any phrases but those that may be readily understood. By this plan the Bank merely mean, that when there is a disposition in the bullion to flow out of the country—which can only arise when the precious metals are more valuable on the Continent than here, that is, when you are obliged to import something from the Continent of a greater amount than you can send goods for in exchange—if you contract the currency under those circumstances, it will make money so scarce as to cause your goods and merchandise—your sugar in the docks, your calicoes in the warehouses—by competition, to become so cheap that the people abroad shall take them, in consequence of their cheapness, in preference to your gold. I am not blaming the principle—I am not saying whether it is necessary or not; I only wish you to understand exactly the operation of this principle as regards commerce. The Bank of England have not properly acted upon this principle: for whenever there was a disposition on the part of bullion to go out of the country, it has always been attended by a commercial crisis, as it must always be in such circumstances; and the consequence has been that they have neglected that rule, and have allowed the gold to go out of the country without contracting the currency; and then after it was all gone, or nearly so, they have contracted it with great violence, and brought down the price of commodities very much, in order to bring the bullion back. What the Government propose is this: as the Bank has not shown power enough to act upon its own principle in this case, they will make an independent body, that shall have no other inducement connected with banking or commerce, which shall by any possibility prevent it carrying out that principle to the most rigid extent; so that whenever the exchange turns against us, if they lose a million of bullion, for example, their rule is immediately to contract the currency, make money scarce, and reduce the price of goods. This is a point to which I wish particularly to call your attention. We never have had, and I believe it is almost an impossibility that we ever shall have, any very important disturbance of the currency for any continuous time which has not arisen from bad harvests. (Hear, hear.) I will give you my reason for that opinion: you have no other article that is of such vast importance and primary necessity as bread, for which you are bound and called upon to make any sacrifice in order to obtain it. If the exchanges were to turn against this country because we were importing too much silk or wool, or even any luxury, such as wine, we could very easily contract our consumption of that particular article, and the evil would very soon become rectified. But if you have bad harvests, bread being the very last thing you can do without, it becomes no question of choice of contracting your demand for bread: you must get that to the required extent, at any sacrifice, in exchange for any other commodities, whatever they may be, of which you are possessed. Therefore, I contend that, if there was a disposition on the part of the exchange to turn against us from any other reason than that of bad harvests, it would very soon correct itself. In that I am supported by all experience. We have had several periods of commercial derangement; but, though they arose from foreign loans or any other cause, all those derangements have, comparatively, quickly arranged themselves. But in 1838 you had a deficient harvest, succeeded by another in 1839; we began the latter year with £9,000,000 of bullion in the coffers of the Bank. During the whole of that period you were obliged to import corn; you had no choice, it was an act of necessity. There was nothing which you had that you were not compelled to part with in order to obtain corn; and before the end of that year you were positively obliged to go to France and borrow £2,500,000 of bullion. Now, whatever legislative act you may have on the subject, and by whatever principle you may regulate the currency, you cannot avoid that necessity of importing corn when you have these deficient harvests; and there is no currency measure that can be devised which will relieve you from that necessity. The Bank may regulate its issue upon any principle it pleases, but it will not ensure good harvests; you must either subject yourself to a reduction in the price of the commodities which you may take, or else you must send your bullion. The measure which Sir Robert Peel proposes is this: that instantly there is a turn of exchange, the currency shall be so immediately contracted as to suspend the efflux of bullion, and goods be made to go out instead; but the effect of this will be, that the owners of these commodities will be more instantly sacrificed to the necessity of importing corn than they were under the old system. Understand me: I do not complain of the measure of Sir Robert Peel; I do not say this is not a better and more mechanical way of working out the same principle which the Bank have very indifferently worked upon before; all that I mean to contend is, that this is not going to the root of the evil which they pretend to cure. I just want to call the attention of the bankers and merchants of Liverpool at this particular moment, and also the merchants in London, the manufacturers and shopkeepers, and traders of every class, even the farmers and landlords themselves, and, above all, the labouring population, to what will be the immediate consequence of the operation of this law stringently carried into effect in the event of a deficient harvest. Supposing you have a failure in the crop as you had in 1838, and no doubt as we shall soon have again under these laws which render such calamities inevitable; supposing that you were obliged to import a great quantity of foreign corn, so that the exchange turned against this country, and you had a balance to pay the Continent, the Bank of England would be called on to pay a million of bullion: by this new rule they would instantly contract the currency—that is, they would cease to discount the bills of others, and sell their securities. By such machinery they must do this. The consequence would be that more would be taken for everything you could get—you would have everybody selling and nobody buying—there would be immediately a rapid and sudden depreciation in the value of property, and all other commodities. On this sudden depreciation in the value of raw material what is the merchant in Liverpool to do, who has got a cargo of cotton coming from America to this country, upon which he has accepted bills, perhaps to the full amount? What are the merchants connected with the East Indies to do, who have got their cargoes coming from Bombay, who have got their letters, invoices and bills of lading coming over land, for which they have accepted bills in London, and they find when those cargoes come that their value is depreciated twenty-five per cent? What is the manufacturer to do, who has got his stock of cotton or wool, when he discovers that the value of his commodity is depreciated fifteen or twenty per cent? The mechanics and persons in all inferior employments would be thrown out of employment. The farmers themselves would be sufferers by the reduction in the price of their wool; and after a very short time, passing through the channels of trade, there would be a diminished consumption of farm produce, and a consequent state of agricultural distress. (Hear, hear.) As I said before, I do not mean to contend that these consequences are not inevitable, but they are precisely what has occurred during the last five years. It is a contraction of your currency in order forcibly to reduce commodities below their natural prices, to protect the currency system of the country which has produced such mischief during the last five years. Now, although I do admit that you cannot, under the present system, prevent their contracting the currency and depreciating the value of property, and while I am not disposed here now to criticise Sir Robert Peel's Act, or the machinery by which he intends to carry it into operation, I nevertheless do say this, that for a Prime Minister of this country to get up and propound a measure which he says he hopes will be a cure for our fluctuations in commerce, secure the interests of trade and manufactures, and benefit the working population—a measure which will prevent sudden depreciation—how a Minister can say that he expects, with a mechanism of that kind, to retain the sliding scale and the Corn Laws which are at the bottom of all, I cannot comprehend. (Cheers.) The cause of all your derangements, and that which renders all this mechanism necessary, is, that you have not a regular and uniform trade in corn as you have in almost every other article. If you had, and your merchants could as safely trade in corn as they can in cotton, knowing that it would as uniformly come into consumption as any other commodity, you would then have no more derangements or crises in business. (Cheers.) The largest stock of corn we ever had in this country has never exceeded a few weeks' consumption. (Hear, hear, hear.) There is no other article with which you can safely carry on business unless you have nine, ten, or twelve months' consumption. Therefore this very article which, above all others, has the most important influence upon the currency, is the one in which you expose yourselves to all the diversities of season, and all the chance of accident which can possibly betray you. (Cheers.) I have no doubt whatever that after this bill comes into operation, some two or three years hence, when we have a bad harvest, the very first week there will be five or six houses in Liverpool and London who will lose far more in that short space of time by the contraction of the currency, and its effect upon the price of their commodities, than that large sum which the Anti-Corn-Law League are collecting this year for the purpose of abolishing this nuisance. (Hear, hear, hear.) If these merchants and traders knew their interest well they would advocate Free Trade; ay, and the landlords too: for why has the Duke of Richmond lost £2000 this year by the salmon fisheries? Only because the people have not the ability to consume his salmon. That nobleman tells us that the tariff has been the cause of his loss; but there has only been about £2000's worth of salmon brought into the country in the course of the year. (Hear, hear.) The collapsed condition of the country caused this, because the very things that were raised the people had not the ability to buy. That is the reason why the Duke of Richmond lost by his salmon. (Hear, hear.) His grace's tenant, no doubt, being a shrewd, clever fellow, found the trade going against him, and was very glad of an excuse for giving up his lease. Why is it we have heard of ten, twenty, and twenty-five per cent. of the rents being given back during the last year by the landlords? Simply from the same cause to which I have referred. Therefore I contend that all interests are involved in this matter. I cannot look upon this question of Free Trade as being either a merchant's, manufacturer's, or landlord's question; it is a matter which vitally concerns the whole of us. (Loud cheers.) We are bound together by an indissoluble tie of common interest. Providence never did, or could, mean that it should be the interest of any one portion of the human race to make laws and institutions which should have for their object, or which should successfully carry out principles which war against the interests of any portion of the human race. (Renewed cheering.) I therefore conclude, ladies and gentlemen, that this is not a party question, but one which involves the interests of the whole community. All I can say is, that, looking at this currency question as it is now passing before our eyes, if the bankers and merchants would only look at it and see the evils to which they are exposed now by the Corn Law, which causes these crises and fluctuations, I think that they would look on our friends here with more favour, and they would find that it would be a most profitable thing, merely looking at it in a money light, to assist the Anti-Corn-Law League more perfectly to liberate commerce and industry here and elsewhere. (Mr. Wilson, at the conclusion of the above able address, was vehemently cheered.)

The CHAIRMAN then came forward and said:—I beg leave, ladies and gentlemen, to introduce the tenant-farmer of whom I spoke some time back. Mr. Turner is a tenant-farmer, holding from 300 to 400 acres of land, and yet at a county meeting for Somersetshire he attended, and either proposed or seconded a resolution for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, which was carried triumphantly. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. TURNER then came forward amidst great applause; silence having been restored, he proceeded to address the meeting as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I think an apology is due from me for venturing to address so magnificent an audience as I now see before me. I have no doubt that I may safely calculate on your kind indulgence and forbearance when I assure you that I feel it quite out of my power adequately to address my fellow-creatures this evening. With the exception of briefly proposing a vote of thanks to the League at the Somerset county meeting, I never attempted to address any assembly before. I appear before you to-night as a bona fide tenant-farmer (cheers)—as one, every farthing of whose property is invested in the cultivation of the soil. It would be an act of base ingratitude on my part, to the class to which I belong, if I thought that in thus advocating the principles of Free Trade I should in any measure be injuring them in word or deed. (Hear, hear.) I appear here under peculiar circumstances, having been preceded on former occasions here by several gentlemen of my order who are better able to express their opinions to you, and who have done so very much to their credit; I present myself before you to-night in the hope that I may induce others of my class to come before you in like manner (cheers), and also that my example, in connexion with that of the agriculturists who have preceded me, may excite the tenant-farmers from every county in this empire to present themselves before such audiences as this, and denounce the system under which we are suffering. (Renewed cheers.) If many of your best speakers upon these boards have expressed themselves unable to find any thing novel with which to amuse or instruct you in reference to the Corn Laws, how much more must that difficulty be felt by myself. I believe that the first and grand evil produced by the Corn Laws to my class is the prevention of improvement which they cause. (Hear, hear.) They have been the means of cramping and confining the skill and knowledge which the tenant-farmers possess, and which they have been incapable of fully exercising for want of a lengthened tenure. (Cries of "Hear.") You are, of course, all aware why the tenant-farmers are refused lengthened tenures; it is that they may be used by their landlords for other purposes. (Cheers.) Their being compelled to occupy the land as tenants-at-will has led the farmers to look merely at prices, instead of looking carefully at the amount of produce which the land is capable of yielding. (Hear.) To illustrate my meaning, we will suppose that in a particular parish the land may yield an average of about twenty bushels of wheat per acre, and that the farmers may calculate on selling it at 8s. a bushel (the bushel is the measure by which we sell in our county). If it should so happen that prices should recede 2s. a bushel, they would calculate their loss at 40s. per acre by such fall in the market. Now, I maintain that such a calculation is no criterion of the gain or loss of the farmer, although, under his present circumstances, it may be true that he will not be remunerated for his outlay by the 6s. instead of 8s.; for, supposing that, by increased skill and additional outlay on the land, he realizes eight bushels more per acre than he previously did, and then sells his produce at 6s. per bushel, it is obvious he would be a gainer of 8s. per acre, over and above the additional outlay, even at this reduction in price of 2s. per bushel. (Cries of "Hear.") This fact appears to me to be so clear and convincing that I am satisfied we do not know at what reduction of price we may be able profitably to sell our corn. (Cheers.) Then, again, you are all perfectly aware that the Corn Laws have had a tendency to create great fluctuations in prices; so that in some instances, although a farmer may be disposed to venture on a lease, and may have an opportunity presented to him of taking a farm for seven years—and I, myself, am one of those who occupy a farm on lease for that period—he is afraid to do so, because of the insecurity of prices. (Hear.) I can assure you that the practice pursued with reference to us farmers is to calculate the rents upon high prices. This is owing to the competition for farms which prevails among us, and which enables the landlord to get high prices; and therefore we should not be secure in taking our farms upon that description of tenure under the present system. Equally is the landlord deterred from granting lengthened tenures at the present moment, lest he should lose the power he now possesses over the farmer, as tenant-at-will, for other purposes. (Loud cheers.) The gentleman who preceded me has gone so clearly into the statistics of the matter with reference to the class to which I belong, and has so convincingly proved that the Corn Laws do restrict trade, and in every instance have done so, that I cannot but believe that there is such a close and intimate a connection between commerce and manufactures, and our interests as farmers, that the one cannot thrive unless the other prospers, or be depressed without all feeling the injury. (Loud cheers.) In every instance fluctuation of prices has likewise prevented the fair adjustment of rent. (Cries of "Hear, hear.") Under any circumstances whatever, however disposed the landlord may be to place the tenant on a secure footing—however inclined he may be to act upon that great principle, "Live and let live"—I maintain that fluctuations of price prevent that fair adjustment which would otherwise take place. (Hear, hear, hear.) Supposing the land-agent calculates upon an average price of wheat for a number of years, and fixes upon that calculation a stated rent, such as he considers the tenant ought to pay, I contend that in nine cases out of ten the tenant would not receive that average price; especially if he is a needy man, or an individual who commences, as most young men do, with a capital just sufficient to stock a farm, and to provide for a few contingencies which may occur. (Hear.) He will then be compelled, in order to make his payments, to sell his corn as soon as it is possible for him to thrash it out, and sell it, probably, at that period of the year extending from Michaelmas to Christmas, three months in which prices are lower than in the other nine which are farther removed from the period of harvest, when prices rise to a greater height. (Hear, hear.) Selling it, therefore, at such a time, he cannot obtain the average price received by others who can hold over their stock. For my part, ladies and gentlemen, I am quite at a loss to know who are benefited by these laws. (Hear, hear.) It has been assumed by many that the farmers who have the power of retaining their corn year after year in their possession are benefited by this system; and while I am happy to inform you that there are many instances in our neighbourhood of farmers who have that power, and are considered by some fortunate in being able to exercise it, I have been particularly anxious to ascertain what were the prices they have ultimately realized; and you will probably be surprised when I tell you that they have assured me that, in comparison with their neighbours who have sold annually, they have not made as good prices upon a period of seven years as if they also had sold annually. (Hear, hear.) This statement may surprise some persons in this meeting, but I speak upon the authority of men who would, if called upon, verify what I say; and I have not, therefore, spoken without due caution. (Hear, hear.) Neither do I think the landlords have been greatly benefited by this law, except so far as they have used it for political purposes; pecuniarily, I believe, they have not been gainers. But even if they do maintain this Corn Law, as they suppose, for pecuniary purposes, I think they do it at the expense of their good name. (Hear.) All classes of the community are certainly desirous of maintaining credit among their fellow-creatures; and although they may have amassed vast sums of money, and attained to great political power, I think their position in this country is not an enviable one, and I am confident they will one day look upon their past support of a law for such bad purposes with deep shame. (Loud cheers.) I hardly know what position to take up with reference to the Corn Laws which will be at all interesting to you; nevertheless I cannot but reiterate what has been so frequently stated here, that they have produced most calamitous results amongst us. You have been informed that we as a class are in very depressed circumstances; that the major part of the farmers who are occupying their land at a rack-rent are, and have been for the last three years more especially, paying their rent out of their capital. (Hear, hear.) I speak now from sad experience: I know this statement to be a fact; not only so, but in a lapse of time those who have not been able to command property to any considerable extent have been placed in a very unfavourable position. As my friend Mr. Somers told you, the tenant farmers are in a condition bordering on insolvency. (Hear.) The statement which that gentleman made here was certainly received in our neighbourhood with a great deal of astonishment; but I beg leave publicly to corroborate that statement, knowing it to be a lamentable fact in the neighbourhood where I come from. Not only is it a fact that the farmers are in this state, but the labourers are greatly reduced, and are as a body in a most depressed condition. Indeed, I may say, bordering upon a state of the most abject want which it is possible even to conceive. If I could but picture to you the many scenes of misery which are to be witnessed in my own neighbourhood among the agricultural population, it would indeed harrow up your feelings; but, lacking the ability to describe it to you, I must console myself with the belief that your sympathy with them will be equally as great. (Loud cheers.) I have sometimes been asked by my brother farmers how I can suppose that Free Trade will benefit us as a class, or that with it we shall be able to transact our business better than now? However things might be, this I know that we are now suffering most intensely; and I cannot conceive in my mind the possibility of our being worse. (Hear, hear, hear.) At all events, from what I have been able to glean from the information which we get, poor as it is in our neighbourhood—and which I am sorry to say our disposition to acquire is very small indeed, we not being, generally speaking, a reading class, and the tone of our education being such as to preclude us from attaining that ability to think and speak of it as much as we ought—yet, situated as we are, from the able documents in which the Anti-Corn-Law League is conveying that information to us, it gives me satisfaction to learn that we are certainly in a position to contend against the corn culture of any country in the world. (Loud cheers.) The first question which arose in my mind with regard to this subject was this: Whether we had more mouths to eat than to eat. It has been clearly proved, then it follows of necessity that a greater quantity of food can be consumed. (Hear.) The next question which arises is: Have we ever been able by our own cultivation to produce that quantity which would feed the population of this kingdom? I am informed that we have not. I then proceed to inquire whether we can reasonably expect a great influx of corn from abroad, where it is to come from, and how it is to be produced? There seems to be a very singular opinion existing among my brethren, that corn will flow with the same facility into this country as water does in a river. (Laughter.) They appear to forget that it requires some £6 or £7 an acre to produce corn in our own country; and to imagine that it grows almost spontaneously abroad, or may be found upon the sea-shore, and there picked up in the greatest abundance. (Hear, hear.) If they would but think and inquire into this matter themselves, they would derive the same knowledge and come to a similar conclusion which I have done. (Hear, hear.) It has been shown in a report made by Mr. Meek in 1841, with reference to the corn-growing capacities of distant countries, that, with the exception of one tract of country, I think Prussia Posen, they have not the power of producing anything like that quantity of corn of which we have so much dread. (Hear, hear, hear.) Even in that place, where Nature seems to have been specially bountiful, they labour under the great disadvantages of having bad roads, and no canals or railways of any description whatever. I therefore compare the expense of creating facilities of communication to the ports, to which I add the expense of cultivating the land, however cheap labour may be there, and, having done that, I feel satisfied that we need be under no apprehension of getting such a quantity of corn from abroad as will prevent our growing it at a remunerating price at home. (Cheers.) Besides, we have most fortunately the light of the past to guide us in the future. There is a practical demonstration of the effect of Free Trade in the Channel Islands. An opportunity has been afforded there of testing the influence of Free Trade. I am informed, and I believe it to be correct, for the statement is corroborated by all I have read, and has not been contradicted by the Pro-Corn-Law agitators, that corn in the Channel Islands has averaged for the last seven years 47s. per quarter. That circumstance clearly proves to me that corn will not recede so low as many seem to anticipate. (Hear, hear.) Reciprocity of dealing has been much talked of. It is a conjecture as to whether our neighbours abroad—I will not call them foreigners, because I do not think that mankind are foreign to one another (loud and prolonged cheering)—whether they will deal with us. We have been perfectly convinced, by the able speaker who has just sat down, that there is not the least doubt that if we import we must necessarily export; and wherever we get our corn, as has been proved by every transaction of trade, we are sure to find a demand for our merchandise too. Mr. Gladstone himself clearly admits this, when, in reference to the tariff, he says, that by the importation of cattle there will be a corresponding exportation of manufactures. (Hear, hear.) This appears to be an established fact, and it is one, I think, which ought to satisfy our minds that trade will necessarily increase the amount of goods exported; and by that increase of trade from whence we farmers derive our prices, the country would always be placed in a position to give us that price for our corn which will prove remunerating to our pockets. (Cheers.) I have no concise mode of speaking, ladies and gentlemen, and I am confused in my statement of the case. (Cheers, and cries of "No, no.") I hope you will grant me your forbearance. I feel a great interest in your cause, but I assure you I would not have ventured here but at the earnest request of many of my brother farmers in the district from whence I come. (Cheers; a voice, "Bravo, Somerset.") For myself I do not think that there is any neutral ground for any one to stand upon in this great question. (Hear, hear.) I think it behooves all of us—tenant farmers and farm-labourers—to add our humble testimony to that of the great body of our fellow-labourers who are working hard to accomplish your wishes as well as ours. (Cheers.) I feel satisfied that, if my brethren would but calmly and dispassionately view this question in a freer and more enlightened manner, they would come to a very different conclusion than that to which, I grieve to say, most of them have come to. (Hear, hear.) The first effect which I believe Free Trade would have upon us as a class would be to enable us to get that permanency of tenure which would give us security for any capital which we might think fit to invest. Many of us know how to farm, but, unfortunately, we cannot get the means of cultivating our farms. We have found that those farmers who have suffered least from the pernicious effects of these Corn Laws have been our northern brethren, who have had the advantages of long leases and corn-rents (hear, hear); which clearly proves to us that leases and security under all circumstances and at all times, will enable us to carry on our business satisfactorily, although not with so large a profit as we ought to have. We ought certainly, in common with others, to share in the advantages which this kingdom offers. We ought, as a class, and I see no reason why we should not be able to make the same per centage on our capital which manufacturers and tradesmen make. (Hear, hear.) I believe that Free Trade will enable us to do: it will give us the ability to realize that profit, by the introduction into this country of one of the greatest boons—long leases. It has occurred to me frequently, and very likely to you, that farmers do not farm as they ought, nor take advantage of the means of farming well, when they have it in their power to do so. But how can we expect them to do so when they have got the difficulty to contend against of want of security for their outlay of capital. (Hear, hear.) All the statements in regard to the evils of the Corn Laws have been clearly proved to you in every instance; but I would beg leave to say, before I sit down, that the Protectionist meetings have not given us much enlightenment upon the subject (hear, hear, hear); on the contrary, I find that they are merely disposed to cavil and abuse as much as in them lies. I might refer to the Bridgewater meeting, held for the purpose of maintaining protection, where, as you have been informed, discussion upon this question was denied, and we had no opportunity of controverting what may have been said by those who held it. That circumstance proves to my mind that they are conscious they have not much truth on their side, otherwise they would not have denied their opponents an opportunity of proving, if they could, that they were right. I am quite aware that many remarks may be made upon my humble observations, as I know remarks were made upon my friend Mr. Somers, in the Morning Post, with respect to grammatical errors, and such unimportant matters. (Cheers and laughter.) That we are not intimately acquainted with the refinements of our language, is not to be wondered at when you consider the difficulties we labour under, and the extreme thralldom of landlord oppression which we have endured. (Loud cheers.) It is not, I say, to be wondered at; and it is a matter of great question with me, if these Corn Laws are not repealed, whether we shall be able to give our families any education at all. (Cries of "Hear, hear, hear.") I cannot conclude without making my grateful acknowledgments to the Anti-Corn-Law League for their efforts in our part of the country in enlightening my brother farmers and the people in that neighbourhood. (Applause.) I can testify that their distribution of tracts has created such an excitement and intense desire on the part of the population in that locality to become more acquainted with the subject that they have been the means of conveying a vast fund of information which will never be forgotten, and which has, in many instances, taught the labouring classes to think for themselves, and to know their true position, thereby relieving the farmers from the odium which had been thrown upon them for not giving better wages. (Cheers.) They have learned the truth, that wages are regulated by the proportion between demand and supply; and that, however willing the farmers might be to give more wages, they are prevented from doing so owing to the amount of rent which they have to pay to their landlords. (Cheers.) I trust that the observations which I have made will have the effect of urging other farmers to exercise, as much as in them lies, a degree of independence. (Hear.) I verily believe that if they would but come out, throw off the thralldom by which they are now kept down, declare their opinions on this matter, and assert their independence, that the landlords, at the present time, would not venture to exercise that authority over them which they threaten. (Cheers.) I know of many instances in my own neighbourhood of persons who have done so with success. I feel satisfied that, if they would but exercise their independence, they would have some chance of procuring that which they so anxiously desire. (Hear.) For my part, I am not disposed to look upon any man as an enemy; but I would seize on every opportunity to regard truth wherever it may be found. (Cheers.) I feel satisfied that the manufacturers are indeed working out for us what we should never have been able to accomplish for ourselves. (Loud cheers.) Therefore, although hitherto we have looked on them with a degree of suspicion, and regarded them in the light of enemies, the time is coming when they will be universally acknowledged by us as our very best friends. (Renewed cheering.) I say sincerely from my heart, let those principles which have been proclaimed universally throughout the world prevail, and I believe that Free Trade will place us on a far more satisfactory and better footing; let its advocates come from wherever they may, I think it is the bounden duty of every one of us to fall in and co-operate with them. I will conclude in the words of the poet:—

