No. 67.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1845.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newell's-building, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

The League Bazaar will be held during the month of May next, in the Theatre Royal Covent Garden.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

Persons wishing to be on the Register next year, as Freeholders for County Votes, must be in possession of the property, or in the receipt of the rents and profits, before the 31st of January.

QUALIFY, QUALIFY, QUALIFY.

PRACTICAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR ELECTORAL QUALIFICATION.

The electors for counties are as follows:—Freeholders, copyholders, leaseholders, occupying tenants.

Freeholders.—The following persons are entitled to vote as freeholders:—1. Any person possessed of a freehold estate for himself and his heirs, or, as it is called, an estate of inheritance, of the yearly value of 40s. 2. Any person possessed of a freehold estate for life or lives of the yearly value of £10. 3. Any person possessed of such an estate for life or lives of the yearly value of 40s., under any one of the following circumstances:—If the estate was acquired on or before the 7th of June, 1832; or since, if by marriage or marriage settlement, by devise (i.e., by will), or by promotion to any benefice or office, or if the freeholder is himself the actual occupier of the property. In any of these cases it is sufficient if the property be of the yearly value of 40s. Parish clerks, sextons, schoolmasters, Dissenting ministers, and holders of offices have a right to vote if entitled to emoluments of 40s. per annum, arising out of, or charged upon, land, and may be registered as voters in the parish wherein the land is situate. The appointment must, however, be for life, not for a temporary purpose, or at the pleasure of any other party; but an appointment during good behaviour is considered to be an appointment for life. If the freeholder occupy his own freehold property in a borough, of such a nature and value as would confer upon him the right to vote for the borough, he will not be entitled, in respect of that property, to vote for the county. But if the freehold will not confer the right of voting for the borough, that is, if it be not of the annual value of £10, or if it be land without building, the freeholder may vote for the county, though he occupy it himself. And if the freeholder do not occupy his freehold situate within a borough, he may then vote in respect of it for the county, and his tenant may also vote for the borough. Six months' possession prior to the 31st of July will entitle a freeholder to be registered. And if the freehold lands or tenements should have come to him by descent, succession, marriage, marriage-settlement, will, or promotion to any benefice in a church, or to any office, no definite period of previous possession will be necessary.

Copyholders.—Any person possessed of any lands or tenements of the clear yearly value of £10, whether of copyhold or any other tenure than freehold, is entitled to vote. Tenants in ancient demesne may in general vote as freeholders, if they do not hold by copy of court-roll, but otherwise they will be entitled as copyholders. As freeholders, 40s. per annum will be sufficient; but as copyholders, £10 a year is required. The same period of possession previous to registration is required, in respect to copyholders, as in respect to freeholders. Copyhold property within a borough, if of such a nature as would qualify any person to vote for the borough, will not, under any circumstances, give a right to vote for the county.

Leaseholders.—The right of voting in respect of leasehold property extends to—1. Any person who is entitled by virtue of a lease made or assigned to him of any lands or tenements for the unexpired residue of any term originally created for a period of not less than 60 years, if the property is of the clear yearly value of £10 above all rents and charges. 2. Any person who is in like manner entitled to the unexpired residue of a term originally of 20 years, if the lands and tenements are of the clear yearly value of £50. The party to whom the lease was originally made, or a party to whom such lease may have assigned the original lease, may vote, though not in occupation of the premises. Any sub-lessee or assignee of an under-lease may also vote, but only when in occupation of the premises. Lessees or assignees must have been in actual possession for 12 months previous to the 31st of July, unless the qualification is acquired by any of the modes before mentioned as excepted; that is to say, by the death of a relative, by marriage, by will, or by promotion to any benefice or office. Leasehold property in a borough, if of such nature and value as will give any person a vote for the borough, will not give a vote for the county.

OCCUPYING TENANT.—Any person occupying lands or tenements for which he is liable to pay a yearly rent of £50 is entitled to vote, if not within a borough, and not of such nature as would qualify a person to vote for the borough. In respect of the period of previous possession required, occupying tenants are placed on the same footing as leaseholders; but it is not requisite that the occupation be of the same lands or tenements: different lands and tenements occupied in immediate succession for twelve months previous to the 31st of July in each year will give the qualification.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.—Besides lands, houses, buildings, and the like, property and interests of the following description will entitle the owner to be registered and to vote, viz.—tithes, an annuity charged on land, a rent-charge, a fee-farm rents issuing out of an estate in fee; shares in navigable rivers, canals, &c., where the shareholders possess an interest in the soil; tolls of bridges, tolls of fairs and markets, purchases of unredeemed land-tax. Persons who have entered into an agreement of purchase of property, or who have paid any part of the purchase-money, or done any other act in part performance of the agreement, are considered to have equitable estates, and are entitled to vote and to be registered. Joint tenants and tenants in common have each a right to vote, provided the property be of sufficient amount to give to the share of each the value required. Mortgagees may vote, if in actual possession or in receipt of the rents and profits, but not otherwise. Trustees are expressly excluded from voting for any trust estate; the right of voting in respect of trust property is reserved for the cestui que trust. In estimating the value of freehold or copyhold property, the marketable value of the property is to be the criterion to be attended to. If, owing to accidental circumstances, the rent should be less than might be obtained, the property will still give a right to vote. As regards leaseholds, the value required does not depend on the amount of rent, it is to be estimated by the profit which the tenant can make of the property, over and above the amount of rent reserved and any other charge on the property. The value required is to be "above all rents and charges." Under these words are included all encumbrances affecting the property, but not any public or parliamentary taxes.

BOROUGH FRANCHISE FOR 1845.

In order to secure a borough vote next year, those who occupy premises giving a qualification should immediately see that their names are placed on the poor's rate-book.

A claimant must be rated, or have claimed to be rated, to all rates made during the year ending the 31st of July. If, therefore, his name is omitted from any rate made during that time, he should immediately claim to be rated. The overseers are required to put the name of a person so claiming on the rate list made; consequently, if the claimant suffers two rates to be made before he claims, he will be unable to get upon the former one, and will thereby lose his vote for one year.

No particular form of claim to be rated is prescribed by the Reform or Registration Acts; but the following form may be adopted:—

"CLAIM TO BE RATED."

"To the Overseers of the Parish of _____
"I hereby give you notice that I occupy a _____ at _____ in _____ Street, in your parish, and I claim to be rated to the relief of the poor in respect of such premises, in order that I may be entitled to vote in the election of a member (or members) of Parliament for the city (or borough) of _____
"Dated this _____ day of _____, 1844.
"(Signed) _____
of _____"

Insert the name of the parish, the nature of the premises, as house, shop, room, or as the case may be, and the name of the street, &c., and of the city or borough, also the date. The Christian and surname and place of residence of the claimant should be inserted at full length. Give the claim to an overseer, keeping a correct copy, on which should be written the date when, and the name of the overseer on whom, it was served. If any poor's rates are due for the premises at the time of making the claim they must be paid, or the amount due tendered. Should the overseer refuse to accept the money, or omit to enter the claimant's name in the rate-book, he will be deemed to be rated notwithstanding; but, if the claimant's name be omitted from any future rate, he should again claim to be rated.

THE NEW YEAR.

Another year of active exertion has begun for the Leaguers: they commence it under circumstances well calculated to foster hope and inspire confidence.

* No registration of claimants or rent-charges with the clerk of the poor is required. The Reform Bill, &c., is required.

In the space of twelve months the armoury of monopoly has been deprived of nearly all the hackneyed sophistries which they had furnished up to disguise cupidity and deceive ignorance. Rigby's mathematical statement of the falsehood that cheap bread was equivalent to low wages has been decisively refuted in every branch of manufacturing industry; and the fact that the natural price of food raises the rate of reward for labour, both mediately and directly, has been substantiated beyond the possibility of contradiction. The attempt made by the corn monopolists, in conjunction with a section of the Chartists, to show that the rate of wages depended on the will of the masters, has failed most signally, in spite of the insinuations of the Standard-Herald, and its zealous efforts to create dissension between the employers and the employed. It is probable that this precious piece of false economy and worse morality has not been approved by the masters of the "Goose and Shadow," for there are indications that ministerial confidence is given more freely to the Times than to the Standard-Herald. Sir Robert Peel is not always tolerant of the Falstaffs that "misuse the Queen's press most shamefully." The operatives themselves have protested against the deception, and declared in their memorial to Sir Robert Peel, "that other causes besides the will of the masters regulate the rate of wages."

When the ministers of religion met in Manchester, and solemnly declared that restrictions on food produced destitution, and that destitution necessarily generated depravity, there was a unanimous howl from the monopolist press, and every abusive epithet which the vocabulary of vituperation could furnish was hurled against these reverend gentlemen. In the statistical report presented to the Anti-Corn Law Conference of 1842, by Mr. Henry Ashworth, it was shown by the returns of infirmaries, work-houses, and prisons throughout the country, that the then high price of provisions was accompanied by an increasing amount of disease, pauperism, and crime. The monopolist press had the boldness to deny that there was any necessary connexion between these concomitant circumstances; but in the Standard of January 1st we find that in this year of cheaper food and increased employment the current of crime, which had been previously increasing, has not only been effectually checked, but has even been made to retrograde. The bounty of Providence has baffled the wicked policy of war to afflict the nation with artificial scarcity. He has given us plenty, and peace and order have followed in its train. Who will henceforth deny that the Corn Laws inflict a moral blight on the community, when their staunchest supporters confess that their partial defeat by an abundant harvest has unlocked the progress of that guilt which was in a process of continuous increase so long as the starvation laws had free scope of action?

The fallacy that the Corn Laws were devised for the protection of the agricultural labourers has been unfortunately refuted by the miserable condition to which this meritorious class has been reduced; and has been scouted at the spontaneous meetings of the peasantry in Wiltshire. It has been incontrovertibly established, that under the operation of the corn monopoly the physical, and consequently the moral, condition of the agricultural labourers has been fearfully deteriorated. The bad pre-eminence of the county of Dorset in this respect has forced public attention to the consideration of the value of that philanthropy which extends its benevolence to distant objects but shuts up its bowels of compassion against the needy and the suffering in its immediate neighbourhood.

The farmers' doubts of the advantages of pretended protection are fast ripening into a conviction that the system is equally delusive and destructive. They have discovered that under its influence they have been degraded into vassals and dependents; that their votes have been made the subject of base traffic by parliamentary jobbers; and that their tenures have been kept uncertain to render their subservience secure. The protection for which farmers begin to look, is not an artificial price for their produce, but such security of holding as will ensure them a fair return for the outlay of the capital employed in cultivation. Their attention has also been directed to a grievance of minor, but still of great magnitude—the destruction caused by the vast amount of game which titled poulterers are raising for the London markets. They have been taught by bitter experience that the hollow pretext of protection has yielded them no profit, while it has placed fetters on their limbs and yokes upon their necks.

The exertions made to advance agricultural improvements in England are mainly owing to the law.

hours of the League. Mr. Cobden's exposure of the slovenliness and mismanagement of English farms, as compared with those of Scotland, has produced a most beneficial effect: the aid of science is invoked to increase the fertility of the soil. Drainage and manures are carefully investigated; there is even a talk of founding agricultural colleges, while the Post (Ultimus Romanorum) vainly calls upon the advocates of the Corn Law to be consistent in asserting the beneficence of scarcity and the blessings of famine. The Times says that "the League has been stroked down to civility, and almost to silence, by some concession and much prosperity." We may fairly confess that we do feel somewhat of the complacency of prophets who have seen their predictions accurately fulfilled; that we take credit for the civility which abates from the phraseology of Puddle-dock; and that, if this tranquil delight at witnessing the triumphant march of the great principles we advocate be deemed comparative silence, we should be glad to know what word in our language would adequately express the minimum of noise made by the Central Agricultural Protection Society.

In the manufacturing districts, the cradle of the League, our cause has not only advanced beyond all former precedent, but former adversaries have paid public homage to the rectitude of our principles and the validity of our arguments. The Pottinger banquets to celebrate the triumph of Pottinger policy were as good Free-Trade meetings as ever assembled in Covent-garden, or the Leaguers-hall at Manchester. But in these districts a more important movement has developed for Free-Traders new elements of strength in the county constituencies. We have assailed the monopolists in what they deemed the very citadels of their strength, and have made good our lodgment in more than one of their fortresses. South Lancashire is won. The West Riding of Yorkshire, North Cheshire, and the other districts which owe their prosperity to trade and manufacture are, like the metropolitan county of Middlesex, certain to be gained if the vigorous exertions by which they are assailed be continued.

It is to the large constituencies, not to such as that of the borough of Dartmouth, that we must look for the triumph of great principles. In the election for Dartmouth the League took no part, because some men on Mr. Moffatt's committee objected to make the contest one purely of principle. Mr. Moffatt is, indeed, a subscriber to the League, but, being in the hands of his committee, he yielded to the timidity of some of them, and allowed the great question of Free Trade to be kept in the background. Under such circumstances the League could not and did not interfere in the struggle. Not a lecturer or any other person connected with the League appeared at Dartmouth while the election was pending; and its issue shows the futility of any candidate attempting to stand on the popular side unless he boldly avows the broad principles of Free Trade. No other watchword will, for the future, command the response of popular sympathy—the lovers of truth and justice will rally round no other standard. Had Mr. Moffatt's committee stood up manfully and boldly to their principles—and had they sought the aid of our lecturers to inform, instruct, and excite the feelings of the people—a show of hands in favour of Mr. Somers would have been as impossible at Dartmouth as it was for the bread-taxer at Salisbury.

The monopolists exult in their triumph at Dartmouth, with its two hundred and forty voters, where the League did not appear. What do they say to the victory of the League in London, with its nineteen thousand electors? One hundred such boroughs as Dartmouth, won or lost, are but as dust in the balance when compared with the return of Mr. Pattison, the avowed Leaguer, for London. The small boroughs must follow in the wake of the large constituencies, or prepare to be swept away by another Schedule A. To such constituencies as the two divisions of Lancashire, the West Riding of Yorkshire, North Cheshire, Middlesex, &c., we must for the future direct all our energies. An auspicious beginning has been made, and perseverance is only necessary to make the coming year of action herald a coming year of triumph.

MRS. PARTINGTON'S BROOM.

Our readers have all heard of the celebrated Mrs. Partington—that excellent and stout-hearted old lady, whose energetic defence of her native soil against the invasion of an Atlantic spring-tide with south-wester has been immortalized in the panegyric of the Rev. Sydney Smith. How the dame sallied out, broom in hand, and patriotism in her heart—planted herself in front of the foe, and vigorously swept and swept as each intruding wave foamed uproariously above his predecessor,—and how, with all her exertions, the waves got their own way in the end, and forced the old lady to retreat, leaving the enemy in full possession of the field;—all this has long been familiar to the world as an affecting and instructive instance of the inefficiency of good intentions unaccompanied by a clear perception of the relation of means to ends. Mrs. Partington's only fault was an error of judgment. We never heard any doubt intimated as to the purity and excellence of her "motives," and are not aware that malice itself ever cast a slur on her sincerity. Nor could there be possibly be two opinions as to the great practical importance and desirableness of the end which she and her broom had in view. At the same time, the soundness of the dame's understanding remains fairly open to criticism; and we may surely be allowed to smile or sigh at the egregious futility of her "good works," without incurring any imputation of "intolerance."

We have been irresistibly reminded of poor Mrs. Partington by an advertisement which appeared in Wednesday's Herald, from the "Society for the Improvement of the Condition of the Labouring Classes," backed by a leading article written with all the force and vivacity usually characteristic of the ministerial organ. Among the various plans which that society has in view for the promotion of the great object which its name indicates, the first in order is the very important one of improving the dwellings of the poor; which they propose to effect, in the first instance, by the (in itself considered) judicious method of experimentally showing that wholesome and comfortable working men's houses may be erected at moderate cost, and let at rents not exceeding working men's ability to pay. Some six weeks ago, the sub-committee charged with the execution of this plan reported that an eligible plot of ground had been taken, on reasonable terms, between Gray's Inn-road and the Lower-road, Pentonville, with the view of building a certain number of model houses; and that ten of such houses were already contracted for, and were "proceeding as rapidly as the state of the weather would admit." More recently, the scheme has, it appears, been still further matured; and we are now informed by advertisement that

"This society is now raising, near the Lower-road, Pentonville, a range of buildings for the use of the labouring classes, consisting of:—

1. Eight dwellings, having a living-room, two sleeping-rooms, and a closet.
2. Twelve others, for smaller families, affording to each two rooms, with all requisite conveniences; and
3. A widows' house, affording thirty convenient rooms, for a like number of widows, or single women of advanced age.

"The society expects to be enabled to furnish the working classes, in this experimental building, with lodgings in all respects superior to those at present supplied to them, and at less than half the usual cost."

"But to confer this great boon on the labouring classes, it is requisite that the society should receive adequate support. At present the funds at the disposal of the committee are not sufficient for the above purpose; but they cannot doubt the willingness of the wealthier classes to encourage an attempt so evidently fraught with benefits to their poorer brethren. They appeal with confidence to those who, at this period, are enjoying every comfort, to impart some portion of their abundance in aid of an effort which promises to ameliorate, if successful, one of the greatest hardships to which the poor are subject."

Now, we have no wish to say needlessly harsh or disrespectful things either of the Society for the Improvement of the Condition of the Labouring Classes or of their plan for giving poor men better and more comfortable homes. The society has on its books some names "honourable" and "right honourable" otherwise than by courtesy—names with which "improvement of the condition of the labouring classes" is naturally and legitimately connected; and improved dwellings for working men are an object the importance of which it is impossible to overrate. We like, moreover, the experimental mode of proceeding which the society has adopted in this department of its operations. If it can be demonstrated by voie de fait that wholesome and comfortable tenements can be built and let at less cost than the poor now pay for unwholesome and comfortless ones, a valuable practical service will have been rendered to the community. The work is, beyond all doubt, a "good work" (in itself), deserving not only of "toleration," but of hearty sympathy, and of any amount of co-operation that may really tend to its promotion. What we object to the society in general and to this building project in particular is, that, under the present circumstances in which legislation has placed the working classes, this effort to improve their homes is a beginning at the wrong end. It is putting the cart before the horse. It is a Dame Partington's broom uplifted against a Noah's Deluge. It is an attempt to do something which, in the very nature of things, cannot be done unless and until something else is done—to which "something else" the ruling powers of this society of philanthropists are obstinately opposed. The society may plan and build its model houses in model streets—may eloquently appeal to the "wealthier classes" for contributions towards the "great boon," and may get its appeal responded to with lavish and wholesale liberality; but the dwellings of the working classes will not be effectually improved until those laws are repealed which rob the working classes of work, dock their wages, and make them buy their bread short weight. As a scheme for practically experimenting in domestic architecture, with a view to ascertain the maximum of comfort procurable by a minimum of outlay, we cordially wish it well—though we do not exactly see why it need be made so very costly a charity as the society's appeals to the public imply. The experiment may very probably show results which, at some future day, may be made generally available. But as an effort for "improving" on the "comprehensive scale" announced by the society in their prospectus, the "condition of the labouring classes," our good wishes for its success are stifled in their birth by the conviction of its utter and irremediable futility.

For, compare the society's end with its means. Measure the evil to be remedied with the remedy which they talk of applying, and mark how enormously, how desperately, the one is out of proportion to the other. What is the evil? Population increasing naturally—with work, wages, and food restricted artificially. Population increasing at the rate (taking the whole United Kingdom) of from a thousand to twelve hundred per diem. This increase of population—as regards the proportion of births to deaths—going on the most rapidly in the agricultural counties, where work, wages, and food are the hardest to come by; where, as the late occupation returns show, the sources of these are, not merely relatively but absolutely, on the decline. Consequently, shoals of pauper immigrants annually poured into the metropolis and the large towns, where work, wages, and food are still to be had, more or less. Consequently (as even paupers must sleep under roofs, in this climate), a horribly filthy and pestilential crowding of large families into the small rooms of rickety and rotten houses, in undrained streets, at rents forced up to an extravagant height by the strain of competition, and by landlords' frequent experience of bad debts.

This is the evil—a stunted and starving rural population swarming, by the myriad, on the large towns—driven, by stress of hunger and misery, to the seats of commerce and manufactures—law saying, the while, that commerce and manufactures shall not more than half-feed them. It is not with St. Giles's "rookeries" that we have to deal, but with that which renders those dens of squalor and famine acceptable residences to human beings.

And what is the remedy?

Comfortable domestic accommodation for twenty families and thirty single persons, in a range of buildings near the Lower-road, Pentonville: the whole "proceeding as rapidly as the state of the weather will admit," and to be "completed" (so, at least, the committee trust) "by the approaching spring," should the public give its aid in "a prompt and liberal increase of contributions." Why, by the approaching spring the population of the United Kingdom will have increased by another hundred thousand—the population of London, to which that of the whole United Kingdom sends its daily tribute, will have increased by another eight or ten thousand! Truly, the increase of subscriptions had need be "prompt and liberal," to keep pace with Nature's prompt and liberal increase of claimants. We have always understood, however, that it was not any lack of promptitude and liberality in the application of the broom that caused Mrs. Partington's failure, but the intrinsic inefficiency of that mode of dealing with such an enemy as the Atlantic Ocean.

We confess we see not the shadow of a possibility of permanently and extensively improving the dwellings of the labouring classes in the metropolis by any such scheme as this, though it were enlarged to the widest conceivable amplitude. Though the society had funds at their disposal for building a hundred houses in every parish within the three or the twelve-mile circle—though the whole charity of the empire could be got to flow in this single channel,—the rookeries would still fill as before. Rural and Irish pauperism would rush in to occupy any vacuum in St. Giles's or Bethnal-green. Open new markets for labour; raise the price of labour; enhance the worth of the labouring man; give him self-dependence and self-respect; extend his command of the means of health and enjoyment; raise his standard of comfort; create those conditions under which the desire of a comfortable and wholesome dwelling naturally grows up in a man's mind,—and perhaps the society may be able some day to give us useful, practical information as to how that desire may be most thoroughly and economically gratified. But try to "give" him a comfortable and wholesome dwelling as a "boon," and the experiment must fail. The benefit will be limited to the "twenty families and thirty individuals," with such other families and individuals as may, in the course of years, should the society last so long, come within the range of its bounty. Rookeries will live while the Corn Law and its consequences live. No society nor Parliament can help it. Give pauper immigrants new and good lodgings, at "less than half" the usual rent of the old bad ones, and the only consequence will be that the rents of the old bad ones will come down in proportion, so as to be crease the facilities and inducements to pauper immigration. Or, let St. Giles's be bought up, pulled down, and cleared out by act of Parliament, and all men compelled to live only in model houses, the consequence will be that the model houses themselves will swarm with filthy pauper families, at the old extortionate rents; and if Parliament should interfere further, and prohibit over-crowding, then, as Parliament cannot prohibit population, we should want, in the last resort, larger union-houses.

Turn it which way we will, we see not how it is possible to improve the dwellings of the working class, as a class, by any imaginable extension or success of the plan of this society—other things remaining as they are. The case is altogether out of the reach of any charity, however earnest, enterprising, or judicious. Nothing can give working men clean, wholesome, and decent dwellings but their own self-respect; and the basis of a working man's self-respect is work and wages. When domestic cleanliness and comfort are felt by the working man to be necessities of life, he will have them, according to the utmost measure of his power to pay for them; but he will not feel this while prior and more pressing necessities remain unsatisfied. Misery does not know what self-respect means. Misery is not nice about the decencies. Misery will economise in the decencies, and spend the difference in bread or gin. Misery will breed filth and pestilence even in a model house near the Lower-road, Pentonville. All schemes for "improving the condition of the labouring classes" are rotten at the core, which do not go on the basis of improving the market value of labour.

In saying this we are not conscious of any feeling of "intolerance" towards the "good works" of the Society for the Improvement of the Condition of the Labouring Classes. We freely recognise the importance and possible prospective value of some of the experiments which they are trying. The broom really has its uses after all, though Mrs. Partington sadly deceived herself in her estimate of its powers; it is quite inadequate to sweep back an advancing tide, but, after the turn of the tide, it may be of service in clearing away any filthy and pestiferous deposits that may have been left behind. When the great work of national justice and policy shall have been done, we shall be in a position for judging better than now, how much or how little of associated or legislative interference may be requisite for the realization of important secondary objects of public utility. Let industry be free to earn and eat, and we shall then find ourselves at leisure to attend to the society at No. 20, Exeter-hall, and turn to account any well-authenticated facts of which they may happen to be in possession, relative to domestic architecture or any other of the arts and sciences. For the present we have nothing further to say of or to this Society for the Improvement of the Condition of the Labouring Classes, except to express our amazement at the enormous incongruity between their professions "in the abstract" and their concrete designs. They tell us, in their prospectus, that "associations for some one particular object" have "generally failed," and that it is "next to impossible to work efficiently, except upon a comprehensive scale." Their "comprehensive scale" turns out to mean comfortable houses for twenty families and thirty individuals, to be got ready some time next spring. They avow a readiness to take into consideration "other matters involving the general and permanent welfare of the labouring classes;" and they systematically neglect such matters as work, wages, and food. They proclaim that "the word of God must be taken for a guide;" and they ignore the only great social question of the day on which we have anything approaching to specific and textual scriptural guidance. With all possible "tolerance" for any "good works" with which these philanthropists may favour the world, we freely confess an impatience, verging on intolerance, of this jumble of maguiloquent profession and shabby performance.

ZEAL UNGUIDED BY WISDOM.

THE SUGAR MONOPOLY AND THE ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

The article in our number of the 23rd November last, on "The bitter fruits of ignorance, the sugar monopoly, and the Anti-Slavery Society," we are gratified to perceive has excited considerable interest among our friends connected with that society; and, as we appear to have been misapprehended by some of our correspondents, we feel called upon to enter more fully into the question. We may premise that, whilst we differ from some of our warmest friends, we are prepared to do full justice to the purity of their intentions and active benevolence; but duty forbids us to shrink from the exposure in the most forcible language of the appalling cruelty, suffering, and injustice which have resulted from their falsely-directed efforts to put down slavery and the slave trade. We may say with Luther, "Though it offend, we dare but speak the truth unto you."

When we call to mind the acknowledged disappointments of the friends of the African race that hitherto their efforts to extinguish the slave trade have not only utterly failed, but that the traffic has fearfully increased, does it not become all good men earnestly to inquire into the causes of these failures, and diligently to search if their proceedings have been in accordance with sound principles? This important inquiry we recommend to the consideration of every philanthropist.

The course hitherto pursued to put down the slave trade has been—1. To endeavour to suppress the traffic by force of arms. 2. To enter into treaties with foreign powers to unite with us in these efforts, and to put it down in their own dominions. 3. To adopt fiscal regulations to prohibit slave-grown sugar.

That the slave trade is a great moral evil and sin is acknowledged by every Christian mind; but we are not, therefore, justified in adopting immoral means to put it down: this is doing evil that good may come; but unfortunately such have been the means adopted, and we cannot be surprised that they have failed. Although this country has expended upwards of £15,000,000, and laboured for nearly forty years to put down the traffic,—and although, says Sir Fowell Buxton, "an infinitely more important sacrifice has been made in the loss of British life which has necessarily been incurred in pursuing this object,—the traffic has not been extinguished, has not been diminished, but, by the latest accounts from which any estimate can be correctly formed, the numbers exported have increased, the destruction of human life and all the guilt and misery consequent thereon have been fearfully augmented; and at the same time it may be stated that the numbers exported from Africa are, as compared with the year 1807, as two to one, and that the annual loss of life has risen from seventeen to twenty-five per cent." Is it not surprising, in this age of Christian benevolence, that the system which has been so long tried, and which has only aggravated the evil it was intended to put down, should, up to the present moment, exist in full force;—that with the knowledge that Africa is annually robbed of 400,000 of her children, and of this number 150,000 perish victims to our armed interference to repress the trade, no efforts should be made to put an end to this devouring evil;—that the men whose zealous appeals to the hearts and consciences of their countrymen carried Negro emancipation—whose religious principles are opposed to the very system by which there is every year entailed on afflicted Africa more misery and distress than all the ills endured by the slave population in our colonies since slavery began, and which every year sweeps into eternity victims to this system equal in number to one-half the population of Jamaica—should rest satisfied with the mere expression of their disapprobation of it in memorials to the Government? This is an anomaly for which we confess ourselves unable to account, except it be that blind and misdirected zeal which sometimes misleads even good men "to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel."

Our efforts to put down the slave trade by treaties with foreign powers have been characterized by a little wisdom as those to suppress it by force. We have induced them to enter into the most solemn engagements for its abolition, and have squandered immense subsidies to compensate for its surrender; but had the money been thrown into the sea it would have been equally efficacious in obtaining the object for which it was paid. We exacted terms in our treaties which we ought to have known—with the most honourable intentions of fulfilling them—the contracting parties were utterly unable to comply with. Sir Fowell Buxton has shown, that even in our own colonies, during the existence of slavery, we were unable to prevent an illicit slave trade to a vast extent; that thousands of slaves were feloniously introduced into the Mauritius in spite of the utmost vigilance on the part of the naval force on the coast and the British authorities on the island; and that for ten years, as is asserted by Captain Moreau in his evidence before the House of Commons, the trade prevailed there as "plain as the sun at noonday." If in an island like Mauritius, only 150 miles in circumference, we were unable to put down the slave trade (which was, in other terms, a smuggling trade) during the existence of slavery, how can we expect other countries will be able to put it down on an extended line of coast, with a thinly-scattered population, and without the aid of large naval forces? Sir Fowell forcibly observes:—"It is an axiom at the Custom-house that no illicit trade can be suppressed whose profits exceed 30 per cent.; the ordinary profits of a slave voyage are about 180 per cent." The conclusion, therefore, is inevitable that we may enter into treaties with all the powers of the earth, and cover the sea with our cruisers, but we shall still be baffled and defeated in our efforts to suppress the trade by the enormous gains of the slave-trader. We think it tolerably evident that it is vain to look to the suppression of the slave trade by the sword, or by treaties with foreign powers; but there is still another expedient which is the favourite scheme of the Anti-Slavery

Society, viz., "the adoption of fiscal regulations in favour of the productions of free labour;" or, in other words, to prohibit the use of slave-grown sugar. To attain this object that society has formed an alliance with the wooden-bible monopolists, of whom Lord Sandon* is the representative—an alliance more unholy or unnatural never was formed, or one where the objects sought by each were more dissimilar. The object of the Anti-Slavery Society is a sincere desire to put an end to slavery, whilst that of the wooden-bible monopolists is merely to obtain for their sugar double the price it is worth in the markets of the world. Is it not surprising that the shrewd men of the Anti-Slavery Society should so easily have become the blind dupes of ex-slaveowners, and should never have asked themselves, Will the extraordinary course we are pursuing attain the end we have in view? Will our union with these men in the prohibition of slave-grown sugar put an end to slavery or the slave trade? Simple delusion! If all the nations of the earth were guilty of the like folly with ourselves, perchance the experiment might succeed at the expense of a thousand times more evil than it would cure; but they know better. We stand alone in our folly the laughing-stock of the world. The attempt to put down slavery by the admission of free-labour sugar and the prohibition of slave-grown sugar, is as vain as would be the attempt to empty the sea with a bucket: every vacuum created by the bucketful of water taken out would be filled up by the succeeding wave; for the quantity of free-labour sugar now exported to foreign countries will come here and be replaced there by the like quantity of slave-grown sugar. But, inasmuch as the total consumption of sugar will be increased by our admission of foreign free-labour sugar, sugar will rise in price, and a new impulse will be given to the growth of slave-grown sugar, and a new demand for slaves; so that the very measure which the Anti-Slavery Society are so anxious to see effected will increase the evil they deplore—the slave trade. But the folly and evil will not end here. By the prohibition of a direct trade in slave-grown sugar, a temptation to fraud and perjury is created—the honest, respectable, and conscientious will be driven from the trade in what will be represented as free-labour sugar, and it will be thrown into the hands of the profligate and unscrupulous, like the slave trade.

But, say the anti-slavery organs—"The exclusion of slave-grown sugar will raise the moral standard of Britain more than any measure yet adopted by the Legislature." "It will prove to slave-owning countries that we are willing to suffer loss rather than be on friendly terms with them." No such thing. On the contrary, it will expose us to the just imputation by other countries of hypocrisy and fanaticism. Who will believe that we act from principle in prohibiting slave-grown sugar on the ground of its being stolen goods, when we supply our own colonies with refined sugar made from slave-grown sugar (stolen goods), and foreign countries with still larger quantities of raw sugar (stolen goods), but not a pound may we eat at home? We may carry on any amount of trade in, and consume all or any of, the products of Brazil—her coffee (stolen goods), or her hides (stolen goods), or her tobacco (stolen goods), and even her sugar—provided not a particle of the latter finds its way into the tea or coffee of the labouring classes of this country! And beyond even this, we may import free-labour sugar, as it is called, from Java, which now competes with the slave-grown sugar of Brazil in continental markets, and thus increase the demand for the sugar of Brazil and Cuba there; but to consume ourselves, that which our policy forces others to consume, is forbidden by the dictates of humanity! Hence, as Mr. McCulloch observes, "Though we do not sweeten our tea with sugar produced by Brazilian or Cuba slaves, we clothe ourselves with wool, manure our lands with bones, and manufacture our paper of rags, which are paid for with this very sugar (stolen goods). It is obvious, therefore, that, in so far as buying their products goes, we are direct encouragers of slavery in Brazil. And thus it is, that while our present system lays our trade with Brazil and Cuba under a disadvantage, and obliges our people to pay double its natural price for an important necessary of life, it promotes that very slavery we affect to deprecate!" Those must be blind indeed who do not see that the sophistries of the Anti-Slavery Society have only to be stated in order to be scouted by every intelligent and honest mind.

But, say the anti-slavery organs again—"We cannot have, perhaps, a more fearful instance of the effects of our country taking slave produce than in the article of cotton, the import of which into this country has added, probably, at least two millions to * Lord Sandon opposed the proposal of the late Government for the reduction of the sugar duties, and succeeded in throwing out the Ministry on that measure. At the Liverpool election which followed, the noble lord was paraded through the principal streets of that town preceded by a flock of vultures splendidly painted and gilt, to represent the "Holy Bible," which was borne on a crimson velvet cushion before him. A fitting emblem of the policy of ex-slaveowners.

Batley for the services he had rendered to the cause, presented him with the testimonial. The inscription on the cup was as follows:—"Batley, Dec. 27, 1844. Presented to Mr. C. R. Greenwood by his friends in Batley, in acknowledgement of his unwearied exertions in the cause of Free Trade."

Mr. GREENWOOD made the following reply:—"Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen—My worthy friend has placed me in rather an awkward position, by the very complimentary manner in which he has presented to me the testimonial of the approbation of my friends for my past exertions in the cause of Free Trade. Not being used to speaking in public I am at a loss how to express my feelings for their kindness, but I can assure them, if they think my humble services for the past have deserved this token, they may depend on this, it will be a stimulus for the future. The little I have done in the cause of Free Trade has always been prompted by one motive, the good of our common country, for I am fully convinced that all classes will receive benefit from it, and none more than the working class. It is both reasonable and just that we should have the markets of the world open to send our labour to, and in return to receive what is offered in exchange. (Cheers.) The Almighty has said in one of His first title-deeds to man, 'By the sweat of thy brow thou shalt eat bread,' and, further, 'Cursed is he that withholdeth corn from the poor.' I ask, what man or set of men has any right to interfere to prevent our having it from the different granaries of the world? (Loud cheers.) My advice to you all is, that every man among you who is not yet on the register should take steps to put himself upon it, that when another contest comes we may wipe off the stain we suffered to rest upon us at the last election; and recollect that one vote gained in the revision court will go further than all the applause you have bestowed on our honourable friends, however fully deserved that applause may have been. (Cheers.) In this township, at the last election, we polled nearly three to one; the majority in the Birstall polling district, consisting of eleven townships, has about two hundred, and this township had one hundred of that majority; and now we are in a far better position than we were then. And as to the future, I have already sixteen names to put on the register, and thirteen more ready to qualify as soon as property can be secured; yet the township has only been partially canvassed. (Cheers.) And, Sir, I can assure these hon. gentlemen that, if we are not orators, there are many friends in this hamlet who are ever ready to make sacrifices of both time and money in this great cause, satisfied that it is the cause of truth and justice. (Cheers.) I again return my most grateful thanks to my friends, and particularly to those who have been the cause of my standing here to-night, and assure them that this more than repays me tenfold for all the scorn and sneers and rebuffs I have had to meet for years in following out what I have believed to be a useful and consistent path of labour; and I hope this token of your kindness may go down to my children's children, to remind them that, however humble may be their sphere of life, they may yet be of some service to their fellow-men. (Repeated cheering.)

A vote of thanks to the deputation was then moved by Mr. BURNLEY and seconded by Mr. JACKSON, and carried unanimously; as also a vote of thanks to the Chairman, whose consistent advocacy of Free Trade has done great service to the cause. The meeting then broke up. We may add that, both at Cleckheaton and Batley, the committees meet frequently, and are untiring in their labours to secure a large addition to the register; and, from the steady perseverance of the men of this district, great results are sure to follow.

The following spirited placard has been widely distributed in Sheffield and the neighbourhood, a district known in old Saxon times under the name of Hallamshire:—

"QUALIFY AND REGISTER!"

"Men of Hallamshire,—We inhabit a district renowned in history for the stand which its people have made against tyranny. The love of freedom which animated our forefathers lives in us: their oppressors were foreigners; ours (shame to say it) are our countrymen. They contended on the field of battle amid the horrors of war; we strive in the courts of registration for a peaceful triumph. The progress of their enemies was marked by famine, and the depopulation of their towns."

"Our adversaries inflict the like misery by cramping our industry, by closing our markets, and making our food scarce. The power of their enemies was upheld by strong castles and armed retainers; that of ours by wrapping the honest electors with £50 tenants-at-will. We shall be free from their thraldom when at the poll our votes outnumber theirs and their vassals."

"Do you desire to be free? Do you wish to enjoy the right to live by your honest industry, sold in the best markets, and to transmit this right to your children?—then you must strive to become electors for the county! Buy a qualification! You can have one for £50 or £60, and your purchase will yield you interest. Look what has been done in Lancashire—cannot Yorkshire do as well?"

"Cannot the men of Hallamshire show themselves in spirit and independence worthy of their descent? Your cause is an honest one; your weapons are peaceful and constitutional. Arouse yourselves now, and secure the triumph that is within your reach, or else sit down for ever under the poll-tax that is levied on you, on your wives, and your children; and so leave the markets of the world closed against you, and (your country to be a byword and a reproach."

"Lost no time; but qualify and register!"
"A BOROUGH ELECTOR."

NINTH LETTER.

Blandford, Dorset, Dec. 31, 1844.

Pleasant things may be written of Blandford. And I respect to have pleasant things to write of it, and of its people, and of its excellent neighbours, the nobility and gentry who live near it.

It has its poor people and its poor neighbours, who have all their difficulties. And Blandford, like other places, has its difficulties. But it begins to understand them. Its neighbours, who speak in its name, do not say now what they said two years ago.

At that period there were noblemen and squires, I may mention Lord Portman and Mr. Sturt, M.P., without invidiousness, who had long felt that the necessities of their poorer fellow-creatures, and their own ability to do good, demanded of them to improve the habitations and condition of the working poor; and they had been doing so. But there were also at that time those who doubted and denied that the labouring classes of Dorset needed commiseration or assistance. Lord Ashley doubted if any such tales were true as had been told of Dorset distress. He spoke of the remedy being easy and entirely within their own reach—if such distress existed. A year afterwards, just twelvemonths ago, his lordship still seemed to doubt. He does not even admit the evil this year, unless we suppose his silence to be an admission. He has appeared at none of the usual meetings, neither to deny nor affirm.

But his honourable colleague, George Banks, Esq., M.P., has this year admitted what he, bolder than Lord Ashley, denied. He denied that the labourers of Dorset were the worst paid, worst fed, worst clothed, and worst housed in England. He does not deny this now. Mr. Banks having had his attention particularly directed to this painful subject, which was not the case with him two years ago, has the magnanimity to admit that he was then wrong. He does so with certain qualifications, some of which might have been as well omitted. But, upon the whole, his last speech at Blandford is highly creditable to him. Had he known as practically as he knows now what wages were then and had long been on his estate before he got the management of it, and what wages were in the county generally, he would not have suffered himself to be so misled as to assert in Parliament that 10s. and 11s. a week were common wages in Dorset. Neither would he have said so much of the cheerful firesides of the labourers and the jollity of their Christmas cheer as he then did. At least I think not.

But the speech of Mr. Sturt, the other county representative, is more noticeable than that of Mr. Banks. Both gentlemen assume that those who write or speak in public of wages being low in Dorset, do so to give the landlords and farmers of Dorset a bad name. This is a wrong assumption. At any time when I have written of the low wages of this county my object has been to prove that, whether a county or whether a nation be far removed from commerce, employment is less plentiful and less profitable, and wages fall.

Dorset is a county far removed from English commerce and manufactures, and, with much excellent land, it is poor. For why? Because its people cannot get profitable employment. Hear what Mr. Sturt says:—

"One thing I have particularly noticed, the inequality of wages, which is very striking. (Hear, hear.) Is it not remarkable that there should be districts of very considerable extent, throughout which the farmers cannot obtain a labourer for less than 2s. or 2s. 2d. per day, or from 12s. to 13s. a week, while we obtain a labourer for 7s., 8s., or 9s. to the utmost? (Hear.) What causes this inequality? Is it that the landlord in the west exacts a higher rent than the landlord in the north, and so cripples the farmer? ('Hear,' and 'No.') Certainly this is not the case, for land in those districts, of the same productive power as land here, will command, in the north, a somewhat higher rent. (Hear.) In other words, if we could transplant our farms to the north, they would obtain a somewhat higher rent. ('Not with the same burdens,' by a farmer.) 'Yes; their burdens will be found to be about equal. (Hear.) If this be so, the inequality of wages is now owing to the rapacity of the landlords in the west. (Cheers.) Does it not seem, then, extraordinary that farmers in one district, carrying on the same business as yourselves, raising wheat, and barley, and oats, growing turnips and feeding sheep and oxen, with the produce selling at about the same prices, should pay a rate of wages so much higher—that wages should be 12s. or 13s. a week in one district, and 7s., 8s., and 9s. in another? (Hear, hear.) It would seem, in this case, if land was about the same productive power, and the rent similar, that the difference of the price of labour—the difference between 12s. or 13s. a week, and 7s., 8s., or 9s.—must be additional profit in the pocket of the western farmer. (No.) Well, I was about to say it is not so; I am confident such is not the case. (Cheers.) I am satisfied that the sum paid by you in the west, in cultivating a farm of equal quality to one in the north, is, at the least, equal to that paid by the farmer in the north. (Hear, hear.) Now, I do not pretend wholly to explain these facts; I cite them as facts for your further inquiry and consideration; but I am confident that, in raising a quarter of corn in the west, the sum paid for the labour of raising it is, at the least, equal to the sum paid in the north. (Hear, hear.) And I am further assured that if, under the present state of things, we were to pay 12s. and 13s. a week to our labourers, every farmer but him with extra capital would be ruined by the end of the year. (Hear, hear.) I am unable to explain the causes to my own satisfaction, but I know that in some districts of high wages large tracts of land have been brought into high cultivation more rapidly than the population has increased—that the demand for labour has been great, and consequently wages high. From the nature of the case the labourer has become extremely skillful, so that the farmer gets a full equivalent for his money in the extent and goodness of the work done. In other districts I think the great manufacturing establishments have had an effect—that persons have gone to the towns who would have been agricultural labourers—that the higher wages they receive has an effect on agricultural wages—that the intercourse between them has also tended to keep up wages—that the labourers have established a higher standard of living, possessing the necessities of life, as I have described them, and from which they are very unwilling to be deprived. (Hear.) Then there is this distinctive difference between a farmer in those districts and a farmer in the west. The northern farmer asks himself what work he requires to have done, and how few hands can execute it? Here the farmer does not ask how many he requires, but how many men there are in the parish. (Hear.) And the farmer here, I believe, pays as large an amount of wages, in the aggregate, for the same produce, as the farmer in the north; and, therefore, it is unfair and unjust to hold him up to obloquy for not giving higher wages (cheers), for he pays to the greater number that which the northern farmer pays to the lesser. (Cheers.) These are probably some of the causes for the difference in wages to which I have referred. I throw them out for your further consideration and inquiry. (Cheers.)"

Now, according to my reading of the LEAGUE paper, and of the Free-Trade speeches of the leading advocates of Free Trade, this very subject has been a leading one from first to last. Mr. Banks, in accounting for the notoriety which Dorset has attained, gives as one reason that the members for Dorset—Lord Ashley particularly—having exposed the hardships of factory work, the manufacturers have "retaliated," by proclaiming the poverty of Dorset and the hardships of the labourers.

I trust they have had higher motives; though, without a higher motive, they are justified in exposing the poverty of the labourers in Dorset, when the corn monopoly is defended on the ground of its being for the benefit of the labourers in agriculture. But, as just stated, those who have written and spoken of Dorset have had higher motives than retaliation. The exposition of sound political economy, and the indulgence of feelings of humanity, have had alike a share in making Dorset notorious. It has been written of to elucidate those questions which Mr. Sturt is at a loss to understand; and also because it is more than human sympathy can bear to see such people as those of Dorset suffering as they suffer.

And having said thus much of the members of Parliament and their sayings, I shall proceed to relate what I have seen of this county and its industrial population.

TENTH LETTER.

Blandford, Dorset, Dec. 31, 1844.

Since Mr. Banks admits the wages of Dorset to be what Mr. Sturt states them, and makes several other important admissions, I am not disposed to particularize his own property; although, from what he said at Blandford of the labourers' Christmas cheer and cheerful firesides in 1842, I had intended to have written of what the Christmas cheer of his labourers really was in 1844; but, as it might seem unfair to pass over some properties and select his, I refrain from doing so at present.

Let us take the county as it comes.

Entering Dorset by the great road from London through Salisbury, we leave Wiltshire behind us, and come to a place called Woodyates. Here there is a commodious inn, and close to the inn are ten or twelve thatched cottages, inhabited by labourers and their families.

Inquiring the name of the parish we are told it is Pentridge; and inquiring where Pentridge is, we are told it is southward, in the hollow at the bottom of the down. It is nearly a mile and a half. We cross some fields which were at no distant time a part of Cranborne Chase. Some of the men we see here knew this parish when the deer were over it. They show us where three hundred acres of forest copse was grubbed up, and where other hundreds of acres of rich downs were ploughed up. Without a question as to the effect upon them, they at once tell you that "things be sadly altered for the worse since them days."

You remark to them that, it being a good soil, it is better to be usefully employed than lying waste; that it is for the general good of the nation that more corn should be grown. An old man replies, "Yes, master, it grow corn well; it grow eight sacks of wheat to the acre this very year; and some of it grow ten. But we be all the poorer of that. They take everything away to sell now; and we be obliged to buy all as we want of everything. It didn't used to be so."

"Did it not?" "No; where the corn grow now there used to be liberty to turn out pigs and a cow. And poor people gathered nuts and sold them in Salisbury. And we had as much wood for firing as ever we liked; and, quietly, a piece of venison, and nobody said it be wrong of you to eat meat. There ben't no meat ate by poor men now."

In those days, according to this man, wages were the same as now. A gallon loaf and a pound of best cheese (such cheese, he said, as is now 6d. in the village) cost 1s. The gallon loaf of second quality is now 1s. without the cheese. And yet it is cheaper than for many years bygone.

The village contains a small church, the parsonage-house, a large farm-stead, and twenty thatched houses. The half, or fully more, of these houses are in the most deplorable condition that can be well imagined. The doors are broken, and the breaks stuffed up with rags and straw. The glass is also broken, and its place filled in like manner. The thatch is worn in many parts almost to the bare rafters; and what is left is rotten, and retains rain like a sponge. All are inhabited by farm-labourers, who work, when they are in work, to one or other of three farmers among whom the parish is divided. All the land, and most of the houses, belong to the Earl of Shaftesbury.

The houses, which are in the worst condition, are not, I found, strictly speaking, his lordship's: they are held on lives at a nominal rent. The inmates are so poor as to be unable to repair them; and some of them say, "If we had butful's of money we could not get them thatched; there be no straw."

There is straw; but the real fact is they are not allowed to get it. Their houses are pulled down, if they do not fall down before, when the lives expire upon which they are held; and survivors have to leave the parish and seek a subsistence elsewhere.

There is much more land under cultivation now in this parish than at the beginning of the present century; but the farms were more numerous then. The villagers allege that when Mr. Goodard had only 800 acres he employed as many men as he does now that he has 1400.

Wages here are 4s. 6d. and 5s. to unmarried men, and 6s. and 7s. to married men with families. One carter and one shepherd get each 9s. The average rate of wages may be got at from the following:—

1st shepherd at 9s. a week, with £2 at lambing time.

2nd shepherd 6s. a week.

3rd shepherd 5s. a week.

They are full grown men. The two latter have some extras at lambing time; but not so much as the first.

1st carter 9s. a week, and £2 extra at harvest.

2nd carter 8s. a week, with £2 for harvest.

3rd carter 7s. a week, with an allowance for harvest, not stated.

4th carter 5s., with £1 for harvest.

Besides these, three men are hired to plough at 5s., 6s., and 7s.

There are also eight men who thresh, at 7s. a week each, and who work by the piece for a month in harvest. If the harvest lasts over the month they must work for ordinary wages. If it be done in less than a month their extra wages also cease.

There are four stout lads who hold the plough, and do the work of men, at 3s. a week each.

There is another lad who jobs at 3s. a week.

There are five boys, two at 2s. and three at 1s. 6d. a week each.

There are two hedgers who work by the piece, earning about 8s. a week each.

There is one groom at 7s. a week.

It will be seen that, of twenty-six persons who do the work of men, and have, as doubtless they have, the appetites of men, the average income is 6s. 2d. and a fraction a week, exclusive of extra harvest money, the average of which is not more than 30s. a year.

In this I have not included the five boys; nor have I said anything of women. The wages of the latter run about 6d. a day. There are occasionally as many as thirteen women at work on this farm in summer.

A person directed me to a house where he said there were four poor children who had not had a bit of victuals all day, and it was now near dark; and he said if I had anything to give away it would be well bestowed there. The mother and one of the children were out stone-picking; the father and the eldest boy were at work on the farm.

I found the four children, Jane, William, Sarah, and James, sitting crouching over the ashes on the hearth, the fire hardly visible, though it was nearly dark. It was a cold, raw day; and when their mother came in, with her daughter Maria, only a child, from the out-fields, a milk and a half from home, they were bespattered up to the knees, their clothes wet, and no dry ones to put on. They had been gathering the stones at 4d. a load for the use of the roads. They said the short winter day (it was Monday, the 30th of December) was long enough to make them cold and hungry, but it was not long enough to gather more than two loads of stones between them, hardly so many. The father's wages (his name is William Frampton) were 7s. a week; and the eldest boy, George, earned 1s. 6d. at driving plough and such like work.

They had had a small shoulder of mutton from the farmer on Christmas day. That gentleman, to his praise be it spoken, killed several sheep—they were small, still they were sheep—and divided them at the rate of a shoulder and a leg to each family of his workers on Christmas day, else they would have had no meat.

The eldest of the four poor children who huddled over a spark of fire in the ashes was almost naked in rags. Cold as the day was, her skin was seen in a dozen places. Still both she and the others were clean. It is a much commoner thing to be poor in this county than to be dirty. How they get their clothes washed I cannot tell. The self-denial of food to get soap and soda must be great; for there are no baths nor washhouses here to assist poor people.

"Poor dears, you must be very hungry, are you not? Do you not cook some potatoes for your dinner when mother is out?"

"The potatoes be all done, Sir. And there be no bread until mother comes home."

"Have you had no bread since your mother went out to the fields?"

"She had none to take with her and Maria to-day. I wish they had, they would have left two some at home. The taters be all gone; we soon eats all the bread."

"God help you! But you shall have some bread for once when you didn't expect it."

There were four of the family at work upon land which grows from eight to ten sacks of wheat upon an acre; and yet they and the four at home were not eaters of that wheat save in a manner that only made them feel that the wheat is not grown for them.

Their houses had good walls, unlike some of the others; but the roof was wretched. There was space enough for two bedchambers where they slept. But the rain came through the old thatch upon them so continuously when the weather was wet, and the frost when the weather was frosty, that they had to huddle to one side where some canvas was put up to protect them. The house is the Earl of Shaftesbury's. It is in Pentridge parish; but is one of the little cluster at Woodyates.

It has been represented that the people, who only pay a kind of quit rent of 2s. a year in this parish to Lord Shaftesbury for their houses, have a great benefit, compared with those who pay a weekly rent of 1s. or 1s. 6d. But one of the men told me that a few years ago he ventured to complain to Lord Shaftesbury's head steward of the wages being lower by 1s. a week in this parish than in another parish belonging to his lordship. "True," said the steward; "but in that parish they have 1s. a week of rent to pay. You have only 2s. a year to pay."

The man who spoke to me of this said, "So you see, Sir, we be worse than they. We get no repairs done to our houses 'cause we ben't a paying of a shilling a week in money. And yet they stop a shilling a week out of our wages because we have no rent to pay."

It is said that last year Lord Ashley exhorted the chief tenant of this parish to pay 9s. a week; but he refused to make any advance. It is thought by some of the labourers on his farm that Lord Ashley will get an act of Parliament this year to compel him pay 9s. a week. I told them that I did not think any law maker whatever could make a law to compel farmers to pay higher wages than the farmers could get the men to work for. But they said they thought Lord Ashley could do it. "Oh!" said they, "he gave it terrible to the other lords and squires, at Sturminster, last year, for using we poor people so badly."

But it seems his having "given it terrible" to the lords and squires has left things as they were. Indeed, my recollection of that speech is, that he wanted proofs of what the labourers' condition was. It was only wrong that they should be so poor—if it were true that they were so poor.

Look at Pentridge and Woodyates, my lord. Do not talk again of "nameless and spiteful reporters." Go yourself and see. It is only five miles from where you live, and the property is your own; and omit William Frampton's if you like it not. It may seem the extremest case because I have named it. It is certainly one of the worst; but it is only one. The Goodridges, whose father works for 6s. a week, are much the same. So is John Grist's family. He works for 6s. a week on the road; 1s. is stopped out of that for a bastard child he was father of thirteen years ago. Every week for that time has the money been stopped. He has three children, his wife, and wife's sister (at present sick), and himself to keep out of 5s. a week. On the Saturday before Christmas he received one sovereign for a month's work at road-making. Mrs. Herrington, the grocer's wife, gave him half-a-pound of raisins, else his family would have had no Christmas pudding; the sovereign was already eaten up. They had a small piece of pork (pigment, as they term it) sent from a relation; it was not quite 2lbs. weight; and this they treasured up for more than a month, often needy as they were to eat it, that they might have a bit of meat on Christmas-day.

And poor James Thick! his family was little better. But I need not particularize them.

NOTES OF A TRAVELLER.—No. XV.

Frankfort, Oct. 1.

To a stranger unacquainted with the invisible sources of commercial enterprise that Frankfort possesses, and which I mentioned in my last, the taste of the inhabitants must appear to be anything rather than that of men of business. The shops in the principal streets are a succession of depôts of jewellery, of Birmingham wares, ornamental glass, clocks, which alternate with tailors and milliners' windows and printsellers' exhibitions. The town from the shops bears more the appearance of being a place where money is spent than one where it is made. Except at the fair time, there is little bustle in any part; the burly porters have disappeared that last week were seen tumbling cases and bales about the streets. The signs of the wandering tradesmen are withdrawn from the upper windows of the houses, and those parts of the town that during the fair were the scene of the greatest activity were now more deserted than the rest. The actual arrangement of the town shows itself now that the booths have disappeared, and there is a good deal that merits observation. The Zeil and the Rossmarkt that I mentioned in my last, intersect the city, and divide two distinct sets of inhabitants from each other. Between these wide and tolerably regular streets and the river lies the commercial town, a labyrinth of long narrow causeways, with overhanging houses of every conceivable description of architecture but the recognized orders. On the marketplace there are one or two old houses with their gable ends turned to the street, and carved in wood from top to bottom. On some the remains of fresco-painting may still be traced; and the luxury in iron railings, straight, swelling out, foliaged, and trellised, is scarcely conceivably. One or two churches have remnants of pure taste in the Gothic style. The principal churches are anything but handsome. Adjoining the ugliest of these stands the new Exchange, wattle and glazed in like a large saloon; but proclaimed, by a number of allegorical statues that crown outward buttresses of a massive shape, to be a place which ought to interest all the world. The saloon is spacious, and the roof or upper floor (for the place of meeting is on the ground floor of a large house) is supported by light pillars, the arches resting upon which are fancifully vaulted and gaudily painted, according to the new polychromatic notions of German architects. There is certainly no law which condemns merchants more than other people to surround themselves with gloomy, grave-looking, and sober-coloured objects; and the Frankfort people seem inclined to make their contracts in the sunshine and amidst objects of a cheerful nature. The vaulting of the roof is Oriental in form and Greek in ornament; but ventilators are disposed throughout, which allow an issue for the impure air between the roof of the lower and the floor of the upper story: a contrivance unquestionably modern, and much to be lauded. The saloon will hold five to six hundred persons without inconvenience, and can be heated in winter. On leaving this seat of modern power, which the citizens of Frankfort have on many occasions caused to be felt in all its importance (I must remark that by the Exchange in all continental towns is meant the bill and stock exchange), you see before you a monument of the transitory nature of power of all kinds. The old Guildhall or "Römer," where the monarchs who arrogated the title of "Apostolic Majesty," and "Sovereigns of the Holy Roman Empire," were crowned. There, as late as the accession of the deceased Emperor Francis of Austria, the coronation banquet was held, at which the Electors of Germany served in their different capacities of cupbearer, carver, master of the horse, and so forth. The house in which this ceremony was performed is a mean-looking, very ancient building. You descend to it from the Exchange, and ascending an antiquated staircase, are shown into a low-vaulted room of some size, panelled with old oak, which seems to have been put up without the aid of lead and square. The variety of the houses whose families boast ancestors that attained the imperial honours has furnished a gallery of portraits of indifferent execution for the most part; and the plenty of the citizens preserves the building as a monument of departed greatness, by whose extinction they have lost nothing. From a poor balcony in front of the banquetting-room the Emperor used to show himself to the people after the coronation, which took place in the Cathedral. The crown and sceptre, together with the banquetting service of crystal used on these occasions, are to be seen at Vienna. Not far distant from the Römer, on the banks of the Main, a large house in a curious style of architecture attracts attention. The present house, or "adlhof," stands on the site of a palace erected by Louis the German, who chose Frankfort for his residence after the partition of the empire of Charlemagne into three parts, France, Germany, and Italy, by the treaty of Verdun. This part of Germany was a favourite residence of the Sovereigns at all times. Charlemagne's palace of Ingelheim, the seat of many romantic legends, was situated on the Rhine, not half a day's journey from Frankfort; and in Seligenstadt, a small town a few miles distant, on the east of the city, the tomb of Emma, the daughter of Charlemagne, and his secretary, Eginhard, who won and wore her, may still be seen. On the north side, again, a few hours' drive brings you to Gelnhausen, where the remains of an interesting palace built by Frederick Barbarossa, the leader of the third crusade, may be seen; and, towards the point of confluence of the Main to the Rhine, the traveller curious in ancient reminiscences may choose the spot on which "Tribur" stood, famous for the assemblies of Teutonic warriors who met under their dukes to select an Emperor, while the right of election had more than nominal existence. There is little left to guide imagination to the real site of this last place; but the fertile soil, the swelling rivers, and vine-covered mountains, still lend their delights to those of the mildest climates of Germany; and their spell was acknowledged by Napoleon, who, it is known, meditated a restoration of the palace at Ingelheim.

From the quay, on which little business enough seemed to be stirring, you have a pretty but confined view up and down the river. Some of the best houses are on a terrace at the eastern extremity of the quay, called "The Prospect," and here, too, stands the public library, a spacious and chaste edifice. On re-entering the city to gain the Zeil you are shown the Cathedral, which boasts little of architectural beauty, and nothing that recalls the ceremony of the coronations that used to be performed within its walls. It was probably this paucity of objects of interest in the building that drove Victor Hugo, who as a tourist was bound to say something about it, to compose his romance of the inhabitants of the steeple. The romance has so much of truth in it that a family actually does occupy that elevated position, and that expeditions made of communicating with the street through the aid of a basket has been adopted. But the elevation of this watcher's domicile does not equal that of nearly any brother-watcher throughout Germany, where the church steeple is invariably used as a look-out post whence the alarm is given in case of fire by tolling the large bell.

At the western extremity of the Zeil you come to the places and streets chiefly occupied by another body of the inhabitants, who do their best to keep distinct from the mercantile classes—the diplomatic corps. Frankfort, having lost the symbol of ancient unity, the coronation ceremony, has acquired the presence of the body intruded in symbolise the federative union of the thirty-nine powers that have grown out of the dissolved empire. Each of the German states keeps a minister at Frankfort, and the whole constitute a kind of diet, at which the Austrian minister presides. Subjects that require exertions in common on the part of the states are here not discussed, but the measures agreed upon are promulgated. Such are measures for defence on threatened aggressions, or measures for ensuring internal tranquillity in Germany. In consequence of the disputes that arose after 1830, a new court was constituted of legal deputies, to arbitrate differences between the German Sovereigns and the people. Before this forum the dispute respecting the Hanoverian constitution was brought, but it was found so difficult to ascertain who were the people, there being no such recognised political body in Germany, that the lawyer employed to state the complaint was declared unable to show by whom he was deputed, and the court was saved from an awkward predicament. The meetings of the diplomatic body are held in the quondam palace of the Prince of Thurn and Taxis, whom I mentioned in my last as being the postmaster-general of this neighbourhood. Rather an amusing anecdote was told me of the irresponsible nature of these senatorial assemblies, and which serves to show the efficiency of our foreign diplomacy in matters respecting which the nation is supposed not to be very well informed. It is well known that in 1832 several severe resolutions were published by the Diet of the Confederation respecting the control under which it was intended to place the public press. The English Cabinet thought right to protest through its ambassador, Sir E. Cartwright, against these proceedings (in what capacity does not seem clear); perhaps as one of the guaranteeing powers to the treaty of Vienna. Of course this step would not have been taken if the measure had not been supposed likely to prove prejudicial to English interests. The resolutions were nevertheless supported and signed by M. de Strahlenheim, the Hanoverian minister, another servant of the King of England, who, it seems, was able to assume two characters, one friendly to, and one opposed to, the welfare of this empire.

In those palmy days of official monopoly of intelligence, the most striking instance of the distinction between the two castes of Frankfort society was given by the English embassy. I believe I may state as a fact that, during the stay of our first Minister to the Confederation, our worthy consul, venerable for age and respected for his private life, never entered the dining-room at the embassy as a guest. For a man of fortune who stands high in the estimation of his fellow-citizens, although serving a foreign power, this gentlemanly absurdity was of course a matter of indifference. After all, it was he who did the honours of the place to travelling Englishmen, and who ever wanted information was obliged to apply to him. A more serious result for both Germany and England arose from the total neglect with which his communications were received at the Foreign-office; and neglected they were at a period that was of the most serious importance for our commercial communications, I mean when Frankfort was first invited to join the Zollverein. Had the suggestions that then were made, the statements that were transmitted respecting the productions of this country and the wants of its inhabitants, been duly appreciated or only made public, an understanding would have long since been attained between England and the "Zollverein," whose interests, so far from clashing, are deeply and inseparably interwoven. It would require little more than a statement of products and of prices, correctly drawn up and sufficiently extensive to allow practical men to see their bearing upon each other, in order to convince the industrious classes on both sides of the water that they would do better to combine their power than to waste it in idle conflict. The English capital that is employed in manufacturing is so employed for Germany if the Germans choose to make use of it. If they do not, they must withdraw capital from agriculture and trade where it is so much wanted, in order to erect factories under disadvantageous circumstances. Because these factories produce at a dear rate they must be protected by prohibitory duties, and, once on the false path, the annual changes in the tariff of the Zollverein themselves show that it is difficult to stop.

In considering the present state of trade we are every where driven to the recognition of the danger of departing from sound principles. Security of property is what is wanted, as I showed in my letters from Belgium—first, security from foreign invaders; next, security against meddling legislators. The Belgians have just been placed in jeopardy by the faction that now rules their Chambers; the Germans are in the hands of diplomatic agents, who are not taken from the practical men, but who understand how to use the practical men of all classes by flattering their worst passions, and to obtain the sanction of interested castes for measures that are ruinous to the weal of the community at large.

That Frankfort merchants, through whose hands the result of half the commercial speculations of the Continent pass, would do little like to leave the power of smuggling their trade to pecked parliament or half-educated diplomatists as the people of Hamburg or Bremen, may well be conceived; and, in fact, the adhesion to the Zollverein was only carried after great hesitation, and then chiefly because the trade of the city is not as I have said, one of bales and barrels, but one of a nature which is only heavily taxed in England—credit. The differences in the system in which Frankfort and Hamburg are interested in the question of high duties is proved by the customs' receipts of both places. Frankfort now draws about 60,000 dollars from the coffers of the Zollverein under the present heavy tariff. Hamburg raised with an import duty of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. 711,500 marks, or 200,000 dollars. Since then the import duties have been reduced, as I mentioned in my letter from Hamburg, to 1-8th and  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., levied on the simple assurance of the merchant as to the quality of his wares. Frankfort had thus but little to lose by joining the Zollverein; and the greatest friend of freedom of trade would have abstained from dissuading the free city from an adhesion which gave her Free Trade with her immediate neighbours, which she most wanted. But the opportunity was invaluable for supporting the remonstrances of the citizens at Berlin against the prohibitive nature of some of the tariff rates which the anxiety of Prussia to secure Frankfort would have caused the cabinet of Berlin to consider. The opportunity was misused, and Frankfort regretted little the loss of commercial connexions which were unable or unwilling to aid her in fighting their battle as well as her own.

How far the little German states can expect their commercial interests to be nicely weighed upon emergencies, they may learn from the proceedings every day adopted with regard to internal police by Austria and Prussia, and in which they are obliged to concur. Of the present state of things I had a curious instance afforded me this morning. Standing in a bookseller's shop, where I had called to inquire for a new work, I saw a man enter with a sheet of paper in his hand, which he handed to the bookseller. After reading part of its contents, the bookseller wrote his name in the paper and returned it. He turned then to me, and said, smiling, "A notice from the magistracy that Freilgrath's new poems are prohibited, and liable to confiscation." "Why," replied I, "that would make a poet's fortune in England." "Here, too," said he, "the only person who is not dissatisfied with the order is the publisher." He then handed me the volume to look at, in which nearly every lyrical effusion has for its burden the sorrow created in Germany by the King of Prussia refusing to give the parliamentary constitution which he promised so publicly and so frankly on his accession to the throne. The verses are good, and the expression conceived in such general terms, that none but a Prussian, or some one well versed in the domestic policy of Germany, would think of applying them to Berlin. The most explicit piece the book contains is a translation of Campbell's "Ode to the Germans," in comparison with which the others are gentle complaints. Freilgrath has a remarkable tact in translating from the English, and has even been able to give his countrymen a taste of the beauties of Burns. In the preface he declares his envy of the land in which it was possible to publish, "A man's a man for a' that," without every verse being applied to Alnwick, Apsley House, or Buckingham Palace, and the authors being thus brought into conflict with the pillars of the state. Burns would assuredly, in Germany, have been exchequered, instead of sharing, even in a humble capacity, the profit of the Excise-office; and his danger would have been of course the greater in a land where the state professes to have but one pillar, which will not bear shaking. The history of trade has ever been the history of freedom, and their prospects are still, I am sorry to say, but indifferent in Germany.

A plan that has lately been set on foot, however, indicates a wish on the part of the Frankfort people to revive the trade in wares that they once possessed. A steam-tug company, at the head of which the house of Rothschild stands, is to be called into existence next spring, and to open a direct communication between Biebrich, in Nassau, at the mouth of the Main, and Rotterdam. Biebrich is one of the bonding harbours of the Zollverein, and small vessels are to convey the goods up the Main. As the opening of the great canal between the Danube and the Main may also be looked forward to next spring, the two measures, if properly supported by Austria and England, ought to produce a little revolution in the trading relations of central Europe; and Hungarian wines and English cloths, of superior quality and moderate price, ought once more to meet at the fair of Frankfort. But upon what extraneous materials must not this very feasible commercial speculation of the Frankfort citizens be founded. It can prosper upon no other condition than that common sense shall be allowed to sway in the English Parliament, and in the Austrian, Bavarian, Prussian, and Dutch Cabinets. With such a condition tacked to their shares, no one will deny that the founders of the company are men of common spirit. May they go on, and be assisted by every honest man who hears their tale. But let no one say, after hearing it, that commercial men have nothing to do with politics. They are the first to suffer from the blunders of governments, and are bound to keep the strictest watch over their movements. Many of the streets of Frankfort are named after trades and branches of manufacture that are now no longer pursued there. One of them is connected with a crisis in the history of England which brings home to us the casualties that have dispersed the seats of industry in Europe so strangely as we find them. In the sixteenth century the woollen cloths of England were the most celebrated in Europe. They were mostly exported undyed, and were finished in the great trading cities where dye-stuffs abounded. During the persecutions of Queen Mary, two English cloth manufacturers fled to Frankfort, and established themselves in that city. If they had not been recalled by Elizabeth, it is probable that others would have followed to so hospitable a retreat, and England would have lost, as France afterwards did on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, the most industrious of her citizens and a valuable branch of industry.

In addition to the steam-navigation project that I have mentioned, no less than three lines of railways are in progress, which will centre in Frankfort, whence the communication with the Rhine at Biebrich is secured by means of the Tannus Railway, that has been running for several years. I made an excursion to Biebrich and the celebrated "Rhinegau," the seat of the finest Rhenish vineyards; and the trip is one that repays richly the inquisitive traveller. The Rhine below Mayence widens considerably, and is filled with verdant islands, behind which the summits of the Tannus form beautiful lake scenery. The slope of the Tannus to the Rhine is the site of these famous vineyards, whose cultivation is expensive and produce most uncertain. The vines are out short, and are trimmed with such care that one would think the very leaves were counted upon each. The finest grapes do not ripen before the end of October; but, to make the choice wines, the ripe berries are picked with a needle off the bunches, and separately pressed. I was introduced, through the kindness of my friend M—, to several wine-growers, in whose cellars I tasted wine three years old that was still as sweet as syrup. These choice wines are not fit for table before the sixth year, and require incessant care and watching until they come to maturity. In eight years the grower expects two good and two indifferent, two poor and two bad, vintages; and yet the price of the choice sites is enormously high. The Duke of Nassau bought two years back a strip of land at Rüdesheim, for which he paid 6000 florins for the morgen, or about £800 per acre. Yet, even at this price, the speculation is a good one: for, with proper care, three pipes can be obtained from an acre, of a good year, that will sell for £800. The capitalists of Frankfort are beginning to see that such a trade is rather suited to their means than to those of peasants, whom the bad years bring to the lowest state of distress; and both an augmentation of the growth of fine wines and a moderation of the prices will probably soon take place. The finest growths never find their way to England, as their great value arises from their being bought up by wine-merchants to flavour inferior wines with, which are then shipped and sold under the name of the finer growth. Of the delicious quality of the choice wines, therefore, few have an idea; and in Germany they are only to be met with at the tables of sovereigns, or of such as have interest enough to obtain small quantities. The Marcobrunn, Rüdesheim, Johannisberg, and Steinberg, sell in the timber, in butts containing two pipes each, from £5 to £7. 7s. per dozen. The large size of the cask is the great inconvenience that precludes private consumers.

HONOURS TO WORKING MEN.—Upwards of 3000 persons were assembled on Tuesday last, in the Halle aux Draps, Paris, to witness the ceremony of the distribution of prizes, by the Prefect of the Seine, to the journeymen who have attended with the best success the lectures of the professors at the Association Polytechnique. The scene was striking. The Prefect delivered an impressive address, and several musical compositions were sung by the pupils of the association.

THE OLD AND THE NEW ARISTOCRACY.—In the opposition that is offered by the landowners as a body to repeal of the Corn Law there is, we think, an element that is seldom and not sufficiently noticed, and which is at least of some importance, as constituting a stick in the bundle. That there is selfishness and ignorance, and the prejudice that is begot of habit, arranged on the side of the Corn Law, is true enough; but there is more, and something which has a distinct and peculiar source. There is, undoubtedly, much kindness and goodness of heart among the aristocracy and gentry who own the principal portion of the soil; they are not, we believe, strictly speaking, more greedy or selfish than any other class of the community; they are quite as much disposed to act justly and do righteously as their neighbours; but they are, by reason of the character and history of their order, and the conventional and other distinctions which it has enjoyed, especially subject to be influenced by pride of caste in its most vehement and intensified form; and to the force and arrogance of this feeling we are inclined to ascribe much of their resistance to Corn-Law abolition. They perceive in this claim the advances of a power that is offensive to all their idiosyncrasy as a class; they see in it the encroachment of a new order of aristocracy, which, uniting wealth with intellectual activity, has recently come into competition with their older aristocracy in every department of the State and of society, sharing with it the high places and positions which were formerly all its own; that is daily extending possession in the soil itself, and disputing with the hereditary landowners the exercise of the social and political influences that for centuries belonged to the latter almost exclusively. To this jealousy and dislike of the manufacturing and commercial aristocracy, operating in many cases where its existence is not known or recognised by the parties themselves, we attribute not a little of the hostility that is manifested by the landed gentry to a measure which would go to increase its prosperity and authority. But the end is certainly shaped; the new aristocracy has taken firm root, and will surely establish itself in the attitude to which its natural and other advantages inevitably tend. Necessity, and familiarity with its presence, will gradually lessen, until it shall finally extinguish the antipathy that is now borne towards it by the class who regard it as a poacher on their manor; and the two orders, with a good deal in common, will be nevertheless distinguished by differences that will act as a check on the faults and ambition of each other.—Forthcoming Journal.

LECTURES ON POLITICAL ECONOMY AT THE ROYAL INSTITUTION, LIVERPOOL.—A course of lectures on political economy is about to be delivered at the Royal Institution, Liverpool, by Thomas Banfield, Esq. The commencement of the course, we observe, is announced for next week. The friends of freedom of commerce in Liverpool will thus have an opportunity of hearing the principles of political economy expounded in their scientific as well as their practical bearings by a most able and accomplished man. Mr. Banfield delivered a similar course of lectures at Cambridge in the spring of last year, and we feel the obligation of thus acknowledging the pleasure and profit we derived from the perusal of the interesting reports of those lectures in the Cambridge papers.

DISCUSSION ON FREE TRADE.—On Monday se'nnight a discussion of the principles of Free Trade took place at the Old Fellows' Hall, Shipley, between Mr. Jude Yates, of Bradford, and Mr. John Harper, the Protectionist lecturer. The challenge had been given by Mr. Yates at a lecture delivered at Shipley by Mr. Harper. About 200 individuals from Shipley, Windhill, Baildon, and other places in the vicinity, were present. After a rather desul-tory debate, the following resolution and amendment were proposed:—"That Free Trade is essential to promote the well-being of the people, by plentifully supplying the necessaries and comforts of life, and thereby conducing to the moral and intellectual improvement of the human race." "That it is the opinion of this meeting that Free Trade, under the existing commercial arrangements of the world, would prove destructive to the best interests of the working classes of this country." The first was carried amid loud cheering, somewhat to the chagrin of the protection chairman, who said many friends had left the room. Votes of thanks to the disputants, chairmen, referee, and Old Fellows' committee, for the use of the hall, were passed, and the company separated, at near twelve o'clock.

ANTI-CORN-LAW TRACTS.—During the past week a great quantity of Anti-Corn-Law tracts have been distributed in Bradford and the neighbourhood amongst the electors. We hope the seed thus sown will take root, and bring forth fruit abundantly.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XIV.

TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART., M.P.,
First Lord of the Treasury, &c. &c.

SIR,—Any attempt to prove to you the truth of Free-Trade principles or the importance of their practical application, would be a superfluous procedure. You have made repeated profession of those principles. In various ways you have applied them, although it may be but partially. From the proposition of your tariff to the recent admission of Venezuelan sugar at the reduced duty, there has been a slow and cautious, but a distinctly perceptible, advance in the measures of your Government towards Free Trade. The question to be argued with you is not one of principle but of policy; not one of object, but of time, mode, and degree. You are afraid of injuring existing interests by sudden changes. And you are also not unobservant of the influence of your measures on the strength of your political position. This wariness has marked your whole public career, and is deeply inwrought into your personal character. The danger is, lest you should be too wary, and pass the point at which boldness is the safest caution. Did such peril only affect yourself, with yourself its consideration might be left; but it involves the condition and prospects of millions. Those who participate in your connexion as to principles; who are thankful for every step, however small, which you have taken in their application; and who are anxious for that immensity of national good which would arise from their consistent and complete adoption, have claims on your attention, however different from your own may be their political sympathies and antipathies.
The topic is paramount to all party demarcation.

How much further can you go towards the introduction of a consistent Free-Trade policy without fairly grappling with the food monopoly? Are you not all but brought to a stand-still already? The landowners are alarmed and vigilant. You had a taste of their quality on the sugar question. They will not again help you in the demolition even of the minutest monopoly. You will no more be able to persuade them that they are the safer for the sacrifice of others. It will be impossible for you to open your mouth on import duties, but they will look down at your feet and think they see more than your boot covers. You are crippled for what you know to be the only sound commercial policy.
Suspicion will track you through every speech and bill with the scent of a bloodhound. You will rise in the House with the vindictive monopolist in your rear, the Whig partisan in your front, and that magnetic telegraph at work between them which ensures co-operation without coalition. What a helpless and pitiable condition! Can you endure it for the sake of office? Or can you long secure office by enduring it?

On the other hand, imagine the Corn-Law question disposed of, what ulterior division need you apprehend in your majority? In all remaining applications of your commercial principles they would be a band of ready helpers. None so decided as they to raze every remaining fortress of monopoly, and not leave one stone upon another. There would no longer be any apprehension from your measures.
The threatening aspect would change to one of promise. In each new move they would foresee increasing profit instead of impending peril. The spell of "protection" in his own case once broken, not a landowner but would cheer you on in your progress towards its utter demolition. The country would breathe freely, in the grateful perception of each successive benefit. Controversy would give place to congratulation. The din of the old warfare of agriculture and manufactures would die away into the remoteness of historic distance. A career of useful statesmanship would open before you, limited only by the capacity of your own intellect, wherein classes might be harmonised, misery abated,
the labouring many raised, and the truest glory, that of peaceful aggrandizement, be achieved for our country.

But the intermediate step—"there's the rub."
True, you peril office by attempting it, and might very likely be for awhile unseated. What then?
Are you satisfied never to apply your Free-Trade principles to corn? Or do you anticipate a better time by delay?

Never! Why then, as I have already shown, you submit to be obstructed in all your commercial legislation. You consent to live the manacled and maimed slave of a suspicion. You forego the noblest prize that remains to recompense the toils of office. You will neither do good nor win credit.
Much too deeply is the thought of your ultimate purposes rooted in the minds of the landed monopolists for either forgiveness or forgetfulness to enter there. Years will not eradicate their suspicion. It will outlive your power, and be planted on your grave.

A better time? What can bring it? The Whig leaders are still too infatuated to preoccupy the ground. With that renowned ingenuity which builds a wall to knock their heads against, they hold themselves pledged to their fixed duty, and you unpledged as the free air. They stick to their stand by the wayside, where you may pass on and welcome. As to them, delay only provides against you the chance of their having a lucid interval. The chance may be remote; it is not an absolute impossibility.

You have brought in a bill so lately—Psha! Sir Robert; you are too much of a man to mind that. It is a good deal longer since the enactment of your bill than that enactment was from the time of your declaration against any change. Besides, how stands your bill as to the different parties interested?

To the agriculturists, who reckoned upon its keeping up the price of wheat to 56s. the quarter, it is a complete failure. Nothing has been kept up but rents, unless it be agitation. At meetings of protection societies, the farm-tenantry are declared to be posting rapidly on the road to ruin. Do not think of reading your history in their eyes, or hearing it from their lips. You can lose no popularity at their meetings. Even with the landlords, your law is a forlorn hope. They merely think,

"Better to bear the ills [or bills] we have,
Than fly to others which we know not of."

You have no clinging attachment on their parts to overcome. They are in no state to offer stout resistance to a bold onset. Moreover, can they govern the country? Were they to turn you out, there is only one other thing in the wide world which they could do, and that is, to let you in again.

Wheat at 45s. is a good repeal price. No great shock would be given by the change. It would simply render more clear what people were to do. Any great fall or rise will breed confusion and entanglement; desolation in the south or commotion in the north. It is a price to take advantage of for action, as you would the conversion of a stock in the funds. The moment is a golden one. Old Time bends his brow for the forelock to be seized. There is utter destruction to the small farmers, in the perspective one way; and in the other, the well-remembered honours of Paisley, with many a scene of kindred misery.

Although the cheapness resulting from abundant harvests has baffled your bill in its understood promise to the agriculturists, and stimulated a degree of manufacturing prosperity which could not have existed had that promise been realized, yet the condition of great masses of the people continues to be such as demands attention and amelioration. The agricultural labourers are unhelpt. The swarms of our city population are unhelpt. Every daily paper records some death by destitution.

Every charitable society testifies to the necessity for change. Not a near-sighted philanthropist but has his nostrum. But they all obtain more credit for the fact of the disease than for the efficacy of the alleged specific. They are all witnesses that the poor "come off short" in the distribution of the food and wealth which their labour is the agency of creating. And for that the poor will take their testimony. The rest they set down as quackery. You, Sir Robert, know it to be quackery. You are aware, if not of the means of absolute cure, yet of the best remedy in the stores of legislation. Till that be produced, the mischief grows. Your bill can do no more for it.

I have spoken, in general terms, of the "land-owners" as the lion in your path. Really, it is only a landowning clique. With such men as the Duke of Wellington and Lord Stanley, the money worth of the Corn Laws to their class is altogether subordinate to political or party considerations. With the Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham the case may be different. The landlords whom they represent make a great noise, and with the help of stewards, jobbers, and a host of sycophants and hangers-on, they muster their troops of dependent tenantry, and put on a big face of hostility. Is it much more formidable than what you so suddenly and virtuously confronted for Catholic Emancipation? And is there any comparison in the results to be anticipated?

Do not fancy that the writer dreams of persuading you. I deem persuasion as unlikely as conviction is unnecessary. You are making a blunder, and I am exposing the blunder; that is all. To be the greatest of those who lead, has never been the praise or the ambition of your statesmanship; but you have commonly won the humbler fame of being the expertest of those who follow. In the present case, even this glory is likely soon, by over-caution and prolonged delay, to be in danger of forfeiture. This is a great pity on your own account; a yet greater on that of the industrious millions who must endure the consequences.

ON THE CONDITION OF ENGLAND.

TO THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

"What mean ye that ye beat my people to pieces, and grind the faces of the poor? saith the Lord God of Hosts."—Isaiah lii. 15.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR GRACE,—I hope that the generally admitted importance of the subject on which I venture to address your Grace a second time will absolve me from the imputation of unseemly earnestness; and I desire that my respect for your exalted station may be measured by the importunity which I may happen to display.

I would most respectfully submit to the consideration of your Grace, that, if the present Corn Law makes bread dear and scarce, it serves its intended purpose; if not, it serves no purpose.

Till the year 1815 corn could be brought to England in exchange for goods of many kinds at so nominal a duty as scarcely to form an obstacle to its introduction into the country: even during the war with France the clothing of the army of Napoleon was well known to have been supplied by us in exchange for the corn of that country, indirectly introduced.

But at that fatal period probably the greatest legislative crime was committed that the Christian world ever saw: a sudden most unconstitutional innovation, and cruel inroad on the natural rights of the community, was made by the Legislature of the kingdom, who, supported by the fixed bayonets of the soldiery, passed these atrocious enactments under the childish delusion that, while a Superintending and Almighty Providence looked down upon them, the rich could with impunity flourish by limiting the food of the poor. At the end of the war the end of high prices of corn, and consequently high rents and tithes, was apprehended by our legislators of the land and reverend clergy; the admission of corn in exchange for goods was therefore forbidden, unless corn was at a famine price. The wickedness was perpetrated surreptitiously, for it was alleged to be intended for the protection of the farmer and his labourer, or, in other words, for the protection of native industry.

Famine price is not yet supposed to be reached, though famine itself is rife in the land; the law at the present hour interdicts the entrance of any considerable quantity of food in exchange for the industrial products of the people; nor do we hesitate still to pray for that daily bread which we obstinately and blindly refuse to accept: thus, while we dare not make mouths at men, we find courage enough to mock the Majesty of Heaven! Nevertheless, the prohibition against the admission of food, though absolute, is not sufficient to satisfy some landlords and clergymen.

But let us see the influence of protection on those subjected to its tender mercies. The present Corn Law, modified and contrived by the wisdom of Sir Robert Peel, had for its object, according to the views of the Minister, to regulate and prevent the price of corn from sinking below 56s. or 58s. the quarter, which might, therefore, be called the Parliament or protection price. But good corn has lately been sold at 37s. and 40s. the quarter; and the weekly average of the kingdom on December 14th was 45s. 1d. the quarter: the latter may be denominated the market or actual price.

Those farmers who have not the good fortune to have discovered that knowledge is power and ignorance is weakness, and who vainly imagined that foolish and wicked laws could stand in place of the power of supply and demand in regulating the market price at which they must sell their products, have been defrauded by the law of the difference between the putative and tangible prices. Thus, by a shameful abuse of their simplicity, for the land which they have laboriously tilled they have been induced to pay the farmer, and for their marketable commodities they received the latter: so that, to use plain words, under the semblance of law they have been robbed at the rate of 10s. 10d., and even 18s. or 19s., in each quarter of corn sold at the above prices.

This is the protection the farmer is now receiving, which, to my humble judgment, very much resembles that afforded by the hawk to the sparrow, or the wolf to the lamb. Nor is "Homo homini lupus" less descriptive of the modern than of the ancient state of society. Heaven in its infinite mercy protect us from protection, and defend us from the unspeakable kindness of agricultural legislators and clerical friends! Under this withering influence it is not very wonderful that the farmers should have been the only capitalists who, on the average, have tolled without profit, and who since the institution of stringent Corn Laws have in a body petitioned the legislative receivers of rents no less than five several times for relief in their deep distress, under which many have sunk into pauperism, and none can by any possibility prosper permanently.

When the farmer pays any part of his rent and tithes out of capital instead of profit, how can he afford to pay many workmen? The exhortation of the landlords and clergy to employ them freely, and pay them liberally, is a vain mockery: thus is the land, though cruelly ravaged by game, most inadequately cultivated; evil is made to pass a step downwards in the scale of society; and the poor labourer is protected into the workhouse or the grave, to become a wailing angel at the Throne of Grace, and, perhaps, to bear witness against those oppressors to whom the Blessed Saviour gave his injunction, "Feed my flock."

It has been proved by statistical returns that the farmer's labourer, who in many counties is so protected that he gets sometimes, as in the example of the "Sussex Labourer," who lately published his pathetic address, as little as 6s. for a week's work, often only 6s., 7s., and 8s., to maintain himself, a wife, and six children. These poor victims of legislative tenderness have also been proved by official returns to be much worse nourished than the convicted felons in the prisons; and thus, at least, they may be truly said to receive protection from the danger of that reptile under which the receivers of rents and tithes are liable sometimes to suffer or expire. Never did want and luxury exist in such amount, side by side, as in Christian England; and it may truly be said that Dives and Lazarus jostle each other at every post: one bedewing the other with crocodile tears in abundance, and, as if in cruel mockery, offering baths and ventilation in place of the more solid materials of bread and meat. The addition, not the substitution, of these things would have been highly praiseworthy and honourable to those who offer them, "For who can cloy the hungry edge of appetite by bare imagination of a feast?" Your Grace will, I hope, permit me in the name of the poor and hungry to offer my most grateful thanks for your munificent patronage of public baths, but at the same time to mention an almost daily observation, which, during many years' residence at the largest hospital in London, I had reason to make, that many of the sufferings there witnessed required nourishment more than medicine; and baths were sometimes used to cure complaints which would have been prevented by the more liberal use of bread!

Yet many of our legislators and clergy have announced that cheapness, which is almost impossible without plenty, is one of the greatest dangers to which our poor could be subjected; than is it not shocking that our excellent Liturgy should contain several prayers for these afflictions; and might not we also adopt the prayer which became a proverb among the French people just before the Revolution—"Dieu nous garde de l'équité du Parlement"? But I have often heard it mentioned by good clergymen, that though they were well convinced of the folly and wickedness of the Corn Laws, which entail scarcity on the poor, and forbid their working for food, they objected to entering into anything like a political arena. I have then ventured to ask them, if there were more of politics in the Corn Law than in the game law—so often administered by the clergy? I have also in my simplicity inquired if the honourable term of pastor, by which the reverend clergy are commonly designated, could possibly have been intended to apply to the feeding or supervising of game? Or if there can be more impropriety as concerns the clerical character in endeavouring to feed the hungry through the wholesome instrumentality of their own industry, than to wash and clothe the dirty among our brethren?

I am wrong to speak of myself personally, but perhaps your Grace will forgive the observation, that I have always found bathing makes me very hungry. I cannot but feel some apprehension that a good remedy may in some cases be productive of a very bad and almost, under the blessed corn or scarcity law, an incurable disease; and that, in the working of our pharisaical philanthropy, the inconvenience of dirt may be made to give place to the horrors of unappeased hunger!

Thus may we find charity enough to bestow the ornaments, but look in vain for the justice which offers the useful. To my humble way of thinking, however, generosity without justice has always appeared like faith without works, or religion without honesty—"a goodly apple rotten at the core!"

But I entertain full faith in the power of true religion, and cannot restrain the expression of confidence that your Grace will take into consideration the propriety of saving our holy institutions from the scornful imputation of hypocrisy, and will be pleased to contribute your powerful influence and example in the sacred cause of feeding the poor, or rather allowing them to feed themselves by their own handiwork, instead of encumbering them with vain professions and baneful protection. I am emboldened in this expression of honest conviction by the admiration I feel at the readiness and liberality exhibited by your Grace in the work of washing and the erection of public baths.

Some violent critics have said that men should be fed before they are washed; but I agree with your Grace that the poor should sit down to their meals with clean faces; nor can the idea be contemplated that Christian ministers could desire to substitute clean faces for empty stomachs.

I am sure your Grace will obey the divine injunction of the Psalmist,

"Defend the poor and fatherless: see that such as are in need and necessity have right."
"Deliver the outcast and poor: save them from the bond of the ungodly."

I have the honour to be,

Your Grace's most obedient and devoted servant,

45, Gloucester-place, Kentish-town.

CHRISTMAS EVE.—On Christmas eve, an excellent supper, of roast beef and plum pudding, was given by Mr. G. A. Beardmore, of Nottingham, to all the workmen in the employ of his father in this town, on the occasion of his becoming a partner in the establishment. Mr. B., jun., who occupied the chair, made an excellent speech during the evening upon the exertions now being made by the Anti-Corn-Law League in their behalf, by advocating a more extensive Free Trade. The women and children were also regaled with an excellent tea, with the usual accompaniments. The evening was spent in the most harmonious manner, interspersed as it was with several rational amusements, which were kept up until a late hour, all being highly gratified with the evening's entertainment.

THE POSITION AND PROSPECTS OF COMMERCE AND MANUFACTURES.—The year which closes this day has been one of the most remarkable ever known in the commercial and manufacturing history of the country. It has presented the contrast of unexampled prosperity in almost every branch of manufacturing industry, with almost unexampled depression in the price of the raw materials employed in those manufactures. From the beginning to the end of 1844, the course of prices has baffled all calculation, and has, in too many cases, inflicted enormous losses on individuals and communities. With the exception of the importers of gum, timber, and sheep's wool, there is no class of merchants who have not lost money this year, and some have lost it to a frightful extent. The year, as a whole, has been as disastrous to Liverpool as it has been fortunate for Manchester. Happily, when things get to the worst they begin to mend, and the general impression in Liverpool is, that they are past the worst, and that there is a prospect of a very extensive trade in the coming year, with improving prices. High prices are not desirable for the country, but an improvement in prices resulting from a prosperous trade and an extending demand is so; and it is the opinion of persons of sound judgment, well acquainted with the present condition of trade and commerce, that there are the kind of prices which are likely to prevail during the year on which we are about to enter. Most sincerely do we trust that these anticipations will prove well founded.—Liverpool Standard, Dec. 21.

REVIEW.

Memoirs of the Reign of George III. By Horace Walpole. Edited, with notes, by Sir Denis Le Marchant. London: Bentley.

Sir Denis Le Marchant has done good service to the cause of historical literature by the admirable manner in which he has edited Walpole's valuable and interesting memoirs. Since the Revolution of 1688, English parties, and more especially the great Whig party, have been held together by bonds of kindred and affinity not less closely than by community of principle or identity of object; and the genealogies and private records of a family often illustrate passages in the policy and administration of public men which would otherwise seem almost inexplicable. We are now separated by almost two generations from the accession of a British-born King of the house of Brunswick. At that period the administration of the first Pitt had raised England to a height of moral greatness superior to what the country had attained even under Elizabeth or Cromwell. The great Minister had been forced into power against the will of the Monarch, and in spite of that oligarchy formed by the combination of "the great families" which had monopolised all power in England ever since the Revolution. He never quite broke through the conventional trammels of party, which have for nearly two centuries made imbecility, trickery, and hesitation more or less characteristic of the policy of every cabinet that has been formed in England since the restoration of Charles II. But the elder Pitt was not patient in his fetters; there were moments when he dared to be great, and to select instruments of greatness in consequence of their merit, without any reference to their parliamentary influence or aristocratic connexions. George III. entered on his reign with a fixed determination to emancipate himself from the oligarchy which had held his grandfather in complete subjection. The tortuous means which he adopted for this purpose, though they scarcely rose above the level of ordinary court intrigues, and were in themselves utterly contemptible, led to a series of revolutions which have changed the aspect of both hemispheres; America was sacrificed to the prejudices of the palace.

Horace Walpole was admirably calculated to be the historian of the early part of the reign of George III., fruitful as it was of no great event, though fraught with important consequences. He had a happy facility in seizing on the traits which indicate character, as straw shows the direction of a current; and hence he takes care to note that the first act of George III.'s reign was indicative of that insincerity, not to say hypocrisy, which marked his entire career:—

"The first moment of the new reign afforded a symptom of the Prince's character—of that cool dissimulation in which he had been so well initiated by his mother, and which comprehended almost the whole of what she had taught him. Princess Amelia, as soon as she was certain of her father's death, sent an account of it to the Prince of Wales; but he had already been apprised of it. He was riding, and received a note from a German valet-de-chambre, attendant on the late King, with a private mark agreed upon between them, which certified him of the event. Without surprise or emotion, without dropping a word that indicated what had happened, he said his horse was lame, and turned back to Kew. At dismounting he said to the groom, 'I have said this horse is lame; I forbid you to say the contrary.'"

Junius, speaking of the King in his celebrated letter to Horne Tooke, says—"I know that man better than any of you: Nature never intended him for anything but a good-humoured fool; long practice and a systematic education have made him a consummate hypocrite." Lord Chatham also, by direct implication, accused the new Monarch of insincerity when he paid a high tribute of applause to the honesty and candour of George II. That Walpole's doubts of the King's sincerity were early formed appears from a letter addressed to George Montagu, in the first month of the new reign. He says:—

"There is great dignity and grace in the King's manner. I don't say this like my dear Madame de Sevigné, because he was civil to me, but the part is well acted. If they do as well behind the scenes as upon the stage, it will be a very complete reign."

Junius's allusion to the "systematic education" of George III., and the seclusion in which he was kept by his mother, lead us to consider the secret of the influence which Lord Bute possessed in the early part of the King's reign. Scandal describes him as the favourite and favoured lover of the Princess Dowager of Wales; circumstances have recently come to light which seem to prove that he had learned from her the secret of her son's being subject to fits of mental aberration, and there is now abundant evidence that George III. had fits of insanity on several occasions when the matter was concealed from the public. Whenever Lord North's private papers will be permitted to see the light, there will be evidence that the King's obstinacy on many subjects, and particularly on the course of policy to be pursued towards America, amounted to positive monomania. At the very outset of his reign he displayed a resolution to make peace with France on almost any terms. The following anecdote on this subject is new to us:—

"The King's speech to his council afforded matter of remark, and gave early specimen of who was to be the confidential minister, and what measures were to be pursued: for it was drawn by Lord Bute, and communicated to none of the King's servants. It talked of a bloody and expensive war, and of obtaining an honourable and lasting peace. Thus was it delivered; but Mr. Pitt went to Lord Bute that evening, and, after an altercation of three hours, prevailed that in the printed copy the words should be changed to an expensive but just and necessary war; and that after the words honourable peace should be inserted, in concert with our allies. Lord Mansfield and others counselled these palliatives too; but it was two o'clock of the following afternoon before the King would yield to the alteration."

The King's dissimulation was exhibited in no very honourable form by his conduct in relation to his marriage. Walpole tells the story with a colouring derived from his dislike of the Fox party, but the facts are substantially correct:—

"But there had happened circumstances still more pressing, more alarming. The King was fallen in love with Lady Sarah Lennox, sister of the Duke of Richmond; a very young lady of the most blooming beauty, and shining with all the graces of unaffected but animated nature. What concurred to make her formidable to the mother and favourite, was, her being under the tutorage of Mr. Fox, her eldest sister's husband; and in truth she and her family spared no assiduity to fix the young Monarch's heart. And though Fox would probably not have been scrupulous or delicate on the terms of cementing that union, the King's overtures were so encouraging that Fox's views extended even to placing the young lady on the throne. Early in the winter, the King told Lady Susan Strangways, Mr. Fox's niece, and the confidante of Lady Sarah, that he hoped she (Lady Susan) would not go out of town soon. She said, she should. 'But,' replied the King, 'you will return in summer, for the coronation?' Lady Susan answered, 'I do not know; I hope so.' 'But,' said the King again, 'they talk of a wedding. There have been many proposals; but I think an English match would do better than a foreign one. Pray, tell Lady Sarah Lennox I say so.' The next time Lady Sarah went to court (and her family took care that she should not be seldom) the King said, 'He hoped Lady Susan had told her his last conversation.'

"The Juno was not blind to these whispers and dialogues. Lady Bute was instructed to endeavour to place herself in the circle, and prevent them. And the Princess Augusta marked her observation of what was going forward to Lady Sarah herself, laughing in her face, and trying to affront her. But Fox was not to be so rebuffed. Though he went himself to bathe in the sea (possibly to disguise his intrigues), he left Lady Sarah at Holland House, where she appeared every morning in a field close to the great road (where the King passed on horseback) in a fauced habit, making hay.

"Such mutual propensity fixed the resolution of the Princess. One Colonel Graeme was despatched in the most private manner as a traveller, and vested with no character, to visit various little Protestant courts, and make report of the qualifications of the several unmarried Princesses. Beauty and, still less, talents, were not, it is likely, the first object of his instructions. On the testimony of this man, the golden apple was given to the Princess of Mecklenburg; and the marriage precipitately concluded. The ambassador was too remarkable not to be further mentioned. This Graeme, then, was a notorious Jacobite, and had been engaged in the late rebellion. On a visit he made to Scotland, his native country, after this embassy, David Hume, the historian, said to him, 'Colonel Graeme, I congratulate you on having exchanged the dangerous employment of making kings, for the more lucrative province of making queens.'

"So complete was the King's deference to the will of his mother, that he blindly accepted the bride who had chosen for him; though, to the very day of the council, he carried on his courtship to Lady Sarah; and she did not doubt of receiving the crown from him, till she heard the public declaration of its being designed for another. Yet, in confirmation of the trust he had reposed in Lady Susan Strangways, himself appointed Lady Sarah to be one of the bridesmaids to the Queen. Yet Lord Bute's friends affected to give another turn to the story: and insisted that the King had never thought of Lady Sarah but for his mistress. All, they affirmed, he had said to Lady Susan was, to bid her ask Lady Sarah if she should like a place in the family of the new Queen; that she had accepted it; and that the King had destined her to be Mistress of the Robes. Her surprise and disappointment, however, were too strongly marked to make this legend credible. Lady Susan adhered to the truth of what she had reported, in various examinations by her father and uncle. And the resentment Lady Sarah expressed, and which caused, as the Court said, her not being placed about the new Queen, was proof enough on which side the truth lay. The Juno persuaded the King she was a bad young woman; but if she was, what hindered her becoming his mistress? Was it criminal to propose being his wife rather than his mistress? And what became of the King's boasted piety, if he intended to place his mistress about his wife? Some coquet attempts, which Lady Sarah afterwards made to recover his notice, and her stooping to bear the Queen's train as bridesmaid, did her more prejudice than all that was invented against her. Pique and extreme youth might excuse both; and her soon after preferring a clergyman's son to several great matches, gave evidence that ambition was not a rooted passion in her."

It was remarked early in George III.'s reign that, notwithstanding the King's pretensions to piety, he selected for his principal confidants some of the most notorious profligates of that or any other age, such as the Earls of Sandwich and Talbot, Sir Francis Dashwood, and others of minor note.

* Lady Caroline Lennox, eldest daughter of Charles second Duke of Richmond, married to Henry Fox, Paymaster of the Forces.

† Eldest daughter of Stephen Fox, Earl of Hchester, by the sole daughter and heiress of Mr. Strangways Horner, whose name he assumed.

‡ Holland House, beyond Kensington, the seat of the Earls of Warwick and Holland; now of Henry Earl of Holland.

Earl Talbot, as Lord High Steward, presided over the coronation, and involved himself in several quarrels. The banquet in Westminster Hall having been omitted at the two last coronations, we quote some notices of the disputes to which Lord Talbot's conduct gave rise:—

"With the City, with the Knights of the Bath, and the Barons of the Cinque Ports, Lord Talbot had various squabbles, by retrenching their tables at the coronation. Beckford told him it was hard if the citizens should have no dinner, when they were to give the King one, which would cost them £10,000. This menace prevailed. Sir William Stanhope, brother of Lord Chesterfield, a man of not less wit, and of more ill nature than his elder, said, 'it was an affront to the Knights of the Bath; for some of us,' added he, 'are gentlemen.' It was a more bitter speech he made against the Scotch and their Protection. 'He would not go to court,' he said, 'for fear of the itch, which would reduce him to go to the Princess's court for brimstone.' To the Barons of the Cinque Ports Lord Talbot said, 'If they came to him as Lord Steward, their request could not be granted; if as Lord Talbot, he was a match for any of them.'"

The pageant of the coronation was followed by a more exciting and important event—the compelled resignation of Mr. Pitt. On quitting office "the great commoner" gratified his enemies and disgusted his friends by accepting a pension for himself and a peerage for his wife. Walpole felt more keenly on this subject than could have been anticipated: he had begun to respect Pitt for his disinterestedness, and to admire him for the vigour with which he smote the house of Bourbon; and under the influence of these feelings he had pardoned, if not forgotten, Pitt's bitter opposition to his father, and the share he had in that Minister's overthrow. Walpole's feelings of disappointment were strongly expressed in a letter which he wrote at the time to the Countess of Ailesbury:—

"He insisted on a war with Spain, was resisted, and last Monday resigned. The City breathed vengeance on his opposers, the Council quaked, and the Lord knows what would have happened; but yesterday, only Friday, as this giant was stalking to seize the Tower of London, he stumbled over a silver penny, carried it home to Lady Hester, and they are now as quiet good sort of people as my Lord and Lady Bath who lived in the vinegar bottle. In fact, madam, this immaculate man has accepted the barony of Chatham for his wife, with a pension of three thousand pounds a year for three lives; and, though he has not quitted the House of Commons, I think my Lord Anson would be as formidable there. The pension he has left us is a war for three thousand lives! perhaps for twenty times three thousand lives! But 'Does this become a soldier? this become Whom armies follow'd and whom people lov'd?' What! to sneak out of the scrape, prevent peace, and avoid the war! blast one's character, and all for the comfort of a paltry annuity, a long-necked peerage, and a couple of Granvilles!"

Pitt was succeeded in his place of Ministerial leader in the House of Commons by George Grenville, who has earned an unhappy immortality by having originated the scheme for the taxation of the American colonies. The popular hatred of Lord Bute and his associates soon threw a veil over Pitt's delinquencies, and his influence in the City became greater than ever. An address was voted to him by the Common Council; and when, on the occasion of a royal visit, he went to dine in Guildhall, he was overwhelmed with applause, while the King was received in insignificant silence, and Lord Bute so violently assailed that fears were entertained for his personal safety. In the "Memoirs" Walpole attributes Bute's unexpected resignation to his dread of a popular tumult in consequence of the new tax imposed on cider; but in a letter to George Montagu, written on the very day, he gives a more plausible account of the transaction:—

"To-day has been fatal to a whole nation—I mean the Scotch. Lord Bute resigned this morning. His intention was not even suspected till Wednesday, nor at all known a very few days before. In short, there is nothing more nor less than a panic; a fortnight's opposition has demolished that scandalous but vast majority which a fortnight had purchased, and in five months a plan of absolute power has been demolished by a panic. He pleads to the world bad health; to his friends, more truly, that the nation was set at him. He pretends to intend retiring absolutely and giving no umbrage."

Churchill also ascribes Bute's resignation to sheer cowardice:—

"When Bute with foreign hand,
Grown wanton with ambition, scourged the land—
When Scots or slaves to Scotsmen steer'd the helm,
When peace, inglorious peace, disgraced the realm—
Distrust and general discontent prevail'd;
But when (he best knows why) his split quill'd,
When with a sudden panic struck, he fled,
Sneaked out of power, and hid his miscreant head."

The belief that Bute, after his resignation, still continued to exercise an important influence in the royal councils was very general; and there is no doubt that his policy was never abandoned at court, though he was not long trusted with its guidance. Bute was, in fact, the creator of the party known by the name of "the King's friends," which during the entire reign existed separate and apart from every successive administration, forming "a back-stairs cabinet," possessing more of the royal confidence, and exercising more real power, than the nominal Ministry. It was against the presumed existence of Scotch advisers in the back-stairs cabinet that

Wilkes directed the satire of the North Briton. There were many numbers of that celebrated publication which would have furnished better grounds for prosecution than the celebrated "45;" and indeed the Ministers were so well aware of the weakness of their case, that they employed the meanest treachery to obtain a copy of the "Essay on Woman," a worthless piece of obscenity, of which Wilkes had printed twelve copies at a private printing-press. This said essay is one of the most dull and stupid productions that was ever issued by vulgar depravity: its attempts at wit are miserable failures, and its filthy coarseness absolutely loathsome. The notice, however, which the Ministers attracted to this wretched production has ever since kept it before the world; even at the time, many—we may say most—persons of right feeling forgot the blasphemy of the work in the infamy of the accusers:—

"The plot so hopefully laid to blow up Wilkes, and ruin him in the estimation of all the decent and grave, had, at least in the latter respect, scarce any effect at all. The treachery was so gross and scandalous, so revengeful, and so totally unconnected with the political conduct of Wilkes, and the instruments so despicable, odious, or in whom any pretensions to decency, sanctimony, or faith, were so preposterous, that, losing all sight of the scandal contained in the poem, the whole world almost united in crying out against the informers. Sandwich, in opening the discovery, had canted till his own friends could not keep their countenances. Sir Francis Dashwood was not more notorious for singing profane and lewd catches; and what aggravated the hypocrisy, scarce a fortnight had passed since this holy Secretary of State himself had been present with Wilkes at a weekly club to which both belonged, held at the top of Covent-garden Theatre, and composed of players and the loosest revellers of the age. Warburton's part was only ridiculous, and was heightened by its being known that Potter, his wife's gallant, had had the chief hand in the composition of the verses. However, an intimacy commenced between the Bishop and Sandwich, and some jovial dinners and libations of champagne cemented their friendship. Kidgell, the jackal, published so precise, affected, and hypocritical an account of the transaction, that he, who might have escaped in the gloom of the treachery, completely blasted his own reputation; and, falling into debt, was, according to the fate of inferior tools, abandoned by his masters, and forced to fly his country."

In a letter to Montagu, Walpole writes:—

"You know I have long had a partiality for your cousin Sandwich, who has out-Sandwiched himself. He has impeached Wilkes for a blasphemous poem, and has been expelled for blasphemy himself by the Beef-steak Club at Covent-garden. Wilkes has been shot by Martin (in a duel), and instead of being burnt at an auto da fé, as the Bishop of Gloucester (Warburton) intended, is revered as a saint by the mob, and if he dies the people will squint themselves into convulsions at his tomb in honour of his memory."

Charles Churchill took bitter revenge on Sandwich, whom he satirized in the most stinging satire that exists in our language. It is only necessary to introduce the quotation, by stating that Sandwich was named Lothario (a character in Rowe's "Fair Penitent") from his notorious prodigality, and also Jenny Twitcher (the betrayer of Macheath in the "Beggar's Opera") from his political perfidy.

"From his youth upwards to the present day,
When vices more than years have mark'd him gray;
When riotous excess with wasteful hand
Shake's life's frail glass and hautes each obbing sand,
Unmindful from what stook he drew his birth,
Unstaid with one deed of real worth,
Lothario, holding honour at no price,
Folly to folly added, vice to vice;
Wrought sin with greediness, and sought for shame
With greater zeal than good men seek for fame."

When Folly (at that name in duty bound
Let subject myriads kneel and kiss the ground,
Whilst they who in the presence upright stand
Are held as rebels through the loyal land)
Queen everywhere, but most a queen in courts,
Sent forth her heralds and proclaim'd her sports,
Bade fool with fool on her behalf engage,
And prove her right to reign from age to age,
Lothario, great above the common size,
With all engag'd, and won from all the prize;
Her cap he wears, which yet from youth his wore,
And every day deserves it more and more.
"Nor in such limits rests his soul confin'd:
Folly may share, but can't engross his mind.
Vice, bold, substantial Vice, puts in her claim,
And stamps him perfect in the books of shame.
Observe his follies well, and you would swear
Folly had been his first, his only care;
Observe his vices, you'll that oath disown,
And swear that he was born for vice alone."

George Grenville's ministry, after having alienated the American colonies by passing the Stamp Act, suffered shipwreck on the Regency question. "In April, 1765," says a writer in the "Quarterly Review" for June, 1840, "his Majesty had a serious illness; its particular character was then unknown, but we have the best authority for believing that it was of the nature of those which thrice afterwards affected his Majesty, and finally incapacitated him for the duties of Government." From a passage in one of Walpole's letters to the Earl of Hertford, it appears that the writer both suspected the disease and doubted the recovery. He says—"They say he looks pale, but it is the fashion to call him very well; I wish it may be true. The exclusion of the Princess Dowager's name in the list of persons proposed for the Council of Regency was the cause of a serious difference between the King and his Ministers. In his letters, Walpole declares that the intention of excluding the Princess of Wales was first announced by the Duke of Bedford.

"Lord Lyttleton moved an address to the King to name the person he would recommend for Regent. In the midst of this debate the Duke of Richmond started two questions:—Whether the Queen was naturalized, and if not, whether capable of being Regent? and he added a third much more puzzling—Who are the Royal Family? Lord Denbigh answered flippantly, all who are prayed for; the Duke of Bedford more significantly, those only who are in the line of succession—a direct exclusion of the Princess."

In the "Memoirs" we have the following account of the artifices practised to induce the King to consent to the omission of his mother's name:—

"Lord Halifax and Lord Sandwich (the latter of whom had probably machinated so treacherous a step) had posted to Buckingham House a little before the Lords assembled, and, surprising the King alone, had most falsely, and contrary to all likelihood, assured him that the House of Commons would certainly strike the name of the Princess Dowager out of the bill, and therefore that the most decent and prudent method to save the honour of his Majesty and her Royal Highness would be for his Majesty to permit it to be hinted to the Lords, that he himself desired their lordships would omit his mother's name before they transmitted the bill to the Commons. The young inexperienced Monarch, taken by surprise, alarmed at the insult announced, and not having time, or not having presence of mind to demand time, for consulting his mother and his favourite, answered with good nature, that he would consent if it would satisfy his people. The traitors seized that assent, and, hurrying away with double rapidity to the House of Lords, procured in the very name of their master that indelible stigma on his own mother!"

From the importance attached to the Regency question, many suspected at the time, what is now fully confirmed, that the King's recovery was not so complete as his courtiers represented, and that there was reason to apprehend the subsequent aberrations of intellect which, we may add, occurred more frequently than is yet generally known or even suspected. The Rockingham Administration, formed on the overthrow of Grenville's Cabinet, was very distasteful to the King. Its members had stigmatized the prosecution of Wilkes, not from any regard for the man, but from a just dislike of the unconstitutional means employed against him. They had also resolved to repeal the Stamp Act, a measure so distasteful to the King that he attempted to defeat it by underhand means, which stopped very little short of direct falsehood:—

"Lord Strange, one of the placemen who opposed the repeal of the Stamp Act, having occasion to go in to the King on some affair of his office, the Duke of Lancaster, the King said he heard that it was reported in the world that he (the King) was for the repeal of that act. Lord Strange replied that idea did not only prevail, but that his Majesty's Ministers did all that lay in their power to encourage that belief, and that their great majority had been entirely owing to their having made use of his Majesty's name. The King desired Lord Strange to contradict that report, assuring him it was not founded. Lord Strange no sooner left the closet than he made full use of the authority he had received, and trumpeted all over the town the conversation he had had with the King. So extraordinary a tale soon reached the ear of Lord Rockingham, who immediately asked Lord Strange if it was true what the King was reported to have said to him? The other confirmed it. On that Lord Rockingham desired the other to meet him at Court, when they both went into the closet together. Lord Strange began and repeated the King's words, and asked if he had been mistaken? The King said, 'No.' Lord Rockingham then pulled out a paper, and begged to know if, on such a day (which was minutely down on the paper), his Majesty had not determined for the repeal? The King replied, 'My lord, this is but half;' and, taking out a pencil, wrote on the bottom of Lord Rockingham's paper words to this effect:—'The question asked me by my Ministers was, whether I was for enforcing the act by the sword, or for the repeal? Of the two extremes I was for the repeal, but most certainly preferred modification to either.'

The Rockingham Ministry received a more fatal blow by Pitt's public declaration of want of confidence in the Cabinet; like Earl Grey's abnegation of Canning, it damaged the new Ministry, but at the same time it injured the policy of which Pitt professed himself an advocate. This conduct, however, recommended him to the King; he was invited to form a new administration, and he commenced his task by the fatal error of accepting a peerage:—

"That fatal title blasted all the affection which his country had borne to him, and which he had deserved so well. Had he been as sordid as Lord Northampton, he could not have sunk lower in the public esteem. The people, though he had done no act to occasion reproach, thought he had sold them for a title, and, as words fascinate or enrage them, their idol Mr. Pitt was forgotten in their detestation of the Lord Chatham. He was paralleled with Lord Bath, and became the object at which were shot all the arrows of calumny. He had borne his head above the obloquy that had attended his former pension—not a mouth was opened now in defence of his title;—as innocent as his pension, since neither betrayed him into any deed of servility to prerogative and despotism. Both were injudicious; the last irrecoverably so. The blow was more ruinous to his country than to himself. While he held the love of the people, nothing was so formidable in Europe as his name. The talons of the lion were drawn, when he was no longer awful in his own forests. The city of London had intended to celebrate Mr. Pitt's return to employment, and lamps for an illumination had been placed round the Monument. But no sooner did they hear of his new dignity, than the festival was counter-ordered. The great engine of this disaffection was Lord Temple, who was so ashamed to be published the history of their breach, in which he betrayed every private passage that Mr. Pitt had dropped in their negotiation and quarrel, which could tend to inflame the public or private persons against him."

The poet Gray, writing to Dr. Wharton, makes the following judicious remarks on this event:—

"What shall I say to you about the Ministry? I am as angry as a common-councilman of London about my Lord Chatham, but a little more patient, and will hold my tongue till the end of the year. In the meantime I do mutter in secret, and to you, that to quit the House of Commons, his natural strength, to sap his own popularity and grandeur, which no one but himself could have done, by assuming a foolish title; and in hope that he would win by it, and attach him to a court that hate him, and will dismiss him as soon as ever they dare, was the weakest thing that ever was done by so great a man."

In the forthcoming volumes we shall have to discuss the history of the administration thus unpropitiously commenced; and we shall defer until their appearance any general observations on the literary character of these "Memoirs."

Geology: Introductory, Descriptive, and Practical.
By D. T. Ansted, F.R.S., &c. London, Van Voorst.

Doctor Chalmers, in his admirable vindication of political economy from the charges brought against that science in the name of religion, has glanced slightly at the objections which, on the same mistaken grounds, have been urged against the study of geology in our day and of astronomy in past ages. Men have said that the discoveries of science are at variance with the statements of Holy Scripture; they have exercised a perverted ingenuity to magnify and exaggerate the discrepancy, forgetting that, while they may on the one hand induce believers in Scripture to reject the science, they may on the other drive believers in science to reject Scripture. On investigation, however, it will be found that these zealots are not so anxious for the Scripture itself as they are for their own interpretations of its meaning, and that the passages they adduce to confute geology or astronomy have either no reference to the science, or are susceptible of an interpretation consistent with the demonstrated facts. Some of the earlier fathers denounced the doctrine of the roundness of the earth as heretical, because, as they said, if it were so, Satan could not have showed our Lord all its kingdoms from a high mountain. Had those sage doctors understood Greek they would have known that the word rendered "world" also signifies any defined tract of country; and by "all the kingdoms of the world," they would have seen that St. Matthew intimated the several principalities of Judea and Galilee. In like manner some of the Rabbinical writers, commenting on the history of Babel, declared that the sons of Noah wished to raise their tower to heaven, that in case of another deluge they might get out on the solid sphere of heaven through one of the windows mentioned by the sacred writer, and thus escape from drowning. This absurd gloss was received very implicitly by the Rabbinical schools: they even asserted that one of their body had succeeded in effecting the object, and had raised structures on the roof of his house sufficiently high to touch the revolving vault of heaven. They add that a disciple of this rabbi ascended one day to the top of this edifice, having in his hand the kettle in which he used to prepare his breakfast: he put his hand through one of the windows of heaven, but the revolving sphere gave him so smart a blow on the wrist with the edge of the window that he dropped his kettle. On telling his lore to the sage, he was directed to ascend at the same hour, and watch until the window came again over his head; he did so, and thrusting in his hand recovered his kettle. Now, the objections taken from Scripture against geology and other sciences, whether physical or social, belong to the same school of philosophy as that of the rabbinical kettle, and are based not upon Scripture, but upon the glosses of the ignorant and the presumptuous. He who gave us powers of investigation foreknew the results of research; and it is impious rashness to assert that there is any contradiction between reason and revelation.

Geology, like every other branch of natural science, is engaged in discovering the various laws or modes of action which the Great Author of Nature has seen fit to employ in effecting the successive changes that have taken place upon the surface or external crust of the earth. The knowledge of these laws is derived from the observation of certain facts, phenomena or appearances which give indisputable evidences of change. Beds of sea-shells discovered far inland show that the place which they occupy was once covered with water; submarine forests, where trunks of trees, leaves, fruit, and the horns of animals are found beneath a beach, equally prove that the sea in their localities has encroached upon the land. A theory is such a systematic arrangement of facts as enables us to view them in their mutual relation and dependence; and those who exclaim against theory are in their ignorance denouncing every principle of order and arrangement. It is, however, of importance to observe that the right determination of the facts is absolutely essential to the validity of the theory. All the men who in our day have combined to raise geology to the dignity of a science—and furthermore a science that has forced for itself a place in the studies of our schools, colleges, and universities—have been pre-eminently distinguished for the extent and accuracy of their observations. Sir Henry de la Beche, Murchison, Sedgewick, Buckland, Lyell, Forbes, Phillips, and many others, who are an honour to our age and country, have aggregated a mass of facts connected with the structure of the earth, and its past as well as its present inhabitants, sufficient to give at least the outline of a history of a series of successive revolutions, to point out the order in which they followed each other, and to indicate with more or less clearness the laws of their operation.

Professor Ansted's object is to collect into one comprehensive digest the existing amount of geological information, so that, while his work is the best existing guide to students of the science, it will be appealed to in future ages as a landmark which will determine the exact amount of progress made in the science of geology to the beginning of the year 1845. Extracts would fail to give any adequate notion of the value of such a work: they would be, in fact, a repetition of the story told by Hierocles, that a man having a house to sell carried round a brick to exhibit as a specimen. Equally vain would be the attempt to make an abstract of its diversified information, for the volumes are a model of judicious condensation. We must, therefore, be content in general terms to recommend the work as the best existing introduction to the knowledge of a most interesting branch of natural science, equally beautiful in what it reveals and valuable in what it teaches.

Professor Ansted has wisely devoted a large share of his attention to the practical applications of geology in mining, architecture, and agriculture. The importance of geology to the architect has been long overlooked; indeed it is only now beginning to form a part of his professional education. The science is frequently of use in determining the site of an edifice, but its value is most apparent in the selection of building materials. On the latter subject very important information was obtained by the commission appointed to select the stone to be used in building the new House of Parliament; Professor Ansted has condensed the most valuable parts of the Report of the Commissioners, and enriched his abstract with observations of his own of equal practical value. The late William Smith (clarum et venerabile nomen) was the first who directed attention to the importance of geology to the agriculturist, particularly with relation to the drainage of land; on this part of his subject Professor Ansted is full without being diffuse, and we strongly recommend those who aim at becoming scientific farmers to study his directions.

Geology has now obtained so high and fixed a place in the estimation of the public that it must for the future form a part of literary education. The mere general reader, who requires only as much knowledge of the subject as will serve to defray his share in ordinary conversation, will find Professor Ansted's the best existing work for such a purpose. It is the most attractive in style of any treatise on science that we have seen for many a long day, and indeed does not come far short of Sir John Herschel's celebrated treatise on Astronomy.

We cannot quit this book without bestowing our meed of praise on its typographical execution; the woodcut illustrations (as indeed is the case in all the works published by Van Voorst) are beautiful as works of art, and minutely exact as illustrations of science. We trust to have more than one occasion of renewing acquaintance with the same author and the same publisher.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES IN BOLTON.—We have always great pleasure in recording any facts which mark the prosperity of trade and the increased comforts of the working classes. We are informed by John Helling, Esq., the treasurer of the savings' bank, that the sum deposited in that institution at the present time amounts to upwards of £100,000; and that in the two last consecutive weeks the deposits paid into the bank have exceeded the sum drawn out by £1000. These facts afford a pleasing evidence, not only of the improvement of trade, but also of the provident habits of the operatives.—Bolton Chronicle of Saturday.

FARMERS' RIGHTS AND FARMERS' DUTIES.—An Oxfordshire farmer, writing to the Oxford Chronicle, says—“As men, devoting our energies to the important work of producing food for the sustenance of our fellow-men, as working bees in the social hive, we claim from the lords of the soil that respect and consideration which is our due from those who are enabled to live in ease and affluence through the labour and industry of others; as persons employing our capital in the precarious occupation of benefiting the property of others with a view to our own increasing profit and to that of society, we claim that security and advantage of tenure by which and by which alone the great and manifold improvements in the art of culture may be made universally available to the general good of the people; and I trust the time is not far distant when, as men and fellow-citizens, we shall be found to cast aside our long-riveted prejudices, and, being content to abide by the golden rule of ‘doing as we would be done by,’ shall agree to claim for our fellow-men, in the purchase of the necessities of life, that same privilege which we hope to enjoy in the disposal of our own commodities, viz., a full and free access to all the markets of the world.”

AGRICULTURE.

ARE NOT FARMERS FREE MEN?

To those who know the more intelligent and independent farmers, nothing can be more painful than the sentiments of subservience towards landlords which are often put forth by land-agents and people of that sort as those of the farmers. Nothing can be more unjust than to represent such as the real farmers' sentiments. True it is, that ignorant men or dependent men often listen in silence while such misrepresentations are being made, but even they do so with indignation and sorrow; and, whenever a real farmer speaks, it is to give utterance to feelings and opinions of a character directly the reverse of those the creatures of the monopolist landocracy impute to the tenant-farmers. Look through the reports of agricultural meetings, and we shall find everywhere that nothing is so heartily and unanimously applauded as expressions in favour of leases, or any other means of giving independence to the farmer. And it must be borne in mind that a large proportion of the best farmers do not frequent these agricultural gatherings, which they regard as playthings or political clubs of the landed gentry. That the desire of the landowners to keep the farmers in a state of political dependence operates greatly to prevent leases, is notorious; but we do not remember to have heard such an undisguised avowal of agricultural serfdom as that made by Mr. John Maughan, the late Lord Dudley's agent at the Stewpony Farmers' Club in Worcestershire. After an admirable lecture upon leases, delivered to a large meeting of landlords and farmers, Mr. Maughan closed with the following passages, intended to show that leases, while they would increase production and consequently raise rents, would not give the farmer political independence:—

“Much has been said by the opponents of leases respecting the mutual feelings of regard and the interchanges of good offices promoted by yearly and dependent holdings; but, in my opinion, leases for a moderate term of years have not any inherent or necessary tendency to extinguish such feelings and offices. Proprietors of estates may be apprehensive, that if leases were granted to their tenants generally, they, the proprietors, would lose some of that influence and control on the occasion of political contests, which they possess under a system of tenancy from year to year. My own impression is, that, even under a system of leasing, tenants generally would be found ranged on the side of their landlords. It happens continually in local and political contests that there is nothing deserving the name of principle involved—certainly nothing in which the tenants' interests are materially involved—the struggle being for men rather than measures, and the issue of the contest being to the tenant, as well as to the bulk of the community, a matter totally unimportant. A tenant, whether under a lease or yearly tenancy, would be departing from those ordinary principles of prudence and motives of self-interest by which the generality of mankind are actuated, were he to refuse his support to his landlord generally in political and other public struggles. A leasehold tenant would reflect upon the rankling effect upon the mind which his opposition to his landlord would be sure to produce, and how little it would be calculated to recommend his application for the modification of any subsisting contract, or for renewal of his lease, or to dispose his landlord to press lightly the enforcement of covenants on the expiration of the term. He would reflect that support, cheerfully and gracefully accorded, though not recompensed, nor perhaps very pointedly acknowledged at the moment, is not always on that account unobserved or unappreciated.”

Now, we do not recollect to have met with a more open recognition of the fact that servility and political dependence are required by landlords from their tenants over and above the payment of rent and performance of covenants. This gentleman assumes that the landlords and tenants would always be naturally ranged on the same side in political contests, and that to the tenant it is “totally unimportant” whether he votes for Sir John A., the Whig, or my Lord B., the Tory: that politics form a mere party game, a “struggle for men rather than measures,” at which the landlords play—for pretty good stakes, too, sometimes—but in which the tenants can have no possible concern. But can anything be more remote from the truth than such an assumption? Take the present anxiety on the part of a large body of farmers for a repeal of the malt tax; do they and their landlords go together on that question? Again, does Mr. Maughan forget the deep indignation entertained by the farmers by reason of the broken pledges of their parliamentary representatives chosen at the last general election? But passing these domestic dimensions of the monopolist sections of the landed interests, has not the farmer the rights of a free man? What is there in the cultivation of the soil, in the constant opportunity of “looking through nature up to nature's God,” that should render a man unworthy to enjoy the ordinary rights of citizenship? Why is corn-growing or cattle-feeding inconsistent with political duties? Is the farmer alone, of all the members of the community, to be debarred from entertaining opinions upon questions of state policy? Has he no civil or religious liberty to protect? No Government expenditure to control? Has he even the slightest control over his own local public fund, the county rate? Is he not, in a word, the individual, who, of all the middle class, most wants an effective power of political action?

Let us consider the contrast between the farmer and trader in this respect. Take the case of two brothers of the middle class, each possessing two or three thousand pounds—the one has been bred to trade, and takes up his abode in some town. He seeks to succeed in business by attention, and by furnishing the articles he deals in, or executing the work of his avocation of the best kind or in the best manner, and at reasonable prices. In every transaction of business he gives a fair equivalent for all he receives, and no customer thinks of demanding as an addition to his tradesman's commodity the use of his vote. The tradesman exercises all the rights and performs all the political duties of a free man. He is one of the commons of England.

Not so his brother, who, having been bred a farmer, has taken a farm under the Duke of Dunderhead, a nobleman enjoying the nominal ownership of a vast tract of half-cultivated land, but who, so long as he can keep down the interest of his mortgages, wields all the political influence such a possession gives, and returns the three county members. The farmer brother gives the full yearly rent for his farm—in fact rather more, when the bad state of the land, the abundance of game, the restrictions on cultivation which prevail on the estate, and the constant tendency of prices to fall below the act-of-Parliament scale according to which his Grace's rents have been estimated, are considered—and he fondly imagines, that having cultivated his farm in a manner hitherto unknown in the Dunderhead county, and paid the uttermost farthing of rent, he has done all. Nothing of the kind. A general election is approaching, and the farmer, a thinking intelligent man, has been reading the speeches and considering the votes of the late county members, and after mature deliberation he is convinced that the general scope and tendency of their political course has been to promote extravagance and tyranny on the part of the Government, and bigotry and ill-will amongst the people. He determines to oppose them in favour of any candidate of whose opinions he more approves. It turns out, however, that one of the old county members retires from ill health, old age, or something else; another goes to the House of Lords in consequence of the unexpected demise of his father, a peer. Therefore there are two clear vacancies; and the farmer, knowing and hearing of no person of the neighbourhood fit to represent the county except the two popular candidates, who had been defeated by the Dunderhead nominees at the last election, pleases himself with the idea that those gentlemen will walk over the course. Never was he more deceived. The time of election draws nigh, and the farmer hears of public meetings, sees election addresses, and rather wonders that the popular candidates, whom he is prepared to support, have not called upon him to canvass. Little does he think that he is within a tabooed circle. The popular gentlemen, albeit liberal in opinion and so forth, are far too mindful of aristocratic etiquette to think of canvassing the Dunderhead tenantry when they know that the Duke of Dunderhead is substantially their principal opponent. Of course they know that the Dunderhead tenants will support the Dunderhead interest. This the farmer brother soon finds out. He had almost determined to go and volunteer his support to the popular candidates, when he receives a note from the Dunderhead steward, sent by one of the Dunderhead deputy under-gamekeepers—and the man seems unusually insolent on this occasion—conveying the information (in the form of a circular) that two gentlemen of whom neither the tenant nor any body else ever heard will be candidates to represent the county, that they will be supported by the Dunderhead influence, and that the farmer brother is expected at the Duke's Arms Inn, at the county town, on the day of nomination, in order to form part of the Dunderhead procession, which will escort the one old member and two unknown candidates to the hustings. The tenant is aghast. He disapproves of the political course of the old member, and knows nothing of the political opinions or intellectual capacities of the new candidates. He is at first disposed to resist such an unwarrantable interference with his rights as a freeman, but he consults a neighbour, an old Dunderhead tenant, remembers that he has sunk his capital for several years to come upon the Dunderhead estate, and he goes to the Duke's Arms.

There he finds that one of the new candidates is personally a nonentity, intended as a mere warming-pan for the Dunderhead heir; and the other is a young lordling, just twenty-one, fresh from Oxford, where he was remarkable only for epicurean enjoyments and lordly indolence. The only act of his lordship, remaining on record, was the stewing a turkey or a goose in champagne or burgundy. None of the candidates offered any reasons for certain votes they intended to give—all of which the tenant disapproved—but calmly relied on the Dunderhead interest. At the nomination the tenant holds up his hand for the Dunderhead candidates, while in his heart he wishes their opponents could succeed; and he afterwards goes to the poll, marshalled by the Dunderhead agent, to vote against his own countrymen's convictions.

Is not this a just representation of the vassalage in which the great majority of tenant-farmers are now held? And can anything be more distressing to a man of common integrity?

Have the farmers derived any benefit from their enfranchisement by the Chandos clause? On the contrary, has it not added greatly to their dependence, and injured their pecuniary interests? Are they not subject to the most insolent dictation at the hands of their landlords and their land-agents?

Why do not the farmers in their farmers' clubs pass resolutions that they will not vote red, blue, or orange, at the beck of their landlords, and that it is an insult to the farmers to be canvassed by the steward or his underlings? But, in fact, all this and more is implied when these clubs pass resolutions in favour of leases. The farmers, however, must speak out if they mean to obtain attention. The Mark-lane Express, and all the rest of the agricultural journals which are not merely organs of the landowners, distinctly say, in reference to malt-tax repeal and other farmers' public objects, "THAT THE TENANT-FARMERS MUST DEPEND UPON THEMSELVES ALONE."

Hitherto tenant-farmers have been little above the level of the old freemen of the towns: they are bought and sold with the lands they till, their political influence forms a subject of barter in their landlords' hands. Can anything be more discreditable? Look, too, at the men who are sent to Parliament solely by the compelled votes of the farmers, and say whether it is possible to collect a body of men, by courtesy called educated, more destitute of intellect and capacity for public business than the one hundred and fifty-eight county members sent to Parliament by the English and Welsh counties? Not one in ten of them ever attempts to speak in the House of Commons, and not more than half a dozen of the whole number ever open their mouths without making themselves supremely ridiculous. Why, the term county member has become a synonyme for a dull, pompous, prejudiced, and bigoted man, who knows nothing, and is too proud to learn anything, except what is taught him through the medium of his breeches pocket; and for such a national scandal the farmers are mainly answerable.

They, too, have the remedy in their own hands. Why don't they send a few of the most intelligent of their own body into the House of Commons as county members? There are plenty of such men to be found. Then we should hear in Parliament something of the real farmers' grievances, of which in their own peculiar circles they so loudly complain. We should know somewhat of the mischiefs of game preserves and the horrors of the game laws, the unjust operation of the law of distress, and other rural topics, from which at present our legislators most carefully abstain. The first step the farmers must take is to send a few men of their own class, men identified with them in feeling, interest, and social position, and who have sufficient nerve and education to bear a part in the debates of the House of Commons on questions which affect agriculture. Nor will it be necessary for them to send more than a few, for by so doing a standard of opinion will be formed amongst farmers to which from thenceforth all candidates for counties must conform. In this farmers must act together, they must no longer submit to be deemed mere aristocratic appendages to a Dunderhead estate, and they should bear in mind that, in public affairs especially, "fortune helps those only who can help themselves." Moreover, they will soon discover that the monopolist landowners, like most blusterers, are arrant moral cowards, particularly when prices are low, and the interest of mortgages presses sharply. The monopolist landlords say the farmers have learnt to act for themselves; let them now prove that assertion to be a reality.

A MODERN MIRACLE.

THE LANDLORDS SET A-THINKING.

"Sweet are the uses of adversity," indeed; for, under the salutary influence of low prices and falling rents, the monopolist landlords, even the monopolist landlords of Dorsetshire, are listening to reason and diverging into common sense. This is in truth a natural phenomenon of no ordinary import. Rents have before fallen under the influence of low prices, but the landlords' remedy has heretofore been another dose of protection, more acts of Parliament, just when all rational men saw that protection and act-of-Parliament promises had equally failed. Nor have the monopolist squires fallen upon rationality willingly and of their own accord, as may be proved by reference to their Protection Society speeches a year ago, but it has been forced upon them by the teaching of the League; and that not so much by the direct instruction the ample discussion of Free-Trade questions has afforded to the landowners, as by the general enlightenment of the public, which has rendered the old landlord monopolist fallacies too ridiculous to be again broached. Such were the ideas which occurred to us after reading the report of the speeches at the Blandford Agricultural Society. Our readers may remember that this was the society at which the Rev. S. G. Osborne was so furiously assailed by the Dorsetshire squires for simply stating the actual destination in which the Dorsetshire peasants "abided, not lived," upon the earth. Now, however, these squires listened to an excellent speech by the same reverend gentleman with silence and attention, the only indications of dissent being small sneers thrown out by subsequent speakers, which proved that, though the reptile monopoly had been compelled to bear the "lovely jewel" common sense, it had not altogether lost its "venomous" nature.

Mr. Osborne having quietly but firmly stated his adherence to his expressed opinions as to the cause of the low condition of the Dorsetshire labourers, turned to the consideration of a remedy. Of allotments he said, "He had some experience in them, and had watched them carefully, but he could not consider them in the light of a remedy for the labourer." * * * He did wish ever to bear in mind that they consulted the labourer's happiness beat by regarding him simply as a labourer." A small allotment might be useful recreation, "but to tell him that it could do the amount of good that the advocates of the system said it could, was to tell him that which the amount of his experience told him was untrue." Neither had the plan of making labourers small farmers of four or five or ten acres proved more successful. But "granting that the man who cultivates three or four acres was honest and industrious, and all that the advocates of the system said he was, still, as his family grew up, they did not grow up to take the situation of labourers; they had been labourers on their father's own little farm, and they became mere discontented men, unless they could be placed in that situation themselves." And the farmers present by their applause testified to the truth of the above statement. In fact the "allotment system" is a sheer delusion. Mr. Osborne then showed the absurdity of looking to emigration as a remedy "for the evils which existed;" and exposed the false principles on which the scheme of a labour-rate was based.

He then said:—

"There was another, and that was the most delicate of all points to touch upon. It had been urged upon the tenantry that they should employ more labour; he confessed he did not see the justice, in this present time, nor did he see in any time the policy, of dictating to a man how much labour he should employ in his own business. (Cheers.) If a farmer neglected the culture of his farm, nobody could blame his landlord if he either got rid of him, or took what steps were in his power to make him cultivate better; but he could not admit the justice of that course of reasoning which said, 'I won't only have my farm cultivated well, but I'll dictate what number of men I'll have employed;' and, to come to another thing, he thought that those who cried out thus loudly seemed to forget how many a farmer had to keep whom he could not employ at all, and that there was also, in the shape of poor's rate, another most heavy tax. Let any one go into the business, and take all the counties of England, and see who paid the greatest amount towards the old, the infirm, and the useless? He would venture to say it would be found that the tenantry were those who did pay the most, and therefore he could not see the justice of crying out at once that the evil was to be met by their employing more. The question came to this—could they afford to employ more? (A voice: 'No.') In common times he thought no greater want of judgment could be shown than to say anything to lead the tenant to turn on the landlord when prices turned against him; but when, year after year, there was a steady decline in prices, till they arrived at that price below which even those who were going to do away with all protection said they would come—he thought this not a time to turn round to make their first attack upon the farmer. (Cheers.) Do not think that he was saying this to curry any favour from them. He thought he had shown already that he cared little for the want of their favour when he thought he was right."

Then, as to the labourers, he said:—

"That they were in a most degraded state with regard to the condition of the labourer, was an admitted fact. A wrong principle of dealing with the poor had, he thought, brought them to this; and yet he was not cast down, however dark the case might look. He believed the difficulty might be met without relying upon emigration, or without giving the labourer forty lug of land—good as a charity, but bad as standing between the master and the labourer. He would tell them how it was to be met—not by legislative enactments, but by a few zealous landlords and farmers looking the thing full in the face, and the landlord and tenant's discretion in applying the remedy wanting in this or that locality; but to say there was one rule, to say that one man renting high and another renting low were to be guided by the same principle, did appear to him to betray the greatest amount of folly."

Again:—

"It was in vain to give rewards, here and there for isolated merit; it was in vain to call certain members from the mass; let them look at them all. If they were good, let them cherish them—weak, let them protect them—ignorant, let them teach them; but never turn their distress to an engine in their own hands, to dictate the terms on which they were to serve them. No; they had one motto ever popular at such dinners as these, 'Live and let live.'"

Mr. Sturt, in returning thanks as one of the county members, did not think in all the meetings, and all the eloquence which had been brought to bear upon the question, the improvement of the condition of the labourers—"ay, and notwithstanding the speech they had heard from Mr. Osborne"—that much had been unfolded.

"The grievances of the labourer had been laid before them in speech and in writing, but he did not think the causes had been investigated. It might be true that they had been sought after with diligence, but he did not believe that the search had been attended with success. The grievances detailed last year were—the state of the dwellings of the labourer, the want of employment, the inadequacy of wages when employed. They got to that last year, and he thought that they then agreed that the state of the cottages was altogether a landlord's question."

True; but how is it the squires only found out this after the designation of a Dorsetshire landowner had become a byword of reproach throughout the kingdom?

Mr. Sturt, however, admitted—

"That it was the duty of the landlord to see that those persons who dwelt on his land, and whose labour was required for the cultivation of that land, should have dwellings in good condition. He was told, and he was glad to hear it, that much had been done; but, although much had been done, much still remained to do."

And all the squires are, at all events, talking about the subject, for Mr. Sturt said:—

"The condition of the labourer was now so much the topic that it was added to the usual modes of salutations. The first was, 'How are you?' The next, 'How's the weather?' And the third, 'My friend, what's your remedy for the condition of the labouring classes?' The remedy most in favour appeared to be allotments. He did not say he was the first to introduce them into that county, but no one had tried them to such an extent as he had, or continued to do so. Some time ago he pulled down a small village and built up an experimental village in its place. He built two cottages on an acre of ground, so that the land on one side should belong to one cottager and that on the other side to the other. The land had been cultivated in an excellent manner, but he agreed with Mr. Osborne it was not a remedy; it was only a palliative, and he owned that, if it were not carried into execution with forbearance, it was capable of producing a much greater evil than a good. He said it was a palliative; the object of that society was to place the labourer in the most wholesome state."

And how is that to be done? Reader, be not surprised if at length you find a rational opinion upon that subject expressed by a monopolist landowner and a county member:—

"Now, the most wholesome state was that wherein he was enabled to take his capital (that was his labour) to the market, and obtain such an equivalent as would enable him to get the necessities of life. These he should define to consist of a decent dwelling, fuel, clothing, good oatmeal bread, ordinary cheese, and bacon every day in the year. (Hear, hear.) He should be glad to superadd small beer if it were possible, but he thought, with the heavy taxation, it was not so. Was that visionary? Did it exist anywhere in England? It did. He thought it was very striking to note the inequality of wages in different parts of England. Mr. Sturt then pointed to the great difference in the price of labour in the north and in the west of England. While in the former the labourer received 12s. or 13s. a week, in the latter the rate was only 8s. or 9s. Of this difference he could offer no explanation."

Now, it did not occur to this gentleman that the explanation of this is, that in the west the operation of protection was unalloyed, tenants farmed indifferently with insufficient capital, in a full reliance upon act-of-Parliament-promised prices; while in the north and north-east farmers applied more of enterprise and intelligence to the cultivation of land—they do that which would become universal if the incubus of "protection" were removed.

Mr. Sturt then referred to what seemed to him to be the explanation, and here again we have evidence that some of the squires are not absolutely unteachable. He said:—

"I am unable to explain the causes to my own satisfaction, but I know that in some districts of high wages large tracts of land have been brought into high cultivation more rapidly than the population has increased—that the demand for labour has been great, and consequently wages high. From the nature of the case the labourer has become extremely skilful, so that the farmer gets a full equivalent for his money in the extent and goodness of the work done. In other districts I think the great manufacturing establishments have had an effect—that persons have gone to the towns who would have been agricultural labourers—that the higher wages they receive has an effect on agricultural wages—that the labourers have established a higher standard of living, possessing the necessities of life, as I have described them, and from which they are very unwilling to descend. (Hear.) Then there is this distinctive difference between a farmer in those districts and a farmer in the west. The northern farmer asks himself what work he requires to have done, and how few hands can execute it? Here the farmer does not ask how many he requires, but how many men are there in the parish? (Hear.) And the farmer here, I believe, pays as large an amount of wages, in the aggregate, for the same produce, as the farmer in the north; and therefore it is unfair and unjust to hold him up to obloquy for not giving higher wages (cheers), for he pays to the greater number that which the northern farmer pays to the lesser. (Cheers.) These are probably some of the causes for the difference in wages to which I have referred. I throw them out for your further consideration and inquiry."

He then said the tenant who lays out his capital on the farm is entitled to a lease, and "that any tenant, under such circumstances, holding land under him would find him very ready to grant one." He, however, indicated a sneaking kindness for the make-shift arguments called tenant-rights, with which the north-country landlords have, to some extent, contrived to satisfy their tenants. He said—

"He [the farmer] has the fullest reliance on his landlord, but life is uncertain; his son may be a minor, and trustees may feel it their unpleasant duty to take possession of his outlay, or various occurrences may arise. Well, then, if an apprehension of this sort does exist, so as to check this confidence, look again to the north. The custom of the country protects a farmer there. If he leaves a farm for any cause, caprice or notice, he is entitled to a proportionate return of his expenditure—he is empowered to call in a surveyor if a dispute arises, but the principle is never contested. A like plan, improved upon, could be adopted in this county."

This is no doubt a first step towards leases; and the subsequent suggestion of Mr. Sturt, that a few squires and farmers of Dorsetshire should "draw up a code applicable to Dorsetshire," proves that the landowners are at last thinking of dealing with their property like reasonable men. Then followed Mr. George Banks, and he felt obliged to repudiate the "allotment system" and emigration. He then said:—

"The state of the Dorsetshire labourers has, as you are aware, been made a very prominent public question; such is the fact, and, whether I may have been disposed to regret it or otherwise, it does not become me to flinch from it either here or anywhere else. The notoriety of the Dorsetshire labourers arose from two transactions which have occupied much of the public attention, and neither of which brought any discredit on the county, and one of them we may consider a source of honour."

And what, reader, think you was this notorious gentleman's explanation of the ill repute of Dorsetshire? Why, the old occurrence of the Dorsetshire labourers, who in 1830 were transported under an act of extreme severity, and whose case excited very considerable sympathy; and because Lord Ashley, one of the county members, having been forward to inquire into the condition of factory labourers, the employers of those labourers had, as a retaliation, "set the Dorset labourers prominently forward to compete in public sympathy with the factory children." With this pitiful, paltry subterfuge the Times has dealt in a style so trenchant, yet so just, that we cannot better give Mr. George Banks his due than by quoting some passages from the Times article. After alluding to that part of Mr. Banks's speech, and his explanation, and observing it was the only exception to the practical tone of the meeting, the writer proceeds:—

"That it has a bad name is not disputed. Other counties possess claims to notice, but Dorsetshire appears to receive it. Notwithstanding the fires of Suffolk, the occasional riots of Wales, the strikes of Durham, the overwork of Lancashire, and the concentrated miseries of the metropolis, yet destitution and degradation cannot be mentioned without the mind naturally turning to Dorsetshire. The Dorsetshire labourer, Dorsetshire wages, Dorsetshire cottages, Dorsetshire parish houses, Dorsetshire bedrooms, Dorsetshire depopulations, are become almost household words. We have Cheshire cheese, Devonshire cream, Norfolk turkeys, Essex calves, Wiltshire bacon, and other provincial delicacies. But for large families existing on 8s. or even 7s. a week, for undrained mud floors, for a dozen or more of all sexes and ages in one bedroom, for every other form of squalid brutal degradation, we go to Dorsetshire. The opinion may be absolutely unfounded, but still it is universal. Dorsetshire, justly or unjustly, has furnished a type of agricultural misery."

Ay, and Dorsetshire is a type of what "protection" will effect, where aristocratic influence reigns unmixed and supreme. The member for Dorsetshire did not deny or controvert any one of the allegations on which that ill repute has been maintained, or advance a single fact of a contrary character:—

"Yet how does he meet a serious charge—a universal belief? By showing a possible foundation in accident, interest, and malice. Yet the facts were before his face, and under his very feet. A numerous body of labourers had just been rewarded, and at that moment were being seated in the same house; a numerous body of gentlemen and clergymen were in the room. Here was a host of competent witnesses. All the circumstances of the case were as favourable for the impartial development of the truth, as for the favourable reception of Mr. Banks's singularly insufficient apology. Here is the county member, a leading man of his party, at an agricultural dinner; excuse the comparison—a cock on his own dunghill."

What a noble opportunity of eliciting and declaring to the deluded kingdom the facts of the case! Why not out at once with the rates of wages, summer and winter, a description of the cottages, and fare, and other plain realities? The successful candidates for the labourers' prizes had each received "a neat and pretty testimonial, expensively framed and glazed, to hang up in his cottage." How complete the scene would have been if "a neat and pretty" landlords' testimonial could have been added to the series!

Inferior motives will take the lead and mix themselves with the whole course of the inquiry. A wise man casts them aside, and searches for facts. It is but a feeble mode of debate to descend from a question of fact to a question of motive, and merely perpetuate a miserable war of personal recriminations. If it were a sufficient answer to any considerable statement that there are interested or malicious reasons for propounding or believing it, there is an end to all human certainty and all exactness of knowledge, for there are few statements which are not in that predicament."

Nor would retaliation be unusual:—

"Nay, truth itself requires these retaliations. If one employer charges on another the ill condition of his servants, it is quite necessary to inquire, 'How do you manage?' If a person censures the excessive strictness of another's domestic management, it is obvious and inevitable to reply, 'But your children are ill-bred.' The manufacturer is charged with working his servants too young, too much, too carelessly, and so forth. He cannot but inquire, 'How do you contrive to give a sufficiency of wages to your servants without these acknowledged evils? You are lavish of your precepts. Show me your example. How do you actually get over the difficulties under which the great bulk of mankind are sentenced to earn their bread?' Let Mr. Banks just for a moment quit the charmed circle of his castle, his tenantry, and his agricultural meeting, and put himself in the place of a Manchester manufacturer, and he will learn to make allowances, and take truth even at the mouth of a rival; at least, to meet assertions with facts."

This, Mr. Banks, proceeds from a journalist who supports the Ministry of which you are a subordinate.

The only excuse which can be made for the fluent monopolist is, that, though a tolerably ready talker, he is not a good hand at facts. That is his peculiar weakness.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

Sir,—In the LEAGUE of Saturday a correspondent inquires as to the qualification of an Independent Minister having a beneficiary interest in a cottage of the value of £9 a year. You doubt his claim; but my own case induces me to differ from you, and its publication may, perhaps, be useful to others, as it has been argued at length before successive barristers, and always in my favour. I am an Independent Minister in circumstances precisely such as your correspondent specifies. I claim no freehold in the chapel or salary; but the minister's house I prefer letting at £10 a year to occupying, and for that I claim, and successfully, because the cottage is in the hands of trustees for the use of the minister for the time being. The appointment is in another body, called the church. The trustees, who legally hold the property (the cottage) have not a shadow of power, as trustees, to take it away at any time or for any cause; therefore, however the appointment may be deemed terminable by the appointing parties, the trustees are deemed to have no control over the beneficiary interest; and therefore it is as to them a life interest—no opposing barristers have agreed. Many Independent ministers are in similar circumstances, and will be thankful for this information.

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully, JEROME CLAPP.
[If "B.J." has an appointment for life, or for some uncertain period which may endure for life, he can vote; we intimated as much in our answer, but the case sent to us merely stated that of "A minister of the Independent denomination who preaches in a chapel," without giving any reference to his appointment, whether for life or merely an occasional preacher. Our answer could, therefore, be only general.]
"S.G."—Sir,—Being anxious to qualify myself as a voter for Middlesex, I shall feel obliged by your favouring me with your opinion on the following case:—A friend owes me £300, for which I receive the usual interest; he is in possession of freehold property in the county, of ample value, and is willing to grant me a rent-charge of £15 per annum on the same, reserving, however, to himself a power of redemption on payment of £300. Would such a transaction be considered a rent-charge in the spirit of the Reform Act, or not rather a mortgage, and, as such, insufficient to confer on me a vote? The favour of a reply in your next week's paper will oblige yours, obediently.

[We think a rent-charge with such a clause, though good in law as security, might raise a question as to the bond fide qualification in the registration courts.]

"A Free-Trader."—The lodgers' case is before the Court of Common Pleas. It is, therefore, thought advisable to withhold our opinion, but rather wait the decision of the court.
"W.A." may procure one of the articles he inquires for at Mr. Cadaby's, Market-street, Manchester. We are not aware of any error in the statistical account to which he refers.
"C.R."—The verses under this signature are not sufficiently correct for insertion.

"J.R."—Newspapers may be transmitted through the Post-office within the United Kingdom without any limitation as to the date of publication; but they can only be forwarded to British possessions in foreign parts within one week of the day of publication.
"J.H., Jewin Crescent," will be noticed next week.
"W.T., Withenhall,"—We must decline these lines.

"M., Kilkenny," sends some strong remarks, claiming from the monopolists pecuniary restitution, but which we must decline to insert. We cannot, however, refrain from saying, that provided such restitution could be made, and that the monopolists, in order to effect it, were willing to pawn their plate, carriages, racehorses, and fowling-pieces, yet how could they undo the actual misery that they have inflicted? How could they reimburse the families which the effects of monopoly have scattered over the world? And how restore from the grasp of death the victims of a starving policy to their bereaved friends?

The letter from a "Friend, in Oxfordshire," is received: its contents will be duly considered.
Many communications are unavoidably postponed to next week for want of space.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

We beg to announce that on and after the 18th of January, Two Pages of the LEAGUE will be appropriated to Advertisements. No Patent Medicine Advertisements will be admitted; nor will any Advertisements be received after the Thursday preceding the day of publication. The average circulation of the LEAGUE from April 6th to December 28th, 1844, was 19,738: the minimum number having been 17,092.

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING IN THE FREE-TRADE HALL, MANCHESTER.

AN AGGREGATE MEETING of the LEAGUE will be HELD on WEDNESDAY next, January 8, in the FREE-TRADE HALL, MANCHESTER.

GEORGE WILSON, Esq., in the Chair.

The meeting will be addressed by RICHARD CODDEN, Esq., M.P., MARK PHILIPS, Esq., M.P., and WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., of Liverpool.

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING IN COVENT GARDEN.

THE NEXT AGGREGATE MEETING of the LEAGUE, in the THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN, will be HELD on WEDNESDAY so'night, the 16th of JANUARY, at the usual hour.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, January 4, 1845.

The progress of the registration movement has more than equalled our anticipations. During the past week our general and local committees have been kept in full employment providing qualifications for those who are anxious to obtain the franchise, and we have little doubt that at the next registration for the county of Middlesex the Free-Traders will place a working and winning majority on the register. We strongly recommend the formation of committees in all other counties connected with manufactures, or having large towns sufficient to counteract the landlord domination, so as to have everything ready for work as soon as possible; and in the meantime we recommend every individual Free-Trader who can obtain a qualification to do so, and not to be deterred by finding that the monopolists appear to be supreme at present in the district where such qualification is situated.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—M. Villemain, Minister of Public Instruction, is so alarmingly ill that he has resigned that post. The Moniteur of Tuesday announces that the King has signified to M. Villemain his deep regret at seeing him retire from office, and publishes a royal ordinance, dated Monday, accepting his resignation, and charging M. Damon, the Minister of Public Works, with the department of Public Instruction ad interim.

The Minister of Justice and Public Worship has addressed a circular to the French bishops, requesting them to engage priests of their dioceses to be indulgent in the case of persons who die without having received the offices of religion. "Whenever," says the circular, "a doubt can exist as to the real state of mind of the deceased, ought not the minister of a religion of Christian love to hasten to his funeral, and pray solemnly for him whose last sigh, perhaps, was addressed to the God of mercy? Ought he not, at least, to guard himself severely against the inspirations of a too ardent zeal, or the illusions of a too delicate conscience?"

The deputies forming part of the Agricultural Committee of the French Chamber were to meet on Monday, to consider what measures it was advisable to adopt in order to prevent the epidemic now prevailing among the cattle in Germany from extending its ravages to France. The malady is said to have made its appearance on the frontiers of Rhenish Prussia and Dutch Limburg, within a short distance of Belgium. The provincial authorities of that kingdom were taking precautions against the scourge.

BRUSSELS, Dec. 26.—The Senate was engaged to-day in the general debate on the project of the Corn Law. The Ministers of the Interior and Public Works, Foreign Affairs, Justice, and Finance were present. Several members were wholly opposed to the proposed measure, which they thought would be disastrous to agriculture. Other members were of opinion that it would prevent greater evils, and some were of opinion that it could not prove so injurious as some believe, because the Government reserved to itself the power of suspending the execution of it. The general discussion being closed, that of the several articles will commence to-morrow.

Dec. 27.—The Senate in its yesterday's sitting, after an animated debate, adopted the project of law on corn by a majority of 20 to 13.

There has been a meeting at Ghent of the men employed in the sugar houses, for the purpose of drawing up a petition to the Chamber against the proposed law on sugar duties. The petition was unanimously adopted. The following paragraph was added:—"We do not ask alms, we ask for justice—for work." The petition has above 800 signatures.

A Mulhouse journal states that the demand for calico goods in that town is so great, that the manufacturers are all actively employed, and that within a short period 3000 new hand-looms have been set up in the neighbourhood.

UNITED STATES.—The Royal Mail steamer Caledonia arrived at Liverpool on Sunday, bringing the American President's message and papers from New York to the 15th Dec., Boston to the 16th, and Halifax to the 18th.

Mr. Tyler's message is very lengthy. Its chief topic is pressing the annexation of Texas. The advantages of the step are thus summed up:—"The extension of our coastwise and foreign trade, to an amount almost incalculable, the enlargement of the market for our agricultural productions—safety to our frontiers, and additional strength and stability to the Union,—these are the results which would rapidly develop themselves upon the consummation of the measure of annexation." An angry correspondence had taken place between the American Minister at Mexico, and the Mexican Secretary of State, in consequence of the latter having explicitly charged the American Government with bad faith, and with covertly promoting the separation of Texas from Mexico. The American Minister was, in consequence, momentarily expecting his passports to leave the country. According to this news, affairs between Mexico and the United States look very warlike, and a rupture between the two nations may lead to very serious difficulty with England, if with no other European government.

TROUBLES IN CANADA.—There are occasional outbreaks in Canada, which are very unpleasant, particularly at elections. On Monday, Dec. 2nd, the municipal election took place in Montreal, and on the Saturday previous a man named Colburn shot an Irishman named Penta through the heart who had assaulted him. The day following the city was in a state of great excitement, and the Irishmen and Frenchmen collected in great crowds at the Haymarket. The military were called out and the mob dispersed. On Monday afternoon two men were shot, one named Griffiths, in the neck, who is not expected to live. The military were again called out and the mob dispersed.—New York Sun.

WATERSPOUT IN MEXICO.—At Yabu, in the late hurricane, a tremendous waterspout passed through the place, doing much damage. It was about 20 feet wide. In its course it passed over two houses, driving the roofs through, and entirely destroying one. Five children were killed in one of the buildings. The effect was the same as if a violent river had run through the town. Trees, grass, and everything that came in its way were torn up.—American paper.

INDIA.—By the arrival of the Beutick at Suez, on the 14th of December, we have received advice from Calcutta of the 15th of November, Madras the 22nd. From Alexandria we learn "that Lord Elphinstone had left on the 18th for Cairo, as also young Hardinge, who had arrived by the Hedra. The Post-office treaty had been signed, and would go on by the Oriental."

The past month has not been prolific in events of a very striking character. The insurrection in the Kolapore country, which proved to be of a more serious character than was supposed, has been put down, and the disturbed districts seem to be tolerably quiet. In the Bombay Presidency nothing of a very important character has occurred. The Governor-General is still at the Presidency, and rumour is silent on the subject of any intended move from the seat of Government. He appears to be quietly perfecting himself in the business of his administration; and such indications as have yet been manifested seem to point to a tranquil and pacific Government, pregnant with good to the people of the soil. There is no talk of a war in the Punjab, or any other immediate employment of our troops.

Within the presidency two domestic events have occurred some interest of a painful character. One of these is the suicide of the Rajah of Berhampore, who having committed, through his instruments, some acts of cruelty on the person of a dependent, which occasioned, in the sequel, the poor man's death, came down to Calcutta, where intelligence of the tragic issue reached him, coupled with the information that a warrant was out for his arrest. Dreading the indignity of falling into the hands of the myrmidons of the police, the wretched man blew out his brains. He had previously made a will, leaving the bulk of his large property to be devoted to the establishment and support of a university. The coroner's jury brought in a verdict of felo de se. The other event is the murder, by Dacoits, of Captain Alcock, of the Quartermaster-General's department, who was intercepted, when on a dawn journey, by a band of notorious Dacoits, of whom the police were in pursuit, and being taken for Mr. Unwin, the magistrate, was dragged from his palanquin and cut to pieces. Several of the wretches concerned in this murderous deed have been apprehended. "The demand for British goods," writes the Englishman of the 16th of November, "has latterly revived, and some descriptions are now eagerly sought for, notwithstanding the immense increase of supply during the past year. There can be no doubt that a more general and extensive consumption is gradually taking place, and we expect very soon to find India at the head of the list of British exports. The home Government will then, perhaps, become aware how much it is in their power to do for the prosperity of this country, and be furnished with a sufficient motive for undertaking it. The improvement in our overland communications, which we have reason to think will be effected next year, will, we hope, be the first great step to a course of measures on the part of Government for the improvement of the most important of the British possessions. By it they will have brought us near enough to be heard, and it will be our fault if we do not speak."

CHINA.—The news from China is to the 3rd of September, but it is not of an important character.

SYDNEY.—Advices from Sydney are to the 4th of September. The colonies were slowly—very slowly—reviving. Great distress prevailed among the operative classes, and a public meeting had been held to memorialise the Government to take their case into consideration.

Dr. Wolff.—We find that, by the last accounts, Dr. Wolff was on his way from Teheran to Erzeroum.

TAHITI.—The Paris journals of Monday publish very long accounts from Tahiti to the 14th of July, brought home by Admiral Dupetit Thouars, who has, it appears, arrived in Paris. The only new fact of importance unconnected with the horrible details of massacres which are given in the official reports, is the announcement by the Governor, through an indirect channel, of intelligence that his Government had renounced the sovereignty of Tahiti. The writer of a letter from Tahiti, published in the Debates, declares that the natives of the whole island, except in two or three districts, are animated by feelings of the most decided hostility against the French; that they have acquired extraordinary boldness; that they show themselves close to Papeete, and that the colonists are nowhere in security. This is proved by the burning of one of the largest farms, in which the crew of the Uranie were working as labourers, and the destruction by fire of several of the houses inhabited by colonists. The natives have also burned down the residence and chapel of the French missionaries. The Debates correspondent admits that even the French troops are only secure when within their fortifications; for, if they go out to attack the natives, the latter do not retire until they have destroyed many of the army, and immediately reappear, to harass and annoy them. "We have a beautiful climate," says the writer, "and a luxuriant vegetation; but we can enjoy neither, for we are without peace, and we have no hands to cultivate the soil." One of the reports to the Governor announces the death of an English missionary, whose name is given in a private letter as Makinn. This unfortunate gentleman was, it is said, standing on a balcony looking at the troops when the natives opened their fire upon the French, and he received a ball, which killed him immediately.

DOMESTIC.

A petition against the game laws is in course of signature, by the inhabitants of the town and county of Nottingham.

On Christmas-day the bodies of two boys, and subsequently that of a third, were found in a mill-stream which flows into the Cherwell, near Banbury. It was ascertained on inquiry that they had been sliding on the ice, which it is supposed broke under them, and they were consequently drowned.

The Willshire Independent reports an afflictive case of death caused by destitution and the inclemency of the weather. The unfortunate victim, John Mathews, of Greatworth, had been committed to the New Prison for two months for deserting his wife and children, and on coming out on Wednesday, the 11th of December, was deprived of his warm prison dress, and the miserable rags he had on when first incarcerated were given to him; and also a loaf of bread and 4d. given him for his sustenance on the road home, a distance of nearly 20 miles. Thus exposed to the inclemency of the weather, and being afflicted with a disease of the heart, only occasionally obtaining temporary shelter, and having hardly any food to eat at Malmsbury, his feet so badly frost-bitten that the medical attendant declared he must lose them. On the following Saturday night he expired. An inquest has been held on the body, and after a full investigation of the case the jury returned the following verdict:—"That death was of opinion that disease of the heart; and the exposure to cold on leaving the prison with insufficient clothing, rendered him particularly susceptible of its effects." The unhappy men, Downing and Powys, who were convicted at the late Staffordshire assizes for the murder of the gamekeeper, William Cooper, await the execution of their sentence. No information has been received by the county authorities as to whether the recommendation of the jury, that the lives of these wretched men might be spared, has been favourably considered by the officers of the Crown.

The Society for Relieving Destitution in the Metropolis has placed the sum of £100 with a view of the resident inmates of Bethnal-green parish during this inclement season. Relief of a very extensive nature in coal, bread, and potatoes, and a reasonable donation of blankets, was distributed for Christmas throughout the whole of the district.

A public meeting of the Regent-street district branch of the Metropolitan Drapers' Association was held on Monday evening, December 30, at Lloyd's Rooms, Regent-quadrant, when interesting information relative to the progress of the "early closing" movement was detailed, and the evils resulting from the present protracted hours of business in shops were forcibly depicted by the several speakers.

On Sunday morning, a few minutes before 12 o'clock, the metropolis and its environs were visited with a dense fog. At many of the churches and chapels it was necessary to have the lamps lighted to enable the clergy to proceed with the services. The steamers and other vessels proceeding up and down the river dropped their anchors, it being almost impossible to discern objects ten yards distant. About two o'clock the wind shifted, when rain commenced, and the fog dispersed.

A fatal accident occurred on Monday morning on the Liverpool and Leeds Junction Railway. Mr. Thomas Foraythe, one of the principal servants in the establishment, who was going in the train to attend his own daughter's funeral, was run over by the engine and killed on the spot.

The Dublin Evening Mail states that "Sir James Graham, and that portion of the Cabinet which encourage everything anti-Protestant in Ireland, have come to the resolution of founding two colleges—the one in Ulster, the other in Munster; Belfast and Cork being the localities fixed upon in opposition to, if not in rivalry with, Trinity College, Dublin."

The agitation in Ireland against the Charitable Bequests Act is still going on with energy, and appears to have received a considerable stimulus from an article in the Times, recommending as good policy on the part of the British Government to open negotiations with the Court of Rome, for the purpose of establishing diplomatic relations with the Pope.

There are still sad accounts from the midland counties of Ireland. Two murders are recorded—one in Roscommon, the other in Kerry. The Sligo Champion says that ribbonism has been revived in that district.

The Repeal Association met on Monday in the Conciliation-hall. The proceedings were of little interest. The week's rent amounted to £178. 16s.

During the last few days the metropolitan coroners have held a large number of inquests on the bodies of persons who have died suddenly. On Tuesday Mr. Baker held five inquests, the day before six, and in the course of the last four or five days he has had above twenty cases. Mr. Payne, the City coroner, held two inquests on Tuesday; and on Saturday night, while holding one in St. John's, Horseleydown, a female fell down dead opposite the house where the jury were sitting. Mr. Higge, the coroner for Westminster, has also held several. The cause of the numerous sudden deaths is attributed by the medical men to the frequent sudden changes of the atmosphere, and the alternations of heat and cold producing rapid inflammation and congestion of the vessels of the head and lungs.

The occupation of the Royal Exchange by the merchants took place on Wednesday the 1st instant; the muster was very considerable.

On Monday an exceedingly high scaffold, erected against the premises of Mr. Slater, butcher, Jermy-street, St. James's, fell with a tremendous crash, burying in the materials four labourers, who were engaged in running it still higher. One was taken out quite dead, and two others it is feared have been crushed by the weight of the falling timber. Another was removed on a stretcher to the hospital in a very precarious state, small hopes being held out of his recovery.

The official return of the Dartmouth election was made on Friday the 27th ultimo, when the numbers were:—For Mr. Somes, 125; Mr. Moffett, 118—majority, 7. "We understand," says the Chronicle, "that this election will be further contested before a committee of the House of Commons, not only on the alleged disqualification of the successful candidate as a Government contractor, and therefore ineligible to sit in Parliament, but on allegations of bribery, and of bad votes having been polled."

The total number of deaths in the metropolis during the week ending last Saturday, was 1249; showing a decrease of 144 upon the mortality of the preceding week. The returns, however, are still considerably (303) above the weekly average, as deduced from the average numbers of the past five years, which is 946.

An inquest was held on Thursday afternoon at the Three Tons, Saltbill, Slough, on the body of Sarah Hart, a married woman, whose husband is now abroad, and who is suspected to have been murdered. By the evidence of Mary Anne Ashlee, it appeared that between six and seven the previous evening she heard stifled screams in the house where deceased resided, and that on taking a light and going to the door she saw a man dressed like a Quaker, and who appeared much agitated, come from the house; about two hours before she had seen the same person at the house. On entering the deceased's apartment she found her lying on her back on the floor, her dress disordered, she having the appearance of having been struggling. The deceased had always told her that she was a married woman; that her husband was the son of a Quaker named Tawell, with whom she had formerly lived as a servant; that she had expected him (Tawell) to visit her on the day in question, and to bring her part of her husband's wages. She had children by her husband. The witness identified Mr. Tawell, who had been taken into custody, as the person she had seen at the house. He was in the garb of a member of the Society of Friends, and appeared between 50 and 60 years of age. He is the town surveyor of Berkhamstead. After having been seen leaving the house, he was traced to the station-house where he started for London; but the superintendent, Mr. Howell, having forwarded a description of him by telegraph, he was watched by a railway policeman, and arrested and conveyed to Slough to be present at the inquest. The medical evidence was not given, the inquest having been adjourned to Saturday.

A frightful accident has taken place at the colliery of Messrs. Mathews and Dudley, at Bromley, near Kingswinford, in consequence of the breaking of some part of the machinery, by which eight persons were precipitated down the pit a distance of 200 yards, and dashed nearly to atoms.

Major-General Sir William Knott died on Wednesday last, at his residence, Carmarthen.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TURN-OUT OF POWER-LOOM WEAVERS.—On Friday last the turn-out of power-loom weavers at the cotton-mill of Messrs. Tattersall and Mellor, Lyon Mill, Oldham, terminated, the masters having consented to free the hands from the charges made for gas. The object of the strike was to obtain an advance of wages; and the exemption from the charge for gas will be equivalent to an increase of about 6d. per week for each pair of looms.

HANDSOME TURN-OUT.—The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos, the labourer's friend and farm servant's father, has lately been exercising a little wholesome fatherly severity upon his Irish tenants in Westmeath, where eighteen families have been turned adrift by the Duke's steward. Pleasant weather this for the wet bog, or ditch side! It appears that no rent was due from them. Doubtless, on the occasion of the next agricultural jubilee at Stowe, these eighteen families will form part of the pageant. The conduct of the Duke of Buckingham proves the truth of what has been often said of him, that "No landlord can turn out a finer set of tenants."—Punch.

THE WORKING CLASSES IN LIVERPOOL.—The Liverpool Courier mentions, as a proof of the improved condition of the working classes in that town, that there has been only one soup-shop opened this winter, instead of four; and that, though eight or ten tubs of soup per day used to be taken in former years from that single establishment, only one tub and a half has been taken on any one day during the present winter. The Liverpool Courier adds:—"In corroboration of the gratifying fact that the lower classes are not suffering to anything like the extent they did in former years, we may mention that the demands made on the Provident and Strangers' Friend Societies are comparatively few, and that the claims on the benevolent public are much less now than they were in former years."

LABOURERS' COTTAGES.—In the course of an inquiry before Mr. William Brunner, coroner for Oxfordshire, touching the death of a poor girl at Hampton Poyle, a village within six miles of Oxford, it came out that the cottage of the family contained only one sleeping-room, and that of the most miserable description, being near the thatched roof, and barely high enough to stand upright in the middle. There were three beds in this room, and eight persons (comprising the father, mother, and a grown-up daughter and son, and four young children) occupied it as a dormitory. We hope the publication of this case will arouse the landlords and farmers of Oxfordshire, and cause them to render the miserable huts of their dependents and labourers fit for human beings to reside in, instead of having them huddled indiscriminately together. This is not at all an isolated case in the neighbourhood of Oxford, where, with the exception of a few villages, the labourers' cottages are wretched in the extreme.

THE AGRICULTURISTS WITH THEIR EYES OPEN.—Of one thing we feel quite confident, namely, that when Free Trade is established, and the labourers from the agricultural find employment in the manufacturing districts, and an increased consumption of food from constant work and constant wages affords the farmer his best protection against foreign corn, the agriculturists will open their eyes, like men awaking from a dream, and wonder what it was about which they were making such a tremendous fuss. This revolution of feeling has already been effected on the question of free trade in wool. The loudest alarmists are now laughing at their own fears. We hope soon to hear the same confession on the subject of free trade in corn, and think that at no distant day we shall listen to some of the most stringent protectionists admitting that, although terribly frightened at the idea of the repeal of the Corn Laws, they have not been in the least hurt by the reality.—Liverpool Albion.

