SIR,—About this time last year I sent up my little subscription towards your fund, and felt very much regret that, while others from this town were able to send their £5, the state of my finances would not allow me to contribute more than £1. As a shipowner, the previous years of depression had operated so cruelly upon my capital that it required all one's ability as a financier to make "ends meet." I then made an "inward resolve" that, when the power should come, my will should be ready to make my subscription equal to those of my neighbours. This opportunity has come. The late good harvest has left some capital to be invested in other articles of commerce; increased power of consumption has increased the demand to consume, and in consequence increased the demand for vessels to carry those articles of consumption, and thereby raised the rate of freight upon them. For ships are like labourers: when employment is scarce their wages (or freights) are low; when abundant they are in proportion high. Shipowners are now, for the first time since 1840, obtaining some remuneration for the risks their capital runs, and there is every prospect that this prosperity will continue until—another bad harvest. I hope, however, most ardently that, before this misfortune takes place, "Free Trade" will have placed our speculations out of the reach of the weather's caprice; and I think I may safely assert that in this hope I am joined by a majority of the shipowners here. The late years of misery that we have endured have set us to think more deeply upon the cause of the periodical distress to which we have during the last thirty years been subject, and we have at last discovered it to be the simple fact—a want of more trade; and to obtain this there is but one means—that is, Free Trade. Shipowners have long been blinded by infatuated notions about "reciprocity treaties," and "over-production" having something to do with their distress; but those are fast disappearing, and more common-sense views are taking their place.

I observe that the renewed subscriptions from here this year are only single pounds. By enclosing £5 I make mine for the two years equal to my neighbours.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A SINCERE FREE-TRADER.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

Falkirk, Feb. 8.

SIR,—You will probably be as much surprised as I am interested to hear that there are some friends of Free Trade in this small Tory-riden agricultural town, who are very solicitous for the success of the approaching Bazaar; and you will doubtless be amused when I tell you that, "out of their comparatively deep poverty," they are offering of their money to manufacture and contribute a pair of handsome CUMING-STONES, used in a Scotch game, which "the Edinburgh Philist" consider themselves justly famous. The novelty of a pair of cutting-stones exhibited in London in the month of May, and mounted on ebony and silver, is great, and ought, I think, it is thought, to fetch an uncommonly heavy price.

REVIEW.

At present the thermometer with us is far below the freezing point; "the roaring play," however, is at its height, and business and labour of all kinds are impracticable or forgotten. The sun shines brightly on our subscription paper, considering our means, and a farmer "takes the lead." One old curler puts down his mite "to rub off the guard," a phrase which all keen curlers applied to monopoly will at once understand and apply. No expense must be spared in making this contribution worthy of the object and the glorious game it calls to mind. A few other contributions, chiefly from the ladies, will go from this. We would like much, our resources being small, to co-operate with some other town in the neighbourhood,—as Killyth, Stirling, or Linlithgow,—in aiming to supply a whole table; and if the Carron works in our neighbourhood were fairly aroused, this part of Scotland might cut a figure. Address,
Respectfully, yours always,
A READER.

Hill Maraden, near Burnley, Feb. 4.

SIR,—I hope you will not value my subscription less when I inform you it comes from a small landowner and farmer, occupying all the land I own: therefore I consider, if any person in this country is benefited by the Corn Laws, I am one of them. As a landowner, perhaps I may, in some measure, be benefited. As a farmer, I neither am—nor do I believe it ever was intended by the Legislature that I should be—benefited, because if the produce be dear the landlord expects a higher rent for his land, and the poor-rates will be much higher. In 1842, I paid more than £50 in poor-rates for 45 acres of land; in 1844, I did not pay £25 for the same: therefore, if the price of the produce was lower than in the former year, the poor rate was also one half less.

With respect to the game laws, it is my misfortune to have my farm adjoining to a game preserve, and I have suffered all kinds of annoyance, both from the gamekeepers and the game, for the last twenty-four years. Besides my produce being destroyed by the game, the lord's farms are in such a dilapidated state that I am at present actually paying more poor-rates for forty-five acres of land, than one of his farms, in the same township, is paying for sixty acres of similar land, if in the same state of cultivation as mine.

I am, dear Sir, yours very respectfully,
To A. W. Poulton, Esq. JAMES SMITH.

THE FINANCES OF THE LEAGUE.—We hear from a source, the authenticity of which it is impossible to doubt, that our anticipations as to the unsatisfactory nature of the so-called accounts rendered by the Anti-Corn-Law League have been already realized. Serious objections were, we are assured, urged at a late meeting of that body, to the one great thumping item of £59,000 expenditure; and a donor of £500 in particular, we are told, intimated that no further assistance was to be expected from himself. We have little doubt that this example will be widely followed.—Brighton Gazette.—[Will the Brighton Gazette give its readers the benefit of the authority upon which it relies?—ED. L.]

LEICESTER ANTI-CORN-LAW ASSOCIATION.—At a meeting of the Leicester Anti-Corn-Law Committee, held at the Town-hall on Wednesday, Feb. 12, 1845—Richard Ilia, Esq. (ex-mayor), in the chair—Mr. William Biggs having communicated to the committee the resignation of the office of secretary by Mr. T. P. Hull, and the resignation having been accepted, it was resolved, on the motion of Mr. E. Gittins, seconded by Mr. J. D. Harris, "That the thanks of the committee be given to Mr. T. P. Hull for his long-continued, energetic, and effective services in the cause of the Anti-Corn-Law League." On the motion of Mr. C. Billson, seconded by Mr. J. D. Harris, Mr. Joseph Biggs was appointed secretary.

INTENDED FREE-TRADE DEMONSTRATION IN WEST GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—We are informed that it is the intention of a spirited coal company, in the Forest of Dean, to ship at Lydney a large cargo of the best Lydney coals, and to send it round the coast to London to be sold, and the amount applied as a contribution to the funds of the Anti-Corn-Law League Bazaar. This (our correspondent remarks) will be a fitting tribute of adhesion to the principles of Free Trade from the mineral district of the Forest of Dean, and will be an evidence of the hearty support which those principles may expect from the honest and independent Foresters. Our correspondent also informs us that this is merely an indication of the strong and earnest feelings with which the Foresters of Dean are taking up the question of Free Trade, and that whenever the time shall arrive that they may be called upon to give their suffrages at the hustings or elsewhere, commercial freedom and civil and religious liberty will alone be the watchwords under which they will engage, and for the success of which their best energies will be devoted.—Gloucester Journal.

POACHERS.—On Thursday, the 16th ult., the village of Ingham was visited by a most notorious gang of poachers from the adjoining village of Hickling, who were in pursuit of game; but their designs having been anticipated by the authorities, they were frustrated, and were obliged to defer their undertaking until a more convenient time. Being thus disappointed, they proceeded to the dwelling-house of a number of poor cottagers who take in washing, and plundered their gardens of the linen, which was put out for drying, and every article that came within their reach and was moveable, as they did not leave even the time upon which the linen was suspended. The parties have been taken and committed to take their trial at the next sessions.—Nottingham Mercury.

THE DIGNITY IN HUMBLE LIFE.—"Very many of the labouring class," says Dr. Channing, "need nothing but a higher taste for beauty, order, and neatness, to give us air of refinement and grace, as well as comfort, to their establishments." At Enfield, recently, George Healey, an agricultural labourer, died at the age of 77. He and his wife had been married 50 years, and had brought up a large family of children in the greatest respectability, almost solely by the deceased's labour. Their place of residence was like a little palace, the furniture, &c., being of the best description, and in the neatest order. In the parlour was a bookcase, filled with books, some of them elegantly bound, and all of the best authors, ancient and modern. The deceased delighted in his labour, which he continued until the day of his death. He was well known and much respected in the neighbourhood, and was greatly esteemed.

The Complete Concordance to Shakspeare. By Mrs. Cowden Clarke. London: Charles Knight and Co., Ludgate-street.

Every one of us, who studied the classics at schools from the Delphin editions, must remember the verbal indexes at the end of each work, industriously compiled to facilitate the searcher for a favourite or apt passage for a motto, quotation, or illustration; and every one, so seeking, has proved the value of such an index, in the time and labour that it has saved him in his uncertainty as to its precise situation in a poem of twelve books like the "Æneid." Even the refined conversation of the drawing-room has been indebted for many of its literary ornaments to the facility thus provided for ready reference and immediate appliance.

But while the great classic poets have been rendered thus accessible for the purposes of quotation or illustration, our own great poets have been strangely neglected. With the exception of Milton (to whose poetical works the late Mr. Todd added an excellent verbal index) and Shakspeare, none of them have been deemed worthy of such a ready reference; and such attempts as have hitherto been made in favour of the latter poet have been meagre and imperfect. Ayscough's and Twiss's indexes are both amenable to these charges. The former (Ayscough's) is notoriously insufficient; for it professes to supply only "the remarkable passages and words" of the original text, and, moreover, confines its design to "pointing out different meanings to which the words are applied." If we reflect a little, two defects will present themselves in Ayscough's plan. First, we do not want only "the remarkable passages and words," but all the passages and words (except, of course, the very inconsiderable ones, which would only unnecessarily swell the volume, and by the means of which no searcher would think of turning to a passage) that occur in the 37 dramas of the poet. We, therefore, constantly discover that there are phrases, "remarkable" and necessary to the reader, which, not being "remarkable" to the compiler of the index, have been omitted. Again: we do not desire to know merely the minute varieties of meanings that have been appointed to a word, but every passage in which the word has occurred. The plan of Ayscough, therefore, is defective, and it so constantly leads to disappointment that the remark has frequently been made that "every word in Shakspeare is to be found in Ayscough's Index, except the word you want to find."

Twiss's Index is correct and complete. Every important word is recorded with, we believe, perfect accuracy: but Twiss gives no context with the word noted; we have therefore no clue to the passage we are seeking; but are left to turn to every scene in every play wherein the word occurs, which in some cases, where it is recorded some hundred times, would give the reader the same labour as if he had no index at all.

In the plan of the work now before us, Mrs. Cowden Clarke has avoided the inefficiency of Twiss, and has supplied the deficiency of Ayscough: we have the accurate record of the one, and the full context of the other; and consequently her work is unquestionably preferable to both. It is not, however, in complete citation that Mrs. Cowden Clarke has surpassed Ayscough: she has surpassed him also in the range of words employed for the purposes of such a work. She has enabled us to discover the situation and verify the accuracy of a passage, a portion of which only, and that dimly, is floating in the memory, by incorporating in her index words of less significance than we can hope to find in Ayscough; and, to recur to the difference in the two works as regards their fulness of citation, we have turned to the word "CORN," and found it recorded ten times in Ayscough, while in Mrs. Clarke's "Concordance" we discover that the word occurs thirty-seven times in the plays of Shakspeare. In Ayscough the word "LEAGUE" is quoted six times; in Mrs. Clarke's work forty-five times. For the purpose of drawing the attention of our public speakers and writers upon the great question which is now agitating the kingdom—cheap corn and Free Trade—to the work under review, we will give them three quotations that we have turned to in the "Concordance" by remembering one word in each passage, and which will prove to them the care and accuracy of the compiler:—

"Our oppression hath made up this League."—King John, Act III., Scene I.

"If not by birth, have lands by wit."—Lear, Act I., Scene II.

"The gods sent not corn for the rich men only."—Coriolanus, Act I., Scene I.

The work has been the persevering labour of more than twelve years; and even now, when turning over the pages of each monthly part as it appears, we are struck with the care and pains that are daily bestowed in correcting the press of so full a page as is not at this time issuing from any book-printers in Europe. So minutely careful, too, has been the compiler, in supplying the necessity of any future similar attempt, by rendering her "Concordance" perfect in every department, that we find even the slight variations in the editions of Collier and Knight all noted; it is, therefore, a verbal index to all the editions of Shakspeare.

There is yet another remarkable feature of excellence in Mrs. Clarke's "Concordance," and that is, the great skill and taste with which she has contrived in the quotations to comprise the most forcible portion, and that only. In short, it is a very extraordinary specimen of perseverance, good sense, good taste, order, and method. It is little to say that no collection of books making any pretension to a library will be complete without a copy of the work: no man or woman professing to admire or really admiring (without professing) the greatest imaginative genius the world ever saw, will be without this rapid and certain master-key to all the passages, phrases, and words in his immortal writings. Honour and gratitude to the woman whose steadfast nature and good taste have achieved so graceful and acceptable a homage to the genius of the "myriad-minded."

The Life of Major-General Worge. By G. Duke, Esq. London: Parker, Fumival, and Co.

Military readers will be much interested in this biography of an officer of the Cumberland age, who owed his promotion chiefly to his professional merit, at a time when commissions were common instruments of Parliamentary corruption. The founder of the Donoughmore family went so far as to obtain a cornetcy of dragoons for one of his daughters, but he soon sold out, for when he hesitated to support a ministerial measure, he was menaced with an order for the lady to join her regiment. General Worge's most remarkable achievement was his share in the conquest of the French settlements on the coast of Western Africa, which were subsequently abandoned by the slovenly and disgraceful treaty which signalized the Bute administration. Mr. Duke has entered at some length into the history of these settlements, and pointed out their importance to British commerce, and the efforts made for the suppression of the slave trade. Although this work does not possess a very striking interest, it is one which will afford pleasure to the reader, as it elucidates many points in the history of the seven years' war which are fast sinking into oblivion.

The Natural History of Animals. By T. R. Jones, Esq., F.R.S. London: Van Voorst.

Here is another of Van Voorst's meritorious publications in natural science, and one every way worthy of taking a high rank among works of amusing instruction. Professor Jones has peculiar skill in the implication of knowledge: he unfolds the mysteries of physiology with a clearness and facility which could only result from profound knowledge combined with the habitual practice of instruction. Commencing with the lowest order of animals, those whose structural formation scarcely separates them from the vegetable world, he traces the varied phenomena of vitality in its more complicated forms, exhibiting "Above, how high progressive life may grow;

Around, how wide, how deep extend below."

His work is so compact, and so closely held together by chains of illustration and argument, that we can find no passage which can be detached from its context without injury. General readers will derive most entertainment from the wonders of microscopic creation: his description of the Infusoria has all the interest of a physiological romance, combined with all the value of minute scientific detail. We have often regretted the want of a Natural History, suited for the instruction of families, to supersede "Goldsmith's Animated Nature," which is unsuited to such a purpose, not only on account of its gross inaccuracies, but for many other weighty reasons. The work before us will supply this deficiency: it is every way suited to family reading, and not the least of its merits is, that on every occasion where an opportunity is afforded the author points out the evidences of a Creator displayed in the works of creation.

The chapters on the Acalephs and Echinodermata will furnish sources of interesting research and observation to those who reside near the seashore. We have had frequent occasion to remark that naturalists escape all the lassitude and ennui to which others are subject in a fashionable bathing place; and we think that Professor Jones would perform an acceptable service if he prepared a Companion to the Seashore before the next bathing season: it would contribute to the health of mind and body more real advantages than mere change of scenery and occupation. It only remains to add, that the work is beautifully printed, and the wood-cut illustrations are truly admirable.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, February 22, 1845.

We have just received the list of the 430 articles on which the import duties are to be "totally and immediately" repealed. The catalogue is more calculated to excite surprise at the folly which taxed these articles, than admiration of the wisdom that discovered the expediency of their removal from the Tariff. Some of the items suggest a few serious reflections not wholly devoid of amusement. Thus, while our bread is taxed, arsenic is admitted duty free; so that, if we cannot have food at the natural price, we may have poison on moderate terms. Beef-wood meets our eye in the catalogue, where we should much rather see the beef without the wood. Singing birds are no longer entitled to protection, which must greatly annoy Lord Winchelsea and the rest of the Finches. Bones of cattle are liberated from duty, but the flesh upon them remains subject to the landlords' tax; foreign animals are allowed to furnish us with everything but meat: free admission is granted to their bones, their hides, their hair, their hoofs, their horns, and their tails,—to every thing but their flesh, which is precisely the part of which we stand most in need. Brimstone in rolls we may have if we please, but for bread in rolls we supplicate in vain; brimstone in flour we are to get at will, but no other flour will be allowed by the monopolists. We wish that we could reverse the arrangement, and leave them the brimstone, while the rolls and flour should go to the nation. Bristles may come in, but not the pork they covered: and should children cry for food, the State Doctor has provided the same remedy as Moliere's Mock Doctor, in "Le Médecin malgré lui," viz., "a good whipping," by allowing the admission of cane duty free. Unmanufactured chalk is liberated from taxation, but in its manufactured condition, as milk, its exclusion is continued for the sake of the agricultural interest. Coals may be carried to Newcastle without let or hindrance; and the same generosity is exhibited in the free admission of cotton-yarn to Manchester. Feathers, flocks, and flower-roots, for beds, have won the favour of the Premier; but flocks of sheep continue under the appropriate protection of the Duke of Richmond. All gums, except those in the head, are honoured with special recognition by the Minister; instead of a supply for them, he offers us jewels, duty free, which exemplifies "asking for bread and receiving a stone" with a vengeance. As we cannot obtain food to fatten ourselves or our cattle, we are graciously permitted to import animal oil; and Orange Peel having disappeared since 1829, a fresh supply may be had from abroad, with the addition of Lemon Peel, the acid being derived from the income-tax. We find a long catalogue of liberated seeds; but lament that the seeds of wheat, oats, and barley are not among the enfranchised, though hotanists might rank them among the unenumerated grasses. Thrown silk is the only article in which the principle of protection is directly abandoned, unless we include teasles as part of agricultural produce. There is much cry but very little wool in the Budget beyond cotton-wool, which is really important; there are, however, several long garns in addition to that spun by the Premier in his opening speech.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—Marshal Soult, at the earnest request of M. Villmain, has withdrawn the bill granting a pension of 15,000 francs a year to him and his family.—M. Duchatel, in introducing the secret-service-money bill, stated that, on the decision of the Chamber with regard to it, they would stake their continuance in office.

Accounts received at Paris state that the weather in the provinces continued very severe. At Strasbourg, on the 15th inst., Fahrenheit's thermometer had fallen to five degrees.

CANINE HUMANE SOCIETY.—Ten Newfoundland dogs have been imported into Paris for the purpose of watching the banks of the Seine, and experienced trainers are every day employed in teaching these magnificent animals to draw from the water stuffed figures of men and children. The rapidity with which they cross and recross the river, and come and go at the voice of their trainers, is truly marvellous. It is hoped that these fine dogs, for whom handsome kennels have been erected on the bridges across the Seine, will render great service to the cause of humanity.—Commerce.

SPAIN.—We have accounts from Madrid to the 12th inst. In the discussion on the Clergy Detention Bill on that day, the Finance Minister, in order to allay the public alarm as to the Church property already sold, announced that the Government were fully resolved to maintain the inviolability of the property that had already passed out of the hands of the clergy, and that they would suffer no encroachment on acquired rights. It appears, however, that, owing to the folly of the priests, the purchasers of this property were seriously alarmed, and had called a public meeting on the subject.—Serious disputes exist between the Court and the Ministry, and Queen Christina is doing all in her power to get rid of Narvaer. The disputes have reached to such a pitch, that it is not improbable a crisis will soon be the result.

PORTUGAL.—Lisbon letters of the 11th inst. mention the arrival of Dr. Kalley, from Madeira, and of his intended return to that island. The object of his visit was said to be to obtain permission from the Government to open an apothecary's establishment in Madeira, with the view of supplying the people gratis with medicines. The recent broils and dissensions there were likely to prevent his application being complied with.

SWITZERLAND.—The affairs of Switzerland are again becoming serious. Lucerne insists on establishing the Jesuits at the head of its cantonal education. Berne declares that this must not be, and arms to expel the Jesuits from the neighbouring canton by force. There would be little matter in the Radical cantons threatening, but they are supported by Zurich, a powerful, Protestant, and Conservative canton.

THE JEWS IN HAMBURG.—Accounts from Hamburg state, that, in consideration of the active and generous conduct of the Jews of that city, and of the banker, Solomon Heine, in particular, on the occasion of the great fire in 1842, the Government of the city and province has felt it to be its duty to ameliorate the laws which weighed so heavily on this class of its population. Hitherto, the Jews of Hamburg have been restricted to commerce and to the exercise of the medical profession; but the Council of Ancients has proposed the opening to them of all the professions and trades.

PHILADELPHIAN BONDS.—The New York American, in its money article for the steamer, says, "The chief topic of interest and regret is the now certain failure of Pennsylvania to pay her interest to-morrow, the 1st of February. Part, and a large part of it, may be paid, possibly, some days hence; but payment in full on the day is now out of the question. The new governor, Mr. Shunk, sent a special message on the subject on the 29th, and it looks like any thing but present payment." Upon the above the Genevieve Traveller remarks, "The impression, however, is general, that the bill ordering the payment will pass, and will receive the signature of Governor Shunk."

CHABON.—This island has been the scene of rather serious disputes and petty conflicts, resulting from an attempt on the part of certain supercargoes to appropriate the principal portions of the island to their own use, by erecting landing stages, and selling pits at extravagant prices, to the prejudice of the general body of shipmasters seeking cargoes of the favourite manure. These latter, at length, organised a considerable body of men, whom they armed, and then drove the usurpers from their temporary occupancy, forcing them to abandon their exclusive claims, and to stand on the same common level as the other shipmasters.

ADEN.—A correspondent writing from this British possession to the Times states, that it was threatened to be attacked by the Sheriff of Mocha, at the head of an army reputed to number from fifty to thirty thousand Arabs. He assigned no particular reason for the threatened attack save that it was his intention to clear Arabia of all Christians. The writer states that the garrison, which numbered 1800 men, was not sufficiently strong to go out to attack the Arabs; and he complains of the bad state of the fortifications, and urges on the Government to send out engineers to put them in a fitting state of repair.

DOMESTIC.

Sir Robert Peel contradicted, in the House of Commons on Monday, the rumour which had been current for some days, that Prince Albert was about to be created "King Consort."

Sir Henry Ellis states his opinion that a possibility still remains of restoring the Portland vase to its pristine integrity, by two skilful artists in the employ of the trustees of the Museum, who have had considerable experience in resetting the fragments of Greek vases.

A notorious robber, confined in the Chaudos House Gaol at Bath, with a view of making his escape, contrived on Thursday morning, the 13th inst., to set fire to his cell. He, however, met his death in the attempt, as on the alarm being given, his cell-door was broken open, when it was discovered that his career had been terminated by suffocation.

The committee of baths and wash-houses for the labouring classes, after a month's consideration, have selected the plan of Mr. P. P. Baly, as the best of 22 which were submitted to them in competition.

Some time before six o'clock on Saturday evening last a most daring burglary was effected in the warehouse of Messrs. M. and S. Hyams, clothiers, 9 and 10, King-street, Cheapside. There were stolen from the premises 1800 yards of silk velvet, 600 yards of silk serge, in rolls; 495 yards of satin, in pieces; and £13 in gold, silver, and copper.

A patent has been taken out for a new lithographic printing press, capable of being worked by steam. This invention will have the effect of saving much of the labour of the lithographer, who heretofore had not only to lithograph, but also to work at the press: the impressions, also, are more uniform, and the printing altogether better and cheaper.

By the death of the Earl of Effingham a vacancy has been occasioned in the borough of Shaftesbury, which Lord Howard (now Earl of Effingham) represented in Parliament since the general election of 1841. The present earl is a supporter of Whig principles, but voted against the abolition of the Corn Laws. He is now in his 39th year.

The influx of destitute persons is so great in the metropolitan asylums for the houseless poor that the benevolent individuals engaged in conducting the affairs of the charity have been obliged to make a pressing appeal to the public for assistance in saving their fellow-creatures from perishing. They have relieved this season upwards of 10,000 persons, at an expense of £1500, and their funds have become greatly diminished.

Mr. William Carter, coroner for East Surrey, held an inquest on Monday, on the body of Mr. Samuel Laman Blanchard, aged 45, of No. 11, Union-place, Lambethwalk, who committed suicide the previous Friday night. He was the author of several well-known pieces in the various periodicals. About Christmas last his wife, to whom he was fondly attached, died, and his great anxiety during the period of her long and harassing illness so injured his own health, that convulsive fits ensued. He continued to get worse, and on Friday night last, in the absence of Mrs. Jane Spinnell, who had been attending upon him, and who had left the room for an instant to call his eldest son, Edward, he cut his throat with a razor. The jury found a verdict of "temporary insanity." Deceased has left several orphan children.

The Glasgow Constitution gives a melancholy account of the loss of eight boys, who were drowned in Duntillan Loch, near Shott's Kirk, on Tuesday week, by the breaking of the ice. The whole party of boys fell in, and not one returned to tell to the afflicted parents the loss of their children.

The American line-of-packet ship Gladiator has arrived in the St. Katharine Docks from New York. This fine vessel has brought, in addition to a full complement of cabin and steerage passengers and a quantity of specie, an immense cargo of American provisions, consisting of cheese, beef, pork, &c.

The grant to Maynooth, says the Dublin Evening Mail, is to be raised to £28,000 a year, and the college is to be kept in repair at the public expense. Three additional visitors are to be appointed.

Government has granted £100 a year pension to the afflicted widow of Captain J. M'Leod, stipendiary magistrate, who was murdered at Ballinamore, Leitrim; at her demise £50 a year will devolve on her daughter, Miss M'Leod.

The Irish Repeal Association met on Monday in the Conciliation-hall, Dublin. Mr. O'Connell entered the hall amidst loud acclamation, accompanied by several M.P.'s and other gentlemen. In handing in a remittance from Louth, he denounced one of the members for that county, Mr. M. Bellew, as an "unsavoury renegade." In noticing the promised help to be given to Maynooth, the learned gentleman, while expressing his attachment to the voluntary principle, justified his approval of the additional grant: while the Established Church took money from the Catholics and Dissenters, for which it gave no value, he would take all he could get for Maynooth. At the conclusion of the meeting, Mr. O'Connell mentioned, that on the next day of meeting he would give notice of a resolution to the effect, that a petition to Parliament should be prepared, praying for a repeal of those clauses in the Emancipation Act which affected the Jews and other regular clergy. The rent for the week was announced to be £751. 10s. 5d., which included a sum of upwards of £300 from the United States.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE LEAGUE BAZAAR.—It has been suggested that gentlemen friendly to the Anti-Corn-Law League, and interested in trades which include ornamental articles, such as the glass, brass and iron founding, paper, and cabinet making trades, might, at small expense to themselves, render material assistance to this excellent enterprise. We mention this, in the hope that the seed may not fall upon barren ground; and we feel assured that many of the operatives engaged in these trades would be glad to assist in the good work; which, in reality, interests them as much, or possibly more, than their employers.—The Mercury.

SIR R. PEEL AND LORD J. RUSSELL ON PROTECTION.—Let us look at these two chiefs as they exhibited themselves last week:—"I am convinced that protection is not the support, but the bane, of agriculture."—Lord John Russell. "The restoration of protection is impossible; and, even if it were possible, I would not recommend it as a remedy for the distress arising from causes which I deeply deplore."—Sir Robert Peel. It was on the first and third days of this present session that these declarations were made: the first of them by the chief who, little more than three years ago, officially proclaimed the necessity of a large measure of protection to agriculture; the last of them by the chief who at that time was crowned by Squidron with a diadem on which was written, without and within, "Protection to agriculture!"—Bradford Observer.

KING LOUIS PHILIPPE ON POPULATION.—We take the following from the Glasgow Argus. It proves how decided is the spread of true principles on "the Population Question:—"Another curious question which was propounded by Mr. Doubleday, in a recent treatise, also arises out of this. In consequence of the imperfect registration in Scotland, there is no means of arriving with any degree of certainty at the number of births; but, if there were, it would be profitable to inquire whether, as Mr. Doubleday propounds, the births, in proportion to the population, invariably increase in years of scarcity and depression of trade. It is asserted by that gentleman that they do—and he alleges, as a proof, a fact which Dr. Buchan notices in his celebrated work, and which every person must have observed:—that the more squallid and wretched a neighbourhood is, the greater is the number of children in it. His theory is, that whenever a species of animal or vegetable is threatened with extinction by the deficiency of nourishment, nature flies to the relief of the individuals and species so threatened, and increases their fecundity. His Majesty King Louis Philippe, who is well known to take great interest in this curious question, inclines to the opinion of Mr. Doubleday; and asserted recently as a reason for the non-appearance of heirs to certain noble families, that "they fed too much."—The Mercury.

MILLWORK AND MACHINERY.—A return, printed on the motion of Mr. Cardwell, the Secretary of the Treasury, has been issued, giving an account of the declared value of all millwork and machinery exported from the United Kingdom in each quarter of the years 1841, 1842, 1843, and 1844. The declared value of millwork and machinery exported from the United Kingdom in the year ended the 5th of January, 1842, was £351,361; in the year ended the 5th of January, 1843, £354,633; in the year ended the 5th of January, 1844, £713,474; and in the year ended the 5th of January last, to £773,187, showing an increase on every year in the value of millwork and machinery exported.

THE COUNTIES—SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

On looking over a map of the English counties with a view to the question, Which counties in particular, and which first, should be the object of the Free-Traders' efforts, the eye immediately fixes on SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE, as affording a peculiarly fit field for those exertions which have already emanated from the landlord yoke, South Lancashire, North Cheshire, and the West Riding.

We know not of any county, or division of a county, in Great Britain, more deeply interested in the success of this movement for defeating monopoly on its own ground, or better able to bear a part in it, than South Staffordshire. There is none which suffered more from the Corn Law, during those dreadful years when it was last in full operation. There is none which has more to fear from the prospect of the next bad harvest that shall revive this law from its present state of suspended animation, and recall the miseries of 1841 and 1842. There is none which has more to hope from the action of Free Trade, in opening, extending, and widening markets for its peculiar industry; producing, in this district does, every variety and sub-variety of that class of commodities—from a ploughshare to a nail or a needle—which are most in request with a young, raw, corn-growing population. There is none more entitled or better able to avail itself of that particular instrument of self-deliverance—the forty-shilling-freehold franchise. The towns and the towns-people of South Staffordshire have an especial right to assert themselves in the county representation. The county is theirs, for they have made it. Without its towns, and the skilled and organised labour of which towns are the centres, South Staffordshire would be one of the poorest, poorest districts in all England. It owes its growing wealth, not to the peasant, but to the artisan. It is famous through the world, not for its farms, but for its furnaces. It is a county altogether created by that industry which monopoly would starve and strangle. And nowhere are there more inviting facilities for the work of self-emancipation. Small freeholds are far more numerous in South Staffordshire than they were a year ago in South Lancashire; opportunities of purchase are more frequent, and capital, instead of being piled up in a few large heaps, is widely diffused in the hands of a great number of small master-workers. We are perfectly confident not only that South Staffordshire can do what South Lancashire has done, but that the victory may be won by a comparatively moderate outlay of effort and attention.

Why, Wolverhampton alone may, by well-combined and systematic action on the district of which it is the centre, secure the representation of the division. Within twelve miles of this metropolis of South Staffordshire industry and intelligence, we find such towns as Walsall, Wednesbury, Darlaston, Bilston, Willenhall, Tipton, Sedgley, and Bloxwich—places, several of them, far superior in population and importance to not a few of the boroughs which the accident of prescription has left in possession of their member or two, even under the Reform Act—yet all of them (with the exception of Walsall) absolutely unrepresented in Parliament, unless so far as they can make themselves felt and heard in the county constituency. The forty-shilling-freehold franchise is their only hold on the constitution, their only mode of access to a share in the government of their country. That provision of the ancient law of the land, which annexes political power to ownership of the soil, exactly fits their case. By it, and by it alone, can the workers of this most busy and crowded working district obtain the means of protecting their industry from landlord spoliation. We are convinced that a united and vigorous movement here (it is a district abounding with small freeholds) would be successful in qualifying and registering freeholders enough to govern the representation of the division. To the men of Wolverhampton we look with full reliance for originating and guiding this movement. Their long-trying and unwavering adhesion to the Free-Trade cause well entitles the constituents of Mr. Villiers to the honour of winning another county for total and immediate repeal.

Going southward from Wolverhampton, near the borders of the county, we come to Dudley. Dudley, as every one knows, is, like Wolverhampton, a parliamentary borough; but, unlike Wolverhampton, it is a borough without a constituency. Is it true, we read in our "Parliamentary Companion?" "DUDLEY—population, 31,167, registered electors, 937." But the same high authority immediately subjoins, "The prevailing influence in the borough is that of Lord Ward;" which simply means that Lord Ward is the constituency of Dudley; that the 937 registered electors are 937 legal fictions; and the 31,167 inhabitants a constitutional nonentity. Yet there is hope and help for the people of Dudley. The constitution does not wholly cast them out. If they are gagged in their borough, they may speak in their county. Of these 31,167 unrepresented inhabitants of Dudley, there must be some hundreds both able and willing to comply with the cheap and easy condition of political enfranchisement—the investment of £30, £40, or £50 in the purchase of freehold property. Of 176 of them—the minority who unavailingly struggled last July against the "prevailing influence in the borough"—we suppose we may consider ourselves sure already. They will find it an easier and more hopeful task to make truth and justice the "prevailing influence" in their county. We believe that Dudley, although locally in Staffordshire, is legally a part of Worcestershire. Property in the borough will not, in that case, give a vote for South Staffordshire; but qualifications may be purchased, within three miles of Dudley, or in any other part of the division.

Although South Staffordshire is, we cannot doubt, perfectly able to work out its own emancipation, we see no sort of reason why it should not be largely aided by those towns on the borders of the adjacent counties, whose interests are identical with its own. The industry of Birmingham is as closely connected with that of South Staffordshire as the trade of Liverpool is with the manufactures of Manchester. All its interests extend across the county frontier, and its sympathies and services should not lag behind. Manchester sent its hundreds of freehold purchasers into the West Riding; and with even better reason may Birmingham make common cause with the iron and coal county of which it is really, though not nominally, a part. The ground for co-operation is still stronger in the case of Stourbridge, which is scarcely a stone's throw from Staffordshire, on the Worcestershire side. Stourbridge is not, even in name and pretence, a parliamentary borough—has no political weight or existence whatever, except such as it may happen to derive from the law of county franchise. Stourbridge is nothing in the constitution, unless it choose to make itself something, by putting a handsome muster-roll of freeholders on the county register. We know enough of the zeal and spirit of the Free-Traders of this town, to hope that it will strike a good blow for the cause just where it will best tell, by reinforcing the South Stafford Free-Trade registry with a liberal quota of qualified freeholders.

We must not leave the subject without reminding our South Staffordshire readers of some circumstances connected with the present state of their electoral list, which show both the need of exertion and the certainty of the success that will reward it. The whole business of registration having been much neglected in their division for several years, we are convinced that it will be found, on closely looking into the matter, that a great number of Free-Traders, long since fully qualified, have never been on the registry at all. A good deal of profitable work, likewise, will be to be done in winnowing the registry of spurious and dead votes. When we add, that the existing lists do not show more than one registered voter for every thirty-one inhabitants of the division—8,469 voters for a population of 265,550—they will see how wide a margin the neglect of former years has left for the exertions of the present. The proportion is grossly inadequate for a population whose intelligence, industry, and diffused wealth ought to yield as high a relative number of voters as any district in Great Britain. Westmoreland, with considerably less than a quarter of the South Staffordshire population, has more than half the amount of voters; East Worcestershire and Herefordshire, with less than half the population, have, the one three-fourths, and the other seven-eighths, of the number of voters; North Devonshire has 300 votes more, for a population of 75,000 fewer; and North Lincolnshire registers 1700 more electors for 70,000 fewer people. In other respects, there is everything to encourage as well as to provoke activity. Even as the register stands, it is clear, from the state of the representation, that the preponderance of monopoly is not by any means overwhelming. The one-and-one compromise, by which Toryism, sliding scale, and Lord Augustus's consent to split the difference with the West India and Colonies, indicates a secret weakness, on which every resolute and honest blow is sure to tell for what it is worth.

We leave this cause in your hands, men of South Staffordshire! in full confidence that you will do it and yourselves justice. The county is yours, and not the landlords—for you, and not the landlords, have made it. Only get that fact put into regular legal form, as the South Lancashire men have done—see it set down in black and white—where it will be ready for use when you and your country want it.

THE SUGAR DUTIES.

Sir Robert Peel has proposed that the people of England should pay a tax to the proprietors of estates in the West Indies, under the name of a differential duty on sugar, amounting to £2,600,000 annually, being about the sum derived from the onerous and iniquitous tax imposed on the incomes derived from offices, trades, and professions. But though this sum must be paid by the British people it will not all be received by the West India proprietors: from the indirect and slovenly manner in which it is raised, about one-half will be lost in the process of collection, so that if a case could be made out for the West India proprietors, it would be better for the nation, and better for themselves, to grant them compensation in the shape of annuities from the Consolidated Fund. The only conceivable reason why this direct and economic course has not been adopted is, that in such a case the West India proprietors would be obliged to offer an intelligible proof of their claims to the public; and it would then be easy to determine whether their demand amounts to the assertion of a prescriptive right to black mail, or whether we, the British people, have subjected the West Indians to any disadvantages for which we are bound in justice to afford compensation. By raising the tax indirectly, this examination is evaded, and the still more important question is kept out of sight whether the protection given by these differential duties is not an injury to the West India proprietors themselves, by giving a bounty to improvidence, and holding out a reward to negligence and incompetence. The Times were on what it calls respectable authority, that "the cost of production by free labour is double that of production by slaves." Were this the case, the sugars of Java and Manilla could not meet those of Cuba and Brazil in the world's markets, nor would West India produce, in the old days of slavery, have required a discriminating duty for protection against competition with the free labour of the East Indies. Here are notorious facts which must countervail any anonymous authority, however respectable. But Mr. James went even beyond the Times, for he declared that the proprietors of slaves paid no wages at all. Were this the truth, or anything like the truth, our appeals to foreign nations for the total abolition of slavery would be the most hopeless and futile proposals ever made by man. The selfishness of consumers all over the world would be enlisted in perpetuating the system of slavery; and those who make use of such an argument justify those who declare that the British nation seeks the abolition of slavery under a mere pretext of humanity, but really for the purpose of depriving foreign sugar-growers of the advantages of a more profitable system than that which is pursued in the British colonies. But we may test this argument in another way: Mr. G. R. Porter, one of the secretaries to the Board of Trade, and known to Europe as one of the most eminent and accurate of living statisticians, has shown that the cost of producing a cwt. of sugar in the days of slavery was 9s. 10d. Now, Mr. Gibson showed, on the authority of the Clarendon Agricultural Society of Jamaica, which had offered a prize for the production of the greatest amount of sugar at the least cost, that on the Denbigh estate, sugar could be raised at 10s. 2d. per cwt., and on the Halse Hall estate at 6s. 9d. per cwt. The Times found this a very awkward fact, and therefore asserted that in this estimate Mr. Gibson omitted lumber, salaries to overseers, and other elements which had entered into Mr. Porter's calculations. Now, the fact is, that both estimates consist precisely of the same elements, for both include lumber and salaries, and both make a deduction for the rum. In order to put an end to cavil, we insert the items of the return of the expenditure on the Denbigh estate:—

"Total expenditure for labour, inclusive of domestics, buildings, tradesmen, hanging coppers, pans, &c.; in short, the whole labour of the estate, as per second extract £1284 12 2
To which I add the items not given, say overseer's salary .. £200 0 0
Two white bookkeepers or assistants, at £75 .. .. . 150 0 0
The lumber account must consist chiefly of red and white oak staves, and heading for the sugar hds. and rum punichrons; but as these are uniformly paid for by purchasers of produce in the Jamaica markets (with which I shall by-and-by compare the result, as regards sales), the outlay is but temporary, and the price obtained will, moreover, repay some portion of the labour of the coppers already charged. Leaving the staves, therefore, out of the calculation, I put down for boards, &c., required in ordinary repairs upon the buildings during the year .. 100 0 0
Taxes cannot be far wide at .. 50 0 0

Making the gross cost of working the estate 1784 12 2
But the rum is the subsidiary production, being, in fact, created from that which would otherwise be wasted; I therefore claim to deduct from the actual cost of the main staple the price obtained for 3833 gallons of rum, which, by contemporaneous advices, was worth (exclusive of the duty on consumption) 2s. 6d. per gallon, or .. .. . 479 0 0

So that the net amount of .. .. . 1305 12 2 may fairly be said to cover the total cost of producing 2367 cwt. of sugar, being at the rate of 10s. 2d. per cwt."

The first item in this estimate is the manager's account, which the Times declares to have been the only expenditure which entered into Mr. Gibson's calculation; but we have here given the unanswerable evidence of figures to show that Mr. Gibson made a homogeneous comparison with Mr. Porter, and brought in all the items necessary to make the result a capitalist's and not a manager's estimate. But a writer in our able contemporary, the Economist, has shown that this cost is greatly increased by the payment of an expensive staff of overseers and assistants, necessary in the times of slavery, but which, under the system of free labour, could be dispensed with if the absentee proprietor resided on his own estate, and attended to his own business. Were such a saving effected, the cost of production on the Denbigh estate would have been reduced to 7s. 6d., and on the Halse Hall estate to 4s. 6d.

But the argument goes much farther. We have no right to be bound by the present cost of production in the West Indies; we have a clear right to look rather to what the cost would be under a system of fair and open competition. The disadvantage under which West India production is not that our colonial manufacturers have to pay for the labour which their Brazilian rivals obtain for nothing—an absurdity too palpable to need refutation—but because they, as absentee farmers and manufacturers, have to contend with resident farmers and manufacturers. Ireland affords abundant proofs of the evils arising from the absenteeism of landlords; but absentee farmers and absentee manufacturers are men very certain to impoverish themselves, and very likely to damnify the country with which they are connected.

In fact, the greater part of the money extorted by the West India proprietors from the people of England goes not to them, but to the agents, attorneys, and overseers intrusted with the mismanagement of their properties in the islands. The proofs given in the course of the debate of the low state of agricultural skill and enterprise in the West Indies abundantly show that protection is only required for the encouragement of sloth, indolence, and incompetency. The planters are "spendthrifts and slovens," to use the characteristic verbiage of the Times; and the evidence which Mr. Cobden adduced has placed this fact beyond all possibility of doubt or cavil.

When the West Indians and their advocates say that the people of England are bound to compensate them for the difference between the cost of slave-labour production and free-labour production, they conveniently forget that the compensation has been already paid. They received twenty millions of money from the people of England to meet this very case. In round numbers, the production of sugar in the West Indies may be taken at four millions of hundred weights; which, however, is over the mark. Now, the interest on twenty millions at three per cent. is six hundred thousand pounds, or twelve millions of shillings; so that they have already got in perpetuity three shillings per cwt. as a bounty on all the sugar they ever shall raise, to make up for any disadvantage which may arise from using free labour instead of slave labour. But no such disadvantage exists. Mr. Gladstone admitted that absenteeism was the chief cause why sugar was not produced in the West Indies as cheap as in Cuba or Brazil; so that this right hon. gentleman would have the people of England taxed to perpetuate absenteeism, though he confessed that absenteeism to be the chief cause of the depression of the West India interest, causing bankruptcy to the proprietors, and preventing the introduction of all improvement into the islands. We have already given the West Indians an advantage of three shillings per cwt. on all the sugars they ever can or will produce; and we should be glad to know if those who ask for the restoration of slavery would be content to pay back their share of the twenty millions? Every one knows that the abolition of slavery rescued the West Indies from ruin, because they had while it continued to pay enormous interest on their mortgages.

But the Times adds that the colonists are obliged to consume British manufactures; it has not stated the amount of that consumption or its value to the nation. It would have been rather awkward to confess that the sum allocated to the planters in the shape of differential duties exceeds in amount the value of all the British manufactures exported to the West Indies; so that it would be a national gain to give them all the goods they consume, not merely at cost price, but absolutely for nothing, provided they allowed us to purchase our sugars elsewhere. The British manufacturers would gladly give up their worthless exclusive privileges in the colonial market, if the colonists would in turn claim no advantages in the British market.

But the last argument put forward by the Times is one of the most whimsical that can be imagined: it declares that the West Indians contribute "a large quota to our expensive establishments;" it omits to say that these islands do not defray the expenses of their own military and naval defence, or of their civil administration. Under the head of "colonial estimates," about £200,000 is annually paid to supply the deficiencies of the colonies to maintain their own establishments; while they are supplied with regiments, ships of war, and ordnance stores at the sole expense of the people of Great Britain.

The question raised by the Times, whether these or any other colonies are worth being retained, is beside the issue, unless it can be shown that the allegiance of the West Indians depends on their receiving more than two millions annually from a tax levied on British industry as a premium for preserving wasteful habits and bad systems of cultivation.

The real question at issue is, What claim have the West Indians to divert the amount raised by the iniquitous income-tax on offices, trades, and professions from the public Exchequer into their own warehouses and counting-houses? No attempt was made to solve this question during the debate—if, indeed, that can be called a debate, in which all the eloquence and all the argument were on one side. Mr. Gibson's speech particularly deserves commendation; it was a model of a lucid arrangement of facts bound together in logical sequence, the perfection of its eloquence consisting in the perfection of its argument. Lord Howick vigorously treated the labourers' question involved in the discussion, and exposed the hypocrisy of those who call themselves the labourers' friends, while they compel him to give the same amount of labour for 18 lbs. of sugar which under an equitable system would produce him 26 lbs., thus defrauding the working man of more than one-fourth of his earnings whenever he exchanges his labour for sugar. No one denied the wrongs inflicted on the British consumer; no one established a right in the West India proprietary to be pensioned out of the earnings of the industrious classes. It remains, then, as the result of the debate, that the amount raised by the income-tax on offices, trades, and professions must be handed over to the West India interest, because it commands votes necessary to swell the ministerial majority.

THE BAZAAR.

We give a few selections from the mass of correspondence we continue to receive on this subject:—

"Wrotham-hill, Kent.

"SIR,—As you will have contributors to your monster Bazaar in all parts of the kingdom, it will afford a fine opportunity, of which I have no doubt many would gladly avail themselves, to form a large and valuable collection of geological specimens, at very little cost and trouble to the contributors. It would not be necessary to be at any expense in setting them off to advantage, or even naming them; the collection would be valuable if persons situated in different parts would merely send rough specimens of the fossils found in the district, mineral ore, kinds of rocks, slates, spars, oxides, salts, sands, &c.: the name of the place where found would be all that is necessary. You have plenty of geologists in London who could arrange and name them, as, perhaps, the contributors could not. I could send a bushel or two of fossils in chalk and flint, found in this neighbourhood; and, if you recommend it, I have no doubt you would have a large collection.

"I am, Sir, your very obedient servant,
"WM. HICKSON."

"Wrexham, Feb. 1815.

"SIR,—It is our duty, as it must ever be our privilege, to communicate what can either confer benefit or pleasure; and, as I trust both these objects will be attained on the present occasion, I will not delay handing to the League fund a sovereign, which was sent as the annual subscription of an firm a friend to your great cause it can boast—George Ramson, Esq., of Pickhill-hall, near this town, who has heretofore been a liberal contributor, and has now also stated to me his intention of presenting to the Bazaar a painting by one of the old masters, formerly in the collection of the late Mr. Roscoe, of Liverpool, and for which that gentleman, on account of its antiquity, paid one hundred guineas. I trust you will receive many more such intimations, and that the arduous labours of yourself and colleagues in this great struggle to promote our country's weal may be attended with success far exceeding your most sanguine expectations. I am hoping, with our own subscription, to obtain a little more, which I will shortly forward; but the friends here have individually taken up the cause, and now, therefore, send the money without solicitation; so that, though as much may be collected, it appears less by going in detached sums at different times.

"I am, dear Sir, with sincere respect and hearty good wishes, yours, most truly,
"S. HINDRICH.
"Geo. Wilson, Esq."

"Willmott House, Old Kent-road, Feb. 18.

"SIR,—I have to apologize for my seeming inattention to your letter; but as my occupation prevents me affording you that assistance I could so much have wished, and which your truly excellent cause so well merits, therefore I have postponed writing to you till the present, that I might at the same time forward to you some trifling articles, which I would hope will be suitable for your Bazaar.

"Wishing you a speedy and successful termination to the noble struggle which you and the rest of the Council of the League are engaged in, and in which the happiness and comfort of so large a portion, not only of my fellow-countrymen, but all mankind, depends,

"I remain, &c. &c.,

"George Wilson, Esq."

"Uphall, West Lothian, N.B., Feb. 19.

"SIR,—I feel great pleasure in having to inform you that the labouring men of Uphall, along with myself, are determined to show some respect for the League Bazaar. We have commenced collecting a quantity of bird-bones, which we intend manufacturing into moulded candles, and, if you deem my offer of them for the Bazaar worthy your attention, I shall have much pleasure in sending them to whatever address you may be good enough to mention to me. As we intend sending them to the Bazaar free of charge, we will be guided by you in the way we should send them. They will be neatly packed in a box, made for the purpose, and your acceptance of them will much oblige.

"Yours, &c. &c.,

"George Wilson, Esq."

"Donald Gilmore.

"Landport, Feb. 19.

"DEAR SIR,—In answer to your circular of the 5th of January, I beg to say I have called on several ladies who are forming a committee as fast as possible, some of whom had already begun to prepare articles for the Bazaar, and only wanted speaking to.

"I understand Miss Bilton, Union-road, Landport, is to be their secretary, to whom you will please to write for further information. The ladies seem all very anxious in our neighbourhood, and I hope they will do something handsome. At the same time the gentlemen are not behind. Our Anti-Corn-Law Association intend sending a model of a 120-gun ship (being the most appropriate thing we could think of). She is now being made, and, when complete, will be worth fifty pounds. The ladies in the 'Ocean,' representing a conveyer. Other articles will be ent, no doubt, but that will be the principal. The folks here seem very fond of cheap provisions, and are ready to lend a hand to obtain them.

"I am, dear Sir, &c. &c.,
"George Wilson, Esq." "THOMAS ROSS.

"Low-street, Keighley, Feb. 22.

"DEAR SIR,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your Prospectus for the formation of a Ladies' Bazaar Committee in this district, with a list of the Ladies' Committee and a number of tracts and circulars; and I have to inform you, that those in reference to the Bazaar have been liberally distributed amongst our influential ladies, and I hope to make a favourable report of the result at no distant period. I avail myself of this opportunity of stating, that our Association have determined to furnish to the Bazaar a complete specimen of the manufacture of Alpaca, and other fine wools, commencing with the flock out of the fleece, and by regular progression, from spinning, roving, and yarn, to its final completion in the piece, and so, by exhibiting their beauty and utility in mixing with other fabrics, to claim for our town the credit of being the first to develop the multitudinous purposes to which Alpaca and other productions can be advantageously applied. Several ingenious specimens of mechanical apparatus, and the usual quantity of fancy productions, will, I have no doubt, be supplied.

"Yours, &c. &c.,
"SAMUEL THOMPSON."

"Hull, Feb. 22.

"SIR,—Having purchased a set of lithographic marine views for presentation to the League Bazaar, I shall be glad to forward them, free of charge, as you may direct. The publishing price is £1. 1s., and with portfolio £1. 5s. They are executed by a Mr. John Ward, of this town, and, in my opinion, possess considerable merit, inasmuch as they are the production of a self-taught artist, both as a marine painter and lithographer. In his address they are designated as a series of sea views, illustrative of the several rates and classes of vessels in her Majesty's navy, lithographed in the tinted manner, from drawings taken by himself at the different naval establishments; and, as a work of reference, they must be highly desirable.

"I remain, &c. &c.,

"G. Wilson, Esq." "B. BOULTEN.

"12, Park-place, Highbury-park, Feb. 24.

"GENTLEMEN,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your circular respecting the Bazaar, to be held in May next; and to assure you of my hearty sympathy with the objects of the 'League,' and, in general, of my full concurrence in the proceedings which it has adopted.