"Seize upon truth where'er 'tis found,
Amidst our friends, amongst our foes;
On Christian or on heathen ground,
The flower 'tis divine where'er it grows."

(Mr. Turner retired from the table amidst enthusiastic cheering.)

The CHAIRMAN said that Mr. Burnet would address the meeting. (Cheers.)

The Rev. JOHN BURNET then came forward amidst enthusiastic applause. Silence having been obtained, the rev. gentleman spoke as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I shall detain the meeting but a very short period as their time has now nearly expired. I certainly do feel a high satisfaction in the circumstance that the farmers of England are not only uniting in opinion with the League, but are actually becoming working members of that body. (Cheers.) (One of the most satisfactory incidents connected with the meetings in this place is the attendance of the farmers. If they are convinced and are ready to express, as they do repeatedly, their conviction that the Corn Laws are adverse to their interests, where is the man who will insist on the farmer retaining as a benefit that which they desire to cast away as a scourge? (Cheers.) The farmers come to these meetings and tell the assembled thousands of the citizens of London that the Corn Laws are ruining them; the landlords get up in their places in Parliament and say, "If you take away the Corn Laws the farmers will be ruined." Now, which of the two are we to believe? (Laughter and cheers.) Are we to give credence to men who are not farmers themselves? Which of the landlords have commenced to be general farmers in the country since the corn trade under the Corn Laws has proved to be such a good business? (Laughter.) We never hear of great and extensive farmers amongst the highest classes of the community. They make over the farms in small lots to such gentlemen as our friend who has just addressed us; and they crush their tenants by the help of the tenants' own unwise competition until at last they ruin them without having enriched themselves. (Cheers.) Are we then to believe those who have had no experience in the case? or are we to give heed to individuals who are the parties first acted upon by the operation of those laws? It all the farmers of England were to come together, and with one voice declare that they felt the Corn Laws to be ruinous to them, would that satisfy the landlords of England? No. (Hear.) The landlords would then speak of being ruined themselves. (Laughter.) "Those farmers," they would say, "are ignorant men; why, they deserve to be taxed for their bad grammar." (Loud laughter.) And they would go on to abuse the farmers because they were obstinate men who did not regard that as a boon which they really felt to be a serious injury. But, Sir, I do think that men may be allowed to feel their own wants. It does appear to me that if a hungry man were to address another individual, and to tell him that he was starving for want of food, it would be utterly useless for that other to attempt to convince him that he was not. (Loud laughter and cheers.) This appears to me to be a parallel to the case between the landlords and the farmers. Sir, I regret it much that our agricultural friend who has just spoken had it in his power to make use of one expression which he employed in addressing this meeting. He spoke of the landowners giving short leases for other purposes besides the rents, for which they entered into an engagement with the farmers. (Hear, hear.) I did not regret that he used the expression; I was only sorry that he had good reasons for doing so. I am glad, however, that he has so used it. But for what other purpose should landlords be allowed to use their tenants beyond making them pay their rents? Why ought they to have "other purposes," except the payment of their rents, honestly imposed according to contract? (Hear.) I understood the other purpose to which our friend referred. He alluded to the political use which the landlords make of the farmers. (Hear.) They keep a tight rein on them by the short leases that they may pull them up if they refuse to be their political tools. (Cheers.) What a disgrace to a country like this is such a state of things. These tenants are not like what our slaves once were in the West Indies, it is true, but still there is a striking analogy between the two classes. Take a man, and make him personally a slave, and you have degraded him below every freeman, except the freeman that has enslaved him. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) Is there any reason for speaking otherwise concerning the man that makes his fellow-creature a political slave? (Cries of "Hear.") Sir, if a man has property which has exalted him that he can look around and see his tenants cultivating his fields and contributing to his wealth and comfort, and if, when the hour of political contest shall have arrived, that man shall forget his dependence on them, and how much they contribute to his wealth, shall overlook the fact that they have a conscience within them, shall deny them the right of exercising their principles, and crush them to the dust which he compels them to till with an eye to the political slavery which he intends to force upon them,—if that man, when the hour of political strife has come, will pursue such a course as this, I cannot conceive of a more degraded being upon the face of the earth than he is. (Loud cheers.) Sir, I care not whether he wears a ducal coronet, or any other badge of high distinction. (Hear, hear.) Accident may have thrown that coronet in his way; or he may have been born to it, and therefore never merited it himself (a laugh); or it may happen that amongst his ancestors there were evangelists who perhaps first found the way to this mark of royal favour; or it may be that some deed of his own in another department may really have displayed a grandeur of soul and a command of talent which have lifted him up fairly, honestly, and honourably; but he has descended again most disgracefully when he attempts to crush the poor man. (Loud cheers.) His coronet is then shorn of all its lustre, and he has cast away all the merit that earned it, when he comes to destroy the principles of the men whom he ought to cherish as his brothers. But it has been well said, that even the landlords themselves are interested in the abolition of the Corn Laws, and not in their maintenance. It has been proved by the chairman how much the land of Lancashire has risen in value since it became a manufacturing country. But, Sir, there is one thing which must be given as a reason why the landlord frowns so upon manufacturers, while he holds out his helping hand to the poor farmer to aid him by the Corn Laws. There is a reason for this difference. The aristocracy and the squirearchy of the country cannot wield the souls of the manufacturers as they do those of the farmers (hear, hear); they cannot drive the manufacturers to the poll at an election; they cannot threaten them with taking away their leases, and turning them out of doors: if they could work upon manufacturers just as well and as nimbly as on many occasions they have worked upon the poor farmers, I doubt whether they would set themselves so much against the one, or maintain so strong an attachment to the other. (Hear, hear.) The manufacturers are rather obstinate political material to work upon. (Hear.) The country gentlemen know this, and, knowing and feeling it, they are very unwilling to run the risk of letting go their hold of the farmer because they feel they could not renew it in the case of the manufacturer. But whether the landlords will see it to be their interest to change their policy speedily or not, ultimately I am sure they will see such to be their interest, for this system cannot continue. ("Hear," and applause.) We have seen many a change during the last few years, and among others we have the good Tory gentlemen, Ministers and all, who used to speak and vote against every proposition we made for the liberty of the slave, now turning round to plead for the poor black man whom we set free in spite of them. (Cheers.) They used to be very kind to them when they were slaves. (Laughter.) They told us that if the slaves were set free they would perish; and they repeated again and again what mischief we should bring about if we really effected their emancipation; and, therefore, from sheer humanity (a laugh)—from pure kindness, these gentlemen unfortunately resisted every attempt to set the slave free. And now they are still kind to them; they are very anxious that nothing should befall them that would injure their interests. So thus they have taken them up as they have done the poor farmers; and now they will have no sugar in the market except that which is grown by the free blacks: all this is from pure kindness to the slaves, and not for the West India interest at all. (Laughter.) Well, then, after the loud voice of the country had been lifted up—after the cry of humanity had gone forth, so often and so strongly and so loud that those gentlemen were at last obliged to regard it as the voice of God—when they saw they could not resist any longer what was obviously a great movement in Divine Providence, they yielded to a measure which, after all, was a description of purchase—a purchase of the freedom of those people: these gentlemen were so kind that they could not give up the system until they made us pay twenty millions for their liberty. After all this, we find them now, as I said, taking the part of the slaves. But what are we to say to the hypocrisy of all this? (Cries of "Hear, hear.") It is, indeed, very easy to ridicule the inconsistency of such men; but one must deeply lament and indignantly reprobate their hypocrisy. (Cheers.) When a meeting was held at Exeter Hall previous to the departure of the Niger expedition, I happened to be sitting next to Sir Robert Peel (laughter); a strange coincidence too; but so it was. (Renewed laughter.) You may suppose no secrets passed between us, and therefore I have none to tell you. (Renewed laughter.) However, the right honourable baronet rose to speak on that occasion; and, as if to show that such men have sometimes a feeling of shame, he began by stating, "that it was rather mortifying to those who had not been in the field before to come forward at this late hour of the day, to speak a word for injured Africa." (A laugh.) There was a consciousness that his kindness before had not brought him up to the mark so as to speak that kindness out. (Hear, hear.) Now, I do believe that, if there had been any interest concerned in the Niger expedition, some reason would have kept that wily gentleman from coming even at that late hour of the day to speak a word for Africa. (Renewed laughter.) However, take comfort from this. You have in the first Minister of the State one who does feel a little shame sometimes (laughter), one who has a feeling which you can tell upon; it is not altogether steel, although he often steels himself; you have, consequently, this inducement to persevere in the good work in which you are engaged. (Cheers.) Perseverance must, in the end, triumph. What do the aristocracy and the squirearchy mean by pursuing their opposition so long? Do they intend to set different classes of the community at war with each other? Do they mean to make them hate each other, and induce them to believe that if one should prosper the other must perish? Do they mean to tell our chairman that he must hate Mr. Turner and do him injury if he would prosper, and that Mr. Turner must injure our chairman and hate him if he, on the other hand, would prosper? Do they mean that Mr. Turner and our chairman shall therefore have a constant strife of feeling, arising from the belief that they are standing in each other's way in every step they take in their respective businesses? But such must be the case, if their view of the Corn Laws be correct—if the farmers and the manufacturers cannot prosper together, why, one of them must go down. Will any one say in this manufacturing country that the manufacturers are to go down? (Hear.) Why, I would rather see all England covered with workshops, smoking with chimneys, and manufacturing for the world, and while the world was pouring in the full tide of its agricultural produce into the bosom of this community, than see the manufacturers sink even for a single year. (Loud cheers.) But I should like, at the same time to see the farmers growing and prospering, for I do not believe that the destruction of the one class is necessary to the prosperity of the other (hear); I believe that the interests of both, as it has been already stated, will be found to be identical. But if we do live in a country that has got into such an awkward position that the one-half of the community must devour the other—if this is really the doctrine of the supporters of the Corn Laws—if a man stands by this principle the course which we must adopt is simply this: we must come together—all grades, denominations, and professions—we must meet on these boards, and show them that we love one another, that manufacturers do not hate the farmers and the farmers do not hate the manufacturers; we must convince them that there is cordiality abroad which is making its way and spreading far and wide and working with power; and we must let them know that, if they do not come into this kind fellowship, they will be left at such a fearful distance by themselves that they will become the laughing-stock of the civilized world. (Loud cheers.) Man, Sir, was made to form a common family; and, therefore, I like the expression of our worthy farmer, who refused to use the word "foreigner," because he considered that all should be brothers. (Cheers.) There is one thing however, of which I am reminded by the term foreigner, and that is that those who support the Corn Laws, the landlords and the aristocracy, are determined that they shall be foreigners (a laugh), so that we shall have all the foreigners amongst ourselves; and if we are to be foreigners to them as they say they are to us, and if they are to set themselves against the manufacturers of this country, who, I would ask, could then live in it? Not those individuals certainly. Why, look at their palaces, look at all who contribute to their comfort, look around again and again, and you see nothing but the productions of the manufacturer. (Cheers.) And if you find this to be the case, then away with the idea that they can be independent of the manufacturer. But, they say, "We do not wish to be independent of them; we only desire to secure a protection for agriculture." Some people like abstractions; agriculture is an abstract word; suppose you were to try the experiment of spelling out its meaning, according to their use of the word it would turn out to be landlords. (Laughter.) That is really what they mean: when they speak of protection to agriculture, they mean that they wish to protect the landlords. But, Sir, is corn the only thing that will not be allowed to find its level? Can you and I emigrate to any part of the world we please, and travel through any portion of our own country which we may think proper: does the water by its very nature find its own level: does Heaven bestow its own blessing on the rich and the poor alike, and make its light to shine and its rain to fall on the just and the unjust: and is the food of man to be piled up within certain limits, beyond which it is not to find its way—dammed and sluiced up, or rather sluiced out, as the waters of the sea are from the towns in Holland, lest it might overwhelm the landlords of England? (Cheers.) I would say to this meeting, show not only now, but by being in your places here again and again, your determination to persevere in the great work in which you are engaged, and you will thus set an example to all the nations of the earth. (Applause.) Is it for a moment to be admitted that you should flag or tire in a work which will open to you all the prairies of America, and bring before you a state of things which will make the poor rejoice in his comforts without envying the rich in his wealth? (Loud cheers.) I should say, let every man solemnly charge his own conscience with the high duty and sacred obligation of carrying out this work to its full and final completion. Ideas are now going abroad, the public mind is becoming enlightened, mind knows how to think with and to feel with mind; and when a new world of ideas is thus created, and when the public themselves become the depositaries of this new world of ideas—moral, political, religious, and historical—a power, in happy combination, will be found to spring up, and spread quietly throughout the community, which will put down every description of monopoly. (Cheers.) Sir, these are not the times when rude masses of uncultivated, ignorant men would run together stimulated only by passion and violence, committing injury upon their fellow-men, and involving their combination in crime; I would not address an assembly having such an influence operating on it: such men want to be taught afresh, and nothing else (hear); but men have been taught; and this is a very different assembly. And let it be remembered by all who maintain such monopolies as the Corn Laws, that they have lost the master and master monopoly of all, the monopoly of knowledge and moral power (loud cheers); and having lost that monopoly they have lost the only monopoly which would have secured in perpetuity the enjoyment of other monopolies. The day when a tyrant's arm could crush a people has gone by; the day when state intrigue could overlook the real condition of the country, and give itself up to minister to its own gratifications, has gone by; the day of herocs and wars and fights has gone by (cheers); the day of the quarrels of nations has gone by; the day of peace has come;—the civilized world are looking to one another to learn from one another; France looks to England, and England to France; and even Spain, notwithstanding all her irregularities and all her struggles, is trying to imitate sometimes the one, and sometimes the other; ideas are getting into form and fashion; men are beginning to see evils as evils, to regard good as good; they are looking to things and not to men, to measures and not to counsellors; they are looking to the good results of good governments, and not to those who falsely and basely give themselves to the ruinous deeds by which countries are scourged, while they themselves only rise upon the ruins they have created. (The reverend gentleman concluded amidst most vehement cheering.)