INCENDIARISM.—On Tuesday so-nigh a thatched barn at Braintree, in the occupation of Mr. Durrant, of the White Hart Inn, was destroyed by fire, which, there is every reason to believe, was the act of an incendiary.—On Sunday so-nigh a straw-rick, on the Vicarage farm, the property of Mr. Thos. Coleman, was set on fire and consumed. It was also found that a quantity of gates and ploughs in the immediate neighbourhood had been broken. The way in which this had been done evinced that more than one person must have been engaged.—Banbury Guardian.

On Thursday evening last, about nine, a fire (the act of an incendiary) was discovered in a pear-rick belonging to Messrs. Rose, at Marston, near Deves. Before any assistance could be rendered, the whole of the middle part had become ignited, and the rick nearly consumed. The flames communicated to a large barn adjoining, containing 16 sacks of corn. With some little exertion, the corn, with the exception of four sacks, was saved, but the building was entirely destroyed.—Deves Gazette.

On Monday so-nigh a large stack, containing upwards of 12,000 faggots, the property of Mr. Barnard, maltster, situated in a field on the roadside between the towns of Harlow and Sawbridgeworth, in Herts, was burnt to the ground. The loss is estimated at £250. The fire was supposed to be the act of an incendiary.—On Wednesday night, the 18th ultimo, the inmates of the dwelling-house at Lilly Hall Farm, which has been twice the scene of incendiary fires during the last few weeks, were alarmed at finding the house gradually filling with smoke. A search was made, and it was soon discovered that the apple-room was on fire, which was soon got under. Superintendent Wakenell, of the rural police, the next morning instituted an inquiry, and the result was the apprehension of Mary Anne Bigrave, a servant at the farm-house; a very strong case (upon circumstantial evidence) was made out against her, and she was committed for trial.—Another fire has occurred on the premises belonging to Mr. John Wood, at Waterdine, in the parish of Newent, about a mile from the Ford-house, the scene of the alarming and disastrous conflagration of Tuesday, the 24th ultimo, when four wheat-ricks, containing about 500 bushels each, and a large barn, containing 50 bushels of barley and a quantity of wheat, were destroyed. A barn and shed adjoining have been burned to the ground. There can be no doubt, it is said, that the fires are wilful, and the aspect is getting darker and darker.

TRIALS FOR INCENDIARISM.—There were no fewer than ten trials for arson, at Norwich, on Thursday and Friday week; and in all cases convictions ensued. One of the culprits was an elderly woman, and another a man; the rest were all, with one exception, under twenty years of age; one of these youthful incendiaries was nine years old, another thirteen, and a third fourteen. The two youngest and the woman were ordered to be imprisoned; the rest were sentenced to transportation.

the principles for which the League is contending. It is justly observed by the Morning Chronicle—

"This satisfactory balance-sheet is as tangible a Free-Trade demonstration as can be made evident to the sense of man. First, it is another addition to the many proofs in by-past times, that years of cheapness are years of prosperity: cheapness in food, the prime element in labour, and cheapness in the raw material on which capital and labour are expended. Secondly, it exposes the gross delusion which would make a distinction between the home and the foreign trade of this country: they are 'one and indivisible.' Trade with China is trade in Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, and Glasgow; trade in our manufacturing towns is trade for Essex, Lincolnshire, and Norfolk; bustle in the manufacturing implies a mitigation of distress in the agricultural districts. Thirdly, it tells us that low prices produce more employment and higher wages, and that these enable the working classes to enjoy more comfort, and to pour into the Treasury larger contributions, through the medium of the Customs and Excise. And lastly, it reminds all who can recollect the cycles of the last half century, that we have now reached another of those revolving periods, by which, if there be no great and permanent change effected in our whole financial system, we shall be as assuredly landed in disaster as we were in 1819, or 1825, or 1837."

Even the Standard is obliged to confess that the state of the revenue is an argument in favour of Free Trade, though the reluctant admission is qualified by an unintelligible reservation.

"The 'satisfactory balance-sheet' is, no doubt, a demonstration in favour of Free Trade to some extent; that is, a testimony in favour of just so much Free Trade as has given rise to the present happy condition of affairs; but of no more. A little water to one's wine is a good thing, but none but a teetotaler would deluge his cup with the New River; or, on the other side, a glass of wine may be salutary, but this scarcely justifies a two-bottle man in pretending his regimen to be the most conducive to health."

We give the Standard's italics as we find them, though the meaning is far from being clear, and the superadded metaphors belong to that school of rhetoric

"Which puzzles even by explanation,
And darkens by elucidation."

Hamlet, we know, exclaims, "Too much of water hast thou had, Ophelia!" and the writers of the Standard are, probably, as good authorities as could be found on the inconvenience of taking an overdose of wine; but we have yet to learn that a nation can have too much prosperity, or a people too large a supply of food. Sure we are that the labourers of Dorsetshire are suffering from no plethora, and the peasants of Wiltshire from no superabundance of provisions. In no direction have we heard that there is a surplus of demand for labour, or a greater amount of employment than our population is adequate to supply. The Standard, in fact, unwittingly implies that the present happy condition is limited, because the Ministerial progress to Free Trade is limited; for truth will sometimes force its way through the evasions and shuffling of the most dexterous sophist. It would have been scarcely possible to write on the subject without slipping into the admission, that experience had demonstrated the mischief of monopoly to the State as well as its gross injustice to the people. Improvement is most marked in the department of the Customs, where the principles of Free Trade, modified and mangled as they are in Sir Robert Peel's tariff, have had scope for operation.

The Morning Herald has broached what it deems a most ingenious discovery, and promises to furnish a demonstration thereof at some future time—probably at the Greek kalends. According to the venerable lady, our prosperity is owing not to the cheapness of food, but to the exclusion of foreign corn consequent on that cheapness; and it offers to prove that "the public revenue always pays almost pound for pound for every quarter of foreign corn imported." This has been too much even for the Standard: the latter quotes the discovery, "as in duty bound," but dismisses it with the unceremonious comment, "How wonderful—if true!"

The Morning Chronicle very ably points out the indications of future danger that may be discerned in the midst of this favourable prospect:—

"It is now evident that the power of the Chinese to make returns which we can accept, will keep our commerce within limits bearing no proportion to the extent and resources of their empire. Indeed, the great increase in the Customs last year demonstrates the safety as well as the utility of judicious reductions of duties. How is it, then, that this long-coming and much wished-for prosperity has not yet raised the revenue to what it was a few years ago, when we had a smaller population and no property and income tax of five millions sterling? The answer is, a still contracted field for capital and labour."

"A check in the trade with China is, therefore, an event for which a British Minister should be fully prepared. Even if he should be able, by an alteration of import duties, to increase the facilities of obtaining returns from China, this would not render precaution unnecessary. While our trade is restrained in so many quarters, it will have a constant tendency to supply those markets which are open beyond the effective demand. Our only security is the removal of every restriction which is in our power. There is now a breathing time, during which this might be effected with full deliberation. There never was a better opportunity for such a thorough revision of import duties as would withdraw them altogether from popular discussion, and render further alteration unnecessary. This is the time to make the trade in corn free, and to remove all duty from sugar which is not necessary for the purpose of revenue. By such means our commercial prosperity might be placed on a firm foundation, and the materials of much strife and agitation taken away for ever. By such means alone we may ensure a period of successful industry long enough to allow education and other civilising influences to raise the moral and intellectual condition of the working class, and thereby protect society from perils which can hardly be overrated."

Our contemporary declares that he "is not sanguine in his expectation of what the next session may bring forth;" we hopefully look forward to it for very important consequences. Events have shown the futility and falsehood of all the pretences by which monopoly was defended; its hypocritical delusions, its pretended tenderness for the labourer, its hollow anxiety for the revenues of the State, have been proved to be equally false and despicable; the Free-Traders have it now in their power to exhibit monopoly in its naked deformity, and set it before the nation as a self-convicted and self-exposed tyranny. They can now follow its tracks to the covert in which it couched,

"And drag the lurking monster into day."

The next session will do more to test the character of public men than any which has occurred within the century. It will impose upon the followers as well as the leaders of party a stringent necessity for speaking out; the nation will discover in what it has to trust, and in whom it may safely confide; the Legislature will have so obviously to choose between progressive improvement and retrogression that none of its members can avoid the ordeal.

FUTILITY OF PROTECTION.

A singular illustration of the truth of Free-Trade principles, and the pernicious absurdity of monopolist protection, is exhibited in the Trans-Caucasian provinces of Russia. The Count de Cancrin, the late Russian Minister of Finance, perceiving that there was a very active commerce in Georgia, Imerechia, and Mingrelia, through which lies the high road of trade between the Black Sea and the Caspian, resolved to secure exclusive possession of these marts for the manufactures of Moscow. It was the custom of the American merchants at Tiflis, the capital of Georgia and the great centre of commerce between the Black Sea and the Caspian, to make large imports of the various European products and manufactures suited to the Persian markets, for which they found a ready sale on the Georgian frontier. The Count de Cancrin, with the shortsightedness of monopoly, introduced the Russian tariff into the Trans-Caucasian provinces, and exacted heavy duties on the cotton, silk, hardware, and glass brought to the harbours; in a short time these ports ceased to be frequented, and the towns on the Mingrelian seaboard sunk rapidly into decay. The vessels laden with British and German goods directed their course to Trebizond, and the Persian caravans soon sought the same market. The wealthy merchants, finding their occupation gone, abandoned Tiflis; and this metropolis, formerly so rich and flourishing, is now reduced to a state of deplorable poverty: its petty shopkeepers are equally destitute of capital and credit; proclamations of bankruptcy alone keep alive the memory of its trade.

Trebizond has risen on the ruins of Tiflis; the Turkish and Persian Governments have been enriched at the expense of the Russian; the monopolists of Moscow have not sold a yard of cloth or an ounce of hardware the more in consequence of the protective duties, while smuggling to an incredible extent has added to the multitudinous causes of social disorganization in Southern Russia, and more especially in the Trans-Caucasian provinces. The Count de Cancrin nevertheless adhered to the delusive system of protection with the same desperate fidelity that is exhibited by our friend of the Morning Post: he placed bands of custom-house officers and hordes of Cossacks along the banks of the Araxes; but the crafty Americans baffled the one and bribed the other: in fact, more British manufactures are poured into Russian Armenia by this route than were formerly obtained from the Mingrelian ports, and Erzerum in particular is a capital flourishing entirely by illicit trade. General Neidhart, Governor-General of the Trans-Caucasian provinces, in the name of the suffering Georgians, and particularly the pauperized population of Tiflis, frequently represented to the Cabinet of St. Petersburg the injury which the exorbitant Russian tariff was working to the population of those provinces and also to the finances of the empire; but the Count de Cancrin, the creature of the monopolist manufacturers, paid as little attention to these representations as the nominees of English monopolist landlords to the cries of our starving operatives in the late commercial crisis. It was said that the monopolist Minister possessed not a single virtue; fortunately, about six months ago, he exhibited one, which was, under all circumstances, the most desirable—the virtue of resignation. The Council of State, delivered from the impediments thrown in its way by the Russian Goulbarns, has taken into consideration the proposals made by General Neidhart, and resolved on their adoption.

Redut-Khaleh, the best of the Mingrelian harbours, is to be declared a free port, and all European goods intended for Persia or the ports on the Caspian Sea are to be allowed to pass freely through Mingrelia and Georgia on the payment of a moderate transit duty. Tiflis is likewise to enjoy all the privileges of a free market, and from its position may be expected to recover at least some portion of its former importance. It is understood that these changes will not come into full operation before the beginning of next year; but in the meantime the Turks of Trebizond and the merchants of Tabriz will doubtless exert themselves to retain the commerce which the Count de Cancrin threw into their hands; and the Russians are likely to learn by bitter experience that it is much more easy to close than to reopen markets.

So far as we have been able to learn, the Muscovite manufacturers are not unwilling to admit the change. Their monopoly did not give them the Persian markets, and at the same time it so impoverished the Georgians that their custom was not worth having. We have good grounds for hope that this adoption of sound principle will not be confined to the Trans-Caucasian provinces, but will be extended to the entire Russian tariff.

MEETINGS.

GREAT MEETING OF THE LEAGUE IN MANCHESTER.

The Anti-Corn-Law League held its first aggregate meeting in the Free-Trade Hall for the present year, on Wednesday evening. It was at once a splendid and spirited gathering, quite equalling former assemblages of the kind in point of numbers; and both the body of the hall and galleries, as well as the platform, were thronged with people evidently of a respectable station in society, including a great number of ladies. The hall had undergone some alterations, including an enlargement of the platform, which now holds about 300 people; and some embellishments have been added, which tend to give an appearance of elegance as well as comfort to it. Behind the chairman was a piece of crimson tapestry, on which were emblazoned the national colours, and the words "National Anti-Corn-Law League." The proceedings commenced at half-past seven, when Mr. George Wilson, Chairman of the Council, took his place in front of the platform, accompanied by Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., Mark Phillips, Esq., M.P., William Brown, Esq. (late candidate for the representation of South Lancashire), John Bright, Esq., M.P., and Joseph Brotherton, Esq., M.P. The appearance of these gentlemen was the signal for a loud and general burst of cheering from all parts of the hall. Among the other gentlemen on the platform were Thomas Bazley, Esq., President of the Chamber of Commerce; W. Hargreaves, Esq., of the Grange, Milkthorpe; J. Chadwick, Esq., Eccles; John Brooks, Esq., Alderman Shuttleworth, Alderman Willert, D. Alnsworth, Esq., Wm. Bickham, Esq., W. Rawson, Esq., W. Sole, Esq., Alderman Walker, A. Prentice, Esq., John Rawson, Esq., Joshua Bower, Esq. (of Hunslet, near Leeds), Peter Walker, Esq., &c. &c.

The proceedings of the last meeting having been confirmed, pro forma,

Mr. GEORGE WILSON, the chairman, rose and said they were assembled this evening at the commencement of the seventh year of this agitation. (Cheers.) How many more meetings of this description might be required before the corn and provision laws were abolished he could not pretend to say; but he confessed that, looking at the extent and character of this meeting, he did not believe that in any of the past years they had opened their proceedings under more favourable auspices. (Loud cheers.) They met to-night more especially for business. Ten weeks ago the plan by which they proposed to enfranchise the counties was laid before the members of the League by Mr. Cobden. (Cheers.) Since that time the best energies of the Council had been directed to taking those steps most likely to conduce to the success of their plan. Since then thirty-five meetings had been held in various parts of Lancashire, Yorkshire, Middlesex, and North Cheshire, the greater part of which had been addressed by their respected friends, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright. (Cheers.) It is not for me to say what will be the success of this plan (continued Mr. Wilson), which must be completed by the 31st of January; all I have to say is, that unless the town of Manchester alone furnish us for South Lancashire with 1000 qualifications; with 300 or 400 for the West Riding of Yorkshire; with 300 or 400 for North Cheshire; and with as many more for North Lancashire, the people of Manchester will not have done their duty. ("Hear" and cheers.) We by no means think the county is in any other position at present than as described at the last meeting. We have seen the statement of the last meeting controverted; but we have seen no complete reply to the statement then made, that the gain on the register was 1700. We have gone over again this evening the analysis, and are prepared to abide by the statement we then made. (Loud cheers.) Now, there is one way in which the relative truth of the statements made on either side may be tested; we have heard that the noble lord who represents South Lancashire was likely to imitate the example of Lord Bickerstaff, late representative of the Northern Division,—we have all heard, no doubt, that he was expected to go to the House of Lords. Now, if he will do that, the public will have an opportunity of judging who is correct and who is not as to this statement. (Loud cheers.) You will be addressed this evening by Mr. Mark Philips, Mr. Cobden, and Mr. Brown—our future representative; and I now beg leave to call upon Mr. Mark Philips. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. MARK PHILIPS came forward, and was received with great cheering. He said he could not help suspecting, when he received the invitation to attend this meeting, that the Chairman had in his mind that he (Mr. Philips) had been devoting himself to farming pursuits a good deal lately. He probably took him to be a little of a backslider. He perhaps thought him to be somewhat like a razor that had been laid aside for a time: he was losing his edge, and required setting again. (Laughter.) However, there he was, and he hoped they had spent a merry Christmas, and permit him to hope that they had entered on the commencement of a prosperous and happy new year. (Applause.) Since he had last addressed them he had been labouring under heavy domestic affliction, which had necessarily withdrawn him for a time from public life; and he did not hesitate to say that his feelings had undergone a considerable change, and he had felt reluctant to appear in public. He would willingly, if he could, retire into private life; but so long as they called upon him to discharge the duties of their representative he should feel it his duty to endeavour to discharge them. (Applause.) He wished he could work like their friend Mr. Cobden. He congratulated them upon the steadfastness which they had manifested in connexion with this great question of Free Trade. He was delighted to see there was no backsliding among them. (Hear, hear, hear.) He congratulated them that they were determined to carry this question, and were not to be cheated into the belief that, because they had somewhat of a return of prosperity, they were not to apprehend a return of the evils with which they had been heretofore visited. What had legislation done within the last twelve months to secure a continuance of this prosperity? What, for instance, had been done with reference to our export trade to Brazil and the United States? We should look in vain for any change in this respect; and as bad legislation had produced bad results before, surely it would again. What was it had crowded our Exchange once more, filled our streets with traffic, and given employment to our artisans, weavers, and mechanics? Not the protection to agriculture; but the altered state of prices, the cheap rate at which the necessities of life could be obtained, the extension of the market for our manufactures, and the low price of the raw material on which the industry of this great district was employed. In all this was there not an approximation to the very results which had been anxiously anticipated as the consequences of Free Trade? (Hear, hear.) The present position of the country offered the best practical illustration of the truth of their principles. Somebody, therefore, must have been attempting to practise a delusion, or to state that which looked like falsehood (applause); but they were not likely to succeed. This was the season for stock-taking; and what did their opponents' stock consist of? The old fibs to which they had given such general circulation were no longer in demand; and if they attempted to smuggle them out in the spring, it would be like trying to pass a bad shilling between two good ones, but they would fail, as they deserved to do. But he heard an enormous joint-stock company was to be formed at No. 17 (he believed), Bowditch-street, which was to eclipse all others in the articles they were about to submit to the approbation of a discerning British public. It was not their intention, he understood, in the first instance, to attack the League, but to attack Sir Robert Peel, and to endeavour to wrest from him his tariff and his Canada Corn Bill. (Laughter.) He had voted in support of that measure, and should in consistency be bound to come to the rescue of Sir Robert, if he were placed in any predicament by this formidable society. The course for the Free-Traders was perfectly clear—to stick to everything they had got, and to get as much more as possible. (Cheers.) He had not inquired minutely into what would be the operation of that bill in all its details, being satisfied that the main result would be to lead to an increased demand for British manufactured goods. (Cheers.) He had last week travelled from London in company with one of the principal supporters of this Agricultural Society to which he had alluded, who was a good-tempered, open-hearted, country gentleman, and who had declared his readiness to support the removal of the cotton duty. Mr. Philips alluded to the soirée recently held in that hall, at which several gentlemen of the Young England party were present, and expressed his regret to learn, that with all their admiration of our manufacturing industry, and their well-wishes to the town, they had not called at the offices of the League and registered themselves as members. (Laughter.) But he hoped they would yet do something for the cause of Free Trade. He was much attached to the pursuits of agriculture himself, and had seen quite enough of it to know, that if the farmers of Great Britain looked to so-called protection to secure their profits they would be grossly deceived; they had been the subjects of this deception too long, and the consequence was that, as a body, they were suffering very much, and it was the duty of every one who was really a friend to the farmers to endeavour to open their eyes to the real state of the case. The sooner such a delusion was dispelled the better, and the more they inquired into the conduct and proceedings of the League, the more would they be convinced that it was not the advocate of any selfish party, or any particular section of the community. It was clear that protection had not given high agricultural wages, and it was equally clear that low prices of provisions in this district had not created low prices as between the master manufacturers and their workmen. (Cheers.) The only thing done in the way of legislation to relieve the pressure under which we had laboured was the opening of the trade with China. (Cheers.) This was a complicated question, involving, amongst other considerations, the question of how we were to be paid for what we sent out. Our principal imports were tea and silk; the former, by far the most important, was so woefully taxed that it was almost taken from within the reach of the working classes. And it was curious to observe that many individuals, interested in the China trade, but opposed to the League, were now calling out for a reduction of the duty on tea. But, if the Government made any concessions on that point, they must also make concessions on another little article, which was essential to an increased consumption of tea, namely, sugar; and it would be the duty of Free-Traders to exact from them equal justice in reference to those two articles. (Cheers.) It had been said the League was dead, and that "Othello's occupation was gone," but if it were dead, it was the largest ghost he ever saw, and not only a large one, but a troublesome one to lay. (Cheers and laughter.) In conclusion, he would draw their attention to one striking fact, that though the revenue was increasing, and though the Minister and his friends would doubtless boast of this as a proof of the flourishing condition of the country, yet that the last year's consumption of sugar only showed an increase of 2 or 2½ per cent. While congratulating them on the return of prosperity, he must say there was no chance of its being perpetuated, unless they reverted to sound and wholesome principles of legislation. (Cheers.)

WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., was next called upon, and was received with great cheering. He said:—I thank you most sincerely for the warm reception you now give me, and for the unlooked-for and unexpected honour you conferred on me in thinking me a fit and proper person to represent in Parliament one of the most important constituencies in the kingdom—the Free-Traders of South Lancashire. I have neither the vanity nor the presumption to suppose that I am the best man whose services you could have commanded to fight your battle, but in the absence of a better I have the satisfaction to see, notwithstanding the then state of the register precluded any hope of success, that my obeying your call has enabled you to register your votes in favour of a member of your own order, and fairly testing the progress that Free Trade principles have made. (Cheers.) It has called forth those latent powers of registration which have secured to you South Lancashire; do the same by North Lancashire, North Cheshire, the West Riding of Yorkshire, and the battle is won (cheers); for I then cannot doubt for a moment but that you will be able to shiver to atoms those manacles which held in bondage the commerce of the country. Who have a better right to be represented in Parliament than the merchants, manufacturers, and artisans who have made England what she is, and whose onward progress must sustain her, or we fall? Let us take warning in time by the fate of Cadiz, Venice, Augsburg, and other cities that were once important, and we may truly say are now no more. I have always great pleasure in referring to the greatest authorities I can, to sustain the views I take; and I shall now read an extract from a speech of as great a statesman as ever lived—the great Lord Chatham. He said in the House of Lords—"I do not despair of my country; and I have no objection to state what, in my opinion, would restore the kingdom to its once flourishing condition. Give freedom to commerce, and lighten the pressure of taxation, and you will have no complaining in your streets. As commerce is always a change of equivalents, a nation that will not buy cannot sell; and every restriction upon import is an obstacle to export. On the other hand, the more we admit the productions of foreign countries, the more extensive becomes their demand for our commodities. Let the absurd system of our Corn Laws be gradually and cautiously abolished, and allow the cheap agricultural produce of the north of Europe, and of the continents of America and Africa, to be freely introduced, and we shall obtain an unlimited vent for our manufactures. A rigid and efficient system of retrenchment, allowing us to take off the taxes upon salt, upon soap, upon leather, upon iron, and a few other articles of subsistence, our advantages, from position, from coalmines, and from the skill and energy of our people, are so considerable, that were it not for unwise laws and overstrained taxation, Britain, for ages to come, might continue to be the great workshop of the world." Gentlemen, I need only repeat, that this was one of the greatest men of the age in which he lived, and that the views he took on commerce were followed by his no less illustrious son, William Pitt; and who, in the first four years of his administration, negotiated the most remarkable Free-Trade treaty (that is with France) on record. He lowered the duty on brandy one-half, and quadrupled the consumption, and, consequently, doubled the revenue. Contrast this with the unfortunate and ill-judged proceedings of Lord Drexley, who, in Ireland, raised the duty from 7s. 6½d. per gallon to 22s. 6d., which reduced the revenue from £77,000 per annum to £25,000, although the population had gone on increasing. (Hear.) Your late lamented member, Lord Sydenham, stated in the House of Commons, in a speech made by him in March, 1830, that the Irish revenue was in 1807, £1,378,000; that duties from time to time were altered and raised during the war, up to 1821, which ought to have increased the revenue £3,100,000 per annum, say together, £7,700,000; but what was the effect of those injudicious imposts? The revenue was reduced to £3,814,000, leaving a dead loss of £533,000 per year, and depriving the country of more than half of its accustomed imports and luxuries which it enjoyed under the low duties. I am afraid I am troubling you with dry details of revenue statistics which will not be interesting. (Cries of "No, no," "Go on," and cheers.) Now, let us look at the advantage of removing duties, and stimulating our exertions at home. The ironmasters thought they would be ruined if the protective duty was taken off foreign iron. It was, nevertheless, reduced under the judicious counsel of Mr. Huskisson, in 1825, from £6. 10s. to £1. 10s. Our import then was 21,000 tons; now it is 12,000; our export was then 69,000 tons; now it is nearly 400,000. (Cheers.) Our make then was 500,000 tons in 1811 and 1812; it was about 1,500,000 tons last year. (Cheers.) It requires 6,600,000 of coals per annum to make this quantity of iron. You will see from this the immense advantage it is to the agricultural interest to encourage commerce, and create consumers for the products of the soil. (Hear, hear, hear.) Let us now look at the import of wool free of duty, about which the lauded interest raised such a storm. We have not, for the past year, received the official returns of imports, but I believe it will exceed those of the previous year by 20,000,000 of pounds. (Hear, hear, hear.) The effect has been that our export of woollen manufactures to face this import will probably be £2,000,000 in excess of former exports, and British wools have not suffered but benefited by this large import. This is easily explained: we cannot stop the production of raw materials in other countries, and it is more the interest of foreigners to send them here to have them manufactured (which we can do cheaper than they can), and furnish us with something that they can send us on better terms than we can make it, to pay the difference between the raw material and the manufactured article. (Cheers.) Look at flax and hemp: their importation free of duty has not injured the agriculturists, but it has benefited them, by creating more consumers of their produce. (Hear.) Silk is a remarkable instance of the advantage of reducing duties. It will be in the recollection of you all, the battle Mr. Huskisson had to fight in 1825 to accomplish this. The manufacturers of silk thought they would be quite ruined; but how does the matter now stand? Our whole export then was £93,000 per annum: it has since been as high as £865,000; and what is the most satisfactory of all is, that we export to France, the country that was to ruin us by the admission of her silks, double the amount of our whole exports in 1825. (Cheers.) We export now to France about £180,000 value per annum. So that every movement we make towards Free Trade not only benefits the merchant, the manufacturer, the artisan, but the landowner, and it enables us to provide for an increasing population, and makes it less necessary for them to emigrate. (Cheers.) In the China trade the same advantages arose from the reduction of the duty on tea. In 1746 the duty was reduced 2s. per lb., and the consumption was more than trebled. In 1784 Mr. Pitt passed his famous Commutation Act, reducing the duty from 119 per cent. to 12½. The consumption was then 4,900,000 lbs., and it rose by 1787 to 17,000,000 lbs., and continued gradually increasing until an advance of duty arrested its progress. Tea was then a luxury; now it is a necessary of life. Our population was then about 10,000,000; it is now nearly 30,000,000. Let us look at the cost of a pound of the lowest quality of tea in China, say 8d., the duty here 2s. 1d., making 2s. 9d. Now, if Government would remove half this duty, I think of that description of tea we would consume twice as much in England, or more. The consequence would be that China would require twice the amount of our industry to pay for it, not only with greater advantage to the Chinese, but to the consumers here. The country laying on the heaviest duties is the greatest sufferer. I saw a letter from a merchant, in the Times of the 19th of November, which states that our direct import of teas from China is £2,600,000 a year. The duty on the lowest quality of tea, selling in this country at from 9d. to 1s. 3d., is from 200 to 300 per cent.; on the better qualities under 100 per cent.; the lower qualities producing a revenue of £1,600,000; the higher something under a million per annum. It is most unjust, that those who are least able to buy are saddled with the highest duty. I cannot see any good reason why teas are not sold by auction in bond as they were by the East India Company. They are all bonded on arrival, and periodical sales by auction would be a convenience to the merchant. The London merchants, as I am informed, wished it at the time the specific duty was adopted, but were overruled. Now an ad valorem duty, as you will at once see, would be equitable to all parties. I hope the Manchester gentlemen will press this on the consideration of Government. Our consumption of teas appeared to be about 41,000,000 lbs. last year, or about 1½ lb. per head. In New South Wales, from the last colonial returns of the average of four years, it is 7½ lbs. per head. Nothing can evince more the wisdom of the treaty negotiated by Sir Henry Pottinger than his desire that all nations of the earth should have as free admission to China as British subjects; clearly seeing that every impediment to the export of Chinese teas must raise their price; and I will show its advantage by tracing one operation, thousands of which are taking place daily amongst the nations of the earth. You send a cargo of your manufactures to China; you cannot get profitable returns; but you find a Brazilian merchant there who wants to purchase a cargo of tea, which his own country cannot produce. He sells you his bills on London, which is to you a satisfactory payment for your goods. You quite understand that all commercial nations arrange credits in London, for the greater convenience of carrying on their trade. Well, the Brazilian merchant takes his cargo of tea home, disposes of it—but you refuse to take his sugar in payment; he, however, finds an American merchant there wanting to purchase a cargo of coffee, which his country does not produce; and, that the American may have funds to accomplish this, the Brazilian purchases with the proceeds of his tea the American merchant's bills, and remits them to London, to liquidate the bills he drew in China. The American takes his coffee home, turns it into cotton, and remits it to England to pay the bills which he drew in Brazil. Here is an operation, one of many similar ones, advantageous to all parties, but to none more than ourselves, for it increases the market for the sale of the products of industry. The protectionists speak of reciprocity; that should begin with us, for we saddled the imports from the United States with a duty of 330 per cent., if you leave out cotton; and if you leave out cotton and tobacco, on other articles, I think, about 280 per cent. There we have powerful competition to contend with. In 1827, the whole exports of consumption from the United States to China was 9000 dollars. It is now 1,375,000 dollars. The whole exports of all descriptions of goods to China by them are 4,200,000 dollars, and imports 5,700,000 dollars. The copper-masters in England were greatly alarmed some years ago at the admission of foreign ores, and Sir R. Vivian opposed in Parliament with all his might their admission. What do you think they are doing now? Getting up a memorial for their admission. It is estimated that at present, in consequence of the high duties on tobacco, brandy, Geneva, and some other articles, the revenue loses from £2,000,000 to £3,000,000 per annum. Mr. Poulett Thompson stated in the House of Commons that he had good reason to know that seventy vessels had loaded with tobacco in Ostend, Flushing, and the neighbourhood, and smuggled their cargoes into Ireland, between Dublin and the Giant's Causeway, in the previous twelve months. We are fast losing our trade with the United States. The average of our exports there for 1803, 6, and 7, before the war, was £8,000,000 per annum; since that period, for the last ten years, for which I have seen returns, it stands thus:—1833 to 1837, £8,400,000; 1838 to 1842, £8,400,000; the last year of the series 1842, £3,500,000. Now, these people are of Saxon origin—have the same habits and wants as we have; it is therefore lamentable to lose the trade of a people who, before this century is out, will, at their present rate of increase, number 100,000,000. The loss we are sustaining will be more clearly seen if we recollect that, before the war, their population was about 6,000,000, now nearly 20,000,000. The people of the United States are not disposed to let the nation suffer for the benefit of class interests, as their late decision shows, by their electing Mr. Polk, a Free-Trader, and rejecting Clay, the monopolist. I must trouble you with a few more figures to show you the difference between the comforts of a prosperous nation and one that has a short supply of food. In the United States they grow per annum 500,000,000 bushels of Indian corn, 145,000,000 of oats, 105,000,000 of wheat, 100,000,000 of potatoes; after deducting from this their imports, it leaves for consumption twenty-seven bushels of grain and five of potatoes for each individual. They have 4,000,000 horses. Now, all that is returned for duty, and not dutiable to the tax collectors for Great Britain, is under 900,000; but, allow as many more, or say 2,000,000 for mares and foals, not returnable, it is still not half of what they have in the United States. Their statistics show that each family of five persons have 1.6th horse, 4 cattle, 5½ sheep, and 7 pigs. If our Government would procure similar returns, they would show in a striking point of view how much our food and comforts are short of what I have stated, and settle that question with the protectionists. I hope our honourable friends who are here will move for such returns being taken. A little light has been let in upon us by the returns of the quantity of grain sold in these towns, that regulate the average for the last four months, as compared with the corresponding four months of the previous year, when our population was not so well employed as now. The returns are, 2,187,692 quarters, which is 217,707 quarters more than last year for the same period, which shows an increased consumption of about one-ninth. Now, this is general throughout the kingdom, and we have no reason to doubt it: it is clear what our population, for want of fair wages and cheap food, sometimes suffer. There is no class of people who suffer more than the coopers; many of them are men out of employment from the high duty on staves, being about 30 per cent. on those from the Baltic and 60 per cent. on those from the United States, and which, for certain descriptions of work, can hardly be done without. Indeed, the duty on timber, although now lower than it was, has seriously affected the interest of our shipowners, and also our cabinet-makers. We have lost much of our furniture export trade; the Americans and the Dutch are sending some of these articles, and vast quantities of clocks, into our market. This I do not object to, inasmuch as they furnish them cheaper than we can make them, and must take equivalents; but it is unwise in our Government not to let us have raw materials without duty, to enable us to sell cheaper in our own markets than others can supply us, and, before all, cheap corn. (Mr. Brown retired amidst great cheering.)

Mr. COBDEN then came forward, and was received with great cheering. He said it certainly seemed rather alarming in his ears when the Chairman told them they had now been seven years in the agitation of this question. Why, it was a long apprenticeship for them to serve, and to a very hard trade. (Cheers.) He feared some of them had grown older than they were when they had begun; and some he knew, that had begun with them in good hopes and prospects, they had lost altogether. (Others they had certainly gained by the way—and upon the whole he did not think there was any concern in this town that at the beginning of this new year could "take stock" with more hopeful prosperity than they could in the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Cheers.) The League had had opposition shops set up to them; they had had a good many such concerns, and they had all failed. There had been a concern for curing the distress of the country by transporting the people to other countries, but that broke down. (Hear.) And latterly we have had a scheme, amongst others, for giving people potato gardens instead of wages, and they were called "allotments;" and that we heard no more about. What would be the next opposition affair he did not know; but, whatever it might happen to be, ten to one but it would assume the cloak of humanity, in order to deceive honest and not very shrewd people. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) Now, we had been charged with intolerance because we had found fault with some projects that had been brought forward to remedy the distresses of the country. Why, if we had quarrelled with them at all, it was because there had been ostentatious projects brought forward to divert public attention, and not as they believed, with the real intention of serving the object professed by the propounders. Who could say that the League had ever found fault with private benevolence, or had ever stopped to quarrel with men going about to do good, and not seeking to proclaim, trumpet-tongued, their own good works? But it was when men who supported the Corn Laws were found ostentatiously propounding other schemes to meet a great political evil—it was then that they had a right to criticise and to question the intelligence, at least, of those parties, and to ask how they could profess to serve the people, when at the same time, by their votes, they were trying to impoverish and starve the people? (Cheers.) He must confess, that having been let a little behind the scenes in the conduct of these parties, he did suspect that a great number of those who had got a reputation for being benevolent-minded in public matters, were trying to start these false scents with the view of leading the people off from the question of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) Ordinary intelligence might teach them the utter fatality of trying to benefit people who, by their own Legislature, were kept short of the necessities of life. They told us that the people wanted water and wanted good houses. No doubt decent houses and a good supply of water were excellent adjuncts, and, indeed, absolute requisites, to a comfortable state of existence; but did they ever hear of people short of food keeping themselves clean or warm, or being comfortably housed? (Hear, hear.) What was the state of the people in the worst districts of Edinburgh? Were they inhabiting miserable hovels—were they wanting in well-built houses? No; the very worst population of all Edinburgh were inhabiting what were once the palaces of the nobility and Queen Regent of Scotland; and if they could put the whole population of London into Buckingham Palace or Windsor Castle, if they kept that population on a short allowance of the first necessaries of life, they would be as degraded and debased as they were now in St. Giles's. (Cheers.) Now, he would charge with inconsistency, and express his detestation of, the motives of those whom he saw prominent in advocating better houses and a better supply of water to the people, and who at the same time denied them employment and food; yet he hoped he should always be ready to discriminate and give the meed of praise to those men who, whilst they were aiding, or at least sanctioning, the remedying of the evils which they as Free-Traders attacked, were also prominent in advocating other ameliorations of the condition of the people. (Cheers.) He received a letter the other day from an old friend of his, and a fellow-labourer in those efforts they made six or seven years ago in the cause of education—he meant Mr. Jas. Simpson, of Edinburgh—in which he spoke in somewhat of a tone of complaint of the remarks which were made in Covent-garden Theatre upon the subject of public baths. Now he (Mr. Cobden) should be anxious to pay the tribute of his highest admiration to the conduct Mr. Simpson had pursued. He had not prominently advocated free trade in corn; he may have been a silent contributor of his pound or so to the League, and they knew that they had his good wishes. But if he or any one else thought they could promote the benefit of mankind by consistently advocating other questions, why, Godspeed to him, and he wished him well in his labours. (Applause.) He saw a great many working people present—indeed how could they assemble 5000 or 6000 people in that hall without having a great portion of those who worked with skilled hands and heads for their living? And he never liked to omit an opportunity of this kind without saying a word to them on the state of their question, though it was difficult to say anything that could savour of novelty. But they had heard what Mr. Brown had told them of the condition of the people in the United States. He told them that every person there had seven pigs, and five sheep, and that there were one horse and a quarter to every family. Did it ever strike a working man what is the reason that every family has more horses, and every man has more pigs, and sheep, and quarters of corn in that country? Why, it was simply for this reason, that there were more horses, and pigs, and sheep, and quarters of corn in that country, in proportion to the people, than there were in this country. (Hear, hear.) And was there any working man who had not carried his logic and argumentation a little farther, and said to himself, "If there is less for the whole of the people of this country than there is in America, it is impossible that each individual can have so much as each individual in America?" And when somebody must go short, depend upon it the short commons would fall upon the man who was the poorest in the land. (Hear, hear.) Now, this seemed to him to illustrate what Free-Traders meant by having corn and provisions cheap: they meant to have them plentiful. It was only a kind of conventional term for plenty, when they said cheap; it would be a better term to use "plenty" instead of "cheapness;" indeed, as the old compilers of our Prayer-book did, when they called it sometimes plenty, and sometimes cheapness. But if they had not pigs, corn, and sheep in the land, the people could not eat them; and the only way he was aware of was that of getting more into the land. True, some of the agriculturists told them (and his friend Mr. Phillips would bear out what he said) that if they would but wait they could produce as much as the people wanted to eat. Now, they had waited for thirty years, and they had not done it; and he thought they were playing the dog in the manger now, for they would neither do it themselves nor let other people do it. (Cheers.) Well, they had had another turn of the wheel; the wheel of fortune had gone round, and now they appeared to be on the upper spoke of the wheel, and the agriculturists were down in the mud. The agricultural class was now the class that was suffering more than any in the country for want of food. And there was not a more helpless class in the community than the agricultural labourers; they had not the means of combination; they never met to express their grievances; they lived a solitary life; and we heard nothing of their distresses except through those horrid demonstrations of incendiary fires. (Hear.) Well, if there was not another motive on earth to induce us to go on with this agitation, to get more food into the country, in order that the people might have more food than they had now got, the condition of the agricultural labourer ought to incite us to continue those exertions. (Cheers.) Let it be recollected that this great community around them was committed before the world to the carrying out of this cause. (Cheers.) This agitation had been cradled in Manchester, and monopoly must be confined in Manchester. (Loud cheering.) Every age, every generation, had some distinguishing struggle that marked its history. In one century we had the contest for religious freedom; another century marks the era of political freedom; another century comes, and the great battle of commercial freedom has to be fought. (Cheers.) And Manchester and those free cotton districts around it—he called it a free district because the cotton trade had never been dandled by protection, and never owed its devotion to monopoly—were pledged to take the lead in this great contest; a contest that had already become historical, for it was marked upon our parliamentary annals as one of the greatest of modern combinations. (Cheers.) They could not draw back from this contest without bringing not merely disgrace upon themselves, but disgrace upon the nation, and prove themselves recreant from the very race from which they sprung. (Loud cheers.) It was not a mere contest for a few more pigs, a few more sheep, or a little more corn. If the mere physical, the material, gain to which we were looking was all that we had to hope from the trial of our principles, it would be a sordid and mercenary conflict after all. No! the triumph of Free Trade was the advent of peace between all the nations of the earth. (Great cheering.) It was a blow, and a death-blow, to the old system of diplomatic wars and intrigues between the Governments of countries. (Cheers.) It was making them, and the industrious fabricators of this district, and their friend Mr. Brown and such as him, the negotiators and ambassadors between the people of this and other countries,—it was giving to them the title-deeds by which they would secure to themselves and all nations the blessings of peace for all times. (Cheers.) He saw in the distance—he might perhaps be dreaming—(No, no)—but he saw in the distance a world's revolution involved in the triumph of Free-Trade principles. (Cheers.) The very motives which had led governments and ambitious rulers to rear up great empires and to aggrandize the world's territory—those motives would be gone, and gone for ever, when they had taught people that they could better profit by the prosperity and freedom of other nations, through the peaceful paths of free commerce, than through the force of war or military conquest. (Cheers.) He might be dreaming, but he thought he saw in the distance that great empire; and vast and powerful military and naval establishments would be no longer necessary in the governments of the world when they had established Free Trade throughout it. (Cheers.) If what he said was founded in reason, and not the dream of the imagination, then, he said, this was a cause which was worth contending for—one that not merely the merchant and the manufacturer, but the philanthropist and the Christian might well lay hold of, and glory that he had lived in an age when he might take a share in the conquest over selfishness and monopoly. (Loud cheers.) Ah! that word monopoly; if they could only get people to understand what it meant! Why, the very name, if fixed on the back of a candidate, would be sufficient to secure his defeat at the poll. (Cheers and laughter.) It was an odious word. It was a curious fact, but it was a word not known to our forefathers, the ancient Britons. The League have a lecturer, a very intelligent gentleman, who lectures in Welsh. He (Mr. Cobden) met him the other day in London, and he was explaining to him the difficulty he had in lecturing in Welsh, "for (said he) we have no word in the Welsh language to express the word monopoly." (Great laughter.) And he told him that he had called in the aid of one of their most distinguished linguists to devise a means of translating this word "monopoly" into Welsh; and after a good deal of consideration and study they had turned it into a Welsh phrase, which he again converted back into English, and it was "a one-handed bargain." (Great laughter.) Now, let those manufacturers or working men who shout for monopolists in future always bear in mind that they were voting for "a one-handed bargain," and that hand is not theirs. (Cheers.) Manufacturers, and millowners, and operatives in this part of the country, had no share in this monopoly; and yet there were some of them still found who would run about shouting and hurraing for monopolists. (Applause.) Their friend Mr. Phillips had well said that it was impossible to find novelty in these discussions unless you seized upon the topics of the day; and, to do our adversaries the justice, they did occasionally find us topics with very great liberality. Now, there was a meeting the other day at Ashton-under-Lyne—a meeting of the Conservative Association; there were 400 of them—at which Mr. Entwistle, Mr. Tatton Egerton, and Mr. Cornwall Legh attended. There was a Mr. De Hollingsworth there; he had revived the old Norman prefix to his name; it was not plain "Mr. Hollingsworth" now, but he had added the "De" before it—De Hollingsworth. (Cheers and great laughter.) Well, he made a speech. Bear in mind, he was speaking at Ashton, a place that had grown into existence, it might be said, within the lifetime of the present generation; and it had grown by the industry of the manufacturers and merchants of Ashton. Now, bear what this Mr. De Hollingsworth had to say of one class of people by whom he was supposed to be surrounded. Speaking of a manufacturing politician, he said, "He is probably a man who has made his own fortune by one of those lucky chances in trade that have been of such frequent occurrence the last five and twenty years. He may be a good tradesman, may possess good, natural, sound sense, and by its exercise, by frugality and industry, have raised himself from sweeping a warehouse to become its master. But what then? What does he know beyond the walls of his own counting-house? Totally uneducated, or with such information only as may be gathered from a village schoolmaster, what value would be set on that statesman-like knowledge derived from experience and intercourse with the world? Would he not naturally affect to despise what he could not comprehend, and substitute a degraded cunning for that practical and almost prophetic wisdom, the fruit of the accumulated experience of ages, transmitted to us by the pages of history, the only real instructor of mankind? Is such a man fit to legislate for an empire? Is the calculator of pence to become the distributor of millions? Is such a man, presumptuous from ignorance, to direct our fleets and armies? Is such a man fit to advise the Crown in its most important appointments to the sacred and judicial benches? For what portion, then, of a senator's duty is such a man fit? Is it not rather his proper sphere to sweep the floor of the senate-house, as he has formerly done that of his own warehouse?" (Cheers and laughter.) There was a Persian phrase—a phrase used in the East, when a man submitted to a deep humiliation. They say, "that man eats dirt." Now, he saw the names of three or four manufacturers or millowners present at that meeting; the man who was in the chair, his father swept the floor of a mill. (Cheers.) Some people went to public banquets and ate turtle and venison; he thought those millowners went to eat dirt, and they had had their stomachs full. (Cheers and laughter.) If these gentlemen—the De Hollingsworths—were to come there, in the presence of Free-Traders—then, men of our order who had set up for themselves would not use such language as that; they never hear it. (Laughter.) They might not like us; they hated us, they feared us, but they did not despise us. (Cheers.) It was only the men who went to their Conservative dinners at Ashton-under-Lyne that ate such dirt as that. (Cheers and laughter.) But, suppose we carried the war into the camp of the squires. They had been told what sort of men the manufacturing politicians were; now, let them consider what sort of men did the counties send up to Parliament. There were 154 county members representing England and Wales in the House of Commons. Was there one of them, since Lord Stanley had left North Lancashire, of whom they could say "he is above mediocrity in talent?" (They're below it.) There were not ten of them who ever opened their mouths in Parliament with a chance of being listened to, unless to be laughed at. (Cheers and laughter.) They were presumed, by courtesy, to be all educated men; and he had a profound respect for those advantages which the highest education would give to men of natural talent. But what should they say of 154 men—the De Hollingsworths, the select eagles of their order, the picked men of their counties, so far as their education goes—what must be their natural attributes, when they mustered in the House of Commons and made such an exhibition of themselves as our county members did? Why, it was quite a common thing, if a county member got up and made a speech in which he did not murder the Queen's English, for a man to touch his neighbour in this way, and say "That's a pretty good speech for a county member!" (Cheers, and loud laughter.) Now, he observed that at the same dinner Mr. Entwistle, and Mr. Tatton Egerton, and Mr. Cornwall Legh severally spoke, and they seemed to him not to like the prospect of things in this part of the country. (Hear.) Mr. Entwistle complained that the people in South Lancashire insisted on fighting their battle on one question alone, and that question Free Trade. He would like to fight the old battle of Whig and Tory again. (Cheers.) Yes, yes; South Lancashire was safe with 2000 majority in 1841, when it was Tory against Whig; but Mr. Entwistle knew that now it was Free Trade against the "one-handed bargain men," the monopolists. (Cheers.) But the Free-Traders had got a thousand majority just now. (Loud cheers.) The monopolists talked of recovering their majority at the next revision; he (Mr. Cobden) said they would have a thousand more at the next revision! (Loud cheers.) They had heard the chairman say they must have a thousand new qualifications in the Manchester polling district alone, sufficient to overbear the monopolists' majority in Ormskirk, Wigan, and Newton, the only polling districts where they will have a majority. (Cheers.) Well (continued Mr. Cobden), I don't know whether I am letting the cat out of the bag or not, but I believe we have 600 or 700 already. (Cheers.) Now let it be said—it shall and must be said—that the Manchester polling district is able to beat them in all those districts where they have a majority; we'll insist upon fighting them ourselves, and leave Liverpool, Oldham, Ashton, and Rochdale, and all the other places, to look on. (Cheers and laughter.) But I want something to be done for North Cheshire too. I take a deep interest in that contest for North Cheshire. (Hear, hear.) Now, the Egertons of Tatton, father, son, and grandson, have been sitting for that county for about fifty years, with a very slight intermission. If you want to strike a blow that will tell at a distance, in London, just turn out a man whose family is supposed to have ruled the county for half a century. (Applause.) That's the bird you must try to bag (cheers and laughter); it's no use shooting mere sparrows, like our lately-elected member for South Lancashire. (Laughter.) They won't believe in London that you can turn out Lord Francis, until it is done; nobody believes it. When it is done, it will be felt; it will be a body blow that monopoly will stagger under. (Cheers.) The next best thing that you can after turning out Lord F. Egerton,—who as a man, as a county member, stands probably as high as any man representing a county, for intelligence and personal respectability, as well as for accomplishments,—if you want to strike the next heavy blow, turn out Mr. Egerton, of Tatton, for North Cheshire. (Applause.) I was in North Cheshire, at Macclesfield, on Monday evening; why, the monopolists had only a majority at the last contest of about 470 or 500; and I undertake to say that we have more people to qualify for Lancashire and Yorkshire, for North Cheshire, that there will be more new qualifications from those two counties, than the amount of the monopolists' majority last time. (Cheers.) Why, in this little village, as I may call it, of Hebdensbridge, in Yorkshire, there are forty Free-Traders marching down to a body to qualify for North Cheshire. (Cheers.) Well, with what Stockport and Macclesfield can do for themselves, and Hyde, which is a host, we'll have North Cheshire, and we'll have it booked as safely as any borough by the next revision. (Cheers.) I do not fancy it is imprudent, or incautious, or boastful to say so in this public way. I know there are persons here from all parts, not only of North Cheshire, but beyond North Cheshire; and I want them to take this not as a mere idle threat, but to go home to-morrow, and put their shoulders to the wheel, and lend a hand to fulfil my prediction. (Cheers.) Depend upon it, we shall win nothing by attempting to keep these things secret; you cannot put salt upon those birds' tails, they are too old for that. (Cheers.) My friend Mr. Bright and I have been passing into almost every manufacturing polling district in the West Riding of Yorkshire since we last had the pleasure of meeting you. Now, the West Riding of Yorkshire is infinitely the largest and most important constituency of the kingdom: it has from 30,000 to 31,000 registered electors. London has only 20,000, and Lancashire only 22,000 or 23,000; the West Riding of Yorkshire has 50 per cent. more of a constituency than any other in the kingdom. Well, we see the importance of winning the West Riding before any other constituency; and I have no doubt in the world that, before the 31st of January, as I have stated elsewhere, I repeat it—we shall be able to say that there are 2500 new qualifications more in the West Riding of Yorkshire. (Cheers.) They lost last time by about 800 or 1000. But we are not going to content ourselves with qualifying good men; they have got a lot of bad men on the register, and we'll have them struck off, we'll have no illegal votes there. (Cheers.) I speak with the greatest delight of the reception we met with in Yorkshire. They required no stimulus from us. The men of Yorkshire are prepared to do at the next election what they have done on former occasions. That is the constituency that has decided the fate of Government questions in this country. When they returned Henry Brougham—the Henry Brougham of that time (hear, hear)—they struck the last blow at the borough-slavery system; when they returned him as the champion of the freedom of the negro, they abolished slavery in our colonies. (Applause.) And when they return Free-Traders at the next election, depend upon it it will be the signal for the downfall of commercial monopolies. (Cheers.) Now, I shall have no opportunity of addressing gentlemen here again before the 31st of January; but there are three weeks yet, and the lawyers can do a great deal of business in three weeks. I think they are printing off their deeds by steam, or having them lithographed, they are getting on so fast with them. Now, let no young man belonging to our Athenæum and institutions here, who is living in lodgings—let no young man with a good coat on his back, that can afford to take up his freedom by making such an investment, hesitate to take a blow in favour of increased commerce, which will give him a better chance of prospering in the world. I cannot imagine anything more painful than the state of mind of those persons, when the next election comes, who have neglected the previous opportunity of qualifying themselves to take a part in that momentous struggle. In all probability the general election will take place in 1846—the next year; unless you purchase your qualification before the 31st of this month, you cannot be upon the register till 1847; and then the general election, in all human probability, will have passed. There is, to be sure, one way in which young men may qualify after the 31st. I see a good many ladies here, and we seem to be getting into a channel in which they cannot exactly co-operate with us, inasmuch as they are not allowed to have votes; I only say, I wish they were, because many of them would make a better use of them than their husbands do. (Cheers and laughter.) But, though they cannot vote, it is a very singular fact,—and it will be looked upon, at some future time perhaps, when the world has grown wiser and better, as an anomalous circumstance,—that, although ladies cannot vote, they may qualify as many blockheads and dunces to vote as they choose to confer freehold property upon. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) Now, if there be any kind, earnest friend to our cause,—any gentleman having sons or nephews, or even grandsons, if they should be rising twenty-one,—and if she have a little freehold property that she intends to divide amongst her sons, or nephews, or grandsons when she has gone,—why, then, recommend her to convey away to those young men a 40s. freehold each. Let her do it if they are but twenty years old; they will then have twelve months to consider how they will make the best use of their vote when they are twenty-one. Let such persons qualify as many as they can before they depart hence; and then they will have the satisfaction of seeing their young friends vote for Free-Traders during their lifetime. (Applause.) There may be such young ladies; and it is a curious thing, the law seems to have contemplated their case exactly. It is a curious fact that though you must buy a qualification before the 31st of January to be on the next year's register, yet, if you marry a qualification you may be put on the register though you only got possession of it by marriage up to July. (Cheers and laughter.) So, if a young man lets the 31st of January escape him, I know of no other way in which he can rescue himself from his dilemma but by marrying a freehold before July. (Applause and laughter.) But I recommend the young ladies not to take pity upon him: it is his duty to take up his freedom and qualify himself before he thinks of getting married. (Applause.) In some parts of Switzerland, there is a custom, that before a young man is eligible for matrimony he must possess a Bible and a couple of buckets. (Great laughter.) Now, I say a young man who would be eligible for marriage ought to possess a freehold of the county, and to be a voter. (Applause.) And I especially beg the young ladies, when they see a young fellow dressing rather smarter than his neighbours,—a bit of a dandy as you would call him,—with his hat put on one side, and showing himself off in St. Ann's-square,—I especially request the young ladies who are favourable to our good cause to toss up their heads at him as they pass, unless he can answer in the affirmative the interrogatory, "Are you a freeholder of the county of Lancaster?" (Great laughter.) Now, I know there is a large class of skilled operatives that visit our meetings, machine-makers, toolmakers, and men of that class, who get the highest wages. You are the aristocracy of your class; you are the men of intellect; you are the men of the largest incomes, of your order; now, every one of you ought, as a matter of pride and a matter of duty, to qualify for the county. It is a very expensive thing to get a borough vote: you must get a £10 house, must furnish it, keep it up, and pay taxes; but in the other case you may live where you will, in a garret if you like, or in lodgings, but if you purchase a 40s. freehold you have a vote for the county. I speak to that class of men, and I say it is your duty to qualify for the county, and to give the benefit of your vote to those poorer classes of your countrymen who cannot buy the qualification. A hard-working man, at Oldham, the other night, got up to speak in approbation of this movement; he said, "I have no means of qualifying, I cannot afford it; but I do hope all the working men as can will buy the qualification, and then, haply, they'll open the door for us as cannot buy our way in." (Cheers.) Now, I have no hesitation in saying it is my belief that in a few years' time the election for the county of Lancaster will be more in the hands of the operative classes than it is now in the hands of the squirearchy and the farmers. I believe, from what I hear is going on in all directions, that there will be such a vast number of skilled artisans and better paid operatives on the county register, that it will be impossible, in a few years' time, to return a man for South Lancashire unless he be acceptable in the main to that class of voters. (Cheers.) I have heard people say, "This is a very dangerous political game you are playing; you are going to democratize the constituencies of this country." Well, my answer is this: "If the constituencies have hitherto been an aristocracy, they have made very bad use of their power (applause); and if by a democracy you mean that class of people who can afford to pay £50 or £60 out of their earnings for an investment, I say they are a class of people whom I would much rather see in the possession of political power in this country, than the landed aristocracy who have so much abused their power." (Cheers.) I think, if any working man wanted to make up his purse before the 31st of January, and happened to have an employer of common sense—I don't mean one of those "one-handed bargain" men—(laughter)—his employer would be very much disposed to lend him £10 or £20 to make up his purchase-money, so as to get upon the register before next year. (A voice from the body of the room, "They're very scarce, Mr. Cobden.") No, they're not scarce; I know the thing is doing in all directions. (Cheers.) And if a worthy man has saved £20 or £30, and wants £10, or £15, or £20 more lent him, and that man gives him note of hand, promising to pay by so much a week or month, that is the very man that is entitled to the consideration of his employer; and if his employer is a good sound Leaguer, I'll engage for it he'll help the worthy man to get his qualification. (Cheers.) And my advice to the masters is this: Don't ask him how he is going to vote; if he has had shrewdness and self-denial enough to save £20 or £30 out of his earnings, he'll not be like those millowners that sit dirt at Ashton. (Cheers and laughter.) He'll be just the very man that won't be imposed upon by those monopolists. And then what an elevating and proud thing it is for a working man to buy his freehold and possess it! Why, it's a far more elevating possession than a deposit in the savings' bank; a man goes and leaves his money there, and sees no more of it, and knows nothing at all about who has the use of it. But if a man goes and buys a cottage, especially if it is a detached one, and the wind can blow round it, he puts his hands in his pockets on a morning, and walks round it, and says—"That's mine—(loud cheers)—that's mine—I bought it—I paid for it—I worked for it; and who has so good a title to it as I have?" Now, I want to see the little landowners beat the big landowners in the poll. (Cheers.) It may be done; recollect, these men of £30,000 a year can only each have one vote in their own persons; and the man in a fustian jacket that owns a cottage, walks up on the morning of the poll, and just registers as good a vote as a man of £30,000 a year; and I say, "Hurra for the little landowners; we'll beat the big landowners yet." Now, gentlemen, let this be our work continuously until the 31st of January; think of nothing else in the way of Free Trade; we can do all the rest afterwards. We can find out all those who are already qualified, and who are not on the register; all that work may be done afterwards; but think of nothing else up to the 31st of January but how you can induce your friends and neighbours to buy the qualification. Get the property conveyed to you if it be only by an agreement on a piece of paper the size of your hand; the parchments may be made all right afterwards, so long as the money is paid. Get possession of the property by the 31st of January, and then, when the next contest comes for South Lancashire, we'll have our friends, Mr. Villiers and Mr. Brown, in the situation of the present members for that division. (Loud applause, the whole of the company rising and cheering for some time.) And who shall dare to say to us that it is not the contest of principle then? We will choose the very first merchant in Liverpool, the largest merchant in Lancashire, on the one hand; we will choose our tried champion in the House of Commons on the other, the man who suffered obloquy and sneers in the cause of Free Trade, when the battle seemed a hopeless one, when men of self-seeking character shrunk away from it; we will bring forward our Parliamentary leader, Mr. Villiers, and our first merchant, Mr. Brown; and then who will dare to say that this contest is one of personal predilection or of party favour, or that we had any object but to fight our battle on the ground of principle? (Applause.) Then, when the day comes, Hurrah for Free Trade and victory! (Loud and prolonged cheering.)

Mr. Brooks rose, but there was loud cries for Mr. Bright, which continued for some time, and at length

Mr. Bright presented himself, and was received with much cheering. He said:—Even though I oppose the opinion of this vast meeting, I must protest against any interference with the order of proceedings decided on beforehand. The time at which we usually separate has arrived, and I am quite certain you have heard to-night quite as much as any moderate man can digest. You have had some rich materials, but I trust they will disagree with none of us. (Cheers.) I am here, and therefore will allude to one point which has not been touched upon to-night. You have heard that we have been in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and you have heard of the great number of meetings we have held in that district; but I believe you have no really correct knowledge of the state of activity in which our friends are there. We have had some such meetings there as were hardly ever equalled, certainly never surpassed, even in Manchester. (Cheers.) And after the meetings we have had returns of the results which have attended these operations for the extension of the register, such as to afford the strongest arguments in favour of the course we have taken. (Hear, hear.) But though we have been so successful, and have been engaged in favour of so important a movement, the metropolitan papers have said little about this part of our policy. The daily papers are, for the most part, the organs of political parties,—Whigs and Tories,—and it is not for them exactly a movement in the right direction. (Hear, hear.) There is an uncomfortable feeling comes over them when they think of what is going forward, and they wish to hide that which, when seen, must create astonishment and dismay. (Hear, hear.) The Whigs are not much more favourable to the movement than the Tories. It would suit them if it were believed that it would aid in turning the Tories out of office, and placing the Whigs in (hear, hear); but from the first this movement has not been one on behalf of Tory or Whig, but on behalf of the people, and the industry of the people. (Loud cheers.) Now, observe how it has operated. There are of the Whig party thousands and hundreds of thousands of honest men—men who are for popular measures and principles; but when you bring forward a question like this for unconditional Free Trade, it acts as a test which the Whigs, who are but sham Liberals, cannot stand (cheers); and thus you found in 1841 many of the large Whig landed proprietors went over to the Tories. In this county they have been weeded out entirely; so that we have none on the Liberal side that are not in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws, or at least that are not prepared to support a candidate in favour of the League principles. (Cheers.) Well, we have done something, if we have only established this test; and it is a great thing when the battle comes, to know that we have none on our side who will desert, but that all the defection may be expected on the side of our opponents. (Hear.) I can give my word, that whatever men can do for the polling district with which I am connected, and of which Rochdale is the centre, is now doing or about to be done. (Cheers.) We polled at the last election a majority of 149; I believe on the next register we shall have a majority of 350 in our favour; and if the election does not occur till after 1846, we shall have over 400. (Cheers.) We have fixed 540 as the point we aim at. (Cheers.) There is nothing like fixing your standard high enough (hear, hear), and then you will accomplish something respectable. We have a population in the valley between Rochdale and Leeds about the best in the country. (Hear, hear.) Throughout the whole of that valley we have passed, and there is a spirit there which no squirearchy can cast down (cheers); and which, when we have conquered there, will spread to other counties. The time is coming when the monopolists will recover from their slumber, and see how terrible is the power they have raised, and how great the influence which the working classes of this district exercise on the destinies of this country. (Great and prolonged cheering.) For myself I regard this question of the Corn Laws as the all-important question at this moment; but I look beyond it, and hope to see some of the fruits which we contemplate as the result of this agitation. We see, now we have a respite in some degree from suffering, how great the sacrifices which can be made in a time of prosperity to elevate the character of the people of this district. Were it possible that, instead of a period of three or five years, we had a period of prosperity extending over twenty years before we drop down again into the pit, I believe there is no man who could discover it to be the same place, so totally would it be changed. There would be the same geographical character to the country of hill and valley, but there would be a difference of moral character, such as the philanthropist and Christian might look upon with delight. (Great cheering.)

Mr. Alderman BUCKS moved a vote of thanks to the speakers, which was seconded by Mr. BROTHERTON, M.P., who produced a copy of resolutions passed on the Liverpool Exchange in 1792, recognising Free-Trade principles: the motion was carried by acclamation. The meeting then separated.

FREE-TRADE MEETING AT HOUNSLOW.

On Tuesday last a meeting was held in Hounslow, in the large room at the Nag's Head, for the purpose of hearing a lecture from Mr. A. L. Saul on the subject of the Corn Laws. The place of meeting, which is capable of holding between 500 and 600 people, was densely crowded; indeed, many persons were obliged to return, being unable to obtain admittance. Many respectable ladies were present on the platform.

Mr. PARNHAM was called to the chair, who, after some introductory observations, introduced

Mr. SAUL, who entered fully into the question of Free Trade. He proceeded to show that, when corn was cheap, the people being less drained for the first necessary of life, had more to expend in clothing and other comforts; and satisfactorily traced the present improved condition of the country to this cause. He asked, who benefited by monopoly? If the baker got a higher price for his loaf, he paid a higher price to the miller for his flour; the miller, if he received a high price for his flour, had to pay a high price for his wheat to the farmer; and the farmer, if he obtained a high price for his grain, had to grow it on high-rented land. (Cheers.) If monopoly was traced upwards, it was found that the advantage of the system was tracked to the landlord's door; but follow it downwards, and its burden was found to fall on the last link in the chain—the poor consumer—who had to pay down his hard-earned pittance across the counter. (Great cheering.) The speaker adverted to the improved state of the revenue, the current topics of the day, as they bore on the subject of the address; and, after an earnest appeal in support of the registration movement and the Bazaar, sat down amidst much applause.

On the motion of Mr. NEWCOMB, seconded by Mr. MANNING, it was resolved "That this meeting acknowledges its obligation to the Anti-Corn Law League for its energetic exertions to obtain a repeal of the Corn Laws, and pledges itself never to relax until these laws are repealed."

Thanks were voted to Mr. Saul and the Chairman; and, after three tremendous cheers for Free Trade, the meeting separated.

COUNTIES REGISTRATION MOVEMENT.

TEA-PARTY AND MEETING AT WARRINGTON.

On the evening of Friday the 4th instant, a Free-Trade tea-party and meeting were held in the Assembly-room adjoining the Lion Hotel. Nearly 400 sat down to tea at half-past six o'clock, and after the tables were cleared the numbers were increased, and the spacious and elegant room was filled. Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright were present, and on entering the room were loudly cheered. Mr. Nicholas Cooke was called upon to preside, and in a brief speech expressed his deep sympathy with the labours and object of the Anti-Corn Law League, and his pleasure that two of the most distinguished members of that association were present.

Mr. COBDEN rose, and was greeted with most enthusiastic applause. In the course of his speech the hon. gentleman entered at some length into the general question, explaining how natural and how beautiful are the principles of Free Trade, and how calculated to give prosperity to all classes of the community. He alluded to the system of import duties established by the Chinese as worthy of imitation in this country, and one which it was the object of the League to secure. He next passed to the great object of the meeting, the necessity of adding to the county constituencies. In the Warrington district, polling at Newton, the monopolists had a large majority, which the Warrington people might materially reduce; and he exhorted every man present to do his utmost to place himself and his friends on the register for the coming year. If an election should take place in 1846, which was more than probable, every man who now neglected to qualify would then bitterly regret that whilst the great and, it might be, the final struggle was going on, he was able to render no assistance. County votes were easily obtainable, and he implored them to make an effort by which the victory of Free Trade might be won.

Mr. M'NISH rose to move a resolution approving of the policy of the League, and declaring the intention of the meeting to support it to the utmost of their power, and, in doing so, entered into some very interesting statistics with respect to the condition of the borough constituency. From these statements it appeared that the Free-Trade party in Warrington had been gaining strength for some years past, and were now in a position most cheering to the friends of the cause they had so deeply at heart.

Mr. PETER RYLANDS seconded the resolution in a very effective speech, in which he commented with much ability and humour upon the mode in which landlords protect their tenantry, and upon the forces which are annually performed at agricultural meetings.

The resolution was carried unanimously, and with loud cheering.

Mr. BURTON next addressed the meeting. He said that, although the district which had nearly overwhelmed that district of the country was in some degree alleviated, they still relied on their struggle against the Corn Law. That trade was much revived was owing to the goodness of Providence, by whom comparative abundance had been given, in spite of the efforts of wicked legislation to perpetuate scarcity. The Corn Law could not fulfil its appointed purpose but by creating a state of things approximating to a state of famine; and such a law should be opposed by every just and Christian man. He explained how trade had created the middle and industrial classes of England, and had raised them from the condition of serfs, and urged upon those present the duty of defending trade and industry as the only sources of their individual well-being, and of the safety of the country. Whilst men were securing votes, their wives and sisters and daughters might be assisting by working for the Bazaar. All should do something, for the cause was not the cause of a party or a class, but one on which the prosperity of all depended.

Mr. EDWARD WEST moved a vote of thanks to the deputation, and expressed his earnest hope that his townsmen would exert themselves to carry out the objects which the meeting was intended to promote.

Mr. EDMUND ROBINSON seconded the motion, and, in an energetic speech, declared his determination to work more zealously in future on behalf of Free Trade.

The resolution passed with loud and unanimous expressions of applause.

Mr. COBDEN moved a vote of thanks to the Chairman, and stated how highly he had been gratified with the proceedings of the evening. From the activity of the young men he saw around him, from the ability they had shown in their speeches on that occasion, and from the earnestness with which they had devoted themselves to the cause of Free Trade, he augured the happiest results. "Young Warrington" would soon enable that town to give a voice in Parliament for justice to their country, and he was delighted to see among them so much of all the elements which in a good cause could not fail to secure success.

The CHAIRMAN returned thanks, and said he felt some alarm that he had not done all he might have done heretofore, but he pledged himself to work more perseveringly in future.

Three times three cheers were given for the ladies who were present, and who gave their countenance to the cause of Free Trade: the meeting then terminated.

We have rarely witnessed a more gratifying meeting than that of which we have given the above very slight sketch. It was the best Free-Trade meeting ever held in Warrington, and from its success we anticipate a considerable addition to the registers for South Lancashire and North Cheshire, and an impetus to the good cause among the constituency of the borough.

FREE-TRADE TEA-PARTY AND MEETING IN PRESTON.

On Thursday evening, the 2nd inst., the friends of Free Trade in Preston, to the number of about 500, assembled in the Corn Exchange-rooms, the use of which had been kindly granted by his Worshipful the Mayor. Tea was served up a little before seven o'clock, in the long room, and also in the centre room; and during the repast several volunteers were given on the splendid organ erected there. Messrs. Cobden and Bright, on entering the scene of festivity, were received with the most enthusiastic cheering. The animated appearance of the company, together with the decorations of the suite of rooms, was interesting in the extreme, and the order maintained throughout was admirable. After tea the company promenade for some time in the long room, and then the business of the meeting commenced.

Mr. M. SATTEWATER rose and moved that William Ainsworth, Esq., should be called to the chair. (Applause.)

Mr. R. ASKOV seconded the motion. The motion having been carried by applause, Mr. AINSWORTH took the chair.

Mr. COBDEN was received with loud and prolonged applause. He addressed the meeting for about an hour, and in the course of his speech alluded to the inconsistent conduct which had characterized some of the leading manufacturers of Preston during the last year. He recollected that about last Christmas there was a movement made in this town for the reduction of the duty upon tea. The petition was got up, and signed by monopolist millowners, and others. It was supported by all classes. Free-Traders supported it as well as others. It was no party measure at all; but when the Free-Traders brought forward their petition for a repeal of the bread tax (hear, hear)—when free trade in corn was wanted as well as free trade in tea (laughter)—then, "That is a party question," said they. ("Hear," and loud and continued laughter.) They could easily understand how free-trade in tea was a good thing. It was easy to ascertain how monopolist manufacturers understood this. He believed many of the manufacturers in this town were shippers of goods to China. (Hear.) There were some opulent men who owned those tall chimneys; and these generally sought the farthest market for their goods. It was left to the smaller capitalists to do business nearer home. Well, these rich manufacturers go to China with their goods, and the tax on tea an obstruction to their trade in that quarter, and accordingly they go to the Legislature and cry out against it; whereas the less affluent of the manufacturers, who want the removal of those impediments which obstruct their trade with the United States, and in a great measure shut them out of the Baltic, come forward to solicit the abrogation of the duties on the importation of foreign corn. (Applause.) They wish to have Free Trade made applicable to their case; but then these opulent manufacturers turn round upon them and say, "This is party work (laughter); we want free trade in tea, not in corn—tea is our article." (Great laughter.) Again, there is the article of cotton. It is astonishing to see what a unanimity exists about this article—about the repeal of the cotton tax. (Hear.) All the millowners come forward at once and sign a petition for the repeal of the cotton tax. In Preston he believed they had done so. (Hear.) This, then, is not a party question. (Laughter.) It is desirable to have plenty of cotton. (Hear.) But it is not desirable to have plenty of bread—it is a party thing altogether this repeal of the bread tax. (Loud laughter.) (After alluding to the demonstration which had been made in favour of Sir Henry Pottinger and referring to the fact that several of the Preston-Law millowners of Preston had subscribed for the service of plate which was to be presented to him, Mr. Cobden proceeded):—During the last session of Parliament, Mr. Villiers brought forward his motion for a repeal of the Corn Laws; and on that very night, just before he rose, Lord Stanley marched forward to the table of the House with a huge roll, quite an armful, and he said he had a petition to present from his constituents in North Lancashire, in favour of the Corn Laws. He then made this statement, to hear which he (Mr. Cobden) was perfectly astounded, that this petition was not only signed by a vast majority of the agriculturists and landowners in North Lancashire, but it contained the signatures of a majority of the millowners of Preston. Is that true, or is it not? This is the question he wanted to ask. In the House of Commons they could not believe it. When the petition was laid upon the table he was sitting by the side of Mr. Villiers and Mr. M. Gibson, and so completely were they taken aback by the announcement, they determined to judge for themselves; and accordingly walking across the floor, they brought the petition, unrolled it, and examined the signatures. They did observe the name of one or two of the millowners of Preston in it. He could mention their names, if he chose. He supposed if their names were made public they would be proud of it—(laughter)—they would glory in it. He would not, however, mention them, and not for their sakes, but for the sake of their children he would not name them (hear, hear, hear), because, by-and-by, and at a distant period, when the Corn Law became numbers with all those other bad laws which are mere matters of history,—such as the law which made a person subject to be hanged for stealing five shillings ("hear, hear," and laughter), or which applied the rack to punish conscientious opinions, or which tied old women down to the stake for witchcraft,—when this law, as bad as any ("hear, hear, hear," and cheers) became a mere matter of history, the sons of those persons in Preston who signed that petition would blush to know that their forefathers should have been identified with it. (Hear, hear, hear.) And he would tell the meeting that in Preston they stood alone, in allowing it to be said that a majority of the manufacturers are in favour of the Corn Law. (Hear.) Poor Preston! (Hear, hear, hear.) And these are the men who petition for the abrogation of the tax on cotton (laughter), and pray for the reduction of the duty on tea (loud laughter), and subscribe for a piece of silver plate to Sir Henry Pottinger for establishing Free Trade with China! (Continued laughter.) These are the very men who favour the Corn Law! (Hear, hear.) If nothing else will deprive these men of their influence it will be their inconsistency; and that inconsistency justified him in asking what is their motive? What is their motive? What is it? (Hear.) He would tell them the motive. They are led by the nose by the neighbouring squires (hear) into whose pockets the bread goes. (Cheers.) When they petitioned for a reduction of duty on tea, it merely concerned the Queen's revenue; the landlords gained nothing by that. It merely involved a change in taxation. They said, in fact, take your money out of our tea-caddies, and dip them a little deeper into the people's pockets with the income-tax. (Hear, hear.) But if they had asked for the repeal of the landlord's tax, the Corn Law, they would have offended the squires, under whose mahogany they sometimes were allowed to place their knees (laughter); the titheowner would have looked coldly upon them (hear); and the vicar's lay might not have made her curtsy to their wives as before. (Laughter.) Mr. Cobden next proceeded to develop the League plan for increasing the county constituency, and concluded by paying the following just tribute to the merits of Mr. LIVESAY, of the Preston Guardian.—He expected great things from Preston; and, although they had some disadvantages, yet they had some advantages to counterbalance them. It is said that nature never gives a boon without supplying an antidote; and in Preston they had an antidote in his friend, Mr. Livesay, to whom the Council of the League, and those with whom he acted in London and elsewhere, who see his humble publication and his newspaper, owed a debt of gratitude. He had no hesitation in saying that Mr. Livesay's publication, the Struggle, was viewed by those whom he referred to as one of the most powerful and successful engines for disseminating sound information on the subject. A prophet is not without honours save in his own country, and he expected his worthy friend and his gifted family were more respected and admired at a distance than at home. (Hear, hear.) He was happy at the same time in tendering his individual gratitude to his friend for the success which had been consequent upon his exertions in this cause.

Mr. BURTON was received with prolonged applause. He said he was glad to have the opportunity of addressing the inhabitants of this important town on this most important question. He called Preston an important town (hear) because it had a very numerous population—a population exceeding that of any other town in the division of the county, and also for the most part employed in a more extended trade in manufactures. It appeared to him, however, that, although the town had been called Proud Preston, it had not hitherto taken so very deep and prominent a position with respect to this great question in which all its inhabitants are so very deeply interested. And when he observed the activity which was apparent in this town in the carrying on of its trade and commerce, and the energy which had been displayed with regard to navigating the river, and on other questions of much local importance, he could only believe that it was from the want of a greater knowledge with respect to the principles of Free Trade that this position was not sustained; that it resulted from the circumstances that they had not sufficiently considered the subject, had not examined it in such a manner as to be thoroughly acquainted with its practical bearings on their best interests. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Bright then considered the question in various important aspects, and concluded an eloquent speech by urging on the Free-Traders of Preston to be active in promoting the registration of voters.

Mr. LIVESAY, in a short address, moved the thanks of the meeting to Messrs. Cobden and Bright for their speeches and attendance.

The motion was seconded by Mr. M'GURROU, and passed by the meeting amid loud cheers.

The usual vote of thanks to the Chairman, and the cheers for the ladies, and for Messrs. Cobden and Bright, were then given, and warmly responded to, after which the meeting separated.

SOUTH LEICESTERSHIRE.

A meeting to promote the registration of voters in South Leicestershire was held the week before last in Leicester.

JOSEPH WHETSTONE, Esq., was called to the chair, and having opened the meeting, which he said was not for speech-making but for business, observed, that some might think it impertinent to attempt to carry the Southern Division, and he had thought so once, but his opinions were changed. (Hear, hear.) Previously to the last contest, little attention had been paid to the registration; and it was a remarkable fact that in the town of Leicester the Liberal majority was but 20. He believed there was a possibility of increasing that majority to 500; and he thought those present, when they came to look into the matter, would also be satisfied that this was practicable. (Hear.) When they saw what the Anti-Corn-Law League had done in South Lancashire, where a minority of 500 had in one year been turned into a majority of 1700, why should they despair in South Leicestershire? (Hear, hear.) Hundreds of their friends in Leicester, who were able to qualify, had not done so; while in the villages, their opponents (who had attended to the register, while they had neglected it) had put on hundreds who had no right to be on. At present, their two Free-Trade members for the borough were outvoted by four Anti-Free-Traders for the county. He was so convinced that the success of the Free-Trade agitation was indispensable to the prosperity of the country, that no time, or effort, or money should be wanting on his part to aid its progress. (Cheers.)

WILLIAM BIGGS, Esq., said, that the committee for attending to the registry of the Southern Division had been formed only about a fortnight, and they now appealed to the friends of Free Trade for their co-operation. The work they had before them would not be accomplished in one, perhaps not in two, or even three, years. The business of registration was dry and uninteresting; but it was in that way that the battle was to be fought. After urging the supreme importance of Corn-Law repeal, and observing that the purchase of a freehold did not necessarily entail loss, but would usually secure a fair return, with undeniable security, Mr. Biggs stated that there were on the register for the Southern Division the names of from 200 to 300 persons which had no right to be there. The committee, however, were determined to proceed, and had taken a house where an agent would attend daily, to give all necessary information. One hundred of their friends in the town could claim without any new investment; while from 400 to 500 more were able to purchase freeholds if they were so disposed. Two hundred more, on applying at the office, might receive such instructions as would enable them to qualify. It was the bounden duty of every Free-Trade supporter to acquire the franchise, to do so; for, let them recollect, that no exertion, before or after, would supply a deficiency in that respect. (Hear, hear.)

Some conversation took place, during which it was stated that full information on all parts of the subject would be given at the office.

Printed forms, stating the willingness of the persons signing them to become freeholders, were distributed through the meeting; and a large number were returned with signatures.

The Rev. J. BLOODWORTH made some brief and appropriate remarks upon the alarming increase of pauperism.

The CHAIRMAN noticed the importance of gaining the victory, if possible, within the town, since parties could poll without trouble or expense, which was not the case in the out districts. He also denied that the object of the Free-Traders was to reduce wages, or that Corn-Law repeal would have that tendency.

Mr. FILLINGHAM said that confidence would be placed in the committee, when he informed them that Mr. Tertius Paget had consented to act as treasurer, and Messrs. How and Gittins as secretaries.

Thanks having been voted to the chairman, the meeting broke up.—Leicester Chronicle.

MEETING AT CHORLEY.

On Monday evening last a large meeting of the Free-Traders of Chorley was held in the old Wesleyan Chapel, Chapel-street. The building was crowded in every part. Among those present we observed Thomas Watts, Esq., Richard Smethurst, Esq., Mr. John Hodgkinson, Mr. T. Hyland, Mr. Thomas Coupe, Mr. John Houghton, Mr. William Lawrence, &c. &c.

Mr. JAMES WALNOK was called upon to preside, and expressed his gratification that the meeting was attended by a deputation from the Council of the League, consisting of Mr. Bright and Mr. Prentice. He would not occupy the meeting with observations of his own, but would introduce Mr. Prentice to the meeting.

Mr. PRENTICE came forward and was received with cheers. In the course of his speech he traced the progress of the agitation against the Corn Law. For several years the process had been one of instruction—first, among the inhabitants of the manufacturing districts, and then extending itself into the more distant towns and cities of the kingdom. The League had been called a manufacturers' agitation, and the rural districts were supposed to be altogether hostile to the object it was seeking. To refute this, deputations from the Council had visited nearly every county in England and Scotland, holding public open-air meetings in strictly agricultural districts; and there, as in the manufacturing towns, Free Trade had been promulgated, and, wherever taught, had found multitudes of ardent friends. Now the labours of the League were advancing a degree further. Progress marked all its career. Teaching had done wonders—now action was the policy. Mr. Prentice concluded by calling upon every Free-Trade supporter in Chorley to provide himself with a qualification for North Lancashire, to be ready for use when another election should take place.

Mr. BRIGHT followed and spoke at great length on the general question. He asserted that the League, in the agitation it was carrying on, was but the organ and the mouth-piece of the industrious classes of England. The Corn Law was a sign of the subjugation of the trading and commercial classes to the landlord class, and the penalty paid by the nation for intrusting its legislation into hands so incapable as those of the owners of the soil. The protection said to be afforded by the Corn Law was but a cloak for a grievous wrong upon all who lived by the employment of capital and labour. It was a protection given to land, to raise the value of the produce of land, to raise the rent paid to the proprietors of land. It was not afforded to manufacturers, or to the working men in any of the trades by which working men live, and being given only to one class, that of landlords, was clearly and grossly unjust. It was to overthrow this mischievous system that the League had been organized. Mr. Bright then explained how the county constituencies might be enlarged so as to overcome the power of the great landed proprietors;—the middle and working classes of the manufacturing counties might secure the representation of those counties for Free Trade. Many men having 250 to invest might buy a freehold qualification, and then he would be provided with a weapon of defence by which he might secure his property and his rights from the incursions of those who have so long sacrificed the well-being of their fellow-men and the true interests of the country to the sordid love of rent unjustly raised, and the thirst for political power secured by the serfdom of their tenantry.

Mr. JOHN HOUGHTON moved, and Mr. HODGKINSON seconded, a vote of thanks to the deputation, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. PRENTICE moved a vote of thanks to the Chairman, and after three hearty cheers for the League the meeting separated.

From 400 to 500 persons were present, a large proportion of whom were of the working class; and the facts and arguments brought forward seemed to make a deep impression upon all present.

We learn from our correspondent that in many cases qualifications have been already obtained, and that further efforts will be made. The ladies also are making arrangements to assist in providing materials for the great Bazaar to be held in Covent-garden Theatre in May next.

MEETING AT OLDHAM.

On Saturday evening last, a large public meeting of the inhabitants of Oldham, consisting chiefly of the principal manufacturers and of operatives, was held in the large room of the Town-hall, for the purpose of taking into consideration the best means of extending the number of Free-Trade electors, and thus promoting the repeal of the Corn Laws and the destruction of monopolies.

Present we observed—Jonathan Mellor, Esq., county magistrate; Horatio Nelson, Esq., Peter Seville, Esq., William Knott, Esq.; William Bridgson, Esq., constable; Scholes Brierley, Esq.; Edwin Travis, Esq., John Travis, Esq., Lusley Brook; Thomas Robinson, Esq., Wood Brook, Saddleworth; James Wrigley, Esq.; John Booth, Esq., Lees; Samuel Radcliffe, Esq., Lower House; Henry Radcliffe, Esq., solicitor; Samuel Dronsfield, Werneth Mills; Josiah Radcliffe, Esq., Lower House; John Ascroft, Esq.; John Bentley, Esq., churchwarden; John Mills, Esq., Waterhead Mill; Joseph Seville, Esq., Royton; John Holden, Esq., High Lands; John Chadwick, Esq., Rhodes; Mr. Alexander Taylor, Mr. James Mills, Mr. John Dronsfield; James Bredbury, Esq., New York, and his lady; Mr. Edward Mellor, Mr. W. H. Mellor, James Platt, Esq., &c. &c.

JONATHAN MELLOR, jun., Esq., one of the head constables, having been called to the chair, said he had consented to preside on the urgent solicitation of many of his friends. As in South Lancashire a great number of the electors had proved themselves the mere creatures of the aristocratical landowners, it was deemed necessary by the supporters of Free-Trade principles to increase the constituency in the right direction. (Hear, hear.) He was glad that they had not only Mr. Cobden, but also Mr. Brooks, present: the former was the great champion of the Free-Trade question, and the latter was a most worthy and estimable friend of the working classes. (Cheers.)

Mr. COBDEN, M.P., on rising to speak, was greeted with several rounds of applause. He need scarcely tell them, he said, that they were met for the very proper purpose of strengthening the cause of Free Trade on the electoral lists. As he understood there were a number of persons present who did not exactly agree in the opinions of himself and those with whom he usually acted, he would shortly explain what those opinions were. Mr. Cobden then gave a clear and concise exposition of the principles of Free Trade; after which he explained the plan of the League for increasing the number of Free-Trade voters: and concluded by urging the friends of Free Trade to the most prompt and effective measures for securing the election of Free-Traders in the West Riding of Yorkshire, particularly mentioning Saddleworth as a district where freehold properties might be easily acquired on favourable terms.

Mr. JOHN BROOKS delivered a brief but humorous speech, recommending the working-out of the plan explained by Mr. Cobden. He had already qualified his sons in North and South Lancashire and North Cheshire, and he would qualify them very soon for the West Riding of Yorkshire. Mr. Brooks concluded with some observations on the evils of the Corn Laws, and the pernicious effects of the duties on tea, sugar, &c.

The meeting was also addressed by Mr. William Knott, hat-manufacturer, of Oldham; Mr. Edward Watkin, of Manchester; the Rev. Mr. Shepherd, Wesleyan Association minister, of Oldham; and by Mr. Dronsfield, of Waterhead-mill, who moved that a committee should be appointed for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the meeting. Mr. James Mills, of Oldham, seconded the motion.

JOSEPH SHAW, a working man, in the body of the meeting, said:—Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I rise for the purpose of making a few remarks on the subject of the Corn Laws. I have but once before spoken before a member of Parliament, viz., Mr. Hindley, at a public meeting at Lees. I have spoken once at Ashton and Saddleworth, but never before in Oldham. I have thought on the subject of the Corn Laws for the last twenty years and more, and I have ever seen great reason to condemn them. As there is no probability that I shall ever see Sir Robert Peel, as he never comes down into this neighbourhood, and I being not able to bear the expense of going to London, I wish you (addressing Mr. Cobden) to be so kind as to tell him what you have heard a working man say on the subject of the Corn Laws in a large and respectable public meeting in the town of Oldham. I am now and have been long of opinion that the Corn Laws are very injurious to the working classes, and I will tell you how I prove it. I have been in the habit of observing that, when the prices of food have been high, wages have been low, which sufficiently accounts for the dreadful state of Stockport and the other manufacturing towns and districts two or three years since. At that time, when wheat was up to about 70s. a quarter, the working man would have 2s. per quarter to pay for it more than now when it is down to 45s., and consequently would have 25s. less to lay out for clothing and other necessities for his comfort during the time he was consuming a quarter of wheat. I have further to state that, since the prices of eatables have come down, I have seen a deal more new fustian jackets in our village of Lees than I have seen for four or five years during the time of high prices; and I will also tell you how I account for that. When provisions are high, the people have so much to pay for them that they have little or nothing left to buy clothes with; and when they have little to buy clothes with, there are few clothes sold; and when there are few clothes sold, there are too many to sell; and when there are too many to sell, they are very cheap; and when they are very cheap, there cannot be much paid for making them: and that, consequently, the manufacturing working man's wages are reduced; the mills are shut up, business is ruined, and general distress is spread through the country. But when, as now, the working man has the said 25s. left in his pocket, he buys more clothing with it (ay, and other articles of comfort too), and that increases the demand for them, and the greater the demand, you know, makes them rise in price, and the rising in price enables the working man to get higher wages and the masters better profits. This, therefore, is the way I prove that high provisions make lower wages, and cheap provisions make higher wages. (At the close of the speech the speaker was greeted with great applause.)

Mr. RICHARD HASLAM made some observations on the importance of securing the operative electors from all undue influence, by means of the ballot or some other protection.

The CHAIRMAN, as well as Mr. COBDEN and Mr. BROOKS, expressed their approval of Mr. Haslam's views, and of the great necessity of protecting all electors from improper influences.

Mr. HORATIO NELSON, hat-manufacturer, of Oldham, moved a vote of thanks to Messrs. Cobden and Brooks for their visit to Oldham.

Mr. SCHOLES BRIERLEY, hat-manufacturer, of Oldham, seconded the resolution, which, with the other resolution, was unanimously passed.

Several rounds of applause were then given for Messrs. Cobden and Brooks, and the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN returned thanks in a brief but appropriate speech.

NORTH CHESHIRE REGISTRATION.

MEETING IN MACCLESFIELD.

A meeting of the borough electors and others friendly to the repeal of the Corn Laws, was held in Lord-street School on Monday evening last, when the large apartment was crowded, there being at least 1000 persons present. Mr. Cobden attended for the purpose of explaining the plan which has been adopted by the League, and pursued with so much success elsewhere, of extending the county constituencies; and to urge upon the friends of the cause in this locality the necessity for exertion in order to rescue North Cheshire from the dominion of the monopolists. We observed upon and around the platform the following, among other gentlemen:—Samuel Greg, Esq., of Bollington; Mr. Brough, silk-manufacturer, of Leek; John Johnson, Esq., silk-manufacturer, of Congleton, accompanied by Alderman Warrington, Messrs. Chapman, Charles Johnson, and other gentlemen from Congleton; John Smith, Esq., silk-printer, of Langley; William Potts, Esq.; Messrs. Jeremiah Shatwell, Samuel Barton, Thomas Heapy, Ferdinand Jackson, Joseph Barclay, Alexander Carruthers, George Oldham, Thomas Potts, Isaac Moss, William Iyle, John Shatwell, silk-manufacturers; Messrs. Samuel Jesper, James Rathbone, Richard Wilson, Peter Bullock, the Rev. Samuel Bowen, Thomas Airey, Richard Sadler, John Wood Lane, Richard Marsden; Richard Wormald, Esq.; William Sayner, John Hilbel, John Dean, John Bullock, Joseph Sanders; Rev. Mr. Roberts, of Park-gate; James Downing, Joseph Howe, Thos. Jackson, Joseph Anton, &c. &c.

We regret our inability, owing to the length of our report of the Manchester meeting and the late hour at which we received the slips, to do more than state that the meeting was ably addressed by Mr. Hine; Mr. Cobden, who fully developed the League's plan of operation for extending the suffrage in counties; and by Mr. Falvey, whose eloquent speech was enthusiastically received by his fellow-townsmen. The meeting was, upon the whole, one of the most respectably attended, and at the same time one of the most enthusiastic, that has ever taken place in Macclesfield. A committee has since been formed to carry out the object of the meeting.

GLASGOW ANTI-CORN-LAW ASSOCIATION. THE LEAGUE BAZAAR.

The subjoined report—abridged from a much more ample one, which occupies several columns in the Glasgow Argus and Morning Chronicle—is a spirited manifestation of the zeal with which the Free-Traders of Glasgow are preparing to make an effective show at the forthcoming League Bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre. We trust this example will be followed in all the towns of "bonnie Scotland." The few months that intervene before the opening of the Bazaar in May, should every where be devoted to one grand effort to make this Free Trade exhibition one of the most successful and brilliant of the kind ever yet witnessed in this country.

On Saturday evening, a meeting of the members of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association was held in the Trades' Hall, for the purpose of taking into consideration the proposal of the National Anti-Corn-Law League to hold a Bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre, London, in the month of May next, on behalf of the League Fund of £100,000, and the propriety of appointing a local committee for Glasgow to aid that important object, by procuring contributions of manufactured articles from this city for the projected Bazaar.

The chair having been taken by Walter Buchanan, Esq., president of the association, Mr. D. Murray, the secretary, read a circular received from the Council of the League, setting forth the intention of that body to exhibit the Bazaar (which was originally projected by, and is to be under the management of, the ladies), and requesting the co-operation of Glasgow in the measure, it being contemplated that there should be in the Bazaar a stall for every large town in the empire. The circular suggested the formation of a ladies' local committee in every town, and also a gentlemen's committee, to canvass for the contribution of articles, and otherwise assist in promoting the object.

The CHAIRMAN said, the meeting would perceive from the circular read by Mr. Murray, that the Anti-Corn-Law League was still earnestly engaged in carrying out the great objects for which the association was formed.

There was no one characteristic of that body more remarkable than the indefatigable spirit by which it was governed. So far from flagging under continued exertion, or becoming wearied of the agitation, they were still pressing forward with as much zeal and determination as ever. (Cheering.) The National Anti-Corn-Law League is neither dead nor asleep, as its enemies have represented. On the contrary, never has that great and powerful association exhibited more activity and determination, more boldness in its plans, or more confidence in being able to accomplish them, more, in short, of vital and healthful action, than at this moment of its alleged decease. (Hear, hear.) It would, indeed, have been extraordinary if the great leaders who had advocated the principles of Free Trade, and the countless thousands who had enthusiastically adopted their opinions, should at once have forgotten and abandoned the cause, and, on the first flush of prosperous trade, returned contented to their own pursuits. The Chairman then went on to instance, by many striking facts, the zeal and tact displayed by the League, and the verification of their principles by the course of events during the past year; and concluded by a warm appeal in favour of Free Trade.

ALEX. GRAHAM, Esq., after explaining that he had been called on without the slightest preparation to address the meeting, proposed the first resolution:—

"1st. That this meeting declares its entire and unabated confidence in the National Anti-Corn-Law League, and at the same time would express its grateful sense of the many important services rendered to the great cause of Free Trade by that body; and as the League have determined upon holding a Bazaar in the Theatre Royal, Covent-garden, in the month of May next, for the promotion of its objects, this meeting is heartily desirous to co-operate therein, and herein pledges itself to use its best exertions to aid and assist in the same."

Mr. Graham warmly eulogised the League, and pointed out the various signs it exhibited of undiminished vitality. He then made some remarks in reference to the proposed Bazaar. Though not sufficiently informed as to the details, he, nevertheless, had so much confidence in the League, after the sagacity they had shown on all former occasions, that he was sure it would not have been planned nor supported by such men as Cobden and Bright, if it was not likely to exert a salutary influence on their cause, and calculated to add materially to their funds. They had not this year been called upon for subscriptions to the League fund; but this was a cause towards which every man should be prepared to give his annual contribution, in the same way as he would contribute towards other legitimate schemes of benevolence and patriotism; and the fact that no subscriptions had been this year called for furnished a strong reason why they should enter cordially and zealously into the scheme of the Bazaar. Mr. Graham concluded by moving the resolution.

JOHN PATTON, Esq., seconded the resolution. After the very able speech which they had just heard, it would be absurd in him to take up their time by any observations. He must say that before this night he had ever been averse to the support of Bazaars. He never liked them; but, seeing this proposal brought forward by men who hitherto had never gone wrong in the management of the League, he would consider himself very impertinent if he brought forward his ideas on the subject. He seconded the motion with great pleasure.

W. P. PATON, Esq., moved the next resolution:—

"That the following gentlemen be appointed a committee, with power to add to their number, for the purpose of carrying out the foregoing resolutions:—viz., Walter Buchanan, President of the Association; John Tennant and Alexander Graham, Vice-Presidents; Alexander Couper, Treasurer; the Hon. the Lord Provost; James Anderson, John Whitehead, David McKim, William Brodie, John Wilson, Bailies; William Bunker, Provost of Galton; Robert Dunlop, Richard Cunliffe, Bailies of Glasgow; George Stirling, Alexander Dennistoun, John Pattison, W. P. Paton, Alexander Hestie, Samuel Haggitham, Thomas Davidson, Andrew Galbraith, John Hamilton, George Brown, Duncan McPhail, George Anderson, Alexander McEwan, Robert Wylie, William Blackwood, Robert Wilson, Robert McKay, J. S. Blyth, G. C. Dick, James Paterson, S. R. Brown, James Drummond, Thos. Richard, James Dunlop, James J. Robertson, Robert Stewart, James Scott, William Gray, George Lancaster, David Chapman, Donald Bannatyne, Robert Bartholomew, Thomas Boyd, James McClelland, Alexander Tennant, Charles Gray, Andrew Paton, James Turner, Andrew Orr, John Finlay." He agreed with Mr. Patton that they ought to have full confidence in their great leaders in England, who had recommended the plan of a Bazaar. They should recollect that this proposal of a Bazaar was not an untimely one. They had already held a Bazaar in Manchester, by which they collected about £10,000, and it was, besides, the means of diffusing a knowledge of the principles of the League, which could not have been better promoted by other schemes. (Hear.) The League had wisely resolved to carry out the object in London, and, if supported by the various towns throughout the kingdom, there could be no doubt that the exhibition would be of the most distinguished character. He hoped, for the honour of Glasgow, that a great number of manufactured articles of beauty and value would be furnished by our manufacturers; and he might state that it was intended, before sending the collection to London, to exhibit them to the public here, so that the citizens of Glasgow, generally, might have an opportunity of witnessing those beautiful productions of our manufactures, which, he had no doubt, would prove an honour to the city. He would take that opportunity of expressing his admiration of those men who were leading this great movement in England, and particularly of Mr. Cobden. He looked upon Mr. Cobden as no common man (hear); as a man raised up by Providence to do a great and mighty work; and he believed he would be successful in the movement, which he led with such distinguished ability and perseverance, not only in promoting the prosperity of our commerce, and the physical and moral welfare of the people, but also in advancing the peaceful relations of all the nations of the earth. (Cheers.)

Councillor A. Orr seconded the resolution, which, like the preceding, was unanimously carried.

The Lord Provost, who was received with cheering, said he was not aware that he would be expected to say anything that night; but his anxiety for the success of the measure now launched before the public was so great that he could not refrain from attending amongst them, though labouring under indisposition. (Cheers.) The observations the Chairman had made in reference to the present prosperous state of our trade ought to make a permanent impression on all their minds; for though, under Providence, we had been favoured with abundant harvests, and a consequent renovation of our trade and commerce, yet, without the intervention of such measures as he had advocated, and by means of which a uniform supply of cheap food would be ensured to the country, they could not but look forward with fear to the recurrence of those calamitous results which they had in times past experienced. (Hear.) They could not but rejoice at the amount of comfort and prosperity under which the new year had been ushered in, and it was gratifying in the highest degree to witness the prosperity of the working classes and their families; but still it was their duty to look to the future—to secure, if possible, the permanent continuance of that prosperity—and, therefore, all should be ready to lend their assistance—every man ought to put his hand to the oar, and labour to prevent their country being overtaken with former calamities. (Cheers.) He trusted this prosperity would continue; but, if they wished it to be permanent, they would all unite heart and hand in support of the principles and movements of the League. (Cheers.) In reference to the Bazaar, he hoped that the artisans and ingenious mechanics of the city would come promptly forward with elegant and valuable articles of manufacture, and he had no doubt such a collection would be brought together as would do honour to Glasgow. It would be truly gratifying if they could send something worthy of the attention of the League; and, though not immediately on the scene of action themselves, to show that they were not unmindful of the exhortations put forth by those great men who headed the movement, and who so perseveringly followed out the great object they had in view. (Cheers.)

The Chairman stated that some gentlemen had agreed to give subscriptions in order to enable the Committee to buy such articles as they might wish to have exhibited at the Bazaar, and certainly this was a way in which much might be done. The Committee, he might further observe, would take means of making the wishes of the League known to the ladies with a view to the formation of a Ladies' Committee, and he had no doubt that they would have some beautiful specimens of their skill and taste to exhibit.

On the motion of the Lord Provost, a vote of thanks was given to the Chairman for his conduct in the chair, and the meeting separated.—Abridged from the Glasgow Argus.

FREE-TRADE VOTERS.—The Wakefield Free-Trade Committee are proceeding with silent activity in the cause of enfranchisement, and many properties have already been purchased in the town and neighbourhood for conferring qualifications. The amount of property on offer is very large, and plenty of choice is therefore to be had by those wishing to purchase.—Leeds Mercury.

POLITICAL PARTIES.—Party spirit is a bad name, often given to public spirit. Great parties are not necessarily factions. The breaking up of worn-out, dishonoured, ill-principled parties is a good thing; but it is a bad sign, and a great evil, when better combinations do not spring up in their place. At the present moment the only rising and compact party is that of the League, which has justly been styled "the phenomenon of the age," and which, after another election, will be seen controlling, if not directing, the Government.—Patriot.

FREE-TRADERS OF HULL.—WEST RIDING REGISTRATION.—We have seen a letter from Doncaster this week, in which it is suggested that the Free-Traders of Hull might render good service to the cause of cheap bread by securing qualifications in the West Riding. This is a matter which should also be taken up with spirit. If only 1500 registered Free-Traders be obtained in the West Riding, that influential constituency is won from the monopolists. The time between this and the 31st of this month is very short, but by persons sufficiently zealous much may be done. Where difficulty is experienced in obtaining a qualification by persons in a condition to make the necessary outlay, we recommend a direct appeal to the League. The Council of that energetic body are prepared to render every assistance to applicants desirous of obtaining the franchise.—Hull Advertiser.

ENGLISH AND CHINESE LABOURERS.—It is curious to consider the effect of the high duty on tea, as between the producer of calico in Lancashire and the labourer growing tea in China. A pound of good bohea tea, delivered at the shipping port in China, would be about the same as a yard of printed cotton, delivered in the shipping port of England. Say the price of each is sixpence. The yard of print is subject to a duty on reaching China of about 7½ per cent.; and, supposing even that profits and duty reach 50 per cent., the Chinese consumer receives the English print at 9d. per yard; while, on the other hand, the pound of tea, which came from the hands of the Chinese producer at the same price, is increased by duties and necessary profits to at least 3s. 9d. per lb., or just five times the price of the cotton print, so that, as a simple question between the two labourers, the producer of prints in England gives five hours' labour in England in exchange for one in China.—Economist.

STOCKPORT.—TREAT GIVEN BY MR. HOLLINS TO HIS WORKPEOPLE.—On Saturday evening last the workpeople in the employ of Mr. Alderman Hollins were provided, by their benevolent master, with a splendid new year's treat. At six o'clock, from 600 to 700 persons of both sexes, and all ages above thirteen years, sat down to a substantial and even elegant supper, in one of the large rooms of his manufactory. After supper several loyal and other suitable toasts were given and responded to in appropriate speeches, the intervals being enlivened by glees. At nine the dancing commenced, and was kept up with great spirit until near twelve o'clock. To the delights of the evening a very efficient band much contributed. The room was tastefully fitted up for the occasion, and several respectable parties, friends of Mr. Hollins, shared in the pleasures of the evening, all of whom appeared highly gratified to see the harmony existing between this gentleman and his hands, and how highly they valued this substantial mark of their employer's consideration for their happiness. In this manufactory last year, about £50 were raised for the League Fund. At the present time, about 20 of the principal hands are qualifying for North Cheshire as freeholders; and a bank is being instituted in the concern, to be managed by the workmen themselves, to encourage savings, with the view both to promote domestic happiness and political enfranchisement.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE £100,000 FUND.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XV.

TO SIR R. H. INGLIS, BART., M.P.

SIR,—You are the pattern of pious baronets, and a friend and father of the poor, though you neither play cricket nor ninepins. The Church took you for its champion when Peel apostatized; so that you gained Oxford while he retained office. Your orthodoxy is unquestionable, and your charity is conspicuous. You are a supporter of the Standard, and a hero in the Herald. You sympathize in relief societies, and in schools that teach no unsanctified science. You are alive to the dangers of knowledge, and your antipathy is ardent towards "the cold-hearted, muddle-headed school of political economists," who would make the industrious poor independent of the donations of their betters, and prefer legislative honesty to personal almsgiving.

In one of the journals above referred to, I forget whether "Goose" or "Shadow," I read the denunciation just quoted. It does justice to the warmth of your own heart and the clearness of your own head. It was civil, moreover, towards the right reverend chairman of the meeting at which it was uttered, the Bishop of London; one of whose Janus faces looks towards political economy, while the other smiles on soap-and-blanket societies. You know how to back your friends.

True, you had the Bishop on the hip; for the society was a marvellous one for even a mongrel economist to patronize, much more a projector of the New Poor Law. This Metropolitan Relief Association aims at being a provision for perpetual almsgiving. It obtained £20,000 during the pressure of distress last winter; and it has only expended £9000, "the balance being vested in the public securities." It delights in doling out dribbles, and making a little bounty go a long way. There shall be the maximum of the art of giving, with the minimum of the amount given. Its stock in the Three per Cents. is the treasure-chest for an army of almoners. It will be charitable by compound interest. The character of the society so embarrassed the Bishop that he uttered a great truth, though rather inopportune. "More liberality in almsgiving," said he, "unaccompanied by an endeavour to remove the causes of destitution which called it forth, would not answer the requirements of Christian charity." The inference is obvious. You and he would have been better employed in promoting the repeal of the Corn Laws. "Remove the causes," Sir Robert; to do that, is worth more than all the warm hearts that were ever made so by being buttoned under broad cloth.

Your dealing with the poor is double, Sir Robert Inglis. You vote for the laws which pauperize their circumstances, and then patronize the societies which pauperize their minds. Thus your charity completes the work commenced by your legislation. Listen to the Morning Herald. It is the organ of your section of the Conservatives; and it speaks like an oracle. The improvement of the revenue has proved inspiration to its columns, and not Balaam's ass brayed sounder sense than its leader of Wednesday last:—

"The pressing duty of providing for the comforts of the poor is felt by the Christian, because it is a part of his religion; and by the mere politician, because its proper execution lessens the danger of disorder.

This duty, however, is often as well performed by indirect as by direct means. Who will assert that the prosperity of the working classes, created by the spread of commerce, and by every other effect of the people's confidence in their rulers, is to be degraded for a moment into comparison with the comfort of the same classes produced by almsgiving? It is for these reasons that we see that which the grumblers must also see in the prosperous state of the public finances—viz., that an improvement has set in, which promises to reach every order of the population, by giving a fair prospect of rewards for industry. By such rewards it is that the comfort of the labouring class is to be placed on a footing far more secure and infinitely more conducive to manly feeling, than by encouraging any system like that which existed previous to the Reformation, and which when that great event took place had the effect of covering the face of the nation with numberless idle poor."

"Read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest." These are the views for which the leaders of the League have been denounced. This is the crime for which you crucify the economists as "cold-hearted and muddle-headed." Can you understand it? Saul among the prophets, and the Herald at Covent-garden!

The "spread of commerce" creates "the prosperity of the working classes." That is the general principle which the Herald supports you in violating by upholding the Corn Laws, which restrict commerce. They restrict it; but thanks to Providence, and the indomitable energy it has fostered in our Saxon race, they have not annihilated it. They restrict commerce; but the restriction is less in cheap years than in dear years. And last year was a cheap year. That is the fact, which the writer should have combined with the principle in order to state the case fully and fairly. Cheap years, cheap as to the cost of food, are always times of manufacturing and commercial prosperity. The writer might have learned this long ago from Mr. Cobden; and from Mr. Cobden's masters in the science which you despise, but for which they are venerated by the world's intelligence. However, better learn it from the revenue returns than not at all.

The lesson has other bearings in which the Herald is still uninstructed. It only sees one-third as far as the "muddle-headed economists." In describing the prosperity of cheap years, Mr. Cobden has always characterized it as partial, under the present monopolist system. The farmers and their labourers are quite ready to confirm Mr. Cobden's theory. Hereupon our Grandmother is sorely puzzled. She insinuates that her friends are not quite truthful in this matter. They are not suffering, she suspects, "so severely as they assert." Agriculture needs more moral culture. Only see how she flounders:—

"As to the ultra-protectionists, we would ask them—can the agriculturists of England be suffering so severely as they assert, with the home and foreign markets manifestly so prosperous? If such be the case, then we and they have been heretofore altogether wrong in asserting the home market to be supported by the agriculturists, and the agriculturists to be the foundation of national strength and wealth: but we have not been in the wrong; the agriculturists have had the price of nearly all the food consumed in the country—they have carried that price in turn to the home market, and this it is which has given its amazing spring to commercial enterprise, domestic and foreign."—(Jan. 6.)

A good specimen, this, of the game of blind-man's buff; with an insurmountable difficulty of ascertaining whether the right corner has been caught by the handaged inquirer. It is tolerably plain that, if the gross amount of money received by the agriculturists be the measure of commercial prosperity, then the dear years should be the thriving years of the manufacturing districts;—wheat at 70s. the quarter, and not at 45s., should give the "amazing spring" to commercial enterprise, domestic and foreign. Political economy is very "cold-hearted," to make the manufacturers prosperous in proportion as they have less, instead of more, to pay for food. But that is the way of her school. There is no wriggling out of the facts.

This shifting the burden from class to class, and letting the one down as the other rises, is not, however, an ordination of political economy, or of Nature. It is simply the result of the artificial situation in which the farmer is placed by the Corn Laws. His condition is a legal fiction, in the sale of his produce; only the rent is a reality. He has taken a fallacy as the basis of his bargain for the land. At best he only buys a lottery ticket, where blanks and prizes come up alternately; his payment being proportioned to the prize. How, then, is he to share in the prosperity which the Herald prophesies? There is no other way but the abandonment of the artificial element that perplexes and often pauperizes him. Put him on the wholesome and steady footing of Free Trade. Let him have the means of calculating his receipts as well as his outlay. He may then thrive with his neighbours.

It cannot be assumed, until the disturbing influence of the Corn Laws be removed, that "an improvement has set in, which promises to reach every order of the population, by giving a fair prospect of rewards for industry." Cheapness promises little to the farmer, until his rent is adjusted thereto. And the dearness that might enable him to meet his landlord's demands would swamp the present improvement in manufactures and commerce. If the Corn Laws continue, and there be no speedy re-action, he must be left to you, Sir Robert, and your "visiting and relief society." But do not expend on him all your funded alms. The vibrations of the system are incessant. Manchester must soon take a turn at your treasure; the artisans will then need your alms, and draw largely upon your Consols and consolations.

Whatever be the purity and the piety of your motives, Sir Robert,—and assuredly I call them not in question,—the brand you strive to affix on others must rest on the heart or the head of whoever device justice to the poor while he prospers alms. The combination only makes your inconsistency the more conspicuous. The industrious will have little need of alms, when no longer refused their rights.

Cease to degrade and demoralize mankind, with the Gospel on your lips. Let the bounties of Providence flow in freely upon the land, according to the will of Him who giveth liberally to all; then Industry will never lack its fair reward; and you may bottle up your little bank of charity to all eternity.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

STATISTICS AND SCENES FROM DORSETSHIRE.

PART I.

Geographical and Descriptive.

Two years ago one of the members for Dorset said the county was becoming a byword, and would soon be in everybody's mouth. Less than a month ago another of the members for Dorset said that the county had become a byword, and was in everybody's mouth.

It occurs to me that, such being the case, "everybody" would like to know something more particular than the mere blit-and-scraper rumours of what Dorset really is. I doubt not the correspondents from the "South West" will forgive me if I suggest the propriety of giving some of the brighter scenes of Dorset life as well as the darker. Human misery may run deep there; or it may not run at all. It may accumulate and be stagnant. Yet there are clear streams of pleasure in Dorset; and spirits both light and happy to keep them running.

Business has led me several times into that county—into it, out of, and beyond it; and I carry with me a lively recollection of scenes of gaiety which are not unfrequent there, poor though the general population be. Preliminary to these, however, a general view of this famous shire may be desirable.

Dorset contains about 775,000 acres of land. It is said to be 160 miles in circumference. Its longest side is to the sea, from Hampshire in the east to Devon in the west. Its shore is singularly irregular. Now it stands out high, hard, and bold, with its rocky headlands, as if it waded into the deep sea to meet the waves and hurl them back, saying, "Not an inch of English soil, proud waves from France—back with you from whence you came!" Again its shores retreat, crouching low, and timid, and retreating to hide themselves in marshy grass and tules of mud; where, if you go to look for them, your best fortune will be in losing them not to lose yourself.

In one part you will find the sea coming up in a quiet business-like way, tide after tide, with its boats and its fish, and now and then a ship. And in other parts it idles with the dry land, and toys with it, and runs after it round behind the hills, and catches it and gives it a ducking, and then spreads it out bare to dry. And then they both fall asleep, water and land, and lie basking in the sun; and the rocky hills which stand between them and the open sea look down on them and frown, and say, "Why don't you make yourselves useful? What be the use of us standing here to keep off the wind and storms, and you turn it to no account? Why don't you make docks and have ships, and do some good, and give work and wealth to your poor people? Bestir yourselves, and don't lie idling there." And these inland waters do bestir themselves at times, but only like sluggards disturbed. All they do is to shift the pillows of mud on which they slept.

Leaving the English Channel near Lyme Regis, Dorset joins Devon, and both proceed on a journey of a dozen miles as if going to Chard, passing near Axminster. Poor as Dorset is, Devon seems to have picked its pocket hereabout. The latter runs away and carries off a part of the former, and Dorset makes a pursuit, but in vain. In the meantime Somerset has taken the advantage of the moment, and has penetrated into it.

Dorset now turns its back on Devon, and, in company with Somerset, comes eastward, bearing a few points to the north; they cut a rambling figure of about fifty miles, and then Dorset meeting Wiltshire, leaves Somerset, and walks along the high chalky downs which are a continuation of Salisbury Plain. This companionship lasts five-and-twenty miles, and then Dorset meets Hampshire at the verge of the New Forest, and completes its circuit by a journey of fifteen miles to the sea.

The principal rivers in Dorset are the Stour and the Frome; but there are a number of smaller streams, all of which in its valley, with a wide margin of rich meadow. There is every variety of soil. In whatever period of time it was that the chalky downs lay at the bottom of some vast ocean, and the clayey levels and ridges of sand were the beds and shores of some mighty river, all are changed now, and remain as memorials of some stupendous and mysterious revolution.

There are lengthened ranges of downs bare to the eye, without hedges or trees, but covered with a short herbage, the velvet of the vegetable world. Sheep thrive on this herbage most surprisingly. Where there is good winter keep for them the numbers can be increased greatly, and a good profit made. It is said there are above 800,000 sheep in the county.

As a contrast to the bare ranges of down land there is a rich grassy country called the Vale of Blackmoor; and also other districts enclosed and grazed by cows for dairy purposes.

To the east and south there are heaths of ten and twenty miles, intersected only by narrow meadows, which are refreshed and kept green by the streams which they conduct through the dreary wastes. The heath land is in some parts planted with fir-trees. Commonly these are planted on each side of some long, straight road; giving to the road a painful uniformity and dullness.

South from the broad heath land, stretching into the sea, is the Isle of Purbeck, which is, however, no isle: it is a promontory. Here, as in some other parts of the county, the soil is a thin layer upon sandstone rock, exceedingly fertile and easily worked. Westward, between the Vale of Blackmoor and Sherborne, the soil is of a similar quality, formed by the decomposition of the sandstone rock; and, being easily worked and fertile, three-fourths of it are under the plough.

In the vale itself, containing 170,000 acres of land, the soil approaches to clay. Here there is an eighth or tenth part only of the land under the plough. Dairy cows for Dorset butter and cheese, and cattle for Salisbury market,—the best of which find their way at last to Smithfield, where they are reckoned the best of English heaves,—are the chief produce of the vale.

The horses of Dorset, in plough and waggon, would cut a much worse figure in Smithfield than do the horned cattle. The horses are low, shaggy, and slow of pace; but they are highly spoken of as strong, willing, and patient. All of which qualities may be true; but, so far as I have had any of them, are of an ordinary kind on the road: the most prominent quality was a very remarkable unwillingness.

In the chalky districts the roads are hard, save when a frost breaks up. They are mended with flints and last well; but in the interior districts, where the soil is rich and clayey, there is a stone used worthless for roads; and there the roads require more of strength, willingness, and patience than even the Dorset horses are said to possess. No pains are taken to drain the roadway. Narrow, wet, dirty, up hill and down hill, on hill top and level valley, they are same.

Still the roads serve the purpose of draining off the agricultural produce of the county. That may be seen going off every day on all sides, but chiefly on the side towards London.

I shall now say something of the inhabitants.

PART II.

Persons and Professions.

There is a total of 175,043 persons in Dorset. Of these 15,712 are set down as labourers in agriculture: of whom 2050 are males below twenty years of age; 12,892 are males above twenty years of age; 178 are females below twenty years of age; and 592 are females above that age.

There are 2975 other labourers. And it is probable that of more than 2000 domestic male servants, one-half should be set down as labourers in agriculture. And of the female domestic servants, amounting to over 7000, a considerable number of them are doubtless dairy women.

At the same time, though the very rich landed gentry be but few, there are a goodly number of middle-class gentry in the several little towns, which are called water-log-places. And in these towns domestic servants are numerous.

Including labourers, farmers, and domestic servants, there are 3400 different professions or designations in the county. Those returned as of independent means are 5349. The farmers, graziers, and yeomen are 2857; attorneys, 104; bakers, 488—an attorney to each four bakers and a half; blacksmiths, 846; boot and shoe makers, 2261; butchers, 431; carpenters and joiners, 1827; clergymen, 163; clerks, 265; ministers, 63; coopers, 193; dressmakers, 983; gardeners, 444; masons and stonecutters, 1150; milk-sellers and cowkeepers, 519; painters, plumbers, and glaziers, 318; printers, 64; quarriers, 430; ropespinners, 212; saddlers, 144; sawyers, 279; schoolmasters, mistresses, &c., 523, of whom 358 are females; seamen, 653; pilots, 20; tailors, 572; beer and spirit sellers, 528; butchers, 280. The total number of persons whose professions are returned is 55,265; of persons employed in trade whose branch is not specified, the number is 583.

Estimating all who are in any respect workers in agriculture, whether as masters or servants, the number will be about 25,000. This leaves about 30,000 engaged in various kinds of trade. There is a gross "residue" of 111,182.

The manufactures of the county are of small amount in any single branch; they stand thus: the hemp, flax, thread, rope and twine, sack and bag, sail-cloth, canvas, and linen, employ 837 persons, of whom 194 are twenty years of age.

The woollen employs 319 persons, of whom 76 are under twenty years of age.

The glove employs 232, of whom 93 are under twenty years of age.

The button employs 205 persons, of whom 54 are under twenty years of age.

The silk employs 159 persons, of whom 77 are under twenty years of age.

In addition to these, 298 persons are returned as weavers, and 298 as spinners; of whom 46 and 72 respectively are under twenty years of age; but the manufacture in which they are engaged is not specified.

Button-making used to be an extensive domestic employment. The wives and children of labourers in most parts of the county, in the east and northern parts especially, up to a recent period, used to make buttons. These were for shirts and such-like light articles. They were of wire covered. The first operation was to cast, or cover, the wire, which was done by children of six and eight years of age. Afterwards the buttons were filled by older hands. The work may still be seen in a few of the cottages; but the general use of bone buttons has superseded the covered wires.

Next to farm produce the stone quarries of Purbeck and Portland are the most productive of wealth. There is also the exportation of potter's clay from the vicinity of Purbeck.

What is called the Isle of Portland is a kind of peninsula, four miles and a half in length, and two in breadth. It is one continued bed of freestone, and has long been famous. It is said to have been first brought into use and reputation in the construction of the Banqueting-house, at Whitehall, London, in the reign of James I. After the fire of London, Sir Christopher Wren used it in the construction of different public buildings.

The blocks of stone are conveyed from the quarries to the seashore on low cars, with solid wheels, drawn by horses. A car will sometimes carry six tons. Going down the hill, the manner of dragging to stay their velocity is, to have a sledge with a heavy stone on it behind the car. Some of the Portland blocks weigh four and five tons each; but the general weight of them is said to be eight tons to one hundred stones. The quarries belong to many proprietors. From 30,000 to 40,000 tons are annually shipped from the island.

The stone of Purbeck turns out suitable for pavement, and large quantities of it are shipped for London. There are also many curious stones and petrified shells on Purbeck. A kind of marble formed of petrified shells is sawn into slabs, and take a polish fine as alabaster.

The stone-merchants keep provision-stores, and serve their workmen with provisions by truck. Of this the men complain with much bitterness; for if they find any fault with the provisions they are in danger of losing their work. If they leave their work they can get no provisions. They have no money, and such shopkeepers as there are will not give them credit, when out of work, because they do not deal at a shop when they have work. Much vexatious and petty tyranny is suffered by the men, so they say, that they would not submit to but for the truck system, which exists here in its worst form. The quarrying is all piecework.

Digging the potters' clay is done by the day, owing to the great care required to get it pure. It is found in the heath-covered districts below beds of sand. It is conveyed in waggons on a tramway to Wareham harbour; is taken across the sheet of water five or six miles called Poole harbour in small vessels; and is at Poole shipped to Liverpool, from whence it is conveyed inland to Staffordshire to the potteries. As many as twenty thousand tons weight of this finest clay are sent annually to the Mersey. And there is a coarser kind sent to Bristol and to London, used for making brown jars and suchlike common ware.

It is said the clay could not be manufactured in Dorset owing to the absence of another description of clay which is found in Staffordshire, and must be mixed with it.

The fisheries of Dorset are hardly worth speaking of in a commercial point of view. There are, however, 391 persons returned as fishermen and fisherwomen. The rivers are well stocked, but the fishing there is mostly pleasure-fishing.

The seaports of Dorset are Poole, containing 6093 inhabitants; Weymouth, with Melcombe Regis, containing 10,377; Bridport, 4787; Swanage, 1990; and Lyme Regis 2756 inhabitants.

The extent of their shipping trade I have no means of knowing, further than that it is very small, save in the exportation of clay and stone. At Poole there used to be a considerable trade done in Newfoundland fish; but it has fallen to decay.

Dorset returns fourteen members to Parliament; three—The county, 3; Dorchester, 2; Poole, 2; Lyme, 1; Weymouth, 2; Bridport, 2; Shaftesbury, 1; and Wareham, 1. Its market-towns are twenty-four, some of them mere villages; and its parishes are two hundred and forty-eight.

The great tithes are nearly all in the hands of lay proprietors; and the greater part of the county is in a few hands. There seem to have always been a few persons about this county ready in any time of trouble or revolution to do the state some service, by turning their informers against some who had property to lose. Hence the passage of the tithes into lay hands as Government rewards. Hence also the many small estates into a few large ones.

As the trade of Dorset, such as it was, has rather decayed than otherwise; as the demand for corn and cattle in the metropolis has so rapidly increased, with other places, drawing the produce of the farms away from Dorset; as the landowners are few and most of them spending their money out of the county which they own as rent in the county; as much of the land lies in grass and employs little labour; as the land which does employ labour is nearly all held by tenants at-will, who cannot do to the land what should be done; as the family and political advantages to be gained from having the representation of the county in their own hands will not admit of the landlords making their tenants independent; and as even the best agriculture which the independence of the tenantry would bring into practice would hardly keep pace with the increasing population,—there need be no surprise at an increasing poverty.

In 1801 the population was 119,160. In 1811 it was 124,000. In 1821 it was 144,490. In 1831 it was 154,252. In 1841 it was, as we have already seen, 175,043.

The farms are generally large: five hundred acres are common; but so also are one thousand and two thousand acres. The process of enlarging the farms has thrown many more persons into the villages as labourers to compete, and compete in vain, for work; thus reducing wages, and burdening the poor-rates at the same time.

Two years ago one-seventh of the population was officially declared to be paupers, receiving at some time of the year parish relief. The number has not decreased.

REVIEW.

Journal of a Residence among the Negroes in the West Indies. By the late M. G. Lewis, Esq., M.P. (Murray's Foreign and Colonial Library, No. XVI.) London, Murray.

It is but justice to the publisher of the "Foreign and Colonial Library," to say that the series of works he has produced has never been surpassed in goodness and in cheapness. Mrs. Meredith's "New South Wales" is a lively and faithful delineation of the natural aspect and social condition of the Australian colonies. "Father Ripa's Residence at the Court of Peking" contains much curious and striking information respecting the social capabilities of the Chinese Empire; and the very entertaining volume now before us gives us the best existing view of the state of the West Indies previous to the abolition of slavery. M. G. Lewis, commonly called Monk Lewis, from an extravagant work of fiction with which he astonished many and disgusted most, was a man of more imagination than taste, and of more talent than judgment. His "Tales of Wonder," and other similar monstrosities in which the mythologies of all ages and nations were worked into fantastic tales, exposed him to the merited lash of Lord Byron's satire:—

"Even Satan's self with thee might dread to dwell,
And in thy skull discern a deeper hell."

The wild superstitious of the negroes had strong attractions for such a mind; and when he visited his estates in the West Indies he examined the character of the negro mind with more psychological interest than could have been exhibited by one less trained to the love of gloomy superstitions. It is but justice to add that Lewis had a higher and nobler object: he was a proprietor of slaves, and he felt it to be a sacred duty to ameliorate the condition of those whose fate had been placed in his hands by circumstances over which he had no control. He was an honest but mistaken slaveholder; he thought that the system of slavery should be maintained for the "protection" of the negroes, just as some misguided squires support the Corn Laws for the pretended protection of the agricultural labourers; and it is amusing to find that he employs the very same arguments against negro emancipation which are now urged against Free Trade. His journals are more creditable to the honesty of his intentions than to the strength of his understanding; and in turning over their desultory pages we are led to form more affection for the man than respect for the controversialist. He is always amusing, and sometimes instructive; in description he is one of the most picturesque of writers, and what his pictures want in depth is very generally concealed by the vivid colouring of his foreground. The following tale of the sharks is humorously told:—

"While lying in Black River Harbour, Jamaica, two sharks were frequently seen playing about the ship; at length the female was killed, and the desolation of the male was excessive:—

"Che faro senz' Eurydice?"

What he did without her remains a secret, but what he did with her was clear enough; for scarce was the breath out of his Eurydice's body, when he stuck his teeth in her, and began to eat her up with all possible expedition. Even the sailors felt their sensibility excited by so peculiar a mark of posthumous attachment; and, to enable him to perform this melancholy duty the more easily, they offered to be his carvers, lowered their boat, and proceeded to chop his better half in pieces with their hatchets; while the widower opened his jaws as wide as possible, and gulped down pounds upon pounds of the dear departed as fast as they were thrown to him, with the greatest delight and all the avidity imaginable. I make no doubt that all the while he was eating he was thoroughly persuaded that every morsel which went into his stomach would make its way to his heart directly! 'She was perfectly content,' he said to himself; 'she was excellent through life, and really she's extremely good now she's dead!' I doubt whether the annals of Hymen can produce a similar instance of post-obitum affection. Certainly Calderon's 'Amor despues de la Muerte' has nothing that is worthy to be compared to it; nor do I recollect in history any fact at all resembling it, except perhaps a circumstance which is recorded respecting Cambyses, King of Lydia, a monarch equally remarkable for his voracity and uxoriousness, and who, being one night completely overpowered by sleep, and at the same time violently tormented by hunger, eat up his queen without being conscious of it, and was mightily astonished the next morning to wake with her head in his mouth, the only bit that was left of her. But then 'Cambyses was quite unconscious of what he was doing, whereas the shark's mark of attachment was evidently intentional.'

Lewis's first reception on his estates was well calculated to produce very favourable impressions of the negro character.

"As soon as the carriage entered my gates, the uproar and confusion which ensued sets all description at defiance."

ance. The works were instantly all abandoned; everything that had life came flocking to the house from all quarters; and not only the men, and the women, and the children, but, 'by a bland assimilation,' the hogs, and the dogs, and the geese, and the fowls, and the turkeys, all came hurrying along by instinct to see what could possibly be the matter, and seemed to be afraid of arriving too late. Whether the pleasure of the negroes was sincere may be doubted; but certainly it was the loudest that I ever witnessed. They all talked together, sang, danced, shouted, and, in the violence of their gesticulations, tumbled over each other, and rolled about upon the ground. Twenty voices at once inquired after uncles, and aunts, and grandfathers, and great-grandmothers of mine, who had been buried long before I was in existence, and whom, I verily believe, most of them only knew by tradition. One woman held up her little naked black child to me, grinning from ear to ear—'Look, massa, look here! him nice lilly neger for massa!' Another complained—'So long since none come see we, massa; good massa come at last.' As for the old people, they were all in one and the same story—now they had lived once to see massa, they were ready for dying to-morrow, 'them no care.'

Some of the sketches of West Indian natural history are very clever, and, though we should be sorry to vouch for their scientific accuracy, we can not avoid being pleased by their graphic liveliness.

"A galli-wasp, which was killed in the neighbouring morass, has just been brought to me. This is the alligator in miniature, and is even more dreaded by the negroes than its great relation; it is only to be found in swamps and morasses: that which was brought to me was about eighteen inches in length, and I understand that it is seldom longer, although, as it grows in years, its thickness and the size of its jaws and head become greatly increased. It runs away on being encountered, and conceals itself; and it is only dangerous if trampled upon by accident, or if attacked; but then its bite is dreadful, not only from its tongue being armed with a sting (the venom of which is very powerful, although not mortal), but from its teeth being so brittle that they generally break in the wound, and, as it is hardly possible to extract the pieces entirely, the wound corrupts, and becomes an incurable sore of the most offensive nature. Luckily, those reptiles are very scarce; but nothing can exceed the terror and aversion in which they are held by the negroes. This one had been lying dead in the room for several hours, yet, on my servant's accidentally stirring the board on which it was stretched for my inspection, my little negro servant, George, darted out of the room in terror, and was at the bottom of the staircase in a moment."

Lewis early discovered that the reports of the condition of negroes transmitted to England were worthy of as little credit as the tales of the Arcadian happiness of the English peasants which were so studiously circulated three or four years ago, when it suited the political exigencies of parties to libel the manufacturing population, and endeavour to sow dissensions between masters and men.

"It seemed, that while I fancied my attorney to be resident on Cornwall, he was, in fact, generally attending to a property of his own, or looking after estates of which also he had the management in distant parts of the island. During his absence, an overseer of his own appointing, without my knowledge, was left in absolute possession of his power, which he abused to such a degree that almost every slave of respectability on the estate was compelled to become a runaway. The property was nearly ruined, and the slaves absolutely in a state of rebellion. At length he committed an act of such severity that the negroes, one and all, fled to Savannah la Mar, and threw themselves upon the protection of the magistrates, who immediately came over to Cornwall and investigated the complaint; and now, at length, the attorney—who had known numerous instances of the overseer's tyranny, had frequently rebuked him for them, and had redressed the sufferers, but who still had dared to abuse my confidence so grossly as to continue him in his situation—upon this public exposure thought proper to dismiss him. Yet, while all this was going on—while my negroes were groaning under the iron rod of this petty tyrant—and while the magistrate was obliged to interfere to protect them from his cruelty—my attorney had the insolence and falsehood to write me letters, filled with assurances of his perpetual vigilance for their welfare, and of their perfect good treatment and satisfaction; and, if I had not come myself to Jamaica, in all probability I should never have had the most distant idea how abominably the poor creatures had been ill-used."

The following amusing anecdote might be added to "Æsop's Fables" with the same moral that is appended to the "Tale of King Log and King Stork":—

"A Sir Charles Price, who had an estate in this island infested by rats, imported, with much trouble, a very large and strong species for the purpose of extirpating the others. The new-comers answered his purpose to a miracle; they attacked the native rats with such spirit that in a short time they had the whole property to themselves; but no sooner had they done their duty upon the rats, than they extended their exertions to the cats, of whom their strength and size at length enabled them completely to get the better; and, since that last victory, Sir Charles Price's rats, as they are called, have increased so prodigiously, that this single species is now a greater nuisance to the island than all the others before them were together. The best mode of destroying rats here is with terriers. Those imported from England soon grow useless, being blinded by the sun; but their puppies, born in Jamaica, are provided by nature with a protecting film over their eyes, which effectually secures them against that calamity."

We have ever maintained that slavery and monopoly—of which, indeed, slavery is but one form—exert a more demoralizing influence on the master and the monopolist, than on the slave and the plunderer. It leads them to form such perverted notions of right and wrong that they denounce justice as a crime, and regard common humanity as a nuisance. The following account of the conduct of a Jamaica magistrate is a fit parallel for the pamphlet published by some blockhead named Day, who endeavours to show that the sympathy which the League has shown for the miserable condition of the peasantry has a tendency to excite the agricultural population to acts of riot and insubordination:—

"On opening the assize court for the county of Cornwall on March 4, Mr. Stewart, the Custos of Trelawny, and presiding Judge, said, in his charge to the jury, he wished to direct their attention in a peculiar manner to the infringement of slave laws in the island, in consequence of charges having been brought forward in England of slave laws not being enforced in this country, and of their being in fact perfect dead letters. The charge was unfounded; but it became proper, in consequence, for the bench to call in a strong manner on the grand jury to be particularly vigilant and attentive to the discharge of this part of their duty. The bench at the same time adverted to another subject connected with the above. Many out of the country, and some in it, had thought proper to interfere with our system, and by their insidious practices and dangerous doctrines to call the peace of the island into question, and to promote disorder and confusion. The jury were therefore enjoined, in every such case, to investigate it thoroughly, and to bring the parties concerned before the country, and not to suffer the systems of the island, as established by the laws of the land, to be over set or endangered. It was their bounden duty to watch over and support the established laws, and to act against those who dared to infringe them; and that, otherwise, it was imperiously called for on the principle of self-preservation. Every country had its peculiar laws, on the due maintenance of which depended the public safety and welfare. I read all this with the most perfect unconsciousness; when, lo and behold! I have been assured, from a variety of quarters, that all this was levelled at myself! It is I (it seems) who am 'calling the peace of the island in question,' who am 'promoting disorder and confusion,' and who am 'infringing the established laws!' I should never have guessed it! By 'insidious practices' is meant (as I am told) my over-indulgence to my negroes; and my endeavouring to obtain either redress or pardon for those belonging to other estates, who occasionally appeal to me for protection; while 'dangerous doctrines' alludes to the opinions I have expressed, that the evidence of negroes ought at least to be heard against white persons.

"My opinion is most decided that they ought to be heard; the jury, of course, always making proportionable abatements of belief, from bearing in mind the bad habits of most negroes, their general want of probity and good faith in every respect, and their total ignorance of the nature of religious obligations. At the same time these defects may be counterbalanced by the respectable character of the particular negro; by the strength of corroborating circumstances; and, finally, by the irresistible conviction which his evidence may leave upon the minds of the jury. They are not obliged to believe a negro witness, but I maintain that he ought to be heard, and then let the jury give their verdict according to their conscience. But this, in the opinion of the bench at Montego Bay, is a dangerous doctrine!" At least, the venom of my doctrines is circumscribed within very narrow limits; for, as I have made a point of never stirring off my own estate, nobody could possibly be corrupted by them except those who were at the trouble of walking into my house for the express purpose of being corrupted.

"At all events, if I really am the person to whom Mr. Stewart alluded, I must consider his speech as the most flattering compliment I ever received. If my presence in the island has made the bench of a whole country think it necessary to exact from the jury a more severe vigilance than usual in all causes relating to the protection of negroes, I cannot but own myself most richly rewarded for all my pains and expense in coming hither, for every risk of the voyage, and for every possible sacrifice of my pleasures. There is nothing earthly that is too much to give for the power of producing an effect so beneficial; and I would set off for Constantinople to-morrow could I only be convinced that my arrival would make the Muffi redress the complaints of the lower orders of Turks with more scrupulous justice, and the Bahawwax relax the fetters of their slaves as much as their safety would permit. But I cannot flatter myself with having done either the one or the other in Jamaica; and if Mr. Stewart really alluded to me in his charge, I am certainly greatly obliged to him; but he has paid me much too high a compliment: God grant that I may live to deserve it!"

We must give a specimen of the negro legends collected by Mr. Lewis, and we select one in which our readers will recognize the substance of a fairy tale long familiar to European nurseries. Inquiries into the transmission of fiction from one race of men and from one country to another have great ethnographical value, and we should wish that some of the very able men who have recently devoted themselves to the cultivation of ethnographic science would devote some attention to this curious and interesting branch of it. We may take another opportunity of returning to this subject; but we think that the variations in the negro version of a well-known tale are worthy of note as curious illustrations of natural character.

"Two sisters had always lived together on the best terms; but on the death of one of them, the other treated very harshly a little niece who had been left to her care, and made her a common drudge to herself and her daughter. One day the child, having broken a water-jug, was turned out of the house, and ordered not to return till she could bring back as good a one. As she was going along weeping, she came to a large cotton-tree, under which was sitting an old woman without a head. I suppose this unexpected sight made her gaze rather too earnestly, for the old woman immediately inquired, 'Well, my pleasuring, what you see?' 'Oh, ma'am,' answered the girl, 'me no see nothing.' 'Good child!' said again the old woman, 'and good will come to you.' Not far distant was a cocoa-tree, and here was another old woman, without any more head than the former one. The same question was asked her, and she felt not to give the same answer which had already met with so good a reception."

"Still she travelled forwards, and began to feel faint through want of food; when, under a mahogany-tree, she not only saw a third old woman, but one who, to her great satisfaction, had got a head between her shoulders. She stopped and made her best courtesy. 'How day, grannie!' 'How day, my piceaning; what matter? you no look well.' 'Grannie, me lilly hungry.' 'My piceaning, you see that hut, there's rice in the pot, take it, and yam-yamme; but if you see our black puss, mind you give him him share.'

"The child hastened to profit by the permission; the 'one black puss' failed not to make its appearance, and was served first to its portion of rice, after which it departed; and the child had but just finished her meal when the mistress of the hut entered, and told her that she might help herself to three eggs out of the fowl-house, but that she must not take any of the talking ones: perhaps, too, she might find the black puss there also; but if she did, she was to take no notice of her. Unluckily all the eggs seemed to be as fond of talking as if they had been so many old maids, and the moment that the child entered the fowl-house there was a cry of 'Take me! Take me!' from all quarters. However, she was punctual in her obedience; and although the conversable eggs were remarkably fine and large, she searched about till at length she had collected three little dirty-looking eggs that had not a word to say for themselves.

"The old woman now dismissed her guest, bidding her to return home without fear; but not to forget to break one of the eggs under each of the three trees near which she had seen an old woman that morning. The first egg produced a water-jug exactly similar to that which she had broken; out of the second came a whole large sugar-estate; and out of the third a splendid equipage, in which she returned to her aunt, delivered up the jug, related that an old woman in a red dicker (i. e., petticoat) had made her a great lady, and then departed in triumph to her sugar-estate.

"Stung by envy, the aunt lost no time in sending her own daughter to search for the same good fortune which had befallen her cousin. She found the cotton-tree and the headless old woman, and had the same question addressed to her; but instead of returning the same answer—'What me see?' said she; 'me see one old woman without him head!' Now this reply was doubly offensive: it was rude, because it reminded the old lady of what might certainly be considered as a personal defect; and it was dangerous, as, if such a circumstance were to come to the ears of the buckras, it might bring her into trouble, women being seldom known to walk and talk without their heads, if ever, except by the assistance of Obeah. 'Bad child!' cried the old woman; 'bad child! and bad will come to you!'

"Matters were no better managed near the cocoa-tree; and even when she reached the mahogany, although she saw that the old woman had not only got her head on, but had a red dicker besides, she could not prevail on herself to say more than a short 'How day?' without calling her 'grannie.' However, she received the permission to eat rice at the cottage, coupled with the injunction of giving a share to the black puss; an injunction, however, which she totally disregarded, although she scrupled not to assure her hostess that she had suffered puss to eat till she could eat no more. The old lady in the red petticoat seemed to swallow this lie very glibly, and despatched the girl to the fowl-house for three eggs, as she had before done her cousin; but having been cautioned against taking the talking eggs, she conceived that these must needs be the most valuable, and, therefore, made a point of selecting those three which seemed to be the greatest gossips. Then, lest their chattering should betray her disobedience, she thought it best not to return into the hut, and accordingly set forward on her return home; but she had not yet reached the mahogany-tree when curiosity induced her to break one of the eggs. To her infinite disappointment it proved to be empty; and she soon found cause to wish that the second had been empty too; for, on her dashing it against the ground, out came an enormous yellow snake, which flew at her with dreadful hissing. Away ran the girl; a fallen bamboo lay in her path; she stumbled over it and fell. In her fall the third egg was broken; and the old woman without the head immediately popping out of it, told her, that if she had treated her as civilly as her cousin had done, she would have obtained the same good fortune, but that, as she had shown her nothing but rudeness, she must be contented to carry nothing home but the empty egg-shells. The old woman then jumped upon the yellow snake, galloped away with incredible speed, and never showed her red dicker in that part of the island any more."

Of the many horrors connected with the existence of slavery we shall merely select one instance; it was forced upon Mr. Lewis's attention by having been worked up into the form of a legend:—

"There is a popular negro song, the burden of which is—

'Take him to the Gully! Take him to the Gully!
But brudder back the frock and board.'
'Oh! massa, massa! me no deade yet!'
'Take him to the Gully! Take him to the Gully!
'Carry him along!'

This alludes to a transaction which took place some thirty years ago on an estate in this neighbourhood, called Spring-garden, the owner of which (I think the name was Bedward) is quoted as the cruellest proprietor that ever disgraced Jamaica. It was his constant practice, whenever a sick negro was pronounced incurable, to order the poor wretch to be carried to a solitary vale upon his estate, called the Gully, where he was thrown down and abandoned to his fate, which fate was generally to be half-devoured by the John-crows before death had put an end to his sufferings. By this proceeding the avaricious owner avoided the expense of maintaining the slave during his last illness; and, in order that he might be as little a loser as possible, he always enjoined the negro bearers of the dying man to strip him naked before leaving the Gully, and not to forget to bring back his frock and the board on which he had been carried down. This poor creature, while in the act of being removed, screamed out most piteously 'that he was not dead yet,' and implored not to be left to perish in the Gully in a manner so horrible. His cries had no effect upon his master, but operated so forcibly on the less sensible hearts of his fellow-slaves, that in the night some of them removed him back to the negro-village privately, and nursed him there with so much care that he recovered, and left the estate unquestioned and undiscovered. Unluckily one day the master was passing through Kingston, when, on turning the corner of a street suddenly, he found himself face to face with the negro whom he had supposed long ago to have been picked to the bones in the Gully. He immediately seized him, chained him as his slave, and ordered his attendants to convey him to his house; but the fellow's cries attracted a crowd round them before he could be dragged away: he related his melancholy story, and the singular manner in which he had recovered his life and liberty; and the public indignation was so forcibly excited by the shocking tale, that Mr. Bedward was glad to save himself from being torn to pieces by a precipitate retreat from Kingston, and never ventured to advance his claim to the negro a second time."

It should not be forgotten that slavery and the Corn Laws have been maintained by the same parties, advocated in the same newspapers, and defended by the same arguments. The friends of justice and philanthropy have ever to meet the same foes when they take the field against the iniquity of monopoly. Free labour has triumphed in spite of the whinnings of the John Bull, the affectations of the Post, and the invectives of the Standard; a similar victory is predestined for Free Trade, and the day of triumph is not far distant.

FREE TRADE IN AMERICA.

The following extract from a letter addressed by Mr. A. R. Shaw, now residing in Philadelphia, and formerly President of the Shoreditch Anti-Corn-Law Association, to Mr. Sidney Smith, gives some interesting particulars relative to the late contest for the Presidency in the United States:—

"By the arrival of the Britannia the people of England will be made acquainted with the fact of the election of Mr. Polk to the Presidential Chair of the United States, and the rejection of Mr. Clay. The struggle between Free Trade and monopoly has been carried on for the last twelve months, by the tariff and anti-tariff parties, with great spirit. At length justice has triumphed, and I hope monopoly has received its deathblow. With James K. Polk I have no personal acquaintance. He is said to be an honest and upright man, of sound judgment, extensive knowledge, great business habits, and as a statesman quite as clever as Clay. I know George M. Dallas well: he is a citizen of Philadelphia, a highly honourable man, a sound lawyer, a pure patriot, and possessed of splendid talents. With two such men at the helm, we have no fear but that our country will, for the next four years, be governed on just and enlightened principles.

"Mr. Clay's party grounded his claims to be President on the fact of his being a high-tariff man, which they allege is needed to enable our manufacturers to compete with the saucy English, and punish them for their Corn Laws. These gentlemen overlook the fact, that the great masses of the people are made to suffer in both countries from the same cause—BAD LAWS that protect the few. What do you suppose Mr. Clay's electioneering agents told the American farmers in order to obtain their votes for Clay? Why, that Mr. Clay would create a home consumption for their produce, by establishing large factories all over the country, and bring men, women, and children from abroad, with mouths capable of eating all they could raise! In my travels, whenever I had an opportunity, I told the farmers not to be caught with such chaff, and appealed to their common sense, whether they would not rather sell their produce to shipping merchants at a higher price, and thus employ our ships and seamen to carry it abroad, to fill the people's mouths in their own country, where they might remain and be advantageously employed in manufacturing goods to send over to us in exchange for the corn thus shipped, to clothe us at a cheaper rate than we could obtain them from our own manufacturers? And how would they like to support the great masses thus prematurely created by the policy of Clay, as paupers, if some change should throw them out of employment? As an illustration I gave them a short history of the Spitalfields weavers, fostered one day by protection, the next exposed to competition, to replenish an exhausted exchequer. I have the satisfaction of knowing that some in Pennsylvania listened to these hints, and acted accordingly at the polls. I have made it my business to ascertain as nearly as possible what rate of interest the owners of the soil realize on their capital invested in land, and I find it to be 31 per cent.; while, on the other hand, I find those engaged in the manufacture of articles protected by the tariff clear from 20 to 25 per cent. on their capital. These facts I have from the best authority—the parties themselves—in the following states, through which I have travelled since my return in July, 1843:—Pennsylvania, Delaware, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, and parts of Massachusetts. I also learned another fact, namely, that our rich manufacturers are much like your rich landowners, deriving much of their wealth from the same cause—cutting down the wages of their operatives to almost starvation point. I am well acquainted with some of the workmen in several of the largest establishments in this state, who declare, if it were not that food is cheaper here than in England, they would be as badly off as they were before they left England. They complain bitterly of the abominable truck system, which is now in full operation here. Competition among the mechanics is quite as great here as it is in Britain: I know excellent vicemen and turners working for four dollars (16s. 8d.) per week; and first-rate machinists at six dollars (25s.). And yet these men were required to vote for Clay or lose their work! These facts I have from their own lips. The handloom weavers of the city and county of Philadelphia had a meeting about ten days back, at which a report was read, and published the next day. In this report they complained to the public, to which they appealed, that, in consequence of the combination among their masters, they, the weavers, could only earn 34 dollars (14s. 8d.) per week. And these men, too, were compelled to vote for Clay, the friend of 'native industry,' or lose their profitable employment. Would you believe, Sir, our farm-labourers receive 10 and 12 dollars a month, and are found hard, washing, and lodging, from those who are unprotected by any tariff, and sell their wheat at 30s. 14d. per quarter!"

AGRICULTURE.

AGRICULTURAL PRIZE ESSAYS.

"Where there is much smoke there must be some fire," is a proverb no less true than trite; and it would be strange, indeed, if beneath all the smother and noise which, for the last three or four years, have proceeded from the landed and agricultural community, there did not exist some genuine and substantial agricultural progress. And such is the fact. Agricultural societies in England, of any true and practical shape, are of modern origin; for, though societies bearing that title have long existed, they have been usually little more than political associations kept up by some landowner or clique of landowners to cajole or frighten the farmers from a real examination of the Corn-Law question. They were merely monopolist clubs. But in 1836 the doom of monopoly was sealed, by the evidence which the agricultural distress committee of the Commons reported to the House. There was no report against the Corn Laws, it is true; for the only report which could have been deduced from the evidence, that of Mr. Shaw Lefevre, was rejected by the committee, and even the monopolist majority had not the face to propose any counter-report in favour of the Corn Laws.

By that evidence it was demonstrated, that in farming alone, of all the businesses of the country, had men been helplessly waiting upon the seasons, and expecting profit through the aid of restrictive laws instead of their own exertions; that wherever farmers had, in some degree, emancipated themselves from the trammels of protection—as in Scotland by means of corn-rents—their condition was not one of distress or despondency; and that wherever there was sufficient capital, the low prices of the four preceding years had stimulated husbandmen to improvements and exertions which promised them an ample compensation for the loss of a fitful and occasional high range of prices. It became obvious to all landowners of common understanding that they, like the rest of the community, must, ere long, depend solely upon their own exertions. They felt, if they did not completely understand, that more produce and cheaper production must thenceforth be their aim. They must derive their incomes from growing the corn and raising the cattle required for the national subsistence, and could not expect much longer to be paid for growing grain, when in truth they were growing only weeds and rushes.

It was the prevalence of sentiments of this sort which enabled Lord Spencer, and a few other landowners, who understood the real necessities of agriculture, to found a society somewhat upon the plan which had succeeded in Scotland, for the improvement of practical and scientific agriculture in England. Thus, in 1838 or 1839, arose the ENGLISH AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY. Its subsequent history is known to every one; and its annual shows of cattle and rural implements and inventions have for several years past formed at once a remarkable spectacle and a fashionable gala for the landed gentry. It is true, these shows have favoured somewhat of quackery and make-belief, and have neither had nor are likely to have much effect in the improvement of stock; and the recurrence of such incidents as that of the Duke of Richmond's roarer at the Southampton meeting will not tend to raise the character of the society or its exhibitions.

There is, however, one part of the society's proceedings which is effecting substantial and permanent good. We allude to the publication of its journal. That journal, which is ably directed by Mr. Philip Pusey, appears half-yearly, and contains papers on every description of rural topic, from the humblest mode of raising the most ordinary crop, to the most elaborate applications of chemical science and physiology to the common farming operations and the rearing and feeding of stock. This journal, circulating half-yearly amongst the seven thousand members of this society, their friends and neighbours, is of great and unquestionable utility. One of the services rendered to agriculture by this journal has been to prove, that, although the great portion of the English soil is but indifferently cultivated, yet in most districts, and on almost every kind of soil, there are some men who farm well, and whose example offers much encouragement to imitation. Nay, more: it has been made known by the means of the society's journal, to all agriculturists, that in considerable districts, as in large sections of Lincolnshire and Norfolk, high farming has long been adopted by men of enterprise and capital, with profit to tenant and landlord, and great benefit to the agricultural labourers.

The society has lately offered premiums for practical essays upon the agriculture of certain counties, and the successful papers have been published in the journal. By this means several very useful accounts of the actual state and practice of husbandry in particular localities have been obtained. They have, however, been no more than plain statements of ordinary practices written by farmers, who are not much beyond the average of their class in their knowledge of the capabilities of English agriculture. To this remark there is one eminent exception. As Norfolk long since took the lead in English husbandry, so is the prize essay on its agriculture a work far before those of the other rural essayists. The writer, Mr. Richard Noverre Bacon, brings to the task more of education and knowledge, and, it is but fair to say, more practised literary skill, and his report on the agriculture of Norfolk, to which the prize was awarded, is undoubtedly one of the most valuable additions to that branch of economical statistics hitherto published. In Mr. Bacon's hands, instead of the somewhat homely essays upon the other countries which have obtained prizes, the Norfolk report has grown into a goodly volume, which has been published separately, as being too long to be inserted in the society's journal.

To give anything like an analysis of this report within our limits is impossible, commencing as it does with the geographical position and extent, together with the distribution of the population, of the county, and going in detail, through the various circumstances affecting its agriculture, such as its climate, soil, land tenures, and systems of husbandry. Nor is the remarkable influence exercised by one man, the late Earl of Leicester, on the rise and progress of Norfolk farming, overlooked. And we can strongly recommend the work to all Free-Traders who wish to see by what means agriculture is advanced. Mr. Bacon was precluded from any direct reference to the question of Free Trade as affecting agriculture; but it is impossible to read his essay without meeting with proof upon proof that the restrictions and uncertainties which flow from the Corn Laws have been the main impediments to agricultural improvement. So is the tone of the writer one of earnest and intelligent hopefulness. In his introduction he says, "The age is still far off when of British or Norfolk agriculture it can be said, 'Proceed; to exceed is impossible;' and he, indeed, must have profited little by the experience of the last few years who does not admit that, notwithstanding the science by which the system of agriculture is directed, notwithstanding the mechanical skill which now promotes the operations alike of the ploughman and the plough—notwithstanding the knowledge of agricultural chemistry which now informs the farmer concerning what sorts of manures are required for different productions, and are best adapted for different soils—notwithstanding the extraordinary changes which the increased and improved cultivation of the turnip has created, teaching how land may be kept in continual production—notwithstanding the introduction of artificial feed, and the consequent enormous increase in the number of sheep and cattle grazed for market,—notwithstanding all these vast strides towards perfection, that man must be little advantaged by the knowledge he has acquired, who does not perceive that agriculture is still in its infancy, with regard to the extent to which chemical science and mechanical ingenuity may be profitably applied in increasing and varying the productive powers of the soil." And the extent of advancement indicated by the above passage is applicable only to the best farmers of even the best-farmed districts, while the mass of cultivators, the average farmers, are greatly behind that standard which Mr. Bacon truly says is 'but the infancy of agriculture.' We shall have occasion again to refer to this useful publication.

AN IMPERFECT COMPARISON.

At the late meeting of the Blandford Agricultural Association, Mr. George Bankes, one of the county members, whose explanation of the ill repute of Dorsetshire landlords we last week left to the tender mercy of the Times—amidst a great deal of rodomontade, which offered a contrast not much to Mr. Bankes's credit with the more sober and practical addresses of the other speakers—made the following clumsy and imperfect comparison. He said:—

"It was said by one not very friendly to the agriculturists, to one of that body, as a taunt and sarcasm, 'Why, you are nothing better than shopkeepers and traders yourselves.' Well, to be sure, we are nothing better—NOT THEN I TRUST WE ARE HONEST SHOPKEEPERS, and traders not deserving of those gross and unworthy epithets which are sometimes applied to our trade. The epithets we reject with scorn, whilst we have no objection whatever to the appellation. I remember to have read of a worthy shopkeeper who rose from small beginnings to a high condition of prosperous trade, and it had been his uniform practice, from the time when he first kept a small shop and afterwards a large one, every morning when he entered his shop to take off his hat as a token of salutation, and to say, 'How do you do, Mr. Shop?' (a laugh) and then he proceeded, 'Do you keep me, Mr. Shop, and I will keep you.' (Cheers.) Thus he daily brought to his mind the source of his growing opulence and credit, also the nature of that duty which he must pursue in order to maintain them. And it has occurred to me that it might not be altogether a bad plan if agriculturists of all grades and classes were to take a leaf out of this good shopkeeper's book, and to make something of a similar salutation, accompanied by a similar resolution, on going forth every morning to the corn-field. 'Good morning, Mr. Cornfield.' (Laughter.) Do you keep me, Mr. Cornfield, and I will keep you.' The landlord, when he salutes the corn-field, has duties far higher and more complicated to consider and discharge. I will keep the corn-field, he should say, showing by example rather than by precept, to point out that course which shall benefit those whose eyes are upon me, and whose welfare is interwoven with my own. The tenant-farmer shall know me as one willing to acquaint myself with his habits, with his occupation, with his endeavours, and with his success. Not as the prying inquisitor, wishing to acquaint myself with all the vain gossip of a neighbourhood. Not with the spirit of a money-scribbler, looking on improvements merely with an eye to calculate his share of the increasing produce; but with the frank spirit of an English gentleman, happy that others thrive when he thrives, and even when he thrives not—proud when he knows that his tenant is the best-mounted man in the troop of Yeomanry, and that he now and then takes a good gallop with the Squire's hounds. (Loud cheers.) Proud above all if the farmers shall tell him, 'There is not on my farm nor in my parish one single able-bodied man out of employ. I might do quite as well with a lesser number, he may say, but they could not do without me.' By the aid of such men as these the landlord will learn how to direct wisely the channels of his bounty."

Now, comparisons are sometimes said to be odious, but in the hands of such reasoners as Mr. George Bankes it is clear they are often dangerous. We doubt not all this passed current at Blandford, where, as the Times says, Mr. George Bankes was "on his own dunghill." But let us examine it a bit. When and how was the taunt, that the landlords are no more than shopkeepers, made? Why, when a vast parade had been attempted to pass off the landowning monopolists' anxiety for "protection" as solely arising from their love for the peasantry. Their utter disregard of the moral, physical, and material welfare of the labourers who tilled and the tenant-farmers who occupied their land had been exposed, and they stood naked before the world as dishonest hucksters, who had used their political power for the advancement of their own narrow, selfish, sordid interests. This was the sense and the way in which they were taunted as being shopkeepers. Not simply shopkeepers,—we wish they were. We wish they did apply to their own properties and their own affairs the simple, common-sense views which actuate the honest shopkeeper. In fairly pursuing their own interests they would probably promote, at all events they would not interfere with, the interests of others. But what is the truth? Now, if Mr. Bankes's shopkeeper had been one of the governing body—say the corporation of the town in which he lived,—and, being the only provision-seller in the town, he had combined with his brother corporators—also the only tradesmen of their respective businesses in the town—to make a by-law that no other provision-seller should be allowed to come into the town, and that none of the townspeople should be allowed to buy any provisions but such as they could get at Mr. Corporator's shop; and further, if by means of this by-law the price of provisions was so exorbitantly enhanced that the poorer people of the town were sometimes on the verge of starvation, and at all times lost a great part of their employment, what would this shopkeeper be called? Certainly not honest according to any vocabulary with which we are acquainted. Yet this is precisely the case of Mr. George Bankes and his co-monopolists, when he proposes to take off his hat to "Mr. Cornfield." Then follow him into the moral of his fable, and ask whether the landlords really do "make themselves acquainted with the habits, the occupation, and the endeavours" of their tenantry? Do they know that farmers writhes under the political vassalage they are subjected to; that they sigh for security of tenure; that they are half frantic at the injuries they suffer from landowners' game, and so forth?

Then why should a landlord be "proud if his tenants" tell him that they could farm with a less number of men than they actually employ? The absurdity of such a cause of pride is so great that it requires some explanation, and this is it. Farmers have engaged to give a certain rent, calculated on their wheat selling for at least 56s. or 60s. a quarter; but, in fact, wheat sometimes only sells for 45s. a quarter. That is the case just now; but landlords having passed a certain law of distress, by means of which they can sweep off all the tenant's stock, crops, and goods, if the rent is not paid, the farmer, like a mariner in a storm, casts overboard his unhappy labourers, and hands over the funds, which should have paid wages, as the landlord's monopoly rent. So far the landlord seems to have it all his own way. But there is retribution in store. "There is a Providence which shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we may." And accordingly the labourers thrown out of work come upon the poor-rates; and everybody knows that a heavy poor-rate soon tells upon rent. All this even such moon-eyed monopolists as Mr. Geo. Bankes see is going on at the present time, and they may, therefore, be justly proud, if by their miserable delusions they can persuade the farmers to pay their full rents and employ more labourers than they want besides. But, cunning as these prating monopolists are, the farmers and the public see through them.

SETTING THE HOUSE IN ORDER.

Even the monopolists are making ready for Free Trade, so obvious has it now become that ere long monopoly must cease out of these kingdoms. Everywhere we meet with signs of the prevalence of this opinion. For instance at the Cardiff Farmers' Club, met for the purpose of forming a general association to promote the draining of that neighbourhood, Mr. Watson, who avowed his hostility to Free Trade, said, "If the whole island of Great Britain was thoroughly drained and subsoil ploughed in the same way as Mr. Romilly's land, they might laugh at the notion of Free Trade, as this country would then be an exporting country instead of a country requiring the aid of foreigners."

And he afterwards added:—

"It was quite clear to any one acquainted with our manufacturing and agricultural state, that one of two things must, at no very distant period, come to pass. In a short time, they would either put themselves in a position to grow a sufficient quantity of food for the inhabitants of the country, or they must, as a matter of course, as a matter of necessity, and as a matter of duty, admit foreign corn duty free. (Hear.) They could not see their countrymen wanting food, and not get it for them, if in their power to do so. He was satisfied that either alternative was now within their reach. He was convinced that, if they improved the land in the manner suggested by Mr. Romilly, they should have food in abundance, sufficient for the inhabitants of this country, and to spare for the purpose of being sent to other countries. Cheap food they must have. It was as clear as the sun at noon-day. He had given up the idea of high prices. They never could be recommended. He had not given up the idea of seeing land paying 50 per cent. more than it did at present. With the system of thorough draining fully carried out, those objects would be certainly attained. They would then never hear the Minister of the day tell the House of Commons that certain beneficial results were produced by a good harvest. Good harvests would then be almost invariably certain. Nothing was so well calculated to produce good harvests as thorough draining. He thought they had discovered more than the philosopher's stone. They had discovered the way of turning the soil into food for the people. They had arguments on their side which the Free-Traders could not produce; but he did not want to invest the meeting with a political character, and therefore he should say nothing further on that subject."

Now, if the landowners have "found the philosopher's stone" in their own estates—and we by no means think Mr. Watson's expectations go beyond what our soil, if properly and completely cultivated, is capable of doing—they have clearly to thank us for helping them to the discovery. Then it is a source of much congratulation to the whole community that these landed gentry feel it their "duty not to see their countrymen wanting food, and not get it for them, if it was in their power to do so;" and that they are at length convinced that high prices are "never to be recommended." This is an exceedingly happy frame of mind for monopolists in the present day; though, if inclined to be ill-natured, we might say their repudiation of high prices reminds us of the fable of the fox and the sour grapes.

We cannot close this notice of the Cardiff Club without extracting a portion of Mr. Romilly's observations,—the gentleman of whose well-drained and cultivated land Mr. Watson spoke in such high terms. He said—

"That it was generally received that the best land had been taken first into cultivation, then the next best, and so on until they came to the worst description of land. He conceived that that commonly received opinion was a mistake, and that the best was not taken into cultivation first; but rather that land which could be most easily cultivated was a light sandy soil. He was of opinion that the best land in the country had not even yet been brought into cultivation. (Cheers.) He entirely disagreed with Mr. Watson on the subject of Free Trade, and felt convinced that, if the system of thorough draining were fully carried out, this country would be in a position to vie with the whole world."

This is another addition to the proofs we have adduced, that wherever a landowner or farmer really understands the capacity of our soils for improvement, he laughs to scorn all fear of foreign competition.

IS IT COME TO THIS?

Most people will recollect the thrill of horror with which they have read the tales of the Spaniards in Cuba training bloodhounds to hunt out and pull down their escaped slaves; nor will the fact that the same atrocity was perpetrated in Jamaica, in the Maroon war by our slave-holding countrymen, lessen the execration with which such deeds must be universally visited. Yet it seems the same horrible means are being adopted against the British peasant in defence of—what think you, reader?—the LANDOWNERS' GAME!!! The following instance, reported in a provincial paper, needs no other comment than that made by the counsel and judge:—

"At Stafford, on the 13th ult., Thomas Marsh, aged 50, was charged with cutting and wounding John Ludlow, at Sedgely, on the 1st of August. The prisoner, while poaching, was caught by two of Lord Ward's keepers, who set a ferocious bulldog upon him. In the desperate struggle which ensued, one of the keepers was slightly cut with a knife; but the poacher got much the worst of it in the encounter. He was summarily convicted under the game laws, and imprisoned for a month; and then he was brought to an assize trial. His counsel, Mr. Yardley, said, 'Are the peasantry of England to be hunted like beasts by bull-terrier dogs?—to be dragged before game-preserving magistrates, committed to prison, and then to be brought into a court of justice, and indicted for a transportable offence, in having given a few scratches in return for the wounds that two men, who had not the least authority over his person, had inflicted on him? Surely such proceedings will not be tolerated in this country, but feelings of just indignation will save the poor peasant from his oppressor!' Mr. Justice Colman, in summing up, agreed with the remarks of the learned counsel as to the absence of authority on the part of the prosecutor; and the jury, to the evident satisfaction of the court, immediately returned a verdict of 'Not Guilty.' There was another indictment against Marsh, but the judge would not allow it to be proceeded with."

Will not game-preservers read the signs of the times and abandon their demoralising, selfish practices?

A LOTHIAN LEASE.

The following is an agreement for the occupation of a Lothian farm, which an eminent farmer considers fair between both parties. We print it without comment, as preparatory to some further suggestions it is our purpose to offer to the agricultural community upon leases:—

"It is CONTRACTED AND AGREED between A B [the proprietor] upon the one part and C D [the tenant] upon the other part, in manner following: That is to say, the said A B, in consideration of the tack duty and other prestations after specified, has set and hereby sets and in tack and assedation lets to the said C D and his heirs, but excluding assignees and sub-tenants, legal and conventional, of every description, and under the conditions and reservations after expressed,

"ALL AND WHOLE the farm of —, with the houses, yards, parts, pendicles, and pertinents, all as presently possessed by —, all lying [describe the farm], and that for the space of 21 years from and after Whitsunday, 18—, as to the houses, stables, byres and grass, and the separation of the crop thereafter as to the arable lands, and as to the barns at Lammas 18—; at which respective periods the said C D's entry to the premises in virtue hereof is hereby declared to have commenced.

"But reserving always to the proprietor and his successors power and liberty to resume possession of such part or parts of the said lands as he or they may require for planting to the extent in all of 10 acres, and for which ground so taken off the said C D and his forebears are to have an annual deduction from the rent after-mentioned according to the valuation of arbiters mutually chosen.

"RESERVING, also, the whole coal, lime, freestone, marl, and other metals, minerals, and fossils within the whole of the said lands, and power to work and carry away the same, and do every thing requisite for that purpose; the proprietor and his forebears satisfying the said C D and his forebears for the damage thereby done to the surface of the land, as the same shall be determined by persons mutually chosen.

"AND to encourage the said C D in improving the said lands by drainage, the said A B agrees to allow him a deduction from the rent of each of the first four years, of £—, on his producing vouchers that he has expended to that extent in the purchase of drain tiles. And also to allow him a further deduction from the rent of each of the two first years of £—, on his producing vouchers that he has expended to that extent on new buildings or in beneficial alterations on the present offices. Which tack, with and under the exceptions and reservations before specified, the said A B binds and obliges himself and the heirs succeeding to him in the said lands to warrant to the said C D and his forebears at all hands.

"FOR WHICH CAUSES and on the other part, the said C D binds and obliges himself, his heirs and successors to content and pay to the said A B, and his heirs, exors, and assigns, or to their factor in their name, the quantity and value of — quarters of wheat in name of rent and tack duty for the said lands, the conversion to be taken at the second or medium fair prices for the county of Huntingdon for the time, and that yearly and each year during the currency of this tack, payable half-yearly in equal proportions at the terms of Candlemas and Lammas, declaring that the rents for the first year hereof shall be payable by equal portions at the terms of Candlemas and Lammas in the year 18—, and so forth yearly and termly during the continuance of this tack, with a one-fifth part more of each term's payment from the time the same falls due until payment.

"BUT PROVIDING AND DECLARING that the grain rent hereby stipulated to be paid by the said C D and his forebears for the said lands shall never, in reckoning the commuted value thereof, be taken at a higher rate per quarter than 70s., it being intended as a maximum beyond which the quarter of wheat shall never be reckoned.

"AND THAT with regard to the management of the said lands, it is hereby stipulated and agreed that the same shall be laboured, cropped, and manured in all respects agreeably to the rules of good husbandry, and particularly without prejudice to the generality of this clause, that not less than one-sixth part of the whole lands shall be yearly in grass, and that of the remainder of the said lands, or of that part which may be in tillage, not less than one-fifth part shall be yearly in summer fallow, turnips, or potatoes, well and sufficiently manured; and that no two crops of white corn shall follow one another in succession, but that a summer fallow, turnips, or potatoes, sown grass, beans, or other green crop shall intervene. As also all the land sown off with grass seeds shall be sown with the first crop after fallow or green crop, manured as aforesaid, and that with a sufficient quantity of good clover and re-grass seeds.

"AND THE SAID C D binds and obliges himself and his forebears, in the last year but one of the lease, to sow with clover and re-grass seeds, at a proper season, such part of the said lands as may have been in summer fallow, turnips, or potatoes, and properly dressed and manured in the preceding year, the same being not less than one-sixth part of the whole lands hereby let as aforesaid, the said C D or his forebears harrowing or rolling the same in a proper manner without charge, but receiving payment for the seeds sown from the proprietor or incoming tenant, he or they having power to pasture with their sheep one-third part of the lands so sown off until the Whitsunday of their removal from the same, but to give possession of the remainder to the proprietor or incoming tenant as soon as the corn crop is off the ground.

"AND in the last year of this lease, the proprietor or incoming tenant shall have power to sow grass seeds at a proper season, with such part of the waygoing crop as may have been summer fallow, turnips, or potatoes in the preceding year, the said C D and his forebears being paid for harrowing or rolling the same, and for any damage or injury done thereby, as the same shall be awarded by neutral men mutually chosen.

"AND, FURTHER, the said C D or his forebears shall, in the last year of this lease, leave to the proprietor or incoming tenant land for fallow equal to one-fifth part of the lands which shall be in tillage that year; and which fallow being in entire fields as far as possible, the proprietor or entering tenant shall have full power to enter to and plough on the 1st of March preceding the said C D's removal, and for which fallow the said C D is to be entitled to such allowance as may be ascertained by persons mutually chosen.

"AND, FURTHER, the said C D binds and obliges himself to maintain and uphold the whole houses and fences, with any houses to be built or fences made, in good and sufficient condition, and to leave them in the same state at the expiry hereof, the said C D and his forebears being entitled to continue in possession of two out-houses and stabling for four horses for a year after the term of removal, to enable him to thresh and market the waygoing crop, and to have straw for the said horses and servants' cows.

"AND, FURTHER, the said C D binds and obliges himself and his forebears to consume the whole straw growing yearly on the said lands on the ground thereof, and to apply the dung to manure the same, and to leave the whole straw of the last crop as steel bow; AND with regard to the dung on hand and unapplied to the waygoing crop, the said C D and his forebears shall receive half the value thereof, and also for such part of the straw of the penult crop as may be on hand, according to its value if converted into dung, from the proprietor or entering tenant, as the same shall be ascertained by arbiters mutually chosen.

"AND IT IS FURTHER specially agreed that in case the said C D or his forebears shall alter the mode of management and culture hereby prescribed, or deviate therefrom in any respect, he binds and obliges himself and them to pay to the proprietor a quarter of wheat of additional rent, convertible and payable as aforesaid, for each and every acre cultivated, employed, or managed contrary to or in a different manner from the plan of management above prescribed, unless he shall have received the express consent of the proprietor thereto in writing, and that yearly and each year while such alteration or departure from the prescribed mode of management is observed; and which additional rent shall nowise be considered as a penalty, but as a consideration for the advantage which the tenant may promise himself by adopting a different system of management, and as a fair compensation for the injury which the proprietor may sustain, but without prejudice nevertheless to him or her insisting for specific performance on the part of the tenant and his forebears of the mode of management and system of rotation hereby established as they shall see cause.

"AND THE SAID C D binds and obliges himself and his forebears to sit and remove himself, wife, children, servants, goods, gear, and effects at the expiration of this tack, and that without any previous warning or process of removing to be used for that effect.

"AND BOTH PARTIES bind and oblige themselves and their forebears to implement their respective parts of the premises to each other, under the penalty of five hundred pounds sterling, to be paid by the party failing to the party observing or willing to observe the same over and above performance. And they consent to the registration hereof in the book of council and session or others competent for preservation. That letters of horning on six days' charge, and all other necessary execution, may pass on a decree to be interposed hereto, and for that purpose constitute

"Their procurators in witness whereof."

THE GAME LAWS.

It appears from the calendar laid before the magistrates at the quarter sessions for the county, that there are no fewer than 46 persons now confined in the county gaol for poaching. The total number of males confined is but 175, so that we find more than one-fourth of the whole number now in prison are committed for offences against the most disgraceful of our penal laws. The magistrates have it in contemplation to enlarge the present gaol, or build new ones at an enormous expense to the county. Would it not be better to petition the Legislature to abolish the game laws? Remove from the county hordes of the prisoners committed under those horrible laws, and sufficient room would then be found for all that will be in future committed for other offences. It is far better, and would be a more satisfactory mode of procuring prison room—at least to the rate-payers, particularly the agricultural portion of them.—Hampshire Independent.

