These circumstances illustrate the terrific effect that must have been produced by the first plague which was inflicted by Moses at the divine command, the turning of the waters into blood, especially if we recollect that the object of Pharaoh's visit to the river was probably to observe the rising of the waters, a custom which has been invariably observed by all the rulers of Egypt, whatever was their origin. It is mentioned as a most striking result that the Egyptians "loathed to drink of the waters of the river." The salubrity and excellence of the waters of the Nile have ever been the theme of praise both with natives and foreigners. So nutritious were its qualities supposed to be that the priests withheld it from their sacred bull Apis, lest the use of it should make him too fat. The natives at the present day frequently stimulate themselves to an artificial thirst for the waters of the delicious stream by eating quantities of salt, and the Egyptians in foreign lands speak of nothing with so much enthusiasm as the delight they will receive from drinking the waters of the Nile on their return. But, though the waters of the Nile are thus pre-eminently good, that of all the wells in Egypt is so brackish as to be scarcely fit for use. It is recorded as a fearful aggravation of the first plague of Egypt that "the fish that was in the river died."—(Exod. vii. 21.) The first great complaint of the Israelites when they murmured against Moses in the desert was, "We remember the fish that we did eat in Egypt freely."—(Numbers, xi. 5.) And this abundance of fish was still further increased by the ponds, sluices, and artificial lakes which were constructed for the propagation of the finny tribe. Hence Isaiah, in denouncing divine vengeance against the Egyptians, dwells particularly on the ruin which would fall upon those who derived their subsistence from the animals and plants of the Nile: "And the waters shall fail from the sea, and the river shall be wasted and dried up. And they shall turn the rivers far away; and the brooks of defence shall be emptied and dried up: the reeds and flags shall wither. The paper reeds by the brooks, by the mouth of the brooks, and everything sown by the brooks, shall wither, be driven away, and be no more. The fishers also shall mourn, and all they that cast angle into the brooks shall lament, and they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish. Moreover, they that work in fine flax, and they that weave net works, shall be confounded. And they shall be broken in the purposes thereof, all that make sluices and ponds for fish."—(Isaiah, xix. 5, 10.)

The supply of fish has not failed in modern times; the rod and line of the present day differs little from that depicted on the monuments; and on the lakes may be seen the immense nets which the pictorial records show to have been employed in the days of the Pharaohs.

"The small village of Agaltah, at Thebes," says Mr. Wilkinson, "pays annually 1500 piastres (about £21) to Government for the fish of its canal;" and Mr. Michaud informs us that the fisheries of the Lake Menzaleh yield an annual revenue of more than £8000 to Mohammed Ali.

The subjoined engraving exhibits the fisherman taking his store to market: it is probable that a small fish of the trout species, which is still regarded as a delicacy in Egypt, was preserved in the covered vessels, to save it from being injured by the heat of the sun.

The Egyptians were the first nation which history records as curing meat and fish with salt for preservation. The trade of preserving fish appears to have been more dignified than that of catching them, for the curers and salters are superior in look and general bearing to the fishermen. Diodorus Siculus informs us that twenty-two kinds of fish are found in the Lake Moeris, and that the numbers taken in his day were so great that, though a vast multitude of salters were engaged in curing them, they could with difficulty accomplish their allotted task.

The fishes were divided longitudinally by a short wide knife, not unlike that which is sometimes used for splitting cod-fish at Newfoundland. They were cured with fossil salt, procured from the African desert; for sea salt, like other marine productions, was deemed impure. Sea fish could not be used for the same reason; and Plutarch tells us that the priests abstained from every kind of fish, thinking them impure on account of their possible communication with the sea.

Here we shall pause for the present, though we have not yet enumerated all the arts of life connected with the Nile in Egypt. We shall resume the subject at an early opportunity.

 We have received Mr. Disraeli's new work, "Coningsby," but must reluctantly defer our notice of it until next week.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received the letters of our foreign correspondent from Ostend and Ghent, which shall appear in our next. We have also received an admirable letter from a friend of Edinburgh in reply to Mr. Macaulay's letter, but for the last hour at which it reached us, we are obliged to postpone its insertion to next week. From a press of other matter we are again obliged to postpone several notices to correspondents.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, May 13, 1844.

The men of South Lancashire are nobly exerting themselves to fulfil the expectations which they have taught the country to form. Mr. Brown's address to the constituency in Liverpool, and Mr. Cobden's energetic speech in Manchester, have excited a generous enthusiasm which promises the most glorious results. The Free-Traders have nobly flung all party names, titles, and associations to the winds: they regard monopoly as their only foe, whether it be maintained by Tory, Whig, or Radical, and they look upon freedom of trade as their only friend, whether its principles be professed by Conservative or by Liberal.

No man could unite more happily than Mr. Brown the qualities which should attract support from the different classes of a district so peculiarly situated. And how well does his Liverpool speech put the question as relates to the agriculturists:—"About the year 1784, when the first bag of cotton was imported, the population (of South Lancashire) dependent upon agriculture was 52,000; the whole population of Lancashire being about 300,000. In 1800 it had risen to 600,000; and at this time it is 1,600,000. I am sure there is not an individual who hears me, or who will read what I say, but will say that that increase has conferred an incalculable benefit upon the landed proprietary." Truly, it must. And what will their lands be worth should the policy of Monopoly be persisted in till it turns back the wheel, and pauperizes, and drives to desperation, these multitudes whom commerce has created? Could men pause for reflection in the turmoil of electoral contest, here is matter to "make those think who never thought before."

The Monopolist candidate, Mr. Entwistle, in spite of his proclaimed disposition "to retain in a modified form the principle of a fluctuating duty," has found it necessary to render homage to the increased intelligence which the exertions of the League have diffused, and, while he hints his dislike to that body, he is forced to pay a reluctant tribute of respect to the principles they have promulgated. Hypocrisy has been described as the tribute which vice pays to virtue; and Mr. Entwistle's shuffling and equivocal adoption of the principles of commercial freedom is a similar example of homage to the League extorted from an enemy. The triumph of that body is thus to be rendered similar to that of the Roman conquerors, who were forced to take a slave into their chariot as they ascended to the Capitol. Seriously speaking, we have never seen an electioneering address which more clearly pointed out to voters the imperative duty of rejecting its author, than that which has been put forward by the rejected of Manchester. Mr. Entwistle declares that freedom of trade is essential to the prosperity and almost to the salvation of the constituency he aspires to represent; and at the same time informs them that he has had in a store of shuffling evasions and shirking excuses to prevent their obtaining the boon. We have already stated that South Lancashire will be disgraced if it should fail to return a Free-Trader; but if, after Mr. Entwistle's address, such a constituency should choose such a man as their representative, they will merit the shout of contemptuous ridicule with which the announcement of their choice will be hailed from Caithness to Cornwall—they will have earned the scorn with which their name will be pronounced from China to Peru.

But we confidently hope better things: we see the names of men mingling in the contest which in former struggles for freedom held a foremost place in the rolls of dearly-earned victory; we find the young animated by an honourable ambition to emulate the disinterested patriotism of their sires; we observe that many who have hitherto avoided all share in political strife have come forward at this crisis to do their duty to their county, their order, and themselves; and though last, not least, we see that many who had been previously trammelled by the old associations of party and the bonds of political fellowship, have burst their fetters and joined themselves to the increasing band of those who seek for freedom of commerce, extension of manufacture, justice to intelligent enterprise, fair remuneration to the operatives, and the common interests of all classes in our common country.

FREE-TRADE BAZAAR.

We omitted last week to state that the Bazaar intended to be held in Covent Garden Theatre, London, was fixed for the month of July next. The friends of Free Trade in this neighbourhood, therefore, ought to be prompt and active in their exertions to collect and forward contributions. There should be no delay about arrangements for stall-keeping, or display; but the details should be left to the committee in London—all care and attention here being devoted to the procurement of an abundant supply of materials for sale.

The importance of strengthening the hands of Free-Traders by all legitimate means was never more apparent than at present. A few months since, the League was treated by the Monopolist journals, and by Tory peers and members of Parliament, as a mere parcel of "low-bred manufacturers, and peddling shopkeepers." Now, the association constitutes a "Great Fact" everywhere; operating upon the House of Commons, within the walls and without, in driving even Peel and Graham into "movement," and in influencing the election of genuine representatives at places where heretofore length of purse has borne down all regard to principle. The enemies of the people, feeling the gradually overwhelming power opposed to them, have hence taken to denouncing the League as a dangerous body; whereas, but lately they reviled it as a contemptible one.—Kendal Mercury.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE ELECTION.

Shrewsbury, May 15, 1844.

MR. EDITOR.—The writer of the enclosed (given below), who resides in Oxford, is, as you will perceive, an elector for South Lancashire; and in addition has also votes for Manchester, Shrewsbury, and Oxford. Those votes, I regret to say, have hitherto been recorded in favour of Monopoly; but, thanks to the noble exertions of the League, their convincing and unanswerable pamphlets, together with the LEAGUE newspaper, which I have been in the habit of sending to Oxford weekly,—I say, thanks to the educational course of the League, the Monopolists have received their last vote from F. Rose.

The father of the writer is a tenant-farmer, occupying from 800 to 1000 acres in the neighbourhood of Oxford; and, like many more of his class, once thought his existence depended upon the continuance of the Corn Laws. Upon the publication of the three prize essays by Messrs. Hope, Greg, and Morse, I lost no time in forwarding a copy home, and I had very soon the gratifying intelligence that I need not "send any more Anti-Corn Law tracts, as he was quite satisfied of the injustice of the protective system, and that he was become an out-and-out Free Trader." The same pamphlet, to my own knowledge, was the means of inducing three other farmers to examine the question in all its bearings. The result was, two of the three became total repealers; the other wants a fixed duty. I have no doubt there are hundreds of similar cases.

Should the League succeed at the approaching contest, it will indeed be a triumph, a glorious victory of just principles over aristocratic tyranny and oppression.

I am, Mr. Editor, yours, &c., W. B. R.

Oxford, May 14, 1844.

DEAR BROTHER,—Yours I received this morning, and with it another, intimating that if I would vote for the Tory candidate (Entwistle) now in the field for South Lancashire, my expenses would be allowed. However, I cannot say whether I shall go down or not; but I shall, if I do go, most decidedly support that man (be he who he may) who will vote for a repeal of the Corn Laws; I do not now consider that a party question; it is one, as Brown says, "of vital importance," and I say it is one of justice and humanity, due to the half-fed millions of this country. Send me all the communications from that quarter as soon as you receive them. If I should go down I shall most likely make Salop in my way down or up.

Yours truly, FRED. ROSE.

EXETER ELECTION.

May 15, 1844.

SIR,—On reading in your valuable paper the account of the base, tyrannical treatment inflicted on the young man Snowden, for no other crime than the exercise of the dearest principle every freeborn Englishman, when privileged, should fearlessly record as his conscience dictates, I confess my heart recoiled at the mean oppression, and I determined to use my humble effort among friends who abhorred such conduct, in raising a small sum to assist him in the time of need, and cheer him on, for the noble courage so boldly displayed.

I trust the hint may not be lost, "That many may help one." The enclosed sum of £1 14s. from myself and friends, with the few remarks, if worthy of a place in your crowded columns, you will be so kind as to acknowledge, and forward to him as soon as possible.

I remain, very truly yours,

19, Little Pulteney-street, J. W. HUTCHINSON.
Golden-square.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEMORIALS.

GATESHEAD.—The requisition to Mr. Hutt, M.P., requesting him to vote for Mr. Villiers's motion, has been despatched to the honourable member by George Crawshaw, Esq., the secretary of the Gateshead Free-Trade Society. The electors were canvassed indiscriminately.

At the only contested election for the representation of the borough, which took place in 1837, the total number of electors polled was 387; of whom 236 voted for Mr. Rippon, and 151 for Mr. Williamson. The number of electors on the roll is 566. Two or three of those who signed the requisition expressed their willingness to accept a fixed duty, as an instalment of justice.—Gateshead Observer.

WESTBURY.—A requisition, signed by 201 electors of this borough, has been forwarded to Sir Ralph Lopez, asking him to vote for Mr. Villiers's motion for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. When it is considered that there are only 383 voters' names on the register, and that of that number four are dead, and one name is entered twice, such a document ought to have great weight with the honourable baronet.—Wills Independent.

FREE-TRADE PRINCIPLES are walking on at a steady pace in this agricultural county. The Totness electors have a requisition addressed to their sitting members, now lying for signature at the Guildhall, requesting them to vote for Mr. Villiers's motion for the abolition of the Corn Law. The Free-Traders of Exeter have also met and appointed local committees to watch the registration.—Western Times.

ANTI-CORN-LAW TRACTS.—Within the last few days, the Anti-Corn-Law tracts have been distributed in the townships of Idle, North Bierley, Thornton, and Clayton.

REAL WEALTH.—The only test of the increase of natural wealth is the possession of an increased quantity of useful things in the aggregate.

THE SLIDING SCALE.—A vessel arrived at Bristol, after custom-house hours, with a cargo of foreign barley; and the next day (Thursday) being a holiday in commemoration of her Majesty's birthday, she could not be reported, or discharge her cargo. The delay occasioned a loss of £10 to the consignees, in consequence of the duty advancing to 6s. per quarter on the Friday. The corn-merchants were no doubt lost in admiration of the "sliding scale."—Gateshead Observer.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, May 13.—There was a good supply of English Wheat at market this morning, early in the day it was held firmly at the prices of this day week, but the best samples only met a sale, inferior descriptions were less lower, and some remained unsold at the close of the market though offered at the decline. In addition to the large quantity of Barley that appears in the return, a considerable number of vessels arrived in time for this day's market; notwithstanding the continuance of dry weather there was more disposition to make sales than last week, but we cannot quote prices lower. Beans were less dearer, the supply was short. Peas fully maintain last week's rates. A good many vessels have arrived with Irish Oats since Friday; there was a fair attendance of country buyers, but the high prices asked prevented an extensive sale; the business done was at last week's rates.

FRIDAY, May 17.—The supplies of foreign Wheat and Barley, and of Irish Oats, are large this week, but a considerable proportion of the latter arrived in time for Monday's market. There is very little business doing in Wheat, either English or foreign, at Monday's rates. There is rather more disposition to press sales of Barley, but prices on the whole, are maintained. The quantity of English Beans offering is very small, and needy buyers are compelled to give higher prices. The few parcels of Egyptian are held at 2 s. to 2 1/2 s. in bond, and at corresponding prices, duty paid. The trade in Oats is not brisk, but the holders are firm, and the business doing is at Monday's rates.

The Council respectfully request that their friends, in all places where committees for raising subscriptions to the £100,000 Fund have not been already formed, will proceed to their formation as soon as possible, and transmit their names to the LEAGUE Offices, Manchester.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE.

There can be no greater error than that which has been studiously set forward in the monopolist papers, that the agriculturists of South Lancashire have no interest distinct from that of the manufacturers in the coming election. Landlords and tenants, proprietors and farmers, the owners and the cultivators of the soil in that district, owe all their prosperity to the profitable markets which the establishment of manufactures has provided for agricultural produce. Mills have drained the moors, and factories bestowed fertility on the moors; the spindle has given motion to the plough, and the shuttle has guided the harrow. There are localities which, within the memory of man, were productive only of rushes, now covered with the most lucrative of all crops, substantial houses, yielding to the landowner a larger rent per square yard than he could previously have obtained per acre. For any proprietor, then, to set himself against the further extension and expansion of trade is base ingratitude in reference to the past, and little short of idiocy in reference to the future. When Mr. Entwistle avers that the manufacturers have too much trade, he virtually asserts that the landowners on or near whose grounds factories are established have too much rent; and when he aims a blow at the profits of the millowner, he equally threatens injury to the wages of the operative and the income of the landed proprietor. They are equally dependent on each other, and he who injures one injures all.

The dairy-farmers of South Lancashire are more prosperous than their brethren in any other part of England, because the towns and villages which have formed themselves around the great manufacturing establishments afford a ready market for their cheese, their butter, and their milk. They have learned by bitter experience that they are deeply interested in the prosperity of trade; for at every season of manufacturing distress they have found the demand for their produce diminish with alarming rapidity, inflicting upon them a certain and ruinous loss, as they were not prepared to make arrangements for sending to a more distant market. When Mr. Entwistle denounces the extension of commercial enterprise and manufacturing industry, he virtually tells the dairy-farmers that they ought not to be able to sell their milk at their own doors; that they should not dispose of their butter and cheese at a profitable price to their next neighbours; but that they should look to some more remote market where their produce would bring a less price, independent of the toil and expense of carriage.

The grain and the esculent vegetables of South Lancashire more immediately remunerate their growers, because they can sell them within a few miles of the fields on which they have been harvested. They have to pay no freight for the transport of their corn to a remote mart; they have to support no waggon-train to carry their productions to distant purchasers. All that they produce is consumed upon the spot; they have a certain and steady demand; they have, while trade prospers, safe and profitable customers. All the Corn Laws that the perverted ingenuity of Monopolists could devise would not confer upon them one tithe of the advantages which they derive from having a market provided close to their hand, and customers brought to their own doors. Every farmer that votes against the extension of trade in South Lancashire—and no extension of trade is practicable save through its complete emancipation from the fetters by which it is constrained, trammelled, and restricted—every farmer, we say, that gives his support to such principles as those which Mr. Entwistle has advocated virtually lends his aid to close his best markets against himself, and to drive away from his doors his best customers.

We have always protested against the fraudulent and iniquitous attempts to draw a distinction between the interests of agriculture and manufactures. Agriculture is itself a species of manufacture, and, like all other manufactures, can only prosper by the prosperity of its customers. It makes as much difference to the farmer whether there are many or few to buy his corn, as it does to the hatter whether there are many or few to buy his hats; the grower of food is as much injured by the inability of his regular customers to purchase his produce as the maker of stockings is by their inability to procure coverings for their feet. Compulsory starvation and compulsory nakedness are injurious not only to the actual sufferer, but also to those whom under other circumstances he would employ to supply his wants. Producers of every kind, whether from the field or the loom, the pasture or the workshop, the dairy or the mill, are dependent for their prosperity on the consumers, and cannot injure their customers without injuring themselves. If the man who is coming to purchase the farmer's milk is robbed on the road, he loses his sustenance, but the farmer also has his milk left on his hands. Monopoly notoriously strips the operative on his way to market, and the farmer is consequently damaged to the full amount of the injury done to his customer.

Obvious as are these truths, they have tenfold force in application to South Lancashire; the farmers there have no security whatever for the permanence of their present incomes but the continuance of manufacturing prosperity. There are those among them who can remember the agricultural condition of their county, and the state both of the farmer and the farm-labourer, before mechanical invention caused towns and villages to spring up upon desert wastes, as if they had been called into existence by the fabled lamp of Aladdin. They know well how much farming enterprise has increased in extent, and how much the profits of farming have increased in value since mills and factories created almost a nation of consumers. They know, by practical experience, that the only limits to the agricultural prosperity of South Lancashire are those which restrict the number and the means of the purchasers of agricultural produce.

The exertions of the League have opened the eyes of the farmers in most parts of England to the fraud and delusion practised upon them by the pretended protection which the Corn Laws afford. It would indeed be strange if such a fallacy had any influence in South Lancashire, where its absurdity is most palpable and glaring. Who ever heard of a seller wishing to be protected against too great a multitude of buyers? Would it not be something like insanity for the vender in the market to complain that the demand for his goods was too exorbitant? Yet this is the very assertion which Mr. Entwistle proposes to the farmers of South Lancashire; this is the outrageous nonsense with which he hopes to dupe them into an abandonment of their own interests. The monopolist papers predict that such a monstrous delusion will be successful; we cannot believe them; after all that we have witnessed of men being led astray by plausible arts, ingenious devices, and cunning contrivances, we might dread the success of some piece of crafty sophistry, but we can hardly conceive the possibility of men being led astray by a pretext which would hardly pass as plausible within the worst wards of Bedlam. It has been so often proved that the agriculturists of Lancashire suffer not less severely than the operatives in every commercial crisis, that we cannot conceive any man, woman, or child between the Ribble and the Mersey not feeling and resenting every attack on trade as a personal injury. We are sometimes filled with wonder at the boldness of Mr. Entwistle and his supporters in declaiming against manufactures in a locality where every object that meets the sight proclaims their silent refutation, and exposes their fallacy more palpably to the eye than all the oratory of ancient and modern times could demonstrate it to the ear. The blind man in St. Pierre's clever tale of the "Coffee-house of Surat," who denied the existence of the sun because he could not see it, was a model of logic and common sense compared with Mr. Entwistle and his associates averring that we have too much trade in the country. We should like to hear them propound their remedy, and describe their measures. What have they to offer to the manufacturers for diminished profits, to the operatives for lowered wages, and to the farmers for a loss of customers? We should like to hear them interrogated on the question of their proposed compensations to the several interests against which they have set themselves? It is too bad for them to ask men to inflict injury upon themselves, and to offer absolutely nothing as bribe or boon:—

"Protect us, mighty Providence!
What would these madmen have!
First they would bribe us without pence,
Deceive us without common sense,
And without power enslave."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1844.

Fifteenth Week, ending Saturday, May 25.

We have nothing to report this week, of proceedings in Parliament, which come legitimately under the head of FREE TRADE; and, therefore, our usual notice must be very brief. The House of Lords rose on Thursday, and the House of Commons on Friday (yesterday), for the Whitsuntide holidays, so that next week will be altogether a blank in legislative "sayings and doings."

Sir R. Peel's resolutions on the subject of the renewal of the charter of the Bank of England and the regulation of the currency were adopted by the House of Commons on Monday night, and the bill founded on them was brought in on Friday. Its second reading will take place after the Whitsuntide holidays, when, probably, considerable discussion will arise on details, of which we may present some account. Meantime, we may remark that the "alarming unanimity," as Mr. Gisborne termed it, with which this measure has been received, indicates that Sir Robert Peel will be completely successful in getting his plan passed into law; and, therefore, for the next ten years we will be subjected to a great experiment, which is to test what effect on the trade of this vast commercial empire will be derived from a currency tied up and secured, as far as possible, from unnatural expansion and contraction.

Whatever opinion we may have on the merits of this plan, it is well that we should not be deceived, or be led to substitute one thing for another. A well-regulated currency is essential to the wellbeing of a commercial community. But currency is not commodity; bank-notes cannot supply the place of corn; we must have the articles to be bought, as well as the articles with which to buy. And indeed, though very far from being in the secret council of Sir Robert Peel, we have a strong persuasion that in his "heart of hearts" he feels that FREE TRADE must either accompany or be a consequence of his banking measures. A well-regulated currency will be of little use to a nation whose trade is contracted, while its population is increasing—nay, under such circumstances, a controlled currency must act stringently on profits, wages, &c., keeping down the value of capital and labour. But give us FREE TRADE based on a safe currency, and the whole complicated machinery of our commerce will work easily and smoothly; industry will have an unlimited field in which to expand, without fear of sudden collapse, and so far as legislative measures can control human will, and keep enterprise within the boundary of prudence, we may reasonably calculate that a measureless commerce working on a measured currency, will secure all material blessings without those fearful reactions and convulsions which have hitherto been the periodical result of bad Corn Law and bad currency law.

MEETINGS.

GREAT MEETING IN COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

The usual aggregate weekly meeting of the members and friends of the Anti Corn Law League took place on Wednesday evening, at Covent Garden Theatre, on which occasion the chair was filled by Major General Briggs, late candidate for the representation of the city of Exeter. Every part of the theatre was crowded within a few minutes after the doors were thrown open, and there was an unusually brilliant attendance in the boxes, including a great many ladies. Among the gentlemen on the stage we observed—

Major General Briggs in the chair; Dr Cooke Taylor, the Rev Samuel Green George Thompson, Esq., Richard Taylor, Esq., W. J. Fox Esq., J. W. Heath, Esq., J. P. Nixon, Esq., J. E. Royle Esq. (Manchester) Robert Welch, Esq. (Huddersfield), T. H. Hall, Esq., A. Hall, Esq., N. V. Smeley, Esq. (Salisbury) John Wilson Esq., Alexander Jacob Esq. (Manchester) F. Scher, Esq., Captain Gear (Exeter), Messrs. Moor, James Lewis, Henry Franklin, George Dixon, P. Rife, J. Rogers, Moore, Knox, Compton, Ken, Phelps, W. Thornborough, Wagstaff Green, Samuel Harrison P. A. Taylor, J. P. Burdett, R. Lee, H. Underhill R. Wood W. Philo, W. D. Christy, H. Govey, J. Notes, William Miller Christie &c.

Mr. SAUL having read the minutes of the last meeting, they were unanimously confirmed; after which

The Gallant CHAIRMAN came forward, and was loudly cheered for several minutes. He said—Ladies and gentlemen, I am sorry to be obliged to open this meeting by communicating a piece of intelligence which I am sure you will all lament: that is the circumstance that Mr. M. Phillips, the member for Manchester, has been unable from indisposition to attend this meeting. However much we may deplore this circumstance, we must rejoice that we have been fortunate enough to find gentlemen who are willing to supply the places of those who are not able from such circumstances to attend. (Cheers.) The meeting, therefore, will be addressed this evening by the Rev. Samuel Green, by Richard Taylor, Esq., George Thompson, Esq., and W. J. Fox, Esq. (Loud and long continued cheering.) I beg leave to introduce to you, the Rev. Samuel Green. (Loud cheers.)

The Rev. Gentleman then came forward and was received with loud acclamations. He spoke as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, it would not be at all interesting, neither do I know that it would be at all relevant to the matter upon which I have risen to submit a few observations, were I to commence those observations with anything like an account of the reasons why I stand before you this night. I am not accustomed to address audiences anything approaching to magnitude to this, and I did not know that I was to stand upon these boards until 12 o'clock this day. I mention this circumstance for the purpose of throwing myself somewhat upon the candour of the meeting, and I hope I shall have it. (Great cheering.) I was going to say, just now, Mr. Chairman, that I was somewhat reluctantly induced to take the place I now occupy, but that I think that word "reluctantly" ought not to fall from any gentleman's lips in connexion with such an engagement as the present. (Applause.) Any man be his standing high or low, be his influence great or small, be his power mighty or feeble—any man, every man when called upon should be willing to give that influence and to concentrate that power to the mighty object which has convened this large assembly. (Loud cheers.) And, Sir, as I was coming here this evening along with the gentlemen by whom I am now surrounded, I could not help thinking that in these days it would be a somewhat difficult thing to find any man pressed reluctantly, unwillingly into such a service. (Cheers.) Why, Sir, if they were reluctant, unwilling to unite with the ranks of the anti-monopolists, that unwillingness must arise from something like an indifference to the great cause, or from something like a disposition to avow oneself the supporter of monopoly. I rather think that in these days but very few persons would have hardihood enough to acknowledge themselves supporters of monopoly. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) Among the labouring people the lower classes they sometimes call them—it would be very difficult indeed to find persons avowing themselves supporters of monopoly. Surely if there were such among the agricultural poor, whose privations are so heavy, and whose oppressions are so grinding, unless they were humiliated and debilitated, and constrained to act against their convictions, we should find some of them coming forward upon these boards to oppose us. (Cheers.) Then, as to the trading classes of the community, Sir, there are circumstances enough to make them willing perfectly willing to come forward and advocate the great cause which has assembled us together. (Cheers.) It is true that at this moment trade is not in quite so depressed a condition as it was a few months ago; yet there are unemployed, or only half-employed, mills, and there are mills employed at a very low rate of profit; yet trade is still in a condition sufficiently depressed to constrain every man who is concerned for the best interests of the community at large—or who may occupy any standing among the trading classes cheerfully to come forward and avow, not that he is the friend of monopoly, but that trade should be free as air, for it is by trade that we all live. (Cheers.) I think, Sir, that although in the legislative assemblies of our land there are some of the staunchest friends of monopoly (cheers), yet even there many of them are ashamed of being accounted as sustaining such a character. Have we not been told recently that we should buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market? (Cheers.) Have we not been told that from the highest place in that house which ought to be the people's house? (Cheers.) Is it not, therefore, giving up to us that for which we, as Anti Corn Law League men, have contended, that we should buy anywhere, or everywhere, in the cheapest market, and sell anywhere, or everywhere, in the dearest or best market we can find? (Cheers.) Then, Sir, there are other classes. There are the great landowners. I was going to call them "aristocracy." I do not use the word in a bad sense at all, but even among those classes the number of men ready to avow themselves the friends of monopoly is exceedingly small: it is daily becoming smaller and "beautifully less." (Cheers.) I rather think, therefore, Sir, that there would be found in any class, but very few persons indeed who would be bold enough to come forward here and avow themselves friends of monopoly. I ought not, therefore, to say that I came forward reluctantly on an occasion like this. (Cheers.) I know the character which

I sustain. I know the office which the kind providence of God has called me to occupy in another place; but I can say in that character now, that every principle, every possible sentiment and feeling which I am accustomed to cherish and to revere, are in the most perfect harmony with the great and noble cause which has convened this mighty assembly. (Loud cheers.) Where should the minister of the Gospel be found, where should the follower of the meek and humble Redeemer be found, but among the ranks of those who are prepared to undo the heavy burdens and to let the oppressed go free? (Loud cheers.) Sir, I am a little amused sometimes in watching the progress of this anti-monopoly sentiment. Men occupying the place in society which it is my lot to occupy are not, perhaps, often found mingling with corn-merchants, farmers, and millers, in the great corn-halls and exchanges in their busiest hours; yet now and then it does happen that men of my class are found in such places. Now, it happens that once a year it falls to my lot to visit one of the principal corn-halls in this country in the very hours of exchange, and when there I converse with the respectable farmers and merchants and millers assembled. Seven years ago the gentlemen with whom I conversed in that hall would have spurned the very notion of free-trade in food. (Cheers.) Three or four years after I talked with the same men—and I would beg you to observe that I talked with them from year to year upon this subject, for it is a favourite theme with me in places of that sort—and when I mentioned Free Trade to them I was met with something like a contemptuous smile and a "Don't you wish, Mr. Greene, you may get it?" (Cheers and laughter.) Why, yes, I did wish I might get it. (Renewed cheering and laughter.) They spoke thus contemptuously because their monopolist Parliament had just been elected, and because their Minister had just ascended to the supreme place in the councils of her Majesty. Well, Sir, I went into the same corn-hall a year after, when Peel's sliding scale came out. "Oh, dash it," they said—that is the word in their part of the country, Mr. Chairman (a laugh)—"why we might as well almost have a free trade in corn as this sliding scale of Sir Robert's, he has deceived us all." (Loud cheers.) Last December I went there again. "Well, gentlemen," I said, "what think you now of free trade in corn?" "Oh, we wish indeed we could get it (great cheering); we should be in a much better condition if we had it than whilst we remain in the uncertain state that we are in at present." That shows, Sir, that our sentiments are making progress, and that they are making progress just amongst those classes of the community where it was thought once that they would never prevail, and whose support is almost the only thing that is required for their complete triumph. (Cheers.) Sir, connected with what I said of the advance of anti-Corn Law sentiments, and of their progress amongst particular classes, methinks some one in the gallery, or in the pit there, might say, "Oh, but you forget the Anti-League." No, I do not forget it, Sir (cheers); I know they have a long array of splendid names—my lord this, Sir John that, and Thomas the other, Esq. (a laugh); and I know that those gentlemen met together, and that they utter language which seems like the language of determination, and which sometimes even approaches to threatening, and I know, moreover, that this Anti-League has a purse that once promised to be a very long, and a very well filled one too, at their command, and I dare say it may be as long and as well filled as it ever promised to be; but this Anti-League will never come forward. (Cheers.) I should like, for one, to see the Anti-League taking Drury-lane Theatre (cheers, and cries of "They durst not,") and convening such a meeting as that convened within these walls to-night. I will tell you why I should like it—I should like it because then, at all events we should have a chance of seeing the men who compose the Anti-League, because we should have the advantage of hearing their arguments, and because, what would be to me almost the greatest comfort of all, we should have a chance of listening to the shout of derision with which a free and enlightened audience would greet their arguments; and that to me, Sir, would be one of the most cheering sounds in connexion with this subject to which it can ever be my lot to listen. (Loud cheers.) The Anti-League taking Drury-lane Theatre, and calling together a vast assembly in London to listen to their arguments in support of monopoly, would be the most cheering, the most delightful, the most hopeful prospect that I could possibly see; because I think if they put forward their arguments, and were to ask the judgment of a London audience upon them, such arguments would be condemned entirely and for ever. (Cheers.) I will endeavour to point out what kind of arguments they would employ in such an assembly. I don't think they would attempt to stultify a London audience by saying that nations will continue to trade with you though you don't trade with them. (Cheers.) I don't think either that they would refer to the high moral benefits involved in binding together the nations of the earth in one reciprocal bond of amity and affection by means of a wide and extended system of Free Trade. (Cheers.) Still less do I think they would refer to a vastly higher consideration—the religion of Jesus Christ, who has commanded me to do to others as I would that they should do to me, and who has enjoined me to stretch forth the hand of justice first, and then the hand of charity to all. (Loud cheers.) They will tell you, perhaps, that the nation has flourished under these Corn Laws. Well, that is very true—so it has, and I am thankful that it has; but the nation has flourished under feudalism, and would they wish to bring back the times of lords and serfs? (Cheers.) The nation flourished under the religious persecution of the Stuarts—would they then wish to bring back the persecution of the Stuarts? (Cheers.) Perhaps some of them may be longing for that sort of thing. The nation flourished when Cotton and Old Sarum and such rotten boroughs formed a part of the constitution—would they wish to restore these corrupt boroughs? Yet, if their argument is worth anything, they may go back to days of darkest night, to superstitions the most gigantic, and to crimes the most awful. (Cheers.) They would use another argument, I think, a little more availing to their purpose: it would be this—"We are the majority; we, the majority, will it so, and so it must be." (Cheers.) Very well. Now, I must take leave to remind them that that is a dangerous sort of argument to employ. (Cheers.) Power has before now changed hands, and, for aught I know, may change hands again (cheers); and if the people, to whom these gentlemen are offering inducements to place them in power, should succeed to that power, what would then become of the men who now so proudly and so pompously demand of us to yield to them? If the people were once landed in power, what if they should then say, "sic volo, sic jubeo," to these aristocrats? (Cheers.) Well, Sir, they might use another argument—some of them have had honesty and manliness enough to employ it already—they might say, "Oh, but incompetence has grown upon us so much under a long continuance of that state of the law to which we have been accustomed, mortgages especially of various kinds, have so multiplied upon us, that we must have the protection which the law gives us." That would be, probably, their argument. Well, my Norfolk friends used that argument. They said to me seven years ago, "If your principles ever come into the ascendant we shall be ruined." It is quite enough to answer that argument, if I may be excused for again employing an old saying, to reply

"Piat justitia ruat cælum." (Cheers.)

I will have justice; I care not for the consequence, for whatever results may follow from the universal principle of righteousness in every form throughout the world. But this reply, perhaps, would be met by another—"We shall be ruined if your principles ever come into the ascendancy." Very well. Here I think I see some tall, gaunt, wasted figure of a man start up on hearing this: summing up, perhaps, his last remains of strength, he would say, "Is it ruin that you talked about; why, then, be ruined as soon as you please. Look at me, have not you ruined me, or have not you prevented me from a state of destitution?" which approach very nearly to complete ruin. (Loud cheers.) And, if ruin was to be held forth in support of those laws, I would put my doctrine of ruin against them, and show a greater multitude whom these laws have oppressed, and most deeply and fearfully injured, than they could produce. Somebody else might ask me again, "But, Mr. Greene, what you say about the absence of all supporters of the corn monopoly be true—if this monopoly be a doomed thing, a thing for which nobody dares to plead—how is it that it is not destroyed—it must very, very soon fall of itself." Let me address myself for a few moments, and I promise you they shall only be a "few," to answer that question. (Cheers.) I wish that the anticipation of a speedy overthrow of all monopolies were a correct one. I wish that that anticipation might very, very soon be realized; but I must confess I have my fears about it. (Hear, hear.) Monopoly has been long lived—I do not know, but I dare say, if this meeting had to deal with it, that it would soon be destroyed. (Loud cheers.) I rather think, however, that it will prove to be possessed of long life, and of confirmed vigour still; and I will tell you why I think so. I cannot but bear in mind, in the first place, that men—"naturally" I was going to say—are averse to all great changes. I am not conservative—I am not conservative especially in the technical sense of that term—but I think that most men by nature are conservative—that they do not like to interfere with things already in existence—things which have grown somewhat venerable by age—with a view to a complete alteration. (Cheers.) What is the practical inference to be drawn from this? Why, the inference is all in favour of such meetings as the present to enlighten the public mind. (Cheers.) Let the public be taught to go up to our houses of legislature, and say, "Gentlemen, this change must be brought about." Till the moment that the sovereign people shall go up to the Legislature and say that, depend upon it monopoly will not be effectually overthrown; but the moment you go up to the houses of legislature—I care not how those houses are composed—and say with one voice—condemned, determined, perseveringly—that change must be brought about, from that moment monopoly must be overthrown. (Loud cheers.) Sir, I cannot but look at another thing in support of the apprehensions which I entertain, and that is the interest incurred in our land in support of this monopoly. I will mention, just for the sake of illustration, only one. Forgive me if I take that from the history of the Established Church, of which you, perhaps, Mr. Chairman, may be a member; I will not tell this meeting what I am a friend of that establishment (cheers); I will not, for the present at all events, announce it to this meeting. I cannot but regret, however, the attitude of hostility which the establishment has taken to the principles which call for the overthrow of the monopoly in human food. (Cheers.) And I am not much surprised that they do so, and for this reason: title was some years ago, what it is now in effect, a charge upon the land, not either by collecting a certain portion of the produce of the land, or by requiring the farmer who takes the whole produce into his barn to pay—what would otherwise have been taken from him—a certain modus, or money payment. Now, the Legislature, in order to make that title a little more palatable to the public, commuted it, as they term it. And see how they have done it—they have made the commutation of title after a certain time compulsory, upon this principle, viz., that the value of the produce of the land shall be calculated upon a certain number of years, and that that average value shall be taken as the amount to be paid to the Established Church in the shape of title. Very well; now, is not that an inducement for the whole hierarchy of this land to arm against lowering the price of food? So long as they can they will stand in an attitude of defiance, and they are powerful so long as they can they will resist the onward march of our Free-Trade principles. (Cheers.) Now, that is a very enviable position for the hierarchy of this land to stand in—a very enviable position to be held by a set of men who call themselves ministers of God, who were the most merciful being that ever trod this earth of ours, and who ever indulged in sentiments of benignity and mercy. (Cheers.) I have another ground of fear, and that is, the want of a full, fair, and free representation of our people in that which is called the "people's house" in this nation. (Loud cheers.) Without enlarging upon any fear arising from that cause, I will instantly say what the inference I would desire to present to your mind from that circumstance. We have not a Legislature which fully, fairly, and freely represents our people, why, let us create such a Legislature. (Loud and long continued cheers.) Let us never relax in our efforts to obtain that which we believe will aid us in gaining an honest and thoroughgoing Free Trade for ourselves; let us exert ourselves, and that not a little or in a small degree, but let us use every exertion of which we are capable; let us do everything that we can do honestly, honourably, legitimately, to secure that the House of Commons shall be a full, a free, and a transparent representation of the public mind. (The reverend gentleman sat down amidst prolonged cheering.)

The Gallant CHAIRMAN then introduced Richard Taylor, Esq., of the city of London.

MR. RICHARD TAYLOR, Common-Councilman of the Ward of Farringdon Without, on coming forward to address the meeting, was loudly cheered. He spoke as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, it may seem presumptuous in me to attempt to address you on a subject with which I am so imperfectly acquainted, though I feel deeply upon it, after you have been so often addressed by excellent and able men who have devoted their time and attention to it much more than my avocations have permitted me to do. Had I no other motive to come forward, I would do so as an old inhabitant of the city of London, in that capacity to express for once my hearty sympathy with this cause, and to encourage all my fellow-citizens in all the inhabitants of this great metropolis to do what they can to support it. ("Hear, hear," and cheer.) I cannot express to you how much I for one feel indebted to those able men who have come from different parts of the kingdom to discuss this subject, and to endeavour to promote its success in the most legitimate manner, by arguing the question before large, enlightened, and impartial audiences. (Applause.) As I said before, I am not capable of doing this; but I can express my hearty good wishes for the cause, and perhaps point out a few reasons which make it particularly important to the inhabitants of the metropolis to do all they can to aid in its promotion. (Hear, hear.) Ladies and gentlemen, I appeal in the first place to our interests as inhabitants of this metropolis. I need not point out to you how much the prosperity of the metropolis depends—how entirely it depends—upon the prosperity of the nation at large—(hear, hear); whether we look at its foreign trade—considering London as a port, as the largest port in the world—or whether we consider the large portion of the prosperity of London which is derived from the home trade—a quantity of the business of London conducted by manufacturers, warehousemen, and others entirely depends upon the orders they receive from various parts of the kingdom; and it is well known to all who are largely engaged in this trade that by far the greater part of it depends upon the manufacturing districts of the country. (Hear, hear.) Every one who knows anything about country orders, well knows that by far the greater part comes from the manufacturing districts; and if the foreign trade is impeded by the restrictions which are now imposed upon it, and the manufacturing districts, the large manufacturers in various parts of the kingdom, are at a stand, the prosperity of the metropolis must decline in a corresponding ratio. ("Hear, hear," and cheer.) There is another circumstance which strikes me, in which we are deeply interested as inhabitants of the metropolis: I allude to the great number of paupers, of destitute persons from the rural districts. (Hear, hear, hear.) You will all recollect that appeals of the most powerful kind were made during the past winter by new societies as well as old ones, instituted for the relief of these destitute persons. (Hear, hear.) My attention was much struck by an address from a nobleman, Lord Ranelagh, who I believe was president of one of them, in which he stated that many of these persons, whose destitution he described in the most powerful language, were not inhabitants of the metropolis, but came from the rural districts during the winter, driven to London by the extremity of distress, and actually lying and perishing in the roads and parks and highways. (Hear.) Not only, then, must our feelings induce us to join in supporting this great cause, but our interests. (Hear, hear, hear.) It is said by some that the Corn Laws are for the benefit of the agricultural interest. Now, who are the agricultural interest? Certainly not those persons who receive the rents from the land, and who are squandering those rents in the most frivolous and, perhaps, vicious pursuits, in various parts of the country. (Hear, hear.) If I am asked why I consider the agricultural interest, I reply, the farmer who employs his skill and capital on the land, and even more than the farmer, the labourer to whose toil we are indebted for all that the land produces. (Cheers.) When I know, then, that the Corn Laws are for the benefit of the agricultural interest, what is the state of that interest? I deem the state of the peasantry—the really poor man. Why, they are driven from the large towns to a state of extreme destitution. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen and ladies, we have seen accounts in almost every day's news, more of incendiary fires in almost every part of the country, and many gentlemen now begin to acknowledge that these calamities are to be attributed to the destitution and to the distressed state of the rural population. (Hear, hear.) We have the fact from a baronet of Scotland, who gave it as his opinion that such calamities arose from the inadequacy of wages and want of employment. (Hear, hear.) We all know that the wages of the rural population are extremely low, quite inadequate to their support; and more than that, the employment they have is entirely precarious. (Hear, hear.) They are employed in fine weather, but then they are only employed occasionally; they have certainly no means to rely upon but that of the employment they receive from the farmer. The land of this country used (a great deal of it, at any rate) to belong to the people. (Cheers.) We now hear of enclosures and of general enclosure bills, and of "Newbury"; but I do not very much wonder if we will not add very materially to the misery of the people. (Cries of "No doubt they will," and cheer.) The people will be demoralized by them, for the morals of the people can never be in a sound state if they are never independent—that is, dependent on themselves for their subsistence; and it is vain to expect that the population will respect property, and abstain from crimes—first of all property, if they do not particularly value it in its own right results. (Cheers.) It is, therefore, very much directed to this subject very properly by having had opportunities of making comparisons between the population of this country—the rural population especially—and those of foreign nations. Now, I will say that, having myself had various and frequent opportunities of judging—not going abroad with a carriage and servants and baggage, sleeping at great hotels, and mixing only with my own countrymen, but walking from farmhouse to farmhouse, and from one little country inn to another, and conversing with persons of various ranks and employments, both among the clergy and the laity—my conviction, my painful conviction is, that there are no people in Europe, among all the countries I have visited, so miserable, so destitute as the people of this country. (Cheers.) I was surprised to find in a speech by the Prime Minister not long ago, not merely a doubt on this subject, but an assertion to the contrary. Gentlemen, when I look at their clothing, when I look at their habitations—their roomy comfortable habitations—and the good stock of utensils contained therein, which must be of considerable value, besides the good stock of apparel they have, all these bespeak a great degree of comparative comfort. (Hear, hear.) There is poverty in France, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy; but there is not destitution. (Cheers.) It has been said that the people there fare more hardly than the inmates of our union workhouses in England, who would not be content with the food eaten by the peasantry abroad. Now, it is very easy to conceive that a father and mother, rearing a family, tilling land which is their own, and knowing that they shall hand down to their children the benefits of any improvement they may make and all the profits they may derive from it, will willingly undergo hardship and live more frugally and hardly than the reckless, destitute, and hopeless pauper of this country. (Hear, hear, hear.) I do not deny that their fare is coarse and that they labour hard, but hope sustains them: they have not merely the hope, indeed, but I might almost say the certainty that, by frugality and industry, they shall have an old age of comfort, and leave property to their children. (Cheers.) You may say what you will about education and about religious instruction, but it is in vain—and I believe that ministers of religion of various denominations have expressed the same opinion—to attempt to improve the morals of the people by either of these means, excellent as they are, while they are destitute of the comforts and of the necessities of life. (Loud and continued cheering.) Ladies and gentlemen, I remember once travelling in Switzerland, where a great quantity of land is in common. I was riding in a car into Lucerne, when the boy who drove me said, "Sir, this is my parish." Seeing that the land thereabouts was cultivated in a different way from the country I had been passing through, I asked him whose land it was. He said that it was common land; that it belonged to the commune, that is, the whole people. It was in tillage, and a council was elected annually by the inhabitants, by universal suffrage, to manage it. (Cheers.) The land there had not been taken away from the people and given to individual proprietors, so as to leave the succeeding generation beggar and destitute. (Loud cheers.) It did not follow at all, that because the land was more cultivated than that which was left in heath or pasture or uncultivated, that the effort was to be taken from the people. No: this commune chose a council every year, with a president, and had allotted all these lands among the people equally. The lord said, formerly, when the aristocracy had the ascendancy, the rich used always to have the greatest share; "but," added he, "now, Sir, every one, whether rich or poor, has the same quantity." (Loud cheers.) Previously to the French Revolution, Arthur Young described the condition of the peasantry of France as the most miserable that could be; and we see the Frenchman always depicted in caricatures, and in different writings, as a lean and half-starved miserable being. Now, I can only say that, if you look about among the French, you will find that they are fine strapping fellows, with strong arms and good calves to their legs. (Loud laughter.) Gentlemen, it is very painful to make these comparisons between the state of things in foreign countries and the state of things in our own; and we have had so many reports in and out of Parliament describing the miserable condition of the rural and manufacturing population of this country, that I shall not dwell longer upon it. I can only say, that what I have seen in Switzerland I have also seen in various parts of Germany, especially in Wurtemberg, where the people are prosperous and happy—tilling land which is their own almost. The aristocracy and the landowners have been swept away, but there is the land; and there are the people working upon it, producing as much or more than ever. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I think it a great mistake in political economy to dwell so much on the net produce of land, and to say that he is the greatest benefactor to mankind who makes two ears of wheat grow where only one grew before. I think the only crop which is of importance is that of human happiness. If we can get our corn, and feed our people, and make them happier and better by importing it from abroad than by keeping it in bond, and if land can only be made to grow corn by buying out such a sum of money as makes the people pay double the price for it, we had much better bring it from abroad. ("Hear, hear," and cheer.) This consideration derives great force from our insular position—this "seagull isle," as it is often called, "the mistress of the seas;" but what avails it if we are mistress of the seas, if all our ports are blockaded by our own Legislature? (Cheers.) In this way the sea is made our prison instead of being the great highway of the nation's prosperity. (Cheers.) What a monstrous absurdity to have so many noble seaport towns as we have, into which shiploads of corn are brought only to be hoarded and locked up, instead of being distributed in food to the people! (Hear, hear.) One would suppose the great blessing of our naval and commercial superiority would be, that we could command for the people of this country a greater number of the blessings of this life than any other nation in the world. I can conceive no use whatever in our superiority, or in the position of our colonies and our commerce, only in so far as they are able to contribute, as much as possible, to the happiness and welfare of the people. (Loud cheers.) I have adverted to the subject of enclosure bills, one of which is now before Parliament. I have been surprised to see some of the public journals, one of which, at least, advocates most strenuously right views with regard to Free Trade, encourage the enclosure of all waste land. Now, really the question ought to be considered entirely with reference to the great principle of Free Trade. If, by improvements in agriculture, we can get corn cheaper and better at home than we could obtain it from abroad, let these improvements take place; but the only true test of improvement must be, as in every other branch of manufacturing industry, whether you can produce the article you wish to produce cheaper and better. If improvements in agriculture will save now so much sought after corn as can be made at such a price that the people have to pay for them, and that the capital of the country is sunk in making them, such improvements will be quite deceptive. (Hear, hear.) With regard to the enclosure of waste lands, it must depend entirely on the quality of those lands; and I confess I should deprecate exceedingly that those lands where the people have been accustomed to feed their cows, then geese, then pigs, and cut their fuel—where their children have played, where they themselves played at trapball and cricket—should be closed and taken away from them and given to great proprietors; that these very places where they had all these advantages and enjoyments should be turned into preserves for the pheasants of the aristocracy. (Loud cheers.) And, possibly, should these enclosures take place, those very persons who ought to have the enjoyment of them will be engaged in murderous affrays with each other—some as gamekeepers, others as poachers—and so be sacrificed to the sanguinary laws of the country, and the despotism of the aristocracy. ("Hear, hear," and cheer.) I know it is said by some, that all those who have a claim to any advantage from these lands should have compensation; but that is the most fallacious thing in the world. (Hear, hear.) These common lands have been the inheritance of the people through all ages, and existing generations have only a life interest in them. (Hear, hear.) If you were to take all the cottagers of the present day, and give them some bribe to stop their mouths in order that this bill might pass, what is to become of the next generation? Will they not be left destitute? Have they not been left destitute? Are not the people more miserable now than they were formerly when they enjoyed the advantage of a greater quantity of common land? If these lands are worth cultivating, and are to be tilled, let them be tilled for the advantage of the people, to whom they belong. (Loud cheers.) In ancient times the whole land in this country was of two kinds, the "folk" land and the "broke" land. The greater part of the land of the country was "folk" land, belonged to the whole of the people of this country, and formed their inheritance. Of this, however, they have been robbed by the aristocracy. (Hear, hear.) It has been said with reference to enclosures, that there is land enough to be enclosed in this kingdom for one million of rent to be derived from. But who would be benefited by this rent? The aristocracy would be carrying it all away, while the people would be deprived of all benefit from the land. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I have troubled you at much greater length than I intended. (Cries of "Go on.") I heartily concur in the principles of the Anti-Corn Law League; and I have only to exhort all the inhabitants of the metropolis, and the citizens of London more particularly, to widen their view by watching the registrations, and by aiding the League with funds, and assisting them with their personal exertions, so that we may make as powerful an interest in Parliament as possible. (Cheers.) I agree with the last speaker in the hopes which he expressed of what could be done in Parliament. Indeed, to tell the truth, I don't admit that we have a Parliament at all (loud and protracted cheers); at least, we have not that sort of Parliament which all the old writers on the law and constitution used to describe as such. (Hear, hear.) That there is an assembly that goes by the name of the House of Commons it would be absurd in me to deny; but it does not represent the people. (Loud cheers.) They have nothing to do with choosing the members, and have no influence over them. It is right for us, therefore, to use all the exertions that we can to place in the House of Commons, if possible, as great a number of the honest and able advocates as we can, so that we may make progress. (Cheers.) This I will say, in allusion to something which fell from the rev. gentleman who preceded me, that there are other parties who are very active in watching the registrations. Being a native of the county to which he alluded, I know very well that the clergy have excellent opportunities of watching the registrations; they are placed very favourably for this in the different parishes; and if it be true, as he has said, that they have a great interest in maintaining the Corn Laws, they have the best opportunity of obtaining that end by joining with the squirearchy and watching the registrations. (Cheers.) I regret very much that what is called the Reform Act has doubled the county representation, and that in Norfolk instead of having two members, who are opposed to the Corn Laws—and let me always be said to the honour of that excellent man, Thomas Coke, cheers, great as his interest was in land, and though it was the centre of his revenue, that he was always a decided enemy of the Corn Laws—we have now four staunch supporters of the Corn Laws. Gentlemen and ladies, I beg to thank you for the attention with which you have heard my remarks. (Mr. Taylor retired amidst considerable applause.)

The CHAIRMAN then said: Ladies and gentlemen, I beg leave to introduce to you a good friend of the Free-Trade cause, Mr. George Thompson. (Loud cheers.)

MR. GEORGE THOMPSON then came forward amidst reiterated bursts of applause, which having subsided, he proceeded to address the meeting as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, in rising to address this splendid meeting this evening, I am comforted in the midst of my embarrassment of feeling, arising from a consciousness of being but very ill prepared to address you, by the knowledge that I am to be followed—unexpectedly to myself and I trusted this house to-night—by a gentleman who will amply compensate for my deficiency, and whom I am sure you are all most anxious to hear, and are therefore perfectly prepared to grant me, if I ask it, an exemption, if not entirely, at all events to a considerable extent, from the duty which has been devolved upon me by the Council of the League. (Loud cries of "No, no.") Sir, I regret exceedingly that this meeting has not had to-night an opportunity of hearing your sentiments at length upon the great question which has called us together. I feel confident that you have it in your power to try before this meeting many statements of facts and arguments of the greatest value to our cause, and such facts and arguments as the speakers at these meetings are not frequently in the habit of adducing, because they have no opportunity of your own opportunities of observing the condition of our land and things in far-distant countries, and have not spent the greater part of their lives where the evils of monopoly and of restrictive legislation are absolutely more apparent than they are in this country, which, whatever may be the amount of disabilities we may live under, we are devoutly thankful to Providence in our dwelling place; for, after all, we live in a land which, with all its faults, we may love, not only because it is the land of our nativity, but also from its being rich in blessings won by the integrity, perseverance, and courage of our ancestors. (Loud cheers.) I do trust that you have only postponed the discharge of that duty which I had hoped you would have undertaken to-night, and which I feel certain you will select an early opportunity of discharging at some future period. I have been thinking to-night how glorious is the spectacle of an almost unanimous nation pursuing an object like that which we have in view, by means so perfectly righteous and unexceptionable as those which are employed by the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Cheers.) In 1826 the present Home Secretary wrote a book on "Corn and Currency," the object of which was to persuade the Monopolists of that time to give way; and he warned them that if they did not specially yield, and sacrifice to some extent their own interests for the cause of the people at large—in a word, if upon a question of bread they withheld from industry and commercial enterprise their rights—the time would come when, in this country as in other lands, the people would rise in their might and majesty, and sweep them, their honours, titles, distinctions, and ill-gotten wealth at one fell swoop to destruction. (Loud cheers.) What has averted, and what continues to avert, the catastrophe which we cannot entertain in idea without revolting from its contemplation with horror—what has prevented this catastrophe, and what promises to avert it still, however long the contest? It is the interposition of the Anti-Corn-Law League, with its purely intellectual, moral, and pacific agency, gathering around it and welcoming within its ranks every day, men of the purest morality and the highest Christian principles, who are not less bound to these principles than they are to the cause of universal Free Trade, and who in pursuing that glorious object will have recourse to none but such measures as accord with the righteousness of their end. (Cheers.) There is one thing to comfort us in the delay of that which avarice, ignorance, and pride have combined to postpone as long as possible, and that is this, that every hour's delay is an hour spent by 10,000 men in diffusing knowledge of the most valuable kind amongst all classes of the British community. I readily do not know whether the good resulting from the agitation of the Anti-Corn-Law League throughout this kingdom would not—if it could be summed up, and its mighty aggregate placed before our minds intelligibly—amply compensate for the evil which, in the same space of time, has been produced by the operation of the laws we are exposing. The people have been educated; political economy, science, and morality have all been expounded to the multitude at large—to them, as far as they were concerned, without money and without price. Thus, while they were denied bread on the one hand, knowledge was given to them gratis on the other; if they did not grow the fatter for it, at least they grew wiser, if they were wasted in their bodies, their intellectual stature was increased and their mental vigour promoted by the instructions of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Loud cheers.) Our argument is complete, and our illustrations might seem to be utterly exhausted; yet our audiences fail not, our speakers are not exhausted, their eloquence still charms, their facts still constantly multiply; no matter how often reiterated the grand argument may be, it is still presented to the public mind in an attractive form. The cause itself seems to bring men here almost whether they will or no; and when they get within these walls, or at similar meetings, I believe they never depart without a frank acknowledgment that they have been made wiser and better by this assembling together. (Loud cheers.) What an immense benefit has this great body conferred on our country! I, for one, acknowledge my obligation to the Anti-Corn-Law League. I think there is not a man here who is not prepared to confess that he lies under similar obligations to them. Had I the same views before this League came into existence, of the importance of this great principle of international intercourse? I had not. Did I see the importance of this subject in all its bearings as I now see it? No. Had I the same amount of knowledge as to the chief producing cause of the poverty of millions in my own country? I had not. Had I an equally correct view of the cause which contributed to increase the amount of immorality and crime in the country that I have now? Certainly not. Had I the same knowledge of the cementing and fraternizing influence of unrestricted commerce as I have now? Nothing of the kind. Was I then as well aware as I am at the present moment of what is the chief hindrance to the progress and universal diffusion through this and other lands of those great religious and moral principles which are at once the glory, boast, and stability of this country? I had not. Who is it that has shed this light abroad? Who are the men and what is the name of the body? The Anti-Corn-Law League. (Cheers.) And thus, while they are striving to obtain bread for the people, they are giving them knowledge and light. Lovers of ignorance and popular moral impotence should try to put down the League as soon as possible; for the longer it is in existence the more certain its ultimate triumph will be: the wiser will the people become in their poverty, the more deeply will our principles be impressed on their hearts, the more indelible the impression produced on their minds the longer justice be delayed; and the more evident it will be at the end, that it is by the combined moral power of the people that the triumph has been achieved; the more certain I am confident it will be that the energies which will then be no longer required to carry on this movement, instead of being scattered and lost, or suffered to be inert, will be marshalled again, consolidated, and directed to the accomplishment of some other great and glorious object. (Loud cheers.) I am anxious to see that day, for this reason amongst others, Sir, because the light that has diffused itself over this kingdom has revealed other evils than that specific grievance to which we have directed our attention. The line and the plummet which we have used to measure—or rather to detect—the wickedness of this system of monopoly in the people's food, have enabled us to ascertain how far other institutions, practices, and customs in this country conform to the requirements of righteousness, and are, according to the national, and I will add, natural, rights of the people. Hasten the day, then, when we shall be able, having gained the field by the conflict we are now waging, with our flag unfurled, our weapons undimmed,—the song of our triumph having in it no sighs of widows, orphans, or destitute of any kind,—when we shall be able, I say, to direct the mighty army that has thus been collected together for the purpose of achieving the extinction of the Corn Laws, in some other direction,—that the people having gained, and having tested their moral power, may gather up their strength and march forward to still higher achievements. (Loud cheers.) We are reading a lesson to the world; we are teaching men everywhere throughout the civilized globe how to gain their objects without remorse, guilt, or compromise; without the shedding of blood, or the infraction of any of the laws of society, and still less of the commands of God. (Cheers.) I trust the time will soon come when our disgrace will be wiped away, and other nations copy our example, imitate our practice, and be encouraged by the results which I am sure will follow. Why, Sir, in what estimation are we held in other countries in consequence of this very evil, the Corn Laws? An excellent philanthropist, whose heart is as big as the world, went to the United States of America on a mission of mercy in behalf of the fettered negroes of that country—I allude to Joseph Sturge. (Loud cheers.) He had not the honour of being turned out of the hotel into which he went within 36 hours after he landed, as it was my lot to be with my wife and children. But what was the salute he received on reaching New York? "Friend, go home again: you have a Corn Law that beggars your own countrymen. Go look at the wretched and wasted forms of your pauper population; and when you have abolished your own Corn Laws, and set human industry free in Britain, then come and rail against America for holding her negro population in slavery." (Cheers.) What was the language of a leading Parisian journal some time ago? "Britain, proud Britain, raze from your national escutcheon the lordly lion, and put there a starving operative vainly imploring bread." (Hear, hear, hear.) What was the language of Mehemet Ali, the Pacha of Egypt, when an Englishman remonstrated with him on his monopolies—for he is the great and sole monopolist in Egypt? "Go home," replied the Pacha, "and abolish your own Corn Laws; then come to me, and I will be ready to treat with you for any relaxation in the way of trade that you can desire." (Cheers.) Thus, whether the bearded Pacha at Alexandria, or the sensitive American at New York, or the polished Parisian in the French capital, every civilized and enlightened nation taunts us with our inconsistency, and cannot understand how a population like that of England, pretending to govern itself through the medium of a Parliament chosen by its own voice, should tolerate so pestilential a nuisance as that of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) But it is cheering to know that we shall soon come to the last difficulty. The House of Commons was not our first obstacle. I believe it may be said with truth, with regard to most questions, that they will be carried, whatever House of Commons you may have, as soon as the people appreciate fully, generally, and universally the nature and value of that which they demand. I cannot look with hopelessness at the House of Commons, bad as it is. In itself considered, as regards any reforming element which it contains, it is incurable; having in it no restorative or renovating qualities whatever; but I know well from the history of the last thirty years that the people have only to be unanimous in order to succeed. (Loud cheers.) If from a Parliament of High Churchmen the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts could be obtained—if from a Legislature of Orangemen, Catholic emancipation could be wrung—if from a House of Commons filled with borough-mongers, schedules A and B and many others could be obtained—if from a Parliament of West Indian planters negro emancipation could be wrested—why, then, from a Parliament of landlords we will get an act abolishing the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) Sir, having said thus much about corn, will you tolerate me for a few moments if I say a word or two about sugar. (Hear, hear.) I do this with some reluctance, because on a former occasion, when the state of my health did not permit me to be here, you had a speech delivered by a gentleman who on such subjects as this I am scarcely worthy to follow, so infinitely superior is he, as the exponent of a question like this, to myself. I refer to him who, unostentatious as he is—unseen as he generally may be—is nevertheless one of the most effective labourers in our cause—Mr. James Wilson. (Cheers.) But I have several reasons why I want to say a word or two upon sugar to-night. First, because there is an honest difference of opinion on this question among us. I say an honest difference of opinion. I am sure it is honest on the other side—I hope and I believe it is on this side also. Again, because it is a very important branch of the subject, and will soon have to be discussed in Parliament; and the proceedings there—at least their results—will be controlled very much by the state of public opinion out of doors. I have, perhaps, had better means than some about me of knowing what are the scruples of our friends on the other side of this question, seeing that I have been long identified with them, and am still one with them perfectly in regard to the object they are pursuing, though differing (and I am pained that it should be so,) on this particular aspect of the great question; and because, also, I respect those opinions, I know that they are sincerely held by men who will not give them up without a reason sufficient and strong, which shall overcome those feelings—I will not say overcome them—but which, at least, shall show that those feelings of humanity, which they now cultivate and seek to gratify, may be equally well gratified by the accomplishment of our object, and are not at all more likely to be gratified by their persisting in the course they are at present pursuing. And lastly, because I always like something to come up which tests our principles. Now, here is something of that description. I am asked by a friend to the abolition of slavery, "Are you for Free Trade, though it should give admission to slave-grown produce?" I answer distinctly I am for Free Trade: if it cannot be carried out universally, or if it leads to slavery, it is an unsound principle. I adopt it because I believe it righteous. I go with the anti-slavery party because their principle is righteous; two righteous principles cannot cross or conflict with one another, they must run parallel with each other to eternity. If our principle be good for this country, it is good for all nations and conditions of men—beneficial for all times and for ever. (Cheers.) Many of our anti-slavery friends say they cannot go with us upon this subject. I felt it my duty to attend the meeting in Exeter Hall on Friday last. (Cheers.) Had I consulted personal feeling, friendship, or popularity, I should not have been there, but have remained silent on this branch of the question. I thought my friends in error, and that they were doing an unintentional injury to a good cause, by putting arguments into the mouths of our opponents. I conceived they were upholding—and as far as they act on their principle they will uphold—a gross fraud in the House of Commons. I want monopoly to stand out there in its nakedness, filthiness, and selfishness. I do not want any individual there to pocket those arguments which refute themselves and disgust all men who hear them, because they are interested and selfish arguments. I do not wish them to be put into circumstances to throw these behind their backs, and prefer one which is tendered to them by the most estimable party out of doors, and sanctioned by the principle of humanity. (Cheers.) The public papers will have informed you of the result of that recent meeting. (Hear, hear.) I do not cherish so strong a feeling of satisfaction at the success which attended the recommendation of an amendment to that assembly as I do a feeling of painful regret that such a step should have been necessary, and that so large a number should have voted in the minority. However, they voted in that minority honestly; and as soon as they are convinced, they will be with us; and the integrity and inflexibility which now distinguish them will be on a when they perceive, as I trust they will ere long, that the principle to which they take exception in particular cases ought to be, and might be, beneficially carried out universally. I have received many letters from my friends accusing me of inconsistency as an advocate of the abolition of slavery in coming forward now, as they say, as the promoter of slavery. Sir, I protest against this imputation on me, or any other man who holds similar views. I am no more the promoter of slavery because I am in favour of Free Trade, than I am the friend of error because I would not that men should be strangled for holding false opinions, and daring to propagate them. (Cheers.) I consider that slavery will be most successfully combated by Free Trade, as I believe that Truth needs not the aid of racks, gibbets, brickbats, or bludgeons to defend her. (Loud cheers.) What, bring monopoly to the aid of the abolition of slavery! Why, slavery itself is the very spawn of monopoly. It was begotten by monopoly: it has been nurtured by it as its food—it has been nourished and continued in existence by it. The death of monopoly fifty years ago would have been the probable, nay, certain extinction of slavery (hear, hear); without cruisers, protocols, treaties, and remonstrances, and requiring no anti-slavery agitation, or payment of the £20,000,000. (Hear, hear, hear.) I beg to say that I have changed my opinions on this subject. To convince you of this, I will read a few lines of a speech delivered by me in 1839, long ere I had spoken at any Anti-Corn-Law meeting, because I was then entirely occupied otherwise, and had had nothing whatever to do with the Free Trade movement. The speech I allude to was delivered at Manchester, upon the subject of the abolition of slavery, and the improvement of the condition of the natives of India, with a view to advancing not only their welfare, but the happiness also of the population of this country. Allow me to say, if you will pardon the egotism of the remark, that, within the same space of time, I do not know that any of my countrymen have laboured more earnestly and ardently for the purpose of awakening the attention of the people of this land to the necessity of encouraging free labour produce in all parts of the world than I have. (Hear, hear.) In pleading the cause of free labour I remarked, "While my heart's desire and prayer is, that the time may speedily come when every fibre of cotton wool worn or worn by the people of this country may be the produce of free labour; I ask for no restrictions, no regulations, no prohibitory duties, barring out from our ports the produce of any part of the globe, of any kind, whether it be cotton to cover the naked, or corn to feed the hungry. Thanks to the irreversible laws which govern the social state, no such remedies are needed. I only ask for liberty, justice, and impartiality: convinced that, if these be conceded and acted upon, every system based upon monopoly, and worked out by slavery, will totter to its everlasting fall." This language was delivered by me at the splendid meeting-house of the Society of Friends at Manchester, my audience being largely composed of the members of that most estimable and useful body of Christians. Again, in the same house, to a similar assembly, on a following evening, I remarked, "If we encourage the East, and allow a fair competition between the free labour of the East and the slave labour of the West, we might open our ports as wide as they could be extended, and give every other nation of the world a chance of selling their produce in this market; so successful would be the competition between the free and willing industry of our eastern fellow-subjects, and the labour of the slaves who are held in bondage in the western parts of the world." I adhere to this sentiment now. It is my confident belief that all other means will comparatively fail. I say not that these are the only means we are to employ: I did not recommend simply the advocacy of Free Trade alone for the suppression of slavery. I required all other righteous instrumentalities in combination with that—such as the pulpit, the platform, and the press. I wanted Parliament to do its duty—not by putting on, but by taking off, restriction—by giving a whole-some and natural stimulus to industry, and by crowning it with its legitimate reward. (Cheers.) But if I am in error on this subject it is in company with the brightest names in the anti-slavery cause. (Hear, hear.) There was a time when I was intimately associated with that noble body which is distinguished by features very similar to our own, and most of all towards the approach of that period when the triumph over slavery was obtained. I remember that at that time I was supplied by the Anti-Slavery Society with books from which I might select illustrations of the unrighteousness and impolicy of slavery. I preserve those books still, and find them now as then full of instruction. I go to them to know what should be my anti-slavery creed. I hold in my hand a very valuable work written by Adam Hodgson, a highly-respectable merchant of Liverpool. It is a letter addressed to a French gentleman of the name of Monsieur Jean Baptiste Say, upon the subject of the comparative expense of free and slave labour. This letter was written in 1823, 21 years ago; Mr. Hodgson's work having been circulated through the length and breadth of the country by the Anti-Slavery Society. Now, what does that gentleman say? "The nation will not long consent to support a wasteful system of cultivation at the expense of great national interests, and of an opening commerce of 60 to 100 millions of our fellow-subjects; and the slave labour of the West must fall when brought into competition with the free labour of the East." (Cheers.) There is another book to which I wish to refer. I trust, gentlemen and ladies, you will pardon me for reading these extracts. We should ever bear in mind that in addressing these meetings we are also speaking to those persons who are beyond the e-walls,—thanks to those gentlemen who ready pens record with so much celerity the thoughts we utter, putting into enduring type that which, if it alone, would soon perish;—who put, I say, into our ing type the sentiments to which we here give utterance, so that what we are saying will go forth to all the world. (Cheers.) I trust, therefore, I may be permitted to speak to those without this building, and to reason with friends whom I love, showing them that they cannot do better than join our ranks,—that ours is a straight line, better than any other principle of rectitude, but keeping not crossing any other principle of rectitude, but keeping company with every other good and sound principle which it is possible for others to advocate. (Cheers.) I have now before me another book which was put into my hand by the Anti-Slavery Society many years ago, published in the town of Birmingham. It is prepared with great care, and drawn up for the purpose of showing that, if slave labour and free labour were brought into competition, the former must fall through its expensiveness before the superior cheapness of the latter. The name of the author is Sturge; not Mr. Joseph, but his lamented brother John, a man who, if we might judge for ourselves, died much too soon for the cause of humanity and benevolence. Now, what did this gentleman lay down as his grand fundamental principle? That "no system at variance with the laws of God and injurious to his rational creation can ever be ultimately beneficial." Why, Sir, that covers the whole of our ground as Free Traders! (Hear, hear.) We contend that restrictions and taxations in matters of trade and commerce, barring our ports to that which is produced in other regions, preventing the intercourse between one industrious man producing one thing and another industrious man producing another—that this is "contrary to the law of God and injurious to his rational creation," and that to uphold this system cannot be beneficial to any individual or class of men. But what does Mr. Sturge further say? "It is believed that the facts which we are about to bring forward will establish, to the conviction of every candid and dispassionate inquirer, the truth of the axiom, 'That the labour of the free man is cheaper than that of the slave.' In tracing the important consequences which result from this general principle, we shall have frequent occasion to admire the consummate wisdom which has provided by means so simple a complete ultimate remedy for the grossest system of wrong which human villany ever invented. We shall turn with heartfelt delight from the crimes and miseries of man, from the feeble efforts of human power, to contemplate the silent but irresistible operation of those laws which have been appointed in the councils of Providence to terminate the oppressions of the African race." (Hear, hear.) Sir, I do not cite these passages now for the first time. This book is covered with marks which I made twelve years ago, when it was originally put into my hands; when my heart first responded to these sentiments, and I went forth to advocate in the name of that body those glorious principles, and to preach this great doctrine, which were fatal to the continuance of slavery. I could, however, quote many other similar passages, but I will not tire the present meeting, except to read one other very important extract from this book, and then I will lay it down. I beg you to mark what Mr. Sturge says in proof of the principle with which I started:—"Forty years ago little or no indigo was exported from British India. The whole of that article then used in Europe was the product of slave labour. A few individuals in Bengal employed their capital and their intelligence in inciting the natives to enlarge their cultivation of it, and in preparing it for the European market; and, though abundantly discouraged in the first instance, yet, the duties being nearly equalized, their efforts were at length crowned with complete success. Such, indeed, has been the effect of British skill and capital united, when employed in calling free labour into action, that, notwithstanding the enormous freights (five times their present rate) which, for a time, the importers of it had to pay, the indigo of India has been gradually displacing from the market the indigo grown by slaves; until at length, with the help of Free Trade and the lighter freights consequent upon it, there is not now one ounce of indigo the produce of slave labour imported into Europe." (Loud cheers.) Why, Sir, you very well know that what Mr. John Sturge here calls "Free Trade" was not actually at that time Free Trade: the principle then was not even recognised: it was a mere instalment of Free Trade—a little unwinding of the bandages in which the commerce between this country and the East was bound. And yet, high as the freight was, and limited the encouragement to embark in that business—numerous as were the restrictions—amidst all these difficulties, there being a mere opportunity, under great disadvantages, of bringing Bengal indigo into Europe—by the help of what Mr. Sturge calls Free Trade—in a few years afterwards there was not one ounce of slave-grown indigo required. (Hear, hear.) He then proceeds to call upon the friends of humanity to congratulate themselves upon the extinction of the slavery of 500,000 men in South America; and all this without agitation—by the simple, certain, silent, and irresistible working of that great principle for which we are contending to-night. (Hear, hear.) He says "it is impossible to doubt that, but for the bounty upon West Indian sugar, and the protecting duty of 10s. per cent. against all sugar raised in the East, slave labour must have yielded to free labour in the cultivation of this article also, which is the great staple of slavery. It appears clearly that the free-grown sugars of British India might be used if the present protecting duty were removed, considerably cheaper than the slave-grown sugar of the British West Indies. These facts are of the highest importance, not only because they confirm the general principle for which we are contending, but because they lead to the great object of our inquiry, and point out a specific means by which we can effect the entire abolition of the slave trade and of slavery." (Loud cheers.) "Only," says he, "let this principle be carried out, and it will extend its benignant influence to every human being now held in slavery." (Hear, hear.) Who, then, has departed from this principle? Most assuredly not we. I now come to the convention of 1810, to which our great leader—worthy to be such, self-created, or created for that purpose—I refer to Mr. Cobden (prolonged and enthusiastic cheering)—referred on a former occasion. I was a member of that body, and felt a peculiar interest in the question of free labour, for I was at the time, and had been long previously, engaged in efforts to rouse the people of this country to encourage and reward free labour in the East Indies. (Cheers.) A committee on free labour was appointed. That committee brought up an able report. What says that document?—"Slave-cultivation requires, as necessary conditions to its existence, fertility of soil, scarcity of labour, and high prices of produce; and if either of these conditions cease, it must soon draw to a close." The course which we advocate would deprive slave-cultivation of two of these essentially necessary conditions. I would bring into competition with it the labour of millions and millions of human beings who would each work for less than is required for the support of a slave, and I would render slavery unprofitable, by offering the produce of their labour at a lower price in this market. What have our friends to fear, then, on this ground? The report refers to the labours of the late excellent James Cropper, of Liverpool, and says:—"He pointed out the infallible tendency of the competition of free labour to counteract the evils of slavery, and ultimately to extinguish it. He persisted in pressing these views on the attention of the British public, in spite of opposition and obloquy; in spite of the attempts of many well-meaning philanthropists to set them aside, as a mere commercial view of the question, and in spite of the most unworthy imputations cast upon his own motives and character." The report, after enumerating various causes that would contribute their influence to furnish a supply of sugar, goes on to say:—"Under these circumstances, it cannot admit of a doubt that sugar would soon be raised in unlimited quantity, and at a price which, after a fair profit to the planter, would still be low enough to undersell in all the markets of Europe, the blood-stained produce of Cuba and the Brazils. If there be any truth in the principles we have endeavoured to explain, the transport of human beings to these channel-houses of death would then cease, as it would no longer repay the risks of the passage. The slave trade would thus be at an end, and as the competition of free labour held on its course, these nations would ultimately relinquish slavery itself." The report then concludes with a solemn and earnest exhortation to all the lovers of freedom to co-operate in "giving effect," says this document, "to the principles we have developed, which we firmly believe to have been destined by the Divine Ruler to banish slavery from the world, if every other effort should unhappily fail." Who, let me ask, is it that exhibits the most consistent trust in these great principles? Is it he who would have fiscal regulations to exclude slave produce, or he who would remove all restrictions, and, by one and the same act, do justice to the people of this country, and bring slavery and freedom into fair competition, in the full and practical belief that free labour would prove victorious. (Cheers.) Resolutions in accordance with this report were prepared and submitted to the convention, the last of the series declaring—"that, under an improved economy and management, the extended cultivation of sugar in the rich soils of Demerara and other colonies by free labour, would speedily enable British merchants to undersell the sugar planters of Brazil and Cuba, so as to drive all slave-grown sugar out of the markets of the world." There were two gentlemen in the convention, Mr. Turnbull and Dr. Madden, who objected to the enunciation of the principles contained in the resolutions in so absolute a form, and called upon the convention "to pause before giving its high sanction to principles which, however true in the abstract, appeared at variance with the anomalous facts connected with the cultivation of sugar;" and these gentlemen referred particularly, and most emphatically to Brazil and Cuba. Their objections were met and rebuffed by various speakers, among whom I find Mr. Scoble, Mr. Josiah Conder, Mr. Justice Jeremie, and Mr. Pease. Mr. John Sturge sustained the resolutions in an able, but still an inconsistent speech; for, while he asserted that "at that moment the sugars of Brazil and Cuba were undersold in the European market by the free-grown sugar of Manilla and Sum," he declared at the same time that "he could not contemplate the opening of the English markets to slave-grown sugar without horror." Nevertheless, after this declaration, he took great pains to prove that the providential laws of God had decreed that the slave system should entail ruin on all embarked in it, and expressed his confidence in the certain and irresistible efficacy of the principle laid down and supported in the report! Again, I ask, who are they who do honour to that principle? Is it not those who say, "We have no fear of the results: we do not set up a principle as the law of nature and of God, and prove from long historical records that a departure from it has been ruinous as well as disgraceful to all who have violated it, and then, when that principle is about to be applied under the most favourable circumstances, shrink back and say, 'We only mention it in the abstract—we dare not carry it out—we cannot contemplate without horror the time when it shall be brought into fair antagonism with its opposite.'" Let it not be said we desire to promote slavery and the slave trade; because, so far from it, we are influenced by the fullest belief that the time has arrived when, by the free and uncontrolled operation of the sound system of trade and commerce which you have advocated, we may realize our ardent wishes for the extinction of slavery by mild and peaceful means. We follow in your footsteps—we adopt your principles—we applaud the ability with which you have advocated a law so beautiful as that, which has ordained that, in all cases where fair competition is permitted, the systems that are based upon oppression shall be destroyed by those that are honest and just. We intimate you in all but your fearfulness, and in what we cannot but regard as your inconsistency. Blame us not if we have more faith than you have. We honour your feelings of humanity. We believe that your error consists in being led by those feelings into something like the practical denial of the truth of your own doctrines. We crave no more than this—that you stand by your own principles—that you apply them fearlessly—and, if not, that you excuse us if we decline to follow the counsels of those who lack the courage to depend upon the infallibility of the law they have themselves laid down. Our friends now rest their opposition to the impartial application of our great principle upon the assumption, mainly, that if it were fully carried out, results would follow of a disastrous character. But I would remind them that this was not the way in which they argued in former times. They demanded the immediate application of their principle, irrespective altogether of the consequences predicted by their opponents. They conscientiously believed that the fears of their opponents were groundless; but contended at the same time that, even though they were reasonable, they ought not to be permitted to delay the doing of an act of justice. They were told they would injure those whom they sought to benefit—the negroes. We were constantly told of the consequence to the negroes of the success of the anti-slavery cause. A member of Parliament told me one day, in the presence of thousands who had assembled to hear us debate this question, that if we emancipated the slaves they would retrograde in their condition, and, instead of walking erect like men, would crawl upon all fours (laughter); in point of fact, that they would be abandoned to destitution, misery, and hopeless darkness; whereas it was alleged they were then the objects of more than parental care (renewed laughter); not merely having all their wants looked after, but being pampered with luxuries from my lady's table; and had four-post bedsteads, mahogany sideboards, and well-stocked cellars. (Loud laughter.) If you doubt what I say, ask the gentleman who was speaking when the House was counted out last night. (Hear.) Yes, we were gravely told that if we abolished slavery we should injure the condition of the negro, and paralyze all the benign and considerate plans which the planters were at that time carrying out. (Laughter.) It was further alleged that we should deluge the Antilles with blood; that our planters' houses would be wrapped in flames and our ships would rot in our harbours. You, Sir, can testify to the truth of what I am now saying. Calculations were made of the number of thousands of tons of shipping which would be useless, and the millions of property that would be annihilated. Amidst all these alarming prognostications what was our motto? Fiat justitia ruat cælum. What was the maxim we were constantly inculcating? "Duty is ours; events remain with God." The establishment and maintenance of a great principle cannot ultimately do injury. Fling it among the people, and though, like a mountain hurled into the sea, there may be tumult, splash, foam, and commotion created by it, yet a little while and the troubled waters shall settle down and reflect the refulgence of the sun on its calm bosom. (Prolonged and vehement cheering.) Have we a principle or not in this great movement? If we have, as I believe, then carry it out. It has been shown most eloquently upon a former occasion, by the gentleman who is to follow me, that it is the cause of morality—by hundreds of ministers gathered from various parts of the kingdom, that it is the cause of religion—that it is the right of man—the duty of the Legislature—and that the honour and prosperity of our country, and the interests of distant lands, require imperatively that this great principle should be acted upon. Then, I say, carry it out. (Cheers.) But "No," say some of our friends, "we take exceptions to Cuba and Brazil." I shall not follow in the footsteps of Mr. Wilson, who not long since demonstrated that it was idle to talk about aggravating the misery of the negro, or increasing the extent of the slave trade by admitting Brazilian sugar here. The more you take of free labour sugar, the greater the stimulus that you give to Brazilian slavery; for wherever you create a vacancy, there you cause a demand for that produce which you reject; and that which you reject, preferring the produce of free labour in the East, is carried by the people who grow it to those markets which are elsewhere. You are equally simulating the system, whether you consume slave produce or that of free labour. But I ask what right have they to go to Government on a matter so exclusively religious as that of the guilt or innocence of consuming slave-grown produce? (Hear, hear.) They have none. Where is their warrant? What I said in Exeter hall I repeat here: gather me the élite of all the religious denominations in the country; let there be the profoundest intellects; let them all have the most unqualified reverence for the will of our Maker; let them all submit to one common standard as respects the great principles of morality and human conduct, and then I will venture to say that, not only will they not agree that it is a crime in a man here to consume that article which, in its production in a country far off, has given occasion to wrong being done, but the vast majority of them will also decide that it is a question exclusively between the individual and his God. I am sure the world will confess that it is not a question to be submitted to such an assembly as our House of Commons (hear, hear), which certainly have never been suspected of possessing too much religion (laughter), or of being capable of discussing or settling so nice a question as that of slave-grown produce. One other word, and I have done. I want to say to our friends who are opposed to us on this subject, that they should pause ere they put these arguments into the mouths of the present, or any Government or Parliament. Why, had not Sir Robert Peel been able to untold upon the table of the House of Commons an anti-slavery memorial with the venerated name of Thomas Clarkson attached to it, he would have been without the most powerful argument which he employed on that occasion to resist the application of the principle for which we are contending to Brazil as well as other places. (Hear.) But he hushed his followers; he told the West India proprietors—if not in words, at least by deeds—to be quiet; that he had something in his pocket that would serve their purpose much better than anything they could say as West India proprietors, or that might be said in their behalf by my Lord the Earl of Harwood, Lord St. Vincent, or Sir Alexander Grant, or even Mr. Buge—gentlemen who met yesterday at Willis's Rooms in St. James's-street. What did the right honourable baronet say in the House of Commons? "Why, the anti-slavery party is against you; they call on us in the name of humanity to exclude this produce. It is not that we have plantations ourselves in the East, and large possessions in Demerara, or that the house of Chandos and Buckingham own very large property in Jamaica—it is not for any of these considerations—neither is it because we want to consult the wishes of the West India party, and cannot do without them, inasmuch as if they were offended they might knock over the Corn Laws to-morrow—it is not for any of these reasons—we are perfectly disinterested—you would be welcome to Brazilian sugar, but that it is stained with blood and therefore you must not touch it. It is true we were always the enemies of the emancipation cause—that we voted against the abolition of the flogging of women—that we defeated the Whigs, when they wanted to deprive Jamaica for five years of its charter for most gross contumacy and cruelty: it is true we did these things, and made the nation pay twenty millions, which we did not give to the slaves, but to their oppressors. (Loud cheers.) So nice was our sense of justice, that we compensated the tyrant, not the victim (renewed cheers), and bought men off from crime, and saved their reputation, and, it may be, their souls, by giving them twenty millions of money. It is true we did these things; but we are changed men now. Did not I go and make a speech at Exeter Hall in his wanderings, "to have a better kettle than that to boil your potatoes in?" "Bless you, Sir," replied the innite, "if we were to have a new kettle, I should be sure to put something on our rent next quarter." (Laughter.) This is the great gulph towards which all such improvements must tend. Charitable collections raised here for the benefit of the starving fishermen in the Orkneys! why, they have gone by wholesale into the pockets of the Scotch landlords! To virils that tends everything; that great omnipotent eye of monopoly is over all good in the country, and there cannot be a morsel of bread put into the mouth of the poorest pauper but what the noble and highest titled landlords have their share of it as a spoil. And in what way and upon what principle are these enormities apologised for? There is a point which I have mentioned here before very recently, but which I do not intend should be lost sight of by the public—I mean the dereliction of principle which has been shown by the Agricultural Protection Society in its first publication. (Hear, hear.) It will not do to call it, as some have done, a point of "literary criticism;" it is no such thing; it is a question of moral honesty and common decency. (Hear, hear.) False quotations from the writings of Adam Smith were at once proved on Mr. Cayley's pamphlet; after a time he put a letter into the Morning Herald, half confessing and half defending the charge, but admitting the substitution of the word "protection" for that of "encouragement," and also admitting that in two instances, if not in more, he had not taken conservative words of those which were marked in his pamphlet as the words of Adam Smith, and promising that these, and any other error that might be pointed out, should thereafter be corrected. Now, what is the fact? Why, that this publication has been reduced in price from 1s. to 2d., so that by those who buy it it may be bought the more largely. It is distributed, it is said, by tens of thousands, or more, throughout the country—I dare say sent down by carts into South Lancashire at this moment. And yet, notwithstanding Mr. Cayley's printed apology and profession one month ago, to this day these falsifications are not corrected. I purchased a copy of the pamphlet only this very afternoon. I found all the falsifications there: the alteration of the word "encouragement" into "protection;" the perversion of the quotation on the navigation laws; and that other perverted quotation, in which the farmers are represented as belonging to one class of society, and the manufacturing capitalists and merchants to another, in defiance of the spirit of the passage, if not entire in Adam Smith; and that still worse falsification, in which, where the author says, "whatever keeps produce below what it would rise to is an injury, the word 'price' is inserted—in alteration pointed out to the meeting by Lord Rathor, and bearing on it the first mark of the grossest perversion of the meaning of the author. All these, I believe, remain, and the pamphlet appears to be printed from the very same type as that which was used in the first instance. In spite of all the apologies and promises of correction, the only addition is a little bit of paper pasted on the bottom of one page, pointing to "encouragement" and "protection" in the next passage but one; and saying of the other passage, that it is a compression of what the author says, and not a continuation quotation: the fact being that it is no compression at all, but an unfair selection of phrases, by which they are made to bear a different meaning from what they do when read out as they are in the original. Now, I say that all this would not be tolerated in other matters. It would not be allowed for a moment of wealthy persons were not the offenders and the public the injured party. If a transaction of this kind had passed between a common man in the aristocratic ranks of society, they would have been compelled to go out with pistols to obliterate the stain which would attach to the character of the guilty individual. (Hear, hear.) I repeat what has been already said in the Leicester paper, that "if the chivalrous ancestors of those landlords—those of them, and, indeed, who had chivalrous ancestors—had believed in tournament as their descendants have done in argument, their swords would have been locked from their heels, and their banners kicked out of the lists." But here they are—their names all committed to detected falsehood for fraudulent purposes—five dukes, an earl, nine members of Parliament, brilliant names all made "the shameless heralds of a lie." (Loud cheers.) By no such power or means as this can our cause be arrested in its course towards triumph. (Hear, hear.) Such means never yet answered for any length of time, and never will. The power of truth, the sense of the nation, common sense, and moral feeling will always rise against them, heave them off, and consign them to that defeat and disgrace which is their desert. By such means, or by any of the arts of monopoly, however obstinate its resistance is prolonged, they never will succeed. The honest, the brave, the true, the League cannot fall, for its basis is in eternal justice; it cannot fall, for if it could there must fall with it those shrines which Heaven has erected in the common human heart the shrines of truth, of love, of justice, of charity—the holy places of the human soul, where it worships what is good, and vows perpetual devotion to the wellbeing of the community. (Cheers.) The League cannot fall, or if it were it would only be as some of the first and noblest of our race have done—struggling with the mighty tide of corruption and oppression, "falling with a fallen state," and leaving an enduring lesson of animation to others to persist even to the extremest verge of life in protesting against all such public iniquities. The League cannot fall, or, if it could, there would fall with it that agriculture which is set up as an opposing interest to it. Surrounded by famished multitudes, who would be like locusts devouring every green thing from the surface of the earth—surrounded not only by the famine in a famishing, but in an infuriated state—where would they be, with all their property and all their legislative privileges? The League cannot fall, or, if it could, it would be like Sampson of old, clinging fast to the pillars of strength and justice, only falling when they tottered, and when they fell they alone can permanently uphold must sink, whelming the painted galleries of the noble, the gay, and the great in one common and indiscriminating ruin. (Mr. Fox retired amidst enthusiastic applause.)

The CHAIRMAN then said—Ladies and gentlemen, the next meeting of the League will take place at 11 o'clock on Wednesday evening next. The chairman and speakers will be subsequently announced. This meeting is now dissolved.

Three cheers were then given for the League, and the meeting separated at twenty minutes to eleven.

YARMOUTH.

The first yearly meeting of the Yarmouth Anti-Corn-Law League was held on Friday evening, the 10th inst., at the Masonic Hall, Mr. D. A. Gourlay in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN having stated that the year had expired for which the officers of the League were appointed, it would be part of the business of the meeting to appoint the officers for the ensuing year; and, after expressing a hope that the people of this country would not suffer the Corn Law to remain much longer on the statute-book, he said that, being himself a shipowner, he could bear testimony to the injurious effect of that law, not only on the shipowners, but on all the people whom they employed. He was always ready to go the whole length with the people in endeavouring to procure the repeal of bad laws; and, looking as he did on the Corn Law as inhuman and impolitic, he was fully prepared to aid the League in repealing it. He would call on the secretary to read the report which had been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. JOSEPH BAYLY (hon. secretary) then read the report, from which we extract the following:—

"The committee, in making its first report, cordially congratulate the members of the Yarmouth Anti-Corn-Law League on the extension of Free-Trade principles amongst all classes of people in this borough, attributable to the information contained in the publications which have been widely distributed on the Corn Laws, and to the discussions which have taken place at the meetings of the League. It must be a source of gratification to every man of good feeling, that, by the measures adopted by the committee, every elector has been put in possession of statistics, facts, and reasoning on this long-debated question, sufficient for him to form a calm, dispassionate, and decided opinion on it; and any voter who may exercise his franchise at any future election in ignorance of the injury which the Corn Law inflicts on him and his family, has only himself to blame for his ignorance. The advance which a total repeal of this law has made in the electoral body, is even more remarkable than amongst the non-electors. The memorial to the members for the borough last year, requesting them to support Mr. Villiers's motion, was signed by 531 electors. The memorial this year, containing a similar request, received the signatures of 808 electors; and 91 electors refused to add their names to it, on the ground that, as 531 signatures failed to have any effect, no attention would be paid to 800 by gentlemen who, by their votes in the last session of Parliament, proved themselves adverse to Mr. Villiers's motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws. The strength of the constituency favourable to a free trade in corn, and without calculating such as advocate a fixed duty, is thus over 900; and although that number is sufficient to secure the return of two Free-Trade members to Parliament, still the committee is of opinion that the justice of this question, the increased taxation of the country, the falling off of labour, and the increasing poverty of the people in this borough, at a time when the very laws are in existence which are said to be so beneficial to the community at large, must convince many voters who have not signed the memorial that the time is come when they must make their choice between supporting men who say that the Corn Law is a good law, and that they will vote for its continuance, or men who say that it is a bad law, and that they will vote for its abolition. The committee, therefore, is anxious to impress on the members of the League the necessity of urging every voter to enrol his name as speedily as possible, as it is impossible to calculate how short the time may be when the final settlement of this question will be left in the hands of the electors of the kingdom."

Mr. BAYLY said that it was not his intention to have taken any part in the proceedings that evening beyond reading the report, but, as some fault had been found with him for the course which he had thought it right to adopt on the Corn-Law question, he would take the opportunity of stating the reasons which had made him cease to be a party politician. Mr. Bayly then drew the attention of the meeting to the deplorable and melancholy condition of the labouring people in this borough—the distress engendered by want of food—the fact of his having seen infants die from the inability of their mothers to supply them with the aliment intended for them by nature, and declared that, seeing what he had seen, so help him God, he would repeal the Corn Laws, if he could do it, in the hope that it would take the sting from poverty. He contended that the question of a repeal of that law was a religious one, because its object was to feed those who were starving, and clothe those who were naked. That it was a moral question, because, by enabling the people to maintain themselves without the aid of poor rates and charities, it would be the means of erecting sounder moral principles than all the societies and trusts which could be formed or distributed. That it was a question of justice, because justice meant honesty, and it was not honest for one class to make riches by taxing the means of another class.

Mr. JAMES DOUGLAS, in an effective speech, moved that the report of the committee be adopted.

Mr. W. N. BURROUGHS seconded the motion, and expressed himself so thoroughly satisfied that all other questions in which he, in common with many persons at that meeting, had been engaged for the last ten or twenty years, and into which once compared with the present one, that he was prepared to make any sacrifice demanded of him in rendering his assistance to the League. He contended that, ever there was a question in which it behoved the labouring classes of society to lend their aid, this was that question; for that although the Corn Law acted prejudicially on our shipping interest and in favour of the foreign shipowner, although tradesmen felt its effects in the loss of trade, the working classes felt it more than all, from its not only lessening their labour, but also increasing the prices of their provisions. In looking at this question, he thought that the first thing a man should ask himself was, to what class of society is the Corn Law beneficial? Mr. Burroughs then argued the question as regards the labourer, tradesman, merchant, shipowner, and manufacturer, and contended that the landlord alone was benefited by it. He thought, as the electors had the power in their own hands to settle the question, it was high time for them to be up and doing, and not wait until the eleventh hour. He had no fears for Yarmouth, for although some of the repealers, as yet, took no active steps in the matter, the League had a majority of the working classes and shopkeepers with it, and others would join fast enough when the question was carried.

The CHAIRMAN put the motion to the meeting, which was carried by acclamation.

Mr. BAYLY, in moving a vote of thanks to the Chairman, would take that opportunity of reminding the meeting of the practical part of the business. The committee would sit at the King's Head, on the first Monday evening in every month. Let every member of the League come to that meeting prepared with the name of one elector, or more, to be enrolled as a member. He reminded the meeting that meetings alone would not carry an election; every man should endeavour, by arguments, to urge the electors and the most active non-electors to become Leaguers. He urged the meeting not to wait until the eleventh hour, but to commence working immediately, for that it was between this time and the occurrence of an election that that election must be won. He thanked the members of the League for their attendance that evening, and informed them that it depended on the answer to their memorial, whether they would be shortly called upon to attend another meeting or not.

Mr. J. FISH seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

The following gentlemen were appointed the committee for the ensuing year:—D. A. Gourlay, Esq., chairman; Mr. T. Lettis, jun., treasurer; Mr. Jos. Bayly, hon. sec.; Messrs. R. Barber, W. Crow, H. J. Butcher, P. White, A. T. Tillet, W. Reid, T. Thompson, J. Fish, J. Douglas, M. Butcher, J. Fiddes, W. Smith, J. Barker, C. Barber, J. D. Chapman, W. Alexander, S. Miller, jun., J. Lown, W. N. Burroughs, and H. Boulter.—Northwich Mercury.

FREE TRADE AND ELECTORAL INDEPENDENCE.—On Monday evening, the 13th inst., Mr. Lavesey, of Preston, delivered a lecture on these important topics, in the large room, Mary street, Lancaster. On the motion of Mr. Moss, seconded by Mr. Wm. Satterthwaite, jun., Dr. Jos. Johnson was unanimously called to the chair. Mr. Lavesey was received with much cheering. He said the present might be considered as truly an electoral agitation. Anxious as they might be for a repeal of the Corn Laws, he dare say they felt convinced that the present House of Commons would never grant that repeal. It was a house of landowners, who conceived—rather foolishly, as he imagined—that their interests were bound up in the Corn Law, and therefore they were anxious to secure its continuance. It was not hereditary, like the House of Lords, but elective; and therefore it was in the power of the people, or, at least, that portion of them in which the franchise was vested, to change it at their pleasure. The League was now striving to impress upon the electors a knowledge of the vast power they possessed, that they might perceive it rested with themselves to put an end to that system of class legislation which had been productive of injury and antagonism only to the few, at the expense of the many. Mr. Lavesey then went on in loud and forcible language to expose the evils of the Corn Laws, and the many fallacies made use of to justify them. He ably exposed the injustice and immorality of attempting to coerce the conscientious votes of electors. Little boroughs, said he, and Lancaster was a case in point, were liable to be influenced by a few wealthy individuals—men who dealt with butchers and drapers, and who no sooner heard of a tradesman giving his vote conscientiously than they took away their custom from him. Whenever this took place, let the working men endeavour to supply the deficiency, and the shopkeepers would soon find that their custom was worth that of all the aristocrats put together. But let the latter beware. There was a danger that the working people might go to the butchers and drapers and say, "We do not ask you to vote with us—we do not wish to dictate to you how or for whom you shall vote—but if you do not vote conscientiously, we will at least give you a check by way of teaching you that honesty is the best policy." (Cheers.) He should as soon think of asking a Catholic to go to church, as to solicit a conscientious Conservative to vote for a Liberal, or to ask the latter to vote for a Conservative, and thus violate that liberty of conscience which the good God had bestowed on all his creatures. (Applause.) If a shopkeeper was deprived of the custom of a rich man for daring to vote conscientiously, let working men step in to supply his place, and they would prove better customers to him than the one he had lost. Give him a hundred good-hearted working men banded together, and he would rely more on them than on the patronage of all the rich men in Lancaster. (Cheers.) They ought now to bestir themselves in the great cause of Free Trade, Be patient, resolute and persevering. Do your duty, and let Lancaster purge itself of the disgrace of returning two monopolists to Parliament. (Loud cheers.) Mr. Moss moved that the memorial with which he had been intrusted should be read to the meeting, and, if approved of, that it be signed by the chairman, and forwarded to the two borough members.—Mr. William Satterthwaite, jun., seconded the motion. The memorial, of which the following is a copy, was then read by Mr. T. Johnson:—

"In Preston, Greenock and Glasgow, Robert, Esq., R. Esq., representatives in Parliament for the borough of Lancaster, We, the undersigned, Lancashire and Yorkshire Free-Trade men, do hereby express our deep regret at the fact that the above-named ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETING, KNOTTINGLEY.—On Tuesday evening, the 14th inst., a meeting was held in the British School-room of this thriving village, to hear addresses on the subject of Free Trade from Mr. Thomas Plant of Leeds, and Mr. C. Morton of Whitwood Colliery, Wakefield. The audience, in which were several ladies, was not numerous, but it consisted principally of electors, the village containing nearly 100 persons who possess a vote for Pontefract, besides a very considerable number of West Riding freeholders. Mr. Atkinson, the constable, was called to the chair, and introduced the speakers, who entered into the general question of Free Trade, and showed the importance of its adoption as the only means of meeting the demand of a rapidly-increasing population for food and employment; and exposed at some length the prevailing fallacies which are urged against its adoption. Their speeches were heard with close attention for upwards of two hours, and at the conclusion thanks were voted to them by acclamation. Thanks were also voted to the chairman, and the meeting separated. This meeting is the first ever held on the subject of Free Trade in Knottingley, but it is hoped that seed has been sown which will bear fruit, and that the spirited electors of this place will, ere long, be found amongst the active supporters of the just and peaceful principles of the League. It is understood that further meetings will be held in the course of the year.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE ELECTION.

(From the Morning Chronicle)

MANCHESTER, Tuesday.—If there were any longer a question as to the great mass of mercantile feeling in this great county being in favour of the Free-Trade candidate, it has been settled this day. I write this after leaving a meeting on the Manchester Exchange, such as was certainly never witnessed in this country, and probably not in the world. The Manchester Exchange, it is known, is a place where not only the manufacturers of this town, but those of the whole district, including the entire of South Lancashire, resort to meet the merchant on market-days to transact business. Tuesday is the principal market day: it is a day on which men engaged in business make it a rule never to be absent if it is possible to avoid it; and under these circumstances it was pretty generally expected that the antagonist parties in the present election contest would size upon it as offering the most favourable opportunity for introducing their respective candidates to the mercantile and manufacturing body generally. The expectation has not been disappointed. Precisely at half-past twelve o'clock—the "hour of high change," as it is denominated here—both candidates were presented by their friends. The rules of the institution do not allow the discussion of public questions within the building, but the friends of Mr. Brown, the Free-Trade candidate, at once saw that there was such a marked feeling in his favour, that to omit obtaining some signal proof or expression of it was to lose a golden opportunity. Mr. Entwistle, the Conservative candidate, a retired and comparatively unknown manufacturer, by the side of Mr. Brown, one of the greatest merchants of the day—"the Liverpool Rothschild," as he is termed—geemed to be comparatively nobody! He walked about "Change," leaning upon the arm of Mr. Richard Burley, the chairman of his committee, apparently overlooked or neglected even by those who professed to be his own friends; they, like all the rest, were pressing into the large group which occupied the centre of the immense building, and in the midst of which was at this moment the man of all-absorbing interest—Mr. Brown, the Free-Trade candidate. Mr. Brown's friends decided how to act immediately. Along the eastern side of the Exchange is an extensive and comparatively retired paved court, called Ducie-place, and by throwing open one of the first-floor windows of the building on the opposite side of it (the Manchester Times office), there was a hustings provided for the Free-Trade candidate at once. The merchants and manufacturers at this moment assembled within and without the Exchange were numerous and excited, and obeying almost to a man the invitation to hear Mr. Brown's sentiments, there was in the course of about ten minutes an open air meeting, extending the whole width of Ducie-place, and in length from the Arcade-buildings to Market-street, and comprising at the very least from 4000 to 5000 bona fide merchants and manufacturers. The space could not have been more densely packed; whilst the merchants who could not get out stood inside the Exchange, listening in eager anxiety to the statements Mr. Brown and his friends made. The meeting, too, was as remarkable for the wealth represented as for its numbers. To give a list of names would only be to copy those of the most eminent among the subscribers to the Exchange, for on looking through the crowd of them closely packed in front of the building, I did not miss a face—and their faces are all familiar to me. I heard merchants who were near me, of the oldest standing on 'Change, remark on the extraordinary nature of the spectacle; they said they had not seen such a meeting in their lives before. Immediately the meeting had assembled,

J. Heywood, Esq., banker (brother of Sir Benjamin Heywood, Bart.), came forward and said—Gentlemen, I beg to introduce to you Mr. Brown, of Richmond-hill, near Liverpool, who comes before you as an advocate for Free Trade, and for the removal of those shackles which have too long been allowed to fetter your industry, and oppress the trading interests of this great community. I beg to introduce him to you as a candidate for the representation of the southern division of Lancashire in Parliament. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. BROWN then presented himself, and was most enthusiastically cheered. When the applause had subsided he spoke as follows:—Gentlemen, I do assure you that I consider it a very great honour to myself that the town of Manchester should have been the first to invite me to come forward as a candidate on this occasion. (Applause.) In so doing I do not stand before you as a political partisan—as one who comes forward to support the views of any party, except as connected with the great object of unfettering the industry of our country. (Applause.) I stand before you solely in the character of a British merchant, and as one who has some interest in the soil; and my only object is to promote the best interests of both. (Applause.) I consider that Sir Robert Peel and the Conservative Administration have made two or three very judicious moves in the right direction; and if it is your pleasure that I should become your representative, he may depend upon my most cordial support, so long as he continues to carry out his own principle of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I am as confident as I am that I stand here that the Premier and the President of the Board of Trade are as much Free-Traders in their hearts as I am; and I believe that they are most desirous of being supported by the trading interests of the country, in order that they may be enabled to give you what you wish. But if you, the electors of this commercial district, do not return to them a Free-Trader, you tie up their hands, and throw back for a protracted period the fulfilment of those prospects which are now brightening before us for an extension of our commerce to the utmost ends of the earth. (Hear, hear.) On this point, gentlemen, I wish to be most distinctly and clearly understood, that I stand before you, not as a political partisan, but as a Free-Trader. (Hear.) Gentlemen, the bravery of our fleets and armies has, fortunately for us, opened to us the China market; but that gleam of hope—I wish it may be more—that symptom of prosperity, which we now derive from the extension of our trade in that direction, must not lead us to calculate too much on the benefits we shall derive from it: we must not, on that account, shut ourselves out from the other markets of the world. (Hear, hear.) I have had some experience in that trade, gentlemen; and though the net receipts from the sales of the produce sent there were extremely flattering, the returns could not be procured to make it a profitable trade. (Hear, hear.) These new markets are certainly now open to us; but what returns we may be enabled to obtain from them in payment for our goods it is not in our power to know. I am very much afraid that China, like many other countries, will not be able to give us those equivalents which will enable us to look to it as affording us, at all events, a large, extensive, and profitable market. Hence the importance of not placing ourselves in hostility with the other nations of the earth. (Applause.) France, gentlemen, has received a taint from our unfortunate commercial legislation; she thinks that we have become prosperous in virtue of our protecting duties; whereas, I know that we are prosperous in spite of them. (Applause.) We are prosperous in consequence of our local advantages, in consequence of the insulated position of our island—so favourable to commercial pursuits, in consequence of our mineral wealth—our "black diamonds," more valuable to us than those of Golconda (loud cheers); and, in consequence of the physical force and constitutional energy of our operatives, who in this climate are able to work a greater number of hours, without injury to health, than the men of any other country on the face of the earth. (Applause.) These are the advantages we now possess; and if they will only unshackle our commerce, then we can meet every nation in the world in competition with our manufactures. (Applause.) Gentlemen, I need not tell you in Manchester of the critical position in which we stand with the Brazils. They refuse to renew their commercial treaty with us, believing that they can get supplies of the articles they take from us on more favourable terms elsewhere; and I very much fear, unless we make concessions to them in the matter of the sugar duties (hear, hear), that we shall be shut out from our second best market in the world. What, gentlemen, has produced against us the German League? Nothing but our unwillingness to reciprocate advantages with them by an exchange of commodities, by receiving from them the surplus of their industry, which it would be an advantage to us to take; they, on the other hand, taking from us what we can conveniently spare, with advantage to ourselves. (Great applause.) Some political economists fancy that we must exactly send to each country upon earth the precise equivalents for what we receive; but I ask you, gentlemen, as sensible men, whether it is the least importance if, of the fifty-two Governments of Europe, one take the whole of the products of our industry, if the other fifty-one pay us for them? (Applause.) Another fallacy with which we have to contend—put forth, I will not say by our political opponents, for politics are no part of my creed, but by our commercial opponents—is, that we cannot import more than we export, and that, of course, any importation in excess of our exportation is ruinous to the country, and ought not to be encouraged. Now, gentlemen, in what kind of a situation would any of us be if we did not get a profit on our goods—if we were not able to bring home more, in value and amount, than what we send out? (Loud applause.) I think the greatest evidence of the prosperity of the country would be, that our imports should be double our exports. (Applause.) What, gentlemen, are the great manufacturing and landed interests of the country to do with the increasing population of this kingdom—we are increasing at the rate of 1000 a day, nearly half a million a year—without they allow us to bring in food from those countries that can supply us with it: unless they allow the industry of those men to make the equivalent which is necessary to pay for it, we shall certainly be in a most deplorable situation very soon. Denied employment and the means of support at home, our most able and industrious artisans will be sent to foreign countries, to aid and assist them in the supply of those articles which we could have supplied them on much better terms, had we been permitted to feed, as we ought to do, our population at home. (Applause.) Gentlemen, you will probably expect me to say something about the commerce of the United States, with which I am perhaps more intimately connected than with that of some other countries. When I paid a visit to that country a few years ago, in the spring of 1838 or 1839, I had opportunities of conversing with planters, with farmers, and with manufacturers. The planters told me that they were altogether with us, because we took their cottons at a moderate duty; the manufacturers told me that they wanted protective duties to become a great nation, as we had become; but the farmers told me, "We don't believe that either party are right; we want the market of the world; and it depends upon your actions whether we are for you or against you." (Loud applause.) Gentlemen, if it is your pleasure that I should be your representative in Parliament, I do not think you will ever hear my voice raised in making very long speeches (hear, hear); but I will do all I can, as far as my humble abilities go, to be a worker on committees, where the work of the House is done. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, I do not need to tell you that I am friendly to the limited monarchical Government under which we live. (Applause.) I think that its various balances and checks are the best calculated to promote the happiness of this great and important empire; but, like all human institutions, the change of circumstance, and the changes of time, make alteration and amendments necessary in that constitution (applause); and I should ever lend myself, to the best of my power and ability, to promote and vote for such amendments as I might consider would conduce to the prosperity and happiness of the country. (Applause.) The poor-law, gentlemen, is a subject on which I have been questioned during the canvass I have made. I am quite aware that great abuses have crept into it, from the time of Elizabeth down to the late alteration; but, in the attempt to get rid of those abuses, we have fallen into another error, and have made them too stringent and severe. (Hear, hear.) While I would do everything I could for infancy and age, who found it necessary to apply for parochial relief, I would also try to guard your pockets from improper characters imposing upon your benevolence. I am, gentlemen, an economist at heart. I would do everything in my power to prevent a wasteful and unnecessary expenditure of the money of the state. (Applause.) At the same time I would not be unduly in supporting the dignity of the nation among the great nations of the earth. I would on no account wish to see us lose caste, and be considered a second rate power. We now stand at the very top of the tree, and there we must be maintained (applause); and I cannot conceive anything so likely to accomplish that end as the removal of all protective and all countervailing duties and bounties. (Loud cheers.) I collect what one of the French monarchs said to his merchants who had rendered great service to him; he said—"My merchants, what can I do for you?" They gave the most sensible answer they could have done—"May it please your Majesty to leave us alone." (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, I am the friend of peace, of peace all over the world; and I would make any sacrifice to maintain it, short of national dishonour. There is one point which I would wish to mention in connexion with the United States, in addition to what I have said before. The duties which they lay upon our exports to them, average, at this time, 32½ per cent.; the duties which we lay upon our imports from them average 52½ per cent. But if we exclude from that list of imports cotton, which is so essential to our prosperity in this southern division of Lancashire, then the duties we lay upon our imports from America amount to 260 per cent. (Hear, hear.) Now, gentlemen, what friendly feelings can we expect from a nation towards whom we so act? (Hear, hear.) Such a hostile course of legislation must produce heart burnings, vexations, and angry words; every spark thrown into the magazine blows it up, lights the flame of war; then comes additional taxation; increased restrictions and imposts will follow in such rapidity that it will ruin the interests of our country. (Hear.) Gentlemen, two or three questions have been put into my hands, which it is now necessary that I should answer. My importance as a merchant has been so far magnified as to lead to the supposition that any transactions of mine in cotton must be for or against the interest of this great community; and it has been said that I have been a very great speculator, and have very much raised the price of the staple of your industry. Gentlemen, the very reverse has been the case this year; I have set my face against the speculation from the very first moment that it showed itself, for I was convinced that there would be a fair quantity of cotton to supply your wants; and the imports of my house (and I have made no purchases here) have been less than they have been for many, many years—not one-fifth of what they have been. (Hear, hear, hear.) As all kinds of things are said during an election contest, whenever I hear anything by which I am likely to lose a vote, I am always prepared to answer it. I am now asked a question by a gentleman behind me, what I think of the tea hours bill? That measure, gentlemen, does involve very important interests, that of the labouring class of the community, as well as that of their masters, and the country at large. My impression has been that we should not lay additional restrictions upon manual labour, or anything else. If the object sought by this measure were attained, we might for a time get better prices for our goods, and be able to pay better wages to our artisans and manufacturing operatives; but the inevitable consequence would be, that it would act as a premium and a bounty to our rivals to increase their manufactures. (Applause.) It would also have the effect, gentlemen, of stimulating you to build more mills, and to put into operation more machinery; then, if the markets you expected to be open to your produce, and which still remain so, should be found to be shut, by the progress which other countries have made during our fortunate commercial policy, the reaction which would ensue would, I much fear, be severely felt by the industrious classes, which I should feel very much grieved to see. (Applause.) I am not aware, gentlemen, that I have anything further to say to you upon this occasion, in order to convey to your minds the views I hold upon commercial subjects; but if any gentleman has any question to ask me, I shall be glad to give him my opinion freely, fully, and unreservedly. (Loud applause.)

Mr. THOMAS BAZLEY, jun. (of the firm of Gardner and Bazley, cotton-spinners), next presented himself, and said:—Gentlemen, as a man of business, and one, like yourselves, deeply interested in the result of this contest, I come forward cheerfully to propose, after the sentiments we have heard from him, that, in the opinion of this meeting, Mr. Brown is a fit and proper person to represent this division of the county in Parliament. (Loud cheers.) In addition to being a Free-Trader, I recommend him, too, as being a merchant and a man of business, and of the highest integrity and standing—a man who would benefit the cause of industry and promote the interests of the empire. I believe he is not a man who goes to the length which many do in his political views; but, at the same time, he is not the man who would be found to support class interests. (Cheers.) If it be your opinion that he is the right sort of man, you will have the opportunity in a moment or two of saying so, and I will now give place to the seconder of this motion. (Loud cheers.)

At this moment the meeting got a glimpse of Mr. Cobden's face, and his friends, in answer to the loud and repeated calls for him on all sides, pressed him to come forward and second the motion.

Mr. COBDEN was received with deafening cheers. The hon. member, in a powerful speech, urged on the meeting the claims of Mr. Brown as a Free-Trader, and to merge all distinctions of party politics in support of Free-Trade principles; he concluded by seconding the motion.

Mr. BROWN here came forward again, and said he had been asked a question which he would answer at once. He had been asked if he was a Pu-ryue? (Hear, hear.) He was a member of the church of England, but he was not a Pu-ryue. (Applause.)

A gentleman named WYATT then said he had some questions to ask. He wished first to know Mr. Brown's opinion on the ballot?

Mr. BROWN said he was of opinion, from experience in the United States, that the ballot was not a protection, for a man's opinions always got to be known; but at the same time, if returned to Parliament, he would do all he could to promote laws which would protect the elector when the screw was attempted to be put upon him. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. WYATT asked if Mr. Brown was for an extension of the suffrage?

Mr. BROWN: The suffrage might be safe in the hands of a manufacturing population, where intelligence was much greater than in the agricultural parts of the country, but without more education he was not for giving the suffrage to all classes. Regarding the extension of the suffrage partially, he should be guided by the arguments in favour of it.

The resolution was put and carried by the meeting, with only one hand against it, amidst great cheering.

Mr. BROWN briefly thanked the meeting. He would do his utmost in this contest for success, feeling, however, that he was fighting their battle, not his own; and that in attending to his duties he would have to sacrifice much of time and health in their cause. (Applause.)

Mr. COBDEN hoped that those gentlemen who coincided with them would now go and exert themselves to the utmost for the contest. They must remember that there were 300 townships to be looked after; and a vote for each of these would, probably, be the most of the majority for either side.

The meeting then gave three cheers, and immediately separated.

MANCHESTER, Wednesday.

Yesterday, after the splendid meeting of the merchants, &c., on 'Change, in Manchester, of which I informed you in my last communication, there was a meeting of the electors at New Wind-or, Pendleton, at which John Potter, Esq. (son of Sir Thomas Potter), presided, and Mr. Rostron, Mr. Acland, and Mr. T. B. Potter, took part in the proceedings.

This was followed by a similar demonstration at Blackley, in which Joseph Simpson, Esq., Samuel Kershaw, Esq., and Louis D. Launey, Esq., were present.

In the evening Mr. Brown and Mr. Cobden proceeded per rail to St. Helen's, where a numerous meeting awaited their arrival, and after hearing the sentiments of the candidate, the usual resolution was passed, pledging the electors present to support Mr. Brown.

At a later hour another meeting was held at Prescott, where Mr. Brown was received with great enthusiasm. C. E. Rawlins, Esq., presided, and in addition to the candidate, Mr. Cobden, and several other friends, took part in the proceedings. The efforts of the Free-Traders are indefatigable in all directions, indeed. Mr. Moore addressed a meeting last night at Lamberhead green, near Wigan, where the liberal cause never yet polled a single elector, and before the proceedings terminated it was stated that 15 freeholders had made up their minds to vote for the Free-Trader. To-day Mr. Brown attended a large meeting of his friends at Warrington, and a meeting is fixed for to-morrow at Ormskirk. Mr. Entwistle, the Conservative candidate, has been meeting the electors of Wigan to day; to-morrow evening (the eve of nomination) both he and Mr. Brown, the Free-Trade candidate, are invited to dine with the mayor of Liverpool, in conformity with an old custom, and where, of course, they will shake hands in the John Bull style, before going to the fight in earnest!

Great as the exertions of both parties may have been, it is not likely that either, in a great district like this of South Lancashire, can have yet made up their canvassing books; but by to-morrow night it is probable that an estimate will be come to, so far as actual pledges are concerned, of how the contest is likely to go. Though the nomination takes place on Friday, the polling, as I stated before, will not begin till Monday; and the intervening days will be spent in anxiety by both parties; for the election takes place under circumstances differing much from those accompanying former elections. I allude to the fact of the polling being fixed for Whitsun week. The Manchester races being held on the last four days of that week, it is a time of more than ordinary cessation from business. The mills are stopped to afford the hands an opportunity of recreation in the race days, and it is an opportunity generally seized by persons in the more comfortable walks of life to make a tour of pleasure or visit the neighbouring watering places. Under these circumstances, it is confidently expected on both sides that the numbers on the gross poll will be under that of the last election, though the register shows a great increase of names. Which party this will most seriously affect remains to be seen. I have seen members of the Free-Trade Committee this evening, and they say that every hour brings with it more cheering prospects of success; while, on the other hand, I might refer you to the correspondence in the Tory morning papers, as evidence of the spirit on the other side being at a lower ebb than has been exhibited, perhaps, at any previous contest.

THE CANDIDATE FOR SOUTH LANCASHIRE.

In the year 1800, Mr. Alexander Brown, father of the gentleman now under notice, left England, and went with his family to the United States, and settled in the town of Baltimore. There he established a mercantile house, under the firm of Alexander Brown and Sons, and soon extended the sales of British manufactured goods so far that it was deemed requisite for one of the sons to return to England, and establish a house in Liverpool. This duty devolved on William, the eldest. It was in 1808, so that he had been altogether eight years in America.

The selling of American produce in England, and the purchase and exportation of British manufactured goods to the American markets, was the first line of business. This was soon mingled with an extensive agency trade; which means that other merchants consigned cargoes of goods to the houses of Messrs. Brown in Liverpool and Baltimore, from England and from America respectively, and drew advances of money upon such goods, without waiting for the ultimate sales.

To extend this trade, new establishments were opened. The brothers, who had not been in the business, were admitted; and New York, Philadelphia, and New Orleans had each a representative, as they have yet, of the parent establishments. Two of the brothers have, however, retired, and other partners have taken their places. In New York the youngest still adheres to business, and in Liverpool the eldest.

In process of time the commerce between Liverpool and America, through the agency of the Liverpool house, became so great, or rather, it should be said, the commerce of England with the four quarters of the globe ran so much through the agency of this house, that the buying and selling of goods, either as principals or as agents, was, in a great measure, departed from, and the negotiation of bills, or rather the transferring of payments from one country to another on account of other buyers and sellers, was chiefly attended to.

In 1836, the transactions of this house amounted to £10,000,000. In 1837, the American banks, all over the Union, went down one after another, and many together almost with an universal crash. They fell, and their fall involved the Messrs. Brown. The latter were not crushed, but they were bruised. American commerce was at that time a towering pile in course of erection; bank credit was the scaffolding. It fell, and the Browns were not far from being smothered in the rubbish. Had they possessed less than the strength of giants they could not have extricated themselves; and, giants as they were, they would have struggled in vain had not a powerful hand assisted them. The British Government saw, and looked with apprehension as it saw, the struggles of this gigantic establishment. From Inverness to Portsmouth there was not a single town but what would have felt its fall. In Sheffield and Birmingham, and the towns surrounding them, and in Manchester, Leeds, and all the great factory communities, a large number of merchants and employers, and, as a matter of course, every man and woman employed, were less or more involved in the fate of the establishment. The Government of that day saw the imminent peril, and so did the directors of the Bank of England; the latter met, and passed a resolution to give assistance to Mr. Brown to the extent of two millions. The exact sum which he was authorized to draw—a loan of money to an individual unparalleled in the history of the world—was £1,950,000. Of this loan he took advantage to the extent of between eight hundred and nine hundred thousand pounds, which he has since repaid, besides clearing off all other embarrassments.

What Mr. Brown's personal fortune may be now, it is not necessary to inquire. It is ample—probably not less than the sum which he was authorized to borrow from the Bank of England in 1837. The question is not at present how rich he is, but is such a man sufficiently acquainted with commerce and the general interests of the nation to be a fit representative of the great commercial county of Lancashire in Parliament? Some people—but they are only some—seem to think not.

Mr. Brown has always been a Liberal in general politics, but moderate in his opinions. He has been a Liberal in trade also, and in favour of Free Trade for many years, though himself deriving wealth from monopoly. Previous to the China trade being opened, he, as the British agent of the American merchants who traded to China, derived a large profit for his agency. He was requested to give evidence before the parliamentary committee on the China trade, and consented, though he said it would be against his own immediate interests. His evidence, more than that of any other witness, tended to break up the monopoly. He said that he knew it would injure him at first, but that, leading as it would do to an enlargement of trade, it would ultimately benefit him, because it would benefit the nation at large. He was not in error. He has lived to see that he was right.

Should Mr. Brown be returned to Parliament, as there is every reason to believe that he will be, for his own name is a tower of strength in Lancashire amongst commercial men, he will enter the house as but few members, perhaps none, ever entered it. His multifarious knowledge on all subjects relating to the prosperity of this great commercial empire, and to the world at large, must be useful in the highest degree. He will not be a political speaker, but he will be more useful as a sound adviser, a ready informant, and a close observer of the doings of others. He has no family nor other dependants to seek provision or patronage for. He has one son and one daughter, but they are amply provided for; and, if they were not, his is not the mind that would bend to any Minister or other power for personal favours.

If it is an honour to be represented by an upright and independent man, that honour will be theirs who elect Mr. Brown, the Liverpool merchant and banker. If it is deemed a high honour by some constituencies to elect men of high rank and pedigree, rather than merchants, let it be borne in mind that, of all the ancient houses of aristocracy—even Plantagenets—there was not one in the days of old, before commerce gave value to land, whose power or wealth was equal to that of William Brown.

From the Roman invasion to the Norman conquest, from the conquest to the accession of George III., there was not a sovereign in England, and there is not yet another out of England, who is represented, as is William Brown, upon every ocean, in every latitude and longitude of the world. There is not a wind that blows, at home or abroad, but it swells the sails of ships whose cargoes are to be paid for, or have been paid for, through the help of William Brown. There is not a tide that rises or falls but brings to port or floats to sea the ships which, though not his own, would lie in the docks powerless to move if he thought fit to withhold the moving power—money. The Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, the Baltic and Mediterranean seas, and the far waters that wash continental Asia, the four quarters of the globe, all are highways traversed in obedience to the orders of William Brown, of Liverpool.

In our own Birmingham and Sheffield there is scarcely a hammer, or a file, or a grindstone going out but he could stop, by stopping the employers by a single sentence uttered in his own counting-house. While this is his power at home, there is not on the vast continent of North America a road, a canal, or a railway of which there is not a messenger of his power travelling from day to day, from year to year.

But it is not of power that we should speak; it is of knowledge. It is the knowledge of such a man that recommends him to such a constituency as that which now seeks his services. At a former time he could not have withdrawn himself from mercantile business to go to London and devote time to politics. But since 1837 he has confined the business of the firm more to banking than it formerly was, and he has taken in an active partner, Mr. Shipley, who, with another partner, and Mr. Brown himself, form the house of Brown, Shipley, and Co. Thus he is relieved, in a great measure, from giving that incessant attention to business which he formerly devoted to it.—Morning Chronicle.

THE FARMERS AND THE RATS.

By ADAM BROWN.

A few days ago I was in a country inn, situate in one of the northern counties, and several Lancashire, Cheshire, and other newspapers lay on the table, and round the table sat two farmers, with three or four other persons not farmers.

"Dang that paper," said one of the agriculturists, a tenant of an eminent Tory lord who hunts in Cheshire; "dang that paper, there is nothing in it from first to last. I never saw such a paper." "It is worse than having nothing in it," responded another of the company, a game-keeper, as I was afterwards told; "it is worse than having nothing in it; it is full from one side to t'other with that Lancashire election. Brown, Brown; Cobden, Cobden; devil a thing there is in it but Brown, Brown; Cobden, Cobden."

This gave rise to a general conversation on the chances of having Mr. Entwistle elected or Mr. Brown, for South Lancashire; and a rather animated debate as to which of them was the most desirable as a friend to the general prosperity of the country. While this was going on, the other farmer took up the paper which had been complained of by one as having nothing in it, and by another as having too much. He read for a few minutes, and suddenly raising his arm, he clenched his fist, knocked the pipe out of his mouth by the effort, smote the table, and exclaimed as he smote it and made the jazz dance, and the talkers start, and their arguments instantly cease:— "Did ever I hear the like of that since I was born! Talk of nothing being in the paper but that stupid Lancashire election, and Brown and Cobden, and Cobden and Brown! See this; listen to this. Oh, if my bitch Fan had been there; or your Tozer (to the gamekeeper), oh! if Fan had had a snack at them!"

"What has thou found so wonderful?" asked the other farmer; "I saw nought in it, as I said afore."

"Nought in it!" exclaimed the second farmer in reply; "call that this nought?"

"Read it, read it," cried the gamekeeper and two or three more voices.

"Nay," said the second farmer, "thou'ldst, William; thou canst read without glasses better than I can."

So William the gamekeeper took the paper, and having coughed and put one knee over the other, said, "Hah! hah! Greedy and Rapacious Rats," then pausing, and looking at the bottom of the paragraph, "from the Preston Chronicle: What is it at all?—a fight?—a dog-fight?—a rat-fight?—or what?"

"Nay," said the farmer who handed him the paper, "thou must read and see what it is; I shan't tell." So the gamekeeper read thus:

"GREEDY AND RAPACIOUS RATS.—On Thursday last, William Higham of Longton, going to work in the field, took with him his own child of four years of age, who, imitating his older neighbours, carried with him his dinner in a bag. Weighed with his jayviolet sports, the child threw himself on a flower bank, and, with his dinner bag by his side, fell asleep. When he awoke, his grief was great to find that his dinner had been abstracted; and, as the father was aware that no person had been near the place since the boy lay down, he concluded that some animal had made free with it. Near the spot was a dry ditch, and as the tracks of rats were visible and numerous, these wicked creatures were charged with the robbery. After digging for some time, a numerous family of rats were disturbed at dinner on Billy's pie, most of which they had eaten. The bag was safely deposited in their subterranean granary, together with nearly a bushel of potatoes, which these rapacious long tails had purloined and laid up for future use. Thirty-seven of the depredators were destroyed. The head of the community was a most ferocious-looking fellow, and of great size; and he, it is presumed, ventured on the bold attempt of taking the boy's bag, almost from under his arm, and in the face of a dozen people at work in the same field." Preston Chronicle.

The reading of this was instantly followed by the exclamation, "Oh! if my bitch Fan had been there; or your Tozer! there would have been business done!"

"Ay," said the gamekeeper, "and little noise about it!"

"But what a saucy old rascal that boy must have been to come out of the field afore a dozen took in a field and take the child's dinner!" said the first farmer, to which some one added, that it was fortunate the rats had so many potatoes as they had, else they might have been desperate enough to eat the child itself.

From which observation a general exchange of remarks was made relative to the rapacity of rats; the farmers saying that nobody knew rats better than they did, and the gamekeeper that nobody knew so well how to kill them as he did.

"It is rather a singular coincidence," said a person who sat at another table, and had just finished eating a mutton chop, and who had been reading one of the London morning papers and eating at the same time. "It is rather a singular coincidence, but such things do happen; here is an account of a colony of rats, that have just been seen in London. It seems in certain localities they have been in the habit of getting into people's cupboards, and there they ate and carried away whatever they could get. They have been more noted for stealing sugar than anything else; and they have gone so far as to take the very lollypops out of the hands of children as they sat sucking them in their little mouths in their little stools at the nursery."

"The saucy, thieving vagabonds!" exclaimed the gamekeeper.

"Why don't they keep dogs in Lannon?" asked the first farmer; "dogs to worry them, or traps to trap them, or poison to poison them; why don't they give them poison?"

"But to go and take the lollypops out of the children's hands sitting at the nursery gets over me," observed the second farmer.

"And the sugar," added the first; "I never heard of rats going to a cupboard to steal sugar."

At this moment three more people entered the room, one of whom was a commercial traveller from Manchester, another a shopkeeper of the neighbourhood, and the third a miller.

"What news in the paper?" asked the miller; "how does the Free trade come on, eh? Thou won't put him on, not for South Lancashire, nay, thou won't; thou can't; the Times be 'n't strong enough. Howing's in, seven to two on it. Brown gets in. Brown is our man for South Lancashire, Brown gets in, and I can give all your money. We won't have people of country starved, their very bread stolen. I say stolen, I might speak softer word. I might say their bread pinched and nipped away, and munched small, but I say stolen. Brown goes in, then come the corn out, and down goes the Corn Laws, and Sugar Laws, and the monopolists of sugar must be made honest too, as well as landowners. We must not pay recompense for sugar to them, and can get enough for threepence hapenny. What say thou, gamekeeper?"

"I say nought about it. I believe it all humbug, one side and t' other. I say 'Live and let live.'"

"And I say that," added the first farmer.

"So do we all," rejoined the third; "we all say 'Live and let live;' but them Leaguers, and all of that sort, cannot let two live and let live."

"Ah, cannot let us have no more about Anti Corn Law League," said the gamekeeper; "let us have out that from this gentleman about the rats that eat sugar out of bays in the cupboard in Lannon."

"Ay," added the first farmer, "tell us about the rats; more need that we know how to kill them than to know things that trouble us less."

"Well, then," said the person who had the London paper, "the case is this: the rats had been known for a long time to commit depredations on the sugar-basins; but all that the people could do they could not prevent them nor save their sugar."

"The devil they could not!" interrupted the second farmer. "I wish I was in Lannon with my Fan, I would let 'em whether rats could take my sugar out of basin."

"But did they ~~lose~~ on sugar? Did they thieve nothing but sugar? I can hardly believe it."

"O, here it is in the Times, you may see it for yourselves if you like; it fills two or three columns."

"What?" said the commercial traveller, "two or three columns of the Times filled with an account of rats! and those rats discovered thieving sugar, do you say? I never heard of such a thing. Are there many of them?"

"Yes, a great many, young and old."

"Ah! If I had my Fan among them," said the farmer, "I would sugar them."

"Or my Tozer," said the gamekeeper.

"I would trap them; ferret them; hunt them; worry them; dog it, I would be at 'em," said the other farmer.

"Where is their locality?" asked the commercial man.

"Why, the last place where they have been seen in considerable numbers was in a house in King-street, St. James's. It seems some attempt has been made to keep them out of the cupboards, and they have made such a noise as to attract the notice of newspaper reporters."

"And do you say they have been living on sugar?"

"They have been at anything they could lay hold of. One well known rat was seen there who has for a long time been a nibbler at the quatern loaves as well sugar. He was hunted some time ago by a celebrated terrier from Leeds. He bit and scratched viciously."

"Ah, my Fan or your Tozer, William, would not have let him escape," said the farmer.

"Let me see the paper, let me read that extraordinary affair," asked the commercial man. "Why, why this!—Oh! I see what you are at—Lord Harewood—a meeting of West India proprietors. Ah, Mr. Farmer and Mr. Gamekeeper, if you want to kill these rats that take the sugar and the loaf stealthily, vote for Brown; he will represent your Fan and your Tozer."

The conversation turned now rapidly and warmly on the Sugar Duties and Corn Laws. The farmers and one or two others defended the corn and sugar lords; but the person who read the London paper said, that they might as justly defend the big rat that stole little Billy's dinner from under his arm when he was asleep.

TO T. B. MACAULAY, ESQ., MP.

Edinburgh, May 12, 1844.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, and, under ordinary circumstances, I should have thought it sufficient to say in reply that I was satisfied your vote would be given this year, as last, in favour of Mr. Villiers's motion for a total repeal of the Corn Laws.

But the circumstances are not ordinary. It is true that, at a public meeting of your constituents, a resolution implying censure of your conduct (in which I heartily concur) has passed almost without opposition; and a threat, which still not prove a vain one, has been held out, and which, notwithstanding some weak boasting of yours, will, I doubt not, in wisser moments influence both your thoughts and actions.

I have, therefore, thought it desirable to write to you at some length, and I am the more disposed to do so, because I see in the lengthened answer you now condescend to give some apology for the concerted, abrupt, and ill-bred reply you give your constituents on a former occasion; and I am not unwilling, also, to see in it a proof that, spite of some remaining vanity, we do exercise a very wholesome influence over your mind. In the resolution sent to you, the opinion and wishes of your constituents have been very clearly enunciated; but as these are not enough, and you deem your reasons better than ours, I will try to explain them in such a way as to make it clear to you that we understand this subject quite as well as you do, and are quite as little likely to surrender our convictions. To give explanations which will not afford subterfuges and evasions to a man determined to sacrifice truth and his country to his party is, I well know, impossible. But this, I hope, is not your case.

We have two questions to consider—one of political economy, another of practical prudence. I will not follow you in your statements concerning the first, further than to express my conviction that, though you may be persuaded of the economical and political advantage of Free Trade, my fellow-citizens will receive with no small portion of distrust, your assertion that you are, like us, determined to obtain it. You have said in the House of Commons, and in letters to your constituents, that the question of protection and the fiscal question are perfectly distinct, and must be decided on different principles. Now, Sir, we think, though they are perfectly distinct questions, that all those who advocate or even tolerate a fixed duty seek only to confound them, and that in no age or country can it be right to impose a duty on foreign corn for any purpose whatever. It is not possible to conceive a state of society in which an import duty on foreign corn could be imposed for purposes of national revenue alone; and we have a perfect conviction that you are far too clear-sighted to miss so plain a truth, however much your devotion to a party or hope of place may induce you to puzzle so simple a subject.

In theory, I think we agree. Our end, also, you say is the same; and you ask what means should be used to accomplish it. You find it convenient to assert that a lecturer on Free Trade has nothing to do with the instruments to be employed to work out the end, his vocation being confined to illustrate the principle. Can excommunication exceed this? Your letter, Sir, should have been dated, like a celebrated former one, from Windsor Castle, and addressed, not to your constituents, but to your subjects. Let me whisper in your ear, that we will trust Free-Trade lecturers, who have no inducements to veil the truth, rather than members of Parliament, who are daily induced to abandon it; and we doubt not that the members of the House of Commons will learn to purchase support by concessions, and to destroy evils which have been uniformly aggravated by their ignorant and unsifted attempts at mitigation.

I learn there will not be wanting nice gentlemen and party men to tell you that this is mere popular clamour, the loud talking of men who seek to urge you on by pressure from without; but I do not seek to convert you except by addressing your reason, and unmasking your sophistries, which I believe require to be unveiled, even to yourself. I write to you calmly to consider in what manner all the important reforms in our legislation have been carried. Is there one that has not been brought about by the action of constituents on their members?

The history of our country would furnish me with innumerable examples, but I will take one or two only, with which we are all familiar. Sixteen years ago the clamour (I use the fine-gentleman vocabulary) against the Test Acts had risen to such a height that the House of Commons felt it was no longer safe to resist the popular demands, and Lord John Russell stepped forward to assume the credit of an easy victory, already achieved by the people. But his lordship and the House omitted the only point on which the prejudices of the people made it still safe to leave a remnant of oppression and tyranny, by excluding the Jews from all benefit of a more enlightened legislation. Could anything more clearly prove that we owed our enfranchisement only to our own exertions, and neither to compromise nor aid from our rulers?

I will give you another instance. Call to mind, if you can, the real history of the Reform Bill. At the death of George IV., our political leaders were sunk in apathy and sloth. Lord Grey had forgotten his early devotion to reform, to stick to his order. His Majesty's Opposition could hardly be brought to entertain in the House of Commons the subject of parliamentary reform, and out of Parliament it was everywhere tabooed as an ungentlemanly topic. But the sacred cause of liberty was still nourished in the hearts of the people. It grew with their oppressions, and was watered by their tears. When the great French Revolution broke out, it became speedily apparent how dearly they cherished reform. All men again felt it could no longer with safety be withheld. Again the Whigs stepped forward to reap the fruits of the people's victory. On this occasion, however, they did not confine their compromises to the Jews: they compromised on all. With their Chandos clauses, their freemen, their open voting, and their long Parliaments, they have once more laid the country prostrate at the feet of our worst enemies; so that men of sense are reduced almost to ask themselves whether it was not better to have left the work undone than to have brought upon us such universal corruption, such unlimited bribery, such remorseless persecution.

There are many more examples. But I may safely challenge you to adduce a single instance of a great reform effected in a durable manner, unless with perfect co-operation among its supporters, and without any compromise of interests or concession of principle.

The reform of the Corn Laws will differ in nothing from all previous reforms. The party arrayed in defence of the existing system is weak in the extreme. It is beaten to the pit. Spite of wealth and place, it is timid and flexible. We may not only safely, but we should be guilty of extreme folly did we not adopt the same course which led to a repeal of the Test Acts, to the emancipation of the Catholics, and avoid most studiously those corrupt and dangerous compromises which ruined the Reform Bill. We have force enough and to spare, and will do wisely and well to drive into the ranks of our enemies all who seek, under the name of compromises, to secure for themselves imaginary rents, a place among fine gentlemen, or the reversion of office under the next provident prime minister.

We have with us not the towns only, but a great body of the farmers; and we know that many of those who seem opposed to us are secretly with us. You tell us we deceive ourselves. Pray, my good Sir, ask yourself the question, whether those who spend their lives among the people are not likely to be better acquainted with their opinions than a man whose life is given up to literary studies? You say the House of Lords is against us almost to a man. In the first place, this is not true, and you know it. In the second place, we have encountered as great odds before; and we mean to make the House of Commons more favourable to us precisely by the process we have applied to you, by not leaving to our representatives the choice of the means by which this dreadful curse of the Corn Laws is to be removed from a too patient people.

I have now retorted upon you your own arguments, and have, I trust, shown you that they are more powerful to destroy your position than to strengthen it. I will now finish, as you have done, with a word of advice. I am glad to find that your constituents have shown better temper and more wisdom than you have done—that they have accepted your letter, spite of its tart spirit, in a peaceable manner, and do not think it advisable to part with you. I also think you too good and useful a member to be lost, for which reason I have been at the trouble of writing so much to you. But let me who know these men counsel you. Be assured that the compromise of a fixed duty will not be tolerated; and, if carried by the Whigs, will only add to the present popular distrust of them, which I, as an old Whig, do very deeply regret. Be assured also that the same effort which is necessary to obtain a fixed duty will serve to secure a stronger position, for though there may be many landlords willing to admit this solution of our difficulties, the people well know how much more difficult it will be to rescind a fixed duty than a sliding scale. But there is a time for all things, and we are very apt to consider that those who put forward fixed duties and compromises at present, are more anxious to conciliate our enemies than to befriend us. Do not, therefore, while dividing with Villiers and Cobden, prate about union while you are practising separation; and let me advise you to carry a little of that "manly rectitude" with which you threaten your constituents into your relations with your party. For us, we will press forward for entire Free Trade, and treat as enemies all opposed to us. Like good and true soldiers, we suspect those men as traitors, and watch them, who, in our ranks and fighting by our side while the battle is raging and the day is with us, point out difficulties, exaggerate dangers, and propose a parley.

A CITIZEN OF EDINBURGH.

PETITION FOR A REDUCTION OF THE SUGAR DUTIES.—A petition is now lying for signature in this town for a reduction and equalization of the sugar duties. It has a particular reference to the trade with Brazil, which is greatly endangered by the determination of the Ministry to continue the prohibitory duties on sugar, the produce of slave countries. It is necessary that all who intend to sign the petition should do so immediately, as it will have to be forwarded on Wednesday next for presentation to Leeds Times.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Tower Hamlets, May 15, 1844.

MR. EDITOR.—Your remarks on "Registering" have induced me and several others with whom I am acquainted to take the matter into consideration as to carrying out, in our individual sphere, the suggestions relative to £10 householders, whose rates are paid by the landlord. These are the class of voters to whom my attention is particularly directed.

We propose furnishing working men, and others, with forms, so that they may have nothing to do but sign their names, and forward them to the overseers. But to come more particularly to the object of my writing to you.

Will it be necessary to state on the "form" that the claimant's name is to be added in conjunction with the landlord's? And will it be necessary—absolutely necessary—that every person claiming to be registered should attend the Registrar's Court in person to prove his qualification? If so, I fear the parties intended to be worked upon will not take the trouble, or lose the time, in looking after what to them appears, in many cases, of so trifling a nature.

Your kind attention to the foregoing questions will be esteemed by A LEAGUER.

[It is necessary that the claimant's name should be on the rate-book, but not that it should be conjoined on it with that of his landlord. Any person who can swear to all the facts of the claimant's qualification may attend the Registration Courts for him. "Leaguer" is referred for all information to our Registration Office, 68, Cheapside; or to the Tower Hamlets Registration Committee, Grave Maurice, Whitechapel-road.]

EXETER ELECTION.

We take this opportunity, in publishing the following letter, of expressing our high sense of the generous kindness of those good friends of the cause who have so benevolently interested themselves to mitigate, as far as in them lies, the cruel consequences of an act of gross oppression towards a respectable and industrious young man, whose only delinquency has been a conscientious adherence to his own convictions and the honest vindication of his political integrity. Both examples are worthy of imitation—the inflexibility of principle that asserts its honest rights in the face of all threatened consequences; and the noble sympathy that protects such self-devotion from the vindictive intolerance that would crush where it cannot control. The enclosed amount has been forwarded, and will be acknowledged in due course.

SIR.—With much pleasure I forward to you the enclosed sum of £12s. 6d., being the second amount from a few friends who admire the conduct of Snowdon; which you will be so kind as to send him the first opportunity.

As you have pledged yourself to expose every case of such flagrant injustice, I feel myself emboldened, from the liberal manner in which, in this instance, my friends have contributed, in assuring that much may be done, and that the League, while it daily becomes the terror of the wrong-doer, may be made the cheering beacon to which conscious rectitude, boldly exercised, may look for some assistance. Upon strict inquiry, any case not being clearly made out, the amount contributed should be placed in a general fund. I venture to make these few remarks, and thus to trespass on your kindness, knowing how much there is to do; while our noble champions are so energetically impressing on the electors in every part of the country their sense of duty, we must not be found slumbering on our post.

I remain, yours respectfully,

19, Little Pulteney-street, J. H. HUTCHINSON.
Golden-square.

The following letter has been received from the young man, Snowdon, in reply to the letter forwarded to him, and enclosing the amount of £14s., received on his behalf from Mr. Hutchinson, of Little Pulteney-street, Golden-square.

Exeter, May 22, 1844.

SIR.—Through the medium of your invaluable journal I beg to return my thanks to Mr. J. H. Hutchinson and his friends for the kind feeling which they have evinced in my regard, and in detestation of the spirit of petty tyranny which has been exercised over me, and from the effects of which I am still suffering, as I have not since been enabled (with the exception of three days' work) to get any employment. It was with sorrow, nay, I may add, with indignation, that I was made acquainted with the determination that Mr. Hayman had come to, namely, that of coercing the votes of those men in his employment who conscientiously differed from him. But, Sir, I had but one duty to perform, which was to record my vote for those principles which would most tend to alleviate the suffering of my starving fellow-creatures. In acting as I have done, I have done no more than in justice I was bound to do, and what any other person or persons in my situation must have done, or else forfeited their character as liberal and independent electors.

I received this morning from Mr. J. H. Hutchinson and his friends, through the medium of Samuel Maunders, Esq., proposer of Major-General Briggs at our last election, the sum of £14s., which the before-mentioned gentlemen were kind enough to subscribe for me, and for which I return my sincere thanks.

I remain, your most obedient servant,

CHARLES SNOWDON.

Bartholomew-yard, Exeter.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM PETER PLAYFAIR TO HIS BROTHER DANIEL,
OXSTALL FARM, MIDDLESEX.

Ostend, May 10, 1844.

DEAR DANIEL.—You know that I determined, before settling down to business, to spend a little of Uncle Stockport's legacy, in seeing the world, and in judging for myself of the state and condition of other countries. Here I am, then, so far advanced upon my voyage of discovery, determined to see everything, as far as I can, with unprejudiced eyes, and to report what I see fairly. You may make any use you please of my letters. I shall state only that which I believe to be true, whether my statements are favourable to the present restrictions on commerce and the corn trade, or in union with your own opinions; for you, dear Daniel, though a Middlesex farmer, are a friend to the axiom of "selling in the dearest, and buying in the cheapest market," and, like many of our class, an assured but, perhaps, unconscious convert to the doctrines of the Anti-Corn Law League.

I have been engaged all day in visiting different grazing farms in the neighbourhood of Ostend. The land here is low and marshy, chiefly gained from the water, and useful only for grazing purposes. I will not, till I am better informed, offer any opinion upon the agriculture of the district; but one or two general observations I feel justified in making. I engaged a commissionnaire, or interpreter, to accompany me; for the French I got at school, though useful, is not, I fear, very intelligible, and Flemish is more generally spoken by the labouring classes. The last place I visited was a large farm, the property of a distinguished member of the Legislature, a Belgian gentleman-farmer. The commissionnaire had left me for a few minutes, when I met a ruddy, stout-faced gentleman, whom I accosted for information; he politely took off his hat to return my salutation, and listened patiently to my broken language, giving me in return all the information I asked. The commissionnaire came up soon afterwards, took off his hat and bowed, which salutation was smilingly returned by the stranger as we took our leave. I then found from the commissionnaire that my informant was the proprietor of the estate; and here I must make one observation on national manners. The poorest peasant in this country has his bow and speech returned by the noblest in the land in the same manner in which it is offered; while, with us, the furtive and stolen look, and touched hat of the English peasant, are often met by the supercilious glance and silent passing by of his aristocratic neighbour, a frank civility is here shown by one class to the other, as far removed from impudent assumption on the one part as it is from insolent rudeness on the other. No man, whatever may be his position, dares to practise premeditated rudeness upon another. The rights of man are better understood by all:—

"The gold is but the golden stamp,
A man's a man for a' that."

Another observation which I made at Ostend is, that during the two days I have been here I have not seen a single person, man, woman, or child, in torn or ragged clothes:—

"If there's a hole in a' your coat,
I rede ye t'unt it;
A chiel's amang ye takin' notes,
And faith he'll mend it."

Nor could I hear of a single instance in which want and exposure had produced death, as the records of the coroner's court have too frequently shown in once "marie England." It is true I did see now and then a wooden shoe, but even these are becoming scarce, and I did not see a single pair which was not accompanied with warm worsted stockings, evidently of home manufacture. The clothes of the working classes, though coarse in fabric, are warm, and neat in appearance; and the snow white cap, universally worn by the peasant women, with the hooded black cloth cloak, is a neat and pleasing substitute for the shapeless bonnet and slatternly shawl of our labourers' wives and daughters. When I asked if destitution or cold had ever been known to produce death, I was answered by a stare of astonishment, which proved to me that such things could not be, and which made me blush for my own country:

"Oh, God! that bread should be so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap!"

Away, then, for ever with that foul and foolish fallacy with which the Moloch of monopoly has sacrificed his myriads: I mean the assertion "that high wages are all in equivalent for the high price of provisions." Compare the country in which the necessities of life are plentiful and cheap with that in which they are scarce and dear; suppose the labourer to be out of work, or incapable of working—see him dying of downright starvation; and then wonder how the human lawgiver can justify it to himself to contravene the laws of the Eternal, and prevent his fellow-man from living "by the sweat of his brow."

Bruges, May 12, 1844.

The railroad from Ostend to this town passes over a flat and level country, in which there is neither viaduct nor cutting. It is, indeed, more like the old tramroad than the modern railroad. The first point of the journey is through the Polder, a large extent of country from which the sea has retreated, or from which, by the ingenuity of man, it has been blocked out by dykes or embankments. It is chiefly composed of grazing marsh land; but as the road approaches to Bruges the land improves in quality, and is covered with crops of grain and vegetables for the table. Perhaps no city in the world is better supplied with vegetables than Bruges, and their growth is most luxuriant. The early-sown grain is also in good condition, a little blanched by the sun, but strong and healthy, and standing at the present time, upon an average, at least four feet in the stem. A fellow-traveller upon whose veracity I can rely assured me that he had seen clover so luxuriant in crop as to measure three feet in height; another who has farmed in the district for seventeen years tells me that he measured last season a rye stalk eleven feet long. If this be true, and I have no reason to doubt it, the assertion that an English regiment of dragons, when ordered at the battle of Waterloo to charge the French Imperial Guard, were hindered by a field of waving corn through which they had to pass, and by the smoke of the artillery, may be less apocryphal than I have hitherto thought it.

To-day (Sunday) at Bruges is the second Sunday of the May fair. The fair continues every day during the month of May, and a great square of this ancient town, in which our merry Monarch, Charles II., held his court during the Protectorate, is filled with numbers and merry dances, differing in language, but not in appearance, from those we see at our own fairs of Exeter and Croydon and Greenwich. The services of the Catholic Church commence at daybreak on Sunday with early matins, and end with the afternoon vespers. The amusements of the fair begin after the duty of the day has terminated; and so far are the priesthood from discouraging innocent amusement that the fair was announced and ushered in by a paternal benediction from the head of the church, and opened by a procession of priests. I offer no praise to the Catholic Church—no apology for such practices. The fair terminated at ten o'clock, without any order from a, or interference of, the police, and by eleven a not a living soul was to be seen in the square. I did not witness a single instance of drunkenness or violence or vice: the object sought for was amusement, and the means employed not vicious in themselves.

I told you, dear Daniel, that I had not seen a single person at Ostend, among a population of 14,000 souls, with ragged clothes or appearance of destitution. The same remark is true of Bruges, with four times its population. No houseless wanderers in the street, no able-bodied paupers begging the food for which they are willing to work. For here the decrepit, the blind, and the aged are the only recipients of charity, and even of these in the towns mentioned I have seen but two persons. And what is more surprising than all, though perhaps it ought not to be named to "ears polite," I have not seen in either of these towns a single female of the class called, and too truly called, unfortunates. Alas! who can say what portion of the crime, moral and legal, which prevails in our cities is occasioned by want and by suffering—who can measure the extent to which the prosperity or destitution of a population may operate in the violation of laws, human and divine? Who can say how far the labourer, willing to work but ashamed to beg, will bear the pangs of hunger before he poaches on the wild animal which God has provided in common for all, but which the rich man has appropriated to himself, or before he takes by stealth from his neighbour's store? Who can say the amount of suffering and temptation that shall be borne by the poor man's daughter before she tries to mend her condition, and makes it worse by becoming a victim to the arts of the ensnarer? Who can answer the forbearance of the poor shirt-maker?—

"Stitch, stitch, stitch,
Till the eye grows weary and dim;
Stitch, stitch, stitch,
Till the brain begins to swim.
Stitch, stitch, stitch,
Till the hunger, squander, and dirt;
And with a voice of dolorous pitch
She sings the 'Song of the Shirt.'"

But then we have penitentiaries and model prisons, admirably adopted to cure the diseases of the body politic which our cruel laws have engendered. We will not give the destitute man work and food to prevent his poaching upon the manor of nature; but when he has done so we provide him with food and a separate apartment in the new prison palace, to relieve the hunger which caused the crime, and thus prevent its recurrence. We will not take the young and destitute and delicate female from the streets till her body has been polluted; but when this condition is fulfilled she becomes eligible for election into our penitentiaries, until her place is required for others, and she is sent out to run the same course, and told "to go and sin no more." Such is the mercy of man to his fellow-man—such the perfection of human laws by which human misery and human crime are confined within legal bounds, and the passions and wants of the multitude brought into subjection to the wishes and the will of the few! And will it ever be thus? Will no generous legislation ever arise to foster the virtues as it now does the vices of the people? The English labourer works harder than any labourer in any land. He lives to labour; others live to enjoy life; and even this hard tax upon existence is insufficient to secure him the means of existence. Our implements of agriculture are more perfect than those of any other country, for with the Flemish it is chiefly the husbandry of the spade or hand husbandry. We have colonies to take our productions, ships to carry, and commercial men to conduct the exchange of them; and yet, with all these advantages, every interest and class in the country but the landowners are languishing and even this one is rotten at the core. The farmer can scarcely pay his rent, and cannot provide for and properly educate his children; the peasant is a pauper; the trade of our once great commercial country is hollow and unsound; our ships are rotting in our harbours; and our great competitors the Americans are running away with our carrying trade wherever they can get access to it. And thus are the destinies of a great nation, more glorious than any since the times of the Greeks and the Romans, sacrificed to the monster of Monopoly. When Napoleon, in the madness of his pride, shut the ports of the Continent, he with a stroke of his pen extinguished commerce, and beggared whole nations. When the restrictions were taken off, commerce revived, and Belgium in particular has ever since been running a rapid race of prosperity. Release the commerce of our country from the trammels in which the landlord lawgivers, for their own base purposes, have bound it; give us cheap food, and, above all, cheap bread; and the indomitable spirit and industry of the people will do the rest. We shall then cease to find in the small and third-rate kingdom through which I am now travelling so much to envy and to admire, when contrasted with the condition of my own dear but unhappy land.

I shall proceed to visit the great commercial city of Ghent, the port of Antwerp, and the capital of Brussels, from which my next letter will be dated. P. P.

A FACT FOR THE LEAGUERS. At a recent meeting of the charity trustees of the borough of Eversham, situated in the midst of an agricultural district, there were no less than 151 applications for assistance; and although the funds at the disposal of these gentlemen are very ample, yet, such is the constant and pressing demand on them, they had only the means of relieving three very distressing cases. So much for the benefits of protection to the agricultural part of the community.—Dover Chronicle.

A GOOD LANDLORD.—Again we have this day the pleasure of recording the kind acts of a good landlord; and could the oppressor be taught to appreciate the feelings of high gratification resulting from those acts—feelings which must impart more real delight to the benefactor, than even to the objects of his bounty.—Ireland might before long lay claim to her ancient title—the Island of Saints. On Tuesday last, John Waldron, Esq., of Rathen-house, paid a visit to his estates, Ballymountain and Killeps, in the county of Waterford, and was received by his comfortable tenants with every demonstration of welcome. This gentleman was well entitled to their gratitude, for he had not only given them their farms at a low rent, but, as a further encouragement, he told them to drain and improve their lands, for which, and for every slated, well built house, he would make them full allowance. Mr. Waldron treats his tenants as men, not as serfs; they find in him their best friend and benefactor—the interest is mutual—their rents are not only paid to the day, but they are paid with the hearty benedictions of a grateful tenantry. This is the true way to make a people peaceable, happy, and contented.—Tipperary Free Press.

AGRICULTURE.

RENT; MONOPOLIST FALLACIES.

A monopolist will not or cannot understand what rent is—that it is only the surplus after repayment of the tenant's outlay with the ordinary profits. A thoroughgoing but not very acute organ of monopoly—the Farmer's Journal—after referring to our last week's remarks upon the Duke of Richmond's avowal of his rent-raising motives for upholding Monopoly, says:—

"The League organ then goes on to argue that his grace's statement proves the opponents of Free Trade to be only actuated by selfish designs to prevent the 'reduction of rents,' and is either stupid enough not to perceive, or dishonest enough to conceal the fact, that the £2000 a year apparently lost by the Duke of Richmond has in fact been sent out of the country, to the enrichment of the owner of the foreign fishery, and the manifest loss of all those who before derived a profit from supplying our own markets. For the tenant who formerly could afford to pay £7000 a year for what now only brings £5000, must have derived a proportionate advantage for himself, and circulated so much more money amongst the men he employed. The Duke of Richmond, too, would have spent the rent he has lost in England, whilst the owner of the foreign fishery expends not one shilling of the money paid to him for his salmon, for articles of British manufacture. So much for 'arguments' in favour of Free Trade."

And this is the sort of stuff by which the landowners of England imagine that a great commercial nation, an educated and civilized community, is to be deluded into being taxed to keep up the rents of dukes, earls, and squires! An examination and exposure of the fallacy will be useful, as it is the kind of would-be argument to which those Monopolists who are compelled to write up monopoly love to resort. Let us ask why the Duke of Richmond receives any rent for his fishery? What regulates the amount of that rent, and why has the amount of rent been affected by the tariff? The replies will settle where is the dishonest advocacy.

The demand for salmon in the British market is such as to raise the price of that article beyond the rate which would be sufficient to induce men to superintend fisheries, and catch and bring to market the fish. This implies that all the fish of that kind which can be brought to market will sell for more than the cost of preserving and catching it, with ordinary profit upon the labour and capital expended in so doing. The difference between the value of the fish to sell and the cost of bringing it to market (always including in the cost the ordinary profits) is paid to the owner of the fishery as rent. Now, the owner of the fishery procures a law to be passed which prevents the public from buying from any one but himself,—and whether the Duke of Richmond excludes every other owner of a fishery from the market, or only the owners of foreign fisheries, the principle is the same,—and the effect is that, from the under-supply of the market, the whole quantity brought there will sell for a sum sufficient to produce, over and above the cost of preserving, catching, and bringing to market (including profit), a sum of £7000 a year, which, under a monopoly, went to the Duke of Richmond as rent. Then comes a relaxation of the tariff, which lets into the market the fish of other fisheries,—in the present case foreign fisheries,—and the more abundant supply reduces the price so much that the tenant of the Duke of Richmond's fishery can only sell all the fish he can take to market for a sum which, after deducting expenses and profits, leaves a surplus of £5000 only instead of £7000 a year as rent for the landlord. But the difference of £2000 a year is not given away to the foreigner, as the monopolist writer would have believed, but remains in the pockets of the consumers of salmon, to be expended by them in the purchase of an increased number of dishes of fish, or in something else. Thus, if the matter stopped here, the consumers, not the foreigner, would have gained all that the duke lost; and inasmuch as the duke only lost what he ought never to have had, and which he only obtained by an abuse of legislative power, he has no more right to complain than has the pickpocket, who finds the purse, which he though he had snugly appropriated to himself, restored to its rightful owner.

But the matter does not stop here; for though the duke "would have spent the rent he lost in England," he would probably have spent it on horse-racing, opera-dancers, private theatricals, or some other aristocratic vanity; whereas the consumers of salmon, keeping in their own pockets the poll-tax they had previously paid to the Duke of Richmond, would expend it, directly or indirectly, in some industrious undertaking, or in promoting industry in some form or other.

Then, it is not true that the duke's tenant, when he paid rent of £7000 a year, "must have derived a proportionate advantage for himself, and circulated so much more money amongst the men he employed," than when he paid the reduced rent of £5000. Indeed, the contrary is more like the truth; for the price of salmon having been lowered, the demand for it has been increased from its having been brought within the reach of a lower and more numerous class of customers, and thus the tenant must have an increased business, employing more men and extra capital, so making more profit, though the landlord's surplus may have been diminished. What the monopolists and their writers find it so convenient not to perceive is, that rent is nothing and can be nothing except the surplus beyond expenses including the ordinary profits. Then, again, a trade of more or less value arises with foreign fishermen who send their salmon to our market, which is an advantage over and above those we have enumerated.

Thus, though the tariff, by admitting foreign salmon, may have deprived the Duke of Richmond of £2000 a year, which he had previously received as the extra, or monopoly, rent of his fishery, a sum he would probably have expended in promoting the fisheries and immoralities we have alluded to, we have, per contra—first, the retention of that sum by its rightful owners—who have probably earned it—the consumers of salmon; secondly, there is the increased trade in salmon consequent upon additional demand, which gives more profit to the renters of fisheries, and more employment to their workmen; next there is the greater sum of enjoyment by the consumers of fish, and the extension of the use of that article of food amongst a larger class of consumers; and, lastly, there is the clear gain of a new trade with the owners of foreign fisheries, the profits of which add to the wealth of the community, as the trade itself increases the means of employment for the industrious classes.

With this balance against the Duke of Richmond and monopoly, we do not think his loss—if restoration to the right owner of that the pretended loser was not entitled to can be called a loss—of his £2000 a year will excite much sympathy beyond the monopolist circles.

And precisely the same arguments we stated with reference to fish apply to corn: all that the monopolists get in the shape of rent, by reason of the price of corn being raised above its natural price, is a simple robbery of the consumers of grain, who form a far more important part of the community than the consumers of salmon; and all the secondary advantages which we have shown to accrue from the abrogation of the salmon monopoly would happen in a degree a thousandfold greater by the abolition of the grain monopoly. Besides which the process of upholding the corn monopoly operates most injuriously upon the welfare and independence of the growers of corn—the tenant-farmers. Let farmers and others who wish to understand the movements and motives of the monopolists keep these facts steadily in view, viz., that RENT IS ONLY THE SURPLUS AFTER THE EXPENSES OF CULTIVATION WITH THE ORDINARY PROFITS HAVE BEEN REPAID; and that whenever the landlord gets a larger share of this produce, which under the Corn Law he does when prices fall below the act-of-Parliament limit, the tenant is plundered. This will furnish the test before which their fallacies will shrink to their true value—nothing; and will show the way in which landlords conceive that they have an interest in high prices and low produce. High prices give them high rents, with low produce; while yearly tenancies, which are the main cause of low produce, give them a subservient and dependent tenantry. The one object or the other, sordid gain or undue political influence, forms the moving cause of every "protectionist" effort.

A CASE FOR THE MONOPOLIST SOCIETIES.

In a monopolist journal of North Britain, and a very appropriate pendant to a weak article abusing the Earl of Buchan and the Anti-Corn-Law League, and advocating the Corn Laws, we meet with the following advertisement:—

WHO recently Lost his whole Capital, between Two and Three Thousand Pounds, in a Farm in Roxburghshire.

He is now in advanced years, and has a Wife and Four Children too young to do anything for themselves.

At present he has nothing left but his furniture, one half of which must be sold for house-rent at Whit Sunday, unless he receive assistance.

THE SYMPATHY AND AID OF

FARMERS,

LANDLORDS,

AND THE BENEVOLENT PUBLIC.

It is requested for him, to relieve his furniture, pay a small debt incurred only for the plainest necessities of life, and, if possible, to put him in a way of earning a humble subsistence, and education for his children.

The smallest Subscriptions for this purpose, forwarded by Post office order or otherwise, will be thankfully received by Messrs. T. Cooper and Co., 1, South-bridge, Edinburgh.

Mr. Francis Richardson, merchant, Grassmarket.

Mr. Peter Scott, 9, South-bridge, Edinburgh.

Mr. Milne, Horsaugh Castle, Peebles.

Mr. Arrol, Rink, Se Kirk.

Mr. Grove, Howden, Selkirk.

Mr. Anderson, Snodhrope, Se Kirk.

Mr. T. on as C. anston, builder, Jedburgh.

Mr. Scott, Priesthugh, Hawick.

And at the Office of this Paper.

Here, most noble and worshipful dukes, lords, and squires of the Central Protection Society, is an opportunity for the useful application of your funds. Behold a victim of your system—here is a used-up tenant-farmer, whose capital has all gone into your pockets in the shape of rent. Will you not relieve him? or are you afraid of its being drawn into a precedent, and that all the farmers your Corn Laws have ruined may become applicants for your "protection?" If they should do so, Heaven help your funds; adieu to the hopes of pamphleteers; there will be an instant extinction of your "publication committee," for it is doubtful whether all your subscriptions would furnish a week's provision for half the farmers your Corn Laws have reduced to poverty during the last twenty years. We would gladly learn the history of the unfortunate farmer who has made this appeal to the public, for we have no doubt that the story of his ruin would be another chapter in the history of the Corn Laws, and would be most instructive to his brother farmers. It naturally occurs to ask, when did he take his farm? Was it before 1828, and did he calculate on 80s. a quarter for wheat, and agree to pay rent on that expectation? If so, the wonder is, not that his furniture is likely to be sold for debt now, but that he has not been in the workhouse or the colonies long ago. Or did he enter on a sliding scale valuation of 64s. a quarter for wheat, under the law of 1828? Or is he the victim of the last Corn Law of 1842? Did he receive a hard blow by selling his wheat at 36s. a quarter in 1835, while his landlord screwed out of him a rent calculated at 64s.? And did he get his coup de grace from the price of 47s. in 1843, when the law and the monopolists promised him 56s. a quarter for wheat? Was he devoured by game? Or did he lay out his capital in the improvement of the landlord's estate, and for so doing got his rent raised? Had he no lease, or one so absurd and restrictive as to render good farming impossible? These and a dozen other similar interrogations might suggest to those who know anything of the history of British agriculture causes connected with the Corn Laws sufficient to produce this unfortunate man's ruin. That he owes his fall to the delusions of the Corn Laws we have no doubt. Will some of the Free-Traders of the district make it their business to inquire into the case?