"I am happy to assure you that several ladies of my acquaintance take a deep interest in the contemplated Bazaar, and will, I doubt not, be active and zealous in preparing for it. As I constitute the whole of my own family, I can enlist none of them in your cause.

"I have no objection whatever to have my name placed on your general committee, could I be of any service. From the nature and number of my engagements, I could be of no personal assistance; and my name would be of no influence, since I have been resident here but a few months.

"I have to apologize for the late reply which I send. I beg you will not interpret it as indicative of indifference to your cause. I received your communication on the very day I was leaving London for the country, where I remained for some time, and first light of it on my return.

"Believe me to be, gentlemen, yours faithfully,
"J. J. BROWN.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Fourth Week, ending Saturday, March 1.

The debate of Monday night on the ECONOMIC, or FREE-TRADE, view of the SUGAR DUTIES question, was animated, interesting, and admirably sustained, notwithstanding certain difficulties which in the House of Commons are calculated to abate the ardour of discussion. The case, which was stated and exhausted by Mr. MILNER GIBSON, met with no reply whatever. Ministers, as if conscious of inability to answer plain facts and figures, affected to reserve all their strength for the anti-slavery part of the subject—a tactic which spared them the humiliation of boldly controverting those principles which they have admitted as true, not only in the "abstract," but in the concrete, to apply practically in detail. They therefore put forward only two of what are technically termed "little men," to reply; and these, aided by the now unofficial voluntarism of Mr. Gladstone, and the ad misericordiam appeals of the two or three West India planters who spoke, altogether made out so deplorable and pitiable a defence, that it almost looked like heartless cruelty to continue a debate, of which the first speech had secured the triumph, and the remainder seemed to be but the surplussage of victory. Nevertheless, justice to the community, which is easily moved by mendacious appeals to its compassion, and, like a blind-hearted lady, looks only to the rage and the sores, without thinking of the roguery beneath, required an ample exposure of the protective delusions and fallacies; and this most effectually they received.

The member for Manchester, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, having opened the case, seconded by Mr. EYART, the first speech in reply was made from the Opposition benches. The member for Cumberland, Mr. William DAWKINS, is a very worthy gentleman, and a very decent whig; but he has the "misfortune" of being a West India proprietor; and therefore he was driven into confessing that he had "no patience" with the attempts made to deprive his order of their advantages, even though these advantages were proved not to benefit them in the long run. The House, by its "cheers and applause," gave expression at once to its own economic and its perfect appreciation of the nature and value of the opinions and feelings of the member for Cumberland. Following him came Mr. Ricardo, who, in a speech worthy of the reputation of his illustrious relation (that Ricardo who cleared up what Adam Smith had left obscure, and whose position among the English economists is that of first class), gave a practically commercial view to the question, and compelled a reply from the Government. Sir George Clerk was "put up" to answer it. Now, nobody who ever saw Sir George, or came in contact with him, would feel disposed to say an unkind word to or of him. In his fifty-eighth year, he is bald-headed, comfortable-looking, and free from those airs of superciliousness which render Government clerks frequently offensive; a more apparently milder whipper-in never cracked a whip; and, like most respectable Scotchmen of the old school, he has that assiduity of attention to details, and that aptitude for red tape, which are necessary to constitute a useful subordinate. Sir George is now promoted to the Vice-Presidency of the Board of Trade; and, to his own astonishment, has now got to deal with principles as well as with details. He accordingly spoke a speech, of which Mr. VILLIERS, with all his real respect for the worthy lord of Pennycuik, was compelled to say that it looked as if it had been composed twenty-five years, and had been now drawn out from its pigeon-hole, wiped from its dust, and gravely repeated, for the edification of the House of Commons, in the year 1845. The speech of Mr. VILLIERS was exceedingly happy. It was full of pleasant sarcasm and ready retort; and so confirmed the case made out by Mr. Milner Gibson as to leave the matter literally "finished and concluded," so far as argument is concerned.

To answer the ARISTARCHUS of the Free-Trade question, arose a youth, who represents Bristol (Mr. Philip William Skinner Miles, brother of the Somerset and agricultural Miles, belonging to a West-India-owning family, and who, last year, proposed the amendment which led to the entanglement of Ministers on their then sugar propositions). He said—nothing; and spoke as if he had got his speech off by heart, and had been so long waiting for its delivery as to have forgotten half of what he intended to say. Then came Lord Howick, who, with his clear and sharp perspicacity, laid bare the economy of the question, and traced the influence of the economical influences into commerce, health, life, power—every thing which constitutes the numerical value, the social condition, and the national stability of a country.

This brought up Mr. Gladstone. He spoke from behind those front Ministerial benches where lately he sat as an organ of authority. The magical effect of such a change was manifested in the reception of his speech. No longer President of the Board of Trade, he was nevertheless listened to in silence, but a silence which plainly told that the whole House treated him as a party interested in the cause; a mere advocate of the West India influence. He stood on the same level as Mr. James; only that, with the same meaning, he had more ingenuity, and a greater command of words. Yet his admissions were noticeable. Protection, per se, was bad, and a differential duty abominable; only the West India planters were poor, and wanted—money!

If Mr. VILLIERS be the ARISTARCHUS, assuredly Mr. CONDEN is the ARCHIMEDES, of Free Trade. In a pithy speech, which commanded attention, roused flagging enthusiasm, and revived the whole debate (drooping as it was from want of opposition), he struck fleshhooks into the hypocritical pretences, and drew a cry of agony from the sufferers. To him was put up Mr. Cardwell, the new Secretary to the Treasury. Mr. Edward Cardwell, the member for Clitheroe, is the son of a Liverpool merchant, and, by profession, a barrister; he is about thirty years of age; and having made two (only two) carefully prepared crack speeches last session, has been taken notice of by Sir Robert Peel, and made a subordinate of the Treasury. He is, withal, a very gentlemanly young fellow; is too honest and too liberal to go very far wrong, and too much trammelled to go very far right. His speech was a melancholy failure, as the ill-concealed sidgetiness of Sir Robert Peel testified. In truth, young Cardwell is not yet hardened and hackneyed enough to resort to dust and dirt in lack of arguments; and, having no arguments, he spoke a speech which sounded like an empty tin case.

Mr. DAWKINS followed. The House by this time had become full; the members were eager for that mathematical demonstration called a division; and the member for Durham, alluding to the Free-Trade controversy and its effect on the mind of the public at large, exclaimed, "This debate has now gone on long enough." Immediately a burst of cheering, resembling a yell, broke out; the observation was sarcastically applied to the debate before the House. A nervous man might have been intimidated or put down. Not so Mr. Bright. It had only the effect of more completely rousing him; and he concluded his speech with a most thrashing assault upon the monopolists.

In the following abstract we condense the debate into an exhibition of the more noticeable points.

SUGAR DUTIES.

On the order of the day having been read, that the House go into a Committee of Ways and Means on the Sugar Duties, Mr. MILNER GIBSON rose to move the amendment, of which he had given notice, "That no arrangement of the sugar duties will be satisfactory and permanent which does not involve an equalisation of duty on foreign and colonial sugar." He was aware of the inconvenience of what are called "abstract" motions, but his present proposition, as pointing to a permanent settlement, was peculiarly a practical one. Slightly noticing the moral and social view of the question, he came to the economical; he called the attention of the House

"To a plain question of justice in taxation—to a matter which I think I can make clear to every man—namely, that it is not consistent with our duty as legislators, when we are resolving ourselves into a Committee of Ways and Means for the sole purpose of voting a supply to her Majesty to meet the current expenditure of the country—that it is not consistent with our duty at the same time to take the opportunity of levying another tax, as it were, which is not to be paid to the public exchequer, or to be applied in defraying the expenses of the country, but is to be appropriated to a certain class of our fellow-countrymen who have not yet made out any good claim for any such favour, and have not set forth any intelligible ground why we should take this legislative mode for making compensation for any alleged grievances. But it is proposed to take this indirect mode of putting the hands of the colonial proprietors into the pockets of the people of England at a moment when we are professing simply to be engaged in voting money for the public expenditure."

The effect of the different rates of duty he illustrated in this way:—

"I will take, as an illustration, two samples of sugar in bond of equal value—of equal value, I mean, in the markets of the world. I will take that value at 28s. the cwt. To one of these samples I will apply a duty of 28s.; to the other sample I will apply a duty of 14s. What is the consequence? It is quite clear that if the sample to which I applied 28s. be sold in the market of this country, it must fetch 52s., because that is the sum of 21s. and 28s. It is also equally clear that the other sample, being of equal value, must also fetch in the market, and for the purpose of refiners, an equal price with the first. But to this second sample I apply the duty of 14s., and still it, in the same market, must fetch 52s.; but if you deduct 14s. from 52s., what is left?—38s. The supposed intrinsic value of the sugar is 21s., exclusive of duty. Add to 21s. a duty of 14s., and that makes 35s. But in the former case the intrinsic value is also 21s.; but there is a duty of 28s., which makes 52s. Now, deduct 38s. from 52s., and that leaves 14s. Here, then, is a difference of 14s. between the price of foreign and colonial sugars. How does this difference of price arise? Certainly not from the market value of the sugars, irrespective of duty, because both foreign and colonial sugars are assumed to be at 21s. the cwt. The difference then arises from the duty—that on foreign sugar being 28s., that on colonial being 14s., and hence a difference of 14s. But to whom does this difference go? Not to her Majesty, because the price of both foreign and colonial is the same in the market. Then it must necessarily go to the grower of colonial sugar, for as his cost price is 21s., and his duty 14s., and his market price 52s., while the foreign cost price is also 21s., but the duty 28s., and the market price only 52s., the difference being 14s., is clearly a benefit given to the colonial proprietor. But the same argument applies to sugars of unequal value. Suppose two samples of sugar, one at 21s., the other at 15s. Apply the 28s. duty to the 21s. sugar; that makes the price, including duty, 52s. Then apply the 14s. duty to the 15s. sugar, 29s. The difference between 52s. and 29s. is 23s. If the 21s. sugar, with a duty of 28s., sells at 52s., then the 15s. sugar, with a duty of 14s., will sell for 43s. Now, deduct 29s. (which is the cost of the 15s. sugar, with 14s. duty added) from 43s. (the price at which it is sold), and you still have 14s. left as a clear advantage over the sale of the foreign-grown sugar. Now, in all these cases it is clear that this excess of price, where the duty is 14s., goes into the pockets of the colonial proprietors, and not into her Majesty's exchequer, and that whether you take sugars of equal value or of unequal value."

The produce of this "fraud" was demonstrable:—

"The right hon. baronet (Sir Robert Peel) told us the other evening that he expected 230,000 tons of colonial sugar to be consumed in this country in the course of the next year. Now, this at a duty of 10s. per cwt., being £10 a ton, upon 230,000 tons amounts to £2,300,000. That is the sum which we are now invited to take from her Majesty's exchequer, and pay over to the West and East India proprietors. £2,300,000, for which no explanation has been given, is to be taken out of the pockets of the people of this country and be paid over to our colonial producers. What a monstrous act of injustice this appears to be upon the face of it! I know there are gentlemen who will contend that there are good reasons why the colonial proprietors should thus be entitled to deduct £2,300,000 from the public exchequer next year. I know there are gentlemen here who would contend that a case had been made out for such a transfer of the public money. But I, as a member of Parliament, representing the public interest, and not the interest of any peculiar class, am entitled to ask what are those grounds and reasons? I am entitled to ask that something like a case should be substantiated before the claim is assented to, and that the House should not, in a blindfold manner, make a transfer of so large a sum of the public money to individuals of whose right or claim no notice whatever has been given to the House. We are invited to give money to her Majesty's exchequer, but we have since been asked to give £2,300,000 to the West and East India proprietors."

He had no animosity towards the West Indies, and he knew that,

"It has been alleged that, by the legislation of this country in former times, you acted towards the colonial proprietors in such a manner as to give them a just and equitable claim upon your exchequer. If that be so, I should prefer a more direct mode of making that claim than that of giving a compensation to the West and East India proprietors in the form of a monopoly. (Hear, hear.) I believe it would be more satisfactory also to the public if they could see an account made out, for there is nothing which the British people like so much as a balance-sheet, fairly set forth in a clear and perspicuous manner; and, if a just claim could be made out, they would not object to compensate the parties from the public exchequer. I contend that no such claim has been or can be made out; and that whatever difficulties the colonialists may have laboured under, in consequence of what may be termed the legislation of this country, have been amply compensated in the shape of the vote of public money to the amount of £20,000,000 sterling."

Scarcity of labour was also alleged, and the comparative cost of free and slave labour. But, quoting the authority of Mr. Porter, of the Board of Trade, he stated that,

"The cost of producing a cwt. of sugar previous to 1828, when slavery existed and emancipation was hardly expected, was 9s. 10½d. He states that, for a period of ten years, from 1819 to 1828, the expense of cultivating a particular estate in the West Indies, including salt provisions, provision-grounds, lumber stores, expenses of manufacturing sugar, the salaries of overseers, amounted to £26,851. The number of slaves of all ages and both sexes averaged at 140. The produce for these years was 29,492 cwt. of sugar, and 164,285 gallons of rum. The rum, valued at 1s. 6d. per gallon (it was now 2s. 4d.), would amount to £12,321, thus leaving a balance of £14,530 as the cost of cultivating the sugar, being at the rate of 9s. 10½d. per cwt."

Contrast this with present cost, as given in the report of the Jamaica Royal Agricultural Society:—

"The statement is this:—The Clarendon Agricultural Society gave a prize of £20, or a piece of plate of that value, to the manager in the parish making the greatest quantity of sugar at the smallest cost from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, 1843, all things considered." "All things considered," mark; thus evidently making an allowance for every difficulty arising from an insufficient supply of labour, and also for competition with other countries. But what is the sum stated in this report as the cost of producing one cwt. of sugar? On one of the estates the cost was 10s., and on the other it was about 6s. 9½d. So that we have good authority for stating that the cost of producing one cwt. of sugar in the West India islands, during the period of slavery, was 9s. 10½d., while at the present moment it was something between 10s. and 6s. 9½d. I want to know why that can possibly be a ground for giving the West India proprietors a protecting duty of 10s.? Why, 10s. is more than the whole cost of the sugar. I will take the protection duty at 10s., as stated by the right honourable gentleman (Sir R. Peel) himself, though rumour is saying that the measure of the right honourable gentleman will give a larger protection. But, taking it at 10s., I ask upon what ground is it that you give this large additional price upon every cwt. of sugar produced in the West India colonies? I repeat, 10s. is more than the cost of all the labour; so that if Brazil could grow sugar for nothing, if their sugar rained down from the skies without the slightest effort used by common industry to produce it, still this protection duty of 10s. on colonial sugar would place Brazil at a disadvantage as compared with the West India proprietors."

Slavery and Absenteeism had been pointed out as the true causes of the distresses of the planters, by no less an authority than Lord Stanley himself:—

"The great bulk of West India proprietors live away from their estates, and are ignorant of all the branches of industry necessary to the cultivation of their estates. Those estates are left entirely at the mercy of overseers and attorneys, persons who have no interest in the permanent value of the inheritance, but merely in getting as much out of the soil as will answer their own purposes. Manufacture, agriculture, distillery, chemistry, are all necessary to the production of sugar and the cane, and all these are entirely neglected by the only person who has a real and lasting interest in the successful cultivation of his property. I may ask my honourable friend the member for Stockport (Mr. Cobden) if he were to reside in Vienna, and leave his print-works to be conducted by attorneys and agents, bent only on filling their own pockets, whether he would find it possible, however fair markets and prices might be, to continue his business with such a profit as ought to give him a due return for his capital? (Cheers.) Yet this is the condition in which the West India proprietors place themselves. An English landowner lets his estate to a tenant, and it has at least the benefit of the personal presence and exertions of that tenant; but the West India proprietor, who is landlord, tenant, manufacturer, distiller, and merchant, all in one, comes to us and tells us that his business is not profitable, and that the representatives of the people of this country must levy a contribution on the great mass of working industry, in order to make good a deficiency produced by his own absurd and injurious management."

One consequence was the want of all improvement; for three centuries there had been no progress, and even the steam-engine was alleged to be absent from the West Indies. Besides the injury inflicted by protection, it took away all faith in principle or stability.

"At present a great number of labourers are employed, in consequence of want of facility of locomotion, and the means of conveying goods from one part of the island to another; and some spirited individuals, therefore, proposed a railroad between Kingston and Spanish-town. Not one of the gentlemen whose interests are protected, and whom protection, according to their own account, stimulates to improvement, could be found to give countenance and support to this undertaking. Who, then, were the parties who did come forward to take up the proposition, and to furnish funds? The persons who have no confidence in protection, but who look forward to the adoption of Free Trade, and to exposing the West Indies to free competition with the produce of the world. (Cheers.) There were the parties who found the money for the railroad between Kingston and Spanish-town, who relied upon the soundness of their own principles, and who, as necessity, according to the old proverb, is the mother of invention, see the time not far distant when competition will reduce the West Indies to the necessity of introducing improvements."

Look at the effect upon the interests both of home and the colonies:—

"It may be said, therefore, that the consumption was entirely sugar of our own colonies; and what was the average price here and abroad? It was 21s. per cwt. on the Continent, and 31s. at home. (Hear.) Thus there were 10s. per cwt. difference upon no smaller a quantity than 207,000 tons: 10s. per cwt. is £15 per ton, and £15 per ton upon 207,000 tons, according to my calculation, makes a difference of no less than £2,600,000, paid by the people of this country for their sugar beyond the price paid for an equal quantity on the Continent. (Much cheering.) Is this legislating for the benefit of the poorer classes? (Cheers.) Is this in accordance with the Queen's speech, that we were at last to consider the condition of agricultural labourers and artisans in the various branches of industry, with a view to promote the comforts of the lower orders? (Cheers.) Are you prepared to maintain that the working man in England shall pay 13s. per cwt. more for his sugar than the working man upon the Continent? Is that your pretended sympathy for the sufferings of the poor, and your vaunted anxiety that their comforts should be increased? Are not such professions disgusting, and do they not tend to humiliate us in the eyes of the world? (Cheers.) It is humiliating for us to affect such sympathy for the working classes, and to show such real anxiety for the welfare of protected interests. (Hear.) We cut down the expenditure—we pretend the deepest regret at the sufferings of the poor—we are anxious to relieve the great body of the tax-payers from their burden; but we coolly, and without explanation, inflict a real impost of several millions a year on the lower orders in the shape of protection to the West Indies, and augment the miseries we profess to feel and pretend to relieve. (Cheers.)"

This injury at home was not compensated by advantage to the colonies:—

"Have your exports increased under the protective system? Certainly not. They were as great in 1794 as they are now. (Hear, hear.) It may, indeed, be alleged that in 1794 the West India colonies were the mart for the supply of our manufactures to the Spanish Main, and that on this account the comparison is not fair: I will, therefore, take the last twenty years, and ask whether your exports have materially increased? Have they shown a disposition gradually to augment? Quite the reverse. The House does not like to be troubled with tables; but let us look for a moment at the exports at various periods during the last twenty years. At this moment they were not so great as in 1794, when the exports amounted to £3,632,000. In 1801 they were £4,281,736; 1814, £6,315,073; 1824, £4,870,836; 1829, £3,612,085; 1842, £2,591,425; 1843, £2,882,441. The difference, therefore, between 1824 and 1843 was upwards of £2,000,000, so that this beneficial system of protection has had the effect in twenty years of most importantly reducing the exports."

The honourable member, whose speech was delivered with telling effect, concluded by enforcing the Free-Trade view of the question. His amendment was seconded by Mr. Ewart; and after a plea of distress from Mr. James, Mr. Ricardo thus examined Sir R. Peel's propositions:—

"On looking over the resolutions of the right honourable baronet, he found that it was proposed to charge not less than ten different rates of duty on sugar. When he first took up the paper containing them, it appeared as if the 430 articles, with respect to which the duty was to be repealed, had been transferred here. In looking over this paper they would constantly meet with distinctions without differences, and differences without distinctions. There were ad valorem duties which were inoperative, and a needless sacrifice of revenue without any corresponding advantages. (Hear, hear.) He was ignorant of the source from whence the right honourable baronet had obtained his information, but if he had discovered a man who could tell him where white clayed sugars began, or brown clayed sugars ended—what clayed was equal to, what Muscovado—why some Muscovados should not be of a greater value than some clayed sugars—by what test it was possible to judge of the proportionate value or relative quality of sugars without actual comparison—such a man must be much wiser and have much more knowledge of the subject than the most experienced and acute merchants who had passed their lives in the trade, and the right honourable baronet should take care at once to engage him and secure his services for the Custom-house. (Hear.) Testing these allegations by practical evidence and figures, he found that these different rates of duties being thus chargeable would act as protective duties thus:—

15,000 tons at the 28s. duty, natural price.
5,000 tons at the 23s. 4d. duty will establish a relative protection to the extent of 4s. 8d. per cwt., or	£ 23,333
70,000 tons at the 16s. 4d. duty will establish a protection to the extent of 11s. 8d. per cwt. on the natural price of the world, and of 7s. on the protected foreign Muscovado; the whole protection will be equal to, at 11s. 8d.	816,666
160,000 tons at the 14s. duty will establish a protection to the extent of 14s. per cwt. on the natural price, 2s. 4d. per cwt. on the clayed colonial, and 9s. 3d. per cwt. on the foreign Muscovado; the whole protection being at 14s.	2,240,000

£3,079,999 showing a greater sacrifice to be made by the English consumer, under the proposed plan of the Ministers, than was made under the previous arrangements."

Sir George Clerk pleaded the arguments which were urged with somewhat more of elaboration, in the debate on the subsequent Wednesday night; by Mr. Goulbourn and Sir Robert Peel. The topics are the same as those with which the public were rendered familiar in the sugar debates of last year. Indeed, Sir Robert Peel, on Wednesday night, admitted that the propositions of the Government were open to serious financial and commercial objections; and he also admitted the inconsistency of our freely receiving slave-grown cotton, while we rigidly refuse slave-grown sugar. But the arguments of Sir Robert Peel, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Gladstone, and Sir George Clerk, as detailed in their speeches of Monday and Wednesday nights, may be summed up thus:—There is a necessity for lowering the duties on sugar, in order to benefit the home consumer, by cheaper rates and larger supplies. But having paid twenty millions for the emancipation of our slaves; having deprived the West India proprietors of the advantage of cheap labour; being engaged in efforts to suppress the slave trade; we must, even in destroying the old monopoly, leave a moderate protection, and at the same time persevere in our attempts to discriminate between foreign slave-grown and foreign free-grown sugars. At the same time all the organs of the Government, from Sir Robert Peel downwards, freely condemn a differential duty, as being bad in itself, and only to be justified by peculiar circumstances; they also intimate their hope that the West Indies, in a few years, will be able to dispense with protection, and to stand fair competition in the open markets of the world.

With reference to the speech of Sir George Clerk,

Mr. VILLIERS said it was rather remarkable that the right honourable baronet who had just sat down should have proposed to his honourable friend the member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Ricardo), to satisfy himself and the House as to the propriety and justice of his opinion on the question then before them, by going down to his constituency and asking them whether they approved of his doctrine on Free Trade or not. If they mean to decide whether the doctrines of Free Trade were impediments to commerce or otherwise by such a test, he thought the right honourable baronet might enlighten them a good deal on the point after his recent visit to his constituency, as he could tell them—submitting to that test—how far he considered the constituencies of this country appeared disposed to support those views which the right honourable baronet advocated. ("Hear," and laughter.) He perceived that the right honourable baronet recognized his allusion to his late reception by his constituency. The weather was still in about the same state as when the right honourable baronet had experienced the feelings of his constituents towards him, and if his honourable friend (Mr. Ricardo) went down, as he had been invited to do so, he scarcely thought he would meet with similar proofs of the opposition of his constituents in consequence of his avowal of the doctrine of Free Trade. (Hear, hear.) On the other hand, he scarcely thought that the right hon. baronet had much improved his chances of a more favourable reception from his constituents, by the opinions which he had just expressed, and the speech which had just been delivered by him. ("Hear," and laughter.) With all due respect to the right hon. baronet—and he did respect him personally—he did not think that he had much raised himself by that speech. He did not mean to say that the right hon. baronet's address was not a fair average speech for a functionary of a government (laughter), but it seemed to him to be that sort of a speech which might have been drawn by accident out of a pigeon-hole of the Board of Trade, where it had lain for the last twenty years, and applied, in the absence of any better argument, for the occasion. (Laughter, and "hear, hear.") It appeared in his estimation to be composed of a collection of commonplace vague generalities—of that sort of no-answer declamation which was sometimes brought before the House to occupy a certain portion of their time, without being intended for any other effect. (Hear, hear.) For, as far as any answer to the specific question which his hon. friend had brought before the House was concerned, he did think that there never was an occasion when a gentleman of mature years (renewed laughter), and holding so responsible a position as that filled by the right hon. baronet, did occupy so much of the time of the House without making any reference to the matter really before them. ("Hear," and laughter.)

No answer had been given to the pointed question of Mr. Milner Gibson, as to the nature of the planter's claims to that £2,300,000 which Sir Robert Peel proposed to put into their pockets.

"He should like to know whether these colonies and dependencies were all in the same state or not, and what ohurm was in the mystical sum of 10s. 6d. that rendered it exactly just towards all parties. (Hear, hear.) They had then £2,300,000 taken out of the pockets of the people of England, without any information being given as to why they should lose so great a sum. There was no return to show them that the colonies would benefit by that grant. But he would ask the House to look at the condition of this country at the time they were called upon to make so great a sacrifice. (Hear, hear.) The Government could not give up a property-tax that pressed upon the precarious incomes of the industrial classes; and why could they not do so? Because they were unable to spare that amount of revenue. (Hear.) Now, he wanted every individual in the country to look at the question in that light. They had there a surplus revenue of £2,300,000, which might be immediately applied for the reduction of the tax on incomes, and which they could get from the sugar duties. (Hear.) Would they do so? Now, it was according to the answer that they gave to that question that the people would judge of their measures. Here was an odious tax—an impost levied upon the incomes arising out of trades and professions—and that tax, so oppressive in its nature, could be dispensed with, but for the determination to continue an enormous protection to the West India proprietors. (Hear, hear.) He would wish to know whether that view of the case was disputed. Not one word that had fallen from the right honourable baronet could let him know whether it was or not. He did not tell them whether, if the revenue permitted further reductions to be made, they would be expended in the same manner—whether, if the sugar duties produced two or three millions more, they might be made available by the right honourable baronet (Sir R. Peel) for the reduction of other taxes. This country wanted to have the duty on tea reduced, so as to lower the price of that necessary article to the people, who were anxious to have it cheap, while it would also enable them materially to increase their trade with that distant part of the world. (Hear, hear, hear.) The country was also anxious to have other taxes reduced. The right honourable baronet had told them if he had more surplus revenue he would apply it as he had done the remainder. But why had he not a greater surplus to devote to the reduction of taxation? Because the amount which should be expended in relieving trade and the consumers generally, was swallowed up in an unjust protection to the West India proprietors."

Quoting Bryan Edwards in 1792, and from the reports of select committees of the House of Commons in 1807 and subsequent years, he showed that "protection had been the bane" of the West India interest:—

"He had the highest authority for stating, that on no spot on the globe where sugar is cultivated, is it cultivated in so barbarous a manner as it is in Jamaica by the agents; while, on the other hand, nowhere can it be grown better by proper care, as any gentleman knew who went out there to look for himself; and the proof of this was, that several persons, whose names had been given him, who had gone over to their estates in all but utter despair, with the full intention of selling them if they found their agents' representations correct, had on inquiry and examination purchased other estates in addition to their own, fully confident of making the speculation a profitable one, by means of that care, those improvements, that conscientious management which had before been entirely wanting. (Hear, hear.) He trusted the House would agree to the motion of his honourable friend. It afforded an admirable and practical opportunity for those gentlemen who were always talking so much about their sympathy with the poor, who were ever advocating all sorts of charities, to do an act of all-pervading charity, of universal good to the community, an act which, while it benefited the poor to a very large extent indeed, would indirectly benefit them enormously, by the extension it would necessarily give to trade and commerce. (Hear, hear.) Next week a large portion of the aristocracy was going to dance for the good of the distressed needlewomen, and a very good thing too. Let the House and the country, meantime, bear in mind what these poor creatures, in common with the rest of the community, paid every week for sugar, beyond what they ought to pay, for the benefit of the West India sugar growers; every week did the metropolis pay £4000 monopoly bonus into the pockets of the West India planters; every week did the rest of the country pay £50,000 monopoly bonus into the pockets of the same gentlemen, being the sum paid for sugar beyond the sum which ought to be paid for sugar, and beyond the sum which would be paid for sugar, were the honourable gentleman's motion carried. (Hear, hear.) This calculation was no mere vague speculation. It was a calculation carefully made, and published in a weekly newspaper, and which no one had ventured to controvert. (Hear, hear.) He would ask the country, then, to decide whether they were not justified in bringing this matter before Parliament. (Hear, hear.) By the means proposed in the honourable gentleman's motion, the right honourable baronet opposite might be enabled to reduce a great part of his income-tax, diminish considerably the duties on the lower priced tea, and give increased employment to a large class of the community, nay, indirectly, to the whole community. (Hear, hear.)"

After a short speech from Mr. Philip Miles,

Lord Howick rose, and with his clearness, directness, and felicity of exposition, put the point of the differential duty, as being a tax on the British consumer, in a very forcible way:—

"Let them look into the matter. He presumed it would be admitted that sugar, whether foreign or colonial, was ultimately paid for by the exportation of British manufactures. The affair was simply the exchange of the produce of British industry for the produce of the industry of those countries in which sugar is cultivated. Already had some change taken place in the market, in consequence of the Government announcement. Several days back Brazilian sugar was sold at 18s. 6d., of precisely the same quality as colonial sugar producing 20s.; thus 26 tons of foreign sugar at 18s. 6d., and 18½ tons of colonial sugar at 20s. per cwt., would equally cost £481; in other words, as much British labour would have to be given for only 18½ tons of colonial sugar as for 26 tons of foreign sugar of precisely the same quality. (Hear, hear.) Why should this monstrous injustice to the suffering people of this country exist? (Hear, hear.) There was plenty of Brazil sugar which the owners were eager to exchange with us for our produce; there were plenty of British manufacturers eager to exchange their produce for the sugar; there was the whole community eager for an arrangement so beneficial to them directly and indirectly. Why should Government, then, at the behest of the West India body, step in, and, by a monstrous fiscal impediment, prevent an exchange of such high importance to the country? (Hear, hear, hear.) The very Government whose chief had told the House and the public that it was the height of injustice to prevent men turning their labour to the best account, now came forward and said that British labourers—for the manufacturers were labourers, whether as masters or as operatives—should not be permitted to make the most of their labour, by giving it in exchange to those who would give them most in return for it. (Hear.) This was the matter upon which the House had a right to have a distinct explanation from Government. The loss, be it borne in mind, did not fall on the manufacturers alone; it fell on the community at large, on all those who purchased sugar; but most of all on the labouring classes, agricultural as well as manufacturing, not only directly, but by lessening the productive powers of British industry, and thereby lessening the remuneration of those whose lot it was to labour with their hands, as well as of those who employ them. It was not merely a question of having one's sugar cheap—the question went far beyond that. The right hon. baronet told them last year that Brazil was unreasonable enough not to be willing to receive our goods on favourable terms, unless we agreed to receive her sugar in return; that Brazil, if we consented to receive her sugar on the same terms with colonial sugar, would admit our manufactures on favourable terms. What a large trade would at once be open to us in that direction, were we to accept this overture. (Hear, hear.) Consider how immense a stimulus would be given to our manufacturing industry by an enlarged commerce with the Brazils. And this very increase of business in the manufacturing districts would increase the demand for agricultural produce; which increased demand, by improving the condition of the agriculturist, would react favourably upon our manufacturing home trade. The agriculturists complained of the want of interest shown in their support by the present Government. Why did not those who wished to serve the agricultural in common with other interests come forward and join those at that side of the House who supported the motion of the honourable member, and ask the Minister to confer the advantage on the country of getting rid of this monopoly in sugar? (Hear, hear.)"

He pursued this topic throughout a long and able speech, and concluded by expressing his hope that "The people of this country would look carefully to this question, and compare the taunt of being indifferent to the horrors of slavery, which had been thrown out, with the former conduct of those who threw out that taunt, and thus be enabled to see how much sincerity was at the bottom of their argument. (Loud cheers.) He hoped that they would consider whether an argument like this, which was utterly unfounded, ought to be sufficient ground for subjecting the working-classes of this country to an undenied burden, an undenied tax, which was a still greater burden on the people than by its mere pecuniary amount."

Mr. Gladstone followed the noble lord. He also spoke at considerable length on Wednesday night. On both occasions he practically abandoned the question on the ground of principle, converting it into one of mere temporary expediency. At the same time, while ringing the changes on the anti-slavery topics, he denied that the people of this country would be taxed to the whole amount of the differential duty; and, on Wednesday night, went a little farther, by affirming that out of doors no interest whatever was felt on the subject, the whole commercial community being disposed to acquiesce in the propositions of the Government.

After a few words from Mr. Labouchere—

Mr. Cobden said that he had taken some pains to justify himself, as the present was a question on which he had suffered some little obloquy some months ago. He had made inquiries in the City, and found that the proposal of the Government was Mr. Miles's proposition over again. They had not only got the measure of last year, but they had got something worse. Now, he had been rather ill-used in this matter. (A laugh.) The right honourable baronet was disposed to have a flirtation with their (the Free-Traders') principles, and for a time they had been charmed with the constancy of his attachment. (Hear, hear.) Now, if the right honourable baronet went back to his first love, he must not expect to pass muster for a Free-Trader. He had done something in the way of fiscal changes. He had taken money from the pockets of the people by the income-tax, and restored something to them in the shape of cotton and glass duties. But on the whole, speaking as a Free-Trader, with the Government sugar measures taken with the rest, he (Mr. Cobden) believed that they stood in a worse position now, as regarded protective duties, than they did last year. (Hear, hear.) He did not know that he had any branch of the question before the House to refer to, except that which had been alluded to, and when it was said that they were anxious to evade the question, he meant that branch of it which had reference to the question of slavery. The noble lord the member for London had been charged with having attributed motives to the honourable gentlemen opposite. Now he (Mr. Cobden) would not attribute motives to them; nothing, in fact, was so difficult to discover. (Hear, hear.) But, although he himself would not charge any motives upon them, he might do the honourable gentlemen opposite some service if he told them what were the motives which the people out of doors attributed to them. (Hear, hear.) A great deal had that night been said of Sir T. Buxton and the anti-slavery party, and hon. gentlemen thought that, holding these duties under the plea that by so doing they were preventing slavery, they were sure of conciliating the support of the anti-slavery body. In that they were most grievously mistaken. (Hear, hear.) As a body, he (Mr. Cobden) respected the anti-slavery party, and he had made some acquaintance with many of the most influential members of that body which had fought and won the anti-slavery battle. Now, the very same men, in all parts of the country, who fought and won that battle, were now in the ranks of the Corn-Law repeaters. ("Hear, hear," and some laughter.) They had in London, it was true, a committee sitting in Broad-street and in Lombard-street; and of all localities, he was most ready to suspect committees sitting either in Broad-street or in Lombard-street. Over these they might have some influence; but he could tell honourable gentlemen opposite, that by the great body of the anti-slavery party they were suspected, and that that party regarded them as hypocrites. ("Hear, hear," and "Oh, oh.") He did not charge them with being so. (A laugh.) He was only telling them what was the feeling out of doors. (Hear, hear.) Now, let them look at whom they represented, and who they were who were represented on that (the Opposition) side of the House. The anti-slavery party, when it existed in its strength, had exercised a power over the acts of that House, and had its representatives in that House; and where then were its headquarters? In Manchester, Kendal, Leeds, Bath, &c.—and were the members of these constituencies on that side of the House, or on the opposite?—by whom were the men representing these constituencies sent there? By that body to which the anti-slavery party belonged. Let them take the case of Leeds, in which gentlemen opposite had one representative, and they (the Opposition) another. And who sent the member which hon. gentlemen opposite claimed as their own, and who the member on his side of the House—who? Why, the Conservative member represented the party opposed to the abolition of slavery; the Liberal member represented the anti-slavery party. He would ask the hon. member for Bath, although he was afraid the hon. and learned gentleman was suffering from a severe cold, and could not answer—were the anti-slavery people of Bath anxious to keep up the discriminating duty—to tax the poor people of Somersetshire to put down slavery? They repudiated such a notion. He would venture to say that the great body of them would support the honourable and learned gentleman when he went to the hustings, having voted against this attempt to tax the sugar of the people. Well, seeing these facts, if they (the Ministerialists) were the parties opposed to emancipation—if they were the parties who had voted even against the abolition of the punishment of women by the lash (hear)—and some of their very leaders had their votes recorded against the abolition of that revolting practice (hear), seeing that they never lent a hand to carry out that object—why, the last deputation which came to London, in 1833, consisting of 230 members, had not six of the Tory party amongst them—he believed not three; and on asking his friend Mr.

George Thompson, about it, he was informed by that gentleman that he thought there was not even one; seeing these things, he could not refrain from telling them the honest conviction of those out of doors, who regarded their conduct as utter hypocrisy, when they set up such a plea in that House. (Hear, hear.) He did not charge them with hypocrisy. ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) He showed them that there was certainly some argument on his side, when he could show them that very questionable motives were charged upon them by the people out of doors. Parties out of doors spoke out, and it was important that honourable gentlemen should know what was the opinion held of them, and what motives were attributed to them out of doors. As regarded foreigners, too, they should know these things; and he could tell them honestly that they were by foreigners suspected in this matter, and it was known to foreigners how they were suspected by parties at home.

Quoting from private letters, and other documents, he showed that the management of West India estates was radically vicious, improvident, and ruinous, results traceable to protection and absenteeism; and turning to the condition of the people of this country, he illustrated, in a way as pithy as it was familiar the effects of the sugar monopoly on the minds of the humbler classes:—

"At the close of the last session there was between both sides of that House a sort of rivalry upon that which they called 'the condition-of-England question.' Now, there were some people who argued that sugar was not wholesome; the children of the poor were told by their parents, that if they went to the cupboard to look for it they would find 'Old Bogey' there. (Laughter.) It was because it was so dear, it was said it would spoil their teeth, that it would injure their stomachs. Never was there a greater mistake. (Hear, hear.) There was no more nutritious food. (Hear, hear.) Second to bread itself, there was no one thing that was more fitting that the people should have in great quantity than sugar, and yet they in that House deprived the people of that comfort. (Hear, hear.) They all professed a great love for the people—they professed to be wonderfully charitable—they all professed a great tenderness for the poor, as long as the question they had to deal with was not a money question; but when it was that, then they found the land lords and the sugar lords both combining together upon corn and sugar, and putting their hands into the pockets of the poor people. What would be thought of those who did this? What said of them? That there they were, noble lords and honourable members, professing their regard for the poor, declaring their willingness to serve them, but when it came to the test—when it came to be a question of protection—when it came even to the small difference of a penny in the price of a pound of sugar—then they threw the poor and their families to the winds, and stood by their party. (Cheers.)"

Mr. Cardwell having made his very laboured and tame speech,

Mr. Buxton followed, dealing with the statistics of the question, and showing in figures the mischief inflicted on our commerce and trade by the sugar monopoly. Vigorously assailing the monopolist interests, on the injustice they were perpetuating, he warned them that "The party that advocates free trade in sugar and corn is swelling in numbers every day, while your ranks are thinning rapidly; and, though we may be in a minority to-night, there may be yet another time, before this sugar bill passes, when we shall again meet, and when we shall again ask you why you persist in compelling the people of this country, to pay a tax of two millions a year for the sake of the West India planters; and why you insist upon giving protection to the East Indies and the Mauritius, who have made no claim for it? How can you suppose you are doing your duty to the country when you thus decide for the interests of party, against the interests of the whole people?"

A few remarks followed from the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Lord Sandon; and then came the division—

For Mr. Gibson's motion ..... 81
Against it ..... 211
Majority ..... 127

A comparison of the relative numbers in the division upon Mr. Ewart's motion for equalizing the sugar duties last year, will show a considerable accession to the ranks of the Free-Traders. Last year, on Mr. Ewart's motion, only 56 out of a House of 315 members voted for an equalization of the sugar duties; this year the above division on Mr. Gibson's motion shows 84 votes in favour of equalization out of a House of 295—a considerable increase both relatively and numerically. The division lists, both for this and last year, will be given in our next number.

THE DEBATE OF WEDNESDAY NIGHT.

The debate of Wednesday night was raised by Lord John Russell, who, on reading the order of the day for going into Committee of Ways and Means on sugar, moved "That it is the opinion of this House, that the plan proposed by her Majesty's Government in reference to the sugar duties, professes to keep up a distinction between foreign free-labour and foreign slave-labour sugar, which is impracticable and illusory, aggravates the evil of the protection given to the colonist at the expense of the consumer, and tends so greatly to impair the revenue as to render the removal of the income and property-tax, at the end of three years, extremely uncertain and improbable."

There was nothing very novel in the debate which followed, with the exception of a brilliant speech from Mr. MACAULAY on the MORAL and HUMANITARIAN of the question. We give this speech in another column.

The economical view was exhausted on Monday night; and on this ground there was nothing new to urge. But the Whig leaders placed themselves at a great disadvantage in debate, by maintaining the principle of a moderate protection to the West Indies, an advantage of which Sir Robert Peel was not slow to avail himself, hitting, with his peculiar adroitness, Lord John Russell exactly there is a distinction between the case of cotton and sugar. "The cultivation of cotton," they say, "is less painful, and less destructive to human life, than that of sugar." But that position seems hardly tenable; for sugar is now actually reducing, to the right hon. baronet, the duty on slave-grown sugar to a considerable extent. The duty on slave-grown sugar is imported from the United States. Then a new distinction is set up. The sugar and cotton of the United States, it is said, are undoubtedly slave-grown produce; but they are not produced by means of the slave trade. This brings me to a part of this subject which I approach with great unwillingness. I utterly deny the proposition that the products we are to take from the southern states of America are not the fruits of the slave trade. If they are; and I say that, if there be, on the face of this earth, a society which, before God be, is more accountable than another for the misery and man, is more accountable than another for the misery and man, it is that very republic of the United States, to whose produce the right hon. baronet proposes to give free admission into this country. I can assure the House that I feel no pleasure in going into arguments of this nature. I conceive that it is not the duty of members of Parliament here to discuss abuses which exist in the institutions of other nations. By discussions of that nature, indeed, we can scarcely expect to produce any salutary effect with regard to the reform of such abuses. (Hear.) They are rather calculated to wound national pride, and to inflame national animosity. But the right hon. baronet opposite turns this House into a judicature where we are to arraign and criticise the conduct of all nations under Heaven, before we determine what our scale of duties shall be, and with what countries we shall or shall not trade. The right hon. gentleman forces upon our consideration questions with which, as a member of Parliament, I have nothing to do, and which I am anxious to avoid. But how can I do so? The showkeepers and professional men whom I represent say, "Why are we to go on paying probably for several years, an impost admitted by those who imposed it to be grievous, unequal, and inquisitorial?" The paper manufacturer and the soap manufacturer asked why, if the income-tax is to be continued, they are not to have some share of relief? The answer is, "Because Brazil does not behave so well as the United States with respect to the negro race." Then, can I avoid instituting a comparison? Am I not absolutely forced to test the truth of this statement? I say, then, that there exists in the United States a slave trade in no respect less odious or demoralising—and, in my opinion, more odious and more demoralising—than that which is carried on between the coast of Africa and Brazil. North Carolina and Virginia are to Louisiana and Alabama, what Congo is to Rio Janeiro. The slave-states of the Union are to be divided into two classes—the breeding states and the consuming states. In some of the United States slaves are bred—the human beast of burden is reared up till he is enabled to endure deadly labour in the sugar and cotton estates, with which you are extending our relations, and to which he is sent to be killed. The extent of this traffic we may learn from the census of the United States of 1830 and that of 1840. North Carolina and Virginia are two of the chief breeding states. During the ten years from 1830 to 1840, the number of slaves in North Carolina has been, as nearly as possible, stationary. In Virginia, during the same period, the number positively decreased, although, both in North Carolina and Virginia, propagation was going on to an enormous extent. In both those states, during the time I have mentioned, hundreds of thousands of negro slaves were born; the births exceeded by hundreds of thousands the number of deaths. What, then, became of these people? Look at the census of those states where we know the negro race is worn down by a cruel labour, and where from its own resources it could scarcely keep up its numbers—say, where those numbers would rather diminish. Take the case of Louisiana. In 1830 there were in that state 167,000 slaves; in 1840, 170,000. The slave population of Alabama in 1830 was 117,000; in 1840, 253,000. In Mississippi, during the same period, slave population increased threefold. In 1830 the numbers were 65,000; in 1840, 193,000. That is the scale of this slave trade. As to its nature, ask any Englishman who ever travelled through the southern states of America. Jobbers go about from state to state, taking advantage of the difficulties of the planters in the breeding states; they rend asunder the dearest ties of nature and of marriage as unscrupulously as any Guinea captain; they buy slaves until they have made up their "gang" to 300 or 400; and then these human beings, handcuffed, fettered, guarded by armed men, are driven as you would drive (or rather as you would not drive) a herd of oxen to Smithfield, to the southern states, to undergo the deadly labour of the sugar-mill. In Louisiana the labour of the sugar-mill sends, in a short time, the stoutest African to his grave; but still in Virginia negroes are growing up to supply the horrid trade. God forbid that I should extenuate the slave trade in any form; but I must say that I conceive it may be viewed in its most horrible and odious aspect in the United States. It is bad enough that uncivilized men should go to the coast of an uncivilized country, and that they should thereafter upon wretched barbarians and carry them in slavery to a foreign land; but that civilized men—Christians, freemen—should breed the slave, and, if I must speak out the whole horrible truth, even beget the slaves they breed,—that a man, proud of his liberty, calling himself a Christian, a baptized man, frequenting a Christian church, should see his own offspring gambolling about him in their childhood, that he should watch them growing up to age, and that he should then sell them for dollars, and consign them to a life which is a lingering death,—this is more painful, infinitely more painful to contemplate than the slave trade of Africa. I am now talking of a slave trade which extends to tens of thousands of human beings every year—a slave trade as regular as the trade in pigs between Dublin and Liverpool, or in coals between the Tyne and the Thames. I have no wish to extenuate the evils of slavery in the Brazil; but I do say that on the whole it is less hopeless, and its evils are not so dreadful as those of slavery in the southern states of America. The evils of slavery everywhere are great; but the peculiar characteristics of slavery on the American continent—that which, wherever it exists, almost destroys the hope that you can ever see a free community there—is the antipathy of colour. (Hear.) That antipathy does not exist in Brazil to anything like the extent to which it prevails in the southern states of America. It is well known that in Brazil there is a free coloured and black population, comprising many hundreds and thousands of persons;

they are not excluded from honourable professions, and there may be found among them physicians and lawyers, numbers who bear arms, and many priests. Whoever considers the honour and dignity with which the Roman Catholic religion invests its priests, will appreciate the estimation in which these men must be held. It is by no means unusual to see white penitents kneeling to confess their sins and to receive absolution before the spiritual tribunal of a negro; nor is it uncommon to witness a negro dispensing the Eucharist to whites. I need not tell the House how utterly different is the state of things existing in the southern states. Fully admitting all the evils of Brazilian slavery, if I were compelled to state in which of the two countries I considered it probable the condition of the African race would be most elevated 80 or 100 years hence, I should at once reply in Brazil. But the system of maritime police by which we sought to prevent the slave trade has been referred to by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Gladstone); and how stands the case as regards the conduct of the United States, and of Brazil, with reference to that measure? Brazil agreed to grant you the right of search, and, if it be found impossible to exercise that power, the impediment has been opposed by the United States. What the opinion of the present Government is as to that power we know from the letter of Lord Aberdeen, which was published the other day. I believe I state correctly the spirit of that letter, when I say the opinion of the noble earl, as there expressed, is that the right of search is the only efficacious means of suppressing the slave trade, and that he entertains very great doubt whether any other effectual mode can be adopted for the prevention of that traffic. To this system of maritime police which, as I think with great humanity and wisdom, the Government of this country proposed to institute, Brazil submitted. The United States refused to submit to it, and by such refusal deprived the system to a great extent of its importance and efficiency; nay, they even contested that right of visit which, I will venture to say, was perfectly consistent with the law of nations, and in every part of the continent of Europe they have been endeavouring, through their diplomatic agents, to excite an opposition to it. You cannot have forgotten General Cass's letter. You cannot doubt that, if the United States had submitted to the right of search, the outcry in France against the exercise of that power would never have been excited. But when one maritime nation makes it a point of honour to refuse assent to such a power, you cannot wonder that any country in which there exists a feeling of national pride should be unwilling to submit to its exercise. They will naturally say, "Why should the tricolor submit to this degradation more than the stars and stripes?" It is very well for the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) to say that, if my noble friend's proposition is adopted, the right of search will be useless, in effect, abandoned. A negotiation has been entered into on that subject with France. Every body knows how that will end. France will be released from the supervision of this maritime police. Spain will then ask for a similar release, and, if it is acceded to all other nations, will make a like request. The right of search is worth nothing when France and America refuse to accede to it; and I will venture to say, therefore, that the right of search is abandoned in consequence of the course of conduct pursued by the United States of America. For the existence of the slave trade between Congo and Brazil the United States are more responsible than the Government of Brazil itself. The right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) has alluded to Mr. Calhoun's letter; and I will put it to the House whether the Government of the United States has not, with reference to this subject, placed itself upon a bad eminence to which Brazil never aspired, and to which, if it had aspired, it never could have attained? The United States' Government has openly declared itself the patron, the champion, and the upholder of slavery; it has admitted that it sets up its own principles of slavery in opposition to the principles of freedom, as if it considered that this conduct gives it a title to glory—that it renders itself illustrious as the evil genius of the unfortunate African race. I well understand how statesmen in the United States should say, with reference to slavery, "It is a horrible evil, but we were born to it; we must endure it; what can we do?" But that is not the feeling of the American Government. They are actuated by a propagandist spirit; they seek to spread and extend slavery with more energy than was ever exerted by any other nation to diffuse civilization. Nay, more than that, they seem to think the cause so holy that it sanctifies all means they can employ to promote it; and with that object they snatch away provinces right and left, from those of their neighbours who enjoy free institutions. They put themselves at the head of the slave interest, just as Queen Elizabeth put herself at the head of the Protestant interest of Europe, and, wherever their favourite institution is in danger, are ready to stand by it as Queen Elizabeth stood by the Dutch. I say, therefore, that I think I have made out this, viz., that of all the states now existing, the republic of the United States is that which has long been acting, and is now acting, in a manner the most culpable as regards slavery and the slave trade. (Hear.) I say that they have been restlessly active in preventing every efficient measure of ours for suppressing the slave trade; and I say that the slave trade between Brazil and the coast of Africa is to be attributed, in a great measure, to the United States. (Hear.) Then I come to this: the right hon. baronet says he can't admit Brazilian sugar, because the Brazilians use the negroes so ill; but he will admit the slave-grown cotton of the United States. Is it possible for him to prove that my noble friend's proposition would give a stimulus to the slave trade in Brazil? I use his own argument to prove that his proposition would give a stimulus to the slave trade of the United States. (Cheers.) I have not the least doubt but that as soon as the contents of his budget shall be known across the Atlantic, the slave-trade traffic will become more horrible than ever—that the jobbers in human flesh and blood will be more busy than ever—that the gangs of manacled negroes moving southward to their doom will be more numerous on every road. (Cheers.) But the right hon. baronet says, that this is a great boon that he is giving to the country. (Cheers from the Opposition benches.) But I don't intend to oppose his proposition—I intend to support it, and I can perfectly reconcile it to my conscience. How the right hon. baronet can reconcile it to his, I don't know.