GAME.—In addition to the names of Dr. Lee, Sir H. Verney, and the Duke of Bedford, we have now to add that of Sir Thomas Cotton Sheppard to the list of those common-sense landlords who have taken the only proper step towards putting an end to the game nuisance. One day lately upwards of 600 hares were shot in some fields on Sir T. C. Sheppard's estate at Thornborough in this county; and the worthy gentleman has given his tenants unlimited permission to defend their property in any manner they may think proper from the ravages of the game. There will be no more preserves in the neighbourhood of Thornborough.—Aylesbury News.

MURDEROUS ANNUITY BY POACHERS.—One of the most shocking attacks of the kind that ever took place in Pembrokehire was, on the night of Friday, the 27th ult., perpetrated by a gang of poachers on the gamekeepers of Sir R. B. Phillips, of Pion Castle, M.P. The latter, headed by Mr. Baker, chief gamekeeper, went in search of poachers, whom they discovered in the act of killing a pheasant; a frightful encounter then took place, and several of the keepers and watchers were dreadfully beaten. The life of one is despaired of. The poachers all got off.

NOBLE EXAMPLE TO LANDLORDS.—Miss Jackson, of Fleet-house, near Weymouth, permits several poor men to fish in the Fleet and shoot the wild fowl which frequent the neighbourhood in great numbers at this season, by which means several poor families obtain a precarious subsistence. This neighbouring gentleman has also the same privilege, amongst which is a certain gallant captain who keeps a yacht, and also a punt upon the water, which he can paddle along with his hands. On this point he has placed a swivel gun to bring down his game with more certainty. This gentleman made application to Miss Jackson to warn off the men, as they interfered with his pursuit as a sportsman; she was about to do this, but having heard that the captain sold to the game-dealers and others all the birds he could shoot, as well as the fish and larks he could net, the former at from 2s. 3d. to 2s. 6d. a couple, the latter at 1s. 6d. per dozen, Miss Jackson was so much displeased at this conduct, that she warned off the captain instead of the men as he proposed—a proceeding which gave great satisfaction to the inhabitants of this part of Dorsetshire.

CHIPPENHAM.—We are sorry to learn that a reduction to 7s. per week has been made in the wages of some agricultural labourers in this neighbourhood. We trust the parties coluring to so low a sum the earnings of their workmen are few; we should be happier were they none at all. A distribution of coal, meat, and bread has been made from the subscribed fund for the relief of the poor during the winter. £40 have been thus distributed out of the £105 subscribed.—Wills Independent.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"F. J. H." says,—"Would not a low fixed duty (with an annual reduction of a shilling) be preferable to an immediate abolition of the duty on corn? If not, please explain the reasons."

[There is this decisive and short answer to our correspondent's question, viz., that a fixed duty, whatever might be its amount, would form a tax to the extent of the duty not only on the corn imported, but on all the corn grown in this country; for, before any corn could be imported under a fixed duty, the price of corn in our market must be so high as to enable the importers to obtain an ordinary profit after giving the natural price abroad, and paying the fixed duty. A fixed duty, therefore, so long as it lasted, would be a tax on all the grain consumed in this country, for the benefit of the landowners. Such would be the operation of a fixed duty when prices of grain in this country were high. On the other hand, when, as at present in the instance of wheat, prices had fallen from some abundance, a fixed duty of any amount would interfere with speculative importations, and prevent grain becoming one of the ordinary objects of a regular foreign trade. Again, a fixed duty would prevent that adjustment and reconstruction of rents, which is so necessary for the safety of farmers and the advance of agriculture, and which must take place as soon as our grain market is free from the artificial fluctuations and restrictions caused by the Corn Laws, or by any Corn Law. At this moment, though wheat is cheap, farmers are suffering from the high price of oats, beans, peas, and all kinds of cattle provender, to an extent persons not acquainted with farming can scarcely imagine. Every farmer, at least every one worthy of the name, must feed a considerable number of cattle, sheep, &c., in order to provide manure for his future grain crops, and we know that at this moment such feeding must cause a loss; yet if the feeding is given up, as in many instances it is, the fertility of the land will become deteriorated, and thus even greater loss sustained hereafter. So much for "protection to agriculture."]

"Justice."—"At Christmas, 1843, I took the farm where I now live (30 acres, at £45 a year). All the tenants on the estate get six months' credit with the rent, that is, the rent due on the 25th of December is paid in June following, and the June rent in December. Can my landlord make me an exception, by forcing me to pay the six months' rent when due? The first half year interest for six months was allowed me." [We think that, when rent becomes due, unless there be some stipulation in writing to the contrary, it can be enforced.]

"A Free-Trader."—"A freehold being left by a father to his family, the eldest daughter to reside therein until her death, but to pay the sum of £10 per annum to her brothers and sisters, four in number; at her death to be sold, and the proceeds divided among them. Cannot the eldest son now living vote for the county by virtue of the 40s. rental which he receives?"

[We think the son might claim for "freehold interest of 40s. per annum issuing out of a freehold estate."]

"S. K."—"Having a share in the St. Austell and Lostwithiel Turnpike, in the county of Cornwall, will it confer a vote for the said county?—I.S. An act of Parliament passed in the first year of the reign of his late Majesty King George III., intitled 'An Act for repairing and widening the Roads' aforesaid-mentioned."

[The shares are personal property, therefore will not give a vote.]

67. Owing to the late hour at which we received our Report of the Great Meeting at Manchester, and the large number of Registrations and other meetings which we publish in this day's LEAGUE, we are compelled to omit several editorial and other articles: these we intend to give in our next.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

We beg to announce that on and after the 18th of January, Two Pages of the LEAGUE will be appropriated to Advertisements. No Patent Medicine Advertisements will be admitted; nor will any Advertisements be received after the Thursday preceding the day of publication. The average circulation of the LEAGUE from April 6th to December 28th, 1844, was 19,738: the minimum number having been 17,092.

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING IN COVENT GARDEN.

THE NEXT AGGREGATE MEETING of the LEAGUE, in the THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN, will be HELD ON WEDNESDAY next, the 15th of JANUARY.

GEORGE WILSON, Esq., will take the Chair at SEVEN O'CLOCK precisely.

The Meeting will be addressed by RICHARD COBDEN, Esq., M.P.; THOMAS MILNER GIBSON, Esq., M.P.; and W. J. FOX, Esq.

Cards of admission may be had on application at the Offices of the League, on Monday and Tuesday, between the hours of eleven and four o'clock.

Applications for Private Boxes to be made personally or by letter on Monday.

The Cards of registered Members will admit, as heretofore, to the Pit and Galleries.—DOORS TO BE OPENED AT HALF-PAST SIX O'CLOCK.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, January 11, 1845.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE CONSERVATIVE ASSOCIATION.

In addressing the great meeting assembled in the Free-Trade Hall of Manchester on Wednesday night, Mr. Cobden alluded to a meeting of a very different character recently held at Ashton-under-Lyne, where was exhibited a strange illustration of what Vives used to call "puppies tying knots to their own tails," meaning thereby, men assuming to the stigmatising of themselves and of their order, and partly through a spirit of crawling servility, and partly through sheer ignorance. An assembly of the monopolists of the neighbourhood was held in this town, and it was attended by some manufacturers, eager to show that they are willing to take the yoke of the landlords upon their necks, and to sacrifice the dignity of men for the condescension vouchsafed to slaves. "Verily, they had their reward." The very locality added to the deep degradation of these self-abandoned men. Dukinfield, Stayleybridge, and the districts around Ashton-under-Lyne, exhibit the most wondrous example of the prosperity derived from manufactures to be found on the surface of the globe: within the memory of persons yet alive they were waste moors, tenanted by a few cottiers, almost as miserable as the labourers of Dorsetshire; they are now covered with the mills of thriving manufacturers and the houses of prosperous operatives; churches, chapels, and schools amply supply the religious and intellectual wants of a flourishing population; and trade has effected this change, not only without the aid of landed aristocrats, but in the teeth of their positive discouragement. Ashton-under-Lyne, too, preserves in its traditions the honours of ancient feudal rule: the annual ceremony of "riding the black lad" commemorates the tyranny of one of those lords of the soil who swelled his income by plundering the industrious, and anticipated the system of indirect robbery which the Corn Laws have established by undisguised and open plunder. It was in this locality, where everything around was replete with associations of the present blessings of trade and the past curses of landlord domination, that the monopolists assembled to parade to the world the soul-chained serfs who had sold their birthright, and had not the spirit to claim the mess of pottage. It was here that certain manufacturers came to kiss the feet that spurned them, and lick the hand by which they were chastised. The chastisement was inflicted by a person who rejoices in the strange name of Robert de Hollingsworth. How came that Norman de, before the pure Saxon Hollingsworth? Was it inserted through ignorance or through arrogance? Or was it some ancestor, a renegade to the Saxon race, who tried to conciliate the Norman plunderers by an incongruous assumption of their peculiar affectations? The little particle is a significant index either to folly or to falsehood, but it is of little importance to the world whether it be traced to one or the other. This Normanized Saxon, standing in the midst of a manufacturing population, and within ear-shot of thriving manufacturers, actually delivered himself of the following description of the character of a manufacturer who has raised himself by industry and intelligence:—

"He is probably a man who has made his own fortune by one of those lucky chances in trade that have been of such frequent occurrence during the last five and twenty years. He may be a good tradesman, may possess good, natural, sound sense, and by its exercise, by frugality and industry, have raised himself from sweeping a warehouse to become its master. (Loud cheers and laughter.) But what then? What does he know beyond the wuffs of his own counting-house? Totally uneducated, or with such information only as may be gathered from a village school-master, what value would he set on that state-manlike knowledge derived from experience and intercourse with the world? Would he not naturally affect to despise what he could not comprehend, and substitute a degrading cunning for that practical and almost prophetic wisdom, the fruit of the accumulated experience of ages, transmitted to us by the pages of history, the only real instructor of mankind? Is such a man fit to legislate for an empire? Is the calculator of pence to become the distributor of millions? Is such a man, presumptuous from ignorance, to direct our fleets and our armies? Is such a man fit to advise the Crown in its important appointments to the sacred and judicial benches? For what portion, then, of a senator's duty is such a man fit? Is it not rather his proper sphere to sweep the floor of the senate-house, as he has formerly done that of his own warehouse? (Cheers and laughter.)"

We are not at all disposed to quarrel with this philippic of the eloquent Normanized Saxon; he only acted after his kind, for "Its proper power to hurt each creature feels, Bulls aim their horns and asses kick their heels."

The tirade, such as it is, has not even the merit of originality, being a bad imitation of the abuse which the "Cavaliers of 1640" bestowed on "the Brewer of Huntington," of which brewer, who bore the name of Oliver Cromwell, it is possible that Robert de Hollingsworth may have read or heard something. But Robert de Hollingsworth knew his men, and, when he baptized the manufacturers who heard him with the nickname of "sweep," he knew that there would be no necessity for sponsors, because renegades are ever ready to promise and vow all modes and forms of servility and degradation. We sincerely hope that they will retain the baptismal designation which they are so ready to prove that they have richly merited. May their honours wear well, for they have been dearly earned. We write and speak of these men more in sorrow than in anger; there is nothing more painful to contemplate than that slavishness of soul which courts the contumely of insolence towering in its pride of place, which invites contempt and supplicates to be despised. It is a moral anomaly over which the philanthropist weeps, because it shows that human nature can sink farther below zero in the scale of estimation than the most ascetic misanthrope ever ventured to imagine. We lament over such men; we wail over the sight of rational beings submitting to be scorned, insulted, and smitten by a Robert de Hollingsworth. He would not have ventured upon such swagger and bluster before men conscious of their own worth, and firm in their own independence; they would have detected the nature of the animal concealed under the lion's skin, and answered him in the words of Constance:—

"Thou wear a lion's hide! doff it for shame,
And hang a calf-skin on thy recreant limbs."

Mr. Cobden's speech precludes the necessity of further comment on "the sweeps" and their baptizer; he was admirably calculated for the office, as we shrewdly suspect that he previously bestowed the de upon himself.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—M. Villemain's health is reported to be improving. The Constitutionnel mentions a report that, as M. Villemain is almost without fortune, it is the intention of the Cabinet to bring into the Chamber a bill for an honourable provision for his children.

M. Glais-Bizoin has placed on the table of the Chamber of Deputies a petition, signed by a great number of the inhabitants of Paris, praying for a moderate uniform postage on letters.

The intrigue to turn out the Ministry on the right of search question appears to have been broken up, so that the Ministry is now considered safe.

Admiral Dupetit-Thouars received, on Tuesday, the deputation charged to offer him the sword of honour. The Admiral thanked them for their good intentions, but refused this mark of public sympathy, declaring that he had done nothing but obey the orders of his Government, and that it was for it to blame or recompense him.

SPAIN.—The Times correspondent in Madrid writes:—"I am assured that accounts have been received here this day of the safe arrival in Portugal of General Zurbano. He was escorted to the frontier by strong parties of contrabandistas, who relieved each other alternately from post to post; and who faithfully performed their engagement to conduct him safe out of the Spanish territory, notwithstanding the immense reward they knew they were sure of if they had betrayed him to the Government. Private letters from the Basque provinces state that the Carlists are beginning to stir in that part of Spain; and that they are co-operated with by the refugees in France."

A bill has been presented to the Senate, having for its object to carry out a treaty made with England in 1835, by rendering offences connected with the slave trade penal.

PORTUGAL.—A letter from Lisbon of the 25th states that Mr. Toxer, the English gentleman who has been imprisoned in various gaols and fortresses in Lisbon, Coimbra, and Oporto, on a charge of aiding and abetting the designs of the persons implicated in the late revolt, has been brought to trial, after an incarceration of upwards of nine months, and acquitted.

SWITZERLAND.—The Supreme Direction of the federal affairs of Switzerland, which was last year confided to the canton of Lucerne, belongs this year by rotation to the canton of Zurich. As the leading men of this latter canton profess more liberal opinions than those of Lucerne, a considerable change in the federal policy as regards the religious differences is expected to take place.

UNITED STATES.—The St. Patrick, a new packet, arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday evening, bringing papers from the United States to the 16th and 18th ultimo. The Oregon question is again agitated in Congress, a Mr. Duncan having introduced a bill for the extension of the States' jurisdiction over the disputed territory. The bill has been referred to the "Territorial Committee" to deliberate and report upon to the House. The Secretary of the Treasury had presented his annual report. The report does not recommend any immediate reduction of the tariff. It suggests a general revision and reduction, and leaves time for obtaining such information as may allow the change to be made wisely, considerably, and gradually. In regard to the annexation of Texas, private letters agree that there is no immediate chance of its success. There are now two bills before Congress providing for the annexation. One introduced by Mr. McDuffie, the other offered by Mr. Benton. The Senate and House will each be divided between these two measures. Riots and loss of life had taken place in Ohio, originating with slaveowners, and a struggle on the part of some negroes to escape from bondage. A man named Miller was stabbed and killed by some Kentuckians for aiding their escape; and a slave was hung without trial or other ceremony.

THE BRAZILS.—Her Majesty's ship Crane reached Falmouth on the evening of the 7th inst., bringing news from Rio de Janeiro to the 26th of November. There is no news of importance by this conveyance, matters remaining in status quo at the seat of Government. At Macao there had been some little outbreak of the ordinary Brazilian character, to check which a new President, Senhor Lopez Gama, and a considerable number of troops, had been despatched in the Regeneraco corvette, with two frigates and two steamers, and it was expected that the province would be speedily pacified. According to the Rio Mercantile Journal of Nov. 23, business in imports has been dull in the extreme during the week, particularly as regards the most important articles, such as flour, piece-goods, and wines.

PERU.—Some notice has already been taken of the differences which arose more than six months ago between the Government of Peru and the commander of the British vessels in the Pacific. These differences appear to have originated in the refusal of the magistrates of certain places to supply water to a British ship. To mark the sense in which this insolence was felt, the commander fired two guns, which, in the magniloquent style of Peru, is described as the barbarous bombardment of Arica. A negotiation had been commenced in consequence, but nothing definite had been concluded.—Times.

DOMESTIC.

Her Majesty, with her accustomed generosity, has given, we are informed, out of her privy purse, the sum of £1000 a year to Sir Augustus D'Eole, which is equal to the sum Sir Augustus lost by the death of the Duke of Sussex.

It is currently reported that her Majesty has been graciously pleased to appoint Sir Henry Pottinger Governor-General of Canada, in the place of Sir Charles Metcalfe, who is seriously indisposed.—Standard.

A pension of £20 per annum has, through the patronage of Lady Peel, been conferred on Miss Frances Brown, the blind poetess.

It has been stated that a pension on the civil list has been granted to Mr. Thomas Hood, the distinguished comic writer. We understand, however, the fact to be, that a pension of £100 a year has been conferred on Mrs. Hood, the wife of that gentleman, in consideration of his great literary merits, and the infirm state of his health.—Observer.

Mr. Wakley, at an inquest, a few days since, mentioned the case of a woman who, when dying of excessive drinking, required to have a sponge saturated with brandy constantly held to her lips.

The operation for strabismus, or squint, was, last week, successfully performed on a boy, at Leicester, during the mesmeric trance; the patient being, when aroused, utterly unconscious of what had taken place.

By the will of Miss Ann Dimsdale, which has just been proved in Doctors' Commons, bequests to the amount of £26,000 are made to charitable and other institutions, principally in Bristol. The deceased was a member of the Society of Friends.—The Britannia.

The coroner's jury empanelled at Slough, to try in what manner Sarah Hart came by her death, have brought in a verdict of "wilful murder" against John Tawell. Tawell, it appears, is no longer a member of the Society of Friends, having many years ago been disowned by that body in consequence of having committed a forgery, for which he suffered transportation. The evidence on the inquest was altogether circumstantial, and went to establish several important facts, viz.:—The acquaintance of the prisoner with the deceased; his visit to her on the evening of her death; his hurried departure from the house immediately after a neighbour had heard stifled screaming proceeding from it; the finding of the deceased in a dying state, and the subsequent discovery of a deadly poison in her stomach; the finding of a phial bottle in the path which he took to the railway, which was ascertained to contain the remains of the same poison; and other corroborative circumstances.

At the Central Criminal Court, on Tuesday, Robert Hobson, aged 53, was found guilty of stealing the sum of 1s. 10d., the property of the Postmaster-General. And also of embezzling and secreting six newspapers, the property of the Postmaster-General, and sentenced to be imprisoned for one year, with hard labour.

On New Year's Day a riot occurred in Sunderland amongst some of the military, who were intoxicated, and a private, in a fit of drunken frenzy, stabbed and badly wounded a corporal who sought to quell the riot; he then made his escape from the barracks to the town, and proceeding to the river side, threw himself in and was drowned.

An investigation has been going forward relative to an alleged attempt to assassinate Charles Louis de Bourbon, who calls himself the Duke of Normandy. It appears that on Thursday evening, about half-past seven o'clock, the "duke" was at work in his residence at Fulham, at the lathe, which faces the window, and was in the act of polishing a piece of brass, when he was suddenly alarmed at a loud explosion, and the place was momentarily in flames. The report instantly brought Mr. Tucker, the manager, and some of the students in the duke's establishment to the spot. From a hasty examination it was ascertained that a bullet had been fired through the window, from either a blunderbuss or a large cavalry pistol; that it had passed within an inch or two of the duke's head, and made its way through the boarding at the back of the garden. Nothing definite has been brought to light as to the perpetrator; but the duke says it was the act of his political enemies.

The new Lord Mayor of Dublin, Mr. Arabin, gave the usual inauguration dinner at the Mansion-house on Thursday evening. It was attended by all parties amongst the citizens, and passed off with perfect unanimity, and without any reference to political questions. Mr. Arabin is a Protestant.

Tipperary, which possesses such a bad eminence in the annals of crime, has not been remiss during the past year in paying the repeal rent, though not noted for its readiness in paying any other kind of rent. From January to December 23rd, the repeal subscriptions of the county amounted to £3034. 9s. 3d.

The Irish Bequests Act still causes much agitation and excitement in Ireland. On Sunday last the Rev. Mr. Carroll, at the Westland-row Chapel, Dublin, denounced in strong terms those who had lately set the authority of the Church at defiance; and stated on the authority of a magistrate that there was ground to suspect that a conspiracy had been set on foot to take the first public opportunity that might occur to offer violence to the person of Archbishop Murray.

The Repeal Association met as usual on Monday. A letter was read from Mr. O'Connell, enclosing £51, being the amount of his own and his sons and other relatives' subscriptions to the repeal fund for the current year. The total repeal rent for the week was £250.

The Queen's County magistrates have met, and passed a series of resolutions, having for their object the adoption of means to aid the local authorities in protecting the peaceable inhabitants against the predatory gangs who infest the country. They state, as their deliberate opinion, derived from facts communicated to the meeting, and confirmed by the murder which had been recently committed at Rathdowney, "that a system of agrarian combination exists in that and the surrounding districts, which, unless promptly checked, will lead to that more general system of outrage now so prevalent in some of the adjoining counties." They implore the prompt interference of the Government to aid them in their exertions to preserve the public peace, and to afford security against the marauders and murderers.—Globe.

THE FREE-TRADE BAZAAR.—A committee has been formed in Derby, with the view of promoting this object, and we have no doubt that, besides the aid that may be given by sending specimens of the staple manufactures of the town, our fair friends to the cause will ply their needles, and assist the general contribution. We believe it is contemplated to have a Free-Trade celebration in Derby presently.—Derby Reporter.

THE OCCUPATIONS OF THE PEOPLE.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

An absurd article from the Morning Herald, entitled "Fallacies of the League," is at present going the round of the Tory press, the object of which appears to be to show that the Government returns, relating to the occupations of the people, have been garbled to serve the purposes of the Anti-Corn-Law League. By a very singular process of reasoning, the Herald has actually arrived at the conclusion that "agriculture maintains 685,818 families more than manufactures," although the total number of males, 20 years old and upward, who are dependent upon agriculture in Great Britain, as farmers, graziers, labourers, gardeners, nurserymen, and florists, is declared by the census to be only 1,215,264, while the total number of adult males employed in trade and manufactures is 2,039,409.

"Commerce and trade," says the Herald, "in all their multifarious avocations, only employ 1,459,963 male adults, or 191,699 more than agriculture; but the Irish statistics would turn this scale in favour of agriculture. The distinguished art of the Leaguers generally induces them to mix up the numbers employed in trade, commerce, and manufactures, altogether; and thus, by false comparisons, they have circulated the numerous statistical fallacies which have been too readily swallowed by their credulous supporters. The commissioners' returns, however, clearly establish that, even in this manufacturing portion of the United Kingdom, more than twice as many people are supported by agriculture as by manufactures."

Most unquestionably, "the Irish statistics would turn the scale in favour of agriculture;" but would they not also turn it in favour of pauperism and unparalleled destitution? As for the charge brought against "the Leaguers" of having "mixed up the numbers employed in trade, commerce, and manufactures, altogether," we must confess our inability to comprehend it, unless Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham are to be called "Leaguers." In the preface to the "Occupation Abstract," prepared by the commissioners appointed by Government, a book with which the Herald ought to be familiar, when it assumes the office of public instructor on this subject, we find the following statement regarding the principal classes of the population:—

Statement of the Occupations of Males aged 20 years and upwards, in Great Britain, in 1841.

Agriculture, occupiers and labourers .....	1,215,264
Persons engaged in commerce, trade, and manufactures .....	2,039,409
Labourers, employed in labour not agriculture..	610,157
Capitalists, bankers, professional and other educated men.....	286,175

Here, then, we find, according to the Government returns, not quite two persons dependent on agriculture for every five who obtain a living from other sources of employment. Does the Herald still insist that these tables have been dishonestly garbled? In that case it cannot utter a single word of accusation against the League, without involving ministers in a still worse condemnation.

In another part of the same article, the Herald asserts, that, "at the outside, those engaged in manufactures for the foreign export market cannot exceed 120,000;" and these, it is absurdly assumed, are the only persons who can possibly have any interest in promoting freedom of trade. Now, it would be easy to show that the number of persons employed in the production of goods for the export trade cannot be much less than eight times what the Herald reckons it. Taking the annual value of our exports of manufactured goods at £30,000,000, it will be found on examination that not less than £30,000,000 of this represents the wages of those who have been engaged in the production of them. How many persons would that amount furnish with employment? At an average of 10s. per week throughout the whole year, for every individual, it would afford employment to no less than 1,200,000 persons. Now, as there are only about 900,000 agricultural labourers, aged 20 years and upwards, in all Great Britain, and as their average wages are certainly not more than 10s. per week, it follows that the gross amount of wages earned merely by those immediately dependent upon our export trade is one-fourth greater than all the wages earned by all the adult agricultural labourers in England, Scotland, and Wales.

Well may the Herald call the Occupation Abstract "an important document," and naturally enough may it try to garble the statements contained in it. We would remind it, however, that very little purpose is served by perverting the truth so grossly as it has done in the article we have quoted. Indeed, we incline to think that its wiser course would be to refrain from statistics altogether; and, above all, to have nothing to say on the occupations of the people, till Sir Robert Peel brings forward his next measure in favour of Free Trade.

WHEAT AND TITHES.—An account of the average prices of British wheat, barley, and oats in England and Wales, for the seven years ending on Thursday, Dec. 19, 1844, which regulates the commutation of tithes:—

Years ending	Wheat per qr.	Barley per qr.	Oats per qr.
1838	61 7	31 5	22 5
1839	70 8	39 6	25 11
1840	66 4	36 5	26 8
1841	61 4	32 10	22 5
1842	57 3	27 6	19 3
1843	50 1	29 6	18 4
1844	51 6	33 7	20 7

Average of seven

Wheat per qr.	60 8	33 0	22 1
Ditto per bushel	7 6½	4 1½	2 9

The tithes payable for 1844 were £104. 3s. 5½d. per cent. for the year 1845 it will be about £104. 3s. 2½d.; 2½d. per cent. only less than last year.

Hay has attained the price of £6. 6s. per ton at Marlbury, and it is feared will for some time continue to rise. It is computed that the weekly consumption of hay in this town averages £870 worth per week, and of oats £510 worth; such is the large number of horses employed in the works.

FRENCH TRADE TO CHINA.—The Press states, that the information furnished by the special commissioners sent to China, as to the probability of finding markets for our produce, is not of a nature to justify the hopes of the French merchants. The monopoly of the most important articles of manufacture appears to be secured to the English and Americans, with whom it will be difficult to com-tend in the supply of white and unbleached calicoes. The exportation of muslins and cambrics has been tried by the English, but has not succeeded. Our woollens might find a better chance of success, but even that is not certain, because the Chinese prefer cotton, which they wear single in summer and wadded in winter. The Russians, moreover, have monopolized the Chinese markets for cloth. Our printed calicoes might perhaps find a market if our manufacturers could reduce their price. Until the present moment the Swiss have been in possession of the markets for that article. In the year 1843 the Americans exported 1,000,000 pieces of unbleached cotton. That amount was nearly doubled in the year 1844. In April last, the warehouses in the interior of Canton were overloaded with British and American manufactures. We may conclude from the information received that the Government does not expect much advantage from the expensive expedition sent to China. Thus are confirmed the doubts we expressed on the departure of M. Lagrenée.

SUNDERLAND, Jan. 2.—The shipping interest of the north has not been for many years in such a flourishing state as it is at present. The freights to London for coals are as high as 10s. 6d. and 11s. per ton, at which rates the owners of vessels of a moderate burden are clearing from £60 to £80 per voyage; foreign freights are in proportion, and sailors' wages are generally £5 per month or London voyage. Yesterday a crew signed articles at the neighbouring port of Shields for £5. 10s. Shipbuilding, as may be naturally expected, is on the increase, and Sunderland, which last year was sunk into a state of the greatest depression, is now rapidly rising into a state of prosperity.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, Jan. 6.—The supply of English Wheat this morning was only moderate; the prices of this day week were maintained, but the demand was far from brisk. There was also a slow sale for Foreign at former rates. With Foreign and English Barley together, there was rather a large supply; the value of all descriptions remains the same as last week. Beans were 1s. cheaper. No alteration in the value of Peas. Notwithstanding the wind has continued favourable for the arrival of the supplies of Oats from Ireland there is very little addition to the quantity since Friday; there were, however, in addition, a considerable quantity of Scotch, which—the time for clearing the vessels being short—are 1s. cheaper than this day week; the inferior qualities of Irish, which were rather over their value compared with other descriptions, were also 1s. lower. Fine qualities of Foreign maintain former rates.

FRIDAY, Jan. 10.—The supplies of English Wheat since Monday are larger than usual; a considerable quantity is direct to the millers, who are not therefore buyers of what is offering for sale. Those who have not so provided themselves exhibit no disposition to purchase, and it would be difficult to effect sales to any extent even if a reduction of price was submitted; as it is, prices are nominally the same as on Monday. The supply of Barley is fully equal to the demand, but Monday's rates are maintained for all descriptions. In addition to a good supply of Irish Oats, a considerable quantity of English and Scotch have arrived since Monday. There is the same indisposition to stock themselves evinced by the dealers that we have had occasion to report so frequently of late, and the sale of all descriptions is slow; and a decline of 6d. from Monday must be submitted to for out-of-condition samples, but fine fresh corn is held firmly at former rates. There is no alteration in the value of Beans and Peas. The only alteration in the duties, yesterday, was an advance of 1s. on Beans.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, $100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication, for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Office of THE LEAGUE, Newell's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quentin Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund. By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

Manchester, Jan. 13, 1845.

The League Bazaar will be held during the month of May next, in the Theatre Royal Covent Garden.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Office either in London or Manchester.

Persons wishing to be on the Register next year, as Freeholders for County Votes, must be in possession of the property, or in the receipt of the rents and profits, before the 31st of January.

QUALIFY, QUALIFY, QUALIFY.

PRACTICAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR ELECTORAL QUALIFICATION.

The electors for counties are as follows:—Freeholders, copyholders, leaseholders, occupying tenants.

FREEHOLDERS.—The following persons are entitled to vote as freeholders:—1. Any person possessed of a freehold estate for himself and his heirs, or as it is called, an estate of inheritance, of the yearly value of 40s. 2. Any person possessed of a freehold estate for life or lives of the yearly value of £10. 3. Any person possessed of such an estate for life or lives of the yearly value of 40s., under any one of the following circumstances:—If the estate was acquired on or before the 7th of June, 1832; or since, if by marriage or marriage settlement, by devise (i.e., by will), or by promotion to any benefice or office, or if the freeholder is himself the actual occupier of the property. In any of these cases it is sufficient if the property be of the yearly value of 40s. Parish clerks, sextons, schoolmasters, Dissenting ministers, and holders of offices have a right to vote if entitled to emoluments of 40s. per annum, arising out of, or charged upon, land, and may be registered as voters in the parish wherein the land is situated. The appointment must, however, be for life, not for a temporary purpose, or at the pleasure of any other party; but an appointment during good behaviour is considered to be an appointment for life. If the freeholder occupy his own freehold property in a borough, of such a nature and value as would confer upon him the right to vote for the borough, he will not be entitled, in respect of that property, to vote for the county. But if the freehold be not of the right of voting for the borough, that is, if it be not of the annual value of £10, or if it be land without building, the freeholder may vote for the county, though he occupy it himself. And if the freeholder do not occupy his freehold estate within a borough, he may then vote in respect of it for the county, and his tenant may also vote for the borough. Six months' possession prior to the 31st of July will entitle a freeholder to be registered. And if the freehold lands or tenements should have come to him by descent, succession, marriage, marriage-settlement, will, or promotion to any benefice in a church, or to any office, no definite period of previous possession will be necessary.

COPYHOLDERS.—Any person possessed of any lands or tenements of the clear yearly value of £10, whether of copyhold or any other tenure than freehold, is entitled to vote. Tenants in ancient demesne may in general vote as freeholders, if they do not hold by copy of court-roll, but otherwise they will be entitled as copyholders. As freeholders, 4s. per annum will be sufficient; but as copyholders, £10 a year is required. The same period of possession previous to registration is required, in respect to copyholders, as in respect to freeholders. Copyhold property within a borough, if of such a nature as would qualify any person to vote for the borough, will not, under any circumstances, give a right to vote for the county.

LEASEHOLDERS.—The right of voting in respect of leasehold property extends to—1. Any person who is entitled by virtue of a lease made or assigned to him of any lands or tenements for the unexpired residue of any term originally created for a period of not less than 60 years, if the property is of the clear yearly value of £10 above all rents and charges. 2. Any person who is in like manner entitled to the unexpired residue of a term originally of 20 years, if the lands and tenements are of the clear yearly value of £50. The party to whom the lease was originally made, or a party to whom such lease may have assigned the original lease, may vote, though not in occupation of the premises. Any sub-lessee or assignee of an under-lease may also vote, but only when in occupation of the premises. Lessees or assignees must have been in actual possession for 12 months previous to the 31st of July, unless the qualification is acquired, by any of the modes before mentioned as excepted; that is to say, by the death of a relative, by marriage, by will, or by promotion to any benefice or office. Leasehold property in a borough, if of such nature and value as will give any person a vote for the borough, will not give a vote for the county.

OCCUPYING TENANT.—Any person occupying lands or tenements for which he is liable to pay a yearly rent of £50 is entitled to vote, if not within a borough, and not of such nature as would qualify a person to vote for the borough. In respect of the period of previous possession required, occupying tenants are placed on the same footing as leaseholders; but it is not requisite that the occupation be of the same lands or tenements: different lands and tenements occupied in immediate succession for twelve months previous to the 31st of July in each year will give the qualification.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.—Besides lands, houses, buildings, and the like, property and interests of the following description will entitle the owner to be registered and to vote, viz.—tithes, an annuity charged on land, a rent-charge,* fee-farm rents issuing out of an estate in fee; shares in navigable rivers, canals, &c., where the shareholders possess an interest in the soil; tolls of bridges, tolls of fairs and markets, purchases of unrode land-tax. Persons who have entered into an agreement of purchase of property, or who have paid any part of the purchase-money, or done any other act in part performance of the agreement, are considered to have equitable estates, and are entitled to vote and to be registered. Joint tenants and tenants in common have each a right to vote, provided the property be of sufficient amount to give to the share of each the value required. Mortgages may vote, if in actual possession or in receipt of the rents and profits, but not otherwise. Trustees are expressly excluded from voting for any trust estate; the right of voting in respect of trust property is reserved for the cestui que trust. In estimating the value of freehold or copyhold property, the marketable value of the property to let is the criterion to be attended to. If, owing to accidental circumstances, the rent should be less than might be obtained, the property will still give a right to vote. As regards leaseholds, the value required does not depend on the amount of rent. It is to be estimated by the profit which the tenant can make of the property, over and above the amount of rent reserved and any encumbrance charged on the property. The value required is to be "above all rents and charges." Under these words are included all encumbrances affecting the property, but not any public or parliamentary taxes.

BOROUGH FRANCHISE FOR 1845.

In order to secure a borough vote next year, those who occupy premises giving a qualification should immediately see that their names are placed on the poor's rate-book.

A claimant must be rated, or have claimed to be rated, to all rates made during the year ending the 31st of July. If, therefore, his name is omitted from any rate made during that time, he should immediately claim to be rated. The overseers are required to put the name of a person so claiming on the rate last made; consequently, if the claimant suffers two rates to be made before he claims, he will be unable to get upon the former one, and will thereby lose his vote for one year.

No particular form of claim to be rated is prescribed by the Reform or Registration Acts; but the following form may be adopted:—

"CLAIM TO BE RATED."

"To the Overseers of the Parish of _____
"I hereby give you notice that I occupy a _____ at No. _____ in _____ Street, in your parish, and I claim to be rated to the relief of the poor in respect of such premises, in order that I may be entitled to vote in the election of a member (or members) of Parliament for the city (or borough) of _____.

"Dated this _____ day of _____, 1844.

Insert the name of the parish, the nature of the premises, as house, shop, room, or as the case may be, and the name of the street, &c., and of the city or borough, also the date. The christian and surname and place of residence of the claimant should be inserted at full length. Give the claim to an overseer, keeping a correct copy, on which should be written the date when, and the name of the overseer on whom, it was served. If any poor's rates are due for the premises at the time of making the claim they must be paid, or the amount due tendered. Should the overseer refuse to accept the money, or omit to enter the claimant's name in the rate-book, he will be deemed to be rated notwithstanding; but, if the claimant's name be omitted from any future rate, he should again claim to be rated.

* No registration of annuities or rent-charges with the clerk of the peace is requisite. The 3rd Geo. III. c. 24, is repealed.

WAGES THE TRUE DEPENDENCE OF THE WORKING MAN.

We have no desire at present to revive the allotment controversy, which we are well satisfied to leave as it stands, until the parliamentary discussion of the subject, promised us for the ensuing session, shall give it practical interest. But we cannot refrain from noticing a curious and instructive contrast recently exhibited by the Morning Post, between the speculations of one column and the facts of another, which must startle, we should think, the most hopeful advocate of that remedy for the ills of the labouring classes.

The Post is, editorially, of opinion that it is a great misfortune for British working men to be dependent on wages. According to the Post's view of the condition of England question, dependence on wages is the canker-spot on our body politic, the prime evil of our social condition; and nothing will go well with us while it lasts. The Post "grants that the English labourers, as a body (it is clearly not speaking of the protected section of labourers), eat more animal food, burn more fuel, and have more frequent changes of raiment, than the continental labourers." But then the continental labourers have the immense advantage of being "less dependent upon wages." Our contemporary says:—

"The labourers of France and Germany work for themselves more than for masters. They depend more upon the direct produce of their labour than upon wages received from employers. This is very often a great inconvenience to enterprising capitalists, who require work to be done at a time when the labourers choose rather to work for themselves. But in France and Germany the laws and customs of the country do not sacrifice the humbler classes to the interests of enterprising capitalists. * * Except in the few manufacturing towns and villages, wages, on the Continent, form rather an occasional than a complete and constant source of the people's subsistence. They have some plot of ground, or some little business of their own, which is their chief dependence, and, though they work for wages a considerable part of the year, they are not wholly dependent upon wages. They have more liberty than is enjoyed by the poor in this boasted land of liberty, for here the freedom is theoretical, while the tyranny of circumstances is absolute. The great mass of the people are without property, and must be continually the servants of the comparatively few who have property. Under no other system, we grant, could the great works be done, and the great fortunes be made, which are done and made in England. But we doubt that the happiness or the virtue of this British people is promoted by the great works which are done, and the great fortunes which are made. * * * It is, we believe, unquestionably true, that the occasional superiority of the condition of the British labourer is one of his misfortunes. We believe it would be much better for him if he were not the sport of the great capitalist's shifting interests or changing views—it he were not at one time highly paid, and, at another, thrown off without any support at all, to suffer all the miseries of poverty. At certain periods the British labourer has indulgences which it were much better for him that he had never been acquainted with. We should rather see his condition more equal, and more independent of the vicissitudes of trade."

The Post need not have gone so far as France and Germany for illustrations of the advantages of making working men independent of wages. There is a country within the limits of the United Kingdom, whose "humbler classes" suffer as little as possible from the molestation of "enterprising capitalists," and are rarely troubled with the execution of "great works." In Ireland "wages form rather an occasional than a complete and constant source of the people's subsistence." The Irish peasantry have usually "some plot of ground" which is "their chief dependence;" and, "though they work for wages" during a "part of the year," they are as far as possible from being "wholly dependent upon wages." This singular omission of our contemporary's is, however, the less to be regretted, as it is amply supplied by one of his correspondents in a neighbouring column, writing under the signature of "Miles Emeritus," and the implied editorial sanction of leaded type. "Miles Emeritus" concludes a letter on "Currency and Labour" with the following significant comment on the doctrine of independence of wages:—

"I write from Ireland, where the desperate competition for land is producing such frightful consequences in wholesale murder. Why should there be such scenes enacted in any country? Few words will answer the question. This is the reason: no man can support himself by the sweat of his brow without land in his own possession, for his labour's market price will not buy food for himself, to say nothing of his family. * * * Sir Robert Peel may rest satisfied that no concordat, no Charitable Bequests Bill, no interference between landlord and tenant, will ever produce quiet in Ireland, or stop bloodshed, until he legislates to raise the market price of labour, and to allow the population to live without having land in possession. * * * The fact is, that nine-tenths of the misery of Ireland must be attributed to the fact that there is no remunerating price for labour, and that, until this be set to rights, all other measures are like attempting to bale out the Atlantic with a bowl dish."

It has been remarked, as a creditable characteristic of the English press, that, however one-sided and partisan may be its editorial leaders, it gives all sorts of facts and opinions tolerably fair play in its columns of news and correspondence. We have seldom seen this impartiality of the broad sheet more happily exemplified than in last Wednesday's Post. The editor tells us that dependence on wages is a grievance, and that independence, with "some plot of ground," is the true thing; but, with admirable candour, he allows "Miles Emeritus" to tell us at the same time that the consequence of this transference of the labourer's reliance from wages to "some plot of ground" is, simply, "WHOLESALE MURDER." The editor much doubts whether the happiness and virtue of the British people are promoted by the great works which are done under the stimulus of wages: the correspondent is quite sure that bloodshed will never cease in Ireland until the régime of wages shall be fully established. The desideratum of the one writer is the abomination of the other. The editor thinks things will never go right in England till labourers learn to dispense with wages (except "occasionally"), and make their tenure of life contingent on their tenure of land: the correspondent is clear that there will be no quiet in Ireland until a good market rate of wages shall have made Irishmen careless of possessing land; and that, "until this be set to rights, all other measures are like attempting to bale out the Atlantic with a bowl dish."

We need scarcely say that in this matter we go with "Miles Emeritus." The great want of Ireland is precisely that which Great Britain has—enterprising capitalists, great works, public and private, and a consequent demand for labour, to whose steadiness and sufficiency the Corn Law and its associated monopolies are the only serious obstacle. And the great danger of Great Britain is, lest a longer continuance of monopolist policy, and of the aggravated miseries which it inflicts on all classes of labourers, and on the agricultural labourers most of all, should throw us on an Irish state of society by way of remedy. A densely-crowded pauper population, without a market for their labour—dependent for existence not on wages of labour, but on pitiful patches of potato-ground—and, consequently, fighting with their landlords and with one another for potato-ground, as for life;—this, the very ideal of domestic misery and social disorganization, is what the Post's political economy would inevitably realize. Transfer the labourer's dependence from wages to land, make land his first necessary of life—and, with a fast-growing population on a limited soil, we should not be long of making a second Ireland.

But our purpose in noticing these lucubrations of our contemporary is not so much to reiterate old objections to his remedy for the case of the labourer, as to protest against his statement of the evil to be remedied. "Dependence on wages" is, in his view, the grand grievance of our labouring classes. Monopoly has, it must be allowed, odd notions on the point of "independence": it would have a commercial country independent of foreigners, and a labouring population independent of employers. But will the Post tell us why it need be a grievance for English working men to depend on wages? Dependence on wages—like every other sort of dependence—is good or evil according to the reliability or unreliability of the thing depended on. Dependence on wages is not, necessarily and in itself, an undesirable condition of existence. In a stationary or declining country, it is—but not in a growing country: the mischief is, that monopoly does so much to stop England from growing. Where there is plenty of profitable work to be done, and of capital to do it—i.e., where there is a natural and permanent demand for labour—the labourer's dependence on wages is just as safe as the landlord's dependence on labour, or the tradesman's dependence on custom, or the farmer's dependence on sun and rain, or the fundholder's dependence on public credit, or the State's dependence on the instinct or habit of popular obedience. In some conditions of society, the labourer dependent on wages is, in fact, the only independent member of the community. For our own part, we see not the shadow of a reason why dependence on wages should be deprecated as an evil in the case of the British labourer. Monopolist legislation apart, we have in these islands all the elements necessary to make one of the best labour-markets in the world. With untold millions of hoarded capital seeking profitable investment; with watery energy and inexhaustible fertility of enterprise in the owners of this capital; with manufacturing superiority, natural and acquired, maritime ascendancy, and an insular position lying convenient for all the commerce of the globe; with hundreds of millions of customers in the eastern and western worlds, wanting the very things we are best able to give, and ready and willing to pay for them with the things we most need to receive,—there is no reason whatever why our working men should be afraid of dependence on wages. The English labourer has work enough cut out for him by nature to last for centuries: all he need ask is leave to do it. It is quite a mistake to call England an "old" country: England never was younger—never had more growing power—than in this year 1845. The wages-fund of Great Britain is perfectly capable of multiplying at the same rate with the claimants on it. Population may grow as it will: there is no danger, in the nature of things, of the numerical relations of masters and men, who are looking out for one another, being altered prejudicially to the latter. Only let the "enterprising capitalists" and their "great works" alone, and they are quite competent to the greatest work of all, that of meeting a rapidly-increasing demand for wages with a rapidly-increasing supply. Providence has laid on the capital of these islands the enormous burden of taking on a thousand new hands daily: but the capital of these islands is perfectly well able—give it room enough—to bear the burden.

Naturally, the demand for labour in this country is as steadily progressive—affords as good and solid a ground of reliance for a labouring population—as any people need desire. The "vicissitudes of trade" come not of the laws of trade, but of the laws of Parliament; and the "occasional superiority of the condition of the British labourer," which the monopolist organ deprecates as a "misfortune," might just as well be made habitual, for anything that Providence has enacted to the contrary. That at this time, in this country, wages are a precarious source of dependence to a working man, is purely the doing of monopoly. The British labour market is, naturally, as good a market as need be; but monopoly steps in and spoils it, by driving away the purchasers. The capital, the labour, and the field for their mutually profitable action—nature has them all ready waiting; but monopoly interdicts their union. Monopoly talks, at agricultural dinners, of the "importance" and "duty" of providing employment for labourers. Monopoly legislates, in Parliament, to make the employment of labourers, in ways which Nature has provided, penal. Monopolist philanthropy is certainly most oddly constituted. It first makes payment of wages a statutable offence, and then turns round to condole with the labourer on the precariousness of wages as a source of dependence, and to recommend, as a substitute, "some plot of ground."

We beg our readers of the working classes—who, after all, are the party chiefly interested in this matter—to note well what is implied in the doctrine of the landlord organ, and in the allotment philanthropy in general. The Post tells them that it is a bad thing for Englishmen to be dependent on wages; which is just a civil and circuitous way of saying that they, the working classes, are not wanted in England. The rationale of this alleged precariousness of wages is an assumed slackness of demand, or superfluity of supply. The working man, as a working man, has come to be a drag on the market. By wages of labour the English labourer must no longer hope to live; but philanthropy will see what it can do to find something for him instead of wages—"some plot of ground," perhaps. In the Post's philosophy, England has done growing (except in the matter of population). We have reached the limit of our industrial power. We are a used-up people. Our working men are now rather in the way; and the problem for philanthropy to solve is, how to put them gently and kindly out of the way. The Post's answer to the question, What is to be done with the labouring classes? is—anything and everything, except make them valuable as labourers. That is quietly taken for granted to be a permanent, intrinsic impossibility. The true working man's paradise—a state of things in which two masters are looking out for one man—has no place in the wildest day-dreams of landlord and monopolist benevolence. The fundamental hypothesis of this benevolence—that working men must give over believing in wages—is one of absolute despair. Those working men who have recently participated in, or benefited indirectly by, or sympathizingly witnessed, a successful strike, will need no aid from us to criticize the soundness of this dismal philosophy, or to judge how it strikes at the root of the honour and independence of their order.

And what would the Post and its patrons substitute for the dreaded and deprecated "dependence on wages?"

"Some plot of ground," to grow potatoes in:—held, at landlord's pleasure, by the tenure of good behaviour, at a rent determined by landlord's good nature: of which good nature, Corn Laws and Game Laws are the most authentic specimens we at present possess. One would sometimes think, indeed, from the way landlord philanthropy talks after dinner, that "allotment" means land given by a rich man to a poor man as a present, in fee simple, to make the poor man independent of the rich man. We can assure all working men, manufacturing and agricultural, that this is not what is meant. Without professing to be deep in landlord counsels, we can state positively that there is no intention to make a general division of land. The Post does run out a little sometimes against the property-law of the country, and is apt to be Jacobinical when Parliament is not sitting, on the subject of title-deeds and estates of inheritance—which may tend to mislead provincial readers; but it is fully understood, in the best-informed political circles of the metropolis, that Lord Ashley will not bring in an agrarian bill next session.

After all, it is idle speculating on the advantages or disadvantages of "dependence on wages." Whether desirable or undesirable, dependence on wages is, once for all, a settled, permanent fact in the public economy of Great Britain—as is the rapid numerical increase of the labouring population. There is no help for it. Allotment system, or no-allotment system, this is the fact, and will remain the fact, to all present appearance, so long as England remains a country:—the chief dependence of the labourer is on wages of labour, and wages of labour can only be paid out of profits of capital. To obstruct the profitable employment of capital is to obstruct the payment of wages, and turn a natural and necessary fact into an artificial curse. The labouring man's only chance of rising is in the rising value of his labour; the value of his labour is measured by the demand for it; and the intensity or sharpness of the demand for labour, in this commercial and manufacturing country, mainly depends on our access to, or exclusion from, foreign markets. Every foreign market gained is money in the working man's pocket, and independence in his soul—every foreign market lost is a lapse in the direction of pauperism and servility. There is no sort of harm in the "plot of ground," if the working man likes it. Let him buy it freehold, and he will find excellent virtues in his plot of ground—political enfranchisement among the number. His social and personal independence, however, in no way rests on his growing his own potatoes. The true security for this is a strong and steady run on the labour market, in the shape of heavy orders from China, America, and Brazil.

THE LANDLORDS' LAST.

At the great meeting at Manchester, reported in our columns last week, Mr. Cobden said, in the course of some cruel allusions to the various "opposition shops" of landlord philanthropy—the emigration concern, the allotment concern, and the like—"What would be the next opposition affair he did not know; but, whatever it might happen to be, ten to one but it would assume the cloak of humanity, in order to deceive honest and not very shrewd people." Landlordism has lost no time in fulfilling, as usual, Mr. Cobden's prediction. Within the past week the new opposition affair has made its appearance; and a delectable affair it is—gracefully cloaked with humanity, and not ill-adapted to the capacities of those "honest and not very shrewd people" whose gullibility is landlordism's stronghold. Our contemporary of the Morning Post favoured the world, on Tuesday last ("from a correspondent"), with the following prospectus of the new concern:—

"The great disparity which exists, and for many years has existed, between the price of wheat and the price of bread, has been well known to every one who has paid attention to the subject. The public are aware that formerly the price of bread in the metropolis was regulated by the Lord Mayor, who fixed it according to the price of wheat, allowing a handsome profit to the miller and the baker. This law, called the law of assize, was repealed; it was imagined that Free Trade in grinding and making bread would cause such competition among the millers and the bakers that the public would obtain their flour and bread cheaper; but experience has proved that millers and bakers find it more profitable to combine than to compete, and the consequence is, that although the public pay a very high price for their bread, an association is about to be formed, for the benevolent purpose of supplying the poor with bread at prices more in proportion to the price of wheat than they at present pay. The profits of the association are to be limited to five per cent., consequently all profits beyond that will be applied to the reduction of the price of bread. Now, when it is considered that the price of bread in London is generally about forty-four per cent. higher than in Paris, although the British farmer, notwithstanding his greater burden, supplies wheat within thirteen per cent. of the French farmer, it is obvious that the price of bread might be very considerably lowered. We will assume that bread, with wheat averaging 40s., might be sold 2d. per loaf cheaper than at present; but let us be very moderate, and say that, by means of the association, it is only lowered 1d. That 1d. per loaf, taking the population of London at only 1,600,000 souls, and allowing 11lb. of bread per diem for each individual, would enable the population of London to save in hard cash no less a sum than £550,464 per annum, or to consume 22,738,000 more loaves of 4lb. each. This association will likewise prove a fact for which we have often contended—that the high price of bread is not to be attributed to the Corn Laws, or to what is called the grasping monopoly of the landed interest. It will prove that the high price of bread is not to be laid at their door, for the farmers sell their wheat at a price, which, under a different system, would enable the public to obtain bread as low as the most sanguine advocates for a repeal of the Corn Laws could desire. Indeed, we very much question whether any alteration in the Corn Laws would benefit the consumer of bread more than 1d. per loaf, although their repeal would be ruinous to the British farmer, for 1d. in a loaf is equal to from 8s. to 10s. a quarter in wheat."

This association, therefore, of bread and the rate of cul the agric association repeal of be obliged cry has ob not run the timental le

This association, if ably and honestly carried out, will, therefore, virtually effect as much reduction in the price of bread as a repeal of the Corn Laws, without lowering the rate of wages or the price of wheat, or throwing land out of cultivation. It is a matter of great moment with the agricultural interest to make known that such an association is about to be formed, for the advocates of a repeal of the Corn Laws whose cry is 'Cheap bread' will be obliged to abandon the vantage ground this popular cry has obtained for them, for the consumers of bread will not run the risk of having their wages lowered to the continental level."

Really, these boys will be the death of us. We have seen many odd things within the six years and more of our agitation, but of all our Corn-Law experiences this is about the oddest. Here we have the very landlords themselves crying out against "combination" to raise prices (the fastest thief cries loudest first)—extolling the virtues of cheapness—telling us that, after all, cheap bread does not mean low wages—and getting up a joint-stock cheap-bread company. They have got one monopoly, and they want another to mend it. They have long grown our corn dear—they insist now on baking our bread cheap, to square the account. They have turned their particular attention to the baking business, and will contract to do it cheaper than any other house in town. They answer an indictment for fraud, by asking for our custom in a new line. It is as if one caught a thief in the fact, with the property on him, and the fellow buttoned his pocket and collared somebody else, and offered to do policeman's duty on him. We are shockingly cheated in our bread, they tell us—a penny in every loaf we eat, making "no loss a sum than £568,464 per annum, hard cash," for the population of London alone. The League are right enough, after all, in saying that dear bread does not help the payment of the national debt; and that cheap bread has nothing to do with low wages; and that artificial dearth of the first necessary article of life is a cruel and infamous poll-tax. Only the League happens to be mistaken in thinking that the high price of bread is to be "attributed to the Corn Laws, or to what is called the grasping monopoly of the landed interest." Nothing of the sort. It is all the millers' and bakers' doing. The millers and bakers all over London, and all over England, are in combination. Depend upon it, there's where it is, gentlemen. They "combine," gentlemen, instead of competing—there are so few of them, and they live so near together, and they are on such excellent terms with one another. It is a great shame, gentlemen, and you must please let us see to it. What business have millers and bakers to combine? Why should millers and bakers make more than the well-known ordinary maximum of trading profit, five per cent. per annum on the capital invested? Millers have no mortgages, and bakers' daughters don't want marriage portions. These millers and bakers want looking after, gentlemen, and we are the men to do it. Nobody shall take you in, if we can help it, but ourselves. Only give us the milling and baking business, and we will promise to put your bread at as low a figure "as the most sanguine advocate for a repeal of the Corn Laws could desire."

It is undeniable that landlordism here presents itself in an attitude at once novel and fascinating—i.e., to all those good people whose honesty is unqualified by shrewdness. A lord in a baker's apron, for the good of his country and his kind, is certainly a spectacle to do any man's heart good. Feudalism behind a counter, in the cause of humanity and the poor, speaks volumes for the progress of civilization. How soon the attractive prospect thus held out to our hopes is likely to be realized we are unable to say confidently. The squires will not, we fear, come to town and open shop during the shooting season; but, if we may credit our private letters, preparations are in a forward state. His Grace the Duke of Buckingham has consented, in the kindest manner, to put himself in training at a private oven immediately on the termination of the royal festivities at Stowe; and the noble proprietor of Goodwood, delighted at the notion of combining the retail of loaves with his wholesale fish concern, has handsomely entered his prize roarer to run in the first cart, at five per cent. interest on the Southampton valuation.

In the midst of so much to encourage there is, we are sorry to say, some matter for regret, and even apprehension. The association will not, we understand, have the distinguished aid and countenance of Lord Ashley. His lordship sets his face against the thing altogether, referring the disappointed applicants for his patronage to his recent declaration at the great needlewomen's meeting, when "he wished to impress upon the meeting, for he felt it very deeply himself, the very great evil arising in all directions from that constant and unceasing effort to get everything—not only the common trumperies of life, but even the greatest necessities—at the very minimum of remuneration." His lordship positively declines being made a party to a scheme for minimizing the remuneration of the capital and labour invested in the milling and baking branches of British industry, and which, in its more general operation, must, he conceives, produce a demoralising effect on the public mind. To offer this stimulus to the unhealthy popular craving for "greatest necessities" at the smallest cost must, in his judgment, lead to very great evil. Coats or quarters, trousers or twists, shirts or shortbread—it is all one. His lordship objects to cheapness and cheap shops, on principle. We are told that his lordship's argument has had considerable weight with some of the original promoters of the scheme, and that symptoms have already been manifested of an alarming and extensive schism. Another difficulty, too, has been started, which threatens to paralyse the whole concern. As the members of the association very generally repudiate the principle of buying in the cheapest market, it has naturally occurred to some of the longer heads that they will have to buy their corn and flour above the Mark-lane price—to pay a considerably higher rent for their premises than the landlord asks (at least, supposing the landlord has a family of small children)—to adjust all clerks' salaries and porters' wages, not by the rules of trade, but by the principles of philanthropy—and, in general to give more for everything they use than it is worth in the market. All which, when added to the five per cent. interest on the capital employed, will, it is apprehended, sadly narrow the margin of surplus profit, and bring into serious doubt the society's ability to perform its promise of saving the Londoners £568,464 per annum, hard cash. What prospect exists of this difficulty being solved we are not informed, further than that it has been proposed, as a via media, by some of the parliamentary supporters of the scheme, to profess the principle of philanthropy "in the abstract," and manage the practical business of the shop on the ordinary shop principle.

We do not know whether any of our readers will expect a serious word from us on this deliciously-absurd business. We should find it next to impossible to say one; and must give them credit for combining with their honesty a sufficient amount of shrewdness, natural and acquired, to dispense with anything like a grave discussion of the statistics and economics of this piece of moonshine. Whether milling and baking are, upon the whole, taking one year with another, extraordinarily and extravagantly prosperous trades—whether millers and bakers make fortunes much faster than other folks—and, if they do, why there are not more of them—are queries which suggest their own answer. If the new Joint Stock Milling and Baking Company begin business with an ignorance of its first principles, which allows them to imagine that five per cent. per annum of interest on the capital employed is a living profit, we can only say that they are more likely to become dangerous to their creditors than to their competitors.

We accept, meanwhile, for what it is worth, the landlord admissions, that artificially-created dearth of bread is a wrong to the community, and a crime on the part of the selfish and greedy combination that inflicts it—and that cheap bread has no connexion with low wages. As it is stated to be "a matter of great moment with the agricultural interest" to get the prospectus of the new association well advertised, we cheerfully tender the agricultural interest our heartiest co-operation. Eight or ten shillings extra on the quarter of wheat—equal to a penny on the four-pound loaf—and a penny on the loaf equal to an annual tax of more than half a million sterling, in hard cash, for the population of London alone: if the gentlemen of the agricultural interest think they have any end to serve by setting people's minds going in this track, most assuredly the League will not stand in their way.

As for the association itself, we wish it all manner of success. The good works of this new fraternity of bread-cheapeners shall have, not our tolerance merely, but our active patronage. If we like their bread we will eat it, and recommend it. We trust, however, we may be permitted to add, without offence, that, after the taste we have had of these lords and gentlemen in their law-making capacity, we shall invariably insist on seeing our loaves weighed.

THE BAZAAR.

On the 4th of the present month, the Cambria steamer, for the United States, took out a large number of a prospectus of the Bazaar, embracing many of the points included in the one in circulation in this country, with others explanatory of the grounds on which the Council of the League seeks the co-operation of the friends of Free Trade in that country.

It is intended to insert this in the journals published in all the leading cities of the United States and Canada; so that in a short time the intention of the Council to hold the Bazaar will be disseminated through the whole of the northern part of the American continent, together with full information respecting the means of transmitting the contributions to England. The following extract from the paper referred to, will exhibit the character of the appeal thus made to the American public:—

"The Anti-Corn-Law League seek, by constitutional means alone, the abolition of all duties levied for the protection of any particular interest in this country. They seek no exclusive privileges for Great Britain. Free Trade with all the world, without drawback or qualification, is their watchword. They attack the Corn Laws as the fruitful parent of innumerable social evils—the keystone of the system of restriction; and, viewing the connexion of this great question with the world's progress, they will persevere till the object is attained.

"Free Trade is not the question of one particular class, nor even of a single nation. Circumstances seem to point out England as the battle-field of this great principle; and all who desire to see the arts of peace flourish—civilization extending her limits, and national antipathies vanish before the humanizing influence of commerce—should identify themselves with this movement."

We trust that such of our readers as have relatives or friends resident in these countries, will urge this matter upon their attention; and we hope that the next mail that leaves our shores will bear many invitations to unite in assisting a cause which is equally interesting and important to England and America.

We subjoin, as usual, some extracts from the correspondence of the past week:—

"MY DEAR SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 30th ult., I hasten to assure you that the subject of the Bazaar has not escaped my attention. We are not without parties who are employing themselves in the good cause.

"My friend Mr. Maw, of West-hill House, will contribute some scarce and valuable engravings, and is exercising his unrivalled talents as an amateur artist, by painting an attractive picture for the Bazaar. I have no doubt he will do more than he speaks of. The family of Benjamin Smith, Esq., M.P. for Norwich, who are residing here, have for some time been engaged in making a number of fancy matters usually current at bazaars; and one of our principal mechanics has his family similarly engaged; his name is Thwaites; and I am told that he has already quite a show of very pretty fancy articles. I intend to send a valuable old picture, in a costly and elegant frame, as my own contribution, which ought to bring a good price.

"DEAR SIR,—Our committee have taken into consideration the subject of the Bazaar, and I am instructed to say we are fully alive to its interest, and purpose having a stall of our own manufactured goods; and hope we shall be able to get one or two ladies to superintend the same.

"DEAR SIR,—In reply to your letter, received some time since, relative to the Bazaar, I write to say that I shall feel much pleasure in contributing to so good an object. Any specimens of the produce of my chemical manufactory would not be interesting nor suitable; but I will forward some specimens of a manufacture which I have lately given up, viz., that of walking-sticks made from the woods of our neighbourhood: of these I will forward to London, free of expense, 500 of the best quality, with as great a variety as possible as to pattern, colour, &c. Should this, however, be an article with which you are already overstocked, please send me word, and I will devise some other means of showing my attachment to the Anti-Corn-Law League, and my desire for the success of the great object it has in view.

"DEAR SIR,—I have received your letter regarding the Bazaar in London. As this is quite an agricultural district, it is difficult to find neighbours willing to advance the object of it. I have, however, got a committee formed at Larkhall, and you will receive from them a April or earlier, if you wish it, specimens of the work there, viz., of collars and veils worked; and Mrs. Hamilton proposes to send a sample of knitting. Wishing you every success in your noble exertions,

"SIR,—My time is so occupied that I cannot assist the Council in the way suggested by Mr. Wilson's circular, received this day. I enclose, however, a number of autographs which may be presented to some lady who is preparing a Book of Autographs. Amongst them will be found those of the Duchess of Marlborough, C. J. Fox, Townsend, Walpole, &c. I saw in the Aylesbury News that a gentleman had refused £50 for an old Bank of England note. I also enclose three old exchequer bills: one for £5, paying a farthing a day interest, dated August 6, 1697; another for £25, 1701; and another for £100, 1709: perhaps something may be made of them. I shall take care to attend the Bazaar and make a purchase; and I should think that an annual exhibition might be made of the works of manufacturers similar to that existing at Berlin. "DEAR SIR,—I was on Saturday favoured with yours of the 2nd. Our meeting went off very well. I beg to send to you a copy of the Argus containing a report of it. To-morrow the committee are to meet to follow up the resolutions. The first thing will be to set a going a subscription. We shall then address a circular to such persons as may be likely to contribute in any way, including the ladies; and we propose to endeavour to get a shop in a central part, to be opened as a repository, and where articles may be received. And before they are sent off we propose to exhibit them here for eight or ten days.

THE CORN TRADE.—Although this trade has been very quiet for some time, we hear that considerable orders for the purchase of foreign grain have been sent out to the Baltic. At the present prices at home and abroad, good Baltic wheat could pay 20s. duty, the freight and charges, and just clear itself. There can, however, be no importation at present on account of the ice.—Liverpool Times.

MANUFACTURING ADVANTAGES.—It is precisely because of our peculiar advantages, and among others the machinery of our capitalists, along with the skill and industry of our workmen, that we are enabled to work up goods of various descriptions, which are in extensive demand all over the world, and which we alone can provide so cheaply, as in the sale of them to bear down all competition, and keep exclusive possession of so many markets abroad.—North British Review.

MEETINGS.

GREAT METROPOLITAN LEAGUE MEETING.

The first great Metropolitan gathering for the present year was held on Wednesday evening last. A more crowded and enthusiastic audience was never convened within the walls of that building than that which assembled to greet the leaders of the League upon their public entrance on a fresh year of labour in the Metropolis. The applications for tickets of admission were far more numerous than the ability of the Council to comply with, and the house was densely crammed from the floor to the ceiling. Long before the Chairman opened the proceedings, the entrances to every part of the house were obliged to be closed against the crowds of unsuccessful applicants for admission, and large placards were posted against the walls announcing the house was full. The meeting was presided over by Mr. George Wilson, and addressed by Messrs. Cobden, Milner Gibson, and Fox. The presence of Col. Thompson elicited marked applause.

Among the gentlemen present, were George Wilson, Esq., Chairman; Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, M.P.; Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; W. D. Christie, Esq., M.P.; Thomas Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P.; W. J. Fox, Esq.; Major-General Briggs, Col. T. P. Thompson, Dr. W. Cooke Taylor, Captain Cogan, Colonel Henderson, Messrs. William Leaf, William Wiles, P. A. Taylor, Jun., George Ridout, Joseph Ivimey, James Beattie, J. Cumming, R. Scholefield (Rochdale), J. Geratonsbery, — Parker, — Pugh, W. A. Wilkinson, George Thompson, L. and J. Travers, R. Palmer, R. Fowler, — Gosnell, Daniel Cooper, S. Smith, Edmund Garrett, Charles Wordsworth, Summers Harford, Abraham Baner, N. Overbury (Westbury), Robert Overbury, William Biggs, (ex-Mayor of Leicester), F. Alexander, J. Hunt, J. L. Ward, John Bedford, Rev. Henry Bedford, Thomas Ruston, Samuel Maunders (Exeter), W. J. Bower, Wm. Cooke, Henry Jones (Liverpool), Thos. Owen, Thomas Wilkinson, J. S. Stock, G. Hoffman, A. K. Watson, J. N. Senior, Press Granger, A. Harrison, C. Lloyd, T. B. Burton, Wm. Geesion, John Burd (Manchester), Thos. Graham (Glasgow), John Lambert (Salisbury), Samuel Whitfield (Birmingham), &c.

The minutes of the previous meeting having been read by Mr. Saul, upon the motion of Colonel Thompson, who was again greeted with a cordial cheer, seconded by Mr. Christie, M.P. for Weymouth, were unanimously confirmed.

The CHAIRMAN then came forward amidst great applause, and spoke as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, since we last met together in this place, we have entered into the seventh year of our agitation. Fresh agreements have been made, and new bonds ratified, by thousands in the north, to stand together with an unwavering resolution to continue this agitation, and, if possible, to do so with increased energy; to demand that the labourers of this country shall be permitted to purchase from the world's markets as well as from the corn-stores of their Graces the Dukes of Buckingham and Richmond. (Hear.) Although six years is a portion of time of but small account in the history of a country, there have been some changes during that period not altogether undeserving of notice. It must be conceded that at the commencement of that period the term "Free Trade" had a very different signification to that which is attached to it in the present day. It then meant almost anything or everything. All men who sought for the slightest modification in the import duties were classed under the general head of Free-Traders; so in like manner every man who demanded the least alteration in our Corn Laws was denominated a Corn-Law Repealer. Those delusions, however, have since been completely exploded; and we now clearly understand who are in truth to be regarded as Free-Traders and who as monopolists. (Hear.) The division between the two classes is now perfect and complete. During that time we have seen one Administration attempting an approximation towards the principles of Free Trade, by introducing a measure bearing some resemblance to it; but which attempt utterly failed. We have beheld a second Ministry making a similar attempt successfully. We have witnessed the leaders of men brought into office for the avowed purpose of upholding monopoly, enunciating the principles of Free Trade and passing a fresh Corn Law, a new tariff, and a Canada Corn Bill—all measures in one direction, and that towards Free Trade; and yet during the whole of this period not all three shifts or expedients have detached from us a single individual favourable to the great principles which we have confederated ourselves as an association to establish in England. (Loud cheers.) Six years have not been passed without exposing the numerous fallacies which were then current. We hear no more of the old cries, "Do not depend upon foreigners for the supply of food;" "Cheap bread will bring down wages." These fallacies, and a host of others, have disappeared in Parliament; and I regard the fact as one of the most favourable symptoms of our present position, as compared with that of former days, that no question in the Legislature has ever had more able representatives than ours. (Applause.) Three months ago it was said that the League was dead. The meetings in this theatre were suspended, and none were being held elsewhere in the country. Everybody who did not know to the contrary took it for granted that nothing more would be done by this defunct body. (Laughter.) That delusion did not last long. (Hear.) In a few days after the conclusion had been arrived at, our own leaders, in the very same papers which had published our death, stating that, after all, the League was not quite dead, but was just as vigorous and as ever. (Cheers and laughter.) The old cries were ruled, "Bring out the Attorney-General!" "Where are the law officers of the Crown?" "Ah! this is just what we always expected. If our advice had been taken, we should have heard nothing of the League for many years past." (Laughter.) There are some people who seem to have an idea that the object of the constitution is merely that whenever a grievance is discussed in the country, its agitation should be immediately suppressed; and, if their notions had been carried out, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Cobden, and a few others would have found themselves some fine morning standing before twelve "good men and true," to answer an indictment as bulky as that produced at the monster trial in Ireland, and certainly long enough to ensure a verdict against more innocent men than they were. (Laughter.) The last plan which has been adopted by the League is the application of their efforts to the registration courts, to which I shall now refer. The plan which Mr. Cobden proposed about ten weeks ago could not have had a better certificate of recommendation than the objections which have been urged against it by the monopolists. Since the idea was broached we have had 40 meetings in Lancashire and Yorkshire, for the purpose of inducing our friends in those counties to qualify as voters. All these have been thorough business meetings. We have had some experience in public meetings during the course of this agitation; but never since the League commenced its operations have there been such large assemblages convened for business objects as those to which I am now referring. (Cheers.) We want our friends in the counties of Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Middlesex to run side by side—not in a spirit of jealousy, but with a feeling of honest rivalry—so that each county may present a proper return at the next election. The counties I have now enumerated are such as any man may well be proud of becoming a freeholder of: they are leading districts of this country, but they have not been made so by the influence of the aristocracy of the land. (Cheers.) Their inhabitants have not been raised to their present high position by the efforts of the aristocracy, nor have they attained their present standing by anything which mere rank and station may have contributed to their welfare; but it is attributable to the muscle and sinew, skill and intellect, of their operatives and capitalists, manufacturers, masters, and merchants. (Cheers.) It never can be long the destiny of these counties to be held in the thrall of an aristocracy, or to be misrepresented by men who are hostile to the very principles upon which their prosperity is founded. (Cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, you will be addressed this evening by the hon. member for Manchester, Mr. Milner Gibson, by Mr. Cobden, and Mr. Fox. (Cheers.) I have now great pleasure in calling upon Mr. Gibson.

Mr. M. GIBSON then came forward, and was received with loud cheering. The hon. gentleman said:—Sir, it must be deemed a great privilege to be permitted to address so imposing an assemblage as is now gathered within these walls; but I confess that, great as that privilege is, I do feel some difficulty in attempting to throw any fresh light upon a subject which has been so clearly and frequently explained by abler persons than myself, and which, I doubt not, is well understood by the great bulk of such an intelligent audience as we have collected here to-night. An actor forgot his part at the 140th representation in which he had appeared; and he pleaded, as his excuse, that it could not be expected that a man's memory should last for ever. (Laughter.) But we can plead no such apology here. In the first place, we are not actors, or men dealing with imaginary things, but with stern realities; we have before us facts which are patent to all our eyes; we are engaged upon the great subjects of justice, humanity, the spread of civilization, and of procuring for our fellow-countrymen that full reward of their industry which can only be secured by commercial freedom. (Hear.) If the present moment presents to us many signs that our cause is progressing, that the growth of public opinion in favour of Free Trade is sure, without being slow; why, on the other hand, when we look at the position of our adversaries, we find that public opinion as regards their views is moving in a retrograde direction. Can we possibly doubt that such is the fact, when we hear of the confused demands, and the differences of opinion, which prevail amongst the protectionists? (Hear, hear.) The monopolists are, at this moment, anything but "a happy family." (Laughter.) Sugar is frowning upon corn, and corn is looking black upon sugar. Sir Robert Peel has no confidence in the monopolists, the monopolists are equally suspicious of the right hon. baronet. Some are demanding the repeal of the malt tax; and others are insisting upon the abolition of the Canada corn bill. In one direction we hear that the currency would be depreciated; in another, we hear that the present Corn Law does not afford sufficient protection to the agricultural interest, and that the farmers are daily losing money under it. In whatever direction, in fact, we cast our eyes, we see no marks of harmony; there is nothing but one universal murmuring amongst the protectionists, the expression of discontent. (Hear.) When we look at our association—the ranks of the Free-Traders who compose this great combination, called the Anti-Corn-Law League—we find no difference of opinion prevailing there. Our demand is simple and straightforward, and our course uniform; we neither swerve to the right nor to the left. (Hear, hear.) We do not ask less to-day than we demanded yesterday; but one plain, "unvarnished claim" is now, what it has been from the first formation of this great association, namely, the total and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws, and all other monopolies. (Cheers.) This time last year the Anti-League meetings were convened in various parts of the country, and there then took place such a display of brutality and ignorance as must have left a stain upon the supporters of those associations which will not readily be wiped out. (Hear.) The case is different, however, now. The Central Protection Society, the London parent of the little local associations, dare not allow their smaller societies in the country to hold their meetings, for fear the public should be made aware of the discontent which prevails in the camp. (Hear.) We continue to hold our meetings; we have no desire to prevent any portion of our friends, in any portion of the United Kingdom, from assembling, and boldly expressing their opinions on Free Trade. (Hear, hear.) How certain it is that when a cause is not based upon truth, which is unchangeable, combustions in its support will break into different conflicting parties, and end in being blown entirely to the winds! (Cheers.) There can be no firm bond of union for any body of men associated in a great cause but truth; and the very duration of a society like this, after so much discussion, sifting of motives, and argumentation upon every point of view in which this question can be placed—the very duration and growth of the society, under such circumstances, is of itself a proof of the truth and justice of its cause, if at least the experience of all past times be any guide to us in framing an opinion upon such a subject. (Cheers.) It is said by our enemies that we are opposed to established institutions in Church and State; that under the guise of being Corn-Law repealers, we conceal revolutionary views; that we wish to interfere with the existing arrangements of society; are jealous of distinctions, and "speak evil of dignities." It is said that, under the plea of making known the principles of political economy, we are in reality endeavouring to excite class against class, and to spread through the land a feeling somewhat resembling that which prevailed in France previous to the Revolution. (Laughter.) Nothing can possibly be more untrue than these allegations. There are amongst us men of all opinions—individuals of all religious persuasions. (Hear, hear.) We have undoubtedly, in this great society, men who hold liberal opinions in connexion with the representative system and forms of Government; but, on the other hand, we have also gentlemen of Conservative opinions, who deem the present form of Government the best adapted to promote the happiness of the country. We have never made the profession of opinions on other subjects at all a condition of being a member of this association. The League unites men of all parties: the only common ground upon which they stand being that of Free Trade, the striking off the fetters from commerce, and the freeing mankind from those selfish combinations against the interest of the community for the benefit of a few which have been known and designated by the name of "monopolies." (Cheers.) We are what we profess to be: nothing less or more; and I am quite sure that I speak fully the sentiments of our distinguished leaders in this great society, when I say that there is no man, let his political opinions on general subjects, or his religious opinions, be what they may, who will not find a welcome in this society if he supports the great principle of commercial freedom. (Cheers.) It is said that we are the enemies of agriculture. Can anything be more absurd? Agriculture!—the art of tilling the land! We enemies to the extension of an art! We opposed to the progress of science in any form or shape, or to the advancement of any description of knowledge! We are not opposed to it, but, on the contrary, I believe that amongst the members of this association will be found some of the best supporters of that science at present existing in the United Kingdom. There will be found in the Anti-Corn-Law League some of the most celebrated improvers of agricultural science. (Cheers.) There are in this society men who have enlightened the agriculturists upon husbandry, and the different modes by which the produce of the earth may be increased. I venture to say that there is not in any part of this kingdom an individual to be found more anxious to improve the agriculture of the country, or to see two blades of grass grow where one only is now produced, than our excellent leader, Mr. Cobden. (Cheers.) His speeches have been replete with sound advice to the agriculturists. They have also, I believe, led to a practical improvement in agriculture. (Hear, hear.) In different parts of the kingdom where they have been delivered, they have turned the attention of the agriculturist to the improvement of his art, and have withdrawn him from that fatal reliance upon what Parliament can do for him, which has hitherto been the bane of the farming body. (Hear, hear.) We are no enemies, I say, to agriculture. It has been stated also that we are opposed to the British farmer. When the Anti-League meetings have been held, we have been told that "the British lion"—meaning, by the expression, the British farmer—"was shaking his mane at us." (Laughter.) The British farmer is beginning to think, at least in that part of the country where I reside, namely, the county of Suffolk, that perhaps the League will turn out to be his best friend. (Hear, hear.) We are not foes to the farmer. We desire to see him prosper; but we know that there can be no permanent stability in his calling until every vestige of protection is swept away; when he relies on Corn-Laws we know that he is building his prosperity upon an unsound basis; raising his house upon a sand, which will not stand the shocks with which it will have to contend. Experience has proved that no class in this kingdom has suffered more severely from the operation of the Corn Laws than the British farmer. (Hear, hear.) Then it is said that we are opposed to the landowner. We are not hostile to men merely because they own land. We are enemies to the principle which is laid down by the landowners of this country—or at least by many of them—that the possession of land entitles a man to go to the Legislature, and ask it to prevent persons from buying food of any one but himself. (Cheers.) If a shoemaker made the demand that the inhabitants of this metropolis should buy all their shoes of him, and we objected to such a monopoly, could it be said on that account that we were opposed to the body of shoemakers? ("Hear, hear," and great cheering.) We are opposed, undoubtedly, to the unjust demand of the landowners. We do object to the principle which is laid down by them, that trade is to be a secondary consideration in this country; that the merchant, manufacturer, all other classes are to be deemed in the eyes of the Legislature of minor importance to the landowner. We hold, on the contrary, that all are equally worthy of the regard of the Legislature. The landowners have legislated for England on the principle that they themselves constitute the country, and that the rest of the community are only to enjoy just so much of the comforts, trade, and conveniences of life as may suit the pecuniary interests of the dominant class. This has been the constant principle of landowners' legislation. You cannot look through our statute-book without discovering it in nearly every page. Can there be a more conclusive instance of the favouritism of such legislation than the statement which appeared in the Times newspaper the other day, in reference to the legacy duty? What could be more striking than that law, as one small instance of the way in which the landed proprietors of this country have used their power in the Legislature? (Hear, hear.) When personal property passes, after the death of its holder, to another, it pays a heavy duty to the Government. Landed property, however, is exempt from any such tax. (Hear, hear.) But, if I were to go through the numerous instances in which the landed interest have unjustly proved themselves in the distribution of the burdens of the country, I should detail you much longer than I desire, and trespass unwarrantably upon your time. Many of the landed proprietors tell us—and when I speak of "landed proprietors" that term this association who hold it and who are these odious after all, a the expense there is a r their having commercial landowners saying to the are very for you never you are al people to g unfortunate legislators can abolish of the mon the advantage an excuse f sides, there all other in any s go into it ions who will not l capital will with those additional manufacture what mono industry, w petition of to the ord monopolies rest of the monopolists in a very sh receive the rived upon But it is no may build cannot add (Hear.) of "landed proprietors" perhaps I am wrong in using that term too generally, because we have, as members of this association, men of vast landed possessions, men who hold large quantities both of arable and pasture land and who are perfectly willing and even anxious to give up these odious monopolies, believing, as they do, that it is, after all, a vain effort to attempt to benefit themselves at the expense of the rest of the community; vain, because there is a recoil which falls upon themselves, and prevents their having that full prosperity which would ensue if commercial freedom were established;—the monopolist landowners of this country, however, are in the habit of saying to the Anti-Corn-Law League, "You gentlemen are very fond of talking about the corn monopoly, but you never say anything respecting any other similar tax; you are always attacking us; why don't you ask other people to give up their monopolies?" We do so; but, unfortunately, the landed proprietors themselves are the legislators of this country; it is they, and they only, who can abolish the monopolies of these other parties; many of the monopolies which they maintain are inoperative for the advantage of those parties, and are only continued as an excuse for the great corn monopoly. (Cheers.) Besides, there is a wide difference between the corn and all other monopolies. If we establish a monopoly in any species of manufacture, fresh capital can go into it; new mills may be built, and the persons who have had the monopoly granted to them will not long enjoy it because the profits of their capital will be brought down by competition to a level with those of every other description. You may build additional mills, or open fresh shops in a particular manufacture or trade, in order to remove the evil. Give what monopoly you please to the different branches of industry, with the exception of agriculture, and the competition of capitalists will always bring down the profits to the ordinary rate of all other capitalists. Those monopolies, indeed, will not be the less injurious to the rest of the community: but what I contend is, that the monopolists, under the appearance of an advantage, will, in a very short time have no advantage at all, but will receive the same profits upon their capital which are derived upon that of all other portions of the community. But it is not so with regard to land. (Hear, hear.) You may build more mills, and open more shops, but you cannot add additional acres to the island of England. (Hear.) The landed proprietors possess a monopolized agent—the land: that you cannot increase in size; and, although the farmers who hold the land under them will never receive more than the ordinary profits of capital, give these farmers what protection you may, yet there will be a surplus flowing over in the shape of rent, and upon this the owners of the land will keep a very steady eye. (Laughter.) This it is which makes them so very unwilling to relinquish their own monopoly, even though we are prepared to abolish those enjoyed by other people. (Hear, hear.) What a monstrous thing it appears that in these days there should be any question at all as to the propriety of the repeal of the Corn Laws, when you look merely at the limited extent of this island, and the growth of its population. (Hear, hear.) Why, 230,000 fresh human beings are added to our numbers in England, exclusive of Ireland, every year; but not one additional acre is added to the soil; on the contrary, a great quantity of land is taken from the country. I will tell you how Mr. Chadwick, the secretary of the Poor Law Commission, tells us that, as there are 230,000 fresh persons added to the population of England every year—exclusive of Ireland, Wales, and Scotland,—there must be a corresponding addition made to the number of houses in which this population is to reside. He calculates that we require 59,000 new tenements to be built in England annually. Now, Manchester alone contains only 30,000 houses, and Birmingham but 27,000; and therefore, if the population are not to die in ditches and upon the high roads, there must be built in England, a number of houses which would occupy a space equal in extent to the two large towns of Manchester and Birmingham. So that every year the territory of this island is becoming smaller for the purposes of agriculture and the growth of wheat; the available surface is growing less and less. To think that we should have men getting up in the House of Commons, and wisely telling the legislators,—or with a wise look, for their wisdom is based on the authority of their acres, and from this I suppose is derived the term "wiseacre" (great laughter).—To think that we should have these men gravely telling the assembled Commons that it is actually for the advantage of this increasing population, living upon such a limited soil, that every possible difficulty should be thrown in the way of an importation of food from foreign countries! (Hear, hear.) Mr. Chadwick, in that same volume to which I have referred,—a volume upon the sanitary condition of the people of this country,—also tells us, what you have heard repeatedly, I have no doubt, in this theatre, that, in order to grow a sufficiency of food for this increasing population, there must be added to England every year a county equal in size to the whole of Surrey, unless you can devise means of enacting the present extent of land to grow a great deal more than it does already. Now, I fear that, unless we abolish the Corn Laws, we shall not make the present extent grow more. I believe that two reasons may be alleged for the abolition of the Corn Laws: first, that we shall get increased supplies from abroad; and secondly, that we shall obtain an improved amount of production at home. They may tell me that there are some new guano islands discovered. (Laughter.) I have no faith in guano without Free Trade. (Hear, hear.) I have no confidence in the agriculturists of this country putting forth their manures; I have no reliance in their profiting by all the lectures which they receive upon under-dressing and the application of chemistry to agriculture; I can have no faith in any of these things until we remove every vestige of protection from agriculture, and teach the farmers no longer to rely upon that unsound and deceitful basis. (Cheers.) There is another charge, however, which is brought against the Anti-Corn-Law League. Our opponents say that we are opposed to the church. (Laughter.) Why, we have in this society some very distinguished clergymen; and one of our ablest writers upon political economy is Dr. Whately, the Archbishop of Dublin. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Still they say we are enemies to the Church, because when we demanded the repeal of the Corn Laws we omitted to state that we were prepared to indemnify the clergy from any loss which might arise to them in reference to the tithe rent-charge. (Laughter.) Now, I quite admit that that is entirely dependent upon prices. (Hear, hear.) No improvement in agriculture can they look to with comfort; and any beneficial change which lowers the price of corn will, we may be sure, be regarded by them with no favourable eye. (Hear, hear.) The clergy derive no consolation from guano—(great laughter)—it is all price with them. The reason why so many of the clergy have, unfortunately, committed themselves to a somewhat extreme course, in opposition to the Anti-Corn-Law League wherefore we have them amongst our most determined opponents; is to be found in the fact that the tithe rent-charge is dependent entirely upon price. (Hear, hear.) We may console the landlord by saying to him, "Under-drain your land; expend capital upon it; and make it grow more; give leases to your tenants; have corn-rents; and you will get as good a return from your property as you ever obtained before." We may console the farmer by telling him that, if prices fall, rents and other charges will be lowered also; and that he will, in fact, be as well off as he was before. We may solace the labourer by telling him that when prices are low his wages will command a greater quantity of the necessities and comforts of life. I might also have added, in reference to the farmer's advantages, that all the rabbits and hares would be destroyed. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) But all these things afford no consolation whatever to the clergy. They say, "If a repeal of the Corn Laws reduces as it will do, the price of corn, our tithe rent-charge will be lowered in money value; and to this we are not prepared to consent." (Hear, hear, and laughter.) Our excellent friend Mr. Cobden has most ingeniously—and not only so, but with great truth—met the case with regard to the farmer, in some measure with respect to the landowner, and entirely with reference to the labourer. (Hear, hear.) But we have still to deal with the clergyman, and to consider how he is to be indemnified against loss. A clergyman of the Church of England, for whom I entertain a very deep respect, once said to me, "If you could only convince me that the abolition of the Corn Laws could, by no possibility, produce a lessening of the price of corn, then, indeed, I should not much mind supporting the Anti-Corn Law League." (Laughter.) It reminded me of one of Sheridan's plays, in which one of the dramatic personages says to his black servant, "Can you be honest Mungo?" The servant replies, "What you give me, massa?" (Great laughter.) That is the question which the clergyman has justly to consider. Is the Corn Law a just enactment? If it be unjust, abolish it, and take the consequences. That, I contend, is the course which they should pursue. (Cheers.) What I would say to the hesitating clergyman, who doubted between his income and his duty, would be this:—"If the repeal of the Corn Law make the Church poor, let it be poor; better be poor than unjust." (Cheers.) I would give such persons the same advice as the celebrated Dr. Channing gave to an American slaveholder. When the latter complained that the abolition of slavery might make him poor, that great man replied, "Be poor, then, and thank God for your honest poverty." (Cheers.) Now, I think that I have completely, as far as I am individually concerned, denied that hostility to the labourer, the farmer, the landowner, or even the clergyman which is imputed to the Anti-Corn-Law League. As far as I myself am concerned, I assure you that I have no hostility to any individual about corn. All I contend for is, that it would be to the advantage of all these individuals, and not the least to the clergy, if these laws were abolished. For, if there be a loss of income by their repeal, will there not be a gain in reputation? (Hear, hear.) Will there not be a relief from odium (hear, hear.) a settling of discord, a harmonizing of all classes in society, and an increase in social happiness? ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) And, if there be these gains, how can we for an instant set off against them the paltry additions which it is alleged are made to the income of some particular class by the great infringement of that first law of nature, and greatest principle of civil liberty, that every man has a right to the full benefit of his own industry; that all are entitled to the reward of their own labours, whether they be those of the head or of the hand? (Loud cheers.) Now, it is said, "If you reduce the price of corn you will lower the wages of the labourer." It is stated that the Anti-Corn-Law League is totally indifferent to the welfare of the labourer; that this question is a mere contest between the manufacturers, on the one hand, and the landowners on the other; and that the interest of the labourer is completely lost sight of in the matter. It is alleged that the interest of the labourer would be even injured by reducing the price of corn, and making food more abundant. Now, I should not have much difficulty in convicting our opponents, from their own proceedings, of uttering what they do not believe. What do I read in the papers? Why, even within the last two or three days I have seen, in the Morning Post and other journals, a statement that certain philanthropic gentlemen are about to establish a society for the purpose of grinding flour and baking bread for the poor. (Laughter.) They propose to raise a large sum of money, and to erect mills, offices, and bakeries, in order to undersell the present millers and bakers, who, they tell us, are extracting too high a price for their bread from the pockets of the poor. But how does this tally with the oft-repeated statement, that if you reduce the price of bread to the poor, you will bring down their wages? What is it to me who raises the price of bread, whether it be the miller, the landowner, or the baker? If the raising of the price be a heinous to me, I say, "Do not lower it." (Hear, hear.) The labourer does not buy his loaf in Mark-lane; we do not purchase our corn and food by the averages which are published in the Gazette. No, we buy our bread from the bakers. They tell us that if we make bread cheaper in price we shall reduce wages. "Well, then," we reply, "if you make it cheaper by baking or grinding more cheaply, you will cause wages to be lower than they are at present." So that these philanthropic gentlemen are convicted from their own course of conduct, of not really entertaining the belief that the wages of the labourer will be reduced by lowering the price of bread. (Cheers.) These worthless seem determined that nobody shall rob the poor except the landlords. (Great laughter.) Oh! it is a shocking thing for millers and bakers to be getting this large profit out of the hard earnings of the poor man, and it is a dreadful thing for people to take such advantage of the labourer; but yet my lord duke is entitled to increase the price of flour by an act of the Legislature, and he has a right to call men fools who do not believe that to do it in that way is a benefit, though in all other modes he admits that it is a curse. (Hear, hear.) However, the day is not far distant when this great delusion will be thoroughly exposed and understood. I am convinced that we are approaching the time when the Corn-Law repeal and the question of Free Trade must have a practical issue. (Hear, hear.) The Morning Post is an honest paper, after all. (Laughter.) What did that journal tell the agriculturists but the other day? It said that the only difference between the policy which even Sir Robert Peel is prepared to pursue, and that of the League, is this, that Sir Robert's is a slow decay of gradual poverty saddened by disappointed hopes, while the policy of the other, namely of the League, is prompt as the gullotine: but he says they are both forms of extinction—both are going in the same direction to a certain extent. I believe this is true. I am sure, from all that I have heard Sir Robert Peel say in Parliament, that he is, in his own mind, firmly convinced of the truth of the principles of Free Trade (hear, hear); but that he is prevented from doing all he would do by the power of the aristocracy of this country, which rules not only Sir Robert Peel, but the Queen upon her throne. (Cheers.) The strongest Ministers that England has ever seen, have succumbed at last under the weight of this powerful landed aristocracy. (Hear, hear.) Pitt bowed under that pressure, when he yielded the point with regard to the legacy duties on landed and personal property. It was his intention to have placed the same tax on both those descriptions of property. It was his design that the lands of the great man should pay the same duty on passing to his heir as the money or the furniture of the poor man pays in its transfer. Such, I say, was his intention; but he was overborne by the great landed aristocracy of the country. Ministers have always quailed before that tyranny; and the only influence in this country which can overcome the landed aristocracy, is the power which exists in such meetings as these. (Loud cheers.) It is the firm and indignant voice of the industrious and intelligent classes of this community, conscious of their rights and determined to vindicate them, which will make that landed aristocracy concede justice. (Cheers.) The Corn Law is the last—no; I will not say the last, but it is one—of the badges of feudal barbarism. (Cheers.) It is a remnant of the Norman conquest; and it is for the Saxon population of this country to rise up and throw off this galling and disgraceful yoke. (Hear, hear.) They and they only can do it. No Ministers that ever were or will be born can make them a present of commercial freedom. It will never be a free gift at the hands of the great; but it will be wrested from them by the exertions of the people themselves. (Vehement cheering.) I know we are told that the majorities against us are large, that the landed gentlemen return numbers of members to Parliament, and that the towns can never compete with them there. I would not despair even if there were no plan so good as that which has been struck out by Mr. Cobden for the registration and formation of 40s. freeholders. No! I should not even then despair. I have faith in the ultimate conquest of truth over error, of reason over prejudice, of freedom over oppression. (Cheers.) The experience of mankind tells me that those triumphs have always been accomplished. The mind of this country has but to be awakened, and I am persuaded that the hearts of all good men will be united in the cause of commercial freedom. (Cheers.) It is emphatically the cause of justice, truth, civilization, and social happiness; and I cannot entertain the smallest shadow of a doubt of its ultimate and enduring triumph. (The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst loud and prolonged applause.)

Mr. COBDEN then came forward amidst the most enthusiastic applause, which for some time prevented his proceeding; silence having been at length restored, the hon. gentleman said:—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, really I, who have almost lived in public meetings for the last three years, feel well-nigh daunted at this magnificent spectacle. Is there any friend or acquaintance of the Duke of Richmond here? (A laugh.) If there be, I hope he will describe to his grace this scene in Covent-garden Theatre to-night. (Hear.) I do not know how he may be impressed, but I am quite sure that if the Duke of Richmond could call such a meeting as this—ay, even one—in the metropolis, I should abandon in despair all hope of repealing the Corn Laws. But this is only one of many; and when we look back at the numerous gatherings we have had of a similar kind, and when we remember that not one discordant opinion, violation of order, or even breach of etiquette, has occurred at any of our meetings,—why, there is an amount of moral force about these great assemblages which I think it is impossible for any unjust law long to resist. (Hear, hear.) Ladies and gentlemen, I appear before you to-night as a kind of connecting link—and a very short one—between two gentlemen who have not so recently presented themselves here as I have: the one a most able and efficient fellow-labourer in the House of Commons, whose speech you have just heard; and the other, one of the most distinguished and accomplished orators of the age, who will follow me; and I promise you, that, on this occasion, I shall endeavour, in deference to your feelings and in justice to myself, to be very brief in my remarks. (Cries of "No, no.") Indeed I scarcely know that I should have had any pretence for appearing before you at all, had it not been that we are now preparing for our Parliamentary campaign, and probably, unless I took this occasion, it would be some time before I had a similar opportunity; and, as we are preparing for our Parliamentary labours, it may be as well, if we can possibly dive into futurity, to try and speculate, at least, upon what the course of proceeding may be, in connexion with our question. Now, I think I can venture, without any great risk of failure, to tell you what will be the course which the Prime Minister will pursue on this question. He will attempt his old arts of mystification. (Laughter.) He has acquired somehow, we are told, a great character as a "financier." Now, that is a distinction which, amongst men of business, does not place a person always in the very highest grade of respectability. (A laugh.) "A clever financier!" "He has put the revenue of the country in a satisfactory state!" Yes, he has done so; and how? Why—I hope, to your satisfaction, through the medium of the income-tax. ("Hear," and laughter.) We, as Free-Traders, have nothing to do with fiscal regulations here, nor with systems of taxation for revenue; but as I foresee that it will be the policy of the Government, and the Prime power in this country is transferred from the landed oligarchy which has so misused it, and is placed absolutely—mind I say “absolutely”—in the hands of the intelligent middle and industrious classes, the better for the condition and destinies of this country. (Enthusiastic and prolonged cheering.) I hope that every man who has the ability to possess himself of the franchise for a county, will regard it as his solemn and sacred duty to do so before the 31st of this month. Recollect what it is we ask you to do: to take into your own hands the power of doing justice to twenty seven millions of people! (Hear.) When Watt presented himself before George III., the old Monarch asked him what article he made; and the immortal inventor of the steam-engine replied, “Your Majesty, I make that which kings are fond of—power.” Now, we seek to create a higher power in England, by inducing our fellow-countrymen to place themselves upon the electoral list in the counties. We must have not merely the boroughs belonging to the people; but give the counties to the towns, which are their right; and not the counties, as they have been heretofore. (Cheers.) There is not a father of a family, who has it at all in his power, but ought to place at the disposal of his son the franchise for a county: no; not one. It should be the parent's first gift to his son, upon his attaining the age of twenty. There are many ladies, I am happy to say, present; now, it is a very anomalous and singular fact, that they cannot vote themselves; and yet that they have a power of conferring votes upon other people. I wish they had the franchise, for they would often make a much better use of it than their husbands. (Cheers and laughter.) The day before yesterday, when I was in Manchester (for we are brought up now to interchange visits with each other by the miracle of steam in eight hours and a half), a lady presented herself to make inquiries how she could convey a freehold qualification to her son, previous to the 31st of this month; and she received due instructions for the purpose. Now, ladies who feel strongly on this question, who have the spirit to resent the injustice that is practised on their fellow-beings,—cannot do better than make a donation of a county vote to their sons, nephews, grandsons, brothers, or any one upon whom they can beneficially confer that privilege. (Hear, hear.) The time is short, ladies and gentlemen; between this and the 31st of the month, we must induce as many people to buy new qualifications as will secure the representation of Lancashire, the West Riding of Yorkshire, and Middlesex. I will guarantee the West Riding of Yorkshire and Lancashire; will you do the same by Middlesex? (Loud cheers, and cries of “We will.”) I am quite sure you will do what you can, each in his own private circle. This is a work which requires no gift of oratory, or powerful public appeals; it is a labour in which men can be useful privately and without ostentation. If there be any in this land who have seen others enduring probably more labour than their share, and feel anxious to contribute what they can to this good cause, let them take up this movement of qualifying for the counties; and in their several private walks do their best to aid us in carrying out this object. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, we have begun a new year, and it will not finish our work; but whether we win this year, the next, or the year after, in the meantime we are not without our consolations. When I think of this most odious, wicked, and oppressive system, and reflect that this nation, so renowned for its energy, independence and spirit, is submitting to have its bread taxed, its industry crippled, its people—the poorest in the land—deprived of the first necessities of life, I blush that such a country should submit to so vile a degradation. It is, however, consolation to me, and I hope it will be to all of you, that we do not submit to it without doing our best to put an end to the iniquity. (The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst the loudest applause.)

Mr. Fox upon coming forward was received with loud and prolonged applause, which having subsided he proceeded to address the meeting as follows:—The practical measure by which the policy of the Anti-Corn-Law League is characterized in the present year, is that to which Mr. Cobden has just adverted, namely, the correction of the county registration, and the enlargement of the county constituencies, by inducing the wealthy Free-Traders in the cities and towns, to employ a portion of their surplus money, and the industrial classes in those places to invest their savings, in the purchase of 40s. freeholds, in the contemplation, at no great distance of time, of meeting the lords of the soil upon their own ground, of having with them a fair fight, and, as we confidently reckon, driving them from their strongholds. (Cheers.) This policy has excited a remarkable degree both of satisfaction and dissatisfaction in different quarters. The displeasure has been expressed by the use of the word “unconstitutional,” which for the purpose of political displeasure is very analogous in its use to the term “respectable,” in moral praise. The late William Hazlitt in one of his essays says, that we never have recourse to that expression to praise anybody, if there is any quality whatever by which we can designate him. If capable of making good verses, we call him a poet; if skilled in diagrams and profound in problems, we term him a mathematician. We run the whole round of qualifications, and seek for any honourable distinction whatever, and in the failure of all we say, “Well, he is certainly a very respectable man.” (Hear, hear, and laughter.) So in politics, when persons are annoyed by a proposed measure, if they cannot pronounce it illegal, because it violates no enactment of the laws of the land,—or immoral, inasmuch as it implies no breach of the commandments— if they cannot allege that it is dishonourable in principle, and inconsistent with the conventional regulations of life,—why, they fall back upon this word “unconstitutional,” which means neither more nor less but that they dislike the thing exceedingly, and, having nothing else which they can assert against it, they say, “Well, at any rate it is very unconstitutional.” (Laughter.) It is, however, with singular impropriety that such displeasure is applied to a policy which tends to give life to the constitution, makes it something more than a mere dead letter, enlarges its power, extends the number of those who possess its privileges, and through that extension multiplies its blessings to the community. (Cheers.) The persons to whom the League policy imparts dissatisfaction are happily only to be found among those to whose proceedings that body is opposed—whose unjust gains or aggressive blunders it seeks to bring to the standard of truth and justice. (Hear.) We have displeased our enemies by the course we are pursuing; but that same conduct has gratified our friends. (Cheers.) The case is reversed with the Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture. Whatever they may have done in facing their opponents during the last year, they have certainly succeeded in exciting the strongest dissatisfaction and reprobation of their friends. Throughout the country the cry is loud against them. Never was protection (if it really be so) more unthankfully repaid. The society say that they are set up as a safeguard to the tenant-farmer and the labourer; but throughout both classes there exists but one feeling of disappointment, annoyance, and rebuke. (Hear.) They held a meeting the other day; but not such an assemblage as this. They held, indeed, venture to compare theirs with ours, if every duke were counted for a thousand, and each member of Parliament for 100 or 200; but their great gathering in reality numbered some 40 persons. (Laughter.) It was an annual general meeting of the great Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture, held in a room upon the first floor of a house in Bond-street. (Laughter.) Then even the members of the committee found fault with their own report, and alleged that dissatisfaction at their proceedings was general throughout the country; that the agriculturists were everywhere crying out that the society neither did nor attempted to do anything (hear); that they would receive no suggestions from others, nor yet originate any proceedings; that they would not go down to Manchester and hold large meetings for open discussions—I should like to see them attempting it (hear);—that the farmers were not getting the price of 50s., which was promised to be secured to them by Sir Robert Peel's bill, but it had been down as low as 45s. (Hear, hear.) In truth there is reason for this dissatisfaction. It proves that the Central Society have undertaken more than they can perform. It may protect the Corn Law against legislative change, but not against the workings of that higher power which interferes with the practical operation of those enactments. (Hear.) The Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture, with all its dukes and squires, has failed to shield monopoly against the dispensations of Providence. (Cheers.) It has been unable to preserve the farmers from the calamity of a good harvest; or show itself strong enough to avert what it strangely deems the plague of plenty and the curse of cheapness. (Renewed cheers.) The endeavour has not been wanting; but such is the success which attempts of this description deserve. We seek not to please persons of this class by the proceedings of the League. We would not needlessly annoy them; if there be annoyance to any persons, the fault is their own. We cannot separate monopoly from the monopolist, nor sophistry from the sophist; they are bound too closely together. (Hear, hear.) The unholders of these unjust laws, whatever be their standing in the country or their dignity of station,—if they persist in clinging to these evils, and engaging in a mad struggle against the rights of mankind, the tendencies of the age, and even the dispensations of Providence,—must expect defeat and disgrace. Mortification awaits them; they see the shadow of the coming events in these efforts to enlarge the constituencies of counties: that is to say, in fact, to create what the counties have not at present—Independent constituencies. They know how much their own power has arisen out of the large extent of country of which they go to Parliament as the representatives; they have a foreboding, that it will not do long, should they be shaken in those seats, to fall back upon the little boroughs. They feel the humiliating position in which they must be placed, when, lords and dictators of these vast provinces, they are unhorsed from their power, and are taught to give way to those who recommend themselves to the general voice by their adhesion to the common principles of right and justice. (Hear, hear.) The counties have been their heavy artillery; the pocket boroughs, without them, will be worth no more than so many pocket pistols (cheers and laughter); and when the League has carried their cannon, do they think to make the fight good with their popguns? (Renewed cheering and laughter.) They must submit to drink the cup of humiliation, which an obstinate retention of these laws is mixing for their lips; and with the humiliation must come loss also—not merely of the proceeds of the bread-tax, but other things beside—if they persevere in holding by that tax until the result be that their political influence vanishes. Their ascendancy in the State is at peril in this conflict: it can only be saved by a timely compromise; and they know well enough that their land is worth to them, politically, much more than it is simply in an agricultural or commercial sense. It is not only wheat and barley that they seek from their acres; other things are grown there—offices, salaries, red coats and commissions in the army, preferment in the church; gowns and surplices are cultivated there peacefully together. (Cheers and laughter.) They have long had the undisputed gathering in of this vast harvest; and it is surely a species of infatuation, by which they are now perilling the whole, in vainly endeavouring to retain this imposition on the food of the people—a taxation which no nation conscious of its own power can possibly submit to, or regard otherwise than as a burden wrongfully bound upon it, which every effort is to be put forth to shake off on the very first opportunity. (Hear, hear.) Of all the undignified endings of a potent body, I think the humbling of the aristocracy of Great Britain for the sake of the bread-tax, would be one of the most preposterous. The old noblesse of France fell in defence of monarchy; the aristocracy of Poland sacrificed themselves for the sake of nationality; but to go after them into the gulf of insignificance and oblivion on such a score as this—for the aristocracy of Great Britain to sacrifice its power and greatness in order to tax the poor man's loaf—would be the most “lame and impotent conclusion” that ever followed a long and brilliant story. (Cheers.) Such an extinction and humiliation would reflect no lustre on their memories in the page of history; it would gain no monumental honours or records. A foreigner, a little while ago, visited Westminster Abbey, thinking he should be permitted to inspect the monuments in the same manner as those in foreign cathedrals are looked at; but, after having gone the round, the vergers demanded 15d. of him. The foreigner hesitated a little. “Why,” said the man in office, by way of argument. “I have shown you the monuments of the greater portion of the aristocracy of England.” “Have you?” said the foreigner, “why, then, I would give you half-a-crown if you would complete the collection.” (Great laughter and cheering.) But no mingling with the illustrations of former times would await an aristocracy, martyred in the cause of the bread-tax. The only fitting memorial even for those who boast, like the Dukes of Buckingham and Richmond, of royal blood in their veins, would be some old empty warehouse where, in the days of the Corn Law, bonded wheat was locked up, while multitudes were starving around. (Cheers.) Such should be the monumental pile of the descendants of the Stuarts and the Plantagenets. (Renewed cheering.) They say something else, however, in reproach, besides adopting this word “unconstitutional.” The report of the Central Protection Society declares, that the leaders of the League use “all means” for the accomplishment of their ends. I humbly submit that this is something of a mistake. No; we do not use “all means.” We never send people scouring the country, in order to gather a meeting together. (Hear, hear.) We have no occasion for dilettanti charioteers, to drive dirty demagogues in dog-carts, in order that they may pass for peasantry upon the hustings. (Cheers.) We do not use “all means.” We do not garble Adam Smith; neither do we falsify quotations, nor repeat the practice after a promise has been made of revision and correction. (Cheering.) We do not use “all means.” We do not promise that the people shall have cheap bread within a given time, and then leave them to grumble over a very different price from that which was put forth in our prospectus. (Hear, hear.) We do not use “all means.” We do not, in a collective capacity, declare that it is very improper indeed to interfere in elections; that it is contrary to all our principles; that the most rigid abstinence shall be maintained; and then, whenever the occasion offers, employ all the dirtiest tricks of bribery and the most abominable arts of intimidation. (Cheers.) No; we do not employ “all means.” If her Majesty—God bless her (loud applause)—will but come to the Free-Trade Bazaar, next May, in this building,—and, though I do not expect her to take a stall there, I believe it would call forth a very grateful acclamation from her people if she did (hear, hear),—she will behold honourable specimens of the industry of the country in all its branches, deserving not only justice but the noblest praises that royal feeling can bestow; and she will not see there such tricks as sometimes are to be met with at a cattle-show, when a roarer wins the prize by being passed for an Arabian. (Great cheering.) Instead of employing “all means,” the League leaves such as these, and others of a similar description, making a fair partition with the antagonist society, they taking those which are most in harmony with their ends, we choosing those which are most accordant with our purposes, remembering that they are banded for the defence of an interest,—we leagued for the assertion of a principle. (Hear, hear.) If it be only meant “all means” which may become a man to use, why, then, accusation vanishes, and the fact is correctly stated. The leaders of the League have shown themselves men who will, in these circumstances, use “all means;” who will spare no time or labour, but undertake whatever the powers of the human body and mind are equal to, in the promotion of this great work; who seem to have consecrated to it their very lives, and will earn their honourable niche in history by the unceasing perseverance, the gigantic effort, the honourable virtue, the lofty and just principles in which they have pursued this great object, and will bring it, I trust, before long, to a triumphant termination. (Cheers.) It is a satisfactory characteristic of the cause of Free Trade, that, in all its successive phases, and in every stage of its progress, there has not only been a good end pursued, but just means employed; and the beneficial results produced by the operation might themselves be ranked as among the noblest objects of persevering endeavour. It has been thus from the very first. How did it commence? With such speculations as those of Adam Smith and other political economists. The cause of Free Trade was then enshrined in scientific volumes; it was an intellectual discovery. The talent and power of the philosopher were employed to make a science of that which theretofore had been a mere chaos of isolated facts. They accomplished this; but they did not realize Free Trade for the country by so doing, because legislators are not chosen for their knowledge of the science of national prosperity; and at that time the disregard of the seminaries of education, and the different taste which prevailed in both Houses of Parliament, made senators altogether heedless of any such study as that of political economy. The next stage in the process was, that from a science it became a polioy. Principles were wrought out into their details, and applied to the practical concerns of the country. Exhibition was made gradually, in different directions, of the way in which trade and commerce were affected. For this change let us never forget how largely we are indebted to the pages of the “Westminster Review,” and to the other writings of the author of the “Corn-Law Catechism.” (Cheers.) That noble veteran in our cause, Colonel Thompson (great cheering, and waving of hats and handkerchiefs),—soon may he fight the battle again on the floor of the House of Commons.—(Renewed cheers.) He may be said, almost single-handed, to have accomplished this stage of the process; to have advanced the politico-economical science into a national polioy; but still without result on the Legislature, for it was not one of the watchwords of party. Whig and Tory hoisted their old banners, held their review days as of yore, and fought out battles of much more importance to themselves, than to any other persons whatever through the length and breadth of the country. But a third phase was advancing, when a new form was taken—that of the interest of a class; an important class, but still only a class. The third stage of Free Trade was, when the great manufacturers began to feel the shoe pinch them. Monopoly interfered with the extension of their operations, prospects, and profits; and they, beginning to be uneasy under this load, forwarded the cause another stage. Whether any of the present leaders of the League first felt it in this particular way, I cannot undertake to say; if they did, we know how soon their views expanded, and their minds arose towards a nobler contemplation of the subject. But through this stage it had to pass; an intellectual one still, for there was another and a mightier class to interpose its veto upon anything which they would have had adopted for their relief. Then came the stage for which we are indebted to the Anti-Corn-Law League, and the efforts of those true-hearted men, so many of whom are before you on this occasion (cheers), and who have their road-jesters in the country; who made it a popular appeal, and called first on the inhabitants of the towns and cities to consider this matter, to see its bearing on the common weal, to decide on the right and justice of the case, and to say whether this system of things was to be prolonged with their consent, or was entitled to their endurance. (Cheers.) What was this but a great national institution? It was a system, at first, of the communication of knowledge, much of which was altogether new to those who came together to be instructed; they had many of them to learn the very elements of that political economy which is now so familiar to their minds. They had to be formed and trained; and the result has been a clear conviction and a firm determination. But the monopolist landowners make fight still, even in the face of these great bodies of the people; and therefore the leaders of the League have given the word, "March onward," to gain another and a yet higher step, to make this great battle in the counties throughout the whole extent of the land, to arrive thus at the public mind, and then to take decisive measures that the national will shall become the law of the empire. (Loud cheers.) And if, of all the previous stages, it may be said that they were a public good, pre-eminently may it be so stated of that which is now in the course of being realized. The endeavour which is making to enlarge the county constituencies, and especially by the qualified votes of intelligent Free-Trade residents in towns, and of the industrious classes in particular, is, in every view of it, an important benefit in itself, even were it not the path through which we must pass to the repeal of the Corn Laws. For what is it but to make county representation a reality? County elections are what the Duke of Wellington once called county meetings, a mere "farce." (Cheers.) They are the result of the distribution of property, and the votes are reckoned upon according to the number of tenant-farmers on the different estates throughout the district. There you have them all beforehand. When the property passes from one party to another, the votes are transferred with it. They may be all marked out upon the map of the county. They should be so; we should have something like those very instructive geological maps, which by the different colourings of the districts tell us what mineral wealth lies hid beneath; and there is something analogous, I conceive, to a geological distribution. Had we such a map, the dark line that designates the bed of coal below would show where black monopoly was working in its deep recesses. (Cheers.) The indication that petrified remains were in abundance, might suggest to us that there would be the place to dig up, and to excavate the fossil Whigs, with their fixed-duty, remains of an antediluvian world. (Cheering.) In another direction, the soft alluvial deposit might suggest the yielding clay of the Ministerial followers (renewed cheers); whilst, to the eye of scientific observation, it would be plain, that beneath all this was that central fire, of which geologists tell us, intense and enduring as the principles of human nature, and which, at the appointed time, raises the lowest strata from their humble position, shatters down the higher, granite though it be of an older creation than any Norman nobility, and produces a new surface of things, where those that were unseen, scorned, and disregarded, become a fresh world of order, enjoyment, harmony, and beauty. (Great cheering.) We are a League, for the transformation of county voters into realities; for delivering them from the district dictatorship to which they are now subjected. (Hear, hear.) And this is to be done by infusing the lifeblood of city thought and independence into the constituencies. Bring the independent into contact with the dependent. Lay the factory alongside of the farm-house. (Cheers.) Let those who have been enslaved, even in the tone and spirit of their minds, be shamed by their friends and neighbours, who take a more decisive part in this matter. Let them perceive that there is for them a protective power. Surely, friends, neighbours, customers—those who purchase the produce of their soil—have some title to their care and confidence; for who is the best friend of the farmer—the man who pays him money for his corn, or the man who takes his money for a rent calculated on monopolist prices? (Cheers.) They call this "the interference of strangers." There is an absurd way of speaking of the League as "a stranger" everywhere. It is a stranger nowhere. (Hear, hear.) It has domesticated itself here in London; but "the League" is every one whose mind sees clearly, and whose heart beats strongly for the principles and the cause of Free Trade. (Cheers.) We are the League in London; and if we look abroad into the different towns and districts of the country, wherever there are men who see the real interests of the nation, who feel for the wrongs of the poor, who rise up against oppression and say, "These taxes on the bread of the indigent shall not continue," why, they are the League—the League is there. When my Lord Duke or Radnor rises in his place to address their fellow-peers, why, then the League is in the House of Lords. (Cheers.) When by any chance, however remote, a courageous thought shall arise in the mind of the Premier, and an honest determination on this matter come from his mouth amongst his colleagues, then the League will be in the Cabinet. (Renewed cheers.) Principles of this nature are like the air or the water—they have an elemental omnipresence. They are wherever there is the light of thought, and the warmth of feeling. Besides, as to county representation, are not towns and cities part and parcel of counties? Are they—foreign countries? Are they "allens in blood, language, or religion?" (Cheers.) Are not most counties made by the towns and cities which are in them? Do they not rise as the crown of the richness and fertility of the more productive counties? Where there is no such fertility, but mineral treasures exist below the surface, or ports and harbours are found along the coast, why, there towns and cities make counties by a work almost to be compared with that of creation, giving them numbers, wealth, grandeur, and importance, which Nature seems to have forgotten or overlooked. What would Middlesex be, if you were to strike London out of it? (Hear, hear.) Nay, what would the most rural counties be, if you were to take from them the advantage of towns, if not in them, at least in their vicinity, and within an easy reach—and what are not now within easy reach? The counties separate from, and independent of, the towns!—Do we not buy their wheat, even at their own monopolist prices? Do we not very often, indeed, feed their poor who seek refuge here; employ their idle and superfluous hands, and give a shelter to their victims? And, besides all this, do we not purchase their game? (Cheers and laughter.) Towns and cities are the hearts of counties—the last portion of them that should be left unrepresented.

If it should be said they have their own separate representation, I reply, that is not all. It is property that is represented, according to the theory of the law under which we live; and wherever there are freeholds which produce 40s a year, there the constitution supposes, and by supposing, requires and demands of us if we are patriots,—that there should be a corresponding vote also. Your 40s. freehold is not represented by the city and town members; it has yet its claim to make. Well is it when that claim can be urged with such happy results as promise to attend it in the present instance. For in this plan there is a moral good, beyond, perhaps, what in its original conception was thought of. It tends to act upon the character of the entire labouring population of the country,—the working classes,—the more toilsome section of the middle classes; it holds out to them a hope, promise, and incitement of the most desirable and elevating description. It says to them, "Become proprietors of a portion, however small, of this our England; have a stake in the country; be something here." It was thought a wise thing, when, by the measure introduced by the late George Rose, the savings-bank funds were connected with the public funds of the country; it was deemed judicious in this way to link those who could amass but very small sums with national institutions and public interests; and, if it was wise and good to endeavour to make all who could save their pittance become fund-holders, it must be at least as prudent and just to induce them, according to their proportion, to become land-owners also, joint shareholders in this lovely, and fruitful, and beautiful country—and their country as much as that of the wealthiest nobleman whose lands cover half a county. (Cheers.) It gives them a tangible bond of connexion with society; a feeling of independence and honest pride. They are put in the position which was deemed necessary to citizenship in the republics of ancient days; and this is adapted to cherish in them the emotions which best accord with consistency, propriety, and dignity of character. The poet Campbell has described the feelings of the outcast when he wanders through the village; how he looks wistfully at the cottage with its little garden; leans on the gate, and says to himself—

"Oh! that for me some home like this might smile,
Some hamlet's shade, to yield my sickly form
Health in the breeze, and shelter from the storm!"

To those whose lives are spent in toilsome exertion and constant endurance, but who can take time so far by the forelock as to accumulate a little sum, such hope and promise as this, does the present plan hold out and offer as an excitement. May their spirit arise to aspire towards, and seize it; and obtaining it, I think we shall be on the high-road towards a better choice of legislators, a more complete identification of the interests of those who toil with the advantages of those who think,—a better identification of the different classes that extend themselves through the demarcations of society; and our House of Commons will then be a fair way to show what it is to have a full, fair, and free representation of the Commons of England. (Great cheering.) You have had well dissected this evening the constituent elements of a great financier; and you have heard something of the prosperity of the revenue. I have a notion that the revenue is prosperous when more money remains in our own pockets rather than when more is taken out. (Hear, hear.) This comparative prosperity (for it is only such) has falsified every assertion of monopoly, and verified all the predictions of the leaders of the League. We rejoice that there is such a comparative prosperity; but yet, how far has it gone towards eradicating the miseries and the endurance of a very large portion of the community? Take up the daily newspapers, and I defy you to look at them many days in succession without meeting again and again with coroners' inquests on deaths by destitution; poor wretches perishing upon a bundle of straw in a corner of a hovel, where they have scarcely had any nutriment for days or weeks. Whilst there are such scenes as these, it is not for our efforts to relax, or for us to bate one jot of heart or hope in this great struggle, but still to press right onwards. (Cheers.) There is another testimony to the fearful amount of misery that yet remains untouched, in the different societies which are continually forming; societies, as you have heard, for grinding and baking bread for the poor; for furnishing them with baths and wash-houses; for setting them to work; putting them into better dwellings; and societies for relieving the wants of the poor needlewomen. The leaders of the League have sometimes been blamed, because they were thought to look coldly at these efforts; they have been accused of a sort of jealousy, or an indifferent feeling towards the wants of the poor, as though they must be careless about them unless they entered into the specific modes of attempted relief; the fact being that they were not less anxious than any of the promoters of those societies for the removal of the mischiefs of which they complained; but they saw at the same time that, as national measures for relief, these were mere pretensions so miserably inefficient that they were scarcely worth a thought, whilst the great battle was to be sustained as that which alone could reach the root of the evil, and banish it from the country. (Cheers.) It was their sympathy with, and not their want of feeling for, the poor that occasioned this mode of adverting to such exertions. But allow me to say that those who were so quick in detecting in the Free-Traders what they represented as hostile to humane attempts, might, if they had looked elsewhere, have seen a real collision with the object of these societies: for, while there are societies for all these purposes, there is also an association for rendering the poor needlewomen unable to buy more than three-fourths of the bread which they might otherwise purchase; for making the poor spend so much upon food that they cannot buy a stock of linen to go to the wash; a society which so interferes with the rights and wants of the poor, that they lose all heart and desire of putting themselves into a better habitation; there is a society that directly tends to diminish the amount of work for the poor, to curtail their employment, and deteriorate the worth of that employment. There is an antagonist society to all these professedly benevolent institutions; and that is the Central Society for keeping up the taxation upon bread. (Great cheering.) They are the parties that ought to be accused by those who are so much addicted to these special modes of charity. On their heads should the thunder-bolt fall. They should be put upon their trial, and not the leaders of the League. The League on their trial, indeed! Why, Providence has given them their trial, and they have stood it bravely and triumphantly. (Cheers.) They have summered and wintered this great cause. They have been earnest for it in times of heaviest suffering, and in periods of comparative prosperity. They have pleaded it in the Legislature, and before assemblies of tremendous multitudes; they have been, to use an apostolic phrase, "instant in season, and out of season." Every time to them has been a season for striving to advance this great cause of justice and charity. (Cheers.) They are not merely acquitted, but are deserving of all honour for these proceedings. It is another party who are upon their trial: it is the moral courage of the Premier that is upon trial, and his disposition to carry into practice his own professed principles. It is the constitution of our country that is upon trial, in order to ascertain whether it furnishes the means of redress for this great and pervading wrong. It is the spirit, the energy, and the determination of the British people, to see whether it will hold out until it shall do itself this right, and put down the oppressions of a class. (Much cheering.) They call themselves a Protection Society; why, we are a Protection Society too, although antithetically distinguished from them. They are an association for the protection of the rich and powerful; we, for that of the needy and the helpless. They are a society for the protection of high prices of food; we, for the protection of the highest worth of wages. They are a society for the protection of indolence and of rent; we, for the encouragement of industry and of enterprise. They, for the protection of a demoralizing, degrading, and destructive system; we, for that of universal right, justice, and charity. (Mr. Fox sat down amidst loud and long-continued cheering.)

The CHAIRMAN then said:—Ladies and Gentlemen, I have to express my acknowledgments for the great order which has prevailed in this most crowded meeting, and the hope that we may see you all again on this day month.

After giving several cheers for Free Trade, the meeting separated.

FREE-TRADE MEETING AT BLACKBURN.

(Abridged from the Blackburn Mercury.)

Our readers are already aware that on many occasions we have had the satisfaction of recording the great gatherings of the friends of Free Trade in this country; but many of them are not aware of the rapid increase which has taken place, and is still progressing, in favour of the movements of the League. The glorious sight which presented itself to our view at the meeting on Monday evening was one well calculated to stimulate every one to renewed exertions in this great cause. The meeting was far more numerous attended than any of its predecessors, and the enthusiasm manifested was of the most intense nature. The meeting took place in the large schoolroom under James-street Chapel, and, spacious as that apartment is, hundreds were unable to obtain admission, although about 1300 were present during the speech, which so engrossed the attention of the audience that, save the repeated bursts of cheering, a deep intensity of silence prevailed, as though every one seemed afraid of losing a word of the eloquent and argumentative appeals to their hearts and understandings. The tables were amply supplied with refreshments, and a general feeling of enjoyment appeared to pervade every group. At the end of the room some very handsome crimson and blue banners were displayed, containing emblems of a steam-engine, a ship, and a plough, the mottoes in gold letters, "Protection Tariffs—Unjust to the Many"—"Every Country our Country"—"Free Trade is of No Party"—"Every Man our Brother"—"Commercial Tariffs for Revenue only." The room was also handsomely decorated with evergreens.

After the Rev. F. SKINNER had returned appropriate thanks for the excellent repast of which they had partaken,

The CHAIRMAN then addressed the meeting in an excellent speech, and introduced Edmund Ashworth, Esq., of Egerton, who was followed by Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., whose reception was most enthusiastic, and told with inspiring effect upon the audience.

Mr. Cobden was succeeded by Mr. Bright; after whom

JOSEPH ECOLES, Esq., of Mill-hill, proposed, and HAROLD POTTER, Esq., of Darwen, seconded, a vote of confidence in the League, and their admiration of its present movement.

The Rev. A. FRAZER moved, and WM. PILKINGTON, Esq., seconded, the thanks of the meeting to the deputation.

Mr. COBDEN returned thanks.

Mr. BRIGHT moved a vote of thanks to the trustees of James-street Chapel, for the use of their school, which was seconded by W. HOOKS, Esq.

WALTER BULLOCK, Esq., proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman, seconded by the Rev. E. JONES.

Mr. COBDEN voted thanks to the ladies, seconded by Rev. F. SKINNER.

The meeting separated about ten o'clock.

NEW INVENTION—COAL FROM PEAT.—We are informed that, by the application of a chemical process, an ingenious party has succeeded in the conversion of peat into coal within a very short period of time. If the result of the great laboratory of nature, perfected during centuries, can thus be performed by art in a few weeks, it will indeed cause a great social and national revolution.—Literary Gazette.

WHEAT.—The agricultural reports state that the best wheat in the forward districts of England have been some under favourable auspices; but, in the north, much remains to be done in that respect, which cannot possibly be accomplished till the atmosphere becomes much milder than it is at present. One very important feature in the appearance of the young wheat plants, which, comparatively speaking, are looking well, yet it cannot be denied that they have suffered materially from the prevalent cold easterly and north-easterly winds, especially those exposed situations, which have stood greatly in need of good fall of snow to shelter them. More than the usual quantity of grain has been thrashed out during the month of December, owing, in a great measure, to the being much in want of straw for the stall-fed stock. The yield of wheat turns out extremely good, both as regards quality and quantity; but in that of barley a great deficiency is apparent. Oats appear to be barely an average crop, and the same may be said with regard to beans and peas.—Leeds Mercury.

MR. BRIGHT, M.P., AND HIS CONSTITUENTS

Durham, Thursday Morning.
Last evening, Mr. Bright, the member for this city, addressed a very numerous meeting of the constituency in the Theatre, Sadler-street. The building was crowded to excess in every part, the passages and avenues were filled, and many persons had even gained access to the space beneath the stage, and endeavoured there to hear some part of the proceedings.

JOHN HENDERSON, Esq., of Leaze-house, was called to the chair.

When Mr. BRIGHT appeared upon the stage he was received with reiterated bursts of cheering, and these manifestations of approbation were renewed again and again when he rose to speak. The hon. gentleman spoke for an hour and three-quarters, alluding to the debates of last session on the Corn Law, the sugar duties, the lucenary fires, and the factory bill. The present position of the Free Trade question and of the Anti-Corn Law League was dwelt upon, and the principles of Free Trade were explained and enforced in a manner which created a strong impression on the minds of the audience. Mr. Bright reminded the electors of their memorable victory over two great public foes: in their election they had given a blow to monopoly, and had in their city overthrown the system of corruption which the enemies of public liberty had so long fostered among them. He exhorted them never to forget what they had accomplished, but in future to fight all their elections on some good principle, not for party objects, whether Whig or Tory; and to fight only with the weapons of purity which become the advocates of a good cause. The speech was greatly cheered throughout, and we regret the impossibility of transferring it to our columns.

JOHN BRAMWELL, Esq., moved the following resolution, which was seconded by JOHN MARSHALL, Esq.: "That the able review which has been taken this evening by the honourable member for this city, of his parliamentary conduct, is highly satisfactory to this meeting; that his conduct in Parliament entitles him to the warmest thanks of this constituency, and that the meeting and the constituency feel perfect confidence in the course which he will pursue in the proud situation in which he is placed as the member for this city."

This resolution was carried unanimously, amidst prolonged cheering, every hand having been raised in its favour. Thanks were then voted to the Chairman, and the meeting separated. A more gratifying meeting has never been held in Durham; and it was well if the practice of meeting the constituency, thus introduced into Durham by Mr. Bright, were continued by all who may represent it in future.

Mr. Bright proceeds to Newcastle this evening, and will probably attend a Free-Trade meeting in Gateshead to-morrow.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XVI.

TO THE CAMLET WEAVERS OF NORWICH.

I have been reading, in the Norfolk news, a report of your proceedings, or rather a selection from your speeches, at a meeting last Monday week to consider the best means for resisting an alleged attempt on the part of Mr. Worth, manufacturer, to reduce your wages. On this attempt I am not qualified to speak—none of the circumstances have come under my cognizance; and although an attempt to lower wages in Norwich, at a time when they have generally been raised in the great manufacturing towns of the north, excited both my surprise and regret, yet without more information it would ill become me to express an opinion. If you are wronged, may your resistance be successful. My present business is with the extracts before me, which are alike creditable to your good sense, your patient endurance, and your honest purposes, although not free from mistake, which, pointed out, in a friendly spirit, by one who formerly belonged both to your town and your occupation, you will not perhaps be backward to perceive and to avoid.

The privations you suffer were feelingly and forcibly described:—

"One speaker at the meeting observed, that time was when there used to be something like a friendly feeling between the employer and the employed; but now times were altered, and the poor weaver could scarcely wear his own clothes, eat his own food, or pay his rent. In many cases they were doted worse than the pauper, or the felon who had broken the laws of his country. The felon did not get meat three times a week; but where was the handloom weaver to be found who could get it? The practice of reducing wages had been too long the fashion—that they knew to their sorrow—that their homes, their ragged garments, and their care-worn and half-starved appearance would fully testify. The individual who sat at the loom was not the indifferent person some thought him to be. Without him, where would be the fine dresses which adorned the persons of the fairer sex? Without him, where the garments which clothed the other sex? But while, however, nothing could be done in the shape of clothing without the aid of the handloom weaver, that individual and his family were left half-naked. It was said that he that tolled should be the first partaker of the fruits of his toil; but with the weaver the reverse of this was the fact. What could be the state of that man's mind, who was beholden to his friends for raiment, and who heard his children crying for food, without having it to give them? Yet such was the condition of the weaver."

That you, who contribute to clothe others, should yourselves be clothed and fed in return—that your honest industry should not fare worse than the felon in the goal—is too evident to be denied, and too sad not to be deplored. But can you give no better reason for this lamentable result than that "the practice of reducing wages has been too long the fashion?" A master manufacturer has other things to do besides following a fashion. In the old times you lament, was there ever a Mr. Worth that gave more than its worth for your work? And will not the present Mr. Worth, unless he be a very wrongheaded man, and blind to his own interest, pay for it now whatever it is worth to him? Knowing nothing of the individual case, I can only argue on general facts. There is no such thing as fashion in the rate of wages. The competition of the men tends to keep them from rising; and the competition of masters tends to check them falling; and between the two they find their true level, from which, to any great extent, or for any long time, they cannot deviate. By this "true level" I mean, not the remuneration which industry deserves, but that which the state of any particular trade fairly allows. In a trade locally declining, and overdone by too many hands, this level is but too likely to fall far below what is requisite for the decent maintenance of the workman himself, to say nothing of a family. Such, I fear, is your case, and that of a large proportion of that much-suffering body, the handloom weavers.

No master manufacturer can dictate the price at which his goods shall sell. He is quite as dependent upon the market as you are upon him. The most generous disposition in the world will not help him. He must encounter, at home and abroad, as fierce a competition as that which sometimes rages amongst yourselves. If he cannot sell as low as the foreigner in distant markets, or his countrymen in those at hand, there is an end of his ability to pay you any wages at all. He goes to the dogs; and so must you. On the other hand, extending trade makes him dependent upon you. He must advance his bidding for your help until he gets it, or he is thrown out in the race. Talk not, then, of "fashion." It is fact, not fashion, with which you have to do. You might as well say that bad harvests were the fashion a few years ago, and that better harvests are coming into fashion now. The laws of trade work upon men and masters as mightily as the laws of nature on the farm and cornfield.

Is there no help? The needful preliminary to answering that question is that the case be rightly understood. One of your speakers demanded indignantly, "What! do they think they do us good by enabling us to look upon our own misery?" We can do that now with very little instruction." Un-happily, you can. Athenæums and Institutes will not feed you. But does it not make some difference whether even the wretched spectacle of your own misery be contemplated by an intelligent or an unintelligent eye? Would you beat the stone that hurts you, like a stupid child? Look further into your own misery and its causes.

You are too many for the funds that exist to be divided amongst you. Is not that a plain truth? No worth or worthlessness of masters can alter that. Those who can should turn their hands to almost any other kind of work which they are able to find. And don't bring up your children to a trade that is going down. Handloom-weaving is not an operation requiring much skill. It is a sort of receptacle for those who can do nothing better; a refuge for the incurable, and a very miserable refuge. There is strength in wood and iron. They will beat the bones and sinews of a man. Skill is the quality in growing request. Little skill, little pay, is a sure rule in wages. Here the Athenæums and Institutes may tell, in spite of the question just quoted. Another of your speakers seems to have perceived this truth; and his appeal to the civic magnates for such provision on behalf of the weavers, no less than on that of the drapers' assistants, is well and powerfully urged:—

"Another speaker said, 'I feel for every man in distress: I feel for the drapers' assistants. I will not dispute that they are overworked. But so are the weavers. I am glad to see the bishop of the diocese with all his theological lore, Mr. Gurney with his philanthropy, and the mayor with all his magisterial authority assisting the drapers' assistants to better their condition; but I do not think it would be beneath the theological reputation of the bishop, the philanthropy of Mr. Gurney, or the magisterial authority of the mayor, for them to endeavour to do something for the handloom weaver. Have we not minds and feelings as acute as the drapers' assistants? And surely, if those assistants, who are by us kept at work, deserve protection, we have a claim. I hope that, if the weavers are to be denied an Athenæum, some plan will be thought of whereby we can have our minds filled with knowledge, as we wish to have our bodies filled with food. If it is important that we should have knowledge, all we want are the means to attain it.'"

Fairly reasoned, and with some home thrusts. I trust it will not be disregarded in the proper quarters. And yet, after all, there is something better than charitable instruction, however frankly the means be given. Mechanics' institutes will never flourish as they ought until they are supported and governed by the mechanics themselves. A little help meanwhile is not amiss; but that is the condition of their permanent prosperity and highest utility.

And when is that time to come? When labour has fair play and free scope. All the world wants clothing; all the world is willing to pay for it; and all the world has got something or other wherewith to pay, which, if it be not exactly the thing that is wanted here, can be exchanged when it is wanted elsewhere for something of which we are in need. In itself, your labour is money's worth; though it be not Mr. Worth's money, under present circumstances. The free exchange of products is not obstructed by your masters, but by their masters and yours: by the landowning legislators who make laws to keep up food, and so keep down trade; to keep out foreign produce, and so cripple commerce. This is ruination both to your masters and yourselves.

Read, I pray you, the speech of Joseph Shaw, a working man, at the Oldham Free-Trade meeting. You will find, it quoted in Mr. Cobden's speech at Covent-garden Theatre, reported in this number of the League; and the whole proceedings of that and other meetings in last week's LEAGUE. Read it now, and say if it does not very plainly show the general operation of the Corn Laws upon the condition of the working classes.

The action of those laws upon you is doubly mischievous: it injures trade and raises the price of food. You have less work, consequently lower wages; and those wages go for less in the market. Is not this to be thought of? Is not the Anti-Corn-Law League entitled to your hearty sympathy and co-operation?

Norwich returns one member who supports these laws, and helps to keep you down in your abyss of misery. Certain of your freemen, as the slaves are called, sold the cause of trade and commerce for drink and a bribe. Those men did you more mischief than the most grinding masters. They stood between you and the only hope that exists for your class. The only hope: for if Free Trade cannot bring improvement and deliverance, the world has nothing for you but penury and starvation. That the blunder and guilt of your last elections may be, on the first opportunity, redeemed, is the heart's wish of one whom neither years nor distance can make forgetful of his entrance in life as

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

REDUCTION OF CRIME.—It is our pleasing task to report this week a greatly diminished number of cases for trial at our quarter sessions. There were only eighteen cases of felony, and three for misdemeanour. Only three of the cases were from Preston.—Preston Guardian.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

De Bruijes-hall, Jan. 14.

SIR,—In your last LEAGUE you make remarks on a speech delivered at the Conservative meeting at Ashton-under-Lyne, by a Mr. De Hollingsworth. Now, if this is the same person who, some years ago, purchased an estate in the parish of Mottram, in Longdendale, called Hollingsworth-hall—and I am much inclined to think it is—he is entitled to be spoken of as one who has seen something of the world, and understands both men and things. I do not know what county, or even what part of her Majesty's empire, had the honour of his birth; but I have understood that he came to reside amongst cotton-spinners and weavers, in this remote and almost unknown part of Cheshire (till he made it his home), because it either belonged, or he thought it might have belonged, to his forefathers, which to an imaginative mind is sometimes the same thing; but, let this be as it may, his neighbours have greatly the advantage. I mean that those who have grown rich by manufacturing cotton the "last twenty-five years" will learn from him to retire on their fortunes and look out for estates of the same names as their own, where they can subscribe their notes of invitation. De Mellor of Mellor, "De Harrop of Harrop," &c., &c., and, like their friend Mr. De Hollingsworth, rail at us, at politicians and spinners, even if any of them should be known by the name of Peel, unless he has the "De" put before Peel.

I do not know what use you will make of this bit of mine, for reminding you of what I and the spinners of Ashton-under-Lyne think of Mr. De Hollingsworth's speech, and your remarks upon it; but they are at least all of them who attend Ashton-under-Lyne Conservative dinners) greatly obliged to him for such a rich treat as he gave them at their last meeting, although, as you say, there might "be a sprinkling of dirt" mixed with it. You, Mr. Editor, I think, should have a little more patience than you have shown in your remarks on this gathering at Ashton-under-Lyne, because it may have the effect of making people think, who have never thought before, and that is what you say you write your LEAGUE for. At any rate, the people of Ashton-under-Lyne will now have an opportunity of knowing which of their Conservative neighbours possess moral courage enough to spurn the man who has dared to spurn the memory of their fathers' or their own industry, as well as those who can meanly stoop to be told in their own Town-hall, that they are a low, degraded, and despised class, and unfit for a seat in the great assembly of the nation.

A CALM LOOKER-ON.

P.S.—There is a small house, of the annual value of say £4, in the gorge of the glen which bounds Mr. De Hollingsworth's estate on the north side, and this gorge is called the Bruijes; and in this house Mr. De Hollingsworth lived for some time, three or four years ago, when he advertised the Hollingsworth estate to let at a rent of, I believe, £350 per annum.

THE LAST LEAGUE MOVEMENT.

(From "Tait's Magazine.")

The recent movements of the Anti-Corn-Law League have been singularly successful in putting new life (not that life was at all lacking before) into an old agitation. The credit of their last move—the attack on the English county registration by means of the old constitutional weapon of the forty-shilling freehold franchise—is especially due, we believe, to the sagacious, inventive genius of Mr. Cobden. However this may be (it is a matter we are sure, about which Mr. Cobden and his coadjutors care extremely little), the scheme is the work of a master-mind in the art and science of agitation, and is plainly destined to exert a most powerful influence, not merely on the particular cause of Free Trade, but on all cognate questions of popular right and good government.

In every point of view, we rejoice to see this most important work in the hands of men who, of all our agitators and reformers, seem best to know precisely what they mean to do, and how to do it. This attack on the counties, so well opened with the conquest of South Lancashire, is the beginning of the end of the old conflict between industrialism and feudalism, the first move in the last campaign against aristocratic domination. In this good, plain, old-fashioned forty-shilling freehold franchise, so easy of attainment and defence—so happily left free from the "quidnits and quilllets" of revising barristers' law—the people of England have a lever power capable of uplifting the incubus of Toryism, not as in 1832, by a violent convulsive effort which it was impossible to sustain, but quietly, effectually, and once for all. Let a few more counties be won, as South Lancashire has been won, and never again will a Lord Stanley make the insolent boast that the results of county elections are ascertained by cataloguing the "great landed proprietors," and marking opposite to each man's name the twenty, fifty, or hundred vote power that he may have at his command. The great landed proprietors will be reduced to their constitutional dimensions at the polling-booth, by the little landed proprietors; and the "natural and legitimate influence of property" will be asserted, after a quite novel fashion, by the new democratic landed interest. It is not a little amusing, by the way, to see landlordism itself playing the game of the League, with its plans for remedying national distress by means of an "allotment system," a system whose virtues, whatever there may be, will probably be seen to best advantage in conjunction with freehold tenure and political independence. The allotment system of landlord philanthropy is, at the best, but a charitable make-shift for finding paupers in potatoes without troubling the rate-payers; the allotment system of the Free-Traders will supersede the philanthropy, by opening the ports to cheap bread, and making new markets for the paupers' labour. We wish the League all manner of success in the work, ing-out of this idea, and only regret that we, in Scotland, are disabled, by the state of our electoral law, from tendering our aid in any form more effectual than that of good wishes.

The attention which has of late been paid to the fair of registration, both by the English Free-Traders and the Irish Repealers, is a satisfactory sign of the growing strength of the popular cause in both countries. Active and successful management of registration business, we take to be the most decisive proof that any agitators can give, of being thoroughly in earnest. It is the best test we know of a people's or a party's political mettle. The business of the registration courts, is a tedious, troublesome, disagreeable, expensive business, in which your mere holiday patriots will never be seen meddling. It is a dry, mean-looking affair; a thing of petty and frivolous-seeming details, unrelieved by the excitement and enthusiasm that make the charm of Tara and Covent-garden meetings. It is easier to find men who, under the inspiration of "tremendous cheering," will speak valiant speeches, well spiced with sedition, than men who will go through the drudging of registration in a business-like way. Whenever we see men do this work well, we may be sure they will do any thing well that belongs to the civil department of political warfare. For the first time, since 1832, the people are now coming to understand their true position under the Reform Act. The fact is, that act, with its complicated registration machinery, effected a revolution in our politics of a far less obvious and appreciable kind than that wrought by its resumption and re-distribution of electoral franchises; a revolution which, from the very nature of it, the people have been slow of comprehending—and by which, hitherto, the operation of the main provisions of the measure has been virtually defeated. The Reform Act nullified popular excitement and enthusiasm as a power in electoral contests. The "enthusiasm" must take place some months before the election, and not wait for the Queen's writ. It must be annual, not septennial. A good "cry" at a dissolution is of little or no avail, if the lists have not been properly attended to. No ministry, party, or principle, can now take the country by storm. Such elections as those of 1830 and 1831 are henceforth impossible. The real business of an election is not now done at election time, but months and even years before, in the revising barrister's court. Virtually and practically, the registration is the election. Not eloquence, enthusiasm, public spirit, and principle, carry the day—but dogged patience and unsleeping attention in complying with the provisions of the statute. It is not enough for a man to be enlightened and patriotic: he must cultivate the habit of inspecting the lists on the church doors. In this state of things there are obviously great evils; we have experienced them to the full, during the last ten years, in a series of elections, each one of which has given us a worse House of Commons than its predecessor. But there are also some advantages, which, it is to be hoped—now that the subject is coming to be popularly and practically understood—will incredibly appear in future years, until the system shall be radically altered. It was in the nature of the thing that the first working of the new arrangement should be adverse to the people. The popular party, having the least and worst party organization, and being habitually prone to trust over-confidently in the inherent strength of a good cause, have, until very recently, grossly neglected registration; while the oligarchy have carefully obeyed, with untiring zeal and unscrupulous morality, the memorable mandate of their leader. It is among the best of the many good services which the Anti-Corn-Law League have rendered to the people's cause, that they have completely changed this. They have taught reformers to be as wary, as long-sighted, and as business-like as the Tories—to reinforce enthusiasm with patience and discipline—to "keep their powder dry," as well as "trust in the Providence" that defends and aids the right. Under the tuition of this extraordinary body of men, registration is every year becoming, more and more, the character of an annual election—an annual test of the strength of parties, and measure of the progress of opinion. The advantage is purchased, it must be confessed, at an extravagantly dear rate; still, we think it is an advantage, a useful item in a people's political education, to be thus compelled, by a disagreeable necessity, to exercise the most difficult of political virtues—habitual alertness and vigilance with a view to results of remote and uncertain occurrence. It is something to have learned, at whatever cost, to bring deliberate conviction, and steady, working activity, into the service of enthusiasm and patriotic principle. The people that can begin, in the second year of a new Parliament, to work for the next general election, may be said to have mastered the last and hardest lesson in the art and science of political freedom.

THE REVENUE.—THE HERALD'S "CURIOUS" DISCOVERY.

(From the Economist.)

The Morning Herald of Monday last attempts the following explanation:—

"We have made a discovery in the course of our researches, as curious, perhaps, as any discovery ever made in political science—namely, that the public revenue always runs almost pound for pound for every quarter of foreign grain imported—viz., that if one million, one million and a half, two millions, &c., are in given years paid for foreign corn, the public revenue always declines so nearly to the same sum as rarely to vary from it in the proportion of ten per cent. The present is not the fitting occasion to exhibit the tabular proofs, but we affirm the fact, and we submit it to all who have an interest in public credit as a demonstration that a repeal of the Corn Laws would, among many other calamitous results, inevitably lead to a national bankruptcy—a matter worthy the consideration of all whose property is either directly or indirectly committed to the public funds."

The Herald has made a "curious" discovery,—the revenue sinks one pound for every pound's worth of foreign corn imported; ergo, a repeal of the Corn Laws will "lead to a national bankruptcy." But why, then, does the Herald applaud Sir Robert Peel for his new Corn Bill, which has created nearly a Free Trade between that country and us? Why does the Herald rather not join the Morning Post, and cry out for strict protection—for a complete prohibition? For it is quite clear that if a free import of corn is to result in "national bankruptcy"—if for every pound's worth of corn imported, one pound of revenue is to be sacrificed, then the public creditor can never be safe, except with absolute prohibition.

We thank the Herald for this admission: but is it possible that our contemporary does not see how damaging it is to the whole policy which that journal advocates? We have heard so little of late of the Corn Laws, that the policy has been inadvertently forgot by our contemporary. It is quite true, as a general principle, that the revenue rises and falls with the quantity of corn imported; but had the Herald, in a "momentary forgetfulness," overlooked the fact, that its own dear principle is, that the imports of corn shall only slide into importance as the price slides into a famine state. In 1835 the price of wheat was 39s. per quarter; we imported no foreign corn, for under the sliding scale the duty was then higher than the whole price. In 1839 the price was upwards of 70s. per quarter; and the duty being reduced to one shilling per quarter, we imported 2,500,000 quarters of wheat.

In 1835 commerce was prosperous, manufactures flourished, labour was in great demand, with ample wages, and the revenue presented a large surplus. In 1839 all was the reverse—ruin, discredit, and sinking finances alarmed the stoutest hearts. The Herald will no doubt quote those two years as an evidence of its "curious discovery." The Herald sees that in the former year no corn was imported—in the latter, wheat alone to the value of upwards of £7,000,000 was imported; but the Herald overlooks the fact, that wheat was 39s. the quarter in 1835, and 72s. the quarter in 1839. And to which of these facts, thinks the Herald, are we to attribute the loss of revenue in 1839? To a famine price of 70s. a quarter, or to an import of 2,500,000 quarters of wheat, to prevent its rising to 100s. per quarter? But enough of this childishness. To what a pass must this would-be Government organ be reduced to parade this new and "curious discovery," made in the "course of its researches" in its leading columns, containing a fallacy so glaring and so manifest that every schoolboy must detect it.

If, however, the Herald wants one conclusive evidence that it is not large imports, but high prices, that are destructive of revenue; that it is not the absence of imports, but low prices that are so effective in increasing prosperity, we refer it only to the year just expired—to the year in respect to the revenue of which it is so exulting. It seldom has happened that we have had any considerable import of corn, except in years when prices have been very high. Last year has been an exception, and through the operation of the sliding scale very large sums of money have been lost; still we have had large imports. The comparison with the previous year, of the first eleven months of each, is as follows:—

CORN imported in the first eleven months of 1843.		1844.
Wheat ....	895,294 qrs. ....		978,308 qrs.
Barley ....	169,533		920,614
Oats ....	83,066		282,846
	1,147,893		2,081,768
Flour ....	315,786 cwt. ....		957,038 cwt.

—See Official Table in this paper.

The Herald has made the "curious discovery," that, to whatever extent the imports of grain take place, "the revenue always declines so nearly that precise sum as rarely to vary from it in the proportion of ten per cent.," but here, in the very year of which that paper is treating, in which the revenue has increased in its main features upwards of £2,000,000, the import of only three kinds of grain has increased nearly one million of quarters, and of flour upwards of six hundred thousand cwt. According to the rule of the new and "curious discovery" of our contemporary, the revenue of the year just expired ought to have diminished, at least, as much as it has increased, compared with that of 1843.

HEROIC versus SHOP-KEEPING POLICY.

(From the Spectator.)

French statesmen seek to extend the manufactures and commerce of their country and increase its wealth, with a view to increase its naval and military power. English statesmen seek to render the defensive establishments of their country by sea and land more perfect, in order to protect its manufactures and commerce. The statesmen of both countries direct their attention to the same objects; but what is the means with the one is the end with the other.

An interesting paper on the Mining Statistics of France, by Mr. Porter of the Board of Trade, which has just been published in the Journal of the Statistical Society, affords an opportunity of contrasting the results of what may be called the direct and indirect processes for increasing national power.

A strong steam-navy has become an object of desire in both countries. The most important material elements of a steam-navy are coal and iron. The French Government has set itself with energy to construct war-steamers; and has laboured strenuously by a system of artificial protection to increase the internal production of coal and iron, in order that in the event of a war it might be independent of foreign supplies. The protection afforded to the iron trade of France has been prompted less by a desire to increase the national wealth than to obtain a home supply of materials for war. Meanwhile, the English Government, though not inattentive to augmenting its force of war-steamers, has pursued with respect to the coal and iron trades a course of policy which had in view solely the general development of the national resources, regardless of their bearing upon our means of defence. While the French Government has been hedging its iron trade round with fiscal protection, the English Government has gradually been stripping its iron trade of every vestige of protection. The French Government, with an eye to contingent war, has been labouring to ensure a stock of warlike materials; the English Government, with an eye to turning peace to the best account, has left the day of war to care for itself.

The result has been, that in 1841 the quantity of coal raised in this country was at least ten times the quantity raised in France; and that in the same year four tons of iron were made in this country for every ton made in France. The coal consumed in the iron-works alone of Great Britain rather more than doubled the whole quantity of coal raised in France. In Great Britain, the average quantity of coal raised within the year by each person employed in coalmines was 253 tons; in France, it was only 116 tons. In France, 47,600 persons were employed in producing one-fourth the quantity of iron produced in Great Britain by 42,400. The price of iron to the consumer in France are from 100 to 250 per cent. higher than in England. France has not even succeeded in making herself independent of foreign supplies: the quantity of coal imported in 1841 was within a trifle of half the quantity raised; and nearly 50,000 tons of British iron was imported,—pig iron being subject to a duty of £3. 2s. 6d., and plates, bars, and rods, to a duty varying from 4s. 6d. to 4s. 12d.

Britain, in whose policy war has been scarcely taken into account at all, possesses at this moment a more abundant and cheap supply of materials for its steam-navy than France, which by the artificial encouragement given to its iron manufacture has diverted industry and capital from other branches of trade, voluntarily sacrificing wealth to increase its warlike force. France has in consequence only its royal steam navy to rely upon; while the steam navy of our wealthier traders could at a short notice supply a formidable body of war-steamers. If French statesmen would take a leaf out of the British book, and adopt a commercial policy really and sincerely intended to promote their country's commercial prosperity without any arrière pensée of war, they would find this indirect way of increasing the national strength by far the most certain.

However, British statesmen have little reason to assume airs of superiority over French statesmen, so long as the corn-protection folly of Great Britain survives to keep the iron-protection folly of France in countenance.

COUNTIES REGISTRATION MOVEMENT.

WIGAN.

On Thursday, the 9th inst., Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright attended a Free-Trade meeting at Wigan. The large room adjoining the Buck i' th' Vine Hotel was crowded to excess. Ralph Thicknesse, Esq., was called to the chair, and on and about the platform were Reece Bevan, Esq., Joseph Acton, Esq., Mr. Thos. Taylor, E. Evans, R. Leigh, T. C. Riley, Thos. Cook, and other leading gentlemen of the Free-Trade party.

Mr. Cobden spoke at length on the question of the Corn Law, especially dwelling upon the effects of monopoly upon the manufacturers and operatives of the district. He alluded in terms of merited severity to those employers who support the Corn Law in obedience to the call of party, when in private they admit the mischievous effects inflicted by it upon trade. The operatives had now a proof of the benefits of moderate prices of food, in the increased demand for their labour, and the higher wages now paid in almost every branch of manufacture. Mr. Cobden then explained the process by which the power of the squire might be effectually overcome, and the populous and manufacturing counties gained to Free Trade, and exhorted the Free-Traders of Wigan to enrol themselves upon the county register.

Mr. Bright directed the attention of the meeting to the sugar monopoly, explaining the injustice which it inflicts upon the consumer, and arguing from this one case how false are all the pretences of giving "protection" by a system whose principle is one of wrong, and which, if in active operation, must necessarily plunder the community. He then referred to the state of the borough of Wigan, returning one member for monopoly and one for Free-Trade; and strongly urged its electors to a more sensible exercise of their electoral trust. The Wigan elections have been notorious for expense to candidates and corruption among a portion of the voters; and Mr. Bright, in severe and powerful language, denounced the practices which have obtained among them, and entreated them to strive to redeem the character of the borough. The temporary gain of a bribe was little compared with the loss of self-respect and the upbraidings of conscience which the giver and the receiver of a bribe must feel; and, when the prosperity of trade and the comforts of multitudes of families depended upon the measures of the Government, a greater crime could scarcely be imagined than that which an elector committed who, for any base consideration, sold the interests of the country, and betrayed the trust reposed in him.

On the motion of Mr. EVANS, a committee was appointed to superintend and promote the registration for the county. JOSEPH ACTON Esq., then moved, and THOS. TAYLOR, Esq., seconded, a vote of thanks to the deputation, which was carried with great cheering.

Mr. COBDEN proposed thanks to the Chairman, which were carried with cheers; and the proceedings terminated. It is probable that on no former occasion has there been so good a Free-Trade meeting in Wigan; and there is every reason to hope that before long that borough will take its proper place among the constituencies returning none but Free-Traders to Parliament. There is material in the borough, and all that is wanting is a little more courageous leadership on the part of the more influential gentlemen.

From the proceedings of this evening we can foresee a great change for the better in the management of the Free-Trade question in Wigan.

BRAMLEY—WEST RIDING.

On Friday, the 10th instant, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright attended a very numerous meeting at Bramley. The townships of Bramley, Pudsey, Stanningley, and Farsley, contain a large number of county voters, and, from their being manufacturing townships, it was believed that a large addition might be made to the register. Bramley was selected as the place where the meeting should be held, and the Baptist Chapel in that village was crowded with an audience drawn from the surrounding villages. Mr. HATTON STANNFIELD, of Leeds, accompanied the deputation from the Council of the League, and on entering the chapel they were loudly cheered.

JOHN CLIFFE, Esq., a veteran Free-Trade, was called to the chair. On the platform were—Mr. George Andrews, Mr. Calvert, Mr. D. HAINSWORTH, Mr. P. HAINSWORTH, Mr. R. WILSON, Mr. Saul MURRAY, Mr. John AQUILLO, the Rev. James MACPHERSON (minister of the chapel), and other gentlemen.

Mr. COBDEN and Mr. BRIGHT addressed the meeting in most effective speeches. Every argument was responded to by the audience, and the utmost enthusiasm prevailed.

Mr. HATTON STANNFIELD briefly spoke, as also did Mr. S. MURRAY, Mr. P. HAINSWORTH, and other gentlemen.

The Rev. Mr. MACPHERSON expressed his gratification with the meeting, considering its object one of humanity, and in accordance with the benign precepts of the Christian religion.

A committee was appointed to carry out the plans of the League, and the utmost determination was manifested to increase the Free-Trade register for the district as much as possible.

The gentlemen of the deputation drove off amid the loud and reiterated cheering of the crowd by whom the carriage was surrounded.

MEETINGS IN THE HALIFAX POLLING DISTRICT.

The Halifax Committee, with a view to rouse the whole polling district, arranged for public meetings to be held in some of the more important townships, and procured the aid of Mr. Plint, of Leeds, at each of them. The series commenced at Elland, on Thursday evening, the 2nd inst., and was held in the school-room of the Wesleyan Chapel. Mr. Smith, of Elland, filled the chair. Mr. Plint addressed the audience, about 100 in number, for upwards of an hour and a half, and was heard with great attention and evident interest. At the conclusion, twelve names of persons who intend to qualify were given in, and it is believed that number will be made up to 16 or 18 before the 31st.—The following evening, Friday, the 3rd, a second meeting was held at Brighouse; the chair was ably filled by J. T. Clay, Esq., of Ristrick, and on the platform were Messrs. Holland (Sled-house), Messrs. Ormerod, and Mr. Sugden, and several other influential gentlemen of Brighouse and the neighbourhood. Mr. James Houston, and Messrs. R. and F. Crossley, of Halifax, attended as a deputation from that place. Mr. Houston, Mr. Plint, and Mr. R. Crossley addressed a very attentive and enthusiastic audience, consisting of nearly 300 persons, at some length; and at the conclusion of a vote of thanks to the chairman and the deputation, three hearty cheers were given for the League.—The third meeting was held in the school-room of the Independent Chapel, Northowram, on Monday, the 6th. The Rev. Mr. White was chairman, and Messrs J. Crossley, and — Whitworth, of Halifax, and Mr. Plint, were the speakers on the occasion. The audience was thin, and it was evident that information on the whole subject of Free Trade needs to be disseminated in this township. The population is principally engaged in the getting of stone and slate, and is palpably behind the population of the neighbouring townships, which is engaged in manufactures, in its appreciation of Free Trade.—On Tuesday, the 7th, a fourth meeting was held in the Methodist Association Chapel, Luddenden Foot. The chapel was well filled, and the chair was taken and ably filled by James Aker, Esq., of Kershaw-house. Mr. Dunbar, of Halifax, and Mr. Plint, successively addressed the meeting.—On the following evening, the concluding meeting was held at Sowerby Bridge, and a deputation of 10 gentlemen from the Halifax committee accompanied Mr. Plint. The chair was honourably filled by Mr. Thompson, corn miller, of Halifax, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. Dunbar and Mr. Plint. Notwithstanding the most unseemly interruptions of the Monopolist-Chartists at the two latter meetings, committees were formed at each place, and there appears to be the more zeal to canvass in consequence of the very conduct which was obviously intended to thwart the whole scheme.—Leeds Mercury.

NORTH CHESHIRE REGISTRATION.

The following letter, from one of the largest landed proprietors in North Cheshire, was sent to the committee which called the late meeting at Macclesfield to hear an address from Mr. Cobden:—

"GENTLEMEN,—As I cannot conveniently attend night meetings at a distance from home, you must accept my good wishes instead of my presence. Meanwhile I send you what is better than either, namely, an argument in favour of your cause—the extraordinary change which has occurred in the last four years in the economy of agriculture, and consequent facility of producing and selling the necessities of life. Improved machinery has supplied draining tiles at one-fourth of the old prices, and guano has enabled us to manure the land at a nearly similar saving of time, labour, and money. There is, moreover, no mode of investing capital more profitable than by the improvement of the soil, and thus turning sterility into fertility and abundance. With these appliances it is not difficult to show that protection to agriculture, though it may console the sloven who has neither money nor skill to do justice to the soil, is an unnecessary to enlightened farmers as it is offensive and unjust to the rest of society. Your obedient servant,

"E. D. DAVENPORT.

IMPORTANT DECISIONS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.—Thursday, January 16, 1845.—Before the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, Mr. Justice MAULE, Mr. Justice CROFT, and Mr. Justice KELL.

SOUTHERN DIVISION OF LANCAHIRE.

TOWNSHIP OF CHADDERTON.

Eckersley, appellant; Barker, respondent.

The respondent's name appeared on the list of voters for property situate in Chadderton, and was objected to by the appellant. The revising barrister retained the name, subject to the opinion of the court, on the following case:—

The respondent is seized, in fee-simple, of an undivided moiety of two cottages, situate in Tinker's-lane, Hollinwood. It appeared in evidence that none of the cottages were numbered, nor were they known by any name that any person inquiring in Tinker's-lane or the neighbourhood for the cottages claimed for would readily find them. It was objected, on the part of the appellant, that the description given, namely, "Tinker's lane, Hollinwood," was not a sufficient description, as required by 6 Vict., c. 18, reference being had to the form in the schedule A of that statute; and that, neither of the cottages being numbered or known by any name, the names of the occupying tenants should be inserted. The revising barrister ruled the contrary.

The case was argued last Michaelmas term, and the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE now delivered the judgment of the court. He said:—The objection in this case was, that the description in the list of voters of property in respect of which the respondent claimed the right to vote was insufficient, inasmuch as it omitted to state the name of the occupying tenant. The qualification is described to be in respect of "an undivided moiety of two firehold cottages in Tinker's-lane, Hollinwood," and it is stated as a fact in the case, that none of the cottages in Tinker's-lane, Hollinwood, are numbered, nor are either of the two cottages known by any particular name. The question therefore is, whether, under the circumstances of this case, the name of the occupying tenant is required to be inserted; and we think, upon the proper construction of the act, it is not. The 4th section of the statute 6 Vict., c. 18, requires the names of claim to be delivered or sent to the overseers, according to the form in schedule A, No. 2, or to that effect; and that form requires the street, lane, or other like place, and number of the house (if any) where the property is situate, or name of the property, if known by any, or name of the occupying tenant, to be inserted; and we think the word "or" in this form is disjunctive, and creates three different descriptions, and that it is sufficient if the qualification be brought within any one of them: namely, either the street or lane, and number, if any; the name of the property, if any; or the name of the occupying tenant, if any. And although it is contended that the fifth section of the act, which requires the overseers to make out, according to the form No. 3, in schedule A, an alphabetical list of the claimants,—containing (amongst other things) "the nature of his qualification, and the local or other description of his property, and the name of the occupying tenant thereof," and that, consequently, the name of the occupying tenant must be inserted in each case,—yet it appears a sufficient answer that this direction is qualified and restricted by the words which immediately follow, namely, "That the same shall be written as they are stated in the claim." The direction at the head of the form No. 2 appears to us to intend, that if the house is in a street, lane, or other like place in the parish, the street or lane should be mentioned, and if the houses are numbered the number also should be given; but that if the house and premises are not in a street or lane or other like place, but in a road or on a common, or the like, then the name of the property should be given, if known by any, or the name of the occupying tenant. If, however, the two latter requisites are held to apply necessarily to the house or premises, when situate in a street or lane, then this inconvenience would follow, that there is no description required by the act to be given to a house or premises not situate in a street or lane, or other like place. The direction given by the Legislature to the overseers in the statute 2 Wm. IV., c. 45, sec. 37, for the framing of their notice, according to the form No. 1 in the schedule H to that act, which is a notice precisely for the same object as that required by the 6 Vict., c. 18, sec. 4, is so expressed as to leave no doubt but that the requisition to give the name of the property, or the name of the occupying tenant, only holds where the house is not situate in a street, lane, or other like place. The act 6 Vict., c. 18, is made in pari materia with the former act, it may be properly inferred that no more is required by the later act than by the former. The court, therefore, think the decision of the revising barrister was right.—Decision affirmed.

DECISION AGAINST THE RIGHT OF LODGERS IN BOROUGHS VOTING.

CITY OF WESTMINSTER, ST. MARY-LE-STRAND.

Pitts, appellant; Smedley, respondent.

Samuel Marshall is owner of a house, 17, Catherine-street, Strand. He occupies the shop and first floor; he lets the other floors to several lodgers, Samuel Pitts being one, who rents the second and third floors, at a weekly rent amounting to £26 a year; he has the exclusive control over those rooms, and has the keys, which are in his own possession, and also a latch-key by which he lets himself in at night. There are other lodgers in the house, to some of whom the landlord gives latch-keys; but he sometimes has young men as lodgers, and to them he does not intrust the latch-keys. Claimant's right of egress and ingress has never been interfered with by the landlord. There is another lock to the entrance-door, but he has never seen the key of it; when he has found it locked, he has entered through the shop. Pitts's name appears along with Marshall's in the rate made in November, 1843, and upon the subsequent rates; there was no rate made between April and November, 1843. Charles Marshall not only occupies the ground floor and the shop, but also resides with his family on the premises. The question for the opinion of the court was, whether Samuel Pitts had such an exclusive occupation of the second and third floors, in the house, 17, Catherine-street, as to confer the franchise on that point.

The revising barrister held that the claimant had not such exclusive occupation.

Mr. COCKBURN having addressed the court for the appellant,

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE (without calling upon the learned counsel for the respondent to address them) delivered the judgment of the court as follows:—It appears to me that this case is free from any doubt. The question is whether the claimant here occupies this part of the house as "owner or tenant," for these are the words of the statute; and the question does not turn upon the description of the premises or building, but upon the nature of the occupation. This is a case in which the landlord occupies the ground floor, and resides in the house—living there. All that he has done has been to give a limited enjoyment of this part of the house to such person as the claimant; I call it a limited enjoyment, because the door of the house has a lock upon it, and it is stated in the case that the party has no key to that lock; it is also stated that when he found it locked that he has gone through the shop; and this is not an actual occupation of a separate building in any way, but the party is merely a lodger of the landlord; therefore, the decision of the revising barrister was right, and therefore must be confirmed.

The learned counsel for the respondent applied for costs, which the court allowed.

Score v. Hugget.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister of the city of Westminster.

At the revision, George Bedford claimed to be inserted in the list of voters for the parish of St. James, Westminster, in respect of the occupation of apartments at No. 7, Leicester-street, Regent-street. The apartments consisted of two rooms on the second floor, for which he paid £20. 10s. a year rent. Other rooms in the house were occupied by other persons. The access to the first and other floors was by the common street door of the house, a key of which was in the possession of each of the occupiers, who had each a key of the respective apartments in his own occupation, and the exclusive right of access thereto. The landlord did not reside in or occupy any part of the house. The revising barrister decided that the occupation of the two rooms in question by Bedford was sufficient, and allowed the claim.

Mr. MANWATERMAN appeared for the appellant, and endeavoured to distinguish this from the case of "Wright v. the Town-clerk of Stockport," but

The COURT (without calling on Mr. Cockburn, who was on the other side) at once held that there was a separate occupation by the parties, quite different from that in "Pitts v. Smedley," and that the decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed, with costs.

BOROUGH OF TOTNESS.

Toms, appellant; Cuming, respondent.

In this case the point reserved for the opinion of the court was whether a copy of a notice of objection was a duplicate if the copy was not signed by the objector himself, but with his name by some other party.

The revising barrister decided that the duplicate notice was void, it not bearing the personal signature of the objector.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in giving judgment, said it appeared to him that the objector had not put himself within the meaning of the 100th section of the 6 Vict., c. 18, by which section he was to deliver the notice open and in duplicate to the postmaster, thereby making both of them originals. In this case the objector had not signed the duplicate: he, therefore, thought that the objector had not delivered the notice to the postmaster "open and in duplicate." The decision must, therefore, be affirmed.

The other Judges were of the same opinion.

Decision affirmed.

HILARY TERM, 1845.

On Tuesday the Court of Common Pleas appointed the following days for hearing the appeals from the revising barristers' courts, viz.:—

Thursday, the 16th of January, 1845.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.—As a proof that the condition of the operative classes has improved in this neighbourhood, we may instance that, in the course of the week, upwards of 150 marriages have been solemnized in the town.—Bolton Free Press.

NEWSPAPER CORRESPONDENTS.—A contemporary, in answer to a querulous correspondent, has the following note, which will be found applicable to, probably, every newspaper in Great Britain:—"The correspondent who will best understand this paragraph is respectfully requested to recollect that newspapers are not produced by supernatural means, nor even prepared, and printed, and published after the manner that many patent and very useful articles are manufactured, 'to order.' He will have the liberality to consider how obliging an editor must become before he can satisfy every reader—every contributor—every correspondent—and every applicant. He will have the kindness to reflect upon the amount of mental and physical labour necessary for producing a paper calculated to please everybody. He will good-naturedly calculate the profit likely to accrue from editorial pursuits—and, above all, he will have the honest manliness to admit that, in the management of a journal, it is better to deserve general support than to strive for individual patronage."

LECTURE ON PEACE.—On Wednesday evening the 15th inst., Mr. George Thompson, at the request of the committee of the London Peace Society, delivered a lecture to a crowded audience in the Hall of Commerce, Finsbury-street. The hon. gentleman on rising was loudly cheered. He stated that the merchants of the city of London had lately paid a very high compliment to a distinguished and gallant individual, who, as the representative of her gracious Majesty, had brought about a peace with China, and had negotiated a treaty of commerce with that empire. He, Mr. Thompson, had no wish to diminish the gratitude and respect with which Sir H. Pottinger was regarded by the people of this country. As a public servant he had nobly done his duty, and was entitled to the thanks of his employers. As, however, there had not been in any of the entertainments recently given to Sir Henry Pottinger an allusion even to the origin of the war with China, or any description of the circumstances by which that war was characterized, he deemed it right to avail himself of the present opportunity of directing attention to the real grounds of the quarrel, and to the nature and consequences of the war to which it had given rise. Mr. Thompson then related the history of British intercourse with China, down to the year 1839, and afterwards gave a vivid description of the horrors of the war, which then dilated upon the unchristian and brutal character of such expeditions and aggressions, under the plea of promoting the ends of commerce, and called upon his audience to determine with what amount of joy the truly patriotic should be hailed, when viewed in connection with the barbarities which had been perpetrated, and the crimes committed against all the laws of morality as well as of nations. Mr. Thompson concluded by an earnest exhortation to his audience to consider the subject of war in connection with the happiness of mankind, and the duties imposed by religion, and not down to the narrow and selfish views of the mercantile class.

AGRICULTURE.

A HINT TO GAME-PRESERVERS.

A Correspondent at Hertford writes to us:—"Lord Essex has given Mr John Hardcastle (the tenant of his who occupied close to the palls of his park, and who showed him up very cleverly respecting the game system) notice to quit, and we are now getting subscriptions from the farmers to present him with a piece of plate, in order to testify our hatred of LANDLORDISM and GAME-PRESERVERS, and our approbation of the manly and spirited conduct of Mr. Hardcastle, who, I believe, is, or was a CONSERVATIVE; but, perhaps, this lesson may make him a Free-Trader. As you have already noticed this case in your paper, probably you may think these facts worthy of notice."

MONOPOLY RENTS, OR CORN RENTS?

WHO GETS THE LION'S SHARE?

Future historians of British agriculture will probably refer to the expectations farmers have entertained that profit could be created by high prices and artificial scarcity, as the most extraordinary of popular delusions. That landowners should desire high prices, the result of small produce, is intelligible. Their object is high rent, and the shortest road to a high rent is an artificially-enhanced scale of prices. But that the actual cultivators of land should seek an artificial enhancement of prices seems surprising. In the first place, prices are always tending towards the natural, and receding from the artificial standard. Good harvests, improved cultivation over any considerable portion of the country, sudden or excessive importation, and various other circumstances cause prices frequently to fall below the rate at which the makers of the artificial standard tried to fix them. But as both landlords and tenants have believed in the efficacy of the law—the Corn Law—to create an artificial scarcity, and thereby to obtain permanently high prices, rents have been fixed according to the artificial standard. In other words, farmers and land-valuers have agreed to estimate rents as if wheat grown on all the land of this country could always be sold at from 56s. to 60s. a quarter. But in fact wheat now sells for only 41s. a quarter. That alone would account for the distress of farmers. That will in a great measure explain such paragraphs as the following, which we have taken from the Mark-lane Express:

"Lord Bagot, at his recent audit, taking into consideration the depression prevailing in all agricultural produce, made a remission of 15 per cent. on the rents of his numerous tenantry in Staffordshire," and probably the same thing has been done upon most of the large estates in England. Now what is this but an admission on the part of the landowners that they have made an unconscientious bargain with their tenantry? And is there any one simple enough to imagine that, by these paragraph-paraded abatements of rent, the landlords give back all they have unfairly obtained from their tenants?