ENCOURAGEMENT TO MINISTERS.

At a recent sale of the live stock of a celebrated stock farmer in Northumberland, Mr. Bong, the following approval of the Free-Trade direction of the Ministerial measures emanated from two farmers present:—

"Mr. S. Donkin, Bywell hoped that the horn and horse would meet with the same degree of competition as they had seen the steers call for. Perhaps his friend opposite, Mr. Hogarth would admit that the announcement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to repeal the wool duty had something to do with the great demand for Mr. Bong's sheep."

And the vice-chairman, Mr. Forster, proposed "a good wool trade," and said that "he hoped, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had tried his 'prentice hand' on Free Trade by proposing the repeal of the wool duty, he would, when he became a proficient in the art, practise to a greater extent by repealing the Corn Laws."

And this sentiment seems to have been assented to by the 250 farmers present.

FAILING CROPS—FREE TRADE THE REMEDY.

The views we expressed a short time ago that the failure of food for stock, which the long-continued drought has now rendered absolutely certain, would reduce the value of stock, and diminish the quantity kept and fed, are fully confirmed by the various agricultural reports of the past week. Thus the Mark-lane Express says:—

"Serious apprehensions are now felt in regard to the late-born harvest and oats, whilst the accounts respecting the probable yield of hay are of the most discouraging character. Beans and peas are also said to have suffered to a considerable extent; and unless an immediate and entire alteration takes place in the weather, and artificial food for the feeding of cattle are likely to become scarce and dear."

So, again, the agricultural report from Nottinghamshire says:—

"Want of rain is telling on the price of every description of stock, the depreciation in the value of which is an evidence that there is a scarcity of keep at home."

And in Northamptonshire the same cause is producing the like effects:—

"ELSTOW FAIR.—The May fair was held on Tuesday: the supply of all kinds of stock was very good, but it was a heavy trade in all kinds. Many persons were said to buy in consequence of the shortness of keep. On the whole business was very flat."—Northampton Mercury.

Now, Indian corn might be bought at this moment in the seaports of the United States at less than 2s. a bushel, and beans, peas, and other cattle feeding grain may be had in various parts of the world at prices equally low; and any farmer who has paid attention to stock well knows how far a small portion of corn will go towards keeping cattle and other stock in good condition. The probable issue of the present season to the farmer will be a low price of stock from scarcity of keep, a small force of manure from his disinclination to keep and fat much stock at a loss, and a low price of wheat from abundant produce, while rents are calculated at monopoly prices: of course we shall yet hear more of agricultural distress; and that distress will be mainly caused by the Corn Laws. How long will farmers toss up their caps for high rents and "protection?"

MONOPOLIST SELF GLORIFICATION.

When the classes by whom the Corn Laws have been supported are driven into sanctioning improvements—which they resist as long as possible, lest their peculiar profits should be lessened or their supremacy affected—they are very apt to turn round and glorify themselves as the promoters of all the good they opposed as long as they were able. It is well known that railways—which are doing so much to promote the intelligence of the people—were opposed by most of the Monopolist landowners. Now, however, the new power of locomotion is thus referred to in a Monopolist paper in connexion with a Protectionist M.P.:—

"Our excellent county member, Sir Thomas Acland, may well be called active and indefatigable. On Wednesday he performed a feat which has never been equalled by any legislator in ancient or modern times. He left London the seat of Government, at half-past seven in the morning, came 194 miles to Exeter, dined at the festival, remained between four and five hours, and the same day returned to London, and enjoyed the music of the Ancient Concerts, where he met a party of his friends."—Dorset County Chronicle.

Now, all the squires of Devonshire and Dorset, and all the rest of the landocracy of England, might have bumped up to London on horseback between two saddlebags, with rawboned groans behind them, as in the days of Squire Western, but for the enterprise and industry of commercial England. When the Great Western Company's bill was first applied for and defeated in Parliament, the triumph of "slow coaches" over enterprise and rapid communication was celebrated by a dinner of monopolists at Silthill, at which the Duke of Buckingham presided!!

Now, however, every place is desirous of having a railway communication, and nobody is more busy in promoting such objects than the monopolist county members. Thus, at a meeting in support of a proposed railway to Dorchester, a letter from Mr. Acland, the Pro Corn-Law M.P., was read, in which we find the following passage:—

"I may be permitted to say, that, considering the state of the communications of this kind which exist in other parts of the country, and the peculiar position of this county with reference to them, it does appear to me a very desirable object to be obtained, if, upon further consideration, it should appear to be feasible."

Yet there are still some lingering, interested opponents of improved communications, for at the meeting Mr. John Hayne said:—

"He was sorry to differ in opinion from Mr. Williams, as to the advantage of having a railway to this town. He had ever thought, and he thought so still, that the respectability of the town depended upon the respectability of the trade; and he was of opinion that the proposed increased facility of going to London would injure the trade of the town, and consequently diminish its respectability."

Again,—

"Mr. T. Bennett, sen., said he believed that a railway would be of great injury to the trade of the town: they had not a population or traffic to support a line of railway, and therefore, being opposed to it, he would move an amendment, that this meeting do stand adjourned to this day six months.—The amendment was not seconded, and therefore fell to the ground."

Mr. Hayne, who first started the objection, it appeared had not resolution to move an amendment. But as this gentleman was an earnest advocate of the Corn Laws at the Dorchester "Protection Society," where he was put forward as a trader advocating restrictions on trade, it will be well our readers should be made aware of his actual position. Mr. Hayne is a man who has for many years enjoyed a considerable trade as a grocer in Dorsetshire, to which he has united the business of a farmer—being also to some extent a landowner. He is usually known amongst the country people as "Squire Hayne the grocer;" he is one of the old-fashioned, high-priced tradesmen, looking for his customers chiefly amongst the wealthier classes, and making a large profit upon a comparatively small number of sales. He also, being now himself rich, seeks to be personally noticed by the squirearchy of Dorsetshire. Here we find all the motives which can influence a trader to be a monopolist; the exclusive possessor of a confined, but to himself lucrative trade, he dreads the introduction of competition, general or local, and therefore he opposes Free Trade, and resists improvement of communications; and, anxious to curry favour with the landed gentry, he comes out at a monopolist meeting as a trading Anti-Free-Trader. It is by examining thus into the position and motives of those who—not being squires—come forth to do battle for monopoly that we shall discover their hollowness and worthlessness.

LANDLORD REVELATIONS.

Amongst the peculiar notions of the monopolists is that hallucination which supposes that a debtor, or a class of debtors, can, by lowering the real but maintaining the nominal value of money, pay their debts in the diminished coin, and retain their characters as honest men. Now, as the monopolist landlords are almost to a man in debt, this is undoubtedly a very convenient delusion, though nearly all the rest of the community agree in designating it something else. However, amongst the many odd things and suspicious acts which in the vocabulary of the Morning Post range under the terms, "Protection to British Industry," is a depreciation of the currency. This necessarily has the effect of widening the breach between the "protectionists" and Sir Robert Peel, and many fierce and furious attacks on the Minister on account of his late speech upon banking and currency have appeared in the Post. Some of these afford some curious illustrations of the frame of the monopolist-landowning mind, and the state of the landowning pocket, and corroborate much we have said about the springs of action of the monopolists. A "Norfolk Landowner" had written not long since to tell the Post that the return to cash payments in 1819 had reduced his income from £1000 a year to £1000, and denounced Peel as the author of his loss. Another "LANDOWNER" shortly afterwards takes up the same strain, and says:—

"Your correspondent, 'A Norfolk Landowner,' does not complain without cause of what he terms his 'hard fate,' in that every one must admit. To have £3000 a year out of £4000 a year taken from him by Sir Robert Peel and his mischievous measures, and to live in the daily fear of losing the remaining £1000 a year, may well make him complain; and if he does so in strong terms who can feel surprised? When, however, I compare the case of your correspondent with that of several of my other friends and acquaintances—most of them now dead, ruined, and broken-hearted—I cannot help thinking that your correspondent has much cause for thankfulness; thankfulness to Sir Robert Peel for having left him in the enjoyment of £1000 a year for upwards of twenty years."

Now, this is sufficiently absurd, but it shows to what pretences the monopolists will resort to account for their debts and their difficulties without adverting to the true cause, extravagant expenditure or want of prudence, while it serves to diminish the surprise naturally excited at the sillinesses we hear and read of at protectionist meetings; for the mind which has accustomed itself to irrational belief and unfounded expectations on one topic readily forms erroneous conclusions upon others. Hear the "landowners'" version of the downfall of some insolvent landowners:—

"Amongst my ruined friends and acquaintances (some of them, indeed, near family connections) were several with much larger estates than your correspondent's, every one of whom were totally ruined almost immediately after the passing of 'Peel's Currency Bill.' Consequently were ruined more than twenty years ago. Three of them were men with hereditary titles, and whose united estates were about £46,000 a year; one of them being £25,000 a year; another £12,000; and the third £9000 a year. They were all very ancient estates, and belonged to gentlemen whose ancestors had for many centuries been of prime note and distinction; in two of the cases of much higher rank than the parties themselves, who were only young or branches. Nearly the whole of the largest of the above estates got into the hands of a person who had been an army tailor, or something of that kind; the estate of £13,000 a year into the hands of a person who had been a wine and spirit merchant, and, I believe, a Government contractor, and whose father, I have been told, kept a London tavern or hotel. Into whose hands the £25,000 a year estate I do not recollect; indeed I am not certain that I ever heard, the property lying in a remote part of the country. I have more particularly noticed the above cases because in all of them the estates belong to gentlemen of distinguished families, and the possessors of hereditary titles. But their estates have been taken from them, and their titles left as bare as the bar of rock in the Hebrides."

Now, though this betokens a confusion of thought, an utter absence of power to connect cause and effect, which would seem to most persons of disciplined minds and business habits to merit little more attention than the ravings of an imbecile, it is by no means uncommon to hear such sentiments in aristocratic circles. That gentlemen of ancient family, hereditary titles and estates producing twenty-five, thirteen, and nine thousands a year, should have been ruined by a cause which affected not only the owners of estates but all other persons equally, while the other classes and other owners of estates have lived and prospered on the change, does seem to require some explanation. That these gentlemen and their ancestors had been "for many centuries of prime note and distinction" would, perhaps, lead those acquainted with the habits of landowners to suspect that each succeeding possessor of each estate, amongst other modes of acquiring note distinguished himself by laying an additional encumbrance upon the estate, and thus, though the shell of the estate descended to the "landowner's near connections," its substance had long been the property of other people. The fact that the estates got into the hands of people who had made money by their own industry shows that they must have been sold for money or money's worth, so that the mere parting with the acres could not have ruined these "hereditary" gentlemen, if the properties had been theirs to sell. And the pathetic expression of the Post's correspondent, that "their estates were all taken from them, and their titles left as bare as the bar of rock in the Hebrides," seems to point to some obdurate creditor wanting his own money; and in the same spirit the "Landowner" goes on to say:—

"I could mention several other cases—some of them cases of large estates, others of smaller ones—in all of which the former owners have been totally ruined, and the estates sold to rich cotton spinners, Government contractors, or other new people of humble origin; and into similar hands all many other ancient estates get unless something or other be done to prevent it."

What can be done to prevent these vulgar "new people of humble origin" buying the estates of the "distinguished families," unless the "distinguished" are able and willing to keep their estates themselves. And subsequently the truth slips out when the writer says:—

"It may be hardly necessary to observe that all the above cases were cases of heavily encumbered estates."

Now, here is the gist of the whole matter. These possessors of hereditary thousands a year turn out to have really no estates at all; they were in law and in fact tenants-at-will to persons who had bought the estates in detail by lending money upon the security of the property; and the gentlemen of "prime note and distinction" had probably adapted their expenditure to their ideal incomes of twenty-five, thirteen, or nine thousands a year, rather than their real incomes, which probably were not half, perhaps not a fifth, those sums. This would have ruined the "tailor," the "wine merchant," and the "army contractor," or "other new people of humble origin," as certainly and in less time than the landed proprietors; but the latter class seem to think that they are entitled to "eat their cake and to have it" at the same time, to borrow money on the security of land, and to keep the land without paying the debt. Not a few of the landowners, from 1830 to 1820, acted as if they imagined such a "golden age" of borrowing without payment was to be established for their especial benefit; and of course their end was ruin, and they might as well have attributed their downfall to a hot summer or a sharp frost as to "Peel's bill." Let the landowner's take a word of advice from one who has seen and observed something of the management of landed property, and who has watched the course of many landowning families: let no landed proprietor ever borrow money unless and except he shall at the same time set apart a definite portion of income which will redeem it in five years. In every other case let him sell so much of his land as will supply him with the money he wants. This will be far cheaper than borrowing, and will prevent him from being deluded by the possession of a large nominal and a small real income, and will render him a happier, richer, and more respectable man than he would have been as a mortgaged proprietor. Another danger from borrowing is, that at first it appears so easy, the interest at first looks like such a small deduction from the year's income, while the borrowed money, or the object for which it was borrowed remains,—facilis descensus averni—that in a few years, when a new object is started or the old difficulty recurs, the same process is again and again resorted to. Then come difficulties thick and threefold: more money is wanted, but the former lender has no more to lend, and a new lender won't be satisfied with a second mortgage; there must, therefore, be a fresh and expensive arrangement to pay off the old mortgages, and borrow a larger sum of another person, and then the end is not far off. Now, however, the public is hearing all these things from the landowners themselves.

MANURE TANKS.—The Earl Fitzwilliam, with his usual liberality, has intimated to his tenants that he will pay half the expense for providing tanks for containing liquid manure on the several farms held under his lordship.

Above 100 committees, formed in various parts of the country, are already in co-operation with the London committee for promoting the testimonial to Rowland Hill. The most eminent merchants and bankers of the City have subscribed towards the fund.

THE MONOPOLISTS.—The Agricultural Protection Society, following in the wake of the Free Traders, have offered four prizes, of £25 each, to the writers of the best essays on legislative protection, as enjoyed by tenant-farmers and labourers, cotton-manufacturers, woollen and silk manufacturers, hardware, and other manufacturers. These essays, if they ever see the light, will take their place amongst the curiosities of literature.—Leeds Times.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, May 25, 1844.

Our letters from South Lancashire describe in glowing terms the warm reception which Mr. Brown has everywhere met with in his Free-Trade canvass. The meeting at the Manchester Exchange is decisive, as to the light in which the contest is viewed by the mercantile and manufacturing classes; the great community assembled at that mart on the market day, spontaneously gathered round the candidate pledged to oppose monopoly, and left his antagonist "alone in his glory," to reflect upon the unequivocal condemnation of his pretensions pronounced by his fellow-citizens. Similar enthusiasm has been exhibited in all the manufacturing towns of the southern division of Lancashire; and the farmers of the district, who feel that their prosperity is essentially bound up with that of agriculture, have manifested in many places an earnest desire for Mr. Brown's success. The agricultural population will be found on the side of Free Trade, unless the screw be put on and turned very stringently. Monopoly, however, has taken the alarm; a Demetrius has been found in Manchester, as of old in Ephesus, to say to his brethren, "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth," and has endeavoured, not wholly without success, to raise as great a commotion among the partisans of Ceres in the North, as his prototype did among the votaries of Diana in the East. But the silver-smiths of Ephesus had more decency in their enthusiasm for their craft than some of the monopolists of Lancashire seem disposed to exhibit. If the following placard is not an audacious forgery, or the trick of some mean and unprincipled underling, it is one of the most ostentatious manifestations of aristocratic tyranny which has occurred since a Stanley superintended the massacre at Bolton in the great civil war. We need hardly request the attention of our readers to the ominous document; we need not anticipate the contemptuous indignation with which it will be perused:—

"Notice is hereby given, that the Earl of Derby's Annual Rentday for the Manor of Bury, will be holden on Monday, the 27th of May, 1844, at the house of Mrs. Wilding, the Eagle and Child Inn, in Bury aforesaid; for the Manor of Pilkington, on Tuesday, the 28th of May, at the house of Miss Anne Edge, at Bessingworth-Barn; and for Manchester, Salford, and Chetham, on Wednesday, the 29th of May, at the house of Mrs. Burns, the Eagle and Child, Temple, Chetham. The tenants are particularly requested to pay their rents on the above days, to prevent the necessity of personal application, and ultimately more severe measures being resorted to!!!!

"Thos. STRATTON, Agent.

"Office, Market-street, Bury."

Often and grossly as intimidation has been practised, we know not of any case in which it appears so grossly insulting, so thoroughly revolting. The demand for rents, and the threat of severe measures, on the very days appointed for polling, are without a parallel in the annals of elections. For the honour of our country, and even of our nature, we sincerely hope that this measure of unexampled despotism has not emanated from one of the authors of the Reform Bill; we trust that Lord Stanley has had nothing to do with the issuing of this declaration of war against all freedom and independence, this manifesto against the rights of conscience and honest opinion. If there be a spark of English spirit among those thus threatened, they will meet the proud oppressor with scorn and defiance, and dare him to do his worst in the presence of his insulted country. It wanted but this to show that the desperation of monopolists has become so great as to render them callous to all prudential considerations, and utterly regardless of common decency and common sense. But we abstain from comment: their own reflections will teach the authors of this precious document the iniquity of such a proceeding, if they have consciences; and if they have not, they are likely to find the moral impressively conveyed by the general reprobation of the community.

FREE-TRADE BAZAAR.

We trust our townsmen and townswomen are about to commence preparations for contributing to the novel and interesting exhibition, intended to be opened by the Council of the League, in London, in the month of July next. The Council recommend that each large town, with its neighbourhood should furnish a separate and distinctive stall, illustrative of its principal manufactures. The various processes in the manufacture of cotton are thus to be shown, from the original plant to the finished web; and the history of porcelain, from the first rude attempts to the perfection of modern workmanship. These contributions from the factories are to be diversified by the thousand ingenious and elegant devices suggested by the fancy and taste of the Free-Traders in each locality.

The Council rely with much confidence on the zealous co-operation of the ladies throughout the kingdom to render this part of their scheme effective; their confidence is justified by the past experience of the League. It will be remembered how, at an early period of its history, the ladies of Manchester, by means of a bazaar, held in the headquarters of Free-Traders, were enabled to present the treasurer with the magnificent sum of £10,000. We understand that the idea of the proposed bazaar in London is derived from the same indefatigable friends; and we doubt not the ladies of other commercial towns will now show how fervently they have at heart the interest of this most enlightened of charities. It is common ground on which all can meet who believe in the advantage of the freest exchange throughout the world of God's gifts and man's labour; and the proposed bazaar will afford the ladies an appropriate opportunity of doing the cause in concert with their husbands and brothers. A ladies' committee for Dundee should be immediately appointed: Free-Trade possesses many friends in the families of the gentry residing in the neighbourhood, who doubtless would be glad to co-operate with the ladies of the town in conducting the arrangements. On the part of the gentlemen, the efficient committee of our local association will be prepared to do their duty, and to receive the services of others who may be more particularly adapted for accomplishing the undertaking.

By commencing early we shall not only be the more likely to do credit to Dundee at the general exhibition in London, but another object might at the same time be attained. The collection previous to its transmission to the metropolis might be opened to the public in a large hall, so as to afford an agreeable promenade; and a small charge for admission might assist in swelling the Bazaar fund. Each provincial association might thus contribute to the central body its contingent of money as well as of articles for sale.

This scheme of the League promises to establish in Great Britain a centralized exhibition of manufactures and inventions, similar to those which the care of some continental governments has for some years provided for the commerce of other countries by no means so far advanced as Great Britain in the practical application of the arts and sciences. Every third year an extensive wooden erection is prepared in the Champs Elysees at Paris, in which specimens of the productions of the different departments of France in manufactures and scientific inventions are collected under royal patronage, and in which royal prizes and praises are administered to successful candidates.

It will be exceedingly characteristic of the difference between the two countries, and of the self-reliance of the British people, if in our case the same results are obtained by a union of merchants and manufacturers themselves—not only unaided but even discountenanced by the existing Government.

We are persuaded that, under the auspices of the League, the collection in London will not only prove superior to any royal or government exhibition ever opened, but will afford at the same time convincing evidence of the impolicy and the danger of restricting by parliamentary majorities the employment and the wages of millions of industrious workers engaged in so many ways, as will there be practically shown, in supplying the wants and increasing the comforts of the whole human family. Dundee Advertiser.

HALIFAX. A meeting of the committee of the Halifax Anti-Corn-Law Association was held on Wednesday, the 15th instant, in the Trustees' Office, Cheapside, Mr. Joseph Thorp in the chair; for the purpose of forming a ladies' committee to contribute to the Bazaar to be held in London in July next, in aid of the Great League Fund. Circulars have been issued, soliciting the valuable assistance of the ladies of Halifax, and we have no doubt but the call will be well responded to. The committee are also taking active measures to secure such voters as may happen to reside in Halifax and neighbourhood, for the approaching contest in South Lancashire. — Leeds Mercury.

POPULATION AND FOOD. It is a significant sign of the times, that, while the population of Sunderland is steadily on the increase, the consumption of animal food in that place is sensibly diminishing. The number of cattle, &c., now slaughtered for the town is believed, on good evidence, to be less by 25 per cent. than in the year 1841. The conclusion is, that multitudes of men, women, and children, who formerly ate animal food, now "rejoice on potatoes."

WAGES IN AMERICA. The Cincinnati Atlas, speaking of a factory in that city for the manufacture of cotton bagging, in which 50 girls and 40 men are employed, says, "A little girl at this establishment quitted work on Saturday at two o'clock, having woven 30 cuts, equal to 1534 yds. from Monday morning, for which she was paid 20 cents per cut, being 6 dollars for less than six days' employment." "O! 6 dollars a week for the labour of 'little girls' in a city where a bushel of flour is 1½ cents a pound, and chickens 8 cents a pair!"

THE BANDS ARE BREAKING. It is extremely difficult, at one and the same time, to keep up in full activity and excited enthusiasm more than one political movement. Corn-Law agitation, it must be admitted, now engages by far the most considerable portion of the public time and attention. Large funds, an admirable organization, a body of energetic men, on the whole, all, in a most righteous cause, have created in the national mind an intense desire for a repeal of the tax on bread, while daily appeals to all parts of the kingdom to the religious feelings, the commercial advantages, and the political rights of the people, sustain and animate the hope, that the hour of deliverance is near at hand. — Sentinel.

REVIEW.

Coningsby; or, the New Generation. By B. Disraeli, Esq., M.P. London, Colburn.

This is a remarkable book, written by a remarkable man, and published at a time when both the subject and the author are sure to command general attention. The design of the work is to set forth the political creed of that new political party usually called Young England, a party which wins sympathy where it fails to secure co-operation, by its enthusiasm, its earnestness, and its steady rejection of all the petty artifices and dishonest concessions by which ordinary politicians obtain support. We differ from "Young England" on many important points; we do not admire the end at which they aim, neither do we appreciate very highly the means which they employ; but nevertheless we are still more averse to the petty impertinence which sneers at generous enthusiasm, and jests at honourable, even when mistaken, feeling.

In the many notices of this work which have appeared from our contemporaries of the press one very important point has escaped observation, namely, the moral position from which the author views his subject. This is an interesting problem to solve, for both in this and several of his previous works Mr. Disraeli seems to have removed himself beyond the range of ordinary sympathies, and has led many to believe that his pictures are false and distorted, by not explaining the point of view from which they were delineated, and from which, if possible, they ought to be contemplated. Some years ago, when noticing his "Tale of Alroy" in "The Foreign Quarterly," we had occasion to notice the original character of his imagination, and the theocratic tendencies of his mind. Independent of his works, the intellectual phenomenon of an oriental judgment adjudicating western controversies, and an oriental fancy abstracting and combining the prosaic elements of European life, is sufficiently curious to arrest attention and provoke examination. Such an investigation has not been attempted, for pride, prejudice, and ignorance have combined in almost equal proportions to hide from the present, as well as from many past generations, that there exists an intelligent Judaism, a Hebrew heroism, an aristocracy of soul belonging to an outcast and despised nation, which gives to many of the Jews a nobility of thought and action which none of other races can inherit. Let us take an ideal Jew, not such as the great or small vulgar conceive, but such as the student of Isaiah, of Ezekiel, and of the older rabbinical writings can easily imagine. He claims to be a peer in that realm of which Jehovah himself is Sovereign; his patent of nobility is dated from Mount Sinai; his blood has flowed pure through the veins of priests, of prophets, and of martyrs; "Hear, O Israel," has sounded in his ears from childhood as words of favour from a Heavenly Sovereign; the accents of the language "that speaketh mighty things," and which tradition teaches him to be that spoken by angels in paradise, are familiar to him from his childhood; he feels that he is on but not of the earth; and the Buth kot brings him echoes from the heaven of which, while here, he regards himself as an exiled citizen. To a mind thus constituted there is something inexpressibly paltry and petty in the squabbles of political party, and the objects of modern ambition. He is at every moment tempted to inquire, "Why do the Goyim—the rejected nations of the earth—so furiously rage together, and the people imagine a vain thing?" To him a theocracy is a reality; it enables him to accomplish that of which the Epicurean poet dreamed:—

"Bene munia tenere Eh'ta doctrina sapientum templi serena."
"To view mankind safe in that blest abode, Rus'd by the wisdom, not of man, but God."

What to him is the nobility of Christendom? A mere upstart from the clay—a child of yesterday. A century of generations before European dukes and earls had a name, his ancestors were elect of God into an aristocracy of imperishable privilege and perpetual name. What to him are the titles and names of European chivalry? Nicknames and gewgaws, which are but as dust in the balance compared with the proud boast of being descended from Abraham.

This is the idealism which has ever been present to Mr. Disraeli's mind, but which has never thoroughly entered into his consciousness. His "Wonderful Tale of Alroy" was an impersonation of his dreams of Judah's glory, and of the high destinies to which "the chosen race" have been called. It was a conception of Judaism apart from Rabbinism—the ideal temple instead of the actual synagogue. Let us not be misunderstood: we do not join in the sweeping censures which have been pronounced on rabbinical lore; an opportunity may perhaps be afforded for showing that the glories of science and literature have not been wanting to the synagogue; from thence almost everything that is good in the Koran, and not a little of what is excellent in early Christian literature, was derived; we merely mean that Mr. Disraeli's idealized Judaism was derived from an older and a purer source—from the Hebrew theocracy such as it existed ere the sacred oracles were silenced and the shekinah rolled away from the pinnacles of Mount Zion.

Has Mr. Disraeli realized the idealism which we have described? We cannot bestow upon him such eulogy, we even doubt whether it was ever present to his imagination in all its simple and severe sublimity; had it been so, "Alroy" would have won a deathless name. But we think that this idealism, which we have but faintly portrayed, forms the basis of Mr. Disraeli's peculiar creed, and has in his writings, his speeches, and his public career exercised an influence which has caused him to be much misunderstood and much misrepresented. We live in prosaic days, when men have little taste for idealities of any kind, and where the idealism of Judaism would probably have the least chance of all.

"Coningsby" is, like "Vivian Grey," a political novel, the actors in which are living characters with fictitious names, the adventures partly real and partly imaginary, the plot not altogether fabulous, and the winding-up designed to be suggestive of prophecy. Our first business is with the characters: one of them is put so prominently forward, and portrayed with such minuteness of detail, that he forces himself first on our attention. Here is the picture of Rigby—long cursed by the navy as the patron of the worst jobs in the Admiralty,—long lauded by monopolists as the most unscrupulous defender of every vicious system in the "Quarterly."

"Mr. Rigby was a member for one of Lord Monmouth's boroughs. He was the manager of Lord Monmouth's parliamentary influence, and the auditor of his vast estates. He was more: he was Lord Monmouth's companion when in England, his correspondent when abroad—hardly his counsellor, for Lord Monmouth never required advice; but Mr. Rigby could instruct him in matters of detail, which Mr. Rigby made amusing. Rigby was not a professional man; indeed, his origin, education, early pursuits, and studies were equally obscure; but he had contrived in good time to squeeze himself into Parliament, by means which no one could ever comprehend, and then set up to be a perfect man of business. The world took him at his word, for he was bold, acute, and voluble; with no thought, but a good deal of desultory information; and, though destitute of all imagination and noble sentiment, was blessed with a vigorous, mendacious fancy, fruitful in small expedients, and never happier than when devising shifts for great men's scrapes.

"They say that all of us have one chance in this life, and so it was with Rigby. After a struggle of many years, after a long series of the usual alternatives of small successes and small failures, after a few cleverish speeches and a good many cleverish pamphlets, with a considerable reputation indeed for pasquinades, most of which he never wrote, and articles in reviews to which it was whispered he had contributed, Rigby, who had already intrigued himself into a subordinate office, met with Lord Monmouth.

"He was just the animal that Lord Monmouth wanted, for Lord Monmouth always looked upon human nature with the callous eye of a jockey. He surveyed Rigby, and he determined to buy him. He bought him; with his clear head, his indefatigable industry, his audacious tongue, and his ready and unscrupulous pen; with all his dates, all his lampoons; all his private memoirs, and all his political intrigues. It was a good purchase. Rigby became a great personage, and Lord Monmouth's man."

It is a pity that Mr. Disraeli had not the secret of Rigby's "Familiar Epistles" and the Irish lampoons: he would have made a capital picture of the satirist paid for speaking, and doubly paid for silence. He should also have specified Rigby's valuable services on the Duke of York's trial; his honourable exertions to shield profligacy and cover peculation; his sneers at virtue; his eulogy on vice, and his sensitive delicacy in the cross-examination of Mary Anne Clarke. Such exploits ought not to be lost to posterity for want of a chronicler. Let us, however, proceed with the character:—

"Mr. Rigby had a classical retreat, not distant from this (Lord Monmouth's) establishment, which he esteemed a Tusculum. There, surrounded by his busts and books, he wrote his lampoons and articles; massacred a she Liberal (it was thought that no one could lash a woman like Rigby), cut up a rising genius whose politics were different from his own, or scartified some unhappy wretch who had brought his claims before Parliament, proving by garbled extracts from official correspondence that no one could refer to, that the malcontent, instead of being a victim, was, on the contrary, a defaulter. Tadpole and Taper would back Rigby for a 'slashing reply' against the field. Here, too, at the end of a busy week, he found it occasional convenient to entertain a clever friend or two of equivocal reputation, with whom he had become acquainted in former days of equal brotherhood. No one was more faithful to his early friends than Mr. Rigby, particularly if they could write a squib.

"It was in this refined retirement that Mr. Rigby found time enough, snatched from the toils of official life and parliamentary struggles, to compose a letter on the study of history, addressed to Coningsby. The style was as much like that of Lord Bolingbroke as if it had been written by the authors of the 'Rejected Addresses,' and it began, 'My dear young friend.' This polished composition, so full of good feeling and comprehensive views, and all in the best taste, was not published. It was only privately printed, and a few thousand copies were distributed among select personages as a special favour and mark of high consideration. Each copy given away seemed to Rigby like a certificate of character, a property which, like all men of dubious repute, he thoroughly appreciated. Rigby intrigued very much that the head-master of Eton should adopt his discourse as a class-book. For this purpose he dined with the Doctor; told him several anecdotes of the King, which intimated personal influence at Windsor; but the head-master was immovable; and so Mr. Rigby was obliged to be content by his 'Letter on History' being canonized as a classic in the preparatory seminary, where the individual to whom it was addressed was a scholar."

Here, too, there are some remarkable omissions which it would be desirable to have supplied. The "Liberal" took her revenge in "Florence MacCarthy," and produced a portrait of Rigby under the name of Crawley, faithful in all its lineaments, and, therefore, a complete picture of a politician void of scruple and destitute of feeling. It should have been added to the account of "the garbled extracts from correspondence" that many of the victims took heart of grace and exposed the iniquitous treatment which they received. Parga was a case in point; and, if it were worth while, we could so illustrate the circumstances as to show an unequalled example of literary and political dishonesty combined in one transaction. The history of another article is sufficiently curious to deserve a little detail. The outbreak in the manufacturing districts in the autumn of 1842, so notoriously the result of destitution and want of employment, seemed to afford the old managers of "the spy and black-face system" an opportunity of reviving a business which they and their sires had found very lucrative, and, at the same time, of removing from the bench certain magistrates who refused to countenance jobs and wink at profitable abuses. Ingenious devices were employed to entrap these magistrates, and, at the same time, tales of plots and conspiracies were forwarded to the Home Office, enough to supply twenty such green bags as those furnished to Parliament by Sidmouth and Castlereagh. An agent was sent down to make inquiries; an ample collection of surmises, suspicions, and forced interpretations soon found its way to his table; but he could not find in the entire collections materials for even a plausible case against the League, and he returned to London with his useless budget. The collection scorned by the Attorney-General was transferred to the unscrupulous reviewer, and in due time an article made its appearance which could not easily be matched in deliberate falsification. In this article the worthy Rigby undertook to give a mathematical exposition of his notions of economic science: he only succeeded in showing himself utterly ignorant of even those mathematical elements which are familiar to children in a Sunday school, and incapable of understanding the plainest proposition in political economy. What was worse than all, a pet case of magisterial neglect broke down while the article was in the press, all reference to it was necessarily cancelled, and "the part of Hamlet was omitted by particular desire." The article itself, deprived of what had been designed for its principal attraction, fell stillborn from the press, and is only remembered as an example of effete malignity.

The author might beneficially have extended his notice of Rigby's friends of "equivocal reputation;" the acquaintances formed when Rigby catered for the delicate amusements of the Duke of York. It would have been amusing to have a graphic sketch of the delinquency that allowed of sitting at table with ladies of very unequivocal reputation, but struck from being their companion in a carriage.

The historical labours of Rigby have not received full justice from Mr. Disraeli. He should have noticed the history of England which he published, and in which such trifling events as Magna Charta and the Revolution are omitted as suggesting inferences of questionable tendency. But his chief literary reputation arose from his slashing articles, which Mr. Disraeli has very felicitously characterized:—

"These 'slashing articles' were, indeed, things which, had they appeared as anonymous pamphlets, would have obtained the contemptuous reception which, in an intellectual view, no compositions more surely deserved; but, whispered as the productions of one behind the scenes, and appearing in the pages of a party review, they were passed off as genuine coin, and took in great numbers of the large, especially in the country. They were written in a style apparently modelled on the briefs of those sharp attorneys who weary advocates with their clever common-places, teasing with obvious comment, and torturing with inevitable inference. The affectation of order in the statement of facts had all the lucid method of an adroit pettifogger. They dealt much in extracts from newspapers, quotations from the 'Annual Register,' parallel passages in forgotten speeches, arranged with a formidable array of dates scarcely accurate. When the writer was of opinion he had made a point, you may be sure the hit was in italics, that last resource of the forcible feeblers. He handled a particular in chronology as if he were proving an alibi at the Criminal Court. The tenure was coarse without being strong, and vindictive when it would have been sarcastic. Now and then there was a passage which aimed at a higher flight, and nothing can be conceived more unlike genuine feeling, or more offensive to pure taste. And yet perhaps the most ludicrous characteristic of these factious galimatheys was an occasional assumption of the high moral and admonitory tone, which, when we recurred to the general spirit of the discourse, and were apt to recall the character of its writer, irresistibly reminds one of Mrs. Cole and her prayer-book."

But enough of Rigby. Turn we to a different portrait, drawn with equal fidelity, but also characterized by some remarkable omissions:—

"The other gentleman was of a different class and character. Nature had intended Lucian Gay for a scholar and a wit; necessity had made him a scribbler and a buffoon. He had distinguished himself at the University; but he had no patrimony, nor those powers of perseverance which success in any learned profession requires. He was good-looking, had great animal spirits, and a keen sense of enjoyment, and could not drudge. Moreover he had a fine voice, and sang his own songs with considerable taste; accomplishments which made his fortune in society, and completed his ruin. In due time he extricated himself from the Bench, and merged into journalism, by means of which he chanced to become acquainted with Mr. Rigby. That worthy individual was not slow in detecting the treasure he had lighted on—a wit, a ready, and happy writer, a joyous and tractable being, with the education, and still the feelings and manners, of a gentleman. Frequent the Sunday dinners which found Gay a guest at Mr. Rigby's villa; numerous the airy persequades he left behind, and which made the fortune of his patron. Flattered by the familiar acquaintance of a man of station, and sanguine that he had found the link which would sooner or later restore him to the polished world that he had forfeited, Gay laboured in his vocation with enthusiasm and success. Willingly would Rigby have kept his treasure to himself; and truly he hoarded it for a long time, but it oozed out."

Lucian Gay (we willingly leave him under the shade of his fictitious name) was unscrupulous in levying money on others, and lavish of what he had thus unworthily acquired. Hence arose the necessities which made him through life dependent on men he despised, and forced to practise arts which he detested. But notwithstanding these serious defects, to call them by no harsher name, Lucian Gay's convivial talents, combined with his vast and varied intellectual powers, rendered him a universal favourite. One of his extraordinary displays of versatility is thus described:—

"His powers of mimicry indeed were great and versatile. But in nothing was he so happy as in a parliamentary debate. And it was remarkable that, though himself a man who on ordinary occasions was quite incapable without infinite perplexity of publicly expressing his sense of the merest courtesy of society, he was not only a master of the style of every speaker of distinction in either House, but he seemed in his imitative play to appropriate their intellectual as well as their physical peculiarities, and presented you with their mind as well as their manner. There were several attempts to night to induce Lucian to indulge his guests with a debate, but he seemed to avoid the exertion, which was great. As the night grew old, however, and every hour he grew more lively, he suddenly broke without further pressure into the promised diversion, and Comingsby listened really with admiration to a discussion, of which the only fault was that it was more parliamentary than the original; 'plus Arabe que l'Arabe.'"

"The Duke was never more curt, nor Sir Robert more specious; he was as fiery as Stanley, and as acid as Graham. Nor did he do their opponents less justice. Lord Palmerston himself never treated a profound subject with a more pleasant volubility; and when Lucian rose at an early hour of morn, in a full house alike exhausted and excited, and after having endured for hours in sarcastic silence the menacing finger of Sir Robert shaking over the green table and appealing to his misdeeds in the unrevocable records of Hansard, Lord John himself could not have afforded a more perfect representative of pluck."

"But loud as was the laughter, and vehement the cheering with which Lucian's performances were received, all these ebullitions sank into insignificance compared with the reception which greeted what he himself announced was to be the speech of the night. Having quaffed full many a quough of toddy, he insisted on delivering it on the table, a proposition with which his auditors immediately closed."

"The orator appeared, the great man of the night, who was to answer everybody on both sides. Ah! that harsh voice, that arrogant style, that saucy superciliousness which decided on everything, that insolent ignorance that contradicted everybody; it was impossible to mistake them! And Comingsby had the pleasure of seeing reproduced before him the guardian of his youth, and the patron of the mimic—the Right Honourable Nicholas Rigby!"

We must be satisfied this week with exhibiting these specimens of Mr. Disraeli's powers in delineating character. As a moral anatomist, he may be supposed by many to have used the knife too roughly; but one of the subjects at least is so callous all over, that greater delicacy of cutting would have failed to develop his peculiar formations. In our next we shall examine some of Mr. Disraeli's commentaries on contemporary history.

The Poems of Charles Churchill, with copious Notes and a Life of the Author by W. Tooke, F.R.S. London, Pickering.

Churchill's poems were so exclusively political, and so immediately designed to serve the temporary purposes of party, that it required no ordinary share of merit to save them from total oblivion. But even their poetic power would have been insufficient to save them from the certain fate to which all party effusions are predestined, had not the constitutional questions then at issue between the court and the nation possessed a greater interest and importance than any which have since been brought into public discussion. The early part of the reign of George III., discoloured from all modern associations by such great events as the American war of independence, the French Revolution, and the wars against Napoleon, has as remote an interest in its facts as the reigns of the Tudors and almost of the Plantagenets; but some influences were then established which retain their power at the present day, and render the examination of that era neither unimportant nor uninteresting.

As Churchill is full of allusions to persons and events which are now passed into general oblivion, the task of his editor and commentator was one of considerable difficulty. Mr. Tooke has spared neither time nor toil in collecting the requisite elucidations, and his notes contain everything that could possibly be desired for illustrating the meaning of the author, and pointing out the objects at which the shafts of his wit were directed. But unfortunately Mr. Tooke has gone beyond the line of a commentator's legitimate duty, and has superadded some of his own opinions on modern politics, irrelevant to his subject, and not the most creditable either to the taste or feeling of the author. Let us hope that they may disappear from the next edition, and that we may be enabled, as we earnestly wish, to bestow praise without such serious qualifications.

The poems before us principally relate to the personal contest between Wilkes and George III.; we say "personal," because the sovereign, from the very outset, placed himself in the arena, and directed the weapons which were aimed at the demagogue. The people of England would have cared little about such a paltry squabble had not an attempt been made to get at the weaker party through the shield of the constitution. Wilkes had no claims to respect either in public or in private life: he was a profligate and the associate of profligates; but every man of sense and proper feeling was disgusted when the very worst companions of his infamous orgies took a prominent part in denouncing those abominations in which they had been more than participants. An Earl of Sandwich, denouncing the "Essay on Woman," was a living exemplification of the Spanish caricature of the Devil turned preacher. The original of Disraeli's "Rigby" might as fairly read homilies on the disgrace of pandering to aristocratic vices. Such patent and palpable hypocrisy invited the attack of the satirist, and fully justified his severity. Lord Mahon very justly reproaches Churchill for his virulent attack on the Scottish nation, but something may be said in extenuation of the poet. Previous to the reform of Parliament the whole Scottish representation was a system of rottenness and corruption, and the Scotch members were proverbial for their subservience to the dispensers of the loaves and fishes. The nation was unfairly estimated by the notorious character of its nominal representatives, and was consequently misunderstood by the people of England. Now that the representation of Scotland has been purified, the men of the North are no longer the object of attack for every libeller who counts celebrity by flattering popular prejudice, and a modern imitator of Churchill would be hooted out of society.

Mr. Tooke's notes fully maintain Churchill's assertion, that the accession of George III. was the commencement of an injurious change in the social character of England, and that the limited intellect and defective education of that sovereign prevented the empire from advancing to that height of moral and political eminence to which it was advancing under the administration of the elder Pitt. We shall soon have occasion to examine this portion of history, and shall then enter into a comparison between the latter years of George II. and the first years of George III. Churchill's poems are an indispensable aid to all who would wish to form a correct notion both of the intellectual and the political character of the period, and without the aid supplied by Mr. Tooke's notes they could scarcely be made available for that or any other purpose. We therefore feel ourselves bound to render the editor thanks for having well performed an acceptable service, but must add our regret for his having travelled out of the record in a manner which neither does credit to himself nor affords pleasure to his readers.

"The object of the central society," says Mr. Cayley, M.P., "is to maintain protection to British agriculture, not less than at present existing" in other words, not "to allow to others the privileges they enjoy themselves." Special protection (observes the Times) is absolutely incompatible with equal and general protection. No class can be protected except at the expense of all the others. Give equal protection to all, and you give special protection to none.

DEARTH AS OLD SOURCE OF RIOT.—From "Sharpe's Egypt under the Romans," we learn that, in the 10th year of the reign of Anastasius, the Persian army entered Egypt, laid waste the whole of the Delta up to the very walls of Alexandria, but at length retired, leaving the people ruined as much by the loss of a harvest as by the sword. Alexandria suffered severely from famine and the diseases which follow in its train; and history has gratefully recorded the name of Urban, a Christian Jew of great wealth, who relieved the starving poor of that city with his bounty. Three hundred persons were squeezed to death in the church of Arcadius on Easter Sunday, in the press of the crowd to receive his alms. As war brought on disease and famine, so there brought on rebellion. The people of Alexandria, in want of corn and oil, rose against the magistrates, and many lives were lost in the attempt to quell the riots.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEMORIALS.

LEADS FREE-TRADE MEMORIAL.—This document is now complete, and has been forwarded to the borough members, William Beckett, Esq., and William Aldam, Esq. It contains a request that they will support Mr. Villiers's motion for the entire and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. That the utmost authenticity might be given to the memorial, the place of abode of every individual elector who has affixed his signature is given, with his number on the last register. The result of the canvass is the recorded opinion of a large majority of the constituency in favour of Free Trade, as appears from the following statement:—

|-------------------------------|------|
| Total entries on the register | 6139 |
| Deceased duplicate entries | 1191 |
| Electors dead | 76 |
| | 1268 |
| Total number of electors | 4971 |
| Signatures to the Memorial | 2746 |
| Number who have not signed | 2225 |
| Clear Free-Trade majority | 521 |

The numbers who have not signed comprehend 60 Free-Trademen, who, for various reasons, decline to affix their signatures; 55 advocates of a fixed duty; and 56 who have left the town, and, therefore, could not be seen.—Leeds Mercury.

TYNEMOUTH.—The Tynemouth Free-Trade Association are promoting an electoral memorial to H. Mitcalfe, Esq., M.P., requesting him to support Mr. Villiers's forthcoming motion for the abolition of the Corn Laws.

Lord Ossulton and Mr. A. J. Baker Cresswell, members for North Northumberland, have been requested by a memorial from Alnwick and its vicinity, bearing about 300 signatures, to support Mr. Villiers's motion on the Corn Laws.—Tyne Mercury.

OCCUPATIONS OF THE PEOPLE OF WALES, AND THE ISLANDS OF THE BRITISH SEAS.

Having received the returns for the other six counties of Wales, which exhibit the occupations of the people, we proceed to lay before our readers the results of these returns, as to the whole of the principality, in tables arranged as we have explained in former articles of a similar nature. If there is one large tract of the island more than another likely to be almost purely agricultural, it is Wales; and, therefore, we are quite aware that in these tables is shown the nearest approach to equality between the trading and agricultural classes that is likely to be exhibited in any considerable district south of the Tweed. But what is the fact? Only one county—Radnorshire, possessing the smallest population of any Welsh county—has a larger number of persons employed in agriculture than in trade and manufactures; and the agricultural population of Wales is only 11.18 per cent. of the aggregate population, while the trading and manufacturing population amounts to 21.32 per cent. of the whole. In other words, there is but one-ninth of the population of Wales engaged in agriculture, while those engaged in trade and manufactures are very nearly one-fourth of the aggregate population of the principality.

The following table exhibits the actual numbers by enumeration for the census of 1811, of farmers, graziers, and yeomen, apart from the agricultural labourers, the total numbers engaged in agriculture, the total number engaged in trade and manufactures, and the centesimal proportion of persons in agricultural occupations to the whole population, both in each county and in the entire principality:—

| COUNTIES. | Farmers, graziers, & yeomen. | Agricultural labourers. | Total in agriculture. | Persons in trade and manufactures. | Proportion of persons in agriculture to population. |
|-------------|------------------------------|-------------------------|-----------------------|------------------------------------|---|
| Anglesey | 2,318 | 5,291 | 7,609 | 9,149 | 13.0 |
| Brecon | 2,107 | 3,351 | 5,458 | 15,699 | 9.8 |
| Cardigan | 5,171 | 5,151 | 10,322 | 13,895 | 12.9 |
| Cardigan | 5,509 | 8,887 | 14,396 | 21,730 | 13.5 |
| Cardigan | 3,496 | 6,164 | 9,660 | 18,497 | 11.9 |
| Denbigh | 3,467 | 7,713 | 11,180 | 20,591 | 12.5 |
| Festiniog | 1,774 | 3,559 | 5,333 | 17,196 | 7.9 |
| Glamorgan | 4,191 | 6,541 | 10,732 | 55,699 | 6.6 |
| Merioneth | 2,367 | 3,243 | 5,610 | 8,478 | 14.2 |
| Montgomery | 3,187 | 6,616 | 9,803 | 14,697 | 11.6 |
| Pembroke | 2,994 | 6,361 | 9,355 | 19,738 | 10.6 |
| Radnor | 1,584 | 2,981 | 4,565 | 4,401 | 17.8 |
| Total Wales | 33,793 | 66,211 | 100,004 | 211,720 | 11.18 |

From the above table we find that the agricultural labourers are nearly double the number of the tenant farmers. In Brecon, the persons in agricultural occupations form only 9.8 per cent. of the population of that county, while in Radnorshire they reach the maximum of 17.8 per cent. The following table exhibits the remaining classes of occupations into which the population of Wales is divided:—

| COUNTIES. | Persons of independent means. | Alms-beggars, and persons not described. | Other persons not described. | Residue of population. | Total Population. |
|-------------|-------------------------------|--|------------------------------|------------------------|-------------------|
| Anglesey | 1,094 | 709 | 88 | 31,212 | 50,891 |
| Brecon | 1,305 | 512 | 141 | 8,693 | 10,651 |
| Cardigan | 2,193 | 637 | 54 | 42,911 | 45,795 |
| Cardigan | 3,602 | 991 | 151 | 65,443 | 70,187 |
| Cardigan | 2,281 | 374 | 213 | 50,608 | 53,476 |
| Denbigh | 1,908 | 896 | 101 | 51,196 | 54,095 |
| Festiniog | 1,252 | 378 | 360 | 42,402 | 44,392 |
| Glamorgan | 4,071 | 760 | 416 | 10,480 | 15,727 |
| Merioneth | 1,014 | 412 | 40 | 23,719 | 25,185 |
| Montgomery | 1,177 | 840 | 51 | 47,551 | 49,619 |
| Pembroke | 3,147 | 882 | 193 | 51,717 | 55,939 |
| Radnor | 815 | 175 | 42 | 15,328 | 16,360 |
| Total Wales | 23,978 | 7,427 | 1,892 | 556,615 | 611,663 |

The women and children not employed, as in other cases, form the majority of the population. It is a striking circumstance that Radnorshire, which shows a maximum agricultural population, exhibits a minimum of persons of independent means, there being only 815 independent persons in a population of 25,356.

The following are pretty nearly the centesimal proportions of the different classes of occupations of the people of Wales:—

| Persons in agricultural occupations | Per cent. |
|-------------------------------------|-----------|
| in trade and manufactures | 21.32 |
| of independent means | 2.53 |
| receiving alms, beggars | 0.81 |
| not described | 0.10 |
| residue; women and children | 61.16 |

100 per cent.

We have not yet received the return for Surrey, so that we cannot complete our tables for England; but we may add here the aggregate results as to the islands in the British Seas, including Guernsey and Jersey (i. e., the Channel Islands), and the Isle of Man. The occupations of these islanders stand thus:—

|-------------------------------|---------|
| Farmers, graziers, and yeomen | 3,970 |
| Agricultural labourers | 4,211 |
| Total in agriculture | 8,181 |
| Trade and manufactures | 33,336 |
| Of independent means | 7,176 |
| Alms-beggars, &c. | 1,099 |
| Residue; women and children | 74,135 |
| Total population | 124,040 |

In these islands it seems the persons engaged in agriculture form only 6.6 of the entire population, while those engaged in trading and manufacturing occupations are about 26.9 of the whole population. In other words, the agriculturists are about one-fifteenth, the traders, &c., nearly one-fourth of the entire population of these islands.—Manchester Guardian.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK LANE, Monday, May 20.—There was a good supply of English Wheat to this morning's market, it was taken off, though rather slowly, at about the price of this day week. The supply of Foreign Wheat last week was large, and the trade to-day was slow at former rates. Foreign Barley continues to arrive in large quantities, but the prices of this day week were notwithstanding obtained. The supply of Beans was again scanty, and an advance of fully 1s. per qr. established. Peas fell as dear as last week. Of the large quantity of Irish Oats which appears in the return, a large proportion arrived in time for our market this day week; there was not a brisk trade, but last week's rates were fully maintained.

FRIDAY, May 24.—The supplies of all Grain since Monday are very moderate. The trade in both English and Foreign Wheat is just the same as on Monday, with a little more inquiry. A considerable proportion of the recent large arrivals of Foreign Barley has been taken off, and an advance on Monday's prices is obtained. Irish Oats are held firmly at fully Monday's rates; there is not, however, a brisk sale. English are scarce, and rather better prices are obtained for the few samples that are offering. Beans and Peas fully maintain Monday's prices.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive a copy, weekly, of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND, are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

REGISTRATION.—All parties anxious for information on the subject of Registration, or desirous of claiming to be registered as Electors for the City of London, or for any one of the Metropolitan Boroughs, or County of Middlesex, are requested to communicate with Mr. Sidney Smith, at the Registration Offices of the League, 68, Cheapside.

RETURN OF MR. ENTWISLE.

The Monopolist journals are crowing—ye gods! how they are crowing!—over the South Lancashire election. They must have been in a desperate fright, and have deemed their cause in a desperate condition, to be thrown into this exuberant rapture by such a victory. What would they have said had the poll shown a progress in the power of Monopoly at all analogous to that which it evinces on the side of Free-Trade principles?

We grant them that Mr. Brown had a majority in only six polling places out of the ten; and that the chosen of the Liverpool district, the Manchester, Ashton, Bury, Oldham, and Rochdale, was rejected by the independent voters of those of Newton, Bolton, Ormskirk, and Wigan. At a distance, it seems strange that these localities should reverse the fate of an election, and return the representative of South Lancashire; but so it is, and we give Monopoly joy of its victory.

We grant that Mr. Brown only polled 6972 electors, being 1400 more than placed Lord Francis Egerton at the head of the poll in 1835, and 400 more than the highest Liberal candidate (not a Free-Trader) in 1837. We grant that the adhesion of Mr. Entwisle to the bit-by-bit application of Free-Trade doctrines, in which he is prepared to stick to Sir Robert Peel, is very objectionable to us, as compared with the manly and consistent principle of his opponent; and allowing all this, for Monopolist scribes to make the most of, we again give them joy of their triumph, and beg to ask how many similar victories they are able to bear without the repeal of the Corn Laws becoming inevitable?

Mr. Entwisle is an addition to the Peel portion of the Parliament. He simply increases the pulp of the orange, which is between two screws. We shall have his vote whenever Sir Robert is squeezed hard enough. The existence of such a class is very contemptible; the return of such a man is very contemptible; the pursuit of such a policy is very contemptible; but still it is not the out-and-out, callous, bread-taxing cause that has triumphed. We are not beaten by Monopoly; we are only beaten by compromise, equivocation, and unprincipledness. The slimy creature is the hardest to beat of the two: just as the soap on a certain animal's tail makes it harder to catch. Still the selection shows that Monopolists were not quite so ready as Free-Traders to fight out fairly the plain battle of principle.

An accurate and complete analysis of the poll is in course of preparation, which will probably exhibit results of no little interest to the public. Something will be seen by it of that power of property over votes which makes electoral influence an important item in the worth of an estate. The operation of the Chandon Clause will also be traced,

There is no doubt of the fact, that striking the tenants-at-will off the poll would leave Mr. Brown in a majority of many hundreds. There are 4000 electors of this class, of whom a small proportion were at liberty to vote as they pleased. The League will not be unmindful of its pledges to labour for the purification of elections. Exposure, at any rate, awaits culprits whom no other punishment can reach.

What an odd notion the Morning Herald must have of vitality. It proclaims the League "defunct," because, in the first county contest ever attempted on Free-Trade principles, only about 7000 votes have been polled. At the same time it warns the Protectionists against "falling back into contented indolence," and foretells that, if so, "all their recent perils and alarms will inevitably return after the first bad harvest." Our contemporary, then, fears that even a dead League may be too much for living Monopoly. In his apprehension, its very ashes may prove destructive "after the first bad harvest." All the energy of Protectionists is invoked against that contingency. This note of preparation speaks volumes against the Corn Laws. Already the landowners are counselled to look out lest the pressure of impending famine should be destructive to their ill-gotten profits. They are advised that Humanity is in strength where multitudes are starving, and that they should be on the alert to prevent its effecting a diminution of their law-created prices. The cry of millions may rise to Heaven, if it can; but if the Richmonds and Buckinghamians attend to their Seer, they will take means against its stopping, or being heeded, on the way thither. There is truth in the foreboding. Whatever else may last over the next "bad harvest" it will assuredly not be the Corn Laws.

The League will not be in fault if the controversy and the struggle endure until a period so critical. Its efforts are directed to the settlement of the question in a time of comparative calm. Not that any postponement of the evil day affords any reason for compromise, or that compromise would ward it off. But a peaceful and constitutional decision is our object; we leave Monopoly the responsibility of running the risk of confusion.

While the number of Tories who not only voted for, but took an active part in endeavouring to secure the return of, the Free-Trade candidate was considerable, there were many Whigs who pursued an opposite course. The old party distinction is evidently fast breaking down. But it cannot be concealed that the advocates for further organic change, especially in the extension of the Suffrage and the Ballot, gain largely for their cause by such elections. The violations of electoral rights are too glaring for endurance. The League may restrict its own operations to its own question; but it cannot limit thoughts of reprobation, feelings of disgust, and the progress of discontent. The topics we refer to are forced upon men's minds. Monopoly may soon have other work upon its hands besides that cut out for it by the League. It is sustaining its parliamentary force by means that cannot but engender a tremendous reaction. Such is ever the lot of legislative iniquity. Let the fields be ever so fruitful, our dual protectionists are sowing and ripening a "bad harvest" for their own reaping.

ELECTION FOR THE KILMARNOCK BURGHES.—TRIUMPH OF FREE-TRADE.

The Kilmarnock election affords unequivocal proof of the great progress of Free-Trade opinions, and also of the wisdom of the course adopted by the Council of the League in directing its attention to the principles, not to the persons of candidates, and leaving in all cases the choice of the individual pledged to support Free Trade to the constituencies themselves. Three candidates offered themselves for this vacancy, each of whom was an avowed Free-Trader; the choice of the constituency fell upon the candidate most closely connected with the League, Mr. Bouverie having publicly given his adhesion to that body. One of the candidates withdrew; the other, Mr. Vincent, resolved to divide the Liberal interest, by going to the poll. This division seemed to open a chance of success to the Monopolists, and they accordingly brought Mr. Prinsep into the field. Thus, for one seat, there were two Free-Trade and one Monopolist candidate. It is obvious, therefore, that the aggregate of the votes given for Mr. Bouverie and Mr. Vincent is the correct index to the strength of the Free-Trade interest in the borough of Kilmarnock, and thus the true majority over Monopoly is 108 votes. Now, at the previous contested election the Free-Trade candidate, the late Mr. Alexander Johnstone, had only a majority of 11, so that the cause of Free Trade has gained in that borough, within two years, by close upon 100 votes. It should be distinctly understood that, in the choice of a candidate out of the three Free-Traders who offered themselves for the representation, the League did not in any way interfere, but left the decision entirely in the hands of the constituency; under these circumstances it is peculiarly gratifying to find that the choice of the independent electors has fallen on the gentleman most closely identified with the League, both by his own public profession of principle and by his determination to adopt the course of his noble father, one of the illustrious few who has ever employed the privileges of his peerage to promote the prosperity and secure the rights of the people.

THE ANTI-LEAGUE AND THE MORNING HERALD.

Can any one tell what has become of the Anti-League and its Central Committee for the Protection of Native Industry? Is it defunct or merely in a state of suspended animation? Is its silence to be explained by shame for the detected falsifications of Mr. Cayley, or by the more substantial gift of office to one of the younger branches of the Goodwood-tree? After escaping strangulation by Buckingham's garter, has it been finally smothered by the Lennox embraces of the Treasury? So silent has it been, that we should have run the risk of forgetting that it ever existed but for a lugubrious article in "Granny," as the Morning Herald is irreverently designated, in which that venerable old lady having vented a little spleen at the naughty LEAGUE, and a good deal of petty spite on its formidable rival, the Times, turns fairly round on the Central Committee, and reads that body a pretty sharp lecture in the peculiar style of eloquence which has so long characterized the poor gentlewoman of Catherine-street. The meeting on Wednesday evening at Covent-garden answered by anticipation the Herald's lucubrations of Thursday; never were the members of the League more determined, more enthusiastic, and more confident of success at no very distant date, than they are at the present moment. Mr. Cobden's speech precludes the necessity of any comment on the election for South Lancashire. It is acknowledged on all hands to have been a signal proof of progress, and this is strongly put forward by the Times, a journal which has not been remarkable for showing favour to the League. Though we have spoken of that election in another part of the paper, we shall here extract the account of the League's progress given in the Times, for the purpose of contrasting it with the view of the Anti-League set forth by the Morning Herald. In recording the result of the election, the Times says:—

"Mr. Entwisle has been returned by a majority considerably reduced as compared with that obtained by the Conservatives in 1837. Mr. Wilbraham's majority over Mr. Towneley in the latter year was upwards of 1100; on the present occasion Mr. Entwisle's friends only claim 622, while the supporters of Mr. Brown only admit 578.

"It is useless to deny the fact that the large number polled by Mr. Brown is mainly to be attributed to the prevalence of Free-Trade opinions throughout the manufacturing districts of the county, and the influence and immense exertions of the Anti-Corn-Law League, assisted as it was by the absence of any popular grounds for supporting the successful candidate.

"Mr. Cobden, in a speech which he delivered last night at the close of the election, said he would not omit paying a tribute to those who on this occasion had come out from the Conservative party in support of Free-Trade principles. A vast breach had been made in party distinctions. That breach would go on widening, and would never again be closed. He looked forward to the time when the whole people of Lancashire would take up the question of Free Trade on one common ground, for they had all one common interest.

"As a proof that it was the influence of these opinions rather than any general political party bias which led to the comparatively small majority obtained by Mr. Entwisle, it may be mentioned that Mr. Brown, his opponent, was nominated by Mr. Gardner, a Conservative, of Manchester; and it is said that the present Conservative Mayor of Liverpool was one of his most active canvassers."

So much for the state of the League, after having received what many regard as "a heavy blow," but what no one looks upon as "a severe discouragement." Now, what is the condition of the Monopolist confederation—the Anti-League? We are told by the Morning Herald that "there is a danger of their allowing their associations to slumber or to fall into disuse, and their ample funds to be drained away by some invisible and unavailing leakage." The remedies for this decadence are twofold. The London committee is indirectly advised to purchase advocacy in the press; this being, perhaps, an intimation that there are scribes on sale in Catherine-street. The second remedy is of no very peculiar a nature, that we must give it in the poor creature's own words:—

"If we might be permitted to offer a suggestion, we would submit to the London committee the propriety of sending to the local association of every county a circular proposing such inquiries as these:—

1. "What is the state of public feeling in your county, as to protection for native industry?" 2. What in the agricultural districts? 3. What in the towns?
4. "Have the efforts of the League, its lecturers and its tracts, produced any perceptible effects on public opinion; and to what extent?"
5. "Which of the sophisms of the Free-Trade party have made any converts to their notions?" 6. And on what point does information appear to be needed."

The League correspondence fortunately enables us to answer these six queries, which we have numbered for the sake of reference, and we shall reply to them in their order. 1. The public feeling respecting "protection to native industry" is everywhere that the industrious should have their earnings protected against the plundering propensities of Monopolists and class-legislators. 2. In the agricultural districts it is found that Monopolist protection renders the farmer the serf of his landlord, and prevents him from employing farm-labourers to the extent which the scientific principles of cultivation require by affording him no security for the return of the capital which he may invest in land. 3. In the towns, Monopolist protection has gone on depriving operatives of employment by closing the markets of the world against their productions.

To the fourth question, South Lancashire gives the answer of 270 less to Monopoly, and 402 more to Free Trade, than at the former contested election.

On the fifth point we find that Sir James Graham's declaration that "the principles of Free Trade are the principles of common sense," and Sir Robert Peel's assertion that it is the wisest policy "to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest," have made most converts, and among those converts we could enumerate several of Mr. Estlin's supporters. Whether the Herald will continue to describe these principles, so enunciated by the Ministers of its affection as sophisms, will probably depend on the nature of the next communication sent to its office from Downing-street. This leads us to the concluding query, and we can confidently reply that the information most sought is—how far the Ministers we have named are prepared to carry out the principles which they have recognised? As we have been so generous with our information, perhaps the Morning Herald would reciprocate and tell us when Sir James Graham will put his "common sense" into practice, and when Sir Robert will act on his "sound policy?"

THE ANTI-SLAVERY COMMITTEE AND THE SUGAR QUESTION.

Though the editorial columns of this paper have contained but few references to the controversy now waging upon this subject, our readers have, nevertheless, been made acquainted with all the bearings of the argument, pro and con, through the medium of the many speeches we have published—speeches in which, we venture to say, the strongest reasons of the exclusionists have been fully and fairly put forward, and treated with a degree of deference and respect (to say the least) quite equal to that which has been shown towards their opponents by the abolitionists. As matters, however, are drawing to a crisis on the question, both in the Anti-Slavery body and the Legislature, we deem this a proper time to say a few words. On Monday evening next the subject of the sugar duties will be discussed by the Government in the House of Commons; and, on the same day, there will be a meeting at Exeter-hall of the subscribers to the Anti-Slavery Society, to consider and determine of the propriety of retaining that part of the constitution which pledges the society to the adoption of fiscal regulations in favour of free labour.

On the 17th ultimo there was a great meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society, to celebrate its anniversary. At that meeting an amendment, proposed by Mr. Thompson, intended to test the views of all present on the matter in dispute, was carried, notwithstanding an ingenious speech from Mr. O'Connell in favour of the course of the committee, and the most decided opposition from Sir George Stephen and the Chairman. It is necessary here to observe that the League altogether abstained from adopting or recommending any measures to obtain a majority in that meeting. Had the meeting been called to consider a railroad question it would not have been less interfered with by the League. Yet in that meeting—a meeting of the warmest supporters of the anti-slavery cause—a meeting held at a season when the largest number of its provincial patrons are in town—a meeting attended by the whole of the London committee, whose apprehensions of some allusion to their cause on the Sugar Question had led them to strain every nerve to secure a verdict in their favour—at that meeting an amendment, suspending the action of the committee, was carried;—carried, too, after every effort had been made to weaken the force of the arguments brought forward to sustain it; carried, too, notwithstanding the Chairman's special and unprecedented appeal to the Ladies to vote, telling them at the time that his own opinions "admitted of no dispute!" and that "he was astonished at the assertions and declamations of his two friends," Messrs. Bright and Thompson.

We will not attempt to anticipate the decision of Monday's meeting. Whatever it may be, it will be of small importance compared with the vote of the 17th. It is well known that four-fifths of the money which sustains the operations of the society come out of the pockets of two or three of the rich and generous members of the committee; that the society has few subscribers in London; that but a small number of those summoned from the country will at a week's notice attend the meeting; and that it will, therefore, be composed principally of the committee, and such persons belonging to the Society of Friends as may find it convenient to protract their stay in town beyond the termination of the yearly meeting. Such a meeting, though highly respectable and embracing many of the most distinguished and ardent promoters of the Anti-Slavery cause, will not be a fair representation of the opinions of the subscribers at large, and still less of the hundred of thousands through whose influence the Anti-Slavery Society has in times past carried its measures; and we have that reliance upon the good sense and honesty of the committee, that we cannot bring ourselves to believe that, even should the obnoxious clause of the constitution be retained, they will consider themselves justified in acting upon it, until they have stronger proofs than they have at present that they possess the sympathy and support of the friends of abolition at large. We are prohibited by the crowded state of our columns from entering into the merits of the question at issue, and shall only, therefore, commend to the immediate and thoughtful consideration of our readers, and especially those who differ from us, the article we below reprint from the Nonconformist of the 22nd ult., which will be found to reduce the whole argument within the smallest possible compass. It may greatly assist the deliberations of Monday next, to make the propositions therein contained the basis of the gravest and most conscientious consideration:—

THE DUTY OF GOVERNMENT IN RELATION TO SLAVE PRODUCE.

"The annual meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society on Friday last, the main topic which came under its consideration, and the result at which it arrived, render it imperative upon us, in the discharge of our duty, to discuss the question of the obligations of the Government of this country in regard to slave produce. We shall attempt to perform our task in a calm and conscientious spirit. Men, whose integrity of character and whose earnest philanthropy are placed above suspicion, have differed in their views of this important subject. We feel it to be unnecessary, therefore, either to call in question the motives of those from whom we differ, or to impugn their wisdom. We deem it quite sufficient to state, with all brevity, the reasons which have guided us to the conclusions we entertain, and leave our readers to decide upon their validity.

"The question, in its concrete form, is environed with considerations which appeal with almost irresistible energy to the compassionate feelings of our nature, and which, by means of that appeal, are apt to warp the decisions of the judgment. It will be, we think, for the advantage of all parties, that the subject should be looked at as abstractedly as possible; that, setting aside, for a moment, the legions of exciting facts which come rushing into the mind to divert attention, we should endeavour to settle general principles. If those principles be sound, we may safely follow them whithersoever they conduct us; if otherwise, no caution in the application of them, no purity of intention, no sagacity, were it superhuman, can prevent our being landed on ultimately disastrous consequences.

"The committee of the Anti-Slavery Society, in seeking the extirpation of slavery from the world, deem it incumbent on them to call in the aid of Government, and, by fiscal regulations, to promote the object at which they aim. They argue, and not without considerable force, that slave produce is stolen produce—they contend that Government is bound to take notice of this fact—and they conclude that, on every principle of morality, as well as of humanity, the import of such produce into Great Britain ought to be prohibited by law. If they are right in their principle, they are right in the application of it. It is on this ground, therefore, that the discussion must be taken.

"The general truth which this theory involves may be thus laid down:—It is the duty of Governments, in regulating the commercial intercourse between their own subjects and the subjects of other realms, to be guided in their policy by a reference to the moral habits which obtain in those realms; and, in deciding upon the admission or exclusion into their own markets of articles of trade, to take into consideration the mode in which those articles were produced, the moral character of the practices resorted to in securing whether their growth or their manufacture, and the influence which commerce may exert in furtherance of oppression or of freedom, in the kingdoms from which these articles are obtained." Now, we demur to the soundness of this principle—and we shall content ourselves with stating, as nakedly as possible, why we thus demur.

"In the first place, then, we hold the regulation of commerce to be no proper business of Governments at all. The right of one man to dispose of the product of his own labour to any other man, who may offer him an equivalent, was antecedent to the institution of government, and, certainly, cannot be abrogated by it. Like all other rights, it is to be exercised by the possessor of it, on his individual responsibility, in subordination to the dictates of morality. Viewed in his relation to God indeed, he may not act as he pleases. He is under restrictions—restrictions which he will throw off at his peril. But, considered in his relation to Government, his right is circumscribed by no single exception which does not plainly spring up out of the objects or the necessities of Government. Where, for example, the exchange of his labour would obviously lead to the infliction of wrong upon another subject of the realm, the state, whose business it is to extend equal protection to all its subjects, is bound to step in and prevent the exchange. Quoad the Government, therefore, the right remains as it did, save where it clashes with the will of the Government in the execution of its proper and legitimate functions. Now, it is clearly one object of those functions to protect from injury, by fraud or force, the property of its own subjects; and, in attaining this object, its duty to punish the receivers of stolen goods must be admitted. There is no correct analogy, however, between this restriction of the right, and that which would prevent commercial dealing with slave-holding states. It does not follow that, because Government, in protecting its own subjects, draws a certain line across the exercise of an individual right, and says, 'Hitherto shalt thou go, and no further,' it is bound also to impose the same restraint in favour of humanity at large. The interests of humanity at large have not been committed to its keeping. Its business is to protect its own subjects, and, having done this, it has, in its governmental capacity, accomplished every object for which it was instituted. It cannot take upon itself higher duties without doing far greater mischief than good. The commercial intercourse carried on between the people of these realms and those of foreign realms is a matter with which the state, as such, has nothing to do. Its interference in relation to it is a trespass beyond its legitimate sphere; tramples upon individual right; takes from man what belongs inalienably to man; in a word, does evil that good may come.

"In the next place, were the regulation of commerce the proper business of Government, it could not, we contend, be guided, in admitting or excluding articles of consumption, by considerations of the mode in which such articles have been produced. The principle, if good for the exclusion of slave-grown produce, is good to the whole extent to which it applies. Mark, then, the consequences upon which its advocates are driven! 'That which is the product of proved injustice ought to be prohibited by Government from entering into the market.' Such is the naked principle. Is it, then, the business of Government to trace the history of every article of commerce, before it sanctions its introduction into the country? If not, what is the special law which devolves upon it the duty in reference to the produce of slaves? If it be, what Government on earth possesses adequate means for the accomplishment of its stupendous task? Why, the principle cannot be carried out even in reference to slave-grown produce. It is sought to be applied only to the article of sugar—simply forasmuch as its further application is purely impracticable. But were it sound, who can say within how narrow a range all commerce must at length be restricted? What article of trade, for instance, comes to us from Egypt which is not tainted with injustice? What from Russia which does not smell of oppression? What from America which has not some tale to tell us of the cruelties inflicted on the producers of it? Would the imports from the East Indies pass muster? Is there, in a word, a single article we could admit from any quarter of the world with a safe conscience? And, be it remembered, that the same principle which we adopt in reference to our imports from other nations, they are equally bound to adopt in reference to their imports from ours. The duty is certainly reciprocal. Are they, then, to trace the history of all our manufactured fabrics? and are they to admit our cotton, woollen, and hardware goods into their markets, to determine the question, whether or no they are the product of oppressed and down-trodden men?

"The general principle, then, we believe to be in theory unsound, and in practice impossible. We need not pursue the subject further. The inexpediency of resorting to it in the case of slave produce was pointed out with great force by more than one speaker on Friday last. We are, therefore, less anxious to touch upon this part of the question. It has been our single object to state our own views of the ultimate principle upon which the recommended interference of Government, for the exclusion of the sugars of Brazil and Cuba from the British market, must necessarily proceed. If those views be correct, the interference is unwarrantable—if incorrect, we shall be thankful to any party who will be at the pains to set us right."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

Sixteenth Week, ending Saturday, June 1.

Parliament re-assembled on Thursday, after the Whitsuntide recess; but as yet nothing has been done calling for attention as relating to Free Trade. But at this period of the session the state of public business will compel a better attendance of members, and more business-like procedure; and therefore we will have some opportunities of recording the sentiments and conduct of the representatives in relation to the leading practical question of the day.

Before rising for the holidays, the Government, pleading that it was usual to do so at this time of the year, got the consent of the House that every Thursday, for the remainder of the session, should be a "Government night."

MEETINGS.

WEEKLY AGGREGATE METROPOLITAN MEETING OF THE LEAGUE.

The usual weekly metropolitan meeting of the League was held at Covent-garden Theatre, on Wednesday evening last, under the presidency of the Earl of Ducie, a nobleman who has been aptly described by Mr. Cobden as "the best practical arable farmer in the kingdom." The meeting was also addressed by the hon. member for Stockport himself, who was most appropriately introduced to the assembled Free-Traders of the metropolis and the country as "their own Cobden." Mr. M. Gibson, M.P., who was advertised to address the meeting, was unexpectedly prevented from returning to town, but his place was ably supplied by the veteran Free-Trader, Col. Thompson. Mr. Holland, a landowner of Worcestershire, and Mr. Bright, M.P., made most effective speeches. Every allusion to the recent contest in South Lancashire was enthusiastically responded to, and the gain of 1000 county votes in favour of Free Trade was hailed by the immense multitude as one of those "great moral victories" which, however their effect may be misrepresented by the monopolist press, are a more presage of the approaching overthrow of the Corn Laws.

Among the gentlemen present we observed

The Right Hon. the Earl Ducie, in the chair; Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P.; J. L. Ricardo, Esq., M.P.; Major-General Briggs; Colonel T. P. Thompson; Samuel Hanford, Esq.; Sir William Baynes, Bart.; Professor Huber, of Berlin; Captain Duberley; Dr. Cooke Taylor; Ed. Holland, Esq.; Rev. J. Martineau (Liverpool); Col. Tucker; Messrs. W. A. Wilkinson, J. Spowers, Isaac Hadwen, H. White, William Feller, G. Hyde, D. Dewar, H. Wedgwood, T. Johnson, Charles Mackay, Andrew Doyle, G. J. Dixon, W. Macmillan, J. Faulkner, J. S. Ashton, W. Farmer, W. Elliott, T. Oxford, S. King; Professors O. Byrne, Messrs. Lattimore (Wheatthampstead), J. E. P. Dean (of the United States), J. Thomson, W. Falconer, W. Thorabarrow, John Leach (Wattor, Herts), William Snelling, Thomas Dean, H. Crooks, P. Fairbairn (Leeds), T. H. Potter, J. T. Dunn (Nottingham), Joseph Glassey (Brighton), William Brady (Dewsbury), H. Crossfield (Liverpool), Joseph Bennett (Hitchin, Herts), James Clarke, Thomas Bull, W. Robertson, (Dumblaton, Worcestershire), T. Schunck (Manchester), John V. Lyons (Co. A), A. Feltott Oster (Birmingham), Thomas Ruston, C. S. Crowley, J. Angus, Henry Cove, P. A. Taylor, J. De Silva, R. W. Cole, W. Egan, W. J. Johnson, James Clarke, James Hotham (Leeds), Joseph Harris, J. W. Fletcher, Jonathan Harris, Joseph Cranstone (Hemel Hempstead), Joseph Bennett, Martin Robinson (Horley, Surrey), John Jackson (Halifax), John Harris, &c.

The minutes of the previous meeting having been read by Mr. Saul, upon the motion of Sir WILLIAM BAYNES, seconded by C. S. CROWLEY, Esq., they were unanimously confirmed.

The Noble CHAIRMAN then came forward amidst reiterated bursts of applause. Silence having been restored, his lordship spoke as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, in rising to open the business of this meeting, I must honestly confess that I do not do so without some little embarrassment at feeling myself in so novel a situation. I assure you, and you will readily believe me, that it is a very different thing to look at the stage from the boxes, and to look at the boxes, filled as they are to-night, from the stage. I am the more surprised at finding myself here, believing, as I do, the truth of the saying, that "All the world's a stage," and yet feeling conscious that I have been hitherto so indifferent an actor upon its great stage, that I hardly thought it possible that I should ever have appeared upon a stage so celebrated as that upon which I am now standing. (Cheers.) I am encouraged to appear before you because I hold it to be not only the imperative duty of myself, but of all those who believe with me, and I trust every one of you do, that the existing Corn Laws are absurd and ruinous in principle, and highly injurious to the people in practice. I say it is the duty of every person holding this opinion, however poor and insignificant their station in life may be, and how feeble soever their talent, to throw the weight of that influence into the scale of truth and justice, and endeavour to weigh down, by their united firmness, that powerful opposition which we have met heretofore, which we now daily experience, and which we must expect frequently to be called upon to encounter before we attain that great and glorious object which we have in view. (Loud cheers.) There was another consideration which also operated upon my mind, to remove any unwillingness I might have felt at appearing upon this stage, and that is, that no tragedy of so deep a die was ever performed in this theatre—no poet or tragic writer ever invented, or by fiction added painful incidents to historical facts, which could for a moment be brought into comparison with the real misery, sorrow, and distress, as well as lamentable loss of life, which have been produced on the stage of life by the operation of the accursed Corn Law, the abolition of which is our object in assembling here from week to week. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) It is indeed most painful to refer to the tragic scenes which have resulted from that iniquitous measure; but you will, perhaps, permit me to follow up the theatrical simile, a little further, by saying that as it appears to me, there is much gentle comedy exhibited in the way in which Sir Robert Peel at present manages his supporters, in the hope of continuing the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear, hear.) I should rather have said that there was a great deal of low comedy in the manner in which that right hon. baronet coquets with his two mistresses—his virgin love "Free Trade in the abstract," and his more meretricious mistress, Monopoly. (Loud laughter.) Twenty or thirty years hence, any person looking back upon the course of our Corn Law legislation would, indeed, see as much broad farce in it as ever produced laughter in this house. But when I speak of "looking back" upon the Corn Laws twenty or thirty years hence some persons will be disposed to inquire: "Do you really suppose that they will be repealed before that period?" I reply, undoubtedly I do (loud cheers); I do not believe there is a person in this theatre who entertains a doubt upon the point. And not only is this the opinion of those who are united with us in our efforts to overthrow the Corn Laws, but also of those by whom they are supported. (Hear, hear, hear.) It is admitted by all parties that these laws must go, and there is no doubt that they will. But, you will probably ask me, how and when they will be abolished? Do you suppose that they will be repealed by the party who advocate a fixed duty? (Cries of "No, no.") Undoubtedly not. Do you anticipate that they will be abolished by Sir Robert Peel and his supporters, who have ever opposed a fixed duty, and have pledged themselves to support the sliding scale? Surely not. If, then, the Corn Law is to be repealed by neither of these parties, I readily know where we are to turn for this object unless we go, as a sort of forlorn hope, to "Young England." (Laughter.) If we go to that party, we have no reason to suppose that we shall have any great help from them. I do not know whether many of you have read a little poem, which has been lately published by a poetic brother of that fraternity, entitled "England and its Trust." I was very much amused the other day with what I read of that production, and I think it may serve to convince you that we have little to hope for from them. If I recollect rightly, this poetic lord says:—

"Yes, I could bear to see her crowded towns Sink into hamlets and unpeopled downs."

(Laughter.) A very wise wish, certainly; it requires a very strong mind to enable one calmly to contemplate such a prospect. (Laughter.) In another part this Young England poet says:—

"Let wealth and commerce, law, and learning die!
But give us still —"

What do you think, ladies and gentlemen? Why, you would expect something very considerable in exchange for "commerce, law, and learning." But no; the author promises you nothing of the sort, he says:—

"But give us still —our old nobility."

(Loud laughter.) It must be a great satisfaction to the inhabitants of any country to be ruled over by persons who can tell who their great-grandfathers were; but it is buying that privilege rather dear to sacrifice for it "wealth and commerce, law and learning." (Hear.)

I do not think, therefore, we can place much reliance on our friend Young England; but I will tell you how it is to be won, by yourselves. (Loud cheers.) You must never be cast down by defeat; you must not be disappointed and cease from exertion when you are apparently unsuccessful; you must continue, in season and out of season, pressing your doctrines upon the people, and teaching them their real interests. Let us see the great masses in the great towns fully alive to the real question of Free Trade; let us see them return at a future general election members to support Free Trade; and, beyond all, let us see the great city of London do its duty. (Cheers.) That is the way in which the Corn Laws are to be repealed; and let me tell you, gentlemen, that there is no person in this theatre, and no man in any station, in whatever position he may be placed, who cannot, by his own individual exertions, and by his energetic support of our proceedings, to a certain extent accelerate the time when the repeal of the Corn Laws shall take place. (Cheers.) I feel convinced that it is the duty of every man to do what little he can to enlighten his neighbours on any points of the subject with which he may be most conversant; and that conviction induces me to offer you a few observations upon this momentous subject. Undoubtedly, in great towns, and more especially in this large metropolis, there must be a great number of persons very much unacquainted with agricultural subjects; and it is not at all unnatural that those persons should be alarmed when it is continually dinned into their ears by our opponents that the repeal of the Corn Laws would be ruin to the agricultural interests, and would throw vast tracts of land out of cultivation. There must be many in this great town having a little land of their own, or having connexions who are dependent upon land; and it is natural that they should hesitate and doubt, and say, "If I am to be injured, if my connexions are to be ruined, if the welfare of the agricultural labourers is to be set aside, I do not think that the repeal of the Corn Laws would be so great a boon as I at first supposed." Now, it is in the hope of dispelling such doubts, and of inducing all who may entertain them to go on without fear supporting us, and promoting in every way the repeal of the Corn Laws, that I shall now take the liberty of addressing a few words to you. Were I to go into the whole agricultural subject, it would occupy a great deal more of your time than I have a right to demand from you. I shall, therefore, take only a very limited portion of a part of the subject; and it shall be my endeavour to show you, by tracing the expense of growing a bushel of wheat, that it is impossible any land can be thrown out of cultivation by the repeal of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) For the last eighteen years I have been actively employed in agriculture, and in the county of Gloucester, where I reside, I have, within that period, held six different farms in three different localities of the county; and, therefore, it would be almost impossible that I should fail to know something of the circumstances of the agriculture of the county. Gloucestershire contains within it a very large tract of that light land which our prophetic opponents say will be thrown out of cultivation if the Corn Laws are repealed. In the debate on the fixed duty, when proposed by Lord Melbourne's Government, I remember Lord Wilmot saying, that if a fixed duty were adopted all Lincoln heath would be thrown out of cultivation. It is not necessary to tell you that Lincoln heath and the Cotswold hills are almost of the same nature; they are on the same geological formation, and identical in their nature, except, perhaps, that Lincoln heath has been rather better cultivated than the Cotswold hills. I will read to you a few statements which I have received from different farmers as to the cost of a bushel of wheat. I procured them without mentioning for what purpose I wanted them, and therefore I am not at liberty to mention their names; I wished to have my statements above suspicion, and therefore I did not state why I wished for the information. I will read a statement of the expense of a bushel of wheat on my own farm, in the first place, and for this reason—that, not being afraid of having my books looked into, I am enabled to say that every penny which everything is stated to have cost can be proved to be most perfectly correct. (Cheers.) Having shown you what the different operations cost, you will be able to judge how far those other statements tally with mine; and, if there be no very great discrepancy, I think you may as there is no very great error in the statement. I may be objected to the way in which I shall lay these statements before you, that I should have taken the whole of the rotation into the calculation, and charged its proportion of the whole amount of the ameliorating crops to the wheat. But I have not done so for these reasons:—First, if I had, it would have made scarcely any difference; and, secondly, I should have had to alter the statements sent to me—my great anxiety being that I should present them and, therefore, Mondays, Thursdays, and Fridays will be devoted to Government business. By this arrangement the only day left to independent members is Tuesday; and as there are a considerable number, all interested in particular questions, and all anxious to have them brought before the House and the public, it will become more difficult to obtain a hearing. It is quite hopeless to think that two important motions could be discussed in one night; even if it were practicable it would not be desirable, for as the object of discussion within the House is to act on and form public opinion, attention would be too much scattered and divided if two subjects were each struggling for consideration in the public mind. For this reason Mr. Villiers intimated, on Friday week, the course which he intends to pursue in bringing on his motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws. He had fixed it for the 11th of June, but was obliged to postpone it, in consequence of other members having notices of motions which had precedence, and being unwilling to give place. He has now fixed it for the 18th of June; but on that day there are also one or two motions which have precedence; and if he is prevented on that night, he has given notice to the Government that, however reluctant to do anything which might appear to interfere with their business, he must bring on his motion on the first order of the day for going into committee of supply, there being still a number of grants to be voted for different departments of the public service.

In this course he is quite justified, and perfectly right. The old constitutional rule is redress of grievances before supplies are granted; and, though there is a great difference between ancient and modern times, it is an exceedingly wholesome thing to maintain, in the House of Commons, that practical check upon an executive government by which they are obliged to listen to the complaints of the public before they get possession of the public money.

There was an instance on Thursday night last, when Mr. Roebuck brought on a discussion on Canadian grievances on the occasion of bringing up the Report of the Committee of Supply on Colonial Estimates—that is to say, not on the occasion of granting the supplies, for they were already granted, but on the mere formal proceeding of reporting to the House that the votes had been passed, and of getting them confirmed.

If ever there were a practical grievance of which a member may avail himself in order to raise a discussion on a supply night, it is the great grievance of the Corn Laws; if ever there were a member entitled to avail himself of the privilege, it is Mr. Villiers. From year to year continually, he has kept the question before the public eye; he did it when from without he had scarcely any support, and within he might say he had none except the faithful few who recorded their apparently hopeless votes in his favour; he continues it still, when public opinion is organized in his favour, and when, in spite of literally tremendous obstacles, arising from landlord influence and class interest, the repeal of the Corn Laws, like the bright star on the horizon, is approaching nearer and nearer to certainty.

This of itself would give Mr. Villiers an unquestioned right to use his privilege; but he has also another claim. Though steadily adhering to that question, which may be almost said to be his own, there is no man who is less obnoxious to the imputation of unnecessarily obtruding himself on the attention of the House. He never speaks unnecessarily; always seizes the fitting opportunity, and speaks precisely the fitting thing; his speeches are generally short, but are striking from their terseness and pithy point; and while he frequently utters very gallant truths to nowing ears, and that, too, in the most unflinching way, there is nothing in his manner which deviates from that gentlemanly style of which "Honourable House" is so tenacious. This much is due to Mr. Villiers, who, in cast of phrase, is the father of the Corn Law question, as it now stands before the public, nor is it one of the least of his characteristics that, should these remarks fall under his observation, he will be the first to take offence at them, as being, what he will consider, a deviation from that stern impartiality which should record only public men's acts, and leave them to find compliments in the conscious rectitude of their motives.

Great complaints have lately been made by the public on the frequent "coming out" of the House of Commons, and Thursday last afforded an instance that whenever the Government chooses, it can prevent it. When Mr. Roebuck brought the consideration of the state of Canada under the consideration of the House, there were not forty members present during the greater portion of his speech; and if any member had chosen, he could have "counted out" the House. But the Government wished to have a discussion; Lord Stanley was prepared to make a speech; and, consequently, there was no "count out." But in the case of any motion which it is not convenient to discuss there is always some Ministerial member on, who are ready to do the work. One comes members away; another stands in the lobby to prevent members from going in; and when they have thinned the House, the operation usually taking place during the dinner hour, from seven to about half-past eight) somebody notices that there are not forty members present, strangers are ordered to withdraw, and the House being counted, the adjournment takes place. Whenever any member brings on a frivolous motion, for mere talking's sake, this is a good way to punish his empty conceit; but it lowers the House of Commons when done repeatedly, and on important questions. But the remedy lies with the constituencies: if they return, as their representatives, young fops, fools, idlers, men who go to the House of Commons for amusement, Parliament will be an engine of the executive Government, assembled in order to register its edicts, instead of being the "collective wisdom" of "a most thinking nation."

SUGAR DUTIES.—The number of signatures to the Leeds petition for a reduction of the sugar duties, now exceeds 20,000, all male petitioners. The women complain that they are not allowed to exercise a franchise upon an occasion where their feelings and their taste are so materially involved.—Leeds Mercury.

to you just as they came from the farmers, fresh and undiluted. (Cheers.) We have a right to assume that the other crops—say barley and oats—can be grown to a profit without wheat; if they cannot, it proves that the system of agriculture must be extremely faulty, and that the arrangement between landlord and tenant cannot be quite right; for it were absurd to suppose that the profits of a wheat crop are to go to pay all the losses upon all the other crops in the rotation: it would, if it were possible, render the existing Corn Laws more absurd than they are at present. (Hear, hear.) I will produce an authority that they can be grown at a profit, and that authority is a man who is allowed by our opponents to be a shrewd judge of his own affairs, and one who can see as far into anything as most people—I refer to my friend, Mr. Gisborne (hear, hear), whom I believe you had the pleasure of hearing at this theatre. I remember that, in a speech which he made some years ago against the Corn Laws, he said, amongst other reasons for their abolition, that they prevented very hard upon him. He cultivated, from necessity, a large quantity of thin hill-side land in the county of Derby; and he said, "What a horrible thing it is that you should tax me for the benefit of those who can grow upon their lands wheat which I cannot grow upon mine." (Hear.) I conclude, therefore, that Mr. Gisborne can grow oats and barley to a profit. (Cheers.) I asked for the returns from my own farm which I am about to read, in February last, not thinking then of turning them to the use I am now making of them. The first is the expense of cultivating and marketing 120 acres of wheat on Whitfield Example Farm. We have the impudence to call it Example Farm for this reason—that it has acted as a guide in points on which we were right, and as a beacon to warn from those in which we were wrong; and I am happy to say that it has been useful in both ways. This is exactly as it is taken out from my books:—

The Expense of Cultivating, Harvesting, and Marketing 120 acres of Wheat on Whitfield Example Farm.

To 1864 days of a man and two horses ploughing, cultivating (i.e. working with cultivator), drilling and harrowing 120 acres, at 10s. per diem .. £93 2 6

That amounts to 15s. 6d. an acre for ploughing sowing, and preparing the seed.

To 173½ bushels of seed wheat, at 7s. per bushel .. 60 14 6

To harrow 120 acres, at 2. 61 per acre .. 15 0 0

To pitching to carts and ricks, building and loading, at 2s. 4d. per acre .. 14 0 0

To 72 days of one-horse cart and boy to haul the produce from the field to rickyards, at 4s. 6d. per diem .. 16 2 0

That amounts altogether, for harvesting and bringing home to the yards, and thatching, to 14s. 10d. per acre.

To thrashing and winnowing, and taking out, say 500 quarters, at 2s. .. 50 0 0

To marketing 500 qrs. at 5 qrs. per cart, 50 days of a man with two horses and carts, at 10s., and for expenses 2s.,—50 at 12s. .. 30 0 0

The calculation of the produce on this farm is 33 bushels, the usual produce being upwards of 40; but it was put so low that it might be an average which one might be secure of, during a period of years, allowing for bad harvests; so that there should be no deduction from the account.

This sum amounts to 54s. 6d. per acre, or 1s. 7½d. per bushel

To half dung on last year's crop, 50s. per acre, or .. 1 6 per bushel

Rent, tithe, and taxes, on 120 acres, 50s. per acre, or .. 1 6 per bushel

4 7½ per bushel

But my wheat crop, having bought its manure, has a right also to sell its straw, for which we must give it credit; the calculation is, that we grow rather more than a ton and a half of straw, which is calculated to be worth, to consume on the farm, 36s., there being 35 bushels to the acre. In fact in a farm I have just let, I have had it valued at that rate to the incoming tenant; however, I will not take it to the full extent, because I wish to keep entirely within bounds, and therefore I will only put the ton and a half of straw at 35s. the acre. It will lower the cost something more than 1s. a bushel, and, as the original sum I read to you was 4s. 7½d., we may fairly, for the sake of even numbers, reduce it to 3s. 61., because the 1s. remaining over will only leave a fraction of a penny over the 3s. 61., which I am sure will be no very great matter. Now, the capital invested in that farm amounts to £15 an acre; therefore you will see that, if the price of the bushel of wheat exceeds by 1s. the 3s. 61. which it cost me to grow, it will give 10 1 7th per cent. on the capital invested; and, therefore, it shows that, if the price of wheat is 5s. 6d. the bushel or 4½ a quarter (which, by the way, is 3s. less than the average price of the Channel Islands for the last seven years), that will give me 20 2 7th per cent. on the capital invested; and that, you will admit, is not a bad profit. (Cheers.) Now, let us go on a little further, and see what the return is at the present price of corn. We will suppose that it is now 56s. (which is very nearly is, a good quality of corn is worth more; the last I sold was 59s.), that will give a return of 33½ per cent. on the capital invested. This farm, being alternate years wheat, yields 17½ per cent. on the entire capital employed on it. In these calculations of expenses on all the charges there is a percentage allowed to keep everything good; to maintain horses, harness, and machinery in repair. I thought it as well to go where I should have the highest calculation, and therefore I went to the bailiff of one of the largest proprietors on the Cotswold-hills, and this is the return he gave me. This, I should tell you, is the best class of land on those hills, which is generally cultivated on the five-course system; the wheat is generally sown on the second year's clover; therefore, instead of going to the expense of the whole rotation, the farmers on the Cotswold hills have, on these statements, charged the wheat crop with the entire rent and taxes of the preceding year: therefore, instead of charging the rent and taxes of one year, it is charged with the rent and taxes of two years. On this farm two years' rent, at 25s., with rates and taxes, amounts to £2 15s. 9d.; ploughing, harrowing, and drilling, £1 an acre (that is, about 4s. 6d. more than mine); seed, 2½ bushels at 7s. 6d. per bushel, 18s. 9d.; bird-keeping and hoeing, 5s.; reaping and harvesting, 15s. (that is about the same as the charge on my farm); threshing, winnowing, and taking out, at 8d. a bushel, allowing 30 bushels to the acre on the average, £1

(that is rather more than my charge). In addition to this, my friend charges wear and tear, 3s., so that he has put into the statement all he could. This amounts to £6 17s. 6d. an acre. Now, we will suppose that there was not so much straw on this land as upon mine, and therefore, instead of charging 35s. for their straw, I will only deduct 30s. to be placed to the credit of the wheat crop: that reduces the sum per acre to £5 7s. 6d. Now, we will just see how it paid. That amounts to 3s. 6d. 1-6th per bushel. Perhaps you will allow me to make the calculation on the 3s. 6d., and leave out the one-sixth. The capital invested in such land is certainly under £10 an acre, so far as I have calculated it; therefore, every 6d. in price per bushel above 3s. 6d., is 7½ per cent. on the capital of £10. Now, supposing the same price of corn, 44s. per bushel (that is, 3s. under the Channel Islands price for the last seven years), it amounts to 30 per cent. on the invested capital. Let us try the calculation with the higher price, as we have it at present, 7s. a bushel, or 56s. a quarter, there is then a return of 32½ per cent. (Hear, hear, hear.) Supposing this land cultivated on the five-course system, it gives a return of 10½ per cent. on the whole capital employed over the whole of the farm. Now, there is one remark which I should make here, which is this. When this return was sent to me, I thought that the rent was not put sufficiently high for land that produced 30 bushels of wheat on an average per acre; I have therefore made the calculation, adding 5s. more to the rent, which I think ought to be done. This statement being given to me by a gentleman's servant, he was anxious to make as good a show as he could of his produce, and therefore calculated the rent lower than it ought to have been. I will put his rent up to what it ought to be; that is, putting 5s. more on the expenses per acre, and that will, on 30 bushels, be an addition of 2d. to every bushel, increasing the price to 3s. 8d. per bushel. Every 4d. beyond that price will be 5 per cent. on the capital; and of course the price of 44s. amounts to 27½ per cent. on the capital; taking the price at 7s. a bushel, or 56s. a quarter, and that will produce a return of 50 per cent., or 10 per cent. on the whole capital employed on every acre of the farm, supposing no other acre to pay a sixpence. I thought it as well that I should put it as fairly as I could before you, and not make so good a show as my friend has done. You see that a bushel of wheat can be grown there, upon that sort of land, for 3s. 8d. Now, I have two calculations here, from two very clever agriculturists, one of whom is certainly a most superior man, residing in the county of Gloucester, who cultivates more land, and does a greater business in a better manner, than any individual I have ever met with. That gentleman gives this statement. He says:—

Outlay on an Acre of Wheat on two-year-old Seeds, Rent of Land in the neighbourhood of Stow and Northleach, from 15s. to 20s. per acre—Average, 17s. 6d.

Two years' rent .. £1 15 0

Two years' poor, church, and road rates .. 0 6 0

Ploughing, harrowing, and drilling .. 1 0 0

(That is the same as the last calculation I gave you)

Two-and-a-half bushels of seed wheat at 7s. .. 0 17 6

Bird-keeping and hoeing .. 0 5 0

Reaping and harvesting, including carting, stacking, thatching, &c. .. 0 15 0

Thrashing, winnowing, fetching into barn, and delivery, at 8d. per bushel—20 bushels per acre on an average .. 0 13 4

Wear and tear .. 0 3 0

But this being a very inferior quality of land, the produce is only calculated at 20 bushels an acre. We have got now £5 14s. 10d. as the cost of 20 bushels; we are to deduct the value of straw, which I reduce again, from the quality of the land, from 30s. to 25s.; and that lowers the cost of the 20 bushels to £4 9s. 10d., or 4s. 6d. a bushel. I have a statement from another person, of whom I have also a very high opinion, which is so very identical with those made upon land of the same character, and of so equal an average of produce, that I think I need do no more than read you the cost in it, which is £5 13s. 1d., the other being £5 14s. 10d. So that I think the returns of these two gentlemen are so identical upon the same soil, that you will take them almost as facts. I take them, indeed, and know them to be facts. (Cheers.) The price of 20 bushels in one calculation is £4 9s. 10d., and in the other £4 9s. 1d.; being a difference of 9d. only. Now, I will merely trouble you with a little calculation on this. That brings the expense to 4s. 6d. a bushel. You perceive that the lower we get in the quality of land the more expensive the wheat is to grow; but this is the lowest quality of land which any man has a right to grow wheat upon: indeed, I think there is too much wheat grown on it as it is. The capital invested in this quality of land does not exceed, and indeed I know does not near come up to the £8. an acre; and, therefore, every 5d. in price in excess over the sum of 4s. 6d. is a fraction above five per cent. on the capital invested. Let me throw away the fraction, and say five per cent. Suppose the price of wheat to be 4½s.—3s. under the Channel Islands price—it gives eleven per cent. on the invested capital. That is the lowest price you can possibly conceive in any state of Free Trade. It returns eleven per cent. upon the growth of wheat. (Cheers.) Now, take the present price, as I did of the others, at 56s. per quarter, that gives a return of 27½ per cent. on the capital of £8 invested. Supposing that this farm is cultivated on the five-course system, it will yield five and a half per cent. on the whole capital invested on the entire farm, supposing there to be no profit on any other single acre of land on the other four-fifths of it. I am afraid that I have already trespassed a great deal too long on your time. (Cheers and cries of "No, no.") I was anxious to show you that that low quality of land which it is said must be thrown out of cultivation if the Corn Laws are repealed, can, under the lowest possible prices in free trade in corn, pay 11 per cent. for growing corn at 44s. per quarter. (Cheers.) I hope and trust that, if there were any here who doubted before in consequence of their being told by our opponents that Free Trade would throw land out of cultivation, they will set their minds at ease upon the point, and that they will believe with me that nothing can ever cause any land to be thrown out of cultivation in England so long as the manufacturers of this country are enabled to undersell those of the Continent in the world's market. (The noble chairman retired from the table amidst enthusiastic cheers.)

The Noble CHAIRMAN again advancing to the table

amidst considerable cheers, said, our excellent friend, Colonel Thompson, will next address you.

Colonel THOMPSON, who was received with the most vociferous applause, spoke as follows:—My lord, ladies and gentlemen, I am sent forward to address you at a moment when we have not to speak to you on the subject of a success, but being under the shadow of something like a temporary misfortune. Neither you nor I came here under the notion that misfortune was always to fly over our heads harmless. (Cheers.) Need I say to you how necessary it is that, being engaged in a cause like ours, we should look on all temporary evils as they are intended to be looked upon—merely as a means of sharpening our minds—as instruments of greater successes to follow. (Loud cheers.) A post, they tell me, has been driven in in South Lancashire. Well, that's not every where, nor everything. Wait, I beg of you, till we drive it back again. (Loud applause.) Why, it evils like this settled the dispute, the trade of war would be nowhere at all. If we all gave over at the first symptom of fortune failing us, fortune would be only one long misfortune for the best of us. (Cheers, and a laugh.) We knew when we came here that we were to witness many a turn of chance before we left to our children the enjoyment of that freedom and those blessings which we will leave them and shall leave them. (Cheers.) Is there any fear that this country, whose metropolis can thus pour forth its thousands week after week in support of the popular cause, can ever fail? (Cheers.) Now, if there be any here of the adverse party, let me warn them not to talk too loudly on the subject of their success. They know that, as for driving us back to the beggarly elements of olden times, they might just as well talk of driving back the Anti-Slavery Society (cheers)—just as well might they expect that great work of philanthropy to be undone at their bidding, as for us and our cause to quail before their threatenings. (Cheers.) We know our enemies and their strength; we can calculate and estimate too, the value of those who are for our country and of those who are against it. (Cheers.) Go to the Prince de Joinville, tell him England needs not his puny interference. She has a domestic enemy, an inbred foe, can do his work much better. (Great cheering.) We have these among us, who have the power to inform us that British commerce—which might have raised us above the fear, almost, of human ills—which might have carried our flag, not in sanguinary triumphs, but in the victories of peace, all over the globe with scarcely a competitor to meet us—that commerce, they tell us, shall be crippled and limited to suit the interest which their side-pockets dictate. (Loud cheers.) They say plainly—they keep no secret of it—men in office, men decked with power have told you, and will tell you again before they have done perhaps, that it was to make their daughters portions that they robbed yours. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) Do Englishmen want telling that more than once? (Cheers, and cries of "No.") Is not one bidding sufficient to rouse the heart of every father here into fierce opposition to such horrible injustice? (Cheers.) Why, those men would lie on anything; there's no garbage they would not make their profit of; there's no trade so low, no calling so base—sinful, I might add—but those men, with their toll-dish, stand by and take their portion of the proceeds. (Cheers.) Yet those men, forsooth, look down on humble citizens, commercial men, tradesmen, as things beneath them, and hardly deserving of a glance. Do not you know, that for a man to bear an honest heart and a good conscience is vastly more valuable than to hold any rank this world can give him? (Loud cheers.) That such a cause as yours has always prospered and always shall, while be your and our sheet anchor, and we will hang by it till the day of success shall come. (Cheers.) England—great and glorious England as she might have been, and as in some ages of her history 'tis true she has been—will not see herself for ever trammelled and confined to suit the interest of those bad men—'tis well I did not give them a harsher epithet. (Loud cheers and laughter.) Oh! they shall not have me to truckle to them; they shall hear from me no compliments to their hospitality. "Light come, light go," is a story we have heard of before to-day; we know plenty who are hospitable when it suits their purpose. Thieves are hospitable: they drink all they can get, and give freely to their companions. (Loud cheers.) We cannot be deluded by such pretences as these, to look on and see the prospects of our children and our families scattered to the wind; we cannot bear that they shall rob us of a shilling to get sixpence for themselves. There the is rob, depend on it. (Cheers.) If it were fair, equitable thieving, there would be no getting rid of it. (Laughter and cheers.) You cannot stop a man that simply picks your pocket and spends the shilling at the wrong shop (cheers); if you could prove on him, as you can with these, that he took the shilling, getting only sixpence for himself, then there would be some chance, and that chance is before you now. Depend upon it, there is the rub, to which the question will be brought; and when that is settled we shall see the end. Ladies and gentlemen, I was sent forward here on one stipulation—which is not needful with me in general—that I should not detain you long. So one word more—a word which the place we are in prompts me to. I hear that a well-known favourite of yours, Miss P. Horton—whose name I mention with all the respect due to an individual so eminent in her profession (hear)—is singing elsewhere, and "Song of the Shirt." Now, all you that have shirts, and I am sure there are none of us here without them yet (great laughter), could you not go to increase her benefit and could you not, think you, instead of an encore, which might be troublesome to her, alter the exertion of singing so long a ditty, give in its place something like these cheers for the Anti-Corn-Law League? (Cheers.) Would that not be a fair use to make of a theatre which in our partially free country, is happily free, and which is, as I trust it always will be, under the direction of persons as take the lead there now, an instrument of promoting national freedom and morality, and not destroying them? (Cheers.) Gentlemen, if you admit that my allusion to this subject has been warranted by the occasion, bear it in your minds; and now let me most respectfully take my leave. (Great cheers, amidst which the gallant Colonel withdrew.)

The Noble CHAIRMAN next advancing, said:—I have now the pleasure of introducing to you a gentleman well acquainted with all farming details, a good practical agriculturist from the adjoining county to that in which I reside, and a gentleman of the highest character and abilities,—Mr. Edward Holland, of Dumbleton. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. HOLLAND then came forward, and was received with marked approbation. He spoke as follows:—My lord, ladies and gentlemen, this is the first time since the meeting of the Anti-Corn-Law Association in this theatre that I have had the pleasure of being present; but, having read the proceedings upon each and every occasion, I have constantly remarked that those speakers who are not amongst those that come the most prominently before you are continually in the habit of commencing their speeches with stating that they have been called upon quite unexpectedly to address you. (Cheers.) Now, I assure you that I am in that position also (cheers and laughter); for five minutes before I entered this theatre I was not aware that I should be a "stage-horse."—I thought I should only be a "stage-passenger." (Laughter.) However, a man who has his heart and soul in any cause—especially if he believe that cause to be beneficial, essentially beneficial—and I use the term in the strongest sense I can—to life's existence, depend upon it such a man is constantly ready to express his feelings upon so vital a subject to any body of his fellow-countrymen. (Great cheering.) All I beg of you, then, ladies and gentlemen, is not to expect from me any arguments, for those arguments which might arise from any practical knowledge at present in my possession should be advanced with so much care and so much thought that it is essential that I should have considered before coming here how I was to classify them and what they should be; for our opponents are ready to catch at the least tripping—all figures are scrutinized—all matters and points of fact and detail are sure to be examined and well sifted. I will, therefore, gentlemen, if you will excuse me upon this occasion, simply, as one fresh from the country, state to you as an eyewitness that I well know, so far at least as my part of the country is concerned, that our cause is prospering. (Cheers.) At first, indeed, for country gentlemen who espoused the cause of the League, it was all up-hill work with them—sour faces, or eyes askance—loss of temper—distance, and all the unpleasantness which can happen to those who live in the country, and who feel it also much more than you in town, because they are obliged to take their neighbours as they find them, and are not able to select from a multitude as you can who reside in the metropolis. (Cheers.) But now things have changed. I can go into the market and speak to the farmers openly and freely, as I can to you, upon Free-Trade principles; and I am not asked—"What do you mean—are you going to ruin the country?" and so on; but they say—"Ah! I see with you that it is impossible for us to oppose that question much longer, for though I may not agree with you, yet I do feel that your opposition is so strong, and is becoming so general, that we must yield." (Loud cheers.) But those are the worst sort of farmers—those are they of the old school who, if they were dissected, would be found to have a grumbling apparatus expressly made for such occasions. (Cheers and laughter.) And we may naturally suppose that men may be allowed to grumble who depend, in a great measure, upon the climate for their success, and not as the manufacturer or trader does, upon his own skill and handicraft. (Cheers.) A farmer, then, must be excused if he do now and then grumble more than other persons who are less at the mercy of the elements. But, with others, I feel that we did not make so much way, perhaps, as we might have done, in consequence of the name of the association. The Anti-Corn-Law League they were prepared to regard as an opponent to the Corn Laws alone. Now, thanks, not only to this society, but thanks also to the existence of protection societies, the farmers have been taught to think, and to act for themselves as well as think. (Cheers.) And I can assure you that I know, by living amongst them as I do, that, since the existence of the protection societies, thought has been so rife that we have gained some few converts from amongst the agriculturists of Worcestershire. (Cheers.) I believe that many who, at first, would have been so thoroughly opposed to us as to imagine that they were bound to oppose and crush us, would now be ready to join us; and I know that the exertions made in populous towns, and especially in the metropolis, cheer the hearts of those who sojourn in the country, and aid and encourage them to such an extent as you could hardly credit unless you were yourselves resident among us. (Cheers.) I remember once going into a museum, and among other things that were exhibited there was a short spear, strong and stiff in its nature, sharp at its point, and about two feet from the point was a cross-bar. "What on earth is this for," said I, "almost too heavy for a man to carry to battle?" "Oh, Sir," said the man, "it is for killing bears—it is a Norwegian bear-spear." "But," said I, "what is the use of that cross-bar?" "Oh, Sir," replied he, "that is very useful indeed; it saves us a great deal of trouble—the bear, immediately he is pricked by the point of the spear, embraces the bar in his arms, and presses the spear home and kills himself." (Loud laughter and cheers.) Now, thought I to myself, this is exactly what the agriculturists are about. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) The sharp point is the Corn Law—(hear, hear)—the cross-bar is the bar of protection—the farmer feels pricked by the Corn Law, and embraces the bar of protection. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, I hope that those who have felt so bitterly against us, and those who are now embracing this cross-bar of protection, are diminishing in number; and if ever I have the pleasure of meeting you again, I hope and trust that I may be enabled to rejoice with you that the time is fast approaching when we may all be one united body—not those only who are here, but those who are opposed to us—that we may all, protectives and anti-protectives, be one united body, enjoying the benefits of Free Trade. (The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amid loud and prolonged cheers.)

The Noble CHAIRMAN then came forward, and said, Ladies and gentlemen, you will now be addressed by your own Coblen. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. CORNEN then came forward amid most enthusiastic bursts of applause, which were renewed again and again, and which lasted for some minutes. As soon as the honourable gentleman could obtain a hearing, he addressed the crowded assembly as follows:—My Lord, ladies and gentlemen, if I had returned from South Lancashire, where I have been doing my duty as a freeholder of the southern division of that important county, victorious and decked with laurels, you could not have given me a more favourable reception. It is a proof, at all events, that we do not desert our friends in what our enemies call "the hour of adversity." Gentlemen, I come here not to talk of "misfortunes," "losses," or

"defeats," but to claim for ourselves, as Free Traders, a great moral triumph. (Cheers.) We have been out-nosed, I admit; but we will count the noses and see what they are made of. Gentlemen, we have not lost a member for South Lancashire, but we have failed in gaining one. (Hear, hear.) The late amiable representative of South Lancashire, who was suddenly and at an untimely period of his life snatched from us, was opposed to the League in its principles. We were upon this occasion brought to the contest for South Lancashire suddenly, unexpectedly, and in an unprepared position. Let us see, if you please, how the contest stands now, and how it stood when that late worthy representative—for he was a most amiable and excellent man in private life—was elected as member for the southern division of Lancashire. The last contested election for that part of the county was in the year 1837. That contest was between two Tories on the one side and two Whigs on the other. Lord Francis Egerton, who was at the head of the poll, was 1200 above Mr. Stanley, and 1700 ahead of Mr. Townley, the lowest on the poll. But in the year 1841, when the last general election took place, the leading friends of the Reform party in Lancashire were preparing to contest the county again with the same candidates, and they investigated the registration, and came to the conclusion that if they did contest it they would be in a minority of 2000, and they left the field in the possession of their adversaries. It was a contest between Whig and Tory in 1837. We were, therefore, then totally ignorant of our strength as Free-Traders; for, bear in mind that the gentleman for whom we fought in 1837 has not turned out to be a Free-Trader. Mr. Stanley, for whom we contended so ardently, has now sent down a distinct disclaimer of our principles, and his tenantry have, I believe, been to a man polled against us in the recent contest in South Lancashire. (Hisses.) If we have gained nothing else by this contest we have at least sifted the wheat from the chaff, and now know where we stand. Gentlemen, we have on this occasion had for our candidate a commercial man, the head of one of the largest firms in Liverpool, totally unconnected with the soil of Lancashire, without the slightest influence with any of the landed proprietors there. He came forward as a mercantile man, and he stands on the principle of the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws and all other monopolies. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, we have fought this battle against the combined influence of every large landed proprietor in South Lancashire, with the single and splendid exception of Lord Sefton, who has given us, I believe, all the assistance which he could do legitimately in the exercise of influence among those who are connected with him in that county. (Cheers.) The result is, that we have polled 6972 of the Free Traders of South Lancashire, being 400 more than were obtained by the highest of the two Reform Whig candidates in 1837; and we have polled within 500 of our opponent with the whole weight of the landed aristocracy to aid him. Gentlemen, we know our strength; we have 6972 of the freeholders of South Lancashire who are pledged to the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. We are told that, on this occasion, it has been a fair contest for Free-Trade principles, inasmuch as there has been no aristocratic or territorial influence arrayed against us. I have here the Standard of this evening (groans), and I will just read you what that veracious print says on the subject:—"The South Lancashire election has terminated by the return of the Conservative candidate, with a majority of nearly 600; the whole number of electors polled being 14,458. The result of the South Lancashire contest is one, on many accounts, deserving of observation. An election at which between 11,000 and 15,000 electors polled, must, of course, be free from suspicion of any internal influence, whether of the Government or the aristocracy, and an election in a district almost as densely peopled as a great city, must be equally free from the suspicion of any local territorial influence." Not content with one assertion—for the Standard does not do things by halves—a little further on it repeats it in these words:—"As we have said, Government influence, aristocratic influence, local territorial influence, are wholly out of the question in a district like South Lancashire, all cut up into small possessions, with a population of more than half a million, and between 14,000 and 15,000 electors actually brought to the poll." Gentlemen, let us see how far we have been free from aristocratic influence in this election, and what truth there is in the statement that Lancashire is all "cut up into small possessions." Is the Earl of Derby a small proprietor? (Hear, hear.) I do not know whether it is 12 or 15 miles that you may ride in one direction upon his land, but it is one or the other. Are Sir John Gerrard and Mr. Scarsbrick small proprietors? Both of these gentlemen are Catholics, and yet their tenantry came up to the poll, under the stewards' influence, almost to a man against us. Are they small proprietors? I rode over the district owned by Mr. Scarsbrick, the extent of which is 14 miles by 7, including a great portion of the district at Ormskirk. Are Lord Francis Egerton, Lord Wilton, and Lord Stamford and Warrington, small proprietors? Why, I am speaking to you of noblemen owning from £50,000 to £100,000 a year in this district: is their land "cut up into small possessions?" (Laughter.) And yet these men of "territorial influence," whose names I have given you, were dead against us upon this occasion. Lord Derby did not issue his flat that his tenantry should vote against us; and there was, nominally, a kind of neutrality; but there is a way of signifying through the steward, and from him to the underlings, and from them to the tenants, in what manner the rising sun wishes the tenantry to vote. (Hear, hear.) There was a placard put out to this effect, and canvassers went about repeating it:—"That Lord Stanley would be very much obliged to them if they would vote on this occasion for Mr. Entwistle. I believe, almost without exception, the Derby tenantry, as well as those other great proprietors of tenantry of whom I have spoken, almost to a man were arrayed against us. (Hear, hear, hear.) Gentlemen, how far does this influence extend? There were 14,000 and odd electors polled; there are 3600 £50 tenants-at-will on the register at the disposal of these great proprietors. Now, we are told that the Manchester polling district showed a very small majority; that that locality presents a very trifling balance in favour of Free Trade; and, therefore, it is quite clear that the League principles do not prevail in Manchester. Why, gentlemen, the Manchester polling district extends over 30 agricultural townships, all of which are entirely at the mercy of those large proprietors. It stretches out for 12 miles, from Lord Francis Egerton's estate at Worsley, down to the confines of Stockport; and I can bear testimony from actual observations that the tenantry of those large proprietors—Tatton Egerton, Lord Francis Egerton, Lord Wilton, and the others who hem in Manchester, as it were, and keep us in a state of siege—that those tenantry came in in dense masses, in a body, decked up with blue ribbons, and marched to the poll under the guidance of the steward, with just as much will and discretion of their own as if they had been their own quadrupeds. (Groans and hisses.) Gentlemen, we stand thus in the polling district of Manchester:—in the boroughs of Manchester and Salford—that is, those who poll within the parliamentary boroughs having qualifications there—there were polled 1164 for Mr. Brown, and only 659 for Mr. Entwistle. (Cheers.) We were swamped by the tenants-at-will, who were brought in from the neighbouring agricultural townships. How stand we upon the whole of this poll? We have a very large majority of the bond fide freeholders pledged to the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. Taking away the tenants-at-will, who have been forced to vote at the bidding of their landlords, there is a large majority of independent and bond fide freeholders of the county who have returned Mr. Brown to Parliament on this occasion. (Cheers.) Now, I have told you the way in which these tenants are brought up to the poll. I never had so much experience before upon this matter as I have had upon this occasion. I have gone through the whole of the county with Mr. Brown, and have seen the working of the system, and I will give you an illustration of it. In 1837, at the last contest, I was at Southport, a small watering-place at the extremity of the Ormskirk polling district, which is a purely agricultural part of the county. I rode up from Southport to Ormskirk along with a procession of voters, who went up from that place to poll for Mr. Stanley and Mr. Townley, the two Reform candidates. I proceeded to the place where these men were getting their breakfasts, and a shrewd quiet man, standing in the room, said to me, "You see all those men sitting there drinking their coffee, wearing orange and green rosettes?" I replied, "I do." "I saw," said my informant, "those same men, who are the tenants of the proprietor here"—whose name I will not mention, from circumstances that you will perceive probably—"I saw," said he, "those same tenantry at the last election, two years ago, sitting in this very room eating their breakfast with blue favours on their breasts." (Laughter.) "But," said he, "since that time the proprietor of the estate on which they are living as tenant-farmers has thought proper to change his politics from Tory to Whig, and they are now going to vote with him upon that side." (Renewed laughter.) Gentlemen, since 1837 that same property has changed hands, and has been sold by its former proprietor to a Tory landlord; and those same tenants were seen on Monday last marching up in a body again to Ormskirk to poll for the old colour, blue. (Laughter.) I was curious to watch this little batch of "free and independent electors" (laughter); therefore I commissioned a very trustworthy friend in that neighbourhood to write me an account of what was going on at Southport, and here is his letter written from that place:—"The rector of Southport, at the head of a procession" (cries of "Oh, oh") "came into Ormskirk, and led above one hundred to the poll, yesterday. The stewards and agents of Lord Skelmersdale, of Squires Scarsbrick and Plume Tempest, stood in the booths and feed the tenantry as they gave their votes. The same was done at Wigan by the steward of Lord Balcarras." These are all proprietors of the small possessions cut up, you know. (Laughter.) "The same at Newton by other stewards. I saw a woman running to stop her husband from voting at Newton, and did stop him, because the steward had been to her house and threatened her. The agents had no other canvassing but to intimate that they desired such a one to vote, and he voted." We were under a delusion as regarded the Ormskirk district, from which we were swamped by those tenants-at-will, up to the last moment. As there was no canvassing, and no activity on their part, we thought there probably might be a chance that we should get a considerable number of votes in that locality. Canvassing was out of the question; the signal was given to the steward, the steward simply gave his instructions to the tenants, and to a man they mustered at the breakfast-table, or any other point of designation, and came from thence to the poll. (Loud cries of "Same, same.") So completely do these men regard their tenants as their goods and chattels at the time of an election, that it is positively considered a breach of etiquette, and an intrusion and unwarrantable liberty, for a man to go and canvass a tenantry at all, unless he first goes and gets the landlord's permission. (Hear, hear.) This is the kind of opposition by which we have been defeated at this contest. Bear in mind that in the towns of South Lancashire there are comparatively few freeholders. If you want to know the sense, the will, and feeling of the townspeople—take their returns under the £10 franchise if you please—and then what say Manchester, and Salford, and the rest of them to Free Trade? But in the county contests, the numbers which are registered in the towns are comparatively few, for this reason: if men in business own property which they occupy for their business, they vote for it in the borough election, but they are disqualified from voting in respect of that property at the county election; and therefore they must be the owners of real property in the borough, apart from their business, to have a vote at all for the county. You will see from this circumstance the reason of the very small proportion of the voters that are actually included in the boroughs at all in South Lancashire. If you take these points into consideration, and bear in mind what I have stated to you, that we have been fighting Lord Derby, Lord Balcarras, Lord Skelmersdale, Lord Francis Egerton, Lord Stamford and Warrington, Lord Wilton, Mr. Scarsbrick, Sir John Gerrard, and the whole host of large proprietors of that county, with the exception of Lord Sefton—if you bear that in mind, I say, I am entitled to come before you, and claim a great moral triumph. (Cheers.) A mercantile man from his counting-house, drawn forth at an hour's notice, without the slightest preparation, has polled within 500 of his opponent, and we have actually upon the poll a large majority of the independent, bond fide freeholders of that county in our favour. (Loud cheers.) Whatever our opponents say, or Mr. Entwistle may assert in Parliament, I am prepared here to declare, and there to maintain, that he goes to that House not to represent the mind, wealth, intelligence, and independence of South Lancashire, but that he is the bond fide representative of the droves of bipeds that were driven up to vote for him at the late election. (Loud and continued cheering.) Gentlemen, this contest has been productive of advantages which will turn to good account in future. We know our strength; we have ascertained our enemies' weakness, and they know it too. (Cheers.) Why, this has been a battle to prepare us for the real contest in future. It is like clearing the decks, collecting our forces, and knowing who are our friends and who our enemies. We know now what is the strength of League principles in Lancashire. They tell us that the League is dead and defunct in this contest. I see in the Standard, a statement to this effect:—"This monster, the League, is now strangled." (Laughter.) I think you can make some tolerably cheerful guttural sounds, considering you are "strangled." (Renewed laughter.) Gentlemen, there is one point that I dwell upon with peculiar satisfaction in this contest. We have placed the League upon high—indeed, the very highest possible—moral ground in the county of Lancashire, for we have fought this battle purely upon Free-Trade principles; and I cannot help giving to the men of Lancashire of all political opinions—for there are no exceptions—the credit due to them for having on this occasion treated Free Trade as the great practical question of the day—that without having abandoned their politics, or turned their back on one point in their political creed, they have, for the present, merged other questions that are not the practical questions of the day, and with one accord, Tories, Whigs, Radicals, and Chartists in many districts, polled side by side in favour of the Free-Trade candidate. (Loud cheers.) Now, take the borough of Oldham. I was there with Mr. Brown at his recent canvass. Oldham is a place entertaining, probably, an extreme opinion on political questions as any borough in the kingdom; Mr. Brown was there catechised by individuals holding those ultra opinions, and he did not, on any one point of their political faith come up to their standard; but, nevertheless, at a crowded meeting in the townhall of that borough, I saw, certainly, an unexampled thing in the history of that town—a unanimous resolution passed to support Mr. Brown on Free Trade principles, which was moved by a man who himself professed Radical principles. I wish I could say that there had been the same unanimity on the part of those who call themselves "Conservatives," or "Tories," in that district. We have made a breach in that party on this question; that breach will never be healed again, but will go on widening. We have drawn men out from the slime of party, and we have compelled them, by the force of justice and truth, to record their votes for a Free Trader. The gentlemen who nominated Mr. Brown, himself professed to be a Conservative; and we have a great many instances of leading men, who, for the first time, on this occasion have polled irrespective of party. We have an immense number in that district who, as of old on the present occasion merely to obtain a safe future time, and I believe that in less than two years from this period of all parties in our midst during these years in the North, I except the lunatics of party, those men to whom reason has been denied. I say, with those exceptions, in less than two years I firmly believe we shall take no common ground on this question of Free Trade. We will make short work of the landlord's monopoly, when we under take our own interests, and come to a conflict upon this kind. There can be no doubt we have been defeated on this occasion on account of our disunion. Because there have been men who have sprung from commerce and manufactures, creatures to their order, true to the interests to which they are allied, who have called out from one town, who have gone to bring the warts from the agricultural districts to swamp the honest, independent votes of their neighbours. I know nothing to compare with such conduct as that of these few—I call them insane and suicidal politicians—unless it is the conduct of men of whom we read in the time of the war between the manufacturing towns of the Low Countries and the feudal aristocracy who then made war upon them, where we find among men of their own class—burghers—these individual cases of treachery, such as when they opened the gates of their boroughs, spiked their own guns, and brought in their enemy to devastate their streets and ruin their neighbours. One thing I have to congratulate you upon on this occasion, and that is, the importance which is attached by our opponents to this contest for South Lancashire. They say, "defeat in South Lancashire is death to the League." Now, let them hear that a mind, if they please; for I suppose they will not refuse to admit by and by that success in South Lancashire is death to Monopoly. (Cheers.) I am glad of the importance which they attach to this great contest, because it has come out in what I have stated on former occasions, that this question of Free Trade will not be carried by a mere numerical majority in the House of Commons. I have stated again and again, and now we have a proof of it, you need not wait for your nomination boroughs or pocket boroughs of Wilt and Dorset send up a majority to carry a repeal of the Corn Laws, it is with constitutions such as South Lancashire, Middlesex, London, Bristol, Hull, Liverpool, and Leeds, it requires that those various constitutions should be side by side with such places as Manchester, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Birmingham, and other large boroughs that are now united in this question, and no Prime Minister in this country will dare to maintain monopoly one hour longer than public opinion, through those formidable channels, is declared in favour of commercial freedom. (Loud cheers.) Then, gentlemen, our course is clear. We will leave Lancaster, Huntingdon, and Aylesbury; we will give up Hastings, too, if you like. We have to do with the large constituencies, and I tell you what our intention is with respect to South Lancashire. It has been wholly lost sight of that the first duty of men in the towns of Lancashire who have the means to become freeholders is to arm themselves with electoral weapons with which to fight the enemy in the polling booths. Every one must become a freeholder who can afford to invest £50 at four per cent. per annum. It requires only £50 to bring you 40s. a year; and it is the duty, and is felt to be so, of every man, whether here, the West Riding, or in South Lancashire, to become a freeholder and entitled to vote at a county election; and we have it in our power to carry the repeal of the Corn Laws by that simple means. (Cheers.) Our opponents, you may say, will play the same game. They have done this while we have been asleep. They have split their farms, and have compelled the tenants to take their sons or their brothers as joint partners, in order that more votes may be at the command of the landlords. We have comparatively done nothing; but I will undertake to say that, at the next revision in November, South Lancashire shall be placed, with a clear majority, above the number that our opponents can put on the register; and if they will only give us another registration before the election takes place, we will make that number four-fold. (Cheers.) You have in existence, for similar purposes, a Registration Society, which has been for some time most diligently and systematically at work in the city of London. Their place of business is No. 68, Cheapside. There every one who applies will find all necessary instruction, advice, and aid, to save him even the least possible trouble in this matter. It will be attended with no expense; you may there learn the law of the registration courts, and be put in the way of becoming electors, whether for the boroughs or the counties. You will be glad to hear that great progress has been made in this respect in the city of London. I know our opponents feel that there is a rod in pickle for the city of London. (Cheers and laughter.) I have before explained in this place that, by a recent decision in the Court of Common Pleas, lodgers, who pay £10 a year, can, if they like, become qualified to vote. I know that large numbers of young men live in London, who pay more than £10 a year for a floor or an apartment. Those are the very class who wish to aid us in the cause; for young men who have their way to make are not generally so blind as to wish to have the avenues stopped up by which they have the chance of reaching to fortune. Let them inquire as to the means by which to become electors; and let not a man who has it in his power find his name absent from the registration lists at the next election. I should not be doing justice to my feelings if I did not express the sense of obligation which I feel to my Lord Ducie for his attendance here to-night (cheers), and thank him for those valuable documents which he has presented to the meeting, and which will be far more serviceable out of this house when they are printed, minute and, unquestionably, accurate as they are. I thank him for those statements, completely proving, as they do, and establishing our case on that very ground where we were supposed to be the most vulnerable—I mean as to the power of farmers to compete with foreigners, and to sell their grain at a good profit, with perfect freedom of trade in corn. (Cheers.) There is one encouraging fact, namely, that, go where we will, if we find men—whether they be proprietors, like Lord Ducie or Mr. Holland, or tenant-farmers, like Mr. Lattimore and Mr. Hunt—if they are for Free Trade, they are the men most eminent for skill and intelligence as agriculturists. Go into the manufacturing districts, and find men who own establishments with tall chimneys, but who are Monopolists, and the very reverse of the rule applies. You will not find that they are the men to whom a Government commissioner, or a traveller from abroad who is in this country to make inquiries, would think of applying for information, either about their own business, or respecting principles of social policy. You will not find in Manchester that the men who run out of the borough to bring in these landlord-ridden serfs are the men who are promoted to offices of honour by their own townsmen. But in regard to the turning interest, where you have an intelligent man, ten to one but he is a Free-Trader, or in the high road to become one. I thank them for the sacrifices they have made, the sacrifices to which Mr. Holland has alluded, of social comforts which men have seldom the moral courage to forego. (Hear.) I thank them for what they have done for us. Let them not be dismayed at the threat of putting down the League. What is the League? The League is nothing but the impersonation of the anti-monopoly principle. Would the League have been more in favour with our opponents if they had called themselves by any other name? Had we designated ourselves an angelic choir (laughter) they would not have disliked us the less. It is not the League they dislike, but its principles of commercial policy. (Cheers.) Why, there have been Leagues in existence before this; and Leagues have been generally successful. There was the Solemn League and Covenant in Scotland. That was a League most obnoxious to ecclesiastical monopoly and tyranny (cheers); and why was it? Not because they called themselves "the Solemn League," but because their principle was religious freedom and liberty of conscience. (Loud cheers.) They had a League in Germany—the Hansatic League, which was a union of the merchants in the towns of that country, to put an end to the brigandage of the feudal aristocracy, who had planted themselves in their castles on the banks of the rivers, and sallied out thence with their mailed attendants to harass the commerce of that day. Thank you that the League would have been more in favour with those brigands had they called themselves by any other name? No; it was not as a "League" they were obnoxious, but because their purpose was to put down spoliation and robbery. Our League has no other end; this is the only object we have in view. (Cheers.) They may taunt us, and call us by what foul names they please; they have exhausted their vocabulary; they cannot call us by names half so bad as they did this time two years. We survived their slanders then, and we are in a better position now, with an exchequer well replenished (loud cheers) to meet their calumnies when they fall stillborn—for they know that they are not true themselves. (Laughter.) The League is not strangled; the League is not dead. (Cheers.) The League is the anti-monopoly principle in this country. The League will die only with the death, or, I would fain hope, the repentance, of the commercial monopolists. (The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst vehement cheering.)

At the conclusion of Mr. Cobden's address, there were loud calls from all parts of the theatre for Mr. Bright, and the desire to hear that gentleman being very loudly manifested, he at length came forward.

Mr. Bright then said:—I confess that I have never before come from an election contest in which we have been in a minority, with so little of that feeling which men are supposed to experience when they have been defeated. The ardent labourers in the Free-Trade cause, from whom we parted last night in Manchester, exhibited no symptoms of defeat; on the contrary, they were persuaded that they had made an enormous advance. (Hear, hear, hear.) They were satisfied that, at the large meeting which they knew was to be held here to-night, there would be a sympathy expressed with them in their struggle, and that you would be willing to cheer them on in the continued contest in which they are engaged, and to which they have devoted themselves. (Cheers.) I can bear testimony to the noble manner in which many hundreds of men in South Lancashire have fought during this struggle; to the days and the nights which they have spent in disseminating Free-Trade principles, and in bringing to the poll Free-Trade voters. And, bear in mind, there is, as regards canvassing, a great difference between us and the steward of a large landed proprietor going out to seek votes. That important personage merely intimates his lord's pleasure, and the tenants, as a matter of course, most obsequiously obey. With us it is necessary, if men are not already convinced, to talk and argue, to debate and reason with them, in order to show them that it is their duty and interest to support Free Trade. The labour, then, in our share of the contest, is infinitely greater than that which is necessary for our opponents. We have first of all to beat down the whole of that large number of electors who are already, by their own necessitous circumstances, pledged against us; and then we have to obtain a majority of those who remain. You have heard a paragraph read from a monopoly newspaper relative to the South Lancashire election. The monopolist press will chuckle over what they are pleased to term this victory of their party; they may well be thankful for it. Monopoly has had few triumphs in this country of late years, and fewer still are in store for it in years to come. But there are other public journals, the writers in which think it their duty to find fault with the conduct of the League; journals too, which do not profess to be in the interests of the monopolists. Two papers I have seen this evening one is that from which a quotation has been already made. The other is the Globe. I will take the liberty of reading a paragraph from its leading article, that you may see how far the party it represents sympathise with us in this struggle. (Hear, hear, hear.) After speaking of the tenacity of the League in adhering obstinately and resolutely to the principle of total and immediate repeal, the writer says, "Here, we think, the League has taken an untenable and, therefore, detrimental position. Tenacity in striving for that which is unattainable has created or increased the difficulties of beating down the sliding scale, and substituting for it the better system of a fixed duty. Instead of regarding every advantage gained over the advocates of restriction as a victory, the unprincipled abolitionists subject themselves, and the cause of Free Trade generally, to defeat, by aiming to accomplish that which is unattainable." Now, in the first place, I give this a flat and an unmistakable contradiction. It is utterly false in fact; for there has been no election yet in which we have been concerned, and where we have failed, in which with a view other than a thoroughly Free-Trade canvass we could have polled as many votes as we did. (Cheers.) "They thus exhaust their resources, and subject the Liberal party to reverses and discouragements in places where, by union and combined exertion, they might become increasingly strong, and eventually triumphant. Our remarks may be unpalatable; but we know them to be founded in truth; and that they have been practically exemplified in several instances." (Hear, hear, hear.) He does not state any one of these instances. "We believe that had the supporter of a low fixed duty, in the person of a gentleman of landed property, and connected with one of the influential families of the county or of immediate neighbourhood, stood in opposition to Mr. Entwistle, South Lancashire would have been wrested from Tory domination." Before going to Lancashire I was spoken to by a member of the House of Commons on this very subject. He said, "Your electioneering policy appears to me most unwise; you lose seats which otherwise, you might secure." I asked him where that would be, and to give me a single instance of the description alluded to. He could not; in fact, there is not one such instance. It is true there is one case in which the party alluded to was returned a member since we adopted our present electioneering policy; but that man, Whig though he be, is a thorough Protectionist; and, therefore, their electioneering policy, so far, has not been very favourable to the cause of any relaxation of commercial restrictions. (Cheers.) I asked him if he knew South Lancashire and the spirit that prevailed there. He replied that he knew very little about it; but I told him, and I can tell you, that if any man in South Lancashire had come forward in opposition to Mr. Entwistle, holding what we called "Liberal principles," but refusing to vote for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Law, I believe—and I speak with the utmost sincerity, and with a slight knowledge of the fact—that he could not, by the utmost exertions, have polled one-half of the number of electors that were obtained for the League candidate. (Cheers.) It may be "unpalatable" to hear these remarks; but it should be borne in mind that it is disagreeable to the party who has written this leading article that we should adopt a course which beats down the fence between Whig and Tory. Those terms have never been made use of in the contest in South Lancashire. Men of all parties have voted for the Free-Trade candidate; and no man who has had any connexion with that county will deny that we have there done more to abolish old party cries and distinctions, and all those delusions by which the people have suffered so much in past times, than has ever been done before in any election, or in any number of elections that have taken place there. (Loud cheers.) Let men who profess not to be monopolists take care how they find fault with us. It may be they cannot approve of everything we do; but while they are doing little or nothing towards overthrowing monopoly, we are doing all that lies in our power to do. We have subscribed our money freely; and hundreds of men who have gained every farthing they possess by the sweat of their brow, have subscribed liberally towards this great cause; and hundreds and thousands have made sacrifices for it which the great leaders of political parties know not of; and I say it all becomes this party, if they have, as they profess, any sympathy with our object, thus to step forward at the moment like this, and help the men whom they pretend to call their opponents to strangle, if it were possible, this "vile and hated conspiracy," on which you have set the seal of your approbation over and over again. (Loud cheering.) I know not that I have much to add, for I was not present to-night with the intention of speaking; but I will say—and I do so with the utmost sincerity—that all I have witnessed during the past week connected with the election just terminated convinces me, if possible, more than I ever was before, of the wisdom of the League in taking up a principle which can be easily understood, and from which no man can be driven. (Cheers.) We have seen men working with an energy unknown in all former contests. "How we were deluded," they now say, "in 1837! We thought that with some kind of ardour in favour of a candidate who, at the present election, has done all he can to defeat the object we aim at. Were we not then running after a false scent? Were we not fighting for a man merely because he hoisted a certain party colour? It is well for us that he was not returned then, for we might have found it as difficult to get rid of him as of Mr. Estlin. (Cheers and laughter.) I am satisfied that we have placed this question on a basis such as will ensure its speedy triumph in the county of Lancashire. We have had Free-Trade elections in boroughs, and have won them; but there has never before been a county election conducted on the principle of a total and immediate abolition of all commercial monopolies. (Loud cheers.) If, in the first county election, we have fought under circumstances not the most favourable,—opposed by the combined influence of all the landed proprietors of the county,—we have succeeded in striking off a thousand of our hostile majority; if our opponents only yesterday morning trembled in their shoes because they believed the majority which they had gained was rapidly dwindling away; and if they now can make a great triumph and glorification because, out of 11,000 voters (3000 or 4000 of whom are seigns), they have secured a majority of less than 600, why, then, we have done something for South Lancashire; and I can tell you that, whatever exertions you may make when your opinions may be called for in a similar manner, your exertions, I will not say shall be surpassed, but shall at any rate be equalled by the intelligent freeholders of the north of England. (The honourable gentleman retired amidst the loud plaudits of his audience, and waving of hats and handkerchiefs.)

The CHAIRMAN then came forward and said:—Ladies and gentlemen, I am requested to state that Mr. Milner Gibson, who was expected to address you, has been prevented from returning to town. Before declaring this meeting to be adjourned, I will just state that, besides the calculations which I read to you, I had in my hand another paper which I did not read; and I may perhaps be called to account for suppressing it, because it may be said it was not so favourable as those I have read. But I refrained from reading it because I considered it so absurd that it would be folly in me to place the slightest faith in it. I merely mention this, in order that I may not be attacked for having left the calculation to which I refer altogether out of view. (Cheers.) It is now my duty to declare this meeting adjourned till Wednesday evening next.

At the instance of Mr. GORDON, three cheers were given for Lord Duncannon, the honourable gentleman described as the best practical arable farmer in the country.

The meeting concluded shortly before ten o'clock.

FREE-TRADE MEETING IN NEWBURY. On Thursday evening, the 23rd of May, the advocates of Free-Trade held a public meeting in the Fanners-street School-room, for the purpose of assisting the Anti-Corn-Law League in their noble endeavours to abolish the iniquitous tax on food. Mr. John McKinnell was called to the chair; and a resolution pledging the meeting to raise subscriptions in support of the League—after having been well spoken to by Mr. David McKean and Mr. Bald—was carried unanimously. Several persons then handed in their subscriptions, collectors were appointed, and the meeting separated. —A Correspondent.

We have heard from good authority that the notice issued by the steward of the Earl of Derby, to which we directed attention in our last number, had no special reference to the South Lancashire election, but was a mere repetition of an annual form of notice and was published before the vacancy occurred in the representation. We know not whether the concluding threat of severity to defaulters forms a customary part of these annual notices, but, whether or not, it is one which reflects little credit on the Earl's name and forbearance of the agent, or on the intelligence and independence of the tenantry.

FREE-TRADE BENEFIT SOCIETY FESTIVAL.—SALISBURY, May 27.—This society, which in the little space of four months consists of nearly 100 respectable young men, assembled at the Dolphin Inn, this morning, being Whit Monday. At an early hour workmen were busily employed in erecting a triumphal arch, consisting of laurels and other evergreens, surmounted with a garland of flowers, from one extremity of the said inn to the corner of Culver-street. At ten o'clock, the society, having partaken of refreshment, formed into a procession, and left the inn to pay respects to the honorary members. Several tasteful banners having Free-Trade mottoes were borne by some of the members. The society first proceeded to Milford, the seat of Richard Fowler, Esq., M.D. They next visited John Lambert, Esq., of Milford Hill (the Chairman of the Salisbury Branch of the National Anti-Corn-Law League), and W. Fane, Esq., of Belle Vue. They then returned to the Dolphin Inn, where a dinner was prepared. The dining-room was tastefully decorated with evergreens and flowers. After dinner the society proceeded to the pleasure-grounds of the Rose and Crown Inn, Milford, and after enjoying themselves there for some hours, they returned to the Dolphin Inn and took supper. The next evening, Tuesday, the members again supped at the Dolphin, after which J. Lambert, Esq., very ably addressed them. It is confidently expected that before this year closes the society will consist of some hundred members: such is the march of Free-Trade principles in the cathedral city of Salisbury!

LEGISLATING AGAINST FOOD.—What an enormous immorality it is, when one looks at it with unsophisticated mind—this legislating against food! These people really seem as if they had a sort of horror of food. They are in arms against plenty; they fear much bread; they abhor the abundance of meat. We have this on their own showing of their own case. It is the drift, the point of all the monopolist argument, that, if it were not for monopoly, there would be more bread in the land than there is. This is their case. We all remember Lord St. Albans's famous Tribulation, in which his lordship showed how many millions of quarters of best wheat, as cheap as an old song, would come rushing in upon us like a deluge, from a single province of Russia, the moment the monopoly should be abolished. The statistics of that oration have long since had their due: but what shall we say to the morality of it? What does the argument mean but that much bread is a nuisance to be abated, and abundance of wheat a curse to be averted, by dexterous and provident statesmanship. —Hardwood's Lectures.

WHO ARE THE CUSTOMERS OF THE LINCOLNSHIRE FARMERS?

At a railway meeting held recently at Lincoln, Mr. Seely, an extensive miller, in order to show the advantage of one line over another, entered into detailed statements as to the traffic, especially in goods, and gave the following particulars as to the agricultural produce of the district and its destination:—

"The chief produce of this district (Lincolnshire) was cattle, corn, and wool. He had addressed to several farmers some circulars, requesting information with regard to the weight of wool which they sold last year, the weight of corn, and the number of fat beasts and sheep sent to the different markets, and what markets they were. He was sorry he was unable to give the meeting any definite information as to the best market for cattle for the farmers of this district; but, as far as he could learn, at least two-head of cattle out of every three went to Rotherham market, and the third to Wakefield. There was also the advantage which Rotherham had in the market being two days before that of Wakefield; so that the cattle, if not sold in the former, were transferred to the latter. Mr. Joshua Lupton, who was pretty well known in this city, when present a few days ago, stated that there was another advantage which the Rotherham market had over the Wakefield market, as the Lincolnshire men were met at Wakefield by a large supply from the North Riding of Yorkshire; and he said that the Rotherham market had only grown up in consequence of the cattle from this district being met by the cattle of the North Riding, and thus being driven down, as it were, to Rotherham for the supply of the Manchester and Sheffield markets. * *

With regard to the articles of wool and corn, he had sent circulars to some of the leading farmers; from some he had obtained answers, and he found that for every ton of wool they sold last year, they sold 119 tons of wheat and barley. He had had answers from three farmers, and he found that they had sold 613 tons of wheat and barley, and only 5 tons 8 cwt. of wool. Now, with respect to corn, there could be no question that wheat and barley were the sorts of corn that were chiefly produced here, and he found that, from the 1st of October to the 1st of April last, 59,365 quarters of wheat were sold in Lincoln market; the different merchants of Lincoln (and he had inquired of every one of them) had shipped to Leeds during that period 2119 quarters; and to Wakefield, during the same period, 1382 quarters; he also found that the three firms at Lincoln—Alderman Rudgard, Messrs. Hill and Rook, and Messrs. Keyworth and Seely, purchased 32,277 quarters; that the total of wheat they shipped was only 572 quarters, and that all the rest they ground. Then he (Mr. Seely) further found that Mr. Thorpe, of Newark, had purchased, during the same time, 8,513 quarters; and Mr. Hold, 2606 quarters. He was not aware what the town millers purchased; but there were twelve windmills, and if they were averaged at ten quarters a week, there would appear to be a consumption during that period of 3120 quarters; so that, out of 59,365 quarters bought, the five wholesale millers took 43,126 quarters, leaving but 9288 quarters unaccounted for. He did not know where this went to; but he apprehended the greater portion of it was conveyed to Nottingham, Derby, and that district. Now, speaking in the presence of Mr. Hill (and he had no doubt he should have been borne out by Mr. Rudgard, had he been present), he could affirm that the great proportion of the wheat ground by the Lincoln millers went to Manchester—both flour and bran. There was much said about the valley of the Calder, and its large population; but respecting this he (Mr. Seely) would remind them of an old proverb (and proverb generally embody great truths), that "men did not send coals to Newcastle," and the millers of Lincoln were not such fools as to send their produce to the valley of the Calder, when that same district was well known to be studded with flour mills. (Hear, hear.) He wrote to his partner and friend, Mr. Keyworth, of Manchester, for information with regard to the quantity of flour he had sold from the 1st of October to the 1st of April, and the places where it was delivered: the answer was, that he had sold at Rochdale 618 sacks, at Oldham 2,141, at Heywood 1,912, at Ashton and Stalybridge 3,067, at Stockport 2,202, and at Manchester 11,351. Rochdale, Oldham, and Heywood, were on the Leeds and Manchester line; Ashton and Stalybridge on the Sheffield and Manchester line; Stockport communicated with the same line, but the Manchester and Leeds did not. They met with much greater competition from the millers of Yorkshire along the Manchester and Leeds line and this was a sufficient reason why they did not go into the valley of the Calder. Thus, what he (Mr. Seely) had said was true: they had shipped only 1851 sacks of flour and 1500 sacks of bran along and connected with the proposed line they had sold 5260 sacks of flour and 3598 sacks of bran. With regard to barley and malt, the facts were pretty nearly in the same proportion: from the 1st of October to the 1st of April, there had been sold in these markets 26,685 qrs. of barley; of this, 700 qrs. went to Leeds, 577 qrs. to Wakefield; of malt, 100 qrs. were shipped to Leeds, and 100 qrs. to Wakefield. In the same time, 5598 qrs. of malt were sent to Manchester; and Mr. Thorpe, the largest miller in that place, had that morning informed him (Mr. Seely), that before the season closed he should ship 5000 qrs. more, and all to Manchester. He apprehended there would be other shipments made to Manchester by other millers in the town; but he was unable to inform the meeting of the quantity. Thus it might be fairly assumed, that Manchester and the places around were the districts that consumed the chief part of the wheat and barley grown in the Lincoln district; and this was what they had to bear in mind, notwithstanding anything that railway shareholders and canal proprietors might say to the contrary."

[From the above statements it will be tolerably clear, that the Lincolnshire farmers, or at all events the millers, are a little more enlightened as to who are their best and largest customers, than their redoubted city representative, Colonel Sibthorp. With these facts before their eyes, they will be in no humour to respond to that memorable and philanthropic wish of the Standard, touching the utter razing and ploughing over of Manchester and other manufacturing towns; for in that case their best, if not their only market for their wheat and other produce, would be wholly lost to them.]—Manchester Guardian.

THE FACTORY DISTRICTS.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

In my last I introduced a subject which certain philanthropists of the present day seem to forget, namely, the cheap and abundant articles of clothing produced by the aid of machinery. It is certainly an unaccountable paradox that noble lords and gentlemen should come from among their farm-labourers, who have barely a change of clothes—who have barely enough of potatoes and bread—who, many of them, do not eat a mouthful of beef or mutton from year to year—who, once in two months, it may be, eat a pound or two of bacon—who, in short, are employed in raising crops of human food, but who themselves are living on the meanest kinds of it, with not enough of that meanest food to fill their bellies—I say, it is a strange paradox, and proves, though there has been no other proof, that the creature man is the most unaccountable and fantastic being of creation—to see those who come from among the field-labourers, who cannot spare a shilling to buy out on articles of clothing but by pinching the belly, and who are pinched though they buy no clothes—to see these advancing to the relief of the factory operatives, who are comparatively well paid, well fed, well clothed, and well lodged!

I have before me published and unpublished facts, some of them parliamentary and some of them not, which either professedly or incidentally give evidence of the food consumed by farm-labourers. Besides which, I have had a wide range of personal observation in many of the agricultural counties. From what I have seen of the style of living among the factory workers in and around Manchester, at Ashton, Stalybridge, and Bolton and neighbourhood, I shall make a comparison, and shall be ready to support it hereafter, namely, that the 1220 factory workers of the Messrs. Whittaker, at Ashton—and they are only a fair specimen—eat as much butcher's meat, that is to say, beef, mutton, pork, and veal, as all the farm-workers and their families, not themselves farmers, nor overseers of farms, nor fed in the farm houses, nor in the workhouses, nor in the prisons, in the whole of Oxfordshire; or in the whole of Buckinghamshire, and adjoining half of Hertfordshire; or in the whole of Dorsetshire and southern division of Wiltshire united; or in the whole of Somersetshire; or in the half of Devonshire; or half of Essex; or half of Suffolk; or whole of Gallogway and Wigton, in Scotland; or whole of West Lothian; or whole of Fife, Kinross, and Clackmannan united; or whole of Forfarshire; or the whole of the counties of North, West, and South, in Ireland; or the whole of the provinces of Munster and Connaught, with all their counties combined.

I repeat, that in those districts of country here specified, as in others not specified, if the gentry, and farmers, and tradesmen, and artisans, the overseers of farms, and all who are otherwise provided for, be it in farmhouse, or hospital, or workhouse, or in prison, are deducted, and none left but those who are actually the labourers and their families living on their wages received for farm labour, they do not eat more butcher's meat, collectively, in those specified districts, than do the 1220 factory operatives and their family dependents at Ashton under Lyne. I am as sure as I am of anything that I ever saw, or heard, or felt, that they do not eat anything approaching the quantity of butcher's meat used by these 1220 factory hands; but, for my present purpose, it is enough to say that they do not eat more. I shall be glad if this assertion of mine provokes inquiry. Meantime, it is there before the reader, before the world, and it can be proved true.

Now, I ask again, if it is not a strange and inexplicable paradox, that, full of humanity, a large section of our legislators should come from among these farm labourers, who plough and plant, and sow and reap the fields from which they, our legislators, derive their incomes; and who plough and plant and reap those fields, driving nothing more than a stunted diet of the poorest food, seldom able to buy clothing of even the meanest kind, if not assisted by the charitable hands of the clergy and gentry who live around it, if not a strange paradox that the machinery which makes clothing cheap, which produces scarves and flannels, and put them into the hands of charity at a low price, and makes charity cheap also, and clothes the farm-labourer's family better than they would be clothed if each and flannel were dearer, and his share of the fruits of the fields in which he works remained small and distant, and not most unaccountable that such humane persons should seek to make clothing scarce and dearer? But is it not stranger still that the pretence for doing so is to give exercise to a sentiment of benevolence in behalf of the factory worker, who, in every aspect in which they can be viewed, are in a condition superior to farm labourers; in some respects as regards the two great essentials of life, food and clothing, greatly superior? But is it not more strange still that those who take all that can be spared from the land in the shape of rent—who cause every bushel of grain and pound weight of meat to be sold, save what the farmer and his family choose to eat, and save what the labourer, from their number and competition, are forced to subsist upon, which, God help them, is small enough in quantity, and mean enough in kind—should not see that this grain, and oil, and mutton, and bacon, and butter, and cheese, is sold to one trading and manufacturing people, who, because they trade and manufacture, are able to buy it? They buy it, and they eat and are comfortable, if they have enough. Whether all people engaged in trade, as masters or operatives have enough or not is another question. The breakfasts of tea and coffee, and butter, and bread, and bacon; dinners of meat and vegetables, and puddings and pies, teas of bread and butter, and coffee or tea; suppers composed of some portion of all or each other meet—these are what I see the factory workers eating every day. If people are not employed, or but partially; or if they are so numerous that their competition brings down wages, as is peculiarly and habitually the case in the agricultural counties at a distance from manufacturing localities, they must eat food accordingly; and the producers of grain and other provisions must pocket less money as profits or as rents.

Men will improve themselves, if the circumstances in which they are placed furnish a stimulus to that improvement. They will also acquire wealth, if their industry be rewarded, and its fruits enjoyed; and, generally speaking, they will become intelligent and virtuous, if the means of obtaining knowledge be fairly within their power.—Prof. Dewar's Ireland.

THE SOUTH LANCASHIRE ELECTION AND THE MAYOR AND EX MAYORS OF STOCKPORT.—The Mayor of Stockport and five ex Mayors recorded their votes for Mr. Brown and Free Trade. Since the incorporation of the borough, in 1835, the present Mayor is the eighth. One ex-Mayor is dead, and the other not qualified for South Lancashire only about a fourth of the borough is in Lancashire. At the booth in Manchester, at which these voters polled, Cephas Howard, Esq., mayor, was the first, Alderman Andrew, ex-mayor, the second, and H. Coppock, Esq., town clerk, the third, to poll on the morning of the day. This looks like being in earnest against monopoly.

The great evil of protection is, that it cannot be made just, equal, and equitable.—Deacon Hume.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE ELECTION.

NOMINATION OF THE CANDIDATES.

The nomination of the candidates having been appointed by the Sheriff for Friday, the 24th of May, at ten o'clock, the little town of Newton presented a lively appearance as early as nine o'clock. The hustings were erected in the usual place, in front of the church, opposite the Horse and Jockey Inn, fronting down the principal street. From that hour until ten o'clock several carriages arrived, and those containing ladies were drawn up on that side of the street opposite the Horse and Jockey Inn. Amongst the parties on the ground were:—

Messrs Thomas Bolton, Henry Holmes, Hardman Earl, Richard Earl, Edmund Molyneux J. P. Maitley; William Whalley of Clark hill, near Clithero; W. C. Cleaver, of Liverpool; P. Rushton, jun., of Liverpool; Samuel Holme, of Liverpool; William Broome, of Liverpool; Messrs. C. Ewart, William Garnett, J. I. Blackburne, M. P., G. C. Leigh, William F. Hulton, James Holme, C. Rawdon, George Holt, R. Cobden, George Wilson, Edward Lloyd, of Manchester; Clement Royds, J. Wilson Patten, M. P., Robert Garner, J. Muncaster, of Liverpool; Sir Thomas Potter; Jonah Harrop; J. Wilkinson, of Liverpool; J. Bentley, &c.

The High Sheriff, John Fowden Hindle, Esq., of Woodfold Park, near Blackburn, accompanied by Robert Brandt, Esq., barrister-at-law, the Sheriff's assessor, arrived about a quarter before ten o'clock. Mr. Brown, the Free-Trade candidate, arrived in a carriage and four a minute or two before ten o'clock. Mr. Entwistle, the Conservative candidate, arrived by railway from Liverpool shortly afterwards, with a procession, blue and white flags, and a band of music. There was also a procession of the supporters of Mr. Brown. Great numbers arrived by the trains from Manchester, Liverpool, Bolton, Wigan, Leigh, &c.

Mr. Brown, being the candidate first in the field, having the choice of sides on the hustings, selected the booth to the Sheriff's right hand; Mr. Entwistle and his friends occupied the booth to the Sheriff's left.

Amongst the gentlemen in Mr. Brown's booth we observed—

Messrs. R. Cobden, M. P.; J. C. Ewart, Hardman Earl, Richard Earl; Thomas Bolton, of Liverpool; Sir Thomas Potter, Mr. Alderman Kershaw, Mr. Alderman Armitage; Messrs. Robert Gardner, George Wilson, Thomas Bazley, jun., William How; and many other gentlemen from Bolton, Rochdale, Wigan, Ashton, Oldham, Warrington, and other parts of the division.

Amongst the gentlemen in Mr. Entwistle's booth were—

Messrs. John Wilson Patten, M. P.; John Ireland Blackburne, M. P.; Colonel Plumbe Tempest; Sir Thomas Branker; Edmund Molyneux; Samuel Holme, of Liverpool; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Thomas Townsend, William Townsend; Thomas Hurley, of Manchester; Clement Royds, of Rochdale; W. F. Hulton, of Hulton; Jonah Harrop, of Ashton, &c.

The proceedings were commenced by the Sheriff's assessor, Mr. BRANDT, reading the Queen's writ, and the act and oaths against bribery and corruption. The usual oath was administered to the High Sheriff, who, after having subscribed the declaration, proceeded briefly to address the meeting in explanation of the important duty they had assembled to perform. He eulogized the character of the late representative of the district; and, having congratulated the electors on the peaceful manner in which the canvass of both candidates had been hitherto conducted, assured them that in the performance of his duty he should endeavour to act with the strictest impartiality, and to secure for every freeholder who might wish to address them, a fair and patient hearing.

ROBERT GARDNER, Esq., of Manchester, came forward amidst loud cheering to propose Mr. Brown. After some preliminary remarks he said:—Gentlemen, this county, which was formerly an agricultural county, has become a great commercial county (hear, hear); and it requires a man well versed in all commercial business to represent it in Parliament. (Cheers.) This division of the county in which we are now engaged, not many years ago, was a complete morass. It comprehends an area of 441,000 acres—(great interruption from the Monopolists, followed by cries of "Order," and cheers from the Free Traders)—it covers, I say, a space of 441,000 acres, and it is rated at very nearly five millions. (Hear, hear.)

The northern division covers a space of 721,000 acres, and includes within it several important towns, such as Preston, Blackburn, and about twelve large manufacturing places, whose inhabitants are about 200,000 in number, yet the whole of it contains a population of only 402,000 (though it has nearly double the number of acres), whilst the southern contains a population of no less than 1,264,000. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) This barren morass, which was really worth nothing for agricultural purposes, perhaps, not worth half-a-crown an acre—"Oh, oh," from the Monopolists, and counter cheers—"I say there are districts in it—[Mr. William Hulton: "Ah, ah!"]—comprehending twenty square miles, that contained, not very long ago, only fifty, eighty, or a hundred inhabitants, which now contain some twenty or thirty thousand. (Loud cheers.) Now, see what commerce has done for this county—for this division. (Cries of "Question" from the Monopolists.) I am to the question—this is the question. (Free-Trade cheers.)

This county now contains the largest population of any in the kingdom, not excluding Middlesex—(cheers)—this county is rated for a higher amount than any county in England, not including Middlesex. (Hear, hear.) The population of this county exceeds that of Yorkshire by 500,000. (Great applause, and renewed cries of "Question" from the Monopolists.) Why, it is the question. [Mr. Cobden: Those facts and figures do not suit them.] (Great cheering.) Mr. Gardner: I say, then, that this county has become completely a commercial county, and that it requires a man to represent it who is thoroughly versed in all commercial transactions—a man who is thoroughly conversant with our trading interests—(cheers); and every wise constituency, that will study its own welfare, will seek out for that man to represent them who is best acquainted with their individual interests. (Renewed cheers.) Mr. Gardner then proceeded to notice and refute several charges that had been made against Mr. Brown, whose claims, founded on his great practical commercial knowledge, he ably supported. Having pointed out many of the evils inflicted on commerce by restriction, he concluded, amidst loud cheers, by proposing Mr. Brown.

JOSEPH CHRISTOPHER EWART, Esq., in a short speech, seconded the nomination.

Colonel PLUMBE TEMPEST, of Tonge-hall, near Leeds, came forward amidst some cheers to propose Mr. En-twistle. He said that the contest was as to whether British industry should or should not be protected. He considered that the nation should, as far as possible, be rendered independent of other nations for its bread; that agriculture and commerce should go hand in hand for the prosperity of all classes; that the home market was the best, and that no increase of trade from the repeal of the Corn Laws could compensate for the injury the small traders especially would thereby sustain. After urging these and other oft-refuted fallacies, Colonel Tempest concluded by proposing Mr. Entwistle as a fit and proper candidate.

Sir THOMAS BRANCKER, of Liverpool, in seconding the nomination of Mr. Entwistle, after proclaiming that he was the friend of Mr. Brown, whom he highly respected, made the following characteristic remarks:—My friend, Mr. Ewart, who seconded the nomination of Mr. Brown, has appealed to all parties to return a Free Trader to Parliament as the representative of South Lancashire, in the person of my friend, Mr. Brown—for Mr. Brown is my friend, and I highly respect him. In this respect, however, I do not wish to follow his example. I do not call upon the Radicals for their support in favour of Mr. Entwistle, because I know that, if I did, they would not answer to the call. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) But I do call upon the Tories or Conservatives, or whatever they call themselves—for my part I am myself a bigoted old Tory—(laughter, and partial cheering)—I call upon the Tories to merge all minor differences. The Radicals never split from their party, and, although I am a bigoted old Tory (hooting and laughter), I confess that, in this respect, I am prepared to follow their example. I may think that one man goes too far, and another not far enough, but I do not think that sufficient to justify me in deserting my party. (Laughter, and "Hear, hear.") With Mr. Entwistle, however, I do agree. He has been called an old Tory of forty or fifty years ago, and if you return him to Parliament he will serve you well and faithfully, and do all in his power to promote your interests. He concluded by seconding the nomination of Mr. Entwistle.

WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., then stepped forward, and was received with great cheering by the Free-Traders, and hisses from the blues. When silence was in some degree restored, he said:—Mr. High Sheriff and gentlemen, I have the honour now to stand before you in the proud position of a candidate for the honour of representing you in Parliament. Gentlemen, I cannot omit on the present occasion, as I have availed myself of every opportunity when I have appeared before you, to mention to you the high estimation in which I held your late lamented representative. He was one of the most amiable and most accomplished men whom I have had an opportunity of knowing, and I am quite sure it was only necessary to know him to appreciate his worth. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, from the character of the gentlemen who have done me the honour to put me in nomination, and from their taking different sides of politics as we have hitherto considered them, I think you will see that I am presented to your notice not as a political partisan (hear, hear), but as the uncompromising advocate of that which will promote the interests of our country—Free Trade. (Cheers and hisses.) It is a right we claim, gentlemen, to exchange the equivalents of one country for the equivalents of another, with mutual advantage to both parties. ("Hear, hear," and "We don't want it.") Gentlemen, the effect of those mutual exchanges is to cement those friendships between nation and nation which prevent us going to war (hear, hear)—which prevent you being burdened with taxes consequent upon such events. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, I am only desirous of carrying out what the Premier has told us that he is desirous to carry out—the principle, that this country should buy in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest. (Cheers.) If it is your pleasure, gentlemen, that I should be your representative (cheers and disapprobation), and if you return me to the Commons' House of Parliament, I never will offer a factious opposition to any good measure, whether it originates with Whig or Tory, Radical or Conservative. (Hear, hear.) I never will place myself in a position to fear the frowns or the smiles of any administration. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) Measures, not men, you may rest assured, will have my support. Mr. Brown then proceeded to combat the usual fallacies of independence of foreigners, the lowness of wages resulting from cheap food, &c., and continued:—Something has been said of the desire of the Free-Traders to interfere with the aristocracy of the country. I assure you, gentlemen, I consider them a necessary spoke in the balance wheel, and I should be the last man upon earth to deprive them of their privileges and their honours. I stand before you, gentlemen, in the double capacity of a landed proprietor and of a merchant. (Hear, hear.) As a landed proprietor I am not less anxious than the gentlemen whom I see around me to support the rent-roll of myself and family (hear, hear); but I see most clearly that the best mode of doing that is to throw open our trade to all the world. (Cheers.) I must again, gentlemen, refer for statistical facts, which are now in my possession, to the United States of America, and I must tell you that during my experience in business I was in the habit of passing through my hands a vast amount of property, and a vast number of articles with respect to which our restrictive policy has compelled them to issue hostile tariffs against us, and which they now manufacture themselves. (Hear, hear.) They, at this moment, gentlemen, employ nearly a million of men, and produce to the extent of 250 millions of dollars, or 50 millions sterling a year, of the fabrics that we could supply them with, with much greater advantage. (Hear, hear.) Your exports to them at one time amounted to upwards of 12 millions sterling per annum; now they are about one-half that amount (hear, hear), all arising from the bad commercial legislation with which you have inoculated them; and we have not only inoculated the United States with bad commercial legislation, but we have done the same to other countries of the world. France and Germany, with the German league, fancy that we have risen to be the first nation in the world in consequence of our restrictive measures; while, in reality, we have risen in spite of them. (Hear, hear.) I know we have risen from our mineral wealth, from the physical energy of our working population, from the accumulated capital of this country, from the enterprise of our merchants, from the position of our island, so favourably situated for commercial pursuits; unto our hands, then, and we are a match for all the world (cheers)—either in commerce or in war. Gentlemen, I am the uncompromising advocate of Free Trade (hear, hear); and my opinions are supported by Adam

Smith, who first opened our eyes upon the subject; by the great Lord Chatham, whose transcendent mind and powers fitted him to govern the destinies of the world (hear, hear); by his no less illustrious son, William Pitt; and by the late George Canning, who was a Liberal at heart, but was tied by his party and prevented going that length (hear, hear);—but how did he treat us in Liverpool? He sent us that individual whom I never think of but with grief of heart, the Right Honourable William Huskisson. He said, "There, gentlemen, is my tutor; and, gentlemen, I recommend him as your representative, as one who understands the commercial affairs of his country." (Hear, hear.) If we are to persist in this commercial policy of ours, I would ask the landed interest what are we to do with the surplus population, increasing at the rate of 1000 a day, nearly half a million a year? (Hear, hear.) We must, gentlemen, take off their fetters, or we cannot feed their bellies. I am clearly and decidedly of opinion, gentlemen, that the taking off the duty on corn will not materially interfere with the rent-rolls of those gentlemen; but I believe it will operate greatly to the advantage of the labouring classes, it will enable them to get more from their employers for the work they do. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, I always like to refer to high authorities for the opinions I entertain. Earl Fitzwilliam, Lord Ducie, Earl Spencer, Mr. Samuel Jones Loyd (hear, hear)—a man of unquestionable knowledge as respects his own interests and the interests of his country—the Marquis of Westminster, and a host of other illustrious names that I could present to you. But I will return to Earl Spencer, the first farmer in this or any other kingdom (hear, hear); a man to whom his political opponents always give the credit of being an honest politician, who never would deceive any man upon earth; and he states to you, pointedly and distinctly, that he considers the removal of those restrictions would not only benefit the landed interest, but every subject in her Majesty's dominions. (Hear, hear.) I am afraid that some gentlemen of large landed estates fancy, that the number of inhabitants being limited necessarily imposes the consumption of a fixed quantity of the productions of the earth; but, gentlemen, they don't look quite far enough; for I feel a thorough conviction in my mind, that if we make the great masses of our population comfortable, and happy, and prosperous, and comparatively rich, as we could very well do at this moment, we should thereby increase the consumption of our agricultural products. (Hear, hear.) Why, look at Ireland; look at some parts of this country, where the poor fellows are obliged to live for weeks together upon buttermilk, and probably upon potatoes and salt. (Hear, hear.) It is less applicable to England, perhaps, than to Ireland; but every gentleman who knows the condition of the labouring population of the country, knows it to be the fact. (Hear, hear.) I am, therefore, an enemy to all countervailing or protective duties upon commerce; and, for the information of the landed interest, although it is a very dry subject to read statistics, I will read an extract from the speech of Mr. James Wilson, which will convince them, I hope. I only want to convince those who conscientiously differ with us in opinion, that their interests will not be injured by adopting our views. ("Talk; we'll have no writing," and great clamour.) That is exactly what I am afraid of, that you are determined to remain in ignorance. (Loud cheers.) Mr. Brown then read a passage from Mr. Wilson's speech recently published in the LEAGUE, in which it was clearly proved that the removal of the several restrictive duties on wool had invariably been followed by not only an increased importation of foreign wool, but an increased consumption of the home-grown article. Gentlemen, said Mr. Brown, in conclusion, I have now said all that I mean to say on this occasion. I have a personal favour to ask, that during this contest the gentlemen who espouse the views I entertain will, when they meet an adversary of different opinions, quietly and honestly reason with him as to your differences of opinion, and convince him if you can (hear, hear); but, if you cannot convince him, treat him as a gentleman, stating that you claim for yourself the right of private judgment, and that you will freely concede it to him. (Great cheering.)