quite at a loss to conceive, and what I am very curious to hear. (Cheers.) The right hon. baronet cannot say that it is an old abuse he is keeping up. He comes forward to propose a budget favourable in the highest degree to that society, which of all societies has the most to answer for in respect to the slave trade, and in the same breath he says that he cannot possibly admit the sugar of Brazil. (Hear, hear.) No one is more capable of doing justice to his case than the right hon. baronet; and it would be in the highest degree presumptuous in me to anticipate the defence that he means to set up. But I hope the House will permit me, as one who feels deeply on this subject, to explain how I shall justify the vote which I shall give to his proposition; and that explanation will, at the same time, explain the vote which I shall give now. (Hear, hear.) I most fully admit the paramount authority of moral obligations. But what are our moral obligations to other men? We are bound not to wrong them. We are bound to regard them with benevolence; but it is nevertheless true that Providence has assigned, both to individuals, and to societies, certain spheres within which it is desirable that their benevolence should be peculiarly active; and if, neglecting that within their province, they aim at setting right what is beyond, in all probability their too active benevolence will fall in its intention, and more harm than benefit will arise. (Hear.) We can all see this. None of us would be justified in injuring any stranger to benefit ourselves; it is clear that any stranger is justified in claiming from us many good offices, which we are clearly bound, by the laws of humanity, to render him; but it is not true that a man is bound to exert himself to serve strangers as he exerts himself to serve his family. It is not true that a man would be justified in subjecting his wife and children to disagreeable privations in order to save, even from ruin, some foreigner whom he never saw. If we were to conduct life on that principle, we should entail misery on our families. The same of nations: no legislator, no statesman, ought to benefit his own country by injuring others. No statesman ought to omit any reasonable opportunity that comes in his way of rendering good services to another nation; but, after all, our country is our country. (Cheers.) Observe: I am not so narrow-minded as to prefer the happiness of a particular society to the happiness of mankind; but I say, that by promoting the happiness of the society which I know best, and with which I am most connected, I shall best promote the happiness of mankind. (Hear.) If we attempt more, in what a wilderness shall we not find ourselves. Look at the factory system pursued in England. We may agree that there are evils in that system which might be amended by legislation; we shall at any rate all agree that every member of this House ought to give his mind to the subject; in the same manner we shall agree that there are great evils in the system of serfdom pursued in Russia; but could any good be done to the cause of humanity if the Emperor of the Russians and the British Parliament were to exchange their sympathies in these matters, and the Emperor were to take our factory children under his special care, whilst we undertake the cause of the poor peasants on the banks of the Volga? (Cheers.) What good, I say, would be done to the cause of humanity, if pursuing this course—if thus extending and exchanging our active benevolence—we should say to the Emperor, "We'll take none of your tallow or your hemp until you emancipate your serfs;" and he were to say to us, "I'll take none of your manufactures till you emancipate your factory children?" (Cheers.) By this I mean no sophistry, or casuistical quibbling; but I think, on these principles of common sense, that I can vindicate (as I hope I shall ever be able to do) the whole course of conduct which I have pursued with respect to the question of slavery and the slave trade. (Loud cheers from the Opposition benches.) When I first came into Parliament I had, as was natural that I should have, a strong feeling on this subject. I found then slavery existing; and I gave, according to my situation and my measure of ability, every aid in my power in order to its removal. I never shrunk from any exertion, or hesitated to make any personal sacrifice, to accomplish it. (Cheers.) I do not mention this as matter of boast. It was merely my duty. The right hon. gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department knows that for this cause, in 1833, I put my resignation into the hands of Lord Spencer, and voted and spoke against the Government of which I was a member, at a time when office was of as much consequence to me as it could be to any one. (Hear, hear.) Lord Spencer and Lord Grey did not choose to accept my resignation, and I remained in office; but for some days I did, in consequence of the course I then pursued, consider myself out of the service of the Crown. (Hear, hear.) However, slavery was abolished. Then, in my opinion, as a member of the British Parliament, intrusted with the care of my black fellow-subjects, it was my duty, at any sacrifice of my own interests, to do everything in my power to remove that stain from our laws, and to set at liberty the negroes of Jamaica. (Hear, hear.) But now comes the question of the negroes of Louisiana and Alabama; and I consider that they do not stand in the same relation to us as the negroes of Jamaica. (Cheers.) I have a great and solemn duty to perform to those whom I represent—to a great number of persons, who I will not say are in a state worse than slavery, but who are toiling hard from sunrise to sunset to obtain an honest living—persons who, if I could succeed in opening to them a new great new market, might possibly experience some alleviation of their hard lot. I cannot doubt that the evil which I should inflict on them by going out of my sphere would be great; but the good which I should do to the negroes of Louisiana and Alabama is exceedingly problematical. (Hear, hear, hear.) With regard to the right hon. gentleman's proposition it has, I admit, a tendency to give an impulse to the slave trade in South America. But I look at it in this way—I very much doubt whether the marked interference of the English Parliament would on the whole have a good effect with the South Americans. What right have we to interfere? All nations have a susceptibility of feeling upon such a point as this. No nation likes to be told "We are more virtuous than you." (Hear, hear.) I feel this myself. I feel that there are many abuses in Ireland which we ought to redress, but I must confess that when I take up a New York paper and read most furious attacks upon our country (such for instance as the speeches of President Tyler's son), in consequence of our treatment of Ireland, I feel almost inclined to retrace my own steps, and to ask "of what concern is it to America?" (Hear, hear.) If there be anything to be done with regard to the amelioration of the American institutions as respects slavery, we must look to the co-operation of that large, enlightened, and respectable body of citizens of the United States, who hate slavery as much as we. They may possibly accomplish something. But if we refuse to take their produce in order to punish them for their national offences, we should probably wound the pride and excite the resentment of those very persons; and it would become a point of national honour with them to stand by slavery, which they have hitherto thought a national disgrace. We should thus confer no benefit on the negro, whilst we should inevitably inflict mischief upon our own countrymen, by making them pay higher than they need pay, for the necessities of life. (Hear, hear.) On these principles I can reconcile to my conscience the vote which I intend to give on this part of the right hon. baronet's plan; but on the same principle I can reconcile the vote which I shall give to my noble friend to-night. I confess I shall find some difficulty in understanding in what manner the right hon. baronet will distinguish between the cases. (Cheers.) There are many other points that have been referred to in the course of this debate to which I will not advert—there is one, however—"the refining" of the right hon. gentleman—that I cannot help touching on. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) Was such a distinction ever heard of? Not for the world are we to eat one ounce of the accursed thing; but we are to dress it up in a more pleasing form, and to export it to Hamburg, or Leghorn—to all the coffee-houses of Italy or Germany! But we don't taste it;—no! We can stand up with a pharisaical air, and thank God that we are not as those Italians and Germans are, who eat slave-grown sugar. (Hear, hear.) Clearly such distinctions as these in matters of morality are most absurd. I hardly know what to say to them. It seems to me very like the distinction drawn by the perjured witness. "What," said he, "I perjure myself! not for the world—no, no—I only kissed my thumb—I didn't kiss the book—I wouldn't do it on any account." (Cheers, and laughter.) But this is surely not the way in which we should treat considerations of this sort. I remember something very analogous to it in an old Spanish novel that I read some time ago, and which seems to me to be singularly appropos. A wandering lad, something after the fashion of Gil Blas, is taken into the service of a rich old silversmith—a most pious man, who is always telling his beads, who hears mass daily, and observes the fasts and fasts of the church with the utmost scrupulosity. He is always preaching honesty and piety. "Never," he constantly repeats to his young assistant, "never touch what is not your own; never take liberties with sacred things." Sacrilege, as uniting theft with profaneness, is the sin of which he has the deepest horror. One day while he is lecturing after his usual fashion, an ill-looking fellow comes into the shop with a sack under his arm. "Will you buy these?" says the visitor, and produces from the sack some church plate and a rich silver crucifix. "Buy them!" cries the pious man. "No; nor touch them; not for the world. I know where you got them. Wretch that you are, have you no care for your soul?" "Well then," says the thief, "if you will not buy them, will you melt them down for me?" "Melt them down!" answers the silversmith, "that is quite another matter." He takes the chalices and the crucifix with a pair of tongs; the silver, thus in bond, is dropped into the crucible, melted, and delivered to the thief, who lays down five pistoles and departs with his booty. The young servant stares at this strange scene. But the master very gravely resumes his lecture. "My son," he says, "take warning by that sacrilegious knave, and take example by me. Think what a load of guilt lies on his conscience. You will see him hanged before long. But as to me, you saw that I would not even touch the stolen property. I keep these tongs for such occasions. And thus I thrive in the fear of God, and manage to turn an honest penny." (Cheers and laughter.) But really I do say that the cause of morality is very much injured by admitting such distinctions as these—nothing can have a more immoral tendency than the quibbling away our moral obligations in this way, making distinctions of such a description as we have of late seen introduced into theology, where it was attempted to be shown that a gentleman could hold the dogmas of Rome, and hold with them the best benefits in the Church of England. I hope we shall keep the sophistry of Tract XC. out of these debates at all events. (Cheers and laughter.) Then, the right hon. gentleman wonders that people on the Continent say that all this is hypocrisy. Why, can anything be more natural? It is, I should say, perfectly natural; and, I should add, that it is all the effect of this new distinction. (Hear, hear.) I do not think, till the right hon. baronet came into office, that the particular topic of our admitting slave-grown cotton and tobacco was ever mentioned, much less ever made a charge against an administration. But as soon as the right hon. baronet began to profess that he acted on a new and exalted moral principle, everybody began to inquire whether he consistently adhered to that principle; and the result of the inquiry is that every foreign journal, whether in Germany, or France, it signifies not what country, laughs at the philanthropy of England. "Oh!" say they, "it is nothing but a farce, for it applies only to sugar, and affects not cotton, tobacco, or coffee. You take the Hawaiian cigar, and grab up the plantations of the poor Irish freemen who want to cultivate tobacco, and you even admit the sugar of New Orleans." (Hear, hear.) I care little about the abuse which foreign journalists or orators may throw on the Machiavellian policy of perfidious Albion. But I am sorry and ashamed when I feel that I have nothing to say in reply to their reflections. (Cheers.) The right hon. gentleman who preceded me said a good deal about the former history of slavery; and he alluded to the names of one or two persons who were very eminent indeed in their exertions in the abolition of slavery, who did agree with the measures of the right hon. baronet in 1841. But I must tell the right hon. gentleman that I very much doubt whether my lamented friend, the late Sir T. Buxton, or Sir S. Lushington, would approve of the present budget of the right hon. baronet. They, at least, I believe, would be consistent. But, if we go back to the services of those eminent men with regard to slavery, is it possible to deny that there are some circumstances in the conduct of the supporters of that man which lay them open—I won't say to the charge of hypocrisy, but to be accused, in some degree at least, of having deceived themselves, to say nothing of the possibility that their own interests may have exercised, even without their knowing it, some influence on their minds.

(Hear, hear.) Who are now the great supporters of the right hon. baronet's plan in this House? his right hon. colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the right hon. gentleman who immediately preceded me in this discussion. Now, when I look back to the history of the great struggle which ended in the abolition of slavery, I find nothing there that leads me to conceive why their sensibility upon this point should be greater than ours. (Cheers.) The right hon. baronet at the head of the Government would think that I was speaking of him in terms of irony, were I to say that during the whole of that great struggle he ever threw the weight of his influence on the side of the negro. At the very last, when the bill was brought in which put an end to slavery, I myself well remember that the right hon. baronet declared that he could not give his support either to the plan of immediate emancipation proposed by my noble friend, now the member for Sunderland (Lord Howick), or to the plan proposed by the noble lord, now Secretary for the Colonies (Lord Stanley); and I well remember that the right hon. baronet said,—"I shall now claim no credit for this measure; I only desire to be absolved from the responsibility." (Loud cheers from the Opposition benches.) As the right hon. gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not present, I shall not advert to his course of conduct further than to say that I believe he has always acted as other West India proprietors acted upon this point; but as to the right hon. gentleman the late President of the Board of Trade, he must allow me to bring to his recollection the part which he took in the debates in 1833. He said, "You raise a great cry about the distinctions between cotton and tobacco cultivation, and the cultivation of sugar. I don't mean to say that there is no difference between the hardship of cultivating cotton and tobacco on the one hand and sugar on the other hand; but it is not so great as you may think. In some damp marshy soils the cultivation of sugar may be very difficult, but it is not so in other situations. Go, for example, to Barbadoes, and there you will find the slave population engaged in the cultivation of sugar extremely well off." That was what the right hon. gentleman then said upon this point. He said, too, that there were other employments quite as injurious and detrimental to health as that pursued by the slaves, and he referred particularly to "grinding," saying, "See how grinding injures the sight and shortens life." He went on to say that he thought the system had originated with the West India Legislature.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Really I never said anything of the sort. You are not quoting me at all correctly.

Mr. MACAULAY: What, not about the grinding?

Mr. GLADSTONE: Yes, about the grinding, but nothing more.

Mr. MACAULAY continued, I at once admit the right hon. gentleman's denial: I will let that pass. Now, I must say that I am forced to look for some common principle that shall explain the meaning of these gentlemen going all round the compass in this manner; one time assuming one ground, and at another time another; and I do find that there is one principle common to all, and that that is a great desire to protect the West India interest. (Cheers from the Opposition benches.) At one time they are for protecting slave-labour sugar against free-labour sugar, at another time free-labour sugar is the only sugar that is to be admitted at all. When I see gentlemen moving from one side to the other in this way, what am I to understand?—what can I do but see, if amid all these changes there be any one point to which they universally adhere? I have so looked, and I perceive that one point governs all their actions, to one principle, regardless of consequences, they ever point, and that is—protection to the West India interest. (Cheers from the Opposition benches.) These are my views on this subject, and I do hope that I have at least succeeded in acquitting myself of the charge of inconsistency, or of insensibility to the evils of the slave trade, in the vote which I am about to give; my conduct I can perfectly reconcile with my conscience, and I must say that I shall be much surprised if the right hon. baronet or the Government can readily reconcile their present conduct with their past actions, and convince the House of their consistency. (Cheers.)

NATURE'S PROVISION AGAINST SCARCITY.—Does any mystery of nature conceal the fact, that different countries have been created under such circumstances as make it practically impossible that a partial favour in the harvests of one should not be remediable by communication with the others, if man, in the wisdom of his absurdity, could be persuaded not to stand by to prevent? And is it not plain that the suffering to one country would be balanced by a correspondent profit to the other? And thus, as nature presented the cup of suffering and of profit to each by turns, the movement of the great machine would be kept up with the least practicable aggregate of human evil.—Colonel T. P. Thompson.

THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURER OF IRELAND.—The condition of the agricultural labourer of Ireland is thus summed up by the commission appointed to inquire into the Tenure of Land in Ireland, whose report has just been published:—"The agricultural labourer of Ireland continues to suffer the greatest privations and hardships—he continues to depend upon casual and precarious employment for subsistence—he is still badly housed, badly fed, badly clothed, badly paid for his labour. Our personal experience and observations during our inquiry have afforded us a melancholy confirmation of these statements; and we cannot forbear expressing our strong sense of the patient endurance which the labouring classes have generally exhibited under sufferings greater, we believe, than the people of any other country in Europe have to sustain." And so vividly does this misery appear to have presented itself to the commissioners, that in another part of their report it is spoken of in language equally forcible—language that shows that the aspect of it had made a deep impression on their feelings. "It would be impossible," they say, "to describe adequately the privations which the cottiers and their families habitually and patiently endure. It will be seen from the evidence, that in many districts their only food is the potato, their only beverage water, that their cabins are seldom a protection against the weather, that a bed or a blanket is a rare luxury, and that nearly in all their pigs and manure heap constitute their only property."

Silk milliners, the manufacture of Malta, are now imported into this country on payment of 5 per cent. duty ad valorem.

ADVANCE OF WAGES.—It is gratifying to learn, as another proof that the manufacturers do not withhold from those in their employment the benefit of an improved demand for their goods, that the nail-makers of Dudley have agreed to advance wages ten per cent., and that a similar advance has been agreed upon at Bromsgrove. There is still an impression that the price of iron will be advanced.

Morning Advertiser.
THE BRITISH PLATE GLASS COMPANY.—The liberal and comprehensive plans of Sir Robert Peel, so far as the recognition of Free-Trade principles is concerned, are already about to be brought into practical operation in this neighbourhood. Owing, in a great measure, to the restrictive and vexatious duties levied on glass, the above company relinquished business about two years ago, it being found impossible to carry on the manufacture without loss to the shareholders; and their extensive works have up to the present time been at a standstill. Since, however, the announcement of the Premier's plan of commercial reform, it has, we understand, been determined to bring the works once more into operation; the effect of which will be to give employment and bread to hundreds of families in the neighbourhood. Independently of the demand which the home trade will create in a material which is susceptible of application to almost every conceivable purpose of use or ornament, our manufactures, released from the restrictions which pressed so heavily upon the trade, will be able to enter into successful competition with our continental neighbours, and regain those markets abroad from which they were all but excluded by the policy or impolicy of our rulers.—Birmingham Journal.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXII.

TO THOMAS MILNER GIBSON, ESQ., M.P.

SIR,—There are many who, like myself, have watched your public career with the liveliest interest. A rare openness to conviction, in spite of early associations or party connexions, and a frankness of bearing and expression, not less rare, soon fixed upon you the observance of those who desiderate in political life a purer and loftier tone of morals than is generally to be found. You have borne alike gracefully, first, the punishment which corruption awarded to your sincerity, and then its reward in the selection which identifies you with the constituency of the manufacturing metropolis of the empire. And not from that constituency alone, but from all the industrial classes throughout the country, have you earned a feeling of deep and lasting gratitude, for your uncompromising advocacy of Free-Trade principles in their general application; and for your late able and lucid application of them, in your motion of Monday last, to the differential duties on sugar. The debate which you originated, and in which Lord Howick and Messrs. Villiers, Cobden, and Bright so well supported you, is by no means one of the least impressive disquisitions on monopoly that has been submitted to public attention.

On Free-Trade questions the Times newspaper starts with the hare and runs with the hounds. Its acuteness anticipated at once the effect which its report would produce. No time was to be lost. Accordingly, its leading article on Tuesday morning is directed to the purpose of abating whatever influence in favour of Free-Trade principles, as applied to the importation of sugar, might have been produced by the discussion, on the preceding evening, in the House of Commons. Its path is as crooked as yours is straightforward. My design is to inquire into the character of the means employed for the accomplishment of its purpose. To what its columns have contained in favour of Free Trade on other occasions I shall not advert: I raise no question about its consistency; I shall cite no former articles. All I intend will be effected, if I induce its readers to analyze the reasonings therein advanced; although it will be no cause of regret should this mental exercise lead to a similar mode of dealing with other lucubrations of the leading journal.

The article begins by suggesting the association of impertinence, or irrelevance, with your proposition. It is said to have "no especial bearing whatever on the details of the new Ministerial settlement of the duties on sugar;" but to be "aimed as much against a differential duty of 6d. as of 10s. or 15s."

The last clause is true; but the truth of fact is adduced to support a fallacy in logic. The fact is, that the motion had no exclusive bearing against high duties; but the hearing may be "especial" when it is not exclusive; it becomes especial by the very fact that the duties are high which the general principle is introduced to avert. Exactly in the degree in which protecting duties are onerous on the consumer, does the application of the general principle of Free Trade become special. It is antagonistic to all; but especially to those which are very oppressive and injurious. The first sentence is a sophism; and a sophism tending to excite a prejudice. It aims at making the would-be knowing ones shake their heads, and say, "Ay, all an abstract impertinence; not business-like; nothing to do with these particular duties;" when, in truth, the proposition had more to do with these than with any other duties on sugar proposed of late, simply because they are the grossest violation of the principle which it asserts.

I proceed to the next clause of the article:—

"He (Mr. M. Gibson) belongs to a school of statesmen who legislate by general principles and mathematical certainties. In their minds the axiom that if equals are added to unequals, the wholes are unequal, is not more certain and universal in its application than the doctrine that a differential duty is so much money gained by a certain producer at the expense of a certain consumer."

Here is an attempt to mystify between the certainty of an operation on the mass, and its uncertainty as to particular individuals. The extra three halfpence of the poor needlewoman, for her half pound of sugar, cannot be traced and identified, with police accuracy, through their passage from her fingers to the pocket of the great West India proprietor. It is uncertain that the very coppers ever reach that destination. Nor can their change, by accumulation with others, into silver, gold, notes, bills, be put in evidence. And so, because the toll-worn wretch looks bewildered at the question, "My dear, did you ever give any halfpence to Mr. Gladstone?" and because Mr. Gladstone declares, on his honour, he never took her coppers, the Times would have us infer that there is no certainty about the payments of the one and the receipts of the other being enhanced by the operation of the duties. This, too, is a sophism. The next sentence proves the writer to be perfectly aware of its being so. Instead of showing that the loss to consumers, and the gain to producers, were in themselves, uncertain, he proceeds as follows, upon this very repudiated assumption of their reality:—

"If it be shown that the consumer enjoys some compensation for that loss, and, on the other hand, the producer is only repaid for certain peculiar burdens and difficulties, these reasons treat such considerations merely as they would so much contingent matter—a slight friction at the axle, a grain of dust in the balance. As long as they are expounding their theory they make a wonderful parade of certainty and exactitude; but when, in the order of things, or rather in the course of talk, they come to the facts of the case, they relapse into a popular gossiping style, as if vested interests, national engagements, ancient ties, and such incidental circumstances, were really beneath the notice of a philosopher."

The "uncertainty" is here altogether dropped. It has done its work. It has been fired off, and lodged in some thick head; and there let it rest. The writer flies off to a matter wholly irrelevant so far as the "exactitude" of politico-economical doctrines is concerned. A third charge springs up, viz.: that the proposition disregards certain things for which the British sugar-buyer ought to pay, and the West India sugar-grower to receive, compensation.

What in the world has this to do with the fact that differential duties tax the consumers, unless it be to prove that fact in the teeth of the writer's sarcasm on its certainty? The "compensation" and the "burdens" are entirely independent and irrelevant. Let us suppose the glories of negro emancipation and colonial empire to be so great to farm labourers, handloom weavers, and distressed needlewomen, that they ought to subscribe towards paying the planters for their help in realizing those glories; and let us also suppose that "the peculiar burdens and difficulties" of those planters are so severe that even pauperism should contribute towards their mitigation; still the question remains, how this affects the certainty of the doctrine of differential duties; and also, how, whether that certainty be affected or not, such duties should be the best mode of collecting the contributions of beggars for the suffering proprietary. Is there not more than "a slight friction at the axle" of the argument? Who objects to inquiring into the "peculiar burdens and difficulties" of the West Indians? Who objects to consider the question of the money payment for negro emancipation? The propriety of such consideration impeaches the doctrine of Adam Smith just as much as it impeaches the doctrine of Euclid. They are plainly, what the economists are accused of taking them to be, "so much contingent matter." Having first objected to the motion as wholly irrelevant, the writer now objects to it as exclusively relevant. The common character of both objections is, that they are so expressed as to stimulate dislike and prejudice.

When the Times catches "a popular gossiping style" in narratives of sugar-making and such things, and even the appearance of "certainty and exactitude" in "expounding a theory," it will be singularly consistent in sneering at those who do not so reverse the common custom of language, and the fitness of procedure. Always to state your theories loosely and in a "gossiping style," and always to "make a wonderful parade of certainty and exactitude" in telling how Sambo and his overseer got on at melting time, are new canons of composition, whether for parliamentary speeches or leading articles. "Vested interests, national engagements, ancient ties," &c. &c., all apropos to a sugar-tax for the advantage of the planter, are specimens of a very old style, and of one which has often attracted "the notice of a philosopher" from the time that Socrates exposed the logomachies of the Athenian sophists.

Without pursuing the rest of this article so minutely, the following sentences afford a specimen both of the correctness and congruousness of its assertions:—

"Whatever the character of the West Indians fifty or a hundred years since, they have for these twenty or thirty years at least been the most universal and remarkable types of ruin and distress. And as for their management, we believe they have of late improved as much on their own former practice, and on the rest of the world, as our own manufacturers of every class at home."

The nine lives of a cat are nothing to the vitality of West India solvency, which is thus capable of ruin once a year for a quarter of a century. And this continuous ruin has not been averted nor mitigated by the protective system, which is nevertheless to be enforced at the expense of the people of this country for its prevention in future. Nor have the twenty or thirty rubations interfered with spirited improvements comparable to those of "our own manufacturers of every class at home." Nor can there be a doubt of the future success of this improvement and protection after their signal and total failure, in leaving only "the most universal and remarkable types of ruin and distress." Such are the contradictions which, by a sort of steam pressure, the Times has contrived to condense into a couple of sentences.

While the Times supports monopoly by rating free labour at twice the expense of slave labour, the Morning Herald supports monopoly by rating free labour as less expensive than slave labour in the proportion of three to five. Yet they both come to the same conclusion. Both agree in taxing the people's sugar here, and making war upon the wages of the free black labourers in the colonies. Notwithstanding all the cant that is abroad, it is plain the English people and the emancipated negroes are in the same boat. Monopoly would plunder us in the cost of sugar, and them in the wages of labour. Even abolitionists join a struggle whose watchword should be, "Up with sugar, and down with the blacks."

The effort you have made, the abuse you have braved, and the services you have rendered by extricating this question from the entanglement of mere party tactics, and anticipating in the luminous discussion of Monday the mystifications of Wednesday, will not be unappreciated or forgotten.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

FREE TRADE — MEETING OF LADIES — ISLINGTON.

A crowded and most respectably composed meeting of ladies, resident in Islington, was held on Tuesday in the large room of Canonbury-house, for the purpose of hearing an address from Mr. George Thompson, the eloquent advocate of slave abolition, explanatory of the objects of the Free-Trade Bazaar, to be held in Covent Garden Theatre in the ensuing May. The meeting was almost exclusively one of ladies, and formed a new feature in the Free-Trade agitation.

On the motion of WM. LEAVERS, Esq., the Rev. ISAAC BROWN was called to the chair. The rev. gentleman, in opening the business of the meeting, said that the question which had brought that respectable assemblage together was not a political question, and was, therefore, one in which ladies might take part. In questions of humanity they certainly did feel, and they could not be indifferent to the maintenance of any laws which subjected vast numbers of the people to the sufferings of great distress. It seemed hard that the vast abundance of Providence should be kept from an industrious people for the gain of an unjust and unwise monopoly. No ladies, and especially ladies who were in the habit of visiting the habitations of the poor, could be insensible to the importance of the great cause which they were met to advocate; and they must be convinced that the interests, not only of humanity, but of religion and morals, were involved in it. They could not witness with indifference the vast amount of crime committed and fostered daily for want of bread, without being satisfied that there was something wrong that should be put an end to. He rejoiced, therefore, to see the ladies coming forward to take a part in the subject. Much was due to the Society (the League) that stood forward in opposition to the monopoly that oppressed the people; and he (the rev. chairman) felt assured that the ladies (to whose valuable exertions in the cause of human improvement so much was due) would not, on the present important occasion, be deficient in their exertions.

Mr. George Thompson then presented himself, and said he was very agreeably surprised to find so large a number of the ladies of the neighbourhood present, for the purpose of advancing the cause in which he had the proud distinction to be engaged; and he took it for granted that they felt an interest in it, or they would not be there. That such an agitation was in progress the great and influential meeting of ladies he then had the honour of addressing was a sure, as it was a most gratifying, indication. And under such auspices, and by such means, abolition must soon come, and their great cause must prosper. It was not his intention to prove, by any arithmetical calculation, the extent to which the community was injured by protection—a protection, he repeated, merely for the benefit of a monopoly in land, and of the West India planters; but he felt called upon to denounce as unfair, and most unjustly oppressive, such a system. He conceived the question to be one most legitimate and proper for such a meeting as that to consider. It was a question not merely of money, but it was a question of mind, a question of morals, a question of religion, a question of truth, a question of justice, and a question of humanity. If, then, they admired with just regard, truth as the foundation of the pillars of the throne of Justice itself, and of the principles that should guide them here below; if, in addition to that, they had benevolent hearts, and could sympathize with those who were the foundations of society—the industrious and productive classes—they would not hesitate to lend their co-operation in carrying out this great cause. Mr. Thompson concluded by drawing attention to the approaching Bazaar, urging his auditory to give it their earnest co-operation. The eloquent gentleman was heard throughout with attention, and evidently made a favourable impression upon the ladies assembled.

A Committee of Ladies, with power to add to their number, was then formed, to add in carrying out the objects of the meeting in the district of Islington: the following are the names already enrolled:—

ANTI-CORN LAW BAZAAR.

MEETING OF THE MANCHESTER COMMITTEE.
A meeting of the committee appointed in Manchester to assist in getting up the approaching Bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre, was held on Tuesday evening, at the Queen's-room of the League, and as the object is to make the contribution here, as far as possible, representative of the different descriptions of manufactures carried on in the town, sub-committees of gentlemen were formed to wait upon the manufacturers. Amongst others, committees were appointed under the names "Calico, Fustian, &c., Committee," "Silk Committee," "Fancy Muslin, Smallwares, &c., Committee," "Glass Committee," "Colico Printers' Committee," and "Book and Artists' Committee."

Mr. GEORGE WILSON, in taking the chair, said the Ladies' Committee had received since the previous week an addition of 150 names, making the total number now on the books, 650. (Applause.) He read a list of the contributors at Nottingham, which included the name of almost every large and respectable house in that town; and he said their correspondent there informed them that the contribution from Nottingham would probably exceed £500. (Applause.) He said that Mr. Robert R. Moore had held a large and influential meeting at Derby, the mayor in the chair; and a numerous and highly respectable committee had been formed there, and were at work. In the Leeds Mercury he found a paragraph stating that the ladies there had met with great encouragement, and that the contributions from that town might be expected to be neither few nor insignificant in value. (Applause.) The publication of the previous week's proceedings had drawn a letter from Mr. Charles Walker, of Rochdale, who quite corroborated him in what he had said of the extremely large contribution likely to be sent from that town. The contribution, that gentleman said, was likely to reach quite £1500; and, if the whole of the goods met with a ready sale, they might realize even a larger amount. (Cheers.)

Mr. Alderman Brooks, Mr. Rostron, Mr. Rawson, Mr. Harvey, Mr. Samuel Lees, Mr. W. Morris, Mr. Sale, Mr. Smith Philip Robinson, Mr. McCall, Mr. Burton, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Standring, Mr. Hall, Mr. McCartney, and others of the numerous gentlemen present took part in an extremely interesting discussion, referring to matters of detail as well as the general working of the committee; and the following is a list of the gentlemen named upon the different sub-committees, (which will doubtless receive an augmentation of names from time to time at subsequent meetings):—

Calico Printers' Committee.—Messrs. W. M. Cartney, S. P. Robinson, J. E. Royle, W. M. Call, W. Bickham, Charles Duffield, and John Hough.

Silk Committee.—Messrs. Benjamin Lyddall, Willis, G. Castree, Abbott, T. B. Potter, D. Proctor, J. Sutcliffe, and Charles Bury.

Fancy Muslins, and Small Wares Committee.—Messrs. Isaac Skimwell, Abraham Lees, T. Britton, E. Hall, Jonathan Rawson, F. A. Fynney, John Harding, and Abraham Ward.

Calico, Fustian, &c., Committee.—Messrs. W. Harvey, John Leadbeater, George Ashworth, John Swallow, Samuel Lees, Thomas Bright, W. Robb, E. Armitage, J. S. Ormerod, T. Woolley, E. W. Watkins, and W. Morris.

Glass Committee.—Messrs. W. Burton, Atherton, W. D. Fullalove, and George Johnson.

Mechanical Committee.—Messrs. J. Nasmyth, James Harvey, S. P. Spencer, John McCall, D. Morris, M. Curtis, Fothergill, Whitworth, and Forsyth.

Book and Fine Arts Committee.—Messrs. James Hall, jun., J. Standring, Benjamin Hampson, J. Stevenson, C. A. Duval, Pett, and Captain Rafter.

After the appointment of the committees, Mr. ROSTRON, speaking of the extent of the canvas about to be entered upon, said he thought there would be contributions enough from Manchester to fill Covent-garden Theatre.

The CHAIRMAN said, in addition to the space in the theatre, which was considerable, there was a yard which could be covered in if desirable. He expected the contributions would be numerous; indeed the opportunity for manufacturers' goods and patent inventions to be exhibited would be one rarely to be met with.

Mr. W. MORRIS suggested that working men should be invited to contribute small articles of their own workmanship.

The committee adjourned till Thursday.

MEETING AT DERBY.

(Abridged from the Derby Reporter.)

On Monday evening, the 17th ult., the Lecture Hall, Derby, was crowded to overflowing by an audience composed of all classes—rich and poor—met for the occasion of receiving a deputation from the League, and pronouncing the Bazaar to be held in Covent-garden Theatre in May. A considerable number of highly respectable families were present. Soon after seven o'clock, his Worship the Mayor, Colonel Thompson, Robert R. Moore, Esq., and other friends of the cause ascended the platform amidst loud applause; and after a short interval his Worship introduced

Mr. MOORE, who delivered an able speech, replete with facts and sound arguments, in support of Free Trade. He urged on the people of Derby to contribute to the approaching Bazaar. Let them place it in the power of Mr. Strutt and Lord Duncannon to invite their Parliamentary friends to see the Derby stall, that they might the better understand the capacity and character of the town they represent. Let them put it in the power of the Parliamentary friends of Free Trade to appeal to their stall, and ask their opponents if such manufactures as these can want protection? And have not the men who can produce such goods a right to earn, by the production of their industry, as much of the food of the world as it is their industry to produce? (Cheers.) Let them remember that this Bazaar would be visited by almost every foreigner in London. It would be advertised in the continental papers, and it would serve to show foreign nations what they lose by prohibiting the entrance of such goods into their markets. Every manufacturing town and village in the country would be represented there; it would be a strong representation of the earnestness of the people in demanding a repeal of the laws that stifle them of food. It would show the position and the influence of the League. Mr. Moore concluded with an eloquent appeal to the ladies to assist in this glorious undertaking, the celebration of whose triumph was not far distant, and re-announced his seat amidst reiterated plaudits.

[It is right to state here that the silk-manufacturers of Derby were the only silk-manufacturers in the kingdom who approved of and supported the Government in their measures for abolishing the prohibitive duties on silk.] The Mayor then introduced Colonel Thompson, who was received with plaudits. The gallant Colonel adverted to his recent travels in Germany and Sardinia; stated the great progress which was there making in social comfort and improved commerce; and contrasted the comfortable, happy, and healthy appearance of the peasantry there with the pride of our native land."

The Rev. NOAH JONES moved, and Mr. Alderman Paterson seconded, a vote of thanks to the League, and to the gentlemen forming the deputation on the present occasion; which was carried by acclamation.

Mr. Mooker returned thanks, and concluded by proposing "His Worship the Mayor and Free Trade," which was vociferously responded to by the whole meeting.

The Mayor acknowledged the vote. Towards the close of the proceedings, about thirty ladies sent in their names as members of the General Committee, and the Mayor announced that Mr. Fritche had handed him in a subscription of £1 to the League, and £1 to the Bazaar Fund.

FREE-TRADE DINNER AT WAKEFIELD.

On the 19th ult. the Free-Traders of the Wakefield polling district dined together, at Wainwright's Hotel, to celebrate the triumphant conclusion of their labours in making 40s. freehold qualification. James Mickleshaite, Esq., Chairman of the Anti-Corn-Law Committee, presided, and Mr. Israel Burrows, of Horbury, and Mr. J. Boston, of Wakefield, were vice-chairmen. Upwards of ninety gentlemen sat down to dinner, which Mr. Wainwright provided in the most liberal manner. The following toasts, amongst others, were given on the occasion:—

"Freedom of Commerce all over the world." "The Earl of Radnor, and other noble supporters in the House of Lords." "The Hon. E. P. Villiers, and the other Free-Trade Members in the House of Commons." "Messrs. Cobden and Bright, and the other Members of the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League." "A speedy retirement into private life for Wortley and Denison." "The new Free-Trade Freeholders of the Wakefield Polling District of the West Riding, who have so nobly exerted themselves to rescue their country from the thralldom of monopoly."

Messrs. Fearnside, Mitchell, Burrows, Boston, J. Rhodes, jun., Nettleton, and Hammetton, responded to these and other toasts.

Mr. JOHN HARRINGTON, reporter to the York Courier, responded to "The Liberty of the Press," and gave "The Chairman, and thanks for his most efficient conduct in the chair."

The CHAIRMAN returned thanks. It was stated, during the evening, that upwards of £5000 had passed through the hands of the committee for the purchase of property; and 1200 qualifications had been made by one solicitor, in Manchester. There can be no doubt that the important West Riding is sure to return two Free-Traders to Parliament after the next registration.

TAXATION ON PROPERTY—FREEDOM TO INDUSTRY.

LIVERPOOL ANTI-MONOPOLY ASSOCIATION.

Just before going to press, we received the Liverpool Mercury, containing a long account of an important meeting held by the Liverpool Anti-Monopoly Association, on Thursday, in the Theatre Royal, "to consider the propriety of protesting against the continuance of venious and unequal taxation, levied, not for the necessities of the country, but for the support of the corn, sugar, timber, and other monopolies."

The doors were announced to be opened at seven o'clock, but long before that hour crowds had assembled in William-square, anxious to obtain admittance—a proof that Free-Trade principles have not retrograded in Liverpool. The boxes and stage were reserved for the members of the association, who were admitted by ticket; the gallery and pit were thrown open to the public generally. At the back of the stage a handsome marine view was exhibited, and over the proscenium a brilliant transparency, with the motto, in large characters, "Taxation on Property—Freedom to Industry."

Long before the proceedings commenced, the house was densely crowded in every part. A number of ladies were seated in the boxes. Shortly after half-past seven o'clock, William Brown, Esq., one of the vice-presidents of the Liverpool Anti-Monopoly Association, and chairman elect for the evening, made his appearance upon the stage, and was greeted with an enthusiastic burst of applause. He was followed by William Rathbone, Esq., who was also vehemently welcomed, the cheers being renewed upon the appearance of George Thompson, Esq. The theatre at this moment presented the most brilliant and lively appearance; thousands of their fellow-townsmen welcomed the champions of Free Trade, and about after about ascended for some time. Surrounding the chairman we observed the following gentlemen, namely:—George Thompson, Esq., William Rathbone, Esq., Richard Shell, Esq., Thos. Blackburn, Esq., Chas. Robertson, Esq., W. Turner, jun., Esq. (of Carnarvon), Charles Holland, Esq., J. T. Croke, Esq., J. B. Cooke, Esq., Samuel Bailey, Esq., William Thorp, Esq., E. Lewin, Esq., Eyre Evans, Esq., Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M. J. Whitty, Esq., A. Higginson, Esq., W. M'Kee, Esq., J. Bradley, Esq., Dr. Mansfield, James Stitt, Esq., Hugo Reid, Esq., Peter Eastwood, Esq., John Mure, Esq., Sigmund Lebn Levi (from Ancona), Thomas Mathér, Esq., R. W. Ronald, Esq., Thos. Blackburn, jun., Esq., Daniel Harrison, Esq., James Mellor, Esq., Samuel Hobson, Esq., Charles Edward Rawlin, Esq., James M'Gee, Esq., Robert Mober, Esq., Dr. MacIntyre, Henry Wood, Esq., Andrew Leighton, Esq., Jas. Hodgson, Esq., John Russell, Esq., Samuel Seward, Esq., John Murray (of the League), J. King, jun., Esq., Samuel Tomkinson, Esq., George Maxwell, Esq., David Lamb, Esq., Richard Johnson, Esq., James Lewin, Esq., George Bradley, Esq.

We regret that want of both time and space prevents us giving or quoting from any of the excellent speeches delivered on the occasion, by Wm. Brown, Esq., chairman; Messrs. Wm. Rathbone, Charles Holland, Charles Robertson, Richard Shell, and George Thompson. Resolutions in accordance with the object of the meeting were unanimously agreed to.

NOTTINGHAM FREE-TRADE TEA PARTY.

Want of space prevented us last week giving more than a brief notice of the interesting speeches and proceedings at the annual meeting of the Nottingham Free-Traders, held on Tuesday evening in the Exchange Hall. Colonel Thompson's speech was as graphic and racy in illustration as his speeches always are. The signs of progress on the Continent, as indicative of a healthier social condition and the precursor of peace, he first dwelt upon, and confirmed his views by what he had witnessed when a traveller there. He then noticed the continental custom-house system:—

"Railways and steam-boats are putting down the passport and custom-house systems on the Continent—they cannot stop for them. (Cheers.) In the dominions of Sardinia, on the Lago Maggiore, the custom-house troops boarded our wherry; their corporal—not a plain man such as you are used to see a custom-house officer, but with a cocked-hat and aiguillette like a field marshal—opened a box at hazard, and put in his hand to sweat by; and when he turned but a young lady's frills, he supported them down with an air of reverence, as if the young lady had been inside. It is clear this man saw nothing serious in his vocation. Sardinia is laying itself out for a place among civilized powers; so, if Sardinians ever find their way to Nottingham, let them have the benefit of it."

The Colonel is but too likely, many will think, to have the following prophecy fulfilled almost to the letter:—

"It is perilous to prophesy, but a man may be allowed to guess. See, then, whether the expiration of the new term for which the income-tax is to be continued—two years; or some day three—an effort is not made to continue the income-tax again on consideration of taking off the malt tax. It will be represented as the simple course of nature, the inevitable return for the boon (such is the miserable phrase) conferred on commerce in the present instance. 'To have diminished an injustice, will be a thing that must be paid for. If the proposal comes, see whether it shall be admitted without removing the Corn Law besides; and perhaps, with that, you might not consider it so bad a bargain.'"

If the monopolists are so blind, when they look at home, as to remain unconscious of the folly and injustice of their pretensions to exclusive advantages at the expense of their neighbours, perhaps, if they look abroad, they may be led to reflect on the character of such pretensions when exhibited by foreigners. The Colonel supplies them with an illustration:—

"See what the great northern organ of our opponents—'Blackwood's Magazine'—in its last number, says of Spain:—'It must truly be a difficult thing to legislate for a country split into so many conflicting interests—fancied interests mainly of them—as Spain is. The Catalonians, for instance, have got a notion that they are cotton-manufacturers (laughter)—a notion which their northern neighbours do all in their power to encourage.'—It is impossible to persuade them, so pig-headed are they (laughter), that it would be better to limit foreign manufactures at a far duty, than to have their markets deluged with smuggled ones that pay no duty at all. 'To these miserable manufacturers (says the author under review), only capable of producing about one-half of what is required for the consumption of the kingdom (and that half, be it observed, of inferior quality, and at vastly higher prices than the same merchandise could be imported for), is the interest of the landed proprietors and commercial class, as well as that of the entire community sacrificed.'—'These manufacturing madmen, the Catalonians (laughter), are the plague-spot of the Peninsula (Bursts of laughter). Observe, they, and selfishly, they only think of themselves, and of what they consider their interests, petty and miserable as the latter are compared to those of the rest of Spain (Excessive laughter). The real interests of the country are obvious to any but prejudiced understandings. It is a land flowing with milk and honey, or, what is far better, with wine and oil; abounding in valuable products, of which the export might be greatly increased by admitting the manufacture of countries possessing, perhaps, a less favoured soil and climate, but a more industrious population. Instead of making bad calves at a high price, let the Spaniards set to work to clear and plant their dehesas (waters)—let them improve their system of agriculture, their mode of producing oil; let them cut canals and make roads, and get something like decent communications between towns and provinces.' See only what sharp-sighted hawkmen are when it is on their side; and what owls and bats they are when it is on the side of anybody else!"

The Corn Laws are unfortunately of somewhat ancient date, but from their first establishment there were not wanting honest and stout-hearted men to protest against their litigious and oppressive character. Who, that loves justice and hates grasping self-hood, will unite in the wish uttered by the speaker, that a bishop having the spirit of Hugh Latimer would rise up in our days in the presence of royalty, and express such sentiments as the following:—

"The complaint about the Corn Laws was not a new one; close upon 300 years ago 'the Rev. Father Master Hugh Latimer, before our late Sovereign Lord of famous memory, King Edward VI., within the preaching-place in the palace of Westminster,' was harping on the same string in no gentle tones. 'You landlords, you reitainers, I may say you step-lords, you unnatural lords, you for your possessions yearly too much. Priers are so enhanced that I think verily, if this continue, we shall be constrained to pay for a pence a pound.'—'Thus all the enhancing and raising goeth to your own private commodity and wealth. So that were we have a single to much, you have that; and since the same ye have enhanced the rents, and so have increased another too much; so now ye have double too much, which is too much. (Laughter and cheers.) What would the proverb have said, if, besides all this, they had made a law to raise their rents by act of Parliament? At that same bishop in these days would speak out thus in the preaching-place in the palace, instead of raising gown and surplice question, 'black, white, and grey!' (Laughter.) He saw they knew the rest."

We have not space to notice Mr. Moore's speech at the meeting; but the Nottingham Mercury, from which we have made the foregoing extracts, speaking of it, says that it was "one of the most eloquent, forcible, and convincing speeches ever delivered in this town, on the fatal effects of monopoly."

VENEZUELA SUGAR.—A return has just been presented to the House of Commons, stating the quantity of sugar which has been admitted for home consumption under the 7th and 8th Vic., c. 28, at the rate of 31s. per cwt., and 6 per cent., between the 5th of July, 1811, and the latest period to which it could be made up. It appears that the total amount is 11 cwt. 2 qrs. 3 lbs. of sugar, all of which is the produce of Venezuela.

THE BAKED MONOPOLY.—This bread monopoly, with its alleged principle and rationale of independence of foreigners, is an enemy to civilization. It would, if it could, stop the world from growing. It seeks to hedge in and pare down this nation's wealth, population, power, and greatness, to the measure of the food-producing resources of the acres of this small island; it bids out, as far as we are concerned, fruitful fields and profitable herds to beyond the sea, as effectually as an earthquake would do it; it would smite whole tracts of the earth with the curse of perpetual barrenness, and enslave the whole of the world to a few nations.—P. Harwood.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

Hampstead-road, Feb. 27.

SIR.—I have read in your last paper the paragraph from the Tyne Mercury respecting contributions to the Bazaar. I beg to say, that I have prevailed upon a friend of mine, who, by the way, needed not much persuasion, to contribute agricultural machinery, of which he is an eminent manufacturer, to the value of £20.

Yours, truly,
J. G.

THE BAZAAR.

DOVER.—A correspondent writing to the Dover Chronicle urges the claims of the League, and especially with reference to the intended Bazaar. He says: "If some of our active spirits will but start the matter, I am convinced that they will be liberally countenanced; for the people of Dover surely cannot be content to be merely idle spectators of a struggle affecting the welfare of so large a portion of their fellow-men."

HULL.—We call upon our Free-Trade friends to bestir themselves in aid of the League Bazaar. Sir William Lowthrop has kindly set apart a room in his house for the temporary reception of Bazaar articles intended to be forwarded from Hull to London. All persons, therefore, having donations of articles to send can forward them to Sir William's residence in George-street, in this town. The most useful, as well as the most curious, articles will be accepted. One contributor is preparing to send fine linen shirts; another, a collection of views of the navy, drawn and coloured by a Hull artist; a third, some valuable prints; a fourth, slippers, and so on. Articles associated with the lives of Marvel, Wilberforce, and other distinguished men of Hull, would impart a character to donations from the town. Let all who can, contribute something for the honour of the place, and out of devotion to the cause.—Hull Advertiser.

LEEDS.—We have every reason to believe that the contributions from Leeds to this undertaking will be neither few nor insignificant, and are informed that the ladies of the committee have met with considerable encouragement in the course of their labours. We are not aware whether any steps have been taken to ensure the collection of a complete exhibition of our local manufactures, as we observed the Free-Traders of Sheffield, Leicester, and other towns intend doing; but we trust and believe that the gentlemen of this town and neighbourhood, who are able and willing to further the cause, will not be behindhand in seconding the praiseworthy industry of the ladies. A notice will be found in our advertising columns requesting that all articles may be sent as soon as convenient, to the treasurer or secretary of the committee.—Leeds Mercury.

SHEFFIELD.—We are glad to learn not only that additions have been made to the number of the zealous and respectable ladies who as a committee are making, and canvassing for, articles for the ensuing grand exhibition in Covent-garden Theatre, but that several valuable contributions are promised, and now being got up, in specimens of our staple trade from many of our manufacturers. This is as it should be. The aim of the League being to extend commerce and manufactures, it is entitled to the best support of the whole producing community.—Sheffield Iris.

GLIMMOROUGH.—A correspondent of the Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle says:—"I happen to have a small piece of oak post me, which formed part of the planking of the Royal George, that was sunk in 1782, when Kempenfeldt went down."

With three three hundred men. Were this formed into handles for little seal stamps, or into some such nick-nackery, do you think it would be rare enough to make it sufficiently attractive as an object of sale at the Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar? and, if so, do you know any neat-handed patriotic cabinet-maker, who would undertake the fashioning of it into such articles? If so, the writer will have great pleasure in forwarding it to your office, to be disposed of as you may think fit."

A contemporary last week announced the death of the Hull Free-Trade Association. He will very soon have an opportunity of recording its joyous and triumphant resurrection—a miracle never likely to happen in the case of the Yorkshire Protection Society. Preparations for a grand public meeting are on foot, and our friends may hold themselves in readiness for a movement which shall materially affect the future prospects of the Tories in the East Riding.—Hull Advertiser.

PORTS OF HULL AND BRISTOL.—The number of vessels entered into the ports of Hull and Bristol, during the year 1811, exhibits an increase of six vessels, with 1914 tonnage. The clearances outwards show a larger increase, Bristol and Hull despatching 13 vessels more in 1811 than 1810, with an increase of 3755 tonnage. The East India trade has thus exhibited a much more active appearance than during the previous year.—Hull Packet.

Nations, like men, will come to years of discretion in time; and till they do, they must suffer.—Colonel T. P. Thompson.

CHEAP TRIP TO LONDON.—The Committee of the Great National Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar intend to make arrangements with all the lines leading to London, for cheap trips, during the month of May next.

GOLDAR.—We heard it remarked during the week by an old Goldar manufacturer, that the people in this village were never better off since he knew it than they are at present, and this improvement he attributes to the great quantity of low priced goods which are made there for the Huddersfield market. Although wages are low, corn is proportionably cheap, and the great bulk of the operatives live in comparative happiness from what they did a few years since.—Leeds Mercury.

MANUFACTURING ACTIVITY.—FRUIT OF PLUNTY.—On the eastern bank of the Pontypool line of the Monmouthshire Canal, within six miles of the town of Newport, a new iron work has sprung up, as if by magic, and is just commencing active operations. It consists of one blast furnace, with all requisite conveniences.

HAWICK.—The manufacturers in this thriving town are in constant and full employment. Wages are good, and, with cheap provisions, our mill-workers are well off. It is understood that some of the manufacturers have pledged themselves to give constant work with no diminution of wages during the current year.—Perthshire Courier.

TRADE OF LANCAIRE.—In the month of December, 1841, there were 139 mills in the county of Lancaster working what is called short time; there were, likewise, an equal number entirely stopped in consequence of the badness of trade. This stagnation was equal to about 4071 horse power, and 20,115 operatives unemployed. What is the contrast now? All the factories in the country capable of being worked are employed; and, notwithstanding the prodigious improvement in machinery, the labour of the mill operatives is in good demand at wages averaging from 15 to 20 per cent. advance from the lowest point. Manufactories are being enlarged in Manchester, Stockport, Ashton, Oldham, Rochdale, Blackburn, &c.; and it is confidently anticipated that within a year and a half the productive power in the weaving department will be increased by nine or ten thousand looms. —Liverpool Chronicle.