There is but one way in which these fluctuations can be provided for with common fairness and honesty towards tenant-farmers, namely, by the immediate adoption of corn-rents. On this topic our agricultural readers will peruse with advantage a letter addressed by Mr. Cobden to the Mark-lane Express, which we shall refer to more particularly next week, and which forms part of a controversy on the subject of rent now going on in that journal.

In the next place, the effect of high prices, and the expectation—whether well-founded or not—of high prices is to give the landlord as rent an undue proportion of the gross produce of a farm; and that at the expense of the tenant's profits.

It has been again and again shown that nearly as much as one-half of the whole produce, saleable produce, of a farm is usually required to pay the rent and tithes. Yet in the face of this we constantly find landlords and their land-agents offering certain ideal calculations of the cost of growing an acre of wheat, barley, or oats, and then they refer to the amount of the rent per acre, and say, "How small a proportion does the rent bear to the whole expense of cultivation." These people seem to forget that rent can properly be only the surplus after repayment to the farmer of all the costs of cultivation, with the ordinary profit on the capital employed. How few farmers, under our present system, are able to realize this! The way in which these calculations are concocted cannot be better illustrated than by taking from Mr. Robert Baker's prize essay on the agriculture of Essex, what he calls the expense of an acre of barley:—

First year, making the fallow, three whole tithes, and one strike, at 8s.	£	s.	d.
Two harrowings	0	1	4
Seed tithes	0	8	0
Harrowing	0	1	4
Seed, four bushels	0	16	0
Sowing	0	0	4

He then adds other items of the same sort, with two years' rent, tithes, taxes, and so forth, and makes the whole cost £28. 1s. 8d., estimating the total crop to be worth £10, "leaving £18. 4d. for implements, wear and tear, consumed and property taxes, and for two years' profit." Now, the absurdity of this mode of calculation is manifest; for why are all the ploughings, harrowings, &c., to be estimated in money? The true and the only mode of keeping a farming account, is to state the aggregate sum invested as capital, and then to enter the actual yearly money payments and money receipts. Let that be done, and we shall soon see who gets the lion's share of the produce of the soil.

And this view is borne out by Mr. Bacon's prize essay on Norfolk agriculture, wherein, after giving, in great detail, the debtor and creditor money accounts of various farms in Norfolk for periods extending over several years, he says, "In comparing the gross produce with the rent, it must be borne in mind that the expenditure for manure is 10s. an acre, and the consumption of artificial food (oilcake, &c.) about 8s.; if these last be considered as a fixed sum, it would about double the rent, and the gross produce would hardly exceed 2.55 of the rent."

We are glad to learn that farmers are looking into this question, of what proportion rent bears to their whole selling produce; they will find that it will repay them for their trouble.

The Corn Laws materially increase the landlord's share of the whole produce of the farm. It is true they cause the whole produce to be far less than it would be under a natural state of things, but the landlord obtains as much, or nearly as much, now as he would if the farmer should become really an occupier on his own account, instead of living a mere bailiff to scrape up the landlord's rent, as he too commonly is at present. This may be easily made evident. Under the existing competition for farms amongst farmers, the landlord obtains as rent an enormous proportion of the whole produce which can be raised upon a system of yearly tenancies. He also obtains a rent calculated according to the Corn-Law scale. Land-agents assume that prices will always be up to the top of the act-of-Parliament scale, and that the land will every year produce what it may grow in the most favourable seasons; and farmers, especially those short of capital, who are eager to get or to keep farms, blindly fall into the pit, and enter into engagements which, in three years out of five, render them helpless supplicants for abatements of rent and other indulgences.

Now, let the trade in corn be free, and farmers will no longer be deluded into the expectation of making a profit by high prices with short crops, and then they will not take farms unless they can get them for long terms of years. They will enter upon their business with more caution and calculation, and will look to the results of outlays extending over several years for profitable returns. They will invest more capital, and, of course, obtain much larger produce. But of this produce a much greater amount than at present will be raised, through the capital, enterprise, and skill of the farmers, which will form their own reward. Landlords will be thankful if they get as high rents as they do now, and must no longer seek to grasp more than a fair surplus after the costs of cultivation have been repaid to the farmer; at the same time the lease will give the farmer independence, and advance his social happiness and personal respectability, no less than it will increase his pecuniary gains.

Free Trade is necessary to render the farmer's business one in which, taking one year with another, a man of moderate means and intelligence can secure a livelihood and a competency. This is so obvious that nothing more is required to make all farmers Free-Traders, than thoroughly to understand their own position, especially as regards the immense proportion of their saleable produce which goes "to make up the rent." This we will try to help them to comprehend.

THE MODERN MOLOCH.

The following unequivocal expression of the opinion generally entertained by the public, was given on the occasion of an inquest held on the body of a man whose life had been sacrificed at the shrine of landlords' sports:—

"THE GAME LAWS.—A jury impanelled at Worcester, touching the death of a gamekeeper, made the following important declaration:—That the jury cannot but deplore the continuance of laws so immoral in their tendency, so fruitful in crime, and so destructive to human life as the game laws have proved, after long experience throughout the length and breadth of the country, and that they strongly recommend their abrogation."—Provincial paper.

This is significant; will our landowning legislators regard the warning on the wall?

A meeting was held last week in the Town-hall, Galtonborough, for the purpose of forming an association to arrest the progress of lucubration. Several influential farmers and landowners were present. Resolutions were agreed to, and a committee appointed to carry out the objects of the meeting. About £700 was subscribed before the meeting separated.

A mendicant, named James Burnett, was committed for fourteen days at Queen-square, on Wednesday last, for begging in the streets. He is one of those wretched looking beings who abstract money from the burials by lying on the flags with the word "starvation" written before them; when taken by the police, he was found to have his pocket well stored with "coppers," the fruits of this "ingenious device."

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, January 18, 1845.

All parties that feel themselves specially aggrieved by taxation are pressing their claims for reduction on the Ministry and the country with all the earnestness that self-interest can inspire. The most reasonable and forcible arguments are put forward by those who object to the taxes that have been imposed upon the raw materials of manufacture, and certainly nothing but the most stringent exigencies of the State can justify their continuance. Now, the heaviest and most extensive tax imposed on the raw materials of manufacture is one which may be abolished with very little loss to the revenue, and the remission of which would most effectually benefit the artisan, the operative, and the labourer. Food is an element of manufacture in every one of the departments of industry; that which supports the labourer is obviously an essential element of labour; food is therefore worked up in our clothes and our calicoes, in our glass and our earthenware, in our tin and in our iron; in all that we produce for exportation, and in all that we retain for consumption at home. While various sections of manufacturers are pressing their claims on the Cabinet and the Legislature, precedence should be given to that demand for relief which includes the common interest of them all. The repeal of this iniquitous and impolitic tax, which injures the consumer without benefiting the revenue, is so strongly recommended by moral as well as economic considerations, that nothing but the intense selfishness of class could resist the reasonable demands for its remission. Cheap food has been proved to be concomitant with increased demand for labour, an increased amount of wages, an increased consumption of articles taxed for the benefit of the State, and an increased revenue. Here, then, is a tax the repeal of which will be equally advantageous to the industrial classes and to the State itself.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The discussion in the French Chamber of Deputies on the address commenced on Monday, and was continued on Tuesday and Wednesday. There prevails considerable doubt as to whether the Ministry of M. Guizot will have a majority. They are opposed by M. Molé, who is known to be the favourite of the King; from which it is conceived that his Majesty is not averse to a change of Ministry. If this be the case, the defeat of the Ministry, and their consequent resignation, may be looked for. The newest and most important fact of the sitting, was the announcement that the English Government had consented to a mixed commission, for inquiring as to the means of revising the right-of-search treaties.

SPAIN.—On the 7th instant the Senate adopted the Slave-Trade Suppression Bill.

SWITZERLAND.—At the sitting of the Grand Council of Lucerne, held on the 7th, a decree was passed whereby all the expenses of the Government in securing the arrest of the authors of the late revolution, and in carrying into effect the measures resolved upon for its suppression, are to be paid out of the property of the delinquents. All persons implicated in the revolt are declared incapable of disposing of any part of their property.

The New Zurich Gazette states that the Council of Regency of Lucerne has announced the definite adoption of the arrangement with the Jesuits, and that it entered into operation on the 5th instant.

REPORTED DEATH OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.—News reached London on Thursday, through Brussels, of the death of the Emperor of Russia. It was not official, but the Belair, a Ministerial paper, published in that city, stated that there was no doubt of its authenticity. This intelligence caused a fall in the funds, both at Brussels and Amsterdam. Since doubt, however, has been cast upon it in consequence of no report of the event having reached the Russian Embassy in London, and also that it is not probable it would have been forwarded through Brussels, but by way of Berlin. This doubt is further increased by the absence of any positive intelligence up to yesterday (Friday). It is, however, supposed to be a mere stock-jubbing rumour.

PRAQUE.—A letter from Prague of the 2nd states, that from the commencement of the disease in horned cattle up to Dec. 22, the disease raged in 129 different places in Bohemia, that 2143 horned cattle were attacked by it, of which number 106 only had recovered; 1044 having died of the complaint, 880 were necessarily killed, and 33 were still under the scourge.

SWEDEN.—We learn from Stockholm, December 27, that the King of Sweden, although strongly desirous of effecting capital punishment from the penal code of that country, has consented to its being retained, a large majority of the Council of State having decided for the maintenance of it.

UNITED STATES.—The British and North American Royal Mail steamer Acadia arrived at Liverpool, on Tuesday, bringing intelligence from New York to the 31st ult. Another joint resolution, providing for the annexation of Texas to the United States, "in conformity with the treaty of 1803 for the purchase of Louisiana," was making way through the House of Representatives, having been introduced, read a first and second time, and referred to the committee of the whole house, in one day. The New York Herald states, that annexation would be consummated in the course of a few days by both houses. A memorial from respectable citizens of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to appropriate the public domain for the purchase and liberation of the slaves of the United States, was laid on the table of the House of Representatives on the 23rd ult.—by ayes, 49; noes, 117. A stormy debate had arisen on a series of resolutions proposed by the Pro-Slavery member for South Carolina, Mr. Pickens declaring the recent resolve of the House of Representatives to receive petitions against slavery a flagrant outrage on the rights of South Carolina, and dangerous to the stability of the federal compact, &c. Considerable agitation prevails in the States on the subject of slavery, the slaveholders being evidently apprehensive of the further spread of abolitionism.

Miss Della Webster, recently convicted of aiding slaves to escape at Lexington, Kentucky, has been sentenced to two years' confinement in the Penitentiary; the Rev. Mr. Torrey, at Baltimore, convicted of a similar act, to several terms of confinement, amounting in the whole to seven years and three months; and Mr. Walker, Missouri, and Mr. Kelly, in Virginia, have had the like sentence passed upon them.

A terrible steamboat explosion occurred, on the 14th ult., on the Mississippi. The Belle, of Clarksville, from New Orleans for Nashville, came into collision with the Louisiana, from Memphis to Orleans, and immediately sunk; the number of passengers who perished was thirty-one.

MEXICO.—Latest accounts represent that the insurrection against Santa Anna was spreading, the principal towns having pronounced against him. The great object of the revolution is to decide whether Santa Anna shall be precipitated from power, or whether, on the other hand, he shall be the permanent dictator and arbitrary master of the Government.

VENEZUELA.—Accounts from Lagunayra, of the 15th of November, state that an insurrection, of rather a serious character, had recently broken out in the neighbourhood of Lezama, in this province, some sixty or seventy miles from Caracas. A body of troops was immediately despatched by the Government to the camp of the insurgents, for the purpose of restoring order; on their arrival, a flag of truce was sent to the hostile army, with offers of pardon and protection to all who would return peacefully to their homes. These offers were, however, rejected, and a battle ensued, which resulted in the complete overthrow of the rebels, and the death of their leaders, Centeno and Alvarado.

DOMESTIC.

On Monday the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz (daughter of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge) was safely delivered of a Prince, though unhappily it shortly afterwards expired.

The Queen and Prince Albert left Windsor Castle on Wednesday for Stowe, the seat of the Duke of Buckingham, with whom they are now stopping on a visit.

The foundation-stone of a steam busin was laid at Portsmouth on Monday, by Sir Hyde Parker, C.B., superintendent of the dockyard.

On Monday morning, at ten o'clock, an inquiry, adjourned from the previous Friday, was resumed and concluded before Mr. Wakley, M.P., at the Horse and Groam, Seven Dials, on the body of Joseph Leonard, an Italian boy, aged fifteen, who was found dying in the streets in a state of destitution, and expired on Wednesday last in St. Giles's workhouse, to which he was conveyed. The deceased was one of those unfortunate creatures who are brought over in shoals to this country to perambulate the streets with hand-organs, and to solicit charity. In the course of the investigation, which lasted six hours, and excited great interest, it appeared that the deceased, named Rabbotti, was in the employment of an Italian, named Rabbotti; they were obliged to go out at nine in the morning, and remain out pursuing their avocation till eleven at night. Two of the boys said that they were well treated by their master, but a lad named Fortunati alleged several acts of cruelty by Rabbotti towards the deceased. Deceased was labouring under disease of the chest, and constantly complained. Notwithstanding this, he was compelled to go for the usual time into the streets with his organ. There was no written agreement between Rabbotti and those he employed, but the term for which they were engaged on being brought from Italy was two years and a half. Whatever money a boy brought home at night, he had to divide with the master for the use of the organ. A gentleman who was present said that the amount of cruelty practised upon these poor defenceless boys by their rapacious masters was inconceivable. The jury returned a verdict of natural death, but accompanied it with a severe censure on the conduct of Rabbotti, for allowing the deceased to be exposed to the inclemency of the weather whilst labouring under illness. It was stated, in the course of the inquiry, that in the metropolis and principal manufacturing towns of England there are 1000 Italian organ boys, who draw from the public a sum exceeding £20,000 annually.

A woman named Sarah Freeman, a most abandoned character, has been committed, on the verdict of a coroner's jury, held on the body of her brother Charles Diamond, at Shipwick, Somersetshire, to take her trial for having wilfully murdered him, there being strong suspicion that she administered arsenic in some food which she gave him on the 24th ultimo, of which he died. The case has created intense excitement at Shipwick, not simply arising from the circumstances connected with the case for which the prisoner stands committed, but from the fact, that within a short time she has buried no less than five of her nearest relatives, besides her brother—viz., her mother, who was buried about three weeks since, three of her illegitimate children, and her husband. The body of the mother has been exhumed, and no doubt is stated to exist of the fact that the unfortunate woman was poisoned.

On Monday the 6th inst. the Berwick Theatre and Assembly-rooms were destroyed by fire. The cause of the fire is unknown, but it is believed to have been accidental.

The Repeal Association met at the Conciliation Hall on Monday. The chair was occupied by Mr. Davis, barrister, one of the editors of the Nation. A letter was read from Mr. O'Connell, announcing his intention to be in Dublin on the 18th or the 19th inst. Several speeches were made, strongly deprecating the Pope's letter to Dr. Crolly, and denying his right to interfere, or to use his spiritual influence or authority, in the political affairs of Ireland. The rent for the week amounted to £230.

The Roman Catholic Primate of Ireland, Dr. Crolly, has addressed a letter to Mr. O'Connell, expressing his regret and surprise at Mr. O'Connell's denial that the letter sent to him (Dr. Crolly) some time since from the see of Rome was not canonical. Dr. Crolly publishes the referred-to document, which is in Latin, and the purport of which is to urge the Primate to use his official authority and influence to check the Irish Roman Catholic priesthood from engaging in political agitation. The Archbishop also publishes a resolution passed unanimously by the assembled bishops in November last, in Dublin, acknowledging the receipt of the Pope's letter, and pledging themselves to carry the spirit of it into effect.

Meetings hostile to the Charitable Bequests' Act continue to be held in Ireland.

The Manchester subscription for public parks, &c., now amounts to a sum of nearly £30,000, so that the committee is now in a position to apply to Government for a grant.

The Manchester testimonial to Rowland Hill, amounting to upwards of £1400, (after deducting expenses) has been presented, by Sir Thomas Potter, treasurer, to that gentleman.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, Jan. 18.—The supply of English Wheat last week was large; it was chiefly from Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire, and direct to the millers; there was only a moderate quantity fresh up this morning from the home counties, and the condition being generally indifferent it was taken off slowly at about the same prices as this day week. There was a fair demand for Foreign Wheat at former rates. The secondary quality of English Harley were 1s. cheaper, and even the best samples barely maintained the rates of this day week, but there was no alteration in the value of Foreign. Beans were again rather cheaper. No alteration in Peas. The return shows a large arrival of Irish Oats, in addition to which several vessels arrived in time for this day's market; there was a free sale to country buyers at 1s. decline from last Monday. The supply of Scotch Oats not being so large as last week, prices were little if any lower.

FRIDAY, Jan. 17.—We have had liberal supplies of all Grain since Monday, particularly of Oats from Ireland. Of the Wheat which has arrived, much of it is direct to the millers. There is but little inquiry for the samples offered for sale, and they are disposed of with difficulty at Monday's rates. The quantity of good Foreign Wheat left on hand is so small, that the holders do not press sales, and former prices are therefore fully maintained, but the demand is by no means active. English Harley of all descriptions is difficult of disposal. Factors have been unwilling to force sales, so that prices are not at present lower than last Monday, but much of this week's supply remains on hand. Foreign Barley for distilling and grinding is held firmly, and the few sales made are at former rates. The impression being truly general that Oats are not at safe prices, the dealers have shown more disposition to get into stock, and a fair proportion of the supply has been disposed of on Wednesday and to-day at about Monday's rates. No alteration in Beans and Peas. There was no variation in the duties yesterday.

THE LEAGUE.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward their contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quentin Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund. By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

Manchester, Jan. 13, 1845.

The League Bazaar will be held during the month of May next, in the Theatre Royal Covent Garden.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

Persons wishing to be on the Register next year, as Freeholders for County Votes, must be in possession of the property, or in the receipt of the rents and profits, before the 31st of January.

QUALIFY, QUALIFY, QUALIFY.

PRACTICAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR ELECTORAL QUALIFICATION.

The electors for counties are as follows:—Freeholders, copyholders, leaseholders, occupying tenants.

FREEHOLDERS.—The following persons are entitled to vote as freeholders:—1. Any person possessed of a freehold estate for himself and his heirs, or, as it is called, an estate of inheritance, of the yearly value of 40s. 2. Any person possessed of a freehold estate for life or lives of the yearly value of £10. 3. Any person possessed of such an estate for life or lives of the yearly value of 40s., under any one of the following circumstances:—If the estate was acquired on or before the 7th of June, 1832; or since, if by marriage or marriage settlement, by devise (i.e., by will), or by promotion to any benefice or office, or if the freeholder is himself the actual occupier of the property. In any of these cases it is sufficient if the property be of the yearly value of 40s. Parish clerks, sextons, schoolmasters, Dissenting ministers, and holders of offices have a right to vote if entitled to emoluments of 40s. per annum, arising out of, or charged upon, land, and may be registered as voters in the parish wherein the land is situate. The appointment must, however, be for life, not for a temporary purpose, or at the pleasure of any other party; but an appointment during good behaviour is considered to be an appointment for life. If the freeholder occupy his own freehold property in a borough, of such a nature and value as would confer upon him the right to vote for the borough, he will not be entitled, in respect of that property, to vote for the county. But if the freehold is not of the right of voting for the borough, that is, if it be not of the annual value of £10, or if it be land without building, the freeholder may vote for the county, though he occupy it himself. And if the freeholder do not occupy his freehold situate within a borough, he may vote in respect of it for the county, and his tenant may also vote for the borough. Six months' possession prior to the 31st of July will entitle a freeholder to be registered. And if the freehold lands or tenements should be sold to him by descent, succession, marriage, marriage-settlement, will, or promotion to any benefice in a church, or to any office, no definite period of previous possession will be necessary.

COPYHOLDERS.—Any person possessed of any lands or tenements of the clear yearly value of £10, whether of copyhold or any other tenure than freehold, is entitled to vote in ancient demesne may in general vote as a freeholder, if they do not hold by copy of court-roll, but they will be entitled as copyholders. As freeholders, £10 a year is required. The same period of possession is required in respect of copyhold property.

LEASEHOLDERS.—The right of voting in respect of leasehold property extends to—1. Any person who is entitled by virtue of a lease made or assigned to him of any lands or tenements for the unexpired residue of any term originally created for a period of not less than 60 years, if the property is of the clear yearly value of £10 above all rents and charges. 2. Any person who is in like manner entitled to the unexpired residue of a term originally of 20 years, if the lands and tenements are of the clear yearly value of £50. The party to whom the lease was originally made, or a party to whom such lease may have assigned the original lease, may vote, though not in occupation of the premises. Any sub-lessee or assignee of an under-lease may also vote, but only when in occupation of the premises. Lessees or assignees must have been in actual possession for 12 months previous to the 31st of July, unless the qualification is acquired by any of the modes before mentioned as excepted; that is to say, by the death of a relative, by marriage, by will, or by promotion to any benefice or office. Leasehold property in a borough, if of such nature and value as will give any person a vote for the borough, will not give a vote for the county.

OCCUPYING TENANT.—Any person occupying lands or tenements for which he is liable to pay a yearly rent of £50 is entitled to vote, if not within a borough, and not of such nature as would qualify a person to vote for the borough. In respect of the period of previous possession required, occupying tenants are placed on the same footing as leaseholders; but it is not requisite that the occupation be of the same lands or tenements: different lands and tenements occupied in immediate succession for twelve months previous to the 31st of July in each year will give the qualification.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.—Besides lands, houses, buildings, and the like, property and interests of the following description will entitle the owner to be registered and to vote, viz.—tithes, an annuity charged on land, a rent-charge, fee-farm rents issuing out of an estate in fee; shares in navigable rivers, canals, &c., where the shareholders possess an interest in the soil; tolls of bridges, tolls of fairs and markets, purchases of unredeemed land-tax. Persons who have entered into an agreement of purchase of property, or who have paid any part of the purchase-money, or done any other act in part performance of the agreement, are considered to have equitable estates, and are entitled to vote and to be registered. Joint tenants and tenants in common have each a right to vote, provided the property be of sufficient amount to give to the share of each the value required. Mortgagees may vote, if in actual possession or in receipt of the rents and profits, but not otherwise. Trustees are expressly excluded from voting for any trust estate; the right of voting in respect of trust property is reserved for the cestui que trust. In estimating the value of freehold or copyhold property, the marketable value of the property to let is the criterion to be attended to. If, owing to accidental circumstances, the rent should be less than might be obtained, the property will still give a right to vote. As regards leaseholds, the value required does not depend on the amount of rent. It is to be estimated by the profit which the tenant can make of the property, over and above the amount of rent reserved and any encumbrance charged on the property. The value required is to be "above all rents and charges." Under these words are included all encumbrances affecting the property, but not any public or parliamentary taxes.

BOROUGH FRANCHISE FOR 1845.

In order to secure a borough vote next year, those who occupy premises giving a qualification should immediately see that their names are placed on the poor's rate-book.

A claimant must be rated, or have claimed to be rated, to all rates made during the year ending the 31st of July. If, therefore, his name is omitted from any rate made during that time, he should immediately claim to be rated. The overseers are required to put the name of a person so claiming on the rate last made; consequently, if the claimant suffers two rates to be made before he claims, he will be unable to get upon the former one, and will thereby lose his vote for one year.

No particular form of claim to be rated is prescribed by the Reform or Registration Acts; but the following form may be adopted:—

"CLAIM TO BE RATED."

"To the Overseers of the Parish of _____,
"I hereby give you notice that I occupy a _____ at No. _____ in _____ Street, in your parish, and I claim to be rated to the relief of the poor in respect of such premises, in order that I may be entitled to vote in the election of a member (or members) of Parliament for the city (or borough) of _____.

Dated this _____ day of _____, 1844.

(Signed) _____

Insert the name of the parish, the nature of the premises, as house, shop, room, or as the case may be, and the name of the street, &c., and of the city or borough, also the date. The christian and surname and place of residence of the claimant should be inserted at full length. Give the claim to an overseer, keeping a correct copy, on which should be written the date when, and the name of the overseer on whom, it was served. If any poor's rates are due for the premises at the time of making the claim they must be paid, or the amount due tendered. Should the overseer refuse to accept the money, or omit to enter the claimant's name in the rate-book, he will be deemed to be rated notwithstanding; but, if the claimant's name be omitted from any future rate, he should again claim to be rated.

No registration of annuities or rent-charges with the clerk of the poor is requisite. The Act, &c., is repealed.

MR. GRANTLEY BERKELEY ON THE GAME LAWS.

We have rarely read a more thoroughly sincere and earnest piece of writing than the lately-published "Defence of the Game Laws," by the Honourable Grantley Fitzhardinge Berkeley, M.P. It is such a defence of an unpopular and losing cause as one does not often see in these milk-and-water times. We should scarcely have inferred, from internal evidence alone, that the author was a strong liberal Whig politician; but the dullest critic could never be so far at fault as to mistake our pamphleteer for a Conservative of the Peel and Gladstone school. There is no "expediency" about Mr. Berkeley. His principles are neither those of "common sense," nor does he hold them "in the abstract." He is ready any hour of the day or night, to give them concrete and practical embodiment in a "simple, well-directed punch on the head" of any person or persons inviting their application.

Without particularly admiring Mr. Berkeley's style, in a mere grammatical point of view, we must allow that he has, in an eminent degree, the first great qualification for writing well. He perfectly understands his subject. He writes from a large experience and a full heart. A more practical man, or a more practical book, never came in our way. His theories are taken from an induction of at least "a million facts that have come under his own immediate observation." He is armed to the teeth with facts. Probably there is not a second man in all England so well provided with game-law facts as Mr. Grantley Berkeley. He has seen the thing on the large scale and on the small scale. He is conversant with estates where game is well preserved, and with estates where game is ill preserved. He has preserved game himself in three or four counties. He has not only enforced the law as a game-preserver, but administered it as a magistrate; and not as a magistrate only, but as a policeman. Mr. Berkeley can execute warrants as well as grant them. To his zeal for the service, the useful and the dignified functions of the law are, on occasion, equally acceptable. He has been actively concerned as a principal in porching affairs of all descriptions, from "a mere personal encounter with a list" to serious armed mobs, against the formidable odds of two, three, and four to one. For, in addition to his magisterial duties, and constabulary recreations, he has occasionally done a little amateur and scientific gamekeeping: "for his pleasure, and in order to observe more closely both causes and effects," he has "amused himself by watching night and day, and setting an example to his servants." Twenty-six times has he been "personally engaged with poachers" and "always with success"—it being his invariable rule to "strike first and speak afterwards." The opinions of such a man on game and game laws are decidedly worth having. Constable, gamekeeper, sportsman, landlord, magistrate, and lawgiver, all in one, the Honourable Grantley Fitzhardinge Berkeley, M.P., may well be allowed to speak with the tone of authority. We are only sorry that his opinions do not seem so clearly settled on corn as on game. A "Defence of the Corn Law" by the same hand would afford a welcome relief from the statistical mystifications of the Premier and the dull dishonesties of the Society for the Protection of Agriculture.

Mr. Berkeley's theory of society and government is simple in the extreme. For Mr. Berkeley, though a practical man, has his theory, too, like the rest of us. He has not escaped the philosophical epidemic of the day; he has studied the Condition-of-England Question: the true solution of which he has ascertained to be—not Protection to Agriculture, nor Free Trade, nor Education, nor Currency, nor the Charter, nor Guano, nor Church Extension, but—A LARGE HEAD OF GAME. A "large head of game" is Mr. Berkeley's ideal of a healthy state of society. It is at once cause and effect of national prosperity and greatness. Give him a large head of game, with a "wholesome administration of the law for its preservation," and he, Mr. Berkeley, will answer for all the rest. Where there is a large head of game, "the people are well to do;" men "follow their honest occupations," "obey the laws" (both from interest and pleasure), and "please the resident proprietor." Where there is a large head of game, employment is plentiful, wages are liberal, the best feeling pervades and unites all classes, and the squire's life is a succession and combination of "pursuits and pleasures, good for himself, good for his tenants, and of immeasurable benefit, morally and temporally, to the surrounding poor." And, what is better, still, where there is a good head of game, "the blood of the acres circulates through domestic veins, and returns again to the full furrows whence it commenced its flow"—an interesting physiological play.

which Mr. Grantley Berkeley has "witnessed" with an "honest pride" at Berkeley Castle. Nay, a good head of game advances not only the moral and temporal but the spiritual and eternal interests of the poor. It promotes "attendance on divine worship," transforming the "systematic Sabbath-breaker"—Mr. Berkeley has this from his "pastor's" lips—into a diligent church-goer. On the whole, it is not agriculture, nor commerce, nor manufactures, nor schools, nor consols, nor trial by jury, that is the true palladium of British greatness and glory—but a large head of well-protected game. The church establishment itself would do little for us without the aid and alliance of the game establishment.

As the social, moral, and economical advantages of a large head of game must be new to many of our readers, we borrow Mr. Berkeley's account of some of the more conspicuous of them. The following is an interesting picture of paternal landlordism dispensing morality and comfort through the medium of game-persevering:—

"At Berkeley there are eight head-keepers, twenty under-keepers, and thirty additional night-watchers; to speak in round numbers, there are sixty men employed in nothing else than the care of the game and deer. Almost all these men, certainly all the keepers, have families dependent upon them for support. In addition to these, during the winter, there are a number of men employed at the shooting parties as beaters for game. These poor people all regard themselves as a regular part of the establishment; and they even make a newly-enlisted beater 'pay his footing' on coming among them. Now, in addition to the employment and comfortable subsistence thus afforded to so many men and their families by the preservation of a large head of game alone, if you add the immense number of grooms and helpers, a huntsman, whippers-in and kennel-men, necessary to the care and condition of from fifty to sixty hunters, besides other horses, and from eighty to a hundred couples of foxhounds, besides other dogs, let any man imagine the amount of wages expended on such species of labour, and then reflect on the misery which would arise if all these men and their families were deprived of their employment and subsistence. There are other men attached to establishments of this sort, such as men for the decoys of wild-fowl, for the fisheries, in the gardens, and on the lands reserved for the use of the estate; and, I repeat again, let the cavalier pause and consider the mischief if all these people were cast out of employment and added to the present numbers of the poor. By the talked-of abolition of the game laws you risk all this; for it is not his hounds alone that will keep a proprietor in the country."

What would people have? Here is a "practical result." "You cannot rob me of such facts as these." With all the corn land of England drained and tilled to the highest point of perfection, and no room for another shilling of capital to be expended on the soil—with production positively at its maximum—what are labouring men to do but consume? In this view, the economical benefits of sporting establishments like that above described are incalculable. They turn producers into consumers, and thus work off the plethora of the national stomach. Where would the farmer be, as Mr. Berkeley suggests, without a large head of game in his parish? He would lose his best customer:—

"People ignorant in these matters speak as if the pheasants lived solely at the expense of the farmer, whereas the pheasant is often the best customer the farmer has; for the landlord purchases at the best price whole flocks of barley, beans, and buckwheat, besides potatoes and Swede turnips, with which to stock his woods and feed his game."

In the present glut of food, with a stationary or declining population of consumers, these things are worth thinking of. Happy the people for whose waste corn the pheasant is the best customer!

It is wonderful how zeal for a favourite art or science enables the philosophic mind to trace remote and unperceived connexions between its beloved pursuit and things seemingly the most alien from it. Did ever mortal man dream, before Mr. Grantley Berkeley, that a large head of game has anything to do with liberty of conscience? Yet so it is. Rob us of our large head of game, and "liberty of conscience" becomes an empty sound; the teacher of religion, too, is left without countenance, and the law of the land lies a dead letter. A large head of game is rather a more serious affair than people suppose:—

"If, by untimely and ruinous interference with their amusements (for rich men will have their pleasures), you drive them to seek the joys of life at Paris, or in foreign lands, who remains to stand up for the liberty of conscience who to countenance the teacher of religion, whether Protestant, Catholic, or Dissenter? and who to give effect to the local administration of the laws?"

Liberty of conscience had used to be considered as requiring, and presupposing in its champions, something of the spirit of martyrdom. According to the old philosophy, ease, enjoyment, riches, liberty, and life, must be heroically sacrificed by the man who would make good, for himself and his fellows, this sacred franchise. Not a bit of it, says Mr. Grantley Berkeley. The prophet-and-apostle are quite out of date. We don't want saints and martyrs to champion our spiritual rights. "Rich men will have their pleasures," can do the work as well—only give them, for humanity and religion's sake, their large head of game.

After this it is needless to add that Mr. Grantley Berkeley's "Defence" of the laws guaranteeing the pleasures of the singularly patriotic rich men who will have their pleasures, or else cut their country, is vigorous and thoroughgoing. That the actual working of the game laws is not in all respects satisfactory he candidly allows. But the fault lies, not with the laws (which can't be better), but with the indolence, timidity, selfishness, or "surface-founded humanity" of their unworthy ministers. Our game-law system is in theory perfect, but in action it is sadly defective, owing to the almost criminal supineness of men who cannot be got to understand the value of a good head of game. This peculiar domestic institution is, as an institution, all that could be desired—"founded on sound and rational principles"—and producing "a beneficial effect in regard to the proprietor, the tenant, the yeoman, and the poor." But we are not worthy of it. We might be a virtuous and happy people, but our rich men—as Mr. Berkeley tells them roundly—do not "value virtue." Nobody does his duty. Landlords don't do their duty. "Neglected woods" and "abandoned manors," those loathed of every crime, stud the country in all directions, ruining both virtue and sport. Magistrates don't do their duty; they fine where they ought to imprison; and they talk too much prose. When Mr. Berkeley resided in Wiltshire, he was dreadfully "hampered" in the exercise of his sporting rights, not merely by the "rebellious spirit of the lower orders," but by "the weak and prosy decisions of timid injustice." In fact, he "seldom attained justice;" and seems at last to have left off looking for it, except through his own "determination of purpose and aptness of hand." Judges and juries don't do their duty: "mistaken clemency" is disgracefully substituted for "the cold and calculating severity of law." Gamekeepers and constables don't do their duty: "talk to them as you will, teach them as you may, keepers never can be made to adopt the simple and humane plan"—they will "speak before they strike." In particular, these men have a most ridiculous delicacy (it is the foolish magistrates' fault, however) about using handcuffs without obvious occasion—a "precautionary and humane measure," which Mr. Berkeley, "as a magistrate, always recommends." If gamekeepers could only be made to understand the policy and humanity of anticipating a murderous intent, by showing poachers "the sight of their own blood!"—but there is no driving it into them. The Berkeleyan philosophy—"more fighting and fewer words," "blows and no talking," a "simple, well-directed punch on the head" (an excellent specific for "banishing an inclination to commit murder")—might as well be preached to the winds as to the gamekeeping and constabulary intellect. In fact, society in general, from the highest personage in the realm (nothing can be more demoralizing than the present state of the royal forests) down to the lowest dregs of poaching vagabondism, is leagued together to frustrate the action of these admirable laws. That the evil is as deeply-rooted and obstinate as it is extensive in its ramifications may be inferred from the circumstance, now for the first time made known, that the very newspapers themselves are secretly directed by convict poachers—which of course, more than accounts for the efforts of the press to throw discredit on the system. We can now understand why Mr. Grantley Berkeley's pamphlet has been so ill received by "anonymous writers in the daily papers," "most of whom," he says, "if not all, have, in all probability, suffered from punishment rightly inflicted by the laws they are, for that reason, so sedulous to condemn."

In taking leave, for the present, of this extravagant and insolent brochure, we must thank Mr. Berkeley for a valuable service unwittingly rendered to the cause we have at heart. He has spoken out, truly and boldly, much that is in the landlord mind which landlords usually keep to themselves. We regard the appearance of this "Defence of the Game Laws" as most timely. It shows, more forcibly than nine tenths of the attacks on those laws, their abominable character; and will, if we mistake not, greatly facilitate their downfall. That Mr. Grantley Berkeley is right in what he seems to regard as his main point, viz., that if game is to be preserved at all it must be done with a high hand and a hard heart; that the game-preserving squire would do well to surround himself with a corps of armed police—half spies, half gendarmes—well trained to punch suspicious-looking people on the head, and to show vagrants "the sight of their own blood," without stopping to ask questions, we are quite prepared to believe. Mr. Berkeley's experience coincides here with the general experience of humanity. A little tyranny commonly needs a great tyranny to make it work—cruel laws require ruthless ministers, and a bad end can only be reached by bad means. Whether it be possible, by any amount of violence and terrorism, to get this particular tyranny patiently submitted to by Englishmen, is another question, which the experience of eight hundred years would seem to answer in the negative. Our own opinion is, that the realization of the landlord's idea of "England as it should be" is just now more hopeless than ever; for the reason, that some landlords are poor, and cannot afford private military establishments—and other landlords are prudent, and look to the safety of their ricks and mansions—and some others are humane, and would decline a civil war in the cause of battu-shooting; and that, on the whole, England is still a Christian country, and will not be made an Aeldama to give a few thousand individuals a few hours per annum of a sport, the only known parallel to which is to be found in the exploits of the celebrated dog Billy.

We shall take an early opportunity of returning to this subject.

IRELAND AND THE REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS.

Ireland is pre-eminently an agricultural country. There are men who say that the Corn Laws should be maintained for the sake of the Irish farmers and the Irish farm-labourers; there are men, calling themselves emphatically the friends of the Irish people, who affect to sneer at the exertions of the League to obtain justice for the labouring population of the empire, as if the industrial classes in Ireland would derive no benefit from measures that would profit their brethren in Great Britain. It is always an invidious task to scrutinize motives; we abstain, therefore, from inquiring whether these efforts to conceal the universality of the justice which it is the object of the League to obtain, are the results of sheer ignorance or wilful perversion. They are certainly made with conscious obliviousness of the fact that this universality was proclaimed by Mr. O'Connell, at Covent-garden, in the name of the people of Ireland, and responded to by one of the most enthusiastic meetings ever assembled in any country. But we may go much further: we may safely assert that no country under the sun exhibits more palpably and more deplorably the necessary results of the monopoly which disguises itself under the name of protection than the Emerald Isle. A population fed on lumps, housed in hovels, miserably clad, subjected to periodical visits of famine, exposed to the chances of "a clearing system" which turns out its hundreds, and even its thousands, to perish unsheltered, is assuredly no evidence of the perfection of a system. But Ireland in its protective legislation has not only had the benefit of duties to prevent import; it had its bounties to stimulate export; both being designed to subserve the same purpose—to furnish an excuse for raising the amount of rent by artificially raising the price of corn.

This artificial price of food has doubly cursed the Irish farmers and farm-labourers: it has placed wholesome food beyond the reach of themselves and their families, while it has stimulated a competition for land so as to raise the price to an amount which has left nothing to remunerate the occupying tenant. It has happened frequently that people were perishing for want of food in the streets of seaport towns, the harbours of which were crowded with vessels laden with provisions for export. Nay, more: ships have come into these ports, laden with meal and flour purchased by English charity, at the very moment when vessels were sailing out laden with similar produce, exported for the benefit of rapacious landlords. Corn Laws have enabled the Irish lords of the soil to regard the tenants and labourers as mere machines, necessary to produce articles for an artificial market, and unworthy of the slightest regard the moment that this object was accomplished. Corn Laws have been the mainstay and support of absenteeism: they have enabled Irish landlords to adopt a system of management by which the returns from the soil should form a rude but tolerably definite routine, requiring no personal superintendence beyond that of the land-agent and the driver. The Irish labourers have had ample experience of the benefits derived from high prices; they can exclaim,

"Oh! yes, 'tis a blessing that bread is so dear; Yes, yes, 'tis a comfort that rent is so high. Give the rich man his chariot, the poor man his bier; 'Tis a favour, untaxed to be suffered to die."

These high prices have exhausted the powers of the Irish people as consumers, and rendered their powers as producers available only for the increase of their toil and the decrease of their remuneration. What is the rate of wages paid to the Irish farm-labourers? We know districts where 4s. per week is above the average, and this, too, when the taxed loaf was at its highest price in the market.

"Oh God! that bread should be so dear! And flesh and blood so cheap."

It is made the subject of complaint that the League, in its collective capacity, takes no part in the discussion of other grievances of which the Irish people complain. This objection is obviously employed to convey the impression, that the members of the League, in their individual capacity, are restricted to the course of conduct which is prescribed to the general body. The League is formed for a specific object, but its members are no more limited to that object than a subscriber to a school is prevented from subscribing to a fever hospital. The great object of our association is to raise the condition of the industrial classes, and particularly of the agricultural classes—whether English, Welsh, Scotch, or Irish; and we feel most interested in behalf of the Irish peasants, because they have been most

There may be other grievances of equal magnitude: we interfere not to prevent their removal, but we say to those who claim to be the friends of Ireland—"Look at your labourers! Is their condition such as a friend to humanity can endure? Is the food proper for their sustenance placed within their reach? Does their daily toil procure the adequate remuneration of labour?"

"Low rents, cheap bread," the people cry;
"Untrammelled labour's hands!"
"Taxed corn—high rents—low wages!" sneer
The callous ruling bands.

What means, then, this mockery of saying that the objects of the League have no connexion with the interests of the Irish people? Is it meant that the misery of the Irish peasants should be preserved as a kind of leverage to help political party to the attainment of its objects? We have no sympathy with any such party: we seek the common rights and common good of all; we seek sustenance for those who are insufficiently fed, and a fair remuneration for those who are inadequately paid. We say that the under-fed and under-paid peasants of Ireland have a direct and immediate interest in such an object, and that they are not the friends of the Irish people who interfere in any way to prevent its accomplishment.

CRIME INCREASES WITH DEAR BREAD AND DECREASES WITH CHEAP BREAD.

There are few things more unpalatable to the monopolists than figures—they are so plain that "he who runs may read." The remarks of the Chairman at the last Manchester Quarter Sessions on the diminution of crime, and the annual Reports of the state of crime for a long series of years, published, for the use of the magistrates, by the Governor of the New Bailey Prison at Manchester, are worthy attention as proving what we have so frequently stated, that the Corn Laws are the sources of poverty and crime.

It will be seen, from the following official statement of the number of prisoners convicted at the New Bailey Prison, that the increase of crime has gone on precisely as the price of corn and the difficulty of obtaining food have increased; and that so soon as bread becomes cheaper and employment is more easily obtained, crime diminishes:—

1846	871	48 9
1847	1118	55 10 year of panic.
1848	1065	61 4
1849	1215	70 6
1850	1360	66 4
1851	1483	61 5
1852	1565	57 5
1853	1008	50 1
1854	1004	51 5

It appears, also, from a further statement of the governor, that the daily average number of prisoners confined in the New Bailey was as under:—

1840	713
1841	723
1842	750
1843	673
1845	500 only on the 1st of January!! wheat 45s. per quarter.

These statements afford the gratifying reflection to every benevolent mind that the people of this country are not naturally profligate and criminal, but are driven by destitution and want to commit crimes. The philosophy of the whole matter is contained in the saying of Poor Richard, "It's hard for an empty bag to stand upright." We commend these facts to those pseudo-philanthropists who, whilst they affect great piety and zealous interest in the welfare of the working classes, tax their bread, rob them of employment by upholding monopoly, and thus fill our poor-houses and prisons with the victims of their own selfishness. The people now understand the question too well to be any longer bamboozled by human-mongers. He who upholds the bread-tax is an enemy to his poor neighbour, he his pretensions what they may. Holy Writ declareth, "The bread of the needy is his life; he that defraudeth him thereof is a man of blood."

LEAGUE BAZAAR.

THE GENERAL COMMITTEES.

Some weeks since, we urged upon our readers the desirability of replying to the invitation of the Council, to join one of the two committees of ladies and gentlemen respectively, to be formed for the purpose of assisting them in the preparations for the Bazaar, and we are happy to learn that a very considerable number of the friends of commercial freedom have done so; but, as the point is one of considerable importance, we feel no scruples in again referring to it.

The officers of the several local committees are especially requested to forward the names of the members of the same at their earliest convenience, together with the names of all the ladies in their several neighbourhoods who may be willing to lend their sanction to the Bazaar.

We have reason to believe that many ladies have answered the application of the Council in the negative, from a supposition that important and onerous duties were attached to the engagement, and they were unwilling to accept an office, the duties of which their numerous domestic engagements, and other causes, would prevent them from adequately fulfilling.

We are, therefore, anxious to correct this misapprehension. All that the addition of a lady's name to the committee is understood to signify, is simply an attachment to the principles which are sought to be promoted by the Bazaar, and a willingness to contribute to its success in any way compatible with other duties; and, even where these render personal co-operation totally impracticable, the addition of their names is of the highest importance, as evincing the deep interest taken in the Free-Trade movement by those who, having no party or political prejudices to gratify, protest against the Corn Laws on other and higher grounds.

We give below extracts from some letters received during the last few days, though the increase of the correspondence relative to the Bazaar renders the selection every week more difficult.

"Coalbrookdale, Salop, Jan. 14.

"DEAR SIR,—I am sorry not to have replied to your previous letter before, but I have not been unkindful of it. Pray excuse the seeming neglect. I can promise you a contribution from this place somewhere between £200 and £300, consisting of various articles of English manufacture, chiefly in iron, yet not cumbersome or very bulky. Could you let us have a stall or space, say 20 to 30 feet by 10 feet, or thereabouts?"

"We shall deliver the things in London free of cost. Would it not be desirable to open the Bazaar for two or three days previous to any sale commencing, to allow the public to inspect the beauty of the stalls? If the sale commences the moment the Bazaar is opened, most of the best things will be snapped up, and a great portion of the public would be deprived of the pleasure of seeing them.

Yours, &c., &c.,

"George Wilson, Esq." "ABRAHAM DARRY.

"Swansea, Jan. 16.

"DEAR SIR,—In reply to yours of January 2nd, in reference to the Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar, I beg to observe that, on receiving your former favour, I made applications to several parties in this town and neighbourhood for assistance. The result has been promises of aid from several ladies.

"What I have done may be thus enumerated, in the way of preparation:—

"1st. Models of farthings, pence, &c., rolled out into their copper sheets. 2nd. Specimens of copper ore, foreign and British, arranged comparatively. 3rd. Copper in its several stages of manufacture. 4th. Illustrations of the national costume of Welshwomen. 5th. Models of steam-engine, &c.

"I shall feel obliged by suggestions which may prove useful in carrying out this object, and the time by which models &c., should be in town. Yours, &c.,

"JOHN JENKINS."

An esteemed friend writes thus from Maidstone:—

"I have in my possession, which I purchased at a great cost as a relic, the very orrery made by James Ferguson, as described by him in his life and in his lectures on astronomy. I propose, if it will be acceptable, to present the same to the Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar; but it would be desirable that some person who may have the 'Life of Ferguson' would present that, to go with the orrery. I recollect to have seen it when I was a lad, but do not recollect by whom published. Yours, &c.,

"J. BARNETT."

"Relief Manse, Newlands, by Noblehouse, N. B., Jan. 8.

"SIR,—I observe, from a recent number of the LEAGUE, that the Rev. Dr. Hewlett, of Coventry, has offered to supply you, for the Bazaar, with a few copies of a work of his, entitled 'Thoughts upon Thought.' I feel very much disposed to adopt his language and follow his example in this matter. I have just published a small work, entitled 'The Apostleship and Apostolical Succession,' and if you deem my offer of a few copies such as you can accept, or as being suitable for the Bazaar, I shall have much pleasure in causing my publisher to send them to whatever address you may be good enough to mention to me. Wishing you every success in your truly patriotic and benevolent endeavours to emancipate British trade and commerce from unrighteous and oppressive restrictions, I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"George Wilson, Esq."

"JOHN CRAIG."

"Paisley, Jan. 10.

"DEAR SIR,—I duly received your circular referring to the proposed Bazaar, and would have replied sooner, but our committee were busy collecting the renewed subscriptions to your fund: that being now nearly finished, we had a meeting last night, at which the matter was talked over, and resolutions agreed to, highly approving of the proposal. Our committee have already remitted you to London upwards of £400 towards the £100,000 Fund; and from the good feeling existing towards the League in this neighbourhood—a feeling of admiration and gratitude towards your Council for their great and unprecedented exertions in the cause of commercial freedom—I am certain that something respectable will be done towards supplying a stall at the Bazaar. You must bear in mind, however, that Paisley is a comparatively poor town, and that we have been suffering, and suffering severely, for many years, from the effects of those iniquitous laws you are associated to abolish. With best wishes for the cause, I am, &c., &c., "George Wilson, Esq." "H. MACFARLANE, Junr.

The following pleasant lines convey a hint which, we trust, will not be lost upon our juvenile readers:—

"ANTI-CORN-LAW BAZAAR.

"Scarborough, near Halifax, Dec. 24, 1844.

"DEAR SIR,—Expect not much from me, I'm but a little girl indeed; And 'tis but a short time ago That I could neither write nor read."

"I'm but eleven years of age,
Yet glad would I the cause befriend;
Then let me see, what can I do?
Why, nothing that is fit to send!"

"O yes, two drawings which, I'm sure,
The Queen herself will gladly buy,
If you'll just tell her they've been done
By such a little girl as I."

"Yours, respectfully,

"ADA HINCHLIFFE."

"Hull, Jan. 14.

"DEAR SIR,—I have purchased for the League Bazaar a neat timepiece, of the best workmanship, and cost 10 guineas. It is now packed up at my jeweller's, and ready to be sent either to yourself or any other place or person as you may direct. Yours, &c., &c.,

"WM. LOWTHROP."

MEETINGS.

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING OF THE LEAGUE AT MANCHESTER.

The annual meeting of the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League was held on Wednesday evening, at the Free-Trade Hall, Manchester. It was preceded by a general meeting of the members of the Council, specially summoned from different parts of the kingdom, and held in the Council-room, Newall's-buildings, Market-street; the proceedings of which, of course, were not intended for publication in detail, but as they are calculated to excite very general interest, and show that the agitation of this great question—judging from the muster of influential gentlemen present, and the sentiments there expressed of confidence and satisfaction in the proceedings of the Executive—has lost none of its vigour, but is likely to go on with even increased energy, we propose to give a brief outline of the business.

PRELIMINARY MEETING OF THE COUNCIL.

The preliminary meeting commenced at half-past two o'clock, and among the gentlemen present we observed George Wilson, the Chairman; Richard Cobden, M.P.; T. Milner Gibson, M.P.; John Bright, M.P.; John Burd, John Brooks, Nicholas Heald, Lawrence Roston, William Harvey, T. Woolley, John Standing, W. Evans, J. B. Smith, William Rawson, James Chadwick, J. Whitworth, J. Leadbeater, Thomas Bazley, jun., A. Prentice, W. R. Callender, R. H. Greg, Samuel Lees, J. Barratt, and P. Steiner, Manchester; Thomas Mason, Ashton; James Midgley, Rochdale; W. Ackroyd, Otley; John Mather and Robert Mather, Liverpool; William Brown, Liverpool; W. Biggs, Leicester; William Hargreaves, Grange, Milnthorpe; — Boden, Derby; C. Hotter, Darwen; E. Hollins, Stockport; C. E. Rawlins, Liverpool; J. T. Crook, Liverpool; E. Bines, jun., Leeds; Lawrence Heyworth, Liverpool; E. Ashworth and H. Ashworth, Bolton; Joseph Crook, Bolton; F. Schwann and R. D. Jackson, Huddersfield; — Skinner; James Wrigley, Bury; John Whittaker, Ashton; John Walker, Bury; and J. G. Marshall, Leeds.

THE CHAIRMAN, in opening the business, said:—He took it for granted that most of the gentlemen present at this meeting were acquainted with its objects. It was that they (the Executive), who met in that room from day to day (and for whose acts the General Council were in some degree responsible), might lay before them a detail of what its proceeding had been. A report had been prepared, which it was proposed should be submitted for their adoption, together with an account of the receipts and disbursements for the past year. He could assure the meeting that it was gratifying to them, who met there from day to day, to find themselves surrounded by a number of gentlemen, from different parts of the kingdom, of such influence and standing in society; and they felt confidence that a cause which was supported by such men could neither be much longer misunderstood by the country, nor resisted by the Government. The report contained a general outline of the proceedings of the League during the last fifteen months. It would be impossible to descend to details in such a document; but, if it was thought desirable to go more fully into the operations, it would be necessary only to take the books, which were lying on the table, and they would show the business as it was transacted from day to day. [He then read the report, a copy of which will be found in our account of the subsequent meeting in the Free-Trade Hall.] It would be observed that in this report they had referred to the last report, presented in 1843, more especially as regarded the fund of £100,000 asked for on that occasion, and which the Council then stated that they thought would be fully equal to meet all the engagements of the year. They had now received towards that sum about £85,000. (Cheers.) When they stated £100,000 as a fund necessary to their operations, and as the amount they were likely to realize, they included, of course, in their estimate, the probable proceeds of a Bazaar intended to be held in Covent Garden Theatre. That Bazaar had not yet been held, but it would be held; and when the proceeds of it should be added to the amount already received, the fund would as far exceed the amount calculated upon, probably, as it now fell short of that sum. (Cheers.) However, let the amount they had received and should receive be whatever it might, the sum in hand had been much more than was actually necessary for carrying out the objects in view. (Hear, hear.) They had never been restricted in their operations for want of money, at all events (hear, hear, hear); and if they had they had always felt confidence when more money was required the country would support them (hear, hear, hear); and now they met them with a balance in hand of somewhere about £20,000. (Loud cheers.) The account would be laid before them, but in the first place the report would have to be dealt with, and he should beg to call upon Mr. Biggs, of Leicester, to move its adoption.

Mr. Biggs said he had great pleasure in moving the adoption of the interesting report now submitted to them. He had been in the habit of hearing reports from public bodies, but he had never before met with one, to his mind, so interesting as this. It appeared that they had an overflowing consequence; they undertook to manage and transact the business; and all they now required from the meeting was to pass the report, which it would be actually a dereliction of duty to withhold from doing. (Hear, hear.) It might probably have been better had some gentleman from this part of the country been selected to move the report; but so far as he was concerned, his feeling, and he might say the feeling generally in Leicester towards them, was that of gratitude to them as one of the most useful and important bodies to the interests of this great country that ever had existence. While other associations had been formed for the carrying of great public measures, and had failed, they felt confident that this would go on increasing in power and public estimation, till the Government of the country should be no longer able to resist its demands. (Cheers.) He could speak with a little more knowledge than he possessed in the morning, of the machinery employed, and the manner in which the business was transacted. A kind friend had introduced him into the arena, and shown him over the premises of the Anti-Corn-Law League; and, though he had had a general impression of its excellent management before, he confessed that he had been agreeably surprised at the perfection and completeness of its plans of operation—its comprehensiveness of arrangement on the one hand, and its accurate attention to minutiae on the other. Why, gentlemen (Mr. Biggs continued), they have the most accurate statistics in regard to political affairs of any that are extant. They have, as it were, the whole country in a string; they have the whole of the borough constituencies upon record—the number of electors, the names of members, the proportion the electors bear to the population; the history of the past, and (reasoning from what has been) the most probable and rational expectations of the future. The public is not, and cannot possibly be, aware of the extent and influential character of the operations of the League. Judging from all that he had seen and learned of those operations, he felt more than ever convinced that they must succeed. As to the course to be pursued for the future, it appeared to him they could not retract or go back: they were, like Hannibal, sworn upon the altars of their country; they could not retrace their steps, and if they pursued their course they must succeed. (Cheers.) It was the opinion of all his friends, wherever they met upon this question,—whether in Leicester or the midland counties,—that not only their thanks but their deep gratitude was due to this Council for the manner in which they had conducted the agitation. He believed that Washington, in America, had not a higher and holier end in view, when he led the struggle for independence, than they had. From his heart he wished them success, and was convinced that they would have, as they deserved, the thanks and the gratitude of the country and of ages to come. He was obliged to them for this excellent report, and had great pleasure in moving its adoption. (Great applause.)

Mr. W. BROWN, of Liverpool, rose to second the motion. He said:—Mr. Biggs had so ably laid before them the advantages to be derived from the industry of the gentlemen who had taken an active part in the management of the League, that little was left for him to say; but when he looked at what other leagues had done whose measures were founded on truth and justice, and that they had never failed of success, he could not doubt that the onward progress of this agitation would be as certain as theirs. (Cheers.) He alluded, when he mentioned previous leagues, to the opposition which was raised in America to the system of taxation without representation, and which led to the loss of our colonies there; and to the Helvetic League, which was established to protect the people within its operations from the exactions of the barons of those times. The more he looked at the position which this League occupied, and the object for which it was established—which was not unlike that to which he had last referred (hear, hear),—the more he was convinced that success was within their grasp. (Cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN, in putting the motion, said:—It was due to the meeting to state, that a number of gentlemen in the commission of the peace had been prevented from being present, in consequence of a county meeting of the magistrates holding at Preston. He had also a number of letters from other gentlemen, who, for various reasons, could not be present, and he would now read them. He then read the letters, which were from Robert Munro, Esq., John Graham, Esq., Arthur Morse, John Dixon; Samuel Bean, Brothers; and Thomas Mather; and all expressive of confidence in the League, and of willingness to lend further pecuniary support. These letters were loudly cheered.—The motion was carried unanimously.

Mr. CONNOR next read the financial statement of the treasurer (which will be found in the proceedings of the evening); and on the motion of Mr. LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, of Liverpool, seconded by Mr. J. CHADWICK, of Eccles, it was unanimously resolved,— "That the account of the receipts and expenditure now presented are highly satisfactory, and that they be, and are hereby approved."

A discussion followed as to the form in which the accounts should be published, in the course of which Mr. Mather, of Liverpool, Mr. Biggs, of Leicester, Mr. Schwann, of Huddersfield, and other gentlemen from a distance expressed their confidence in the Executive; and Mr. E. Baines, jun., of Leeds, expressed his admiration of the systematic and satisfactory manner in which the books of the establishment were kept, and every proceeding of the body recorded.

Mr. R. MATHIAS (of Liverpool) then moved:—

"That the accounts now passed be published in the same manner as last year."

Mr. J. G. MARSHALL, of Leeds, seconded the resolution, which passed unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN (at the suggestion of Mr. Lawrence Heyworth) gave an outline of the plan of operations which the League proposed to follow this year, which, he said, was that adopted within the last few months principally, of acting upon the county registration by inducing Free-Traders to become freeholders; and by attending also to the registration in boroughs. The lecturers would be sent out as usual, and meetings would also be held wherever desirable, which would be attended by deputations of the Council.

Mr. BROWN gave a detail of the measures taken to put the registration for South Leicestershire on a more satisfactory footing, by which it appeared that they expected to strike off 300 bad votes at the next registration, and to add 500 new claims—making a difference of 800. By these means, and by the number of parties they hoped to induce to become freeholders, he had great confidence that they should be able to place the representation in the hands of Free-Traders.

Mr. EDWARD BAINES then moved the following resolution, expressing his perfect satisfaction with all the operations of the League, and entire confidence in the executive body of the Council:—

"That this meeting of the General Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League, having received very full and detailed reports of the proceedings of the executive Council in Manchester, expresses its perfect satisfaction with those proceedings; its warm gratitude for the patriotic, self-denying, and most laborious exertions of the Council in the great cause of Free Trade, and requests them to continue their labours in directing the future operations of the League."

Mr. LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, in seconding the resolution, said he had not only the most unbounded confidence in the League, but he would go further, and say they had his warmest gratitude for their labours in the great work in which they were engaged. (Cheers.)

Mr. SCHWANN, of Huddersfield, supported the resolution, and said he would not only express his satisfaction with what the Council had done, but his entire confidence in what they might do for the future. (Laughter and applause.)—The resolution then passed unanimously.

The meeting, after a few words in acknowledgment of the last vote from the Chairman, then separated; and Mr. Wilson subsequently conducted most of the strangers through the extensive premises of the League, to see the machinery by which its operations were carried on, and respecting which we understand they expressed themselves in terms of high satisfaction and gratification.

THE GREAT AGGREGATE MEETING.

The aggregate meeting in the evening, at the Free Trade Hall, was a large and splendid assemblage; and the platform (capable of holding 600, and not 300 persons only, as we stated on the occasion of the last meeting), the galleries, and the body of the hall were in every part extremely crowded. The proceedings were announced for half-past seven, and precisely at that time, George Wilson, Esq., the Chairman, Richard Cobden, M.P., John Bright, M.P., Joseph Brotherton, M.P., T. M. Gibson, M.P., Esq., and other members of the Council, appeared in front of the platform, and were received with great and prolonged cheering. Nearly the whole of the gentlemen named as present at the foregoing meeting were on the platform; and in addition we noticed Messrs. Alderman Walker, J. B. Potter, J. Rawson, B. Syddell, J. B. Scott, T. Bright, Alderman Armitage, J. T. Clay (Ratrick, near Halifax), G. Thompson (tenant-farmer, Goodmanham, near Beverley), James Brotherton, Alfred Charlton, J. S. Ormerod, J. N. Rawson, R. Ryder, and Samuel Kay, jun.

The CHAIRMAN opened the business of the meeting by calling upon Mr. HICKIN, the Secretary, to read the minutes of the last meeting, held in Covent Garden Theatre. The minutes having been read:—

R. COBEN, Esq., moved, and J. T. CLAY, Esq., of Ratrick, seconded the motion, that the minutes be confirmed. The motion having been agreed to,

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the business, said:—

Ladies and gentlemen, as this meeting will partake more, perhaps, in the commencement, of a business character than any which have been held here previously, and as a number of documents will have to be read, I will not occupy your attention one moment by any observations of my own; suffice it to say, at a meeting of the Council of the League, held this day at Newall's-buildings, to receive a report of the proceedings and the transactions in the past year, as well as to receive the financial statement of the Treasurer, certain resolutions were adopted which will be submitted to this meeting for farther approval. You will be addressed at this meeting by Mr. Baines, of Leeds (cheers); by Mr. Heyworth, of Liverpool (cheers); by one of the members for Manchester, Mr. Gibson (loud cheers); and by our excellent friend, Mr. Bright (renewed cheering); and I therefore at once call upon the Secretary to read the report and resolutions which have been adopted by the Council this afternoon. (Cheers.)

Mr. HICKIN read the following report and financial statement:—

"The report which the Council have now to submit to their constituents extends over a period of fifteen months—from September 28, 1843, to the 31st December, 1844.

"In the address presented at the meeting in Covent Garden Theatre, September 28, 1843, the Council explained the course of action it proposed for the future; and the distinguishing feature of this plan was the determination to make the movement essentially an electoral one.

"To give effect to the extensive operations here proposed, the Council, having a full reliance on the zeal and co-operation of their countrymen, asked for a contribution of £100,000,—a sum which, whilst it would furnish evidence of the increasing influence of Free-Trade opinions, would be sufficient to meet the estimated expenditure of the League.

"In conformity with this plan, the whole of England and Wales was divided into thirteen electoral districts. To each of these districts a competent agent was appointed by the Council, whose duty it was personally and repeatedly to visit each borough in his district; to promote and superintend the formation of local registration committees; and to give advice and render assistance in all matters relating to the registration, and, wherever, practicable, to secure the appointment of an active local agent, having a knowledge of the law and practice of the revision courts. It was also his duty to make periodical returns of the state of each constituency, and of the means available for increasing the strength of the Free-Traders on the register.

"Under this arrangement 160 boroughs, in England and Wales, have been visited during the past year. The Council have obtained a mass of information which will enable them to direct their future efforts with greater efficiency, while the returns already in their possession show an undoubted gain in 112 of the boroughs thus acted upon, and in many of these the improvement on the register is such as to ensure the return of Free-Traders in the place of monopolists, in the event of an election.

"Simultaneously with these electoral movements, the communications between the Council of the League and every portion of the kingdom have, by means of correspondence and deputations, been not only maintained, but greatly increased during the past year. More than 240 meetings, attended by a deputation from the Council, have been held in England and Scotland since October, 1843. Of these meetings more than 150 have been held in parliamentary boroughs; and the increased numbers by which they have been in all cases attended, and the zeal and enthusiasm manifested, prove the extent and the depth of the public conviction in favour of Free Trade. Besides these, the great meetings held in Covent Garden Theatre, London, and in the Free-Trade Hall, Manchester, show that the great question has lost none of its hold on the public mind in the metropolis, or in this town, the birthplace of the League.

"The lecturers of the League have visited and lectured in thirty-six out of forty counties of England, and in nearly all the Welsh counties. The demand for this mode of instruction has been much greater than the Council have been able to supply, the desire for lecturers having been especially manifested in the agricultural districts.

"More than 2,000,000 of stamped and other publications have been distributed. In addition to these, there has been an average weekly publication of 20,000 copies of the LEAGUE paper,—15,000 to subscribers to the League Fund, besides a sale of 5000 copies weekly,—amounting, in 67 weeks, to 1,340,000 copies, making the total distribution of publications nearly 34 millions.

"The correspondence, since the last report, has more than doubled: the number of letters received at the League offices in London and Manchester being about 25,000, while the numbers despatched from the two offices have been about 300,000.

"Until recently, with the exception of Lancashire and Middlesex, the Council had not directed their attention to the county registration. In South Lancashire, having the data furnished by the late contested election, they proceeded at once to a thorough examination of the register, and the result of the last registration in this division of the county was a gain of 1750 votes to the Free-Traders. In North Lancashire there was a gain of more than 500 votes; and in Middlesex an accession of strength was also secured.

"Hitherto the county registration has been almost entirely neglected by the commercial, trading, and industrial classes; and the Council resolved to invite their friends everywhere to acquire that political influence to which they are so justly entitled, by taking up their enfranchisement for the counties. The appeal has been received and acted upon with a promptitude and an enthusiasm surpassing their most sanguine expectations. The Council have reason to believe that, within the last three months, a sufficient number of persons have purchased freehold qualifications in North Cheshire, South Lancashire, and the West Riding of York, to secure to those important constituencies a Free-Trade majority; whilst a large addition to our ranks has been made in Middlesex, North Lancashire, and several other populous counties.

"The Council view this as but the encouraging commencement of a movement to which they will devote their primary attention during the ensuing year. The Government of this country is at present in the hands of a class solely through the instrumentality of the Chaucer clause, which places the county representation at the mercy of the landlords, through the votes of less than 200,000 tenants-at-will in England and Wales. From calculations carefully made, the Council are convinced that it will be practicable, in a short time, to induce such a number of the friends of Free Trade to purchase freehold qualifications as will neutralize these dependent voters at the poll, and give to the intelligent middle and industrial classes their due influence in the government of this commercial country.

"The Council have now entered upon the seventh year of their labours. Of the past they can speak with satisfaction. They have seen public opinion gradually, but surely, becoming more and more settled in favour of Free Trade; the public press, the organ of that opinion, uniting more cordially and earnestly with the exertions of the League; the Cabinet chosen by the monopolists, moving slowly it may be, but still moving on in the direction of Free Trade; whilst, throughout the manufacturing districts, the return of active and prosperous commerce has not only done nothing to abate the enthusiasm and determination of their friends, but has given them enlarged means of advancing the object they have so greatly at heart.

"The League is emphatically the representation of the classes that live by industry—it is an embodiment of the spirit and energy of trade which is struggling to be free; it seeks no private, no partial good, but the true and permanent interests of the whole people; hitherto it has received a degree of support unknown to any other organization in this country; it has sought, by a faithful discharge of its duties, to deserve the confidence reposed in it: its success is to be seen wherever the opinion of the people is freely manifested, and its complete and not distant triumph is as certain as its determination is firm and its principles are impregnable.

"By order of the Council,
GEORGE WILSON, Chairman.

Balance down .. 26,675 19 9

Wm. Rawson, Treasurer. £86,009 7 3
The announcement of the balance in hand was received with loud and reiterated bursts of cheering.

The SECRETARY also read the minutes of the meeting of the Council above reported.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Baines will now move the adoption of the report. Before he does so, perhaps the meeting will allow me one explanation with respect to the fund. When we first launched the address in which we asked from the country a contribution of £100,000, we had it in contemplation to raise a large portion of the amount by a Bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre. That Bazaar has not been held, and therefore the sum here stated is fully as large as we expected to realize. (Cheers.) We propose still to hold the Bazaar; and I have no doubt the proceeds will carry us far beyond the sum we expected. (Loud cheers.) With this explanation I beg to call upon Mr. Baines.

EDWARD BAINES, jun., Esq., Leeds, came forward, and was received with loud cheers. He said he had the honour to submit the first resolution, "That the report of the proceedings of the General Council of the League, which has now been read, be adopted and confirmed by this meeting." He had had the privilege to attend the meeting alluded to in the report, and the minutes of which had been read, that afternoon, consisting of gentlemen—some of them the largest contributors to the League—from various parts of the northern and midland counties—gentlemen among the largest employers of labour and of capital in the country (hear, hear)—gentlemen who might be said to belong to the most intelligent class of the community (hear, hear); and he was sure he might speak for them, as well as himself, when he said that the impression upon their minds, after the report and detail laid before them had been gone into, was one of full satisfaction—and not only full satisfaction, but of perfect confidence—and not only of perfect confidence, but of lively gratitude to the Council, who had performed such stupendous things in the cause of Free Trade. (Loud cheers, which were prolonged for some moments.) They had the opportunity of asking many questions, and going into many details with regard to the operations of the Council and the Executive Council; they had the opportunity of questioning the treasurer, and going over the whole system of accounts, with the admirably contrived checks and counter-checks by which the business of that Council was carried on; and he must say that nothing more perfectly regular, systematic, and business-like ever met his eye than the business of that vast establishment was now conducted. (Loud cheers.) He spoke the sentiments of all the gentlemen present when he went through the establishment—men of business habits and intelligence, men accustomed to the working of large establishments in various parts of the country—when he expressed this opinion. He felt it an honour to have an opportunity of expressing before this vast meeting of Free-Traders his own unbounded and increasing attachment to the cause of the National Anti-Corn-Law League. He looked upon it as a great national confederation for the overturning of an oppressive and unjust law, and for the vindication of the rights of industry and capital, and for establishing a system by which the wrongs of the people of England might be redressed, by which the resources of the country might be developed, and her prosperity be carried to the highest possible pitch. (Loud cheers.) He looked upon this as a League not only for times of bad trade, but times of good trade ("hear, hear," and cheers), and for all times until the system of a perfectly Free Trade be established with all who were willing to trade with us. We had heard of "fair-weather" friends, and it might have been said, perhaps, that the League were "foul-weather" friends; but they had proved to be something more (cheers); and it was creditable, at least, to the members of this League and the men of Manchester, who had conducted its operations, as showing their sincerity, that when the return of prosperity had arrived they had not abandoned the cause, thus showing that their principles were too well founded and enduring to be affected by any mere temporary alteration in the state of the country; and that, having put on their armour, they had been resolved not to take it off till they had accomplished the full measure of justice which they set before themselves at the outset of this agitation. (Cheers.) So he had lost the honour of addressing an assemblage in Manchester—upon nearly this spot of ground, though in a more frail and temporary building—a vast change had come over the circumstances of the country. (Hear.) At that time they had but a small committee, and had to get up a case; they were a distress committee (laughter), and very black was the hudget they had to exhibit. The distress existing over the whole manufacturing districts was very great—and not existing in the manufacturing parts of the country alone, but extending into the agricultural districts. (Hear, hear.) Now, the change was indeed great, and if they had to form a distress committee it was probable they would have to bring up a nearly empty bag. But did that alter or negative the principles they held? On the contrary, it was in exact accordance with what they had always contended for, namely, that cheap food was above all things essential to national prosperity. (Cheers.) He had now seen a somewhat lengthened period of agitation for the repeal of the obnoxious Corn Laws. Twenty years ago, once March, he made his first public speech on the subject of the Corn Laws, in direct opposition to them (laughter); and that might seem discouraging at first view, but if they looked to the experience of the working of the law at that time, he thought it might be shown that there was something interesting, and from which they might derive hope, in the history of the question in that period—between 1825 and 1845. (Hear, hear.) But he mentioned it to show them this—and he had been a pretty close observer of the changes which the country had undergone in that time—that there had been in those twenty years, he might say, no less than six distinctly marked periods of distress and prosperity—three of prosperity and three of distress. (Hear, hear.) But he would confine himself more particularly to four of them as coming within the recollection of almost all present, and enabling them to bear out the lessons he sought to deduce from them. He had seen a period from the year 1823 to 1831 of dear food and of great distress, and this was followed by a period from 1833 to 1836 of high prosperity. (Hear, hear.) From 1838 to 1842 was again a period of dear food, and again deep and extensive and unparalleled distress prevailed. (Hear, hear, hear.) And again in 1833 and 1834, with cheap food once more we had again a revival of prosperity. (Loud cheers.) Not only did he himself observe, and know from personal recollection, what the state of the country was during those periods, but he had gone through various public records, which enabled him to show the lessons he deduced from them to be founded on correct data. It would be unwise for him to trouble them now with a minute statement of facts or figures on this subject; he should not do so; but he would briefly state the grand results of inquiries he had made, all of which tended to show that with cheap food we had national prosperity, as an invariable accompaniment, and that with dear food we had national distress. (Loud cheers.) Now, there were, he might say, seven grand heads or features into which he might divide his subject, distinguishing the country during these periods, all of which were capable of being proved by the public records of the country; and on each of these he would say two words. First, of trade and manufactures: he said (and would unhesitatingly challenge any man to meet him in the discussion of that subject to prove the contrary)—he said, in regard to the state of trade and manufactures, in each of those periods of dear food, trade and manufactures were languishing; and in each of those periods of cheap food, trade and manufactures were flourishing. (Hear, hear.) The second head was as to the comforts and luxuries of life. He said that, in times of dear food, the consumption of those articles was comparatively small; and that in seasons of cheap food it was comparatively large. (Hear, hear.) The third head of national prosperity or distress under which he should illustrate his argument was in reference to the public revenue. In times of cheap food, the revenue had been invariably found to flourish, so as to more than answer the wants of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and so that he had been able to repeal taxes (hear, hear, hear); in times of dear food, it had as unquestionably languished and declined, and new taxes had been imposed to meet the expenditure. (Cheers.) The fourth feature had reference to pauperism and the poor-rates. Now, he could show how, during several years of cheap food, they had declined; and that in the years of dear food they had gradually and as certainly increased. (Hear, hear.) The fifth head was emigration (cheers); and on that he might say that he could prove that, during the years of dear food and scarcity, the tide of emigration had considerably increased; and that during the years of cheap food it had as certainly ebbed, and materially decreased. (Cheers.) The sixth head he would adduce—equally decisive on the subject—was that of crime. (Hear, hear.) They had had it stated in their local organs, within a few days, that the same features marked the statistics of crime, so far as regarded this neighbourhood; and the experience of Manchester was that of the whole country: in times of cheap food it was found that crime invariably diminished; and that in times of dear food the increase was fearfully great. (Hear, hear.) The seventh and last head was that of wages (cheers); and he would observe, in reference to this question, that throughout the country they would find that wages fell in times of dear food, and rose in times of cheap food. (Loud and reiterated cheers.) He was happy to have the confirmation of that great meeting to the truth of the deductions he had drawn from the documents he had examined for his own satisfaction on these subjects, and which entirely bore out his recollection on the subject. And he might say that these results applied not only to the periods he had named, but to previous ones—particularly he might mention those of 1818-19 and 1824-25. Now, if this was true, what was the great lesson they should deduce from it? Why, that whatever the effect of these laws might be upon particular classes, the effect upon the nation at large, tested in all the ways they could test it, showed that it was the interest of the people to have their food cheap, and that the greatest calamity that could befall them was to have their food dear. (Great cheering.)

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq. (Liverpool), in seconding the motion, made some excellent statements calculated to show the absurdity of the monopolist doctrines which attributed the alternations of distress and prosperity to panics and mere monetary operations; he traced the origin of commercial depressions clearly to the laws which made food scarce and dear, and made some interesting statements as to the effect which returning prosperity (consequent on cheapness and plenty) had had upon railway returns and profits—a result which he had predicted at a railway meeting several years ago, when his opinions on the subject were received with distrust or sneered at. His address was loudly cheered, and at its conclusion the resolution was put and carried unanimously and with loud cheers.

T. M. GIBSON, Esq., M.P., on rising was received with vehement cheering, which was prolonged for a considerable time. He spoke as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I have the greatest satisfaction in supporting the resolution, which affirms the efficiency of the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Cheers.) It has happened to me several times, within, perhaps, I may say, a recent period, to be asked in a sneering tone, by gentlemen in the south of England, how the Anti-Corn-Law League was getting on. (Hear, hear.) There's a way of asking a question which conveys, beyond the mere words, a very clear meaning. The meaning of the question was, the idea, the fond notion that has been vainly invented in the south of England, that the League was retrograding; and some even have gone the length of saying that the League was extinct. (Hear, hear, hear.) Nay, more: rumour says, Sir, that a subscription was even entered into to give a very large testimonial to a writer who was supposed to have been instrumental in bringing about the dissolution of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Cheering and laughter.) I wish some of my southern friends could be present at this great assembly. (Hear.) And I think, when they hear of the large sums which have been so willingly subscribed by the people of this country in support of the League, and the large balance of something like £27,000 which now remains in hand to carry on the agitation (loud cheers), that they will feel assured that the Anti-Corn-Law League has escaped all the dangers of its infancy, and is now established in a mature and robust manhood, and that it will live until it has accomplished the object for which it was brought into existence. (Cheers.) It was predicted that the League could not live because the Anti-Corn-Law demand was only a political cry. It was no "cry." (Hear, hear.) A "cry" is a very different thing; it means a something used as a watchword of a party, without any real intention of carrying the object into effect. (Hear, hear.) That is a "cry," to talk of "our young Queen and our old constitution" (laughter); and "The wooden walls of old England." (Loud cheers and laughter.) These are political cries. But the distinction between the watchword or bond of union of this great association and those political cries is this,—that the one is real, but the other is merely used as a means of binding men together in a sort of livery, which is known by the cry, as it were, that they utter, though there is no real intention of carrying any political movement into effect. (Cheers.) But not so with the Anti-Corn-Law League. Politicians are beginning to find that something is really meant (hear, hear); that something is meant to be done, and that this cry of "Free Trade,"—the demand for Free Trade—is not intended merely to bring political partisans into office and into the enjoyment of power, but it is intended to place in the possession of the great body of the intelligent middle and working classes of this country their full rights, which consist in having the free use of their power, and the full enjoyment of the fruits of their industry. (Cheers.) It has been predicted also, that, when good times came, the Anti Corn-Law League could not carry on its agitation. It has been said, when men are making money fast, they cannot attend to politics. The reason that they have so deceived themselves is this, that they never knew the reality of this movement. (Cheers.) This movement has not been adopted from a mere impulse, but is based upon an intelligent conviction. (Cheers.) It is not based upon the mere contingency of whether times are good or bad, or whether there be prosperity or whether there be distress; it is based upon the immutable principles of justice, that can never change. (Cheers.) You have had placed before your eyes by the Anti-Corn-Law League a plain, intelligible, broad, and clear idea; and what is this idea? That merchants and manufacturers are something in the land, as well as landowners and farmers (loud cheers); that commerce is as lawful and as legitimate a pursuit, and as advantageous to the community, as agriculture (cheers); and that it is as much the right of the merchant to supply his fellow-countrymen with food, by the agency of commerce, as it is the right of the landowner to supply the community with food by the agency of his acres. (Loud cheers.) That is the plain, intelligible principle which has been placed before the country. They now understand that commerce—that the agency of commerce—is a productive power, that it is as much a producer as agriculture; and that the one producer is as much entitled to the favour of the Legislature as the other. (Cheers.) All should be equal in the eyes of the Legislature; and, since you cannot protect or give special advantages to all, you must give special advantages and privileges to none. (Cheers.) All must stand upon the same common ground; and all must have the same free use of their powers, and the same advantages—the full advantage of whatever resources Providence may have placed within the reach of their honest industry. (Cheers.) And I say, the very object of government—the very principle upon which civil society is formed, and upon which it is based—is to carry out the spirit of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Cheers.) The object of government is to prevent individuals from encroaching upon the rights of individuals, and class from encroaching upon the rights of class. (Cheers.) But when our Legislature assists in promoting the maintenance of the Corn Law, I say it is itself guilty of one of those very wrongs which government was intended to repress. (Cheers.) Your excellent friend, who has addressed you before me, has so well pointed out how favourable the present movement is for testing the truth of the theory of the Anti Corn-Law League, by comparing its conclusions with the facts which are now around us—namely, the fact of an improving trade, with cheapness of food,—that I will not enter further into the detail of that branch of the question. Nothing in the world can be so clear—nothing but the wilful blindness which arises from self-interest, one would suppose, could ever prevent a man from admitting that, when food is abundant, when the necessities of life are cheap and accessible to the great mass of the community, there must be an increased demand for other products of industry; and with that increased demand for the other products of industry there must be rising wages and increased employment. (Loud cheers.) That is a self-evident proposition, and needs not any lengthened demonstration to satisfy any meeting, and especially one so well acquainted with the subject as that now gathered within these walls. (Cheers.) But with regard to the farmers: the farmers are grumbling together; and, grumblers though they are reputed generally to be, their grumbling is now somewhat more remarkable than usual. And I think they have good reason to grumble. (Hear, hear.) I think that of all people in this community, notwithstanding what the Legislature has professed to do for them, no class has been worse treated than the farmers. (Loud cheers.) It has been pretended that the Legislature has had the welfare of the farmer in view when it has reduced the taxes upon the land. It was said—"What a saving the farmer has had by the alteration consequent on the New Poor Law; the poor-rate is much less than it used to be; the poor farmer will be able to get a better return from his occupation." (Hear, hear.) But all that the farmer saved in poor-rate goes to rent. (Cheers.) There never was a greater mistake than to suppose that the Legislature, when professing to benefit the farmer, was not really putting more money into the pocket of the landowner. (Loud cheers.) The landowner was the object of favour—the farmer was merely held up as a mask to their intentions. (Cheers.)

Now, we have said this of the Anti-Corn-Law League all along: It has constantly been said that the Corn-Law question was a question of rent (hear, hear, hear); that the Corn Law was never intended to compensate the farmer for the different charges which pressed upon the land, because all those charges were calculated upon when the farmer took his land, and allowed for in the rent. (Hear, hear.) When the tithes rent-charge is high, when the poor-rate is high, when the various other burdens are high—of course a man who takes land cannot afford to give so much rent for it; therefore, the farmer has nothing whatever to do with the various burdens which have been alleged as the reason for protecting him. Now, as a proof that farmers themselves, compelled by the pressure of the times, having made their contracts for their present rents under the notion that prices would be higher than they now are,—are beginning to speak out upon this question, I will take the liberty of reading you one or two remarks from the speeches of tenant-farmers, at a meeting which took place in Gloucester, and which appeared in the Times newspaper of yesterday. And when I quote from this meeting, I quote from a meeting which resembles a great many others; for I have seen similar remarks to those which I shall read, as made at a great many meetings in different parts of the country. And were it not for the fear which prevails, in consequence of the sort of influence that is possessed by the landed proprietary over the tenants-at-will in this country, there would be at the present moment a very general expression of indignation on the part of the farmers, at the way in which their credulity has been practised upon by the Legislature, and at the way in which they have been induced to rely upon these faithful patrons of protection. (Cheers.) The article is headed, "The Farmers' Difficulties." It sets out by remarking that the guests were rather fewer than usual. It says:—

"The room was as commodious and the viands as abundant and inviting as on any previous occasion, and the charge was the same—but the guests were wanting. About thirty persons only were present, and of these a number were landlords, and several belonged to the city."

Mr. Watts, a tenant-farmer, then volunteered an explanation, and he said:—"I am sorry that our club is continuing to fall off, and that the attendance at our meetings has been so small. But, gentlemen, I told you last year the reason of this, namely, the unwillingness of many landlords to help their tenants in these times of difficulty and distress."

Then he goes on to say:—"I am aware, that many land-surveyors will advise their employers not to grant leases; the reason is obvious—instead of these men being called upon once in seven years, they perhaps will not be required to value the farm oftener than once in twenty-one years. (Laughter.) I hope the time is not very far distant when every good farmer will be protected by a fair lease, and at such a rent as the prices of produce, permanently reduced as they undoubtedly are, will enable him to pay." (Cheers.) So that, it seems, after all, when the farmer wants relief, he does not look to rent. He knows there is a margin there that can be burrowed upon. (Cheers.) We have been told—I dare say my excellent friend, Mr. Cobden, has been frequently told—"If you were to abolish rent altogether, the farmers could not afford to farm their lands under a repeal of the Corn Laws."

They don't say where. (Hear, hear.) We have not a word said about "special burdens," either; there is not a word said about poor-rate, nor about the seasons, nor about any other difficulties whatever. (Cheers.) The only remark made by this tenant-farmer is, that he wants a lease, and he wants it at a fair rent. (Hear, hear.) And that is the whole question. Now, what is it the farmers are afraid of, at the present moment, from a repeal of the Corn Laws? Is it low prices that they are afraid of?

Why, they have the low prices now; prices are low. They say they want a lowering of rent. (Hear, hear, hear.) But I ask them, will they ever get that lowering of rent until the Corn Law is abolished? (No, no.) Will there ever be a general adjustment of rent between the landlord and his tenant throughout the kingdom until there is a total abolition of protection? Never. (Cheers.) Now, as a proof that I am speaking not without authority when I say this—what did Lord Liverpool say when the Corn Law was passed? He said:—"If you don't pass this Corn Law, there will be a general adjustment of rents between landlord and tenant all over the kingdom, and the farmer will start afresh upon a new basis." (Cheers.) That would be the state of things now. Repeal the Corn Laws, and there would be an adjustment of rent, and there would be leases; and those are the very demands which these farmers are making at the agricultural meetings. (Cheers.) Now, the Anti-Corn-Law League proposes to do all in its power to accomplish this object; and therefore, I say, the Anti-Corn-Law League is emphatically the farmers' friend. (Cheers.) We are not enemies to the farmer; we desire to see the farmer prosper. We are enemies to landlord legislation (cheers); and we are enemies to the delusion which has been palmed upon the community—that it is an advantage that the landlord class should be elevated in the social scale by the depression of the mercantile community. (Loud applause.) There never was a time more favourable for the total abolition of the Corn Laws than the present moment. (Cheers.) We are often told in the House of Commons when we make a proposition—and by no means more frequently than by our State physician, Sir Robert Peel (hear, hear)—"Your proposition may be very reasonable in principle; but this is not the time." (Laughter.) Now, I defy them, if ever they mean to repeal these Corn Laws, to point to any future time which can by any possibility be more favourable than the present moment. (Cheers.) Prices are already moderate; there would be no change in the position of the farmer in that respect. Labourers are not now thrown out of employment because prices are reduced; but there is growing up at this moment, from the speculations in railroads, from a manufacturing prosperity, and from various causes, very greatly-increased demand for labour. (Hear, hear.) Now, altogether, I do not believe that one single individual would be thrown out of employment upon the land by the repeal of the Corn Laws; yet, allowing all they say about the non-employment of labour without the Corn Laws to be true, I say that there are now abundant means for employing the labour that may be thrown out of employment; for there are the railroads, and there is your manufacturing prosperity. (Cheers.) But, after all, what a nonsensical argument this is about throwing labourers out of employment by the repeal of the Corn Laws. Labourers can only be thrown out of employment (and by being thrown out of employment I suppose they mean the labourers will be deprived of bread) by the land going out of cultivation. Now, I will take the most extreme case that can possibly be imagined—that of a great number of acres of land being thrown out of cultivation, and, as they say, a great number of labourers being deprived of employment. Why, there are only three labourers employed on one hundred acres of land. (Hear, hear.) And does any sane man, any human being who is fit to be at large, mean to assert that these three men could not, by their own industry, live out of these one hundred acres of land, which it is alleged would be thrown out of cultivation? (Loud cheers.) But we know that it is a mere pretence this throwing of labourers out of employment. Why, what was said when the New Poor Law was introduced in the year 1835? It was said then—"Prices are very low, and this is a very favourable moment, therefore, for trying the effect of a more stringent poor law, which is to throw the labourer upon his own resources." (Hear, hear.) This was said by landed proprietors in those days, who wanted the New Poor Law to reduce the poor-rate; it was said by the Poor Law Commissions, it was said by all parties having influence or authority in the State. It was said then that it was a favourable moment to introduce the New Poor Law, simply because prices were very low, and, therefore, there was increased employment in other branches of industry, and greater facility for the labourer to find the means of living by his own industry. (Cheers.) But hundreds of instances of this kind of inconsistency may be discovered by only looking through a certain book called "Hansard's Parliamentary Debates." (Laughter.) You will find that every good Anti-Corn-Law argument is used by the supporters of the Corn Laws when it suits their own interests. (Cheers.) There is scarcely a single argument that we use in support of a repeal of the Corn Laws that has not been used by the supporters of those laws on other subjects; and the case was remarkably so, most undoubtedly, when the new poor law was introduced into this country. (Cheers.) But we have a great show of philanthropy in these days. Persons say—"We cannot support this Anti-Corn-Law League; but, at any rate, we'll do something in the way of charitable subscription for enabling the poor to enjoy some of the comforts of life, when they are unable to find employment to earn them for themselves." Now, I hold in my hand a book that has just been published in London—namely, the "Report of an Association for Promoting the Relief of Destitution in the Metropolis, and for Improving the Condition of the Poor by Means of Parochial and District Visiting, under the Superintendence and Direction of the Bishop and Clergy." Now, this is the report of the Lord Bishop of London. (Hear, hear.) What does he say upon this subject? I would just observe that we are entitled to have a little conversation with the Lord Bishop of London upon the question of the Corn Laws; not because he is a bishop—not because, as the late Mr. Cobden said, "he has a mitre on his head, and has a crosier in his holy hands." (Laughter.) No; but because he is a legislator; he sits in the House of Lords; he is a party to these laws; if he does not object to them, he assents to them. (Cheers.) Therefore, we are entitled to have a little conversation with him as to the operation of those Corn Laws in bringing about the results which this association is endeavouring to remedy. The Bishop says, in the course of this investigation,—"But it soon appeared, that, whatever might be the severity of the immediate pressure, a still greater and more alarming evil existed in its cause. It was found on investigation that the condition of the labouring classes, in too many instances, exhibited a downward tendency, declining from comparative comfort and respectability into poverty and ultimate pauperism. Whether this tendency might be ascribed to the great competition in trade, the manifold interruptions to which so vast a traffic as that of Great Britain is unavoidably exposed, and the consequent fluctuation in wages and uncertainty of employment; or whether, in particular districts, it might be traced to circumstances affecting the immediate locality alone, the fact remained the same. Now, the Bishop says—"a more alarming evil exists in the cause of all these disasters." A very sensible remark. (Cheers and laughter.) Perhaps it may not be thought wrong to say that the Bishop himself is a cause. (Laughter.) But, unless we are totally wrong in all our conclusions, the Bishop of London, by not testifying his disapprobation of the Corn Laws in the House of Lords, unless we be completely deceived in all our notions of cheap food, as a source of happiness to the community,—I say there is nothing so very extreme in the remark that the Bishop of London himself may be considered as one of the causes of the evils which he deplors. (Cheers.) "Why," the Bishop may say, "prices are low now—what would you have? The Corn Laws have not prevented you, you see, from having abundance of food." Yes, but I say the Corn Law answers no purpose at all, unless it be to raise the price of food. (Cheers.) The object of that law is to raise the price of food: it does effect that sometimes; and, therefore, by not opposing that law as far as in him lies, the Bishop of London does all he can to keep up the price of corn. (Cheers.) This is the great delusion into which men fall upon this subject, that because we have a momentary cheapness of corn, therefore we are not to object to the maintenance of the Corn Law. Why, the fact is this: either the Corn Law is operative, or it is not. If it be operative it is a great public wrong and a great injustice; and if it be inoperative at any moment, that, of course, can be no possible reason against its total repeal. (Cheers.) Now, I think the Bishop of London and this association, who are so anxious to inquire by their report into the cause of the distress of the poor, can hardly deny that cheapness and abundance are necessary to promote employment, to promote the welfare of the poorer classes of the community. Surely, it can never be necessary to discuss a question with the church, whether plenty is an evil, or whether scarcity be a blessing. (Hear, hear.) The very prayer, as we have often heard it said, which is used in our churches, assumes that cheapness and plenty are blessings. (Cheers.) True, undoubtedly it is, that sometimes these things are interpreted in what is called a non-natural sense (laughter); but I never heard that these words, "cheapness and plenty," meant anything but the plain meaning which they convey. (Cheers.) Well, then, I ask these gentlemen—we will not venture to impugn their motives, we will give them full credit for a desire to benefit the poorer classes of their fellow-countrymen; but I ask them in the name of common sense, in the name of all that is sacred, why don't they come forward to assist us to abolish a law whose only object, if it have any object at all, is to make food scarce, and therefore dear? (Loud and continued cheering.) Is there anything unreasonable in this request? ("No," and laughter.) And is there anything unreasonable in attesting that the Bishop of London, if he do not, in the House of Lords, use his authority for denouncing this law, gives his assent to it? (Cheers.) You have heard the story, I dare say, at least you have read what the late Lord Eldon said. He made use of the silence of the bishops in respect to the slave trade as an argument in its defence. He said:—"The slave trade cannot be such a horrible thing as is represented, or, surely, my lords the bishops would have denounced it long ago." (Cheers and laughter.) We are entitled to call upon all who profess to carry into practice the doctrines of Christianity (cheers), and all who have a voice in the making of laws for their fellow-countrymen, to express some clear and definite opinion as to the operation of this Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) It is necessary that it should be settled; and I think that, if opinions be expressed, the repeal of that law must be the necessary consequence. (Cheers.) I defy men in these days to make use of the exploded follies of past times. Society has begun to think; society has begun to reason upon this question in a spirit that has never existed in any previous period. (Cheers.) Now, I should like to ask whether there can be any gentleman found in this kingdom who would boldly assert—except it be the editor of the Morning Post (great laughter)—that scarcity in itself is a blessing to the community? (Hear, hear.) I do verily believe that, if we had the opportunity of fair and dispassionate argument, free from all party, with any man who supported the Corn Law, we should reduce him to the necessity of asserting that scarcity was, per se, and abstractedly, a blessing to the community. (Great cheering.) I think when we consider the great advantage, too, which the agitation of the Anti-Corn-Law League has been to the promotion of practical agriculture in this kingdom—when we consider how the farmers through the whole kingdom are more or less curious as to new manures, and new investments in respect of agricultural improvements, we shall be satisfied that our agitation has had a most beneficial effect upon the cultivation of the soil. (Cheers.) No man—I say it emphatically, I say it conscientiously, as somewhat of an agriculturist myself, and as residing in an agricultural county—I say no man has proved a better friend to agriculture than our excellent leader, Mr. Cobden. (Loud cheering.) We never should have heard so much about guano, and under-draining, and organic chemistry, and lectures upon the nature of soils, if there had not been a foreboding that days of competition were at hand, and that it would be no longer possible to rely upon the Legislature and the promises of members of Parliament. (Applause.) That has proved a broken reed; and I have heard this very uncertainty mentioned by several friends of our cause as in itself a good thing for the community. (Applause.) For this uncertainty causes an increase of zeal—an increased energy, I should rather say, in the adoption of various improvements, and in the testing of these new inventions. Perhaps Sir Robert Peel may think that uncertainty is, after all, a good thing for the farmers; I don't know that he does not. (Laughter.) He seems to adopt that cautious reserve as to his future intentions upon all matters of public policy, that would lead one almost to imagine that uncertainty itself is a part of his studied intentions. (Applause and laughter.) It may have its benefits; but I confess that I think a certainty would be a far more beneficial thing for this community. I cannot help thinking that, if we could now repeal the Corn Laws, we should see rendered permanent that prosperity which now will be such a source of satisfaction and joy to the Premier when he meets the coming Parliament. (Applause.) But I doubt myself, although our Prime Minister has undoubtedly made some footsteps in the direction of Free Trade, whether we can give to him the full credit of all these improvements in our commerce and in our manufactures. (Hear, hear, hear.) I rather think that unless we deem—as some extreme partisans have been held to deem—that the weather even is influenced by the Ministers in power, we cannot allow Sir Robert Peel that meed of credit. (Laughter.) No. His measures have been useful, inasmuch as they have affirmed a principle (hear, hear), but their practical result, I believe, has been but small. (Loud applause.) We are indebted to a power which has defeated the intentions of monopoly—(loud applause)—we are indebted to Providence, we are indebted to abundant harvests for the prosperity which we now enjoy; and we can only consider ourselves under an obligation to Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham, for having, in their places in Parliament, affirmed that the principle of Free Trade is the principle of common sense. (Cheers.) We are satisfied with that declaration, because I am persuaded that it will be long and hard to lead the people of this country to the belief that it is not expedient to carry into practice the principles of common sense. (Loud cheers.) Certainly the object for which the League contends is a glorious one. The struggle for commercial freedom has been compared to the struggles which took place in former times for religious liberty, for the freedom of the press, for the freedom of speech, and various other great struggles of freedom against oppression. But I believe that the result of our success will be greater in benefit to the community than all the other results that have preceded it. I believe that Free Trade contains within itself something which is not merely beneficial to this community in which we live, but that if we adopt its principles it will confer a benefit upon mankind at large. (Cheers.) It is no less, depend upon it, than the highest and dearest interests of mankind at large that are involved in the struggle for commercial freedom. (Cheers.) We are not engaged in any narrow or confined object,—in anything which partakes either of the nature of privilege on the one hand, or of exclusion on the other. (Cheers.) Whilst the Free-Traders vindicate their own rights, they have an equal regard for the rights of others. (Cheers.) There is nothing in our principle that is inconsistent with universal justice; and I feel persuaded that the day is not far distant—it may be nearer than any of us imagine—when the Corn Law shall be erased from the statute-book of England, and consigned, as many other barbarisms have been before it, to everlasting oblivion. (Loud cheers.)

JOHN BAUMER, Esq., M.P., then presented himself, and was most warmly cheered. He said:—"It seems to me a very becoming thing that the Council of the Anti-Corn-

Law League should render its annual report to this audience, and in this hall, and on this spot. For this audience is a fair representation of the numbers and the influence of the Free-Trade party in this country; and this great hall is a temple which has been reared to Free-Trade principles, to justice, and to freedom; and this spot whereon we are now assembled is memorable in the annals of the struggle for Free Trade—for on this spot, a quarter of a century ago, your fellow-townsmen were attacked by a brutal and cowardly soldiery (loud cheers); and the blood of men and women, who had assembled here to protest against the iniquity of the Corn Law, was then shed. (Hear, hear.) There are two things which strike my mind at this moment, in connexion with this question. One is, that the tendency and object of all Corn-Law legislation of late years has been the same—to plunder the industry of the country by creating an artificial famine, and thereby to enrich the great proprietors of the soil, and those who call themselves the nobility of the land. (Loud cheers.) When the law was passed in 1815, £4 a quarter was fixed as the price of wheat. Now, the price is 45s. a quarter—only a little more than half. (Hear, hear.) Now, we think £4 a quarter a famine price. It was a famine price then; the law intended that it should be perpetual; but only two years since that time have witnessed the price of wheat so high as 80s. In 1817 and 1818 the act-of-Parliament-famine price was reached; and those years were years of great distress and discontent, and menaced insurrection in all the densely-populated districts of the kingdom. (Cheers.) But the Corn Law intended that, from 1815 to 1815, or as long as it should last, the famine price should be kept in view, and should be attained if possible; the object of these men, the views of these men, had only this limit—"Get as near that price always as it may be safe to go." (Loud cheers.) Get all out of the industry of the country which the industrious classes will bear quietly. (Hear.) Don't mind starving a few of the poor, who will go down to premature graves, and their voices will not be heard amongst the strife of parties and the contentions for political power." (Loud cheers.) This Corn Law has no mercy in it; and its framers had none. (Cheers.) There have been periods when distress has not extensively prevailed. We are now passing through one of them; but it is not by the mercy of the Corn Law that we are not now plunged into utter desolation. (Cheers.) We have heard already, and I may here repeat it, that there is a power, a beneficent power, a power which does not make its arrangements to suit the ignorant and the sordid views of the proprietors of land in Britain; and that power, omnipotent—far above all the potentates that sit in the halls of human legislation—that power it is which has baffled the intentions of the framers of the Corn Law, and has given at this moment plenty and comfort to the millions of the people. (Loud cheers.) We hear sometimes that the slave flies from the lash and the chain, and makes his escape into a country where slavery is unknown; he escapes although the bloodhounds are upon his track; but does any man attribute his escape and safety to that quality of mercy which is not to be found in the nature of the bloodhound? And will any man now say that it is the effect of protection, that it is owing to a quality of mercy in this protection, or to any feature in this Corn Law, that you are not now overwhelmed with pauperism, and that every valued institution of your country is not threatened by the menaced insurrection of millions who are starving around you? (Cheers.) The next thing to be remembered is this,—and it should never for a moment be forgotten,—that the Corn Law was passed by military force, and by the power of that alone (hear, hear); that the houses of legislation in this free country were garrisoned the night when that law passed the senate (cheers); that the very police, and the very military who are sustained by taxes taken from the people, were employed to impose upon the neck of the people—y, and to rivet fast the collar which was to be at once the mark of their servitude, and the penalty they were to pay for their subjugation. (Loud cheers.) It was passed, and it has been maintained, by force applied to the population of our towns; it has been maintained by the grossest fraud and cajolery applied to the population of our rural districts. It has never been asked for by the people. No petitions have gone to Parliament signed by tens, twenties, and fifties of thousands of people, asking for the enactment of a Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) It has never even been consented to by the people; there has been from the moment of its first enactment a continual protest against its iniquity. (Cheers.) Your own meeting, of which I have already spoken, in 1810, was one to protest against it; and from that time to this there have not been wanted men—men in every part of the country, ay, and intelligent men in every part of the world—to rise up and to speak in denunciation of the infamy of this law. (Cheers.) And the Anti-Corn-Law League is but the embodiment, as it were, of a long-held opinion; we are but taking up the question which our fathers have also had a deep interest in. We are here, better organized, and, if possible, more resolved; and that is just the difference between the agitation in which we are now engaged, and that which was being carried on upon this very spot of earth twenty-five years ago. (Cheers.) Now, this may be a fitting time to ask the question, which some of our opponents, perhaps, are asking—What has the League done? In many gigantic works, in the building of some vast edifice, you see the progress daily; stone is placed upon stone, until the whole immense fabric is complete. Our object is to promote the passing of a bill in Parliament to repeal the acts affecting the importation of corn; but it is not to be expected that we should see, by successive steps, clause after clause of that bill put into shape, or that it should be read a first time, and be waiting for further agitation to compel its reading a second time. Our work is to create public feeling, and to array public feeling against this law to such an extent that the law shall be virtually repealed, that the triumph shall be consummated; and then the act of Parliament, the mere sanction of the Legislature, will be but the formal acknowledgment and ratification of that which public opinion has already decreed. (Cheers.) I was tracing our progress in my mind; and I recollected that in the year 1815 the Anti-Corn-Law League raised a subscription of about £5000, and it was thought a very serious attempt; and one knowing man promised to repeal the Corn Laws for about £3000. (Laughter.) In 1840 another subscription was entered into—a guarantee fund for three years, to be paid by instalments. In 1841 there took place that very memorable meeting when 700 ministers of religion assembled in this town, deputed by 700 congregations of Christian men and women. (Hear, hear.) These men assembled here, and, with all the force and all the power which their character and their calling could give them, they denounced this Corn Law as one violating every human right, and offensive in the sight of Heaven. (Great cheering.) Oh, it was a noble spectacle! (Cheers.) There are many who have not sufficiently valued it. But in our journeys through various parts of the country we have met with scores and scores of those men, and we have found that they went back from that meeting to the most remote corners of the island, and there they spread the principles which in themselves had been strengthened here, and formed a centre of agitation in favour of Free Trade, from which the very best results have succeeded. (Cheers.) In 1842, we held a bazaar in this town which realized the sum of £10,000—(cheers)—more, I believe, by some thousands, than was ever before received from any bazaar in this country, however great and noble were its patrons and patronesses. (Cheers.) In 1843, we raised a subscription of £50,000—(loud cheers)—and that was done with the greatest ease. (Cheers.) In 1844, the subscription of £100,000 was asked for; and you have heard from the report that about £82,000 or £83,000 have been received, although one of the great means by which it was to have been collected has not yet been employed. (Hear, hear.) But what shall I say of 1845, not yet a month old? (Hear, hear.) This: that within the last three months, at the recommendation of the Council of the League, aided by a large number of meetings which have been attended by deputations from the Council, the Free-Traders of Lancashire, of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and of North Cheshire, have expended certainly nearly a quarter of a million of money in qualifying new votes for the counties I have named. (Loud cheers.) When, more than a year ago, a few despised manufacturers met in the Town-hall, and (being a business day they could not stay long) put down their names for upwards of £12,000; the Times newspaper said that it was "a great fact." Now, I should like to know what description of fact is this?—that, within three months, at the recommendation of the Council, more, certainly, than £200,000, I believe £250,000, have been expended in the purchase of property, for the sake of augmenting the Free-Trade register in the counties I have named. (Loud cheers.) Well, now, I ask this meeting, after this brief description of our progress so far, can this movement fail? (Cries of "No, no," and "Never.") I ask the monopolists themselves, who have any share of intelligence, and who know anything of how public questions are carried in this country,—I ask the members of the Queen's Government themselves whether they think there can be any rest for their Ministry, or for any succeeding Ministry, whilst this infamous law shall disgrace the statute-book of the country? (Cheers, and "Never.") This movement began when trade was gradually failing; it strengthened when trade was at the worst; it has passed through that period, and it is marching on now with firmer and faster steps when trade has again become prosperous. (Cheers.) What a delusion—what a miserable, wretched delusion was it, that improved trade would stop the agitation for the repeal of the Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) These men to whom we are opposed never understood us; they thought we were like themselves (hear, hear)—that we did this, either for a living, or for the sake of power, or for the sake of popularity. I believe there is little of that—however mixed may be our motives, and however frail we all are—I believe there is little of any such unworthy motive to actuate any member of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Tremendous cheers.) Our movement arose from a deep conviction—a conviction which has become a faith—a faith which was strong before, but which has become much stronger by the experience of recent years. We have before us such extraordinary proof that, if I were to be asked to make facts for the purpose of proving our case, I could take nothing better than those which every year is bringing before our notice. (Hear, hear.) For four or five years, from 1838 to 1842, the average price of wheat was 61s. 8d. a quarter; now it is 45s. a quarter—within 4d. of 20s. difference. (Hear, hear.) What is the effect? That if we consume 20 millions of quarters of wheat, we save 20 millions now in the purchase of our food, compared with the price we gave in the dear years to which I have alluded. In those years the landlords were above, and they were dropping down their great landlord sponge (great laughter), and were absorbing from the industry of all the industrious classes of the country 20 millions per annum, without rendering for it one atom of good, or even near so much food as they are giving us now for a lower price. (Loud cheers.) Well, the difference now is simply this, that that 20 millions is running into a thousand channels, fertilizing every district of the country, drying up nothing but tears, and spreading smiles and happiness all around. (Immense cheering.) We have read lately what a good thing it is that the China market has been opened. True; but how much better a thing that the English market has been opened! (Cheers.) If you look at the whole of our exports to our colonies, you will find that they were only 13 millions in 1842. Therefore this alteration in the price of food is tantamount to the opening of markets half as extensive again as the whole of the colonies of Great Britain. (Cheers.) If you take the markets of Germany, Holland, France, Italy and the Italian Islands, Russia, Belgium, and Brazil,—all those markets only take from us—or did take from us in 1842—goods to the amount of £20,200,416. But this reduction in the price of food gives us an extended home market equal to the demand of all those markets, and exceeding by one-half the demand which arises from all the colonies of Britain in every part of the globe. (Loud cheers.) Well, then, our present prosperity enjoins upon us that we should continue this agitation. (Loud cheers.) And if it did not, agricultural misery imperatively demands it of us. (Loud cheers.) Thirty years' protection has left some 800,000 or 900,000 of our countrymen, agricultural labourers, for the most part paupers, hopeless and reckless. (Hear, hear.) We now find, on inquiry into the condition of those districts, that the very population who, our opponents said, supported our home trade and supported the revenue, buy almost no clothing, and consume almost no excisable articles. We find these labourers are helpless amidst their wrongs. Protection to them has been of a sort which they dread almost to think of. If I were to be asked of its results, I would say—

"Tis to see their children weak,
With their mothers, pline and peak
While the wintry winds are bleak,—
They are dying whilst I speak.

"Tis to hunger for such diet
As the rich man in his riot
Casts to the fat dogs that lie
Surfeiting beneath his eye!"

(Cheers.) This is the protection which the Corn Law has given to the rural labourers; and I appeal to themselves and their actual condition for the truth of the statement. (Loud cheers.) And then the farmers, of whom Mr. Gibson has spoken, are just about as helpless. There is a case to prove it. Ninety-nine farmers out of every hundred in the kingdom are altogether against the game law; that is notorious, and yet there are not ten farmers in a district who dare meet to denounce that law in the face of their landlords. (Cheers.) I have letters in my pocket just now, I am receiving them nearly every day, signed—"Plain Truth," and "A Friend to Justice to the Farmer," and a variety of other anonymous names of that kind, asking the League to go on with their work, and especially to agitate against the game law. (Cheers.) They dare not even put their names to a letter, for fear they should come out before the public. Now, I ask you, not only to deliver yourselves but to deliver these farmers; they are suffering under the same tyranny which has so long trampled upon you and your class. This battle in which we are engaged is the battle of trade against lordly plunder. (Cheers.) You know what they say of trade; you know, or you ought to know, what the Standard newspaper said of your district:—"England would be as great as she now is, and all useful Englishmen as rich and as happy as they now are, if all the manufacturing towns and districts of the empire were involved in one common ruin." (Hisses, and cries of "Shame!") It was an unhappy sentiment for any paper to utter; it is a horrible and diabolic sentiment; but it is suited admirably to the columns in which it appeared. (Loud cheers.) Many attempts have been made to explain it away. Doubtless, when you come fairly to the belief that that sentiment expresses the real opinions of the party to whom we are opposed,—then, I suppose, there will be no difficulty whatever in rousing all the industrious classes of the empire to one general execration of this tyranny, and that it will be swept away, and for ever. (Cheers.) This battle is one of honest industry against dishonest idleness. (Cheers and laughter.) Mr. Baines has spoken of the fact that some of us who are prominent in this matter are calico-printers, and cotton-spinners, and the like. Well, we own it. (Cheers.) We confess that we are guilty, and that our fathers have been guilty, of doing something for our own living. (Cheers.) We make no pretensions to high blood; we don't pretend even to be high-bred. (Cheers and laughter.) If our fathers did throw a shuttle—and I'll never deny that mine did—(loud cheers)—yet I take it that we are born upon this soil of England, and, somehow or other, we have a strong impression that, whatsoever Government rules over this land, we, equally with the richest and the noblest born, have a claim to impartiality and to justice at the hands of that Government. (Loud cheers.) But now trade is getting off its knees, standing up a little, looking around, and surveying those who have for years been trampling it in the dust. Trade is now enfranchising itself. This,—shall I call it, new move?—this great move, this ulterior weapon of the League, is doing wonders, and is destined to do wonders for the trade and commerce of this district, and of the country at large. (Cheers.) When I consider the effect which it has had, the enthusiasm which it has produced, it appears to be more as if I had looked upon some battle-field, and had seen the forces of monopoly on one side, and of Free Trade on the other,—that the struggle had been long and deadly, with the alternations of loss and of gain, the forces rather unequally matched, the issue for a long time doubtful; and it seems as if some superior intelligence had thrown to the Free-Trade warriors an armour which was invulnerable to the shafts of their enemies, and weapons of such exquisite temper that their foes could no longer stand for a moment against them. (Tremendous cheers.) It is a long struggle, and it is a death struggle; it is a struggle where men come and grapple with men, and principle with principle. But, looking back over the ground we have trod, over the dangers and the perils which we have surmounted, is there not enough to stimulate us for the future? (Great cheering.) I ask you, here, men of Manchester,—you, to whose everlasting honour it will be said, that amongst you this League was cradled,—I ask you whether you will not be valiant for the future? (Cheers.) I feel that every step we take we tread on firmer and firmer ground; that on every hand the foe is retreating; and from whatever I see and hear—from the support we have received from the gentlemen who have come from various parts of the country to-day—and from all I see around us, I do augur that we approach the end of this conflict; and after the tolls, and the perils, and the sacrifices of warfare, we shall have the reward and all the enjoyments of a well-earned and a perpetual peace. (At the conclusion of Mr. Bright's speech the whole audience rose en masse, and the cheering was loud and prolonged.)

Mr. Brooks, in moving the thanks of the meeting to the speakers, expressed his gratification with the progress of the cause. He said that his friends—his constituents he called them—at Ashton and Staleybridge were the best constituency in the kingdom, always up to the mark, and willing to come again to the charge. He had met one of them recently, who asked if the money was all done, as he expected him (Mr. Brooks) coming again, and he was ready for them. Mr. Brooks expressed his opinion that, at their next meeting in the Town-hall, if another subscription should be needed, we should get up another great fact, and get more money than before.

Mr. AUKROYD seconded the motion, which passed unanimously.

The vast assemblage then separated.

ANNUAL AGGREGATE MEETING OF THE LIVERPOOL ANTI-MONOPOLY ASSOCIATION.

(Abridged from the Liverpool Times.)

The annual aggregate meeting of the members and friends of the Liverpool Anti-Monopoly Association was held on Monday night in the Music-hall, when, notwithstanding the absence of any exciting temporary subject, or of any of the leading advocates of Free Trade from any other part of the country, the large room was densely crowded in every part. On the platform we noticed Thos. Thorneley, Esq., M.P.; Rawdon Briggs, Esq., ex-M.P. for Halifax; Joel White, Esq., the newly-appointed consul of the United States in Liverpool; Wm. Brown, Esq.; Christopher Rawdon, Esq.; Thomas Blackburn, Esq.; Lawrence Heyworth, Esq.; T. Jevons, Esq.; J. B. Cooke, Esq.; J. T. Crook, Esq.; C. E. Rawlins, sen., Esq.; Charles Holland, Esq.; Charles Robertson, Esq.; C. E. Rawlins, jun., Esq.; T. Blackburn, jun., Esq.; James Harvey, Esq.; John Finch, jun., Esq.; Mr. John Murray, &c.

Shortly after seven o'clock, the chair was taken amidst much applause, by THOMAS THORNELEY, Esq.

The CHAIRMAN addressed the meeting, and in the course of his speech noticed the progress of Free-Trade principles during the past year, referring in proof, to the repeal of the wool duties, the sugar duties debates, and the reduction of the duties on coffee. If those partial efforts had afforded them thus much good, how great would be the good that would be accomplished when the principles of Free Trade were thoroughly carried out, as he was persuaded they would be in the end. (Cheers.) It was extraordinary that the Legislature should not look around and see the progress manufactures were making in foreign countries, because foreigners said, and, as he thought, unwisely said, that parties who did not take their goods should be prevented from sending their goods in return. (Hear, hear.) He had the curiosity to look at what the consumption of cotton was in the United States of America last year, and he found that in 1844 those states had consumed as much American cotton as we in this country consumed of American cotton in 1824. This was very extraordinary, that the consumption of American cotton in the United States of America last year was equal to what we consumed 20 years ago. (Hear, hear.) He must always acknowledge, in meeting the people of Liverpool on an occasion of this sort, what an admirable expression of public opinion they had made on various occasions in favour of Free Trade, but he could not meet them without referring them again to that admirable subscription which they had made to the funds of the League, amounting to no less than £6000. (Cheers.) The Chairman having exhorted them to persevere, concluded by stating that the meeting would be addressed by a number of gentlemen; that Mr. Crook would read a statement of the funds, and Mr. Rawlins the report.

JOHN TAYLOR CROOK, Esq., one of the treasurers of the Liverpool Anti-Monopoly Association, read the accounts for the past year. It appeared that at the end of 1843 there was in hand a balance of about £46, which, together with the subscriptions and donations during the year 1844, made a total income of £1053. 2s. 1d. The expenditure had amounted to £896. 15s. 6d., leaving a balance of £156. 6s. 7d., with no outstanding accounts. (Cheers.)

C. E. RAWLINS, jun., Esq., secretary, read the report for the past year, and moved its adoption.

The Report commenced by congratulating the members on the flourishing condition of our local association for the advancement of Free Trade. "The number of our members has," it was observed, "very greatly increased—our funds are ample—and the confidence of our fellow-townsmen in our object and movements is daily augmenting. It is perfectly obvious that for these favourable circumstances we are indebted to our steady adherence to the principle of entire Free Trade. Whatever difference of opinion upon this point there might have existed among our friends at one time, it is fast dying away. It is now acknowledged that the public mind can only be moved to action by a clear definitive principle of justice, admitting of no mystification, and implying no mental reserve."

The Report then proceeded to point out the many indications given during the past year of the progress made towards a Free-Trade policy, as proved by the large number of votes given for Mr. Brown in South Lancashire; the gradual application by the present Ministry of Free-Trade principles to the destruction of monopoly; and the proof given of the truth of those principles by the progress of events. "Events have indeed spoken trumpet-tongued in our favour. Every fallacy which a selfish policy had endeavoured to impress on the public mind is, at this passing moment, in process of refutation. Cheaper food was to lower wages! We have had cheaper food, and in a great number of trades even money wages have been actually increased, in some cases voluntarily, by the employers; in others at the demand of the operatives, and the combinations of the latter have, in almost every instance, been successful. Every where real wages—the amount of comforts for which money wages stand as only the representative—have advanced, and we believe that the working classes are becoming more and more convinced that the only permanent and true protection for the labourer is in the active demand for his labour. Our late distress was said to be owing to over-production of manufactures and the use of machinery! Returning prosperity has been accompanied by increased production, while an unexampled extension of machinery has led to a like extension in the employment of manual labour. Cheaper food was to injure the revenue! The revenue, which had declined in years of scarcity, has flourished in seasons of abundance."

The Parliamentary report on the occupations of the people had been one powerful cause in producing this change of opinion. This report showed that the whole number of the population engaged in commerce and manufactures was more than two to one of the number engaged in agriculture, being upwards of three millions in the former, and only one million and a half in the latter; that this relative disproportion was constantly increasing; and that, while the population has been rapidly increasing, the employment afforded in agriculture has not only relatively but actually diminished since 1821. Having furnished the returns proving these statements, the report of the Association added, "Thus while in 1821 the cultivation of the soil had not only failed to employ any portion of the natural increase of the population, but even 30,487 able-bodied labourers less than it did ten years before, commerce, manufactures, and all other occupations had employed upwards of three quarters of a million (774,963) additional hands." Other causes which had been operative in the production of this change of opinion were next adverted to.

The repeal or modification of the duties on vinegar, dist-glass, currants, coffee, marine insurances, and wool, was noticed; and the report advocated a total repeal of the duty on vinegar, as a raw material in calico-printing, and on glass, as a manufacture for which England was eminently fitted, though the vexatious excise duties had caused it to be a declining one. A sweeping reduction and equalization of the duties on all coffee, no matter whence imported, was advocated; and this article was selected to show the remarkable effects produced on consumption by legislation. Some interesting facts were given with respect to the wool trade, which afford a striking lesson to the friends of restriction, and show how completely the fears of the agriculturists have been falsified.

The article of sugar was next referred to, an attack on the grinding monopoly in which has at length been made. The object of the ministerial measure passed last session was (said the report) twofold:—1. To prevent the consumption of slave-grown sugar in this country. 2. To discourage the continuance of slave labour in countries where it is now established.

"1. The Ministerial measure will not prevent the consumption of slave-grown sugar in this country."

"The question has been practically settled by Messrs. Ackers and Co., of this town, who entered the first parcel of sugar under the new act. It was the production, according to certificate, of the state of Venezuela, and the production of slaves. Its admission was founded on a treaty existing between that country and our own, which entitles their produce to admission on the most favoured terms of other nations."

"Now, let us see in what position this admission has placed us. The total produce of the world, according to M'Culloch, is about 670,000 tons per annum, of which 267,000 tons are the product of Cuba, Porto Rico, and Brazil, by slave labour. These countries are situated in the immediate vicinity of the following countries, with whom we have commercial treaties on the footing of the most favoured nations, viz.:—Dutch Guiana (Holland), the United States, Buenos Ayres, Columbia, Mexico, Venezuela, Peru, Bolivia, Texas, and Paraguay. What, then, is to prevent every one of these countries exporting every cwt. of their own produce, and supplying themselves from the great sugar countries we have named? Dutch Guiana alone exports 25,000 tons, the surplus produce of her 60,000 slaves. We think these facts justify the assertion that the object of keeping out slave produce is a mere chimera. That Government contemplated such admission is also clear, from the very circumstances of the alteration of the duty being fixed after the expiration of our treaty with Brazil. This treaty was of the same character as those we have described, and Ministers have thus secretly connived at what they dare not openly avow. While noticing the singular fact of the very first operation of their measure detecting the fraud, we are struck by the coincidence that Lord Sandon, the unflinching advocate of West India monopoly, and the loud declaimer against slave-grown sugar, acted on behalf of Messrs. Ackers, in procuring its first admission for home consumption into the country."

"2. The Ministerial measure will not discourage slavery in countries where it is now established."

"This could only be done by lowering the present price of slave produce, or preventing its increase in the same ratio as free produce. Granting, for the sake of argument, that additional consumption will all be of the latter, we still affirm the same effect will be produced on the market prices of the world as if it had been exclusively slave-grown."

A glance is then taken at the results of the principal alterations effected by the tariff of 1842; and it is shown that the reduction of the duty on copper ore, which it was predicted by Sir Richard Vivian would ruin the whole mining interest, had been so highly beneficial as to convert copper monopolists into copper Free-Traders.

The operation of the new Corn Law was the next subject taken up. This new law was expressly framed with the view of remedying two evils—great unsteadiness of price, and great inequality of supply.

"1. Has it produced steadiness of price? To ascertain this, we should compare its operations with those of the old law upon the produce of similar harvests. It will be generally admitted that the last cycle of cheap years, viz., from 1833 to 1837, will afford us a parallel with the present cycle of 1842, 1843, and 1844, the latter having been at least as abundant as the previous one. Now, we find that in the first twelve months ensuing after the enactment of the new law—

1842 .. .. . 64 3
The lowest ditto, April 6, 1843 .. .. . 46 2

Showing a difference, in nine months, of 18 1

In the second twelve months—

The highest price was, on August 4, 1843 .. .. . 57 7
" lowest " May 5, " .. .. . 47 0

Difference in four months .. .. . 10 7

In the part of the three years which has expired—

The highest price was, on May 2, 1844 .. .. . 55 8
" lowest " Dec. 5, " .. .. . 45 11

Difference in seven months .. .. . 9 7

Under the old law, the difference between the highest and the lowest prices, in the years before named, was as follows:—

	Highest Price.	Lowest Price.	Difference.
1833 ..	56s. 9d.	49s. 8d.	6s. 9d.
1834 ..	49s. 2d.	41s. 11d.	7s. 3d.
1835 ..	43s. 8d.	36s. 9d.	6s. 5d.
1837 ..	60s. 1d.	51s. 7d.	8s. 6d.

So far, then, from producing steadiness of price, it must be evident that, under similar circumstances, the new Corn Law shows worse results than the last.

"2. Has it prevented inequality of supply? One of the heaviest charges against the old Corn Law was, that it alternately injured the consumer and the producer—the one by withholding supplies when most needed; the other by admitting them all at once, and at the very time he had his produce to sell. How stands the account with the new Corn Law?

	Entered for Home Consumption in 7 months—January to July.	Entered for Home Consumption—August and September.
1840 .....	784,538 qrs.	1,567,111 qrs.
1841 .....	808,403 "	2,510,524 "
1842 .....	646,008 "	2,630,514 "
1843 .....	61,573 "	64,500 "

There is a complete and unexampled inequality here.

The timber monopoly and the shipping interest were next passed under review in a very able manner.

This report was read by Mr. Rawlins with a spirit and animation which gave it all the impressiveness of a spoken speech. It frequently elicited warm expressions of approval, and at the close there was a burst of enthusiastic applause from the whole audience.

WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., who was greeted with rapturous cheering, said that it was with very great satisfaction that he rose to second the motion for the adoption of the report. It had been very ably and properly drawn up, and forestalled a great deal of what he had intended to say. Mr. Brown then delivered an able speech, abounding with valuable statistics, and concluded, amidst warm applause, by seconding the adoption of the report, which was carried unanimously.

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., who experienced a most cordial reception, moved the second resolution—a vote of thanks to the Council of the Association for their labours during the past year.

THOMAS BLACKBURN, Esq., in an eloquent address, which was frequently received with loud plaudits, seconded the resolution, which passed unanimously.

CHARLES HOLLAND, Esq., in an able speech, moved the re-election of Mr. Thorneley, M.P., as President, and the appointment of a committee and officers for the ensuing year.

Mr. THOMAS BLACKBURN, Jun., seconded the resolution.

Upon the motion of CHARLES ROBERTSON, Esq., seconded by C. RAWDON, Esq., a vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman by acclamation.

FREE-TRADE TEA PARTY AT BURY.

(Abridged from the Manchester Guardian.)

On Monday last upwards of 700 friends of Free Trade sat down to tea together in the Brunswick School-room, Bury. Mr. Hacking's band was in attendance. After the things were removed, when upwards of one thousand persons were present, the business of the evening commenced. Richard Walker, Esq., M.P., was called to the chair. On the platform were Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P.; John Walker, Esq.; Richard Walker, Esq., jun.; Richard Bailey, Esq., Radcliffe; John Grundy, Esq., Bellevue; James Wrigley, Esq., sen., and James Wrigley, Esq., jun.; Ash Meadows; Edmund Grundy, Esq., Park Hills; Wm. Ascroft, Esq.; Gigg; James Kay, Esq., R. T. Grundy, Esq., Revds. F. Howarth, — Roseman, and — Molyneux; John Brooks, Esq., and Edward Watkin, Esq., of Manchester.

The CHAIRMAN opened the proceedings with a short speech.

The Rev. F. HOWARTH then spoke on the justice of Free Trade, maintaining that a repeal of the bread-tax was in accordance with true Christianity.

The Rev. Mr. ROSEMAN contended that it was the duty of Christian ministers to advocate those things that were good for the body as well as for the soul.

RICHARD COBDEN, Esq., M.P., on being called on to address the meeting, was received with cheers. He said:—He remembered that the first meeting of the sort he attended after being returned for Stockport was at Bury, and he was now happy to meet them again previous to going to Parliament. The hon. member for Bury and himself had generally voted together, but had often been in minority. He then proceeded to point out the benefits which the country derived from cheap food, as evidenced in the improved state of trade, and the increased wages of the operatives, consequent upon two abundant harvests. He next pointed out how necessary it was, to secure a repeal of the Corn Laws, that the present House of Commons should be changed, and that this could be effected only by Free-Traders swelling the registry: he, therefore, urged upon them to qualify, and secure the franchise. In conclusion, Mr. Cobden said he was certain no man could advocate with a clear conscience anything that would tend to deprive the labourer of his daily bread; he ought to have plenty of food and clothing; it was his right; it was justice that he should have them, for there was plenty and to spare. (Cheers.)

Mr. JOHN BROOKS, of Manchester, was next called on. He said:—The questions they had met upon were of a religious nature. He was a member of the Church of England. He had laboured hard for many years to convert the church parsons to his opinions, but he had only succeeded in obtaining a single convert, and that was a church clergyman without a church. (Cheers.) He would say all things should be free.

Mr. EDWARD WATKIN, of Manchester, said:—There was not a less sum than £50,000 annually taken from the hard earnings of the people of Bury, in the shape of a tax on provisions. In England, there was £23,000,000 in the savings' banks, belonging to the middle and working classes; it was paying only 2½ per cent; if that money was laid out in the purchase of 40s. freeholds it would soon bring about a reform.

JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., M.P., was received with loud cheers. The honourable member spoke with his accustomed power on various branches of the question of Free Trade. "The Corn Laws," he said, "had been forced upon the people against their wishes; but they would force them off again by argument. Real reforms must be brought about by sound arguments; and public opinion, on this point, was already gaining ground in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and North Cheshire. During the last three months, he and Mr. Cobden had visited 16 boroughs in Yorkshire; he had also lately been at Durham, and other places, and the cause of Free Trade and a repeal of the Corn Laws was gaining ground rapidly. If the people of England had made all the railways, canals, built large towns, &c., they could also raise a new set of men to Parliament, and then a real reform would take place; then the labourers would be in a better condition, and would obtain a fair remuneration for their labour. Free Trade, too, would, without doubt, cause a unanimity amongst all classes, in all countries and nations." (Cheers.)

The meeting was afterwards addressed by Messrs. James Fielding, of Heywood; Edmund Grundy, of Park Hills; and Henry Rostron, of Radcliffe. Votes of thanks were given to the chairman, Messrs. Cobden, Bright, Brooks, and Watkins; and also to Mrs. T. R. Grundy, and the ladies who had got up the tea party.

The company separated a quarter before ten o'clock, highly delighted with the proceedings of the evening.

MR. BRIGHT, M.P., IN GATESHEAD.

(Abridged from the Gateshead Observer.)

The honourable member for the county of Durham having visited his constituents on Wednesday the 15th inst., he was invited to come forward to Gateshead, and address the inhabitants at a public meeting. This invitation was at once accepted, and the use of the Independent Chapel, Melbourn-street, obtained for the occasion. Friday the 17th was the day appointed; and, notwithstanding the shortness of the notice, there was a numerous muster, when GEORGE CRAWSHAY, Esq., the President of the Gateshead Free-Trade Society, took the chair. This was shortly after eight o'clock in the evening. After some introductory remarks from the chairman,

Mr. BRIGHT rose, amidst loud cheers, and delivered an able address, in the course of which he discussed various important points having a bearing on the question of Free Trade: he concluded with a forcible appeal to the inhabitants of Gateshead to come forward on behalf of the League, and take the question as it were a question on which their own families and property depended—working at it zealously, constantly, and uncompromisingly, and proving that, whether as electors or in a more private way, everything that the borough of Gateshead said or did should be in favour of that cause, and tend to the unshackling of those interests upon which the prosperity of the country depended. (Mr. Bright resumed his seat amidst general and loud applause.)

Mr. BLAGBURN then proposed a vote of thanks to the hon. member for Durham. He said he could number 24 broken farmers of his own acquaintance; and, if the Corn Law were framed for their protection, it had proved a most miserable failure.

Mr. WINDHART seconded the motion, which was carried by acclamation.

Mr. BRIGHT acknowledged the compliment. Thanks were voted to the trustees for the use of the chapel.

Mr. BRIGHT then moved the thanks of the meeting to the chairman, who, he said, first began his subscription to the League Fund when a student at Cambridge—a much less genial soil for the nourishment of Free-Trade principles than Gateshead, in whatever other respect it might be superior. He congratulated the borough and the district on the accession of a gentleman of Mr. Crawshaw's ability and influence; and thanked him especially for his services in that great cause.

The CHAIRMAN returned thanks; and announced that it was intended to form a central committee in Newcastle, by means of which to agitate the whole district.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

Brighton, Jan. 23.

MY DEAR SIR,—I was in hopes of being able to send you a report of the meeting of the monopolists, held in Brighton to-day; but the paper will not be published till to-morrow.

There has been both a meeting and dinner. The meeting was held at twelve o'clock, at the Town-hall; the dinner at two, at the Old Ship. Tickets, 5s. each for members, not transferable, could be obtained only at the Society's offices. No one was allowed to attend the meeting except those who had dinner tickets; but the reporters for the press who had dinner tickets were not allowed to attend the meeting: only one was present, that of their Brighton organ, and he was forbidden to take notes. The plan evidently was that, in case of any complaint being made, it would most probably be at the meeting when no reporter was present.

Early this morning, I sent a person with a packet of pamphlets, sent me by the League, to a public-house where the farmers usually resort when visiting Brighton, so that most of them had a tract early; and afterwards a man was placed at the door and gave one to every one attending. Both the Duke of Richmond and Norfolk attended (the latter duke was behind his time), and on his Grace of Richmond having one of Mr. Cobden's speeches handed to him, he refused to accept it, and was politely told that, as a wholesale dealer in fish and corn, it was supposed he would feel much interested. I had some of the Struggle, and one representing the duke as a fishmonger was given to Colonel Wyndham, who was much pleased with it. Of all the miserable bore-and-corner meetings, this was the most contemptible, for hardly a dozen people in Brighton knew when and where the meeting was to be held, and the fear shown, and care taken prevented any person like myself being present: the person who distributed the bills declares there were not 250 persons present. Since writing this, our friend who reports for the —, has come in, and he tells me he attended the dinner; that a printed list of toasts were placed in every plate, and both Sir Robert Peel's name and her Majesty's Ministers were pointedly excluded—that hardly any allusions were made to them; that abuse of the League was the staple commodity. A Mr. Denman proposed the health of the labourers, and called on the company to drink it in a bumper; on which Mr. Wood, who employs more labourers than the Duke of Richmond, said it ought to be in water—that was the only beverage the labourers could get. Hereupon the Duke of Richmond got up in a rage, and declared "that no man was out of employment except through his own misconduct, and that in his part of the country he considered them well remunerated for their labour." He alluded to these pamphlets being distributed; and in allusion to himself being represented as a fishmonger, wished his friends to cut off the rubbish attached to the picture, and preserve that. Our friend says, that after the Duke had left the chair, seven o'clock, the whole company separated en masse; that several of the farmers complained that when a man like Mr. Wood made his observations about the labourers, which were true, he was immediately put down, and were compelled to attend, and they left the place more like persons who had attended a dry, uninteresting meeting than a convivial party.

As the tracts, &c., were sent to me, and I knew you would feel an interest in this, I thought I ought to send an account of my stewardship. Excuse this, as I have hardly time to save the post.

Yours, very truly,

MORE ADVANCES IN WAGES.—The miners in the employ of Messrs. Lloyd, Foster, and Co., the extensive coal and iron masters, of Wednesbury, have received an advance in their wages, the thin coal men to the amount of 3d. per day, and the thick coal men 6d. a day. The iron trade is in a most flourishing condition, and it is most gratifying to find the men partaking of the prosperity which prevails throughout the district.—Hirmingham Journal.

FREE-TRADE LECTURES.—A lecture on the Corn and Provision Laws was delivered by Mr. Falvey, from the Anti-Corn-Law League, in the Crown Inn Assembly-room, Gosport, on Thursday evening the 16th inst. The meeting was highly influential, both as to numbers and respectability. Samuel Bayliff, Esq., was, on the motion of Mr. Adams, seconded by the Rev. Mr. Silley, unanimously called to the chair. At the close of Mr. Falvey's address, a Chartist from Landport offered some opposition, but got so far wide of the question that the audience became tired, and refused to listen to what the chairman very properly termed "nonsense." Votes of thanks were proposed to the chairman and lecturer, and carried with three times three cheers. It is expected Mr. Falvey will soon deliver a second lecture in Gosport.—An eloquent address in favour of the principle advocated by the Anti-Corn-Law League, was delivered on Friday evening, at the Honorary Society's Hall, by Mr. Falvey.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XVII.

TO ONE OF THE FIVE HUNDRED LABOURERS PARADED LATELY AT STOWE.

So you took the five shillings and the dinner, to do duty on the lawn at Stowe, and show her Majesty the semblance of "a bold peasantry, our country's pride." You are a fine outline of a fellow; the smock-frock, whole and clean for the occasion, and the green riband round your hat, became you well; and you, no doubt, shouted as lustily as any other of the hired company. You have earned your money, and had your pay. And, now, is there sense enough in you to ask your conscience whether the bargain was an honest one?

The question affects not your loyalty. Do not get rid of it by pretending to swell out an imputation on that. Probably you would, as certainly you could, have shouted "God save the Queen" as lustily without the pay. You might have gone to see her Majesty, and worn your best garments, whatever they may be, to show your respect. That, too, could have been accomplished without being hired for the purpose. Nobody waits for a bounty, to bless the Queen. She reigns over many hearts in which her predecessors had rendered homage to royalty a rare thing. Unbought greetings strew her path like flowers, and spontaneous acclamations fill the air as if they were a portion of the element. When she appears, the expression of discontent, or even (unless in respect) the maintenance of silence, is scarcely conceivable: and the purchase of popularity is as unnecessary as it is extraordinary.

Well, then; being as loyal as any proud peer or ragged rascal in your county, or the kingdom, why should you have objected to the clean frock and green ribands, the dinner or the crown, for doing precisely that which you would have done of yourself? Hodge, I will tell you. What you did was not precisely that which you would or could have done of yourself. That would have been a true thing, and this was untrue. No smarter smock-frock than your own would have covered your torn coat or your no coat. You could not have afforded the ribands on your hat, no not to hide its holes. You would have looked Buckinghamshire, and not Arcadian. You would have been a ploughman, and not a player. And you would not have deceived the royal mind by a false exhibition of the labouring classes of your neighbourhood. There is the difference, and it is a great one. You have helped to impose on her Majesty, and leave a delusive impression on her memory. The whole five hundred of you have acted a falsehood. By appearances and action, though not in words, you are all accomplices; and, in the face of high Heaven, you have told your Queen a LIE.

"On the estates of his Grace the Duke of Buckingham, and through the many parishes where he is paramount, we, the farm-labourers, are well to do: thriving, clothed, fed, and happy. We are free of his lawn as he is of our love. We rally around him as his retainers. Our green ribands are bound in gratitude for his blue one. He is the first of farmers' friends, and of ploughmen's patrons. The Queen shall long remember him, as a princely host, and us, as the merry multitude of his men."

That is what the five hundred told her Majesty, in the language of appearances most unmistakable. Is it true? Is it within miles of the truth? If so, Buckinghamshire is much beheld. People say that you, labourers, are most of you in rags; that you don't know the taste of butcher's meat from year's end to year's end; that your gaols are half filled with pouchers; that you are packed off anywhere to seek for work and wages; and that you get 8s. a week to keep yourselves and your wives and families. The Queen will never believe it. Her own eyes have seen to the contrary. You have forfeited your right to talk of distress. She knows what a set of trim fellows and jolly dogs you are—nothing like the wretched factory folks of whom some farmers' friends have told her Majesty. You will always occur to her memory as a demonstration that the Duke of Buckingham's estates are manned by most prosperous ploughmen, ribanded reapers, dandy diggers, and thriving threshers: altogether a sort of pastoral paradise.

But, you say, it was only to welcome a gracious Queen; and the Duke's gardener or gamekeeper tempted you; and who could resist the crown and dinner? You would, if you had been a MAN, and not a down-trodden scurf. You would have shown your own loyalty, in your own way, and not become the varnish for his vanity. The more gracious her Majesty is, the more ungracious are you to sell yourself for her deception. She would have smiled on your careworn wives and dirty children. She would have bent to the hurrahs of the ragged; and the memory of the sad reality would have sunk into her soul. There would have been pity for your poverty, as well as pleasure in your praises. You made a dear bargain with the Duke. You became traitors to yourselves, your families, and your class; and all for five pieces of silver. Judas got thirty from a priest; and you had only to deal with a duke. Have you any hope that, now the job is done, he will better the bidding; or give any more of you a guinea to go away to Manchester?

Is this your first offence? Have none of you taken money before, to bellow at meetings or bully at elections? Some of you are said to have served against the League. It is not unlikely. The falsehood and the bribe are both of the same sort as the present. And who is to pity you, if you take pay to tell the world how well off you are? Your conduct tends to vilify the farm-labourers all over the country. Judged by you, they can only be reckoned a set of most unreasonable rogues. The scamps, to let their wives go without bonnets, when they can afford to riband their own hats. You brand their complaints as causeless, and their deeds of desperation as most detestable. Mr. Dickens has sought to inspire the world with sympathy for the poacher under his oppressions; and with compassion even for the guilty madness of the incendiary. But, were there any truth in your exhibition of the labourers' condition, such wanton crime would mark the culprits as mere wild beasts, deserving only of extermination. You should be beaten together for a battue, and humanity would scarcely condemn the butchery of such brutality. Down on your knees and bless Heaven that you are not believed. Only have a little manhood in you another time, whoever may be the tempter; and find some means of retrieving your fault and folly.

The labourers in Northamptonshire have been signing parish petitions for agricultural protection; you may be ordered, perhaps have been, to do the like. All right, provided that you really have too much meat, and are in danger from over-eating. That is the case with the Northamptonshire labourers; or else they have made as big fools of themselves as you have. Sir Charles Knightley distinctly explained this matter, last Wednesday, at the association dinner. He complained that, two years ago, "meat was about 6d. per lb., and it was now reduced to 4½d." That is the grievance against which your Northamptonshire brethren have petitioned. Of course you suffer from it also. Then he foresees a danger. "They would soon find that meat could and would be brought from abroad as fresh and as good as it could be had in Herefordshire." Against that peril the peasantry are united to help their masters. "Then there was another measure, allowing salt provisions to be imported." You perceive what an injury it would be to you for salt meat to be more plentiful and cheaper, hey? Petition against that too; will you not? Sir Charles Knightley's fears and troubles are endless. "For his own part, he did not see in what way it would be possible to prevent this market from being glutted with foreign meat." O horrible, you hungry dogs! Think of the misery of being "glutted with foreign meat." Shout against that, at the Duke's bidding. Petition against that, at the Duke's bidding. It would affect his pocket a little, and your stomachs a good deal. He is at the head of all these societies against more meat and more bread. He is their head; and you are their tail, whenever you do anything so dirty as to take pay, or obey orders, for a falsification of your own condition.

Did you ever see tall chimneys? Tramp into Lancashire and take a look at them. They rise as high as church spires; and they take no tithe. In their neighbourhood, the farm-labourer is always better off. He lives in the atmosphere of trade. So would you, were the Corn Laws repealed. It is a healthier air than that of monopoly. There would, under the impulse of Free Trade, be more demand for corn; people would eat more; the farmers would want you, and you would thereby get more to eat. There would also, under Free Trade, be a livelier spirit of competition and improvement among the farmers; that, again, would make them want you, and give you better wages. You would eat meat dinners, though the Queen was not coming to Stowe. And should she drive your way, your wives would take care of your clean smock-frocks and green ribands to meet her with; nor would her fine car fail to detect the difference of your hearty from your hired hurrahs. Poverty is kept out of sight, in these royal progressers. The more's the pity, while there is so much of it in the land. Yet better for it to keep away altogether, than to come masked and bedizened into the royal presence, and, for the bribe of bread-taxers, perform the disgraceful mummery of well-fed jollification.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

HAND-LOOM WEAVERS.—We are glad to learn that, within the last fortnight, the Carlisle manufacturers have advanced the weavers' wages fully nine per cent., making a total advance of 20 per cent. since the spring of 1844.—Manchester Guardian.

We are glad to learn that the gingham weavers in Whitehaven, in the employ of Messrs. Chambers and Co., of Carlisle, have lately had an advance in their wages of one penny per head, which will amount to from 6d. to 9d. per week to ordinary workmen, and perhaps to 1s. per week to the quickest hands in their employment.—Chesham and Piquet.

THE COUNTY QUALIFICATION.

ROCHDALE, Jan. 23.—A correspondent writes—"Between sixty and seventy gentlemen have just paid their money for qualifications in South Lancashire; after securing their deeds, a sumptuous supper was provided by Mr. Holland, Roebuck Inn. There being four streets to the property, it was unanimously agreed that they be called Bright, Cobden, League, and Crawford streets. We shall secure 150 new qualifications for this district for South Lancashire."

LEICESTER.—The committee for South Leicestershire are actively engaged in carrying out Mr. Cobden's plan; and their having an office regularly open, and an agent in attendance with all requisite information, is of great service to the cause.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, Jan. 20.—Before the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, Mr. Justice MAULE, Mr. Justice CRESSWELL, and Mr. Justice ERLE.

BOROUGH OF NORTHAMPTON.

Jeffery, appellant; Kitchener, respondent.

The facts of this case are these:—William Kitchener, the respondent, had been an inhabitant householder of the borough of Northampton, and at the time of the passing of the Reform Act was entitled to vote as such in the election of members of Parliament for that borough. Before the Reform Act passed, every person who had been an inhabitant householder within the borough of Northampton, for six calendar months next before the day of election, and who had not received parochial relief or other alms for the space of twelve months then next, was entitled to vote at such election. The respondent, in October, 1832, ceased to be an inhabitant householder of Northampton, and went with his family to Bedford, where he resided fourteen weeks; after which he again came back to Northampton and resided there as an occupier, which he had continued to do up to the time of the revision. He had in every year since the passing of the Reform Act been an inhabitant householder duly qualified, according to the usages and customs of the borough, on the last day of July in each year. The revising barrister thought the respondent came within the saving of the 33rd section of the statute 2 Wm. IV., c. 45, and disallowed the objection; he being of opinion that, inasmuch as the respondent's absence from Northampton occurred during a period which was not necessary to qualify him as an inhabitant householder, he was entitled to retain his reserved right of voting.

Mr. HUMPHREY was for the appellant, and Mr. WADSWORTH for the respondent.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in giving judgment, said:—It is impossible to read the 33rd section of the Reform Act without perceiving that the intention of the Legislature was that, after the passing of that act, there should be but one right of voting in respect of cities and boroughs, namely, that which is commonly called the £10 householder qualification; but it was thought extremely hard, as it would have been, that persons who were in the possession of other rights of voting, in respect of other qualifications, should at once be deprived by those general and sweeping words, and, therefore, there is an exception or a proviso made, "that every person now having a right to vote in the election for any city or borough, by virtue of any other qualification than as a burgess or freeman, or as a freeman and liveryman, or, in the case of a city or town being a county of itself, as a freholder or burgage tenant, as hereinbefore mentioned, shall retain such right of voting, so long as he shall be qualified as an elector, according to the usages and customs of such city or borough, or any law now in force." And the qualification that is here stated on the part of the person whose name appears on the list, is that he was qualified to vote on the 7th of June, 1832, the day on which that act received the royal assent, as an inhabitant householder of the borough of Northampton; therefore, the proviso as to this right must be read and interpreted as if there had been a section in the act which said, "he shall retain the right of voting so long as he is an inhabitant householder of the borough." On the part of the claimant it is contended, that that is too stringent a mode of interpreting the clause, but, that it ought to be, "so long as he continues an inhabitant householder of the borough, or does acquire afterwards, though he ceases to be an inhabitant householder, a new right as an inhabitant householder of that borough." It seems to me, however, that that would be in effect giving not only the right he had at the time of the passing of the act, but the right of acquiring a new qualification in respect of a new residence. Suppose the Reform Act had never passed, and a person qualified to vote as an inhabitant householder had ceased to reside in the borough, as this person has done, and went and took up his residence in another place; no one can contend that if he came back again to the borough, and took a new house, and began fresh to be an inhabitant householder, it would be his old qualification. In the first place, the necessity of the residence there for six calendar months shows that it was not his old qualification; then, if it is not his old qualification, why, it must be a new qualification. And I cannot understand what object there can be gained by the court holding, that a man once an inhabitant householder should have the privilege through his life, not having been omitted from the list for two years, of acquiring a second qualification by again becoming an inhabitant householder. Why should he have the right to vote which was refused to every other subject in the kingdom? It seems to me that the question is simple enough, because the subsequent clauses of the act commence by saying, if any person applies to be put upon the register, such and such qualifications must be observed before his name is inserted on the list. These words are limited to the actual qualification existing at the time of the passing of the act. I therefore think that this person ought not to have been retained on this list.

The other judges were of the same opinion.—Decision reversed.

BOROUGH OF WESTBURY.

Dyer, appellant; Gough, respondent.

John Dyer, the appellant, claimed in respect of property situate in the parish of Westbury. An objection was taken to his being retained on the list, and the revising barrister expunged the name, subject to the opinion of the court on the following case:—

It appeared that at the time of making out the list of voters, the appellant was a person employed in collecting the duties on windows, and that he was appointed such collector by the commissioners for executing the acts of Parliament relating to duties of assessed taxes. It was admitted that the two commissioners making the appointment were also commissioners of the land-tax. The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the appellant came under the words of the disqualifying section 22nd Geo. III., c. 41.

Mr. Serjeant SHEP was for the appellant, and Mr. COCKBURN, Q.C., for the respondent.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in giving judgment, said:—This question arises on 22nd Geo. III., c. 41; and, if the first section of that statute had been the only section in the act, there could be no doubt but that the appellant would have been disqualified, because he would have been a person employed as collector of window duties, and that is one of the disqualified persons mentioned in the first section; but then comes the second section, which appears to me to be an exception, and which takes certain persons out of the range of the disqualifying provisions of the first section. The question, therefore, is whether this person falls within that exception; it appears to me that he does, because, after the very general words used in the first section, the second section says, that nothing in the act contained shall be construed to extend to any person by reason of his being a commissioner of land-tax, or acting under their appointment;—I pause here for a moment, and if it had rested here the proper construction would have been that he is not exempt from the general terms of the first section, unless employed by the land-tax commissioners, but it goes on to say,—"for the purpose of assessing, levying, or managing the land-tax, or other rates or duties already granted or imposed, or which shall be hereafter granted or imposed by authority of Parliament." Then, looking to the acts that have imposed other duties upon the commissioners of land-tax, one of which duties is the collecting and raising the assessed taxes, by the 23rd Geo. III., c. 99, coupled with subsequent acts; it appears, therefore, to me that the appointment of Dyer being under the hands and seals of two of the commissioners of land-tax, although it was an appointment for the purpose of raising duties that are of a different nature from those which the land-tax commissioners originally had, yet, as it is for the purpose of raising those duties which are cast upon the commissioners of land-tax, the disqualification never was intended to extend to the appellant. If the court decided otherwise, it appears to me we should be putting a constrained construction upon the act in order to disqualify a vote, which ought never to be done.

The other judges were of the same opinion.—Decision reversed.

CITY OF LONDON.—Thursday, January 23.—Before the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, Mr. Justice CRESSWELL, and Mr. Justice ERLE.

Wansey, appellant; Perkins, respondent.

Richard Loakey was objected to as not being entitled to vote; the revising barrister disallowed the claim, subject to the opinion of the court on the following case:—

On the 26th of July, 1837, Richard Loakey was occupier of a warehouse, No. 8, Wood-street, City, as tenant; and on or about that day claimed to be rated in respect of those premises, there being then a rate for the time being in the said parish; but there not being any rate due in respect of such premises, the overseers neglected to put the name of the claimant on the rate for the time being. Other rates were subsequently made in the said parish between the said 26th day of July, 1837, and the 31st day of July, 1843. And between the 31st of July, 1843, and 31st of July, 1844, four rates were made. The claimant occupied the premises from the 26th of July, 1837, to the 31st of July, 1844 inclusive; but he was not rated in respect of such premises after the 26th of July, 1837, and he did not make any claim to be rated after that date.

On behalf of the claimant, it was contended that inasmuch as the overseers had neglected to put his name on the rate for the time being, when he so claimed to be rated, and as he was by part of the 30th section of the Reform Act to be deemed to have been rated in respect of the premises from the period at which the rate had been made in respect of which he had so claimed to be rated, that he was to be deemed to be rated to the future poor-rates so long as he continued in the occupation of the premises.

Mr. HILL, Q.C., having addressed the court on behalf of the appellant,

The COURT (without calling upon Mr. Humphreys, who was counsel for the respondent), decided that the claimant should have sent in a claim to be rated on each rate that was made; so that, if twelve rates were made during the year, he must claim to be rated on each of those rates, or any of them his name was omitted from. They thought there was nothing in the objection, and the decision of the revising barrister must therefore be affirmed with costs.—Decision affirmed.

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST.

Wansey, appellant; Perkins, respondent.

James Hill claimed to have his name inserted in the list of persons entitled to vote for the city of London. His qualification was stated to be in respect of "three rooms, 16, Budge-row." The claimant occupied the whole of the second floor, which consisted of three rooms, which were in his exclusive occupation, and were occupied by him as a dwelling-house and printing-office. The claimant occupied the rooms in question as tenant to one Knight, who occupied the shop and first floor, and who resided therein. The outer or street door of the house was kept closed, and Knight had the key thereof, as had also the claimant.—The revising barrister rejected the claim.

Mr. HILL, Q.C., appeared for the appellant; and Mr. HUMPHREYS for the respondent.

The COURT said, that the case had been decided twice before during this term. This did not appear to the court to be a separate house or tenement within the meaning of the act. The claimant was only a lodger in the house, and the proper person to be on the list would be the landlord.—The decision must therefore be affirmed.

CITY OF BRISTOL.

Daniel, appellant; Condliffe, respondent.

The claimant in this case was described on the list as claiming for a "house." It was objected that the description was bad, inasmuch as the building was used only for a warehouse, that the claim should have been "warehouse."—The revising barrister allowed the claim.

The COURT, in giving judgment, thought that the qualification in the list of voters was sufficient. The question was whether the building stated in this case did or did not constitute a house, within the meaning of the act of Parliament: it having walls, rooms, chimneys, and all the requisites of a dwelling-house. The words of the act were "house, warehouse, outhouse, shop, or other building;" there was no necessity that the party should dwell in the house, or that the house itself should be a dwelling-house. The case found that it was in fact a dwelling-house, but was used as a warehouse. The act merely required that the party claiming to vote should be the occupier. The decision of the revising barrister must, therefore, be affirmed with costs, as the point was so clear.

Decision affirmed.

REVIEW.

The Life of Sir Thomas Gresham (Knight's Weekly Volume, No. 28). London, Charles Knight.

This is an admirable piece of biography, and one which must obtain a permanent place in our literature. The Greshams were the Barings of Elizabeth's days, and, like their modern parallels, they were as much behind in the science of trade as they were advanced in its practice. Under the Tudors merchants held high rank as diplomatists, but the exercise of political trickery was not favourable to the development of commercial intelligence. Sir Thomas Gresham changed his creed to all the fluctuating fancies that Henry VIII. propounded as articles of faith. At the accession of Edward VI. he became a sound Protestant and the possessor of forfeited monastic lands; when Mary succeeded he went back to the Church of Rome, but contrived to keep his Protestant lands; and finally, when Elizabeth was settled on the throne and in her creed, he became a zealous Anglican, equally opposed to Romanism and Puritanism. He was as loose in his commercial principles as in his religious faith; he recommended restrictions and monopolies, while he was himself a free-trading smuggler of the first head; and, though his prosperity depended on commerce, he was as great a recreant to his order as the supporters of monopoly in Manchester:—

"In all times nothing could be further from our royal agent's mind than the great laissez faire doctrine: on the contrary, his doctrine was faite pour. He writes to Cecil—"If you will enter upon this matter, you must in no wise relent by no persuasion of the merchants: whereby you may keep them in fear and in good order; for otherwise, if they get the bridle, you shall never rule them. . . . As the merchants be one of the best members in our commonwealth, so they be the very worst if their doings be not looked into in time, and themselves forced to keep good order."

Like all who cease to respect their order, Gresham was badly treated by the different classes which he was anxious to conciliate. Cecil treated him with great indignity on many occasions, and, what he deemed a still greater grievance, the Queen stinted him in his pay:—

"The great Elizabeth was given to little savings, and at present she was sadly straitened for money. The total of such reductions must have amounted to a very insignificant sum, but it appears that she diminished the diet or daily pay of many of her servants. She certainly reduced that of Gresham. Perhaps she thought that a man who had so many estates in Norfolk, and who was building for himself a sumptuous palace in the city of London, could very well bear some diminution to his twenty shillings per diem; and perhaps she also thought that, as he could not succeed in borrowing such large sums for her as he had done in more peaceful and prosperous times, his allowance ought to be less than it had been. But the rich Sir Thomas did not enter into either of these views of his case, and he set up a loud lamentation about his twenty shillings. He enumerated to Cecil all the services he had rendered to the King her Majesty's father, to the King her brother, to the late Queen her sister, and to herself: he afterwards affirmed that he had done money business for Elizabeth alone to the amount of eight hundred and thirty thousand pounds, that he had saved her much cash, and had hitherto always accomplished her Majesty's commandments and instructions in all points to her Majesty's great honour and credit throughout all Christendom: he put in his broken leg, as a soldier does his wounds, and he said that he was become lame and was now waxing old! He also recalled the promises which the Queen had made to him at Hatfield, when she told him that she would do as much for him as had been done by Edward VI. and Queen Mary together. He declared that his expenses, when abroad, exceeded four times twenty shillings a day; but he said nothing of his numerous commissions and profits, or of the large allowances paid him for house-rent, posting, &c. &c. It is evident that he was very fond of money, and that his 'poor wife' was fonder of money than he was himself, and could not brook any diminution, however small, of the income."

We wish not to dwell further on the career of a man who atoned in a subsequent part of his life for the injury his example and influence had wrought on the mercantile character. But we commend the perusal of this cheap little work to our mercantile young men: it will teach them that they can only become respectable by "being themselves," not by imitating others. It shows that in their order they can be great, but that out of their order they must be little, and that self-respect is absolutely requisite for obtaining the respect of others.

MENTAL FREEDOM.—No human power can force the impenetrable intrenchments of the freedom of the mind; compulsion never persuades, it only makes hypocrites.—Hansen.

THE SPORT OF DEATH.

WHAT ROYALTY DID, AND DID NOT SEE, AT STOWE.

Happening the other day to say to a landed proprietor of Buckinghamshire, "What is the Duke of Buckingham about?" we received this remarkable response, "Why, Sir, he is selling outlying property, buying up everything he can in Buckinghamshire, and creating a desert around him." It was only in September last that the newspapers were for several days filled with details of the "festivities at Stowe," on the occasion of the Duke of Buckingham's son, the Marquis of Chandos, coming of age; and the readers were either amused by the pompous silliness of the Duke's mimic feudalism, or disgusted by the revival amongst the peasantry of the brutalizing sports of a barbarous age. And foolish as this attempted revival of obsolete practices—obsolete because the world's intelligence has outgrown them—appeared in the one instance, and detestable as it was in the other, it was perhaps not altogether inappropriate to the occasion. Now, that occasion was the perpetuation of landlordism for another generation, in the waste created by the Dukes of Buckingham. A short explanation will make this plain. It is a rule of law that landed property cannot be settled, that is rendered inalienable, for any longer period than during the lives of persons in existence at the time of the settlement and twenty-one years afterwards. For instance, if a settlement is made on the occasion of a marriage, and the property is settled on the first unborn son,—as is the case in all great landed families,—the parents taking only life interests, no disposition of the property can be made until there is a son of the marriage, of the age of twenty-one. Now, the Duke's estates were resettled by his father and himself before or upon his marriage, and consequently, until the present Marquis of Chandos became of age, there could be no dealing with the capital of the family property. But the Duke was notoriously and deeply indebted, and in all probability—for beyond local reputation we have no knowledge of the fact—the occasion of the son's majority was embroiled to charge the father's debts on the estate, to give the son, as a sop, a present increased allowance, and to resettle the estate; so that until the present Marquis of Chandos shall have a son twenty-one years old nothing more can be done with the capital of the estate. No doubt that a large surplus income remains after payment of interest upon all encumbrances; but, whether that surplus be £6 or £60,000 a year, a family thus situated must be poor, and unable to improve the family estates by draining, and other expensive outlays in permanent improvements. Thus, unless they grant long and rational leases to enterprising farmers, the Buckingham property must remain for another generation a half-cultivated nursery for paupers; and a desire to retain influence over the votes of their tenantry will prevent the grant of leases by the Dukes of Buckingham.

Thus it is that the encumbered aristocracy of England, dog-in-the-manger-like, hold property they cannot properly manage or enjoy, and continue from generation to generation a sort of wilderness around them.

The Queen's visit to Stowe has again brought the Duke of Buckingham and his domains before the public. It is not within our province, and it is far from our wish, to say a word in disparagement of the Duke's efforts to do honour to her Majesty and her court, or to criticise the gorgeous hospitality of Stowe; but there is one portion of the amusement offered to royalty which it is impossible to pass unnoticed. We allude to the battue reserved for Prince Albert and his party; which is thus described in the Times newspaper:—

"At about half-past ten the Prince, accompanied by the Duke of Buckingham, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Jersey, the Marquis of Chandos, Lord Orkney, Colonel Bouverie, Captain Carrington, Lord Delawar, and Mr. Anson, repaired to a battue which took place at Guernsey-hill and Paper-mill Spinney preserves, near the mansion, which had been rigidly kept this season for the amusement of his Royal Highness, should he, as was fully expected, honour Stowe with his presence. Hunters to the number of about fifty, under the command of an experienced hand, were made to enter at the extreme end of a thick cover, while the shooting party were stationed in positions from which the game might most conveniently be destroyed, as they were driven forth into the open space of the park. Out-seconds were appointed to drive back the hares which issued forth before the sportsmen took up their positions. So plentiful was the game, that abundant opportunities for displaying his skill were afforded to every gentleman of the party. Immediately that the beaters received the word of command they marched forward, keeping in close together, side by side, that their sticks might have touched. A regular 'running fire' instantly commenced upon the devoted hares. Out they rushed from every quarter—so many that it was often impossible to 'stop' more than one out of half a dozen. The ground immediately in front of the shooters became strewn with dead and dying; within a semicircle of about sixty yards from his Royal Highness, the havoc was evidently greatest. The gun was no sooner to his shoulder than the animal was dead. In other cases, wounded hares vainly endeavoured to limp away, but every precaution had been made to avoid the infliction of prolonged torture. Keepers were in readiness to follow up and kill such as were maimed.

"It was curious to behold the evident reluctance with which the hares left their retreat, and then their perplexity at finding themselves so bereft without. Many actually made for the canal, and swam like dogs across a piece of water nigh one hundred yards wide, shaking themselves upon landing, and making off without any apparent distress. The pheasants were still more averse to 'come and be killed.' For some time not one appeared above the trees. The cocks were heard crowing like domestic fowls, as their numerous tribe retreated before the sticks of the advancing army of beaters. Upon arriving, however, at the verge of the wood, quite a cloud ascended, and the slaughter was proportionately great. The total amount of game shot by the party was 200 hares, 100 pheasants, and 1 snipe. Prince Albert shot 114 hares, 29 pheasants, and the only snipe killed."

And all this, as is stated in another part of the paper, occurred in two hours. How such wholesale butchery can be deemed sport, we cannot imagine. The nearest poultry-yard would any day afford as good. With that, however, the public would have nothing to do, did not this vast "head of game" inflict countless evils on the community. Let the farmers on whose substance these hares and pheasants have been fed venture to speak out, and they would declare that, though this death-doing may be sport to the mighty of the land, the keeping up the game is pain, misery, and loss, ay, and too often ruin, to the tenant-farmers.

In two short hours, and out of two small woods, TWO HUNDRED HARES were killed; and the report states, "it was impossible to stop more than one out of half a dozen." Here, then, on one corner of the Duke's estate, we find TWELVE HUNDRED HARES fed at the expense of the Duke's tenants for their landlord's gratification and profit. We know not whether such truths as these ever penetrate into the palace, but, if they do, we would ask her Majesty and Prince Albert to reflect upon the extent to which the vermin kept for this two hours' sport (!) had desolated the crops, blighted the hopes, and rendered nugatory all the industrious efforts of the tenant-farmers at Stowe. And we would remind them of a recorded fact, that one-third of the criminals confined in the Bucks county gaol have been committed for poaching; and, further, that one whole wing of the new prison is required expressly to punish those of the starving peasantry—wages are 7s. a week in Buckinghamshire—who are tempted to poach on the overflowing preserves of the Duke of Buckingham and his fellow-game-preservers. Why did not the Duke show his wing of the county gaol to her Majesty? Why did he not enable Prince Albert—who is reported to be of a kindly disposition—to understand that the "infliction of prolonged torture" upon wounded hares was by far the least horrible of the "tortures" by which that fraction of a day's amusement was obtained? The halls, the gardens, the preserves at Stowe, are not fairly and fully exhibited unless the poachers' wing of the county gaol is shown at the same time. Nay, more: the latter is the reality of the spectacle. The mock feudalism, the "Bucks horse-artillery," the 500 labourers in "smock-frocks," and the tenants on horseback, form but tinsel and tawdry imitations of baronial times. The Duke's feudalism is real only in the dungeon. Until royalty has seen the poachers' cell, as well as the Stowe preserves, the true extent and effect of the social and political power of the Duke of Buckingham, and such has he, cannot be appreciated.

COMMON SENSE AT A RENT FEAST.

Every day brings proofs that the bolder and more intelligent landlords have come to the conclusion that the restrictive system is no longer tenable, and are placing themselves at the head of their tenants in opposition to the Corn Laws. This is their natural position. Every landowner, not inextricably mortgaged, must feel that the existing relations of landlord and tenant are most unsatisfactory, such as it is not the interest of either party should be continued, and, therefore, he will be glad to hasten the removal of that incubus on agriculture, the Corn Law, which effectually prevents either landlord or tenant coming to an equitable adjustment. This is forcibly illustrated by a very sensible speech made by Captain Pechell, M.P., to his tenants at his recent audit. He commenced by regretting the little advantage they had derived from their business during the past year; "when he considered the zeal, the perseverance, and exertions" they had exercised in that business, "he could not be wrong in attributing the present depressed state of agriculture to some other cause than want of intelligence or application on their parts. Some great cause must be in operation which thwarted all their exertions." He said:—

"It was acknowledged at all agricultural meetings that distress was more or less to be found in the farming interest. That was admitted even by those who were called the farmers' friends. But at none of those meetings had it been shown or attempted to be shown what was the cause of that distress."

They would recollect the formation of "protection" societies to oppose the League:—

"The farmers were called upon at that time to subscribe their money, and they were led to believe that all their distresses were occasioned by the agitation of that powerful association [the League], and they were told that, if they would join heart and hand, and subscribe to the Protection Association funds, prosperity would be sure to return to them. He now asked them whether any advantage had resulted from that counter association, whether it had been the means of procuring them more steady prices, whether it had procured for them any reduction of their rents? If this could not be shown, then he did say that the farmers who had been persuaded to join the Protection Society had been completely led away by the most delusive hopes and expectations. [Mr. Oliver: We are in a worse position now than we were then.] He (Captain Pechell) should be glad to hear from any person who had joined the Protection Association what benefit had been derived from it."

Let every farmer apply Captain Pechell's question to himself and his own case, and he will be satisfied that the Pro-Corn Law agitation of last year was only a part of a series of delusions got up by the monopolist landowners to prevent the tenants from examining the existing management of landed property. Captain Pechell said he felt that it was proper he should explain some of the real causes of the depression, which the "farmers' friends" had failed to account for or remove:—

"It was of no use attempting to disguise the facts which must sooner or later present themselves. The first and principal cause of which the farmers had to complain was undoubtedly the operation of the Corn Laws; and, as that was a very wide question to enter upon at the present moment, he would merely ask them whether the Corn Law had or had not been beneficial to them? He also considered among the grievances of which they had to complain was the competition for the occupation of land. (Hear, hear.) And again he considered that the rental of land, the tithe rent-charge, and taxes, also required consideration. The unfavourable nature of the seasons had contributed very much to their distress; but that was beyond their control. These were the four principal subjects which he would venture to touch upon, because they were points which had been entirely overlooked, with one exception, at the agricultural meetings."

Oh no! nothing but the seasons is ever mentioned at agricultural meetings to account for agricultural distress: all the rest is political, and therefore forbidden! How long will farmers be so gulled?

He said:—

"The time when they were in the most flourishing condition was when they were not hampered by the Corn Laws. Under those laws prices had fluctuated from 112s. to 36s. a quarter. In 1822 the price of wheat was 42s., though the Corn Law promised 80s. In 1834 it was 36s., though the Corn Law promised 70s. At the last change, in 1842, Sir Robert Peel promised them 56s., and he would leave it to them to tell Sir R. Peel, through their representatives, the difference between the sum he promised them and the price they received for their wheat. (Cheers.) Thus he had shown them that, under the operation of the Corn Law, prices had been of a most fluctuating character, and their business had not been successful. They would naturally say, 'Let us have an amendment—let us have anything which will make prices steady, and we shall then know how to manage our capital.'"

The Corn Laws induced competition injurious to men of capital by bringing needy persons into the market as candidates for farms:—

"This competition for land was a serious evil; it gave an advantage to the landlord, because in some cases it enabled him to do that in a summary manner which, without that competition, he might not think it prudent to do. A landlord might have a prejudice, either political or otherwise, and give a tenant notice to quit, when, perhaps, if there were no such competition, he would be slow in untenancing his farm."

Besides, rents generally are too high:—

"He now came to what all in that room, no doubt, considered a most important point. It was notorious that a great part of the land in England was let at a rental far above what the present prices warranted. Under these circumstances there could be but one opinion—that rent must be paid out of capital."

The tithe system, also, operated hardly against the tenant-farmers:—

"They were now paying after the rate of £15 or £16 a load, when they were only receiving £10; while at the same time all the rates and all the taxes remained undiminished. He thought that an equalisation of rent must take place, so as to make it bear its fair proportion to the price of produce; as well as an alteration in the present mode of averaging the tithe-rent charge. It was ever intended by those who passed the Commutation Act that tithes should remain a plague to the occupiers of the land; and he had no doubt the farmers' friends even would join them in a question which would, perhaps, relieve payments."

As to remedies, Captain Pechell observed:—

"There were many schemes which had been adopted to encourage the farmers, which he considered merely as auxiliaries to improvement. He supported the Cattle Show and Agricultural Association at Arundel because he thought it was a means of bringing persons together, and so long as they had the security of such a president as the Duke of Norfolk, who was totally free from all interested and political motives, it was well to give countenance to such associations. But he quite changed his opinion when a different practice was observed, because it was possible that cunning persons might contrive, whilst bamboozling the farmers and talking about themselves and their families, to advance and further their own political purposes. At the agricultural meetings the farmers were strongly recommended to use their exertions, and in some cases they were reproached for their want of intelligence or diligence in improving their land. Some of them might have drained their land, and their pockets too. (Hear, hear.)"

This is a very hard bit at that cunning intriguer the Duke of Richmond. Then as to the employment of labourers:—

"They would also remember that great sympathy was exhibited for the labourer, and the farmers were called upon to employ them. Now, he thought it most unwarrantable to interfere with the business of the farmer by requiring him to employ what was termed the surplus population of the parish. This was an interference exercised in no other trade, and it worked very oppressively in parishes where the landlord was not an occupier of land, and where he did not happen to reside. When such recommendations were made, it was only right to look to the quarter whence they originated. All parishes were not similarly circumstanced. In some localities the labourers were employed during the whole of the winter out of a fund subscribed for other purposes, whereby the landlords and the farmers were entirely relieved to the amount of those payments. It was very easy to be generous with other people's money, in recommending the farmers to employ the surplus population: which meant that they were to employ more labourers than they required. That was an interference which he thought ought to be discountenanced.

Every farmer will agree in this. Indeed, the advice of the squires on this subject has gone far to open the farmers' eyes. Why should farmers be dictated to as to the mode of managing their business?

"The prosperity of the manufacturer was solely to be attributed to the application of science; and why were the farmers to be prevented from having recourse to the same appliances, and to be discouraged from the employment of the same advantages?"

Of the present aspect of the protectionist cause he remarked:—

"He had noticed the absence of all information affecting their interests from what were called the farmers' friends; but to supply this deficiency he perceived by the county press in the interest of 'farmers' friends,' that instructions had been issued directing the tenants to attend a grand dinner at Brighton before the assembling of Parliament. He was glad they had selected that locality, as at any rate the public would be certain of being acquainted with the proceedings of the Protection Society. It was said that the voice of the British farmer should be forced on the attention of every member of Parliament in such a way as to fortify the opinion of the wavering and strengthen the hands of the acknowledged advocates of British protection. It was also said 'that the Protection Society had done much good, that it had opposed the Anti-Corn-Law League,' but that the full extent of its benefits had not been acknowledged, and would not—alluding, he supposed, to the failure of the subscription—unless a spirit of perfect union prevailed; and then the farmers' friends who made the present Ministry would be strong enough to unmake them, as they greatly encouraged the growth of Free-Trade principles." And, finally, it was ordered and declared (hear), that 'the farmers should not presume to join in the repeal of the malt-tax, as the example might serve other parties for the repeal of another law.' Now, they would observe there were some symptoms of a split. One portion were for the repeal of the malt-tax; and the other party, who had committed themselves to the Minister, and who got up the sham fight against the Canada corn bill and other measures, were not in a condition to throw any embarrassment in the way of the Government. Those who were deluded into the hope that they would improve their interests by subscribing to the protection fund were now discovering their mistake, and a dinner was now being got up in the hope that these differences might be adjusted; and he had no doubt that something would be done to stop those who were striving to repeal the malt-tax. Now, he advised them not to put their trust in any one to oppose the present Government who had received for themselves or families either place or honours from the members of that Government. They had experience of the way in which the votes in both Houses of Parliament had been given, and it behooved them to be careful in not entering too sanguine hopes of any opposition being made by the farmers' friends which would be injurious or fatal to the Government of Sir Robert Peel."