WILLIAM ENTWISLE, Esq., then presented himself, and was received with considerable applause by his party. He said—Gentlemen, at the commencement of this contest I was indeed greatly surprised to find that the electors of South Lancashire were called upon to decide their votes in this struggle upon one point alone to which their attention was directed, and that it was expected that they would leave out of sight all the other principles of the constitution—those institutions—"Oh, oh," laughter and cheers;—but, gentlemen, my surprise has been greatly diminished, and I must say that I much congratulate all the electors of this district, when I find that my honourable opponent is put forward, with that one exception, upon precisely the same grounds as I appear before you myself. (Hear, hear.) In fact—(Cries of "Free Trade.") That is the one exception which I have mentioned. With that one exception, I will say that it is an assertion I have been met with in my canvass, that Mr. Brown is a better Conservative than myself—[A Voice: "But are you a Free-Trader?"]—and it has now been put forward by his party that he would give his support to the Ministry which now holds the reins of power in this country; that is put forward as a claim for the support of the electors; and I say that, if there is one argument more than another which establishes the claims of those Ministers, it is that both sides appeal to the electors for support, on the ground of supporting them and their measures.—[A Voice: "Are you a Free-Trader? Answer the question."]—I am not at all surprised that the contest has taken that turn, when I look back at the circumstances in which we were left at the last election, at the election of 1841, and when I see the circumstances in which this country now exists, and the comparatively great degree of prosperity to which we have attained. I am not surprised that great confidence should be attached to those Ministers, when our trade was depressed to an extent almost unparalleled, when we were engaged with foreign nations in hostile wars, and when our national revenue was greatly deficient.—I am not surprised that great confidence should be attached to those Ministers who have restored peace to the country—(hear)—under whose government trade has been greatly extended, and by whom our revenue has been again placed in a situation to be sufficient for the expenditure of the country. ("Income tax.") Do you pay the income tax? It is said, gentlemen, that this is done by means of an income tax. I am not here to discuss by what means it was done. ("Hear, hear," "Oh," and disapprobation.) I am quite ready, if you wish for my opinion, to express my opinion that the tax was a good tax, and was imperatively called for by the circumstances of the case. Great diseases, gentlemen, require severe remedies. The remedy may have been severe, but it has answered the purpose (hear, hear); and, for the first time for many years, the Ministry have had the agreeable duty imposed upon them of considering in what manner the surplus revenue should be applied. ("They are robbing the country.") We were not troubled with any such consideration under the late Ministry. (Hear, hear.) We have had just now a considerable detail with regard to wool read to us in this meeting. I did not hear a great part of it, and I happen to recollect that there is just now passing a measure for the total abolition of the duty on wool. I don't know whether that may in some degree answer the expectations of those gentlemen. But, gentlemen, it seems that a great cry is to be raised upon the subject of Free Trade, and in this instance the question of Free Trade appears to be narrowed to one individual question, that of the repeal of the Corn Laws. ("No, no; sugar.") Gentlemen, is it so, or is it not? (Cries of "No," and "Yes.") Is my opponent the candidate of the League, or is he not? ("Hear, hear," and cries of "Yes.") If it be not so, I would ask how it is that that gentleman has been making his progress through the county attended by the most active, and, I believe I may add, the most able member of the League. (Shouts of "Three cheers for Cobden," followed by immense cheering and clapping of hands, mingled with hisses.) Mr. Entwistle then went on to contend that the League had failed to convince the great majority of the people of the country of the soundness of their views. He deprecated trials and experiments as hazardous. He dwelt on what he termed the inconsistencies of the League, many of whose members, he said, notwithstanding the alleged ruinous effect of restriction, had realized fortunes. The cry of "Cheap bread!" was raised, while at the same time the League told the landlords and farmers they were not to be ruined. The entire abrogation of rent would only make a small reduction upon the price of bread. A large portion of land would also be thrown out of cultivation, and ruin would inevitably follow. (These assertions were followed by cries of "Nonsense!" and "Fiddle-dee!" which caused much laughter.) Mr. Entwistle, after some further observations, concluded by expressing his thanks for the kind manner in which he had been listened to, and a hope that the struggle might continue as it had commenced, without animosity or enmity on either side, and that when the contest was over it might be quoted as an example to the rest of the kingdom. (Loud cheers.)

MR. JOSEPH HOLLAND, a farmer and freeholder, and a collector of rates, was desirous of addressing his brother electors; but, it being intimated by the sheriff that he could not be allowed to do so unless he wished to propose another candidate, he was about to desist; but he was told that he might put questions to the candidate. He accordingly asked if Mr. Entwistle, if returned to Parliament, would vote for the repeal of the window tax?—Mr. Entwistle: I may be allowed to answer that question as I shall do all others of a similar nature, namely, that I decline to pledge myself to support or oppose any particular measure. ("Ah!" "Oh!" and cheers.)—MR. HOLLAND: Will you vote for the tax to be taken off farmers' dogs? I am a farmer, and, as a collector, I know a poor washerwoman who is forced to pay tax on a dog she keeps to watch her clothes drying.—MR. W. F. HULTON: A sheep-dog does not pay a tax.—MR. HOLLAND: But an old washerwoman, between 70 and 80 years old, pays for a dog, for I have had to receive it as a tax-collector.

RICHARD COBDEN, Esq., M.P., asked if the sheriff had decided that no one could speak unless he had to nominate or second a candidate?—The sheriff replied in the affirmative.—MR. COBDEN then intimated that he would propose another candidate.—MR. BRANDT: The time to do so is before the candidates speak. You are now quite out of time.—MR. COBDEN: No, I believe I am quite in order. (Cheers.) MR. COBDEN then came forward to address the electors amidst loud cheers from the majority of the assemblage, and considerable uproar and hooting, and all sorts of clamorous vociferation, from Mr. Entwistle's booth, which the sheriff for some time in vain endeavoured to restore to something like decent quietness and order. At length Mr. Entwistle essayed with better effect, saying: Gentlemen, I do beg of you that you will give every man a patient hearing and be quiet, and allow every man to speak.—The gentlemen in the booth having subsided into a momentary hush, the mob below took their cue from them, and were tolerably quiet for a minute. But Mr. Cobden had no sooner again commenced by asking, "Why, what are you afraid of?" when he was again assailed by an uproar of yells, shouts, groans, and shrieks, in which we are bound to say those which proceeded from the hustings equalled, if they did not surpass, those which emanated from the crowd. MR. BRANDT loudly called "order," but in vain; and, turning to Mr. Cobden, he said, "If the gentlemen on the hustings would be quite silent, you might proceed." MR. COBDEN: Yes; but they are by far the worst.—The Sheriff: Gentlemen, Mr. Cobden, as a freeholder of this county, has declared that he intends to propose another candidate. He has a right to be heard, and I shall insist upon having him heard, or I shall adjourn the meeting.—MR. COBDEN: Now, gentlemen, respect your high sheriff. (Renewed uproar.) Gentlemen, I will stand here till midnight, but I will be heard. (Groans and hisses, responded to by loud cheering from the Free Traders.)—MR. JOHN WILSON PATTERSON, M.P. (to the friends of Mr. Entwistle): Gentlemen, Mr. Cobden has a perfect right to be heard, and you will do yourselves no good by this.—MR. COBDEN: Now, gentlemen, shall I go on?—[Immediately a large drum was beaten, close by the Horse and Jockey Inn, about thirty yards from the hustings.] Gentlemen, that is their argument.—The Under-sheriff requested Captain Woodford, the chief of the county constabulary, to give orders to stop the drum; but he coolly replied, "The drum is half a mile off;" and gave no directions concerning it that we saw or heard, although he had previously given various directions to stop the music of the bands which were playing while passing the hustings.—The uproar, both on the hustings and in the crowd, continuing, Sir Thomas Brancker said, Gentlemen, pray hear Mr. Cobden; he has a right to be heard.—MR. COBDEN: Now, gentlemen, are you ready to hear me? (Renewed yelling, hissing, and clamour.) Addressing the sheriff, Mr. Cobden said, Pray, Mr. Sheriff, request those people on the other side of you to be quiet.—The Sheriff: I have requested them, but in vain.—(A voice on the hustings: "Get down with you, Cobden.")—The Sheriff suggested to Mr. Cobden, that, if he commenced speaking the noise would probably cease in a while; and Mr. Cobden said he had no objection to try that experiment; but, at all events, he was determined to be heard if he stayed all day. He then came forward, and spoke for a time amidst all sorts of discordant noises, which, however, gradually diminished; and during the greater part of his speech he was only occasionally interrupted in this way. So far as we could hear him for the clamour, he said,—Gentlemen, I will detain you but a short time, but claim the right, as a freeholder of this county, to appear before you. I will maintain my right to be heard in this meeting, even if I am obliged to remain till twelve o'clock at night. (Cheers, hisses, and "Off, off.") Our opponents have stated (uproar)—ah! it's a very few of them that are making all the noise. Our opponents on this occasion have made one great admission, to which I am very anxious to draw your attention. Mr. Entwistle has stated that there is no point of difference between himself and Mr. Brown on general politics; he has let us know that Mr. Brown is as good a Conservative as he is himself, and that the only point of difference between them is on the Free-Trade question. (Hear.) Now, I thank him for that admission, because it at once proves that the Free-Traders of South Lancashire, who are willing to support Mr. Brown, whether they are Whigs, Radicals, or Chartists, are sufficiently in earnest in support of that principle to throw aside party on this occasion; and if we gain nothing else by this election—and I think we shall gain a great deal more—we shall at least gain this,—that we shall have a moral standing hereafter, as being an honest party, caring neither for Whigs nor Tories, but having at heart the principles of Free Trade, which we have been so long contending for. (Hear.) But Mr. Entwistle has stated—(great uproar from Mr. Entwistle's booth)—that Mr. Brown comes forward claiming the patronage of her Majesty's Government, and anxious to seek popularity as the supporter of Sir Robert Peel. (Hear.) Now, Mr. Brown distinctly stated that he would support any government, whatever it might be, so long as their measures were good; and that he would go to Parliament neither to wear the colours of Sir Robert Peel, or to bow to his dictation, any more than he would to that of Lord John Russell. ("Question.") But the honourable candidate on the other side has said more. He says Mr. Brown has narrowed this question to a mere question of corn. Why, Mr. Brown distinctly said that he was opposed to all protective and differential duties, whether in corn, or sugar, or coffee, or in any other article. ("Off, off.") Gentlemen, it is not very easy to learn, from the speech of Mr. Entwistle, what his own principles are in reference to trade or anything else (hear); but there is an old saying, that you may know a man by the company he keeps (laughter), and therefore, if we would learn Mr. Entwistle's opinion, we cannot do better than refer to the opinion of the hon. gentleman who nominated him. I declare to you most solemnly, that the fallacies that gentleman used on the subject of the Corn Laws have been dead and buried, even in the House of Commons, where these things generally are very long-lived, for the last two years. (Hear.) If it were not that I would not wish to be personal, I would ask the hon. gentleman where he had been for the last five years; for I think, if we had found some antediluvian remains of a politician, he could not be more hopelessly in the dark as to the question of the Corn Laws. (Laughter and applause.) MR. COBDEN then went on to answer the several arguments of Mr. Entwistle. We can only give a portion of the hon. member's able speech, which strikingly illustrates the evils which the farmers suffer under the restrictive system.—Gentlemen, the Corn Laws cause a constant fluctuation in prices, making the price go up to 73s., and down to 39s.; but, gentlemen, your rent is fixed at high prices, and then it is to be paid when prices are low, and the consequence is, that the farmer is always on the books of his landlord. ("That's true.") Hence it is that farmers are so often sold up; and that is the reason why land-agents, and valuers, and auctioneers, are always on the side of the landlords. (Hear.) I have got a letter to read to you, and I will have it published too, and this letter lets the secret out. It is well worthy of hearing; but they won't let you hear it if they can help it. It is from a respectable gentleman, a member of the Society of Friends, living at Manchester. He says:—

"No. 20, Market-place, Manchester, 5mo. 20, 1844.
"Richard Cobden—Respected Friend,—In reading different speeches which have been delivered by thee, I have remarked that thou hast frequently made allusions to the claims of individuals in the agricultural districts by whom the present Corn Law is supported, and amongst others auctioneers have been named. I was much struck, a short time since, by the remarkable manner in which thy assertions were borne out. About six weeks ago I had occasion to employ an auctioneer in an agricultural part of this county, and during our conversation I asked him if he were an advocate for the repeal of the Corn Law, when he immediately answered—'No, I am not.' On asking his reason for supporting the present law, he said—'My business is almost entirely confined to the agricultural districts, and I believe that where I now sell ten farmers up, I should not sell one up if the Corn Laws were repealed.' Well, I said, that is can't be at any rate; then, I suppose, thou art actuated entirely by self-interest. 'Exactly so,' he replied. The only motive I have for withholding the individual's name is the fear of injuring, if not ruining, the man if his name were made public. I have, however, two respectable witnesses who will vouch for the accuracy of the above statement; and thou art at perfect liberty to make use of it in any manner thou thinkst proper, if in thy opinion it will have the least tendency to erase from the statute book one of the most obnoxious laws that ever disgraced it.—I am, respectfully, thy friend, "JOHN WHITLOW."

MR. COBDEN concluded by proposing Sir Thomas Potter, but the nomination not being seconded, fell to the ground.

The SHERIFF then called for a show of hands, when, according to the Manchester Guardian, whose report we abridge, nearly two-thirds of those present held up their hands in favour of Mr. Brown. The sheriff, however, after a second call, declared the show of hands to be in favour of Mr. Entwistle.

MR. ROBERT GARDNER then demanded a poll for Mr. Brown.

The polling was announced to commence on Monday, the 27th of May; and the court was adjourned to Thursday the 30th, that the sheriff might declare the numbers, and which candidate had been duly elected.

MR. ENTWISLE and MR. BROWN severally returned thanks to the electors; and moved and seconded a vote of thanks to the sheriff, who briefly acknowledged the compliment.

Three cheers being given for Mr. Brown, and three more for Mr. Cobden, the proceedings terminated about half-past one o'clock; and within an hour, two trains of enormous length had borne away towards Manchester and Liverpool several thousands of the parties assembled at this county nomination at Newton.

MONDAY.—THE POLL.

The polling commenced briskly this morning in all the districts at nine o'clock, and closed at four; and in the seven hours, at the ten polling towns, there were polled 11,459 votes. The following table will exhibit the returns of both parties at the close of the first day's poll in every district, and also the majorities for the respective candidates in the several districts on the day's poll:—

| Polling Districts. | Free-Trade Return. | | Monopolist Return. | |
|--------------------|--------------------|------------|--------------------|------------|
| | Brown. | Entwistle. | Brown. | Entwistle. |
| Ashton | 321 | 263 | 321 | 263 |
| Bolton | 413 | 597 | 402 | 613 |
| Bury | 431 | 497 | 439 | 419 |
| Liverpool | 1062 | 845 | 1043 | 863 |

| Total | 5559 | 5990 | 5578 | 5966 |

The total number of electors polled during the day was 11,459.

From the above return, it will be seen that Mr. Brown, the Free-Trade candidate, headed the poll at six of the ten polling places, namely, at Ashton, Bury, Manchester, Oldham, Rochdale, and Liverpool; and that his opponent headed it at four, that is, at Bolton, Newton, Ormskirk, and Wigan, the very centres of landed influence, and the hotbeds of tenancy-at-will.

TUESDAY.

The poll commenced this morning in the polling districts of this part of the county with great spirit; and in several of them, especially in Manchester, Ashton, and Bury, the majority of Mr. Entwistle was considerably reduced; but in other districts he gained ground, and the result will be found below.

| Polling Districts. | Free-Trade Return. | | Monopolist Return. | |

| Majority by Mr. Entwistle's Committee | | 546 | | |

We are engaged in preparing a complete analysis of this poll; but the return, as it now stands, presents on the face of it some important results, to which we are anxious to direct attention. The Free-Traders have had a majority in the only six districts in which an expression of free opinion was possible—a majority amounting to 800. Now, in those very districts, at the election of 1837, the Liberal candidates were in a minority of 171, so that the actual gain is nearly 1000 votes. In the purely agricultural districts, persons who might be generally regarded as supporters of Liberal opinions went against the League, as they thought that their class-interests were endangered; and among these was the Liberal candidate of 1837, Mr. Stanley. Now, the equivalent to the number of votes thus added to Monopoly must be reckoned among the gains of the Free-Traders; and thus their progress becomes very striking, and quite sufficient to justify their claim of a triumph. At the election of 1841, when the Liberal committees went to investigate their chances of success, they found that there would be something like a majority of two thousand against their candidates; so that the result of the present election shows a progress of Free Trade opinions to the amount of fifteen hundred votes. This result should cheer our friends as it has alarmed our adversaries.

AMERICAN BREAD STUFFS.—The stock of wheat and flour now in the warehouse on the margin of the Western Lakes, on the American side, is estimated at 1,000,000 barrels, and the stocks at the depots on the interior communications are enormous, yet it is thought the farmers have fully one-half their crops remaining in their barns. The surplus from Canada West, it is estimated, will, out of the last crop, exceed 300,000 barrels, which will nearly all find its way to Britain.

NEWTON-LE-WILLOWS.—THURSDAY.

(From our own Correspondent.)

This morning a grand display was expected at Newton-le-Willocks, to await the declaration of the poll by the High Sheriff. There was, however, nothing seen but a miserable muster of the blue. The declaration was to have been given at 10 a.m. At that hour, around the hustings, there was but a stray person here and there. Two or three vehicles drove up, and the inquiry put by one to another was—"Do you think they mean to do anything?" By-and-by the Sheriff and a dozen others were seen advancing to the town. They placed themselves upon the hustings, and for an hour sat perfect mutes. A few dozens of men, women, and boys gathered around. At length it came out that the Sheriff was waiting the arrival of a band from Rochdale, there being none elsewhere to be had. In the meantime a whipper-in of the Monopolists—a neighbouring village officer, who mustered the serfs, &c., for the nomination—was observed very busy giving out bands for the hats, with "Entwistle for ever" upon them. Some labourers, and poor-looking objects from the workhouse, were formed into a procession. These, together with a few dozens of more respectable-looking Monopolists, with blue knots upon their breasts, and nine blue flags, stood at the railway station awaiting the band. The band arrived after twelve o'clock. They seemed a parcel of boys, with a drum, some jingling bells, and other small instruments. The ragged regiment, with their flags, advanced to the town amid a faint huzza. The Sheriff commenced proceedings by declaring the majority for Entwistle over Brown 598—some cried out, 591. At this time there were not 350 men, women, and children present. Poor Mr. Entwistle seemed to be perfectly paralysed: his tongue and address betrayed a faint heart. The most of his speech was in reference to allusions upon the canvass of a personal character, and some vain vituperation of the League. He defied all opposition, and declared himself for more trade, hoping that all South Lancashire would leave the proper ways and means to his superior judgment; and boasted that he went to Parliament the representative of independent electors. Thanks being moved to the High Sheriff, he dismissed the assembly, declaring himself a Tory of the old school.

Mr. Entwistle attempted to defend his party from having brought voters to the poll like cattle. This is all lost upon those who know this district. The Monopolists used the most desperate efforts, and your correspondent is aware of instances where they were literally made wretched by polling contrary to their consciences. They dreaded the consequences of a refusal. Collectors of assessed taxes were pulled up to vote for Entwistle; others voted who had no claim; the agents of the Monopolists went round to the tenantry, and stated it to be the desire of the proprietors that they should vote for the blue. From scenes encouraged and got up by the opponents of Free Trade on the nomination day and at the declaration of the poll, as well as during the election, monopoly and immorality would seem to be inseparable.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A PLANTER'S VIEW OF THE SUGAR QUESTION.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

Judging from the detail of the late budget, it would appear that the Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks we are likely to thrive better upon the sour rather than the sweets of life. We may have as much of the former as we please, but a surfeit of the latter would not be good for us; and, therefore, as a kind and watchful guardian of our welfare, he keeps it out of our way. I hope, however, that a little discretionary judgment may be allowed to us, the patients, in this case, and if so, it must be confessed that the plea assumed for keeping us upon such short commons of sweets is the hollowest and most insincere which in these days of legislative humbug has ever been palmed off upon a most gullible public.

The right honourable gentleman perhaps glorifies himself that there is now no longer any slavery on his own sugar estates, but we may be allowed a little to doubt his sincerity when, like the old broken-down prude, he cries out "Oh, fy!" upon the sins of others, which she has no longer power to commit herself.

But be this as it may, it is a sad impertinence to put forward the existence of slavery in this quarter or that as a plea for preferential duties in favour of our own sugar, when, at the same time, fifty other articles, all the produce of slave labour, are, and will, volens volens, continue to be in daily and hourly use among us, and among none more than the very class who are now so earnestly protesting against it.

It fell to my lot, some years ago, to become connected with property in the island of Jamaica, and, of course, I became also a participator in all the benefits which are alleged to attach to the existing principles of monopoly and restriction; but I am not prepared to admit that they were in any degree beneficial to me: on the contrary, my conviction is, that my interests were extensively injured by their operation, and that if I had been left to myself, and permitted to carry out the mercantile dictates of common sense, by selling in the dearest and buying in the cheapest market I could find, I should have succeeded vastly better than I have done, and should have had in my pocket many thousands of pounds, for the loss of which I am persuaded I have nothing to thank but monopoly and restricted trade.

As to myself, I do not entertain a doubt as to the benefits which would arise to all parties from throwing open the sugar trade. I deny that it would militate against the profits or the produce of the careful or intelligent sugar-grower. At present no one, without witnessing the fact, would believe to how low a standard agriculture in Jamaica has degenerated, although, indeed, experience amply proves that such has always been the result of agricultural protection.

A reckless extravagance in the expenses of farming, and a total regardlessness of economy of labour, have been glaring features in the system; and having superadded to this a most imperturbable and impenetrable bigotry in favour of every old and worthless mode of tillage and management, you will have something like a view of the average of Jamaica farming.

I here mention an occurrence which may in some degree tend to exemplify what has just been alleged. A friend of mine, a Jamaica proprietor, was called to England by urgent business, and detained there for some time. On leaving the island, he placed his estate in charge of an individual who stood very high as a planter and manager; in fact, one of the first, if not the first attorney in the island. What was the upshot? Why, no sooner was the proprietor gone, than the attorney sent a jobbing gang upon the estate, cleared and holed 300 acres of fresh land at the charge of £10 per acre, when it might have been done at little more than half that cost by using the plough. But what will be thought of this instance of insane extravagance when it is stated that not one single cane was ever planted in any of the holes, and it became a dead loss. But, indeed, had the affair been otherwise, the case would not have been bittered; for, independent of these 300 additional acres, there was barely strength enough to take off the usual crops of the estate as they were!

Now, under a free trade in sugar, such doings as these would, of necessity, cease. If that rotten staff of protection, upon which they have been accustomed to lean, were taken away from our West Indian planters, it would beget a state of wholesome energy amongst them; they would be compelled to bestir and avail themselves of more rational and scientific, as well as less extravagant, modes of culture. Hence would arise more produce, better in quality, and far more profitable to the importer. Let him only bring to market good samples, made at a reasonable cost, and he need not fear competition!

Only observe what a miraculous effect the very mention of Free Trade has had upon our corn monopolists at home. Here are our landlords awakened from a long and profound doze, running about the country under the discovery that their broad acres are miserably cultivated—calling for this improvement, and that—and fairly confessing that, under judicious management, their land is capable of producing full 1-4th more food for the people than it has hitherto done. A similar cause would have a similar effect in our sugar colonies.

It does seem strange why the West India interest, as it is called (as if the rest of the community had no interest in the question), should hug this delusion as they do. What is their condition under this covet monopoly? Are they thriving and prosperous? Certainly not; on the contrary, we hear continued declarations that they are ruined, and nothing is talked of but the abandonment of estates one after another, as not only not paying for the expense of cultivation, but involving the owners in increasing difficulty and debt. Why, Sir, I conceive that, if Free Trade were actually fraught with all the evils which its adversaries attribute to it, the West Indians could not, under its operation, be in a worse condition than they describe themselves to be in now. Their monopoly has not saved them, and in my humble opinion never will.—I am, Sir, yours,

A PLANTER.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—Will you have the goodness to transmit to the honest elector of Exeter, Charles Snowdon, the enclosed half-sovereign, as a testimony of my respect for a man who appears to have duly appreciated the sacred nature of the duty with which the franchise invested him; since he exercised it with a spirit of independence that does him honour, thereby incurring a heavy penalty.

I have the honour to be, your obedient servant,

THE CORN BILL OF 1815.

The following is an extract from a speech delivered by Mr. Edward Taylor, at a common hall held at Norwich, in May, 1815, to petition against the Corn Bill brought into the House of Commons by Mr. Robinson (now Earl of Ripon):—

"If I believed that the bill now proposed in the House of Commons would really benefit the farming interest, I should not be here to oppose it; but my firm conviction is that it will utterly fail to accomplish this end, while it will inflict a grievous and permanent injury on the manufacturing interest of this kingdom. The professed object of this bill is to secure to the farmer a steady price for his corn. This is the plea of its advocates—this is the argument they use in its support. They disclaim all intention to raise the price of corn; they only intend to secure, by act of Parliament, a steady price. Now, with all respect for the power of the Legislature, this, I affirm, they have no power to do. The price of corn depends in a great measure upon its abundance or its scarcity, and whether it shall be abundant or scarce—whether we shall be blessed with a succession of plentiful harvests, or whether we shall have to suffer from scanty ones—depends on that Almighty Will which governs and controls the seasons. It is absurd, it is impious in any human power to affect here a power of control. But the effect of this measure will be to induce the farmers to regulate by it his future contracts. The proposed Corn Bill will be used by landlords as an argument for keeping up rents, and tenants will trust in it. The latter will confide, as they are told to do, in 'the wisdom of Parliament'; they will believe that this act of the Legislature will have the power to ensure them at least 80s. per quarter for their wheat;—they will be deceived, and hundreds of them will be ruined. This will be the effect of the proposed bill on the farmer. To the manufacturer it will be equally injurious. The very essence of trade is barter—the exchange of one commodity for another. Now the chief, almost the only commodity which some nations have to offer in exchange for our manufactures is corn; and if we refuse to take it, we cross them out of our books as customers. Nor is this all. The time may come—and in unfavourable seasons must come—when our home growth will not supply us. We must then buy corn at any price. But those who have hitherto been accustomed to look to the English as customers, and who have regularly exchanged the produce of their soil for our manufactures, will now find our ports shut against them, except in times of scarcity, which neither they nor we can foresee. We must then buy our corn wherever we can get it, and for hard cash: all commercial intercourse will have ceased, and the trade in corn, instead of being a regular exchange of produce for produce, will become the speculation of jobbers and gamblers; and our continental neighbours, so long our excellent customers, will be compelled to turn manufacturers. The order of Providence is that nations should traffic with nations, each supplying from its own natural resources the wants of others; and if we attempt to array ourselves against it by the puny efforts of human legislation, depend upon it we shall deeply repent and dearly smart for it."

AGRICULTURE.

MONOPOLY PRICES AND MONOPOLY RENTS.

THE COST OF PRODUCING WHEAT.

If those persons, who have little or no knowledge of the art of husbandry, or acquaintance with the condition of the tenant-farmers, should feel perplexed between the confident assertions of the Monopolists that Free Trade would injure the farmers, and the undeniable fact that they have not prospered under a protecting monopoly, there is one simple practical test for resolving such perplexities. That test is the state of opinion upon the subject amongst the best agriculturists. Tried thereby, the monopolists' assertions will invariably be found to be based on falsehoods or fallacies. All our best farmers are Free-Traders, while the bad ones are usually desperate sticklers for "protection." Now, at the very head of the practical agriculturists of this country stands Earl Ducie, who is alike eminent for his scientific knowledge of husbandry, and the business-like method in which he has shown to the farmers of England what are the real capacities for production of the soil they occupy. Every one knows that Earl Ducie is a Free-Trader, and that he declares the Corn Laws to be a positive injury to the British cultivator. And no one can read or hear the arguments of the Free-Trade agriculturists on the one side, and of the Monopolists on the other, without being sensible, however little acquainted with rural affairs, that the former refer to distinct and tangible facts in the sober, business-like way in which men conduct their own every-day avocations, while the latter deal in mysterious prophecies and oracular predictions of what might possibly happen under certain combinations of imaginary or impossible circumstances. As a specimen of the plain common-sense view of the subject we would refer our readers to the admirable speech of Earl Ducie at Covent Garden, on Wednesday last, of which a full report will be found in another column, and to some parts of which we shall presently refer; and, as an example of the fanciful assumptions of the Monopolists, let our readers peruse the following passage from a leading article of the Morning Post:

"In conformity with those irresistible influences which the arrangement of society generate, the labourer is the natural ally of the great landowner. The labourer thrives on high wages. The landowner prospers when rents are high. High wages, high rents, and those profits on production which are intermediate between these extremes, flow naturally from high prices. In high prices, therefore, labourers, landowners, farmers, and tradesmen are interested. High prices are, in truth, in all artificial states of society, the great bulwark of productive industry. To great landowners, therefore, the interests of productive industry are emphatically committed. They are the natural guardians of the interests of labour. They betray their trust, therefore, when they lend themselves to schemes which have 'cheapness' for their object; and, in betraying their trust, they are preparing their own ultimate punishment."

No one can read that passage without being convinced "That true no-meaning puzzles more than wit."

But, though the writer has not expressed any meaning, he has implied one which is perfectly intelligible to the Monopolist landowners for whom he writes, which being interpreted into ordinary language means this:—"High prices produce high rents, without the necessity of undertaking agricultural improvements,—the Post always sneers at 'scientific farming'—or of seeking independent and responsible tenants." Such, if anything, is the meaning of that passage, and upon this position the writer advances the naked lie that such high prices and such high rents produce high wages. This is simply untrue. Rents may be high under two sets of circumstances directly the reverse of each other. First, when any article of prime necessity, such as wheat, can only be supplied to a numerous and increasing community from a particular district or from one country, as, for instance, if the people of this country should only be supplied from the growth of the United Kingdom, or if the people of the metropolis could be compelled to subsist on the wheat grown in Middlesex, and the quantity grown in the United Kingdom, in the one case, or in Middlesex in the other, be insufficient to supply the demand for wheat, prices might rise to any extent, and the owners of the land within the charmed circle would "prosper" upon high rents. That would be the golden age of the "Protectionists." There would be monopoly prices and monopoly rents, the bread-eaters would be absolutely at the mercy of the bread-growers. And that is precisely the state of things which the landowners have sought to create and make perpetual by the Corn Laws. It is for the maintenance of this system that tenants are driven to the polling booths, like herds of cattle to market, that "Protection Societies" are formed, that Cayleys disgrace themselves and their class by literary lying, and that Dukes bluster and bully their own Minister, and are to be quieted only by Garters and places at the Treasury.

Secondly, high rents may arise from high cultivation. A rich and growing population offers a certain market for grain, meat, and other agricultural productions; and the skilful farmer applies all his capital, his knowledge, and his industry to tillage, with a view to produce abundant crops. That is his main object. He does not rely on accidents of the seasons, or look for periods when, by reason of scarcity, he may make a temporary profit out of his underfed fellow-citizens. He knows that there is a steady and constant demand for grain and cattle, and that, with access to the world's market, his customers will never be compelled to give him any very exorbitant prices. He, therefore, does not sit waiting upon Providence; he knows that he can only be successful by a large produce and by a constant produce, and to attain those ends he must cultivate his land highly and carefully; he cannot afford to have bad crops, and, let the season be what it may, he will never have them. He will of necessity employ many labourers, for high cultivation and the employment of much rural labour are convertible terms; and the labourers finding constant occupation will obtain good wages, and, the prices of the necessities of life being moderate and steady, they will be in a state of prosperity. Here we find a large amount of produce to be divided between the labourers, the farmer, and the landlord; and after the labourers are paid, and the farmer has replaced his capital and industry, which the competition amongst farmers will permit him to retain for his own use, the surplus will go to the landlord as rent. Under these circumstances the landlord's rent will be a natural rent, generally tending upwards, and will assuredly be far greater in amount and more permanent than the Monopoly rents of our present system. Now, the present is a season to exhibit the difference between good and bad farming. In many instances, upon lands which are in a low condition, there will be literally no crops, and the cultivator will have an absolute loss from which no prices could relieve him, while land in high condition bears the drought in a manner perfectly surprising to those who have not studied the science of agriculture.

But the Post tells us that "cheapness" is the great thing the landowners are to eschew, and it is by exaggerating the cheapness of foreign corn and the cost of corn-growing in this country that the Monopolists now mainly rely, as the bugbear by which they are to frighten the farmers from inquiring into the pros and cons of free and restricted trade. Of the utter fallacy of such notions every day's experience gives evidence, and the practical statements of Earl Ducie of the cost of growing wheat on his own farm, and of those of other farmers in the same county, shows the absurdity of the Monopolists' assertions. His lordship proved that on land paying for rent, tithes, and taxes 50s. an acre, 33 bushels of wheat per acre can be grown at the cost of 3s. 6d. a bushel; and, taking the capital required for so doing to be £15 per acre, that return when wheat sold at 41s. a quarter—which is 3s. a quarter below the average price of the Channel Islands, where trade is absolutely free—would give a yearly profit of 35½ per cent. upon the capital employed; or supposing wheat to be grown (as it is on his lordship's farm) every other year, and that the intermediate green or root crop gave no profit (which it will give), there would be a yearly profit of 17½ per cent. on the whole capital employed. Thus it is that the experience of the best farmers shows the fears or the pretended fears of the Monopolists to be as baseless as they are dishonest; and the whole plea of the Protectionists comes to this, that, if the trade in grain were free, landlords could not obtain high rents from unimproved and ill-cultivated farms.

IS IT A HOAX?

The following paragraph appeared as an advertisement in a daily paper, which is really so ludicrous that we are half inclined to believe, as a friend on reading it said, it is a hoax:

"The Publication Committee of the Agricultural Protection Society hereby offer four prizes of £25 each to the writers of the best Essays on the Advantages of Legislative Protection, as enjoyed by 1. Tenant-farmers and labourers. 2. Cotton manufacturers. 3. Woollen and silk manufacturers. 4. Hardware and other manufacturers. Such Essays not to exceed 16 pages each, octavo, and to be sent directed to the Chairman of the Publication Committee, 17, Old Bond-street, on or before the 1st of July."

Now, we defy any man, woman, or child who can read, write, and understand what he reads, to compete for one of these prizes without becoming a Free Trader, and proving, if he proves anything, that the "legislative protection enjoyed by tenant-farmers and farm-labourers, and by cotton, woollen, silk, and hardware manufacturers," is just the sort of enjoyment of those whose friends say they "enjoy a very bad state of health." But the report of the committee shows where their literary strength lies, for they say:—

"With regard to placards, we have forwarded them to country societies, whenever a wish has been expressed; and we take this opportunity of inviting our friends to let us know the particular part of the question to which they wish public opinion, by means of placards, to be directed. We are enabled, by statistical details of unquestioned accuracy, to point out to our friends the wisdom of reducing wages, the state of foreign labourers; the comparative demand in the home and foreign markets for our manufactures; the proportion of protection enjoyed by other trades; the manner in which our

Free-Trade advances have been met by other nations; or those many other bearings of the subject that will easily suggest themselves to the experienced in particular districts.

Now, what does this mean but this: "Though we don't shine in pamphlets, and are rather chary of publishing again, we can lie in large letters in any way which may suit the peculiar local prejudices to be pandered to, or the particular character of ignorance to be deluded." Why, this is worse, at all events more dirty, than passing laws to cheat the public out of a penny a pound upon salmon.

WHAT IS THE ANTI-LEAGUE DOING?

We have more than once asked this question somewhat ironically, and we have heard several farmers who plumped over head and ears into the Anti-League "flare up" (for it was too transient to deserve the name of an agitation,) ask the same question in all sober and somewhat doubting seriousness. For ourselves, we beg to offer to the "Central Protection Society," and especially to the noble president thereof (the Duke of Richmond), our most humble apology for imagining that they and he were not effectively doing that which they had organized themselves to do, namely, looking after their own interests. The dual president of the society very aptly represents the society, for he is one of those who "Do good [to themselves] by stealth, and blush to find it fame." He opposed the reduction of duty on wool solely from self-love for the "English short-wool masters," and behold he is supposed to be animated by the most disinterested love for the Australian wool-growers. Again he opposes his party-leader on the tariff question, and is thereupon exalted by all the bad farmers of the country into a patriot, while all the time he is only seeking to keep up the rent of his own salmon-fishery. Just so of late he was supposed to have a most irrepressible determination to displace Sir R. Peel and his Administration, on account of the Minister's coyly expressed admiration of a Free-Trade policy; and the undrained and over-rented farmers, to a man, declared that their only protector against the insidious Peel, and the insinuating Cobden, was the unflinching Duke of Richmond, and behold the following paragraph:—

"The vacant Lordship of the Treasury has been accepted by LORD ARTHUR LENOX, brother of the DUKE OF RICHMOND, which will cause a new election for the representation of Chichester." All the Papers.

Farmers, well has it been said, "Who can tell what a day or an hour shall bring forth?" You will now comprehend the full meaning of the ominous menaces against the Government which the Duke of Richmond uttered at Steyning just before the opening of the session. You can now comprehend why you were hurried to death by stewards and land-agents, lawyers and auctioneers, to attend—"without being expected to subscribe to"—protection societies. You now see the Central Society has not hired a room in Bond-street and appointed a secretary for nothing. The Duke of Richmond has taken the chair in his own house to some purpose, for he has hoisted his younger brother—one of those blister plasters of our poor-rich aristocrats—into a seat at the Treasury Board, at £2000 a year.

We do not know whether the Duke of Richmond is one of those in whose settlements there is a clause which directs the income of the younger brothers' portions charged on the family estate to remain in abeyance while the incumbent is in the receipt of Government pay or pension through the family influence; or whether by this masterly stroke the duke has merely relieved himself from the ordinary pressure of one of his poor juniors. At all events, the farmers will smell a rat, and those who have not subscribed to the Protection Society will congratulate themselves on their abstinence, while those who have been caught once will take care not to be caught again. One old farmer of our acquaintance, after coming over the above paragraph for some time, burst out into the exclamation, "Why, bless me, this is the old story of 1841 over again! I am afraid these great gentlemen have been again humbugging us farmers."

But we owe another excuse to the Monopolists for supposing the Central Protectionists have been doing nothing, for in their recent report they show that they have been working most assiduously in the cause of Free Trade, by proving their own utter disregard of common sense and common honesty. Notwithstanding the exposures Mr. Cayley's pamphlet has met with, the chivalrous chairman of the room in Bond-street—who shall dare to say again that their soul, like their locality, is that of a non-milliner?—declares, in the name of the society:—

"We have considered it, on the whole, best to make an exception to the rule of not being our own publishers, in favour of Mr. Cayley's pamphlet; and the result has been such as to leave us no cause to regret our having done so."

This declaration bespeaks high moral courage, for assuredly a gentleman who now identifies himself with Mr. Cayley and his tract, must have nerves as well strung as the Indian who bears, without flinching, the tortures of the stake. And her symptom that the landlords are letting off the Pro-Corn-Law steam is, that a subscription is advertised to reward Mr. Robert Baker, of Writtle, the Essex lion, or, as many farmers call him, the "gentleman, in a lion's skin, of the Monopolists!"

OH, IT IS A LABOURERS' QUESTION!

True, Monopolists, it is a labourers' question, and you know it. See how the Labourers deal with the question in the Monopolist county of Wilts:—

"PRO-CORN-LAW PETITION MANUFACTURE!—This branch of business is not going on, but, although the employees of the Monopolists are working hard to obtain numerous signatures, they don't succeed quite so well as their masters wish. Nevertheless, a good many names are attached to the petitions, for, as we have before stated, scruples of conscience do not prevent these jackals from putting down the names of many who refuse to sign, and of more who have not even been asked to sign. Since our last notice we have heard of several flagrant instances of dishonesty in the getting up of these petitions: in one case the worthy caterer for names visited a farm, and when the men and boys were all assembled, he told them they were to sign what he had brought, adding, that if they did, probably their wages would be raised; but if they refused, most likely they would be cut down to 4s. or 5s. a week! The labourers all refused, upon which this precious specimen of a Monopolist's slave said:—'If he were their master he would soon let them know his mind; they should either sign or cut their sticks.' At last, under the threat, he did get two names! In another instance the farmer, in his grief at not getting his men to sign, exclaimed that they had turned their backs on him and his landlord (Mr. Sotheron). At Bechingstoke, the farmers had a meeting to consider the best means to be adopted for getting the labourers to sign one of these Pro-Corn-Law petitions. It was agreed that they should be called together for that purpose.

The men all refused! A second time they were asked, but again in vain. Upon this their masters said to them—'Well we shan't force you to sign, but if you don't we'll drop your wages to a week from this very day!' In the adjacent parishes similar conduct has been pursued; and in very many instances the names of the labourers have been put down without their consent. At one farm within two miles of D. vizes, the hack employed to get signatures obtained a list of all the labourers, and, sans cérémonie, attached them to his petition, their leave to do so not having even been asked! Rotten, indeed, must be the cause that requires to be supported by such means."—W. W. W. Independent.

No comment can add to the effect of this extract. We know the parish of Beechingstoke well, which is occupied by a few large farmers, some of whom are their own landlords, and others hold under Monopolist landowners; and the labourers are as completely in the farmers' power as it is possible for even oppressed agricultural labourers to be. This speaks volumes in favour of the common sense and honesty of the peasantry.

A WORD FROM A FARMER.

The following extract from a farmer's letter, which appeared in one of the public journals, bespeaks pretty accurately the frame of mind with which the more intelligent regard the present state of the Free-Trade question:—

"Speaking as a farmer, I say the sooner this climax is arrived at the better: we shall then know how to adjust rent. Nothing could exceed the blunder of reducing the tariff duties on animal food prior to repealing the Corn Laws, the effect of it upon the farming interest has been to destroy profit in the rearing and fattening of cattle. Any one may prove the fact by purchasing a lean animal, and feeding it fat upon grain. The result would be found to amount to a considerable loss. Speaking as a farmer, I say the question is not so much what the actual market price may be, but is there a profit on the article when brought to market? I care not whether the price is 6d. or 4d. per pound, providing there is a profit. Now, I maintain that with a restrictive Corn Law and a liberal tariff there cannot, on the average, be a profit on feeding stock; and further, that this very principle will enforce a repeal of the Corn Laws ultimately, even should the Anti-Corn-Law League not be able to procure that result. We, the farmers, must have the means of rearing and feeding stock cheapened, otherwise the land will deteriorate in quality, and, as a consequence, rents must come down."

This bears out what we have frequently said as to the advantages the farmer would receive from Free Trade, by getting cheap food for his stock.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Friend."—The bond of union in the League is advocacy of Free Trade, irrespective of opinions on any other subject. It is always a source of regret to the Council when speakers wander, however slightly, into other topics very remotely connected with the main subject; but, when the various shades of opinion of the gentlemen who come before the public are taken into consideration, every candid mind will acknowledge that such aberrations are less frequent than could have been reasonably expected.

"No. 22,210" is informed, that by law the goods and chattels of every occupier of any part of a house or other premises are liable to distraint for the poor-rates due upon his own and all the other parts of such premises. To have himself rated for the specific part he occupies is, therefore, to limit and restrict his liability, not to increase it. The only effect of his being rated is to make him personally liable, but to a much smaller amount than his goods would be were he not rated. In reference to the second point, he would not be subject to any separate rating.

Once for all, we have to announce that an office expressly for registration on purposes has been in active operation at No. 68, Cheapside, for the last six months; and that competent persons are always in attendance there to afford every information and assistance to the public. Under the superintendence of the Registration Committee there, a complete "Guide to the Framing" has been printed.

"B. T."—We should be very unwilling to enter into a controversy with so staunch a friend, but we do not quite assent to his opinions. We have received another letter on the subject, signed "Omicron," taking a very different view of the question; we agree with the writer that the word "immediate" includes the entire question, for the widest monopolist would not assert that the Corn Laws should be maintained under all possible circumstances. To have open the choice of a proper time for their repeal would be to render national interests subservient to the exigencies of party.

"W. M. S."—The passage is marked for extract so soon as we have an opportunity of continuing our review of Mr. Davies's admirable "History of Holland."

"A. S." very judiciously directs attention to the following interesting extracts from Sir James Mackintosh's "History of England:—

"When Parliament at this time (1661) were at leisure from the usual occupation, of raising up or deposing sovereigns, they applied themselves very diligently to regulate commerce. It is hard to say whether the regulations which they proposed more betray their strong sense of the rising importance of trade, or their gross ignorance of its true nature, and of the only effectual means of promoting it. The importation of foreign corn was prohibited, because it ruined the people by making their food cheap, and foreign manufactures were forbidden wherever the like articles could be produced at home; a similar discretion being shown in both cases to the interest of the body of the people who consumed food, and who wore clothes. But the same astonishing errors still pervert the judgment of, perhaps, the majority; and we must not blame the parliament of the fifteenth century for prejudices which to this day taint the statutes of the nineteenth."—Vol. II., p. 35.

Referring to the commercial treaty between England and Burgundy in 1496, Sir James remarks:—

"The vast importance of a free and active exchange of all the products of human industry manifestly appears, from this treaty, to have become an article in the political belief of some in the states which had been taught the value of traffic by experience. When we read such national transactions, we feel our approach to those mighty, but then unobserved, changes which were about to raise the middle classes of men to more influence than they had ever before enjoyed, to restore personal property to that equality with real estate which the feudal institutions had robbed it; in due time to extend political importance to the lowest limits of liberal education; and at length to diffuse that education so widely as to alter the seat of power, and to bring into question many opinions hitherto prevalent among statesmen."—Ibid., p. 103.

He proceeds to show the beneficial effects of the rise of the "pacific and industrious classes," whose hope of new produce and more profitable exchanges were the impelling motives of voyages of discovery, which have enriched and raised them to power; and "no man can now either limit the extent or foretell the remote consequences." America, with her popular rights and liberty, Sir James exhibits as the fruit of the commercial system.

"K. T."—The lines are not quite up to the mark.

"S. D." has done better: there is a good spirit in the following verses:—

SUGGESTED BY THE CALL OF THE LEAGUE UPON THE ELECTORS OF ENGLAND.

"Up to your duty! this is the hour!"
Ay! up to your duty, Oh, brave men and true!
This, this is the hour! we have waited for you!"

Long and painful our watch, while the sun on his way
Waked year after year, and went down day by day;
The stars saw us looking aghast in the gloom,
The seasons pass'd by, or in seed-time, or bloom.
Want and woe pressed upon us, but yet watch'd we still,
For the beacons of hope were lit up on the hill,
And ever around us came breathing the hum
Of hearts inly voicing—"Have patience,—they come!"

As the sap in the root brings the leaf to the bough,
As the fount in the earth bids the broad river flow;
No now shall be seen Freedom's green leaf and dew,
If ye to your duty are constant and true!
This—is this the hour; never faint, never fall!
Corruption shall shrink, and bribed treachery quail.
Your voice hath the way, let your hearts and the will—
Be firm and be honest,—we trust in you still!
The foundations we lay on your courage and power,
Thun up to your duty! Let this be the hour!

On, on! be ye stirring! be first in the strife!
England bids you all hail for Free Trade and for life:
To the land's furthest limits, from ocean to sea,
One thought fills our bosoms—let commerce be free!
Ye, whose word legislators create, you who hold
O'er the rights of the many your right uncontrolled,
For the weal of the many that right now make known,
In the scale of our hopes be your weight bravely thrown,
Combine every heart as bright drops in a shower,
And show for your duty, that this is the hour!

"An Essex Landlord," we are much obliged, but the matter is of little importance.

"A Constant Reader," and "An Islington Leaguer."—The honesty of the supporters of the ten hours' bill will be tested by their votes on Mr. Villiers's motion, and we shall not fail to watch them.

Our old friend "O" sends the following, which needs no introduction:—

A VISION OF THE FUTURE.

"Coming events cast their shadows before."
"I had a dream which was not all a dream."
Musing on men and things, I fell asleep;
And as strange images, and stranger thoughts
Arose unbidden, to shine for a time, then flee,
Leaving the mind in intricate confusion,
So it fell out, that of the forms that thronged
The presence-chamber of my soul, but these My memory can retain.

A brave, bold man
Stood in St. Stephen's, 'mid his stern compeers;
And in a tide of burning eloquence Proclaimed the people's wrongs. The mass outside Watched their strongest and their last appeal
To those who made the nation's laws, and gave
The acts that made the rich man richer still,
And took the bread from out the poor man's mouth.
Almost alone their champion stood—alone,
To grapple with the hydra-headed form—
Monopoly—the giant who had sucked
The blood, and fattened upon famished millions.
His was no stripling's task, no coward's part:
Before him men of substance and of wealth,
Fresh from the table, redolent of wine,
Were ranged, and laughed and mocked at all he said;
Still he stood firm, and thundered in their ears
The last—sole warning of the mass he served.

"A change came o'er the spirit of my dream."
A vast assemblage listened to the tale
Of all their wrongs, with flashing eyes, and hands
Firm clench'd, with lips compressed and white with rage;
Want was in their faces, and their haggard forms
Told of starvation, and starvation's pangs.
They heard how their petitions with contempt
Had been received. They heard how years had passed,
And he, who should do something, had done nought.
The muttered curse and darkened brow revealed
How dark and deadly were their silent thoughts.
They passed away, and all was still—as still
As the last hour before the tempest bursts.

Then in the darkness of the night arose
The cry of man's surprise, and woman's wail,
And childhood's bitter shrieks from blazing homes;
And Darkness, wondering, fled before the glare
Of burning cornstacks, and of kindled barns.
The terrible illumination glowed
Night after night, through all the land, and still Increased, and spread with more relentless force.
Men quaked, for none were safe; and statesmen wore
The look of men perplexed, and shook with fear.
Anarchy prevailed, and the civil power
Grew powerless, and nerveless, and expired!

And bands of men, made desperate by their wrongs—
Hardened by staring famine in the face
For long, long months—mad with excess of rage—
Drunk with vengeance, thirsting still for more—
Plundered in daylight, robed in night.
Horror was everywhere, for in the land
The fearful reign of Terror had begun!

"A change came o'er the spirit of my dream."
Upon the howling waste of waters rose
A form that spoke, and hushed them a l to sleep;
Upon a million crushed and prostrate slaves
The sun of Freedom rose resplendently;
Upon the great highway of nations poured
A fresh myriads of commerce-laden prows;
Upon a discontented nation, rife
With all the horrors of internal war,
Broke forth the beams of Peace; for one, ay more—
A whole united Nation's powerful voice
Had said—"Let trade o'er all the world be free!"

My dream was done: it had no further change;
For when that voice that thundered through the world
Fell on my ears, I woke—and only heard
Echoed from every shore—"LET TRADE BE FREE!"

"E. J."—The subject has not escaped attention; it is admirably discussed in Lawson's "Lectures on Political Economy." Among several short pieces of poetry we find the following, to which we give insert on, and at the same time beg to assure the authors of the rest that we find rejection the most painful part of our editorial duties:—

A grievous law is now in force,
Of woe and crime and death, the source;
Which, to adorn the princely dome,
Makes desolate the poor man's home—
Diverts the law by Nature made,
That nation shall with nation trade,
And stands unrighteously between Man and his food:

Making the subjects of our Queen
A famish'd brood!

And therefore, we who deeply feel
Th' unjust effect of upon our weal—
Who bear Oppression's searing brand,
The unfranchised of the land—
Expect you'll prove, in spite of gold,
Worthy the sacred trust you hold,
And vote against as foul a law
As groaning nations ever saw;
That which, to glut the nobly born,
Depresses Trade and taxes Corn!

"A Working Man."—The information he communicates is gratifying, and will be turned to good account.
In the following lines we recognise with pleasure the hand of an early contributor:—

HURRAH FOR OLD ENGLAND!

Hurrah for the trade of England,
Her commerce unhackled and free;
What has she to fear from foreign compeer,
Or rivals wherever they be?

Away with the bugbear Protection,
She hurls her proud scorn on the name
That hangs like a blight, and withers her might,
And reddens her children with shame.

Have her artisans lost all their cunning,
Is her genius departed, or dead?
Has she ever been behind in the race of mankind,
Will she be so when centuries have fled?

She asks the wide world for a market
(Mock patriots may croak of her fall);
Let her sell, let her buy, and procure her supply
Where she can, free and open to all.

Away with the laws that degrade her,
Let the obstacles be what they will—
There are bees in her hive that shall struggle and strive,
And come off the conquerors still.

Give, give to her commerce full freedom,
Sweep, sweep all restrictions away;
She then can procure food and clothes for her poor,
When are ended the toils of the day.

And again in her vigour and greatness—
Her millions contented and free—
Their shout and acclaim, with a pride in her name, Hurrah for Old England shall be!

RECIPROCITY.—The letter with this signature has been handed to the editor of the LEAGUE by the gentleman to whom it was addressed.

We need not give specific answers to those correspondents whose letters refer to matters of temporary interest, which the unavoidable delay of these notices has placed out of date. The number of such is very great, and we trust that they will grant us their indulgence. Several communications stand over for further consideration; and there are about half-a-dozen which we find it very difficult to decipher. It would be a convenience if those who send letters designed for publication, would write only on one side of the page. The Secretary has to acknowledge several contributions and offers of assistance to the Bazaar and the Exposition.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, June 1, 1844.

The Monopolist party of South Lancashire is so little satisfied with its victory or its position, that the cry of "Register, register, register," is raised as loudly as "Help, help, help," when a house is on fire. An office is opened in Manchester, and advertised italics warn to "lose no time." This is a game at which two can play. Every such cry is a warning voice to Free-Traders; every such movement an example and stimulus. Let the hint be taken, not in South Lancashire only, but everywhere throughout the kingdom. The Registration Court is the arena of the bread-tax battle. Into this court the cause has been moved. We have lodged there our appeal from Parliament. All exertion has tended to this point. A good registration this year is the crown of all past endeavours. Every man who can make himself a voter anywhere should be alive to the work as a bounden duty. Our number of the 11th ult. contains the needful forms, and gives distinct information of the rights of different parties. If Free-Traders generally claim the votes to which they are entitled, or to which they can easily entitle themselves, the result is beyond doubt. The League has done its part, and continues to do it, by all the faculties that such a body can afford. For the rest, individuals must act for themselves. We entreat them to do so forthwith. The enemy is in the field. Thousands of sagot votes will increase the dead weight already presented by tenants-at-will and other helpless and dependent possessors of the nominal franchise, who are only a multifold register of their master's edict. All this has to be overcome. We have to outnumber, at the poll, multitudes who are merely the puppets of the wealthy few. The odds against us should only stir up zeal. We have to prevail, not only over erroneous opinion, but against an unfair position, and an anti-national interest. And, unless this be achieved, we have leagued in vain for the noblest cause that ever stirred the energies of humanity. The selfishness of a small body of sordid, insolent, and wrong-headed men will sacrifice to its shortsighted views the hopes of millions and the well-being of a nation. Be assured the great electoral struggle is impending. All parties are looking forward to it. Make sure of your names on the register. We echo the admonition of our adversaries—"Lose no time!"

THE BAZAAR.

It will be in the recollection of our readers, that when Mr. Cobden announced the holding of a bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre, in July, in aid of the Great League Fund, he intimated his hope that a display would then be made of the productions of our manufactures in all the great trades of the nation, in order that, through their works, so to speak, the skill, industry, taste, and energy of that important portion of the population might be seen, and their claim for freedom of trade be strengthened by this material demonstration of the intellectual and moral qualities of our artisans and manufacturers. Manchester, it appears, responds to Mr. Cobden's call. He speaks positively that specimens of all its fabrics, and in every stage and process of manufacture, will be sent to the bazaar, such as will vindicate its claim to pre-eminence amongst the trading cities of the world; and we do not doubt that his pledge will be fully redeemed. We understand that Leeds also will respond to Mr. Cobden's call. We feel no small degree of anxiety as to the manner in which Bradford will be exhibited in this National Bazaar. Will it even have a stall? And if it should, will it be such that the name of our town may appear—blazoned above it, challenging the inspection of the curious and the critical, the British and the foreign competitor alike? We are somewhat jealous of the fair fame of our enterprising town, as connected with this movement. Bradford is no longer a small fifth or sixth rate town—it is a great commercial and manufacturing city, we had almost said, but we may say, with propriety—emporium. It must shortly rank with such places as Leeds, Birmingham, and even Manchester, as the centre of a vast and most important manufacture, and the principal mart to which buyers—home and foreign—shall resort for their chief supply of the varied productions of that manufacture. We are startled, almost, when we recollect how few years have passed since Bradford was an unnoticed and obscure town—known chiefly because it produced a few plain stuffs, and lay in the coach road betwixt the great seats of the woollen and the cotton manufacture! Now, it is a densely peopled town—its fabrics known in every clime; and everywhere, not merely admired for their beauty and sought after for their cheapness, but disputing the palm of lightness and elegance with the once unrivalled fabrics of the cotton and the silk loom. Surrounded as we are with evidences of the rising importance of this manufacture, in the rows of substantial cottages and elegant houses which start up, as by a magic power, almost in a day, and in the elegant erections destined as repositories of our varied fabrics, we do not grasp the whole extent of our own greatness (and, be it admitted, that of the whole worsted district around us) until we compare the export of our peculiar fabrics at this moment with the exports of a few years, a very few years back. Will our readers believe us when we say, that the number of pieces of stuffs exported for the years 1820-4, 1840-2, and 1843, are respectively 1,064,441, 1,901,734, and 2,443,771; and the number of yards of mixed cotton and worsted fabrics for the same years respectively, 893,470, 5,199,244, and 11,129,975,—and yet so it is. Nor does this convey a correct or adequate idea of our progress. The export of yarn for the years 1831, 1841, and 1843, was respectively, 1,592,455lbs., 4,903,291lbs., and 7,410,313lbs. Nor is this all. We know the home consumption is vastly augmented; but, unfortunately, we have no means of accurately measuring it; unless, indeed, we took the number of spindles and looms at work now and at any former year during the last 20 or 30. The comparison would amaze us, we are sure! Well, but what of all this, our readers may say. Why, just this, that such a trade, so wonderfully enlarged, so important to the national greatness and wealth, ministering to so much of the comfort, convenience, and elegance even of life, and linking us with so many nations by the process of exchange, ought not to be unrepresented in the approaching bazaar. What would it be for our merchants and manufacturers, each to send a dozen or a score of their choicest fabrics, or a score of assorted qualities and fabrics, to the bazaar? A justifiable pride would be gratified, and a great cause forwarded by a small sacrifice. The dyers would be emulous to dye the specimens gratis, for the mere love of their art. If we may hope that a generous spirit of emulation will prompt to a liberal and large contribution (large and liberal in the aggregate, we mean), then we would suggest that some scribe, famous for proficiency in the art of caligraphy, should record on vellum the population of our town in 1811 and in 1841, and the exports of our fabrics in such years, betwixt 1820 and 1843, as might best illustrate our progress,—show with what nations we hold intercourse; and we would get some eloquent pen to inscribe underneath the proud record, words which should express the desire of the producers of the fabrics over which it was placed, that they should enjoy freedom to dispose of the fruit of their industry, skill, and taste, with all people, ministering to the enjoyment of others, and receiving back contributions to their own; and whilst thus linking together, by mercantile dealing, nation and nation, insensibly binding them together in the more imperishable bonds of a felt mutual obligation and dependence. There is an old proverb, which says something about the sufficiency of few words, when addressed to wise people;—without flattery to our merchants and manufacturers, we do not say more on the subject of this article, because we take them to be included in the honourable category just named.—Bradford Observer.

The Bazaar to be held in Covent-garden Theatre in July next, in aid of the £100,000 fund, will embrace specimens of British skill and industry in arts and manufactures from all parts of the kingdom, thus illustrating the progress of the national mind in the useful and ornamental arts. Nor will this be all. The ladies have taken the matter up, and numbers of stalls will be covered with their delicate handiwork, in the shape of drawings, Berlin wool, embroidery, needlework, and other elegant feminine productions. The bazaar, too, will be national rather than metropolitan in its character, and will partake in no small degree of the "representative system," it being, we understand, the intention of the ladies of the leading cities and towns to have stalls on the occasion, each to bear the name of the town to which it belongs. This will, no doubt, create a laudable rivalry, each place striving to show itself thoroughly in earnest in the cause. The county of Cornwall will, we hope, take a conspicuous place in the exhibition. It affords a most excellent opportunity for making the inhabitants of the Metropolis, as well as people from all parts of the kingdom, especially acquainted with the great progress made in this country in the construction of steam engines and other kinds of machinery connected with mining, &c.—Falmouth Packet.

The great Bazaar, to demonstrate the powers of England's mechanical skill, and devotion to the principles of commercial freedom, will be held in London in the month of July. We trust that Preston and all the Lancashire towns will be foremost in their contributions to this national offering. Let the leisure time of the ladies and the ingenuity of the mechanics be called speedily into action, and when help is wanted to provide materials to work with, let the idle rich be appealed to, to supply these requisites. We have no doubt but there are clever workmen who would willingly give their labour, but, unless assisted with materials to work upon, that labour will be lost to the Bazaar.—Preston Guardian.

The Council of the League, in pursuance of its great object—the emancipation of British industry from the commercial restrictions to which it is subjected—has resolved to combine with the Free-Trade Bazaar, about to be held in Covent-garden Theatre during a part of this summer, an exhibition of the products of British arts and manufactures; and has applied to Cambridge for an assistance, which has been accorded. It has long been desired by all who take an interest in the intellectual and mercantile progress of the nation, that England, like France, should have a periodical exposition of the artistic condition of the different branches of industry, so as to afford the means of judging how far intellectual refinement has kept pace with the advance in physical comforts. As the League is the only great body before the country which has no connexion with party politics, it is peculiarly fitted to undertake the task, and is, indeed, to some extent bound to do so, for it is believed that very few Englishmen are aware of the wonders that have been wrought by British skill and industry, particularly in the ornamental manufactures; and still fewer are aware of the vast and varied advantages we possess for commanding pre-eminence in the world's markets, if they were opened to our free competition.—Cambridge Advertiser.

REPLIES TO THE LEEDS MEMORIALS ON THE CORN LAWS.—Replies have been received from the members for this borough to the memorials from a considerable majority of the electors, requesting them to support the intended motion of the Hon. C. P. Villiers for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. A memorial from Holbeck having been sent to the West Riding members, a reply has been received from the Hon. John S. Wortley. Mr. Aldam writes as follows:—"House of Commons, May, 16, 1844. My dear Sir: I received your letter in due course, and at the same time the memorial of a large number of the electors of Leeds respecting the Corn Laws, and the import duties on necessities of life. I shall continue to give my support to Mr. Villiers's motion; and I hold with undiminished strength my opinion of the impolicy of laws which prevent the articles of greatest consumption from becoming the subjects of our extended commerce. I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully, W. Aldam, jun. To J. G. Marshall, Esq."—Mr. Beckett states that the subject shall have his best attention, but that at present his views are not in unison with those of Mr. Villiers. Mr. Stuart Wortley expresses his regret that it will not be in his power to support Mr. Villiers's motion, but that he will feel it his duty to resist it.

PRICE OF BREAD IN PARIS AND IN LONDON.—The highest price of white wheat of the first quality in Paris is 33s. per 1½ hectolitre, which is equivalent to 50s. 5d. per quarter; and the highest price of white wheat of the first quality in London being 62s. per quarter, it follows that wheat is about 23 per cent. dearer in London than in Paris. The highest price of flour of the first quality in Paris is 40s. 7s. 6d. per 100 kilogrammes, which is equal to 40s. 9d. per sack of 280lb. English; and the highest price of town-made flour in the London market being 50s. per sack, it follows that flour is 22½ per cent. dearer in London than in Paris. The price of bread of the first quality in Paris is 35s. per kilogramme, which is equivalent to nearly 6d. per 4lb. loaf English weight; and the price of bread in London at the shops of the full-priced bakers being 8½d. per 4lb., it follows that bread is 4½ per cent. dearer in London than in Paris. It appears, therefore, that, at present, flour in London and Paris bears nearly the same proportions as the prices of wheat in the two countries, being in either case about 23 per cent. dearer here than in Paris; the price of bread in London is, however, upwards of 18 per cent. above this difference, being 4½ per cent. dearer than in Paris.—Times City article.

A MODEL FOR EMPLOYERS.—Adam Brown, in an able communication to the LEAGUE, gives various extracts from a letter received by him from an "Essex Farmer," whom we may safely conclude to be Mr. Biggs, the enterprising and philanthropic tenant of Earl de Grey, of whose immense services to the poor in his neighbourhood Mr. Brown gave an account in a former communication. The account then given of Mr. Biggs's practice we laid before our readers; but, fluttering as was the picture drawn, it was scarcely sufficient to display all the merits of the truly good and high-minded individual in question. In the communication now before us an additional trait in his character is pointed out, by which he is entitled to peculiar admiration. Among the passages cited by Mr. Brown from the letter of his correspondent, is the following, in which he speaks of some labourers who are, by most people, considered too bad to be employed. In regard to individuals of this ill-fated class, he observes:—"These, of all persons, should be employed; for those men, by mixing with the sober and industrious in employment, will be shamed out of their evil practices. When there is no employment the mind is unoccupied, and all kind of evil and base thoughts are generated, and, in many instances, put into practice." So much for the humane and noble sentiments entertained by this man, who was himself at one time no more than a poor labourer. His sentiments, however, are not confined to barren expression. The paragraph from his letter given above is followed by the unjoined observations of Mr. Brown:—"This 'Essex Farmer' does not merely write this benevolent philosophy on paper: he practises what he writes. Some of the working men about his farm told me when I was there, that such was his practice. If he saw an outcast—a man fresh from prison, it might be—whom no other farmer would employ, he took that man and put a spade or a hatchet in his hand, after filling his belly, and sent him to work, and paid him for his work, and tried to reclaim him. This is noble philanthropy."—Wexford Independent.

REVIEW.

Coningsby; or, the New Generation. By B. Disraeli, Esq., M.P. London, Colburn.—(Second Notice.)

More than a quarter of a century has elapsed since the cessation of foreign wars has permitted the administration and the people of England to look each other fairly in the face; and the result has been, as Coningsby intimates, the creation of a mutual distrust, which every day grows wider. Our statesmen have no faith in the people, and the people have no faith in our statesmen; a cold scepticism pervades every social relation connected with the Government—parties are held together by names and not by principles—political leaders have neither confidence in the public nor in themselves. It is this want of faith which has produced the necessity for the League. We find that we cannot trust either of the great bodies which divide the state; but we have unshaken trust in the British nation, and we, therefore, turn from parties to the people. On this point the League is in unison with the small body of independent thinkers, known by the name of Young England; like them, the League rejects the mere cant of party, spurns the hollow sophistry of name, recognises no political sectarianism, and demands the assertion of universal principles. The nation wants something intelligible and substantial; it cannot be much longer beguiled by mere plausibilities. It asks the Conservative what it is he means to conserve, and it demands of the Destructive what it is he means to destroy. This craving for some definite policy and statesmanship has been admirably set forth in the reviews of "Coningsby" which have appeared in the Times newspaper, and which we sincerely hope to see published in a separate form. Let us in the mean time examine Mr. Disraeli's historical survey of political parties, beginning with that to which Sir Robert Peel unfortunately attached himself at the commencement of his public life.

"The chief members of this official confederacy were men distinguished by none of the conspicuous qualities of statesmen. They had none of the divine gifts that govern senates and guide councils. They were not orators; they were not men of deep thought or happy resource; or of penetrative and sagacious minds. Their political ken was essentially dull and contracted. They expended some energy in obtaining a defective blundering acquaintance with foreign affairs; they knew as little of the real state of their own country as savages of an approaching eclipse. This factious league had shuffled themselves into power by clinging to the skirts of a great minister, the last of Tory statesmen, but who, in the unparalleled and confounding emergencies of his latter years, has been forced, unfortunately for England, to relinquish Toryism. His successors inherited all his errors without the latent genius, which in him might have still rallied and extricated him from the consequences of his disasters. His successors did not merely inherit his errors; they exaggerated, they caricatured them. They rode into power on a spring tide of all the rampant prejudices and rancorous passions of their time. From the King to the poor their policy was a mere pandering to public ignorance. Impudently usurping the name of that party of which nationality, and therefore universality, is the essence, these pseudo Tories made Exclusion the principle of their political constitution, and Restriction the genius of their commercial code.

"The blind goddess that plays with human fortunes has mixed up the memory of these men with traditions of national glory. They conducted to a prosperous conclusion the most renowned war in which England has ever been engaged. Yet every military conception that emanated from their cabinet was branded by their characteristic want of grandeur. Chance, however, sent them a great military genius, whom they treated for a long time with indifference; and whom they never heartily supported until his career had made him their master. His transcendent exploits and European events, even greater than his achievements, placed in the manikin grasp. (The English Ministry—the settlement of Europe.)"

When we look back upon the termination of the great continental war, and the force that succeeded its tragedies, we feel sometimes disposed to believe that there are periods in history which should be called epochs of national fatuity. The Congress of Vienna was the most miserable diplomatic failure which the annals of the world record, and England has the bad pre-eminence of having exhibited the greatest amount of incapacity among the incapables, and of weakness among the feeble. One anecdote connected with the sacrifices of colonial dominion then madly made deserves to be known. Sir Stamford Raffles, at the table of one of the Ministers, was speaking on his favourite topic, the incomprehensible abandonment of Java. He was told in reply, to his utter astonishment, that if he had given timely information of the great value of that island, it would never have been yielded to the Dutch. He declared, with truth, that he had sent a very full account of the country to the Colonial Office; and in the archives of the office his despatch was subsequently found unopened! Mr. Disraeli's account of the domestic policy of this miserable Ministry is written with great power, but it derives its principal force from its justice and its truth:—

"The peace of Paris found the Government of this country in the hands of a body of men of whom it is no exaggeration to say that they were ignorant of every principle of every branch of political science. As long as our domestic administration was confined merely to the rules ing of a revenue, they levied taxes with gross facility from the industry of a country too busy to criticise or complain. But when the excitement and distraction of war had ceased, and they were forced to survey the social elements that surrounded them, they seemed, for the first time, to have become conscious of their own incapacity. These men, indeed, were the more children of routine. They prided themselves on being practical men. In the language of this defunct school of statesmen, a practical man is a man who practices the blunders of his predecessor.

Now commenced that Condition of England Question of which our generation hears so much. During five-and-twenty years every influence that can develop the energies and resources of a nation had been acting with concentrated stimulation on the British Isles. National peril and national glory; the perpetual menace of invasion, the continual triumph of conquest; the most extensive foreign commerce that was ever conducted by a single nation; an illimitable currency; an internal trade supported by swarming millions, whom manufactures and enclosure bills summoned into existence; above all, the supreme control obtained by man over mechanical power; these are some of the causes of that rapid advance of material civilization in England to which the annals of the world can afford no parallel. But there was no proportionate advance in our moral civilization. In the hurry-scurry of money-making, men-making and machine-making, we had altogether outgrown, not the spirit, but the organization, of our institutions.

The peace came; the stimulating influence suddenly ceased; the people, in a novel and painful position, found themselves without guides. They went to the ministry; they asked to be guided; they asked to be governed. Commerce requested a code; trade required a currency; the enfranchised subject solicited his equal privileges; suffering labour clamoured for its rights; a new race demanded education. What did the ministry do?

They fell into a panic. Having fulfilled during their lives the duties of administration, they were frightened because they were called upon, for the first time, to perform the functions of Government. Like all weak men, they had recourse to what they called strong measures. They determined to put down the multitude. They thought they were imitating Mr. Pitt, because they mistook disorganization for sedition.

Their projects of relief were as ridiculous as their system of coercion was ruthless; both were alike founded in intense ignorance. When we recall Mr. Vanittart with his currency resolutions; Lord Castlereagh with his plans for the employment of labour; and Lord Selbourn with his plots for ensuring the Liberator's silence; one is tempted to imagine that the present epoch has been one of peculiar advances in political ability, and marvel how England could have attained her present pitch under a series of such governors.

There is a dark chapter in our history at which Mr. Disraeli only hints, but which we may some time or other be tempted to open, the mystery of iniquity connected with the forging of plots, and the manufacture of conspiracies. Selbourn's detestable emissaries and spies will not always remain safe in the obscurity which has hitherto shrouded them; there are twilight periods in political life when the ominous birds of prey, together with the bats and owls, emerge from the hiding-places where they lay during sunshine, and are seen prowling about the dim horizon: it is at such a period that the managers of Manchester massacres and Bolton Blackfries are found to brave popular indignation, and venture to show themselves abroad. They must be effectually taught that their occupation is gone; instead of furnishing cases to Crown lawyers, they can only supply columns for an effete article in Regis's review. There is little chance of the world being frightened with the hideous fables and ugly words which served to support the Ministry of Lord Liverpool. Our author justly remarks that, even in the palmy days of Quarterly rent, the systematic falsehoods of the Regis journalists were insufficient to support an administration.

Notwithstanding, however, all this successful mystification, the Arch-Medusa who presided, rather than ruled, over the Cabinet of Ministers, became hourly more conscious that the inevitable train of events fulfilling the duties of an administration to perform the functions of a government could not be conducted without talents and knowledge. The Arch-Medusa had himself some glimmering tradition of political science. He was sprung from a noble stock, had received a liberal training, and, though not a statesman, might be classed among those whom the Lord Keeper Williams used to call "statesmongers." In a subordinate position, his meagre intelligence and his timid method might not have been with advantage; but the qualities that he possessed were amplified; nor in any country could he have been invested with the high properties of a leader. In the conduct of public affairs, his disposition was exactly the reverse of that which is the characteristic of great men. He was presumptuous in little questions, and great ones he left open.

In tracing the subsequent history of administration, the author of "Cunningby" shows some symptoms of wavering and hesitation when he comes to speak of the Duke of Wellington's first appearance as a Cabinet Minister. He has either concealed or forgotten that the Wellesley family had been distinguished as the most prolific of political jobbers in the jockeying Parliament of Ireland, and that the Duke of Wellington in his earlier days had held a seat in that corrupt assembly, where he served his apprenticeship to the art of ruling a nation by the unscrupulous use of corruption and terror. The lessons which he then learned were very emphatically renewed when, as Sir Arthur Wellesley, he held the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland; fortunately for himself he was called away from political to military life, and the merits of the successful general effaced the failures of the blundering politician. There was one person, however, who did not forget the blunders and worse than blunders of Sir Arthur Wellesley when Irish Secretary, and that was the Duke of Wellington himself, when he declared that "he would be mad to think of becoming the head of an administrative cabinet." He did subsequently take upon himself that office; he introduced into the Ministerial ranks the drill and discipline of the parade; he taught the Conservative party to forget everything but the word of command; he schooled them into marching and countermarching, wheeling and holding line, advancing and retreating, without ever venturing to ask the why or wherefore of a single movement. This discipline has rendered his party exceedingly formidable in attack, and has just in the same proportion diminished its power of holding a defensive position, which has ever proved the most dangerous to mercenary troops. He refused to them the slightest freedom of thought, word, and action; and hence a few years sufficed to reduce them to mere machines, equally destitute of intellectual and moral exertion. The results of the Wellington discipline on what is called the Conservative party cannot be better stated than in the words of the Times:—

"England at the present day is a gathering of sects, and classes, and factions, all equally selfish, equally blind. The power of the monarch, in whose person the wisdom of the past ever recognised the leader of the people, gone; the universality of the Church, pervading every rank, and alone equalizing all by a dignified isopotism, a thing unknown;—and in its stead a respectable establishment, frigid,itudinarian, alarmed, decorous; composed of priests who write books on Algebra and Greek metres, but powerless to mould the conscience and touch the feelings of the rugged multitude;—and, lastly, a peasantry, estranged from Church and March and aristocracy, by the suicidal neglect of all—consigned alternately to the dreary walls of grim bastilles and the dreary consolations of infidelity and Chartism. Such are the elements of our social state. To rescue the country from a position so dangerous—to substitute principles, acknowledged in men's hearts, for words which are but as a lie—to renovate by restitution, and to conserve by shrinking from concession—to destroy for ever that painful medley of selfish exclusiveness and ponderous mediocrity which for many years weighed on England like a nightmare, under the assumed name of Tory Statesmanship—a statesmanship of blunders and expedients and restrictions—these are put forth as the objects of men whom youth may have made too bold and confident of success, but whom history has taught not to despair while there is aught of private virtue or national character remaining among us—as long as forms remain to inspire reverence, and opinion to influence conduct."

Mr. Disraeli avoids entering upon the discussion which must, at no distant date, be forced upon public attention—the effect of the Duke of Wellington's dictatorship upon political party, especially the military discipline which he has established among his followers, and of which the recent divisions on the factory question furnish a flagrant example. We turn, however, to another subject, the sudden loss of power by the Whig party at the moment that their tenure of office seemed most secure. After relating the history of a contested election, Mr. Disraeli continues:—

"And here in a work which, in an unpretending shape, aspires to take neither an unimpaired nor a partial view of the political history of the ten eventful years of the Reform struggle, we should pause for a moment to observe the stringency that, only five years after the reconstruction of the electoral body by the Whig party, in a borough called into political existence by their policy, a manufacturing town, too, their candidate comprising in his person every quality and circumstance which would recommend him to the constituency, and his opponent the worst specimen of the old generation—a political adventurer—who owed the last desperate part of his notoriety to his opposition to the Reform Bill; that in such a borough under such circumstances there should be a contest, and that, too, one of a very doubtful issue."

"What was the cause of this? Are we to seek it in the 'reaction' of the Tories and the Tapers? That would not be a very satisfactory solution. Reaction to a certain extent is the law of human existence. In the particular case of affairs before us—England after the Reform Act—it never could be doubted that time would gradually and, in some instances, rapidly counteract the national impulse of 1832. There never could have been a question, for example, that the English counties would have reverted to their natural allegiance to their proprietors; but the results of the appeals to the third estate in 1835 and 1837 are not to be accounted for by a mere readjustment of legitimate influences."

"The truth is, that, considerable as are the abilities of the Whig leaders; highly as they are held as many of them; unquestionably must be acknowledged in parliamentary debate; experienced in conduct; sedulous in office; eminent as scholars; powerful from their position; the absence of individual influence, of the pervading authority of a commanding mind, has been the cause of the fall of the Whig party."

"Such a supremacy was generally acknowledged in Lord Grey on the accession of this party to power; but it was the supremacy of a tradition rather than of a fact. Almost at the outset of his authority his success or was indicated. When the crisis arrived, the intended successor was not in the Whig ranks. It is in this virtual absence of a real and recognised leader, almost from the moment that they passed their great measure, that we must seek a clue to the fall of the Whig party. All those distempered elections of 1832, all those dark intrigues, that finally broke up not only the Whig Government, but the Whig party; demoralised their ranks; and sent them to the country, both in 1835 and 1837, with every illusion which had operated so happily in their favour in 1832, scattered to the winds. In all things we trace the irresistible influence of the individual."

"And yet the interval that elapsed between 1835 and 1837 proved, that there was all this time in the Whig array one entirely competent to the office of leading a great party, though his capacity for that fulfilment was too tardily recognised."

"Lord John Russell has that degree of imagination which, though evinced rather in sentiment than expression, still enables him to generalise from the details of his reading and experience; and to take those comprehensive views, which, however easily depreciated by ordinary men in an age of routine, are indispensable to a statesman in the conjunctures in which we live. He understands, therefore, his position; and he has the moral intrepidity which prompts him ever to dare that which his intellect assures him is politic. He is, consequently, at the same time, sagacious and bold in council. As an administrator, he is prompt and indefatigable. He is not a natural orator; and labours under physical deficiencies which even a Demosthenic impulse could scarcely overcome. But he is experienced in debate; quick in reply, fertile in resource; takes large views; and frequently compensates for a dry and hesitating manner by the expression of those noble truths that flash across the fancy, and rise spontaneously to the lip, of men of poetic temperament when addressing popular assemblies. If we add to this a private life of dignified repose; the accidents of his birth and rank, which never can be severed from the man, the action of a great historic family, and born as it were to the hereditary service of the state, it is difficult to ascertain at what period, or under what circumstances, the Whig party have ever possessed, or could obtain, a more efficient leader."

The fall of the Whig party was predicted by all thoughtful politicians from the introduction of the Irish Coercion Bill. Never was there a more monstrous abandonment of all former professions, and all recognised principles. The measure bore all the appearance of haste and passion; it was carried through both Houses with an utter disregard of the very appearance of consistency; and when at length it became law, the Ministers stood before the country in the very ridiculous position of one who has got a wolf by the ears, is afraid to hold him, but is still more afraid to let him go. It was a measure which proclaimed that the Whig statesmen had neither confidence in themselves nor in the people; and their incapacity to devise remedial measures was their only apology for having recourse to unconstitutional violence.

Every one knew that the English people did not obtain the Reform Bill to the extent which had been originally intended; the two capital defects of admitting tenants-at-will to the franchise, and preserving the right of voting in the old freemen, both of which the Whig leaders had resisted, were thought to require a counteracting extension of the franchise to independent classes, and the protection of the ballot to dependent voters. These measures were a logical deduction from the principles on which the Reform Bill was declared to be based; but when these measures were sought, Lord John Russell answered with the assertion of finality; an assertion to which he clung the more tenaciously as it was the more illogical if not irrational. The great body of the nation understood this strange declaration as the announcement of a ministerial resolution to put an end to all improvement, and from that hour thinking men began to be persuaded that even administrative reform should be sought from other quarters. The celebrated Whig budget was regarded as little better than a mockery by the parties it was intended to conciliate; such measures proposed by a Government in the very decrepitude of weakness, seemed to be a palpable delusion. Mr. Disraeli's view of the state of parties in 1841 is, on the whole, correct, and is calculated to suggest much useful reflection.

"The state of political parties in England in the spring of 1841 offered a most remarkable contrast to their condition at the period commemorated in the first chapter of this work. The banners of the Conservative camp at this moment lowered on the Whig forces as the gathering host of the Norman invader frowned on the coast of Sussex. The Whigs were not yet conquered, but they were doomed; and they themselves knew it. The mistake which was made by the Conservative leaders in not retaining office in 1839—and whether we consider their conduct in a national and constitutional light, or as a mere question of political tactics and party prudence, it was unquestionably a great mistake—had infused into the corpse of Whig authority a kind of galvanic action, which only the superficial could mistake for vitality. Even to form a basis for their future operations, after the conjuncture of '39, the Whigs were obliged to make a fresh inroad on the revenue, the daily increasing debility of which was now arresting attention, and exciting public alarm. It was clear that the catastrophe of the Government would be financial."

"Under all the circumstances of the case, the conduct of the Whig Cabinet in their final propositions cannot be described as deficient either in boldness or prudence. The policy which they recommended was in itself a sagacious and spirited policy, but they erred in supposing that at the period it was brought forward any measures promoted by the Whigs could have obtained general favour in the country. The Whigs were known to be feeble; they were looked upon as tricksters. The country knew they were opposed by a very powerful party, and, though there certainly never was any authority for the belief, the country did believe that that powerful party were influenced by great principles; had in their view a definite and national policy; and would secure England, instead of a feeble administration and fluctuating opinions, energy and a creed."

"The future effect of the Whig propositions of '41 will not be detrimental to that party, even if in the interval they be appropriated piecemeal, as will probably be the case, by their Conservative successors. But for the moment, and in the plight in which the Whig party found themselves, it was impossible to have devised measures more conducive to their precipitate fall. Great interests were menaced by a weak Government. The consequence was inevitable. Tadpole and Taper saw it in a moment. They snuffed the factious air, and felt the coming storm. Notwithstanding the extreme congeniality of these worthies, there was a little latent jealousy between them. Tadpole worshipped Registration; Taper adored a Cry. Tadpole always maintained that it was the winnowing of the electoral lists that could alone gain the day; Taper, on the contrary, faithful to ancient traditions, was ever of opinion that the game must ultimately be won by popular clamour. It always seemed so impossible that the Conservative party could ever be popular, the extreme graciousness and personal popularity of the leaders not being generally esteemed a sufficient hedge against the inveterate odium that attached to their opinions, that the Tadpole philosophy was the favoured tenet in high places; and Taper had had his knuckles well rapped more than once for manœuvring too actively against the New Poor Law, and for hiring several link-boys to bawl a much wronged lady's name in the Park when the Court prorogued Parliament.

"And now, after all, in 1841 it seemed that Taper was right. There was a great clamour in every quarter, and the clamour was against the Whigs and in favour of Conservative principles. What Canadian timber merchants meant by Conservative principles it is not difficult to conjecture; or West India planters. It was tolerably clear on the hustings what squires and farmers and their followers meant by Conservative principles. What they mean by Conservative principles now is another question; and whether Conservative principles mean something higher than the perpetuation of fiscal arrangements, some of them very impolitic, none of them very important. But no matter what different bodies of men understood by the cry in which they all joined, the Cry existed; Taper beat Tadpole; and the great Conservative party beat the shattered and exhausted Whigs."

It was at this crisis that the League first rose into importance; everywhere there was felt a want of something on which the nation could rely more substantial than that aristocratic patronage of popular measures which was ever ready to sacrifice national objects to the exigencies of party. It was the first time since the days of Cromwell that the middle classes, self-officered and self-disciplined, appeared as a political body in the State. It was the first time since the days of the Long Parliament that popular leaders reposed full trust in the people alone, and that the people responded to them with more than an answering share of confidence. The League has a simple creed and an intelligible faith; mutual and unlimited confidence is the bond of its union and the primary condition of its federation; in an age of general distrust and almost universal scepticism, it exhibits to the world an organization of faith, a union of self-reliance and mutual reliance which has had no parallel in modern history.

Here we must pause for the present; but "Comingsby" has still some historical lessons which we have left untouched, but to which we shall return at an early opportunity.

Patriotism, and other Poems. By George Richardson. London: Adms. Manchester: Falkner.

An interesting autobiography forms the introduction to this little volume, and conveys a very favourable impression of the taste and feeling of the author. His poems maintain the same character; for though the metre is occasionally rough, and some of the epithets not very appropriate, there is not a line which does not bear the stamp and impress of an honest heart, alive to every generous sympathy, and responsive to every noble emotion. We are always glad to receive accessions to literature from the manufacturing districts, for, though there may be some deficiency in artistic skill, the poets of Lancashire exhibit a genuine love of nature, and an earnestness in the cause of humanity, which may well atone for mere structural deficiencies. If, on the one hand, they are wanting in metropolitan polish and scholastic refinement, on the other they are free from conventional cant and sentimental affectation. Like Bamford, the author before us is a poet of the poor, and earnestly pleads their cause by appeals not to benevolence but to justice. There is an indignant energy in the following lines very different from the maudlin sentimentality which is just now fashionable in London:—

"Look on the crowded streets, and trace
The aching breast in many a face!
The lowly mass, the labouring band
Who prop the grandeur of the land,
The vigour that upholds the state,
The blood and vitals of the great!
Oh! deep the hardships that the poor
With sad humility endure—
The battling destiny of years,
Through toil and sweat, through want and tears,
Which they must brave, which they must bear,
Nor murmur at their slavish care;
Scarce look or speak—a tyrant's curse
Might make their slavery doubly worse!
Preferring (calmly great) a wrong,
They learn to suffer and be strong!
In misery they live—they die,
And this is British Liberty!"

Though usually affectionate in his remonstrances against oppression, there are some passages in which he pours forth a spirit of honest reprobation against the hollow pretences by which oppression is attempted to be justified:—

"Ye proud voluptuaries of earth
Who boast—how vainly boast of birth!
Yet ask Protection! shame, oh, shame!
Degraded and perverted name!"

Protect ye, millions of the land,
Against a trammelled, hungry band!
Protect ye, in your chariot pride,
Against the houseless at your side!
Protect ye, at your orgiastic rites,
Against the squalid foodless wights!
Protect ye, 'gainst the low, obscure,
The weakly, harassed, prostrate poor!
Protect ye, whilst ye dare to hold
Heaven's bounty for the lust of gold;
What know ye in your princely domes
Of thousands and their narrow homes?
What know ye of the common want—
Of wages, or of warmth the scant?
What know ye of the lack of bread,
The throb of woe, the fevered head?
No anxious days, no nightly throes,
Perplex your minds, or wound repose,
Tho' near, yet far, ye dwell apart,
And reck not of the anguished heart!
Vouchsafe to open 'one cottage door,'
And yield some solace to the poor;
Approach with sympathetic care,
And see the sickly misery there!"

Another passage, in a similar strain, deserves to be noticed:—

"Lo, where Corruption, as a demon, lurks,
And in dark guise the mesh of misery works;
There the Monopolist, with glib tongue,
Adds ill to ill, and selfish wrong on wrong;
There the aristocrats in riches shine,
Mammon at once their homely and shrine;
Taxing their market, for their country's grief,
The workhouse or the dungeon for relief.
There, too, Oppression makes his grim abode,
Opposed to Freedom, Nature, and to God!
Whilst rankling scorn and festering hate, the while,
Degrade for worldly lust the sons of toil;
There feudal lords confer in bitter mood,
And over partial laws in baseness brood,
Lay sinful imposts on the fruitful sod,
Taxing the living grain—the heritage of God!"

Although there are some weak lines in the passage descriptive of the social blessings to be derived from Free Trade and unfettered commerce, there runs through it such a healthy spirit of religious sense of right that we cannot refuse it insertion:—

"Let Commerce, with its genial smile,
Spread its bright wings o'er every isle;
Our ships be freighted with free store,
And blessings bring from shore to shore—
From north to south, from east to west
And make the world with comforts blest!
Labour!—a great, a mutual good—
Would yield us profit, raiment, food,
And free exchange would grant to all
A golden boon 'gainst needy thrall;
Promote a social, friendly tone,
With tribes and states as yet unknown;
Convinced that God for great and small,
Gave produce of the earth for all!"

"Unshackle all—let free the Patriot voice!
To urge their wish—have rulers of their choice;
Nor subsidy presume, with golden gloss,
To tempt the hushing with its guilty dross."

"List to the voice of Mercy sweet—
'Give to the hungry food to eat!'
And will they not his goodness share,
Who tend the poor with watchful care?
And will not penal judgment wait
On them who bind the humble state
Who tax their corn—a grievous wrong—
And trample on the suffering throng?
Mysterious Power! oh, dign to scan
This wayward, finite atom—man,
And bless with motives thoughtful, kind,
The stubborn passions of the mind;
Let fall Thy providential will;
Oh, turn away the impending ill,
And to the rulers wisdom give,
For better laws, that man may live,
Enjoying bounties sent by Thee,
Eternal, infinite, and free!
Oh, let them, like the chosen band
Of Israel, reap the fruitful land,
When the great kings and furious host
Fought 'gainst the Lord by Merom's coast;
For Joshua, at the sacred word,
Unsheathed his just and righteous sword,
And Hazer's mighty kingdom's lay
In ruin, on that fatal day!"

There are several picturesque descriptions of scenery in this little volume, which show that the author has viewed nature with the eye of a poet and a painter. We take one of these, not because it is the best, but because it is of the most manageable length:—

"SUNRISE IN SPRING."

"The shadow of night from the east hath rolled,
Now the Sun comes forth on his throne of gold!
And around his heavenly pathway bright,
Like an ocean appear vast gleams of light;
And tracks of purple and azure are seen,
As a glorious land in the far serene;
And shapes are there like a citadel rent,
With rampart, and tower, and battlement!
Now the hills, which were lately cold and dun,
Are fringed with the glare of the burning sun;
And the dew appears to nourish the birth,
And moisten the shoots of the droughty earth.
A freshness comes with the blushes of morn,
Like a zephyr with fragrant riches borne;
And the trees, which drooped as a maiden grieves,
Now quiver and flutter their myriad leaves,
And seem to rejoice in a matin lay,
Which floats aloft to the Giver of day!
Behold, in the sunlit meadow and glade,
A glittering gem on the verdant blade;
And purely bright is each dewy bead,
Like an orient pearl on an emerald bed!
The birds are awake, and on rapturous wing
Are greeting the morn and the budding Spring;

And the lark is up with its trilling lyre,
Like a messenger sent from the feathered choir,
To soar unseen 'neath the temple of God,
And utter their thanks from the tree and sod!
What a lesson for man, of praise and love,
To the essence of glory and goodness above!"

Although the poetry in this little volume is not of the highest school, and sometimes manifests a want of artistic training, yet it is, on the whole, highly creditable to the writer's intellectual powers, and still more creditable to his moral feelings.

THE FOREIGN CORN TRADING.—We find the following curious note in a work on the corn trade in France:—"During the period of 27 years, from 1815 to 1841, 17 harvests were insufficient, and rendered the importation of foreign corn necessary. In 1838, this corn amounted to 1-75th part of the consumption. Two years ago France paid 92,000,000*l.* for wheat alone brought from abroad; and, in 1817 purchased to the amount of 72,000,000*l.* Once, in 1832, the importation amounted to 4,000,000 hectolitres. The average per annum, during the 27 years from 1815 to 1841, was 800,000 hectolitres. (The hectolitre is rather more than 2½ bushels.)"

SILK MONOPOLY AT ROME.—The frequent allusions to silk in the complimentary poems of Claudian, receive illustration from various imperial laws, which were promulgated in the same century, and in part by the very emperors to whom his flattery is addressed, and which are preserved in the Code of Justinian. Their object was not to encourage the silk manufacture, but, on a principle very opposite to that of modern times, to make it an imperial monopoly. The admiration excited by the splendour and elegance of silk attire was the ground on which it was forbidden that any individual of the male sex should wear even a silken border upon his tunic or his pallium, with the exception of the emperor, and his officers and servants. To confine the enjoyment of these luxuries more entirely to the imperial family and court, all private persons were strictly forbidden to engage in the manufacture, and gold and silken borders were to be made only in the imperial city.—Fate's History of Weaving among the Ancients.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.—A copy of the following resolutions, agreed to at a late meeting of the Northamptonshire Agricultural Book-Club, has been forwarded to us, with the request that we will give them our consideration. We think that we cannot better meet the views of the members of the club than by laying the resolutions before our readers:—"On the best Method of Improving the Condition of the English Agricultural Labourers. Resolved—That it is the opinion of this meeting, that the best mode of improving the condition of the agricultural labourer is,—1. By establishing and encouraging, in every village, daily and Sunday schools, for useful and religious education. 2. By promoting the establishment of clubs upon a sound and permanent basis, for providing funds for the relief of the sick and superannuated, and also clothing and provident clubs. 3. By procuring cottage gardens, not exceeding one rood of good land, near to the residence of the occupier, and, where practicable, attached to his house. 4. By providing labourers with comfortable cottages, containing no less than two bedrooms. 5. By paying the labourers weekly on a Friday instead of Saturday, thereby giving them an opportunity of laying out their earnings to the best advantage. 6. By adopting every possible means of giving constant employment to the agricultural labourers throughout the year, and of paying them according to the work performed, and not according to their necessities. 7. By pressing upon the attention of the members, composed of landlords, land-agents, and tenant-farmers, the importance of carrying out the spirit of the 6th Resolution, by devising means of increasing labour in such a manner as will secure to the employer a return equivalent to the additional outlay, without which the occupier cannot afford the expense consequent on such increase of labour."—Birmingham Advertiser.

COMMERCE AND MANUFACTURES IN GREECE.—Commercial occupation were never in great esteem among the ancient Greeks. No person of ancient nobility ever condescended to them, although conversely a manufacturer might raise himself to the head of public affairs, such as Cleon, Hypocholus, and others. The early statesmen, however, encouraged industry, especially Solon, Themistocles, and Pericles, partly with the intention of improving the condition of the lower classes, and partly of increasing the population of the city; as well as of advancing the cause of commerce, and of manning the numerous fleets, by which, after the time of Themistocles, the Athenians held the mastery of the sea. And it was this circumstance that rendered the resident aliens indispensable for Athens, who carried on manufactures and commerce to a great extent, and were bound to serve in the fleet. It even appears that the useful arts were encouraged by honorary rewards, though, even by these means, they could not rank in the public estimation. There were prizes for the common people, for which the higher ranks did not compete with them. At the same time the respectable citizens, who had none of the higher aristocratic notions, like Pericles, Alcibiades, or Callias, the son of Hippocrates, whose pride yielded in nothing to the haughtiness of the modern nobility, were not ashamed of superintending extensive manufactories worked at their own expense. The inferior citizens were as much reduced to the necessity of manual labour as the poor aliens and slaves. It was not until after the balance had been turned in favour of the aristocracy that measures of severity were brought forward; as, for example, Diophantus proposed that all the manual labourers should be made public slaves. There was again another reason why no restriction should have been imposed upon the freedom of industry, viz., the little importance that was attached to it; an alien was allowed to carry on any trade although he was prohibited from holding any property in land, with regard, indeed, to the sale in the market, strangers were on a less advantageous footing than natives, as they were obliged to pay a duty for permission to expose their goods there. The law of Solon, that men should not deal in ointments, was only founded on principles of education, in order to withdraw men from womanish labours; subsequently, however, it became a dead letter, for Machines the philosopher had a manufactory of ointments.—Bosch's Economy of Athens.

POOR LAW COMMISSIONERS' REPORT.

(EXTRACT.) May 1, 1844.

We rejoice to be able to state that, since the date of the last report, the demand for labour, both in the manufacturing and agricultural parts of the country, has continued steadily to increase, and that during last winter (which was, indeed, on account of its mildness, eminently favourable to the working classes) the administration of relief to the unemployed poor was not attended with any serious difficulty. The regulations respecting the out-door relief of the able-bodied, which were in force in the several unions, were generally observed, and we were not required by special circumstances to modify our general orders on this subject.

The expenditure for the relief of the poor, which decreased annually during 1835-6-7, the three years which succeeded the year of the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act, began to increase in 1838, and has continued to increase steadily, in each successive year, up to the year ending Lady-day, 1843, the last parochial year for which the accounts are complete.

The amounts for the two last parochial years are as follows:—

|-----------------------|---|
| 1842 | £4,911,498 |
| 1843 | 5,218,027 |
| Increase | £296,529 |

The expenditure for the relief of the poor in the parochial year of 1843 is, however, still considerably less than the expenditure for the parochial year 1841, the last parochial year previous to the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act:—

| Years ending Lady-day | Total expenditure for the relief of the poor. |
| 1841 | £6,317,255 |
| 1843 | 5,218,027 |
| Diminution | £1,100,228 |

The expenditure for the year 1843, therefore, falls short of that for 1841 by a sum exceeding a million sterling; and in comparing these two years the increase of population and wealth which has taken place since 1834 should be considered.

The number of paupers relieved both in and out of the workhouse has increased annually, and by a tolerably rapid rate of progress, since 1840. The total number of paupers in the quarter ending Lady-day, 1840, was 1,199,529, and in the quarter ending Lady-day, 1843, it was 1,539,490, showing an increase in the latter quarter of 339,961. For the last two years the comparison stands thus:—

| Quarters ending Lady-day | In-door Paupers. | Out-door Paupers. | Total. |
| 1842 | 222,612 | 1,204,545 | 1,427,157 |
| 1843 | 238,560 | 1,300,930 | 1,539,490 |
| Increase | 15,948 | 96,385 | 112,333 |

The total number of persons relieved in England and Wales during the three months ended Lady-day, 1843, exceeded a million and a half, and amounted to one-tenth of the entire population.

The rates of increase have been widely different in different parts of the country. Whilst in 11 counties the increase in the year 1843 over the previous year has exceeded 10 per cent., in 9 counties the increase has only been 1 per cent., in three counties it has been less than 1 per cent., and in six counties there has been even a diminution. It is further to be observed that the counties in which the largest increase has taken place are those which contain the principal seats of manufactures and mining. In the parochial year 1843, compared with 1842, the increase in Staffordshire is 32 per cent., in the West Riding of Yorkshire 26 per cent., and in Lancashire 23 per cent.

We rejoice, however, to be able to state that the progress of pauperism, which had been constant from the year 1837 to Lady-day, 1843, was arrested in the course of last year, and that the expenditure for the half-year ending Michaelmas, 1843, exhibits a diminution of £139,926 as compared with the corresponding half-year for 1842.

In some of the counties in which the increase was greatest in the year ending Lady-day, 1843, the diminution was greatest in the succeeding six months. Thus, in Lancashire, an increase of 23 per cent. is followed by a diminution of 16 per cent.; in Staffordshire an increase of 32 per cent. is followed by a diminution of 10 per cent.; in Leicestershire an increase of 17 per cent. is followed by a diminution of 12 per cent.

For the quarters ended Michaelmas, 1842 and 1840, the comparative numbers of paupers relieved stand thus:—

| Quarters ending Michaelmas | In-door Paupers. | Out-door Paupers. | Total. |
|----------------------------|------------------|-------------------|-----------|
| 1842 | 197,397 | 1,175,215 | 1,372,612 |
| 1843 | 186,256 | 1,108,318 | 1,294,574 |

Decrease in 1843 11,141 .. 66,927 .. 78,068—6 per cent.

In our report of last year (section 11) we adverted to our former reports on the difficulties attending the relief of casual and wandering poor, and the inconveniences connected with it. We further stated that those inconveniences continued to be felt in many parts of the country, especially in and near London, though they had been somewhat mitigated by the provision contained in the act 5 and 6 Vic., c. 57, s. 5.

We have continued to give our attention to this subject for many reasons. Some of the most urgent cases of distress occur occasionally among this class of poor, and the denial of relief to persons thus situated may lead to the most fatal consequences. We have not ceased, therefore, to assert the existence of the duty imposed by the law, as it now stands, on parish and union officers to relieve persons in a state of destitution, wherever they may be, and irrespectively of their settlement. On the other hand, we have felt, and still feel, that in no class of cases is it more necessary to administer relief, subject to proper conditions. A neglect of such conditions carries with it, not only the extension of relief to the idle and undeserving, but it tends, at the same time, to promote habitual vagrancy and all the degraded habits which are implied by such a course of life. The difficulty is to steer between two sets of errors—to provide temporary relief for the labourer or mechanic, who may be surprised by sickness or unforeseen misfortune, whilst searching for that employment which he has been unable to procure at home, and at the same time to favour as little as possible a mode of life, squalid indeed, and apparently wretched, but which experience shows us is often preferred by many to the monotony of steady labour on the same spot. This subject assumes peculiar importance in connexion with the question whether it is expedient at the present moment to authorise the erection of distinct asylums for the class of persons of whom we are now speaking.

LABOUR.—An acre of land that bears here twenty bushels of wheat, another in America which, with the same husbandry, would do the like, a without doubt of the same natural intrinsic value (utility). But yet the benefit that mankind receives from the one in a year is worth five pounds, and from the other possibly not worth a penny, if all the profit an Indian received from it were to be valued and sold here—at least, I may truly say, not one-thousandth. 'Tis labour, then, which puts the greatest part of value upon land, without which it would scarcely be worth anything. 'Tis to that we owe the greatest part of all its useful products; for all that the straw, bran, bread, of that acre of wheat is more worth than the product of an acre of as good land which lies waste, is all the effect of labour. For 'tis not barely the ploughman's pains, the reaper's and thresher's toil, and the baker's sweat, that are to be counted into the bread we eat; the labour of those who broke the oxen, who digged and wrought the iron and stones, who felled and framed the timber about the plough, mill, oven, or any other utensils, which are a vast number, requisite to this corn, from its being sown to its being made bread, must all be charged on the account of labour and received as an effect of that—nature and the earth furnishing only the most worthless materials as in themselves. 'Twould be a strange catalogue of things that industry provided and made use of about every loaf of bread, before it came to our use, if we could trace them. Iron, wood, leather, barks, timber, stone, bricks, coals, lime, cloth, dyeing drugs, pitch, tar, musts, ropes, and all the materials made use of in the ship that brought away the commodities made use of by any of the workmen to any part of the work—all which 'twould be almost impossible, at least too long, to reckon up.—Locke on Civil Government.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK LANE, Monday, May 27.—There was a pretty good supply of English Wheat to this morning's market; the best samples sold at the prices of this day week, but inferior qualities were 1s. cheaper, and the whole was not cleared at the close of the market, though offered at the above decline. The trade in Foreign Wheat was slow at last week's prices. The arrivals of Barley were moderate, all descriptions readily brought an advance of 1s. from this day week. Beans and Peas were very moderate, and trifling quantities of Oats from Ireland were very moderate, and trifling quantities of Irish were fully 6d. dearer, and for the best samples last week's prices were more readily obtained; the few English and Scotch offerings brought high prices.

FRIDAY, May 31.—The supply of English Wheat alone Monday is moderate, 10,950 qrs. of Foreign have arrived during the week. There is not much activity in the trade, but Monday's prices are supported both for English and Foreign. The supply of English Barley is quite trifling and the arrivals of Foreign are moderate. Monday's rates are well maintained for all descriptions. We can have very scantily supplied with English Oats, and the expected arrival of Irish is delayed by unfavourable winds. There is not much left on sale of the late arrivals, and Monday's prices are readily obtained for all descriptions. Beans and Peas scarce, and fully as dear. The duty on Barley rose yesterday to 7s. Rain fell for some hours during Wednesday night in London and the neighbourhood, but none has fallen since, though the weather is frequently gloomy.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 37.]

SATURDAY, JUNE 8, 1844.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive a copy, weekly, of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND, are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

REGISTER, REGISTER, REGISTER!

The Free-Traders qualified to vote must everywhere prepare to enrol themselves and their friends on the register for the NEXT year.

To entitle a voter to be registered, he must have occupied during the twelve months previous to the 31st of July, premises of the value of £10 a year. He must have been rated for twelve months to the relief of the poor.

He must have paid, on or before the 20th of July, all poor-rates and assessed taxes due to the 6th of April preceding.

Further information and directions will be furnished on application, personally or by letter, to the Local Registration Societies; to Mr. Sidney Smith, 68, Cheapside, London; or to Mr. Hickin, League Offices, Newall's Buildings, Manchester.

For the convenience of individuals whose avocations render it difficult for them to call at the Registration Office, 68, Cheapside, during business hours, arrangements have been made by which attendance will be given every evening at that office until eight o'clock, to fill up and serve claims, and to supply every information relative to Parliamentary registration for counties, cities, and boroughs.

THE LEAGUE, ITS OBJECT AND ITS NECESSITY.

Every great measure of reform is resisted by a powerful and organized body, for all who have an interest in the maintenance of abuse are banded together by the mere fact of participation in profit. Selfishness gives supporters to the cause, and the desire of gain secures discipline. When we look back to the history of past times, and see how long several wrongs have been maintained after the injury they wrought to the community had been repeatedly and palpably demonstrated, we shall find that the strength of the wrong-doers consisted in the compactness of their association, which enabled them, though few in number, to show a firm front, and maintain a successful resistance against the isolated and desultory attacks of the friends of truth and justice. In every age monopolists have shown how deeply they are sensible of their union being the chief source of their strength; in every age the advocates of right have lamentably wasted much strength in separate and individual assaults on evil institutions, which could not long have resisted them had they combined their efforts. There have been many exposures of the iniquitous system of the Corn Laws, and some efforts made to procure their modification or removal, but such efforts were laughed at by the nobles and squires; they knew that, while the Free-Traders fought singly and separately, they would have little chance against the phalanx which monopoly had placed in the Legislature. The League was formed because association was necessary as a means for obtaining the great national object—the emancipation of British industry from the fetters and trammals to which it has been unwisely and mischievously subjected. Those who profess themselves friends to Free Trade, and yet feel, or pretend to feel, some dread of an association formed for the sole purpose of getting rid of an iniquitous law, are bound to point out the means by which the repeal of this oppressive statute, without the formation of a League, to give its assailants the same advantages which the monopolists possess in its defence. Do they think that we ought to wait until some unparalleled miracle had given wisdom to the heads and mercy to the hearts of the bread-taxers? We have waited for the greater part of the average time which the laws of nature assign to a generation without seeing any symptom of improved science, or improved humanity, among the monopolists of corn. Are we to look entirely to the progress of intelligence and the development of knowledge in the community? Much as may be expected from such a source, there is an obvious necessity that intelligence should be guided, and knowledge directed, in order to lead to a beneficial result. Monopolists would not be silent if Free-Traders held their tongue; the taxers of bread would not have been idle had those who seek food for the poor folded their arms. "Behold, while men slept, the enemy sowed tares."

The right of association has been always highly valued by the friends of liberty, and always proscribed by despots. Whenever the powerful have resolved to obstruct reform, the means they have adopted have been invariably the suppression of discussion, and the prevention of organization. Hence arises the violence of revolutions in despotic states; men suffering under social evils, pressed down by burdens without understanding their nature or discovering their source, rush with blind fury against all elements of constraint, and run riot in destruction. The League is, and has been, a strictly Conservative association: it has protected our social system from the perils by which it would be menaced if the operative classes were left in ignorance of the nature of those evils which at once limit the field of their employment, and abstract a large portion of their earnings. It was chiefly owing to the League that society escaped dangerous dislocation during the late outbreak in the manufacturing districts; and the existence of the League will be absolutely necessary to the continuance of social order should a perseverance in impolitic legislation expose England to the hazard of another commercial crisis.

Some people speak as if the very name of League had in it something perilous and threatening; they are at liberty to call the body what they please, provided they recognise the principle of a protective association against monopolist aggression. The name, however, is dear to humanity, for it is associated with the remembrance of the noble confederation of the Hanseatic merchants against the aristocratic plunderers who obtained by brute force and open violence that share of the profits of the industrious which modern monopolists attempt to grasp by legislative fraud and artifice. Had not these merchants formed the Hanseatic League, the system of extortion and violence would have run its course unchecked; European commerce would have been reduced to the miserable condition of that of Asia, and civilization would have been driven from this quarter of the globe.

What would be gained if, to gratify those who dislike or pretend to dislike the name of "League," we laid it aside and took that of "Association?" Would they not be reminded of that memorable Association to which the Catholics of Ireland were indebted for their emancipation? The political foresight of Pitt, the nervous eloquence of Grattan, the acute logic of Plunket, the keen wit of Canning, and the combined talent of nearly all the best parliamentary orators of our day were wasted in vain efforts to remove the iniquitous principle of religious exclusion from our constitutional code. But when O'Connell collected the Catholic strength in an Association, he soon succeeded in extorting emancipation from an unwilling Parliament, a hostile Ministry, and a reluctant Sovereign.

The means by which religious exclusion was overthrown are a precedent to guide us in our great struggle for the removal of commercial restrictions. Such means are the more necessary because the various monopolies have already organized Leagues to protect their selfish interests. There is a League of Canada merchants to protect the timber monopoly; of West India proprietors, aided by their co-partners of the East, to protect their darling sugar monopoly; and there is also the Monster League of all, falsely calling itself the agricultural interest, to protect the corn monopoly. These are just as independent of the Government, and just as likely to interfere with the course of administration, as the Anti-Corn-Law League. In point of fact, they have often so interfered, and have mischievously dictated to the Government and forced measures upon the Cabinet against the will and opinions of the Ministry. There has been scarcely one Prime Minister for the last thirty years who has not been an avowed advocate of Free-Trade principles, but has been prevented from acting upon them by the leagues of monopolists, who threatened to withdraw parliamentary support if any attempt was made to diminish their privilege of extortion. On such occasions, Ministers have had to succumb to a League of Leagues: the sugar-jobber joined the corn-jobber, and the timber-jobber stood ready to lend them assistance; the commercial boons which the Government was prepared to offer to the country were thus obliged to be withheld, because there was no organized body in favour of Free Trade on which the Minister could fall back for support. The commercial policy of unshackled industry was advocated by Lord Shelburne in 1783,—his arguments were felt to be unanswerable, his principles were as fully recognised then as the principles of common sense as they are now by the existing Cabinet; Pitt preceded Peel in declaring that it was the obvious policy of a commercial nation to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market; Lord Liverpool was as firmly convinced as Mr. Huskisson or Lord Sydenham of the impolicy of restrictions on commerce and fetters on industry: had there been a Free-Trade League they would have given effect to their wise economy; but because such a body was wanting, they were obliged to give way to the formidable league of monopoly, to the borough-mongers of the towns, and the slave-drivers of the counties. Small as the modifications in monopoly are which Sir Robert Peel has made, there is not a man in the country who does not feel that he never could have carried them into effect but for the direct support given him by the League, and the indirect assistance he has derived from its moral influence in the country. Dread of the League drove monopoly into its citadel, and thus facilitated the conquest of the outposts by the Minister. Without the League Sir Robert would never have ventured to touch the West India monopoly, or despise the remonstrances of the Duke of Richmond against the removal of the wool-duties.

It is a convenient excuse for selfishness to pretend sound faith in the end and quarrel with the means. Hostility to the League is a ready plea for excusing the hypocrisy which recognises the justice of Free Trade, but pockets the profits of monopoly. There are more Free-Traders in the abstract than Mr. Thomas Baring. They are like Christians in the abstract: they profess the creed, but they keep not the commandments. We prefer open enemies to such pretended friends. If Free Trade be confessed to be an act of justice, of sound policy, and of vital importance to the country, the association formed to gain the object must command the support of all who are honest and sincere in the cause. Abuse of the League by pretended Free-Traders is a mere cloak for selfishness, a specious pretext for avarice, and an excuse for a secret wish to preserve the profits of monopoly, and share in its unhallowed gains.

THE ANTI-SLAVERY COMMITTEE AND THE SUGAR QUESTION.

The meeting of the subscribers to the Anti-Slavery Society, alluded to in our last number, was held in the small room, Exeter Hall, on Monday last. As a meeting representing any important part of the anti-slavery public it was a ludicrous failure, not more than ninety persons being present, including several ladies and some very young persons, and these, for the most part, were members of the Society of Friends, intimate connexions, and a large number of them personal friends or relatives of the New Broad-street Committee. Of course, in such an assembly, an opinion adverse to that of the committee was not likely to find much favour. The policy of the Committee on the sugar question was approved, and the gentlemen who compose it seemed somewhat consoled that opinions utterly rejected by the thousands assembled in the great hall at their annual meeting should have found adherents in the snug family gathering to which they were on this occasion submitted. A facetious friend of ours, who observed the parties entering the room, remarked that "it was a nice little Tottenham meeting," and the family compact was so complete that argument fell utterly harmless upon minds more disposed to be led by others than to examine the question for themselves. We are curious to see what the Committee will say on the matter; much exultation will be sorely out of place; they could scarcely have a smaller egg to cackle over. It remains in the public mind that a meeting of at least 4000 persons, the very strength of the anti-slavery public, at the annual meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society, condemned, by a very large majority, the mistaken policy which the Committee has pursued. In the settlement of the question of the Sugar Monopoly, we suspect the Committee will for the future have small influence; our only fear is that their readiness to furnish weapons to the abettors of one of the foulest monopolies which ever existed will shake the confidence which many have been disposed to place in them, and will impair their influence to work out the liberation of the slave.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

Seventeenth Week, ending Saturday, June 8.

The week opened auspiciously in Parliament for FREE TRADE. On Monday both Houses were occupied, not merely in discussing, but in voting, for farther reductions in our Import Duties; and as every step, however slow, or however tortuous, evidences the irresistible tendency of our commercial legislation towards the realisation of the grand object which the Anti-Corn-Law League has in view, we may congratulate our readers on the significant symptoms of vitality which the Question is exhibiting in the Legislature.

The third and final reading of the Customs' Bill took place on Monday night in the House of Lords; and as this is the bill by which the Government repeal the wool duty, and effect the other small reductions on currants, vinegar, &c., it gave rise to some amusing debate. Previous to its coming on, Lord Kinnaird reminded the Duke of Richmond of his assertion that the tariff had struck off £2000 a year from the rent of his Scotch salmon fisheries, and asked how that could be, seeing that only about 800 cwt. of foreign salmon had been brought into this country since the tariff was passed. He coupled this with some allusions to the appointment of the Duke's brother, Lord Arthur Lennox, as a lord of the Treasury, and asked if the threatened opposition to the repeal of the wool duty was abandoned.

The Duke of Richmond was rather sulky in his reply. The appointment of his brother would not, he said, "gag" his mouth, or deprive him of his independence. Yet somehow or other he seems obliged to confess that Sir Robert Peel has got the upper hand of him, and that if the Government were resolute enough to go further in the straight road, the boasted dual power of making and unmaking Prime Ministers would be found but an impotent vaunt. Amongst various things uttered by the Duke was his disclaimer of being the leader of the agricultural party, as well as his inoperative disapproval of the successive steps taken in the direction of Free Trade by the Government; nor was it one of the least noticeable things in the discussion on the passing of this Customs Bill, that while Lord Wharncliffe was professing himself a fast friend to the agricultural interest, he was obliged to admit to the Earl of Radnor a great Free-Trade principle, having a far wider application than the limited reference to the case of wool. While Lord Wharncliffe was speaking, the Earl of Radnor interposed this most important remark, that "In the years when the importation of foreign wool is largest, the price of the native article is highest," to which Lord Wharncliffe replied, "That, he believed, was the state of the case." We hope our readers see the pith of this remark, and the importance of the admission, for we firmly believe that in this great commercial country, with a perfect system of Free Trade, the same result would take place in the case of corn. Certain folks in male attire, but who, if properly dressed, would appear as old women in petticoats, are in the habit of screeching out, "How inconsistent Mr. Cobden is! He wants Free Trade to make corn cheap, and yet sometimes he says that Free Trade will make corn dear." Let these venerable people rest assured that Free Trade will enable the community permanently to thrive; that a permanently thriving community is a far better consumer than one exposed to the fitful alternations of abundance and scarcity, high prices, middling prices, and low prices; and that in such a community—consuming largely, buying largely, industrious, active, and enterprising—there is a far better chance of a steady remunerating profit, than in one where prices are at one time unnaturally high, and at another unnaturally low. But our protectionists treat the people as the Irishman treated his pig: he fed it one day, and starved it the next, in order, as he fancied, that he might have a streak of fat and a streak of lean alternately.

It is refreshing to see the Earl of Radnor, in his green old age, ever in his place in the House of Lords whenever any measure is to be discussed affecting the rights of the people; and it must have been as refreshing to him to hear, on Monday night, how near an approach to Free-Trade principles was made by the young Earl of Dalhousie, Vice-President of the Board of Trade.

But it was in the House of Commons, on Monday night, that there was evinced still more the progress of Free-Trade principles. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a speech of some length, stated the intentions of the Government with respect to the SUGAR DUTIES; and in doing so, laid down, officially, authoritatively, and broadly, the great Free-Trade principle, which requires that the community shall have access to a sufficient supply of all essential articles. Here is the principle in his own words: it is very true as applied to SUGAR, it would be exceedingly true as applied to CORN. "On one point," said the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "he expected the unanimous concurrence of the House, and that was as to the importance of securing for this country a sufficient supply of an article which, once a luxury, had now become almost a necessary of life, the supply of which, as conducive to the health and the comfort of the people, had been admitted on all hands to be an object of very chief importance. The securing for the people, then, this essential article in sufficient supply was a subject on which there would be no difference of opinion. When he considered the increase which had taken place in the price of the article, amounting to no less than 2s. per cwt. in the course of last year, he had thought it his duty to submit a measure which should provide not merely for the supply required for the consumption of the country, but also to create something of a surplus."

The plan of the Government is now known to every one. At present all foreign-grown sugar is kept out of consumption in this country by a high prohibitory duty, amounting to 63s., while the sugar of our colonies comes in on payment of a duty of 24s. The Government feel this prohibition to be utterly wrong—a gross injustice, as well as a great mischief—and, therefore, they wish to remove it. But having come into office on the plea of due consideration for West India interests, and a great zeal against slavery, they declare that, in consistency, they cannot admit foreign sugar on precisely the same terms as colonial, nor permit the introduction of slave-grown sugar. They, therefore, propose to admit free-grown foreign sugar at a differential duty of 10s.: that is, while West Indian or colonial comes in at 24s., free-grown foreign may come in at 34s. This is to take effect from November next; at that time our treaty with the Brazils expires; we shall no longer be under the necessity of admitting its produce on the terms of "the most favoured nations," and are, therefore, free to open our ports to the sugar of free-labour countries.

Bearing in mind that this measure comes from a monopolist Government, it is a great step towards Free Trade. We may mourn over the want of straight-forwardness which plays with principles, half admitting, half denying them, and brings in measures which are neither one thing nor another, but which, in relation to consistency or even common sense, look as ridiculous as a lawyer's wig stuck over with roses and lilies. Still, be it remembered, by this measure the sugar monopoly is broken in upon preparatory to its overthrow; and that cannot take place without the corn monopoly ultimately following.

The proposition is, to permit sugar from Java, from the Philippine Islands, and from China to be admitted at a duty of 34s. What amount of sugar may yet come from China is at present quite unknown; but it is, at all events, an important article to be added to the list of our imports from that great country. There is likely, however, to be no inconsiderable quantity from the Philippine Islands, which constitute a portion of the Indian Archipelago. Since the Spanish colonies in America have obtained their independence, the commerce of Manila, the capital, has been rapidly extending, in consequence of the opening of the trade to all commercial nations; and sugar is one of the articles of export which exhibit the greatest increase. In addition to the countries which are to be included, at present, it is intimated that the great empire of Siam may hereafter also have the permission of sending its sugar directly to this country. Mr. Gladstone told the House that the information of the Government was not sufficiently explicit as to whether or not slavery existed in Siam, and therefore that country remains over for future consideration. But it seems exceedingly unlikely that we will have to wait for that permission, before we receive Siamese sugar. The sugar cane has been grown in Siam from time immemorial, but only for the internal consumption of the country. But about the year 1812 some Chinese began to cultivate it on an extensive scale, finding a ready market for the production in their own country; and so rapidly did this trade increase, that in ten years from its creation upwards of 8,000,000 pounds of Siamese sugar were annually exported to China, the western parts of Hindostan, Persia, Arabia, and Europe. Now, if China itself do not supply enough of sugar to meet the demand from this country, the Chinese are knowing enough, enterprising enough, and industrious enough, to extend the cultivation of Siamese sugar, carrying it to China, and sending it to Great Britain with a certificate that it is the produce of the "celestial" or "flowery" land. It is stated that the cultivators of the cane of Siam are always Siamese, but that the manufacturers of the sugar are invariably Chinese.

The debate which followed the speech and the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not very animated, because only one portion of the question was discussed, the other views of it being held over for future discussion at subsequent stages of the measure. There were three notices of amendments to the Government proposition. First, there was one by Lord John Russell, the object of which was to overlook all considerations of slave-grown and free-grown, and to admit all foreign sugars at the same rate of differential duty. Then, Mr. Philip Miles, the member for Bristol, proposes to admit colonial sugar at 20s. instead of 24s., the object being to raise the protection proposed to be left to the West Indies, or, in other words, to make the differential duty fourteen instead of ten shillings. Again, Mr. Ewart would abolish the differential duty, and admit all sugars, foreign and colonial, at the same rate. Only the first of these amendments was discussed on Monday night—that of Lord John Russell—the others remain for future debate. Mr. Ewart's will come on on Monday, that being the day fixed for the committee on the bill.

Lord John Russell made an excellent Free-Trade speech in proposing his amendment, but his practice fell short of his principle, for by admitting that the West Indians still required the aid of a differential duty, he gives his countenance to protection. But his arguments in favour of freedom of commerce were excellent, and delivered with great vivacity and spirit. His ridicule of the distinctive principle between slave-grown and free-grown was happy; telling the Government that they were erecting a pulpit in every custom-house, and making their landing-waiters preachers of anti-slavery doctrines; and censuring them for departing from the commercial principle for the mere sake of bolstering up the consistency of the Cabinet.

Mr. Gladstone, in reply, was tamer than ever we heard him. Usually he is uncommonly fluent, and never pauses for a word, even if he should lack an argument; but on Monday he seemed to lack not merely arguments, but words. He frequently paused, seemed to hesitate as if he had not got his speech off by heart, and was trying to recollect it; and spoke in a tame, unimpassioned, embarrassed way, as if his heart and his head were holding an internal controversy. He made, however, one very important admission. The West Indies could not, he thought, be restored to a healthy state for twenty years to come, even if the old sugar duties were continued, giving them the exclusive possession of the English market; and he very plainly intimated that it was impossible for the people of this country to be deprived of the use of foreign sugar until it should please the West India monopolists to say that they could afford to withstand foreign competition. If they grumbled, let them recollect that the Government, for their sakes, was imposing a duty of 10s. 6d. on foreign sugar, equal to fifty per cent. to be paid by the British consumer to the West Indian interest, on an article now become all but a necessary of life; and was this, he significantly asked, nothing? The Government had done all for the West Indies which they had any right to expect, consistently with what was due to the interests of the great consuming community; and for his part he would not have consented to laying so heavy a tax as fifty per cent. on sugar, if the matter were merely one of revenue. Sentiments like these, coming from members of the Government, are signs of progress.

Lord John Russell's amendment was defeated by 197 to 128, making a majority of 69.

On Tuesday night there was a lively debate on the subject of the export duty on coals, which was imposed in 1842. That this export duty is injurious, there seems no reason to doubt; and the benefit which the revenue derives from the tax is too trifling to be put into consideration with it. At the same time, those gigantic monopolists, the coalowners, did not escape. The system by which, through the means of a formidable combination, they limit the quantity of coal raised from the pits, and keep back cargoes from being delivered in London, in order that the supply may be diminished and the price kept up, was exposed; and the fact was once more brought before the public that the coal combination compels the people of London to pay from 25s. and 26s. to 30s. and 32s. a ton for the same coal which the foreigner can get from the same pits at 15s. It is well thus to bring public opinion to bear upon these things. Hitherto the producer has had almost a monopoly of parliamentary attention. Now, the consumer comes in for some consideration. There is, however, this difference:—the Producer clamours for acts of Parliament; but the Consumer only asks it to take its hands off—to leave him to buy where he can and how he can; and, in the long run, he will take better care of himself than all the Parliaments in the world.

MEETINGS.

WEEKLY METROPOLITAN AGGREGATE MEETING OF THE LEAGUE.

The weekly meeting of the League was held on Wednesday last at Covent-garden Theatre. The house was crowded in every part by a highly respectable audience. Mr. George Wilson in the chair. The reception of the chairman was most enthusiastic, the audience rising and greeting his re-appearance with several rounds of applause.

Among the noblemen and gentlemen present were—George Wilson, Esq., in the chair; the Earl of Radnor; Hon. Edward Pleydell Bouverie, M.P.; Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; Thomas Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P.; Benjamin Smith, Esq., M.P.; General Briggs; Colonel Tucker; W. Ackroyd, Esq., of Otley; Dr. Cooke Taylor; Dr. Epps; George Thompson, Esq.; Robert R. Moore, Esq.; Provost Henderson, Paisley; Baile Murray, Paisley; Messrs. W. A. Wilkinson, P. A. Taylor, J. Booth (Rochdale), S. D. Driver, H. R. Stainton, Charles Tye (Manchester), W. Thornborough, H. Day, Wm. Lockett (Salford), John Kay (Salford), H. Franklin, H. White, W. G. Gower, Wm. Austin, Alexander Carruthers (Macclesfield), J. Coulthard, H. H. Stansfeld (Leeds), T. E. Ward (Sheffield), J. Moir Ware, R. Palmer, J. P. Burnard, J. Ridge, J. Granger, W. P. Longdill, W. Macmillan, — Caddell, — Eversley, Wm. Cunningham (Devizes), W. Butterworth (Rochdale), — Felch, — Gessin, G. Aldeney (Baling), T. Alleney, P. Stuart (Liverpool), Charles Horsley, W. D. Starling, W. M. Wardon, Charles Marshall, &c.

The minutes of the previous meeting having been read by Mr. Saul, upon the motion of J. Bright, Esq., M.P., seconded by W. Ackroyd, Esq., of Otley, they were unanimously confirmed.

The CHAIRMAN then advanced to the table amidst enthusiastic cheers, accompanied by waving of hats and handkerchiefs. Silence having been restored, he proceeded to address the meeting as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, you have had such a number of distinguished individuals occupying the chair, and presiding over your meetings since I last had the honour of appearing before you, that an humble instrument, and a fellow-labourer in the cause like myself, may feel some little trepidation in again assuming an office, the duties of which have been so much more ably and appropriately discharged by the noble lords and honourable gentlemen who have from week to week supplied my place. (Cries of "No, no.") If we are to take for granted what the monopolists and their press are stating, from day to day, it will not be of very much consequence who takes part in the proceedings of these meetings in a very short time. (Hear, hear.) If we may believe what they state, the League, if not quite extinct, is on the very verge of dissolution. (Laughter.) Its treasury, it is said, is exhausted, its candidates have been defeated, and, in every respect, it is a very different body from what it formerly was, and in a very short time will only be talked of as a thing of yesterday. (Renewed laughter.) Now, gentlemen, it may be presumption in me for a moment to call in question such great authorities on this subject; but I confess, upon a careful inspection of our position, I can discover no reason for believing that we have not gained ground—and material ground—since I last had the pleasure of attending one of the metropolitan League meetings. (Hear.) It is quite true we may not have as much money in our treasurer's possession as will be necessary to carry on the war against monopoly till it is completely humbled; but still we have more in hand now than all the Protection Societies have ever had, or will receive for the next twelve months. (Cheers.) We may not have carried every election in the counties and close boroughs; and yet we may bring abundant evidence to show that in three instances out of four where an election has been lost, it has been attended with most beneficial results, and the League has left traces on record and influences at work which promise future victory at the next general election. Gentlemen, South Lancashire is no exception to this rule. What are the facts connected with that contest? At the election in 1837, which was a party conflict, two monopolists were returned to Parliament; at the general election in 1841 no one could be found to contest the county on Liberal principles. What is the case now? There are ten polling districts, and that division of the county; in six of them we have now a majority. In the general election in 1837 we had only majorities in two out of the six; in the whole six in 1837 the Liberals were in a minority of about 200 votes; at this election in those six polling districts we have a majority of 800 at the poll (cheers), evidencing a change of opinion to the extent of 1000 upon the registration as compared with the election of 1837. In addition to this great advantage, in three out of the four remaining polling districts we have greatly reduced their majority as compared with what it was in 1837, and in Ormskirk, the only district in which they have increased their numbers—and that a purely agricultural locality, entirely removed from the influence of trade—the voters have not changed their opinions, but merely their owners; the property which used to qualify for votes on the Liberal interest having been transferred to an individual in the monopolist interest, so that the same tenants who voted in 1837 for the Liberals have polled this time for the monopolist candidate; in fact, they are so completely under the domination of the landlord, that if the steward had gone to the returning officer with the poll-book in his hand, and told that functionary to write off the names of the voters, without going through the farce of an election, the thing could not have been more completely managed than it has been this time. But, gentlemen, let us turn from South Lancashire to Kilmarnock. What will the monopolists say to the election which has recently taken place there? It is quite true the League has lost, by death, one of its oldest supporters in the late member for that borough, and that in the House of Commons our friend Mr. Bouverie will only give a vote for Free Trade, as Mr. Alexander Johnston did before him. But in the election for 1841 Mr. Johnston, the Free-Trade candidate, was only returned, after a very severe contest, by a majority of eleven votes over his opponent; at this election we have had two Free-Trade candidates in the field, and notwithstanding that disadvantage at the poll, by which the monopolist expected to slip in between them, Mr. Bouverie has been returned by a majority of ten over the monopolist candidate. Now, as Mr. Vincent, the other Free-Trade candidate, polled 98 votes, the clear Free-Trade majority, which was only 11 at the last election, has been increased to 108 on the present occasion. I might go over other grounds to show the progress which has been made in our cause. We wanted this contest in South Lancashire in order that we might test and know our strength preparatory to a general election. We have torn down the monopolist flag in six out of the ten polling places in that county; we have lowered their colours in three of the remaining districts, and I have no doubt that, at the next general election, we shall find that we have cleared the decks and shall return two Free-Traders to Parliament. (Loud cheers.) But let the monopolists rejoice over their victories, and talk to us of defeat as they think proper;—let them remind us of Hastings, Exeter, Salisbury, and South Lancashire if they please;—our reply is, Nottingham, Durham, Kilmarnock, Kendal, and though last, not least, London (loud cheers); which several victories I take to be more than a receipt in full of all demands which the monopolists may have upon the League. There are other proofs of the progress of Free Trade which I might refer to. Memorials are now being numerously signed by the constituencies, and presented to the various members of the cities and boroughs of this country, soliciting their support in favour of the total abolition of the Corn Laws when Mr. Villiers should bring forward his motion in the House of Commons upon that subject during the present session. (Hear.) These memorials have not been got up with a view of awing those members of Parliament, but merely to convey the special yet strong request of the constituencies that their members, without reference to party, should support Mr. Villiers's motion in the House of Commons. (Cheers.) Take, for example, the case of Leeds. In 1841 that borough returned to Parliament one Monopolist and one Free-Trader, the former being at the head of the poll. Upon that occasion the Monopolists polled 2076 votes; but the electors of Leeds during the present year have presented to that Monopolist member and his colleague a memorial requesting them to vote for Mr. Villiers, signed by 2700 votes, or an actual majority of persons upon the register who are qualified to vote of 521, and numbering 700 more than polled for the highest candidate at the last election. (Loud cheers.) I could refer you to a number of other cities and boroughs where the results have been equally as satisfactory as in Leeds. In Falkirk, for instance, a borough which is represented by Mr. Baird, a Conservative, there are 1000 persons upon the register: 700 out of the 1000 who returned the Conservative to Parliament have requested that gentleman to vote for Mr. Villiers whenever he may bring on his motion. (Cheers.) Great Yarmouth, Bradford in Yorkshire, Huddersfield, and other places give us similar results, which I need not now detain you by repeating. We know that no great principle ever yet, amidst all the strife of party and the animosities and struggles through which it has to be carried, failed to be triumphant. At least we know that the right of every man to exchange the produce of his labour and industry wherever he thinks proper for whatever the markets of the world may give him in return, is a just and great principle, and must ultimately be recognised both on the hustings and in Parliament. (Great cheering.) I have now, ladies and gentlemen, great pleasure in introducing the Hon. Edward Bouverie, M.P. for Kilmarnock, to the meeting.

The hon. gentleman then advanced, and was received with three distinct rounds of applause. He spoke as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I thank you for the cheers with which you have greeted me, not that I take those cheers to myself personally, but because I look upon them as a tribute of your gratitude and of your sympathy with those Free-Traders in the sister country of Scotland who, in spite of the division which might have let in a Monopolist, have returned, I may say I think confidently, a good Free-Trader to Parliament. (Immense applause.) And allow me to say, gentlemen, that the opinion of a constituency like Kilmarnock is, perhaps, a far better test of public opinion—a far better test of the feeling of this country, and of the independent judgment of the constituencies of the country than the result of such an election as that of South Lancashire, or the result of such an election as that which I have myself fought twice upon one ground—I mean the election of Salisbury (great cheering); and I say so for this reason, that in the counties of England, and in many of the boroughs connected with the agricultural districts in England, the expression of the opinion of the constituencies is not the honest and real expression of their opinion, but it is an expression of the opinion of those who have a majority now in the House of Commons, and who will continue to have a majority, unless the people are determined to get what they want, and what, if they are determined to obtain, they certainly will have. (Loud cheers.) I have had nothing at Kilmarnock, as I have had at Salisbury, of voters saying to me, "We wish you well, Sir; we agree with your opinions; we think Free Trade ought to be carried; we believe the Corn Laws to be unjust, but we cannot vote for you." I have had, I say, nothing of that kind at Kilmarnock. (Loud cheers.) There are no squires, or squire's ladies, to drive into the town there, and tell the tradesmen that they must vote this way or that way, and not as they please themselves (cheers); but there are honest, hard-working, intelligent weavers—men who think and who act for themselves, and who vote according to the best of their judgment; and I think I may fairly say, that the universal opinion amongst that class—and a very intelligent and a very superior class they are in Scotland—is, as all you think, that the Corn Law is a crying evil, and, as such, ought at once to be repealed. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, it is too true, however, and the result of the South Lancashire election proves it to a certainty, that the battle of Free Trade is not yet fought to victory. Much remains to be done, and much, I believe, that is not to be obtained from the present House of Commons. (Great cheering.) When last I addressed a meeting here it was upon the eve of the meeting of Parliament, and I endeavoured to conjecture, and ventured even to prophesy, that there would be but little done upon the part of the House of Commons, when it met, to advance those principles for which you meet here weekly to contend, and in which I may safely say that the heart of by far the greatest portion of the population of this country is embarked. (Great applause.) Now, if we look back at the three months that have passed since that period, I think it will be seen that I was no bad prophet. (Cheers.) We have had, first of all, Mr. Cobden's motion. Mr. Cobden moved for a committee to inquire into the advantages of protection to agriculturists, to farmers, and to labourers; and one would think that those gentlemen who take such an active part in maintaining the Corn Laws, who advertised themselves as the "farmers' friends," who set themselves forth as the agriculturists of this country (but who are no more agriculturists than any one of you, because they are merely the possessors of the land and have nothing whatever to do with the tillage of it)—one would think, I say, that those persons would have been too glad of an opportunity to show to the country at large, and to those classes whom they say they represent, the advantages of those laws, which they so strenuously maintain and uphold, to be not for their own benefit but for the benefit of those very classes. (Great applause and laughter.) It signifies nothing from what quarter the offer comes, whether it comes from Mr. Cobden or from the Duke of Buckingham; but the opportunity was offered them of having an inquiry into those advantages. And what did they do? Why, they refused it, and said "We will have no inquiry." (Cheers.) And they were right in doing so, because they knew if an inquiry took place that it would show the absurdity, the futility of those doctrines which they put forward; that it would show that protection was a delusion; that it would show that protection was no benefit to those classes themselves; that it would show that it was a plunder upon the public at large (loud cheers); and therefore it was that they refused it: "ignorance was bliss; they loved darkness better than light; they dreaded the light because their deeds were evil. (Loud cheers.) Well, gentlemen, there has been another measure which to a certain extent has tested the sympathy of the House of Commons with the wants of the people in this respect. I allude to the Factories Bill (cheers); and what do we find there? We find a majority in the House of Commons affecting a sympathy with the wants of the labouring classes, voting in support of a proposition which declared that the people of this country were overworked; that they did more than was consistent with the health either of their bodies or their souls; that their children were overworked; that their wives were overworked; and, therefore, that there ought to be a law to limit the hours of labour. Why, gentlemen, that very majority is the majority which maintains the law that compels those people to work so much for their very existence—the Corn Law. (Loud cheers.) It is the Corn Law which says, "You shall not have the same means of subsistence that you might have if the trade in corn was free;" it is the Corn Law that says "the means of employment to the people shall be less than it might be;" and it is the Corn Law, therefore, which grinds those who have to toil with the sweat of their brows for their daily bread, and which compels them, if they would win their hard-earned subsistence, to exert themselves beyond their strength, and to perform an amount of labour utterly at variance with their continuance in prosperity, in health, and in good condition. (Cheers.) But that is not all. The majority which voted for the proposition with an affected (for I think I may fairly call it affected) sympathy for the wants and sufferings of the working classes—why, what did they do? (Cheers.) The very moment that the Ministry declared that the proposition which they brought forward was one upon which they must stand or fall, that sympathy disappeared altogether. (Hear, hear.) It was no longer a question of the wants and sufferings of the working classes, but, looking merely to the continuance of a set of men in power, they cast away that sympathy, and again voted by a majority that what they had before called black was now white. (Loud cheers.) But we have had also some alteration in the duties affecting the articles of consumption in this country—there have been some little, faltering steps taken in the right road—some attempt to curry favour with those who maintain Free Trade to be the right, and proper, and just principle of commercial legislation. But where are the monster evils? (Cheers.) Have they been touched at all? It is merely little insignificant matters—it is the tithe of mint and rue and not weighty matters that have been touched upon on this occasion. (Cheers.) The people should say to the House of Commons, "These ought ye to have done, but not to have left the others undone." (Cheers.) We have had an alteration in the duty upon currants—I congratulate the lovers of pudding and of cake upon that reduction in their current expenses. (Great cheers and great laughter.) But there are other ingredients in pudding and cake, as I believe; I think flour is an essential one (loud cheers), and that is the much more important ingredient of the two, and a much more important matter, because many people may be affected by the tax upon flour who never dream of puddings or cakes from one year's end to the other. (Cheers.) Then, I believe, to make a pudding good, sugar is required. (Cheers.) True, there has been an alteration in the sugar duties of late, but is it an alteration in the right direction? No; it is an alteration that leaves the matter very much in the position that it was in before. To a very slight extent it may be beneficial; but one of the certain results of that alteration will be, if any of the sugar which is to come from foreign countries is sold at all, that upon all the sugar imported from our own colonies there will be a tax of 10s. per cwt., amounting to about two millions a year, paid by the people of this country, not into the Treasury for their own benefit, but paid for the benefit of those who have the sugar monopoly, and who maintain and support it by the present majority of the House of Commons. (Cheers.) For this reason it is that I say the alteration in the sugar duties is not one in the right path; upon this account I say that it is fallacious, and for this reason I say we had better have had no such change. To a certain extent this is a change of the law, but every such change ties up the question for a period, and those who opposed the alteration are driven to consent to the change, and then they make up their minds to a stout resistance to any future change. If the law were changed at all, that change might as well have been based upon right principles. (Cheers.) I will not detain you by adverting to the question which has been raised with respect to the nonsensical distinction between slave-grown produce and the produce of countries where labour is free. That fallacy has been often reverted to, and successfully refuted in this place, and it is one for which there is a very complete answer, viz., that even if there are some benevolent individuals who think that a distinction should be made, yet it is out of the question to make it practically. (Cheers.) We cannot do it, and we had better not pretend to act upon it—we shall only boggle the matter and make a mess of it. (Cheers and laughter.) But if that is to be the principle on which we are to act, where are we to stop? (Hear, hear.) If we are to inquire into the social, moral, and political condition of every people from whom we receive commercial produce, where shall we draw the line? (Cheers.) A great portion of the wheat, for example, that comes in under the present law (and there would be much more if that law were repealed) comes from a country where slavery to a great extent exists—I mean from Russia. (Loud cheers, and a few hisses.) Really I am quite surprised that these protection societies, who seem to beat about the world for arguments, and at last concoct such bad ones, have not laid hold of this, and told us that, if we admitted corn free, we admitted slave produce. "Why, that is very bad morally; how can you think of it: let us have the Corn Law to keep out Russian corn." (Loud cheers.) But we need not stop there even; why should we limit it to the question of sugar alone? It is only an evil as concerns the degradation and moral condition of the people, and surely in almost every country with which we have commercial dealings the labouring classes are in a degraded moral condition. I do not know even that we should stop with foreign countries—I do not know that there is not a country no very great distance from here—a sister country—(great cheering)—having a very large population—a population of industrious people, but who, if all accounts are to be believed, are, generally speaking, in a very degraded physical and moral condition. (Cheers.) I have lately been reading the work of an intelligent traveller upon this subject, and he says, though he has visited the poorest classes in Poland and Livonia, where the peasants are in the greatest distress, that he never found anything there to be compared with the misery which he met with in Ireland. (Cheers.) So, I suppose, that these protection folks, when they have got us to exclude Russian wheat, will likewise come and say we must shut out Irish corn, and Irish cattle, and Irish oatmeal, and, perhaps, even the Irish people. (Great cheers and laughter.) Therefore it is, gentlemen, that I think the proposition about the distinction between slave-grown and free-grown produce is perfectly absurd. The public should not be imposed upon by it. It made a very good party agitation some years ago, when those now in power were in opposition, and were looking for some debatable objection to those then holding the reins of government, and who brought forward some proposition for an alteration in the sugar duties; really the consistency of the present party in power is such a rag that they cannot afford to part with the slightest portion of it, and have, therefore, stuck to this proposition; but the distinction is so absurd that I am sure the people of this country will never for a moment admit of its reasonableness or its truth. (Cheers.) Well, gentlemen, I think there is no denying that I was a true prophet. (Cheers.) I said much was not to be got this session from the House of Commons in the cause of Free Trade, and I do not think much has been, or will be, got. (Cheers.) But there remains in your hands the question that is still to be solved, "How long will the people of this country submit to the existence of laws which they know to be not merely not for their benefit, but to be absolutely injurious to them, to be pressing upon their industry, and to be crushing them for the advantage of a small portion of the community?" (Cheers.) That is the question, and we cannot stop where we are. (Cheers.) This you may be assured of, that this country has risen to great power and great eminence as a commercial and manufacturing country, but yet "progress" is the great law written in its history, and we have come to the limit of our tether under the present system of restriction: unless, then, we get Free Trade, we shall go back instead of standing where we are, to the great injury of the people of this country. (Cheers.) It is commerce and manufactures which have placed us in the position which we now occupy as a great country; it is commerce which has created this great city; it is commerce which has filled our ports with shipping and called into existence numberless flourishing towns over the whole surface of the country; and if that commerce departs from us, if that trade leaves us, or if those manufactures are destroyed, where are we to look for subsistence for the great portion of our population? (Loud cheers.) It is not merely the soil, as the protection folks would lead you to suppose, which is the great source of prosperity to the country. If it were merely that, and we had never had trade or commerce at all to enable us to bring in foreign productions and to give a spur to our industry and to our manufacturing skill, we should have remained just like our ancestors, the ancient Britons, clothed in skins and our bodies painted blue. (Cheers and laughter.) But that is not the case; and if we want to flourish again—to see everybody well employed; to see everybody who is willing to work hard for the maintenance of himself and family fully employed and able to obtain a subsistence—we must have Free Trade, or else we shall go backwards and downwards instead of forwards; and we shall see misery and “rebellion.” I was going to say, because “rebellion of the belly” is the worst of all rebellions (cheers); we shall see that misery and suffering and lawlessness will be the inevitable consequences. (Loud cheers.) Now, this is simply what the people of this country have to contemplate. They must solve the question whether we are to have Free Trade or not. Their voice—if they express it loudly, yet peaceably, firmly, yet legally—must ultimately be obeyed. I have no doubt that prosperity shall revisit our shores, and that we shall not be clothed in skins this time or reduced again to paint our bodies blue. (Great cheering, and a laugh.) I believe most sincerely that we shall have a greater continuance of happiness and prosperity amongst the commercial and manufacturing classes, which, reacting upon the agricultural classes, will cause a greater continuance of prosperity amongst them also than has ever been known in past times. (Great applause.) But those gentlemen in the present Ministry, some of whom affect to be Free Traders, have no faith in their principle, that great principle being that the operation of Free Trade is beneficial to all, and that it is not required to protect this class in opposition to that class, but that if the principle were once carried out, prosperity to all would at the same time be the result. (Cheers.) That is the great and general principle, and though those people have no faith in it themselves, there have been, in past times, Ministers who have had: Mr. Huskisson had faith in it, and he showed it and tried it (cheers); and before I sit down I will, with your leave, just give you a proof of it. (Cheers.) With reference to the silk trade, that great commercial Minister altered the duties upon silk, and allowed the importation of raw silk at lower duties, whilst he also admitted the importation of manufactured silk, which had heretofore been prohibited. That change was effected in 1825, and, at the time, he was told that he had ruined all the silk trade of this country, that the ladies would be dressed in French silk, that we should have nothing but French silk pocket handkerchiefs, and a lot of nonsense of that sort. But what was the result? Why, in 1840, it was given in evidence before the House of Commons, that, in Manchester alone, where there had, previous to the alteration in the duties, been only 3000 persons employed in the manufacture of silk, there were, at that time, 30,000; that where there had been only 10 silk factories, there were then 30; that where there had been not above £450,000 worth of goods turned out, there were then £1,600,000 worth. (Great cheering.) That, perhaps, was good evidence of what the working out of the principle might be expected to lead to. Mr. Huskisson had full faith in the principle, and, had he lived, he would have rejoiced to witness the good effects which have resulted from his liberal and enlightened policy. (Marked applause.) I allude to this to show that those Ministers who have been put into, and who occupy the places of their predecessors solely through you, should have faith in those principles, and should, at your bidding, be willing to work them out fully and fairly. (The hon. gentleman retired amidst overwhelming applause); and

The CHAIRMAN, advancing to the front of the platform, said: Our excellent and tried friend, Mr. Milner Gibson, M.P. for Manchester, will now address the meeting. (Tremendous cheers.)

Mr. MILNER GIBSON, M.P., then advanced, and was greeted with loud bursts of acclamation. He said:—Sir, I rejoice to have the opportunity of meeting our friends here this evening after a temporary absence, to discuss the great and important question of commercial freedom. I rejoice, sir, to hear from your opening remarks that there is no disposition to abate your efforts; and when I address you I mean to address you as the chairman representing this evening that large and important association in the country called the Anti-Corn-Law League. I say, sir, I rejoice to hear from you that there is no desire to abate your efforts until you have accomplished the great object for which you were at first associated. (Cheers.) I rejoice, to hear from your remarks that you feel a strong consciousness of the justice of your cause, for I know that this association and these meetings did not spring in the first instance from a new and sudden impulse, that they do not rest upon any temporary or passing interest, but that they are founded upon the broad and eternal basis of immutable justice. (Loud cheers.) Sir, I believe that the cause of commercial freedom is not a mere question of pounds, shillings, and pence of any one class in this community. It is a question involving the most important civil rights of free men; it is a question involving the right to buy and sell, the right that men should have a full reward for their own industry; and I say that there is no right which Government was ever formed to protect, or which society can recognise—no right so sacred as that man should have the power to live by his own unfettered industry and exertions. (Loud cheers.) It is true, as has been remarked, that there is not the slightest ground, the smallest shadow of a pretext, for any feeling of despondency in the progress of this great cause. (“Hear, hear, hear,” and cheers.) We, I have always understood, are not a mere party of politicians. We are not merely testing the question as between Whig and Tory; and when we get rid of that consideration, I will appeal to every dispassionate mind, I would appeal to any man, of whatever political party he may be, to ask himself the question whether he can look around him and not observe a steady progress in public opinion in favour of a relaxation of restrictions upon British industry. (Loud cheers.) Why, look at the course which the Conservative Ministry were compelled to take when they came into office in 1841. The cry of the electors was “no surrender;” the cry throughout all the counties was, “the existing Corn Laws and no alteration.” And yet we see a Minister, having an immense majority ready to back him in any measure he thinks proper to propose, compelled to come forward from a sense of necessity and propose something of a relaxation in our tariff and in the Corn Laws of this country. (Loud and long-continued cheering.) There was great distress in the country; there were complaints from the manufacturing districts; there were complaints from the agricultural and commercial classes; and if “protection,” as it is called, “to native industry” is really the basis of the promised prosperity of the country,—why, I ask, did the Minister, with a large majority at his back, capable of carrying whatever measure he chose,—why, I ask, did that Minister come forward with an attempt to relieve distress, not by increased protection, not by this saving remedy, on which he felt depended the prosperity of the nation, but by a sort of relaxation in the commercial code of the country? (Cheers.) If protection is to save the country, when there were complaints of distress and of non-employment they should have made the Corn Laws and protective duties more stringent—they should have given the country another dose, if this really was the legitimate medicine. (Loud cheers.) Sir, I see around me in every direction strong proofs of the progress of public opinion on this important question. I see it daily among the farmers, among whom I pass a great portion of my time, living in a purely agricultural district. I do not mean to say, Sir, that the farmers have told me that they would advocate a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws; but what they told me is this—“We do begin to think that these men who induced us to invest our capital upon an unsound basis were our worst enemies, for we do feel that the day is coming when the necessities of the country will compel the abolition of the Corn Laws, and a complete freedom of exchange in all the articles of food.” (Loud cheering.) They begin to feel, Sir, that the landed interest, the landed proprietors, in inviting them to invest their capital upon the rotten and unsound basis of the Corn Law, acted a faithless part—acted the part of men who, for a present pecuniary advantage, were resolved to risk the future safety not only of their own tenants, but of other classes of society. (Loud applause.) And that was in reality the fact; for to the close of the war what was the course the landed interest took? Did they give time for things to settle? Did they give time for a landlord and tenant to make new bargains, and to set new rents, with reference to the new state of things that had arisen since the war? No; but at once refusing all previous inquiry, without a moment's delay they proceeded to concoct the Corn Laws, telling the tenantry that they must rally, that they might be able to keep up the price of corn to the point to which it had attained by the war, and that they might safely invest the capital not only of themselves, but of their families, upon this unsound, this rotten, this precarious basis. (Loud and long-continued cheers.) What I would observe of the farmers is this. They feel that, if they were going to business free and for the first time, they would prefer going into the farming business on the basis of Free Trade rather than on the basis of protection; that they would prefer to rely upon the natural rather than on the artificial prices maintained by the Corn Laws. That is their feeling. The pinch of the question therefore is, “how, having embarked our capital in these Corn Laws, are we to get out of the difficulty?” All that I can say is this, that it is the retribution—the necessary retribution—on bad laws and bad legislation. (Loud cheers.) The landed proprietors of this country, when they passed the Corn Laws, did it under a protest from the commercial and manufacturing classes. The manufacturing classes were not represented in Parliament at the time that they passed these laws. It was at a time when the representatives of the country to a great extent were returned by the rotten boroughs. The Reform Bill had not passed. The commercial and manufacturing interests, badly as they are represented now in Parliament, were not represented then, and strong memorials were signed by them and presented to the Government of the day. The most earnest protests were forwarded to all parties who had influence in enacting laws in this country; but in the teeth of these protests, with a full knowledge beforehand of all the consequences predicted by the opponents of these laws, that they would be repealed the first moment that the commercial classes had the power to repeal them—with a full knowledge of that power they passed these laws; and if the farmers suffer—and God forbid that we should not deeply sympathise with them if they do suffer in this necessary change—it is to the landed proprietors that they must look for compensation. (Loud and marked cheers.) The occupying tenantry of England have a strong, a just, an undeniable claim upon the landed proprietors for compensation for the injury that has been done them by inducing them to embark their capital in the way they did. (Renewed cheers.) The commercial classes, the great body of the working classes—those who do not hold land, those who earn their bread by their own industry, either through the exertions of their mind or the exertions of their sinews and muscles—they have nothing to do with this unfortunate business between the landowner and his tenant. They demand the inalienable right of freedom of exchange, because, whatever wrong might be done by the landed proprietary towards their own tenantry, whatever wrong might be done by the class of owners and the class of occupiers, the wrong done to them never could prejudice the rights of the rest of the community. (Great cheering.) If A does a wrong to B, how can it prejudice the rights of C? C was a party who protested in the first instance against the transaction. He told A and B, you are embarking in a system of legislation which will bring down ruin on yourselves. It is injurious to me; now, I protest against it. I ask you not to pursue it, and A and B cannot, after having so persisted, come to C and say, in consequence of the wrong done to you, you now have no claim to ask for justice. (Loud cheers.) I observe that there is growing up a want of confidence between what are called the farmers' friends and the farmers in the country. My hon. friend, the member for Kilmarlock, alluded to that want of confidence in his speech, and I think with great justice. I say that the farmers begin to think that the great men in Parliament have rather a disposition to make use of them for political purposes. (“Hear, hear,” and laughter.) There is a suspicion, a growing suspicion, that they have not been fairly dealt with by their leaders in the House—the hereditary legislators. (“Hear, hear,” and cheers.) Now, there was the case of the Duke of Buckingham. I would not for a moment stand here and say that the Duke of Buckingham did anything in the world to forfeit his claim on the confidence of the protection party; but somehow or other he is now deposed, as I understand. He is no longer the leader. He is supposed to have come under the particular influence—I don't know what it is—which Governments do contrive to obtain with gentlemen with whom they have connexion. He has been deposed, and his grace of Richmond is now the professed leader of the protection party—(“Hear, hear,” and laughter);—at any rate he is President of the Central Society for the Protection of British Agriculture. Now, the Morning Post—(ironical laughter);—I feel the greatest difficulty in quoting from that newspaper, because there is always a predisposition to laugh when its name is mentioned. (Cheers and renewed laughter.) But there is a letter in the Morning Post of this day, which takes the Duke of Richmond to task for not having taken a bolder course in reference to the duties on foreign wool. These duties have been totally and immediately repealed, and it is said that the fact of the Duke of Richmond's relative having recently received an appointment in the Treasury has had the effect of influencing his course of conduct. (Loud cheers.) That has been the sort of insinuation. Now, my opinion is this, and it is with confidence I express it, that the Duke of Richmond was not influenced by that circumstance; I do not credit it, and I will tell you why—because the Duke of Richmond has been the supporter of the Conservative party—his brother has been the supporter of the Conservative party—and there is nothing of itself improbable in the circumstance that he should have an appointment given him; but I mention the letter in order to show what a disposition there is among the farmers and the protection party to suspect the “farmers' friends.” (Cheers.) The moment any fact occurs with a sort of prima facie appearance of betrayal, but without the slightest foundation for it, somehow or other they will have it that they are betrayed; there is a sort of predisposition amongst them to feel that they have not been dealt with fairly by their “friends” in Parliament. I do not mean to say that, if the Anti-Corn-Law League had places to give away, there might not be some influence produced amongst the protection party. (Great laughter and cheers.) I should be sorry to hint that we could act so directly at variance with all our professed pledges as to sanction any sort of political bribery whatever (cheers); but we cannot, Sir, disguise from ourselves the fact that, some way or other, Government, when gentlemen get into London, does obtain a great influence over them, which leads the innocent and simple-minded rustics to believe that they are betrayed and that justice has not been done them. (Great cheering.) The Duke of Richmond, I remember at a former time, expressed very strong opinions, and I believe always against the repeal of the Corn Laws. He said: “If you abolish the Corn Laws, I will go away out of the country altogether.” (Great laughter.) But he was told, “If you do, you cannot take the land away with you.” (Cheers.) Now, let us consider what is the position in which a person places himself who makes such a declaration. What are the Corn Laws? What is their nature? Simply this, that certain parties in this country dealing in the articles of bread and beef, having shops open to supply the community with those necessary articles, are very unwilling that any body else should open shops of a similar description. Now, his grace is extensively concerned in this “victualling” business, and he wants to take upon himself to be a sort of “licensed victualler” (loud and continued laughter); but I say that any Englishman has as good a right as another to supply the market with provisions, provided that he comes by them honestly. (Hear, hear.) I have a right as an Englishman to supply the market with corn by the operation of trade just as well as the Duke of Richmond has a right to supply it by the operation of agriculture. We contend that trade is a legitimate calling, and as proper to be pursued as any other branch of national industry, and that there can be no earthly reason, if it pleased me to send my capital to the Continent and there turn it into corn, and bring that corn to the English market and sell it at a profit again, I should not be permitted to perform that operation. (Cheers.) If I propose to bring corn to London from the Continent and sell it, what am I told? “You must not do it.” Why? “Because, if you do, some other gentlemen in the country will not get so large a pecuniary return from their property.” Well, but what claim have these gentlemen over me? I am not aware that there is any account between us, or that they have any control over my exertions, or demands upon my industry. (Cheers.) Put it in this light, and how monstrous an interference the Corn Law is with the civil liberties of her Majesty's subjects! (Great cheering.) What are governments for? What is society for? Why, the only object of government is to prevent men from trenching one upon another—to prevent one class from invading the rights and properties of another class. Now, I say that the right to follow a branch of business, viz., trade, is placed within my reach, that it is my property, and that Government ought to protect me in my honest calling. But what has Government done in this country? It has assisted a class in this community in opposition to this freedom of trade—this property of mine—this exchange of my industry in every quarter of the globe—it has assisted a party to invade my rights, and thus it has completely departed from the true functions and proper ends of any just government. (Loud cheers.) I trust, Sir, I am not dwelling on this point too long, and that I am not becoming tedious. (Cries of “Go on.”) But I do feel that this is the most important view that can be taken of the question. (Cheers.) I do feel that we have not sufficiently considered the Corn-Law question as a question of civil liberty. I contend that as you have abolished slavery in your colonies—as you have totally abolished the right of man to hold a property in his fellow-man in any part of the British empire—the same principle, if carried out, must lead to the abolition of monopoly. (Loud cheers.) What was slavery? What is slavery? (Cheers.) Why, one portion of the community claiming a right over the industry of another portion—one set of men claiming a right to control the exertions and to possess themselves of the results of the exertions of another set—and is not monopoly the same thing? (Immense applause.) If you destroy slavery, I say, à fortiori, you are bound to destroy monopoly. (Cheers.) Slavery recognised an inherent right in one man to possess the mind, the muscles, and the body of another: I say, the Corn Laws recognise a sort of inherent right in the landed aristocracy of this country to possess the reward of that industry which belongs to, and ought to go to other classes of the community. (Loud and long-continued cheering.) I see no difference between monopoly and slavery, except in degree. It is precisely the same in principle, or of what use was it for the planter to possess the slave? He did not possess him for mere ornament, or for the mere pleasure of looking at him as you would a canary bird in a cage (cheers); but he possessed him that he might eat the fruits of his industry; and that is the principle which, I believe, actuates a great many apporters of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) I believe it is a desire to take to themselves a larger share of the industry of the commercial and manufacturing classes than they are of right entitled to. (Cheers.) Now, I have seen, within a day or two, what I thought would hardly have been put forward in public, a statement to the effect that there was some inherent right in the landed aristocracy of this country to interfere with freedom of trade. (Oh, oh!) I have copied a little extract to that effect, from a publication called the "Quarterly Review," in which there is an article on agricultural improvement, and in that article I find the following paragraph: "The people forget that the land, and the owners and cultivators of that land, form the primary essentials, and that the mercantile and manufacturing establishments are the accidental adjuncts of our state" (cheers and laughter); so that all we who do not own land in this country are merely "the accidental adjuncts of the state." (Renewed laughter.) We are not to be recognised as free citizens, as having claim to equal laws; we are merely to be recognised as human beings sojourning upon this island, and are to engage just so much in trade, and to enjoy just so much of the comforts and conveniences of life, as it suits the pleasure of the landed proprietors to allow us. That seems to be the sort of principle avowed? but what a principle it is! When I hear the debates in Parliament I sometimes ask myself, "What are we in this House of Commons?" Are we employed here in making equal laws for all classes of her Majesty's subjects, or are we merely carrying on particular branches of business and making particular employments pay? What have we to do with making land pay in Parliament, whether in the West Indies or in England? Are we to be considered in the House of Commons as sugar-planters and corn-growers, or are we to be considered as men dealing, not with land and inanimate substances, but with human beings who demand of us the discharge of the true functions of civil government? (Loud cheers.) Are we to consider ourselves as interested in establishments in the West Indies? If so, why not go there—why not let the Speaker appoint different members to be bailiffs in the different districts, to look after the returns to be made to each proprietor? (Cheers.) This would be a far more reasonable course than sitting there talking about such affairs. (Cheers.) Now, this question, as connected with civil liberty, appears to me to be a very simple and, at the same time, a very important subject. I have heard learned divines, skilled in the philosophy of the ancients, knowing mathematics, and capable of writing and composing in the dead languages, say that this Corn-Law question is so complicated, so difficult, so intricate, that they could not approach it or touch it. (Cheers.) But I am afraid that these excellent divines of the Church of England (a laugh), when they view these immense difficulties, forget the maxim which they sometimes make use of, that their "kingdom is not of this world." (Cheers and a laugh.) I am afraid that the Tithe Commutation Act has had a very curious influence in preventing their coming to this question with an unbiased power of reflection, which they would otherwise have been able to give it. I am afraid there is an idea amongst the clergy of the Church of England (with a few exceptions) that, if we repeal the Corn Laws, the price of corn will fall very greatly, and that then the tithe-rent charge will fall with it. If it were not for this unfortunate influence, I think we might have on this question of the Corn Laws the assistance of all men who profess to act from the spirit of Christianity. It appears to me that it is instinctively connected with the whole code of Christian morals, and I do believe, although I know we have been found fault with for introducing scriptural quotations in this Corn-Law discussion, that the best arguments in favour of the Anti-Corn-Law League are to be found in the Bible itself. (Great cheering.) I have said that I saw a want of confidence in the agriculturists in their leaders; and in the chance of maintaining this Corn-Law protection nothing is more true than what my hon. friend said—that we were threatened with fine speeches in Parliament, and great denunciations of the Anti-Corn-Law League, but those promised speeches have

"died upon the lip, Faint as a chicken's note that's got the pip."