The CHAIRMAN then said—I have only to state that the next meeting of the League will be held here this night week; and perhaps it may be as well to say that it is not very likely that these weekly meetings will be continued for a much longer period, owing to the necessity of commencing those arrangements which it will be necessary to make for the Bazaar and great exhibition of manufactures which are to take place in this building. This meeting is now dissolved.

Three cheers were then given for the Chairman, and the meeting separated.

WHEATHAMSTEAD FREE-TRADE CLUB.—A special meeting of this club was held, according to advertisement, on Thursday evening, the 9th inst. It was attended by Mr. C. H. Lattimore, the Rev. T. Gilbert, many farmers and tradesmen of the place, and a considerable number of the working classes, and also by some friends of Free Trade from other quarters. A flag, inscribed with the comprehensive words "Free Trade," floated from the centre window of the Swan Inn, in the yard of which was erected a convenient tent, under and around which the business of the evening was carried on. Mr. Walker, of Harpenden Common, having moved the confirmation of the minutes of the preceding meeting, and the motion having been seconded by the Rev. T. Gilbert, the chairman (Mr. Charles Lattimore) proceeded to address the meeting. He said they had assembled to denounce a system the effects of which were sensibly felt by almost every one then present. Its course had been one of political profligacy, and its natural results were universal ruin and degradation. Having ascertained the cause of the evil, it was their duty to apply the remedy. The object of this meeting was to awaken the thinking faculties of the labourer, to point out to him the origin of the evil from which he suffered, and to prove to him above all things that the cause of Free Trade was the cause of the industrious classes. Having exposed some of the evils of the Corn Laws, Mr. Lattimore proceeded to show how their repeal would tend to promote constant employment and afford remunerating wages, neither of which could at present be secured to the labourer. Addressing himself more particularly to the labourers, he demonstrated by what means the existing system involved them and the farmers in one common ruin. With this conviction on our minds, he said, we come to you for that sympathy and support which, as rational beings capable of appreciating your own situation and wants, and desirous of their amelioration, you cannot withhold from us. The speaker concluded a lengthened speech with an exhortation to the labourer to remember that happiness was comprised in home and its delights—it did not depend upon wealth or station—and it was an error to suppose that a peer was of necessity happier than a peasant. He conjured them to control their desires, to regulate their passions, and, whilst seeking their own rights, to be respectful of the rights of others. No principles but these could carry happiness to their firesides; and there he advised them to seek it. He begged them to carry home what they had heard, to digest it thoroughly, and so arrive at sound, honest, and rational conclusions. Mr. Lattimore resumed his seat amidst loud and long applause.—The Rev. Thomas Gilbert, after some introductory remarks, went on to state his perfect agreement with all which Mr. Lattimore had advanced, and to express his gratitude for that gentleman's advocacy of so great, so godlike a cause. (Cheers.) It was the duty of all men, but more particularly of religious teachers, to denounce laws the effect of which was to lessen the demand for labour, and increase the price of food, thus tending to render all religious teaching ineffectual, for Divinity itself appealed in vain to famishing humanity. (Loud applause.) He conceived, therefore, that as a Christian minister he was acting in concert with his holy office in advocating a cause the success of which would promote alike human good and the purposes of the Divine Will. The reverend gentleman, after an eloquent speech, proposed the thanks of the meeting to the chairman; Mr. Bruton, jun., seconded the motion, which was carried amidst the unanimous shouts of the meeting.—Mr. Charles Lattimore returned thanks.—A labourer, named Archer, came forward, and said he thought the truth had been spoken to-night. He was quite satisfied with Mr. Lattimore's speech. He wished they could get rid of the tithes and poor's rates; and now, he exclaimed, they are going to tithe our gardens, but I'll never pay it. (Cheers from his fellow-labourers, who heartily echoed the sentiment.)—Mr. C. Lattimore entered into an explanation with Archer. He told him that the titling of even the gardens was lawful, and, being such, must be paid. Archer and others wanted to know why it had never been enforced before?—Mr. Lattimore said that some laws were so monstrous, so oppressive, that of necessity they lay long in abeyance, and this was one of them. "Being law, however," he added, "don't resist it. But whilst it is law never relax in your efforts to destroy it." (Great cheering.)—After a few words from Mr. Bruton, sen., the meeting peaceably terminated. The next meeting of the club will be held on Wednesday, the 22nd inst., when arrangements will be made to effect a junction with the Free-Traders of St. Alban's.

Mr. D. Liddell, on Thursday evening, the 19th inst., delivered a lecture at the Salvation Inn, Tynemouth, on the corn and provision laws, the causes of strikes, &c. The audience was numerous and attentive.

THE DUTY ON WOOL.—The proposed remission of the duty on foreign wool is, notwithstanding all threatened opposition on the part of the monopolists, certain of being carried into effect. It will prove a great boon to the woollen trade generally, and will be especially felt in this town, as the duty was very heavy upon low wools,—from 10 to 20 per cent. on their value. Several petitions and memorials have, from time to time, been transmitted to Parliament from the manufacturers here. Mr. G. W. Wood, for two years, was actively engaged in seeking this object, and made a motion last year in Parliament to effect it. Mr. Warburton has also fully earned the confidence placed in him as an attentive business member, by his ready and earnest exertions, in various ways, to carry out the objects of the petitions which he had to present with reference to this question.—Kendal Mercury.

ERRATUM.

In LEAGUE No. 33, for "William Jeeves, 67, Market-street, Cavendish-square, London, £1 1s," read "William Geeves."

WOLVERHAMPTON.—On Tuesday evening 15th night the Wolverhampton Free-Trade Association held their fortnightly meeting, at the Little Swan; Joseph Walker, Esq., in the chair. The chairman opened the proceedings in a speech replete with good sense, pointing out the effect of the Corn Laws on the agricultural labourer, and proving that they were the cause of his destitution and poverty.—Mr. H. Walker next addressed the meeting, and went through a portion of the report of Mr. Austin, the Government commissioner, to inquire into the state of the agricultural labourers. The tales of misery he recited from that report were so harrowing and painful as to draw tears from the eyes of some persons and execrations from the mouths of others. He next reverted to Scotland, and showed the misery and want of the Scotch labourer, whose condition he described as being wretched in the extreme; he then noticed the labourers in Wales, whose only fare was potatoes; and in Ireland, where they fed like the beast of the field, on the roots of the field, the victims of misery, penury, and want.—Another gentleman, whose name we did not learn, then addressed the meeting on the bad internal policy of the English Government, in thus allowing its people to be degraded when there was every facility for making them prosperous. He plainly showed the evil effects of the Corn Laws on the agricultural and commercial interests. He reverted to the alliance between the two interests, and said that if the Government liked to stop the free current of industry, and impoverish the manufacturing interest, it would certainly hurt the agriculturists, because the agricultural interest depended upon home trade and home consumption; therefore by enactments to rob the one they robbed the other. He spoke of the information which was being spread by the League, and which would force a remedy and produce a change.—Mr. Wood next addressed the meeting, with which the business closed. The thanks of the meeting having been given to the chairman, the assembly separated.—Midland Observer.

A "GREAT FACT."—From the 10th of April to the 9th inst., inclusive, 64 vessels, laden with grain, have entered the port of Newcastle, of which SIXTY-ONE WERE FOREIGNERS! Such is the operation of the "sliding scale," which renders necessary the chartering of vessels on your side of the water, instead of this. If the trade were free, British ships would be sent out for the corn; but the gambling nature of the speculation almost always requires that shipments be made immediately on receipts of orders; and hence not only do foreign vessels obtain the carriage of the grain, but they frequently do so on terms much higher than would otherwise be the case.—Gateshead Observer.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE ELECTION.

THE FREE-TRADE CANDIDATE, WILLIAM BROWN, ESQ.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

We learn that the gentleman who has been selected by the friends of Free Trade as the candidate of the Liberal interest in South Lancashire has already been made the object, in quarters where he is not known, of various misrepresentations and grossly false statements, with the view of damaging his success with the electors. Amongst other things, it has been alleged that he is an American, a Catholic, a Dissenter, &c., not one of which allegations is true. We cannot, perhaps, do better than insert the following statement, abridged from the Liverpool Times of yesterday, as placing the personal history and character of Mr. Brown fairly before the constituency of South Lancashire; and, appearing in a journal published in that town where Mr. Brown has so long resided, it cannot fail to have due weight with those at a distance, in putting down the industriously-circulated falsehoods by which unscrupulous opponents are seeking to injure his cause with the electors:—

Mr. Brown (says the Liverpool Times) is a gentleman whose knowledge of the wants of the commerce and manufactures of the country, and whose hearty adoption and liberal support of Free-Trade principles give him as strong a claim on the confidence of the commercial and manufacturing classes of South Lancashire, as his extensive landed estates and deep interest in the prosperity of agriculture give him on those more immediately connected with the soil. During the whole of his long, honourable, and eminently successful career as a merchant, Mr. Brown has been accumulating that description of knowledge and experience which is the safest guide in the discussion and decision of those great questions on which the prosperity of the nation and the well-being of every individual in it depend; and, by investing so large a portion of his wealth in landed property, he has given ample security that he will never forget the just claims of that important interest. Mr. Brown is not indeed one of those false friends of the landed interest who believe that the prosperity of agriculture can be promoted by measures destructive of the manufactures and commerce of the country. He has had ample opportunities of seeing—and, indeed, who has not?—that every extension of commercial and manufacturing wealth gives an increased value to the soil, and he has therefore felt himself bound, both by principle and an enlightened view of his own interests as a landowner as well as a merchant, to adopt, defend, and promote those principles which, by giving the greatest present impulse to trade, will give the greatest extension and stability to agriculture.

Mr. Brown was born at Ballymena, in the county of Antrim, and educated in Yorkshire, in which county he now possesses a large landed estate. He left this country for the United States in the year 1800, returned to England in 1808, and has resided in the neighbourhood of Liverpool ever since. We mention these circumstances, about which there is no more doubt than there is about Mr. Brown's existence, because it has been stated that he is a native of the United States; and, for the purpose of contradicting another misstatement, we add that Mr. Brown, though born in one of the most Presbyterian districts of Ireland, has for many years been a member of the Established Church, and one of the congregation, as well as a personal friend, of that accomplished scholar and clergyman, the Rev. Edward Hull. Of the benevolence of Mr. Brown, and his disposition to use the wealth which he has acquired by his judgment and enterprise in the relief of his fellow-creatures, we need adduce no further proof than the fact, that he is this very day to assist in laying the foundation-stone of the new Northern Dispensary, in this town, to which he several months ago contributed the munificent sum of £1000.

We may add, that no one has deserved the support of those interested in the manufacturing industry of the country more than Mr. Brown. For between twenty and thirty years his firm have been the most extensive exporters of manufactured goods in the empire; and to the evidence of Mr. Brown, given before the committee on the East India Charter, and given in direct opposition to his own interests as the agent of the American houses which then monopolized the trade, it was in a great measure owing that the trade with China and the East was thrown open to every merchant in the empire.

MEETING OF FREE-TRADE ELECTORS.

On Tuesday evening, an aggregate meeting of the Free-Trade electors of the Manchester district, convened by circulars and placards, was held at the Free-Trade Hall, Peter-street, at seven o'clock. "to confer with a deputation from the League." It was announced that the meeting would be addressed by Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., R. H. Greg, Esq., and other gentlemen. Though this meeting was necessarily different in character from the ordinary League meetings, the assemblage being chiefly composed of county electors, yet the great hall rapidly filled; and the meeting was altogether a highly respectable one, and much more numerous than can be contained in any other building in Manchester. In the galleries were many ladies. Upon the platform we noticed, amongst others, the following gentlemen:—

Mr. Cobden, M.P., Robert R. Phillips, Esq., Mr. Alderman Kershaw, Mr. Alderman Brooks; Messrs. John Potter, Thomas B. Potter, James Carlton, J. B. Smith, T. Booth (of Rochdale), William Harvey, Alderman Hopkins, Alderman C. J. S. Walker, Robert Platt (of Stalybridge), John Hampson, John Leadbeater, Samuel Matley, John Rawson, H. Rawson, David Ainsworth, T. Critchley, Horatio Smith, John M. Clure, William Morris, Thomas Barton, W. Wainwright, G. Langworthy, Augustus Smith, A. Bauer, J. Hitchcock, W. Woodcock, H. Ashworth, T. Simpson, Joseph Simpson, John Whittaker (of Ashton), Robert Schofield (Rochdale), B. Syddall, James M'Jannet, Charles Ewart, Whitmore, J. Gibb, Vernon, Edward Hall, and many other members of the Council of the League.

Exactly at half-past seven, Mr. George Wilson took the chair, amidst loud applause, mingled with cheers for Mr. Cobden, who took his seat at the right of the chair.

The CHAIRMAN then came forward, and said that that meeting of the electors, residing in and near Manchester, had been convened irrespectively of all political party feeling, in order that they might have an opportunity of hearing those reasons which it was thought ought to influence them in giving their votes in favour of a Free-Trade candidate at the next contest for this county. (Applause.)

They had called this meeting of electors of all parties. The Free-Trade Hall was neutral ground. (Hear, hear.) It was not built for party purposes. There men of all parties could meet together; and when this great question was settled, they could again return and carry out their own party political opinions as they might hereafter think proper. (Hear, hear.) They met there to discuss the evils of the giant monopolies under which this country suffered; and the electors were asked to pause well before they gave a vote in favour of the continuance, for one day, of those monopolies. (Applause.) They had now an opportunity of putting them upon trial, and they were asked to hear the evidence which would be presented, why their verdict should be against them. (Hear, hear.) He had received a number of letters from gentlemen who were most anxious to have been there and taken part in the proceedings of that meeting. He would not detain the meeting by reading them, but at once proceed with the immediate business, by calling upon Mr. Cobden to address them. (Loud and long-continued cheering.)