Probably the grossest case of political humbug ever attempted to be palmed on any body of men, is that attempted by such men as the Duke of Richmond—whose brother is a Lord of the Treasury.—Mr. William Miles, and men of that sort, when they pretend to oppose the Peel Government. Even the farmers don't now believe them to be in earnest.

Then, as to the alleged identity of interest between the landlord and tenant, Captain Pechell observed:—

"No man was more aware than he was of the importance of the connexion between landlord and tenant; but he did not concur with those who said that their interests were identical. It was very much the fashion to say that they were embarked in the same boat. It was very agreeable, no doubt, especially on a fine sunny day, to be embarked in the same boat as the tenant; BUT IT MIGHT SO HAPPEN THAT, WHILE THE TENANT MIGHT BE LABOURING AT THE OAR, THE LANDLORD MIGHT BE REPOSING VERY QUIETLY AT THE HELM. (Hear, hear.) Again, it was said, that, 'they must work or swim together;' but when the farmer had to meet his landlord, and he pointed out the improvements he had made, it was found that the interest of the landlord and tenant were very much opposed to each other. If he were asked his opinion as to the best mode of relieving the agricultural interest at the present moment, he would say that, whatever might be the price, let it be what it would—let there be no fluctuations as they had now, the operation of which was only to make the fortunes of the speculators and dealers in corn, to the injury of the low-growers, who were compelled to bring their produce to market at an adverse time. Nothing, in his opinion, could settle this question but such an alteration in the law as would let them alone; and he thought that, when prices had arrived at a degree of permanency, then there might be such an adjustment of rent as would bear a proper proportion to the price of corn."

This presupposes a total repeal of the Corn Laws. Nothing else can ever settle the question. We commend the speech of a landlord to his tenants, on the rent-day, to the serious attention of our agricultural readers.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Free-Trade Lodger."—"I have purchased a lot of freehold land, which cost me £42, and it has cost me £8 more to put a wall round it, which makes it £50; there is no dwelling. I wish you would inform me, through the LEAGUE, whether this will give me a county qualification."

[A plot of land of the yearly value of 40s. will confer a county qualification. It is unimportant what is paid for the land so that it be of sufficient annual value.]

"Two Free-Traders of Chatham, Kent."—"Myself and my brother having bought a piece of freehold ground on which we intend building a house, we wish to qualify ourselves for a county vote. We are in possession, and have a receipt to prove payment of the money on the 18th of this month. If the house is occupied by the 31st of July, can we qualify ourselves then for a county vote?"—Yes.

"Working Man, Warrington."—"We think his attorney correct; but, for the purpose of voting only, the deed does not appear necessary, although the title hereafter will always be imperfect for sale."

"C.P."—"I rent the first floor of a warehouse in the City, for £30 per annum, the landlord paying all rates and taxes. Can I claim to be inserted on the Parliamentary register?"

[If the landlord does not occupy the house as owner or tenant, you may claim to be rated for the rooms you occupy. If the staircase and street-door be common to all, and having paid the rates, &c., you will be entitled to be on the list of voters under the words of the statute, "other building."]

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

We have received communications from subscribers in almost all parts of the country, questioning the propriety of devoting so large a proportion as two pages of the LEAGUE newspaper to advertisements. We beg to inform our correspondents that the letters on this subject have been referred to the Council, and are now under consideration.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, January 25, 1845.

In another part of our paper will be found a very full report of the proceedings of the Council of the League at Manchester. In the morning the Council met for the despatch of business; there were present from all quarters of England the largest employers of labour in the kingdom, who have become members of the Council by paying subscriptions of £50 and upwards. It is unnecessary to dwell on their social importance as employers and encouragers of national industry; but it is obvious that such men would not have quitted their absorbing occupations to join in any movement which did not involve the gravest considerations of national prosperity. They not only have a large stake in the country, but they have besides a firm conviction that the profit and even the safety of their invested capital is contingent on good government. A landholder may run the risk of tumult and revolution, for his estates will survive the shock; but the manufacturer must be ruined by any serious interruption of public tranquillity, for his capital is virtually annihilated when it ceases to be worked. The names of these gentlemen sufficiently refute the absurd calumny which the Earl of Egmont uttered at the Brighton meeting of the Sussex Protection Society, on Thursday, when he declared, that "revolution and anarchy were at the bottom of the designs of the League." The members of our Council are more deeply interested in the prevention of anarchy than Lord Egmont, though none of their ancestors obtained peerages as a reward for political profligacy.

The financial report read by the Secretary will afford great satisfaction to all the friends of Free Trade. Though the multiplied operations of the past year necessarily involved a very heavy expenditure, there is still a large available balance in hand; and at the close of the meeting in the evening, Mr. John Brooks took an opportunity of declaring that when the present fund was exhausted there was more money where it came from, and offered personally to guarantee whatever may be necessary whenever required. The transactions of the past year were minutely detailed to the General Council, and after they had been maturely considered, votes of thanks were unanimously voted to the Manchester Council, and they were requested to undertake the superintendence of the movement during the ensuing year.

The Free-Trade Hall in the evening was full to overflowing. Numerous as have been the eloquent addresses delivered in that hall since first this national agitation commenced, that of Mr. E. Baines, jun., on Wednesday night, must be ranked among the very best for clearness of arrangement, force of argument, and brilliancy of diction. It must be gratifying to those who have taken a lead in this great cause, to find that they are training up worthy successors to continue the work which they have begun; and that, as in the classic races of ancient Greece, honourable aspirants are ready to receive from their hands the torch of truth when their time comes for quitting the course.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—Admiral Dupetit Thouars has declined to receive the sword of "honour" subscribed for by the French republicans, to mark their approval of his doings at Tahiti. The amount subscribed to purchase the sword was nearly 20,000 francs, and the number of contributors 175,000. It is supposed that the admiral's motive in refusing to accept of the intended sword was the fear of offending the Government.

IMPRISONMENT.—The Cours Royale of Paris have resolved that the maximum of time during which prisoners should be subjected to solitary confinement must not exceed ten years. At the end of ten years the convict will be allowed to communicate with his fellow-prisoners.

The discussion on the address in the Chamber of Peers was brought to a close on Saturday. The number of members who took part in the ballot was 153. Absolute majority, 77; for the address, 114; against it, 39; ministerial majority, 75.

MOROCCO.—News from Morocco has been received by way of Gibraltar, giving the most deplorable account of the internal state of the empire. The Kabyles were pillaging the towns, while the Emperor is described as having lost authority since the battle of Ialy. These accounts are perhaps exaggerated.

AMSTERDAM Jan. 18.—The following paragraph respecting the false report of the death of the Emperor of Russia, is taken from the Journal de la Haye:—"We learn from a good source that all the accounts which have been recently published respecting the state of health of the Emperor of Russia are mere fabrications. That monarch has not even been indisposed."

BRUSSELS, Jan. 21.—In the Chamber of Representatives yesterday, a petition was presented on the part of several merchants of this city, for a uniform postage. M. Verhaegen observed that the uniform rate of postage already prevailed in principle, for, by the recent postal convention with England, a letter addressed to Arlon and one addressed to Antwerp (two distant places) paid the same amount. The petition was referred to a committee. The Minister of the Interior has appointed a commission to inquire what are the best means of preventing fires, or of checking their progress. M. Dethuin, a notary, of Mons, has just acted with a degree of disinterestedness which deserves to be made known. Madame Herendal bequeathed to him her whole fortune, amounting to 50,000fr., to the prejudice of her brother. M. Dethuin has declined this legacy in favour of the lady's brother.

SWITZERLAND.—Letters from Zurich (the present governing canton of Switzerland) of the 17th, state that an extraordinary sitting of the Vorort or Diet would be held in a few days. The report that the Radicals of that canton intended to invade, a second time, the Lucerne territory was unfounded. Considerable agitation still prevails in Switzerland. The Catholic and Protestant parties have formed a coalition at Breslau in order to obtain the liberty of the press. This important question, it is expected, will form a prominent topic of debate in the approaching provincial Diet, which will be opened on the 9th of next month.

PETE FOR THE HOLY GARMENTS.—COLOGNE, Jan. 8.—Bishop Arnold has issued an ordinance to his clergy, announcing that he is resolved to institute a special holiday in honour of the Holy garments (?) of our Saviour, and the other valuable relics, namely, the nails and the spear; that this fête shall be celebrated on the Wednesday following the third Sunday after Easter.

A FATAL DUEL.—A duel took place at Mentz, on the 3rd inst., between M. Ruperberg, aged twenty-one, a clerk in a commercial house at Mannheim, but a native of Mentz, and M. de Lavalette, a Prussian Dragoon officer, of a noble family, aged twenty-four, which terminated fatally for the latter. The quarrel arose from M. Lavalette laughing at M. Ruperberg slipping as he was acquiring a young lady from the play, and it was decided with pistols.

EDUCATION IN LOMBARDY.—Education among the poorer classes appears, from a recent statistical account, to be making great progress in Lombardy. More than 350,000 children of both sexes are now receiving instruction there in the primary schools.

DR. WOLFF.—St. PETERSBURGH, Jan. 9.—We have received positive information that Dr. Wolff, who has arrived at Tcherni, from Bokhara, will return home by way of Russia and St. Petersburg. We hope to see him here very shortly.

TAHITI.—The following letter from Tahiti, received this week by a gentleman in Yorkshire from his friend in that island, contains the latest intelligence from that quarter of the world:—"Tahiti, August 21, 1844. The British frigate Thalia brought the Consul-General here about a week ago, and he will remain for some time to investigate a few of the complaints of the British against the French. About the same time that the Thalia arrived, the French proposed peace to the natives till the arrival of news from Europe, which was readily agreed to by the Tahitians. To-day the French have captured a Tahitian boat, coming from Moorea to this island. Letters have been sent by the chiefs, stating that, unless the boat and men are given up, they will consider the treaty at an end. Indeed, I think they mean to act as they say, because every Tahitian, man, woman, and child, is absent from the beach to-night, which is a strong symptom of war. In the engagements the French have had with the natives, they have lost, in killed in battle, or since dead of their wounds, about 200 men; the Tahitians nearly as many; but I firmly believe the French have had the worst of it. The war is a horrid one—no quarter on either side. Every man found wounded is coolly bayoneted. A number of the misfortunates sail from here in a few days for Valparaiso, on their way to England.—Leeds Mercury.

WEST INDIES.—The Medway, Royal Mail steamship, arrived at Southampton, on Sunday, from the West Indies, having left St. Thomas's on the 31st ult. The news she brought is of little importance. The fever is represented to have been very bad amongst the civilians at Jamaica, and was still raging when the Medway left. The military, generally speaking, had escaped, and the whole of the troops were healthy. The weather had been extremely hot, and one of the passengers, who had resided nearly 20 years on the island, states, he never remembered it so oppressive in the month of December.

A rather warm discussion had taken place in the Jamaica Assembly on a memorial to the Crown, on the subject of the sugar and coffee duties, the clause that gave rise to it setting forth that the colony is on the verge of ruin, and therefore required protection. The argument lay between the members who supported the clause as a fair general description of the state of the colony, and those who contended that the chief part of their sufferings were attributable to a succession of unfavourable seasons, and that, with the improvements now rapidly introducing in the mode of culture in the process of manufacturing sugar they would, under ordinary circumstances, be able to maintain their ground against the production of the slave-holding states. The latter class of advocates were, however, left in a small minority, and the clause alluded to was retained.

DOMESTIC.

Last Sunday, Exeter was the scene of considerable commotion, arising out of the Puseyite movement amongst some of the clergy in that city. The Rev. Mr. Courtney, curate of St. Sidwell's, appeared in the pulpit in a surplice both morning and evening; and in consequence, on leaving the church, was assailed with hisses and groans by an excited crowd of several hundred persons. He was protected by his friends and the police to his residence. A memorial to the Mayor is in course of signature to request him to put himself in communication with the Bishop with a view to induce him to interpose his authority to prevent a recurrence of the scenes of last Sunday.

A new comet, discovered by M. d'Arrest, it is calculated, will be seen in England on the 17th of February next, with the naked eye, or, at least, with a common telescope.

Charles Lamb, a prisoner in the House of Correction, Coldbath-fields, on Tuesday underwent an examination before Mr. Mills, an Uxbridge magistrate, in the board-room of the prison, on a charge of having murdered John Brill, a youth of sixteen, who was murdered in a wood at Ruislip, in February, 1837. The principal evidence against the prisoner was that of another prisoner named Sibley, who stated that Lamb had confessed to him that he had murdered Brill at the place and time referred to. The evidence of several other persons went to prove the fact of Brill having been found murdered; and that of one witness to show that the prisoner had been seen to enter the wood on the day specified, and was afterwards met on the common of Ruislip, out of breath, when he complained of feeling unwell. He was committed to take his trial at the next session of the Central Criminal Court.

The Earl of St. Germans expired on Saturday night, at Port Elliot, Cornwall, from an attack of paralysis, at the advanced age of seventy-eight years. The deceased earl was the father of Lord Eliot, the Secretary for Ireland, who will now take his place in the House of Lords. His elevation will cause a vacancy for the eastern division of Cornwall, which he has represented since last general election.

Mr. Baron Gurney, in consequence of ill health, has resigned his office of one of the Barons of the Exchequer. It is said he will be succeeded by Mr. Platt, Q.C.

A meeting of the London and Central Committee of Agriculturists favourable to a repeal of the malt-tax was held on Monday at the Farmers' Club-house, York Hotel, Bridge-street, Blackfriars, when forms of petitions to both Houses for the abolition of the tax were agreed upon.

On Tuesday evening a destructive fire broke out in the warehouse of Messrs. Smith and Ingle, paper-manufacturers, Piccadilly, Manchester. It spread with such rapidity that it soon ravaged through every floor of the warehouse, and left scarcely the shell standing.

The City of London Postage Committee have forwarded to Rowland Hill, Esq., through Sir George Larpent, chairman, a check for £10,000, part of the amount raised as a testimonial to that gentleman for his successful efforts in carrying the measure of Post-office reform.

Tuesday an inquest was held at the Coseley Tavern, at Coseley, on the body of Benjamin Smith, a miner, whose death, with that of two other men, was caused by an enormous fall of earth in a mine in which they were working—Verdict, "Accidental death."

A club has been formed in Dublin, called the '82 Club, composed of gentlemen repealers, whose object will be to promote Irish legislative independence. Mr. O'Connell is the president. One of the rules is as follows:—"That the club uniform be a green body-coat, with velvet collar, white skirt linings, and gilt buttons, inscribed '1782' in a wreath of shamrock, white tabinet vest, green pantaloons uniform with coat in winter, and white duck in summer, patent leather boots, white kid gloves, and black satin cravat, subject to changes by the committee—all of Irish manufacture."

The Nation states that Sunday, Feb. 9, has been fixed upon "for the effectuation of the O'Connell tribute in all the parishes of the kingdom whose contributions for 1844 have not yet been made up."

The Repeal Association met at the Conciliation Hall, on Monday. There was a numerous attendance. Mr. O'Connell was present; and in the course of his speech, admitted the receipt and canonicity of the Pope's rescript, but denied that it contained any prohibition to agitate for repeal. He suggested that the Bishops should be petitioned to have nothing to do with the Bequ exs Act. Mr. O'Connell also suggested that two delegates should be sent to Rome on the part of the laity, and he named Lord French and John O'Connell, Esq., his son, to represent with his Holiness against countenancing any ecclesiastical interference with the Catholic clergy who had embarked or were about embarking in the struggle—the political struggle for the freedom, and liberty, and justice of the Irish people. The rent for the week amounted to £395.

On Saturday morning a man of advanced age, named Samuel Smith, was murdered at Harristown, near Moynagall, Tipperary. His head was shockingly fractured, and death must have been instantaneous. He was murdered, it is thought, in consequence of being engaged in trying to remove some defaulting tenants from their holdings.

The sum of £1300 has been subscribed for the relief of the widows and children of the men who were killed by the explosion of the Gipsy Queen at Blackwall, in November last.

THE BAZAAR.—We have, as yet, heard nothing of the formation of a committee in Hull to provide articles for the great Free-Trade Bazaar, to be held in Covent Garden, in May next. What are the ladies of Hull doing? Are they, who are so justly noted for the deep interest which they take in missions of mercy, indifferent to the wretchedness of the millions of poor creatures who are perishing for want of bread? Many of them are known as noble-spirited angels in the crowded haunts of misery and guilt.

Shall we call upon them to testify to what depths of degradation human beings are sunk by the sharp pressure of hunger? The cause in which we would engage them is a most Christian and a most noble one. It is to co-operate with those who would secure honest bread—the purchase of free labour—to every son and daughter of toil. Their contributions to the Bazaar need be neither very rare nor very costly. Fancy or useful articles of any description, curiosities, albums, and autographs, will be all accepted by the committee. We hope our fair friends will lose no time in doing something worthy of them. The work is one of Christian charity. "Blessed," says the psalmist, "is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble. The Lord will preserve him, and keep him alive: he shall be blessed upon the earth. The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing." And, in the same beautiful spirit of genuine benevolence, the son of Sirach, in Ecclesiasticus, says, "Help the poor for the commandments' sake. Loose thy money for thy brother, and let it not rust under a stone to be lost. Lay up thy treasure according to the commandment of the Most High, and it shall bring thee more profit than gold."—Hull Advertiser.

WOODEN RAILWAY.—The Irish Railway Gazette announces, amongst a host of other railway projects about to be undertaken in Ireland, that "the projectors of the Waterford and Kilkenny Railway have determined to lay down a single line at first, using the wooden rail; and the most sanguine hopes of success are entertained."

TREAT TO WORKMEN.—On Monday se'night, being the first market, the workpeople in the employ of Mr. Edw. Howard, Bottom-street Mills, Rochdale, assembled together in a large room connected with the mill, called the Bank, which was beautifully decorated with evergreens, intermixed with choice fruits, flags, and mottoes—"Let the interests of our Queen and her kingdom never be thought distinct." "Commerce universally extended." Here a dinner, consisting of substantial joints and plum pudding, was given by Mr. Howard, to between 300 and 400 of his workpeople. Mr. Howard presided, and was supported by several of his personal friends, some of whom addressed the company in brief but appropriate speeches. Several of the hands connected with the mills spoke in high terms of their employer.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, Jan. 20.—The supplies of English Wheat last week were large; this morning there was a fair supply in improved condition from Kent, and small from Essex. The demand was not brisk, but the stands were cleared before the close of the market at similar prices to this day week. Barley was in good supply; a few sales of English were made at a decline of 1s., but though the abatement would have been willingly acceded to by the factors, the business done was to a very limited extent. There was a little demand for Foreign at former rates. There was a good supply of Irish Oats during the past week, and a few vessels arrived in time for this morning's market. On Wednesday and Friday last the impression was general that prices would not go lower, and there was more disposition to stock the mills as evinced by the London dealers; the same opinion appeared to be entertained by the country buyers to-day, and there was a tolerably free sale at fully last week's rates. S. H. LUCAS and SON.

AFRICAN GUANO.—The above MANURE, from Ichaboe, on SALE.—Apply to DABBY and SIM, Importers, Liverpool, 1845.

WANTED, by a Wholesale Hosiery House in the City, a respectable Young Man, of good address and accustomed to the Wholesale Trade, as WAREHOUSEMAN. A thorough knowledge of his business is indispensable.—Address, post-paid, to A. Z., at 43, Wood-street, Cheapside.

THE ANTI-CORN DESIDERATUM, AND COMFORT TO THE FEET.
HALL and CO., WELLINGTON-STREET.
STRAND, near Waterloo-bridge, London.—The PANNUS CO. RUM, or LEATHER-CLOTH BOOTS and SHOES, are easier, softer, and more durable than any other kind: they never draw the feet, but afford most comfort to the wearer. Their Spring Boots support the ankles and prevent the trouble of lacing or buttoning; and their India Rubber Goloshes protect the feet from damp and cold.

SCHOOLBRED and CO., 34, Jermyn-st., St. James's.
beg respectfully to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that they have now, for many years, supplied the best and most fashionable articles of Dress at prices considerably lower than those usual at the West End. They have therefore taken this means of introducing their name to the notice of those gentlemen who wish for a durable and well-made article combined with the strictest economy.

DO you want a good and smart-fitting COAT, VEST, or TROUSERS? If you do, go to the cheapest Tailoring and Out-fitting Establishment in the United Kingdom, 40, KING WILLIAM STREET, CITY, two doors from London-bridge, where you will find one of the largest, cheapest, and best assortments of Clothing in the world, at prices that will positively astonish the beholder, and, upon comparison, will be found fully to realize the proprietor's assertion. Observe the address, M. SAMUEL, two doors from London bridge.

J. SMITH, TAILOR, &c., Successor to his late
Father, No. 17, Tavistock-street, Covent-garden, begs to solicit the continuance of the patronage so long extended to his predecessor. J. S. does not profess to tempt Gentlemen by a parade of Low Prices, as experience has fully satisfied him that extreme cheapness is incompatible with superior materials and good workmanship. He trusts that those who honour him with their custom will find, in the care and skill with which clothes are made under his superintendence, a guarantee that a fair equivalent is given for his Prices, which are as moderate as any respectable establishment can possibly charge.

OUTFITS to AUSTRALIA, INDIA, and the
COLONIES.—Parties leaving England will find it greatly to their advantage to purchase their Outfits at E. J. MONNERY and CO.'s, 165, Fenchurch-street, City, where a large assortment of Shirts, Clothing, Hosiery, Game Merino Under Shirts, &c., adapted for each particular colony, as well as for the Voyage, is kept ready for immediate use, and at prices far more reasonable than usually charged for the same articles.
Bedding, Military Accoutrements, Cabin and Camp Furniture of every description.—Lists, with Prices affixed, forwarded by post.

CABINET and LIBRARY FURNITURE, UPHOLSTERY, &c. &c.
W. MILLS respectfully solicits the attention of the Gentry and the Public in general, to his well-seasoned stock of FURNITURE, manufactured on the Premises, and cheaper than any other articles which are daily exhibited for sale in the metropolis.
No. 10, Regent-street, French Polishing, &c. &c., executed in a superior manner, on OXFORD-STREET, opposite the Bear and Castle Inn, near Tottenham-court-road.

VAL DE PENAS, of excellent quality, £18 the Quarter Cask; or in Bottle, 36s. per Dozen. MARSALE WINES, first imported, 21s. and 27s. per Dozen; or in Wood, £13 and £11 the Quarter Pipe. Fine old crusted PORTS, and Pale and Brown SHERRIES, 4s. 6s., 4s., 3s. per Dozen. HOCKS, CLARETS, and CHAMPAGNES, 4s., 3s., 2s., and 1s.

CRAWFORD and CO., 129, Regent-street.

FENDERS, STOVES, and FIRE-IRONS, as well as GENERAL IRONMONGERY.—The largest assortment of Stoves and Fenders in the world is now on sale at RIPPON and HURTON'S extensive warehouses, 39, Oxford-street, corner of Newman-street (just removed to Wells-street). Bright Steel Fenders, to 1 foot, from 50s. each; ditto with ornamental cast-iron, from 60s.; rich bronzed scroll ditto, with cast-iron, 10s. 6d.; iron fenders, 3 feet, 4s. 6d.; 4 feet, 6s.; ditto bronzed, and lined with standards, 3 feet, 9s.; 4 feet, 11s.; wrought iron kitchen fenders, 3 feet, 4s. 6d.; 4 feet, 6s.; bright register stoves, with ornamental cast-iron, from 20s. 6d.; black dining-room register stoves, with ornamental cast-iron, from 20s. 6d.; black dining-room register stoves, 2 feet, 20s.; 1 foot, 10s.; bedroom register stoves, 2 feet, 16s.; 3 feet, 21s. The new economical Thermic stoves, with fender and radiating hearth plate, from 4s. 6d.; fire irons for chimneys, 1s. 9d. per set; handsome ditto, with cast-iron, 6s. 6d.; newest pattern, with elegant bronzed heads, 11s. A variety of fire irons, with ornate and richly-cut heads, at proportionate prices. Any article in furnishing ironmongery 30 per cent. under any other house, with the extent and variety of the stock is without any equal. The money returned for every article not approved of. Detailed catalogue, with engravings, sent (per post, free). Established (in Wellington) 1823.

EVERY MAN HAS NOW AN OPPORTUNITY TO BECOME HIS OWN LANDLORD OR A SMALL FREEHOLDER.

EQUITABLE PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION, and SAVING FUND.

Established September, 1841. Enrolled pursuant to Act of Parliament, 1 and 2 Wm. IV., chap. 32.

SHARES £110.

MONTHLY PAYMENTS 10s. per Share. ENTRANCE FEE 5s. per Share.

The Association presents much greater advantages than any other similar society. The LAW CHARGES are very much reduced. This, a most important consideration to the borrowing member, is fully secured to him by a special agreement made with the professional gentleman who holds the appointment of Solicitor to the Association; he will transact all the legal business required by the Member to complete the mortgage to the Association for FOUR GUINEAS, exclusive of Stamps, when such are required.

Notices have been given that the FOURTH MONTHLY MEETING for dividing Profits and issuing Shares will be held on WEDNESDAY EVENING NEXT, January 2nd, at seven o'clock precisely, in DOR-CHESTER HALL, 1, Dorchester place, New North-road, Hoxton, when persons who are anxious to purchase a small freehold or leasehold property, or to pay off mortgages by easy instalments, or who wish to obtain a secure and profitable investment for their savings, are particularly invited to attend and to enrol themselves members.

At the above meeting a second SALE of SHARES, to the extent of £100,000, will take place, and persons joining the Association on that evening will be entitled to bid, and if the security offered be approved, the shares will be made without delay.

The RULES, price 6d., can be obtained at the residence of the Manager,

1, North-building, Hoxton; and in the room on the meeting night.

By Order of the Committee, HENRY THOMAS, Manager.

The operations of this Association are not confined to the metropolitan district, but take up their share on property in any part of the country.

CEDEMATOUS LEGS.—Persons who from a long residence abroad, sprains, contusions, &c., are suffering from the use of the Patent Elastic Stocking, which bandage, together with the use of the Elastic Knee Cap, Belt, &c., have for many years received the patronage of the most eminent surgeons. The Bandage can be sent per post, by which means also the directions for measurement will be forwarded on receipt of a line addressed to the Patentee.

Schoolbred and Co., 34, Jermyn-street, St. James's.

TWENTY YEARS' LOSS OF HAIR, and WON- DERFUL RESTORATION.

Church-street, Whitby, Oct. 10, 1841.

My dear Sir, The last supply of OLIPHANT'S BALM OF COLUM-bin, which was sold immediately on receipt, and I have many more now on hand, which I hope you will send without delay. Orders have been poured in more than ever since the restoration of the Balm have been so decisively demonstrated in the case of several credible and respectable inhabitants of the town. One individual, a young man who had little or no hair for twenty years, in the case

TO MERCHANTS AND EXPORTERS OF SEALING-WAX.

G. HYDE and CO., SEALING-WAX MAKERS,
61, FLEET-STREET, beg to intimate they continue to manufacture their much approved Wax for home consumption and export. It will be found particularly brilliant in colour and adhesive in quality, and may be had in quantities of not less than 25 lbs. Attention is also solicited to the superior quality of their Envelopes and Account-books; these articles being manufactured on the premises, enable G. H. and Co. to sell at such prices as will defy competition.
Hyde's London Manifold Letter Writer, for producing several letters with a copy at one operation, reduced in price to 10s., is supplied to the Colonial and Stationery Offices, and acknowledged to be the best Copying-machine yet invented.
Wholesale, and for Exportation, 61, Fleet-street, London.

CLERICAL, MEDICAL, AND GENERAL LIFE
ASSURANCE SOCIETY. Instituted 1834. A third Quinquennial Division of Profits was made in January, 1842, and the Bonus thus divided amounted on an average to £23 per cent. on the Premiums paid. Every description of Assurance may be effected with this Society, and Policies are granted on the Lives of Persons of all ages.

The Rates for Life Policies are also lower than those of most other Offices.
The sum accumulated for the security and benefit of the Assured already exceeds £300,000; and the Income is now £101,500 per annum.
In addition to Assurances on Healthy Lives, this Society continues to grant Policies on the Lives of Persons afflicted with asthma, rupture, and other diseases. The plan of granting Assurances on unhealthy Lives originated with this Office in the early part of 1824.

Trustees and Directors.
George Bousfield, Esq., Thomas Piper, Esq.,
Thomas Challinor, Esq., Ald. Thomas B. Simpson, Esq.,
Peter Ellis, Esq., Edward Smith, Esq.,
Joseph Fletcher, Esq., Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P., Richard Hoiler, Esq., John Wilks, Esq.,
Charles Hindley, Esq., M.P. Edward Wilson, Esq.

Secretary—Dr. THOMAS PRICE.
The experience of five years, and the growing prosperity of the Company, justify a renewed appeal to public attention and support, especially to ministers of all denominations among Dissenters, and to their friends in general. At the annual meeting in May, 1843, an increased Dividend to Proprietors was announced on the capital advanced by them for public protection against contingencies, and to Life Assurers, under Table No. 11, a bonus of 13 per cent. on the gross premiums paid was declared, with a further bonus of 10 per cent. to Ministerial Assurers, making to such of them as were assured on the terms of Table No. 11, a total bonus 23 per cent.

The following are among the distinctive features of the Company:—

1. One-tenth of the entire profits is appropriated, by the Deed of Settlement, to reducing the premiums payable for insuring the lives of Dissenting and Methodist ministers, or in other ways similarly beneficial to their families.

2. Certificates of age and character, and of the amount of loss in case of fire, not required from clergymen and churchwardens.

3. A Table of Premiums for Policies, payable at the age of 60, or of Annuities, to commence at that period, suitable to the case of superannuated ministers, and of other persons.

4. The lowest rates of premium consistent with security, and the payment of policies guaranteed by a capital of One Million.

5. Two Tables of Premiums, the one giving an interest in the profits of the Company.

6. Parties assured on the former Table entitled to participate immediately in the profits of the Company.

7. Every facility given, on moderate terms, to persons going beyond the prescribed limits of their policy.

8. Premiums may be paid either annually, half-yearly, or quarterly, in a number of payments, or in one sum.

9. Loans advanced on policies of the value of £50.

10. All claims payable three months after satisfactory proof of death; or earlier, on deduction of discount.

11. Loans also are granted on equitable terms to life assurers on life interests, and on real or satisfactory personal securities.

12. No entrance fee required.

A liberal allowance to solicitors, auctioneers, surveyors, and others.

The next Division of Profits will be made in November, 1847.

Members whose Premiums became due on the 1st instant, are reminded that the same must be paid within thirty days from that date.

The Report of the Directors to the Ninth Annual Meeting of Members, held on the 16th instant, may be had on application at the office.

LUXURY IN SHAVING.
JOHN GOSNELL and CO.'S AMBROSIAL
SHAVING CREAM (Patronised by Prince Albert). This inestimable Cream possesses all the good qualities of the Finest Naples Soap, without the disagreeable smell inseparable from that article in a genuine state. It is of a white pearly silvery appearance, produces a creamy lather, which will not dry on the face, and suits in use the delightful flavour of the almond.

Perfumers to Her Majesty, 12, Three King-coart, Lombard-street, London.
Manufacturers of Combs and Brushes of the best quality, and on the most approved principles.

ROWLAND'S UNIQUE PREPARATIONS.
Under the Patronage of the several Sovereigns and Courts of Europe, and universally preferred.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for the Growth, Preservation, and for Beautifying the HUMAN HAIR. Price 3s. 6d., 7s.; Family Bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d., and double that size 21s. per bottle.
ROWLAND'S KALYDON, for Improving and Beautifying the SKIN and COMPLEXION. Price 4s. 6d. and 5s. 6d. per bottle, duty included.
ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICH, for the TEETH and GUMS. Price 2s. 6d. per box, duty included.

CAUTION.
Spurious Compounds are frequently offered for sale, under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty), the labels, bills, and advertisements of the original articles are copied, and either a fictitious name, or the word "Genuine," is used in the place of "Rowland's." It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the word "ROWLAND'S" is on the wrapper of each article. For the protection of the Public from fraud and imposition, the Honourable Commissioners of Stamps have directed the Proprietor's signature to be engraved on the Government Stamp, thus:—
A. ROWLAND AND SONS, 20, HATTON GARDEN,
Which is affixed on the Kalydon and Odonto.
Sold by the Proprietors, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

THE METROPOLITAN EMPORIUM OF ELEGANCIES.
AMONG THE SIGHTS OF LONDON, none are more interesting and extraordinary than its shops; and for a combination of taste and elegance, there is not one so conspicuous as MECH'S, 4, LEADENHALL STREET, near the India House. There may be seen the most recherche productions of English manufacture, displayed in the most attractive form. At night, the brilliancy of the illumination gives an additional effect of great splendour. Those who are about to visit London will certainly wish one of its most remarkable public features if they do not call at Mech's. There may be suited the economical and the luxurious. Industry and amusement may there be alike furnished with their implements, made in the most finished and suitable manner. The merchant, the traveller, the housekeeper, in short, every class will find at Mech's many things adapted to their wants. The Stock comprises the following articles, manufactured by Mech's, for the wholesale, retail, and export trade:—Ladies' and Gentlemen's dressing-cases, in leather, wood, and paper maché; writing-desks; work-boxes; ladies' cabinets and jewel-cases assorted; tea-caddies, the most elegant in the world; ladies' paper maché work boxes; netting boxes; card-boxes;

tea trays; bottle-cases; ladies' companions; pole-screens; hand-screens;
card-racks; note and cake baskets; bagatelle tables, justly renowned; leather writing cases, containing a complete dressing apparatus; pearl and sandy card-cases; ivory hair-brushes; splendid cases of seven-day razors; ivory-handles and other highly-finished articles; Wharfedale penknives, sporting knives, and fancy scissors; splendid cases of agate, pearl, and ivory desert knives and table knives; a rich variety of plates, bronze, gilt, and paper maché and table ink-stands; everything for the toilet and work table; the new electrotype plated forks and spoons, which never show the wear; and an admirable assortment of table cutlery. Elegant chessmen and backgammon boards, &c. &c. Catalogues gratis. Mech's is the inventor of the well known magic strip and paste, the cushioned bagatelle table, the Mechian dressing case, and the castellated tooth-brush.
His specimens of paper maché manufacture are unrivalled in this country for beauty of design and execution.

N.B. Letters from the country, accompanied by a post-office order or a reference for payment in London, will meet prompt attention, and the goods will be carefully packed.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Which warehouse in the land can claim
The honour of the highest name?
And which has won the greatest fame?

The mart of MORER.

Which is the house that serves with dress,
Whose value all the world confess,
In elegance and usefulness?

Why, that of MORER.

Whose garments hang upon the back
Too tight in fit, or else too slack,
While oft the cloth and stitches crack?

Not those of MORER.

Whose choice habiliments are sought
At prices little more than ought,
Although they serve you as they ought?

The garb of MORER.

Where do admiring thousands go,
Their valued favours to bestow?
To any other warehouse? No—

They go to MORER.

To whom should every one repair,
For articles whose look and wear
Would constant admiration share?

To none but MORER.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

The Public are specially informed that, during the re-erection of E.

MORER and SON'S premises in Aldgate, the entrance to their Establishment is only at 154, Mile-end.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 71.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1845.

[3d]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quentin Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund. By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

Manchester, Jan. 13, 1845.

The League Bazaar will be held during the month of May next, in the Theatre Royal Covent Garden.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London, or Manchester.

PROSPECTS OF THE COMING SESSION.

Taxation and finance will engross a more than ordinary share of attention in the approaching session. To preserve a large revenue, and at the same time to relax the inordinate pressure by which industry is weighed down, employment restricted, and the operations of labour and capital ungenerously cramped and limited, is the great problem about to be proposed to the Legislature; and on its right solution the prosperity of the country is staked. It is a proposition evident to the comprehension of a child, or even of a county member, that the payment of taxes which do not go to increase the revenue must restrict the ability to pay those taxes which contribute to revenue. Every shilling abstracted from consumers by monopolists diminishes the ability of those consumers to contribute to the exigencies of the state. There is no man more thoroughly convinced of the truth of this axiom than Sir Robert Peel himself; but he has given indications of his continued resolution to evade and mystify this simple truth. His plan will be to remove the principle from fact to the convenient region of abstractions; and he has unwittingly revealed this intended game by selecting, as mover of the address, Mr. Charteris, who is a protectionist "in the abstract," and as seconder, Mr. Thomas Baring, the rejected of London, who is a Free-Trader "in the abstract." The Peel policy, therefore, promises to be a nondescript cross between abstract protection and abstract Free Trade—a monstrous birth which will not a little perplex some future writer on the natural history of politics.

Though a landlord majority is likely to show itself obstinate and unscrupulous on all landlord questions, there are symptoms of alarm exhibited at the monopolist gatherings, not unlike those evinced by the captains of "the free companies" in the middle ages, when the restoration of legitimate authority threatened the extinction of black-mail. The vaunts and boasts of the protectionists have disappeared: Sir Charles Knightley declares that the old system has lost all strength in the House of Commons; Mr. Colville denounces the Premier in good set terms, and declares that protection societies exist only for the purpose of keeping the Minister in order. The Marquis of Londonderry fairly tells his tenantry that reliance upon protection is leaning upon a broken reed; and amid the cheers of the farmers assembled at Selby, the Hon. Edward Petre flings to the winds the sophistries of the monopolists, and gives to his hearers the plain common sense inculcated by the League. He says:—

"I will never admit that either the agricultural or commercial interest is separate and distinct; they are connected one with another, and the happiness and prosperity of one confer happiness on the other. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I say to the agriculturist—persevere. Let him persevere in his industry and improvement; and, above all, let him avail himself of scientific knowledge; and these means will be to him the surest protection that he can enjoy. Let him not depend, however useful it may be, on the protection of legislative enactment. However available it may be, let all other means of protection be of secondary consideration, and let these I have pointed out be his guide in all his undertakings."

Though these indications do not prove that the ship of monopoly is about to strike her flag, they show that the crew is disheartened, the officers perplexed, and no pilot able to guide the helm. At almost all these meetings the dissatisfaction of the farmers has been exhibited in various but significant forms: they have learned to distrust the monopoly which they will ere long detest; and they have spoken so many truths disagreeable to lordly ears, that several believe it a perilous experiment to have a meeting with their tenantry. Still the corn monopolists will cling to their privilege of taxing the poor man's loaf, and insist on their right to swell their rent-rolls by driving a lucrative trade in artificial famine.

Foremost among the victims of monopoly must be ranked the agricultural labourers. There has been a promise that their condition shall be brought under the consideration of Parliament, and there are pretty distinct signs of a determination that this promise shall not be evaded. When a noble monopolist proposed the health of the labourers in Sussex, he was met with the indignant rebuke that such a toast should be drunk in the beverage to which class-legislation had reduced the labouring population. This edifying scene may suggest important reflections: discontent must have acquired great strength out of doors before any untitled individual would have dared to beard the Lennox in his den; he must have been conscious of large sympathies without the walls, ere he so sharply rebuked the Richmond within. There are others who exhibit a nervous dread of the exposure of the condition of the agricultural labourers: we request attention to the letters of our correspondent from the south-west, which elucidate some of the modern exemplifications of the policy of the ancient tyrants in stifling complaint. We shall quote one passage here:—

"I was sitting in one of the inns here two days ago, when a man in the clothing of a farm-labourer came and inquired for me. I had seen him before, and he told me that he had come to look for me, and to beg of me that what he had told when I saw him in his house at home might not be put in the papers. The things that had been said of the parish next to his, and of the poverty of the families I visited in it, had been a 'terrible misfortune.' The master had been at his men at a 'terrible rate,' and his lordship had been, or had sent, the man did not know which, to master; but, whichever it were, master swore that every one of them would be turned away and put on the roads or in the workhouse, and Lord Shaftesbury would turn them out of their houses, for telling such tales as they had told to persons that put what they said in the newspapers." He begged, for the love of Heaven, that his name might not be mentioned. And then he told me of the unfortunate consequences that would ensue if it should be known that he had made any complaints."

When we remember the extent to which commissions of inquiry have been promoted by Lord Ashley, and the eagerness he has displayed to collect every grievance, and every circumstance that could be distorted into a grievance, in operative life, we feel some little surprise at the edict against information published to the agricultural labourers on his paternal estates. But let us look a little farther; our correspondent adds:—

"It may be remembered that in Pentridge parish—all of which belongs to the Ashley family, who have their title from where I now write, as already observed—I saw the family of the Framptons; the father working on the farm for 7s. a week; the mother and eldest daughter, only a child, out in the fields picking stones for the roads on a cold wet day—frost, wind, and rain striving for the mastery; the other children, four in number, at home without food; huddled on a hearth without a fire, save what might be put on top of a pipe to light it—literally not more. It may be recollected that I spoke of their house—Lord Shaftesbury's house, the walls of which were not amiss, but the roof of which, for want of thatch, was like a rotten sponge, under one corner of which was a piece of canvas, waterproof, to keep out the wet; and under which was the lair or bed of the family.

"These people, the Framptons, because of what I said, have been—what shall I call it?—they have been 'taken into consideration.' There has not been any straw sent to thatch the roof; not any more waterproof canvas given to keep the rain out of the bedroom; not any firing; not any clothing; not any advance of wages; nor yet gratuitous bread. But that noble family, so remarkable for humanity to women, have caused it to be intimated, since I wrote what I wrote, published what I published, that it was wrong for such a woman as Mrs. Frampton, mother of a large family of young children, to be allowed to go out to pick stones for the roads on a wet wintry day, and they, herself and child, should be restrained from so doing.

"They, who had no bread in the house while they did go out to gather stones, are to be restrained from getting the pence they earned thereby, because it is shocking to the feelings that women and children should be so employed."

This is a fair sample of the humanity that has sought to establish itself in legislation. The philanthropist says, "Do not work where you can be seen, but go and starve unseen with your children. Hide that famine which proclaims the misery of taxed bread; perish in your hovel, that lordly sensibilities may not be wounded by the aspect of the wretchedness which lordly legislation has produced; remove from the public road the pining mother, the shivering children; let their presence not excite the disgust of the fastidious, or the inquiries of the compassionate; let not the results of the Corn Law be read in the cadaverous aspect, the swollen cheek, and the hollow eye; such damning testimony against monopoly is of dangerous consequence; hide it in the hovel preparatory to hiding it in the grave."

There is one little objection to this course of policy: the facts cannot be hidden; the monopolists themselves challenged the inquiry when they declared that the Corn Laws were maintained for the sake of the agricultural labourer, and that challenge cannot be retracted. By their effects on the condition of the labourer the Corn Laws must stand or fall; and the benevolent Lord Ashley is bound to support the most searching inquiry into their state and condition, or to abandon for ever all claims to the character of philanthropy.

The Morning Chronicle has announced that a further reform of the tariff is contemplated. It states:—

"An important document has just been printed. Only fifty copies of it have been issued from the press, and these are said to be intended only for the members of the Privy Council. The document is of great length, and forms more than 200 folio pages. The object of it is to show the operation of Sir Robert Peel's tariff. It contains statements, in columns, of the Customs receipts upon each article imported for each of the four years preceding the new tariff. It contains also a similar statement of the receipts since that tariff came into operation. The advocates of Free Trade will rejoice to learn that the gross receipts for a year under the new tariff exceed those of any other of the four years accounted for by one hundred thousand pounds."

In confirmation of this we may add that in all the political circles, at all associated with the Government, the Report of the Import-Duties Committee, which so lately was studiously maligned and fiercely reprobated, is now recognised as a document of irresistible authority. Even in the Morning Herald a table was published to show that every recommendation of that committee which had been carried into effect had produced the results anticipated and predicted. But we should be deceiving our readers if we led them to believe that even these hopeful signs lead us to expect a consistent and scientific reform of the tariff from our present rulers; there will be some peddling here, and some nibbling there, reminding one of what was said of Pope Gregory's reform of the calendar:—"His Holiness has found out an evil which did nobody any harm, and suggested a remedy which does nobody any good."

Tait justly remarks that the course of policy which the Ministers will pursue on the sugar question is almost as much a matter "of curiosity as of practical concern." The Premier must by this time be thoroughly ashamed of the cant of moral botany, and must regret his having stooped to adopt a cry so patently hypocritical as that of slave-grown sugar in a country whose staple branch of industry is dependent upon slave-grown produce. There is no doubt that in this, and in many other instances, the factions pretences of 1841 will seriously interfere with the practical exigencies of 1845. Lord Sandon's wooden bible is not likely to afford him any useful assistance: the hypocrisy outside is no longer able to conceal the stupidity within. An act of Parliament designed to favour free-labour sugar, whose first operation is to let in a cargo of slave-labour sugar, is so utterly ridiculous as to render the statute-book little better than an appendix to "Parson's Collection of Blunders." But there is, in addition, the question of the Brazilian trade,—peculiarly interesting to the wooden-headed supporters of the wooden Bible,—which will compel some change; and, as yet, the chances are equal whether the change will be an act of statesmanship or of cunning: whether the Minister will enact the part of a political economist or of "the artful dodger." When we remember the strange scenes produced by the debates and divisions on the sugar duties in the course of the last session, we may fairly anticipate some curious concussions and dislocations of party when they come again under consideration. As on the former occasion, the Free-Traders will adhere unwaveringly to their principles, and sacrifice nothing either to the caprices or the purposes of political party.

A letter from Lord John Russell, which has appeared in the Morning Chronicle, may lead to a hope that his lordship is not disinclined to abandon his pet project of moderate protection, and to adopt the intelligible and simple principle of Free Trade. The letter is addressed to the sawyers of Oldham, who addressed his lordship to support a tax on machinery; and we insert it at full length:—

"Unsted Wood, Godalming, Sept. 24, 1844.

"GENTLEMEN,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, signed by your secretary, of the 17th inst. I wish I could bring my opinions to some accordance with your own, but I fear that it is impossible. While you seek to put fresh restrictions on the skill and ingenuity of mechanical inventions, it will not be in my power to assist your endeavours for the benefit of the sawyers. If I were to do so, I could not stop with your trade. Nail-makers are in a similar situation, owing to the new machinery for the manufacture of nails; other artisans and agricultural labourers will pray for the like interference, to prevent the use of new machines which interfere with manual labour.

"Now, my belief is, that those inventions tend to the improvement of our condition as a people, and enable us to support the great weight of taxation to which we are subjected. Ever since I have known this country, machinery has been in progress towards perfection, performing more and more the task of human hands, and, at the same time, a great number of people have found profitable employment.

"I know, and I deplore, that while this progress is going on, many a workman loses the wages which skill and experience have enabled him to gain. But instead of the perilous course of laying duties on machinery, which would soon enable foreign nations to outstrip us in the score of competition, I am of opinion that we ought to give greater freedom to trade, and, if possible, so extend the demand for labour that our population, greatly increased as it is, may obtain a good price for their day's work.

"I do not mean to pronounce any opinion on the late tariff, so far as regards timber. If the sawyers of this country are subject to unfair competition, they have a cause for redress so far as colonial timber is concerned.

"I remain your most obedient servant,

"J. RUSSELL.

"Mr. Samuel Easthope, White Lion, Oldham."

There is but one word in this letter which we could desire to see altered. Instead of "greater freedom to trade," we would that he had said "perfect freedom to trade." There should be no such thing as graduated justice or graduated wisdom. In the application of a right principle there is no room for any question of greater or less. The English nation has suffered as much from timidity in rectitude as from boldness in prepossession injustice. We trust that the dream of a fixed duty no longer haunts his lordship's imagination: the project would scarcely command a hearing in Parliament, and would assuredly be scouted by the constituencies.

The ensuing session is not likely to be one of such deep and exciting interest as many that have preceded it; but we see no reason for despairing of its being a practically useful session. It will probably contribute to convince the nation more thoroughly of the utter vanity and folly—to say nothing of the mischief—of mere party names and associations. Enlightened public opinion may be brought to bear on the course of legislation, if not so efficiently as to keep its march continually in the straight path of right, at least with sufficient force to prevent any gross deviation into decided wrong. The gains to Free Trade may not be very great, but monopoly must make no new acquisition. Financial questions afford excellent opportunities for the enunciation of sound principles, and much will be gained by publishing a simple gazette account of the number of monopolist sophisms killed and wounded during the recess. We trust, indeed, that this session will go far to show that, while it is honourable to be a Conservative when good is to be conserved, it is equally honourable to be a Destructive when evil is to be destroyed.

WHAT HAVE THE LEAGUE TO DO WITH THE GAME LAWS?

"You have no more right to dictate to the owner of the great estate as to the amount of game he shall keep, than you have to command the cottager in the number of his chickens."—MR. GRANLEY BERKELEY.

"Were the Corn Law out of the question, we should not be disposed to contest this assertion of landlords' rights. Whoever else may be in the habit of running out against the right of the landlord to do what he will with what is really and truly his own, the Leaguers at least are not chargeable with Jacobinical assaults on the property law of the country. Undoubtedly, the landed proprietor has, as landed proprietor, a clear right to keep any quantity of wild animals on his premises that he thinks proper—hares and pheasants, deer and dogs, cats and mice, rats and rabbits. If a man positively will turn his house and grounds into a menagerie of vermin, we know of no principle of law or public policy on which he can be meddled with, so long as he keeps his vermin from plundering and annoying his neighbours. The thing may be foolish enough; but it is one of that very large class of follies which, in this country, law wisely tolerates in its tenderness for the liberty of the subject. It is an affair for the moralist rather than the legislator. Punch must deal with it—not Parliament. Once for all, we freely admit—supposing the Corn Law out of the question—the right of the landlord, as a landlord, "to preserve" any quantity of game he pleases, on his own grounds and at his own cost; under the protection of the law of trespass, and subject to the restrictions and responsibilities of the law of nuisance.

But the Corn Law is in the question: and this makes a prodigious difference. The Corn Law turns this abstract landlords' right into an enormous practical wrong. By the Corn Law the landlords of England have stripped themselves of the right of doing what they will with their own. They have changed the tenure and title of their estates. They have made their property trust-property. They have taken on themselves, for a consideration, the character of trustees of the arable land of the realm, for the purpose of keeping us independent of foreigners; they have pocketed the consideration; and we have a right to criticise and control their execution of the trust, and to see that they do not slip out of it. They have made themselves public functionaries; and we have a right to hold them responsible for the discharge of their functions. Their "property"—as they still call it, by force of habit—is public property; of which they are not proprietors, but hereditary and salaried trustees. They are official personages—patented and licensed national purveyors; and they must bear official responsibility for all they do and leave undone. They have contracted to find the whole British people in food, without troubling foreigners—to find a growing population in growing supplies of food, off a limited soil: and what they do with the soil is our affair, not theirs. To take the people's food to feed hares and rabbits—to turn good corn land into a wilderness of a pheasant-preserve—is not a venial misuse of private property, but an infamous breach of public trust. The assumption of a right to preserve game ad libitum is, in the mouth of a monopolist, at once iniquitous and impudent beyond measure or expression. By the Corn Law the landlords claim the privilege of feeding us, for their profit; by the Game Law they claim the privilege of starving us for their amusement. By the Corn Law they assert a right to grow all the corn that (except in actual famine) shall ever be eaten in Great Britain; by the game law they assert a right not to grow corn, but to breed hares and pheasants instead. They first say we shall not get our corn from off other soils than that of England, and then they carefully and elaborately waste on their sports (and such sports!) this corn and this soil of England: "for the landlord," says Mr. Granley Berkeley, "purchases at the best price whole stacks of barley, beans, and buckwheat, besides potatoes and Swede turnips, with which to stock his woods and feed his game," and "the pheasant is often the best customer the farmer has." When a corn-lawing landlord stands up for the right of game-preserving, he simply tells us that he and his order have a right to keep Great Britain, if they think proper, at perpetual famine point, to help them to pass the time.

It is worth noting, how aptly these two tyrannies fit on to one another—how exactly the profit of the first is dovetailed in with the pleasure of the second. A landlord class, protected by a monopoly, have a direct pecuniary interest in game-preserving. It improves their market. A "large head of game" all over England is worth almost as much to them as a bad harvest. The less corn they can agree among themselves to grow, the more money they will get for what they do grow; it being well understood that the price of bread always rises more rapidly than the supply declines. The same interest which the old Dutch colonists found, or fancied, in burning half the produce of their spice islands to improve the value of the other half, the English landlords actually have in turning corn-fields into pheasant-preserves and rabbit-warrens. Their sport "makes good for trade." Their seeming extravagance is, in a business view, real economy. Their hares and pheasants are a part of their protection. The rabbits alone are as good as a rise of 5s. on the pivot. The "whole ricks" which they buy in to feed these creatures, add more than their worth to the price of the other ricks which they sell in Mark-lane to feed the people. As corn-growers, with a monopoly of the best and surest market in the world, it is their interest to narrow the surface of corn-growing soil, to diminish the quantity and damage the quality of the corn actually grown, and to abstract from the net product of the year's harvest "whole ricks" for pheasant consumption. Corn Law and Game Law together—the system is as complete a machinery of starvation as the brain of man could devise. The one makes it the interest—the other makes it the pleasure—of the landlord class to produce sparingly, consume wastefully, and keep the people short.

While, however, we contend that the existence of the Corn Law gives us a clear full right to "dictate to the owner of the great estate as to the amount of game he shall keep"—i. e., to dictate to the owner of the great estate as to the amount of starvation he shall inflict on the people he has contracted to feed,—we need scarcely add, that we are not solicitous to see this right practically acted on. The true remedy for the game-preserving and battue-shooting nuisance is not to be sought in direct legislation. Repeal the Corn Law, and the thing will die a natural death. Without a monopoly to prop up rents and prices, landlords will not be able to afford keeping up artificial wildernesses in the heart of a densely-peopled, highly-civilized, and hungry country. We are quite disposed to believe that, with Free Trade and natural prices, it will still be in the power of the landlords of Great Britain, very generally, to keep rents at about their present rate (though we are in no sort of way concerned to prove this); but the conditions of landlord life will be altogether changed. High rents may continue possible; but high rents, with slovenly farming—high rents with a large head of game—high rents, with small and damaged crops—high rents, with tenancy-at-will and political slavery of farmers—will be flatly impossible. Under the Free-Trade régime, the only way of maintaining a high money price of land will be, to make it more productive. The interest of landlords will be, not in minimising, but in maximising the annual yield of the soil of England. The pheasant will no longer be a desirable customer for British-grown corn; and a large head of game will be to the landlord, what it is to the farmer, a plague of locusts. It is thus that we can best ensure the decline and fall of game-preserving with its connected evils. It will come as the incidental, but inevitable, result of that revolution in the whole business of farming and landowning which Free Trade will silently effect. In this, as in ten thousand other ways, will the repeal of the Corn Law "sweeten the breath" of society in England.

The case of the game laws is different from that of game-preserving. It does not for a moment follow that, because the landlord amusement of game-preserving is a private folly which, on the whole, legislation had better tolerate than forcibly suppress; therefore, legislation is to go out of its way to patronise and promote it. While the practice of game-preserving is but a stupid and mischievous exercise of the right of property, which we have no other title to meddle with than what the existence of the Corn Law gives us, and which will naturally die out when the Corn Law is repealed—the barbarous enactments by which this practice is specially favoured and upheld are, at all times and under all circumstances, a crying public wrong, calling for direct, immediate, and total suppression. If landlords will preserve game, let them. The hares preserved within the landlord's fences, like the rats and mice preserved behind the landlord's wainscots, are indisputably his. To come on his property is trespass—to take anything away is theft—and we have laws by which trespass and theft are punishable. But the hares and the rats still remain—in fact, in the common sense and feeling of mankind, and in the language of the law—feræ naturæ. A man may domesticate and keep them, if he can: only, if the creatures will not be kept, but break loose from their artificial and temporary appropriation, they become feræ naturæ again, and are the first man's who can catch them. This is the plain right of the case; and not all the acts of all the parliaments in creation can alter it, or alter men's sense of it. The irreconcilable contradiction of our game laws to the public conscience and opinion of our people was never better evidenced—though, in truth, it needs no evidence—than in the lately-published report of the Inspector of Prisons for the northern and eastern counties; in which we have the concurrent and emphatic testimony of the chaplains of county gaols, to the effect that, "It is quite in vain to persuade prisoners convicted of poaching that they offend God in breaking the laws of their country—they answer, the law is oppressive, and they have as much right to the game as others." One reverend gentleman, it seems (at Beccles, in Suffolk), has fairly given up the task, and contented himself with the humbler and more practical aim of "endeavouring to impress them with the idea that it is injurious to their temporal welfare, by setting the higher orders against them. Unfortunately, however, the poor fellows have their own notions on the subject of temporal welfare:—"They say it is better to do this than go into the union."

the instrument of one man's amusements on the product of another man's industry. With the game laws there is nothing to be done but totally and immediately to do away with them. Place pheasants and partridges in the same category with blackbirds and sparrows. If a man tame, feed, and keep them, they are his; if not, they are anybody's or nobody's. Give any and every man the legal, as he has the natural and moral, right to kill any and every wild noxious creature that comes in his way. The game laws never have been obeyed—never will be obeyed—by Englishmen. "Punches on the head," and "showing them the sight of their own blood," have been tried these hundreds of years, and we are still where we were. No law can be executed which is not in its nature more or less self-executory in virtue of its hold on public opinion and conscience. Showing men the sight of their own blood may make some shy, and others savage, according to temperament; but it will mend no man's notions of right and wrong.

AN HONEST CONSTITUENCY AND A WORTHY REPRESENTATIVE.

The working classes of Ashburton have paid a tribute of respect to their excellent member, James Matheson, Esq., in a manner as creditable to themselves as it must have been gratifying to the feelings of that gentleman. More than two thousand of the operatives entered into a penny subscription for the purpose of presenting their representative with a silver snuffbox, as a testimony of their respect both for his public and private character; and they transmitted it with an address equally remarkable for its truthful simplicity and sterling honesty. There is a moral value in the testimony of those pennies which far outweighs the evidence of subscriptions of larger amount: they are the witnesses of sincere conviction and unpurchased approbation—the tribute of real feeling to real worth. Stating their opinions with the manly independence of freemen, they urge upon their representative the importance of advocating Free Trade, as essential to the prosperity of the whole industrial community. They say, with equal force and clearness:—

"We consider ourselves honoured in having you for our representative in Parliament; and, without venturing to dictate, allow us humbly and earnestly to solicit you to sanction all measures bearing on 'Free Trade,' persuaded, as we are, that it is only by completely unfettering our commerce that the industrious classes will have sufficient employment, and a proper remuneration for their labour, whilst the prosperity of our country is promoted, and the welfare of mankind established."

Mr. Matheson's reply to his constituents is conceived in a kindred spirit: it manifestly flowed directly from the heart, and it goes directly to the heart. We have rarely seen a document which bears so evidently throughout the stamp and impress of conscious rectitude; and hence there is a moral power in every sentence superior in efficacy to any intellectual display or literary ornament. It is the effusion of genuine and generous feeling, united to the practical knowledge of one who has largely profited by experience. Eminent among our commercial men for his matured judgment, extensive knowledge of trade, untiring energy, and unswerving integrity, Mr. Matheson speaks on the subject of Free Trade with an authority to which monopolists, however reluctantly, must of necessity pay attention. In reply to this part of the address, he says:—

"First in the order of necessity and importance, is that which you have touched upon in your address, namely, Free Trade, meaning thereby the abolition of all merely protective duties; and I consider your advocacy of it as the strongest proof of your enlightenment; seeing that, although long since inculcated by philosophers and men of learning, it is only very recently and tardily that it has been able to overcome the old interest begotten prejudices that have unfortunately so long swayed the bulk of mankind. So prejudiced against Free Trade were the artisans of this country at a very recent period, that it was impossible for the Minister to propose the minutest abatement of protection on the most insignificant article without exciting such a violent clamour and resistance as it was for a time impossible to withstand. When we consider how powerful is the influence of large pecuniary interests to obscure the reason and cloud the judgments of men, we can hardly wonder that there should be some parties alarmed at what seems likely to injure their local and pecuniary sources of profit. But to all other minds not so fettered, the question of Free Trade must seem one of the easiest to understand, and one of the most advantageous to the world at large (but to England in particular) to carry out as speedily and extensively as possible. When it pleased the great Creator in His wisdom to produce for the habitation of man a globe marked by diversities of climate, and yielding an infinite variety of products, each in excess beyond the wants of the particular provinces in which they are found, He saw fit also, in His benevolence, to provide the means of barter and exchange between all the varied regions of the earth, by the noble rivers which form the channels of conveyance for the produce of the interior to the seacoast, and then the vast ocean as the highway between nations the most remote.

"If the inhabitants of each of these nations were restricted to the use of their own products only, and could not interchange them with others for articles differing from their own, it is clear that all countries would remain in a state of comparative barbarism, as each would be lamentably deficient in many things essential to their happiness, at the same time that they would be encumbered and burdened with far more than they needed of their own peculiar products. But if Free Trade be important to the world in general, it may be called the life-blood of England especially. In no other country of the world have there yet been made the same advances in the arts and sciences as applicable to manufacturing power; in no other country are there the same inexhaustible beds of iron and coal; in none the same amount of skill and industry, or the same extent of capital and energy, to combine all these for the production of wealth. From all which there results the daily and hourly manufacture of such a vast mass of commodities as to be beyond measure superabundant for the consumption of our own population. And it is impossible these immense manufactures and the millions of our fellow-countrymen depending upon them can be maintained, far less can they advance as they ought, without a constant and progressively expanding demand for their commodities, among the other nations of the globe. For these reasons, and a hundred others which might be added, I respond most cordially to your wish that I should sanction all measures in favour of Free Trade, to which I shall always give my constant and earnest support."

We shall not weaken the effect of this admirable reasoning by a word of superfluous comment; but we cannot help reflecting on the contrast which such honourable relations between a representative and his constituency offer to those boroughs in which voters have been induced to sell their birth-right for a mess of pottage; where the elected despises the bribed elector, and the elector, degraded in his own estimation, detests the author of his shame. We heartily join in the kindly wishes for Mr. Matheson's health and long life expressed by the honest subscribers. One such example is of more value than ten rotten constituencies are a loss; it is an example which will cause shame to the buyers and sellers of consciences, while it affords hope, assurance, and encouragement to those who are resolved to exercise honestly the franchise confided to them as a sacred trust by their country.

THE BAZAAR.

We are happy to hear from Manchester that the few observations in our last number in reference to the General Committee of the Bazaar have had the effect of directing attention to this branch of the preparations, and that during the past week there have been considerable additions to both of them.

They are, we understand, about to be published, from which we anticipate the best effects, as showing that the prevalence of comparative prosperity throughout most of the branches of manufacturing industry, whilst it does not neutralize the force or application of Free-Trade principles, has not diminished the ardour of those who have adopted them; had their zeal now suffered abatement, it would have exposed them to the charge of acting from the lowest motives, instead of an enlightened apprehension of what the necessities of the country and the laws of sound political economy alike demand.

We beg to direct the attention of our readers to the subjoined communications, especially to the two from the northern part of the island—we refer to those from Glasgow and Paisley.

The previous communications from these places certainly led us to suppose that very considerable contributions might be expected; but we were scarcely prepared for the magnificent commencement which our friends in Glasgow seem to have made,—realizing, in pecuniary contributions alone (setting aside extensive promises of aid in other ways), in a very few days and with scarcely any effort, nearly £600.

Glasgow has certainly the honour of making the first decisive movement; but we feel certain that the large manufacturing towns of Lancashire and Yorkshire, now that they are relieved from attention to the important movement in connexion with the county register, will emulate the example of the commercial capital of Scotland.

To the letter of our Paisley correspondent we refer, for the purpose of making grateful acknowledgment of the manner in which they have complied with the suggestions of the Council in two or three points,—viz. the formation of a Ladies' Local Committee, as the initial step; the furnishing a stall entirely, and with articles of local manufacture, &c., points,—these of the utmost importance, as much of the interest and success of the Bazaar depend upon the degree of attention paid to them.

As we stated last week, the difficulty of selection from our correspondence becomes daily more difficult, from its greatly increased extent; and we are obliged to restrict ourselves to those which are likely to prove suggestive, either to committees or individuals, of the best method of directing their proceedings.

"Glasgow, Jan. 27.
"DEAR SIR,—We are taking steps to procure contributions to the Bazaar, and have opened a large shop, in a central situation, where they will be received.

We are promised contributions from a great many persons. We are also applying for subscriptions, and I beg to enclose a list of those we have already obtained."

"Paisley, Jan. 23.
"DEAR SIR,—The Free-Trade Association of this place held their annual meeting on Monday last, when, among other business, the following resolutions were carried by acclamation:—

"1. That we again offer our warmest thanks to the Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League, for their continued and indefatigable exertions in the cause of Free Trade."

"2. That we highly approve of the determination of the League to hold a Bazaar in aid of the £100,000; and appoint the office-bearers and directors of this society as a committee, with power to add to their number, for the purpose of organizing a 'Ladies' Bazaar Committee' in this neighbourhood, canvassing for contributions, and otherwise co-operating with the Council of the League in this matter."

"Please convey these resolutions to the Council. Our directors met last night, when steps were taken to carry the latter of these resolutions into effect; and as soon as the Ladies' Committee is organized I will transmit you the names. We propose furnishing a table at the Bazaar, and expect, from the nature of Paisley manufacture, that it will be an attractive one. We shall have a great variety of shawls and other produce of Paisley looms, as well as fancy articles worked by the ladies."

"Please state by return the latest day that the goods must be in London; and, in fixing the date, bear in mind that no time need be lost in sorting them for sale, as we shall send them all ticketed from this, and shall engage gentlemen in London connected with our trade to price and lay them out at once."

"Regarding ladies to superintend the sale, we have not yet fixed: we rather fear that no one can be got from this; however, we shall see."

"Meantime I shall be glad to have any suggestions which you may deem of use to our committee."

"Throstle Nest, near Manchester.
"SIR,—In reply to a circular bearing your signature, received a short time ago, requesting me to contribute to the forthcoming Bazaar, to be held in May next, for the benefit of the Anti-Corn-Law League fund, I enclose a five-pound note, which I wish you to be kind enough to place to the fund for preparatory expenses. I trust you will receive many similar contributions, as the cost of decorating the theatre, erecting stalls, &c., will necessarily be heavy, and a considerable drain upon the proceeds of the Bazaar. With many thanks to the Council of the League for the great and good service which they are rendering to their fellow-countrymen,

"I remain, dear Sir, yours, &c.,

"Pontefract, Jan. 25.
"SIR,—I feel great pleasure in having to inform you, that labouring men of Pontefract, along with myself, are determined to show some respect for the League Bazaar, which will be held in London in May next. We have commenced a subscription for the above purpose, and the money which we shall collect will be laid out in liquorice cakes,—the only thing manufactured in Pontefract. We have this day ordered a quantity of tin boxes, to hold half a pound each, and covered with coloured paper with this inscription, 'Pontefract cakes, presented by the labourers of Pontefract to the League Bazaar.' This present is to be sold at the Bazaar, and I am sure will fetch a good price. They are to be manufactured by Mr. Francis Dunhill, a Free-Trader; and are to be of the best quality that can be made. I am yours, &c.,

"SIR,—I have got some autographs, which, if suited to the Bazaar, I shall be glad to send to any one authorized to receive them. One document, signed by George III., Lords North, Palmerston, &c.; another, by George III., William Pitt, and others; about fifty warrants for the payment of the troops, all bearing the sign manual of George III.; about twenty signed by the Duke of York; three by the Duke of Kent at Gibraltar; two by Sir Ralph Abercrombie; a passport signed by Prince Polignac; some letters from Wellington, Cleveland (the late), Portland (the late), Melbourne, Palmerston, Peel, and others of the nobility and members of Parliament; a few letters of R. B. Sheridan and J. P. Kemble; a check for the week's salary of Harriet Mellon (the late Duchess of St. Alban's), with her signature at the back; checks in favour of J. P. Kemble, Joe Grimaldi, and John Bannister,—each with their signature at the back.

"DEAR SIR,—As I find the Council of the League wish their intended contributors to the Bazaar to inform them of their intentions, I beg, as a warm advocate of their good cause, to state that, besides a small pecuniary donation of my own (in addition to my former subscription to the League Fund), I intend to send some few, but very neat, articles, which I think well suited for an occasion of the kind, as Mrs. D.'s offering to the benevolent object which we have all so much at heart. I shall forward the above where and at such time as you may think proper. Believe me to be, &c. &c.,

NOTES OF A TRAVELLER.—No. XVI.

"Berlin, Oct. 22, 1844.

EXPOSITION OF MANUFACTURES AT BERLIN.

The entrance to Berlin from the Anhalt-gate, where the station of the railway is situated, has nothing striking for the traveller. He traverses the new portion of the town, composed of long streets running at right angles to each other, and after following the Fredericks-strasse for about a quarter of a mile, arrives at the central part of the city, where the most interesting edifices are collected together—the Linden-promenade. Here the best hotels and the gayest shops are to be found. The neighbourhood of the Linden is the west end of Berlin. The University, the Academy of the Fine Arts, the Arsenal, the Opera-house, and the Palace of Prince Charles lie contiguous to each other at the eastern extremity of the broad street, where the lime-tree avenue, to which it owes its name, ceases. A bridge over the Spree separates these edifices from a large open space in which rows of young trees and groups of shrubs enclose a parterre prettily laid out with flowers, in the centre of which stands a large marble basin, with a fine fountain. One side of this space is occupied by the King's Palace, a fine dark-looking building, in bold Italian taste, opposite to which stands the Museum, with its noble portico. The effect produced by the vicinity of so many fine buildings is very pleasing, and although none of them can be compared with the Louvre or the Tuilleries in extent, yet one is involuntarily reminded of Paris when standing on the Schlossplatz.

This part of the city is free from the intolerable nuisance of open channels at the sides of the streets, into which the filth is poured, to stagnate, and which persecute the walker in nearly all the streets. The effluvia emitted by these open drains is so bad that, having once had occasion to traverse the whole length of the Frederick-strasse in the morning, I found it very difficult to refrain from vomiting. The width of the streets, with the circumstance that the majority of the houses are low, and do not run higher than two stories, must always prevent the constant prevalence of malignant fever in that part of the city. The condition of these streets is the worst that I have seen, nothing in Italy or in France being comparable to it. It is difficult to conceive how such a state of things can be tolerated under the eyes and—what is more—under the noses of the Monarch and all his court. In the more wholesome atmosphere of the Linden stands the Arsenal, a majestic-looking building, whose destination is intelligibly proclaimed by a profusion of trophies and of warlike implements that decorate the roof and vary the large spaces of wall that front the street. This building has been destined by the King to receive the specimens of manufacturing industry sent to Berlin for exhibition. It is an idea that does the highest credit to the royal patron of the exhibition, to display the fruits of the long peace that Germany has enjoyed in the place devoted to preparation of instruments of war. This tribute to the bias which public opinion now decidedly follows in Europe is, perhaps, the most popular act of the King since his accession to the throne.

A summons to the manufacturers of a country to send specimens of their ability to produce, and of their skill in invention or improvement, has, or ought to have, a different tendency from an accumulation of the products of industry in one spot for sale. No doubt the collection of goods at Leipzig or at Frankfurt fair, or even the contents of the shops of Berlin, present a greater variety, and even occasionally better specimens, of manufacturing skill than were deposited in the Arsenal. The object of a display like the present is to furnish an opportunity for considering the extent of the manufacturing power which a nation commands, not as regards the relation of manufacturer to consumer alone, but in as far as the Government is concerned in the prosperity of both. The King, on such an occasion, acts with prodigal as well as with dignity when he proclaims his respect for a class of subjects that is one of the firmest supports of the power and lustre of his throne. Similar declarations of respect for the manufacturing classes have been given by the Kings of France and of Belgium, and by the Emperors of Austria. The King of Prussia has united his suffrage to the rest in the most unreserved and cordial manner.

The manufacturers have, however, no right to look upon a demonstration of this kind as a one-sided or party expression of dependence on the part of the crown on them, to the exclusion of the other classes of the community. An acknowledgment of the value of their contributions to the national wealth, so far from disparaging any other class, has no meaning unless it be accompanied by evidence that the progress of the manufacturing interests goes hand in hand with all others, and that each derives benefit from the rest. This exhibition, therefore, while it afforded matter of congratulation to Germany from the progress to which it testified, contained an invitation at the same time to investigate the question in how far the interests of all classes correspond with those of the manufacturers. There were not a few, however, who did not regard it in this light, but who imagined, like the wheat-growers in England, that the weal of the nation is inseparably linked to the private gains of a few individuals. Evidence of this was given in a general evasion of the invitation issued to affix the prices to the specimens sent for exhibition. Most of the manufacturers sent their prices; but the majority of these did not like them to be publicly affixed to the goods. Many objected to their being declared upon special inquiry. The loudest objections to the publication of the manufacturing prices was, however, raised by the retailers,—a circumstance that cannot excite wonder, and which would anywhere suffice to foil the attempt to display the powers of a country with unreserved frankness. But, since an exhibition without published prices is a mere scenic decoration, it would be useless to enter into a minute examination of products whose value is either concealed, or is declared under the modifications prescribed by the considerations I have suggested. The exhibition is, however, not a wasted exertion; nor is there any want of objects to draw the attention of the inquiring visitor although he must content himself with general conclusions, and is precluded from entering into details. Wherever I mention prices in my remarks, they must be understood to express the current prices of similar articles, which my experience in these matters enables me to quote. In cases where a price has been affixed to the exhibited article, I shall especially note it.

The first impression that is produced on the stranger on entering the large saloon on the ground-floor of the building is one that he cannot divest himself of afterwards. The leading feature of the exhibition is the evident advantage that is on the side of the Germans in all articles requiring hand labour and artistic skill; and this advantage contrasts strongly with the difficulty that evidently presents itself when the scale of production swells into a manufacture. The lower saloon was half filled with carriages sent from the coachmaking establishments of Berlin and other large towns. The shapes were, generally, tasteful; and nearly all the improved constructions, with double springs, patent axles, &c., were represented. The prices of these articles of convenience and luxury are remarkably moderate when contrasted with English prices. For £60 a handsome, well-constructed calèche or britzka can be purchased, of Vienna build. A close carriage costs at Vienna from £100 to £150. The next most celebrated place for carriage-building is Offenbach, near Frankfort-on-the-Maine. There, and at Munich, the prices are somewhat higher than at Vienna; and at Berlin the difference may be estimated at nearly 50 per cent. over the Vienna prices. The abundance of wood, and the cheapness of the Styrian steel and iron, are the causes of the cheapness of the Vienna carriages. Berlin has not the command of either cheap wood or steel, and prices are, consequently, higher than either at Vienna or at Offenbach, although lower than in London. The difference is to be ascribed to the smaller remuneration expected by all handicraftsmen and designers in Germany than in England, and sufficiently illustrates the position of the producing classes in the two countries.

Adjacent to the carriages stood specimens of locomotive engines and other steam-engines. Amongst these a steam-engine with oscillating boilers and "expansion variable," from the works of Lindner and Hoppe, at Berlin, and one with fixed boilers and expansion, were well put out of hand. These, and several others from the great works of Daniels, Huysgens, and Co., on the Lower Rhine, prove sufficiently that the German mechanists can produce superior machinery if they find it worth their while. Evidence of the same kind was afforded by the printing cylinders, "perrotines," one of which, by Oppen, of Berlin, prints with five colours; and the machinery for cotton, wool, and flax spinning and weaving, of which there were numerous specimens. That it is, however, not always worth their while is testified by the not inconsiderable importation of machinery and other iron wares which takes place, as well as the difficulty with which manufactures of all kinds, chiefly from the scarcity and high prices of machinery, are established in Germany. The average of two recent periods of three years each show that the importation of rolled and hammered iron, suited to the fabrication of machinery, has of late years greatly increased, notwithstanding the increase in the domestic production of the country.

M. Diederici's new publication states the quantity of rolled and hammered iron to have increased as follows, in Prussia:—

1841 .. ..	1,537,454 "
1842 .. ..	1,541,461 "

The three years' average of the quantity imported shows an increase of:—

1837 to 1839 .. ..	16,211 cwt.
1810 to 1812 .. ..	35,452 "

These figures throw strong light on the wants of the mechanics of all descriptions in Germany, and make the policy of the late addition to the import duty on this description of iron appear very questionable. What the ironworker gains by the protection is clearly at the cost of the mechanist and the manufacturer.

Iron is so weighty a lever of production in an age that depends upon machinery, that I cannot avoid extracting a remark of M. Diederici that clearly points out the state of things in Prussia. The author remarks, "The proprietors of iron foundries have been gainers; they now produce as 120 to 100 when compared with their former production (1,514,829 cwt., instead of 1,246,416 cwt.); and yet the demand for bar iron has increased so much that, were they to satisfy the general demand, they would have to extend their establishments in the ratio of at least four to five, perhaps even of three to four. Since they cannot increase their establishments on this scale, the deficiency cannot but be drawn from England, and promises to extend rapidly."

The quantity of sheet iron produced between 1840 and 1842 has declined from the average of 1837 to 1839 in the proportion of 14,644 cwt. to 11,122 cwt.; and the importation has experienced an apparently similar decrease, having in 1839 been 21,680 cwt., and in 1842 only 14,083 cwt. Previous to 1840, anchors and chain cables were, strangely enough, included under this head, but are now classed with other articles of wrought iron, the importation of which has increased from 437,074 cwt. in 1840, to 933,598 cwt. in 1842. The greater part of this increase is in rails. In general the importation has exceeded the domestic production in its growth within the last three years; but to this may perhaps be ascribed the improvement here displayed in the construction of machinery. In the increased duty, lately imposed, the Government chose between the interests of the producers and the adapters, to the manifest disadvantage of the latter.

The German iron establishments were numerous represented at the exhibition. Besides the imperial and royal foundries and mining works in Stiria, Bohemia, the Hartz, Silesia, and Saxony, numerous private works in Silesia, Hanover, Saxony, Nassau, and the Lower Rhine districts sent samples of their produce. The prices may be best estimated from M. Diederici's estimate, which is as follows:—"Raw iron and native steel, £4. 10s.; cast iron wares, £12; wrought iron, including bar iron, £15; steel, cast and in bars, £21; sheet iron, £27; iron and steel ware, £30 per ton." That with such prices there should be an outcry for more protection is less surprising than that the Government should be so weak as to grant it. Still high as these prices appear, there are sides of the iron trade that deserve the particular attention both of traders and of governments, and that have been hitherto wholly neglected in international arrangements. The art of casting iron has been brought to great perfection in Germany. The chemical skill of the founders enables them, by simple processes, to produce specimens of wonderfully delicate workmanship, not only in ornaments and figures, but especially in plates, which are cast with great accuracy of a large size. The price for cast iron quoted above stands in a remarkable contrast with that of bar iron, although the quality of both is superior to that produced in England. In one article the superiority of the German iron is so remarkable, that it becomes almost a matter of humanity to call attention to it. In stoves it is free from that disagreeable smell which has rendered the general adoption of stoves in England almost impossible. In this respect the stoves produced in Austria, in Nassau, and on the Rhine are deserving of peculiar notice; and it is sincerely to be lamented that the trading relations of the two countries do not favour an exchange which would allow the poorer classes in England the enjoyment of the advantages which Dr. Arnott's and other inventors' skill has long been unable to procure for them for want of a fit material.

Besides cast-iron stoves, the native steel, which has long been prepared in Stiria and on the Rhine, especially in the district of Siegen, is well adapted to form an object of commerce, and, if produced on a larger scale, assisted by the cheapness which would result from the admission of our ordinary iron at a low duty, would greatly contribute to enrich both countries. I shall be too happy if these remarks induce any persons interested in the iron trade to make experiments with the German cast iron, for which I venture to predict a larger market in England as soon as it has been fairly tried.

Sollingen sent its sword blades and other cutlery, for the manufacture of which, as I remarked in a former letter, its advantages lie in the native steel of Siegen. Some of these objects, and especially the needles that were exhibited, were sent with the English manufacturing marks and labels, which the dealers are in the habit of imitating. The arrival of these goods caused a discussion respecting the propriety of exhibiting them in such a state, which was decided in favour of their exhibition on the following singular grounds. The commission assumed that the articles thus marked were equal in quality to the English goods which they represented, and that the iniquitous practice of the forgers was one for which they were not responsible, but which the public had to answer for, whose absurd predilection in favour of English goods occasioned the deceit. A better argument would have been, that the fols made in England and France all bear the mark of Sollingen, and that the deceit was in so far only retaliation, although unjustifiable. Gun and pistol barrels were sent from various quarters, but the prices were mostly higher than those of Liege.

A round table, of a beautiful open arabesque pattern, in cast iron, and with ornamental claw-foot, from the foundry of Count Stolberg, was marked at 20 dollars (£3). It was 3½ feet in diameter, and weighed 50 lbs. Garden chairs to match were marked at 5 dollars (15s.) each.

Pumps of various kinds, forcing pumps, fire and garden engines, were exhibited, of good manufacture and at reasonable prices. The castings for architectural purposes were both tasteful and well executed, and showed to what extent iron can be used in building with great advantage. For the designs required for ornamental casting the German founder has an advantage, in the case with which he commands the aid of artists. Other metals were also exhibited as applied to the same use. Figures and arabesque designs in zinc, as well as capitals of pillars, rivalled with similar productions in terra cotta. Both have contributed to the embellishment of Berlin, and have assisted the execution of some of the tasteful designs of the celebrated architect, Schinkel. I was told that the capitals of the pillars and pilasters of the Opera-house (which is rebuilding) are of zinc. The small figures and ornaments that go by the name of Berlin iron work are well known. The chief seat of this manufacture is in the principality of Sayn, near the Rhine. The manufacture of tools has made considerable progress of late years in Germany, and many large establishments on the English plan may furnish a considerable supply. The abundance of the native steel is of advantage for this branch of manufacture; but the difficulty of a factory organization, and the great demand for the raw material, keep the prices high. This is still more the case with agricultural implements, which were scarcely exhibited. So great is the demand for iron of all kinds in Germany, that I remember having been shown rails at Vienna that were made of the Stirian native steel, and which might have been cut up into knife blades.

The new fabrication from nickel, called "German silver," is extensively carried on at Berlin, and numerous objects were exhibited. A method is now adopted of combining the nickel with native arsenic, by which the use of the poisonous arsenic oxyde is avoided, and the mixture is rendered harmless. Nickel has become an object of mining interest, in consequence of the growth of this manufacture, and is extracted in many parts of central Germany: it is in great demand and keeps high in price.

The lower saloon contained also specimens of terra cotta and earthenware, for ornamental stoves and chimney-pieces, in the place of marble. Those which were burnt without glazing had the advantage of a sharper finish, which improved the effect; and, as the cast admits of being retouched by the master's hand before the piece is sent to the furnace, they can be brought within the sphere of works of art. The various styles of wood and stone were well imitated in some of these terra cottas, but their price was higher than would be necessary if this style of ornament was in general demand. The Egyptian and Chinese specimens were exhibited in the upper story, which I found laid out both tastefully and very much to the purpose. A large central apartment was surrounded by a continuous gallery, of sufficient breadth to allow the visitors to circulate without crowding between the stalls that were erected against the wall on one side, and those placed between the windows on the other. The great elevation of the roof was turned to account for draperies and the display of ornamental woven designs, which could not otherwise well have been spread out. The light was generally sufficient, although here and there more would have been desirable, even at the sacrifice of some of the many transparent blinds that covered the windows, but which showed neither novelty nor much taste. The specimens of stained glass—an art that has been fully restored in Germany—were neither numerous nor brilliant. Better may every day be seen at Freiburg, Mueb, and Nuremberg.

ELEVENTH LETTER.

Shaftesbury, Dorset.

This is a small town, producing one member of Parliament, situated on a hill in the western part of the county, close to the border of Wiltshire, and not far from Somerset. It contains 3170 inhabitants; gives the title of earl to the Ashley family; and has the head of that house for lord of the manor. The greater part of the land around belongs, however, to other proprietors.

There is little to be said of this district which may not be said of the whole county,—which, indeed, has been said,—that is, wages are low and difficult to get. Married men receive upon an average, supposing them to be in full work, 7s. a week. Single men find work difficult to obtain, and 5s. a week is fully above their average earnings. I was sitting in one of the inns here two days ago, when a man in the clothing of a farm-labourer came and inquired of me. I had seen him before, and he told me that he had come to look for me, and to beg of me that what he had told when I saw him in his house at home might not be put in the papers. The things that had been said of the parish next to his, and of the poverty of the families I had met in it, had been a "terrible misfortune." The master had been at his men at a "terrible rate;" and his relationship had been, or had sent, the man did not know what to master; "but, whichever it were, master swore that every one of them would be turned away and put on the roads or in the workhouse, and Lord Shaftesbury would turn them out of their houses, for telling such lies as they had told to persons that put what they said in the newspapers." He begged, for the love of Heaven, that his name might not be mentioned. And then he told me of the unfortunate consequences that would ensue if it should be known that he had made any complaints.

Thus, it will be observed, that to write from Dorset, at least from some estates, is a difficult matter. If we write of a tenant's misdeeds, people say, "This may be true, but it is not true without a name of person and place, we cannot verify it." On the other hand, give the names of places and places, and instantly gentlemen leave the fox-hounds, and retreat from their visits of hospitality to the poor labourers. Stewards are called in. Consultations are held. Missives are sent to tenant-farmers, and a liveryed groom is seen galloping through the village, and calling at a farmer's house, and from that, at the parson's, and next at the house of the farmer, who lives out of the village. The parson sends in all haste for the road-surveyor who employs the five-shillings-a-week men on the roads. And, whether by accident or design, parson, surveyor, farmers, and steward, who is seldom seen there, all meet during the forenoon.

The women look out of windows and ask what is it all about? It must mean something. It must mean that we are all going to get something, a hundred of coals, or perhaps a blanket, or a sheet, or a shirt; or, mayhap, we are to have our houses thatched. "Would it not be glorious news if at last, in this cold weather, we was to have them old houses thatched? Who knows but the gentleman as was here two weeks ago, writing in a book about the houses with rotten thatch, and windows without glass, and doors that do not keep out the wind; and who asked about our wages and our victuals; who knows but he was sent here to see how things was, to have things made right. What a good thing it will be for we if it so be that he has told what he saw of our poor way of living—hardly enough of potatoes, and not half enough of bread. Potatoes for the breakfast of the father of a family who goes out to the fields to plough, a bit of dry bread with him, and nothing but 'tatoes when he come home again of a night. What a good thing it will be if the stranger gentleman have told his lordship, and all the rest of them as have working people starving as we be, how bad we be for clothes to keep us warm in this terrible weather."

Such is the talk of the women who look out of windows, and see the meeting of farmers, parson, surveyor, and head steward. What the different working men may have had said to them by one or other of these gentlemen during the day need not be particularized; but the men from the outfield and the barn, and the turnpike road and gravel pit, have not listened half a minute to the pleasant surmises of their wives on going home in the evening,—pleasant surmises about presents of blankets, and new thatch and new doors, all to keep out the cold—pleasant surmises about a load of fagots, or a quarter of coals, or a gallon of flour, or a piece of bacon, to make the first month of the new year a welcome one—pleasant surmises about what the "stranger gentleman" whom his lordship, and the other lords who are said to be careful inquirers into the state of the poor in "other parts," have most probably sent here,—the husbands have not listened a minute to such surmises of their wives when they interrupt and say, "Never let no stranger gentleman be seen speaking to you about we again; us be all to be turned away that be found out to have spoken a word with that stranger; us on the farm will be turned on the roads; us in his lordship's houses to be turned out. Oh! there be a terrible piece of work about telling of how badly off us be to that stranger man."

Next comes Sunday, and the church and its one service. Most of the churches have but one service in the parishes now referred to. The land and the houses belong to one or two persons only, and they admit no dissenters; consequently the churches have no rivals, and they take it easy. There is only one sermon, but it is devoted entirely on this, the Sunday following the visit of the liveryed groom to the parson, to the doctrine of the duty of contentment, each man with his lot as he finds it in this world. The duty to superiors is largely dwelt upon, and the great sin against God, of not being submissive to those whom He has set over us. The text is from the Book of Job, and patience is the burden of it. The sin of grumbling is depicted as one of the blackest; the iniquity of not remembering that we live in a land, compared with which every other on the face of the earth is heathenish, is dwelt upon. All the wealth and luxuries of the world would be no recompense to a people deprived of the privilege of the church.

And the people return to their houses, notwithstanding this sermon, not too well satisfied with the thatch that lets in the rain, the broken windows that let in the wind, the wet floors that let in the water, the dry bread and cheese which, as on work days, is still the dinner; not too well satisfied with the blessings which 6s. (the average of wages) afford. Some even doubt if the pulpit be the right place for preaching contentment with such a worldly lot. But they know there is a stronger power than that of the pulpit—the power of sending them to the roads if they grumble on the farm, and from the roads to the treadmill if they "refuse to work and maintain their families." So they receive the sermon from the text in Job, like any other sermon, and go to their homes and put wisps of straw or pieces of turf in the holes of the doors to keep the wind out, and sit close together to keep the little fire in the large fireplace warm, and resolve not to run the risk of losing their work on the farm and their residence in one of his lordship's houses, by complaining again of their hard lot to any stranger who may come about.

The poor man who came to me in Shaftesbury did not belong to the parish here indicated. I saw him in another near it. It was from hearing what had happened there that he sought for me, to beg I might not say anything of him or his family to endanger his seven shillings a week. Whether he had any business in the market for himself or his master, or whether for himself or for some one else he journeyed to Shaftesbury to look for me, hearing I was there, I cannot say. I have some reason to believe that he was sent on that business. There are good technicians in Dorset—good in their own way; and they, likely enough, thought the best way was to first threaten such a man as this, knowing he had made a statement, and then suggest to him the propriety of withdrawing his statement. He could only succeed in this by expressing fear of the consequences of its publication. The parties concerned are welcome to put what interpretation on its withdrawal they choose.

I went back to the district to learn how far all this was true or not true; and to my very great sorrow I found that it was more than true.

Who the parties actually concerned in threatening, and in causing threats to be used against the labourers and their wives, who stated the amount of their earnings and their manner of living, might be I cannot say. But the labourers are either in a compact to deceive, or they have been threatened—they say they have. It may be remembered that in Pentridge parish—all of which belongs to the Ashley family, who have their title from where I now write, as already observed—I saw the family of the Framptons: the father working on the farm for 7s. a week; the mother and eldest daughter, only a child, out in the fields picking stones for the roads on a cold wet day—frost, wind, and rain striving for the mastery; the other children, four in number, at home without food, huddled on a hearth without a fire, save what might be put on top of a pipe to light it—literally not more. It may be recollected that I spoke of their house—Lord Shaftesbury's house,—the walls of which were not amiss, but the roof of which, for want of thatch, was like a rotten sponge, under one corner of which was a piece of canvas, waterproof, to keep out the wet; and under which was the lair or bed of the family.

These people, the Framptons, because of what I said, have been—what shall I call it?—they have been "taken into consideration." There has not been any straw sent to thatch the roof; not any more waterproof canvas given to keep the rain out of the bedroom; not any firing; not any clothing; not any advance of wages; nor yet gratuitous bread. But that noble family, so remarkable for humanity to women, have caused it to be intimated, since I wrote what I wrote, published what I published, that it is wrong for such a woman as Mrs. Frampton, mother of a large family of young children, to be allowed to go out to pick stones for the roads on a wet wintry day, and they, herself and child, should be restrained from so doing.

They, who had no bread in the house while they did go out to gather stones, are to be restrained from getting the pence they earned thereby, because it is shocking to the feelings that women and children should be so employed.

It is shocking. It was shocking to my feelings. But it was infinitely more shocking that, with all this additional work, there was not enough of bread for the family—bare bread,—and all the potatoes, as the little girl Jane said, were done. "All the 'tatoes were done before Christmas, and they had no bread in the house."

It is shocking. It must be shocking to the noble lord most concerned in the land, to see the grandeur of his own family supported out of such human suffering; and he and his family are accordingly desirous, and prompt in their desires, to hide it. "Stop the women from working." It is not, "Untax the bread, and make it less a struggle of life and death for them to work to get bread." It is not, "Restore to these people the common rights torn from them when we divided Cranborne Chase." It is not, "Give our tenants power to employ more people at more wages, by relaxing our political hold of them—our tenant-at-will hold for political purposes. It is, "Call in the women from the fields: do not let them be seen."

TWELFTH LETTER.

Shaftesbury, Dorset.

There is a village called Dinton, some miles from here, on the Wiltshire border of the Downs. The place has spoken of me on the Dorset side. Dinton is on the road from Salisbury. I believe it belongs chiefly to the Wyndhams. There, as elsewhere among labourers, you cannot look around you without seeing poverty; the hardest task is to look for and find anything else. My attention was drawn to Joseph Yates's family. His wife was delivered of twins a few weeks back. These twins added to the family made nine children: one of them is since dead. The poor woman is still in a painful state, a severe operation having been performed before the birth could be effected. It is a bare country for fuel about Dinton, and a poor country for wages. The Wyndham property is all mortgaged. Tenures are insecure, farming is bad, employment scarce, and Joseph Yates receives only 7s. a week, the wages of the district. Of this income 1s. a week goes for rent of house. There is only 6s. a week for this large family to live upon, all of which is expended on the articles of bread and potatoes and salt. They can never get enough of either bread or potatoes. They can get no clothing, and consequently are next to going without it.

When the poor mother was taken ill in the pains of labour, they had neither firing nor candle in the house. For the rent of 1s. a week they have only two small apartments to dwell in, which will not allow an ordinary-sized man to stand upright. And in there, almost without furniture, the nine of a family were crowded together before the twins were born, and during the painful trials of the mother, and almost without food.

It is unnecessary to say, and yet it may be said, that the foxhounds and the hunters kept here, mortgaged as the estate is, are as well lodged and cared for as any other hounds and hunters; therefore, the indebtedness of the estate cannot be pleaded as a reason for the very small wages and the very small house of Joseph Yates and all the other labourers of Dinton.

That the ever-delusive Corn Laws, from the first to the last of them, have caused the borrowers and the lenders on landed property to do what they never would have done, had land been left to its fair worth, by its produce going fairly into the market to be sold at its real value, is true beyond any question. It is proved here. The late Mr. Wyndham, M.P. for Salisbury, whose property Dinton was, mortgaged it beyond its real worth, depending on high prices. And now his family, and also the mortgagees, find to their cost that less money borrowed and less lent would have been a comfortable condition for all of them at present, compared with the mess they are in.

There is much good land in the parish. But the land, like those who live on it, is sadly neglected, and out of order.

I hope poor Yates will not be troubled about what I have here said of his family and their want of bread. Least he be, I may state that he cannot help what is here stated, for I have never seen him. After learning the result on the Shaftesbury property of my giving the names of persons who tell what wages they get, what food they eat, and how "terrible hard it be to keep life in their bodies," I have been cautious not to compromise other poor fellows. It may be a hard matter for the eight children of Yates and his troubled wife and himself to live on 6s. a week, after paying the weekly rent of 1s. But it would be harder still to be sent on the roads at 5s. a week as a punishment for talking with, and complaining to, a stranger of the inadequacy of 6s. a week. I do not say that any Wyndham, or agent or tenant or person or road-surveyor of a Wyndham, would do so; but they might do as the agent and tenant and person and road-wardens of the Ashley, neighbours of the Wyndhams, threaten to do. It is best, therefore, not to put too much in their power.

THIRTEENTH LETTER.

Shaftesbury.

In this letter I wish to refer for a few minutes to the game question. I stated in the two foregoing letters that I returned to that district of Dorset bordering on Wilts and Hampshire, after hearing of the income taken to punish farming men for saying they were not well enough paid and fed. On my return I also heard that much strife and trouble was stirred up about the statement I had made of game being sold in Salisbury, to the injury of the farmers' wives and others who had fowls to sell.

1st. It is "indignantly denied" that Lord Normanton has ever sold game, and put the money in his pocket. I never said he did.

2nd. It is equally denied, though not so publicly, that the Hon. Sidney Herbert ever sold game and pocketed the money. I did not say he did.

I have not heard of any denial as regards the family of Lord Nelson; but, as Trafalgar Park was one of those mentioned as furnishing Salisbury market with game, it may be denied that Lord Nelson, or any of his family, sell game and pocket the money. I never said they did.

What I did say might have been said of all the game-preservers in the south-west. But these three were mentioned merely as specimens, because they were near Salisbury; and they were mentioned because two tenant-farmers on Lord Normanton's estate mentioned them to me.

These two farmers were not friends of the opinions which I hold on Free Trade. They were both Corn-Law men, and in politics Tories. They were speaking of the great support the farmers of England had given at all times to the aristocracy, and the ungracious return made to them. They were talking, and wholly of their own accord, of the want of sympathy on the part of the landlords towards the tenants, and instanced their own landlord, the Earl of Normanton. They would not go with me for fear of being seen; but they told me where I might go and see a field of Swedish turnips belonging to a farmer, worth £6 or £7 per acre two months ago, which were now as if twenty sheep to the acre had been on them for a week, though no sheep had been on them at all, only Lord Normanton's hares. They told me of the tenant, and where I might see him, who sowed twelve acres of oats this year, and, because of game, did not get more than a third part of the seed for a crop, and yet had to pay full rent to Lord Normanton. They told me of several other cases which I mentioned, and of some which I omitted; and, in answer to a question from me, one of them said that there were many ways in which game injured them, besides its destruction of crops, or its spread of crime by creating poachers, or its increase of the county rates for prosecuting poachers, or its increase of pauperism by sending the families of men in prison to the workhouse. This tenant said that he could name "at least twenty ways in which he and his workmen, and the country in general, were injured by the game." I asked him to specify some of the ways in which he and his workmen were injured, and which did not come under the heads of evil already stated; that is, increase of crime; increase of taxes; and injury to crops.

He then went on to show me how his threshers were injured by having to thresh the same quantity of straw for a less quantity of grain, they being paid by the bushel. In summer, he said, the hares bit the straw in the middle, partly with a design to eat, but more frequently in play.

If the ear was already shot from the blade, the growth stopped and the ear whitened and appeared ripe without grain. If the hares bit the stalk before the ear was shot, a new stalk was commonly sent up, and a new ear which was green and unfilled when the others were ripe. Being cut green it produced nothing. He said that on several of his fields he could prove that a third part of his crops this year had been lost by the hares and by the pheasants, to say nothing of the seed picked up by the latter when first sown. So that, added he, I do not only lose part of my crops, and am then less able to pay for labour, but my men in the barn have to thresh at straw which does not produce them for wages more in ten hours than it should do in six and a half or seven hours.

I then asked him for some others of his twenty evils; and he proceeded to show me how the farmyard poultry did not meet a good market, because the game was there before it. He referred to a case within his own knowledge in which a farmer's wife, with a good yard of poultry, hearing that on the previous week fowls were in demand at Salisbury, sent a quantity, that she might get some ready cash. But between the previous market-day and that on which she sent her fowls there had been a great battue in some of Lord Normanton's preserves, and the market was filled with game, to the almost total exclusion of fowls at any price. The next week it was the same, and the next and the next; and so it had continued up to Christmas, or nearly, because all the great game-preservers were having their annual slaughters.

In course of conversation the different game-slayers whom I named were spoken of as those who had been killing very large quantities of game; and I have learned since, and from other sources, that the Hon. Sidney Herbert killed in one day, in one preserve near Wilton, 146 head of game.

It was neither affirmed nor denied in the conversation that Lord Normanton sent the game to market and pocketed the money. The topic was not introduced. Nor did I, in making a statement, less particular than I now make, mean it to be understood as a charge against either of the parties named that they kept, killed, and sold game for money. The question under notice was, that game was sold after the great battues, and by its plentifulness excluded poultry from the market.

And this, after careful inquiry, I repeat. It may be true to the very letter that the money does not reach the pockets of Lord Normanton or Mr. Herbert. They make a great slaughter of game; and what is not required for their own tables, and as presents for a few friends in town, is left for the gamekeepers and stewards to distribute amongst poorer neighbours. How it is distributed, and how used by those who get it, cannot be very minutely particularized. But it is just as true as Tuesday comes and brings Salisbury market; or that coaches and vans go through Ringwood to Southampton carrying parcels for London, that each great slaughter day is followed with a large supply of game for market.

I have been careful upon this subject; and a dealer, who buys more than any other single person for Salisbury, smiles at the "indignant denials" of Lord Normanton's servants, and says that, wherever the money goes, he pays for the game; and if he hears of a shooting party going out to some new preserve, he lays his plans accordingly. He knows a large quantity of the game will reach him through some channel or other.

And now a word about my informants. A gentleman in Fordingbridge (who is, I believe, a tenant of Lord Normanton) has been fixed upon by the steward of that nobleman—so some friends of mine who were present at the scene in Ringwood market have informed me—as the writer, or informant of the writer, of the letters in the LEAGUE, which letters have become locally important by their republication in some of the local papers.

That gentleman is too well known for his high personal integrity and straightforward conduct to need any defence from me. But he was not my informant. The persons who talked to me of the prodigious mischief done by Lord Normanton's game, were, with one exception, Lord Normanton's tenants, and all of them persons unfriendly to me, in so far as I am not friendly to the Corn Law. They were persons who dread the name of the League, or who did dread it until the League became their friend on the game question.

When the steward attacked the gentleman of Fordingbridge, in Ringwood, and told him, in the hearing of a dozen or more tenants of Lord Normanton, that "the letters in the League were a d—d lie," the farmers listening called out, "It is true, every word; and much more might have been said." And one of them thereon observed, "I cannot speak of the selling of the game as a thing within my own knowledge; but this I know, that every other particular is true; and if I had seen the person who wrote the letters in the LEAGUE, I would have told him of twenty other cases of hardship on Lord Normanton's estate, some of them much worse than any stated by him."

I again repeat that the very tenants of his lordship who are usually most unwilling to say a word against a steward or a steward's master, were my informants; and they have told the steward to his face, in the open market-place, that the twelfth part of the truth was not told. But I leave them to settle the matter themselves.

The Birmingham Journal states, that the subscriptions in that town, in aid of public walks and baths, now amount to £5000.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, January 27.—Before the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, Mr. Justice MAULE, Mr. Justice CRESSWELL, and Mr. Justice ERLE.

CITY OF BRISTOL.

Daniel, appellant; Jackson, respondent.

In this case the appellant objected to a person named William Camplin, who claimed as occupier of a house and shop in High-street, Bristol. It appeared that he occupied the premises jointly with another person; and the objection to his qualification was, that he ought to have described himself as a joint, and not as the sole, occupier of the house and shop. The revising barrister overruled the objection, and retained his name on the list of voters. The question for the consideration of the court was whether the qualification was properly described or not.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL: It appears to me that the decision of the revising barrister is right. The objection to the vote of the claimant was, that upon the list made out by the overseers the nature of his qualification was improperly described; that which was mentioned in the list was for occupation, namely, "William Camplin—High street—house and shop in High-street." The objection was, that it ought to have been "joint occupation of house and shop." The question is whether the statute requires it in the claim made by the party, or the list made out by the overseers. I think we have no right to alter the form from that given in the act. The act requires that the claim shall be entered in the list; and such list is to be made out from the claim according to the form given in schedule B of the Registration Act. And if we look to that form, No. 8, it is a list of claimants to be published by the overseers; and if there had been no guide as to the manner the subject-matter was to be inserted, under the words "nature of qualification," there might have been some doubt; but, upon looking to the preceding statute, 2 Wm. IV., c. 45, and to the schedule I. in the appendix, there, under the words "nature of qualification," is inserted "house, warehouse, shop, counting house,"—that is the subject-matter for which the vote is claimed, and those are the words that are used in the body of the section that directs the list to be made out; therefore, if he complies with that form, he has done all he is required to do. It is objected that he ought to have stated it as "joint occupier," that would be the interest he had in the property, and not the subject-matter. The 27th section of the Reform Act gives the right of voting to persons claiming as "owners or tenants;" and therefore he has to state in respect of which he claims, not whether he claims as a joint tenant, but as owner or tenant. I therefore think that the claimant and the overseers have complied with the requisites of the act, in following the form given, namely, "nature of qualification," as it is there expressed, and that the claimant had a right to vote.

The other judges were of the same opinion.—Decision affirmed.

BOROUGH OF BLACKBURN.

Dewhurst, appellant; Fielden, respondent.

Joseph Fielden, described on the list of voters as "Joseph Fielden, of Wilton," was objected to as not being entitled to have his name retained upon the list of voters for the borough of Blackburn, in respect of occupation, described in the list as "joiner's shop, warehouse, and land, in Thunder and Back-lane." Joseph Fielden has, together with his uncle, jointly occupied as owners, for a time sufficiently long to confer a vote (as far as regards the mere question of time of occupation), the joiner's shop in Back-lane, worth by itself under £20 a year, and the warehouse in Thunder, worth £11 a year, besides two yards in Thunder, occupied for the deposit of stones, &c.; the two yards being worth about £5 a year. These several premises are the joint property of himself and his uncle, and occupied jointly in manner before stated. The joiner's shop, yards, and warehouse are worth together above £20 a year; but the joiner's shop alone is not worth £20 a year; and the warehouse and yards alone are together not worth, independently of the joiner's shop, £20 a year. Thunder, where the warehouse and two yards are situate, is three hundred yards' distance from the joiner's shop; there are many buildings and other descriptions of property lying between the joiner's shop in Back-lane and the warehouse and yards in Thunder, which premises, so lying between the two, are the property and in the occupation of other and different persons. If the premises in Back-lane and those in Thunder can be united, so as to confer a vote on the respondent, they are of more than sufficient value for that purpose; but if they cannot be united for that purpose, then the joiner's shop is of insufficient value to confer the vote on the respondent; and the warehouse and yards in Thunder are also of insufficient value to confer a vote. The revising barrister decided that the respondent occupied a joiner's shop, warehouse, and land sufficient to entitle his name to be retained on the list within the meaning of the 27th section of 2 Wm. IV., c. 45.

Mr. COCKBURN, Q.C., appeared for the appellant; and Mr. SERGEANT KINGLAKE for the respondent.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL: I am of opinion that the revising barrister has come to a wrong decision. The 27th section of 2 Wm. IV., c. 45, gives the right of voting to occupiers; it goes on to specify that he occupies either as owner or tenant; then, when it describes the subject-matter, that which he is to occupy, it says, occupy "as owner or tenant any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building." Now, the first observation upon the very surface of it, is this, that all these words are in the singular number; and it would have been just as easy, if the Legislature had intended that when several of these distinct subject-matters might together make a sufficient qualification, to have used the plural number, as houses, warehouses, counting-houses, shops, or other buildings; but the section does not stop there, but it goes on to state, that when the subject-matter of a shop, warehouse, or other building should not amount to the sum of £10, it may be made up by the occupation of land in conjunction with it. Now, it seems to me that the ordinary construction of the very act of the Legislature expressio unius est exclusio alterius. And in this case we cannot see why they should mention a joint occupation of land, unless there had been an exclusion of a joint occupation of another house, another warehouse, another counting-house, another shop, or another building. The argument here comes old from the same, viz. that in which description the house, definite several the case, may very who occup condition Whereas, small and to add and we think reversed. This app before the Feb. 13, to which stand in which the list is to be made out. It is evident the description of the property—street, lane, and number of the house, and other things—points more to a single and definite subject-matter than that which is composed of several things. After all we think, on consideration of the case, that the construction is just and proper; for it may very well be that the Legislature intended that a man who occupied a house worth £10 might be in a proper condition of life to give his vote on these occasions. Whereas, if this was made up of a very large number of small and worthless tenements, he should not be allowed to add and eke them, to make up the £10. On the whole we think this claimant had no right to vote.—Decision reversed.

This appeal terminated the list of registration appeals before the court. The court has appointed Thursday, Feb. 13, to deliver judgment on the registration appeals which stand over.

THE BETHNAL-GREEN COMPOUND HOUSE-HOLDERS' REGISTRATION ASSOCIATION.

A general meeting of the members of this association was held at the close of the last year, at the Royal Oak, Abbey-street, Bethnal-green-road. Mr. Joseph Dean in the chair.

A report of the proceedings of the committee was delivered by Mr. MANLEY, which was received with great applause, and appeared to give universal satisfaction.

Of this report the following is an abstract:—

"The parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, contains a dense population of 73,000 souls, the great body of whom are toil-worn artisans, of whom 2000 are compound house-holders, or occupiers of houses for which the landlords pay the poor's-rate; whose united earnings amount, at the least, to £120,000 a year, and most of whom are entitled by the Reform Act, if they legally claim, to a vote in the election of the parliamentary representatives of the Tower Hamlets. A considerable portion of the house-holders were early alive to their rights, and made their claim in 1832; but, from some informality in their proceedings, were not put upon the register. Discouraged by want of success, the matter slumbered till 1811, when the general election once more aroused the energy of the non-electors to the formation of this society, 100 of whose members in that year claimed to be rated to the poor, and subsequently to be put upon the register of voters. In the revision court of 1842, Alfred Austin, Esq., the presiding barrister, admitted 99 of these claimants, and registered their names as voters for the borough. In 1843, notwithstanding the proved legality of their claims, all these names were left off the list of voters. Of these, about 70 reclaimed to be placed on the register; the remainder, being disheartened by their previous disappointment, neglected to claim. At the revising barrister's court of the same year, 60 were again admitted to the condition of freemen, the others having been disqualified by removals. Notwithstanding this second legalization of their claims, the names of this band of pioneers was again left off the register in 1844; but having once more reclaimed, they were admitted by the revising barrister, Mr. Moylan. The indomitable energy and perseverance of these men have at length established their right to the possession of the franchise. All opposition has been withdrawn; and future legal claimants have no reason to expect that any obstacle will be thrown in the way of their enfranchisement. The association has now upwards of 200 members whose names are inserted in the poor-rate book, and who will therefore be qualified to be placed on the register of 1845."

This report having been received and adopted, the following resolutions were moved, seconded, and carried unanimously:—

1. That the auditors' report be approved.
2. That the best thanks of this meeting be given to the Liberal members of the vestry of this parish, who, by their votes and interest in behalf of the objects of this association, have materially contributed to the success which has attended our efforts.
3. That the cordial thanks of this meeting be given to the Central Registration Association of the Tower Hamlets for their assistance to this association.
4. That the thanks of this meeting be given to Mr. Doxer, our solicitor, for the able manner in which he triumphantly advocated our claims in the revising barrister's court.

A vote of thanks having been unanimously passed to the retiring committee; to Mr. Gurnell, the honorary secretary; to Mr. Boulter, the treasurer; and officers having been elected for the year ensuing, the meeting dissolved, evidently much gratified at the proceedings of the evening.

PAISLEY FREE-TRADE ASSOCIATION.

We observe from the local papers that the annual general meeting of this society, was held on Monday, the 20th ult. The chair was occupied by JOHN HENDERSON, Esq. A report of the committee for the past year was read, and officers elected.

The meeting was addressed by the Chairman, Provost Murray, Bailie Coats, Councillor M'Nair, and Messrs. Ritchie, Boyd, Hutchison, Macfarlane, and Walker. We regret that want of space prevents us from giving a report of the speeches. We have only room for a short extract.

Provost MURRAY, in rising to offer a few remarks as introductory to a resolution which he meant to submit to the meeting, begged to congratulate the members of the association, and the friends of Free Trade generally, on the great progress of the cause during the past year, and on the very prominent position which the question now held on the public mind of the country, auguring, as these facts do, a speedy triumph to the principles of Free Trade. During the past year several occurrences had taken place calculated to inspire the friends of Free Trade, and to encourage them to persevere in their labours. Among these he might allude to the great contest for the Free-trade chair in America. Mixed up as that question was with some minor points, there was no doubt that the of that vast country, was that of Free Trade as opposed to protection. And the decision was very striking. An old and able statesman, of great abilities, had been rejected, in support of Free-Trade principles. Another circumstance to which he would allude was the treaty with China, the details of which had been communicated during the past year. He regarded this as one of the most important commercial treaties ever negotiated by this country, whether viewed in reference to the vast empire, the trade of which it had opened up, or as regards the principles of the treaty itself. It was very gratifying to find that, however much the adoption of sound principles of commercial legislation were opposed by selfish and political interests at home, still, they had obtained such a prominence and influence as to lead to their entire adoption in this important treaty—the first, he believed, which this country had based entirely on Free-Trade principles. What were the leading features of that treaty? Why, one of the chief was, that human food should be admitted duty free—not only duty free, but that the vessels should be exempted from the ordinary port dues. Talk of barbarians! Why, it would be a blessing to the country if we only had such a barbarian as the prime minister of China to rule us for a short time. But the greatest source of satisfaction was the importance now attached to the question by all parties, not only in this country, but on the Continent and even in America. It was not to be wondered that, during a time of depression and suffering, the agitation should receive support; but it was predicted by our enemies, and feared even by our friends, that with returning prosperity that would be withdrawn. Both these predictions and these fears have equally failed. The question has now assumed an importance which it never before possessed, proving that the great mass of intelligence among all parties and classes of the community has come to the conclusion, that so long as the people of this country are dependent on our own soil for the means of subsistence, and consequently liable to all the vicissitudes of seasons, it is impossible to prevent the recurrence of those periodical revulsions of trade which have produced such fearful suffering and misery among the people. (Applause.)

The Chairman concluded some remarks by adverting to the efforts of the League, to its success in the registration courts, and to the strong probability that there was of Lancashire and Yorkshire being both represented exclusively by Free-Trade members after the first election. It was one of the objects of the meeting to take steps for aiding the great Free-Trade Bazaar which was to be held in London in May next. That exhibition was expected to contain specimens of the leading articles of manufacture from all the branches of our national industry. And, therefore, if there were sent forward specimens of the manufactures of Birmingham, Sheffield, Manchester, Leeds, and other districts, he thought the manufactures of Paisley might, with great propriety, fill up one table, and he had no doubt but it would be found as interesting as any of them. (Applause.) Such an exhibition would present nearly all the advantages of the great national exhibition of France, held last summer. It would give the manufacturers in every department an opportunity of exhibiting their richest productions to such a variety of visitors and customers as would make it one of the cheapest and most effective advertisements that could be obtained, and he had no doubt but many would avail themselves of it. (Applause.)

We are happy to observe that this society is in a flourishing condition, and that it numbers among its members of committee, the whole of the local magistracy.

THE LEAGUE—THE WISDOM OF ITS PLANS.

(From the Christian Examiner.)

It has been said that the League has already tried a number of "specifics," and every one has failed; and yet it is as sanguine as ever, and about to try another "specific," which the cavalier predicts, with a dogmatic air, will fail like the rest. Now, if we understand the meaning of the term "specific," we venture to say, that the actions of the League belong to a very different, nay opposite category. But we do know some parties who are continually harping upon one string, completely taken up with one idea, and dogmatically asserting that they alone are possessed of a remedy, which will not only remove the unsightly ulcer of the Corn Laws, but also dissipate every ache and pain with which the body politic is afflicted. And yet it is these parties, forsooth, that have the face to charge the League with using "specifics," when they themselves so much resemble the Morikons, et hoc genus omne, who boast of possessing "an infallible and universal medicine." But let us return to the doings of the League, which have been so ridiculously misapprehended and misunderstood by men of acknowledged talents, honour, and probity—but who are so taken up with, or rather, we should say, lost in the contemplation of, one idea that they seem almost incapable rightly of appreciating anything which does not just fall across the path of their mental peregrinations. The doings, then, of the League are a series of reciprocal operations, one based upon the other, and projected with a direct reference to circumstances which must be grappled with, and to difficulties which must be overcome, before the objects which its supporters have in view can be attained. Nay, so far are the doings of this body removed from the charge of "specifics," that we do not hesitate to say, that when rightly appreciated, they bear the stamp of the most consummate generalship in the struggle of social and political agitation. What movement have the League planned and executed, what attack have they made, which has not been the necessary basis of ulterior measures? To say that such a movement or such an attack has failed to repeal the Corn Laws, and therefore of no use, is not only most illogical, but puerile in the extreme, and just as absurd as to blame the Duke of Wellington for his retreats and manoeuvres in the Peninsula, because they did not compel the French to evacuate that country—though, as every one knows, they were absolutely necessary to ensure ultimate success, and were, in themselves, deep strokes of policy. But the men who can say that the League has made no practical impression, and has altogether failed in its objects, are as ignorant or regardless of facts as their condemnation of its policy is childish and weak. What was it, we ask, that induced the leading members of a Government, placed in power by monopolists on the express understanding that the monopolist system should be upheld, so soon to turn round, and proclaim publicly in Parliament, "That the maxim of buying in the cheapest market, and selling in the dearest, was a sound one, and ought to be acted upon;" that the "doctrines of Free Trade were the doctrines of common sense;" and much more of a like nature? What was it, we ask, that induced that Government, in defiance of "pledges at hustings," and "promises at dinners," to modify the sliding scale in the direction of a fixed duty? What induced that Government to revise the tariff on very liberal grounds; admitting cattle, sheep, and pigs at a nominal duty, which before were all but prohibited? What induced that Government to pass the Canada Corn Bill, which is virtually an abandonment of the sliding scale as far as the United States are concerned, and which must prove, at no long period, a most powerful lever in assisting to root up the Corn Laws from that mass of ignorance, prejudice, and self-interest, among which they seem so deeply bedded? What induced that Government to alter the sugar duties against the will of the West India interest; and introduce "a most favourable treaty clause," whose operations will probably undermine the sugar monopoly, just as the Canadian Bill most assuredly will the corn monopoly? What was it, in short, we ask, which has induced a Government so originated and constituted to steer, so far as they have advanced, in Free-Trade winds? Why, the plain answer to all these questions is—The efforts of the League, which, by a wholesome agitation based upon the diffusion of sound practical knowledge, have created, and are still creating, such a feeling against monopoly as to induce, we may truly say compel, a monopolist-constituted Government to steer in an opposite direction to its professed principles; and which will ultimately, and we believe at no very distant period, blow such a gale as will compel the legislative ship to enter into the safe and spacious harbour of Free Trade. Let us, then, hear no more about the failure of the operations of the League, by parties who, however talented and honest, have either no time or inclination to examine into them.

We heartily wish "a happy new year" to the League; proud of its past conduct, and hopeful of the future. And it is our fond desire that its success in 1845 may exceed that of the past year. Its programme is worthy of its past actions—bold, yet prudent—fearless, yet cautious. And we verily believe that its attack on the manufacturing counties will be successful to an extent never feared by its enemies, nor even dreamed of by its friends!

COBDEN ON COUNTY MEMBERS.

(From the Morning Post.)

All men admit that agriculturists are little fitted to engage in the work of political "agitation." Hence, among other reasons, there exists a necessity why agriculturists should enjoy the protection of fixed laws, favourable to agricultural industry. In proportion, too, to their want of fitness for the business of "agitation" is the strength of the necessity why agriculturists should select as their representatives in Parliament the ablest and most accomplished men whom the country can supply. Such, undoubtedly, ought to be the men to whom is assigned the duty of watching over the interests of native industry in all its varieties. What is the intellectual character of the men on whom is actually devolved the task of confronting the members of the League, and of unravelling the pernicious sophistries in which the leaders of the great Free-Trade conspiracy deal? Let Mr. Cobden testify. At the late Free-Trade meeting at Manchester, he observed:—

"Now, suppose they 'took stock' of the county members of this country. They had been told what sort of men manufacturing politicians were: now, let them consider what sort of men the counties sent up to Parliament. There were 158 county members representing England and Wales in the House of Commons. Was there one of them, since Lord Stanley had left North Lancashire, of whom they could say 'he is above mediocrity in talent?'"

(Cheers, and "They are below it.") There were not ten of them who ever opened their mouths in Parliament with a chance of being listened to, unless to be laughed at. What can be said of 158 men—the picked men of their order, the picked men of their counties, so far as their class goes—what must be their natural attributes, when they mustered in the House of Commons, and made such an exhibition of themselves as our county members did? (Cheers and laughter.) Why, it was quite a common thing, if a county member got up and made a speech in which he did not murder the Queen's English, for a man to touch his neighbour, and say, "That is a pretty good speech for a county member!" (Cheers, and roars of laughter.)

If this statement contains even an approximation to the truth, need we wonder at the success of the League in the House of Commons? Are not the interests of English agriculture, so far as the power of discussion goes, virtually unrepresented in the Lower House? If, among the one hundred and fifty-eight members whom the farmers and landowners of England and Wales send to Parliament, there had been found three men equal to Mr. Cobden in point of energy, industry, and talent, would the new Corn Bill, the tariff, the Canada Corn Bill, and the Bank Charter Act, have ever found a place among our statutes? No: it only one Cobden had been found among our county members, the great agricultural interest of England would not have been at this moment, as Mr. Cobden truly proclaims it to be, "down in the mud."

THE CANADA CORN BILL—THE TARIFF.

The subjoined table of exports from Montreal and Quebec, for the years 1843 and 1844, to the 23rd of November of each year inclusive, exhibits a remarkable comparative increase for the last-mentioned year on every article of flour, wheat, barley, oats, peas, oatmeal, butter, beef, and pork; and as the demand increases, which it no doubt will do, increased means will be employed to provide the supply, so that the province of Canada must reap much advantage from the operation of the Canada Corn Act and the new tariff on provisions:—

We have received the following letter from a correspondent at Whitehaven, enclosing a silver medal, on the obverse of which is a profile with the words, "Henry Brougham," and on the reverse, "To the patriotic, incorruptible, and unbought freeholders of the county of Westmorland, July 4, 1845."

"Sir,—I have sent the enclosed medal which I once had a respect for. Perhaps it may sell at the price of old silver at the Bazaar. Your obedient humble servant, "R. C."

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XVIII.

TO THE MARQUIS OF NORMANBY.

My Lord,—Your lordship has not joined the agitation against the Corn Laws, but you have become an agitator for sanitary legislation, on behalf of the poorer classes. Of course there is some distinction in your mind which renders you quiescent on the one question and active on the other. On the nature and soundness of that distinction I content to feeling some little curiosity. How is it to be ascertained?

In your speech at the close of last session, which has been reprinted (I presume by the association lately formed under your lordship's auspices) for cheap and gratuitous distribution, you affirm that "the whole question of sanitary regulation seems to turn upon the treatment of those two elements, air and water: both equally necessary to the healthful course of human existence; both equally necessary in their external influence on our frame; and in their external use—one the primary ingredient in all human nutriment, the other the life-spring of our lungs."

And is it possible that your lordship actually forgets that food had any connexion with the question? that its deficiency in quantity, or deterioration in quality, is foremost amongst the causes of disease and mortality? or that, by its abundance and wholesomeness, the frame is invigorated to resist many of the external evils which you are anxious to remedy? How came diet not to stare you in the face? Why were you not reminded of it by the reports of prison-keepers and poor-law commissioners? Why not by the rules of hospitals? or by the verdicts of coroners' juries in cases of destitution? My lord, the omission is remarkable. Not only in the passage just quoted, but throughout your speech, you maintain, on this point, the silence of the grave. You have thus avoided all mention of the Corn Laws; you have also avoided the most important part of the subordinate topic with which you were dealing, and have left your argument woefully incomplete and maimed.

Whether this omission be ascribable to the limited view of the subject taken by your own intellect; to a vain desire of blinking the connexion between sanitary legislation and Corn-Law repeal, lest aristocratic lawmakers should be startled and offended; or to an indisposition to pledge yourself, independently of your late official colleagues, to the cause of commercial freedom, is very immaterial: I respect what I believe to be your motives, in the exertions you have actually made, too much not to endeavour to show how imperatively those exertions demand that you should go further, take broader ground, add good bread to the good air and water which you desiderate for the poor, and put your sanitary movement in its real relation, not as a substitute for, but as an adjunct or branch of, the far more comprehensive agitation conducted by the League against monopoly.

To procure by law the limitation of the landlords' power of letting noxious dens for human dwellings; and to show, theoretically or practically, how buildings may be best constructed for the comfort of their inhabitants, are objects, no doubt, of importance and interest. Their pursuit is laudable, and may it be successful. But when accomplished, how much will you have done towards promoting the public health, if the present burdens on food and restrictions on industry remain untouched? Man cannot subsist on air and water. Rotten potatoes will taint the atmosphere of the best ventilated abode. Out-of-work will soon be out-of-house and home, however excellent the drainage. Meat will not multiply of itself in the cupboards of model cottages. Nor will malaria be purified while monopoly is prolonged. Your scheme sits only on the threshold of the "condition-of-England question." It heathstones the doorstep, while want fills the interior with disease and corruption. Food is the first essential. Work and wages are its conditions. Provide them, and the poor will not long be so perverse as to prefer damp and darkness to cleanliness and comfort. They are sent into the cellarage by sinking wages. When their payments rise, they aspire to parks and pleasure-grounds. The best houses that can be provided will not put them into a condition to choose; and when once they are in a condition to choose, they will not select the worst.

The nearest road, my lord, to your own especial object, is through the repeal of the Corn Laws. The extension of commerce is the broad highway to the improved dwellings of the poor. Only with increased ability can there be the increased demand which will stimulate the speculations of builders and the ingenuity of architects. Both will come when they are wanted. Till then, those who are turned out of the narrow lane will crowd closer together in the narrower court. Expel them from the courts, and they will swarm under the unsheltering archways of the railroad. Drive them thence, and they will perish in the open fields. A select tenantry may be found for your pretty plans, but you cannot march the moneyless into their permanent possession. As soon might you expect a large shell to generate the fat fish to fill it. The fish makes its own shell; and, outgrowing that, produces another proportionate to its size. And so, though by a circuitous agency, will a thriving population realize the more commodious abodes to which its resources are adequate.

Let any medical man treat of the sanitary condition of the people, and he will be sure, unless purposely avoiding it, to introduce the topic of food, and the means of its being procured. I have now before me an instance of this fact, in a pamphlet entitled "Public Health: an Oration delivered on the Seventieth Anniversary of the London Medical Society. By Leonard Stewart, M.D. 1844." It is only a bird's-eye view of the subject; there are but nineteen pages of the oration altogether: yet this brief summary takes prominent notice of the topic which seems to be tabooed in your proceedings:—

"We have narrow streets, dark and crowded passages, with noisome cellars and comfortable attics. There are the suffocating factories and workshops, the damp grounds and yards, the smoking labyrinth of what are called the 'back settlements,' all swarming with the toil-worn, the debauched, and the brutalized, strangely huddled together. Their scanty or precarious food, defection of mind, discomfort, ill-regulated or intemperate habits, and filthy places of residence, often in the vicinity of stagnant water, and of decaying animal and vegetable substances, are altogether the prolific source of disease and infection."

As the author expands his views towards the peroration of his address, he speaks, with apparent unconsciousness, the language of Free Trade, to express the natural tendency of the principle of sanitary legislation:—

"When we glance at the actual condition of all countries, we shall find that there are strange accumulations of similar conditions; so that distribution seems to be pointed out as the leading duty of the age."

"We see, on every hand, multitudes existing in the position of the fabled Tantalus—surrounded by the most desirable objects, which they are debarred from using and enjoying."

"What numbers of persons, of all ages, sexes, and occupations, cramped by sedentary monotonous toil, when half asphyxiated in their close and dusty workshops, would fain escape to the breezes of the hill-side. Many hunting tribes might safely share the excess of stimulants which the desponding artisan is now tempted to use, and miserably abuse."

"We have Ireland exporting substantial food to all parts, yet half starving her own peasantry. In the wild parts of North and South America, the carcasses of deer and of cattle are left to rot, while many of our own labourers are limited to vegetable diet, or nearly so. The mountains of Switzerland are carefully cropped and shorn of every blade of grass; the wine countries are tended like gardens; while many of the richest plains, both of the old world and the new, as on the Euphrates and Mississippi, are either abandoned or unattempted by the hand of the cultivator."

"We have, at the present day, the eyes of politicians and of speculators directed to the striking spectacle of the eastern coast of Asia (with its three hundred millions of Chinese, scantily fed, and often living in boats and on rafts for want of room on shore), as contrasted with the opposite north-west coast of America (or the Oregon territory), whose only civilized inhabitants consist of some few hundred men, the servants of two or three private companies of merchants."

"It is no far-fetched improbable theory, to propose the greater equalization of these opposite conditions."

"Nature's full blessings would be well-dispens'd
In unsuperfluous even proportion,
And she no whit encumbered with her store."

Could I have, my lord, a more unexceptionable witness to the fact that you stop short of your own professed object, while the Anti-Corn-Law League is the real and most efficient sanitary association? The testimony, borne unconsciously, is that of a physician, engaged in no agitation, but quietly descending on "public health," to his brethren of the profession, at an anniversary of the "Medical Society." It will not do, then, to hint at "far-fetched connexion," "independent topics," "totally distinct objects," or any such modes of extrication from the conclusion that you are, as yet, standing aloof from the one great combined movement towards the satisfactory settlement of the question of which you profess to have taken charge.

Nor can you, my lord, plead that you abstain from mooted before public meetings the points which must come before you as a member of the Legislature, and perhaps again as a member of the Cabinet. You do agitate, though only upon a small scale, and for an imperfect result. I rejoice that, so far, you are less squeamish than some of your late colleagues. They seem to think it enough that they lost office for proposing to take a step towards commercial freedom. They claim the glory of martyrs, and leave the people to work for the cause of themselves, as best they may. Dual and right hon. champions of monopoly are not so regardless of their allies out of doors. They present themselves at the smallest gatherings. They preside over very limited and select assemblages; their troops are never unofficered; the officers frequently more numerous than the troops. They lead, and organize, and agitate; whilst you abandon to its own guidance the mightiest movement of modern times. You show no sign of sympathy; you stretch no helping hand. Like the gods of Epicurus, you sit remote, and merely deign to inhale the incense—when it comes. You are more coldly isolates from the people than even the enemies of their rights and interests. Nor can more effective security be taken, that when they triumph, as triumph eventually they must, the work will be their own,—a victory of the industrial classes,—without (save in a few bright exceptional instances) either aid or encouragement from the Liberal section of the aristocracy, and its political staff which holds in reversion the appointments of ministerial office.

My Lord Marquis, this is no petition; if a remonstrance, it is more for the sake of those who neglect a duty, than for theirs who are well content, and able, to work out the just and beneficent objects to which they are devoted. We are on the eve of a time when to join the League will imply as little merit as to become the camp-followers of a victorious army. This may be so in by parties as well as persons, who have eyes in their heads. It will look rather ridiculous in history, should the summary of these times set forth Lord John Russell as the first of Free-Trade martyrs, and Sir Robert Peel as the first of Free-Trade Ministers.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

THE "FLAG OF PROTECTION" IN SUSSEX. (From the Morning Chronicle.)

TO THE EARL OF MOUNT.

"He had been taught to revere the institutions of his country. He loved those institutions; and as long as he was able he would support those institutions and that beloved country to the best of his humble ability. He was happy, therefore, to take that opportunity of identifying himself in the most public manner possible with the Protectionists of the county. He was quite sure they would succeed against the Anti-Corn-Law League. For his own part, from that day he hoisted the flag of protection to the agriculturists and defiance to the League."—Speech at Brighton, Jan. 23, 1845.

My Lord,—You are a captain in the navy. At the dinner at Brighton, presided over by his Grace of Richmond, when you spoke the above words, the toast of the "Army and Navy" was given. As an officer, you rose to reply on behalf of the navy. But you did not speak to the toast. You spoke professionally, it is true; but you spoke in your character of a dealer in corn and flour. You are a naval captain; but you also have land, and you plough, sow, reap, and sell your corn. You have a flour mill, and you grind wheat and sell flour. You have flour stores, and you order every one employed on your estate, or at any works over which you have control, to deal at your stores. You have carts, and waggons, and flour sacks, and all are marked with the name and title of Earl Egmont, miller and flour-dealer.

You were called up to speak as a naval captain; but the shop was more immediately concerned than the ship—so you spoke of the ship.

Let us see what this hoisting of "the flag of protection" means. Of course, you deny that it means protection to yourself. Who, then, can it mean protection to? You say the agriculturists. Who are they?

Is Mr. Saunders an agriculturist? He is your tenant, and occupies a large breadth of land. He pays you rent; and up to this year he used to be the leading man at the audit dinners. When your health was drunk he used to lead the hip, hip, hurrahs. He did not do so this year. He would not go to the dinner. His crops were devoured by your game. You receive from him a rent for his land, and you receive from another person a rent for the game. Mr. Saunders paid off some of his men because he did not find it profitable to employ them. You sent orders that he must employ them. He said, "Not as things now stand." You said, "Yes, as things now stand." He said, "Not with all that game." You said, "Yes, with all that game." He said he would rather leave the farm. You said he was at liberty to do as he chose.

Is your "flag of protection" to be hoisted over Mr. Saunders?

Your tenant, Mr. Allwyn, had his turnips ate up by your hares last year, and he kindled fires during the winter nights to scare the hares away; this year you forbade him to do so. He pays you rent for his farm, and you let the game which he has to feed to Captain Shirley, who also pays you rent for it. When Mr. Allwyn took the farm, very little game was preserved on it, and it was not rented by another party. But since it has been rented by another party, and keepers kept by that party to preserve it, the loss to Mr. Allwyn has been greatly increased. He has the option of going to law to recover damages; but it is throwing away good money after bad. He had one field valued this year, and the damage done in that one field was given by the valuers at £20. Captain Shirley offered to pay £6, and refused to pay more. Last year the estimated damage done to the whole farm by game was £70; Mr. Allwyn was only allowed £20.

Is your "flag of protection" to be hoisted for Mr. Allwyn?

Turn next to the relation of Mr. Allwyn—the miller. He also is your tenant. You set up a mill at Midhurst, on your own account, to compete with four other mills, all held by your own tenants. The workers in the copes and the brickfield men were all dealing at Mr. Allwyn's mill. You set up a store at the brickfield, and ordered the employers of all the men to send them to your store. The men said they owed Mr. Allwyn for flour; that they got one sack of flour on trust, and paid the last; and that they could not pay him what they owed if they left him now. You said they must pay him as they could; they must not deal anywhere but where the flour of your mill was sold.

Is your "flag of protection" to cover the miller?

You have another tenant, a baker. He was told he must deal at your mill. He said he could not; he had many years dealt elsewhere, and he did not like to change now. You told him if he did not deal at your mill you would set up a shop and undersell him. You have done so.

Is your "flag of protection" to extend to this tenant of yours, the baker?

Mrs. Saunders, a widow, holding one of your farms, paid away two men whom she said she could not employ, because of the ten per cent. you put on the rent this year. She was told by you she must employ the same number of hands and pay the ten per cent. also. You were told that much more than that amount had been destroyed by game; but you said that was no matter. You were told such interference with the affairs of the farm was unbearable; and you said no one need bear it unless they chose; they were at liberty to go—other tenants could easily be had.

Is this, my lord, protection to agriculture?

What was this year reaped on Mr. Saunders's farm at 6s. per acre. For a good crop the price paid is generally from 10s. to 12s. per acre. The reapers, on speaking of it, were asked what kind of wages they made at 6s. and they replied, "Better than we have sometimes done at 12s. There wasn't much to reap; the game had done so much damage, that we could go over a dozen yards before having a sheaf filled."

Is this protection to agriculture, Lord Egmont?

At the very gates of Cowdray-park, where you live, gangs of men—honest labourers, who ought to be the pride of that country you say you love so well—are working at parish work for 1s. 6d. a week. They are turned away from the farms, because the farmers cannot employ them. The farmers cannot employ them, though their land is in sad disorder; because, whenever they complain to you or your steward, Mr. Brown, they are told they may leave their farms if they be dissatisfied.

Is such relationship between landlord and tenant, and between both and the labourers, protection to agriculture? You say you will "hoist your flag of protection to agriculturists, and defiance to the League," from that day forward, the 23rd of January. I, for one, want no protection at all, but protection from such a landlord as you. Not that I blame you as avaricious. Upon the whole, I believe you to mean well; but you do not understand your new business of landlord. You do not know what is protection to agriculture, and what is not. I shall endeavour to give you a few lessons.

Meantime, I am,

LETTERS TO MY LANDLORD.—No. II.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

ON FRIENDSHIP.

SIR,—I call this letter No. II., because I wrote one the other day, which, though not addressed to you individually, was to a friend of yours, the Earl of Egmont, and I know you read it. At the dinner last Thursday you cheered Lord Egmont, when he declared that he could sit no longer a silent spectator of the Free-Traders, but would from that day "hoist the flag of protection to the agriculturists, and of defiance to the Anti-Corn Law League." I saw you cheer, Sir, and, as your tenant, thought I should like to ask you to protect me.

But had I done so, I should have been considered a bad tenant, a mutterer in the camp, one that was not to be encouraged; and I should have been—Heaven knows I should—in want of protection; a protection which no act of Parliament can afford me. You cannot endure a tenant that makes a complaint.

Of many evils inflicted on us farmers by the Corn Law, which I propose to lay before you thus publicly, because I cannot get your ear privately, and because the public discussion may do good—of the many evils we have to bear through having this load upon our backs, mis-called protection, the first and greatest is our complete dependence and subjection to those who tell us it is all for our good.

A friendly relationship between landlord and tenant is quite another thing. My relationship to you is one of fear—one of mutual distrust. I cannot trust you, and you think you cannot trust me. You have never told me so, but I know your thoughts. I have doubted the efficacy of protection, and have said that, unless practically protected from present palpable evils on my own farm, I should doubt the good intention of all other kinds of protection.

You have been told this. A straw tells which way the wind blows. You killed several hundred head of game two weeks ago. Neither you nor your friends could use it all, so you sent it round amongst your tenants. But all those were omitted who had advanced any claim for damages done by game, or made any other complaint of it. I was one of them. I cared not a rush for your hare and brace of birds. I had already fed them, and morally they were mine. But what I regretted, and still regret, is, that you should not know who are your best tenants, who are the persons most disposed to do justice to you and to your land. You only know us through the mouths of others. The subjection to which we are brought to uphold this thing called Corn-Law protection makes you turn us to political purposes, and surround yourself with spies to see that we are all obedient and properly trained to the best uses we are put to.

Had you none of these persons about you to report everything we do or say, you would either make us independent of you by a lease of our land, or not interfere with us at all. Whichever you might do, you would find us better farmers than we are.

You would then find us your friends. For I must declare before the world, that it is more proper to speak of "the farmer, the landlord's best friend," than of "the landlord, the farmer's best friend."

Do we not find the capital to cultivate the land and draw from it its profit? Do we not furnish the skill and the energy, the strength of mind and of body, to conduct the whole business of the land? Do we not run all the risks of seasons, and of varying prices? My farm, as indeed your whole estate, is valued at the rate of 60s. per quarter for wheat, and this rent I pay. You have no risk—you never trouble yourself with the land, but in so far as you try to keep up the price of wheat and cannot, and tell me that it is quite right we should pay for land as if wheat were 60s. a quarter, because if everything was as you and your friends would like to make it, that would be the very lowest price.

You and your friends are in Parliament. Why don't you keep up the price?

While you quarrel amongst yourselves, you blindfold us by your promises—by your professions of friendship. I tell you, Sir, that not only are we obliged to pay for land a fictitious value, but we are liable to the most distracting uncertainties, which prevent us doing to our land as we should do and would do.

I do not like to read long letters in a newspaper myself; I seldom do read them; so I shall not write a long letter to be unread by others. This is the only reason why I do not go into some figures and details to prove my losses to you; I only now speak in a general way of my losses; and, as I said before, the first and heaviest felt is, that you bring me down to be dependent on your personal favour. I am dependent on varying seasons and varying prices, which are had enough without being also dependent on a varying landlord—a landlord who varies with each tale-bearer on his estate. I am,

IMPORTS OF CATTLE IN 1844.—The total number of beasts and sheep imported into the United Kingdom, during the year ending Dec. 31, 1844, was—beasts, 4405; sheep, 2603; of these were imported direct into Hull, 1690 beasts and 775 sheep.

THE LEAGUE—EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE.—The League have availed themselves of the improved intelligence of the masses, and are helping forward at once their intellectual and their political education. They have done more, we are well persuaded, by their lectures, discussions, and great meetings, to rouse more especially the most dormant and sluggish portion of the public mind,—that of the proverbially slow-thinking jog-trot farmer.—In the course of the last few years, than could have been hoped for from any other process in the course of a generation.—Patriot.

LAUNCH OF AN IRON STEAMER.—On Saturday, a beautiful new iron steamer was launched from the iron shipbuilding yard of Messrs. James Hodgson and Co., North Shore, the builders of the Richard Cobden. This vessel is, we understand, the first that ever was launched with her machinery, masts, and rigging all properly fitted on board. Her bow is tastefully decorated with scrolls, surmounted by a beautifully carved cornucopia. At the hour appointed for launching, every preparatory arrangement had been made, and at ten minutes past one o'clock the order "down dunnage" was given, when the Iron Prince (which name was given to her by Miss Crofield, of Warrington, in admirable style) glided into her future element, on which we hope she will long and successfully ply, amid the cheers of the assembled spectators. The Iron Prince is rigged as a three-masted schooner, to be propelled with a screw, and two engines of the united power of 45 horses; her length on the water line is 103 feet, 18 feet beam, and 9 feet 6 inches depth of hold. She is very strongly built, being double-plated and double-ripped throughout, with six strong longitudinal stringers; she also possesses the novelty of an iron deck, bulwarks, and rigging. She has hold-room for 200 tons of measurement goods, and will carry 200 tons of dead weight. The Iron Prince is, we believe, intended to ply between this port and Newport, in South Wales, to be commanded by Captain Hughes.—Liverpool paper.

BURGLARIES IN SUSSEX.—Burglaries have been committed in this county almost nightly during the last month, and yet not a single person has been detected. Twenty houses at least have been broken open, and the gangs are become quite a terror to the country people.—Globe.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

SIR.—One of the most frightful symptoms of the condition of the rural and "protected" districts is to be found in the anxiety displayed by landowners and farmers to get rid of the labourers among whom they live. To drive them out of the parish on which they have a claim to support is thought a public good; and whether the poor outcasts wander towards the manufacturing districts, or ship themselves off to some foreign land, is of no consequence, so that they cease to be a burden upon the parish funds. From the experience of the last five years, however, it would appear that migration to the northern counties is not now considered so certain a remedy as emigration to New South Wales. When the manufacturing towns are suffering during seasons of high prices of food, some of the labourers are compelled to return home, and to become a burden upon their native parishes; but, when once fairly over the water, they have not the power, nor do they, we suspect, wish to return. I have before me a letter written by an aged woman, living in a parish in Oxfordshire, to her relatives employed in a cotton manufactory in this neighbourhood. From this letter it would seem that getting rid of the labourers is the policy now followed by the owners and occupiers of land in that county. The following is an extract from the letter:—

"Edmund King and his wife and family are gone across the water to Sydney; and Richard Jones and his wife and family, and William Harley and his wife and family; and Joseph Holland went to the workhouse and choosed himself a wife, and went directly; and Job Taylor, and Thomas Quarterman, and William Burnham, and William Wixen, all of them young men: there was seven-and-thirty altogether; they all started last Wednesday morning."

I am not disposed to say anything of the misfortune it may be supposed to be to these individuals to leave their native land. From all we know of their condition here, no foreign shore can afford them worse shelter or more of hardship than they have, in all probability, been accustomed to at home. I will not remark upon the fact, that Joseph Holland went to the workhouse to choose himself a wife who might be the partner of his voyage to the antipodes,—although that circumstance gives us some insight into the state of things in Oxfordshire,—my intention being rather to point out how hopeless is the contest which the landlords are waging with an increasing population. Whether the landlords will provide work for the labourers or not, the people will increase and multiply; and if work is not provided they will become poorer and more degraded; and poverty and continued suffering will engender discontent and despair; and from these will come a state of things neither agreeable nor safe for the landowners themselves. Is Oxfordshire so well cultivated that it can afford to part with its strong young men, and with fathers and families? Is land held by a sound tenure in that county, and is capital freely applied to it, so that its utmost powers of production have been arrived at? I greatly fear the case is far otherwise. The evidence of many speakers at the recent agricultural meetings goes to prove that there is no superabundance of labour, but that there is a great want of employment, arising from the wretched state of cultivation on many of the largest estates in the kingdom.

These emigrants will probably do better abroad than at home; but under other circumstances home might have been far better than abroad. Their wish was to work on the land and by honest industry to live comfortably. The owners of the soil neglect the duty which their ownership imposes. They keep the land locked up, and by insecure tenure, by parliamentary protection, and by the preservation of game, they prevent the demand for labour out of which labourers might be well supported and saved from the necessity of exile from their native country. From all that is passing around us, I have hope that this system is drawing to a close. Free Trade is before us, and not far distant; and with it will come greater value to labour, and consequently greater independence to the labourer. When it comes, labourer and landowner alike will have to bless the League,—the one that he has been saved from poverty and slavery; the other that he has been rescued from the retribution which a longer continuance of wrong-doing must inevitably have brought upon him.

I am, yours respectfully,

J. B. R.

THE GAME LAWS.—A public meeting is to be held in the County Hall, Aylesbury, on Monday next, against the Game Laws, and to adopt a petition to Parliament for their repeal. John Lee, Esq., LL.D., of Hartwell House, to take the chair. John Bright, Esq., M.P., has announced his intention of attending.

AMERICAN HOPS.—Another result of the operation of the new tariff has been seen, the last few days, in the importation of hops from the United States. The samples have been pronounced, by competent judges, as quite equal in flavour and quality to any produced in this country.—London paper.

BUST OF ADAM SMITH.—The Lord Provost and magistrates have confided to Mr. Patrick Park the task of executing a marble bust of the philosopher, from the medallion by Tassie, which is held to be the only likeness extant. The bust, when completed, will be placed in the Council-hall, City-buildings.—Glasgow Argus.

RUSSIAN RYE IN IRELAND.—About a fortnight since, the ship Cape Marie, Cramer, arrived at this port with a cargo of Russian rye, amounting to 860 quarters, which the captain had purchased at Constantinople. Having engaged a broker, he offered the rye for sale on his own account; but the Customs authorities here refused to permit the sale, though the captain stated his readiness to pay whatever amount of duty it was liable to. The ground of objection appears to be that the captain (a Dutchman) who had taken his vessel from Amsterdam to Constantinople, having shipped the rye in the latter port, and sailed direct for Ireland, the cargo comes under the operation of a provision in the navigation laws, which prohibits the importation, in a foreign vessel, of the produce of a foreign country other than the country to which the vessel belongs. As the case now stands, Capt. Cramer is unable to sell the rye in either England, Ireland, or Scotland, or even bond it in the United Kingdom, and, therefore, must leave this port for the purpose of disposing of it in France, or some other of the Continental countries. He intends to sail on Monday. He was not aware of any law being in existence to prevent the sale of rye in Ireland, and he will suffer a severe loss by the disappointment.—Port paper.

REVIEW.

THE STRUGGLE BETWEEN FEUDAL DESPOTISM AND MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY IN FLANDERS.

Philip Von Artaveld. A Historic Romance. By Henry Taylor, Esq. London, Moxon.

"Destiny never proves false to men until they prove false to Destiny." This great truth is no where more signally evidenced than in the history of the several struggles which have taken place in different ages and different countries between the mercantile classes and the feudal aristocracy. Great and glorious have been the several triumphs of the mercantile and middle class, but negligence has been invariably the attendant on victory, and the fruits of conquest were lost from want of the watchfulness, the vigilance, and the active energies by which they were acquired. The feudal aristocracy, however divided by parties and jealousies, has always had a cementing bond of central union in the common desire, founded on common interest, of giving exclusive political power to property in land. On this point Tories and Whigs are as unanimous as the Barons and Burgesses were in the middle ages; possession of the soil gave to landed proprietors a domination over the supply of food to the people, which could only be counterbalanced by extended trade; and hence the extension of trade has ever been resisted by the feudal lords as perilous to their monopoly of political power.

Against this compact and united body the mercantile and middle classes have always contended at a disadvantage. Trade is a more absorbing occupation than the management of land: it makes large demands on the intellectual energies, and fixes them more exclusively to one definite line of direction. A very rude shock is required to force the merchant from his counting-house, the manufacturer from his factory, and the tradesman from his shop. Besides, there is not always a perceptible community of interest between the divisions of the mercantile classes: those engaged in the home trade are not always in close amity with those engaged in the foreign trade; questions respecting the division of profits will arise between the wholesale dealer and the retailer; ironmasters are sometimes unable to discover that their interests are identified with those of cotton-spinners, and both find it difficult to believe that no question respecting shipowners can be indifferent to themselves. Even when such renegades are wanting as those whom the redoubtable Robert de Hollingsworth has baptized "the sweeps of Ashton," there must always be a difficulty in permanently holding together sections of men absorbed in engrossing occupations, having occasional causes of mutual jealousy, and very rare opportunities of discussing any subject in which they can have community of feeling and identity of interest.

The Revolution of 1688, and the Reform Bill of 1832, were mainly accomplished by the middle classes of England, headed, in both cases, by sections of the territorial aristocracy; and in both cases the chief object in the hour of victory was to reward the alliance of the middle classes with as small a share of political power as was possible. The Reform Bill was advocated and opposed as a measure which would transfer a due share of political power from the landed aristocracy to the mercantile and industrial classes; Lord Carnarvon believed so firmly in the transfer that he asked to be reduced to the ranks of a commoner; and Lord Dudley expressed alarm lest the want of education in the middle classes, evidenced by such want of self-respect as was shown by "the sweeps of Ashton" should make them the easy dupes of artful leaders. The middle classes triumphed and carried the Reform Bill, but they made the fatal blunder of regarding the change in the representation not as the means to an end, but as an end in itself. History has been written in vain if it has not taught us that mere constitutional forms, however excellent in theory, may be worked to evil in practice. In fact, more gross tyranny and more grievous oppression can be practised in the name and with the forms of freedom than is possible under avowed despotism. Whenever men mistake the means for the end, they are almost certain to allow those means to fall into the hands of their adversaries. Sir Robert Peel saw that the middle classes had made this mistake: he called the attention of the monopolists to the abandoned means, and forthwith the monopolists, recovering from their paralysis of terror, commenced to work the registers, while the industrial classes never troubled their heads about the matter. It was not until the League was formed that the mercantile classes had any form or element of cohesion as a political body: they were sometimes fixed to the tail of one party, and sometimes to that of another; but they had never before an opportunity and scope for separate and independent action. When the League of the middle classes took a survey of the ground on which to fight the battle of Free Trade—the great common interest of all who live by labour of mind or body—their first great difficulty was to ascertain the exact amount of the advantages which had been lost by the middle classes, and won by the feudal oligarchy, in the interval between 1832 and 1841; the extent of the deformation of the reformed constituencies could only be ascertained by repeated trials, and election contests were employed as the most accurate tests. Their results indicated not only the amount of loss, but its cause,—the neglect of the constituencies; and the League immediately applied itself to the reconstruction of the constituencies, aware that this would be a work of time and labour, but fully confident of ultimate success.

In comparing the Free-Trade struggle with former movements and agitations to extort popular rights from feudal monopoly, we find the League characterized by several distinctive novelties, all of which have high import, not only in themselves, but in their bearings on the future destinies of the country. It is essentially a federative union of the middle and industrial classes: it originated with them, was organized by them, continues under their management, and has been carefully preserved from becoming in any way the engine of political party. It affords no leverage for placing one set of men in office and turning out another, irrespective of principle; it demands justice, and, to ensure its support, men must dare to be just.

A second novelty is, that the League does not hold out victory as the reward of a single campaign; those who have engaged in the struggle know that it must be not only arduous but tedious: they seek to enlist none but those who have

"Learn'd to labour and to wait."

In other agitations it has been sought to produce a sudden burst of strong feeling, which, as in the case of the Reform Bill, might bear down all opposition by its intensity; but the League asks for patience and perseverance not less than courage; it seeks to besiege rather than to carry by storm, and to train its followers into rational discipline rather than rouse them into passionate ardour. This system, while it renders ultimate success certain, confers incidental advantages of the highest value. During the entire period that the struggle continues, the League is engaged in the political education and discipline of the middle classes: its publications, its lectures, and its speakers, are diffusing through the nation the sound principles of social science, and those elements of public morality which, when once apprehended, can never be forgotten.

It is impossible to view any great effort for commercial freedom without being reminded of the former struggles made by the mercantile classes to emancipate themselves from feudal bondage. The wars in Flanders, at the close of the thirteenth and the beginning of the fourteenth centuries, are particularly instructive; and we take advantage of Henry Taylor's able dramatic history of one of the principal heroes to direct attention to the subject. The rapid growth of the commercial cities of Flanders was greatly facilitated by the charters of privileges which they had purchased from their respective lords; the burghesses soon began to rival their former masters in wealth and influence, and they formed an order of their own which was as much respected in the trading communities as the landed aristocracy in the rural districts. When the feudal lords attempted to violate these charters collectively, the Flemings flew to arms, and completely overthrew the aristocracy at the battle of Courtray—one of the earliest in which infantry triumphed over feudal chivalry. The cities became so powerful that they were able to control the policy of their Sovereign; and when Louis Earl of Flanders declared war against Edward III. of England, he found that Jacob Artaveld, a brewer of wethelin, in Ghent, had sufficient influence to prevent the Flemings from engaging in war with the English, who were their best customers. Earl Louis, unable to contend against the entire mercantile community, was forced to temporize; but he found allies in the commercial cities and commercial classes more potent than the aid of his feudal vassals. We extract the following description of the circumstances from a recent historian:—

"The spirit of monopoly injured the Flemings more than all the disasters of war. Earl Louis had granted to Ghent, Ypres, and Bruges the exclusive privilege of manufacturing cloth; but the other towns and villages insisted on their right to enjoy the advantages of lucrative industry, and prepared to defend it by force of arms. Louis took advantage of the crisis to appear in the three cities as the determined supporter of the monopoly; for the moment all his cruelties and exactions were forgotten, in gratitude for his gracious permission to the burghers of the three cities to oppress their brethren in the neighbouring towns; even Artaveld was deceived, and led an army against the supporters of Free Trade. He was soon undeceived; when he returned victorious, he was arrested by the earl and thrown into prison. Louis, however, found that he had proceeded too hastily; Artaveld's numerous partisans took up arms, and demanded his liberation. The earl was forced to submit; but he was an indignant at the disappointment that he once more quitted Flanders and returned to Paris. At this crisis Pope Clement VI. sent two legates to command the Flemings to submit implicitly to their illegal lords. The citizens replied that they were loyal to Edward, whom they recognized as the legitimate King of France, and that there was no violation of duty with which they could reproach themselves. In reply, the legates published an anathema against all who refused obedience to Philip, as if the Pope's recognition of his title had made revolt against that monarch rebellion against God.

"Monopoly is the prolific parent of confusion and abuses: the artisans of Ghent, Bruges, and Ypres, not content with excluding the other towns of Flanders from the benefit of manufactures, began to quarrel amongst themselves respecting emoluments and wages. The weavers insisted that the fullers received too large a share of profits, without perceiving that, if their complaint was well-founded, the only remedy was to throw the fulling trade open to the public competition of all Flanders. The spinners asserted that the weavers unfairly cut down the price of their yarn, but did not see that this would be impossible if the markets were perfectly open. Artaveld appears to have discovered that Free Trade was the only remedy for these disorders; and he was, therefore, anxious to transfer the Government of Flanders from Earl Louis, the supporter of monopoly, to the English Prince of Wales, who was unconnected with any of the privileged parties. All those who had a vested interest in wronging their neighbours were immediately in arms; and none were more violent against Artaveld than the operatives, whose advantage he sought by enlarging the sphere of their employment. In all countries we have found occasional outbursts of popular indignation against common honesty and common sense: men get persuaded that some tortuous means may be devised of raising the rate of profits or of wages above its market price, never pausing to consider that the regulation of the market price is no more in their power than the direction of the winds; and so they frame statutes and form combinations to extort illegitimate gains, and, like all other plunderers, hesitate at no act of violence to effect what is nothing better than ill-disguised robbery. Such a delusion seized on the artisans of Ghent, when Edward, on the invitation of Artaveld, brought the Prince of Wales to Flanders."

The weavers of Ghent, being taught to believe that Artaveld intended to deprive them of their exclusive privileges, rose in tumult, attacked Artaveld's house, and murdered him. This was a fatal blow to the popular cause: Edward returned to England completely alienated from the Flemings; most of the great towns protested against the conduct of the citizens of Ghent, and disunion was fatally introduced into the commercial confederacy. The son and successor of Earl Louis I., usually distinguished as Louis le Mâle, took advantage of the crisis to establish a complete despotism. His conduct is a specimen of what the renegade "sweeps" of Ashton have to expect from the triumphs of De Hollingsworths:—

"A congress was opened at Dunkirk, where, on the 10th of December, 1348, a treaty for the pacification of Flanders was signed under the mediation of the Duke of Lancaster, the nephew of Edward III. Earl Louis granted pardon to his Flemish subjects for all their former revolts, engaged to respect all their privileges, and confirmed the several treaties which they had made with the English. But pardons and privileges granted by princes, when not secured by constitutional guarantees, have rarely protected those who have attempted to encroach on their prerogatives. Soon after his return to Ghent, Louis took advantage of the rivalry between the trading companies to set one party against the other: the fullers and the inferior artisans took up arms against the weavers, who had been the chief of the earl's opponents, but who had sacrificed the respect due to the supporters of freedom by the devotedness which they exhibited for the maintenance of their selfish monopoly. A battle took place in the public streets: six hundred of the weavers were killed in the market-place; their comrades were pursued by the infuriated populace, and slaughtered in their own houses. Earl Louis took advantage of the confusion to seize upon the most obnoxious of the leaders of the former tumults in the principal cities: in the confusion of popular strife and clashing interests, their fate excited little attention: most of them perished on the wheel or the scaffold."

Feudal tyranny soon provoked new insurrections; years of war, bloodshed, and confusion ensued, until at length the people of Ghent organized a confederation which took the name of the White Hoods, from the cognizance worn by the leaders, and raised the standard of open revolt. The insurgents were generally unsuccessful until they placed at their head the son of their former leader, the murdered Artaveld, who is the hero of the dramatic poem before us. The character of the new leader, Philip Von Artaveld, has been thus portrayed:—

"Philip Von Artaveld was a very influential man among the mercantile aristocracy; the large fortune he had inherited from his father rendered him independent of trade, and it was only in compliance with custom that he entered his name, as did many knights and nobles, in the company of brewers. Familiar as we are with this custom in England—most of our leading men being enrolled in some or other of the London companies—it has nevertheless led astray many modern historians, and led to fanciful parallels between the brewer of Ghent and the brewer of Huntington. Artaveld had, up to this period, kept himself aloof from the different parties in the state; the unmerited fate of his father disgusted him with the populace, while he was too wise to join the landed aristocracy, whose measures, he clearly saw, would ruin the manufacturing industry of the country. He displayed equal gentleness and firmness when placed at the head of affairs; while he treated courteously every citizen who made a complaint, he rigorously punished those who were detected in treasonable correspondence."

We must reserve for another opportunity the history of this second war.

THE MAGAZINES.

We have received at the last hour copies of the three new magazines,—Parker's, Douglas Jerrold's, and Crinkshank's,—and all three, in their respective characters, deserve a word of commendation. Parker's leading article is a recommendation of the allotment system, written with more zeal than judgment, and betraying in every line a want of discrimination between what is desirable and what is practicable. The author makes an incidental attack on the electoral movement, as likely to lead to the minute subdivision of land! Need we say a word in reply? The other articles of the magazine are written in a good spirit, and display more than average ability.

Douglas Jerrold manfully pleads the part of the labouring classes, and exposes the grievous wrongs inflicted on the industrious by the idle, under the present system. The article headed "Peasants and Pheasants" is one of singular power and cogency; if we thought he had sufficient brains to comprehend it we should recommend it to the consideration of Mr. Grantley Berkeley.

George Cruikshank takes the field against mesmerism, and cuts it in capital style. We extract from his pages the following: "Lines on a Block of Ice brought from America without melting, and exhibited in a Window in the Strand":—

"Ice placed within a shop or room
Will turn to water, we presume;
For 'tis a solvent, all agree;
But here in solvent ice we see.

"Yet, though we cannot solve the ice,
We solve the riddle in a trice;
It comes from Pennsylvania's state,
And therefore will not liquidate."

SNIPE NOT GAME.—Lord Mountechel lately prosecuted two officers of the 3rd Dragoon Guards, stationed at Clogher Barracks, for shooting snipe on his grounds without leave, contrary to the 7th and 8th Victoria, cap. 9, sect. 69; but it was suggested that "snipe was not game," and therefore that the penalties were not incurred. Mr. Brewster and the Solicitor-General have since given their opinion, confirming this view of the case. "Snipe," they say, "is not game."

LUGGAGE LABELS.—We have received from the office of the Railway Bell, a packet of very convenient luggage-labels for the use of travellers. They are covered at the back with an adhesive preparation similar to that of the postage-stamps, so as to be always ready for immediate use; and the printed directions on them are precisely those which are most requisite for passengers.

FREE-TRADE MEETING AT HACKNEY.—A numerously-attended and most respectably-composed district meeting was held on Friday evening, in the Assembly Room of the Merald Tavern, Hackney, for the purpose of advocating the principles of Free Trade, and aiding the National Anti-Corn-Law League in carrying out those principles. There were many ladies present. George Ofor, Esq., was unanimously called to the chair, in which he was supported on the one side by the Rev. J. James Carlile, and on the other by Dr. Oxley, &c. Mr. George Thompson addressed the meeting at some length, in his usually effective manner, and at the conclusion of his speech received enthusiastic and long-continued applause. The Rev. James Carlile, before moving the first resolution, proceeded to read a letter which he had received from the Rev. and venerable Dr. John P. Smith, in which the rev. doctor, after an expression of regret at his inability to attend, proceeded to remark:—"In particular I ardently wish that all religious and faithful persons would pay serious attention to the abundant demonstration of not merely the impolicy and mischief of the Corn Laws and their alliances (and whatever is impolitic and injurious must be sinful), but that those laws which are framed to enhance the price of provisions, and to diminish the means of obtaining them, are wicked and impious in a very high degree." The rev. gentleman then moved the following resolution:—"That, in the opinion of this meeting, the parliamentary franchise is an element of political power which every citizen should seek, by all lawful and proper means, to possess; that, on this ground, they have learned with high satisfaction that the Council of the League has directed its attention to the extension of the franchise, by the enlargement of the county constituency of this country;—a measure which in several of the northern counties has been crowned with signal success. And, believing this plan of action to be in harmony with the spirit of British law, this meeting would express their determination to co-operate with the League, by endeavouring to extend the constituency of the important county of Middlesex." Dr. Oxley seconded the resolution, which was passed unanimously. A vote of thanks was then moved to Mr. George Thompson, "for his able exposition of the principles which should regulate the commerce of this and every other nation," &c.

WEST HACKNEY.—Wednesday a meeting was held at the British School-room, Kingsland, to hear a lecture on the extension of Free-Trade principles, from Mr. George Thompson. The Rev. C. J. Dukes took the chair, and, after an able address, introduced to the meeting Mr. George Thompson, who, after an eloquent and feeling tribute to the early exertions of the venerable Clarkson on behalf of injured Africa, addressed the meeting most effectively on the principles of Free Trade, and detailed the successful efforts of the League in the registration counts throughout the country. The lecturer, after energetically exhorting the people of Middlesex to rescue the county from its present anomalous representation in Parliament, addressed some excellent observations to the meeting on the necessity of early qualification, and set down amidst enthusiastic cheering. Mr. F. Clark moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting cordially approve the efforts made by the League to extend the franchise throughout the boroughs and counties of England, and renounce in the strongest manner, up to the present time, the cowardly efforts, and pledges itself to co-operate for the furtherance of the great object. This meeting would also express its gratification in the prospect of the Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar, and its hope that the ladies of this neighbourhood will cordially unite in the undertaking." Mr. S. Green, of Newington, seconded it, and it was carried unanimously. The meeting, after votes of thanks to Mr. G. Thompson and the Chairman, separated.

It is an interesting circumstance, and one confirmatory of the improvement of trade, that there are fewer unemployed seamen in the port of London than for many years past.

THE MONOPOLIST LITTLE-GO.

WE ARE ALL UNANIMOUS?

On Thursday se'night three hundred monopolists, peers, squires, tradesmen, and farmers, met at Brighton, to bow down before the altar of landlordism. The golden calf on this occasion, the particular object of adoration, was the Duke of Richmond. Indeed, looking at the report of the proceedings, one is inclined to say the meeting had its origin in the idol's avidity for incense. The Duke was the Alpha and Omega; monopoly and all the rest were incidentals. As a ministration to the vanity of a grandee, and an illustration of the power of acres to induce men to "eat dirt" before the possessor, the meeting was one of much success. But as a demonstration in favour of protection it was a complete failure. It was probably intended as a rehearsal of the farce of unanimity amongst the monopolists, which is to be performed next week in London. What was the result our readers shall presently see. It is plain that the most careful preparation had been made to prevent all appearance of discord, for the meeting "for business" had been held in the morning with closed doors, the "society's reporter" only having been admitted. And, although these precautions had prevented all except one gentleman from openly expressing dissatisfaction, there was scarcely a single speaker who did not incidentally disclose the wide-spread discontent with their monopolist leaders, which prevails amongst the farmers.

The meeting was composed in a great measure of landlords, land-agents, and tradesmen, together with such tenant-farmers as are under the immediate influence of the chief landlords of the district. The one of the monopolist grandees was to flatter the farmers by the most outrageous and absurd panegyrics; to assume that in struggling for protection the landowners were only seconding a spontaneous movement by the farmers; and to keep up a show of entire unanimity between the monopolist landlords and their oft-debated tenants. Thus the Duke of Richmond talked about everything but farmers and farming. He referred to his own soldiering, his family, the League, and the Duke of Wellington with the most excellently arranged incoherence; but of monopoly rents and natural prices, insecure tenures and heavy burdens, and all the other subjects which now fill every tenant-farmer's mind with care and anxiety, the ducal president of the "Central Protection Society" uttered not one syllable. Then there was Mr. Stafford O'Brien, member for Northamptonshire,—one of the few county members who can string together two consecutive sentences, albeit he usually talks nonsense,—who furnished the "eloquence" of the evening. He complimented the local protectionist committee on their business-like manner of communicating with the "room in Bond-street;" and said,—"Patience under difficulty, belief and faith in the constituted authorities, belief in the efficacy of truth, generous inclination to forgive injuries and aspersions, were interwoven with the character of the English farmer." Again, in the same strain of fulsome flattery, Mr. O'Brien said:—"But, my lord duke, high as is your station, high as is your social position in this country, you cannot, for no subject could, receive a higher honour than that of being the honoured and trusted president of such a body of men as I now see before me." If the farmers are now to be deluded by such trash as that, they will deserve all the distress they at present suffer. But, in fact, none of them are imposed upon by such "talk;" they have proved its hollowness, and are daily losing faith in their would-be leaders; and none know this better than the monopolist would-be leaders.

After Mr. O'Brien followed Mr. John Ellman, once a great farmer, but now a small squire, and an especial "toady" of the Duke of Richmond. And we are glad that this person can no longer be classed as a farmer, for the brutality of the following passage has only been paralleled by an acrid monopolist in Lincolnshire. He said—"Ours is strictly a defensive society. It will be remembered that we merely united when we were attacked, when the Anti-Corn-Law League came into our county town of Lewes, and by their itinerant orators invited the farmers to attend. They did not do so, and I will tell you why. It was a matter of serious consideration whether the League should be met or not, and at last it was resolved that they should not, for the farmers, not only of Sussex, but throughout the kingdom, had been aspersed and vilified in such a manner, that there was very great excitement amongst them; and in order to prevent a breach of the peace, which I verily believe would have taken place if the young farmers of Sussex had attended, they abstained from doing so. Gentlemen, the meeting was very near the pure stream of the cause, and I am not at all sure that the League orators might not have performed an involuntary ablution in that stream, or in a horsepond, which was quite as near." This gross calumny upon the farmers of Sussex proceeds from a man lately one of their own body, but now, by the favour and for the objects of the Lord Lieutenant, a county magistrate! But Mr. Ellman is well aware of the absolute untruth of his statement: he knows that, however egged on, there would not be found ten farmers, young or old, in the county of Sussex who would perpetrate any such act of violence; and, even if there were any persons capable of outrage towards the Free-Trade speakers, such ruffians would not dare to show themselves in an open meeting. It is only in the packed meetings of the monopolists that the free expression of opinion is put down. The statement, however, proceeding from such a quarter, shows what sort of language is chosen by those most anxious to curry favour with the landed grandees, wherewith to tickle their ears.

Nothing was so much insisted upon as unanimity; thus Mr. Ellman said—"The great point is that we should be unanimous;" the League "is at this moment endeavouring to sever the connexion between the landlords, the tenantry, and the labourers." Let our reader go to any market-table in England, let him stop and talk with the first agricultural labourer he meets with in any part of the country, and he will soon discover that it requires no effort on our parts to "sow divisions" between the industrious agricultural classes and the landowners. The squirearchy has taken care to leave us no room for such exertions, were we inclined to make them. We have had nothing more to do than to mention the existence of such divisions, and to show their connexion with the rent-protecting Corn Laws.

The Duke of Richmond said—"I hold that one of the great objects of the protection society, and one of the great benefits it proposes to accomplish, is, that by its means the landlord, the tenant, and the labourer are united in the same cause." We have no doubt that such was the "proposed" object of the protection society; but has it done so? We shall see presently. Even the poor simple Duke of Norfolk made "one remark," and that was that "it was by such unanimity as that which prevailed amongst them, that they were enabled to show the Anti-Corn-Law League that they were determined to stand, and not only assert, but defend, their rights and privileges."

So also Mr. Darby declared "that there is no jealousy between landlord and tenant, and that they are determined to co-operate together." And he asserted that it was only necessary to "show a bold front," and "be unanimous," to maintain the Corn Laws. And he thus advised the farmers to "follow the excellent advice of Mr. Ellman, and not take for granted any facts on the authority of the Anti-Corn-Law League, or any other body that is not friendly to us, but if there is any question on which you entertain doubts with respect to the importation of foreign corn, that you will submit it to the Protection Society; for what your enemies wish is to make you desperate, to sow dissension amongst us, and, finding they cannot prevail by their own force, they hope to do so by our weakness. But I trust that the straightforward good sense of the gentry, yeomanry, and labourers of this country will be sufficient to guard against their endeavours; and I am perfectly satisfied if you trust to this society which you have yourselves formed, if you apply to it to give you any information you want, if you take your facts from your friends whom you trust, instead of from your enemies whom you ought to distrust, then I say, looking at such meetings as these, I cannot help looking forward to the future with the hope that, in looking back upon the past, we have seen the worst."

Now, all these exhortations to unanimity indicate that there is a screw loose somewhere; and Mr. Darby's warning against receiving "facts" from the League, is an amusing proof that the farmers' faith in the "Bond-street" facts has been somewhat shaken. Men do not exhort those to be unanimous who have never differed; or tell those who have only accepted information from friends not to listen to opponents. But, beyond the circumstantial evidence of discord which is to be found in the speeches of the lords and M.P.'s, we have the direct testimony of other speakers. For instance, Mr. Edward Wyatt said, "He had been frequently asked this question, and asked, too, by practical farmers, 'Why do you belong to the Protection Society? What good have they done you?'" And Mr. Wyatt, like other and greater monopolists, found that a rather difficult question to answer; therefore he left it unanswered, and set to and abused the League. And Mr. Prime, the active committee-man, said, "I was sorry to hear it whispered here and there, that some members of our body, who had formed exaggerated notions of what was to be effected by the society, have been disappointed that nothing more striking—that nothing more magnificent—should have been achieved by its operations. It is highly necessary we should warn our associates against such chimerical notions." And we can easily understand this feeling; for surely never did such a mountain in labour as the Pro-Corn-Law meetings of last year bring forth such ridiculous abortions as the acts of the Protection Societies in opposition to Free Trade.

Again, Mr. A. Denman, a farmer, stated, "on his own personal observation," that prior to the formation of the society "there were, in his own neighbourhood, some who were wavering on this great question,—nay, who were just going over to

"If, however, I am not tiring you, I would beg to call your attention to the present condition of the labourers. I grieved to see that there was to-day very great distress reported to exist amongst them; and I can myself say, from my own practical knowledge and observation, THAT SUCH IS THE CASE. Yet I am disposed to think that, though we may not be able to give them employment, yet we may, to a very great extent, sympathize with them."

This is the farmers' account of the condition of the labourers; presently we shall hear the monopolist duke's.

Then occurred a scene to which we can only do justice by giving it in the very words of the reporter:—

"Mr. Wood (of Hicksted): My lord duke, as a small farmer—[Mr. Wood was seated at the lower end of the room; the reporters were near the head of the table; consequently we could not see what was going on, but sounds as of a person struggling with others reached even our distant part of the room. This was mixed with loud cries of 'Order, order!']