(Great laughter.) There never was anything so absurd in this world as the attempts that have been made to justify monopoly, and I do not believe there is one of its advocates that would get up in the House of Commons and say, "I came here to keep up rent on land, the price of corn, and I will not have any alteration in the Corn Laws." (Cheers.) This is, mind you, what these gentlemen have virtually told the agriculturists, and, as I believe, in the remote agricultural districts amongst the great body of the people there who believe that county members go up to Parliament with the one sole simple object of keeping up the price of wheat. (Cheers.) An agriculturist in the county of Suffolk said to me since the prices have fallen, "I wish our member had stopped at home and spent his money amongst his neighbours, for he does not appear to me to have done anything—the price of corn has fallen, and what good has he done?" (Great laughter.) This, I believe, is no exaggeration of the opinions of the agricultural body. The question, however, is this:—Are the commercial class, the great body of the intelligent and thinking community, to be ruled by a species of "farmers' ordinaries" and "market tables?" (Cheers.) Are they never to vindicate their rights, and to demand from the Legislature in a voice that cannot be resisted, that they must have granted to them the inalienable rights of free citizens to sell in the dearest and buy in the cheapest markets? (Cheers.) That feeling, I trust, will continue to gain ground in consequence of the studied and constant attempts daily witnessed in Parliament to blacken and degrade the commercial and manufacturing community of this country. (Cheers.) Can you not see always when you take up a paper which announces any meeting assembled on some charitable occasion, allusions to the "dreadful vices and horrid state of the manufacturing districts?" (Cheers.) And why is all this long-continued and studied system of attempting to degrade the manufacturing population perpetually pursued, but because they know that amongst that population there is a tone of free and independent thought—they know that there lies the germ of civil and religious liberty—they know that from the great body of the commercial classes of this country have always sprung, and are now springing, those great changes which have freed the country from thralldom, both intellectual and physical—they know that it is amongst that class the first dawn of religious liberty broke forth—that amongst them are to be found the stern enemies of monopoly, and the least respecters of hereditary wisdom. (Loud and continued cheering.) Why, Sir, what a monstrous thing it is that, at the very time when our agricultural districts are flaming with incendiary fires—at the very time when reports on the table of the House of Commons tell us that the agricultural labourers are in the depths of misery—their cottages ill-built and ill-ventilated—disease and misery rife—when you see barbarism increasing in those districts—when you behold these horrible, these fiendish atrocities, these incendiary fires—that at such a time Parliament should occupy itself with lectures on the vices of the manufacturing and commercial community! (Cheers.) Why, these violences are not going on in the manufacturing districts. (Hear, hear.) We do not hear of incendiary fires in the cotton districts. We have heard, it was true, of combinations of men in strikes, but unaccompanied by violence or any attacks upon the person. (Loud applause.) Instead of pursuing these attempts to degrade this body of the community, gentlemen would do much better to turn their eyes to the state of the agricultural districts; and representing, as I do, an important manufacturing constituency—I may call it the metropolis of manufactures—I think it the interest of all that the agriculturists should be well instructed, trained, and fed; otherwise there will be a mass of men growing up, ignorant and untutored, without religion or morality, in the manufacturing districts, casting a taint upon the community originally located there, upsetting all the efforts which had been made in those districts to elevate the moral and religious tone of the great body of the working population. (Cheers.) These agricultural districts are the sources from which must flow the population of the manufacturing districts; our population is increasing at the rate of 700 or 800 a day, and the land increasing not at all; and it is possible that, as no agriculturist can proceed to employ one more than he does at present, we can any longer restrain the extension of our manufactures, our trade, and our commerce, or employ this increasing population, unless we wish to see this loved land of ours at some future day one formidable scene of convulsion, bloodshed, and disorder? (Loud and long-continued applause.) I say that must be the consequence; poverty and distress will upset reason, religion, moral training, and every thing else; for when a man is in despair, when he sees his wife and children famishing around him, and knows that there are no means of existence in his power, I ask you of what use is it to go and preach to him a sermon? Will you not rather find him partaking of the character almost of a savage animal, feeling that he is reduced to the condition of a mere brute on this earth, and that he cannot enjoy any of the advantages of an intellectual man? (Enthusiastic cheers, renewed again and again.) Although there may be less distress in some particular districts in this country than there was a short time since; although there may be less fluctuation and changes, I cannot look around me and perceive that there is any thing very encouraging in the present aspect of affairs. I cannot find any class in this country, among whom I go and converse, from whom I do not hear well-founded complaints of excessive competition, and the great difficulty there is in finding employment and situations for the younger branches of families. I hear it complained of, ay, in all professions, in the law, and even in the church itself. Wherever I go, amongst all classes, I hear this one complaint, of the great competition and struggle there is for men to obtain a living who are not born to an independent fortune. (Hear, hear.) I do in my conscience believe that these restrictions on trade, and this interference with freedom of action, are the causes of all these difficulties. (Hear.) We have all natural advantages; our disadvantages, I believe, are our own creation—they are artificial. Providence has provided in this country the means of a comfortable subsistence for all classes of her Majesty's subjects; that is my conscientious belief; but certain particular interested classes have interfered with the distribution of all this wealth and all these facilities which Providence has bestowed upon us; and I believe that nothing but the removal of these obstacles will enable society to enjoy the full reward of those advantages which Providence has really placed within their reach. Commercial freedom contains within itself all the objects that the philanthropist can desire to see attained. It embraces the means of diffusing civilization and religious freedom not only through the United Kingdom of England, but through all parts of the globe. Commerce will spread blessings which no missionary efforts can ever accomplish. Opinions upon slavery, and upon all other great questions which influence men's actions, can only be supported through the instrumentality of commerce. If we desire to see the day when the Brazils and Cuba shall abolish the slave trade, we must not isolate those countries from communication with more civilized parts of the world which already hold sentiments adverse to the continuance of slavery. What was our own act when we were slaveowners, and when we—ay, even our very bishops in the House of Lords—were advocates for the slave trade? What were our acts? Why, the Government of this country knew the danger of commercial intercourse in spreading opinion, and what was the course they adopted when the slaves were freed in St. Domingo? They passed a law to prevent any communication between St. Domingo and our West India colonies, for fear the infection of freedom should spread to them. (Hear, hear, hear.) Commercial intercourse is the grand means, depend upon it, which Providence has designed to civilize mankind—the means, at any rate, of spreading the truths which are to civilize mankind. We have at this moment the Emperor of Russia in England. (Vehement groans and hisses.) When I spoke of the Emperor of Russia, I did not do so for the purpose of eliciting marks of disapprobation. I think we ought not to carry our feelings beyond the mere circumstance of his coming here as a simple individual man; I do not think we ought to carry our ideas into Russia. The remark I was going to make was, that we have that monarch here; we have also the King of Saxony; and we are expecting a visit from the King of the French. We are told that the visits of all these monarchs, from one to the other, will tend to ensure peace throughout the world. I am glad to see these friendly communications; but if we want to maintain peace upon right principles, ours, Sir, I believe, to be the true method for linking nations together by the tie of a common interest, which will prevent wars and outbreaks, by putting an end to the jealousies of the different powers. (Loud cheers.) Emperors and diplomatists may do something by their amicable communications, but depend upon it they can do nothing so effective as that which will be brought about by that feeling of interest amongst nations which will arise up when they are bound together by the ties of commercial intercourse. Make men your customers, depending upon you for their comforts, for the reward of their own industry, and then public opinion in all states will not allow the various monarchs and ambassadors to involve people in war as they have done in bygone times. I have detained you too long. (Cries of "No, no." "Go on, go on.") I will conclude simply by saying, there is no need for despair respecting the progress of our cause. No one that I have heard of considers the Corn-Law question in the least degree settled, except Mr. George Robins, the auctioneer. (Laughter.) He, "small blame to him," as they say in Ireland, in his advertisements when he wants to sell an estate, is very apt to say, as he said in an advertisement in a paper which I have seen to-day, that the Corn-Law question is settled, in consequence of the declaration of Sir Robert Peel during this session, that he does not contemplate a change. (Laughter.) And Mr. Robins advises persons to sell out their stock and purchase this estate, and give more for it in consequence of Sir Robert Peel's "contemplation." I must say, Sir, that I think the "contemplations" of this distinguished Minister are not a very good security for capital. (Cheers.) I would give as much for an estate without the Corn Laws as I would with them; but I certainly would not recommend gentlemen who think that the Corn Laws are necessary to maintain the value of estates, to place much reliance on the contemplations of the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government. I think we may with truth apply to him the term which the late Lord Grenville used with reference to monopoly—that he is the "parent of uncertainty." (Laughter.) I believe that he congratulates himself—only it must not be mentioned in public—on the progress of this Anti-Corn-Law League. (Hear, hear.) I have known cases myself where a Minister has been anxious to resist some job that he has been asked by his supporters to aid, and has, therefore, given a hint to the Opposition to be very uproarious against the job, in order that he might have an excuse to offer his friends for not adopting it. Now, that I believe is the position of her Majesty's Government: they want forcing; they are inviting you to force them. The stronger you put on the screw, the more they will give you. I am persuaded that in no period of the history of this country have such a number of direct invitations to agitation and to forcing been given by any Minister of the Crown to the Opposition. You see Ministers usually carry their questions not by the strength of their own supporters, because they are generally mere dupes, but by the influence of the Opposition. "See what a noise these gentlemen who are connected with the Free-Trade party are making. We really cannot maintain these laws any longer, you must give way, the country is in danger, if you do not surrender these laws you will have to give up something better worth keeping; therefore, be wise in time, for the pressure is too strong to be resisted. You cannot compose a government out of the 'Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture;' there are no men of sufficient talent capable of forming a cabinet in the Jamaica House of Assembly; there are no men who can carry on a Conservative Government unless you come to us, and, I tell you, gentlemen,"—this will be the language of Sir Robert Peel,—the pressure of the Free-Trade party has become so strong that I will not let any consideration of consistency stand in my way when I have an important public duty to discharge; therefore, I say, at once, that you must have Free Trade, or you must part with me." (Laughter.) It would be good and sound advice. We are taking, I believe, by these assemblies a truly patriotic and proper course in every point of view, whether in reference to moral considerations, or to the question of the accumulation of wealth. I say we are taking a proper course in endeavouring, as far as in us lies, to form that public opinion which is to be the instrument the Minister will use for the repeal of these obnoxious laws. The advice the Minister would give his friends in telling them they would lose other things better worth keeping, unless they gave up the Corn Laws, is true advice, for I recollect, and I dare say many of you remember also, that eloquent expression of the Rev. Robert Hall, when he said, "There is a taint of rottenness at the root of society which will wither the remotest and highest branch of the tree, be it ever so lofty." (The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst prolonged and most enthusiastic cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN came forward and said—I now beg leave to call upon Mr. Moore.

Mr. ROBERT R. R. MOORE on presenting himself at the table was received with enthusiastic cheers: silence having been obtained he spoke as follows:—I come before you to-night in the place of Josiah Hunt, a tenant-farmer; I would much rather that he were himself upon this stage to address you, as he has done before, proving from his own experience that the Corn Laws have never benefited him nor any tenant-farmer that he was ever acquainted with. I do not know any class of this community of whom I would rather be the advocate in this cause than the tenant-farmers. I do not know any other portion of the community that have suffered more continuously and more deeply from the Corn Laws; and I do not know any other set of men that would sooner reap the benefit of their total and immediate abolition. (Hear.) I am glad of an opportunity of appearing as the farmer's advocate against the Corn Law, because in the name of the farmer, unjustly and falsely, was the law originally passed and is now continued. As Mr. Gibson has said, the supporters of this law—the landowning lawmakers—shortsighted men, who imagine, that by crippling this nation's industry they can increase the wealth of a particular class, assert that they passed and maintain this law for the benefit of the farmer and the farm-labourer; and yet upon no other portion of the community has more bitter distress fallen than upon the farmers and farm-labourers of this country. But I am not going now to speak of farmers and the Corn Laws in what may be called the agricultural view of the question. I am not now about to argue that the impulse of competition must give rise to improvement in agriculture—and spur, to community of exertion and industry, the landlord and the farmer—bringing them to call to their aid all the discoveries that science has made and which might be brought into practice for the increase of agricultural production. (Hear.) I am not about to speak now of farmers as oppressed by the pauperism of labourers, who are paupers because there is no work for them to do upon this Corn-Law-protected land. I am not going to say anything of farmers with their fences broken down, their crops eaten up by game, protected, no doubt, for the benefit of British industry and agriculture. (Hear, hear, hear.) But I speak of the farmer as a serf,—as a man not allowed to act upon his own judgment; an individual who, if in secret he cherish an opinion in favour of Free Trade, dare not express it in public. (Hear, hear, hear.) This South Lancashire election, which I have had some share in, has made me hate the Corn Laws more than ever. Every election that I happen to be engaged in has made me feel more anxious that the people of this country should be roused to a practical effort against this Corn Law; that they should be brought to throw aside party, and come forward in the spirit of men who love industry, to protect that industry from the oppression that stalks through the land under the cloak, and cover, and name of protection. (Cheers.) In the southern states of America for every five slaves the proprietor has a vote for members of the local Legislature and the Congress. Every intelligent man's feelings somewhat revolt at the idea that a man should have a vote and go and express it for those who are only considered men enough for another to count their heads. But I wish that that were the case in this country; it were less degradation to the "Independent Englishmen," to the "bold peasantry, our country's pride," to the "Britons."

"who never, never will be slaves."

It were relieving them from a load of degradation if the landlord, as in America, had a vote for every five tenants, and went and gave them himself at the hustings, instead of making these men go through the form of being recorded on the register as John, William, Thomas, Henry So-and-so, and then bringing them to the polling booth, and asking each his name and qualification, and for whom he votes, as if it were a form invented publicly to degrade the man. (Cheers.) When you go to the tenant and canvass him, and speak to him of the Corn Laws, not a word has he to say in their favour. When you talk to him of the sugar monopoly, not a syllable has he to utter in its behalf. When you show him men out of employment who are willing to work, no means does he know of employing them save by extending the markets for our productions, and letting their industry be free. He is a repealer of the Corn Laws, and a Free Trader; he tells you so plainly he shakes hands cordially with you—he wishes you God-speed, hoping your cause will prosper; but he has, in reality, no vote, although he is recorded on the register, he is a mere voice—a chattel with a tongue—a slave, not voted for by a master, but driven up by a master to record his vote, and announce, in the face of the country, his own degradation. "Independent Britain" as he is; "farmer" as he may be; legislated for in Parliament as he professes; he has been; quoted as a reason why the Corn Law should be continued he is, nevertheless, but a land-thrall—a voting bondsmen, a voice through which that person who calls himself "man," the landlord, declares that he, the farmer, contrary to all his knowledge and conviction of right and wrong, in opposition to all his sympathy, feeling, and real interests, shall speak against his conscience, and vote against his country. (Cheers.) If I speak here to-night in some sort as the representative of a tenant-farmer, I ask you, electors, and you who have the power to become such, to take these oppressed serf-made farmers under your protection, and say, "It shall not avail you, landlords, you men-degraders, to dictate to these farmers; for we will outnumber you at the poll, and will carry this question for the sake of which you degrade these men. (Cheers.) It is no light matter that these men should be so degraded—that they should be dictated to—that they should be commanded not to think—that when you go and ask men looking and working like yourselves, having sympathies like you, and anxious to be independent,—for their votes, they should tell you, "that they vote for so-and-so," mentioning the name, not of the candidate, but the steward of the estate. (Hear.) If you wanted anything to make you more earnest in carrying the repeal of the Corn Laws, such domination should rouse you to that additional energy. An end must be put to this landlord dictation; and if the farmers cannot be roused to spirit enough to do it of themselves, if the interests they have at stake, and the risk they run, be too perilous for them to attempt it then every man who can do it, even though it should cost him some inconvenience, should acquire the power to vote at an election; and should take these farmers under their true protection, be their real friends, and say, "You farmers shall be raised from this thralldom to the dignity of men not only having an opinion, but daring to express it; you shall not be canvassed for and counted through the landlord only; you shall not be their voice but your own; you may henceforth call your minds your own, and tell these landlords that from this time you are resolved to look your fellow-men cheerfully in the face. We forgive the farmers for the injury they have done us; and by that injury we vow in the face of the country that the cause of it shall cease, and that the independent men in the town shall set not merely trade, but the farmers themselves, free." (Loud cheers.) You know, all of you here, "accidental adjuncts of the land" as you are, the mode by which the League proposes to accomplish the repeal of the Corn Law. You are aware that we seek to effect our object through the registration courts—you men of London are active on that subject. It is not merely when an election comes that you must commence your canvass, but you must urge all men who are in a position to register votes to do so; it is not when the struggle comes and the battle is at hand that you are to begin to see whether the weapons of your warfare are in order (hear), then is not the time to ascertain whether your taxes and rates are paid, and your name is upon the register. It is an important right—that of voting; it is a privilege by which you ward off oppression, and keep the landlords from levying a sort of tax on your industry. (Cheers.) At the election for South Lancashire the landlords did, by bringing in their tenants and commanding them to vote, precisely the same thing to trade as if they had come into the town and levied a tax from door to door, in the town. They came in plundering the industry of the people. (Hear.) These monopolies are not anything dead or inactive; it is not something abstract we are talking about; neither is it a mischief that might come to pass at some future time; but it is a hardly-crushing reality that we are resisting. Every year every year increases competition for employment in this country; you have more men bidding for work and running up the rent to an amount which the farm is not worth; you have more men bidding for employment and beating down wages; you have no more food, and yet increased numbers; you have more men needing to open shops, and no more people in a fit condition to be well paying and profitable customers to this increased number of shopkeepers; this monopoly is an ever-pressing injury, therefore you should be perpetually active against it, not merely coming to meetings such as this, cheering and holding up your hands for Free Trade, but going home and asking, "What can I find to do to forward the repeal of this law, and the abolition of all monopolies?" (Loud cheers.) You would deserve well the name of "accidental adjuncts" if you did not do something. "Accidental adjuncts!" I think we have reason to thank our enemies for that term. We "accidental adjuncts" will try if we cannot teach those "originals of the country" that, after all, the "accidental adjuncts" are powerful enough to win liberty for the industry of the people. (Cheers.) Now, we have not merely to attend to the registration, but we have to find out what condition of mind the present members of the House of Commons are in upon this question. The Parliament will, in the common course of things, sit about two years longer, and then again it will rest with the country to say who shall represent them. If the people be well taught and thoroughly in earnest, they will send Free-Traders in a majority to represent them, and the first session of that new Parliament will be rendered memorable by the triumph of Free Trade. (Loud cheers.) If the people are not sufficiently in earnest and thoroughly taught, then you will have a Parliament again to talk and squabble about compromises, spending their time in great and small changes, and talk about overthrowing old-established interests; you will have all the twaddle of Monopoly before you again, and, if you are prepared to be drugged with that for another Parliament, then do not do anything now to be ready for a future occasion. (Cheers.) The constituencies want to bring their members to a plain declaration upon Free Trade, "Ay or no;" not to have them coming to the hustings making fine promises; but to learn from them now, "How they will vote?" they will look at the Parliamentary list to see how they really have voted. A promise on the hustings will go for nothing, deeds in this Parliament will only be relied upon. Members have had enough to teach them while the present Parliament has sat; they have had distress during high-priced food, and a comparative return of prosperity when by the blessing of a good harvest bread was somewhat cheaper. They have no excuse for ignorance or for hanging back; and if they will not give their constituents proof that they are in favour of Free Trade by their support of Mr. Villiers's motion, then the constituents will select other men, and these lingers in the ranks of monopoly will find themselves left out of the list of members of Parliament at the next election. (Cheers.) I have here the answers to two memorials from constituents to their members. I wish it to be observed that in reading these documents, and in any remarks I may make upon them, I am not to be understood as using a word harshly or disrespectfully to either of these honourable gentlemen. I am speaking of the question, and not of the men. Letters have been received from Lord Seymour and Mr. Baldwin, members for Totnes, in answer to memorials signed by a majority of their constituents, calling on them to support Mr. Villiers's motion for the abolition of the Corn Laws. Lord Seymour says, "I have received your letter with the enclosed memorial. With regard to the question of the Corn Laws it may be remembered that, in 1831, when I first addressed the electors of Totnes, I told them that my opinions were in favour of an alteration of the Corn Laws, and I should vote for any motion tending towards greater freedom of trade in the admission of corn. At that time no large party in the House agreed in these views, and no association existed in the country for the purpose of advancing them. The question is now in a very different position; the Government, having passed a law which is in my opinion very insufficient to remove the evils which were before complained of, seem yet determined to go no further: the party calling themselves the League declare that they will be satisfied with no other measure than an immediate and entire abolition of all duty. Their mode of proceeding, which has been useful in leading to more general consideration of the question, has not apparently won the support of the manufacturing and commercial classes, since their defeat in South Lancashire seems to show that there is not, even in that district, any great confidence in their proposed measure. I think that, by their mode of dictating to the country this one measure, to be at once adopted as the criterion of political wisdom, and at the same time denying to their opponents common sense and common integrity, they have injured the cause, and I therefore do not support a plan which seems unlikely to lead to any settlement of the question. My own views can hardly be fully stated in a letter, but whenever I come to Totnes, if any of my constituents wish to hear them at more length I shall be happy to state them." Lord Seymour admits that the mode of League procedure, and their vigorous agitation, has led to a more general consideration of the question, but he argues that the election in South Lancashire seems to show that there is not any great confidence in total and immediate Free Trade felt even there. Then Lord Seymour, as he is opposed to the present Corn Law, and is also to the League movements, must mean that he is in favour of some system of compromise. Now, I ask, where is the evidence from South Lancashire, and where is the proof anywhere in favour of compromise? At our county meetings, now and then, some one has proposed an amendment in favour of a fixed duty; but I never saw more than three hands held up for that proposition upon any such occasion. (Hear.) Where was the fixed-duty candidate brought forward in South Lancashire? Who spoke of such a measure there? Mr. Entwistle was a sliding-scale man, pledged to its maintenance; and the serf-farmers were driven up to vote for him, having told our canvassers that they were in favour of total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) Which is to be taken in proof of the will and knowledge of the country upon the subject—the opinion a man expresses when you go to him as a stranger and ask him what he thinks upon the subject of the Corn Laws, or the vote he records when under the landlord's dictation at the poll? I think that, if Lord Seymour would examine the case of South Lancashire, and be at the trouble of reading the speech of our Chairman to-night, and if he would also remark the progress we have made, he will see in every place a farmer could escape—where he was left to himself—he came out for Free Trade, and that only where he was domineered over and dictated to did he vote for monopoly. (Hear.) If that noble lord would go down into South Lancashire among the men who voted for monopoly, he would not find any manifestation of triumph for the return of their candidate, but rather a grieving over the present baffling of principles that they themselves would have wished to have seen triumphant. (Cheers.) He would find the private efforts of the very men who have given their votes against the Free-Trade candidate exerted for the promotion of the very objects which they were compelled to vote against. (Hear.) If Lord Seymour really imagines that there is any party in this country who are in favour of compromising this question, he evidently knows little of the state of feeling throughout the land upon the subject. (Hear.) The farmers complain that they have had compromises enough, and have had quite a sufficiency of changes in the Corn Laws. They are aware that they have suffered too long from the delusion of steadiness of price and good markets being established by law; for too many years they have been vainly told that the Corn Laws would give them prosperity. The labourers will tell you that they are tired of hearing it said that the Corn Law is especially for their protection, and that by it alone can they be taken care of. The noble lord would find that, even amongst those who in party are opposed to us, there is principle in favour of Free Trade at work. If he will look over the poll-books of South Lancashire, he will find indications there that men in this country are now being universally brought to say, "Manufactures, trade, industry, wages, and food first; and then party—if there be any need for it." (Cheers.) If Lord Seymour thinks that our mode of "dictating to the country this one measure as a thing to be at once adopted as the criterion of political wisdom is not judicious," I reply, that we have not dictated this one measure. All that the League has done, is, as his lordship says, to "raise up a giant power of spreading knowledge upon the subject." The League has simply taught the people that it is their interest to have Free Trade. The League has done nothing more than turn general attention to the works of the greatest writers upon the mode by which nations can prosper. It has only brought into common use the instruction given at the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, in each of which places a professorship of political economy is established for the purpose of teaching the students the principles upon which national prosperity is to be secured; and it has shown that every one of these celebrated seats of learning have never existed a professor of political economy who was an advocate for the principles of monopoly; but that, on the contrary, they were all Free-Traders;—that a man in such a position would be laughed at, unless he were an advocate of Free Trade, and in the examinations of candidates for these professorships, he would lose all chance of success if he were to declare himself in favour of monopoly. (Hear.) The League, then, has done nothing more than to carry the instructions of all these learned universities into practice,—teaching merchants, shipowners, traders, shopkeepers, manufacturers, and hard-working men, both in towns and rural districts, principles which have so long, and without exception, been taught in the universities of the land. (Cheers.) These business, practical men are not satisfied with abstract knowledge, but come forward and say, "Give to us workers, to us industrious men, to us skilled artisans—give to us, to whom all that the earth can produce is property when we labour for it—give us our share of the world's produce." Free Trade is the one question, because the people of England are taught, and begin to give up party. They say "Live industry, and perish party!" (cheers)—we must be free to work there must be no shackles on the hands; there must be no crushing down of the spirit, even though the man be a mere adjunct of the land." Let no man expect to put any other question forward till this is settled. There it stands: we have struggled for it long enough. We have in this country passed through periods of distress and oppression frequent enough; we have even now amongst us, thick enough, the traces of the periods of distress which we have passed over: we have seen people growing up in ignorance and exasperation from distress. Those only who have been in the manufacturing districts in a time when the Corn Laws were doing their best work, and prices were high, and we have seen how the people struggled against the dependence of pauperism, and laboured to keep up the appearance of having enough to live upon while they were pinched from want,—they have seen enough to make them say, "This shall be the one question." Those who have seen men who were rising in the world thrown suddenly down to poverty, who have beheld men broke before their time by anxiety brought on by these monopolies, and watched the spirit of this country and learn to love a people who were willing to work, and asked nothing but room to labour, and that monopolists would keep their hands off their working arms,—they, I am sure, have seen enough to make them exclaim, "This shall be the one question." (Loud cheers.) We shall have been engaged in election contests, who have been watching more closely than most people the progress of opinion, have seen sufficient to justify us in telling you here to-night, that this one question cannot be stayed in its progress; that it is certain to triumph. (Cheers.) I feel always inclined to repeat what is to me one of the greatest gratifications on this subject, and that is, that those who have voted against us at elections,—who have been driven up from their farms as serfs to poll for the monopolists,—that those who have worked against us will be brought to acknowledge that, after all, we were right. The worst I wish them is, that they may live long enough to feel the burning blush of shame rise high in their face when any one points to the country's prosperity, and says, "Free Trade won it—a few men laboured long and earnestly in the cause, and you held them back, and reaped the benefit, and blush that you withstood the cause." (Mr. Moore retired amidst loud and protracted cheering.)

The CHAIRMAN then came forward, and said, Ladies and gentlemen, in closing the meeting I am requested to make two announcements. The first is, that all those parties who have qualifications for electors, and wish to be placed on the register for the city of London, should apply at the Metropolitan Association Rooms, 68, Cheap-side, to Mr. Sidney Smith, the Secretary. And the second announcement I have to make is this: I trust we need not prove to the world that here, at least, we are no monopolists. The Conservatives of the city of London are anxious next Wednesday to have a dinner, some other meeting, in this theatre, and we have been asked to waive our right of holding our meeting, in order that they may have this place for that evening; we are quite willing they should have it, and we hope they will make as good a use of it that night as we should have done. (Hear, hear.) You will, therefore, have the goodness to understand, that the meeting stands adjourned till this day fortnight; and should the Conservatives next week take an opportunity of uttering any fallacies bearing upon our question, I have no doubt the speakers who will then address you will take an opportunity of answering them. (Loud cheers.)

At the suggestion of Mr. Bright, three cheers were given for Free Trade, and the meeting separated.

EDINBURGH ANTI-CORN-LAW ASSOCIATION.

On Wednesday, the 29th ult., a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Anti-Corn-Law Association was held in the rooms of the Chamber of Commerce.

The Secretary stated, that, as directed by the committee, he had written a letter to Mr. Macaulay, and had received an answer. They were as follows:—

"TO THE RIGHT HON. T. B. MACAULAY.

"Edinburgh, Fifth Month, 16th, 1844.

"RESPECTED FRIEND,—I received thy letter of 1st instant, but not till five days after its date. It was immediately printed and circulated among the members of the large committee of the Anti-Corn-Law Association of this city; and, on considering it at a numerously attended meeting, held here on the 9th instant, the following resolution was unanimously passed:—

"That having heard read the letters from the city members—Resolved, that while there is much in Mr. Macaulay's letter of which the association disapprove, they desire to consider both communications as conveying the impression, that our representatives are now convinced of the propriety of supporting the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, as opposed to any duty whatever, in terms of the second resolution passed on the 22nd of April; direct this resolution to be communicated to them by the sub-committee; and in the meantime delay all further proceedings until the sub-committee shall think fit to call another meeting of the association."

"The executive committee of the association, who were charged by the meeting with the transmission of this resolution to thee and thy colleague, have directed me candidly to state to you the different views entertained of your letters which led to the adoption of this resolution. The greater number believed that you wished to convey to the association the impression that you were now prepared to give a cordial support to the cause of total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, as opposed to any duty, whether fixed or sliding. While others understand that although prepared in theory to approve of total and immediate repeal, and in certain circumstances even to vote for it, you would be ready to abandon the cause, and to advocate a fixed duty in preference to it, whenever any Government which you esteem liberal shall propose such a measure. The committee have given expression to their views in the above resolutions; and, in accordance with the general understanding of the meeting as to what is implied in it (in respect of which an amendment proposed on the motion was withdrawn), the executive committee have directed me respectfully to request that thou wilt favour them with an answer. In making this request, the executive committee desire me to express the cordial satisfaction which it will afford them to know that the committee have adopted that view of thy letter which it was thy intention to convey. Thoroughly convinced that the continued prosperity of the nation is dependent on the establishment of Free Trade without delay, the association will rejoice to be assured that thy great talents are enlisted in advocating its principles and promoting their final triumph."

"From a sincere desire that an harmonious feeling shall be restored between thee and the constituency by which thou wert elected, and wishing to avoid the needless discussion of matters in which thou and they differ in opinion, the executive committee forbear from noticing those parts of thy letter which have been generally disapproved by the committee. I am, however, particularly requested to explain that the third resolution adopted at the meeting of the association, held on 22nd ultimo, was not communicated to thee and thy colleague, simply because it was not intended for you, but for the direction and guidance of the committee during their tenor of office. That resolution expresses the opinion and determination of the association in a matter involving at once the interests of the kingdom at large, and the objects and business of the association. Not intended by the committee as a threat, but for another purpose, it was not communicated, lest it might wear the semblance of one. The collective opinions of a constituent body like the association can be gathered only at a public meeting, by the discussion and adoption of resolutions embodying their views. We know thy character sufficiently to prevent us from imagining that a threat would induce thee to swerve from any course which thy judgment might lead thee to adopt as the path of duty. We submit to thee, with much deference, that the representatives of the city have no just cause of offence, on account of the association adopting resolutions which they considered necessary for the guidance of their committee; however these resolutions may in their operation eventually affect their connexion with the city. Such an idea would unduly interfere with the freedom of discussion in public bodies; and the executive committee of the Anti-Corn-Law Association cannot recognise it as legitimate."

"I am thine, very respectfully,
(Signed) "JOHN HOWISON."

"Albany, London, May 21, 1844.

"DEAR SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter conveying to me a resolution passed by the Anti-Corn-Law Association of Edinburgh, on the 9th of this month.

"The sense put on my letter by the majority of the association is correct. It is only as compared with a fluctuating duty on foreign corn that I think a fixed duty of low amount entitled to support. I have no doubt that a perfectly free trade is preferable to a fixed duty, and it is my intention to act in strict conformity with these views."

"I learn from your resolution that there is much in my letter of which the association disapprove. I think it right to say that I have carefully reconsidered that letter, and that it contains not a single statement or argument to which I do not deliberately adhere."

"I have the honour to be, dear Sir,

"Your faithful servant,

"J. Howison, Esq., Edinburgh." "T. B. MACAULAY."

After a number of members had expressed their opinions fully on the subject, the meeting unanimously agreed to the following minute:—

"Having heard read the letter of the Secretary to the members for the city, transmitting the resolution of the general committee, and the answer of Mr. Macaulay, the executive committee rejoice that, according to the interpretation proposed by that resolution to be put on his letter of the 1st instant, now homologated by himself, they can reckon on his cordial and unqualified support to the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, as opposed to all duty, whether fixed or sliding; and feeling assured that he will lend his powerful talents in actively advocating, and his personal influence in promoting, a measure so vitally affecting the prosperity and best interests of the nation, they refrain from any observations to which his adherence to his previous letter might have given rise."

It was explained that no answer had as yet been received from Mr. Gibson Craig, and the Secretary was in consequence directed to write to him requesting an answer.—Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle.

POLITICAL ECONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.

The following is an extract from a lecture on agriculture, forming one of a series on political economy, delivered by Mr. Banfield in the University of Cambridge, with the permission of the Vice-Chancellor. We shall occasionally recur to these lectures, which we understand are shortly to be repeated in town.

"To the indirect proofs that I have endeavoured to adduce of the little danger that need be anticipated from increased production to the vested interests, whether of the landlord or of the farmer, direct evidence may be added from the history both of tropical and of European agriculture. Since the extension of navigation beyond mere coasting trips, various additions have been made to the catalogue of our nourishing plants, that, could their introduction have been calculated beforehand, must have appeared to threaten the annihilation of agricultural property in Europe."

"Rice, we are told, was not known to the Greeks and Romans. It made its appearance in Europe about the middle of the 11th century. Its cultivation is said to have been first attempted in the low lands adjoining Verona by a patrician of Milan, named Theodore Trivulzi, in 1522. Since then, the cultivation of this plant, which occasionally yields 100 bushels to the acre of the most nourishing description of grain, has furnished us with an immense supply of food. The consumption of Europe is now estimated at 3,000,000 cwt. annually."

"The potato made the next change in the amount of farinaceous food placed at our disposal. This root did not become of general use until the commencement of the present century. It is now found in great abundance in every part of northern and central Europe."

"The third addition to our supplies consisted in the pungent herbs, such as tea and coffee, with which it is possible to consume a vast quantity of sugar. The sugar consumed with tea and coffee at present, in England alone, has been estimated as equivalent to the saccharine matter contained in six millions and a half gallons of beer."

"A plant that was much prized on its first discovery, but that is only now drawing the attention that it deserves, as a valuable article of food, is Cacao, or 'Theobroma.' This delicious production is grown with the least toil and expense of any vegetable that we know in the tropical parts of our globe. One thousand trees, capable of yielding each twelve fanegas or cwt., can be tended in the Canaries by one man, when the first arrangements, at planting, for occasionally irrigating the ground they stand upon have been well made."

"As the fruit of this tree is highly nourishing, and is sweet enough to require no mixture of sugar, the cheapness and the delicacy of the drink prepared from cacao will recommend it generally, and it will doubtless produce a revolution in our taste for tropical produce."

"Yet in spite of these constant additions to our supplies of food, instead of finding that the culture of grain can be diminished, we see that it must daily be produced in increased quantities to keep pace with the demand."

"The same experience is furnished by the history of the raw materials produced for our manufactures. The quantity of cotton wool imported for consumption in 1810, was 90,000,000 lbs. In 1810 we imported nearly 600,000,000 lbs.; yet the demand for wool was not diminished by this increase. Australia sent us 2,500,000 lbs. of wool in 1830, and nearly 10,000,000 lbs. in 1840. Our importation from other countries likewise increased within the same interval, and yet our linen manufacture was able likewise to extend itself. The consumption of silk has in the meantime not declined. The same phenomenon meets us in the other countries of Europe, where supplies have likewise increased of every description of raw produce contemporaneously."

"With this experience, one would think it must be easy to detect the economical law of progress by which these phenomena are produced. Their recurrence pointed to a necessary connexion between the increasing supply and increasing demand for agricultural produce that ought to have been sooner recognised than has been the case."

"The law is simply this, that an abundant supply of objects of primary necessity is the condition of a great demand for objects of less urgent utility, and for luxuries. As we advance in the scale of wants thus classified, the desire to satisfy each less-pressing deficiency increases according as the more essential requisites to our existence or our comfort are supplied. Thus the demand for clothing is increased by an abundant supply of grain. Flax, silk, and cotton are in greatest demand amongst nations that are best able to supply themselves with food. The condition of the demand for flax is, that there shall be a supply of corn or of potatoes."

"Again, in the crops of food, the cultivation of luxuries must depend on the supply of necessaries. Meat, butter, cheese, fruits follow in a natural succession. In an open market each refinement in the description of food produced becomes more remunerating as a crop in proportion as indispensable food is more abundant. In the same manner an abundance of cotton increases, instead of diminishing the demand for flax and silk, when the free action of trade is unimpeded. That the price, under these circumstances, does not always rise, may be accounted for by various considerations, to which I shall presently recur. But this is the theory of consumption, and consequently of demand."

LORD RADNOR AND THE WILTSHIRE FARMERS.

The following letter has recently appeared in the columns of the Wiltshire Independent, addressed by Lord Radnor to the farmers of that county. It is illustrative of the harsh and tyrannical attempts that the "Agricultural Protection Societies" are now making to force some apparent expression of public opinion in favour of the Corn Laws. Some hundreds of petitions—most of them signed by an exceedingly small number of persons—have lately been presented to the House of Commons, praying that no further concessions may be made to the principles of the Anti-Corn-Law League. We have received numerous letters from various counties, complaining of the reckless and cruel compulsion to which the agricultural labourers have been subjected to induce them to sign these petitions. Surely such proceedings can only tend to render more desperate the spirit of discontent that already reveals itself with such fearful ferocity in the wide-spread incendiarism of the rural districts!

"TO THE FARMERS OF WILTS."

"I have read in the Wiltshire Independent, and have heard from other quarters, such instances of gross oppression and flagrant injustice towards agricultural labourers made use of by their employers to compel them to sign petitions in favour of the Corn Laws, and I feel so forcibly, not only the iniquity, but also the folly and impolicy of such conduct, that I cannot refrain from addressing these lines to you on the subject."

"Well-authenticated cases and the names of parties are in my possession, but I do not by any means wish to expose them. It is very possible, indeed, if these practices are persevered in, that it may become necessary, hereafter, to do so. At present I will only argue the matter abstractedly, and endeavour to put before you such reasons, as I think, ought to weigh with you to abstain from anything like compulsion."

"1. The labourer is a free man, and has as good a right to his opinion on the subject as any of you. He is, in no respect, bound to follow your opinions, and to act under your directions in anything, except in matters connected with his service. Signing a petition with reference to the Corn Laws cannot in any way be considered so."

"2. The labourer has an immediate and direct interest in the matter. My belief, indeed, is, that the repeal of the Corn Laws would be as beneficial to you as to him; but his interest is more evident. He is a consumer; you are both consumers and producers. His interest in having what he consumes abundant and cheap, is palpable, and he knows it. Why should he not be at liberty to express his opinion? Still more, why should he be called upon to express a contrary one?"

"3. It is your manifold interest to promote and encourage morality in your labourers, and especially to discourage falsehood and lying; but when you urge a man to put his name to the expression of an opinion, contrary to that he really entertains, you urge him to commit a deliberate falsehood in the most formal manner. How can you, after this, blame him, if on any other occasion he lies to you?"

"4. I would ask what you gain by this? Nothing but the expression of an opinion, which you know to be untrue, and which your employers and landlords, if you are candid with them, also know to be so."

"5. Again, I would ask, what do you lose by this? The respect and good opinion of your men. How can a man respect one, who, for his own purposes, urges or compels another to tell a deliberate lie?"

"6. But this is not all you lose. The men, knowing as they all, I believe, well know, that the Corn Laws are injurious to them, being so called upon, naturally suspect that you must have some view or object detrimental to them; or, at the very least, that you are indifferent about their welfare. I ask every farmer in Wilts, and in the south of England, whether there exists between him and his labourers such cordiality as could neutralize that suspicion, or prevent its being highly dangerous?"

"But it may be said you have a right to employ whom you like and to give what wages you like; to dismiss those who do not agree with you about the Corn Laws, or to give to them lower wages. True, the right you have—whether it be right or proper to exercise it is another question. And, on the other hand, the men have a clear right to stick to their opinion, and if they prefer doing so to accepting the wages of falsehood and iniquity, to take your dismissal; would the Boards of Guardians refuse to admit them, with their families, into the workhouses, because they had refused to sign their names to a lie?"

"I throw out these things for your consideration, and I think they are deserving your attention. I wish to say nothing to irritate or annoy. I have no desire to expose the names of any who have acted, as I think, so unjustifiably. But I will do what I can to save the labouring men from oppression and injustice; and I care not whom I may offend, or what offence I may give, if it is necessary to do so for that purpose."

"To conclude: be just and fair—do unto others as you would that others should do unto you—keep your opinions and act upon them if you please, but let your labourers keep theirs. You probably know my opinion, that your landlords have no right to coerce you; in the same way you have no right to coerce your labourers. Act on these principles, which are the principles of justice and truth, and, take my word for it, you will never have cause to repent of so doing."

THE BAZAAR.

We have much pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to the arrangements announced for the great Free-Trade Bazaar, in London. The Manchester Bazaar cleared about £10,000, and enabled the League to do a great amount of good in the diffusion of Free-Trade principles. We confidently anticipate, however, that it will be infinitely surpassed by the Bazaar in London, to which every part of the country will contribute. Though the League may not have succeeded in South Lancashire, yet by its systematic attention to registration, it is preparing the way for a great triumph when the next general election shall arrive. The proofs of the progress of our principles abound on every hand; and the most gratifying and the most convincing are the tributes paid to the power of the principles of Free Trade by our opponents. The Times, two years ago, told Sir R. Peel that he was in the groove of Free Trade—that he must slide along—and that he could no more resist the motion than counteract the laws of nature. This has been proved to be quite true. But Sir Robert Peel's motion is far from being spontaneous. He moves in the direction of Free Trade, because, moving slowly, he mitigates the force by which he would otherwise be driven. But take away the driving power—let the League become ineffective for want of funds, and we should soon see Sir Robert give way to the influences of monopoly, and become stationary, if not retrograde. He sees what is right; but he is prepared to do either right or wrong, to secure his power. The League, the embodiment of enlightened public opinion on Free Trade, is his incentive to advance in the right; but if he be once enabled to say "The League is fallen! we need look for no more Free-Trade measures from him. No effort to support the League can now be too great, or can be useless; and so far from the South Lancashire defeat being a reason for despondency, it ought to be an incentive to renewed and more active effort. There are few towns that could furnish a more attractive stall for the Bazaar than Sheffield. Our manufactures are varied, elegant, useful, most convenient in size for exhibition and for sale on such an occasion. We have no doubt that the Sheffield stall will be well furnished, and will add much to the attractions, and to the profits of the Bazaar.—Sheffield Independent.

THE ELECTION FOR SOUTH LANCASHIRE.
(From the Correspondent of the Morning Chronicle.)

Now that the election is over, and people can look back upon it without hope or fear for any immediate result, there is room for reflection; and there is not only room, but there are ample materials for thought—very serious thoughts. The power that has returned a Tory member is not an invisible power, and much might be said of it, much written, and much predicted. Were I to turn prophet for a few minutes, I would say that this is the last time that such a member will be returned to Parliament by such a power in this county—by the power of some dozen great landowners, who can each command from fifty to six hundred votes. But I shall not at present press that subject. It is enough to say that Mr. Entwistle, despite the opinion of a great majority of freeholders, has been returned by the votes of those who have neither freeholds nor opinions—the tenants-at-will—of whom there are in this division of the county not less than 4000, nearly all of whom voted for him at the bidding of the stewards. At present I prefer bringing before the public a consequence of the extensive creation of tenancy-at-will votes, which, I believe, has been overlooked. It is the effect on the domestic comfort of families arising from a plurality of votes being created upon a farm of which the father of the family is the leasee. It affects the disposition of property in a very important degree, as will be seen from the following dialogue between a farmer and his son-in-law. Farmers, whether as fathers of families, or as brothers, will do well to look to the consequences that may arise out of such a system. In Lancashire, the creation of votes by such means as this dialogue sets forth has been carried to an extremity, and the present election has been carried by such votes. But fathers and sons, and sons-in-law, and daughters, and other relatives, should look into the subject, and see if they have not paid too dear for their whistle in supporting the gentleman who has just been made a member of Parliament:—

SOME MORE OF THE EVILS OF THE CHANDOS CLAUSE IN THE REFORM BILL, EXEMPLIFIED BY A CONVERSATION BETWEEN A FARMER AND HIS SON-IN-LAW, DURING THE ELECTION FOR SOUTH LANCASHIRE.

Son-in-law.—Good morning, Sir, how are you all at home?

Farmer.—Very well, Richard; art thou middling?—how is Anne and the children?

Son-in-law.—Very well. I say, Anne, here is your father.

Anne.—Father, what has brought you here so soon?

Farmer.—This election.

Son-in-law.—Well, I suppose you are going to vote for monopoly?

Farmer.—Yes, I am, if you call it so. I had rather have stopped at home, but then thou knows we are all obliged to come.

Son-in-law.—You say we, who besides yourself?

Farmer.—Why, does thou not know? if thou does not, I will tell thee. My rent is £223 10s. per year. I am entered along with my three lads, Samuel, Thomas, and Albert, so then thou sees we have four votes when we only ought to be one.

Son-in-law.—Well, but why is not Charles put in?

Farmer.—Because it will not allow any more, but the steward talks of letting me have a little more land to make the rent a little above £250 per year, and then Charles is to be put in for to vote.

Son-in-law.—Ah, Sir! that Chandos clause will in a little time make many a rogue, and be the cause of breaking up many peaceable families.

Farmer.—How, Richard? I do not see it; be so good as to tell me, that I may guard against it.

Son-in-law.—You cannot guard against it now, if you remain a farmer under such a landlord.

Farmer.—Why cannot I, Richard?

Son-in-law.—Well, when I married your daughter Anne, you said it was your intention to leave your children equal in election matters.

Farmer.—I did so, Richard, that is correct.

Son-in-law.—But from what you have said, you cannot do so now, if you remain on your farm.

Farmer.—Why cannot I?

Son-in-law.—Well, have you not acknowledged that your three sons are partners with you in the farm?

Farmer.—I am not aware that I have ever acknowledged them as such.

Son-in-law.—Did you not say that you were, with your three sons, entered as tenants, that you might have votes; and if so entered, are you not all accountable for the rent; and if accountable for the rent, are not all of you equally entitled to profit, if any; and at your death cannot those three sons each claim one fourth of the stock, &c., on the farm, and then take their share of the remaining fourth along with the other seven children?

Farmer.—Oh, no; the steward and my lord also told me and my neighbours it made no difference with our personal property, it was only to swell the register to assist in keeping on the Corn Laws. Never make thyself uneasy about that, my lad, thou may depend it is as I say.

Son-in-law.—I wish it was so; but I know different, and so does your steward, and his lordship too; but they want to keep you in the dark about that, knowing well that to get out it would uproot their power soon, as their best tenants would refuse to remain on such terms, preferring to retire and live upon what they have got than stop to be ruined by a wild son; for you are aware that Albert is very fond of company, and at times spending more money in diversions than you approve of.

Farmer.—I am, Richard; and what of that?

Son-in-law.—Well, we will suppose he goes to market to sell your wheat, which he does, and receives the money, say £100; on the same day he also receives £150 for fat beasts and sheep, amounting together to £250, and instead of giving the same up to you, he retains it, and tells you he is as much entitled to it as you are, as one fourth of the farm is his. I want to know by what law you can get that money from him?

Farmer.—By the same law as I could recover it from any other servant.

Son-in-law.—Oh no, Sir, you must remember he is a partner in the eye of the law, and you are aware, one partner cannot sue another.

Farmer.—Ah, Richard, thou hast made me uneasy; I will make some inquiry about it, and if I find it as thou says, I will give up my farm before it shall remain as it is; for I plainly see we shall eat one another if we all stop at the place, and they get married, as every £50 a year in land cannot keep a family. But I must go now to vote; I will see thee again about this business. Good bye to you all.

The foregoing is almost literally written. It is worth the consideration of the farmers, whose families are made county voters by wholesale. M. D.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—The London committee of the Anti-Slavery Society care little for consistency. They oppose the introduction of labourers into the West Indies, and yet demand "protection" for the only interest which is to be promoted by it. The fallacy is evident: sugar is assumed as the staple produce (as if stability were not itself an absurdity in human affairs); labour is too dear for the purpose; the Legislature is called upon to provide labour that sugar may be grown, and to keep up the price of sugar that there may be an excuse for providing labour. None more than the Whigs vociferate for immigration from Africa or India; and yet the committee support the very measure which occasions both the necessity and the justification of what they deprecate, and cannot or will not see that those whom they call their friends are laughing at their simplicity, and counteracting their efforts. The committee profess sympathy for the American abolitionists, while they court the patronage of noble lords who recommend us to leave the American abolitionists to settle the question among themselves. These good people are against slaveholding with the money of slaveholders. The wrongs of the negro swell out the Moravian subscriptions to the Abolition Society, and the slave-worked min. sharers' contribution to their funds proclaims, in their annual report, their utter disregard of principle. They declaim against the tyranny of the planters, while they advocate a line of policy which, by encouraging an unremunerative production, will leave the black to the mercy of his employer; for "protection" to the master is slavery to the servant. They dwell with just commendation on the independence and prosperity of the negroes, and yet they are aiding the combination that has been formed for the destruction of both. If the negroes can now support their schools and their chapels without the assistance of the English people, the whites ought to support themselves without the assistance of the English Legislature. Why should we be called upon to take part with either against the other? Let them arrange their own affairs in their own way; or, if we must interfere, let us take the sense of the black population on the policy and justice of the sugar duties. It is a singular way of showing your friendship to the black or white man, by defending a tariff of duties which robs the one without giving an equivalent to the other, and enriches the bitterest enemies of both—which forces capital out of its natural channels, and depresses labour below the level it would find in the development of its inherent resources.

That the West India proprietor, who wanted "protection" for compulsory labour against free, should now want "protection" for free labour against compulsory, is perfectly consistent. They well know that the production of any agricultural produce by means of large capital and oppressive bounties would subject the growers of produce more adapted to the soil and the climate to their personal and political power—would enable them to control both wages and elections. They see that Hayti finds it cheaper to import than to grow sugar, and they hope to tax our docility to the whole amount of the difference. They feel that the removal of restrictions would break down a monopoly, based, like that of the mother country, on the degradation of the peasantry, and creative of an overbearing oligarchy. Abolish the sugar duties, and the emancipated negro will make a fair bargain with his employer. Continue them, and he will be reduced to his former state of servitude. The Brazilian will not gain freedom, and the Jamaica black will lose it. What right, in fact, have we to take for granted the acquiescence of either in the views we are pleased to take of his interests? We may, perhaps, be inflicting an injury in striving to confer a benefit, and human misery may be increased by the steps we are taking to diminish it. It is the slaves' question in the same sense as the Corn Law is the labourers' question. Emancipation has tested the fertility of the soil. If Free Trade be, as most of the abolitionists maintain, a natural right, no deviation from its correlative obligation can, as they insinuate, be justified by the pretence of eventual good. In the case before us, the good is contingent and doubtful; the evil is present and certain. The cry of inhumanity raised by the "abolitionists" against the "Free-Traders," does not deserve an answer. Who "calls upon Government to sanction slavery?" Government is called upon to mind its own business. Let each party confine itself to its own sphere. Let not the one assume the honour of hating slavery, nor the other incur the disgrace of hating liberty. For my part, I believe that slavery is encouraged by the sugar duties, as I know that the slave trade has been encouraged by its "abolition."

The idea of driving a competitor from the market by selling at a higher price what he deals in has, at least, novelty to recommend it. That free labour is less costly than slave labour is true in a restricted sense alone. No one would suppose that cotton could be grown as cheaply in Canada as in South Carolina; yet the Canadians are free; and the Jamaica negro, if a slave, would be less able to compete with the Brazilian than he now is, while he neglects the cultivation of what would place him above the other. This is but one of the many fallacies associated by ignorant or designing men with this subject.

Mr. Gurney called Cuba sugar "stolen goods" at the late meeting—yet, he himself addresses Mr. Clay, a dealer in these "stolen goods," as his "dear friend." Is it worse to buy "stolen goods" than to express personal regard for the thief? The Quakers would do well to reprove their American brethren for their unworthy contempt of their fellow-men. They have been informed by their "missionary" Shillito, that the prejudice of colour has spread its poisonous infection among the "Friends" of North America. A coloured man was rejected as a candidate for admission by one of their meetings, though acknowledged to be in every respect fully qualified, but in that which referred to the tint and texture of his outward garment. "The Society of Friends," says the Report, "is for 1843, of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society," "is in no wise favourably distinguished from that of the other sectarian divisions into which what calls itself the religious world is divided, while its inconsistency with its own professed principles is more glaring than theirs. The churches have excommunicated members for rebutting their neglect of a duty they do not acknowledge to be one—the Society of Friends has disowned men for pointing out its unfaithfulness to one of its acknowledged testimonies. The sects have done what they could to discourage their members from taking part in the Anti-Slavery movement from their avowed hatred of its objects; the society disavows Friends in promoting it, when its purpose is what they themselves acknowledge to be right and binding upon all mankind," &c.

Here is a fair field for the zeal of our London committee. We may differ in opinion on the subject of Free Trade—on that of humanity we are fully agreed. Humanity is outraged by the Quakers in America; let Free Trade be spared by the Quakers in England. The negro of Philadelphia has long and in vain implored their pity and appealed to their sense of justice. Their interference is wanted on one side of the Atlantic; it may well be dispensed with on the other.

It is much to be wished that some medium of co-operation might be effected between the advocates of Free Trade and of abolition; some literary journal that should point out the affinities that tend to unite them, and remove the misapprehensions which have separated them; some interpreter of the latent sympathies which combine the interests of the free cotton-grower in the east with those of the free corn-grower in the west—something that may prepare the way for that happy conjunction of human affairs that shall remove the causes of hostility, by promoting the commerce of nations and effecting that division of labour among communities which we now see productive of such good effects among the individuals that compose them.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

Manchester, May 15, 1844.

SIR,—In the LEAGUE of the 11th instant, some information is given regarding the qualification of borough electors, and other matters connected with the registration of those who claim to vote for cities and boroughs, all of which is highly useful at the present time. I presume, however, the information applies alone to England—English boroughs, &c. But this is only conjecture on my part, as "England" is not mentioned at all. I shall, therefore, feel greatly obliged if you would be kind enough to state in the LEAGUE, whether under the Reform Act there is any other qualification in Scotch boroughs than that of occupancy?—or whether, over and above this, a rental or income of £10 and upwards, from property situated within a borough returning a member to Parliament, does not also entitle the proprietor to vote irrespective altogether of occupancy, presuming, of course, that he resides within seven miles of the borough for which he claims to vote. I am a voter for one of the counties in Scotland, and cannot know practically how the matter stands with regard to the boroughs; but still I feel confident there is such a qualification as I have referred to. I do not, therefore, ask for the information so much for myself as for many, both here and elsewhere, with whom I have spoken upon the subject, and who cannot think that the boroughs in Scotland possess so great an advantage over those of England in this respect.

Knowing the value of your time and space, I beg to be excused for troubling you on the matter, but shall feel obliged by being instructed on the point.—Yours,

A SUBSCRIBER TO THE LEAGUE.

[Our correspondent is informed, that by the Scotch Reform Act no rating for poor rates is required in Scotch boroughs (in very few, indeed, of which are there any poor-rates). The qualification for Scotch boroughs is the occupancy of premises, of the yearly value of £10, or the ownership of such premises provided owner or occupier resides within seven miles of the borough. Thus, every £10 house gives, in Scotch boroughs, two votes—one to the tenant who occupies, and another to the landlord who owns, if residing within the prescribed distance.]

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—I shall feel obliged if in your next week's notices to correspondents you will tell me, if, under the following circumstances, I can claim a vote for the county:—

I occupy two adjoining houses, leaseholds (the original term 60 years, the rental above £50 per annum); the one gives me a qualification for the borough. Can I claim to be put on the county registry for the house which gives no borough qualification?

Your obedient servant,

R. M., Marylebone.

[No leasehold property which is so situated that it will give a borough vote can confer a county qualification. If the leasehold house, therefore, which R. M. lets to a tenant be situated within Marylebone, it will not give him a county vote. The house let does give a borough qualification either to the tenant, or to R. M., if he chose to occupy it.]

TO THE REGISTRATION COMMITTEE.

GENTLEMEN,—Mr. Cobden has repeatedly stated, that there has been a decision that mere lodgers may entitle themselves to votes. You will confer a great benefit if you cause the authority for this to be printed in the LEAGUE, as it is generally thought that Mr. Cobden is in error, and therefore no attempt is being made in any district that I know of to act upon it. The only known decision that seems to tend that way is on the Stockport case; but that does not go beyond previous decisions as to houses let in parts with open doorways.

Your obedient servant,

G. S.

[The Anti-Corn-Law Parliamentary Registration Association, 68, Cheapside, submitted the following queries, among others, to Mr. Charles Austin, perhaps the most eminent legal authority in parliamentary registration cases in England, and who was counsel in the Wenlock case.

"1. Is the occupier of a single room (of the required value) in a house used exclusively for the purposes of dwelling, the landlord not sleeping on the premises, qualified?"

"2. If so, is such an occupier qualified where the landlord sleeps on the premises?"

"3. And, if the occupier in such a case is qualified, does it make any difference that the landlord contracts in the taking to supply furniture, service, fire, light, &c. &c., in the case of furnished lodgings?"

ANSWERS TO QUERIES.

"1 and 2. I am of opinion that the occupier of a single room or connected set of rooms (of proper value), in a house used exclusively for the purposes of dwelling, with the uncontrolled use of the outer door, is entitled to be registered if otherwise duly qualified; nor do I think that the mere circumstance of the landlord sleeping in such house would be material, unless the landlord retained a control over the outer door or generally in the house, so as to reduce the tenant to the condition of a lodger. Wherever the landlord retained any such control, the tenant would acquire no qualification."

"3. The circumstance mentioned in this query would make no difference, except that, in such a case, the rent would probably be no criterion of value."

G. S. is in error in supposing that the Stockport case, taken in conjunction with the Wenlock case, does not go beyond previous decisions. The former case decided that part of a house or building, was a building; and the second, that a building, whether for business or residence, conferred the franchise. A room in a house is a building; and although it cannot confer the franchise under the first denomination "house," mentioned in the Reform Bill, it does so under the last term used in that act, "other building."

When time and space will admit of it, we may publish a detailed statement on the subject of registration, while it will be seen that Mr. Austin defines the tenant to be one who is subject to control of the master of the house in his egress and ingress; and that wherever an occupant occupies exclusively, and with absolute power, his own apartments, and has his own key to the street door, having right to enter and issue whenever he pleases, he ceases to be a mere lodger, and becomes a tenant within the terms of the act.]

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

London, June 5, 1844.

SIR,—Having observed an article copied into the LEAGUE, of the 25th ult., of a "Farmer in Distress," which being a circumstance unfortunately now of too frequent occurrence under the existing state of the Corn Laws, and this appearing to be a case in which utter destitution is likely to occur without some aid is afforded, I beg you will forward the accompanying small amount of 10s., being contributed by myself and a few sympathising friends, hoping greater liberality will be shown in quarters where more ample means are at command. May your noticing such cases in your valuable paper induce the still wavering to join the good cause, and speedily be the means of abolishing a law at once tyrannical and unjust.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

A MEMBER OF THE LEAGUE.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

June 6, 1844.

SIR,—You will please to forward to Charles Snowden the enclosed 15s., being the third amount collected by me from friends who admire his truly patriotic and fearless conduct at the late Exeter election.

Should any member or friend feel disposed to contribute the smallest amount, I will most cheerfully place it at your disposal. I cannot think a body generous, moral, and enlightened as the League, bound together for the righteous purpose of emancipating a nation from its oppressors, freeing its food and commerce from their iron grasp by the most legitimate and constitutional means within its power, will suffer one of its most humble, but honest, supporters to be crushed by these minions who thrive under the smile of monopoly, and would keep in their power not only the bones and sinews, but the noblest privilege of an Englishman, whose life is a life of toil,—an honest and conscientious sense of duty.

I remain, Sir, yours respectfully,

J. H. HUTCHINSON.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM PETER PLAYFAIR TO HIS BROTHER DANIEL, OXSTALL FARM, MIDDLESEX.

SECOND LETTER.

Ghent, May 24, 1844.

I told you, dear Daniel, that my next visit should be to Ghent, which is called the Manchester of Belgium, just as Liege is called the Birmingham and Namur the Sheffield of this commercial country. Ghent is indeed a magnificent city, with a population of 95,000 inhabitants. It is apparently prosperous, and has an air of commercial bustle which few towns in this country possess. The tall chimneys of the manufactories are seen in every direction lifting their gigantic heads above the surrounding houses, and vomiting forth dense columns of smoke into the clear blue ether. Since the passing of the act of Parliament which permits its exportation, machinery has been chiefly imported from England, and with it English engineers to superintend its erection and working. One of these is to be found in nearly every manufactory, and such is the superiority of our machinery over that manufactured at Liege and Charleroi that the Belgians invariably prefer paying the larger price for it. It is a singular fact, too, and one worth noticing, for its perfect accordance with the principles of Free Trade, that, in spite of all those advantages of the cheaper rate of labour, and the lower price of provisions, we are able still, in some fabrics, to beat the Belgian in his own market. I have recently travelled with an intelligent Leeds manufacturer, who goes up to Germany and Hungary to purchase wools. He pays the cost of the transit to England and the duty hitherto exacted of one penny per lb., manufactures the cloth, sends it back to Belgium and Germany, paying a heavy duty for its admission, and ultimately sells it to advantage in the markets here. I do not say that this is to be done with many articles, but I am cognizant of one transaction for £5000, just completed by this manufacturer with a house at Brussels in one particular fabric. And who can fail to admire the indomitable industry, enterprise, and intelligence of our manufacturers when operating against such fearful odds, or hesitate to confess, if their efforts were unshackled and reciprocal Free Trade encouraged, as well in corn as in machinery, that England would become the workshop of the world?

But, it may be said, how do you reconcile the assertion that the English manufacturer can occasionally undersell the Belgian manufacturer in his own market with the fact that food and labour are cheaper, and with the advantage he now has in English machinery and English overseers? My answer is, that the English manufacturer is incomparably superior to his Belgian competitor in his mode of conducting, and in the arrangements of his business; and, still more important, the English workman is immeasurably above the Belgian workman in industry, and in close, assiduous application to his labour. These are the principal grounds of our superiority and success. I spoke with an intelligent English overseer of one of the factories here on this subject. He assures me that it is impossible to get more than six or seven hours of labour per diem out of a Belgian workman. He will laugh, chat, jest, for the remainder of the day, but not work. Is it not hard, with such elements of commercial prosperity, and such proofs of application as we possess, that our factory men and factory masters should only enjoy a limited success, and should be so far from a state of general and deserved prosperity?

The land between Bruges and Ghent resembles, my dear Daniel, the market gardens between Hammersmith and Brentford, in the neighbourhood of London. For 40 miles you pass through a succession of rich garden land, interspersed with corn, rye, and flax fields. The soil is a rich, black, vegetable mould, over a light sandy subsoil, so light and friable in texture that it is turned by the spade, without using the foot. One horse is sufficient for the plough and the harrow, which has coarse wooden teeth, and is generally drawn by a boy or a man. The country is divided into small farms of from 10 to 100 acres, which were usually the property of the occupant. No law of primogeniture exists in Belgium to occasion heartburning and bitterness between sons of the same sire. Each child, male and female, is entitled to a share of the property of the parent. Property is, therefore, more equally divided, and every farmer has an interest in the permanent improvement of his land. The cottage of the agricultural labourer is generally built of brick, and consists of two or three rooms. It is frequently his own, as well as the small garden in which it stands. Houses cost but little in building. Bricks were 6s. 8d. per thousand, which is rather less than the duty upon them in England. Wood plentiful and cheap, and buildings may be erected for about one-third of the English price. Clothes and food are cheap. The latter, in this part of Flanders, on a general average of articles of diet, about one-half of what they cost in Middlesex. The diet of the peasantry is chiefly rye bread; an abundant supply of vegetables, some varieties of which are not used in England; soup, a little meat, eggs (thirty-six a shilling), cheese, coffee, and beer. The labourer does not appear to consume much animal food, but he looks healthy and strong. His wages average 15d. per day in summer, and 10d. in winter. The burdens on the land are light; but the taxation in towns, including general and municipal duties, is heavy. Ten per cent. is charged on the registry of every estate sold.*

Antwerp, May 28, 1844.

Antwerp is the principal port of Belgium situated on the river Scheldt, a river about as wide as the Thames at Greenwich, and with a draught of water sufficient for ships of any tonnage. It had, at one period, a population of 200,000 souls; and 500 vessels are said, upon an average, to have entered the port daily. The treaty of Munster, in the sixteenth century, gave a deathblow to the commerce of Antwerp, by compelling her to receive her cargoes via Holland. After the battle of Ramilies, in 1706, Antwerp submitted to the Duke of Marlborough. Her ports were then thrown open, and her prosperity returned. Again, at a later period, the spirit of monopoly triumphed. Her commerce was made subservient to that of Holland, and her prosperity declined. With the Revolution it returned; and thus the phases of prosperity or adversity have been distinctly marked by the freedom or restrictions upon commerce. Facts like these speak trumpet-tongued to the monopolist and the protectionist. During the first five months of the present year the commerce of Antwerp has shown a decline of 140 ships, in comparison with the corresponding period last year. This is said to be owing to the fact that the Chamber has been occupied, and is still occupied, with a discussion of the differential duties: so dangerous is it to tamper with the commerce of a country, even when, as in the present instance, the Government desire to alter and relax some of the restrictions upon trade. Coffee from the Dutch colonies is to be admitted free, in return for the manufactures of Ghent, and other cities, admitted into Holland; and thus the healing influence of commercial intercourse will aid in softening down the asperity of political feeling. This, too, is a concession of opinion made by a Catholic-Conservative Ministry to the march of principles now universally admitted by liberal and well-informed men. To show that these men have no desire that the reciprocity should be as the Irish phrase it, all on one side, they say, "Take our corn—we do not want your money, but will have your manufactures in return; but if you wait till we have established manufactories throughout the country in numbers sufficient to supply all our wants, it will be too late." And is this golden opportunity to be lost, because a Kentish baronet and other landlords have daughters to be disposed of, and mortgages to be paid off? Forbid it justice and common sense;—forbid it religion and humanity. Must a nation suffer that a single class may enjoy a bloated and unwholesome prosperity? God forbid!

"Famine hath laid its withering hand
Upon our nation's head;
Oh, Christ! is ours a Christian land?
"Give us our daily bread."

Brussels, June 2, 1844.

Brussels is, indeed, a noble capital, not one of the largest, but certainly one of the most cheerful, clean, and handsome cities in the world. Like Edinburgh, it is divided into two distinct towns, the old and the new. The Park is in the centre of the new town, and is an enchanting garden, planted with splendid old trees, arranged in the fashion of the early part of the last century; divided by broad walks, and square cut grass plots, dotted here and there with flower beds, ornamented with statues and fountains, and crowded with gay and well-dressed people. It is a square, and on the four sides are the Rue Royale, with its noble mansions; the Boulevard, with its splendid drive; the King's Palace, and the Chamber of Representatives. It was in this park that the Prince of Orange, with his troops, was enclosed by the Belgian populace when the nation arose to rid themselves of their oppressors; and it was in front of this park that the British troops paraded, one-third of them for the last time, on the 15th June, before the fatal battles of Quatre Bras and Waterloo. I went yesterday to visit the last celebrated battle-field of Europe, whose name appears to me a singular misnomer. The village and church of Waterloo are at least two miles and a half from the field of battle. The battle itself was fought on some gently undulating ground, between the village of Mount St. Jean and the hamlet of La Belle Alliance. The entire battle-field did not appear, as far as my eye could judge, to cover more than 400 acres of ground; and the respective heights upon which the artillery was planted could not have been more than half a mile to three quarters of a mile apart. 200,000 men and 350 pieces of cannon were thus brought into contact in a space of ground so limited, and with so little cover, that the wonder ceases as to the amount of the slaughter. The Duke of Wellington described it as the most deadly pounding match he ever witnessed; and even the minds of the victors must have sickened at such wholesale slaughter. The orchard at Hougoumont on the right of the British position, containing less than four acres of ground, contained also, on the fatal 18th of June, 1815, the bodies of 1500 of the slaughtered soldiers. At the farm of La Haye Sainte, in the centre of the position, which covered with its buildings about two acres of ground, the slaughter was nearly as great. I cannot now refer to the horrid enormities committed in cold blood after the battle; but they serve to show that, if war is a game at which kings may play, it is one for which subjects must pay both in person and in pocket. As an Englishman, I am proud of the courage and conduct and bravery of my English, Scotch, and Irish brethren; as a man of feeling, I thank God, my dear Daniel, that our lines are cast in such different and such pleasant places. I believe, also, that there is a growing feeling among the people of Europe that wars are unnecessary, and ought not to be permitted upon vain pretences. The people of our country will hereafter have something to say in questions of war and peace. Long may it be ere the fields of Flanders are again fertilized by streams of human gore!

I must delay the conclusion of my remarks upon Brussels until next letter, when I propose to take Liege, celebrated for its iron works and coal mines; Louvain for its ancient University; and Mechlin for laces—what the ladies so love.

AGRICULTURE.

THE COST OF BRITISH WHEAT.

Lord Ducie's statements of the low cost at which a good farmer can grow wheat in this country have made a considerable impression upon the public mind, and have caused much consternation amongst the monopolists. Thus the Mark-lane Express, referring to those statements, says, "We trust that some of our experienced practical readers will answer the noble earl's statements. If such statements are allowed to pass uncontradicted they will produce more effect than a volume of argument unsupported by practical experience." True, most true; but can any practical farmer controvert those statements? We know no good farmer will venture to attempt it; we defy the monopolists to refute those statements, or to resist the conclusions in favour of Free Trade which necessarily follow.

Let us state succinctly what Lord Ducie has demonstrated by evidence drawn from his own farms, and from other farms in Gloucestershire:—First, he has proved by what he has himself done upon Whitfield Example Farm, the rent, tithes, and taxes of which amount to 50s. per acre, that he can grow thirty-three bushels of wheat to the acre at a cost, including rent, manure, labour, and everything, of 4s. 7½d. a bushel; from that sum he deducts for the value of the straw to be consumed on the farm, 11 15s. an acre, or rather more than 1s. a bushel, which leaves the prime cost of wheat 3s. 6d. a bushel. Nor are the means by which this is accomplished either difficult or extraordinary: they consist, first, of an improved farm; and secondly, of a sufficient farming capital. The capital employed by Lord Ducie is £15 per acre; and the present price of wheat (56s. a quarter) will give a return of 35½ per cent. upon that capital. With such power the farmer may grow wheat in alternate years; and thus, assuming nothing to be made by the intermediate green and root crops—an assumption altogether unwarranted by facts—the wheat crop will give an annual return of 17½ per cent. upon the rather considerable capital employed.

Now, the practical agriculturist will not fail to remark that 33 bushels of wheat is by no means a large produce from land upon which capital at the rate of £15 per acre is invested; and we have no hesitation in saying, that if the strong and heavy soils of England were as highly farmed as the comparatively weak thin land of which Lord Ducie's farm in a great measure consists, that their average produce would not be far from 40 bushels an acre. Now, the average price of wheat in the Channel Islands, where the trade is free as air, has been for the last seven years 17s. a quarter; and it is plain that from 33 to 40 quarters to the acre grown, as it can be grown, at a cost of 3s. 6d. a bushel, must give the farmer a very ample profit.

an acre; and on a third, the rent of which is 25s. per acre; and the cost of growing a bushel of wheat was, on the poorest land, 4s. 6d., and on the better soil, 3s. 6d. a bushel. The capital employed on the poorer farms being £8 an acre, and on the better land, £10 an acre. Upon the poor land, 20 bushels of wheat formed the average produce; while on that of higher quality, 30 bushels are grown. Upon the poor land, cultivated on the five-course system, this return, from the wheat crop alone, gives 5½ per cent. yearly on all the capital invested on the farm; and upon the superior land, cultivated upon the same system, 10½ per cent. upon the whole of the invested capital.

At this moment, farmers, who are farming well and with sufficient capital, are making considerable profits, and the greatest obstacles to the extension of good farming are the absence of secure tenures—leases—restrictive covenants, game, and the annoying and perpetual interferences of landlords and stewards. To these causes also must be attributed the reluctance of farmers to lay out £8, £10, or £15 of capital an acre on their farms; for it will be repaid that, when such a system of farming is adopted, so much is sunk in the soil which cannot be recovered in one or two years that no yearly tenant ever thinks of farming so highly. There can be no doubt that a great proportion of farmers employ too little capital, and thus, instead of growing from 30 to 40 bushels of wheat per acre on land well adapted to yield such returns, they grow more commonly from 15 to 20 bushels. This system is strictly the effect of the Corn Laws. The price of corn being occasionally high, and farmers always expecting that it will be high, they only calculate upon growing, by the use of a small capital, that acreable quantity which may be called the natural produce of the land. This varies in good years from 16 to 24 bushels, and in bad years from 10 to 18 bushels per acre. Either must, upon the long run, bring the farmer into debt. The rent paid is the same upon this system as upon that of high farming, unless the landlord has improved his farm, when, of course, he gets a higher rent; and every farmer is willing to pay a handsome per centage upon the cost of judicious permanent improvements in the shape of advanced rent. Taxes are the same, rates commonly higher, in a badly-farmed than in a well-farmed parish. The ploughing, cutting, carrying home, threshing, and marketing, cost the starveling farmer nearly as much per acre as his richer neighbour. More seed is used, and more is necessary, on land in low condition; and in almost every particular the expenses of raising a poor crop is as great, often greater, than that of growing a good one.

But in high farming the landlord gets a less proportion of the whole returns as rent than he does from poor farming, while the man of capital is independent, and requires the security of a lease; in most cases, too, he requires a preliminary outlay by the landlord, either in draining, buildings, or other permanent improvements; and our debt-burdened and political-jobbing aristocracy dread alike demands upon their funds, and emancipation of their tenantry.

Hence they are so eager to preserve the Corn Laws, under the belief that out of scanty crops they can obtain high rents. The public, however, now begin to understand that slovenly farming, and the wasteful management of landed property, are all that is sought to be "protected" by the corn monopoly.

A MONOPOLIST NONPLUSSED.

THE CORONETTED FISHMONGER AGAIN.

When we hear a monopolist promise to "argue" in favour of the Corn Laws, or to refute any argument against restrictions on trade, we always feel the same sort of interest as the House of Commons does when Mr. Ferrand promises to explain one of his misstatements, or a conjurer pledges himself to get into a quart bottle. Nobody believes that either Mr. Ferrand or the conjurer—and some people take Mr. Ferrand for a conjurer, or at least for a person in whose apparent folly there is a very sinister purpose—will attempt to perform their promised feats; but then there is a sort of curiosity to see what funny things they will do. So, with the monopolist reasoner, nobody expects him to argue, but then one wonders what he can say.

It was with this sort of feeling we regarded the promise of the Editor of the Farmer's Journal to answer "next week" our article upon the Duke of Richmond's notorious salmon speech. Well, having taken a week for consideration, our readers shall judge of the success of the monopolist writer; they shall see whether the herculean brain of the monopolist editor has not been spinning rather a flimsy web of sophistry; whether the labouring mountain has not indeed brought forth a ridiculous mouse. And here let us note, for the instruction of our agricultural friends, the significant fact, that the advocates of the Corn Laws begin to dislike to have the term "monopolists" applied to them; they call that designation "League slang." But what is a monopolist but a person who procures by law an exclusive right to furnish any particular commodity? And what is that but a paraphrase for those who passed the Corn Laws? It is always an indication of a bad cause when a party shrinks from a designation—though meant as one of reproach—given by opponents. Parties who have contended for the just and the true have constantly accepted and adopted as distinctive titles the nicknames which their opponents in malice or in scorn have applied to them. But the monopolists of British food like to be delicately called "Protectionists." This savours somewhat of the prudish nicety of the hulks, where the names "convict" or "prisoner" are never used. But, to return to the long-threatened monopolist reply. The writer, after quoting some part of our article, admits our position "that rent is only the surplus after repayment of the tenant's outlay with ordinary profits;" and in so doing—though, for want of a logical mind, or from having been trained in an illegal school, he does not seem to know it—he substantially admits the whole question; for rent being only the surplus after the repayment of capital and labour, it can be of no kind of importance to the capitalist or the labourer whether the rent be high or low, provided it be no more than the real surplus. The Duke of Richmond's £7000 a year might have been reduced to £1000 without in the slightest degree injuring either the tenant of the fishery or his workmen; that is, if the Duke did not succeed in entrapping the tenant into a promise to pay more rent than the fishery was actually worth. But, having admitted our premises, let us see how the Farmer's Journal disputes our conclusions. He says:—

"Now, without taking any exception to a definition of 'rent' which we believe to be inapplicable in the case before us, we ask the 'League' whether the 'outlay' of the tenant of the Scotch fishery, in the shape of wages to his men, is not nearly double what is paid by the proprietors or renters of salmon fisheries in the North of Europe to the hands in their employment, and whether, therefore, the competition in our markets of cheap foreign salmon, caught by cheap foreign labour, does not compel a reduction of the wages paid to the Scottish fishermen, as well as a reduction of the rent paid to the Duke of Richmond and other proprietors similarly circumstanced?"

To this compound question we answer, no; and for these reasons:—The outlay of the tenant of the Scotch fishery, in the shape of wages to his men, may be, or may not be, more than that of the owners or occupiers of European fisheries: that is a question determined by principles altogether different from those which determine the amount of rent; but, unless all the outlay of the tenant of the Scotch fishery—he it more or be it less, be it payments for wages or fish-hooks—shall have been first paid with the ordinary profit, there can be no surplus, and consequently no rent. It is a question of fact whether might have been proved or disproved had a committee of inquiry into the operation of protective duties on imports been granted; but, we say, the truth is, that more capital and more labour have been employed in the fisheries to the Duke of Richmond's new tenant, and since the reduction of the duty on foreign fish, than were employed by the former tenant under the more stringent monopoly of the Duke of Richmond whines over so pathetically. We say, also, that the Scotch fishermen's wages have not been reduced since the new tariff, and that as much salmon from the Duke's fishery is now caught and sent to market as formerly, the only difference being that the price of salmon is lower—the Duke of Richmond and his compeers not having now the exclusive supply of the market—and the consumers get the same quantity of fish for less money, and the law-made surplus or rent of the Duke of Richmond is reduced by £2000 a year. These are the conclusions, and the necessary conclusions, from the admitted premiss which admits rent to be the surplus—and only the surplus—after repayment of the tenant's outlay, with ordinary profits. Let the monopolists gainsay this if they can.

Then, in answer to our question of "Why the Duke of Richmond receives any rent for his fishery?" the monopolist writer says:—

"The Duke of Richmond is entitled to receive rent for his fishery for precisely the same reason that any other owner of property has a right to enjoy the benefits arising from it. The amount of that rent is regulated, in the first instance, like the income derived from letting land or houses—by the amount of sunk money it is deemed to represent, and would probably be, for, allowing, of course, a fair remuneration for the capital employed, and the risk run by the tenant, after defraying all contingent expenses."

This unquestionably is very nonsensical, and is altogether contradicted by the writer's preliminary admission, that rent is only the surplus; but when such nonsense is used to justify the acts of dominant majorities in the Houses of Parliament it is worth exposure. The amount of rent is not regulated by the "amount of sunk money it is deemed to represent, allowing a fair remuneration for the capital employed," whether that money be sunk in land, houses, or fisheries, but by the produce of the land, the house, or the fishery over and above expenses, with ordinary profits. The amount of sunk capital has nothing directly to do with, indeed is only remotely applicable to, such a subject. The capital may have been sunk injudiciously, upon expectations which have proved unfounded, such as the power of the landocracy to enforce a perpetual monopoly of the food of the British nation. The question is whether a law which should compel all the grocers or all the bakers to live within a certain district where there are not enough houses for their accommodation, for the purpose of keeping up the rents and prices of groceries or bakeries within that district for the benefit of the proprietors thereof, would not be an injury to the grocers, and the bakers, and the consumers. And the same reasoning applies with ten thousandfold force to grain and fish.

The fact is, that until the monopolists show that they can by their Corn Law make two grains of corn grow where only one would have grown under a natural soil of things, they do not make out even a plausible case; whereas they themselves admit that the object of the law is to keep up prices by limiting the supply, whether it comes from foreign importation or "scientific farming."

Now, let us give a word of advice to our agricultural contemporary, and that is, not to try to write down to landlord ignorance and the prejudices of the most inferior classes of cultivators; for, even as a pecuniary speculation, he will ere long find he has made a mistake. Light is rapidly breaking in upon the farmers, and they are anxious for real information and bona fide reasoning upon the question of Free Trade. And we are certain that an agricultural journal which would fully and fairly discuss the whole of the bearings of the question—be its own peculiar leaning one way or the other—would find very general acceptance amongst farmers. This at one time the Mark-lane Express seemed inclined to do, though of late its perception has been somewhat obscured by the dust raised by the Duke of Richmond and his fellow-monopolists. As, however, the Duke is letting the Pro-Corn-Law agitation down as easily and as quietly as he can, we may hope that the last-named journal will again ere long treat the question rationally.

The Duke of Richmond referred the other night, in the House of Lords, to his salmon, which he said "is small and delicious; but the public generally prefer large salmon." Now, this is just what he and his fellow-monopolists might say of bread. They might tell a half-starved agricultural labourer that the small loaf which the Corn Laws permit him to purchase for a definite number of pence, being of English growth, was far more "delicious" than the larger loaf he might get by an admixture of foreign corn.

The Farmer's Journal concludes its defence of the Duke with these words:—

"Will the League attempt to combat those truths? We think not. Silence is the best resource of the defender of a bad cause."

What a striking illustration does the monopolist's own article offer of the truth of his last sentence. We have always said that the monopolist landowners in the House of Commons were wise in their generation to vote silently against any change in their monopoly; that a monopolist who attempts to argue is always playing with edged tools; and we think our readers will agree that the Farmer's Journal has not improved the unfavourable position in public estimation in which the Duke of Richmond's fish-monopoly speech has placed him, and that our case against monopoly has not been in any degree weakened by such quasi arguments as those upon which we have commented.

THE FOREIGN COMPETITION FALLACY.

The following testimony—from an unwilling witness—shows the value of Earl Ducie's late admirable speech, and the importance of such practical statements in discussing the question of Free Trade:—

"We lay before our readers a statement made by the Earl of Ducie, at the late meeting of the Anti-Corn-Law League, in Covent-garden Theatre, with a view to show the profits to be derived from growing wheat on land of different qualities, and more particularly to prove that a repeal of the Corn Laws would not throw the poor lands in this kingdom out of cultivation. We trust that some of our experienced practical readers will answer the noble earl's statements. If such statements are allowed to pass uncontroverted they will produce more effect than a volume of argument unsupported by practical experience."—Mark-lane Express.

Can those statements be controverted? Will not the experience of every good farmer in the kingdom give very similar results, if he will only fairly consider the subject? We read Lord Ducie's speech to a good and intelligent farmer, but who, being mixed up with monopolist landlords, has been induced to undertake to go round his parish with a monopolist petition against any alteration of the Corn Laws; and he frankly and fairly admitted that his own experience bore out his lordship's calculations; but he objected to such statements being made, because the landowners would take advantage of them, and try to exact more rent.

RURAL CRIME—THE GAME LAWS.

Our monopolist landowners first refuse to permit their estates to be more than half cultivated for the sake of preserving game, thus preventing a vast amount of employment for the agricultural labourers, and then, when the half-starved peasantry fall into the temptation, which poaching offers to the partially-employed man, they are persecuted by forest laws of the most savage and sanguinary character. We have often had occasion to refer to the iniquitous laws which lords and squires have passed to protect their absurd pastimes; but it seems that the game laws are not as yet sufficiently stringent to answer their purposes, and that another Draco-like statute must be framed to increase the game-law-caused demoralization of our peasantry. A bill containing the most severe enactments to prevent night-poaching has already passed the House of Commons sub silentio—we really want some members who are acquainted with rural affairs, without having the class interests and class prejudices of squires—and on Monday the third reading was moved in the House of Lords by the Suffolk monopolist and game-preserver, Lord Stradbroke. This was opposed by that true-hearted nobleman Lord Radnor, who said:—

"The bill was too stringent in its provisions. It was said that the existing law was inoperative; but in the last year there had been 236 commitments under it, and out of this number five persons had been transported for fifteen years, eight for ten years, and thirty one for seven years, besides 127 who had been sentenced to different terms of imprisonment. This was independent of summary convictions. These were important facts, when their lordships were called upon to strengthen the provisions of the law on the ground that it was inefficient and inoperative. By this bill, any three persons armed, walking along a turnpike road, might be taken up, committed to gaol, and if convicted transported for fourteen years. And what were arms? Bludgeons were arms; if so, the carrying such a stick as that he held in his hand (a walking-stick) might expose a person to apprehension. In the report of the Poor Law Commissioners it was stated that these offences depended upon the state of the population. The progress of the offence of poaching, therefore, was not to be put down by more stringent measures of punishment, but by relieving the distress of the people."

Earl Fitzhardinge attempted to meet this with the stale fallacy that poaching was not caused by distress, because most of the notorious poachers were men of dissolute habits, and who would not work if they could. "Upon his own estate, a valuable servant had been killed in cold blood, and another maimed by persons of this description, who had taken an oath of secrecy, administered by an attorney, who had been transported for the offence." How much more of the wickedness of the system does Earl Fitzhardinge disclose than he intended! Let our readers contemplate the whole of the vicious circle created by the game laws, and say whether it is fit that any game law should longer pollute the statute-book.

The preservation of game is inconsistent with good farming, and, next to the desire of having a dependent tenantry for political purposes, the great object for which landowners prefer yearly tenants is, that they may be compelled to preserve or to permit the preservation of game. Now, we say without hesitation, and we defy contradiction, that a yearly tenant on whose farm the game is kept in the landlord's hands does not, be his situation what it may, make his land produce more than one-half of what it is capable of producing, and which it would profitably produce if the tenant had a lease and the absolute control of the game. Neither does a yearly and game-ridden tenant employ as much labour by one-third as a farmer who has the real and complete possession of his farm. Thus, in the first instance, game-preserving induces poverty, half employment, and distress amongst the agricultural labourers, and then the game itself offers them a ready resource for momentary subsistence. We grant with sorrow that the man who becomes a confirmed poacher generally ends in being a dissolute and idle man, and not unfrequently a savage desperado. But that is no excuse for the law; it is, in truth, one of the strongest grounds of indictment against it. Instead of making the law against poaching more severe than at present, it ought to be abrogated altogether; and hares and pheasants, partridges and rabbits, being wild animals, which no man can call his, except when on his own land, should be no more protected by special laws than sparrows or blackbirds; and, instead of transporting a poor unemployed peasant for shooting game in a highway, the law ought to leave him an absolute right to do so. The truth is, that game-preserving is altogether unsuited to the state of society and the condition of husbandry in this country; and the sooner the practice is totally abandoned the better for all connected with or employed upon land. And the effect of distress amongst the agricultural labourers in increasing the game-law-made crime is strongly illustrated by the tables of criminal statistics for the year 1813, prepared under the authority of the Home-office. Everybody knows that, in 1812-13, the price of wheat was reduced by a moderately good harvest at home, about 10s. a quarter below the act-of-Parliament price on which farmers had been taught to calculate, and of course they were in distress. Landlords only gave back pittances of 10 and 15 per cent. where the whole rent would not always have made good the farmer's loss, and consequently labourers were dismissed in great numbers. And what has been the effect as regards the game laws? Why, the Home-office people tell us, that "in other offences of the miscellaneous class the commitments (for the preceding year) have been nearly stationary, EXCEPTING THE OFFENCES AGAINST THE GAME LAWS, the commitments under which had increased from 101 in the year 1812, to 236 in the past year, OR 43 6 PER CENT. ON AN AVERAGE OF THE THREE PRECEDING YEARS!!! And the increase in the commitments for shooting, stabbing, and wounding, in the first class, may be traced to their connexion with these offences." We believe that poaching is invariably the first step to crime in the rural districts, and if there were no game and game laws, crime of all kinds would be lessened three-fourths in all the agricultural counties. It is worthy of remark that in Suffolk, a great game-preserving county, where Lord Stradbroke, the mover of the new forest law, resides and preserves game, is now the scene of that fearful crime, incendiarism, to a greater extent than any county in England. This crime, like poaching, is the sad result of want of employment for the labourers, a want almost entirely caused by the Corn Laws.

A correspondent of the Times, who signs himself "WEST SUFFOLK," advocates the assessment of game to the parochial rates, and, as his letter states, confirms some of our observations, we shall extract it a few passages. He says,—"The defect and abuse I purpose bringing to your notice savours much of this. It is, 'the non-assessment of game for parochial and county purposes.' The provincial press is too much under the influence of country gentlemen and game-preservers, for us to hope that any exposure will originate there, or even be admitted into their columns." Here is the mode in which game interferes with husbandry:—

"A tenant farmer, hiring his occupation, signs his agreement, containing the usual clause of reserving the game and right of sporting to the landlord; and if he asks questions as to the extent to which the game will be preserved, is either unanswered, or deemed impertinent—the character of the landlord being deemed a guarantee against extremes. The tenant expends a large capital on the faith of his agreement, expecting to be reimbursed before the expiration of his term. From death or purchase, he finds himself under another landlord—either a game mad or a penurious man; the game wears like locusts about his corn fields, devastating the fresh sown, the growing, and the ripening crops. The tenant gives way, unable to stand against the spoiler, the game makes; the farm (a large one) is let to another tenant for £200 per year less, as the landlord is still determined on having an excessive quantity of game. The assessment of the farm is, of course, reduced in proportion to the rental, and other property in the parish proportionably overtaxed, or rather overburdened. The game is killed, is sold to the highest and best bidder, and the landlord pockets the proceeds, which are amenable for neither parochial nor county purposes."

This is a precise way of showing how much destruction is caused by game. The writer gives a case in point:—

"I know a parish near by, the entire property of one individual, where the farms conjointly are let for above £700 a year. The owner goes abroad, and the lease—a pound, shillings, and pence man hires the sporting for £1000 per annum. He makes a considerable profit by his speculation, which is neither taxable nor assessable. It is said down as a truism that five hares eat and destroy as much as would keep a sheep; my own observations lead me to consider that three hares to one sheep is nearer the mark, bearing in mind their unlimited range and voracious appetites. Our laws designate game as feræ naturæ, but modern civilization has made them as tame as barn-door fowls; they are familiarised to the approach of man by his constant surveillance, and as easily kept in a covert as hens and chickens are in a farm-yard."

He says this system must be brought to notice:—
"The position of England at this period, considering the mania that exists for an approach to Free-trade principles, demands that all abuses and defects, however latent they may hitherto have been, or however 'consacrated by time,' should be brought to notice. I know of whole districts where the farm tenants are forbidden to either mow their wheat or drill their turnips. The first system costs less by 2s. an acre to harvest, and further secures to the tenant an extra quantity of straw for the use of his stock, and for making manure, but it destroys the laying, or jungle, for partridges in September. The latter system produces a much greater weight of root per acre, at a much smaller expense, but it encourages the birds to run, and thus spoils the nose of the best pointer, and the sport of the shooter; but, if this mania (right or wrong) gains its sway, England, to exist as a nation, must allow her cultivators to grow the greatest quantity of grain at the least possible cost, and any abuses or restrictions, confining either the capital or capabilities of the cultivators of her soil, ought to be canvassed and then removed. The recriminating details of proceedings between farm tenants and game preservers' keepers might be entered into without spleen, and also poaching, to which the numbers and tameness of the game offer every encouragement."

This plainly shows that the corn monopoly is only necessary to maintain bad farming, game preserves, and dependent tenant-farmer voters. Before quitting this subject we must refer to one of the most monstrous cases of a game conviction we have recently noticed. Here it is in all its atrocity:—

"BICESTER PETTY SESSION, May 24.—Present, the Rev. A. Matthews and J. Lechmere, W. Style and C. C. Dormer, Esqrs. Game.—Thomas Causeley, of Bicester, was charged, on the information of W. Elliott, with having, on the 15th of May, killed a partridge and taken fourteen eggs. Griffin proved the serving of the summons, but Causeley did not appear. Mr. Mayley appeared for the prosecution. Mr. Phillips proved the offence, and deposed to his having met Causeley in the parish of Bicester Market End, on the day in question, with the bird in his hand, Causeley telling him at the time that he had just killed her on her nest, and that she was still warm. In his cap Mr. Phillips found the fourteen eggs. Causeley took Mr. Phillips to the place, and showed him the nest from which he had taken them. Mr. Mayley pressed the charge, stating that unless a stop was put to it there would not be any game in the neighbourhood of Bicester; that Causeley was a bad character, he having been seven times before the bench, and four times convicted. Convicted on each separate charge, and sentenced to pay for killing the bird, costs 2s. 6d., and constable 1s. 6d., with a fine of £1 6s. In default of immediate payment, two months' imprisonment. For taking the eggs, costs 11s., with a fine of £3 10s. In default of payment, two months' imprisonment with hard labour. Mr. Horner declined signing the conviction, and saw no reason for adding 'hard labour' to the sentence."—Aylesbury News.

Could such deeds be done in any other civilised community of the world?

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, June 8, 1844.

A report on the incendiary fires in Suffolk and Norfolk has appeared in the Times of Friday morning, equal in ability, and scarcely inferior in interest, to the celebrated reports on the disturbed districts in Wales, already published by that journal. Although these outrages afford fearful proof of the condition to which the agricultural labourers have been reduced by the operation of the Corn Laws, we have been very unwilling to direct attention to so painful a subject, so long as there was a hope that the Monopolists would take into consideration the condition of their wretched serfs, and concede in time a redress of their grievances. But the remedy is delayed while the disease increases in extent and intensity. The excellent report before us states:—

"Since Michaelmas last, in the county of Suffolk alone, there have been 131 agricultural fires in which one insurance company has been called upon to make good the various insurances effected upon the property consumed. This is some index to their frequency, but far from a complete one, as all farmers are not insured, nor are the insurances effected confined to one insurance-office. About a fortnight ago there were no fewer than 16 agricultural fires in one week in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, the same crime also prevailing over parts of the north of Essex. People seem stricken with dismay. In this town Messrs. Ransom and Co., large iron-founders and agricultural implement manufacturers, have been compelled, to meet the exigency, to manufacture a large fire-engine, and to organize about 60 of their men as a fire-brigade to be ready to start at any moment to any part of the surrounding district, so numerous and calamitous in their results have the fires been."

The reporter having thus described the extent of the evil, proceeds to examine the various causes that have been assigned for its origin, and treats with contemptuous ridicule the impudent and absurd calumny which ascribed them to some inexplicable machinations of the League; but as the stupid calumniators, who gave vent to this precious specimen of malignant folly, so obviously showed that they did not believe their own assertions, and so utterly failed to produce an impression by patent and palpable mendacity, that even their callous idiocy was forced to admit a conviction of failure, we need not extract the reporter's refutation of the variously-titled bearers of false witness. We leave them to enjoy, as they may, the luxury of being at once detected in their knavery and despised in their folly.

The reporter next examines the supposition that these fires have originated in vagrancy, in an insatuated spirit of imitation, in sheer love of mischief, and in innate depravity, successfully showing that no one of these theories can be reconciled with the notorious circumstances of the case. He then directs attention to the following fact:—

"That it is the labourers who commit these acts, I think no doubt can be entertained, from the general diffusion of the fires in particular districts, from the fact that the greater part of the incendiaries who have been apprehended are young farm-labourers, and from the spirit which is said to prevail and to be exhibited amongst the labourers at any fire which takes place. I have heard of several instances of this bad feeling showing itself at fires from parties who have witnessed it, and who have heard the sullen expressions, 'Let it burn—I'll be d—d if I help to put it out;' but I prefer quoting the opinion of Mr. Bevan, the chairman of the Bury Quarter Sessions, expressed in his address to the grand jury about a week ago. Speaking of the feeling shown at a late fire, he says:—'At the occasion of the late calamitous fire at Tuddenham, while the populace did all they could to extinguish the flames, others of the Mildenhall people did all they could to promote the fire by casting fuel upon it. A certain magistrate who was present had said he had seen fuel placed on the fire and could not prevent it.'"

Now, such a phenomenon as is here described—the combination of the farm-labourers to destroy the property of their masters and their neighbours, instead of being its guardians and protectors—may well excite surprise and alarm. The reporter has felt the grave responsibility which such an investigation has imposed upon him, and the assiduity of his inquiries is not less conspicuous than his honest and manly statement of the results:—

"I was struck the other day with a remark of an old and experienced insurance officer with whom I was conversing on the subject:—'That the Norwich Union-office could invariably tell, from the prevalence of fires in the agricultural districts, what was the condition of the people. Whenever wages were very low in any part of the country, and the people were badly off, or whenever it was threatened that wages would be lowered, they always found fires to commence and increase; and, on the contrary, when better wages began to be paid, the number of fires diminished, and they at last ceased.' Of the same opinion is the chairman of the Ipswich Quarter Sessions, who last week stated in his address to the grand jury:—'In my opinion, the only efficient protection for agricultural property—the only rational hope that exists of restoring the country to a wholesome state, and of insuring permanent tranquillity—is to be obtained by securing to the labourer constant employment, together with the payment of more liberal wages.'"

"The same gentleman (Sir A. Henniker, Bart.) is further reported to have said:—'Let me not be supposed for an instant to accuse those who are sufferers that they have not been sufficiently considerate, because I have seen in the public reports of the trials of incendiaries that their employers have been men even distinguished for kindness and goodness. Still, I think the grand jury will agree with me that there are no means so likely to remove the probability of a recurrence of such evils as those which I have stated. They said, as agriculturists, that the soil was grateful to those who properly cultivated it, and would return all that had been bestowed upon it; but rather should they say, also, the honest and industrious labourer was grateful for what was done to him, and that he would return, with his wife and children, justice and kindness a hundredfold. To carry such a recommendation into effect might, perhaps, require some sacrifice, but it would yet be accompanied by a satisfaction pleasing, indeed, to them as men and as Christians—a satisfaction which would be of benefit to them; and, let them hope, would bring from above a reward to all, because such liberality, 'like the gentle dew from heaven, both blessed him that takes and him that gives.'"

We shall look anxiously for the continuance of these reports. Such benevolent inquiries as the Times has instituted in this and several other instances, are a proof that journalism is conscious of the responsibilities attached to its power as a fourth estate of the realm, and goes far to maintain the decided superiority in intelligence, fairness, and philanthropy, which the English newspapers have acquired over the press in other countries.

EASTINGTON (NEAR STROUD), GLOUCESTERSHIRE, January 6.—Mr. Josiah Hunt, of Aldmondsbury, Gloucestershire, gave a lecture on the Corn Laws and Free Trade in the Reading-room, at the above village, showing the practical bearing of these laws on agriculture in particular; his arguments were most convincing, and told well on his audience, by whom he was loudly cheered during some parts of his address. Some tenant-farmers and farm-labourers were present.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEMORIAL.—An address to P. H. Howard, Esq., and W. Marshall, Esq., the representatives of this city, is now in the course of signature amongst the electors, respectfully requesting them to vote for Mr. Villiers's motion for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. It has already received the signatures of about 520 registered electors. The total number of electors on the register is 1025—and of course includes a number of duplicates, and of persons dead and removed since last year.—Carlisle Journal.

GEORGE THOMPSON, ESQ.—It is with great pleasure we learn that this gentleman is about to visit Southampton, to address a meeting of the Free-Trade Association on the cause which they are engaged in advancing. The meeting will be held on Monday next at the splendid carriage bazaar of Mr. Andrews, who has generously given the use of it to the association for this purpose. The numerous friends of Mr. Thompson, we have no doubt, will eagerly embrace this opportunity of welcoming him on his recent return from India.—Hampshire Independent.

REVIEW.

Coningsby; or, the New Generation. By B. Disraeli, Esq., M.P. London, Colburn.—(Third Notice.)

We return to the consideration of this book and the party whose opinions it is supposed to represent, because both present to us the two great elements in which the social state of our day is most deficient, high principle and high purpose. It is perfectly obvious that a direct and immediate recognition of the moral government of Providence forms the foundation of the creed of Young England; to us it appears equally obvious that they hold this principle more in accordance with the Hebrew Theocracy than with "the kingdom which is not of this world." We do not say this in the way of censure; there has been no great revolution in modern times, either permanent or beneficial in its effects, which has not been based on Theocratic principles, and in which the authors have not felt themselves, whether justly or unjustly, to be the commissioned agents of a Providential ministration. The great man who saved Europe from Asiatic despotism and feudal barbarism, the much calumniated and misrepresented Hildebrand, identified the Papacy with the Theocracy, and aimed at establishing a spiritual empire for the reformation of temporal abuse. He contended against powers and principalities for no selfish end of personal or party aggrandisement; he boldly adhered to a principle under circumstances, through which nothing but an earnest conviction of truth and a firm consciousness of rectitude could have borne him scatheless. "I have loved righteousness and hated iniquity, and therefore I die an exile," were his last words as the sun of his existence sunk in clouds of darkness and disappointment. Such are not the dying words of selfishness and hypocrisy; they were the expressions of a mind that had conceived the glorious idealism of religion guiding intellect, and intellect governing humanity. While we grant the impracticability of realizing such an idea—while we confess that such a theory of government could only be worked out by the ministration of angels—let us not refuse homage to the great mind by which it was conceived, but let us, if we please, pour forth vials of indignation on the petty selfishness and paltry ambition by which the theory was grossly perverted, and to which it was ultimately sacrificed.

The Hebrew Theocracy was uppermost in the mind of Luther when he hurled defiance at the Vatican. Rabbi Joseph ben Sphardi, who was nearly his cotemporary, records with admiration the similarity of the great Augustinian to those prophets who, in the decline of the Theocracy, denounced judgments on the followers of Baal and the forsakers of Jehovah; the worthy Rabbi all but recognises the mission of the Reformer. It was because he looked upon himself as the destined restorer of Messiah's kingdom that Luther so firmly believed himself exposed to personal conflict with Satan. The idea of the Theocracy was the chief source of his strength,—we deny not that it was to a considerable extent the source of his weakness,—it rendered him stern, haughty, and uncompromising; but, had his mind been constituted of more yielding materials, we doubt whether Germany would recognise to this day the voice which woke her intelligence from the slumber of ages.

The divine right of kings was an idea introduced—we should rather say self-developed—to supply the want of the Theocratic sentiment which had been associated with the papacy; it is a doctrine which falls dull and heavy on our ears, because it is associated with the names of a pedantic idiot and vulgar profligate, like James I.; an imbecile hypocrite, like Charles I.; a heartless debauchee, like Charles II.; and a stupid bigot, like James II. The sanctity of royalty is a theory that has never had fair play in England, because parasites and flatterers, utterly regardless of its ideal beauty, applied it with gross and fulsome adulation to as worthless a race of kings as ever found a place in history. No principle could stand against such absurdity of application as James I. taking the prophet Samuel's description of a sovereign, intended as a warning against royalty, and gravely proposing it to his subjects as an authoritative statement of the constitutional rights of a monarch.

It was the principle of Theocracy pervading every man in the ranks of Cromwell's army that enabled a handful of soldiers to effect the conquest of Ireland, in spite of four hostile, though dissociated, parties, any one of which might have crushed them in a moment. They looked upon themselves as the chosen of the Lord, predestined to extirpate idolatry, as the new Israelites ordained to subdue a western Canaan. It is true that the notion of a Theocracy was as much profaned by a vulgar democracy as it ever had been by a vulgar monarch. We are told that the state of Massachusetts thus perverted the principles when they wished to seize some hunting-grounds of the Indians. A meeting was held, and, after the usual preliminaries of prayer and preaching, the following resolutions were submitted, and unanimously adopted:—"1. Resolved, that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. 2. Resolved, that the Lord hath given the inheritance of the earth unto his saints. 3. Resolved, that we are the saints."

We have seen that papacy, monarchy, and democracy have successively taken up the Theocratic principle, and have successively desecrated and dragged it through the mire and dirt of petty selfishness, and corrupt, because partial interests. Do we then say that the principle is one which should be abandoned? God forbid. On the contrary, we ever have maintained, and ever will maintain, that no political party deserves or can secure the confidence of this country which has not for its principle, "Glory to God in the highest," and for its purpose "peace on earth, good will towards men." But we do assert that those who adopt this principle, and profess this purpose, take upon themselves a heavy responsibility; nowhere else is the terrible truth, Corruptio optimi est pessima, so strongly and fatally exemplified. They who set up such a banner must abandon all self-seeking, and particularly its most dangerous and pernicious form, "class-seeking;" they must not mistake institutions for principles, nor means for ends. They must be large in their sympathies, tolerant in their judgments, universal in their philanthropy: "Be ye children of your Father in heaven, who causeth His sun to rise upon the evil and the good, and sendeth His rain upon the just and upon the unjust." The policy resulting from such principles will be marked by the generous confidence of conscious integrity and consequent strength; the opposite policy will be marked by a lurking consciousness of dishonesty and consequent weakness. This point is well put by Mr. Disraeli:—

"Exclusive principles in the constitution and restrictive principles in commerce have grown up together; and have really nothing in common with the ancient character of our political settlement, or the manners and customs of the English people. Confidence in the loyalty of the nation, testified by munificent grants of rights and franchises, and favour to an expansive system of traffic, were distinctive qualities of the English sovereignty, until the House of Commons usurped the better portion of its prerogatives. A widening of our electoral scheme, great facilities to commerce, and the rescue of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects from the Puritanic yoke, from fetters which have been fastened on them by English Parliaments in spite of the protests and exertions of English sovereigns; these were the three great elements and fundamental truths of the real Pitt system—a system founded on the traditions of our monarchy, and caught from the writings, the speeches, the councils, of those who, for the sake of these and analogous benefits, had ever been anxious that the sovereign of England should never be degraded into the position of a Venetian Doge.

"It is in the plunder of the Church that we must seek for the primary cause of our political exclusion, and our commercial restraint. That unhalloved booty created a factitious aristocracy, ever fearful that they might be called upon to regorge their sacrilegious spoil. To prevent this they took refuge in political religionism, and paltering with the disturbed consciences or the pious fantasies of a portion of the people, they organized them into religious sects. These became the unconscious Protectors of their ill-gotten domains. At the head of these religionists, they have continued ever since to govern, or powerfully to influence, this country. They have in that time pulled down thrones and churches, changed dynasties, abrogated and remodelled Parliaments; they have disfranchised Scotland, and confiscated Ireland. One may admire the vigour and consistency of the Whig party, and recognise in their career that unity of purpose that can only spring from a great principle; but the Whigs introduced sectarian religion, sectarian religion led to political exclusion, and political exclusion was soon accompanied by commercial restraint."

We lay aside all reference to persons and parties; it is now of little avail to discuss with whom political exclusion and commercial restraint originated; what we have now to inquire is, whether those who recognise their iniquity will lend their aid to their total and immediate abolition. How will "Young England" receive the question of Jewish emancipation whenever it may be mooted? and, what is of more immediate moment, how will "Young England" vote on the abolition of the Corn Laws?

Independent of the deep interest which we take in the great question, we feel not a little anxious for the maintenance of the character of a party which has started with high principle and high purpose. We wish to see whether that principle and that purpose are sufficient to break the conventional trammels of class and party. Mr. Disraeli with great force, and unfortunately with great truth, exhibits the situation of the Premier, fettered and restrained from pursuing the course of which no one sees more clearly the wisdom and the rectitude, by the associations and connexions of party-life. It is a companion picture to Gulliver chained down by the Lilliputians.

"We have seen that at an early period of his career, Mr. Peel withdrew from official life. His course had been one of unbroken prosperity; the hero of the University had become the favourite of the House of Commons. His retreat, therefore, was not prompted by chagrin. Nor need it to have been suggested by a calculating ambition, need it to have been suggested by a fast bearing to him for the ordinary course of events was fast bearing to him all to which man could aspire. One might rather suppose that he had already gained sufficient experience, perhaps that he had already gained sufficient pause in that in his Irish Secretaryship, to make him pause in that career of superficial success which education and custom had hitherto chalked out for him, rather than the creative energies of his own mind. A thoughtful intellect may have already detected elements in our social system which required a finer observation, and a more unbroken study, than the gyves and trammels of office would permit. He may have discovered that the representation of the University, looked upon in those days as the blue ribbon of the House of Commons, was a sufficient fetter without unnecessarily adding to its restraint. He may have wished to reserve himself for a happier occasion, and a more progressive period. He may have felt the strong necessity of arresting himself in his rapid career of felicitous routine, to survey his position in calmness, and to comprehend the stirring age that was approaching.

"For that he could not but be conscious that the education which he had consummated, however ornate and refined, was not sufficient. That age of economical statesmanship which Lord Shelburne had predicted in 1787, when he demolished in the House of Lords Bishop Watson and the Balance of Trade, which Mr. Pitt had comprehended, and for which he was preparing the nation when the French Revolution diverted the public mind into a stronger and more turbulent current, was again impending, while the intervening history of the country had been prolific in events which had aggravated the necessity of investigating the sources of the wealth of nations. The time had arrived when parliamentary pre-eminence could no longer be achieved or maintained by gorgeous abstractions borrowed from Burke, shallow systems purloined from De Lolme, adorned with Horatian points, or varied with Virgilian passages. It was to be an age of abstruse disquisition, that required a compact and sinewy intellect, nurtured in a class of learning not yet honoured in colleges, and which might arrive at conclusions conflicting with predominant prejudices.

"Adopting this view of the position of Mr. Peel, strengthened as it is by his early withdrawal for awhile from the direction of public affairs, it may not only be a charitable, but a true estimate of the motives which influenced him in his conduct towards Mr. Canning, to conclude that he was not guided in that transaction by the disingenuous rivalry usually imputed to him. His statement in Parliament of the determining circumstances of his conduct, coupled with his subsequent and almost immediate policy, may perhaps always leave this a painful and ambiguous passage in his career; but in passing judgment on public men, it behoves us ever to take large and extended views of their conduct; and previous incidents will often satisfactorily explain subsequent events, which, without their illustrating aid, are involved in misapprehension or mystery.

"It would seem, therefore, that Sir Robert Peel from an early period meditated his emancipation from the political confederacy in which he was implicated, and that he has been continually baffled in this project. He broke loose from Lord Liverpool; he retired from Mr. Canning. Forced again into becoming the subordinate leader of the weakest government in parliamentary annals, he believed he had at length achieved his emancipation, when he declared to his late colleagues, after the overthrow of 1830, that he would never again accept a secondary position in office. But the Duke of Wellington was too old a tactician to lose so valuable an ally. So his grace declared, after the Reform Bill was passed, as its inevitable result, that thenceforth the Prime Minister must be a member of the House of Commons, and this aphorism, cited as usual by the Duke's parasites as demonstration of his supreme sagacity, was a graceful mode of resigning the pre-eminence which had been productive of such great party disasters. It is remarkable that the party who devised and passed the Reform Bill, and who governed the nation in consequence for ten years, never once had their Prime Minister in the House of Commons; but that does not signify; the Duke's maxim is still quoted as an oracle almost equal in prescience to his famous query, 'How the King's Government was to be carried on?' a question to which his grace by this time has contrived to give a tolerably practical answer.

"Sir Robert Peel, who had escaped from Lord Liverpool, escaped from Mr. Canning, escaped even from the Duke of Wellington in 1832, was at length caught in 1831, the victim of ceaseless intrigues, who neither comprehended his position, nor that of their country."

Ten years have elapsed since Sir Robert Peel was thus caught and pinioned. He has made some struggles to set himself free, but the result has invariably been that which Hudibras describes when he attempted to escape from the lady—

"And as a dog committed close
For some offence by chance breaks loose
And quits the clog, but all in vain
He still drags after him the chain;
Thus, though my ankle she has quitted,
My heart continues still committed."

We hope that Sir Robert Peel's name will not be handed down to posterity as that of a statesman who exposed his country to ruin from sheer cowardice—from dread of facing a faction which he despised, and by which he was in turn spurned and insulted. But though "His towering spirit now he broke, yet "Young England" as yet stands upright; its position is not sufficiently comprehended for the veterans of political warfare to understand any portion of its tactics. Had the value of the steeds been known, there are plenty of jockeys who would have tried to train them to harness previously to working them as useful hacks. The protest against what is justly called the Venetian Constitution, is hollow hypocrisy, unless accompanied with a resolution to remove the worst badge of tyranny imposed by a worse than Venetian Oligarchy. Mr. Disraeli must himself explain the meaning of our Venetian Constitution:—

His neck he bended to the yoke,"

"The Venetian Constitution!" said Sir Joseph. "To be sure," said Millbank. "We were governed in this country by the Venetian Constitution from the accession of the House of Hanover. But that yoke is past. And now, I hope we are in a state of transition from the Italian Dogeship to the English Monarchy."

"King, Lords, and Commons, the Venetian Constitution!" exclaimed Sir Joseph.

"But they were phrases," said Coningsby, "not facts. The King was a Doge; the Cabinet the Council of Ten. Your Parliament, that you call Lords and Commons, was nothing more than the Great Council of Nobles."

"The resemblance was complete," said Millbank, "and no wonder, for it was not accidental; the Venetian Constitution was intentionally copied."

"We should have had the Venetian Republic in 1640," said Coningsby, "had it not been for the Puritans. Geneva beat Venice."

"I am sure these ideas are not very generally known," said Sir Joseph bewildered.

"Because you have had your history written by the Venetian party," said Coningsby, "and it has been their interest to conceal them."

"I will venture to say that there are very few men on our side in the House of Commons," said Sir Joseph, "who are aware that they were born under a Venetian Constitution."

"Let us go to the ladies," said Millbank smiling.

Let us go to the same authority for the constituent elements of this Oligarchy and their claims to despotic dictation:—

"Ancient lineage!" said Mr. Millbank; "I never heard of a peer with an ancient lineage. The real old families of this country are to be found among the peasantry; the gentry, too, may lay some claim to old blood. I can point you out Saxon families in this county who can trace their pedigree beyond the Conquest; I know of some Norman gentlemen whose fathers undoubtedly came over with the Conqueror. But a peer with an ancient lineage is to me quite a novelty. No, no; the thirty years of the wars of the Roses freed us from those gentlemen. I take it after the battle of Tewkesbury, a Norman baron was almost as rare a being in England as a wolf is now."

"I have always understood," said Coningsby, "that our peerage was the finest in Europe."

"From themselves," said Millbank, "and the heralds they pay to paint their carriages. But I go to facts. When Henry VII. called his Parliament, there were only twenty-nine temporal peers to be found, and even some of them took their seats illegally, for they had been attainted. Of those twenty-nine not five remain, and they, as the Howards for instance, are not Norman nobility. We owe the English peerage to three sources: the spoliation of the church; the open and flagrant sale of its honours by the elder Stuarts; and the boroughmongering of our own times. Those are the three main sources of the existing peerage of England, and in my opinion disgraceful ones."

Now, we are of those who believe that the profession of "high principles" opens to men a high vocation; and that abandonment of such a vocation predestines the deserters to that irretrievable contempt which courts mere oblivion as its only refuge. A party makes its destiny for itself; the sneers of the ignorant, the calumnies of the prejudiced, and the malignant arts of the Rigby brood may safely be defied, provided that principle and purpose be held steadily in view. Dereliction from the creed once propounded and accepted is certain destruction. "That which is crooked," says the Preacher, "cannot be made straight, and that which is wanting cannot be numbered." If "Young England" accepts its destiny it may do much for the nation; if it falters at the crisis, its name will become a mockery and a byword, and a hissing and a scorn. The test of its sincerity is not far distant: it will soon be determined whether they have chosen the exclusive Theocracy of Paganism and Semi-paganism, or whether they have adopted that Theocratic principle which manifests its existence by strictly adhering to the rule, "To do justice, to love mercy, and to walk humbly before God." Need we add that class-legislation is opposed to justice, that taxing the food of the poor is inconsistent with mercy, and it is not only the opposite of humility, it is daring impiety to place legislative restrictions on the Divine decree, "Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth."

Here we should gladly close, had not some of Mr. Disraeli's critics chosen to sneer at the character of Sidonia, and his noble defence of Hebrew intellect. We quote part of the passage, equally conspicuous for its eloquence and its truth:—

"You never observe a great intellectual movement in Europe in which the Jews do not greatly participate. The first Jesuits were Jews; that mysterious Russian Diplomacy which so alarms Western Europe, is organized and principally carried on by Jews; that mighty revolution which is at this moment preparing in Germany, and which will be in fact a second and greater Reformation, and of which so little is as yet known in England, is entirely developing under the auspices of Jews, who almost monopolize the professorial chairs of Germany. Neander, the founder of Spiritual Christianity, and who is Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Berlin, is a Jew. Benary, equally famous, and in the same University, is a Jew. Wehl, the Arabic Professor of Heidelberg, is a Jew. Years ago, when I was in Palestine, I met a German student who was accumulating materials for the History of Christianity, and studying the genius of the place; a modest and learned man. It was Wehl; then unknown, since become the first Arabic scholar of the day, and the author of the life of Mahomet. But for the German professors of this race, their name is Legion. I think there are more than ten at Berlin alone."

"I told you just now that I was going up to town to-morrow, because I always made it a rule to interpose when affairs of state were on the carpet. Otherwise, I never interfere. I hear of peace and war in newspapers, but I am never alarmed, except when I am informed that the sovereigns want treasure; then I know that monarchs are serious."

"A few years back we were applied to by Russia. Now, there has been no friendship between the Court of St. Petersburg and my family. It has Dutch connexions which have generally supplied it, and our representations in favour of the Polish Hebrews, a numerous race, but the most suffering and degraded of all the tribes, has not been very agreeable to the Czar. However, circumstances drew to an approximation between the Romanoffs and the Sidonias. I resolved to go myself to St. Petersburg. I had on my arrival an interview with the Russian Minister of Finance, Count Canorin; I beheld the son of a Lithuanian Jew. The loan was connected with the affairs of Spain; I resolved on repairing to Spain from Russia. I travelled without intermission. I had an audience immediately on my arrival with the Spanish Minister, Senor Mendizabel; I beheld one like myself, the son of a Nuovo Cristiano, a Jew of Arragon. In consequence of what transpired at Madrid, I went straight to Paris to consult the President of the French Council; I beheld the son of a French Jew, a hero, an imperial marshal, and very properly so, for who should be military heroes if not those who worship the Lord of Hosts?

"And is Soult a Hebrew?"

"Yes, and several of the French Marshals, and the most famous; Massena for example; his real name was Manasseh; but to my anecdote. The consequence of our consultations was that some northern power should be applied to in a friendly and mediate capacity. We fixed on Prussia, and the President of the Council made an application to the Prussian Minister, who attended a few days after our conference. Count Arnim entered the cabinet, and I beheld a Prussian Jew. So you see, my dear Coningsby, that the world is governed by very different personages to what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes."

"You startle, and deeply interest me."

"You must study physiology, my dear child. Pure races of Caucasians may be persecuted, but they cannot be despised, except by the brutal ignorance of some mongrel breed, that brandishes faggots and howls exterminations, but is itself exterminated without persecutions by that irresistible law of nature which is fatal to curs."

"But I come also from Caucasians," said Coningsby.

"Verily; and thank your Creator for such a destiny: and your race is sufficiently pure. You come from the shores of the Northern Sea, land of the blue eye, and the golden hair, and the frank brow; 'tis a famous breed with whom we Arabs have contended long; from which we have much suffered; but these Goths, and Saxons, and Normans, were doubtless great men."

"But so favoured by Nature, why has not your race produced great poets, great orators, great writers?"

"Favoured by Nature and by Nature's God we produced the lyre of David; we gave you Isaiah and Ezekiel; they are our Olynthians, our Philipps. Favoured by Nature we still remain: but in exact proportion as we have been favoured by Nature we have been persecuted by man. After a thousand struggles; after acts of heroic courage that Rome has never equalled; deeds of divine patriotism that Athens, and Sparta, and Carthage have never excelled; we have endured fifteen hundred years of supernatural slavery, during which, every device that can degrade or destroy man has been the destiny that we have sustained and baffled. The Hebrew child has entered adolescence only to learn that he was the Pariah of that ungrateful Europe that owes to him the best part of its laws, a fine portion of its literature—all its religion. Great poets require a public; we have been content with the immortal melodies that we sang more than two thousand years ago by the waters of Babylon and wept. They record our triumphs; they solace our affliction. Great orators are the creatures of popular assemblies; we were permitted only by stealth to meet even in our temples. And as for great writers the catalogue is not blank. What are all the schoolmen: Aquinas himself, to Maimonides; and as for modern philosophy, all springs from Spinoza."

We should wish the world to know that Talmudism is not Judaism, and that Chirrim's account of the Hebrew race, which has become the arsenal for all the bigots of Europe, is just such a representation as a Mohammedan might give of Christianity from the ravings of Muggleton or Joanna Southcote. We know that among the Jews in England there are men of as powerful intellect, as exalted principle, as pure patriotism, and as enlarged philanthropy as any other division of the nation could produce. We have found minds consigned "to cold obstruction," by our exclusive laws, with capacities for enlightened statesmanship which it would not be easy to parallel. We know of one, who to talents of the highest order unites the same untiring energy of purpose which supported his ancestors through all the vicissitudes of alternate triumph and persecution,—a true knight of Judah's chivalry, equally void of fear and reproach,—and we see him doomed to stand without the pale of the constitution, wasting those powers in compulsory idleness which he is anxious to devote to the service of his adopted country. But we shall not dwell on individual instances: let us look abroad. To which of our charitable institutions are not Jews liberal subscribers? From what movement in favour of general education have they withheld their assistance? In what great struggle to attain a patriotic object, has their aid been found wanting? We know of none, and we earnestly hope their intelligence, their liberality, their patriotism, and their public virtue may be incorporated into our national boast, by their being made an integral part of our nation.

We have not reviewed this work as a novel, though its merits as a work of fiction are of the first order. It has appealed to us on higher and nobler grounds than those of mere amusement; and we have met it with feelings different from those that usually direct professional criticism. Perhaps we might seem to some readers to have indulged ourselves at too great length; let them pardon us, for we are not often likely to meet such a temptation to excursive flights; a new "Coningsby" is not likely to come without a new generation.

Four Lectures on the Natural History of Plants yielding Food. By E. Lankester, M.D., F.L.S., &c.
[Unpublished.]

Although these lectures have not been published, yet the great interest they have excited, and their close connexion with the great cause in which we are engaged, have induced us to make some extracts from the lecturer's notes, which have been kindly lent us for the purpose. The extracts we shall make are more calculated to stimulate than to gratify curiosity; but we trust that, at no distant date, we shall have the matter brought before us in a more tangible form. Dr. Lankester thus introduces his subject.

"By the late researches of chemists, and more especially by the bold generalizations of Liebig and Dumas, the subject of the nature of the food of man has become much more a matter of calculation and science than at any previous period in the history of knowledge. If we look at the vegetable kingdom as a whole, and attempt to enumerate the vast variety of different productions that are used by man and animals for food, it would seem almost impossible to reduce the mass to anything like systematic order. But the chemist has found that, complicated as are the forms of plants, they are formed out of a few simple elements, of which carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen are the chief. These, again, enter into secondary combinations, which, although more numerous than the elements of which they are composed, are, nevertheless, comparatively few. The secondary combinations or principles, which are the principal constituents of the food of animals, may be divided into two groups: those possessing nitrogen, and those without it; the nitrogenised and non-nitrogenised principles of food, as they are called. The first group, which are all included under the name of proteins, the various forms having only very slight differences of chemical composition, is that which is used for the building up of the fabric of the animal body. However diversified the organs of the body of an animal may appear, they are made out of some one of the forms of proteins, which are called fibrin, albumen, and caseine. These proteinaceous compounds, or nitrogenised principles, are found in almost every kind of vegetable food, and when not supplied in sufficient quantity to an animal, it becomes feeble and dies. The reason why animal food is more strengthening and nourishing than vegetable is, that the flesh of animals consists almost entirely of proteins. We also see, from the fact of the proteins of the vegetable and the proteins of the animal being the same in composition, that, in as far as these nitrogenised principles are concerned, no chemical change takes place in the digestion of food, but that it is a simple transference of certain principles from the vegetable to the animal body.

"The second group of principles entering into the food of man and animals is that without nitrogen. The chief constituent of these is carbon, and they are commonly called starch, sugar, oil, gum, &c. Now, at one time it was supposed that these things were very nutritious; that is, that they helped to form the fabric of the body; but this is not at all the case, although these principles contribute to a not less important end—the keeping up of the animal heat of the body. The carbon is, in fact, burned in the blood, carbonic acid is expelled from the lungs, and the animal frame has its various organs thus kept at a temperature always the same, whether placed in the snows of Iceland, or under the burning sun of the tropics. Saccharine, amylaceous, and oily foods are taken into the system for the purposes of combustion, and subserve just the same end in our bodies that coals do upon our fires."

The lectures are divided according to the chemical principles which most distinguish the plants yielding them. The first lecture consists of a history of the plants yielding vegetable alkalies, and which are used in infusions. This includes the history of the tea, coffee, chocolate, and Paraguay tea-plants, with notices of all those plants, such as the chicory, the piqua plant, and other trees, shrubs, and herbs that are used for adulterating, or as substitutes for, these well known articles of diet. One of the most singular facts connected with this group of plants is, that the vegetable alkalies which they yield are identical in composition, and, according to the great chemist, Liebig, they fulfil a very important office in the economy of the human frame, accounting for the fact of their extensive cultivation and use. It appears that upwards of 800,000,000 of pounds of tea, coffee, and chocolate are consumed by the inhabitants of the world annually.

The second lecture contains an account of plants yielding starch as a principal ingredient. The plants yielding pure starch, as the arrow-root plant, the sago-palm, and the tapioca tree, are described. Then come for consideration those grasses yielding grain, which not only contain starch, but also a large quantity of proteins, and which have rendered them the principal food of the finest races of men in the world. These are wheat, rice, maize. Wheat is in Europe, maize is in America, and rice in Asia. They are, in fact, the types of all other kinds of food.

The third lecture treats of plants yielding oily and acidulous foods. To the first belong the wonderful cocoa-nut-tree, which, although chiefly characterised by the oil contained in its ripe fruit, yet affords at various periods of growth all the other principles necessary for the subsistence of man. Nuts, chestnuts, walnuts, Brazil nuts, &c., fall to be considered here. The plants yielding acids are numerous. The orange and the lemon yield citric acid, pears and apples, malic acid; Rhubarb and sorrel, oxalic acid; grapes, tartaric acid, &c.

The fourth lecture consists of an outline of the purpose sugar subserves in the vegetable kingdom, and its manufacture from the sugar-cane, beet-root, maize-stalks, &c. In this lecture is also considered the liquors produced by the fermentation of sugar, as beers, wines, ardent spirits, &c.

From this general summary our readers will be able to form some notion of the important topics which are discussed in these lectures, and the arguments in favour of Free Trade which may be deduced from this scientific view of nutrition. It is a gratifying sign of progress to find that the mind of the country is keenly awake to the evils which monopoly inflicts, and that the misnamed system of protection finds no advocates save in the class which cannot teach and will not learn. In the conclusion of his lectures Dr. Lankester thus eloquently and luminously states their general results:

"I feel that I have not been able to throw around this subject the fascinations of romance, nor to elicit from it the harmony of music, but I hope I have succeeded in developing in some measure the value and beauty of great principles. I have endeavoured to show you the vegetable kingdom as a vast chemical laboratory converting the elements of inorganic matter into substances fitted for the structure and uses of animals. I have pointed out to you the inexhaustible sources of nourishment for animals that are constantly being developed by the unceasing activity of the vegetable world. I have shown you that, so long as the world is clothed with vegetation, so long as the present constitution of nature remains, that God has made the vegetable world an infinitely more than abundant source of food to all his living creatures; and I feel it to be a duty which we all owe to our suffering fellow-creature man to study the laws which regulate this wonderful harmony of supply and demand between the vegetable and animal kingdom, in order that we may be enabled speedily to adjust the disarrangement which must take place when the first cry of want or the first wail of hunger shall have reached our ears."

An Essay, showing the ruinous Effects which a Free Trade in Corn would have upon the Landlord, the Farmer, the Labourer, the Tradesman, the Fundholder, and the Community at large. London, W. M. Clarke, Warwick-lane, Paternoster-row. (Sold by the Publication Committee of the Agricultural Protection Society, at No. 17, Old Bond-street.)

In perusing this "Essay," one knows not whether more to admire the self-importance of the writer in engaging to show so much within the narrow limits of fourteen 8vo. pages, and in taking upon himself "to counteract the pernicious effects of" the "falsehoods and frauds" of the "leaders of the Anti-Corn-Law League," because "it has become highly necessary at length" so to do; or to despise the system of false quotations and references which, in humble imitation of the detected and exposed Mr. Cayley, he also has adopted.

It is declared by all controversialists that the suppression veri is quite as unjustifiable as the suggestio falsi, if not more so; and that whether an author publish a quotation from the works of another which in itself is absolutely false and garbled, suppress from the context explanatory passages, or assert that admissions have been made for which he has no authority, he is alike unworthy of credit. This principle we propose to apply to the writer of the essay before us.

"In the first place," he affirms, "it is admitted—on all hands admitted: even the great authority of the League, Mr. James Deacon Hume, has admitted—that in the event of a free trade in corn being established, a great quantity of land will be thrown out of arable cultivation;" and he then goes on to suppose that "great quantity" to "be an eighth." Now, the inverted commas applied to the words "great quantity" are not ours but our author's; and they are used by him to induce his readers to believe that Mr. Deacon Hume's printed evidence given before a committee of the House of Commons, to which the writer, in a note, triumphantly refers as his authority, contains these words. But how stands the fact? Sir C. Douglas, a member of the committee, put the following question:—

"If the Corn Laws were totally abolished, and consequently that part of our provisions and food were brought in from other countries, do you agree with those who think that a great deal of land would be thrown out of cultivation?"

Mr. Deacon Hume's answer was this:—

"By throwing land out of cultivation, I presume is meant converting arable into grass land. It is a wrong term, I think, to use, though I know it is a common term. I believe that much land would be thrown out of arable cultivation."

And he proceeds to give what appears to us to be a very satisfactory reason for that opinion, as well as an equally convincing statement of the probable effect.

We leave it to casuists and critics to decide upon the precise difference between a great deal of land and much land. That the two terms were of distinct signification in the mind of the witness is manifest, because the former, which was proposed to him by Sir C. Douglas, he declined to adopt; and he made use of the latter as more properly expressive of his own meaning. Our author, also, would seem to be of the same opinion, for he rejects both, and unfairly interpolates the words "great quantity."

Having arrived, by some tortuous mental argument, at the conclusion that he had the right not only to construe the meaning of "much land" to be "great quantity," but to deceive his readers by imputing the latter expression to Mr. Hume, by whom it was not used, he proceeds boldly to define this quantity to "be an eighth," "much more than one-eighth in all probability." Now, if much land really mean a "great quantity," what proportion of one-eighth is much more than one-eighth?

Upon this theorem of his own, falsely based upon the clear, argumentative, and unanswered evidence of Mr. Deacon Hume, whose loss Sir Robert Peel feelingly deplored, the writer proceeds to raise an argument which, partaking of the fate of all arguments founded upon false premises, carries its own condemnation along with it.

The Essayist produces, in the way of evidence, certain statistical calculations; and in order that we may deal out evenhanded justice, as well to the gentleman whose essay is before us, as to one of his fellow-labourers in the same field, we will place their opinions on the same subject in juxtaposition before our readers:—

"Essay."

"The produce of British agriculture amounts to £539,036,200: one-eighth of which, of course, will be £67,379,525; and, according to the census of 1831, there are in the United Kingdom 2,470,411—say 2,500,000 persons employed in agriculture above twenty years of age, one-eighth of the number of whom will be 312,500, which number would, by their families, be swelled into at least 1,500,000. The first effects, therefore, of this one-eighth of the land being thus thrown out of cultivation, would be, that the farmer would lose his profits upon that one-eighth, that the amount of its produce, namely, £67,379,525, would be lost to the community, and that 312,500 labourers, with their families, that is to say, 1,500,000 persons, would have to be supported in a state of pauperism, at a cost of 2s. 6d. each per week, or £6 10s. each a year; which, for a million and a half, would be £9,750,000 per annum!"

An analytical examination of the very extraordinary contents of these two brief passages, extracted from the writings of contemporary authors, and issued by a society whose anxiety for the promulgation of truth has induced them to appoint, from amongst their own members, a "publication committee," to "point out," "through the Press," "the inconsistencies contained in the statements of" their opponents, would extend this article beyond our limits. Let those, however, who can, reconcile "the inconsistencies" glaringly apparent in the two publications to which we refer.

The one author contends that the effect of one-eighth of the land being thrown out of arable cultivation would be to withdraw £67,379,525 from the community;—the other affirms that one-third of the land upon which wheat is now grown must be thrown out of cultivation, and that there would probably be somewhere about £5,000,000 withdrawn from the labour market. The one calculates that 312,500 labourers, being one-eighth of the number of persons employed in agriculture, above twenty years of age, would have to be supported in a state of pauperism; the other concludes that one-third of the present number of labourers, or about 400,000 hands, would be thrown out of employ.

"A maze of figures mazes of mind betrays."

Pursuing the same chain of reasoning, the writer of the "Essay" proceeds to assure tradesmen, "more especially those who live in purely agricultural districts," "that it behoves them to look at this well. They must lose the profits on the reduced expenditure of the landlords, the profits on the diminished expenditure of the farmers, and the profits on the whole of the wages of the labourers thrown out of employ; besides having to bear their full share of those additional burdens which the fact of these labourers—who are now their customers, and from whom they derived profit—being thrown out of employ, must of necessity create!" "Is there," he asks, "in provincial districts one tradesman in ten who would be able to stand this for twelve months?" Perhaps not, if the writer's assertions were true.

Having thus, to his own satisfaction, shown the inevitable ruin of nine-tenths of the tradesmen, the writer proceeds to show that perhaps one-half of the labourers might manage to keep out of the Unions; but, alas! their fate would be infinitely worse: they would not "lie down in ditches and die;" but "their moral feelings would be deened; their spirit of independence would be destroyed; the principles of right and wrong would be utterly lost to view; life and property would be insecure; recklessness would be engendered; robberies, crimes of every character and description would be perpetrated; the gaols would be crowded, and the country in a blaze!"

Is, then, British agriculture exclusively confined to the growth of wheat? Do the whole of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom (who can get it) subsist upon wheaten bread, and that alone? Admitting, for this purpose, with Mr. Deacon Hume, (though this, as we shall presently show, is not on all hands admitted, as our author asserts,) that much land would be thrown out of arable cultivation by a repeal of the Corn Laws, would this land of necessity become waste? Would it not be used for some other agricultural purposes? Agriculture is not confined to the tillage of land for corn, but extends to the culture of the earth for various other profitable produce. With the same admission let us see what, in the opinion of Mr. Deacon Hume, would be done with the land which, by the abolition of the Corn Laws, might be thrown out of arable cultivation. The same answer on which our anonymous author relies, and which is the only authority he has given, furnishes a clear and convincing explanation.

We will do our author the justice to acknowledge that he has not overlooked this latter part of Mr. Deacon Hume's answer to the question of Sir C. Douglas; but in his comments upon it, and even in adopting the very words and language of Mr. Hume, he does not so inform his readers. Assuming much that is said by Mr. Hume, he arrives at a very different result, as will best appear by the following comparative passages:—

Extract from Mr. Hume's evidence.

"I believe that one of the great evils of our agriculture is, the misappropriation of the soil; I believe there is a great deal too large a proportion of land under the plough, and too small a portion under grass. The difficulty of raising lean stock in this country for the purpose of fattening is so great, that it is the chief cause of the high price of meat; and I am quite persuaded that, if a very large breadth of that arable land which can scarcely be cultivated to advantage were turned back to grass, the effect would be, to reduce the quantity of corn produced in this country so much as to make it impossible for the foreigner to fill the vacuum at a low price, and that the general result would be, that it would produce a lower price of meat, there being a power of increased consumption in the present state of the country in the article of meat that is almost immeasurable. When we reflect upon the extremely small portion of meat eaten every day by the most robust labourers in the country, who are, of course, by far the most numerous portion of the population, if we were only to suppose them to have every day a fair moderate meal of meat, the increase of demand for meat, and for inferior meat—for cattle not fattened to the highest pitch of perfection, such as would be suitable to the produce of land of inferior qualities—would be so great, that there would be no want of good employment for any of the land that we possess within our boundaries."

These parallel passages exhibit a fair specimen of the arguments and reasoning of the author whose essay is under consideration, and of the gentleman whose evidence he has attempted to distort into an admission of an isolated position, which would seem, per se, opposed to the principles of those who advocate a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. The one, a gentleman who had passed thirty-nine years in the service of the public, in the departments of the Customs and Board of Trade, one of whose dicta was thought worthy of being called "memorable" by Sir Robert Peel, declares, in plain intelligible language, his belief that the abolition of the Corn Laws would, even on this vezata question of throwing land out of arable cultivation, enable British corn-growers to compete with foreigners; would increase the demand for meat to an almost immeasurable extent; would supply animal food to those who now seldom taste it; and would produce good employment for all the land within our boundaries. And to this may be added, in passing, as a fair corollary, that as there would be no want of good employment for the land, so also there would be no want of profitable employment for the labourers. Turn now from this picture, and look on that.

The author, who has undertaken to show "the ruinous effects which a free trade in corn would have upon the community at large," loses sight altogether of the actual present state of the labouring classes in this country. His statistics, on this part of his subject, are confined to the number of agricultural labourers and their families, and the expense of supporting a million and a half of them in a state of pauperism. He assumes it to be probable that in the course of six or seven years things might come round—but "look at the interim!" and then, setting all probabilities aside, setting all reasoning and argument at defiance, he revels in the certainty of bankruptcy, ruin, wretchedness, and misery; broken fortunes, broken spirits, and broken hearts; destitution, beggary, pauperism, vice, and crimes; robberies, Union workhouses, gaols, and the country in a blaze!

Leaving this wild rhapsody to the fate which always attends declamation without argument, let those tradesmen and labourers, in purely agricultural districts, for whose especial instruction and benefit the pamphlet before us has been written, reflect upon the condition in which the labouring classes are now actually placed, and ascertain from means within their reach, from information founded upon evidence, and gratuitously furnished to them by the calumniated League, what proportion of that class is now able, by the greatest industry and the strictest frugality, to obtain food of the plainest, clothing of the coarsest, shelter of the humblest kind, fit for human beings in a civilized state of society; how many of them are now confined in Union workhouses or receive partial relief from parochial funds or private charities; how many starvation has already driven to crime; how many have perished for want; and then let them decide, by way of answer to the questions of this author, whether they will believe the man of nearly forty years' experience in the drudgery of offices where the subjects, now imperatively pressing upon the public attention, were duly and hourly calling forth the energies of his intelligent and enlightened mind, or will pin their faith upon the sleeve of an anonymous writer, who garbles the opinions of his opponents, and seeks to wrest them to unworthy purposes.

We have called the opinion that an abolition of the Corn Laws would throw much arable land out of cultivation a vezata question. Our author says it is "admitted on all hands." Mr. Deacon Hume considers that much land now under the plough can scarcely be so cultivated to advantage, and that the misappropriation of the soil is one of the greatest evils of our agriculture. But what says Lord Ducie—a nobleman who has for the last eighteen years been actively engaged in agriculture, and whose practical knowledge of agriculture is universally acknowledged? We find in the speech delivered by his lordship on the 29th of May, at the League meeting at Covent-garden Theatre we quote from our paper of the 1st inst.—the following passages:—

"It shall be my endeavour to show you, by tracing the expense of growing a bushel of wheat, that it is impossible any land can be thrown out of cultivation by the repeal of the Corn Laws."

I was anxious to show you that that low quality of land which it is said must be thrown out of cultivation if the Corn Laws are repealed, can, under the lowest possible prices in free trade in corn, pay 11 per cent. for growing corn at 41s. per quarter. (Cheers.) I hope and trust that, if there were any here who doubted before in consequence of their being told by our opponents that Free Trade would throw land out of cultivation, they will set their minds at ease upon the point, and that they will believe with me that nothing can ever cause any land to be thrown out of cultivation in England so long as the manufacturers of this country are enabled to undersell those of the Continent in the world's market."

Certainly this is an admission with a vengeance.

The pamphlet under consideration contains another extract from the evidence of Mr. Deacon Hume, and it is appended by way of note to the following paragraph:—"But view the position of the agricultural labourers." [We wish heartily the author had afforded his readers a faithful view of their position.] "The League and its satellites complain of their not being sufficiently well paid, and yet seek to reduce them at once to the position of the labourers abroad. They would reduce not only our agricultural labourers, but their own, to the position of other countries at once." And now comes the evidence of Mr. Deacon Hume in support of these veracious assertions:—

"Then I understand you, in the opinion you have given, to contemplate placing the working men of this country upon the same, or nearly the same footing as the workmen of other countries?—I would place them on the same footing."

Upon this solitary declaration of Mr. Deacon Hume, without explaining the antecedent information from which the interrogator drew the inference contained in his question, or giving the answer called forth by the subsequent question of the chairman, the author proceeds at once to reduce the wages of agricultural labourers to 6d. per day, or

3s. 1d. per week, and to draw an affecting picture of their future condition!

The answer of Mr. Deacon Hume, thus put forward as a proof that "the League and their satellites" seek to reduce not only our agricultural labourers, but their own, to the position of the labourers of other countries, was founded upon the supposition which he expressed as follows:—

"That the expense of living of the labourers in those cases which the several questions have so particularly pointed at, should be reduced to the natural amount. That must certainly be understood to mean that the corn trade should be free, that meat, that every article of consumption should for the future be free; and were that the case, no change being made in the revenue, I can scarcely believe that the natural effect would not be to raise the product of the revenue a fourth, or perhaps a third greater than it is, without laying on a single additional duty; and in that case we clearly see how easy it would be to relieve those parties, who are now much pressed by competition, from those taxes which were considered to oppress them to the greatest degree, and to place them on a fairer footing with the foreign competitors than they now are."

And the subsequent question of the chairman, with Mr. Hume's answer, satisfactorily explains the whole:—

"Do you mean, by placing them on the same footing, that you would abolish all those monopolies as regards food in this country, and which are the cause of that great difference between the condition of the labouring people here and abroad?—Most certainly; I should never think of exposing trades situated in the manner which is contemplated in the previous question, to an open competition with foreigners, while I left them burdened—not with taxes, I beg to be understood, but with the operation of protections in other cases, and for the emolument of other parties."

With these exposures of the falsifications of the author of the essay, we shall leave him to his reflections, and his readers to their own conclusions; but we trust that the Publication Committee of the Agricultural Protection Society will in future take the trouble to compare the quotations of their pamphleteers with the authors from which such quotations profess to be extracted: and, moreover, that they will bestow upon the correction of the discrepancies contained in the tracts issued by themselves a little of that attention which they liberally resolve to apply in "repelling the imputations, and pointing out the inconsistencies, contained in the statements of those who oppose protection."

YOUNG ENGLAND'S "OLD NOBILITY."

(From Punch.)

Lord John Manners, the Home Secretary in posse, when Young England shall reign in Downing-street, has published a volume of verse, called "England's Trust, and a few Poems." In this volume there are—let the reader prepare for a gasp—the following lines:

"Though I could bear to view our crowded towns

Sink into hamlets, or unpeopled downs;

he could not bear that any decay should fall upon the ancient peerage. No, says Lord John

"Let wealth and commerce, laws and learning die,

BUT LEAVE US STILL OUR OLD NOBILITY."

These lines were quoted by Earl Ducie at the last Anti-Corn-Law meeting, but their authorship, and the book that enshrines them, were not given. We supply the information for the benefit of the curious. And now, with every wished respect for the ancient aristocracy of England, we must own we were not aware of its surpassing worth in comparison with wealth and commerce, laws and learning. We were evidently in darkness. Yes; put all the wealth of Britain—all the labours of its lawmakers—all the inspiration, as bequeathed in books to us, of its God-gifted men into one scale, and clap an Earl's coronet into the other, and that little ornament shall make all things else kick the beam; that is, when the balance shall be held by the pure and just hands of—Young England!

But, after all, would not this old nobility be a poor, plucked, very shabby thing indeed, divested of all the refinements, all the graces of life? With no wealth, no commerce, no laws to restrict its ferocity,—no learning to soften it,—would it be little other than a Baron Rawhead and Bloodybones, an Earl Gogmagog, living on lordly pillage? Let us imagine this old nobility, spared amidst the wreck of all the commerce, all the arts of life.

Our "crowded towns" exist no longer. No: Liverpool is a mere village; Birmingham, a hamlet; Manchester, a place where two or three old women ply the spinning-wheel; Sheffield, a casual home for wandering tinkers or knife-grinders; all Yarmouth shrunk into the huts of a few fishermen who cure herrings; and where Hull, and Paisley, and Glasgow stood, are swamps and unpeopled downs. Bitterns boom and hares squeal, where merchants trafficked and babies judged. Thousands and thousands of men have withered from the face of the earth—whole towns are but as empty sepulchres; but let us clap our hands, and utter hallelujahs for the mercy; there remains to us what is dearer than all—for very dear, indeed, it sometimes has been—"our old nobility."

Well, in this new state of things, let us inquire what Old Nobility would do for itself? All wealth and commerce annihilated, Old Nobility would of course set about subjugating the rest of society into hordes of serfs and vassals. The sword of Old Nobility would exact from Serfdom Labour uncompensated, brutal savagery, and those sweet privileges of the bygone day,—the droits du seigneur. As for laws, Old Nobility, as of yore, would make its own; a stout, significant code of timber, easily comprehended by the meanest capacity—namely, a gallows at every castle-gate.

And then for learning, why should Old Nobility care to spell even the monosyllable sword, so that Old Nobility had its own sweet will to make its mark with it!

"Oh, no!" cries the spirit of Young England, "there is such an instinctive refinement, such an inborn benevolence in Old Nobility, that, without any other laws or learning than those fashioned and acquired by its own pure heart, it would work the unqualified good of the meaner millions placed by Providence at its disposal." Of course, all history proves the truth of this. We have no doubt that if all the social arts should suddenly perish, and Old Nobility, to distinguish itself from vulgar flesh and blood, should dye its body with its armorial bearings—that in this forked and naked state its first anxieties would be for its unpainted brotherhood. Wealth, commerce, and all learning having perished—save, indeed, heralds' learning—let us imagine a Marlborough, with his coat of arms and legend painted in bright wood, after the manner of the Ancient Britons, on his back and breast; let us imagine him labouring for the comfort and welfare of the unadorned vulgar. What—what would he do for them? Doubtless, all laws and learning having perished, the impulses of his own noble soul would instinctively supply him with benevolence and wisdom all-sufficient. Without a rag upon him, the Duke would stand up nature's nobleman; would show to meaner thousands the workings of his benevolent heart, ay, as plainly as though he were Momus's ideal man, with a pane of glass let into his bosom.

It would certainly be a fine thing for the real interests of the world, if all commerce, laws, learning, and arts had perished, and all the children (dear elder sons!) of Old Nobility had no other outward signs of their greatness save their arms beautifully tattooed in their anatomies. Then, indeed, would be seen the inherent value of the griffin, and unicorn, and hydra, and pelicans of the herald. As it is, the exquisite beauty of these glorious creatures is, in a measure, lost by the unceremonious elbowing and jostling of wealth and commerce—by the bold intrusiveness of laws and learning.

It must, however, be a great consolation to the people of England to know in what consist their happiness and refinement as a nation. Not in their wealth; not in their laws; not in the wisdom of their buried sages. Oh, no! Let them despise their colonies—their fleets of ships—their literature, with its wings of light for distant nations—let them look upon all these things as cumbrous vanities, and, with thankfulness pulling at their hamstrings, reverently drop down upon their knees before the House of Lords!

The House of Lords! Yea, that is nature's prime laboratory; there, indeed, she toils and labours to "give the world assurance" of her best article. Indeed, the eye of the philosopher—borrowing the glass of Young England—sees painted on the outside of the House of Lords—"Real men to be had only within. All elsewhere are spurious. No connexion with any other House."

Thus, all that we have to do, is to pray for the procreation of Peers. With an Old Nobility, let "crowded towns," with all their wealth, sink and perish—the true national property is in the Lords!

Thus, if Bristol should be again assailed by a devastating mob, let them burn every stick. Why should we care, if Bristol's Earl be safe?

If all Westminster should catch fire, let it blaze away; for have we not a nobleman of that ilk dearer than all Westminster put together?

And, lastly; if an earthquake should swallow the entire city of Londonderry, ought we to mourn over the desolation,—seeing that Providence has benignly preserved to us a wise and gentle Marquis of that glorious name? Yes!

"Let wealth and commerce, laws and learning die,
BUT LEAVE US STILL OUR OLD NOBILITY."

THE LANDOWNERS' SLAVES.—We do not know that in the slave institutions of the United States, or the Brazils, there is anything which exceeds in atrocity the slavery of the tenant-at-will farmers of England. Driven, like cattle, up to the poll; not allowed to have an opinion of their own; forced to comply with the wishes of their landlords; all mental independence trodden down; taunted with the show of liberty; what worse, it may be asked, could occur in the United States or in the Brazils? And yet the men who approve of the system of coercing tenants in respect to their votes are the persons who have lately raised a very loud outcry about the introduction of Brazilian sugar into England, because it is slave grown. Verily, there never was slavery equal to that in which the farmers of England are held, because, in addition to actual dependence on the whims and caprices of a landlord, they are mocked by being told they are the free and independent yeomanry of the soil! "What is morally wrong cannot be politically right," said Lord Ashley, recently; but landowners are privileged to set at defiance all notions of right, and to trample on the consciences of men. The elective franchise is a trust held for the benefit of the nation at large, and he who dares to interfere with the free exercise of this trust, for the purpose of advancing his own private interests, is guilty of as great a crime as any that is denominated in the decalogue. And yet parties who thus act will go to the church on Sundays, will make their responses aloud, and will assume to be the very patterns of sanctity and decorum. It seems strange that the landowners could order their slaves to come into the manufacturing towns, with the view of supporting a system which must ultimately be ruinous to their customers. The farmers in this and neighbouring towns dispose of their milk, butter, and other agricultural produce to the inhabitants of the town, and yet, with the utmost coolness, the former march into this place and give votes, the tendency of which is to restrict the business of the latter, and to starve and ruin them. Perhaps the inhabitants of towns may yet hit upon some plan for bringing the landowners and farmers of their respective neighbourhoods—parties who are entirely dependent upon them—to their senses. Such things have been brought about, and may be again. The farmers, as a body, voted for little trade, perhaps they may find, before long, that some of them will have less of trade than they will approve of.—Bolton Free Press.

A righteous magistrate is the image and shadow of God upon earth.

It is at once the most palpable absurdity and the most monstrous wickedness, to represent capital as in any way opposed to the rights and profits of labour; without capital there would be no demand for three-fourths of the labour now employed in this country; without capital, wages for labour would be reduced to the lowest point at which it would be possible to support human existence; and without capital the operative could have no chance of permanent and steady employment.—W. Cooke Taylor, LL.D.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE ELECTION.—AN EXPEDIENT OF THE MONOPOLISTS: HOW TO SECURE A TEMPORARY TRIUMPH.—A correspondent, on whose accuracy we can place reliance, and who had the means of acquiring correct information at the recent nomination, has transmitted us the following, amongst other intelligence relative to the proceedings on that occasion:—"Scattered in every direction amongst the crowd, but particularly on that side next to the Horse and Jockey, we observed numerous parties, who, from their ragged clothing, were evidently composed of the poorest and lowest of the population of the surrounding villages, if they were not paupers and inmates of workhouses, every one of whom had a piece of white calico round his hat, or cap, or head, having 'Entwistle for ever' printed upon it. Of these, about four hundred were marched up from Culcheth and Kenyon; three hundred from Ashton-in-Mackerfield, headed by a clergyman; one hundred and fifty from Warrington, and many others from the populous villages of Croft, Lowton, Golborne, and Haydock, the whole number amounting to from one thousand two hundred to one thousand five hundred." By inquiries made amongst them, our correspondent has learned that "those from some of the villages were to receive 1s. and their meat and drink; others 2s., and even 2s. 6d., but without meat or drink, 'to shout and hold up their hands for Entwistle,' and to wear his badge, however ashamed of such employment. And it was by such means that a temporary triumph was sought to be obtained, upon a show of hands, before the High Sheriff, for that it is certain not one shilling was paid for the same purpose by or to any one of the Free-Trade party."—Liverpool Albion.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, June 3.—With a moderate supply of English Wheat this morning, the prices of this day week were with difficulty obtained for any but the best qualities. There was but a slow trade in Foreign at last week's rates. The supply of Foreign Barley during last week was moderate, and of English quite insignificant; all descriptions sold readily at 1s. advance. Beans were firm at last week's prices, with very small supplies. Peas were 1s. dearer. About half a dozen Irish vessels arrived with Oats in time for market; there was very little addition to the quantity of English and Scotch Oats previously on sale; an advance of 6d. per qr. was readily obtained on all descriptions. FRIDAY, June 7.—The supplies of Wheat and Barley are moderate since Monday. There is a slow trade for Wheat at the prices of that day. There is not much Barley left on sale of the recent large arrivals from abroad, the little that is offering is held at high rates, but the transactions in it are very limited. About 16 vessels have arrived with Irish Oats, and the buyers expecting a considerable addition to the supply before Monday, are holding off in anticipation of rather lower prices. The factors are, however, unwilling to submit to any reduction, and the business done is at fully Monday's rates. There is no alteration in the value of free Beans; Egyptian are held at 23s. to 24s. in Bond. Peas the same as Monday. S. H. LUCAS and SON.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 3rd of June to the 7th of June, both inclusive.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive a copy, weekly, of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND, are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

REGISTER, REGISTER, REGISTER!

The Free-Traders qualified to vote must everywhere prepare to enrol themselves and their friends on the register for the NEXT year.

To entitle a voter to be registered, he must have occupied during the twelve months previous to the 31st of July, premises of the value of £10 a year. He must have been rated for twelve months to the relief of the poor.

He must have paid, on or before the 20th of July, all poor-rates and assessed taxes due to the 6th of April preceding.

Further information and directions will be furnished on application, personally or by letter, to the Local Registration Societies; to Mr. Sidney Smith, 68, Cheapside, London; or to Mr. Hickin, League Offices, Newall's Buildings, Manchester.

For the convenience of individuals whose avocations render it difficult for them to call at the Registration Office, 68, Cheapside, during business hours, arrangements have been made by which attendance will be given every evening at that office until eight o'clock, to fill up and serve claims, and to supply every information relative to Parliamentary registration for counties, cities, and boroughs.

MIND THE REGISTER.

The merits or demerits of the Reform Bill come not within our sphere of discussion. With its capabilities we have much to do, and should be glad to induce the public to try their extent, in relation to the Free-Trade question. The franchise conferred by the Reform Bill has never yet been realized. There has not been even a considerable approximation. Extravagant as the notion may seem, of adding nearly a million to the borough voters of Great Britain, we believe the legal practicability is susceptible of demonstration; nor is there, in this calculation, any large allowance made for plurality of votes arising from high-rented houses. Only a pitiful fraction of the possible constituency, under the Reform Act, has ever yet existed. In many counties, the mass of unrepresented property is enormous; much of it, too, is of a kind, or belongs to a class, comparatively free from the electoral tyranny of landlords. Why should not this legalized power be called into existence and active operation against monopoly. Why should not the errors of voters in esse be corrected by the mass of voters in potestate? It would be absurd to reckon upon the entire weight thus to be gained being thrown into the scale of Free Trade; and not less absurd to suppose that, were this great enfranchisement indiscriminately made, the cause of Free Trade could fail of a vast preponderance.

"Register, register, register," has been the text of many a homily, since those memorable words were uttered by Sir Robert Peel in Merchant Taylors' Hall. Hitherto, the doctrine has only been practised by the party to which it was then addressed. They set about it with the power of a compact party organization, with ample funds liberally furnished, with the skill of old and practised electioners, and with the golden prize of political ascendancy full in view to stimulate exertion. We all know the result. Sympathizing, or lamenting, none can question the completeness of the success. As an instance of the adaptation of means to the end, it reflects credit on the shrewdness of Sir Robert Peel, and the combination and perseverance of his followers. The example is before us. Think of it, friends of Free Trade, throughout the country.

The defeat of the opposite party only confirms our inference. Whatever be the reasons assigned, the fact is certain that the Whigs did not work the registration. To go into the rationale of this fact would lead us far afield into political disquisition. The causes do not matter for our present purpose. Every one knows that, with a few local exceptions, the Tories were for ten years the great augmenters of the registration lists, by the addition of their own partisans, and the great excluders, by objection, of their opponents. In some measure, by such exclusion, but very far more by those additions, did they constitute themselves a commanding majority at the last general election. They are the only people who have thus experimented on the Reform Act. And, so far from exhausting its capabilities, they have merely indicated what capabilities exist, to be explored and developed whenever the question of the nation shall assert its infinite superiority in the public mind over a mere party question.

The arrangements of the Reform Act are precisely of such a nature as to invite the friends of Free Trade to experiment upon the degree of electoral power which may be obtained through their means. By those arrangements, all questions of temporary interest, however intense that interest for the time, are placed at a disadvantage. No Perceval or Pitt can again triumph by a sudden excitement. No regiments of unexpected voters can again rush to the rescue, and turn the fate of an election at the critical moment. The inflexible registration is there. Woe to those who, like the unwise virgins, have neglected to trim their lamps. The fatal doors are closed against them. Good intentions go for nothing. The non-registered may have the worst oppressions to complain of, and may prove that the salvation of the country depends on the candidate whom they would have returned; their protests are all vox et preterea nihil. We pass no judgment on this matter; we only state the fact. The Reform Bill has annihilated, or very greatly abated, the electoral power of an unforeseen popular excitement. On the other hand, it favours the electoral power of a decided and unintermitting determination. The clear and growing conviction that strengthens from year to year is secure (the means once understood) of gaining its proportionate parliamentary expression. Its strength is not in stimulus but in principle. It depends not on sudden outbreaks of zeal, but on a foreseeing purpose. It prepares, provides, and calculates. For such a cause—and such a cause is ours—the Reform Bill suppression of momentary power works little mischief; while its premeditated and deliberate enrolment for a great future struggle, and for all intermediate emergencies, is in harmony with, and affords facilities for, the peculiar character of our agitation. We advance by instruction. Our appeal is to mind and thought. Success is found, not in the evanescent furor, but the enlightened and enduring conviction. Our course, with a registration, must be progressive. To convince those already enfranchised, and put all others already convinced in possession of their political rights, are our ceaseless aims. Work the registration, then, we repeat; work the registration to the full extent of its yet unmeasured capabilities.

Since 1839 the registration of electors for Great Britain has been increased by upwards of 33,000. Thanks to the zealous and business-like way in which the London committee has taken up the subject, we expect that an increase of several thousands will this year be added to the metropolitan registration alone. And this is the spirit which we desire everywhere to excite. In all localities there is very much to be done, and it can only be done by residents. The detection of false claims and the multiplied assertion of just claims can only be effected by activity and diligence on the spot. We fully appreciate the extent of time, attention, and exertion for which we are calling; but by no other means is our great battle to be fought fairly out. All hope rests upon the intelligent and unalterable conviction of the essential importance of Free Trade being found practically a sufficient impetus. The task is not merely a laborious but an unostentatious one. It is unattended by the éclat of great public meetings.

It the objective portion of it, we may almost call it an unthankful office. But it is indispensable: the cause demands it. As the business of the day, it is pressing and urgent. By the end of next month the overseers' lists must be prepared, so as to be printed and affixed to the church doors on the first two Sundays in August. No time is to be lost. And who can tell but what this registration will be the decisive one for a new Parliament? Such an event is by no means improbable. Even should that contingency not occur, who can measure its moral effect on the existing House of Commons? Every year the results of the registration are diligently scrutinized. They are, de facto, an annual polling of the people. Never has the inspection been more anxious than it will be this time. Nor is it an advantage, which the Council of the League can be at all likely to neglect, should they be empowered to say at the close of the year, "We are backed in our demands by a decisive majority of the electoral body." It is not for us to anticipate what proceedings they may found upon such a fact, nor what specific kind of co-operation it may encourage them to invite. They will evidently be placed by it in a proud and formidable position for carrying forward the agitation they have hitherto conducted towards its final and triumphant termination.

We cannot conclude without most earnestly recommending our friends and fellow-labourers everywhere to avail themselves of the instructions and information contained in the "Guide to the Elective Franchise" put forth by the "Metropolitan Anti-Corn-Law Registration Association." It is an invaluable help. In its few pages there is so complete a practical directory, that all should have recourse to it, and endeavour, each according to his opportunities, to work out its suggestions. We are also authorized to say, that any communications or inquiries connected with this subject—of registration—will be readily attended to either by Mr. Sidney Smith, Secretary of the Metropolitan Registration Association, at the Central Office, 68, Cheapside, or by Mr. Hickin, Secretary of the League, at its office, Manchester.

ELECTORS OF GREAT YARMOUTH AND THEIR REPRESENTATIVES.

In a former number of the LEAGUE it was announced that a memorial had been forwarded to the members for Great Yarmouth, requesting them to support Mr. Villiers's motion for the total repeal of the Corn Laws, signed by 808 electors.* The following answer, addressed to Mr. Bayly, Secretary of the Yarmouth Anti-Corn-Law Association, has been just received:—

"DEAR SIR,—Mr. Villiers having now given notice of his motion for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, we think it right to address, through you, the gentlemen who signed the requisition† you forwarded to us, in reply to their call upon us to vote for that motion.

"As our sentiments have undergone no change since we last had the honour of addressing you on the subject, we beg to refer you generally to the letter we wrote in reply to the requisition of last year.

"Although we are unable to reconcile ourselves to vote for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, yet as we have uniformly supported the principles of Free Trade, and more especially a reduction and alteration in the Corn-Law system, we should be very unwilling to be considered as opposed to its amendment; but with reference merely to a statement contained in your requisition of last year—that the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws would terminate the deplorable distress which was then existing in your borough, and which, with heartfelt sorrow, we learn has since that time increased—we wish to observe, that, as far as the manufacturing districts and some of the commercial classes are concerned, their prospects have considerably brightened in the interval, and that the state of the former may even be considered prosperous; and that although unfortunately this improvement has not extended to the shipping interest, with which you are most immediately connected, it is sufficient, we think, to create doubts even amongst that class, whether the present depreciation of their property, and the general want of employment, may stand in so close connexion with the existence of the present Corn Laws.

"While, however, for the reasons which we have here and in our former letter assigned, we deeply regret being obliged respectfully to decline acceding to your requisition, we feel it due to ourselves to point out, that, after all, our opinions may not be found so much at variance with a proposition of which the 'National Anti-Corn-Law League' would, according to reports which have long been in circulation, avail itself, did it suppose that proposition would be supported by a majority of the House. It is perfectly true that this might be declared not to be a permanent measure; neither would we be understood to consider it so, or permanently to oppose ourselves to the total abolition of the Corn Laws. All we wish is, that a measure affecting so vitally the largest, and not the least important, class in the kingdom, should be approached with the same caution as we believe has uniformly been observed in dealing with the various interests, whose protection has been diminished in the course of the last twenty-five years.

* The strength of the Free-Trade voters may be safely taken as upwards of 900, the constituency being 1929; and as more than 150 who have not signed the memorial could not vote (in consequence of removals, deaths, duplicates, &c.), were an election to take place on the present register, 800 constitute a majority. Since the passing of the Reform Bill, we have never at any election polled 1500 voters, 800 always carrying the election.

† A requisition was also forwarded to the members for the borough by the non-electors.

"We have the honour to be,

"With the greatest respect,

"Yours very faithfully,

"C. E. RUMBOLD.

"W. WILSHERE.

"Mr. J. Bayly, London, May 31, 1844."

It will be observed that in this letter reference is made to the answer to the requisition last year, which was signed by 534 electors. It is therefore necessary that the letter dated May 5th, 1843, should be before the reader. The following is a copy of it:—

"DEAR SIR.—We have been honoured, through your hands, with a requisition from Great Yarmouth, calling upon us to vote for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.

"We feel deeply the weight which should attach to a representation coming from men of so much intelligence as well as practical experience in commercial matters, who are themselves also suffering severely from the distress complained of, and among whose signatures we perceive a large majority of those, between whom and us there has generally been a close sympathy of political feeling. For ourselves we beg leave to observe, that, since either of us has represented Yarmouth, we have supported every proposal for inquiry into the Corn Laws, every measure for their relaxation, and uniformly have voted for the least amount of protection. Up to within a short period we had reason to suppose that, in supporting the proposal of the late Government for an 8s. fixed duty, we had the general assent of our constituents—that many would consider it as a step gained towards the total repeal of those laws, while others could not, satisfactorily to themselves, look to a larger remission. At the time of the last election, the price of wheat was 20 per cent. higher than it is now, and yet we heard no expression of strong dissent.

"The proposal which we are now called on to support is, the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws;—its immediate effect could hardly be to reduce the price of provisions lower than it is at present, and the experience which we have had of the manner in which our advances in favour of a greater freedom of commercial intercourse have been received by other powers leads us to suppose that very slow progress would be made by those countries in meeting us on the same liberal footing. We do not here enter into the abstract question whether it be right or wrong to make this remission of duties a subject for negotiation; but, inasmuch as the repeal of our Corn Laws is stated as a remedy for the present distress, we hold that that remedy would be very uncertain, and at best of very slow application.

"The measure itself could not but tend, in such a crisis as the present, greatly to extend the distress and alarm, not merely among the agriculturists, but many other classes in the community; and as the tendency of our opinions in favour of freedom of trade, as well as the sincerity with which we declare ourselves, cannot be doubted, we ask that your candour will duly estimate the responsibility we are under to our constituents and to the country at large, to act up to our honest feeling of what justice and policy demand from us. It is alone from a very strong conviction of the misery which the course proposed would entail upon the country, without affording any immediate relief to the present distress, that we feel called upon to oppose such a change in the policy of this country as would be effected by the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.