WHEAT AND WHEAT FLOUR, &c.—An account of all wheat and wheat flour imported into the United Kingdom in the years ending the 5th of January, 1843, to 1845 inclusive, and also of the quantities entered for home consumption during the same period, was obtained a few evenings since on the motion of Mr. J. Trotter, M.P. for West Surrey. We find, on inspecting the return before us, that the gross total quantity of wheat and wheat flour imported was, in 1841-42, 2,770,647 quarters; of which 2,511,628 were foreign, and 259,019 quarters colonial produce: in 1842-43, 3,040,269 quarters; of which 2,810,726 quarters were foreign, and 229,543 quarters colonial produce: in 1843-44, 1,064,912 quarters, of which 616,638 were foreign, and 448,274 quarters colonial produce: and in 1844-45, 1,341,977 quarters, of which 1,145,086 were foreign, and 196,891 quarters colonial produce. The total quantity of wheat and wheat flour which has been imported (certified as the produce of Canada, under the act 6 and 7 Vic., c. 29) since the 10th of October, 1843, amounts to 383,899 quarters. The total quantities retained for our home consumption amounted in 1841-42, to 2,619,702 quarters; in 1842-43, to 2,977,302 quarters; in 1843-44, to 982,287 quarters; and in 1844-45, to 1,080,976 quarters.

AGRICULTURE.

IT'S A QUESTION OF RENT!

It has been the habit of such wolves in sheep's clothing as Mr. Robert Baker and his fellow land-agents, who act the part of tenant-farmers at protectionist meetings, to asseverate that rent forms so minute a portion of the cost of production that the abandonment of all their rent on the part of the landlords would form no compensation to the tenants for the loss of "protection." It is true that this is a gross and most transparent fallacy; yet so is it true that, to those who know practically the class of tenant-farmers, Messrs. Baker and Co. appear about as like to tenant-farmers as the peasants and village lasses of a ballet or an opera are to the real rural labourers of England. They do, in fact, what Punch, in fun, offers to do: they supply "a contented tenantry" at so much per head for show occasions. But instead of being paid by the job, as are the theatrical peasants, these men are paid by the hope of patronage, to come in the shape of stewardships, valuations of estates, valuing in and out tenants, and auctions of farming stock. And still a large class of farmers silently permit these men to talk and splutter bad English and worse logic in the names of the tenantry of the kingdom, and allow themselves to be led blindfold into the landlord trap of "protection."

And this does not happen because there are no men amongst the tenant-farmers capable of discerning such fallacies and exposing such mummery, for there are hundreds of farmers in every county, shrewd, thinking men, who regard all these with supreme contempt. But they are in great measure employed upon their own farms; they do not meet and compare notes as men in trades do. At fairs and markets they are too busy with the actual business of the day to discuss aught but the present prices of cattle or corn. Hence somewhat of narrowness is found in the views of all but the more educated of the tenant-farmers. We suspect, however, that farmers' clubs are gradually effecting a remedy for this evil. Although some of the promoters of these clubs are most anxious to exclude all topics which may touch upon farmers' grievances, under the pretence that such subjects are political, and love to disport themselves in experimental agriculture and chemical lectures, still at these clubs farmers soon go up to the limits assigned for their inquiries, and learn to look over the boundary line at the prescribed topics. There, they perceive, lie all the questions which really and seriously affect their condition. It requires no prophet to foretell that these imaginary boundaries will soon be passed; that the hobgoblin of politics, which like a nursery tale is used to scare them, won't long keep the farmers' clubs from adopting as constant themes questions of rents and tenures.

Let us illustrate this by an incident which came under our own observation a few days since. A gentleman—an avowed protectionist—who is the leading member of a farmers' club, was descending of the necessity of using artificial manures, of appointing a chemist to the club to analyze guano and so forth, when it was observed that, looking at the slovenly state of the farming in the locality,—the undrained land, the uncoursed ditches, the high, rude, neglected hedgerows, the abundance of timber, and the superabundance of game,—it would be mere waste of time and money to buy or analyze guano, &c., until, by the removal of all the above evils, the first and most obvious steps towards good farming had been taken. He admitted the force of the objection, but said, "All that must be removed by the landlords; the farmers can't correct these things without leases, and we can't entertain such questions in the club because they are political." All present at once acceded to the response naturally made, "Of what use, then, is your farmers' club?" But can it be supposed that farmers, having proceeded so far upon the inquiry as to the means of agricultural improvement, will be thus stopped from examining the most important questions which lie at the very beginning? The notion is absurd. Again, at protection meetings, which are avowedly political, farmers are precluded from bringing forward the real evils from which they require protection, lest there should be signs of disunion between the landlords and tenants? Witness the reception Mr. Wood met with at the Brighton monopolist meeting, when he hinted at the actual condition of the agricultural labourer whom the Duke of Richmond and his toadies so ostentatiously toasted. In the agricultural and provincial journals, however, the subject of rent is beginning to be canvassed by farmers with more reality and purpose. For instance, the Mark-lane Express contains every week some very sharp complaints of the mischief done by game, and of the want of secure tenures; and of late the question of corn-rents, and the effect and incidence of rent in general, have called forth many useful remarks from practical farmers. A recent number of that paper contains letters from these first-rate farmers, Mr. George Hope, of East Lothian, and Mr. C. H. Lattimore, of Hertfordshire, from the perusal of which farmers may profit much. Now, what do these practical farmers say?

that rent is a matter of small moment to the farmer, but that it is the grand question; that it is the surplus, the margin from which all immediately effective relief to the tenant-farmer must come. And until the abrogation of the Corn Laws that relief must be obtained by means of corn-rents. We give some passages from these valuable letters. Mr. Hope, after alluding to the invitation of the editor of the Mark-lane Express to discuss the question of corn-rents, says:—

"Before proceeding to the question of rent, allow me first to express my astonishment at the notorious fact that a large proportion of the soil of England is farmed by tenants at will; that there should exist landlords so blind to their own interest as to let their farms from year to year, and that there are men found willing to occupy them on these terms, is to me alike unaccountable. It is held as an established principle by every agriculturist that I am acquainted with, that a tenant can afford a higher rent, and, at the same time, make more money himself, during the currency of a twenty years' lease, than if he continues liable to be dismissed at six months' notice, taking it for granted that his lease is a fair one, and unencumbered with absurd restrictions, and that he possesses skill and ample capital for the stocking and improving of his farm."

The truth is that the state of the relations between farm-tenants and landlords in England is such as would be incredible, were it not proved by daily-occurring evidence, and which is, in fact, almost incredible to all who have not some practical acquaintance with English agriculture: that a body of industrious capitalists should submit to live year after year under engagements which the slightest reference to the experience of the last thirty years would show them can only be performed in years of scarcity; that they should place their capital, and often their very means of subsistence, at the absolute disposal of other men,—and men as a class the most ignorant and prejudiced in the community, the landowners,—by farming under yearly holdings; and that they should render any chance of substantial profit impossible by submitting to restrictions on cultivation which preclude good farming. We lately heard a landowner, possessing very large estates, say, in a tone of exultation, that he "had only two jobbing farmers on his estate," meaning by the term "jobbing farmers" those who buy and feed for the butcher much stock! Yet this gentleman admitted that these "jobbing farmers" were the only men of capital, and the only men making money, on the estate. Moreover, he is a most estimable person, who wishes to be, and believes himself to be, a good landlord. The error lies in considering the relation of landlord and tenant to be that of feudal chief and feudal vassal, instead of a trading contract between a capitalist whose business is to till the soil, and the owner of that soil who has not the skill, the means, or the inclination to cultivate it with profit to himself. Favour and forbearance there ought to be none, and there should be no room for any as between landlord and tenant. They ought both to consider like reasonable men the terms of their contract and the capacity of each for fulfilling it before they make it; but having made it, it should be a fact accomplished, not an engagement to be kept or abandoned according to the accidents of a season, or the mere will of the stronger party. But to return to Mr. Hope's letter. He thus enforces the economy of good farming:—

"And not only so, but it is also for the interest of both parties that a lease should be renewed before its expiration, as now-a-days it is impossible to farm profitably without the land be both put into and maintained in the highest order, which cannot be unless the tenant himself invest considerable capital; and it is much more economical to keep land in high condition, than to have again to make it so. Farmers should treat their land as they do their horses—feed them high and work them well, but always have them fit for any work."

It is not that leases will alone secure good farming, that must depend upon the tenants' capacity for advancing their own interests, but good farming cannot exist without leases. Mr. Hope says:—

"I do not say that a fixed tenure will ensure good farming; but I am certain it can rarely be found without it. No landlord can expect his estate to improve under the management of an individual whom he can remove for the slightest whim. For the landlord's interest the tenant must be a free man. And it is right that it should be so: it is most degrading that any man should be compelled to study the every wish, or to use the political or religious spectacles of another. If the proprietor clings to the system I condemn, let him be content with the small and ill-paid rents which he has hitherto got, only through the odious monopoly of the food of a great people, and which will scarcely be longer tolerated."

In some sense there may be some truth in the assertion of the monopolist landowners, that if the trade in corn were free, some land would go out of cultivation; and it is in this sense, and this sense only, that where estates are let only from year to year, where game abounds, and where unwise or vexatious restrictions on cultivation exist, farmers would not be found to occupy them were prices steady and moderate. But the remedy for this is in the landlord's own hands, for he has only to enter into fair engagements with his tenants so that they may become "free men," and he will in the end get more than by the present system. The condition of the Scotch farmers proves this to demonstration. Mr. Hope says:—

"Why, with present prices, there is not a whisper of distress amongst the farmers, as a body, in the Lothians of Scotland, while the rents are as high, and the money wages expended annually per acre perhaps more than in any other quarter of the kingdom. It will not do to say that here the land is good, for a great proportion of it is naturally very inferior. Not fifty years ago, nearly one-fourth of this farm was uncultivated, and not worth 2s. 6d. per acre, and not above another fourth was ever reckoned good land; now, the crops produced are equally good over the whole. Every acre has been thoroughly drained with tiles, at least 300 miles have been made within the last ten years, while large sums are annually expended in the purchase of bones, rape-cakes, guano, besides linseed-cakes for feeding. I do not mention this from any feeling of vanity, because my neighbours do the same, but simply to show what tenants actually do, farming under fair leases, and which would be madness for men to attempt who are completely under the power of their landlord; as whenever any difference of opinion arises between them, or perhaps from the succession of a new landlord, or a remonstrance about game, the tenant is always the party who suffers. If the tenant himself chooses to leave his farm, the landlord is in no worse situation; but it is a very different thing if the tenant is summarily dismissed, after having spent his last shilling in improving his farm, or having his rent raised to the full value of his own improvements, if men so rash as to do all this are really to be found."

Farmers of England, is not this true to the letter? Are you not constantly living under this unpleasant and unprofitable condition? Scarcely a day passes in which some account does not ooze out to show how the yearly tenant—or, perhaps, his widow and family—are victimised by a capricious, tyrannical, or avaricious landlord. Then, besides a lease, the tenant, whilst the Corn Law lasts, can only be safe by means of a corn rent. Mr. Hope puts the matter thus:—

"It is only as far as possible to protect the tenant from this fluctuation caused by fiscal regulations that I advocate the system of corn rents. Not very long ago, most landlords, and many farmers too, imagined that it was impossible to grow or sell wheat in this country under 80s. per quarter; latterly, from 55s. to 60s. per quarter has been the price expected to be realized. Now, were every tenant paying a money rent to ask himself the price he fixed in his own mind as likely to be obtained for his produce, and compare it with what he has on the average received, it will not require much argument to convince him of the value of a corn rent. True, too much grain, as well as too much money, may be paid, but RENTS ARE ALMOST ALWAYS CALCULATED AT THE MAXIMUM PRICE EVER LIKELY TO BE OBTAINED. If the landlord, in asking a rent, expects that prices are likely to be higher than the tenant is disposed to allow, the former cannot object to a grain rent. Under the violent fluctuations caused by the Corn Law, I think it the fairest plan for both parties, otherwise either one party or the other is getting the advantage. In the year 1822, the greater part of the landlords in this county met their tenants in the most handsome manner, relieving them from their difficulties by converting the high money rents then paid into so many quarters of wheat, at the rate of from 75s. to 80s. per quarter. Those landlords who did so at once found it for their advantage in the end, as their tenants went on improving their possessions; while those who exhausted the capital of their tenants had their land ultimately returned on their hands deteriorated in value, when smaller rents than ever had to be taken. These leases are generally renewed at an occasional increase in the quantity of wheat paid as rent, but with a maximum of 70s. per quarter, beyond which it does not rise. From my own experience, and as far as I can judge from that of my neighbours, grain rents have been the main cause of the thriving condition of the Scotch farmers, when our English brethren have been suffering so severely. Yes; CORN-LAW RENTS, AT FREE-TRADE PRICES, ARE AT THE BOTTOM OF THE FARMER'S DISTRESS."

Let English farmers test Mr. Hope's statement by referring to their own experience and their own books, and see whether they have not been made the landlords' dupes! Upon the important question of the proportion which rent bears to produce Mr. Hope has this most explicit statement:—

"My experience confirms the views of Mr. Lattimore, and that fully one-half of the saleable produce of an ordinary arable farm (at least in Scotland) goes to the landlord in the shape of rent. The gross produce being worth about three rents, one-third of which is required for seed corn, horse keep, the maintenance of the labourers, and domestic consumption; the other two-thirds being sold, one for the landlord, the other to pay wages, tradesmen's accounts, rates, and profits; it follows as a necessary consequence that grain of every kind could be sold at about one-half of even present rates, allowing all the horses and cattle to be kept as usual, the same wages paid to labourers (say 10s. per week), and leaving the same profit to the farmer, BEFORE THE BROAD MARGIN OF RENT WAS WHOLLY EXHAUSTED."

This is the fact that every farmer should impress on his mind when landlords and land-agents talk about rent bearing a small proportion to the cost of production, the truth being that from one-half to one-third of the whole saleable produce goes for rent. Now, the whole of this ought to be absorbed, and in a natural state of things must be absorbed, before the tenant's profits could be touched. Of the Scotch peasantry Mr. Hope gives this picture:—

"But I cannot be done with 'Philopatris' without rebutting the libel he has penned against the Scotch agriculturists and their labourers: it is true the latter are paid chiefly in kind, but their earnings on an average amount to fully 10s. per week. Is this below or above the rates in England? 'Philopatris' does not say what the actual wages are in Lincolnshire. I admit, too, that oatmeal porridge is their food night and morning, and which from choice I have breakfasted on nearly my whole life, and with good milk there is nothing better or more wholesome. And each labourer has a cow, his own property, which is grazed and kept on the farm, and which is a great assistance to him in bringing up his family. He feeds generally a couple of pigs in a year, which he consumes himself, besides occasionally purchasing a piece of fresh butcher's meat. I would like to see them better paid than they are, for there is not a more respectable class of men in any country. They are being constantly sent to market with grain, which they sell, and get the money for, and bring it home, without the master ever losing a copper. They can read and write, and cast accounts, and are frequently taken, at high wages, to England and Ireland as land-stewards, where they don't disgrace their country. At home they are civil, active, and obliging; going to church or chapel (for many of them are Dissenters) on Sundays with coats of good broad-cloth on their backs, when it takes a practical eye to distinguish them from their masters. What folly, then, to talk of a system producing results like these, 'as branded with selfishness,' 'as destroying all sense of common interest and kind feeling between landlord, tenant, and labourer.' You must look elsewhere than in Scotland for a game-destroying peasantry or that maniacal spirit which, in some other quarters, almost nightly illumines the horizon with the blaze of burning corn-ricks."

Contrast this with the protected farm-labourers of Buckinghamshire, Dorsetshire, Wiltshire, indeed, with a few local exceptions, of England generally. The truth of Mr. Hope's views is confirmed by Mr. Lattimore, not only himself a good practical English farmer, but one who mixes much with farmers, and knows their wants, their sufferings, and grievances as well as any man in the country, and knowing them has the courage and ability to explain their landlord-begotten origin. He commences by showing from statistical authorities the estimated quantities of cultivated and other lands in England and Wales, and says:—

"The rent and tithe charges upon the cultivated land have been calculated at 42 millions per annum, exclusive of rates, which may be roughly estimated at 3s. in the pound; which, upon the rental of 34 millions, amounts to £5,100,000. If we take the capital employed upon the 28,749,000 acres of cultivated lands, at only 45 per acre, it will amount to £143,745,000; a good round sum on which land agents and valuers can rest with security and for the payment of rents (however high in proportion to the price of produce) in addition to the growing crops, and the law of distress. And I doubt this has not much effect upon the receivers of rent, making them very complacent under existing prospects, as a very large portion of that vast sum will be, and probably is already, absorbed by the rent sponge, if all arrears and claims were fairly adjusted before the corn and provision laws are finally settled. This is an interesting question for the farmers and the country at large, for it is impossible that the vast amount of capital annually lost by the farmers under the present system, and consequently by the community, can continue much longer."

And he adds:—

"We come now to the point, what effect will be produced upon the welfare and prospects of the farmers by well-adjusted leases, upon the basis of a corn rent, compared to the current system of fixed money rents. Under the latter system the rents and tithes have been in some cases trebled during the last century, while the price of wheat is now nearly the same: it follows, therefore, that either vast improvements in cultivation must have taken place, or that the rapidly-increased rents, &c., have absorbed all the profits of the cultivators, including a vast amount of capital employed upon the soil. Is there any feasible prospect of an alteration in this matter so long as the present fluctuations are liable to recur, and the law, so vitally important to the farmers, remains in their present precarious position?"

After referring to, and commenting upon, some remarks of a Pro-Corn-Law correspondent of the Express, Mr. Lattimore says:—

"If this is a fair specimen of the feelings of Conservative landlords, the prospect of reduction in fixed money rents is not very encouraging to the farmers, and it also shows the objects these gentlemen had in view when they called upon the farmers to place the present Government in office, and their present motive and expectations in retaining Sir R. Peel in power. How can the farmers reconcile these remarks and passing events with their future welfare, and the interests of their order? Will not a doubt arise in their minds as to those delusive specifics of 'rowing in the same boat,' 'mutual welfare,' 'identity of interest,' &c. &c., so much vaunted of late by their professed Conservative friends, and a thorough conviction obtain of the complete alienation of interest and feeling that exists between the small scale cultivators of the soil and this class of political landlords? This is the result of fixed money rents under the sliding scale. Let us compare the difference under a corn rent. These political landlords are not disposed to lower rents according to prices; that would be inconvenient; how are they then to be made to participate in the fluctuations of prices, which will occur in spite of all their legislation to prevent it, save only by a corn rent? In a natural and perfectly healthy state of things fixed money rents would be feasible; but under an artificial sliding scale, liable to be modified at any time, and, in all probability, to be entirely abolished at the recurrence of the first deficient harvest, there appears to me no method so secure to both parties as a corn rent. By this means these legislators in corn will be amenable for the fulfilment of their bonds, and made to share in its deficiencies. The settlement of this matter will also be productive of the great good derivable from an improved cultivation, which will obtain, whenever the tenant feels assured that he will be permitted to reap the benefit of an enlarged outlay in cultivation, or in the purchase of artificial or other manures. With regard to the only reasonable drawback made to corn rents, viz., 'high prices contingent upon deficient seasons,' limits should be assigned to advancing prices (which may rarely be expected) beyond which the rent should never be calculated."

The following illustration of the operation of a corn rent will go home to the breasts of the struggling tenant-farmers at the present moment:—

"The present price of wheat, 45s., being about twenty per cent. below the 'act-of-Parliament-promised price,' it follows that this difference in the price of wheat, calculated upon a rental of £11,000,000, would amount to £2,800,000. If this sum were left in the pockets of the tenants (as would be the case now under a corn rent), instead of going to the landlords, a reasonable calculation may be made of the great benefits obtainable from the well-directed application of this vast sum in the employment of labour, and in the promotion of improvements."

"And yet persons have been found to assert that rent is but a trifling item in the cost of production, and that, if the whole rental of the kingdom were taken off, corn could not be grown to compete with low prices. This arises from not adequately calculating the proportion in which rent enters into the cost of production, from the capital employed being indiscriminately mixed up with the produce of the soil. For instance, a person having £2000 embarked in trade, and taking stock at the close of the year, would not calculate profit till he had deducted the amount of fixed capital, with interest thereon, allowance for bad debts, &c. How is it that the farmers alone are induced to sink their capital in calculations of this kind? Surely, they are as much entitled to security for their capital as any other class of the community. Now, let them generally calculate their circumstances in the way I have alluded to, viz., first, to make out their fixed capital, then deduct their liabilities for rent, tithes, rates, taxes, &c., and they will then be able to estimate the proportionate amount of cost in production which rent bears upon an average of years, also the balance left to remunerate the labour employed, and the skill of the cultivator."

"The chief difficulty in this calculation arises from the too prevalent error of confounding produce with profit. I am contending for the principle that rent can only fairly be estimated from profit; and that if, regardless of profits, it be taken from produce, then it trenches upon, and must ultimately absorb, the tenant's capital. I believe few intelligent and reflective farmers will wantonly assert that an annual profit of forty to fifty millions sterling from the cultivation of the soil in England and Wales is either a light or trifling matter; and I am persuaded that a careful examination into the bearings of this important question, taking all the circumstances into consideration, will bring them to the conclusion, that at least one half or more of the bona fide saleable produce is absorbed in rent and tithe charges, upon a consecutive average of years."

Comment on this passage is needless. Mr. Latimore thus refers to the way in which the monopolist landowners shirk these questions, observing:

"I regret exceedingly to observe the inattention to this important point manifested by farmers at their public meetings with the landowners, and the too prevalent custom of avoiding any allusion to those grievances under which so large a portion of the British farmers are now groaning, such as high rents, increased tithe charges, ravages by game, want of control over the expenditure of county rates, insecurity of tenure, &c.; which evils can be redressed by the landlord alone."

While they are vainly looking to the Legislature for high prices, which are unobtainable, they are neglecting to secure the only solid advantages they can enjoy, separate from benefits shared by the community at large."

And if, as we think would sometimes happen, corn rents give the turn in the tenants' favour, landlords who uphold monopoly have only themselves to blame. Thus Mr. Latimore corroborates the statement of Mr. Hope, that in a natural state of the corn trade there would be no difficulty in fixing money rents for a long series of years, which would be fair towards both landlords and tenants; nor must tenants submit to have their present high rents converted into corn rents.

"In contending for corn rents upon principle, as best adapted to the repeated fluctuations of prices, I by no means intend to assert that it would be either wise or prudent for farmers to adopt, at the present high standard of rents, which prevails wherever tenants-at-will have been screwed up to the last shilling which fear or competition could enable needy or rapacious owners to obtain. I know contiguous lands, of nearly similar value, where a difference prevails in the rent of 15 to 30 per cent. In such instances a corn rent based upon the present rental would annually transfer from the occupier to the pockets of the receiver of rent a great many quarters of corn, in addition to the fair value of the land."

Farmers of England, these statements, these unanswerable reasonings, proceed from men of your own class, men whose capital is "embarked in the same boat" with your own, who can have no interest in misleading you, and who have proved by their success in life that they understand the business of farming on which they write. Now, the reverse of all this is true of the monopolist landlords and land-agents, who strive to divert your attention from your actual grievances and the real causes of your present difficulties, and to lead you after the will-o'-the-wisp "protection."

Ask yourselves who are most likely to be candid and honest advisers—those who are of your own body, or those who have gained high rents and overwhelming political influence by leading you into your present most lamentable state of distress? Ay, and who will leave you to struggle through it as you best may, without attempting to enforce upon their own Minister the measures they pretend to tell you are necessary for your deliverance.

HARVEY AND RABBITS.—A tenant-farmer, writing to the Norwich Mercury, says:—"The greatest relief that could be given to a tenant farmer in the present time of need, would be the full liberty to kill hares and rabbits any way he may think best."

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING.—The next great aggregate meeting of the LEAGUE will be HELD in the FREE-TRADE HALL, MANCHESTER, on WEDNESDAY Evening next, the 5th of MARCH.

GEORGE WILSON, Esq., will take the Chair at SEVEN O'CLOCK precisely.

The meeting will be addressed by W. J. Fox, Esq., and by GEORGE THOMPSON, Esq.

BOROUGH OF MARYLEBONE REGISTRATION AND FREE-TRADE DINNER.—The MARYLEBONE REFORM and REGISTRATION ASSOCIATION, with others, alive to the important movement now in progress in favour of the great principles of FREE TRADE, have deemed the present a fitting occasion publicly to attempt their proposition by all the means in their power; amongst which, attention to the Registration of Electors is admitted to be of paramount importance.

It is hoped that such an occasion may be the means of extending the Reform interest, and of more closely uniting the electors in the pursuit of objects important, not only to the Borough, but to the Empire at large. A DINNER will take place in the Concert Room of the Princess's Theatre, Great Portland-street, Oxford-street, on WEDNESDAY, the 5th of March next, at which their esteemed President, JOHN BARNARD, Esq., has consented to preside.

The following, among other gentlemen, have accepted invitations, and will attend:—Sir B. Hall, Bart., M.P.; Sir C. Napier, K.C.B., M.P.; J. Hope, Esq., M.P.; W. Ewart, Esq., M.P.; R. Cobden, Esq., M.P.; J. Bright, Esq., M.P.; T. M. Gibson, Esq., M.P.; General Sir De Lacey Evans, and W. J. Fox, Esq.

By order of the Committee, WILLIAM ALLEN, Secretary. N.B. Tickets, Five Shillings each, may be had of the Secretary, at the Office of the Association, 62, Warren-street, Fitzroy-square.

We have omitted our Reviews, with other matters, in order to give at full length the excellent speech of Mr. Macaulay.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, March 1, 1845.

Mr. Bright's motion for a select committee to inquire into the operation of the Game Laws has been carried with the consent of the Government. All parties agreed in praising the temper, moderation, and ability of the speech with which the honourable member introduced his motion. He presented to the House an array of facts and figures, lucidly arranged, which could not be resisted; his unaffected sympathy for the sufferings which these laws have brought on the poor and the defenceless gave to his arguments a tone and colouring of rich feeling, which made them as touching to the heart as they were convincing to the head. As if anticipating the cavils of the versatile Times, he explained, in simple but clear language, the connexion between the Game Laws and the Corn Laws as the cause why the attention of the League had been directed to the subject. The landowners have taken to themselves the exclusive right of furnishing the people of the three kingdoms with food, and have passed iniquitous laws to prevent consumers from obtaining a supply elsewhere; they, consequently, aggravate the grievance of the artificial scarcity, which it is the object of the Corn Laws to produce, when they maintain multitudes of game merely for their own amusement, by which large quantities of corn are annually destroyed, and the pressure of fictitious famine increased. The Times is indignant that a member of the Society of Friends should interfere between the peasantry and the peasantry, venting several ponderous jests on broad brims and drab coats with the usual liberality and good taste by which its polemical articles are so eminently distinguished; and, of course, superadding at random hints and insinuations suggestive of the falsehood which it would be inconvenient to express directly. The Times indeed, of late, seems to aim at establishing for itself the character of "the worm of Nilus;" its proprietors may say with the Clown, "Its biting is immortal; those that do die of it do seldom or never recover;" they add the menacing warning, "You must think this, look you, that the worm will do his kind," and "Look you, the worm is not to be trusted but in the keeping of wise people; for indeed their is no goodness in the worm." Wise people, however, have not always directed the worm; for, with all the pretensions made by the Times to advocacy of the cause of the labouring classes, it deliberately advises the muleting of the working man of one-fourth of his wages whenever he exchanges labour for sugar. Verily, "the worm will do after his kind."

The Times asks, "What should we say to strictures on the character of William the Conqueror by Obadiah Broadbrim, or Ebenezer Longface on the feudal system?" We can discover no inconsistency in such topics being discussed by persons belonging to the societies that these very clever mechanisms are intended to designate; it is far more inconsistent to learn that pretensions to decency and morality are occasionally made in the parlours of Printing-house-square. There can be no incongruity in any honest man expressing his detestation of the Norman tyrant, or his hatred of feudal despotism. It is contrary to historical justice and truth to assert that "Norman tastes are part of the British character;" our whole history is nothing more than a record of the reconquest of English liberty from the Norman tyranny which triumphed at the Battle of Hastings. "Our nation's body, blood, and bones" are essentially Saxon; and the just impatience of the game laws felt by the great body of the people is mainly caused by the fact, that they are the remnant of the odious and cruel forest laws—the most galling and torturing badge of tyranny which the Norman bandits, in the insolent wantonness of victory, imposed upon the English people. This view of the case is sanctioned by the high authority of Sir W. Blackstone, who says, "Yet from this root (the Forest Laws) has sprung a bastard slip, known by the name of the Game Laws, now arrived to, and wantoning in, its highest vigour; both founded on the same unreasonable notions of permanent property in wild creatures, and both productive of the same tyranny to the commons; but with this difference, that the Forest Laws established one mighty hunter throughout the land, the Game Laws have raised a little Nimrod in every manor." The historical accuracy of the Times is in strict keeping with its morality, its decency, and its philanthropy.

The general tone of the debate leads us to hope that these laws, the barbarous relic of barbarous feudalism, will not long be maintained in an enlightened age and nation. Too long have the poor been viewed by the Legislature as objects to be legislated against; the results of Mr. Bright's committee will, we doubt not, show how, at least in one particular, they should be legislated for. He will be rewarded by the prayers of those whom he will rescue from pain and contamination, and he may console himself for the sneers of the Times by reflecting that "the worm will do after his kind."

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The division on the secret service money grant took place in the French Chamber on Friday evening, the 21st ult., when there was a majority of 24 in favour of Ministers.

In the Chamber of Peers, on Tuesday, M. Duchatel, the Minister of the Interior, presented the Secret Service Funds Bill as passed by the deputies, in a speech in which he declared his conviction that France had never been more peaceful or prosperous at home, or more influential and respected abroad, than at the present moment.

MADRID, Feb. 10.—The differences between Sweden and Denmark, with Morocco have been arranged, under the joint mediation of France and England. The Emperor has renounced the claim of tribute.

LISBON, Feb. 18.—The Queen was taken with the pains of labour at three p.m. yesterday, and at half-past ten last night gave birth to a princess. Both mother and child are doing very well.

It is a curious fact that Viscount Saldanha, who, when Minister of Foreign Affairs some years ago, so pertinaciously refused to enter into any treaty with England for the suppression of the slave trade, has since then on many occasions shown himself a most zealous advocate for the extinction of that traffic. This conduct on his part, though seemingly inconsistent, is in perfect harmony with the character of his countrymen: they may be led but cannot be driven.

MUNICH, February 14.—The deputies of the States of the Zollverein will meet in this city on the 1st of July. There are several indications which encourage us to hope that in this meeting of the deputies the Cabinets of the States of southern Germany will exert themselves with more energy than ever in favour of higher duties, to protect several branches of German manufactures.—German paper.

SWITZERLAND.—The excitement in the various cantons still continues. The Journal des Debats gives a concise history of the origin of the dispute, which threatens to result in a civil war. It alleges that the real design of the Radical party is to bring about a revolution with a view to establish a pure Republican Government instead of the federal system which now prevails, and that their demand for the expulsion of the Jesuits from Lucerne is made a pretext for bringing about this their main object. The most active canton in the movement is Berne, which hopes to become the centre of such a republic. Genes and Vaud, although Protestant, and hostile to the influence of the Jesuits, refuse to join a cry which they regard as a pretext for destroying the present federal constitution. It is said that the European powers will interfere should the republican movement party proceed to any overt acts of violence to enforce their demands.

CIRCASSIA.—News from Caucasus comes, down to the beginning of the year. The severity of the cold had impeded the operations of the hostile armies. Hostilities were expected to be renewed in March. The reports of the great losses sustained by the Russians, and the capture of their forts by Schamyl, are denied: there were but two slight engagements, in which it is alleged the Russians had the advantage.

INDIA.—Despatches from India and China, in anticipation of the mail which left Calcutta on the 5th of January, arrived on Monday last, by express, from Madras. The Punjab is again in commotion. A revolution broke out, and Heera Singh, the Rajah, and Jella Pandit, have been killed. The English Government had, it was believed, no idea of interference in this instance (though the time may not be far off when it will be obliged to do so), not being in the slightest bound to assist or uphold either party or Ministry.

The news from Selude is unfavourable. The Highlanders at Sukkur were still dying off. Upwards of 200 men, women, and children had perished since their arrival. They were to be removed immediately.

The non-arrival of the ships Ranunculus and Briton, the former from London with recruits, and the latter from Sydney with a detachment of her Majesty's 50th Regt., is causing great uneasiness, and great fears are entertained for their safety. The Company's steamer Waterbury had been sent in search of them.

CHINA.—There had been rather a serious disturbance at Hong Kong, in consequence of a registration decree issued by Government, which was resisted by the Europeans, who, in an address to Council, styled it as "unjust, oppressive, and despotic." A good time, arbitrary, unconstitutional, and despotic. A good deal of bickering was the result between the Europeans and the Chinese, as the former refused to answer the address. Three thousand Chinese left the island, and at last the Government deemed it fit "to amend and modify" the registration ordinance.

UNITED STATES.—By the Patrick Henry, which arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday, we learn that the Oregon Territory Bill had passed the House of Representatives.

The New York Express says:—"The Oregon Bill, we have passed by a large majority, but the most mischievous part of it had been extracted. Slavery was prohibited in Oregon by the bill—Ayes, 121; Noes, 69 (all bled in the vote). The bill provides for notice to Great Britain of our intention to annul, at the end of twelve months, the convention for a joint occupancy, and affords a guarantee that the rights of British subjects, under the guarantee, shall not in the mean time be interfered with. Even now, it is passed by a vote of 121 ayes to 82 noes."

The revolution in Mexico had been terminated. The bill to pay the whole interest on the foreign portion of the State debt, in February, had passed both branches of the States legislature, and been signed by the Governors. The treasurer of the State has arrived in Philadelphia for the purpose of making the payments. This step towards liquidating the State debts had given great satisfaction.

DOMESTIC.

Mr. Oakeley, of Margaret-street Chapel, who has made himself so notorious by his Romanist practices and his Romanist publications, and by a late defiance to his diocese, has been at length suspended by the Bishop of London.—Standard. This statement is denied by the Morning Post.

Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, so well known for his efforts to promote the abolition of the slave trade, and the civilization of Africa, died last week, at his seat in Norfolk, aged fifty-nine.

Mr. C. Tower, a supporter of Sir R. Peel's Government, has been elected to represent Buckinghamshire in Parliament. Mr. W. P. Carew, a gentleman of similar politics, has been elected representative for East Cornwall.

The Rev. Sydney Smith, the well-known and accomplished Canon of St. Paul's, died on Saturday morning, at his house at Mayfair, after an illness of several months, in the 73rd year of his age. He was the founder, and for many years the editor, of the "Edinburgh Review." His most remarkable work was "The Letters of Peter Plymley," in which he advocated, in his own peculiarly powerful and witty style, the claims of the Irish Catholics to civil and religious liberty.

On Friday evening the 21st ult., shortly after seven o'clock, Mr. John De la Rue, a professor of the piano-forte, was found barbarously murdered near the Finchley-road, Hampstead. When discovered by parties who had heard, and were attracted by, cries of murder, he was quite dead, and his watch and other property stolen from his person. Suspicion fell, in the first instance, on three men, dressed as labourers, who had been lurking about the neighbourhood during the day; subsequently, however, a young man named Thomas Henry Hooker, an acquaintance of the deceased, was arrested, and his person, as well as his lodgings at Victoria-terrace, Portland-town, and his father's house, where he occasionally stopped, having undergone a thorough search, evidence was given seriously involving him in the charge of having been guilty of the frightful crime. The deceased's watch was found under his pillow; but this he alleged had been given him by the unfortunate victim to pledge. Blood was found on the cuffs of his coat, his trousers, and drawers; and two buttons, picked up on the spot where the murder was committed, corresponded with those on his coat, from which two were missing. A number of other circumstances of a corroborative character were also proved against the prisoner. The inquest was adjourned to this morning (Saturday).

During the past fortnight a number of parties have been apprehended, and brought before the magistrates of Worcestershire, on the charge of being implicated in the fatal poaching affray which took place at Croome, in that county, on the night of the 19th of December last, when Thomas Stalte, gamekeeper to the Earl of Coventry, was so badly injured that he died a few days afterwards. Several of the prisoners have been discharged, and others are remanded for further examination. The whole of the prisoners are from the town of Pershore, which is near to the preserves of the Earl of Coventry, and some of them are respectively connected. Pershore, and indeed the whole of the country, is in a very excited state in consequence of these proceedings. Several other outrages, by large bands of poachers, took place in different parts of Worcestershire about the time of the fatal occurrence at Croome, and it is expected the result of the present inquiries will be to show that the same party is implicated in them all. On Wednesday last a further examination took place, when nine poachers implicated in the murder were committed to take their trial at the next assizes.

A fire of an alarming nature broke out on Thursday morning early, on the premises occupied by Messrs. Courtold, Taylors, and Courtold, in Gutter-lane, craps, and silk merchants. The fire spread with such rapidity that the inmates had barely time to escape for their lives. They consisted of Mr. P. A. Taylor, jun., his wife, and two female servants. One of the latter, Caroline Norris, a young woman about 25, was so severely injured that for two hours after the fire was extinguished she was insensible. It appears that she jumped from the second floor, intending to fall upon the sheet fire-escape, which several persons were holding underneath. The flames, however, bursting through the warehouse window with violence, they drove some of the parties back, and instead of falling into the centre of the escape, she fell at the side, and from thence on to the stone pavement. The house-keeper was saved by throwing herself into the escape. The damage done to Messrs. Courtold, Taylors, and Co.'s property is estimated at near £10,000.

The Herald's Dublin correspondent says that a split has taken place in the Repeal Committee between Mr. O'Connell and R. D. Brown, M.P., on the one side, and Mr. Smith O'Brien, M.P., H. Grattan, M.P., and "Young Ireland," on the other. Mr. O'Connell, supported by Mr. Brown, urged on the committee that the negotiation should demand of the Government to concede the proposed new universities strictly Catholic; this was strenuously and successfully resisted by Mr. O'Brien, supported by Mr. Grattan and "Young Ireland," who are for a mixed education to be equally available to both Catholics and Protestants. The dispute was finally calmed down, on the understanding that the question should remain an open one in the association. The Repeal Association met on Monday, at the Convent-hall, Dublin; R. A. Fitzgerald, the newly-elected member for Tipperary, was called to the chair. Mr. R. D. Brown, M.P., addressed the meeting in reply to the strictures of Mr. Foxbuck on the Irish members for having deserted their posts. The hon. member soundly rebuked the member for Bath, whom he described as "a little angry wasp, running over the floor of the House of Commons, which inflicted upon all parties a little would-be powerful sting, because he could not collect from any the honey of office; but he was perfectly innoxious—he had no position." Mr. O'Connell moved, and Mr. Davis, a Protestant barrister, and a contributor to the Nation, seconded, the adoption of a petition to Parliament for the repeal of so much of the Emancipation Act as relates to the monastic orders (the Jesuits). The motion was carried unanimously. Mr. O'Connell addressed the meeting on the subject of the report of the "Land Commission," and pronounced it to be what Cobbett called a cat-lap report. It was one of the most foolish pieces of composition he had ever read, and furnished him with a powerful argument in favour of repeal. The rent for the week was announced to be £366.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.
MARK-LANE, Monday, Feb. 21.—The supply of English Wheat last week was large, and most of it direct to the millers from Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire; the fresh arrivals from the near counties were not large. The best qualities were sold readily at last week's rates, but inferior qualities were very difficult of disposal, and some quantity of the Kentish remained unsold at the close of the market. The demand for foreign Wheat continues slow at former rates. With good supplies of barley the trade remains the same as last week, except that in some cases a little improvement has been obtained for the very finest qualities. No alteration in Beans and Peas. The supplies of Oats were large from Scotland and Ireland, with a few cargoes from our own coast; prices generally were 6d. to 1s. lower than this day week, and even at this decline the sales were not extensive.

FRIDAY, Feb. 28.—Only moderate supplies of all descriptions of Grain have arrived to this market since Monday. Every branch of the trade continues in a very inactive state. In Wheat both English and Foreign the sales are insignificant, and of the former considerable quantities are still on hand. The finest milling Barley fetches late prices to a limited extent, but inferior sorts are difficult to quit even at a reduction. In Oats the sales are small, holders being unwilling to submit to any further decline, without which the dealers are not inclined to purchase. There was no alteration in the duties yesterday.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 23rd of February to the 27th of February, both inclusive.

A WALK IN A THAW.

When the cold winds of winter begin to withdraw,
 'Tis very unpleasant to walk in a thaw.
 Though you would wish to tread, you are certain to meet
 With puddles of water that deluge the street.
 And if you should chance to be rather too prompt,
 Your gaiters, your feet, and your trousers are swamped.
 Then, then is the time that the water creeps in,
 And drenches the stocking, and drenches the skin;
 While often a drop from the cold melting snow
 Falls down from the housetop, and plops on your nose.
 Or settles (unless it is met with a check)
 On a sensitive part of the body—the neck.
 Under these "disagreeable" what's to be done?
 Why, take the advice of E. MOSER and SON,
 And buy a warm coat, without bluish or faw,
 Which saves you from all the mishaps of a thaw;
 The puddles may splash, and the water may drip,
 But you've no cause to fear them if thus you equip.
 The warm coats of MOSER are sure to keep off
 A cold in the limbs, or a troublesome cough;
 And thousands will own, when the winter is o'er,
 That their health was preserved by E. MOSER and SON.

THE UTOPIANISM OF FREE-TRADERS.

"One often finds people," says Tait, "sincerely but moderately attached to the Free-Trade cause, who shake their heads at what they call the extravagant and 'Utopian' expectations of the Free-Traders as to the amount of practical social good to be anticipated from the success of their agitation;" for which shake of the head our northern friend shows extremely little respect. He holds the moderate men to be decidedly mistaken, and even doubts whether the Free-Traders themselves have, generally speaking, at all adequately realized to their minds the sum of social and moral good implied in the eventual success of their work.

The writer might have added, for the further consideration of the men of moderate views and little faith, that the "Utopianism" so glibly alleged against the Free-Traders is found to exist most largely in quarters usually the least accessible to extravagance of hope or enthusiasm of feeling. It is remarkable that the strongest, most sanguine, most Utopian-seeming anticipations of the benefits to be realized by the legislative adoption of Free-Trade principles have been expressed by men as far as possible removed, both by position and character, from the influences that ordinarily produce exaggeration of sentiment and opinion. The Utopianism of Free-Traders has not merely reason and science on its side, but that which, with the moderate men, goes somewhat further—official authority. Not by philosophers dreaming in their closets, nor by League men declaiming in Free-Trade halls and metropolitan theatres—but by official men—men of facts and figures, practical and earnest men—men whose predictions have been enunciated, of the results to be expected from commercial and industrial freedom, which, for boldness and amplitude of promise, lie next open to the charge of Utopian extravagance.

It was no raw League lecturer, but Mr. JAMES DEACON HUME—a man who had spent a lifetime in the Customs and at the Board of Trade, and "whose loss" Sir Robert "is sure we must all sincerely deplore"—who, in the forty-ninth year of his official experience, told the Import Duties Committee of 1840 that, "if trade in this country were perfectly free, and we were enabled to obtain in the cheapest markets, upon even terms, all the commodities we want, he could see no reason why this should not be one of the cheapest countries to live in that any civilized populous country can be."

It was no selfish and sanguine manufacturing capitalist, but Mr. G. R. PORTER, the head of the Statistical Department in the Board of Trade, who assured the same committee that "he had no doubt that the removal of protective duties generally would extend commerce and improve the condition of the people in this country to a degree of which the world has hitherto seen no example." To a question as to any possible evil effects arising from their sudden removal his reply was, "Certainly not."

And it was not one of the volunteer, unofficial financiers whom Sir Robert Peel holds so cheap, but Mr. JOHN MACGREGOR, likewise of the Board of Trade, who handed in to the same committee a plan of a new tariff, which, though by no means perfect in its author's eyes, contained so much of Free Trade as would, according to his belief (besides adding six millions to the revenue), "give full employment to every healthy individual among the labouring classes, and, in a great measure, except among the sick and disabled, destroy the call for the poor-rates altogether."

When the future historian compares the date of this evidence with that of the act of Parliament for the repeal of the Corn Law he will suspect some strange blunder in our chronology. It will seem past belief that any sane people or Government should have let the facts and principles brought out by the committee of 1840 stand over for some seven years without statutory recognition.

The doctrines of commerce and common justice certainly do not need the imprimatur of official authority to give them legitimacy. Yet it is a great fact for the Free-Trader that the heartiest condemnations of the system of monopoly come from the lips of the men best acquainted with it, and officially employed in administering it, and that the most sanguine and unhesitating predictions of the good to ensue on its abolition are uttered by men to whom position, occupation, and official responsibility concur in teaching lessons of caution and moderation. After this it is perfectly ludicrous to hear your judicious and sober people, in Parliament and elsewhere, advise one to beware of "expecting too much" from Free Trade—for Free Trade will not bring the millennium, will not be a panacea for all national and human ills, &c. &c. For our own part we expect, and shall persist in expecting, fully as much from Free Trade as Mr. Deacon Hume, Mr. G. R. Porter, and Mr. John Macgregor. We do not pretend to be more moderate and sober in our views than the eminently practical and well-informed gentlemen of the Board of Trade.

There is not the least need of Free-Traders troubling themselves to eschew extravagance and Utopianism of expectation. It must be an immense and altogether incalculable good to bring the statute-book of an empire into conformity with the legislation of nature and Providence. England, a cheap—that means, an easy—country to live in; work in plenty for every willing worker, and pauperism extinguished; commerce extended, and the condition of the people improved to a degree of which the world has seen no example;—here is a reward for which the toils, the sacrifices, and the patient waiting of years are not too high a price to pay. Here is everything on the largest scale which a well-meaning but blind and impotent philanthropy is vainly seeking on the smallest, in scheme after scheme, which must be futile so long as it takes no account of those laws of production and exchange which are as divine as the law of day and night. "Improvement of the Dwellings of the Poor," "Improvement of the Condition of the Labourer," "Relief of Metropolitan Destitution," "Relief of Distressed Needlewomen" and the like; play and schooling for the young, leisure for the adult, and rest for the old—all would be found contained, by implication, more or less direct, in that one simple and comprehensive act of justice which should give industry its full reward.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND THE FARM-LABOURERS.

On Tuesday the Duke of Richmond is reported to have undertaken a very exhibition in the "Hospital of Incurables," as Lord Chesterfield rather irreverently denominated the Upper House of Parliament, which would qualify him to take a high place in the Mohammedan calendar, where folly is regarded as evidence of sanctity. Professing to advocate the cause of the labouring classes, he declared that "Free Trade would be the ruin of the country." Now, "Free Trade," meaning nothing more than the free interchange of the products of labour, every restriction on trade is a disadvantage imposed on labour, and consequently a direct wrong and injury to the labourer. But the Duke of Richmond is one of the chief supporters of the Corn Laws, which are confessedly designed to raise artificially the price of bread, and yet he pretends to be the friend of the labourer, whom he mulets of a considerable portion of his earnings every time that labour is exchanged for food. The nature of the tax thus covertly and fraudulently levied on the agricultural labourers would be better understood if the proportion between the increase in the rate of wages and the rise in the price of food had received more attention. We have prepared a table illustrating this disproportion, to which we beg leave to direct the attention of our readers:—

Years.	Price of Bread.	Value of the £1 sterling in quarters of wheat.	Average money wages of the agricultural labourer.	Bread wages, in quarters of wheat.
1776	6d.	37	8	15
1785	6	40	8	46
1792	7	34	9	15
1803	10	24	10	12
1811	12	20	12	12
1812	20	12	15	9

If the money-rate of wages was advanced in direct proportion to the rise in the price of corn, there would be some pretext for saying that an artificial raising of price inflicted no injury on the agricultural labourer; but there has been no proportion between the two advances: in fact, the labouring classes were never so badly off as in the year of 1812, for though their wages were then nominally high, they were inadequate to purchase the necessaries of life at the exorbitant prices to which they were then raised. In fact, a high price of corn renders labour disproportionately cheap, when the price of that labour is measured by the cost of the article for which it must ultimately be exchanged.

Comparing the years 1811 and 1812, we have another proof to adduce that the dear year was one of great suffering to the poor. In the former year the amount of the poor-rates was a little under six millions; in the latter year the poor-rates reached a much more enormous amount. The Duke of Richmond says, "If all articles of agricultural produce were to be allowed to come into the country the labourer would be ruined." He forgets to tell us how. The very contrary would obviously be the case, for the labourer would then be able to exchange his labour for a larger supply of food. The evil under which the peasant suffers is want of employment; and the "Report on the Occupations of the People," recently published by her Majesty's Government, shows that under the system of the Corn Laws the amount of population to which employment is given by agriculture has been fearfully diminished, not only proportionately to the whole population, but in its absolute numbers. Does the Duke of Richmond mean seriously to assert that sufficient food would aggravate the evil of insufficient employment? This is what his words mean, and one would have thought that the absurdity was too palpable not to be perceptible even to his intellect.

It is within the range of possibility that the Duke of Richmond may be self-deceived on the subject of the Corn Laws; but there is another monopoly in which the warping influence of self-interest cannot be so direct, and which will serve to test the professions of patronage to the labouring classes of which the lord of Goodwood has recently been so lavish. We shall soon see which lies nearer his heart—the distress of the labourer, which is patent and flagrant; or the distress of the West India proprietors, as manifested in the establishments of the Gladstones and the Goulbourns. No one can be ignorant of the great improvements that cheap sugar would introduce into the domestic economy of the poorer classes. Let us hear from the Duke of Richmond why they are to be deprived of this nutriment as well as stunted in their bread. When we are told that monopolies are to be maintained for the protection of the labouring classes, and inquire what they are to be protected from, the answer, stripped of its verbiage, is that they must be saved from an abundance of food, or rather from a sufficiency of sustenance. This is the kind of protector which the Duke of Richmond professes to be: his vocation is to protect paupers from a plethora, and labourers from overloaded stomachs; his morality is artificial famine, and his summit of virtue is sheer starvation. The present condition of the Sussex labourer is not far from the state of perfection advocated in the dual system of policy; but we doubt whether the country would be ruined if larger loaves were found in the peasant's cottage, or more abundant food in the labourer's shed. We say that the condition of the agricultural labourer is not what it should be; we say that his wages are too low and his provisions too dear; we know that his meals are neither nutritive in quality, nor adequate in solid amount; and we wish to save him from the protection of such guardians as the Duke of Richmond, the beginning and end of whose policy is to increase the labour of his hands and stint the supply to his stomach.