MR. COBDEN, M.P., then came forward amidst the most enthusiastic cheering, and addressed the numerous assemblage to the following effect:—Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if you were assembled here for private objects I should not be here amongst you. I have never, since I appeared in public, taken any part in mere party squabbles; and, so far as I may be considered to speak the sentiments of the Anti-Corn-Law League, I challenge all who have had opportunities of observing my public conduct, to point out a single instance in which my proceedings were influenced by any regard to any political party, or any individuals connected with party. (Hear, hear.) We have met here, as the chairman very properly says, irrespective of parties. I cannot point out any existing political party which takes its station upon the ground which the Free-Traders of the Anti-Corn-Law League now occupy. We have a section of politicians disposed to profess Free Trade in the abstract, and to carry out Free Trade little by little; we have another party taking its stand upon fixed duties and protection; but there is no political party that seeks at once to obtain the object which we have in view, that of practical and perfect Free Trade. Now, gentlemen, as often as we have spoken on this subject here, it cannot be necessary for me to go into any argument to show you we are right in the grounds we occupy: it is not necessary that I should convince, it is not necessary, I believe, that we should convince anybody; but we have powerful parties opposed to us, who believe they have an interest in the system we oppose. I met those parties at headquarters, with an overwhelming majority against me in the House of Commons; but I never found, even there, we could meet with arguments or reasons that served to establish the truth of their principles in the estimation of the country. This is a question, gentlemen, that is referred back to the electors of this country; and to no portion of the electoral body can it come with so strong a claim to their attention as to the electors of South Lancashire. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, we are not solely manufacturers in South Lancashire; there is a large rural district in this county; we have farmers as well as manufacturers. I have everywhere made good the principles of Free Trade on farming grounds, as well as on manufacturing grounds; and if there be one stronger ground than another, it is that which Lord Ducie and Lord Spencer have taken up, that is—as to the benefit which Free Trade will confer on agriculture itself. But unfortunately the manufacturers of this county, while they generally admit that Free Trade would be good for them, have left no time to consider this question of Free Trade apart, and altogether away from political partisanship. If we can only lay aside our old animosities and predilections; if we can only come to common ground, and consider this question of the Corn Laws apart from Whig and Tory views, I verily believe there are not at this moment two opinions among the manufacturing classes of South Lancashire. (Applause.) Now, gentlemen, I am happy to say, that on this occasion we have evidences of our being soon (if we are not already) at that happy point when we shall be no longer blinded to our true interests, and the interest of the country, by such absurd delusions as those of mere Whig and Tory politics. I am happy to announce to you, that we hear from all quarters—not merely in Manchester or Liverpool, but in all the surrounding districts—we hear of numerous instances of influential and most intelligent men, who have on this occasion declared they will no longer vote as Whigs or Tories. The question before the country is Free Trade or Monopoly; and they will vote for Free Trade. (Applause.) It would be invidious to name the gentlemen who have already made this declaration, and, besides, it would be very partial and unjust to do so, for I verily believe we are only beginning our conversion; and, before this contest is over, we shall see such a change manifest among the manufacturing class of South Lancashire as even the most sanguine of us do not expect (hear); and I am perfectly convinced, however they may manage to keep up still the semblance of a division on the question of Free Trade, that this is the last contest for South Lancashire when any party will venture to come before the electors of this manufacturing district and profess to be the upholder of monopoly at all. (Applause.) And, gentlemen, if anything can prove this, it is the terms in which Mr. Entwistle has put forward his address to the electors of this county; there is, at all events, a tribute paid to the power of Free-Trade opinions in this county. For, although it is not an address professing to carry out the principles of Free Trade, it is full of compliments to those principles as far as they have been applied; it speaks of the permanent importance of manufactures and commerce, and it proposes, very intelligibly, to go on carrying out Free Trade as fast as somebody else, who shall be named, in London, will give the cue. (Laughter and applause.) Now, gentlemen, I think we are too old birds in Lancashire to be caught on the present occasion with chaff like this. (Hear, hear.) We must not be deluded or mystified by plausible lies. We want Free Trade; we don't want it ten or twenty years hence, we want it now (hear); and, if we can get it, we will have it now. (Hear.) But I am told that some of Mr. Entwistle's canvassers are canvassing the farmers for him as a Free Trader. Now, I don't set myself up here as a counsellor to settle matters of conscience; but surely, if gentlemen go to obtain promises under false pretences, they don't expect those promises to be binding. I should be sorry if they led the electors of South Lancashire into any mistake of that kind; and, therefore, it appears to be our bounden duty to warn the constituency that Mr. Entwistle is not a Free-Trader, though his address does all that words can do to try to make it appear that he is one. But, gentlemen, we have a candidate, in the person of Mr. William Brown, of Liverpool. (Applause.) Now, Mr. Brown, as a commercial man, I should say is, of all others in the kingdom, the man that could be properly selected for the high honour of representing this county in Parliament; I say as a commercial man, for I won't disguise from you, and Mr. Brown would not thank me if I could disguise from you, that if we could, by deferring to the tone of public opinion in counties, obtain just the right man, connected with agriculture, and even connected with aristocratic families, in South Lancashire, Mr. Brown would be the first to say, "Take him in preference to me, as the man most likely to conciliate the greatest amount of support." I may tell you, we did apply to one gentleman in London, Mr. Pascoe Grenfell, brother-in-law of Earl Sefton, and had he not been at the time in the hands of his medical attendant, and confined to his house by a very painful disorder, I have not any doubt he might have been inspired to enter the breach on this occasion; for a more ardent repealer, one more thoroughly devoted to the principles of the League, I never found in the whole of my travels in England. (Hear.) Under these circumstances, we chose—I speak of the electors who took a part, for I was not in Lancashire at the time—the electors chose the first commercial man in Lancashire (hear, hear); he is a man who, if you want to test what he is, will answer to the question which Napoleon used to put when anybody talked to him of any man, that he was a great man, a distinguished man, or a man of vast superiority—Napoleon always put the question, "What has he done?" (Hear, hear.) Now, Mr. Brown has built up one of the most gigantic commercial establishments that ever existed in this or any other country; and he has, in the various ramifications of his business, probably contributed more to the facilities of commerce, to the interchange of the productions of this district, than any other merchant, or probably any other half dozen merchants, in England. ("Hear, hear," and applause.) Next to the reverence we have for aristocratic origin, is probably the homage which, in England, we (wisely or unwisely) pay to wealth. On the score of wealth, Mr. Brown must be unexceptionable to the most money-loving portion of us. If great riches give a guarantee, in the estimation of timid men, that the possessor of those riches is not likely to be a destructive in politics, why, then, Mr. Brown has given that guarantee, and will commend himself to the most timid amongst us. I know of no objection that has been alleged to Mr. Brown as a candidate for our suffrage, unless it be one which originated in idle gossip, I suppose, in the absence of anything really tangible; it has been alleged that Mr. Brown is not a British-born subject. I am happy to tell you, from the very highest authority, that Mr. Brown was born in the county of Antrim, in Ireland (hear); that his family were extensively connected with the linen trade; from thence Mr. Brown came to England, and was educated here; that he left England in 1800, went to America, and returned from that country in 1808; since which time he has been a resident of Liverpool; and, as the owner of large landed estates in this country, he has given that proof of his naturalization which will be both a satisfaction to our opponents as to his citizenship, and also recommend him as being an extensive landowner. There has been, I believe, some other allusion made to Mr. Brown, but we really don't talk of religious subjects here. Mr. Brown, I may tell you, is a churchman; and if he had been anything else, he would have been equally acceptable in this Free-Trade Hall, for we don't meet here on religious grounds. This is a description of the candidate who is presented to you, the electors of the southern division of Lancashire. If any of you know what a bale of cotton is, you are only one remove from a near acquaintance with Mr. Brown, who has in his hands one-sixth part of the trade between this country and the United States. There is hardly a breeze which blows, or a tide which flows in the Mersey, that does not bring a ship freighted with cotton, or some other costly commodity, for Mr. Brown's house; and not a lorry in the streets but is destined to carry cloth or other commodities consigned to the care of Mr. Brown, to be shipped to America, China, or other parts of the world. (Applause.) Now, gentlemen, short of being himself one of the landed proprietors of Lancashire, Mr. Brown is probably more deeply interested in the prosperity of the land of Lancashire than any other man can be. I say, he is not in Lancashire one of the aristocratic families; but a gentleman having the mighty concerns in Liverpool to which I have alluded, and being, as he is, so intimately bound up with all transactions with which you are bound up in Lancashire; I say, second only to the numerous estates he possesses, Mr. Brown may be considered as securely anchored amongst you, and he has given every pledge that he is bound from interests to foster and regard the welfare of this county. (Applause.) Mr. Brown does not appear before this community as a party politician; if he has mixed with parties at all it is to moderate party feeling; and I will venture to say now, in his name, that Mr. Brown would deeply regret if this contest were carried on upon any other ground whatever than that of the strictest principle: and nothing would he deplore more than if his friends were to use one word that could indicate a party spirit; or, above all, if they were to say anything that could border upon personalities. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Brown, much to his honour, has taken a prominent part in Liverpool in aiding the labours of the Anti-Monopoly Society, and in Liverpool his adhesion to that society was an event about as important to our movement there as the adhesion of Mr. Samuel Jones Loyd to the League's proceedings was in London. (Applause.) And this step was taken, not in anticipation of any such honour as you are now striving to place in his hands; but it was done from a conviction of the baneful tendency of monopolies in general, and from a desire to do his utmost by his influence, which is so great in Liverpool, to put an end to a system so destructive to commerce. ("Hear, hear," and applause.) I may also tell you that Mr. Brown is not an anti-monopolist of yesterday; for there is one fact to be stated, so singularly to the honour of Mr. Brown, and which so strikingly proves the disinterestedness with which he is willing to assail monopolies, even when he himself may be supposed to be interested in them, that I cannot help mentioning it. During the time of the monopoly of the China market by the East India Company, Mr. Brown was one of those in England who had a monopoly of the private trade with China, which was carried on through American houses. No English private house could trade with those countries; but the Americans took up the trade in an indirect way, and Mr. Brown was the agent for that commerce, which became a very important branch of his business. When the proposal was made to abolish the monopoly of the East India Company in the China trade, Mr. Brown went to London and gave evidence before the parliamentary committee in favour of opening the trade with China, though to do so would deprive himself of the monopoly he then had in the trade with that country. (Great applause.) This, then, gentlemen, is the candidate you have before you. He is a free-trader in corn; but, as a proof that he does not consider that free-trade in corn would prove injurious to land, he has invested largely in the land of this country; and I know at this moment that he is prepared as willingly to invest money in land, with the prospect of a repeal of the Corn Laws tomorrow, as he would be if the Corn Laws were likely to be perpetuated. ("Hear, hear," and applause.) And, gentlemen, let me remind you that Mr. Brown's property in land may be really as extensive as that of many of those landowners who make so great a talk about this monopoly of corn, and who, in appearance, seem to have a very much wider expanse of surface in their possession. (Hear.) When a merchant invests his accumulated gain in land, that land is his; but those men who are making the greatest outcry for this monopoly of corn, the men who are most prominent in opposing the League, are merely the nominal possessors of broad acres. (Great applause.) I have stated who Mr. Brown is, and what he is. Now, what is his opponent? I will not deal in personalities, by alluding to Mr. Entwistle in any other way than as regards his public career; but, putting the test which Napoleon applied whenever a man was spoken of, I ask, what has Mr. Entwistle done, in public or in private, to entitle him to your support? (Laughter and applause.) We are not opposed on this occasion to one who, owing to high aristocratic connexions or exalted descent, is considered, in this lord-loving country of ours, to be entitled to a sort of presumption of right to represent a county. That claim does not stand, at all events, before us. We know that Mr. Entwistle is a private gentleman of respectable character, and we know he is nothing else. I have not had, myself, an opportunity of listening to his speeches or of hearing his views; but there is a report of what he said the other day to his committee, with reference to the operation of the Corn Law, which certainly goes far to convince me that Mr. Entwistle cannot have given the slightest attention to the subject of the Corn Law at all. (Hear.) In addressing his committee the other day, Mr. Entwistle stated:—