"W. WILSHERE.

"Mr. J. Bayly."

These letters are a tolerable specimen of the art of saying "few things in many words;" the sum and substance of them is, that Messrs. Rumbold and Wilshere prefer party to principle, and will not vote for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws because it happens to be merely a national, and not a Whig measure. This determination is announced in a form which we should be unwilling to describe as shuffling or evasive, but which is certainly far from being candid and straightforward. The opinion of these gentlemen on the justice of the Corn Laws in themselves is very studiously withheld, and their views of the effect of such restrictions on the commerce of the country are far from being clear or consistent. In one letter they declare that "the repeal of these laws would entail misery on the country;" but in the subsequent letter they seem to have so far improved in political economy as to have abandoned this precious morsel of monopolist cant, and they merely contend that the Corn Laws have not done all the mischief that is ascribed to them.

It is gratifying to discover such signs of amendment; the Free-Trade electors of Yarmouth have only to continue their lessons, and they may in time succeed in imbuing their representatives with what Sir James Graham justly calls the doctrines of common sense. But, during this educational process, the shipping of Great Yarmouth may be rotting in the docks, and its sailors perishing in the streets; it might, therefore, be a question with the electors of Great Yarmouth whether it would not be better to look out for representatives whose education in the elements of political economy has been completed, instead of taking upon themselves the onerous task of adult instruction, even with pupils of such promise as Messrs. Rumbold and Wilshere.

There is in their letter a dark allusion to some proposition, of which they assert that the Anti-Corn-Law League would, "according to reports," avail itself. The proposition is not named, and the authority for the reports is slurred over in judicious silence. They know that the Anti-Corn-Law League is solemnly pledged to struggle for total and immediate repeal, and to accept of nothing less; and they know well, that if there be any reports to the contrary, which we very much doubt, the tale is utterly and absurdly false. The League has more than once declared, that while it regards the sliding scale as a combination of folly with iniquity, it looks upon a fixed duty as a fixed injustice.

The letter-writers wish to create a doubt about the cause of the depressed state of the shipping interest in Great Yarmouth; they insinuate that it may not be in close connexion with the existence of the present Corn Laws! But do they attempt to deny that the distress has some connexion with that system? No;—they concede the principle, and then desire to divert the attention of the Free-Traders by raising a question of the degree and amount of mischief. It is just the old story of the robber, who confessed that he took purses on the high road; but insisted that the passengers had no right to complain, as he always left them enough to pay their fare to the next town. It is not unlike the story of the slave, who was told that overwork had no close connexion with his disease, because there were no sores on his legs and arms. It was reserved for these representatives, in statu pupillari, to confess their ignorance of so simple a proposition, as that the employment of shipping depends on the amount of exports and imports. The electors of Yarmouth must have little skill in educational science, if they do not soon contrive to teach this lesson very effectually.

We have referred to this correspondence with great pain; it adds one to the many lamentable proofs brought constantly before us, of the incalculable evils which the spirit and system of party inflict on this country. Men have accustomed themselves to look to their party first and to the nation afterwards. It is the duty of constituencies to teach them to reverse this process, and we hope that the electors of Great Yarmouth will give this lesson to their representative pupils.

THE MONOPOLISTS BEATEN WITH THEIR OWN WEAPONS.

THE PRUSSIAN MINISTER'S ANSWER TO LORD ABERDEEN.

A curious and amusing document has just been published, dated Berlin, March 19, 1844, being the answer of the Prussian Minister, Baron Bulow, to a note of Lord Aberdeen, dated November 28, 1843, complaining of the intention of the German Customs Union (more generally known here as the German Commercial League) to impose increased duties on British iron, and mousselines-de-laines.

Lord Aberdeen, in an uncourteous bullying style, charges the Prussian Government with "holding a language on the subject of trade entirely different to its acts," and accuses the German League of "every year showing itself more and more hostile to the commerce of the two nations."

The Prussian Minister replies, in effect, "Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but perceivest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how canst thou say to thy brother, Brother, let me pull out the mote that is in thine eye, when thou beholdest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pull out the mote that is in thy brother's eye." Lord Aberdeen gives the Prussian Minister a Free-Trade lecture: he tells him that the duty on English iron would affect British interests in a less degree than those of the German consumer, and has the assurance to remind him of the impolicy of imposing duties on raw materials. Baron Bulow replies:—

"First, with respect to the reproach that the Union intends to increase the duty on iron—a raw article of the first necessity—we know no nation which has less right than England to cast blame on us, when she has for a long series of years openly violated the principle of not levying duties on raw materials. It is true that England fixes but a small duty on the importation of iron, because no country thinks of sending any there; but she imposes heavy duties on articles of the first necessity, such as corn, wool, and timber: and these duties are much more prejudicial to the interests of its consumers than a slight increase of duty on iron will ever be to the states of the Union."

This is a hard blow at the Minister of the sliding-scale Government; but the Prussian follows it up by showing the inconsistency of complaining of Prussia whilst the interests of the British people have, for thirty years, been sacrificed by the prohibition of foreign corn and timber for the benefit of a few monopolists; and this he does most effectually by quoting the authority of the Secretary of our Board of Trade, and of the agent sent by our Government in 1839 to attend the conference of the German League.

"Without speaking (continues Baron Bulow) either of corn or wool, we will quote, with respect to timber, the opinion of a very competent judge of the commercial interests of England, Mr. M'Gregor, in his excellent work, "Commercial Tariffs," &c.:

"If there is an article which more than another is to be regarded as a primary article, and consequently free from duty, it is timber. This article is one of the last on which a revenue should be raised. The celebrated Hume, who never adopted a principle in theory that he had not examined in all its practical bearings, thought that, since we had iron and coal in abundance free from duty, we only wanted timber to enable us to have a store of these primary articles of the first necessity for our principal industry. With respect to the high duties tending to limit the use of foreign, and increase that of colonial timber, it is more than doubtful that the North American colonies derive a real advantage from the high duties imposed on foreign timber. But it is certain that these duties have been prejudicial to the interests of millions of inhabitants of the United Kingdom."

"Thus might we easily retort upon the English Government the observations made by the British Cabinet with respect to the increase of duty on iron, as well as its reproach of certain states being hostile in their disposition relative to the recent fixations of their tariffs. Could the English Government hear that the Customs Union should impose heavy duties on the principal product of England—such as those we are obliged to pay on corn, wool, and timber—without using reprisals? Or does Lord Aberdeen wish to defend these duties? In order to appear quite impartial, we will again quote a man of great authority in commercial matters. Dr. Bowring, who was sent by Government in 1839, in order to learn the relations of the Union, went so far in his report as to say that the establishment of the Customs Union might be looked upon as a measure of self-defence against the hostile legislation of foreign nations, and especially the corn and timber laws of Great Britain. The following are also passages of this report:—"The duties imposed in England on corn and timber are what affects the principal interests of the states of the Union in her commercial relations with Great Britain. The present Corn Laws are of the greatest detriment to the agriculture and commerce of the states of this Union. They are not only hurtful to the labourers and working people, but they are hurtful to the commercial interests of all Europe. After this question of corn, the most important is that of timber. The tariff on this article is almost equivalent to a prohibition, and the system of measurement by which these duties are imposed gives them a still more hostile character." Mr. M'Gregor, in the work mentioned above, admits that the complaints of Germany are just. When he speaks of the Union, he says:—"It must be confessed that the anti-liberal systems of commerce of England and France, but especially of England, with respect to Germany, have been justly blamed, the latter having always been England's principal market, and that upon which it has always found the purchasers most exact and valuable in regard of payment."

"In an article in the 'Edinburgh Review,' the same opinions are uttered as those in Dr. Bowring's and Mr. M'Gregor's books; and it adds, 'with the exception of Holland, England is the only country which requires German corn. By refusing to admit it, England labours to withdraw German capital from agriculture, in order that it may be applied to manufactures. By our high duties and sliding scale, we have made the commerce of German corn a mere speculation, which depends on the rise or fall of the English barometers. England has also maintained enormous duties upon German timber, which pays a duty of 55s., whilst the timber from the colonies only pays a duty of 10s.'

"Why, then, does England complain of a modification of tariffs, on the part of the Union, on a small part of the produce of foreign wool, at the time when the importation of this produce is on the increase, to the profit of foreign manufacturers, and those of England in particular? Why does she complain, when her own tariffs are so high that they almost prohibit our produce, that we take into consideration an increase of duty on iron, when that duty is not to be compared to the heavy duties imposed on foreign iron in France, in Austria, Belgium, and Russia? Is it equitable for such small things to reproach the Union with hostile dispositions, when Prussia, for the last twenty-five years, and the Union for the last ten, have maintained a tariff under which, in spite of pretended inconvenience as to the principle of imposition according to weight, foreign importation, and especially that of English manufactured produce, have annually increased? 'It is evident,' says Mr. M'Gregor, 'that the importation of English manufactured produce into the Union has increased in a surprising manner, as well in value as in quantity, as may be proved by the report presented to Parliament upon the commerce of Great Britain with different countries and the British colonies from 1831 to 1840; nevertheless, I send you annexed a table of the importations of several articles of some importance to English commerce into the states of the Union during the years 1836 up to 1842, which I beg you will present to Lord Aberdeen. The favourable results they present for Great Britain are to be attributed to the tariff of the Union. By comparing it with the tariffs of Austria, Great Britain, France, and Russia, Lord Aberdeen will see how much more favourable it is to England than to other nations. After perusing these extracts we appeal to any one if England has a right to complain. On the contrary, the question ought to be, should not the Union have increased its tariff long ago? Why, when the Union has, during ten years, maintained them in spite of the ungenerous proceedings of England—why is she so unreasonable as to complain of a few slight modifications, without casting an impartial look on her own system?'"

Lord Aberdeen cuts a humiliating figure in the hands of the Prussian Minister, and has received such a castigation as we venture to predict will teach him caution in volunteering lectures on Free Trade in future.

We must do the Prussian Government the justice to say, that it has exhibited the most enlightened views on the subject of trade of any Government in Europe. On the return of peace, after a long and desolating war, Prussia immediately sought the best means of developing the natural resources of her country, and endeavoured to persuade England to take her corn and timber in exchange for the manufactures with which we then largely supplied her, but in vain. She did not, however, relax her efforts to obtain a relaxation of our monopoly system, and we find in 1823, when urging us to concede a reciprocity-of-shipping treaty similar to that we had made with the United States, the sound principle laid down by the Prussian Minister was, "That reciprocal commercial restrictions were reciprocal nuisances, prejudicial to all nations having reciprocal interests, and particularly to those engaged in extensive commerce; and that the policy of Prussia was to substitute in the place of reciprocal prohibitions, reciprocal facilities."

In 1826, Prussia made another effort to induce us to take her corn and timber, and proposed a treaty founded on reciprocity. Mr. Canning, however, replied to the overture, "That it becomes his Majesty's Government, when a proposal for the alteration of our Corn Laws is made to us by a foreign Government as a condition of something to be done or omitted by that Government, at once to declare that we can never entertain such a proposal." After such a reply it seemed hopeless to make further attempts at negotiation, and Prussia then turned her attention to the formation of the celebrated German commercial league, which, after many difficulties, she succeeded in establishing on the 1st of January, 1834. Lord Aberdeen may only just now be opening his eyes to the folly of our perseverance in excluding Prussian produce, but the sliding scale has already done mischief which can never be remedied; it has forced German capital to be withdrawn from the growth of corn and timber to be employed in manufactures—these manufactures have now supplanted ours in the German market, and even compete with us in foreign markets. Our exports to Germany are no longer manufactured articles, but raw materials. In 1820 we exported of cotton manufactured goods to the value of £2,969,493. In 1841 our exports only amounted to £945,195, and this chiefly to those parts of Germany not included in the League. Hitherto our raw materials have been admitted into Germany at nominal rates of duty, but now it seems we are threatened with high duties on these; and there can be little doubt that a few more years' perseverance in the sliding scale will effect for our raw materials what it has already done for our manufactured articles—an almost entire prohibition.

Who is to blame for these things, Prussia or monopolist England? Why, so lately as 1839, Dr. Bowring was sent as the British representative to the meeting of the German League, and he expressly states in his report of his mission to Lord Palmerston, that it was not then too late, by relaxing our prohibitions, to secure a large trade with Germany; that the League at that moment were willing to meet us in an equitable spirit. "Their statements," says Dr. Bowring, at the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, "are these:—If you are able and willing to do much, we, too, are able and willing. If you will do little, we will meet you by doing little; but matters cannot stand as they are. Our duties must be diminished upon your goods, which we shall rejoice to be able to accomplish, or they must be raised." The Free-Traders pressed the Government of the day to listen to propositions so reasonable and just; but the Melbourne Cabinet disregarded the report of their own representative, and the Peel Cabinet have since passed a sliding-scale Corn Law which, like the former, instead of establishing a regular trade in German corn, makes it dependent on the rise and fall of the English barometers, whilst German timber, by the Peel tariff, is subjected to a duty of 900 per cent. more than timber from our own colonies!!

Lord Aberdeen, from his note to the Prussian Minister, might be blind to these facts, but he ought to know that, by the concurrent testimony of every British ambassador, without exception, who has been intrusted with negotiations for facilitating trade, our corn and timber laws have been uniformly pointed to by foreign nations as evidences of our own monopoly system, and as stumbling-blocks which must be removed before they can confide in our sincere intentions of equitable trading. His lordship must surely now be satisfied that it is vain to preach Free Trade to other countries until the Corn Laws cease to disgrace our own statute-book.

THE "STANDARD" AND THE LEAGUE.—The League, about the "prostration" of which the Standard bubbles so incessantly, would seem, according to our contemporary's testimony, to require an infinite deal of "killing." Twelve months ago, the Standard declared that the Canada Corn Bill had "annihilated" the League, by supplying "a prop and buttress to the Corn Laws." During the recent factory discussions, we were again assured by the Standard that the influence of the League philosophy was utterly subverted. The currency measure propounded by Sir Robert Peel, a few weeks ago, was, moreover, lauded by our honest contemporary as a measure "which scattered to the winds all the dogmata of the political economists." Yet, after all the effective modes of discomfiture have been employed—after the doctrines of the League have been refuted, and the League itself annihilated—we find that the South Lancashire election was required to secure the League's "prostration."—Morning Post.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

Eighteenth Week, ending Saturday, June 15.

This has been another FREE-TRADE week—we may almost say, a great Free-Trade week—in Parliament. Both LORDS and COMMONS have been engaged, directly and collaterally, in discussing the principles of Free Trade, and, we may add, doing homage to them; for, notwithstanding the numbers on a division, every debate shows more and more how these principles are essentially ascendant, and penetrating—nay, pervading—the dense atmosphere of legislative thought and action. Monday and Thursday were thus occupied; each House having a direct Free-Trade discussion, with the addition of a Currency debate, tacked on by some of the speakers to the corn question; and all bearing testimony that turn how you will, act how you will, the Protective system meets you, but meets you only to recoil. Verily, the "beginning of the end" draweth nigh.

There have been some striking individual traits, too, in these discussions. A sugar monopolist, seeing the Government slowly moving, plucks up heart, girds up his loins, and proposes to outstrip them in the race; another monopolist sees corn following sugar, and, with bitter melancholy, asks if this is merely the Government mode of letting the West Indies down easily; the Earl of CLARENCE cannot see any difference between the principles advocated by Lord Montagu, as a Free-Trader, and those avowed by the Earl of Dalhousie, Vice-President of the Board of Trade; whereupon the Duke of Richmond shouts "hear, hear!" till the House of Lords rings again, and wild laughter from every side testifies that their lordships feel tolerably comfortable, even with the appalling spectacle before them; while, in the House of Commons, Free-Traders warn the country gentlemen that the repeal of the Corn Laws must be the inevitable consequence of the new Charter of the Bank of England, accompanied as it is with a limitation of the currency. But proceed we to details.

We stated, last week, that only one form of the manifold SUGAR QUESTION had been discussed—namely, the proposition by Lord John Russell, that the differential duty should be the same on all foreign sugar, whether the produce of slave-labour or free-labour countries. This constituted the DIFFERENTIAL debate. This week we have had the FREE-TRADE debate, which was raised, on Monday night, on the proposition, by Mr. Ewart, that there should be a Reduction of the Duty on Foreign Sugar to the same rate of Duty as Colonial Sugar. In order, however, to understand the way in which the subject was treated by the Government, we must enter into one or two preliminary explanations.

The proposition of the Government, it must be borne in recollection, is to let the duty on colonial sugar remain the same as it has been, namely, 24s. the cwt.; and the only alteration consists in letting in what is considered to be free-grown foreign sugar at 34s. instead of maintaining the old prohibitory duty of 63s. on all foreign sugars. They thus propose to create a differential duty of 10s. between colonial and free-grown foreign sugar. As soon as the Government proposition was announced, Mr. PHILIP MILES, one of the members for Bristol, immediately placed an amendment on the notice paper, that he would propose to reduce the duty on colonial sugar to twenty instead of twenty-four shillings. The object of this was plain enough. The SUGAR MONOPOLY is going, says Mr. Miles and his friends; we are unable to help ourselves by resistance; and therefore let us do the best for ourselves that we can. So long as we had the monopoly of the English market, we made no stir about paying 24s. as duty, because it came, not out of our pockets, but out of those of the consumer. Now, however, that some foreign sugar is likely to come in, we must make a great outcry about our inability to pay this 24s. The Government are only going to leave us a protection of ten shillings; let us have the duty down to 20s., and we will have a protection of fourteen shillings, and be better able to compete with the free-grown sugar, the quantity of which may not be so very great, after all.

Somebody whispered in the ear of Mr. PHILIP MILES that he should amend his amendment. In its present shape it won't do at all, says the little bird that whistled in the ear of the member for Bristol. You have no chance of carrying it; though you are a Conservative, the Ministerialists will all vote against you; and the Free-Traders are not to be caught as young simpletons fancy they can catch swallows, by putting salt on their tails. The Free-Traders are in favour of reduction of duties, but they are not likely to vote for your reduction, because, instead of benefiting the consumer, it will only put 4s. more into the pockets of the West India interest than the Government propose to give them. Mr. Philip Miles, therefore, thought better about it, and amended his amendment in the following significant way:—

"Mr. Philip Miles.—In committee on Sugar Duties Bill, to move.—That from and after the 10th day of November, 1844, the duty upon sugar, the produce of British possessions, be reduced to 20s. the hundred weight; and that the duties on sugar, certified to be the growth of China, Java, or Manilla, or of any foreign country, the sugar of which her Majesty in Council shall have declared to be admissible, as not being the produce of slave labour, shall be as follows, namely:—
Brown, Muscovado, or clayed, the cwt. . . . 30
White clayed, or sugar otherwise prepared, and equivalent to white clayed sugar, the cwt. . . . 34
With 5 per cent. thereon."

This was what, in the language made classical by Charles Dickens, men would call an "Artful Dodge." It was from no "abstract" love of Free Trade that Mr. Philip Miles proposed a reduction in the import duty on free foreign as well as colonial. He simply wanted to make the best terms he could for the West Indies; and as, with threatened competition, the lower the duty on colonial sugar the better for the colonies, he was willing to purchase the advantage by a corresponding concession in favour of free foreign. He calculated on the support of the Free-Traders, because, as they are for measures, not men, and will take Free Trade from Tory or Whig, they would naturally vote for any proposition which would lower import duties. Here, therefore, was a Conservative, who, seeing monopoly doomed, is willing to go faster than the Government he supports; and who, without any fear of injury to the revenue, or a failure in the payment of the dividends in the funds, framed his amendment so as to secure the support of the Free-Traders he repudiates, in order to defeat the Government which he sustains!

And the Government were somewhat uneasy on Monday night. They dreaded being caught in a trap, similar to the factory one; they were fearful of falling between two stools. They did not want to discuss Mr. Ewart's proposition, and every effort was made to get rid of it at an early hour, in order that "Miles's motion" might come on.

The Free-Traders, however, would not allow themselves to be deprived of their Free-Trade discussion, on the simple merits of the question, by any anxiety about a sinister amendment. In spite, therefore, of coyness, of a reluctance on the part of members of the Government to speak, and a somewhat impatient House, especially on the Ministerial side, the debate occupied Monday night. On its conclusion, Sir Robert Peel tried to coax Mr. Philip Miles to go on with his amendment; but the member for Bristol was not disposed to fire off his speech at that late hour. Its discussion was accordingly postponed till Friday (yesterday); but at the early hour at which we are obliged to go to press, we are unable to give any account of it in this week's number of the LEAGUE.

Before Mr. Ewart made his speech, on Monday night, the House was addressed by one of the members for Cumberland,

Mr. JAMES, who sits on the Opposition side of the House, and is liberal in his politics. As one of those unfortunate beings called a West India planter, he craved leave to state his view of the actual condition of the West India interest. He took his own case as a favourable illustration. His son, a business man, resided on the property, and he had no extra charges, beyond the ordinary brokerage, &c. Every pound of sugar cost him 4d. a pound in production and transmission; the duty was 3d., making the sugar 7d., and, taking the average of the last three years, he had only been able to get 6½d. a pound, entailing a loss of £500 on every 100 hogsheads of sugar, produced from a property which, before emancipation, yielded a clear annual revenue of £3000, and during the period of apprenticeship one-half of that amount. This was a loss for which his share of the twenty millions was no compensation. He appealed to the House for a favourable consideration of the cruel case of the West India planters, who were an interest extremely weak, as compared with the landed proprietors, or even the manufacturers; and called on the former to make common cause with them, for they did not know but ere long they would be in the same boat with them. If the House would not legislate for their benefit, let it, at least, not injure them; facilities should be given to enable them to produce and transmit their sugar cheaper, and the colonial sugar duty should be considerably lowered, say to 12s. a cwt., and this, with plenty of free labour, would save the colonies as well as benefit the community.

Mr. Ewart then proposed his amendment in a neat speech, in which he urged the Free-Trade and commercial view of the question. He was very briefly answered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, more for form's sake than anything else; and the whole debate might have gone off before seven o'clock if Mr. Milner Gibson had not risen and asked, what claim the West India interest had on the manufacturing community? Encouragement to the colonies was discouragement to the community of this country. He wanted the reason of this differential duty; on what grounds the amount was fixed at 10s.; what was the principal or justifiable claim which led them to create this new discriminating duty. What officer of the Board of Trade was it whose business it was to measure the precise nature of the wants of the community, and the exact amount of protection which the colonies still required? The Government proposition would not materially reduce the price of sugar; and it was strange to see a Government, with its practised reputation, adopting, as part of its policy, the amiable weaknesses of those who refused to eat sugar during the anti-slavery agitation, which ended in emancipation. This discrimination between free-grown and slave-grown foreign sugars might be followed by high discriminating duties against British manufactures on the part of other countries, especially the Brazil.

Again there was a pause; no member of the Government rose to answer the question; "Divide, divide," ran like a piping fire along the benches; the SPEAKER exclaimed, "Strangers must withdraw;" and the galleries were cleared. Again the doors were opened, and Mr. Villiers was found addressing the House, and expressing his regret that no member of the Government rose to answer the question of Mr. Milner Gibson. There was a weekly paper (the Economist) which made a weekly calculation of the amount taken out of the pockets of the people of the Metropolis, and of the country generally, by this system of protection, which, from the statement of the West India interest, did not benefit them, while it robbed the Exchequer and the community. Competition would compel those improvements in the cultivation of our colonies which would alone enable them to meet the foreign cultivator on equal terms. The best proof that emancipation was no positive disadvantage, was the fact which Mr. Gurney stated, that in the island of Antigua, where the population was dense, the produce had doubled in six years. Other countries could not enter into the distinction which we draw between slave and free labour; we refused the slave-grown produce of the Brazils, and yet maintained friendly relations with such countries as Egypt, where the slave trade was openly carried on, accompanied with horrors in the transportation of the unhappy creatures from Nubia and elsewhere worse than those of the "middle passage." They were maintaining a system which cost five millions a year, and yet was useless to those for whom it was maintained; and the Government was bound to give some explanation of the reasons on which it rested.

Mr. GLADSTONE was now compelled to get up, and said that he had not risen because he thought that the reasons for the policy pursued by the Government had been sufficiently explained, and were perfectly familiar to the House. There were two reasons: the first, that of caution in a state of transition from one system to another; and the second, that the West Indies being insufficiently supplied with labour, required protection to enable them to compete with other countries. He briefly replied to some of the statements of Mr. Villiers, especially as to Antigua, which was in a peculiar position, but which had not doubled its production. This he did with a pertness of manner not usual to him, and the object was plainly to get rid of the general question by a quibble about the exactness of a particular statement. When he had concluded, Dr. BOWRING, in the midst of a multiplicity of conflicting interests, claimed some consideration for the great consuming interest. He also defended the Pacha of Egypt from being implicated in the cruelties of the Nubian slave hunts.

Mr. VILLIERS defended himself from the charge of incorrectness, to which Lord STANLEY replied, each adducing figures, the result being that the produce in Antigua increased, if it had not doubled.

Mr. COBDEN then got up, and, with his accustomed tact, recalled the House to the true question before it. The hum and hubbub subsided into silence, and there was instant attention. He told them that he saw a great disinclination in the House to discuss this question on principle. The question was not as to the authenticity of what Mr. Gurney stated, but on what ground they gave a monopoly to the West Indies. The open, bare proposition of the Government was to give that interest 10s. on every cwt. of colonial sugar; and the only plea for it was, that the planters could not profitably grow their sugar without it, a statement very fitting to be made at a meeting of creditors, but not to the House of Commons. We maintained the colonies, protected them with our army and navy, and, in the face of these facts, the arguments used in that House for protection were as audacious as those of the Duke of Richmond about the loss of £2000 a year on his fish. He amused the House by reading the resolutions of the House of Commons in 1640 against "projectors and monopolists," expelling them from the House, at the time when the tobacco patent granted by Charles I. was in question. This portion of Mr. Cobden's speech is too good to be condensed, and we therefore quote it as reported:—"There was a time when, in this House, a most stringent resolution was passed against monopolists. The hon. gentleman then read the following entries from the Journals of the House of Commons:—Upon the question that all projectors and monopolists whatsoever, or that have any share, or lately have had any share in any monopolies, or that do receive, or lately have received, any benefit, from any monopoly, or that have procured any warrant or command, for the restraint or molesting of any that have refused to conform themselves to any such proclamations or projects, are disabled by order of this House from sitting in this House; and if any man here knows any monopolist, that he shall nominate him. That any member of this House who is a monopolist or projector, shall repair to Mr. Speaker that a new warrant may issue forth; or otherwise that he shall be dealt with as with a stranger that hath no power to sit here.

"Resolved, upon this question, that the word unlawful should be joined to the word monopolists."

"This order was resolved upon the question with one unanimous vote."

"On the 12th November, 1640, it was resolved—'That if any man here knows any projector or monopolist, that he should name him.'—[Committee appointed to inquire into the matter.]

"On the 21st January following, he found that—

"Mr. Peril reports from the committee for monopolists these four cases following:—And upon his report it was—

"Resolved—That Mr. Wm. Sandys is within the order made against monopolists, and not fit nor ought to sit as a member in this House of Parliament, and that a warrant issue forth under Mr. Speaker's hand to the Clerk of the Crown for a new writ for electing of another member to serve for the town of Exeter in his stead."

"Resolved—Upon the question that Sir J. Jacob is a monopolist in the business of tobacco, and within the order against monopolists, and ought not to sit as a member of this House (and a new writ was ordered for Rye, in Sussex).

"Resolved—That Mr. Thomas Webb is interested in the monopoly concerning the sealing of bone-lace, and within the order of this House made against monopolists, and ought not to sit as a member in this House this Parliament (and a new writ was ordered—place not named).

"Resolved—That Mr. Edmund Windham is a monopolist, and within the order made against monopolists (and a new writ was ordered for Bridgewater.)

"Hear, and laughter." Now he (Mr. Cobden) wanted to know the distinction—the difference in operation—(constitutionally he knew very well what it was) between a monopoly granted by Charles I. to a creature of his court, and a monopoly granted by Parliament to any body of men, in opposition to the interests of the public at large? (Hear, hear.) It might be said that in 1640 the times were troublesome. True; but why were they so?

In every motion, in every debate recorded of the period, they found this question of monopoly put forth as the prominent grievance, restricting the trade and comforts of the people, and being a great hardship upon the people generally. That was the complaint now (cheers); and he defied the Government and the upholders of the monopolies of the present day to show him the difference between the monopoly in sugar, which his honourable friend got up, and, as he thought, unwisely maintained, and the monopoly in tobacco in the time of Charles I. (Hear, hear.) Where was the difference so far as the people were concerned? They could not compensate his (Mr. Cobden's) constituents for the loss they sustained from the monopoly in sugar, by giving them any monopoly in return. (Hear, hear, hear.) They could give them no quid pro quo ('hear, hear,' and a laugh from Lord Stanley) in wages for what they took from them in the high price they were now made to pay for their sugar. It was admitted on all sides that they could not legislate to increase or keep up the rate of wages;

therefore, in increasing the prices to the labourer of the articles of consumption, they inflicted a grievous injustice upon the whole labouring classes. (Hear, hear.) It would, he knew, be useless to call for a vote against monopoly then, when the great majority were monopolists, though the abolition of the monopoly could be proved to be advantageous to those by whom it was possessed. He did not stand there in support of the proposal of his honourable friend (Mr. Ewart), because he thought that, if the equalization of the duties were carried, no injury to the West India interest would result. He would tell his honourable friend (Mr. James) that, in his opinion, the West India planters would best consult their own interests by uniting with the Free-Traders in demanding a very low rate of duty on the import of sugar, equal throughout the whole world. (Hear, hear.) He believed that an equal duty of 16s., or even 14s., a cwt., would in the course of a few years produce as much to the revenue as the present rate of duties produced, while it would give an impulse to the trade of the West Indies, and place it upon a sound bottom; and capital and intellect (which was, he feared, as much required as anything else) ('hear, hear,' and a laugh) would flow in, and that prosperity which, under a system of protection, those colonies looked for in vain, would, under a system of free competition, result. (Hear, hear.) The present condition of the West Indies was known and admitted; and what was the prospect under the new measure of protection which was now proposed? The right hon. the President of the Board of Trade had told the House that the present was nothing more than a transition measure. He (Mr. Cobden) knew that very well; the opinion of the right honourable gentleman was not necessary to convince the House that this could not be a final measure, but merely one of transition. The question, then, was not as to 1s. of duty more or less, but it was a question between monopoly and no monopoly. (Cheers.) There could be no settlement, no quiet in the matter, until the system of differential duties was abolished. (Cheers.) The great party out of the House, which he and his hon. friends represented, called for 'no monopoly;' in the House, however, they had a large majority in favour of monopoly; but that party in the House, who advocated a smaller amount of protection than now existed, were, in his opinion, the best friends of monopoly. As he had said, the question out of doors was simply between monopoly and no monopoly, and upon which side was the preponderance of public opinion there could be no doubt. (Hear, hear.) What did the petitions which had been presented to the House upon the subject say? They had one petition from the important town of Leeds, with 25,000 signatures, praying for the reduction and equalization of the duty on sugar. Year after year they had had petitions sent up to them from Manchester, declaring the opinion of the inhabitants of that town in favour of the equalization of the sugar duties. They had also received a petition from the Brazilian merchants of Liverpool in favour of a modified measure; but that body had since broken up in consequence of the difference amongst its members as to that measure—the majority of them preferring to dissolve the body rather than petition again for a modified duty. (Hear.) He would call upon his hon. friend near him to bear these things in mind, and join with the Free-Traders in demanding a low equalized duty. What the Free-Traders wanted was Free Trade in all things—not here only, but in the colonies also—they demanded not differential duties, which they held to be alike injurious to those for whose benefit they were imposed as to the people by whom they were to be paid; but low equal duties. (Hear, hear.) Let, then, his hon. friend join with him (Mr. Cobden), and he would find that the West India interest would be better off in the hands of the Free-Traders than while they were thus made the shuttlecock of political parties, and were banded about from one to the other on the floor of that House." (Hear.)

The other speakers were Mr. Bright, Mr. Roebuck, and Mr. Warburton, in favour of the motion. Mr. Bernal, who, as a planter, made a long speech on behalf of the West Indies, as did also Lord Sandon; while Mr. Donald Maclean, member for the city of Oxford, declared "that sugar was as much entitled to protection as corn. He had heard it said, you must give protection to corn, because it was an exceptional case. He granted it; you must protect corn, but then you must protect sugar, because it was an exception too. (Ironical cheers and laughter.) If you were to let down the protection of the West Indians by degrees, would not that breed some anticipatory fears that the same steps would soon be taken with respect to corn? (Hear.) If that were so, he said it was better they should know it in time, because, if they were wrong in the political economy they had been taught, that the power of this country depended on her colonies, and if it were true that commerce from colonies was nothing better than free trade, then many of them had been labouring under a very grievous delusion. But he hoped there was no ground for those apprehensions, and that his right honourable friend on this occasion did mean to protect the West India interest. He hoped we should not act in such a way as to render those magnificent islands deserts, but in a genuine spirit of protection that the English labourer might find, when he emigrated thither, that he was still under the ægis of British protection—that genuine protection which had pervaded the legislation of Great Britain since the first imposition of import duties."

The House divided:—

For Mr. Ewart's motion 56

Against it 259

Majority against it 203

We may notice the following amendment which appears on the notice paper. Our readers must be dull, indeed, not to see the drift of it:—

"Mr. Irving, in committee on Sugar Duties Bill, to move—That the same rule that has been applied to British possessions in India should be applied to foreign countries, which may import Sugar into Great Britain under the proposed reduced duty, viz., that only those countries which do not import Sugar for their own consumption should be allowed to export their own growth to this country."

The Free-Trade debate in the House of Lords on Thursday night was not only admirable, but cheering. It was brought on by Lord MONTAGLE, who, in a speech of about three hours' duration, supported a proposition, "That a Select Committee be appointed on the Import Duties, with the view of considering the effect produced by Protecting Duties on the Foreign Commerce, the Home Industry, the Revenue, and the general prosperity of the Empire." In support of this motion, he reviewed the whole field of our commercial legislation, tracing the operation of the Corn Laws from 1815 to the present time; sketching the history of the two conflicting principles of RESTRICTION and FREEDOM—the one struggling to escape from the other, and each manifesting their opposite influences when applied to Corn or Silk, Sugar or Coffee, Wool or Timber, Flax or Cotton. Very happily did the noble lord apply the words of a Spanish writer to our system of commercial policy and absurd legislation. It substituted dearer commodities for cheaper; inferior articles for better; limited the exports and production; created a loss to the revenue; increased smuggling; caused internal divisions, foreign jealousies, and adverse diplomacy; and, finally, diminished confidence in Government. This is the perfection of descriptive concentration, condensing a volume into a paragraph.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE, Vice-President of the Board of Trade, opposed the motion of Lord Montagu, but did not attempt to answer his speech. In fact, he gave up the whole case, merely opposing the appointment of a committee of inquiry on the ground of inconvenience, but claiming for the Government the credit of moving as fast in the direction of Free Trade as it was possible for them to do. This did not escape the Earl of CLARENDON, who, in declaring his conviction that there was no material difference between the Earl of Dalhousie and Lord Montagu, drew from the Duke of Richmond those loud, significant cries of "Hear, hear!" to which we have already alluded as provoking very great laughter. The Earl of CLARENDON, like his brother, Mr. Villiers, takes high, statesmanlike ground on the subject of the Corn Laws, and of Free Trade generally; and accordingly his speech on Thursday night was a most admirable one. Gravely and earnestly he warned their lordships against exposing this country to the continued and increasing danger of leaving the community dependent on the fluctuations of the barometer for a supply of the main article of subsistence; told them that our very institutions would be powerless to resist another succession of bad harvests; laid bare the folly of trumpery reductions in duties, and of trifling negotiations to effect worthless, because useless, reciprocity; and showed that, though the greatness and the prosperity of England had grown up in spite of our absurd legislation, the time was now come when our Government, be it Whig or Tory, must let restriction go, and act on Free Trade.

The Marquis of Lansdowne and the Earl of Wicklow both supported the cause of Free Trade by their speeches; and the Duke of Richmond, of course, was full of horror, in which he was sympathised with by the Earl of Winchester. Lord Montagu obtained 75 votes for his motion, but being opposed by 90 peers present, who held in their hands 91 proxies, making 184, the committee was refused by a majority of 109.

The debate in the House of Commons, on the same evening, was on the Bank of England Charter and Currency Bill; and as we have already, on a former occasion, alluded to it at some length, we need here only say, that various speakers gave it as their decided opinion that the new currency law cannot be maintained, in conjunction with the Corn Law. We are of the same opinion; and therefore view this banking measure, which will meet with but slight opposition in passing through the Legislature, to be a preliminary to the approaching and inevitable repeal of the Corn Laws.

MEETINGS.

SOUTHAMPTON.

On Monday evening last there was a splendid gathering of the friends of Free Trade in Southampton. The meeting was called by the Free-Trade Association, recently established in that town, and was held in the spacious carriage bazaar of Mr. Andrews. The most excellent arrangements had been made by that public-spirited and liberal gentleman, for the accommodation of his town's people. The gallery was appropriated to the use of the ladies, and was completely crowded. The lower part of the building was densely packed by a male audience of enthusiastic supporters of the anti-monopoly movement. Mr. George Thompson had been advertised to deliver an address, and was accompanied by Major-General Briggs and Robert R. R. Moore, Esq. At eight o'clock those gentlemen (accompanied by the president of the society, Dr. Cooper, and the committee,) made their appearance, and were greeted with loud and repeated acclamations. The president took the chair.

Mr. THOMPSON briefly expressed his joy at meeting with his Southampton friends after his absence in India, and stated that he should reserve his speech until after Mr. Moore had addressed them.

Mr. MOORE then came forward amidst loud plaudits, and at considerable length, and in the most effective and happy strain, exposed the fallacies of the protectionists, and pointed out the duties of the electors of the borough. His speech was received with vociferous applause, and appeared to produce the most satisfactory impression.

Mr. THOMPSON then delivered an address, which lasted nearly an hour and a half. It was listened to with uninterrupted attention, and at its conclusion the meeting testified the most perfect sympathy with the great object that had been discussed.

Major-General BRIGGS, in a brief address, referred to his recent contest in Exeter, and to the firm determination of himself and others who had been engaged in similar struggles to persevere until the question of Free Trade was triumphant.

Mr. ANDREWS, in reply to a vote of thanks, alluded to the great bazaar to be held in Covent Garden Theatre, and said, that if an opportunity was afforded to the electors of Southampton of exercising their privilege before that event took place, he thought that Southampton would be able to send two Free-Trade members, which he had no doubt would be considered a most acceptable and valuable contribution. (Great applause.)

The CHAIRMAN announced the intention of the association to hold a Free-Trade meeting in Southampton once a month, regularly. (Applause.)

Mr. MOORE assured the meeting that the Council of the League would always be ready to render any assistance that might be required from London.

Mr. ANDREWS declared his willingness to allow his bazaar to be occupied for Free-Trade meetings whenever it might be required, and the oftener the better.

Thanks were voted to the deputation and the chairman.

and the meeting separated after giving three cheers for the League.

BRIGHTON.

On Wednesday evening last, according to announcement, a meeting was held in the Town-hall, Brighton, to hear addresses from Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, on the subject of Free Trade. The hour appointed was half-past six, and soon after that time the immense hall became crowded. Mr. John Hilton was unanimously voted into the chair, and on the platform and in the body of the hall were a large number of influential inhabitants of the town.

Mr. COBDEN's speech was, as usual, a very happy exposure of the foolish idea that any public advantage could arise from the existence of the Corn Law. He pointed out in forcible language the injustice of a law to prevent a full and natural supply of food, and by familiar illustrations showed how the shortness of supply must of necessity be most prejudicial to the labouring classes. He alluded to the policy of the landowners who make the Corn Law and the prejudices of the farmers their way to power and to political advantages. The "salmon complaint" of the Duke of Richmond was happily touched upon; the opposition to the abolition of the wool duties threatened by that magnanimous nobleman, but withdrawn at the same time that his brother receives a place from the Government; the sacrifice of the supposed interests of the farmers in protection, whenever it suits the political objects of the landowners; the evident breaking up of the old system of endeavouring to enrich one class by spoiling all the rest,—all afforded subjects which, in the hands of the speaker, could not fail to carry conviction to the minds of the auditory.

Mr. BRIGHT commenced by showing what was the nature of the contest in which they were engaged. Two principles were offered to the public mind: one, that of protection; and the other, that of perfect freedom of industry. He showed how impossible it is to carry out the protective principle to all trades and to every individual, and how unjust such a principle must be when only partially applied, and how utterly absurd as a mode of increasing the wealth or prosperity of a nation. By illustrations from the sugar and coffee monopolies, he showed how grievous is the wrong inflicted upon the great body of the people by the restrictions upon the importation of these articles, and asserted that these monopolies had no other object than that of adding to the revenues of the proprietors of the sugar and coffee estates in our colonies. From these examples it might easily be seen how little the monopoly in food was calculated to add to the comfort of the people, and how clearly it was a system having only for its object the increase of the rental of the landowners. Mr. Bright went on to speak of the unprosperous state of the farmers, and of the terrible condition of the labourers in most of the agricultural counties. The incendiary fires in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex, were proof of the lamentable state of the labouring population of those counties, and demonstrated the utter uselessness of the Corn Law in giving employment and wages to the people. The subject of the representation of Brighton, and the necessity of attending to the registration, were urged upon the meeting, and a strong feeling was created as to the necessity of returning two good Free-Traders for the town of Brighton.

Both speeches were greatly cheered, and the utmost enthusiasm was manifested.

At the conclusion of Mr. Bright's speech, a person named Dudman, and who, we believe, appeared at the Steyning Anti-League meeting, under the auspices of the Duke of Richmond, as a "working man," asked two questions of Mr. Cobden, viz., Whether he was for Free Trade in all articles? and, whether he thought a free importation of corn would throw inferior lands out of cultivation? To which Mr. Cobden gave answers perfectly satisfactory to the meeting, and apparently so to Mr. Dudman himself.

A vote of thanks was passed to the deputation from the League, also to the chairman; and after three times three cheers the meeting separated shortly after 10 o'clock.

THE BAZAAR.

To the Editor of the Norwich Mercury.

DEAR SIR,—Permit me through the medium of your columns to direct the attention of the city and county to the arrangements now making by the Anti-Corn Law League.

It is contemplated in the month of July to hold a splendid miscellaneous Bazaar at Covent-garden Theatre, for the purpose of displaying the varied manufactures of this country, works of art, &c., that the public may generally have the opportunity of witnessing (in a compressed focus) the combined skill and taste of that very important portion of our population who are so worthily labouring for a release from those shackles which self-interest and class legislation have so long denied them. Free Trade in the most extended form is the primary object of the League, and with it also the abolition of the WHITE SLAVERY that is consequent upon our present restrictive policy.

It is not now my purpose to go into any lengthened argument respecting the propriety of this momentous movement of the League; suffice it to say, that I conceive the object it designs is of so holy a character that it cannot need much to induce the co-operation of any one possessing the least spark of philanthropy.

The battle must necessarily be of long duration, while the recipients of the benefits of a law so pernicious are the law-makers themselves; but I confidently hope that the injustice inflicted on the rest of the community will ultimately render itself so glaring that, combined by the efforts of the League, the Ministry and House of Commons will be so constructed that not only shall the agricultural but the manufacturing interests be regarded in a manner commensurate with their undoubted importance.

I trust I have said sufficient to induce others to join in their assistance in promoting this novel step of the League, and that both its county and city friends will proceed immediately to get ready their intended contributions, and thus give the county of Norfolk a chance of being duly and properly recognised. To the fairer portions of its friends I beg to submit that any contribution of fancy work, drawings, or other elegant productions will be deemed an acquisition, and will materially assist in carrying out the object.

In conclusion permit me to add, that I am alone influenced in my support to the League from the fullest conviction that the object it contemplates is that of paramount importance, involving not only the happiness and prosperity of the present but future generations.

I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

A NORWICH MANUFACTURER.

A NOBLE HUCKSTER.

(From the Economist.)

"If you want the best fish dinner that can be had in London at one half of the usual price, go to —." Such, or something similar, is the intimation which one's eyes encounter, from time to time, in passing through the crowded thoroughfares of this great metropolis. It is a sort of thing which, whether reputable or disreputable, is sufficiently well understood. It is what is called the puff direct, and it is, we dare say, pretty generally estimated at about what it is worth. The sympathy felt for a poor man, as perhaps such an advertiser is, struggling in the midst of keen competition for an honest, or partially honest, livelihood, quite overcomes any rising feeling of dislike or contempt for a resort to such means of aiding him in his effort; and the pushing victualler, if not rewarded with a passing customer for his pains, is at most only punished with a smile. But, indeed, puffs of all sorts, direct and indirect, are so common that they cease not only to mislead but even to amuse. However, till now it has been thought that there were some among us who, from being above the necessity of puffing, could not by any possibility be supposed capable of resorting to it. The Duke of Richmond seems determined to show that it is not so, or at least that he himself and those with whom he acts are not of this class.

It will be recollected that some weeks ago his Grace was lamenting, in his place in Parliament, a loss of £2000 in the yearly rent of one of his Scotch fisheries, which he ascribed entirely to the importations of foreign fish under the new tariff. People who knew a little more of trade than dukes in general do—certainly more than the Duke of Richmond does—were prepared to tell him that under the new tariff, from the first day that it became law to this hour, little more than £2000 worth of salmon, most certainly not £5000 worth altogether, had been imported into England from abroad; and that the cause of the diminished demand for salmon, necessarily leading to the demand of his Grace's tackmen for a reduction of rent, was the diminished ability of the people to consume, arising from that diminished trade which the Duke of Richmond desires—so suicidally—to make less and less. The actual quantity of salmon imported since the duty became 10s. a cwt. appears, by what fell from Lord Kinnaird on Monday night, in the House of Peers, to have been precisely 800 cwts., a quantity it must be admitted which ought not, in all conscience, to have alarmed even a nervous duke; and that excellent nobleman very plainly insinuated that his grace had been taking more rent than he ought. We subjoin the principal part of the Duke's reply:—

"With respect to salmon, he had seen the return which the noble lord, no doubt, had found out, and he knew that it appeared from the customs return that a very small quantity of salmon had been brought into this country; but that did not satisfy him that a great deal had not been brought in by other means. Then his noble friend asked him whether the rent of his salmon fisheries was not too high. He could only say he believed the rent was not too high, and he was sure his tenants would have continued to pay the rent had it not been for the tariff. He made the agreement with them for the rent some years since, and good security had been given for its payment. The early fishing paid better than the fishing later in the season, and it was the early fishing which was interfered with by the salmon imported from Holland. The foreign fish were certainly the largest, and people were attracted by their appearance; but when they tasted them they found out that they were not as good as the Scotch salmon." (Laughter.)

We pass by as unworthy of refutation the assertion, or rather insinuation, that with so low a duty on salmon parties would be found to incur all the risk, trouble, and expense of smuggling it into the country in any considerable quantities. There is not a tidewater, from Land's End to John o'Groat's, who would not laugh at the idea. But what amuses us—while at the same time it gives us pain—is the very cool manner in which the Duke here advertises his own salmon. "Laughter," we read, was the ready response which his fellow peers gave to the Duke's puff direct of the fish which he has got to sell, and that certainly is not surprising, for in one sense it is very amusing; but otherwise, and looked upon as it ought to be, in connexion with the whole tenor of speeches and petitions from that party of which the Duke of Richmond has become the chief spokesman, it presents another aspect, and suggests something other than amusement. By every shilling that the Duke of Richmond can show himself to have lost by the new tariff, to that extent, on the face of the thing, he is proved to have been robbing the community heretofore; and, indeed, that is not the whole of it, for what is absolutely lost to the community by the total prevention of trade, such as the Duke of Richmond advocates—prevention of trade with all except himself and his class—is of necessity incalculable. But what a pitiable sight it is to see a great duke—in whose veins, it might have been thought, there flows no vulgar blood—condescending to announce to the high court of Parliament, and through it to the nation, that he has got fish to sell; moreover, that he is very sorry he cannot compel his countrymen to buy them at 10s. per cwt. dearer than they might have them in the market of the world (for that is the plain intent and meaning, not disguised, indeed, and for that, so far, he deserves thanks, of his dislike to the new tariff); but, finding that he cannot play the tyrant to the full extent of his wishes, resorting for the rent to the lowest arts of the trickiest huckster to increase his gains by avowing that his goods are better than those of any one else! The full meaning of Napoleon's sneer was never seen till now—we are a nation of shopkeepers, and the days of chivalry must be over. "Give us our old nobility," says Young England; but for what? Here is a duke of ancient family and high descent, tracing his pedigree, in fact, to royalty itself, known to be in the receipt of one of the most princely incomes of any man in the country, and recognised, in respect of the particular matter here discussed, as the representative of nine-tenths, or, we believe we might say, nineteen-twentieths of our "nobility," so called; and we find him engaged—how? in rallying round him the feelings and affections of numerous dependants?—in causing to be felt his goodness as well as his power?—in attempting to quell the rising spirit of democracy by showing how much justice may be administered, how much happiness felt, under the dominion of an oligarchy? No! but by proclaiming and lamenting a loss of £2000 on the sale of fish, his monopoly having been infringed upon to the extent of some shillings per cwt., though he still enjoys a protection to which he has no more right than has a convicted felon to the use of his plunder; and then, with a spirit which would disgrace a Yankee storekeeper, to say nothing of a great English duke, he wishes to retain his hold of the market by crying up his own articles, and decrying those of his neighbours. It has passed into a proverb with the Scotch, that "cadgers" never depreciate their own fish; and it seems that the Duke of Richmond has no sooner got among them than he has caught their spirit, and he is determined to make use of his position in doing his best to glorify his goods. Only fancy the following, which is no strained paraphrase of his Grace's speech the other night. That speech was an advertisement to all intents and purposes; and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not see to obtaining the usual duty, he appears to us to lay himself open to impeachment for voluntarily, we may say almost wickedly and maliciously, sacrificing eighteenpence which he should have for the revenue!

House of Lords, Monday, May 3, 1844.

"The Duke of Richmond, not grateful to the British public, his customers, since they have been so for many years only by compulsion, they having had to buy his genuine small salmon as imported from Speymouth at such prices as he was pleased to put upon them, instead of being permitted to buy from Norway, Holland, or other places, such large salmon as those countries produce, and at such prices as the market of the world might determine, feels it necessary—not in vindication of his own character, about which, in fact, he is quite indifferent, but with a view to protect his salmon from the foul aspersions of Lord Kinnaird, Earl Radnor, Richard Cobden, and all the small fry of the Anti-Corn Law League, and in order, as far as possible, to counteract the bad, the ruinous consequences of that disgraceful tariff of Sir Robert Peel—to ANNOUNCE that though the foreign fish may seem large and good to begin with, besides being very cheap, the only true, good fish are those small and now not so dear salmon (for which the more's the pity, he [the Duke] having been done out of £2000 a year in consequence) which come from his Spey fisheries in Scotland; and he begs to say that, 'for the protection of British industry,' all parties should eat them and no foreign salmon. To prevent fraud, the mark 'Richmond' will for the future be stamped on all dear salmon." &c. &c.

"Ye gods and little fishes!"

But the Duke was fertile on Monday night. The Customs-Duty Bill came on for discussion, and he could not with any face let the proposed abrogation of the wool duty pass without saying something against it. To have done so would have been to betray his order; it would have indicated a sort of willingness for once to be just as respects a trifle. Accordingly, his Grace admitted,

"That the question was one which only concerned short-wool growers; BUT HE LIVED IN A SHORT-WOOL COUNTRY HIMSELF, AND HE FELT BOUND TO STAND UP FOR THEIR [WHOSE?] INTERESTS. On that ground alone he considered that it was inexpedient the clause should pass."

Really if we were the friends of the aristocratic order, which we are not, we should tremble for the consequences of such bold and barefaced announcements as these. To be sure, it never could have been a secret for what purpose monopolies were created, nor was the flimsy veil attempted to be cast around that purpose sufficient to hide it at any time from view; but certainly such announcements as these made by the Duke of Richmond are somewhat new and in their nature startling. We wonder what would be thought of a manufacturer in the House of Commons who should request the attention of members to any loss occasioned him, perhaps by some new invention in machinery, or some hostile tariff inflicted from abroad in revenge for our Corn Laws? or of a merchant who might have lost by some speculation in tea, coffee, or cocoa, by any of the thousands of incidents to which all merchandise is subjected? Why, they would be laughed at. And if those gentlemen should demand indemnification from the community for their losses—what might they expect?—more probably than anything else to be sent to Bedlam. They would be told that those were their own affairs, and they must manage them the best way they can without any aid from others.

But the upper chamber of the Legislature would seem to have more privileges in this respect. It seems noble lords may meet in that house, where vulgar people would expect them to be studying the public interest, and unblushingly concoct means for promoting their own, or whine over their defeat in attempts to uphold it at the expense of the community. But there will come an end of these things, as surely as the sun is in the firmament; nor can that end be now far away.

"INDEPENDENCE OF FOREIGNERS."

(From the Times.)

There is a common saying, that in our dealings with our most intimate friends we ought to do nothing which we should repent of in the event of their becoming our enemies; as, on the other hand, we should conduct ourselves to our enemies as if they might some day be converted to friends. To the former and more prudent part of this maxim there must be some limits. That friendship is no friendship at all which is chilled by the perpetual recollection of human inconstancy, and there can be no law, either of feeling or of prudence, against doing all the good we can, even though the good we do may sometimes be found to have armed against us an ungratefully ally. Again, it cannot be necessary to repudiate entirely the law of mutual dependence which Heaven has made the condition of our social race, and to seek security by insulation. Nay, so little is it possible on this level plain to exalt man above man, and so intimately are our interests interwoven, that we cannot make others dependent on ourselves without suffering a dependence on them in return.

Thus, we presume, there can be no doubt that the Prince de Joinville has done much more than a wise caution would have suggested, in calling on his country to arm itself up to the teeth against a friendly neighbour, now dwelling by its side in the profoundest and most unconscious security. Nothing could be less unseasonable than the ideas of surprise, invasion, pillage, and retreat, which he suddenly opened his heart to reveal. But let us see whether the same unfriendly and impertinent precaution is not sometimes found, in more specious form, perhaps, on our side of the Channel.

What are we to say of that class of patriots who never cease to remind us of the possibility of a war, not merely with this or that nation, but with the whole world, with every people and every shore, and who exhort us, in consequence, to render this island an island indeed, by closing for ever all interchanges of kindness and support with every brother realm? Mr. Archibald Alison is a patriot of this class, who thinks he best discharges his duty to his own country by admitting no duty, except lawful resistance, to any other; and that it is impossible to be true to England without being traitor to man. This gentleman's remarks on Free Trade and Protection have been reprinted from some more comprehensive treatises "for," and "at the request of, the Agricultural Protection Society," which may, therefore, be considered to sympathize with his terrors.

The following are some of the suggestions which he thinks it delicate to make after a profoundest peace of thirty years—after a whole generation has grown up and filled the earth, to whom war is little else than a calamitous and antiquated error:—

"The foreign market is, in great measure, composed of individuals owning allegiance to independent potentates, and who either have been or may become, our inveterate enemies."

"What will the operatives of Birmingham, Manchester, or Glasgow gain by doubling the growth of corn in Poland, Prussia, or the Ukraine? Nothing but this—that they will augment the resources and revenues of the Czar, who wields at his pleasure the whole power both of Russia, Poland, and Prussia, and enable him to pursue, with increased advantages, any designs against the prosperity of this country, and the independence of Europe."

"It requires little penetration, indeed, to perceive that the general peace which we have so long enjoyed is not destined to be of very long endurance; and that a contest, possibly as serious and protracted as that with Napoleon, awaits us with the power which has already ravaged more than half of Europe under its influence. Few will contest the reality of this danger, since the aggressions and ceaseless strides of Russia are the subject of general and well-founded apprehension. What, therefore, can be so hazardous—it may almost be added, so insane—as to forfeit the national independence at so critical a moment, by throwing ourselves upon the mercy of foreign states for the purchase of bread? It was a maxim with the Romans, 'Salus populi suprema lex.'"

So the policy of the Romans, unquestionably the most selfish and egotistical of empires, is to be the model of this Christian country. Rome called it self the mistress of the world, and while seeking as a paramount object the prosperity of the people, very consistently aimed to include in that class the whole human kind. Thus its benevolence was at the same time patriotic and universal. We, however, advance no such pretensions. We acknowledge ourselves to be one only of the family of nations; and also profess, at least, to belong to a higher and universal kingdom, which binds all its subject states to unwearied offices of kindness, to the arts of peace, to unsuspecting confidence thinking no evil, and to the mutual ministrations of those gifts which, to promote such intercourse, Providence has given abundantly to one member, and sparingly or not at all to another.

But to proceed with Mr. Alison:—

"Poland, Prussia, the Ukraine, are all, in fact, provinces of Russia; they all equally take the law from the Cabinet of St. Petersburg. Odessa, Dantzic, Memel, and Riga are alike Russian harbours; yet these are precisely the ports from which our supply of grain must inevitably be obtained, if we throw open our ports to foreign competition. The provinces from which we must almost exclusively obtain our food are those which wait at the beck of the Emperor Nicholas. To the permanent ambition of the Russian Cabinet the British possessions in India afford an attractive object of desire; to the jealousy and apprehensions of their despotic Government our free institutions and unrestrained press are a constant subject of disquietude. Everything, therefore, both in political combination and national interest, conspires to indicate that the seeds of permanent rival hostility between the British and Muscovite empires have not only been sown, but are already fast springing to maturity."

We have not space to pursue further Mr. Alison's visionary horrors. Strung to the highest pitch of patriotic fury, he expects these islands in absolute dependence on the granaries of Dantzic and Hamburg. At that moment the awful Czar, by the word of his mouth, "without fitting out one ship of the line, without raising one hostile banner," is to close his harbours. "He would speedily starve us into submission. The populace of Great Britain, deprived of their wonted supply of bread, would become unmanageable," and so on to the desired conclusion. We never saw such a case of malice prepense. Will Mr. Alison just consider what power Russia, what power all the nations in the world have of blockading our shores, without which they could do nothing? What is the use of our being mistress of the ocean if we are to be in continual tremour lest a Muscovite chief should stop our supplies? And is not charity, that is, international aid and confidence, a far more excellent way?

ANOTHER MOVE IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION.—We hear, from good authority, that Thomas Bushell, Esq., of Dolphin Lee, near this town, has granted permission to his tenants to destroy and convert to their own use all the hares and rabbits on their respective farms. This boon, it is almost needless to say, has been thankfully received. Some idea may be formed of the immense number of rabbits on this estate, and the consequent injury to growing crops, when it is stated that Matthew Goth, one of Mr. Bushell's keepers, shot and snared upwards of two thousand last winter. In spite, nevertheless, of this prodigious slaughter, they are now, to use his own expression, "as thick on the ground as ever;" a circumstance which will cease to excite surprise, when the remarkable fecundity of these animals is taken into consideration.—Lancaster Guardian.

PROVINCIAL PRESS.

THE PROGRESS OF RENT AND CIVILIZATION.—In the course of a lively discussion in the House of Lords, the other evening, on the third reading of the Factories Bill, Lord Wharncliffe, after alluding to some "golden age of industry," which all such sentimental political economists for the last four or five hundred years have been lamenting over, as if it had really existed in the days when they were young, made the following remarks regarding the extension of manufactures:—"But our great manufacturing system has since sprung up, and a fearful price we paid for it. As to civilization, what is it, except that every man tries to make as much money as he can?" We know not where his lordship picked up this sentiment about civilization; but we must confess, that it bears so close a resemblance to some of Rousseau's wilder notions regarding the superiority of the savage state, as to sound rather strange from the lips of a Conservative peer, and a cabinet minister to boot. We must, however, take the liberty of contradicting the assertion, that the modern manufacturing system is in any degree responsible for that strong desire to make money, the unreasonable excess of which has been the blemish of humanity in all ages, if we can place the slightest reliance upon history. In those "good old times," of which we hear so much laudation, all classes were just as desirous to make money as their more energetic descendants of the present day are; the grand essential characteristic of modern material civilization being simply the increased facilities for making money, which the men of the present day possess, and their inclination to acquire it rather by honest industry than by the rapine and violence which were rife in former times. Let Lord Wharncliffe look, for example, to the simple process by which his own rent-roll, or that of any of his fellow-landowners, has been quadrupled under the benign influences of that modern civilization which he affects to rate so lightly. Much as we may feel surprised when we look at the increased avenues to competence and wealth which have been opened up to thousands of industrious and enterprising men by the extension of manufactures and commerce, there is nothing connected with them all half so wonderful as the mysterious but inevitable process by which every step in the march of civilization is accompanied by an increase in the wealth of the owners of land. Other men make money by hard toil, by skilful invention, or by prudent speculation; but as for the landowner, he only requires to sit still; while a large portion of the wealth created by the combined industry and skill of the rest of the community is poured into his coffers. We are forcibly reminded of this when we look at the immense increase which has taken place in the rental of England since the conclusion of the war, as exhibited by the income-tax returns. It has been customary hitherto to represent the rental of the country as having diminished greatly since 1815; but the returns to which we allude will dispel that delusion. When Sir Robert Peel proposed the income-tax in 1842 he assumed the landed rental of Great Britain to be the same as it was under the property-tax returns in 1815, at which time it was only £39,400,000. It appears, however, from the returns just issued, that the present landed rental of the country is not less than £50,000,000; so that, although the value of money has risen greatly within the last twenty-eight years, the incomes of the landowners have increased during the same period to the extent of nearly £11,000,000. Indeed, if we take into account the difference between the war prices, on which the rents of 1815 were founded, and prices at present, we shall be justified in estimating the real increase of the landed rental of Great Britain, since the close of the war, at not less than £30,000,000. With so large a portion of that wealth which modern civilization has created, as their peculiar share, it might well become noble landlords, like Lord Wharncliffe, to ask themselves whether, in return for all this increase of wealth it may not be possible for them, as a class, to give the manufacturing industry of England something better than unmeaning lamentations over the past, and semi-Chartist denunciations of the present.—Manchester Guardian.

PROTECTORS OF MONOPOLY.—If any thing were wanting to prove that our pretended protection societies know that they are playing off a farce and a humbug upon the public generally and upon the farmers in particular, a resolution of the committee to this effect will give ample demonstration of its truth:—Resolved,—"That, in consequence of the Editor of the Devonshire Chronicle having inserted a leading article, showing the fallacy of our pretended protection, on the same day as our advertisements were once inserted in the above newspaper, no more of our advertisements do appear in that newspaper!" What manner of men can these "protectors" be? Do they think to bribe and intimidate with a few pence? Is this the way the public cause and the cause of truth is betrayed, and the vast numbers of advertisements are obtained in certain quarters, by the hope of gain or the fear of loss? Will this explain the display of malice upon one hand, and the violence upon the other? And is it true that the independence of the press of Exeter is in the hands of a few ignorant, narrow-minded, self-willed monopolists, who have neither talent nor power to defend the cause they have taken up, by replying in an open and manly way to the arguments against them; but, as far as they can, endeavour to suppress all argument, by holding out their advertisements in the shape of a bribe? Is this the way our magnates—our Courtenays and our Newmans—think they can succeed in extinguishing the light of truth, and smothering the effects of free discussion? They mistake their own position, they do not understand their own cause, neither do they mark the signs of the times, wherein is written in letters of iron, "Justice and monopoly, their days are numbered; and the thin veil of pretended protection can no longer hide the truth from the public eye." It is in vain the monopoly men attempt to defend their cause by garbling extracts from such writers as Adam Smith, or by endeavouring to shift the force of such evidence as that of Mr. Deacon Hume. They are unable to show that they are really entitled to any protection whatever; they say that the land has heavy burdens to bear; they are asked to point out one exaction that especially appertains to the land; but they say they won't—we opine because they can't! They say they want the protection of the sliding scale for the farmer and his labourer; they are asked to show how much protection has been afforded to these parties by the sliding scale; but they will not tell us—no, because they cannot! In fact there is no part of the conduct of the monopolists that shows they have any confidence in their own cause; they fear argument, and only hope to keep up the delusion by bribing and intimidating the public press. At any rate they will neither bribe nor intimidate us. The cause we advocate is the cause of truth, the cause of our country, the cause of the poor man, and by far the largest portion of the rich; and a cause that must triumph, in spite of all opposition!—Devonshire Chronicle.

THE COAL MONOPOLY.—The Government has determined to maintain the duty on coals exported, and the consequence is that other nations are beginning to find coals for themselves. In Belgium alone there are now in operation 352 coalmines; places formerly supplied with English coals are already supplied with Belgian coals; and the coal trade of that country is now carried coastwise as far as Havre and Rouen. In Hainault there are in operation 155; in Liege and Limburg, 138; in Namur and Luxembourg, 59 mines. In Prussia, and many of the Rhenish provinces, coals have been found in such abundance that Holland is supplied from that source. In La Vendée, and some parts of the south of France, many coalmines have been opened within the past year. Toulon and Marseilles are supplied with native coals. And yet with these facts before them the Government persists in maintaining the duty on coals exported abroad. It has been asserted that the English coal trade, whether for exportation or home consumption, is a monopoly; and this has been as warmly denied. But what is a monopoly? Though not fond of definitions as we often find them in dictionaries, we have no objection to that given in Smart's "Walker Remodelled"—"Monopolize: to buy up so as to be the only purchaser; to obtain the sole possession of a commodity or of a market; to engross, to obtain the whole of it." "Monopoly: the sole power of trading in some article, or at some place." Now, the coalowners possess this power. The coalfields are in few hands. In 1771 they formed a confederacy to fix the price of coals and the quantity to be supplied from the several mines. If this be not a monopoly, nothing is. We know it is not a monopoly such as many of those created by legislative acts; but that is of no consequence: it is, notwithstanding, a monopoly in the fullest sense of the word. The only question is, whether it is such a monopoly as the Legislature can destroy or interfere with. Directly it certainly cannot without inflicting a breach on private property; but, as regards the right of imposing duties upon it, it has been exercised without let or question. Now, the monopolists have so contrived matters that English coals are at this moment selling at the remote market of St. Petersburg for 15s. or 16s. per ton, of the same quality as those which the people of London are compelled to pay 30s. or a higher price for. What is the consequence? The foreign trade since 1822 has increased 210 per cent., whilst the consumption of London, with all its increase of population—all the consumption of coals for gas, steam-boats, &c. &c.—has not increased more than 30 per cent., not but that more would be consumed, but consumption is always regulated in coals as in every thing else, not by the wants but by the means of the consumer. We say nothing about the strike among the pitmen—which, by the way, has raised the price of coals considerably—because it seems to have been brought about by differences between the owners and the pitmen which are not well understood here; but it does seem to us that Lord Harry Vane's motion in the House of Commons on Tuesday for a committee on the coal trade, though the notice of motion was not so full as we desired, ought to have been entertained; for the whole of the coal trade—every thing about or connected with it—requires revision. The monopolists ought not to object to this though they might be humbled; for nothing is more certain than that bodies of men frequently mistake their own interest and injure the public at the same time.—Brighton Herald.

THE SOUTH LANCASHIRE ELECTION.—We find, as we expected, on analyzing the votes recorded at the recent election for South Lancashire, that there is a greater majority than at first appears in favour of Mr. Brown among the independent and intelligent voters of this district. The total majority for Mr. Brown in the Liverpool polling district, as stated by his committee, was 193. The number of votes polled for Liverpool and the adjoining townships of Everton, Toxtethpark, and West Derby, which as an expression of public opinion, must be considered in connexion with the borough, were—for Brown, 1041; Entwistle, 753—showing a majority for Liverpool of 288. In the Prescot district, including Prescot, Eccleston, Horton, and Roby, which contains a large number of highly respectable and intelligent voters, there voted for Brown, 145; for Entwistle, 111; majority, 34; whilst, in the rural districts of Hale, Garston, and Speke, under the immediate influence of J. I. Blackburne, Esq., M.P., who was very active on the occasion, there voted for Mr. Brown, 19; Mr. Entwistle, 102; minority, 83. From Knowsley, under the dictation of Lord Stanley, there voted for Brown, 4; Entwistle, 23; minority, 19. The result of the election is properly considered by the monopolists here as an unexpected and complete defeat, and they are working most assiduously by every means to increase their strength on the register. The Liberal party should make equal exertions. Let not a man of liberal principles be left of the next register who has a legal right to be placed there. The Free-Traders have fairly routed the Monopolists at the poll: now let us beat them on the register. The 20th of July is the last day on which claims can be sent in. Again, we say, be active; let every Free-Trader who has a qualification see that his name is placed on the register!—Liverpool Mercury.

DEATH OF THE LEAGUE.—The League dead! It is but just feeling its real vigour. The South Lancashire election, though terminating in a slight defeat, was a brilliant achievement on its part, and has fully awakened the enemy to a sense of the increasing strength and bravery of its antagonist. The friends of Free Trade were never in better spirits, and why should they be otherwise while they see their cause progressing on every hand. Each successive election exhibiting an increase of Free-Trade votes upon previous elections? Not only in the country, but in Parliament also, are our principles progressing. Government has again and again pronounced in favour of Free Trade as a principle, and many Conservatives are separating from the Protectionists, and using their influence in favour of Free Trade. Based on justice, the cause of commercial freedom will continue to progress, and ultimately the League will be honoured as having effected a change essential to the peace and prosperity of the empire. While so many Conservatives are deserting from the monopolist ranks, we may ask what are the deserters from the League? Where are the persons who have aided its funds and say they will aid no more? Such are not to be found. Unanimity and perseverance are the characteristics of its members; and the "defunct" League is yet ready for another battle—we may say another "victory," for with those who are at liberty to think and vote for themselves it has certainly gained even in South Lancashire a decided victory.—Preston Guardian.

THE GAME NUISANCE.—At the Garstang Pro-Corn-Law meeting no one professed a larger share of sympathy for tenant-farmers, or abused the League more roundly, than Mr. William Garnett, the late High Sheriff of this county. On the principle that "charity begins at home," it was therefore quite natural to suppose that he was a kind and considerate landlord to his own tenantry. Alas for the tender mercies of the Monopolists! Mr. Garnett, it will be recollected, some time ago became the owner, by purchase, of a princely domain in this neighbourhood, known by the name of Quernmore Park. And what do our readers suppose was one of the first acts of this "farmers' friend" on taking possession of the estate? Why, simply to convert it into one vast game preserve. Previous to its passing into his hands, the estate had been farmed on lease, and the game kept down as much as possible; but no sooner was the transfer fairly effected than strict means were adopted for its preservation. The consequence is, that the whole of this fine property literally swarms with hares and pheasants, to the serious detriment of the occupiers of the different farms, who, in addition to seeing the produce of their industry daily devoured before their eyes by these winged and four-footed pests, have the mortification of knowing that not a farthing will be paid them in compensation of the damage. That we may not be accused of exaggeration in speaking of the losses sustained by Mr. Garnett's tenants in consequence of his game-preserving mania, we may mention that, while conversing with one of them on this subject a few days ago, he stated that in a two-acre field in his occupation, which had been sown with clover, he counted no less than twenty-six hares at one time. The crop, he said, was a promising one before it was invaded by these destructive animals, which totally devoured it, leaving the field almost as smooth as a lawn. Of this latter fact we satisfied ourselves by actual inspection. Pursuing our queries, our informant gave us to understand that, although his farm was only of limited extent, his losses by the ravages of game and rabbits since Mr. Garnett became his landlord could not be less, on a moderate estimate, than £20 a year, for which he did not receive the slightest recompense. Pretty "protection" this for farmers! But, to give Mr. Garnett his due, he is not wholly insensible to the welfare of his tenants. At his late rent audit he condescended with them on the non-arrival at Liverpool of an expected cargo of Peruvian guano, which he had kindly undertaken to purchase for them—at their own expense! What a truly edifying display of land-owning sympathy! How delighted the Quernmore farmers ought to have been at the condescension of the opulent ex-manufacturer in expatiating for their advantage on the wonderful properties of guano! Yet some of them, we learn, were so ungrateful as to scart, within ear-shot of the great man, that it was useless for them to lay out money in guano so long as his game was fattened at their cost. They are in the right. A new light is dawning upon them. Thanks to the admirable little tracts so plentifully distributed in this district by the active agents of the League, they are beginning to perceive that the "protection" spoken of by Mr. Garnett and other Pro-Corn-Law and game-preserving landlords admits of no signification favourable to the interests of tenant-farmers; but has for its sole object the keeping up of rents, and the perpetuation of that system of hourly spoliation which has called forth these remarks.—Lancaster Guardian.

MR. HUTT AND THE CORN LAW.—The member for Gateshead is not very loquacious on the subject of total repeal of the Corn Law; but we believe that no member in the House of Commons has done more by his acts, in a quiet and unostentatious manner, to sap and destroy that odious statute. A return, now before us, shows that, from the passing of Mr. Hutt's "Flour and Biscuit Act," in August, 1812, to the 5th of April last, no less a quantity than 71,018 quarters of wheat have issued from the warehouses and vessels of this country, duty free. This is surely a hard blow at Monopoly! Newcastle alone, in the above period, has seen the delivery from her warehouses, of 6125 quarters of wheat, duty free. We quote these figures in order that full justice may be done to Mr. Hutt. The delivery of 71,018 quarters of wheat, duty free, is a "great fact" worthy of the grateful remembrance of every advocate of Free Trade.—Gateshead Observer.

A JUST LANDLORD.—The steward of Henry Hoghton, Esq., of Bold Hall, recently addressed a circular to the tenantry, in which he says—"I am directed by Henry Hoghton, Esq., to inform his tenants, that, having been made acquainted of the continued complaints of the great injury done to their crops, &c., by the game—having from personal observation ascertained the justness of those complaints, and being desirous, in every instance, to meet the wishes and promote the interests of those around him, and in whose welfare his own is so closely connected, he has determined upon relinquishing the strict preservation which has till lately been maintained on his estate. I am, therefore, desirous to give notice, that, on and after the 1st of September, 1844, the hares and rabbits on each farm will be considered as the property of the occupier for the time being, and it will be at his option to destroy or preserve them, as he may think proper; Henry Hoghton, Esq., or any one having a written authority from him, being also at liberty to shoot the same, on consideration of their afterwards being delivered to the tenant. The other game, and all in the covers, plantation, copse, &c., will remain, as heretofore, the property of Henry Hoghton, Esq., who, in return for the above concession, relies on his tenants to give notice of, and use every endeavour to prevent its destruction, by unauthorized persons, against whom the law will be strictly enforced."

PROPORTIONATE PAYMENTS OF THE INCOME TAX BY THE LANDED AND MANUFACTURING INTERESTS.—The Tory prints have been lately extremely vociferous about the large proportion of the income tax, which they allege is borne by the landed proprietors. We thought of asking them to tell us, with equal precision, what proportionate payments of probate and legacy duties the landed gentry escape. A circular comes apropos to hand, which is in private circulation, entitled a "Proposed Equitable Tax on the Transfer of Real Property in place of the Income Tax." The writer estimates the entire property of England at £6,186,000,000, and proposes that all real property should be taxed with the probate and legacy duty. The produce of such duty would, he thinks, be about £12,000,000 annually. Were his ideas adopted, he says that Sir Robert Peel might dispense with the income tax, and still have a much larger revenue than he has at present. It will be thus seen that the landed proprietors save, by their own legislation, twelve millions annually, to which species of payments the manufacturing interests are subject, whilst the latter have the income tax to pay into the bargain. The aristocracy have little need to plume themselves on their contributions to the National Treasury. They are but as a drop in the bucket when placed in juxtaposition with the manufacturing and industrial interests.—Kelso Chronicle.

MISCELLANEOUS.

POTATOES WITH THE BONES IN.—We are told that "there is reason in roasting eggs"—and there ought to be the same in roasting and boiling potatoes. But there will probably be few of my readers who can readily assign a reason why the all but universal custom among the poor of Ireland is to only half-boil their potatoes, leaving the centre so hard that it is called the bone of the potato. Considering that this root constitutes nearly the whole of the labouring man's food, it seems extraordinary that it should not be properly cooked, especially as the want of fuel is hardly ever felt in this land of bogs. It is my habit, whenever any unusual phenomenon presents itself to my observation, to endeavour to unravel the mystery myself before making inquiry of others. In the present case I stumbled on the true solution of the problem, and found it amply confirmed afterwards. There is scarcely a more indigestible substance taken into the human stomach than a half-boiled potato; and to a moderately dyspeptic Englishman such diet would be little less than poison. It is this very quality of indigestibility that recommends the parboiled potato to the poor Irishman. Rarely, indeed, have the labouring classes more than two meals of these in the twenty-four hours; and if they were well boiled, the pangs of hunger would be insufferable during a considerable portion of the day and night. Custom, fortunately, is a second nature; and custom has so reconciled the poor Irishman's stomach to this wretched food, that even the children complain if they find no "bone in the potato." The simplicity of their diet, their exposure to the open air, their patient resignation to their fate, and many other causes, render them little susceptible to the miseries of dyspepsy; while the bones of the potatoes protract the period of digestion till sleep renders them unconscious of the gnawings of hunger. As a feather will often show the direction of the wind better than a well-poised weathercock, so this simple fact demonstrates more forcibly the poverty of the Irish peasantry than a philosophical dissertation on the subject. I may here remark, that although the children of the cottiers look chubby, and the people healthy, on a potato diet, yet when the Irish labourers come over to this country, and are employed in hard work as navigators, &c., they are found unequal to the task till they are fed for some days on bacon, bread, and potatoes. They are like horses taken from grass, and incapable of hard labour till fed for a time on hay and corn.—Dr. James Johnson's Tour in Ireland.

THE SENSATIONS THAT ATTEND STARVING.—I have never yet seen a treatise or dissertation upon starving to death. I can speak feelingly of nearly every stage except the last. For the first two days through which a strong and healthy man is doomed to exist upon nothing, his sufferings are, perhaps, more acute than in the remaining stages—he feels an inordinate, unappeasable craving at the stomach night and day. The mind runs upon beef, bread, and other substantial; but still, in a great measure, the body retains its strength. On the third and fourth days, but especially on the fourth, this incessant craving gives place to a sinking and weakness of the stomach, accompanied by a nausea. The unfortunate sufferer still desires food; but with loss of strength he loses that eager craving which is felt in the earlier stages. Should he chance to obtain a morsel or two of food, as was occasionally the case with us, he swallows it with a wolfish avidity; but five minutes afterwards his sufferings are more intense than ever. He feels as if he had swallowed a living lobster, which is clawing and feeding upon the very foundation of his existence. On the fifth day his cheeks suddenly appear hollow and sunken, his body attenuated, his colour an ashy pale, and his eye wild, glassy, cannibalish. The different parts of the system now war with each other. The stomach calls upon the legs to go with it in quest of food; the legs, from very weakness, refuse. The sixth day brings with it increased suffering, although the pangs of hunger are lost in an overpowering languor and sickness. The head becomes giddy—the ghosts of well-remembered dinners pass in hideous procession through the mind. The seventh day comes, bringing increased lassitude and farther prostration of strength. The arms hang listlessly, the legs drag heavily. The desire for food is still left, to a degree, but it must be brought, not sought. The miserable remnant of life which still hangs to the sufferer is a burden almost too grievous to be borne; yet his inherent love of existence induces a desire still to preserve it, if it can be saved without a tax upon bodily exertion. The mind wanders. At one moment, he thinks his weary limbs cannot sustain him a mile—the next, he is endowed with unnatural strength, and, if there be a certainty of relief before him, dashes bravely and strongly onward, wondering whence proceeds this new and sudden impulse.—Kendal's Narrative of the Texan Santa Fé Expedition.

LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE FARMING IN IRELAND AND RENTS IN 1835.—Sir William Brereton, who travelled between Carrickfergus and Belfast in July, 1835, says in his journal:—"Many Lancashire and Cheshire men are here planted; with some of them I conversed. They sit upon a rackrent, and pay 5s. or 6s. an acre for good ploughing land, which now (July 6) is clothed with excellent corn. From Belfast to Linsley Garven is about seven miles, and is a paradise in comparison of any part of Scotland." Three days afterwards he came from Tredaugh to Swords, near Dublin (a distance of fourteen miles), through "a most pleasant country, the greatest part corn upon the very sea-coast, almost Warralike (the Wirral Hundred of Cheshire, between the Dee and Mersey), and very good and well-sown corn; the barley now (July 9) beginning to turn, and will be ripe before the eye." "Here I saw very fair large English kine, I inquired the price, about £2, £3 10s., or £3. These worth in England double the price. Land here sold for about twenty years' purchase; set, some for 5s. or 6s. an acre, and meadowing for £2 an acre; some for £1. Some land about Dublin is set for £2, £3, and £4 an acre." Near Hacket's-town (twenty-seven miles from Dublin), in a barren, dry soil, he finds "some land set by Mr. Watson (a Lancashire man) at 2s. and some at 3s. 4d. an acre, and for thirty years. Here is good butter made as in England, and they say good cheese, but I tasted none." Mr. Watson "paid for the purchase of this lease about £500 fine, and he pays also £100 rent. He hath already improved it unto more worth than £400 per annum, and hath much prejudiced his plantation, by insisting upon overhard conditions and demands." Sir Morgan Cavanagh "demands £1800 per annum, and £1000 rent, for twenty town lands (in Carlow), and, as he saith, it is about 12,000 or 13,000 acres; but I cannot conceive it less than 20,000 acres, much hereof mountain wood, and the rest but poor land, all overgrown with fern and bracken, and not to be improved but with great charge and trouble." By another part of this curious journal, it appears that it was then the custom in Wexford county, and perhaps in other parts of Ireland, for the tenants to sow their landlord's grounds, allowing him the third sheaf, and taking two sheaves for their pains. For a farm of from 200 or 300 acres near Wexford, the tenant (Mr. Hardy, an Englishman) paid about £16 a year rent. It would keep twenty or thirty milch kine, yield sufficient corn for a small family, with abundance of rabbits, fish, and fowl. Mr. Hardy demanded for his thirteen years' interest £55, and the landlord demanded £100 fine for a lease of eighty years in reversion, after the determination of the thirteen years. £20 were offered for a lease of eighty years; but the landlord said he would not accept £40, and an augmentation of the rent of £4 per annum.—Mr. Robert Cooke, an Englishman, tenant on a farm near Waterford, belonging to an uncle of the Earl of Ormonde, paid £100 fine, and £120 yearly rent (his term about twenty years), for 1200 to 1400 English acres, all good land; but a great part marsh, lying along the river, in common (not enclosed), which, if divided and enclosed, would yield more than the rent of the whole. In this neighbourhood, too, the tenants ploughed the ground, and allowed the landlord a third part of the produce. "This is so slothfully and improvidently ordered, as the ground is much impaired, and yields much less than if well husbanded."

PRICES IN BRISTOL IN 1635.—Rape cakes made in Bristol were sold into Holland at 2d. per dozen, a ship coming purposely to fetch them away. The rape oil was used in making soap, to some extent, in Bristol. A firkin of old soap cost 16s.; sack, 1s. a quart; claret, 6d. A horse-load of goods from Bristol to Shrewsbury paid 2s. 6d. carriage; from Shrewsbury to Chester, 6s.

LIVERPOOL IN 1780.—"The 'good old town' is thus described as it appeared 63 years ago, to the late Mr. Samuel Curwen, in his journal under date of June 12:—"Entered the city of Liverpool, so celebrated for its commercial character; houses by a great majority in middling and lower style, few rising above that mark; streets long, narrow, crooked, and dirty in an eminent degree. During our short abode here, we scarcely saw a well-dressed person, nor half-a-dozen gentlemen's carriages; few of the shops appear so well as in other great towns; dress and looks more like the inhabitants of Wapping, Shadwell, and Rotherhithe, than in the neighbourhood of the Exchange, or any part of London above the Tower. The whole complexion nautical, and so infinitely below all our expectations, that nought but the thoughts of the few hours we had to pass here rendered it tolerable. The docks, however, are stupendously grand; the inner one, called Town Dock, lying in the centre of it, and filled with vessels exhibiting a forest of masts; besides this, are three very large ones lying in front of the city, communicating with each other by flood-gates, intermixed with dry ones for repairing. The lower or new one has a fine wide quay on its outer side, an agreeable walk being lined with trees on either hand; below this, on the river, is now building, nearly finished, a circular battery with embrasures for thirty cannon. Parade and barracks are in hand, and, when completed, will afford a charming walk and prospect, if allowed to the inhabitants. Liverpool, June 12.—Taking a circuitous ramble through this, to us, disgusting place, returned to inn, paid our bill, and entered the carriage we came in."—Samuel Curwen's Journal.

MR. VILLIERS'S MOTION.—The memorial to the members for Macclesfield, requesting them to support Mr. Villiers in his approaching motion for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, has received the signatures of a majority of the electors on the register. On Friday week, a deputation, consisting of Messrs. Howe and Rathbone, waited on Thomas Grimditch, Esq., and presented to him the memorial, when he declared, in the most decided terms, his intention to vote against the motion. On the same day, the deputation presented the memorial to John Brocklehurst, Esq., when he entered into conversation with them on the subject at considerable length. At the close of the interview, Mr. Brocklehurst signified to them his intention to give his answer in writing, which has since been received.—Macclesfield Chronicle. [The letter is chiefly of an apologetic character, but leaves the question of his vote over for further consideration.]

BREAD SKEINION AT NAPLES.—I was told that, during my stay at Naples, there had been an emute of the people, on account of the dearth and high price of bread. The populace stopped the king's carriage in the street, informing him of the high price of bread; showed him the size of the loaves in common use; also stated to him what the usual prices were, and entreated of him to have compassion on their sufferings. He was glad to escape out of their hands by promising immediate attention to their demand; and he kept his word. His "corn law" was instantly repealed, and corn was allowed to enter his dominions free of duty: the price of bread was consequently lowered, and he gained on the affections of his people. But, if this occurred during my stay at Naples, it was unknown to me, and apparently unheard of by any one whom I met with in society; for I was informed of the occurrence only after I had reached Leghorn on my return northward, and my informant was an Englishman, long resident in Naples, and in confidential communication with many influential persons of that city. It is probable, however, that, for the reasons already stated, you may already know all this better than I do; but the mere mention of the general ignorance of the occurrence in Naples is instructive.—Letter in the Scotsman.

THE PRESTON MANUFACTURERS AND SPINNERS' SUBSCRIPTIONS TO THE LEAGUE AND ANTI-LEAGUE. —Some time ago a statement was paraded in the London papers, and also in a pamphlet sold in Preston, entitled "A Short Letter to Mr. Richard Cookson," &c., in which the spinners and manufacturers of this town were divided into "Leaguers" and "Anti-Leaguers;" and to show the weakness of the League party, it was urged that only six individuals or firms had subscribed to the Great Fund. We announced at the time that these six (though the real number was more) had given to the amount of £530, and challenged the party to produce the same sum from the manufacturers and spinners of Preston in favour of the Protection Society. We promised to wait awhile until the amount was announced. Nothing beyond £25, we believe, has yet been published from this quarter; and as we trust the writer will not shrink from pursuing the comparison, if there be other sums to be added, he will give them to the public. The writer himself who made this money test of the popularity of the two Leagues, is now in a condition to give us the sum total. So soon as we get possession of particulars, according to our promise, they shall be laid before the public. We will wait a little longer, and, if he fail to come forward, we will ourselves give the comparison according to our best information.—Preston Guardian.

THE MONOPOLIST DEMONSTRATIONS.—On Thursday evening Mr. Fyles, a plasterer, attended a meeting of Mr. Brown's friends in Ormskirk. For so doing his landlord threatened to disown him for rent due to the amount of £5, and was as good, or as bad, as his word, although the property was indebted to Fyles £10 for work done. On the following Monday Mr. Fyles voted for Mr. Brown. On Tuesday he went to finish some work for a tradesman in the town and was told by his employer, without any reason assigned, that there was no further occasion for his services, other parties having been engaged. On the following morning Fyles sent his apprentice, as usual, to work for a monopolist at Lydiate; but the lad was summarily dismissed, with an insolent message to his master, to the effect that the great man would have "none of his (Fyles') humbugging electioneering!"—Here is another instance.—A respectable tradesman being canvassed by one of the Tory leaders of Ormskirk, said he had not promised his vote, but certainly would not give it to the canvasser's party. "Oh very well," was the reply; "it will be a bad job for you, as you will lose all your trade." Now, if there be any just and proper feeling in Ormskirk, and we know that there is a great deal, these two honest and independent men will be no sufferers for their manly conduct, but will have abundant reason to be thankful that these petty despicable tyrants dared to threaten and persecute them for acting up to their own conscientious opinions.—Liverpool Mercury.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE SECRETARY OF THE ANTI-SLAVERY COMMITTEE.

Leominster, 6th of 5th mo., 1844.

RESPECTED FRIEND,—I shall feel obliged by thy striking my name out of the list of subscribers to the Anti-Slavery Society. Before entering into my reasons—which I hope to compress into a very small compass—for the step which I am taking, I wish to say that I am one of the minority of seven who held up their hands against monopoly at Exeter Hall on the 3rd instant; and further to observe, that it is not because I think my small subscription of much importance to the society that I now withdraw from it, but because I am most desirous to manifest my deep sense of the value of a principle involving, as I apprehend, most important consequences.

The view, then, which has been primarily operative with me in the step which I am taking is, I confess, this,—that if in ordinary matters of business we are forbidden to employ means which will not bear a scrutiny in point of principle, a fortiori, we are precluded by the moral law from the use of such means for the attainment of objects of a moral and religious character. The oppressive and insidious nature of all fiscal regulations, which are intended by means of discriminating duties to benefit one class at the expense of the rest of society, may very readily be proved: because such regulations fall with oppressive weight upon those least able to bear the consequences; because they impose a burden upon the community, who are the victims of them, at least threefold in amount when compared with the sum they serve to put into the coffers of the tax-receivers (the monopolists); because they run counter to the evident designs of a benevolent Providence, in promoting reciprocal intercourse between men of every nation and every degree of civilization, thus diffusing on either hand the arts of peace, and turning the knowledge, the sciences, and the productive energies of one country to the common benefit of all; because they embody a system of heartless robbery on those least able to protect themselves; and because the spirit of monopoly is diffusive, since it has a decided tendency to lend a helping hand, giving permanence and force to other monopolies partaking of a similar character. It is, therefore, evident that the tendency of the measure supported by the Anti-Slavery Society is to foster and encourage monopoly wherever it exists. With, I venture to assert, a disposition to judge candidly of the motives of my friends, I cannot escape the conclusion that they are willing for once to act upon the maxim, "that the end sanctifies the means." All this, it is probable, will be met by sneers at "political economy," at "ultra views," and at "abstract principles." Are we, then, to repudiate all the enlightenment of the age, bearing the unpalatable name of "political economy," fraught as that science is with deductions not merely speculative, but precisely adapted to the present circumstances of this country? How, indeed, are our increased and increasing population to be fed, except by throwing open the markets of the world? The answer may be, for aught that I know, "It is not our business. It were better that miseries should die in our streets, and that in an increasing ratio, than that a measure should pass, whatever its bearing upon a free supply of all food at home, rather than that the moral evils of slavery should continue to exist in different countries." I must, on the other hand, be permitted to believe that the adoption of a more liberal course of commercial policy would, in its grand results, be found to promote and extend the interests at once of justice and humanity.

Whilst on this subject, I cannot refrain from observing on the marked analogy between the reasons alleged by your committee for monopoly, in one shape, professedly intended to benefit the slave, and those who argue for the corn monopoly as conducive to the interests of farm-labourers; those who support both views may some of them be sincere, but both, as I conceive, are equally mistaken. Nothing grieved me more in the recent meeting than to see a professed minister of the Gospel enacting the part, if I am correctly informed, of a paid advocate. I will not attempt to enter into those reasonings from consequences indulged in by himself and others. I venture, however, to tell him that all we have to do is to ascertain the correctness of our principles, and then we are assuredly safe as to the results; and I conclude by two quotations from a volume—the authority of which he will not deny—which, to my mind at least, have an intimate bearing on the question, viz:—

"I hate robbery for a burnt offering."
"A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit."

I am respectfully, thy friend,
JOHN SOUTHALL.

The following letter was read by Mr. Cobden at a recent meeting at Westbury—

"High-street, Warminster, May 3, 1844.
"SIR,—I take the liberty of handing you, on the other side, an extract from a letter received by me from a Conservative friend settled in America, bearing somewhat upon the operation of the Coin Laws in connexion with the woollen manufacture.

Yours most respectfully,

EXTRACT.

"Allegan, Allegan County, State of Michigan.
"I once doubted the statements made in the Anti-Broad-Tax Circular, respecting the great want of our manufactures, to make the inhabitants more comfortable; but it really is so, and they are compelled to pay the most enormous prices for those articles of clothing which they can get. A good superfine coat is worth a good cow, and cannot be had except it be an extra beast. Only think of an English farmer taking a cow worth £15, and giving her to a tailor for a coat; yet such is the case, and the same may be said of all the other manufactures of England; and if England does not soon open her ports for Free Trade, she will not have the chance for the great object of the people here seems to be to make themselves independent of her; they are tired of her arbitrary treatment."

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.
SIR,—I shall feel obliged if you can inform me, through the LEAGUE paper, whether persons owning copyhold property have the right of voting for county members of Parliament; or if they are in any way enfranchised; and what is the requisite amount of qualification?

Providing they are enfranchised, I also wish to know, whether if two persons are admitted to an estate, each in his own right, both would have a vote? And if so, I also wish to know whether, in case of death or alienation of one of the above, and that a moiety be taken up in three persons' names—two as executors, and one as trustee—each of them would have a vote? And, if so, whether male and female alike possess votes in such a case?

Your answer in next paper will oblige a subscriber and Free-Trader.
H. S. T.

June 3, 1844.

[Copyhold property, worth £10 yearly, will confer a county vote; but (if situated within a borough) only where it is of such a nature that it would not qualify the holder for a borough vote, such as two or more houses of less rent than £10 each, but of more rent than £10 altogether; or land without buildings worth £10 yearly.

Joint copyholders of one copyhold would, under the same qualifications as above stated, be entitled to vote, provided the joint copyhold were of such value as would yield £10 per annum to each copyholder. The trustee would have no vote; but the two heirs (in possession) of the two thirds of the moiety would have a vote, if their shares were worth £10 per annum each.

We are sorry to think that any elector should be so ignorant of the most important interests of British citizens as, at this time of day, not to know that females have no votes for members of Parliament.]

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—With pleasure I have enclosed a Post-office order for £1, in behalf of Charles Snowdon, who was discharged from his employment for having endeavoured to serve his country by voting conscientiously at the late election for Exeter. This small collection is from a few friends of Free Trade at Ripley and Cobham, and I hope the example now and already given will be followed by those who may have a trifle to spare. I have chosen your valuable paper as the medium by which to testify my esteem for Mr. Charles Snowdon's integrity; we wish, at the same time, to express our sincere thanks to Mr. J. H. Hutchinson, who has proved himself to be a true friend to the oppressed and an enemy to the oppressor.

Sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS COLBORN.

N.B. We expect a remittance from the friends of Free Trade at Woking, in favour of Charles Snowdon. Ripley, June 13, 1844.

AGRICULTURE.

INCENDIARISM IN SUFFOLK.

We have, for some time past, watched with deep and painful interest the lamentable reports which every day brings of fresh acts of incendiarism in the county of Suffolk; and in abstaining from comment upon the prevalence of that crime, we have been in some degree influenced by the feeling that the land-owners and occupiers of that county were undergoing a fearful retribution for the erroneous legislation by which, for their own selfish purposes, those classes had depressed the condition of the agricultural labourers. Moreover, we desired further information as to the peculiar state of the peasantry, and the agriculture of that district, than was obtainable through the ordinary channels, before bringing the subject under the notice of our readers in connexion with the question of Free Trade. The time for such hesitation has now passed, and it becomes a duty to aid in the investigation which this violent local symptom of a deep-seated national disease must undergo. The want of precise local information is, to some extent, in the course of being supplied, through the medium of the Times newspaper, the proprietors of which, with a spirit worthy of the mighty journal they conduct, have sent a correspondent into Suffolk to inquire and report as to the state of the rural labourers of that county. From the letters published, the reporter, it is evident, is executing his mission with great spirit and intelligence, and he has already gone far to show that this prevalent crime is to be traced to the want of employment, and the irregular employment of the agricultural labourers.

In his first letter the Times correspondent said, that, "Taking the map, the district where the fires have been most frequent lies from Braintree, in Essex, extending in a broad line northward, and across the western parts of Suffolk bordering on Cambridge, taking in the line of Thaxted, Haldstead, Sudbury, Hadleigh, &c., to Stowmarket and Mendlesham; and thence in a north-westerly direction to Mildenhall in Suffolk, and then directly northward through Norfolk." Now, the district here indicated is locally known as "High Suffolk," and consists generally of heavy land, not in the highest state of cultivation, and which a gentleman well acquainted with the county described to us as "a neglected district." Hereafter we shall probably be able to trace the low state of the peasantry of this tract to the condition of its agriculture, and to show how directly that condition has been caused by the Corn Laws and the system they uphold. For the present we will deal with the facts relative to the state of the agricultural labourers in Suffolk which the Times correspondent has disclosed. And first we must notice that all the "various surmises as to the cause of these fires," which have been made from ignorance and prejudice, are examined and rejected as inconsistent with the evidence obtained on the spot, and the real cause is shown to be the sufferings of the peasantry from insufficient employment.

It appears that wages, in the best districts, in the eastern part of the county where there have been few fires, are sufficiently low, 9s. and 10s. a week, with the power of earning from £3 to £5 during the year by extra work at turnip hoeing, haymaking, and harvest, with perhaps 2s. a week earned by his wife, being all that the best paid Suffolk farm-labourers can hope for; while in the western district not only are wages still lower, but the employment of the labourer is irregular and uncertain. In the first district, where the humble wages we have mentioned were constantly earned, the reporter, after a minute detail of the incomes and expenditures of several of the best paid labourers with whom he communicated, showing that all, and more than all, their ordinary receipts are required to be expended in food, thus refers to their condition:—"But where are the clothes and the shoes, or any little additional comforts to come from, leaving alone animal food, or, as they call it here, a 'crumb of pork,' and leaving entirely out of the calculation the chance of illness or being out of work? Clearly shoes and clothes must come from stinting themselves of the necessary quantity of food; and if they indulge in the luxury of pork, it must be at the expense of a larger quantity of bread. Now, this is where the people are said to be 'well off,' and these are examples of peasants in regular employment, and the best I could find. These, with much pinching and contrivance, with steady labour from day to day, and never spending a farthing wastefully, manage to live. With this lot, are they discontented? QUITE THE REVERSE. I found them, in every case, cheerful, and naturally intelligent and communicative. Their little cottages are perfect patterns of cleanliness."

Now, here we have distinct evidence that even very low wages, the command of no more than the bare necessities of life, and the necessity for a life of rigid and painful frugality on the part of the rural labourer, are not inconsistent with cheerfulness and content. Again, the correspondent refers to instances in which employment is less constant, "where, though the cottagers are somewhat stinted, they have yet bread to eat and clean comfortable cottages," and of them, also, he says, "Well, and they do not grumble; on the contrary, when they can get these blessings in return for hard daily toil, they are thankful and content." In the eastern district, where though there is "much distress" occasionally, but where the labourers can find some employment in the towns, there have been few fires. On the other hand, on the western side of the county, where fires have been prevalent: here we find that "many give nominally 9s. a week wages, and if there is a rainy day, or half a rainy day, the men are sent home from work, and many of the farmers are blind enough to their own eventual interests to deduct some miserable 4d. for a quarter of a day's work, that a man has not been allowed to work because it rained, or because the farmer could not find a job for him. The nominal 9s. a week is thus often reduced to 6s. or 7s., and very often the men are kept out of work for two or three weeks. What can the poor fellows fall back on? They will starve to the last pinch rather than enter the union-house, and they must live whether it rain or be fine."

In this state of things is it surprising that such conversations as the following occur between the clergyman and his parishioners? The reporter says:—"The clergyman of the next village told me—'The labourers' wives, when I call at their cottages, tell me, 'My husband has been out of work three days or two days this week, and we and the children are almost starved; it's hard to bear, God knows, and it puts bad thoughts into my husband's head.' This clergyman told me he had heard these fearful words—'It puts bad thoughts into my husband's head,' fifty times."

All this is entirely consistent with our own observations amongst the agricultural population in various parts of the country. It is not mere poverty, and comparatively low wages, which induces discontent and crime amongst them, provided employment be constant; it is the occasional and compelled idleness—bringing positive destitution and privation—which chafes the temper and demoralizes the minds of the peasant; and we have again and again shown that one of the direct and inevitable consequences of the Corn Laws is to render the employment of common farm-labourers uncertain and irregular. When prices fall below the rates promised by the Corn Laws, and on which landlords and farmers found their calculations, the rent becomes excessive, and, encroaching upon the funds properly applicable to the employment of labourers, transfers unjustly into the landlord's pocket the money of which the labourers have been deprived.

There are many other points touched upon in this correspondence to which we must hereafter refer, but at present our limits will not permit us to notice more than one case, which forcibly illustrates how injuriously the high prices sought to be maintained by the monopolists affect the condition of the agricultural labourers.

It appears that Mr. Colchester, of Ipswich (an auctioneer and land-agent there), farms 150 acres of land in Woodbridge parish. "Having other sources of income, his labourers are kindly and liberally treated. He pursues what is termed the old Suffolk plan, of allowing his labourers to purchase their corn of him at a fixed rate, whatever its price may be in the market; and they now purchase their corn at 6s. a bushel, the market price being 8s. He also purchases for them good cheese by the cwt., which his foreman lets them have as they want it at the cost price; they thus get a better cheese, and at about 1d. to 2d. per lb. cheaper than they can buy it at the small retail shops." Now, let us see what is the condition of one of these favoured labourers, and then the reader will judge how much those, whose masters have not the means of making them such extra allowances, must suffer from high prices.

"William Walton, has a wife and five children, wages 9s. a week. Wife works three days a week in the fields at hoeing and weeding, and earns 7d. a day; children earn nothing.

Leaving 19s. 2d. balance for the eight weeks, or about 2s. 4d. per week for what the peasantry term "shop goods," i. e., tea, sugar, butter, a candle, soap and soda for washing, salt, milk, and other little matters, which cost money, and cannot well be done without. His master allows him to live rent-free in his cottage; and he therefore has not that expense to provide for. During harvest he earns about £3 additional, which is the only fund wherewith he has to buy shoes and clothes for a family of seven. This statement will show that this man, who works hard every day the year round, his employment and pay being constant, CANNOT HAVE ONE PENNY TO SPARE.

Now, though this man has not "one penny to spare," he yet lives in great comfort as compared with the vast majority of the peasantry; and how is this? Why, simply because his master has suspended the Corn Law in his favour by selling him corn, &c., below the market price.

Look at the expenditure of a rural labourer; observe what a large proportion of his income goes for food, especially for bread, and let any one dare to say that high prices benefit the labourer. Remember that at present his wages never rise beyond 9s. or 10s. a week, though they frequently fall below that amount; but, if the trade in grain were free, so much activity and employment would be excited in agricultural districts that, besides getting his food somewhat lower in price, the wages of the farming labourer would tend upwards, but, above all, his employment would be constant.

AGRICULTURAL INSANITY—A LUCID INTERVAL.

Having lately had occasion to look over many of the reports of agricultural meetings which took place throughout the country during the four final months of last year, we were struck with the fact, that amongst those who then so rationally and usefully told the farmers that the days of protection, high prices, and artificial scarcity had passed away, and that, thenceforth, good husbandry with its sequence abundant produce, must be the object of every cultivator, were many who subsequently became the most furious ranters at protection societies. To men of reflection the absurdities uttered at these meetings by persons of station and education, seemed quite irreconcilable with anything but the temporary insanity of the utterers; and the sudden ebullition of nonsense which occurred just before the meeting of Parliament appeared to many altogether unaccountable. When to this we add the circumstance that the very same individuals, who in October and November warned the tenant-farmers against reliance on protection, and urged them to look instead to improved culture, in February and March following, became the frantic asserters of the necessity of "protection to agriculture," the climax of mental confusion seems to have been attained. But with the help of a pretty accurate knowledge of the character of English landlords and tenants we believe we can explain much of this seeming inconsistency. It is true that the protection meetings exhibited the landowners of the country apparently under the influence of nonsense run mad; but it is no less certain that there was a purpose, and a sinister one, in their madness.

During last summer it became obvious that the influential members of the Government were preparing the minds of their adherents for the further adoption, in practice, of Free-Trade principles, and the great majority of landowners seeing plainly enough that with Free Trade and bad farming—bad farming, the direct consequence of the existing system of restriction—rents would probably fall, began, most of them with about as much real knowledge of the subject as parrots, to lecture their tenants on draining, subsoiling, manuring, and improved stock-breeding. Each lordly or worshipful owner of acres began to imagine that the possession of land conferred upon him the agricultural knowledge of a SPENCER, a DUCKE, a COKE, or a PUSEY. Many of them, no doubt, thought that, if hereditary power to legislate had descended to them with their estates, why should not the knowledge of husbandry have likewise been cast upon them by descent or settlement. With the courage of PHAETON, therefore, they assumed the office of lecturers on improved husbandry; but like Phaeton, also, they discovered that the tenant-farmers, who, in the hands of the masters of the art, appeared such docile and manageable disciples, became suddenly restive and unmanageable. Not an association occurred in which some tenant-farmer did not give vent to the thoughts which were filling the minds of all; and, admitting that all the proposed improvements were necessary and practicable, said, "but, to effect them, we, the tenant-farmers, must be protected and unshackled; we must have leases and fair covenants; we must have proper buildings, and allowances of materials; we must be protected from game, hedge-row-timber, the interference of stewards and political thralldom, and then we can farm highly and pay good rents." Such, in substance, was the reply everywhere made to the landowners' lectures on improvement; and the political squires, the mortgaged interest the Richmonds and the Buckinghams, and the smaller fry of monopolists began to think the craft was in danger. Hence a diversion became desirable. Farmers had talked uncommonly like Free-Traders, and a grand move, perhaps we should rather say a great splutter, was devised to turn the attention of tenant-farmers from too curious an examination of their real grievances, and their semi-feudal vassalage. Hence the "Protection Societies," the "Central Protection Committee," the back-parlour sittings at the Duke of Richmond's, the "room in Bond-street," and Mr. Cayley's mendacious pamphlet. To a certain extent the diversion succeeded, for tenant-farmers have been cajoled or compelled into listening to, if not into talking, trash absolutely maniacal. But the paroxysm was too violent to last, and we already see signs of a lucid interval at the least, if not of actual recovery. That the Treasury-board sedative which Sir Robert Peel has administered to the leading patient, the Duke of Richmond, will rapidly promote the cure we have no doubt, and probably the agriculturists will come out of these delusions wiser and soberer men.

As evidence of the return of the squire to a state of sanity we shall refer to a speech lately made by the chairman of the Devon Agricultural Society, Sir John Kennaway, at Exeter, in the presence of Lord Courtenay, M.P., and a host of those who have lately figured as "protectionists." Sir John said:—

"It seems to me that the business of agriculture may be considered as carried on by a kind of joint-stock or trading company, embracing not one individual, or one class of individuals only, but many individuals and many classes. We find amongst those who are engaged in it men who stand at each extreme in the scale of society, as well as those who occupy a middle position in that scale. We have the landlord—the tenant—and the agricultural labourer—and these three together constitute the firm by which the business of agriculture is and must be carried on. It is for each and all of us, in our respective situations, to consider whether we have brought in our proper shares—whether we have contributed our fair proportions—to the capital of the firm; and this we are bound to do, whether we are landlords or tenants, or whether we are occupying the humblest station of those who will be before us presently, and whose occupations, though of a humbler and more laborious kind, are not less creditable to themselves, or less beneficial to the community at large. To whatever class we may belong, we are equally bound to contribute our share to the capital, and to bear our proper parts in promoting the prosperity of the firm. I will first speak of him whom we may call the leading partner in the concern—I mean the landlord. It is his business to furnish the land, but that is not all his business. He is bound to furnish it in such a manner, in such condition, and upon such terms, and to maintain such a relation to those below him, as may enable them to perform their parts well—and encourage them to look up to him with affection and respect. In endeavouring to discharge this duty the first thing which he has to look to is the interest which the tenant shall have in the land which he is about to occupy, and in the cultivation of which he is about to embark his capital."

Now, this is very like the healthful tone of landlords' speeches before what we will call their late illness—some designate it the Richmond, others the salmon, others again the Treasury-board fever;—but the speakers at that time having gone so far as Sir J. Kennaway goes in the above extract, usually closed with some "lame and impotent conclusion" about "mutual-confidence" tenures, and so forth. Now, however, the treatment lately received has enabled the worshipful monopolists to think about digesting that first condition necessary to improved agriculture—a lease. Hear, for example, Sir John Kennaway:—

"We have seen a good deal of discussion lately on the subject of leases: I will not enter at length upon that subject here, but I will state to you briefly the conviction to which I have myself arrived. I have arrived at that conviction by endavouring to place myself as far as possible in the situation of another, and by asking myself what I should like, and what I should look for, were I really placed in such a situation. I cannot help thinking, then, that were I a tenant farmer, I should like to have something like a permanent interest in the land which I was about to cultivate, and on which I was about to expend my industry and my capital."

And then he sweetened the dose with some twaddle about "families which have sustained towards each other for many generations the relations of landlord and tenant," and "the beautiful feeling [sometimes] existing without any lease or agreement."

"But," he adds, "it is impossible that, in a mixed state of society, such things can always exist; cases must frequently occur in which the changes produced by death, by intermarriage, or by many other circumstances, may alter materially the relative positions of the parties; and I can conceive a

This is just and sensible, for it is no less reasonable that a landlord should look to the responsibility and intelligence of his tenant than that the tenant should take care to have a secure tenure. The tenant has likewise a right to require all proper permanent improvements to be done by his landlord, as Mr John admits, saying:—

"Having this, the tenant naturally looks to his landlord for encouragement during his occupation. He looks to him especially for encouragement in the way of improvement, and particularly in effecting improvement of such a permanent character as would have a beneficial effect, beyond the duration of what we usually call a long lease. In all the various relations in which they stand to each other, as neighbours, as tenants in which they stand to each other, as neighbours, as tenants, the tenant has a right to look for similar encouragement and support; and I trust and believe that the landlord of Devon will not be the last to give it. Returning again to the comparison with which we set out, we now come to inquire what is the duty of the second partner in this trading firm to which I have alluded—namely, the tenant. The landlord, according to the view I have stated, having provided the land, and secured to the occupier a fair interest in it, we look to the latter to supply the requisite capital and skill. Both these things are essentially necessary to the due cultivation of the land and the proper management of a farm."

There can be no greater misfortune to a farmer than to undertake a farm without sufficient capital, and anything tending to raise the standard of cultivation which will increase the amount of capital required on a given number of acres will confer a great benefit on tenant-farmers as a class. Sir John then thus delicately hints at deficiencies on the part of tenants:—

"I see around me so many gentlemen occupying the position of tenant-farmers, who fulfil in their respective neighbourhoods all the duties which devolve upon them, that I am barely almost ashamed to speak of those duties in their presence. At the same time I must be allowed to say that, although there are many, in various parts of the county, equally respectable, and equally able with themselves, it is equally a question that there are many among the renting far-beyond question that there are many among the renting farmers of Devonshire who do not bring in, and who have not the means of bringing, those things which I hold to be so essential—capital and skill."

This is but a mild way of telling the truth, that the agriculture of Devonshire is very inferior; and what is the remedy? Not "protection," and such like Richmond-Baker-Buckingham quakeries, but

"Skill in this, as in any other business, is not to be attained in a day—it is to be attained by looking from day to day in the field on which a man has been born and to which he has been accustomed all his life. A man cannot become a farmer in that way. He must look a great deal further than that. I remember hearing an observation made many years ago, in which, though I do not entirely concur in it, there is a great deal of sound truth. It was to this effect—that when a man commenced farmer he should be always looking over his neighbour's hedges. I repeat, that I think there is a good deal of sound truth in that observation; for it is much better to gain a experience at the expense of another than at one's own. (A voice—Cut down the hedges.) Yes, that certainly is one way; of looking over them, and in many cases it is a very good way; but in the present day the facilities for looking over the hedges of one's neighbour have been very greatly increased. The farmer has no excuse if he fails to avail himself of the opportunities which the improved state of agriculture, the improved means of travelling, and the improved means of acquiring information by reading, afford to all those who are ready to take advantage of them. The farmer has now the opportunity of going, with little loss of time, from one part of the country to another; he has the opportunity, if he chooses, to stay at home, of informing himself by reading of the results of the experience of others; and if, with these opportunities, he chooses to confine himself to such matters only as are immediately under his own eyes, he must of necessity fall behind in the race."

What a volume is comprised in that exclamation—"Cut down the hedges," which, with their timber-landlords' timber—are peculiarly majestic in Devonshire from the smallness of the fields!

And in the following story it is difficult to believe that John did not intend a sly hit at the "protection" speeches of his brother squires:—

"A gentleman told me a very few days ago, that he had been applied to the evening before, by a stage coachman, who wished to be informed whether the statement which had been made to him were true, that the distance between the earth and the moon could be measured, and had been measured in fact. He answered the inquiry, by assuring him that it was, no doubt, perfectly true—that the science of astronomy had so far advanced—and that astronomical instruments had been brought to so great a degree of perfection, that the distance to the moon had been ascertained with very considerable accuracy. "Sir," replied the man, "I will never believe it until I can drive to it with my own stage coach." (Laughter.)

This is a man after the "Central Protection Society's" own heart; sure y they will exert their influence at the TREASURY in his favour to secure him a place when the railways which are now penetrating into the west shall have displaced him from his coach-box. Farmers, however, must get rid of prejudices.

"If we meet with such prejudices among those who are engaged in agriculture, we must bid farewell to improvement; but I am quite sure they will not be indulged in by those who exercise that good sense, and that common intelligence, which are the peculiar characteristics of Englishmen, and of which it is the privilege of the county of Devon to possess so large a stock. I do not hesitate to say to the farmers of this country, that they must be alive and looking about them. They have lost their monopoly, which is less they move forward with the times they must give up." (Hear, hear.)

And which, he might have added, if they do more forward they cannot want. But the backwardness of the farmers is more the fault of the landowners than of the tenants, for though a tenant may have all the knowledge required in the next passage, it will avail but little if he is not made completely independent by a rational lease—

“I am not going so far as to say that any knowledge of Greek, or even of Latin, is necessary to make a good farmer, but I will be bold to say that some learning is absolutely indispensable to that end. I think it is necessary, at all events, that he should know when he takes into his hand the materials with which he is to work, what is their nature and composition. It is necessary that he should be able to examine, to analyze, and to compare, and by that means to ascertain of what different materials the soil itself, upon his knowledge of which the success of all his operations must depend, is composed; and it is necessary also that he should be able to go further than this. To drive the plough, so to speak, deeper still, and not only to know well the surface of the land, but to make himself acquainted with the nature and structure of that which lies beneath. He should know, too, something of geology, at least he should know so much of it, that, when he sets himself to drain his land, he may not throw his money away, but may be able to do it upon scientific principles, and so at half the cost. (Hear, hear.) You may think, perhaps, that I am attempting to fix a very high standard of skill and qualification for a person in the condition of a renting farmer. I do not pretend to suppose that we shall arrive at that standard all at once, but I do expect that the farmers should approximate to it every year more and more, and I am quite sure that if they do not do it they will find by-and-by, as the numbers of those who are educated for the learned professions increase, and as those professions themselves become over-crowded, men will be found, among their increasing numbers, possessing all the knowledge, all the skill, and all the information to which I have alluded who will bring that knowledge and skill and information to bear, profitably for that knowledge and skill and business of agriculture. I say that, themselves, on the practical business of agriculture. I say that, if the tenant-farmers of this country do not, as I hope and trust they will, exert themselves to acquire the skill which every man in that condition ought to possess, they will find themselves eventually thrust aside by a different class of men — by men who now find employment for their talents and energies in the liberal or learned professions. I need not, I am sure, in such a meeting as this, attempt to enlarge upon the importance of the other item to which I have alluded, as prominent to the tenant to supply, namely, capital."

There is much truth in the above passage, but every trace of feudality and degrading dependence on landlords and stewards, to which landowners yet so pertinaciously cling, must be abandoned before men of education as well as capital will, to any great extent, embark in agriculture as a profession. He then referred to the necessity of regarding the welfare of the labourers, saying:—

"On them we are dependent, in a very great degree, for the success of all our exertions, and it is our interest, as it is our duty, to do what we can to add to their comfort and an increasing profitability, and to make them feel a deeper and an increasing interest in the soil which is cultivated by their hands. I can easily conceive a case in which an occupier of land—whether himself the owner or the tenant of another, by care and kindness—considerate treatment at all times—by a diligent attention to the habits of his labourers—by something too of severity and strictness in enforcing attention to their duties—by manifesting an interest in all their concerns, may inspire them with such a desire for the success of their employer, and the credit of the farm on which he lives, that the labour of one such person shall be worth that of two others; I am sure that such care and attention bestowed upon the labourer would more than repay itself—and I have no doubt that the man who acted upon such principles would stand a much better chance of winning prizes at an agricultural show, and of beating his neighbour in the field and in the market, than one who treated his labourers as mere implements and tools to work with, as articles which cost a certain amount of money, and which were to do a certain quantity of work for it." (Cheers.)

It seems the quality of the stock exhibited improved, for Sir John said:—

"If the attendance had not been so numerous, or the exhibition so large as on former occasions, it was partly owing to the fact that they had established a higher standard of excellence, so that a man intending to exhibit thought twice about sending an animal to the yard, where previously he only thought once."

And he concluded with this reference to fences:—
 "There was no doubt the land was much more subdivided in this county than in many others, and that the number and nature of the fences tended to prevent many desirable improvements, to occupy room that might be more usefully employed, and to impede many of the operations of agriculture. He was satisfied that, in a great number of cases, the landlords would greatly benefit by removing them."

This speech, which was listened to with attention, and cheered throughout, indicates not merely recovery from the "protection" mania, but considerable progress from the point to which landlords had reached before they had been inoculated with that malady. Another speech worthy of remark was that of Mr. George Turner, a tenant-farmer, who, in returning thanks as a "successful candidate," said:—

"He was peculiarly gratified to see the interest which the county gentlemen had taken in agricultural matters within the last few years. Some years since they were very unfortunately situated in this respect. There were but few men among the landlords of the county to set an example, or to give encouragement to the renting farmer. Mr. Turner referred to the regretment, to the county of Norfolk had attained among high position which the county of Norfolk had attained in the agricultural countries of England. He attributed it, in a great measure, to the course taken by Lord Leicester (then Mr. Coke), in trying himself experiments on a large scale—in investigating and testing the value of different manures, and in purchasing invariably the best male animals that could be got, and chasing his tenants the best of it. He was delighted to see evidences of a similar spirit among the landlords of this county. It was not to be expected that a tenant, particularly of a small estate, could undertake to try expensive experiments, the result of which, of course, must be entirely uncertain. Many of them could not afford it, and it would be hard upon the tenant to incur the expense if he could; but if the landlords, who had both the ability and the chemical knowledge to do it effectually, would themselves undertake it, the best results would follow. He had proved the value of draining and subsoil ploughing, on an estate he was going to himself, which had been left him by his father. When he took it in hand, it was not so well cultivated as he could have wished; and he assured them that by a considerable small outlay, he had nearly doubled its value. He had drained a great portion of it, and since then subsoiled a considerable part of it; and he should be happy to show the result to any gentleman who might desire to see it. He had a field, of which he had subsoiled one portion, and left another portion undone, and he declared positively that the latter was not half as good as the former." (Hear.)

Mr. Tuckett also said :—
 "He was convinced that the land might be made, with proper exertions, to produce double the quantity of food which it now produces, and that it might be made to maintain fifty millions of people. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Tuckett made some further observations on the importance of strengthening the connexion between agriculture and commerce, expressing himself warmly in favour of long leases."

FARMERS, BEHOLD YOUR "FRIENDS"!

FARMERS, BEHOLD YOUR "FRIENDS"
The great landed lords and squires who have conferred upon themselves the style and title of "farmers' friends" are beginning to be found out even by their most willing uppers. Not one effective movement have any of the high-professing protectionists made in their places in Parliament, but, on the contrary, they have watched their own Minister breaking down, in his own underhand and stealthy way, all the outworks of monopoly. Now, either all their noise in the country about the necessity of protection to agriculture was known by themselves to be base and lying assertion, or their present inaction is an abandocument of their public duty. In that dilemma they have placed themselves, and the political monocoppies—the landed—we should have rather said the mortgagee-interest will soon take that low place in the estimation of their dupes, the renting farmers, they have long held with the rest of the community. The conduct of the leaders of the agricultural protectionist party has placed them beneath the scorn of their opponents and the contempt of their own adherents.

Now, though the Morning Post has, by consistently advocating "protection," and carrying out its principles to their necessary conclusions, rendered itself the laughing-stock of rational men of all parties, there can be no doubt the views of that journal are those of the "protectionist" leaders. At most of the "protectionist" meetings the conductors of the Post were formally thanked—for nobody more cordially than the Duke of Richmond—for their efficient aid in the cause of dear bread and low wages; of high rents for the mortgaged landowners, and short commons for the industrious people; and though lords and squires have found it convenient to forget their professions, the Post, with a constancy worthy of a better cause, is true to its nonsense. Not long ago, on the wool duties' repeal coming before the House of Lords, the Duke of Richmond said the proposed repeal would do great injury to the "short-wool growers," and was besides objectionable to him as being another step towards Free Trade, which he believed would ruin the country; yet he would offer no "factive opposition" to the Government. Oh dear, no! If be had, Sir Robert Peel must have very much misappalled place at the Treasury. But hear what the Post, speaking under the name of PHILADELPHUS, says on the subject:—

That the "Protection Society" does not represent the interests of English agriculture is admitted; and from the conduct of its leaders it does not even represent the cause it was created to maintain, namely, English bad husbandry. The truth that it represents nothing but the sordid personal interests of the mortgaged landocracy must now be palpable to the dullest comprehension. Farmers, in their true characters behold you "FRIENDS!"

FREE TRADE OR SCARCITY?
The following letter, from a "Tenant-farmer," appears in the Mark-lane Express of this week, and it points very plainly to the great loss which farmers sustain in years like the present from the restrictions on the corn trade:—

"THE DROUGHT AND THE CROPS."
"SIR,—I have heard and read a good deal about the advantages of protecting British farmers against the importation of foreign corn, but there is one point upon which I wish you, or any of your Pro Corn Law correspondents, would tell me how they make out their case. I mean, the case which is, I dare say, that of husbandry."

"I will state my own case, which is, I dare say, that of hundreds besides. I occupy strong land, but which, being drained, is in pretty good condition. I can grow, in ordinary seasons, roots, beans, peas, and spring tares, upon which I rely for keeping a large stock both of cattle and sheep. This year I shall have neither beans, peas, or spring tares, come what may, and my chance of a root crop is not very promising. Besides my pasture land is not worth mowing, so that I shall have little or no meadow hay, and my clover crop will be but a scanty one. I have naturally become anxious about my stock, which it is now certain I shall keep during the next year at a serious loss. Neither shall I do better by selling them, for nine-tenths of the farm are as badly off for provender as I am; and if I sell my stock, it will be at a great sacrifice. Besides, my next year's wheat crop, and that of the year after, depend upon my continuing to keep a large stock; the stock, therefore, must be kept, be the loss what it may.

"Now, what I want to know is, should I not be benefited by being able to buy Indian corn from the United States, beans from Egypt, and peas, rye, oats, and tares from continental Europe at cheap rates? If there were no duties on these articles, I could get them at a cost that would make my stock cheap, instead of a cause of loss, as will happen this year, and I should fully keep up the fertility of my wheat land. In a word, I should be protected from a severe loss, and my farm saved from deterioration, by that very Free Trade which our Corn-Law gentlemen tell us is to do, I know not what, our chief to farmers. And thinking about this matter has induced me to look back for several years, and I find that, year after year, I should have been a gainer if I could every year, at all times of the year, have procured from abroad the stock-provender I have named, without the burden of any duty. When such articles were plentiful, I should have kept more stock, and so grown more wheat; and when, as now, they are scarce, I should at all events have kept up my stock, and the condition of my farm, without loss. But then, they tell me, if the Corn Laws were repealed, wheat would be so cheap that half of us could not grow it at all. That's all nonsense; for give us plenty of stock, together with cheap food for stock, and I will be bound to say we English farmers can grow wheat at a lower price than any other farmers in Europe. And this year, wheat is the only crop likely to stand the drought; so that, having lost all our other crops, and being compelled to keep our cattle, or sell them at a loss, we shall most likely find what we want in price as if the trade in corn had been free. So break again the Corn Laws would help us. I am more than half inclined to say the Free-Traders are right after all."

THE CROPS AND THE WEATHER.

We have more than once adverted to the way in which farmers will lose during the present season from deficiency of cattle provender; and the following extracts from the agricultural reports of the past week will place before our readers some of the facts relating to the deplorable prospects of the farmer at this moment. The Mark-lane Express, in its review of the corn trade, says:—

Mark-lane Express, in its review says:—

"Even if the anxiously wished-for supply of moisture should now be afforded, it may be questioned whether it would be sufficient time to repair the injury occasioned by the long-continued drought. What on good soil might, we are disposed to believe, recover the ground it has lately lost; whilst in light lands the deficiency would probably not be of much importance, should the summer and autumn prove propitious; as regards spring sown corn, however it is to be apprehended that the mischief done can be but very partially remedied, in addition to numerous well-authenticated instances, in which the seed has failed altogether to germinate, the reports respecting the appearance of the fields, where germination had taken place are the reverse of satisfactory. In many localities the seeds are stated to have come, at different periods, and are described as wearing a most irregular aspect; a circumstance which must, even could quantity be obtained, preclude the possibility of the quality of the grain being even in the same year.

Again, the same authority adds:—

"Beans and peas may, however, be definitely spoken of; and we have no hesitation in stating that the effects of the last two months' drought has rendered it almost impossible for these articles to produce nearly a usual average."

And from nearly every part of the country the same reports are received. Thus, by the agricultural report from Essex, we learn that

"Thousands of acres in our county of grass lands intended for mowing, and whereon full crops were obtained last year, now present the sterility of Hounslow-heath; and two barrows full would, if mown this season, be nearer the produce than two waggon-loads. In many parts, both on the heavy as well as the light districts, clovers have suffered so severely that they would not mow a quarter of a ton per acre; and we do not think we are far out of the way in rating our hay produce at two thirds less than last season."

So it appears that

"Oats present a very unfavourable appearance, and must be very deficient. Beans are most pitiable; in many places in full blossom some six or ten inches high. Peas are a little better and, as they are pretty free from insect, with rain they may improve. Mangel-wurzel is wretched; there is hardly a tenth of what is sown that has vegetated."

And it seems that monopoly rents, landlords contrive to secure without high prices, which laws and landlords cannot secure, have already diminished the tenant's stock; for the Essex reporter says:—

"The wool markets are rather better than last season; but, owing to increasing difficulty in making up payments, the farmers generally have not the great stock of sheep they possessed some two or three years since."

Again, in Bedfordshire, the same melancholy prospect is presented:—

"We have intentionally delayed our report for a week, under the hope of being able to say that the long (and now very alarming) drought had ended. Day after day, however, succeed each other without any rain, except an occasional very slight shower, which tells on the thirsty land little more than a good heavy dew. We never recollect to have had to report (at this season of the year in particular) so long an absence of rain, it being now about eleven weeks since the earth has had at all a thorough saturation. The ponds are half of them dry, and very many have been excavated within the last month; and the want of water in some situations begins to be severely felt. The pasture grounds in many cases are completely bare, and in some instances the cattle have to be foddered. Many of the young clovers will not mow at all, especially on the weak, dry soils; and the seeds sown with the spring crops have, as yet, hardly anywhere vegetated. The high land grass, where laid for mowing, is now much of it fed with cattle, and where left, it is so short that it will be difficult to mow it at all; while the meadows (except in the very lowest situations) are a most scanty crop; so that, taken altogether, the crop of hay must now be unavoidably deficient, almost beyond precedent."

Again:—

"The beans are also at present exceedingly short in the stem, and the chances are greatly against anything like an average crop. The peas, perhaps, vary most of all; in some cases, where sown early, they seem to have suffered less than other grain, though in other instances they look sickly, and here and there are quite dried up."

So in the same county:—

"Mangel-wurzel bids fair to be a general failure this year; we have seen none yet that has vegetated, and, if rain was even to come shortly, it is now getting almost too late to hope for anything like a heavy produce. There is also a good deal of anxiety now beginning to be felt as to the turnips; very few are sown, and those few cannot come up without rain, though it is not too late yet to hope for a crop of turnips; if, however, rain should hold off much longer, the prospect both for summer and winter provender will be most gloomy."

Since the above was written, rain has not only "held off" more than another week, but the prospect of wet appears more remote than ever, for the wind has changed to the west and south-west, and the weather appears to be only hotter and drier than before. Again, in Somersetshire:—

"Peas are injured greatly. Some of the barley has been ploughed up. Beans in blossom, very short, but not fine. Many oats not up. Rain may greatly benefit all these crops yet. Crop of grass very light. Clover almost a failure in crop; that sown in the spring quite so; as also, with few exceptions, mangel and carrots for winter feed. The late potatoes have not made their appearance, and the crop will stand a poor chance of being an abundant one."

Even in Cumberland, the most moist county in England:—

"The hay crop, according to present appearances, must be unusually light. Sown grasses were very forward, and suffered severely from the frosty nights and cold windy days, much of the clover being completely shrivelled and dried-like in its leaves, and on dry gravelly-bottomed land it has been burned quite brown, and cannot recover."

And even the rich grazing land of Northamptonshire cannot resist the long-continued drought, for the report from that county says:—

"Circumstances appear now very serious, everything that is growing is suffering extremely. The old rich grass land that generally looks so luxuriant at this time of the year presents but a barren appearance, and has not, up to the present time, carried more than half the quantity of stock as in an ordinary season. Many of the fresh heaths are now foddered with hay occasionally. The growing crops of hay are very light, and in many places the roots appear to be quite dead. The wheat crop looked well up to the middle of the month, but is evidently going the wrong way. The flag is dying, and the drills may be seen from end to end."

And—

"Mangel-wurzel does very bad; it comes at several times, and will have a hard matter to make a crop. There are one or two pieces in the vicinity of Northampton that look well. Carrots, in most instances, are a failure; they, like mangel, came at twice, and present but a poor appearance."

So in Yorkshire:—

"Every thing looks parched, and in many districts the wheat crops, which in the early part of spring were so promising, begin to assume a sickly colour in the blade. The barley and oats, too, are suffering greatly from the drought; and it is but too well ascertained that the hay crop is sadly deficient both in quantity and quality. With copious rains wheat might yet recover itself; but we fear that almost every other kind of crop is doomed to be deficient."

Again, in Scotland, which has suffered less than England, we learn from the Inverness Courier, that—

"The hay crop may be said to be irretrievably gone, as we are now within a short time of the usual hay harvest. In the southern counties the damage done by the drought is much greater than in this neighbourhood, as the crops are in a more advanced state of progress, and less likely to recover by subsequent rain. A proof of the dryness of the season is at present sent afforded by the state of our river, which is lower than it was even in the memorable season of drought in 1826."

In 1826 hay rose to £10 a load, and other provender was at the like famine prices. Yet, while our stock is in danger of being starved, and the farmer is likely to be injured, in some cases ruined, by the difficulty of keeping them and upholding the condition of his land, we find from the Mark-lane Express review of the foreign corn trade that

"From the south of Europe we learn that the weather has been favourable for the growing grain crops, which, together with the dull accounts from hence, had given a heavy tone to the trade in wheat at the principal ports in the Mediterranean."

The wheat of southern Europe is generally inferior and in bad condition, but if the corn trade were free, we could draw from that part of the world large supplies of beans, maize, and other provender; and Egyptian beans might now be had in Liverpool, but for the duty, at 24s., and Baltic peas at 23s. a quarter, and Indian corn at 28s. a quarter. The Corn Laws here seem to inflict a wanton injury; but Monopoly has ever been the parent of dearth, scarcity, and famine.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Subscriber" sends us the following query:—If A rents a freehold house and premises at £10 per annum from B, is A entitled to vote for the borough, and B for the county? [Both A and B can vote, one for the county, the other for the borough.]

The information sought for by "A Friend to Free Inquiry" will be found in "Macgregor's Commercial Statistics." The work is published by Mr. Knight, Ludgate-street, and sells for a guinea and a half.

"A Subscriber to the League," from Leith, may rest assured that the misrepresentations of the monopolists are utterly without foundation. The information he requires will be given in due course.

The article on the customs' frauds is not exactly suited to our columns.

The Epitaph on Monopoly, from "M. N.," of Sheffield, we will reserve as he desires. We shall be glad to receive his proposed contribution to the bazaar.

"M." should ask all cavaliers to ascertain for themselves what is the proportion which rent bears to the money value of all the produce sold off the farm. This is the most effective mode of disproving the cant fallacy that rent bears an insignificant proportion to the general expenses of agricultural production.

"J. H., a Member of the League,"—The League wants an adequate supply of corn for the people, no matter whence obtained. The Corn Laws prevent the importation of foreign corn, and, by thus excluding competition from the home-grower, render him more reliant upon what is called protection for his market, than upon his own skill or enterprise. The necessary consequence has been, that agriculture has been less improved practically in this country than any other branch of our national industry. Take away that protection, and leave the farmer and landlord dependent altogether upon self-exertion and science for their market, and there can be no doubt that necessity would compel the universal use of those more economical and productive modes of tillage that experience, in so many individual cases, has proved capable of very largely increasing the quantity of food from a given surface. We should thus increase materially our own food production; and suppose even that this increase of production would be sufficient to lower prices so far as to render it unprofitable for the foreigner to send corn to this country, the advantage to manufactures and commerce would arise from the early extended means of home consumption that would arise from the diminished cost of subsistence. Then, again, the trade with other countries would be greatly extended by the increased power of consuming all foreign commodities, such as sugar, tea, coffee, &c. &c. The demand for the raw materials of all our manufactures would also be greatly multiplied; and as almost without exception these raw materials are the products of other countries, our foreign trade would be proportionately extended in all these commodities. But J. H. must remember, that the operations here alluded to will require many years to realize their results, while population in this country is rapidly increasing every year, and with a free trade in food would increase in a ratio fully sufficient to consume not only whatever increase of production might take place on our own soil, but any additional quantity that could be obtained from other countries. Then there would be a double stimulus to the wealth and industry of this country—on the one hand, the increased food-producing power of our own soil, whilst the rapid growth of a wealthy and well-paid population would provide the means of consumption both for the additional quantity of corn grown here and that imported from other countries. What the Free-Traders demand is, that the trade in corn shall be free, as the only means of enabling the people of this country to feed themselves. When they can feed themselves, no matter whether from the productive capacities of their own soil, to which Free Trade alone can give full development, or by importation—the natural desires of men for the higher comforts of life would open new, and widen all the old, sources of commerce, so that our foreign trade might extend proportionately with the increasing wealth and population of the country.

We have a file of poetical contributions before us, from which we can make no extracts this week.

We have also a variety of other correspondents on hand, to each of which it would be impossible to give separate replies; but we will take care to print by the suggestions of some of our friends; and the information needed by others will be given in due course.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, June 15, 1844.

The annual motion by the Hon. C. P. Villiers, for the repeal of the Corn Laws, will certainly, as we understand, be brought forward on Tuesday, the 25th inst. Whatever constituencies intend to present memorials to their representatives, requesting them to support such motion, should, if they have not already forwarded them, transmit them forthwith; and, as we have before intimated, in cases where the members are pledged to our cause by former votes, a thankful acknowledgment and expression of confidence may duly take place of the requirement in the memorial. Let none who are friendly to our cause have occasion to say that his hands are not strengthened by his constituents; and let none who are hostile either dare to misstate, or affect not to know, the wishes of those whom he claims to represent. Cut away all such excuses or pretexts; nor is it needful, or desirable, that memorializing should be restricted to localities where Free-Traders are already in a majority. The protests and recommendations of strong minorities are not things to be disregarded. Very often they are intimations in which an observant member can read the presage of his destiny at a future election. "Coming events cast their shadows before;" and shadows have struck terror to stout hearts, when known to be cast by the approach of advancing realities.

It is most just and needful that our friends and champions in the Legislature should be thus encouraged from without. There should be no sympathy that can be construed into coldness and indifference; or a lack of appreciation of their arduous services. Within the walls of the House of Commons there is everything to dishearten and discourage them. We know very well that they are not so to be damped, or taken aback. But that is no reason for the slightest failure in what is due from us to them. To cheer them forward is all the co-operation we can render; and let it be rendered heartily. They are aided by the appeal to foes and neutrals, as well as by the expression of gratitude towards themselves. All such documents should, therefore, speedily be at their respective destinations.

We do not affect to anticipate success; nor, indeed, any considerable accession of numbers upon the division of last year. Monopoly is not yet prepared to surrender; nor the Ministry to break with the monopoly by which it was created. As to conversions, they are rare things now-a-days. We shall never see a black swan majority. But we do expect that both Monopoly and the Ministry will have their impression deepened that they are fighting a losing game, and that it is rapidly becoming time to look about them for a final arrangement. We shall win in their minds, though not in their voices. They will say "No," feeling that they must come to "Ay." They will be unable to shut their eyes to the fact that the end has begun.

Although individual members should have the private jogging and flapping which will remind them of their constituents, yet, as a body, we have not, this session, begirt the Parliament, "beseeching or besieging." It has been let alone. The Leaguers have not pestered it with petitions. The public looks on, merely watching it, and regarding the Legislature, rather than the Corn Law question, as being just now upon its trial. Such silence is a very significant hint of the transfer of public interest and expectancy to the next Parliament. We shall "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest" whatever proceedings take place; but the appeal is already made, and the cause is before the tribunal of the nation, as constitutionally embodied in the constituencies.

Nor can any complaint be set up that the House of Commons has been overmuch troubled within doors, any more than from without, upon this question during the present session. It has been suffered to fall into a comparative abeyance, offering a curious and expressive contrast with the unabated interest it excites in the public mind. There has been no forcing it forward. There has been no factious harassing, to be made an excuse for not, at last, yielding "ample scope and verge enough" to a matter so important. The House will come to it like one waking out of sleep, and learning what the rest of the world has been talking and thinking of all the while. This does not encourage us to say, "We all expect a gentle answer, Jew;" but it should at least ensure a full and fair discussion of the subject, and a more decorous disposal of it than has sometimes been vouchsafed on former occasions.

FREE-TRADE CLUB.—We are glad to hear that several of the most eminent opponents of monopoly have determined upon instituting a Free-Trade Club in London, the want of which has been long felt. We know of nothing more desirable than that the advocates of the emancipation of industry should have opportunities of intercommunication, and the means of ascertaining the progress of free commercial principles. The collection of a library of sterling publications on the till lately little understood science of Political Economy, the convenience of those Free-Traders who may visit London from the provinces, and the association of as many friends of the cause as possible, appear to be the objects that the promoters of this undertaking have in view.

He that squeezes the poor to increase his own estate, gives to the rich only to impoverish himself.—Luther on Proverbs xxii. 16.

REVIEW.

Heeren's Researches into the Commerce of Ancient Nations. (French and English translations.)

In the conclusion of our former article on this subject we stated that fish was not the only supply which the Egyptians derived from the Nile; the cultivation of aquatic plants for the food both of men and cattle was an important branch of their agriculture, though unknown in almost every other country. Herodotus, whose testimony is confirmed by Theophrastus and Diodorus Siculus, gives us a very full account of the cultivation of the lotus lily and the byblus. "The byblus," he says, "is an annual plant; after they have plucked it from the marshes, they cut off the top part, and use it for many and various purposes; the lower part, which is about a cubit in length, is good for food, and is commonly exposed for sale. Those who desire to make a very delicate dish of the byblus, stew it in a hot pan, and so serve it up."

The two species of lotus are the Nymphaea Lotus and Nymphaea Nelumbo; the former is still found in great abundance near Damietta; its stalk grows about five feet above the surface of the water, but it sometimes attains a greater height, which would justify the Egyptian artists for mixing it with the byblus, as we shall soon see that it is in the sketch of bird-catchers lurking amid these large aquatic plants. Savary mentions that the seed is still used as an article of food by the inhabitants. The Nymphaea Nelumbo, or Nelumbium speciosum, is well known in India: we have not been able to find a distinct notice of it in any of the recent works on Egypt; but that it was anciently cultivated in the country is beyond doubt. Not only do we find it depicted in its natural colours, with its stalk and fruits, in one of the tombs opened by Belzoni, but in the great French work on Egypt, from which we copy the engraving, we see that the representation of a nelumbo harvest adorns a royal sepulchre. The byblus is not now cultivated in Egypt; its principal value was for the manufacture of papyrus, which was very extensive. It is generally known that the byblus grows in a part of Sicily, near Syracuse, but nowhere else, we believe, in Europe, and that the late Chevalier Landolina succeeded in manufacturing papyrus from its leaves, specimens of which were sent to the principal museums and cabinets in Europe. He likewise bears testimony to the sweetness of the sap, and describes the pulp as somewhat similar to that of the sugar-cane.

We find the lotus-harvest, however, as usually connected with horticulture as with agriculture; at first the plant might be mistaken for corn, but it may be easily distinguished by the greenness of the stem, and by the waved lines, which show that it was planted in well-watered beds. The gatherers of the lotus appear to have cut the stem off close to the roots, with a sickle shorter and sharper than that used for reaping the corn. We clearly see that the lotus reed was looked upon as far more valuable than straw: great care is shown in binding them into sheaves, and those who carry them exhibit an anxious caution against breaking the stem. It is also remarkable that the lotus was gathered both green and ripe, and that the fruit was extracted by drawing the heads through a toothed instrument not unlike that used for cleaning flax; after which the stems were preserved for a great variety of domestic purposes. It was, however, chiefly as fodder for cattle that the lotus was cultivated, and its nutritious qualities were deemed so great that kine fed upon this water plant were said to surpass all others in fatness and in flavour of the meat. As it is our purpose in these articles not to confine ourselves too strictly to the mere commercial examination of the history of ancient nations, but to take advantage of such opportunities as may incidentally arise for illustrating the scriptural narratives and confirming the historical veracity of the Old Testament, we may here notice a slight inaccuracy of our translators in the account given of Pharaoh's dream (Gen. xli. 2). The passage stands thus:—"There came up out of the river seven well-favoured kine and fat-flashed, and they fed in a meadow." The latter clause should be rendered "they fed on the achu," which was a generic name for the plants of the Nile. Meadows properly so called were unknown in Egypt, though artificial irrigation has been practiced in the country from the earliest ages. The shaduf represented in the accompanying engraving is still used by the Egyptian cultivators, and indeed a contrivance of the same kind is common in many parts of England. It will be seen that the dress fowl in Western Africa and India. In some tropical countries the aquatic plants are so strong, and rise to such a height, that they become the principal causes of the marshes which render the navigation dangerous, and also of the miasmata, which at the end of summer necessarily arise from the decay of such immense masses of vegetable matter. They are also the common resort of the crocodile, which, though an object of veneration in some of the nomes of Egypt, was chased and destroyed in other parts of the country. There are but few representations of the chase of the crocodile: it was too dangerous a sport to be often practised, though the Tenbyutes were celebrated for their skill and bravery in such encounters. Most of the nations bordering on Egypt greatly dreaded this animal, which was known to them only by report, and hence we find it quoted in Job as one of the wonders of creation which best illustrate almighty power. The description is rather long, but a portion of it may be advantageously quoted:—

"Canst thou draw out leviathan with an hook? or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down? Canst thou put an hook into his nose? or bore his jaw through with a thorn? Will he make many supplications unto thee? will he speak soft words unto thee? Will he make a covenant with thee? wilt thou take him for a servant for ever? Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens? Shall thy companions make a banquet of him? shall they part him among the merchants? Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons? or his head with fish spears? Lay thine hand upon him, remember the battle, do no more. Behold, the hope of him is in vain: shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him? None is so fierce that dare stir him up: who then is able to stand before me? Who hath prevented me, that I should repay him? whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine. I will not conceal his parts, nor his power, nor his comely proportion. Who can discover the face of his garment? or who can come to him with his double bridle? Who can open the doors of his face? his teeth are terrible round about. His scales are his pride, shut up together as with a close seal. One is so near to another that no air can come between them. They are joined one to another, they stick together, that they cannot be sundered. By his neesings a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning. Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out. Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a seething pot or caldron. His breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth."

We have heard objections made to the latter part of this description; but those who have seen the animal when he comes to the surface of the waters to breathe, have declared that the expiration is like and appearance of the labourer here represented proves him to belong to the very lowest class; and we find in Scripture that "hewers of wood and drawers of water" were proverbially regarded as the meanest of slaves.

The reedy shades formed by the water plants of the Nile formed very dense covers, and were used by the fowlers for setting their trap-nets, which, in consequence of the extreme abundance of aquatic birds in Egypt, were made so large that the exertions of several persons were necessary to close them. Some one of the fowlers appears to have been usually concealed among the reeds and tall flower-stems of the aquatic plant, to watch the time when a sufficient number of birds would be collected in the net, and give his companions the signal for pulling the catchline by which it was closed. There are not in the picture from which our engraving is copied any traces of bait being used to entice the birds; but it is probable that the simple clearing of the water from its reeds and lilies would be sufficient attraction for the flocks of Egyptian aquatic birds, as it is still found to be for the river-the seething of a caldron. Virgil boldly applies the same description to a spirited horse, an animal not at all so remarkable as the crocodile for the force of its breathing. He says:—

"Collectumque premens voluit sub naribus ignem," which may be rendered

"And in his nostrils rolls collected fire."

The chase of another dreaded inhabitant of the waters deserves to be mentioned; we mean the hippopotamus, called in Scripture the behemoth. Its almost impenetrable skin was highly valued by the Egyptians as a covering for their shields, and it is still used for the same purpose by many African nations. Among the Egyptians, the shield appears to have been more highly valued than it was by the Greeks of the heroic ages. They were almost the only nation who, in the siege of fortified places, employed a shield of sufficient size to protect storming parties, or sappers and miners advancing against hostile walls, similar to the pavis used for a like purpose in the days of chivalry. These pavises were usually covered with hides, not merely to repel darts and other weapons, but to save them from being burned by the torches and brands of the besiegers.

The formidable whips used for the chastisement of slaves and public offenders were also made from the hide of the hippopotamus, and these instruments of torture were not less formidable than the Russian knout, or the cow-skin of the American slave-dealers. The unfortunate Fellahs of Egypt are often chastised with this fearful instrument of punishment by the officers of Mohammed Ali, and they believe that liability to be flogged with the hippopotamus thong has been transmitted to them as an inheritance from their ancestors in the age of the Pharaohs.

No species of chase appears to have been more dangerous than that of the hippopotamus. The hunters, instead of spears, used a species of harpoon, to which a rope was attached so as to afford the wounded animal full scope in his death-struggles, as is the practice in the whale-fishery. It was not until the hippopotamus had been wounded by several persons, gashed by darts, harpoons, or spears, and exhausted by his struggles and the loss of blood, that the attendants attempted to secure him by flinging a noose over his head; and even, under the most favourable circumstances, this was a service of danger, for a single touch of the unwieldy animal's paw would have upset or broken to pieces the frail canoe used by the Egyptian chasseurs. From the description given of the behemoth or hippopotamus in the book of Job, it would seem that this animal was at one time very generally known in Lower Egypt, but at the present day it is very rarely, if ever, seen below the cataracts:—

"Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee; he eateth grass as an ox. Lo now, his strength is in his loins, and his force is in the navel of the belly. He moveth his tail like a cedar: the sinews of his stones are wrapped together. His bones are as strong pieces of brass; his bones are like bars of iron. He is the chief of the ways of God: He that made him can make his sword to approach unto him. Surely the mountains bring him forth food, where all the beasts of the field play. He lieth under the shady trees, in the covert of the reed, and fens. The shady trees cover him with their shadow; the willows of the brook compass him about. Behold, he drinketh up a river, and hasteth not: he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth. He taketh it with his eyes: his nose pierceth through anares." (Job xl. 15—24.)

Some commentators have hastily inferred from this passage that the hippopotamus was anciently found in the river Jordan, but it is manifest that the patriarch insinuates the direct contrary; for he declares that the animal would exhaust that stream, and consequently must be the inhabitant of a much larger river.

Fowling was a favourite Egyptian sport. We have already noticed the large nets spread among the aquatic plants of the Nile. This species of net was principally used in the Delta; a different kind of trap was necessary for the birds which frequented the districts bordering on the desert, such as the partridge, the quail, and the bustard. This was usually a net stretched over a frame which closed with a spring when the bait was touched, and the mechanism of the contrivance appears to be equally simple and ingenious.

We find many allusions to this practice in Scripture. Thus, Solomon says, that the profligate heedlessly encounters dangers "as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life." (Prov. vii. 23.) He also uses the same image, to show of what little avail is human foresight without the superintendence of Divine Providence:—"For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them." (Eccles. ix. 12.)

From the number of persons who made fowling their business or their pleasure the timidity of the Egyptian birds was proverbial. Thus the prophet Hosea says:—"They shall tremble as a bird out of Egypt, and as a dove out of the land of Assyria; and I will place them in the houses, saith the Lord." There is an original Egyptian painting preserved in the British Museum, which represents an entire family engaged in an excursion against the aquatic birds of the Nile. Besides his wives, children, and attendants, the fowler is represented as having brought with him a decoy-bird, and, what to us must appear rather singular, a favourite cat, which, hunting through the reeds, frequently pounces upon the birds, and is, besides, trained to act as a retriever instead of a dog.

Another use of the Nile remains to be noticed: it was the great highway of communication between Upper and Lower Egypt. We possess the representation of a sea-fight between the Egyptians and some Indian people, and this is, of course, sufficient to prove that the subjects of the Pharaohs were not ignorant of marine navigation; but in general it may be said that the Egyptians, like the ancient Persians, Assyrians, and Babylonians, and the modern Siamese, were able navigators of rivers, but dreaded generally to encounter the perils of the open sea. The boat most commonly used on the Nile was the baris, which was originally nothing more than an excavated tree, similar to the canoes of the Pacific; but, as large trees are not common in Egypt, we incline to think that the workmen represented in the accompanying sketch are engaged in a process which more nearly approaches our modern boat-building. The instrument in the hands of the three workmen may either be used to bore holes for the pins which fastened the planks together, or, what is more probable, to stop up the interstices, or, as we commonly say, to calk the vessel, with loose hemp and byblus. The chisel, which is employed by the two figures to the right, is the same as that which, in other paintings, we see used in cabinet and upholstery work, and in one specimen in chariot-making: it is always distinguishable by the curve which the blade makes with the handle.

The rigging of most of the vessels on the monuments proves that they were river or canal boats. The rudder passes right through the stern, and is used as an oar is sometimes employed as a substitute for a rudder in the present day, and in the mode of propelling a boat called sculling. In many instances we find an awning below the main sail, to protect the rowers from the excessive heat of the sun. These vessels were very unfit to ascend the river against the stream, and they are always towed up, except when the wind was fresh and favourable. They made use of a singular contrivance to accelerate their motion when descending the stream. They fastened a hurdle of tamarisk with a rope to the prow of the vessel; this hurdle they strengthened with reeds and bands of byblus, and let it down into the water. The stream bearing upon the hurdle urged the vessel forward with such rapidity that her head would have been run under water if they had not steadied her by a heavy weight in the stern.

Coracles were used by the hunters and fowlers, who sought for game in the swamps and marshes; the fishermen used boats of a larger size; but for ferrying over the river, and the transport of goods down the stream, the Egyptians generally used such boats as Ulysses is represented to have constructed for the purposes of escaping from the island of Calypso. Homer describes so graphically the ancient process of boat-building, as we find it depicted on the monuments, that the passage deserves to be quoted:—

"When rosy morning call'd them from their rest,
Ulysses rob'd him in the cloak and vest.
The nymph's fair head a veil transparent grac'd,
Her swelling loins a radiant zone embrac'd,
With flowers of gold: an under robe, unbound,
In snowy waves flow'd glittering on the ground.
Forth issuing thus, she gave him first to wield
A weighty axe, with truest temper steel'd,
And double-edg'd; the handle smooth and plain,
Wrought of the clouded olive's easy grain;
And next a wedge, to drive with sweepy sway:
Then to the neighbouring forest led the way.
On the lone island's utmost verge they stood,
Of poplars, pines, and firs, a leaty wood,
Whose leafless summits to the skies aspire,
Scorch'd by the sun, or sear'd by heavenly fire
(Already dry'd). These, pointing out to view,
The nymph just show'd him and with tears withdrew.
"Now toils the hero; trees on trees o'erthrown
Fall crackling round him, and the forests groan:
Sudden, full twenty on the plain are strow'd,
And lopp'd and lightn'd of their branchy load.
At equal angles these dispos'd to join,
He smooth'd and squar'd them by the rule and line.
(The wimbles for the work Calypso found.)
With these he pierc'd them, and with clunchers bound.
Long and capacious as a shipwright forms
Some bark's broad bottom to outride the storms,
So large he built the raft: then ribb'd it strong
From space to space, and nail'd the planks along;
These form'd the sides; the deck he fashion'd last;
Then o'er the vessel rais'd the taper mast,
With crossing sailyards dancing in the wind;
And to the helm the guiding rudder join'd
(With yielding osiers fenc'd, to break the force Of surging waves, and steer the steady course).
Thy loom, Calypso! for the future sails
Supply'd the cloth, capacious of the gales.
With stays and cordage last he rigg'd the ship,
And, roll'd on levers, launch'd into the deep."

Odyssey, v.

In Upper Egypt, it would appear that coracles were sometimes formed of wicker-work, covered with hides, such as were used by the ancient Britons. Lucan intimates, that in his day such boats were used on the Nile:—

"The bending willows into barks they twine,
Then line the work with skins of slaughtered kine;
Such are the floats Venetian fishers know,
Where in dull marshes stands the settling Po;
On such to neighbouring Gaul, allured by gain,
The bolder Britons cross the swelling main.
Like these, when fruitful Egypt lies afloat,
The Memphian artist builds his reedy boat."

Pharsal, vii.

It was probably in one of those wicker boats that Moses was exposed by his mother: "When she could no longer hide him, she took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch, and put the child therein; and she laid it in the flags by the river's brink." (Exod. ii. 3.) The word which our translators have rendered "bulrushes," properly signifies a species of papyrus, which, as we have already said, was used by the Egyptians for their rafts and coracles.

The papyrus boat in which Moses was exposed was "daubed with slime and with pitch," that is, both with mineral and vegetable substances, to serve as calking. A mineral tar, frequently used for this purpose, is produced on the coasts of the Red Sea; it is remarkable for its antiseptic properties, and has been successfully used in the preparation of mummies. A human hand preserved by this substance may be seen in the Museum of the Royal Asiatic Society; it is so very perfect that the shape of the nails is clearly discernible. When the mother of Moses had stanch'd the little boat, she had reason to hope that it would float in safety until some charitable person should take compassion upon the child. But as in her immediate neighbourhood concealment was necessary, she hid it among the aquatic plants, "the flags by the river's brink." We have already seen that these plants grew so high as to furnish a lurking-place for fowlers and trappers; and it is probable that the sister of Moses availed herself of such a covert, in order to watch the fate of the child without danger of detection.

In some reigns the Egyptians unquestionably paid attention to naval affairs, and kept ships for war and commerce on the Red Sea: the navigation of the Mediterranean was always unpopular, and for the most part prohibited. The cause of this appears to have been the dangerous nature of the coast, which, even in the time of the Romans, was greatly dreaded by mariners. Lucan avers that it was on this account chiefly that Pompey chose Egypt for the place of his retreat after the unfortunate battle of Pharsalia. He introduces Lentulus, declaring—

"Abounding Egypt shall receive thee yet,
And yield, unquestioned, a secure retreat.
By nature strengthen'd with a dangerous strand,
Her syrtis and untry'd channels guard the land.
Rich in the fatness of her plenteous soil,
She plants her only confidence in Nile."
Pharsal. viii.

We learn incidentally from the prophet Nahum, that the sea was usually regarded rather as a defence to Egypt, than as a means of communication with foreign nations. In his denunciation against Nineveh, he asks, "Art thou better than populous No, that was situate among the rivers, that had the waters round about it, whose rampart was the sea, and her wall was from the sea? Ethiopia and Egypt were her strength, and it was infinite; Put and Lubim were thy helpers. Yet was she carried away, she went into captivity; her young children also were dashed in pieces at the top of all the streets: and they cast lots for her honourable men, and all her great men were bound in chains." (Nahum iii. 8-10.)

The city of No, or as it is elsewhere more correctly termed, No-Ammon, that is to say, "the peculiar city of Ammon," is identified with Thebes, which was sacred to the god Ammon. Its ancient magnificence is attested by its mighty ruins, and the testimony of Homer shows how appropriate is the epithet "populous." When Achilles refuses to be reconciled to Agamemnon, he declares—

"Not all proud Thebes' unrival'd walls contain,
The world's great empress on the Egyptian plain (That spreads her conquests o'er a thousand states,
And pours her heroes through a hundred gates;
Two hundred horsemen and two hundred cars
From each wide portal issuing to the wars),
Thou' bribes were heap'd on bribes, in number more
Than dust in fields, or sands along the shore;
Should all these offers for my friendship call,
'Tis he that offers, and I scorn them all."
Iliad, ix.

The commerce of the Egyptians seems to have been chiefly conducted by foreigners; the trade with Central Asia, and perhaps with India, was carried on by the Ishmaelites, and other wandering tribes of the Arabian peninsula; the navigation of the Red Sea seems to have attracted little attention before the age of Ptolemy.

The Logic of Political Economy. By Thomas De Quincey. William Blackwood and Sons, 1844. We have derived much pleasure from the perusal of this book, we wish we could say profit; but, on turning over the contents of it again, we fear we must confess that we have gained no valuable addition to our stock of knowledge. Much there is, indeed, to amuse in the variety of the illustrations with which its gifted author has diversified the subject; and amid the quaint pedantry and scholastic dogmatism with which it abounds, we meet with many things which make us glad that we have not left it unread. This is not a book for the multitude; the author, perhaps, would consider this to be praise; we mean it, however, as censure. Neither is it a book for the few, who have studied this science as it ought to be studied, and after painful thought, and through many difficulties, have been enabled to see and recognise its truths, as none others can see them. It would bewilder the multitude, while to the master of the science it would present something like a Chinese puzzle, serving as an exercise for his powers of mind to unravel the mysteries which the author has created, and to clear the subject of the cloud of doubts thrown around it.

For we hold that there are, in the moral sciences especially, three classes of inquirers, two of whom we have mentioned. The multitude, who, unless they be led away by interest and deeply-rooted prejudices, generally by a kind of instinct, perceive and apprehend the substantial truth, though they may not be able to define it with logical accuracy, or trace the process of reasoning by which it is established—a most salutary provision, that to those, who have often neither time nor means to prosecute abstract inquiries, a shorter road to the truth is thrown open, and some logicians have thought (though we dissent from them) a safer one than that of reason. The second class consists of those who have aspired much beyond this, and indeed attained a higher station both in their own eyes and that of the world, but yet have not gone far enough: they have entered upon the study, have read what other men have said, have formed systems ingenious enough, above all complex enough, so as to be out of reach of the vulgar understanding, and yet have failed to attain the simplicity, the majestic simplicity of truth. From simple to complex, and from complex on to simple at the end, is the course of the passage of the master-mind through the field of inquiry in the moral sciences. Thus, such a mind finds itself, at the close of its inquiries, coinciding in many respects with the very multitude, able, therefore, to enlighten and instruct them, because having much in common with them, but, need we say, immeasurably superior in the nature of its perception of the truth, and in its power of exposing error. Those who remain in the middle stage can never hope to be the instructors of the public mind: they may attain much celebrity amongst literary men, their wit and originality may be deservedly lauded, but, if they will speak in a dead language, they cannot hope that the multitude will be stirred by their words.

We think that any political economist who is content to follow the mazes of the Ricardo labyrinth, and to attach himself to that school, in short, to "expound" Ricardo, must be content with being neither read nor understood by the vulgar, while those of a higher order will perceive and detect the fallacies, which have made so many works on this science intricate and absurd.

"Political economy," says the author in his preface, "does not advance." We differ from him—it is advancing, it has advanced: we know no science whose truths have been rendered so clear, and above all so well known, within the last few years; and without extravagant self-laudation we may say, that the men connected with this journal have in no small degree contributed to bring about this result. We are bold enough to say that we will find many men now, in every county in England, who would be able to demonstrate, in fair argument with the author, to the satisfaction of any intelligent hearers, the baselessness of many of the doctrines to be found in this book. How an intelligent tenant-farmer would demolish the definition of rent, page 163:—

"That portion of the produce from the soil which is paid to the landlord for the use of its differential powers, as measured by comparison with those of similar agencies operating on the same market."

Yet, hear the author:—

"Though Aristotle should rise from the dead, that definition (I humbly submit) will stand."

The part of the work which treats of value is most deserving of attention: we subjoin some extracts from it. He thus points out the two constituents of value,—utility and difficulty of attainment:—

"CASE EPSILON.—A man comes forward with his overture. 'Here is a thing which I wish you to purchase; it has cost me in labour five guineas, and that is the price I ask.' 'Very well,' you reply; 'but tell me this, what desire or purpose of mine will the article promote?' Epsilon rejoins: 'Why, as candour is my infirmity, none at all. But, what of that? Useful or not, the article embodies five guineas' worth of excellent labour.' This man, the candid Epsilon, you dismiss.

"CASE OMICRON.—Then succeeds Omicron, who praises your decisive conduct as to the absurd family of the Epsilons. 'That man,' he observes, 'is weak—candid, but weak; for what was the cost in your eyes but so much toil to no effect of real service? But that is what nobody can say of the article offered by myself; it is serviceable always—nay, often you will acknowledge it to be indispensable.' 'What is it?' you demand. 'Why, simply, then, it is a pond of water, and as good water as ever you tasted.' The scene lies in England, where water bears no value except under that machinery of costly arrangements which delivers it as a permanent and guaranteed succession into the very chambers where it is to be used. Omicron accordingly receives permission to follow the candid Epsilon. Each has offered for sale one element of value out of two—one element in a state of insulation—where it was indispensable for any operative value, i. e., price, to offer the two in combination; and, without such a combination, it is impossible (neither does my economist hang this by his principles) that value in exchange, under the most romantic or imaginary circumstances, ever should be realized."

These two he calls "affirmative and negative value": the first expressing the desirableness of the article, and the second its difficulty of attainment; and endeavours to show that only one of these at a time determines the value of the article, that though the other is present, it is not in active operation. There is much ingenuity in the mode in which this is stated and illustrated:—

"Both are copresent always. Neither can be absent: for, if so, then the common idea of exchange value would vanish—the case Epsilon or the case Omicron would be realized. But each of the two is suspended alternately. Thus, by way of illustration, walk into almost any possible shop, buy the first article you see; what will determine its price? In ninety-nine cases of a hundred, simply the element D, difficulty of attainment. The other element U, or intrinsic utility, will be perfectly inoperative. Let the thing (measured by its uses) be, for your purposes, worth ten guineas, so that you would rather give ten guineas than lose it; yet, if the difficulty of producing it be only worth one guinea, one guinea is the price which it will bear. But still not the less, though U is inoperative, can U be supposed absent? By no possibility; for, if it had been absent, assuredly you would not have bought the article even at the lowest price; U acts upon you, though it does not act upon the price. On the other hand, in the hundredth case, we will suppose the circumstances reversed. You are on Lake Superior, in a steam-boat, making your way to an unsettled region, 800 miles ahead of civilization, and consequently with no chance at all of purchasing any luxury whatsoever, little luxury or big luxury, for a space of ten years to come; one fellow-passenger, whom you will part with before sunset, has a powerful musical snuff-box; knowing, by experience, the power of such a toy over your own feelings, the magic with which at times it lulls your agitations of mind, you are vehemently desirous to purchase it. In the hour of leaving London you had forgot to do so; here is a final chance. But the owner, aware of your situation not less than yourself, is determined to operate by a strain, pushed to the very uttermost upon U, upon the intrinsic worth of the article in your individual estimate for your individual purposes. He will not hear of D as any controlling power or mitigating agency in the case; and finally, although at six guineas apiece in London or Paris you might have loaded a waggon with such boxes, you pay sixty rather than lose it when the last knell of the clock has sounded, which summons you to buy now or to forfeit for ever. Here, as before, only one element is operative: before it was D, now it is U. But, after all, D was not absent though inoperative. The inertness of D allowed U to put forth its total effect. The practical compression of D being withdrawn, U springs up like water in a pump when released from the pressure of air. Yet still that D was present to your thoughts, though the price has otherwise regulated, is evident; both because U and D must coexist in order to found any case of exchange value whatever, and because, undeniably, you take into very particular consideration this D, the extreme difficulty of attainment (which here is the greatest possible, viz., an impossibility), before you consent to have the price racked up to U. The special D has vanished; but it is replaced in your thoughts by an unlimited D. Undoubtedly you have submitted to U in extremity as the regulating force of the price; but it was under the sense of D's latent presence. Yet D is so far from exerting any positive force, that the retirement of D from all agency whatever on the price—this it is which creates, as it were, a perfect vacuum, and through that vacuum U rushes up to its highest and ultimate graduation."

The practical chapters at the conclusion are merely a reproduction of Ricardo's opinions on rent, wages, and profits, and that in their most erroneous form, and without any attention to those obvious corrections which have been made by subsequent economists; for instance, we have his "Theory of Rent," without any notice of Colonel Thompson's modification of it in his "True Theory of Rent," or the still further restrictions upon its application which, in our judgment, are necessary before making any practical use of it. Again, we have Mr. Ricardo's very gross misapprehension of the distinction between "fixed and circulating capital" reproduced, although the error has been long since pointed out by Mr. Senior; and we are surprised to find, in what professes to be a logic of political economy, such a quality as "durability" made "the ground of the generic distinction between fixed and circulating capital." (Page 116.)

With regard to the style of the work, we must say that the author is successful in conveying his meaning well and clearly; and it would be more attractive if not so much deformed by the introduction of the "sesquipedalia verba." Every page displays a store of varied information, with great felicity of illustration; and if an author so gifted had but treated the science as one based on observation and experience, and suited for practical purposes, we are satisfied that he would have produced a work much more deserving of the title of the "Logic of Political Economy" than this is.