"Mr. Wood: I beg to be allowed to—(loud cries of 'No, no, no,' mixed with a partial 'Hear, hear, hear.') Mr. Wood continued amidst the interruptions: My lord duke, hear me! Let us drink the health of those labourers in cold water, for that is the liquor which the labourers are now obliged to drink. (Cries of 'Order, order,' and confusion.)

"The Duke of Richmond: Gentlemen (cries of 'Order, order; chair, chair'), as your chairman (the confusion still prevailing, there were loud cries of 'Chair, chair, chair,' from all parts; over and above all which, one cry of 'Chair,' in a most stentorian voice, was at length heard, and appeared to produce the desired effect of restoring order.) As your chairman (repeated his grace on silence being obtained), it is my duty to call that gentleman to order who has caused this interruption. (Applause.) I never have shrunk, nor I never will shrink, from the duty which I feel myself imperatively called upon to perform. Gentlemen, the toast that has been proposed, and most ably proposed, by that gentleman [Mr. Denman] (loud cheers), was intended to show our good-will towards the labourers of the county. Gentlemen, in the first part of this evening I was called upon, or I felt myself called upon, to express to you the good opinion which I had of that class. I feel that they are the main instruments of our prosperity, and that they are of great importance to the country at large; for how could we plough the field—how could we cultivate the soil—unless we had our honest, industrious, and independent labourers? (Cheers.) It is in this light I look upon them; and I may now be permitted to say that I have the honour of being the president of the first association which asked the meritorious labourers to dine at their board. (Loud cheers.) Are we, then, to be interrupted by a gentleman stating that water alone is what they have to drink? (PARTIAL APPLAUSE.) I affirm, without the fear of contradiction, that the farmers of Sussex have ever felt, and I trust they ever will feel, that imperative duty which we are all of us bound to perform, that 'We should do unto others that which we wish to be done to ourselves.' (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, in the district which I reside in, I am happy to say that there are no men out of employment, who have not misconducted themselves in their employment. (Cheers.) I stated at the Steyning agricultural meeting, that I felt it was the duty of the landowners to employ all the good men, and I would rather drink water myself for the rest of my life than see one man—(very great cheering which drowned the rest of the sentence). These things being so, then, I ask you now to respond to that tenant-farmer, who has so well expressed his opinions on this subject, and drink 'Prosperity to the labouring classes.'"

Drink water, indeed! Have not the labourers of Sussex dined (once) at the same table with me, the great I, and don't I feel for the labourers and think well of them; and is not that enough to sweeten everything they drink—though it may look like water—with a pleasant flavour, for the rest of their lives? Such was, in effect, the Duke's speech. Yet later in the evening the Duke, having a whole-some fear of the League before his eyes, thus qualified his round assertions, that there were no labourers out of employment, and that they were receiving "fair remuneration." He said, "It is possible for the Anti-Corn-Law League to go down into my neighbourhood and find men who are only receiving eight shillings or nine shillings a week; but if they will inquire what their conduct has been, they will find it has been such that they have lost the confidence of their employers."

This is mere subterfuge. The confidence of a farmer in a farm-labourer, forsooth! We need not tell our readers that wages in Sussex are low, and employment precarious; and they will know how to estimate the Duke of Richmond's statements on this head at their true worth. His Grace probably employs constantly a certain number of men on his own domain, at fair wages, and then fancies, or affects to fancy, that all the "deserving" labourers are "receiving fair remuneration." We shall hereafter have occasion to refer to some particulars of the Duke's tenantry, and the management of his Sussex property, with which we have been furnished; and it will be seen that his self-vaunted liberality is a hollow and unsound thing.

We have only space to refer to one other occurrence at this meeting. All the landlords asserted and reiterated, in every variety of expression, that the protectionist movement of last year originated with the tenant-farmers; and Mr. Prime, in giving the "tenantry of the empire," said—

"Allow me, before I conclude, to call your attention to the fact that they were the men who originated these meetings—that they wear on their brows the immortal laurels of having commenced this movement; and that, though supported, as I trust it ever will be, by the landlords, yet the tenant-farmers commenced it."

Yet, what was the truth, as pointedly stated and admitted at this very meeting?

The honorary secretary of the Sussex Protection Society is Mr. Walter Burrell, the son of a large landowner of the county, Sir Charles Burrell, a monopolist member of Parliament, and so forth. Of course such a secretary's health was toasted at such a meeting with all due reverence. But the proposer, Mr. Thomas Blaker, seems to have been one of those practical men who will give a reason,—country gentlemen, on the authority of the judges, are never safe if they give their reasons for their acts,—and he, to enhance the enthusiasm of the meeting, let out this awkward truth, that the society was got up by Mr. Burrell. He said:—

"I am aware, gentlemen, you all agree with me that he is 'the worthy son of a worthy sire'; but I cannot sit down without giving you some slight idea of the great labour he has undergone in our service. (Applause.) I remember about this time twelve months all around was darkness and dismay: then it was that our secretary came forward with scarcely six tenant-farmers to back him; and he,—by his exertions and by the suavity of his manners,—he it was that was in a great degree the cause of the great meeting at Steyning, and of the party which is gathered together to-day—a party that I should be very glad if Sir Robert Peel could see. (Cheers and laughter.) I am quite sure, my lord duke and gentlemen, that, so long as we can continue the services of our secretary, so long will our meetings be equally large and powerful; for there is not a man in existence that could have spent more of his time in support of this cause, that could have been more accessible, more courteous when called on, more kind in his manner, or more competent to the discharge of his duties, than our worthy secretary."

Here we have the whole secret. The suavity of Mr. Burrell, backed by all the influence of Sussex landlordism—of which he seems to be a mild impersonation—"with scarcely six tenant-farmers to back him," succeeded in getting up a meeting, which the landocracy thought could be passed off as a spontaneous movement by tenant-farmers.

TRUE FARMERS' FRIENDS.

The tone always assumed towards the tenant-farmers by the monopolist landlords is peculiarly offensive. They patronise and they lecture; they profess to teach that which the farmers all know far better than their self-sufficient instructors; and, after all, they contrive to evade and shirk any reference to the real sources of the tenants' difficulties. Far from affording to their tenants that information which, from their leisure and education, they ought to be able to give, they endeavour to foster all the prejudices to which the cultivators of the soil sometimes cling. But in all this the political squires miscalculate. They greatly under-estimate the intelligence of the mass of tenant-farmers, in supposing that all the monopolist trash passes current with them.

This is clearly shown whenever a man of sense and education boldly and frankly offers to farmers an exposition of the system by which farmers have been made the dupes, the instruments, and the victims of the landlords. An illustration of this is afforded by the speech of Mr. James Brotherton—a relative of the excellent member for Salford—at Wingerworth Farmers' Club. On the anniversary meeting of the club, a large party of tenant-farmers assembled, and, after the usual routine toasts, Mr. James Brotherton was called upon to propose "Success to Agriculture." After commencing by an able statement of the direct and immediate interest farmers have in understanding the science of their business, which he illustrated by the advantages derived from correct analyses of the soil, the amalgamation of different soils, and the right application of manures, he said—

"Farmers' clubs were established not only to discuss and promote the improvements which are more immediately connected with the practical cultivation of the soil, but also as affording to the tenant-farmers an opportunity of discussing, and so to lay the foundation for removing, the obstacles which cripple their energies, and prevent them from deriving that fair proportion of advantage from the prosecution of their trade which they have a right to expect." This is true, and we have no doubt that farmers will soon turn these clubs to some such account. A few addresses to farmers' clubs, like that of Mr. Brotherton, will help on that desirable consummation. And the way in which his speech was received will encourage other gentlemen to address tenant-farmers like men of business and common sense. It is time the "preacher" "preacher," adult-instruction tone adopted towards farmers should cease. The time is come when they must look to realities, and eschew the delusions of monopolist landowners. Let them attend to Mr. Brotherton, and mark the reception of his outspoken truths by his tenant-farmer audience:—

"I am aware that, in most of the farmers' clubs which have been established in different parts of the country, great anxiety has been evinced by certain parties to exclude the discussion of what they call (and I believe them) 'obnoxious subjects'—such as rents, leases, and game. (Loud cheers.) But somehow or other, in almost every club of whose proceedings I have seen any account, these 'obnoxious subjects' have crept in, in spite of all the shifts and manoeuvres which have been resorted to to keep them out. (Continued cheers and laughter.) And, gentlemen, I think it perfectly right that these things should be discussed. (Renewed cheers.) There are times when farmers must speak out, not only about guano and drilling, but about land-agents, land-valuers, and game-preservers (LOUD CHEERS); and indeed it would be no compliment to a landlord to suppose that he would wish you to keep silence upon those topics which affect the privileges and just rights of your occupation, and more especially upon those grievances which it may be in his power to alleviate or remove. (VOCIFEROUS CHEERING.)"

Mr. Brotherton then quoted several passages from Professor Low's recent work "On Landed Property," to show that leases and fair rents are essential to agricultural prosperity; and he concluded with an eloquent exposition of the dependence of agriculture upon the prosperity of our commerce and manufactures.

Mr. Binns, who followed, made, in the course of his speech, the following just remark, that land-agents are often blamed for acts which really lie at the landlords' door. He said:—

"Mr. Brotherton had alluded to the land agents, against whom a heavy score was laid. Now, he thought that class of people were rather too roundly rated, and that more was fathered upon them than they were justly entitled to bear. (Laughter.) Let them look at the matter fairly. A land-agent goes to the landlord and says, 'My lord,' or 'Sir'—as the case may be—'the times are bad, and it is impossible that I can collect the full amount of rent; you must make some allowance.' 'Oh,' says the landlord, 'I can't hear of such a thing; I have been giving fêtes and balls in London (LOUD LAUGHTER AND CHEERS); I have spent £100,000, and must have money to pay my debts.' (Hear, hear.) In such a case what was the poor agent to do? How could he help himself when he received imperious commands like these? Let them not be too hard upon the agents."

Again, on the subject of tenure, he said:—

"A man takes a farm; his landlord for the time being may be a reasonable one, and the tenant has an inward conviction that he will not be displaced so long as he pays the rent; but then, probably, he has to look forward to the coming of a future heir to the estate, who may, from caprice, or a variety of motives, blight the prospects of the tenant at a breath, and drive him at a short notice from the farm. (Cries of 'Hear, hear.') The industry of years is, as it were, lost to him; he receives no compensation worth the name for the hardship he endures, and can obtain no sufficient reason for the visitation brought upon him. (RENEWED CRIES OF 'HEAR, HEAR.')

This often proceeds from the ignorance of landlords:—

"He had no hesitation in saying that nine-tenths of the landlords in this country were not aware of the state of their tenantry. This fact of itself was a very unfortunate one, and pregnant with great meaning. He (Mr. Binns) had been engaged all his life with landowners; he was, however, free from them now, and right glad he was to be so. (MUCH CHEERING AND LAUGHTER.) He wanted the saddle to be placed on the right horse."

As to the capacity of the soil for improvement, he said:—

"Mr. Brotherton had given them an instance of a celebrated chemist doubling the produce of a farm. In three years, he (Mr. Binns) had trebled the produce on a portion of his farm. (Cheers.) There was not a farmer in that room who could have done this—and why? Because he had not sufficient capital to expend in the necessary experiments, whereas he (Mr. Binns) had the capital of a large company at command. (Hear, hear.) He was told by Mr. Stephenson to adopt the best method and grow as much as possible, in order that the agriculturists of the district might see what skill and capital could accomplish. During the last three years he had produced on land which some present know to be the worst round Clay Cross, and which had let at £1 an acre, very considerable crops. When he entered upon his small farm he put in 70,000 draining tiles; he had now capital standing upon it to the amount of £6000, but he had no hesitation in saying that in three years' time he would not have one farthing of capital upon it. (Hear.)"

We know cases in which farmers have entered upon farms in the full expectation of raising treble the crops which had been raised by their predecessors; and these, too, shrewd, money-making men, who have founded their calculations of profit upon success in so doing. Mr. Holland, a farmer, also said:—

"The farmers ought to use every effort to improve their condition, considering the diminished price of corn and cattle. If landlords would come forward when tenants were in difficulties, and say, 'We will meet your case by reducing the rent' (LOUD CHEERS), their struggles would meet with some alleviation. But such was not the case. Instead of meeting them with sympathy, on a tenant's complaining, the answer, in a majority of cases, was, 'If you do not like to stay on the farm, you may leave it; we have plenty waiting for it.' (Hear, hear.) Let the farmers then, in future, depend more upon themselves. He knew there were some landlords who acted upon the principle, 'Live and let live,' BUT UNFORTUNATELY THEY WERE FEW, COMPARATIVELY. (Hear, hear.) Farmers' clubs would tend to unite farmers in one common bond of agreement in all that concerned their mutual interests. Talent and experience would be brought to their aid, together with the advantages of superior implements; and by aiding each other, by concentrating their means of information and acting upon them, they would be able to stand in their own defence much more effectually than in their merely individual capacity. (Hear, hear.) What was of importance, too, they would produce more effect upon the landlords. (CHEERS.)"

The following instance of liberality on the part of a landowner ought not to be omitted.

Mr. Brown, the agent of Sir Henry Hanuloke, said:—

"He had occasion to accompany Sir Henry Hanuloke over part of the estate, and was struck on observing that one tenant, who had entered upon barren land at 3s. an acre, had made it worth 20s. (Cheers.) The tenant asked for such security only as would repay him for the outlay; and his landlord, instead of taking advantage of the improvement made in his property, at once gave him a lease, in order to secure the tenant against the possibility of a successor to the estate dealing unfairly by him. (Loud cheers.) He (Mr. Brown) made a valuation, and instead of the tenant paying 25s. an acre (the real value), he had a security at 3s. 6d. (Renewed cheers.) As regarded himself, he (Mr. Brown) was favourable to leases. (Hear.)

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

West Binny, by Linlithgow, Jan. 20.

Sir,—I have looked week after week, but in vain, through the LEAGUE (the best agricultural newspaper in the United Kingdom), expecting some one of your intelligent correspondents or lecturers would state something about the iniquitous waste of valuable manure, from the Land's-end to John-o'-Groat's House. But no one has spoken or written about this (in my humble opinion) crying sin, if I may be allowed to call it; I conceive we may as well tumble as many quarters of wheat into the Irwell, Thames, Mersey, Clyde, Forth, or any other rivulet or river which conducts it ultimately into the sea. I have had occasion lately, in pursuing my business (selling turnips to dairymen and others) both in Edinburgh and Glasgow, to see almost every dungcart in every lane in both cities; and no one who has not seen it would believe the incalculable loss sustained from the manure and urine, more especially of the cows, to say nothing of the horses, running to waste. I am the more confirmed that my calculation is just—viz., that if every man, woman, and child preserved their offals, by covering them up with earth, plaster of Paris, or something else, to keep in the ammonia (I have tried it for some time), and if all the manure in these kingdoms were properly husbanded, notwithstanding our increase of 1000 per day, we would, by sending it along by road and rail, conduit and pail, and other conveyances, be enabled to send out corn in those vessels that are now bringing in guano from Ichaboe, &c. We would then save the carriage of other manures, after having fed every mouth of man and beast in the land to the full; and I hold that every man who works for his bread by the sweat of his brow has as good a right to be fed and clad as any other nobleman in the land. I would suggest to you to send, with my best respects (that of a Linlithgowshire farmer), to every chief magistrate in every town in her Majesty's dominions (and the small villages and villas will hear of it), this advice about dung, after having put it into a condensed form in your paper. I would further only beg to add that, until the hand that writes this is turned as cold as the earth from which it was taken, I shall never cease to write and to speak against the accursed and most unjust laws which starve our less-favoured and worse-used brethren. I have the honour to subscribe myself,

Yours, most respectfully,

J. THOMSON, Tenant-farmer.

Since writing the prefixed, I have observed in the LEAGUE the hard case of Mr. John Hardcastle; and beg to say that, if he requires it, to obtain a better farm and a better landlord, I shall cheerfully add my mite to any subscription that may be set a-going for that purpose.

"An Essex Farmer," writing to the Times on the fact that rents and tithes are doubled and trebled since 1790, while the prices of corn and meat are now about the same as they were fifty years ago, says—

"Prices for corn and meat fell lower and lower, unless influenced by scarcity; and no ingenuity of the worthy Northampton baronet or of the protection societies will ever get them up, if Englishmen are true to their own interests and to their country. Rents and tithes must be assailed. The farmer does not require high prices for his produce. Land is always cultivated better with low—if requires less capital in money, and more in labour."

That farmers should desire to render prices artificially high is, indeed, most strange. Low prices and abundant produce are what the farmer should seek.

THE GAME LAWS.

On Thursday a numerous meeting of the farmers and inhabitant rate-payers of the parish of Ruiship, Middlesex, was held in the vestry room of Ruiship church, "to consider the cruelty, injustice, and ruinous consequences of the game laws, with a view to petition Parliament for the repeal or modification of the same." Mr. N. Sones, a landed proprietor, was in the chair. Resolutions, and a petition in accordance with the objects of the meeting, were agreed to.

"SPECIAL BURDENS."—In Great Britain the proportion of taxation borne by land is one-thirty-fourth; in France two-thirds; in Prussia and Austria one-half; and yet the landed interest talks of its special burdens.—Complete Suffrage Almanac.

CORN AND TIMBER DUTIES.—The Economist argues that the corn and timber of all countries having treaties with us containing "the most favoured nations" clause, are admissible at the colonial duties only, which are levied on American corn and timber and the river St. John, by the 23rd clause of the Ashburton treaty.

THE VOICE OF TIME.—The voice of Time cries to man, Advance! Time is for his advancement and improvement; for his greater worth, his greater happiness, his better life; his progress onward to that goal within his knowledge and his view, and set there in the period when time and he began. Ages of darkness, wickedness, and violence, have come and gone: millions uncountable have suffered, lived, and died: to point the way before him. Who seeks to turn him back, or stay him on his course, arrests a mighty engine which will strike the meddler dead; and be the horror and the wilder, ever, for its momentary check!—The Times.

INCENDIARISM.—We regret to observe several instances of this crime. On the night of Saturday last the premises of Mr. Harrison, of Tipworth, near Bury, were discovered to be on fire, and two barns, two stables, a cow-house with three cows and a calf, and a granary with a large quantity of corn, were destroyed. On Sunday night a barn stack, belonging to Mr. Gupp, of Walsingham-le-Willows, was destroyed by fire. Several other fires have lately occurred in this parish, but in no instance have the perpetrators been discovered.—Cambridge Advertiser.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"An Admirer of the League."—"Having recently purchased a freehold piece of land within the borough, which I intend to occupy myself, but it is not connected with the property which gives me a borough vote. The land has no building erected on it, but is of a sufficient value to give a county vote. Am I entitled to claim?"

[Freehold land, without building thereon, of the value of 40s. per annum, in own occupation, will enfranchise for the county, but not for the borough.]

We announced last week, that the communications made by our correspondents with reference to the space devoted to Advertisements were under the consideration of the Council. We now beg to announce that the Council has resolved to confine the Advertisements to the last page.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, February 1, 1845.

The Ministerial changes announced in the Times of Thursday morning have taken the public by surprise. Of these the most important is the resignation of the Presidency of the Board of Trade, by Mr. Gladstone,—certainly one of the most active and intelligent members of the Government. According to the Times, the right honourable gentleman retires because the concessions which the Ministers are prepared to make to the Irish people involve a greater sacrifice of the exclusive privileges of the Church of England in Ireland than is consistent with Mr. Gladstone's well-known opinions on ecclesiastical supremacy. Rumour adds that there was also a wide difference of opinion between the Premier and the President of the Board of Trade on the subject of the sugar-duties; and that the extensive connexion of Mr. Gladstone's family with railroads led other members of the Cabinet to doubt the propriety of his continuing to hold office in a department to which the official supervision of railway speculations has been intrusted. Lord Dalhousie will be the new President of the Board of Trade; and his place as Vice-President will be filled by Mr. Cardwell, the member for Clitheroe.

Sir Thomas Fremantle will be the new Secretary for Ireland; and he will be succeeded in the post of Secretary at War by Mr. Sidney Herbert, who will also be admitted to a seat in the Cabinet. The Earl of Lincoln, whose administration of the Woods and Forests has given general satisfaction, and who is believed, at least, to waver in his attachment to the corn monopoly, will be received with his present office into the Cabinet. Both secretaryships of the Admiralty are vacant: it is understood that one will be given to Mr. Corry. Some other changes are rumoured, but none of any greater interest or importance than those we have mentioned.

The publication of these changes in the Times is, of course, regarded as a significant cut to the Standard-Herald,—a connexion of which Sir Robert Peel has been long known to be heartily weary and ashamed. Indeed, some short time since, the Standard, for self and shadow, was forced to disavow all connexion with the Ministry, by declaring that the present Government had no official organ. We take little interest in these squabbles of journals; but, if there must be such a thing as a Ministerial paper, we are glad to find it one of a respectable character.

Since the above was written we have received information that Mr. Cardwell's elevation is doubtful, the Government not being certain that the hon. gentleman's re-election is secure.

THE LEAGUE BAZAAR.

What are the friends of Corn-Law abolition in Kelso purposing to do in aid of the Bazaar to be held in Covent-garden Theatre in the month of May next? We would cordially invite our townsmen, and especially the ladies, to set about the formation of such articles as they may have in their power to forward to this great national demonstration. In the view of allowing all to participate in so noble a work, we would also suggest that betwixt this and may next a soiree be held, and the tickets of admission fixed at such a price as will put it in the power of the great majority to contribute their mite on such a glorious occasion. We trust that a "Bazaar Committee" will be immediately formed, and the necessary arrangements set on foot. We shall be glad to receive any suggestions from our friends in different localities.—Kelso Chronicle.

We have pleasure in making known to the friends of Free Trade, that the commencement of a movement in support of the National Free-Trade Bazaar, to be held in May next in Covent-garden Theatre, has been made in Hull by one every way worthy to take the initiative in so good and so commendable a work. In this town, where it is above all things difficult to prevail upon any to take the lead, example is everything; and by none could such an example be set with more propriety than by the chairman of the Free-Trade Council, Sir William Lowthrop. With a view to combine the useful and the ornamental in his Bazaar donation, Sir William purchased a valuable timepiece, for which he gave ten guineas, and at once placed it at the disposal of the committee in Manchester. We are of opinion that Sir William Lowthrop could adopt no better plan for aiding the Free-Trade Bazaar than a public tea-meeting at the Victoria-room; The Rev Mr. Aspinall has kindly promised to attend; and, were it necessary, we could secure the presence of a member of the Free-Trade Council at Manchester. But Mr. Aspinall is a host in himself, and with the assistance of our own merchants, shipowners, and tradesmen, and more especially if countenanced by the fair sex, there can be no doubt that we should succeed in the establishment of an influential Bazaar committee. Such a meeting is wanted, at all events, to infuse fresh spirit into the Free-Trade; and, were only proper energy displayed, it might be held in the course of the ensuing week. Without a tea-meeting, the proceedings with respect to the Bazaar will be all of an isolated character.—Hull Advertiser.

As soon as the intention of the League to hold a Bazaar was made known, the spirited weavers of Barnard-Castle at once determined that their town should be represented by a specimen of hand-loom carpet-weaving. It was considered that a subscription of £15 would cover the material for a carpet of the finest description. Not satisfied with this, however, it has been ultimately determined that a Persian rug, a Scotch, a Brussels, and a Venetian carpet, shall be prepared, each with an original pattern, allusive to Free Trade. The materials will, in all, cost £30. We are glad to say that £22 are already subscribed, and no doubt the balance will be speedily forthcoming. Let every town in the county of Durham "go and do likewise." We have great pleasure in recording the spirit displaying at Barnard-Castle, and recommend this zealous and active little town to the notice of the advocates of the League, who have hitherto overlooked it.—Tyne Mercury.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Chamber of Deputies divided, on Thursday, on the following amendment to the first paragraph of the address:—"Our labours ended, a few months ago, in the midst of complications which clear-sighted and firm conduct might have prevented, or terminated in a more satisfactory manner." On the question being put to the vote, the Ministry had a majority of twenty-eight—a larger number than was expected. A very interesting discussion took place on Saturday evening, on the third paragraph of the address, which alludes to the identity of Mr. Pritchard. The following amendment was moved:—"We learn with satisfaction, that harmony, so necessary for the peace of the world, has been maintained between the two states. But we regret that, in conceding a reparation which is not due, sufficient account was not held of the rules of justice and of reciprocity, which France will always respect." On a division, the numbers appeared so nearly equal, that there was considerable doubt as to which party had the majority. The President, however, after consulting with the secretaries, declared the amendment lost. After much further discussion, another division took place, when the Ministers had a majority of eight only. The remaining paragraphs of the address were voted seriatim, and ultimately the whole address was carried by a majority of 183—a number which, being wholly unexpected, caused great surprise. It is anticipated that a further effort will be made to overthrow the Guizot Ministry, on the vote for the Secret Service Money Bill.

In an express of the Herald of yesterday, their French correspondent states that on Wednesday a meeting of Conservative deputies was held, when not less than 47 adhesions were given in to the Ministry. The King's answer to the address of the deputies is also given; and in it his French Majesty speaks warmly of the happy relations established between France and England.

SWITZERLAND.—The latest accounts from Switzerland reported that country to be in a state of increasing agitation. At Argovie they were making preparation to attack Lucerne. Attempts were also making to induce other cantons to join some confederation which they call the "Popular Helvetic Association." The Council of Zurich has resolved, by a majority of nine to four, to send federal commissioners to Lucerne to insist upon the propriety of their receiving Jesuits to oppose the formation of the free corps, while at the same time interference in their affairs by other cantons would be promised to be put down by force if necessary.

ABD-EL-KADER.—The Moniteur Algerien of the 20th ult. announces that Abd-el-Kader remains at Sebra, in Morocco. His camp and his deira are well supplied by the religious gifts of the true believers. The Algerien states that "the last courier from Africa confirms the statement made by Marshal Bugeaud in the Chamber of Deputies relative to the position of Abd-el-Kader in Morocco. From all provinces of the empire deputations from the Berberes have visited him in his retreat, bringing him offerings, saluting him as the regenerator of Islamism, and offering him the assistance of their arms to combat the Christians, and to overthrow the dynasty which oppresses them, and which has abdicated the religious sovereignty by declaring impious the martyr of the faith, who during fourteen years defended his God, his religion, and his country."

BAYONNE, Jan. 24.—EXECUTION OF ZURBANO.—Zurbano was discovered in a house in the immediate neighbourhood of Logrono, on the road to the Sierra de Camaraz, near the spot where his two sons and other partisans had been arrested. The officer who effected his capture was an old comrade known under the sobriquet of El Rayo (the Thunderbolt). The latter had been long in pursuit of him, having sworn to take him alive or dead. His brother-in-law, Cayo Muro, a major of cavalry, on half-pay, was shot dead, in endeavouring to escape by a window. Zurbano was less fortunate; being taken prisoner, he was led to Logrono, where the Governor, Brigadier Aynat, commanded him immediately to prepare for death. He was shot in the back, in the market-place of Logrono, at eleven o'clock on the morning of the 21st inst. General Prim had been pardoned by the Queen at the recommendation, it is said, of Narvaez.

CATHOLICISM IN GERMANY.—DRESDEN, Jan. 19.—The Roman Catholics of this city who have resolved to withdraw from the supremacy of Rome, will take the next decisive step. We hear in a few days there is to be a general meeting, when M. Ronge will state his views respecting the measures which are now necessary.

ALEXANDRIA.—Intelligence to Jan. 6 states that the epidemic still raged among the cattle. Upwards of 8000 oxen imported from Tarsus had lately died of it in Lower Egypt. It would appear from reports current at Alexandria, that the Russians were collecting a large military force in Armenia, and that another treaty, like that of Unkar-Skelessay, was on the tapis at Constantinople.

UNITED STATES.—News from New York on Monday of January, by the ship Ses, reached Liverpool on Monday evening. It states that several schemes for the annexation of Texas were under discussion in the House of Representatives, but nothing decisive had been agreed to.

The Ohio House of Representatives had resolved the resolutions passed in the session of 1841-2, censuring John Quincy Adams for presenting a petition for the dissolution of the Union; the vote was—yeas 41, nays 21. Both Houses of the Ohio Legislature had passed resolutions in favour of the immediate occupation of Oregon. The New Hampshire Legislature has adopted decided resolutions against the present tariff.

Mexico.—Accounts from Mexico state that the army of Santa Anna had deserted him, and that he had been, by a decree of Congress, formally banished from Mexico.

HOORIBLE SHIPWRECK AND LOSS OF LIFE.—The American brig Gazelle, Captain Philbrook, from Bangor, United States, bound to Port-au-Prince, was capsized in lat. 30, long. 64, on the morning of December 12, while lying in a gale of wind. She immediately filled with water, turned bottom up, but soon righted again, with the loss of three men. The decks were swept of everything movable, and the bulwarks gone. The rest of the crew stuck to the wreck, on which they remained twenty-four days, during which time their sufferings from the absence of water were intense. No less than nine vessels passed them during that period, without affording them the least relief. Two men were stationed on the rigging constantly making signals of distress. On the eleventh day a piece of canvas was affixed to the mainmast, which was intended to serve as a bucket to catch what rain water might run down the mast. The only provisions were a few beef bones and pork rinds. On the 6th of January the American ship Tamerlane, Captain Theobald, from Savannah, bound to Liverpool, hove in sight, bore down, and took off the famished wretches, and brought them to Liverpool, where a subscription has been opened for them. —Liverpool Chronicle.

THE STATE OF NEW ZEALAND.—Extract of a letter (to the Times), dated Wellington, Oct. 10, 1844:—"I need not tell you that receiving news from home gives me a small share of consolation, and particularly under my present circumstances, for things have come to such a state here, that we are all on the point of starvation. I have made application to several captains of vessels to allow me to work my passage home, but could not succeed, not being able to perform a seaman's duty. What I am to do God only knows, for I cannot get employment, and I am sorry to say I am not the only one. My partner, poor fellow, is living with the Mourees in the most miserable state; and, for myself, I am walking the beach, not knowing how to procure a meal's victuals: we have been compelled to sell the land we purchased to get us food, for £6, land having decreased in value about 10 per cent.; and I expect in a short time people will be able to get it for 5s. per acre. The land claims are almost in the same state as they were before the arrival of our new governor; he has not done the least thing to benefit the place; if anything, he has made it worse."

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The New York Sun gives news from the Sandwich Islands to the 10th of August, and states, confidently, that the French have excluded English vessels from Tahiti.

DOMESTIC.

The Hon. Francis Charteris, M.P., and Mr. Thomas Duff, M.P., are to be the mover and seconder of the Address on the Queen's speech.

A rumour has reached us, that a private meeting of the members of the Court of Common Council, convened by Sir Ashurst, has taken place, for the purpose of considering the propriety of petitioning for Jewish emancipation. —Jewish Chronicle.

A petition against the income-tax is in the course of signature in Berwick. We observe that the names are headed by that of our worthy chief magistrate, followed by many of our chief citizens. The distinction between an income-tax and a property-tax is noticed, and the gross income of being both alike put in a striking light. —Berwick Warder.

On Saturday night Liverpool was visited with a tremendous gale. It is feared that great destruction to the shipping on the coast has taken place. One vessel, the Monaster, of London, which had sailed from Liverpool for Calcutta, had gone down on Hoyle Bank. The crew were saved. The Athlon steamer, which had sailed from Liverpool for Belfast, having M. Thalberg, and other passengers and vocalists on board, was in imminent peril for several hours, and was forced to put back.

On Sunday a collier vessel was discovered, in a sinking state, on the Scroby Sands, opposite Caistor. The yawl Perseus, manned with beachmen, put off to her assistance, and succeeded in rescuing five or six of the crew, but the remainder, eight in number, perished.

On Tuesday, Mr. Platt, who has been raised to the bench in the room of Mr. Baron Gurney, took his seat in the Court of Exchequer, with the other barons.

A band of poachers, about ten in number, were met with on Saturday night, on the Stoke estate, Herefordshire. The watchers were so severely beaten that they were obliged to keep their beds ever since.

The Reverend Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, in Oxford, Doctor Fausset, and the Reverend Divinity Lecturer, have agreed to receive signatures for a requisition calling upon the convocation to pronounce a solemn condemnation of the doctrines contained in tract No. 90, of the "Tracts for the Times." —Standard.

On Tuesday morning last, a locomotive engine, in the possession of the Manchester and Leeds Railway, at Wharfedale, exploded, killing three of the workmen, and injuring three others.

The Irish Repeal Association met on Monday, at the Convention Hall. Mr. O'Connell was present and spoke, but the proceedings possessed no unusual interest. The rent for the week was £257.

The friends and pupils of Dr. Ryan, the chemical lecturer at the Royal Polytechnic Institution, sat down to an excellent dinner on Thursday last, at the Queen's Arms, Newgate-street, for the purpose of presenting the learned doctor with a gold watch and appendages, of 100 guineas value, with the following inscription:—"Presented to Dr. Ryan, by his friends and pupils, as a testimonial of his valuable attainments." The chairman was J. Frost, Esq., and the vice-chairman Henry Ault, Esq.

The merchants attending "Change have forwarded a memorial to the Grenham Committee, pointing out the inconvenience and want of comfort, and the currents of wind to which they are exposed in the quadrangle, with a request that it may be covered in.

The agitation in Ireland against the Bequests Act is not carried on with great energy. An aggregate meeting of Catholics opposed to the act is in preparation.

The Earl Rosse is elected representative peer for Ireland.

Bishop Higgins calls the Pope's Rescript very harmless, and says that, it being purely hypothetical, it leaves matters precisely as they were.

At a public dinner given at Judo's Hotel, Dublin, in aid of the fund for erecting a new Roman Catholic chapel at Chapelizod, Mr. O'Connell said, speaking of Lord Eliot:—"He came over here one day, and gave a dinner party; his lady gave a ball next day; he went to the Castle, looked about him, said very little to anybody, and then went back to England! There was the full and particular history of Lord Eliot's career as Secretary in this country!" Of Lord Heytesbury Mr. O'Connell said—"I do, in my conscience, believe that he is the primest humbug that ever humbugged this unfortunate humbugged country."

A desperate affray, accompanied with loss of life, occurred last week, at Killaloe, between a party of soldiers and their friends, and a party of police and some country people. The affray originated in the former, who had been amusing themselves fishing by night, having made free with a couple of geese belonging to a farmer named Gleeson, who, in consequence, procured the assistance of two constables, named Brophy and Callaghan, and some of his neighbours. The parties having come into collision, Gleeson and the police were knocked down: Callaghan was stabbed with his own bayonet till he lay for dead. Brophy received two bayonet-wounds, from the effects of which he, too, fell; but, watching an opportunity, again raised himself from the ground, and though writhing with pain, grasping the carbine which lay by his side, he discharged it in the direction of his antagonists, one of whom, a young man named John Ellis, fell dead, the ball having passed through his neck. Others of the parties were desperately wounded; and a man named Malone is missing, and is supposed to have received a shot and fallen into the river. While this dreadful affray was going on Gleeson had escaped from the island, but soon returned with a strong police party from Ballina and Killaloe, who made prisoners of the four soldiers and William and Joseph Ellis, brothers of the deceased. The military also received bayonet wounds in the desperate conflict with the police.

A frightful accident occurred at Limerick on Monday night last. The corpse of a woman named Mary Shaugnessy, who died the same day, was being waked in the attic story of an old house in the Abbey, where the friends of the deceased had assembled in numbers, as is usual among the humbler classes of society, when suddenly the floor gave way, and came down with a tremendous crash, bringing with it the other floors of the house, and burying over thirty poor creatures in the ruins. Assistance being procured, with much difficulty the rubbish was quickly cleared away, and the dead bodies of nine human beings were taken from beneath. Two others expired while being conveyed to Barrington's Hospital. There are seventeen persons in the hospital badly wounded.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, Jan. 27.—The supply of English Wheat to this morning's market was short; nevertheless the sale was exceedingly slow at last Monday's rate, except for the best samples, which were taken off readily. The demand for Foreign Wheat was not active, but former prices were well maintained. The supply of English Barley was very large. The finest qualities were 1s. and secondary 2s. per qr. cheaper. Though the holders of Foreign Barley were unwilling to accept lower rates, the sale was of course affected by the decline in the value of English, and the quantity sold was in consequence very limited. No alteration in Beans. Peas were 1s. lower. The supply of Oats was moderate, but the lay days of many of the Irish vessels having expired, the trade was scarcely so good as on Friday, but the advance of 6d. from this day week was maintained. FRIDAY, Jan. 31.—The supplies of Wheat since Monday here have been moderate. Of Barley a fair quantity has arrived. The arrivals of Irish Oats are short; a few cargoes of Scotch are fresh up this morning, with a very small quantity from our own coast. The Wheat trade remains in precisely the same state as on Monday. Barley is not lower, though the trade continues exceedingly heavy. Oats are held for an advance of 6d., and as the buyers are unwilling to comply, the business doing is very limited. Beans and Peas remain as on Monday. The only alteration in the duties yesterday was an advance of 1s. on Beans. S. H. LUCAS and SON.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quentin Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund. By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

Manchester, Jan. 13, 1845.

The League Bazaar will be held during the month of May next, in the Theatre Royal Covent Garden.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

THE OPENING OF THE SESSION—LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

The first night of the session was of a character—with one striking and satisfactory exception—to justify, in great measure, the remarkable indifference with which the public had awaited the commencement of what is called "the business of the country." The Speech and the debate on the Address were well matched in insipidity. Congratulations on a commercial and manufacturing prosperity whose permanence is, for any thing that appears to the contrary, to be left to the chances of the weather; complimentary allusions to sundry royal visits, as evidences and guarantees of international amities which commercial restriction and prohibition practically disown; a suggestion of the desirableness of redressing one Irish grievance, and a promise of a blue book on another; a hope that parliamentary wisdom will devise the means of "promoting the health and comfort of the poorer classes of my subjects," so far as health and comfort are to be had without promoting food, work, and wages; and some financial generalities, the value of which will be better understood when the promised "financial statement" makes its appearance;—such is the substance of a Speech which has not one word of corn, of sugar, of Brazil and China trade, of game laws, of national education—which is silent on every one of the questions just now nearest to the heart of the people of Great Britain. And the debate was, on the whole, worthy of the Speech. Much excellent "prosperity"—eloquence on the Ministerial side, with nothing said as to how we are to keep our prosperity now we have got it; abundance of able reasoning on Tahiti, Mr. Consul or quasi-Consul Pritchard, Spain, right of search, and charitable bequests, diversified by what a House of Commons always loves to listen to—an "explanation" from an ex-minister; a plentiful hash of the stale commonplaces of party rhetoric, spiced with an average allowance of party feeling: but a dismal lack of wise and earnest discussion on the question of questions which British statesmanship has now to solve—how to give permanence, security, and steady progress siveness to the improved activity in which some of our greatest national interests are at present rejoicing.

With one remarkable exception, however, which we note with satisfaction and hope. The general inanity of a debate—which was mainly spent, on the one side, in complimenting Sir Robert Peel for the results of last summer's sunshine; and on the other, in criticising last autumn's French diplomacy—was relieved by Lord JOHN RUSSELL, in a speech which leads us to hope that he is about to take up that position with regard to the first question of the day which befits the statesman who gained London and lost office as a Free-Trade Minister. We have always regretted his lordship's apparent determination to sacrifice himself in a desperate fidelity to the fixed-duty crotchet—a thing which never had much life in it, and is now dead and buried beyond all possibility of resuscitation. There was a time, years ago, before the Free-Trade principle was understood by the country, when a "moderate fixed duty" would have been pretty generally acquiesced in, as a convenient and useful compromise; and we can respect the motives which then prompted its advocacy. But the question has long since grown beyond a compromise. Any convenience which such an arrangement might once be supposed to have possessed, is now merged in its palpable impracticability. Nobody wants it; nobody asks for it; nobody would accept it. Agitation has brought round "convenience" to be on the side of principle; and the most inconvenient course which a public man could take, for himself or his country, would be to erect the well-meant make-shift of a day into a permanent maxim of policy, and throw himself away on the advocacy of a thing that has neither principle nor feasibility to recommend it. There is now, we trust, an end, once for all, to this most inglorious martyrdom. Lord John Russell has, we rejoice to observe, taken the opportunity of the first night of the session to make, before Parliament and the country, a round, clear confession of Free-Trade faith, in words as large and full as we could desire:—"I AM CONVINCED THAT PROTECTION IS NOT THE SUPPORT, BUT THE BANE OF AGRICULTURE." Can we be mistaken in supposing that this significant declaration means ALL that it says? The time and circumstances of its utterance justify the belief that it does. Lord John Russell is a prudent and careful, as well as an upright, man; knows the force of words; is not given to loose and sweeping statements; is habitually slow to commit himself; and spoke on this occasion after six months' premeditation. The words were instantly caught up by the monopolist leader, Mr. Miles, as a declaration of alliance with the League; and Mr. Miles was left to enjoy his opinion, undisturbed by any disclaimer or explanation of his lordship. They were accepted by Mr. Villiers, as denoting the relinquishment of the ground that had divided his lordship from the Free-Traders; and Mr. Villiers's interpretation was allowed to pass without correction. By the plain, natural meaning of his words, and by his tacit acceptance of that meaning as affixed to them both by friend and foe, Lord John Russell has begun this session by taking his true position as a Free-Trade statesman. We cannot but understand, from his speech of Tuesday night, that he has now kept the promise made last year, to give up "security-grinding." It is inconceivable that he should ever again propose to benefit agriculture by administering a moderate or low fixed allowance of that which he is convinced is its "bane."

We receive this avowal of Free-Trade convictions with the more satisfaction, because of the clear, statesmanlike views with which they are accompanied, as to the practical and pressing urgency of the question. Lord John Russell's Free-Trade principles are not "in the abstract." He sees as plainly, and says as strongly, as any Leaguer, that now is THE TIME—now, with low prices and prosperous trade and manufactures—to redeem the industry of the country, by one wise and honest act, from the awful uncertainties and perils that overwhelm its future. Nothing can be better than his rebuke of the folly that sees matter for boasting, in a prosperity which we hold but from year to year—almost from month to month—by tenancy-at-will of the barometer.*

Lord John Russell may consider himself as most happy in being in the situation of a powerful and honoured parliamentary leader at such a period, to hold the Government to their duty—to mark, control, and chastise their deviations from the straight and honest path—and, backed by that power of popular intelligence and will which Adam Smith and the League have got ready to the hands of the first man that can use it, to take the place which ministerial cowardice and dishonesty vacate. Heartily shall we rejoice to see him show himself worthy of the great nation which is still not unwilling to give him the honour of leading it to industrial and commercial freedom. It were a proud work to do; one to task the highest faculties of beneficent action, and to satisfy the largest ambition for honourable name and fame in history. Never had any public man a nobler position within his grasp—one of higher honour, finer opportunities, or more assured, substantial power—than that which may be Lord John Russell's, should he, by a sincere, unreserved, and thorough adhesion to the Free-Trade cause, choose to make himself the representative of those principles and ideas which are evidently destined to be the ruling powers of the "new generation." There the post is, ready waiting for him; or for another, if he deem himself unworthy of it. It is a change worth his making: from being the last leader of a beaten, broken, and defunct party, to be the first executive Minister of a victorious principle. As Whig Opposition leader, Lord John Russell represents nothing but a respectable, decayed historical tradition; as Free-Trade Minister, he would be a "great fact"—the organ of a great idea—the representative of the highest interests of civilization for his own and the coming age.

AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION SOCIETY.

On Monday last there was a gathering of the dukes and lords, and squires and auctioneers, and land-jobbers and land-agents, that compose this association, at the Freemasons' Tavern. They met not, as the Duke of Richmond once vaunted, to make or unmake a Ministry; on the contrary, mutual condolence was the prevailing characteristic of the loggubrious assemblage: in the words of Lord Beaumont, they met to ask, "Where is the 56s. per quarter that was promised us?" and Echo answered, Where? Others might rejoice over increased revenue, improved trade, extended commerce, greater demand for labour, consequent rise in the rate of wages, and consequent addition to comforts in the families of the industrious; but the selfish spirit of monopoly cares for none of these things: with Lord Beaumont it turns to the Premier, and demands the promised 56s. per quarter. He will listen to no explanation; he is deaf to every consideration that the non-fulfilment of the promise is the cause of the revived prosperity of the country; but, with the obstinacy of Skylock, exclaims:—

"I'll have my bond; I will not hear thee speak.
I'll have my bond, and therefore speak no more.
I'll not be made a soft and dull-eyed fool,
To shake the head, and relent, and sigh, and yield
To Christian intercessors."

The Premier's breach of promise was put into every form of complaint and menace; but it never crossed his lordship's mind that certainty of price is unattainable under a sliding scale, and that the fluctuations in the price of wheat which have produced such misery and loss to the farmers are the necessary results of an artificial system which attempts to fix prices, without reference to the world's markets. Having given abundant proof that protection did not secure the promised 56s. per quarter, he very consistently proposed "The Protection Societies;" and Mr. Baker, of Essex, responded to the toast.

Regis ad exemplar, that is to say, "treading in the steps of the noble lord," Mr. Baker fiercely assailed Sir Robert Peel's concession to the principles of "Free Trade," and defied the Premier to maintain the present system of taxation unless he contrived to raise the price of corn to the promised 56s. per quarter at the least. As everybody knows that the revenue has increased in consequence of the low price of agricultural produce, which enables consumers to spend on exciseable articles the sum which the monopolists previously extracted from them in the enhanced price of food, it is not easy to comprehend the amount of boldness necessary for the enunciation of such a proposition, or the amount of stolidity necessary for its reception. The same gentleman, with a similar disregard not merely of facts but of matters of notoriety, claimed the continuance of protection for the sake of the agricultural labourer; while there is not a man in the country who does not now know that the so-called protection had reduced the agricultural labourer to a state of distress so utterly deplorable that fastidious landlords have commanded it to be hidden from public view.

Mr. Newdigate consoled the company with the assurance that the League was declining in strength; an assertion which was controverted by Mr. Mills, of Elstone. This gentleman called upon his hearers to do something which would prove that their body had some energy and vitality, and as a test he advised them to propose the repeal of the Canada Corn Bill. Earl Malmesbury found it necessary to check this tendency to independent action: he informed his hearers that their policy was to do nothing, and to permit nobody else to do anything. As more protection was out of the question, he thought that they should be satisfied with keeping hold of what they had got; and he indistinctly intimated that whatever changes might be made would, in the present temper of the country, necessarily be in the direction of Free Trade.

The toast of the "Tenant-farmers" was proposed by Mr. Sotherton, and responded to by Mr. Jonas. The speeches were chiefly remarkable for their omissions: very little was said about security of tenure, and nothing of the devastations of game. The toast of "The labourers" was intrusted to Mr. Stafford O'Brien; and he, with the strange inconsistency which seems to have led almost every speaker to run counter to the sentiment he was nominated to advocate, set himself to prove the disadvantage of expending capital on the improvement of land. He asserted that a low price of produce was not beneficial to the agricultural labourer; but he forgot to show, what was really the point at issue, that the labourer was better off in the time of high prices than he is now. We say that protection is the cause of his distress, Mr. S. O'Brien attributes it to low prices; but if he were right the distress should have commenced at the period when prices began to fall, and should have reached its maximum when they were at the lowest. But in truth the distress of the agricultural labourer has not varied perceptibly with the fluctuations in the price of corn, save that in his capacity of consumer, he, in common with all the other industrial classes, has the misery of low wages aggravated by the misery of dear provisions in seasons of artificial scarcity.

The speech of the Duke of Richmond was more than usually vague; but the Duke of Buckingham made what may be termed an official announcement, that the Premier was bound to maintain the present amount of protection. It appears from the report that the proceedings generally were flat and dull; they were not even relieved by those bitter attacks on the League and the characters of its leaders, which gave life to the speeches of the monopolist chivalry some twelve months ago. On the contrary, the Duke of Richmond referred to the League in the deprecatory tone used by the poor Indian to Robinson Crusoe's gun, when he begged that it would not go off and kill poor Man Friday. Except the Duke of Buckingham, no one assumed a tone of confidence; and even his trust was manifestly based on his having paid for a further extension of protection by placing his borough of Buckingham at the disposal of the Minister. Lord Malmesbury's declaration, that the repeal of the Canada Corn Bill was hopeless, chilled every spark of enthusiasm in the breasts of those who were not mere politicians. They felt that there was a practical blunder in collecting agriculturists together to tell them that they were miserable, and that therefore they should resist a change. Such a lame and impotent conclusion renders the proceedings too ridiculous to require further comment.

HOW SLAVERY MAY BE ABOLISHED—THE SUGAR MONOPOLY AND THE ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

We have already shown that the results of the course pursued to abolish the slave trade during nearly forty years, have been, according to the testimony of Sir Fowell Buxton, greatly to aggravate the evil it was intended to cure—that at the present time a more awful waste of human life is every year going on than was expended during the destructive wars of Napoleon. Of 400,000 negroes annually torn from their homes to supply the demand for slaves, only 120,000 are available to the planter: the remaining 280,000 perish! The efforts to put down the slave trade by treaties with foreign powers have equally failed; and the scheme of admitting free-labour sugar and excluding slave-grown sugar will, as we have also shown, prove no less abortive in accomplishing the desired object.

How apt are we to forget that "nothing happens by chance," and that, by disregarding the operations of truthful Nature, we fall into errors and follies involving the highest interests of the human race. It is remarked by an eloquent writer, "The phenomena of trade and labour are as much under law, Divine law, as the phenomena of the seasons." We earnestly entreat our anti-slavery friends to reflect how far the failure of their well-meant efforts may be attributed to the violation of the laws of Nature and Providence.

When God had created man He said,—"Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of ALL the earth, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat." Monopoly is directly opposed to this first gracious gift of God to man—it limits our supplies of food and other productions to a part of the earth only. To uphold monopoly, therefore, under whatever pretence, is to oppose the will of God. Again: we see that it hath not pleased Providence to give to every nation diversities of soil, climate, and productions, but to spread these blessings over countries separated from each other by great distances. But He has given us the sea, "the great highway of nations," by means of which we have easy access to the ends of the earth. Are not His wise and benevolent designs apparent in this dispensation? Are there any other means by which different nations can be so effectually brought into communion with each other as by the mutual interchange of their respective productions? Can peace and brotherly love be so well promoted as by conferring mutual benefits on each other by such exchange? And is not, then, every law prohibiting mutual traffic, under whatever pretext enacted, an impediment to the fulfilment of the beneficent designs of Providence? Slavery, then, cannot be put down by upholding monopoly, or by prohibiting free intercourse, and the free exchange of our productions for the productions of ALL other countries, because this is a violation of the law of Nature, and opposed to the designs of Providence.

It is also vain to suppose that slavery can be put down by mere declarations of its unchristian and iniquitous character. The slave-dealer, wrapt up in his enormous gains, is deaf to appeals to his feelings and conscience; and slaveowners, so long as they believe that the abolition of slavery would bring them to ruin, treat, like Henry Clay, of Kentucky (the late candidate for the Presidency of the United States), as a "visionary dogma," and "speculative abstraction," the simple yet sacred proposition that man cannot hold a property in his fellow-men. We see no way of approach to this class but through their self-interest. Convince the slaveowner that by free labour a greater quantity of sugar can be produced at the same or at less cost than by slave labour, and when he is made to feel that slavery is unprofitable he will not be long in discovering that it is inhuman. A striking instance of the correctness of our views is shown in the news, received by a recent arrival from the United States, of the intention of the state of Missouri to revise her constitution, and to abolish slavery on the ground of its being unprofitable. A correspondent of the New York Herald states that—"The people of Missouri have become perfectly satisfied that slave labour is an absolute disadvantage to them, and that they can procure their work done much cheaper by free labour, which entails no obligations, as in case of slavery, to support and look after the labourer any longer than he is actually engaged in toil. Thus, you see, it is not from philanthropy, but absolutely as a matter of interest, that slavery is to be abolished."

We know of no symptom so favourable to the cause of the abolition of slavery as this commencement of correct views of the superior value of free over slave labour in Missouri; but unfortunately the opinion generally entertained by slaveowners is, that slave labour is cheaper than free labour; and we know of no parties who have unconsciously done more to foster this erroneous notion than the Anti-Slavery Society. Slaveowners are in the constant habit of referring to the abolition of slavery in the British colonies as a complete failure, so far as proving the superiority of free over slave labour; and they triumphantly refer to the diminished production of sugar and coffee in those colonies where the experiment of free labour has been tried; they refer to the prosperity of slave-sugar colonies, notwithstanding they sell their sugar at half the price of free-labour sugar; and they say the free-labour planters have been impoverished by emancipation, and are only kept from absolute ruin by protective duties, which enable them to sell their sugar and coffee in England at double their real value in the markets of the world; and, as a natural consequence, with these views slaveowners cling to slavery more tenaciously than ever. The proceedings of the Anti-Slavery Society, in opposing the competition of free with slave labour, tend to strengthen the arguments and to confirm the prejudices of slaveowners. The amiable and pious Joseph John Gurney visited the West Indies in 1840, and thence addressed a series of letters to Henry Clay, of Kentucky, a slaveowner, to endeavour to persuade him to abandon slavery; and we quote his language, because it has been adopted, word for word, by the Anti-Slavery Society:—

"There is," says he, "a specific point which at the present time peculiarly demands the union of planters, merchants, labourers, and philanthropists—I mean the proposed equalization of the sugar duties. The duty now levied in England on sugars not produced in our own colonies amounts to a prohibition; and thus the whole market of our country is open exclusively to the sugar-growers of these colonies. Once equalize that prohibitory duty with the lower duty charged on the sugar produced in these islands, and immediately there will be a vast influx into Great Britain and Ireland of the sugars of Cuba, Brazil, Louisiana, &c. The inevitable consequence will be, that the sugars of Jamaica will lose their market, or will fall to a price which cannot remunerate the planter. The next link in the chain of disasters will be a large one. The planter will withdraw from the production of sugar, and will undergo great difficulty in his attempts to apply his grounds and apparatus to any other purpose. In the meantime the labourer will lose his employment and his wages; the merchant and shopkeeper will find their resources of profit suddenly cut off; and lastly, the abolitionist will discover to his dismay that a fresh impetus of vast force is given to slavery and the slave trade, by the opening of a new market of incalculable value to the producers of slave-grown sugar."

Such is the catalogue of evils which Mr. Gurney anticipates would flow from exposing free labour to the competition of slave labour; and it is not to be wondered that slaveowners laugh at the simplicity of the good man who expects by language like this to persuade them to involve themselves in the like ruin with free sugar-growers, by imitating the example of our colonies and abolishing slavery, the more especially as slave sugar-growers have no protection to rely upon like the West India planters.

Now, we maintain that the experiment of slave emancipation is not a failure: on the contrary, it is not only the noblest moral triumph which history records, but its success has exceeded the most sanguine expectations of its best friends. It cannot be denied, however, that since emancipation the production of sugar and coffee has greatly diminished, the planters have been impoverished, the profits of the slaveowners of Cuba and Brazil have increased, and with it the increase of the slave trade. But at whose door does the blame lie? Why, at that of the planters themselves, and they are entitled to no sympathy. Their losses are the recoil upon themselves of their own unjust and infamous conduct to the negroes. The deeds of the wooden-bible monopolists are engraven on our memories, never to be effaced; and it is important to our subject that they should be reviewed. In 1831 the colonial legislatures were reminded by Lord Goderich of the resolution of the House of Commons, passed in 1823, in substance declaring "that slavery was repugnant to the principles of the British constitution and of the Christian religion, and that it ought to be gradually abolished throughout the British dominions." The hints to prepare for abolition were treated by the slaveowners with general contempt, and to threats of transferring their allegiance to America, they added imprisonment and persecution, even unto death, of the missionaries, and the destruction of their houses and places of worship.* These proceedings only hastened the crisis so much fostered by the slaveowners. In 1833 slavery was declared by the British Parliament to be for ever abolished in the British dominions; an apprenticeship for six years was substituted, with a compensation of £20,000,000 as an indemnity to the planters. This boon was hailed by the slaves, and by their friends both in England and in the colonies, with the greatest public demonstrations of joy. But how was it met by the slaveowners? They had no objection to pocket the £20,000,000, but they determined to make the brief period of apprenticeship, if possible, more oppressive than slavery itself. They continued the flogging of females, and the Legislature, though urged by the Governor, refused to pass laws to prevent it, or in any way to express their disapprobation of conduct so repugnant to humanity. "During the short period of two years, in Jamaica alone, 60,000 apprentices received in the aggregate 250,000 lashes, and 50,000 other punishments by the tread-wheel, the chain-gang, and other means of legalized torture."† These cruelties induced a degree of discontent and exasperation among the negroes never manifested under slavery, and which, but for the influence exerted by the Governor and the missionaries, would, in all probability, have resulted in a sanguinary rebellion. Such was the spirit in which emancipation was met by the planters. Is it any wonder, with such treatment, that the negroes—freemen, or men in the progress to freedom—should have laboured less cheerfully? Would any but planters have expected that the production of sugar and coffee under such cruelties would be increased?

At length arrived the day of perfect freedom; and who can read without emotion the simple and affecting details of the celebration of that glorious day in the West Indies? The kind-hearted negro, in the fulness of his gratitude for freedom, forgot and forgave the cruelties of the past. "On some of the properties" (says Phillippo, speaking of Jamaica), "where commemorative festivals were held, the people, with a few individual exceptions, went to work on the following day, while many of them presented their first week of free labour as an offering of good will to their masters." What might not have been made of these grateful and forgiving beings at this epoch, by judicious treatment? But the tiger natures which slavery induces were not to be changed in a day. The planters could no longer compel the negroes to work by the whip, but when they offered their services they endeavoured to compel them to work at such wages as they chose to dictate; and, in cases of refusal, their "cottages" (says Mr. Gurney) "were unroofed, and even demolished. Cocoa-nut and bread-fruit trees have been cut down; provision grounds have been despoiled by the hand of violence, or trodden underfoot of oxen; and thus the labourers have been driven to seek for themselves a new home, either by moving away to other properties, or by purchasing little freeholds on the neighbouring mountains." Besides these instances of violence, another plan, practised through the length and breadth of the islands, was to double, triple, and even to multiply fourfold the rents, or to charge rent, per capita, against husband, wife, and each of the children, as a penal exaction to compel labour on their own terms—the screw for this purpose being completed, in many cases, by distraint of goods and imprisonment of person. Is it surprising that tyranny like this on the part of the planters led to discontent and heartburnings and desertion of estates? Can we wonder, after the facts we have stated, at the falling-off in the produce of sugar, as shown in the following official statement of the sugar exported from Jamaica?—

In 1831 to 1833, average of 3 yrs. of slavery .... 3,811,163 cwt.
1839 to 1841, ditto, 3 yrs. of freedom ..... 2,896,784 "

Are the planters entitled to sympathy on account of the distressed condition in which their own tyranny has placed them? Ought the people of England to be compelled to support this tyranny by paying the authors of it four or five millions per annum more for their sugar and coffee than it is worth? We ask the Anti-Slavery Society, is it by an alliance with men like these that they can hope to advance the cause of the abolition of slavery? No: there is no hope, and no means of accomplishing the abolition of slavery and the slave trade, but by increasing the production of free-labour sugar and coffee at cheaper rates than slave produce, and so rendering slavery unprofitable; and then we shall see, as in the case of Missouri, that men will no longer keep their fellow-men in cruel bondage, when there is nothing to be gained by it. Our limits prevent us from pursuing the subject; but we purpose hereafter to show that there are no obstacles, except the existing monopoly, to the production of sugar and coffee in abundance by free labour cheaper than by slave labour; and that when philanthropists shall cease to advocate the violation of the laws of Nature and Providence, and shall abandon the indefensible course of doing evil that good may come, they may hope to be favoured with that Divine blessing on their labours which their want of success during forty years may lead them to doubt has hitherto attended them.

THE BAZAAR.

The various local committees to collect contributions to the Bazaar are now in active operation, and we have the pleasure to announce that the enthusiasm with which the ladies have taken up the project in various parts of the country surpasses all our anticipations. Offers of assistance are daily received from unexpected quarters; while the old friends of the cause are determined to show that time, instead of abating their zeal, has strengthened their resolution to provide employment for the labouring classes and adequate remuneration for that employment. The ladies of Great Britain have ever taken a leading part in every labour of Christian charity; in the present instance they see that the Corn Laws are a double curse to the industrious poor: they restrict the amount of employment, lower the rate of wages, and raise the price of food; they render bread dear, they make flesh and blood cheap. Against such double injustice it is no wonder that the sympathies of the tender sex should revolt; and it must be gratifying to those engaged in seeking the abolition of monopoly that they have with them, to cheer their toil, the hearts and hands of their fair countrywomen. We subjoin some selections from the correspondence:—

"Wrexham, Jan. 28.
"Sir,—I received the circular requesting my name might be on the committee for the Bazaar only on Saturday last, the very day of our return home, after an absence of between five and six months, and give this as my reason why it has not been more promptly responded to. With regard to its contents, I can only say I should be proud to have my name so associated with a cause to which I feel it my duty and my pleasure strenuously to advocate. The only reason why I ever for a moment demurred on the subject was because I like our motto to be 'Deeds, not words'; and, being likely soon to leave home again, it was impossible I could do what would, I thought, entitle me to the proud pre-eminence of being on your committee for the Bazaar. Your last circular has enlightened me on this point; and if it be a mark of attachment, or a guarantee for any exertion within my power, I would at once say, take it and welcome.
"I must add that, during our various ramblings, we have seen with much interest the gradual spread of those principles which are, we firmly believe, ere long to secure the permanent commercial prosperity of our country."

"Even in a remote watering place in Wales the matter is most warmly taken up; and I am not without hope that it will furnish a stall for the Bazaar."

"I do think that even in Shropshire—that stronghold of Toryism—the giant monopoly is beginning to totter; and I read this not only in the increased warmth of friends, but in the bitter spirit of its opponents, who are ever more violent when a cause to which they are opposed is progressing than when either standing still or retrograding. Begging you will excuse these few lines, which are written in much haste,

"I have the honour to be, yours most truly,
"George Wilson, Esq." "SARAH HILDITCH."

"25, New Bond-street, London, Jan. 28.
"SIR,—In reply to your circular respecting the Ladies' Committee for the Bazaar, to be held in Covent-garden Theatre, I can only say that, if the name of so obscure an individual can be useful, mine is at your service; and, did I feel capable, I should consider no duty onerous which could tend to the welfare of the many."

"I am not qualified to judge of the subject of Free Trade in all its bearings, but it has always appeared to me that, however it may affect the interests of a few individuals, it must eventually benefit mankind."

"As that great highway, the ocean, renders the products of all nations accessible to all, no Government which studies the good of the people should tax any commodity necessary to the existence or conducive to the health or morality of the humbler classes."

"Trusting that you will pardon my having thus trespassing on your valuable time,

"I am, Sir, &c. &c.,
"George Wilson, Esq." "MARY THOMSON."

"Stockport, Jan. 30.
"SIR,—I beg to apologize for not answering your former communication. In reply to the latter, I regret to say that my state of health is such as to preclude any active effort for the accomplishment of the important object proposed; but my interest in the success of the League is undiminished, and you are at liberty to add my name to your list, as a pledge of continued adherence to the cause, which I regard not in a political view, but as connected with the claims of humanity, and greatly affecting the interests of the poor. I do not hear of any combined efforts of the ladies of Stockport to furnish articles for the Bazaar; but, for myself, I will do what I can."

"I am, Sir, yours, &c.,
"George Wilson, Esq." "L. WADDINGTON."

"Coventry, Jan. 30.
"SIR,—In reply to your letter, dated 21st of January, I beg to say that, if you consider my name worth adding to your committee, I am very willing to have it stand there, if you will consider it an expression of my interest in, and best wishes for, the success of the righteous cause you are seeking to promote. I ought to apologize for not replying to your previous communication on the subject of the Bazaar; but knowing that want of health, and many other circumstances, would prevent my co-operating with any active exertion on behalf of it (should such be set on foot in Coventry), I did feel some hesitation in giving my name alone, because I am convinced it can be of no use but to swell the list of your committee. With the gratitude and esteem which all who wish well to their country must feel for the devoted and untiring labours of yourself and your colleagues,

"Believe me to remain, &c. &c., "George Wilson, Esq." "MARY HENNEL."

"Horwich House, Jan. 29.
"If Mrs. T. Gisborne's name is considered of any value by the Committee of the Anti-Corn-Law League, she will be glad to give it in testimony of her sincere good wishes."

"Oxford-place, Manchester, Jan. 28.
"SIR,—In reply to your circular of the 21st, I beg to assure you that I feel a deep interest in the success of the National Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar, and have only been deterred from consenting to have my name placed on the Ladies' Committee by an apprehension that, in doing so, I should incur an amount of obligation and responsibility in reference to the Bazaar which my habits and various duties would prevent me from being able adequately to sustain. If, however, my name can be of any use in the promotion of so good and noble an object, you have my permission to place it on the committee; and if I can prepare some little article in the way of a contribution in time, I shall be happy to do so."

"I am, Sir, &c. &c.,
"G. Wilson, Esq." "H. MAYSON."

"Salford, Manchester, Jan. 28.
"SIR,—In compliance with the wish of the Council of the League, expressed in a circular which I have just received, I have not the least objection to my name appearing on the Ladies' Committee. I shall at all times feel a great interest in the progress of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and feel myself bound to make considerable personal sacrifices to promote its success."

"I am, Sir, yours, &c.,
"George Wilson, Esq." "H. DRAUGH."

One of our correspondents, writing from Darlington, offers for the Bazaar 150 pieces of spar from the lead-mines of the Wearside district. Such contributions are very acceptable; and we hope the example of our Darlington friend will be followed by many who may have the power to send contributions of a similar character."

TRADE WITH CHINA.—Fourteen vessels are advertised to sail from Liverpool for China, against seven at this date last year. This shows that the Chinese treaty works well. There is also a slight increase in the ships laid on for Calcutta."

"A CORN SPECULATOR."—Mr. Ellman, who claims a portion of the merit of inventing the "sliding scale," was told by the Morning Post, the other day, that it was a misnomer to call him a farmer, the fact being that he is a "corn speculator." It is all very well for Mr. Ellman, says the Post, to tell the poor farmers to "hold," and lie in wait for "better prices," when they are compelled by their poverty to sell, while jobbers like Mr. Ellman can hold for two years, and ultimately get 60s. for what they might otherwise have sold for 40s. The Post is right; there are gambling farmers as well as gambling merchants; and always will be so long as we have a "sliding scale."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

First Week, ending Saturday, Feb. 8.

On Tuesday, Feb. 4, 1845, the firing of cannon, ringing of bells, and acclamations of the crowds that lined the streets in the order of the procession, announced to all within hearing that her Majesty had gone down in person to open the legislative session. The House of Lords was crowded. The ladies, to whom a spectacle is always pleasing, mustered in great numbers to witness the state and ceremony of the royal presence and the delivery of the royal speech; and the splendid array of beauty, dress, and fashion, with peers in their robes and officials in uniforms, rendered the scene of this day as animated and attractive as any of those which have preceded it. The swell of the trumpets proclaimed the coming of the Queen; the audience rose; the cortège entered in the usual form. Her Majesty, after seating herself on the throne, prayed their lordships to be seated; the House of Commons was summoned; and on the appearance of the Speaker at the bar, attended by members, the Lord Chancellor, kneeling, presented the copy of the speech, which her Majesty, in musical accents, and a sweet, distinct tone, read as follows:—

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"I rejoice that I am enabled, on again meeting you in Parliament, to congratulate you on the improved condition of the country."

"Increased activity pervades almost every branch of manufacture. Trade and commerce have been extended at home and abroad, and among all classes of my people there is generally prevalent a spirit of loyalty and cheerful obedience to the law."

"I continue to receive from all Foreign Powers and States assurances of their friendly disposition."

"I have had much satisfaction in receiving at my court the Sovereigns who, in the course of the last year, visited this country."

"The journey of the Emperor of Russia, undertaken at a great sacrifice of private convenience, was a proof of the friendship of his Imperial Majesty most acceptable to my feelings."

"The opportunity of personal intercourse thus afforded to me may, I hope, be the means of still further improving those amicable relations which have long existed between Great Britain and Russia."

"The visit of the King of the French was rendered especially welcome to me, inasmuch as it had been preceded by discussions which might have impaired the good understanding happily established between the two countries."

"I regard the maintenance of this good understanding as essential to the best interests of both, and I rejoice to witness that the sentiments so cordially expressed by all classes of my subjects on the occasion of his Majesty's visit were entirely in unison with my own."

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

"The estimates for the ensuing year have been prepared, and will forthwith be laid before you."

"The progress of steam navigation, and the demands for protection to the extended commerce of the country, will occasion an increase in the estimates connected with the naval service."

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"I have observed with sincere satisfaction that the improvement which is manifest in other parts of the country has extended to Ireland."

"The political agitation and excitement which I have had heretofore occasion to lament, appear to have gradually abated, and, as a natural result, private capital has been more freely applied to useful public enterprises, undertaken through the friendly co-operation of individuals interested in the welfare of Ireland."

"I have carried into effect, in the spirit in which it was conceived, the Act for the more effectual application of charitable donations and bequests."

"I recommend to your favourable consideration the policy of improving and extending the opportunities for academical education in Ireland."

"The report of the commission appointed to inquire into the law and practice in respect to the occupation of land is nearly prepared, and shall be communicated to you immediately after its presentation."

"The state of the law in regard to the privileges of the Bank of Ireland, and to other banking establishments in that country and in Scotland, will no doubt occupy your attention."

"The health of the inhabitants of large towns and populous districts in this part of the United Kingdom has been the subject of recent inquiry before a commission, the report of which shall be immediately laid before you."

"It will be highly gratifying to me if the information and suggestions contained in that report shall enable you to devise the means of promoting the health and comfort of the poorer classes of my subjects."

"I congratulate you on the success of the measures which, three years since, were adopted by Parliament for the purpose of supplying the deficiency in the public revenue, and arresting the accumulation of debt in a time of peace."

"The act which was passed at that time for imposing a tax upon income will shortly expire."

"It will be for you in your wisdom to determine whether it may not be expedient to continue its operation for a further period, and thus to obtain the means of adequately providing for the public service, and at the same time of making a reduction in other taxation."

"Whatever may be the result of your deliberations in this respect, I feel assured that it will be your determination to maintain an amount of revenue amply sufficient to meet the necessary expenditure of the country, and firmly to uphold that public credit which is indispensable to the national welfare."

"The prospect of continued peace, and the general state of domestic prosperity and tranquillity, afford a favourable opportunity for the consideration of the important matters to which I have directed your attention; and I commit them to your deliberation with the earnest prayer that you may be enabled, under the superintending care and protection of Divine Providence, to strengthen the feelings of mutual confidence and good-will between different classes of my subjects, and to improve the condition of my people."

This having been spoken, the Queen retired with the same state as before; and the House adjourned for a brief interval.

Our business being with FREE TRADE, as it is affected by the proceedings, or touched on by the discussions, of the Legislature, we will confine ourselves exclusively to that subject. Other matters may be, and are, of importance; but FREE TRADE is to us at once the foundation and the corner stone of all permanent prosperity, and of all positive improvement. In our reports, therefore, of what takes place in Parliament, our business is to look with a single eye to that one great object, without which all others are to us comparatively as naught.

In the House of Lords the debate on the address presented nothing very particularly attracting our attention. There was this exception. The "farmers' friends" are nervous, anxious, and uneasy; and, notwithstanding the assurances of the Duke of Buckingham, given at the protection meeting at Freemasons'-hall, that no farther progress is to be made with Free Trade, they are afraid of the great commercial measures which are announced, and solicitous to overawe the Government. Thus the Duke of Richmond complained that agriculture was depressed, the tenantry distressed (is the Duke of Richmond "distressed" himself?), and blurted out the ludicrous complaint that, "as soon as any set of men got into office, they forgot that there was such a thing as agriculture!" This raised loud laughter, as well it might. The Earl of Hardwicke, that other "farmers' friend," who fills a subordinate station in the royal household, responded a little to the Duke of Richmond; but with a pathos closely allied to bathos, said that, whether the fears of the agriculturists were just or not, he would give no opinion, but if the agricultural interest were "LEFT ALONE" (the very thing the Anti-Corn-Law League is struggling for!)—if it were "left alone,"—but let us quote the very significant and amusing passage:—

"His belief was, that if left alone (hear, hear), if permitted to rise by their own industry and their own exertions (hear, hear), if they were to be left free from legislative enactments ('hear, hear, hear,' principally from the Opposition), and untouched by a press which pandered to the appetites of a particular class in this country—whose desire was to raise agitation throughout the country for purposes best known to themselves,—if left alone on these points, there was no question but that the agricultural interest itself would triumph over the difficulties which now beset it."

Turning to the House of Commons, we find that FREE TRADE received more attention there. The mover of the address, Mr. Francis Charteris, is a young man, representative East Gloucestershire, is grandson of the Earl of Wemyss, and boasts a descent from "Macduff, Thane of Fife." He has never spoken before, but on this occasion acquitted himself very creditably, descending on commercial prosperity, peace and war, the progress of civilization, the material triumphs of science, and so forth. He also raised much laughter by naively stating that, "as a Scotchman," he hoped Ministers would interfere as little as possible with the banking system of Scotland.

The seconder of the address, Mr. Thomas Baring, took a more ambitious flight, and was therefore repeatedly in danger of having his waxen wings melted, and of dropping, plump, into the frigid sea of a "breakdown." He evidently considers himself to have entered the House of Commons as a "Commercial Phenomenon" (to use the style of Moses and Son), and therefore that it is incumbent on him to instruct "honourable members" in the philosophy of manufactures, and the mysteries of trade. One part of his speech, in which he expressed a hope that the Emperor of Russia would be taught, by his visit to this country, to adopt a more liberal system of Import Duties on our productions, was adroitly taken up by Lord John Russell, who added to it the expression of his hope that the Emperor would induce his "good sister" of England to admit Russian corn and timber into England on more equitable terms! Mr. Thomas Baring enlarged on our commercial prosperity; declared that the cotton, woolen, linen, silk, and flax manufactures were all in a state of unexampled affluence; that the spinners were realizing large profits, though the exporters were not so liberally remunerated (a significant admission!), and accounted for the falling off in our exports of twist and yarn by affirming that our spinning power was inadequate to the supply of both the home and the foreign demand. Then, after affirming that all our prosperity was sound, not fictitious, he fell into philosophy, lamented the tendency of our manufacturing system to "OVER-PRODUCE" (oh, that "over-production"!), which we should control by caution (a rich man advising a poor man to be "cautious" in the exercise of his industry!), and pointing out the high prices of our funds, praising our national honesty in paying our debts, and counselling "discretion" in the reduction of taxation, he sat down.

Lord John Russell followed, reviewing with much animation, and at great length, the whole foreign and domestic policy of the Government. With all this we have nothing to do; but the concluding portion of his speech, in which he replied to Mr. Thomas Baring, is so excellent, both in spirit and expression, that we quote it at length.

"There remains one topic, to which it is gratifying to me to allude. I mean the prosperous state of the manufacturing and commercial interests. The hon. gentleman who seconded the address to-night—and no one is more conversant with the subject—in treating this part of the subject, gave us several instances of this prosperity, and he told us that even the iron trade, which last year did not partake of the prosperity which was enjoyed by other branches of commerce, is this year in a comparatively flourishing state. (Hear.) But while that is perfectly true, and while we have every reason to be thankful to Divine Providence for the bounteous harvest with which the land has been blessed, there is yet another reflection occurs to me, and which I do not mention to damp our feelings of exultation, or to diminish the force of those facts which the hon. member has recounted, but only for our warning as legislators. In 1836, on the 4th of February, the very day of that year on which we are now met in this, an hon. friend of mine, the member for Sheffield, seconded the address. In so doing he went through the various interests of the country, cotton, wool, silk, iron, and he found that the increase had been very large, that our exports had greatly increased on a comparison with the five years antecedent. The hon. member drew a picture of the flourishing condition of the country in 1835. Then we had had a favourable harvest. But 1838, 1839, and 1840 brought us into a very different condition (hear, hear), when we had bad harvests, when it did not please Providence to continue to us the same state of blessing we had heretofore enjoyed, when we suffered most severely from the depression of our manufactures and commerce in that season of high prices. (Hear.) No man can expect the course of things to continue unaltered, or that we shall have in this country every year a recurrence of those bounteous harvests with which we have of late been blessed. If, then, we cannot expect that—the reflection occurs, Can men do anything to remedy the evils which deficient harvests bring along with them? (Cheers.) I think we can (cheers): not, indeed, by attempting to interfere with the course of Providence, but by looking at another dispensation of Providence which enables man to exchange the products of his own country with other and distant regions. (Loud cheering from the Opposition side.) Let us, then, as I hope we shall, consider in the course of the present year whether we have not the power to ward off the storm which at some future period of deficient harvests may fall upon us, by giving to those productions of other nations which we can best use and employ a more favourable inlet into this country than they have at present. (Cheers.) By so doing, you would be only acting in consonance with the principles of the present Government, and of the great majority of this House. (Hear, hear.) They do not hold with that great society which met yesterday (laughter and cheering), that protection to British industry is the true way to ensure a permanent flourishing condition for the people of this country. (Hear, hear.) On the contrary, with respect to many articles of great value, they have declared that principles opposed to those of protection, and which, if not entirely Free Trade, are known by the name of Free-Trade principles, are those by which the intercourse of nations should be regulated. If they continue in these opinions—if they differ from those great authorities which maintain that protection is for the benefit of the people—let us have the advantage of the practical working out of those opinions. I KNOW THAT THOSE WHO PROPOSE THIS ARE CALLED THE ENEMIES OF AGRICULTURE; BUT I AM CONVINCED THAT PROTECTION IS NOT THE SUPPORT BUT THE BANE OF AGRICULTURE. (Loud cheers.)"

The question is, whether you shall do, in a season of prosperity, calmly, deliberately, with all the dignity of legislators, considering what is best for those we represent, that which you may have to do hereafter hastily, under the compulsion of popular uproar, and with the fear that you may be unable to deny that which you appear to grant. I must say I think that, both with regard to the question of Ireland and with regard to this question of Free Trade, you ought to take advantage of the present time. You say Ireland is more tranquil; you say that trade is prosperous. Shall we lose the opportunity when everybody—I think almost everybody—will admit that, if you were forced by foreign war and internal commotion, you would give to Ireland almost every thing she asks, and when everybody will admit that, if forced by two or three bad harvests, or strong popular excitement, you would have no hesitation in changing your Corn Laws. If that is the case, do not wait for those events. Take your time now; take advantage of the great prosperity that is before you. Consider yourselves as most happy in being in the situation of Government at such a period, and show yourselves worthy of the great nation which you are called upon to defend."

The remainder of the discussion was occupied with explanations, by Mr. Gladstone, of the reasons (particular Church and State scruples) which have led to his retirement—Ireland; Maynooth; Education; the Right of Search; and the suppression of Slavery. There was one exception. The cause of Free Trade was specially advocated by Mr. VILLIERS, who spoke as follows:—

"Mr. VILLIERS said that, seeing the unwillingness of the House to prolong discussion, he would occupy them very shortly. He could not help observing upon the singular calm and good humour that prevailed in the House. He could only refer to the circumstance of the prosperity or the great improvement which there was in the state of the country. (Hear, hear.) The honourable gentleman who seconded the address had admitted this fact very fully. He went into some detail to prove it, and seemed anxious further to devise the causes which have produced this change. (Hear, hear.) Now, considering the state in which this country had been for the last few years, considering the difference of opinion that prevailed as to the cause of the great distress which had recently existed, he thought the honourable gentleman had done wisely in raising this question, and that he could not have presented a more important consideration to the House at the commencement of the session. The country was now comparatively in a satisfactory state. Till a recent period it had been in a state to excite nothing but anxiety and alarm. To satisfy the public of the reason for this change would be of most essential service, and would go far to determine that question regarding trade which notoriously distracted the country at present. There were now two systems, diametrically opposed to each other, which had their respective advocates. The honourable gentleman who seconded the address is a supporter of one, which he terms the protective system, and considers that it is for the interest of this country to restrict its commerce, and artificially enhance the necessities of life. (Hear.) He (Mr. Villiers) was directly of the opposite opinion; he contended that the prosperity of the people depended upon cheapness and abundance, and the fullest liberty being given to the exercise of their industry and commerce. (Hear, hear.) They knew that for five years past commerce had been depressed, the people had wanted employment, and the revenue had declined. They had met that evening, and had to congratulate the country on the opposite indications in all these respects; and the honourable gentleman wished to know what had caused this change. Was it the result of the protective system, or was it from the failure of that system, and from the fruits of what was expected from the opposite system having occurred? He hoped the country would consider and determine. He did not hesitate to assert that it was owing to everything having occurred which it was the prime object of protection to prevent (hear, hear): cheapness of produce, and abundance of food, arising chiefly from a most singularly abundant harvest, aided by certain relaxations of the protective system. (Hear, hear.) Those things had occurred: there had been plenty, and they were, thank God, gathering its fruits. The means of the community had been increased, and consumption was extended. (Hear, hear.) This was the promise of Free Trade; this had occurred in spite of the gentlemen opposite; and the country had to thank Providence rather than the Ministry for it. The country at this moment was prospering, and the discontented and disappointed were those who supported and were led to depend upon protection. (Hear, hear.) They have legislated, and have failed; they have been thwarted in their object by Providence; and the poor, the people, trade, and the revenue have all profited by the result. (Hear, hear.) So far as the right honourable gentleman has relaxed the protective system, he has reason to be satisfied—he has contributed to the prosperity of the country, and he has nothing to regret as regards revenue, or any other circumstance. (Hear, hear.) The right honourable gentleman cannot point to any duty that he has reduced, with the view to diminish protection, that does not offer him reason for satisfaction, as well as ground for advancing farther in the same direction. It ought to be his object, as it is that of all wise men, that this country should continue in its present state, so far as it is prosperous. Of what vast importance, then, is it to settle this question of protection, and determine whether it is not by the liberation of trade, rather than from its restriction, that the great mass of the people will be enabled to possess the great essentials as well as the comforts of life. (Hear, hear.) The system of protection is opposed to this. It has no object if it is not. The great question now before the country, and that really engages its attention, is whether it is to be continued or abolished. He was induced to call the attention of the House to the fact, from the circumstance of the member for Somersetshire having declared to-night that he would adhere to it, and cautioned the Government how they abandoned it. The importance of his opinion is, that he believed he represented the opinions of the party that had been dominant in both Houses. He hoped the right hon. gentleman would, however, see the importance of consulting the great and general interests of the country, and not suffer himself to be guided by this selfish and exploded policy. The Ministers must desire that the country should prosper while they hold the reins. They have now seen the impossibility of attaining that end by the protective system. It had been tried, and he was glad to hear the noble lord the member for London declare that he believed it to be not only unwise and unjust, but baneful to the interest which it was intended to serve. (Hear, hear.) Nothing can be more true. (Hear, hear.) His noble friend had been led to this conclusion, no doubt, from reflecting on the experience which the country had had of it. (Hear.) It was a point on which he had differed with his noble friend, and he was delighted, and he was sure many in the country would be charmed, to find that he had now abandoned it, and that he no longer clung to the notion that protection benefited even the interest that claimed it. (Hear, hear.) When protection did for a while succeed, the necessities of life were rendered dear and scarce, and the country was in the most disastrous state. If that is not the case, let it be denied or disproved; or if the gentlemen who uphold it can do so, let them tell the country what has been the benefit of the system. They have had their own way, they have made laws for it; where do they look for its benefits? Are the tenants of their land satisfied or well off? (Hear, hear.) Is the land well cultivated? Are the labourers not in a deplorable condition? (Hear, hear, hear.) He asked them now, when the country was all attention to learn what could be said for its continuance, to let them know why it should not be abolished. The right hon. gentleman was bound to settle the question one way or the other. He has the power to do it; and he (Mr. Villiers) said, that if what was termed protection, or relieving particular interests from competition, could be shown to be beneficial to the country, let it be universally applied and not disturbed (cheers); but, if the contrary, do not let the country be kept longer in suspense, or the session pass over without its error being fully acknowledged. The right hon. gentleman has now no excuse for not acting upon his conviction. (Hear, hear.) He has now full power to do what he likes. (A laugh.) In this direction he will receive the cordial support of this side of the House. He is not opposed, and he has strength enough around him to carry out his views. He has avowed himself a friend to the principles of Free Trade. He has partially applied it with perfect success. He has the power to give it a more perfect application. His sincerity will be tested by the measures which he intends shortly to submit, and on him now would rest the entire responsibility of suffering the question to remain unsettled. (Hear, hear.)"

THE INCIDENTAL AND NOTICEABLE DEBATE OF THURSDAY NIGHT.

On Thursday night, on the usual formal "order of the day" being read by the SPEAKER, that the Queen's Speech be taken into consideration,—

Mr. CONDEN rose, and in a quiet, incidental way, called the attention of the agriculturists and Ministerial members to a circumstance peculiarly interesting to them. The House, which had a very fair attendance of members, though it was not crowded, immediately became all eyes.

tion, and Mr. Cobden proceeded. On former occasions, he said, when the agricultural districts were in a state of distress, the circumstance was usually adverted to in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the session. On the present occasion it was not. Wheat was now at 45s.; and Lord Beaumont, at the great Protection meeting, on the previous Monday, had adverted to the assurance given that the Corn Law would give them protection up to a given point, and he had repeated a question, which had also been put on a former occasion by Mr. Miles, the member for Somersetshire, "What had become of the promise of a steady price at 56s.?" Farmers were alleged to be suffering from the want of protection; but, in fact, it was protection which was at the bottom of all their sufferings. He reminded the House of his motion last session, for a committee to inquire into the effects of protective duties on the interests of tenant-farmers and agricultural labourers—an inquiry which would bring out the facts. He advised the agricultural members to join with him and his friends in order to procure the appointment of this committee—a junction which would compel the Government to grant it, either from a conviction of its necessity, or under compulsion. They might take a week or a fortnight to consider of it; and, if they did not then accept his offer, he would feel it to be his duty to renew his motion of last session.

Mr. Miles then rose, and, after stating that the landed interest did not intend to ask the Government for a committee of inquiry into agricultural distress, denied that Sir Robert Peel had promised a price of 56s. under his Corn Law; and affirmed that, from the very nature of agriculture itself, prices must vacillate between 46s. and 56s. As to Mr. Cobden's proposed committee of inquiry, he did not object to it. Loud laughter and cheering from the Opposition benches having greeted this intimation, Mr. Miles got afraid of having been too valorous or too indiscreet, and he added something very indistinctly about neither objecting to nor desiring such an inquiry; and, above all, that if the committee were granted he should not be made a member of it.

Mr. Milner Gibson was glad to hear that Mr. Miles would consent to such a committee. "Oh, no," exclaimed Mr. Miles, while the laughter and the cheering were doubled; "he would neither vote for it nor against it." Then Mr. Milner Gibson, after some general remarks on the injurious effects of protection, very adroitly and very respectfully put it to Sir ROBERT PEELE if he had really come under any condition, or made any pledge, which could warrant the Duke of Buckingham in saying, at the meeting at Freemasons' Hall, on the previous Monday, that no farther inroads were to be made on the protection still enjoyed by the agricultural interest? Sir Robert Peel was about to reply; but up jumped

Mr. Banks, the noted member for Dorsetshire, not doubting that he knew the intentions of the Prime Minister far better than he did himself, and could explain them much more lucidly. Now, Mr. Banks has a somewhat loud-toned, and, but for a peculiar whine, a not unmelodious voice; and having that, he thinks he has all the requisites for an orator and a statesman; and a stranger would fancy that something was really coming, that came with a rotund swell, until, after listening awhile, he is amazed that so tiny, so shallow, so dribbling a stream of ideas should issue from any mortal brain through the medium of a sounding pipe. Yet Mr. Banks said a noticeable thing. He attributed the distress amongst the farmers to the fact that, though there had been an average wheat crop, other grain had been deficient; and the reductions effected by the tariff preventing them from realizing famine prices for hay, and so forth, they were unable to make up for the moderate price of wheat which abundance had caused, by high prices for other grain. This, being translated into plain English, means that protection is solely for high rents; and, to enable the farmers to pay high rents, it is necessary that Providence should not be too bountiful; but, if indiscreet enough to give an average wheat crop, it should compensate them in some other way. According to the reverential notions of Mr. Banks, Providence did not in this way last year: but Sir Robert Peel, with his Tariff, counteracted the designs of Providence, and therefore the poor farmers, with high rents and low prices, were in distress. Having thus explained the cause of the distress, Mr. Banks sat down by declaring Mr. Cobden's proposed committee of inquiry to be unnecessary.

Mr. BRIGHT followed, and in a really powerful speech, exposed the delusion and the hollowness of the pretences by which the protective system is still sustained. His contrast between protected Buckinghamshire and (so to speak) unprotected Lancashire was masterly; and his picture of the miseries of the agricultural labourer, and the straits of the tenant-farmer, all caused by protection, fell with withering effect. The countenances of those sitting opposite to the member for Durham testified that the plain statement of plain truth can cut and Master, when plain truth is unacceptable. Mr. Stafford O'Brien, who is the wit of the Protection Society, got up, of course, to complain of Mr. Bright's tone. That was not the way to "treat the gentry of England." So a fashionable dame, given to gambling, who rose from a card-table on Sunday morning, as the bells were ringing, and drove to her fashionable church, where her fashionable preacher was accustomed, in his sermons, to "dance his bear to the gambler of tances," was amazed to see a stranger occupy the pulpit. Instead of falling asleep, she listened, for the sake of novelty, and was still more amazed to hear an eloquent and earnest discourse on fashionable vices. Coming out of the church, she indignantly protested against the violence and rudeness of the preacher, emphatically affirming that it was not the way in which the ladies ought to be treated!

Mr. Villiers and Mr. Brotherton, as well as Lord John Manners, took part in the discussion; but the interest of the night was Sir Robert Peel's very short speech. It was short, but it was significant. He rebuked those agricultural members, especially Mr. Stafford O'Brien, who had so hastily declared that they would consent to the appointment of Mr. Cobden's committee; and said that, if they had taken the offered fortnight for consideration, they would have been able to judge if a committee of inquiry were necessary. This is a significant hint that he has some measures in view more or less affecting agriculture as well as commerce, and which will be divulged when he makes his financial statement. He also denied that agricultural distress existed GENERALLY, though it might LOCALLY; but as emphatically denied that the local distress was in any way caused by the Tariff. But it was his answer to Mr. Milner Gibson which threw a gloom over the countenances of the agriculturists around him. He loudly announced that he is under NO PLEDGE to the agriculturists in any way inconsistent with the principles he had laid down in 1842. The Duke of Buckingham must, therefore, have been deceived, or else his "wish was father to the thought," when he announced to the Protection Society, that no farther inroads on protection were contemplated. And, in accordance with his denial of all pledge, Sir Robert Peel said—the sentiment is worth notice, for, though a trite truth, it was significant when uttered by the First Lord of the Treasury from the Treasury bench. Sir Robert Peel said:—

"THE RESTORATION OF PROTECTION IS IMPOSSIBLE! and, even if it were possible, he would not apply it as a remedy for distress arising from other causes, and the existence of which he deeply deplored."

Such was the appropriate conclusion!

While waiting those "great commercial changes" which Sir Robert Peel is to expound on Friday, the 14th of this month, we may rapidly glance at past progress and present prospects. Time, ever moving, brings us round again to another Legislative Session; but though the earth, in its circling orbit, returns to the place from whence it started, men and measures are carried forward on a straight line, which stretches beyond our visible horizon. It is this which fills the HUMAN HEART with HOPE, and nerves the HUMAN MIND to patient endurance in the race which is set before it, where noble enterprise and generous impulses are the spur to great achievements. Onwards we go, never to return; what is gained, is gained for ever; the great battle of FREEDOM, as all our past history testifies, though often apparently lost, is "ever won" by every conflict in which it is engaged; every material triumph is a help and an aid to a moral one; and we, who live in an age of railroads and of rapidity, find that PUBLIC OPINION from walking has taken to running, and, ere long, from running will take to flying. Society moves now as fast in a year as formerly it did in half a century.

Look to the last four years of our Parliamentary history for proof and "confirmation strong" of this. In 1840, the FREE-TRADER—knowing the power of monopoly, looking to the state of parties, and mourning over the apathy and the sluggishness of public opinion, in relation to the true interests of the community—might have retreated into his cell with a sigh, and pointed to the close of the present century as the probable period about which Free Trade might triumph, if meantime Great Britain had not been overwhelmed in the ruins of its own folly. For there was much in 1840 to damp and to discourage. The ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE was indeed at its great work of enlightening the mass of the public; but as yet the men composing it were regarded as intruders from Manchester, on a mission to forward their own mere interests; and the monopolists, with audacity yet unabashed, and fallacies and falsehoods not yet hissed into the limbo of vanity, thought themselves secure for long years to come. In spite of the prevalent distress, the bad harvests, and the high price of corn, a host of pamphleteers rushed into print, to prove that the repeal of the Corn Laws would only benefit the working man by about the one hundred and fiftieth part of a fraction on the price of the quartern loaf; and therefore it was good for the health, morals, education, comfort, and happiness of the labouring classes, that there should be a high price for corn, and little work with which to earn the small wages that were to be given away for the dear bread. Absolutely, too, there were starving working men who believed this in the year 1840, though now it looks almost incredible. Nay, in 1840 there were people who would listen to a man, who, though clothed and fed with the products of every country under heaven, would tell his starving auditors that it was necessary to have dear bread, and sometimes no bread at all, in order to be "independent of foreigners;" and the audience would go away, under the impression (like Robinson Crusoe's Friday) that if they did not starve themselves, in order to be "independent of foreigners," these foreigners might come and "eat 'em all up." It is of the year 1840 we are speaking—that is, of four years, not four centuries, ago. Yet there was hope in 1840. The financial condition of the country, the result of our foolish fiscal system, had entangled the party in power; and the party out of power, waxing as the other waned, gathered together their compact troops, and laid siege to Downing-street. The eager thirst for place made the people be forgotten; and though Mr. Villiers in 1840 twice debated the Corn Laws, and Mr. Ewart moved for a reduction of the duty on foreign sugar, and Mr. Hutt applied to know under what restrictions foreign corn might be manufactured in bond; and in the House of Lords Earls Fitzwilliam and Radnor contended that it was expedient to reconsider the laws relating to the importation of foreign corn—every thing was either out-voted, or hustled down, or "counted out," or shuffled over. There was but one idea in Parliament. The ours were eager to be in; the ins were struggling desperately to keep their places. But during the turmoil, Mr. Hume quietly moved for a Select Committee to "inquire into the several duties levied on imports into the United Kingdom, and how far these duties are for protection to similar articles the produce or manufacture of this country, or of the British possessions abroad, or whether the duties are for the purposes of revenue alone." The committee was granted and appointed, for the two great parties struggling for the Treasury were too busy to think of the Custom-house, and too much absorbed in their strife to anticipate the consequences which would flow from the investigation. Mr. Hume, of course, took the chair, and called his witnesses, men in office and men in trade; before that committee appeared the late James Deacon Hume, Mr. Macgregor, and Mr. Porter, all bringing the aid of their official and personal experience to testify to the folly, the obstruction, and the ruin caused by our fiscal system; and they brought with them models of NEW TARIFFS, to show the vast benefit which would result from a little honest simplification. Then came out the Report on Import Duties, one of those productions which effect a mental revolution, and, appearing at a critical period, so startled the existing generation as to compel them to surrender at discretion, and march out of the fortress of their old prejudices with guns spiked, banners muffled, and arms reversed.

The Import Duties Report achieved a great work; meantime the distress continued, the Revenue still declined, the party in power felt that it must do something, and the party out of power lustily exclaimed that everything would be put right, if those on the right hand of the SPEAKER'S chair would go to the left, and let the left-handed men go to the right. Out came the Whig Budget and the fixed duty of eight shillings; and these testified that, as between 1840 and 1841, there was already a great advance. True, FREE TRADE did suffer a temporary reverse by being associated, rightly or wrongly, with the last efforts of the party from whose hands the sceptre was departing. In the GENERAL ELECTION of 1841 the ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE laboured under the disadvantage of being supposed the mere aids or auxiliaries of a party which had been in office for ten years, and had now passed into the last stage of official decay. The public had not yet learned that FREE TRADE is of no party, but the great party of the people; and the general constituency of the empire being called upon to "pronounce" while they were as yet babes in the understanding of those doctrines which schoolboys can now expound, they frequently, in heat, in passion, and in prejudice, voted for men whose principles and professions were adverse to their real interests. Vague ideas, too, floated about, as to what would be done, when one party was turned out, and the other party turned in. There were to be new poor laws, short hours, high wages for the workmen; and all the farmers, called to the hustings by the farmers' friends, were to be secured in high prices for corn, and their landlords in high rents for land. In spite, therefore, of the great progress making with Free Trade, the GENERAL ELECTION of 1841 was a SKEMING demonstration and decision against it; and once more might the Free-Trader have despaired, when the roll was called, and in the House of Commons a majority of NINETY-ONE turned out the party which proposed to give us some Free Trade, and turned in the party which was to give us none.

Yet, great and manifold were the benefits to arise out of the seemingly disastrous general election of 1841. The new Parliament assembled on the 19th of August; and in the royal speech, read by commission, it was called upon to direct its attention to "the revision of duties affecting the productions of other countries;" to "consider whether some of these duties are not so trifling in amount as to be unproductive to the revenue, while they are vexatious to commerce;" to "further examine whether the principle of protection upon which others of these duties are founded be not carried to an extent injurious alike to the income of the state and the interests of the people;" and, above all, "to consider the laws which regulate the trade in corn." "It will be for you," said the Lord Chancellor, as the mouthpiece of royalty, addressing the assembled Lords and Commons, "to determine whether those laws do not aggravate the natural fluctuations of supply—whether they do not embarrass trade, derange the currency, and by their operation diminish the comfort and increase the privations of the great body of the community."

Great words, to come even by proxy from the throne, though pressed on a new Parliament, the majority of which listened with unwilling ears. Had it been animated by that wisdom and sagacity which, with instinctive fore-slight, can discern and prophesy coming events, it would have nobly responded to the appeal; and, without reference to sliding scale or fixed duty, decided that commerce in corn and provisions should be free, and that customs duties should exist for revenue alone, and even then only on principles of moderation and fairness, the new Parliament of 1841 would have stamped itself as the greatest and the noblest recorded in our annals. But the majority said they had other work to do. The enlightened people of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland had sent them, not to take measures for renovating commerce, reactivating trade, mitigating the sufferings of millions of industriously-minded but idle and starving men, but to dismiss some twenty individuals who held high offices of state, and to place some other twenty people in their places. To this great work they addressed themselves; and this great work they achieved.

Yet the debate of the week which followed the assembling of the new Parliament in the autumn of 1841 was not all wasted in the miserable rhetoric of party. Messrs. Villiers, Milner Gibson, Ward, Ewart, and Bowring recalled the heated partisans to the fact that something was due to the nation as well as to themselves; and Mr. Cobden, first returned to Parliament in the general election, was heard for the first time in that arena where he has won so many honours. But Sir Robert Peel was the man who was to indicate the rapid progress of the question of Free Trade. In that cabinet oration of about four hours, which preceded the vote that dismissed the Whigs, while talking on all topics, home and foreign, and proclaiming his future policy, he wheeled right face round about to the benches behind him crowded with county members, and declared that he "would not pledge himself to all the details of the sliding scale." A cloud passed over the countenances of those county members, some of whom had a dim idea, even then, that they were "sold." But it passed off, as no doubt it was intended, in the hurried excitement of an approaching and important division. In those words, however, of Sir Robert Peel, let fall apparently at random, yet uttered with deep premeditation, was it shadowed forth that the Corn Law of 1828 had filled up the measure of its iniquities, and was doomed to destruction.

The short session of the autumn of 1841 was brought to a speedy close, in spite of the earnest protests of the Free-Traders as to the state of the country and the condition of the working classes. The weather seconded their remonstrances. Instead of a bright shining August sun, maturing the wheat and mellowing the fruit, dark clouds chased each other across the sky, and torrents of rain drenched the ground. A dark and gloomy winter followed: dismal for commerce, disastrous for trade, and distressing for the labouring classes. Even the "Quarterly Review" was touched by the general suffering. At the close of 1841, it came out with an article full of kindly sympathy for the poor, and protesting that they were very far from getting a satisfactory bellyful of butcher meat. So it called out for cheap veal; and, pointing to the seas that surround our island, declared that there were inexhaustible stores of living creatures there, all good for food, if we would only go out and catch them. Flying paragraphs also went about the newspapers, stating that the Prime Minister rose every winter morning by candle-light—some said as early as five o'clock—and, with his secretaries on each side, was busily employed in concocting a grand plan of relief. And in the month of January, 1842, Mr. Christopher, the farmers' friend, of Lincolnshire, let up a "pilot balloon" on the subject of the sliding scale; and all men became eager for the opening of a session which was to reveal the mysteries of the new administration.

The commencement of the session came at last. The Tower and the Park opened their iron mouths, and announced that the Queen of England, accompanied by her "good brother and ally" the King of Prussia, had gone down to the House of Lords; and there, on the 3rd of February, 1842, her Majesty read to the assembled Parliament her regret at the "continued distress in the manufacturing districts," and her admiration of the "exemplary patience and fortitude" with which the people had borne their "sufferings and privations." Now, they were commanded to apply a remedy—to consider measures which would "improve the national resources, and encourage the industry and promote the happiness of the people."

The first of these measures was propounded on the 9th of February. Expectation was almost wild with anxiety and excitement. The country gentlemen clustered like bees when swarming. All below was crowded, and from the side galleries above eager eyes looked down, and ears were open as eagerly to hear. The Prime Minister stood up; he talked of corn, of averages, and of the sliding scale; but when it turned out that he was about to substitute one sliding scale for another, the pent-up excitement relieved itself by smiles, shrugs, and murmuring, whispering conversation. Still, when the speech was done, there was no disposition to raise a debate. To the country gentlemen the change appeared too trivial for change, unless, indeed, it would have the effect of suppressing the dreadful and annoying Anti-Corn-Law League; and to the Free-Traders the matter appeared a mockery. Yet there was a juggle in the new scale; it had "averages" in it, that is, small fixed duties embedded in a fluctuating series; and there were to be changes in the mode of taking the averages, the effect of which could not then be estimated. So, by general assent, the House rose as early as eight o'clock; the only voice raised in condemnation of the new scheme being that of Mr. Cobden, who, in a few energetic words, denounced it as an insult to a suffering people.

But the debates which ensued on subsequent nights did more to enlighten the public mind on the nature and merits of sliding scales than, perhaps, all that had gone before. Contrast is a great help in controversy; and in the Corn-Law controversy, two scales, side by side, were like the two pieces of wood in the hands of the aboriginal Australian, when by friction he procures a light and illuminates his darkness. Nor must it be forgotten that it was in the debates on this new Corn Law that Sir Edward Knatchbull made the memorable declaration, that the object of all Corn Laws was to enable the country gentlemen to maintain their stations in society, and bestow decent dowries on their daughters.

Next came the great New TARIFF speech, on the 11th of March, and the deliberate and emphatic announcement by the head of the Government that it was the essence of commerce to "buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market." From that hour Free Trade became a great fact, a living reality. Maimed, mutilated, and crushed as it was in the Legislature, it passed from the Import Duties Report into legislation, from the Anti-Corn-Law League into the Ministry, from Manchester into the Custom-house, and from the Custom house into the Exchequer. Abuse of "millocrats," which, about a year previously, was a popular and fascinating theme, became vulgar and disgraceful. No more pamphlets came out about the saving of the one hundred and fiftieth part of a fraction on the price of the quartern loaf. We heard a good deal more about our foreign, and a good deal less about our home, commerce. Foreign cattle came in; and "grinding in bond" was permitted. Glorious year was 1842 for Free Trade, passing, as it did, from the abstract to the concrete, and writing itself down on the Statute Book of Britain. Yet even then it was owing to the unexpected bounty of Heaven that Free Trade, in the confined shape in which it appeared in the New Tariff, did not come too late. Another year seemed about to be added to the list of deficient harvests, when suddenly a brilliant August sun chased away the clouds and the rain, and saved the crops. At the same moment the working classes in the manufacturing districts, worn out with privations, and desperate in feeling, broke out into the unhappy insurrection which marked the autumn of 1842—an insurrection, nevertheless, which might have been productive of fearful disaster, if the working classes had not been as intelligent and as enduring as they were.

So much had been done for Free Trade in 1842 that all men looked forward with hope to the session of 1843. Phrases dropped from Sir Robert Peel at the London Guildhall, and other public places, indicative of a disposition to follow out the course he had entered on. Fearful that abundance in corn might follow the opening of the markets for foreign beef, fish, and vegetables, the monopolists roused themselves, and laid their heavy hands on the head of the Prime Minister. In the royal speech at the opening of the session, the "diminished receipts from some of the ordinary sources of revenue" were attributed to "the reduced consumption of many articles, caused by that depression of the manufacturing industry of the country which has so long prevailed." From this it might have been inferred that the Prime Minister was perfectly conscious that free trade in corn, and other articles of general consumption, should at once be added to the Tariff. But the dual influence was too strong. The coroneted corn-merchants and fishmongers had still power to frighten, if not to unmake, a Minister; and though galled and fretted by the taunts which were flung at him, Sir Robert Peel had to get up on the first night of the session, and declare that, at present, he had no intention of meddling with the Corn Law. The thing, however, rankled in his soul; he felt the humiliation of it; and in the great debate, raised by Lord Howick, on the causes of that manufacturing depression which was alluded to in the royal speech, he was betrayed into that unhappy perversion, by which he converted Mr. Cobden's ministerial "responsibility" into personal responsibility, and thus endeavoured, to the infinite damage of his own credit and character, to attach a stigma to the member for Stockport. The night, or rather morning, on which this occurred, was marked by a heavy snow storm; but the elements were calm and tranquil when contrasted with the heated and stormy atmosphere of "the House."

Still, though 1843, when considered legislatively, was a smaller year than 1842 for Free Trade, it was, nevertheless, a year of movement, if not of progress. It was in the debate on Lord Howick's motion that Sir James Graham affirmed that the doctrines of Free Trade were "recognised by every man of common sense" in the country—that Mr. Gladstone declared there was no longer any doubt about the truth of the principles of Free Trade—and that Mr. Goulburn, going still further, asserted, that of the abstract truth of those principles there never had been any doubt. At a later period in the session Lord Stanley opened a back door to the corn-growing regions of the United States, by the Canadian Corn Bill—a measure which, though a crooked one, has turned out anything but despicable. And it was in this session, too, that Mr. Gladstone repealed the prohibitions on the exportation of machinery; and that the electors of Durham returned Mr. Baines to the House of Commons.

The session 1844 is too recent and too memorable to be forgotten. Mr. Cobden's great speech on the effects of protective duties on the interests of farmers and farm-labourers; Mr. Villiers's annual debate, brought forward with unabated spirit and interest; the turmoil on the Factories Bill, with the warnings about the "House of Cards;" and the embroilment of Ministers in the question of the Sugar duties. Nor need we remind our readers how the Tory Chancellor of the Exchequer repeatedly preached Free Trade in the House; how he repealed and reduced duties; and how he promised that there was to be a great revision of our whole financial condition in the session of 1845.

The session of 1845 has come; and we wait its results.

THE LATE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE LEAGUE.

[In our report of the proceedings of the late annual meeting in the Free-Trade Hall, Manchester, we were compelled, from the lateness of the hour at which we received the report, to give only a brief summary of the excellent speech of Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., of Liverpool. There are in it, however, some important remarks on the subject of railways, well worthy the attention of such of our readers as are interested in any of these gigantic undertakings; and we beg, therefore, to submit them for their perusal.]

MR. LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, of Liverpool, next addressed the meeting. He said that last week they had a meeting of the Anti-Monopoly Society in Liverpool, and the room, one of the largest in the town, was crowded to a greater extent than on any previous occasion—a circumstance which, in times unfavourable to agitation, augured well for the cause. Following up Mr. Baines's line of argument, he would endeavour to point out the immediate causes of the results so ably illustrated by that gentleman. All would remember that in 1836 food and provision of all kinds were cheap, and the revenue prosperous, the poor-rates diminished, and everything indicated that the people, to a considerable extent, were employed, and were enjoying the comforts of life. But, after 1836, we had unfavourable harvests, yielding an insufficient supply of food for the people; not that Providence had not supplied a sufficient provision for his rational creatures, for the crops were plentiful in other countries. The cause of the evils which afflicted us in the years 1837 to 1841 did not come from the hand of Providence, but direct from the iniquitous operations and designs of men. (Hear.) These evils were produced by artificial means, by an iniquitous law, which forbade the food that God had provided from supplying the crying wants, not only of the indigent poor, but also of the honest and industrious operatives and labourers of this country. The evil consequences were not limited to the immediate distress it occasioned. We require, on an average, two million quarters of wheat, amounting to five or six millions sterling per annum. Our opponents said, that all we could expect to benefit by Free Trade would be in the importation of these two or three million quarters of wheat, and in the sending in return six millions' worth of our manufactures to pay for it. Though that was in itself no trifling matter, it was not all, or a tithe of the whole benefit, that would result from Free Trade—because, if that wheat were prevented coming in by iniquitous legislation, the price of provisions would rise so high that the poorer classes could not eat sufficient, and, at the same time, it would deprive them of the means to consume to the same extent the commodities and manufactures of the country, as they could when food was cheap. Say that this privation was to the extent of 2s. weekly per family during the time of extreme high prices. That would amount, on five million families, to £500,000 a week, or upwards of twenty-six millions of money per annum, withdrawn from the consumption of articles necessary for comfort. In this fact existed the fearful and aggravated evil of a scarcity in the necessities of life. (Applause.) When this cessation of demand on the part of the masses had taken effect, so as to stop the employment of manufacturing operatives, they ceased to earn wages, and this increased the general privation to an amount he would not attempt to calculate, but would leave the meeting to judge how much money was consequently withdrawn from being expended, not only in the consumption of our various manufactures, but also in food. Now, the withdrawal of twenty-six millions of money from the consumption of the country paralysed the country's industrial power to create wealth, and was many times more important than the direct advantage derived from sending our manufactures in exchange for foreign corn. Amongst the fallacies as to the cause of distress, one, put forth by many who were well-informed on other subjects, was, that distress was owing to a scarcity of money—to a panic in the money market. Now, he thought he could show clearly that it did not arise from these causes, but simply and solely because the great articles of necessary consumption, provisions, were scarce. That was the only origin of the evil. Suppose a man, with 1s. 6d. in his pocket, went to market to buy potatoes, and expected to get as usual 90lbs. (the measure in Liverpool) for 1s.; but found that, owing to a deficient crop, they had doubled in price, and that 1s. would buy only half a measure. When he recollected his hungry children at home, he would immediately feel a panic in his pocket, and would regret that he had spent 6d. on the way in a pair of woollen socks for one of his children. He would say to himself, "Now potatoes are more scarce, I find money more scarce too; and where it would do before, I must have 2s. now; and, though the children want shoes and stockings, I cannot buy them, as I shall want the money for potatoes." Then the shoemaker and other tradesmen who had profited by the man spending his other shilling with them, not finding his shilling, and those of thousands of other operatives, similarly affected, to come over their counters, began to say, "Bless us, what a scarcity of money! Where is all the money gone to?" But the operation of scarcity on the money market does not stop here; the poor man is by trade a stocking-weaver, and his master, not receiving his usual order from the shoakers, deprives him of employment, wages cease to be earned, and even the provision shops in consequence participate in and proclaim against the want of money. Why, the money is in the pocket of just the same as before; but, when all the provisions of country were scarce, money became scarce too; and the panic of that one man became the universal panic. (Applause.) No money panic ever occurred in this or in any other country, that has not been occasioned by an inefficient quantity of the things calculated to remunerate enterprise, or the labourer for his labour,—either specially as in national adventures, such as the abortive, because premature, railway investment of capital in the United States; or, as it happens more usually, from an actual defalcation in the necessities of life, such as this country, painfully experienced in the years 1839 to 1842. Commodities of all kinds are the effects on which the currency obtains credit; and when these fail, a panic in the money market must of necessity ensue. The commodities, the things, of a country were the basis of the money; and, if the things were scarce, there would be a scarcity of money too. Give us plenty of commodities, and money would be plentiful; and the most ingenious legislation on the currency, be that currency gold, silver, or paper, cannot prevent this law in the nature of things from taking effect. Hence distress and stagnation of trade were not owing to the money panic, but scarcity in the provision market was the disastrous parent of all this misery. But our rulers legislated to get scarcity, though common sense would lead us to desire plenty. The only way to get plenty was to abolish all monopolies, and then scarcity at home could be remedied by plenty from without. Mr. Heyworth next dwelt on the benefits which cheap food had secured to the railway companies. The traffic of the last six months of 1844, on thirty-eight of the principal railways of Great Britain, amounted to three millions and a quarter, or exactly to £3,264,000, on 1522 miles of main and 234 of branch lines—in all, 1756 miles. This revenue was £454,000 more than the corresponding period of 1843, or nearly half a million of money increase; being 14 per cent. of increase on the traffic. This, which was only a small integral part of the wealth of the country, indicated that the whole country was in a state of prosperity; because the only available power, which is the industry of the country to create wealth, had been called into active and cheering operation by the plenty and cheap food, which left a surplus of wages in the hands of the labourers of the country, to be expended by them on the commodities that rendered themselves and their homes comfortable. He pointed to this augmented railway traffic and profit, in consequence of the abundance of cheap provisions, once more vouchsafed by Providence to relieve from wretchedness a nation guilty of restricting its food for the people by heavy impost on its importation, because it justified a statement he had made in 1842. The statement was as follows:—"He was a large railway proprietor, and if Free-Trade principles were to prevail—if the differential duties on colonial produce were removed—if corn were permitted to be imported free of duty from abroad whenever we wanted it, and the vast masses of the people were allowed to satisfy their hunger with cheap food, he felt persuaded that a double quantity of sugar would be consumed, that a double quantity of coffee would be used, and he scarcely doubted that a double quantity of wheat would be required for the sufficient sustenance of the people. These articles, when imported, would be transported from the seaports to the interior, and from town to town by railway. Payment for them would be made in manufactures, which would be transmitted by the same conveyances; and commercial travellers, employed in the sale and purchase of these, would vastly augment the number of railway passengers, and could not but greatly increase the profits of the railway companies, to an amount far beyond what he would venture to predict; but if it amounted to one-half per cent. of net profit, which was so small that it would not be doubted, it would give an additional value of ten per cent. to the capital, and that ten per cent. would give him a hundred times one hundred pounds." In conclusion he seconded the motion, which was put from the chair, and passed unanimously.

MEETINGS.

LYMINGTON.—On Monday, the 27th ult., Mr. Falvey gave a lecture at the large School-room, in Ashley's-lane, upon the Corn and Provision Laws; and long before the appointed hour, seven o'clock, nearly every seat was taken. The lecturer, who was listened to with great attention, handled his subject in a masterly style.

SOUTHAMPTON.—The last monthly meeting of the Southampton Reform Association was held at the Sun Hotel, on Tuesday, the 28th ult., when there was a crowded attendance of members. Mr. R. Andrews was the chairman for the evening, and Mr. F. Leigh, solicitor, the vice-chairman. Several new members were admitted, amongst whom was Mr. Snowden, coach-trimmer, late of Exeter, who was made an object of persecution by the monopolists at Exeter, at the last election for that place, in consequence of his having given an independent vote in favour of General Briggs, the Free-Trade candidate. He was dismissed from his situation, and has now found employment in the establishment of Mr. Andrews. The meeting gave Mr. Snowden a vote of thanks for his independent conduct at Exeter. The usual business having been transacted, Mr. Falvey, the eloquent lecturer of the Anti-Corn-Law League, addressed the meeting. At the close of his speech, Mr. F. Cooper proposed a vote of thanks to the League for their great exertions in the cause of Free Trade, and to Mr. Falvey, for his eloquent and convincing address. Mr. Andrews seconded the vote, which was put to the meeting by the vice-chairman, and carried unanimously.

BARNSTOCK.—Mr. Falvey delivered a lecture on the Corn and Provision Laws, at the Town-hall, on Wednesday evening, the 29th ult. The spacious building was crowded with a most respectable audience, including many influential agriculturists, millers, and others materially interested in this important question. Various questions were put to Mr. Falvey, by Mr. Whistler, of Down Grange, and the lecture took a rather conversational turn, which appeared to increase the interest of the meeting; the discussion, with one or two trifling exceptions, being conducted with the greatest temper and courtesy, and with a manifest desire on all sides to elicit truth irrespective of its bearings on the question at issue. The lecturer's replies, to judge by the enthusiastic cheering which generally followed, appeared to make a great impression on the audience. A vote of thanks to the chief magistrate, for permitting the use of the hall on the occasion, was carried by acclamation, and the meeting separated—Stamper Independent.

EMSWORTH.—A lecture on the Corn Laws was delivered by Mr. Falvey, on Friday, the 31st ult., to the farmers of Embsworth, and the neighbourhood. Major Allen, was called to the chair. The lecture was attentively listened to, and repeatedly cheered during its delivery. At the close, votes of thanks were given to the chairman and lecturer, and three cheers for Free Trade.

HOXTON ANTI-CORN-LAW ASSOCIATION.—The second anniversary of this association was held at the North Briton, near Hoxton Church, on Tuesday, the 4th inst., when about 100 members and friends sat down to dinner. Among the toasts given was "Prosperity to the Association, and may they soon arrive at the consummation of their wishes." Mr. Fisher, in responding, gave a detailed account of the objects and proceedings of the association. The health of the Council of the League was received with three times three, and other manifestations of confidence and respect. Mr. Sidney Smith acknowledged the toast in an eloquent and effective speech.

ANTI-CORN-LAW TEA PARTY AT BURY.—On Friday evening, the 31st ult., an Anti-Corn-Law tea party, at which upwards of 300 persons were present, was held in the Mechanics' Institution room, Radcliffe. After tea the room was crowded; and Edmund Grundy, Esq., of Park Hills, was called to the chair. After addresses from Messrs. Wood and Rostron, of Radcliffe, Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., was called upon. In the course of his speech he showed that, when provisions were cheap and plentiful, there was a better demand for goods, and operatives were enabled to obtain a higher rate of wages. The cause of a repeal of the Corn Laws and Free Trade was rapidly advancing, and a better feeling was arising between the employers and the employed.—John Brooks, Esq., of Manchester, spoke on the sugar and coffee question. Votes of thanks were given to the chairman, to Messrs. Cobden and Brooks, and also to the ladies, the Misses Wolstenholmes, Fletcher, Taylor, and Kay, who had got up the tea party. The meeting broke up a few minutes before ten o'clock.

NOTTINGHAM ANTI-CORN-LAW ASSOCIATION.—A meeting of the Council of this association was held on Monday evening last; Samuel Bean, Esq., in the chair; when the Secretary, Mr. Johnson, resigned his office, in consequence of his being about to remove to Stockport. L. Christie, Esq., then moved the following resolution, which was seconded by J. Bradley, Esq., and carried unanimously:—"That this meeting desires to record its high sense of the services of Mr. J. G. Johnson to this association, and to the cause of Corn-Law repeal; that it accepts his resignation as secretary with regret, and begs to offer him its best wishes for his prosperity." Mr. John Place, of Mount-street, was unanimously elected Mr. Johnson's successor.

DERBY LIBERAL OPERATIVE ASSOCIATION.—The fourth annual meeting of this society was held in the Lecture-hall, on Tuesday se'night, Wm. Evans, Esq., M.P., in the chair. The room was tastefully decorated for the occasion, with banners, evergreens, and various mottoes, and when lighted up had a most pleasing appearance. About 350 sat down to dinner. The Chairman was supported by his Worship the Mayor of the borough (John Moss, Esq.), E. Strutt, Esq., M.P., J. Barber, Esq., W. T. Evans, Esq., S. Fox, Esq., &c. &c. In the course of the evening, Robert R. Moore, Esq., from the Anti-Corn-Law League (who chanced to be passing through the town, and received an invitation to attend the dinner), made his appearance, and was received with clapping of hands. Mr. Madely, in the course of the evening, proposed "Free Trade—success to the exertions of the League, particularly in the course they were taking to increase the constituency of the country—and the health of Mr. Moore." Mr. Moore responded in an eloquent speech; and when he had concluded, three hearty cheers were given for the League.

PLYMOUTH FREE-TRADE ASSOCIATION.—On Friday evening, the 31st ult., Mr. G. W. Soltau delivered a lecture to the members of this association, at the Mechanics' Institute, Plymouth, to a crowded audience. The subject of the lecture was "Education as connected with Free Trade." Our space does not permit us to quote from the lecture, a full report of which appears in the Plymouth Journal. It embraced a copious array of facts, lucidly arranged, establishing the deplorable extent of ignorance, and the vice and crime consequent thereon, throughout the country; facts of an opposite kind, showing that in those countries where education is the rule, crime is of much rarer occurrence; an exposure of endowed schools; and the lecturer's own views of what popular education ought to aim at, viz.:—"Religious instruction for the formation of morality. The language of the country. The elements of geometry, and the general principles of drawing. Practical arithmetic. Geography and history combined, so as to give the pupil a knowledge of the divisions of the earth, and the history of the world. The history, laws, and constitution of his own country. Writing, singing, and gymnastic exercises. Such an education would develop the faculties of the soul, the reason, the senses, and the physical frame. It exercises the reason, enlightens the morals, fortifies the body, and founds the disposition to labour and independence." The lecturer also contended for the necessity of employment, and the unfettering of the springs of industry, to go hand in hand with education. The lecture was received with great applause.

COUNTY QUALIFICATIONS.

Little was expected to be done this year in North Lancashire; but such has been the zeal displayed in the work of qualifying, that, calculating the number known to have neglected claiming, and the number of new qualifications, the next register will stand at least a thousand more in favour of Free Trade than the present. We have no minute reports from Chorley, Blackburn, Burnley, Clitheroe, Lancaster, &c.; but we can state upon the best authority that the value of freehold property which has changed hands in Preston alone for this purpose, amounts to the sum of £10,930! This is only the beginning, and, from the spirit we behold, we have not the shadow of a doubt but our division of the county will yet be honoured in the Senate by men whose principles are really identified with all its interests. We recommend the example of the Free-Traders in this district to other counties, many of which, by corresponding exertions, may be delivered from the yoke of monopoly.—Preston Guardian.

The effort just made to increase the number of Free-Traders on the register of the West Riding must produce important consequences. In Leeds 486 persons have entitled themselves to be placed on the register, of whom some, however, would in the ordinary course of things have obtained the qualification. We believe from 200 to 300 will be added at Huddersfield; perhaps an equal number at Halifax; upwards of 150 at Bradford; from 100 to 150 at Wakefield; and considerable numbers at Sheffield, Hebden Bridge, Todmorden, and many other places. Besides this, some hundreds of gentlemen at Rochdale and Manchester have qualified themselves to exercise the franchise in the West Riding of Yorkshire. On the whole, we have no doubt that, after the next registration, the number of Liberals and Free-Traders on the register will considerably preponderate over that of the Tories and Monopolists.—Leeds Mercury.

REVENUE AND FREE TRADE OF HOLLAND.

(From the Economist.)

There are various rumours afloat as to changes in the mode of raising the revenue of Holland. Most of our readers are aware that the commercial policy of Holland has been always distinguished for its great liberality and freedom, by which means a nation numbering only between two and three millions, and having the greatest natural disadvantages to contend against, has maintained an important position among the great European nations, and accumulated capital to an extraordinary extent.

Holland has been much assisted in her free commercial policy by the fact, that the Government has relied chiefly on direct taxation as the great source of revenue, and not on import duties. The taxation of Holland bears nearly the same proportion to its population as that of this country—if anything, it is rather greater. The population is about one-tenth of the United Kingdom, and the annual revenue rather exceeds one-tenth, being about seventy millions of florins, or £5,800,000 sterling. Of this not more than five millions of florins, or little more than £400,000 net, are raised from customs duties, while all the rest is raised from direct taxes on property. One of the propositions which has been made to the finance minister by some eminent merchants, and which proposition, it is said, has been favourably received, is to abolish the customs dues altogether, and to raise the additional sum by direct taxes on property, and thus to make their foreign trade as free as a coasting trade.

Much blame has been heaped upon the Dutch Government for the way in which it has conducted its colonies in the East, much of which, however, is totally undeserved; and, at all events, its colonial legislation, as far as regards the interests of the home consumer, has been marked by a sense of justice and wisdom that we might do well to imitate.

The Government may be said to have had especial interest in the produce of Java, but yet not even an attempt has been made to introduce that baneful system of differential duties, which, we believe, have not only been injurious to the consumer in this country, but have really been detrimental to the best interests of our colonies. Holland imports sugar and coffee from all the world, and admits it to consumption on payment of the same duties, without regard to its place of growth. Sugar and coffee from Cuba and Brazil are imported exactly on the same terms as the same articles the produce of Java or Surinam; and yet, notwithstanding this free competition with the world, an unparalleled rapid increase has taken place in the production of these commodities. It is customary for people to express great regret that we gave up that island at the conclusion of the war, when it is seen how productive it has proved in the hands of the Dutch; but we very much doubt whether, with our colonial management—with our protecting care of high differential duties—that progress had been near as great as it has. Certain it is, that none of our colonies, with all the advantages which they have had during that period, with a strict monopoly of the home market for sugar, and a high protection for coffee, have made any such progress. In the three great leading articles of produce, the exports from Java, during the last sixteen years, have been—

1829	27,551,000	91,227	51,205
1830	38,498,980	129,333	—
1831	39,878,160	144,077	47,125
1832	41,889,755	292,705	185,032
1833	48,022,188	251,128	139,228

1835	62,249,451	323,162	597,128
1836	66,410,393	607,338	448,577
1837	91,326,321	820,063	904,741
1838	—	No accounts.	—
1839	100,714,336	999,895	1,191,636
1840	150,605,810	1,203,980	2,124,911
1841	128,195,466	1,215,804	1,827,386
1842	131,812,592	1,053,196	1,627,437
1843	113,093,333	920,583	1,712,300

When we contrast this progress of production, exposed to free competition with Brazil, Cuba, and other slave-producing countries, with that of our own colonies, it is impossible to divest our minds of the suspicion, of the truth of which there are so many collateral evidences, that the principle of protection is always most delusive in its operation; that it lulls the energies and ingenuity of the producers, of which the West Indian papers now teem with acknowledged examples, while it effectually prevents that application of capital which can only take place where perfect confidence exists in the state of things as they are.

In other respects the Dutch tariff is based on the most liberal principles—the rates of duties, even where an accidental protection is intended, varying only from six to ten per cent., while a large portion of the duties are even much lower.

The Dutch have great reason to be well pleased with the enlightened principles of trade which they have adopted, and we shall be highly gratified to see them carry these principles farther into practice, by abolishing custom-house duties altogether, and resorting exclusively to a direct taxation, which they are in a condition to do without any inconvenience, seeing to how small an extent they are now dependent on that source of revenue.

Circular letters have been sent, by order of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, to the different corn inspectors in market towns, requiring them to be more particular in forcing due returns from the dealers in corn, a neglect of which subjects the offender to a penalty of £30.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XIX.

TO THOMAS BARING, ESQ., M.P., not FOR THE CITY OF LONDON.

SIR,—It is natural for those who have escaped being your constituents to scrutinize your Parliamentary conduct, and thus ascertain whether they have, or have not, reason to congratulate themselves on their rejection of your proffered services as their representative.

You invite this scrutiny by your prominent position on the first night of the session, as the seconder of the Address. You are "grateful" for the honour of being "selected" for that office. It is your pride to have, so far, the confidence of Sir Robert Peel; and you find in that some compensation for not having the confidence of the citizens of London. That you do so feel, is not less satisfactory to them than it appears to be to yourself. It shows how little you were qualified for the honour to which you aspired. He who can boast of the "selection" was not unworthy of the rejection. To be trusted by one whom nobody trusts, is a very equivocal compliment to throw in the scale against the votes of the metropolitan constituency.

"Prosperity" is the beginning, middle, and end of your speech. You paint the condition of the country in the most brilliant colours. Wool and cotton, ships and iron, beam in your eloquence like the tints of the rainbow. In your figures, the people grow fat upon "tea, coffee, and sugar." Judging by your praises, if Pitt was a heaven-born Minister, Peel is a heaven-making Minister. The land is flowing with milk and honey. Hope may rest at the bottom of Pandora's box; she is not wanted by a thriving world, in the fulness of its enjoyment.

And is this the whole of the picture which, on such an occasion, should have been presented? Does the existing manufacturing prosperity descend so deep and stretch so wide as to require no abatement of your gratulations? Around this nucleus of thrift, is there no dark atmosphere of wretchedness? What says your colleague in moving the Address? "At no former period has the condition of the great body of the people excited so deep, so real an interest, in the public mind. Never have so many plans been discussed for the improvement of their moral and physical condition." Does this sympathy only come when it is least needed, these plans when they are least wanted? Is this sanatory speculation simply a scheme for the investment of surplus capital in beneficence? Does it not rather show that the prosperity which is undenied, and which no one seeks to depreciate, is insufficient for the wants of the population? We have more trade and employment than we had; still we have not so much trade and employment as we need. The full exchequer leaves many stomachs empty. The good you describe as positive, is only comparative. In the words of Carlyle, "Man is yet unhelped." We have not got rid of "deaths by destitution." With all the increase of work, thousands cannot obtain "leave to toil." How is there to be more work, and work that will afford adequate wages, for willing hands? You did not propose to explain that to her Majesty, in your address. Do you not know? Have you no conception of the means by which trade might be enlarged? Do you perceive no openings, rich in promise, and boundless in extent? Are you aware of no restrictions, by which those openings are barred against honest exchange and industrial enterprise? O you know the talisman that would make the temple of commerce rise in the natural amplitude of its dimensions; and expand its gates for the reception of multitudes with far other greeting than what awaits them at the doors of the union workhouse. But of that extension of the present limited prosperity which the wants of multitudes require, and which Free Trade alone can give, you were dumb as death.

Equally silent were you of the gloomy shading which, from another quarter, ought to have cast itself over the brightness of your picture. You spoke of commercial, but not of agricultural, prosperity. The tenant-farmer makes no figure in your speech. The life of the labourer is not delineated. You had not a word of sympathy for the struggles of the one and the misery of the other. You entered into no discussion of the discrepancy between their condition, and that of the classes just now more prosperous. This omission is less excusable in the member for Huntingdon than it would have been in the member for London. Many of your constituents are connected with agriculture; and agriculture is, at present, not paying anybody but the landlords; who, as such, are not agriculturists. That the real cultivators of the soil are distressed, should not be overlooked because they are deluded. They say they are in the same boat with the landlords; but should they be allowed to sink for the sin of embarking in the pirate craft of Protection? Agricultural distress is an inevitable alternative in the effects of commercial restriction. Under the present system, the plough and the loom never prosper at once. Thriving and starving are like the man and woman, one in, the other out, of the old weather house. They swing on the same pivot. Why did you blink facts which are not less palpable to the statesman because they are perverted by the protectionists? The Corn Laws are ruining the real agriculturists. The tenant knows not whether he is better with a lease or without, taking it, as he must, at a factitious rent, and in the face of fearful fluctuations. The security by which improvement should be guaranteed, is paralysed by the delusions of protection. The labourer is alike forlorn, whether dukes drank his health in water or in wine. They give his health, but he gets it not. They toast him, but he has no toast with his cold tea. Peel's prosperity touches neither the tenantry nor the peasantry; and you leave them untouched in your one-sided picture.

Another omission, in your speech, is that of all mention of the cause or causes of the present gleam of commercial prosperity. You shun analysis. The only hint at causation is when you declare it "impossible not to see that the real change of circumstances had originated in the adoption of the Income Tax!" Perhaps you restrict this to the revenue. If so, it materially abates your argument of national prosperity from financial prosperity. To speak of trade as revived by an Income Tax would rather exceed even the indulgence extended to movers and seconders of the Address. So you have the prosperity as if it came, as America is said to have been originally peopled, "by accident." You flinch from the palpable fact that comparative cheapness has induced comparative prosperity. You trace no connexion between the price of provisions and the impulse to manufactures. The effect of a cheap year is undiscernible to you; unseen amid the benignant influences of an Income Tax. They like it at Huntingdon, I suppose. Tastes differ, in different localities, both as to men and measures. But why did you say nothing of cheap food? Why did you leave the vision of prosperity in a mist, when the proof of its resulting from permanent and progressive causes would have imparted the firm characters of reality? You are not yourself convinced of its permanence. The ceaseless changes to which restriction subjects the trade of the country present themselves to your mind, though you abstain from all allusion to them. This is another instance of the pervading mental dishonesty of your speech. When you come to the subject of taxation, the truth peeps out:—

"Looking, therefore, to the safety of the country, and to the maintenance of her credit and financial stability, on which that credit depended, and believing, moreover, as he did, that whatever amount of relief might be experienced generally by having recourse to an extensive reduction in the amount of taxation, it would be as wise on the part of the nation to rely upon one year of great prosperity, as it would be for an individual to regulate his expenditure by one year's fortunate exertions in trade,—he considered, he repeated, that it would be exceedingly unwise and impolitic to make any important reduction in those taxes from which the present financial prosperity of the empire was derived."

This prosperity is, therefore, by your own showing, not a thing for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to rely upon. He must look out for the chance of a rainy day. You are content with leaving the trade of the country on a sandy basis, much too infirm to trust the Treasury thereon. In the sentimental days of Toryism, the cry was "Perish commerce, so the Constitution live." The modern doctrine is to peril trade so that the treasury be replenished; even though it be by the exactions of the Income Tax. Should a bad harvest send corn up to the prices of 1839, where will be your prosperity? The taxation will be safe, and there you leave it.

You profess to desiderate "a closer connexion" with the United States. Are not the practical means tolerably obvious? Is there any way but one in which that desire can be gratified? While you uphold the corn monopoly, what are such professions but the vainest of words? Is not an American trade waiting for us, contingent simply on our taking its produce? Do you not invite the Americans to retort upon you the very admonition inflicted by yourself upon the Emperor of Russia? Nothing can be better for the purpose than your own words:—

"He was sure the Emperor of Russia must have appreciated the feelings with which he had been received, and seen the desire that existed to bind the two countries in closer connexion; and happy should he (Mr. Baring) be if, feeling, as he must, that there was no stronger bond of peace than the mutual interest of the two countries, the Emperor of Russia should be disposed to remove or modify some of those restrictions which now interfered so much with the importation of our produce into that country—('hear, and a laugh')—a measure which he believed would not only increase the friendly feeling between the two countries, but augment the receipts of his own revenue, and of which the only injury would be to the productiveness of the contraband trade."

While America may repeat your lesson, Nicholas may have recourse to you for his reply. He is for Free Trade "in the abstract." What right have you to expect from the Czar of Russia that he shall surpass you in the practical application of principles? You confirm, by such admonitions, the Continental prejudice, that Great Britain aims at combining the advantages of Free Trade by other nations with those of monopoly for herself. Suggestions of this sort tempt all the world to compare practice with precept; they combine huckstering details with empty abstractions; and excite the derision which attends on manifest insincerity united with palpable inconsistency.

In October, 1843, you declared the improvement of trade to be "a permanent re-establishment of our commerce, and a fresh era of prosperity to the empire." Your party received the declaration with cheers, and yet now you have no such faith in that permanence as to dispense with even that portion of the Income Tax which bears most heavily upon trade and industry. An abstract prosperity satisfies you, but not an abstract tax. In that same month you also told the citizens of London that Sir Robert Peel had restored confidence throughout the agricultural districts. Let the language continually held by the Protection Societies answer that assertion. The reply is sufficiently confirmed by your own "expressive silence."

The voice of experience speaks most distinctly. Even during the eighteen months that you have been before the public as candidate and legislator, the effect of continued cheapness in manufacturing prosperity, the need of a larger measure of that prosperity, the artificial antagonism in which agriculture is placed towards other interests by the restrictive system, and the peril overhanging every present mitigation of a distress absolutely unendurable, have been proclaimed by events and observation so as to force them upon every reflective mind. What the cause may be of your eyes being closed against the perception of these truths, I cannot say; the consequence certainly is, that you have acquired no additional claim on the confidence of those who think that the permanent prosperity, not merely of the revenue, but of the entire community, is best guaranteed by that just, wise, and consistent policy of Free Trade, on which you bestow a hollow assent and a practical hostility.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

NOTES OF A TRAVELLER.—No. XVII.

BERLIN EXPOSITION OF MANUFACTURES.

On the last day of the exhibition the King paid one of his many visits to the rooms. He came in a military undress uniform, attended by a single aid-de-camp; and as nearly every stall bore evidence to its having been subjected to royal inspection by tickets marked "purchased for his Majesty," he rather hurried through the crowded spaces, and seemed to select particular objects about which he desired to obtain information. In other respects his Majesty's appearance had much the effect that unceremonious visits of royalty have elsewhere. There was a good deal of running and crowding, and in the narrow passages it was with some difficulty that openings could be effected with all the efforts of the gentlemen who had the charge of keeping order. In about an hour the King retired, and each resumed his observations as well as the crowd, which on this day was particularly great, would allow him.

The woollen manufactures were even more fully represented than the linen wares, and as one of the most natural objects of domestic industry. Of the wool manufacture in Germany it may generally be remarked, that the technical difficulties are not overcome in a measure proportioned to the ease with which the raw material is procured. Saxony, which is the seat of the finest wool production, is fully rivalled by districts that depend for their main supply upon imported wool, and must draw the superfine qualities from Saxony itself. This is notoriously the case both with French and English wool factories; and yet the Germans look up to these still as models, and acknowledge their inferiority to both, by the heavy protecting duties which they impose on the wares of both these rival nations. Berlin is famous for its dyes, the fame of which has spread far and wide with the worsted which ladies use in embroidery. Fancy articles, especially in combed wool, are frequently dyed at Berlin. One house (H. Kaufmann) exhibited plush made of fine goats' hair. Beside numerous specimens of tapestry and hand embroidery, which, like all other artistic productions, is sold at a lower price in Germany than could be afforded elsewhere, but which does not properly form a branch of manufacture, attention was chiefly attracted to a new ware of great beauty, which promises to prove a valuable addition to the ornamental carpet manufacture. The inventor calls it wool mosaic, and describes the texture as resembling woollen velvet, which is woven on a peculiar machine, and which is distinguished by remarkable closeness and thickness. This velvet texture is united by means of caoutchouc with a camelot ground, which is consequently waterproof. The right side of the wool mosaic resembles a printed velveteen, and the patterns are of such delicacy, both as to contour and shading, that it is difficult to conceive they can be produced otherwise than by an improved process of printing. This, on the other hand, is rendered improbable by the number of dyes. I was shown one pattern at the factory which I visited that contained one hundred tints. The manufacturer, moreover, recommends his wares under the guarantee that they can be cleared by shearing when the surface is soiled. The beauty of this product bids fair to drive the needle out of the embroiderer's hands, and even to draw off admirers from the far-famed Gobelins work; for effects of colour and accuracy of outline are evidently achieved in this ware that cannot be produced in the Gobelins looms. It would be unjust to deny this woollen ware its claim to be considered the most beautiful textile fabric that we possess for household use. It is sold for carpets, table covers, chair and sofa covers, and the price considering the beauty and novelty (the first was produced in 1839), is moderate. At the factory they told me they had considerable orders for England. The price of flower pieces for chair-seats, 18½ inches by 19, is but 9s. A very handsome flower piece for a rug, 5 feet 4 inches by 6 feet 2 inches, cost £7.

Amongst the numerous specimens of cloth exhibited, those from the neighbourhood of Aix-la-Chapelle were the finest, taken generally, although cloths of the best quality were sent from the other manufacturing districts, Silesia, Prussian Saxony, and the neighbourhood of Berlin. The German cloths of the middling fine qualities are less closely shorn than English cloths of the same weight, the yarn being less even of texture, and the web not being completed with the same precision and technical skill that prevails in England. This is a result of the less perfect drill which the manufacturer, who here is little more than a dealer, can enforce amongst his weavers. It is also a result of that negligence which nothing but competition will get rid of. The demand for this description of cloth is so considerable, and the dyeing is so perfect, that English cloths cannot compete with it under the protecting duty. The finest cloths resemble more the French cloths in their glossy finish, as in the tints of blue and blue black. The prices of all kinds are naturally higher than English prices, especially where the difference of quality under the same name is considered.

The display of fancy wares, merinos, thibets, mousseline de laines, &c., was not great, but showed that this description of manufacture has arrived at considerable perfection. The merinos and thibets of Saxony are known as being of superior quality. Only one lot of mousselines, thibets, and Orleans was marked as being machine-woven. The taste displayed in the patterns was mostly French; nothing original or novel was observable in these wares.

Carpets were exhibited in no great variety. Those worked in the Brussels and Kidderminster fashions were good in designs and colours, but something dearer than English wares. An attempted imitation of the Tournay and Axminster carpets, by a house recently established at Hanau, in the electorate of Hesse, is both of inferior quality and too dear to find a sale in Germany. There can be no doubt but that there would be a large consumption of Scotch and other low-priced carpets, if the heavy duty of £80 per ton were reduced.

From these circumstances, and what I have stated in my former letters, it will not appear surprising that, while the home market extends for the woollen manufacture of Prussia and Saxony, the foreign demand for these wares diminishes.

The inducement to the proprietors of large estates in Germany to keep large flocks of sheep is very great. Many such estates in Pomerania, Silesia, and the grand duchy of Posen would yield no revenue without this branch of farming. The saving in labour which they admit of on the one hand, and the manure yielded by sheep on the other, make them valuable additions to the farmers' stock. Accordingly, the largest stocks and the most improved breeds are found in the provinces where estates are largest. The district of Stralsund, in Pomerania, averages 5660 sheep on the German square mile; Breglau counts 5608; Merseburg, in Prussian Saxony, 5145; Posen, 4752. The smallest number of sheep is found in the Rhenish districts: Cologne has 991; Düsseldorf, 850; Coblenz, 1897 sheep, on the German square mile, which is equal to twenty-one English square miles. Of 16,344,018 sheep in Prussia, 4,119,950 are of fine Merino breed, upwards of one-half are half bred, and one-fourth are common country breeds. For the whole Zollverein the number of sheep is calculated to be 21,981,554, and the yield of wool to be 32 lbs. per 10 sheep. This gives a total of 48,315,419 lbs., to which, in order to estimate the whole consumption, the excess of imports over the exports of wool, 2,116,000 lbs., must be added. The sum total, 50,431,419 lbs., is about equal to the average quantity of foreign wool imported into England. The whole of this quantity is consumed within the country, at least in the year 1842 the imported foreign yarn nearly balanced the stuffs exported: the former having amounted to 22,235 cwt., the latter to 26,020 cwt. Upon this official showing, therefore, the whole foreign trade of the Zollverein is dependent upon its foreign supply of yarn; and that this is the shape in which the supply is most advantageously drawn from abroad, may be presumed. These facts must at the next congress prove a satisfactory answer to the spinners, who cry out for an augmentation of the duty of 8 dollars per cwt., about 10 per cent. Wool-spinning by hand is almost exploded in Germany; but a great many spinning-machines are worked by hand, as appears from the small number of spindles to a machine noted in the official report, which I am induced to subjoin, as it gives at one view the best insight into the state of the woollen trade in Prussia. The number of spinning-machines for wool in the different provinces was, in 1842:—

Provinces.	Carded. Machines.	Spindles.	Combed. Machines.	Spindles.
Prussia .. ..	82	2,734	111	3,452
Posen .. ..	534	23,508	287	9,622
Brandenburg ..	1,138	134,847	79	4,818
Pomerania .. ..	362	13,991	64	2,100
Silesia .. ..	464	54,128	158	9,520
Saxony .. ..	755	46,675	9	9,738
Westphalia .. ..	56	8,638	27	1,125
Rhine .. ..	170	96,408	24	15,833
	3,561	380,839	759	56,258

In the greater number of provinces the average number of spindles to a machine is below 100. The number is only considerable in the Rhenish province, in which the districts of Aix-la-Chapelle and Elberfeld are situated. The total number of looms employed in 1842 was 17,846, which shows an increase of 909 since 1837.

The proportions in the kingdom of Saxony are nearer to those of manufactures on a large scale. There are 229 machines with 448,819 spindles, which give employment to 6000 looms. A loom in Saxony, therefore, gives employment to 75 spindles, and in Prussia but to 25.

Some of the prettiest fancy articles were from the south of Germany. From the kingdom of Wirtemberg, besides cloths and flannels, satin de laine and shawl stuffs, for dresses of wool, silk, and cotton, were exhibited. The only manufactory of shawls in the Zollverein is at Elberfeld, and is recently established. Some of its products were exhibited, but offered nothing remarkable. The best shawls were sent from Vienna, where the manufacture is of old date. They are mostly worked in the French style, but are seldom so soft to the feel or so brilliant and tasteful in their colours as the products of the French looms. One handsome shawl, of fine texture, was marked as purchased by the Queen. The high duty levied on this article in the Zollverein probably prevented the sale of all that were exhibited, for the prices were moderate in comparison with the French prices.

The dependence of the agriculturist upon improvements in manufactures is well illustrated by the rise in price of low-quality wools since the combed wool stuffs have been brought into demand. The reports of the fair of Breslau in the years 1841, 1842, and 1843, show the increased demand for long wool, notwithstanding the growing supply and the importation from England:—

Year.	Fairs.	Quantity for sale.	Price. Fine.	Middling.	Ordinary.
1840	Spring ..	25,915	80-140	50-70	45-49 dol. p.cwt.
	Autumn ..	27,087	60-90	58-70	43-45 "
1841	Spring ..	51,147	80-140	50-75	45-55 "
	Autumn ..	29,391	70-120	62-70	50-58 "
1842	Spring ..	60,000	78-125	50-70	40-50 "
	Autumn ..	82,000	78-100	60-72	62-58 "

The silk manufacture is making considerable progress in the Zollverein, and the specimens exhibited were very creditable to the factories. The two principal houses in Elberfeld and Crefeld had a large assortment of articles from satins and gros de Naples to the lightest scarfs. The velvets from Crefeld were a choice selection in point of finish and colour, but dearer than the English manufacture of the same quality. The new fashionable stuff for dresses, a broad white stripe, alternating with a flowered stripe, is a very delicate production, and testifies to considerable skill in the assorting of colours on the part of the designers. Nearly all the pieces exhibited of this kind were purchased by the King, who seems bent on gladdening the hearts of some of his fair relatives.

Silk-weaving is scattered over various parts of Germany. Next to Elberfeld, Berlin and Potsdam are the most considerable stations of the trade. The distribution of the looms working in Prussia in 1840 was as follows:—

Berlin .. ..	2,306
Potsdam .. ..	606
Frankfort-on-Oder ..	100
Silesia .. ..	112
Saxony .. ..	94
Westphalia .. ..	130
Cologne .. ..	451
Düsseldorf .. ..	11,812
Troves and Aix .. ..	24
	15,713

From this list it appears that the manufacture is only important in Berlin and in the neighbourhood of Düsseldorf, where there has doubtless been a great increase in the number of looms worked within the last four years. Saxony follows Prussia in the number of silk-loom employed, which, however, do not exceed 250. For the whole Zollverein not more than 16,785 looms are returned. The quantity of silk imported into the Zollverein increases annually. In 1842 the imports exceeded the exports by 12,595 cwt. The greater part of this is Italian silk, which comes in through Bavaria, Wirtemberg, and Baden. The exports of silk wares have decreased. In 1842 they exceeded but by 1075 cwt. the quantity imported. In 1841 the excess was 1673 cwt. The foreign markets for sale are chiefly towards the east of Europe, where buyers come to the Leipzig and Frankfort fairs.

One of the most interesting objects in the exhibition was the native silk, of which specimens were sent from nearly every part of Germany. Such experiments are usually the fruit of the leisure and curiosity of amateurs; but they are hints, at the same time, to the industrial community of what lies within their reach. The experiments that have for some years been carried on in the north of France have proved that silkworms can be reared with artificial heat even more productively than in the southern latitudes, where ventilation is more difficult. The great mortality in Italy and in the south of France occurs amongst the worms during the prevalence of a sirocco wind, from which more temperate climates are exempt. In every part of Germany the mulberry-tree flourishes, as it is notorious that the frost does not destroy it in England. No natural obstacle, therefore, impedes the introduction of the silkworm generally into Prussia, as well as into England. Perhaps in Ireland, where there is such abundance of turf fuel, the greatest success would be experienced. The experiments made upon a large scale have hitherto not been successful in Germany, from a cause to which in these letters I have often referred; but which is as constantly overlooked in the practice as in the theory of political economy. Until cottons, linens, and woollens grow cheap, there can be no demand for silks. It happens, however, that Dr. List preaches, and the statesmen of his school practice, the doctrine that dear cottons, linens, and woollens are an advantage to a country; and while they do so, the German ladies must be content to practise the abstinence which the manufacturers of common stuffs recommend. The increase that I have noted as having taken place in the consumption of silks within some years, stands in the closest relation with the decline in price of cotton and woollen wares, in consequence of the growing domestic competition. If the Germans relaxed the fetters of trade (the English likewise), they might hedge in their fields of flax and hemp with mulberry plants, which then, perhaps, would yield the most valuable crop on the ground.

In strolling through the rooms, after examining the leading articles of manufacture, I was very desirous to obtain some information respecting specimens of pipes for water and gas which were exhibited of various materials. There were different kinds of clay pipes, respecting which I could only learn that the first experiments made with them as substitutes for wooden pipes failed from want of sufficient attention to the fitting of the joints. The cement used to remedy this defect did not hold the water; and the result was that the clay pipes were taken up, and the wooden ones relaid. The pipes in the exhibition appeared to be more carefully formed, so as to remedy this defect. Other pipes of glass had brass and iron fittings, but (notwithstanding the absence of excise duties) they were too expensive to be adopted on a large scale. In a conversation which I had with some gentlemen who had turned their attention to the state of the streets of Berlin, and were fully impressed with the necessity of adopting some means of cleansing them, I learnt that they had no apprehension of an interruption of a constant flow of water if the pipes were laid two and a half feet deep.

They say that in the severest winter the frost does not penetrate deeper. I found that they were quite unacquainted with the proceedings of the Health of Towns Commission, although the writings of some of them were known at Gwydyr-house; but they expressed the greatest anxiety to see the evidence on its appearance. I was not able to tell them whether the report had appeared or not, but it certainly will attract great attention on the Continent. In Germany especially, where the uncongenial climate, by restricting the productiveness of the soil, keeps the people in comparative poverty, and is unfortunately seconded by the political institutions and position of the German states, everybody is on the watch for novelties that have the practical worth of cheapness. A more general co-operation amongst all classes may also be expected there from the feeling of the power that association confers on those who command small means. The most striking proof of this is in the rapidity with which railroads have spread in all directions, and this rapidity would have been greater if the Governments had earlier become converts to the notion of their utility. In Prussia alone there are now thirteen railroads, in length 617 English miles, in active use. Permission has been granted for the construction of twelve other lines, 873 miles in length, and twenty-two lines are projected, extending in length 1340 miles. The cost of the lines opened is under £2500 per English mile. On the appearance of the report of the Health of Towns Commission there is little doubt but that it will speedily be acted upon in the continental towns, especially as the sanitary police already exists upon an excellent footing throughout Germany.

The characteristic feature of this whole exhibition was to show the earnestness and skill with which an industrious nation is struggling with difficulties, in great part of its own creation. With all the power to fill the dignified position of the centre of European intelligence, and the nurse of the kindly and graceful feelings which in the conflict of petty interests are too often sacrificed, the Germans allow themselves to be seduced from this path by the brawling of writers who have no claims on their confidence to seek a position of hostility against their neighbours; and for what? To have the pleasure of torturing their labouring classes with factories that have no solid foundation, but which threaten, in the measures necessary to ensure them a temporary existence, to lay a mine that, sooner or later, must explode to the general ruin. I had almost forgotten to mention an object that must have attracted the attention of all visitors to the exhibition—the beautiful coloured, lithographed printing which was displayed in various forms. A model in an old form, with coloured initials and illuminated headings, and a landscape, the finish of which would have deceived any connoisseur, and have made him believe that it was retouched with the brush, were exhibited by the firm Reinmann and Co. The price at which this mode of multiplying coloured prints can be afforded is still too high to allow of its introduction into the lower branches of the trade. But the beautiful figures exhibited by Professor Zahn in facsimiles of those discovered painted in fresco on the walls of the houses in Pompeii offer a field that is capable of great extension. The substitution of anything approaching to a work of art for the unmeaning productions called paperhanging must be hailed as a step forward in the improvement of those domestic arrangements from which poverty and confined views have so long banished anything like elevated views. The first design by any eminent painter can by the aid of the printed colours be multiplied in facsimile so as to give the benefit of the designer's talent to a large circle of consumers. The beginning has been made in the textile department, to which the printers must join their aid; and thus our furniture may be expected to reflect in some measure the civilization of our times, as that of the ancients reflected theirs. Amongst the objects in silver that laid any claim to be considered works of art was a vase with figures in relief copied from one in the collection which the King purchased of Professor Zahn for the Museum and the Mechanical Institute at Berlin. The two collections contain casts of the choicest objects of domestic table furniture that were found at Pompeii and Herculaneum.

In the exhibition of the fine arts I saw a beautiful composition by a young artist of Munich, M. Widmann. It is the shield of Hercules from "Hesiod," and a worthy rival of the celebrated shield of Achilles by Flaxman. It would be a valuable acquisition for a goldsmith.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the League.

Sir,—You profess to be a friend to the poor, to be the advocate of humanity; but I fear there is not much sentiment about you Leaguers—not much refined sensibility. You talk much of "justice," and but little of "charity." Now, "justice" is very well, very proper in its way, but it has something coarse and vulgar about it: it don't tell like sentiment, and sensibility, and "charity." If a man pays his debts, he fulfils justice; but it's thought nothing of, it's only his duty, a man gets no praise or credit for it; but if you subscribe to a "charity" (and there's no harm in its being known), why, then, your name's up at once for a kind and benevolent person. You Leaguers tell us you want to repeal an unjust law for the benefit of all classes, to make work plentiful and food cheap. This is all very well; but to repeal a law, to make plenty of work and cause food to be cheap, in all this there may be justice, but there's no charity—no sentiment, there's something too coarse, vulgar, political, and utilitarian about it.

How much better a "charitable object" sounds than a utilitarian object; why, the last phrase has positively a horrid sound! Then, again, to repeal an unjust law may involve an injury to some private interest—some dear monopoly—and thus lessen our gains, our income; may oblige us to make sacrifices, to draw in a bit in external, in "respectability," but to promote a "charitable object" requires only the surrender of a pound or two, and it may be the expense of some time and speech-making, amply repaid by plenty of praise and popularity from those from whom they are most worth having—the wealthy and influential. Whereas by advocating "justice" one gets popularity only from the poor—from the "lower classes"—whose praise don't tell for much.

Then, again, one's pride is so nicely flattered in promoting "charity"—one is conferring a favour, and putting persons under obligations to us, and exciting them to be cringing and servile, which is all very gratifying to some minds; but when you have done "justice" to a man he thinks you have only done your duty, and he does not feel much beholden to you, at least he has no temptation to "bend low" and use "a bondsman's key" towards a patron on whose gracious favour he is dependent. Believe me, Mr. Editor, "charity" is a much finer thing than "justice." I do verily believe that the "League Fund" would be far more amply and quickly supplied if its object was to obtain money to lay out in buying bread to give away to the poor, instead of enabling the poor to get work, and buy their own bread by honest industry. But to buy bibles for the poor would tell better than to buy bread for them. There's more sentiment about it. After all, the stomach is a low, vulgar thing, and so, of course, is everything relating to it. What can be more low and vulgar than talking about "bread"—such a common thing? and then "cheap bread," too, it's worse still. Who has anything to do with cheap things but low, vulgar people? Oh, let's have agitation for anything rather than for food—for bread—cheap bread, something more sentimental; let's not say a word about "justice," let's speak only of "charity," there's some sentiment in that.

Why, the move for "bathing and washing" for the poor is better than the "cheap-bread" agitation. It's a far genteeler thing to have a clean face and a clean shirt than to have a full stomach—(what a horrid sound a "full stomach" has!)—and there's some sentiment about it. They say "cleanness is next to godliness." When a person is neat and clean, he is "respectable," and not only that, but he feels respectable; and he is, therefore, likely to be quiet, orderly, and well-behaved to his "betters"—especially as there's "charity" in the matter,—as he owns his cleanliness and respectability to the "subscriptions" of the rich. But a dirty, hungry fellow (a dirty man is always a "fellow") is apt to be rough and boisterous; there's no knowing what mischief he may do. The Examiner is right! It may not matter which you advocate most, or get first—cheap bread or a clean skin; but a clean skin is evidently that which ought to be looked to first—it's a far genteeler thing and more likely to be obtained than "cheap bread." In the former is an outside thing, the latter internal; the one connected with charity and patronage, the latter is only a matter of right and justice. A clean skin, I've said, is an outside affair, and who doesn't know that the world thinks more of the outside than the inside—more of external respectability than internal worth or happiness? A clean skin before cheap bread any day. Then there's the move for "public walks," "cricket matches," "maypoles," &c., for the poor—all better than the "cheap-bread" agitation, more genteel, more sentimental, more connected with charity, gratitude, and subservience. And these things are more easy to get than cheap bread, because there's no sacrifice required, and because they're not so necessary—ornament before utility—outside before inside, that's the world's motto. Depend upon it you're wrong, you Leaguers. Cheap bread is very well in its way, but cheap bibles, cheap amusements, cheap washing, are far better, more important, more genteel, more sentimental.

Yours,
SIMON SIMPLE.

PUNCH'S VERSION OF THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Grand Recitative and Scene. THE QUEEN.

My lords and gentlemen, again I meet ye,
With cordiality once more I greet ye;
Though I'd not have you work your brains to dizziness,
Pray give your heads to the despatch of business.

Cantabile molto affettuoso.

My dear allies, my foreign allies,
Are acting with policy pleasant and wise;
For some of them come
To see me at home;
But this observation expressly applies To LOUIS PHILIPPE,
Who to Windsor's keep Came over, despite Anti-Anglican cries.

Adagio.

Ah! the appearance of our country's coffers,
Oh! A rich theme for gratulation offers;
Our public purse we've found the way to stock it,—
We've got at last a surplus in our pocket;
Oh, may it never cause so much dissension
As—oh! another surplus I could mention.

Allegro.

All things wear a smile;
Commerce has been mending;
In our little Isle
All to good seems tending.
Wages on the rise;
Lots of milk and honey;
You'll not grudge supplies,—
There's a glut of money.

Chorus of MEMBERS.

Tooral looral, loo, &c. &c.

THE QUEEN (deuxième couplet.)

Poor there are, they say,
Who endure hard rubbing;
But they've found a way
To heal it by a scrubbing.
Baths they mean to build
Soon in every quarter;
Mouths will then be filled,
If not with bread—with water.

Chorus.

Tooral looral, loo, &c. &c.

[At the end of the Chorus there is a grand display of red fire, which makes everything look as if it were couleur de rose, and
THE CURTAIN FALLS.]

"THE FARMERS' FRIEND."—This is the proud title—a much prouder one than that of his nobility—of the Duke of Buckingham. He is at all times the farmers' friend. Indeed, in Buckinghamshire, he is looked upon as only second to the blessed sun itself, in his benign influence on the farmer. In the smiles of the Duke, crops ripen; and his agricultural counsel is far more fertilizing than guano. Yes, the Duke of Buckingham is the farmers' friend. But how, when the farmer dies and leaves a widow? Does the friendship extend to the survivor? Let us see. A Mr. Read, occupant of a farm at Winchendon Marsh, recently died. The farm had been in his family nearly a century. Previous to his death, Mr. Read had laid out nearly £400 in under-draining. He left a widow with a large and young family. The executors (practical farmers) offered to see that the farm was properly managed. The widow begged to be allowed to remain one more year to reduce her stock. No—no—no! "The farm," says the Aylesbury News, "was actually let over the poor woman's head at an advanced rent of £100 per annum." Nor is this, it appears, a single instance of the kind. However, these things do not invalidate the Duke's claim to the title of "farmers' friend." Only let the farmers of Buckinghamshire make this memorandum—the Duke's friendship does not extend to farmers' widows and children.—Punch.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—Last week Dr. John Ryan, the professor of chemistry, delivered a lecture on Fire, for the purpose of exhibiting an apparatus recently invented by Mr. Phillips, of Bloomsbury-square, called the Fire-annihilator. Dr. Ryan commenced his lecture by stating he should endeavour to explain the nature and combustion of fire. After explaining the theories of the earlier chemists, and those of more modern times, the doctor proceeded to make a number of experiments, to prove that combustion under all circumstances, is the result and compound of chemical action. He more especially pointed out the effects of volumes of free nitrogen, or free carbonic acid, upon the flame of coal-gas in an atmosphere containing only a small per centage of these gases; he proceeded to explain that Mr. Phillips used a mixture of coke, nitre, and sulphate of lime, with a little water. To illustrate the effects of the apparatus, Dr. Ryan kindled a fire in a small iron house; when the flame was at its height he introduced a small apparatus not holding more than two ounces of the material, and in half a minute the fire was completely extinguished. We understand that Dr. Ryan intends to make this the subject of a daily lecture for some time, in order to afford the public an opportunity of witnessing the invention.

REVIEW.

Factory Legislation.—Report of the Central Committee of the Association of Manufacturers engaged in the Cotton Trade, for the year 1844. Manchester, A. Burgess.

British Quarterly Review, No. 1. Article 4: The Factory System. London, Jackson and Walford.

It was said of old that "Truth is mighty, and must prevail;" but during the period of the struggle between truth and falsehood it is possible that an immense amount of social wrong may be perpetrated, which the ultimate triumph of truth can neither compensate nor cure. Falsehood is most ingenious in devising "a cry;" for the Shibboleth once adopted passes from mouth to mouth as a demonstrated aphorism which precludes the necessity of further inquiry, and to doubt of which is deemed conclusive proof of obliquity of intellect or hardness of heart. Investigation and examination are shouted down by vociferous clamour; and public men, whose ears only catch the loudest voices, are very apt to mistake shouts for testimony. Even the best of English patriots, the Russells and the Sydneys, were found to endorse the monstrous falsehood of "The Plot" devised by the first Lord Ashley, and to stigmatize as "stiflers of the plot" all who ventured to hint their suspicions of the consistency of the evidence of Oates and Bedloe. In the last session of Parliament we had the pain of witnessing many for whom we entertained sincere respect yielding to the delusion of "a cry," and giving the authority of their names to gross mis-statements, the refutation of which was within the reach of any one willing to take the trouble of impartial inquiry. It would not be easy to find more misrepresentation aggregated in a single sentence than Mr. Charles Buller contrived to cram into the following description of the factory operatives:—

"Large masses of unskilled, needy, impoverished labourers were collected together, subjected to terrible privations and discomforts from their very agglomeration; from the very same cause almost at the mercy of their employers; and from the same cause ready and apt to combine for mischief."

It is instructive to compare these several allegations with facts. The first assertion is that the operatives are unskilled. Now, every one acquainted with the delicate mechanism—the spindles, shafts, wheels, and rollers—employed in the processes of cotton-spinning, must know that the management and direction of these tools and machines must require considerable skill and careful training. The steam-engine sets them in motion, but it cannot direct and apply their motions, because no conceivable combination of steam with iron can think. The more perfect the machinery is, the more nice and delicate must be the management by which it is applied to the processes of manufacture. There is, consequently, a large demand for skill in the manufacturing districts; and that the demand has called forth the supply is proved by the machinery having attained a perfection which nothing but skill of a very high order could govern and direct.

The second allegation is that the factory operatives are needy. Now, how stand the facts?

"The returns obtained by the Factory Commissioners in 1833 showed that 212,800 operatives in the cotton mills of Lancashire and Cheshire (including 120,167 above sixteen years of age, 81,912 under sixteen, and 4721 whose wages were not ascertained,) were receiving on the average, within a fraction, 10s. 6d. per week. And the returns obtained by a committee of master manufacturers, including the most eminent in the cotton trade, from mills employing 112,596 operatives (including women and children) in the month of April, 1844, showed that they were then receiving, on the average, 10s. 3d. per week. There is no extensive class of labourers in this country, including women and children, where the average earnings are nearly so high. Those of handloom-weavers and stocking-weavers are not half as much, for longer hours; and those of agricultural labourers are not half as much, for harder labour."—British Quarterly.

The third allegation is that the operatives are impoverished. If this epithet be a mere oratorical expletive superadded to needy, its correctness has been already tested. If it means that those who have come to the factories from other occupations have thereby deteriorated their condition, it is refuted by the fact that when Stockport was reduced to the most intense distress during the late commercial crisis, the operatives braved the direct extremes of famine rather than apply for parochial relief, which might have caused them to be sent back to the agricultural parishes from which they had migrated. If it means that the social position of the operative is inferior to what it was in the past generation, the fact is shown to be the very reverse by every statistical document published on the subject. Restrictions on the exchange of the produce of labour for the necessary sustenance which labour was obtained by the great Creator to afford must, of course, tend to impoverish those who live by labour, whether those restrictions assume the form of variable oppression in a sliding scale, or fixed injustice in a fixed duty.

The fourth allegation is that "the operatives are subjected to terrible privations and discomforts from their very agglomeration." The orator has here found it convenient to confound the crowding together of inhabitants in towns, properly called "the great town nuisance," with the factory system. It is undoubtedly true that the working classes of every kind in all our cities do suffer great privations and discomforts from being crowded together in narrow lanes, small tenements, and bad lodgings; but it is decidedly untrue that the factory hands are, in this respect, worse off than any other operatives. Indeed, if there be any difference, it is in favour of the factory operatives; and in proof of this we quote Mr. Horner's description of the factory operatives in Stockport:—

"No collection of the working classes in other occupations in this country can possibly exhibit a larger proportion of well-fed, well-clothed, healthy, and cheerful-looking people."

We shall next quote the account of the operatives in the rural factories, given by Nassau William Senior, Master in Chancery, and formerly Professor of Political Economy in the University of Oxford:—

"The factory people in the country districts are the plumpest, best-clothed, and healthiest-looking of the labouring classes that I have ever seen. The girls, especially, are far more good-looking (and good looks are fair evidence of health and spirits) than the daughters of agricultural labourers. The wages earned per family are double those of the south."

The fifth allegation is that the operatives are almost at the mercy of their masters; but the fact happens to be that the operation of the factory system is the very reverse, and places the masters more at the mercy of the men than any other form of industry in the country. The amount of invested capital, which not only makes no return when unworked, but becomes greatly deteriorated by any cessation, compels the master manufacturers frequently to run their mills at an absolute loss; they are forced to do so when the amount of loss on working does not exceed the interest of the invested capital. The men know this fact, and hence it is notorious to all who have taken the trouble of making the slightest inquiry, that no class of the employed bear themselves so independently towards their employers as the factory operatives.

The last allegation is that the operatives are ready and apt to combine for mischief. This is the direct reverse of the truth. We are well aware of the evils of strikes; but where such combinations are confined to the single object of procuring by cessation from labour—without having recourse to acts of violence—an advance of wages, we deny that they should be called combinations for "mischief." In the last great strike in the cotton districts, though thousands were out of employment, with millions of property at their mercy, no mill was burned, no machinery damaged, and no species of property wantonly injured or destroyed. Mr. Buller should have paused before pronouncing such a wanton and groundless libel on the character of the operatives; he should have paid a little more attention to the geography of mischief: he would then have found that the home of Rock and Swing is not in South Lancashire or the West Riding of Yorkshire. In the course of the speech from which we quote, Mr. Buller declared that he had adopted a new and bold principle of legislation. Unfortunately there is no novelty in legislating in utter ignorance of the subject-matter, though there was considerable boldness in making statements so wholly at variance with facts.

We have dealt at some length on the vague generalities of Mr. Charles Buller, because such indefinite charges have been too long allowed to pass without exposure. It must not be supposed that we accuse the gentleman of wilful misrepresentation: we believe that he never took the trouble of making any inquiry into the facts, but took up the version of them best suited to his purpose, believing that any inaccuracy would pass as a mere rhetorical flourish. Let us now turn to the more specific charges adduced against the factory system by Lord Ashley.

Lord Ashley, on the authority of some "experienced" but unnamed "mathematician," declared that "piecers and spinners had to travel from 15 to 37 miles per day." It was proved by the Committee of Manufacturers that the distances traversed were not more than eight miles per day.

Lord Ashley quoted Dr. Villermé to prove the tendency of the cotton manufacture "to produce coughs, pulmonary consumptions, and early deaths." Mr. H. Ashworth showed that Dr. Villermé spoke thus in reference to the process of "batting," long disused in this country, but that, in reference to all other processes, he had declared the condition of operatives working in a factory to be superior to that of operatives engaged in their own homes.

Lord Ashley stated that continued "improvements in machinery had led to the substitution of infant for adult labour, and to the increase of female as compared with male employment." The committee showed that the proportion of infant and female labour to adult and male labour was as follows:—

	In 1835.	In 1844.
Children under 13 ..	13 per cent.	3½ per cent.
Females ..	54 "	52 "
Adult males ..	26½ "	32 "

That is, the facts of the case were the very reverse of his lordship's statements. We must refer to the Report of the Manufacturers' Committee for equally decisive refutations of the other calumnies against the factory system; but it is only fair to give some explanation of the circumstances by which Lord Ashley was deluded into making such gross misrepresentations. He was misled by his witnesses. The report states—

"During the debates on the Factory Bill the attention of Parliament was drawn to the class of persons who usually furnish to members of Parliament information respecting factories, who frequent the lobbies of the House, and who appear in London under the title of 'Deputies from the Operatives.'"

"It was openly stated in the House of Commons of one of these deputies—who had published two books dedicated to Lord Ashley, exposing what he called the factory system, and who had been paraded before visitors in Lord Ashley's house as a 'Factory Cripple'—that whilst collecting the materials of one of these books he had been furnished with money by Lord Ashley; that he had received written instructions from an individual, who it was admitted acted as Lord Ashley's agent, to 'blacken the characters' of certain millowners who took a prominent part in opposing the Ten Hours' Bill—and that he had lately been discarded by Lord Ashley, who stated in the House of Commons that he had discovered him to be a man unworthy of credit."

"It was also stated of another of these 'operatives' and delegates, that he had first obtained employment in a mill in Manchester by means of a forged certificate of character, dated Belfast, and that he had since been twice in prison. And of another 'operative' and frequenter of the lobby of the House of Commons, a newspaper report was read, showing that he had recently been arrested, and had taken his trial upon a charge of stealing silver plate from a tavern."

Unfortunately these men do not stand alone in the endeavour to make the advocacy of a damaged cause serve as a salve for a damaged reputation.

The question of a Ten Hours' Bill may be decided, either by considerations of humanity or prudence; on both grounds we are prepared to show, in a very few words, that such an interference with industry as has been proposed by Lord Ashley would be equally prejudicial to the operatives and their employers. Let us first take the ground of humanity: and in the first place it must strike every thinking man as strange that those persons who tax the bread of the operatives and stint their food should stand forward to proffer them protection. Such a proceeding realizes the picture of the Spanish monk, giving a penitent his blessing while he picked his pocket. Secondly, we are bound to see how these professing philanthropists treat their own dependents before we sanction their interference with the dependents of others. Before the landlords are allowed to regulate the condition of the manufacturing operatives, we have a right, nay, more, it is our duty, to inquire into the condition of their own agricultural labourers. And here we must remark that manufacturers are eager to have the condition of their operatives examined, while on Lord Ashley's paternal estate the unfortunate labourers are menaced with expulsion from their hovels if they venture to disclose the secrets of their prison-house. We have shown that the sanitary and educational condition of the persons engaged in the cotton manufacture is superior to that of the operatives in most other branches of industry; we do not deny that it is desirable to have them as well as all other persons more healthy and better instructed, but we do deny that it is desirable to reduce their present amount of wages. There is abundant evidence that the operatives do not desire it, for they notoriously quit mills which work short time to engage in those establishments where the longest hours are worked:—

"Mr. Kenworthy, of Blackburn, the author of 'Inventions and Hours of Labour,' attempted to make an approach towards carrying out the views he had advocated, and for this purpose ran his mill eleven hours and a half a day, instead of twelve; but ere the week was over, his men intimated, that unless he at least paid them for twelve hours they would leave work; and he found himself compelled to return to the former length of day. There are employers who have for a time been compelled to run short hours from want of water; and although the short hours were only for a season, with a prospect of making up for lost time afterwards, some of the best workmen were so much dissatisfied as to leave their situations, though those situations were of a most eligible kind, and had been held by them and their families for years. So well known is the disposition of the workmen on this point, that no millowner, however strongly disposed to work shorter hours, would venture upon it without the general concurrence of the body,—feeling perfectly certain that, if he did, he would immediately lose all his best hands. A case might be mentioned of a mill in which no young persons under eighteen were employed, and where the mill ran (as it legally might) more than twelve hours a day; and in that case, so far from the workmen deserting the mill, the best workmen from all the surrounding mills flocked to it, to secure the higher wages which longer hours produced. When Mr. Horner, the Inspector, asked the opinions of the workmen at the mill of Messrs. Bright, at Rochdale, the majority declared that they should not wish for shorter hours if they were to be accompanied by reduced wages."—British Quarterly.