FREE-TRADE MEETING IN MARYLEBONE

On Wednesday last the members of the Registration Committee of the borough of Marylebone had a public dinner to celebrate the union of Free Trade with the business of registration. Hitherto the committee has had some difficulty in defining the exact purpose for which citizens are requested to claim the electoral franchise; for the old distinctions of political party have been so long becoming "small by degrees and beautifully less," that there was a large and increasing portion of the community to whom the differences between Whig and Tory appeared so trifling and unimportant that they were unwilling to give themselves any trouble to mark their preference for one or the other. Under these circumstances, the Registration Committee of Marylebone has very judiciously passed by those nice shades and gradations which it is no longer easy for men of ordinary perceptive powers to distinguish, and the minuteness of which frequently furnished excuses for abandonment of principle to "unkind deserters" in that borough, and have directed their efforts to advance the great question of Free Trade, being that in which the country is most interested, and that which affords the strongest and most tangible bond of union to the electors of that important borough. The emancipation of industry from the fetters imposed upon it by the short-sighted selfishness of the monopolists would give the middle classes more trade, the operatives more employment, and the poor more food. It is a cause in which there is no room for jealousy of classes, because the interest of all classes are identical; and hence the jam which once dismantled the independent electoral body in Marylebone, and caused it for a season to be misrepresented by Lord Teignmouth, have sunk into oblivion. We all know that "union is strength," but we sometimes forget the practical working out of this principle; we sometimes ask for union without making clear and intelligible the grounds on which we are to be united. Free Trade is not only the cause of justice and of sound policy, but it has the further advantage that all except the wilfully blind perceive at a glance its equity and its expediency. We trust that the example set by the spirited and sensible electors of Marylebone will be enthusiastically followed in the rest of the metropolitan boroughs. London is the place for practical life and business, not for idealisms and abstractions; Free Trade in the abstract, with restricted trade in the reality, is just as absurd as to promise a shopkeeper "good trade in the abstract, and then turn away all customers from his door." We know that the constituencies feel this truth, but it is of importance that they should ever keep it forcibly impressed on the mind of their representatives. The monopolists feel that the hour of a decisive struggle cannot be far distant; the Free-Traders should not only have the same conviction, but should act upon it by keeping themselves in constant preparation. Cromwell's advice to his soldiers was, "Put your trust in God, but sleep on your matchlocks to keep your powder dry;" and we say to the Free-Traders, "Put your trust in the goodness of your cause, but neglect not any one of the means necessary to ensure its speedy and final success."

THE BAZAAR.

"The Flack, Ravensglass, Feb. 24.
"My DEAR SIR, Absence from home in the first place, and a wish to give the matter of the approaching Bazaar my best consideration in the second place, have been the reasons why I have delayed replying to your favours of Dec. 23 and Feb. 13.
"Even now I can only reply as an individual, for in consequence of bad health I have been ordered to abstain as much as possible from public meetings. I do not think there will be many contributions of articles to the Bazaar from this district, as manufacturers do not prevail here, but I think our money contributions will be more than those of last year.
"In addition to my money contribution (which will be £40 this year), I hope to send you specimens of the linen manufacture of Great Britain in the year 1845, showing the great progress that has been made in this branch of manufacture since the linen trade has been freed from the protection formerly extended to it in the north of Ireland.

"I am my dear Sir, most truly yours,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "THOMAS AINSWORTH."

"The Limes, Peckham, Feb. 25.
"DEAR SIR,—Sir Robert Peel, when proposing to lower the duty on glass, assured the country of his belief that the knowledge of its uses in manufacture is yet in its infancy.

"Doubtless there are free-trading glass-factors who read the LEAGUE, to whom I would suggest that it might be made a beautiful substitute for plate. Would you not agree with me, that tea-trays of ground or plate glass would be very elegant? I should think they might have some Free-Trade device on them. I imagine, also, that a set of dinner covers, made of ground glass, so that the meat might not be seen through them, or they be dimmed by steam, would give a table a really elegant appearance. Surely these articles would suit your tremendous Bazaar, if some one wishing the glorious cause every possible success would either order or manufacture them. My sisters and I have seen your circulars, and are preparing our mites to contribute to the grand Bazaar. Earnestly wishing you the most complete success,
"I remain, &c. &c.,
"A. W. Paulton, Esq." "ELIZA ARGENT."

"Wintaton, Newcastle-on-Tyne, March 1.
"DEAR SIR,—I feel anxious to contribute my mite to the League Bazaar, but am somewhat at a loss to find anything coming up to my idea of what should be sent to a Bazaar. I have an opinion that the articles generally should be such as cannot be bought everywhere in the regular way of business, but should be as far as possible rare and curious. I therefore think of sending a few specimens of fossil vegetable impressions from the Durham Coal Field, found in collieries adjoining an estate and royalty I have lately purchased, and at a depth of from five to six hundred feet below the present surface.

"If you think these will be acceptable to the Committee, I will forward a box, free, as you may direct.

"Southampton, Feb. 27.
"SIR,—I see by the LEAGUE newspaper, which I take regularly, that you do not refuse the smallest contributions which are offered to the approaching Bazaar. I shall feel proud to contribute my mite in the shape of two dozen pots of oriental cream for nourishing and improving the appearance of the hair, which will no doubt fetch 1s. 6d. or 2s. per pot if they are worth your acceptance. I will get them up very tastefully and forward them in good time. My wife will also send some fancy articles.
"Wishing you every success in the righteous cause in which you are engaged,

A correspondent writing from this town informs us that many ladies are actively engaged for the Bazaar, and that considerable contributions will be forwarded at the proper time.

"Bloomfield-terrace, Ranelagh-road, Pimlico, March 1.
"SIR,—Thousands of persons who have never allowed themselves to examine into the merits or demerits of the Corn Laws will probably be attracted to the Covent Garden League Bazaar from curiosity, and are likely to be very greatly astonished at the wonderful exertions of others, and therefore would feel very anxious of knowing facts relating to the Corn Laws; some may feel ashamed at the small exertions they had made compared to others, and would gladly seize on a present opportunity of making up for the past. Now, both these classes of persons would be materially assisted in their good resolutions by the League having, large well-assorted and arranged parcels of their pamphlets (with a concise, conspicuous appeal to purchase at the marked prices), for self-information, and distribution at the Bazaar.

Mr. THORNELY: I wish to repeat the question which I put yesterday to the right hon. gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. I yesterday stated that a quantity of sugar had reached this country from the United States, which was notoriously the produce of slave labour. The question which I then put has become of more importance, because to-day I find that samples have arrived of cargoes of two or three shipments from New Orleans. The question I wish to put is this, whether this sugar, the produce of Louisiana, and therefore the produce of slave labour, will be admitted at the same rate of duty as sugar from China, Java, and Manila, which is considered the produce of free labour?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: There are certain countries—the United States being one of them—where sugar is produced by the labour of slaves. The United States, and one or two other countries, have concluded reciprocity treaties with this country, which treaties stipulate that the produce of such countries shall be admitted into this country on the footing of the most favoured nation. That, I apprehend, is the state of the case. But, up to this hour, there has been no official information received by her Majesty's Government, from the Custom-house, with respect to the arrival of this shipment, nor has any communication been made to the Treasury Board upon the subject, nor any application for an order in Council which would be necessary before the sugar could be admitted. At present I apprehend that the sugar could not be admissible, for no order in Council has been issued for its admission from the United States. At the same time, I have no hesitation in saying that my construction of the treaty is, that sugar from the United States would, under the reciprocity treaties, be admissible on the same terms and footing as sugar from Java, Manila, and China. (Loud cheers from the Opposition benches.)

Mr. THORNELY had heard the answer of the right hon. gentleman with great satisfaction. He begged simply to state that the produce of sugar in Louisiana was such as would give great profit on its exportation to this country, and that there was every reason to believe the new trade would be carried on to a very considerable extent.

Mr. EWART said there was another question connected with this subject, which he was anxious to have answered. He wished to know whether the right hon. baronet was aware that all the sugar coming from Louisiana was brown muscovado sugar, and, therefore, would come into this country at the duty of 23s., and not at 28s.? So that, in fact, this slave-grown sugar of the United States would be imported at a lower duty than the free-labour sugar of Java, Siam, and Manila.

SIR R. PEEL declined entering into any argument upon the subject at present.

For several days, the "notice paper" of the House of Commons (that is, the document daily printed, containing the list of "orders of the day," and other business to be transacted) presented the following somewhat mysterious announcement:—

"Mr. Wodehouse.—To put a question to Mr. Cobden relative to a motion which stands first on the orders of the day for the 13th of March."

Edmond Wodehouse is a cousin of Lord Wodehouse and Earl Cowley; he sits for East Norfolk, and is a deputy-lieutenant of the county; he is a hale, comfortable-looking gentleman, who has been in Parliament for many years. His question was put on Wednesday; and was to the following effect:—

PROTECTIVE DUTIES.
Mr. WODEHOUSE rose to ask a question of the honourable member for Stockport. That honourable member had given notice of a motion for the 13th of March, to inquire into the operation of protective duties on imports upon the interests of tenant farmers and farm-labourers. Now, what he (Mr. Wodehouse) wished to ask the hon. gentleman was, whether he had any objection to defer his motion till after Easter? His (Mr. Wodehouse's) reason for asking this was, that very many members were desirous of attending the quarter sessions and the adjourned sessions, all those honourable gentlemen would be much obliged to him.

Mr. COBDEN replied that he was placed in a somewhat difficult position by the question just put to him. It was well known that if he were to postpone his motion from the 13th, he should not be able to claim precedence on any subsequent day. He in the first instance gave a fortnight's warning to the House that he intended to give notice of this motion; when this fortnight expired he then gave another fortnight's notice of his motion, and he afterwards postponed that notice for a week. Thus full five weeks' notice had been given to honourable gentlemen of his intended motion; he hoped that would be considered sufficient time to enable them to determine whether they would concur in his motion or not.

Mr. WODEHOUSE had not the slightest intention of concurring in the motion of the honourable member; at the same time he begged to state he had no reason to complain of the course which the honourable gentleman had pursued.

The bill for continuing the property and income tax for three years longer was debated on Wednesday; but so strong is the feeling which is growing up in favour of DIRECT TAXATION, as the instrument by which we are to carry out the principles of FREE TRADE, that not even all the inequalities of the income department of the tax could induce more than twenty-three members to vote against the bill. In fact, Sir Robert Peel is so well aware of this, that he chucklingly refused to give any pledge as to its termination, because the House and the country might be so enamoured of the tax at the end of three years as to refuse to let him take it off?

The only other matter requiring notice is the re-introduction of Mr. Cowper's bill for promoting the acquisition of allotments,—a kindly-meant measure, but one not likely to pass in its present shape. Free Trade would render pottering unnecessary.

ADVANCE OF WAGES.—Last week, Messrs. Fielden, cotton manufacturers, Todmorden, advanced the wages of most of their hands from 6d. to 8d. per week each.

"come forth and live!" You animate it and bid it go on with power and strength, and make itself the agency, not of party spirit, but of national grandeur and prosperity. (Cheers.) Well, during that period too the enemy has not been idle. There has been the Anti-League beating up its recruits, accomplishing its regeneration, meeting not in a hall like this, but assembling on the first-floor of a house, No. 17, in New Bond-street. (Great laughter.) They had a very fine annual meeting there, it is said; several chairs in the drawing-room might be left unoccupied, but still altogether it was a good gathering; and yet even in that assembly there were tenant-farmers found to read a lecture to the ducal farmers' friends, and to tell them something of their mind as to the promises which had been made to them for a time, and the halting performance which had followed those promises. (Cheers.) Well, their leaders told them to be as quiet as possible. They selected a land-agent to speak for the tenant-farmers, and proposed as to other matters they should have a dinner, and at that dinner they should drink the labourers' health, but not in water only. (Loud cheers and laughter.) There they have concocted their pamphlets, made their beautifully correct quotations from Adam Smith, settled their proceedings for a campaign, in which, after having gone through exertions of this kind, after presiding at sundry meetings of this kind, after having presided at various meetings in the country, after having gathered together 500 labourers in clean smock frocks, and with green ribbons round their hats, to shout before the Queen and impress her with the comfort of the peasantry; after all this, the Duke of Buckingham and the Duke of Richmond each feels he can lay his hand upon his heart and say, "Have I not done all that I can as a man and a monopolist?" (Cheers and laughter.) However, although they still murmur among themselves, and still tell the country that they must needs have protection on account of their peculiar burdens, we perceive no great eagerness to come forward and distinctly prove to the world what these burdens are. They like the force—it answers a purpose; but, as to going into particulars, and making out the case, that is quite another thing. They are of opinion with the sentimental lady in the play of "The Stranger":

"I have a silent sorrow—a grief I'll ne'er impart;
It breathes no sigh, it sheds no tear,
But it consumes my heart."

(Roars of laughter, and much cheering.) Such is their secret burden; they will tell nobody of it (cheers); but, whether it consumes their hearts or not, it seems, at any rate, not hitherto to have consumed their pockets. (Cheers and laughter.) No; I do not mean to deny that the land has peculiar burdens; and I should say that, first and foremost, the land of this country is burdened with the most exorbitant proprietary of any country in the world. (Cheers.) England has been rightly named the paradise of landowners. There is no country in Europe where so small a proportion of the general taxation of the country is borne by the land as in Great Britain. (Cheers.) There is no country in Europe where the proprietors of the land have the opportunity, by means of political power which their possessions confer, to put their hands into the pockets of other people, and where they use that power with so unparagoning and unmerciful a prodigality. (Cheers.) That is the first great and peculiar burden of the land in England.

The rent is double now what it was some forty or fifty years ago;—more than double generally, throughout the country. The burden has thus been increased, is increased enormously, and every well-wisher to the land will feel that it ought to be diminished. (Loud applause.) Another burden of the land is the weight of misery which it bears upon its bosom. It is like a fainting mother, with a child which it cannot nourish; mourning and groans are continually heard, and the unhappy beings who are willing and ready to till the soil for a very scanty portion of its produce, go here and there begging for leave to till the soil, too seldom getting it, and when they do get it, upon most starvation terms, they continually feel themselves in a dilemma between the workhouse and the solitude of destitution. (Cheers.) Now, this is the burden of the land; and if the poet, in the exercise of his imaginative faculties, were to conceive the earth as endowed with reason and feeling, he would imagine it to bring forth bitter remonstrances. The free air would say, "I flow for all; I yield the measure which I can give of life and well-being to every organized existence." The sun would say, "I shine for all; my light gladdens the pauper in his hovel as well as the noble in his palace." But whilst the air breathes for all, and sun and stars shine for all, the earth does not bear its fruits for all: they are made artificially scarce, dear, and inaccessible to a large proportion of those by whose labour they are produced. And then a seeming curse is laid upon the earth from which the other elements may claim exemption. (Cheers.) Yes, the land has to bear the burden of an unnatural complicity in crime and wretchedness; for it is made the pretext for all these. There are those who support a monopolist system, who undertake to feed the country and fail in the attempt, and yet endeavour to exclude the foreign nations, and set up the vain plea of independence, as if any nation could be independent of others—as if it did not render them the less independent of us; yet they say it is all for the sake of the land. They keep down the peasantry; they make the farmer pay rent out of his capital, opening only before him the melancholy prospect of declining resources, crippling his energies, stopping his enterprise; and they say it is all for the sake of the land. They fix barriers to trade and limit the markets for commerce; they press heavily upon manufacturing industry; they alienate this country from other countries; and they say it is all for the sake of the land, the innocent land, which abhors it all, it is for their own sordid sakes. It is the work of the Government over which they tyrannize; it is no ordinance of Nature; it is Peel, and not Providence. (Cheers.) Another topic which has arisen into importance during the last fifteen months, is that which has been so fully and amply adverted to by your Chairman in his opening address—I mean the Bazaar, which is soon to be held in Covent-garden Theatre, and which partakes of that simplicity, breadth, and grandeur which has characterized the proceedings of the Anti-Corn Law League. (Cheers.) It is of itself an argument—it will be a most imposing argument to the senses—this exhibition of the products of the national industry, this display of what manufacturing power and skill and taste can achieve in the variety and in the magnificence which will there be exhibited.

(Cheers.) But where will space be found for the exhibition? Why, Covent-garden Theatre—scarcely London itself would suffice for the full display of such an exhibition of the labours, of the products of manufacturing industry, as one would wish to see accumulated on that occasion. (Applause.) And even then, how imperfect it would be! Show the deeds of industry, of British industry—arrange its trophies—why, not all the space of London would suffice for anything of that sort. Nor would you have it be such gauds as can be carted, or waggoned, or boated to the metropolis; why, to exhibit British industry in its whole magnificence, you should remove Manchester bodily to London. (Applause.) We should have up your long lines, your palaces, of buildings; we should have up your ample factories; we should have up your capacious warehouses; we should have from other places their docks, their shipping; we should gather together all that has been done by the power that raises temples, towers, and palaces, furnishing them with all the adornments of luxury, and with all the splendour of grandeur. Bring all these together, and then let Industry point to them, and say—"These are my works: how long shall legislation interfere with my recompense?" (Cheers.) Oh that we could have, not only the products, but the men that made the products too! (Applause.) Our great industrial army, the noblest army ever raised—(applause)—the most varied, the most magnificent in its bloodless triumphs, the most glorious of armies,—would that we could have it there, with all their ensigns of industry, with all their trophies of success! (Cheers.) Why, no processions of royal and titled personages, with all their crowns and coronets, their sceptres, robes, and helmets—no military march of battalions that have won the bloodiest fields, with their resounding music and their flaunting banners, could possibly compete in moral grandeur with that stupendous procession—that exhibition of the might with which man is enriched through his intelligence and his vigour, acting for the noblest results, and ruling effectually over the very elements of nature for the benefit of humanity. (Loud and repeated cheers.) I am certain monopoly could never compete with that exhibition; no, not though there were borne in procession coffers filled with all the wealth the bread-tax ever realized (cheers)—not though nobles were there, not only with their insignia of state, but with the attendants who grace their amusements also—not though there were Corn-Law dukes and peers with their huntsmen and whippers-in (laughter), with their very hounds (great laughter)—not though all the game they had slaughtered could be raised from the dead, and they could proceed in stately march, every man heading what he had destroyed in a battue—his hundred hares and his two hundred pheasants. (Great laughter.) The very paltriness in comparison would sweep them away into utter insignificance; it would render more striking the grandeur and the glory of British industry—that industry to which the ancients, in their idolatrous enthusiasm, would have raised temples, to which they would have built altars, offered sacrifices, with the songs of the poet, and the exhibitions of the drama,—and for which, in our Christian times, we seek no such homage, but merely demand appreciation, merely cry out for bare justice, merely say—"Here we are, the representatives of industry; we have done all this; and do we not deserve—not titles or honours—but the bread and salt which we earn by the sweat of our brow?" (Loud cheers.) But it may be said, and is said, that we are better off than we were, that the season has been favourable, that here and elsewhere there is a considerable revival of trade, and that with this we should be content. I scarcely think the time is come to be contented yet. (Applause.) There have been concessions, no doubt. The late alteration in the tariff has made a good many; but still nothing must be multiplied a vast number of times before it amounts to anything substantial. (Cheers and laughter.) In the goods exonerated from duty there is the article of "greaves," which I am told are the clippings of skin, useful for feeding dogs. (Hear, hear.) Now, if the food of dogs is to be imported free of duty, what a shame is it that that of labouring men is yet to be so heavily taxed! (Cheers.) The little obstacles are giving way to Free-Trade principles; we want to see the great ones giving way also. (Cheers.) In this variety of movements with the smallest items of the list, there is an encouragement to push the argument for consistency yet more strenuously with those who hold the reins of power. (Cheers.) Sir Robert Peel professes Free-Trade principles; repeatedly and distinctly has he professed them. We cannot then let him off with any such minute application as he is making in all these operations. (Applause.) We cannot allow him to boast of it much, to come pompously forward and say what he is doing for the country. The littleness of the doings will warrant no boast, whilst there is so serious a deficiency in the carrying out of those very principles. (Cheers.) This magniloquence only reminds one of that late facetious character, of theatrical notoriety, Robert Elliston. When he was the manager of Drury-lane Theatre, some great tragedian exceedingly pleased him by his performance one night. Elliston, in his pompous way, marched into the green-room when the play was over; there, amid the assembled company, he called the successful tragedian before him; he made a sounding speech to him, telling him how gratified he had been by the able personation of that evening, how it drew tears and excited clamours of applause, and wound up by saying it had so impressed him that he could not feel he had discharged his duty without showing his appreciation by presenting him with a small piece of plate, and accordingly he handed to the flattered tragedian—a silver tooth-pick! (Peals of laughter.) Now, Sir R. Peel's Free-Trade performances are very much like this small piece of plate; they amount to but very little; and our answer to them all is, that we take them as pledges of principle, and not as satisfaction of our demands (applause); we thank him for the little tooth-pick, but we are determined to have the dinner also. (Loud cheers and laughter.) In the prosperity which there has been for a time in manufactures, whilst there is so much reason for rejoicing, I find also ample warrant for saying this does not satisfy us. For look, after all, at the limitations of the prosperity. It has been comparative, it is not absolute—it may be as much as the present system will allow—it is not so much as the interests of the country or the claims of humanity require. (Cheers.) Why, in this prosperity of ours, what does Sir James Graham tell us? That, last year, 1,500,000 persons received more or less relief from the poor-rates. (Hear, hear, hear.) One person out of every fifteen in a state of prosperity, as it is called, receiving relief; two hundred millions of pounds expended on the poor, since the conclusion of a general peace! Why, we might ask, did one not know how these matters were effected—one might ask, if this be prosperity, in the name of Heaven, what is our adversity and calamity? (Hear, hear.) We still hear, too, of deaths by destitution; many cases have I noticed lately of suicide from destitution. And so long as any reports of this kind, or any facts of this description, exist in the country, you cannot say that there is such prosperity as any heart can be satisfied with that is not deadened in its whole feeling of what humanity is entitled to from the possessors of our common nature. (Applause.) Prosperity or adversity, it is our business to see that these things shall not be, whilst there is any further opening for the spread of trade and commerce by which these persons may earn their bread, instead of receiving it in charity, and instead of dying in destitution, may live on by their own exertions, or those of their connexions who had been enabled to render their kindly assistance. Towards this we should ever direct our view; be content with nothing but the entire establishment of the claims of justice and of humanity. (Applause.) And the reason for not being satisfied with this degree of prosperity is, that the way in which it has been attained shows us the path to get a great deal more. (Applause.) Let Sir Robert Peel take what credit he will for the alterations of the tariff—if that modicum of Free Trade has done so much, what will not the broad and universal application of the principle effect? (Loud cheers.) He calculates that he has given us of trade enough to enable us to pay the income-tax; we want a little more, in order to enable us to rise above the apprehension of change, and see the interests and the prosperity of the country moving forward in an accelerated ratio. (Cheers.) We are content to bear whatever burdens are needful for the state, willing to be taxed for Queen and country—(applause)—for the administration of law, for army and navy, for the interest of the national debt; but very unwilling to be taxed for the timber-merchants, the sugar-dealers, or the landlords. (Cheers.) We hold that to be quite another thing. We do not feel bound to support them, either in grandeur, or in any state short of that of absolute pauperism; and if they claim the privileges of paupers, they must submit to ask them in paupers' language. (Cheers.) Especially do we demur to our own best feelings, our own noblest exertions, being turned against us for the purposes of class taxation. I mean, in the way in which the philanthropy of the country, its generous, its noble zeal for negro emancipation, has been made to recoil upon it, and serve as a reason for a monopoly in sugar—(hear, hear, hear)—as if we were thus to be screwed down because it was found that we felt for the unhappy negro. This is a most mean and ungenerous use of the feeling that was exhibited by the people of this country on that subject. (Applause.) Did they not cheerfully pay their twenty millions, and was not the burden then complete? Why should we now pay, not for the good of the negro, for that is not in question,—but simply for the interest of the West India proprietor. (Hear, hear.) The negro does not want our interposition; the complaint of the monopolist papers is that the negro is too well off. A paper in their interest, the Morning Herald, says that the state of things cannot be good until the wages of labour of the freed negro is reduced—(hear, hear)—brought down to what it calls "the wholesome European standard." (Applause.) The same paper says that it advocated free labour, but it never meant free idleness. Now, if the emancipated black can afford to be idle now that he is free,—if in that genial climate he can realize all that he deems necessary for his subsistence and his comfort, which has been complained of by some of these newspapers,—if he is even in the way to get so much for his labour as to aggrandize himself, and to become a proprietor of the lands he was once flogged to till, why should we not wish him godspeed? (Cheers.) We have struggled, we have paid for his emancipation; and if emancipation bring him wealth, in the name of Heaven let him possess the enjoyment of that wealth and all the luxuries it can realize. (Applause.) "No," says the mock philanthropy of the day, "you must enable us to compete with slave labour; you must pay us further;" and thus they make your good feeling the instrument of subserving their sordid interests. (Applause.) The philanthropy of our modern West India proprietors reminds me of a story of Barrington, the noted pickpocket, some years ago, whose memoirs were at the time as popular as the stories of Dick Turpin and Jack Sheppard at the present day. He was transported at last; but at Botany Bay he amassed property and became a magistrate—one of the "great unpaid"—no doubt he took care to pay himself. (Applause and laughter.) Well, Barrington one day went to a watchmaker in London, in the city, and gave him directions to make a very delicate instrument, of a very peculiar construction, which he was to call for. It was made, and made to his satisfaction. He praised it much; he paid the man a £10 note for the job, and was going away, when the maker of the instrument preferred the request that he might know the use for which it was intended. "I shall not tell you its use," said Barrington; "afterwards, perhaps, you may discover." As soon as he was gone, the man found the instrument had been already used to draw the £10 note out of his pocket. (Great laughter.) And so you have manufactured a beautiful philanthropy, a genuine one: the West India interest, like Barrington, is using your philanthropy to interest, like Barrington, is using your philanthropy to draw money out of the public pocket; and thus, afterwards, you may discover what the objects were with which this philanthropy passed so readily into the ranks of those who had always been the most determined enemies of negro emancipation. (Loud cheers.) He not satisfied, I say, with present prosperity, with all its appearances; for whilst obstructions to the importation of corn and the exportation of goods remain, not only to limit the operations of commerce, but to spread uncertainty over prices, and everything connected with such transactions. (Hear, hear, and applause.) Why, if one or two bad harvests were to come, where would our prosperity be? (Applause.) The change which came in with low prices would go out with high prices; the same fearful round would have to be trod, from which we have but just emerged; there would be the same outcry, the same want and destitution, the same heart-sickening scenes that but a few years ago produced an impression that can never be obliterated. (Hear, hear.) For there is no security, until the simple and direct application of Free-Trade principles shall be made to all the arrangements of this great commercial country. (Applause.) It is as if the powers of disorder were ever beneath our feet. For a short time a stimulus is given and we rejoice therein. You find it not a motive for relaxation, but to work on; and while there is no better security than we yet possess, what is the result of prosperity but eventually to enrich those who hold the ultimate screw, and who endeavour to turn every aggrandisement of the country and augmentation of its wealth to their own account. (Cheers.) We should never forget what has been witnessed, and what, when it returns, will return in a yet more awful form; for these crises grow continually darker and deeper as they recur. The powers are undiminished in their force and energy by which the last great seasons of distress were occasioned; they are ready, the moment they are let loose, to work again the like disastrous consequences. (Hear, hear.) It is but as the condition of those who live on the side of Vesuvius or Etna: we may grow careless. The field and the mountain side may be rich; the vineyards may be laden with grapes; the wealthy may be careless; pretty cottages and stately mansions may rise here and there; the peasantry may be dancing night and day. But the principles that are at work in the bowels of the earth still keep on with their chemical combinations; the great laboratory never ceases; and in the midst of all this peacefulness and rejoicing, another combination of those elements produces explosion, shakes the solid mountain itself; the burning lava-stream rushes down scattering all before it; the scene changes from one of peacefulness and joy, to one of dreary, wide, and lasting desolation. (Applause.) And if a blind persistence in the cause of monopoly should survive the present time of comparative quiet and prosperity—should hold us until failing harvests, and famine prices, and sinking trade again excite the public mind, and stimulate to madness the feelings of the destitute,—who can say what is too old, too venerable, too sacred, not to be shaken in that convulsion, or give way before that tremendous tempest? (Loud cheers.) We should not wait till the storm arrive, when it will be impossible to rectify that which, with great care, may be harmoniously arranged during the season of calm and sunshine. (Applause.) Therefore now, with might and main, urge on your great work; continue with that peaceful and untiring energy that has hitherto been manifested, and make good your steps in the course which leads to assured success. (Applause.) Men of Manchester, with whom it began, I know you cannot and will not relax. (Cheers.) You did not when alone, before your spirit had spread itself over the whole face of the country, before you had elicited the response of the metropolis; then you were decided and determined, and you cannot cease to be so now. (Cheers.) The resistance of moral nature is at least as great as that of physical nature. There is the security of enlightened determination—a security as great as that of cause and effect in the material creation. The sun and moon once stood still to accommodate array; Cobden and Bright will not stand still to accommodate a government. (Tremendous cheering.) Onward, onward, is their word, whether it be in this mode of action or in that. (Applause.) You will hold your meetings, you will register your voters, you will circulate your tracts, you will send out your lecturers. (Cheers.) Whether you petition Parliament or abstain from petitioning—whether you cultivate the constituencies of counties or of boroughs—whether you subscribe your money or whether you exhibit manufacturing produce—still your tendency is the same, it is a working out towards the great and blessed end—a working out with a power like that of the mighty elements of nature—creating, invisible, or visible—welcome or unwelcome to mortals—judged rightly or wrongly—still they form their combinations, still they go on, the sun shining by day and the moon and stars by night, maturing the richness of varied seasons; and, like them, your moral energy will do its work; a great power of nature, also of our inward and spiritual being, which shall combine with all the elemental influences of heaven and earth to declare the glory of God, and to ensure the well-being of humanity. (The most enthusiastic cheering followed the delivery of this eloquent address.)

George Thompson, Esq., was next called on, and received with loud and prolonged applause. He spoke as follows:—Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I feel impelled to commence my address this evening with the language of fervent congratulation that eloquence has been self-consecrated to the cause of freedom in the largest sense of the word, embracing that freedom which you and your coadjutors in this town, and the members of those vast organizations whose business it is to transact, are seeking to achieve for the trade and commerce of this country. (Hear, hear, hear.) Sir, had I been on the opposite side of the question, I for one, should have been met with feelings of profound admiration, how much that feeling might have mingled with that of regret at the misapplication of talents so great; but I listen to eloquence like that of the gentleman who has gone before me, in the cause of human freedom, and I feel deeply grateful to him who has bestowed such noble gifts, and with those gifts themselves the power to employ them on behalf of the best interests of the human race. (Cheers.) It is a noble sight to see a man consecrating his substance to the good of the world, dealing his bread to the hungry, and bringing the outcast poor into his house. (Applause.) But to me it is a still more precious sight to see talents that might obtain for their possessor pre-eminence in any of the departments of usefulness, and distinction among the intellectual of the age,—to see such a man refusing to be a man of talent, and identifying himself closely and sympathetically with those who are in bondage, sharing their lot, and willing to bear any amount of reproach if it be the instrument of leading them into that which is the design of our Creator that all men should be free. (Applause.) Honour then, Sir, to him who has done this to-night—(loud cheers)—who has done this to the people for the people's good, and not alone in this place, but in every part of the country, and in every other way, is unceasingly employed in striving to elevate the humblest inhabitants of this country to a station of equality, in mind and self-respect at least, with the proudest and the noblest in our country. (Applause.) I have, Sir, to congratulate my friends about me on the progress which this great cause has made since I was last upon this platform, some twelve months ago. I had then to congratulate you upon the progress you had been making during the previous two years; and a progress as great as any made during a preceding period has marked your history during the last twelve months. (Applause.) There seems to be almost universally, at the present time, a conviction in the minds of men,—however they may hang to particular systems of protection for their own sake, and the sake of the class to which they belong,—that our circumstances do imperatively call for the application, in a very wide degree, of the great principles of Free Trade. (Applause.) They cannot look at our ever-increasing population, they cannot compute our redundant capital, they cannot look upon our augmenting productive energy, they cannot contemplate the expansive and expanding enterprise, without feeling convinced that larger spheres of action, that wider markets, that a freer exchange with the nations of the earth, that, in fact, unrestricted commerce is absolutely necessary for us above all nations on the face of the earth, in order that we may maintain our position, and put the necessities of life within the reach of all our fellow-subjects. (Loud applause.) And if this be the general conviction, I think we may fairly say that it is owing to the unexampled exertions which have been made by the Anti-Corn-Law League to enlighten the public mind, and to give to the people a right understanding, both of their necessities, and of the rights to which they are entitled as members of this great society. (Applause.) One thought has occurred to me to-night, and it is this:—It is a strange fact that the great impediments which we are called upon by a society, and as the people of this country, to remove—the great impediments that lie in our way to prosperity, to wealth, to stability as a nation, and to pre-eminence amongst the nations of the world, are not of a natural kind, but are self-created. (Hear, hear.) They are created by law—(applause);—for it is strange that an assembly of men, intrusted with the power of making laws for this country, who are responsible for the use they make of that power, and under the most solemn obligations to use it for the best interests of their fellow-subjects—that these men are the men who have exerted that power for the purpose of throwing impediments in the way of a nation's welfare, when the knowledge, the ingenuity, the perseverance, and the enterprise of that nation had removed all other impediments out of the way. (Cheers.) There are extensive markets in the world, where all our people's manufactures might find a ready and profitable sale. We know where these markets are; we have the means of reaching them; those who carry to them our goods meet with no molestation on the shores of these distant countries; they are welcomed there; and there is an abundance of produce with which to freight their ships upon the homeward voyage. We want not men to man our vessels; we are not afraid of the winds or the weather; we have triumphed over the elements to a great extent; we reckon now by minutes and not by miles—by hours and not by degrees of latitude and longitude. (Hear, hear.)

—The keels of our merchant ships are cutting all waters; and all nations of the earth might be rendered, by the productions of their varied soils, tributary to our comfort and to our wealth. (Applause.) The difficulty we have to contend with is home-born (hear, hear, hear); it has originated among those who ought to be, of all other men in the world, foremost in removing impediments out of the way. (Applause.) The nation has done all for itself that is necessary, and now only asks that its own Government and its own so-called representatives will not prevent the people from reaping the advantages which they might reap from the various wants of mankind, from the diversified riches of the earth, and from the free exchange of benefits which would be, to the greatest possible extent, advantageous to mankind at large. (Applause.) I say, Sir, it is a reproach to our country that this should be so. (Cheers.) It is to the dishonour of our Legislature that this should be so. (Loud applause.) And it is, above all, reproachful to them and to us that it should be so, for the simple purpose of advancing the interests of particular classes in society. (Applause.) What is it with which we are contending? What is called the principle of protection? I have said before in this town that I know not a word in the English language more abused than that. (Hear, hear.) The party ostensibly sought to be protected are not protected. (Applause.) I have recently been in India; I know what the word "protection" means there. (Hear, hear.) We have never "protected" a prince whom we have not dethroned—(applause)—we have never "protected" a people whom we have not deprived of their liberty, whose institutions we have not annihilated, whose every acre of land we have not grasped, and whom we have not "protected" with a land-tax which taken from them 45 per cent. of their produce. (Applause.) This is "protection" in India; and "protection" in England means the general and universal oppression and plunder of the people. (Cheers.) We understand at our firesides, the word "protection" to mean the doing of good to others, and not the enriching of ourselves. We don't so protect the stranger and the outcast that come to our doors. (Applause.) We don't so protect the poor that cast themselves upon our benevolence and generosity; but those who undertake to protect us, and to protect us before they are asked to do so (applause), turn out to be only protectors of themselves at our expense. (Cheers.) And, consequently, it is established, I think, beyond all doubt, that there has been a grand mistake in bestowing upon this system the name that it bears, and that it ought to be called by that plain name which Col. Thompson has given it,—“Robbery.” (Loud applause.) Many events have transpired since we met together in this place; and one of the most interesting of these events has been the announcement by Sir Robert Peel, in the House of Commons, of his intention to make very considerable alterations in the tariff of the country. I for one, cannot be disposed to think that at present, he is entitled to much more of our gratitude than that which has been described by the eloquent gentleman who has gone before me. It seems no very sublime height of virtue to have attained in the way of practice, to make the nation a present of duties amounting to some three millions and a half; while at the same time he takes, in another way, five millions out of their pockets. (Cheers.)

I do not know how he could have done less than he has done, with such a surplus revenue as that which he has obtained by means of an income and property tax. (Hear, hear.) Something he was obliged to do; and he has found out a way of absorbing it all. (Applause.) He wants more than a million for the purpose of augmenting the navy, and he is asking for some addition, I believe, to the army; and he makes us a present of the rest, by which the duty is taken off 430 articles. Still, we are not here to quarrel with Sir Robert Peel for what he has done; but we have to quarrel with him on account of what he has not done. (Applause.) Sir, I think we may look very hopefully, however, to the present state of things; and it is right that we should do justice to the Prime Minister of this country. I think much credit is due to him, under the circumstances; and I think he would do much more for us, if all who call themselves Liberals and Free-Traders in the abstract, were so in reality, both in the House of Commons and out of it. (Cheers.) I think we have no right to wonder that so little is done, considering the class of men by whom the Minister is surrounded: if you look at the circumstances under which he was brought into power—if you look at the threats that have been held out to him—ay, if you read the last speech of the Duke of Buckingham, when he took the chair at the dinner to celebrate the return of Mr. Towers for the county, you will find that in every thing that Sir Robert Peel does, in the way of diminishing the restrictions upon our trade, he flies directly in the face of these mighty dukes, and of those who sympathise with them in upholding the present protection of the Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) Now, I think we have much more reason to complain of the men on the opposite side of the House, who declare protection to be the bane of agriculture one night, and come down and ask protection for the West India body the next night (applause); who absent themselves when a motion going to the root of the matter is before the House, who then leave the benches empty, and come back again only to bid for the support of the West India body, by promising them protection to which they are not entitled, a protection which, but a few evenings before, was denounced by themselves as the bane of agriculture. (Cheers.) I cannot look at the history of Sir Robert Peel during the last two or three years, without coming to this conclusion, that he has made his election,—that he has determined upon what he will base his fame,—that he has chosen “for better or worse,”—to stand or fall in a great effort to be the liberator of the commerce of this country. (Applause.) I speak not now of Sir Robert Peel as a man: I may entertain but small respect for his character as a man; I speak of him as a statesman, as an ambitious man, as a sagacious man, as a man who reads the signs of the times, as a man who knows where strength abides, upon whom he may best depend for support, and who have the best means of supporting him (applause)—as a man who knows the wants of this country, as a man not forgetting the rock from whence he was taken (loud applause)—who has something like commercial blood in his veins, who has no lineage that he can trace back to the Normans (hear, hear), but who stands closely identified by his inheritance, by his descent, with the commercial and trading classes of the community. (Applause.) And I cannot look at what he has said, and the little he has done, without coming to this conclusion, that he has determined hereafter, if he enjoys fame at all, to enjoy that fame as the emancipator of the commerce and manufactures of this country. (Applause.) And when those who are now influenced only by factious motives, and the many others who are hanging on to the tails of their skirts, in the hope—growing less and less day by day—that those whom they follow so obsequiously may one day place them in office,—I say, when these men shall be convinced that they are but the impotent representatives of a once extensive and respectable, but now powerless, and defunct party—(applause)—and when they have a near prospect of certain questions being put to them on the hustings—they will come round to the views so honestly maintained by your champions in the House of Commons, by those who entered in such close connexion with this Anti-Corn-Law League; and when that shall come to pass,—when, with or without political power or place, these men shall give an honest opinion, and an honest vote in the House of Commons,—I rather think Sir Robert Peel will then go a great deal further than he has gone, and will not only allow arsenic to come in duty free, but corn and sugar also. (Cheers.) Looking at the materials with which he has had to work, I think he has done much (applause); and looking at what was said to him by the farmers—I beg pardon, “the farmers’ friends”—I think the wonder is that he has been able to accomplish the little that he has accomplished. (Applause.) At a great meeting recently held in Covent-garden Theatre, Mr. Bright, in the course of an admirable speech, read a passage from one of the works of Leigh Hunt—a paper in the Indicator—intended to set forth the position of Sir Robert Peel and his followers, in which Sir Robert was described as heading a parcel of unruly and by no means intelligent fellows, that might be likened to pigs on their way to Smithfield. (Applause and laughter.) Now, Sir, I find in the Times newspaper of this very day, a very similar passage in reference to the feeling entertained by this class in regard to Sir Robert Peel. The Times says:—“The persevering confidence of the agriculturists must now and then inflict a pang even in the remorseless bosom of the Premier. That their confidence must be retained, and must also be abused, is, to say the least, an unpleasant necessity. Fondly credulous, they not only believe what is said, and that in the largest sense, but they even construe silence into the language of hope. They will not be undeceived. They condemn themselves, body and soul, substance and expectations, to the butcher who triumphs in their ruin. The more he has seduced and denied them, the more do they yield to his arts, and bring on themselves fresh repudiation. They must catch it from their cattle. The poor things bleat, and low, and express all kinds of inarticulate annoyance, and try first this lane, then that, but eventually find their way to the slaughterer, to the slaughterer, or wherever else fate may lead them. It must be so. How else shall the lords of the creation be fed and clothed? Still, in one’s hungriest and nakedest mood, one relents a little at the sight of their misplaced confidence and ill-requited affection. If the human agriculturist were only an ignorant and unsuspicious of the future as the animal—if he would only consent to be happy till the very blow, or its gloomy preliminaries, we should not need to be so much distressed on his account.

"The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed to-day,
Had he thy reason, would he skip and play?"

But, unfortunately, they will not skip and play. They complain very lustily. Nevertheless, their confidence is unabated. Sir Robert is still their master. They still come to him for food and protection, still lick his hand, and suffer him to stroke down their allies. Long may that confidence remain undisturbed. The dominion of Sir Robert over the landowner we hold to be as important just now as that of man over the brute. Still it is not without circumstances to excite one's pity. There we have the condition of what is called the landed aristocracy of the country,—valiant out of doors, but mute in the House of Commons,—vowing what they will do when they gather round the dinner table at the Freemasons' Tavern, but making no sturdy stand against the inroads of Sir Robert Peel in the House of Commons. (Applause.) Well, now, with such a body of men, having already considerably annoyed them in the matter of cattle and the Canadian Corn Bill, can we wonder that he has not gone much further than he has gone, looking at the conduct and the language of monopoly held by those who sit on the opposite side of the House? (Applause.) I say, Sir, in meetings like these we should express our sentiments honestly. (Applause.) If those who are professing to be Liberals, and to denounce all kinds of protection in the abstract, are found to be bidding still for the support of men whose support they cannot obtain, unless in practice they concede the principle, and sustain and uphold the monopolies which we denounce—(applause)—why, here, on this very question of sugar, we find Sir Robert Peel is left without an alternative. He is not likely, with the wisdom he possesses, to risk a defeat; and when he finds the leader of the Liberal party coming forward to tell the West Indians, in so many words, that he considers they have a right to protection, and that he intends to give it to them—how can we expect Sir Robert Peel to do more than he has done? (Applause.) With regard to the argument by which they seek to vindicate their discriminating duties, I have only this to say, that it excites my most unmingled disgust. (Applause.) I agree with the eloquent gentleman who has gone before me, that they are taking advantage of the philanthropy of the people of this country. (Hear, hear.) I think it is of all spectacles the most revolting, to see men who, when slavery existed, were its firm supporters, and who went to considerable expense to defeat the efforts that were made twelve or thirteen years ago,—to see these men now claiming for themselves an astonishing amount of sympathy with slaves, and robbing the people of this country to the amount of £2,500,000 a year, upon the plea of monopoly, the extinction of the foreign slave trade, and the slavery of the American states and colonies, is a most deplorable and revolting sight. Why, here you have an astounding fact: almost every man who now votes for an equalization of the duties on sugar, is a man who represents an anti-slavery constituency. And many of these men would never have been in the House of Commons had they not given a direct and unequivocal answer to the question put to them in Manchester, in Sheffield, and elsewhere. Have Manchester and Sheffield changed their opinions? No. Have those men changed their opinions? No. But, by the very same rule according to which they indeed that the negro had a right to freedom, they arrive at this conclusion also: that every man in this country, and throughout the world, has a right to carry the result of his labour to the best market, and to have no impediment placed in his way in the shape of fiscal regulations to fetter the exchange of the productions of his industry for the articles that are presented to him in the open market of the world. (Loud applause.) Sir, the inconsistency of the present Government has been admirably exhibited in a speech of extraordinary ability, which was delivered by the Hon. Mr. Macaulay in the House of Commons—a speech I should recommend to the attentive perusal of all who wish to understand this great question, namely—whether our Government, whether any Government, has a right, upon such a plea as that which is put forward by Sir Robert Peel and his supporters, to tax the people of this country, and to deprive them of their right to Free Trade. I stand not here, nor anywhere else, as the apologist of slavery. (Hear, hear.) I think I shall not be accused of loving the slavery of the United States, the slavery of Brazil, or the slavery of any other part of the world. (Applause.) But I cannot consent to purchase even the abolition of slavery, to interfere with negro slavery, by the sacrifice of the liberty of my fellow-subjects and fellow-countrymen. (Applause.) I hold that the negro has a right to be personally free. (Hear, hear.) I hold it to be an equally sacred principle that every individual in this great community should be free to carry his industry to the best market. (Applause.) And I deny the right of Government to undertake to settle that question of morality—whether I, by purchasing Brazilian sugar in the market, or Carolina rice, or Virginia tobacco, or the cotton of Alabama, become of necessity a participant in the crime of the man-stealer of the coast of Africa, or the slaveholder in any other part of the world. I deny that the Government is instituted for any such purpose as to legislate for the consciences of men. (Applause.) Submit the question to the bench of bishops; ask them to give their reasons and their opinions; and there will be as many opinions as bishops on that bench. (Applause.) Submit it to any six men or six women in this country, and they would most likely frankly tell you, "We cannot settle the question." They would, perhaps, know what they ought to do as individuals, but would say they could not decide for others. (Applause.) And this is the reason why the question should not be interfered in by the Legislature. But for men who would not even vote for the abolition of the practice of flogging women, who stood by the slavery of our own colonies when their votes could have annihilated it years ago, and who kept up that system to the last, to make this a plea for protection of free labour is sheer hypocrisy. (Cheers.) Mr. Thompson concluded by congratulating the meeting on the progress which Free-Trade principles had made since last they met, and were making, and on the prospects of the Bazaar, and sat down amidst great cheering.

JOHN HUDGINS, Esq., in moving a vote of thanks to the speakers, spoke briefly in reference to the proposed sugar duties, and said that the arrangement intended to be carried out respecting clayed and muscovado sugars could never be worked. A similar system had been tried in tea, but it could not be carried out.

The motion having been seconded by Alderman WALKER, was carried; and the meeting then gave three cheers for Free Trade, and separated.

MEETINGS OF THE WILTSHIRE LABOURERS.

Our readers will probably remember that, some months ago, we reported several meetings of agricultural labourers in Wiltshire, to make known their privations, and seek some redress for their grievances. During the winter the sufferings of the Wiltshire peasantry have been most severe, and they are again assembling in large numbers to remonstrate with the Legislature, and claim attention to their miserable and degraded condition. It is an example worthy of imitation in other counties. It is by such means only that public opinion can be awakened to the fearful state of the agricultural districts. It is the want of organization among the agricultural labourers that has led to their deep and almost hopeless degradation. Public meetings are the only effectual means of resistance to wrong or oppression; and the peaceable exercise of this right by the peasantry of other counties would soon arouse public sympathy to an effort for the amelioration of their condition. We beg to call the attention of our readers to the following report, and more especially to the plain and homely narrative of wretchedness contained in the letter of Isaac Hart. It is a picture of privation and suffering common to thousands in every strictly rural district of the country; and the "Lords of Protection" would do well to read the "signs of the times" exhibited in these spontaneous meetings of the Wiltshire peasantry.

(From the Wiltshire Independent.)

The labouring classes of this place and its neighbourhood have not been exempt from the distress which has long existed in other parts of this county, and which the severity of the past winter has not a little increased. Under these circumstances they are led to ponder on the causes which have produced, and are still producing, scarcity of employment and lowness of wages; and, having before them the example of many other districts in this county, they have met spontaneously, and in large numbers, to make known their distress and to petition Parliament to inquire into its cause.

Their meeting was announced for Monday evening last, at the large room of the Red Lion Inn, Avebury; and at the hour appointed (seven o'clock) the large club-room was crowded, while hundreds were outside striving in vain for admission. It was evident that the meeting could not be held in doors; and then ensued a scene of excitement which is past description, arising from the endeavours of those who had obtained places in the room to get out, and the eager efforts of those outside to obtain admission. At length, it became understood that the intention was to hold the meeting in the open air, upon which quiet was restored. In a few minutes chairs were placed in front of the house for the speakers, and before them, spite of the bitter cold, upwards of 1500 people, almost entirely of the labouring class, were gathered together; not, be it remembered, to hear any distinguished orator, but to listen to the addresses of working men, like themselves, and, some of them, in their own plain but touching and truthful language publicly to make known their condition.

GEORGE ROYCE, of Marlborough, was called to the chair, and opened the business of the meeting by calling on

GEORGE AWDRY, a shoemaker, residing at Marlborough, who moved the first resolution; and in a straightforward and honest manner, drew a picture of the condition of the poor, the truth of which was borne witness to by the exclamations and by the hearty assent of all who heard him.

WILLIAM MAIDMENT seconded the resolution; and from his own experience confirmed the statements of the preceding speaker as to the destitution of the labouring classes.

Several agricultural labourers then came forward, and, in simple language, told tales of distress, deprivation, and suffering, which could not fail to move the coldest heart; distress which, if one might judge from the kind of running commentary kept up, during the detail, by the multitude, was the lot not only of those who thus publicly stated it, but of the majority of those who were present.

The second resolution was moved by J. WESTALL, of Marlborough, who endeavoured to impress upon the labourers the necessity of publicly and peaceably investigating their own grievances, and pointed out the benefits to be derived from such meetings as the present.

WILLIAM EDWARDS seconded the resolution, and entered fully and clearly into a history of the corn and other restrictive laws, showing their injustice, and the injury they inflicted on the working classes, in a way which did credit to his head and to his heart, and which elicited frequent applause.

The third resolution was briefly moved by J. BOND, and seconded by W. ARMSTRONG, baker; after which a petition (which appears below) was read and adopted by acclamation. The greatest earnestness prevailed both on the part of speakers and hearers. The multitude quietly dispersed about 10 o'clock.

RESOLUTIONS.

1st.—Moved by GEO. AWDRY, and seconded by H. MAIDMENT, "That this meeting is fully convinced, from the numerous proofs in its own neighbourhood, from evidence it has received from other quarters, and from the general information furnished through the medium of the press, that distress of the most alarming character every where prevails, and that misery so universal demands from the Legislature an immediate inquiry."

2nd.—Moved by J. WESTALL, seconded by W. EDWARDS, "That it is the opinion of this meeting, that the corn and other restrictive laws passed by the Legislature, under the idea that they would benefit the country, have had a directly opposite effect, and are the primary cause of the distress and misery now experienced by the labouring poor, especially those of the rural districts."

3rd.—Moved by J. BOND, seconded by W. ARMSTRONG, "That this meeting views with admiration the praiseworthy exertions of Mr. Cobden, the member for Stockport, and are resolved to support that gentleman by a petition to the House of Commons, praying that House to agree to the motion about to be submitted to them, for inquiry into the state of the agricultural classes, as the only means to extricate the farmer from his embarrassment, and permanently to benefit the labourer."

To the Honourable the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled;

The Petition of the undersigned labourers and others, residing at Avebury and the neighbourhood, in the county of Wilts, in public meeting assembled;

Showeth,—That your petitioners have been told that the Corn and Provision Laws were passed for their benefit, and that the total and immediate repeal of those laws is resisted by the Government and by the landed aristocracy, on the ground that, by their repeal, the labourers of England would be reduced to a state of destitution and misery.

That your petitioners are, and long have been, in the greatest poverty and want, the employment furnished, and the wages given (now that they are under the protection of those laws) being totally insufficient to maintain them and their families in comfort, in decency, or even in health.