Architectural Annual. Edited by M. Jules Gailhabaud. Firmin Didot and Co., Amen-corner, Paternoster-row, 1844.

The student in any branch of art or science is met at the outset of his career by a difficulty which is almost insurmountable, indeed is entirely so, unless he bring with his love of study great wealth coupled with most unconquerable patience. We allude to the voluminous and expensive works it is necessary for him to read and study ere he can obtain the required knowledge of those elementary principles so essential to his after success.

Many attempts have been made of late years to remove this difficulty. We have had "Cyclopaedias" and "Treasures of Knowledge" ad nauseum; but, like every first attempt to remove a difficulty, the opposite extreme has been fallen into; and, instead of the beginner requiring years of study for the completion of his education, he may now be initiated into any branch of human inquiry in a few days, and astonish his friends by appearing before them as a most accomplished scholar and finished gentleman; the danger is, however, that your learned wonder proves upon strict scrutiny to be a mere quack, knowing only the terms of the science of which he pretends to have imbibed the spirit.

It is rare, indeed, that we see books issued with the sole intention of giving simplicity to any one branch of inquiry; but when we have the good fortune of meeting with such a work it is truly refreshing and delightful. The one now before us just comes up to our standard of what such a book ought to be, and we doubt not it will be hailed as a great boon by the architectural student. Perhaps there is no department of art to which the above remarks are more applicable than the one treated of in this book; as the editor very justly remarks in his preface:—"Every style and description of the art has been given to the world in rich and costly folios: the works of Woods and Dawkins upon the antiquities of Bابل and Palmyra, of "Le Roy and Stewart among the finished monuments of Attic art," together with the "splendid tomes of the 'Voyages Pittoresques' of Choiseul Gouffier, with many others upon the antiquities of Egypt, India, China, and Mexico; and as he further says:—"more recently a Britton, a Moller, a Pugin, and a De Chamont have made us acquainted with the science and taste of the Ogival or Pointed style in all its exquisite details and transitions." And he further says, most justly too:—"The greater number of these learned illustrations have been intended rather for the professional man and antiquary than for the instruction of the less initiated, and have been consequently of too profound a character to attract the general reader," and, we would add, much too expensive for the great mass of students, not only from the actual price of the works, but from the great time consumed in their perusal—time which very few can afford to bestow.

This work, then, we consider a desideratum, not only because it gives valuable information in a concise form, but because it also gives the leading principles of architecture, whilst the reader will find the analogy of the several styles pointed out, and their various distinctions clearly shown.

In the work will be found notices and examples of the following styles:—Hindoo, Egyptian, Persian, Pelasgian, Celtic, Grecian, Roman, Early Italian, Byzantium, Gothic, and Modern. Although there is great difficulty in extracting from such a work, as most of the remarks refer to the plates, we shall endeavour to give one or two specimens of the author's style and feeling. Under the head, "Hindoo style," and speaking of the ruins of the excavated Kailasa at Ellora, he makes the following just observations:—

"Having completed our description, we will endeavour to account for the feeling of admiration that seizes the spectator. What can it be which thus strikes the mind and fills it with ecstasy? It is not the height of the monument—its forms are heavy and flat; it is not the extreme regularity of the lines—the unevenness of the ground has, in some instances, done violence to the principles of art; it is not variety of design, as everything affects a square figure; it is not the number of ornaments, for they are too profusely lavished. But it is that the vast ensemble of the performance bears witness to the power of man, and gives birth to a just feeling of pride in the spectator of these almost superhuman efforts. He applauds the genius of the artist who commanded the strong mass to square itself into chapels and pillars, to embody itself in sculptures, to part asunder, and open into spacious halls and porticoes. The rock was obedient to his word, and the sovereign intelligence of man shines in every part, whatever imperfections he may discover on criticising it as a work of art. The uniformity of the lines is calculated to diffuse a religious calm over the mind; the variety of the ornaments distracts and agitates it. If the low ceilings do not raise it to its God, it would seem that, in weighing upon it, they make the presence of the Deity more acutely sensible. A single being, under multifarious forms, is the grand mystery of the Indian religion, and this mystery is in a manner exemplified by this monument, which combines with its systematic unity so great a multiplicity of details. Whatever the thought of its author may have been, the hardihood of the undertaking, the skill shown in its arrangement, the spirit of its execution, surprise, delight, and enchant the beholder. Such has been the effect produced even on European travellers, that they all agree in saying it must be seen to be appreciated."

It is quite impossible to make extracts that will give entire satisfaction to our readers; this arises from so much of the literary portion of the work being descriptive of and referring to the illustrations; but we can the better appreciate the text by the accompanying engravings. The reader is, therefore, referred to the work itself, and assuredly much delight he must derive from it.

In speaking of the Church of the Invalides, at Paris, the author makes a just observation:—"After the cupola of St. Peter's at Rome had been executed in all its vastness by the glorious and no less vast genius of Michael Angelo, that structure became the object of imitation for all architects, and the despair of all who were engaged in similar enterprises. It was almost impossible that their could be any opportunity of rivaling the extent, height, or majesty of the Basilica of St. Peter. Merely to copy, on a smaller scale, what had already been executed in such gigantic proportions, would only have appeared a poor imitation. But Mansart, in the dome of the Invalides, and Sir Christopher Wren, in the St. Paul's Cathedral, have successfully differed from that grand model, at least in the internal arrangements."

As we have already said, extract is most difficult from such a work as the one under notice; it is not, however, at all difficult to speak in terms of decided approbation. The work was wanted—of that there can be no doubt—first, on the score of expense, and again as a means of economising the time of the student. It has another merit, and this we consider peculiar to it, viz., that of bringing together in a reasonable and readable space all the known styles of architecture, and noticing the points of difference and of agreement. No one need be in ignorance respecting the peculiarities of each style so long as this work is within his reach; and in reference to this we must again point out how much the value of the work is augmented by the plates. These are done with the utmost care—not only perspective views of the most celebrated buildings in the world, but ground plans and sections of them, making the work valuable as a practical guide as well as of general interest.

From the tone of the above remarks our opinion of the work may be gathered; but how much more pleasure will it give us, when in a succeeding part we get the views of its author upon the monuments of our own country, more especially upon those venerable cathedrals of which Englishmen have so much cause to be proud.

We must not conclude without mentioning that the work is well "got up," forming a most handsome drawing-room accompaniment. It is clearly printed, and is a most elegant quarto.

A FABLE AFTER GAY.

High on a tree were perch'd two rooks
Of thoughtful mien and solemn looks;
With gravity, one op'd his beak,
And to his friend commenced to speak:—
"I've much employed of late my mind
In contemplating humankind;
And 'tis with wonderment I trace
Amongst that reasoning biped race
Two kinds of beings—one quite sleek,
And portly too, with ruddy cheek;
The other sort are wasted, lean,
And hungry starvelings. 'Tis not seen
That other creatures thus display
So strange a contrast. Speak, I pray—
Explain the reason, if you can,
Of this phenomenon in man."
The other thus:—"The reason's clear
Why this division should appear:
Brutes as we are, by instinct led,
We feed where Providence has spread
With gen'rous, not with niggard, hand
Her teeming bounties o'er the land;
We're therefore never seen to bear
The marks of want, or wasting care;
But men, who boast of reason, wit,
Observe, are in two parties split—
Of protectors, and protectees!"
"Oh!" cried the first, "I now with ease
Discern the cause; the pampered set—Oh, lucky dogs!—protection get."
"Hold!" cried the other, "there you're wrong,
'Tis the cadaverous sallow throng—
The hunger smitten, wasted crew,
Whose wretchedness appals the view—
Who are protected; and by laws
Which strictly charge that empty craw
Shall not be filled where grain is found
In most abundance on the ground,
But point to barren fields indeed,
Where these protected ones shall feed.
And think you not, if such a plan
As this, that's so employed by man—
If, amongst us rooks, a privileged few
Had power to say to me or you,
'Here you may dine, but there refrain,
Nor touch the tempting, golden grain,
Our rounded crops would soon collapse
(May we ne'er suffer such mishaps)—
Our shining coats would soon grow dim—
Our looks be haggard, lean, and grim—
By former friends would scarce be known
Such specimens of skin and bone?
If rooks should sanction such vile laws,
To call us geese there would be cause;
And rooks, like men, would then be seen Divided into fat and lean."
"Friend," cried the first, "you've op'd my eyes,
I thought that man was wondrous wise;
But if so vilely he can act—
If what you now relate be fact—
Why, then," he said with upturned look,
"I bless my stars that I'm a rook!"

CHARITY OF THE MONOPOLISTS.—The pseudo-benevolent harangues, who have talked so volubly of philanthropy and charity to the workhouse poor, and out-door relief, have utterly mistaken the matter. They have been generously disposed, not at their own expense, but at the expense of the working classes of England; for we defy them to show any mode of obtaining contributions to the poor-rates, except through the work of the workers. The whole food of England has to be produced by the agency of the brains and arms of the workers, whether from English or foreign soil. This total amount has to be divided amongst the whole population in larger and smaller shares, and it must be obvious to the shallowest capacity, that if the whole of the workers ceased to work, there would be no food to divide; and it must follow, as the night the day, that the greater the number of supernumeraries who do not work, the harder must be the work of the workers, in order to maintain them. Therefore the charitable gentlemen who are non-workers, and cry out lustily for full rations and out-door allowances to paupers or poor non-workers, are, with very great ease to themselves, calling upon the workers to work harder than before. And when, as it frequently happens, these very charitable gentlemen are the advocates of artificial high prices for provisions, in the form of Corn Laws—that is to say, when they seek to diminish the total amount of food—our indignation at their injustice is only restrained by our contempt for their pauper-like ignorance.—Westminster Review.

VALUE OF NEWSPAPERS.—A thousand times have we heard this question and answer. Two gentlemen meet: "What's the news?" asks one; "Nothing but what you see in the papers." They pass on about their business. Has it ever been noticed that, among the thousand benefits of a newspaper, not the least is, that it does away at once with the tittle-tattle gossip, street-yarn foolish exaggerations, scandal, and news-mongering, which once took up so much of the time of those who were always hearing or telling some new thing. One real evil of social life is thus ended. The man rises in the morning, looks over the paper, and is satisfied that he knows all that is worth knowing of the passing history of the world. He has nothing to tell and nothing to hear further. He does not spend his time in giving information which his neighbour knows as well as himself. He is not annoyed in the midst of his business or pleasures by the recital of affairs in which he takes no interest. The same with women. Curiosity is gratified without loss of time. The scandal of the day has not employed a hundred busy meddling tongues in its circulation and exaggeration. Conversation takes a higher tone. Principles of morals and taste are discussed; the new poem, the last book, the magazine, or the review becomes the subject of conversation. Even in the minor matters of life, society owes a large debt of gratitude to the newspaper.—Manchester Courier.

EXTRACTS FROM THE IMPORTS.—Some of the articles imported into this country are rather curious in their nature, as the following items will show. Thus, among the skins imported and paying duty towards the revenue are enumerated those of cats. In the half-year ending the 5th of January, 1842, no fewer than 2096 "undressed cat-skins" were admitted, paying £9 3s. 3d. duty; in the half-year ending the 5th of January, 1843, 981 skins, paying £3 19s. duty; and in the half-year ending the 5th of January, 1844, 601 cat-skins. Thus, the fur of the feline race seems to be going down in the market! Two pounds of candle-wick have been imported in the same three half-years, paying a duty of 1s. 8d. and upwards of 500 tons of bulrushes, exclusive of 248 loads in the first of the three half-years! Again, there have been imported, during the same periods, no fewer than 36,000 lbs. of waste paper, paying nearly £1000 duty; and some £1600's worth of slate-pencils, paying nearly £300 duty! About £350 was derived as duty from ships imported to be broken up, during the like half years; and nearly 600 dog-skins were also imported "in the hair!" Such are a few of the curiosities of the import lists of this great commercial country, showing that there is nothing so trifling or apparently useless from which commerce does not manage to derive some advantage.—Manchester Guardian.

NON-EMPLOYMENT OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.—A parochial meeting was held recently at Brill. The chief business was "to take into consideration the serious amount of the parish poor-law expenditure." The statements made show the small amount of labour employed on land in that place. An order or call had been made on the parish by the union for £275, which was nearly 2s. in the pound on the assessment of the parish. This amount the overseers stated they could not collect in the time allowed. It appeared that scarcely any labour had been or was now employed on the land by several of the occupiers. This had caused the pressure on the poor-rates. It was stated that a large farmer in the parish had not a man employed on his farm, and that 100 acres of the best land in the place, which would be asked £300 a year for, did not employ a labourer. Other similar statements as to the non-employment of labour were made. With what grace can farming monopolists ask for agricultural protection on the plea of its being to protect agricultural labourers?—Globe.

FOREIGN BARLEY.—From a return moved for by Mr. E. Wodehouse, the member for East Norfolk, it appears that the total quantities of foreign barley imported into the principal ports of Great Britain from the 4th of January to the 22nd of May, 1844, amounted to 221,481 quarters, of which 202,327 quarters were entered for home consumption at the same ports, the amount of duty received thereon having amounted to the sum of £55,336,—a tolerably handsome contribution to the quarter's revenue. The average price of barley for the regulation of the duty during the period in question only fluctuated between £1 12s. and £1 13s. 5d. per quarter. The countries from which the importations have been received are not exhibited in the accounts transmitted from the ports at weekly intervals, and cannot, therefore, be shown for the whole of the above period; but for a portion of that period, during which 38,410 quarters were imported, it appears that 25,636 quarters were imported from Denmark, 4700 quarters from Prussia, and 7395 quarters from Germany.

MONOPOLIST HYPOCRISY.—There was much talk before the late election about the liberality of certain noble lords and squires who had made proclamation to their slave-tenants that on this occasion they really might be free. But their notion of freedom was of a very curious character. It has oozed out that, while liberty was thus publicly announced, private circulars were sent to each individual of the emancipated, stating that although his lordship or his squireship would, in this instance, use no compulsion, yet it would be regarded as a particular and personal favour if the tenant would oblige them by voting for the Monopolist candidate. Such monstrous hypocrisy as this was never before heard of. In future let all such gentry administer the black dose of compulsion without the mockery of such disguise. The effort to gild the pill only makes it more nauseous to those who know and feel that they are obliged to swallow it. Liverpool Chronicle.

CORN LAWS IN THE OLDEN TIME.—Mrs. Margaret Paston, writing to her son, Sir John, in the reign of Edward IV., complains of the low price of wheat (2s. or 2s. 2d. for two bushels), and that the market was kept down by "the king's command that there should none go out of the land!" Thus, then, four centuries ago, the exportation of wheat was forbidden by the sovereign, that it might be cheap. Its importation is now restricted, that it may be dear.

WHO ARE THE FARMERS' BEST CUSTOMERS?—Within the last few days large droves of horned cattle have passed through Lancaster from the north, destined for the markets of Preston, Manchester, Rochdale, Bolton, and other manufacturing towns famous for those "tall chimneys," on which the landed monopolists have lately been expending vials of their wrath, but for which their rent-rolls would not have yielded half their present revenue.—Lancaster Guardian.

BENEFITS OF COMMERCIAL RECIPROCITY.—At Paris, in the best appointed houses and at dinners, which for costly materials and admirable art in their preparation could not be surpassed, the effect is always considerably lessened, and by a mode the most mortifying—by the mere circumstance that every one at a French dinner is served on a cold plate. The reason of a custom, or rather a necessity, which one would think a nation so celebrated for its gastronomical taste would repel, is really, it is believed, that the ordinary French porcelain is so very inferior that it cannot endure the preparatory heat for dinner. The common white pottery, for example, which is generally used, and always found at the cafés, will not bear vicinage to a brisk kitchen fire for half an hour. Now, if we only had that treaty of commerce with France which had been so often on the point of completion, the fabrics of our unrivalled potteries, in exchange for their capital wines, would be found throughout France. The dinners of both nations would be improved; the English would gain a delightful beverage; and the French, for the first time in their lives, would dine off hot plates. An unanswerable instance of the advantages of commercial reciprocity!—Gleanings, or the New Generation.

THE AGRICULTURISTS NUMBERED IN THE COUNTY OF EDINBURGH.

At the recent meetings of the "lairds" and farmers, both in this county and in East Lothian, reference was made to the supposed dependence of the city of Edinburgh, and the other towns within the county, on the prosperity of what is called the agricultural interest; which was alleged to be all-important in this quarter, where there are no manufactures, whatever it might be elsewhere. It was not possible satisfactorily to dispose of their assertions until the classified details of the census of 1841 should be laid before Parliament. This has not yet been done, but we have procured privately, from an authentic source, a copy of the abstract for the county of Edinburgh, which is about to be printed as a parliamentary paper. It is a valuable and curious document, and ought to make the "lairds" ashamed of the miserable minority of the county population, which can be properly included within their favourite designation of "the agricultural interest."

It appears from this abstract that, excluding women and children, there are 91,711 other persons resident within the county (including the city and the towns) following occupations which have all been ascertained, with the exception of those of 438 individuals, returned—"occupations not specified." Now, of the ascertained number following occupations (91,273), only 6465 belong to the agricultural classes, namely—"farmers, graziers, and yeomen, 656," and "agricultural labourers, 5809." Thus the agriculturists form only about seven per cent., and those who are not agriculturists, about ninety-three per cent. of the entire number ascertained to follow occupations! It is true that, in this calculation, landowners are not included on either side; for, as Mr. Cobden happily remarked on a recent occasion, the owners of land have no more right to be called agriculturists than the owners of ships have to be called sailors. But waiving this objection, and adding those who subsist wholly or mainly on the rents of lands to the agricultural population, the aggregate results will not be materially altered; for even supposing that there were two landowners residing within the county, for every individual of the class described as "farmers, graziers, and yeomen," which must be greatly above the truth, the total number would only be 1312. Adding these to the real agricultural population of 6465, the aggregate number would be 7777. But there must also be a large addition made on the other side, as we shall presently show.

The number of persons residing within the county and city who, without following any profession or trade, subsist entirely on their real estate—including owners of property, annuitants, persons living upon dividends arising from bank and other stocks, pensions, and other sources of income—is very large in proportion to the population, probably larger than in any part of the kingdom, unless the county of Middlesex be an exception. The different classes referred to are all included in the return under one head, "persons of independent means," and amount to 8634, in addition to the persons following occupations, amounting, as before stated, to 91,273. Thus the "persons of independent means" form 8634, out of a population of 99,907, being upwards of eight and a half per cent. If these "persons of independent means" be added to the non-agricultural population, as in justice they ought to be,—with the exception of the landowning portion, estimated as before at 1312, and added to the agriculturists,—the general result will be as follows:

Males ascertained to belong to the agricultural classes 7,777
Males ascertained not to belong to the agricultural classes 92,130

Total of both classes 99,907

The above statement shows that, even after adding all the landowners residing within the county and city of Edinburgh to the farmers and agricultural labourers, the united agricultural population is only about seven and a half per cent., while the non-agricultural population is nearly ninety-two and a half per cent. of the population!

In addition to the above numbers, there are included in the return "alms people and paupers" 2513; and "persons not described," 1057; "occupations not specified," as before mentioned, 438; making in all 103,915. Then there is a sweeping item "residue of population, including women and children," 121,539, making the total population of the county 225,454, being an increase of only 6109 since the census of 1831. This is only about two per cent. in ten years, while the general increase for Scotland has been eleven per cent. during the same period.

The census returns, if analysed in a similar manner for all the counties, will show that the agriculturists—in place of forming, as the monopolists affirm, five-sevenths of the entire population—are a mere fraction of the population; and even that fraction, small as it is, would (with the exception, perhaps, of 30,000 landowners) be greatly benefited by the abolition of the Corn Laws and all other monopolies, as would all the rest of the population of the kingdom.—Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle.

MONTHLY CORN CIRCULAR.—The following is an extract from the "Corn Circular" of the Messrs. Sturge for the present month:—"Birmingham, 6th month 5th, 1844. With the exception of a slight fall of rain about a week ago, the weather has been almost uninterruptedly fine the whole of the past month, and as the drought has now lasted for nearly ten weeks it has occasioned serious, and in some cases irreparable, injury to the crops of grass and spring grain; but on the good soils the wheat continues to have a favourable appearance; in many instances, however, where the land is either inferior or the plant was not in a sufficiently forward state to cover the ground before the dry weather set in, it is looking very sickly and unhealthy; and as much of the past two months has been cold as well as dry, and the thermometer has occasionally been below the freezing point in the night, the prospects at present are not favourable either for an abundant or early wheat harvest. The supply of this grain from our farmers during the month has been about adequate to the demand, and though the stocks in the hands of our millers continue, we believe, very light, our prices have given way 1s. to 2s. per quarter, as compared with the commencement of last month. Our imports into Gloucester since that period have been considerable, yet there is but little free now offering, and we have an increased demand for the finer qualities. Most of our arrivals are Polish Oatmeal from the Black Sea, with a few cargoes from the Baltic. A considerable portion is imported on millers' account, who are not at present disposed to pay the duty. Our present prices are 7s. to 7s. 4½d. per 60lb. for Polish;

Dantz, 7s. 6d. to 7s. 9d.; hard Russian, 5s. 8d. to 6s. 6d. per 60lb. at Gloucester. The recent advices from the shipping ports, which offer the most favourable prospects for investment for the English market, are Dantz mixed and high mixed, 32s. to 37s. per quarter, on board; Odessa Polish, 26s. to 28s. free on board; though there is little if any margin for profit at the above quotations, we are still of the judgment that, without a more early and abundant harvest than present appearances warrant, the expectation of the prospect of an advance in wheat is much greater than that of a decline in price. Although the arrivals of oats into Gloucester during the past month have altogether been large, we have had a brisk sale, and their values advanced 1s. to 2s. per quarter. There is no reason to expect that the growing crops of this grain in Ireland have yet been materially injured by the weather; but the certainty that the crop of hay must in many districts be very light, and that there will be a greatly increased consumption of oats in consequence, has created a general belief that all the remaining stock of old Irish oats will be required, with probably a considerable import of foreign, before the new crop can be brought to market. Our present quotations are 21s. 6d. for light—22s. for heavy Irish, at Gloucester. The bean crop is supposed to have suffered more than any other from the drought, and as they are in many places now in blossom, with the stalk not one foot in length, no change of weather can in such cases render them productive. They have advanced in price since our circular of the 1st ult. about 4s. per quarter, and as it is now not improbable that the duty will recede to 5s. 6d. per quarter, if not below that point, the samples of beans in bond have generally been withdrawn from the market. The same causes which create an increased demand for oats apply equally to beans. Egyptian have sold at 22s. per imperial quarter in bond, and 34s. per quarter, free; Irish at 14s. 9d. to 15s. 3d. free; English 15s. 6d. to 16s. 6d. per 196lb. at Gloucester."

One of the principal arguments which the advocates for the Corn Laws urge for their maintenance is, that their repeal would give a serious blow to the interests of the wealthiest portions of the community; it would thus deprive the home trader of his best, most numerous, and surest customers. This is, in fact, saying that it is better to give your money to another person to spend, instead of spending it yourself—an argument which refutes itself.—Falmouth Packet.

No cause can hold its ground after it has given up its defence by argument. It is true that it may be a long time before argument finds its way into the necessary places; but this is no more than an inevitable consequence of the structure of a representative government like ours. Knowledge, like everything else, must take root downwards and bear fruit upwards; and it would be a most odd and unreasonable demand that should expect the representative to find wisdom for the represented. The people must first be wise, that they may choose representatives of like quality. When every man, and woman, and grown child in the lower and middle ranks have been for twelve months conversant with all the mystery of Corn Laws, it will be quite time enough to expect any appearance of substantial transference into the council of their representatives. As soon, however, as any such transference shall take place, strong hopes may be indulged, from the rapidity with which representatives are known to be illuminated on points where a great mass of public opinion is brought to bear.—Colonel Thompson's Exercises.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK LANE, Monday, June 10.—The supply of English Wheat this morning was moderate, the trade was not withstanding dull the best qualities were more difficult of disposal, and inferior descriptions were 1s. cheaper than this day week. There was a fair demand for Foreign in small quantities at last week's rates. With very little Barley fresh up, all descriptions met a ready sale at 1s. advance. There was a rather better supply of English Beans, and the prices of this day week were with difficulty obtained. Peas were 1s. dearer. A considerable number of vessels arrived from Ireland since Friday with Oats; there has been a large sale, chiefly of the lighter qualities, at last week's rates. But little rain has fallen in this neighbourhood during the past week. S. H. Lucas and Son.

Ab-

THE LEAGUE.

No. 39.]

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive a copy, weekly, of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND, are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

REGISTER, REGISTER, REGISTER!

The Free-Traders qualified to vote must everywhere prepare to enrol themselves and their friends on the register for the NEXT year.

To entitle a voter to be registered, he must have occupied during the twelve months previous to the 31st of July, premises of the value of £10 a year. He must have been rated for twelve months to the relief of the poor.

He must have paid, on or before the 20th of July, all poor-rates and assessed taxes due to the 6th of April preceding.

Further information and directions will be furnished on application, personally or by letter, to the Local Registration Societies; to Mr. Sulney Smith, 68, Cheapside, London; or to Mr. Hickin, League Offices, Newall's Buildings, Manchester.

For the convenience of individuals whose avocations render it difficult for them to call at the Registration Office, 68, Cheapside, during business hours, arrangements have been made by which attendance will be given every evening at that office until eight o'clock, to fill up and serve claims, and to supply every information relative to Parliamentary registration for counties, cities, and boroughs.

PARTY TACTICS.

While the League pursues, singly and undeviatingly, the great object for which it is constituted, an instructive contrast is presented to the public in the doublings and windings of party tactics. The last few days have elicited this contrast with unusual strength.

The debate on the Import Duties, brought on by Lord Montagu in the House of Lords last Thursday week, furnished occasion for an elaborate leading article in the Morning Chronicle. After some rough handling, exceedingly well deserved, of the Duke of Richmond, who has impressed upon the memories of all the very ridiculous figure he cut on that occasion, the Chronicle concludes thus, advertising to agricultural protection:—

"If it were right and safe to go on under the present system, the Duke of Richmond and the farmers might fairly demand a twenty years' lease of it. They cannot rely upon its continuance for half that number of months, nor be sure at any seed time that it will last over the harvest, and therefore they ought at once to seek for security in its abolition. If once the trade in corn were FREE, it might be left safely to the landed interest to insist upon such inquiries as that proposed by Lord Montagu, and, as a necessary consequence, to make protection in every shape a matter of history."

This is very plain. The tone and language are those of a thorough-going Free-Trader. "Abolition" of the Corn Laws is the remedy prescribed, and not the substitution of a fixed duty for a sliding scale. The desirable state of the corn trade is said, without qualification, to be its freedom; and the writer anticipates the making "protection in every shape a matter of history." A hope as decidedly opposed to any fixed duty, however low, as to any sliding scale, however high.

So spake the organ of the Whigs on the subject of Lord Montagu's motion: We will not add, so thought that organ, at the time its words went forth to the public. The article in question was written upon the debate of Thursday night in the House of Lords. Meanwhile there had been another debate, in the other House, on the Friday night, to which it makes no allusion, and of the result of which the writer was evidently unaware when he put pen to paper. We give the quotation, therefore, as illustrative of the spirit of the Morning Chronicle on Saturday morning.

In the very next publication, that of Monday, we have a jeering allusion to the possibility of an "immediate alliance" between the League and Sir Robert Peel. "It would be a great thing to have an ex-Premier in the chair next spring at Covent-garden, agitating against the moderate fixed duty of the Whigs, and in confraternity with the gentlemen whose abstract principles were too refined on Friday night for so plain a motion as that of Mr. Miles."

Unless the "abstract principles" which provoked Monday's sneer be the "abolition" of protection, "in every shape," which is the theme of Friday's laudation, we confess we know not where to look for them. Jim Crow never twirled more rapidly. "Fair is foul and foul is fair." The celerity with which black becomes white, and white becomes black, rivals the magic changes wrought by the wand of Herr Dobler.

As "this effect defective comes by cause," where can we look for explanation but to intervening events? Between the composition of the first article and of the second, Sir Robert Peel had been left in a minority. He had been beaten by a "combination" (out of doors it might have been called a conspiracy) of Whigs and Monopolists. The Tapers and Tadpoles of Opposition—for Opposition has its Tapers and Tadpoles too—dreamed that night of Downing-street. A breach had been made in the Treasury outworks, through which it was hoped the mingling banners of Miles and Russell might be borne, heading a triumphant march into the citadel itself. "Lads, throw away your lumber, and prepare to charge," cried the officer of an advanced guard, in presence of the enemy, during the Peninsular war. Away went the soldiers' knapsacks; and, just as briskly, away go the Chronicle's "abolition" and hostility to protection in every shape, as it prepares to charge Sir Robert Peel with "the moderate fixed duty of the Whigs."

When Downing-street seems at an indefinite distance; when the Ministerial cohorts stand to their arms; when the very idea of a majority is a chimera, then go all lengths with the League; then claim fraternity with Free-Traders; then assume the leading of the popular mind, and threaten to pitch monopoly "into the middle of next week," or rather of last week, and make all its shapes only "matter of history."

But when the coach may be upset by monopolist help; when Miles and majority have mingled into one idea; when the Premier talks of resigning, and the Sovereign thinks of sending; when another shape of "Protection" may heal old grievances and solder new alliances; then, abstract all praise from "abstract principles," abolish the thought of total "abolition," hold up the sugar-plum of unchanging bread-tax for Monopoly to lick its lips at, and evoke Fixed Duty from its grave like the ghost of the Cid for the discomfiture of the Infidels.

We might apostrophize the Chronicle in the language of Lord Byron to Napoleon:—"Ill-minded man, why scourge thy kind?" The squashed (on Friday) Duke of Richmond is quite open to treat on a "moderate fixed duty." The Agricultural Societies have carefully guarded themselves against any serious difficulty on that score. In the resolutions by which they are constituted, the definition of the object generally is "to maintain protection to British agriculture not less than at present existing." There is little care about the form in which it comes, so that it come in satisfactory quantity. The difference of form has, in fact, pretty nearly disappeared from the Free-Trade controversy. The struggle is with "protection in every shape," as the Chronicle so well knew in what it printed on Saturday, and so totally forgot in what it published on Monday. What an oblivion of earthly things must have come over its spirit in the sacred interval: a dream of the golden gates of the New Jerusalem.

So far, then, as the Chronicle interprets correctly the Whig leaders, we know what we have to expect. There is no indisposition to propitiate the landowners by a bread-tax, but merely some nicety as to the form. The quantum of help to be rendered in the Free-Trade agitation can easily be calculated.

It is in the inverse ratio of the prospect of power and place. With all its shrewdness, this is purblind policy. It gives us a direct interest in the remoteness of the Whigs from office. Let their chance be desperate, and we fight side by side; let their hope be bright, and our late comrades favour our ranks with a volley.

A straightforward course would really be more promising. Let them carry out fully the principles they profess: only a popular tide can bear them back to their old seats, or keep them there. Consistency and policy are for them the same. Their fixed duty was avowedly a compromise, not a principle: it was a rejected compromise. An honourable path is before them, with every indication of eventual success. Nor will we despair of them on the evidence of the Morning Chronicle. Only by themselves shall they be condemned; and right glad shall we be to find them nobly vindicated by themselves. Mr. Villiers's motion comes on next Tuesday.

THE SUGAR DUTIES DEBATE.

The merits of this subject have been so fully discussed in other parts of our present number that further comments are unnecessary. In fact, the intrinsic merits of the question have been studiously evaded by those organs of the Whig party which have assailed the votes of the Free-Traders, on mere party grounds. Our answer to these attacks must be, the simple reiteration, for the hundredth time, that the League is of no political party; an assertion which we hope will require no confirmation with Tories or Whigs after the proofs afforded by the division lists of Friday and Monday. One word only upon the pitiful attempts made to identify the maintenance of the present Ministry in power with the votes of the Free-Traders, and the still baser effort to weaken the influence of the League in certain quarters by insinuating that its members have, by preserving the Ministry of Sir Robert Peel, prevented the liberation of Mr. O'Connell. There must be conscious demerit on the side of a party which seeks to evade the real question at issue by a resort to such fabulous charges. Our answer is—let Lord John Russell move a resolution of want of confidence in the present Ministry: that would be the fair and direct mode of testing how far the Free-Traders acquiesce in the general policy of the Government. If he will not take this step, his partisans of the press and the Reform Club should at least be prevented from venting their harmless spite upon those who refuse to support a motion, which the Whigs pretend to interpret as one of confidence in Sir Robert Peel, but which dispassionate men, beyond the influence of the clubs and cliques of Pall-mall, will view as a simple question of more or less protection to the West Indian monopolists.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

Nineteenth Week, ending Saturday, June 22.

In last week's "Mirror" we intimated the then impending defeat of the Government on the Sugar Duties; but having been obliged to "go to press" before the event occurred, we were unable to record the fact itself. It took place late on Friday night, or rather early on Saturday morning; and as no little political turmoil has arisen out of it, we shall resume our explanatory narrative at the point where it was broken off last week.

Up till Friday morning there was a general understanding that the amendment (a copy of which is given in last "Mirror") proposed by Mr. Philip Miles would be supported by the whole Liberal party, the Free-Traders included, on the simple ground that it would effect a greater reduction of duties than the Government proposition; but on that morning the attention of those members of the House who are more or less connected with the Anti-Corn-Law League was drawn more particularly to the terms of the amendment. The Government proposed 24s. on colonial, 34s. on free foreign; the amendment 20s. on colonial, 30s. on free foreign brown, muscovado, or clayed. But—and it is important to mark the "but"—the amendment added, that "foreign white clayed, or any foreign sugar otherwise prepared, and equivalent to white clayed," should pay the 34s. duty. This looked suspicious. What was "white clayed" sugar? and what proportion did it bear in amount to the whole quantity of free foreign which might come into our market? Raw or muscovado sugar is the common moist or brown sugar of the shops; clayed sugars are raw sugars which have undergone a process of filtration by water through clay, by which more or less of the colouring matter is removed. Claying is very little practised in the British plantations, from an opinion that the increase of labour and diminution of quantity of produce occasioned by it are not compensated by the improved quality of the sugar; besides which, the great business of refining sugar is carried on in England in a highly scientific way. But the sugars of Java and the Philippine Islands are chiefly clayed; and as these countries are the sources from which our supplies of free foreign are mainly to come, the amendment would practically have imposed a differential duty of fourteen shillings instead of ten, in favour of the West Indies. On this fact having been ascertained, by reference to merchants in the "City," the Free-Traders resolved to support the Government proposition, in opposition to the amendment, as being the better of the two. Neither was good on Free-Trade principles; and, therefore, had the amendment of Mr. Philip Miles been a bond fide reduction of duties, there could have been no hesitation which to choose, even though the proposal came from a monopolist. The fact, however, of Mr. Philip Miles being chosen as the mouth-piece of the West India interest, in opposition to the Government, came in confirmation of the other fact, that the amendment was a sinister one, and did not contemplate giving so great an advantage to the consumer as the Government proposed. In this state of things the pure Free-Traders in the House were placed in the somewhat awkward predicament of either voting with the Opposition against the Government, and in favour of practically a higher protection than the Government proposed; or of voting with the Government against the Opposition, and in favour of practically a lower amount of protection than the Opposition proposed. The latter course they adopted.

Mr. Philip Miles, in proposing his amendment, rated the Government very severely for their Free-Trade tendencies; and strongly insisted on "adequate" protection being given to the West Indies. The seconder of his amendment, Mr. Bailey, did the same thing, in even stronger terms. Both of them are young men—Mr. Philip Miles especially has a very youthful appearance—and it was certainly a little amusing to see and hear these juvenile protectionists scolding their seniors for their very naughty inclinations, in the way of enlarging the market supply for the benefit of the British consumer. The course which the Free-Traders would take was early indicated by Mr. Ewart, who, "however inclined to approve of reduction of duties, could not support the amendment. It proposed to create a differential duty of 14s. on the white clayed sugars, which constituted two-thirds of the amount imported, and on which the Government proposition only left 10s. The distinction, too, between brown and white clayed, if adopted with respect to foreign sugars, should also be introduced into our colonial."

To a similar effect spoke Mr. Bouverie: "Seeing that the amendment would create a differential duty of 14s. on the white clayed sugars of Java and Manila, he could not consent to give an additional bonus to the West India interest of 4s., which must come out of the pockets of the community, and be a direct loss to the revenue. All the sufferings of the West Indians had their origin in a system of protection, and it would be worth while trying what Free Trade would do for them."

Mr. Milner Gibson likewise had at first been disposed to view the amendment favourably, but, on consideration and inquiry, he found it was contrived as a trap for the Free-Traders. The West Indies, if the amendment were adopted, would receive practically a protection of 11s. The Government proposition was, therefore, of the two, the nearest to Free Trade. Being, however, anxious for a real reduction of duties, he asked if Mr. P. Miles would omit the 31s. on white clayed; if so he should have his support.

Mr. Ricardo, and Mr. H. Berkeley (the colleague of Mr. P. Miles in the representation of Bristol), plied the same question, but the mover of the amendment would not forego his "14s." Meantime, the great body of the Opposition, including Liberals of all shades of political opinion (exclusive of the absolute Free-Traders), supported the amendment; and the debate dragged on until the noise, confusion, and clamour for a division drowned all efforts to prolong the discussion. At this critical moment, foreseeing that the defection of the Free-Traders might affect the numbers, Lord Howick rose, and, amidst much confusion, explained to his honourable friends around him the nature of the vote they were now called upon to give. The question which would be put to them by the Chairman would be, that the words in the original motion proposed to be left out should stand part of the question. If the majority should negative those words, and thereby defeat the proposition of the Government, it would then be perfectly open to any gentleman who wished to make a proposition different from that which had been made by the honourable member for Bristol to move it. The question, therefore, upon which they were now about to vote, was not the amendment proposed by the honourable member for Bristol; but it was "ay" or "no," would they or would they not negative the plan of the Government? He (Lord Howick) believed that plan to be a bad one, and he should vote against it, without, however, pledging himself to adopt, without alteration, the suggestion of the hon. member for Bristol.

The House then divided—

Majority against the Government 20

The announcement of the division was received with loud cheers.

Lord Howick's adroit explanation had the effect of inducing a number of Free-Traders, as Mr. Ewart, Dr. Howling, and others, to vote for the amendment. It was quite true that the division was not for and against Mr. Miles's amendment. Technically, it was for and against the Government proposition, leaving the amendment or anything else to be afterwards proposed. But for all practical purposes, and according to common usage, the amendment was carried. There were but two propositions before the House: one, that by the Government, was rejected, and the Government were therefore defeated; the other, that by Mr. P. Miles, remained for adoption, and it was clear that no other amendment was likely to secure a similar combination in its favour.

Having been victorious, Mr. Philip Miles moved that the House, or rather the Committee (for the House was in Committee), should be adjourned till Monday, in order to give the Government time for consideration, probably thinking that, after its defeat, they might submit, and save all further trouble by adopting his amendment. Sir Robert Peel acquiesced; and the Committee on the Sugar Duties Bill was therefore postponed till Monday.

Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, there were Cabinet Councils, club meetings, much talk, and many rumours; but nobody treated as within the limits of probability, that, if Sir Robert Peel remained in office, he would call on the House of Commons to rescind its vote. When, therefore, Monday afternoon arrived, the House of Commons was crowded, in order to hear the Ministerial explanation. The first step was that Sir R. Peel moved that the House should go into Committee on the Sugar Duties Bill; which having been done, he proceeded to make his statement as to the view which was taken by the Government of the position in which it had been placed by the vote on Friday night. He commenced by sketching the policy which has been pursued by this country with respect to the slave trade and slavery, viewing it in the light of one of the greatest evils and curses of humanity. The chief onus of suppressing it had fallen on this country: for this we had made great sacrifices; and only last session an act was passed, more stringently preventing the employment of British capital in the trade, and, therefore, showing what was the whole tenor of our policy. Men of the most opposite opinions concurred in considering that, with reference to slavery, sugar should be taken out of the ordinary principles of commercial legislation. Hitherto our efforts to suppress the slave trade between the coast of Africa and Cuba and the Brazils, have been ineffectual; and to open the sugar trade between Great Britain and these countries would only aggravate the traffic and defeat their efforts. But by giving encouragement to the free-labour sugars of the Manillas, Java, and perhaps China, we would strike a blow at the slave trade, and ameliorate the condition of the slave, even if one consequence should be a slight stimulus to the production of slave-grown produce. The Government felt it necessary to decide, during the present year, on the course which they should adopt with respect to sugar; our treaty with the Brazils expires on the 10th of November next; and the reasons by which they were actuated in bringing in their present measure, and deferring a more general consideration of the subject till next year, were three. First, the income-tax expires next year, and the full operation of the tariff, which was imposed in conjunction with it, would not be distinctly ascertained till that time—as, for instance, the full reduction in the timber duties did not take effect till October last. This fact is to be taken along with the general revival of trade and industry, which, however gratifying, might not be permanent; if it were, next year would give them positive assurance. Second, there was the great financial operation, the reduction in the Three-and-a-Half per Cents., of which it was of great importance to secure the success; and the third reason was, that if the income-tax were renewed next year, a revision of the sugar duties would have been considered as one of the conditions of it. The indications of rising price, and the fear of a deficit supply, led the Government to introduce their present proposition; the sugar monopoly was the only one that remained (a voice, "Corn"); and they considered that, without detriment to the revenue, or injury to the West Indies, their measure was calculated to be of great advantage to the community at large. They wished to ascertain, before next year, if Parliament would sanction and establish the distinction between free labour and slave labour; and they adhered to their opinion that their own proposition was better than the one proposed by Mr. Philip Miles. The distinction which he had drawn between muscovado and white clayed sugars was one, if adopted, which ought also to be introduced into our colonies. After mature consideration, they could not adopt the amendment with the view of escaping from their difficulties, because they were of opinion that, while it would not benefit either the consumer or the West India interest, it would be detrimental to the revenue. To prove this he entered into details, taking the effect of the reduction on the timber duties by way of illustration; and then, pointing out that the amendment would create a differential duty of 14s. on certain sugars, while the Government measure only gave 10s., emphatically repeated that they would not escape from their difficulties by giving increased protection to the West Indies. He then read extracts from letters which he had received that morning, from individuals largely engaged in the sugar trade, in which the writers pointed out that, by adopting the higher duty on the white clayed sugars, great injury would be the consequence. There were sugar refineries established at Calcutta and in Demerara, which manufactured a refined sugar, which, while it would escape the duty on the white clayed, was largely superseding its use. Refusing to adopt the amendment on its commercial merits, neither could they adopt it on political grounds. It had been carried by a combination of a portion of the supporters of the Government with their political opponents, and, however unimportant the matter itself might be, it had an important bearing, as indicating a want of confidence in the Executive. He did not complain of the combination, though he believed it to have been preconcerted. (Cries of "No, no.") Members had a perfect right to act as they pleased; but if the Government acquiesced in the vote of Friday night, it would only be an encouragement to similar attempts. Though not disposed to take offence, he could not but complain of the harsh terms which Mr. Miles, and his seconder, Mr. Baillie, had used. The Government had been told to "throw off the mask," and they were accused of having struck a blow at Australia, by the reduction of the duty on wool—the fact being, that, a few days ago, the first sales of Australian wool since the reduction had been greater than ever before known. By the vote of Friday the Government proposition had been rejected; the amendment of Mr. Miles had yet to be proposed, and he would then give the House the opportunity of reconsidering their vote, by restoring the duty of 24s. on colonial sugar. After adverting to the general state of the legislative measures of the Government, and expressing his fears that the close of the present session would be marked, like the last one, by the abandonment of many of them, he lamented the want of cordiality between the Government and many of its usual supporters, but would not conciliate them by holding out the prospect of taking a different course. They had taken office with the view of not only maintaining, but of improving existing institutions, and of gradually relaxing the system of protection. They had been defeated in the House of Lords on a question which, though appearing isolated, was in reality not so; it was a portion of that ecclesiastical renovation which circumstances required. Seeing, therefore, that the policy of the Government was one of gradual improvement, and that they could not hold out any expectation of an alteration in it, he concluded by intimating that important consequences might be the result of the decision of the House.

Lord John Russell followed Sir Robert Peel, expressing his amazement at the overbearing conduct of the Prime Minister in asking the House of Commons to rescind on Monday what it had voted on Friday, and warning it against suffering itself to be degraded in the eyes of the country. This topic was the leading idea in the debate which ensued, and which lasted the entire night; but, as we have nothing to do here with PARTY POLITICS, we shall pass it all over, and simply give one speech, as the justification for the course which the Free-Traders pursued.

Mr. Milner Gibson would only occupy the attention of the House for a few moments, but he wished to explain the view he was constrained to take of the question before the House. It was said by some that the question simply was, whether the duty on colonial sugar ought to be 20s. or 24s., and many plausible reasons might be alleged to show that such was the question; but, reflecting on the real position of affairs, he had come to this conclusion—that the question before the House was between the extreme protection party and the Government of the right hon. baronet, which had brought forward a proposition for diminishing the protection to the West India interest. The question which an advocate of Free Trade ought to consider was this:—did the hon. member for Bristol call upon the House to give the country a larger measure of Free Trade than the Government? He (Mr. Milner Gibson) might be wrong, but that was the view he took of the subject. The noble member for London had talked of combinations and concerts, and had treated the present as a sort of party question on the Liberal side of the House. Was it anything of the kind? The noble lord did not invite support to a liberal measure of his own, proposing but to co-operate with those who had been most uncompromising and determined practically to defeat a measure, and a measure which was within reach. It was true that it was an imperfect measure, but it was looked upon as an improvement by the constituency he (Mr. M. Gibson) had the honour to represent, and by the great trading interests of the country. He admitted that he fell very short of what it ought to be, but, as far as he was competent to form an opinion, it was a practical reform within the reach of the House. The noble lord invited his friends to co-operate with their opponents; but he (Mr. M. Gibson) could not bring himself to believe that gentlemen complaining of the admission of some foreign sugar into competition, could possibly at this moment be proposing to admit more sugar. He was strongly disposed to think that the measure of the hon. member for Bristol was one of larger protection than that of the Government, for the former asked a differential duty of 14s., while the Government offered a protective duty of 10s. His (Mr. M. Gibson's) desire and inclination was to vote with the noble member for London, and, if he would bring forward a liberal measure of his own, no man would be more anxious to support the noble lord. It had been stated by the noble lord the member for the city of London, when he (Mr. M. Gibson) asserted that the 31s. duty on the white clayed sugar would apply to a large proportion of the foreign sugar which would come under the bill, that he had not been right in that assertion. Of course it was not from his own knowledge that he had made the assertion; but he had done so from the best authorities within his reach, and for his own gratification he would refer to one or two letters. ("Oh, oh," and "Read, read.") When a member's accuracy was attacked he had a right to do this, and he must either do it, or move that the chairman should report progress. (Read, read.) One letter was from Mr. Peter Martineau, a name well known as connected with the sugar trade, and a firm supporter of liberal principles.

"Goulstone-street, Whitechapel, June 17.

"DEAR SIR,—I am sorry that the Ministers' motion was not carried on Friday night, as the effect of Mr. Miles's motion will be to entail an additional protective duty of 4s. on a very large proportion of the foreign free-labour sugar admitted to consumption; for under the denomination of white clayed sugar, or sugar equivalent to white clayed, the public would have to pay a much higher percentage of protection than is levied under the Ministers' bill.

"I remain, yours truly,
"PETER MARTINEAU."

The next letter, which was to the same effect, was from a gentleman of opposite politics, also connected with the sugar trade, and what did he say?

"Goodman's Fields, June 17.

"MY DEAR SIR,—In answer to your inquiry, I have no hesitation in saying that it is my conviction that by far the greater part of the sugars proposed to be admitted in November next would, under Mr. Miles's amendment, be taxed at 34s. instead of 30s., as many seem to imagine.

"I am, my dear Sir,
"THOMAS HODGSON."

The next letter was, perhaps, from still better authority. Messrs. Thornton and Wests.

"Old Swan, London-bridge, June 17.

"DEAR SIR,—In answer to your application on the subject of Mr. Miles's proposition, we are decidedly of opinion that, if the differential duty between colonial sugar and sugar the produce of Java, Manilla, and Siam, exceeds 10s., the benefit contemplated by Sir Robert Peel will be in a great degree, if not altogether defeated.

"Mr. Miles, doubtless, intends to bring Java, Manilla, and Siam sugar under the denomination of white clayed, thereby rendering the duty 34s., and not 30s., which will operate most materially against the article being imported (to the degree which would otherwise be the case) for home consumption. We still trust, however, that Sir Robert's measure may be confirmed, without which we shall continue, as heretofore, and no benefit will result to foreign sugar the produce of free labour.

"We are, as you are aware, and have been for upwards of thirty years, the largest importers of Java sugar, hitherto invariably sold in bond, for exportation; and under Sir Robert's plan we certainly did hope for a ferent state of things, and we shall regret if Mr. Miles succeeds in upsetting the measure.—Believe us to remain, Dear Sirs, yours obediently,

“THORNTON AND WESTS.”

He had several other letters from men of different political opinions, to the same effect.* They all considered that the measure of the West India interest gave increased protection, and called upon the advocates for the abolition of all protection to support the best measure they could get. He must, therefore, call upon the noble lord not to throw out a taunt against them for acting inconsistently. (Oh, oh.) They were simply desirous of procuring for the country the best measure within their reach, and did not wish to offer any opposition to the noble lord. (Hear.)

When the galleries were cleared for a division the result was—

| For Mr. Miles's proposition of 20s. on colonial sugar | 233 |
| Against it | 255 |
| Majority against | 22 |

The announcement of the numbers, practically rescinding the vote of Friday night, was marked by cheers, and Mr. Miles said that he would, after so decided an expression of opinion, abandon his proposition.

On Thursday night, the House of Commons was occupied the whole evening in discussing the Sugar Duties Bill in committee. We shall not, however, at present, make any remarks on the debate, reserving the subject for fuller observation next week, when the bill will have made farther progress through the Legislature. But we cannot avoid noticing the fact, that Mr. Thomas Duncombe could not allow the bill to go through committee without an attack on the eleven members of the House, who, as Free-Traders, supported the Government. He called them “Tory tools.” The matter, however, is not worth noticing: because, in his speech, Mr. Thomas Duncombe displayed entire ignorance of the whole question of the Sugar Duties—an ignorance which Sir Robert Peel did not miss exposing; and because Mr. Thomas Duncombe has on all occasions, as far as he durst, endeavoured to damage the Free-Trade movement.

MEETINGS.

AGGREGATE WEEKLY MEETING OF THE LEAGUE AT COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

The usual aggregate weekly meeting of the members and friends of the National Anti-Corn-Law League was resumed on Wednesday evening at Covent-garden Theatre. Mr. George Wilson, the Chairman of the Council, presided.

The theatre was extremely crowded, and the proceedings of the evening were characterised by a degree of enthusiasm seldom equalled. The following gentlemen, among others, were observed upon the platform:—

Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., Thomas Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P., J. L. Ricardo, Esq., M.P., General Briggs, the Rev. Thomas Spencer (of Hinton Charterhouse, near Bath), W. J. Fox, Esq., Colonel Tucker, George Thompson, Esq., the Rev. Dr. Lavis, Rev. Mr. Roberts (of New Bedford, Massachusetts), Professor Wright (Boston, United States), the Rev. Dr. Jenkins (Coward College), Summers Harford, Esq., William Felkin, Esq., F.R.S., &c. &c., Professor Key, the Rev. J. Edwards (Nottingham), Messrs. John Rawsthorne (Manchester), W. D. Starling (Stourbridge), J. D. Cummings, Thomas Hoyle (Rochdale), Crew (Shelley-house, Essex), H. Warland, R. Palmer, H. T. Stanton, John Bloor (Lutbury, Derbyshire), Samuel Lucas, W. A. Wilkinson, A. Bauer, Frederick Farrand, J. P. Barnard, Sidney Kennedy, P. A. Taylor, Thomas Carman, J. Carlton, T. Johnson (Sunderland), Samuel Rogers (Isle of Man), Duff (Isle of Man), Garrett, jun. (Isle of Man), William Lear, Press Granger, Oliver Wilcocke, W. Thornorow, M. Curtis (Manchester), J. Ridge, Charles Cobby, George Dully (Newbury), J. Elkin, John McCall, D. Jonassohn, George Wood, W. Gessin, John Howarth (Rochdale), W. G. Thompson, A. Tomlinson, Thomas Thornton, and Edward William Gray (Newbury).

At half-past seven o'clock the Chairman entered the theatre, accompanied by Mr. Cobden, M.P., Mr. Milner Gibson, M.P., and several other distinguished advocates of Free Trade.

The CHAIRMAN called on the Secretary to read the minutes of the last meeting, which having been done, upon the motion of Mr. George Thompson, seconded by Mr. Milner Gibson, M.P., they were unanimously confirmed.

The CHAIRMAN then again came forward, and said:—Ladies and gentlemen, we have again assembled to discuss the great and unredressed grievances which monopoly, the parent of scarcity, is still inflicting upon the industry of this country (cheers); and to express our hostility to its longer continuance, and the fixed purpose and determination of the League to increase its efforts, if possible, to secure its speedy and final overthrow. (Great cheering.) Before we meet again, our excellent friend Mr. Villiers (applause) will, in furtherance and in promotion of the objects of Free Trade, introduce this question for the consideration and decision of the House of Commons. We shall not now stay to inquire the probable decision which the House will give with respect to that motion—it is sufficient for us to know that, after their election to Parliament for the purpose of upholding and continuing monopoly, the rank and file of monopolists—those who would sacrifice every other interest in this country to their own interest—are not very likely to make many concessions to us now. (Cheers.) I trust, however, that there will come a time when, although they now think their lease a long one, this matter shall be put an end to. (Applause.) It is our business, by a speedy, a consistent, and a timely action upon the constituencies, to prepare them so that when that period shall arrive they may be ready to vindicate their own rights and the rights of the industrious classes of this country. (Great cheering.) Before I sit down, I have to make an announcement with respect to a subject which has been brought before you some time ago—that is, in reference to the bazaar. It was originally proposed to hold it in the month of July. We have had numerous applications, from our friends in the country more especially, expressing an anxiety to furnish contributions; but, at the same time, stating that the time is too limited for them to do justice to their own wishes in respect to it. (Hear.) In consideration of these communications, and as there is no reason for its being held immediately, I have to announce that the Council of the League have come to the determination to postpone it till the month of January next year—an announcement which I hope will prove satisfactory to our friends here as well as to those who may read the reports of the proceedings of this meeting to-morrow in the country. (Hear.) There is another alteration in our arrangements, also, with respect to this meeting which I have to announce. It was intended that Dr. Bowring, M.P. for Bolton, should have addressed you this evening. Owing, however, to some other arrangements, he is unable to attend; but I am quite sure, when I state that Mr. Cobden (loud and reiterated cheering)—when I state that Mr. Cobden will address you, I trust that the arrangement may not be considered altogether unsatisfactory. (Loud cheers.) I beg leave, then, to introduce to you the hon. member for Stockport. (Immense applause.)

Mr. COBDEN upon approaching the table was received with the most vehement and reiterated applause, which having at length subsided, the hon. gentleman addressed the meeting as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, it is within the last two hours that the announcement was made to me that Dr. Bowring, who we had hoped would have addressed you here to-night, was unavoidably compelled to be absent; I therefore appear before you on this stage merely to fill up the vacancy which he has unfortunately occasioned. I might have been wanting in topics upon which to address you, but our question seems now to be so prominent everywhere, that each week turns up some fresh subject, or some new phase of the old topic, by which we are enabled to invest our great question with some new interest. Gentlemen, during the last week we have had two discussions in the House of Commons; and if party spirit had not elbowed poor political economy aside, that assembly might have become a school for instructing the public mind upon a question which I think is but too little understood—I mean the subject of differential duties. (Hear, hear.) But, unfortunately, certain parties on both sides were possessed of the idea that instead of 4s. a cwt. of duty upon sugar being the matter involved in the debate, there was place, power, and patronage at issue in the struggle. (Hear, hear, hear.) Our question became drowned in mutual recriminations and invectives, in retrospective attacks for past misconduct as far back as the year 1835: in fact, those who were in and those who were out seemed to be influenced only by one cause of anxiety—how the one set could get the others out and instal themselves in their places. (Cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, there is a pretty large school of political economy now assembled in this theatre, and if you will allow me I will endeavour to give you a short lesson upon that subject, which was really the topic of debate in the House of Commons, but which other, and in my opinion less important subjects superseded, very much to the disadvantage of the public interests. (Hear.) I wish the country to understand what is the meaning of the phrase “I used at the beginning of my address, ‘differential duties’ laid at the Custom-house. I think I can give you an illustration of its real significance, which probably may enable a child to go home and tell its grandpapa what those words mean. I will suppose that a certain number of market-gardeners, owning a limited surface of the neighbouring territory—say the parish of Hammersmith—persuaded his Grace of Bedford, who owns Covent-garden Market, in which these vegetables are sold, to lay a duty of 10s. a load upon all cabbages which came from all other gardens except those in the said parish of Hammersmith—such, for instance, as Battersea and other places. What would the consequence be, as the parish which would possess the monopoly does not raise as many cabbages as the people of the Metropolis can eat? The effect would be that the market-gardeners of Hammersmith would hold back their supply until they could get the same price as the people of Battersea obtained, who, having to pay 10s. a load to the Duke, consequently added the amount of the duty to the price of their produce. What would be the effect of such a system? The great Duke would receive his 10s. a load duty on the cabbages which came from Battersea and elsewhere, and the Hammersmith growers would get the extra 10s. on their cabbages, which, not having to pay the duty, they would put into their own pockets, the public paying the 10s. extra on both descriptions of cabbage. We will now suppose that the Duke wanted a little larger cabbage revenue, but, wishing still to favour the Hammersmith growers, he proposes to levy a tax of 10s. upon their cabbages, but, at the same time, to raise the duty upon the Battersea cabbages to 20s. What would be the effect? The Hammersmith people would as before hold back their cabbages, and as the market is insufficiently supplied by them, they would sell none until they could obtain the same price as the Battersea gardeners, who have to pay 20s. duty on their cabbages, while the Hammersmith people pay only 10s. Now, how would the public be affected? They would pay upon all the cabbages they bought 20s. beyond their actual value. The Duke obtains the whole of the extra 20s. upon the Battersea cabbages, and also 10s. upon those coming from Hammersmith, the Hammersmith people pocketing the other 10s.; the public meanwhile paying 20s. tax upon all their cabbages. (Cheers.) Some time after this the Hammersmith people want a little more monopoly; having tasted of its sweets they desire a little more of that same (laughter), and accordingly they lay their cunning heads together. They do not deem it expedient to go to the Duke and ask him to put on a still higher duty upon the Battersea cabbages; because that would be a very unpopular measure. They, therefore, adopt the plan of raising the cry of “Cheap cabbages,” and go to the noble market proprietor and say, “Reduce the duty upon all cabbages coming from Hammersmith from 10s. to 6s., and leave the tax upon those brought from Battersea, as it is now at 20s.” Having assumed the pretext of patriotism, they wait upon my Lord John Russell, and ask him to interest himself with his brother, the Duke of Bedford, to induce that nobleman to carry into effect this admirable arrangement. The noble Duke, whom I presume to be a shrewd man, naturally replies—“Your cry of cheap cabbages is merely a pretext to cover your own selfishness: if I take off 4s. a load from your duty, and leave the duty on the Battersea cabbages 20s., as at present, you will continue to sell your produce at the same price as theirs, and the only result will be that I shall lose 4s. a load duty, which you will pocket, and the public will pay precisely the same price as before.” (Cheers.) Change the word “cabbages” for “sugar,” and you will then have a complete illustration of the move which has recently been practised by our old opponents, the West India planters. (Hear, hear, hear.) Government brought forward a measure for fixing the duty upon foreign sugar at 34s. per cwt. upon all kinds of sugar, not refined, and of 21s. per cwt. upon all colonial sugar; that is, giving to the growers of the latter description of sugar—the colonial—10s. extra price for all they bring into the market, because, as in the supposititious case of the Hammersmith cabbage-growers, their own supply is totally insufficient for the market, and they will not sell one ounce of their sugar until they obtain the same price as the Java and other dealers receive, although out of that sum the latter have to pay 10s. duty more than the former. Let us see what that protective duty will amount to. In round numbers there are about 4,000,000 cwt. of sugar supplied by our colonies to this country. Ten shillings per cwt. upon that quantity will be £2,000,000 sterling, as near as I can calculate it. The whole of this large amount is a bonus, or “protection,” as it is called, to monopoly, which the Government propose to give to the West Indian planters. What, gentlemen, has been the conduct of the Free-Traders with reference to this sugar monopoly? Why, we brought forward a motion for the equalization of the sugar duties, in order that all growers of that article might pay an equal sum in the shape of duty to Queen Victoria, and that no private interest should be allowed to pocket any part of that amount. (Cheers.) We discussed that proposition in the House of Commons; and, although I think we undoubtedly had the best of them in the argument, they had the advantage of us in the number of votes. Then there was another amendment proposed by Mr. Miles, who brought forward a proposition for the imposition of a duty of 20s. per cwt. upon colonial, and 30s. upon foreign sugars; but he introduced a third line—a discrimination omitted in the Government measure—to the effect that all foreign sugar of the description which is called “white clayed,” or of a quality equivalent to it, should be charged 34s. per cwt. I have been told that there are a great number of people, even in this enlightened metropolis, who believe that the Free-Traders have been acting wrongly in resisting Mr. Miles's amendment. (Hear.) To say the least, there is a suspicion attached to the origin of that honourable gentleman's proposition, but I do not judge of its character by that circumstance. It is the West India proprietors who complained that Sir Robert Peel was going to ruin them by his motion, and therefore they brought forward Mr. Miles's amendment; and there are some people kind enough to believe that the amendment would give the colonists less protection than the motion of Sir Robert Peel! We will not, however, judge by appearance, still less estimate the measure by the character of the men who bring it forward, but we will examine and see what its tendency really is. A reduction of 4s. per cwt. in the duty upon colonial sugar, is a reduction to that amount upon all colonial sugar, whatever its quality may be. The reduction of 4s. upon foreign sugar, is only a reduction upon a part, or a certain description of foreign sugar. Let us inquire what is the description of foreign sugar which is excepted, and upon which it is proposed to levy 34s., because that in reality is the whole question. Men who are not conversant with the sugar trade are very unfit judges of the effect of the proposed exception. Some of us Free-Traders thought it worth while to go into the City and ascertain what this “white clayed sugar” coming from foreign countries really was. We thought we could not do better, and therefore went and consulted some half-score refiners and wholesale dealers in sugar; and, among others, referred to our old and trusted friend—the chairman both of Lord John Russell's and Mr. Pattison's committees—Mr. Travers, who, I believe, is one of the largest, if not the greatest wholesale dealer in sugar in this country, he not being himself a colonial proprietor, but being simply engaged as a distributor of sugar. The interests of that gentleman are identical with those of the consumer in this country. I will read the letter received from Mr. Travers upon the subject:—

“MY DEAR SIR,—I repeat to you, without hesitation, that the practical effect of Mr. Miles's amendment upon the proposed sugar duties, will be to establish a differential duty of 14s. per cwt. in favour of colonial sugars, as against three-fourths at least of the foreign sugars named for home consumption in November next. Java sugar, which will yield much more than half of this additional supply, is wholly clayed, and its lower qualities are in substance (or the amount of saccharine matter contained in them) more than ‘equivalent’ to the white clayed of many other countries, which, in comparison, are often weak and worthless. The same remark will also apply to a portion of the China and Manilla sugars, though the latter are not clayed at all.

“Then, again, as to the terms ‘brown clayed’ and ‘white clayed,’ it is impossible to draw a line of distinction in which any two parties, whose interests are opposed to each other, will agree. There is, between these two extremes, every shade of variety of ‘brown white’ and ‘white brown;’ and thus, the disputes of the importer and the Government officer will prove endless, terminating however, there is no doubt, in all cases, in favour of the revenue, and the imposition of the higher duty; unless, indeed, there is any fraud or collusion between parties in favour of the lower duty, which would of course operate to the injury of the fair trader.

“Both in the substance and colour of sugar there exists, in fact, as to value, no point of fixed or general argument. The real substance of sugar can only be determined by frequent experiment and great practical experience on the part of the refiner; and the value of colour is a thing generally settled between buyer and seller in the course of the moment, the colour itself varying with every light to which it is subjected.

“If the Government intend a differential duty of only 10s. per cwt. between colonial and foreign sugar, Mr. Miles's amendment will not answer the object. In the absence of fraud, the colonial interests may be benefited by it to the extent of 4s. per cwt., but it will be just so much out of the pocket of the consumer.

“I am, my dear Sir, faithfully yours,
“JOHN TRAVERS.”

“Switlin's-lane, June 17, 1844.”

I have upon the same subject also letters from a number of the most eminent houses in the sugar trade, and amongst others the following:—Messrs. Thornton and West, Messrs. Goodhart, Messrs. John and Henry Taylor, Mr. Peter Martineau, and Mr. John Davis. I have no hesitation, gentlemen, in stating to you my conviction that this amendment in its origin was nothing better than a trap to catch unwary Free-Traders. (Hear, hear.) I will not charge Mr. Miles with being the originator of the trick, or an accomplice in the intended deception; but I believe the artful scheme was got up in Mincing-lane by men who understood very well what they were about, and who imagined that the Free-Traders in the House of Commons would be caught by their specious artifices. What would have been the effect of the amendment if carried? The duty on colonial sugar would have been lowered from 24s. to 20s.; the great bulk of foreign sugar would have been 34s.; it would therefore leave, instead of the 10s. protecting duty according to the Government plan, 14s. a cwt. protecting duty to the colonial interest. (Hear, hear, hear.) Notwithstanding this there are unwary people who tell us, "If you get your sugar cheaper, why care about the colonial interest getting a little advantage too?" But the fact is you would get your sugar no cheaper by this plan. A reduction of 4s. per cwt. upon colonial sugar would be simply transferring an equal amount from the revenue of the country into the pockets of the monopolists. Four shillings upon the 4,000,000 cwt. brought into this country from the colonies would be equivalent to £800,000 a year taken from the national exchequer, and which you would be compelled to make up again in some other shape for the revenue. Mark me, the public and the national revenue are both in the same boat, while the monopolists are in another; and, if you have £800,000 a year abstracted from the revenue by the giving up of these duties on colonial sugar, you will have to pay so much more taxation in another form. What is the plan of Mr. Miles but the absorption of revenue, which ought to go to Queen Victoria, by the monopolists of this country, similar to that which has already led to the imposition of the income-tax? (Cheers.) What is their alteration of duty but an amount which they propose to transfer from the public exchequer to the pockets of the monopolists? Some people say that it is a small and insignificant sum; but it should be remembered, as I stated before, that 4s. per cwt. upon 4,000,000 cwt. of sugar is £800,000 per annum; and that £800,000 per annum is equal to a capital at an interest of 4 per cent., of £20,000,000 sterling. The proposal of Mr. Miles, therefore, is nothing more nor less than this—to take from the pockets of the people of this country another £20,000,000, and give it to the colonial interest. (Cheers.) I have told my good friends here—for I heard a shout or two at the beginning which showed that we have some present who have been gulled by this artifice—I told them, and now again repeat, that reducing the duty upon colonial sugar without reducing the foreign, will not lower the price to the consumer one farthing; and as we are told that, at a future period—probably next year—a very great change will take place in the sugar duties, let us in the meantime learn our lesson thoroughly, and understand what these differential duties are; and, if we can only make the public perceive their real nature, by next February there will not be a Minister who will dare to come down and propose them. (Cheers.) I tell you that, if the Government were to take off the whole of the duty on colonial sugar to-morrow, and leave on the foreign duty, you would not have your sugar one farthing a pound cheaper than now. You can only have that article cheaper by increasing the quantity which is brought into the market; there is no other way of lowering the price of things but by increasing the supply, provided consumption shall continue as it now is. The only effect, therefore, of taking off the duty of 24s. a cwt. from the colonial sugar would be to transfer the whole of that amount into the pockets of the monopolists, and take four or five millions sterling per annum from the revenue, which you probably may have to make up by another income-tax. If these questions can but be understood, and the public become informed upon the subject, we shall very soon get rid of the whole of these impositions in the article of sugar which are inflicted on the people by means of these differential duties. After all, what do they amount to? It is just voting so much money, taken out of the pockets of the people of this country, into the pockets of a certain small class of proprietors of land in Jamaica and the West Indies. It amounts to that and nothing else. When the colonists come forward and propose "protection" as a remedy for their grievances, let us ask ourselves whether this system of protection can possibly be said to work well, even for the colonists themselves? Why, I have seen hon. gentlemen in the House of Commons, owners of land in the West Indies, come forward and almost weep over the distresses of themselves and connexions: they have said that they are ruined now—that their property is of no value—that they have to send out money every year to pay the expenses of managing their estates, instead of drawing a revenue from them. Under what circumstances does all this distress happen to them? Why, they have at this very time a protection actually amounting to a prohibition against all other foreign sugar whatever, for at the present moment you cannot purchase foreign sugar for less than 64s. a cwt. duty, which is an actual prohibition. If that system of monopoly has not enabled them to carry on their business successfully—if they had and decline under such protection as that—why, does it not argue that they are upon a wrong tack altogether, and that a system which is so injurious to you as consumers of one of the first necessities of life, is not beneficial to those for whose advantage it has nominally been imposed? I say let us see the thing in its true character. My hon. friend Mr. Milner Gibson, who has a very shrewd way of looking at things, put the whole matter upon its right footing; he said, instead of voting money to the monopolists in the shape of an act of Parliament, which purports to be merely voting supplies to the Crown—instead of voting colonial duties under that subterfuge, which leaves the benefit to the monopolists—let us vote money to the Crown only; and, if the colonists come forward with fair claims upon us, let them state them openly, and let us vote to them separately whatever they are entitled to. But, even if they do come before us in that form, we shall want to know something more besides the mere fact of the existence of their sufferings and disasters; we shall require to be informed whether they have managed their own property in the best possible manner. If a man comes before a meeting of creditors and pleads distress and failure, and says he cannot meet his engagements and carry on his business with profit, you will naturally want to ascertain what the habits of that man have been, and if he has conducted his business with skill and economy. We will ask a few questions of that kind of the West India proprietors, if you please. I say they have failed because they have not conducted their business with either skill or economy. I remember crossing the Atlantic seven years ago with a very enlightened traveller, who had been through the whole of the sugar-producing countries of the globe; and he remarked to me, "There is as much difference between the mode of cultivation and manufacture in your West India islands, and in other countries where I have been where they have no such monopoly as that which exists with you—there is as great an inferiority in the process in your sugar-producing islands—as there is between the machinery and management of one of your cotton-mills now as compared with what they were twenty years ago." Then, I say, if such be the case, away with this rotten prop of protection, which only makes sluggards and cripples, and induces men to slumber under its influence. Put these colonists on a fair and equal footing with other people, and leave them to fight their own battle without favour, just as we are obliged to do in this country. Gentlemen, I have now told you what are the grounds upon which I voted against Mr. Miles's amendment the other night. I will frankly confess to you that I was not myself aware of the trap which had been laid for us until the Friday morning as this motion was to come on before the House in the evening. I had on the Thursday even made up my mind to vote for that motion, imagining—simple-hearted creature, as I was—that something good could come out of Mr. Miles, the member for Bristol. (Laughter.) I am willing to believe, in fact I have no doubt of it, that a great number of Free-Traders, as earnest as any in this theatre, who voted with Mr. Miles, did so under the same misapprehension as to the facts of the case, as that under which I should have voted had the motion come on on the day before I found out the truth of the matter. But, gentlemen, though I believe the earnest Free-Traders have voted under a misapprehension, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that there are other parties in the House of Commons who have made this a mere party contest. (Hear, hear.) I do not shut my eyes to the fact that the newspaper organs of those parties are very much dissatisfied because we, who had other principles in view than party purposes or factious objects, did not join in carrying a worse measure than the bad enough measure of Sir Robert Peel, and by that means contrive to upset the political coach. (Cheers.) I do not look at these proceedings in Parliament as party political contests: I have never given a factious vote in that House, and I hope I never shall. (Cheers.) I will get the best measures I can; I will never originate a bad one, nor ever support a worse measure when a better is presented before me in that House. (Cheers.) If I was a partisan, and was disposed to look at this question merely with reference to the tactics of the party in the House of Commons through the spectacles of Whiggery itself, why, what must I say of the wisdom of the tactics of that party in their late proceedings? Here is a coalition—and what sort of a one? I have heard many rational people say in this country, that in all probability we shall see a coalition some day in the House of Commons. I have heard sensible men say that they believe there are 250 of the more moderate men upon the Tory benches, and at least 100 of the more Conservative upon the Whig side, who are so identified in politics that they might now be sitting on the same side and under one leader, if it were not for the difficulty of adjusting the pretensions of rival leaders. There are some people who think that there is sense or policy in such a coalition as that; but what sort of a coalition had we on Monday last between Liberals on the one side and the ultra-bigots of monopoly on the other? Lord John Russell with his Whig party, and Lord John Manners with Young England after him, going out into the same lobby? If faction did not blind men, if they could look beyond their noses, might they not ask themselves what can this lead to? Admitting that such a combination might upset their rival leader, where would it land them? Why, the very next vote they came to, with such ingredients as that, would put them again in a great minority; and what would be the effect of the opposition to Sir R. Peel himself? Suppose the Queen sent for Lord John Russell, and asked him to take office, what would be his advice to her Majesty? In all probability to entreat her to send for Sir R. Peel back again. Why, with a majority of 90 on all party questions, can Sir R. Peel be dispossessed of office by any such miserable manoeuvre as this in the House of Commons? If the parties had come to something like a balance—if they were within 10 or 20 of each other in strength—there might be an opening, perhaps, for these party political manoeuvres and tactics in the House of Commons; but, I say, with 90 or 130 majority on the side of Sir R. Peel, how can these tactics there ever put his opponents into his place in power? No, no: the way to get into office, if Lord John Russell and the Whigs desire it, is this, not by the unprincipled plan of joining the ultra-bigoted monopolists,—that policy does not answer even in France, where there are less scrupulous politicians than here, and where the public mind is not so cognizant of public men as in England,—but if the noble lord wants to get into power, let him work up his strength out of doors, in order that he may increase his power within the House. (Cheers.) How will he or any other man increase his power out of doors? Not by obstructing the gradual advancement of Free Trade, which he professes to support, but by advocating himself the real principle of Free Trade, and taking his position upon it either to stand or fall. I am very sorry to say that such is the opinion of political parties—I mean the two great political parties in this country—that the people care very little for either one or the other of them. (Hear, hear, hear.) On their present footing, I believe, the public has very little to choose between them: I should not wonder but that for 5s. a cwt. less protection on sugar the nation would sell either of them. (Laughter.) Gentlemen, the League, so far as I am concerned, is of neither of these political factions. Neither Whigs nor Tories are practical Free-Traders. We have never yet heard a pledge from the leader of the Whig party any more than from the head of the Tories, that they are prepared to carry out the principle of Free Trade. We have heard vague declarations, but we are not to be satisfied with them; we find no votes in favour of the principle of Free Trade. There is always some plea for maintaining or continuing protection on sugar, and some apology for protection on corn; and until we can get one party or the other to take their stand upon Free Trade against all protective duties which are robberies of the public, until you can find one or other political party to take that high ground, I do not believe that the League, as a league, would be acting either with wisdom or policy if it identified itself with either of them. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, my opinion is, that if we are isolated as a party, provided we are a party, the Free-Traders will be stronger in the House of Commons and the country, though they may not be numerically strong, than if they merged themselves into the ranks of either Whigs or Tories. (Cheers.) I see the confusion of parties, and the complete chaos into which political factions are falling. I am not sorry for it; but I say, give us a compact body of Free-Traders, and the more confusion and complication there is between Whigs and Tories the sooner we shall succeed in carrying out our principle. (The honourable gentleman retired amidst enthusiastic cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN then said, the Rev. T. Spencer, of Hinton Charterhouse, near Bath, will now address the meeting.

The Rev. T. SPENCER, who was greeted with much applause, then spoke as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I have listened, in common with yourselves, with great interest to the address of Mr. Cobden, and I am glad to find that mere parties are getting into disrepute in this country; that the names of "Whig" and "Tory" are almost about to disappear; and I am in hopes—and have long been entertaining the hope—that a new party will rise out of the ruins of both, to be called "the justice party" (great applause)—a party which shall have no other rule but that of justice, not justice to one, but justice to all (loud cheers)—not of favour to the rich, the poor, or to the middle classes only, but holding the balance evenly, and doing at all times, and under all circumstances, the thing that is right. (Cheers.) I am in hopes, too, that the newspapers will take a change at the same time. Instead of their being calculated on, and written on purpose, to deceive the public, or to gain popularity—instead of endless articles on pauperism and the poor laws—instead of perpetual appeals merely to the passions of men—instead of these old Whig and Tory papers, I trust that we shall have a "truth paper"—a real record of passing events, giving no colouring to, but recording circumstances, and chronicling them just as they are (cheers), so that the people shall really be able to believe what they read, which at present they cannot do, being obliged, in order to get at truth, to read both sides and then to judge between them. (Cheers.) I ought to feel a great deal of diffidence in my own opinion as a clergyman of the Church of England, when I know that so great a majority of my own order entertain different views from myself upon political subjects—when I see in the late election for South Lancashire that only six or seven clergymen polled for the Free-Trade candidate and 60 or 70 for the other—that is, that nine out of ten entertained opinions differing from my own. However, it is possible for a minority to be right. (Hear.) Sometimes it has happened in the world that truth has been held even by very few, and it is possible for a man even to stand alone—at all events no man should be prevented thinking for himself by this circumstance. The question is, what is right and true, and not "how many are there of your opinion." (Cheers.) I am sorry to be of the opinion of Bishop Butler in this respect, "that the greater part of men do not think for themselves." (Cheers.) I do not wish to say anything disrespectful of my fellow-creatures, but I am convinced that he is right: that men are indolent in their minds whatever they may be in their bodies—they do not like thinking, studying, and labouring mentally; therefore, even when they read, it is, as he says, "too frequently only an act of idleness." We may see them devouring a novel—there is no study in that; or reading a newspaper—there is no mental labour, no inquiry, no investigation, no balancing of the truth. But this stuffing, as it were, of the mind, and this lading of the memory, go on till by-and-by there is a fit of indigestion—the memory becomes weakened and destroyed—and nothing, I would remind you, weakens the memory so much as reading an immense mass of matter without the exercise of great consideration, and by much digestion causing it to become part and parcel of the mind itself. I ascribe one difficulty in the way of the League to this want of thought on the part of the people. The League has to do the thinking part for them, just as some people like to have all their work done for them: there are some who commit their health to the doctor, their estates to their agents, all their difficulties to the lawyer, and their souls to the priests. (Great cheering and laughter.) They do not read the scripture aright, for it says, "Examine yourselves;" whereas they say, "Do you come and examine for me if all be right." (Laughter.) The scripture says, "Prove your own selves."—"Prove all things—hold fast that which is good."—"Know ye not your own selves?"—"Why do ye not your own selves judge what is right?" This is the scripture rule; but men are always shifting their responsibility upon other men, and doing everything by proxy. (Cheers and laughter.) Now, as soon as ever the people of this country will do their thinking for themselves—whenever they will come and realize justice for themselves—and, above all, when they come to know for themselves what true religion is,—that it is not mere cant—not the putting on long laces, the saying of prayers, and singing of psalms, but the putting of justice and rectitude into all their words and actions,—when this time, I say, shall come, then will the League go through the country and make converts so fast that a few weeks will see as much success as many years have witnessed in times past. (Great applause.) There is another reason why this cause has not gone on faster than it has done, and that is, that even amongst those who do think a little, and who have made up their minds that Free Trade is right,—and thinking is sure to bring men to this conclusion—I mean, unbiassed and disinterested thought,—they commit the great fault of leaving the acting to other people. They say, "Never mind, it is not necessary for me to do much—there is Mr. Cobden (great applause)—there is Mr. Cobden, he will do it all (cheers); there is my representative in the House of Commons, he is a good man, he will speak for me there; and there are people signing petitions and holding meetings; and there are paid agents, and men going about without being paid at all; and there is the League, and the newspapers, and tracts of various kinds, all working well: therefore I need not spend my time, my money, and my labour to make enemies, and neglect my own business for this cause; I may very safely leave it in the hands of others." (Applause.) This has been the ruin of many a great cause. (Cries of "Hear.") But the really great man is the man who says to himself, "I must act as if I were the only man in this cause (cheers); I will take such steps as are necessary, if all others neglect their duty; and, though I believe in the superintendence of Providence, I will work as though Providence would help no one except he be doing the very best himself. (Hear, hear.) As to names, it is not enough to bring them forward either for or against me. There have been those who have found fault with others for relying upon great names, but who have fallen into the very same error themselves—men who charge others with relying on a Pope, and yet stick up another themselves: who have got a Luther, a Calvin, a John Knox, or a Wesley, upon whom they pin their faith. (Cheers.) The proper plan is to throw aside those great names, and not to be frightened even if we are told that we have a Clarkson against us. What matters that, if we have truth upon our side? (Cheers.) So with respect to the influence of the majority of the clergy of England upon my own opinions: though I pay very great respect and deference to such an authority and to such a majority, yet there is one thing in which I think I have the advantage over them, and which ought to bind them as it does me—that is, the doctrine not only of the scriptures which they preach, but of the prayer-book to which they have subscribed. (Hear, hear.) I am not now going to allude to parts of that prayer-book, to which I have referred at other times and in other places—namely, the thanksgiving for cheapness and plenty; but I would allude to another portion of the prayer-book, viz., as to the right mode of action when a nation is in distress. At this particular time, for instance, many of the clergy are reading the prayer for rain, because we have had three months of dry weather. In my own parish, before I left home yesterday, I was told that one farmer had suffered a loss of £500 in consequence of the exceeding dry weather. In that prayer for rain, I perceive, that the thing which the clergy are taught to desire is, "that we may receive the fruits of the earth to our comfort and to God's honour" and the meaning of receiving the fruits of the earth to our comfort and to God's honour is explained in those other prayers to mean "cheapness and plenty." I consider, therefore, that to be the standard by which clergymen are to be guided in using these prayers of the church. (Cheers.) Now, I have no faith in prayer except it is united with action. The man who says, "Give us this day our daily bread," and does not go to work for it, must be a person of very small sense indeed. (Loud cheers.) I believe there is not an instance in the whole Bible of God's doing anything for man that man could do for himself; and this is a truth which I particularly wish to impress upon the minds of all who respect that book. Whenever, for instance, our Lord raising the dead, I do not find that He took away the stone, because that was a thing that man could do: therefore, He says, "Take ye away the stone;" and when the dead was raised (which Balane could do), I do not find that He did any more; at He said, "Loose him, and let him go;"—that being a thing that could be done without His aid. (Cheers.) When He fed the multitude, He did not divide them into companies and place them upon the grass—that He to His disciples to do, for they could do it; but the multiplying of the bread was His own business,—that He alone could do. When that was done, however, He said, "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost;"—at being what they could do. So we find it in every case in the scriptures, that when anything is beyond our own power we have a right to ask the Divine assistance; but when it is within our power we have no right to expect the assistance of Providence any farther than we use our own exertions. (Cheers.) I would, then, appeal the clergy, and Sir Robert Peel as a churchman, as to whether the prayer-book does not lay this down as a foundation—this principle of cheapness and plenty. That the thing to be prayed for—that is the thing to be sought after; and I would also appeal to Sir Robert Peel from his own statement, for he himself has confessed as much as the proper rule for government to recognise, and the proper law for the people, is, to "buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest." This, he says, is a great truth—the basis on which things are founded; and is, therefore, ought to have been the original basis of our commercial laws. But he justifies himself for not carrying it into effect from the circumstances in which he finds himself in the present day. Now, every Sunday I am bid by my office to offer up a prayer for the Parliament which he is so conspicuous a member (laughter); and part of that prayer is to this effect:—"That all things may be so ordered and settled by their end and avours upon their best and surest foundation" (which he acknowledges to be cheapness and plenty— which he confesses to be Free Trade—the best and surest foundation). We pray every Sabbath that these "may be so ordered and settled by their endeavours on the best and surest foundation; at peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and law, may be established among us for all generations." (Hear.) Now, at present we have anything but peace and happiness among us—we have anything but prosperity in our land;—and why does not Sir Robert Peel, who hears this prayer, know that he himself is acting contrary to the spirit of the prayer-book, so long as he deems going to the very foundation which is here described the best and surest foundation—cheapness and plenty, allowing men to buy wherever they can to their own advantage, and allowing them to sell wherever they wish to their own best advantage? (Loud cheers.) I believe Free Trade to be one of the rights of man (loud cry "Hear") that nothing can take from him; I hold to be a right to be exercised at all times, under circumstances, and with all nations, and that there can be no case in which Free Trade ought to be suspended. It is the only sure foundation. I have caused the earth to be differently divided, some climates being warmer, some colder, some poor, some fertile, some possessing corn, some fruits, but all things diversified so that when there is not "corn in man, there is in Egypt;" and it was His intention that should have the benefit of that which was produced very part of the earth: it is for His honour and our fort that it should be so—and the Christian religion, which is declared to be "Glory to God in the highest; peace, earth, and good will towards men," can never be carried out until the ministers of that religion come forward and advocate this great and good principle. (Great ring.) I have before me the testimony of a very great man in his day—a man, indeed, who has not been a long time dead—got a clergyman of my own church, Robert Hall, the Baptist minister. (Hear, hear.) He says, "If there is any class of persons whose opinions on these questions are entitled to deference and respect, they are, undoubtedly, political economists—men who have made the sources of national wealth the principal subject of their inquiry; and where will we find one, from Adam Smith to the present time, who has not reprobated the interference of the Legislature with the price of corn, to say nothing of the reasoning of that great philosopher, which is unanswerable. Common sense will teach us that laws to raise the price of such a commodity are unjust and oppressive upon the whole community for the exclusive benefit of a part." (Loud cheers.) Now, I may be told that the Free Trade which I have advocated can hardly be carried out in the case where the countries we trade with grow their produce by slave labour; and, as I have taken some conspicuous part in this matter, I may be allowed now, after all that has been said in the country, to give my present opinions on this point. (Hear, hear.) I have no idea of altering a rule after it has been once established. If a man, in coming to the Bible, for instance, once makes up his mind, from external and internal evidence, that its pages are genuine and authentic, then he is not to cavil at any particular word afterwards, but recollect the conclusion he had previously come to. (Hear, hear.) Every science takes for granted certain axioms and definitions. Euclid begins with his definitions and postulates. If you grant these, you must not deviate from them; in every proposition afterwards you must take them for granted, and as settled. So Sir Isaac Newton, when he commenced his "Principia," begins with his definitions, his axioms, and postulates; and, if we go so far with him, we must not afterwards quarrel with him on these points. So in this country, supposing we did not know a place where slavery existed—suppose we did not yet know America—suppose we did not yet know the Brazils and its inhabitants—and suppose we had come to the conclusion that Free Trade was the right of man; that it was only just—that it was only right that he should be allowed to enjoy that self-supporting and self-adjusting system which would enable every man to do his best in the markets of the world, you are not afterwards to alter it from circumstances either here or there—you cannot say, "You shall not trade with Russia" because the Emperor has not pleased us with his conduct towards the Poles; you shall not trade with another country because they are Mahometans, or because they are idolaters, and rob God of the honour due to him. But am I to be answerable for all these things? My question is this—"Have you agreed previously with me that Free Trade is right?" If you have, manfully adhere to what you have approved, and keep to your bargain. (Cheers.) Do not be always seeking to examine the foundations. Then, with respect to this slave produce. I have been a member of the Anti-Slavery Society for many years past, and I have heard them argue that free labour will beat slave labour if you will only let it be tried. Yet here are the same persons contending against the trial being permitted. Why, then, I say they have no faith in their own principles. (Cheers.) I know, that under the old poor-law, when paupers were to be had in a parish at 5s. a week, and free labourers for 9s., the farmers have said that they would rather pay 9s. for independent labour than 5s. for pauper labour. (Hear, hear.) The fact is, that the one man works with a feeling of independence: he knows that he is working for himself; probably he works by the piece, and he knows at the same time that he can lay by for sickness or old age, and is in a better condition, and will do ten times the amount of work, than a pauper or a slave will do; whilst the man who works without such a stimulus has no feeling of honourable emulation about him, and will not do so much justice to his employer. Then these persons say that slaves are stolen, and that therefore slave produce is stolen goods. I cannot quite see the inference here attempted to be drawn. It does not follow that the earth on which a man treads is stolen earth because the man himself is stolen; and yet these persons believe it. (Hear.) Now, suppose that it were so—I am sorry to say that in that case they convince themselves of sin, and of being the greatest criminals in the country. That is not a sin in me, but it is in them. I do not hold it to be stolen produce; and therefore, as whatever is not of faith is sin, this is of faith in me, and is no sin. If a man knows a thing to be good and does it not, he sins; if a man believing it to be sinful to use, yet uses slave-grown cotton, slave-grown tobacco, or slave-produced gold, copper, and silver, why, he condemns himself. (Cheers.) But then the answer is, "Two blacks cannot make one white." (A laugh.) Suppose we are condemned so far, surely we are better than you, who use slave-grown sugar, and cotton, and other things." No: I say, so far from being better, you are much worse. The scripture says, "He that offendeth in one point is guilty of all." You allow that you offend in one point; we do not allow that we offend at all; you are, therefore, guilty of all. You are guilty of the slave-grown sugar which you do not touch; you are guilty of using slave-grown produce, because you wilfully use slave-grown cotton, wilfully smoke slave-grown tobacco, and wilfully take up your nose slave-grown snuff. (Great cheers.) I have seen men who have refused even slave-grown cotton, and yet I have known those very men with slave-produced gold in their pockets. (Laughter.) I have said to them, "Show me a penny or a sovereign;" and they have replied, "Well; but we cannot do without this—we could not live." But my answer is, "It is not necessary for you to live if you set up so high a standard. There have been martyrs at the stake who have not accepted their lives even though by signing their names to a recantation they might have saved them." Men there are, however, who have said, "It is a sin against God to touch anything in the shape of slave-grown produce," and yet they have had slave-produced gold in their pockets. (Cheers.) I am convinced that the Master we serve, or the Creator who made us, never expect such slavery from us as always to be examining everything we touch. This book—this paper (referring to the prayer-book in his hand)—is made of slave-grown cotton. He never can expect from us that we should be trembling at every step, nor charge us with sinning in using slave-grown produce. I am, therefore, decidedly of opinion that Government is in error in allowing this idea to weigh with them as an argument for a moment; I am convinced that every one of them in their own minds knows better, but that they do not wish to offend the feelings of people who think otherwise. I cannot, however, but regret that there is such a feeling: it is the misfortune of this country that such a feeling exists in the minds of many good men; but whenever charity and pity occupy the mind in the place of justice, all kinds of blunders are sure to be the result. (Cheers.) All I can say is, that the Bible does not sanction the putting of charity for justice. It says: "Do justice," and then "love mercy." Let everything be based on right principles, let everything be honest, let everything be fair, let everything be equitable, pay your dues, and do what is right, and then, if you have the opportunity and the means, show your generosity. But even then the charity of the Bible is not modern charity—not charity at the expense of the state—or of the poor-rates—not charity at the expense of the church-rates—not the charity which says, "Be ye warmed and be ye clothed," and then adds, "go to the parish for it;" but it is the charity which comes out of a man's own pocket. (Cheers.) I will tell you a case of true charity which came to my knowledge yesterday. An excellent gentleman whom I know was travelling with me from Bristol (he may be here, if so I hope he will forgive me for mentioning the circumstance); he stated that 30 years ago a gentleman was in the coach with him, upon the same road, on a terribly stormy winter night. Outside the coach was a soldier's wife with her child, enduring the misery of the pelting rain and the chilling and boisterous wind. This gentleman, though the journey was long, when he heard the circumstances of the case, resigned his place within the coach, and changed seats with the poor soldier's wife and child, whom he placed in the comfortable interior, whilst he himself for hours bore all the pelting of the pitiless storm. (Cheers.) That gentleman was a noble Free-Trader, whose name is Radnor. (Immense cheering, the audience rising en masse.) I said to the gentleman who informed me of this, "I wonder if Lord Radnor would remember that if he were told of it."—"Oh," he said, "I know scores of similar occurrences, but whenever I have told him of them lately (for I was very intimate with him), he said he had quite forgotten them." Another mark of a truly noble, generous mind! (Great cheers.) Now, the principle which I wish to lay before you is this—that if there be distress in the country you should not take the modern system of patching, mending, and tinkering, but should go to the fountain-head of the mischief and the misery, and try to remove the cause of that misery. (Cheers.) It is better to spend £5 in removing the cause of misery, destitution, and vice, than to spend £500 in striving to keep people comfortable in their wretchedness. (Cheers.) Now, the plan to which I allude is a scriptural plan: the other is too much the fashion in the present day. I will just state to you a few views which the business of last Sunday led me to entertain; and if I go wrong it is the Church which sets me to do this work. (A laugh.) In the Psalms of the afternoon service I read about misery and distress:—"How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked? Defend the poor and fatherless: do justice to the afflicted and needy." It is not the mere giving them charity that is the doing justice to the afflicted and needy. Then the next verse is, "Deliver the poor and needy; rid them out of the hands of the wicked." This is what the Free-Trade movement is intended to do. (Loud cheers.) Then I find another recommendation, which we who live in an age in which religion is very much in fashion, when there are so many ladies and gentlemen who think themselves of the highest-class persons, who almost feel themselves defiled if they meddle with any movement, or interfere in the affairs of the world, or come within the influence of ordinary matters—still I find that religion which is recommended to us to be this—"Is it such a fast that I have chosen? A day for a man to afflict his soul? Is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? Wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord? Is not this the fast that I have chosen?" Let us know the religion that God hath chosen:—"To loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke." Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? When thou seest the naked that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh." It is, then, in breaking these yokes, and undoing the heavy burdens, that true religion consists. I have also found a description in another part of the present state of affairs quite to a nicety. The prophet might almost have lived in England when the people's property was taken from them, not by an open tax which they could understand, but by an income-tax which they could estimate, but indirectly by a tax upon the necessities of life, which they pay when buying their tea and sugar, giving 7d. instead of 3d., paying a tax to monopoly at the very time when they are paying also for bread. It is in these days when the people are paying taxation whatever they eat, on whatever they drink, and on whatever they are clothed in—it is to this that the description which I am about to read particularly applies. At a time when a great part of the people are poor, and many men do not know how to keep their heads above water—whilst a few are getting enormously rich, because they do not pay their fair share of the burdens of the state—to such persons the description applies. This is the description:—"Now, therefore, thus saith the Lord of Hosts, Consider your ways; ye have sown much, and bring in little; ye eat, but ye have not enough; ye have drunk, but ye are not filled with drink; ye are clothed, but ye are not warm; and he that earneth wages earneth them to put them into a bag with holes." This is exactly the case in the present day. (Cheers.) The Chancellor of the Exchequer has so many holes in the bags in which the people's wages are put, that a man has no means of keeping his money. (Cheers and laughter.) Now, after this description of the state of England at this very time, the adviser is again repeated, which I will repeat again to you:—"Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, Consider your ways." (Cheers.) It is because the people do not think—because they do not consider—that such a state of things exists. I am of opinion that a wise and understanding people cannot be badly governed. (Hear.) There can be no tyranny where there are free souls and free spirits. (Cheers.) There cannot be bad laws over a wise people, because you cannot bribe a virtuous man, nor make drunk an election a sober man (cheers)—nor can you intimidate a noble-minded man; and, therefore, I say it is partly the fault of the people that the laws are such, and the taxes as heavy as they are. Therefore, the reform must be with the people. (Loud cheers.) There must be a change, and a new understanding result from enlightening them more; there must be a greater generosity of heart exhibited by every man whilst seeking wisely his own interest, at the same time not injuring the interest of any or every other man. (Cheers.) There is only one objection to this system not being adopted in this country, and that I will now touch upon. I am aware that there is a treat in reserve for this audience, and therefore I will not trespass much longer on your time. (Cheers, and cries of "Go on.") Wherever I go, and have talked with farmers and with persons who have stumbled on the subject of the Corn Laws, I find one of the greatest difficulties to be on the subject of the National Debt. "It might be," say they, "very fair if all countries were alike and all equally taxed; but it is impossible for the farmer, with this national debt upon his land, to compete with countries that have no national debt." Now, I say, in the first place, that it is rather a hard thing in the landed interest, for the sake of their wars to defend their own estates, to incur this national debt, and then to use it as an argument against the people to oppress them still more. (Cheers.) It is, however, no argument at all in favour of protection, but rather, in my opinion, an argument upon the other side. Suppose you take two men keeping shops—one in trade with a mortgage on his property, and the other free from any such encumbrance. The man who had the mortgage could not go to the corporation and say, "You must allow me the privilege of monopoly and give me greater prices, because I am not so unencumbered as the other man." No; he would not be allowed to do so. But what he ought to do would be to try to undersell, or rather to oversell, his competitor, by obtaining more custom, and so pay off his mortgage and clear his estate. Some towns in England have, by means of their corporations, got into debt; but is a town with a heavy debt to say, "You must protect us and allow us privileges not possessed by other towns, because we have a sort of little pocket national debt." You would say, "No; be more industrious in your business, so shall you be able to pay off your debt and the burdens which oppress you." So must it be in the wide field and market of the world. (Cheers.) If England have difficulties, other nations will not regard them; and if our goods meet with others of the same quality in the neutral market, the cheapest must and will be taken. As other nations will not, then, regard our difficulties, we must depend for prosperity upon our own wisdom and our endeavours to extend our trade (which will be the result of Free Trade), in order that we may ultimately rid ourselves of the national debt. (Cheers.) I have no doubt, if Free Trade were given, that the national debt would be felt as but a very light burden, and that ere long the people would be so wise as to pay it off, and to take care that the state should never incur another. (Cheers and laughter.) With respect to the farmer complaining of the debt, he seems to look at it in a one-sided manner, forgetting that the manufacturer and the shopkeeper are labouring under it also. (Cheers.) It is not the landowner and the farmer who have to pay this national debt—but each bears his portion. I say, then, that the argument of the national debt is in reality an argument in favour of Free Trade. (Cheers.) I do hope that the longer the subject is discussed the more it will be believed to be a shameful thing of any man to stand up in Parliament to advocate local or selfish interests, instead of having regard to the advantage of the public at large. (Applause.) I hope they will know that they stand there to represent the public, and not the interests of their own pocket—that they stand there to consult the good of a nation, and not their own individual gain. (Cheers.) I hope the time is coming when no man will attempt to blind the eyes of his more ignorant neighbour, and endeavour to persuade him that it is well for him that food should be dear, and the necessities of life scarce, when common sense tells him it is desirable that food should be low, plentiful, and cheap. (Cheers.) I hope the time is coming when men shall be ashamed thus to deceive each other; and yet, I am sorry to say, that in the neighbourhood in which I live these attempts are going on on a large scale—even in the villages—not, I need hardly say, by the gentlemen and agents employed by the League, but by quite other means. (Cheers.) A petition is brought into a small village by the butler or head servant of the great house, and is taken by him—as I know to be a fact—not only to those who are in favour of the Corn Laws, but to their opponents, calling upon them to sign it. Some of them do as they are directed, and they sign it, as they afterwards confess, to their shame and sorrow. Then with others there is, perhaps, a reasoning with them for a quarter of an hour, base appeals to self-interest are resorted to, and yet, as I know, in some cases unsuccessfully, though the consequence might have been the loss of bread. A poor blacksmith in the village, who was dependent for his business on a certain party, came to me, and said, "Sir, I hope you do not think I signed that petition in favour of the Corn Laws." "Well," I said, "I am glad to hear that you did not; and, knowing all the circumstances, I was anxious to hear how you acquitted yourself. I rejoice that you were able to maintain your standing." The man behaved nobly; but it was a shameful thing on the part of wealth and power to lead the man into this temptation. (Loud cheers.) The only system which, I trust, we shall ever advocate will be, first of all to "consider our own ways"—to seek to find out the truth, and then to act on our own part;—to endeavour to persuade others, to endeavour to enlighten others, but never to hurt them, never to displease them, never to intimidate them, never to bribe them, but to love and adhere to the truth in all things, in the confidence that we shall ultimately prevail; and, knowing that, whether we gain our cause soon or late, we are, at all events, enlisted upon the right side, and that we have sought to conquer by the right means. (Great and general applause.)

A person here mounted a seat in the pit, and demanded to address the meeting. A general cry arose from all parts of the theatre against his being heard, and upon his pertinaciously persisting in his attempt to speak he was ultimately quietly ejected by those around him. In the midst of the confusion created by this circumstance,

The Chairman came forward and said: Ladies and gentlemen, I am very sorry that I cannot accede to the request made for permission to address the meeting; but I must throw myself upon the meeting to support me in carrying out the rule from which we have never yet deviated, and from which I certainly shall not depart to-night—that is, of taking the speakers who have been previously advertised in their appointed order. From that rule I shall not deviate upon this or any other occasion. I must beg of the gentleman who is seeking to interrupt the meeting that he will keep his seat. If any disturbance is attempted, it is my duty, as chairman of the quiet and orderly audience who usually attend in this place, to protect them in the enjoyment of that comfort throughout the meeting to which they are fully entitled. (Cheers.) I beg leave now to introduce to you Mr. Fox.

Mr. W. J. Fox came forward amidst most enthusiastic cheers, and proceeded to speak as follows:—The motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws, which the Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers will propose in the House of Commons on Tuesday next, marks the completion of another year of the League agitation. It is a time to note the indications of the progress which our cause is making, and the rate at which it is advancing. The result of that motion will be, as it were, a taking stock in the House of Commons (laughter), and exhibiting, in the first instance, how the Free-Trade cause stands in that assembly as compared with last year. I confess I have no very large anticipations as to this portion of the review. I am acquainted with the prayer for the House of Commons, which has been so emphatically and soundly explained to you by a reverend gentleman this evening; but however frequently, and in some quarters earnestly, that prayer may be offered, I am afraid it will be about as unavailing as a proposition made about two or three weeks since in a country village, where the farmers were suffering very much in a similar way to that described to you by Mr. Spencer—a proposal that their clergyman should put up a prayer for rain. He consulted an old farmer in the village, and wanted to know what his view of the matter was; and whether he coincided with the rest of the parishioners in the request. "Why, master parson," said the farmer, "in my opinion it is no use praying for rain as long as the wind holds in the north-east." (Laughter.) And I fear that the prayer of the church will be of as little use in leading to a settlement of this question of Free Trade in the House of Commons on the foundation of truth and justice, so long as the prevailing wind in that region is from the bitter and biting quarter of monopoly. (Cheers.) I can hope but little in a question between class interest and the public from an assembly which is at present a class-constructed and even a class-elected Legislature. The disease is in its very vitals, and there must be a regeneration of the legislative body before we can hope for justice, to say nothing of charity, to the suffering millions, from those who are at present the arbiters of our destiny. (Cheers.) There are symptoms, too, which must moderate our expectations of the approaching debate and division on this question. I confess I should not be at all surprised if our strength should even appear less, instead of more, than on some former occasions; and I should be by no means disheartened by any such phenomenon, for when the Whig party gets a glimpse of power we always find that phrases and notions which had been thought obsolete by the progress of the controversy, are revived again; and in the recent conflicting events which have taken place, as soon as in the Legislature any chance of upsetting the rival party and returning to place is perceived, the doctrine of a fixed duty reappeared in the Whig newspapers. (A voice: "They have a right so to do.") True it is they have a right to revive it, most assuredly, as anybody would have a right to dig a corpse out of the earth if that earth belonged to them; but they would have no right to push that hideous mass of corruption among living beings, and say, "This is one of you, and must share in your functions and enjoy a portion of your privileges." (Cheers.) A short time ago, apparently, in public attention, logically, the fixed-duty doctrine was dead, buried, rotten, and forgotten (cheers); and it only reappears on the stage because there seems to be some slight opening—because a certain parliamentary party occupies another position than it did ere while—for a return to place. But with fixed duty as with sliding scale this League wages unextinguishable warfare. (Hear.) The hostility of our principle is as great in the one case as it is in the other: we know no more compromise with bread-tax in the one form than we do in the other; we abjure them both as only different phases of intercepting the gifts of Providence in their way to minister to human enjoyment. There is a yet further objection to the fixed-duty doctrine which renders it, I think, still more obnoxious; and that is, that it is a principle which tends to divide the interests of the class possessing capital from that of those having only labour to rely upon. It might answer the purpose of the merchant, manufacturer, and shopkeeper, and might in some measure satisfy them, looking exclusively to their own interests; but it does so at the sacrifice of the interests and the rights of the great majority of the toiling multitude, whose question this is, with reference to whom it ought always to be agitated, and not one atom of whose claim to the food they earn should ever be compromised by any friend of Free Trade on the just and broad principle which that phrase denotes. (Cheers.) In looking at the public indications of the state of our cause, one cannot but be struck at once with the fact of the unabated interest that is manifested in these meetings; and this circumstance is more remarkable, I think, at this time, than it was last year, or upon any former occasion, for this reason, that the present period is not one of very much excitement on this question: it is not a time in which there are the cheering and stimulating electoral victories that occurred a few months ago; it is not a season in which the operations of the League have allowed of those numerous country meetings in different parts of the kingdom which some while since occupied public attention, and formed continual occasion for regarding the progress of our cause; it has not been a time, except within the last few days, of parliamentary discussions that were attracting any very great degree of notice, or exciting any peculiar interest in our principles. You have come to this place from week to week, seeing the old familiar faces, and hearing the old familiar voices; you have attended this theatre under no temporary excitement; and, influenced by no extraordinary stimulus from without; you have come, because the determination was fixed and rooted in your own souls, to protest against these outrageous impositions on food until they should be utterly abolished; to reiterate that determination, and by the very fact of your attendance here to call Heaven and earth to witness, that, come storm or sunshine, calm or struggle, you are resolved to bear your protest, until at length the voice of truth and justice shall prevail over all class interests, and the Legislature itself shall yield to the power of public opinion. (Loud cheers.) In this quiet determination—needing no contrivance or varied means and appliances to keep up your attendance—I see that calm and growing strength which works like the mighty elements of nature itself. It is a power which has within itself the means of perseverance, and the means of perseverance in moral power are the means of increase also. It shows that our strength goes on from day to day silently, but irresistibly augmenting, swelling like the snows upon the mountain-top, until they are formed into the extent and compactness of the glacier, and then ready—affording to abide your time, but ready when that time shall come—to rush down bearing all before you, and overwhelming every hostile power with the resistless will of a mighty nation. (Loud cheers.) Miscalculating the quietness with which true power holds its own and augments its influence, we find some journalists still determined to treat the League as comparatively or absolutely defunct. (Laughter.) Indeed, only a few days ago, there were papers in which one might read that the League had been "driven out of Covent Garden Theatre by the London Conservative Association." A marvellous rout, indeed, would that be! The generosity which allowed that body the use of this theatre, I think, was by no means misplaced; although, perhaps, those who met were rather unfortunate in the permission being extended to them quite so soon. They should have met to-day instead of last Wednesday, and then, when they toasted their "glorious majority of ninety," we might have asked where it was last Friday and Monday? They might have been called upon to explain whether they were celebrating the triumph of the Tories over Sir Robert Peel, or the victory of Sir Robert Peel over the Tories; and the question might especially have been put to Sir Howard Douglas, who voted on the first occasion with Mr. Miles, and won the second division with Sir Robert Peel, and who refused his vote by declaring that his opinions had undergone no change whatever. (Laughter.) That was the gentleman who took upon himself, or who had put upon him, at the Conservative dinner here, the office of being responder in reply to the health of the Duke of Wellington. Had the Conservative festival been postponed till this evening, they might have had some pithy allusions to the uncovered statue, which I have not seen, but which, I am told, stands with its face towards the Church, the Post-office, and the Horse Guards, and its back turned upon the Royal Exchange. (Cheers.) They stated repeatedly at that festival, and I believe they alleged very truly, that they were not associated to uphold "any particular ministry;" "the ministry which such an association upholds, beyond all doubt, must be a ministry which is not 'very particular.'" (A laugh.) I wonder much, considering the number of mercantile people there, and the large correspondence which they must keep up in their business, that they did not introduce at least some such toast as this: "Success to those who hold the seals of office, and who brew the seals of letters!" (Prolonged and tremendous cheering.) To return to the indications of the progress of our cause: I for one reckon it a very gratifying indication, and a good omen of moment effected by the League, that the condition of the agricultural labourer is now forced upon public attention with a power which I think ensures that something must be done towards its amelioration. It was the League that brought that condition first into notice, and it did so in the face of the boldest contradiction. Very rural district was described as a perfect Arcadia; a being innocence, comfort, and enjoyment there. Thresh is now torn aside, and no patching can ever meet it hold together again. The horrid and disgusting reality is exposed, and that reality, however it may be tampered with, I believe never can be materially altered in character, or thoroughly reformed but by the accomplishment of that repeal of taxes on food which is the object of this association. (Cheers.) How much of us would ever have been attempted had not the League broached the subject—had not the condition of these creatures been prominent in the speeches at these almost every other meeting held in connexion with a question throughout the country? Would that great power the Times newspaper have taken the matter up it has done had there been none of this previous preparation? The Times has now sent out its royal commission into the disturbed districts. I say "its royal commission," for we have other Governments besides those that meet in Westminster. The Times may be said to a fair extent to rule England, as Daniel O'Connell rules Ireland. (Cheers.) Printing-house-square and the Penitentiary in the Circuit are seats of Government, where influence are exercised which make themselves felt to the remotest borders of either island. (Ad cheers.) The series of papers which are appearing the Times with reference to the condition of labourers in the eastern counties—where, as we find, you may trace the map the broad black line of low wages and inferior fires—those papers, by the impression that they produce, will, I think, shame down for ever the calumny often repeated against the League and these meetings—that they have, or can possibly have, anything whatever to do with the excitement of such disturbances. (Cheers.) That sophism must follow in the wake of any others; they are all on the road to oblivion, and it will soon be little or nothing left to the monopolist at the barefaced assertion, "to tax your food is good for your pockets, and we will do it as long as you leave us power of doing so." It is a blessing even already that condition of the labourer is now becoming so much understood, and that the need of applying some alleviation is so extensively felt. There is reason throughout the agricultural counties—in Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk—and day when its labours commenced. (Cheers.) Poor creatures! born to filth and hunger, entering the world in a dilapidated cottage, destined, perhaps, to be put down under the common clearing system—sent out as early youth to pick stones on the road that leads to some ducal mansion, kept up in its splendour by the distance of bread-tax profits—growing up in his stren and maturity to work for 6s. a week, and to house feed as he can; his only refuge—his church, if one so say—the beer-shop; his only chance of tasting any better than dry bread being to go out in the night plying in the preserves of the squire who is resident half his course steering between the Bays and Charybdis the workhouse and the gaol, with beyond them, in the distance, a view of the gallows made visible by the fire of a neighbouring barn. (Loud cheers.) For wretched as such a career of hope has arisen, and it will hold on its way until it attains the meridian of truth and justice, and the bright light and knowledge that it sheds upon the power that principle of operation in the League which has led to the understanding of mankind, and provided them with information; which has shown not only to the class that was immediately influenced to begin this agitation, but through all classes, commercial or agricultural, the devastating and demoralizing influence of the monopoly to which we are opposed. (Cheers.) There are indications of the advance of our cause in the present condition of the hostile power. Where is the great compact phalanx that two years ago was arrayed against us? Where the power which, in the election of 1841, carried everything before it like a whirlwind—where, I ask, is it now? (Hear.) Quarrelling about almost every question that can be started; contending fiercely respecting a Welsh bishopric; fighting desperately about Dissenters' chapels; going to quarrel about the new poor-law; having quarrelled about the ten hours bill; and being involved in a deadly feud on the subject of the sugar duties. (Cheers.) Why, there they are,—high church and moderate church—ancient Tories and modern Conservatives—Young England and Old England,—there they are, till the Premier, stirring up the heterogeneous materials, may well exclaim:—

"Double, double toil and trouble;
Fire, burn; and, caldron, bubble." (Laughter.)

And this is Sir Robert Peel's "great Conservative party," which he was ten years in amalgamating. (Cheers and laughter.) The present condition of the House of Commons reads a very impressive moral lesson to statesmen, to avoid in future the endeavour at forming a party without a principle; or, what is pretty much as bad, the formation of a party with half-a-dozen antagonistic principles. In opposition, Sir Robert Peel courted them all, avoiding the committing of himself with wonderful dexterity; but still each was given to understand—confidentially as it were—that there was good in the combination. It was only to unsettle the Whigs, and the rest was all to follow. The amalgamation succeeded so far, and now it exhibits the right honourable baronet in the most pitiable position in which, I think, a Prime Minister has ever been placed. (Cheers.) Needed for his dexterity, and tolerated for nothing else, there he is, toiling at their work: needed by all, scorned by all, thwarted by all, reproached by all, and the reproaches bearing this marvellous uniformity—that they all strike in one direction; nobody accuses him of being so sturdy in his principles that he is impracticable—no one charges him with being rash, and going to extreme lengths in the carrying out what is right and proper, but every one all round intimates "treachery." The word "trickster" is on all their tongues, and, as they search their calendars over, they all agree in giving him Judas for his patron saint. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) In this age of invention and discovery we should be astonished at but few things; novelties follow with such marvellous rapidity, and are often of so extraordinary a nature; but not the least astounding is the recent discovery by Sir Robert Peel of the principle of his administration, which he has just found out is the relaxation of our commercial system of prohibition and protection, and the letting in, in competition, the articles produced in other countries with similar articles produced in this. He did not make this discovery before he came into office: there was no announcement of it in the Tamworth manifesto; and it was never proclaimed on the hustings in the election of 1841. He comes out with it only now that he is in a difficult and entangled position. Let his followers think what they will of his new principle, it may recommend some of his measures to us, but it will not commend himself. (Hear, hear.) It can attract no confidence in any quarter. When the time shall come—a period which the pragmatism of the Whig party makes not impossible—that some statesman must propose the total repeal of the Corn Laws, it may be that Sir Robert Peel will do it: from his hands, as from any other, we will take that repeal, but not as from a champion; not as from one who has claims to trust and confidence, but from one who, if he knew the right, all along dallied with the wrong, and pursued it while it gave him political power, and who, therefore, can only take his place amongst those whom the might of public opinion has conquered into the allowance of a good to a nation that ought never to have been refused. (Cheers.) I have often in this place addressed earnest recommendations to those who assemble here, that they should exert themselves in such ways as their circumstances allow for the furtherance of our cause; that they should pay attention, for instance, to the registration, and do whatever they can to get those who are entitled to vote, and who are friends of our objects, to place themselves in a position for the exercise of their political rights. That they should exert themselves in canvassing, and by the distribution of tracts and conversation spread abroad the knowledge of our principles, and the conviction of their truth. I will only briefly advert to one other topic. Yesterday was the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo. The warriors who won that tremendous fight are enjoying their laurels. Many of them are in a very influential position, and I could wish that the occasion should suggest to their minds an inquiry into what it was that had weakened the social power of Napoleon before his military strength reserved the complete destruction which it did at Waterloo. Now, I believe that, in tracing the course of events, we should have to go back to the time when his Berlin decree declared the British islands in a state of blockade. The laws of trade, it has been said, and most truly so, crushed him like a weed. Opinion had ebbed from him, destroying the allegiance and respect for his policy all over Europe before the prodigious reverse which his arms sustained on the 18th of June. The system was hollow, and he himself gave it the first great blow in those anti-commercial proclamations to which I have referred. Well, then, let the warriors who triumphed over one blockade of Great Britain think well before they support a class which, in its turn, attempts also to blockade Great Britain. (Hear.) The Corn Laws are a blockade: they warn foreign ships from our shores; they cut off our supply of food; they treat us like a besieged people; they girt us round as though they would starve us out. The blockade which the Duke of Wellington raised by his arms was not more essentially a blockade than this of monopoly, only the latter has not the pretence of being imposed for a great national policy like the former, but for a paltry class interest. It is not that the lordship of Europe is at stake in the contest, but merely that so much more rent per annum is at issue. (Cheers.) It is not that kings come into conflict with nations, but it is that those whose property lies in the manufacture of food and in the production of fish in the waters (laughter), or even country, and for birds, feel their interests at stake, and therefore wage war and endeavour to encompass with their blockade the industrious and toiling multitudes of England. (Cheers.) The system of monopoly is as anti-national as the commercial policy of Napoleon was hostile to the interests of Europe; and it can no more last than did that of the French Emperor. No power, whatever victories it may have achieved, can sustain this imposition of monopoly; the blockade will have its Waterloo of final defeat, and monopolist legislation its St. Helena of exile from the boundaries of the civilized world. (Loud cheers.) I trust that the warriors who yesterday assembled, satisfied with the laurels they have gained, rejoice in their hearts that there has not since been occasion for more laurels, and that the peace has been unbroken; long may it continue so. (Hear, hear.) But whether we ascribe the cessation of warfare to the exhaustion of the resources of nations—which no doubt has much to do with it, or to the growth of opinion—and that, I trust, has also some influence in the matter—I mean the opinion which deprecates an appeal to the sword for the settlement of questions between nation and nation, which may be adjusted amicably, as well as those of individuals where there is mutual consideration and forbearance,—wherever these are, in whatever proportions their combinations be, the causes—the antagonist principles to warfare—are also the antagonist principles to monopoly. If nations cannot fight because they are exhausted, assuredly they cannot bear the pressure of monopoly when their resources are exhausted. If opinion has set in strongly against the conflict of nation with nation, opinion is equally decided against the conflicts of class with class, especially of the rich and powerful with the poor and laborious, for a portion of their earnings. (Cheers.) These same causes will work on in correction of the one mischief, I trust, as they have done in correction of the other. The features are the same of these two sorts of evil: if war impoverishes, if it brings down the merchant from his height of fortune, lays waste the resources of the nation, and crushes the poor into yet deeper poverty, why, monopoly re-enacts all these scenes, and carries on its oppressive influence from year to year. If war desolates the fair face of nature, makes ruins of cities, and a desert where fields had been covered with the waving corn, what is the tendency of monopoly also, but to make the grass grow in populous towns, and keep large tracts of country a desert, which might otherwise have borne their abundant harvest for the consumption by means of Free Trade of labouring multitudes in distant lands. If war kills, if it stains the field of strife with human blood, monopoly destroys human life also by hundreds and thousands from year to year, and that, too, by lingering agonies, far worse to endure than the short stroke of the sword or the cannon-ball. If war demoralizes, training thieves whom peace brings to the gallows, monopoly demoralizes also, opening up the sources of crime, spreading it through the different ranks of society, and inciting to theft and violence, until it fills our goals and calls down the vengeance of the law. (Cheers.) Alike in the evils they generate, and opposed by the same antagonistic principles, I rely on one overruling process for the destruction of both—the same moral law condemns both systems for their criminality, and the same Divine Providence will ultimately work for both a total annihilation. (Mr. Fox concluded his address amidst enthusiastic applause.)

The CHAIRMAN then came forward and said:—Ladies and gentlemen, I have simply to state that, in consequence of the motion of Mr. Villiers being expected to be brought before the House of Commons next Tuesday, it is not our intention to hold a meeting in this theatre on Wednesday next, but on this night fortnight we hope to see you all again.

The meeting then separated.

WIGAN.—On Monday evening, an argumentative, able, and eloquent lecture, on the advantages of Free Trade, and the evils of the corn and colonial monopolies, was delivered in the large room at the Buck-ith-Vine Inn, Wigan, by Mr. Falvey, one of the lecturers of the League. There was a full and an attentive audience, and the lecturer was enthusiastically applauded in various portions of his address. At the close, a Chartist, named Hylop, asked some questions, which were satisfactorily answered by Mr. Falvey.

THE FREE-TRADERS OF FARNWORTH AND KERSLEY.—On Monday evening, the 10th inst., the friends of Free Trade in Farnworth and Kersley sat down to an excellent dinner, provided by Mr. Tong, the host of the Golden Lion, Moses-gate, Wm. Barton, Esq., in the chair, and Robert Peat, Esq., in the vice-chair. After dinner, the following toasts were drunk with great enthusiasm:—"The Queen;" "Prince Albert and the royal family;" "Earl Fitzwilliam and the Free-Trade peers in the House of Lords;" "Mr. Colcland and the Free-Trade members of the House of Commons;" Mr. Brown, the representative of, though not the member for, South Lancashire, and the Free Trade electors who voted for him;" "Free Trade with all the world;" "The people, the source of wealth;" together with several other toasts, all of which were very ably responded to by Messrs. Cunningham (of Liverpool), Wardle, Prestwich, Eatock, Dyson, Greenwood, Berry, Eckersley, and several other gentlemen. During the evening, several glees, &c., were sung in excellent style by the Messrs. Prestwich; which added to the harmony of the meeting. Towards the close of the meeting a subscription was entered into (and carried out with great spirit) for the purpose of defraying all expenses incurred by the two townships of Farnworth and Kersley in the late election, by endeavouring to secure the return of Mr. Brown to Parliament, and to the honour of the place he it known, that although there was a local committee sitting daily from the time a Free-Trade candidate was brought into the field until the close of the election—and in no place were there more active exertions made by either party than the Free-Traders made in this little spot—still every farthing has been paid by their own voluntary subscriptions, and at the next contest for South Lancashire the Free-Traders of Farnworth and Kersley can enter the field without fear of being dunned for old unpaid election scores. Bravo! this is the right sort of feeling and action.—Bolton Free Press.

LANCHESTER.—On Wednesday evening Mr. Liddell, of the Anti-Corn-Law League, delivered a lecture at Lanchester, on the Corn and Provision Laws, and their injurious effects upon farmers and agricultural labourers. Arrangements had been made for delivering the lecture in Mr. Suddess's long room, and placards issued to that effect; but Mr. Liddell, in order to meet the wishes of an influential bread-taxer, delivered the lecture in the open air. Surely the Corn Laws are injurious to the nation, when those who maintain them must interfere with the landlords of inns in the use of their rooms. Though the wind was high, and some rain falling, there was a numerous audience, including some eminent farmers, and the lecture was heard with the greatest attention. At the conclusion of the lecture an opportunity was given to any one to defend the Corn Laws, which no one accepted, and tracts were copiously distributed, and eagerly received.—Durham Chronicle.

FREE-TRADE LECTURE.—A public lecture, on the principles of Free Trade, was delivered at Ormskirk on Thursday evening last, by Mr. John Murray, of Manchester. J. Robson, Esq., of Moor-hall, presided. Another lecture, on the same subject, was given the following evening.

THE ANTI-LEAGUERS.—We have always looked upon the Anti-League Protection Society as one of the most impudent humbugs of the day. We regard it as a mere patronage-absorbing association, and nothing else. It was once observed by some wicked wag, that he always considered the escutcheon displayed on the front of a house in memory of its departed lord to be an advertisement in plain English, "A widow to let." And even so the catalogue of Anti-League protectionists would appear to be a mere list of needy or greedy gents, hinting to the minister that they greatly lack his scraps of patronage to keep them quiet. See how the thing works with all the noisy ones of the lot. What a ferocious champion of monopoly intact old nunquam tuta fides, alias Sir Edward Knatchbull, used to be! Where is he now? He is, strange to say, holding a good place under the "bit and bit" Free-Trade Administration. What, also, has become of that long-tongued country gentleman, Mr. Dundas Christopher, who, at one time, vowed such terrible things against the Ministers if they dared to touch even the outworks of monopoly? We know not. He has lost his voice. He is, we believe, alive, but his objections to Free Trade have marvellously subsided. Either he is convinced that he was wrong in his former opposition to it, or, properly grateful, he does not like to throw obstacles in the way of a Premier who has sent his brother-in-law to govern Jamaica, and bestowed large church preferment on his relation. And where is the Duke of Buckingham? Convinced of his errors by the bestowal of the Garter upon him by Sir Robert Peel, he has just given another shake to monopoly by sending to Parliament an out-and-out Ministerialist for Buckingham, to support the reduction of the wool duties, as well as those on sugar, as the natural forerunners of the fall of the Corn Laws. And where, last of all, is that most blatant of all the enemies to the Free-Trade tendencies of the Ministry, his Grace of Richmond? He, likewise, has just given in his adhesion or submission by sending up one of his own family to be a Government hack as the member for Chichester, a subordinate place in the Ministry having very opportunely been bestowed upon his brother by Sir Robert Peel, who, having some knowledge of human nature, wisely concludes that, when people show their teeth, it is not always a proof that they intend to bite, but, perhaps, only a hint that they are hungry and want feeding. At all events, he appears to have made some very accurate guesses as to some of his friends on this point. If he had not been a Prime Minister, he would have made an admirable keeper of a menagerie. While others are alarmed at the terrible howlings into which the animals under his care occasionally break forth, he understands exactly the meaning of the noise. It is but a hint that "FEEDING TIME IS COME." He straightway casts the offal of his patronage before them, and all is hushed. The roaring of the lions, the bellowing of the "fat bulls of Bashan," and the chattering of the monkeys, all cease at the sight of the loaves and fishes. Harmony and peace are restored, and the vision of the happy family, all living in love and unity together, is realized upon the Ministerial benches.—Liverpool Chron.

IMPORTANT CORN CASE.—In the case of Barrow v. Arnaud, Lord Denman delivered judgment on Tuesday week. The defendant was the collector of the import duties at Liverpool, and the plaintiff a corn-merchant in the same place. Upon the Thursday next, after the Friday on which the Sliding-Scale Act received the royal assent, Mr. Barrow applied to Mr. Arnaud to sign a bill of entry for the admission of a certain quantity of wheat. The day of the application was that upon which the first weekly average was to be made by the controller of the corn returns, and it was made by him upon that day, but not transmitted to Arnaud until the following day. Arnaud not having any certificate of the average under the new act, demanded the duty which would be repayable on the repealed statute; and, as Barrow contended that the latter statute (the 9th George IV., c. 60) having been repealed, no duty would be payable under it, he refused to sign the bill of entry, upon which the defendant refused to sign the bill of entry, for which refusal the plaintiff brought the present action to recover damages for the injury he had sustained in losing a market for his wheat. The case having come on for trial at Liverpool, the jury found a special verdict, which embodied the facts of the case as we have mentioned them above. The only question for decision was, whether the Legislature had not in the Sliding-Scale Act omitted to make any provision for levying the duty upon the importation of corn during the six days which intervened between the day upon which that act obtained the royal assent and the day upon which the first weekly average was to be made under its provisions. The judgment upon the verdict was given for the defendant.—Manchester Guardian.

We noticed last week that the Mark-lane Express had attempted no reply to Lord Ducie's statements with regard to the cost of producing wheat. The editor invited his "experienced practical readers" to answer them, and said that, if they were "allowed to pass uncontroverted, they would produce more effect than a volume of argument unsupported by practical experience." Another week has elapsed, but none of the "experienced practical readers" have ventured to contradict any of his lordship's statements. He had shown that wheat could be grown at 3s. 6d. a bushel on land paying 50s. per acre, including tithes and taxes; and that the farmer would make 20 per cent. profit on his capital if he sold his wheat at 6s. 8d. the bushel, or 44s. the quarter, which is 11s. 6d. the quarter less than the present average.—Manchester Times.

THE SUGAR DUTIES.
(From the Manchester Guardian.)

The administration of Sir Robert Peel, which was recently placed in a situation of great difficulty, during the discussions on the Factory Bill, has received another, and, we think, a ruder shock, by an adverse decision of the House of Commons, upon the ministerial resolution fixing the future amount of the sugar duties. It will be seen from our report of the debates in the House of Commons on Friday night that Sir Robert Peel, in accordance with the intimation contained in his speech on the budget, moved a resolution to the effect that, from and after the 10th of November next, the duty on sugar from British possessions should be 21s., and on the produce of Java, Manilla, China, and such other countries as Government might hereafter declare, 31s. per cwt. On this resolution, Mr. Philip Miles, one of the members for Bristol, and a large West India proprietor, moved an amendment to the effect that the duty on British sugar should be 20s. per cwt., and on foreign 30s., with the exception of white clayed sugars, on which he proposed a duty of 31s. per cwt.

At the first sight, it may probably appear to some of our readers that the principal difference between these two propositions is a reduction of duty, by that of Mr. Miles, to the extent of 4s. per cwt. below the rates proposed by Government. Now, if this had been the real state of the case, we think few of our readers would doubt as to which of them ought to have had the support of the Liberals and Free-Traders in the House. Fully believing, as we do, that the present sugar duties are too high, and that a substantial diminution of them would be highly beneficial to the country, and, eventually, by no means injurious to the revenue, we should have been exceedingly glad to witness the triumph of Mr. Miles's amendment, and the consequent adoption of duties of 20s. and 30s. in lieu of 21s. and 31s. per cwt. on British and foreign sugars respectively.

But a mere general lowering of the duty was by no means the object of Mr. Miles, and the members of the West India interest who supported his amendment. They were perfectly well aware, that the whole, or very nearly the whole, of the foreign free-labour sugar, which, under the proposed change in the law, can be introduced into this country (though not more valuable than good West India brown Muscovado sugar), is exported from Java and Manilla in the state of white clayed sugar, on which Mr. Miles sought to place a discriminating duty of 14s. per cwt. instead of 10s. In other words, the object of that gentleman was really to obtain for the growers of sugar in British possessions an additional protection of 4s. per cwt.; and the proposed reduction of duty to 20s. and 30s. (on brown sugars) was neither more nor less than a cunning trap to catch the votes of those who might think the duties proposed by Sir Robert Peel were too high. Into this trap, we regret to say, nearly the whole of the Liberal members, including Lord John Russell, Mr. Labouchere, and other leaders of the Liberal and Free-Trade party, rushed with inconsiderate steps, and thus placed themselves in the very false position of voting, by implication, for an additional protection to the British colonial sugar-growers. We say by implication, because the formal effect of the vote was merely to negative the proposal of the Government; but, as the choice really lay between that and the amendment of Mr. Miles, to vote against the one was, in effect, to vote in favour of the other.

To the general error of the party who took this false step, the conduct of Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, Mr. Milner Gibson, and about twelve more of the Free-Traders, formed a very creditable exception. They saw and pointed out the hollowness of the pretext under which Mr. Miles sought their votes, and supported the ministerial proposition; but the result was, that Sir Robert Peel's resolution was negatived by a majority of 20.

Of course, this defeat coming so soon after the previous defeats on the Factory Bill in the House of Commons, and on the Welsh Bishopric Bill in the House of Lords, caused a very great sensation in London; and reports were exceedingly rife, to the effect that Ministers had either tendered or determined to tender their resignations. Whether there was any foundation for these rumours we are quite unable to say; but it is clear from the result, that, if Sir Robert Peel and his coadjutors ever thought of resigning, they abandoned their intention, and determined to try the chance of another appeal to their supporters in the House of Commons. This they made on Monday evening, when Sir Robert Peel, after explaining at great length his views upon the subject, declared his intention of moving upon Mr. Miles's resolution (which had then become the original motion before the House) an amendment, the effect of which was to substitute his own scale of duties in lieu of that which Mr. Miles had proposed; and he intimated pretty plainly, that, in the event of being defeated on that amendment, he should decline to continue in office. A very long and interesting debate ensued, in the course of which Lord John Russell and some other members of the Liberal party declared their intention of adhering to the principle of their former votes, by supporting Mr. Miles's resolution, but intimated that they should endeavour to extend the discriminating duty on clayed sugars to those from British possessions. This intimation was, no doubt, intended to remove the appearance of a vote in favour of additional protection; but, if they could have carried out their views on this point, they would not thereby have removed the objection, seeing that the discriminating duty would have applied to nearly all the foreign and to little or none of the West India sugar to be imported.

We are glad to say, however, that, on a division, Mr. Miles's proposal was negatived by a majority of 22; the numbers being 233 for, and 255 against it. Sir Robert Peel's amendment was afterwards carried without opposition; and, though not yet entirely out of danger, we hope it will speedily become the law of the land. It is, as the recent division clearly shows, the best measure which we are likely to obtain in the present composition of the House of Commons; and, in addition to its intrinsic value, it has the important extrinsic advantage, that it must very speedily bring about further and more beneficial changes.

Of course, on an occasion like the one which we have been describing, there are many curious changes of opinion, and some of which will expose the parties concerned to severe animadversion. Amongst the votes which have excited the greatest amount of astonishment amongst certain classes in this neighbourhood, is that of Mr. Entwistle, the newly-elected member for South Lancashire. When it became known here that his name was included in the list of the majority against Ministers, his Tory friends stood perfectly aghast; no doubt recalling to mind his declaration, that he was going to Parliament as a staunch supporter of Sir Robert Peel. To us, however, Mr. Entwistle's conduct caused no surprise at all. We knew pretty well that, in case of a difference of opinion between Sir Robert and the thorough-going monopolists in the House, Mr. Entwistle was pretty sure to fling overboard his allegiance to the Premier, and to go to the utmost extent in favour of monopoly. This opinion we publicly expressed at the time of the late election; and Mr. Entwistle has very soon verified our prediction. He gave his vote against Ministers on Friday, on the ground, as declared by himself on Monday, that he wished to give further protection to the West India interest. Having, however, as we suspect, received some earnest remonstrances from his friends on the vote he had given, the hon. gentleman announced that he should abstain from voting on Monday, and he retired from the House before the division. We imagine that some of his mercantile supporters will begin to be of opinion that they have got a very pretty bargain in their new representative.

WHO WAS IN ERROR?

(From the Economist of this day.)

In order to determine this point, let us shortly consider what will be the practical effect of the Ministerial proposition to establish the duties of 21s. and 31s. on colonial and foreign free-labour sugar respectively.

The greatest proportion of all the sugar which comes to Europe is for the purpose of refining. It is only in this country that Muscovado sugar is used to any extent; and here about two-fifths of the consumption is computed as being used in that state. The price of sugar in every country is therefore determined by its value for refining; and in this respect the finest Muscovado sugars are nearly, if not quite, equal in value to most of the white clayed sugars. In a Price Current before us, the price of the best yellow East India sugar and best white (clayed), are both quoted at 68s., including the duty; the price of the best white Manilla (clayed) is quoted at 22s. in bond; while best Cuba yellow (Muscovado) is quoted at 23s. per cwt.; and Java sugar (all clayed) is quoted from 17s. to 25s. in bond; while Cuba Muscovado ranges from 17s. to 21s. Now, there is no principle more generally admitted than that when high duties are levied upon commodities, the best qualities only are taken for consumption; inasmuch as a specific duty is, in reality, much higher upon an inferior than a better quality. It is true we pay a high duty upon all qualities of colonial sugar, but that only in consequence of the higher differential rate of duty charged on other sugars, which makes the commonest West India sugar worth more in bond than the finest foreign sugar. The effect of the new regulations will be to cause a consumption of about 40,000 tons of foreign sugar, in addition to the 200,000 tons of colonial sugar now supplied. These 40,000 tons can be supplied with the greatest facility from Java, Manilla, &c. It must, however, be very evident that, practically, only the finest class of sugars will be taken by our refiners to pay duty upon. The price of all qualities in bond will be determined by the general value in Europe, and for refining in bond for export; the common qualities will therefore be all taken for refining in bond, while the best qualities alone will be selected whereon to pay the high duty proposed of 31s. per cwt., because those qualities will yield a proportionably larger net produce of refined sugar of higher value, on which the duty will practically be less per lb. than it would be on the smaller quantity of inferior quality which would be produced from low-priced sugars. The effect will therefore be that 40,000 tons of the best quality of Java and Manilla sugars will be taken for the consumption of this country, while all the inferior qualities will be used for refining in bond and re-exportation. Now, let us suppose that that quantity can be procured at 26s. per cwt., for we must expect that the demand for this country will raise the price of foreign sugar; to that price we must add the duty of 31s. and 5 per cent. (say 35s. 9d.), which will make the duty-paid price 61s. 9d. Colonial sugar, of a similar quality, will command the same price of 61s. 9d. per cwt., from which, if we deduct the duty payable thereon of 25s. 3d., will leave 36s. 6d., or about 6s. less than the present price of that quality in bond. We may, therefore, state the account thus, to show the effect on the colonial planter, the consumer, and the revenue:—

| Total consumption of sugar, say— | |
| 240,000 tons, or 4,800,000 cwts. at 61s. 9d. | £14,820,000 |
| Thus distributed:— | |
| Value in the markets of the world of 4,800,000 cwts. at 26s. | £6,240,000 |
| Duty paid on 4,000,000 cwts. at 25s. 3d. | 5,050,000 |
| 800,000 cwts. at 35s. 9d. | 1,430,000 |
| Protection to the colonies, or differential duty on 4,000,000 cwts. at 10s. 6d. | 2,100,000 |
| | £14,820,000 |
| Or thus:—Intrinsic value of sugar | £6,240,000 |
| Revenue | 6,480,000 |
| Protection to colonies | 2,100,000 |
| | £14,820,000 |

When first Mr. Miles's amendment was proposed, Mr. Labouchere objected to it, because it established a higher differential rate of duty by lowering that chargeable on colonial, and retaining the foreign duty at the highest proposed rate. This objection was perfectly consistent with the clear and distinct views which that right hon. gentleman has always shown on this very intricate, confusing, and deceptive subject—differential duties. He saw at once that that proposition would only tend to a loss of revenue, without benefit to the consumer. Had Mr. Miles's first proposal been entertained, the above national sugar account would have stood thus:—We should still have to buy 40,000 tons of foreign sugar in the markets of the world at 26s., to which the same duty would have to be added of 35s. 9d., making the duty-paid price, as before, 61s. 9d. Colonial sugar of the same quality would command the same price in the market; but as it would only in this case be subjected to a duty of 20s. and five per cent. (or 21s.), it would now be worth 40s. 9d. per cwt. in bond, in place of 36s. 6d., as above, or thus:—

|--|-------------|
| Total cost of 4,800,000 cwts. sugar at 61s. 9d. | £14,820,000 |
| Thus distributed:— | |
| Value in the markets of the world of 4,800,000 cwts. at 26s. | £6,240,000 |
| Duty paid on 4,000,000 cwts. at 21s. | 4,200,000 |
| 800,000 cwts. at 35s. 9d. | 1,430,000 |
| Protection to colonies, or differential duty on 4,000,000 cwts., at 14s. 9d. | 2,950,000 |
| | £14,820,000 |
| Or thus:— | |
| Intrinsic value of sugar | £6,240,000 |
| Revenue | 5,630,000 |
| Protection to colonies | 2,950,000 |
| | £14,820,000 |

Thus by the reduction of duty merely transferring £850,000 from the revenue to increase the amount of protection. On this intelligible ground Mr. Labouchere rejected the first proposal of Mr. Miles; and we feel well assured that, had he considered the effect of Mr. Miles's proposition a little more, he would have discovered that it was not only as objectionable, but even more so, and that he would have supported Ministers against that, as he had expressed his intention to do against Mr. Miles's first proposal.

There may be a difference of opinion as to the exact proportion of the different kinds of foreign free-labour sugar which would come to this market, which would respectively class under Mr. Miles's 30s. and 34s. duty. It has been variously stated; as much as seven-eighths of the whole, it is said, would come which would class under the 34s. duty. But Mr. Labouchere expects that a larger proportion of Louisiana and other sugar would be available, which would class under the 30s. duty. For the sake of examining the effects of this scale of duties, it matters little what the exact proportion would be—let us take it at a half that would class as Muscovado or brown clayed at 30s. duty, and half as white clayed at 34s. duty. Still, as before, the refiners would have every inducement to select the best and highest priced sugar, on which to pay the respective duties. But now another principle would come into operation in their choice of these sugars, which, it is most strange, seems to have been entirely overlooked in the whole discussion of this question. The refiners in the selection of their sugars would then find that, instead of one differential duty, they had now practically two differential duties. Their purchases would now consist of 20,000 tons of the best white clayed sugars, and 20,000 tons of the best Muscovado and brown clayed. The price of white clayed sugars would be the same in the markets of the world as in the former case, viz., 26s. per cwt., to which the same duty of 35s. 9d. would still have to be added, making the price of sugar exactly as before, 61s. 9d. There is no imaginable reason why this should be altered from anything connected with the change of duties; as in the last case, the price of colonial sugar would also be the same, viz., 40s. 9d., being less by the duty of 21s. than the entire price of 61s. 9d. Then let us inquire what would determine the price of the intermediate description, the 20,000 tons subject to the 30s. duty. When the refiners went into the market to select sugar, they would find white clayed at 26s., on which they must pay a duty of 35s. 9d. If they found Muscovado sugars of as great a value for refining, it is clear that they would as willingly pay 30s. 3d. for that article on which the duty with the 5 per cent. would only be 31s. 6d., as they would pay 26s. for the former; both would cost them when the duty was paid the same price, 61s. 9d., or, which is more likely, if they found Muscovado sugars, the intrinsic value of which, as compared with less, inferior clayed in the 21s. 9d. term would obtain cost to sole wout of the the le then 4,800,000 ther duty T Value equi —4, Duty Prote cwt. with the white clayed, was only 21s. 9d., or 4s. 3d. less, it would be as profitable to give 26s. for these inferior Muscovado sugars, as for the superior white clayed, because they would save the difference of value in the duty; and no quantity of Muscovado sugars at 21s. 9d. coming into competition with white clayed, would reduce the price of the latter, because that would be determined by their intrinsic worth in the markets of the world. Proportionably less refined sugars would be obtained from the same weight of Muscovado, and the cost to the consumer would therefore be the same. The sole effect, therefore, of Mr. Miles's last proposition, would be to establish a second differential duty in favour of the 20,000 tons of sugar admissible at the 30s. duty, to the loss of the revenue. The national sugar account would then have stood thus:—

|--|-------------|
| 4,800,000 cwt. of sugar, or equivalent thereto by lower quality and net produce, at 61s. 9d. | £14,820,000 |
| Thus distributed:— | |
| Value in the markets of the world, or equivalent thereto according to quality | |
| 4,800,000 cwt. sugar, at 26s. | £6,240,000 |
| Duty paid on 4,800,000 cwt., at 21s. | 4,200,000 |
| " 400,000 cwt., at 31s. 6d. | 630,000 |
| " 400,000 cwt., at 35s. 9d. | 715,000 |
| Protection to the colonies on 4,000,000 cwt., at 14s. 9d. | 2,950,000 |
| Protection to the importers of Muscovado and brown clayed sugar on 400,000 cwt., at 4s. 3d. | 85,000 |
| | £14,820,000 |

The comparison of the three plans would be thus:—

| | Ministerial Plan. | Mr. Miles's 1st Proposal, not supported. | Mr. Miles's 2nd Proposal, supported. |
|---|-------------------|--|--------------------------------------|
| Intrinsic value of 4,800,000 cwt. sugar | 6,240,000 | 6,240,000 | 6,240,000 |
| Revenue | 6,480,000 | 5,630,000 | 5,545,000 |
| Protection to Colonies | 2,100,000 | 2,950,000 | 2,950,000 |
| Do. to importers of Muscovado or brown clayed foreign sugar | | | 85,000 |
| | £11,820,000 | £14,820,000 | £14,820,000 |

The amendment, therefore, discussed did really involve a loss of revenue of £335,000, without a gain of one shilling to the consumer. And if this be not strictly true, then are the whole objections raised to the principle of differential duties invalid and untenable. The truth is, that the price to the consumer must always be fixed and determined by the highest rate of duty added to the intrinsic value of an article in the market, in bond, and any lower rates of duty on other similar produce cannot act in favour of the consumer, but only add to the first price paid for such favoured produce; and the fact of such lower rate of duty being charged on quantities so slightly varying in their intrinsic relative value in no way alters the case. The commonest brown Mauritius sugar, worth 48s. or 50s., duty paid, enjoys as much the advantage of the differential duty as does the finest Jamaica sugar worth 68s. per cwt. Though the sugars in question at present vary in value from 17s. to 21s. per cwt., yet that difference only expresses the actual proportionate intrinsic value; and nothing can be more plain, than if you subject the quality worth 17s. to a lower duty by 1s. 3d. per cwt. than that at 21s., while their relative intrinsic value is not altered, the price to the consumer will remain the same; but that price will always be determined by the rate at which the highest duty added to the natural intrinsic value will furnish the commodity.

An argument in favour of the 30s. duty on Muscovado sugar has been very current, which we think equally untenable, viz.: that at that duty it would be practicable to bring Louisiana sugar, while at the 31s. duty it would not. Now, the slightest consideration must show any one that an importing merchant is not interested in the actual amount of duty charged on his goods so much as on the amount of any difference between the duty charged on his produce and that of more favoured countries. Thus the importer of Louisiana sugar would be quite indifferent to a reduction of the duties from 21s. and 31s. to 20s. and 30s. The price, as we have shown, which he receives in bond, and in which alone he is interested, is regulated not by the actual amount of duty, so much as by the difference.

Under such circumstances, we cannot conceive how the Free-Trade party could with any degree of propriety act otherwise than oppose Mr. Miles's motion, and support in preference thereto the better measure proposed by the Government, though far short of their entire principles; and we believe the more men reflect on the subject the more will they see that it was the best course for the true interests of the country, and the most consistent for the whole of the Liberal party to have pursued;—most consistent with the measures on which they relinquished office in 1841;—most consistent with the amendment on the sugar bill, supported only a year ago by the party. We must own we cannot appreciate the fine, though strictly technical, distinction which Lord Howick made in the first division, between voting against the Government bill and Mr. Miles's amendment. It was certainly open to any member to vote against both, but if successful what would have been the result of that policy?—either to have had another worse bill proposed and carried by the support of the West India interest, or the present law renewed for another year. In a recent article (May 25th) we showed how much and how urgently the country requires an additional supply of sugar, and is likely more and more to do so during the present year; and it would certainly not have been a very creditable thing for the Liberal party, had it been the means of inflicting a recurrence of the evils of scarcity, high prices, and deficient revenue, from which we suffered in 1840.

By the Trade List published by the Custom-house on the 4th inst., we find the supply of sugar and present stock this year, as compared with last year, as follows:—

| | West India. | | Mauritius. | | Bengal. | |
|--------------|-------------|----------|------------|---------|-----------|--|
| | Hhds. | Fierces. | Barls. | Bags. | Packages. | |
| Imported to | | | | | | |
| June 4, 1843 | 25,360 | 2,258 | 3,708 | 179,315 | 230,664 | |
| " 1844 | 19,300 | 1,380 | 2,478 | 180,126 | 160,175 | |
| Stock:— | | | | | | |
| June 4, 1843 | 10,184 | 1,132 | 1,781 | 61,230 | 88,589 | |
| " 1844 | 4,658 | 490 | 1,035 | 65,442 | 102,158 | |

And the stocks in the country are reduced to the lowest obb pending the uncertainty of these discussions.

We think it will be admitted that Mr. Miles and the West India interest were correct in the view they took of the effect of the amendment to counteract Free-Trade progress; and that those, whose only acknowledgment of party compact is strictly bound up in the advancement of these principles, were not only justified in the course they took, but could not consistently have pursued any other; and we feel assured that the more people reflect upon it, the more will that course secure the approbation and imitation of others. The greatest good cannot fail to arise from the discussion of the principles of differential duties, so little understood, which has been provoked by this debate.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEMORIALS.

YORK.—The following correspondence has been handed to us, with a request that we would insert the same in this day's LEAGUE.

LETTER TO H. R. YORKE, ESQ.

York, June 14, 1844.

"DEAR SIR,—On the part of the committee of the York Anti-Corn-Law Association, I forward you, by the post of this day, a memorial signed by a majority of the registered electors of this city, earnestly entreating your support in favour of Mr. Villiers's motion for the total repeal of the Corn Laws, to be brought forward in the present session.

"From the statement below, you will perceive that the actual number of the registered electors is 3329, of which 1717 (a clear majority of 53) have signed the memorial. But the views of 481 have not been obtained, and assuming that one-half of these, or 242, are favourable to Free Trade, the number of repealers will be 1959. Besides 129, who declined signing, have expressed themselves decidedly favourable to the requisition, and ready to prove their sincerity in the cause of Free Trade whenever an election may occur; therefore, the total number of Free-Traders cannot be short of 2088. And we may reasonably consider that those who advocate a small fixed duty, are friendly to the cause rather than otherwise, for many of them will no doubt eventually see eye to eye with us. As near as we can ascertain they number 92, all of whom we can afford to give to the monopolists, and still possess a majority of 424.

MR. YORKE'S REPLY.

"SIR,—A very important family consideration, calling me express into the country, has deprived me for the moment of the satisfaction with which I should trace the signatures, name by name, of those who have very kindly, though very unnecessarily, given themselves the trouble to address me.

"Without following, as you have pointed them out, the electoral advantages which such and such a vote would confer, and which alone would not influence me, it may be sufficient to refer to the votes I have already given on corn, and to add, that those great principles to which, when on my probation before the constituency of York, I professed a general adhesion, seem, to my mind, as the progress of intelligence, of time, and of population go forward, only to claim a higher and more comprehensive respect.

"I beg, gratefully and respectfully, to remind my friendly memorialists, that I protest against huntings' declamation, for the purposes of deception; that, though a modification of words may be permissible and even prudent under circumstances, I do not say one thing to mean another; that as to principles recognised and avowed there ought to be no doubt, no disguise; and that, with reference to such, I will keep my faith and fealty to them.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

London, June 15."

We understand that a similar letter was sent Sir J. H. Lowther, but that his answer has not yet been received.

Huddersfield.—The electors of Huddersfield have nobly discharged their duty in the present juncture. In pursuance of the plan of operations recommended by the League, they have transmitted to their representative, W. R. C. Stanfield, Esq., an expression of their opinion that all restrictions on the supply of human food are injurious to the community at large, accompanied by a requisition that he will support, by his vote, the motion of the Hon. C. P. Villiers, for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. The electoral body of the borough numbers 692. Of these 499, or 5-7ths of the entire constituency, have subscribed the memorial to their member. We have been at some pains to analyse the state of opinion of the voters in this district, and the following is the result—the accuracy of which may be depended upon:—

|---|-----|
| Free-Traders who have subscribed the memorial | 499 |
| Free-Traders who decline subscribing any more petitions or memorials to the present Parliament or its members | 14 |
| Fixed duty-men | 12 |
| Neutrals | 16 |
| Removals by death and otherwise | 31 |
| Monopolists | 120 |
| Number on the registry | 692 |

The merchants and manufacturers of the district are busily engaged in making preparations for the support of the League's forthcoming exhibition of British arts and manufactures. While the men of Huddersfield are thus up and doing, the women are not inactive. A ladies' local committee has been formed to aid the Bazaar, by contributions. Three meetings have been held, at which the utmost enthusiasm was manifested, and practical means adopted for the furtherance of the great object. Huddersfield, indeed, sets an example to the constituencies of the country. Let them "go and do likewise," and the doom of monopoly is sealed.—Leds Mercury.

BARNARD CASTLE.—At the great Anti-Corn-Law meeting, held some time ago in Barnard Castle, it was unanimously resolved, that petitions should be got up for signature by the electors, to be presented to each member for the Southern Division, earnestly requesting their vote in favour of Mr. Villiers's motion for a total repeal. Each elector was accordingly waited upon, and we are happy to state, the most cheering result has been experienced; for out of the 148 resident electors, 132 willingly signed the memorial, leaving only the small number of 16 refusals, many of whom advanced satisfactory reasons for declining; for it appears that a "lordly" petition has been lying for some time at the King's Head Inn, in favour of the now existing Corn Laws, and that means have been employed to obtain the signatures of the farmers, tenants, and others, many of whom stated to the repeal canvassers, that they would have willingly signed their petition, but that they had to sign an opposite one, much against their consciences. The memorials were lately forwarded to each member, accompanied with the following letter:—

"MY LORD,—I forward to you a memorial from the electors of Barnard Castle, humbly but earnestly requesting you to vote for the motion to be brought forward by the Hon. C. P. Villiers, in the House of Commons, for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.

"I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your obedient servant,

"To Lord Harry G. Vane." JOHN GIBBON.

The following answer has been received from John Bowes, Esq.:—

"51, Conduit-street, June 3, 1844.

"SIR,—I am this day in receipt of your letter, and of a memorial from the electors of Barnard Castle, desiring my vote in support of Mr. Villiers's motion for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. It is a matter of very great regret to me, that I feel compelled, on this important question, to differ from so numerous and respectable a body of my neighbours and friends, as I cannot, in accordance with my previously expressed opinions, and my conscientious convictions, support Mr. Villiers's proposition.

"I am, Sir, your faithful servant,

"To Mr. John Gibbon." JOHN BOWES.

We cannot but notice the conclusion of the honourable M.P.'s reply, where, not for the first time, he subscribes himself to be a "faithful servant." Servants they indeed are, and as such are engaged to represent the requirements of the people; but mark, the majority, not the minority, constitute them members, and, as a matter of course, ought they not to advocate the wants of the majority? But, how frequently, nay, we could almost say, do they not always, represent themselves, their own pecuniary interests, and the minority, or few; but we hope, indeed are certain, that when Barnard Castle has again to choose her "faithful servant," one who will advocate and carry out the object and principles of the great Anti-Corn-Law League, and the desire of the great mass of the people (if not previously obtained,) will carry the way. We cannot but again notice the conduct of the working class of Barnard Castle, in the great Anti-Corn-Law movement, amongst whom may be favourably particularised, Gibbon, Baker, Davis, Blackett, and others, who, time after time, have shown their strong attachment to Free-Trade principles, and who, by their pecuniary aid and active exertions, have elicited the admiration of all, and, undaunted in the face of discouragements, are determined to persevere: were the great body of electors and non-electors to copy an example from Barnard Castle, we have no doubt that neither the Corn Laws nor any other monopoly could long exist.—Tyne Mercury.

The memorial to the members for Carlisle, requesting them to support Mr. Villiers's motion for a total repeal of the Corn Laws, was forwarded to them on the 7th inst., signed by 532 registered electors. The total number of names on the register is 1025, amongst which we have counted 73 duplicates and deaths, exclusive of many free-men and others who have left the neighbourhood or cannot be found. It appears, therefore, that the majority in favour of Free Trade is considerably above 100.—Carlisle Journal.

HOW TRADE SUPERSEDES FEUDALISM.—As long as war lasts, the nobles, who must be soldiers, rule very well. But when peace comes, the nobles prove very whimsical and uncomfortable masters; their frolics turn out to be very insulting and degrading to the commoner. Feudalism grew to be a bandit and brigand. Meantime trade (or the merchant and manufacturer) had begun to appear: trade, a plant which always grows wherever there is peace, as soon as there is peace, and as long as there is peace. The luxury and necessity of the noble fostered it. And as quickly as men go to foreign parts, in ships or caravans, a new order of things springs up; new ideas awake in their minds. New command takes place, new servants and new masters. Their information, their wealth, their correspondences, have made them quite other men than left their native shore. They are nobles now, and by another patent than the king's. Feudalism had been good, had broken the power of the kings, and had some very good traits of its own; but it had grown mischievous, it was time for it to die, and, as they say of dying people, all its faults came out. Trade was the strong man that broke it down, and raised a new and unknown power in its place. It is a new agent in the world, and one of great function; it is a very intellectual force. This displays physical strength, and installs computation, combination, information, science, in its room. It calls out all force of a certain kind that slumbered in the former dynasties. It is now in the midst of its career. Feudalism is not ended yet. Our governments still partake largely of that element. Trade goes to make the governments insignificant, and to bring every kind of faculty of every individual that can in any manner serve any person, on sale. Instead of a huge army and navy, and executive departments, it tends to convert government into a bureau of intelligence, an intelligence office, where every man may find what he wishes to buy, and expose what he has to sell, not only produce and manufactures, but art, skill, and intellectual and moral values.—The Young American, by R. W. Emerson.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

London, June 17, 1844.

DEAR SIR,—You will greatly oblige a few friends of liberty, by sending the enclosed half-sovereign to the independent elector, Charles Snowdon.

Yours respectfully, ROBERT HASTINGS.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

June 20, 1844.

SIR,—The enclosed sovereign, being the fourth amount from friends desirous to assist and sympathise with Charles Snowdon, who has so nobly done his duty in defence of the insidious threat held out to him at the late Exeter election, you will please to forward to him without delay. It is not enough that we are members of the League; we should be ready, as one man, and show the country that we are determined to sustain and save from penury such noble victims who suffer in support of our righteous principle. We should remember that small amounts, regularly supplied, would furnish ample funds for such a purpose, and scare away those who would make a traffic of the consciences of those who have so zealously espoused our good cause, and are its energetic and vigilant advocates. Our foes are subtle and plausible, and are ever on the alert to enmesh the weak and unsuspecting voter, whom they labour to turn to their own account by bribes, threats, and intimidation, thus violating the most sacred privilege we possess—a privilege which should be exercised fearlessly, and for the benefit of our famishing fellow-countrymen, who demand that justice should be done them.

I remain, your obedient servant,

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

PETER PLAYFAIR'S LETTERS.—No. III.

Brussels, June 10, 1844.

Trinity Sunday was ushered in with a long and solemn procession from the Chapel of the Holy Trinity to the Cathedral of St. Gudule. Tall and graceful fir-trees were planted before every house in the line through which the procession had to pass. Garlands of flowers, and festoons of blue, white, and red drapery, were to be seen hanging from every window; and at the entrance of one street I copied an inscription which ran thus:—

"Happy Rue de Chêne (Oak-street)! The Holy Trinity is come! Rejoice! Hallelujah!"

The procession itself was full half a mile long, and composed of military, clerical, and lay members. First, a squadron of Guides, or the body guard of the King, with a splendid band of music; then the young girls of the district, and those of the parochial schools under the age of fourteen, in white muslin dresses; next the powerful band of the Harmonie Society of Brussels; after them the boys of the parish, the acolytes of the church, the young men of the district, a company of light infantry soldiers with their band of bugles, the different orders of the clergy with the symbols of the Catholic worship; and, lastly, the bishop of the diocese, under a splendid awning, or canopy, of cloth of gold. The ceremonies ended with a sermon at the cathedral on the doctrine of the Trinity, and a benediction from the head of the church.

I have been minute in describing these forms, because it is interesting to compare them with those of our own simple faith. It is interesting, too, to note the coincidence of forms in the ceremonies of Christian churches. I read in the London papers a few days after that the Trinity Brethren, with the Duke of Wellington as Master, went in procession by water on Trinity Monday to Deptford, inspected the schools established by the brethren, and attended a sermon on the doctrine of the Holy Trinity by the eloquent chaplain of the order, the Rev. Henry Melvill. It is probable that the ceremonies in which our iron-heeled warrior assisted are partly derived from the observances of the Catholic Church, although they would scarcely now admit of a parallel, especially as in this as on most other occasions in England the solemnity is made to wind up with that very essential part of the performance, a public dinner.

Perhaps no country in Europe exhibits stronger external signs of religious worship than Belgium. I have no intention to enter at large upon this subject, or to draw invidious distinctions. But it is impossible even for a cursory observer to avoid being struck by the number of the festivals of the church and the religious fervour of the people. They are probably remnants of Spanish domination, and of the power which the church possessed in the middle ages. Nor would it be right to speculate upon the influence which street processions, accompanied with gold and glitter, and incense and music, may have upon the uninstructed mind. It is enough for us that we prefer the simpler and sterner faith of our fathers.

But, though I abstain from offering any opinion as to the nature and character of such matters, I may be permitted to offer my praise to the principle of Free Trade, if I may so express it, which is acknowledged here in all religions. Sir James Graham intends, it is said, during the present session of Parliament, to propose a bill in England permitting free trade in physic, so that the valetudinarian will be able to apply to any one in whom he has faith for the treatment of his bodily disease, with reference to colleges or halls. Here the same principle is observed in religious matters. Every minister of a Christian creed, whether foreigner or native, is supported at the expense of the state, and the consequence of this provision is, that all bickering and bitterness seem to be prevented, and freedom of opinion in religious matters effectually ensured.

The country around Brussels is chiefly under corn cultivation and vegetables to the table. The quotations for grain, as I have taken them from the Price Current of this week, reduced into English weights and English money, are:—

|----------------|-------------------|
| For fine Wheat | 10s. per quarter. |
| Rye | 27s. " |
| Barley | 25s. " |
| Oats | 17s. " |

Bread varies from three farthings to three halfpence per pound, according as it is made of wheat flour, rye and wheat mixed, or rye flour alone. Horses on a journey are commonly fed with coarse bread, which is convenient to carry, and is a good substitute for oats. The environs of Brussels on the French side are very lovely; on the Dutch side they are flat, consisting chiefly of meadow land. The railroad from Brussels to Malines passes over a dead level. About six or seven miles from Brussels, on the Malines road, is Vilvoorde, the ancient Fildurum, formerly a principal town and free city of Brabant. At the entrance of this town is the central prison, modelled on the plan of the new prisons in England and the United States. It contains 2000 prisoners, each of whom has a separate apartment, and the greatest order and propriety are observable throughout the establishment. The silent system has been considerably modified in this penitentiary, and I could not hear of a single instance in which madness had supervened as a consequence of the harsh and inhuman practice of compelling silence. From Vilvoorde to Malines the country is very lovely, and in a high state of cultivation.

Malines, June 12, 1844.

Malines, or Mechlin, is the central point upon which all the railroads of Belgium converge. The railroads form a cross, the common centre being at Malines: from this point one branch passes to Ostend, in the direction of England; another to Antwerp, in the direction of Holland; a third towards France, and a fourth to Germany; these are the principal lines, and from these lines ramifications branch off to various towns on the frontier. The administration of the railroads is in the hands of the Government; and the authorities, conscious of the importance of rapid and cheap communication, have made the charges moderate. On the lines which I have traversed, I find the charges amount, in round numbers, to about three halfpence per mile for the diligence, or first class carriage; one penny for the char-à-banc, or second class; and a halfpenny per mile for the waggon, or third class. But it is to be remarked that the two latter carriages are more comfortable than a similar class of carriages in England. The third class, for example, is furnished with seats, and is covered in winter; and the second class with windows and cushioned seats. There is also in every train carriages of each class, so that the poor man may travel by a passenger-train in the third-class carriage, instead of being obliged, as on the "Great Western," to go by the baggage-train in the middle of the night. In the third-class carriage smoking is also permitted, and many persons prefer this conveyance in fine weather. When will the poorer classes of her Majesty's subjects meet with similar consideration in England? Upon one point, in reference to the Belgian railroads an Englishman may well be proud. Nearly every locomotive bears the name of an English maker; the road itself was planned and executed under the instructions of an English engineer; and most of the superintending engine workers are Englishmen: facts which, taken together, afford practical evidence of our superiority in civil engineering and mechanics. The town of Malines, or Mechlin, was formerly celebrated for its manufactures, and especially for its laces. In the fourteenth century Malines boasted 3200 looms. The population does not now exceed 25,000 souls, and the manufactures are chiefly confined to blankets, cotton counterpanes, imitation cashmere shawls, and a little lace. The cathedral is justly celebrated for its beauty. It was begun in the twelfth century, and occupied 300 years in building. The tower, which was intended to be the highest in the world, is still unfinished. It is the same height as the steeple of St. Paul's, London, and was to have been reared 96 feet higher, but the stones prepared for it were carried off by the Dutch in 1583, and used to build the town of Williamstadt, in Holland. The dial of the clock measures 48 feet in diameter, and each of the 12 figures is taller than myself, although I stand 5 feet 10½ in my stockings; a fac-simile of this clock, in the paved square of the cathedral, enabled me to take these measurements. Malines is the residence of the primate of Belgium, and the head-quarters of the church. It is fortified, and was taken by the Duke of Marlborough in 1706. The name Mechlin signifies that the ocean once flowed up to the city, and that its site was gained from the sea.

Louvain, June 15, 1844.

Louvain is now called the Catholic University of Belgium, in contradistinction to Brussels, which is the Liberal University: they bear the same relation to each other, if allowance is made for difference of faith, which Oxford and Cambridge bear to the University of London. Louvain was once, however, a great city, the capital of the province. Even in the 16th century she boasted 200,000 souls. Her outer wall extended for 7 miles; and her university, to which 43 colleges were attached, was attended by 8000 students. Since then, the university has declined, and it is now little better than a Catholic seminary. The empty colleges remain, melancholy monuments of former greatness, and witnesses of the fact that, in her free and palmy days, more distinguished men were sent from the University of Louvain than from any other university in Europe. In 1604 the college church, erected on the site of a temple dedicated to Mars, fell down, burying beneath it many houses. A short time afterwards the celebrated Justus Lipsius, a renowned ornament and pillar of the university, died. The double misfortune occurring about the same time gave rise to the following pithy chronogram:—

OMNIA CADUNT.

Louvain has continued ever since to decline, and now numbers only 25,000 inhabitants, and about 400 students. The town-hall is an edifice in the florid arabesque style, unequalled for beauty by any edifice in Europe, something like Henry VII.'s Chapel, adjoining Westminster Abbey, but infinitely more elaborate in style and in finish, with exquisitely sculptured groups of figures, biblical, historical, and mythological, over the façade. A story is told, that when the work was completed the poor sculptor had his eyes put out to prevent his ever eclipsing this his first and great work. But though human life and human suffering were but lightly thought of in those days, it is to be hoped that the story is a fable.

Liege, June 18, 1844.

The road from Louvain to Liege changes its character entirely, and instead of a level, flat country, we have a constant succession of hills and valleys, viaducts, cuttings, and tunnels. The panorama from the railroad, upon entering Liege, or from the Bellevue on the opposite hills, is one of the most lovely that can be described. The city itself is built in a romantic valley, watered by the Meuse, which is seen winding through its rocky banks. The surrounding hills, wooded to the summit, or covered to their almost perpendicular heights with the green and graceful vine; the Moorish steeples of the churches, and the fantastic old buildings which dot the landscape here and there, fill the observer with unbounded admiration. Seen in a clear and cloudless day, from any of the heights which surround the town, Liege looks like a city embosomed in the Happy Valley of Rasselas; nor can you imagine it to be the Birmingham of Belgium until you pass from its squares and principal streets into the narrow lanes, where its manufacturers dwell. No one should visit Liege without perusing or reperusing Sir Walter Scott's novel of "Quentin Durward." It is perfectly surprising how accurate the great novelist is in delineating a locality he never visited. The palace in which the Prince-Bishop was murdered by his turbulent subjects is now used as a palace of justice. Its inner courtyard is surrounded by cloisters, supported by innumerable pillars, carved in an arabesque Gothic style, no two of them alike, but bearing some resemblance to modern silver candlesticks, with elaborate chasings. With some slight confusion of dates, the facts of history are truly described by the great romancist; but it is a question whether the Liegeois, in combating for their independence, merit all the hard things said of them by the chroniclers of the day, or whether, on the contrary, it is not to the bold burghers of the enfranchised towns of Flanders and Brabant that we are indebted for the first stand against feudal tyranny, and for the liberty and freedom which we now possess. Certain it is that, in Liege then as in Liege now, commerce has brought wealth, and knowledge, and independence in its train; and the rich stores of coal and iron in her neighbourhood, with a navigable river at her door, which, though not wider than the Thames at Richmond, is navigable above and below the town, will always render Liege a place of commercial importance.