"The proposition of a fixed duty had often been adverted to, as offering a greater certainty to the admission of foreign corn, but this had been objected to by others, and, to his mind, satisfactorily, as likely to place the aggregate duty at a higher amount—that was, supposing such a fixed duty to be 8s.—than it was even under the old sliding scale; and it was well known that the old system was calculated to keep the duty at a much greater elevation than the new system"—[present scale]. Now, gentlemen, you will see at a moment's glance, that Mr. Entwistle, in calculating how much duty was paid upon the old sliding scale, forgot altogether those times when the sliding scale was altogether prohibitory. He merely looked at the amount of duty paid upon corn under the old sliding scale; forgetting that the scale was intended to keep out corn, and did keep it out, by making the duty prohibitory till corn rose to a famine price in this country, and then the people got in a scanty supply. (Hear.) Why, gentlemen, we do not hear such fallacies as this even in the House of Commons now; even there they are ashamed of them. (Laughter.) I can assure you, if Mr. Entwistle comes to the House of Commons, he will have to learn his lesson before he speaks there, or he will actually be laughed at if he talks thus. Now, we do not come here to talk of fixed duties or sliding scales, but if a gentleman, a candidate for this division of the county, professing to know something of the difference between them, comes forward to give his views on the subject, he certainly should not talk to the men of South Lancashire in this style. (Laughter.) Why, under the old sliding scale, there was a duty on corn of 50s. or 60s. per quarter: the corn we wanted would have come in if they would have allowed it, but they put on a duty, by the sliding scale, of 50s. or 60s. to prevent it coming in; and then Mr. Entwistle adduces the fact, that corn did not come in, as a proof that the sliding scale does not do us any harm. (Hear.) We shall have, I suppose, brother electors, the opportunity of hearing Mr. Entwistle's views on this subject; but, having learned that he has decidedly declared for a sliding scale, and against a fixed duty, I must confess I have been astonished to see the name of a gentleman prominently connected with his nomination,—I mean Mr. Hugh Birley; for I well remember that that gentleman met us four or five years ago at the Town-hall, when we assembled to petition for total repeal, with an amendment declaring that nothing but a moderate fixed duty could restore the commerce of this country; but that as the Whigs were in power, in whom he had no confidence, he was resolved not then to petition for a fixed duty. (Hear, hear.) But it now seems, if we may believe the newspapers, that he has actually been one of the chief men who have brought forward Mr. Entwistle, and that he is supporting him on the principle of a sliding scale. (Hear.) Now, I don't understand this; it is a thing utterly incomprehensible in this Free-Trade Hall. (Hear.) But I would like to ask the manufacturers and the millowners, of all classes and parties, in this district, just to look at this question as it affects them and their workpeople—and there is one question more especially to which I should like to call the attention of the electors of this district, and that is, the late excitement which has been created against the long hours of labour in this district. Now, I have watched very attentively the proceedings in Parliament on Lord Ashley's motion on the short-time bill, and I have heard it admitted by the leading men on both sides of the House that the Corn Laws and the other monopolies are the cause of the long hours of working in this district. (Applause.) I was walking down Parliament-street one day, just when Lord Ashley had brought forward his first motion, and I was mentioning to a gentleman the subject of the ten hours bill: he is a shrewd man of few words; and he shook his head, and said, "It will be quite impossible for the working classes to support the aristocracy with ten hours' work a day." (Peals of laughter and loud cheering.) But I did not expect to hear such specific admissions from the leading men on both gides of the House, as I did on this subject. After Lord Ashley had got a majority to vote for his motion, Sir James Graham, speaking against it, with a view to get the House to reverse their decision, tried every kind of argument; at last, at the conclusion of his speech, he turned round very significantly indeed, with a look which he knows so well how to put on, to the squire behind him, and he said, "Let hon. gentlemen beware what they do. This restrictive system of ours is an artificial system (hear); it is like a house of cards: if you touch one, the rest will fall." (Laughter and applause.) I was sitting behind a rabid protectionist, a member for a rural district, and I touched him on the shoulder, and said, "Do you understand that?" (Laughter.) "Yes," he said. (Laughter.) Now, interpreted in plain common sense and English, what does Sir J. Graham's admission amount to? Why this: If you pass a ten hours bill, the corn laws, the sugar laws, and the coffee laws cannot be maintained. (Hear.) Why? He did not see, while making this appeal to the squire behind him—or he seemed to forget—that there was a Leaguer present, and that we should interpret his argument, and carry it out in the Free-Trade Hall. What does it amount to—this admission by the Home Secretary? Why, that the working classes here are working two hours a day to maintain the monopolists. (Immense cheering.) There were Lord John Russell and Lord Howick on the other side; they rose and declared that the ten hours bill could be passed with perfect safety, provided the corn laws and sugar duties, and other such monopolies were removed. (Laughter.) Now, this is very important, in more senses than one. It shows us that we are the real ten-hours people after all. (Applause.) Certainly any argument to make it appear that the Leaguers are long-hours men will be the most impudent and audacious argument ever used, after their own admissions thus made. But do not those admissions by Sir James Graham and his leading opponents involve a sacred duty on the part of the employers of this district, to unite together to remove that unjust load which compels the people in their employ to work two hours a day to maintain the monopolists? (Applause.) I would appeal to employers of every party in this country, I would ask them in the first place, from a sense of justice to those they employ—I would not put it upon a lower motive—will they lend themselves to a system which is crushing down the men, the women, and the children living around them and depending upon them; or will they now take advantage of this opportunity which they, the constituency of South Lancashire especially, have, by their votes,—for their hands and the working classes have no votes at all,—to put down a system that thus oppresses those who are dependent upon them? (Applause.) If I wanted to appeal to a lower motive than the mere sense of justice, I would ask them to look at the tone which has been manifested, not only in the House of Commons, but in the public prints, upon the subject of the long hours of labour in this county. It is quite evident—it is of no use denying it—that there is a demand on the part of public opinion in favour of less intense labour, on the part of the people of this country. I join in that appeal. (Hear.) I will not say a word about legislating on this matter—that is not our business here—but if I see that existing laws compel the working classes of this county (by the admission of the Ministers of the day and their opponents) to work two hours a day to maintain the monopolists, I, as an employer, should not be doing my duty, when a vote is thrown into my hands, as it is now, unless I voted for the removal of those burdens. (Applause.) And let not the employers of this district suppose that, whatever was the decision of the House of Commons last night, this question will be allowed to rest; for Lord Ashley has declared that he will pursue it to the death. Does it not become the master manufacturers and mill-owners of this district to see if there be not a way of meeting the requirements of public opinion, by removing these monopolies, which I firmly believe, as I stated in the House of Commons, would enable the working people of this county to have as good remuneration as they now have, and the master-manufacturers as good profits, without the intervention of us lawmakers—for they had better have as little to do with us as possible—upon ten hours a day as they now have upon twelve? For I am firmly convinced, if the people of this country had the full benefit of their natural advantages, they would be able to do as much, nay more, in ten hours than any people on the continent of Europe could do in twelve; and you would be put on a par with them at that number of hours' labour, if you only had the full, fair, and free advantage of all that nature has destined you to possess. (Applause.) I do hope that on this occasion we who have the franchise will endeavour to use it not for the benefit of a class, not especially for the benefit of the richest class, but for the benefit of those immediately dependent upon us (Hear, hear, hear.) We are charged in the London press, and it is widely disseminated, that those employing labour throughout this county are not giving that due consideration to the interests of those in their employ which they ought to do. I do not stand here to make the charge or to vindicate it; but I do say, that employers who still lend themselves to a system which grinds their people down to the dust, and compels them to labour for others who make a return to reward them for their toil, will be justly chargeable with neglecting the opinions of those dependent upon them. (Applause.) I hope that on this occasion we shall manifest not merely a desire to benefit those around us, but also to promote the best interests of the country at large. It is not merely the operatives here that will be benefited by Free Trade, they form comparatively but a small section of the country; but go to the agricultural districts, where, if they don't work as hard, their labour is as disagreeable and as painful as any here, and they are not so well requited; and if free trade in corn, sugar, and coffee will benefit our operatives here, it will also carry comfort into the thatched cottages of the agricultural labourers of Dorsetshire and Devonshire, and give to the peasants a comfortable meal of wholesome bread, where now they are often starving on miserable potatoes. (Hear, hear.) These are the objects we have in view in supporting a Free-Trade candidate on this occasion.—One word upon the subject of the duty which devolves upon us during the next fortnight. Vain is all our talk in this Free-Trade Hall—vain all our lecturing—vain the millions of tracts that have been distributed—unless we now buckle on our armour, and "work, work, work" till the day of election. (Great applause.) Gentlemen, the basis of all chance of success at an election is a due attention to the registration lists. (Hear, hear.) The registration lists of this county have been diligently attended to during the last three years, to my knowledge; and there is upon the cards the fairest prospect of success, if the friends of Free Trade will only exert themselves during the next fortnight. (Applause.) It is true that we have in this county, as they have in every county, a large number of tenants-at-will, occupying £50 tenancies. There are 3000 or 4000 of these £50 tenants-at-will in Lancashire. If it were not for those, we have a large majority of the real bona fide freeholders of Lancashire with us; we are quite sure of that without going to the poll; but as many of these £50 tenants-at-will are not allowed to choose for themselves, then it devolves upon the freeholders, both in the town and the country districts, to counterbalance the undue influence of the landlords upon their tenants, by increased efforts upon those who are independent in their holdings or property, and who can vote as they please at this election. If due diligence be used, I have no doubt the contest can be won. (Hear.) It depends upon the labours of those upon whom this vital issue now rests—the Free-Traders and the League in Lancashire—upon their personal exertions in their respective districts, whether we shall triumph at the coming poll. It is impossible to overrate the importance of this contest. I do not say as some of our enemies, and some of our false friends too, have said, that if we lose it, "the League may shut up shop." No; the League never will shut up shop until the Corn Laws are abolished. (Immense and protracted cheering.) But this I do know, that if we carry this election for South Lancashire, it will be taken as a sign of the times by those who live in high quarters, and it will save us a great deal of labour and expense hereafter in carrying our question. (Hear.) But do not let them deceive themselves with supposing, if they over-whelm us now with their £50 tenants-at-will, that we are going to give up the contest. No; I have no hesitation in telling them, that, if they were to beat us now, it would only be the signal for a larger gathering in this Free-Trade Hall than ever before, to devise the means of beating them in another contest. But when I talk of this as a triumph, whom do we seek to triumph over? None; for we seek to benefit every one. There may be canvassers and partisans on the one side as on the other; but do we seek the injury of those parties? No; our victory will be, not a victory over men, but the triumph of a principle—one in which we believe our opponents, mistaken as they are on this occasion, are as much interested as any one in this Free-trade Hall. And it is with the strong belief I hold, that a large number of our neighbours are bringing themselves to these convictions, that I entertain strong hopes that this contest may be won by a large majority. (Hear.) For if those of our neighbours who have been amongst us for the last four or five years of intense suffering and disaster,—if the owners of cottage property, of empty shops,—if the men of Stockport, Bolton, Rochdale, and Bury, who have, during the four or five years of our trouble and distress, found their property wasting away in their hands, their bricks and mortar becoming valueless, and their cottages not even paying their chert rents,—can I believe for a moment that such a season of tuition as that which has passed away does not leave the fruits of conversion behind it? No; I believe that there is a vast amount of conviction of the benefit of Free Trade on the part of those who have fought us heretofore on Whig and Tory grounds, and that there is a still larger amount of doubt on the part of our opponents. I ask those of our political opponents (for they call themselves such) if they have now come to the conviction that Free Trade is for the good of all, to do that which many have done, both here and in Liverpool,—to throw aside their prejudices, and come out manfully in support of their opinions. (Hear.) I ask those who have doubts, not to record their opinions while these doubts are on their minds; but to abstain from a contest in which they do not see their way, and to leave it till another contest before they determine whether they will take the ground of Free Trade or resume their party politics. It is because I have sufficient confidence in the common sense and the sense of justice in my neighbours here and in other towns that I cannot doubt, if we work as we ought for the next fortnight, that this contest will be won; and then we will meet here again, not to triumph over any one, but to congratulate ourselves upon the victory; and when Free Trade comes, as come it will, with or in spite of this election,—for though it may be retarded, truth is invincible, and cannot be put down,—I shall hail as gladly the benefits that Free Trade can confer upon my political opponents, as any that it can confer upon myself, or upon those most naturally and closely connected with me in opinion or interest. (The honourable member resumed his seat amidst loud applause, after having spoken upwards of fifty minutes.)

Mr. Alderman KERSHAW in a short speech moved the following resolution:—

"That this meeting pledges itself to give to William Brown, Esq., the Free-Trade candidate for South Lancashire, its most cordial and honest support."

The resolution was seconded by Mr. John POTTER, and supported by Alderman BROOKS.

Mr. ROBERT R. R. MOORE next addressed the meeting amidst much applause.

At the conclusion of Mr. Moore's address, the CHAIRMAN put the resolution, which was unanimously carried, and three tremendous cheers were given for "Brown and Free Trade." The proceedings then terminated at a quarter past nine o'clock.—Manchester Guardian.

THE EDINBURGH ANTI-CORN-LAW ASSOCIATION AND THE CITY MEMBERS.

The following letter from Mr. Macaulay has been received by the Secretary of the Edinburgh Anti-Corn-Law Association, in reply to the resolutions passed at the meeting held on the 22nd ult.:—

"Albany, London, May 1, 1844.

"DEAR SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, and of the resolutions enclosed in it.

"Under ordinary circumstances I should have thought it sufficient to say, in reply, that I wished to see the Corn Laws totally repealed, and should vote this year, as I voted last year, for Mr. Villiers's motion.

"But I learn from the public papers that the meeting which passed the two resolutions enclosed in your letter passed also a third resolution, conveying a censure which I am not conscious of deserving, and a threat which, you must permit me to say, will have no influence on my public conduct.

"I have, therefore, thought it desirable to write you at some length, and I am the more disposed to do so because I have been blamed for returning a brief answer to a communication which was made to me on the same subject a few months ago. I then expressed myself briefly, for this reason, that I had a short time before declared my opinion fully, and, having no change of sentiment to announce, thought it unnecessary to repeat what I had recently said. As, however, there seems to be still some doubt as to my views, I will try to explain them in such a way as may make them clear to all reasonable and candid men. To give any explanation which will not be misrepresented by envious and interested cunning is, I well know, impossible.

"We have two questions to consider—a question of political economy, and a question of practical prudence. The first question relates to ends, the second to means.

"The first question is this—On what footing would it be best for the country that the Corn Laws should be placed?

"The second question is this—By what line of conduct are we most likely to succeed in placing the Corn Laws on a good footing?

"Now, as to the first question there is, I apprehend, little or no dispute between us. I am, like you, for perfectly Free Trade. I have been represented as maintaining the doctrine that duties on the import of foreign corn may properly be imposed for purposes of revenue. But this is not quite a fair representation. I have indeed said, both in the House of Commons and in letters to my constituents, and I now say again, that the question of protection and the fiscal question are perfectly distinct, and must be decided on different principles. In no age or country, I conceive, can it be right to lay an import duty on foreign corn for the purpose of raising the price of home-grown corn. But it is easy to conceive states of society in which an import duty on foreign corn, imposed in good faith for purposes of revenue, would be a very proper resource for the financier. Whether in this kingdom, and at this time, such a duty would be proper, is a question on which I have never yet given an opinion. I will now plainly say that, having heard the question very ably argued on both sides, I have come to the conclusion that it is not desirable to lay a tax on foreign corn for the purpose of raising revenue. It is clear that such a tax would, in this country, take out of the purse of the consumer a sum many times greater than the sum which would come into the purse of the state; and this, I think, is an insurmountable objection.

"In theory, then, we are agreed; and now comes the question of prudence. Our end is the same. What means ought we to employ in order to attain it? This is a point upon which a lecturer on Free Trade has nothing to do. His business is to inculcate abstract truth; but the business of a member of Parliament is to effect practical good. Abstract truth does not admit of compromise; but he who wishes to effect practical good must often be content to obtain it by instalments, to purchase support by concessions, and to mitigate evils which he would gladly destroy.

"I know that there will not be wanting detractors to tell you that this is the cant of party, the shuffling of a man who wishes to compound matters between his convictions and his interests. I shall make no protestations; but I write you calmly to consider in what manner all the most important reforms in our legislation have been carried. Is there one which has not been brought about by means such as those which I recommend?

"The history of our country would furnish me with innumerable examples; but I will take only one or two with which we are all familiar:—Sixteen years ago, Lord John Russell succeeded in obtaining the abolition of the Test Act. Now, I conceive that the arguments for freedom of trade, strong as they are, are not stronger than the arguments for freedom of conscience. I hold that no theological test whatever ought to be imposed on any candidate for civil office. But in the year 1828 the Parliament was not prepared, and, I fear, is not yet prepared, to legislate on this sound principle. The sacramental test—the worst, in all points of view, of all tests—was abolished. But another test was substituted, a test less objectionable, yet still indefensible in theory and mischievous in practice. A person taking office was required to make a declaration on the faith of a Christian. In this manner our Jewish countrymen were excluded from many situations which they might hold with great advantage to the public. Nevertheless, all the most eminent defenders of the rights of conscience accepted the measure, imperfect as it was, with joy and gratitude. They knew that it made an irreparable breach in an unsound system; and that such a breach, when once made, would gradually be widened. They knew, also, that, if they rejected all compromise, and drove from them every road-juror who was not prepared to go the whole length with them, they would, with religious liberty on their lips, have done the work of the worst class of bigots, and would, instead of removing the grievances of the Jew, have perpetuated the grievances of the Presbyterian and of the Independent.

"I will give one more instance:—Call to mind the history of the Reform Bill—a great and salutary law, but not perfect even as originally framed, and grievously injured by subsequent alterations. I could not think it reasonable that Sudbury, with 4000 souls, should have twice as many members as Perthshire with 150,000 souls. I could not think it reasonable, that, while the old scot-and-lot franchise was abolished, the freemen—the worst of all classes of electors—should be suffered to remain, and to infect with their inveterate corruption the new and sound parts of the constituent body. I disliked the Chandos clause. I had many other objections. But, in spite of all these objections, was it not my duty to give zealous support to that noble law which swept away venal and servile boroughs by scores—which bestowed the franchise on hundreds of thousands who were excellently qualified to use it—and which first gave to Scotland anything that deserved the name of representation? If I, and all who, like me, saw defects in the Reform Bill, had set ourselves to attack it—if we had, at the general election of 1831, put up in every county and town candidates of our own way of thinking, to oppose Lord Grey's supporters, would you have had a better Parliamentary Reform? My firm belief is that you would have had no reform at all. The effect of our disunion would have been, not that the bill would have been carried without its blemishes, but that Gatton and Old Sarum would have retained their privileges, that Manchester and Leeds would have remained without members, and that Edinburgh would still have been a close borough.

"These are mere examples. I may safely challenge you to produce a single case in which a great reform has been effected in opposition to powerful interests without co-operation among persons who did not entirely agree in opinion, and who, in order that they might act together, were under the necessity of making mutual concessions.

"Why am I to believe that, in this respect, the reform of the Corn Laws will be found to differ from all other reforms? Is the party which is arrayed in defence of the existing system so small and weak—so destitute of wealth and power—so timid and flexible, that we may here safely adopt a course which, if adopted with regard to the repeal of the Test Act, or with regard to the Reform Bill, would have been fatal? Have we such a superfluity of force that we can, without any risk, spare from our own ranks, and drive over to the ranks of our enemies, a great body of persons, some of whom have by their talents and virtues justly acquired the public confidence, only because, while they are prepared to co-operate with us to a great extent, they will not pronounce the shibboleth—'total and immediate'?"

"It is easy for the members of any Anti-Corn-Law League to deceive themselves about their strength. They are generally inhabitants of great towns. Everybody with whom they converse is for Free Trade. If they attend a meeting on the subject of the Corn Laws, they see every hand held up for total and immediate repeal. No supporter of the sliding scale, no supporter of a fixed duty, can obtain a hearing. It is not strange that even people so intelligent as my constituents should go home from such meetings with a conviction that the voice of the nation is on the side of the League, and that the good cause is on the point of triumphing. I am certain that you deceive yourselves. The House of Lords is against you almost to a man. But this is the smallest of the obstacles which lie in your way. If the House of Commons were with you, the Lords might find it necessary to yield. But you have against you a great majority of the House of Commons. If the constituent body were with you, you might hope to procure, at the next election, a House of Commons favourable to your views. But you have against you, I grieve to say, a majority of the constituent body. The electors who return the supporters of the present Corn Law may be less intelligent, but are at least as numerous as those who return the friends of Free Trade. The population of Wiltshire is double of the population of Edinburgh. There was an election a few weeks ago for North Wiltshire, and no friend of Free Trade ventured to show his face. The population of Exeter is double of the population of Durham. The return of Mr. Bright for Durham was represented as a great victory of the principles of Free Trade. But Exeter has just returned a supporter of the present law by an overwhelming majority. You have not even the West Riding. You have not even the great town of Liverpool. Remember, too, that the gentlemen who represent the Irish counties, though they in general support a liberal policy, are, on this subject, opposed to us, and would not be favourable even to such a bill as the late Government proposed to introduce.

"Under these circumstances, what is the policy which those who hold, in the fullest extent, the doctrines of Free Trade ought to adopt?"

"My advice is this—assert your principle and defend it; do your best to convince the rural population that you are not seeking for a benefit at their expense, and that their interest is, in truth, the same with yours; but, as it is probable that a long time may elapse before reason achieves a complete victory over prejudice, do not, during the interval, refuse to accept anything because you cannot obtain everything. Consider as a friend every man who endeavours to put the law on a better footing, though that footing may not be the best. The day may come when the difference between the supporters of Free Trade and the supporters of a fixed duty will be a serious practical difference. At present it is a mere speculative difference, and will continue to be so till sound principles have made much greater progress. What course may be expedient in the session of 1850 we need not now discuss. In 1844 our wisdom is to treat the supporters of a moderate fixed duty as allies.

"You have advisers who urge you to a very different course—to a course which never did, and never will, end in anything but disappointment and disgrace. They say to you, 'Regard all who do not join in calling for total and immediate repeal as enemies alike. Make no distinction between the Duke of Buckingham and Lord John Russell, between the Duke of Cleveland and Lord Howick. Nay, let no supporter of total repeal, who is inclined to tolerate the supporters of a moderate fixed duty, be himself tolerated. It is not enough that he is against all protection. It is not enough that, as a member of Parliament, he has redeemed, and far more than redeemed, every pledge that he ever gave. It is not enough that, in every division, he has voted exactly as you wished him to vote. Persecute him, unless he consents to persecute others. If he dares to recommend union and mutual forbearance among Reformers—if, despairing of at present accomplishing all that he desires, he is willing to co-operate cordially with those who are willing to assist us in obtaining half or even a quarter of our demands—eject him from his seat.' Such counsels have often brought gain to the demagogue who gives them: they have never brought anything but disaster to the ignorant whom they have misled.