That your petitioners, therefore, are not afraid that the repeal of the Corn Laws would prove injurious to them, their condition being already far worse than that of felons in gaol, or even of paupers in the workhouse.

They, therefore, humbly pray your Honourable House to agree to the motion of the honourable member for Stockport for inquiry into the state of the agricultural classes, being convinced that, whatever the Corn Laws may have done towards keeping up rents, they have neither benefited the labourer, nor his employer, the farmer; and fully believing that inquiry would bring to light such a state of things in the rural districts as would induce the Legislature to renounce the idea that Corn Laws are necessary to the welfare of the labouring classes in England.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

Signed on behalf of the meeting,

By the Chairman, GEO. ROYCE.

A correspondent sends us the following case, illustrative of the condition of the peasantry of Wiltshire:—

"I have enclosed a letter addressed by a poor old woman, an agricultural labourer to a friend, touching the condition of his daughter and her family. I need not make any remarks on the letter; it is simple and eloquent, and speaks for itself. The first paragraph I could not cut off, but even that shows that the writer is a worthy man, and proves that he is anxious to pay a small debt. The writer, Isaac Hart, is a thoroughly respectable old man, of good moral character. His age is 75, or thereabouts; and his ability to work being gone, he is supported by the Corn Union. As to the case mentioned in the letter, that of the Franklins, it is by no means a solitary one; indeed it is a fair sample of the condition of the labouring population of North Wilts, excepting from them carters, shepherds, and those few among them who receive rather higher wages than are commonly paid, and have some sort of perquisites. To be in the condition of the Franklins is the rule, and not the exception, among the peasantry of Wiltshire. Poor old Hart wrote to the guardians of the Calne Union respecting his daughter's case, and two of the guardians called on him, and told him 'the hard would not do anything for the family because his daughter was a bad manager.' How they can manage to do ought but starve with such means passes my comprehension. It is too bad to taunt the poor with being bad managers. I should like to see Mr. Banks, or Mr. John Benett, lay their plans for the lodging, feeding, clothing, and warming of a family of seven persons for a week, and only 7s. to do it with."

Hillmarston, January 10, 1845.

"MY DEAR FRIEND,—I hope it is well with you and well with your Mother and your unkel. I have been expecting for some time to see you to pay you for the things that I received; but I do expect I shall see you sooner or later. With respect to myself, I am much the same as when I saw you last. Thomas Hart, and his wife and family, and your Master, Mr. and Mrs. Archerd, are all well.

"but I have a grievance to state to you a bout my Daughter, Jane Frankling. Thomas Frankling's wife she is now confined with her fifth child, and they only six shillings a week to support herself and a wife nearly confined, and five children—that is, seven in family. It is true his wages is seven Shilling a week; but his Master, altho one of the guardians, takes one shilling a week out of the poor man's seven for house-rent; another shilling is needed for fireing, and another is needed for garment and shoes, and a few needy things; this will deduct his seven shillings down to four shillings a week, to support himself, a hard labouring man, and a wife nearly confined, and five children; no more than one penny a day each. I went to see them myself, and I found them thus: four poor children below stairs, crying in hunger and cold, and not one bit of bread in the house to give them; the poor woman up stairs, and a very aged woman with her: my daughter was in labour in childbirth, and in great distress. I went to a neighbour house and bought a loaf of bread to give the poor children, and that saved their crying. No one was provided, that is, no nurse was provided for to attend to the poor woman, therefore I provided for to attend to the poor woman, and to do the best she could for her, and I would pay her myself out of my small income.

"now, my Dear friend, this is a truth that can be brought forward if needed; and I should be glad for you to publish the same, only I beg you to keep my name out of it, except it was needed to be brought to light, and then, if needed, I would come forward without fear. What I mean is, you know, that they would take any advantage of me if they could."

ISAAC HART.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, MANCHESTER, AND MR. HIRLEY.

TRIUMPH OF THE LEAGUE.

The special meeting of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufacturers, to consider the propriety of expressing their opinion on the exclusion from office of one of the directors, on the alleged ground of having acted as a shareholder of an election committee, was held on Tuesday, at the Town-hall, at eleven o'clock, when there was one of the most numerous assemblages of this body ever yet known. Among the gentlemen present, in addition to Thomas Bazley, Esq., jun. (president), were the following:—Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., and John Bright, Esq., M.P. (who were loudly cheered on entering the room), R. P. Livingstone, Malcolm Ross, John Hyde, Thos. Bright, Lewis Williams, Jas. Atherton, Wm. Bickham, M. Curtis, H. Grounds, John Harding, Geo. Peel, G. Paton, John Shawcross, S. Fletcher, D. Ainsworth, E. Armitage, W. L. Kelsall, Wm. Harvey, Nathan Lees, J. Turner, T. Roberts, W. Gibb, Ald. Hopkins, W. B. Watkins, Henry Ashworth, George Wilson, W. Evans, E. Ashworth, J. Garnett, S. Walker, S. Lees, W. McCall, John Potter, R. Pownall, — Royle, J. Simpson, S. Seed, J. Macvicar, Ald. Shuttleworth, P. Lucas, W. Rawson, John Cheatham, Ald. Murray, W. R. Callender, Ald. Kershaw, H. Houldsworth, Ald. Burd, John Brooks, T. P. Potter, E. Shawcross, R. Barbour, John Herford, J. Swindell, W. Morris, T. H. Williams, J. C. Harter, J. W. Fraser, Thomas Cooke, J. P. Westhead, Thomas Woolley, S. L. Behrens, J. Swanwick, John Chippendale, Edward Tootal, J. B. Wanklyn, Ald. Willert, John McClure, John Sharp, J. H. Wanklyn, Smith Philip Robinson, Ald. Neild, &c. The following is a copy of the requisition upon which the meeting was called:—

"We, the undersigned, being at least one-fourth in number of the members of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures, do hereby request you to call a special general meeting of the chamber, to consider the propriety of expressing its opinions on the exclusion from office, at the recent annual meeting, of one of the directors for the last year, recommended for re-election by the board, on the alleged ground of his having acted as chairman of an election committee."

After some proceedings on a point of order, Mr. HENRY HOULDSWORTH moved—"That this meeting regrets the decision of the last annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, whereby an active member of the board of directors was excluded from the board on the ground of his having taken an active part in securing the election of a member of Parliament having views on the question of Free Trade not in accordance with the declared opinions of a majority of the chamber; and conceiving that the principle urged in favour of such a course is at variance with the constitution of the chamber, and calculated to lessen its weight and usefulness, hereby declares its opinion that to exclude any member from the direction on the ground of his political opinion or conduct, or for the part which he may think proper to take in the election of members of Parliament, is to give the chamber a character of exclusiveness at variance with its original constitution, and injurious to the leading objects of such an institution."

J. A. TURNER, Esq., seconded the motion.

An amendment was moved by Mr. Alderman SHUTTLEWORTH, seconded by Mr. T. H. WILLIAMS, that the meeting do adjourn. On the division, the numbers were—

For the adjournment .. .. .	101

Majority .. .. . 19

The result therefore is, that the attempt to censure the Chamber of Commerce, which was interpreted to mean an attack on the Anti-Corn-Law League, has completely failed. A full meeting of the Chamber has been held, and instead of a "great majority," which the Manchester Guardian anticipated, there were only 82 members out of the 300 to vote against the proceedings of the meeting which selected Mr. Barnes in preference to Mr. Bailey.

FREE-TRADE MEETING AT COVENTRY.

(Abridged from the Coventry Herald.)

Notwithstanding Mr. Newdegate's taunt at a recent meeting of the "Protection Society" in London, that the League had "retired from the field" in this county, the Free-Traders last Tuesday evening made one of the best "demonstrations" in this city which has ever taken place. The announcement of the well-known and weighty names of Colonel Thompson, George Thompson, Esq., and Robert R. Moore, Esq., drew together at St. Mary's Hall a thronged attendance of the labouring, trading, and manufacturing classes, including a good portion of ladies, who occupied the front benches. The Mayor of Coventry presided.

Colonel THOMPSON, on being introduced, was received with loud cheers. His speech was well received, and many of his illustrations told with effect. Speaking of the Coventry silk trade, he said:—"He had heard that an idea was cherished that there were some peculiarities in the Coventry trade, the ribbon trade for instance, which ought to make it exempt from the application of Free-Trade principles. But how was this notion to be refuted? If Coventry and the ribbon trade could get re-emption or protection in its own favour and keep it to itself, it might be all very well; but it so happened that other trades and places asserted their claim to similar exemptions, and what they called protection became public robbery. The putting restrictions on trade was in fact encouraging one trade to rob another, and the amount of which they thus robbed each other was just as much wasted as if it were thrown into the sea."

Mr. ROBERT R. MOORE followed in an eloquent speech, in which he showed that the peculiar branch of manufacture in which Coventry was engaged, proved more strongly than any other he could select, the disadvantage of monopoly, and the advantage of Free Trade. He also gave a brief view of many other branches of the subject.

Mr. GEORGE THOMPSON, who had come specially from London, next addressed the meeting, and made many telling hits against the proposed Government measures, as far as they are hostile to Free Trade; and exposed with great power the feeble grounds on which a distinction is assumed in favour of slave-grown cotton, but against slave-grown sugar, by Sir R. Peel and his supporters.

On the motion of the Rev. J. GORDON, seconded by Mr. JOSEPH CASH, a vote of thanks was given to Colonel Thompson, Robert R. Moore, Esq., and G. Thompson, for their kindness in attending and addressing the meeting.

MEETING IN BRISTOL.

ANTI-CORN-LAW BAZAAR.
(Abridged from the Bristol Gazette.)
In pursuance of the notice contained in our last, a tea meeting of those attached to the principles of Free Trade was held at the Public Rooms, Broadmead, on Monday evening. The more immediate object of the meeting was to bring under the notice of those present, and of friends elsewhere, the Bazaar proposed to be held in Covent-garden Theatre, in May next, in aid of the funds of that great League, which, with such dauntless and persevering efforts, continues to assail the remaining bulwarks of monopoly. From the respectability and numbers of those who attended the meeting, as well as from the interest taken in the subject by many ladies, we anticipate that the stall to be allotted to Bristol will present such a display as will be worthy of its position, and worthy of the interest which it takes in the great cause.

The doors were opened at five o'clock, and by six the spacious room was nearly filled. The arrangements for the tea, &c., were on the same scale of comfort and liberality which has given so much satisfaction on former occasions. Among the strangers present we noticed James Adam Gordon, Esq., of Nash-house; and Thom, the weaver poet. In the lamented absence of Earl Ducie, occasioned by renewed indisposition, the chair, at the conclusion of tea, was taken by

GEORGE THOMAS, Esq., who proceeded to address the meeting. Having expressed his regret that he should have to take the chair in the absence of Earl Ducie, he read the following letter:—

"DEAR MR. THOMAS,—I am sorry to say that I am again in bed, my knee having given way on my first attempt to ride after five months' interval of doctoring."

"There is, I fear, not the slightest chance of my being able to move for some days, so pray, therefore, make my excuses at Bristol, on Monday."

"Yours faithfully, Ducie."

The Chairman then explained the object of the meeting, namely, to solicit their assistance in order that Bristol might be well represented at the Covent-garden Bazaar. He next addressed the meeting at much length on the general question of Free Trade, elucidating his views by cogent arguments and apt illustrations. The Chairman, in conclusion, again reverted to the Bazaar; he said:—

"I have not stated one thing, but which I ought to have done before, viz.:—that we do not come here to make a collection. Still, in order to carry out the objects of the Bazaar, I hope that Bristol will maintain her position, so that when we go to Covent-garden we shall not find the old city in the shade. (Cheers.) In order to do so, some of us must advance money to help those who are willing to work, but who have not the means to pay for the raw material. Many of our female friends give their labour, and ought not under any circumstances to be called on to do more; but there are many mechanics and other skilful persons to whom it would be an advantage if we could enable them to get materials wherewith they could manufacture many articles which would be worth showing. I should be very glad to see the ingenuity of the citizens of Bristol employed in this way; I mean those who have not the means of giving their time or money towards the furtherance of our objects. (Hear.) I hope many who are here this evening will be induced to furnish the means to those who are willing to work. A gentlemen's committee and a ladies' committee have been formed, so that two of the points alluded to in the general address are settled. I hope that some of the manufacturers of Bristol will show some performances of skill in the various arts; and now that the duty has been taken off, I hope we shall have the pleasure of witnessing some of the beautiful productions of the glass manufacture. I shall be glad to receive contributions to the Bazaar in any way that may be agreeable to the donor."

The Chairman then concluded amidst loud cheers by calling on G. Thompson, Esq., to address the meeting.

Mr. G. THOMPSON, on rising, was received with loud cheers. In an eloquent speech he reviewed the progress of the Free-Trade question in Bristol, the difficulties they had overcome, and those which still stood in their way to final success. He denounced the injustice of that legislation which prevented the people from availing themselves of the great advantages they might otherwise derive from their enterprise, industry, skill, and capital. He was not afraid to discuss the question on the ground of expediency, for that which was right was ever expedient; and if it was proved to be just to abolish the Corn Laws, that was enough to establish its expediency. The eloquent speaker then reviewed the several points involved in the new tariff, and ridiculed, with happy effect, many of its details; he asserted protection to be an evil, and that its total abolition would promote the welfare of all classes of the community. Apart from all lower considerations, the Free-Traders claimed free and unrestricted trade as the right of every man,—a right which could not be denied him without positive injustice.

Colonel THOMPSON was received with loud and repeated cheering. The colonel commenced by a graphic portraiture of the Premier, and, his prototype, an eminent historical character:—

"I certainly feel great obligation, if I may be permitted to do such a thing, to the present director of England's fortunes, for what he has done, according to his opportunities, for the benefit of the country over which he presides. (Cheers.) It was ever my opinion, that want of knowledge was not that Minister's defect; and every step he takes has shown it, and will show it still. (Hear, hear.) Depend upon it he knows all about it, as well as either you or I do. (Cheers and laughter.) Why should not he? (Continued cheers and laughter.) Has he not commercial blood in him as we have? He is no Norman, no aristocrat. (Cheers.) He came from cotton-spinning (laughter), and in plenty of cotton-spinning he will end. (Continued laughter.) His position, it is clear, is difficult. We perhaps could find nobody to do so well for us if put into his place. See now if he does not turn out the greatest man in his line, that has appeared in the world since Duke Maurice of Saxony. (Cheers.) That eminent individual was born a Protestant, and was a Protestant at heart,—living during the grand struggle for the Reformation on the Continent. But he had no taste for martyrdom; his talents did not lie in that direction. (Laughter.) He temporized; he kept clear of the stake; he did more, he kept his dukedom. (Laughter.) He did what perhaps to you or me would have been exceedingly painful—he went with the stream (laughter); he offered no resistance where resistance would have been in vain; he took care not to diminish his usefulness. Is not that the phrase? (Laughter and cheers.) When invited by others to assist them—no, not at all. He passed for an enemy with many; to a certain extent he was so; but the hour arrived when the weakness of the oppressive power of that age came upon it, and then Duke Maurice of Saxony was in his place. (Great cheers.) Something like that will be the end of the present eventful history. He will make no sacrifice of self without a purpose. When the time comes, he will go to his followers and say, 'Office is not my desire; if, gentlemen, you have anybody that can do better for you than I, why don't you take him?' (Cheers and laughter.) In the meantime he, like the mouse that liberated the lion in the fable, will be gnawing away one mesh after another of the bonds which hold down his country's industry. Depend on it that man, by virtue of the blood from which he sprang, has entertained the idea of being the liberator of his country's commerce; and he will be so, and laugh at nobility. (Great cheering.) I speak of snakes; was it three, or was it four hundred and thirty, that he has gnawed just now? (Cheers.) No one of them in itself, perhaps, of any great importance; all of them together making a considerable large hole towards our escape." (Cheers.)

The veteran speaker put a few more finishing touches to complete the picture.

"After the intelligence he has displayed on that other crabbed subject of the currency, do you think there can be a hole or cranny in the question of the Corn Laws with which he is not familiar? He assured that lack of knowledge never was his weakness. (Laughter.) Nor will he show weakness of any other kind when the time shall come. I do not present him as practising any deceit upon his followers. I bargain for his doing the best he can for them, and that they shall tell him so. But the time is not far off when he will say to his own party, 'Gentlemen, is it your desire to have the amputation performed by a friendly surgeon or by an unfriendly?' " (Loud cheers.)

The monopolists' cry-out against "foreign trade" is thus pithily met:—

"Foreign trade! foreign trade! I would put down all foreign trade by act of Parliament—teach people to trade with the country they live in." It a man had blurted out this, you would have been everywhere ready with the answer. You would not have found an apprentice boy but would have been ready to tell him, that foreign trade is advantageous because it brings in a greater quantity of good things than would be got by trading at home;—that the only reason why a man should wish to hinder it is, that he may be able to make us carry on a bad trade with him at home, instead of a good one abroad. What is all this monopoly in favour of a bad home trade, or a bad colonial trade, but a demand that men shall be encouraged in such an operation as making boots and cutting them into shoes?" (Laughter.)

Those who look for wisdom in their legislators have an excellent hint given them in the following pithy sentences:—

"The country, you know, is the origin of the House of Commons, and not the House of Commons of the country; it is reasonable, therefore, that we should expect to find wisdom in the original sooner than in the copy. (Cheering and laughter.)

If we turned to the records of the abolition of slavery, should we not find Bristol foremost in the struggle? (Hear, hear.) Black slavery is an evil; white slavery is so no less; and of all kinds of slavery I know none more bitter than the slavery of the bread-basket. (Cheering and laughter.) You have had sad experience enough to know that there is no safety or comfort for any class so long as the national channels of industry are closed and kept down. It is just as if the inhabitants of some petty island were shut up to starve. The thing is as foolish in the grove as in the small. It cannot be long before the wise men get the better of the fools." (Cheers and laughter.)

He concluded by an appeal on behalf of the Bazaar:—

"Let us see if you cannot make the exhibition in London a source of wonder to foreigners at the extent and variety of English manufactures. Let all send something. Let those who have much send of their much, and those who have little send of their little. Your town has never been behind-hand in the cause of humanity; let it not now lose its reputation, but send our foraging party something with which we may make a triumphant appearance as the bringers." [The gallant colonel concluded his speech amidst great and reiterated cheering.]

The CHAIRMAN now stated that the business of the meeting had concluded, and after hearty votes of thanks had been carried by acclamation to the deputation and to the chairman, the meeting broke up about nine o'clock.

WHAT FREE TRADE IS DOING.

(From Mona's Herald.)

For the last few years we have every winter had imposed upon us the painful task of calling public attention to the distressed condition of our artisans and labourers, and the means of devising temporary measures for their relief; our trade and commerce were in stagnation, bankruptcies were common, property was unsaleable, rents low, and indifferently paid, shops and houses were empty in all directions, the infamous license monopoly ground the people to the earth, while it afforded a rich field of patronage and favouritism for the enrichment of the fortune few. In this state of things, could it be matter of surprise that stranger visitors were leaving us daily, and that our position and prospects were every year becoming more and more deplorable? This is no coloured picture of imagination. It is matter of public notoriety that considerable efforts were required, and an earnest appeal to individual benevolence, to avert absolute starvation among large numbers of the industrious inhabitants of this town. Need we allude to the circumstances under which our streets were cleaned and paved, and our doors numbered, only twelve months since? We need not refer to what is so well known to every one in this island, and, generally, throughout the united kingdom; we mean the recent fiscal bill, by which a grinding and unjust monopoly has been abrogated, and a large measure of Free Trade secured to the inhabitants of this island. The state of things which we have briefly described was denominated by the Sun, the organ of the Keys and the clique, as the "golden era," and the slightest change was to be attended with the most direful results! Respectable residents were to leave us en masse; trade and commerce were to be paralysed; property was to become worthless; half of the town would be advertised "to let;" the people were to be hurled from their "high and palmy estate" to that of absolute wretchedness—in short, the island was to be ruined! We long foresaw and predicted a very different result; and already, when the new act has been in operation little more than six months, we are enabled triumphantly to point out what Free Trade has done for us, and to demonstrate to the world that our fondest anticipations have been more than realized.

During the present season our people have been fully employed, at better wages than they ever received before; rich and poor have now the opportunity of purchasing on the same terms; the necessaries, and many of the luxuries, of life have been reduced in price nearly one half; property is daily advancing in value; where there were ten houses and shops "to let" a year ago, there is not one at present; respectable visitors are expending capital, and about to fix their permanent residence among us; and everything betokens unwonted prosperity. Was this not worth struggling for?

This is what Free Trade has done, and is doing, for us. Let our antiquated and absurd legislative constitution be reformed—let our legislators be elected by, and made accountable to, the people; let our laws be made conformable to the advanced progress of society and the altered state of the times, and our prosperity will yet be augmented more and more.

VICTIMS OF PROTECTION.—LETTERS TO INDIVIDUAL SUFFERERS.

FIRST LETTER.

To my old Master, Mr. W. T.,—a particular Victim.

SIR,—Though you are not so rich as you once were, you are not dishonoured. Your money credit may be gone, but your moral credit remains. You struggled with a bad bargain, and only yielded in the struggle when you had paid away all your farming capital and private fortune in rent; capital derived by inheritance, and not accumulated by any former profits from the farm. Some persons have said you were foolish to do so; but, at the least, they must admit you were honest. In truth you could not help yourself. With a large family to provide for, with no alternative if you left the farm; but without the power to leave it, you being bound by a lease, what could you do?

Some have said you were imprudent to have taken such a lease at such a rent; and, perhaps, you were so. But your imprudence was comprised in this, that you did not think it necessary to inquire into and understand that delusive Corn Law which promised to do so much and which did so little, save to transfer your capital to the pocket of the Laird of Thurston, your landlord.

That you should have taken the farm upon a fixed money rental was, perhaps, indiscreet. You would not now do so. Nor would any of your friends. But when you took your lease corn-rents were not so common in your county as now; and, I believe, had not been then introduced upon the Thurston estate at all. However, I am not perfectly informed on that point; but I do know this, that when Brauxton was sold out of your family you were desirous to retain it even as a farm. You had a love for it; it was natural you should. You knew nothing about the Corn Law; it was natural you should not. The education of young gentlemen, such as you then were, did not comprise a knowledge of the causes which affect the value of property; which make corn dear at one time and cheap at another time; which show that high prices are not always profitable, nor moderate prices always a loss.

The attempt to raise corn to an exorbitant price, and keep it up when it was up, had, through the failure of the East Lothian Bank,—that instrument by which wheat was never to be allowed to fall below 90s. a quarter in East Lothian,—the attempt to secure such a price by such an instrument, resulted in the downfall of the projector, and shareholders of the bank, who included some of your nearest relations. This led to the farm of Brauxton going out of your family as an estate, and still it brought no instruction to you on that pernicious Corn Law which first made you a tenant instead of a proprietor, and then ruined you as a tenant.

But even to this day the farmers, your late neighbours, are not taught by what they have seen and should have studied. I am told that many of them still cling to this agricultural "protection," as the Corn Law is most absurdly called. Some of them may know better, yet fear to go against the landlords who uphold it, and the landlords' deputies—the factors. But I believe the greater part of the farmers do not know which is the right side and which the wrong of this question.

I have seen most parts of England since I left you, and have paid close attention to both sides of the Corn Laws—the agricultural side, and the commercial side—and I therefore place before myself the task of helping the farmers to a perfect knowledge of this all-important question. It is not so difficult to explain principles as it is to get those most concerned in them to listen to the explanations. It is not so difficult to bring facts together, and place them before a farmer's eyes, as it is to get him to open his eyes and look at them. "One man may take a horse to the water," we used to say, "but twenty men will not make him drink;" that is, if the horse is not inclined to drink. So, one man may put the whole history and mystery of the different Corn Laws—their delusive promises and their disastrous effects—before a farmer, clear as the looking-glass in which he looks to see if he be clean shaven; and he may be shown by that one man in that glass how the Corn Law has shaven him; but twenty men will not make the farmer look into the glass if he be resolved not to look.

The only way I know of accomplishing this desirable end is to go to some of them singly, and tell them that they bleed—that in the dark they have been wounded; and then, being addressed individually, they may open their eyes and behold each his own suffering and disfigurement, before any factor or agent can come and tell them not to look, not to read, not to understand.

To such as you, Mr. T., I need not say you are hurt. You know that too well. But, if I am not much misinformed, you do not yet see clearly how you have been hurt. You will say by too high a rent; but why did you contract to pay too high a rent? It was not, as some say, that you were not a proper judge of the value of land—it is easy to say this after you have lost your all upon it—Job's comforters are always ready with their sayings; but the real cause of your contracting to pay £3 per acre for Brauxton was, that the Corn Law promised you a price which would have got you a profit at that rent; but the Corn Law deceived you—it cheated you, and you have lost your capital, your patrimony, your farm, and your family's bread.

At one of the contested elections for the county, which occurred after you became a tenant of the Laird of Thurston, when much popular interest was excited in behalf of one of the candidates, you were asked by one of your workmen if you would not vote for that candidate. You replied,—and your reply was, like all your actions, straightforward and honest,—you said you knew no difference between the merits of the one candidate and the other; that the one was a Whig and the other a Tory; that both were alike to you save that the Tory was your landlord's candidate, and that he would be yours; that it was safest to keep on the landlord's side, "because," you continued, "what is for the landlord's interest must be for my interest, and the interest of all of us on his estate."

In this you spoke as it is common for a tenant to speak; in this you voted as it is common for a tenant to vote. I blame you not for seeing no difference in the candidates. If Toryism be Conservatism—the principle of conserving the British nation as it now exists, and of extending and elevating its greatness and glory—then I am as much a Tory, though I do not like the name, as your landlord was who swayed your vote to the Tory side. If your landlord be a Conservative, so am I, though totally opposed to him on the subject of the Corn Law. Indeed, the Free-Traders are the most thorough Conservatives of any party. Were the maintenance of the Corn Law a part of Conservatism—Conservatism being the preservation of the national power, prosperity, and integrity—then it would be to uphold the national power, prosperity, and integrity, that you were made to pay to the Laird of Thurston every penny of the fortune you inherited out of Branxton estate, and were at last driven from your farm with a helpless family.

It is rank deceit to mix up the preservation of the Corn Law with the patriotic principle of Conservatism. The one is personal, the other is national; the one aims at the meanest of objects, the other at the highest.

You have lived to prove, unhappily, that the interest of your landlord was not your interest, and that of your men. By his parliamentary power you expected he would procure you such a price for your corn as would enable you to pay him £3 per acre and provide for your family. You entered into a bond that you would pay that rent every year, for a certain term of years; the landlord gave no bond that he would not take all the money you promised him if you did not get all the price he promised you. On whose side was the best of the bargain? You knew the best of the bargain was on his side. Hence your reasons for the vote you gave.

But did that satisfy him? Did he not exact his bond—his "pound of flesh"? He did; and he got it too, and the blood with it. After you had paid him all your profit, all your capital, and every penny you possessed, and begged for time to pay the rest, you were only saved from being sold out even to the last wheelbarrow,—even to the pillow upon which you laid your head in that house which had once been your father's mansion, and which had descended from that to be what it now was to you and your helpless family, by the landlord and the landlord's Corn Law, and these alone,—you were only saved from losing the last stick and the last pillow, to satisfy that landlord whose interest you said was your interest, by the intervention of two friends—family friends—not "farmers' friends."

I do not say that all landlords would have done as yours did; far from it. I do not say that yours would have done the same to every other tenant; and yet there is no reason to suppose he was harder upon you than he would have been upon others who might have had as bad a bargain as you. But he proved in your case, against your own words, that a landlord's interest may not be always a tenant's interest. So long as the Corn Law exists, or legislative protection to agriculture exists in any shape, the interests of landlords, tenants, and labourers cannot be identical, unless a landlord acts towards them in a spirit the very opposite of the spirit of the Corn Law, which is personal and selfish, coerced for private ends by those who have had the power to enact it.

But here I may remark that the landlords have even injured themselves by it. See how many estates have been driven away from their former owners by these owners' indulging on excessive rents, indulging in expenses they could not support. See how many estates are mortgaged, and all but the name of the property taken from the once independent owners. Extensive as the Laird of Thurston's estate is, it is not clear of embarrassments. He has had an expensive family to provide for; and though he had the support of your votes, and the votes of his numerous tenants, to procure them admission where none are admitted without high influence, still that was not enough for them. To support his family he wrung from you the last penny which should have supported yours.

He is now no more; and I hope, for the credit of his memory, it was necessity on his part, and not greediness, that made him take your money from you which never belonged to the farm as such. But, whatever the actuating cause was, he took it. He never could have done so but for the delusion of high prices promised by the Corn Law, which the Corn Law could not fulfil, put you in his power.

I shall resume the subject in another letter. Meanwhile I am your old cowherd, stable-groom, ploughboy,

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

SECOND LETTER.

To my old Master,—a particular Victim of the Corn Laws.

SIR,—The time that has elapsed since I was in your service has worked a great change in both of us. The change has been to your disadvantage, I grieve to say; but it has been rather favourable to me. Whether there be any person, situated as I am now, who could look back upon such a service and such a master, and not grieve for your misfortunes, I know not. I am not that person.

Neither am I one who, separated from the farm-fields where I once toiled in summer and harvest days with scythe and reaping-hook, with bended back and sweaty brow; in winter days clearing out the watery ditches with feet immersed, or picking the frozen turnips to the snow-bedded sheep,—I am not one who looks back to despise those times and those employments. With much toil there was much satisfaction. There were the merry days of spring when we whistled along at harrow and at plough, committing the seed once more to the earth, and our hopes once more to God for a succeeding harvest. Then there was the annual winter supper when harvest was over, when every man, woman, and child gathered around you,—the young with more joy than they could contain, the old joyous as if they were young again; when my venerable father, being the oldest there, said grace, thanked Heaven for the harvest we had had, and prayed for another as good; and then, old as he was, solemn as was the piety of his life, danced among the dancers, and sung some of the merriest songs, the songs of his young days, among the singers.

Then there were the long winter evenings around your kitchen fire, on which the piled up logs and the coals that made them fierce drove us back, as they blazed and reddened, into a wider and a wider circle,—into the circle where one would mend his shoes or his horse harness; where another would stitch her new apron or knit her stocking; where one would nod in the snooty heat, while another would sing or tell a story; where I would sit and listen for the sound of your horse's feet to meet you at the door with the stable lantern ready lighted; where, on returning from the stable after grooming up your horse for the night, I would perchance find you, if it was market night, warming yourself for a brief period before you went to your parlour, asking the men what had been done while you were away, and telling them what was to be done to-morrow,—whether the threshing-mill was to be going or not, and whether the markets were in such a state as to make it desirable that the threshing-mill should be set a-going. At this kitchen fireside I was a member of the circle; and on such occasions have been referred to, to say whether there was straw enough to last the cattle in the close, the cows in the byre, and the horses in the different stables over Sunday; and if there was, then perhaps you did not thresh until next week. And so the work which the men and horses were to go to next day was decided upon; frost and thaw being the only doubtful questions.

And think you I have had no pride in sending you out in style to market or to a distant dinner? If field work took me out, which it often did, before the stable work was completed; and some one came and called me, as often was the case, by the message, "The master wants his horse!" have I not been in the stable and stripped to the shirt before the echoes of the voice that called me had well died away? And there have I brushed and wiped, and wiped down, and combed the mane, and sponged the hoofs and brightened them; and have saddled and bridled, and have drawn the girths tighter, and have wiped the reins and the martingal once more, and the stirrups and the bit; and have sent you away with a curb-chain shining. And when you have gone, and I have watched you through the trees cantering beyond the holly bushes, and have seen you fairly into the public road with nothing but your hat visible bobbing above the hedge of the upper Butterlaw-park, I have shut the stable door, have thrown a fork over my shoulder, and my jacket over the fork, preparatory to going to another job, and have sung or whistled on my way to the other job from pure pleasure and satisfaction that there would be no stirrups, or bridle-bits, or curb-chains on the road to market that day brighter than yours were.

And you to have had at that period an independent fortune of several thousand pounds, besides all your working capital invested in farm stock; and to have lost all,—to have been deluded by the Corn Law, to transfer all to the pocket of your laird in whom you reposed as in a "farmers' friend!" it is, indeed, grievous.

There are those in the world, and there may be some of them concerned in the land on and around Branxton now, who look upon an enemy of the Corn Law as their enemy. There may be many farmers in that district of country who will read this, I know there will be some, and who will think that some lurking recollection of them, or fretful dislike to agriculture, prompts me to contend against the thing called protection, and thus bring the argument to their own doors by reference to the farm of Branxton.

If such there be they will do me wrong. I have paid close and widely-extended attention to this momentous subject, and am convinced, beyond the slightest possible doubt, that it is not more clear that commerce will be benefited by Free Trade, than it is that agriculture has been wronged by monopoly, by the delusion of the Corn Laws being a benefit to the farmers.

I have no dislike to agriculture: my interests and sympathies are with it. I have no disagreeable feelings towards any of those concerned in it whom I knew in my youth; I have kindly recollections of every one of them. I have a constitutional veneration for agriculture, strengthened by my connexion with it in early life, even though then I was not a master in it, but a servant, and one of the very humblest. But it does not follow that, loving agriculture, I should love the Corn Law. On the contrary, every circumstance of past days which memory and history supply me with, and every observation of the present day which travel and business-transactions afford me the means of making, unite in dissociating the welfare of agriculture and the existence of the Corn Law. In England the pernicious influence of "protection" is more apparent than in Scotland. Yet in Scotland protection has done its work of mischief, as we see by your own case. Let me bring to your recollection some facts.

The first harvests I have any distinct knowledge of were those of 1816 and 1817; and I remember them more by their results than their realities. I was then a child, and you were a young man. It was in one of those years I first saw you to know you from your brothers. And a very trifling event it was that made me distinguish and remember you—a trifling event in itself, yet not to me; and destined to be fixed in my mind until nails are fixed in my coffin. It was intimately connected with the famine-stricken harvests of the two years just named, and with that Corn Law which has robbed you of your farm, and all your patrimony.

The crops of those years were great failures. In 1817, which I remember most distinctly, the whole crop of the Horse-hill, which was peas and beans,—and which you know grows as good wheat and beans as any on the farm,—the whole crop of that very good field was carted home for the cattle to trample into manure—it never went to the stackyard; it was absolute muck. Barley was that year growing in the large field south of the Horse-hill. Though earliest ripe, much of that barley was never even threshed; it was lost by the continued dark wet weather. I have no recollection of where the other crops grew, though, in after years, I heard the crops of that year often talked of; no recollection save of the potatoes, which were at the west side of the Pond-park: they were small, few in number, and bad in quality.

Yet corn was so excessively dear, this being a second bad harvest, that my father's and brother's wages did not go far enough to procure us half—not more than half—the usual supply of oatmeal for porridge, and barleymeal for bread; and, moreover, what we did get was bad, very bad. The bread was black, wet, and clammy. Foreseeing the failure of the potato-crop, my father kept no pig in the sty; we had, therefore, no pork. There were either nine or ten of us almost dependent on what the wages of two could procure. So dear was everything, we could not even afford salt herrings at every time we ate the miserable diet of small watery potatoes. When brose was made of the oatmeal, we could neither afford butter, nor lard to our brose, but were only too happy to get brose in any shape, made of water and oatmeal only.

As a matter of course, we could get no new clothing. The previous year had been a famine year, and parents such as mine hoped that the next (this of which I now write) would enable them by its plenty and cheapness to restore the clothing of themselves and children. They were disappointed. This year was worse than the last; two famine years were worse than one. We decayed into rags, and almost to barefootedness, in the depth of winter. The nightly upstirring of my mother (who is still a living witness of that dreadful time) to mend and remend, to set patch on patch, contending as she did for nine of us against the united attacks of winter, nakedness, and famine—against all these, and the Corn Law, and the East Lothian Bank—the Corn Law being to keep foreign grain out of the country, and the Lothian Bank to keep home-grown corn out of market until it had reached the highest possible price at the longest possible period to which the farmers could hold it and not sell;—my mother, I say, sitting up night after night during that dreary winter to stitch and stitch, patch and patch, our clothes when we were in bed—she contending for nine of us—one woman for nine of us, against the united hostility of winter, nakedness, famine, Corn Law, and the farmers' combination bank—one woman against all these—the task was unequal. She could not mend as fast as our clads decayed. They went to pieces, and she could not help them.

I am now at the point where I first saw you to know you. At that time my chief garment was a pinafore. The famine years had reduced me to one, and even that one was made up of the best parts of several that had fallen to pieces. I had only that single one, and it was ingeniously shaped and extended in size to hide the poverty of the clothing beneath it. When it was washed I had to stay within doors; and I never went out without being charged to keep that garment clean and untorn. I was careful of it; for, young as I was, the unequal contest which my mother held with famine and decaying clothes was bitterly felt by me. But I was out one day playing on that green knoll where the whinbush grew in front of the barnyard gate, and you and some other young gentlemen came along with your greyhounds. The dogs were playful. Perhaps they were kind; but, whatever their humour, they leaped upon me, pulled me down, one behind and one before, rolled me down the steep declivity, and did not leave off until that beat garment of mine was equal to the worst. I ran home in the bitterest distress. I could not tell in the fear of the moment how it had happened; but a neighbour, who had seen the wreck and its cause, said it was done by "Master William's dogs." My mother took the rags, one by one, and looked at them; and knowing she could not go to a draper's shop to buy calicoes to replace them, she mingled tears of despair with my tears of childish fear, and sat down and asked in anguish, "What was she to do?"

Ay, what was she to do, indeed, with such a confederacy of famine-making seasons and famine-making men against her? My father was in full work at full wages; so was my eldest brother. One or two of the younger ones earned something; and even my mother went out and worked at the threshing-mill, and in the fields rooting and "shaving" turnips amid wet and snow in those winter days, the nights of which were partly spent in sleepless toil to mend our clothes which she could not replace. And all who worked at anything were working on the farm, and yet could not earn enough to get enough of mere food of the coarsest and meanest quality, to say nothing of clothing.

And what was the value of the exorbitant prices to those who received them? They had less to sell, and, therefore, it will be argued it was proper they should have the highest possible price. Look at the result.

For nearly three years my mother did not go to the shop of Mr. McIntyre, in Dunbar, which was the one and the only one she dealt in for cloth goods. You will remember Mr. McIntyre's shop. And here I may remark, that at that very time, so I have been told, Mr. Duncan McLaren, of Edinburgh, the highly talented enemy of Corn-Law famine, was an apprentice with Mr. McIntyre. See, therefore, how early the Edinburgh champion of Free Trade must have observed the evil influence of the Corn Law!

We did not for nearly three years give custom to the draper's shop, and very, very little to the grocer's shop. The hinds of Lothian, who have a corn payment, would be in better circumstances. They have a similar advantage over fluctuating markets that the farmers have who pay corn rents. But the hinds in receipt of corn payments are but the merest fraction to the whole working population of the kingdom. Even in Lothian one-half, at least, of working persons were at that time in receipt of money wages; all in a similar state to our family.

And what was the consequence throughout the kingdom? The shopkeepers could not sell, consequently they could not buy from the wholesale merchants. The merchants could not buy from the manufacturers. The latter stopped their works. Every one, from the shopkeeper upwards, dispensed with some of their domestic servants; with clerks and workmen. These again could not buy grocery goods and clothes. Tailors and shoemakers, and every one employed in making and providing the materials for things that should have been made, were wholly or partly stopped. Carriers inland had less to carry, and ships were laid up idly in the docks. Sail-makers, riggers, and shipbuilders were thrown out in their turn. So were sailors. In thickly peopled districts mobs met and rioted. Soldiers were called out to disperse them. Men were hungry and clamorous, and demanded political changes. Demagogues found them ready to listen to and act upon the wildest suggestions. They essayed to overturn the Government, and blood was spilt. The Habeas Corpus was suspended, and the gibbets were loaded.

And while the mobs of unemployed working men were thus starving, and plotting and threatening because they were unemployed and did starve, mercantile men were cracking to pieces, their bills dishonoured, credit broken, and all enterprise stagnant—a panic sweeping them into a backward gulf as a receding wave sweeps back the broken seaweed.

And all these, comprising millions of individuals, had to retrench their family expenses. Millions had, like my father's family, to live on less than enough of the worst of food. The farmers got high prices for the little they had to sell; but the people were famine-struck, and the nation was shaken to its centre.

And what came of the farmers? The succeeding years brought better harvests. But the population was now too poor to pay for what the farmers had to sell, and markets fell far below what they would have been had the general population been fully employed. The farmers had thus to pay the high rents, calculated upon a continuance of dear years, out of low prices. In England they were worse off than in Scotland; and in some parts of Scotland they were worse off than in Lothian; but even in Lothian they were so badly off that they could not meet their engagements in 1816 and 1819. The combination broke, and it broke some of the most substantial men in the county with it.

I have much more to say in illustration of the pernicious effect of monopoly; but this letter is already too long. Meantime I am your sincere friend and old servant,

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

The block-printers at St. John are begun to be very busy. A factory is so much wanted in the village, that a gentleman has offered to give land for the erection of one; also water, by which a great power may be obtained.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—I wish to offer an observation or two on some matters often discussed in your paper, deserving, as it appears to me, of your consideration, and of that of your agricultural readers.

1. On Leases.—I am myself a landed proprietor, and have always been friendly to leases; but it is manifest, and I think it will at once strike Mr. Hope, Mr. Latimore, and others such, that for the benefit of the public, as well as the advantage of the landlord, something more is wanted than that the occupier should have secure possession. A lease of twenty-one years to an improving, active, intelligent tenant is, I conceive, good for all parties; but if he should be none of this, if he should be prejudiced, unwilling to admit modern improvements, or to avail himself of modern science, the lease becomes an impediment and a disadvantage. And amongst the tenant-farmers how small is the proportion who do not deserve this last character? I certainly believe that the repeal of the Corn Laws will greatly mitigate, if not entirely remove, this objection; that it would let loose for the cultivation of land a great quantity of capital and of intelligence and science; but that science and intelligence are very sparingly applied to that object now; so that, till this repeal shall have taken place, I can very well understand why many even of those most disposed to give every encouragement to an independent tenantry should object to leases. I hope intelligent tenant-farmers who wish for leases will see in this argument an additional reason for getting rid of the Corn Laws.

2. On Rent.—I perceive that it is a matter of dispute whether the rent is a material part of the payments made by the tenant. I maintain that it ought to be the last item to be considered after every other matter has been examined into and calculated. Rent is the sum paid to the owner of the land by the occupier for the use of it; and it should, therefore, be the net sum remaining to the occupier after all expenses paid; in which expenses should be included not only labour, keep of horses, &c., but interest of capital, replacement of capital expended on improvements, and remuneration for trouble. An intelligent and calculating tenant ought to make an estimate of these and all other expenses (such as rates, &c.), and then of the value of the probable produce; and the excess of the value of the produce over and above the sum total of expenses is the proper rent. So that, in truth, it ought to be a matter of no concern whatever to the tenant whether the rent be £100 or £500.

The truth is, that in these matters we begin at the wrong end. The landlord says, I want so much rent, and the tenant agrees to give it; and then has to make it out as well as he can; if he has made a bad bargain, either by encroaching on his capital, or screwing down his labourers, or neglecting the proper cultivation of his land; and then at rent-day he comes, cap in hand, and says, "Live and let live," give me an allowance, or I shall not be able to live. Whereas "live and let live" is what the landlord ought to say to the tenant. In the natural order of things it would be so. The owner is, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, a poor creature, totally unable to help himself, or to gain his own livelihood; at all events, by the cultivation of his land. The tenant is an active man, who knows how to work himself, and to direct the works of others, but does not possess the instrument to work upon. Which of them is the most independent, the best able to do without the other? Assuredly the latter. It may be said that they are mutually dependent: the owner can do nothing without the cultivator, nor the latter without the use of the land. Be it so; but let them meet on equal terms, each negotiating and making as good a bargain for himself as he can; both independent; neither under any obligation to the other. If farmers would but pluck up courage and act on such sentiments and with such feelings, they would soon perceive their power, and raise themselves from the poor dependent state in which they (nine out of every ten of them) are now.

3. But the beginning of every advantage they can hope and expect to gain must be the acquisition of knowledge and of science—of science by which they may know how to carry on their business as agriculturists with the most advantage and of general knowledge by which they may form an estimate of the different circumstances likely to affect their dealings. Why is it that large fortunes have not been made in agricultural pursuits (adieu the trade and business of farming), as well as in mercantile and manufacturing? Is it that it is a more uncertain business? Quite the reverse. It depends not on winds or waves, which so often materially affect the merchant; it depends not on tastes and fashions, which the manufacturers are so often obliged to consult and humour; it depends not on the caprices of ministers or legislatures, which may prohibit or encourage. It has a sure and certain demand and market for its wares in the daily wants and necessities of all mankind. Its principal machine and instrument is always at hand, and never ungrateful or refusing to respond to care of cultivation. Why then, I say, do we not see farmers grow rich as our Cobdens or our Brownes? Merely because general knowledge and science are scarcely ever applied to this pursuit. Farmers have been heretofore content to walk in the ways of their fathers. Happily a new light seems to be breaking in upon them. Let them not avert their eyes, and whether the light comes from the manufactory of Mr. Smith, of Deanton, or the shop of Mr. Mechi, of Lendenhall-street, or the laboratory of Mr. Faraday, let them avail themselves of it. A LANDOWNER.

PETITIONS AGAINST THE GAME LAWS.—The Alnwick petition for the repeal of the game laws, containing 729 signatures, and the Alnmouth petition for the same object, with 78 signatures, were this week sent to Mr. Bright for presentation.—Newcastle Advertiser.

A petition from the inhabitants of Pershore, praying for the total repeal of the game laws, has this week been forwarded to T. S. Duncombe, Esq., M.P., for presentation to the House of Commons. The petition received the signatures of upwards of four hundred individuals, mostly inhabitant householders.—Worcester Chronicle.

WAYS AND MEANS—SUGAR DUTIES.

MONDAY, Feb. 21.—Motion made and question proposed, "That the order of the day for the Committee of Ways and Means be now read."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)—Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no arrangement of the sugar duties will be satisfactory and permanent, which does not involve an equalisation of duty on foreign and colonial sugar"—(Mr. Milner Gibson)—instead thereof:—Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question?"—The House divided: Ayes, 211, Noes, 81.

GLoucester Farmers' Club.—This club was virtually broken up on Saturday evening. Circumstances arising out of the refusal to drink Earl Ducie's health on a recent occasion, and some expressions deemed insulting by the farmers, made use of towards them in a letter published a few weeks ago by Mr. Baker, of Hardwick court, are the causes which led to the catastrophe.—Hereford Journal.

A FARMER'S OPINIONS, AND ADVICE TO HIS BROTHER FARMERS.

We take the following letter from the Devizes Gazette, an ultra-protectionist journal: it contains many sound views, and much judicious advice to farmers, from a practical farmer, who is thoroughly acquainted with their condition, and whose enlightened opinions must carry with them the weight of authority:—

To the Editor of the Devizes Gazette.

Now that the advocates of protection to agriculture have had their meeting in London, and their interview with the Prime Minister, I solicit your insertion of another letter, and I press my opinions a second time on the notice of my brother farmers, because they must now be satisfied that protection, either by the repeal of the Corn Law or other legislative measures, cannot be repaired, and that they have no chance of success in their business but by adopting those means which will enable them to compete with the untaxed cultivators of America, and the untaxed graziers of cattle on the Continent. As a farmer and owner of land, I do not complain of the position in which we are placed—on the contrary, I rejoice that, with the certainty of low prices rendering wholesome food accessible to all, we have the means, if we are wise, of meeting our altered circumstances rather by a reliance on our own unfettered industry and resources, than on the deceptive principle of protection. What course, then, must the tenant-farmers take, and in what course should they be aided by those occupiers of their own estates, who have hitherto taken a leading part in the Wilts Protection Society?

On this question I must necessarily refer to other matters than those treated of in my first letter, but I will promise to do so in the shortest possible way.

1st. An appeal must be made to the landlords for a reduction of rent, based on the honest principle—that rents undertaken to be paid with wheat at 56s. a quarter, ought not to be exacted with wheat at 46s.

2nd. A call must be made for the erection of those buildings and conveniences, without which no man can make the most of his corn, or keep his cattle in healthy condition.

3rd. All wet lands must be drained, either by the landlords or by the tenants, on such an understanding as to expense as may be agreed on.

4th. Leases should be required, in which the tenants should be released from all those absurd restrictive clauses usually applied to arable lands, framed by lawyers and land-surveyors who have no practical knowledge, the main condition as to cultivation being this—that a green crop to be consumed on the farm shall always precede a white-straw crop, and that two white-straw crops shall never be grown in succession, unless they shall have been preceded by two previous successive green crops, consumed on the land or in the yards.

5th. The game should be kept within reasonable bounds.

6th. A resolute determination should be formed to get rid of the malt-tax, on the ground that wholesome beer is as necessary to the hard-working man as bread, meat, and cheese; that this tax curtails the sale of one of the most important articles of farming produce, prevents altogether that useful interchange of good-will between the farmer and his workmen which a fair allowance of beer produces, interferes most mischievously with the application of barley as cattle food, and is, in its absurd excise regulations, prejudicial and troublesome in every way.

It is no part of my business to find a substitute for this tax; but I say, without hesitation, that the property-tax (not the income-tax) may well be continued, even at an increased amount, in the place of it, and that I shall have no faith in any farmers' friend who will maintain the one for the purpose of effectually resisting the other.

With reasonable rents—with fair farming conveniences—with dry healthy land—with freedom from restraint in cultivation—no damage from game—and with a free trade in corn and all kinds of cattle food, I assert that farming in England will be maintained; not as a money-making business—for competition for land will always prevent that—but as a business by which a steady prudent man will obtain a fair and respectable living. And here I must say, that I think a respectful and proper appeal to the landlords will not be made in vain. Although there are some scrubbed ones, as a class they are considerate and just, and have the true feelings of English gentlemen.

My farming friends will, I dare say, agree with all my previous propositions—the last as to Free Trade excepted, in my opinion the most honest and important of all: but, with their dislike of Free Trade, they will, I hope, bear in mind, that I am not dealing with the old Corn Law, but with that law which, in connexion with the Canada Bill, has in fair harvests reduced protection to 3s. a sack of wheat, and with that tariff which admits at all times salted meat at a low duty, and fat oxen at £1 per head.

At the risk, then, of being charged with a repetition of my former letters, I refer to the first as containing a fair calculation as to the expenses and returns of a light farm, with protection and without protection, supposing corn-farming to be followed in the latter case. And, notwithstanding all that has been said as to my calculations being speculative and hypothetical, I must remind you that no practical farmer has yet stated that £800 cannot be made in sheep, wool, and cattle from 200 acres of green crop, 500 sacks of beans, and the produce of 200 acres of straw and fodder, or that the crops mentioned by me cannot be grown on land farmed in the way set forth in my letter. I argue then again—

1st. That the occupiers of grass lands, whether for dairy or grazing purposes, must be benefited by cheap corn, because they are purchasers for their cattle, sheep, and pigs, and grow none; and because the less our working people have to pay for their bread, the more they will have to lay out in meat, cheese, and butter.

The grazier at the present time is ruined by the high prices of all cattle food.

2nd. That, with wheat at present prices, a good crop must be grown to pay expenses; that such crop cannot be grown on light land without high farming; and that, as the occupiers of light soils cannot grow either beans, peas, or oats to advantage, and a supply of beans and peas for all light soils could not be obtained from our own produce, they will benefit by getting those articles at Free-Trade prices, resting satisfied with the growth of green crops for feed, and wheat and barley for sale. The very fact has been that the light soils would go out of cultivation without protection. My object has been to show that with Free-Trade prices, and high farming, the light soils can be profitably cultivated.