I propose next to pass down the Meuse by Maestricht into Holland,—

"A country drawing fifty feet of water,
In which men live, as in a hold of nature;
And when the sea doth in upon them break,
And drowns a province, doth but spring a leak."

THE TAXES PAID BY FARMERS.—The old fallacy, that the farmers pay more than their fair share of taxes, and that consequently the community should make up the difference to them by paying a higher price for corn, was employed by the Duke of Richmond last Thursday evening in his speech against Lord Montagu's motion for a committee of the House of Lords to inquire into the operation of the import duties. The noble chairman of the Agricultural Protection Association affected to be quite as favourable to the appointment of such a committee as any one could be; his sole reason for opposing it on the present occasion being his alarm lest people might suppose he was a friend of Free Trade were he to vote for a motion which had been prefaced by a speech in favour of Free-Trade principles:—"He, for one, should have been very glad to have the inquiry proposed; but he could not vote for it after the speech of his noble friend who proposed it, and of his noble friend who followed in the debate, because, if he did, he should at once be admitting that he was a Free-Trader; but that there was one single argument in all that was uttered by his noble friend, he was not prepared to admit in the slightest degree. His noble friend who made the proposal said, that he was for a protective duty if they could show him that any one class was more severely taxed than another. Why, that was the very reason he should have gone into that inquiry, because, did any man mean to say that the farmers of England were not more taxed than any other men? They knew that on the farmers were imposed the taxes of the country. They knew that by law the manufacturers ought to pay for their profit, but it could not be got at; and the farmer who did not make £300 by his farm paid more than a manufacturer who, perhaps, in some years might make £30,000." Now, when his grace made this rash statement regarding the large amount of taxes paid by the farmer, he surely must have been ignorant of the existence of a return lately issued, on the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of the produce of the income-tax for the year ending April 5, 1843. Had he only taken the trouble to glance over that return, he would have seen, to his great astonishment, that, of the £5,384,125 produced by that impost, the entire amount contributed by the farmers of England, Scotland, and Wales, who are described as "a class more severely taxed than any other," is only £298,763, or about one-eighteenth part of the whole sum collected. As for the merchants, manufacturers, and others, comprehended in schedule D, and whose profits "cannot be got at," if one might believe the Duke of Richmond, we find, from the parliamentary return, that they contributed £1,466,984, nearly 400 per cent. more than the total sum paid by the farmers. In making this statement, we do not say that the latter class are able to pay much more than they do at present. Most of them are only tenants-at-will; and this circumstance, coupled with that desperate competition for farms which prevails in most parts of the kingdom, prevents the great mass of agriculturists from adopting such improved modes of cultivation as might enable them to realize a decent income. But, even if the Legislature were to relieve the farmers from the income-tax altogether, they would, under the present state of things, derive no more benefit from such a relaxation of their burdens than they have done from the reduction of the poor-rates to less than one half of what they were twelve years ago in many parts of England. Should the poor-rates in one parish amount to 10s. in the pound on the rental, still they form no special burden on the farmer, seeing that he only pays so much less rent than his neighbours in the next parish, where the rates happen to be only 5s. in the pound. With the great mass of farmers, all that remains of the money they have received for their produce, after maintaining themselves, and paying taxes and rates, must go for rent, so that every diminution in their burdens is clearly so much gain to the landlord. Hence the unreasonable complaint of the Duke of Richmond, as to the undue pressure of taxation on the farmer, is neither more nor less, when analyzed, than a question of rent.—Manchester Guardian.

AGRICULTURE.

THE STATE OF THE PEASANTRY.

The monstrous absurdity which Sir James Graham, the Home Secretary, thought it decent to countenance when, in reply to Mr. Milner Gibson's inquiry whether the Government was taking any means to ascertain the causes of incendiaryism now so prevalent in Suffolk, he said, that "it was the work of a few wicked spirits, probably perambulating through the districts in question," has met with a prompt and decided contradiction from Sir Henry Bunbury. Sir Henry is a Suffolk landowner, who has resided constantly in his own county; and he appears to regard the state of the agricultural labouring classes with kindness and common sense. In a letter addressed to a local newspaper, he says he "cannot discover any ground" for the opinion expressed by Sir James Graham, and avows his "conviction that these incendiary crimes are the symptoms of a smouldering and dangerous discontent." In proof of this, Sir Henry adds:—

"In the course of the thirty years that I have lived in this county, I have seen this or a similar disposition to destroy the property of the farmers burst out three or four times; but I have never seen it show itself except at times when the labourers had, or believed they had, especial causes of complaint, with but little hope of redress."

And he guards himself against misconception by saying, that the labourers in general are not concerned in these fires, but that "circumstances beget dissatisfaction in the minds of the labourers and their wives. They murmur. If there be no amendment the tone of their murmur becomes more angry, more frequently it is mingled with rash threats as they converse in publichouses, or in their own cottages." With this state of mind prevailing amongst the peasantry, there may be some one or two individuals in a parish, who, from vindictiveness, desperation, or even wanton mischievousness—perhaps, occasionally, some half-witted creature or child—actually put in practice the savage threats which destitution, or fear of destitution, has caused to be recklessly or thoughtlessly uttered by the half-employed agricultural labourers. This is quite confirmed by the testimony of the Times correspondent, which we quoted last week; for it must not be imagined that the labourers whose wives tell the clergyman that half employment "puts bad thoughts into their husbands' heads," actually commit these crimes, but they talk about them rashly, and some wilder or more desperate character—possibly, some man who has been imprisoned, hunted down, and originally rendered an outcast from society for poaching—takes up the thought and puts it into execution. The deficiency of cottage accommodation, now universally admitted, together with the general disuse of the old practice of boarding the unmarried farm-servants in the farm-house, tends to render the condition of the younger peasant peculiarly uncomfortable. He has no place in which to pass his evenings, or often to cook his food and obtain warmth and shelter, but the beer-house; and there he goes in a discontented and sulky frame of mind to meet those whose misfortunes or whose habits have rendered them criminal. This, combined in many, perhaps in most, cases with extreme ignorance, produces the worst results whenever any general feeling of dissatisfaction exists amongst this class of labourers. That such is the state of the unmarried farm-servants in Suffolk is made abundantly plain by the second letter of the Times correspondent, and we know that the same evils are in operation in most of the southern and eastern counties. There is no difficulty in tracing this evil to its source, namely, the unsettled and fluctuating state of English agriculture, caused by the system of which the Corn Law forms the cornerstone; but, as Sir Henry Bunbury observes, it would require a pamphlet to go into detail as to all the causes of agricultural discontent, and we must, on a future occasion, refer more particularly to this part of the subject.

Upon the "circumstances" which occasion the general discontent of the Suffolk labourers Sir Henry is most distinct—and to the accuracy and more general application of his facts we can, from personal observation, bear testimony—when he says:

"The great grievances are the inadequacy of wages compared with the work performed; the frequent dismissal of the labourers from employment because the weather is too wet, or the weather is too dry, or on similar pleas; and that, speaking generally, the ill-paid or discharged labourer has nothing to fall back upon as a resource. To these circumstances, which have been in full operation for some time past, must be added the new poor law. It is useless to alter with the question; there is the deterioration; be it reasonable or not reasonable, there it is."

The operation of the new poor law upon the rural labourer has been undoubtedly severe, for it has driven him into a labour market where, from the funds properly applicable to wages being frequently abstracted to make up rents, he finds a redundant supply of labourers, while he has nothing to fall back upon but the union workhouse.

Into this part of the question it will likewise be our duty to enter in some detail in a future article; at present we are most anxious to place before our readers the evidence as to the state of the peasantry which the occurrences of the day are bringing forth. The full effect of that evidence we shall hereafter sum up. Upon the poor law Sir Henry says:—

"When that alteration was made in the law, I was willing to welcome it as an instrument of good. I had seen and had experience of the evil practised under the old law; and I imagined that, when farmers were relieved from the expense of maintaining paupers in idleness, they would have employed more men and at better wages. I deceived myself. In its organization the new scheme is far preferable to the old parochial jobbing; but in the working, it has been brought to operate with a cold harshness that is revolting to the feelings of the labouring class. It may not be fashionable to speak of the 'feelings of the labouring class,' but this I will say, that in the two parts of this county, in which I have spent thirty years, I have found plenty of good feelings in a great majority of that class; I have found them simple-minded, well-meaning, and grateful for kindness; and as for industry, I do not believe the world can produce a more willingly hard-working race of men."

That "more men are not employed, and at better wages," is far less the fault of the farmers, on whom Sir Henry seems to cast the blame, than on his own class, the landowners. The farmers are as much victims and sufferers from a vicious system as the labourers themselves; and therefore the sore in our social system, which the incendiaryism in Suffolk indicates, requires to be probed far more deeply, and to be treated with remedies far more potent, than the suggestions with which Sir Henry Bunbury's letter concludes would point to, when he says:—

"Let lands and cottages to labourers at reasonable rates; pay them wages in fair proportion to the work they do; discharge them not because there comes a day of rain, or a day of frost; talk to them, talk with them, come to know them, advise them, and encourage them. You will have no more fires; nor will a Secretary of State's mind be taxed to imagine incendiaries perambulating through Suffolk."

This is all very well, but who is "to bell the cat," how is the state of agriculture, described by the Times correspondent as existing in Suffolk—deservedly esteemed, by comparison, one of the best-farmed counties in England—to be dealt with? Are there no preliminary changes necessary to enable the farmer to "employ more men, and at better wages?"

The following, by the Times's correspondent, is a very correct general account of the condition of a large proportion of the farmers:—

"It would not be amiss, in the first instance, to give a notion to your readers what station the farmers in this county occupy. The farms run generally from 200 to 1000 acres, the large farms being what are called flock farms, where immense droves of sheep are reared. It requires, according to the mode of farming common in this the finest farming county in England, a capital of from £800 to £1000 to cultivate every 100 acres of land. A large farmer, therefore, is a man of considerable capital, realized or borrowed, and even the smallest farmers are respectable men. The large farmers live in some degree of style, and all in comfort. In many cases farmers commence with insufficient capital for the size of their farms, and borrow money to sufficiently work them, trusting to Providence for a good season to enable them to pay off their debt, or they continue to pay interest. In these cases, if the season should not turn out well, the labourer is the first to suffer. The rent and the interest must be provided for at certain days, and the farmer manages till the pay-day arrives, and then makes an effort to meet his liabilities; but the labourer has to be paid ready money every week, and the farmer endeavours to dispense with him as much as possible. If it is a bad day, he does not give him a job in-doors; or, if it is too dry, he does not set him to work on other things—in fact, tries to save all he can; for, though ostensibly an extensive farmer, he has enough to do to pay rent and interest of money, and live up to his station, and the labourer suffers. Where the farmer has capital enough, the labourer fares better. I give this merely as a picture of the position of the generality of farmers here, without explaining the rate of wages, which will be matter for further examination."

This is enough to account for the distressed condition of the agricultural labourers whenever prices of corn fall below the act of Parliament price; and no one can go amongst and converse with the rural classes, the farmers, and the farm-servants, as the Times reporter has done, without becoming convinced that want of capital, and unwillingness to employ sufficient capital in the cultivation of farms, are the grand causes of the deficient and irregular employment of the peasantry. The readers of the LEAGUE will be at no loss to trace these causes to their real source—the CORN LAWS, which have, to use the words of the parliamentary committee of 1833, rendered "the fixed rent of the farmer a hazardous speculation." Yet the law of distress enables the landlord to enforce his rent in all years and under all circumstances, and that although its enforcement may cause the farm-labourers of the kingdom to be half-starved. If this be at the bottom of our agricultural distresses, if this be indeed the seat of that ulcerous disease which is affecting the vital interests of the nation—and we challenge the monopolists and their allies to gainsay it—must not this sore be probed to the quick, though legislators and party-politicians groan, and monopolist and mortgaged landowners may wince? And, God willing, it shall be probed to the bottom.

HOW TO GET THE BEST OF AN ARGUMENT.

There is a method of reasoning to which the monopolists are addicted that seems to be very consolatory to the self-love of the reasoner, though it carries mighty little conviction to the minds of other people. This consists in making some extravagant assertion, or asking some ridiculous question, and then, shutting their eyes to all exposures, to stand stoutly by their nonsense, and reiterate their falsehood or their fallacy as if neither had ever been noticed or displaced. Another plan is, to assume that anything of which the individual monopolist happens to be ignorant does not exist. As an instance of the last, we give the following passage from a letter in the Mark-lane Express on the subject of Earl Ducie's statements as to the cost of producing wheat, where the writer says:—

"I looked rather anxiously to this week's paper, to see what practical men would say upon the subject, but was disappointed in finding no notice taken either of Lord Ducie's statement or your invitation for discussion."

We are not surprised at that. The monopolists do not much relish such distinct practical statements as Lord Ducie's; they like to deal in imaginary, intangible, and hypothetical cases. Thus the correspondent says:—

"Now, I submit to you, Sir, that no reliance whatever can be placed on Lord Ducie's statement, as there are many indirect charges arising out of the general result of the other operations on the farm which cannot well be estimated."

This is nonsense, but let that pass:—

"If Lord Ducie will show up in your columns (in the same detail I say as he has done the cost of growing wheat) the entire working of his farm at Whitfield for three or four years, or even for two years, exhibiting the annual net profit, we shall then have matter before us upon which we can rely."

If I understand right, it is the object of his lordship to prove to the public that when farms are well managed, as is the case at his lordship's farm at Whitfield, the profits are so large as to admit of a considerable reduction in the value of agricultural produce, without unduly pressing upon the tenant.

"If this be his lordship's object, I submit that he should show to the public the general result."

Does not this ignorant know that Mr. Morton, his lordship's manager of Whitfield farm, has published a very full and complete account, which shows that there are no "indirect charges" which cannot be well estimated by a farmer who understands his own business, and that the general result shows an ample profit.

Of the former class of monopolist reasoners we take the following example from the Farmer's Journal—and our readers have seen the mess the writer made of the Duke of Richmond's salmon case—which, in allusion to ourselves, says:—

"We are quite aware that our contemporary will find it inconvenient to answer the question we now, for the third time, put, but, notwithstanding, repeat it:—Has not the writer in the LEAGUE always insisted that Free Trade would not cause any reduction in the rentals of the landed proprietors of the country, and how does he reconcile that position with his exultation over the diminished value of the Dukes of Richmond? Will he venture to repeat this query in his next publication, and reply to it? We trow not."

Now, the "inconvenience" of answering this question is limited to the mechanical trouble of writing what we have so often written before. We have repeatedly shown that so great is the capacity of nine-tenths of the land of this country for increased production, provided the tenant has a secure tenure (that is a lease not containing injurious restrictions), the absolute control over the game, and the permanent landlord's improvements done for him which are necessary to good farming, rents will not fall under a state of natural price—Free Trade—but the contrary. On the other hand, where landlords grant no leases, make no improvements, preserve game, and "vote their tenants," rents must fall with or without Free Trade. But even should all the rent be lost in consequence of Free Trade, that would form no justification of the landowners' monopoly, for as rent is only the surplus after the repayment of all expenses of cultivation, with ordinary profits, if the fact really was, as the monopolists allege, that the Corn Law permanently raises prices some 30 or 40 per cent., it would simply prove them to be more wholesale plunderers than we have believed. The Corn Laws are dishonest contrivances for a dishonest purpose, but they have proved a fearful illustration of the truth that dishonesty, whether by an individual or a class, is, in the long run, as unprofitable as it is unjust. The difference between the Duke of Richmond's salmon fishery and the ordinary owner of land is this, that the tenant of the fishery had probably such a reasonable lease as enabled him to make the most of the property, whereas, in ordinary cases of land letting, the tenant-farmer is little more than a kind of bailiff, who gets enough to pay his rent from the consumer in times of scarcity, and from his own capital or that of his creditors in seasons of abundance.

LANDLORD CANT.

When the landlord legislators of this landlord-ridden nation stand up in their places in Parliament, and declare with unblushing front that they support this measure or oppose that because it affects their own sordid interests, their conduct is sufficiently disgraceful and disgusting; but when, having misused their legislative power to advance their own interest by the wholesale spoliation of the industrious classes, they, with cool Pecksniff-like complacency, claim to be the especial friends and protectors of the labouring many, it becomes difficult to find adequate terms in which to express contempt for such hypocrisy. These reflections arose unbidden on perusing in the last number of the Mark-lane Express the following attempt to foist upon its readers a solemn piece of landlord humbug, as calculated to "elicit the best feelings of human nature." The writer commences by saying that "every day's experience affords additional proof of the necessity of giving attention to the condition of the labourer," and adds:—

"We have long since, and frequently, expressed our apprehensions in respect to the social condition of our working population, daily increasing in numbers, but without a corresponding increase in the staple means of existence—employment. To find employment is a matter of primary importance, and should demand the attention of the state, not of a great nation like this, not by providing direct employment, but by endeavouring to open the channels of labour."

The truth of the propositions contained in the above passage is incontrovertible, and we read on with considerable interest, expecting suggestions for the employment of the peasantry in some sort corresponding with the preliminary flourish. We looked for some reference to the irregular employment of agricultural labourers consequent upon the uncertain tenures on which farmers hold their farms, and the low standard of cultivation induced by yearly tenancies. We anticipated suggestions of agricultural improvements, the draining and subsoiling heavy lands, the chalking and claying light lands, and the more generous treatment of land and stock by which the employment for the farming labourers of England might be doubled at the fiat of the lords of the soil, would they only grant long and rational leases. We were, however, doomed to disappointment; for the writer having indicated his knowledge of the crying evil of our community, passed on to a second branch of the subject, saying:—

"Next to finding employment, the point of most importance is that of endeavouring to elevate the working man in the scale of humanity, by showing him that if he displays, so far as his situation will permit, the qualities which adorn man, in whatever rank or station, those whom Providence has placed in the superior grades of society will hold out the hand of fellowship to him."

"We yield to none in anxiety to 'elevate the working man,' especially the rural working man, 'in the scale of humanity;' but our readers shall judge whether we are wrong in our conclusion that the melodramatic display to which these fine sentiments—oh, there is nothing like sentiment—are intended as introductory, is not calculated to have directly the contrary effect. They shall decide whether 'the superior grades of society,' as represented by the Duke of Richmond, his compeers, and dependants at the Goodwood sheep-shearing dinner, do not, in fact, 'hold out the hand of fellowship' to the labourer in a very left-handed manner. Hear, however, what the monopolist organ says about the meeting:—

"We have been led to these remarks from having last week had the gratification of attending the meeting of the West Sussex Agricultural Association, held at Goodwood, and of which His Grace the Duke of Richmond is president. Here the landlord, the tenant, and the labourer meet and dine together in the same room. [Tremendous condescension.] Here the best feelings of human nature are elicited in the wealthy and independent, by bestowing rewards and commendation where due; in the poor and lowly, by accepting with a consciousness of deserving it the reward of integrity, industry, and good conduct."

This betrays great ignorance of "human nature," and would be excessively silly were it not intended to minister to an exceedingly sinister purpose. Does the writer really believe—can the rent-loving landocrats and monopolists who get up these farces seriously suppose—that the following is anything like a true representation of the influence of such meetings?—

"Much as the pecuniary reward is an object of importance to these poor men, we know, from what we have learnt of the system, that they esteem the permission of dining in the same room with the landowners of the neighbourhood and their own employers as a distinction and an honour which stimulates them to good conduct."

Fudge! Can anything be more absurd than to suppose that such a dinner to a few pet labourers of the Goodwood domain can efface from the minds of the peasantry the deep injuries they are hourly enduring at the hands of the landowners? If any indulge in that illusion, let them peruse the following summary of the proceedings of this meeting:—

"His Grace the Duke of Richmond presided, supported on the right by the Lord Bishop of the Diocese, the Hon and Rev. L. V. Harcourt, J. Baring, Esq., George Darby, Esq., M.P., J. Barton, Esq., the Venerable Archdeacon Webber; and on the left by the Earl of Chichester, Charles Scrace Dickins, Esq., the Earl of March, the Hon. John Carnegie, the Venerable Archdeacon Manning, Haaler Holist, Esq., &c. &c. A large number of the neighbouring clergy and gentry attended."

The Bishop of Chichester, in returning thanks, said:—

"I have been delighted to hear from the lips of His Grace the assurance, which I had previously entertained, that the Lord-Lieutenant and the gentlemen of this county are well disposed to second every effort made for the welfare of our poorer brethren. I assure you that that assurance went to my inmost heart. Those are the interests which I am placed here to superintend. But individual exertions will be called forth in vain, unless our lay brethren come forward to our support."

Now, the courtly prelate's language expresses somewhat of the "delight" of one who has received an unexpected pleasure, and by what is this called forth? Why, by the "assurance" that the gentlemen of the county are well disposed to second every effort made to aid the labourer! This looks very much as if the gentlemen of the county had not hitherto got much beyond good dispositions or intentions towards the poor, and we all know the proverb about "good intentions." Nor has the benevolent Bishop apparently any more tangible ground for delight than the "rules and regulations of this association." Nothing can more strongly mark the Christian frame of mind of this excellent spiritual peer than his thankfulness for "small mercies."

Next we find Archdeacon Manning approaching, though with the tenderest tread, one of the great evils under which the agricultural labouring class suffer, and which is entirely caused by the selfishness or negligence of the landowners, we mean the deficiency of cottage accommodation:—

"Next to the faithful discharge of the pastoral office, the faithful discharge of the duties of the landlord is essential to the welfare of the parish. We wish to have their assistance in personally visiting the cottagers. We can easily procure assistance, so far as the mere giving of money is concerned, but that is a very insufficient way of discharging the duty of charity, and furnishes but a slight text of it. We know very well that money may be given by hands merely as being required by public decency; it is not such a cheap thing as this that deserves the name of charity, but the personal visit to the cottager, which involves self-denial. This is the best text of charity. If they would with the pastor visit the poor at their homes, we should then be much better able to forward the improvement of the dwellings of the poor. It has been my great privilege for the last eleven years to be conversant with the poorer classes; and it is to me a subject of the greatest congratulation. You, my lord duke, I know, are well aware of the state of the poor around you. The state of the chamber has a very intimate relation to their character; and you have now pledged yourselves to promote their comfort as regards their dwellings. Some petty and trifling disturbance between the landlord and the cottager may have permitted the wind and the rain to penetrate to their fire-sides. If there be one thing more abominable than another in the eyes of Divine mercy, it is to see from the poor man more money for rent and to do less in repairs. (Cheers.) I invite you, from this day, to enter with my reverend brethren upon this important subject. Very pleasant it was to me to hear yesterday from your grace the desire that every poor man in this county should possess a stake in the hedge. I thank your grace for the sentiment. It is impossible but that every poor man should have a stake in the hedge. We are assured by an authority to which we must all defer, that

"the poor shall never cease out of the land. I am sure that I shall not be accused or suspected of wishing to give encouragement to revolutionary ideas; but I do maintain that, by the Divine ordinance, there is a propriety in the land for every poor man in every portion of what he reclaims by his labour from sterility and makes to trem with abundance. This is a subject which we cannot put away. We must make the poor man a partaker of the soil in the sense in which the Apostle says, 'The husbandman that laboureth must be the first partaker of the fruits.' This is what your grace meant yesterday, when you said that every poor man should possess a stake in the hedge. We need not look far for means."

And having thus given what may fairly be deemed, in reference to the actual state of the rural poor and their wretched dwellings, a sharp rebuke to the lords and squires, the venerable dignitary "lets them down easy" by intimating that the allotment of plots of potato ground might be "the means" of giving the labourer "a stake in the hedge."

The Duke of Richmond then said, speaking to the labourers:—

"We highly value your services. They are advantageous to us, even in a pecuniary point of view; for it is to our advantage to have good men working on our farms."

Now this, no doubt, is very ducal and condescending; but, supposing his grace had been addressing the plough-teams instead of the ploughmen, could he have used more appropriate language? This might have "elicited the best feelings" of equine nature, inasmuch it seemed to point to an extra feed of corn, but we question whether its tendency was to "elevate the working man." After referring to a recent fire—was it an incendiary one?—at which some labourers had been active, his grace said:—

"They (the labourers) well know that their interest is identical with that of the farmer and landowner; and should anything occur to put us in need of assistance, we should look with confidence to the labourers to stand by us to the last. (Loud cheers.) I am sure, when they are well treated, they will stand by us; and if we do our duty to them, they are not the men to desert us in the hour of need."

We suppose this means that they will sign petitions for dear bread (to say nothing about dear salmon and short wool), high rents, and low wages.

His grace then proposed the health of the Earl of Chichester, of whom he said:—

"The noble earl is an example to country gentlemen. He resides constantly on his estate at the other end of the county, and is in the habit of meeting his tenants and labourers. The noble earl fills the arduous and responsible office of chairman of the quarter sessions, which calls for his attendance every six weeks. We all know him well enough to believe that he feels his position to be one of great importance; for it gives confidence that justice will be duly administered. I am persuaded that the unpaid magistracy is one of our greatest bulwarks, and I hope it may never be taken from us. While he is obliged to carry out the law against transgressors, he feels it is much better to prevent crime than to punish it. He is chairman of a similar association to the present, and feels much greater pleasure in rewarding industrious labourers than in punishing offenders."

Should not his grace have added, and did he not mentally add, "unless they are poachers?" Now, as most of the "arduous duties" of the chairman of quarter sessions, and of the unpaid magistracy arise, directly and indirectly, out of the game laws, we may suggest that, as these tender-hearted noblemen and magistrates are so desirous of "preventing rather than punishing crime," they would go far to attain that object by repealing the game laws, placing pheasants and partridges in the same category as sparrows and tomits, and encouraging the destruction of those noxious vermin, hares and rabbits, as they now do that of those comparative innocents, weasels and polecats. Then they may hope to "elevate" the farming labourer.

But the richest part of the exhibition was when the Duke returned thanks:—

"I feel that at these meetings I get a great deal more credit than is due to me; for although I occupy the chair, the main credit is due to those who support this association, not only by their subscriptions, but their attendance."

How becoming is modesty in a great man! Not a few wicked persons may be found who will insinuate that his grace should have said, "I take a great deal more credit than is due to me;" and, perhaps, then, the noble president would have spoken with his accustomed frankness. However, he thought proper to add:—

"It is always with the greatest satisfaction I find myself among you, and find myself identified with the agricultural interest; this repays me for much of that abuse I get for standing by them and advocating their interests. But we cannot expect to go through the world without abuse. Whether I receive it as chairman of the board of guardians of our union, or as chairman of an agricultural society, I care not; I hope I am actuated by far higher motives than a love of popularity in the part I take."

What his grace deems a "high motive" it is not for us plebeians to say; but when he stated in the House of Lords that his objection to free trade in wool is founded on the fact that he is "a short-wool master," and that his hostility to free trade in fish was his desire to retain the exclusive right to supply the British public with "delicious small salmon," the public did not think his "motives" seemed to be precisely what men of intellect and humanity have been accustomed to call high. But, possibly, the ducal mind was contrasting the "high value in a pecuniary point of view" which he puts on the labourers' "services" and the £2000 a year lost upon the salmon fishery. If this be the true ducal standard of high and low, we can comprehend the meek spirit of martyrdom with which his grace endures the remarks, which his exertions in favour of high rents and artificial scarcity have provoked. The Rev. Mr. Harcourt afterwards said:—

"I have no hesitation in saying that it is of far greater importance to attend to the welfare of men and women than of sheep and oxen. I confess that I have no respect for fat oxen."

Though he subsequently owned a slight feeling of tenderness—possibly in compliment to the noble short-wool master—for "a sheep whose points are well developed," and concluded by stating his concurrence with the remarks of Archdeacon Manning respecting the cottages of the labourers. We are glad to find that the clergy are beginning to feel that the state of the dwellings of the rural poor touches their own characters. Let the efforts of the League receive a share of thanks for this.

THE MONOPOLIST AGITATION.

It seems the Agricultural Protection Society has found vent for its energies, which, for all the world knew, seemed pent up in the "room in Bond-street," for one of their weekly journals tells us that—

"A meeting of the General Agricultural Protection Society was held last week, at which the Dukes of Richmond, Cleveland, and Buckingham were present. The committee was very fully attended, and a resolution was passed unanimously, 'that the Bank Charter Bill, as at present constituted, would, in the opinion of the committee, be detrimental to the agricultural interest.' This resolution would be forthwith communicated to the local associations, and we have no doubt that during the present week a strong demonstration of the sentiments of the agricultural body will be made."

Now, if these "strong demonstrations" are made in such meetings as the following, we suspect Sir Robert Peel will not regard them with much respect:—

"The public meeting of the Long Sutton Protection to Agriculture Society, convened a few days since, was attended by three gentlemen—the president, secretary, and treasurer of that association."—Stamford Mercury.

This is just what Lord Worsley told the Lincolnshire farmers would be the end of the "protection societies." The Duke of Cleveland seems to be active in this new "agricultural agitation;" and, probably, a large rental is no guarantee against encumbrances, but we did not know before that his grace was one of the deeply indebted.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Mr. Samuel S. Kenrick, Greenfield-lodge, Holywell," is informed that, according to the decision of Lord Kenyon, R. J. Zolpuddle, 4 T. R. 671, "the word tenement applies to every profit issuing out of land," within which definition coal mines seem to be clearly embraced; so that, as the franchise is conferred upon occupants of "lands and tenements" of £25 yearly value, it would seem that Mr. Kenrick is qualified to vote for members for the county of Flint.

"W. D." is informed that his interest is not so described as to enable the Editor to judge of the qualifications enumerated. If his interest in the London and Westminster Bank, Gas Company, and Great Western Railway Company, be merely that of a share of the profits, it is not a freehold interest, and does not confer a county vote. But if he personally hold the actual stone and lime of the bank to the value of 40s., or land on which the railway is laid, or the houses or lands of the gas company to that value, then he is, if he hold them in his own right and not merely as trustee for the companies, entitled to be registered for Middlesex. The Editor learns from W. D.'s letter that he does not occupy and pay rent out of his own pocket for any of the tenements he describes. He therefore has no vote for the city or any borough on account of his interest in them.

Joseph Sexton, Westbury, Wilts.—The question put by Mr. Sexton is one whose solution is of such general interest that an answer in the LEAGUE may be instructive to many of our readers. 1st. Before the 20th of July the claimant must pay all rates "which shall have become payable from him" prior to the 6th of April preceding. 2nd. A rate is not made until it is allowed by the justices; and 3rd. Is not payable until it is published in the parish church on the immediately preceding Sunday. (Burn's Justice, vide "Poor Rate.") As, therefore, although the rate was granted in the Westbury case on the 1st of April, it was not made until the 22nd, and could not have been published until the 28th, it did not become payable until after the 6th of April, and does not, therefore, require to be paid in order to qualify a claimant to be registered in that year.

"Selig Heaman" is informed, that by the 13th Geo. III., c. 21, all children, although born abroad, whose fathers, or even whose grandfathers by the father's side, were British subjects, are also British subjects, and are entitled to vote for members of Parliament.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, June 22, 1844.

The Times very emphatically assures its readers that the League has had no influence in stimulating its commission of inquiry into the condition of the agricultural peasantry. So that the work of inquiry be fairly, ingeniously, and efficiently pursued, we care very little how it may have originated. Thus we know, that, whatever attacks upon the new Poor-law may have been made by the Times before the League was in existence, it still left the public mind in a state of utter darkness as to the privations of the peasantry until the Anti-Corn-Law agitation began to penetrate into the rural districts. Up to a comparatively recent period, the boldest assertions were reiterated, both in Parliament and by the press, of the comfort enjoyed by the farm labourers, their happier lot than that of "factory slaves," and their vital interest in the continuance of the present system. A great change has manifestly taken place. If the Times has worked at the subject so long as it asserts, at least there can be no denial of the fact that its ancient labours were less successful than its recent efforts. That difference, also, may be possibly explained without supposing the League, either by its meetings, publications, conferences, or the speeches of its friends in Parliament, to have had any influence in its production. We leave to the Times the benefit of these remote possibilities, and frankly admit that the obvious and common-sense solution of the fact is not susceptible of strict mathematical demonstration.

And no matter for that, we repeat, so that the Times continues to drag into the light such horrible truths as its able reporter is developing in the regions of daily starvation and nightly fires. The facts of its correspondence will keep in check the sophisms of its leaders. In arguing against the League, it may tell us that the peasant's sympathies are "with hereditary power and transmitted rank," and treat us very distant "the day on which the allegiance of the labourer to the landlord" will fail, or be exchanged for other reliance; but we have only to turn the page, and learn from the reporter the "complete severance of kindly feeling," and that, "in fact, all kind feeling between the labourers and farmers and those above them seems completely severed"—a change attested by old and "most respectable inhabitants." Such reports will not dispose the public mind to rely on large doles of workhouse charity as a remedy of the evil, or to seek it in the individual beneficence of the class who create the mischief by unjust and selfish legislation.

MR. VILLIERS'S MOTION.

The following are the terms of Mr. Villiers's motion as they stand on the Notice Book for Tuesday next, the 25th instant.

"That it appears by a recent census that the people of this country are rapidly increasing in number.

"That it is in evidence before this House that a large proportion of her Majesty's subjects are insufficiently provided with the first necessities of life.

"That, nevertheless, a Corn Law is in force, which restricts the supply of food, and thereby lessens its abundance.

"That any such restriction, having for its object to impede the free purchase of an article upon which depends the subsistence of the community, is indefensible in principle, and injurious in operation, and ought to be abolished.

"That, therefore, this House do now resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, for the purpose of considering the Act 5 Vic., cap. 4, with a view to its immediate repeal."

THE LEAGUE BAZAAR.

It will be seen by a reference to the speech of the Chairman on Wednesday evening last, at the meeting of the League in Covent-garden Theatre, that the Council has consented to postpone the holding of the Bazaar in London until January next. This determination has been formed in compliance with the wishes of most of the Ladies' Committees, both in the Metropolis and the country. The great anxiety felt by our fair friends to do adequate justice to their own feelings on such an occasion, and the apprehension lest their various engagements during the summer months should materially limit both the time and exertion necessary for such an undertaking, have been urged as the grounds for requesting a postponement of the Bazaar.

Such of our friends as have already sent in their contributions may rely upon their safe custody up to the appointed time; and we trust that no exertion will be spared in the interval on the part of those, who may have time or opportunity, for successfully promoting the good work.

REGISTER!—Mr. Cobden, in his speech after the termination of the South Lancashire election, stated that there were about 2000 persons in this division of the county who were Free Traders, and who could be easily placed on the register. Let, then, the Free Traders do their duty, and South Lancashire will be won at the next election. Nearly seven to four of the freeholders have voted for Brown, so that only a little additional exertion is needed to make the Free-Trade majority amongst them two to one, when the victory will be certain. Indeed, it would be absurd to suppose that the commercial, manufacturing, and other classes of freeholders who dwell in this district, will not be determined to be released from the bondage in which they are held by Lord Francis Egerton, Lord Stanley, and the squireen monopolists, Whig or Tory.—Bolton Free Press.

HOW THE CORN LAWS AFFECT PRICES.—The Corn Laws reduce the money prices both of agricultural and manufacturing produce, the last most. When the numbers of the manufacturing population begin to press against the limits of the food which can be furnished by the monopolists, the manufacturers will consent to give an increased quantity of goods for a given sum (as, for instance, for a guinea) as the means of purchasing corn; and hence the money price of goods will fall. But the number of guineas which will be given for a quantity of corn depends on the number necessary to make the consumers agree upon the mode in which the stock in hand shall be divided among them. Since, therefore, guineas cost more labour to the consumers, or to a great and effective portion of them, than they did before, a smaller number will make them agree on the division; and hence the money price of corn will fall too. A further consequence of which will clearly be, that a portion of guineas will go out of circulation by being restored to the uses of common life, on the ordinary principles of currency; so that, after all the rout that has been made on the danger of a free trade in corn diminishing the gold in circulation, this effect is in reality the result of the Corn Laws. This explodes the fallacy on which the agriculturists have dwelt with considerable effect, and which, in truth, was one of the very small number of good ones they had upon their side,—that, as corn has fallen, the distresses of the manufacturers have gone on increasing. It is quite true that corn has fallen. For example, between 1814 and 1826, it fell from 72s. to 57s., which is twenty-one per cent; but the wages of a weaver for weaving a given quantity of cambrics fell in the same time from 13s. to 2s. 9d., which is seventy-nine per cent. If the wages of the weaver had fallen in the same proportion as the price of corn, they would have only fallen to 10s. 3d.; but instead of that they have fallen to 2s. 9d., which is not much more than a fourth of the other. The agricultural monopolists, therefore, get the labour of the weaver for a little more than one-fourth of the substantial price they paid before, which is the mystery of the Corn Laws, and what they, of course, intend to stand out for as long as they are able. Of this general fall of prices some part may have been caused by the return to gold payments; but gold payments did not cause the wages of the weaver to fall four times more than the price of corn.—Colonel Thompson's Exercises.

REVIEW.

The History of Holland. By C. M. Davies. London: Parker.

We noticed the two first volumes of this work in our publication of the 6th of April, and gave our meed of praise to the deep research, sound judgment, and political sagacity displayed by the gifted and amiable lady to whom we are indebted for this important history. The third volume fully maintains the character of those which we have already noticed; and, independent of its merits, we are bound to notice it in deference to the suggestions of several correspondents, who have directed our attention to various passages in it illustrative of political philosophy and economic science. As a specimen of the political sagacity with which Mrs. Davies investigates constitutional principles, we shall extract her account of some of the causes which led to the decline of Holland.

"As in the human frame, no sooner does beauty attain its fulness, and strength its prime, than senility creeps on with stealthy and imperceptible steps—than the elastic muscles begin to grow rigid, the delicate membranes to thicken, and the nerves to lose their sensitiveness; so in the body politic, during the apparent prime and vigour of its existence, the decay has often already commenced which must terminate in its final dissolution. It seems, indeed, as though free constitutions contained within themselves some principles of this decay, from which less excellent forms of government are in a great measure exempt. Party-spirit and corruption in particular, the besetting and fatal vices of a free constitution, are in absolute governments more rarely found, and when they do exist, are comparatively less pernicious. The slaves of a despot, the serfs of an oligarchy, ignorant of aught better than their own state of social existence, hopeless and undesirous of change, are little apt to form schemes for the improvement of their condition; accustomed to unlimited obedience, they receive implicitly their political opinions from their masters, and subjects of political discussion therefore seldom arise; while the administration of public affairs is confined to few persons, and these, if they seek to distinguish themselves at all, seek to do so rather by their zeal in the service of the prince than by the introduction of novelties, or of measures which, however conducive to the improvement and happiness of the people, have a tendency to disturb or alter the existing order of things. In free constitutions, the more fully developed energies and capabilities of the people, their more numerous wants, their more extended relations, create the necessity and the desire for continual improvement, and consequently continual change. Schemes are devised, alterations proposed, many or all of which perhaps being, or supposed to be, inimical to the interests of some particular class of persons, become the subject of debate, which soon increases into contention, and is exasperated into animosity. The career of public ambition being open to all, a greater number of men of ability are produced on the political arena; and in their struggle for power and influence, each seeks to obtain it by espousing with vehemence some cherished interest, some popular opinion, of the class from whose favour and support he has the most reason to expect advancement. Hence principles and men become identified in the public mind, and parties are formed; men being induced to support one whom they might otherwise have opposed, for the sake of the principle he advocates, while others are led to espouse opinions from esteem for the person by whom they are recommended.

"In proportion as the leaders of parties thus acquire influence, they soon find, owing to the natural proneness of mankind to adopt opinions without the labour of examination, numbers ready blindly to acquiesce in any which come recommended to them by the charms of eloquence, or the weight of authority; by degrees they erect themselves into the guides and masters of the judgment of their followers; a new standard of right and wrong is set up; measures are looked upon not in regard of their intrinsic value, but of the party by whom they are proposed; and a man's public virtue is esteemed, not in proportion to his integrity and zeal for the good of his country, but for his unscrupulous adherence to his party. Accordingly, measures of vital importance to the welfare of the state are rendered abortive by the stronger party, for no other reason than that they are proposed by the weaker; or such as are utterly destructive, carried with a similar recklessness. Often, too, when pressing evils are to be remedied, the requisite measures, instead of being adopted with alacrity and unanimity, become questions of party strength, and are either thwarted altogether, or delayed till too late to produce any beneficial effect; and when imminent danger is to be averted, party debates and contentions consume the time which should be otherwise occupied, and ere either one or other has gained the desired ascendancy, the country is irretrievably ruined.

"Corruption, likewise, the ordinary and deadly poison of free states, is less rife and less dangerous in those of an absolute or monarchical constitution. A monarchical government is naturally strong in itself; simple in its action, and easily comprehended both by those who cannot, and those who will not, trouble themselves to examine and understand the more complicated machinery which a mixed or republican constitution requires, it finds the ignorant, the indolent, and the unthinking—a vast majority of mankind—amongst its advocates; it has therefore always the advantage of numbers on its side. A free government, on the contrary, habitually in the minority, is inherently weak, and hence is obliged to resort to means of corruption to gain partisans; to encourage venality in order to support itself; it has therefore a natural temptation towards this vice by which the former is unassailed. Corruption is also less mischievous in a monarchical government, inasmuch as the wealth and honours a monarch has to bestow tend chiefly to confirm his subjects in their loyalty to his person and their zeal for the support of his throne and the existing state of things; while the bribes administered in a free or republican state undermine the principles of integrity and public virtue absolutely essential to the existence of that state, and render the recipients subservient to those who may seek by these means to become its masters. All these evils we shall find exemplified in the course of the later history of Holland. We shall see party-spirit overbearing the principles of genuine patriotism, perverting the judgment, nay, it would almost appear, obumbrating the intellect of public men. We shall see them, when the very existence of their constitution is threatened, neglect the measures necessary for its re-invigoration, lest their adoption should throw power into the hands of their political opponents; we shall see them absorbed in questions of petty party-strife, when the enemy was close at hand who was to put an end to the debates of all parties by the destruction of all.

"The evil of corruption will appear less glaringly to our view; the eminent heads of affairs preserving themselves wholly pure from its taint, the details of its progress—creeping through the minor branches of the state—will escape the notice of general history; but its effects, none the less certain, will be visible in the incapacity of the subordinate members of government to fill the offices into which they had introduced themselves by surreptitious means; in the disinclination manifested by all ranks of persons to undertake the duties of such as were rather onerous than profitable; in the general increase of avarice and proportionable diminution of the high sense of honour and moral rectitude formerly observable in the people; and in the indifference of the whole nation to public affairs and to its own political condition. Yet to deduce from thence that it had been better for Holland had she never possessed that freedom for which she struggled so long, would be as though one should desire the continuance of the feebleness and imbecility of childhood to avoid the trials and temptations of maturer growth; or to hasten on the period of the intellectual decay of age, in order to preserve the body from the exhaustion consequent on the action of the mind; to suspend, in fact, all the more noble and valuable functions of existence for the sake of prolonging its term. Neither is it permitted to Holland to make the choice between liberty and despotism an abstract question of political theory; the immense practical advantages that liberty has secured to her, greater, perhaps, than ever fell to the lot of any other nation, preclude her for ever from undervaluing the source from whence they were derived."

Another cause, the influence of which was most clearly shown when Holland was menaced by the tyrannical Louis XIV., and that most ungrateful of royal profligates, the English Charles II., not a little contributed to the overthrow of the Dutch power. The lesson which such events teach should ever be present to the minds of mercantile and manufacturing communities.

"Louis suffered no engine to lie idle whose power could be turned to the destruction of this devoted country; and, unhappily, he found but too many ready to serve his purpose. The neighbouring states, both great and small, and the German princes in especial, were well pleased to behold the approaching humiliation of Holland; the latter, jealous that a country not superior to them in geographical extent, and inferior in natural resources, should become entitled to rank herself with the mighty of the earth; the great sovereigns of Europe, irritated to find the lustre of their ancient dignity, and the grandeur of their empire, eclipsed by the actual wealth and power of a republic of yesterday. The pride, too, of Holland had given them offence, and it was true that she was proud. Proud, not of hosts which her conquering arm had stretched bleeding on the field of battle, nor of the lands and cities she had laid waste with fire and sword, but of her noble fleets, her mighty men-of-war, her merchant-vessels laden with treasure, peopling the ocean she kept at bay; proud of her smiling fields, where the husbandman pursued his labours in content, and enjoyed their fruits in security; of her fair cities, in whose streets crime and poverty were rare, and starvation unknown; of her peaceful dwellings, whose spotless purity seemed an emblem of the moral delicacy which reigned within; proud of her honourable name, synonymous throughout the world with industry and integrity; of her wise and just laws; of her race of hardy sons, who, when she had sent them to gather wealth and glory in all quarters of the globe, returned to her bosom with still abiding affection. Such an honest pride Holland had felt; and of such a pride it was that her rivals aimed to destroy the sources."

But, notwithstanding the formidable power of this coalition, the Dutch, while love of liberty continued a living principle, never faltered in their courage even when ruin appeared imminent.

"Amsterdam proved that the spirit of the 'Gueux' was not yet utterly extinct in Holland. Prevailing with four towns of North Holland to follow their example, the council of Amsterdam refused to send deputies to debate upon the question of granting full powers to the ambassadors, and made vigorous preparations for the defence of their city. They repaired the fortifications, and strengthened them with considerable outworks, the magistrates themselves being the first to sacrifice their magnificent country-houses in the suburbs for this purpose; they assigned to each of the regiments of burgher guards (who were 10,000 in number) a portion of the city to watch; took into their pay as soldiers all those inhabitants whom the cessation of trade would throw out of employment; stationed outposts in the Y, Amstel, Zuyderzee, and Pampus; and, cutting the dykes, laid the country to a great distance round under water. They likewise passed a resolution, that though all the rest of Holland should make terms with the conqueror, they would sustain the siege single-handed till some friendly power should afford them assistance."

The circumstances attending the murder of the brothers De Witt are related by Mrs. Davies with great graphic power and dramatic effect. Having related the arts by which John De Witt was entrapped into visiting his brother Cornelius in the prison, to which he had been committed on a false accusation, she thus continues:—

"During this time one of the judges sent for Tichelaar, and suggested to him that he should incite the people not to suffer a villain who had intended to murder the prince to go unpunished. True to his instructions, the miscreant spread among the crowd collected before the prison doors the report that the torture inflicted on Cornelius De Witt was a mere pretence, and that he had only escaped the death he deserved because the judges favoured his crime. Then, entering the gaol, he presented himself at the window, and exclaimed to the crowd below, 'The dog and his brother are going out of prison! Now is your time; revenge yourselves on these two knaves, and then on thirty more, their accomplices!' The populace received his address with shouts and cries of 'To arms, to arms! Treason, treason!' and pressed in a still denser crowd towards the prison door. The States of Holland, immediately on information of the tumult, sent three troops of cavalry, in garrison at the Hague, for the protection of the gaol, and called out to arms six companies of burgher guards. But in the latter they only added fresh hosts to the enemies of the unfortunate captive. One company in especial, called the 'Company of the Blue Flag,' was animated with a spirit of deadly vengeance against them; its leader, Verhoef, having that morning loaded his musket with a determination either to kill the De Witts or perish in the attempt. They pressed forward towards the prison, but were driven back by the determined appearance of the cavalry, commanded by the Count de Tilly. So long as these troops remained, it was evident that the fell purpose of the rioters was impracticable. Accordingly, a report was raised that a band of peasants and sailors was coming to plunder the Hague; and two captains of the burgher guards took occasion from thence to demand of the Council of State that the soldiers should be drawn off from their station, in order to protect the houses from pillage. First a verbal order, and on Tilly's refusing obedience to such, a written one was sent, commanding him to divide his troops into four detachments, and post them upon the bridges leading into the town. 'I shall obey,' said he, as he perused the mandate, 'but it is the death-warrant of the brothers.' His anticipations were too soon realized. No sooner had he departed than the rioters were supplied by some of those mysterious agents who were actively employed throughout the whole of these transactions with wine, brandy, and other incitements to inflame their already maddening fury. Led on by Verhoef and one Van Bankhem, a sheriff of the Hague, they assailed the prison door with axes and sledge-hammers, threatening to kill all the inmates if it were not instantly opened. Terrified, or corrupted, the gaoler obeyed their behests. On gaining admittance they rushed to an upper room, where they found their victims, who had throughout the whole of the tumult maintained the greatest composure. The bailiff, reduced to a state of extreme debility by the torture, was reclining on his bed; his brother was seated near him, reading the Bible. They forced them to rise and follow them 'to the place,' as they said, 'where criminals were executed.' Having taken a tender leave of each other, they began to descend the stairs, Cornelius De Witt leaning on his brother for support. They had not advanced above two or three paces when a heavy blow on the head from behind precipitated the former to the bottom. He was then dragged a short distance towards the street, trampled under foot, and beaten to death. Meanwhile, John De Witt, after receiving a severe wound on the head with the butt-end of a musket, was brought by Verhoef, bleeding and bare-headed, before the furious multitude. One Van Soenen immediately thrust a pike into his face, while another of the miscreants shot him in the neck, exclaiming as he fell, 'There goes down the Perpetual Edict.' Raising himself on his knees, the sufferer lifted up his hands and eyes to Heaven in deep and earnest prayer. At that moment, one Verhagen struck him with his musket. Hundreds followed his example, and the cruel massacre was completed. Barbarities too dreadful for utterance or contemplation, all that phrenzied passion or brutal ferocity could suggest, were perpetrated on the bodies of these noble and virtuous citizens; nor was it till night put an end to the butchery that their friends were permitted to convey their mangled remains to a secret and obscure tomb.

Mrs. Davies assigns convincing reasons for a strong suspicion that the Prince of Orange, afterwards William III., was "consenting" to this atrocious assassination.

"The parasites of the Prince of Orange, they were, who, angry at being kept out of power by the De Witt party, and greedy of the profits and honours which had of late been shared solely by their opponents, were the inciters and fomenters of this revolting sedition. Whether or not the prince himself were guilty of a participation or cognizance of their acts, history has involved in an impenetrable veil of obscurity. But it requires more than the expressions of abhorrence with which he ever afterwards spoke of the massacre of the De Witts, to exculpate him from the imputation of, at least, the extreme of injudiciousness and imprudence; defects of which he never, before or after, betrayed the smallest symptom. At any period after the arrest of Cornelius De Witt, when the populace, fearful of his escape, constantly surrounded his prison, a proclamation from the prince would at once have sufficed to still the tumult; or had he complied with the earnest request of the States in sending some troops and a special guard for the safe-keeping of the bailiff's person, the people would have been satisfied, and the fate of the unhappy prisoner averted. Again, when the States of Holland besought him to lend his aid to discover and punish the authors of this 'detestable crime,' he replied that the number and quality of the guilty rendered all pursuit dangerous; and, shortly after, prevailed with them to grant an amnesty in the most ample terms to both principals and accessories in the murder. Nor was this all; honours and rewards awaited every one of those who had rendered themselves conspicuous in the transactions of that eventful day. But the hand of retribution was heavy on them. They found that, when the angry passions of the people had subsided, their association was shunned by all men with contempt and aversion. Verhoef was sometime after condemned for his crimes by the tribunal of Rhynland to be publicly whipped, and imprisoned for the remainder of his life; and the manes of the De Witts were avenged, when the unhappy miscreant, writhing under the lash of the executioner, heard the murmurs of the immense multitude around the scaffold applauding the justice of his sentence. Some squandering away their ill gotten wealth, sank into the grave in loathsome poverty and disease; others, unable to stop in their career of iniquity, terminated their sinful lives inured in dungeons; Tichelaar himself, during the life of the Prince of Orange, enjoyed a liberal pension 'for the services he had done the state' of which, being deprived after his death, he was reduced to beggary, and lived to an extreme old age, preserved only by alms from perishing of starvation, and a prey to the bitterest remorse for having been, as he confessed, the cause of the murder of two innocent men."

The memory of William III. has been almost canonized by faction; but his character is examined in these pages with a fearless spirit of criticism which the hero of Glenro is not well fitted to sustain. Mrs. Davies exposes the base hypocrisy by which he deceived his wretched father-in-law, and his complicated treachery to the unfortunate Duke of Monmouth.

"William, on his side, showed no less a disposition to be on the most amicable terms with the king. The Duke of Monmouth, natural son of Charles II., had, in the last year, in consequence of the discovery of the Rye-house Plot, in which he was implicated, retired into Holland, where, during his father's life, he was entertained by the Prince of Orange with marks of peculiar esteem and regard. William now not only anticipated the king's wishes, by desiring this nobleman to quit the United Provinces, but consented, at his request, to cashier all the officers who had waited upon Monmouth during his residence in Holland.

"But it scarcely admits of a doubt that, even at this period, the prince was deceiving his unhappy father-in-law, and that, in order to try the humour of the people of England, he was privy to, if not participant in, the subsequent enterprise of the Dukes of Monmouth and Argyll against England and Scotland. Certain it is, that the former soon returned to Holland, and that both lived for a considerable time in affected privacy at Amsterdam, where they collected, without impediment, the requisite arms, ammunition, and vessels; that Monmouth kept up a frequent correspondence by letter with the prince's favourite, Bentinck; and that though he was seen in various places in Holland, and even at the Hague itself, William constantly evaded the solicitations both of the English ambassador and the States for his arrest, as well as of the other suspected parties. The Pensionary Fagel likewise contrived that the order of the States-General for the detention of the ships in which the rebels were to set sail for England, should be delayed till the time for its execution had passed away. But the assumption of the title of king by Monmouth was a step further than William either desired or expected; he therefore thought proper to disavow all knowledge of the enterprise, and readily coincided with the States in their compliance with the king's request for the loan of the three Scottish and three English regiments in their service, and even sent Bentinck to London to propose that he should take the command of the royalist army. This offer, however, the king, giving credence, probably, to the reports which were universally current, of the secret support he had afforded Monmouth, unhesitatingly rejected."

The general summary of William's character, which Mrs. Davies has subjoined to the account of his reign, though far more faithful than that which is given by the generality of English historians, is, however, on the whole, more favourable than the monarch merited. How often, indeed, does it happen that, when we come to examine the real character of the idols of party, we feel tempted to exclaim, in the indignant language of the prophet, "These be your gods, O Israel." We extract a portion of Mrs. Davies's elaborate survey of William's career; but we could easily supply circumstances which would add deeper darkness to the shadows she has, with rather too much forbearance, introduced into the portrait.

"William had to sustain a life of anxiety and fatigue, under the disadvantage of a feeble constitution of body; betrayed by his slight and attenuated frame, though in no degree by his countenance, which was clear, animated, and sparkling. His character has been so often delineated by the ablest pens, that it seems presumptuous and even superfluous to dilate upon it here; yet it may be permitted to observe that, being for the most part viewed through the medium of party affection or political prejudice, he has been as often lauded by his panegyrists for qualifications which he did not possess, as denuded by his detractors the credit of those virtues by which he was really distinguished.

"In a military point of view, he presents the singular phenomenon of a commander indebted for a high reputation solely to reverses and defeats; his peculiar constitution of mind being indeed such as to ensure for him both the reverses and the reputation. Deficient in inventive faculty, slow of comprehension, hesitating and unready, without a sufficient degree of confidence in his own opinions, and too proud to endure contradiction, or adopt the suggestions of others, he was unable immediately to perceive the skilful combinations of the great generals opposed to him, or to cope with their rapid and masterly movements; and often allowed the opportunity for action to escape, or formed his plans in ignorance of some point which, if seized, would have occasioned them to be wholly different. In the field of battle, on the other hand, the discovery of errors previously committed caused in him neither vacillation nor apprehension. Roused to animation, full of unwonted fire and energy, he was present everywhere, and exposed himself with indifference to the most imminent dangers. In the hour of defeat, which too surely arrived, his real greatness displayed itself; it was then that his dauntless spirit and unshaken firmness of soul enabled him to take advantage of all the resources that were yet available; to give his orders with the same composure and precision as if advancing to certain victory; and to convert the most disastrous rout into a safe and orderly retreat.

"Considered as a politician, his capacity for government appeared in a very different light in his native country, where he was surrounded by able and zealous ministers, and in England, where he was left to depend more upon his own resources. In Holland he had merely to express his opinions, however crude, and a Fagel, a Beverning, a Dykvelt, and a Hemsius—unquestionably the first statesmen and politicians in Europe—were ready to modify, to improve, and to render them suitable to the taste of the nation; in England, where he had few or none on whom he could depend for information and assistance, and where the slightest influence gained over him by one party excited the jealousy and animosity of the other, he betrays an extreme deficiency in penetration, dexterity, and temper; and we can scarcely recognise in the peevish monarch, threatening constantly to abandon his kingdom, and with it the noble cause he had espoused, the steady patriot who delivered his country from the miseries of foreign conquest and domestic sedition. Placed by circumstances in the position of a restorer and defender of liberty, never was absolute monarch more fond of arbitrary power, or more impatient of even the most legitimate control.

"In Holland, where, at the time of his accession to the stadtholderate, the precarious condition of affairs rendered it necessary that unusual authority should be placed in his hands, we have seen him take advantage of it to introduce his dependents into every office of government, without regard to their ability to fill them, and to trample under foot the ancient customs and privileges, interwoven in the welfare, almost in the very existence of his country. It may, indeed, be truly affirmed, that had he left a son, or succeeded in settling the inheritance on his relative William Friso, the liberties of Holland were gone for ever. In England, his anxiety to obtain a larger share of authority than the nation was willing to grant, led him to appear ungrateful to those who had set him on the throne, and to inflict incalculable injury on his affairs, by intrusting them to ministers of the Tory party, whose maxims of government, as more favourable to royal prerogative, were more acceptable to him than those of the Whigs, but whom he never could succeed in reconciling to his person, or engage to serve him with fidelity."

Even in the days of Holland's decadence, her statesmen maintained those sound principles of economic science which had been the basis of her former prosperity, and from which England has departed at the behests of a selfish and shortsighted oligarchy, not possessing even such an amount of intelligence as would enable them to comprehend and profit by Esop's fable of the clown and the goose that laid golden eggs.

"The provinces of Guelderland, Zealand, and Friesland, having on one occasion demanded either the prohibition or the imposition of a duty on the importation of foreign corn, on the grounds that in consequence of the low price at which they were obliged to sell the corn they produced they should be unable to furnish their contingent towards the general expenses, and that the money which usually found its way into foreign countries in payment of their corn would be saved to the nation, their proposal was treated by the States as nothing less than an absurdity. The petitioners must, it was said, be in a state of the profoundest ignorance of the first principles of the government of a civilized nation; an occasional prohibition to export corn during periods of famine was indeed permissible; but in no case ought its importation to be checked; that neither in ancient nor modern history could an example of a similar unreasonable prohibition be found; but, on the contrary, the care of all wise rulers has ever been to secure an abundance of food to the people; and that to comply with the desire of the petitioners would be to establish a mischievous monopoly dishonourable to a civilized state."

The greatest blot on the history of Holland is its colonial policy, which was even worse than our own, and nearly as profligate as that which some of the American states have adopted in their dealings with the negroes and the Indians. We may quote, as an example of colonial maladministration, the massacre at Batavia, which is not yet forgotten in Java.

"The most tragical occurrence of this kind was that which happened in 1740, at Batavia, the seat of the Dutch empire in the East; where the discontent that had betrayed itself amongst the inhabitants, principally Chinese, against the government, gave rise to apprehensions that an insurrection was contemplated. Accordingly all race bonds and suspicious persons were expelled the city; but a considerable number remained in the outskirts, concerning whom information was given that they designed to surprise the town, and having massacred the Christians, to take possession of their property. This intelligence was taken as confirmation of the suspicions before entertained by the government of their secret understanding with those within the walls; and the Chinese in the town were commanded to put out their lights at sunset, and not to look out of window, much less appear in the streets. After the lapse of some time spent in mutual mistrust, the fugitives advanced in a somewhat hostile manner to within reach of the artillery of the town, whence they were soon driven by the firing of a few rounds. But their appearance had a fatal effect on the destiny of their unhappy countrymen within. On the ground that they would not have ventured on such a demonstration without some encouragement from the latter, the soldiers and armed burghers, by the command, as they said, of the governor, Adrian Valkenier, broke into the houses of the defenceless Chinese, murdered the inhabitants, and pillaged all they could lay their hands on. Amid these horrors, fires, kindled, it was affirmed, by the sufferers in their desperation, broke out in various places; and had they not been promptly extinguished, the town in a few hours would have presented nothing but a mass of ruins. As it was, the spectacle of the half-burnt houses, strewn with the dead and dying, heaped together as they had offered themselves unresistingly to slaughter, or singly as they had fought the last agonizing struggle for life, was sufficiently appalling. The pillage continued two or three days before the hand of authority was interposed to arrest it. The Chinese in the suburbs were all either massacred or forced to take flight. By degrees order was restored, and those who had fled or concealed themselves were allowed to return and resume their avocations on condition of their submission to the government; and, extraordinary as it may appear, numbers were found ready to avail themselves of the permission. The governor, Valkenier, was afterwards imprisoned."

The length of the extracts which we have made from this volume precludes the necessity of any formal comment. We earnestly commend the work to our readers as the best existing history of a country in which Englishmen must ever feel a lively interest, and as an illustration of the high range of thought to which the mind of English ladies is capable of attaining.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE PRESS.—Those who are unused to this mode of conceiving of human improvement, as spreading from secret centres to a wide circumference, and who are accustomed to the notion of civilization by external agencies, may perhaps adduce the printing-press as an instance of a vast engine of amelioration, mechanical rather than moral. It is obvious, however, that the press, with all its magic, is not a power in itself, but a mere instrument; a tool, whose influence, in kind and degree, depends altogether on the spiritual forces that wield it; which might be given to the savage without producing the smallest fruits of culture, and to a community of the vicious without producing any culture that is good. It is simply an implement for the transmission of mental effort; and it is the thought, not the machinery, that works the wonders of which we boast. Its function is to bring into contact such minds as there are; and, as in private intercourse, it depends on the character of those minds, whether it circulates the vitality of health or the contagion of disease. It is true, indeed, that in the long run the highest spirits are always the strongest too; but this is a law of nature, which human inventions did not make, and cannot alter; and the press, giving equal voice to all, leaves the proportionate influence of different orders of minds precisely where it was—widening the empire, but not redissipating of the victory.—Rev. James Martineau.

GOOD GOVERNMENT.—Poverty is, after all, the great badge, the never-failing badge of slavery. Bare bones and rags are the true marks of the real slave. What is the object of government? To cause men to live happily, they cannot be without a sufficiency of food and raiment. Good government means a state of things in which the main body are well fed and well clothed. It is the chief business of a government to take care that one part of the people do not cause the other part to lead miserable lives. There can be no morality, no virtue, no sincerity, no honesty, amongst a people continually suffering from want; and it is cruel in the last degree to punish such people for almost any sort of crime which is, in fact, not crime of the heart—not crime of the perpetrator, but the crime of his all-controlling necessities.—Cobbett.

CAUSES OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.—Among the principal of them was unquestionably the severity of the oppression to which all classes had been previously subjected; for the violence of the convulsion will always be proportioned to the magnitude of the burden to be thrown off; and the atrocity of the revenge will generally take its measure and its character from the atrocity of the injury to be atoned for. But, perhaps, the circumstance which more than any other modified the course of events in the revolution was the famine which prevailed at its commencement. Mr. Carlyle is, we believe, the only writer on this period who has assigned to this fact its due weight. The harvest of 1788 was a very defective one, and the consequent scarcity spread itself over the three following years; for though the ensuing crop was plentiful, the usual channels of industry and commerce had by that time become so completely disorganized, that bread was nowhere to be obtained in sufficient quantity, and the scarcity soon amounted to a famine. In the market-place the corn sacks had to be guarded by dragoons, "often more than one dragoon to each sack." The bakers' shops were beset by a famishing populace, who were obliged to stand in a long string, often reaching above a hundred yards, that each might be served in turn. Even when obtained, they complained, probably with truth, that the bread was adulterated with plaster of Paris. Many were reduced to "meal-husks and boiled grass." Finally, an ounce and a half of bread daily was the utmost that could be afforded to each individual, and onions and pulse must fill up the deficiency; nay, during the insurrection at Versailles, a horse, which had been slain in the riot, was eagerly seized upon for food. The effect of all this upon a people of singular excitability, and with whom bread is a staple article of food, may be easily conceived. It caused the populace to intermingle in a struggle which would otherwise have been fought out (with a widely-different result in all likelihood) between the aristocracy and the middle classes—the tiers état "Parties" (says Mr. Carlyle) "might have suppressed and smothered one another in the ordinary bloodless parliamentary way, on one condition—that France had at least been able to exist all the while. But the sovereign people has a digestive faculty, and cannot do without bread."—Westminster Review.

FOOD FOR THE MONOPOLISTS.—Sir Robert Peel concluded his speech on Monday night in these words:—"I state now, as I have stated before, that I consider it to be our duty to protect and maintain the great and important institutions of the country; but, at the same time, it is our duty also to propose such improvements in them as may be compatible with their maintenance and permanence, we have considered it to be desirable for the public interest to relax our system of commercial protection in many particulars, and among other articles to which this principle should be applied, we have considered it desirable that foreign sugar, the produce of free-labour, should be admitted into competition with that the produce of our colonial possessions; we have endeavoured, in the measure which we had framed for the consideration of the House, to reconcile the enforcement of this principle—a principle which, we believe, to be founded in truth and justice—with every due regard to existing interests involved in the production of that article. Now, looking at the question more immediately before the House, I repeat, as I said before, that I cannot hold out a hope of our being willing to conciliate opposition, by consenting to abandon the proposition upon this subject which we have felt it our duty to propose. We are deeply sensible of the kindness of those who have on many occasions given us their support; but I cannot ask you now to vote with us to-night upon promises or expectations which in the end may not be realized. The proposition which we made was, I think, a right and a safe one for the House to adopt; and, that being the case, we cannot consent to abandon it. Neither with respect to other articles, in which we have proposed and carried some alterations, can I say that we feel any regret for the policy which we adopted in framing those measures. THE PRINCIPLES WHICH WE THEN ACTED UPON WE CONTINUE TO PROPERLY; AND THE SAME COURSE OF GRADUAL IMPROVEMENT WHICH WE HAVE ALL ALONG ACTED UPON, WE MUST CONTINUE TO PURSUE; AND I THINK IT RIGHT TO MAKE THAT DECLARATION NOW, WHEN VERY IMPORTANT CONSEQUENCES MAY RESULT FROM ITS ANNOUNCEMENT."

THE TOTAL AND IMMEDIATE REPEAL OF THE WOOL DUTY.—ITS EFFECT.—"My honourable friend (Mr. Miles), in introducing his motion, spoke of the Government as willingly sacrificing the colonial interests, and he instanced this by referring to the fact of its having reduced the duty on foreign wool; and although my hon. friend admitted that the reduction of the duty on foreign wool did not interfere with that interest, still he deemed it prudent to say that it had struck a blow at Australian produce by having diminished the duty on foreign wool. Now, I feel a satisfaction in stating to my hon. friend, that since the reduction, or rather, I should say, the abolition of the duty on foreign wool, there have taken place considerable sales of Australian wool. About three or four days since it was stated by an hon. gentleman who sits on that side of the House, that never was there a brisker sale of Australian wool; that there has been a rise in the price of Australian wool since the reduction of the duty on foreign wool, as compared with the price before the reduction; that since then the sale has been greater than ever it was known before. My hon. friend, then, cannot quote the reduction of the duty on foreign wool as being destructive of the sale of Australian wool.—Sir R. Peel on Monday night. [Could not the same experiment be tried with corn, coffee, sugar, timber, &c., with every probability of being attended with an equally beneficial effect?]

ENGLISH, FRENCH, AND GERMANS.—The English are the only people now-a-days that do not stand in awe of a revolution, but go on fearlessly in their own way, without troubling themselves with the apprehension of such an event. The French are a people of words; we (Germans) of thoughts; the English of action. We are better and more humane, perhaps, inasmuch as thoughts are mostly purer than actions; but in moral vigour and courage, and in self-confidence, the English far surpass us; and those are the qualities by which a nation grows to greatness. England will fall one day, but not before, like Rome, she has held the mastery of the world.—Hahn-Hahn's Letters.

SPIRITS OF THE AGE.—The strong Saxon spirit of George Stephenson, the "Hengist of Railways," is a spirit of the age that has written a work whereon those who ride may read glad tidings of man's rescue from the bondage and thralldom of ignorance; of his power of union with his fellows for the purpose of conquering and civilising the earth, reclaiming its swamps and morasses, and adding to its beauties. Prometheus, in the elder mythus, brought fire from heaven to earth for man's uses. George Stephenson may be the hero of some future mythus, which will tell how he harnessed fire to chariots of iron, which became swifter than the winds of heaven. Isambard Kingdom Brunel is a spirit of the age that would not be content with the work of George Stephenson, but made a yet greater work in advance of the spirit of his age, refusing to submit to the set patterns even of the great originator. David Napier, the restless planner of steam-boat after steam-boat, each swifter than the last, and the planner of the great Bristol iron steamer, are spirits of the age. Clegg, of the railway air traction—the rope of wound-off wind; Smith, of Deanston, the physician of diseased land; Liebig, the multiplier of human food by chemical science, are all spirits of the age. Marshall, of Leeds, the greatest of the "captains of industry," he who spins flax for half the world, and when profits become too large voluntarily cuts them down, and "builds another mill" to keep up his annual revenues—he who works to underwork cotton cloth, and replace it by cloth of linen—he, too, is a spirit of the age.

"Men, my brothers, men, the workers; ever reaping something new:
That which they have done but earnest of the things that they shall do."
—Westminster Review.

ISLE OF MAN.—From a return moved for by Dr. Bowring, we find that, in the year 1843, there were imported into the Isle of Man from Great Britain and Ireland alone 2981 quarters of wheat, 12,658 cwt. of flour, 1672 cwt. of meal, 434 quarters of oats, 227 cwt. of potatoes, 16 head of cattle, 1120 sheep, and 6 pigs. During the same year there were exported from the Isle of Man to the United Kingdom, 7582 quarters of wheat, 22 cwt. of flour, 127 cwt. of meal, 5015 quarters of barley, 1370 quarters of oats, 117,779 cwt. of potatoes, 307 cattle, 180 sheep, and 308 pigs.

CORN LAWS.—All the grain that has been imported into the port of Sunderland this year has been in foreign vessels, except one which arrived on the 23rd ult., and that vessel belongs to some part of Wales. Shipowners of the North, do you see no benefit Free Trade would give you?—Sunderland Herald.

CONSUMPTION OF WOOL.—In the quarter ending 5th April, 1843, the quantity of foreign wool entered for home consumption was 4,618,887 lbs.; in the same quarter of the present year the quantity so entered was 9,697,805 lbs., and yet, notwithstanding this large increase, amounting to about 120 per cent., the English farmer is obtaining at least 25 per cent. more for his wool than he received last year.

The external features of the Cornwall mining districts are peculiar; for although occasionally we see the machinery and the rubbish of a mine in the centre of a fertile spot, sterility in general marks the surface which covers mineral treasures. Moors, enlivened only by the furze and heath, or granite hills bare of vegetation, are most commonly the scenes of mining operations. The landscape, as Nature left it, is one of desolation, but a productive mine is discovered, and the scene is changed. White-washed cottages thickly cover the soil—the transforming effects of industry; and vegetables for use, and flowers for ornament, grow in the cottage gardens. In the centre of this scene of life, the tall house, and its taller chimney, of the steam-engine, are seen employed in pumping the water from the depths of the earth—and near it another engine drawing the ores from the shafts, or perhaps the primitive horse whim, with the heavy rope twining around its wooden cage. On a near approach, life and bustle are immediately apparent. At the mouth of the shaft, men are waiting for the arrival of the tribble to the surface; the ore is carried off immediately to the dressing-flours, where young women and boys are employed in breaking up the large masses, whilst the task of selecting the pieces of ore from the matrix in which it is found is performed by children. Thus, in the Cornish mines, are 30,000 persons employed, averaging 18,472 men, 5764 women, and 5764 children.—Athenaeum.

BIDDING DEFIANCE TO COMPETITION.—At the monthly meeting of the Galloway Farmers' Club, the secretary said:—"If we have any determination of pursuing a vigorous, enlightened, and profitable mode of rearing and feeding, we must be up and doing, with more and more energy, in the extension of green crops—more especially now, since we have artificial and other manures of such excellence in abundance. In short, we, and every British farmer, must ever hold it to be an unalterable and golden rule, both in rearing and feeding our cattle, and in the cultivation of our farms, to produce the most at the least expense; and by so doing we will soon elevate our positions as cultivators, and bid defiance to the competition of the universe."

PROGRESS OF TRUTH.—We see that large principles are more extensively agreed upon than ever before—more manifest to all eyes, from the very absence of a hero to work them, since they are every hour showing how irresistibly they are making their own way. We see that the tale of the multitude is told as it never was told before—their health, their minds and morals, pleaded for in a tone perfectly new in the world. We see that the dreadful sins and woes of society are the results of old causes, and that our generation has the honour of being responsible for their relief, while the disgrace of their existence belongs certainly not to our time, and perhaps to none. We see that no spot of earth ever before contained such an amount of infallible resources as our country at this day; so much knowledge, so much sense, so much vigour, foresight, and benevolence, or such an amount of external means. We see the progress of amelioration, silent but sure, as the shepherd on the upland sees in the valley the advance of a gush of sunshine from between two hills. He observes what the people below are too busy to mark; how the light attains now this object and now that—how it now embellishes yonder copse, and now gilds that stream, and now glances upon the roofs of the far-off hamlet—the signs and sounds of life quickening along its course. When we remember that this is the same sun that guided the first vessel of commerce over the sea—the same by whose light Magna Charta was signed in Runnymede—that shone in the eyes of Cromwell after Naseby fight—that rose on 800,000 free blacks in the West Indies on a certain August morning—and is now shining down into the darkest recesses of the coal-mine, the prison, and the cellar—how can we doubt that darkness is to be chased away, and God's sunshine to vivify, at last, the whole of our world?—Essays by an Invalid.

What now, amongst the Germans, strikes every liberal lover of his country, every man who has no motive but to see the truth and spread it, especially in our own beloved country? He sees a simple and less feverish state of existence. He sees a greater portion of popular content diffused by a more equal distribution of property. He sees a less convulsive straining after the accumulation of enormous fortunes. He sees a less incessant devotion to the mere business of money-making, and consequently a less intense selfishness of spirit, a more genial and serene enjoyment of life, a more intellectual embellishment of it with music and domestic entertainment. He sees the means of existence kept by the absence of ruinous taxation, of an enormous debt recklessly and lavishly piled on the public shoulders, by the absence of restrictions on the importation of articles of food, cheap and easy of acquisition. He sees, wherever he goes, in great cities or small towns, every thing done for the public enjoyment. Public walks, beautifully planted, and carefully accommodated with seats at convenient distances for the public to rest at leisure. He sees these walks laid out wherever it be possible. Old town-walls and ramparts are converted into promenades, commanding, by their elevation, the finest prospects over town and country. The whole of city or town is encircled by them. Thus the old as well as the young can ascend from the heat and dust and hurry of the streets, and enjoy the freshest air, and the most lively and yet soothing scenes in the streets below on one hand, or gaze into the green fields and hills around. It is delightful to see on fine days the grey-headed fathers of a city thus seated on these airy walks beneath their favourite trees, and enjoying their chat together over old times; while, within a few steps of home, their eyes can still wander over those distant scenes whither their feet no longer can carry them. If there be an old castle in the suburbs of any of their towns, it is not shut up, but its gardens, and its very walls and courts and fosses, are laid out in lovely walks, and the whole place is made the favourite resort and enjoyment of the whole population. There a coffee house or casino is sure to be found; and there, beneath the summer trees, old and young, rich and poor, sit and partake of their coffee, wine, and other refreshment; while some old tower near is converted into an orchestra, and sends down the finest music for the general delight. He sees all sorts of gardens, even to the royal ones, and all sorts of estates, kept open for the public observation and passage through them; he sees the woods and forests all open to the foot and spirit of the delighted lover of nature and of solitude. He sees all public amusements and enjoyments, as theatrical and musical representations, the very highest of this kind, kept cheap and accessible to all. There are no operas there, with boxes let at £300 per annum, with seats in the pit at half-a-guinea each. Twenty-pence is the price of gentility itself; and for fivepence may be heard, and in a good place, the finest operas performed by the finest singers in the country. For fourpence may be attended the finest out-of-door concerts of Strauss or Lanner in the capital of Austria itself. He sees education kept equally cheap in school and university, kept within the reach of all, for the free use of all, and the school so systematized as to answer the various requirements of every varied class or profession. He sees the church kept cheap, and the churches open and free to one man as well as another, without pews and property, where all should be open, the common meeting-place of the common family before the common Father. He sees no church-rates imposed on stubborn and refractory consciences, but a voluntary contribution left to the voluntary attendant of divine service. He sees musical and singing societies encouraged amongst the people, where the working classes, when the labours of the day are done, can meet and enjoy a refining treat. He sees these civilizing and refining influences extended over the open-air enjoyments of the Sundays and holidays of the common people in city and country.—German Experiences, by Wm. Howitt.

Nobility is nothing, unless supported by good actions.

OCCUPATIONS OF THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND AND WALES, AND ISLANDS IN THE BRITISH SEAS.

In the Guardian of Wednesday, the 29th ult., we gave, in a tabular form, the results of that branch of the enumeration of 1841, for the official census, which relates to the employments or occupations of the people in 13 counties of England; and, having previously given those for the 27 other counties, we added the totals together and gave our computed account of the summary as regards the total population of England. Since then, we have received an abstract of the official return, giving the totals, under each branch of occupation, as regards the aggregate population of "England and Wales, and the Islands in the British Seas." We present these official results in the same form as in our previous articles on this subject:—

|---|-------------------|
| Farmers, graziers, and yeomen | 252,413 |
| Agricultural labourers | 980,135 |
| Total in agricultural occupations .. | 1,232,548 |
| Trades and occupations not agricultural .. | 4,649,998 |
| Persons of independent means | 453,149 |
| Almspeople, pensioners, paupers, and beggars .. | 147,887 |
| Other persons not described | 68,020 |
| Residue of population: women and children .. | 9,459,979 |
| Total population | 16,031,781 |

We have neither time nor space at present to dwell upon all the remarkable points suggested by this official return. The principal fact to which we are desirous of directing attention, however, is worthy of all consideration as another "great fact," which we recommend to the consideration of Colonel Plunbe Tempest, Mr. Wm. Entwistle, et id genus omne. Out of a population of rather more than sixteen millions—being the whole population of the southern division of Great Britain and its islands—the persons engaged in agricultural occupations, whether as farmers, graziers, or yeomen, or as agricultural labourers, very little exceed 1,200,000, or only one-thirtieth of the whole population; while those engaged in trade, manufactures, &c., not agricultural, amount to more than 4,600,000, or about four-thirtieths of the whole population! To state the relative proportions of the two great classes of the employed population with more arithmetical accuracy, we may say that the persons engaged in agricultural occupations form only 7.56 per cent. of the entire population of England and Wales and the islands; while the persons engaged in trade and manufactures amount to not less than 29.25 per cent. of the whole population; about four times the number of the agriculturists! We recommend these "facts and figures" to the investigation, analysis, and (if possible) the refutation, of the monopolists' scribes, and the councils and committees of the surviving anti-league societies.

The centesimal proportions of each of the two great classes of the employed population, in these several parts of the kingdom, stand thus:—

|---------------------|--------------------------|----------------------------|
| England | 7.4 | 29.56 |
| Wales | 11.18 | 24.32 |
| Islands | 6.6 | 26.9 |
| Totals | 7.55 | 29.25 |

FREE TRADE IN CORN, A FARMERS' QUESTION.

It must be admitted that the farmers, as a body, are still in love with the Corn Laws; and until they are out of love with them there will be a difficulty of their being repealed. Convince the farmers that these laws are no benefit to them; demonstrate to them that a prohibitory duty on imported corn would not put a farthing in their pockets; prove to them that the working agriculturists as a class would reap more benefit from a free trade in corn than any other working class in the community; and then the League's occupation is gone.

We are persuaded that these three propositions are capable of demonstration, and shall give our reasons.

There is a competition for farms all over Great Britain and Ireland. In the nature of things, this competition will every day become fiercer. Our soil does not increase, but our agricultural population does. From these causes the competition for farms flows. The competition for farms tends to raise the rent of land; and this again prevents the profits of the farmer from rising.

Now, in such a state of things, what benefit can farmers possibly reap from the Corn Laws? Grant that these laws raise the price of agricultural produce; but it does not follow, that the augmented price goes into the pocket of the farmer. The Corn Laws, by raising the price of agricultural produce, enable the farmer to pay a higher rent to the landlord. But here the matter ends.

Suppose that instead of the present sliding scale we had a prohibitory duty, as in the "good old times." Suppose that by the operation of this duty wheat, instead of selling at 56s., were to sell at 80s. a quarter. Would this be a benefit to the farmer? Would not his rent be raised just in proportion to the increased price of agricultural produce? The competition for farms would settle this point; and the tenant-at-will tenure of farms would enable landlords to take a speedy advantage of the improvement in prices.

From which our two first propositions clearly follow, viz., that the present sliding scale does not put a farthing in the pocket of the farmer; and that, so far as he is concerned, a prohibitory duty on foreign corn would be equally valueless.

But we have said that the working agriculturists as a class would reap more benefit from a free trade in corn than any other working class in the country. This is a bold proposition; but our proof is at hand.

Farmers will admit that there is a competition for farms. They know this to their cost. They cannot expect that, so long as this competition lasts, the rent of land will fall. Of course it is clearly their interest that this competition should be abated. But how is it to be abated while the agricultural population is rapidly on the increase on a limited soil? A farmer has two or three sons, grown up, we shall suppose, to his estate. How is he to find farms for them? The neighbouring farmers generally have the same number of sons. What is to be done for farms for them all? In this case, as in others, the weaker go to the wall. The richer farmer, desirous of having his sons "settled in life," makes an offer of a higher rent for the farm of a neighbour. The landlord is but a man, and he does not resist the temptation. Of course, an old farmer and his family are turned adrift upon the world; and if not absolutely reduced to poverty, they make a desperate effort to procure another farm, by offering a rackrent. Possibly they are successful; but it is at the expense of a brother farmer, and with the prospect of poverty or bankruptcy, in consequence of the high rent they have promised to pay.

We appeal to the experience of farmers for confirmation of these remarks. Let them say whether we have overstated or overcoloured. But, independently altogether of one old farmer over-bidding another, what are farmers to do with their young fellows? Again we say, the soil does not increase, but the agricultural population does; and this is a natural source of competition for farms, which, under the present system, there is no getting quit of.

The victims of this competition might perceive that our restrictive system, including the Corn Laws, and all other monopolies, makes it still more intense. Our restrictive policy curbs and confines our manufacturing and mercantile system. Farmers, who cannot find farms for their sons, naturally endeavour to employ them in some branch or other of our manufactures. But our manufactures are already full—overcrowded—as much so as the field of agricultural industry. There is no room here for the surplus agricultural population. Of course, after searching in vain for employment and subsistence in our marts of manufacturing industry, they are forced to return to their agricultural fields, there to compete with farmers and farm-labourers—in the one case to raise the rents of farms, in the other to beat down the price of agricultural labour.

Now, let the farmers ask themselves the question,—What effect has the Corn Law upon such a state of things? Does it not limit the field of our manufacturing industry?—and by limiting this field, does it not render the competition for farms and for agricultural labour more intense? The field of agricultural industry is naturally limited; not so the field of manufactures and commerce. This field is capable of indefinite extension; and either in this field, or in foreign emigration, our rapidly-increasing population must find elbow-room. Repeal the Corn Law; abolish all other monopolies upon our commerce; open up a field of profitable enterprise and employment in our towns and villages; and the intense competition for farms and for agricultural labour will immediately be abated. Thus, and by no other means, will our farmers be relieved from their natural enemy, competition, and will be able to procure farms at less than rackrents.—Bradford Observer.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK LANE, Monday, June 17.—Our market was well supplied with English Wheat during last week, and there was a fair quantity fresh up from the near counties to this morning's market; the best samples were taken off at about the prices of this day week, but the trade was heavy, and some of the inferior samples remained on hand at the close of the day. There was a moderate demand for Free Foreign at last week's rates. We are now quite dependent on our foreign supplies of Barley, and prices are 1s. higher than this day week. There were rather more English Beans offering, but the quantity was still so small that last Monday's prices were obtained. A few parcels of Egyptian in bond were held at 24s. to 25s., which prices were rather higher than buyers were willing to give. The very small quantities of English Peas on sale brought 1s. more. We were well supplied with Irish Oats; fully as high prices, and in some instances a little advance was obtained, but the trade was not quite so brisk as on this day week.

FRIDAY, June 21.—The supplies of English Wheat are moderate; upwards of 12,000 qrs. have arrived from abroad during the week. The trade for all descriptions remains in exactly the same state as on Monday. Barley, of which the supplies are very moderate, is taken off readily at Monday's rates. We have fair supplies of Irish Oats, and larger arrivals of Scotch than we have had for some time. The trade in all descriptions is dull; and Scotch cannot be disposed of without accepting a decline of 6d. from Monday. Beans and Peas are fully as dear. The duty on Beans fell to 8s. 6d. yesterday. Rain has fallen in most places round London, but by no means sufficient even for the present, unless it is followed up, of which there is not the least appearance.

The Free-Traders qualified to vote must everywhere prepare to enrol themselves and their friends on the register for the NEXT year.

To entitle a voter to be registered, he must have occupied during the twelve months previous to the 31st of July, premises of the value of £10 a year. He must have been rated for twelve months to the relief of the poor.

He must have paid, on or before the 20th of July, all poor-rates and assessed taxes due to the 6th of April preceding.

Further information and directions will be furnished on application, personally or by letter, to the Local Registration Societies; to Mr. Sidney Smith, 68, Cheapside, London; or to Mr. Hickin, League Offices, Newall's Buildings, Manchester.

For the convenience of individuals whose avocations render it difficult for them to call at the Registration Office, 68, Cheapside, during business hours, arrangements have been made by which attendance will be given every evening at that office until eight o'clock, to fill up and serve claims, and to supply every information relative to Parliamentary registration for counties, cities, and boroughs.

THE LATE DEBATE.

The number of members of the House of Commons who voted with Mr. Villiers on Wednesday night, was 124; being one less than last year. In the majority, 328 voted, being fifty-three less than last year. An analysis of the division-lists will throw some light upon the question, how far the memorials of the constituencies have operated towards this reduction, by one-fifth, of the Parliamentary strength of Monopoly. Fifty votes is no small number to have neutralized in twelve months. And this result has been produced under circumstances affording strong inducement to the Protectionists for the most impressive demonstration of their power which it was possible for them to make. It was their part, if they could, to lay the question to rest by an overwhelming majority. They should have shown, and would, had the means been within their reach, that the League was farther than ever from its object. They have only exhibited its advance—neutrality is half conversion: the next step will become comparatively easy. We must make allowances for them, and look for their complete accession next year; another detachment then taking up the position which they now occupy of neutrals and absentees. Two such operations will transfer the majority to the Free-Trade side; without making any allowance for other influences than those now at present operating. Nor is this all. Twenty-nine friends of our cause who voted last year were absent on the late occasion. As the motion last year went the full length of total repeal, and there have been no symptoms of desertion, we reckon these votes as still constituting a portion of our Parliamentary strength; and, if we combine with these the eleven members who are known to have paired, it gives our strength in the House at 164. It must also be considered that 28 members voted with us now, though they did not in 1843. They are an addition not less real for the total on the division being kept down by about an equal number of absentees. Amongst these also it may happen that an observant eye will find traces of the good result of memorializing by the constituencies. Perhaps we may thank the electoral remonstrants for at least a moiety. Here is encouragement to work on.

Not that our continued protest against taxation upon food requires such encouragement. Testimony against injustice is ever to be borne, whatever the aspect of events. We are not leagued on policy, but for principle. Had there been a majority of 400 against us, instead of 200; or had the majority increased by 50 instead of being diminished by 50; we should still not "bate one jot of heart or hope," but gird ourselves afresh for the conflict which now can never end but in the destruction of a vicious and miserable system.

In the debate, Sir Robert Peel diligently paid court to his semi-alienated friends. He was more sweet than sugar upon them. He stood up like Pecksniff baring his bosom for Martin's blow, in defence of old Chuzzlewit. "I, Sir, defend protection to agriculture!" He took the "burdens of the land" on the shoulders of his own logic; when Mr. Bright made them press rather heavily. It was a grand performance; and, though, as he said, he had had his benefit previously, yet like a prudent player, he was calculating on making a house for his next benefit. Yet there were passages in his speech that threw a strange and dreary colour upon the affected lightness with which he treated the discussion.

Sir Robert Peel speaks of "privations," as, in his fear "inseparable from the artificial state of society in a great manufacturing country." But why is a manufacturing country in an "artificial state?" There is no inherent tendency in enterprise and industry to produce either artificiality or privation? It is the interference with them that does both. To be a manufacturing country is evidently the natural position and destiny of England. Providence has marked it out for that purpose, both by its natural products and the character of its inhabitants: return towards the natural state, and how largely must the privations be abated. Legislation keeps up a struggle to make the country more agricultural than it would be, left to itself. It makes the evils, affectedly lamented; and then treats them as inevitable. For Sir Robert Peel has nothing to suggest: he simply objects. The victims of privation are left in hopelessness. The people must suffer, for legislation is artificial. That is the moral.

Sir Robert's colleague, Mr. Gladstone, "granted that high price of bread was a great public misfortune." The argument in which he introduces this concession supposes it to apply to the agricultural labourer, as well as the manufacturing. He contends that distress cannot cause incendiarism, for that bread is cheaper now than it was in 1839, 1840, 1841, when there were no fires. What, then, we demand, becomes of the argument of himself and his colleague, and the whole body of Protectionists, that Corn Laws, whose essential object is artificial enhancement of price, are a benefit to the farm-labourer? How will Mr. Gladstone get out of this dilemma? How will he deny that, so far as Corn Laws operate at all, they are a "public misfortune?" That public misfortune, be it remembered, inflicted by the Legislature for the private gain of a class, and aggravating the artificiality of society from which Sir Robert Peel deems privations inseparable.

For the first time, the subject of revenue has been pressed into the service of the Corn Laws. The average duty paid on foreign corn has, it appears, been regularly and rapidly rising from the passing of the present law. Before that, it had only averaged 5s. 3d. per quarter. In 1842, it was 8s. 9d.; in 1843, it was 14s.; and this year 160,000 quarters of wheat have been entered for home consumption at 17s. per quarter. All this falls doubly, at least, upon the consumer. The practical operation is that of a closer partnership than has hitherto existed between Government and Monopoly. "The devil and the king divide the prize." They share in the profits of the "privations" and "great public misfortune" which they create. How long is this to last? How long is every appeal to be dismissed with the ostentatiously exhibited weariness of listening to a twice-told tale?

In addition to those advocates of our cause on whose exertions we ever rely, and who so ably fulfilled every expectation, the service best contributed, in the debate, was from Lord Howick. He put the question in its plainest light. He showed how thoroughly the Corn Laws are a rent-job. He asserted man's right to the fruits of his labour. He brought home the charge upon the landowners, which, in other mouths, is treated as a calumny. "If the labourer at Sheffield could exchange the produce of his year's labour for 30 quarters of foreign corn, and they prohibited him from having any but English, of which he could only procure 20 quarters, he would ask whether they were not distinctly robbing that man of one-third of his labour?" Certainly they are; and they declare they will continue to do so, as long as they can.

How long that will be, must depend on the constituencies. It is their business to make themselves represented. Is Liverpool content to throw its entire weight into the scale of Monopoly? Has Bristol only a "half-faced fellowship" for Free-Trade? Bolton, Brighton, and Norwich;—are they all perfectly satisfied to be of the Janus genus? Where were the two Portsmouth members? Where Mr. Beckett of Leeds? And have we gained a fair stand-up, single-handed fight in London, to be outvoted by two to one, to say nothing of the absentee, who might have trimmed the balance? These and similar cases are for the electors to rectify with those anticipatory warnings by which "coming events cast their shadows before." The commercial constituencies must first do themselves justice. They cannot set about it too soon, or too vigorously. Memorializing has proved to be no bad thing; a better thing is—Registration.

THE LEAGUE, AND THE DIVISIONS ON THE SUGAR QUESTION.

The recent divisions on the sugar question have given rise to much discussion, not only in the public journals, but in private society; and while some have confined themselves to an examination of the principles involved, others have preferred to adopt as a test the supposed interests of party, the indulgence of passion, or the gratification of prejudice. We have before stated that Free-Traders, as such, are bound to regard nothing but the principles involved in the question; the conventional rules of party, and the very loose morality which they inculcate, have ever proved the shield of corruption and abuse in England; there has been Whig monopoly as well as Tory monopoly, and both have been found equally adverse to national justice and national prosperity. The question really in issue was, whether the proposal of Sir Robert Peel or that of Mr. Miles made the nearer practical approximation to the sound principles of Free Trade; and that question was solved by Mr. Miles himself, who proposed his amendment on the express ground that the Ministerial measure did not accord a sufficient amount of protection to the West India monopoly. Stripped of all technical artifices, his proposal was designed to increase the amount of protection given to colonial sugars; and we cannot comprehend how such a proposal could be consistently supported by those who denounce all protection as unjust, and all monopoly as injurious.

But we are told that, according to the rules of party-morality, this general principle should have been set aside for a purpose of temporary expediency, and that Mr. Miles should have been supported in order to place the Ministry in a minority, and force Sir Robert Peel to a resignation; it being inferred that the Free-Traders might possibly have gained some unexplained advantage in the future scramble for office. Now, we feel convinced that even on this low ground of expediency, setting aside all considerations of principle, the conduct of those Free-Traders who supported Sir Robert Peel was not only the most just, but the most prudent course that could be adopted under the circumstances. It is obvious that a majority against Sir Robert Peel could only be obtained by a coalition of parties; let us then inquire with whom the Free-Traders would have to coalesce? It is only necessary to glance at the list of Mr. Miles's supporters, and we shall find that it includes the names of the most bigoted and rancorous monopolists in the empire, the desperate adherents to the old system of corn and sugar ascendancy, such as it existed in the most palmy days of the rotten boroughs,—men who have forgotten nothing and learned nothing, for whom the stream of time has flowed in vain,—whose professed principles are the revival of ancient abuse and the restoration of corrupt influence. What principle do Free-Traders hold in common with such men? None whatever. Such a union would, therefore, have been an unprincipled coalition, and English history has been written in vain if it has not taught the lesson that every unprincipled coalition has been fraught with serious injury to the nation. This has ever been the besetting sin of the Whigs, and this has been the reason why Whigs statesmen have rarely been able to win public confidence in the honesty or consistency of their policy. Mr. Fox's memorable coalition with Lord North, whom he had so often described as something worse than an incarnate demon, threw back the cause of Reform in England for more than half a century, and enabled the oligarchy to plunge England into a war with France, the consequences of which will be felt for many succeeding generations. In the debate on the Treaty of Commerce with France, February 12th, 1787, we find Mr. Fox deliberately advocating the exclusion of French produce from English markets, on the ground that the French were our "natural enemies," and that, consequently, any close commercial or political connexion between the two countries should be avoided. This temporary adoption of the cry of prejudice rendered all Mr. Fox's subsequent opposition to the French war utterly unavailing; and the temporary adoption of the cry for protection by the Whig leaders in the late debate would have compelled them to take an attitude hostile to Free Trade, had they returned to office. Lord John Russell's late coalition with Lord Ashley, whose measures he had denounced with supercilious contempt while he held the seals of office, was another example of the danger of paltering with principle for real or imaginary party gain; and should he ever return to power he will find that he has prepared for himself a series of entanglements from which he cannot escape without loss of character. To go no farther than the condition of the present Cabinet: every man sees that the partial encouragement given to such discreditable exhibitions as Lord Sandon's wooden bible, and the figure of a woman in scarlet robes, paraded through London, together with the tacit acquiescence in the cry of "No Popery," the calumnies against the Irish priesthood, the appeals to national prejudice against the Irish people, and the more than implied acquiescence in the monopolist clamours against the Whig measures of 1841, have been the source of the greatest difficulties which Sir Robert Peel has had to encounter in his present administration. It is notoriously a proverb, that the Peel Opposition is beating the Peel Ministry. With such examples before them, of the evils that arise from unprincipled coalitions, the Free-Traders would have shown themselves incapable of profiting by the lessons of history or experience had they entered into union with the bigots of monopoly merely to produce the confusion of a Ministerial crisis.

The leaders of the Whigs have indeed on two recent occasions consorted with the extreme bigots of the opposite side for the purpose of obtaining a triumph over Ministers; but have they by so doing advanced their moral influence in the country? On the contrary, they placed themselves in a position where victory would have been their ruin and defeat their only means of salvation. Had they broken up the Government on Lord Ashley's motion they must have gone to the country pledged to impose restrictions on industry; had they succeeded on Mr. Miles's motion they would have appeared before the constituencies equally pledged to maintain restrictions on commerce. It is said that the League on the late occasion saved Sir Robert Peel's Ministry from dissolution; but with greater truth it may be averred that the Free-Traders who supported Sir Robert Peel saved the rest of the Liberal party from coming before the country with the millstone of West India monopoly round their necks, and with their votes for increased protection to the sugar oligarchy labelled on their foreheads. But with the consequences of these votes to the Whig party or any other party the Free-Traders have nothing to do; they have asserted their principles, as they have declared that they would do, irrespective of party consideration; they have paltered with no pledge, they have parleyed with no monopoly, they have abandoned no profession, they have adhered to plain simple truth, refusing all compromise with falsehood. When the day of reckoning comes, as come it assuredly will, they have no debts of dishonour to pay by conceding national interests, either in whole or in part, as a price for the support of faction.

It must be confessed that the amendment was so artfully worded by Mr. Miles, or more probably by some hidden juggler behind the curtain, that it was well calculated to ensnare the unwary; and Mr. Cobden has confessed that, at the first blush, he was inclined to give it his support. We must, therefore, not be understood as in the slightest degree blaming any of those staunch Free-Traders who were induced to give their votes to Mr. Miles. We believe that they misapprehended the real question at issue, and we know that the question was designedly put in the form most likely to mislead. The difference between them and the Free-Traders that supported Sir Robert Peel was not respecting any principle, but respecting the form in which a principle was stated. They have taken this view of the matter, and, therefore, we have nothing at issue between us. Our argument is directed, not against them, but against those persons who condemn the votes given by our friends on mere party grounds, and who consequently find it convenient to omit all consideration of the principles involved. To those who object on the score of principle, we have replied by arguments deduced from principle; and to those who censure on the ground of party, we are now making our reply on their own chosen basis of party expediency.

The condition of Ireland has been set forth as a reason why the mere ejection of the Ministry ought to have been the paramount consideration in giving votes on the sugar question. This is the argument of passion, which, however honest, is not always very reasonable. It is possible that a new Ministry might have put an end to the equally absurd and mischievous farce of the state trials, but it is also possible that Ireland may not have been a gainer by any transfer of Ministerial power. Mr. O'Connell's first prosecution was a Whig measure, and neither Ireland nor England has forgotten the Coercion Act. In the debate on Mr. Ward's motion, the mere Whigs showed little inclination to deal wisely and liberally with the chief grievances of Ireland; and the majority on that occasion was decisive as to the fate of remedial measures for Irish grievances in the present Parliament. But, without dwelling on these considerations, we should rather at once state that there is no earthly connexion between the imprisonment of Mr. O'Connell and the question of the sugar duties. To us it appears that the most probable result of a Ministerial crisis would have been the restoration of Sir Robert Peel to office with greater power than he possessed before; and that, in the interval of confusion, the appeal to the House of Lords on the writ of error, to which we look with some confidence, would have been delayed, or perhaps adjourned to another session.

Some papers, but more especially the Sunday Times, have measured the conduct of the Free-Traders by the standard of mere vulgar prejudice. According to such writers, the mere fact of supporting Sir Robert Peel, even when he was right, justifies the application of the whole vocabulary of coarse vituperation to those who adhere to sound principle wherever they find it. Their conduct reminds us of the story of two aldermen of Cork, in the days of the ascendancy: at a corporation dinner, when the wine had circulated for some time, one said to the other, "Well, I hate those Papists, Bob, but I cannot tell why;" to which his worthy compeer replied, "I hate them too, Ned, and for the very same reason." Now, it is quite true that Free-Traders have no particular reason for loving Sir Robert Peel; we need not refer to circumstances still fresh in the public memory, and not likely to fall soon into oblivion, for the purpose of proving that the leaders of the Free-Trade party can have no feelings of personal favour towards Sir Robert Peel,—his odious attempt to fix an odious imputation on one of the most prominent of the Free-Traders cannot easily be forgotten,—and still less reason have they for any political attachment to a Minister the whole course of whose tortuous policy is in direct opposition to the principles which he recognises, and the faith which he maintains. No man can doubt that, if personal feelings were allowed to have sway, that the Free-Traders would far more readily join with those leaders who sit on their own side, and with whom on many important questions they have sentiments in common, than lend their aid to a monopolist Minister. Were Lord John Russell in office, and assailed like Sir Robert Peel by a bigoted section of his adherents for a concession to the principles of Free Trade, the League would have given him unhesitating support; but they cannot follow when he chooses to ally himself with the band of ultra-monopolists.

It is fair, also, to take into consideration the circumstances which placed the existence of the Peel Administration in jeopardy. Had the Premier left the West India monopoly intact in its grossness and oppression, he would have found no revolt in the rear of his camp, no insurrection among his followers, no monopolists ready to join the Whigs, or any others in resistance to his measures. His crime was his approximation to honesty, and the Free-Traders are blamed for not punishing his approach to sound principle. If such reasoning be correct, the leaders of the Whigs deserve infinitely more blame for not having joined Sir Robert Inglis and his party in 1829, and broken up the Peel Ministry of that day on the question of Catholic emancipation. All the world knows that they claimed no small credit to themselves for not having done so; but then they had not recently tasted the sweets of office, which are found to be an excellent anodyne for inconvenient scruples. We do not attack any section of the Liberal party for having consorted with Miles and monopoly, because, as we have already said, the amendment was designedly so framed as to admit of a wide latitude of interpretation, and thus hide the real point in issue; for the same reason we are not disposed to complain of those who, from obvious misapprehension, have taken the trouble of lecturing us on the score of principle; with such persons a very brief explanation will be sufficient to set us right. But we are now dealing with those who censure us because, to serve the doubtful expediency of party, we refused a coalition with that section of the House of Commons most bigoted to monopoly, most interested in the maintenance of unjust restrictions, and most perverse in the perpetuation of every abuse; but we must say that their anger against those who refused to compromise themselves and their principles by such a junction is exceedingly like the indignation of the fox who lost his tail, and then scolded his brethren for refusing to part with such an appendage.

The cause of Free Trade has gained much during the debate; its principles have not only been recognised but defended by the main body of the Ministerial phalanx; the extreme monopolists have found themselves utterly powerless save when aided by the party to which they have been most strongly opposed. With the morality which gave or accepted such aid we have nothing to do; our code of ethics is not framed for the service of political party; our rules of judgment are the invariable standards of truth and falsehood, which cannot be varied for any purposes of temporary expediency. But while we pronounce no censure on others, we rejoice that our friends have fulfilled the pledge which they gave to the public, that they would ever support principle irrespective of party; and our approbation of their conduct is not a little increased by the circumstances of difficulty under which they were called upon to fulfil the pledge.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

Twentieth Week, ending Saturday, June 29.

Mr. VILLIERS brought on, this week, his annual motion for the total and immediate REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS. It was commenced on Tuesday, and terminated on Wednesday; the debate, on each night, extending considerably into each morning. There were also peculiar circumstances attending the discussion, which marks it out from all other previous debates on the Corn Law, and by which the division has been rendered a very signal and instructive indication of the progress of public opinion. It is important to note these peculiarities, in order that the true character of the debate and the division may be clearly seen.

First, the motion of Mr. VILLIERS was, in itself, a very rigid Test. Hitherto the advocates of a Fixed Duty have had some pretext for supporting Mr. Villiers. His motion has generally been, that the House should resolve itself into a Committee, in order to consider the propriety of repealing the existing Corn Law. Now, Fixed-Duty men could support such a proposition. Their argument was, usually, Let us go into Committee; we condemn the Sliding Scale; and having voted its abrogation, we can see what we can substitute in its place. But no pretext of this kind was afforded by the proposition made during the past week. Mr. Villiers proposed certain resolutions affirming certain facts; and no man could consistently vote for them who was not an enemy, on principle, to all Protection, and prepared to carry the immediate as well as the total repeal of the Corn Laws. To be sure, two or three members declared their intention of voting for the motion of Mr. Villiers, because, though friendly to a Fixed Duty, they preferred Total Repeal to the maintenance of the existing law. Even Lord HOWICK, clear, emphatic, and decided as he always is on the great principles of FREE TRADE, avowed this motive. His speech on Tuesday night evinced grasp of the subject, appreciation of its importance, and boldness in application; yet he indicated in it, as he has done before, that he was friendly to the imposition of a moderate Fixed Duty, and only supported the motion of Mr. Villiers as a far better alternative to that of supporting the sliding scale. With these exceptions, however, the division on the motion must be regarded as indicating purely, without the intervention of adventitious circumstances, the strength of the TOTAL-REPEAL party in the House of Commons. Sir Robert Peel admitted that the motion was an honest one; that it had been framed so as to exclude all chance or pretext for fishing for stray votes; and viewing it, therefore, as a rigid Test, it marks out those members of the House who support Free Trade on principle.

The Test itself would have repelled support from all who were not rigid Free-Traders; but there were other circumstances which had the effect of narrowing the circle of the supporters of the motion. We need not here revive the question of whether those members of the House who are connected with the Anti-Corn-Law League were right or wrong in their conduct on the sugar duties, with the exception of noticing that the extremest of those who censure them only impute error of judgment, but do not venture to impugn motives. But the Whig party were grievously offended; and their displeasure was marked, first, by Lord John Russell, on Tuesday night, speaking against the motion of Mr. Villiers; and, secondly, on Wednesday, by the absence of all the leading Whig members from that front Opposition bench which they usually occupy, and which continued conspicuously empty, until at a late hour it was filled up by members who are not considered as having a conventional right to sit there. Of this absence Sir Robert Peel took occasion to make use, in order to excite a laugh; and this was only one of the many evasions which characterised a speech in which the whole question was evaded, with the exception of the allegation that there were circumstances which determined him to maintain the existing law and the existing rate of protection.

With these explanatory remarks we shall proceed to describe the debate itself.

The motion was to the following purport:—

"Mr. Charles Villiers.—That this House do resolve itself into a Committee, for the purpose of considering the following Resolutions:—

"That it appears by a recent Census that the people of this Country are rapidly increasing in number.

"That it is in evidence before this House that a large proportion of her Majesty's subjects are insufficiently provided with the first necessities of life.

"That, nevertheless, a Corn Law is in force which restricts the supply of food, and thereby lessens its abundance.

"That any such restriction having for its object to impede the free purchase of an article upon which depends the subsistence of the community, is indefensible in principle, injurious in operation, and ought to be abolished.

"That it is therefore expedient that the Act 5 and 6 Vic., c. 14, shall be repealed forthwith."

In support of the motion, Mr. Villiers made a speech of no less than three hours and a half—a great effort, considering the delicate state of his health. Its points may be thus indicated:—

1. Continued discussion inspires Hope; the protection societies were but an exhibition that theirs was a losing, while that of the Anti-Corn-Law League was essentially a gaining cause; and public opinion will ultimately carry that which is based on Truth and Justice.

2. All the arguments adduced in support of the Corn Law had been sifted, and found wanting; the most plausible of them all, that of "independence of foreigners," had turned out the most foolish, inasmuch as returns showed our habitual dependence on foreigners for the bread we eat; and, while the Corn Law was unequivocally injurious to commerce, the interest of the farmer and the agricultural labourer in it had been shown to be an utter fallacy.

3. Not only were the farmers in continual distress under this Corn Law, but the agricultural labouring population were lower in the scale of civilization than almost any other class of human beings. On this fact, incendiary Fires shed an awful light.

4. The allegations of land being thrown out of cultivation, and labourers out of employment, were disproved by the minute calculations of such men as Earl Dufferin, who, combining science with practice, showed that land would pay rent, and therefore be cultivated, under any pressure from foreign competition. While they were talking about the danger of displacing agricultural labour, no less than 360,000 agricultural labourers had passed into and been absorbed in the manufacturing districts.

5. The people of this country were admitted to toil too long and to have too little to eat; they were better off with a good than with a bad harvest; yet there was no difference in principle whether food was rendered scarce by a bad harvest, or by limiting the supply from other countries.

6. A copious exhibition of STATISTICS, showed that abundance or scarcity in the supply of the essential food of the people had an intimate connexion between the increase or the diminution of

Pauperism Crime
Poor Rates Disease
Emigration

Deficient Nourishment .. Increase of Typhus Fever.

WAR PRICES AND RENT
being the parents of

Want, Disease, Crime, and Death.

7. The united cry of the more enlightened agriculturists was—IMPROVEMENT: yet, if there were truth in protection principles, Improvement ought to be as injurious as Importation. Nor, while Protection remained, would Improvement be so carried out as to develop all the resources of the soil, with security to the farmer, comfort to the labourer, and benefit to all, including even the mistaken landlord himself.

This index will enable the reader to appreciate the points of the following speech:—

Mr. VILLIERS rose and said:—Sir, the purpose of the motion of which I have given notice is once again to bring under the consideration of this House the claim, so just and important in itself, which is made on the part of the community at large, that the trade in the first necessary of life, now restricted by an act of this House, should, in future, be unfettered and set wholly free; and I can most truly say that, such is the importance which I attach to this claim, that if I could persuade myself that the manner with which it was presented to the House could in any way affect its success, that I would not again have become the instrument for bringing it forward. This, however, Sir, is notoriously not the case. I have upon two occasions brought the question before this Parliament, and have been supported by members with the greatest ability, who have left nothing unsaid that could be urged in its favour; and they have done so in vain. It may then perhaps be asked, upon what grounds it is that I now renew the appeal. Sir, I think I may take credit for not having adopted this course without consideration, and that I should not have hastily decided upon a course which was more likely to injure than advance the cause. Had those who are united with me in opinion on this subject remained silent upon it during this session, our opponents would not have been slow to infer that, either from their overwhelming influence or their persuasive eloquence, we had been induced to fly from the field, or that we were satisfied with the former decisions of this House. A notion certainly more foreign to the fact could not be imagined. But I think the public might have concurred in this view had we remained silent, considering the novel attitude which the country gentlemen have assumed on this question during the past year. Those gentlemen have lately deemed it expedient, for the purpose of maintaining this law and influencing opinion, to descend into the field of public agitation; and they have appealed to the same tribunal to which that body who, in self-defence, are now leagued together to oppose the Corn Law have found it necessary to appeal. The meetings of those gentlemen appear to have been somewhat select, and they seem to me rather to have agitated themselves, than to have succeeded in awakening much sympathy for their cause ("Hear," and a laugh), yet, inasmuch as their professions appear somewhat large in print, and as there has been no lack of confidence evinced, perhaps, on the other side, it would have been curious if, when both met together on this common ground, there had been no opportunity of meeting in argument face to face on this subject. The public expected such an opportunity of judging fairly between the contending parties as to which have the right on their side. But, Sir, I see little reason for despair, and much ground for hope, in the continued discussion of this question; for I am unable to explain on any other ground than that of a conviction of the substantial justice of our cause why the Government have not allowed any session, nay, why they do not allow any month of any session, to pass without abandoning some portion of the ground on which the system to which we are opposed is based. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) I do not say this from any idle purpose to make mischief between the two sections of the opposite party, because I feel no respect for the blindness or boldness on the part of those of the opposite side of the House who are not ready to defer to that greater experience and greater ability possessed by the Government, in saying how far and the time when it is necessary to abandon any portion of that which they are neither able to keep nor entitled to possess. It seems to me that we are deriving all the advantage from discussion which a cause based on truth and justice is likely to secure. We are gradually gaining ground in public opinion, whilst those who are opposed to us are rapidly losing ground. ("Hear, hear, hear.") Public opinion, fortunately, possesses great influence in this country, and discussion exercises considerable influence in forming that opinion; and so much deference is due to it, that any law or institution which is assailed must be defended on public grounds. ("Hear.") The difficulty with hon. gentlemen opposite in arguing this question was, that they were unable to defend the law on its real ground, and it was inconvenient to assign any other; for as soon as it was attempted to place it upon any public ground, that instantly became the subject of the closest inquiry: it was sifted and tested in every way to examine if the plea was hollow or true; and there was no one ground which he had heard since he came into that House that had not now been thus thoroughly examined, and as completely exposed. ("Hear.") He was curious, therefore, to hear what fresh ground was to be alleged this time. The ground upon which it was placed when first introduced was the most plausible, before it was tested by experience, when it proved to be the most foolish on which it could stand—which was, that it was dangerous for this country to be dependent for its supply of food on other countries, and that, therefore, the landowners should be protected from competition. It was assumed that we might depend upon other countries for our revenue, for the material of manufactures, and for the means of employment to millions of our people, whereby they should obtain bread, but not dependent upon them for the bread itself. ("Hear.") That was the plea set forth for the enactment of the law—one which, at the time, all thinking men derided, and which has since become contemptible by the failure of the experiment. The returns laid before the House during the last twenty years, showed that since the law was passed we had been dependent on other countries for large supplies of corn, and in the last five years to the amount of 17,000,000 quarters of corn ("hear"); and that too a supply not raised with a view to this country, but obtained under circumstances the most disadvantageous to us. ("Hear, hear, hear.") During the thirteen years of the duration of the law passed in 1828, there was imported from foreign countries no less than 30,000,000 quarters of grain actually necessary for the consumption of the people of this country. The advocates for monopoly in the home market would hardly then allege a sufficiency of home supply as an excuse—at least, he would not expect such an excuse from any man having regard for his character and truth. Whether this soil would or could not produce enough to support the people of Great Britain, he could not pretend to say; but the fact stood upon record, that it had not produced enough, and that we had been obliged to import 30,000,000 quarters of grain from foreign countries. He had considered what were the other excuses urged in support of this law, and having listened with attention to them all, he must say that they had been every one shown to be futile and totally insufficient. ("Hear.") He had heard from honourable gentlemen opposite, on previous occasions, when the subject was discussed, that those connected with the ownership of lands had no interest in their continuance, but they supported the Corn Laws because those who were dependent on them (the landowners) had all their interest involved in their continuance. It was now, however, ascertained beyond a doubt, that neither the farmer, nor the farmer's labourer, nor any other class in the community, derived any benefit from these laws except the landowners themselves. ("Hear," from the Opposition.) No member of any agricultural county would to-night, he thought, venture to urge this flimsy pretext, so demonstrably untrue, as a reason for the continuance of the Corn Laws; no honourable member would here stand up and say, I can prove that the farmers or their labourers benefit by this law. ("Cries of "Hear, hear.") The interest of these classes in these laws had been fully and fairly inquired into by those leagued together for the purpose, and so far from the Corn Laws being of any service to them, nothing appeared to be more identified with the permanent interest of both the farmer and the agricultural labourer than their total repeal. Every person is now familiar with the fact that the distress of no class had been more prominently or more frequently obtruded upon the public than that of the farmers. He (Mr. Villiers) would undertake to bring before the bar of that House, or before a committee, such a body of evidence as would leave no doubt that, for the last thirty years, the farmers had been, of all men, the most embarrassed, and that their distress had been more obtruded upon the attention of this House than those of any other class of persons. In fact, it is now matter of notoriety that they had derived no benefit from the Corn Laws. ("Hear.") The farmer had been duped and deceived by the promise of Parliament as to the effects of these laws. ("Hear, hear.") The landlords had told him that they would ensure him a certain price for his corn; and what had been the result? Why, that he had been deluded into the payment of higher rent. The same had occurred with regard to all the exemptions that had been procured for the farmer in the payment of taxes, there was not a landlord in the House who did not know that they contributed only to swell the rent of the landowner. ("Hear, hear, hear.") The members of that House dare not call a single farmer before them, and ask him whether what they had done in his behalf, as they said, had been at all to his benefit? Whatever relief they had procured for the farmer through Parliament had been for the advantage alone of landowners. ("Hear, hear, hear.") He would venture to say that not an honourable member in that House would repeat again to-night that the Corn Laws were enacted for the benefit of the farmers. He defied honourable members to repeat that the law was upheld for such purpose. The farmers were not only the most distressed class in the whole community, but they held their lands under circumstances the most disadvantageous for the purpose of agriculture. The assertion that these laws were for the benefit of the labourer was equally absurd and unfounded. No one would now venture to say that it was to the advantage of the labourer that the prices of food should be kept up, and that high prices ensured high wages. There was a volume before them, produced by the labours of a commission of the Crown, which effectually disproved that assertion. No man in the face of that volume could rise and say that these laws were for the advantage of the labourers. Their mouths were closed by the evidence of their own commission. This was an authority which they did not venture to dispute. That evidence proved that no one could be lower in the scale of civilization than the agricultural labourer; so much so, indeed, as almost to place him out of its pale. Scarcely a day passed but the papers were full of accounts of what were called the crimes of the labouring classes, which were, in fact, only the results of their necessitous condition. The honourable member for Stockport had asked for inquiry upon this subject; he had made a motion to that effect, but the landowners in this House could not to assent to it; they felt that they dared not call upon a single farmer or labourer to give evidence with respect to their condition, and their experience of the operation of these laws. The motion of his honourable friend was a perfectly fair one, and one quite in point; but the landowners were afraid to call upon their own tenants, and to ask them whether, in their opinion, the Corn Laws did not chiefly operate to raise their rents; and upon the poor labourers, to say whether their case was not made more desperate by high prices. Sure he was that the landowners would not bring forward either farmers or labourers to speak of their experience of the operation of these laws. He saw in the Times newspaper a statement, that in some parts of the country, where there had been once a great deal of disaffection, wherever the farmer allowed the labourer an opportunity of procuring provisions cheap, thus virtually repealing the Corn Laws, they became better affected, and property was safe. He would ask the landowners to answer this question, how it was that the labourer was always found to be contented and well affected when prices were low, but that they were always disaffected, and the property of the country endangered, when prices were high? He asked the hon. member for Knaresborough, who had thought it decent to give notice of an amendment on the present occasion, to meet and answer this point. ("Hear.") He would read a public letter, yet unanswered, addressed to the county of Bucks, one of the most purely agricultural districts in the country, by a baronet and a magistrate of that county, Sir Harry Verney, no member of the Anti-Corn-Law League. The honourable baronet writes as follows:—

"My friends, it is with pain that I contemplate the condition of the agricultural classes, especially of the agricultural labourer. See his damp, unwholesome, ill-ventilated, crowded cottage—ride through a village, where groups of men are standing about, unable to obtain work. Remark the downcast look of a man, as honest and upright as the most honest and upright amongst us, who has gone round from farm to farm and cannot obtain labour; follow him home to his family, and see him enter his cottage, where his wife and hungry children await his return, hoping that he may have obtained employment and food: but he has failed. The charity of a farmer, or the kindness of those who divide with each other the widow's mite, of some neighbour less poor only than himself, supports the family for a few days, until the order of admission to the workhouse is obtained. There are few, I hope I may say no, deaths from want in our agricultural districts; every poor family that has a crust or a dish of potatoes will divide it with their poorer neighbour who has none; in every village there are farmers and farmers' wives ready to assist a starving family. But are there no diseases brought on by poor living? No constitutions impaired by unwholesome and insufficient diet, want of clothing, and bad dwellings? Are not the minds as well as the bodies of our peasantry often enfeebled by their sufferings, and unfitted for the very exertions that would better their condition? You know as well as I do the reply to such questions." This was the letter of a baronet of Buckinghamshire—one who had property in the county; and such was his description of the state of the labourer after thirty years of protection. He would now read the evidence of a farmer who had spoken at a public meeting in the county of Gloucester (Mr. Josiah Hunt, of Almondsbury, a practical tenant-farmer of great experience); and in proceeding to do so he would notice the reference of an hon. member to the subject of the poor laws:—"He (Mr. Hunt) believed that with Free Trade the cultivation of the land would be improved—the produce of the land would be increased—the independence of the tenant secured, and his prosperity greatly augmented. He could fully bear out what Mr. Cobden had said about the agricultural labourers—their wages were miserably low, and yet the farmers could not pay more. In his own parish hundreds of families lived on 7s. per week—their fare was worse than that of the pauper—whole families of grown up children slept in one room, to the total disregard of the decencies of life, and to the total destruction of feelings of propriety and morality. It had been said the land had to bear peculiar burdens; but it should also be said the farmers had peculiar exemptions; and if the farmers' windows were untaxed, and his riding horse and his dogs free of duty, it was not to benefit him, but that he might be able to pay higher rent to his landlord. He cordially seconded the resolution, believing that a repeal of the Corn Laws would improve the prospects of the tenant-farmer, and promote the physical, moral, and social condition of the labourer." What did the honourable member suppose was the average weekly cost of supporting a man, with his wife and six children, in the workhouse in the county? He would find that it was 17s. 6d., whilst the wages of a labourer it appeared were only 7s. a week. The working labourer, therefore, was very far worse off than the pauper, and almost forced into the workhouse in self-defence. The farmer to whom he had referred said farther, that he, had long been opposed to the Corn Laws—and that he was fully convinced that they were no benefit but an injury to the tenants: they were designed to raise rents, and to place the tenantry subservient to the political domination of the landlord—and that if he needed anything to fortify his opinion on the Corn Law, it was the fact of the best practical agriculturists in the kingdom entertaining the same views on the subject: the whole system, he declared, was not to benefit the farmer, but to raise the landlord's rent. Let the hon. gentleman opposite stand forward and avow himself the friend of the landowners, if he pleased—let him truckle to the dominant class in the state, if he thought it convenient or proper to do so; but before he stood forward in such a cause as the friend of the poor labourer, he would call upon him to answer the statements which he had just read to the House. (Hear, hear.) These statements, along with a host of others to the like effect, fully bore out his (Mr. Villiers's) position, that neither the farmer nor the labourer were interested in the continuance of these laws; and it was but justice to add that it was to the exertions of the Anti-Corn-Law League that the disclosure of these important truths were owing. After these disclosures he did not believe that the defenders of these laws would attempt to reassert any of these arguments which had thus been exploded; and he was at a loss to anticipate the grounds on which honourable gentlemen opposite would attempt to oppose the present motion. (Hear, hear.) The right honourable the Secretary for the Board of Trade, who did not like to repeat all the foolish things which were said by his supporters, had, when this subject was last discussed, started an argument of his own, which he (Mr. Villiers) must confess he did not think much wiser than those of his colleagues. The right honourable gentleman said that he would not urge any objection upon the ground of any danger of our not obtaining a sufficient supply of corn from abroad when wanted, as he believed that the market in corn would be regulated pretty much upon the same principles as that of any other commodity. But the objection which the right honourable gentleman threw out was, that the influx of foreign corn and the consequent depression of price, would throw out of employ a good deal of agricultural labour. From what had fallen in the course of the debate, the landowners in this House did not appear to entertain a very high notion of the right honourable gentleman's agricultural knowledge. (Hear.) An honourable member for Sussex, indeed, seemed to imply that the right hon. gentleman was so ignorant of these matters as not to know an ox from a plough. (A laugh.) With respect to the notion of the repeal of the Corn Laws displacing agricultural labour, the right hon. gentleman gave the House none of the data upon which that fancy was founded. He supposed, of course, that the right hon. gentleman calculated upon agricultural labour being displaced, as the consequence of certain lands being thrown out of cultivation. Now, looking at what had been said by agriculturists themselves, he was at a loss to understand that the necessary consequence of a reduction of prices would be to throw any considerable quantity of land out of cultivation. The fact, he believed, was that, if a little science and economy were applied to the cultivation of the land, a low price might pay the labour of cultivation, and yield a good profit. A nobleman, distinguished for his knowledge of agriculture, Lord Ducie, declared publicly that all apprehension upon this score was a fallacy, and that without paying rent they could produce wheat on almost any land at lower prices than those quoted at any foreign port. (Hear.) Now, it was obvious that, before land could be thrown out of cultivation, it must have given up paying rent; and before it ceased to support the labourer, it must go to waste. The right hon. gentleman ought to have shown at what prices land could not be cultivated with a prospect of profit; and he would have to show that it would not be worth the mere application of industry required for cultivation, before he declared that the lowering of prices in the market would be followed by the displacement of labour. He (Mr. Villiers) thought it probable that the right hon. gentleman would not repeat this argument again to-night. Since he had formerly used it, he had possibly read what had been said by men who knew something about the subject, and he had doubtless profited by it. But there was another argument which the right hon. gentleman had since advanced; it was to this effect:—that we should be careful how far we risked the reduction of rent, lest owners of land should themselves become farmers. The right hon. gentleman was afraid that the farmers themselves would be ousted from their tenancies, and the landowners, by cultivating their own land, become useful members of society. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) Now, he did not think that the right hon. gentleman need labour under any very serious apprehension on this score. He did not think that the firstborn of the land would be very likely to take to a very industrious and laborious pursuit as long as they could be more agreeably employed in doing nothing. Let him not be alarmed—let him rest satisfied that, during his time, at least, those who were born to inherit the land would continue to be trained up in idleness as they had heretofore been (a laugh), and be chiefly qualified for consuming the fortunes they possessed (Hear, hear, hear.) But whilst the right hon. gentleman was dreading the displacement of agricultural labourers, let him reflect upon the alternative of injuring trade, which would result in the displacement of a considerable number of manufacturing labourers. It appeared that in ten years upwards of 360,000 agricultural labourers had gone from their villages to the manufacturing districts as a means of living. Did not the right hon. gentleman perceive that, by the returning of any considerable portion of that number to the agricultural districts in consequence of the want of employment in manufactures, there would be just as great a displacement of agricultural labour as he apprehended would result from the introduction of foreign corn, and the consequent lowering of prices. (Hear, hear.) But the landowners themselves were now convinced that increased production and low prices did not displace labour; on the contrary, they went to their farmers and told them that the principle to go upon was, by the application of more labour, and increased skill and new improvements, to produce the largest possible quantity of corn, and at the lowest possible price. And if this argument against low prices was good, it was just as much so against improvement as against Free Trade: increased supply and reduced price was the result of both. They could not increase the productiveness of the land without the effect of the additional quantity being felt in the market; and the right hon. gentleman reasoned from the effect of low prices that land would go out of cultivation. Another argument had been used as showing the necessity of great caution in any change—which was the numerical importance of the agricultural classes in the scale of society. But a document had recently appeared—namely, an analysis of the late census—which gave some information on this matter. It appeared from these calculations that the agricultural classes, about whom so much had been written, and of whom it had been said that they constituted seven-ninths of the whole population of the country, were only seven per cent. and a little more of our population. (Hear, hear, hear.) And with what show of right or justice would it be pretended to exclude the whole mass of the people of this country from their natural right to buy their food as abundantly and as cheaply as they could, out of regard to the supposed exclusive interests of such a fraction of the community? (Hear.) On those who contended for the continuance of the Corn Laws lay the onus of showing that they were the means of giving the most abundant supply of food to the people. That was the question—whether that was the effect of those laws or not; and if they failed to prove the affirmative of that proposition, then he (Mr. Villiers) would say that the maintenance of the Corn Laws was the maintenance of tyranny, and the cause of enormous evil; for he stood there not on the part of this or that interest, either manufacturing or otherwise, but on the part of the people at large, to assert that it was their right, and for their unquestionable advantage, and for the good of the whole country, that they should procure and have access to their food as cheaply, as abundantly, as conveniently as by means of capital, commerce, industry, or any other human contrivance they could possibly possess themselves of. (Cheers.) Do the Corn Laws affect that? It ought to be proved surely if it is so, for most truly did Lord Grenville say, that imperative, indeed, should be the necessity that justifies any tampering with the means of the people's subsistence, and that to confine ourselves to our own soil appeared to mar the provision which Heaven, by varying the climes and seasons of the earth, had relieved any nation like our own from exclusive dependence on itself. (Hear, hear.) To legislate for limiting the sources of supply was, in point of fact, to encourage scarcity. It was most unwise to confer upon any body of men who were irresponsible, and whose interests might conflict with the interest of the great majority of the people, the right to enact laws for regulating the supply of food. (Hear, hear.) It was giving them complete power over the people. He who determines the amount of food, could make slaves of the people; and they could not too quickly direct the attention of the country to the immense importance of food being abundant, and to the influence of the Corn Law on that object. The time was most convenient,—their information never had been greater. Never had their experience been more complete, as to the effect of more or less food upon the moral as well as physical condition of the people—never had they approached the subject at a moment more calm or free from excitement—never had there been a period in all respects so adapted from the knowledge of the past to legislate for the future. (Hear, hear.) There were, moreover, now, some honourable gentlemen in that House who occupied themselves much in the praiseworthy endeavour to discover the cause of the bad physical condition of the people, and who, overlooking all pecuniary and selfish considerations, were anxious, as they said, to legislate at once on the principles of humanity, in order to raise the condition of their fellow-men. He would invite those honourable gentlemen, then, to go into the question of what was the chief cause of the misery and sufferings of the great mass of the labouring people. He asked them to investigate the cause of that severe and pressing competition which compelled the people to toil too long, to work too hard; which limited their food, and deprived them of the power of educating their children; which compelled them to neglect the domestic duties of life, and sunk them in the scale of civilization. He heard from them that people were made slaves by circumstances. He asked them, then, to examine the circumstances that caused this evil, with a view to remove them. (Hear, hear, hear.) He asked those honourable gentlemen who were actuated by those philanthropic motives, whether that competition which led to all these lamentable results was not influenced by the want of food? (Hear, hear.) Could there be any doubt upon this point? The truth of the proposition was admitted by honourable gentlemen opposite themselves in some cases. They always were anxious for a good harvest; they prayed for it in their churches; and why? Because a good harvest rendered food more plentiful. (Hear, hear.) Those honourable gentlemen had certain associations in their minds as to the effects of a good or a bad harvest, and amongst them was that, with a good harvest, the people had more work; that they were improved in their condition, and were not liable to those extreme sufferings which a bad harvest, and the consequent scarcity of food and high prices, entailed upon them. Then why quarrel with those who sought to obtain the same results which they looked forward to as the consequences of an abundant harvest by other means—by the freedom of trade? (Cheers.) The object of both parties is the same (continued the hon. gentleman), and your desire for good harvests and ours for Free Trade proceed from the same motive. (Hear.) When you pray for good harvests, we do not wish to accuse you of a wish to decrease wages and to benefit yourselves only; then give us credit for being actuated in our attempts to increase the supply of food by other means—the same motives as yourselves, that of benefiting the condition of the people. (Hear.) Could there be any difference in point of fact, whether food was rendered scarce to the people by a bad harvest, or by limiting the supply from other countries? Apply this principle of the sliding scale to a single town—barricade London with a sliding scale, and make Grosvenor-square grow corn for the whole town. What would be the effect? If the people increased and the food did not, in proportion, would not prices rise and competition for food increase? Would not wages be reduced, and the people be compelled to work harder for less money and less food (hear)? and would it not be said of those who refused to admit corn from without, for the purpose of keeping up the rents of the square, that they were guilty of the grossest selfishness and the grossest injustice? (Hear.) And where was the difference whether the principle was applied to a single town or to a whole kingdom? The population of the country was increasing rapidly; and the produce of our own soil, it was notorious, was not keeping pace with that increase; and yet they refused to admit supplies from foreign countries. Let in food from abroad, and they would find customers enough in the people to purchase it. If they had no fears from the admission of foreign corn, why not let it in? If they had fears of the consequence of such a change, on what did they rest? Could they deny that it was best that the people should get their food too cheaply, and that that blessing would be too widely diffused; and could that be justified on any principle of justice or humanity (cheers)? and what would they say of any man who, being a party to this injustice, who supported this system for the interest of his order, should go forth to sympathise with its victims, and get credit for seeking to heal the wounds he had inflicted. (Cheers.) Would they not charge him with the grossest ignorance or the grossest hypocrisy? (Cheers.) This was a question which did not affect the operatives of the mill and factory alone, but the whole working population. They had no excuse for not looking at its effects. They had lately forced upon them the means of judging of the effect of years of scarcity and of plenty upon the moral and physical condition of the people. Within ten years they had had four years of scarcity and four years of plenty. From 1832 to 1836 was one continued period of abundance; from 1838 to 1842 was a period of scarcity. He would measure the comparative effects of scarcity and abundance by figures, he found that, in the four years of abundance, from 1832 to 1836, the price of wheat had averaged 46s. a quarter, and in the four years of scarcity the average price had been 66s., a difference of 20s. a quarter in the price of wheat. But what were the sacrifices which the people had been called on to make during these dear years? One of the first consequences of the period of scarcity was that the people were able to consume less, though they had to pay more, while, at the period of abundance, they had to pay less, and consumed more. That had been the case in the years he had referred to. The difference of consumption was supposed to be one-tenth more when food was cheap than when it was dear. The average consumption of wheat in this country was calculated at sixteen millions of quarters. In cheap years there would be an addition of one-tenth to that amount, making the consumption of wheat in those years seventeen millions of quarters, and in dear years they must subtract one-tenth from the average, leaving the consumption in years of scarcity at fourteen millions. Now, for the seventeen millions of quarters the people paid £149,000,000, and for the fourteen millions £184,000,000. Mr. McCulloch stated that £195,000,000 was the annual value of agricultural produce of this country, and the increase in price in the four dear years over the four cheap years was one-sixth on all produce, besides corn. These calculations were based upon returns made to that House and the contract prices at Greenwich Hospital, and he believed their correctness would not be disputed. The people of this country were thus called upon to pay 33 millions a year more for their food in cheap years than in dear years, while the amount of that food was diminished in the proportion he had stated. This was one of the effects of scarcity, and this of itself was sufficient to occasion stagnation of trade and depression of prices. Then we were always compelled at first to make a sacrifice by exporting bullion to procure the necessary supplies from abroad, to the prejudice and derangement of all the monetary affairs of the country, which, by limiting credit, tending still further to depress prices, lower profits, and create that which was called over-production or glut of our markets. There were some of the consequences of an insufficient supply of corn in this country, and from the same cause resulted an increase of pauperism and poor-rates, and increase of crime and emigration. If this were disputed, he would refer to authorities which connected those effects with this cause alone, and showed that, as the cause was removed the effects disappeared. He would first call the attention of the House to the several remedies which had been proposed by the Government, and recognised by all the leading members of the House as efficient for the purpose of removing those evils, and as showing their opinion that all the sufferings and misfortunes of the people resulted from a deficient supply of food. In 1811, eighteen months after the period of scarcity and depression to which he had alluded, her Majesty, in the speech from the Throne, referred to the deficient supply of food, and the consequent sufferings of the people, and recommended remedial measures to the consideration of Parliament; and what was the remedy which the Ministry of that day—those who were responsible for the good order and welfare of the country—proposed? The then Government came forward, and said they had no remedy to propose but an alteration in those laws which restricted the supply and enhanced the price of the great necessities of life. In 1838 the deficiency began; and in 1841, at the beginning of the year, Ministers came forward, and said they had nothing else to propose to relieve the distresses to which her Majesty had called the attention of Parliament than an alteration in the duties upon the import of corn and sugar. (Hear.) And his noble friend the member for London (Lord J. Russell) expressed his regret that the people of this country were in a worse condition than the negroes of the West Indies—that they were subject to greater privations, and that the great mass of the labouring population were fast falling into a state of pauperism, and becoming recipients of public relief; and the noble lord referred to this condition of the people in introducing a measure to relieve their distresses by altering the corn and sugar duties, and those other laws which tended to enhance the price of food to the people. They well knew the fate of that proposition. They knew the results to the Government who had brought it forward. (Hear.) And what was it? Those who were interested in keeping up the price of corn united and combined together, and ejected the Ministry. But did that cause the distress to subside? What was done in the year following? Her Majesty, in opening the Parliament, again referred to the sufferings and privations of the people, and said, "I have observed, with deep regret the continued distress in the manufacturing districts of the country." The sufferings and privations which have resulted from it have been borne with exemplary patience and fortitude; and the mover of the address in that House said, that "six months ago the House had heard statements made of the awful distress under which that part of the country with which he was connected was then suffering. He regretted to say that that distress was now frightfully aggravated. He would refer to the returns of workhouses to show that applications for relief were greatly increasing, and were, in many instances, made by persons who had been formerly in a state of comparative prosperity. He would refer to the charity and visiting societies, to prove that many were now applicants to that charity for relief who had, not long ago, been themselves dispensers of charity. He regretted to be obliged to state that, in his opinion, pauperism was advancing in this country. They then found the Archbishop of Canterbury writing a letter to the clergy, exhorting the ministers of every parish to promote subscriptions amongst their parishioners for the relief of the distress which existed. But at last what happened? Why, the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government came down to Parliament, and told them that taxes upon the necessities of life had exceeded their limits, and, as a means of relieving the sufferings of the people, they must reduce the cost of living; and by the tariff which the right hon. baronet introduced and carried, he admitted that the cost of living in this country had been inordinately high. (Hear.) This, however, was not enough; the right hon. baronet at last felt that he was obliged to alter the Corn Laws; and that measure he declared was for the purpose of relieving the general distress. Those Corn Laws which the honourable member for Knarborough (Mr. Ferrand) looked upon as essential to the protection of industry, the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government had himself altered, alleging as his reason that, as it was absolutely necessary that the price of food to the people should be reduced, those laws, the tendency of which was to keep up prices, must be altered. At last, however, they found the Queen congratulating the country on its improved condition—but when was this? When the harvest had been ascertained to be good, and when supplies from abroad had been introduced, and when the food of the people was to be cheap and abundant. And when was it that the Secretary of State announced to the country that he was happy to say that the rate of mortality had diminished? It was in 1813, when food was more plentiful, and importation had increased. (Hear.) Great God! the rate of mortality was diminished! Then the people had been actually dying of want, starving to death, for that was what the admission of the right hon. gentleman amounted to. (Hear, hear.) The suffering of the people did not depend upon surmise; they had, unfortunately, official evidence of it, to which he was anxious to call the attention of the House. In the first place, he would refer to the increase of pauperism; and he found that, in 1837, the rates levied in England and Wales for the relief of the poor amounted to £4,044,741; and, in 1813, they amounted to £5,200,000. The number of paupers chargeable upon the rates, when the period of distress commenced, was 1,000,000; and when the Minister announced that there were indications of the distress having subsided, the number was 1,500,000. What was the number of able-bodied adult paupers at the same period, unable to obtain employment, and depending upon the poor-rates for relief? At the period when the distress commenced, the number was under 200,000, that was in 1836; and in 1812 the number was 407,570. Then, observe in particular places the increase in the amount expended in relieving the poor in dear years as compared with cheap years? He found that the amount expended—

Throughout the manufacturing districts there was great increase, but it was not confined to these districts. The increase was hardly less in the agricultural districts. In the 15 chief agricultural counties he found the increase in the amount of poor-rates between 1836 and 1842 was 21 per cent., while in the 12 principal manufacturing counties the increase had been 30½ per cent. This surely was sufficient to show the injurious effect of high prices of food on the labouring population. (Hear, hear.) Then what was the effect upon the revenue? This he was aware was a large subject, but none was more deserving of the attention of the House and the country; and although he felt himself inadequate to go into it fully, he trusted some honourable gentleman, more competent than himself, would draw the attention of the House to it; for if there was anything that was operated upon more directly than others by the scarcity of food, it was the state of the revenue; and as that question excited, he found, more interest in the minds of some persons than the suffering and privations of the working classes, it was on that ground an important matter for consideration. He would refer to the state of the excise revenue as affording more especially a striking evidence of national distress. It appeared from the Parliamentary returns, printed the 30th of May, 1842, that the augmentation of the taxes made in 1810 was estimated to yield £781,000 to the excise, whereas it only yielded an increase of £58,170 that year, and in the year following there was an actual decrease of £182,747. In the year ended October 10, 1842, the net revenue from excise was £733,448 less than in the year ended October 10, 1841. Such was the state of things in the fourth year of the deficient supply of food. Then what was the effect of scarcity on the moral condition of the people? What was the increase of crime in periods of scarcity, as compared with periods of abundance? In 1834 the number of commitments in England and Wales had been 22,451; in 1836, a year of low prices and plenty, the number was 20,000, showing a decrease of 2000. In 1813 the number had increased, under the influence of scarcity and high prices, to 31,000, being an increase over the year of low prices of 11,000. He now came to the effect of dear years and limited supplies in increasing emigration. From 1832 to 1837 the average number of emigrants had been 70,000, that was in cheap years. In 1841, under the influence of high prices, the number was 116,000, and in 1842 it had increased to 128,000. In 1838, the bankruptcies were 800; in 1842, 1500. This was the experience they had of the effect of scarcity and high prices on the condition of the country; and he asserted again, that there was no one instance to the contrary, that when food was abundant and cheap the working population, both in the manufacturing and agricultural districts, were better off than when food was scarce and prices were higher. He might quote an authority upon this point, to whom, perhaps, the House would be inclined to look with respect. He alluded to the late Lord Liverpool. In 1822 the proprietors of land and the agricultural labourers came to Parliament, complaining of distress, and begging for relief; and in that year, when the price of corn was exceedingly low, that noble lord, speaking in reply to the Earl of Stanhope in the House of Lords, said, "When the noble earl (Earl Stanhope) says that the low prices incident to the distress which agriculture suffers benefit no man, I answer, that, although I sincerely wish the distress did not exist, I cannot be blind to the fact that they certainly do benefit a great majority of the people. (Hear, hear.) Do they not benefit those who were, during the war, the principal and almost the only sufferers? In all large towns they have occasioned considerable benefit by the fall of the poor-rates. I have been at some trouble, my lords, to ascertain the real state of the case, and can pledge myself to the accuracy of this statement. In this metropolis, in which your lordships are now sitting, never were the lower orders of the people in a better condition than they are at the present moment." This was at the beginning of a year in which the agriculturists were clamouring for a rise of prices and scarcity in food, and complaining of distress as the consequence of abundance and plenty; and this was the time when, according to Lord Liverpool, the working classes generally were never in a better condition. (Hear, hear, hear.) What, then, was the opinion of Mr. Tooke upon the same point. That gentleman, in writing of the period from 1819 to 1822, said, "That the great mass of the community was greatly benefited by the transition from dearth to abundance, there is not, there cannot be, any reasonable doubt. What but the privations and sufferings of the great bulk of the community led to the popular discontent and commotions which prevailed, and were with difficulty repressed, in the great dearths at the close of the last and the beginning of the present century, and again in 1812, in 1817, and 1819?—dearths which, after their natural cessation, these legislators would, as far as in them lay, have artificially perpetuated; while, on the other hand, the contented state of the working classes in 1821 and 1822, and not to mention the great increase of the revenue in those years, attests the comparative well being of the bulk of the community in periods of what those who are interested in high prices and high rents are pleased to characterise as agricultural distress." There had been committees on agricultural distress, appointed by the House of Commons in the cheap year of 1833; and Mr. Tooke, remarking on the evidence, said:—"There is one point which the whole tenor of the evidence before the committee of 1833 tended to establish beyond doubt, and that is, the improved condition of the agricultural labourer: the fact is thus noticed in the Report:—'Amidst the numerous difficulties to which the agriculture of this country is exposed, and amidst the distress which unhappily exists, it is a consolation to your committee to find that the general condition of the agricultural labourer in full employment is better now than at any former period, his money wages giving him a greater command over the necessities and conveniences of life.'" He (Mr. Villiers) would now proceed to draw the attention of the House to the effects and consequences of scarcity on the health and life of the people; and he was induced to go further into details upon this part of the subject than he should else do, as he felt that the House could not resist testimony in this case which had been relied upon on another question—he meant the authorities which had been quoted on the Factory Bill; and which were here cited for their opinion that nothing tended so much to shorten life and injure the health of the people as a scarcity or a constantly varying price of corn, which meant, in fact, a varying amount of food. If he remembered rightly, the noble lord (Lord Ashley) had alluded to the authority of Dr. Hawkins and M. Villermé. The former of those authorities had stated the opinion of himself as well as that of Villermé and Quételet in the following passage:—"The price of corn has a most remarkable influence on the movements of population and of disease. We have not a sufficient number of data to enable us to estimate the exact amount of its influence, but we shall assuredly not be mistaken in classing it among the most energetic causes which press upon the operations of life. This influence extends not only upon deaths but upon births. It affects, also, the number of marriages, of diseases, and even of crimes." It was the opinion, then, of these eminent medical writers, that upon the supply of food depended, in a great measure, the physical welfare of the people. In Milne's life annuity table it was stated that that which was the case in England with respect to the influence of food on disease, held equally true with respect to other nations. A table was then given "exhibiting the number of deaths, the proportionate mortality, and the character of the crop of each year in Sweden and Finland from 1750 to 1803, which shows that throughout this whole series of fifty-three years there is not one exception to the rule, that every increase in the scarcity of food is accompanied by a correspondent increase in the mortality of the people. In every year following a scanty or failing crop, the number of deaths was increased, in some instances to a most appalling amount; for instance, in 1760, after an abundant harvest, 60,323 persons died; in the next three years the crop was 'middling,' 'scanty,' and a 'failure,' and the deaths rose from 63,188, to 74,931, and after the failing harvest to 85,093; from 1770 to 1773, the deaths rose from 69,895 to 117,509, from the same cause—a failing crop. And not only is every failure of the crop marked by a rise in mortality, but conversely there is no marked increase of mortality throughout the whole series of fifty-three years, that is not preceded by a falling off in the crop." The hon. gentleman continued: "The evidence on this subject was more uniform than on almost any matter of medical science. All authorities were agreed that upon the greater or smaller supply of food depended the greater or smaller degree of mortality. Taking the returns furnished by the Manchester Dispensary, and comparing six dear with six cheap years, he found that 196 persons had annually died in the dear more than in the cheap years. From extensive returns obtained from sick clubs in various parts of the country, from Blackburn, Stockport, Maidstone, the Potteries, and many other places, it appeared that during the six cheaper years the mortality among the members was 3 per cent.; during the dearer years 4 per cent., being an increase from dear food and bad trade of 25 per cent. There was an important work lately published, entitled "An address to the Clergy of the Established Church of England, on the Effects of a Scarcity of Food, showing the tendency of Starvation to engender Epidemic Disease." It was there shown, by quotations from reports of physicians, writing at the time on purposes quite independent of any agitation, that each of the three remarkable famines by which this country has been visited, those of 1810, 1798, and 1810, were quickly followed by epidemic fever; and this fever was attributed by the medical men of the respective times to want, as its principal cause. The evidence of Dr. Fitzgerald, as to a late epidemic in that part of Ireland where he practised (Clonmel), showed that in his opinion the primary cause of the disease was insufficiency of food. He said, "Let me take this opportunity of guarding myself against misapprehension. It is by no means my intention to affirm that epidemic typhus always owes its origin to deficient and deteriorated food, and to that cause alone. I fully admit the influence of contagion, dirt, cold, damp, insufficient clothing, want of employment, depression of spirits, and the other causes of the disease alleged by physicians; but I would observe, that these causes must in this climate coexist with scarcity, and some of them, at least, be occasioned by it. They may be more or less obviated by the particular circumstances of the country at the moment, and hence the pestilence will be found more or less general; but the great truth which I have laid before you will remain unaffected, that typhus fever is the inseparable companion of great and continued scarcity after bad harvests." Take evidence from another country. There was a most important report by Dr. Alison, in which it was stated that 23,000 persons existed in Edinburgh in an entirely destitute state, and completely dependent upon casual charity. He said:—"As the botanist can tell the quality of the soil from the flowers that spontaneously arise upon it, the physician knows the state of a people from the epidemics that mow it down. It is not asserted that destitution is a cause adequate to the production of fever (although in some circumstances I believe it may become such), nor that it is the sole cause of its extension. What we are sure of is, that it is a cause of the rapid diffusion of contagious fever, and one of such peculiar power and efficacy that its existence may always be presumed when we see fever prevailing in a large community to an unusual extent. The manner in which deficient nourishment, want of employment, and privations of all kinds, favour the diffusion of fever, may be matter of dispute; but that they have that effect in a much greater degree than any cause external to the human body itself, is a fact confirmed by the experience of all physicians who have seen much of the disease." Then, again, there was the evidence of Dr. Grattan, in Ireland, whom he found writing as follows:—"Next to contagion, I consider a distressed state of the general population of any particular district the most common and extensive source of typhoid fever. The present epidemic (that of Ireland in 1818) is principally to be referred to the miserable condition of the poorer classes in this kingdom; and so long as their state shall continue unimproved, so long fever will prevail, probably not to its present extent, but certainly to an extent sufficient to render it at all times a national affliction." He had lately applied to a medical gentleman, practising in a populous district of London, Dr. Hunter, of Bloomsbury, whose experience quite confirmed all the information he had received upon the point. This gentleman wrote as follows:—"An extensive practice for more than twenty years, almost in the very focus of typhus localities, has given me an opportunity of seeing that disease in all its various degrees of malignity. There are numerous predisposing causes, such as impure air, crowded neighbourhoods, want of cleanliness, and so on; but all these sink into insignificance and unimportance when compared with the great monster predisposing agent—I mean a scarcity of nutritious food; and it may be said, if other causes have slain their thousands, this alone has slain its tens of thousands. My experience justifies and warrants me in affirming that, where the people have insufficient nourishment, there typhus fever manifests itself with all the horrors of a depopulating plague. Witness Ireland. No sooner does a year of scarcity appear but this fell destroyer of the human race shows itself, carrying off thousands; and this affirmation will, I am sure, be confirmed by any medical practitioner who has had the misfortune to see, as I have, whole families carried to their weary bourne by this scourge of the human family, brought into existence and activity by the physical wants of the people. I happened to know a family of nine persons, seven of whom died in one short month, and all by the fell destroyer, typhus, and this too in an agricultural district, where the air was as pure as the morning breath of heaven, and where contagion was impossible, as the farmhouses were at a considerable distance from each other. But in the same district, where the families had sufficient food, and of a good quality, fever was wholly unknown." He had a great amount of evidence of the same kind, relating to France, Belgium, and Germany. All medical men seemed to come to the unanimous conclusion that the well-being of the people varied with the quantity of food with which they were supplied. (Hear.) Now, he might be asked, what all this had to do with the Corn Laws. They would say that these laws were intended to protect native industry, and keep up the supply of food—at least something of the sort was implied in the amendment of the honourable member for Knarborough. But what was really the purpose of the Corn Laws? If it was not to produce scarcity, he wished to know what its purpose was? He wished to know why the opposite intention had never been avowed? He wished to know if any person who had spoken in defence of the Corn Laws had ever said or implied anything other than that scarcity was their end and object? If their object was to produce plenty, why were those who maintained these laws dissatisfied whenever there was abundance in the country? How was it that when the people were well fed and well off, that it was precisely that moment at which the agriculturists came forward with complaints? (Hear, hear.) They had evidence to show that it was always the case that, when the people were in a comparatively comfortable state, the complaints of the agriculturists were loudest. If plenty was the object of the law, why, at that moment its supporters should be most satisfied. (Hear, hear.) If plenty, he repeated, had been the object of the law, how did he find that it had continually been a question as to how prices could be most effectually raised. And what did they find stated in every agricultural committee, but that the great evil had been the excess of produce, and that, in order to remedy the evil, they had been sowing and raising less. (Hear.) In 1836, when, as he had stated, the people were well off—when they were well employed—when poor rates were diminishing and crime was diminishing—the agriculturists were asking what could be done to remedy such a state of things? (Loud cheers.) In 1833 and 1836, when, by the evidence of all competent persons, the condition of the people was comfortable, the agriculturists, both in this House and the other, were asking how they could best diminish the supply of food, and raise the prices accordingly. (Hear, hear.) If the purpose of the Corn Law was to prevent scarcity and secure abundance, how came such a state of things about? (Hear.) How came it that when the law was first introduced no one had any idea that it would produce plenty? How was it that those who introduced and defended the law, never did so on any other grounds than its tendency to produce scarcity?—that scarcity which I have shown produces want, disease, crime, and death. (Hear.) He asked how it was, if the law had not that tendency, that those who had been most prominent in their opposition to it had always charged its supporters with wishing for and aiming at the production of scarcity? On what grounds did Lord Grenville rest his opposition to the law, but on those that it would produce scarcity and uncertainty in the supply of food? He saw that these were the objects of the law, and the views of its framers. There was one member of the House—a most distinguished person—the respected father of the Prime Minister—who also protested against the law, and stigmatised it as cruel and oppressive towards the people. "Those," said that eminent man, "who had profited by the war prices, were the landowners. They have reaped a rich harvest from the misfortunes of the people, and they now propose the Corn Law to keep up war prices, to perpetuate national misfortune. He told them that they were about to perpetuate the effects of war by acts of legislation; that the effect of war, owing to the interruption of commerce which it occasioned, was high prices; and that the object of the Corn Law was to perpetuate these prices. But while he said this, he warned the landowners that they would eventually themselves be the sufferers by their selfish legislation. They would raise rivals in manufacture, and bring fresh burdens on the country; and, although by the enactment of a Corn Law they hoped to promote their own interests, they would in the end be most cruelly deceived." These were the words of Sir Robert Peel, and they had been most fully verified. How came the popular opposition to the Corn Laws at the time of their introduction, if it was conceived that their object was any other than to produce scarcity. What was the cause of the riots in this town at that period? (Cheers.) Did the people think then that the promoters of the Corn Laws wished to improve their condition, or to bring about a time of abundance? If the agriculturists could defend their measure, why did they not then use argument instead of artillery? (Hear.) They used no argument—they used cannon. (Hear, hear.) They mowed the people down with powder and shot; it was the only answer they could offer them. (Hear, hear, hear.) Could they gather either from what had been said and done in more recent times, that any other result than that of scarcity was aimed at by the Corn Laws? (Hear, hear, hear.) Two years ago the honourable gentleman the member for Somersetshire was objecting to the tariff proposed in the midst of great national distress, and for the purpose of relieving that distress by lowering prices; that honourable member, representing as he did the agricultural interest, the interest supporting the Corn Laws, objected to the tariff, not because it would diminish the supply of food, but because he apprehended that it would have the effect of increasing it. The honourable gentleman read a statement which he considered to be entitled to the utmost confidence, to the effect that, if we were to open up the trade with the United States, that there could be no doubt but that there would ensue a most extensive traffic; that food would be poured into the country, and that manufactured produce would be exported out of it to as great an extent; and that the effect would be the lowering of price on articles of general consumption. Thus the honourable gentleman looked upon as a great evil. The honourable gentleman now shook his head; but his speech was recorded in Hansard, and to be found in the library; and in that speech he regarded the tariff as a means of making food cheap, and said that it was upon that ground on which he opposed it. (Hear, hear, hear.) Were they, then, in the face of such facts to be told that the Corn Laws had plenty and cheapness in view? He had lately taken the trouble of looking at speeches made at the meetings of protection societies, and, after having read them, he had not been able to find that any of the speakers at those meetings wished to increase the supply of food. Indeed, at one of these assemblies, met in the county of Surrey, a gentleman, a great proprietor, present, with more candour, if not with more wisdom, than the greater number of his brethren, confessed frankly and broadly that they were met to advance their own interests, and to render food dear. (Hear, hear.) To render food dear, he acknowledged, was their interest, and therefore they met together to concert how they could best accomplish that end. If, he continued, any resolution should be proposed which did not take that view of the case, he had an amendment in his pocket which he should propose, and which embodied his opinions. Now, at this meeting were present many of the great landed proprietors in Surrey. It was a meeting of the nobility, gentry, and clergy; and, although it was quite true that in any meeting there might be found some wild man—some enthusiast, whose views were not generally shared by those present—yet, on the occasion to which he was alluding, not a syllable was uttered with the view of contradicting opinions so candidly and boldly put forward. (Hear.) Therefore it went forth to the world that the meeting had no purpose but that of promoting their own interests, and that these interests were to make food dear. (Hear.) Certainly, then, if this had been the original object of the law, it was still adhered to. When they heard of settlements and mortgages, and that the objections of landowners to the repeal of the Corn Laws was that the prices which these laws enabled them to obtain for their produce enabled them to provide for the interest of these mortgages, how could they come to any other conclusion than that the effect of the laws was to diminish quantity, in order to raise prices? He should not be satisfied that such was not the case until some county member got up and said that his object was to lower the prices of produce as much as possible, in order to make food as accessible to the public as they could, and to derive as little advantage as possible from its sale for themselves. (Cheers.) But the honourable member for Berkshire (Mr. Pusey) might perhaps say that protection was necessary for the development and advance of agriculture. Now, he begged to ask, what was it which the experience of the last thirty years of protection showed? What was the present state of agriculture? Had its advance satisfied the wishes of the supporters of protection, or did they promise any better result for the future? He did not know for what reason—but perhaps from fears of an impending change in the system of protection—there had lately been a great bustle among agricultural societies. (Hear, hear.) A good deal had been said and a good deal promised. In looking over the reports of these agricultural meetings, what struck him most forcibly was the universal admission on the part of people of all stations, of all ranks, that nothing could be more deplorable or more imperfect than the present condition of agriculture. (Hear, hear.) They all said that these were not the times when they could stand with crossed arms, that the state of their respective localities was shameful, that something must be done, that they could not afford to follow the example of their forefathers. This was the sort of confession which they heard on every side. (Hear.) There was the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government, and the noble lord the member for North Lancashire, who took it into their heads to deliver lectures upon the state of agriculture in their respective neighbourhoods. The right honourable baronet attended a Tamworth dinner last autumn. The right honourable baronet began by stating that they had met there not for the protection but for the promotion of agriculture. (Hear.) This was really an important distinction, and one not to be forgotten. (Hear, hear.) Well, he went on to say, "It becomes us seriously to consider what we can do to promote agriculture. It is impossible to travel ten miles in this district without seeing that mere reliance on personal experience will not ensure success as a farmer." But at these meetings, after the disease had been adverted to, the cure was generally indicated. At the Tamworth dinner the right hon. baronet, after having pointed out the defective state of agriculture in his neighbourhood, was followed by Dr. Buckland, who said that he never saw such a deplorable state of things as was presented by the farming about Tamworth, and mentioned that he saw more thistles in one field there than he believed grew in the whole of Lincolnshire. (A laugh.) The right hon. baronet then went on to advert to some of the modes by which this state of things could be improved. He said, "On a late occasion, in a neighbouring city, I took an opportunity of saying something about leases. I said then that the habit of this county was adverse to the practice of granting leases, but still, that if any tenants of mine felt that their position would be raised, their confidence in the security of their tenure increased—were they to apply to me for an extension of the terms now generally granted, in order to have additional security as to the application of their capital—I said, then, that I should be disposed to give to any such application my favourable consideration. (Cheers.) I remain of the same opinion. I repeat the same declaration in presence of many who occupy my land." He then pointed to another grievance much felt by the farmer—the ravages of game. With respect to hares, the right hon. baronet informed his auditory that, "I will forego the gratification of mere sport; and if any tenant informs me that the hares upon his farm are so numerous that they are doing him serious damage, I shall at once give orders for their immediate destruction to that extent that shall satisfy him that he can in future sustain no loss in that way." This was all very well, and a very good example to set; but he asked the right hon. baronet whether he supposed that either in Warwickshire or in Staffordshire any hares had been killed, or leases granted at the request of farmers since, and in consequence of his Tamworth speech? (Cheers and laughter.) Then, in the same autumn, the noble lord the member for North Lancashire paid an agricultural visit to his own county, and he told the people there what improvements he and his family had effected upon their land. "Every month," said the noble lord, "that passed over his head convinced him that, so far from having done all that could be done, they had only made a beginning, and were only doing that which it was their bounden duty, but still more their abundant interest, to do." But why is this discovery made only now? He feared the League was at the bottom of this cry; that something must be done. (Hear, hear, hear.) Were the League to relax its efforts or to give them up, how much would be heard about improvements in agriculture, or about liberal offers from landlords to kill all the hares and rabbits upon their estates? (Laughter.) But his lordship went on to allude to tiling and draining. "Over and over again he had heard from tenants that their land had been doubled in value by draining and tiling with slate soles, which had a great advantage over tile soles, being lighter and less liable to break in the carriage. They would tell him, perhaps, that these were very expensive operations, and that the farmer could not conduct those operations." To which the meeting vociferously responded, "Hear, hear, hear!" And what said his lordship? Why, precisely what the Free-Traders have been saying for years:—"Well, perhaps they could not, unless they had perfect confidence in their landlords, or unless they had the security of a long lease." (Loud, repeated, and marked applause, the object being apparently to elicit something further on the subject of leases from his lordship.) But nothing was elicited, for his lordship went on as follows (a laugh):—"There were many other topics which he might press upon their attention, but this was the main maxim. This was no time for the farmer to stand with his hands behind his back, going on half asleep, just as his father and his grandfather had gone before him." But at all these meetings there seemed to have been some practical man ready to comment on the advice given by the landlords, and on this occasion the practical man was a Mr. Neilson. Let the House attend to his observations. They were as follows:—"His lordship has said, a material improvement in the agriculture of the county had been seen; and, as far as his (Mr. Neilson's) observations went, these improvements had principally taken place on farms where the landlord had come forward with a liberal hand; and he did not hesitate to say that, with some exceptions, the landlords were more deserving of blame for the want of improvement than the tenants themselves. Look at the state of the land when the tenant first got possession of it. Look also at the terms on which it was let to him. (Hear, hear.) They asked rent without legalized terms of possession, or they had a lease abounding in clauses for the protection of the landlord, but none for the tenant. In many instances these were totally restrictive of cultivation; tying them down from ploughing a certain part of their land, or restricting their cultivation to one-ninth of fresh land each year. These terms were not likely to induce a farmer to expend his money on property not his own. Far be it from him to make any depreciatory remarks on that noble system of mutual confidence which enabled estates to be handed down from generation to generation of tenants under the same family; but looking at the uncertainty of human affairs, and the fluctuations of property, this was not a general system—one under which a man was justified, with a proper consideration of his family, in expending his money. Seven years were not a sufficient time to enable a man to repay the outlay of improvement, without doing injustice to the land during the latter period of his lease. (Loud applause.) Give him a long lease, and he would freely stretch out his hand, with a certainty of getting it back again." Upon the subject of leases they had the opinion of Sir Harry Verney, expressed at a meeting of the Bedfordshire and Buckinghamshire Agricultural Association. The honourable baronet stated, after alluding to the generally defective state of farming, that "there is a remedy, and one which, aided by your landlords, it is in your power to adopt, viz., an improved system of farming. This would at once afford employment to the labourers, and the money which you now expend in poor-rates for the maintenance of their families would render them industrious and happy, and would yield to you a profitable return. In order to carry out such a system, you would require your farm-buildings to be adapted to increased produce from your land. You ought to have well-arranged farm-yards, with the needful barns, and cow-houses and stables, and with cesspools, into which all your cattle-sheds and yards should drain. You ought to have encouragement and assistance in effecting certain improvements, such as draining, &c.; and, having obtained these things, which it is as much your landlord's interest as his duty to provide, you ought to have the assurance of such permanency of tenure as will enable you to reap the fruit of any capital that you may embark in the cultivation of the soil." The hon. baronet went on to say that "one of the essentials to the prosperous pursuit of agriculture was a good farm-yard, and he would boldly state what he believed to be another—they all stated their opinions freely, and his opinion was, that unless they got leases (cheers), long leases (renewed cheers), agriculture would never prosper in England as it ought to do." At the same dinner—that of the Bedfordshire and Buckinghamshire Agricultural Association—he found the editor of the Mark-lane Express approving of these opinions of Sir Harry Verney, and stating that "he was happy to be present at this meeting, and to hear such sound observations from those who must give the start in agricultural improvements—the landlords. (Cheers.) He felt confident that if the capital invested in United States and other stocks were invested in that best of securities—farming, they might bid defiance to the world." At the same dinner, the hon. member for Bridgewater spoke thus:—"The more I see of and practise agriculture, the more firmly am I convinced that the whole unemployed labour of the country could, under a better system of husbandry, be advantageously put into operation; and, moreover, that the Corn Laws have been one of the principal causes of the present system of bad farming and consequent pauperism. Nothing short of their entire removal will ever induce the average farmer to rely upon anything else than the Legislature for the payment of his rent, his belief being that all rent is paid by corn, and nothing else than corn, and that the Legislature can, by enacting Corn Laws, create a price which will make his rent easy. The day of their (the Corn Laws) entire abolition ought to be a day of jubilee and rejoicing to every man interested in land." The farmers' clubs and agricultural societies all seemed impressed with the idea that the cultivation of the soil should proceed in a more efficient manner, but that the conditions under which land was occupied precluded it. Colonel Powell, at the Herefordshire Agricultural Society, who was described as "a friend of the farmers, a friend of the landlords, a friend of the peasants, and a friend of man" (a laugh), said, "I can see no prospect of any benefit till rents become more equalized with, and parallel to, the value of the produce of the land. (Cheers.) Many meetings connected with agriculture have of late taken place, and various plans at these meetings have been adduced to meet the pressure of the times; but, gentlemen, although good in themselves, they do not hit upon the right remedy. One says, drain, drain! You are all to be drained. (Laughter.) Another tells you to keep up your orchards—nothing equal to Herefordshire orchards. Others say guano. This new manure will produce such immense crops that you yourselves will not fail to receive the bulk; this will be a remedy for all evils. Another says, if you are eaten up with hares and rabbits I will have them all killed—by-the-by, a proposition not to be entirely despised. (Hear, hear.) This will be quite sufficient—nothing more is wanted. There is only one thing that can be done to alter your position at the present time: it must come to this, that rents must be adjusted to the prices of the produce, and leases must be granted. (Prolonged cheers.) Again, "there must be fresh rents and corn rents. Draining, manuring, &c., are subjects worthy to be attended to, certainly; but these, if we may judge from the tone of the addresses that have taken place at some of our meetings lately held, are to be a specific remedy. There is a new dictionary just published, which contains a vast number of words—many new ones—and a most excellent work it is, and some critics speak most highly of it; but it has an omission of one little word—one little word is left out—that word, gentlemen, is 'rent.' To some this is a most perplexing little word, and to many it proves so; at all meetings that take place the speakers use excessive caution about repeating this little word, and I observe, invariably, the word 'rent' rarely comes out—this bolus (laughter), gentlemen, they cannot articulate, much less digest." Colonel Powell thus concludes his able and honest speech:—"I say, gentlemen, that one thing only can benefit us so as to do us any lasting good, that is, fresh rents, corn rents, long leases. These form a just and equitable guide between landlord and tenant. The farmer would then know what to depend upon. This would be only fair between man and man." The gallant colonel sat down amidst loud and long applause. Again, Sir R. Pigott, at a recent meeting of the Worcestershire Agricultural Association, as chairman said:—"It is through the medium of such societies as these, and these alone, that we can hope to throw off the weight that oppresses us, and promote the regeneration of agriculture." He said:—"I trust there is no one so blind in this way as not to see that a sort of public interdict has gone forth against the return of high prices throughout the world, and apart from all political influences—though no doubt it is very agreeable to us to be able to talk over those days when sowing and gathering were mere mechanical operations, and when the profits were sufficient to cover any deficiency either of produce, industry, or skill—depend upon it those days will never return.