"Have I misrepresented the language which has lately been held to you? Have I even exaggerated its absurdity? Of what do you complain? Of my opinions respecting Free Trade? They are your own. Of my votes? They have been such as you requested me, and are now requesting me, to give. In what division on the Corn Laws have I been in a different lobby from Mr. Villiers and Mr. Cobden? I remember none. My crime is simply this, that I have recommended union, that I have refused to concur in a policy which tends to divide against itself a force already too weak. As I have acted, I will continue to act. When a motion is made for the total repeal of the Corn Laws, I think it right to mark my opinion by my vote. But I am certain that the total repeal will never take place till the views of a large part of the agricultural population have undergone a change; and I apprehend that such a change in the views of such a population must be gradual. Being unable at present to obtain the whole of what I desire, I will try, at least, to obtain a part; and, that I may obtain a part, I will thankfully accept the aid of persons who are not yet prepared to assist me in obtaining the whole. Towards those persons I will strictly observe the obligations of good faith and amity. I will not attempt to gain popularity at their cost; and I will exert myself, in conjunction with them, to effect reforms which, though not altogether such as I could wish, may yet be calculated to diminish the evils inseparable from monopoly, and to extend the commercial relations of the empire.

"If this exposition of my sentiments is unsatisfactory to my constituents, I regret it. But they must do their pleasure—my mind is made up, and I am ready to abide the consequences.

"I see that one gentleman who harangued the late meeting favoured his hearers with new definitions of Toryism, of Liberalism, and of hypocrisy. According to this teacher of politics and morals, a member of Parliament who does not submissively conform to the voice of his constituents is essentially a Tory, and, if he calls himself a Liberal, is guilty of adding hypocrisy to Toryism. My notions of right and wrong have been learned in a different school. I have been in the habit of considering a man who injured his country in order to curry favour with his constituents, not as a Liberal, but as a knave. I do not believe that Edinburgh will ever send to the House of Commons a man abject enough to sit there on such terms; at all events I will not be that man. If you wish to be so represented, you can have no difficulty in finding an intriguing sycophant every way qualified for the purpose. It will be for you to consider whether your dearest rights can be safely intrusted to the care of one who is destitute of honesty, courage, and self-respect. As for myself, while I continue to be honoured with the confidence of the electors of Edinburgh, I will attempt to show my gratitude, not by adulation and obsequiousness, but by manly rectitude; and if they shall be pleased to dismiss me, I trust that, though I may lose their suffrages, I shall retain their esteem.

"I have the honour to be, dear Sir,

"Your faithful servant,

"T. B. MACAULAY."

Mr. Gibson Craig has also written an answer to the resolutions forwarded to him. From his letter, which bears date the 2nd instant, we take the following extract:—

"As the resolutions of the meeting, therefore, and the speeches in support of them, convey the distinct intimation that even the slightest difference of opinion is to be visited by dismissal from the representation, I cannot but consider that such a course is altogether inconsistent with what is due to a representative whose opinions on general politics agree so entirely with those of the great majority of the constituency, and against whom no charge was made of neglect of their interests, or of abandoning the principles on which he was elected. Having so recently given a full and explicit statement of my opinions on the Corn Laws, I can now only refer the Association to my letter of 26th of December last, and remind them that as I then stated, that 'I shall in this session vote for every motion which has for its object the getting rid of the present Corn Laws,' I have consequently already voted for Mr. Cobden's motion, and of course I shall vote for Mr. Villiers's motion, and any others to the same effect."

On Thursday evening, the 9th inst., a general meeting of the committee of the Edinburgh Anti-Corn-Law Association was held in the Merchants' Hall, for the purpose of adopting a resolution in reference to the letters received from the members.

Mr. WIGHAM having been called to the chair, shortly stated the object of the meeting.

Mr. M'LAREN rose and said—When the letters from the city members were received, a meeting of the former sub-committee was immediately called to consider what course should be pursued. At that meeting I had the honour to propose that the letters be printed and sent to each member of the association. This proposal gave rise to some difference of opinion. The objectors thought that the tone and spirit of Mr. Macaulay's letter was exceedingly offensive, and that its general scope was calculated to injure the cause which he professed himself desirous to promote. They therefore argued that it should be left to himself to publish it if he thought fit, and that it should merely be read at this meeting. The majority, while they unanimously concurred in the opinion as to its offensive tone and spirit, thought there was only one person it could possibly injure, and that was Mr. Macaulay himself. In this opinion I cordially concurred. It was at length agreed, without a vote, to print the letters, and send them to all the members of the association, and to all the newspapers. They were accordingly put into your hands yesterday, and you have thus had an opportunity of considering them at your leisure. It occurred to members of the sub-committee that Mr. Macaulay's letter might be fairly interpreted in two different ways. The most liberal view was, that he wished to convey to us the impression that he was now prepared to give a cordial support to the cause of total and immediate repeal, as against any duty, whether fixed or sliding. The other view was, that while he was prepared in theory to approve of total and immediate repeal, and even to vote for it in certain circumstances, he would be ready to desert the cause whenever any Government with which he might be connected should propose a small fixed duty; and that any influence he possessed would practically be employed in throwing cold water upon League principles, and in advocating the compromise of a fixed duty. Similar views were entertained regarding the sentiments of Mr. Gibson Craig. It was at length agreed to propose, for the adoption of this meeting, a resolution which, without giving any decided opinion as to the correct interpretation of the letters, should express a willingness to receive them as conveying the most liberal view, provided the members should afterwards agree to homologate that interpretation on its being communicated to them. As one of the supporters of this course, I was requested to move the resolution which I am about to propose. But I must first explain that the committee unanimously agreed to insert in the resolution their disapprobation of much that is contained in Mr. Macaulay's letter. (Applause.) Several glaring misrepresentations regarding matters of fact were pointed out and discussed in the committee; and to some of these I was requested to call the attention of the meeting. In considering this letter, which, from its length, might serve as an article for a review, and which appears to have been written with great care, as a sort of Whig manifesto, it will not be expected that I should enter into anything like a minute criticism. There are many statements which he has made, which are at variance with the real facts of the case; but I shall call your attention only to a few of them, just to show how he has taken liberties with facts, in order to suit his own theory; and that he has made statements which are extremely plausible in themselves, but which have no foundation. It will be for you, as a jury, to decide on the sufficiency of the proof which I shall bring before you in proposing the motion. The first point, then, to which I shall refer, is the impression studiously and carefully sought to be conveyed by various parts of Mr. Macaulay's letter, that he has never expressed opinions in favour of any duty for revenue, and that he had always opposed a fixed duty for protection. These allegations you find distinctly conveyed in his letter, although he has, no doubt, been very careful in the choice of his words, always stating less in the strict literal meaning of the words than he wishes you to believe. And here I would remark that I will look only to the fair import and evident intentions of the writer. I shall follow the rule of interpretation which Puley lays down in such cases, and adopt the familiar illustration which he gives of the sense in which expressions, or even signs, are binding on the parties who use them,—that if one man asks the way to London, and another, knowingly, points his hand in the wrong direction, that, morally, he is as justly chargeable with practising deception as if he had uttered words distinctly conveying the false statement. Keeping this principle in view, no candid person can doubt that Mr. Macaulay's letter is studiously written with the view to convey the denial of his former sentiments to which I have already referred. Now, what are the facts of the case? In February, 1843, he was written to by our respected chairman, on the part of the association, requesting his support to Mr. Villiers' motion. On the 22nd of that month, Mr. Macaulay replied in a letter of considerable length, which was published at the time in all the newspapers, and republished in the Scotsman last week, declining to comply with the request. In that letter he stated that in speculation he was opposed to any duty for protection, but that even in speculation he was not opposed to a duty for revenue. His words are these:—"But I do not, even in speculation, pronounce all duties on foreign corn to be indefensible; for I conceive that there are cases in which such duties, when levied in good faith, solely for the purposes of revenue, may be justified." But this is not all. He goes on to argue, as in his present letter, about the weakness of the League, the strength of the opposing forces, and the advantages of supporting a fixed duty; and then, in these terms, he distinctly repudiates the principles which he now says he always supported:—"Thinking thus, I will not pledge myself to support total and immediate repeal; and I am perfectly ready to take the consequences." Again, in the last sentence of the same letter, he assumes that this avowal will cause an opposition to his re-election, and therefore he says to Mr. Wigham, that "no part which you may feel it your duty to take regarding my seat in Parliament will in the smallest degree diminish the esteem and good will which I feel for you." I leave it to you to judge, after hearing these extracts, whether it be possible, with any regard to truth and fair dealing, to reconcile his sentiments, so plainly and broadly stated in the letter of 1843, with the denials of them which are so studiously embodied in his letter of 1844. And now with regard to the alleged misrepresentation of his opinions by "interested and envious cunning," who are the parties that argued incessantly that Mr. Macaulay was conscientiously opposed to total and immediate repeal, and in favour of a small duty either for revenue or protection? They were his own friends and supporters. This can easily be proved by a reference to facts. At the recent public meeting, the greater part of the excellent speech of Councillor M'Farlane, who supports the honourable member, and disapproves of the third resolution, was taken up in demolishing, which he did very ably, the revenue duty, or small fixed-duty opinions, which he believed were held by both of the members; and Mr. M'Farlane concluded his speech by expressing a strong hope that they would "disregard the trammels of party," and vote for total and immediate repeal. In like manner, Mr. Montgomery Bell, who moved the amendment, after expressing his regret that Mr. Macaulay "should be fettered and trammelled by party," went on to say that "the other difficulty was, that he (Mr. Macaulay) was still in doubt whether a low fixed duty would not prosper the revenue. The idea of a revenue from a fixed duty had been demolished both by Mr. Cobden and Sir R. Peel, and he could not but suppose that a man of Mr. Macaulay's powerful intellect would be open to these arguments." (Hear, hear.) These, then, are the opinions of the supporters of the members. On the other hand, friends of total and immediate repeal, who opposed the views of the members, were more sceptical as to Mr. Macaulay's having any serious objections to League principles other than what arose from party connexions. This scepticism was broadly stated by Balie Gray at the public meeting, and was reiterated by myself. Thus, it must be manifest that if there was any misrepresentation, or "envious and interested cunning" about the matter (which, however, I deny), it was exhibited only by Mr. Macaulay's supporters, not by his opponents. The second point will occupy very little of your time, at it is easily disposed of. In the course of my remarks at the public meeting, which were compressed as much as possible in the delivery, from the late hour at which I spoke, and still further compressed in the published report, I argued, as is known to 600 witnesses, that I did not believe it was from any scruples of conscience that Mr. Macaulay was prevented from supporting our views, and that it was his party connexions alone which made him oppose the voice of the great body of his constituents. With this conviction as to his conduct I expressed an opinion, that any man who thus set the opinion of his constituents at defiance acted on Tory principles, and, if a professed Liberal, only added practical hypocrisy to Toryism. Now, what was the conclusion to which my remarks plainly pointed? Not that Mr. Macaulay should vote against his conscientious convictions to please his constituents—for my argument supposed that his conscientious convictions and those of his constituents were identical, provided he would honestly act on them, and disregard the "trammels of party." The conclusion to which alone my remarks could lead any one was, that if party or other considerations prevented him, or any other man similarly situated, from fairly representing the sentiments of those who elected him, on the great public ques-

"LETTING THE CAT OUT OF THE BAG."

No man is wise at all hours; and it seems that the Duke of Richmond, excited by the obvious contempt with which his opposition to Free-Trade principles is regarded by the Ministry, has made an admission of motives which well deserves the attention of farmers and consumers. No one who has had much personal intercourse with landowners, or who has known any thing of the management of their estates, can hesitate to admit that the narrowest and lowest selfishness, the meanest and most grasping pecuniary greed, are the motives which mainly guide their actions. Here and there are some noble exceptions, but the observation is strictly accurate as regards the great body of landed proprietors; and it will be found that those who are most notorious for a narrow and exclusive regard for their own petty interests are the most ardent advocates of monopoly. Nor are the causes of this much beneath the surface, of which more presently. But there are many intelligent persons, who, having had no actual knowledge of landlords, that is, no business knowledge of them in their own districts, have taken as true the fancy portraits of themselves which lords and squires delight to sketch with a free, bold hand at rural dinners, protection meetings, and the like. There the landowners are delineated—by themselves—as overflowing with sympathy for their tenants, and ready to make any sacrifices to promote the welfare of the agricultural labourers; and as this self-glorification is usually vouched as true by the parson of the parish, and the principal land-agents and lawyers of the district, some of the educated classes, ignorant of the interior of rural life, imagine that there must be at all events some resemblance between the portrait and the reality. The speeches of the landed gentry at recent protection meetings have, however, gone far to dissipate such delusions, for the veil by which it has been attempted to cover the real object of the aristocracy—namely, rent—is singularly transparent. The continued though tardy movement of the Government in the right direction, and its practical adoption of minor measures of Free Trade, have, moreover, madened the monopolist leaders into an open betrayal of their real motives.

Thus the removal of all duty upon the import of wool, which is henceforth to be admitted into this country from all parts of the world without let or hindrance by custom-house officers, has aroused the monopolist Duke of Richmond from the sulky state of inaction into which he has apparently fallen since taking a room in Bond-street for the "Central Protection Society," and has led him to expose his spring of action in all its native deformity. Of course this hereditary lawmaker for the British people means to oppose the Government measure when it reaches the House of Lords; and in preparation for that opposition the ducal monopolist on Friday week moved for some returns relating to the wool trade. In so doing he said, "He only knew that in the year 1828 the reduction of the duty upon the importation of wool from 6d. to 1d. or 1½d. per pound was one which inflicted great injuries upon the flockmasters of England."

This, as was conclusively shown by subsequent speakers, is a statement the reverse of true; but it serves to show the motives of the monopolist leader, who said, "He thought the measure about to be proposed to them was a bad one; he disliked that measure because he considered it to be another step taken towards Free Trade. It was a matter which, if it did not affect the short-wool masters of Great Britain and Ireland, he would not be prepared to vote for." And his grace then wandered into some rigmarole about the Australian wool-growers. So far the monopolist legislator kept a slight covering of decency over his motives by pretending that it was the interests of the Australian wool-growers, and not those of "the short-wool masters of Great Britain"—of whom the Duke of Richmond is one—about which he was solicitous. As the sailors say, "let him tell that to the marines!" But after Lord Dalhousie, the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, had shown that the high duty imposed on foreign wool in 1819 had seriously injured the British wool-grower, and that a nobleman who had then indulged in the day-dream that monopoly was profitable to the monopolists, found to his cost that the price of wool fell from 2s. 6d. to 9d. per lb.; and after Lord Brougham had proved by reference to tables of prices that the imposition of a high protecting duty on foreign wool had, on comparison of an average of four years before and four years after the imposition, reduced by about one-half the price of British wool, the Duke of Richmond, stung into the abandonment of all subterfuges, stood out as the unblushing claimant to have his own rents kept up by taxes on the community. He said the opinions of himself and his friends "had proved right in some items of the tariff—for example, on the article of salmon. They had been told that no salmon would come in. Now, he happened to have a fishery, which he had let on lease at £7000 a year