The question of humanity may very fairly be left to the men themselves; no doubt they would like to have twelve hours' wages for ten hours' work, and, in good sooth, so should we ourselves, whose work with the head is as laborious as any work with the hand; but they have everywhere shown that they repudiate a reduction in the hours of labour which would be accompanied by a corresponding reduction of the amount of wages.

Now, let us say a few words on the prudential or commercial part of the question.

In the debates on the Factory Bill, Sir Robert Peel stated, on the authority of M. Ducpetiaux, a member of the Belgian Government Commission, that the number of hours which mills run in the principal manufacturing countries was as follows:—

United States ..	78 hours per week.
France ..	72 to 84 "
Prussia ..	72 to 90 "
Switzerland ..	78 to 84 "
Austria ..	72 to 80 "
Saxony ..	72 "
Baden ..	84 "
Bonn ..	94 "
England ..	69 "

The average in foreign states is therefore 16 per cent. above England; and could we keep our present position in foreign markets if subjected to a further disadvantage of 14½ per cent.? As the writer in the "British Quarterly" has ably shown, it is on the productive power of our machinery that the wages of the workman as well as the profits of the capitalist depend:—

"It has been shown that the modern system of manufacturing rests almost wholly on the great mechanical inventions. By machinery the fabric of our manufacturing greatness was reared, and by machinery it must stand. The labour of the workman who attends upon it derives its value from the extraordinary productiveness of the machinery; and that labour, though indispensable, has comparatively a small share in producing the results."

"Whatever diminished the productive power of the machinery, would of necessity raise the price of the goods which it produces, and thereby be a tax on the consumer."

"Whatever diminished the quantity of goods and raised their price, would necessarily reduce the quantity of employment given to all the trades which are dependent upon, or auxiliary to, the machinery."

"Whatever raised the price of English goods would doubly reduce the foreign demand—first, by the ordinary effect of high price upon consumption, and next, by the advantage given to foreign manufacturing competitors."

"Whatever reduced the foreign demand, would reduce both the profits of the capitalist and the wages of the workman."

"This train of consequences would naturally, and we think inevitably, follow the diminished productiveness of machinery. It would injure all classes; and the injury done by the encouragement of foreign competition, though it admits of no previous measurement or estimate, might be of the most serious extent."

This is what the Times justly calls the commercial view of the question; and it is the view in which the matter must be regarded by every one who takes an interest in the commercial prosperity of the country. Diminished production would only raise the price of articles produced when the demand was a constant quantity, and when the producers had an exclusive power of supplying the market. Now, we have no such control over foreign markets as to prevent American and German manufacturers competing with us in the markets of the world. Our manufacturers should sell at reduced profits; but as profits constitute the fund out of which wages are paid, a reduction of profits is obviously equivalent to a reduction of wages. It is not necessary to say another word upon the subject.

GOD'S WORLD—MAN'S WORLD.

God's world is beautiful, when early morn
Lifts the dark curtain night draws o'er the earth,
When every lovely thing looks freshly born,
And brightly smiles, rejoicing in its birth.

God's world is beautiful, when glorious noon,
The manhood of the day, its vigour shows,
When the bright day-king ruleth, and his boon
Of golden blessings on the glad earth throws.

God's world is beautiful, when overhead
Those myriad sparkling watchers of the night
(The canopy of gems which He hath spread)
Give, in our sleeping hours, their gentle light.

God's world is beautiful! but what does man,
Its tenant-lord, his thankfulness to prove?
Does harmony with God's benignant plan
Show his admiring reverence and love?

Man's world is chaos! discontent and gloom,
Wrongs unredressed and rights by power denied,
Justice dethroned, starvation labour's doom,
Genius a victim, crushed by gilded pride!

Man's world is chaos! morning wakens care,
Noon lights a scene of struggling industry,
And, when the stars shine forth, oh! what is there
Save heartless mirth, heartbroken misery?

Man's world is chaos! and will so remain
Till that blessed Trinity, in spirit one (Freedom, and Truth, and Love), shall "move" again,
As once "The Spirit" did when time began.

Oh! for the dawning of that second day,
When Freedom, Tyranny's dark reign shall end,
When Truth, "his own heart's truth," each shall obey,
And Love its softening influence shall lead.

And dawn it will, though long the night may seem
Which darkens o'er the maze of Heaven's plan.
The morning star already glows to beam:
'Twill dawn, for God is good, and—God made man!

AGRICULTURE.

PROTECTIONISTS AT HOME.

When the monopolist landlords come forth to support a law so manifestly unjust and injurious as the Corn Law, upon the plea of assisting the tenant-farmers, it becomes important to inquire into their personal dealings with their own tenants. After reading the speeches at the protection meeting at Freemasons' Tavern, in which the lordly protectionists express so much anxiety for the interests, so much respect for the opinions, and such deep consideration for the difficulties of tenant-farmers, what farmer does not sigh for a holding under such landlords? How loudly they applauded a suggestion to allow per centages to be laid out on improvements rather than in mere money abatements of rent! How fiercely they hurled defiance against their own selected Ministry if they should dare to carry out "any further" the doctrines of common sense, and thereby disturb "protection to agriculture!" How unhesitatingly they asserted the farmer's right to "protection" from the Legislature! Is there any farmer so mistrustful as to suspect that these "noble" defenders omit to afford that protection which is within their own power?

Let us follow a few of these monopolists home, and our agricultural readers will judge for themselves. Amongst the most vehement speakers was the Earl of Malmesbury, who, in responding to the toast of "The landlords," complained of the "calumnies of the League, which had been showered thick and fast upon the landlords. They had been described as extortioners of their tenants, and as grinding even the labourers below them; as persons guilty of every sort of crime which the least Christian man would be ashamed to commit. If such charges were true, they were perfectly unworthy of men of education, such as the landlords; but, before the Almighty God, he protested that such charges were false." What charges, most noble monopolist? It does so happen that, in all this outbreak of injured virtue, this rate protectionist managed—accidentally, of course—to omit the only charge which we have especially made against him. The tale, as we have heard it, runs thus. The Earl of Malmesbury, a great preserver of game, always professed to make allowances to his tenants for damages done to them by his game. Such allowances, however, being fixed by the landlord's agent, were seldom satisfactory; and one tenant, determined to test the actual damage, huddled off a small portion of his wheat-field, so as entirely to exclude the game from that portion. The result of this ocular demonstration of damage was, that his lordship had such an amount of compensation to pay as really to swallow up the rent of the farm; and he paid the damages, but turned out the tenant. We have never heard any contradiction of this incident in the life of a game-preserver attempted. Probably none could be offered. But could his lordship have stated this charge, even amongst the select and selected monopolist tenant-farmers who dined with the Dukes on Monday, without eliciting some symptoms of, to say the least, uneasiness? How heartily the Earl of Essex, who was present but did not speak, must have sympathized with the irritation of his brother game-preserver, our readers, who recollect Mr. Horncastle's letter, will readily comprehend.

Then, to pass over minor monopolists, we find the Duke of Richmond declaring himself "determined, faithful, and eager, without favour, or affection, or reserve for any party,"—his grace forgot his brother at the Treasury; but that's a bygone, and perhaps there is no other Lennox Sir R. Peel can promote,—to maintain the opinions he conscientiously entertained, that if agricultural protection be diminished one iota lower than it has already been reduced to, the tenantry and labourers, and landlords of the country would cease to exist as a class in England." What a denunciation! How fearful a prophecy! If his grace had said that, on a similar contingency, oxygen, hydrogen, and carbonic acid gas would cease to exist in England, it would have rounded his period as well, and been quite as rational. Unless, indeed, the noble President was playing with the protectionists, by asserting that those who do not now exist as "a class" would not then exist as a class. They are now two classes, the industrious agriculturists and the rent-consumers; the working bees and the drones; and such they would be then.

Then the Duke flattered himself he had become obnoxious to the few remarks we have made upon him, "because he is the farmers' friend." This is quite a mistake. We have referred to his support of monopoly as an excellent illustration of the shallow pretences on which these monopolist landowners seek their own ends, and call themselves "farmers' friends." It so happens that we have been enabled to get a glimpse of the Duke at home. Just before the accession of the Duke to his title and his Sussex estates, and whilst the property was at nurse in the hands of trustees for his father (an embarrassed man), a revaluation of the property was made, and it was the common boast of the agent and the trustees to say, "We have doubled the Duke's rental." This was about the year 1817, when prices were nearly at the highest, and we do not hear that any reduction has since been made. In the time of Charles Duke of Richmond—the well-known Reformer—all the Sussex tenantry prospered; most of them secured a competence, and some accumulated considerable wealth. How changed has been the scene since the revaluation! Changes, departures, distresses for rent amongst the tenantry have been matters of not unfrequent occurrence. Men, whose fathers and grandfathers had occupied their farms and prospered under preceding dukes, have had their stock distrained for rent, and sold under the present. One left the country and died in exile; another died whilst the distress was in progress; another, who had occupied 2000 acres, became a farming bailiff; and in various forms ruin fell upon others who, trusting to protection prices, have been unable, when prices fell, to meet their "farmers' friends'" monopoly rents. We shall not follow this topic further at present; but the above is sufficient to show the farmers that "all is not gold which glitters."

We can only now find room for one other monopolist worthy—the Duke of Buckingham. And after reminding the reader that his grace is a strict game-preserver, and a rigid enforcer of the game laws and yearly tenancies, we shall simply give, without note or comment, the following extracts from the Aylesbury News of the 25th of January last:—

"The Duke is considered a pattern landlord by the great bulk of those who compose the agricultural interest; and, while such is the case, we can have no hopes of real or lasting agricultural prosperity. For, what is his grace's real conduct towards the tenantry? Now, we are not going to accuse Buckingham of screwing out the last farthing obtainable from his tenants, though he is as fond of high rents as most landlords; nor do we accuse his grace of any acts of stingy meanness in his dealings with his tenants. The charge we bring against him is that of an overweening ambition, which can only be satisfied by having about him a set of tenants reduced to the lowest state of servitude; to gratify which passion he sacrifices every consideration of agricultural expediency, and every reckoning of a common-sense or commercial character. His grace's main object seems to be, not so much to promote the cause of agriculture, nor to encourage the full development of nature's powers, nor to increase the amount of the harvest yield, nor even to add to the sum total of his rent-roll, though he has no objection to do this occasionally,—his Grace's sole desire seems to be to add to his own personal influence, and to lengthen the list of his slavish dependents and retainers."

Again:—

"While the tenantry are in constant fear lest they should sometimes vote for the wrong candidate, or be unfortunately provoked to point a gun at a hare, and so be dispossessed of their 'holdings,' it cannot be expected that they will properly cultivate the soil, or expend their capital in bringing out its full powers. But the case we have before us shows his grace to be in the habit of gratifying his ambition by going to greater lengths than these; and that, rather than lose a vote, or allow his list of retainers to be lessened, he will commit acts of injustice upon the widows and fatherless, and punish those who are incapable either of committing any offence against his own strict code of rules, or of defending themselves from his aggressions. We have heard of numerous instances of fathers being seriously inconvenienced by his grace compelling them to take their boys into partnership immediately on their attaining their majority, that the number of tenant-at-will voters may be increased."

But no women are allowed to occupy farms on the Duke's property.

"Women have no votes, cannot enter themselves among the Bucks Yeomanry, cannot swell the mob of applauders at public meetings, nor attend to do suit and service at Stowe when any distinguished visitors are there."

And the following instance is stated:—

"There is a farm belonging to the Duke of Buckingham at Winchendon Marsh, near this town, which had been in the occupation of the late tenant (Mr. J. Read) and his family for upwards of a century. Mr. Read had just previous to his death expended from £300 to £400 in under-draining, and had otherwise so expended his capital and skill as to bring the farm into first rate condition. He left a widow with a large and young family, and it was important that this bereaved family should have been allowed to remain undisturbed for a year or two at least. But no, this did not suit his grace's ambition; women and children do not answer his purpose, and so he has no consideration for them. A notice to quit was immediately served on the afflicted widow, and the farm was actually let over the poor woman's head at an advanced rent of £100 per annum. The widow begged to be allowed to remain but one more year, that she might reduce her stock and make other necessary arrangements; the executors under Read's will, who are practical farmers, offered to see that the farm was properly managed; but his grace was inexorable, and so the poor widow is obliged to get rid of her stock by public auction, and to sell off the cattle, &c., at a time and under circumstances which are sure to cause a great sacrifice of her means."

Nor is this a solitary case:—

"That this ejecting widows is part of a regular system of his grace is evident from other causes. Mrs. Read's is by no means a singular instance. It is but a few years ago that the widow of a Mr. Adkins, of Brill, was, with her numerous children, turned adrift upon the wide world by his grace, though a neighbour kindly offered to see that the farm was properly managed. The deceased Adkins, too, left his farm in good order, and had always been a most zealous partisan of his landlord; exerting himself beyond his means to further the electioneering objects of the present duke."

A farm under such a "FARMER'S FRIEND" would be dear at any price.

THE GAME LAWS.

Public opinion on the game laws has now assumed a practical form, for in two different counties public meetings have been held to petition for a total and immediate repeal. At Ruislip, in Middlesex, resolutions to that effect were agreed to, with one dissentient—a landowner—and amidst the eager assertion, by farmers, of particular instances of the mischievous operation of these laws.

On Monday last a meeting was also held in the County Hall of Aylesbury, in Buckinghamshire, where Dr. Lee presided, and a petition for repealing the game laws was agreed to. The Chairman, in opening the business of the meeting, referred to the social evils caused by game-preserving, and the efforts which Sir Harry Verney and himself had made to induce the Buckinghamshire magistrates to memorialize the Home Secretary on the subject. He also

"adverted to a return obtained by Mr. Mainwaring of the number of gamekeepers murdered during the ten years ending 1843, from which it appeared that no fewer than 41 gamekeepers had lost their lives during that period in protecting the game of lords of manors. He was sorry to say that the first on the list was Charles Coles, the gamekeeper of a clergyman of the Church of England, one of those gentlemen who professed to be the descendants of the Apostles, though Holy Writ did not inform them that the Apostles took out game licenses or went fox-hunting. The next case was in Berkshire; and then came, he regretted to see, one in Buckinghamshire. In Cheshire there had been three such murders, in Derbyshire two, in Gloucestershire one. To the disgrace of Buckingham he was compelled to admit that another gamekeeper had been killed in that county. In Northamptonshire two had been murdered. From a return of the number of persons convicted of offences against the game laws in 1843, obtained by Mr. Bright, he found that there were 119 such persons who had been convicted either at the quarter or the petty sessions in Buckingham. Those details showed that the present meeting was called for no light purpose, but one involving the comfort, happiness, and lives of their fellow-creatures."

Out of 539 prisoners in Buckingham county gaol during last year, 169 were offenders against the game laws. The present system of game-preserving was not sportsmanlike.

"To the old style of shooting he did not object. Formerly, gentlemen considered shooting a pursuit which united exercise and sport; they would go out with their dogs, and if they killed two or three heads of game, they were satisfied. Latterly, noblemen and lords of manors had got into the practice of preserving game to the amount of thousands upon thousands, and recently they had adopted a foreign custom, to which they durst not give an English name—the battue. ('Hear, hear,' and a laugh.)"

Modification of the law is not sufficient:—

"His opinion was, that the game laws should be abolished, and that the law of trespass would be quite sufficient to ensure a gentleman sufficient game and sport. His neighbours would protect his land, and his tenants would get rid of a great source of disaffection. Any gentleman who would have the moral courage to call upon Parliament to repeal the game laws would prove himself to be the farmer's friend. The game-preserver was not the farmer's friend, but his enemy, and the persecutor of the labourer, loading the villages in his neighbourhood with taxation to maintain the wives and children of those he caused to be sent to gaol. The game-preserver was indeed the tyrant of his county, filling the prison with inmates sent from his own domains, and doing mischief to almost every other class of his fellow-subjects. (Cheers.)"

We believe it will be invariably found that a game-preserver is a bad neighbour and a tyrannical landlord; and the reason is obvious. Not only is a game preserve a nuisance and source of loss to all adjoining owners and occupiers of land, but it leads to perpetual ill blood between neighbouring occupiers and their servants, and the game-preserver's keepers. Then, none but inferior farmers and dependent tenants will rent under a game-preserver; for good farming is absolutely inconsistent with game-preserving.

Mr. Scrivener, a farmer, said:—

"He believed the game laws to be so bad that it was impossible to amend them, and therefore they should be got rid of altogether. (Hear, hear.) He believed them to be a crying evil. He did not wish to curtail the sports of the gentry, but to see them pay the expenses of their sports, and not lay them upon other people. (Cheers.) Had there been no game laws, he thought they might have been spared the expense of a new prison, which would cost something like £40,000. (A voice, 'Ay, and the workhouse too.') He moved the second resolution:—'That a petition to Parliament, praying for the total and immediate repeal of the game laws, be adopted and signed by this meeting, and as many of the inhabitants of Aylesbury and its neighbourhood as think proper to affix their signatures.'"

In both the above meetings the petitions to the House of Commons against the game laws was intrusted to Mr. Bright, with whose motion of inquiry into the subject our readers are acquainted. Mr. Bright himself was present, by invitation, at the Aylesbury meeting, and forcibly stated the case of the community against the game laws. He said:—

"The game laws were especially unsuited to the present condition of things in this country; and the evils of which they were the parent were beginning to engage the attention of the country to such an extent that the day was rapidly approaching when they must be either greatly modified or entirely abolished. (Cheers.) They were injurious to the farmer by promoting the rearing and the maintaining of what was called a large head of game. They were also very injurious to the labourer by causing bad farming, and putting an irresistible temptation before him to break the law. But there was a general charge he would bring against the game laws. The landowners of this country had undertaken to feed the people. It was common for them to express their desire that this country should be independent of foreigners for the supply of food, saying that the land of this country was sufficient to supply the whole population with food. He was not going into other questions. But the landowners having undertaken to feed the 27,000,000 of people of England and Ireland, if there was reason to believe that those people were not sufficiently fed, then it was the height of injustice and immorality on the part of the landowners to keep up a very large quantity of game, a kind of vermin, to devour a large portion of food which multitudes of the starving population would be glad to obtain. (Hear.) Every eater as well as every grower of agricultural produce had reason to complain of the game laws. To the farmer, whether having a lease or not, they were an injury and a nuisance. The landowners of England were in the habit of calling themselves the farmers' friends, and of speaking in Parliament in favour of protection for the farmer; yet they supported the game laws, which formed one of the greatest barriers to their success. The farmers were low-spirited; they found it difficult to pay their rents. Some were looking to Parliament for help, and some knew not where to look, but were quite in despair. But the farmer should consider who they were that maintained this system, and whether it was not for their own pleasure or profit. Then would come the question how far the farmer's interests were identified with those of the landowner, and the consideration whether it was not worth while for the farmers to take their own business into their own hands. (Hear, hear.) But farmers were generally quiet men, and afraid to speak their minds, and act up to their convictions; but he trusted that the time would come when they would show greater independence of spirit, and not mind so much what their landlords and their agents and stewards told them. They should unite together to obtain deliverance from those evils which were forced upon them in consequence of their own neglect of their own interests. The motion of which he had given notice had reference not only to the injury done to the farmer, but the demoralizing influence of the game laws upon the labouring population. He would put it to any minister or teacher of religion whether he did not find all his efforts counteracted very much in particular districts by the propensity to poaching on the part of the labourers?"

After alluding to the portentous fact that in 1843 there had been, in England, 4500 men convicted of poaching; and the demoralizing effects of this law-made crime; Mr. Bright said:—

"All this was caused because a certain small portion of the community were resolved to gratify a barbarous appetite for a barbarous pleasure, and to make laws severer in respect to this species of property than those affecting other property, the same being carried into effect with a rigour that disgraced those who sat on the bench of justice. Game was styled property; but not all the laws in the statute-books could make it so to the mind of the labourer."

Farmers were beginning to find out the jugglery of their landlord protectors:—

"The time was coming when the farmers would find their friends. (Hear, hear.) But he would deliver the farmer from the tyranny of the watchfulness of the game-keeper. (Hear, hear.) The farmer must not on his own land set foot on a nest of game, nor pick up a half-dead hare. The farmer should look about him and search into the cause of this degradation. (HEAR, HEAR.) He trusted that this second meeting would lead to others, and that by union and perseverance the attention of the Legislature might be drawn to the subject."

And the agricultural journals abound in letters from correspondents, practical farmers, which confirm all these views. For instance, in the Mark-lane Express of last Monday, amongst a multitude of others to the same effect, we find the following; a writer, signing himself "A Tory," says:—

"Observing in your paper some account of the ravages caused by game, I beg leave to state what I saw during the harvest of 1814, on the estate of a tenant-farmer, who has now happily left that occupation: he did not put a scythe into 38 acres of barley, it being so completely destroyed by the game. The proprietor has since killed on the estate 3000 hares. In these days, when the population is considered to be more than the kingdom can contain, still less support, we see hares and rabbits eating that which would feed thousands all the year round. Nor is this all; 'tis not that which is wasted or eaten by these creatures, but it is what is also prevented from being grown by the curtailment of the tenant's means; and also the distress amongst the labourers by the damages sustained by the farmer."

Again, another writer thus states "the game laws in a nutshell":—

"For the last quarter of a century and more I have watched the game law in all its changes, its effects, and its oppositions, morally, politically, and in regard to individual interests; and I have never failed to find my law of ten words, or ten syllables, or thirty-three letters, made many years since, to meet every difficulty, having the aid of a simple law of trespass. The law may be engraved on a good-sized seal, and is this: 'LET ALL DANK BE TURNED ON WHOM LAND IT IS.'"

Indeed it is as impossible to take up a newspaper, circulating in rural districts, without meeting with much to the same effect, as it is to speak to a farmer on the subject of game without calling forth bitter complaints and indignant observations against that remnant of feudal barbarism—the game laws.

DESTRUCTION CAUSED BY GAME.—Sir Thomas Hare has given directions that the game on his estate at Stowe, near Downton, Norfolk, should be shot down as close as possible. This determination, we believe, has arisen in consequence of the numerous complaints he has received of the injury done to the crops of his tenants. A gentleman near this city, who hired an estate last year in this county for sporting, and where he had reared a large head of game, had this week an account of £500 presented to him for payment for damage done by the hares and rabbits to the tenants' crops.—Nottingham Mercury.

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING IN COVENT GARDEN.

THE NEXT MEETING of the LEAGUE in the THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT-GARDEN, will be HELD ON WEDNESDAY SE'NIGHT, the 19th INSTANT.

BOROUGH OF MARYLEBONE REGISTRATION and FREE-TRADE DINNER.—The MARYLEBONE REFORM and REGISTRATION ASSOCIATION, with others, alive to the important movement now in progress in favour of the great principles of FREE TRADE, have deemed the present a fitting occasion publicly to attempt their promotion by all the means in their power; amongst which, attention to the Registration of Electors is admitted to be of paramount importance. It is hoped that such an occasion may be the means of extending the Reform interest, and of more closely uniting the electors in the pursuit of objects important, not only to the Borough, but to the Empire at large. A DINNER will take place in the Concert-room of the Princess's Theatre, Great Castle-street, Oxford-street, on WEDNESDAY, the 5th of March next, at which their esteemed President, JOHN BASCHAW, Esq., has consented to preside.

The following, amongst other gentlemen, have accepted invitations, and will attend:—Sir B. Hall, Bart., M.P.; Sir C. Napier, K.C.B., M.P.; J. Hume, Esq., M.P.; W. Ewart, Esq., M.P.; H. Cobden, Esq., M.P.; J. Bright, Esq., M.P.; and General Sir De Lacey Evans.

By order of the Committee,
WILLIAM ALLEN, Secretary.
N.B. Tickets, Five Shillings each, may be had of the Secretary, at the Office of the Association, 62, Warren-street, Fitzroy-square.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, February 8, 1845.

It will be seen from the report in another part of this paper, that Mr. Cobden has intimated his intention of moving for a select committee to inquire into the alleged distress of the farmers and the farm-labourers, should he not be anticipated by those gentlemen who designate themselves representatives of the agricultural interest. All our readers may not understand the nature of a select committee: it usually consists of ten or twelve gentlemen, who assemble to examine witnesses during the day, when the House is not sitting, so that their special labours do not interfere with the progress of public business. Indeed, a select committee is rarely refused to any parties who can make out a plausible case of grievance or distress. A select committee was granted to those who complained that their spaniels and lapdogs were stolen; to those who were aggrieved by smoky chimneys; to the gamblers on the turf; and to the writers of dramatic pieces. Nothing could be more reasonable than to ask on the part of the farmers and farm-labourers that their alleged distress, which has formed the staple of so many lugubrious orations at the protection societies, should be thoroughly investigated by a select committee, so as to ascertain its nature and extent, the causes in which it has originated, and the remedies proper to be applied. Mr. Stafford O'Brien, the chairman of the Publication Committee of the Protection Society, rather indiscreetly—as suggested by Sir Robert Peel—at once assented to the propriety of the measure; but the more wary members of his party cautiously held back. Mr. Cobden has done good service by applying such a decisive test to the professions of sympathy for the alleged distress of the farmers and farm-labourers so liberally made by the Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham, and their nominees and associates in the Commons' House of Parliament. If these gentlemen believed what they said, they must eagerly embrace the opportunity of establishing their case before a parliamentary committee; but if they oppose inquiry, and refuse all investigation, no man can resist the inference that they have no confidence in their own statements, but feel conscious of practising a delusion on the credulity of the country, and especially on those classes for whose interests they affect to be most deeply concerned.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The appointment of M. de Salvandy as Minister of Public Instruction, in place of M. Villennin, has been officially announced. A vacancy is thus caused in the vice-presidency of the Chamber.

The Duke de Broglie has been deputed by the French Government on a special mission to England. The object of the duke's mission has reference to the "right of search," and the slave question generally; and it is hoped that a settlement of the long-pending differences on that important subject will shortly take place to the satisfaction of both nations.

The Minister of War, finding that the majority of the acts of insubordination in the army arise from drunkenness, has sent a circular to the commanders of divisions, directing them to use all the severity the rules of discipline warrant against soldiers found in this condition.

The following will amuse our readers:—"The Havre and Rouen Railroad Company, founded by Charles Lafitte, is thus composed," says the Courrier Francais:—"The principal engineers are English, the overseers are English, the operatives are English, and the machinery has been fabricated in England. Everything in the concern is English, even Charles Lafitte himself, who voted for Pritchard."

The Revue de Paris announces that letters from M. Brast had been received by the Minister for Foreign Affairs, in which the Governor of the Marquesas mentions his having adopted measures calculated to effect, without any unpleasant complication, the transition from the régime of "absolute possession" to that of the "protectorate." "We have not heard," says the paper, "if M. Brast mentions having completely succeeded in the accomplishment of his moderate and pacific intentions; but we apprehend that such has not been the case, for a report prevails that fresh scenes of revolt and collision occurred at Tahiti after the receipt of the despatches announcing the immediate restoration of Queen Pomaré."

TOULON, Jan. 30.—The number of suicides on board the men of war in this port is becoming truly alarming. A few days since a young officer hung himself on board the steam-corvette Caméleon, and yesterday a sailor hung himself on board the Jemmapes.—Herald Correspondent.

SPAIN.—The commission on penal law has issued a lengthy report, in which, in referring to the slave trade, the commissioners express their condemnation of the traffic in theory, but would not wish to abolish it before having previously determined on what was necessary to substitute in order to preserve the Spanish colonies. They censure the right of visit as a humiliation, and dangerous to commerce; but as the treaty exists, it should be respected and executed with frankness.

BELGIUM.—The wishes of those who desired a change of Ministry have been frustrated, an address to the King praying for the dismissal of his present advisers having been negatived by 65 to 22.

FRANKFORT, Jan. 29.—The Frankfurter Journal announces the death of the Duchess of Nassau, daughter of the Emperor of Russia, in the following terms:—"It is our melancholy duty to announce an event which has plunged his Highness the Duke and the entire country into the deepest sorrow. Yesterday afternoon, the 27th, her Imperial Highness the Duchess Elizabeth, Archduchess of Russia, was delivered of a female child, stillborn, and early the next morning her Imperial Highness expired under a severe attack of spasms at the heart."

FIRE IN SWITZERLAND.—Upwards of 250 houses were last week burnt down in the village of Luc (Switzerland). The clergyman's residence and the Town-hall were also reduced to ashes. The church is so much injured that it is not expected to be again available for public worship. The walls are tottering in parts from the effects of the heat. The three bells were melted before the fire reached the spire of the steeple. The total damage from the fire is estimated at 100,000*fr.* Provisions and necessaries have been sent in by the surrounding villages to the sufferers.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—Intelligence from Constantinople of the 15th ult. states, that on the 13th the Minister for Foreign Affairs had notified to Sir Stratford Canning, that the Porte acceded fully and unconditionally to all his demands respecting the claims of British subjects, the reform of certain abuses in the administration, and the execution of the commercial treaty.

UNITED STATES.—The packet-ship Stephen Whitney, which arrived at Liverpool on Saturday, brings advice from New York to the 14th ult. The annexation of Texas was still the leading question, but such was the diversity of opinion with regard to the manner in which it should be effected, that it was generally deemed very doubtful whether it would even pass the House of Representatives.

The steam-boat Capitol, on her passage from Pittsburgh to St. Louis, had been entirely destroyed by fire, and three passengers (Mr. Dalrymple, his wife, and son) had, it was believed, perished in the flames. The loss of property was large.

TEXAS.—We have accounts to the 28th of December. On the 16th of that month, the new President, Mr. Jones, addressed another message to Congress, in which he remarks, that the republic has arrived at a crisis in its affairs fraught with deep and absorbing interest, but that the capacity of the people for self-government, and for the maintenance of their independence, has been tested and proved. The President also comes out for Free Trade.

MEXICO.—The news from Mexico, which comes down to the 11th of December, would lead to the belief that all classes had joined in the revolt against Santa Anna, and that a bloodless but complete revolution had been effected.

DOMESTIC.

Her Majesty's speech, containing about 3500 letters, was telegraphed in less than two hours to Gosport: it was set in type as the signals were received; printed off and circulated amongst her Majesty's authorities at Portsmouth.

A patent has been taken out by a scientific gentleman for a new machine, called "The hydro-mechanic apparatus, which, by a combination of hydraulic and mechanical properties, on well-known scientific principles, is intended to supersede the use of fire and steam in working and propelling all kinds of machinery and engines." A scientific correspondent of a morning paper states, that he has examined the structure of this extraordinary invention, and that he has no doubt it will answer the purpose for which it is intended.

On Saturday last, a fashionably attired female, who gave her name as Miss Elizabeth Osborn, and represented herself as the daughter of Sir John Osborn, was committed, at Queen-square police-office, to take her trial on a charge of having stolen a pot of potted meat from the shop of Mr. Edward Allum, oil and Italian warehouseman, Brompton.

John Davies, Esq., hat manufacturer, who died a few days ago, has bequeathed £4500 for the support of religious objects.

On Monday two men, named Isaac Taylor and Joseph Diddick, engaged in a pugilistic encounter in a field near Exeter, for a sum of 10*fr.* Diddick was so much injured that he died shortly after. Taylor and several others who were present, have been taken into custody.

A large factory, belonging to Mr. Peter Coxon, of New Lenton, near Nottingham, was destroyed by fire on Sunday morning last. It is supposed to have been caused by an incendiary.

A fire broke out on Saturday, at Gravesend, in the office of the Kentish Independent, which, we regret to say, was destroyed, and two other premises adjacent seriously damaged.

The highest tide since 1816, and, with one exception in that year, unparalleled during the last 60 years, visited this town (Hull) on Sunday evening, when the top of high water was looked for by the experienced officers of the dock company at ten minutes past seven. It continued, however, to flow for thirty-five minutes longer, and then reached the extraordinary height of 29 feet 7 inches at the Humber Dock gate, and 28 feet 6 inches at the Old Dock.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quentin Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund. By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HIXON, Secretary.

Manchester, Jan. 13, 1845.

The League Bazaar will be held during the month of May next, in the Theatre Royal Covent Garden.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

THE LAST OF "WHIG AND TORY."

Our readers will have observed that the old farce recently attempted to be revived on the Cornwall boards, entitled Whig and Tory, or Freeborn Britons and Little Loaves, has been withdrawn on the first rehearsal, under circumstances which render it highly improbable that any manager, either in town or country, will again venture on its production. Sir William Trelawny has resigned. The protectionist Whig, the Liberal monopolist, the "decided and unflinching advocate" as he styles himself, of "civil and religious liberty" and land-lords' bread-tax, has discovered that this description of "liberty" is sadly at a discount in the Cornwall market. The Liberals will not come forward with any zeal or heart in support of a Liberalism which would tie their hands from working, and stop their mouths from eating; and this curious piece of political satirism—the fossil relic of an earlier social formation—is quietly put back on the shelf.

And on the shelf, we presume, it will henceforth remain, along with the other curiosities of an older world. Thanks to the Cornish men, this nonsense has got its quietus at last. Civil and religious liberty, without liberty to eat! Civil and religious liberty, with life held on tenancy-at-will of the landlords! Civil and religious liberty "in the abstract!" As a joke, the thing certainly is not bad; but it would have been carrying the joke a little too far to send it in a practical shape up to the House of Commons. Seriously, we are glad to see an extinguisher put so promptly on this attempt at reviving old, exploded party nicknames, which have no sort of intelligible relation to anything now existing in our politics. Whig and Tory are words which, in this year 1845, absolutely mean nothing. Men might as well call themselves Roundheads and Cavaliers, or Guelphs and Ghibellines. It were as rational to fight the wars of the Roses over again. The Whig and Tory combatants, in truth, still survive (though some half of them have changed sides); but the old battle has been long ago fought out. We have got a new field, new weapons, and a new cause belli. Of course everybody is for civil and religious liberty now-a-days, "decidedly" and "unflinchingly;" the question is about the liberty to earn bread and eat it.

But there is no need to slay the slain. The thing is done with, in East Cornwall, and, we suppose, in every county and borough of Great Britain. "Whig and Tory" elections now, once for all, belong to history. It is a safe prophecy, that no constituency will again swallow the absurdity of the civil and religious liberty which does not include liberty to live.

THE UNCONTESTED ELECTIONS.

The Standard of Tuesday pleasantly congratulates the Cabinet and the country on the "real, substantial proofs of the strength of the Government," afforded by those splendid demonstrations of public opinion, the elections for Buckingham and Stamford. Our contemporary drolly observes—

"We have to announce to-day, two uncontested elections, returning two members of Sir Robert Peel's Government—viz., Sir Thomas Fremantle and Sir George Clerk. * * * Now, these are the real substantial proofs of the strength of a Government. To believe the Morning Chronicle and the Globe on one side, the Times and Morning Post on the other, the Government has not a friend in the world. Appeal, however, to the people at the hustings, and you will see none but friends to the Government and its supporters."

Nothing here about the snowballs. It is odd what very different ways different people have of telling the same story. According to other accounts which have reached us, poor Sir George Clerk saw some people at Stamford hustings, who, however zealous in their general support of her Majesty's Government, gave but equivocal indications of friendship for its representative on that occasion, and offered to the triumphant candidate "real substantial proofs," on his hat and coat, of a "strength" not of the sort that Ministers usually desiderate. The "uncontested election" ended in something very like a pitched battle; and the unopposed and duly elected candidate had a narrow escape of the river. In particular, it was judged expedient to keep clear of a certain "narrow bridge," where it was apprehended that the boisterous zeal of friends and supporters might lead to a disagreeable catastrophe. Happily, however, by prudent management, and the aid of "a strong party of special constables," the day passed off, we are told, "without any serious results." Sir George escaped from his constituents at last, without experiencing any severe bodily injury; and is, no doubt, pleasing himself with the hope that his next interview with them may take place at a season of the year when nature is less liberal in her supply of missiles.

We notice this snowballing part of the affair, because it really throws a good deal of light on the true character of "uncontested elections" in little boroughs; at the same time that it suggests a short, plain answer to a question which many of our friends will be apt to ask—and which they have a right to ask—Why did the League let the late elections go uncontested?

A strange, mad business it seems, on the face of it, first electing a man, and then pelting him. If the people of Stamford have so very vehement an aversion to Sir George Clerk, why do they choose him? Unanimous election, followed the minute afterwards by unanimous assault and battery, is a phenomenon which one would like to understand. That useful little volume, the "Parliamentary Companion," explains the thing in a line. We there read, under the heading "STAMFORD, Lincolnshire," as follows:—"The Marquis of Exeter possesses most of the £10 houses in this borough." Which is a polite, constitutional way of saying, that the Marquis of Exeter possesses most of the £10 voters in the borough, and commands most of the £10 consciences in the borough. In plain English, the Marquis of Exeter is the constituency of Stamford. The electoral law of Stamford is made at Burghley-house, and the "electors" have nothing to do with Burghley law but to obey it. Here is the whole business in a nutshell—the unanimous election and the unanimous pelting. The pelting is the reaction of the election. The Stamford people assault their representative because they cannot reject him. The illegal violence is their substitute for the legal vote. It is the only form of the elective franchise they know. They cannot register their opinion of an obnoxious candidate on the polling-book in black and white, where his lordship and his lordship's steward would see it; and so they register it anonymously on the candidate's person, in black and blue. They snowball their man, because they cannot black-ball him. That is their vote by ballot.

To contest a Stamford election would obviously be a sheer absurdity. There is nothing to make a contest of. There can be no fighting without at least two soldiers; and no contested election without a constituency counting at least a couple of electors. The electoral body of Stamford is what lawyers call a "corporation sole." The only sort of contest that can possibly take place in a Stamford election is that which goes on in the Marquis of Exeter's private thoughts before he has made up his mind to his man. To agitate the Marquis's ten-pounders for League votes would be like agitating the Marquis's bankers for subscriptions to the League fund. The ten-pounders and the bankers could only reply, "The votes and the cash are not ours to give." The one property is as inaccessible and "private" as the other.

And the case of Stamford is that of some fifty or sixty other boroughs, of the United Kingdom, returning to Parliament from ninety to a hundred members. On the same day that Sir George Clerk was unanimously elected for Stamford, Sir Thomas Fremantle was returned, with a similar unanimity (though without the snowballs), for the borough of Buckingham—the unanimity being, not that of the 391 registered voters, but of the one and indivisible Duke of Buckingham, who, as our "Parliamentary Companion" has it, possesses "much influence in this borough." As an old voter feelingly observed on the occasion to the Times reporter, "His vote wasn't worth a farthing, and nobody cared how he voted, for the Duke could always guarantee a majority in favour of his nominee." The same with those other "uncontested elections" with which, during the past year, monopolists have made-believe to console themselves for their yet unforgotten metropolitan defeat. On turning over the pages of the little vade-mecum before referred to, we find the following significant entries:—

"RIPON, Yorkshire.—Miss Lawrence, one of the most wealthy persons in the north of England, has the patronage of Ripon."

"WOODSTOCK, Oxfordshire.—The Duke of Marlborough has influence here."

"HUNTINGDON, Bedfordshire.—The interest of the Earl of Sandwich predominates in this borough."

"LAUNCESTON, Cornwall.—The Duke of Northumberland's interest here is very considerable."

"CRANFORTH, Gloucestershire.—The Bathurst family has influence here."

That is to say, Miss Lawrence, the Duke of Marlborough, the Earl of Sandwich, the Duke of Northumberland, and the Bathurst family are the constituencies of these five boroughs. It was only last week that honourable members, with their well-thumbed "Parliamentary Companions" in their pockets, voted the interference of peers in elections to be a breach of the privileges of the House of Commons.

It is no part of the business of the League, as the League, to get up a new schedule A. We simply record these things as we find them, and as they bear practically on our own agitation. If a new schedule A should some day be the consequence, the League cannot help it. Meanwhile, we are quite contented to do our work with such tools as we have, convinced as ever—convinced more than ever, with each fresh step we take—that the tools, though none of the best, are good enough to work with. We could wish for better; but we must economize time. While we stopped to mend them our work would stand still.

To prevent disappointment, we may as well tell our friends that we rather expect all future Parliamentary vacancies occasioned by Ministerial changes will be, like the recent ones, uncontested. And that for the simplest of all possible reasons:—good care will be taken that the vacancies shall arise only in those boroughs in which the material of a contest—viz., a constituency—does not exist. We happen to know that dread of the constituencies and the League has already operated very inconveniently on Ministerial arrangements. In the late recast of parts, it has been felt at every turn. Both the dispensers of official honour and emolument, and those who would like to be recipients, have found themselves sadly straitened and hampered. It is of no use for Sir Robert Peel to offer good things to men who have constituents to whom, on acceptance, they must go for re-election. They dare not face their constituents in the character of supporters of a monopolist Minister. Rather than run the risk of being thrust out of public life altogether, the placeman elect reluctantly signs refusal of the very thing on which his heart is set. Mr. Cardwell might have been, at this moment, Vice-President of the Board of Trade, were it his good fortune to supersede Miss Lawrence or the Earl of Sandwich.

But, unluckily, Mr. Cardwell represents the people of Clitheroe—and there is an end of the business. The Clitheroe people were sounded on the matter, and the report was—contest certain, defeat probable; so Mr. Cardwell is not Vice-President of the Board of Trade, but only Secretary to the Treasury—an inferior appointment, which presents, however, the decided advantage of not necessitating re-election. In like manner, Mr. Stuart Wortley might, it is understood, have had his share in the recent redistribution of office. But Mr. Stuart Wortley unfortunately represents the West Riding of Yorkshire, and the League have latterly been somewhat busy in the West Riding of Yorkshire. Mr. Stuart Wortley accordingly, though much obliged to Sir Robert Peel all the same, begs to be excused. We rather suspect, too, that Mr. Fitzroy Kelly finds Cambridge honours stand sadly in the way of Whitehall degrees. The question, Whether is the League dead or alive? is one on which we are sure any of these gentlemen would be competent to afford ample information; and if the inquirer were not perfectly satisfied, we would say—ask Mr. Beckett, of Leeds—ask Lord Francis Egerton, of South Lancashire—ask Mr. Hinde, of Newcastle—ask Mr. Masterman, of London—ask Captain Rous, of Westminster—ask Colonel Wood, of Middlesex. Is there one of these gentlemen who would dare to go to his constituents for re-election pledged to support a monopolist Ministry? The truth is, those representatives who are so lucky as to have no constituents enjoy just now, and will enjoy during the remaining term of the present Parliament and Ministry, a tolerably assured monopoly of all the official windfalls. The League have virtually vetoed the acceptance of office by monopolist members who sit for popular constituencies.

One thing we must add, after what we have shown of the rottenness of our borough system. Let no Leaguer trouble himself about the sixty boroughs without constituencies, and the ninety representatives without electors. Their opposition will not avail to put off Free Trade for an hour, when the rest of our work is well finished. It is not necessary to the carrying of our question that we should proselytise, man by man, a numerical majority of the House of Commons. We need no more concern ourselves about displacing or converting the honourable members who represent Miss Lawrence, than we need waste time and temper in reasoning with the Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham. After all, it is not number, but weight of votes, that will really settle the question. It is not the rotten boroughs, nor the rotten counties, that keep it unsettled; but the assumed quiescence, or division, of the large constituencies. The monopolists perfectly well understand this. They would gladly give half-a-dozen Ripons to get a reversal of the judgment which London has passed on "Baring and Protection." They would thankfully schedule off a round score of their little parliamentary preserves, rather than face the already visible consequences of the forty-shilling-freehold movement. No man living knows better than Sir Robert Peel, that members of Parliament are not to be rated merely by what their votes count for in the division lists, and that the real Government of this country is now, once for all, in the large popular constituencies. Even in the old days before the Reform Bill, one Westminster, Middlesex, or Yorkshire vote was worth more to a Government than a dozen Gattos. The men of straw are useful to a Minister, in their way, but a Ministry resting on them would collapse in a week. Our policy is simple, bold, and sure:—Fly at high game—the highest—and the small fry will give no trouble. Make London and Middlesex, Liverpool and Lancashire, Cheshire and the West Riding, our own—and the work is done.

THE MANCHESTER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, AND MR. BIRLEY.

Many of our readers will probably remember how greatly Mr. Entwistle, the monopolist candidate for South Lancashire, was indebted for his success to the activity of Mr. Richard Birley, the influential chairman of his committee. It will also be in the recollection of every body that party politics were cast aside, and the sole question at issue during the whole of that great struggle was—Whether the principle of Free Trade or of Protection should be applied to the commercial policy of this country. The aristocracy and squirearchy of the county, led on by Mr. Birley, and supported by the monopolists in the manufacturing towns, gained a great temporary triumph; and it would not have surprised us, in these days when the presentation of testimonials generally follows as a reward for public services of all kinds, if Mr. Entwistle's chairman had, ere this, received a handsome piece of plate from the Central Agricultural Protection Society. But we were astonished to find, on reading a report of the annual meeting of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce (an abridgement of which will be found in another page), that Mr. Birley has been seeking for honours in an opposite quarter, as candidate for the office of director of that influential body of Free-Traders! Nay more, he has been making a Free-Trade speech; declaring himself opposed to protection, and to reciprocity, and avowing his belief that neither farmers nor labourers have profited by Corn Laws. All this he firmly believes—but only in the abstract! When asked if he would support Mr. Villiers's motion? He answers that he can't go so fast;—he is as anxious as any man to repeal the Corn Laws, but he thinks the present time is too early;—the League has been for six years asking for total and immediate repeal, but he thinks the League is in too great a hurry. The Manchester men are a practical race, and they do not seem to appreciate very highly the new-fashioned plan introduced by Sir Robert Peel, of saying one thing and doing the very opposite. They therefore decline to make Mr. Birley a director in the concrete, contenting themselves with electing him in the abstract; and in the meantime he may console himself with the reflection that whenever his Free-Trade principles cease to be abstractions, his election will become a reality.

The Manchester Guardian has, we see, taken up the cudgels for Mr. Birley. But, fortunately, its own excellent report of what took place at the chamber, from which we have borrowed our abridgement, furnishes the best possible antidote to its leading article, which is nothing more than one of those splenetic attacks upon the League which have before fallen harmlessly from the same pen. We recommend our readers to peruse the report of the proceedings, and then say whether a body of Free-Traders would have acted wisely in promoting to a post of honour and trust a man who, whilst professing Free-Trade opinions, would be prepared to-morrow at an election to throw all the additional weight which the office of Director of the Chamber of Commerce would give him into the scale of the monopolists.

The Guardian attempts to show that the introduction of the Free-Trade test into the election was a party-political movement. It is quite clear that this was not the opinion of Mr. Birley himself, who entered into an explanation of his views on commercial questions, avowing it as his opinion "that a person proposed as a director should state distinctly what his opinions are in such a case as this." Had he been asked what he thought of the Irish Church or the Ballot, his answer would doubtless have been that they were political questions with which the chamber had no right to interfere. But no one not blinded with spleen or vanity would attempt to create the impression in rational minds, that there was anything inconsistent with strict propriety and good order in requiring the candidate for a seat at the board of the chamber to declare explicitly his views on the commercial question which, above all others, affects the welfare of that community whose interests it was proposed to intrust to his keeping. An attempt is made also by the same journal to create the impression that the chamber is merely an instrument in the hands of the League. If so, the latter has outgrown its parent. The League is the vigorous offspring of the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester. It was launched into existence on the 19th of November, 1838, at the celebrated meeting of the chamber which startled the whole kingdom with its proceedings. That meeting came to a solemn resolution, after two days' discussion, that the Corn Laws were incompatible with the prosperity or even the permanent existence of the manufactures of this country; and declared that they ought to be totally and immediately repealed. Thenceforth began the Anti-Corn-Law agitation in earnest. The following spring the League assumed a local habitation and a name in Manchester, and it took for its shibboleth the principle enunciated by the chamber, and its own words—the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. To the chamber belongs the glory of having originated this great movement which, small in its beginning, has now filled the world with its fame; and poor in spirit must be the man who would wish to sever the chamber from the League, to narrow its functions into the superintendence of turnpikes, or the revision of bridge-tolls, or the regulation of post-offices, and those other local matters which formed the staple of its exploits before men of wider views saw that the interests of Manchester were those of the whole civilized world. No, it cannot be. You can no more dissociate the cause of Free Trade from the Manchester Chamber of Commerce than you can separate the Reformation from the town of Wittenberg, or the art of printing from Mayence. And it is not a vain boast to predict that, when the peaceful principles of which we are the unworthy champions shall have become the recognised faith of the whole world, and when the rich harvest of blessings, springing from the universal practice of Free Trade, shall have been reaped, the enthusiastic traveller will at some future day make a pilgrimage to the very chamber where the battle with monopoly began, which ended only with the regeneration of the commercial world. We trust the members are alive to the honourable fame with which the chamber is identified, and of which they are the guardians; and, judging by the course pursued on the occasion which has called for these remarks, we have no doubt they will prove themselves worthy of their proud but responsible position.

THE BAZAAR.

The committees that have been organized for collecting and arranging the contributions made to the great Free-Trade Bazaar, to be held in the month of May next in Covent Garden, are now actively at work, and we are anxious to impress upon them, collectively and individually, the necessity for exerting themselves so as to make the most of the brief interval that remains before the opening. Unlike ordinary bazaars, that which the League is about to open will, to a great extent, assume the character of a National Exposition of the Products of British Skill and Industry. We feel great pleasure in referring our readers to the letter of our valued friend W. Biggs, Esq., of Leicester, describing the amount and nature of the contributions about to be forwarded to the Bazaar by the spirited Free-Traders of that thriving town. They intend to send specimens of all the staple manufactures of their district; and the Council has received assurances that a similar course will be pursued in all the great marts of industry throughout the three kingdoms. As an exposition the Bazaar will be more perfect and complete than was at first anticipated. It will illustrate, in the most striking manner, the infinitely varied forms in which British skill and industry develop themselves; the great progress which has been lately made in combining elegance with utility, and grace with convenience; and the vast sources of increased national wealth which would be opened to the country and the community if freedom of import allowed an expansion of export.

The obvious difficulty of arranging and cataloguing such a collection, so as to convey an adequate conception of the important and diversified interests of the varied industrial arts and pursuits associated with British commerce and manufactures, renders it very desirable that the local secretaries should exert themselves to transmit as early as possible lists of the contributions and contributors in their respective neighbourhoods. For the same reason we wish to impress on the minds of the members of the committee the importance of an early and active canvass for donations among their friends and acquaintances.

As there are many isolated manufacturers connected with our great cause scattered over the country, we suggest to them the propriety of communicating with the general Secretary at their earliest convenience. There is scarcely any manufactured article which would be inappropriate to an exposition intended to illustrate the greatness and excellence to which British manufactures have attained, and by its proceeds to obtain the means of extending that greatness and increasing that excellence. We feel assured that all who survey the specimens collected in Covent-garden Theatre will be convinced that in free and open markets the products of British labour and intelligence have no reason to shrink from competition.

We subjoin some extracts from our correspondence:—

"Lambeth, Feb. 3.

"SIR,—I have taken the earliest opportunity of acknowledging the receipt of your circular respecting the Free-Trade Bazaar to be held in Covent-garden Theatre in May next. You call upon me to use my endeavours to form a local committee in the neighbourhood, but that is quite out of the power of a journeyman carpenter; and as to the contribution of articles suitable for the Bazaar, carpenters are not the right sort of men to produce anything of that kind; so that you will readily perceive there is but one course for me to pursue so as to be at all useful, although in a very humble way, and that is a pecuniary one; for though carpenters are not in the habit of making articles suitable for the Bazaar, they are ready and willing to aid you, as far as lies in their power (at least the few are with whom I am acquainted), to accomplish the noble end you have in view—that of giving employment to our unemployed fellow-countrymen. Now, although your circular came quite unexpected to me, it did not find me idle: having anticipated the necessity for renewed action in the good cause, I was engaged in soliciting subscriptions for the above purpose (on the very day, nay, for hours before, at the very same time that your circular was being posted) among my shopmates, who responded to the call thus made upon them in a manner quite unprecedented in the subscription way. But, as carpenters do not all think as I do about monopoly, I have to grapple, in my humble way, with some on the corn monopoly; and if I fail to convince them of this piece of injustice, I try what the timber monopoly will do, for upon that part of what the timber monopoly is far more sensitive. I have the question carpenters are far more sensitive, but as soon as not yet completed my subscription duties, but as soon as I have done so I will forward the amount to Fleet-street as early as possible. It will not be like the Glasgow subscription, but it will be the best I can do. I should be most happy and quite willing to do more, but it does not lie in my power. I now take the opportunity of offering my humble thanks, and those of my shopmates, to the leaders of the National Anti-Corn Law League, for their unceasing exertions in the cause of justice and humanity, and beg leave to remain,

"Yours, respectfully,

"To George Wilson, Esq." "HENRY NEWBMAN.

"(Adam House, Appleton, Devon.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have a very high and cordial opinion of the labours of the Anti-Corn Law League.

"As a Christian minister I deem its efforts the most practically humane and benevolent which the most genuine piety and the wisest patriotism can dictate for the political regeneration of our country."

"Whatever, therefore, I and Mrs. Clapp can possibly do to advance its success will afford us the highest pleasure; our only regret is, our inability to do more. If her name be at all acceptable, she will deem it an honour to be associated with ladies engaged in such nobly philanthropic exertions, and will exert herself to add some small contribution to the proposed Bazaar."

"I am, dear Sir, &c. &c.,
"G. Wilson, Esq." "JEROME CLAPP."

A valued friend has handed to us the following report of the proceedings of a meeting of the Free-Trade Committee, held at the Public Office, Birmingham, February 7, 1845; Henry Smith, Esq., in the chair.

It was unanimously resolved,
"That this meeting acknowledges, with the liveliest satisfaction, the zealous and indefatigable exertions of the Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League for the attainment of the objects of the association; and witness with much gratification the decided progress of public opinion in favour of the abolition of the Corn Laws, and the principles of Free Trade thereby produced."

"That this meeting cordially concurs in the essential importance of continuing to excite the attention of the public to this vitally momentous subject, and also in directing the energies of the association to increase, by every legal and constitutional means, the Free-Trade constituency of the united kingdom."

"That, in aid of the funds of the association, the meeting fully approves of the proposed Bazaar, and will use its best exertions to promote its success by soliciting presentations of manufactures and curiosities, and by subscriptions."

"That a sub-committee, consisting of the following gentlemen (22), with power to add to their number, be appointed for carrying out the objects of this meeting."

The following is an extract from a letter received early in the present week:—

"Greenhays, Manchester, Feb. 10.

"I place at your disposal an original letter of General Washington; it was given to me in America, by a granddaughter of General Ward (to whom it is addressed), and there can be no doubt of its authenticity."

"I have been told that there are persons in London who would give ten pounds for it! I only wish this may be so, and that you may, by this means, have that sum to add to the funds of the coming Bazaar."

"I am, &c.,
"SELINA MARSHALL."

We refer to the following letter with much pleasure and gratitude to the writer, for the readiness with which he has adopted the suggestion of a correspondent in a previous number of this paper:—

"Manchester, Jan. 31.

"Sir,—Seeing in the last week's LEAGUE a letter signed 'J. Bartlett,' stating his intention of presenting the oratory made by Ferguson, in aid of the Bazaar, I herewith send you 'The Life and Lectures of Ferguson,' to go along with it, agreeable to the wish of your correspondent."

"Yours &c.,
"George Wilson, Esq." "DAVID M'KINLEY."

"Huddersfield, Feb. 10.

"DEAR SIR,—On behalf of our father we beg to acknowledge the receipt of both your communications respecting the formation of a committee at Kirkburton for the Free-Trade Bazaar."

"The Free-Traders of Kirkburton are preparing contributions of fancy vests—the staple manufacture of Huddersfield and vicinity, and they will be sent to London along with the Huddersfield contributions."

"For our own part we dislike starvation and starvation laws, and if anything we can do will at all assist in destroying monopoly, and help on the good cause of Free Trade, and promote the prosperity and happiness of our fellow-countrymen and of mankind in general, we will most cheerfully do our part."

"We are daily employed in preparing drawing specimens for the Bazaar; but we are only young, being no more than nine and seven years of age, yet we will do our best; and our father is busy in preparing his contributions, and we think, if all would do likewise, we should soon bear no more of distress and misery arising from the Corn Laws."

"We are, dear Sir, your young but very obedient servants,
"WILLIAM BOWER,
"BENJAMIN BOWER, Jun."

"To George Wilson, Esq."

"Highfield-house, Leicester, Feb. 10.

"DEAR SIR,—Your indefatigable friend, R. R. Moore, Esq., has called upon us here, to stir us up in the good work. The result of his visit has been most successful and satisfactory. He has obtained on all hands, from the ladies as well as from the leading manufacturers, promises of contributions and support. We shall send you—women's black worsted hose; men's worsted and lambs-wool ditto; worsted and lambs-wool shirts and drawers, caps, half hose, and socks of every quality and variety; all these articles we consider staples. Beyond these we shall superadd a number of fancy articles: as, for example, shawls, cravats, tippets, mits, gloves, &c. There will also be cotton wound on spools, in a variety of beautiful styles, as well as shoes, slippers, bonnets, and mits of patent new elastic fabric. In addition to these contributions of the manufacturers we shall press all the Free-Trade splinters (I may say all the splinters, for I scarcely know an exception) into the service of knitting. Floss embroidery, merino and shawl yarns. In fact I think, from all I see and hear at Leicester, we shall send a very respectable quota of contributions to the Bazaar. If every other town interested in this great cause should send as much in proportion to the number of its inhabitants, wealth, manufactures, &c. &c., you will have a splendid and magnificent display."

"In the hope that your Bazaar may equal your most sanguine expectations, and that the display at Covent Garden of this year may outvie that of our Gallican neighbours at the Palais Royal of last year,

"I remain, dear Sir, yours very truly,
"WILLIAM BIGGS."

"P.S. If Nottingham and Derby send, as I have no doubt they will, their respective quotas of cotton and silk hose and gloves, and, above all, lace in all its tasteful and infinite variety, the aggregated contributions of the midland counties will form an object of interest to the visitor, and be a source of profit to the funds of the League."

"We feel a pleasure in inserting the following extract from a letter received from the Secretary of the Rochdale Ladies' Committee, and in adding an expression of our gratitude to them for their zeal in behalf of the Bazaar."

"Rochdale Mills, Rochdale, Feb. 11.

"SIR,—The parcel came safe to hand. We had again a numerous attendance of ladies at our weekly meeting, and were much encouraged by receiving a handsome contribution from George Ashworth, Esq., of a parcel of flannels, his own manufacture, value £25 and upwards, and a promise of contributions of needlework from the ladies of his family. The committee are working and canvassing very perseveringly."

"I am, Sir, yours, &c. &c.,
"George Wilson, Esq." "ANNE TWEEDALE."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Second Week, ending Saturday, Feb. 15.

Parliamentary interest, with the exception of railroad discussions, has been suspended this week. The Legislature and the country have been waiting, with no small impatience, the statement of the plans of the Government with reference to our commercial condition and financial position. These are to be stated by Sir Robert Peel this (Friday) afternoon; and we regret the imperious necessity which compels us to go to press at so early an hour, by which we are precluded from presenting to our readers in this week's LEAGUE a full account of his speech. The plans of the Government will be developed to the House, and, by means of "the ordinary channels of intelligence," to the country, as this number is passing into the hands of our readers; and, abstaining from all speculation, we shall only express a hope, in the language of a homely proverb, that the "wool" will be in proportion to the "cry;" and that, after all the preliminary excitement and expectation, the measures of 1845 will not be found as deceptive or as defective as the Corn Law or the Tariff of 1842.

Meantime, the only noticeable indication of the progress of FREE-TRADE opinions which Parliament has afforded during the past week, has been the introduction, by Sir James Graham, of his bill to amend the LAW OF SETTLEMENT, the provisions of which he detailed on Tuesday night. Superficial readers may smilingly wonder by what possible ingenuity the law of parochial settlement can be tortured into a confession of its connexion with those notions of commercial freedom which now fill the atmosphere of public opinion in Great Britain. [Thanks to the Anti-Corn-Law League therefore.] But, if they will but pause for a moment, they will find, even though they should "run" as they "read," that the Law of Settlement and the Law of Free Trade must shake hands together, ere this great commercial country can sit quiet and be at rest, freed from the conflict of antagonistic principles, and the levies of feudal "black mail." For the existing Law of Settlement has been a potent engine in that disastrous warfare between TOWN and COUNTRY, infinitely more injurious to England, to civilization, to humanity, to universal MAN, than the wars of the Red and White Roses—the strife for the crown between York and Lancaster. When the soil of England opened her teeming horn, and unpoetical "bread-stuffs" were in abundance in the land, then smoked the tall chimneys, lights on the long winter nights blazed in the busy mills, and hunger-worn creatures, growing corn of which they scarcely partook, and tending cattle the taste of whose flesh they might imagine but scarcely could describe, flocked into the manufacturing districts, saying, "Give us places in your busy beehives, that we also may eat a morsel of bread." But when the land "contracted its discounts,"—when the steam-engine gasped convulsively for food, and the doors of the mills were opened that their occupants might "go out," not to "come in,"—then the rural immigrants, who had fled to the towns to escape the starvation of the country, and who, in the towns, still felt that the country pursued them, looked bither and thither for relief. The Corn Law stopped their work; and the Law of Settlement bade them go back to the places from whence they came. "No, no," cried the landlords, "we could not keep them when we had them; and, now that we have got rid of them, you must keep them whether you can or no." "Abolish your Corn Law," replied the manufacturers, "and the Law of Settlement need not trouble you; in lieu of your compulsory charity, we will give the paupers the benefit of our enterprise and industry." "Nay," was the respond, "we cannot afford to abolish the Corn Law, but we will do something which will enhance the blessings conferred on you by a Corn Law. We will alter the Law of Settlement, and compel you to adopt and maintain our superfluous poor."

Accordingly, in the bill as it was introduced last session, there was a provision by which paupers, who had been industriously employed in any locality for five years, should not be capable of being removed to their birth settlements; in other words, the five years would give them a settlement in any town or place. At first sight this would seem a very humane provision; and in itself it is so. But, mark its effects, in conjunction with a Corn

Law. In abundant and cheap years the towns would be flooded, and the country would be cleared; the reduction in the poor-rates might so far compensate for low prices as to enable the farmers still to pay exorbitantly high rents. In deficient and dear years the towns would be eaten up; and while they would be groaning under high poor-rates and diminished industry, the country would be rejoicing under the double advantage of low poor-rates and high prices.

Sir James Graham has seen this; and now refuses to do the bidding of the landlords. He has, as he tells us himself, been doing what Burke and Pitt did before him—studying ADAM SMITH. Settlement by birth is the leading principle of the new bill: but, in order to give the poor man the advantage of a wider sphere, Sir James Graham proposes to enlarge the limits of a birth settlement from the Parish to the Union. The Free Trade reasons with which Sir James Graham urged his proposition are very instructive, and well worth perusal. He said:—

"On the former occasion of addressing the House on this subject, he had quoted a remark of Adam Smith, expressive of a doubt whether any poor working man ever reached the age of forty without having practically, in his own person, experienced the hardship and injustice of the law of settlement (hear, hear); and expressive, further, of an opinion, that it was monstrous that in this country, labour, the only capital of the working man, should be confined within the narrow limits and fetters of parishes and townships. (Hear, hear.) What was the number of these townships and parishes? No less, in England and Wales, than 14,500 (hear, hear); which, under the present system, could only be regarded as limiting and restricting the labour of the poor man, or preventing its free circulation. (Hear, hear.) He conceived it would be an immense advantage to the poor man, attended by no coextensive disadvantage to the rate-payer—to the rich man—were Parliament at the earliest possible period to reduce the number of these restraints on the due circulation of labour, by reducing the number of these narrow circles. (Hear, hear.) He did not desire to make the poor-rate an aggregate general or national charge; he should regard any such idea as highly objectionable and dangerous; but he could imagine no objection at all to substituting unions for all purposes of settlement for parishes. (Hear, hear.) The number of unions in England and Wales was 620; and could he induce the House to consent to his views, they would at once reduce the number of the circles in question from 14,500 to 620. (Hear, hear.)"

THE BAZAAR.

A meeting of the friends of Free Trade was held in the Music-hall, Sheffield, on Monday evening, to hear addresses from George Thompson, Esq., and Robert R. Moore, Esq., in promotion of the great Bazaar to be held by the League, in London, in May next. The inclemency of the evening, and the number of other public engagements for the same time, rendered the audience somewhat smaller than usual on these occasions. William Fisher, Esq., president of the Free-Trade Society, took the chair. Mr. Thompson and Mr. Moore severally addressed the meeting in eloquent speeches in support of Free Trade, and the Bazaar; and their remarks and appeals elicited frequent and loud marks of approbation. E. Vickers, Esq., after a warm eulogium on the speakers, moved a vote of thanks to them for their eloquent and effective addresses. The resolution having been seconded by F. Hoole, Esq., was carried unanimously. Mr. Thompson briefly returned thanks; and the usual vote of thanks having been given to the chairman, the meeting separated. (On the following evening (Tuesday) a very numerous meeting was held in the Music-hall, when Edward Vickers, Esq., one of the vice-presidents of the Free-Trade Society, occupied the chair; and the meeting was addressed with great effect by Mr. Thompson and Mr. Moore. Mr. Solly moved a vote of thanks to the deputation, which was seconded by Mr. Earnshaw, Halifax, and carried with loud applause. Mr. Moore, announced that he had spent the day in company with Wm. Fisher, Esq., in visiting a number of the principal manufacturers, whom he found quite ready, as he had found the manufacturers of other towns, to furnish the finest specimens of their skill to the Bazaar. We are glad to learn that on the following days Mr. Moore continued his visits to the manufacturers, all of whom promised their support to the Bazaar.

From Dundee various detached subscriptions have been promised. The importance of our district, as the seat of the Scottish linen manufacture, demands something more than individual exertion. A stall should be furnished exclusively with the articles of its manufacture. Several of our minor traders, which already possess some celebrity in London, might find it an advantageous mode of making their merits more widely known to the strangers from all parts of the world who will inspect the Bazaar. The pebbles of Perthshire and of the sea-coast would also be attractive. In short, an active committee to obtain subscriptions in money and goods would speedily secure an interesting and varied collection. To do it well, however, an early commencement is necessary. We recommend the subject to the attention of the Leaguers in the important district of which Dundee is the commercial centre.—Dundee Advertiser.

THE LEAGUE AND THE GAME LAWS.—The assault on the Game Laws which the League leaders are about to make in Parliament, and the effective mode in which they have been handling that topic during the last year, furnish not the least striking testimony to the unwearied energy and consummate tact with which that body conducts its fight. The movement of the League leaders on this point is, in short, another proof of the vigilance and sagacity which enable them to do a right thing at a right time—for, at this time of day, it would be all but utterly needless to waste a word in showing the appropriateness with which the assailers of the Corn Laws can assail the Game Laws, and the conjunction of circumstances which render the present moment peculiarly propitious for the assault. The Corn Laws and the Game Laws are kindred and co-operating evils, that will fall by the same hands, and must fall at the same time.—Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle.

CONDITION OF THE WILTSHIRE PEASANTRY.

From a known Correspondent.

January 7, 1845.—I took the road which ascends a somewhat steep hill that divides Pitton from Winterslow. The view from this hill (and there are several such views about this part of the country which is a good deal wooded, and beautifully varied with hill, dale, and water,) is as fine as English scenery often furnishes. When it first opened upon me, the effect of the various colours presented by woodland, pasture, and ploughed land, joined to the very slight haze in the atmosphere natural to a day in the beginning of January, was as if I had come suddenly upon a bay with the sea immediately beneath me. Winterslow is one of those parishes where the village is so scattered that it may be almost said to be coextensive with the parish itself; a circumstance which may add much to the picturesque quality, without, as it appears in this instance, necessarily adding to the comfort, of a village.

The parish of Winterslow is situated in the south of the road leading from Salisbury to London, at the distance of about six or seven miles from Salisbury; and is divided into West Winterslow,* Middle Winterslow, and East Winterslow, or Winterslow Common; the last division principally consisting of enclosed common land. And I may here make the remark, in reference to the question of the benefit arising to the labourers from the enclosure of commons affording them more employment, that I have generally found the labourers worst off in places where there had formerly been much common which was now cultivated; in Winterslow I was informed that there are between thirty and forty out of work, notwithstanding the enclosure of the "Lord's Waste," as the lawyers call the common; and the average wages of those employed as farm-labourers are 7s. a week. But, in fact, the employment of a large proportion of the men is poaching and truffle-hunting: the latter carried on by means of small dogs† carefully trained for the purpose, about the size of, and somewhat resembling, an Isle of Sky terrier. As to the poaching, it is carried on with such vigour and effect that the farmers here have no particular cause to complain of the mischief done them by the game. It seems the labourers find the game a slight corrective for the bad effects of a potato diet. The keeper of a gentleman, who has the shooting over a manor here, brought before his master the other day an old man, aged 70, who had been seen to take a pheasant from a trap. The old man said in his defence, "God bless ye, master! I was forced to try to get something of the sort, for I have been eating nothing but potatoes for the last fortnight: they go through me like water." The gentleman did not follow the examples of severity we frequently hear of, but good-naturedly gave him half-a-crown, and told him to go about his business. But alas! what business had he to go about. His occupation, like that of many of his fellows, is gone, unless poaching be an occupation.

The present proprietors of West Winterslow and Middle Winterslow are Lady Holland, and St. John's College, Oxford. The whole of East Winterslow belongs to Mr. Egerton; and the labourers there are much better off than in West and Middle Winterslow. Most of them live rent free, and have fuel found them by their landlord.

The price of bread in Winterslow is 13d. a gallon, the same bread which is now 11d. a gallon in Salisbury, six miles distant. A man who sold it said he could not get paid, and gave up the trade. He said he lost about £50 before he shut up shop. Another, a relative of this man, said the people had got between £200 and £300 in his debt. The fact is, the people in these parts of the kingdom cannot and do not live on their wages; and the above is only one of the ways in which their wages are eked out so as to enable them to keep body and soul together in the most miserable manner. The following is a labourer's expenditure for one week, together with the prices at which the various articles are selling in Winterslow. Every article is above the market-price in Salisbury:—

Ten 1½ oz. .. ..	0s. 0d.
Soap 1½ lb. .. ..	0 2½
Candles 1½ lb. .. ..	0 4½
Butter 1½ lb. .. ..	1 6
Bacon .. ..	0 6
Bread 4½ gallons .. ..	4 10½
	7 11½

It will be observed that the 7s. are more than exhausted here, and yet nothing is set down for potatoes or for clothes, or rent, or fuel. Even if we cut off the 2s. set down for butter and bacon, thereby reducing the weekly amount to 5s. 11½d., there would be but 1s. 0½d. out of the man's 7s. to pay for clothes, bedding, and fuel. All the harvest earnings go in rent and shoes. Even allowing that the women and children earn something—and they sometimes earn more than they are willing to tell, as I have heard them admit—it will be found extremely difficult to make the two ends meet without leaving a large balance against them on the book of the village shopkeeper, or making up the deficiency from other sources of gain than the wages of labour. Take another case, a family consisting of a man and his wife and six children, the oldest thirteen:—

* In the Parliamentary Return to the Property-tax and Land-tax in 1844, West Winterslow only is specified. Does that include the whole parish?

† One of the species of the natural order Fungi, found buried in the soil of woods, sometimes at the depth of 10 or 12 inches. When gathered for eating it is about the size of a large walnut. The surface is warty, and of a black colour. Pigs are very fond of truffles, and used to be employed for hunting them. But dogs have the same power of scenting truffles, and being more easily trained, are employed to find them, and sometimes to scratch them out of the earth.

‡ One of these dogs, well trained, will sell for £5 or more.

Man's earnings per week	7s. 0d.
1 boy's ditto. .. ..	2 0
	9 0

Weekly expenditure out of this 9s:—

Coals and wood .. ..	1s. 6d.
Flour .. ..	8 0
Yeast .. ..	0 3
Butter .. ..	2 3
Milk .. ..	2 0

This agrees with what I have generally found to be the case, viz., that the labourers, in attempting to give an account of the way in which they spend their wages, make their expenditure exceed their income. In the last-mentioned case, the rent was £3. 10s. a year; and, supposing the harvest earnings to pay that and shoes, we have still no means of accounting for this excess of weekly expenditure over income, or of supplying the family with clothes and even potatoes. They belonged to no club. Their cottage was in a very bad condition. They stated the item of potatoes as uncertain. They had had none for three or four weeks. Notwithstanding the old man's excuse for poaching quoted above, I suspect, from the above and other cases somewhat similar which have fallen under my observation there, that the consumption of potatoes in Winterslow is rather below the average. Beer shops abound too. So that it would seem that poaching and truffle-hunting afford a somewhat more generous diet than ordinary agricultural labour in this part of the kingdom at present.

As for the cottages, I will take upon me to say, that neither Lapland nor America contains huts so well worth the study of the curious in such matters, as some which may be seen at present in the county of Wilts, and parish of Winterslow. They really defy all the powers of description, and, therefore, I have had slight sketches made of a few of them, that the memory of these architectural curiosities may not utterly perish from among men.

The first sketch represents a cottage belonging to St. John's College, the chimney of which fell down some time since, and has not been rebuilt. The thatch of the roof has been continued over the chimney, and the smoke now ascends through it as represented in the sketch. I was informed that a deaf woman was in the house when the chimney fell in, and had only left the chimney corner a moment or two before the accident happened. The efforts of the smoke, accompanied occasionally with sparks or ignited particles, to escape to upper air (often unavailing efforts), and the effect of such an operation upon the interior of the dwelling and on the persons of the inmates (the cottage is built chiefly of wood, the rectangular compartments in the drawing being boards, not stones), afford the learned proprietors the advantage of obtaining a continued series of cheap experiments in natural philosophy, chemistry, and physiology—experimentum in corpore villi. So that here we have an edifying exemplar of their love of science, exhibited on the most economical principles.

—The next sketch represents a cottage belonging to Lady Holland, built of mud; supported by upright and cross pieces of timber, originally forming squares, but now somewhat irregular figures. It is in a wretched condition—a mere ruin. The woman in this hovel said that in the cold weather they paid 2s. a week out of their 7s. for firing, and they had seven or eight children. They had no garden ground, and I think she said their rent was £1 a year: but there was no garden ground attached to it.

The last sketch which I shall give is that of another cottage belonging to St. John's College, Oxford, which I think, on the whole, about the worst that I have seen, either in the parish of Winterslow or in any other part of England, though I have certainly seen some, particularly in the parish of Cranborne, in Dorsetshire, and in the parish of East Lydford, in Somersetshire, that came very near it; but they were not quite in such a deplorable state of dilapidation. The man who first pointed out this cottage to me, said he could drive a horse and cart through it; and really he scarcely exaggerated when he said so. Some of the worst parts are not shown in the sketch. There were holes in the windows large enough to put both hands through; and holes in some parts of the walls large enough to put the whole body through. The roof was also full of holes. The man who lived in it said the rain ran in in a hundred places—that they could not lie in their beds dry. The last woodcut is intended to represent the interior of the principal bedroom (the cottage contained four rooms in all), which it does very imperfectly, as the condition of the thatched roof of the room was a principal feature in its wretched character. This cottage, like the last one, is made of mud, supported by upright and cross pieces of timber, forming squares. In the drawing of the bedroom it will be observed that some of these squares having declined considerably from their original shape, now somewhat resemble large rough, irregular stones. I have met with a good many instances of families (generally those, too, in the coldest and worst dwellings) who had no blankets even in the late severe weather; and of those who had, the best off had not more than two to a bed—frequently but one,—while I believe, most people found three too few in the very cold weather of last month, and that, too, in houses made to keep out the cold, with doors, windows, and chimneys of very different construction from that of the majority of cottages. This family had no blankets. The children (there were seven of them), some in rags and almost naked, cowering round the embers of a fire on the hearth within the large chimney—the only sheltered spot in the house. One poor little thing, a boy about two years old, was playing among the embers, unconscious alike of the dark fate of his race and his own. His little brother had been burnt to death only a short time before, while engaged as he now was. The father said his children were never without colds,—not surprising certainly.

prescribing the separation of parent and child would lose all its harshness, and operate wholly for good.

Before I leave this village of Winterslow, I have one word more to say to its proprietors. What have the landlords, whose rental has nearly quadrupled within the memory of living men, done for the labourers whose hands till the soil that is such a source of profit to them? They have given among them some £80 to a national school, and they have left them to live and die in such hovels as I have attempted to give a faint description of. If this was intended as a slow process of driving them away, by letting their houses gradually crumble into ruin, I cannot help thinking it would have been, upon the whole, better and more humane to drive them at once into Salisbury, as several of the neighbouring landholders have done (a process which is likewise going on vigorously about Dorchester). By this means, the labourers suffer, no doubt, and other classes suffer, by being forced to bear the landlords' burdens. But the difference between the two ways of going to work—though it may make a difference to the inhabitants of the towns or other places to which they are driven, and upon whose poor-rate they will come in time—will hardly amount to a difference to the labourer himself. If allowed to remain in a ruined tenement in the country, he endures sufferings and privations which reduce him to the condition of a savage, and render his life "poor, nasty, brutish, and short." If driven into towns, or into an overcrowded village like Castle Acre, in Norfolk, he may, indeed, often purchase necessities in a cheaper market; but then, on the other hand, he is subjected to the hardships of high rents and too great a distance to walk to his daily work, together with a comparative deprivation of that which is at present his principal nourishment—pure air—and all the evils and vices of an overcrowded population.

SHEFFIELD FREE TRADE ASSOCIATION.

(Abridged from the Sheffield Independent.)

The annual meeting of this association was held in the Cutlers' Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 5th instant, when, in consequence of the absence from home of the President, Edward Vickers, Esq. (one of the Vice-Presidents) took the chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the object of the meeting was to give an account of their proceedings for the past twelve months, and to take measures with a view to their operations for the ensuing year.

Mr. SOLLY read the report. It commenced by referring to the object of calling the general meeting, as noticed by the chairman, and to the formation of a committee in November, 1844, to promote the collection of subscriptions towards the great League fund, when, aided by the visits and addresses of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, they had raised a sum of £1334. 5s. 9d. In November last the committee took into consideration the best mode of extending the registration of Free Trade votes for the West Riding; the plans of the League, as explained by Mr. Cobden and Mr. Moore, had been carried out as far as possible, and the addition of Free Trade electors was considerable. Numerous small companies were formed, containing from ten to twenty five individuals each, who have purchased lots of freehold property in common. The report congratulated the meeting on various public circumstances indicating the spread of sound views of political economy, both in the Government and the community; and having emphatically appealed to various classes of society to give their support to the principles of Free Trade, concluded as follows:—

"That the greater part of the educated classes in Sheffield are favourable to the adoption of Free Trade, last year's liberal subscriptions to the League have placed beyond a doubt; but are they willing to devote any time and personal trouble to hasten its attainment? Do our merchants and manufacturers, and shopkeepers and artisans, reflect that, although the state of the town is materially improved in consequence of the late abundant harvests, bad harvests will again recur in the usual course of nature, and with them bad trade, bad debts, heavy poor-rates, shops shut up, houses unlet, manufactories empty, unions, hospitals, and gaols crowded, and our skilled workmen breaking stones on the roads, or sweeping the streets, as heretofore? All these things they know must come to pass again, as surely as winter succeeds autumn, unless these law-made distresses be forestalled by the previous abolition of the Corn Laws. To every man who entertains this conviction, it becomes a part of the duty which he owes to himself, to his family, and to society, to co-operate actively with the measures of this association; and we venture to hope that the support and countenance which it will experience this year will prove the public spirit of our town to be in no degree inferior to that of others in the riding."

"Whatever victories may be gained, whatever progress made, in other parts of the kingdom, it behoves us never to relax our exertions, so long as our county representation continues to run the risk of being ever again rendered instrumental in the ruin and degradation of our industry."

Mr. HUMPHSON moved the adoption of the report. He believed the people of Sheffield were fully alive to the mischief that the restrictions on trade inflicted on them. He felt convinced that there was no manufacturing town in the kingdom where a larger proportion of the people were convinced that the Corn Law was most mischievous to their interests. Nor was there, he believed, any town where they did more injury than in Sheffield. The average consumption of Sheffield goods was larger in foreign markets than in our own. Leeds relied most upon the home market. Manchester goods were sold to the greatest extent, he believed, at home. But Sheffield relied for a market for the greater part of its goods on foreign consumption. There was another reason why Sheffield should be particularly active. In Manchester and Leeds the trade depended greatly on machinery. Sheffield depended more on manual labour, and, therefore, ran the greater risk of losing its trade by the operation of the Corn Laws. They had been told that foreign nations

He said he paid £1 a year. There is a considerable piece of ground attached, and a well, for the use of which the cottagers pay 1s. a year; but the man said a new rope and other repairs took all he got for this. He said he paid £5. 1s. 6d. till the house got so bad. But as I had not an opportunity of testing his statements by the authority of the person to whom he paid the rent, and as his character is not a good one, I do not implicitly rely on the statement as to the rent. But whatever may be the rent, or the character of the tenants, there can be no excuse for the landlord, who, under any circumstances, allows human beings to linger out their miserable lives in hovels unfit for the abode of well-conditioned pigs.

There is almost a tragic interest about the history of the inmates of this miserable cottage. Not that I would hold up the head of the family as a fair sample of the depressed condition of the agricultural labourer, for he is not strictly an agricultural labourer, living in fact by traffic-hunting partly, and perhaps partly by poaching; and even in Winterslow he bears a character pre-eminently bad; but I cannot help thinking that under a better social system,—a system in which the principle that "property has its duties as well as rights" were not only recognized but acted upon,—a system under which one class would not have the power of making all the laws for all classes,—such a being as the beer-shop-haunting renter of this "fretted tenement" would be somewhat less bad, and his poor family somewhat less miserable. Rather less than three weeks ago I visited the same cottage, and found the children, who had recently lost their mother, under the care of their eldest sister, a girl about seventeen. I was now informed that this girl was dead and buried. She had gone to a gentleman's house, at a little distance, to beg, and standing about two hours in the cold and the wet, she caught a cold, which, from the state of the cottage, insufficient covering (there were no blankets), and the want of necessities, turned into a fever and carried her off in about ten days. According to the report I heard, she died raving mad. Poor thing! Her life had been short and miserable. Better to be in the grave than to go on living thus.

It is fearful to think of the present condition and the future fate of the poor children who remain. I hope that the reverend owners of the miserable abode in which these children have suffered so much, and who profess themselves the disciples of Him who sought to clothe the naked and feed the hungry, will make some atonement for their past neglect of their duty as landlords, by doing something for this miserable family. They would, indeed, be infinitely better in the union than there; and in their case the rule would not reciprocate if Free Trade were adopted. He was in America when the present tariff was under discussion. Lord Ashburton was there at the same time, and when he came home he told the House of Lords that the American tariff was for revenue and not for retaliation. Lord Wharncliffe confirmed this assertion. He (Mr. Ibbotson) was surprised that noble lords should make such mistakes. He had conversed on the subject with Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State to the President, and with the officer of a much more important body, the Secretary of the Protection Society, which had recently had a meeting of 2000 delegates. He attended some of the meetings of this body, and argued with some of its members privately. They admitted to him that their tariff was for protection and retaliation. These men were the real framers of the tariff. They had laid a duty of 80 per cent. on screws. On cross-cut saws, which cost 5s. 6d., they had a duty of 4s. 6d. The same might be said of many other articles. Mr. Webster himself had declared that it was a tariff of protection, and that revenue was a secondary consideration. He had asked the Secretary of the Protection Society, why they had no larger a duty than 30 per cent. generally on Sheffield goods? He replied, that it was because 30 per cent. was enough; that they could just as easily have had 40, but it was their object not to levy higher duties than they needed, lest it should excite opposition; that they must give time for their own manufactures to become established; and that 30 per cent. would enable them in a few years entirely to exclude us. When manufactures were once established in America, it would be no easy thing to uproot them, though the danger might have been averted by taking their produce in time. He had been assured by the Secretary of the American Protection Society, that they were still ready to reciprocate, if we would only open our ports to their productions; and he contended that Sir Robert Peel's new tariff, though more liberal than the former, was not more liberal to America than their tariff was to us. He concluded by moving the resolution. (Cheers.)

Mr. JOHN WM. SMITH said, he had the more pleasure in seconding the motion, as it gave him the opportunity of testifying the respect they all owed to the Secretary, whose high intelligence and enlarged information had been brought to bear upon it.

The motion was carried unanimously.

In the unavoidable absence of Mr. Hargreaves, the treasurer, the statement of accounts was read by Mr. YROMANS.

A vote of thanks to the officers of the past year was moved by Mr. Ald. T. B. FURTON, seconded by Mr. JOHNSON, and carried unanimously.

Ald. BUTCHER moved that Wm. Fisher, Esq., be elected President; Edward Smith and R. Vickers, Esqrs., Vice-Presidents; Messrs. Solly, Broadbent, and Yeomans, Honorary Secretaries; and a list of gentlemen as the Committee.

Mr. BEAL, in seconding the motion, made some general remarks on the question of Free Trade. He combated several fallacies put forward by the operatives of Sheffield, one of whom, in the recent discussion with Mr. Ward, had attempted to account for the improvement among the working classes to trades' unions, whereas it had arisen from increased trade, springing from the diminished price of provisions. He also replied to a pamphlet written by a Chartist named Campbell, who had contended that machinery was an evil, and had shown from tables of prices that wages were higher now than they were twenty years ago. It was said that Free Trade would injure the home market for our goods. But the fact was, that that market was composed principally of persons who lived by manufactures and commerce. From the census of 1841, it appeared that the male population employed in agriculture was 1,213,264, which was but about the same number as ten years before, and showed no increase. But those employed in manufactures were 2,039,400, or nearly double the number employed in agriculture; and this class had increased during the ten years by half a million. In point of number, then, the manufacturing population were the best customers of the manufacturers. Besides, he asked, how much did they suppose the helots of British husbandry consumed of manufactured goods? A labourer in husbandry bought, perhaps, a pocket-knife once in seven years, or half a dozen bone-handled knives and forks once in a generation. The trade with the agricultural districts was almost wholly carried on by hawkers and pedlars, and consisted of the lowest kind of goods. It was the manufacturing population who purchased goods in the greatest quantity, and of the best quality. The best customers of the artisans of Sheffield were their brethren of the cotton, the woollen, the silk, the flax, and other trades, with the mercantile and trading classes generally. Some years ago, it had been computed in America that 500 manufacturing families consumed as many manufactured goods as 2000 agricultural families. He had no doubt the same proportions held good here, and this further confirmed him in saying to the manufacturing operatives, Your best customers in the home market are your brethren in trade and commerce. (Cheers.) Having touched on other points of the question, Mr. Beal concluded by enforcing the claims of commerce, which had created the greatness and power of England; and which was the pioneer of peace, of knowledge, and of human advancement. (Loud cheers.)

The resolution was put and carried.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the next resolution, commending the approaching Bazaar of the League to the attention of all the friends of Free Trade, and urging all classes to promote it liberally.

Mr. W. ATKINSON seconded the motion. He rejoiced to learn that the subject of the Bazaar had been taken up with great spirit in all parts of the country, and that the contributions would be of a splendid and extensive character. In Glasgow, a subscription in aid of the Bazaar had been commenced, which already amounted to £600. He hoped Sheffield would not be behindhand. He was glad to learn that a committee of ladies was busily engaged, and he hoped that their efforts would be seconded by the merchants, the manufacturers, and artisans. He trusted that the Sheffield stall would exhibit such a variety of superior articles as should justify and excite the population of its manufactures. (Cheers.)

In answer to a question, Mr. SOLLY stated, that he was not aware of any regulation that if the articles of a contributory contributed articles to the Bazaar, to the value of 50s., they would be entitled to a copy of the Bazaar for a year; but he was satisfied that such an arrangement might be made, by any parties who desired it, on communicating with Mr. Saul, the secretary, at the office in Fleet-street, London.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. W. JACKSON moved,—

"That it especially behoves this association to promote the qualification and registration of electors for the West Riding; and that the committee be requested to give their earnest attention to this subject."

Mr. SOLLY seconded the resolution.

Alderman G. TAYLOR moved that the committee be instructed to take measures to collect subscriptions in order to enable them to carry out the objects of the preceding resolution.

The motion was seconded by Mr. ROPER, and carried unanimously.

Mr. ROBERT LEADER, jun., moved,—

"That this association entertains entire confidence in the Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League; after whose example this meeting recommends to the friends of Free Trade never to relax their efforts until all laws favouring class interests be erased from the British statute-book."

The motion was seconded by Mr. ACORN, and carried unanimously.

After a vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Mr. ATKINSON, and seconded by Mr. JOHNSON, the meeting concluded about half-past nine.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE MANCHESTER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

ELECTION OF DIRECTORS.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

On Monday last the annual meeting of this body took place. After the transaction of various matters—

The CHAIRMAN said the next business would be to elect directors for the ensuing year. He read over a list of twenty-four directors, of whom seventeen were directors of the past year, and seven were new, viz., Messrs. John Crichton (of Staleybridge), Robert Gladstone, John Macvicar, Henry Newbery, John Peel, Sallis Schwabe, and J. A. Turner; and Mr. Boothman explained that it was a rule of the chamber that six members, who had attended the fewest times during the year, should retire, and be ineligible for one year; in addition to whom, on this occasion, Mr. Alderman Willert wished to retire, being unable to attend. There were, therefore, seven new names proposed for election.—The CHAIRMAN put each name separately, in alphabetical order. Mr. Henry Ashworth and Mr. James Atherton were elected, and the chairman's own name standing third was put, when Mr. E. Evans asked if the negative should not be put in each case. The CHAIRMAN then put the negative; but he was re-elected a director without a dissentient hand; and so was the next named, Mr. Robert Benson. On the fifth name, that of Mr. Richard Birley, being put,—

Mr. J. B. SMITH rose, and was for a few seconds inaudible. He was, however, understood to say,—Before that name be put to the meeting, I beg to submit to the chamber whether or not it can be consistently proposed. ("Speak up.") I admit that Mr. Birley, from his connexion with one of the largest manufacturing concerns in the town, from his character and from his respectability, is a very fit gentleman to be a member of the direction of this chamber; but, as I cannot forget that this chamber has over and over again declared that Free Trade is of paramount importance to the welfare and prosperity of this manufacturing and commercial community (hear), I would ask, Sir, how are we to obtain Free Trade? I know no other means of obtaining it except by sending to Parliament members who will vote for Free Trade. (Hear.) We had a few months ago an opportunity of that kind, an election for the southern division of the county of Lancaster; and on that occasion it was gratifying to see great numbers of gentlemen preferring the interests of their country to the indulgence of party feeling, and voting for a gentleman of whose party-politics they disapproved, but who held the principles of Free Trade. (Hear.) On that occasion Mr. Birley distinguished himself by being the leader of the monopolist party; he was the active and indefatigable chairman of the monopolist candidate, and I believe, by his exertions, greatly contributed to the success of that candidate. Now, I don't blame Mr. Birley for the part he took on that occasion; he has a right freely to give expression to his feelings and opinions, and to act as he pleases on such occasions; but, when he is put forward as a candidate for the direction of this chamber, then I have a right to ask whether Mr. Birley approves of the votes of his representative, as given in Parliament upon Free-Trade questions; and I beg to ask Mr. Birley that question, whether he does approve of those votes?

Mr. BIRLEY: Finish your speech, Sir, and then I will answer you.

Mr. J. B. SMITH: If Mr. Birley approves of the votes which his representative in Parliament has given, then I hold that the chamber cannot consistently elect him one of its directors. (Hear.) But if he does not approve of those votes—for I have heard, Sir, that Mr. Birley, although he supported a monopolist candidate, holds the principles of Free Trade—if it be so, then, by being a director of this chamber, he places himself in a very anomalous situation. This chamber has been in the habit, every year, of petitioning for Free-Trade objects; those petitions are signed by the president, vice-president, and the directors. If Mr. Birley be one of the directors of this chamber, Mr. Birley, in the Chamber of Commerce, will petition for a repeal of the Corn Laws; but Mr. Birley, by his representative in the House of Commons, votes against his own petition. (Hear, hear.) (On the sugar duties Mr. Birley, in the chamber, signs a petition for the equalization of the sugar and coffee duties; but Mr. Birley, by his representative in the House of Commons, again votes against his own petition. (Hear.) And more than that, if there be two questions, if a proposition be brought forward that the amount of monopoly should be diminished, then Mr. Birley, by his representative, votes for the largest amount of monopoly, and not for the smallest. (Hear.) Now, this is no supposititious case, but what absolutely occurred in the last session of Parliament. Mr. Birley's representative in Parliament on that occasion stated, that he felt it to be his duty to vote for the largest amount of monopoly. Now, Sir, Mr. Birley has a perfect right to act in this contradictory manner if chosen; but I think, on reflection, he will see that he has placed himself in a false position by so all events, I shall be very much mistaken if this chamber be so very inconsistent as to follow his example; and after their declaration that Free Trade is of paramount importance to the interest and welfare of this community, they should elect—they should take the first opportunity of conferring distinction upon that gentleman, who has done all he could to oppose the object which they seek. (Hear.) I beg, therefore, to move, that in place of Mr. Richard Birley—a gentleman to whom there can be no objection on any other account—and to show that I have no feeling of party in the matter, for the Free-Traders have long since repudiated party (hear, hear)—I shall propose a gentleman who is a Conservative in principle, but also a Free-Trader. I propose Mr. Thomas Barnes in lieu of Mr. Birley.

Mr. D. AINSWORTH: I beg to second the motion.

Mr. BIRLEY: I was asked a question, Sir, which I can answer very shortly, and that is, whether I approve of the vote given by Mr. Entwistle on the sugar duties in Parliament; and I would distinctly answer, that I do not approve of it. (Hear.) That was the question. I should have taken very little notice of the speech of Mr. Smith myself, if I had not felt it right that a person proposed as a director should state distinctly what his opinions are in such a case as this. But there is one remark which he had no right to make. He talks of parties preferring the interests of their country to party politics. I most distinctly state that, in any thing I have done in any election, I had just as much regard to the welfare of the country as he has, or any one in this room. (Hear, hear.) It is rather difficult to explain one's opinions fully without taking some little time, and I shall be obliged if you will listen with patience; and it is quite immaterial to me, after stating what I have to state, whether you elect me a director or not. If you do elect me, I shall endeavour to do my duty; if you do not, I shall be perfectly content to retire. In the first place, I quite concur with all those gentlemen in this room who disapprove of the principle of protection (hear, hear); and I say so without the slightest reserve in any way. (Hear, hear.) I have no reserve to make at all upon the Corn Laws, and I don't in the least consider it is necessary to wait for reciprocity treaties with other countries before you adopt the principles of Free Trade yourselves (hear, hear); on the contrary, Sir, I think that the sooner we can come with safety to a system of no protection, it will be all the better for this country. (Hear, hear.) Long as it has been the practice of this country to have protective duties, I don't consider that protective duties are at all in accordance with the national character. Englishmen, generally, love competition; they don't wish to be dependent in any way; and it is a very extraordinary thing that the protective system should have continued so long in this country. It arose at the close of the war, when probably men thought that a state of war was to be the rule, and a state of peace the exception; but since that time a great deal of experience has been gained, and we are gradually approaching to sounder principles upon trade. There are two reasons, and, I believe, only two, why protection was given to land. The one was to enable a greater quantity of the produce of the earth to be grown in this country, and so to protect us from the danger of being dependent upon foreign countries; another was to give the agricultural labourer more employment. Now, I have heard of no sound reasons for carrying that out, except those two; and I believe it will be found, that the reasons given and the objects intended by protecting corn have totally and signally failed. (Hear, hear.) I believe if the agriculturists, whether landowners or farmers, had been left to themselves, we should have had a much greater quantity of corn grown (hear, hear); and I am led to believe it from the speeches I have read of Lord Stanley, at the Liverpool agricultural dinner, and of Sir Robert Peel, at Tamworth, in which they urge upon the landlords and farmers to improve cultivation and grow more,—not to rely upon protection, but upon their own exertions. The other point, that with regard to the advantage to the labourer, I think has also signally failed. I remember twelve years ago, when the Duke of Richmond was in Manchester, that he said he wished the Sussex peasantry were half as well off as the Manchester labourers; and I remember well the proud look of Lord Stanley when he said to him, "I thought we should astonish you, when we brought you into Lancashire." I observed them very closely; and I am satisfied that, under a fairer system of trade, our manufactures would extend, and we should be able to afford more employment to the agricultural labourers than they get in their own district; and, more than that, if the landowners and farmers—for I class them together—if the landowners of this country had paid more attention to the cultivation of their land, they would have employed more persons in draining and improving that land than at present, and, therefore, the condition of the labourer would have been advanced. There is another social point where I think a great advantage would accrue to this country if there was no protection to the landowners. The landowners, being taught to rely upon their own exertions, would probably have paid some little more attention to us who are engaged in business. They would have learned better habits of business than they now acquire; and I do think that the communication which would have been brought about between the landowners and the commercial classes would have been very beneficial to both parties. I think there would not have been that obduracy, on the part of the landowners, to put their sons into business; and they would not have been brought into business, and enabled them to get a much better living than they were able to obtain in the army, the church, and the navy, where many became exceedingly discontented and envious of our prosperity. Having shown you what are my views on Free Trade, I say that I am as anxious as anybody to see these principles carried out (hear, hear); but I cannot go the pace in carrying them out that other parties can; and that constitutes the difference of opinion on Free Trade between me and the gentlemen of the Anti-Corn-Law League. I conceived, in the course I took at the last election, that I was sending the gentlemen of intelligence and ability to Parliament, who would support the Government in their course of Free-Trade legislation. We have gone over this morning, preparatory to this general meeting, the proceedings of the chamber during the last year; and we have many of us agreed that, since the year 1842, when the present legislation came into force, they have progressed towards the Trade; and there is every expectation that, during this session, still further progress will be made. I do not myself approve of a sliding scale; I would much rather have a fixed duty; but, at the same time, I must say this, that I have great confidence in the head of her Majesty's Government. I consider him a Minister well capable of conducting the affairs of Government, and one who will not lose sight of Free Trade, but who will progress towards a Free Trade as quickly as he considers he can do so with safety. Those are my views, gentlemen; and I have distinctly told you that I disapprove—for that was asked of me very pointedly—of the vote which Mr. Entwistle gave on the sugar duties.

Mr. J. B. SMITH: Of all his votes?

Mr. BIRLEY: He only voted on that question.

Mr. SMITH: Yes, he voted against Mr. Villiers's motion on the Corn Laws.

Mr. BIRLEY: Oh! I quite approve of that; I should have done the same myself. ("Hear," and laughter.) I tell you plainly, that I should not approve of a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws; I say this most decidedly. I think you would cause a very great confusion in the country, and that we can extremely well afford to wait. I will go further than that, and I say that those gentlemen who would most profit by a removal of protection, ought to show a little more mercy and tenderness towards those who will suffer by the change. I don't say they would suffer permanently; but I do say that the landowners would suffer temporarily very much by such a change.

After Mr. Birley's reply a lengthy discussion took place, which was conducted in a temperate and amicable manner, the principal speakers being Mr. Malcolm Ross, Mr. W. Harvey, Mr. W. R. Callender, Mr. Lewis Williams, and Mr. Gibb, against the amendment; and Mr. William Evans, Mr. Rawson, Mr. Thomas Thomasson, and Mr. J. B. Smith in support of it.

After a lengthy conversational discussion, Mr. J. B. SMITH, amidst several calls to withdraw the amendment, rose to reply, and said:—I may be excused if I wish that the chamber should not stultify itself in the eyes of the world. I believe, it is about sixteen years to-day since I first had the honour of bringing before the chamber the question of the corn monopoly. At that time not a single individual supported me; I could not get a seconder; but for several years I persevered, and the eyes of the chamber being at length opened to the enormous injury which the country had sustained by this monopoly, I confess I am very jealous now, lest it should go back again. (Hear.) And when I now hear Mr. Birley say that he is not for a total repeal of the Corn Laws—

Mr. BIRLEY: I said total and immediate.

Mr. J. B. SMITH: Well, for their total and immediate repeal, and when he talks about the injury the landowners would sustain by immediate repeal, and forgets the injuries which millions of our fellow-countrymen have been suffering from the Corn Laws (hear); when he forgets the injury and the suffering that have been experienced in this country for the last ten years from these Corn Laws; and when he puts the interests of the landlords forward, in preference to the interests of humanity, I confess I am surprised; but I am gratified that the discussion has taken place, because it has elicited from Mr. Birley sentiments with respect to Free Trade with which I was not previously acquainted. (Hear.) But, after all, it appears to me that they are merely sentiments of Free Trade in the abstract. Mr. Birley has not stated, that if another election takes place, he would not again support and send to Parliament the gentleman whom he has now sent to Parliament as his representative. (Hear.) Mr. Birley states that he does not approve of that gentleman's vote on the sugar duties. Why, that gentleman, when he first of all voted against Ministers on the sugar duties, preferring the higher monopoly, at that time made a speech accusing himself for having so voted, but still saying he would not commit himself to those in whose hands protection would not be safe (the Ministers), and having done so, he had not the courage to vote a second time, but walked out of the House. Now, if Mr. Birley is prepared to say that, in the event of another election, he regrets the course he took before, and would not support such a gentleman, I should be inclined to withdraw my motion; but if he supports and assists to send representatives to Parliament who vote against the very measure which this chamber considers of paramount importance, I say that the chamber is stultifying itself in the eyes of the world to elect Mr. Birley as a director; and, therefore, with that opinion, I cannot withdraw my amendment unless Mr. Birley gives me a satisfactory answer.

The CHAIRMAN: I think you cannot, in propriety, ask Mr. Birley such a question as that.

Mr. SMITH: Very well; then I will press my motion.

Mr. WILLIAM GIBB rose; and the CHAIRMAN said, Mr. Smith had replied; but Mr. Gibb said, his object was simply to protest against what he called a great hardship, that any vote which any man might give for a parliamentary representative should preclude him from being a director of this chamber.

Mr. J. B. SMITH said that Mr. Gibb was very irregular to speak after he had replied.

The CHAIRMAN said he wished every gentleman to have an opportunity to express his opinions, and Mr. Smith should have a second reply.

Mr. Gibb continued. He regretted exceedingly that Mr. Smith and the other gentlemen who assisted him in this matter, who had always been held in this town, and had proclaimed themselves to be, gentlemen of liberality of sentiment,—he regretted to see them coming forward, and showing what he must term the gross illiberality, which he would almost call tyranny, to say that, because a man did not think on all questions as they did, they were to put him out of a sphere of usefulness in the town to which he belonged. They had very properly been told that this chamber took up various questions of trade and commerce, and not merely that of the Corn Laws. Yet, because Mr. Birley could not come to a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, though he wanted to arrive at it as quickly as possible, but because he did not immediately agree with Mr. Smith and others, he was to be discarded from his sphere of usefulness in this chamber. He would say sincerely, that he believed Mr. Birley was as anxious to work as rapidly in that way as any gentleman present; and altogether, considering the fact that Mr. Birley was the right way, and that he had been a useful member of the board of directors—to which he (Mr. Gibb) could bear his most decided testimony—he must confess that it seemed to him to be one of those attempts of tyranny—(No, no.)

Mr. THOMAS THOMASSON, of Bolton, wished merely to demur to the term "tyranny" being used by Mr. Gibb. (Hear.) He presumed that the chamber had been established for certain purposes, and that its objects were developed in its report; and, if that report expressed bona fide the opinion of the chamber, it was right that its directors, who were to carry out practically those opinions, should bona fide entertain similar opinions. Now, it did not appear to him to be the case in the instance of Mr. Birley. The chamber had repeatedly petitioned for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. Mr. Birley was not in favour of total and immediate repeal; therefore the term tyranny was not applicable at all. (Hear.) Mr. Birley, he presumed, in the opinion of that assembly—although eminently and highly qualified in other respects—yet upon that, by far the most important object that could come before the chamber, did not entertain the opinions of the chamber; and therefore, without any tyranny, he was not rejected, but he was not selected, as a director.

Mr. BIRLEY: Allow me to say, that I do not feel at all that there is any tyranny in the matter. The members of the chamber have a perfect right to elect me or not, as they think fit. They have given me a very fair hearing: I have had an opportunity of stating my opinions, and I am much obliged to them for their patience in hearing me. My friends may think it tyranny; but I assure you I don't. In order to shorten the discussion, perhaps you will allow me to say, that I most distinctly decline to pledge myself to any course at any future election. I am one of those who disapprove of pledges. I disapprove of pledging a candidate, and I much more disapprove of pledging an elector as to whom he should vote for.

Mr. J. B. SMITH: I have only one observation to make as regards Mr. Gibb. I think he has been answered as regards tyranny; and I do not consider any tyranny is exercised, when a gentleman is nominated, and you choose to elect some other in his place. It is altogether an improper term. But Mr. Gibb reminds me of a speech of Mr. Birley, on the occasion of presenting a piece of plate to Mr. Gibb as a reward for his exertions on the bonding question. On that occasion, Mr. Birley made a speech, in which he stated that, when he went round canvassing for a parliamentary candidate, Mr. Gibb stated to him that he should not vote against Mr. Mark Philips, although he differed with him in politics.

Mr. BIRLEY: No; that is not correct; it is not reported quite correctly. Mr. Gibb did not say that he should not vote against Mr. Philips; he said he really did not see how he could vote against him; he did not pledge himself; and I really do not know how he did vote; but I do not remember Mr. Gibb telling me that he was really pledged to vote for him.

Mr. SMITH: All I wish is, that Mr. Birley should act as Mr. Gibb has acted; and that, when the question of Free Trade occurs, he should lay aside his party politics as Mr. Gibb did, in order to attain a greater object. ("Question," and "Vote.")

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Smith, will you withdraw your motion?

Mr. SMITH: No, Sir.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS: Oh! I regret that very much.

Mr. SMITH: I exceedingly regret this on personal grounds.

Mr. BIRLEY: Perhaps I may be allowed to say to Mr. Smith, personally, I do not concur with you in the opinion as to the Corn Laws being the cause of the distress of this town and neighbourhood.

Mr. SMITH: I don't see any mode by which we can obtain Free Trade if we elect members who vote against it. I will not now go into a discussion on the Corn Laws.

Mr. BIRLEY: I merely wish to state, that I desire to guard against the notion that I was not one of those who felt for the distress which the working people suffered; but I do not believe, and did not believe, that the Corn Law was the cause of that distress.

The CHAIRMAN then put the amendment for the election of Mr. Thomas Barnes, and declared it to be carried. He did not state the numbers; but we believe they were 31 for the amendment; 12 against it.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, Thursday, Feb. 13.
BOROUGH OF LICHFIELD.

Marshall, appellant; Bown, respondent.

At the revision court, held last October, for the borough of Lichfield, William Marshall duly objected to John Bown and five other persons, as not being entitled to vote in respect of property situate within the parish of St. Michael. The revising barrister retained all the names, subject to the opinion of the court on the following case.

The borough of the city of Lichfield is a county of itself, and prior to the passing of the 2nd William IV., cap. 46, freeholders had the right to vote in the election of members for the said city.

It was proved that six persons claimed to vote in respect of the same house, situate in St. John-street, Lichfield, and that they had become joint occupiers of it under the following circumstances.

Prior to Lady-day, 1843, one William Gorton contracted in his own name with the then proprietors of the house for the purchase of it at the sum of £292. 5s., and having, after such contract, bona fide sold the house to John Bown and the five other persons in equal shares, a conveyance of it from the vendors to the claimants was made for the consideration of £292. 5s. The purchase money was paid to the vendors by the hand of William Gorton, but was the money of the claimant. The object of William Gorton in proposing the purchase to the claimants was to increase the number of votes for the borough; and it was also proved that the claimants would not have purchased the property unless it had been a good investment of their money. All the claimants had been in the receipt of 50s. a year up to the 31st of last July. It was objected that the conveyance of the house under the above circumstances was void and of none effect by the provisions of the 7th and 8th Wm. III., c. 25, s. 7, as being made to them in order to multiply voters and to split and divide the interest in such house, and that under the said act no more than one single vote ought to be admitted for the said house.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the conveyance of the house to the claimants was void and of none effect under the statute 7th and 8th William III., c. 25, s. 7, and whether, under that statute, the claimants were entitled to have their names retained on the list.

There were five other persons objected to in another parish under the same circumstances as above, and are to abide the decision of the court in the former case.

The case was heard last Michaelmas term, and the court now delivered its judgment.

Lord Chief Justice TINDAL said:—The objection taken against the claim of John Bown, and the several other persons mentioned in the case, to the right of voting as freeholders in the election of members for the city of Lichfield was this: that the five persons therein named claimed to vote in respect of the sale of a freehold house, and that the conveyance to these persons was void, under the provision of the 7th and 8th William III., c. 25, which enacts that all conveyances, "in order to multiply voices, or to split and divide the interest, in any house or land, among several persons, to enable them to vote at elections of members to serve in Parliament, are hereby declared to be void and of none effect." The argument before us proceeds on the supposition that the facts presented by the case brought it within the enactment of the statute; and we were called upon to give a legal construction to this statute, with reference to the subsequent question whether a bona fide conveyance, where money was really paid by the purchasers, where there was no secret trust or reservation in favour of the seller, but where the object of the conveyance was in order to multiply voices, and to split and divide the interests, fell within the provision of the statute. Whenever that question comes before us we shall be prepared to give an opinion upon it; but as we think the facts stated in this case do not raise the question, it would be premature to do so on the present occasion, for we think that the obvious meaning of the statute is, that, in order to make a conveyance void, the party conveying must be privy to the legal object and intention of the conveyance; for, indeed, it would seem an unreasonable construction, and never to have been the intention of the Legislature, that a person who sold his property bona fide to more than one purchaser, with no intention himself, or any knowledge of the object and intention of the purchaser, in making the purchase to avoid the statute, at any distance of time, found this conveyance of the land turned back upon his hands, and himself liable to refund the purchase-money on account of having subsequently discovered that the purchase was made by several persons in order to multiply votes. And the necessity for this proceeding on the part of the seller appears from the subsequent statute, the 10th of Anne, which, after reciting the statute of William III., and that it was made for the more effectually preventing of such undue practices and proceedings, proceeds to make a provision for such case in which the object of the conveyance or assignment cannot but be known to the party who conveys the estate. It still further appears, from the statute 53rd Geo. III., which enacts that devises made for the same purposes shall be taken to be conveyances within the meaning of the former statute. Now, looking to the case before us, there is not only no statement of the fact, but we have no reason to infer that the former proprietors (who were the conveying parties) had any knowledge of what the object was for which the house was purchased at the time of executing the conveyance to the five persons. Gorton contracted, in his own name, with the then proprietors for the purchase of the house; such proprietors having, it appears, no knowledge whatever of the five persons to whom conveyances were afterwards made, and up to the time of the conveyance itself. Then Gorton, bona fide, entering into a contract, sold the house to Bown and the other five persons; so that as to the argument on the part of the appellant, that Gorton must be considered as the seller, it appears to us that the conveyance would be made void, as he had nothing to convey; therefore the case does not appear to us to fall within the statute. We are of opinion that the case taken by the revising barrister never, in fact, arose; and, without going into the merits of the case, we think that the name of the claimant and the other persons are properly retained on the list; and, therefore, affirm the revising barrister's decision.

PRICES OF CORN.—HAMBURG, Feb. 6.—Wheat, Polish, 85 to 122; Anhalt and Magdeburg, red, 78 to 90; ditto, white, 88 to 112; Marks and Brunswick, 78 to 40; Silesian, yellow, 77 to 90; ditto, white, 85 to 116; Mecklenburgh and Pomeranian, 68 to 100; Holstein, 60 to 80; Elder and Busum, 68 to 85; Lower Elbe, 65 to 78.

STOPPAGE OF THE MILLS AT HEYWOOD, BURY.—The hands at all the mills in Heywood left their work last night, the terms of arrangement offered by the masters having been rejected. The masters have posted large placards throughout the town and neighbourhood, of which the following is a copy:—"Many erroneous reports having been circulated relative to the earnings of the weavers late in the employ of Messrs. John Hilton, Kay, and Son, the committee of the Millowners' Association think it necessary, in justice to those gentlemen, to lay before the public a statement of such earnings, as copied from the wages books for the fortnight ending the 22nd of November last (being what may be called the last full fortnight previous to the turn-out). The following are the averages:—For 54 two-loom weavers, per fortnight, 19s. 1d. per week, 9s. 6½d. For 56 three-loom weavers, average per fortnight, £1. 8s. 8d.; per week, 14s. 4d. For 23 four-loom weavers, £1. 6s. 6½d.; per week, 12s. 8½d. N.B. There are no abatements from the above, except for spoiled work, and the whole deductions on that day amounted to only £1. 8s. 9d. The earnings, as stated above, were obtained at the prices per cut paid previously to the weavers turning out; and from the amount, the public will be able to judge whether such a stoppage was justifiable or not. Since the turn out, however, the Messrs. Kay, wishing to put an end to such a state of things, and also to prevent a more general stoppage of mills in the neighbourhood on their account, have made several attempts to come to terms with their weavers, but hitherto without success."—Friday evening. The turn-outs have posted copies of a placard throughout the town this afternoon, intended as a reply to the statements of the masters. It gives the amount of wages paid by Messrs. Hilton, Kay, and Son, for the fortnight ending the 17th of December, as for 59 two-loom weavers, average 9s. 1d. per week; and 41 three-loom weavers, average 12s. 8½d. per week. According to the masters, however, this was not a full fortnight, and hence the difference.—Manchester Guardian, Feb. 6.

ERRATA.

In LEAGUE No. 72, for Black, Alexander, Shaw-place, Greenock, read Black, Archibald; for Darby, Abraham, Coalbrookdale, read Darby, Abraham; and for Macintyre, John, Midclder, read Macintyre, James J.

Hull, Feb. 11.

Sir,—I believe my subscription does not end till the 21st of this month; however, I send you a Post-office order for 20s. towards the League fund; I only wish I could make it £100. My brother farmers in Holderness are beginning to grow; they are, however, very unwilling to confess they have been made dupes of by their landlords; sooner or later, truth will come out; the process is too slow, many of us must be ruined before the consummation. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. S.—O.

On Thursday last, Mr. BRIGHT, M.P., gave notice that he should move on Thursday, the 27th inst., for a Select Committee on the GAME LAWS.

Mr. BRIGHT'S MOTION ON THE GAME LAWS.—The New Farmers' Journal, a supporter of the Corn Laws, comes openly out in support of Mr. Bright's forthcoming motion, and remarks: "No half measure of amendment will do. To be at once effectual and satisfactory, the question both of preserving and killing game must be dealt with in a spirit of impartial justice to all whose interests are concerned."

SWANSEA.—A meeting of gentlemen favourable to Free Trade was held on Tuesday evening last, in aid of the Free-Trade Bazaar. Mr. Jenkins, the League agent, was present, and gave explanations of its objects, &c. It was resolved that a committee of gentlemen be formed to aid the objects of the Bazaar, and that the League circulars be addressed to the ladies of Swansea and its vicinity, accompanied by a request that they would become contributors to the first of charities—that of doing justice. Mr. Joseph Rutter and Mr. Jenkins were appointed receivers of contributions.

FARNHAM.—Mr. Falvey delivered a lecture on the evils of the Corn Laws, in the Farnham Institution, on Friday evening, the 7th instant. George Cope, Esq., was called to the chair, and opened the proceedings in a clear and convincing speech in favour of Free Trade. At the close of Mr. Falvey's address, votes of thanks were carried by acclamation to the lecturer, chairman, and Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League.—Mr. Falvey lectured in the large room at the Dolphin Inn on Monday evening last. There was a very good attendance of agriculturists, many of whom had come a considerable distance to be present at the meeting. Mr. Fielder Miller was called to the chair. The lecturer was attentively listened to, and loudly cheered.—Mr. Falvey delivered a lecture in the Town-hall, Alton, on Tuesday evening. Mr. Crowley, the eminent brewer, occupied the chair, and expressed his earnest hope that the time was not far distant when Free Trade would be established. The lecture was received with marked approbation. In fact, all through Hampshire the farmers are beginning to perceive the insulting mockery and gross delusion of Corn-Law protection.

Mr. Daniel Liddell, the northern agent of the League, has recently circulated from 2000 to 3000 copies of Mr. Liversidge's Struggle and the Free-Trade Almanac, in Lancashire, Cheshire, and South Shropshire.—Galeshead Observer.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN OF THE AGRICULTURAL DEPUTATION:

You are said, in the report of your recent interview with Sir Robert Peel, to consist of an equal number of landowners and of tenant-farmers. To which class does your principal spokesman, Mr. Baker, belong? Why were not land-agents named as a third order in your constitution? Was Mr. Baker the nominee of the landlord or the tenant portion of your committee? The shopkeepers of London would not have thought, in any deputation of theirs, of choosing an auctioneer for their representative and leader. They would have found a spokesman of interests entirely identical with their own, and not one whose emoluments might be enhanced by their embarrassments. It is not credible that any number of tenant-farmers, fairly left to themselves, would have desired to speak by the mouth of a land-agent; they are not so utterly besotted as that. Mr. Baker is not the representative of the tenantry. He is the landlords' man; he pleads the landlords' cause; his exposition to the Premier was an apology for rent; his suggestions to the Premier tend chiefly to the enhancement of rent; and putting him forward as the farmers' counsel was one of the many delusions which you, my lords and gentlemen, have attempted to practise upon the public.

The real object of your deputation to Sir Robert Peel was to obtain a remission of taxation, that is a grant of money, in favour of the wealthy and princely landowners of this country. Disguise it as you may, that is the predominant purpose. The farmer cannot pay up the whole amount of his rent, doubled as that rent generally is from what it was fifty years ago; while his produce sells at about the same rate. Take a tax off his shoulders, and then, perhaps, he can pay it up. One of your number (Mr. Hudson) stated that in his locality the farmers had paid their last year's rents, but that "it was from the tenants' capital, and not from the profits of the farms." That cannot last long. You want to bolster it up a little. Let the farmer off for a portion of his taxation, and then the landlord need not let him off for any portion of his rent. The remission of a tax passes clean over the tenant's head into the landlord's pocket. The public revenue loses the money, and the landlord gets his rent in full. In short, the public pays the proprietary. Stripped of sophisms, and perhaps of blunders on the part of some, that is your shameless proposition to the Premier.

What a fine rhetorical artifice in Mr. Baker to speak of rent as forming "so small an item in the actual expenditure of the tenant" that it is of no material account in considering either his distresses or their remedy. To his optics it is imperceptible. He can see the saving of fattening stock upon malt, but is quite unable to discern an augmentation of rent since 1793 that burdens the farmer more than the entire malt-tax three times told. A microscope for Mr. Baker to discover the minute millions, whose pressure he does not wish removed! Salve for his eyes that the little taxing man of the State may not eclipse that great taxing man, the landlord. He the farmers' spokesman? The silly sheep have a wolf for their representative.

One of your tenant-members, Mr. Turner, of Uppington, says that he is an extensive farmer, and has been so for twenty-five years; and that for the last three years his return has been £100 per annum less for every 100 acres of fair land he occupied than for the three preceding ones. But the three preceding years were years of scarcity and suffering never to be forgotten. The average prices per quarter were 64s. 4d., 66s. 4d., and 70s. 8d. They were also years of partially favourable harvests in Devonshire, though generally so bad. Would he have the Government, if it could, bring back such prices? What is his rent for this "fair land?" And what are his profits on each £100 of his returns? The profits must be very high, and the rent very low, to make the latter an insignificant item; and if his landlord yields "returns" as well as his farm, the case is by no means desperate. Mr. Macculloch calculates that the farmers' burdens, tithes, poor-rates, &c. &c., taken "together, may amount, at a rough average, to from one-third to three-fifths of the rent." Five-fifths are invisible to your deputation, as a margin for reduction, while three-fifths fill your sphere of vision. You rely on the fund of one-third as the Fortunatus's purse of the farmer; and pocket the three-thirds quietly as an inconsiderable trifle.

Another of Mr. Turner's facts bears an awkward aspect for your identification of tenants and landlords. He reports that "many farmers who were not attached to their farms by the ties of a large family, or other circumstances, were quietly slipping out of their occupations to live upon the remnants of their property." Better so than spend those remnants in rent. Your protection laws have driven these men to idleness and uselessness. To them, employment is ruinous. They withdraw their capital to anticipate their landlords; and eat it out rather than pay it up for his consumption. They and their capital are thus lost to the country. With Free Trade, they might grow corn for us, and enrich themselves, by an easy migration. They could help to feed England by taking farms in France. Many a continental proprietor would be glad of them for tenants; and the population which you cannot feed would be glad of their untaxed supplies. But your protective laws protect them out of liberty and profit; as well as the people out of plenty. The landlord's chain is round them. You will not let them work elsewhere, and keep their customers. You put down the "diligence that maketh rich." You say they shall not grow corn for Englishmen unless it be upon your land. And so they grow none at all. This you call being their friends; the tenant-farmers' friends. They deem it better to "take themselves out of that," though it be at the sacrifice for life of all prospect of improving their condition.

The labourer was not forgotten in your statements to Sir Robert Peel. You went a begging to him for the labourer also. You ask relief from the common burdens imposed by the State for the sake of "the maintenance of the labouring class." And on what scale do you maintain them that should embolden you to ask public relief, which is public help, for that purpose? In Mr. Baker's parish, six men are to be employed on each 100 acres. Carry that through the whole country, parks and pleasure-grounds, waste lands, townships, and all: it will not provide employment for the natural increase of the present generation of the labouring population. Your fields will not stretch; your acres will not multiply. Let a manufacturer occupy ten of your acres, and he will employ as many hundreds of hands upon that ten as you do individuals upon each hundred acres. He will quadruple your wages to the men, and pay the very children as much as you pay their fathers. On the ground where you pay pence in wages, he will pay scores of pounds. It is a false pretence, this plea of yours. Sir Robert Peel must look elsewhere if he is seeking to remit taxation to those who provide employment for the people. No mendicant monks in the corruptest times ever begged alms to be spent in the riotous living of a dissolute convent "for the love of God," half so dishonestly as you beg a boon from the public revenue for the love of the labourer.

The little island of Jethou is a landlord's monopoly, having but one owner; and the "Guide Book of the Channel Islands" says of its inhabitants, "about six people live in Jethou! and, happy the man who does not form one of the six!" The six labourers on Mr. Baker's hundred acres remind one irresistibly of this pithy ejaculation. He proposes to work them because their wages come to less than the meagre diet of the poorhouse. Without reckoning house rent, the "independent labourer" is worse off by 75 per cent. than in the condition of pauperism. Take Mr. Baker's own calculation:—

"By the operation of the new poor law, labourers thrown out of employment and seeking relief at the parish expense, obtained it at a far greater increase of expenditure than would be the case if actually employed; and in instances when a labourer and family would incur expense to the amount of 17s. 6d. by the operation of the poor law by way of relief, he would, if actually employed, receive but 10s., and thus the tenant-farmers had found it their policy to employ them rather than suffer them to be relieved ordinarily through the medium of the parish rates."

So the farmer saves 7s. 6d. a week, in addition to the value of the labour, by working the peasant instead of pauperizing him. How the labourer manages to make 10s. do the work of 17s. 6d., and sustain those who require the larger sum under all the advantages of catering for a number instead of a family, it is difficult to imagine. Were a deputation of them to beset the Premier and tell their own story, it would be worth hearing. There would be fearful descriptions in it, and such as make one shrink and shudder to conceive. But what care do their sufferings make out for their 10s. employers, or their employers' bread-taxing landlords? Your labourer argument at most amounts to this: Give us public money, by the remission of taxation, and the peasant will have a chance of being promoted into the poorhouse.

Your desire, my lords and gentlemen, of giving information on the condition of the agricultural population, seems limited to private interviews with the Premier. Some of you, at least, have no desire for the light that would be cast on the subject by a parliamentary committee. The power of having one in your own hands. You repudiate authentic and complete information. What you prefer is a cut-and-dry statement to earwig the Minister with. And you went to him less to plead your poverty than to show your power. You "girt him round, beseeching or besieging." The talking was left to plain Mr. This or That; but your lords and M.P.'s were there, potently persuading by their presence only. Even the absent Buckingham was thrown into the scale, using his privilege as a peer to be a petitioner by proxy. And was this well done? Look at the classes, numerous and necessitous, whose claims on justice and humanity for relief from taxation are infinitely greater than your own. The "great unwashed," for whom charity prepares its baths, would be thankful for cheapened soap. The operatives, whose beverage is tea, would feel the slightest reduction of the duty a daily boon. The half-dunged inhabitants of darkened houses would rejoice in a few beams of untaxed light. The tolling clerk, with his £3 a week, would luxuriate in the restoration of his income to its entirety. And you, my lords and gentlemen, muster your legislative strength, and forget your social dignity, to go and beg the bread out of these poor creatures' mouths, and under transparent pretences about tenantry and labourers, ask the Government to avert the reduction of your rents by remitting taxes to those who pay rents. "Tis wondrous pitiful." Sir James Graham tells us that 1,500,000 persons are receiving workhouse relief. And in this a time for landed proprietors, with their trade-limiting monopoly, to compete with the destitute for some small slice of the Treasury surplus. The very newspaper that blazons your titles, and reports the proceedings of your deputation, records also the suicide of an agricultural labourer at Finchley who had been earning 5s. 6d. a week, paying 2s. 6d. for rent, and supporting himself and his wife on the remainder. "They had nothing but bread and potatoes to live upon, excepting once a fortnight about two pounds of beef, which they made last three or four days. They would often have been without bread even, had not a neighbour been in the habit of lending them some. The little cottage they lived in was a picture of cleanliness, and they had lived in it for 35 years. He was too high-spirited to apply to the parish for relief." And it is evident from the catastrophe which brought his corpse under the notice of the coroner, that had he been a lord and a landowner, however low his rents, he would sooner have hanged himself than have joined your deputation.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

* * A word to George Lynce, of Norwich, next week.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Feb. 12.

MY DEAR SIR,—At the meeting of the so-called "Agricultural Protection (protection?) Society" at Freemasons' Hall, on Monday the 3rd instant, his Grace the Duke of Richmond, as chairman, announced to the assemblage that the "present movement" commenced with the county of Essex, and called on Mr. Baker, Writtle, Essex, to speak to the toast proposed, "The Protection Societies." Mr. Baker immediately rose and confirmed the duke's statement, and avowed himself the originator of the club, and that he had persuaded the Essex farmers to join him.

The question naturally arises, what protection can the Essex farmers stand in need of? Have they not, as it were, at their thresholds the London market, with a million and half of consumers of agricultural produce? Is it not the best market not only in England but in all Europe; yes, even in the world?

Price is said to be their object; and let me ask in what market can they get prices equal to those in London, the first metropolis in the world? Does not the wheat grown in Essex generally stand, with few exceptions, at the head of the list of the Mark-lane prices? Is not its price always above the average, and never below it? As to foreign wheat, on a fair investigation, it will be found that charges of transport, viz., freight, insurance, shipping and transferring cargo, commission, port charges, export and import warehousing, will form an amount equal to the rent paid by the English farmer for arable land; that is to say, that the rent paid for a given quantity of arable land to produce a quantity of English wheat, will not exceed the amount of expenses incident to the importation of American, or Canadian, or Baltic wheat.

Essex is noted for its great production of calves; and where, in what market, is a price paid for veal so high as in London? The fresh Essex Epping butter, so highly estimated, cannot stand in need of protection against salted Irish or Dutch butter; and can vegetables of all sorts go to a better market?

There are canals and railways in different directions in the county, and the noble river Thames, with the sea coasting its boundaries for upwards of seventy miles, affording facilities for transporting its produce to market.

But what protection do they want? After the ample experience of the Essex farmers, they must be deficient in intellect if they have yet to learn that a rise of rent is a certain consequence of a rise of prices; the landlords' stewards and hawk-eyed valuers will see to that. In all cases does not the venter look to advantage from a rise in the market? and is not land a subject of sale either absolutely, or for longer or shorter terms? What protection have they against an advance of rent?

Every one must admire the condescension of the noble duke in placing himself at the head of the Essex farmers.

Yours, very respectfully,
A SUBSCRIBER OF £300 TO THE LEAGUE FUND,
IN HIS SEVENTY-NINTH YEAR.
R. Cobden, Esq., M.P.

THE LEAGUE SPIES.

(From the Brighton Herald.)

There is nothing which has irritated the landed aristocracy so much as that strangers, sent by the League, as it is asserted, should have the impudence to go among the tenants and farm-labourers to spy out the poverty of the land, and, what is worse, to publish their spyings in the London papers, and expose the real state of affairs in the rural districts.

To be sure, these sort of spies proceed rather differently from the spies employed in the good old Tory days of Castlereagh and Sidmouth. They did not publish their discoveries in the newspapers; they not only kept every thing snug and quiet, but egged conspirators on; took an active and leading part in their treason; and, when a plot was ripe, their victims were pounced upon, hung and hanged, and the spy retired on an independence. Never did an aristocratic landlord give an opinion against the employment of spies on this system.

But the gentlemen employed, as it is supposed, by the League to collect facts and obtain positive, practical, and personal information of the actual state of tenants and farm-labourers, proceed in a very odd way for spies. They obtain facts, and, instead of sending them to the secret bureau of the Secretary of State, they publish them to all the world and set contradiction at defiance. Nor ought this to be complained of. Mr. Laing, Mrs. Trollope, Captain Basil Hall, Charles Dickens, and a thousand other intelligent men and women, have collected facts and information of the same kind in other countries; nay, what is worse, our own Government have employed persons for the very same object. And what is there in the constitution, institutions, manners, and customs of the people of England to forbid the collection of facts by any one, stranger or foreigner, among us? We have before us a blue book, published by the English Government, containing precisely the same questions to our officials in every foreign country as were addressed to every parochial authority in this; and all these questions have reference to the condition of the occupiers of land and the labourers.

Let us hear, therefore, no more complaints about the League sending out gentlemen to obtain information of the condition of that portion of the people which is employed on the land; or the world will come to the conclusion that it is no bad thing that the landlords are afraid and ashamed of having it exposed.

Besides, Lord Ashley displayed no such delicacy when the condition of the operatives in towns, and the employment of women and children in mines, were to be exposed. The landlords themselves, with Mr. Ferrand at their head, could be loud enough in their exclamations against the poverty and the sufferings of the poor in factories, and assumed a tone of pious indignation against the employment of women and children; yet, when facts are produced showing that men, women, and children are worse off on the land, worse fed, worse clothed, worse lodged, worse educated, and harder worked than in the factory, the snuffling Tartufoles, not daring to deny the facts, denounce those who obtain them as spies, and would not be sorry, perhaps, if they were knocked on the head for presuming to enter into a farmhouse belonging to my Lord This, or the Duke of That.

At one time the organs of the landed aristocracy had the audacity to allege that it was the spies of the League who urged the labourers to acts of incendiarism; but this was too bad to be persisted in. It was notorious that the fire took place where the spies had not been; that they occurred among the most ignorant portion of the population, where a newspaper seldom reached, and the name even of the League was unknown. But the condition of the farm-labourer does not rest altogether on the representations of the agents of the League. It comes before the public in a thousand shapes, and frequently upon the reluctant oath of tenant-farmers themselves. For instance, at the Berkshire Michaelmas sessions, William Jackson, 32, was charged with having stolen two sheep, at Kingston Lisle, the property of Robert Hemmington and Thomas Fisher Hemmington. Mr. Robert Hemmington, examined: Is a farmer residing at Warren Farm, Kingston Lisle. Recollected losing a sheep. Saw it safe the day before. He was in partnership with his brother.—Cross-examined: Farms 900 acres of land. Has employed 14 or 15 men. The rate of wages is from 8s. to 10s. per week: some labourers are paid less. He had heard of some receiving 6d. per day, exclusive of Sunday.

How can labourers with families exist as the men of England ought to exist on 8s. or 10s. a week? How support life on 6d. per day? This is a case occurring not in a remote part of the country, but near to the metropolis, and it can be taken, not as an isolated instance, but as a specimen of what is universal, and consequently a subject that demands the instant attention of the Legislature.

"THE HEALTH OF THE LABOURER."

(From Punch.)

The great social difficulty that has beset us in the amelioration of the condition of the labourer, is at length solved. To the Duke of Richmond, we believe, is to be attributed the happy discovery. Doubtless, when the full success of the plan is made manifest; when throughout the length and breadth of England, its wondrous agency is turning the butts of the labouring poor into abiding-places of substantial comfort—when it is calling smiles into the labourer's cheek, and putting flesh upon his bones, and giving him the erect bearing and independent look of God's primeval work.—Many, then, we doubt it not, other claimants of the discovery will rise up, contending with the noble Duke of Richmond the originality of that stroke of philanthropic genius which has worked such blessed wonders. It has been so with the inventor of printing; with the discoverer of the motive principle of steam. Be it then our rewarding task at once to claim for Richmond his inalienable right to the gratitude of England's labourers. He has discovered the infallible remedy for all their social ills. It is simply this: It is to drink their Health.

Mr. Lane tells us, that the Egyptian magicians used their greatest wonders with merely a bowl of water. The Duke of Richmond performs his benevolent Accus-potus with a glass of wine!

Oh, it is soothing to the soul, wearied and desponding from a contemplation of the crushing ills that press the very manhood out of thousands, to see a nobleman—philanthropic as Prometheus—rise in a tavern hall; and with a voice melodious as ten silver trumpets, give—"The Health of the Labourer!" There is no mistaking the look, the presence of the man. He is rapt, sublimated by the greatness of his mission; by the almost divine power of his discovery.

"The Health of the Labourer!"

Magical are the syllables! What are they, in truth, but as the words of some spirit-compelling wizard—some political Prospero—that are no sooner dropped from the lips of the speaker than they arouse a swarm of genial-working vassals of benevolence!—and away they fly to carry on their wings a healing balm to thousands and thousands! So mighty is the necromancy of the toast, that when uttered, it is easy for imagination to behold a very cloud of Ariels rising from the Freemasons' Tavern. East, west, north, and south they separate upon their glad mission. Some, carrying loaves—some, meat—some, kegs of nut-brown ale—some, new raiment,—and all of them alighting at the labourer's fireless hearth, and calling cheerfulness and hope into his face, and making his gaunt wife and pallid little ones smile at the miracle of sudden plenty. What benevolent magic lies in that little sentence, "The Health of the Labourer." It is the "Open Sesame" to the heart of the country.

And even when the labourer fails to receive the substantial sweetness of these fairy gifts, it is plain he is largely benefited, though all unconsciously, by the magical toast. Therefore, let him take heart. True it is, he may wither on seven shillings a week; but then, does not a Duke drink his health? and such condescension must more than double the miserable stipend.

Consider this, O labourer! It is possible that all day you have wanted food—at night you need shelter and firing. There are sullen thoughts clouding your brain; there is, too, a slow, withering heat at your vitals; night is coming on, and you know not where to lay your head. This, it must be owned, is an uncomfortable plight; nevertheless, you may shake off the misery like an ugly dream; for know, you have been toasted in a London tavern. Yes; at the Freemasons' the Duke of Richmond has given—"The Health of the Labourer!"

You are breaking stones in a Union-yard. Let the thought of the toast touch your brain with music, and somehow try and hammer on the granite a grateful accompaniment to—"The Health of the Labourer!"

Well, labourer, you fall sick; it may be in the parish of Iwer, in Buckinghamshire; in the county of the "farmers' friend." You are carted to Isleworth, and you ask for bread for yourself and wife. You cannot move; but your wife, poor wretch! has yet some strength, and so she is ordered to trudge from Hillingdon to Uxbridge—and from Uxbridge back to Isleworth, having walked in the cutting winter air, only one and twenty miles, before melting charity gives her an order for grocery, price three shillings! It is very wearying, it is sickening to the brain, it is enough to make you call upon death to take you from that despot, fellow-man; it is very wretched for you to wait the return of your wife on her hard pilgrimage of three-and-twenty miles. But take heart! Be of good cheer! Disease and famine have hold upon you; but let this thought make them powerless—all that can be done, is done for you; for amidst hurrahs and cheering clamorous, somewhere in London, they drink "The Health of the Labourer!"

And, labourer, it may be you are just turned in howling winter time from a comfortable goal. You were sent thither for straying in search of work, that you might take your wife and offspring from the Union. You could not make out the offence; but the magistrates, hawk-eyed, saw it, and you were sent to goal. There, you slough your labourer's rags, and are warmly clothed. Your sentence is suffered, and you are discharged; the warm convict clothing taken from you, and your labourer's tatters restored. You shiver at the goal's threshold; for the icy wind makes you know the difference between the saug garments of a felon, and the threadbare raiment of a working man. Well, you trudge on; but you have palpitation at the heart; and it is sore travelling with you. At length you crawl into a wayside hovel; and with one loaf, in withering December, you fight famine for three days; your feet becoming gangrened with the blighting cold. Terrible thoughts must visit you in that lone hovel; you cannot but hold awful communications with the midnight blast, howling, to your ears, like humanity about you. Nevertheless, you are not forgotten. No; your woe is not humanly—ludicrous—humanity, and all its gushing impulses; for though you are starving, perishing; though you are a piece of numbed, mortified, human refuse—a Duke remembers you, and gives "The Health of the Labourer."

And, labourer, you crawl from your hovel, and are taken to the Union. You die. You have been killed—murdered—by want and winter's cold. You are at length at peace; and sleep the sweet sleep of death in a pauper's shell. You are carried to the pauper's ground; and whilst the priest utters the words that confound all things in one undistinguished heap of clay—the pomp and the poverty of life; its emblazonments and its miseries; while he utters—"Ashes to ashes, dust to dust," let your spirit in its upward flight be comforted for those of your earthly fellows you have left behind; for still—still will be drunk—"The Health of the Labourer!"

As some dural landlords drink the health of the labourer while living, so to make the heartfelt solemnity complete, a Doctor Cantwell should bury him when dead.

THE SILK TRADE.—We are glad to hear that one of two of the firms giving out silk in Leigh have lately made a small increase in the prices paid for weaving that fabric. We hope this example will be generally followed.—Manchester Guardian.

THE RICHMOND CORONET.—At the agricultural protection gathering, the Duke of Richmond sold the brightest jewel in his coronet was his care of the labourer. "The brightest jewel in a crown," is an old phrase; now, it comes down to the coronet. In like manner dressed, some commoner landlord may declare that his treatment of the labourer is the dearest bit of blood in his beaver.—Punch.

REVIEW.

History of the Reformation in Germany. By Leopold Ranke. Translated by Sarah Austin. London, Longman and Co.

The history of the German Reformation, unlike that of England, involves the examination of a great social and political revolution, the beneficial results of which are placed beyond the reach of controversy. To Luther, Germany is mainly indebted for its nationality: when he smote the supremacy of the Pope he struck down, by the same blow, the despotism of the Emperor; when he gave to Germany a new creed, he necessitated a new political constitution; and when he founded an independent church, he secured the independence of the German states. The great commercial cities early perceived this connexion between political and religious freedom: they became the most earnest allies of the Reformation, and to the trading community of Germany, far more than to its feudal principle, must be attributed the triumph of Protestant principles in the Thirty Years' War. Catholics and Protestants equally benefited by the defeat of the attempts to establish imperial despotism, and render the German empire a revived empire of the west; even those who lament that the unity of religion was broken, join in exulting over the failure of the schemes proposed for giving to the power of the Emperor the same extension in political and material rule that the Pope claimed in spiritual affairs. Hence Charles V. did not abate one jot in his hostility to the Reformation when he was engaged in open hostilities with the Pope; and hence Francis I., though a virulent persecutor of the Huguenots at home, was a zealous ally of the Protestant Princes of Germany. The Princes and the free cities were engaged in the common cause of securing government and good order; they were opposed by the associations of the feudal knights, who were, in fact, nothing better than titled robbers.

"We still see the warlike knights and their mounted retainers, in helm and breastplate and with bent cross-bow before them—for as yet the horsemen had no firearms—riding up and down the well-known boundary lines, marking the halting places, and lying in ambush day and night in the woods, till the enemy whom they are watching for appears; or till the train of merchants and their wares, coming from the city they are at war with, is seen winding along the road: their victory is generally an easy one, for their attack is sudden and unexpected; and they return surrounded by prisoners and laden with booty to their narrow stronghold on hill and rock, around which they cannot ride a league without despoiling another enemy, or goot to the chase without harness on their back: squires, secret friends, and comrades in arms, incessantly come and go, craving succour, or bringing warnings, and keep up incessant alarm and turmoil. The whole night long we hear the howlings of the wolves in the neighbouring forest. While the States of the empire were consulting at Treves as to the means of ensuring the execution of the laws, Berlichingen and Selbitz seized the train of Nürnberg merchants coming from the Leipzig fair, under the convoy of Bamberg, and thus began the open war against the bishop and the city. The decrees of the Diet were of little avail. Götz von Berlichingen thought himself entitled to complain of the negotiations that were opened; for otherwise he would have overthrown the Nürnborgers and their Bürgermeister 'with his gold chain round his neck and his battle-mace in his hand.' At the same time another notorious band had collected under the command of the Friedingers in Hohenkühn (in the Hegau), originally against Kaufbeuren, to avenge the affront offered to a nobleman who had sued in vain to the fair daughter of a citizen; afterwards they became a mere gang of robbers, who made the country unsafe: so that the Swabian League at length stirred itself against them, and the Emperor himself sent out his best men, the Weiskopf (Wake up) of Austria, and the Burscheus,—at whose shouts, as the historical ballad says, 'the mountain tottered, the rocks were rent, and the walls riven, till the knights fled, their people surrendered, and the castle was rased to the ground.' But there was also many a castle in Bavaria, Swabia, and Franconia for which a similar fate was reserved. The insecurity of the roads and highways was greater than ever; even poor travelling scholars, who begged their way along, were set upon and tortured to make them give up their miserable pittance. 'Good luck to us, my dear comrades,' cried Götz to a pack of wolves which he saw fall upon a flock of sheep; 'good luck to us all and every where.' He took it for a good omen."

The Hansa towns would not allow their citizens to be plundered with impunity: they formed associations for mutual defence, and their league was found a formidable opponent to aristocratic tyranny and oppression:—

"How many a robber noble did Lübeck drag from his stronghold! Towards the end of the fifteenth century the city concluded a treaty with neighbouring mediate lords, the express object of which was to prevent the hated aristocracy from exceeding the powers they had hitherto exercised. It availed nothing to King John of Denmark that the Emperor Maximilian for a time favoured his attempts. In the year 1509 the Hansa towns, rather a part of them, attacked his islands, beat his ships at Helsingör, carried away his bells for their church, and remained absolute masters on the open sea. A Lübeck vessel, boarded by three Danish ones near Bornholm, beat off two of them, and captured the third: in the year 1511 the Lübeck fleet returned to the Trave with eighteen Dutch ships as prizes."

"Nor did the inland cities make a less spirited resistance to those aggressions from which they were not protected by the Swabian League. How admirably did Nürnberg defend herself! For every injury she sustained, she carried her vengeance home to the territory of the aggressor, and her mounted bands frequently made rich captures. Was to the nobles who fell into their hands!

No intercession either of kinsmen or of neighbouring princes availed to save them; the Council was armed with the ever-ready excuse that the citizens absolutely demanded the punishment of the offender. In vain did he look out from the bars of his prison towards the forest, watching whether his friends and allies were not coming to his rescue: Berlichingen's story sufficiently shows us with how intense a dread even those of her neighbours who delighted the most in wild and daring exploits regarded the towers of Nürnberg. Noble blood was no security either from the horrors of the question or the axe of the executioner."

The condition of the agricultural population in Germany at the time of the Reformation was truly deplorable:—

"Throughout the whole breadth of the empire, the peasantry was in an equal state of ferment. The peasants of the Swiss mountains had completely changed their relation to the empire: from the condition of subjects, they had passed to that of free and independent allies: those of the marches of Friesland, on the contrary, had succumbed to the neighbouring sovereigns; the Dittmarschers alone stood for a while, after a glorious and successful battle, like a noble ruin amidst modern edifices. The antagonistic principles which, in distant lands and from the furthest marches of the empire, gave rise to these conflicts, came into contact under a thousand different forms in the heart of the country. The subsidies for the empire and its growing necessities fell ultimately on the peasant; the demands of the sovereign, of the holders of church lands, and of the nobility were all addressed to him.* On the other hand, in some countries the common people were made to bear arms; they formed the bands of landsknechts, which acquired and maintained a name amongst European troops: they once more felt the strength that was in them. The example of the Swiss was very seducing to the south of Germany. In the country round Schlettstadt, in Alsatia, a society of discontented citizens and peasants, the existence and proceedings of which were shrouded in the profoundest secrecy, was formed as early as the year 1493. Traversing almost impassable ways, they met at night on solitary mountains, and swore never in future to pay any tax which was not levied with their own free consent; to abolish tolls and duties, to curtail the privileges of the clergy, to put the Jews to death without ceremony, and to divide their possessions. They admitted new members with strange ceremonies, specially intended to appal traitors. Their intention was in the first place to seize on Schlettstadt, immediately after to display the banner with the device of the peasant's shoe,† to take possession of Alsatia, and to call the Swiss to their aid. But, in spite of the fearful menaces which accompanied the admission to the society, they were betrayed, dispersed, and punished with the utmost severity. Had the Swiss in 1499 understood their own advantage, and not excited the hatred of their neighbours by their cruel ravages, the people along their whole frontier would, as contemporaries affirm, have flocked to join their ranks. An incident shows the thoughts that were afloat among the people. During the negotiations preceding the peace of Basle, a peasant appeared in the clothes of the murdered Count of Fürstenberg. 'We are the peasants,' said he, 'who punish the nobles.' The discovery and dispersion of the conspiracy above mentioned by no means put an end to the Bundschuh. In the year 1502 traces of this symbol were found at Bruchsal, from whence the confederates had already gained over the nearer places, and were extending their ramifications into the more remote. They declared that, in answer to an inquiry addressed to the Swiss, they received an assurance that the Confederation would help the right, and risk life and limb in their cause. There was a tinge of religious enthusiasm in their notions. They were to say five Paternosters and Ave Marias daily. Their war-cry was to be, 'Our Lady!' They were to take Bruchsal, and then march forth and onward, ever onward, never remaining more than twenty-four hours in a place. The whole peasantry of the empire would join them, of that there was no doubt; all men must be brought into their covenant, that so the righteousness of God might be brought upon earth. But they were quickly overpowered, scattered, and their leaders punished with death."

There was throughout Europe a general suspicion of the clergy; but it was more intensely felt in Germany, where the ecclesiastical constitutions came frequently into collision with the principles of municipal government:—

"The cities felt the exemptions enjoyed by the clergy peculiarly burdensome. It was impossible to devise any thing more annoying to a well-ordered civic community, than to have within their walls a corporate body which neither acknowledged the jurisdiction of the city, nor contributed to bear its burdens, nor deemed itself generally subject to its regulations. The churches were asylums for criminals, the monasteries the resort of dissolute youth; we find examples of monks who made use of their exemption from tolls, to import goods for sale, or to open a tavern for the sale of beer. If any attempt was made to assail their privileges, they defended themselves with excommunication and interdict. We find the municipal councils incessantly occupied in putting some check to this evil. In urgent cases they arrest offenders even in sanctuary, and then take measures to be delivered from the inevitable interdict by the interposition of some powerful protector; they are well inclined to pass over the bishops, and to address themselves directly to the Pope; they try to effect reforms in their monasteries. They thought it a very questionable arrangement that the parish priest should take part in the collection of the common penny; the utmost that they would concede was that he should be present, but without taking any active share.‡ The cities always vehemently opposed the Emperor's intention of appointing a bishop to be judge in the Imperial Chamber.

"The general disapprobation excited by the church on such weighty points, naturally led to a discussion of its other abuses. Hemmerlin zealously contends against the incessant augmentation of ecclesiastical property, through which villages disappeared and districts became waste; against the exorbitant number of holidays, which even the Council of Basle had endeavoured to reduce; against the celibacy of the clergy, to which the rules of the Eastern Church were much to be preferred; against the reckless manner in which ordination was granted, as, for example, that two hundred priests were yearly ordained in Constance: he asks to what all this is to lead.*

"Things had gone so far that the constitution of the clergy was offensive to public morals: a multitude of ceremonies and rules were attributed to the mere desire of making money; the situation of priests living in a state of concubinage and burdened with illegitimate children, and often, spite of all purchased absolutions, tormented in conscience and oppressed with the fear that in performing the sacrifice of the mass they committed a deadly sin, excited mingled pity and contempt: most of those who embraced the monastic profession had no other idea than that of leading a life of self-indulgence without labour. People saw that the clergy took from every class and station only what was agreeable, and avoided what was laborious or painful. From the knightly order, the prelate borrowed his brilliant company, his numerous retinue, the splendidly caparisoned horse, and the hawk upon his fist; with women, he shared the love of gorgeous chambers and trim gardens; but the weight of the mailed coat, the troubles of the household, he had the dexterity to avoid. If a man wishes to enjoy himself for once, says an old proverb, let him kill a fat fowl; if for a year, let him take a wife; but if he would live joyously all the days of his life, then let him turn priest."

"Innumerable expressions of the same sentiment were current; the pamphlets of that time are full of them.†

Amid such distractions it would have been difficult to discover any principle which could have become the basis of social order, other than that evoked by Luther. From the moment that he formed the scheme of a national church distinct from the universal church, the principle of distinct nationalities was impressed upon the rulers and princes of the several German states, and their idea of the empire became that of a federative union of independent governments, instead of a uniform imperial despotism. The great blunder made by the Roman court was the overlooking of the great question of national existence, which, though never openly mooted, was really the engrossing principle in the minds of the Reformers. It was a great disadvantage to the papacy at the crisis that the wearer of the triple crown was an Italian, and the Emperor a Spanish Monarch: Leo X. and Charles V. were equally regarded as foreign usurpers, eager to subvert the nationality and independence of the German empire. Hence Luther's bold step of publicly burning the Pope's bull, which was regarded throughout the rest of Europe as an act of daring impiety, was deemed in Germany nothing more than a bold protest against unjustifiable usurpation.

"Luther had the audacity to denounce the Pope as a suppresser of the Divine word, for which he substituted his own opinions;—nay, even as a stubborn heretic. Carlstadt also raised his voice against the fierce Florentine lion, who had never wished any good to Germany, and who now condemned the truest doctrines, contrary to laws Divine and human, without even having granted the defenders of them a hearing. The whole university rallied more and more firmly round its hero, who had in fact given it existence and importance. When the intelligence arrived that in some places the authorities had begun to execute the bull, and to burn Luther's books, the monk felt himself sufficiently strong to revenge this arbitrary act on the Pope's writings. On the 10th of December, 1520, the academic youth, summoned by a formal proclamation posted on a black board, assembled in unwonted numbers before the Elster Gate of Wittenberg; a pile of wood was collected, to which a Master of Arts of the university set fire: in the full feeling of the orthodoxy of his secession, the mighty Augustine, clad in his cowl, advanced to the fire, holding in his hand the Pope's bull and decretals: 'Because thou hast vexed the Lord's saints,' exclaimed he, 'mayst thou be consumed in eternal fire!' and threw it into the flames. Never was rebellion more resolutely proclaimed. 'Highly useful were it,' said Luther another day, 'that the Pope (that is, the papacy) with all his doctrines and abominations should be burnt.'"

Hutten's intense nationality made him one of Luther's most formidable allies; indeed, on all sides, we find that Germany was the dominant idea in the minds of all who revolted from the papacy, and that the Germans adopted the principles of the Reformation not so much from conviction of their truth, as from a strong belief that these principles were necessary to their existence as a people. It was, in fact, a conflict between Romanism and Germanism—between traditions south of the Alps and associations racy of the soil:—

"Hutten perfectly understood the advantage he possessed in writing German: 'I wrote Latin,' he says, 'formerly, which not every one understands; now I call upon my fatherland.' The whole catalogue of the sins of the Roman Curia, which he had often instigated upon, he now exhibited to the nation in the new light thrown upon it by Luther, in German verses. He indulged the hope that deliverance was at hand, nor did he conceal that it thence came to the worst, it was to the sword and spear of brave men that he trusted; by them would the vengeance of God be executed. The most remarkable projects began to be broached; some particularly regarding the relation of the German Church to Rome; as that no man should for the future possess an ecclesiastical dignity who could not preach to the people in the German tongue; that the prerogatives of the papal throne, excois, regresses, reservations, and, of course, annates should be abolished; that no sentence of excommunication issued by Rome should have any validity in Germany; that no brief should have any force till a German council had pronounced whether it were to be obeyed or not; the bishops of the country were always to hold in check the Papal power. Others added proposals for a radical reform in details; that the number of holidays should be diminished, the curates regularly paid, fit and decorous preachers appointed, fasts observed only on a few days in the year, and the peculiar habits of the several orders laid aside; a yearly assemblage of bishops should watch over the general affairs of the German church. The idea even arose that a Christian spirit and life would, by God's special ordinance, spread from the German nation over the whole world, as once from out Judea. Thereunto, it was said, the seeds of all good had sprung up unobserved:—a subtle sense, acute thought, masterly skill in all handicrafts, knowledge of all writings and tongues, the useful art of printing, desire for evangelical doctrine, delight in truth and honesty. To this end, too, had Germany remained obedient to the Roman Emperor."

Ranke's merits as a historian are of the highest order; and he has had the good fortune to find a most able translator in Mrs. Austin. The volumes before us contain the most complete view of the great religious and political change which has moulded and regulated the whole subsequent course of modern history. Ranke is, indeed, the only writer who has shown the important share which the middle classes had in effecting both religious and political reform; and has thus added one to the many lessons which teach that the middle classes are the firmest friends to social order, and that no social grievance can resist their efforts when they are true to themselves and have confidence in their own resources.

THE LABOURER'S LOVE-SONG. (From Punch.)

A plague upon thy head, thou Dove!
I envy thee thy fate;
Like unto thee I have a Love,
But not, like thee, a Mate.
A plague upon my own fond heart
That was not made of stone,
Without a throb, without a smart,
To go through life alone.
What right have I aloft to gaze
Upon the sunny skies,
Whence, evermore, my fancy strays
Unto a pair of eyes?
And wherefore should the rosy morn
Remind me of a cheek?
Oh! I could laugh myself to scorn,
For that I am so weak.
Do I mistake myself, in truth,
For some great Lord or Squire?
What can a hind, a lout, forsooth,
More than a brute, desire!
What, hath he passions, thoughts, and powers,
More than a hog can feel?
Pshaw!—let me crush them,—like the flowers,
Beneath mine iron heel.
I, that can scarce my daily bread
With bitter labour earn,
Have I a tear for love to shed,
A heart with love to burn?
What more than bacon needs a clown?—
Would I'd enough of that!—
Give him his beer; and let him drown
His passion in the vat.
When yonder Church would lure thee on
With visions of a bride,
Turn thee, thou fool! and think upon
The building by its side.
There stands the Workhouse—look with awe
Upon that place of dread
Where Paupers go, who break the law
Which says—THOU SHALT NOT WED.

ENGLISH TRADE WITH CHINA.—The Times correspondent writing from Victoria (Hong-Kong), Oct. 22, 1844, says:—"The treaty with America has been concluded. Ringing the changes upon our treaty, they have extended theirs to twenty-eight articles. The only difference worthy of remark will be found in the 6th and 10th articles; the former rectifying an oversight in the English treaty, according to which small coasting vessels had to pay the same port dues as larger vessels coming from Europe, and also to pay at each port they might have occasion to visit. These restrictions upon the coasting trade are by Mr. Cushing's treaty removed, and such vessels are now admitted at the modified rate of 1 mace per ton, and not, as before, of 5 mace. Article 10 also has given great satisfaction, for by its provisions ships are authorized to anchor at any of the five ports, and if they should find the market in one unsuitable to their cargo, they may depart without paying port charges, provided they sail within forty-eight hours, and before they have broken bulk. Article 20 also provides for the re-export of goods to any of the five ports without repayment of duties. The 2nd article refers to a tariff which is made a part of the treaty, but it is not known here whether it embodies any modifications of the one already in existence. The treaty itself has not been made known in detail, but only by a summary. All the advantages of the treaty are equally secured to all nations."

During the past week a great quantity of tracts, &c., published by the National Anti-Corn-Law League, have been distributed in Doncaster. —Leeds Times.

One thousand eight hundred and four persons died of small-pox in the metropolis in the year 1844, being 1053 above the average of five years. In the first week in January it numbered only 10, but gained strength by degrees till it reached the maximum of 58 in the week ending August the 17th, and from that time it fluctuated at about 40 or 50 till the end of the year.

AGRICULTURE.

FARMERS, ARE THESE YOUR "FRIENDS?"

That distress prevails amongst the great body of farmers is undeniable. Indeed all those who affect to be best informed as to their circumstances, and who most anxiously thrust themselves forward as "farmers' friends," are the loudest assertors of the prevalence and depth of such distress. On that point the landlords and land-agents, who form the active portion of the Protection Society, are unanimous. Nor is there less unanimity as to the origin of the farmers' present sufferings. The legislative changes of the Peel Administration—the tariff, the Corn Law of 1842, the Canada Corn Bill, and so forth—almost universally bear the blame of causing agricultural depression; and their repeal is boisterously demanded: so say the protectionists. On the other hand, the Minister and his adherents deny that the Government measures have caused the depression, and they assert that to retrace their footsteps is impossible. There can be no re-enactment of abandoned protections.

Then the Free-Traders declare that, directly and indirectly, the laws by which the price of grain is attempted to be artificially enhanced, form the actual source of agricultural distress; while the Whigs, by their parliamentary leader, have at length admitted the truth that "protection is the bane of agriculture."

Here, then, we have four distinct sections of the community represented in Parliament, taking issue upon the questions, whether agricultural distress does or does not proceed from acts of the Legislature; and whether it can or cannot be relieved by the Legislature. All, except the Government section, maintain, though upon different, nay, opposite grounds, that legislation has positively caused the evil.

Now, is not this just the case for an inquiry? We call upon the farmers of the country to look at this matter like men of business. It is their especial concern. They have created the parliaments by which all the legislation on the subject has been effected. The makers of all the laws complained of on all sides have professed to act in their names and for their interests. Yet the result has been the most grievous distress amongst tenant-farmers and all dependent upon them. Is there not, then, reason to suspect that the legislation, which has produced results so directly the contrary of those intended, has been either wrongly conceived or badly executed? That either the farmers have been themselves mistaken, or have been betrayed by their representatives? And would not those representatives, if they had confidence in the soundness of their own views and the integrity of their own purposes, be most anxious for inquiry? Precedent is in its favour. In 1814 there was the complaint of agricultural distress, and committees of both Houses of Parliament prosecuted laborious and extensive inquiries into the cause. So, in 1821 and 1822, similar distress led to like committees of inquiry; the same happened in 1833 and in 1836. No one can deny that much useful information as to the state and prospects of British agriculture was obtained on each of those inquiries, and attempts—whether successful or not matters nothing to the present purpose—were made to alleviate the suffering farmers. Why are not these precedents to be followed now?

If those who profess to represent the farmers sought an inquiry, it would not, indeed could not, be resisted by the Government; and the farmer would have something more tangible to refer to on the causes of his distress than the vague declamations which pass current at protection society dinners. Yet what occurred when Mr. Cobden gave notice of his intention to move for a select committee to inquire into the causes of the present agricultural distress? Why, the protectionists, with one incautious exception, declared their intention to resist all inquiry!

Let the tenant-farmers note that fact. Their political "friends" can, at Brighton, bully a single tenant-farmer who suggests an unpleasant truth in connexion with the state of agriculture; they can bluster at Freemasons' Tavern, and pretend to look big and business-like at their "room in Bond-street;" but they dare not—we use the term DARE nor advisedly—test the truth of their assertions by the examination of evidence before a select committee. The political "farmers' friends" constantly complain that they have been calumniated, that they have been accused of legislating for their own objects as landowners at the expense of the interests of the tenant-farmers; and they get together, with cliques and in corners, and deny the charges. But what does a man of honour and honesty do when in his individual character he has been subjected to such imputations? Does he not seek redress by inquiry before a jury? Is he not eager to avail himself of the first opportunity of rebutting such charges by means of evidence? And if a man thus charged shall not so purge himself, if he do not seek such inquiry, does he not tacitly admit that he cannot refute the charges made against him? And that is the political position of the self-styled "farmers' friends," with this additional circumstance, that, when an inquiry is sought to be thrust upon them, they actively and strenuously oppose it.

We will tell the farmers why their craven champions resist all inquiry into agricultural distress. They know that, though they will have a great majority of protectionists on the committee, that there must also be some three or four Free-Traders on that committee; and they are conscious that facts will be elicited even from their own witnesses which will completely establish the selfish character and object of their protective legislation. That their Corn Law will be shown to be protective of high rents, and high rents only, and that the tenant-farmer is the catspaw and victim of the political landowner. We ask the farmers to read the debate, which occurred in the House of Commons, on Mr. Cobden complaining of the omission of all reference to agricultural distress from the Queen's speech, and say whether their protectionist representatives made any reply to the distinct and definite charges of the Free-Traders against the Corn Law and their upholders?

The only person who even attempted a reply was Lord John Manners, a mild monopolist, who said:—

"Though he was not a member of the League nor of the Anti-League, nor of the Administration, which had held the scale so evenly between the contending parties, he could not resist the opportunity of endeavouring to answer one of the arguments advanced by the honourable member for Durham. That argument was, that the landowners were especially wrong in this respect: that they had protected themselves from competition, while they had exposed their tenants and the peasantry most fiercely and cruelly to it. In reply he would ask, if the competition under the present law were so fierce and cruel, what would it have been if, in addition to home competition, foreign competition had been allowed?"

This no answer. The landlords protect themselves from competition by a law which promises constant high prices, and they get rents according to such high prices. But the farmers, induced likewise to expect permanently high prices, calculate on profit from comparatively scanty crops raised by the application of small capitals in proportion to the extent of their farms; the man of least capital usually offering the highest rent. In years of scarcity they contrive to pay their rents and scramble on; but let a season of abundance occur—as was the case with wheat last harvest—and the high rent of the landlord remains, while the expected high price of the tenant has vanished. Then the labourers suffer from this system of low farming—cultivating a large area with comparatively small capital—because scanty crops can be raised with few labourers. Thus, and thus only, does agricultural labour become redundant, and wages of servants in husbandry become reduced to starvation point. Free trade in corn—with the immediate consequence, steady and moderate prices—would at once correct those evils by inducing a high system of cultivation and the employment of much additional labour in husbandry.

Again, his lordship said:—

"He wished to call attention to another point urged by the honourable member for Durham when he charged agricultural members with sitting still and seeing the prosperity and fortunes of the farmers frittered away from year to year by the course of policy pursued by Government. If it were really the opinion of the honourable member that the prosperity and fortunes of the farmers were frittered away by measures of Free Trade, how could he expect that those to whom the interests of the farmers were so dear would consent to any further changes of the law in the same direction?"

What a confusion of mind is indicated in this passage. It is the argument of the protectionists, when out of the House, that the measures of Government have "frittered away the fortunes of the farmers," not of the Free-Traders; and the natural question was, why men who make such assertions resist inquiry? But, in fact, the capital of the farmer is constantly "frittered away" under the operation of the Corn Law, which leads him to give monopoly rent, and yet cannot, in all seasons, secure him monopoly prices.

Mr. Hudson, of Norfolk, who formed one of the protectionist deputation to Sir Robert Peel, distinctly stated, "that although in the county of Norfolk the rents had been paid up, it was from the tenants' capital, and not from the profits of the farms." Surely this is a ground for inquiry! Mr. Hudson's political leaders resist all inquiry! The little squires, the auctioneers, land-agents, not farmers and landowners, who make up the Central Protection Society, may think this all very right; but what say the real and suffering tenant-farmers to such shirking conduct on the part of the "farmers' friends?"

WHAT IS RENT?

LANDLORDISM DISPLAYED.

The farmer's attention cannot too often or too closely be drawn to this important question. It is by short myopia of the subject of rent that the monopolists have contrived to keep so many farmers as active and passive supporters of the high-rent laws. A Pro-Corn-Law correspondent of the Mark-lane Express says the English farmer pays land tax, poor rates, tithe rent charge, county rates, and highway rates, to the amount altogether of 12s. 11d. per acre; and then he adds that this is independent of rent, amounting on an average to 28s. an acre.

This is mere confusion. When a man takes a farm he inquires what are the rates, taxes and tithes to which it is liable, and offers a rent higher or lower according as those local burdens are light or heavy. The rent can only properly be the surplus which remains after payment of all fixed burdens, the expenses of cultivation and the farmer's fair profit; when the landlord gets more than that as rent he obtains an unfair advantage over his tenant. This has been extremely well put by Mr. Holland, of Dumbleton, a large landholder in Worcestershire and Gloucestershire and a practical farmer, in a letter addressed to a provincial journal. He says:—

"Rent, therefore, may be defined as the value of that portion of the produce of a farm which is apportioned to the landlord; it ought to be the value of the produce which remains after the tenant has repaid himself the expenses of cultivation, secured his interest for the capital invested, and realized a fair profit."

And he gives this practical illustration:—

"Suppose that a tenant has a farm of 100 acres, producing, upon an average, 30 bushels of wheat per acre—that is, 3000 bushels—and that the agreement with his landlord is, that the latter shall have as rent one-sixth of his produce, viz., 500 bushels; then the sum paid to the landlord should be the market value of that one-sixth, whatever it might be, and no more. I believe that much of the depression of tenants arises from neglect of this rule. Let us suppose that, in the case we have put, wheat at the time of making the bargain was at that price at which it is the object of certain acts of Parliament to keep it—say at 7s. a bushel. In such case the value of the 3000 bushels (the whole produce of the farm) would be £1050. The landlord's one-sixth of this would amount to £175 (35s. an acre), and the tenant's residue would amount to £875. So far so good between the parties, as long as the parliamentary price and the market price correspond; but how would it be if the market price was to fall, and that the latter was 6s. a bushel instead of 7s.? The total return for the whole produce of 3000 bushels would then be but £2100, the tenant's share of which would be £750, and the landlord's ought to be £150; but being a fixed money payment, it remains as before the fall in the market, £175—that is, instead of receiving one-sixth of the value of the produce, the landlord takes £25 in addition, which ought in justice to belong to the tenant. A landlord, with a fixed money-rent so regulated, could make a return of nearly 15 per cent. to his tenant, without encroaching upon his share of the value of the produce."

But in fact, in most cases, this operates more against the tenant than it appears from Mr. Holland's illustration. The great thing farmers should bear in mind is, that rent ought to be only the surplus after they have been repaid all the costs of cultivation with a fair profit; what is really is, they know too well. But it is almost impossible that a farmer can make a profit under a yearly tenancy: he lays out only what he can recover, or what he hopes to recover, in a year, and so becomes a mere bailiff to the landowner, often not receiving for himself even a bailiff's wages; and it is certain that landowners are very generally aware that hitherto they have been able not only to maintain the most absolute power over their tenants, but also to obtain more than this fair rent of their land in its natural condition. As an example, we find a letter from Mr. T. B. L. Baker, of Hardwick, Gloucestershire—an active monopolist, who offers to lease his land for his tenants on being paid NINE PENNY per acre for his outlay as additional rent!—in which the present exaggeration is used to deter farmers from demanding their only security—long leases. He writes:—

"If a tenant takes a farm of me on a twenty years' lease, he has, of course, a large capital to invest on permanent improvements—no advocate of leases would recommend me to take a tenant without such a capital, which would exclude most of my present tenants. Now, if my tenant lays out £1000 in permanent improvements, I have to have a security of a return, he must of course by the end of the lease have his £1000 in his pocket again. In order to get this, he must lay by his four per cent. per annum for the twenty years; he must also have five per cent. for interest on his capital during that time. This makes nine per cent., which must be made on a twenty years' lease, before the tenant can clear anything for skill, labour, or risk. All beyond is the farmer's profit, but all below is a dead loss."

This is a fallacy: it is not for outlays in permanent improvements that farmers require more capital than they usually employ under yearly holdings, but for the ordinary routine of good husbandry. Permanent improvements ought to be done by the landlord before letting a farm on lease; and we have no hesitation in saying, that present rents can only be maintained by—first, the landlord executing necessary permanent improvements, such as draining, and so on; and, secondly, by granting long leases as well.

But hear what this monopolist squire wants to screw out of his tenants—tenants admitted by himself to have too little capital to farm well—over and above their present monopoly rents:—

"Now, were my tenant to say, instead of this, 'You shall lay out the £1000 in draining, &c., on your land, and I will pay you the nine per cent. upon it; I mean, which will put out my £1000 into canal or railroad shares, which will give me five per cent., with a little risk as farming. I shall receive five per cent., and shall not have to lay by four per cent., so that it will be exactly the same to me, except that if I die there is no risk to my family, and, so far, it is the better for me.' If, I say, my tenant would come fairly forwards and make me aware that he would not be making a better bargain for himself than he would if he laid out his money on a twenty years' lease."

If a landlord is unable or unwilling to make the necessary preliminary improvements which all good farmers know to be necessary, and he has therefore to let his land in bad condition, the tenant will reasonably require nine per cent. on his outlay, or even more; for such outlays form no part of the tenant's proper business. Such outlays are equivalent to the purchase of additional land, and benefit the landlord for ever just as much as if more land had been recovered from the sea. To induce the tenant to undertake such a speculation, ultimately for the landlord's gain, he must be offered a high premium. But that a landlord is to improve his own land, and charge his tenant a profit of nine per cent. upon the outlay, is so monstrous a proposition that nothing but the grasping habit of mind engendered by monopoly could have induced a sane man to broach it. If landowners can secure two and a half or three per cent. on their outlays in improvements beyond their present rents, they ought to esteem themselves the most fortunate of men; and this they can only hope for by granting long leases of their improved farms. This "farmers' friend" then says:—

"Farmers of the Vale of Gloucester, go any of you and quietly ask any one of the great advocates for leases—'How much capital must a tenant produce in proportion to the size, rent, and quality of his farm, to entitle him to take a twenty years' lease of it?' I will venture to say that, on his decision, there were not ten men in the room at the Spread Eagle competent to take leases on the farms they now occupy. Consider this, gentlemen, before you join in the clamour for leases, and look accurately that you are not cutting the ground from under your own feet."

It is probably true the farmers so coarsely taunted by this protectionist squire do not actually employ so much capital on their land as they know they should do in order to make the most of their farms; but why is it so? Either because they have taken too much land, relying upon the high prices promised—though not given—by act of Parliament; or because they dare not lay out their own money, or cannot obtain on loan any extra capital they may require, for want of secure tenures.

The want of capital said to exist amongst farmers, though true to a certain extent, is much exaggerated. It is not merely because less capital is laid out under yearly tenancies, but because it is laid out in a different way, that yearly tenancies are so injurious to farmers. With a lease a farmer sets to work in earnest at the commencement of his term, and brings his land into high condition: when it is, in fact, cultivated with less actual yearly cost than it would be if only half in condition. But then the land can only be got into this high condition by sinking in it capital which will not be got back for several years. Now, if this were done on a yearly holding, the landlord might, and in nine cases out of ten on some pretence or another would, by a six months' notice, grasp this capital himself.

Tenant-farmers do not and ought not to trust their landlords with such temptations, and therefore it is that nine-tenths of the land of England is only half cultivated. Tenants could and would procure the requisite capital to adopt a far higher system of farming than now prevails, if once their business were put upon a safe foundation, and they could keep the landlords' hands out of their pockets by means of long and reasonable leases. In the same paper in which Squire Baker's modest and moderate proposition is made, he is in the following week thus answered by "A VALE TENANT-FARMER," who says:—

"Now, Mr. Baker insinuates 'The main arguments in favour of leases are, that landlords would find tenants with large capital to improve their land permanently.' If (says he) a tenant takes a farm of me on a twenty years' lease, he has of course a large capital to invest on permanent improvements. I have never understood this to be the principal feature of the argument on that point, neither do I think a tenant would be justified in making permanent improvements. I should say the landlord ought to make them, and charge the tenant a moderate interest upon the outlay, whether under a lease or otherwise. The advantage of leases, in my opinion, is the encouragement of good cultivation, such as subsoiling, levelling, following, manuring, fencing, cleansing water-courses, &c., operations which, if well performed on land, give the tenant an interest in it for several years, and should be secured to him by a lease, the rent varying with the price of produce. This I think would place landlord and tenant on a sound footing; for under the system of continually valuing, and making a tenant pay for his improvements as fast as he makes them, in the shape of additional rent, the farm, landlord, or tenant, can ultimately derive no benefit."