3rd. That, with present prices, high farming on the best strong arable soils will be necessary. That on such soils, where beans and peas can be grown, not more than about the fifth or sixth part of a farm can advantageously be sown with such corn. That with high farming a far greater quantity than the produce of a fifth or sixth part ought to be consumed by horses, cattle, and sheep. That such extra quantity would be beneficially bought at Free-Trade prices; and that it is absurd to suppose that the best lands in the country really need or ought to have any further protection, than that which is afforded by the freight, insurance, and shipping charges on foreign corn.

I will now add a few observations on the tariff, and the best way of meeting the competition arising from it.

The foreigner has the advantage of purchasing poor stock at far lower prices than the English grazier. He has the great advantage of cheap corn and oil cake for fattening purposes. His drawbacks are the risk of loss by accidents, freight, and the duty of £1 per head. This tariff is gradually and quietly working its way. Importations to Hull and London are increasing and will increase. The Smithfield butchers, on entering the market, soon ascertain the number of beasts on sale. They know the average number required, and the circumstance of there being in the market 200 or 300 beasts more than are wanted disheartens the salesmen. They know that beasts take infinite damage by being put back for another week. The butchers are shy of purchasing, and the salesmen make enormous sacrifices in sales. I can myself speak feelingly on this subject. Although an annual importation of 5000 or 6000 beasts may appear small, compared with the general consumption of the country, yet such a number, coming at the rate of 200 weekly, may have a very depressing influence on the Smithfield sales. How then, I say, can this state of things be met? We cannot and ought not to hope for a repeal of the tariff, but we have a right to be placed as near as may be on a footing with the foreigner, by having all kinds of cattle food at the cheapest possible rate. I can see no way of meeting foreigners but by putting ourselves in a position to fatten beasts and sheep as cheaply as they can, and by increasing the ability of the working people to purchase, by increased trade and employment.

At greater length than I at first intended, I have again enforced my views. At the present time, all that the farmer has to sell is cheap: all that he has of necessity to buy in the shape of cattle food is, very much owing to legislation, excessively dear. From the want of food, sacrifices of stock to an enormous amount are daily made. There is, I really believe, no way of remedying this state of things, but that of doing away with protection altogether, and leaving everything to find its own level.

I am, &c., NATN. ATHERTON.
Kington, Feb. 14, 1845.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—During the lecture which Doctor John Ryan has been giving, this week, on Mechanical Power, he has taken the opportunity to advert to an invention connected with mechanical science as applicable to the alleviation of human suffering. Our readers may remember that a few days ago a notice appeared in a morning journal, referring to an invention lately exhibited in Paris, by which a man who had been deprived of both his arms was enabled, by means of artificial limbs provided with springs, &c., attached to the remaining stumps of the natural arms, to perform a variety of offices. The French invention appears to be most ingenious; but that to which the learned doctor adverted is equally worthy of humbler approbation. He introduced to his auditors a man whose arm had been amputated just below the elbow. To the remaining stump of the arm was affixed an apparatus, consisting of springs and bands, terminating in an artificial hand, by which means the man was enabled to lay hold of any thing, and convey it to his mouth, to tie and untie shoes, and to do many other things for which the human hand is used. This admirable contrivance is the invention of Sir George Cayley, Bart., chairman of the Royal Polytechnic Institution, a gentleman well known for his practical knowledge of mechanism.

FIRST ARRIVAL OF SUGAR FROM THE UNITED STATES.—On Sunday last the American ship Franconia arrived in this port, bringing, as part of her cargo, 12 hogsheads of Louisiana sugar. This is the first arrival of American-grown sugar in this country, but we suspect that it is only the beginning of a trade which will, in a few years, become a very considerable one, if the new sugar duties of Sir R. Peel should pass in their present form. According to the provisions of the proposed bill, the sugars of the United States are to be admitted without dispute or difficulty, on the same footing as the free-labour sugars of Java and Manilla; the Minister, indeed, having no power, under existing treaties with the United States, to admit the one and exclude the other, and as the sugars of the nations, not possessing such treaties, in which slavery exists, are not to have this advantage, the sugar-planters of the United States will have a superiority over the planters of Cuba and Brazil, which will secure them pretty nearly a monopoly of slave-grown sugar in the English market. This will doubtless be a great advantage to American planters as well as to American shipping. The sugars received by the Franconia must necessarily have been shipped before anything was known or suspected of the reduction of duties now proposed, and must therefore have been sent here for the purpose of ascertaining whether they could be imported with profit at a duty of 36s. per cwt., so that, if there was any chance whatever of their succeeding under such a duty, they cannot fail to pay handsomely, now that the duty is reduced to 24s. per cwt. We feel no doubt that they will pay if they are at all well selected, for on Saturday last we saw samples of two other expected lots of American sugar, both of which had been examined by a sugar-broker, who states that they will leave a handsome profit—at least 10 per cent.—in this country, even if the price of sugar should fall to the full extent of the duty repealed; the prices, therefore, are no obstacle, and what renders it still more likely that this trade will become considerable is, that the sugar crop in Louisiana was last year much the largest ever known, and the price so moderate that a gentleman who was on one of the sugar plantations between New Orleans and Belize, about three months ago, was offered any quantity of sugar at the rate of 8½ cents, that is, at less than 2d. per lb.—Liverpool Times.

REVIEW.

History of the United States of America. By George Bancroft. Edinburgh and London: Fullarton and Co.

The publishers of this volume have done good service to the cause of standard literature and sound principle by presenting Bancroft's admirable history of the colonization of the United States, and of their condition while British colonies, in a cheap and accessible form, to the English public. In no department of politics have the lessons of experience been more completely thrown away than in everything connected with colonization: every page of colonial history proves that colonies succeed best when left to individual enterprise and independent resources; but that, when coddled and pampered by a system of protection, they become miserable themselves, and a burden to the parent state. Spanish America was colonized under the direct superintendence of the Spanish Government: every department of colonial administration—everything connected with exports or imports, or with transit from one colony to another—every action of public life, and not a few of those that belong to the domestic and family existence, had been arranged and tabulated in strict formularies to which no exception would be tolerated. Spanish manufactures were protected in the colonies, and colonial produce was protected in Spain; the commercial system which floats indistinctly before the turbid vision of the writers in the Morning Post, was established with a completeness and stringency that could not be exceeded: the result was, that Spain was impoverished, while the colonies were not enriched; and the colonies were rendered miserable without any profit accruing to the parent state.

Far different was the course pursued in the New England colonies, and far different has been the result. The Pilgrim Fathers, denied the privilege of worshipping God according to the dictates of their conscience, sought freedom in the wilds of America; they sought no protection save from Divine Providence; they asked for no assistance to their own stalwart arms: they cleared the forest, they bridged the torrent, they quayed the harbour, and they protected themselves from the savage with their own swords. They grew up the healthy children of a healthy people; they earned for Britain the title of the Cybele of nations—the mother of countless sons, and every son a god. Spain, the South American colonies, and protection, stand on one side; Britain, the New England states, and commercial freedom, on the other:—there are the two systems tested by their results; and yet it is debated in this age and nation which is the system of most salutary policy.

The Spanish system, like our West India monopoly, not only sanctioned but encouraged an absentee proprietary; we find Mr. Gladstone absolutely pleading for the continuance of differential duties for the mere sake of this absenteeism. It is no new discovery of the right honourable gentleman: when an attempt was made to establish absentee influence in Virginia, the House of Assembly at once saw that this would necessarily be associated with a fettered commerce and restrictive monopoly. Accordingly, in their memorable protest, dated April 3, 1642, they boldly declared "FREEDOM OF TRADE IS THE BLOOD AND LIFE OF A COMMONWEALTH." Nor was this a republican cry: the Virginians were zealous adherents of the royal cause; they clung to it with desperate fidelity after Charles I. had fallen on the scaffold, and Charles II. had fled into what seemed hopeless exile. But, when compelled to submit to the naval armament sent against them by Cromwell, they still maintained their principle, and made it an express stipulation in the act of surrender that "the people of Virginia should have as free trade as the people of England." This article was not a mere form: in March, 1636, the Virginian House of Assembly invited "the Dutch and all foreigners to trade with them, on payment of no higher duty than that which was levied on such English vessels as were trading to their ports;" and in 1660 a special statute of the Virginian Legislature extended to every Christian nation in unity with England a promise of liberty to trade, and equal justice. No wonder that, during the interval between the English and American revolutions, Virginia was described as "the best poor man's country in the world."

The spirit of Free Trade, thus broadly asserted beyond the Atlantic, was soon felt in England. A monopoly of fisheries had been granted to a company by royal patent; a bill was brought into Parliament to give confirmation to the royal grant; the aged Sir Edward Coke, expiating in his latter years the sins of early ambition by his devotion to the interests of the people, thus addressed George, the advocate of the patentees, from the Speaker's chair: "Your patent contains many particulars contrary to the laws and privileges of the subject: it is a monopoly, and the ends of private gain are concealed under colour of planting a colony." Had he lived in our day he might with equal force and truth have addressed Messrs. Gladstone and Goulburn on their proposed system of sugar duties:—"It is a monopoly, and the ends of private gain are concealed under colour of sustaining a colony."

Bancroft has ably shown that the alienation of the American colonies from the parent state was not the mere result of the Stamp Act, or the import-duty imposed upon tea; these were the crowning acts of an unjust system, which he has exposed with great clearness and brevity:—

"The activity of the shipping of New England, which should only have excited admiration, excited envy in the minds of the English merchants. The produce of the plantations of the southern colonies was brought to New England, as a result of the little colonial exchanges. To the extravagant taste of mercantile avarice, New England was become a staple. (Chalmers, 262. See Hutch. Coll. 422.) Parliament (25 Car. II., c. vii.) therefore, resolved to exclude New England merchants from competing with the English, in the markets of the southern plantations; the liberty of free traffic between the colonies was accordingly taken away; and any of the enumerated commodities exported from one colony to another were subject to a duty equivalent to the duty on the consumption of these commodities in England.

"By degrees the avarice of English shopkeepers became holder; and America was forbidden, by act of Parliament, not merely to manufacture those articles which might compete with the English in foreign markets, but even to supply herself, by her own industry, with those articles which her position enabled her to manufacture with success for her own wants. (For example, 5 Geo. II., c. xlii., § 7; and 23 Geo. II., c. xxi.)

"Thus was the policy of Great Britain, with respect to her colonies, a system of monopoly, adopted after the example of Spain, and, for more than a century, inflexibly pursued, in no less than twenty-nine acts of Parliament. The colonists were allowed to sell to foreigners only what England would not take; that so they might gain means to pay for the articles forced upon them by England. The commercial liberties of rising states were shackled by paper chains, and the principles of natural justice subjected to the fears and to the covetousness of English shopkeepers. (Burke.)

"The effects of this system were baleful to the colonies. They could buy European and all foreign commodities only at the shops of the metropolis; and thus the merchant of the mother country could sell his goods for a little more than they were worth. England gained at the expense of America. The profit of the one was balanced by the loss of the other.

"In the sale of their products the colonists were equally injured. The English, being the sole purchasers, could obtain those products at a little less than their fair value. The merchant of Bristol or London was made richer; the planter of Virginia or Maryland was made poorer. No new value was created; one lost what the other gained; and both parties had equal claims to the benevolence of the Legislature. (Say, II., 288, 289.)

"Thus the colonists were wronged, both in their purchases and in their sales; the law cut them with a double edge. The English consumer gained nothing; for the surplus colonial produce was re-exported to other nations. The English merchant, and not the English people, profited by the injustice. The English people were sufferers. Not that the undue employment of wealth in the colonial trade occasioned an injurious scarcity in other branches of industry; for the increased productiveness of capital soon yielded a larger supply than ever for all kinds of business; just as a fortune doubles rapidly at a high rate of interest. But the navigation act involved the foreign policy of England in contradictions; she was herself a monopolist of her own colonial trade, and yet steadily aimed at enfranchising the trade of the Spanish settlement. Hence arose a set of relations which we shall find pregnant with consequences.

"In the domestic policy of England, the act increased the tendency to unequal legislation. The English merchant having become the sole factor for American colonies, and the manufacturer claiming to supply colonial wants, the English landholder consented to uphold the artificial system only by sharing its emoluments; and Corn Laws began to be enacted, in order to secure the profits of capital, applied to agriculture, against the dangers of foreign competition. Thus the system which impoverished the Virginia planter, by lowering the price of his tobacco crop, oppressed the English labourer, by raising the price of his bread (22 Car. II., c. xvi.); till at last a Whig ministry (William and Mary) could offer a bounty on the exportation of corn.

"The law was still more injurious to England, from its influence on the connexion between the colonies and the metropolis. Durable relations in society are correlative, and reciprocally beneficial. In this case the statute was made by one party to bind the other, and was made on iniquitous principles. Established as the law of the strongest, it could endure no longer than the superiority in force. It converted commerce, which should be the bond of peace, into a source of ranking hostility, and scattered the certain seeds of a civil war. The navigation act contained a pledge of the ultimate independence of America.

"To the colonists, the navigation act was, at the time, an unmitigated evil; for the prohibition (12 Car. II., c. xxi.) of planting in New England and Ireland was a useless mockery.

"As a mode of taxing the colonies, the monopoly was a failure; the contribution was made to the pocket of the merchant, not to the treasury of the metropolis.

"The usual excuse for colonial restrictions is founded on the principle that colonies were established at the cost of the mother country for that very purpose. (Montesquieu, I., xvi., c. xvi.) In the case of the American colonies, the apology cannot be urged. The state founded none of them. The colonists escaped from the mother country, and had, at their own cost and by their own toil, made for themselves dwellings in the New World. Virginia was founded by a private company; New England was the home of the exiles. England first thrust them out; and she owned them as her children only to oppress them!

"Again, it was said that the commercial losses of the colonists were compensated by protection. But the connexion with Europe was fraught only with danger; for the rivalry of European nations did but transfer the scenes of their bloody feuds to the wilds of America."

Before taking leave of this volume, we must express the great delight and satisfaction we have derived from Bancroft's manly defence of William Penn. Stendly bearing in view that Divine law regulates our relations to the Deity, civil law our relations to the state, and moral law our relations to society, he carefully segregated these elements, which later writers have jumbled together, and consistently maintained that neither the state nor society have a right to intervene in the relations between man and his Creator. Many of the Protestant Dissenters of his day insisted that Romanists should be excepted from this rule; and it was because Penn maintained its universality that he lost much of his popularity after the Revolution.

The Messrs. Fullarton have published "Botta's History of the American Revolution" as a companion work to Bancroft: it is worthy of such an association—and the two together should form a part of every Englishman's library who feels an interest in the genuine honour of his country and the advancement of his kind.

ANTI-CORN-LAW LECTURES IN SUSSEX.—A public lecture on the evils of the Corn Laws was delivered in the large room at the Spread Eagle Hotel, Midhurst, by Mr. Falvey, on Thursday evening, the 27th ult. The room was excessively crowded with an agricultural audience, who took the greatest interest in the proceedings. Had Mr. John Ellman been present, and heard the labourers cheering for Free Trade at the very top of their voices, he would never mention the horse-pond argument again. T. Bowles, Esq., was called to the chair, and made a short but forcible speech in favour of Free Trade. At the close of Mr. Falvey's lecture, a Free-Trade resolution was carried unanimously, and three cheers given for Free Trade and the Anti-Corn Law League. Mr. Falvey delivered two lectures on the Corn and Colonial restrictions at the Richmond Arms Hotel, Horsham, on the evenings of Monday and Tuesday last. Mr. Agate took the chair on each occasion, and impressed upon his friends and fellow-townsmen the necessity of carrying out Free-Trade principles in the legislation of the country. Mr. Falvey took the Corn monopoly on the first evening, and Sugar on the second; and was listened to with deep attention by a numerous and respectable audience, including many ladies. On the motion of the Rev. Mr. Ashdown, a vote of thanks was carried by acclamation to Mr. Falvey, and the Council of the League, for their exertions in the cause of commercial freedom. Mr. Falvey is to lecture in the Town-hall, Brighton, on the evenings of Monday and Tuesday next.

BREAD MONOPOLY.—Tuesday evening upwards of 150 master bakers held a meeting at the Green Dragon, Fleet-street, for the purpose of inducing millers or flour factors not to supply any baker with flour who sells his bread under a stipulated trade price, and pledging themselves individually and collectively not to support or deal with any miller so transgressing. A committee was appointed to see their resolutions carried into effect. Probably the public may think it right to ascertain the names of these 150 master bakers, and refuse to buy bread of them at their trade or monopoly prices. —Globe.

THE PRICE OF BREAD IN FRANCE.—The Moniteur publishes the prices of wheat in the different markets of France in February last, from which it appears that the hectolitre sold on an average for 19f. 50c. at Toulouse, Gray, Lyons, and Marseilles; 19f. 10c. at Marais and Bordeaux; 17f. 64c. at St. Laurent and Le Grand Lemp; 17f. 64c. at Mulhausen and Strasbourg; 15f. 79c. at Bergues, Arras, Roye, Soissons, Paris, and Rouen; 17f. 17c. at Saumur and Nantes; 13f. 70c. at Metz, Verdun, and Charleville; 17f. 33c. at St. Lo, Paimpol, Quimper, Hennebont. The price of bread has experienced a slight rise in Paris. The Moniteur announces that the price of the 14r. loaf, first quality, is fixed for the first 15 days of the present month at 60 centimes, or 6d. The National observes, that "it appears to be impossible to induce the Prefect of Police to put an end to the jobbing which is practised at the Corn-market for the purpose of raising the price of bread. Nothing announced that the price of bread would be changed for the first 15 days of March, but the day on which the assize was to be struck, a few bakers, in collusion with some factors, made fictitious sales of 1200 quintals of flour at 2f. higher than what had been fairly sold to the trade. This fact has caused both surprise and indignation, particularly as at the moment of those fictitious sales the price of wheat had fallen 1f. the quintal."

BURTON LIBERAL REGISTRATION ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this association was held on Thursday evening, at the Public-rooms, Broadmead, G. Thomas, Esq., treasurer, in the chair. The Chairman said the meeting had been deferred till a later period of the year than usual, it being thought desirable to see what measures would be brought forward by Sir Robert Peel, at the opening of Parliament. He then referred to the various measures proposed by the Government, as set forth in Sir Robert Peel's speech in the budget, and concluded by enforcing the importance of attending diligently to the registration, and quoted from the LEAGUE newspaper to show what might be done towards throwing open the county representations.—T. Mills, Esq., read the annual report, an ably-written document, from which it appeared that the debt of the association had been liquidated, and that the aggregate gain of the Liberals upon the last registration was no less than 240. The report was adopted, and the usual resolutions of thanks to the committee, &c., having been passed, the meeting separated.

The monopolists of corn, and the monopolists of sugar, treat the consumers of both articles as two roguish lawyers, did a pair of booby squires; and the arguments of thread-vendors of the West India interest, which were all addressed to the supporters of the Corn Laws, were fairly expressed in the letter sent by one of the pettifoggers to his compeer:—

"There are two boobies in the west
That are well-feathered in their nest;
Do you pluck one, I'll pluck the other,
So fare you well, my loving brother."

AGRICULTURE.

THE GAME LAWS' COMMITTEE.

The recent appointment of a select committee to inquire into the operation of the game laws forms, undoubtedly, an epoch in the history of British agriculture. It is the first tenant-farmers' committee. It is an inquiry which tenant-farmers to a man desire should be full, searching, and complete; and it is one which nine landholders out of ten, taking the country through, would have resisted if they had dared, and will, if they can, render as imperfect and inconclusive as possible. For the first time in British history have the farmers made their own, their real, voices heard in the Legislature. There have been select committees without number to inquire into agricultural distress, but they have only been intended to ascertain how reductions of rent could be avoided without making the farmers their own masters. The agricultural committee of 1836 disclosed the fact that all the legislation by which for two-and-twenty years landlords had professed to benefit at the expense of the tenant's capital. From that moment the political landlords became the most energetic opponents of all inquiries into the existence and causes of agricultural distress. It was, therefore, with something like surprise that the concession of a committee to inquire into the game laws was received by the public.

Writing as a farmer to farmers, we shall not waste a line on the supererogatory task of showing that the game laws constitute one of the greatest and most hopeless burdens by which, amongst many others, the tenant-farmers are oppressed. That is an agricultural axiom. Nobody denies it, except such madcap reasoners as Mr. Grantley Berkeley, who unconsciously demonstrate just the contrary of that they wish to prove, having all the value of most unwilling witnesses. There is no doubt that the inquiry will be an effective one. But we ask the tenantry of Great Britain how this has been brought about? Has it originated with the "Central Society for the Protection of British Agriculture?" Is it due to the indomitable perseverance of Mr. William Miles or Mr. George Bankes? Does it result from influence, the disinterested influence of the Duke of Richmond at the Treasury? Has the Duke of Buckingham at length proved himself in deed as well as in name the "farmers' friend?" To each of these queries every farmer must say no! no! There is not a man amongst the active protectionists, the self-designated "farmers' friends," who would not have shirked or burked the inquiry if he could. Fancy the faces of the eighty squirearchical members of the House of Commons who assembled at Sir Robert Peel's on the morning of the day when the committee was agreed to! Imagine what they must have felt when plainly told by the Prime Minister, doubtless in the blindest terms, that an inquiry into game laws and game-preserving was inevitable! How, then, has all this been brought about? Hares, pheasants, and rabbits might have devoured the substance and impoverished the family of every tenant-farmer in the kingdom, so long as rent could have been levied out of his capital, before the landowners would have moved in furtherance of such an inquiry. Who, then, has proved to be the "farmers' friend?" No other than John Bright, one of the dreaded champions of the League. The efforts of the League throughout the country, and the tact, eloquence, and intellectual power of a few Free-Traders in Parliament, have obtained this first instalment of justice for the tenant-farmers. They, whose very names have been used by the monopolist landowners to scare the tenantry from all investigation of the causes of agricultural depression, have been the only public men who have ever obtained a public measure unquestionably advantageous to the class of tenant-farmers. His Grace of Richmond made apparently a great stir for the sake of the farmers, but it all ended in a seat at the Treasury for his own brother. Buckingham's devotion to the cause of the suffering agriculturists has procured him a blue ribbon and a diamond bauble for himself. While Miles and Bankes are talking of making sham motions,—at the very mention of which even the landowning House of Commons laughs outright, and by which they know they can get nothing but a minority of about seventy or eighty of the most imbecile members in the House,—Bright the Leaguer obtains a committee on the Game Laws with the approval of those who, by that inquiry, will be put upon their trial.

Farmers, who are your friends? Are those who delude you with false promises and illusory expectations, or are those who, telling you some home truths, go at once to a practical examination of your admitted grievances, your real friends?

The most rabid monopolists begin to note this as a sign of the times. Thus the New Farmer's Journal says:—

"We sincerely rejoice in the appointment of the committee, and, although by no means disposed to deny Mr. Bright his full share of credit for having obtained it, we may perhaps be pardoned for expressing our regret that the matter was not first taken up by some agricultural representative. ARE WE ALSO TO BE INDEBTED TO A FREE-TRADER FOR A COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY INTO THE CAUSES OF THE PRESENT DISTRESSED STATE OF AGRICULTURE?"

As surely as the game-law inquiry was obtained by the exertions of the Free-Traders, so certainly will any effective inquiry into the "distressed state of agriculture" be procured by means of the League. So the Morning Post :—

"In districts where the rural peasantry are suffering from want of employment and destitution, it is mere madness to suppose that the game-preserving system can be kept up by severity of law. If men be idle and hungry they certainly will attempt to catch the wild animals on which they may feed. Let proprietors, therefore, look carefully to the condition of the people on their estates, and try to give them something better to do than poaching."

And what makes men idle in the rural districts, but the slovenly cultivation induced by the Corn Laws and Game Laws, and the consequent vassalage of yearly tenant-farmers?

The great object of farmers now must be to make the inquiry as complete as possible, and the best mode of doing so will be for those farmers who have had opportunities of noticing the evils caused by game-preserving and the game laws—and what farmer has not had far, far too many such?—to communicate to Mr. Bright, as chairman of the committee, the substance of the evidence they can give. Witnesses summoned by the committee will have their expenses paid; so that, by the devotion of a few hours to this most important question, farmers may help to remove the most cruel remnant of feudal barbarism by which they and their labourers are oppressed and degraded. Farmers should come prepared to show the whole bearings of the game laws, for already are there indications that the squires think of giving up their special law as regards hares and rabbits, and retaining it for the preservation of pheasants and partridges. But this will never do. Hares and rabbits are at present more complained of than pheasants and partridges, because they are a degree, and only a degree, less destructive. The minor is sunk in the major. But what is the fact? We know that overwhelming evidence of the vast injury done to grain crops, in every stage from seed time to harvest, by pheasants in particular, will be offered to the committee; and we know also that farmers and their men will be subject to espionage and entrapment by gamekeepers as much for the sake of winged as of four-footed game. The abolition of the game laws must be entire, and if the farmers who give evidence will state all the facts within their knowledge the result of the inquiry must be the TOTAL REPEAL OF ALL GAME LAWS. Now is an occasion when farmers' clubs should be rendered realities by the introduction of this topic, and by deputed some one of their body to give evidence before the committee. Farmers must begin to think and act for themselves. They should form societies to discuss their real grievances, and they should support each other in firm and business-like demands for their removal. There is no other body of capitalists who would submit to be devoured in detail as the farmers have been by the rent-loving landlords; and nothing but a combined action on the part of tenant-farmers is necessary to emancipate them once and for ever.

The landowners could never resist any real pressure on the part of the farmers. Not one in fifty—be his rental what it may—could find capital to stock and manage a thousand acres without extreme inconvenience, and not one in a thousand, having stocked it, could continue its cultivation without a yearly loss far beyond his whole rent. It is only because tenant-farmers do not co-operate with each other that they have been one by one ground down to the dust by the landowners. Let this game-law committee be made the occasion for the commencement of such co-operation by tenant-farmers for their own protection.

GREAT CRY AND LITTLE WOOL.

We all recollect the outcry there was a few weeks ago amongst a certain clique of monopolist squires and land-agents for repealing the malt-tax, and the solemn pretences put forth that farmers would then make great gains by feeding cattle with malt! We believe it was even pronounced by the Duke of Richmond's deputation to Sir Robert Peel. How the right honourable baronet, who knows pretty well the depth of solemn humbug, must have laughed in his sleeve at the impudence of those who asked the Government to take off a very productive duty on malt to enable them to feed their cattle, while they compel the Government to retain a very unproductive duty on grain, which keeps out more cattle food by a hundred-fold than all the malt consumed in the country. However, the assertion having been made, it became the duty of the "Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture" to seek for some evidence to support it; and accordingly we find Mr. Stafford O'Brien, the chairman of the publication committee of that society—the Adam Smith-garbling committee—thus addressing the Mark-lane Express for information :—

"At the Northampton Agricultural Protection Society's dinner, on the 22nd of January last, I mentioned in my speech that it would be very desirable to obtain from Government some arrangement whereby the agriculturist could malt barley (or could obtain malt) for his cattle free from the impositions of the existing malt-tax. Since then I have received several communications on this subject, suggesting methods, whether by drawbacks, certificates, chemically colouring the grain, &c., by which this could be accomplished. But my object in writing to you is to obtain from some practical farmer a statement as to the efficacy of malt in feeding cattle, and also of its efficacy as compared with oil-cake. The subject was mentioned to Sir Robert Peel at our interview with him to-day, and, if we are able to make out a case to the Government, I have little doubt they will concede this to us. But I have not, as yet, met with any one who can speak of its advantages from experience."

It is difficult to imagine any thing more ludicrous than this advertisement for facts to "make out a case," after the Minister has been seriously told that the agriculturists are to be relieved in that way. And although the malt-tax repealers are daily associates of Mr. O'Brien at the "room in Bond-street," yet he has "never met with any one who can speak of its advantages from experience." What, is Mr. Baker and his crew silent on this point! Mr. O'Brien certainly took the right course in addressing himself to the Mark-lane Express, the columns of which are the great receptacle for the effusions of the malt-tax repealers; and our readers shall see the mighty results.

Mr. Charles Poppy says :—

"All that is known respecting the nutritious quality of malt for feeding, except from a single case or two, is, that whilst the duty on malt was but 6d. per bushel, small portions of malt mixed with bran or chaff used to be given to cows when brought to a weak state by calving, and to other cattle and horses after severe illness or bad accidents; a practice recommended by old farriers and cowleeches. I have seen beasts so fed recover their strength very fast. I have no doubt of the superior fattening quality of malting corn, and pulse too, given in proper quantities with other food; but should be sorry if the farmers were allowed to use doctored malt for feeding cattle, whilst the farm-labourers were debarred its use. This would increase dissatisfaction and disaffection. But the mode proposed is not practicable; as beasts would not touch scented malt, and its being stained with innoxious ingredients would not prevent its being used for brewing."

This is very sensible, and pretty well knocks on the head Mr. O'Brien's "case." So Mr. Thomas Ellman :—

"It is difficult to mention advantages from experience in feeding with malt, inasmuch as little confidence can be placed in trials on a limited scale; and the expense attending it interferes seriously with extensive practice in this matter; however, I can furnish Mr. O'Brien with the names of farmers (with their permission) who have used malt in the feeding of cattle with very great success. There are certain reasons why their names are not here stated.—[Running the duty, hey?] I understand from old farmers, that malt was frequently used for cattle when the duty was only 4s. a quarter. Malt should never be used in a dry state for cattle."

Mr. Ellman, however, thinks that if malt for cattle-feeding should alone be exempted from duty it would excite ill-will and jealousy amongst the labourers, who know that malt makes beer. We could extract many more passages from various other sources, but they are all much to the same effect; feeding cattle on malt has never practically been tried, and all that has been said about it by monopolist repealers has no other foundation than their own inventive powers. Mr. Ellman suggests :—

"That some other than a tenant-farmer should give this experiment a fair trial. An article upon which is charged so heavy a duty, is only within the reach of an amateur farmer; many of which class, I have no doubt, will take up the subject."

The fact is, that if the malt duty should be either partially or wholly repealed without making the trade in foreign barley absolutely free, all the revenue lost by the State would go into the pockets of the land-lords. The consumers of malt would not be benefited one farthing, while they would be injured by having to pay a part of any other tax which might be substituted for the malt-tax. And whatever may be the relative value of malt for feeding purposes as compared with pulse, oil-cake, &c., the grazier would gain nothing by the alteration until the demand for meat shall become larger by unfettering the national industry, and shaking off monopoly in every form.

SQUIREARCHAL INSOLENCES.

"ONGAR LABOURERS' FRIEND SOCIETY.—We understand that Sir Edward Bowyer Smyth, Bart., of Hill-hall, patron of the above society, has expressed his intention to the Rev. Philip Ray, secretary, to present at the next ensuing annual public meeting a silver cup, value ten guineas, to the renting farmer who shall have expended the greatest amount in agricultural labour for one year."—Chelmsford Chronicle.

There, farmers of Essex, is a prize for you! Sir Edward Bowyer Smyth, Bart., of Hill-hall, the patron of the Labourers' Friend Society, graciously offers you a bit of a pipkin to encourage you to employ the labourers! We wonder whether Sir Edward Bowyer Smyth, Bart., of Hill-hall, ever associated, out of his own class and clique, with any but lackeys and stable-boys; for surely the pipkin prize is adapted rather to the tone of the servants' hall than to that of a body of tenant-farmers.

Perhaps it would be difficult to find a more complete illustration of the utter ignorance in which landlords live of the farmers who surround them, than the offer of such a pitiful and insulting prize to the Essex farmers.

WEARING ROUND.

The day is not far distant when the most passionate opponents of Free Trade will be convinced of the necessity of getting speedily over the present transitional state, and removing altogether protective duties. The following passage from the Bankers' Circular, a violent monopolist journal, seems to indicate that what has happened with respect to the Game Laws will occur as to the Corn Laws: viz., that their last blow will be received at the hands of the Free-Traders, with the hearty co-operation of the industrious agriculturists :—

"The pretext of 56s. for the quarter of wheat did not deceive us, we knew its delusive fallacy, and did all in our power to prevent the agricultural class from being deceived by it. However, there is obviously no strength in Parliament to counteract the operation of causes, which must inevitably produce such evil consequences; and, seeing that it is a hopeless effort to discuss these subjects, we shall be glad to see the principle of Free Trade have its range at once; because we are convinced that nothing but the experience of its effects can convince either the Government or the legislative bodies of the revolution in the value of property which it would produce. The agricultural representatives seem to us to act in a suicidal manner, by rejecting Mr. Cobden's invitation to unite with him in demanding an impartial committee of investigation. It is that proceeding which they ought themselves to demand. We believe Mr. Cobden would consent to a fair committee, and that he would agree that the investigation should be searching, unrestricted, and complete—comprising all matters that bear permanently on the prices of agricultural produce, and the condition of farmers and their labourers."

LANDLORD BENEFICENCE.

"The tenants of the Duke of Buckingham have just had distributed among them one hundred tons of oil-cake, in order to afford food for their cattle, and to compensate them for the great deficiency in their hay crops during the past unprofitable season. An additional sixty tons have also been ordered by his grace to be delivered to his tenantry before the first of next month. It may be remarked that the average price of oil-cake is now from £10. 15s. to £11. 5s. per ton."—Morning Post.

The above paragraph affords a very apt illustration of landowning beneficence. The duke's dairy farmers are not men of capital, and, therefore, are unable to feed their cattle with purchased food. But if their cattle were now brought to market, lean and half-starved as they are, they would scarcely fetch enough to pay the duke's arrears of rent. Hence his grace's paragraphed generosity. Had the trade in grain been free, the deficiency of provender would have been supplied, in a great measure, by importation.

The following has been exhibited as a placard in many of the shop windows in London :—

FARM TENANTS AND THE GAME LAWS.—Colonel Oakes, chief constable of the Norfolk police, hired Easton Lodge of Thomas French Berney, Esq., and conditioned not to encourage the production of hares and rabbits thereon. Notwithstanding this engagement, 10,000 rabbits and 400 hares were killed during the last season, and the damage done to the tenants occupying the adjoining farms has been valued by Mr. Thomas Edwards, Hapton-hall, and found to amount to upwards of £280, which sum Colonel Oakes paid to Mr. Berney's agent (Mr. Noye) on Saturday last. —Norfolk News.

INCENDIARY FIRES.—A fire most lamentably destructive in its effects, and which is proved beyond doubt to be the work of an incendiary, broke out about twelve o'clock on Tuesday night on the premises of Mr. Ganner, an extensive farmer residing in Kingston-lane, Teddington. Before the fire was got under the valuable ricks and the numerous sheds surrounding the yard were destroyed. The horses, cows, pigs, &c. &c., were removed to a place of safety; the house was also saved. A wheat rick, containing the produce of 50 acres, a second nearly as large, a stack of rye, one of barley, and two ricks of hay, were wholly consumed. The damage done to the premises, and amount of property destroyed, it is said will be little short of £3000. There seems to be no doubt that the fire was wilful. This is the second calamity that has occurred to Mr. Ganner; two years since he had the entire contents of his farm at Hampton-common destroyed by fire, and under circumstances similar to the present.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, March 8, 1845.

The income-tax has been whimsically but justly baptized "bitter extract of sugar," for the necessity of its continuance has solely arisen from the Premier's determination to maintain the unjust monopoly of the West India proprietors. But the additional principle of classification has been introduced to render this bitterness literal as well as metaphorical, for the more nutritive and saccharine sugar is, the higher is the tax to be imposed on its importation. In plain terms the Cabinet proposes to make the supply of wholesome sustenance penal, and to offer a premium for the adulteration of food. Mr. John Gladstone, the father of the late and paulo-post-future Minister, is of opinion that the penalty on pure sugars is insufficient, and that the reward for adulteration is too small; and he has addressed a letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the "serious and alarming" results that are likely to follow if the people of England are allowed to have wholesome food. These Gladstones have a strange love for patronizing poison: one justified the Chinese for poisoning the wells; the other calls for a law to compel the producers of Java and Manila to adulterate their sugar. We did not suppose that Brinvilliers would have had such avowed disciples in the nineteenth century. It is a singular proof of the influence possessed by the Gladstone clique that Sir Robert Peel, after having apparently yielded to Mr. Hogg's arguments against the proposed classification, should after the interval of a week be again fixed to the principle of discrimination, though he fully recognised that this discrimination will compel a large class of producers to lower the quality of their produce, and to patronize the arts of adulteration rather than those of improvement. We in effect say to the sugar-producing countries, "You shall not send us the best article you can produce, because people would purchase it in preference to the far inferior article grown on the estates of the Gladstones in Demerara; but you must find out some artificial means of rendering your sugars as bad as those of the Gladstones." It has what the Times calls "an ugly look" for the greatest of civilized nations to tell the less advanced members of the human family, that in its legislation improvement is visited with a heavy penalty, and that sugar, in order to find favour, must be stripped of its wholesome and nutritious qualities.

Now, we hold that this proposed sliding scale in sugars is iniquitous as it regards consumers, and utterly barbarous in its relations to the general progress of civilization. We deem it unjust that the people of England should be compelled to use the impure sugars of Demerara because they happen to be grown on the estates of the Gladstones, in preference to the more wholesome sugars of the eastern seas; and we deem it no small move in the direction of barbarism when men are told that, if they take advantage of the bounties of nature, and produce the best article which can be grown on their soil, they must pay a heavy penalty.

But there is another point on which we greatly deprecate some information. We wish to know on what principle the divisional marks of the new sliding scale have been graduated, for the purpose of establishing one clear and uniform system of fixing the duties on eight different classes of sugar in all the ports of the United Kingdom. Are the Custom-house officers to decide by the taste, the smell, or the colour? Or is the Polytechnic Institution to be allied to the Custom-house, and its able chemical lecturer induced to apply his clever tests of poison to determine the amount of adulteration which will enfeeble sugars to the honour of being consumed by British mouths and digested in British stomachs? The chemical department of the Custom-house will be a novelty in the history of science, and the analysis of the "white clays" in saccharine culture will involve more controversy than all that Davy, Liebig, or Playfair has written on the "heavy clays" in agriculture. "This sugar is too good for John Bull," will be the exclamation of one landing-waiter, whose perception of sweetness has been sharpened by his draught of early purl; "It is as bad as if it had been grown by the Gladstones in Demerara," will be the reply of his compeer, whose taste has been dulled by the lozenges which he has taken to cure his cold.

"Who shall decide when doctors disagree?"

But while the matter rests in dispute, owners, consignees, and importers will be left in the utmost perplexity: the amount of saccharine consistency, like the amount of ministerial consistency, will be kept in discussion to the injury of trade, until the question is referred to the Lords of the Treasury, who may be supposed qualified to judge of the sweets of sugar from their keen relish for the sweets of office.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Committee of the Chamber of Deputies on the estimates met on Monday to discuss the question of the conversion of the Five per Cents. into Four-and-a-Half per Cents., when it was decided almost unanimously that the measure should be carried into execution during the present session. It was not expected, however, that it would pass the Chamber of Peers this year.

For some days past there has been an active embarkation of troops at Toulon for Algeria, in order that the army may be complete by the 1st of April, which has been fixed for the commencement of the spring campaign.

SPAIN.—Circular orders have been sent to the Captains-General of the provinces, not to carry, in future, into execution the sentences of death pronounced by courts-martial, without referring to the Government.

PORTUGAL.—The Cortes resumed their sittings on Friday, the 21st ult. The Peers took up the adjourned discussion on the project for the repression of the contraband introduction of grain. The first article is to the following effect:—"That foreign grain introduced into the kingdom is considered contraband, and, as such, subject to the penalty of forfeiture, together with that of the means of its transport. The contrabandist incurs imprisonment of a month the first time of capture, three the second, nine the third, and so on progressively, and shall be fined the triple value of the capture and transport. And when the fine is not paid, it will be substituted by confinement at hard labour at public works, at the rate of half a milree per day, until the full amount of the fine be completed."

After some discussion and skirmishing of a rather personal nature, the bill passed in its "generality," and proceeded to its "particularity" (equivalent to our second reading). The Chamber soon after adjourned, appointing the continuation of the discussion for the order of the day in the following session.

SWITZERLAND.—The debate in the Diet on the question of the Jesuits was commenced on the 27th ult., when a petition for their expulsion, signed by 120,000 persons, was taken into consideration. The discussion was proceeding when the last advices left. The German translation of the Earl of Aberdeen's note to Dr. R. Morier, Esq., British Minister at Bern, has appeared in the papers. His lordship expresses the deep regret of her Majesty's Government at the receipt of Mr. Morier's despatch respecting the recent disturbances, but announces that it does not feel called upon to pronounce an opinion with regard to the causes which may have produced the events narrated by him. Respect for the nationality and independence of the canton would deter her Majesty's Government from any interference in the internal affairs of Switzerland; but the continuance of the present disorders might (it is hinted) lead to consequences which Swiss patriotism would naturally object to. His lordship concludes his note by empowering Mr. Morier to lay it before the President of the Helvetic Confederation.

The Amsterdamsche Courant announces the death of the Nestor of the country, Henricus Keuper, of Doesborgh, in his 110th year. In his 46th year he married a young woman of 22, who survives him; in his 100th he worked still in the fields, and in his 103rd, walked with his wife a distance of three leagues and a half. He was presented to his Majesty a short time ago.

The Rev. Dr. Wolff.—Captain Grover has received a letter from Dr. Wolff, dated from Erzeroum, Jan. 17, in which among other interesting particulars, he states that the following persons have been put to death at various times by the King of Bokhara:—Lieutenant Wyburd, of the Indian Navy; Lieutenant-Colonel Stoddart; Captain Conolly; one whom they call Freshaw; H. Cavaliere Nacelli; a German; five Englishmen, outside Teheer-Joo; a Turcoman who came to Bokhara to attempt the escape of Colonel Stoddart; Ephraim, a Jew, from Meshed, who was sent to Bokhara to make inquiries about Captain Conolly; and a Turkish Officer.

HAYTI.—A letter from Port-au-Prince (Hayti), of Jan. 23, states that the yellow fever had broken out in the Thetis frigate, one of the French vessels on that station. Twelve of the crew died of the disease between the 6th and 12th of January.—Galignani.

CAPTURE OF A SLAYER.—On the African station, off Lagos, on the 16th of November last, the Wasp, whilst under the temporary command of the first lieutenant, C. L. Hockin, captured a small schooner of about 40 tons burden, having on board 179 slaves, viz., 70 men, 44 boys, 30 women, and 35 girls.

TEXAS.—The Southern, from Charleston, brings accounts from Texas. The citizens of Fort Bend county had held a meeting to consider the question of annexation, and had declared, that "it now behoves us, as a nation mindful of our own dignity, to urge the question no further, but distinctly to make it known to the people of the United States, who have a far greater interest at stake upon its final issue than we can have, that the measure is one altogether acceptable to us upon equal terms, but for which Texas ought not to beg." The meeting repudiated all discouraging and "despairing" expressions touching the well-established ability of Texas to maintain her national independence. The Galveston Citizen says,—"It is the impression of well-informed men that the tariff will remain as at present."

INDIA.—Despatches in anticipation of the Overland Mail, bring intelligence from India to the 1st of February. According to the accounts from Bombay, the insurrection in Kolapore is not yet subdued, though 10,000 soldiers have been employed to repress it. Three British officers have unhappily fallen—Captain Taynton, 8th Madras N. I., Lieutenant Campbell, and Ensign Faure, of the 2nd Bombay Europeans. Sickness prevailed in Upper Scinde, where the European soldiers had suffered considerably. Her Majesty's 78th Highlanders are now at Hyderabad; they are on their way to the seacoast for the recovery of their health. Every man is either now sick or has recently been in hospital. There have died since the 1st of September, 402 men, 35 women, and 120 children—or 557 in all belonging to the regiment. The deaths continue at the rate of from 4 to 8 per diem, and the corps, unless removed, threatens speedily to become extinct. A fresh revolution has occurred at Lahore. Heera Singh, the vuzer, his chief adviser, Pundit Jella, with two other sirdars of note, have been slain. Property to the amount of £10,000, chiefly in gold and silver, was found in the house of the deceased Minister, and was confiscated and made over to the public treasury. The entire power is in the hands of the troops, who pull down and set up governments at pleasure.

The Runnymede and Briton transports, the one from Australia and the other from England, with troops for Calcutta, have made their appearance after having for a long while been missing. They were believed to have gone down at sea, but turned out to have been wrecked side by side, on the Andaman islands, in the bay of Bengal—no lives lost.

Intelligence from China is to the 18th Dec., it is of comparatively little interest.

DOMESTIC.

It is rumoured that Mr. Gladstone will return to the Cabinet and hold an office in the administration yet higher than that from which he recently receded. He has, it seems, reconsidered the subject of the increased grant to Maynooth, and has intimated that he is prepared to support both that grant and the other projected educational institution of a liberal constitution in Ireland.

At Dover, on Monday, while it was blowing a strong gale from the S.E. and about eleven a.m., the Spanish schooner, Ignatius, from London for St. Sebastian and Bilbao, with a valuable cargo, came on shore to the westward of the South Pier. Two vessels, with the assistance of several boats, were employed to get her off the rocks, but without avail. At three p.m. the gale increased, with heavy snow squalls, and finding the vessel was fast filling with water, she was obliged to be abandoned by the crew, and she became a total wreck.

The freight of coals from the Tyne to London has suffered an extraordinary fall during the past week, to 6s. 6d. and 7s. per ton. The freight from the port of Sunderland has ranged from 8s. to 8s. 6d.—Newcastle paper.

On Monday a very numerous meeting of delegates from the factory districts of Lancashire was held at the Temperance Hotel, Bolton, to "consider the best means of forwarding the Ten Hours' Bill in the present session of Parliament." There were about 28 delegates present from the various manufacturing towns of Lancashire. Resolutions in favour of the Ten Hours' Bill, and adopting means to promote it, were unanimously agreed to.

Richard Brinsley Sheridan, Esq., of Frampton, Dorset, has been elected for Shaftesbury, which was vacant by the elevation of Lord Howard to the earldom of Effingham. In politics Mr. Sheridan is a Whig, but opposed to the repeal of the Corn Laws.

Numerous attended meetings of the Peace Society have been held in Manchester and Birmingham, to adopt petitions to Parliament against the proposed increase in the navy estimates.

The General Committee of Elections have fixed next Tuesday, the 11th instant, for the appointment of a select tribunal of seven members, to try the merits of the petition presented by Mr. Moffatt against the return of Mr. Joseph Somes, M.P., for Dartmouth.

The coroner's jury on the body of Delarue have found a verdict of "wilful murder" against Tho. Henry Hecker. The case has been several times under examination before Mr. Rawlinson, and stands over till Tuesday next.

On Monday, Mr. W. Carter held an inquest, adjourned from the previous Wednesday, at the Rose and Crown, Commercial-road, Lambeth, on the bodies of Rebecca Richardson, aged 33, and her illegitimate child Joseph, aged 14 months, whose deaths occurred under distressing circumstances. It was proved on the evidence of two medical men, that both of the deceased had suffered extremely from want of the common necessities of life. The father of the child was also in extreme want, and begged about the streets. After hearing further evidence, the jury returned the following verdicts:—"That the deceased, Joseph Richardson, died a natural death from congestion of the brain and lungs, arising from exposure to the cold;" and "that the deceased, Rebecca Richardson, died from debility and exhaustion, arising from the previous want of food and sufficient nourishment."

The Right Hon. William Draper Beaz, Lord Wynford, died on Monday, March 3, at his seat, Leasowes, Kent, in the eighty-second year of his age.

The Rev. Mr. Ward, author of the "Ideal Church," in consequence of an announcement which has gone the round of the papers, that he is about to be married, has published a letter, the object of which is to explain that there is no inconsistency between the alleged statement and his advocacy of celibacy in the work in question. "Both friends and foes have, in innumerable instances, conceived that there is some inconsistency between the statements made in my work and the announcement that has been recently made." "How any one can imagine that I have ever professed a vocation to a high ascetic life, I am utterly at a loss to conceive."

Shortly before eight o'clock, on Sunday evening, a fire, involving it is said the destruction of property to the amount of from £10,000 to £20,000, occurred on the extensive premises belonging to Messrs. E. H. and G. Enderby, patent rope, twine, and canvas manufacturers, East Greenwich.

At the Middlesex sessions, last week, a gentleman of highly respectable appearance (whose name we could supply) claimed exemption from serving on the jury on the ground of having been convicted of felony, and tendered documentary evidence to that effect amidst roars of laughter. Mr. Sergeant Adams held the objection good, but observed he was only surprised that any person should disgrace himself by pleading such an unenviable privilege.—Globe.

On Friday, the 23rd ult., between the hours of three and four o'clock in the afternoon, a fire broke out in the private dwelling-house belonging to Mr. John Franklin, situate at No. 5, Garden-street, Vauxhall-bridge-road. It was occasioned by a child playing with lucifer matches. The child was so injured by the flames that it died in a few hours afterwards. Part of the furniture was also burned.

On Monday William Deedes, Esq., of Sandling Park, was elected, without opposition, member for East Kent, in the room of Sir E. Knatchbull.

Sir John Gurney, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, died on Saturday last at his residence in Lincoln's-inn-fields.

Revolting details of the state of Spaffords Burial-ground have for the last few weeks occupied the police reports of the newspapers. Witnesses have sworn that the ground, which does not comprise a space of more than two acres, is literally saturated with dead bodies; notwithstanding which, interments, occasionally to the number of 30 in a day, continue to take place. A former gravedigger has sworn that he and another kept count of the number interred in one year, and that it reached 2017! To make room for fresh arrivals, bodies half decomposed are exhumed, and, with the coffins, burned. Inhabitants of the neighbourhood stated that the effluvia was horrible, and that frequent illness was the consequence: in some cases death was alleged to have resulted from putrid fever caught from the malarial. The affair has come under the cognizance of the Home Secretary, who, it is expected, will interfere to abate this frightful nuisance.

The Repeal Association met on Monday at the Conciliation-hall, Dublin. Mr. O'Connell commenced the business of the day by handing in a variety of subscriptions; among which were £65 from the clergy of the diocese of Elphin, and £126 from the clergy of the archdiocese of Tuam, by the hands of Dr. M'Hale. Mr. O'Connell moved that the resolution adopted at the last meeting, relative to monastic institutions, be changed to a petition to Parliament, praying that Mr. Watson's bill may pass. That bill would effectually remove the disabilities under which the regular clergy lay. If the Government gave that bill their support, the Irish people would accept it as a boon; and he called on the Ministry, if they wished to make good their promises to this country, to do so. Mr. O'Brien seconded the motion, which passed with acclamation. The other business and speeches contained nothing novel or important. The rent for the week amounted to £586.

An accident occurred at the Royal Canal, Dublin, by which seven persons lost their lives. It arose from the passengers, who were numerous, having rushed to one side to speak to their friends as the boat was about to leave, when the boat lurched, the water rushed in at the cabin windows, and seven persons were suffocated.

On Sunday last eight persons were drowned on the lake nearly opposite Hare Island, Athlone, by the sinking of a ferry-boat, in which they were crossing. Three others, two women and a man, were saved.

At the meeting of the Protestant Operatives' Association on Thursday, a letter was read from Sir R. H. Inglis, relating to a petition to the House of Commons for the impeachment of Sir Robert Peel. A similar letter was received from Mr. Gladstone.

Mr. W. B. Ferrand has been enrolled a member of the confederacy, and certainly he is every way qualified.—Dublin Evening Post.