tion of the day, justice and fairness required that he should resign his seat. And many here will remember, that when I used the same argument at the meeting of the committee, and illustrated it at greater length, I referred to the cases of Sir Robert Peel, who resigned his seat for Oxford, and of Mr. Milner Gibson, who resigned his seat for Ipswich, in similar circumstances. And what has Mr. Macaulay made of this argument? He has represented me to have argued that members are bound to vote against their conscientious opinions, and even to injure their country, in order, by their votes, to please their constituents—a sentiment which, I am sure, every member of the association utterly repudiates and abhors, and which Mr. Macaulay well knows was never either expressed, or intended to be expressed, by any one. (Hear, hear.) The third and last point which I shall notice is by far the most important of the whole; and I beg the particular attention of members to it, because of its extraordinary misrepresentations. He seeks to convey the impression throughout his letter, in various shapes and ways, that in principle he has always been with us, that in divisions he has always voted with Mr. Cobden and Mr. Villiers, and that therefore we have acted a factious part towards him. He says, that, in our opinion, it is not enough that a member of Parliament should redeem, and far more than redeem, every pledge that he ever gave. It is not enough that in every division he has voted exactly as we wished him to vote. "Persecute him unless he consents to persecute others." He is anxious to make us believe that he has done exactly as we wished him to do; that he has invariably voted with Mr. Villiers and Mr. Cobden; and no man who admits that to be true can possibly come to any other conclusion than that Mr. Macaulay has been ill-used; that he has been persecuted; and that we have acted towards him with something like factious opposition. (Hear, hear.) Now, what are the facts of the case? The question of a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws has only been twice before Parliament, so that it cannot be difficult to ascertain how Mr. Macaulay has acted. The first occasion was immediately after the great meeting of delegates in London in February, 1842. That was the first time the motion was brought forward in the stern shape it has since assumed; for our excellent friends in Manchester, though they had all along advocated the total abolition of the Corn Laws, had not before demanded their immediate abolition by any specific motion to that effect in Parliament. Mr. Villiers's motion, which was brought forward as an amendment on Sir Robert Peel's bill, was to the effect "that the duties on corn should now cease and determine." Now, one would suppose, from the statements of Mr. Macaulay, that on this subject he had acted and voted with Mr. Villiers and Mr. Cobden. But what are the facts? On that occasion Mr. Macaulay made a long speech, in which he begins by saying that this was the first time he had spoken on the Corn Laws, and he was anxious that his opinions should not be misunderstood. After some complimentary allusions to Edinburgh, he says:—"And I can fairly say that I believe the people of Edinburgh have a feeling so strong on this subject, that I have reason to apprehend their disapproval rather than approval,—that they will not, at all events, be quite satisfied with my conduct in not feeling myself at liberty to support the motion of my honourable friend the member for Wolverhampton." Here is a man who now wishes us to believe that he has always been found in the same lobby with Mr. Villiers and Mr. Cobden, who begins his speech by stating that his constituents, he fears, will disapprove of his sentiments, because he cannot support the motion of Mr. Villiers. Here is a specimen of the credit which is to be attached to the truthfulness of Mr. Macaulay. ("Hear, hear," and applause.) After arguing the question as a man of his splendid talents can well do—after nicely balancing both sides—he states that he approves in the abstract of the principle of total repeal, and condemns the sliding scale. In short, after making a regular Whig-party speech, he concludes by stating that he will not support Mr. Villiers's motion, because the word "now" is in it. He has no objection, I dare say, to these laws being abolished next century, or after he shall have ceased to be member for Edinburgh, or at any other time; but as to their being abolished "now," he will have nothing to do with such a proposition; and yet this is the man who has always held our opinions, who was always to be found in the same lobby with Messrs. Cobden and Villiers. (Applause.) I remember very well hearing of the effect which this tail to Mr. Macaulay's speech produced, though it is not, of course, quoted in Hansard—that, after saying he could not support the motion, he walked out in a very stately manner, amidst the derisive cheers of both sides of the House. I think I have sufficiently shown up the alleged facts of his letter. I think I must have satisfied all who hear me that no credit is to be given to the statement of facts contained in his letter; that the whole statements are very prettily and skillfully put together; but the hypothesis on which they are built being destroyed, the whole tumbles to the ground. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) It is, therefore, of no use to go into his general arguments. I may merely notice in a general way the inference which he appears to deduce from the course which we have taken. He appears to think that all the honour of the House of Commons is monopolized by the Whig party; and that it is impossible to get an honest man as a representative for the city of Edinburgh, unless we get himself or somebody like him. If we get a man to support the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, he is described to be some trucking person in whom we should put no trust. Now, there are two classes of representatives, those who object to our principles, and those who approve of them—the latter being of the class of Messrs. Villiers, Cobden, and Bright. If we ask any of these gentlemen to stand as members for our city, we are, in effect, informed by Mr. Macaulay that we are bound to assume, that, because they hold the opinions which we hold, they must, therefore, do so from interested motives, and that we ought not to trust such men, but only him, and such as him. I do not mention this as a jocular inference, but as a serious matter of business. (Honest cries of "Hear" from Mr. Moncrieff and Mr. Maitland.) It does seem to be so brought out as intended to convey the meaning I have put upon it. We have often been asked whether we would really dispense with the service of men of eminence, who are such useful and valuable members on other public questions. Now, my answer has invariably been this—it does not follow that Messrs. Villiers, Cobden, and Bright, or men of that class, are less liberal on other questions than our members. On the contrary, we know that the men who support League principles are likely to be more at one with the constituency in matters of general politics than either Mr. Macaulay or Mr. Craig. In his remarks about the power of the landowners, and the want of power in the League, he referred to the recent election at Exeter, as showing that the Anti-Corn-Law League was in a minority. I admit the fact; but the reason was, and it was not convenient for him to state it, that, while General Briggs, the Free-Trade candidate, was supported by all the friends of Free Trade, the Whigs either abstained from voting, or voted for the Tories. (Hear, hear.) There was a single paragraph in the letter of Mr. Craig to which he would refer in conclusion. He complained of the members being censured although their "opinions on general politics agree so entirely with those of the great majority of the constituency." Now, I do not question that Mr. Gibson Craig is sincere in this remark, for I believe him incapable of saying what he does not believe to be true; still I do not think their opinions on general politics coincide with the majority of their constituents. Of Mr. Gibson Craig's opinions I shall say little—they are to be learned only from his votes; but Mr. Macaulay tells us what his opinions are, for he takes part in the general discussions in the House of Commons. After making a few other remarks, which led to some slight interruption, Mr. M'Laren concluded by moving:—

"That having heard read the letters from the city members—Resolved, that while there is much in Mr. Macaulay's letter of which the association disapprove, they desire to consider both communications as conveying the impression that our representatives are now convinced of the propriety of supporting the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, as opposed to any duty whatever, in terms of the second resolution passed on the 22nd of April; direct this resolution to be communicated to them by the sub-committee; and in the meantime delay all further proceedings until the sub-committee shall think fit to call another meeting of the association."

Mr. RITCHIE seconded the motion.

Mr. J. MONCRIEFF, advocate, replied to Mr. M'Laren, and entered into a defence of Mr. Macaulay. He contended that Mr. Macaulay agreed with them in sentiments, and had not changed his opinions on the subject. He had made certain statements of his views before the question of revenue was mooted at all, and it was surely very unfair to seek to bind him down to those statements as the general explanation of his views. After quoting that part of Mr. Macaulay's letter in which he alludes to the distinction between the question of protection and the fiscal question, Mr. Moncrieff said he put it to the good sense and candour of the meeting to say, if it was fair to interpret Mr. Macaulay's views and conduct as Mr. M'Laren had done. There were just two questions to be considered in relation to the matter. One of these was a question of principle, the other a practical question, in regard to which they must be guided by expediency. The practical question divided itself again into two branches—the one being the point of revenue, the other that of protection. Now, if there was any difference at all between Mr. Macaulay and them, it was not on the question of principle, but on that of expediency. It was simply as to how far the abstract question could be carried under existing circumstances, and with a due regard to the substantial interests of the country. Referring to the cases of Sir Robert Peel and Mr. M. Gibson already adduced by Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Moncrieff said, he did not think it proper that, whenever a member happened to differ from his constituents upon any question, he should be immediately called upon to resign.

Mr. JAMES MACLAREN in a brief speech submitted an amendment, requesting an answer from the members whether a proper construction had been put upon their letters; but on its being explained that a reply was expected, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. E. MAITLAND, advocate, said that for himself and others—while there were expressions in the resolution with which they could not agree—they would offer no opposition to it, in order that the unanimity of the association might not be disturbed.

The resolution was therefore unanimously agreed to.

Mr. ARCHIBALD THOMPSON then moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Duncan M'Laren, expressive of the high confidence of the meeting in his sincere and disinterested devotedness to the association, gratitude for his unwearied exertions in the cause of Free Trade, and especially for his valuable services in twice superintending the collections of the contributions to the Anti-Corn-Law League (applause); in which he gratuitously performed an immense amount of labour.

Mr. R. R. BLYTH, in seconding the motion, said he hoped it would be considered as a practical refutation of the groundless insinuations contained in the letter of Mr. Macaulay. (Much applause.)

Mr. PRENTICE, editor of the Manchester Times, and one of the most distinguished members of the Council of the League, bore testimony to the merited compliment, declaring Mr. M'Laren was considered by the Council of the League the most efficient auxiliary they had in the country. (Hear, hear.)

The motion was carried by acclamation, and Mr. M'LAREN briefly returned thanks.

Mr. PRENTICE then shortly addressed the meeting. The Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle, from which we have taken the foregoing account of the proceedings, thus concludes a leading article on the subject:—"We have said nothing regarding the tone and temper of these letters, and of Mr. Gibson Craig's we have nothing particular to say; but that of Mr. Macaulay betrays great irritation, and a pettiness unworthy of his high character. The plain insinuation of sinister motives, which he throws out against a citizen not more remarkable for intellectual eminence than for inflexible integrity, and more distinguished for both endowments than any other individual it would be easy to name, are contemptible in the last degree. Mr. Macaulay has mistaken his man. He little knows the real character of the gentleman at whom he evidently aims his envenomed shafts, or the estimation in which he is held by the inhabitants of Edinburgh; or he would have refrained from penning the virulent aspersions with which his letter abounds."

When the reduction in the duty on currants is urged on the ground of the advantage it will give to the great mass of consumers, while so high a duty is maintained on the flour with which they must be used, we are forcibly reminded of the beggar who, on entering a farmhouse, craved for a little salt, and then modestly begged for an egg to eat with it.—Economist.

After the passing of the tariff, his tenant came to him and said, "I believe you have permitted all your tenants of land to give up their leases after the alteration in the Corn Law?" Upon his (the Duke of Richmond) stating that he had done so, his tenant immediately applied for the same advantage, which was granted. Since then he had certainly obtained another tenant, but it was at the sacrifice of £2000 a year. It would not do, then, to say that no mischief had accrued from the tariff; it had done a great deal." Here we have a distinct avowal of the kind of mischiefs the Monopolists apprehend from Free Trade; and the whole may be summed up in three words, REDUCTION OF RENT. Now, let such reduction to any conceivable extent be in reality the consequence of Free Trade, is that to be for a moment put in competition with the public benefits derivable from unfettered commerce? This was well put in a quiet and sarcastic way by Lord Montegle, who said, "He was sorry for the loss the noble duke had sustained on his salmon; but it was consoling to recollect that, to the same extent in which the noble duke had lost by the change, the people had gained;" and even the House of Lords laughed at the misfortune of the huckstering duke. What, then, must be the tone of his mind, who can stand up in the Great Council of the Nation and plead his own paltry, sordid, grovelling interest as a bar to great measures of public utility? Can any term of contemptuous indignation be too strong to apply to the hereditary legislator, who thus uses his high functions in the spirit and with the objects of a petty huckster? What would be said of a jurymen or an arbitrator or a judge, who thus perverted a public duty to serve his own personal ends? We trust that when next the Duke of Richmond attempts to gull a meeting of farmers with follies and fallacies about the advantages of "protection" to farmers and farm-labourers, that he will be met with the cry of "Fish alive! Fish alive, oh!" for, whatever be his accidental station, it is clear that his soul is adapted for the superintendence of a fish-stall.

However, we have now the case against monopoly completely made out by the admissions of the Monopolists themselves; they have been compelled to plead at the bar of public opinion, and they have now admitted the full extent of their guilt. First, feeble Sir E. Knatchbull confessed that the Corn Laws are required to enable the landowners to provide for their jointures and settlements; then weak Lord Mountcashel admitted monopoly of the people's food was sought that the squires might pay the interest on their mortgages—like governments, they never dream of paying the principal—and lastly we have the head and leader of the monopolists, the plausible and cunning Duke of Richmond, forced openly to declare that it is RENT, and rent only, which is endangered by Free Trade. If the landed aristocrats do hold two-seventh parts of their rentals by means of the Corn Laws,—if that proportion is, as the Duke of Richmond assumes, a tax upon the industrious community of the empire,—then all the stir and fume of "Protection Societies" will become perfectly intelligible. And, with these facts before them, will the farmers continue to lend themselves to the delusion?

But it will be said, how is this want of intellect and morality amongst a class which makes so much pretension to both, and which has so many apparent advantages of birth, fortune, and education, to be accounted for? How is it that acts which would be disgraceful to a shopkeeper, and would make the name of any merchant, who did the like, stink in the nostrils of the sons of commerce, be matters of course with our landed legislators? The explanation is short and simple: they are poor rich men. With large incomes they are deeply in debt; their wants and habits of expense always exceed their means; they spend, by anticipation, all their own share of their nominal incomes, and in the midst of wealth they endure some of the worst miseries of poverty. We could name men of princely apparent fortunes who have for years been paying 40 per cent. for the loans by which alone they obtain ready money. In the words of one who knew them well, "their cash comes from, their wealth goes to, the money-lender." Have our readers never remarked how sensitive the Upper House is when any relaxation of the usury laws is hinted at? That is there matter of feeling! Thus it is that the factitious necessities of the great body of our landowners induce them to pervert their political influence to the advancement of their own sordid, selfish, and class interests, in utter disregard of the national welfare.

WHAT HAS MONOPOLY DONE FOR THE PEASANTRY?

It is impossible to take up a newspaper without seeing something which gives the lie to the Monopolists' assertion that the Corn Laws improve the condition and increase the wages of the rural labourers. Directly the contrary is the truth. Monopoly has impeded the progress of agriculture, and has spread crime and destitution amongst the agricultural labourers in all purely agricultural districts. Thus we find in the Mark-lane Express the following significant passage in an article upon a contemplated "society for the improvement of the condition of the labouring classes," wherein the writer says—

"We cannot refrain from advertizing to a subject to which we have frequently before called attention, namely, the necessity of opening all new available channels for finding employment for the industry, for the sinew and bone of the country. It is of no use to preach the gospel to persons who had not got food; they are content to do so; but the means of doing so must be afforded them. With capital in plethora abundance, labour imploring employment, land swamped with water, half-tilled, or altogether uncultivated, we refuse or neglect to adopt measures which would relieve much of the distress and privation to which the labouring classes are exposed. The evil has, however, become one of such magnitude as to thrust itself upon public attention."

Now, the measure required as a preliminary to all general improvement of the husbandry of the country, by which alone the condition of the rural labourers can be improved, is a free and unrestricted trade in grain and all other articles of food: without this, all the efforts of all the benevolent societies are mere moonshine. More employment, and cheaper, or at least steady and moderate priced, food, are the requisites to improve the condition of the peasantry; and these will result from a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, and from nought besides. The reverend speaker, to whose speech reference is made in the above extract, was Mr. Buller, a clergyman of Birmingham, who also said—

"It was to the direful destitution which existed in the rural districts—for there also deep distress existed—that the incendiary fires which had of late been of such fearfully frequent occurrence were to be ascribed. He had lately been in Suffolk, and found that who a family of the poor were living on pig's meat—that is, a coarse kind of bread made of the bran usually given to the pigs to feed on; and it appears they have not enough even of that wretched diet."

And another rev. gentleman, Mr. Burgess of Chelsea, showed the absurdity of the allegation that we have any surplus population, saying—

"He entirely differed from an hon. gentleman (Mr. Stanley) who preceded him, when he ascribed the miseries of the poor to over population. Why, in England there were two acres of land to every human soul in the country, while in Saxony land, one of the most prosperous countries in Europe, there was only one acre to every inhabitant."

This is true; and let it be remembered that Switzerland is the only country in Europe in which trade is perfectly free. Instead of a surplus population, if our lands were cultivated in the way our best farmers cultivate their farms, there would be an actual deficiency of rural labourers. The following extract from a Suffolk paper offers a fearful practical comment on the falsehoods put forth by the Monopolists and their organs as to the benefits—save the mark!—the farming labourers enjoy under the existing system of restriction:—

"SPREAD OF INCENDIARISM.—Within the last few days fires have occurred at Chippenham, Wicken, South Lopham, North Lopham, at Foulton, Exning, Barton Mill, Rattleaden Hall, Buxhall, Coddensham, and Thetford: we omit to notice three or four conflagrations believed to have originated accidentally."

And amongst the suggestions put forth by the Blyth Union Association, formed in the same county for the protection of agricultural property from incendiarism, as the best means of arresting the crime, are these, which speak volumes against the system the majority of landowners are banded together to maintain. They are—

"6. By adopting every possible means of giving constant employment to the agricultural labourers through out the year, and of paying them according to the work performed, and not according to their necessities."

"7. By pressing upon the attention of the members, composed of landlords, land-agents, and tenant-farmers, the importance of carrying out the spirit of the 8th resolution, by devising means of increasing labour in such a manner as will secure to the employer a return equivalent to the additional outlay, without which the occupier cannot afford the expense consequent upon such increase of labour."

This implies a repeal of the Corn Laws.

THE FOREIGN COMPETITION FALLACY.

We have often shown that the largest imaginable importation of foreign corn can do little more than prevent an undue disturbance in our own markets in periods of deficiency; and the present state of the barley trade serves as an illustration to some extent of what would occur under a Free Trade. Our readers will have seen that the prospect of a great deficiency, if not a total failure, of the barley crops was last week apprehended; and another week of continued drought, without the least sign of rain, has since rendered that failure more and more likely. Under these circumstances, the price of barley having risen to the rate which admits practically of foreign importation, considerable quantities have been imported; and what do our readers imagine is the consequence of this "inundation of foreign barley," which the Monopolist lords and squires have affected so much to dread? We will answer by calling an unexceptionable witness, a monopolist organ, the Mark-lane Express, which, in its "Review of the British Corn Trade," thus refers to barley:—

"Barley continues to excite considerable attention, and, notwithstanding the magnitude of the arrivals from abroad, previous prices have been fully supported at all the leading ports (Of English the supplies have been quite insignificant, and it is highly probable that all which may still come forward from continental ports will be required by distillers. The greater proportion of what has been imported has passed into second hands, and, with about one-half of the quantity bought abroad during the winter and spring already in this country, there is no perceptible accumulation of stocks."

Here, then, we have an open foreign trade in barley, at prices perhaps some 4s. or 5s. a quarter higher than might have existed had the trade been free. Barley can now come in from all parts of the world; much has come in; and yet it has only prevented the consumers of barley from being visited with an exorbitantly high price in anticipation of the expected deficiency. Thus we learn from the same authority, that—

"With English barley we have been sparingly supplied, and nearly the whole of the 38,207 qrs. arrived from abroad having gone to distillers direct, the display of samples at Mark Lane has been moderate. Holders of this grain have manifested no anxiety to force sales, and though the disposition to purchase received a check by the showery weather on Friday, former prices were fully supported."

And to the same effect Messrs. Harris and Sons, corn-factors, say—

"Of foreign barley we have again to notice a very large arrival, but so much of it had been sold previously to shipment, that there is very little pressing on the market; and we cannot quote any alteration in value. The little fine English which has appeared has been taken off at full prices."

A little dispassionate observation of the facts and evidence which their own business presents, would soon lead farmers—whatever might be the case with mortgaged landlords—to become Free-Traders.

A FARMER'S DOUBTS.