This is true with one exception, viz., that if a squire can catch a tenant-farmer so incautious as to improve without a lease, the farm and the landlord are benefited at the tenant's expense. And the "Vale Tenant-farmer," who seems to quite understand such men as Squire Baker, adds:—

"Mr. Baker suggests that tenants should pay their landlords nine per cent. for their money invested in permanent improvements; but I think it is only difficultly landlords would have to encounter in this respect would be to get some tenants to enter into this engagement. A great deal has been said about landlords and tenants sailing in the same boat—that if one sinks the other cannot swim. For my own part, I should be afraid to embark with Mr. Baker on these terms, for if I treated his land fairly (which I have no doubt he would take care of in black and white), I suspect he would very soon pitch me overboard. And why, let me ask, should Mr. Baker propose to charge three times the amount of interest to a tenant he could obtain with similar good security any other way?—I mean were his investments either landed or funded;—or, in other words, to double his capital vested with his tenant, on his own freehold, in about eleven years, at simple interest, while in any other way it would take him thirty-three years to do so? In my opinion this is not very liberal of Mr. Baker, and improvements cannot progress under such restrictions."

And he thus deals with Mr. Baker's personal insult to the few farmers present at the meeting where he had the audacity to talk of nine per cent. for improving his own land:—

"Mr. Baker's assertion 'that there were not ten men in the room at the Spread Eagle able to cultivate the farms they now occupy, under leases,' is as evasive as it is insulting. The fact is there were more than about fifteen renting farmers present, and I will venture to say the majority of them were competent to take leases on fair terms for twenty, thirty, or forty years. Mr. Baker also asserts that 'if he let his farms on leases, he should exclude most of his present tenants for want of capital.' Now, I know not whether such is the case, but if it is, and their tenancy has been of long duration under him and his family, and they have been tolerably industrious and saving men, which I believe is the case, I think his own assertion does him no credit; nor does it prove they have been treated liberally."

Let the monopolist squire digest that home-thrust as he best may.

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

The following is an extract from a letter by a Dorsetshire farmer, and tenant of one of the members of that county:—

"I speak the truth, never was there a time when more dissatisfaction existed among the tenant-farmers than at present. We begin to find that the major part of the landed proprietors are, to use the term, gulling us on all sides, and profiting themselves and families at our expense. The remedies, in my opinion, are long leases on corn-rents; every farmer his own keeper; reformation in many useless extravagancies, and the money applied to relieve the poor in their own parishes from the rate-book; repeal of the malt and income tax, and an increase of the property tax; and lastly, Free Trade in everything, from one end of the globe to the other, as also the abolition of the game laws. It, therefore, behoves us as men to come forward and make known our wants and deprivations, and secure to ourselves that independency for which the British farmer has been so long held up. But I would further add, they must conduct themselves very differently from heretofore, for which I strongly recommend a tenant-farmers' institution, the object of which would be, the manner of applying for farms, fixing of rents, repairs, management, &c. &c."

The following interesting circumstance in connexion with the registration efforts in the Huddersfield district is sent by a known correspondent:—

"A young man of the name of —, in our neighbourhood, succeeded his father in a small shop, and to what freehold property the old man (who died without will) was possessed of. There are nine in the family, eight sons and one daughter; and the eldest son has lately divided the property among his brothers and sister, and the eight brothers are now on the register for the West Riding, and are all Free-Traders. Thinking that the knowledge of such a truly 'great fact' would afford you some pleasure, I have sent it to you."

REAL AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION.

The farmer must be his own protector. Still, capital and industry, rightly applied, will secure to the farmer fair profits, provided he can shake off his reliance upon that broken reed, legislative protection, and obtain a rational lease. The following sensible and practical letter, addressed to Mr. Cobden, M.P., sets this in a clear light:—

"Catsfield House, near Battle, Feb. 10.

"SIR,—I occupy a farm, of which 90 acres are arable, and 60 acres pasture. In July, 1843, I received a copy of Mr. Hewitt Davis's pamphlet, entitled 'The Injury and Waste of Corn from the present Practice of too thick sowing.' The reasoning appeared so conclusive, that I resolved to reduce my wheat seed on the whole breadth to be sown in the following autumn (25 acres) to two bushels per acre, having in former years sown three, and, when the season was late, three bushels and a half per acre. And here let me remark, lest any one should feel surprise at those quantities, that it is the practice of this part of the country to sow quite as much, and that I know one large farmer, ranking high as an agriculturist, who grows upon an average four hundred acres of wheat annually, and who begins in September with two bushels and a half of seed, gradually increasing until he finishes with four bushels."

"The result of my experiment has been highly satisfactory, having grown upon light and poor land nine sacks per acre on a field of fourteen acres, which, for the last twenty-four years had never, at any one time, produced more than ninety sacks, or barely six sacks and a half per acre. The year was undoubtedly favourable for wheat, and having for the first time used guano, applying 1½ cwt. per acre at seed time, and 1½ cwt. per acre as a top dressing in the following spring, I await the result of a second harvest before the reduction of seed is carried further."

"The following statement contrasts the previous wheat-sowing of the same field with that just spoken of:—

October, 1841.
105 cwt. of rape dust, at 168s. per ton	44	2	0
3 loads of ash to mix, 8s. 4d.	1	6	0
46½ bushels of seed, at 68s. per qr.	19	6	9
	£64	13	9

"The produce was 14 loads of sheaves, ears small, and yielded but 41 quarters, which were sold at 62s. per quarter—£253. 12s.

	£	s.	d.
October, 1843.
21 cwt. of Peruvian guano, 13s. 6d.	14	3	6
¼ load of ash, 8s. 4d.	0	4	2
31½ bushels of seed, at 62s. per qr.	10	4	9
March, 1844.
21 cwt. of Peruvian guano, 12s.	12	12	0
¼ load of ash, 8s. 4d.	0	4	2
	£37	8	7

"The produce was 13 loads of sheaves, ears very large, and yielded 62½ quarters, which have been lately sold at 45s. per quarter, and amounting to £284. 7s. 6d."

"Comment would be superfluous: the figures speak volumes."

"I do not encumber the account with rent, rates, taxes, and labour, because these were about the same in both cases; and the tithe is commuted into a rent-charge."

"It is indeed of paramount importance to the farmer to obtain manure cheap, and of all that I have yet met with guano is beyond comparison the most fertilizing. My present crops were put in with Ichaboe guano, purchased at £7. 10s. per ton, and I believe it to be quite as powerful as the Peruvian."

"The seed is all drilled in, and the reduction was effected by removing two of the delivery pipes, out of seven, and equally spacing the remaining five, thus increasing the distance between the rows to nine inches, and by using the largest cog-wheel belonging to the drill. The wheels used in the two years alluded to were respectively calculated to put in specific quantities of seed; but having very active horses, the intended allowance of seed was rather exceeded in both instances, the difference, however, being precisely one bushel less per acre. In October next, a further experiment shall be made with a new wheel that will drill 14 bushel per acre. The seed of oats and peas was proportionably reduced last year with equal success. It is quite common in this neighbourhood to sow broadcast six bushels of oats per acre. I now drill exactly half that quantity, and find it ample."

"For the last four years I have annually grown two acres of white carrots for milch cows during winter, giving also a few to my horses. The yield has varied from 600 to 800 bushels per acre. Cows are extremely fond of the carrot; they give more milk, better butter, and are in higher condition, with two bushels per day, and a little oat or pea straw, when turned out in May, than they were in previous years when each cow consumed a ton and a half of hay."

"I take the liberty of placing these facts in your hands, in the hope that they may be useful to the cause of Free Trade, fully convinced, as I have long been, that the farmer requires no protection beyond a lease and a corn-rent, and firmly believing there will be no permanent improvement in his prospects until his tenure is altered and the Corn Laws abrogated."

"Pray consider this communication perfectly at your disposal; and accept my apologies for trespassing on your valuable time."

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your most obedient, humble servant,

MR. JOHN LONG AND THE GLOUCESTER-SHIRE FARMERS.

(From the Chatterbox Examiner.)

Some twelve months since, at a public meeting at Gloucester, Mr. John Long proposed to his brother farmers that they should cease dealing with those who favoured a repeal of the Corn Laws. We ventured to point out the absurdity of this recommendation at the time, and to caution the farmers of Gloucestershire against being led by such intemperate men as Mr. John Long to their own ruin. Some months later, at the dinner of the Gloucester Farmers' Club, this same specimen of a tenant-farmer objected to the drinking of Earl Ducie's health, the noble Earl being one of the most liberal patrons of the club; and again we ventured to advise the farmers to separate themselves from such ungrateful and intemperate equities. It seems that the farmers of the Vale of Gloucester are resolved to act upon our advice, and to save themselves from the disgrace of having Mr. John Long for a commander, as the sequel will show. For some months past the Conservative county organ has been devoting a portion of its columns, under the head of "The Protectionist," to stirring up the farmers to resist to the death the repeal of the Corn Laws; in furtherance of this object a society has been established under the title of "The Vale of Gloucester Protection Society," the honorary secretary to which is the proprietor of the forementioned paper, and whose annual meeting was to have been held with much pomp and ceremony on Saturday last. Hints had been thrown out some weeks back that the association was in a very sickly condition; that the hon. secretary and Mr. John Long being the Alpha and Omega of the concern, the tenant-farmers had shown an evident disinclination to have anything to do with it; in fact, it was more than surmised that the annual meeting would never take place, but that the project would drop stillborn from before the public eye. Not so, however, for we find by an article from the "own reporter" of our Monday's contemporary that the association actually met, held their morning meeting, and afternoon dinner, at both of which Mr. John Long was in the chair, at both of which the hon. secretary appeared in his official character, and "at neither of which," as our Conservative friend innocently remarks, "was there a single landlord present!" To be sure there was not; and if our contemporary had added "nor a single tenant either," he would have been pretty near the mark. Perhaps our readers would like to be enlightened as to how these protection societies are conducted, that are to upset the League and its millions, and to arrest the progress of Free Trade throughout the empire. We will tell them. At the morning meeting the attendance was miserable, and the speeches—nowhere; at the dinner, that most attractive reunion to the English yeoman, there were just thirteen present besides the waiters; and this most unlucky number was eked out in the following manner:—Two newspaper reporters; two commercial gentlemen of Gloucester; the Hon. Sec. and his brother; Mr. John Long, the president, and six farmers!!! and yet we are told that "after the cloth was removed the questions of 'protection' and the farmers' prospects were entered upon in right earnest." We should much like to have witnessed the animated discussion which followed, after the removal of the cloth had left these thirteen wise men of Gloucester to their solitude and pleasing reflections. And this is the sorry affair which is to be blazoned forth to the world as a county demonstration, to fortify the Ministry in refusing Free Trade, and to resist the machinations of the League. Dame Partington mopping out the oven with a vengeance! The ancient maxim was a far more compared with this puny attempt to bolster up protection and its "most laud and impotent conclusion."

Two words in conclusion. We hope this will prove to Mr. John Long and his half-dozen associates, that the good sense of the Gloucestershire farmers will keep them from the violent councils which have been sought to be thrust upon them; that they will neither listen to projects of exclusive dealing—revile such men as Earl Ducie, who devote time and money to their service—nor join in fellowship with those who advise them to do so, even though it be to form protection societies. The round dozen assembled at the Spread Eagle on Saturday must be pretty well convinced by this time that the farmers will have none of their guidance; and if protection is only to be fostered by their efforts, the Corn Laws would stand much better without protection than with it.

We have received, from a known correspondent, the following account of the doughty Mr. John Long, who refused to drink Lord Ducie's health at the Gloucester agricultural meeting:—"Mr. Long is tenant under a gentleman of the name of Daniel John Niblett, who is an Anti-Free-Trade, though esteemed as a good landlord. The latter resides at Harefield, and the farm in Mr. Long's occupation is situated in the parish of Whaddon, near Gloucester. Amongst the monopolists Mr. Long is deemed a high authority. He is a valuer of rents of land; also of farming stock, both live and dead. We consider here that he is quite a toady to some of the landlords, though he affects an independence, or what may be termed John Bullism, at times. Some years ago he possessed considerable influence amongst farmers; but, by his assuming so prominent a part on all public matters, he has lost it, as he is not adapted for the office. At the dinner, Mr. Lewis, who sat next him, was the only man who declined to drink Lord Ducie's health. Mr. Long's proceedings on this occasion disgusted several at the meeting; and it is considered almost the finishing stroke to the club, already in a declining state. Mr. Niblett, his landlord, was in the chair, but was himself very desirous that Earl Ducie's health should be drunk. As a proof of the estimation in which Mr. Long is held by his brother-farmers, I may observe that, at a dinner held last Saturday by the Protection Society, when he was in the chair, only eight tenant-farmers were present."

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING IN COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

THE AGGREGATE MEETING of the LEAGUE, in the THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN, will be held on WEDNESDAY EVENING next, the 19th INST. GEORGE WILSON, Esq., will take the Chair at SEVEN O'CLOCK precisely.

The Meeting will be addressed by JAMES WILSON, Esq.; GEORGE THOMPSON, Esq.; and JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., M.P. Tickets of admission to all parts of the House may be had as usual at 67, Fleet-street.

Seats will in future be reserved for all Farmers who may make application at the Offices of the League, up to the hour of meeting, and their attendance, whether favourable or opposed to Free Trade, is especially requested.

BOROUGH OF MARYLEBONE REGISTRATION and FREE-TRADE DINNER.—The MARYLEBONE REFORM and REGISTRATION ASSOCIATION, with others, alive to the important movement now in progress in favour of the great principles of FREE TRADE, have deputed the present a fitting occasion publicly to attempt their promotion by all the means in their power; amongst which, attention to the Registration of Electors is admitted to be of paramount importance. It is hoped that such an occasion may be the means of extending the Reform interest, and of more closely uniting the electors in the pursuit of objects important, not only to the Borough, but to the Empire at large.

A DINNER will take place in the Concert Room of the Princess's Theatre, Great Gable-street, Oxford-street, on Wednesday the 5th of March next, at which their esteemed President, JOHN BACON, Esq., has consented to preside.

The following, amongst other gentlemen, have accepted invitations, and will attend:—Sir B. Hall, Bart., M.P.; Sir G. Napier, Bt., M.P.; J. Hume, Esq., M.P.; W. Ewart, Esq., M.P.; E. Cobden, Esq., M.P.; J. Bright, Esq., M.P.; T. M. Gibson, Esq., M.P.; General Sir De Lacy Evans, and W. J. Fox, Esq.

By order of the Committee, WILLIAM ALLEN, Secretary. Feb. 5, 1845. N.B. Tickets, Five Shillings each, may be had of the Secretary, at the Office of the Association, 67, Warren-street, Fitzroy-square.

* Several letters and other articles in type, are unavoidably postponed.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newell's-buildings Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, February 15, 1845.

Just as we were going to press, Sir Robert Peel had risen to make his promised financial statement. The anxiety with which the public has looked forward to this exposition of the course of fiscal policy about to be pursued by Ministers is greatly increased by the profound secrecy which the Premier has preserved respecting his intentions. It is a signal proof of the great progress that Free-Trade opinions have made that men of all parties, save those who have a personal interest in exclusiveness, are expressing their hopes that there will be a great reduction in the duties on articles of consumption, so as to allow of greater freedom of import, which nobody now denies to be necessary to any expansion of exports. Several articles have been mentioned, the duties on which are notoriously onerous and impolitic, as likely to have their present rates of admission either wholly remitted or very considerably reduced. We need not indulge in any conjectures, however plausible, as a very few hours will bring us certainty on the subject; but we cannot avoid expressing our fears that, on the most important articles of consumption, Sir Robert Peel will be too much fettered by the monopolists who have raised him to power, to venture on proposing that extension of freedom of import which is alike demanded by common justice and sound policy.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Uniform Postage Bill was defeated in the Chamber of Deputies on Saturday. There were 179 votes for the reduction of the rates of postage, and 144 against it; but the President having added his vote, the numbers were rendered even, and the proposition rejected. In the Chamber of Peers, on Monday, Count Darnéville gave notice of a proposition to repress the unlimited speculation which has for some length of time been carried on in railroad shares. It is intended that henceforward no subscription shall be opened for the construction of any railroad which has not been authorized by the Chambers. The minimum of the first deposit must amount to one-fifth of the price of each share, and any violation of this regulation to be punished by the application of the 419th article of the Penal Code.

The French Government continue to display vigour in pursuit of the hordes of murderers and thieves with which Paris is notoriously overrun. On Saturday last a considerable military force, placed under the direction of three commissaries of police, surrounded two public establishments on the Boulevard du Temple—the Café de Pay-de-Dôme and the Caveau—the haunts of malefactors and receivers of stolen goods. Upwards of 200 individuals were arrested and marched to the Prefecture of Police, in bands of 20 and 30 at a time, after the commissaries had taken down their names and abodes.—Times correspondent.

SPAIN.—Letters from Madrid of the 4th and 5th inst., announce that the member of the Representative Chamber who had stolen from the house of General Narvaez certain articles of plate, was expelled the Chamber (of Deputies) on the 4th inst.

We learn from these letters that blame was attached to the commandant of the fort at Europa Point, who lately fired on a Spanish vessel (the same who some three or four months since sunk another Spanish vessel), and that he had in consequence been superseded. The Spanish Government expressed itself satisfied with this reparation.

HOLLAND.—During the past year French goods of the value of twelve millions of francs were imported into this country, being a decrease of five millions compared with the preceding year. French exports, however, to the Dutch colonies had considerably increased. The Utrechtische Courant states that the British and Foreign Bible Society at London have resolved to print, for the future, the Dutch editions in this country, and not, as hitherto, in London or Brussels. It adds that an order for 10,000 copies of the Dutch Lutheran Testament has been given to a printer in Amsterdam.

THE GERMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.—The priest John Rouge, in Breslau, and his followers, have, after several meetings, finally constituted their church, and adopted the confession of faith put forth by the priest Czerski, the leader of the community of German Catholic Christians in Schneidmühl, in East Prussia. Subscriptions have been raised in many towns of Germany for the purpose of providing Czerski with the necessary funds for building a regular place of worship of his own, the service according to the new ritual hitherto having been held in a private dwelling. Two Roman Catholic priests in the province of Posen, Hubert, priest in the town of Raszkow, and a country curate of the name of Wodzinski, have declared in his favour, and their Polish flock have followed the example of their pastors. An officer of the Prussian army, who asked the King to permit him to join Czerski, received the answer that there were no objections to his doing so, the new German Catholic confession being recognised by the state, and as such under its protection; and there is little doubt that the number of these seceders from Papal authority will rapidly increase throughout Germany.—German paper.

THE REV. DR. WOLFF.—Captain Grover has received intelligence of Dr. Wolff to the 10th of January, at which date he was at Erzeroum, endeavouring to recruit his strength for the journey over the mountains to Trebizonde. At Teheran the Doctor was received in the kindest manner by Colonel Shiel, her Majesty's Envoy, who sent a Government groom to meet him. He left Teheran in a "tuckravan" (a sort of litter), and by easy stages reached Tabriz. Here the judicious treatment of Dr. Casolani enabled him, after some days' repose, to proceed by a similar conveyance towards Erzeroum. On reaching the Turkish frontier, owing to the immense accumulation of snow, he was obliged to proceed on horseback, and after great bodily suffering, he reached Erzeroum on the 4th of January, completely exhausted, where he was kindly received by Colonel Williams, her Majesty's Commissioner.

WEST INDIES.—The Dee, Royal Mail steam-ship, reached Southampton on Monday.

By the Nassau Royal Gazette we find that the legislature of the Bahamas met on the 16th of December. His Excellency Governor Mathew opened the session in a speech of some length. Alluding to the scarcity of food that had been felt, Governor Mathew says:—"It has pleased an all-seeing Providence to visit these islands with the heavy affliction of famine during the past summer; but I am happy to be enabled to inform you that the chief pressure of want appears now to be past, and that private and public benevolence (to which the lives of very many are owing) was most liberally afforded during its continuance."

UNITED STATES.—The steam-ship Cambria arrived at Liverpool on Thursday morning. She brings important news from Mexico, which reached New-York on the 5th ult. By the schooner Sarah Ann, Captain Davidson, from Tampico, the New Orleans Tropic has papers from the city of Mexico to the 4th ult., and private advices as late as the 9th. Santa Anna has met another San Jacinto defeat, and is now a miserable captive. His war has shot madly from its zenith, and he whose light word was law, a brief period since, has fallen so low that there are "none so poor as to do him reverence." The latter announcing the battle says, that news to the 5th had been received by express from Mexico. Captain Davidson himself puts no confidence in this. Captain Davidson says, that although Santa Anna was contending against such vast odds, his situation was not deemed in any way desperate. It is reported in New-York that the state of Pennsylvania will not pay her debt. A series of resolutions for the annexation of Texas had passed the House of Representatives by a majority of 111, and eventually a bill for the same object passed by a majority of 17.

TAHITI.—Private letters to the 3rd of November, from Valparaiso, bring us the latest news from Tahiti. The

MEMORIALS.
THE CRITIC, No. XXVII., of this day, contains the JOURNAL OF MEMORIALS, detailing many new and interesting cases, and the Proceedings of the Memorial Society. The CRITIC contains also Reviews, with copious extracts, of all the new Books, Music, and Works of Art; Literary Intelligence, &c. &c.; and the Principles and Policy of YOUNG ENGLAND. Communications of new and interesting Investigations in Memorials are requested. Published at the Office, 29, Newgate-street, Strand, on the 1st and 15th of each month, price 6d., or 7d. stamped. A number, as a specimen, sent to any person enclosing two postage stamps.

Just published, price 30s., handsomely bound, gilt or marbled edges.
CORNER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF CHINA AND INDIA, with a descriptive account of those countries, and their inhabitants, from the earliest period of authentic record to the present time; in which the author has treated not only of the historical events, but also of the manners, customs, religion, literature, and domestic habits of the people of those immense empires. The embellishments are of the first order, illustrating whatever is peculiar to the inhabitants regarding their dress, domestic occupations, their mode of agriculture, commercial pursuits, art, &c. The plates, 32 in number, are printed in the new style of tinted lithography; and, with the wood engravings, of which there are 118, are executed by artists of celebrity. WOLVERHAMPTON, WOLVERHAMPTON, DUDLEY, and BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.

THE COMMITTEE OF MANAGEMENT have to express their satisfaction that the Board of Trade has reported in favour of the Main Line of this Railway from WOLVERHAMPTON to BIRMINGHAM. The Company's Engineers having carefully revised the Estimates, including a Branch from Wolverhampton to the Grand Junction Railway, recommend the adoption of quadruple lines of Rail between Birmingham and Wolverhampton, in accordance with the suggestions of the Board of Trade, and which the immense mineral traffic of the district will render necessary. The Committee of Management are happy to state that, with large allowances for contingencies, the Capital required will not exceed £1,100,000, which estimate has accordingly been inserted in their Bill now before Parliament. By Order, GEORGE KNOW, Secretary.

TO CAPITALISTS, BUILDERS, JOINT STOCK COMPANIES, &c.
NEW HOTEL or DORMITORY.—WANTED very much, in a healthy and industrially central part of the west end of London, a new, commodious, and well-managed HOTEL, with a property vested in other money, due regard being paid to its structure to the quibbles of the sleeping apartments, and where the Proprietor shall be able to have his object the supplying a portion of the very large number of gentlemen daily arriving in the Metropolis with comfortable Beds and Breakfasts, Wines and Spirits. The attention of persons well qualified for Housekeeping is likewise particularly directed to this advertisement, as it offers a suggestion whereby there is no doubt such persons may realize a handsome fortune. Apply for further information, daily, at the different London Railway Stations.

FATHER MATHEW.
NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, 39, Moor-gate-street.—As it is intended shortly to close the SUBSCRIPTION in aid of the REV. THEOBALD MATHEW, the Committee appeal once more to the sympathies of the British nation to relieve this distinguished philanthropist from his embarrassments. The same received at present amount to £394. 7s., including the following donations:—
The Duke of Bedford .. .. £50
Lord John Russell .. .. 25
Anonymous, per ditto .. .. 50
Jos. J. Gurney, Esq. .. .. 25
Samuel Gurney, Esq. .. .. 25
Edward Thomas, Esq. .. .. 21
Joseph Eaton, Esq. .. .. 20
Christopher Bowly, Esq. .. .. 20

The Committee earnestly hope that the numerous friends of Mr. Mathew will avail themselves of the opportunity now afforded of contributing to relieve him from his difficulties. The sum hitherto contributed falls far short of the anticipated amount. Subscriptions will be received by the Treasurer, G. W. Alexander, Esq., 40, Lombard-street; by the Secretary, Theodore Compton, Esq., 39, Moor-gate-street; and by the following bankers, viz., Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, and Co.; Messrs. Hankey and Co.; Messrs. Glyn and Co.; Messrs. Manson and Co.; and the London Joint-Stock Bank.

JONES'S £4. 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES, warranted not to vary more than 1 minute per week, are selling at the Manufactory, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset-house. They combine the truth of a mathematical instrument with the elegance of an ornament of taste. On receipt of a Post-office order for 1s. above the price, a Watch will be sent free to any part of the kingdom. Read Jones's "Sketch of Watch Work," sent free for a 2d. stamp.

VAL DE PENAS, of excellent quality, £18 the Quarter Cask; or in Bottle, 3s. per Dozen. MARALA WINES, finest imported, 21s. and 27s. per Dozen; or in Wood, £12 and £13 the Quarter Pipe. W. MILLS respectfully solicits the attention of the Gentry, Professional Gentlemen, and the Public, to his well-seasoned Stock of CABINET and LIBRARY FURNITURE, manufactured on the Premises, which will be found, upon trial, cheaper than the fragile articles imported on the public by public establishments. N.B. Repairs, French Polishing, &c. &c., executed in a superior manner. Second-hand Furniture taken in exchange.

No. 59, STRAND.
DRESS COATS to measure, 60s. Opposite the Adelphi Theatre. EDMISTON and SONS.

SHOOLBRED and CO., 34, Jermyn-st., St. James's, beg respectfully to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that they have now, for many years, supplied the best and most fashionable articles of Dress at prices considerably lower than those usual at the West End. They have therefore taken this opportunity of introducing their name to the notice of those gentlemen who wish to be supplied with a well-made article combined with the excellent quality.

DO you want a good and smart-fitting COAT, VEST, or TROUSERS? If you do, go to the cheapest Tailoring and Out-fitting Establishment in the United Kingdom, 40, KING WILLIAM STREET, CITY, two doors from London-bridge, where you will find one of the largest, cheapest, and best assortments of Clothing in the world, at such prices that will positively astonish the beholder, and, upon comparison, will be found fully to realize the proprietor's assertion. Observe the address, M. SAMUEL, two doors from London-bridge.

THE BEST STEEL PENS.—GEORGE and JOHN DEANE have constantly in stock a large assortment of WINDLE'S CELEBRATED STEEL PENS, comprising not less than one hundred and fifty varieties adapted to all the exigencies of Penmanship. Deane's Two-hole Black Pen, the very facsimile of the natural quill, is the general favourite with the clergy, the legal profession, and with merchants, bankers, and their assistants.—George and John Deane, 46, King William-street, London-bridge.

NOTICE.—MR. LEWIS, the Inventor of the New Systems of WRITING, ARITHMETIC, and SHORTHAND, respectfully announces his arrival in Manchester, where he intends giving instructions in those useful and necessary branches of Education; likewise the most approved methods of BOOKKEEPING, both by Single and Double Entry. For Terms, &c., apply to Mr. Lewis, at his teaching-rooms, No. 13, Oxford-road, corner of George-street. Pupils may attend any hour from ten till four, and from six till ten in the evening.

PRICE and GOSNELL'S PERFUMERY.
(Performer of the late JOHN GOSNELL versus REES PRICE, Per-fumer 24, Lombard-street.)
The Judge in the Court of Exchequer this day decided in favour of the plaintiff in this case. The defendant, Rees Price, had disposed of his interest in the Perfumery and other trades carried on by the late firm of Price and Gosnell, to the late Mr. John Gosnell (father of the parties now carrying on business under the firm of John Gosnell and Co., 12, Three King-court, Lombard-street), and he used himself, under the name of Price, to continue business within the City of London or Westminster, or within the distance of 100 miles from the same, and, notwithstanding this, had carried on business. This action was brought to recover liquidated damages for such breach of contract.—12, Three King-court, Lombard-street, Jan. 27, 1845.

THE Public are respectfully informed that HENRY PENNY'S ORIGINAL METALLIC PAPER MEMORANDUM BOOKS are to be had of any respectable Stationer in town or country, and the trade can be supplied by any of the wholesale houses in London. Nine years' extensive sale has proved that the writing on METALLIC PAPER (taken chemically prepared) is not to be obliterated, neither will the friction of the leaves at a distance of 100 miles from the place of issue, or the many numerous imitations bearing the name of Metallic, but which in fact are not in any way prepared, and are written on with common lead (made like Metallic Paper), but are neither so durable nor so good. In order to protect the public from such imitations, H. P. has recently commenced making METALLIC BOOKS of a second quality of binding, which causes a considerable reduction in price, so that now can be obtained the original books in the West and Second Bindings. H. P. has ascertained that many books have been sold bearing the name "Penny" in Gold Letters on the back, which were not made by him, all his Best Books have H. PENNY'S IMPROVED PATENT, with the No. of the book in Gold Letters on the back (observe H.). And his Second Quality have a label inside, printed, H. PENNY'S Second Quality.

AFRICAN GUANO.—The above MANURE, from Ichaboe, on SALE.—Apply to DABY and SIM, Importers, Liverpool, 1845.

DRAWING and DINING ROOM CURTAINS and CARPETS.—THOMAS PAUL and CO. having purchased many thousand pieces of BRUSSELS CARPETS, of elegant fashionable patterns, at less than half their value, are giving the advantage to the public. A selection may be made from this large quantity, commencing at 2s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. The reduction on the materials for curtains may be effected by royal damasks, some as low as 6d. per yard; silk tabarets, 2s. 6d.; and chintzes, all wide, 4d. The immense stock of Cabinet Furniture is of the most approved style, workmanship, and finish, and full 50 per cent. under the general charges. A written warranty for any period of time is given where required. N.B. Ladies' fancy work elegantly and moderately made up.—Furniture and Carpet Warehouse, opposite the Mansion House, City.

LUXURY IN SHAVING.
JOHN GOSNELL and CO'S AMBROSIAL SHAVING CREAM (Patronised by Prince Albert). This invaluable Cream possesses all the good qualities of the Finest Naples Soap, without the disagreeable smell inseparable from that article in a genuine state. It is of a white pearly silvery appearance, produces a creamy lather which will not dry on the face, and suits in use the delightful flavor of the almond. In Pots, price 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., &c. Perfumers to Her Majesty, 12, Three King-court, Lombard-street, London. Manufacturers of Combs and Brushes of the best quality, and on the most approved principles.

ROWLAND'S UNIQUE PREPARATIONS.
Under the Patronage of the several Sovereigns and Courts of Europe, and universally preferred.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for the Growth, Preservation, and for Beautifying the HUMAN HAIR. Price 3s. 6d., 7s.; Family Bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d., and double that size 21s. per bottle. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for Improving and Beautifying the SKIN and COMPLEXION. Price 4s. 6d. and 2s. 6d. per bottle, duty included. ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, for the TEETH and GUMS. Price 2s. 6d. per box, duty included.

CAUTION.
Spurious Compounds are frequently offered for sale, under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty), the labels, bills, and advertisements of the original articles are copied, and either a fictitious name, or the word "Genuine" is used in the place of "Rowland's." It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the word "ROWLAND'S" is on the wrapper of each article. For the protection of the Public from fraud and imposition, the Honorable Commissioners of Stamps have directed the Proprietors' signature to be engraved on the Government Stamp, thus:—A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, HATTON GARDEN, Which is affixed on the Kalydor and Odonto. Sold by the Proprietors, and by Chemists and Perfumers. * * All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!

STOOPING of the SHOULDERS and CONTRACTION of the CHEST are entirely prevented, and easily and effectually removed, in Youth and Ladies and Gentlemen, by the occasional use of the PATENT ST. JAMES'S CHEST EXPANDER, which is light, simple, easily employed outwardly or inwardly, without bending beneath the arms, uncomfortable restraint, or impediment to exercise. Sent per post, by Mr. A. BIRTON, 40, Tavistock-street, Strand, London; or full particulars on receiving a postage stamp.

EDEMATOUS LEGS.—Persons who from a long residence abroad, sprains, contusions, &c., are suffering from Edema, dropsical or other affections of the Leg, will derive great benefit from the use of the Patent Elastic Stocking, which bandage, together with the Patent Elastic Knee Cap, Belt, &c., have for many years secured the patronage of the most eminent surgeons. The Bandages can be sent by post, by which means also the directions for measurement will be forwarded on receipt of a line addressed to the Patentees. Shoobred and Co., 24, Jermyn-street, St. James's.

JACK FROST'S LETTER
TO E. MOSES and SON.

I trust, Messrs. MOSES, you'll grant your attention, To one or two things I'm anxious to mention. You're lately had days so remarkably pleasant, That Winter seem'd to end at least for the present; You've fancied, no doubt, that my powers were lost, But now you have still to be plagued by "Jack Frost." I still mean to freeze you like the lake and the rivers, And scatter my snow flakes while every one shivers; I still mean to let my bright letters freeze While they drop from the lancet's sharp edge on the nose. Yes, in spite of the frolicsome attempts of Miss Spang, "Jack Frost" is resolute that he still will be King. And therefore, I trust, Messrs. MOSES and Son, That you'll lend me your warm Winter garments on loan, You must still keep your warm Winter garments on loan, That people may cold blighting winds may withstand. Let the stock of your garments at once be increased— I shall want twenty thousand warm wrappers at least. I'm certain the public will shortly require An astonishing increase of Winter attire! Yes, thousands before the mild Spring is begun, Will purchase warm clothing of MOSES and Son. And now, Messrs. MOSES, I beg to conclude, In case you should happen to think I intrude; And at once (with the hope that my hints won't be lost), I remain your obedient servant, JACK FROST.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.
The Public are especially informed that, during the re-erection of E. MOSES and SON'S premises in Aldgate, the entrance to their Establishment is only at 154, Mitre-lane. A new work, entitled "The Commercial Phenomenon," with full directions for self-insurance, on application, will be forwarded post free.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quattrin Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund. By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

Manchester, Jan. 13, 1845.

The League Bazaar will be held during the month of May next, in the Theatre Royal Covent Garden.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

THE COUNTIES.

Those of our readers—we trust a large and increasing number—who have learned to interest themselves in the details of registration business, are aware that we last week recorded a judicial decision of capital importance to the future prospects of the Free-Trade cause. Under the heading "REGISTRATION APPEALS, Marshall, appellant—Bown, respondent," we reported the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, affirming a legal doctrine on which large numbers of our friends had already acted, viz.:—the validity of purchases of freehold property made by two, three, or more persons JOINTLY, for the avowed purpose of securing the county franchise. This decision had been looked for with the utmost interest, doubts having been thrown out whether a plurality of votes could be legally constituted for a single lot of freehold property, conveyed to a number of joint purchasers by one deed, and paid for in one sum. These doubts are now cleared up, and the legality of such an arrangement is placed beyond all question. The result is of first-rate practical importance. It is ruled by the supreme court of appeal on matters of electoral law (a question being left open, as our legal readers will observe, with regard to the necessity of certain technical conditions which in the particular case had been complied with), that any number of persons may unite in buying a freehold property, for the declared purpose of obtaining county votes, and, provided each purchaser's share is of the clear annual value of forty shillings, he has a right to be put on the register. His franchise is as full and indefeasible, his vote at the polling-booth counts for as much, as that of the heir to an estate worth £50,000 a year.

For our own part, we had little apprehension as to the issue of this case. We did not contemplate the possibility of a judicial decision divorcing, from any bond fide annual 40s. worth of freehold property, whether severally or jointly purchased and conveyed, that franchise which both the spirit and letter of the ancient law of the land have annexed to it. Yet, knowing as we do the amount of hope and effort which a contrary result would have frustrated, we cannot but heartily congratulate our friends, the new freehold constituencies of the northern counties, that their electoral rights are placed beyond the reach of doubt. Their public-spirited exertions have not been thrown away. The £200,000, or £250,000, which, since last October, have been invested in the soil of England by the Free-Traders of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Cheshire—in a large number of cases, on the faith of the legal doctrine now judicially affirmed—will yield their due return, not only of liberal pecuniary percentage, put of political enfranchisement. South Lancashire, the West Riding, and North Cheshire are now our own, without let or hindrance, by a title which only awaits for its completion the formality of the next registration.

"A quarter of a million of money spent in buying votes—how benevolent! how prodigal!" or "how unconstitutional!" will be some people's comments on the affair. Not at all. It is neither the one nor the other. The men of the north can be benevolent enough on fit occasion; but in this particular business we see nothing to compliment them on but their extreme good sense and intelligent activity. They have been prodigal of nothing except time and trouble. As for the "Constitution," their respect for it is sufficiently evidenced by their eagerness to possess and enjoy its franchises. We must explain the matter a little. The people of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Cheshire have not laid out this quarter of a million of money in buying votes. They have simply invested their money, on the finest security in the world, and at an excellent rate of interest. The vote is a free gift of the law and constitution of England—annexed, by certain good old statutes, to that particular description of investment. The quarter of a million of money is not lost nor thrown away: there it is still, yielding an annual return of six or eight per cent., and the principal is at any time recoverable on demand. It is as simple and regular a business transaction as paying money into a savings'-bank: the difference being that the rate of interest is double, and that the constitution of the country superadds a civil franchise to the proprietary right. When the skilled operative or frugal tradesman takes his £30 out of the bank to buy a bit of ground that returns him 40s. a year, we have frequently known it done in the north of England, where cottage property is purchased jointly, it is quite a mistake to say that he buys a vote. He gets his vote gratis. It is given him, over and above, by the old constitutional law of England; a law whose rationale is, that a little independent property is some sort of guarantee for the independence of a man's politics, and that a visible, tangible stake in the country is the only needful qualification for the highest degree of citizenship.

In calling on the industrious classes of this country—those who, whether by the industry of head or hands, make and keep the country—to come forward and take up their freedom, by complying with the cheap and simple condition on which the law of the land offers it, we suggest nothing in the shape of trick or finesse. They have a stake in England; that is a fact already. We invite them to register that fact—to make themselves legal and actual as well as virtual shareholders in their own country—to take out their certificates of citizenship—and, by one vigorous and united effort, wrest the government out of the hands of the sordid and greedy idlers that tax their bread, chain their industry, take toll of their earnings, and mock their cry for justice. There is nothing artificial or crooked about this move in the counties. Nothing can be more natural and straightforward. Fairly worked out, it will do more to put reality and sincerity into our politics than any agitation this island has yet seen. It will turn the most disgraceful political sham of these times into a great fact: it will make county elections real. It will make the old complimentary formula, "Worthy and independent electors," no longer an impudent lie, but a most indisputable truth. No electoral worth and independence is like that of the voter whose franchise is representative of his own honest industry. There is nothing violent or "revolutionary" about it. Its tendencies are all conservative and restorative—conservative of the rights and rewards of industry, restorative of the principles and spirit of the best parts of our ancient constitution. The modern innovation of the tenancy-at-will "franchise," as they pleasantly call it, has extinguished county elections: as Lord Stanley says, you have only to count up "the great landed proprietors," with the number of votes that each of them has in his pocket, and there is your election. It must be the work of the ancient freehold franchise to restore county elections, by bringing into the field a constitutional democracy of little landed proprietors—an industrial landed interest. Every way, this is an honest as it is a legal movement. The industry of towns, the intelligence of towns, has a right to be represented in counties, for the towns make the counties. The power that makes Lancashire to differ from Buckinghamshire, and Middlesex to differ from Huntingdonshire—who will dare say that it has not the right to rule Lancashire and Middlesex?

The more closely and circumstantially we have looked into this matter, the more entirely are we convinced that the forty-shilling freehold franchise is the weapon by which the industry of England is to come victorious out of the conflict with feudalism. Taking our stand on the good old constitution of our country; availing ourselves of that venerable relic of our ancient electoral law which annexes political rights to the wages of labour when invested in the soil, it is within the power of us, the working millions of this island, to get into our own hands the control and management of those vast national resources of which we are the creators. This is the cheapest, simplest, and most accessible form of the elective franchise. There is, indeed, much good work yet to be done in the boroughs, towards completing the electoral lists up to the measure which the law allows and intends. But we cannot conquer by the boroughs alone. Some fifty or so of them are, as we said last week, hopelessly sealed against us; and, generally, the law of borough franchise and registration is in a state which renders popular action by means of it peculiarly difficult. To get and keep a borough vote is comparatively an expensive process. To take a £10 house, furnish it, keep it, and live up to it is far less within the power of many working men than to invest from £25 to £50 in the purchase of forty shillings of annual income accruing from land. The effort needed for this, once made, is made once for all: from the moment the money is paid the man becomes a shareholder for life in the sovereignty of the country. We tell the industrious classes of England that if, with this magnificent resource within their reach, they will not use it for their own liberation—if they actually will not take shares in their own country, and wrench it from the grip of the idle and insolent few that portion daughters, pay interest on mortgages, and "maintain a station in society" by levying blackmail on their earnings—they deserve to be Richmonded and Buckinghamed to the end of the chapter. There cannot well be a more shameful self-contradiction than that of men crying for "more franchise," while neglecting the franchises that the law already gives them. We have seen enough of the temper of the trading and working classes in those counties where the question has been put before them in a practical shape, to know that their honourable desire for political enfranchisement is too real and earnest for that.

We shall take many future opportunities of returning to this subject; less with the view of stirring up public feeling on the matter, than of showing, with detailed reference to specific localities, in what channels and by what means the feeling already excited may most profitably express itself. For the present, we have only one more to remind our readers that the splendid electoral victories necessary to the carrying of the Free-Trade question are not to be had without a vast deal of work—hard, dry, disagreeable work—begun, carried on, and ended months and even years before the day of actual conflict, and apart from all the exciting and stimulating influences of an election time. We beseech them to remember that the next general election—an election which in its consequences, immediate and remote, will be one of the most important in the history of Great Britain—will not be carried by enthusiasm. Since the Reform Act, elections never have been carried by enthusiasm. That act effected a revolution in our politics (otherwise than by its clauses of enfranchisement and disfranchisement) which, from its very nature, the people have been slow of practically appreciating: it is to be hoped we understand it now, or we have bitter and humiliating lessons in store that will teach us. The Reform Act disfranchised septennial enthusiasm; put bustings' eloquence and popular excitement in Schedule A; and transferred the franchise to the family of the sober, patient, plodding virtues. The country can never again be taken by storm (as in 1830) in the power of a good popular "cry." The "cry" is good for nothing without the votes; the votes are good for nothing if they are not registered; and they will not be registered if people do not attend to it. A self-acting registry is a political invention reserved, to all appearance, for a future and more fortunate generation. Enthusiasm and patriotism are invaluable qualities: only they positively must be trained to send in claims, sustain and resist objections, read acts of Parliament, and inspect the lists on the church-doors. We must have our enthusiasm, not septennially, but annually, and all the year round. Rather, we must have that which is better than enthusiasm—the earnestness, principle, and heart in the cause of truth and justice, which enable a man to make daily, unconsciously and as by habit, those little efforts and little sacrifices of leisure and convenience which are needed for the practical triumph of a great principle. Patriotism for the year 1845, means quiet, systematic, unsleeping attention to the details of registration business—the sort of attention which a prudent man pays to the details of his ledger and his bank-book.

THE BUDGET.

The most remarkable feature in Sir Robert Peel's much-lauded budget is, that the income-tax on trades, offices, and professions is to be continued, for the purpose of maintaining the West India monopoly. Schedule D, though recognised to be unjust, inquisitorial, and oppressive, must be forced on the industrial classes, that the fruits of their toil may swell the profits of the lords of the sugar-hogs-heads. An equalization of the sugar duties to the present colonial rate would have given sugar to consumers at a price equally low with that which may be expected from the Premier's new arrangement—would consequently have produced an equally extended consumption—and have secured a revenue of at least six millions; but nearly three millions of this revenue are recklessly slung to the high and mighty powers of Mining-lane, and a tax is maintained on the precarious and fluctuating incomes derived from personal occupations and labours to supply the deficiency. No man could for a moment believe that the landlords in the House of Commons would allow the incomes of farmers to be thus grievously mulcted for the support of the monopolists of Mining-lane, if they did not require the aid of the West India interest to prop up the food monopoly. Mr. James Wilson's speech, which will be found in our report of the Covent Garden meeting, enters so fully into the facts and figures of the case, that we need not go over the same ground here; but we wish to rivet public attention on the galling fact that the inquisitorial tax on income derived from offices, trades, and professions, is continued, not for the exigencies of Government, but for the maintenance of the public revenue, not solely and exclusively for the sustentation of monopoly. The monopolists are not satisfied with being protected in their system of public plunder unless they make the plundered pay the cost of the protection. Sir Robert Peel, in his long and laboured speech, offered neither explanation nor defence of this monstrous wrong inflicted on the industrial classes. He merely announced that differential duties were to be maintained; but he did not attempt to assign any reason why the people of England should pay annual tribute to the proprietors of land in the West Indies. His silence on this point, when contrasted with the diffuseness of his dissertations on all other parts of his financial policy, is sadly significant; it showed a lurking consciousness of the wrong which he was labouring to perpetuate—a conviction that his plausibilities could not cover what was so palpably indefensible, and a reluctance to confess that he could only rely for support on the obstinacy of selfishness. To the combination of selfish interests we are sacrificing the entire commerce of the New World. The monopoly of provisions cuts off our trade with the United States, the monopoly of sugar produces the same result with the Brazilian trade; and the purpose to which the income-tax subserves is to enable the Minister to effect such wanton destruction of our natural commerce and our national resources. The income-tax on trades and professions is not only injurious in itself, but it is expressly and almost avowedly maintained for working further and incalculable injury to the industrial classes by which it is paid; they are grievously mulcted, not for the protection of themselves, not for the benefit of the nation, not for the service of the state, but for the direct injury of all—for the exclusion of the products of British industry from the best markets and the most profitable markets. It would be a wiser because a more simple and honest policy to pay the West Indian proprietors regular stipends, as the army and navy are paid, rather than to give them their profits by circuitous and fraudulent means: the English people, under present circumstances, have not only to give these men the annuities, but have to pay the expense of the tortuous and indirect means by which the amount is levied, and the cost of the fraud by which the extortion is disguised. The absurdity of the distinction between slave-grown and free-grown sugar—that precious specimen of Sandonian morality deduced from the wooden bible—is so patent and palpable that the Premier did not attempt its defence. He will not be allowed to preserve his discreet silence, even though he has declared that his arrangements are merely temporary. The commerce of South America is infinitely more valuable to the country than the consistency of Lord Sandon, or the purse morality of Mr. Goulburn, or even the new-born zeal against slavery which has suddenly distinguished the house of Gladstone.

In one important particular—important so far at least as principle is concerned—Sir Robert Peel has put in practice the League doctrine of total and immediate repeal, by removing at once every impost on the exportation of British produce and manufactures; but the laws of trade are as invariable as the laws of nature; we cannot have exports unless we receive a proportionate amount of imports, for the simple reason that we cannot sell our goods to other nations unless we are prepared to take what they have to offer us as payment. There is no such thing as a one-sided commerce; the course of trade establishes its own reciprocity infinitely better than any treaty that has been framed since the days of Pericles, and legislative interference can no more guide and direct the natural balance of trade than it can predestinate the ebb and flow of the tide. In both cases unwise and artificial structures may close markets and choke harbours, but the great highway of nations still remains open, and commerce will go to the markets where there is depth of wisdom as ships to the harbours where there is depth of water.

We doubt not that the remission of the duty on cotton, and the total removal of the onerous and perplexing excise on glass, will give a great stimulus to production in these important branches of British manufacture. But we do not appreciate very highly the financial wisdom of stimulating production, and at the same time keeping the markets closed where that produce can be profitably sold. We know that the monopolies which now close those markets cannot be perpetuated: Sir Robert Peel himself confesses that his arrangements are but temporary by making the sugar duties an annual vote. But nothing can be more impolitic or more destructive to sound commerce than the uncertainty produced by merely temporary arrangements. At this very moment there is a hesitation in some of the most important branches of business because no man is able to calculate what another year may bring forth.

We do not regard the budget with the admiration that has been bestowed upon it by some of our contemporaries. The abolition of the duty on exports, however important as a recognition of principle, is but miserable in amount; for only one article, the duty on which was imposed by the Premier himself, namely, coal, remained to be liberated from restriction. The removal of duties on raw material is confined to the class of duties which, in point of principle, was the least objectionable; because, however impolitic were the duty on cotton and the excise of glass, the amount they produced went directly to the revenue: they did not, like the duties on timber, sugar, and corn, serve merely for the profit of selfish classes at the expense of the nation, and with a direct loss to the state. The change in the sugar duties, so far from being an advance in the direction of Free Trade, is, in fact, a retrograde movement in favour of the monopolists. On this subject we beg attention to the following extract from a letter which has been sent us by a valued correspondent long and extensively engaged in the sugar trade:—

"Now, as to Peel's measures, so far as I know, they are most of them good measures except the sugar proposition, and if they cannot be altered it is a perfect delusion. Last year the Free-Traders were blamed for dividing with Peel and supporting him against Miles, by which means a larger protection on clayed sugar was prevented. But Sir Robert Peel's scheme this year is Miles's over again, or worse. The duty on West Indian or British colonial is to be 14s.; clayed, 16s. 4d., of which there is none at present. The duty on free-labour foreign is to be 25s. 4d.; but thou wilt see that Sir Robert Peel, in his speech, only expects to bring in 5000 tons of that quality; for the best of all reasons—nearly all the foreign is clayed; so that the competition will be virtually between British at 14s., and foreign at 28s., or 100 per cent. protection, and the public, instead of getting their 14d. per lb., will only get 4d. Now, with the duties at 25s. 3d. and 35s. 9d., as they are now, the protection is 40 to 45 per cent., but with the duties at 14s. and 23s. 4d. the proportion is 65 to 70 per cent., so that the people of England are to have the inquisitorial income-tax perpetuated upon them in order to put money into the pockets of the West Indians. A very large boon has been granted to the West Indians in the large reduction of duty without increasing the relative protection; and I do say, if the measure passes as it is, that the people of this country will be most shamefully imposed upon."

In fact, Sir Robert Peel has struck his colours to Mr. Miles, and not only adopted the vicious principle of that gentleman's amendment of last year, but has even granted a greater amount of protection than the monopolists themselves then ventured to demand. Whether this sacrifice is the result of timidity or of sheer ignorance is questioned; some reports attribute it to the one cause and some to the other; but in either case the proposal is only a clumsy contrivance to prevent a threatened defection of the monopolist supporters of the Ministry at the expense of the nation.

THE BAZAAR.

Our ladies' committees are zealously exerting themselves in every part of the country. Several have begun to canvass for subscriptions among the gentlemen of their acquaintance, to purchase raw materials for fancy work; and we beg leave to direct their attention to an extension of this plan suggested by an "Old Lady," whose letter will be found in the accompanying correspondence. The great extent of our report of the Covent-garden meeting compels us to defer some other suggestions which we had prepared. We can only recommend perseverance in active exertion, so as to turn the brief interval that remains to the best advantage.

"University Club, Feb. 17.
"SIR,—Many of Washington's letters, whose private correspondence it is well known was very minute and voluminous, are to be found in the United States. By comparing the one I now send you with that which you have received for the approaching Bazaar, you will be able to test its authenticity. It was given to me some years ago in America by one of that noble band who are striving, in the face of obloquy, contempt, and personal injury, to obtain for their enslaved fellow-countrymen those rights without which political liberty is a curse and commercial liberty a chimera. Convinced that the cause of abolition is the cause of the League—that free ports in the old country and free hands in the new are the sole conditions of prosperity in either, and for permanent peace with each other—I have much pleasure in transmitting to you a memorial of one whom both may regard as an example of disinterestedness in a struggle for congenial objects.
I have the honour, &c. &c., "E. S. ANDY."

"Sheffield, 2 mo. 12th.
"ESTEEMED FRIEND,—I shall feel much pleasure in furnishing a case of table cutlery for the approaching Bazaar, and am preparing one. Our excellent friend R. R. Moore has called upon many of our leading manufacturers in the past two days, and has promised from them of contributions for the same purpose; and we hope that the Sheffield stall will do no discredit to the town.
"Very respectfully yours,
"To George Wilson."
"WM. HARGREAVES."

"Colchester, Feb. 11.
"SIR,—Being a working country blacksmith, I have lately made, at the suggestion of the gentlemen of the East Essex Hunt, some horseshoes of novel construction, and I humbly think of some merit as adapted for hunters. This, perhaps presumptuous, opinion of mine is prompted by the unqualified approval given by the gentlemen in this neighbourhood who have used them.
"If you will accept a set or two of them for the Bazaar, say in the LEAGUE or some other way, how I can send them, as I think they might fetch something as pattern shoes, should any fox-hunter visit your Bazaar.
"Yours, &c. &c.,
"George Wilson, Esq."
"HENRY DOWES."

"7, Sussex-street, University College, Feb. 17.
"DEAR SIR,—As I have a firm conviction that the universal adoption of Free Trade will be of incalculable benefit to the teeming millions of our 'seagirt isle,' I shall be happy to contribute my mite to the forthcoming Free-Trade Bazaar, in the shape of a few English and foreign silver and copper coins, and two pieces of iron ore from Picton, Nova Scotia, if they will be accepted by you and your worthy colleagues, to whom I am constrained to say I feel personally much obliged by your untiring efforts in the good cause.
Believe me, &c. &c.,
"George Wilson, Esq."
"JOHN CALE."

"Leamington, Feb. 15.
"SIR,—I am extremely anxious to contribute to the funds of the Anti-Corn-Law League; and as I have had some experience in the erection of farm-houses and buildings of an improved character, I will send some plans, models, estimates, &c. (for such buildings), to the Bazaar in May next, if you think they would be worthy of notice. I can assure you that there has been less judgment displayed in the erection of agricultural buildings and peasants' cottages than in any other class of building property in this district. I am, &c. &c.,
"JOHN COLLINS, Architect."

"George Wilson, Esq."
"Relfe Manse, Kelso, Roxburghshire, Feb. 13.
"SIR,—I solicit your acceptance of six copies of a little book entitled 'Jubilee Notes,' being a memorial of the fiftieth year of my church.
"Many who were once members of it now reside in London, and in a few instances have attained to opulence and distinction in the City.
"Some of them may be attracted to your splendid Bazaar; and should half a dozen such chances to notice with interest the views of the church where they worshipped, and the manse of their own and their fathers' minister by the Tweed, and so be induced to swell, by even the small amount of their purchase, your noble Free-Trade treasury, a pastor's feelings shall be gratified in their religious advantage, and the furtherance of your righteous cause.
"I am, &c. &c.,
"George Wilson, Esq."
"JAMES JARVIS."

"Whitehaven, Feb. 19.
"SIR,—Having seen in the LEAGUE a letter from a gentleman who proposed sending some old coins and medals to the Bazaar, I have enclosed a coin and a Waterloo medal to put along with them, as a very small contribution from,
"Sir, your obedient and humble servant,
"R. C."
"Jullington, Feb. 19.
"SIR,—Herewith I send for the Bazaar two copies of works published by subscription, and sold exclusively at Trinity College, Cambridge. The price of one is £1. 2s.; the other £1. 5s.; of course you will name what change you think proper.
"Wishing your philanthropy every success, I remain yours truly,
"To G. Wilson, Esq."
"JAMES SWAN."

"Sir,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your card, with a request I should use my effort to influence my acquaintance to aid the success of the Anti-Corn-Law League Bazaar, to be held in Covent Garden Theatre next May. My advanced age prevents my giving personal activity to promote it, but knowing many young ladies who would be pleased to work for the Bazaar, but whose limited means preclude them from purchasing materials, I have adopted a plan, which I have found successful, by making it known to gentlemen (who, what-ever may be their politics, are interested in every measure that has Free Trade for its object), and asking from them a donation to buy materials, and to enable ladies to them a donation to buy materials, and to enable ladies to procure wools or fancy screens to embellish; and to furnish respectable females who may have their maintenance to earn by their needlework, with employment, by giving them articles of clothing to make up for children.

"As an encouragement for my plan to be generally acted upon, I must inform you that every gentleman (with only one exception) has sent me gold.

"I am of opinion that many young ladies would find relatives and friends who, not liking to have their names published as subscribers to the League fund, would not object to gratify their feelings of approbation of the efforts of the League, by setting some lady to work, and thus giving her a pleasure she would otherwise be denied.

"Another plan my sons' wives have adopted, their time being too much occupied by domestic duties to give their time and needlework, and at the same time work for the Bazaar, is to employ respectable females, whose business it is to sew plain work, in doing all the household sewing, and occupy themselves in ornamental work of various kinds for the Bazaar.

"Excuse the prolixity of "George Wilson, Esq." "AN OLD LADY."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Third Week, ending Saturday, Feb. 22.

In former days the BUDGET was generally regarded as a great mystery. Intelligent men are not ashamed to confess that they are ignorant of the differential calculus, and other scientific profundities; and in by-past times politicians possessing an average acquaintance with the general public topics of the day, thought it no discredit to shrink from comprehending the annual financial statement of a Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was not alone the mere array of formidable-looking figures which repelled them. There was something incomprehensible about the debt and the sinking fund, the surplus and the deficit, the crown lands and implest moneys, Exchequer tallies and Exchequer bills; even the returns of Customs and Excise were to them "a darkness that might be felt," and the only things very level to their apprehension were the Stamps and Assessed Taxes. We believe in astronomy, though we may be unable to calculate an eclipse; and, even if we should scarcely know a three-decker from a Newcastle collier, we rejoice that on Greenwich-hill is an astronomer royal, whose special business it is to watch the stars, and calculate for our ships pathways across the ocean. So, in those days of which we are speaking, the Budget was left to the Rothschilds of the Exchange, and the ledger-poring merchants of the counting-house; and all our consolation was, that, if there existed a VANSITTART to puzzle us, there was a Hume to bore the puzzle, and, by dint of unwearied watchings and untiring industry, to do somewhat towards protecting the public interests.

The change that has been effected, bear witness Friday night, the 14th of February, the same being Valentine's day. Even little boys and girls manifested excitement on the subject of the forthcoming "financial statement;" and the way in which the House of Commons was besieged by strangers, showed that all men have discovered that the key to unlock Exchequer complexities and financial propositions, is the very simple and commonplace principle of "dot and carry one." And, to do Sir Robert Peel justice, he is unrivalled in the House of Commons (at least amongst all who are or have been connected with office) for felicity of exposition. Whenever he chooses (he does not always choose), he is as transparent as glass. A child might have understood his financial statement; an assertion which is corroborated by the rumour current in and out of the House, that all the country members very distinctly comprehended him. Nobody but he can keep the attention alive, without in the least exciting the feelings or the imagination, during some three or four hours, by statements necessarily dry; it is a far harder task to interest an audience with figures of account than with figures of speech. This was effected, in a very masterly way, by Sir Robert Peel; and though Sir John Tyrell—that droll and comfortable-looking Essex baronet, who, on Wednesday night, declared that he did not put himself forward as a specimen of agricultural distress (he is not such a fool as manner and style would seem to indicate)—trifled the Prime Minister with his faithless desertion of the agricultural interests, he was obliged to admit the "ability" with which he had opened the Budget. In fact, all the "farmers' friends" are now fully aware of that truth which Mr. Roebuck, with caustic emphasis, told them on Wednesday night; their King Lou, whom they thought they could jump over and turn roundabout, has become a King Broom, coolly gobbling them up; and, like the frogs in the fable, who prayed to Jupiter for protection, they find that protection is their undoing. For the agriculturists now see that the removal of the property and income-tax is only Sir Robert's peculiar method of compelling them to contribute to "THE ABOLITION OF

THE CORN LAWS, and the destruction of all other monopolies."

We need not now recapitulate the particulars of a Budget familiar to every man in the United Kingdom who reads a newspaper. It was "a mingled yarn" of much good and much evil. The evil will come under our notice when the SUGAR DUTIES are discussed; the good we may here briefly dwell upon. First, Sir Robert Peel has practically demonstrated the truth of what he proclaimed on the night of Thursday week—that "the restoration of protection is IMPOSSIBLE." Secondly, he has affirmed one great doctrine of the Anti-Corn-Law League, that, being essentially a commercial and manufacturing country, Britain requires free and unrestricted means of supplying itself, at the cheapest rate, with all the varied materials essential to our wonderfully varied and marvellously ingenious manufactures; and so he takes off the duties on the IMPORT OF RAW MATERIALS. Thirdly, he announces another and a consequent truth, that there should be as much freedom in sending out our manufactures, as facility in bringing in the materials with which to manufacture; and though here nothing stands in his way but a tax on coals sent abroad, which he himself had imposed in 1842, he announces that he takes off all duties on EXPORTS. And lastly, by his removal of the excise on glass, he commences that career of sound economical reform which must go on—that of removing from complicated and ingenious processes of manufacture the vexatious and deteriorating interference and inspection of revenue officers, for the mere sake of bringing in a certain amount to the Exchequer.

Considered with reference to the state of political parties, and excluding altogether the recollection of principles, it must be admitted that Sir Robert Peel's Budget is a piece of great financial dexterity. All parties, with the exception of the agricultural, are pleased and offended, and therefore unable wholly to approve, or wholly to oppose. He has, in vulgar or pugilistic phrase, "taken the wind" out of all his opponents; and, by confounding and neutralizing the elements of resistance, prepared for himself, except on the subject of SUGAR and DIFFERENTIAL DUTIES, a triumphant ascendancy. And, so far it is matter for sincere congratulation that the ascendancy is on the side of FREE TRADE, and not of MONOPOLY; even the sugar duties are only to be annual, not permanent; and, therefore, there is room for readjustment.

Of the debates produced by the Budget little need now be said. Sir Robert Peel and the Chancellor of the Exchequer repeatedly announced, on Monday night, that they contemplate farther experiments in the reduction of duties on articles of consumption and manufacture. Lord John Russell renewed his declaration that protection is the bane, not the support, of agriculture. The chap-fallen agriculturists, through the mouth of Mr. George Banks, beseeched the House to consider that, if they were really all-powerful, they were certainly not selfish, seeing that their helplessness compels them to acquiesce in the propositions of Sir Robert Peel. And Mr. Hume and others rejoice to see the Government moving onwards from a system of indirect to a system of direct taxation.

Direct taxation is simple; and with land, and in a simple state of society, probably the best that could be desired. But in a country whose circumstances and social state are wonderfully complicated, and almost infinitely diversified, direct taxation, except on realized capital and tangible property, meets with many sound objections. At the same time, any system of indirect taxation which interferes with processes of manufacture, obstructs commerce, facilitates smuggling, and deceives the country, is in itself utterly pernicious. But when FREE TRADE is completely carried out, there may arise some Free Trade statesman, with the principles of Adam Smith and Ricardo, and the abilities of a Huskisson, who may develop some new scheme of finance, which may combine the excellencies of direct and indirect taxation, without their defects, and place this country on such a basis as to secure the permanence and the diffusion of its commercial prosperity. Meantime, we are in a state of transition, waiting the arrival of that Free Trade, which comes as surely as the sun rises on the morrow.

Lord Ashley has reappeared in his old character of a limiter of the hours of labour, and has got so far on the road to Free Trade as to declare that "if it could be proved" to him that the Corn Laws were an obstacle towards the realization of his objects, he would vote for their abolition. Is it—

"Convince a man against his will, He's of the same opinion still!"

Lord Ashley does not take such high ground as he did last session. He merely wants to interfere with the labour of young persons in calico print-works. Mr. Cobden offered to give the noble lord all the information in his power; but Sir James Graham stated so many substantial objections to the measure as to warrant the conclusion that the House of Commons will reject it by a very large majority.

Mr. Cobden gave notice on Thursday, of his motion for "A Select Committee to inquire into the operation of protective duties on imports upon the interests of tenant-farmers and farm-labourers." The debate is fixed for Thursday, the 6th of March.

At Shepton Mallet the silk, velvet, and crape manufactories are in full work, but the general trade of the town is very dull.

GREAT METROPOLITAN ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETING.

On Wednesday evening last, the second Metropolitan Meeting for the present year was held at Covent-garden Theatre. Shortly after the doors were opened, every portion of the house, including the lobbies and avenues in every direction, was completely crammed, and many hundreds, friends of the League, were subsequently unable to obtain admission. The meeting was presided over by W. Brown, Esq., of Liverpool, who was very appropriately introduced to the meeting by Mr. Cobden as the future Free-Trade member for South Lancashire—an announcement which elicited the most enthusiastic response from the assembly. The meeting was addressed in speeches of peculiar excellence by Mr. James Wilson, Mr. George Thompson, and Mr. J. Bright, M.P.

Among the gentlemen present were William Brown, Esq. (of Liverpool), Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, M.P., Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., John Bright, Esq., M.P., Thomas Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P., J. L. Ricardo, Esq., M.P., George Thompson, Esq., James Wilson, Esq., W. J. Fox, Esq., J. Wordsworth, Esq., Major-General Briggs, Sir John Morris, Bart., Dr. William Cooke Taylor, Colonel Tucker, Messrs. John Taylor Crook (of Liverpool), Joseph Wrigley (of Huddersfield), Greenhow (of Trieste), Dr. Edward Schmidt (of Vienna), W. Graham, Robert Bowler, J. Gerstenberg, C. S. Crowley, D. Dewar, Robert Toogood, Thompson, Wm. Garrard, T. F. Ashton, T. Gosnell, H. Heginbotham, Bailey, James Mellor, J. T. Campart, W. A. Wilkinson, J. Fergus (of Kirkcaldy), J. Hodgkin, John Poulton, John Dyte, John Chalmers, George Bret-tell, James Stanfield, J. Williams, Farrand, Richardson, James Midgley (of Rochdale), Alexander Graham, Wm. Graham (Glasgow), T. K. Pritchard, C. J. Baker, W. Weir, Henry Briggs (of Wakefield), J. M'Conkey (of Belfast), Henry Yandall, F. Scheer, Thom (of Inverness), S. B. Bayfield, Holland (of Dunbarton), T. L. Hay Grant, Henry Marshall Fooks, Joseph Heap (of Liverpool), J. P. Nixon, Thomas Harvey (of Falmouth), Henry L. Keeling, Henry Crossfield (of Liverpool), Rev. W. P. Davis (late of Ashburton, Devon), Agate (of Horsham), George Ridge, J. Fitzpatrick, T. Mackenzie, J. Battiscombe, H. Sparrow, Wm. Green, &c. &c.

Mr. COBDEN advanced to the table, but was prevented for some time from speaking by the enthusiastic applause with which he was greeted. The hon. gentleman said:—In the absence of our friend Mr. Wilson, I beg to move that Mr. William Brown, of Liverpool, our late candidate and future member for South Lancashire, do take the chair upon the present occasion.

The motion was carried by acclamation.

The CHAIRMAN (as soon as the prolonged applause which his appearance had created had subsided) then spoke as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, our good friend Mr. Cobden has apprised you of the reason why the League have called upon me to occupy this honourable position this evening. I only regret that, in the absence of our friend Mr. Wilson, you were not able to get upon the present occasion a gentleman of more influence and of greater importance to conduct the affairs of this meeting. I can assure you, however, that there is no individual in this community who has more at heart the promotion of Free Trade than the humble individual before you. It is not, gentlemen, the province of a chairman to make long speeches upon such an occasion as this, but I cannot refrain from congratulating you upon so much of the Premier's budget as carries out the principles of Free Trade. Without at all being considered to sanction that portion of it which we cannot approve of, yet I do hope and expect that the progress that Free-Trade opinions are making will be pressed forward by the proceedings of Friday evening last, and that at no very distant day we shall be able to congratulate the members of the League upon having accomplished all they wished. A great deal, gentlemen, has been said about Sir Robert Peel desiring or wishing us "to buy in the cheapest market and to sell in the dearest;" but he quite forgot to remind you of a fact which another Cabinet Minister told us some years ago, and which I consider still more important than that stated by the Premier. The language of the Minister I allude to—Sir James Graham—and which I shall repeat to you to-night, ought to be known through the length and breadth of the land. He stated that the public feeling must be hostile to the present Corn Laws. (Hear.) That, I apprehend, was not the last sliding scale, but the previous Corn Laws; but still the observation is equally applicable to the present moment. He stated further, that the receivers of rent are a very small body; that, backed by public opinion, they are almost omnipotent; and that in opposition to public opinion they cannot expect long to enjoy exclusive benefits. (Hear.) He stated that the contest was a fearful one, and inquired upon what ground it was to be decided. He said that opinion—that is not probably the exact expression he made use of, but it is the purport of it,—that that which influences and maddens—the hunger which breaks through stone walls—was arrayed against them; that the barriers of the State would be broken down, and estates, dignities, and honours would be overthrown by one overwhelming torrent. (Hear.) Such were the opinions of a Cabinet Minister some years ago, and I cannot believe that at this moment he will repudiate those sentiments. I shall not now trouble you with any further observations, except again to congratulate you on the onward step which was made in the House of Commons on Friday night, and to call upon our distinguished friend Mr. James Wilson, who has been so great an advocate of the Anti-Corn-Law League and the cause of Free Trade. I now beg to introduce that gentleman to your notice. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. JAMES WILSON, upon rising, was received with rapturous applause. He addressed the meeting as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, your worthy chairman has already congratulated you on so much of the budget as was proposed by Sir Robert Peel last Friday night as carried out, in our estimation, the principles of Free Trade. I very heartily join with the honourable chairman in that congratulation, for I conceive that in the measure then proposed to Parliament there are two of the most important doctrines for which Free-Traders have contended for the last half century, which have received not only the full recognition of the Ministry, but have been carried also into full practical effect. But, ladies and gentlemen, although I would congratulate you on that part of the measure, yet I think it must have been a subject of public observation and notoriety, that, in all the measures of relief which the right hon. baronet now at the head of her Majesty's Government has proposed for this people of this country, he has carefully selected those articles to which, although his measures have been termed bold, he had good reason to expect the slightest opposition, and to carry which he had to contend with the least powerful parties. (Hear.) I cannot help saying—while I admit the full value of what he has done—that he has attacked in rather an unwarrantable manner many of the minor sources of industry of this country, while at the same time he has entirely overlooked and neglected some great and material interests which bear severely upon the most productive classes, whom he has exposed to open competition. (Cheers.) I would not, however, wish to detract in any way from the merits of the principles which he has recognised, but I am desirous of impressing upon you and the country, that we ought not to give him so great credit for what he has done, when we see how much he has left undone. (Loud cheers.) Of the two great monopolies which exist in this country the right hon. baronet has left one altogether out of his budget; and, instead of ameliorating the other as far as the consumer is concerned, I am prepared to show that he has studied rather the interests of those who already possess the monopoly of that article. (Hear.) The right hon. baronet, among other things, has proposed a change in the sugar duties. Now, although that alteration is, upon the face of it, very spacious, and he brings it forward to the country under the pretence of reducing the present duties, yet I believe it can be proved to the satisfaction of every reasonable man, that instead of lowering the price of sugar to the consumer, or relieving the people of this country—taking the taxes which they have to pay on the one hand, and the price of sugar on the other, into consideration—that instead of being a good measure it is a bad one. The experience of the last four years has taught the people of this country one great fact, namely, that their interests are identified with the prosperity of the revenue. I am sure it is the last thing that you would consent to, that it should sink so as to endanger in any way the credit of the country. As far as that was the object to be attained, the people are willing to submit to an income-tax; and I believe they will be willing to submit to a more onerous tax rather than have the country disgraced by discredit. But, while we maintain that principle, let us see that the reductions in duties, which are pretended to be for the sake of the consumers, really do go to them, and are not merely for enriching the producer. If we are called on to submit to fresh taxation for the purpose of reducing duties, let us see that that reduction really finds its way into the pocket of the people, where it is pretended it is to go. (Hear, hear, hear.) There is no principle in English legislation which has been so delusive—now perhaps, which is less understood, or through which so much evil has been perpetrated upon the consumer, than that involved in the deceptive operation of our "differential duties." I am quite sure that if their true character were known, and their true operation for some years past upon different articles of produce had been understood—had the community understood them as well as they do what prohibition means altogether—at this day we should have had neither the one nor the other. It is, I am afraid, a very difficult task for any one to undertake to attempt to explain the exact operation of differential duties to such an assemblage as the present; but it is of such importance to the true understanding of these questions, and to the real merits of Free Trade, that I shall make the attempt and do the best I can, even though I should fall. (Loud cheers.) In order to illustrate the effect of a differential duty I will take the proposition which the right hon. baronet made on Friday last. He treated the country with an estimate of what he thinks will be the supply of sugar for the next year, and the amount of revenue which he will derive therefrom. He seeks to establish—which tends very much to mystify the matter—four different rates of duty. On one, at the lowest rate, he expects a supply of 160,000 tons from our colonies; from the second he anticipates a supply of 70,000 tons from the same quarter; from the third he expects a supply of 50,000 tons of foreign sugar; and from the fourth, 15,000 tons of the same description of sugar. Now, I would claim your particular attention for one moment to this statement. On the 15,000 tons of sugar he establishes a duty of 28s. per cwt. It is quite clear, therefore, before you get that amount of sugar into consumption, you must pay 28s. duty in addition to the prime or first cost of the article. That sugar being foreign produce which is used equally all over the continent of Europe, and which is submitted to the same price in this country because it has a common market in all others, to that 15,000 tons you must add the highest rate of duty, 28s. Now, its price at the present moment in London is 21s. per cwt.; it is the same in Antwerp, Hamburg, and all places throughout the continent—that is the price of this sugar established in the general market of the world. Its price, with the highest rate of duty added to it in this country, is therefore 52s. per cwt. It is quite clear that sugar of the same quality, when brought to the consumer, is worth an equal price; therefore, if there is any other sugar brought into this country which the Minister says you shall have at a lower rate of duty, that sugar being worth the same sum when it is brought to the consumer, any difference which the Minister chooses to result will go to the producer, and not to the public. (Hear.) Sir Robert Peel proposes that you shall have 15,000 tons of sugar on which you pay 28s. per cwt., raising the price to 52s.; and that you shall have further 50,000 tons of a second quality, upon which you shall pay a duty of 24s. 4d. The importing merchant will be able to get just as much more as the price in bond for that sugar as the difference of the duty. Instead, therefore, of 52s., the price of this sugar in bond will be 28s. 4d.; which with the lower rate of duty will again make 52s. to the consumer. He then establishes another rate of duty at 18s. 4d. for colonial sugar, of which he calculates to get 70,000 tons. To the importer of this sugar he says, "Your sugar produced in our own colonies shall be taken by the consumer at the same price, 52s.; but you shall only pay 16s. 4d. duty," enabling him, therefore, to receive 33s. 8d. for the same article for which the first importer received 24s. (Hear, hear.) There is, then, a fourth class of producers in the West India Islands, and he says to them, "We will take from you 160,000 tons of sugar, which you also shall bring to the consumer at 52s. per cwt., but we will allow you to enter it at 14s.," by which he will enable them to receive the price of 38s., instead of the original price of 24s. In all this process you will see that, while the Minister is giving up duties, he is not doing so to the benefit of the consumer. (Hear, hear.) By lowering the duty he is not reducing the price to the consumer, but merely increasing the sum which the producer will receive for it. The whole of these sugars are brought to our market at 52s. per cwt., and were the Prime Minister to say to the importer of the 160,000 tons, "Bring your sugar free of duty, I will relinquish my two millions of duty to you altogether," the consumer would not receive his sugar one fraction cheaper, so long as the 15,000 tons of sugar paid the 28s. duty. You therefore see, by those four different rates of duty, that the importer of sugar of the one class receives 24s. per cwt.; of the second class, 28s.; of the third, 35s.; and of the fourth, 38s.; while the consumer pays the same price for all. (Hear.) Now, suppose that the Minister were to say, "I will charge the highest rate of duty upon the whole of these sugars—I will impose a tax of 28s. on all;" it is quite clear he might do that and not raise the price of these sugars one fraction to the consumer. (Hear.) He reckons from these various duties that he will receive a revenue amounting to £3,916,000; he makes a sacrifice of revenue in this reduction of nearly two millions sterling, and then he asks the country to make up that sacrifice by the reimposition of an income-tax. (Loud cheers.) Now, if he would impose the same rate of duty on all these different descriptions of sugar which would enable the colonial grower to receive only the same price as the foreign grower, he would receive a revenue, instead of £3,900,000, amounting to no less than £7,000,000 sterling, and the community would pay not one fraction more for their sugar. (Loud cheers.) Sir Robert Peel, too, upon this occasion, in order, I suppose, to render his proposition more acceptable to the country, has also favoured us with certain estimates of what he believes will be the supply of sugar next year. Now, estimates of supply are an exceedingly unsatisfactory thing for people to rely upon. I remember four years ago, when the present Ministers in opposition opposed the proposition of the late Ministry upon the sugar duties, that Lord Sandon, part of his argument on an estimate of the future supply. That noble lord then said that we really did not require slave-grown sugar, because the produce of our colonies was increasing so rapidly that it would be quite sufficient without having recourse to any other country, and would supply us as cheaply as any market in the world. In that year he estimated the supply of sugar at 225,000 tons; four years, however, have passed over our heads, the population has increased upwards of a million, you have managed to consume 3,000,000 lbs. of tea more, and upwards of 3,000,000 lbs. of coffee additional, and yet up to this day, notwithstanding the estimate that was then made by Lord Sandon as an excuse for his measure, the supply of sugar has fallen year by year to a lower rate than it was then; until in the last year, although that noble lord promised you 225,000 tons as a reason why you should exclude Brazilian sugar, you had only 204,000 tons, which is a smaller supply than in the year in which he spoke. (Hear.) Therefore I do not think the public should place much confidence in any estimate that a Minister may make as to a future supply of sugar from any particular country. That article has, perhaps, been one upon which monopoly has told more than upon any other; for I find ever since 1811, during which time the population has increased upwards of 8,000,000, the supply of sugar has remained stationary;—while your supply of tea has doubled, and that of coffee quadrupled, sugar, the most protected article, has during the whole of that period remained stationary. Now, we find that, notwithstanding the continued disappointment which the community of this country has suffered in the supply from our own colonies, still that most absurd distinction is intended to be kept up—a distinction which I think every Englishman must feel ashamed of, when he thinks of the numerous inconsistencies into which it lands us, and the difficulties in which it places our commerce. Sir Robert Peel has already said that he intends to persist in the distinction between slave and free-labour sugar; but when the right honourable baronet in the budget propounds that principle, we find at the same time he is proposing the total repeal of the duty on cotton wool,—a measure which, in itself, I think is as good as he could almost possibly have proposed,—yet, while he recognises this principle of the evil of slave labour, he is again repudiating it by totally repealing the duty on an article the whole of which is produced by slaves, and a considerable portion of it in the very country whose sugar he excludes. (Cheers.) The right honourable baronet, while he has been sanctioning this principle and making this convenient distinction for purposes which he best knows with regard to sugar, has abandoned it with respect to coffee; for twice within the last four years, since he first established that distinction, he has reduced the duty upon coffee, which is the largest and most important production of Brazil. (Hear.) You have a new budget now proposing to repeal the duty on certain articles the exclusive products of Brazil, such as rosewood, satinwood, and all the finer woods for cabinet articles; which reductions I am glad he has made. I do not find fault with these measures, but I do with his inconsistency. (Hear, hear.) These the right hon. baronet has found it convenient to repeal the duty upon. There is also another article upon which he takes great credit in having reduced the duty—and I think he is entitled, per se, to that merit—and that is the reduction of the duty on copper ore. But copper ore is not only the production of slavery in Brazil and Cuba, but of slavery of the very worst description. Mr. Gladstone has frequently defined the distinction between slave labour in coffee and sugar; because, forsooth, he said that coffee was an easy labour, and was not much calculated to abuse the constitution of the negro; but the working of copper ore, I take it, is the most distressing and injurious labour to which slaves can be put either in Cuba or Brazil. Therefore, gentlemen, the real effect of Sir Robert Peel's sugar duty, instead of being, to decrease the protective duty, as he would wish us to believe, or being a relief to the community,—revenue and price being taken together,—it will be found to be quite the reverse. The law of last year left a differential duty of 10s. 6d.; but by the measure now proposed it will leave a difference between 14s. and 28s. for all practical purposes; and if the whole of these duties are really available, and carried into practice, it will leave a differential duty of 14s., instead of 10s. 6d. as formerly. It may, perhaps, be fair to ask upon what ground these distinctions are made in favour of colonial produce? We know there are many arguments and feelings in the public mind which tend to induce them to give a preference to colonial produce, but I believe that many of those feelings and opinions are based upon erroneous impressions. The community are very apt to believe that a very large portion of the exported manufactures of this country go to the British colonies; and it is frequently urged that it is right that we should maintain our colonies even at an apparent loss, in order to secure an outlet for our manufactures. As far as exports of goods are concerned, our colonial possessions in America in 1843, which is the last year for which our accounts are made up, including the West India Islands, Canada, and Nova Scotia, took goods from this country to the amount of £4,600,000. The other parts of America, the produce of which we now seek to exclude by this class legislation, including Brazil, purchased of us to the amount of £11,500,000. The whole of our colonies in the world during the same year took goods to the amount of £13,500,000; while the foreign countries with which we trade, seeking for no preference, asking for nothing but a fair exchange, giving us their produce at the price of the world's market, and asking for no privilege whatever except the fair exchange of trade, took goods to the amount of £38,000,000. (Cheers.) Some again support the colonial legislation and our colonial principle upon the ground that they form an outlet for increasing population. For my part I am not a friend to emigration. (Cheers.) I would rather see the many means that we have at home applied for the purpose of employing the population, which I am sure might very easily be done by extending our commerce, than see that population sent abroad and scattered over the whole face of the earth, to find a market for their labour in different countries. (Cheers.) But, were I a friend to emigration, then I would tell the men who support our colonial system upon that ground that the reports of our emigration commissioners show me that the United States of America have furnished an asylum for the last twenty years for double the amount of emigrants which all our colonial possessions in the world put together have done. (Hear, hear.) Therefore, if it is on account of emigration, then countries which look for no privilege in trade have furnished an asylum greater than your own colonies. Another and a favourite expression of the right honourable baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government is this: he is very fond of talking of protecting and encouraging the countries where the English tongue is spoken. Now, I do not know whether it ever entered his head that he would encourage colonies in order that there might be a great demand either for "Lindley Murray's Grammars," or for "Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary;" if that be the reason, then I apprehend very little attention to the subject will show any one that there are more than four times the number speaking the English language out of the English colonies than in them. There is another reason given for this colonial protection. We have heard that the colonies are the stay of the empire; that they are a great protection to our political power; but, when we come to bring that argument home, we constantly find that men are reasoning in a circle, and that, if you talk of colonies, they tell you they are to be supported because you have an army and navy, and extensive possessions, and great political power; if you come to speak of your army and navy, you are told you must support them because you have great colonial possessions. It was only the other night that Sir Robert Peel went down to the House and said, "I cannot reduce the army," not because you require it at home, but "because it is necessary to have relays of men to send to the colonies abroad." I quite agree with the statement, that as long as we insist upon keeping those colonies—and I do not say we ought to give them up—that it is an unfair thing for us to exact from soldiers and military men greater sacrifices than we have a right to demand. The time of their service abroad ought not to be extended beyond what was originally intended; and, therefore, if we do retain the possession of these places, we are bound to pay the expense of their maintenance. But the right hon. baronet comes down with another proposition, and asks for a million a year for the support of the navy, not because you want it at home, but because you have increased your colonial possessions so much that you must have such a number of ships afloat over the whole surface of the ocean, and the present extent of your navy is insufficient for the purpose. I do not say that there is anything wrong in this, or that we should not have this augmented navy. I believe there is great practical safety in having ships cruising in the different seas of the world, and that it tends greatly to the preservation of peace; but I do not want to have our political power given as a reason why you should protect your colonies in a way detrimental to the consumers of articles of colonial produce in this country. (Hear.) But what, after all, do we find to be the effect of this protective system in our colonies? There are in them many classes of productions; but I will venture to say you will not find one single article there produced which has been freed from the influence of protection which has not excelled and beaten all the world in its production. (Hear.) A few years ago, the cultivation of indigo was unknown in the East Indies, that article having been introduced there from Mexico about fifty years back. Since that period our East Indian possessions have nearly obtained its exclusive production, not only for this country, but this actually because the great mart of the world, from which the whole of Europe, and almost every other place, is supplied. (Hear.) Again, with reference to wool, silks, and flax—articles which we grow in our colonies—we have managed greatly to increase the market for them without any protection whatever. I believe that if we had not protected our sugar-growers, but they had been left to the competition to which other producers are liable, that at this day our own colonies would have been able to produce sugar cheaper than anywhere else. (Cheers.) I would not hastily form an opinion upon a subject, which I am quite sure is of the greatest importance to our West Indian possessions especially, and not much less so to those of the East Indies. For some time past there has not been a newspaper published in the West Indies of which I have not received a file by every mail which has arrived; there is not one of those papers which has not been carefully perused by me; and if they have taught me anything it has been that protection to those colonies has been their great bane. (Hear, hear.) Not a mail arrives, or a file of colonial papers do I look over, without finding an acknowledgment in numerous ways that the protective system has been there, as elsewhere, a bar to all improvement. It is but within the last year or two, since this question has been agitated in this country, that they have become alive to their situation, and that some symptoms of improvement have taken place. From the last mail I found several extracts, which I will not trouble you by reading, showing that the people there, writing reports of agricultural and planters' societies, confess that there has been no alteration in the process of sugar-making for three centuries. (Hear.) Premiums have been offered for the greatest amount of production similar to those offered in this country lately for agricultural purposes. In the autumn of last year one of these premiums was given by the Clarendon Agricultural Association of Jamaica, for the cheapest production of sugar from an estate. There were two candidates for this prize; the result of the competition being that the one produced the article at 8s. 10½d. per cwt., and the other at 9s. 6½d.; in both cases at less than 1d. per lb. (Hear.) We have also heard that in Jamaica and the West India colonies there has been a great complaint of a want of labour since the abolition of slavery; but I find from these papers constant evidence not of a want, but I was going to say a superabundance, of labour. Frequent complaints are made there of the number of able-bodied paupers. (Hear.) Is it, therefore, consistent with a want of labour to complain of the burden of able-bodied paupers? A railway is now making in Jamaica; and I have recently conversed with the chief promoter of the work, who tells me that plenty of labour can be procured—at that peculiarly hard description of employment in a hot climate—at the rate of 7s. per week. I find also, from the papers, that within the last two or three months there has been an argument raised in some of the parishes whether the price of labour should be 1s. or 1s. 3d. per day. (Hear.) With respect to the scarcity of labour, whatever may have been the case two or three years ago, that evil is very materially mitigated now. Those papers are constantly finding fault with the proprietors for their want of spirit in introducing improvements into the management of their estates. One very remarkable instance, which I cannot help alluding to, occurred in Jamaica last summer. The railway to which I have referred was proposed to be made by a native of Jamaica, a man who has a warm interest in his native country, possessing a capacious mind, and who has taken an enlarged view of the difficulty under which those colonies labour,—and, seeing that one chief cause which raised the price of produce was the difficulty in getting to the shipping port, he proposed the construction of a railway. He went to capitalists interested in the island—to those who had large mortgages, and who were fearful of their safety—he applied to planters and West India merchants; but he could not obtain the slightest encouragement from any one of those parties for making that railway. At last, fearing he must give it up as a bad job, he proposed it—to whom do you think? To two or three Free-Traders in Liverpool, and in less than two days the capital was subscribed. (Cheers.) In that short time a sufficient sum was raised to make a railway in the island of Jamaica by the very Free-Traders who are charged with having the intention to ruin that colony. The gentleman who originated that railway is a native of that island; I believe his main interest and all his sympathies are in it—his chief sympathies are bound up with it. He is, I believe, very shortly to return to Jamaica for the purpose of attending to his own estates, and preaching the doctrine of Free Trade and an entire equalization of the sugar duties. (Cheers.) But, gentlemen, there is one very grave question, which the present proposition of the Minister and the position of this question leave open to the British community, and the British merchant in particular. A year ago, Sir Robert Peel introduced a new sugar bill; twelve months have now nearly passed away since that measure was introduced; but it has been perfectly inoperative except for the purpose of disorganizing trade and baffling every calculation which the merchant, planter, or dealer could make. It has been utterly useless for all the intended benefits as far as the consumer was concerned: it has only operated in allowing a small quantity of slave-produced sugar to come in, which it was intended particularly to exclude. (Hear.) But in the meantime your merchants have found it utterly impossible, upon anything like an ordinary security to base their calculations as to what their future transactions would be. A year of anxious and insecure time has passed over; the Minister has promised from one session to another to propose a final measure as far as he was concerned. Is it the proposition of this session? Now he comes down to the House and proposes a new law of so difficult and intricate a description that I believe there is not one merchant in the city of London who will take upon himself to say what its operation will be for the next twelve months. (Hear.) How, then, can it be that the mercantile interests of this country can go on with anything like certainty if, session after session, new laws and fresh propositions, each more intricate than the last, are to succeed each other in this way? How will it be with the West Indians themselves; for in looking at these papers I find that they have been expecting, in anticipation of the next mail, a notification of something like a final settlement of this question? They are laying their account for it, and, looking out for capital to embark in their estates, they know that that capital will not be available unless some permanent arrangement be made; and until those duties are put upon something like a secure basis they will find they are as far off it as ever. This is one of the great evils of the protective system, that you never are or can be settled as long as you remain protected. I believe that the West Indians as a body have lost more years they have gained by protection, and that in five years they would be in a better position if it were removed, not gradually, but totally and entirely, to-day, than they would be if you continued their monopoly to the full extent. I believe that these improvements, of which they themselves have furnished evidence, can be effected in this experiment which they have made; it would place them in a position, in a very short time, by the application of capital, skill, and the spur of competition, to compete with the whole world, and supply sugar cheaper, and at a larger profit to themselves, than they ever have done, or ever will do, under the present protective system. (Cheers.) I am quite sure that no rational person, as long as this association continues, can hope for any permanent settlement of these questions, except by the entire giving up of this protection. I am quite satisfied, from the vigour, spirit, and determination which the Anti-Corn-Law League has shown from the first,—from the perseverance with which it has followed out its objects,—the success attending its labours hitherto, and from the encouragement which it receives to persevere yet further,—that, until all protective systems and every particle of commercial monopoly are given up, there is no chance of this agitation subsiding. (Loud cheers.) I therefore trust that the day is not far distant when all the protected interests, whether they be of sugar or corn, will come to the conclusion that there is some way by which their interests may be rendered mutual with that of the world at large; and I trust they will discover some means by which they can be rendered so reciprocally beneficial without their seeking for undue favouritism and advantage. I believe that can only be accomplished by a perfect and unreserved Free Trade, and an entire abandonment and repudiation of the protective system. (Loud cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN then came forward and said—Ladies and gentlemen, I beg to introduce to you our distinguished and eloquent friend, who has long proved himself a great and powerful advocate of Free Trade, Mr. George Thompson.

Mr. GEORGE THOMPSON then came forward amid prolonged and reiterated applause, which having subsided he addressed the meeting as follows:—I deem it, Sir, a high and noble privilege to be permitted to occupy such a position as that in which I now stand. If pride were allowable under any circumstances, a man, I think, might be forgiven being proud to address such an audience as this, on so important a theme, surrounded by such individuals as occupy this platform, and various other portions of this house. It is gratifying to know, in giving utterance to what we believe to be just, humane, and enlightened opinions, that our audience is not confined within these walls, but that we find an audience of millions of men, wherever our language is known, and in whatever locality the measures we recommend are likely to affect the interests and destinies of the human race. (Loud cheering.) I do not think there is a spot on the surface of the globe to which human eyes are directed with more interest than that on which we stand to-night. I do not believe there is a question agitating the minds of intelligent beings in any part of the world, more important than the one which is occupying our attention to-night. I do not think there is a question that enters more minutely into the concerns of men, or is more closely and inseparably allied to their best temporal interests. (Cheers.) We are not even discussing a national question; for we hold it to be true that Free Trade is not only the right of men individually, but that it is the interest of nations universally. (Cheers.)

We are not advocating the cause of our country alone, still less of any particular class in the community, but of men everywhere, wherever they live—and where do they not?—under the primeval curse of earning their bread in the sweat of their brow. (Cheers.) All we ask is that human industry should possess its own; that men should be permitted to enjoy the fruits of their honest labour—that no man should be permitted to rob them in the quantity, quality, or price of that which they obtain in exchange for their labour. (Hear.) It is exceedingly difficult to know on what topic to address an audience in Covent-garden Theatre. I would advise the man who expects to speak here at any time never to read the speeches that are made upon these occasions, or even to hear them. Let him content himself with the merits of this question, and be as ignorant as he can be of what goes on in this house, or in reference to the question of Free Trade in other public meetings; for if he should attend them, or read the addresses there delivered, he cannot, while he sits here, or while he meditates elsewhere, select a topic on which he does not know that eloquence and argument have been almost exhausted, and he cannot choose a subject without treading over ground that has already been traversed by those who have gone before him. In fact, our ground is growing every day narrower, even if we take in all the topics that are legitimately in connexion with this question. We had a good many fallacies afloat in days past, but now they are exploded. (Laughter.) The man would be fighting a shadow to-night who got up to battle with "the paramount interest of agriculture." He would be contending with a shadow who got up to talk about "peculiar burdens," for we have never been able to find them, and the squires will not help us to do so, or show us where they are. We cannot even take up the old topics on which we used to talk, namely, the antidotes to distress, depression, and misery, which, when brought forward, were all intended to direct public attention away from the one great source of evil, and the one grand remedy for existing grievances. We hear no more said now about emigration as a substitute for a repeal of the Corn Laws; no more talk—or very little at most—of home colonization; and scarcely anything of national education, as the things to which the public should direct their attention; and not much, I believe, considering the sensation created awhile ago, on the subject of allotments of land. We may, however, glance, Sir, to-night, at some events which have transpired since the last public meeting was held in this place. Several interesting events have subsequently occurred. The first to which I will allude is the holding of a great meeting in Manchester, at which the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League laid a report before their constituents. It was a good report. As our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic would say, it was "a most satisfactory document." (Cheers and laughter.) It stated that £28,000 had been collected in fifteen months; that our respected Chairman would not again have to sustain a defeat in the Southern Division of Lancashire. (Great cheering.) It reported that his defeat had led to the enfranchisement of about 1750 individuals in that county, and the obtaining of a clear majority of more than 1000 of the votes in that county in the cause of Free Trade. (Much cheering.) The report also alleged that a great effort, and a successful one too, had been made in the cause of registration in almost all parts of the country; that much had been done in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and that that important portion of the kingdom is not likely soon to be again represented by two gentlemen who are monopolists. It went on to state, that in other parts of the kingdom, in North Cheshire, as well as in the county in which we are assembled, much had been done in the way of carrying out the plan so ably devised by the distinguished gentleman on the platform, and his coadjutors, for the purpose of regenerating the county constituencies of the kingdom. (Loud cheers.) All this is reported; and, in addition, a sanguine expectation is held out, that when the magnificent Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar is held in this place, in May next, there will be such an addition made to the League fund, as the result of the entrance and purchase money connected with that grand exhibition, that the maximum sum asked for at the hands of the public in the cause of Free Trade will be quite, if not more than, realized. (Loud cheers.) We have not only had a report from the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League of a most gratifying character, but, on the other hand, we have also perused, in the city of London, accounts of a grand meeting of the Agricultural Protection Society. (Laughter.) I have read the report of that meeting, but I cannot pronounce upon it the same verdict which I have with reference to the report of the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Hear, hear.) A more stale, flat, unprofitable, and unargumentative document I have never before seen (laughter); all rationality seems to have fled from the heads of the men who are connected with that Protection Society. (Laughter.) While it seems to be only necessary to join the Anti-Corn-Law League for an individual to become a sensible man (cheers and laughter), it seems only requisite to join the Protection Society in order to become most confused in intellect (renewed laughter)—most incapable of understanding the subject, and still less of arguing respecting it. I will undertake to sacrifice anything you shall please to condemn me to forfeit if you will find an individual who will point out to me, throughout the speeches made at the Freemasons' Tavern on the occasion of the great agricultural dinner, one argument. (Cheers and laughter.) It is needless to dwell on that spectacle. If there was nothing edifying, there was something at least amusing, and a vast deal supremely ridiculous. (Laughter.) We have also recently had a Queen's speech. On that it will not become me to speak, excepting to say that it is as tame as queens' and kings' speeches usually are, and has turned out as delusive as such speeches generally turn out to be. And we have had, above all this, a financial statement from the Prime Minister of the country, which seems to be the topic of topics at the present moment. And what shall we say of this? I will not say it wants skill, but I will assert that it wants courage. (Cheers.) I will not allege it wants plausibility, and tact, and eloquence, but that it is vastly deficient in honesty and truth. (Cheers.) I will not say it does not profess sympathy with the poor, but I will say that the measures recommended do not possess much power to benefit this class of society, which seems to be, according to the words of the right honourable baronet, the special object of his sympathy and regard. (Cheers.) It has been already stated by the enlightened gentleman who has preceded me, that with the measures of Sir Robert Peel brought before the public in that statement we do not seriously quarrel. They are good as far as they go. We are thankful to know that the course is now being cleared by degrees for the grand heat. (Laughter and cheers.) This might not be absolutely necessary, but at all events it will prove to be convenient. We shall not now have deputations going up to Government about glass. We see through that subject now. (Great laughter.) We shall hear no more of deputations on the subject of coals, unless others come up to London to ask for an export duty again to be put on that article, which is not very probable. (Laughter.) Sir Robert allows the introduction of certain kinds of woods to save off the discussions on other subjects; and then, by delusive schemes, which Mr. Wilson has so ably exposed—and no man can do so better, and few so well—he tries to be exceedingly sweet on the community, and to put off the repeal of the Corn Laws by giving us a lollipop. (Laughter.) Now, some benefit will doubtless accrue from these changes. We cannot contemplate without thankfulness any prospect of glass windows being put into the cabins of the Irish. (Cheers.) We are very curious to know whether we shall have our watches and chronometers regulated by glass balances instead of steel ones, for we are told that one of these remarkable curiosities was exhibited by the Prime Minister of England on the Treasury benches the other night. We find little fault with that which he has done. His grievous sin lies in what he has omitted, and it is a heavy one for such a man to commit,—with his knowledge of this country, its geographical position, its high and wide connexion with the world at large, the peculiarities of its population and the resources for which it is distinguished, as well as the many features for which it is celebrated,—that he can satisfy his own conscience and seek to pacify the public and the world, by coming down to the House of Commons for the purpose of reducing duties on certain articles without disturbing those gigantic robberies in the shape of protection which are still permitted to live unscathed and even unthreatened by the Prime Minister. (Great cheering.) He has granted what we never asked for. We did not demand a reduction of taxes levied for the purposes of revenue. We did ask for a reduction and annihilation of the taxes levied for the sole purpose of protection; but Sir Robert Peel has not only not touched the protective system, but he has rather strengthened it and augmented its profits, so far as he has meddled with it at all. Errors of judgment have been corrected by the right hon. baronet. He has known how to remedy the defects of his predecessors in matters of legislation upon minor points. This he has done certainly. He has shown a degree of sagacity, industry, patient toil, and mastery of details, perhaps superior to what almost any other man could have exhibited; but what else has he done? He has corrected those errors of Parliament, those defects in legislation, which may be referred more to the judgment than to the heart—more to the intellect than to the want of principle; but he has left alone that vice of legislation against which the whole community is crying out, and he has purchased the support of great monopolists, holding out to the people the prospect of buying certain articles more cheaply, and importing others more abundantly, although that very reduction in taxation they themselves will have to make up, and he therefore is only making them a present of a part of their own. For what does he do? He says, "There is a surplus revenue for this year of £5,000,000 sterling; but I mean to continue the income-tax. I might do away with that obnoxious impost, and meet all the ordinary expenses of the State until April, 1847, without having recourse to that or any property-tax. I recommend nevertheless that you should continue it for the three years, and in exchange for the £5,000,000 taken out of the pockets of the people I will reduce the taxes on glass, cotton, coals, &c. &c., to the amount of a million and a half, two millions, or three millions." This is exceedingly generous; but I say again that we do not find fault with what he has done. His sin as a statesman lies in not having done that which he ought to have done. He has abated minor evils, but left the monster evil undisturbed. Small benefits have been conferred that huge injuries might go unredressed and in the matter of sugar be augmented. Sir Robert Peel has aimed at popularity by giving the people a part of that which he took from them in the first instance, and he has made the monopolists disgorge absolutely nothing. He has shifted the burdens, but he has not lessened them; as Mr. Cobden prophesied, he has shuffled the cards, and nothing more. The inrush of protection still remains; but, happily, the League exists too. (Cheers.) I have been met by one or two parties in the street, since Friday night, and they have said to me, "I suppose you are not going to carry on your League operations any more, are you?" My simple reply to that has been given in the shape of another question—"Are the Corn Laws repealed? Are the sugar duties abolished? May the corn, coffee, rice, sugar, and tobacco of other countries come in upon equal terms with the productions of our own plantations? If not, the League has yet its work to do, and is determined to do it." (Loud cheers.) What does Sir Robert Peel say? He says, "British industry must be protected; our trade with the colonies is important, and our merchantships must be guarded on their way over the great ocean, that they may arrive safely at their destination, and return uninjured back again. All this is for the sake of British industry. Very well, we thank him for allowing us to have ten line-of-battle ships, and moreover for promising that he will equip some steamers, so that we may indulge in the prospect of a safe sail to Jamaica or New South Wales, unafraid by any buccaner, or Prince de Joinville. (Laughter.) But we did not ask for ships; we did not seek so much to profit by means of war-steamer as through the results of fellowship in the way of trade, reciprocity in the form of benefits, copartnership upon a universal scale, all contributing alike to one another's happiness, and rendering a quarrel almost as impossible or unlikely as that two partners in Fleet-street should quarrel, break their windows, and tumble their own goods into the street. (Laughter and cheers.) If there be one part of Sir Robert Peel's financial statement which I regard with greater dislike than any other, it is the ridiculous affectation of humanity to the negro slaves across the Atlantic. (Hear, hear.) This has been most ably exposed by the gentleman who has gone before me; and I shall, therefore, say no more than this, that I unite with him in denouncing so barefaced an inconsistency as that into which Sir Robert Peel has fallen—fallen intentionally and designedly. (Hear, hear.) He has made the humanity of the people of this country a means of adding them with an annual tax; Mr. Wilson will tell you how much, but I think I shall not be far wrong in saying that the extra price which we shall have to pay for our sugar will much exceed two millions sterling; and this at the same time that he allows the cotton of America to come free of duty. (Hear, hear.) If it is good for us to have cotton, why should it not be beneficial for us to have corn also? (Hear, hear, hear.) If he has got over his scruples as to the cotton, and it is now to be allowed to come in not by paying a small duty, but absolutely free, why will he not allow us to have corn? (Hear, hear.) This is excluded. I know that there is a way of circumventing even this prohibition—namely, by carrying the corn of the western states down the rivers, and across the frontiers into our British Canadian possessions, where, on paying a small duty, it is permitted to be shipped into this country, where it is received on paying a nominal duty. But the Americans do not like this mode of doing business. (Hear, hear.) They want a direct, uninterrupted, immediate access to our ports, and they are fully able to supply us out of the superabundance of their produce with those necessities and comforts of life of which we stand so greatly in need. (Cheers.) Now, if Sir Robert Peel be that friend to peace which he professes to be,—if he be that sympathetic man which he desires us to believe that he is—for he tells us that he was deeply touched by the statements made by one of the deputations, though the House was so uncivil as to receive that announcement with something like a giggle and a laugh; so that the right hon. baronet was obliged to repeat his assertion, and to assure hon. gentlemen on the opposite side that he could feel, and had felt (laughter).—If, I say, Sir Robert Peel has a heart, and is the friend of peace, how is it that his heart does not beat high in the anticipation of securing peace by obtaining from America that of which our country is so much in need? (Hear, hear.) If there is one thing to be deprecated more than another, to be deplored above all other things, save and except a civil war, it is a conflict with our kinsmen on the opposite side of the Atlantic. (Hear, hear.) No disruption could be more calamitous, no spectacle more revolting, no conflict more unnatural than a war between the people of this country and the inhabitants of the United States. (Hear.) Well, our friends on the other side of the Atlantic suggest a mode of rendering this disruption impossible. They tell us what they can do—what they have—how much of what they possess they can spare—and they tell us what they are willing to take in exchange. They have, in fact, just that which we require, and we are able to produce that which they most need; and Sir Robert Peel has it in his power, if he pleases, to put their raw cotton into the shape of fabricated prints, and to send it out again to array the forms of those who are able to return flour, cheese, butter, pork, and beef, for the support of those who wave and spun the cotton in this country. (Loud cheers.) But no; with admirable consistency and equal humanity, what does he do? He says, "You may have as much as you please of slave-grown cotton;—the duty was before but five-sixteenths of a penny; but that is now removed—"huy, and work, and spin, and rejoice, and be merry. But," he adds, "if, when you have worked up this cotton in the mill, and you have spun it in the loom—if, when fair fingers have tambered it at Paisley, any one of you, or your workpeople, should desire to purchase a pound of Brazilian sugar, you must not do so, for Brazilian sugar is prohibited—it is the produce of slave labour. It is true that you have gained all you have by working up slave-labour produce, but you must not have even half a pound of Brazilian sugar, because it is the produce of slavery." (Hear, hear.) But, worse than that, they may not taste American corn. The cotton, which is slave-grown, may come in; the corn, which is free-grown, is excluded. Now, Sir, I believe you will bear testimony to the truth of what I say, when I affirm that there are thousands and tens of thousands who hold our principles in America. Although Henry Clay hoisted the standard of protection, it must not be supposed that all who voted for him were the friends of monopoly. There were other reasons which induced many to vote for him besides a love of protection; while, on the other hand, we know that at least a large proportion of those who carried Mr. Polk into the chair of the Presidency were avowedly Free-Traders. I have, read, since I came upon this platform, one of the most eloquent speeches that I ever met with against protection in my life, by the present Secretary of State, the Honourable Mr. Calhoun. (Hear, hear.) Though I differ from that gentleman on some points, I do say that on the question of Free Trade his language is straightforward and statesman-like, not only consistent with the best interests of his own but also of our country. (Hear, hear.) I heartily wish that he may carry out this part, at least, of his plans, however I may desire that he may fall in some others. (Hear.) I say that the party who thus sympathise with us in the United States is a strong party; and no wonder that it should be so. I will not give you many figures, but will merely state that when the census of the United States was made in 1840 the total population amounted to 17,069,453. In the middle states, that is to say New York, Jersey, Pennsylvania, &c. &c., the population was 5,118,076; in the north-western states, comprising Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, it was 4,131,370, making in the middle and north-western states, as contradistinguished from the New England and south-western states, 9,249,446, leaving only 7,820,007 amongst all the other states. Now for the argument derivable from this statement in favour of Free Trade. Out of a population of 17,069,453 we find that there were engaged in commerce 117,607, in manufactures 791,749, and in agriculture 3,719,951. Now the agriculturists are the men whom we want for our customers. (Hear, hear, hear.) The longer we delay the greater are our straits and embarrassments, and the farther off is the prospect of reaping, when the change shall come, the advantages now within our reach. We have lost many already. Every year hundreds and thousands of young men in the New England States coming from college, and, having to choose what they shall be for their future lives, their hearts yearn for the prairies of the west; and when I was in that country, five hundred a day have I seen bearing for the borders of that vast territory, where they expected to find a home and an inheritance for their children. But they have been stopped in their career; they have been kept and fixed where they are, and have turned, or rather been made, manufacturers, which they did not desire to be, because you would not give them encouragement to become agriculturists, which they wished to become. This has done that which Sir Robert Peel professes to deplore; it has added to the number of planters who have laid out their capital in the purchase of gangs of slaves, and are found now among the growers of cotton, because you will not allow them to be cultivators of corn. That is the effect of the course which has been pursued by this country. The Government cannot be more pro-slavery in anything than they are in their conduct with regard to the agricultural produce of the United States of America; nor in the exclusion of all descriptions of sugar on the payment of an equal amount of duty. (Hear, hear, hear.) Having examined this question since we met here last year, I am only more deeply confirmed in the opinion which I then expressed, that the Anti-slavery party in this kingdom, with the purest and noblest intentions, are injuring the cause which they would fain serve, and procrastinating the day when competition and free labour shall destroy, not only slavery, but that traffic which grows out of it—the detestable commerce in the species between America and Africa. (Loud cheers.) I have only one other remark to make, with regard to America, and that is that whereas our supply of provisions in this country is known to be tolerably short,—for we have it on the authority of a clerical gentleman himself, that five millions of our population rejoice in potatoes, and a very large number in oatmeal,—and while a great proportion of the population, though they taste wheat bread, have much less of it than they desire;—while such are the facts with regard to our own country, it appears, from some tables inserted in an admirable pamphlet, entitled "American Corn and British Manufactures," that every man, woman, and child in the United States has 42 bushels of grain a year—that is to say, they have that to divide amongst them. (Hear, hear.) Only the other day I received a letter from a relative of mine who has recently gone out to the United States. It says, "If I were required to come back to England, I don't think I could make up my mind to it, because I should fancy that you were all starving, for we are rolling in plenty. We have," it adds, "on this, which is not an extraordinary day, roast turkey and plum pudding for dinner." (Laughter.) Now, I say that if Sir Robert Peel were to turn his attention to these things, we should give him more credit for compassion and sympathy with the sufferings of the people, for integrity and consistency, than he can expect in his present course of conduct to receive at our hands. I am thankful, however, that, in the present session, it has been rendered more apparent by what it is this distinguished man is fettered in office—by what parties he is bound and trammelled in pursuing his onward course. The fact is, my friends, that he has a sack of corn at one ankle, and a hoghead of sugar at the other; and when a man is manacled with a sack of corn at one ankle, and a hoghead of sugar at the other, it is not to be expected that he can make very great progress. Such seems to be the unfortunate predicament of Sir Robert Peel. Still we do not deem him to be in a hopeless condition. (Hear, hear.) We know that he is not unable to learn. We know that he is not blind—that he can read the signs of the times. We do not think that he is so completely disheartened that he would throw up office, and patronage, and friends, and connections, and all that surrounds him, in his present position, rather than touch the Corn Laws, or the sugar monopoly. (Hear.) No; he wants a motive. He showed a glass balance in the House of Commons. There is another sort of balance that regulates his chronometer most exactly: he never escapes from it—it governs all his movements. Whether he is at Drayton House, Windsor Castle, the Pavilion at Brighton, Whitehall, or in St. Stephen's, this balance regulates him in all he says and does. I am not sure that it does not regulate his very looks. This balance is public opinion. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) He will do what is right when he cannot help doing it. (Hear, hear.) My friends, I remember who has to come after me, and I will not encroach upon the time which properly belongs to him. (Loud cries of "Go on, go on.") But I will conclude by putting this question:—Is there anything in Sir Robert Peel's financial statement to justify us in relaxing in our efforts? (Loud cries of "No, no.") You answer for me "No." On the contrary, we should be ungrateful were we to recede from the vantage-ground which we have attained—if we were not to profit by the lesson which this very financial statement reads us. A short time ago there were seven hundred excuses for not repealing the Corn Laws, and we have now got four hundred and thirty more. What a powerful body must we be when even the Prime Minister of England dare not attempt to excuse himself for neglecting what we think he ought to do with less than seven hundred, or at the very least four hundred and thirty, excuses in his mouth! Ay, he is obliged to print and circulate and get others to circulate them in order that he may delay for a little longer the sentence, condemnation, and execution of the Corn Laws. There is, I contend, every motive to urge us to proceed. The triumph which we have obtained in the recognition of our principles, the abandonment of the fallacies with which we had to grapple, the giving up of all those excuses which were once pleaded for the Corn Laws—these triumphs, I say, of the justice and truth of our cause are so many motives to continued and increased exertions. (Hear, hear.) While protection exists the Anti-Corn-Law League must proceed, adding strength to strength, numbers to numbers, force to force. We have made thus far an amazing progress, greater than any similar association ever made, I believe, in the history of the world. And when men hereafter shall inquire in what way they may overthrow some hoary abuse, protected by power, surrounded and defended by wealth, rank, and corruption—when they would learn whether they may venture to hope that, by exertion, toil, and sacrifice, they can bring such an abuse to the ground—they shall then turn to the pages which record the history of the Anti-Corn-Law League: they shall therein learn that voluntary association will work greater miracles than the hands of them who reared the Pyramids; that bloodless revolutions may be brought about by the agitation of men's minds; that there are weapons that cannot be struck down in the warfare; that there is a power which, though impalpable and invisible, is yet universal and irresistible, and will outlive Ministers, and Governments, and States, and rule the world when man is man indeed. Mr. G. Thompson resumed his seat amid rapturous applause.

The CHAIRMAN then came forward and said:—Ladies and gentlemen, I have the honour of introducing to you your old and well-tried friend, whose exertions to remove those odious Corn Laws have not only made him the benefactor of his country, but of all mankind. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. BRIGGS then came forward amidst prolonged cheers, and said:—I may be excused if I feel some anxiety in being called upon to address this meeting after the two speeches to which we have listened—one delivered by a gentleman who is well known as a perfect master of the science of political economy; the other by a gentleman celebrated, not only in this kingdom, but in distant parts of the globe, as a perfect master of the art of oratory. My confidence arises, however, from the fact, that the question which we are met to-night to discuss is one of vast importance, and almost limitless extent. I know not that the profoundest thinker, or the most powerful speaker, however much he may exert himself, can get farther than the very borders of this question; for, day by day, as we are connected with it and investigate it, we continually find more and more beauties, and become more and more enamoured of the great work in which we are engaged. (Cheers.) Its course has been like that of every other great question. Its beginning was feeble enough. At its commencement it was wrapped up in much sophistry and mystification. Fallacies the most ludicrous, pretensions the most absurd, were put forward to oppose the progress of those principles of which we have been the humble exponents to the people of this country. But now this sophistry and mystification, these fallacies and pretensions, have all vanished; and the question of Free Trade—the object for the promotion of which the Anti-Corn-Law League is organized—stands before the people of this country in the simple form; we have justice confronting wrong and oppression; and we are asking the people of this empire to side with justice against oppression. (Cheers.) Two principles are offered for your adoption. The one goes by the name of Protection, the other by the title of Free Trade. At the Mansion-house, and at a police-office not far from this place, men sometimes give false names. (Laughter.) If they have committed any act which is disgraceful and criminal, not being entirely lost to shame, they give a name by which they are not commonly known. (Renewed laughter.) Thus the men who support this system,—who for thirty years at least have laid hold, with a violent hand, upon the subsistence of the tolling millions of this country,—those individuals dare not call their system by the name which it justly deserves, but have assumed that of "protection"—an amiable and harmless thing. (Laughter.) On the other hand the Free-Trade principle is offered to you; and I believe that no meetings have not been held in this building and elsewhere without this effect, that there is now an almost universal assent to the beauty and honesty of the principles which the League is established to promote. (Hear, hear.) These great principles, or rather these great the great "Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture," and the other the "National Anti-Corn-Law League." We have learned that protection is a robbery of those upon whom it acts, that it is enervating and injurious even to those who seek to profit by it. It is supported, for the most part, in this country by landowners, great and small; not by facts, reason, argument, and proof, but by force, fraud, cajolery, and delusion, practiced upon every class which comes within the range of its influence. The protection societies formed twelve months ago were fitting means of promoting this odious system. From them was formed the great Central Association, which has opened an office in this metropolis; and, to be particular, I may state that I am informed that it is at No. 17, Bond-street. (Laughter.) Now, in the north of England I have occasionally seen circulars which have been sent down from some certainly not very respectable firms in the city of London, offering to any party in the manufacturing districts, who was thought to be short of capital, certain accommodation bills, to be drawn, accepted, endorsed, dishonoured, and renewed, to be again dishonoured. (Laughter.) Now, those firms may be called swindling concerns; and I have been endeavouring to discover whether the establishment at 17, Bond-street, is not of the same character. (Laughter.) I told them in the House of Commons the other night, that they ought to put a sign over their door with this inscription upon it, "British farmers regularly taken in and done for." (Laughter.) The brass plate might have engraved upon it, "Richmond and Company." (Repeated laughter.) They offer to the farmers accommodation to help them out of their distresses; fraudulent bills of every description; promises which never can be realized; acts of Parliament which are of no more value for the purposes for which they are passed than the parchment upon which they are engrossed. And thus they lure on thousands of farmers to a reliance upon a support which must fail them, and to a ruin from which there is no escape. (Hear, hear.) This society is curiously formed. There are in it political landlords, dukes, lords, earls, baronets, and so forth; and then there is an unpleasant and amphibious creature who is known by the name of a land-valuer—half farmer, half small squire; (great applause)—there is a little also of the common steward and the auctioneer in his composition. Now, the leaders of this firm are the Dukes of Buckingham and Richmond; and time was when Sir Edward Knatchbull might have been regarded as filling the same character. It reminds me very much of a society which we hear of in "Martin Chuzzlewit," called, I believe, "The Anglo-Bengalee Disinterested Loan Society." (Laughter.) I believe the chairman of the board of directors and the one individual who formed the board were enriched; but all those who trusted to their professions were duped and ruined. Now, first, with respect to the Duke of Buckingham. When the Government came into office, that great man—"Planchette," I believe, is his name—was a member of that Cabinet. He was a farmers' friend. It became necessary to alter the Corn Laws, and greatly to modify the tariff, and it was not desirable for further purposes, to be hereafter accomplished, that the confidence of the farmers in the Duke of Buckingham should be entirely destroyed. He, therefore, left the Cabinet, and did not interfere with the carrying of those Free-Trade measures. But did he get anything for so doing? I am not able to estimate the compensation which he received, but it was stated in the public newspapers that he received what is called "a garter." (Laughter.) Let no one imagine that this garter is that homely article by which stockings are kept up. (Renewed laughter.) I do not know exactly what it is, because I never saw one, but I have some information from the ordinary sources that it is a decoration, a sort of toy, which the men in the pit of this theatre would laugh at, or be insulted if any one supposed they were for a moment covetous of; but still a decoration for which gentlemen with long lines of ancestry will do very dirty work. (Loud cheers.) I know not its use unless it be that it gives a man precedence of some one else. I have heard of magnetic or metallic rings, some contrivance by which either very wise or very superstitious people fancy they can cure le docteur and other complaints; it may be that this collar, or garter, may have some effect upon the body; but of this I am perfectly certain, that it comes like a shock of paralysis upon anything like independence and honourable feeling. (Loud cheers.) Then the next in the firm is the Duke of Richmond. (Laughter.) It is hard to tell whether he is not a bigger man than the Duke of Buckingham. He once talked as though he had made the Cabinet, and intimated that if its members did not do his bidding he would unmake it. (Hear.) Well, one would suppose that the Free-Trade measures of the Government had made the Duke of Richmond exceedingly hostile to it. When he talks to the farmers he tells them of his independance, of his having led soldiers to battle some time during the last generation, and that so long as there is a drop of blood in his veins he will stand by the British farmer. (Laughter.) What does all this mean? The Duke of Richmond is believed to be a rich man, but his brothers are supposed to be very poor. He allows his brother, or brothers, a small income out of the family property until they can get settled under the Government. Now, one of the Duke of Richmond's brothers—I know not whether he has more, but probably he has—is Lord Arthur Lennox, who has been placed in office, under this Government, as a Lord of the Treasury, and, I believe, holds the command of his regiment at the same time. The salary of a Lord of the Treasury is reputed to be about £1200 a year. Things are very much now as they were when Butler wrote his "Hudibras;" then it was £200 a year, now it is £1200.—

"What makes all doctrines plain and clear?
About twelve hundred pounds a year.
And that which was proved true before,
Prove false again? Twelve hundred more." (Laughter.)

But the Duke of Richmond has a son known to the public by the title of the Earl of March; who represents, I believe, the district of West Sussex; and he also has had special favour from this Government. I am told that he has had left the army and shaved off his moustachios. (Laughter.) Now, I have often suspected that a vast deal of the gallant bearing of these men really consists in their moustachios. (Renewed laughter.) But I am told he has left the Blues.—(I may make a mistake in using these words, because I am not very conversant with such matters, where he was a lieutenant, and he has now an unattached company on half-pay, and is besides a paid aide-de-camp to the Commander-in-Chief, the Duke of Wellington, a Cabinet Minister. It appears to me that this trade of a farmers' friend is not a bad one. (Cheers and laughter.) Now, you know the Duke of Richmond is remoured to be in the habit of withdrawing the family allowance when his brothers and relations get settled in life,—that is, settled upon you. (Laughter.) If, therefore, by his brother becoming a Lord of the Treasury, he is able to dispense with the allowance of £300 a year, why, then, that amount is some compensation to his grace for the loss which he sustained owing to the free trade in salmon. (Cheers.) We now come to Sir E. Knatchbull. (Laughter.) You recollect he comes from the county of Kent; that he once made a speech upon the question of the Corn Laws in the House of Commons, and as a country gentleman, a member of the House, told me the other day, "it was a very imprudent statement." (Laughter.) He spoke of the settlements of the daughters of the nobility and gentry, but never for a moment thought of the settlements of the daughters of farmers and labourers. (Hear, hear.) It is understood that Sir Edward Knatchbull is about to be called to the other House of Parliament, to be, as some people have expressed it, "translated." It is further understood that Sir Robert Peel has declined to give peerages or promotions in the peerage since his advent to office except on the ground of special service, for this very good reason, that he had a list of applicants so long that it would reach almost from Charing-cross to the House of Commons, and that he did not like, or dared not promote any one except where there were special reasons for it, because he would thereby offend all those whom he did not promote. Then we take it for granted that there are special services in the case of Sir E. Knatchbull. According to the newspapers, he is to be created Viscount Penenden. (Laughter.) Now, I believe there are special services which that hon. baronet has performed. He was taken into the Cabinet in 1841, along with the Duke of Buckingham, as a sort of decoy-duck. (Loud laughter.) He was understood to have such an unblemished reputation, to stand with a character so entirely unassailable, that his coming into the Cabinet and remaining there would be an undeniable guarantee that protection was not to be meddled with. Yet, Sir Edward has sat there with his hands in his pockets, and his chin upon his breast, enjoying the most comfortable slumbers imaginable, whilst laws have been passing through Parliament which, if his principles be true, must inevitably sacrifice the best interests of the paramount class in this country. (Hear, hear, hear.) However, it is not to be regretted that we should be relieved in that House from the soporific influence of his presence. He goes to that which has been fitly termed "the House of lacurables;" and I declare, without any reservation whatever, that I never beheld a man who, from nature or habit, was so likely or well qualified to occupy a bench in that House as Viscount Penenden. (Laughter.) You will see from these cases of Buckingham, Richmond, and Knatchbull that this trade of farmers' friends is really a very thriving affair. It is like the business in guano from Ichaboe, only it cannot be considered nearly so clean. (Loud cheers and laughter.) I would ask you to go to the class who are really agricultural; for these men of whom we have been speaking are not agriculturists. (Hear.) Ask the farmers how they fare under this system? I have heard of none of them getting rich church livings; no garters. (Laughter.) Some labourers have no stockings even. (Renewed laughter.) No, there are no titles, nor army or naval, or civil promotions for the men who have invested capital in the soil of England under the faith of these Corn Laws. And of the labourers it is hard to speak: it is a subject too sorrowful to joke upon; if it were not, I should say that the only decoration to which they are admissible is that of the order of the Union. (Cheers.) Well, if these "No. 17 Bond-street gentry" have played such fantastic tricks with the interests of farmers, and with their own principles, how do they conduct themselves when they are in the House of Commons? They sit on the side of the Ministers; they distrust the Government; they look uneasy; a little sullen;—but they do not make any great demonstration of resistance. (Laughter.) I told them the other night of a character given in a very ancient book to certain faithful guardians of old, that they were dumb dogs, who either could not or would not bark. (Cheers.) This was considered rather vituperative. (Laughter.) Sir Robert Peel, not wishing altogether to displease his party, took upon himself to lecture me for want of manners. (Renewed laughter.) He had forgotten charges which had been brought by him against an honourable friend of mine. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) There was another member on the Ministerial side—Mr. Stafford O'Brien, the member for Northamptonshire, chairman of the Publication Committee of the great Central Association, which meets at No. 17, Bond-street. (Laughter.) Now, Mr. Stafford O'Brien is, I was going to say, "guilty," and must be held answerable for the publication of a pamphlet in which the settlements of the venerated Adam Smith are altogether knowingly and intentionally perverted. (Hear, hear.) When I told them how they served their tenants and labourers, he assured me that was not the way to treat the gentry of England. (Laughter.) Now, it is a great mistake that Mr. Stafford O'Brien should have put on the lion's skin and taken upon himself to censure men in the House of Commons. He has disappointed nature that he is not something very different. From his dress, manners, and tone, it is evident that he would have made his fortune as a man-milliner (laughter); and more than that, I believe he might have borne with credit the stupendous responsibilities of such an avocation. (Loud laughter.) These protectionists do not, then, make a great demonstration against the Government. They mutter a little: it is a sort of human growl, but there is no great resolution to bite; their cause is bad, and they know it. (Hear, hear.) Their courage is ebbing out day by day; they have no faith whatever in the maintenance of their objects, and they never had any in the soundness and the honesty of their principles. (Cheers.) Sir Robert Peel drags them along, and they are able to make scarcely any opposition. A very beautiful and pleasure-giving writer, Leigh Hunt, in one of his delightful essays, describes the difficulty with which a very ingenious individual drove a number of pigs to Smithfield. (Cheers.) He says:—"Unwilling has been their subjection, but more in sorrow than in anger." They were too far gone for rage. Their case was hopeless. They did not see why they should proceed, but they felt themselves bound to do so—forced, ungodly, and damned, as they were, to do so.

polled by fate and Peel. Often would they have bolted under any other master. They squeaked and grunted as in ordinary; they sidled, they shuffled, they half stopped; they turned an eye to all the little outlets of escape, but in vain. There they stuck (for their very progress was a sort of sticking), charmed into the centre of his space of action, laying their heads together, but to no purpose; looking all as if they were shrugging their shoulders, and eschewing the tip-end of the whip of office. Much eye had they to their left leg—abroad, backward glances, not a little anticipation-squeak, and sudden rush of avoidance. It was a superfluous clutter, and they felt it; but a pig finds it more difficult than any other animal to accommodate himself to circumstances. Being out of his pale, he is in the highest state of wonderment and inaptitude. He is sluggish, obstinate, opinionate, not very social; has no desire of seeing foreign parts. Think of him in a multitude, forced to travel, and wondering what it is that drives him! Judge by this of the talents of the driver." [The reading of this extract was frequently interrupted by cheers and laughter.] Well, so much for the great Central Society for the Protection of British Agriculture. I take it that it will make a very ridiculous figure on the page of history, if any historian should ever deem it worth his while to notice it. It was an imposture when it was first started (hear, hear); it was got up for the purpose of making some spasmodic effort to perpetuate a gigantic injustice; all the intelligent classes saw through it in a moment, and those whom it was specially intended to delude are now beginning everywhere to find out, that as it has the features of an imposture, so it is one which ought speedily to be put down. (Cheers.) But in the other society, that of which we are a part,—assembled here and organized for the purpose of promoting the advancement of that other great principle of Free Trade and perfect emancipation of industry (cheers),—we have no Buckinghams, Richmonds, and Knatchbills, to whom you can point with stars, garters, titles, and promotions in the army or in the civil service. The prominent men in the Anti-Corn-Law League, whether here or in any other part of the country—for there are hundreds of them—are from the ranks; they have not joined this agitation for the purpose of obtaining place, power, and station. No; if there be one position more honourable and to be coveted than another, it is that it may be believed now and in aftertimes by the people of this land that we have done something in our day and generation to strike off the shackles which bind you, that your country may be made great, powerful, and happy. (The vast assembly here rose en masse, and continued standing for some time cheering and waving hats and handkerchiefs.) From the beginning, six or seven years ago, we have had no reliance except upon this—first the omnipotence of truth; and then upon the intelligence and virtue of our countrymen. We have applied to you time after time, and also to your fellow-men in every part of the kingdom; ay, and that appeal has been nobly responded to. There are no men in this country, I believe, connected with any political movement whatever, who could have had such a response as has been given to the appeal which the Anti-Corn-Law League has made to the population of Great Britain. (Loud cheers.) In 1839 we asked our friends and neighbours, principally in Lancashire and

Yorkshire, for a subscription to begin and carry on the war against the Corn Laws; £5000 was immediately subscribed. In 1840 we requested a further subscription, and £7000 or £8000 were raised for that and a part of the following year. In 1841 we sent out circulars to every county in the kingdom, asking the men who are engaged to teach the doctrines of religion to the people, what they thought about the Corn Laws. We invited them to come to Manchester and confer upon this subject, and not less than 700 of them did leave the districts in which they resided, and, at immense personal inconvenience and great expense, they assembled in Manchester to discuss this momentous question. (Cheers.) In 1842 we had a Bazaar in that town; the ladies provided the articles for it, sold them, and handed £10,000 to the Council of the League as the proceeds. (Hear.) In 1843 we asked for £50,000, and that sum was collected. In 1844 we solicited £100,000, and between £80,000 and £90,000 have been subscribed; although the great Bazaar to be held here in May next, and the proceeds of it, were reckoned when we originally asked the country for £100,000. This year is but young as yet; two months almost have gone, in the first of which, and in the three concluding months of 1844, we asked the Free-Traders in the northern counties not to subscribe money to the Council of the League, but to do that which was more beneficial—to invest some of their property in a powerful weapon by which at the hustings they could defend their rights and liberties. (Immense cheers.) During that time, according to a calculation, which I believe is under the mark, it appears the Free-Traders in those counties, at the recommendation of the Council of the League—in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Yorkshire chiefly, have invested a sum of not less than £250,000 in the purchase of county qualifications. (Cheers.) There is a class of men, as you know, everywhere, who do not take the trouble to inquire into truth, and then go about spreading that which is not true. There is a set of individuals in the country who say, "This is very unconstitutional in the League; collecting money by thousands and scores of thousands, buying qualifications, and making fictitious votes." (Laughter.) Why, it is no such thing. The League never collected a penny to purchase a qualification for any one. We buy our own qualifications. I have five brothers, there being six of us altogether, and we have spent £900 in the last four months in purchasing qualifications in four counties in the north of England. The whole of this £250,000 has been subscribed by individual Free-Traders in those counties, who are resolved by this means to get within the pale of the constitution of their country that they may fight the battle of their country's rights and liberties on the constitutional ground of the hustings at the next election. (Cheers.) We shall have a Bazaar here in May next, and, from the reports which we have received by letters in London and Manchester, we find that in a large number of towns committees are already at work, and that a very magnificent collection of articles will be submitted for your inspection and purchase in the month of May. But every body in the country asks, "Are they doing what they ought in London?" (Hear.) Now, in the metropolis it is very difficult to form district or local associations for a purpose like this. In a town of twenty thousand inhabitants in the north you can get twenty or thirty ladies to meet together, and take the whole management, and do everything in very short-time. In the metropolis it is very difficult to form district or local associations for a purpose like this. In a town of twenty thousand inhabitants in the north you can get twenty or thirty ladies to meet together, and take the whole management, and do everything in very short-note style. Here it is not so easy, because people have their friends living a very long way apart, and they do not know their neighbours so much as they do in the small towns in the north; still I have no doubt that a great deal is being done, and that a vast deal more may and will be accomplished, before we are three months older, for the purpose of adding your contributions to those of your countrymen and countrywomen, in order that we may have in this building—and decorated as it will be in the most magnificent manner—a splendid collection of articles which would be worthy, ay, and would be no discredit to her—the Sovereign of this land herself to visit. (Loud cheers.) I take it that our position as an Anti-Corn-Law League is a very prosperous one. I never advise any one to look on the dark side of things; I always endeavour to look on the cheerful side of the picture; troubles and disasters will come fast enough without going half way to meet them. Recollect who is the Prime Minister of this country now. He did, it is true, come into office upon the shoulders of the great Central Association, or those who since that time have formed it; but what have been his opinions in past times, and what are his plans now? From what source does he expect that fame which he hopes will hereafter attach to his character? I have here a quotation from a speech made by Sir Robert Peel in 1824. He was then Secretary of State. Mr. Huskisson was at that time bringing forward his Free-Trade measure with regard to silks, ribbons, gloves, and so forth. The landowners do not make a great fight about those articles. The report says, "Mr. Secretary Peel exhorted the House to firmness—reminding it that the eyes of Europe were upon it, and he warned Parliament. Now, greatly those sound and irrefragable principles of commercial policy which they had heard so ably advocated would be prejudiced if it were to yield to the fears of the timid, or the representations of the interested." He knew a good deal about it in 1824; he cannot be less informed twenty-one years afterwards. In 1842 he said, "The true policy of a nation is to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market." In his speech on Friday last he had occasion to allude to a certain combination which exists, or is supposed to do so, amongst the coal-owners in the north of England, by which they fail largely and abundantly to supply this metropolis with coal. What was Sir Robert Peel's language with respect to that monopoly? He says, "I must also think that it is a great abuse of a natural monopoly, if there be combinations among coal-mine proprietors for the purpose of restricting the supply and enhancing the price of coal in this country." Now, I will read it in another way: "I must also think it is a great abuse of a natural monopoly if there be a combination among Corn-land proprietors for the purpose of restricting the supply and enhancing the price of corn in this country." (Loud and prolonged cheering.) A man cannot be so blind as not to see what is right with respect to coal, and be altogether oblivious of what is just with reference to corn. Then, towards the conclusion of his speech, he said:—"I know it will be said, that the principles I have laid down are capable of much further extension, and that I ought to have been led, in deference to those principles, to a still more extensive reduction of taxation. But it is our object, while we establish good principles,—at the same time viewing the state of society, the magnitude of the interests involved, the consequences upon those interests of hasty and rash interference,—to realize the utmost degree of good without the disturbance and alarm of interests, which cannot be disturbed and cannot be alarmed without paralyzing the industry of the country." Here there is an open acknowledgment of all the principles that we advocate here and in the House of Commons: it is clear he has no sympathy with the half-a-dozen members of the great Central Society who sit down behind him, but all his sympathies are with the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League who sit opposite to him. If you look to the other side of the table you find Lord John Russell not altogether stationary upon this great question. (Hear, hear.) He has been for three years past pertinaciously adhering to the idea of protection—protection because of special burdens, and protection by means of a fixed duty. What does he say now? Why, he did not let the first night of the session go over without expressing his full conviction that protection was not the support, but the bane, of agriculture (loud cheers); and the night before last, on the discussion upon the Income-tax, he said he adhered to that declaration, that not only had protection been a bane to agriculture, but to every other interest to which it had been applied—to our colonial interest, to the silk manufacture of this country, and to the timber-growers of our North American possessions. Then, where are we? The great and leading men, those to whom parties look up, are agreed upon this principle; and all we are doing is merely assailing those by whose hands and intervention these principles must eventually be carried out. We are only helping them to raise public opinion, enlightening the minds of the people, concentrating their irresistible power, until it shall become great enough to enable them to fix the sanction of the Legislature to a principle so obviously honest and necessary for the prosperity of the country. (Prolonged cheers.) Public opinion, then, is putting down all opposition to this great principle; the chief men of both parties are agreed; those who are not yet convinced I fear never will be; but their power is broken, their determination cowed, and they have not courage to stir out of Parliament to make a fair and manly defence of their principles. Our course then, as a League, is, as it ever has been, onward. The same reliance upon the principle with which we started; the same unflinching faith in the intelligence and power of the population of this kingdom. We have not the thought of going back, have no dreams of compromise, or prospect before us but that of a final and complete triumph. (Cheers.) We are charged, it is true—and there are men who bring the accusation against us, with an adherence to the science of political economy, whose teachings they say are hard, ungenerous, and grasping—they blame us because we do not rashly and suddenly lay hold of every proposition that is made for the purpose of relieving the distress of our countrymen; they censure us because we do not surrender a portion, at least, of this work for the purpose of helping other things which they believe to be essential to the relief of the suffering people of our country. I do not pretend that we are more charitable than other people, but I do assert this, that we have a love of justice as great as that which finds a home in the breast of any man; and that it is from that love of justice, and a belief that in this question, and in its honest settlement, there is, and will be, justice to the industry of this country, that we pertinaciously adhere to it. What did the Home Secretary tell us only the other night? That subsequent to the close of the war, since the Corn Law of 1815 was imposed, £200,000,000 sterling have been taken from the people in the shape of poor-rates. All this, entirely independent of the vast sums which have been distributed by charitable institutions and private benevolence. He said, moreover, that one-tenth of the population of England and Wales are at this hour paupers (hear, hear); that in these parts of the United Kingdom, the richest portion of the empire, there are at this hour more than a million and a half of persons who are dependent for their subsistence upon parochial relief. I ask you to look, if you can, at that mass of misery, and then tell me what can charity and benevolence do for that? It may touch the edges or fringe of it only—it can make no sensible diminution in it. It cannot in its widest development even prevent its rapid increase. There must be another and a greater remedy than that. We have a charitable plan, not designed by us, but one which involves a principle laid down by the Creator of man when man himself was first formed (immense cheering): this plan is self-working; it requires no dukes or lords to patronize it; nor is it necessary that it should have the permissive smiles of titled and honourable ladies. It does not ask for a string of ornamental names as a committee, or subscription books upon the counters of the west-end bankers. No; this plan is one of a different nature altogether; it is not like mere charity that with cumbrous machinery gives relief to hundreds or thousands—not the most necessitous or really deserving, but rather the most importunate—but it is a principle which would spread through every rank of society, permeate through all classes of the community, and the highest and the lowest would see the beauty of it. There is not a wretch in any garret or cellar who would not find the darkness of his despair rendered less dark, if this just and blessed principle should receive the sanction of the law. (The hon. gentleman concluded the above eloquent address amid a burst of enthusiastic cheering and waving of hats, which continued for some time.)

The CHAIRMAN then came forward and said—I beg to inform you that the proceedings of this meeting are at an end, and when the time for the next meeting is fixed upon it will be duly announced to you.

Several hearty cheers having been given for the League, the meeting separated.

FREE-TRADE MEETING IN BIRMINGHAM.

At a recent meeting of the League Fund Committee in this town, the chairman, Mr. Henry Smith, made an excellent speech, from which we would gladly quote at length did our space permit. We have only room for a passage or two. Having lucidly reviewed the operations of the League for the past year, he went on to notice the anomalous position of Birmingham, represented as it was by a monopolist—Mr. Spooner; and he asked what protection did the inhabitants need? "Of what do our manufactures consist? Do we not, by the application of our capital, our talent, and our industry, convert the mineral productions of our country into articles of necessity and luxury for the whole human race? And is it for this that we require protection? Gentlemen, I assert, without fear of an opponent, that protection is the bane of our district, and (but that it cannot) it would have been our ruin. Who is it who demands it? Is it our workers in iron or steel—our gunmakers—our swordmakers—our machine-makers—our nailers—our screwmakers—or our lock-smiths? Is it our copper-smiths—our brassfounders—our buttonmakers—or our lampmakers? Is it our plumbers—our needlemakers—or our tin-smiths? Gentlemen, I say that no man, who seeks for facts from the sources of truth, can say that it is so. I say that the mechanics of Birmingham ask but for a clear stage and no favour, and they fear not the competition of the world." They had certainly one trade in the town which had protection, the glass trade, but that was in a languishing condition, and he argued that if the weight of protection which now pressed upon it were withdrawn, it would combine the elements of as vast a trade as the world ever saw. Having shown that Birmingham did not require any protection, he asked—"If, then, our improvement be not denied, and if we do not ascribe it to the beneficial influence of protection, nor to an important increase of foreign demand, to what is it to be attributed? Most certainly to a previous improvement in the home trade—to an extension of the home demand—founded on an improved condition in the people to buy, and the manufacturers to sell; and from what did those conditions proceed? As certainly, on the part of many manufacturers, from the establishment of a steady, fixed price of the raw material, by the withdrawal of protection from the producers thereof—and, as certainly, by the protection of an overruling Providence having counteracted that which spurious legislation had established injuriously for the people. Something might be ascribed to the introduction of stock under the altered tariff—something also to the increased facilities for the transmission of food—but the mighty cause was the cheapness of bread." Subsequently Mr. Smith expressed his hope that the members of the committee would exert themselves in aid of the proposed Bazaar, and in support of it offered his own subscription of £25.

ANTI-CORN-LAW LECTURER.—Mr. Falvey delivered a lecture at Petersfield, on Monday evening, at the large assembly-room at the Dolphin Hotel, on "Free Trade and the Provision Laws." It was well attended, and was listened to throughout with marked attention by a large and respectable audience. The chairman, Mr. James Fielder, sen., of Liss, rose and stated that previously to coming to the meeting he had always been undecided on the question of Free Trade, but having heard the present able and highly interesting lecture, it had removed all further doubt, and he would now declare himself to be decidedly a Free-Trader. This statement was received with much cheering. On the motion of Mr. Falvey, three cheers were given for the chairman, and also for the Council of the League.—Mr. Falvey lectured at Andover, on Friday evening, the 14th inst.; and at Newport, in the Isle of Wight, on Wednesday the 19th. The lectures were well attended, and the feeling in favour of Free Trade all that could be desired by its most enthusiastic promoters.

The price of bread in Paris for the second fortnight of the present month has been fixed at 23 centimes the kilogramme first quality, and 22 centimes the second quality. Thus, the best bread costs rather less than in some parts of France.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE £100,000 FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, February 19, 1845.

N.B. As the subscription list is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

DEATH OF THE MARQUIS OF WESTMINSTER.

We regret to announce the death of a noble and zealous Free-Trader, the Marquis of Westminster. At an important crisis in our great struggle, when the League was accused of hostility to property and the landed interest, he, one of the wealthiest and largest proprietors of land in England, came forward to give the calumny a practical refutation by sending, voluntarily and without solicitation, to the League Fund the munificent donation of five hundred pounds. The deceased marquis was lineally descended from a companion and near relative of William the Conqueror; but the family was not ennobled before 1761, when the father of the deceased marquis was created a baron, and subsequently elevated to an earldom in 1784. The marquis was born March 22, 1767, and had therefore nearly completed his 78th year. For many years he had withdrawn himself from political life, but continued to be a distinguished patron of the arts, and a liberal supporter of the charities in the county of Chester. His views of commercial policy were those which Pitt endeavoured to carry into effect before the wars of the French Revolution, and to which most of the party that assumed Mr. Pitt's name have shown themselves inveterate opponents.

His lordship is succeeded in his title and estates by his eldest son Richard Earl Grosvenor, who represented the county of Chester in three successive parliaments previous to 1835, since which time he has lived in the retirement of private life.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXI.

TO GEORGE LYNES, CARPET WEAVER, NORWICH.

SIR,—I like you for a correspondent. You write in a simple, honest, straightforward way. You do not falsify, like Mr. Cayley; nor mystify, like Sir Robert Peel; nor bluster, like the Duke of Richmond. The "Sabbath-school education" has not been lost upon you. It has enabled you to express what you mean; and it has not enabled you to say one thing and mean another, like those who cant of independence for the country, and plan for profits to their own pockets. Never apologise again, man.

Your language is as English as your feelings. Moreover, truth and thought go well in any language. They are the language of humanity.

Your account, in your letter to me in the Norwich Mercury, of Mr. Worth's attempted reduction of wages, stands plain and uncontradicted. It does him no credit, either for the fact or the manner. You say "no strike was contemplated;" and I say "more's the pity," if there was the chance of its being effective. It is the workman's ultimate resource against such an attempt to beat down his labour below the market price which other masters show they can afford to give, and do give. There is one thing which always makes me feel very unforgiving towards a master manufacturer: and that is when by haughtiness, rapacity, or indifference, he widens the breach between the different sections of the industrial population. He comes into the labour-market for a weaver as he goes into the cattle-market for a horse. The weaver ought not to be treated less kindly than the horse, at any rate. To look only at the helplessness that arises from destitution; to calculate not merely his own occasion for labour, but the yielding spirit that makes famine eager to close the hardest bargain with capital; when "buying in the cheapest market" to make that market cheaper by unfair advantages; to be less careful of keeping the man than the machine in good working trim; and to confine to the warehouse or counting-house all thought of those whom he employs in the production of his merchandise: these are the faults, I trust, only of a small fraction of the class which have alienated the hearts of the working people, embittered their feelings, cherished their prejudices, sent their brains woolgathering after the nostrums of political, economical, and philanthropic quacks, and so recoiled upon the whole class by warring that cordial co-operation which, if hearty at first, might ere this, have done so much for the benefit of both by hastening the downfall of monopoly. The whole manufacturing interest suffers, and through that the whole nation suffers, for the unfaithfulness of some great masters and tradesmen to the duties of their position in relation to the working classes. They themselves suffer with others, in the long run, though they have not the sense to see it. Industry is a common cause; and, whether it be master or man who imagines an antagonism between their real interests, he is a mischievous blunderer. To have the confidence and zeal of their workpeople; to secure for them plenty of food and of employment; to guard them against the perils of vice and pauperism; and to win, for them, with them, and by them, those commercial rights of which political rights must be the safeguard: these

ERRATUM.

In LEAGUE No. 75, for Bailey, Samuel, 51, Cord-street, Liverpool, read Bailey, Samuel, 51, Grove-street.

PUBLIC WALKS, PARKS, &c.—The subscription to the fund for establishing public places for exercise and recreation, for our industrious population, now amounts to the sum which, at the commencement of the movement, we considered it possible to obtain, viz., £30,000: our place in the progress of this spirited effort is reached, and we can now look back upon what has been done, with advantage to the success of the future.

would be for some gentleman to move that this meeting resolve itself into a Bazaar Committee, with power to add to its numbers.

Mr. ARMSTRONG moved, and Mr. M'CARTNEY seconded, the resolution.

Mr. J. B. SMITH: I suppose donations in the shape of manufactures sent for exhibition with the manufacturers' names appended, will be received?

The CHAIRMAN: That is a matter to be considered. The suggestion is a good one, and no doubt will be favourably entertained.

Mr. J. B. SMITH: Would it not be desirable to let them remain for a time at the Bazaar on view, with the names of the manufacturers attached? It would induce many parties, no doubt, to send contributions.

The CHAIRMAN: It is desirable. They might be labelled, and if sold early, sold on the understanding that they should remain some days on view before they were delivered. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. EVANS: If you make it an exhibition of British manufactures, will not the French exhibition interfere with it?

Mr. J. B. SMITH: That is not held this year. It strikes me, if you make it an exhibition of British manufactures, you will not only have a great many people to visit it from various parts of this country, but a great many foreigners will come. A great many people flocked to Paris when the exhibition was held there; and many to Berlin on the occasion of an exhibition there, also; and of course, it may be naturally expected that many French and other people will come to London to see this. (Hear.)

Mr. JOHNSON: Will goods be taken for exhibition only and returned?

The CHAIRMAN: No, we have settled so far, that goods can only be received for sale; there would not be sufficient room in the theatre for more goods than it is calculated will be sent for actual sale.

Mr. W. RAWSON: It will be so advantageous for parties to send goods for exhibition, that they will no doubt be glad to give them for sale, for the sake of the opportunity. (Hear, hear.)

The CHAIRMAN: With regard to visits from foreigners, the Bazaar has been already advertised in Galignani, and the news will thus already have been circulated amongst our friends over the Continent. It has also been made known in America. (Hear.)

Mr. W. EVANS: It is necessary to impress upon the committee that there must be a good deal of labour to make it successful.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, we must have exertion. The precise day is not exactly fixed for the commencement or duration of the Bazaar, but the beginning or first week in May is talked of, and it may be expected that it will last the month out. The time is favourable, because there will be the Whitsuntide cheap trains to London, and it is thought it will be desirable to make arrangements with most of the railway companies, especially for the facilitating the visits of our friends in all parts of the kingdom. Then, again, May is the time for the anniversary religious meetings at Exeter Hall, and it is well known that the people who attend these anniversaries are very generally the friends and supporters of League principles. (Cheers.)

The resolution was then put and carried nem. con.; and a second resolution, appointing future meetings for every Monday and Thursday evening, having been adopted, the meeting separated.

MEETING IN PRESTON.

A select tea meeting, consisting chiefly of ladies favourable to the Free-Trade movement in this town, was held in the Corn Exchange Rooms, on Wednesday evening last, for the purpose of taking measures to support the Great National Bazaar, to take place in May. Cards of invitation were issued by the Free-Trade Registration Committee. The tea and accompaniments were gratuitously furnished by the ladies, and more excellently replenished trays were never presented at meetings of this kind. From the select character of the meeting, an unusual degree of cordiality, harmony, and good feeling prevailed. The room in which the company assembled was tastefully decorated with Free-Trade and other devices.

During tea, Mr. Alderman Brooks entered the room in company with Mr. Watkins, of Manchester. The company immediately rose from their seats, and testified their approbation with loud bursts of applause.

A plentiful supply of fruits of all kinds was set out on the table after the removal of the tea apparatus; and when an hour or two had been spent in the best of enjoyment and fellowship, the gentlemen present assembled round a platform, for the transaction of the more immediate business of the evening.

On the motion of Mr. LIVESLEY, Mr. Satterthwaite was unanimously called to the chair.

The CHAIRMAN briefly stated the object of the meeting, to take measures for providing a stall at the Great Bazaar, to display the attachment of the ladies of Preston to Free-Trade principles.

Mr. G. SMITH moved the first resolution:—
"That this meeting cordially approve of the proceedings of the League, and cheerfully respond to its call to support the Great Bazaar, to be held in London in the month of May next."

The Rev. Mr. SLATS seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. WATKINS addressed the meeting in support of the Bazaar project and Free Trade generally.

Mr. LIVESLEY moved the appointment of a committee of ladies, consisting of those present at that meeting, with power to add to their number.

Mr. JOSEPH HAWKINS seconded it.

Mr. ALDERMAN BROOKS followed in a speech of some length, and was warmly applauded.

The resolution was then put to the meeting, and carried, and the names of the ladies present admitted to the committee, with power to add to their number. The secretaries of the committee are Miss Smith, Miss Haslam, and Miss Ord.

Mr. FRANKLAND moved that a committee of gentlemen should be appointed to assist the ladies in carrying out their plans, and that Mr. Charles Wilson and Mr. John Cart act as secretaries.

Mr. JAMES PARK seconded the motion, and trusted that, after the Bazaar, the finishing stroke would speedily be put upon monopoly.

The resolution was carried, and a large committee

Mr. R. ASHCROFT moved a vote of thanks to their friends for their attendance that evening.

Mr. HASLAM seconded the motion.

Mr. BROOKS, in reply, commented upon the increase to the register in North Cheshire, the West Riding, and South Lancashire. He had five sons himself, four of whom were competent to vote; and for an outlay of £160 in freeholds, he procured six per cent. for it, and would also have five votes into the bargain. (Applause.) In North Cheshire, too, for a small consideration, his lads had procured votes. In North Lancashire the register could be carried, there was no doubt of that—all that was wanted was a little exertion.

Mr. ASHCROFT stated that Mr. Livesey had procured votes for five of his sons in North Cheshire, and also in South and North Lancashire. (Loud cheers.) He hoped it would be a point of contest who will have the greatest number of sons qualified. (Hear, hear.) He begged to move a vote of thanks to his Worship the Mayor for the use of the Corn Exchange Rooms.

Mr. R. DICKSON seconded the motion, which was carried by acclamation.

Thanks were also voted to the Chairman.

Mr. LIVESLEY made some comments on the protection petition which had received the signatures of some Preston millowners. He said that for the honour of Preston it was right the world should know that, while the paltry sum of £25 had been collected for the cause of monopoly, £800 and upwards was the sum given for Free Trade. (Loud applause.)—Abridged from the Preston Guardian.

FREE-TRADE MEETING AT HOYLAND.

(Abridged from the Sheffield Independent.)

A public meeting of the friends of Free Trade, was held on Saturday evening last, in the Mechanics' hall, Hoyland, to hear an address from Robert R. Moore, Esq. The meeting was most numerously attended by the inhabitants of Hoyland, Wentworth, Scholes, and the villages adjacent. James Russell, Esq., of Hoyland, was called to the chair.

Mr. MOORE, delivered an eloquent address, and concluded by urging on his hearers to aid in forwarding the great League Bazaar to be held in May next.

Mr. PARKER, of Hoyland, then addressed the meeting. Upon the subject of the Bazaar, Mr. Parker said he was aware that the articles manufactured by them (principally heavy cast metal pillars, &c.) were of too bulky and heavy a kind to be suitable for exhibition at the Bazaar; but he could not see any reason why they should not contribute their mite. He hoped the eloquent exposition they had had from Mr. Moore would have its due effect, as their own interests were deeply concerned in the subject.

The CHAIRMAN moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Moore, which was seconded, and carried by acclamation. After a vote of thanks to the chairman, and three cheers for the League and Mr. Moore, the meeting separated.

FREE-TRADE TEA PARTY AT NOTTINGHAM.

(Abridged from the Notts Review.)

On Tuesday evening last, at five o'clock (according to previous announcement), a respectable company of the Free-Traders at Nottingham assembled in the Exchange-hall, to listen to statements of the progress of the cause. Amongst the company were the Mayor and his lady, J. Bradley, Esq., S. Bean, Esq., Mr. Alderman Cullen, J. Wilson, Esq., J. Beardmore, Esq., Mr. Alderman Rogers, Mr. Alderman Heard, Mr. Smith Fowler, Mr. Alderman Judd, Mr. A. Wells, Mr. Plungst, Mr. Cripps, and other gentlemen. Many ladies also honoured the proceedings with their presence.

At about seven o'clock, Colonel Thompson and Robert R. Moore, Esq., were introduced to the meeting by S. Bean, Esq., amidst loud plaudits.

The Mayor having taken the chair, addressed the meeting. Colonel Thompson and Robert R. Moore, Esq., followed in able speeches, which were loudly and repeatedly cheered.

Mr. Alderman HEARD proposed the following resolution, "That this meeting, grateful for the exertions of the Anti-Corn-Law League, pledges itself to contribute specimens of the manufactures of Nottingham, and fancy articles, in aid of the forthcoming Bazaar; and begs to thank the gentlemen who have so ably represented the League on this occasion."

Mr. Alderman JUDG seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. Alderman BEAN moved, and Mr. Alderman VICKERS seconded, a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was carried with acclamation.

The Chairman having acknowledged the vote, the meeting separated.

AN EXAMPLE TO LANDLORDS.—Certain gentlemen, who have long been allowed by Lord Francis Egerton to shoot over his Northamptonshire estates, having preserved so strictly as to cause a vast increase of game, and having oppressed and annoyed some of his lordship's tenants, the noble lord, on being informed of the circumstances, has ordered that the gentlemen shall be warned off, and has further given his tenants permission to deal with the game as they think proper, so that they can now destroy or preserve it, at their option.—Liverpool Athlon.

IRISH MANUFACTURES.—FREE TRADE.—A great meeting was held in Dublin, last week, to consider the best mode of developing the manufacturing resources of Ireland, in order to "employ the industrious millions." The Lord Mayor presided, and Mr. O'Connell and other remarkable political characters, among others the Rev. T. D. Gregg, an Orangeman and the leader of the Protestant Operative Society, were present. Mr. James Haughton, in seconding one of the resolutions, said that—"Unless they come forward and took hold of the principle of universal Free Trade, they would never succeed in establishing manufactures on a sound and extensive basis, or give employment to the thousands and tens of thousands of poor people who now stood in need of it. (Cheers.) He believed the principle of Free Trade with all the nations of the earth the surest guarantee for the prosperity of native manufacture, and if that boon were once conceded he felt convinced that the intelligence of the country—the immortal mind of Ireland—would take hold of the advantages thus afforded, and that in a very short time manufactories would spring up in every corner of the land, and to a greater extent than the most sanguine could suppose. (Cheers.) If Ireland had the whole world to look to as a mart for the produce and labour of her inhabitants, they would not deserve the high character which they had earned for intelligence and ingenuity if they were not able to take advantage of such circumstances, and turn them to account for the benefit of the country. (Cheers.)"

THE SOCIALIST ESTATE OF HARMONY. HALL, IN HAMPSHIRE.—WHAT ARE THE BURDENS UPON LAND?

The "exclusive burdens on land" is a topic which once more claims public notice. It has been reintroduced into Downing-street by a deputation of farmers and landowners, and from Downing-street it has come into the newspapers, and from the newspapers it has taken its place in common conversation; therefore, it is worth while to draw the attention of Free-Traders to the real facts of the case.

I shall first take five farms in the centre of Hampshire. One of them is only a fractional piece of land, eight acres, but the other four are of goodly size. The scale of taxation is precisely the same as prevails throughout that county and the other agricultural counties of England, with, I believe, the exception of poor's rates. There are fewer unemployed poor in the district referred to than in most other places: a result which is to be attributed to more than one cause, though the chief cause unquestionably is the extension of employment by grubbing out copes and old hedges, digging down useless banks, making composts, and by draining, ditching, and such like matters; and these works have been introduced into the district by an association of individuals commonly called "Socialists." They are the renters of the five farms I am now about to give details of; and though it so happens that their opinions and mine are radically different on the questions of "private property," "community of property," "competition the soul of commerce," and so on, I am bound to say that they, on a late occasion, allowed me to inspect their property, their account-books, their domestic establishment, and to obtain the most minute details of all their business affairs. And they did all this knowing that the present state of their society is not so prosperous as they would like to show it to a stranger, and that stranger an unbeliever in the possibility of carrying out a community of property.

But the difficulties which they have had to encounter are such as still compel me to say that, were they defunct to-morrow as a community, they have given an impetus to agriculture in their neighbourhood. It is but fair to state, however, that that excellent landlord, Baring Wall, Esq., M.P., who lives in the neighbourhood, has also of his own accord, on his own property, done much more than what landlords usually do to employ the labourers. Yet, when this is taken into account, there is still a considerable balance of public good due to the Socialist community for the example they have set the other farmers.

But my object, in referring to them, is to give a statement of rent and taxes. They keep their books in such a way that any item, or every item, of income and expenditure may be seen at a glance. Here are a few of the details.

The farms are Queenwood, containing 328 acres and 20 perches; and Buckholt, containing 206 acres, 1 rood, and 12 perches. The rent of both is £376; title, £31. 17s. 8d.; poor-rates, £37. 11s. 6d.; church-rate, £1. 3s.; county-rate, £2. 6s. 10d.; highway-rate, £1. 16s. 7d.; income-tax, £4. 17s. 8d.; insurance, £31. 13s. 6d.; property-tax, paid by the tenants for the landlord, and deducted from the rent, £12. 6s. 2d. On these two farms there is no land-tax.

Next there is the Brickfield property, containing 8 acres, the rent of which is £12, and the poor-rates £1. Its other taxes are included in the foregoing.

Next there is Great Bentley farm, containing 298 acres and 22 perches. Rent, £253; title, £63. 4s.; poor-rates, £30; church-rate, 11s. 11d.; county-rate, £1. 17s. 6d.; highway-rate, £1. 6s.; income-tax, £3. 5s. 4d.; land-tax, £13. 1s. 8d.; property-tax, £6 10s. These last two items, land and property taxes, are paid by the tenants for the landlord, and deducted from the rent.

Next there is Little Bentley, containing 245 acres, 3 roods, and 25 perches. Rent, £180; title, £56; poor-rates, £28. 5s. 3d.; church-rate, £1. 0s. 2d.; county-rate, 18s. 9d.; highway-rate, £1. 6s.; income-tax, £3. 0s. 2d.; no land-tax; property-tax, £0. 0s. 6d.

Next there is a property belonging to the society of 64 acres. The taxes upon which I did not ascertain save the land-tax, which is £3. 4s. 4d.

The assessed taxes will be higher this year than heretofore, as a portion of the buildings for schools, &c., will be occupied, which were not finished last year. The taxes paid last year were, for 116 windows, £34. 16s. 6d. When the building is all occupied this tax will be for 161 windows, £47. 3s. 6d. The other taxes will remain the same as now, namely, 18 windows in infant school, £4. 16s. 3d.; one male servant, £1. 4s.; one four-wheeled carriage, £4. 10s.; one two-wheeled ditto, £3. 6s.; one horse for riding, £1. 8s. 9d.; three dogs, £2. 8s.; ten per cent. on foregoing, £1. 14s.. Total, £54. 1s. 6d.

Total of acres rented, 1094, 1 rood, and 39 perches; total rent, £821. Total of local and general burdens—assessed taxes, £51. 1s. 6d.; title, £151. 1s. 8d.; poor-rates, £96. 16s. 9d.; church rate, £2. 15s. 1d.; county-rate, £7. 7s. 1d.; highway-rate, £4. 6s. 7d.; income-tax, £11. 3s. 2d.; insurance, £31. 13s. 6d. Add to which the landlords' burdens, paid by the tenants and deducted from the rent, £37. 18s. 3d.

Taking this as a sample of Hampshire, it does not afford a view of taxation in anyway oppressive to the landlords; but it does show a heavy load on the shoulders of the farmers. Mr. Baker, of Witley, in Essex, said, at the interview with Sir Robert Peel, that rent formed but a very inconsiderable part of the tenants' outgoings. This may be true if every item of the expense—the wages of labour, the keep of horses, and wear and tear of implements—be taken into account. But it should be recollected that, whether rent be high or low, it is an abstraction from the farmer's working capital, and he must pay it whether he has made a profit or not.

Herein is the difference between the trade of manufacturing corn and the trade of manufacturing cloth. The cloth-maker is sometimes reproached for becoming rich, while the corn-grower remains poor. But the cloth-maker enriches himself by keeping his profits in his own hands. If he does not extend his trade, he saves his profits. But if, instead of hoarding them up, he extends his trade, buys more raw material, employs more hands, pays more wages, sells more goods, and realizes more profits, he not only enriches himself, but also the nation. If he makes no profit at all, he has at least the advantage of the corn-grower; for, by his trade of cloth-making prosperous or otherwise, he has no hand dipping into his pocket for money which that hand never earned.

The corn-grower has such a hand; and a hand that will have its bond whether there is a profit or not. The Duke of Richmond's tenantry whom he has sold up from time to time can bear testimony to this. And I wish general readers to look at it narrowly.

It is not the mere amount of rent that constitutes the rent burden. The burden is that the rent is abstracted from the tenant's working capital, without reference to the fact of his having or not having a profit to pay it from. The farmer may project drains; may decide on the virtues of guano; may determine to buy guano; may intend to collect composts; may see the expediency of erecting cisterns to save liquid manures; may think of doing all that the Royal Agricultural Society ever recommended him to do; but all at once the hand of the President of the Royal Agricultural Society is felt in his pocket, and away goes the money that should pay for those projects, and that without any reference to his ability to spare that money, or his ability to carry on his improvements without it.

So that he loses much more by paying this tax called rent than its mere amount. He loses the ability to cultivate his farm; and in the year 1844 loses the profits of the year 1845.

Now, do not let me be understood as deprecating the payment of rent: I only go the length of saying that rent should be contingent on profit. Were this so, we would soon see agriculture start into a new life of scientific vigour. This, in my opinion, would be the first principle of protection. Until tenants are so protected, it is a cruel mockery to talk to them of landlords' friendship.

Every legislative project shows that the tenant has had no share in the landlord's protective designs. Look at the landlord's taxes: the tenant must pay them. They are deducted from the rent. But the receipts must be shown before the deduction is made. And, if the rent be paid at the proper time, this shows that the landlords assembled in Parliament resolved that their tenantry should pay part of their rents, for the convenience of the landlords, before the proper time, thus again abstracting from the tenant-farmer his working capital.

But the five farms in Hampshire pay, like other farms, another tax. The occupants are prepared to prove that the destruction done by game this last year was fully equal to the amount of tithe. And this loss will continue; because the game comes from the adjoining estates, over which they have no control.

Mr. Baker states the heaviest burden on farmers to be the wages of labour; because, he says, they have to pay more men than they really want. He says they find a man and his family would cost in the workhouse 17s. 6d. a week; but if the man be employed at 10s. a week, he keeps his own family; therefore, argues Mr. Baker, the farmers, to save the difference of 7s. 6d., employ more men than they require. He says that in his district they employ at the rate of six to the hundred acres. This introduces an all-important topic.

The wages of labourers cannot be a burden on the farmer unless he employs more than he requires. It is a fallacy to call that a burden which produces value, and without which there would be no value. And it is an unhappy circumstance that our farmers, and landlords as well, speaking of them generally, do not distinguish between facts and fallacies.

The wages of labour are called a burden by Mr. Baker, although the land would yield no corn without labour.

Rent is stated by the same authority not to be a burden, although the land would yield corn if no rent were paid.

But labour is a burden if men are employed, as Mr. Baker says they are, merely to keep them from being more expensive in the workhouse. Now, my notions of getting rid of such a burden as this is to find such surplus labourers employment elsewhere. Let us open up every possible channel of trade, and make the law of parish settlements such as would induce labourers to move from home; and we would not only relieve Mr. Baker of his burden of unnecessary labour, but make new customers for his bread, and beef, and mutton; butter, bacon, and cheese.

An east country farmer, who spoke at the interview with the Prime Minister, had been unable to get a good price in Smithfield for his cattle. He asked the salesman why; and the salesman said, "Look across the market, and you will see a hundred Dutch cattle." The east country farmer doubtless thought this a poser for Sir Robert. But what if that farmer, instead of looking across Smithfield, had looked across Essex, Suffolk, and his own county, Cambridge, and had seen, what he surely must know, that the farm-labourers never taste beef; no, not an ounce of it from year to year? What if he had gone into a calculation to show how the price of cattle would rise if every labourer's family of five persons had two or even three pounds of butcher's meat a day? And why should they not? The workers in factories have more than that. The coalminers of Durham eat on an average almost that weight of butcher's meat a day, each man, when working in the pits. This I have ascertained by personal observation.

We are told it is of great public benefit to extract a large sum of money out of the land in the shape of rent, to maintain the aristocracy in London, because they there spend their money, and, by creating a great market for all descriptions of necessaries and luxuries, they make the rents flow back again to the corn-growers and graziers.

This point I shall not dispute; although to spend money in merely consuming is not the same as to spend money in producing, and in consuming because you produce. But I shall take the liberty of reminding those who think this a great argument that it would be equally a benefit to corn-growers and graziers to pay higher wages to labourers. Nay, it would be a greater benefit, because the labourers eat no beef nor mutton now at all; and if they were paid sufficient wages to purchase both, such wages would go directly back to those who paid them.

But all this line of argument is fallacious. Labour can only be paid for if profitable; and it must itself add value to something before it can be profitable.

If it be true that Mr. Baker and his neighbours employ six men to the 100 acres, they employ just double the average of most other counties, and nearly double what are employed in some parts of Essex. I believe, and I have proved it, and am ready to do so to any inquirer or sceptic, that from six to ten labourers per 100 acres will return more profit than three or four. But a farmer must stand in a very different relation to his landlord from what is now common. On the Duke of Richmond's estates in Sussex there are not more, on an average, than three men employed to the 100 acres; and, taking an average of the whole kingdom, there are not more, if quite so many. The census tables would show more; but the census assumes every man to be a labourer who is so set down; whereas, in Sussex alone, not above two-thirds of those set down as labourers are actually employed at any one time, save in harvest.

Mr. Baker says the wages paid in Essex in lieu of parish relief are 10s. a week. But this is not so in Sussex. The more common method in Sussex is to give work at half wages; that is to say, to give one week's work and one week's wages in the fortnight, or 9s. every two weeks.

It now becomes a curious question to inquire what the labouring population, as returned in the census, contributes to the national revenue, the national commerce, the national manufactures, &c. It will be found that they contribute almost nothing, and in some counties absolutely nothing, to that description of national wealth which centres in Smithfield Market. Consequently they do little for the customs and excise duties; and less than either comfort or decency requires for the productions of the loom. But there is not now room for the calculation.

On the question of burdens on land with which I began I shall only remark in conclusion, that whatever burdens may be exhibited in figures, such as taxes and rent and destruction by game (wages of labour, keep of horses, and wear of implements not being burdens, but the producers of whatever wealth the farmer may possess)—I say, let the actual burdens be as heavy as they are represented, there is a heavier burden still, that which, instead of weighing upon the farmer's back as the others do, and flinging from his pocket, is a clog upon his feet, a drag upon his action, a bond which he cannot break, and which keeps him standing still while all the world is advancing. This is his dependence on the landlord's will and the caprice of his agents—a dependence which results directly from the acts of Parliament misnamed protection—a dependence which proves with melancholy truth that "protection is the bane of agriculture."

ONE WHO WAS WHITTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

ANTI-CORN-LAW BAZAAR.—We are the enemies of all monopolies; and emphatically of monopolies effecting the food of the people. The League, as a wisely-conceived and judiciously-managed movement in favour of Free Trade, has had, and will have, our earnest advocacy. That movement must be sustained; and, as an easy and effectual mode of sustaining it, we strongly recommend the proposed Bazaar. We intend to give practical proof of our sincerity in this recommendation by presenting, as an appropriate gift, a splendid copy of a Scotch Bible—itsell the fruit of a successful effort to abolish a most unrighteous monopoly of "the word of life;" and we call on all classes of our readers to express their approval of Free Trade in some appropriate contributions to the Bazaar. What kind of contributions will be suitable and appropriate may be learned from an advertisement in another column, to which we respectfully invite the attention of our readers. Whatever they propose to do, we hope they will do cheerfully and immediately. The cause deserves liberality.—Christian Examiner.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

13th of 2nd mo., 45.
In accidentally perusing the columns of the Morning Post of this day, under the head of "Literature," I read a review of a recently-published work, entitled "Algeria, Past and Present, by J. H. Blofield, Esq."

After quoting from the work an enumeration of the population of Algiers, as follows:—

Moors	17,000
Jews	5,000
Turks	4,000
Negroes	2,000
Kabyles and Arabs	1,000
Baskirs and Mozambites, &c.,	1,000
Europeans	30,695

The reviewer says—"Despite the flourishing vocation made in the Chamber of Deputies by the 'Vainqueur d'Isly,' we fear that no country, even when enjoying the benefit of French rule, can ever prosper when it is overrun by so great a throng of Israelites. Five thousand Jews (and usurers for the term is necessarily synonymous) let loose upon a country at once; what defence can Algiers have committed to meet with so dire an infliction? It would be well for this distracted land if the people could be got rid of by some such summary process as was employed by the penultimate Turkish Sultan when he disposed of 30,000 troublesome Janissaries in the cool of the evening."

Now, to find sentiments such as these publicly advocated by one of our newspapers, taking a high stand (in its own estimation at any rate) amongst the periodical news literature of our country, does certainly strike me as evincing a barbarity of feeling and a brutal illiberality I should not have expected to have discovered, even from such a vitiated source, in this our modern day.

This enlightened Christian reviewer thus holds up to his benighted Mahomedan brother the propriety of massacring in cold blood, 5000 of a people well known as peaceful, industrious, and inoffensive; citing as an appropriate example, one of the bloodiest tragedies ever perpetrated in the annals of crime and murder.

Surely such a man, and such a paper, advocating so dire a dereliction from the mild and pure spirit of Christianity—so dark a stain even on the sanguinary code of the Prophet of Mecca—deserve alike to be scouted from the companionship and the home of every Englishman.

How deadly and bitter must be that ruthless feeling which could prompt the utterance of such sentiments! We, whose creed teacheth us to look upon all mankind as our brethren, thus issue from our country—the very centre of civilization—a murderous cry, calling upon the infidel to imbrue his hands in the blood of the conscientious followers of the faith of their fathers the patriarchs.

I have no kindred with these believers in the Law of the Prophets; but surely the mild benignancy of philanthropy may be allowed to cast one ray on our fellow-men, even though he be a Jew.

Well may such "blind leaders of the blind" (as this writer evidently is) be regardless of the miseries and sufferings of our agricultural and manufacturing population: the same feeling that could thus urge the sacrifice of the Hebrew, would ruthlessly offer up his poor countryman at the altar of Moloch, in the worship of hereditary slavery and aristocratic imbecility.