Mr. Collis, at the same meeting:—The president has said that the landlord would be glad to meet the wishes of the tenant; but, at the same time, I do think that if the tenant had a more fixed tenure in the land (here the speaker was interrupted by the cheers of the farmers), the landlord would get as good rents—better perhaps—and more regularly paid; and that it would be to his advantage, as well as to the advantage of the tenant. (Loud cheers.) There is no other means of accounting for the prosperity of the Scotch farmer, except that he has a better tenure than we have. (Cheers.) I read with great pleasure a speech of Lord Hatherton, in which he said that light and poor lands were not only better cultivated where the tenant had got a lease, but the tenant was able to pay much higher for them. (Cheers.) We must also recollect the very able paper by Earl Spencer on Lord Leicestershire's farm—very light soil, which has been reclaimed, but which now grows excellent crops. It is quite impossible a tenant can do this unless he has a fixed tenure (loud cheering), because, whatever may be his faith in his landlord, circumstances over which he has no control might occur—the tenant himself might die as well as the landlord, and then his family would not have any return for the money which he had spent upon the soil. (Cheers.) Besides, great advantage must arise to the landlord as well as the tenant, because the land would be very much benefited, and thus become more valuable. I lately read a speech of the Earl of Stair, in Worcester—and I find the farmers there are framing it—in which he says he will grant his tenants leases on certain terms; the tenant is to lay out money as well as the landlord; and the only advantage to the tenant—and a great one it is—will be, that he is to have a lease. He had many more documents of the same kind, all proving that agriculture was behind-hand, that it ought to be improved, and that the circumstances under which land was now held prevented that improvement. He had particularly adverted to this, because he expected to find some member rising on the other side, and saying that, by chemical processes and other improvements, the deficiency of past times was likely to be supplied. Now, he had pointed to those meetings for the purpose of showing that sacrifices were required on the part of the landlords which were not likely to be made. The fact was, there was required from the landlord a sacrifice of both power and pleasure. First they were asked to convert tenants-at-will into tenants under lease; and he need not tell honourable members what a sacrifice that was. Instead of having men driven to the hustings as serfs, they would have men exercising an independent judgment on the choice of their representatives. It could not be denied that, ever since the passing of the Reform Bill, the custom of giving leases had rather discontinued, and the practice of taking tenants-at-will had become more general. There was not the least likelihood then of tenants getting leases. The fact was, the competition for land made landlords comparatively safe. He had seen lately fifty-six applications for one farm in the county of Hereford. Under such circumstances, did any man think landlords would not look for the highest possible price? Then they were secure of their rent, for being the legislators, they had so stringent a law of distress that they could immediately command it. He said further, the proprietors of land were generally but tenants for life, as the occupiers were holders at will, and they had, therefore, but a slight motive to lay out much money for the improvement of their land. From the nature of our law of settlement, in nine cases out of ten, when our hereditary proprietors came to an age to look to the improvement of their estates, they found themselves in a position for saving rather than spending money, and, being sure their properties would go to their eldest sons, they felt bound to make provision for their youngest children. (Hear.) This was not his observation, but that of those who had turned their attention to the circumstances essential to the improvement of agriculture. Was it likely, again, that the landlords would sacrifice the patronage and pleasure conveyed in their power over game? Nothing harassed or perplexed the farmer more. The game destroyed his crops, without any allowance being made him. When we read the quantity of game killed at a battue of a landholder, was it to be expected he should forego such a source of pleasure? The fact was, we could never induce the landlords to make the sacrifices required by the interests of the community, until he saw it would be for his advantage to have the greatest amount of produce at the lowest price. When that time came then would he be induced to seek out men of capital and skill and to confer on them a lease. Under such a system he should hope to see landlords seeking out farmers who would well farm the land, and at once giving them leases at any rent they agreed to pay. He should like to see landlords competing for tenants, instead of fifty tenants competing for one landlord. (Hear.) He was bound to admit, from inquiries he had made, that there was now as great reluctance on the part of some farmers to accept leases as of landlords to grant them. But why? From the uncertainty of the present state of things. They had been severally promised 80s., 61s., and 56s. a quarter for their corn. They got 41s. instead of 61s., and 46s. instead of 56s. The farmer saw there was no assurance for his price, and he could not say what influence would be exercised on price by the Legislature. And he ventured to say that no intelligent farmer would say he could suffer as much by Free Trade, and the certainty of his position, as he now did by remaining tenant-at-will, and being promised a protection it was impossible to realize. (Cheers.) Now, he had established these positions—that the supply of food had been deficient, that great inconvenience had resulted, and that the protective system had led to the cultivation of land in a most slovenly manner, and that we had no hope of a sufficient supply from that quarter (hear, hear, hear); that the people were suffering from want, and were increasing in number. When they found such a state of things, were they not bound to consider if they could be averted in future? Was it possible? Why, he asked, should they distrust the effect of commerce, influenced by competition, for the supply of food? We relied on the system of men acting on their own interests, and discovering the wants of the community in every other case; and what reason was there for mistrusting it in this? The right honourable gentleman at the head of the Government told us we might rely on it in all cases, except as to the issue of money. If any mistrust was honestly felt, why not call the merchant and ship-owner to their bar, and ask them if a more abundant and plentiful supply of corn could not be ensured under the ordinary operations of commerce, than was provided under the present system? Did any man believe that any but one answer would be returned? He hoped he should not hear again the foolish things enounced in former debates. For instance, no one, he hoped, would inform them that nothing but bullion could pay for wheat. This would not be said after our having received 17,000,000 quarters of corn within the last five years, and paid for them in manufactures. After the prediction that it would all disappear, there was never so much bullion in the country. And though our general exports had fallen off, those to the corn-growing countries had increased. He should quote an extract from the Economist newspaper, had a very able article on this subject:—

|---------------------------------------|-------------|-------------|
| Exports to continental corn countries | £11,581,342 | £16,860,416 |
| Ditto to all other countries | 41,787,330 | 30,520,607 |
| | £53,368,672 | £47,381,023 |

Now, as to the objections to his motion, on the ground of its being extreme, he did not know who they were in that House who had a right so to designate it. Was it those who said they would stand by the existing law and not abandon one iota of protection? (Cheers.) If he proposed a more moderate measure, had he any chance of conciliating those who constituted the majority of that House? And who held that language? (Hear, hear.) If he proposed what was called a moderate fixed duty, would not the change be opposed as strenuously as that he now submitted? Would not "vested interests" be disturbed, and the rights of protection infringed as much by a 5s. duty as that which he proposed? What was constantly avowed in private by gentlemen opposite was, that they did not care for protection, but to prevent a regular trade in corn. (Cheers.) Whenever they could bring their minds to the conclusion that they had no right to exclusive advantages, they would be as much in favour of Free Trade as of a fixed duty. But while they had the opposite idea, they would determine the kind and amount of protection that suited them (hear, hear, hear); but he could refer to authority in favour of making the changes directly. The right honourable President of the Board of Trade said, the other night, that commercial changes should be effected at once and completely. Nothing could be more wise. Everybody knew that commerce adapted itself to circumstances, and to keep great questions of trade in suspense was the way to contract commercial enterprise, a measure precisely in point was the duties on wool which were just totally repealed. The right honourable gentleman at the head of the Government informed the House that the sudden transition from restriction to freedom improved the prices in the market. In looking back to the period when the trade between England and Ireland was opened, he found all the arguments used now relied on then. "Cheapness of labour," "peculiar burdens," "existing interests," the things now urged against free trade with the globe, were dwelt on in arguing against a free trade with Ireland. And what was the result? A great importation of wheat took place for the first seven or eight years, the price of wheat rising the whole time, and from that time to this much benefit had accrued to both countries. (Hear, hear.) Such appeals for protection are not listened to when they are not backed by important interests. Take the beer duties. He knew no stronger instance of capital being invested on the faith of the existing law, and the interest in question being made to yield to public good, or what was thought to be so. No consideration whatever was shown for their appeals for protection. He did not blame Government for that, because, when general interests were in question, private interests should be prepared to yield. With respect to the exportation of machinery, it was plausibly argued that a great advantage was conferred on the foreigners, who were thus made rivals on unequal terms. The interest affected was weak, and the change was effected at once. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. GLADSTONE: The change was eighteen years in progress.

Mr. VILLIERS: Well, the changes as to the Corn Laws were going on for thirty years. (Hear, hear.) There had been seven alterations in the law, and one undeviating struggle made against it. (Cheers.) Take turnpike trusts, again. People vested their money in them on the faith that there would be no change without notice. But the paramount interest of the public required the change in favour of the mode of travelling by rail, and it was made immediately. But a more important change was effected within the last few years—he alluded to the poor law. He thought the analogy good in this case, because he believed the old poor law to be prejudicial to the poor themselves. But many of them did not think so. Their expectations were raised under it; their conduct influenced by it; their characters formed by it, and many of their domestic relations determined by it; and if ever there was a case in which the feelings of the people should have been considered in preference to an enlightened view of their interest, it was this. There was a sudden introduction of a somewhat rigid system, in utter disregard of the feelings of the people. ("Hear," from Mr. Borthwick.) He asked the honourable member, who had such sensitive feelings on this point, for whom he meant to vote to-night?

Mr. BORTHWICK: For the poor.

Mr. VILLIERS: The hon. gentleman was going to vote against this motion, and would no doubt be influenced by the old arguments as to existing interests, peculiar burdens, and the necessity of consulting the peculiar feelings of those affected. (Hear.) They should not have changed the old poor law, till they had changed the Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) The hon. member for Evesham could not go back to the old poor law, and yet was about to support the present Corn Law. He swelled the fortunes of the rich, but left the wages of labour undisturbed. The hon. gentleman could not do anything more offensive to a dominant class, as he (Mr. Villiers) well knew, than to assail this law, and, if the hon. gentleman wished to conciliate their favour, he could not take a more direct course than to uphold this act, and to run down every man who opposed it. (Hear, hear.) The same arguments as those he had been combating were held on the slave trade, though that was a system condemned from the beginning by all good men. When Mr. Pitt was told he should make no change on account of the existing interests of the planters, he said, "I do not understand complimenting away the lives of so many human beings. I do not understand the principle on which a few individuals are to be complimented, and their minds set at rest, at the expense and total sacrifice of the interest, the security, the happiness, of a whole quarter of the world, which, from our foul practices, has, for a vast length of time, been a scene of misery and horror. I say, because I feel, that every hour you continue this trade, you are guilty of an offence beyond your power to atone for; and, by your indulgence to the planters, thousands of human beings are to be miserable for ever. I feel its infamy so heavily, I am so clearly convinced of its impolicy, that I am ashamed I have not been able to prevail upon the House to abandon it altogether at an instant—to pronounce with one voice, "immediate and total abolition." There is no excuse for us, seeing this infernal traffic as we do. It is the very death of justice to utter a syllable in support of it. Sir, I know I state this subject with warmth. I feel it is impossible for me not to do so; or, if it were, I should detest myself for the exercise of moderation." Now, considering the misery which had been produced by those laws, the irreparable injury they had inflicted on commerce, and the millions they had for ever morally and physically ruined, he for one could not, for the sake of conciliating a few great men, abandon a great principle, which had for its object a great public advantage, and the removal from the people an enormous wrong. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. FERRAND, after descending on a variety of topics (all urged in his old tone, his old manner, accompanied with his old stories, unredeemed by a spark of novelty, and his whole conduct manifesting that fools are not always taught by experience), moved an amendment, the terms of which were a copy, or rather parody, of the motion of Mr. Villiers, with the variation that machinery, not the Corn Law, was the cause of distress, and protection and encouragement to native industry its cure. This amendment found with difficulty a seconder; in answer to the repeated call of the SPEAKER, "Who seconds this amendment?" Mr. Borthwick slowly and reluctantly raised his hat; but as it was scouted on both sides, scarcely even alluded to, and finally withdrawn, we shall take no farther notice of it.

Captain BRIDGES lauded the landed aristocracy, whose hospitality at home and courage abroad were conspicuous in peace and war. The Protection Societies should take the title of Anti-Tamworth or Anti-Peel Associations; and the Anti-Corn-Law League, by its interference with constituencies with which it had no concern, only prolonged a contest which was one merely of time. He condemned all these associations as mischievous; but, acting on principle, he should vote as hitherto, with Mr. Villiers, and in repudiation of the sliding scale.

Mr. GLADSTONE said it would be his duty to meet the motion of Mr. Villiers with a direct negative; and he hoped, therefore, that Mr. Ferrand would not place his amendment in the way of a direct "ay" or "no," on a subject of so much importance as the Corn Laws. He was not an advocate of extreme protection, but confidence in the stability of a law was essential to the complete working of a measure which, so far as it has been tested by the experience of two peculiar and unusual years, has realized the most sanguine expectations. In 1812 they had spent eighteen nights in fair, hard discussion on the Corn Laws; they could not renew it every year; and he claimed something like stability for the decision of Parliament. Sir Robert Peel was accused of having promised a particular price to the farmer for his grain. He had done no such thing, he had merely indicated that it would be desirable, if it were possible, to keep the price between 54s. and 58s.; and in the three seasons from 1842 to 1844 these limits were not exceeded, and the minimum, during the last year, had not been reached. Even Mr. Villiers was obliged to confess that, under this Corn Law, a foreign trade was maintained, not so extensive or so steady as he might desire, but sufficiently so for the supporters of the measure, which, in addition to its other merits, had realized a revenue, during the present year, of so much as 17s. the quarter. The existing law had obviated the objections which applied to its predecessor. The motion was directed, not so much against it as against the whole protective system sanctioned by the policy of the country; and there was, therefore, but one course for Parliament to adopt, in putting a check to an agitation mischievous in its effects, by creating an impression of the instability of a law which ought to be considered as a settlement of the question.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL found himself, like Sir Robert Peel a few evenings ago, in "no very enviable position." He was not prepared, either to say that the Corn Laws should be at once abolished, or that the existing law should be maintained. There were inherent vices in the present system, which indicated its premature decay; and when Mr. GLADSTONE appealed to the two last years, he merely proved that the present Government, instead of being wiser, had only enjoyed much better weather than their predecessors. Would the existing Corn Law stand two successive bad harvests? It violated the commercial principle; while a fixed duty—whatever might be its amount, six, eight, or ten shillings—enabled the merchant to make his calculations with certainty. But he apprehended that a sudden repeal of the Corn Laws would cause panic, affect the employment of capital in agriculture, and lead to a greater importation than was consistent either with the profits of the importing merchant, or the security of the home cultivator. The only portion of the proposition of the Anti-Corn-Law League which had the slightest claim to originality was the immediate abolition; all their other arguments had been anticipated by the masters of the science, Adam Smith, Ricardo, or such statesmen as Mr. Huskisson or Lord Grenville, who, however, guarded their views by great caution as to the mode of arriving at their accomplishment. He regretted that he could take no part in the present motion, and heartily wished that some compromise could be effected which might have the effect of subduing agitation; if trade and commerce flourished, the landed interest need not be afraid of decay. The better way would be to revise the whole system of our protective duties, instead of dealing in perpetual harangues against the Corn Law, the maintenance of which was more desired by the farmers than by the landlords themselves. But he could see no end to agitation so long as the Government were determined to maintain the existing law.

Mr. MILLS commiserated the position of Lord John

Russell, thanked Mr. Gladstone for his straightforward, honest speech, and called on the country gentlemen to listen to no compromise at all. The Anti-League was merely a defensive, the Anti-Corn-Law League an aggressive, association, whose interference, however, at elections had proved anything but a successful experiment. The working population were well aware that the object of the League was to cheapen bread in order to lower wages—a conclusion which none of their speeches, pamphlets, or papers attempted to meet; while the prices at which foreign grain can be imported showed that utter ruin awaited the farmer if free importation were immediately permitted. He adduced a statement, signed by three practical farmers, contradicting Lord Ducie's statement as to the expense of growing wheat on the Cotswold Hills, and denied, through the medium of figures, that the Corn Laws constituted a landlord's question.

Vicount Howick then rose and said:—Sir, I am afraid it is rather a late hour of the night to rise and address the House; but as I believe we are all most anxious that the debate should finish to-morrow, at all events—(cries of "To-night, to-night")—I should be sorry to press; yet I hope the House will permit me, though it is rather late, to take this opportunity of expressing the sentiments which I entertain upon this most important subject. Sir, I agree with the opinion which has been expressed by my noble friend, that this question has not been brought before the House in a convenient shape. I wish my honourable friend the member for Wolverhampton had taken the regular parliamentary course, to have moved for a committee of the whole House on the Corn Laws, and not embodied in the motion to be put from the Chair the resolutions he intended afterwards to move. But, Sir, though this may, I think, be an inconvenient course, still I have no hesitation whatever in giving the motion my support. I do so partly because, as the honourable member who has just sat down has stated, that it is now reduced to the question between the existing laws and the repeal of them; and when the matter came to that point I have never concealed my opinion in favour of the repeal of the existing law. Her Majesty's Government, I think, have done no good service to the landed interest in bringing the question to that issue; they have, I believe, rendered compromise impossible; at all events, until they think proper to propose some accommodation, it will be in vain to urge it from this side of the House. As we are therefore driven to select between the two extreme propositions, I have no hesitation in choosing the repeal of the existing law. (Cheers.) Often as we have discussed this question, I think that in the present year we discuss it under circumstances which give it some degree of novelty and considerable importance. We have just been told by an honourable member, who represents a great agricultural county, that he admits the wages of agricultural labourers to be much too low. With respect to labourers in manufacturing, we had a similar admission not long ago from her Majesty's Government. We were told in the debate on the Factory Bill that they did not dispute the fact that the proposed reduction in the number of hours for young children and females was of itself highly desirable; but they stated that the country was not in a situation to bear so great a reduction of its productive power. They said the loss must fall either upon profits or upon wages; and that both profits and wages were so low that they could not, even for so important an object, consent to further reduction. Now, Sir, having therefore the fact before us that wages are universally low at the present time in this country, and profits equally depressed,—that is, that both the great branches of productive industry are at this moment suffering very greatly, and that industry is inadequately rewarded,—it seems to me there is no question which so imperatively demands the attentive consideration of the House as—What are the causes of this unhappy condition of the country? It is a state of things to which we must all feel it is most important to put an end; and I am prepared to rest my support of the present motion expressly on this single ground,—that the present inadequate reward of industry, the low rate of wages and of profits, is to be traced directly to the operation of the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear.) Other restrictions on commerce, no doubt, contribute to the same effect; but this inadequate reward of industry is mainly the result of the existing Corn Laws. I do not mean to consider that law in any other aspect. I mean to confine my observations strictly to this point, and to endeavour to show that this low rate of wages and profits is the direct effect of our system of protective legislation. Now, Sir, in attempting to establish that proposition, I would in the first place, ask you, to what else can you attribute the fact? The fact itself is not denied; it is admitted on both sides of the House: we all feel that it is the great evil of our present social state. I ask you, to what is it you attribute it, if not, as I do, to the Corn Laws? Can you tell me that English capitalists and labourers receive little because they produce little,—that industry is ill rewarded in this country because it is unproductive? No man can say so with truth. The energy and spirit of British capitalists, whether among farmers, manufacturers, or merchants, are at least equal to that of their competitors in any other part of the world; the perseverance, skill, and industry of British labourers have long been proverbial, and their skill in production is great in proportion. Sir, in manufacturing we all know this to be the case,—we all know that their science has made the gigantic power of steam subservient to our use, and has so greatly increased the improvements in machinery that it has added to the productiveness of human industry in bringing forth materials—cloth and a vast number of other articles of human use—almost beyond calculation; it has even augmented the power of human industry in all these things to such a degree that some gentlemen have actually come forward and told its machinery is an evil. The hon. member for Knarborough has moved an amendment which goes up on this principle, that it is the real calamity of the poorer classes that a great part of the articles which they consume are produced with great facility. (Laughter.) Why, I wonder the hon. gentleman did not, to be perfectly consistent, recommend us to go back to the happy simple state of the aborigines of Australia, who are not dressed by the assistance of any description of machinery. But I believe that no principle could be devised sufficiently simple for the hon. gentleman. I never expected that any one would have brought forward a motion of this kind in this House, still less that it would have been seconded, as we know it was, by the hon. member opposite. I leave it to the House and the country to determine whether those two gentlemen are not extraordinary specimens of legislative wisdom. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) It is not, then, from any deficiency of productive power that industry is ill rewarded in this country. I have shown you that in manufactures there has been a great increase, but in agriculture it has not been so to the same extent. Nevertheless, in that there has also been a very great increase of production, notwithstanding the handsome crop of thistles which my honourable friend described as growing in the neighbourhood of Tamworth. (Laughter.) There is no question that British agriculture is very greatly advancing. The inquiries which have of late years been made into this subject, up to a very recent period, clearly prove that not only the total quantity of produce raised in this country is greatly augmented, but that the amount, in proportion to the number of labourers employed, is also increased; that each individual labourer, looking to the increase of his industry, the improved rate of crops, the improvement of implements now used, and the general improvement and increase of skill in agriculture,—there can, I say, be no doubt that each labourer now engaged in agricultural produce grows a great deal more human food than any labourer so engaged even so recently as the beginning of this century; that, if you refer back to a longer period, it will be seen that each agricultural labourer produces now at least two or three times as much as he did in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. But if industry be thus productive in all its branches, if it is so successful in producing clothing and food and those articles by the exportation of which imported produce is paid for from labour; if labour is thus successful in producing all these things, I want to know why does the labourer receive a smaller share of them than formerly? If he produces more food, clothing, and all those articles which contribute to human comfort, I want to know why he has less of them for himself than he had formerly? A description was given a few nights ago by the honourable member for Stockport of the condition of the Dorsetshire peasantry; the accuracy of that description has not been brought into question. The hon. member who has just sat down has admitted that the agricultural population are in a deplorable condition in that part of the country. Why, I ask, are these men, whose labour is thus so efficient, compelled to part with it for so small a portion of the fruits of their own industry, while at the same time the masters who employ them are equally badly off, and profits are as low as wages? The fact that profits are low in this country is beyond all contradiction; the test of that is in the present price of your funds. We know that money is unprecedentedly low; that the interest of money forms an unflinching clue to the general rate of profits, as well as to the scale of wages; and you are conscious that they are both low. How do you account for that startling fact? You cannot say it is taxation that causes it—because, within the last twenty-five years, taxes to a very large amount have been repealed; and there has been a proportionate improvement in the condition of your labourers and capitalists. I think it would not be difficult to show that this country, in proportion to its wealth, is not heavily taxed, as compared with other countries. They do not doubt have the same objectionable taxes, and some even at a higher rate than we have: still, looking at our revenue at home, I am bound to say that I think taxation is not the cause which presses so heavily on the productive industry of the country. I do not think it is taxation that affords any explanation of that fact. I say there is one way of accounting for it, and one way only; and it is this,—the territory of England is limited in proportion to the people who occupy it; that limitation of territory enabled the natural monopoly of landowners of the soil to demand from those who cultivate it a payment in the shape of rent, to be deducted from the gross produce before it comes to be divided between the farmer and the labourer. I have shown you that the gross produce is larger now in proportion to the number of labourers employed; and you have the fact admitted that the cause why the two great classes engaged in the production of industry—the capitalist on the one hand and the labourer on the other—both receive so small a share of its produce, is simply because they are obliged to pay so large an amount of rent from what they produce before they divide the remainder: the growing and rapidly increasing number of farms, and increasing competition for land, causing higher and higher rents to be paid, there is consequently a progressive diminution of the share of the gross produce of the soil which is to be divided between the labourer and the capitalist. I say this can alone account for the low rate of profits in this country. In the first instance, with respect to agricultural profits and wages—persons engaged in every other description of manufacture must give, directly or indirectly, a great part of the fruits of their industry in exchange for food: thus the price of agricultural produce regulates the price of every other description of commodity; and as the rate of profits and of wages in various businesses can never very greatly differ in particular employments at the same time in the same country, there is a tendency towards equality—though I do not say actual equality—but still a tendency towards equality. This low rate of profits and wages in agriculture necessarily causes a low rate of profits and wages in manufactures and commerce also; and it has thus been the limitation of your territory, in proportion to your population,—it is, then, the monopoly of land which exists which is the direct cause of that low rate of profits and wages of which I complain. (Cheers.) Now, Sir, that I am right in this view of the subject, I think, conclusively proved by this simple fact, that whenever land is more abundant in proportion to the population, then both profits and wages are high. Look, for instance, at our own colonies—Canada and Australia. In both these places wages and profits are high; yet in Canada labour is far less efficient in production than in this country. Compare the amount of labour employed by the people of Canada, in the back woods, with the same amount of labour which is employed here in supplying the peasantry of this country. It will be found to be infinitely greater. The Canadian requires all the clothes he wears, and everything requisite for the supply of his necessities, to be brought from a vast distance, and to be carried sometimes through trackless forests; and at last the goods reach him at a very great expense of labour. The same may be said with respect to the corn which he raises: it has to be carried over bad roads a distance one or two days' journey, there to be ground and brought back. On the other hand, the English labourer has everything close to his door and at his hand. He has the best of roads, in addition to railways, canals, steam-mills, and every convenience; and the goods are delivered at his house at a very inconsiderable expenditure of labour, compared with that which is requisite in Canada. It is evident, then, that the wants of the one class are supplied at an infinitely smaller proportion of labour than the other. Yet the Canadian labourer has not only higher money wages than the English labourer, but a greater amount of all the necessaries and comforts of life: he has more food and clothing, a better habitation, and in every respect superior accommodation to that which is possessed by our labourers at home. Now, to what is this circumstance owing? Why, simply to the fact that in Canada there is so great an amount of land in proportion to the population, that the whole of its produce is divided between the labourer and the capitalist who employs him. There is also a large field for the employment of capital and labour; while in this country there is a restricted field for employment and capital. When you have a restricted field for capital and labour, you have as a necessary consequence low wages and small profits; and, on the other hand, when you have a large field, you have high wages and great profits. Experience is uniform upon this point; wherever the same circumstances occur, the same results follow; whether you look to New Zealand or elsewhere, as long as security can be maintained, where there is a large supply and abundance of land in proportion to the population, there the people have plenty of work and high wages, and the capitalist has good profits. Now, Sir, I have laid before you principles clear and elementary. ("Hear, hear," from Col. Sibthorp.) I have no doubt the gallant member for Lincoln, who cheers me, is thoroughly conversant with these points of which I have been speaking, and therefore the House will understand that it is not for his edification that I have referred to them. (Laughter.) I have been compelled to go into these truths, elementary and plain as they are, because they lie at the very root of the matter before us. If you admit that wages and profits are low, because the soil is limited in proportion to the population, it follows of necessity that, if the extent of land could be increased, and a large additional quantity made available for the purposes of the population, the effect would be at once to raise wages and profits; part of the labour and capital now employed on our existing territory would be drawn off; competition would be diminished, and the labourer and capitalist would be able to retain a larger proportion of the fruits of their industry. I think no one hardly could deny that such would be the result; and if so, I wish to ask you in what does the difference consist between what happens in this case if you allow the labourer and capitalist to obtain food—not directly from land, but indirectly by exchange from other countries? In each case you equally diminish the stringency of the existing monopoly, which keeps down wages and profits. If, for instance, 10,000 or 100,000 labourers, in proportion to the amount of capital, could obtain employment upon a large tract of land abroad, and, thereby, suddenly escape from the country, you must all perceive that that circumstance would diminish the present competition for land, by drawing off a certain number of men of capital from it, and would also increase the supply of food in the country. But is it not attended with exactly the same result if these 10,000 or 100,000 labourers, with the same amount of capital, were employed in producing cloths or tools which they can exchange for corn or flour obtained from Poland or America? Would not that have exactly the same effect as what we have been describing, in diminishing the force of the existing monopoly? It is obvious that the effect would be precisely similar, and, indeed, in every respect the same: it must be exactly the same in the one case as in the other. If this, Sir, is a correct view of the subject, does it not follow that it is most unjust to prohibit that exchange? If, as I have ventured to argue, it would be the same thing whether these people cultivate the same land or produce the same supply of food, by the manufacture of articles taken in exchange for food, is it not most unjust to prohibit that exchange? (Cheers.) The honourable member who has just sat down has distinctly admitted that that exchange might take place. The whole argument of those who support the Corn Law rests upon this—that there would be too great a facility for obtaining land if the exchange we propose were to take place. It does, Sir, appear to me that it is a most monstrous injustice that you should prohibit the poor man from making the most of his labour and turning it to the best account in his power. I say it is a peculiarly monstrous injustice if the right hon. baronet opposite, with the right hon. baronet whom I now see sitting near him, and who upon the late debate on the factory bill, enlarged at such length and with so much eloquence upon the sacred right which every man had to the produce of his own labour—that being the most sacred estate which a man could possess—and the injustice of interference by law with the enjoyment of that estate, should, notwithstanding, support a Corn Law. But, Sir, do you not interfere with the enjoyment of that estate? If a Sheffield cutler, or a Manchester spinner, can exchange the produce of his year's labour for thirty quarters of foreign corn, and you prohibit him from doing so, and compel him to give it for British corn of which he can only obtain twenty quarters, I ask you whether you are not distinctly robbing that poor man of one-third of his labour. (Cheers.) Can there be a clearer case? Of course I do not assume that these are the actual proportions; they may be much less, or considerably more; I believe they would be found to be less; but, whatever the proportion is in which that man can exchange the produce of his labour for a greater quantity of foreign corn than you permit him to receive of British corn, I say in that very proportion you deprive him of the fruits of his honest industry in order to give it away to another. Sir, this is a proposition which I wish to bring broadly before you: I say you take from that man that which he is morally entitled to, and give it to those who have no earthly claim to it. Let it be remembered that this is not a taxation for the benefit of the state. All classes—the highest as well as the lowest—are interested in maintaining the power and necessary machinery of government by taxes, so long as they are duly apportioned and involve no sort of injustice. But this is no tax imposed for the benefit of the state, but for the purpose of raising money. The right honourable gentleman opposite has totally disclaimed the Corn Law as an instrument of revenue. Its supporters say it is for "protection;" but what those gentlemen call protection is to deprive every other class of the community of that power which nature intended them to possess, of exchanging the produce of their labour with those who will give them the most in return for it. What you call protection in shutting out of the market those who would give a man whatever he most wants in return for what he produces, and compels those men, in order to obtain food, to go to the dearest market. Thus, when you come to translate it into common sense and plain language, what is the real meaning of that which you call protection? I say that this involves a very great injustice. I believe there is no doubt that in all fully peopled countries there is a tendency in profit and wages gradually to fall. I believe that to be inevitable. It is palliated in a great degree by the increase and efficiency of labour; by those machines of which the hon. member for Knarborough has so bad an opinion; but still it is the opinion in all densely peopled countries, that wages and profits gradually fall. But if you allow food to be imported from abroad that tendency is checked. I do not say that this, or any possible importation, can prevent a very considerable fall of wages and profits; but I am persuaded that it would so far check it that it would be felt as a private evil, and not experienced as a general calamity by the great body of the community: that it is the means appointed by Providence for making the extensive unoccupied territories of the world available for the welfare and benefit of the population of old and settled countries. Is it, then, just to interfere with that process? Have you a right to step in by law, and—not, as I say again, for the purpose of revenue, but for the benefit of a particular class—place a difficulty in the way of the importation of food into this country? Sir, I ask you whether it is even just or wise for your own sakes to do this? I wish that I could press upon your minds as it ought to affect them, the case of the productive classes of this country at the present moment. I wish that I could enforce upon you, half so strongly as I feel, the sacred duty incumbent on us of losing no time in endeavouring to improve the condition of the working classes. (Hear, hear.) The acknowledgment has been general on both sides of the House that they are in the deepest suffering, and we have only to look around us to be sure that such is the case. With respect to the capitalist we can see a thousand symptoms of the unhappy consequences of the present state of things. It is obvious that there is too low a rate of profit and too large an amount of capital required to enable a tradesman to obtain a living. On the other hand it is perfectly clear that the consequence of a low rate of profit, which I think I have shown you is a consequence of this restriction on importation of food, is to throw more and more of all the trade and business of the country into the hands of great capitalists, to the utter ruin of all humbler men. It is to increase that tendency of which we see so much in the present day—to the creation of overgrown establishments, founded on the ruin of hundreds of families, rendering more and more marked that broad distinction of society into the few very rich, and the great mass very poor, which the right hon. baronet opposite, in introducing his property tax, justly described as one of the great social evils of the present day. Sir, you allow this system to extend and increase that evil day. That is the cause of the universal complaints of the young men in the middling and upper classes of society of the difficulty in establishing themselves in life, and of the overcrowding of every profession. Restriction in trade is obviously the cause of this; because, as I have said, it is a symptom which you never see in those countries in which the land offers employment, and where capital is not restricted. Sir, if we turn to the case of the labouring classes, the misery is still worse. We have had before us a description of the agricultural population—the miserable state of the great body of those who till our land.

Colonel SIBTHORP.—No, no.

Viscount HOWICK.—That is another illustration of my argument. Both the gallant member and myself have the good fortune to come from counties where the population are comparatively well off: that is in Lincolnshire, and the north of England. There they do not witness those distressing scenes which we see in other parts; and it is undoubtedly true that in the north of England the agricultural population are comparatively well off. But in the southern counties of England it is universally admitted that nothing can be more deplorable. In Dorsetshire, for instance, a meeting was held only a day or two ago to see if they could devise means for the improvement of the condition of the people. Well, sir, you find symptoms of this distress in other quarters. We have had brought under our notice, not long ago, the miserable condition of the sempstresses in London: why, these are all different symptoms of one and the same evil; they are all proofs of the overcrowded population—a population pressing against each other for the means of subsistence which you allow them—a population which, in their increased competition for the means of livelihood, are driven to labour for the lowest amount of remuneration that can be given to them. Now, sir, how are you to improve their situation, except by adopting the means which we propose to you? Some gentlemen, I know, have suggested a large and extensive emigration. Her Majesty's Government do not agree with that, and so far, certainly, I concur with them, that though I think my hon. and learned friend the member for Liskeard is perfectly right in his views of colonisation, though I think that large and extensive colonisation would be the greatest blessing given to this country, although I believe that we have the greatest right to complain, after the promise of last year, that the members of her Majesty's Government fell so miserably and lamentably short of the expectation which they held out to us on this subject, still I am bound to say that colonisation, even on the largest scale, could not effect by itself any great improvement in the condition of the great body of the population: I believe that would be altogether impossible. But, sir, if you cannot by those or any other means effect your object of raising the people at home to an equality with their fellow-creatures who are enabled to emigrate, as would be the case with these sempstresses and distressed labourers in Dorsetshire, for the moment they can make up their minds to break the ties which bind them to their native land and emigrate, they immediately find their situation altered, and instead of competing with each other for a miserable subsistence, they find that the competition is for their services amongst those who are anxious to obtain them; but, if you cannot raise your population at home to an equality of prosperity with those who are content to emigrate, I say that you can at least do this,—forbear, by artificial restrictions, to aggravate their condition, and refrain from imposing restraints upon the introduction of food into this country. You can thus give a new value to labour by diminishing the amount of competition, and render it more valuable in the market and enable the labourer to command higher wages in return for his services. I say this you can do; the poor ask it of you, and it is all they require from you—a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. They have a right to ask it—you have it in your power to give it them, by simply consenting to do that act of justice, of relieving them from the artificial restraints which now prevent them from turning their labours to the best account. Any other remedy you may attempt I am persuaded will be ineffectual. Some gentlemen tell us of the Poor Law. Why, sir, it seems to me that charity, whether voluntary or enforced by law, never, in a wholesome state of society, can be depended upon for the livelihood of the great body of the population: even if it were possible, it would be destructive of their moral character, happiness, and comfort. I can conceive nothing more degraded than the state of the agricultural peasantry in the south of England a few years ago, before the attempt at improving the law was made. Relief is absolutely necessary to meet special cases, such as sickness, accident, and deep distress—these are fit subjects for relief; but charity is altogether powerless in affording the ordinary means of livelihood to the great body of the population. There are other gentlemen who say it is all the fault of those greedy people who grind down wages. Why, as my hon. friend the member for Stockport most justly stated, when remarking on the low wages of Dorsetshire, this is not the fault of the farmer—low wages are not caused by him—or of the manufacturer. ("Hear, hear," from the Ministerial benches.) Wages are governed by causes over which they have no control; by the operation of the demand and supply of labour. A voluntary agreement to raise wages cannot answer the purpose. Artificial plans for raising wages, and all these things, in the end, are sure to fail; sooner or later the thing will find its level, and wages will of necessity be regulated by the proportion between the supply and the demand for labour. You can, therefore, only improve the condition of the working people by increasing the demand for labour, making their industry more valuable, and enabling them to obtain their due reward, not as a boon or favour—because upon those terms I say it is not fit to have it—but as a right which they have the power of enforcing. It is in this manner that you should obtain for them high wages. I say you have the power, if you choose to exercise it, of giving them this relief. You may take off those restrictions which every man in his heart is conscious are utterly inconsistent with those principles which even the right hon. gentlemen opposite so stoutly maintain in what they call the "abstract." We all know that these restrictions are totally incompatible with those great principles which the right hon. baronet opposite invariably takes credit to himself for maintaining: he must know that, it is so inconsistent. If he supports these restrictions at all on a special case for some imaginary advantage, which I for one am entirely unable to understand, I ask him how he can reconcile himself to do that, how he can justify it to his own sense of duty, unless he can suggest some other means of raising the condition of the great body of the population of this country. Sir, I tell you to beware how you persevere in this system, because, though the honourable member who has just sat down treated with some degree of derision the notion that this was a question of rent, and that the interest of the peasantry and the farmer were not at stake in it; although he treated that statement with contempt, I for one tell him my firm conviction, that this is a question of rent and nothing but rent. I state this undoubted impression of my mind as one who wishes well to the landed interest, and cannot do otherwise, because my prosperity is completely involved in theirs. (Hear.) I am persuaded that, if they would look fairly into this matter, they would find that even upon the narrowest ground of self-interest, we who are concerned in the welfare of the land ought to put an end to these restrictive laws. If we look back at the history of the last thirty years during which we have had these Corn Laws, what do we see but a continued succession of disappointed hopes of agricultural prosperity, and a perpetual recurrence of seasons of the greatest distress among the farmers. I am persuaded, Sir, that our own real interest requires the alteration of these laws; but whatever may be our interest, I am satisfied it is our most solemn duty immediately to abandon their maintenance. (Hear, hear, hear.) I think that it is as demonstrable as any proposition in arithmetic, that the continuance of these enactments will still further depress the general condition of the people. I ask, whether for the highest imaginable benefit we are justified in keeping down the people? We know, Sir, upon Divine authority, that there is a malediction pronounced upon those who withhold from the labourer his hire; it is my firm conviction that the guilt is as great of those who, as legislators, are parties to the maintenance of this law, and who know its effects, as that of any private individual extortioner who deprives the labourer of his hire. (Cheers.) Sir, I for one will not take any share of the awful responsibility attached to the continuance of this system, and I caution you to beware of your prolonging this obstinate perseverance in evil too far. All experience proves that, if justice is too long withheld, something much beyond justice is in the end extorted. I think there are significant symptoms that we are not very distant from that end. (Hear, hear.) It is true you are all-powerful in this House, and that you have a majority in the constituencies of the kingdom ("hear, hear," from Colonel Sibthorp), by whom you have been returned; but I for one, as a friend of our existing political institutions—as one who would view with the greatest dread and alarm any speedy and violent disturbance of the present distribution of political power—call upon you to beware how you press this power much further, because the foundation upon which our institutions rest is sapped when the persuasion shall once become general, that those in whose hands political power is now placed pervert that power for their own benefit to the injury of others (hear, hear): when once that persuasion gets possession of the mind of the great body of the people the days of our existing institutions are numbered.

Colonel SIBTHORP: When it does.

Viscount HOWICK: The gallant colonel says, when it does: I tell him that that persuasion is very fast gaining ground.

Colonel SIBTHORP: No, no.

Viscount HOWICK: You say "No," but, if you were skilful to read the signs of the times, I think you would give a very different answer. (Cheers.) Let me ask you to look at the symptoms around you of the universal prevalence of Chartism. (Laughter from Col. Sibthorp.) You have taunted gentlemen connected with what is called the Anti-Corn-Law League, with not venturing to meet public discussion in the manufacturing districts. From what does this arise? Do you think it arises from an attachment of the population to your Corn Laws? If you do, you are much mistaken. It arises from this—that that population are deeply dissatisfied with the existing institutions. (Hear, hear.) They believe that, if the Corn Laws continue, the middle classes will join with them in overthrowing those institutions; and therefore they do not wish to alter your Corn Law until they can change with it the existing distribution of political power. I ask any man who is conversant with the actual state of the manufacturing districts, whether they are not now ashamed of those Chartist disturbances that took place at Free-Trade meetings. Do not suppose this feeling of Chartism arises from a theoretical dislike of your form of government, or anxiety to succeed in political power. It is no such thing. It is a practical sense of privation and of physical suffering. It is what they call themselves "a knife-and-fork question," which lurks at the bottom of this dissatisfaction. (Hear.) They feel their condition to be a miserable one, and they refer the misery which they endure to what they call "class legislation." These, I think, are words which are constantly in their mouths; and I say they are right in so referring it. You cannot hope to remove this impression from their minds; do not suppose that you can convince them that their sufferings are not owing to what they call class legislation, you cannot so persuade them, for this simple reason, that in the main they are right. It is perfectly true, and it is to our shame that a great majority of them are very imperfectly educated, and mistake very often the nature of the laws which we have made. Very often the remedies they ask for would only aggravate the evils which they are suffering. In the main they are right; I believe God did not so constitute the world that with a proper form of government, and with sound legislation, honest industry should be unable to obtain a fair and just reward. (Hear, hear.) I said before that "a fair day's wages for a fair day's work" is the right of the labouring class—they feel it to be so, it is a conclusion to which they have come instinctively, independent of reason: and till they get that, they will be persuaded that there is something wrong in your legislation. I say they will be rightly so persuaded; their conviction is a sound one, and you can only cure them of the conviction, by doing that which will really improve their condition. You can only reconcile them to your instructions by rendering their condition better. Sir, I dread a great and sudden change in the distribution of political power, because, in the present state of ignorance on the part of the population, I fear they would mistake the cause of their suffering, and do infinite mischief to themselves and others, before they were convinced of their error; but, if this condition of the manufacturing population is such as to excite the anxiety of those who take any deep view of the situation of this country, I do not think the condition of the agricultural population much better. Reference has already been made in the course of this debate to the prevalence of incendiarism. To what cause is that to be attributed? Why, even the right honourable gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was not prepared to deny that distress was one very great cause of the extension of this crime. Sir, I am persuaded that such is the cause. That distress has been referred to the existence of the Poor Laws. It seems to me that that is a mode of explaining it which is altogether unsatisfactory, for this simple reason, that, four or five years before the alteration of the Poor Laws, precisely similar outrages were even more prevalent than they are at present, and they arose then, as I believe they do now, from discontent produced by intolerable distress. In the agricultural population, at all events, you will not say that this distress arises from anything about grievances or from anything else but the actual pressure of distress. It is true this distress does not manifest itself in that part of the country to which the gallant colonel belongs, nor in some other districts. I say that the change in the Poor Laws altogether fails to explain the cause of this distress, because the same symptoms were perceptible before that alteration took place. But, beyond that, we have lately seen in the newspapers some extraordinary and interesting letters upon the subject of these outrages. I do not concur in the view of the writer of them; but, at the same time, it is impossible to deny that he is a person of considerable acuteness and industry in searching into the facts which he is appointed to investigate. It appears to me that the fact which he has pointed out, and the abuses which he has mentioned as exciting to violence, have had a considerable effect in producing these fires—namely, the perversion of the new Poor Law and the re-establishment of some of the abuses which existed under the old plan. Because, what is it we are told has happened? Why, that there is an attempt made in that county to revive a practice which, previous to 1831, was common, of paying agricultural labourers, not according to the value of their fair labour, but according to what the overseers and persons who administered the Poor Law conceived to be their wants. Usually the wages of single men were reduced by the board of guardians, who administered the law as it had been in olden times. They are at their old tricks again, trying to screw the labourers up by the instrumentality of the new Poor Law, as they formerly did by means of the old. The wages of single men are assessed at what these parochial officers think absolutely necessary for their subsistence. This is a perversion of the present Poor Law, which the commissioners—whose power ought to be used as much for the protection of the poor as the rate-payer—may most advantageously interfere to check; and I hope they will; but the House must observe this remarkable fact, that this abuse, which I say is a revival of the old Poor Law under the amended system, is directly owing to the Corn Laws. The cause is, as I believe, directly owing to the Corn Law; because it can be traced, according to the statements which are made, immediately to the over-competition for land to which they have been subject, and the stringent monopoly of the landowners. Sir, that competition, we are told, drives farmers in these districts to offer rents which, in fact, they have not the ability to pay; so that they are working, not for themselves, but others. Hence arises the temptation to these abuses, and power to practise them, because, if you were to increase the value of labour, labourers would be enabled to command high wages, to which they are entitled; at the same time the farmer would not be driven to offer such exorbitant rent for the land, nor have the same competition, and endeavour to beat down labour. Therefore this dis-

ness, I think, is traceable directly to your Corn Law, and this law further contributes to that distress in this manner—I say it is at this moment the main obstacle to agricultural improvement. Sir, as a person knowing something—I do not pretend to know much—I am happy to behold that in our county we do not follow exactly in the course of the agriculturists in the southern counties, but we adopt a plan which the agriculturists of other counties would do well to copy. I say I do know this, that the present law is a great obstacle to agricultural improvement; it is one of the causes of the indisposition to take leases which at present exist. The right honourable gentleman the President of the Board of Trade distinctly told us that such was the case; because what was his argument? He said this distress in Suffolk, this incendiarism, arose very much from the reluctance of persons to embark capital in land from the want of stability in the existing law. I concur with the Right Hon. President of the Board of Trade, I agree with him that the instability of the law is the main obstacle. I observe that the moment you have altered your law, when you have put it upon a permanent footing, the right hon. gentleman says there is no permanent footing except total repeal. If so, I say by all means let us have total repeal. That fear of foreign competition, which now acts as a discouragement to improvement and enterprise, immediately will change its effect, and it will act, on the contrary, as the strongest possible spur to improvement and stimulus to exertion, so as to enable them to meet with success the foreign competition. Therefore it is this law, directly, which is the cause of the distress which now exists. Sir, I beg pardon of the House for trespassing so long. I feel that by the Suffolk case I have been led further into the case of the agricultural population than I had intended. I will only revert for a single moment, before I sit down, to an argument I was endeavouring to force. I will ask you, when such is the temper and disposition of men's minds—I mean of the great body of the people in large divisions of the agricultural parts of the country, and most manufacturing districts—when such is the temper of the body of the people, I ask you, is it safe or prudent to defer seriously attempting a remedy? The hon. member for Dorsetshire is not in his place now. I know his high and honourable mind, and also the hon. members who voted with him on the Factory Bill. I hope my hon. friend will never allow it to be said that, having adopted a measure with reference to others, he refused to allow the application of the same when his own interests were concerned, but shrunk from the experiment. (Hear.) That noble lord admitted to me, frankly and fairly, that the statement of the hon. member for Stockport with reference to the Dorsetshire peasantry was not overcharged. (Hear.) Let him persevere in the noble task he has set himself, with reference to bettering the condition of the working classes, and join us in getting rid of these artificial restrictions. The right hon. gentleman the President of the Board of Trade shrank from even attempting to defend this law, on any sound principle of commerce. Let him be assured that when he is in combination with a system which restricts food from the population he must be in error. He cannot be acting imprudently if he reverts to a system which Providence clearly meant to be the system of the world—by which the abundance of one country might be brought in aid of the scarcity of another; and if he joins with us in refusing to tolerate any longer a system by which the great body of the people are pressed with intense competition for the means of subsistence, in maintaining artificial laws, of which it is acknowledged that the object is to prevent the introducing of food into this country for the maintenance of the people. (Cheers.)

On the conclusion of Lord Howick's speech, the debate was adjourned.

SECOND NIGHT'S DEBATE.

We sincerely regret our inability to give the entire speeches spoken in the course of the two nights' debate. So far from wishing to suppress a single word uttered in defence of the Corn Laws, we would rather that every monopolist speech were placed alongside every Free-Trade one, were it only to exhibit the sheer imbecility of the reasons adduced in defence of protection. But this our limits positively forbid; and we must therefore content ourselves with an impartial, though an abbreviated, summary.

The debate, on Wednesday, was resumed by

Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN, who read copious extracts from speeches, newspaper articles, pamphlets, &c., in order to give an historical view of the proceedings of the Anti-Corn-Law League, whose conduct and operations he ridiculed and condemned. It seems he had been at enormous pains to get up this undigested mass of scraps, cut out with the scissors, probably thinking that, as Mr. Villiers had gone largely into statistics against the Corn Law, he had only to collect extracts from the speeches of its opponents to prove the reverse! His tedious speech of two hours might be put in this stily-gistic way:—There is a Corn-Law, and there is an Anti-Corn-Law League. But the Anti-Corn-Law League has existed for six years, made great exertions, many speeches, and collected much money, in order to enlighten the country. Therefore the Corn Law is "holy, and just, and good."

Captain LAYARD, when in China, had condemned the practice of crippling the female foot, but was told that the old women who made a living by it prevented the abolition of the practice. There, for the benefit of a class, the women were put on short steps; here, for the benefit of another class, we put the people on short commons. He amused the House by observations on Mr. Disraeli, and by relating his pleasure on having seen Sir Robert Peel relaxing himself at the opera, witnessing the ballet of "Ondine," the "shadow-dance" in which he compared to Free Trade sitting before the mental vision of the Premier. The motion of Mr. Villiers had his support.

Colonel RUSHTON spoke shortly on the condition of the agricultural peasantry of Suffolk, which was much better than had been represented, and to which the incendiary fires had been wrongly attributed.

Lord RENDLESHAM reminded the House that there were two parties to the letting of a farm, and that the landlord, like the manufacturer, could only command the market price. In his part of the country—and he believed that it was general—three rents were calculated on: one for the landlord; a second for the farmer, to recompense his outlay of capital; and a third was appropriated to the labourer, being spent in the shape of wages. But repeal the Corn Laws, reduce the price of grain to the continental level, and the farmer would be unable to compete with his lighter-taxed foreign rival, while wages, regulated by the price of provisions, would fall. He hoped that Sir Robert Peel would boldly avow his determination to maintain that system of protection which this country had so long enjoyed.

Mr. WARD said—Sir, I have no intention of troubling the House at any length on this subject; my opinions in reference to it are so well known that it would be almost useless to do so. But the noble lord has given a fair challenge to every man at all acquainted with the agricultural interest. (Hear, hear.) In the first place, I think we ought to express our obligations to the noble lord for having brought this debate back to something like reasonable grounds. (Hear, hear.) To spend two hours in reviewing everything which has been said and done by the Anti-Corn-Law League—which has been done to-night—I cannot but regard as a mode of evading the question, a waste of the time which ought to be devoted to it if we mean to enter upon it honestly, and a diverting of public attention from that which should be the main topic of discussion, namely, the hearing of the Corn Laws on the public interest. (Hear, hear.) If the hon. member for Northamptonshire had said twelve months ago, "We regard this Anti-Corn-Law League as an unconstitutional body,"—why, that would have been some excuse for the attack which he has entered into; but for a gentleman who occupies at this moment the honourable situation of President of the Publishing Committee of the Pro-Corn-Law Association to come forward and pass in review the acts of a body whose conduct that association is copying in the minutest particular—(cries of "No, no,")—except in that most important particular, the great talent which the League has brought to bear on this question (hear, hear, hear)—this does appear to me a most extraordinary course. I must say that anything so perfectly milk-and-water as the publications which have been issued by the Pro-Corn-Law League—anything presenting a greater contrast, in point of ability, to those of some of the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League—I cannot possibly conceive. But, I say, the hon. member threw away his ground before he occupied it this evening; and he is now following, with others, the proceedings of those very persons whom he holds up to censure. (Hear, hear.) Now, we are indebted to the noble lord opposite for having brought this question to the real point at issue; and if I could believe with him that there was a sort of sliding scale established between the price of corn and wages—if I could believe that, when wheat is at 80s., a farmer pays double the amount of wages that he does when it is at 40s.—I should admit then that there was some force in his argument. But have we heard of anything but a miserable abatement of 5 or 10 per cent. returned to the tenant; while, as the noble lord himself says, the value of his produce has fallen in many instances from 80s., which the law promised, to 43s. and even to 36s.? (Hear, hear.) The complaint which we make against this law is, that there is nothing like certainty for anybody; that you take your land upon a supposition which Parliament holds out, but which Parliament has never yet had, and never will have, the power of realizing. (Hear.) Parliament promised, in 1815, 80s. a quarter, and in six months afterwards the price was 46s. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. baronet himself promised last year a minimum of 56s. (No, no.) Well, he gave a virtual promise, and it was so understood by the country, and so received by all his adherents. (Hear, hear.) There is not a man amongst them who does not value his land on the supposition that he may realize 56s. a quarter for corn, and who does not tell his tenants so at his rent-dinner, "Why, it is the hope held out to us by the head of her Majesty's Government." (Hear.) It will not do, therefore, for the right honourable baronet to come here and say that he has never promised anything of the kind. I say it was believed everywhere throughout the country, and it is upon the faith of it that every arrangement has been made since the Corn Laws were changed. (Hear, hear.) Well, now, the noble lord complains that so much is said out of this House about the poor man, and that so little is done for him. God knows that is true enough; and I should—if I had the happiness of seeing any of them present, but they are all shrinking from this discussion—I should recal those gentlemen who were filled so recently with sympathy for the poor, and who expressed such hopes of making this House a benefactor to the working population of the country, to the sentiments which they uttered in recent debates when indulging in a cheap humanity at other persons' expense. (Cheers.) Why are they not here to-night? (Hear, hear.) Why is there not a man amongst them who is ready to say, "I am willing to incur some little risk, to expose myself to something like a chance of the lowering of the value of my land, to benefit those classes whose claim upon us is so fairly urged? Where is the noble lord the member for Dorsetshire? (Hear, hear.) Where is the whole of that Young England party who are so active here? (Laughter.) Why, there sits the solitary representative of it (pointing to Mr. Peter Borthwick), who had the peculiar distinction of being the only man in this House who ventured to second the resolutions brought forward by his honourable friend. And really I must do that honourable gentleman the justice to say, that I never saw a man dragged more reluctantly into any affair of this kind in my life. (Laughter.) It is most creditable to the House to find that, in the whole course of this debate, not the slightest allusion has been made to the amendment of the honourable member for Knaresborough, except that made by the right hon. gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, who pledged himself distinctly to prove, whenever that was moved as a substantive proposition, that for any one man in this country who could be shown to have lost employment, or to have been injured, by the operation of machinery, he would produce 100 families who were living in comparative comfort by it. (Hear.) Now, I think this is a very creditable position for the House to have taken on this question. (Hear, hear.) But as to all those gentlemen of whom we heard so much in the factory debates—who, while dealing with other people's property, held such large language about the interests of the working classes, and the absolute necessity of rescuing them from the state of degradation and distress into which they have fallen—what is become of them? (Cheers.) Are they all grown sober, like the hon. member for Nottinghamshire? (Laughter.) Have they all had time to become ashamed of their own position? That is the only construction which we can put upon their conduct. (Hear.) I ventured to say in the late debates, that while I had the unpleasant duty to perform of opposing a measure which was decidedly popular with the working classes—which held out to them a hope of relief that I thought could never be realized—I was prepared to support any measure which would contribute effectually to an amended condition of the working classes. But, with respect to those gentlemen who, having been defeated in their own project, do not dare to discuss this question of the Corn Laws—who, having failed in enforcing their own crude theories as to diminishing the duration of labour in this country, do not dare to meddle with the great question of the people's food—why, I must say I can conceive nothing more unhappy, I had almost said more contemptible (hear, hear), than the position which they will henceforward occupy in public opinion. (Hear, hear.) Now, the noble lord says that the rate of wages is always regulated by the price of corn. Really that proposition is so utterly untenable that it is surprising that any one could be found to state it in an assembly of thinking men. What is the difference in his own county between the rate of wages in 1836 and in 1843?

Lord RENDLESHAM: Between 1836 and 1843 there is a difference of about 2s. a week.

Mr. WARD: I venture to say that no corresponding rise whatever has taken place in the agricultural counties in the dear years above the cheap years. In many counties the rate of wages now is lower than it was five years ago, absolutely lower (hear): it is not, I am aware, the fault of the farmers; I do not say that they are responsible for it. (Hear.) They do not regulate the rate of wages; but there are more people out of employment—more people pressing on them for work—and the consequence is, that there is less money to be divided amongst them. (Hear.) I do not here allude to that peculiar custom which seems to prevail in the county of Suffolk, and against which, as a supporter of the new poor law, I beg to enter my protest—a custom subjoining or superadding another test to the test created by the poor law to qualify a man for receiving relief out of the rates. (Hear.) When I voted for that law, I considered that the sole condition upon which relief was to be administered henceforward, was his submission to the workhouse test; that if a man were so depressed by circumstances as to give up the hope of supporting himself independently, and were to apply to the workhouse for relief, that was a sufficient test. I appeal to the right hon. baronet whether that was not the general feeling of the House in 1832. (Hear.) Yet, such is the additional stringency given to this law by the board of guardians in Suffolk, that they require an actual certificate from the ratepayers of the district that the man cannot find work amongst them before they will admit him into the union workhouse. (No, no.) The practice is almost general there at the present moment. They actually require in many of the Suffolk unions a certificate from every farmer in the parish that they have no work to give the applicant, before they will grant him any relief. What is the consequence? The poor man becomes the slave of others. When a young man goes round to look for work, a farmer may say to him, "I will give you work at 4s. or 5s. a week; I will not give you 7s. or 8s. which you ought to have;" and then, if he refuses to accept the offer, he is not able to obtain his certificate, enabling him to obtain relief at the workhouse. If that practice is general in Suffolk, I think it accounts very much for the lamentable state of things in that county. (Hear, hear.) Well, then, the noble lord said that this Corn Law is not detrimental to commerce. Now, that is another of those daring assertions which I cannot make out, and which you only make in this House because it is a packed jury. (Hear, hear.) You are sitting amongst a number of persons who applaud all these extraordinary allegations when they come from one of their own clique, from one of the party who have a pecuniary interest in this question, and who have a monopoly of power; I admit your power, though I altogether deny your justice. It is one of those allegations which no person would venture to make except in this House, which is just the last place where it ought to be made. Everything which has been done as regards our commercial relations with foreign countries; the correspondence of the noble lord with Prussia, published recently; everything, in fact, shows the practical difficulty which every Government has when it attempts to extend commerce, and finds that the Corn Laws stand in the way of every rational proposition for extending the field of our commercial enterprise. (Hear, hear.) Why, there is not a man in this House who, if he could get rid of the supposition that the Corn Laws are essential to his interest, would not join with us on the subject of Free Trade. (Hear, hear.) It would be his own interest to do so, clearly and distinctly his interest. What interest has he in paying double the proper price for sugar? Why, he consents to it because the sugar protection recalls to his mind the protection of corn. He stands by the West Indians on the supposition that the West Indians will stand by him; and so you go on, link by link, till the whole community is injured by a combination of interests in commercial matters, which ought never to have been heard of in a British Parliament. You ought to look more at the general interest of all classes. You have no business to begin at home. You have no business to lay down your abstract principles, as the right hon. gentleman the President of the Board of Trade did last night, telling us that he regarded dear bread as the greatest of public calamities, while in the same breath—almost in the same sentence—he added, that he looked upon the admission of 160,000 quarters of corn, during the first six months of the present year, at a duty of 17s. a quarter, as a proof of the admirable working of the present Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman's practice is all of a piece with his theory. The right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government lays down abstract principles in the most satisfactory manner. We should be too happy to have the right hon. baronet as our leader if he would only do half what he proposes to do (hear); if he would only work out one tithe of his own theory he would be the leading man in this country in the application of Free-Trade principles. (Hear.) I would prefer him ten thousand times over to my noble friend the member for the city of London; because there he (Lord J. Russell) stands, with a sort of dogged pertinacity, the type, in this House, of a fixed duty which no one wants. (Laughter.) He says to our opponents, "Whenever you quarrel with the right hon. baronet—whenever you have a lover's quarrel with him, like that which you had the other day, which I am sorry that you so soon made up—whenever you come to that position, here is a fixed duty, I adhere to the great principle of a fixed duty; I do not see why it should be, mind—we will talk about that when it comes to the point—but I adhere to the principle of a fixed duty. The right hon. baronet adheres to no principle at all; but here am I the representative of the principle of a fixed duty, and, when you want to come to a compromise on this subject, you will find me a very convenient person." (Laughter.) Now, I do not say that if the worst comes to the worst, a fixed duty would not be preferable to the sliding scale; but if the right hon. baronet would only give me some hope that a day would come when he would really set about parting company with the drag-chains that hang around him on that side of the House, and set about working out one small portion of those large and extensive theories which he has had the merit of putting before the country, no man in this House would be more glad to follow him than I should. The right hon. baronet makes a good case even out of a very bad one; and if, besides putting forth good principles, he would combine them with practice, no man would have a greater satisfaction in following him as a leader. I saw with great regret that the right hon. baronet displayed an inclination to make a high bid for an accommodation with the gentlemen who sit round him; or at least with the hon. members for Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, and Winchester. There was a most marked and significant cheer given by the right hon. baronet, when those hon. members said, "We are disposed now to depend on the Government; we did not depend on them much before, it is true; but still, after the manly and straightforward speech of the right hon. gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (not remarkable, by the way, for straightforwardness in his speeches), we are disposed to rely on the new compact entered into with the Government." One hon. member said he really relied upon the right hon. baronet; he would not be put off by the invidious hint thrown out by the hon. member for Manchester; he said, "I really believe that the right hon. baronet intends to give this law a full and fair trial." Well, the right honourable baronet (Sir Robert Peel) cheered this most vociferously; he actually got excited on the subject (laughter); he cheered what was said in a manner which I did not expect—having seldom seen the right honourable baronet manifest much interest in what passed in this House—so important did he consider this patched up accommodation with a large body of his supporters, that he put himself out of his ordinary equable course in this House to cheer most vociferously the appeal which was made to him. Now, I wish to ask the right hon. baronet what he considers a fair trial: is it one, two, three, four, or ten years? (Hear, hear.) You must expect great vicissitudes. Why, I very much doubt whether we should yesterday have had the pleasure of hearing the speech of the President of the Board of Trade had it not been for that timely shower which came to resuscitate the hopes of the agriculturists. (Laughter.) But what, I ask, is a fair trial of this indefensible system? How are we to meet bad harvests, I want to know, for one, two, or three years? How long is this country to endure suffering and misery before the right hon. baronet will be placed in such a position as to be able, with a decent regard to consistency and to past professions, to part company with his followers, and say to them, very amicably, "You really do not know your own interests; I am a better judge of them than yourselves; and you may take my word for it that the time is come when it is absolutely impossible any longer to resist the demand for a change in these laws." Now, I know that we have to labour under the greatest possible disadvantage in arguing with gentlemen who never listen to anything but great practical grievances. When I pointed out last year that 10,000 persons had been actually thrown as paupers upon the parish of Sheffield, who were all earning good wages three years previously; when I said that the Corn Law was consigning them to irremediable poverty, while Manchester, Paisley, Stockport, and other towns were sending forth their remonstrances against the same law; and when the right hon. baronet acknowledged that the greatest possible evils under which the people of this country suffered were those which arose from a period of commercial depression, he could not bear the idea of that distress; it affected him, I believe, as much as any one. Honourable gentlemen were not then disposed to take the same strong ground. (Hear, hear.) They then saw that such a course might be attended with serious dangers; they saw that the aristocracy of this country had much at stake independently of the Corn Laws, that many other things would remain after those laws were repealed; under the idea that there is now some hope of keeping down popular discontent, they are assuming quite a different tone. (Hear, hear.) I repeat, therefore, that we are arguing under the greatest possible disadvantage, but still I come back to the same point. I ask the right hon. baronet what he means by a fair trial of this law? I ask him whether England, the greatest commercial country in the world, is to be governed by a principle which depends on the weather-glass—by a scale which rises and falls with the barometer at a particular season of the year? (Cheers.) I ask him whether the food of the people is to be made the subject of the most unprincipled competition amongst the landlords, without any advantage to one single class, while the system is, in a great measure, repudiated by the tenantry of the country. (Cries of "No, no," from the Ministerial benches.) You say not. Now, I distinctly meet you on that ground. (Hear, hear.) I say that in every step which has been taken by the Pro-Corn-Law League the landlords are the persons who have put their shoulders to the wheel. (Hear, hear.) The landlords are the persons who have coerced the tenantry; and the landlords have paid every shilling of expense which has been incurred. There has not been a subscription in any part of the country which, bona fide, has not been headed by landlords. In the first association which was formed, Mr. Tower, of Essex, had the honour of putting down his name for £50. We all know the sort of machinery which carried the last election. In every one of the counties the squirearchy and the church were found in holy alliance for the protection of agriculture. (Hear.) As many letters have been written by landlords to their tenants to induce them to take part in these meetings as were written to induce them to take the part they did in the last election. Never was there anything so bolstered up and so factitious as the whole appearance of Pro-Corn Law enthusiasm. (Hear.) I am perfectly certain that, if at this moment there were, from any overruling circumstances, a change of opinion in this House;

if gentlemen were to say to their tenants, "We are prepared to meet you on fair terms; you have not the interest which you fancy you have in these laws; and we are quite prepared to enter upon the question of leases with you, with a view to an alteration; we are quite prepared to provide against that confusion;" for I will not mince the matter: I know there must be confusion for a certain period (hear);—"we are quite willing to assist you for two or three years after your protection is withdrawn, and we will then let you hold your land on terms which will be advantageous to all parties." I venture to say that there is not a tenant-farmer in this country who would not gladly close with his landlord on such terms. I say, then, that the question being one in the settlement of which not merely the landlords but the whole population of this country have a direct interest, and one which has so close a connexion with the discontent of large classes of the community, it would be a much wiser, a much more honourable, a much more straightforward, and a much more profitable course for hon. gentlemen opposite to look at this question manfully, instead of staying off the evil hour, as they will do to-night, by a large majority of votes, without convincing any human being that they have one single argument in their justification. (Cheers.)

Sir JOHN TROLLOPE vindicated the protection societies, and made a short speech in defence of the Corn Laws.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON said:—Sir, I think that, in going into an investigation of the mode in which these two societies have been formed, viz., the society for maintaining the Corn Laws, and the society for abolishing the Corn Laws, we have been led from the real question, which is—what is the benefit supposed to be conferred upon the community by the Corn Laws? (Hear, hear.) The Corn Laws are a direct interference with the freedom of trade, the freedom of industry, and the freedom which a man may fairly claim to exercise; and it is incumbent on those who defend this interference to prove to the community the advantages conferred upon it by restriction. (Hear, hear.) An hon. gentleman opposite, in reply to my hon. friend, said, he was quite mistaken as to the origin of the Pro-Corn-Law Society. He said the tenants were the originators of that society. Now, coming from an agricultural county myself, I know how easy it is to give a hint to the steward, that the tenants are expected at a meeting on some particular day, on behalf of the interests of agriculture. (Hear, hear.) To tell me that this society originated with the farming tenants, is to tell me what all the experiences of my earliest childhood convince me is not the case. And, Sir, with regard to the agricultural labourer—I want to know who it is that represents the agricultural labourer in these agricultural societies. (Hear, hear.) I know that when the originators of the Pro-Corn-Law League Society first met in London, with his Grace the Duke Richmond at their head, there were some persons present to represent the tenants; but it is remarkable that no one appeared to represent the agricultural labourer. There was not one single person deputed by the agricultural labourers to come to that association when it was first formed, and say that the agricultural labourers were in favour of maintaining scarcity as being for their advantage. (Hear, hear.) Well, Sir, there was another statement of my hon. friend the member for Sheffield, which was flatly denied by the hon. member for Lincolnshire. The hon. member for Lincolnshire says, that the declarations of the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government have had no effect on the value of land, and have had no effect on the bargains between landlord and tenant. Why, was there ever such an assertion made before? I, myself, saw in the London papers the other day advertisements for the sale of estates by Mr. George Robins, in which he distinctly stated, as one of the grounds why agriculturists must come forward and give a large sum for these estates, that the right hon. gentleman had declared that the Corn Law of 1811 was a final and irrevocable settlement of this great question. (Laughter.) Why, when we see these things in the public papers, put forward by an eminent auctioneer (laughter), who wants to sell an estate (laughter)—does an eminent auctioneer want to get less for an estate than it is worth? (laughter)—does he not want to get the largest amount which he can possibly obtain? Well, then, I regret to hear these statements, disparaging the importance of her Majesty's Government and the right hon. gentleman; and I must confess that I have observed on this side of the House a disposition amongst gentlemen opposite to put forced interpretations upon the statements of the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government with a view of spreading unfounded reports. (Hear, hear.) I have observed a studied attempt of this kind. Now, Sir, I do not say this for one moment with any desire of fomenting those unhappy divisions which prevail on the Conservative benches. (Hear, hear.) I do not say it with that view, but I say it as a friend of the English farmer. (Hear, hear.) My own interests, and the interests of those with whom I am connected, are all bound up with the agricultural class, and there is no class which I desire to see flourish so much as the agricultural tenantry. Heaven forbid, then, that I should in any place whatever, either in this House or elsewhere, say one syllable disparaging the individual characters of men because they happen to be farmers. (Hear, hear.) But, Sir, I complain of this attempt to misinterpret the right hon. gentleman's statements, because I do feel a great interest in the occupying tenantry of the country. For what is the fact? You are teaching them that the Corn-Law protection is permanent; you are teaching them that the right hon. gentleman has said in this House what he has never said, and what he will not say, viz., that he contemplates the permanence of protection to agriculture, or of the present Corn Laws, or of any other Corn Law. All he has said is, that at the present moment he does not contemplate a change; that he has no measure now to submit. That is a very different thing, however, from the right honourable gentleman getting up and saying that he contemplates the permanent maintenance of the protective principle; and for gentlemen to put that interpretation on his words, and thus to strengthen the error into which the agricultural tenantry have fallen—viz., that it is better to rely upon what Parliament can do for them than to rely upon what their own enterprise and their own industry can do for them—I say that, when gentlemen strengthen that fatal error, they are not acting as the true friends of the farmer; they are not promoting the real and permanent interests of the landed proprietors. But are they in any way advancing the true welfare of the community? (Hear, hear.) Sir, we have also heard a great deal about incendiaryism. The hon. member for Lincolnshire read us a letter upon what the farmers of Suffolk ought to do. He has attributed incendiaryism to distress. And what did he go on to say? He said that the farmer must pay them better wages, and that individuals must do this, that, and the other; by those very expressions showing that he has taken a completely erroneous view of the whole question of wages, and of the contract between the employer and the labourer. (Hear, hear.) Why, people cannot pay what wages they please. It is not in the power of individuals to regulate wages. There may be a state of distress in this country produced by your laws and your systems over which landlords, farmers, and labourers have no control whatever. (Hear, hear.) You may have placed it out of the power of the farmers in particular counties to employ labourers. It is my belief that you have. It is my belief that there is a redundant population; it is my belief that there is a pressure upon the means of subsistence, that men who are competing with one another for work will hire themselves for the smallest possible wages which will enable them to live. Therefore do not let us talk of what individuals can do, but let us consider whether there are not some causes arising from our legislation which produces this discontent and this distress in the country, which apparently has within itself all the resources of happiness and prosperity. It is, indeed, remarkable that incendiaryism should prevail in these three particular counties, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex, because these three counties are the very counties of all others in the United Kingdom where protection is supposed to be the most effective for good. (Hear, hear.) These are grain-growing districts to a great extent; they are districts in which you principally grow wheat and barley, which, under the Corn Law, receive so large an amount of protection; and they are districts also in which you have all those means and appliances in the greatest abundance, which you frequently tell us are essential to the morality and good conduct of the population. Why, Sir, there are no counties in England in which the clergy so abound as in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk; so much so that it is the practice of friends of mine, when they have met a person with whose occupation they have not been acquainted, dressed in the garb of a gentleman, to conclude at once that he is a clergyman—to such an extent does this class abound. Yet, notwithstanding the means and appliances for good which exist in these counties, you have there a system of the most awful crime—for what crime can be more awful and more appalling than incendiaryism. And, Sir, I have undertaken, and I trust I shall soon have it in my power, to move for a committee to inquire into the state of the poor in those counties, in order that we may know what are the causes of this incendiaryism. (Hear, hear.) I must say we have a right to ask the right hon. gentleman the Home Secretary, that we should be allowed to live in peace without danger of our property being burnt or our lives endangered. I utterly repel those insinuations which have been thrown out, I must say, in a manner unworthy of him, by the President of the Board of Trade, that this incendiaryism must be the result of agitation against the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear.) Sir, I say that that insinuation is unworthy of the right hon. gentleman. (Hear, hear.) I defy him to produce the smallest atom of proof that any incentive to crime has been thrown out in those counties by any of the advocates of freedom of trade. I should think it unworthy of myself if I had attributed to the society for maintaining a scarcity any such effect (hear, hear), although that society has agitated those counties far more than the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Hear, hear.) For one placard which the Anti-Corn-Law League has stuck on the gable-ends of houses, the society for maintaining a high price of corn has circulated, I venture to say, six or even ten; but at the same time, although you have been agitating the country—although you have been telling the labourers and the farmers that the interest of the community depends on the high price of corn—I should be ashamed of myself if I could insinuate for one moment that its members had incited any person to set fire to property, with a view of promoting their own ends. It might, indeed, be said that the agitation of the Pro-Corn-Law League Society had induced persons to destroy corn, with a view of promoting their own interest; because your doctrine is, that the less corn there is in the country the more the labourer will get; that the less the whole the greater the parts. That is the doctrine which we have heard explained by the noble lord the member for East Suffolk, because he says the dearer corn is, and the less there is of it in the country, the more the labourer will get for his share. (Hear, hear, hear.) A labourer of distribution must be strange, indeed, if such be the result of scarcity. Whatever may be the rate of wages produced by the alterations in the price of provisions, I will venture to assert, without fear of denial, that in no case will you find that, during the cheap year, the wages of the labourer have not given him a greater command over the necessities and comforts of life than he had in the dear year. Be the wages what they may, you will find on the whole that in the cheap year he has more of the comforts and necessities of life, and especially a larger quantity of bread, than in the dear year. This, Sir, I believe to be the fact. But the right hon. gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, in his speech last night, seemed to think that my hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton was not entitled to come forward and ask for an explanation of the grounds on which protection is based; that he was not entitled to ask from year to year the reason why you interfere with the Corn Law. He said that if we would refer back to "Hansard's Debates," and look back to speeches which had been made at various times in Parliament and in other places, we should find that it had been frequently and clearly explained what were the advantages of protection, and that it was unreasonable in the hon. gentleman to ask him (the President of the Board of Trade) again to go through the various advantages conferred upon the community by interfering with the corn trade. Now, I confess I have read a good deal on this subject, but amongst all the speeches which have been made I cannot find one in which these advantages and benefits are clearly set forth. The right hon. gentleman and others say that we are visionary theorists—that we are schemers, and that we are not entitled, without proving the disadvantages of the Corn Laws, to come forward and call upon the Government to show its advantages. Now, I take a completely different view of this question. I say that the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, and those who maintain the Corn Laws, are visionary schemers. You interfere with what is the natural course of things. You come forward with a subtle and refined scheme of what is called an ascending and descending scale of graduated duties, for regulating the importation of foreign corn, and you say that it is a beautiful and ingeniously-contrived plan for making mankind happy, and trade and agriculture prosper. Now, Sir, I have no confidence in this subtle and refined scheme. I do not agree in the extreme opinions which the right hon. gentleman holds as to the results which he can produce in the state of society by this ingenious device. I prefer trusting to a plan based on common sense; I prefer relying upon the natural course of events—on the operation of men's interests, on their actions rather than upon the operation of this beautifully-contrived, but, as I think, visionary scheme, which the right hon. gentleman supports, but which I hope will not be very long maintained in this country. Now, I say, that the right hon. gentleman is the man of extreme opinions. (Hear, hear.) He holds extreme opinions of a device and mere scheme; and when we look around we do not find that those evils which the scheme is designed to prevent, exist. Well, then, the noble lord the member for the city of London has extreme opinions in favour of what may be accomplished by a moderate fixed duty. Now, I do not think that society will be made happy; I do not think that trade will flourish; I do not think that agriculture will be improved; I do not think that society at large will be advanced in social welfare, by this scheme of a moderate fixed duty. (Hear.) I will prefer, instead of them, to allow men to follow their own interest in their own way; to buy where they can buy cheapest, and to sell where they can sell dearest; taking it for granted that Providence has intended that that course, and by that course alone, society should flourish, and mankind become happy and prosperous. That, Sir, is the view which I take of this question, and I must, therefore, altogether repudiate the notion, that hon. gentlemen on this side, who come forward and ask for a total repeal of the Corn Laws, are visionary schemers—nothing of the kind. (Cheers.) It is you who are visionary schemers. You interfere with the natural freedom of industry to which men are entitled; you do not prevent misery, you do not prevent distress, you do not prevent great fluctuations in the price of corn, and we have a right, therefore, to call upon you to desist from interfering; and, if you do not desist from interfering, we have a right to call upon you to explain clearly and definitely what are the advantages which you profess to confer upon society by those subtle schemes of yours; and if you fail to prove the advantages, I say we are entitled to demand of you the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. Now, with regard to the particular class with whom I am connected by representation in this House, I mean the manufacturers of Manchester, I want to know,—as you tell me that the Corn Law, in some way or other, benefits all classes of society,—I want to know how it benefits them. (Hear, hear.) I want to know what is the advantage which is conferred upon the export manufacturer of this country by the impediments which you throw in the way of his operations. You say that he gets an advantage of some kind by the sale of his goods in the home market; that, I believe, is the argument. (Hear, hear.) But I want to know whether, when a buyer goes from a town in Norfolk—I will take, for instance, the town of Norwich—to buy a bale of cotton goods in Manchester for the purpose of retailing them in Norfolk—I want to know whether he will give any more for that bale of cotton goods than a buyer would give who bought those cotton goods for the purpose of selling them in America. There is the hon. member for Dorsetshire: I have no doubt that he buys cotton goods, or at least that his tenants or labourers do in the neighbouring village. I want to know whether, when a party in that village goes to Manchester to buy cotton goods, he will give more for them than a person who wishes to sell them in New York; and if he will not, I want to know what is the advantage which the Corn Law gives to the manufacturer over what it is called the foreign trade. (An hon. member: "Oh, oh.") Unless the hon. member will give more for the goods, I really cannot see what peculiar advantage the manufacturer gains. If he can prove that I am wrong, I shall be happy to admit it; but I cannot see what advantage you give the manufacturer over another person if you do not give him more for his goods. (Hear, hear.) But then reverse the case. You expect that the Manchester manufacturer should give you a great deal more for your wheat than the New York dealer in wheat would charge. (Hear, hear.) You will not give him one farthing more for his bale of Manchester goods. No; you know full well, though you profess not to know it, that, inasmuch as these goods are exported to all parts of the world, the foreign price governs the home price. You get them, therefore, at the same price as the foreigner gets them, and you take from the manufacturer a great deal more for your wheat than the foreigner would sell his wheat for. Why, this appears to me to be a very odd sort of reciprocity, or home trade, or whatever it may be called (hear, hear); indeed, I think it has been well described by the noble lord the member for Sunderland as no better than robbery. (Hear, hear.) I say that when a manufacturer works up cotton into cotton goods it is his own property, and no one else has any right to interfere with it. I will take a piece of cotton goods belonging to a Manchester manufacturer, and I defy the hon. member for Dorsetshire to show that he ever had any property either in the raw material, in the capital which purchased it, in the persons who worked it, or in the machinery which was used in the production of the article? (Hear, hear.) I want to know, then, if he has not a particle of property in the matter, how he can reconcile it to himself to say, "I am entitled, because I am a proprietor of land, to prevent the manufacturer from exchanging his cotton goods in the foreign market for that produce which the country most needs?" Can it be said for one moment that the landed proprietors of this country, because they are proprietors, have any property in the industry of other men? Can it be said that they have any right, as landed proprietors, to interfere with that property? The manufacturers and the working classes now come to the House very much in the same position as Catholics and Dissenters did in former times. (Hear, hear.) They come to this House complaining of disabilities; they say, "We are persons living by our energies, by our talents, and by our capital; we are not owners of land; we live by commercial exchanges. Trade is a legitimate and proper calling, and one which is within our reach—it is a branch of business that we can follow. But you have laws—not for the public service, not for the public revenue, not for state necessity, but for the advantage of a particular class—which prevent our following these pursuits and this business which Providence has placed within our reach." Now, I ask any gentleman in this House what is the plea which you can possibly set up for interfering with this freedom of exchange on the part of your fellow-subjects? They are Englishmen, owing allegiance to your Sovereign, paying your taxes, obeying your laws, and demanding as their right the true protection of your laws, namely, that their property should not be interfered with. Their property consists also in freedom of trade. They do not wish to interfere with your estates; all they ask is that you should be satisfied with your estates. You bought, you inherited, you possessed the estates; but you never bought, you never inherited, you never possessed the right to tax other men because you held those estates. You are entitled to the full possession, the tranquil possession, of the property which you hold; but you must give up what is not your own, and what you now hold simply by virtue of the political power which you possess in this country, enabling you to take a portion of the earnings of the labouring classes in this country—a large slice from the loaf of the poorest subject in her Majesty's dominions. That is the matter of fact as connected with this question (hear, hear); and I call upon the right hon. gentleman (Sir R. Peel), and I call upon the Paymaster of the Forces (Sir E. Knatchbull), after their long experience, and by the repeated arguments on both sides of the question which they have heard in former Parliaments as well as in the present—I call upon them, once for all, to come forward and say what is the ground upon which the landed proprietors of this country claim for themselves, as a matter of justice, the right of interfering with the freedom of industry. (Hear, hear.) It is a fair question. I well recollect reading at the University of Cambridge, in the works of Dr. Paley, that every restraint was, per se, an evil; and that it was incumbent upon those who maintained such restraint, and upon those who imposed it, to prove its advantage, to prove distinctly and to demonstration, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that a manifest advantage was conferred upon society by such restraint; and he said it was not incumbent upon those who suffered from the restraint, even to prove its disadvantage. Therefore, I am now appealing to you in strict conformity with those principles which I have been taught in one of your universities. I have been taught by Dr. Paley, to ask you—the Legislature, to ask you—the governing power, when there is a restraint which is complained of,—I have been taught by Dr. Paley's philosophy to demand as my right, that the advantage of that restraint should be clearly and explicitly stated; and I have been taught also by that philosophy, that, unless the advantage is clearly and explicitly stated, I am entitled to demand the immediate cessation of that restraint. (Hear, hear.) Now, Sir, we have been told that it is an extreme course, the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. But I am prepared to say, after a full consideration, that with reference even to the vested interests of those who have hitherto been protected, the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws is the best mode of settling the question. (Hear, hear.) In the first place, any other mode of settling the question must still leave something to be done—it must still leave some uncertainty and doubt. No settlement short of that can satisfy the commercial and manufacturing classes, whose rights you have so unjustly interfered with. (Hear, hear.) And, when we come to vested interests, we must consider what is the nature of that possession which has entitled you to plead vested interests. It must be remembered that it has all along been an adverse possession. No time creates an interest where possession has all along been adverse. (Hear, hear.) Was the possession of this Corn Law ever acquiesced in by the commercial and manufacturing classes? Why, at the time when you passed the Corn Law, what was the character of this House? It was a boroughmongering Parliament, it was a Parliament of landowners alone. What was then the qualification for a seat in this House? The possession of land. (Hear, hear.) A man could not take his seat in this House—he could not have a voice in this House—unless he was in the receipt of £600 a year from land. (A voice, "Three.") Were the large manufacturing towns represented when you passed your Corn Laws? (Hear, hear.) Were any means taken to ascertain that there was acquiescence on the part of that large portion of her Majesty's subjects in this interference with the freedom of industry? On the contrary: you passed your laws, and you have always maintained them under a protest. You were told at the time you passed them—you continued to be told throughout their existence—that when other parties had obtained power in the Legislature, they would repeal those laws; so far were they from being acquiesced in. (Hear, hear.) I say then, Sir, that it was an adverse possession, and you cannot therefore plead that time has given you a title. I ask you what consideration was shown for the vested interests of the manufacturing class at the close of the late war, when you passed the Corn Law? Let the hon. member for Dorsetshire consider this. What did Lord Liverpool say? He said that the object of passing the Corn Law, at the close of the war, was that of preventing the settlement between landlord and tenant, which would take place in consequence of the peace. He said in his speech that there were many who demanded inquiry—there were many who asked for delay—there were many who thought it would be better that the country should settle down into this new state of things quietly, without any attempt on the part of the Legislature to alter the position of any new class. But were the demands and entreaties of these different persons attended to? (Hear, hear.) No; you proceeded at once, without inquiry, knowing that you were interfering most materially with the manufactures and trade of the country. I say you proceeded at once to pass this law, simply because you were unwilling that rents should fall from the prices at which they had been during the war, and that there should be that new settlement between landlord and tenant which was expected as the consequence of peace. (Hear, hear.) Well, now, what is this vested interest? You, who so disregard the interests of others, were you not aware, at the close of the war, that the manufacturers of this country would have to contend with the manufacturers of other countries, in a way that they had not had to contend with them during the continuance of the war? (Hear, hear.) Were you not aware that the establishment of peace in the different countries of Europe would cause the manufacturers of those countries to commence new works, and that foreigners would necessarily come into competition with the manufacturers of this country? But did you regard their interest for one moment? No, you at once said, "Rent, rent, rent, that is our point; we will sacrifice all interests to rent, and, having power in the Legislature, we will pass this Corn Law with a view of preventing that settlement between landlord and tenant which we all know must, without that law, be the consequence of peace." This, I believe, is not an exaggerated statement of what took place at that period; and that has been the view taken, as far as I am able to judge from reading its history, in all subsequent changes made in the Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) You have never consulted the interest of any other portion of the community; you have never regarded any entreaties for inquiry; you have never passed any other Corn Law except with the view of keeping up your rents. (Oh, oh.) I conscientiously believe that that is the case. When you talk of abuse, let me tell you that these are plain facts. The most eminent writers have taken the same view of your conduct. It is not the Anti-Corn-Law League merely which says these things; it is not only men who are supposed to be political agitators, violent party spirits, and so on, who utter these expressions; the same view has been taken by men of the highest authority and the keenest judgment; by poets, by philosophers, by men in almost every station of society. I will venture to say that, in all the abuse of the Anti-Corn-Law League, you will not find any abuse equal to that of one of the most eminent poets who have written in the British language, himself one of the landed class. (Hear, hear.) What does he say of your conduct at the close of the war? He says you were

"The last to bid the cry of warfare cease,
The first to make a malady of peace;
For what were all these country patriots born?
To hunt and vote, and raise the price of corn?"

What does he go on to say with regard to the war itself? This language is more violent than any used by the Anti-Corn-Law League; and it is the language of one of the most eminent poets in this country, a man whose works are circulated in all parts of the world. What does he say with regard to your conduct—I mean the conduct of the landed proprietors—during the war? I do not say that his words are true, I only quote them to show that the Anti-Corn-Law League are not the only persons who have used strong language with regard to the landed proprietors of this country:—

"Safe in their barns, these Sabine tillers sent Their brethren out to battle—why? for rent!
Year after year they voted cent. per cent.,
Blood, sweat, and tear, wrung millions—why? for rent!
They roared, they dined, they drank, they swore they meant
To die for England—why then live? for rent!
The peace has made one general discontent,
Of these high-market patriots, war was rent!
Their love of country, millions all mispent,
How reconcile? by re-conquering rent.
And will they not repay the treasures lent?"

That refers to the idea which prevailed that landlords had actually some scheme of avoiding the payment of the national debt:—

"No, down with everything, but up with rent!
Their good, ill, health, wealth, joy, or discontent,
Being, end, aim, religion—rent! rent! rent!"

This noble poet does not even exclude the Church itself from joining with you in this crusade against society for the purpose of keeping up rent, because they, be it remarked, bore an interest in tithes:—

"So Mother Church, while all religion writhes Like Niobe, weeps o'er her offspring—Tithes!"

Now, I know that many excellent men are supporters of the Corn Laws (hear, hear); and undoubtedly there may be numbers amongst the class who support protection who sincerely believe that it is a benefit to the country. I only quote these words to show the position in which you then stood in the estimation of men of high intellect and high talent, who, from their position, were capable of judging of the real motives with which you proposed the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear.) Sir, for one I confess it appears to me that, notwithstanding what may be said about the advance and retrogression of different societies, the time is coming when the community will no longer submit to this gross tyranny on the part of the landed proprietors with reference to the Corn Law. (Hear, hear, hear.) And when it is urged that manufacturers and traders have protection, I reply that in all the petitions which I have had the honour of presenting to this House from the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, and from other parties representing the manufacturing portion of the community, it has been stated that they wish for the total abolition of all protecting duties on manufactures, as well as of all protecting duties on corn. (Hear, hear.) I refer especially to the petition of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, which denies altogether the doctrine of protection, and demands of you freedom of industry for all classes of her Majesty's subjects. (Cheers.) I should not feel that warmth in the subject which I now do if this were not the case. Still, the wrong which you inflict on the community could not be made right by the circumstance that there were other wrongs inflicted upon it; it stands there still to be judged by itself. If you favour some particular branch of industry in which there is no monopolised agent employed, all that you do thus is to raise the price of the commodity to the consumer. But you do not increase profits, or the wages of the person employed, and for this simple reason, that manufactures being open, whilst there is capital in the country, there will be persons ready to embark in them when they find that a particular manufacture produces a higher amount than any other branch of industry. I believe that one object which many propose to themselves by maintaining the Corn Laws is, to secure what has been called by the honourable member for Shrewsbury the predominance or ascendancy of the landed interest, and that the motives of their supporters are rather political than pecuniary. They fear, that if unrestricted freedom is given for the exertion of the energy, enterprise, and capital which are ready to be employed in this country, an equalizing and democratic tendency will be imparted to society, and that they may not be allowed to sit longer in the halls of the Legislature, and enact such laws as accord with their own feelings and interests only. What does the Duke of Wellington, who does not say what he does not mean, assert to be the object of the Corn Laws? The maintenance of the landed aristocracy in their present social position in this country. The right hon. gentleman the Paymaster of the Forces made a similar declaration not long ago. (Hear, hear.) When the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel) comes down to the House, and reads tables of corn imported, and manufactured goods exported, I assert that it savours of the same spirit. It seems to say, "You have so much trade; are you not satisfied? See what we have permitted you to have in reward for your exertions and industry." The real question is as to the amount of trade which these laws have prevented; not what the manufacturers now enjoy, but what they might enjoy under a free trade. (Hear, hear.) Then the noble lord the member for North Lancashire got up a scene yesterday evening, about a petition from the landowners, manufacturers, and farmers of North Lancashire, with 16,000 signatures.

Lord STANLEY: No, no.

Mr. GIBSON: Were they farmers or manufacturers?

Lord STANLEY: There were half the manufacturers of Preston and Blackburn.

Mr. GIBSON: There might be, but I want to know what proportion of the whole 16,000 were manufacturers. I very much doubt, if these persons had known that the petition was for the maintenance of the graduated scale, whether they would have signed the petition. If the noble lord was so confident that protection would benefit the manufacturers, I wish the noble lord, as member for North Lancashire, would rise in his place, and say that he was convinced he conferred a great benefit on his constituents by supporting the right hon. gentleman's Corn Law. Will the noble lord undertake to rise in his place and say that that was his conscientious belief?

Lord STANLEY: Yes, I say so.

Mr. GIBSON: Upon the manufacturers?

Lord STANLEY: I represent agriculturists and manufacturers, and I believe I am conferring a benefit on the manufacturers by doing so. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. GIBSON: I hope the noble lord does not suppose that they will be contented with that explanation. ("Hear, hear," from the Opposition.) I should like to hear from the noble lord the grounds on which he thought so. (Cheers and laughter.) Hon. members may laugh if they please, but the noble lord did state the grounds once. Why? That they might be enabled to keep groves and gardeners. (Cheers.) Considering the position held by the noble lord in this House, we have heard very little from him as to the effect of the Corn Law upon the trading and manufacturing interest. It is true that he did once frighten the agriculturists by his description of Tamboff; but he has never satisfied the manufacturers that the keeping out of corn is for their benefit. I think some are treating this question in a way which amounts to little short of insult. When gentlemen get up, they do not speak to the question. (Hear, hear.) Honourable gentlemen on the Ministerial side are responsible in this matter, for they can alter the law, whilst the Opposition cannot. The right hon. baronet is their leader, because they cannot form an administration out of the Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture. (A laugh, and a voice, "Can you form one of the League?") The right hon. baronet is nearer to the League than he is to the Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture, for he has acknowledged the principles of the former to be right in the abstract, and has professed his belief that they must eventually prevail. The right hon. baronet is responsible for the Corn Law; he imposed it, and he ought to give a distinct explanation of the benefit which it has conferred upon my constituents. The right hon. baronet cannot legislate for a portion only of the community. (Cheers.)

Mr. BANKES dwelt upon the opposite side of the question, denying that the agricultural labourers of Dorsetshire were so badly off as they had been described, and somewhat discursively supporting the protective system.

Mr. HUTT would support the motion of Mr. Villiers, though preferring a moderate fixed duty to total repeal.

At the conclusion of Mr. Hutt's speech there were loud and general cries for Mr. Cobden.

Mr. COBDEN then rose and said:—Sir, it is not my intention to follow the example which has been set by hon. gentlemen opposite [the member for Northamptonshire and other hon. members who followed him], in making this a question merely of the conduct or character of the Anti-Corn-Law League or that of their opponents the Anti-League; but I shall confine myself to the consideration of the influence of the Corn Laws upon the country, and to that alone. (Hear.) If it were not a very trite and familiar illustration of the nature of the expedient which has been resorted to by hon. gentlemen opposite, I should say that their conduct reminds me of the course pursued by a certain defendant, who, having a very bad case, put a brief into the hands of a barrister endorsed in the following manner: "No case; please to abuse the plaintiff's attorney." ("Hear," and laughter.) Hon. gentlemen opposite perceiving they have "no case," find it much more convenient to attack the Anti-Corn-Law League than to attempt any defence of the Corn Law. They are the defendants upon this occasion; the Corn Law is upon its trial, and there is but one way in which it can be tried, and that is by looking to its effect upon the nation at large; and ascertaining not merely whether farmers and farm-labourers have been better off since or worse than before its enactment, whether landlords have been richer or poorer, although these may be very important questions; but the point to decide is, whether the Corn Laws have tended to promote national prosperity. (Hear.) I have never seen more than two modes by which it has been attempted to place the Corn Law upon national grounds. The one is, that it forms part of a general system of protection. I believe the honourable gentleman opposite, who is sitting upon the second bench, uses the phrase "protection to native industry in all its branches." The second alleged reason by which the Corn Law is attempted to be supported on public grounds is, that you cannot keep up your national taxation, and pay the interest of the heavy debt which this country has incurred, without this system of protection. Let us look at the first argument—the allegation of the Corn Law being a part of a system of protection to native industry in all its branches. Is this really the fact? If it be so, I will at once give up my argument. If you can show that you have applied a system of protection to all classes, or if you prove to me that you can do so, then I will give up my opposition to your Corn Law. But have you, in fact, done what you state? Have you protected the exporting manufacturer of this country? An honourable gentleman opposite has referred to an instance, as he states, where a candidate for the Presidency of America went about with banners, upon which were inscribed the motto, "Protection to native industry!" But is he not aware that there are parties in that country situated precisely as our manufacturers are here? They are extensive exporters of cotton, and can have no protection to the produce of their soil. What has been the effect in America of the cry, "Protection to native industry." Why, it has produced precisely the same discord, the same "dangerous combinations" of men there to abolish the system of class legislation as that of which you have complained so much in England. Nay, South Carolina carried on its opposition to the tariff-law to such an extent, that you will remember it issued its act of nullification, threatening that it would separate itself from the rest of the Union. Go again to France, and inquire what has been the effect of your system there. In that country the owners of the soil are most extensively engaged as growers of wine; where is the system of protection to native industry in all its branches which the wine-grower of that country possesses? "No," they say, "our prices are fixed by the markets of the world; you cannot protect us in the sale of our wines, and yet you tax us, and impose a duty upon us for the benefit of a few manufacturers; and then raise the same cry as that adopted by the people of Carolina—'Let us have different zones in this country, and let us have different sets of tariffs, suitable to the productions of each zone.' That is the reason why discord raged, and is still continuing, in America and France, and will rage everywhere where a system of class legislation prevails. It is this evil which is at the bottom of the opposition you are now encountering in this country. It is not the League, but your injustice which is the cause of it. If no League had been formed before for the removal of this great grievance, it is a proof of the want of intelligence and public spirit at that time in that portion of the community who, I believe, were then deeply suffering under this system, but had not the spirit to rise and resent it. And I would ask, how you suppose you will put down this opposition. Is it by calling names, and saying that the League is "an aggressive body?" We say that your law is an "aggressive" law, and we demand that it shall be abolished, because it is bad; show us that the Corn Law is just, and we will dissolve the Anti-Corn-Law League forthwith; but, unless you can prove that, do not deceive yourselves by the supposition—do not delude yourselves by imagining that such a display as we have had to-night—such a childish exhibition, I might say, as you have shown—will have any effect in producing a dissolution of the League. You talk of "protection to native industry in all its branches." I will bring this question home to you, and ask you to show me how you can protect the labourer of this country. I have brought this subject before you on a previous occasion; I will bring it before you again; and depend upon it no vague declaration shall serve you in this case. I demand that you now state explicitly how you can protect the labourer of this country, and what is the nature of the protection you propose to furnish him with. I will meet you on the ground of the poor law in connexion with this question, but you shall not by this means evade the discussion of the real point. We have had many attempts made wholly to get rid of the question at issue, but you shall not succeed in doing so: the matter shall be brought before the country and the House, and the working classes of England shall thoroughly understand the gross imposition which has been practised upon them. With regard to the national revenue, we are told that, without a protecting duty on corn, we cannot pay the taxation of this country. I heard a remark of this kind drop from a gentleman sitting just before me here, who spoke with all the apparent gravity of a man thoroughly convinced that what he was saying was unanswerable. The hon. gentleman said, "You cannot meet the national taxation without a protective duty on corn." Indeed! Then, if we are to be taxed to pay the taxes of the corn-grower, who is to be taxed and pay the taxation of the manufacturers, I should like to know? (Hear.) The hon. member for Dorsetshire has had the candour to admit that he does not pay more for the manufactures which he consumes than the foreign merchant who has to take his goods to a distant market of the world; therefore he cannot protect the manufacturer in that foreign market. I ask you by what process you intend to assist the manufacturers in paying their taxes, seeing that you, the landed interest, are possessed of this Corn Law which enables you to pay them. I have heard hon. gentlemen say, unless you have a high range of prices in this country it is impossible you can meet the taxation. Well, now, does anybody suppose that the Corn Law keeps up the price of anything but corn? You want a high range of prices, you tell me, to pay the national taxation; have you not admitted that manufactures are sold as cheap here as those which are exported to the most remote part of the globe? Yet, out of those unprotected prices for their commodities, taxation is to be paid; and I want to know why you cannot pay your taxation by an unprotected trade in corn as well as we do by our unprotected trade in manufactures? There is a great fundamental fallacy lurking under this argument, that protecting duties tend to keep up the prices generally in this country. The protecting duty on corn has been already demonstrated by the noble lord the member for Sunderland, who has put the question so well that he really has left nothing to say upon the subject. He has shown that these protecting duties lower both profits and wages; and how in the world are those duties to assist the community at large in paying the interest of the national debt? This is an argument, let me remind you, which applies not merely to manufactures and agriculture—for I wish to draw this question out of the mere scramble between manufacturers and landowners. You are losing sight of the community at large—the great bulk of the people—who are neither manufacturers nor landlords, farmers or farm-labourers—I mean the vast body of the population, who, when they come to see the fallacies of your arguments about taxation and general protection, will be the arbiters of this question; they will step in and enable those who stand forth prominently now, because they meet with this impediment to their claim, to resist the aggression to which they have been so long subjected—the great body of the middle classes, from whom they get their income—the proprietors of house-property in towns, the owners of the debt itself—these, I say, are the men who will step in and assist us to put down this great iniquity, when they are convinced of the fallacy which lurks under the fear that this Corn Law enables them to pay the national creditor. I want to know how this system of protection affects the great body of the people who are neither manufacturers, farmers, nor landlords? Why, if you raise the price of your corn, you do not profess to requite them in any way for the taxes which you impose on their food. They are neither farmers, farm-labourers, nor landlords: if you tax them for the purpose of paying your debts and taxes, you make them pay their own taxation and yours too. I verily believe that hon. gentlemen, proprietors of land, have a confused notion in their heads, and seem to think that the "national debt" means private debt, and they mistake that debt for their own individual mortgages. Sir, I have one or two facts to show the way in which high prices of corn have operated on the revenue of this country. I want that to be understood by the people at large; and also by the Government of this country. I have looked through the list of the prices of corn ever since your famous Corn Law of 1815 was passed. It is a very remarkable fact that the price of corn is just a barometer of the state of your taxation; that your revenue declines just as your corn rises in price; and the revenue flows over just as the value of corn falls: so much so, that it is a perfect barometer as to the state of the revenue. Now, I will take the first four years, from 1815 to 1820, during which period the average price of wheat was 81s. 4d., and the farmers and landlords were glorying in scarcity and high prices. What was the effect upon the revenue at that time? Why, there was an annual taxation of £2,400,000, additional, imposed upon the country for the necessities of the state. The next four years the average price of wheat was 54s. 6d., being more than 25s. a quarter less than in the previous period; then came "unparalleled agricultural distress," and yet you had taxes repealed during those four years to the amount of £8,100,000. I come to the next period of an exceedingly low price of corn, and that was in 1833, 1834, 1835, and 1836, when the average price for those four years was 46s. 9d.: lower than it had been for forty years, taxes were repealed during those four years to the amount of £4,500,000 per annum. I now come to the late period of dear years, from 1838 to 1842, during which five years the average price of wheat was 64s. 7d. a quarter, being higher than it had been for twenty years previous. During that five years you had, first of all, 5 per cent. additional imposed on your general taxes, and 10 per cent. on your assessed taxes that fell short; and then you had an income-tax, a tax on coal and other taxes; and the whole amount of additional taxation then laid upon the shoulders of the people of this country during the above five years was eight millions sterling per annum. Thus the revenue of this country—at a time when the rent was rising, when the landowners were laying on extra rents, and when, if we may believe you, farmers were in a state of prosperity—was in a state of depression. Now, during the last year, and up to the present time, when the price of corn has been rather lower, we have again had a season of the remission of taxation; and if prices continue low, you may possibly get rid of the income-tax, and have as good a revenue as before. I want to ask the right hon. baronet, who I presume will favour the House with his opinion on this question, where is the difficulty in carrying out the principle of Free Trade in everything? I wish to state most honestly and emphatically that I stand here as an advocate for Free Trade in everything; and if you will go into committee on the subject of corn, and the rules of the House will permit me to add the repeal of the duties upon every other article that is protected, I will undertake to move its insertion. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord the member for the city of London expressed some surprise that we did not bring forward a Free-Trade motion—that we dealt with corn only. You will recollect that the right hon. baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government told us that it has always been customary to deal with corn differently from every other article. Unfortunately, to our sorrow, we know that to be true; and it is because corn has been dealt with differently from every other article that we have established an Anti-Corn-Law League, attacking the Corn Law only, knowing well that, when we can abolish that enactment, hon. gentlemen opposite will save us the trouble of labouring to procure the repeal of all other monopolies. I say that I am for Free Trade in everything. The right hon. baronet may meet us now, as he once did before, by saying, "This is a very revolutionary proposal of yours." (Ironical cheers from the Ministerial benches.) I hear hon. gentlemen opposite cheering, which shows that there are a great many of them labouring under that hallucination. I wish to show that you can adopt Free Trade in everything, and that there are no national obstacles to its being carried out immediately. I want to prove to you that, barring your own class interest as landlords, farmers, or farm-labourers, there is no national impediment to your carrying out the principle of Free Trade to-morrow. The noble lord the member for Newark (Lord J. Manners) laughs, and throws back his head; I am glad to see that laugh, because it is expressive of incredulity. I know, if he has voted for the Corn Laws, it is because he believed he had national grounds for doing so. I cannot believe him sincere in his professions of humanity if he upholds a Corn Law merely for class interest. I want to show him that you might carry out Free Trade in everything, and that, instead of its being a detriment, it would be a benefit to the revenue. What is the carrying out of Free Trade? Not the removal of all custom-houses, as some have stated is our object. I have heard of honourable gentlemen writing to their constituents, and addressing them personally, saying that we want to abolish all custom-houses. I saw in the Times newspaper—an assumed great authority—in a leading article, that such had been my doctrine; but nothing can be more ridiculous and absurd than such a charge. Free Trade does not mean the abolition of custom-house duties, but merely the taking off imposts which are at present levied only for the purpose of protection. How much do those duties amount to? What is the sum which they yield to the revenue? The whole of the duties paid last year, which may be called protective duties, amounted to £2,500,000. That sum includes your taxes upon corn, timber, silk, and every other item that can by incidence be called a protective duty. Now, I am an advocate for removing the whole of those protective duties; but do not let honourable gentlemen connected with the soil think that we are shielding ourselves now under this Corn-Law question, and that we have nothing more in view besides corn in the list of protective duties which we seek to abolish. They will find that, out of this £2,500,000 paid in protective duties, upwards of £2,000,000 consists of taxes paid on articles that are the growth of, or that come from beneath, the soil of this country. The whole of the duties paid on foreign manufactures do not amount to £300,000 per annum. (Hear, hear.) As it is a very late hour of the night, I will not trouble the House with many figures; but I want to show what these customs his Government will be overthrown, as was the Government he succeeded by the bad harvests we have lately suffered from. I do not wish this law to be repealed in times of excitement, nor do I wish its destruction to be achieved as a great party victory; I would rather it were for ever established by the unanimous verdict of the honest and intelligent classes of the country. We should regard it as a question of great national interest, not as one affecting our own profits or property; we should legislate upon it in such a manner that, laying our hands upon our hearts, we may say that we have dealt with it on great and just principles, with an honest regard to the common good, and not merely with regard to the claims of a particular interest. (Loud cheers.)

Colonel SIBTHORP taunted the League, of course. Mr. VILLIERS, in reply, spoke with great animation, in the midst of a turbulent House. Sir Robert Peel will not soon forget the way in which he alluded to some of the arguments of the supporters of the Corn Law, amongst whom great uncertainty had prevailed as to what would be the character of Sir Robert Peel's speech—whether the Prime Minister would again wander amongst the clouds of Free Trade, or endeavour to unite his party by a similar policy to that of 1839, when he declared his determination to adhere to monopoly. They were gratified; but they could no more depend on the speech of 1844 than on that of 1839—events might compel him once more to abandon his party and his professions, for the distress that led to a new tariff and Corn Law would occur again. They listened to long statements about people working too long, but refused those which showed the consequences of their being fed too little.

The House went to a division, when there appeared—

FREEHOLD VOTES—DISSENTING MINISTERS.

SIR,—Could I trouble you to inform me if it would be worth while to make a claim to vote on the following qualification. I am a Dissenting minister, chosen for life, and receiving the proceeds of the chapel, which is freehold property; beside the above, I occupy and have the produce of a piece of freehold ground adjoining the chapel, for which, up to two years since, £2 per annum were paid rent. The trustees of the chapel have purchased the above piece of ground, and secured it for the minister for the time being.

My impression is that, if I could not sustain my claim as minister and a trustee of the chapel, I could for the plot of ground referred to. I shall be glad to have any advice on the subject you may deem important.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
W. T.

P.S. Since writing the above, it has occurred to me whether it would not be worth while for the Council of the League to publish a legal opinion in reference to the claims of Dissenting ministers, and forward to them. There are little short of 2000 in our denomination (the Independent), and, perhaps, another 1000 among the Baptists, most of whom, I should judge, would go with you in reference to the abolition of the Corn Laws. The "Congregational Calendar," published by Jackson and Walford, St. Paul's Churchyard, would give you the addresses of all, or nearly so, of our ministers.

[The Rev. W. T. has offered a suggestion which is so useful, that we have called the attention of the Council to it. There is no doubt that W. T., and all Dissenting ministers whose endowment and office are of like investiture, has a county vote. "If lands or tenements be held subject to a trust directing the rents and profits, or a sufficient portion of them, to be paid to a party so designated in the instrument creating the trust as to be capable of being distinctly ascertained (as to the person officiating as minister at such a chapel, or to the schoolmaster teaching at such a school, &c.), such person being appointed either for life or for any uncertain period which may endure for life, will be entitled to vote as a freeholder, customary tenant, or leaseholder, according to the nature of the estate held in trust."—MANNING, Jurist, vol. 2, p. 459.]

PROPOSED FREE-TRADE CLUB.

By the following circular which we have received, we are happy to observe that what has always appeared to us a very desirable object is about to be realized. Free-Trade principles have made such rapid progress of late, throughout every part of the country, and among every class of politicians and avocations, that a central metropolitan medium of association has been much wanted; and, from what has recently been apparent, it is not unlikely will be more than ever necessary. The leading enlightened politicians of the Liberal party in Parliament and in the country have given these principles, especially of late years, their earnest attention, and among them are to be found many of the most accomplished political economists and Free-Traders. The speeches of such men as Lord Montagu, Lord Clarendon, Lord Howick, and Mr. Labouchere, are, in themselves, the most perfect specimens of commercial legislative enunciations to be met with in the English language; but, while we say thus much, it has often been made too plain that many of their professed followers have imbibed but little either of their knowledge or their principles on these important topics: topics on which every successful political movement in this country must be based for many years to come. We hear with great pleasure that the list is rapidly filling up with applications, both in town and from the country:—

"Several of the most influential friends of Free Trade have long felt it desirable that some means should be devised for bringing into closer and more immediate contact all those who are interested in procuring the emancipation of British capital and industry from the unwelcome restrictions which have been placed upon their productive powers. They are aware that many distinguished advocates of commercial freedom are spread over the country at great distances from each other, and are anxious to have opportunities of intercommunication, both for the purpose of explaining the evils produced by monopoly in their several professions and localities, and for concerting the means of more effectually bringing their grievances before the Legislature and the country. They therefore propose to establish a Free-Trade Club, which shall supply, at moderate charges, all the usual accommodations of a club, and, in addition, afford the subscribers the advantage of a library of reference, comprising the best works on social and economic science, all the statistical documents connected with the external and internal condition, not only of Great Britain, but of all the foreign states with which we have political or trading relations, and the various documents issued by both Houses of Parliament. The want of such a library of reference has been long felt by every one interested in the cause of Free Trade; the collection of it is obviously beyond the means and opportunities of many individuals, but is clearly within the reach of an association such as that which is now proposed.

"As this club is about to be formed for a specific purpose, it must be well understood that no gentleman is eligible as a member who is not opposed to all protective and differential duties. To this principle he will be pledged by his application to be admitted as a member.

"The following are the names of the gentlemen composing the present committee:—The Earl of Radnor, the Earl Ducie, Lord Charles Fitzroy, M.P., the Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, M.P., John Lewis Ricardo, Esq., M.P., Thomas Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P., Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., and James Wilson, Esq.

"As the object of this club is to associate as many Free-Traders as possible, without reference to the profit of any person or party, the entrance and annual subscription will be fixed at as low a rate as is compatible with securing the comfort and convenience of the members.

"Office, No. 12, Parliament-street."—Economist.

A fine specimen of the celebrated "mummy" wheat is growing fast to maturity in the gardens of Sir Hugh Dillon Massey, Bart., Doonass. The seed was found in one of the Egyptian catacombs, and its produce is superior to any other known, yielding nearly double the number of grains in the ordinary head of wheat.—Belfast Paper.

THE PROVINCIAL PRESS AND THE SUGAR QUESTION.

We have taken some pains to ascertain the opinions of the leading Liberal journals throughout the empire on the recent divisions on the sugar question, and, out of more than a hundred which have come under our cognizance, we have not found ten disapproving of the course pursued by those Free-Traders who supported Sir Robert Peel against Mr. Miles. It is a gratifying proof of the progress of sound opinion to find principle so generally preferred to party and its passions; and the ability with which the several writers have supported their views affords such gratifying evidence of the vast amount of talent engaged in the provincial press that, though greatly pressed for room, we must present our readers with a few extracts, selecting not so much the best as those of most manageable length:—

To ordinary spectators, we repeat, the question bore the aspect of a mere difference of 4s. in the reduction of duties on British and foreign sugars, in which the increase of consumption rendered it probable that the revenue would not be damaged by the one more than by the other, while the West Indian interest would decidedly be benefited. This was a specious bait both to the Whigs, and to a considerable number of the Tories who did not understand the details. It seemed so fair and ingenious in Mr. Miles to invent a measure which should benefit the consumers of this country, give a lift to the West Indians, keep up the principle of protection, and fill the Exchequer so much better than the Government plan, that the innocent public might be pardoned for wondering that, instead of adopting it, when a majority of the House carried it against him, Sir Robert Peel flew into a passion and threatened to resign. But what in reality did this cunning manoeuvre mean? The hon. member for Bristol, one of those Corinthian capitalists of the sugar-hoghead aristocracy, who are equally alarmed for the stability of the constitution, when either sugar duties are touched or droves of foreign oxen invade us, and certainly one of the last men to be suspected of making bonk fide Free-Trade motions, proposed that, instead of the relative duties on British plantation and foreign free-labour sugars being 24s. and 34s., they should be 20s. and 30s. This was the main feature of his proposal. There was, however, a more modest but much more cherished one, to the effect that, with respect to a particular description of sugar, there should be a protecting duty of 14s. This latter clause the mover endeavoured to keep in a more unobtrusive place than its real importance warranted, in the hope, perhaps, that the ignorance of the House respecting the varieties of clayed sugars, and the able mystifications of Mr. John Gladstone's letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would favour him so far as to enable him, by a side wind, to smuggle it through. Its effect would have been to exclude the most costly descriptions of foreign sugar, and virtually to retain the home monopoly to the West Indians, by merely changing the form of the manufactured import. This was the trap laid to catch the Free-Traders, and, at the same time, to cripple Sir Robert Peel. The motive that inspired it was evidently this,—the West Indians, looking upon themselves as ruined, any how, and abandoned by the Ministry of their own choice, laid their heads together to have their revenge, by blowing up his Government, at the same time taking their chance of jockeying through their 14s. protective clause in the mélée. It was a motion well suited to catch all the insubordinate grumblers of the Tory party, consisting of the "Young Englanders," the bigoted Corn-Law squires, who have their grudges to pay off, and the Whigs; and, had matters proceeded in the way in which the mover had a right to anticipate, it would have effected its desired end. But the result has showed to Mr. Miles that no reliance can be placed on his battalion, who are as ready to leave him in the lurch to-day as they were to desert from their former leader yesterday. They have shown their teeth, but dared not bite; and, like well-whipped hounds, have retreated into their kennel at the voice of the huntsman.—Liverpool Mercury.

The reasons which the Opposition leaders assigned for supporting Mr. Miles were, that the lower rate of duty would be a relief to the consumer, and also, by increasing the consumption to the producer,—that they totally disapproved of the Government principle of distinguishing between sugar the produce of free labour and of slave labour,—and that the different duties proposed by Mr. Miles on raw and clayed sugars were fair, as the two articles were of very different value. To this, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Milner Gibson, and others, replied that the intention of Mr. Miles, beyond all possible doubt, was to get a higher "protection" for colonial sugar than the plan of the Government gave them,—that the planters believed the amendment to give a higher "protection,"—that that increased "protection" to the planter, must necessarily be at the expense of the consumer,—that the effect of the amendment would be to establish, not only for the present year, but permanently, a difference of 14s. per cwt. between the duty on foreign and colonial sugars,—and that this would be to take 4s. per cwt. more either out of the pockets of the consumer or out of the public revenue, and to put it into the pockets of the planters. We think this view is sound. It appears to us that, so far the comparative rates of duty are concerned, the Government plan is the better, as being less protective, and a nearer approximation to Free Trade. True, Mr. Miles proposed a lower absolute duty for this year; but the all-important point in the eyes of the planters is, the relative amounts of the two duties,—the proportion between them, which decides the amount of protection to the planters. Government admitted its intention to make a great reduction of the sugar duties next year, if the income-tax should not be repealed, but keeping the same proportion as now proposed between the duties on foreign and colonial; and the planters, anticipating this, wish to have the duty on foreign sugar as high as possible, and that on colonial sugar as low as possible. This is the motive of Mr. Miles's motion; and if he and the planters are right in their expectations, then the body of the Whigs have fallen in the trap set for them, and have voted for a higher discriminating duty than was proposed by the Government. Such is our view. We think Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Cobden right, and Mr. Labouchere and Lord John Russell wrong. Of course our approbation does not extend to the Government plan of excluding the sugars of Brazil and Cuba.—Leeds Mercury.

So far as the interests of the public are concerned, there appeared to us but extremely small difference between the Government proposition respecting the sugar duties and that of Mr. Miles, on which it was defeated. While the former provided a duty of 34s. on free-labour foreign sugar, and 24s. on West India, the latter proposed 34s. on free-labour foreign of the better sort, 30s. on the more common, and 20s. on West India. This seemed to some a better plan, because it apparently reduced the duty 4s. But the fact is, two-thirds of the sugar consumed in this country is that of the better sort, on which the 34s. was proposed; so that the plan of the hon. member would have established for the most part a protective duty of 14s. in favour of West India produce, instead of 10s. as proposed by Government; and the 4s. apparent reduction would, therefore, go into the pockets, not of the consumers, but of the West India planters, and injure, at the same time, the revenue. For this reason we are inclined to think that those Free-Traders who opposed Mr. Miles's motion acted perfectly consistently, although, at the same time, we cannot wonder that the apparent reduction of 4s. in the duty should have presented an irresistible attraction to those of their colleagues who did not do so. On a cursory glance, it certainly did seem somewhat strange that some of our anti-monopolist friends should have voted one way, and others directly the reverse; but the cause is very clear when the adverse propositions are examined. Both plans are improvements on the old system of the sugar duties; and both, therefore, evidence of the gradual progress in high quarters of the Free-Trade cause.—Doner Chronicle.

Thirteen Liberals voted with Ministers on Monday evening. These men have been "considered supporters of Free Trade;" and here they deserted their cause. This is the insinuation thrown out. Now, in our mind, they are the men who have done themselves honour, in this case, as the true supporters of Free-Trade principles. Richard Cobden, the intrepid and powerful advocate of commercial freedom, a deserter of the cause! He has done himself high honour by the course he has taken. He voted, not factiously, but upon principle; and he stood aloof from associating himself with the bigots and monopolists, when they were struggling for mora protection. We feel satisfied that he will only stand the higher for this conduct; and, if we are to form any judgment from what we have been able to collect of the public opinion, we feel convinced that the true state of the case is pretty well appreciated, and that the intelligent and sober-thinking Liberal classes do not sympathize with the unseemly combination of Liberals and West India monopolists on this occasion. Mr. Cobden and the League are attacked, however, in the worst spirit, in an article which we copy from the Morning Chronicle. We are told that Mr. Cobden threw his "ample regis" over "the sliding scale;" and that he and the few other Liberals who voted as he did "have slipped in between the chances of Lord Spencer and no duties upon corn," and "the chances of Lord John Russell and moderate fixed duties," or, at least, of a reconstructed Cabinet, "on principles far more favourable to Free Trade than is at present the case." So, according to this authority, Mr. Cobden should have voted wrong, in order to turn out Sir Robert Peel. The morality of this style of reasoning is not at all doubtful; and the absurdity of the conclusion is apparent. Only think of the extravagant notion, that Lord John Russell or Lord Spencer could take office upon the strength of a solitary majority, composed of Liberals and West India monopolists! Then, as to "Lord Spencer, and no duties upon corn," the notion is more extravagant. Greatly should we rejoice if Lord Spencer were in office, with a "no-duties" majority at his back; but, that the yearnings of party should cause the Chronicle to overlook the actual state of affairs, and imagine that, if the Liberals, aided by sixty monopolists, would force Sir R. Peel to retire, the leader of a minority could take his place, seems extraordinary. Lord Palmerston sufficiently exposed the folly of such an expectation.—Northern Whig.

In dealing with the sugar taxes, Sir R. Peel very properly proposed to reduce the prohibitory tax, imposed for the sole benefit of a few hundred persons. But though abolishing the prohibitory tax, he still retained a double tax; first the Government tax of 24s. the cwt. on West India sugar, and next a further tax of 10s. on other sugars, for the benefit of the West India landholders, by keeping up the price of their sugars. This second tax, these once slave-holding men of the sugar hoghead, who got twenty millions from a servile Parliament for their human cattle—this bonus of 10s. from the people—the cornorant interest deemed too little; and though, as we have said, the most profligate supporters of the most profligate Ministries, yet the moment their monstrous monopoly was touched they rebel against the Minister, and seek to make the 10s. additional duty 14s., by reducing the tax on their own sugar, leaving the tax on foreign sugar as before; that is to say, they would have their sugar taxed 20s., and the foreign sugar 34s.; so that foreign sugar could not be consumed till the price of it had been raised 14s. per cwt. above its value in the market, which, as it must be obvious, is making every hundred weight of West India sugar cost 14s. beyond its value, over and above the Government tax.—Oxford Chronicle.

The real question is, whether the proposed reduction of duty on colonial sugar would have occasioned any reduction in the price of sugar. Believing that it would not; that it would have been all pocketed by the colonial interest; and that £700,000 a year would have been lost to the revenue, to be made up either by fresh taxes, or by the continuance of others that might be repealed, we rejoice that Mr. Cobden and his friends have, in the face of the whole country, and in the most impressive manner, given proof that they regard the expression of principle as infinitely superior to all party considerations.—Manchester Times.

The Morning Chronicle of Wednesday contained a genuine Whiggish article. The Whigs are doubtless mortified that Mr. Cobden and other Free-Traders did not vote with them on Monday; but, notwithstanding any mortification which the Whigs may experience, the Free-Traders will pursue their own course, and, in despite of all opposition, will accomplish their object. Mr. Entwistle on Monday stated that he voted against Government on the previous Friday because less protection was afforded to the West Indian interest by their measure than what the member for Bristol proposed to give; and because such was the real state of the case, Mr. Cobden voted with Sir R. Peel. In principle, as it appears to us, Mr. Cobden was right. But, says the Morning Chronicle, the League possibly stood betwixt Lord Spencer and a total repeal—betwixt Lord J. Russell and a fixed duty. That the League will always stand betwixt Lord J. Russell and a fixed duty is certain; that it stood betwixt Lord Spencer and a total repeal is mere sledge, as the editor of the Morning Chronicle well knows. If principle were not to guide members as it ought and will guide the Free-Trade ones; if only the result of a vote is to be looked at, why, then, we at once say the Free-Traders had not the smallest inducement to assist in overturning the present Ministry. It is certain the Free-Traders are not now prepared for an election; after one other registration they may be so, but certainly after two; and to turn out Sir R. Peel at the present time would not be of the slightest service to the cause. On the contrary, we feel tolerably certain that he is the man, who, with the least popular commotion and coroneted opposition, will abolish the Corn Laws and all other monopolies. But whether this be the case or not, no cajolery or taunts of the Whigs will cause the League—composed as it is either directly or indirectly of such a large proportion, probably a majority of the electors, certainly of the inhabitants of the principal towns of the empire—to abate one jot of its claims.

With men not bound by party, but determined to act in accordance with the dictates of their consciences and the conclusions to which they arrive, such a division on the part of the Free-Traders was, under such circumstances, sure to occur; but what shall we say of the Whigs? As one man they were united in favour of Mr. Miles's amendment. The question with them was purely a party one. To mortify Sir R. Peel and to damage his Government was, we believe, their sole object. If this were not the case, the same division of opinion would have been observable amongst them as well as amongst the Free-Traders. Sir R. Peel, we are disposed to think, is a better Free-Trader than the Whigs, and certainly has done, and is doing, a great deal to bring it about; whilst Lord John Russell appears now as if he were not unwilling to ride into office on the shoulders of the fierce monopolists. Sliding scale or nothing, is Sir Robert Peel's motto; and, as every move he makes is in the direction of Free Trade, it must be becoming evident to the most obtuse of the monopolists that, if he continues in office and the pressure from without increases, he will be the instrument by which the extinction of monopoly will be accomplished. Hence arise the hopes of Lord John Russell; he flatters himself that, sooner than lose everything, the monopolists will accept him and his fixed and differential duties. There is but one course for the Free-Traders to pursue, if they wish to win, and that is, to make their object no party affair, but to be ready to support the man and the party who will give the people entire freedom of trade.—Bolton Free Press.

We cannot blame Mr. Cobden for the course adopted by him on these divisions—it was mainly and honest; and however glad we should be to find the truckling, expediency-loving, time-serving, and unprincipled Ministry shivered to pieces by the all-potent energy of public opinion as exercised through the people's representatives, we yet value too highly the principles of justice and truth to desire the attainment of this result by any but the fairest and most legitimate means. We trust that those who have any apprehensions that the Free-Trade leaders seek any purely party or political object in the present great national movement, will have those apprehensions removed by the division-lists this week. The Free-Traders have nobly vindicated their principles, although by doing so they have saved the Ministry from a second defeat, and the resignation which must inevitably have followed.—Sunderland Herald.

The Government proposition appears to many equally liberal with the amendment of Mr. Miles, as tending to discourage slavery at least in its direct and ostensible operation, as creating a less differential duty, and as pointing towards Free Trade, although by no means going so far as desirable in that direction. On the other hand, the amendment proposes a larger reduction of the duty, the benefit being, it is calculated, at the rate of one penny per pound to the consumer of sugar, while on the Government plan it would only amount to one halfpenny. But the difference would constitute a bonus to the West Indian proprietors who have already received twenty millions of the public money, and the deficiency in the revenue would be made up by additional imposts, or by the retention of the income-tax. We are inclined, then, to think with Mr. Gibson, that the amendment was "a trap set up by the West Indians for the Free-Traders." If so, most of them have fallen into it.—Kent Herald.

The Morning Chronicle, and the other thick-and-thin supporters of Lord John Russell and the Whig leaders,—who hope to form the first Government after Sir Robert Peel shall be turned out—have expended much of their indignation against Mr. Cobden and the other chiefs of the League, because, from their having honestly voted for the Premier's proposal regarding the sugar duties—as being, in their estimation, a nearer approximation to Free-Trade principles than the counter-proposal of the West-India proprietors, made through one of their own number, Mr. Miles—the Tory Government were saved from a defeat which, in all probability, would have terminated in their retirement from office, and thus have opened up to the Whigs a prospect of once more having the loaves and fishes to distribute among their hungry followers. The bitterness of the Morning Chronicle against the League is boundless; and we have no doubt that the lesser lights of the old Whig party throughout the provinces will follow in its wake, and try to conceal the real merits of the question, in order to defend the conduct of Lord John Russell and his friends. But that Mr. Cobden and the other leaders of the League—in supporting Sir Robert Peel's proposal, as against that of Mr. Miles—acted in strict conformity with Free-Trade principles, there can be no room for doubt. It follows, as a necessary consequence, that Lord John Russell and the Whig leaders—in uniting, as they did with Mr. Miles and the section of rabid high Tories who complained of Sir Robert Peel's measure as being too liberal, and who brought forward and supported the counter-proposition avowedly on the ground that it would afford more protection to the West Indian interest—acted in utter inconsistency with Free-Trade principles, and in opposition to the best interests of the public.

It is plain that, in these circumstances, nearly all the free-labour sugar would be imported as "clayed," and would therefore pay the 14s. duty; and hence that the West India monopoly would be kept up, and this country injured to a much greater extent by the proposal of Mr. Miles than by that of Sir Robert Peel. We rejoice that the leaders of the League have had the penetration to discover the trick attempted to be played off on them for selfish and party purposes; and that they have had the moral courage to denounce the insidious proposal. It will raise them higher than ever in the estimation of the country, when the question is properly understood.—Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle.

Although some of the Liberals were caught in Mr. Miles's cunning trap, we rejoice to think that Mr. Cobden and the principal leaders of the Free-Trade movement were not lured into a false step by the bait offered to them. They saw through and rejected it. They might have broken up the Government; for if their votes had been given against Ministers on Monday night, the majority would have been against Government, and resignation, according to Sir Robert Peel's threat, must have followed.—Carlisle Journal.

THE PREMIER AND HIS PARTY.—Since our last Mr. P. W. S. Miles, M.P. for this city, has signalled himself by coming forward in the character of soft-sugar champion, and has done battle gallantly in defence of wronged and injured "white clays." The hon. gentleman was quite at home amongst the hogsheads, and astonished the House by the amount of erudition he displayed respecting brown, muscovado, clayed, China, Java, and Manilla sweets. Mr. Miles and his family are, as is pretty well known, in the West-India sugar line: the hon. gentleman thought that Government did not give him protection sufficient, so he threw down his gauntlet and determined to have a tilt with the Premier. For a young knight he certainly did not acquit himself amiss. The cause of quarrel afforded another illustration of the saying, that "there is nothing like leather." Mr. Miles is a Conservative of the first water—"devotedly attached to our glorious constitution," and "all that sort of thing;" but, in the present instance, Mr. Miles had to choose between Conservatism and the price of sugar—between Peel and his own pocket. Mr. Philip Miles did not hesitate for a moment, but, taking "No. 1" for his motto, he laid his lance in rest and nearly upset his own leader! * * *

It must not, however, be supposed that Mr. Miles found himself in the lobby with the Liberals in consequence of any change of "principles." No; it was altogether an affair of the pocket. He proposed a 4s. per cwt. less duty than the Minister, but reserved 4s. extra differential duty for his own benefit. The thing, in a trade point of view, had been very well managed at the West-India House, and almost upset the Minister, who was merely saved by the votes of Mr. Cobden and his friends!—Bristol Mercury.

In another article at foot, we have attempted to give our readers a clear and definite statement of the question as it now stands; and, in order to do so the more effectually, we have availed ourselves of the assistance of our very able and well-informed contemporary, the Economist, from whose pages we have transferred some detailed figure statements, that present the subject in an explicit and tangible form. Those who are disposed to blame that section of the Liberal party who voted with Government on this question, have only to study the facts and figures there detailed, and they will find in them ample reason for the course pursued by the members alluded to. Had the bearings of the relative propositions been as clearly and definitely mastered by the House before the debate, as they have since become, we may venture to assert that, whatever might have been the party result, the division-list would have presented a totally different aspect, as far as the relative arrangement of names is concerned.—Sussex Advertiser.

AGRICULTURE.

A CRY FROM THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.

The most remarkable Anti-Corn-Law meeting which has yet occurred took place last week at Lyneham Green, in a remote village of the rich pasture vale of North Wiltshire. It was attended by ONE THOUSAND MEN, chiefly farm-labourers, who, having heard and spoken of their grievances and sufferings with a temper and in a tone that the agricultural and landed classes in general would do well to imitate, unanimously passed resolutions to the effect that "an immediate and total repeal of the Corn Laws is necessary to prevent the farmers, tradesmen, and labourers from sinking into a state of ruin," and agreed to a petition to Parliament "for the removal of all restrictions from trade and commerce." The meeting then separated with three cheers for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and—as a just tribute to political integrity in high station—with three cheers for LORD RADNOR!! Now, that a number of agricultural labourers should meet and pass such resolutions as these, is alone sufficient to form an epoch in the Free-Trade movement; but when our readers learn the character and peculiarities of the district, and the population where this most significant "FACT" happened, they will agree with us in regarding it as a premonitory symptom of the speedy abolition of the landlords' monopoly. Lyneham is situated in the heart of the dairy district of North Wilts, where nineteen-twentieths of the land all around consist of permanent pasture, applied to the production of cheese, and to fattening cattle. There has been little or no improvement effected in the agriculture of the neighbourhood beyond the original one of laying the land into enclosures. The value of the land, which is considerable, consists entirely in its natural fertility. Though there are a few farmers of capital, such occupiers form the exception, and the majority of the tenants, as in most rich dairy districts, are needy men. Though the district is, upon the whole, thinly peopled, its rural labourers are more than equal to the average employment for agricultural labour, and, as a necessary consequence, wages are always low. Notwithstanding the natural fertility of the soil, the farmers are in an extraordinary degree dependent upon the seasons; for their land being all, or nearly all pasture, and undrained, their ditches unscoured, and their summer "make" of cheese being usually mortgaged to a greater or less extent for the purpose of meeting their Lady-day's rent, they are compelled, whenever their prospects become precarious from too much wet or too much dry weather, as their first and last resource to lessen their not previously superabundant employment of labour. They can neither keep back any of their produce in an abundant year, to countervail, by an increased price, their diminished production in such a season as the present; nor can they afford to incur any extra expense for the purpose of remedying the deficiencies of the year's produce. They are almost to a man yearly tenants, and they conduct their business with the slovenliness and the anxiety to grasp at immediate returns usual with farmers who may be here to-day and gone to-morrow. They apply neither skill nor outlay in the improvement of their stock—a field of agricultural improvement they might cultivate with much profit—and they persist with dogged pertinacity in a system of inferior husbandry by which some of their fathers or themselves made money during the high prices of the war.

Lyneham itself belongs almost exclusively to Mr. Walker Heneage, one of the monopolist members for Devises, who, without being a tyrannical landlord, is meddling and fussy, grants no leases, and prefers the cap-in-hand farmer to the independent capitalist. It need scarcely be said that in such a locality the position of the farming labourer is one of extreme dependence. Knowing as we do the district, we could well understand the distress of the labourers in the North Wilts Vale; but when we read of a Free-Trade meeting of agricultural labourers on "LYNEHAM GREEN," we rubbed our eyes and said, "Is this true?" and being satisfied as to the fact, we ejaculated with heartfelt joy, "then the end of monopoly draweth nigh!!" The pressure upon our space, caused by the report of the debate upon Mr. Villiers's motion in the House of Commons, compels us to postpone until next week an abstract of the proceedings at the LYNEHAM GREEN LABOURERS' MEETING, which we have prepared; but we give the following passages from the remarks of the Wiltshire Independent thereon, which the editor justly designates "an important meeting:"—

"It was an important meeting, and that in the best sense of the word; not, it is true, from any special pomp or circumstances attending it; but because it was a spontaneous exhibition, on the part of the purely industrious classes, of the grievances under which they labour, and of the remedy which they believe might be successfully applied. It is an important fact that 1000 men, chiefly farm-labourers, should congregate together in a thinly-peopled district, and in the face of such a tempest as that of last Tuesday evening, to discuss their sinking condition; and it is a fact which, if properly viewed, will be considered important by people in stations far above any of those who were present on this occasion. Until very lately, persons circumstanced like those who met on Lyneham Green would never have even dreamed of getting up a public meeting to talk over their woes and their wants; but as hunger is said to break through stone walls, so will it drive men to break through those trammels which hitherto kept them back, save at the bidding of those who have looked upon them as their property, to be used for any purpose most congenial to their tastes or wishes. Oh! that is an important meeting at which common farm-labourers and little tradesmen get up in their round frocks and soiled jackets, and publish the fact that potatoes and salt are the only food which their miserable earnings will afford them; at which, out of hundreds of men living in a fertile district, only one labourer could claim the distinction of receiving 8s. a week; 7s. 6d., and even less, being the wages of the remainder,—and these amounts, too, being subject to deductions for lost time, from rain and other casualties, by those who at such rates were fortunate enough to be employed at all.

"We have now before us a list containing the names of eighteen men, living in one parish, with wives, in family varying in number from one to seven, each family averaging six individuals, and whose wages amount in no case to above 7s., but which descend as low as 5s. a week. Where such destitution exists, meetings of the distressed to tell their griefs, and to compare notes, are important. Such meetings will increase. We trust their importance will not be overlooked."

SOUTHPORT.—On the 17th and 18th inst. Mr. Murray, of Manchester, delivered two lectures, in the Assembly-room, Southport, "On the Evils of Corn and other Monopolies." The lectures commenced at half-past seven o'clock each evening. The lectures were listened to with great attention, and the room was nearly filled on both occasions. On Tuesday evening the Rev. George Greatbach, Independent minister, and W. Naisby, Esq., of Belle View Castle (late of Bolton), were on the platform. At the close of the lecture on Monday night Mr. Murray announced that he had just received a letter, enclosing a flash note drawn on the Bank of Economy, value £100. He then stated that he would on the following night read and show the note to the meeting; but on the Tuesday the writer sent an apology, requesting Mr. Murray to return him the foolish note, in lieu of which he sent a sovereign for the Anti-Corn-Law League Fund of £100,000.—Liverpool Mercury.

FREE TRADE IN AMERICA.—At Washington, on the 1st inst., in Senate, Mr. McDuffie's tariff resolution, pronouncing the present rate of duties unjust and oppressive, was taken up and rejected—ayes 18, nays 25.

FOOD DESTROYED BY THE CORN LAWS.—By a return made to the House of Commons about five years ago, it appears that, since the enactment of the sliding scale of 1828, 2130 quarters of wheat, 63 quarters of barley, 783 quarters of oats, 4 quarters of rye, 23 quarters of peas, 38 quarters of beans, 43 quarters of Indian corn, and 26 cwt. of flour, have been abandoned in bond (after having lain on hand, spoiling, till they were not worth the cost of keeping), and destroyed—thrown into the Thames—under the inspection of the proper officers.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, June 29, 1844.

After several positive assurances, repeated at regular intervals, that the League was demolished and defunct, our sage contemporary, the Morning Herald, has again discerned "the downfall of the League" in the division of Wednesday evening. The downfall of the dead is a new phenomenon in the world. To a better reasoner, these repeated semblances of death, leaving all alive as ever, might have suggested the idea, if not of absolute immortality, yet of such vital tenacity as will defy the Herald's sinister auguries. We have shown elsewhere that Wednesday's "downfall" was a very considerable advance on the division of last year; and had it been otherwise, had there been a declining of Parliamentary strength, this would have furnished little ground of satisfaction or security to monopoly. The worth of the debate in the House chiefly consists in its being an indication of the resolution which is formed out of doors. "Perseverance," says the Herald, "is a slow coach." It is a sure one: and the struggle against it is, from the nature of the case, a losing game. So long as it continues, the landowners subject themselves to the inevitable evil and loss of a state of uncertainty. There cannot be confidence in the agricultural body. They walk on quicksands. They sit on gunpowder. Peel's promises are but broken reeds to them. They are cloud-watchers, who cannot reap. There is nothing certain in their prospect but uncertainty; and, were they wise, they would screw up their minds at once to removing the obstacles to that lasting settlement and quietude which agriculture requires above all other occupations.

An odd question is put by our contemporary to himself, and he favours himself with an answer as odd:—

"Why is the principle of protection now as popular generally as a few years ago it was generally odious? Because it has been narrowed to its proper sphere—because now men see nothing protected which ought not for the common good to be protected, and because, too, they feel that all classes share in the beneficial results of that just and moderate protection which each receives. This is the true solution of the downfall of the League: they can no longer avail themselves of the exaggerated folly of high nominal protections, which were endured as long as they were tolerated, only because they were never available."

The Herald has clearer eyes for the past than for the present. It now sees that, not long ago, the principle of protection "was generally odious;" so we used to say, but the Herald then denied the fact. It decides that protection had extended beyond "its proper sphere;" but at that time it abused not only those who opposed it altogether, but belaboured as vigorously whoever desired to contract the sphere of protection. The old law presents itself now as an "exaggerated folly," having been, up to the submission of the Duke of Buckingham to Sir Robert Peel, the very perfection of reason and justice. If the Herald was so grossly deceived, so purblind to plain truths and plainer facts, only four years ago, whence its right to assume a present infallibility? May it not be looking through the same spectacles, and making the same blunders? As its experience confirms our views of the past, it had better trust our reports of the present than its own. Our grandmother's sight fails; she should rely on younger eyes. Her memory, as happens to aged people, is good as to former things, but faithless to events of yesterday.

The general popularity of "protection!" The common conviction that all classes profit by the existence of monopolies! The merchant by his limited markets, the artisan by the diminished worth of his wages, the labourer by his rags and starvation, and the farmer by his burning ricks! Every monkey, by having his own platter filched from, while he filches from his neighbour's, and all have their food spilt or spoiled in the scuffle! To such eyes, we would rather that the League should appear dead than alive, and the cause of Free Trade retrograding than advancing. Their delusions are a testimony to the truth.

No; the monopolists are not elate. They feel that these continual victories will not do. The destruction of the League ceases to be satisfactory when it has to come round once a fortnight. And not very sanguine can those hopes be which have no better basis than the assumed "general popularity" of Protection.

Our adversaries have won a victory in their own House, and they are as little elated by their success as we are cast down by defeat. There was not a rational man among the 328 who constituted the majority that did not feel an inward conviction of his vote having decided nothing beyond the existence of Peel's sliding scale for another season. There was not on either side of the House a single individual who was not convinced that the question was left in a greater state of uncertainty than ever, and that the Premier had only refused to venture in the lottery of legislation to encounter the greater hazards of the lottery of circumstances. To this uncertainty was mainly owing the extraordinary change which has come over the language and bearing of the country gentlemen in the House of Commons: six years ago they took their stand as the only body in the country that had the slightest claim to the special care of the Legislature, and they stated their pretensions with all the self-complacency of conscious strength; now they confess that they hold their protection merely on the sufferance, and at the discretion of a Minister, and that they have utterly abandoned all reliance upon themselves. "The whole of their success," says their great organ the Morning Post, in one of the most lugubrious articles which has yet appeared on the subject, "amounts to a renewed confidence that their situation is not likely to become worse for the present, so far as the Corn Laws are concerned." But are there no ominous signs of a dark futurity? Sir Robert Peel's speech was in substance an echo of that which he delivered in 1839; it was marked by the same vagueness which seemed to say everything, and absolutely said nothing; it paid the same homage to the soundness of Free-Trade principles in the abstract, and exhibited the same shuffling with circumstances as an excuse for not applying them in the concrete; it was marked by the same astuteness as a clever debater, and the same absence of the large and extensive views which belong to the wise statesman. The Tariff was the moral of the speech in 1839, and this recollection made the stoutest monopolist dread that the repetition of this speech might be followed by a repetition of its application.

Twice during this session the existence of Sir Robert Peel's Ministry has been menaced with immediate destruction, and twice there appeared a probability that Lord John Russell would be invited to form a new Cabinet. His lordship's opinions are, therefore, of no little importance in estimating the security which monopoly has gained, and we find him declaring that the sliding scale is so iniquitous and injurious that its removal must be the first duty of a new Minister. During the debate both the Premier and the Vice-President of the Board of Trade took credit to themselves mainly for the reductions they have made in the amount of monopolies, and thus we have it confessed on all sides that no new Ministry can be formed and no present Minister hold office without continued progress in the direction of Free Trade.

Mr. Villiers's reply was still more ominous to the monopolists; in nervous language which sunk deep into the minds of all who heard him, he informed the majority, which bribery and intimidation had arrayed against the cause of truth and justice, that their numerical superiority would avail nothing outside the doors of their House and beyond the exigencies of the present division. Every monopolist felt that the declaration of the numbers would merely herald a renewed struggle; the conviction of the rottenness of their cause was urged most forcibly on the protectionists at the moment that the voices of the tellers were about to make the announcement of their delusive strength.

A majority in the present House of Commons was of course not expected by the League; but they have gained what is scarcely less valuable—a hostile majority tacitly confessing that it maintains abuses which cannot be defended;—and a hostile Cabinet declaring that its legislation is merely provisional, and that it depends upon contingencies which no man can calculate. For the future the length of duration assigned to the Corn Law must be sought neither in the calculations of the politician, nor in the exigencies of the nation, but in the doubtful predictions of Murphy's Almanac.

GAME LAWS.—The Court of Justiciary, by a majority of one, have, by an appeal from the Justices of Lanarkshire, held that a tenant is not liable in the penalty of the day trespass act for taking game on his own farm.

REVIEW.

Contributions to the Eclectic Review by John Foster.
London, Ward and Co.

Although these contributions to periodical literature are not marked by the logical acuteness of Jeffrey, the gorgeous eloquence of Macaulay, or the varied learning of Taylor, they do not the less deserve to be collected and preserved in a permanent form, as examples of honest and earnest criticism, written in a tone of generous feeling and with a high moral purpose. Although the "Eclectic Review" has been almost from its commencement the recognised organ of a peculiar body, it has very rarely exhibited anything of the narrowness of a sectarian spirit: both in the range of its subjects and the temper of its discussions it has displayed a liberal comprehensiveness, which none but those who have had experience in the management of party periodicals can fully appreciate. Mr. Foster was pre-eminently remarkable for supporting his opinions in the temper of a philosopher rather than of a partisan: he narrowed his principles by no sectarian views, but always gave them the full extent and range of general humanity. Some may complain that he fixed too high his standard of excellence, and more will object to the extreme strictness of his rules of morality; but, whatever may be the opinion formed of his weights and measures, there are none who can doubt that his application of them was honest and invariable. There is no part of these volumes so replete with sound instruction as the articles devoted to the character and writings of the celebrated C. J. Fox. In admiration of his principles as a statesman and his powers as an orator, Mr. Foster yielded to none of the most enthusiastic admirers of the great Whig leader; but he could not tolerate the indiscriminate adulation of vices as well as virtues; he could not allow talents however splendid to be pleaded in excuse for private profligacy, nor the mere chance of substituting a Whig Ministry for a Tory to be received as a justification of an unprincipled coalition. The remarks made on the little influence which this English Demosthenes really exercised over the mind of the English public deserve to be impressed deeply on the heads and hearts of those who aim at taking a lead in political affairs:—

"As to his immense display of talent on the wide ground of general politics, on the theory of true freedom and popular rights; on the great and increasing influence of the crown; on the corruption and reform of public institutions; on severe investigation of public expenditure; on the national vigilance proper to be exercised over the conduct of Government; and on the right of any nation to change, when it judges necessary, both the persons and the form of its government;—we have observed with the deepest mortification, times without number, the very slight and transient effect on the public mind of a more argumentative and luminous eloquence, than probably we are ever again to see irradiating those subjects, and urging their importance. Both principles and practices, tending toward arbitrary power and national degradation, were progressively gaining ground during the much greater part of the time that he was assailing them with fire and sword; and the people, notwithstanding it was their own cause that he was maintaining by this persevering warfare, though they were amused indeed with his exploits, could hardly be induced to regard him otherwise than as a capital prize-fighter, and scarcely thanked him for the fortitude and energy which he devoted to their service. He was allowed to be a most admirable man for a leader of opposition, but not a mortal could be persuaded to regard that opposition, even in his hands, as bearing any resemblance to that which we have been accustomed to ascribe to Cato, an opposition of which pure virtue was the motive, and all corruptions whatever the object. If the very same things which were said of Fox had been advanced by the person whose imaginary character we have sketched in the preceding pages, they would have become the oracles of the people from Berwick to Land's End; corrupters and intriguers would have felt an impression of awe when he rose to speak; no political doctors or nostrums could have cured their nerves of a strange vibration at the sound of his words, a vibration very apt to reach into their consciences or their fears; there would have been something mysterious and appalling in his voice, a sound as if a multitude of voices articulated in one; and though his countenance should have looked as candid and friendly as Fox's did, these gentlemen would have been sometimes subject to certain fretful peevish lapses of imagination, much like those in which Macbeth saw the apparition of Banquo, and would have involuntarily apostrophised him as the dreaded agent of detection and retribution. They would have felt themselves in the presence of their master, for they would have been taught to recognise, in this one man, the most real representative of the people, whose will would generally be soon declared as substantially identical with his opinions.

"How then did it come to pass, that Fox had no such influence on the national mind or on the Government? The answer is perfectly obvious, and it forms a very serious admonition to all patriots who really wish to promote the welfare of the people, by an opposition to corruptions of the state. The talents, and the long and animated exertions, of the most eloquent of all our countrymen failed, plainly because the people placed no confidence in his virtue, or, in other words, because they would never be persuaded to attribute virtue to his character."

The principles for which Mr. Foster contends are so important at all times, but more especially at the present juncture of affairs, that we must make room for their more complete exposition, though the length of the extract trenches inconveniently on our space:—

"Public men and oppositionists may inveigh against abuses, and parade in patriotism, as long as they please; they will find that even one manifest vice will preclude all public confidence in their principles, and therefore render futile the strongest exertions of talent; a slight flaw, in otherwise the best tempered blade of Toledo, will soon expose the baffled wight that wields it to either the scorn or pity of the spectators, and to the victorious arm of his antagonist. It has possibly been said, that a man may maintain nice principles of integrity in the prosecution of public affairs, though his conscience and practice are very defective in matters of private morality. But this would never be believed, even if it were true: the universal conviction of mankind rejects it when it is attempted, in practical cases, to be made the foundation of confidence. So far is this from being believed, that even a conspicuous and complete reformation of private morals, if it be but recent, is still an unsatisfactory security for public virtue; and a very long probation of personal character is indispensable, as a kind of quarantine for a man once deeply contaminated to undergo, in order to engage any real confidence in the integrity of his public conduct; nor can he ever engage it in the same degree, as if an uniform and resolute virtue had marked his private conduct from the beginning. But, even if it were admitted that all the virtues of the statesman might flourish in spite of the vices of the man, it would have been of no use, as an argument for confidence in the integrity of Fox's principles as a statesman, after the indelible stigma which they received in the famous coalition with Lord North. In what degree that portion of the people that approved Fox's political opinions really confided in his integrity as a firm and consistent statesman, was strongly brought to the proof at the time of his appointment as one of the principals of the late administration. His admirers in general expressed their expectations in terms of great reserve; they rather wished, than absolutely dared to believe, that it was impossible he should not prefer a fidelity to those great principles and plans of extensive reform which he had so strenuously inculcated, to any office or associates in office that should require the sacrifice of those plans, and that he would not surely have taken a high official station, without some stipulations for carrying them, at least partially, into effect. But they recollected the tenor of his life; and though they were somewhat disappointed, and deeply grieved, to find him at his very entrance on office proposing and defending one of the rankest abuses, and afterwards invariably keeping the peace with the grand total of abuses, in both the domestic and the Indian government, they did, at least many of them, confess, that they had always trembled for the consequence of bringing to such an ordeal a political integrity which, while they had sometimes for a moment almost half believed in it, they had always been obliged to refer to some far different principle from a firm personal morality, supported by a religious conscience.

"We have remarked on the slight hold which our great orator had on the mind of the nation at large; it was mortifying also to observe how little ascendancy his prodigious powers maintained over the minds of senators and ministers. It was irksome to witness that air of easy indifference with which his most poignant reproaches were listened to; that readiness of reply to his nervous representations of the calamities or injustice of war; the carelessness often manifested while he was depicting the distresses of the people; and the impudent gaiety and sprightliness with which arrant corruption could show, and defend, and applaud itself in his presence. It is not for us to pretend to judge of what materials ministers and senators are composed; but we did often think, that if eloquence of such intensity, and so directed, had been corroborated in its impetus by the authoritative force which severe virtue can give to the stroke of talent, some of them would have been repressed into a very different kind of feeling and manners from those which we had the mortification to behold: we did think that, a man thus armed at once with the spear and the scie, might have caused it to be felt, by stress of dire compulsion, 'How awful goodness is.'

"On the whole, we shall always regard Fox as a memorable and mournful example of a gigantic agent, at once determined to labour for the public, and dooming himself to labour almost in vain. Our estimate of his talents precludes all hope or fear of any second example of such powerful labours, or of such humiliating failure of effect. We wish the greatest genius on earth, whoever he may be, might write an inscription for our eminent statesman's monument, to express, in the most strenuous of all possible modes of thought and phrase, the truth and the warning, that no man will ever be accepted to serve mankind in the highest departments of utility, without an eminence of virtue that can sustain him in the noble defiance, Which of you convicts me of sin?"

In his review of a book, which by the way he greatly overrates,—Macdiarmid's "British Statesmen,"—Mr. Foster happily demolishes the fallacy that less rigid rules of morality should be applied to persons in public than in private life:—

"On the ground of morality in the abstract, separately from any consideration of the effect of his representations, the biographer of statesmen is bound to a very strict application of the rules of justice, since these men constitute, or at least belong to, the uppermost class of the inhabitants of the earth. They have stronger inducements arising from situation, than other men, to be solicitous for the rectitude of their conduct; their station has the utmost advantage for commanding the assistance of whatever illumination a country contains; they see on the large scale the effect of all the grand principles of action; they make laws for the rest of mankind, and they direct the execution of justice. If the eternal laws of morality are to be applied with a soft and lenient hand in the trial and judgment of such an order of men, it will not be worth while to apply them at all to the subordinate classes of mankind; as a morality that exacts but little where the means and the responsibility are the greatest, would betray itself to contempt by pretending to sit in solemn judgment on the humbler subjects of its authority. The laws of morality should operate, like those of nature, in the most palpable manner on the largest substances.

"Another reason for the rigid administration of justice to the characters of men that have been high in the state, is to secure the utility of history, or rather to preserve it from becoming to the last degree immoral and noxious. For since history is almost entirely occupied with the actions of this class of men, and for the much greater part with their vices and their crimes, and the calamitous consequences, it is easy to see that a softened mode of awarding justice to these characters will turn the whole force of history to the effect of depraving our moral principles, by partially conciliating both our feelings and judgments to those hateful courses of action, of which we are already very much too tolerant in consequence of being from our childhood familiarised to the view of them, in every account of the past and present state of the world. And in this way we are inclined to think that history has actually been, on the whole, the enemy of morality. Its readers will have too light an impression of the atrocity of great crimes and great criminals. Great crimes constitute so large a proportion of the historian's materials for constructing splendid exhibitions, that if he does not insensibly become almost partial to them, as a general does to a band of the most cruel savages whose ferocity he has repeatedly employed to obtain his victories, his hatred admits at least a certain softening of literary interest; and in many a glowing description of enormous wickedness, we fancy we see the hand of the painter or poet rather than the moral censor. Artful combinations of odious circumstances, epithets to aggravate each indignant line, eloquence of execration, are possibly not spared; but we still find ourselves rather invited as spectators of a splendid tragedy, than summoned as jurors in a solemn court of justice. The diminution or modification, in the historian's mind, of the abhorrence of crimes, in consequence of the benefit which he derives from them as striking materials for his work, aids the operation of any other cause which may tend to render him indulgent to the actor of them. And often the great criminal has had some one virtue, or at least some very showy faults, adapted, in the historian's view, to relieve and even extenuate the account of his wickedness: he might have munificence, a love of letters, a very lofty kind of ambition, or what a lax morality would term a liberal love of pleasure; at any rate he probably had talents, and this is perhaps, after all, the most seductive of the distinctions by which a bad man can dazzle our judgments. The historian, besides, acquires a kind of partiality for an eminent actor in the times and transactions which he describes, from even the circumstance of being, in imagination, so long in his company. In prosecuting his work, he returns to this person each morning, for weeks, months, or even years; the interest of the literary labour consists in following this person through the whole train of his proceedings; the disposition for quarrelling with him gradually subsides; the odious moral features are familiarised to the view; while perhaps the conviction of his great attainments, and the wonder at his achievements, are progressively augmented; extenuations suggest themselves, and occasionally even partial claims of applause; the writer becomes a kind of participator in the activity and importance of the transactions, while he is clear of all the guilt; and thus by degrees the rigour of justice is forgotten, and flagrant iniquity is exhibited with so little prominence of turpitude, that it depends very much on the moral state of the reader's own mind whether he shall regard it with indulgence or detestation. We shall not wonder at the bad morality of history, if we combine this view of the injurious effect of the historian's studies on his mind, with the consideration that the eminent historians of antiquity were pagans, and the most distinguished ones of modern times very near the moral level of paganism, by means of their irreligion."

That skill in moral anatomy which enables a critic to seize the formative elements of character as distinguished from the indifferent or the accidental, was possessed in a very eminent degree by Mr. Foster; we have already seen it rather painfully exemplified in his moral estimate of Fox, and we therefore give a more pleasing illustration of his powers in the delineation of Franklin:—

"In a general moral estimate of his qualities, insincerity would seem to find very little place. His principles appear to have borne a striking correspondence, in simplicity, directness, and decision, to the character of his understanding. Credit may be given him for having, through life, very rarely prosecuted any purpose which he did not deliberately approve; and his manner of prosecution was distinguished, as far as appears, by a plain honesty in the choice of means, by a contempt of artifice and petty devices, by a calm inflexibility, and by a greater confidence of success than is usually combined with so clear and extended a foresight of the difficulties; but indeed that foresight of the difficulties might justify his confidence of the adaptation of his measures for encountering them.

"He appears to have possessed an almost invincible self-command, which bore him through all the negotiations, strifes with ignorance, obtrusiveness, duplicity, and opposing interest, and through tiresome delays and untoward incidents, with a sustained firmness, which preserved to him in all cases the most advantageous exercise of his faculties, and with a prudence of deportment beyond the attainment of the most disciplined adepts in mere political intrigue and court practice. He was capable, indeed, of feeling an intense indignation, which comes out in full expression in some of the letters relating to the character of the English Government, as displayed in its policy toward America. This bitter detestation is the most unreservedly disclosed in some of his confidential correspondence with David Hartley, an English member of Parliament, a personal friend of Franklin, a constant advocate, to a measured extent, of the Americans, and a sort of self-offered, clandestine, but tacitly-recognised medium for a kind of understanding, at some critical periods, between the English Government and Dr. Franklin, without costing the ministers the condescension of official intercourse and inquiry. These vituperative passages have a corrosive energy, by virtue of force of mind and of justice, which perfectly precludes all appearance of littleness and mere temper in the indignation. It is the dignified character of Cato or Aristides. And if a manifestation of it in similar terms ever took place in personal conference with such men as were its objects, it must have appeared anything rather than an ungoverned irritability; nor would it have been possible to despise the indignant tone in which contempt was mingled with anger, as far as the two sentiments are compatible. Believing that the men who provoked these caustic sentences did for the most part deserve them, we confess we have read them with that sort of pleasure which is felt in seeing justice made to strike, by vindictive power of mind, on the characters of men whose stations defend their persons and fortunes from the most direct modes of retribution.

"When, at length, all was accomplished that, with long and earnest expostulation, he had predicted, and been ridiculed for predicting, to the English statesmen, as the certain consequence of persisting in their infatuated course, we find no rancorous recollection, no language of extravagant triumph at the splendid result, nor of excessive self-complacency in the retrospect of his own important share in conducting the great undertaking to such a consummation. His feelings do not seem to have been elated above the pitch of a calm satisfaction at having materially contributed to the success of a righteous cause—a success in which he was convinced he saw not simply the vindication of American rights, but the prospect of unlimited benefit to mankind.

"And here it may be remarked, that his predominant passion appears to have been a love of the useful. The useful was to him the summum bonum, the supreme fair, the sublime and beautiful, which it may not perhaps be extravagant to believe he was in quest of every week for half a century, in whatever place, or study, or practical undertaking. No department was too plain or humble for him to occupy himself in for this purpose; and in affairs of the most ambitious order this was still systematically his object. Whether in directing the constructing of chimneys or of constitutions, lecturing on the saving of candles or on the economy of national revenues, he was still intent on the same end, the question always being how to obtain the most of solid tangible advantage by the plainest and easiest means. There has rarely been a mortal, of high intelligence and flattering fame, on whom the pomps of life were so powerless. On him were completely thrown away the oratorical and poetical heroics about glory, of which heroics it was enough that he easily perceived the intention or effect to be, to explode all sober truth and substantial good, and to impel men, at the very beat of the matter, through some career of vanity, but commonly through mischief, slaughter, and devastation, in mad pursuit of what amounts at last, if attained, to some certain quantity of noise, and empty show, and intoxicated transient elation. He was so far an admirable spirit for acting the Mentor to a young republic. It will not be his fault if the citizens of America shall ever become so servile to European example as to think a multitude of supernumerary places, enormous salaries, and a factitious economy of society, a necessary security or decoration of that political liberty which they enjoy in pre-eminence above every nation on earth. In these letters of their patriarch and philosopher, they will be amply warned, by repeated and emphatical representations, of the desperate mischief of a political system in which the public resources shall be expended in a way to give the Government both the interest and the means to corrupt the people."

In literary criticism Mr. Foster was not quite so successful as in his appreciation of character: he refused to grant poetic licenses, and was too ready to take the poet's sentiments of fiction for the realities of opinion. Into the wide field of discussion which an examination of this question would open we have not space to enter, and we admire Mr. Foster too much on the higher principles of philosophy and eternal truth to dwell on the minor points of difference which arise in his criticisms of fiction. The present collection is worthy of his fame, and will, we trust, be a permanent and recognised memorial of his services to periodical literature. There are principles enunciated in these papers of value too enduring to be easily lost, and, to use the language of Grattan—"The words of the prophet will not die with the holy man, but will survive his generation."

LEAGUE MEETING AT COVENT-GARDEN.—The following portion of Mr. Fox's speech did not appear in full in our impression of last week—"I have often in this place addressed earnest recommendations to those who assemble here, that they should exert themselves in such ways as their circumstances allow for the furtherance of our cause; that they should pay attention, for instance, to the registration, and do whatever they can to get those who are entitled to vote, and who are friends of our objects, to place themselves in a position for the exercise of their political rights. That they should exert themselves in canvassing, and by the distribution of tracts and conversation spread abroad the knowledge of our principles, and the conviction of their truth. I trust that, as I have been indulged in giving such recommendations to you, the great body of Free-Traders who assemble here, I may also be excused if I venture one word of advice to those who may be regarded as the representatives of this great cause in the House of Commons. For myself, at least, I may say that it would gratify my feelings to see them acting more in concert than they appear to have done upon a recent occasion. (Hear.) If they are but few in number there is the more need of their studying how they can most efficiently co-operate. If the question be one not involving principle, why, then, there is nothing to sacrifice on any part in their combination; and if it be, there can be little doubt that no very long consultation would bring them to the same state of mind as to any great application of the principles of Free Trade. At a time when governments are endangered, and ministries are restored by majorities of twenties and twenty-tens, it is time for the tens and the dozens to look about them, and consider where their weight will be best disposed, and to throw that weight untriedly in one quarter for the common good and advantage of the great cause we advocate. (Cheers.) Most honourably, and with the strictest integrity, I have no doubt, they all acted; but when I see that among some twelve members of the House, who have either occupied that chair or addressed you from these boards, there were no less than three different modes of action adopted—indeed, I might say, five altogether, reckoning the voting in one case, and abstaining in another—I think it is clear that the power which to-night so ably elucidated the subject of differential duties might have led—or they might have influenced each other—to a united mode of action, which would have had its effect both upon Parliament and the country. I question none of their motives, most assuredly, having the firmest confidence in them; nor do I doubt the conduct of any of these gentlemen, but merely the wisdom of such diversity of conduct; with this exception, indeed, that seeing in certain quarters that it is broadly asserted that the League has kept Sir Robert Peel in office, when otherwise he must have forfeited his position, I wish to say for myself, as a member of the League, that I am no party to anything which should tend to prolong for one week, or a single day, a Government which rules Ireland by what is called the judicious distribution of troops; which has made the Post-office of England a great spy-shop; which engages in a vain conflict against those who endeavour to catch the substance of monopoly under the forms of liberalism, and itself merely trying to smuggle a little liberalism, in the shape of monopoly; a Government of subterfuges—a Ministry which has made war with meetings of the people in Ireland, condemning their greatness, which was itself evidence of the great oppression to be redressed; a Government which, I believe, is ready, if it dared, to wage a similar warfare here against the best right of the people, as it does already sympathize within certain boundaries in the monopoly warfare against the first claim of the people to the bread which they earn by their labour." (Loud and prolonged cheers.)

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, June 24.—There was a short supply of Essex Wheat this morning, but there was a fair quantity from Kent; the former was taken off at the same prices as on this day week, but the latter was not all sold at the close of the market, though offered on rather lower terms. There was rather a slow demand for Foreign at former rates. What Barley was offering was chiefly Foreign in granary; it was held at high rates, in consequence of which the transactions in it were limited. The high prices which have been obtained of late for English Beans brought a rather larger supply from Essex and Kent, and sellers were obliged to submit to a decline of 1s. to effect sales. The prospect of a low duty causes the holders of Egyptian Beans to hold at high rates, and there has been in consequence but little passing in this article. No alteration in Peas. There was a liberal supply of Scotch and Irish Oats, and a few samples of English, both White and Black, but of these the quantity was very trifling, and high prices were readily obtained for them. The quantity of Scotch on sale was larger than it has been for some time, and the price having lately been held in high proportion to other kinds, a decline of 6d. to 1s. per quarter had to be acceded to. There was a fair sale of Irish in small quantities at about last Monday's prices.

FRIDAY, June 28.—With fair supplies of English Wheat since Monday, the trade is very dull both for English and Foreign. The arrivals of Barley from abroad are only moderate, yet sellers are compelled to give way a little in price to effect sales. The arrivals of Oats are not large either from Scotland, Ireland, or abroad, but altogether the quantity is more than equal to the demand. Owing to the favourable change which has taken place in the weather, there is less disposition to buy, and to effect sales rather lower prices must be accepted. There is less disposition to press sales of Irish Oats than of Scotch or Foreign, owing to the latter having less time to discharge from the ship. The duty on Beans fell to 7s. 6d. yesterday, but there was no inquiry for Beans in Bond. Free Beans are dull sale at Monday's prices. Peas are fully as dear. S. H. LUCAS and SON.