The following letter from a Scotch farmer embodies the doubts which the agriculturists of that part of the country entertain with respect to the operation of free trade in corn upon their business. The Scotch farmers have leases, and some of them, like our correspondent, have laid hold of the notion that free trade in corn would produce the great reductions of price which are assumed in this letter. This is a mere chimera, which any cornfactor's circular would dissipate. For the purpose, however, of enabling farmers to examine the question, we publish the letter:—

To the EDITOR of the ANTI-CORN LAW LEAGUE.

"Whithorn, April 20, 1844.
SIR,—We Scotch farmers, who in general hold leases of land for nineteen years, are hence induced to lay out our money freely in improvements at the expiry of our 'back,' as we call it, from a reasonable hope of profitable repayment in course of its expiry. But, if the Corn Laws are abolished, the value of our produce will likely decline, our capital will be lost, and we shall be thrown at the feet of (with exceptions) a cold-hearted and rapacious aristocracy. How can you expect us in these circumstances to join your League? You say, Oh, this state of things will compel the landlords to make a new arrangement with their tenants; and no doubt it will; but will it be an equitable one while all the power of doing so is in the landlords' side? No, it will not; and in such a crisis you promise the Scotch farmers no help. Our English brethren, having no leases, are in a better predicament. We often marvel that you never propose to legislate for our safety or vested interest, concurrently with a Corn-Law abolition bill. We dare not speak out on our own behalf, without risk of our landlords' displeasure, which we do not wish to incur, when at every change of the Corn Laws our fortunes are placed at their disposal; and we are hence rendered more subservient than even the tenants at will."

"Why do you not propose along with a Corn Law repeal bill, a landlord-and-tenant equitable adjustment clause, with simple machinery for its working? If we had this fair play, we don't care how soon the Corn Laws perish; but further change without such a provision would be cruel and unjust to us. In the event of a considerable fall in the value of corn, some of us could still pay our rents, in consequence of much capital previously sunk in improvements; but we would lose all the profit we otherwise ought to have gained, as that outlay capital would go just to maintain the rent up to its present point, solely for the landlords' benefit. Can you wonder, therefore, at our aversion against you?"

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
A FARMER."

"P.S.—EQUITABLE ADJUSTMENT PLAN.
"In Scotland the yearly average price of corn in each county is determined every year by a competent jury and evidence, and the verdict is called the 'fair price' of wheat, barley, or oats, &c. When a farmer offers a yearly rent for a new lease, he considers what the average price of corn has been for the last few years—say for the last five or six years—and calculating that prices may probably remain through the lease as they were then, being told so also by the landlord, and relying on the stability of the laws of the country, he offers rent for it proportionably. But if protection (to which, to be sure, he has no just right) is taken off, the farmer is undone. Well, here is a plan of an adjustment that is equitable in a tillage farm, viz., if the average 'fair price' of barley, wheat, or oats (according as either or both are grown on the farm), for the five years preceding a tenant's entry on his lease, induced him to promise a certain rent, what should he pay when, after protection is removed, the annual 'fair price' is so much lower? Or thus— if the 'fair price' of wheat for the five years preceding that on which he began his lease, averaging 48s. per quarter, led him to take his farm at £300 a year, what should he pay when, without protection, corn falls to 32s. per quarter? Answer £200. To this proportion we surely ought to be legally entitled; and it ought not to be left in the power of a landlord to say, after our funds are expended on his land, and prices, in consequence of altered legislation, fall, we will give no abatement of rent, but we will take the farm off your hands."

To reason upon the supposition that wheat is to fall to 32s. a quarter by reason of Free Trade would be merely absurd, for all evidence goes to show that such a fall is impossible; but assuming some reduction from the act of Parliament prices—or even from the "fair prices," which are real—there is no reason to suppose that the Scotch farmers have not partaken of the error of their English brethren, and staked too much upon their grain crops. Besides, if prices have sometimes been forced up unnaturally by the Corn Laws, they have been at other times no less unnaturally depressed by the system, of which the Corn Laws form the corner-stone. High prices, though only temporary, have stimulated the growth of extra breadth of grain crops, which for a year or two greatly increase the quantity of grain in the market, and at the same time materially reduce the consumption. A careful review of the prices of corn, and the state of the corn trade during the last thirty years, would show our correspondent that the fears he expresses are founded on reasoning wholly fallacious, and a state of circumstances purely imaginary.

A VOICE FROM THE FAR WEST.

In one of his able articles on English agriculture, in the Agricultural Society's Journal, Mr. Pusey concludes a comparison of what has been done in husbandry with what yet remains to be done, by saying that, after all, he was surprised to find how much good husbandry exists in the country. Just so it is with regard to Free-Trade opinions amongst farmers. A deputation from the League, or the Anti-Corn-Law lecturers, or perchance the loud-voiced but empty promoters of a Protection society, arouse the rural population of a remote district from the apathetic ignorance with which they had been accustomed to accept for gospel the squire's or the land-agent's nonsense about the Corn Laws; and forthwith it is discovered that here and there, amidst the isolation of the farmers' habits and occupations, there are shrewd active-minded men who have worked out for themselves the problem that it is by increased production alone that the farmer can hope to permanently better his condition. The following letter from a Devonshire farmer, which appeared in a Monopolist local journal, illustrates our remarks, and forms a significant sign of the times:—

(From Trewhman's Exeter Flying Post for Wednesday, May 2.)
"TO THE LANDOWNERS AND FARMERS OF ENGLAND.—The time is now arrived when the long-dormant energies of the English agriculturists are about to be aroused, and they are about to follow the example and imitate the energies of the scientific manufacturers of their beloved country.
"I will say one word to the landlords, and I do so with the best of motives. I find in Scotland the farmers pay their labourers 12s. per week and pay larger rents for land than are paid in England. How is this? I will tell you. In Scotland the land is let on lease for 19 or 20 years; this gives the tenant an interest in the estate, and enables him to pay a much better rent than he could if he had a seven years' lease, or no lease at all. In fact, no lease is better than a lease of seven years, for when he uses the estate as many men use a borrowed horse. Sufficient for the day is enough for the good thereof. Therefore, gentlemen, you are the cause of the land not being well farmed, and a good deal of the England does not produce double the quantity of food for the use of men. This double production would give double employment, and make us a united and happy people, through every grade of society, from the high station of our beloved Queen up to the throne, down to the poorest peasant in the field. I admit I have laid a heavy and grievous charge on the landlords, or on those who come under it; but allow me to say I do not consider it is in the power of the landlords to make English farmers generally follow the example of Scotchmen, because it is a well-known fact that, in the West of England, above half of the agriculturists are wrapped up in the prejudices of their grandfathers and grandmothers, which run through families, like corn and bunions, from one generation to another. The new light that has sprung up in our land will open the eyes of all who are to be saved, and the Catholics must go to the wall. Why do Richard Roe and John Doe recommend short leases? Because they get paid for three leases, or, I should say, six in twenty-one years, instead of two for the same period; for I believe it is usual to make one for the landlord, and one for the tenant, whether it be seven or twenty-one years' term. This has been a great stumbling-block to England's prosperity, and can only be removed by gentlemen turning their attention to their own affairs, and not trusting to the shillings that care not for the sheep but for the skins. I do not wish to say one word against the highly-talented and respectable body of gentlemen connected with the law and laws of England, but I do say, they are the last men, in this or any other country, who should be employed to superintend farming, and the management of land. Gentlemen, employ or reward intellectual men, and men who understand agriculture, who can give instruction to your tenants, as is the case in Scotland. At all times be careful not to let your estates to those walking statues, to whom nature has given hands, but forgot to give them brains. I am glad to be able to say, and can bear testimony, that there are many, and very many, among the tillers of the ground, bright and noble examples to be seen, as stars in the west, both in Devon and Cornwall, and soon will be the barons, or the lights set on the hill for the guide of our land-marines and our national guardmen.

"One word to you, farmers, who never intend to alter. I beg to assure you, that the time will soon arrive when you must stand out of the way for brighter men, and brighter minds must occupy the lands that you now mismanage. The dog will not be always allowed to lie in the manger, because starvation will push him out, and poverty will prevent his return."

"I do not profess to be a prophet or a conjuror, but I do say that those who read the history of England, and the debates in our Parliament in less than half a century to come, will be surprised to see that the Government were puzzled to find food and employment for 25 millions of people for several years together, and that money was plenty and work scarce. What will that generation say to our wisdom? I will say but another word, and this is finished. Before fifty years are passed over our heads, fifty millions of inhabitants will find plenty of food, the produce of England's land, and the whole nation eventually will be as a garden, and mankind will be the gardeners. Then will arrive that which will be done by the spade—then will be the deliverance of the able-bodied people from the unions and workhouses. I do not hesitate to say that the land of England does not produce one-half of what it may be made to produce, if managed with judgment, energy, perseverance, &c. &c.; and, by a continued perseverance, you might quadruple your present production. I invite you to come and see what my little farm produces, and then you are beloved to go and do likewise—better if you can: I should like to see it."

"With the highest respect, and the best feelings, allow me to say that all I have said is for the purpose of bringing out the energy, and work into action the great resources that Providence has so bountifully bestowed on this happy land. I say happy land—it can be made so, if we are minded to do it. You must put your shoulder to the wheel, and your foot on the spade, and you will find the land always honest and grateful, and return you fifty, sixty, and one hundred fold for your outlay."

"Yours, respectfully,

"NICHOLAS TUCKETT."

"N.B. When I took my farm at Heavitree, from the profit I could not afford to pay 6s. per week to a labourer as well as I can now pay 10s. or 12s., because the land now produces three times as much. As to the Corn League (?) I think it will prove a great good, as nothing less than a huge monster will ever frighten our old prejudices away; and be assured the increasing population of England of one thousand per day coming into the world beyond those who go out of it, WILL SOON REPEAL THE CORN LAW, if you do not set yourselves in good earnest to cause the land to produce a large supply of food."

CONDITION OF THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.—

The Western Times, in noticing the dinner of the Torrington Agricultural Society, held on Saturday week, and which was presided over by the Rev. Mr. Johnson of Wembworthy, says:—"The Torrington Society was established in 1808, for the improvement of stock and the advancement of the condition of the labourer. How the North Devon stock has been improved the triumphant records of the leading agricultural exhibitions of all England will abundantly testify. How the circumstances and condition of the labourer have been advanced, hear the Rev. Chairman.—With regard to the condition of the labourer, he would not say much. It was not the question whether he should have 8s. a week or any other sum; for he was free to say, generally, that the state of the markets would not permit any increase of wages; but he would impress on them the great benefits which would accrue from a more general introduction of the allotment system, which would employ their leisure with profit to themselves. He then referred to the miserable condition of the labourers' cottages. He said a man living in a glass house should not throw stones, and he would frankly acknowledge that he had cottages not well arranged as to their interior parts, while the exteriors were not in good condition. But while he hoped to correct these things himself, should he hope to be enabled to induce others at once to see to the correction of what is a crying evil. (Hear, hear.) He said it from a melancholy conviction of the degree of truth which attaches to this picture, that it is impossible the labouring classes can live herded up together as they are, without distinction of age or sex, and at the same time maintain their moral attitude as Christians. (Hear, hear.) Here are the parents and their children—the father, the mother, their sons and daughters—all probably having a sleeping room in common. There is no separation of the sexes—no distinction as to the situation or age; and could any one wonder that but too frequent instances of depravity were the result? It was a consequence of indiscriminate and indecent mixture like this, that at an early age, and before its value probably was perfectly understood and known, that that which constitutes the true honour of woman was parted with, and, in the place of what might have been an ornament, a polluted member was thrust forth on society. (Hear, hear.) There is something very humbling and painful in the contrast between what has been done in this district for the brute beasts which perish, and what has been left undone for man, our fellow man, made in the image of his Eternal Maker, and endowed with an eternal soul."

REVIEW.

Heeren's Researches into the Commerce of Ancient Nations. (English and French translations.) Oxford and London, Talboys; Paris and London, Didot and Co.

The French translation of Heeren's Researches adds many valuable notes and illustrations which we should gladly see incorporated in the English version, particularly as they tend to develop the notices of ancient commerce contained in the Sacred Scriptures, and both to elucidate and confirm the narratives of the inspired writers. We deem that we shall be performing an acceptable service if we occasionally direct the attention of our readers to some of the commercial subjects incidentally mentioned in the Bible, for the purpose of showing on the one hand that the principles of Free Trade are strongly confirmed by that historical record whose truth cannot be questioned, and of exhibiting on the other the strong confirmations of Holy Writ which the researches of modern scholars and travellers continually bring to light.

In both points of view Egypt has the first claim upon our attention. The Pharaohs ruled over a settled nation, devoted to agricultural and commercial pursuits, ere the Assyrians had ceased to be hunters, or the Semitic races had advanced beyond the condition of wandering pastoral tribes. Civilization had reached an advanced stage in the valley of the Nile long before the banks of the Euphrates had been cultivated or the plough passed over the lands irrigated by the streams of Syria and Palestine. The spindle and the loom were at work in the land of Ham, while the rest of the ancient world knew no better material for clothing than strips of bark or skins of beasts.

Egypt finds a place in biblical history at a very early period. We need not refer to profane history for proofs of the connexion between the ancient Egyptians and the various nomad races of Shepherd-kings, to which the Hebrews belonged. Abraham, the founder of their race, visited Egypt, and entered into friendly relations with its ruler. Hagar, and perhaps other natives of Egypt, accompanied him on his return to Canaan. There is even reason to believe that, during this visit, he profited by the learning of the Egyptians; for the records of his family history become much more ample and minute in their details after the account of the patriarch's visit to Egypt. Joseph, the great-grandson of Abraham, was the vizier of one of the Pharaohs, and obtained as a reward for his services the grant of a frontier province to his father and brethren. The settlement of the Jews in Goshen seems to have prospered, until "another king arose who knew not Joseph"—an expression which clearly intimates a change of dynasty. Consequently, as the descendants of Joseph, previous to that event, lived on terms of amity with their neighbours of Mizraim, they must have profited by their superior civilization, and borrowed from them their instruments of agriculture, of commerce, and of luxury. Finally, the Jewish legislator was "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians;" and his ceremonial laws contain many traces of usages derived from a Pagan race, accommodated to a nobler faith and a purer worship.

Before entering further into the subject it will be convenient to give a brief geographical description of the country.

"Egypt (says Herodotus) is a land of marvels, and excels all others in mighty works;"—"Egypt (says the prophet Jeremiah) is like a fair heifer;" and certainly there is no country of such limited extent so rich in the wonders of nature and of art. No people of ancient or modern times bears so strongly the mark and impress of locality as the Egyptian: the character, the habits, and the feelings of the nation were moulded by the nature of their country, and in an extraordinary degree identified with its climate and its soil. From the earliest antiquity Egypt has been called the gift of the Nile, not because the land was formed by its successive deposits, but because the irrigation and fertility of the soil depend entirely on the overflowings of the river, without which Egypt would have shared the fate of the districts by which it is surrounded, and remained partly a sandy waste and partly a stony desert. To this remarkable feature in the physical geography of the country the prophet Ezekiel alludes in his denunciation of divine vengeance against Egypt, "The land of Egypt shall be desolate and waste, and they shall know that I am the Lord; because he hath said, the river is mine, and I have made it. Behold therefore I am against thee and against thy rivers, and I will make the land of Egypt utterly waste."—(Ezek. xxix. 9, 10.) From the cataracts on the southern frontier of Egypt the Nile flows in one uninterrupted course through a valley bounded on each side by a mountain chain, extending to a length of more than four hundred miles. Where this valley ends, the stream divides and forms by its branches the fertile part of Lower Egypt called the Delta, and also several marshes, which are less extensive now than they were in ancient times. The Delta indeed may be literally called the gift of the Nile, for its deposits of mud and slime have, by their annual accumulations, gradually raised the soil in the long course of centuries, and converted pools and marshes into profitable land. But the valley was anciently regarded as Egypt Proper, for Ezekiel describes the country as extending "from Migdol to Syene and the borders of Ethiopia."*—(Ezek. xxix. 10.) The rugged mountains which enclose this valley in some places approach very near the brink of the river, so as to leave but a narrow space susceptible of cultivation, and sometimes recede to a considerable distance; but it may be generally stated that there is an average breadth of from nine to twelve miles between the barren rocks forming the base of the mountains and the margin of the stream. This valley was the earliest seat of European civilization, and in it were erected those stupendous works of architecture whose magnitude has enabled them to resist the hand of time and the more destructive ravages of barbarians.

At all times the Egyptians have been sensible of their entire dependence upon the Nile for the means of subsistence, and for their very existence as a nation: this feeling, combined with the natural tendency of man to superstition, induced the ancient Egyptians to deify their river, and assign it priests, festivals, and sacrifices. Even now, under the strict prohibition of idolatry by the Mahomedan law, extraordinary reverence is shown to "The Most Holy River," as it is usually called, and solemn forms of prayer and thanksgiving are appointed for the days upon which its waters begin to rise.

While the overflowing of a river is in most lands the signal of calamity, and diffuses universal consternation, the rising of the waters of the Nile is hailed as the promise of fertility and abundance, and is therefore welcomed by benedictions and thanksgivings. The inundation was typified by the image of Cneph, the father of the Gods, pouring forth water from a vase, by which the fertilizing influence of the river and its presumed celestial source were equally represented. The mystery which shrouds the source of the Nile has been in all ages the prolific source of Egyptian superstitions: even at the present day many native Egyptians, both Christians and Mohammedans, believe that the Nile flows from the terrestrial paradise, to which they add that it is a perfect copy of the celestial river which flows through the mansions of the blessed.

* Marginal Translation.