Shortly after 10 o'clock, on Wednesday morning, a locomotive boiler, used by the Messrs. Samuda for the heating of their factory at Blackwall, exploded in their yard, killing three labourers on the spot and severely wounding eight others. The whole of the engine-house was levelled to the ground, and nearly 1000 panes of glass in a large glasshouse adjoining the premises, as also several windows in the neighbourhood, were shattered to pieces. The corpse of one man was thrown up into the air at an elevation of 100 feet, and was afterwards picked up on the opposite side of the river at a place called Bow Creek. The boiler was rent into three distinct pieces, one portion of which, weighing about 7 cwt., was blown over the houses, and fell into Orchard-street, distant about 300 yards, striking in its descent the door-post and wall belonging to Messrs. Turner, tar-manufacturers. The second portion, weighing about 5 cwt., was likewise blown over the houses, and fell in an adjoining field, at a distance of about 100 feet. The third portion of the boiler, containing the tubular pipes, remains in the yard of Messrs. Samuda.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ANTI-CORN-LAW BAZAAR.—It is with feelings of pleasure that we again refer to this noble project. A committee of gentlemen is now formed, and meets almost daily at the Committee Rooms, in Carlisle-street, to promote the object of the Bazaar. We are also happy to state that the fair sex of our town are coming forward to assist in the laudable design; and that a ladies' committee has been formed. Numbers of ladies are already at work, and others are daily signifying their intention of doing so. We have before suggested the propriety of sending a ship freighted from the Tyne. Coal is one of the principal commodities of this district; let those coal-owners then, favourable to Free Trade, contribute towards the working classes to render their assistance and future interest.—Tyne Mercury.

THE DUKE'S GAME CART.—During the past week, the Duke of Buckingham's game cart has been very busy at Aylesbury, and, in addition to the freeholders of the county, party receiving a hare each, some of the borough members were also presented with one each this year. This is a new and what we cannot understand, unless the Duke's intention to destroy all the hares about Aylesbury is no such luck.—Bucks Gazette.

MR. BRIGHT'S MOTION.—It were idle to waste a word on a palpable fact, that it is to the exertions of the Duke of Grafton, and all parties in Suffolk alive to the importance of this matter, will be prepared with full information for the committee; because, if Mr. Bright's motion be not followed up with vigour, we shall have all the abominations of the game laws perpetuated. Alas! poor Sydney Smith, who first aroused public attention to the evils of the game laws, is now no more!—Ipswich Express.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTIONS.—A gentleman in Liverpool has offered to contribute the sum of £100 to the funds of the Mechanics' Institution, in Dublin, on condition that the sum of £200 be raised in that city within two months.

THE GAME LAW COMMITTEE.—We trust that the Duke of Grafton, and all parties in Suffolk alive to the importance of this matter, will be prepared with full information for the committee; because, if Mr. Bright's motion be not followed up with vigour, we shall have all the abominations of the game laws perpetuated. Alas! poor Sydney Smith, who first aroused public attention to the evils of the game laws, is now no more!—Ipswich Express.

MORE HORRORS OF NORTHLEACH.—At the Cheltenham Board of Guardians on Thursday last, Mr. Hollis reported that William Smart, gunmaker, had died in the house from the effects of his incarceration in Northleach prison, whither he was sent for an offence against the game laws!—Worcester Chronicle.

BASE COIN.—The circulation of base coin in the metropolis is now practised to a great extent, particularly of shillings and sixpences. The spurious coin are manufactured in a superior style, being double-plated, and the sound excellent, and are supposed to be made in Birmingham. The detection can, however, be made by weighing them against real coin.—Globe.

THE GAME LAWS.—At the Buckingham petty sessions, held a few days since before the Rev. Adam Baynes (who was in the chair), the Rev. W. Eyre, and the Rev. W. Andrews, a man named Grantham was committed to prison under the following circumstances:—It appeared that some time since the man was taken before the magistrates charged with killing game without being duly licensed. For this offence he was convicted and fined. The fine and costs were paid. He was subsequently recharged for not taking out a game certificate, but not being able to pay the amount demanded (between £7 and £8) his furniture was sold; and the assets not being sufficient to liquidate the claim made upon him, he was committed to Buckingham gaol until he can raise the required amount. The man lived at Gawcott, in the immediate vicinity of the town of Buckingham.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK LANE, Monday, March 3.—The supply of Wheat from Kent this morning was short, but there was a fair quantity from Kent; the best samples were readily taken off at last week's rates, but other descriptions met a very slow sale, and the stands were not quite cleared at the close of the market. The barley trade remains in exactly the same state as last week. Beans and Peas barely supported former rates. The supply of Irish Oats is again considerable; this and the very limited demand made the trade exceedingly heavy, and sales to any extent could not be effected without submitting to a decline of 6d. to 1s. from this day week.

FRIDAY, March 7.—There is a large supply of Wheat from Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire, direct to the millers, but not much from the home counties. The stands are not yet cleared of last Monday's supply of Kentish Wheat, though it is offered at a decline from the prices of last week. The trade in all descriptions of English and Foreign is exceedingly slow at Monday's rates. There is no alteration in the value of Barley, of which the supply is moderate. The arrivals of Irish Oats are scanty, but there is a good supply of English and Scotch. There is no animation in the trade, but we cannot quote any further decline in prices. Beans and Peas remain as on Monday. There was no alteration in the duties yesterday.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

THE BAZAAR.

Hitherto we have scarcely felt it necessary to give this subject that first place in our columns to which its real importance entitles it. The ready and active zeal with which, in most parts of the country, our friends have from the beginning taken up the suggestion of a great metropolitan manifestation of British industry against the laws that obstruct and plunder it, has seemed to leave us little more to do than to point out the means and organize the machinery by which that zeal may work to the best advantage. But as time wears on, and the hour approaches after which it will be too late to make efforts that would require any considerable variation or extension of arrangements already matured, we feel less than ever able to satisfy ourselves with any measure of success, however splendid, short of the very utmost that may be attainable. Of the success—the substantial and entire success—of our work, there is not, there never has been, a doubt. Yet we should not do justice to our friends, to ourselves, or to their and our common cause, were we to leave any means untried by which that success may be rendered more brilliant and decisive. The prompt and enthusiastic exertions which have everywhere responded to the appeals of the League deputations that have visited many of our towns, and the unnumbered spontaneous proffers of aid from individuals and committees in various parts of the country, lay a responsibility upon us, which we cheerfully accept, while there is yet time, to the completeness of our

It would be a pleasant task (though none of the least) to sum up what has been already done, and to congratulate our readers on results of which they may now hold themselves assured. That thirty men have undertaken to furnish each a stall, with the best specimens of its peculiar industry, is, of itself, success enough to justify our first anticipation. But we cannot content ourselves to deem anything done, while anything remains to be done. There will be ample time for congratulation some ten weeks hence: now is the time for work. We confess we know not why there should not be—in addition to all the thousandfold varieties of natural curiosity, tasteful handiwork, antiquarian relics, &c., contributed by individual liberality—at least twice thirty stalls, each exhibiting the most perfect products of the industry characteristic of the town or district whose name it bears. It is not, however, our purpose now to go into details as to the particular modes of action most advisable. These have already been given, to some extent, in the circular issued by the Council,* and any requisite amount of suggestion or information suited to particular localities will be promptly supplied on application, by letter or otherwise, either here or in Manchester. Our object in writing now is to do that, once for all, for the whole kingdom, which has been done in many of our towns and cities by special deputations from the Council. We would stir up into instant and vigorous action feelings which we well know everywhere exist, but which, unless they immediately take the form of action, will be as unavailing as though they were non-existent. Let there be no waiting anywhere for deputations. It is impracticable for deputations to visit one-half of the places that are ready to give them a welcome. For what remains to be done we must now rely on spontaneous action. In every town and village, large or small, where there are willing workers or cheerful givers, let committees of ladies and committees of gentlemen be formed without delay; or, where materials for a committee may not exist, every one can be his or her own committee: let them immediately place themselves in correspondence with the League, state as fully as possible the nature and extent of their resources, and the best attention of the Council will be given to every point on which information or suggestion may be desired, whether as to modes of contribution or facilities of transmission. There is time enough yet for plenty of good work: but there is certainly none for waste.

After all that has been so well said and done about this matter, we doubt whether its true magnitude and significance are more than half comprehended by any of us. The longer we look at it the more its importance grows upon us. Let every Free-Trader in Great Britain rest assured—rather let him work assured—that by helping forward the League Bazaar he is striking a blow at monopoly scarcely second, in value and power, to the purchase of a county qualification, and the registration of a county vote. A good stall at Covent Garden will be worth more to the cause than would a seat at Westminster for a duke's borough. We speak not merely, nor chiefly, with reference to the pecuniary results of the Bazaar—great beyond example as these will be—but of the impulse—the strong and enduring impulse—which it will give to the public mind. We are perfectly convinced that it will do more to bring and keep the Free-Trade question before the country, prominently, conspicuously, and permanently, than anything that has been yet done in this agitation. There will be no possibility of the public overlooking it while it lasts, or forgetting it when it is over. It will be a spectacle, not to the metropolis only, but to the empire; and not to the empire only, but to Europe and America. That their Graces of Buckingham and Richmond will condescend to look in on this exhibition of the choicest products of that "native industry" which they make it the boast and business of their lives to "protect," is indeed more than we can venture to predict: as they never manifested any partiality for

* As this may be read by some who have not seen the circular alluded to, we subjoin an extract:—

"It now only remains for the Council to observe, that any article which the taste of the donor may suggest, or his ability dictate, will be most cheerfully and gratefully accepted; although the following classification specifies the articles most suitable for such an occasion:—

2. Articles of Manufacture, British and Foreign.

Covent-garden oratory, it may be more than doubted whether they will dare to face that rebuke—more effective, in its silent eloquence, than the most terrible invective that a righteous indignation ever uttered within those walls—which the genius of British industry will there pass on the tyrant monopoly that chains and starves it. But it is a safe prophecy that there will not be an intelligent foreigner in or near London during the month of May next, of whatever rank or from whatever country, of the old world or the new, who will not deem himself privileged in the opportunity of witnessing that magnificent aggregation of the noblest material products of the industrial mind of England; or who will not, on returning to his own shores, help to strengthen the public opinion of nations against the principles of a legislation that holds the first people of workers in the world in slavery to titled and rapacious idlers.

Altogether, this Bazaar will fill a larger space in the public mind, it will live longer in men's thoughts, it will be a more significant and enduring symbol of the Free-Trade principle, than anything which our agitation has yet shown. Every man, woman, and child who makes anything for it, or gives anything to it, or sees anything in the process of making; every one who is at any expense or trouble about it; every one who attends it as a spectator; every one of the hundreds that sell, and of the tens of thousands that buy, and of the hundreds of thousands that will see some one or other of the numberless products of numberless kinds of industry which will be sent from it all over the country, and of the millions that will read or hear of a spectacle unprecedented in the history of spectacles—all will be drawn, more or less, within the influence of the Free-Trade movement—all will, more or less, be called to think, feel, and speak about the Free-Trade question. Our Covent-garden Bazaar will be an impulse to the public mind, at once wide-spread and enduring. Months ago it began, months and years hence it will continue: that, as a cheering recollection, and ultimately as a venerable tradition, of which the outward and visible signs will be precious heirlooms to the children whose fathers and mothers shall have helped to untax their bread and untie their hands.

To the women of Great Britain we need not now renew our appeal in favour of an undertaking which originated with themselves, and to whose furtherance their liberal and judicious zeal has so largely contributed. Ever the truest and most efficient helpers in works of charity and religion, they have here shown how well they understand the nature and obligation of each, by adopting as their own a cause which partakes of both—a cause whose grand and simple justice is at once the most comprehensive of charities, and the essence of the holiest and most catholic of religions. Honour to the strong, true hearts that recognise, in the liberation of industry from the landlord yoke, and of bread from the landlord tax, woman's mission and woman's work. This is a woman's question. Most broadly and palpably is it such. It is a question of home. It is a question not merely of the peace and plenty, the comfort and cheerfulness of home—but, in tens of thousands of instances, of the very existence of a home at all. Monopoly makes fearful havoc of the homes of England. Monopoly is a most pitiless breaker-up of families—divides, knocks to pieces, and scatters households without mercy. Monopoly pauperises the labourer, and then lodges husband and wife at the two furthest extremities of a union workhouse. Monopoly makes a bankrupt of the merchant; and his daughters must earn a painful and precarious living, by teaching for hire the accomplishments that once graced a happy and affectionate home. Monopoly sends out growing girls from under the mother's eye, to slave at millinery and dressmaking—for when bread is dear and trade bad, fathers must economise, or go into the Gazette. Rents for the duke, and portions for the duke's daughters—for the tradesman's daughters, deformity, blindness, cough, and the grave. Monopoly sends off sons and brothers to Canada and Australia, who might have remained to be the stay of their mothers and the protectors of their sisters. When food is not enough for all, some must go; and who should go but the strongest? The mothers have always the union-house to look to; and for the sisters there is needlework and a Needlewomen's Protection Society. The part which monopoly has in making these miseries is as plain as the part which the sun has in making the daylight. The parliamentary returns—which show 33,000 emigrants in 1842, 118,000 in 1841, 123,000 in 1842, and 67,000 in 1843—mark with frightful accuracy the ascending and descending movements of that sliding scale on which monopoly thus cruelly sports with the happiness of our English homes.

Women of England! this is your question. Your co-operation is as true to principle as it is generous in feeling. In taking it for your own, you have but proved how well you understand the duties of that "appropriate and peculiar sphere" to which man assumes to restrict you. Whose should this question be, more than yours? The more completely your thoughts and affections centre in home, the more concentrated must be your abhorrence of the power which invades even that sanctuary, sunders that which it is yours to unite, despoils and devastates your own peculiar creation.

THE INCOME-TAX.

"The bitter extract of sugar," which the political chemistry of Sir Robert Peel has produced in the shape of an income-tax is to be administered to the country without the compensating bit of sweetness immortalized by Punch. Sir Robert Peel indulges in the hope that the nation will become enamoured of inquisitorial vexation, just as Eloisa fell in love with Abelard, from the skilfulness with which he laid on the scourge while giving her lessons in grammar. Similar chastisement is to be inflicted on the nation while it goes through the process of learning the Premier's novel elements of political economy; and it must be confessed that the income-tax is as admirably calculated to sharpen the wits and whet the intelligence as the whips employed by Solomon, or the improvement on them in the shape of scorpions suggested by Rehoboam. During the debate on the sugar duties, our patriotic Premier assigned as one reason for establishing a classification of sugars, that the progress of improvement might probably lead to the discovery of new processes which would raise the amount of saccharine and nutritive matter in some of the classes far above others, and then argued the necessity for making improvement penal by attaching to it a higher discriminating duty. It is quite consistent with this principle that the income-tax should be the means of supplying the deficiency arising from the Ministerial concessions to West India monopoly: a barbarous tax is fitly applied to the perpetuation of barbarism.

We have always contended that the results of monopoly and protection were, like the hug of the bear, fatal to that which they were designed to cherish. We have frequently shown that, when men are taught to rely on protection instead of their skill, their industry, and their moral energies, the progress of improvement is checked, the incentive to invention removed, and the branch of industry thus placed in artificial restriction is doomed to stand still while all around us is in progress. We believed that such a result was an unmitigated evil; we thought that a slovenly and wasteful mode of cultivating corn or sugar was just what the Legislature should most discourage, and that it would be of national advantage to have wheat with the greatest amount of farinaceous substance, and sugar with the greatest amount of saccharine matter. But the Premier has adopted the new principle of affixing a penalty on improvement and granting a prize to barbarism, with the addition of an inquisitorial income-tax to sharpen our faculties into a proper appreciation of his novel system.

It was said of the Excise, that "it gave powers to the dipping rule which should be denied to the sceptre;" but the Commissioners of the Income-tax claim a power more inquisitorial than the Inquisition, more despotic than the worst despots of the worst age, and more torturing than that of the sworn torturers of the Venetian oligarchy. The merchant, the banker, and the tradesman conceal the sources of their income with a jealousy and caution which cannot be relaxed without the most perilous risks; their transactions involve secrets which could not safely be intrusted to the wives of their bosoms or the children of their affections; yet they are commanded by our wizard Premier to lay open the whole to the inspection of the prying commissioner, or to pay a tax upon income which they do not possess, and a proportion of supposed profits out of real losses.

Take the case of a solicitor. His books contain not only the secrets of his own business, but the more important secrets of his clients and employers. In the same manner the records of the business of the medical practitioner involve the most delicate particulars of his patients and their families. How are these men to act when asked to produce their books for the inspection of commissioners? They must either be guilty of a breach of professional confidence—one of the most sacred trusts that can be reposed in man—or they must pay a heavy penalty for their adherence to good faith.

But bad, vexatious, and inquisitorial as this tax is, it might be borne with some patience if its continuance were necessary to carry into effect some sound and wise principles of commercial reform. This, indeed, is the pretext made by the Premier for its continuance, and a more hollow, hypocritical, and fallacious pretext could hardly have been devised. The amount raised by the income-tax is money obtained under false pretences. So far is it from being a tax levied to facilitate commercial reform, that it is maintained solely from the Premier's obstinate determination to maintain monopoly. Abolish the differential scale of duties conceded to the clamour of the West India monopolists, and there would be a revenue from sugar fully equal to the amount of the tax raised by Schedule D on the income from offices, trades, and professions. In the debate on Monday night Sir Robert Peel is reported to have said, that "he would not revive the subject of the sugar duties." We know not how that could be revived which can never be said to have had life; Sir Robert Peel has not even yet discussed the sugar duties: he has not to this hour stated what is to be the cost of the protection he proposes to grant to the West India proprietors, nor the claims which the lords of the sugar hogshead have to tax the people of England. The principle of taxing the colonies for the benefit of the parent-state has been abandoned since the day that Benjamin Franklin put on his old coat to sign the treaty of Paris—the coat which he had carefully preserved from the day that Wedderburne had poured upon the colonists some of the vituperation which it was the fashion with the monopolists to vent against the Free-Traders; but the taxation of the mother-country for the pretended benefit of the colonies is a principle still more monstrous, and Sir Robert Peel had better tax his ingenuity to find some more cogent argument in its support than the mere existence of a parliamentary majority.

If it were true that the income-tax were necessary to facilitate the removal of restrictions on our manufacturing industry, then its continuance might be palliated; but this is not the case: it is maintained merely for the purpose of bolstering up those monopolies which impose the worst restrictions on our manufactures by shutting us out from the whole of the markets of the New World:—from those of Brazil to gratify the monopolists of sugar; from those of the United States to gratify the monopolists of food. These monopolies have placed us in chains, and the income-tax is imposed to defray the expense of our gyves and fetters. We are told that there are no petitions against this inquisitorial tax; there have also been none for the repeal of the Corn Laws; but the silence is not contented acquiescence, and this the Premier will some day learn to his cost. The sanctity that has hitherto invested sugar is fast fading away; the deformity of the idol cannot long be concealed; the income-tax is a shrewd schoolmaster; its lessons will reach the most obstinate elector: when monopoly comes to investigate his secrets, inspect his books, scrutinize his accounts, and pry into his affairs, he will have a pretty clear conception of monopoly's results, and candidates will do well to inquire,

"Was ever voter in this humour woo'd?
Was ever voter in this humour won?"

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Sixth Week, ending Saturday, March 15.

There was a very lively and spirited debate on the sugar duties on the night of Friday week. On the question for going into committee of ways and means,

Mr. COBDEN rose, and in a short speech, taking the data of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that we will consume 230,000 tons of colonial and 20,000 of foreign sugar, affirmed that the differential duties would raise the natural price of sugar by ten guineas the ton, and that, therefore, the community would be taxed to the extent of £2,415,000. This surplus would enable the Government to repeal or abate other taxes, as the window-tax, the soap-tax, and so forth. Was his calculation right? and if it were, what were the reasons for granting this sum to the colonial proprietors out of the pockets of the people?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer tried to evade the question, by intimating that the House wished to go into committee. The matter, however, was not allowed to be shelved. Lord Howick, in his prompt and straightforward way, said that Mr. Cobden's question was really of great importance; it was plain and intelligible, and ought to have a direct answer. On this

Sir Robert Peel, in a way that showed he was conscious of trying to escape by a mystification, threw out, as a diversion, the idea of the corn duties. There were 3000 quarters of foreign wheat thrown into the market, last week, which had paid a duty of 20s. Did this raise the price of all grain by that amount? Taking our home produce consumed at nineteen millions of quarters, and that we added a million of foreign, if that million of quarters paid 20s. duty, would it raise the price of the other nineteen millions of quarters by £19,000,000?

Mr. Labouchere pointed out that in the corn trade, under the sliding scale, transactions were frequently occurring, in which not only no profit was expected, but which were carried on in the face of known heavy loss as certain to arise. A trade thus situated could be made no criterion of others. From this point the debate went on for a main portion of the night, the question of Mr. Cobden remaining to the end unanswered.

Ministers have got their sugar-duties resolutions passed, and embodied in the shape of a bill, now passing through the House. As other debates will arise on it, we shall defer further notice till next week.

On Monday night a vigorous effort was made to place the income-tax in its true light, as connected with reduction of indirect taxation. The question was raised by

Mr. CHARLES BULLER, who, in a speech full of wit, pleasantry, and point, criticised the whole measures of the Government.

"There was," he said, "a feeling growing up in favour of direct taxation; but having to raise an annual revenue of £50,000,000, our main reliance must be on indirect taxation. We should keep the property and income tax for extraordinary occasions; as an instrument in reserve with which to convince the nations of our latent power. But, though willing to keep it for a state of war, he admitted that there were other occasions on which it might be imposed. Such an occasion might be found in a great fiscal experiment, where a large surplus enabled a Minister to deal with great articles of taxation. There was the rare fact of a large surplus; and yet the golden opportunity it afforded, Sir Robert Peel had thrown away. British sugar in bond was 34s., which, with the 14s. duty, made 48s.; and Brazilian in bond was only 21s. Our taxes, also, on tea multiplied its value four times; coffee and malt were doubled; all the leading articles of consumption—sugar, tea, coffee, soap, tobacco, spirits—were either limited in demand, or exposed to adulteration and fraud. Yet, while sundry articles of medicine and alum for bread were admitted, the budget was called the poor man's budget! Tobacco and foreign spirits were undoubtedly legitimate sources of taxation; but our absurd system not merely deprived us of income, but converted them into the cause of nearly all the crime which arose out of smuggling and other offences against the revenue. He had looked into the reductions to be effected by the abolition of the cotton duty, and found that the poor man would be benefited in fustian by three half-pence, and the poor woman on calico for her gowns to a similar amount, making the entire benefit to them three-pence annually. Let the poor, therefore, be truly grateful! True, there were other articles in the budget—as furniture woods—the reduction on which would be a compensation for the income-tax, if all England were composed of new married couples, with a thousand a year and upwards. He warned the Free-Trade side of the House that the reductions on glass and other articles amounted to nothing short of abandoning—at least of weakening—their warfare against all protective duties whatever; and ridiculed the idea that the House would be left, three years hence, at 'unfettered liberty' to deal with the income-tax, when the duties on all articles from which a surplus was reasonably to be anticipated were swept away. No preparation was made for the possibility of years of bad harvests and commercial distress. Urging that the property and income tax, in its practical operation, fully justified his allegation that it was inquisitorial and oppressive, he concluded by proposing his amendment, which was to the following effect:—

"That the circumstances under which the renewal of the income-tax is at present proposed are such as to render it exceedingly improbable that Parliament will have the power of dispensing with its continuance at the end of three years; and that it is, therefore, the duty of this House to take care that the tax be imposed in a form in which its operation shall be less unequal and inquisitorial than it now is."

The debate which followed was maintained with great spirit; but we can only advert to the two speeches of Mr. COBDEN and Mr. VILLIERS, as placing the Free-Trade view of the income-tax in the clearest light. First came Mr. COBDEN:—

Mr. COBDEN said that there was a very good reason why there had been no petitions and no public meetings against the income-tax. It was because the income-tax had been mixed up with various commercial projects. (Hear, hear.) There was, for instance, the sugar duty; and up to this time the people did not know what they were doing with the sugar duty. (Hear, hear, hear.) The people, however, would soon find out what was their plan of a sugar duty. They would soon learn that it was as bad and bitter as the income-tax. When the country understood that, their feelings would be very different from what they were at present. They did not understand it now, and they would not understand it this week or the next. At the end of the year the public would be able to calculate what was the cost of their monopoly sugar. (Hear, hear.) He could say that a very great misapprehension existed as to the feeling about the income-tax. There was a very quiet and a very honest indignation as to Schedule D. He was not one who thought that there was generally an evasion of the income-tax. As far as the north of England was concerned, he believed that there was a great deal more paid than ought to be paid. He alluded now to Birmingham, and for the edification of the honourable member for that town he would read an extract of a letter he had received from it. In this letter the writer stated that he knew of four individuals who were made to pay the income-tax who were all industrious and solvent at the time. They went from time to time and endeavoured to get it off. The answer they always got was that it must be paid. The same writer stated that he believed there were thousands who had paid rather than expose their affairs, and that not more than one in five dared stand the test of an examination of his books, for fear of his credit being ruined. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Cobden ventured to say, that if the members of this and the other House had to go through the scrutiny to which traders were exposed, the income-tax would not last a month. (Hear, hear.) At the same time that he said this, he also said that, if they would take a fair tax upon trades and professions to something like a fair proportion, it was not the middle classes who would object to bear their share of taxation; but then they in that House totally deceived themselves if they supposed the sense of the people of this country was with them in their present proposition, or that they would quickly submit to this imposition. (Hear, hear.) Let them go into any house in the City, let a messenger go there with the authority of the right hon. baronet, and call upon any wholesale dealer or banker to submit to scrutiny his last year's balance sheet. Why, the dealer would hardly let his wife know what it was. (Laughter.) He would scarcely let his son know it. Then, if the messenger said to the trader, if he did not submit his books to inspection, he must pay a fine, the trader would reply that he would pay the fine cheerfully. They thus forced the trader to submit to a double penalty. They might depend upon it—and he called upon them to mark his words—that though there was now no great outcry against the income-tax, still they would find at the hustings, that for neither Whig nor Tory would the people submit to the income-tax. (Hear, hear.) But, why did they not now hear an outcry about it? For this very reason, the tax was so obnoxious that it prevented people from consulting respecting it. The tradesman did not like to consult his neighbour about it; he did not like to expose his affairs; but, he could assure the House, they felt the oppression, nevertheless. (Hear.) In London, he believed, there had been very little of surcharges. They had heard what occurred in Birmingham. He knew that in the north of England surcharges were almost invariably the rule. There was there, too, the habit of bullying honest and respectable men. He knew the case of a surgeon who had been surcharged, and, amongst other questions, he was asked how much was his profit on rhubarb? He had also two gigs, for professional purposes, and he was asked if his wife did not sometimes ride in one of the gigs? had he not also a saddle-horse, and did not his wife occasionally use a saddle-horse? (Hear.) Amongst other cases was that of a hair-dresser. (Laughter.) Honourable gentlemen might laugh, but hair-dressers had influence; he could tell them that hair-dressers had votes. (Hear, hear.) The hair-dresser called for an exemption for a room used for the purposes of business. This man was asked how many persons' hair he cut, what he was paid for each; that if it were a shilling he must have ten pence profit from it. He was then asked if the females of his family did not sometimes use it as a sitting-room? These were the questions that were put to persons called upon to pay the income-tax. Then if a man were surcharged, and he was going to appeal, an intimation was sent to him from the commissioners that he should state what was the trade or profession in which he was engaged; where it was carried on; who were his partners; to state the capital which was employed in each concern, with the distinct amount of the burdens to which each was subject; the amount of interest on his banker's account; the profits for the last three years. (Hear, hear.) This was a bludgeon held up in the face of the trader. (Hear, hear.) It was telling him not to come and appeal at all. In this way, men who were in a large business staid away, and did not appeal at all. He knew the case of a gentleman, who was surcharged £5000 profit. He consulted a member of that House, and finding he must bring all his books and papers, his friend advised him to pay the income-tax on the £5000. That, he said, was not an extraordinary case. He really believed that in Lancashire they paid more than what they honestly ought to be called on to return on the income-tax. This was not a matter to make a joke of. It was not for the right honourable gentleman to make a mockery of it, and to say that the people would be so enamoured of it, that they would insist on retaining it. If honourable gentlemen would mix with their constituents, before the elections came on, they would find how strong was the feeling against the income tax. The Free-Traders did not think it necessary for the measures that were proposed; and, as far as the right honourable gentleman's measures went, he utterly repudiated them. (Cheers and laughter.) As a Free-Trader he repudiated them. The Free-Traders did not think the income-tax necessary to carry out the other measures. It might be necessary for the purposes of delusion—for the purposes which honourable gentlemen on opposite had to carry out. The Free-Traders did not want it, though it might do for the work of monopoly. The right honourable gentleman opposite professed to act sometimes on the opinions of Mr. Deacon Hume. The other night the right hon. gentleman had grounded himself on the authority of Mr. Deacon Hume. Now, he was surprised to find his hon. friend (Mr. Hume) so far forget his own committee as to praise the right honourable gentleman's measures. Mr. Deacon Hume laid it down as a rule that the way to serve the country was to abolish restrictions on trade—not restrictions on divi divi, but their restrictions on corn. (Cheers.) He was quoting Mr. Deacon Hume's authority, and it was to be observed that Mr. Deacon Hume did not mention direct taxation; but he said that they ought to remove all those duties that protected monopolies, and then there would be such an increase to their wealth, and such an expansion to their commerce, that the result would be a full and sufficient revenue; but that, if these monopolies remained, then they must look forward to a fall in the revenue. Mr. McGregor said in his evidence, that if they wanted more revenue they could get it from sugar. Since Friday last, he had asked one well acquainted with the subject, how much would be the revenue from sugar, if the duty proposed was put upon all sugars. He was told six millions sterling. He believed that, if they put a duty on foreign and colonial sugar of 23s. per cwt., they would get more than six millions, and the people would have the sugar as cheap as the Government now proposed to give it to them. But indirectly they would by such a plan gain more, in the opening the channels for their trade, the value of which it would be impossible to calculate. As a good deal had been said about the right hon. gentleman's measures having a tendency to Free Trade, he (Mr. Cobden) said of them, that, so far from their opening new markets to this country, they were shutting it out from the two greatest markets—North and South America. The right hon. gentleman had imposed a duty upon the corn of the one, which was equal to a prohibition against it; and as to the other, he shut them out in the most unattractive manner from Brazil. (Hear.) How the Government had done that, hampered as they were with those who sat behind them, and how, at the same time, they set themselves up for having a character as Free-Traders, passed his comprehension. (Cheers.)

Afterwards came Mr. C. Villiers, who said he would shortly state the case which would induce him to give his vote in favour of the motion of his hon. and learned friend the member for Liskeard—that ground being one which had not been much referred to in the course of the present debate—certainly not touched on by the right honourable baronet (Mr. Peel), and not contemplated, he believed, by his noble friend the member for London: viz., that this income-tax was likely to remain and be permanent. He (Mr. C. Villiers) confidently expected that the tax would be permanent, and for that reason, and chiefly for that reason, he thought the House ought to bind themselves, as his honourable friend the member for Liskeard proposed, to see that it should be just and equal in its operation, and at the same time as little odious to the people as possible. He did not object to the tax because it was a direct tax; on the contrary, he thought one of its chief recommendations was, that it was to be imposed for other taxes that were indirect. He preferred direct to indirect taxation; for so far he agreed with his honourable friend the member for Kendal, that direct taxation, by taking the money directly from the pockets of the people, made them more jealous of taxation, while it interfered less with the commerce, industry, and enterprise of the country. He, then, did not object to the income-tax because it was a direct tax, but he agreed with what he believed to be the opinion out of doors. The people of this country were not opposed to the imposition of necessary taxes; they were not averse to bearing their fair share of the national burden, nor were they anxious to risk the national credit; but what they desired to be satisfied of was, that the taxes imposed upon them were necessary and just; and they were disposed to be satisfied with the continuance of the property-tax, because they believed it was a tax imposed as a substitute for others which affected commerce and manufactures, and fettered the industry of the country. The people, however, required to know that the surplus obtained from this tax was properly applied, and that they derived all the advantage from it. That was not, as he thought, now the case. The recent discussion on the sugar duties showed that it was not, and that the people were submitting to an inconvenient and odious tax, while they had to share the advantage with others whom they did not know, and who had no claim to it. If the surplus were properly applied in removing other duties that bore upon commerce and manufactures, there would no longer be any objection to the income-tax. The decline of the revenue during the latter years of the official existence of the late Government was, no doubt, owing to bad harvests and the Corn Laws. That, he believed, was a settled conviction on the public mind; and no greater imposition had ever been attempted than when it was said that the deficiency arose from the policy of the late Ministry, and that the present Government were entitled to the credit of having, by their acts, restored the revenue to a healthy state. This could not too frequently be impressed upon the attention of honourable members opposite—they must be reminded that they were the cause of this additional taxation. The income-tax, it should be remembered, had been imposed, in the first instance, in addition to all others. Those who supported the Corn Laws, as they were responsible for the imposition, so they were responsible for the continuance of this tax. This would be proved in 1848, by which time it was probable we should have a recurrence of bad harvests, and then they would have to answer to the country for continuing this income-tax. His honourable friend (Mr. Cobden) had referred to the evidence of Mr. Deacon Hume, who said that the best way to increase the revenue was to increase the power of consumption. He would trouble the House with a few figures, to show what was really the cause of their difficulties in bad harvests, and of the improvement in the revenue when the people's power of consumption was restored by low prices. The net produce of the customs and excise duties, which formed 75 per cent. of the whole revenue, was, in 1836, £36,392,472; in 1810, it was £35,535,469; being a reduction of more than a million from 1836 to 1810, though the population during that same period had increased from 26,158,524 to 27,599,968, a difference of 1,400,000; and an increase of five per cent. had been imposed on all those duties. Now, what was the difference of the amount paid for food during those several years? Cost of wheat, calculating the consumption at 16 millions of quarters annually, at the average price of each year, was Here was nearly £50,000,000 more paid in the three years of plenty for the chief necessary of life than in the three preceding years, when the harvests were bad and prices were high. Then, had the people not a right to ask what was the reason that they were taxed first on the necessities of life, and then, when the effect of this tax upon the revenue was seen, that they were to be further taxed to make up the deficiency so occasioned? (Hear, hear.) And certainly, after the speech of the right honourable baronet, they would be right in asking what he meant by persevering in those unjust laws? He could understand if the hon. members for Somerset and Dorsetshire were at the head of affairs, looking at their speeches at the Agricultural Protection Society, that they would persevere in the system; but when he heard such a speech as that of the right hon. baronet, almost like Mr. Cobden's own Free-Trade speeches (hear, hear), what excuse the right hon. baronet could have for not dealing with those other more important articles, which in his present scheme he did not touch, he was at a loss to conceive. He could scarcely believe his ears when the right honourable gentleman talked of the effect of the repeal of the wool duty, and he really thought to hear that we might expect the same results from the abolition of the duty on corn. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) The same results would follow from the same course in regard to corn as in regard to wool, though to a much greater extent. Yet when he (Mr. Villiers) brought forward his motion to repeal the corn duties this year, which he should do on the earliest opportunity, he should be met by the right honourable gentleman with the statement that there were special reasons or something or other which would prevent his adopting the same principles in regard to corn which he had so extolled in reference to wool. (Hear.) He hoped the people would read the speech of the right hon. baronet, which was as good an argument in favour of Free Trade as he had ever heard. Seeing no possibility of getting rid of the Corn Laws at present, and being quite aware that the income-tax must be perpetual as long as those laws existed, he thought it was their duty to make it as little odious and as just as possible in its application, therefore he should vote for the amendment.

The income-tax, without modification, was affirmed by 240 to 112; and the bill, which was read a third time, and passed, on Wednesday, is now in the House of Lords.

On Thursday night Mr. Cobden brought on his motion for an inquiry into the causes of AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS, and the effects of Legislative Protection on the interests of the agricultural tenantry. The speech with which the debate was opened was worthy of the importance of the cause; the manner of the speaker was as telling and as effective as ever; his points as poignant and as novel as if the subject were entirely fresh, and brought under consideration for the first time; and the undivided attention of a full House manifested the homage which is ever paid to intellectual vigour, tact, and perspicacity. It is true that there was not the same intensity of interest as was excited last year when a similar motion was brought forward. At that time the mere novelty of the discussion was in itself a powerfully impelling cause of anxious curiosity. It was felt to be at once a bold and a happy thought to transfer the operations of the war to the homestead of the agricultural interest; and under the conviction that such a motion would go far to dispel for ever the delusion which would keep up a distinction between "farmers' enemies" and "farmers' friends," the county members were painfully in earnest to learn the course which Mr. Cobden would pursue. This year the uncertainty did not exist, because the general outline of the subject had been sketched by Mr. Cobden himself, when he warned the agricultural members that if they did not move for an inquiry into the causes of agricultural distress, he would. Nevertheless, the existence of that distress, as proclaimed and lamented over by the "farmers' friends," gave to the discussion of Thursday night a far deeper interest than any that could result from mere curiosity, or even anxiety. The attendance of the agricultural members, who came to listen as well as to vote, testified to the reality of the business in hand; and there were various circumstances elicited during the discussion which manifested the moral and mental progress of the question, not alone out of doors, but in that which was described as the agricultural mind, and on which Mr. Villiers remarked, with much good-humoured and happy pleasantry.

The speech of Mr. Cobden, which we give entire, will amply repay the most attentive and deliberate perusal. Every body who listened to it felt at once its ability and its importance; and occasional involuntary exclamations broke out from both friends and opponents—"This is really an admirable speech!" The agricultural members exhibited unequivocal symptoms of appreciation; and it is one of the most cheering signals of progress to see the question no longer treated as one for the exhibition of virulent personalities, but on which the House of Commons may be enlightened, and the county members instructed. In truth, the attention paid to Mr. Cobden was not only flattering to himself, but creditable to the Legislature. "Here is a man," combined members seemed to say, "who, whatever may be the character of his opinions, has mastered our question, and is capable of teaching us." And as attentive pupils in a lecture-room did the county members listen, while Mr. Cobden expounded the effects of protection on prices and improvement; the paucity of capital in a pursuit which ought to be one of the most attractive for investment; the want of leases, and the want of intelligence and common sense in such leases as were granted; the ruinous effects of protective duties on the interests of farmers, by disabling them from profitably rearing stock; and the miserable state of the agricultural population. "Give me," he exclaimed, and agricultural members winced at the demand, "give me this committee; place on it a majority of members in the interest of protection; it is a committee to inquire into that distress of which you complain, and the sufferings of that labouring population over which you lament—give me this committee of inquiry, and I will undertake to—EXPLODE THE WHOLE DELUSION OF AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION!" There was a mainly resonance in this demand which caused the idea it contained to ring through the House, and tingle in the ears of the "agricultural interest."

Mr. Cobden's motion was in this shape:—

"Mr. Cobden.—Select committee, to inquire into the causes and extent of the alleged existing agricultural distress, and into the effects of legislative protection upon the interests of landowners, tenant-farmers, and farm-labourers."

On this, as it stood on the notice paper, there appeared two amendments: one by Mr. Wodehouse, the member for East Norfolk, which was somewhat lengthy, and not very intelligible; the other by Mr. Stafford O'Brien, one of the members for Northamptonshire, which had the merit of shortness and explicitness. The amendment of Mr. Wodehouse was to the following effect:—

"Mr. Wodehouse.—To move, as an amendment on Mr. Cobden's motion, that the proposed inquiry, through the medium of a select committee, respecting the operation of protective duties on imports, as regards the several classes of the landed interest, will prove illusory, as far as that particular interest is concerned; and that no inquiry respecting the general effects of taxation ought at any time to be entered upon, unless it be distinctly laid down as a principle that it was intended to comprehend the interests of all the other classes of society under the influence of the various circumstances in which the country may be hereafter placed."

Mr. Stafford O'Brien stood thus:—

"Mr. Stafford O'Brien.—To move, as an amendment

from year to year. You know that it is impossible to farm your estates properly unless a tenant has an investment for more than one year. A man ought to be able to begin a farm with at least eight years before him, before he expects to see a return for the outlay of his money. You are therefore keeping your tenants at will at a yearly kind of cultivation, and you are preventing them carrying on their cultivation in a proper way. Not only do you prevent the laying out of capital upon your land, and disable the farmers from cultivating it, but your policy tends to make them servile and dependent, so that they are actually disinclined to improvement, afraid to let you see that they can improve, because they are apprehensive that you will pounce upon them for an increase of rent. (Hear.) I see the honourable member for Lincolnshire opposite, and he rather smiled at the expression when I said that the state of dependence of the farmers was such that they were actually afraid to appear to be improving their land. (Hear, hear.) Now, that honourable gentleman the member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Christopher), upon my honourable friend's (the member for Manchester, Mr. Milner Gibson) motion upon agricultural statistics last year, made the following statement:—

"It was most desirable for the farmer to know the actual quantity of corn grown in this country, as such knowledge would ensure steadiness of prices, which was infinitely more valuable to the agriculturist than fluctuating prices. But to ascertain this there was extreme difficulty. They could not leave it to the farmer to make a return of the quantity which he produced, for it was not for his interest to do so. If in any one or two years he produced four quarters per acre on land which had previously grown but three, he might fear lest his landlord would say, 'Your land is more productive than I imagined, and I must therefore raise your rent.' The interest of the farmers, therefore, would be to understate, and to furnish low returns."

Now, here is a little evidence of the same kind, which I find at a meeting of the South Devonshire Agricultural Association. The Rev. C. Johnson said:—

"He knew it had been thought that landlords were ready to avail themselves of such associations, on account of the opportunity it afforded them for diving into their tenants' affairs, and opening their eyes. (Hear.) An instance of this occurred to him at a recent ploughing-match, where he met a respectable agriculturist whom he well knew, and asked him if he was going to it. He said, 'No.' 'Why?' Because he did not approve of such things. This why produced another why, and the man gave a reason why. Suppose he sent a plough and man, with two superior horses, the landlord at once would say, 'This man is doing too well on my estate, and increase the rent.'"

Now, I ask honourable gentlemen here—the landed gentry of England—what a state of things is that when, upon their own testimony respecting the farming capitalists in this country, the farmers dare not appear to have a good horse—they dare not appear to be growing more than four quarters instead of three? ("Hear, hear," and cheers from Mr. Christopher.) The honourable member cheers, but I am quoting from his own authority. I say, this condition of things, indicated by those two quotations, brings the tenant-farmers—if they are such as these gentlemen describe them to be—it brings them down to a very low point of servility. In Egypt the landlords take the utmost gain of their tenants, who bury it beneath their hearths of stone in their cottages, and will suffer the bastinado rather than they will tell how much corn they grow. Our tenants are not afraid of the bastinado, but they are terrified at a rise of rent. (Cheers.) This is the state of things amongst the tenant-farmers farming without leases. That I take to be the condition of a great portion of the tenant-farmers in this country. In England leases are the exception, and not the rule. (Hear, hear.) But even when you have leases in England—where you have leases or agreements—I doubt whether they are not in many cases worse tenures than where there is no lease at all; the clauses being of such an obsolete and preposterous character as to defy any man to carry on the business of farming under them profitably. I do not know whether the hon. member for Cheshire is here, but if so I will read him a passage from an actual Cheshire lease, showing what kind of covenants farmers are called on to perform:—

"To pay the landlord £20 for every statute acre of ground, and so in proportion for a less quantity, that shall be converted into tillage, or used contrary to the appointment before made; and £5 for every owt. of hay, thrave of straw, load of potatoes, or cartload of manure, that shall be sold or taken from the premises during the term; and £10 for every tree felled, cut down, or destroyed, cropped, lopped, or topped, or willingly suffered so to be; and £20 for any servant or other person so hired or admitted as to gain a settlement in the township; and £10 per statute acre, and so in proportion for a less quantity, of the said land, which the tenant shall let off or underlet. ('Hear, hear,' from the Ministerial side.) Such sums to be paid on demand after every breach, and in default of payment to be considered as reserved rent, and levied by distress and sale as rent in arrear may be levied and raised. And to do six days' boon team work whenever called upon; and to keep for the landlord one dog, and one cock or hen; and to make no malapropos which the landlord's consent first obtained in writing, under which the same is to be properly filled in; nor to allow any inmate to remain on the premises after six days' notice; nor to keep or feed any sheep except such as are used for the consumption of the family."

Now, what is such an instrument as that? I will tell you. It is a trap for the unwary man, it is a barrier against men of intelligence and capital, and it is a fetter to the mind of any free man. No man could farm under such a lease as that, or under any other lease as it contains. (Hear, hear.) I perceive that the hon. member for the rape of Bramber (Shoreham) is here. I will by-and-by allude to one of the hon. member's own leases. (Hear, hear.) You will find in your lease and lease and dogs, and probably team work, and agreement you have. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) What are those leases? Why, they are generally some old antediluvian dusty remains, which some lawyer's clerk takes out of a pigeon-hole, and merely reads out for every fresh incoming tenant:—a thing which seems to have been in existence for a hundred years. You tie them down by the most absurd restrictions: you do not give men credit for being able to discover any improvement next year and the year after, but you go upon the assumption that men are not able to improve, and you do your best to prevent them doing so. (Hear.) Now, I do not know why we should not in this country have leases for land upon similar terms to the leases of manufactories, or any "plant" or premises. I do not think that farming will ever be carried on as it ought to be until you have leases drawn in the same way as a man takes a manufactory, and pays perhaps £1000 a year for it. I know people who pay £4000 a year for manufactory to carry on their business, and at fair rents. There is an hon. gentleman near me who pays more than £4000 a year for the rent of his manufactory. What covenants do you think he has in his lease? What would he think if it stated how many revolutions there should be in a minute of the spindles, or if they prescribed the construction of the straps or the gearing of his machinery. Why, he takes his manufactory with a schedule of its present state—bricks, mortar, and machinery—and when the lease is over, he must leave it in the same state, or else pay a compensation for the dilapidation. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer cheers that statement. I want to ask his opinion respecting a similar lease for a farm. I am rather disposed to think that the Anti-Corn-Law Leaguers will very likely form a joint-stock association, and have none but Free-Traders in the body, that we may purchase a joint-stock estate, and have a model farm ("hear, hear," and laughter); taking care that it shall be in one of the rural counties, one of the most purely agricultural parts of the country, where we think there is the greatest need of improvement,—perhaps in Buckinghamshire (laughter); and there shall be a model farm, homestead, and cottages; and I may tell the noble lord the member for Newark, that we shall have a model garden, and we will not make any boast or outcry about it. But the great object will be to have a model lease. (Cheers and laughter.) We will have as the farmer a man of intelligence and capital. I am not so unreasonable as to tell you that you ought to let your land to men who have not a competent capital, or are not sufficiently intelligent; but I say, select such a man as that; let him know his business and have sufficient capital, and you cannot give him too wide a scope. We will find such a man and will let him our farm; there shall be a lease precisely such as that upon which my hon. friend takes his factory. There shall be no single clause inserted in it to dictate to him how he shall cultivate his farm; he shall do what he likes with the old pasture. If he can make more by ploughing it up he shall do so; if he can grow white crops every year—which I know there are people doing at this moment in more places than one in this country (hear, hear)—or if he can make any other improvement or discovery, he shall be free to do so. We will let him the land, with a schedule of the state of tillage and the condition of the homestead, and all we will bind him to will be this, "You shall leave the land as good as when you entered upon it. ('Hear, hear,' from both sides of the House.) If it is in an inferior state it shall be valued again, and you shall compensate us; but if it is in an improved state it shall be valued, and we, the landlords, shall compensate you." (Hear, hear.) You think there must be something very difficult about this, and that it will be impossible to be done; but it is not. We will give possession of everything upon the land, whether it be wild or tame animals; he shall have the absolute control. There shall be no game, and no one to sport over his property. Take as stringent precautions as you please to compel the punctual payment of the rent; take the right of re-entry as summarily as you please if the rent is not duly paid; but let the payment of rent duly be the sole test as to the well-doing of the tenant; and so long as he can pay the rent, and do it promptly, that is the only test you need have that the farmer is doing well; and if he is a man of capital, you have the strongest possible security that he will not waste your property while he has possession of it. (Hear.) I have sometimes heard hon. gentlemen opposite say, "It is all very well for you to preach up leases, but there are many farmers who do not want them. We have asked them, and they will not take them." ("Hear, hear," from an hon. member.) The hon. gentleman cheers that remark; but what does it argue? That by that process which my hon. friend the member for Lincolnshire has described—that degrading process by which you have rendered those tenants servile, hopeless, and dejected, so that they have not the spirit of men when they are carrying on their business. Now, hear what Professor Low states, he being, as you are aware, a professor of agriculture. He says:—

"The argument has again and again been used against an extension of leases, that the tenants themselves set no value upon them; but to how different a conclusion ought the existence of such a feeling amongst the tenantry of a country to conduct us! The fact itself shows that the absence of leases may render a tenantry ignorant of the means of employing their own capital with advantage, indisposed to the exertions which improvements demand; and better contented with an easy rent and dependent condition, than with the prospect of an independence to be earned by increased exertion."

Whilst you have a tenantry in the state described or pictured by the hon. member for Lincolnshire, what must be the state of the population? Your labourers can never be prosperous when the tenants are depressed. Go through the length and breadth of the land, and you will find that where capital is in the greatest abundance, and capitalists are most intelligent, there you will invariably find the working classes most prosperous and happy; and on the other hand, show me an impoverished and enfeebled tenantry,—go to the north of Devonshire, for instance, and show me a tenantry like that,—and there you will find a peasantry sunk into the most hopeless and degraded condition. (Hear.) Now, Sir, I have mentioned a deficiency of capital as being the primary want amongst farmers. I have stated the want of security in leases as the cause of the want of capital; but you may still say, "You have not connected this with the Corn Laws and the protective system." I will, therefore, read the opinion of an hon. gentleman who sits, I believe, upon this side of the House, and I wish he may give us an opinion upon the subject in this debate; it is in a published letter of Mr. Hayter, who, I know, is himself an ardent supporter of agriculture. He says:—

"The more I see of and practice agriculture, the more firmly am I convinced that the whole unemployed labour of the country could, under a better system of husbandry, be advantageously put into operation; and moreover, that the Corn Laws have been one of the principal causes of the present system of bad farming, and consequent pauperism. Nothing short of their entire removal will ever induce the average farmer to rely upon any thing else than the Legislature for the payment of his rent: his belief being that all rent is paid by corn, and nothing else than corn; and that the Legislature can, by enacting Corn Laws, create a price which will make his rent easy. The day of their (the Corn Laws) entire abolition ought to be a day of jubilee and rejoicing to every man interested in land."

Now, Sir, I do not stop to connect the cause and effect in this matter, and inquire whether your Corn Laws or your protective system have caused the want of leases and capital. I do not stop to make good my proof, and for this reason, that you have adopted a system of legislation in this House by which you profess to make the farming trade prosperous. I show you, after 30 years' trial, what is the condition of the agriculturists; I prove to you what is the state of farmers and also of the labourers, and you will not contest any one of those propositions. I say it is enough, having had 30 years' trial of your specific, for me to ask you to go into committee to see if something better cannot be devised. (Cheers.) I am going to contend, independent of protection and Corn Law, that free trade in corn would be more advantageous to farmers—and with them I include labourers—than restriction; to oblige the hon. member for Norfolk, I will take with them also the landlords; and I contend that free trade in corn and grain of every kind would be more beneficial to them than to any other class of the community. I should have contended the same before the passing of the late tariff; but now I am prepared to do so with tenfold more force. (Hear.) What has the right hon. baronet done? He has passed a law to admit fat cattle at a nominal duty. Some foreign fat cattle were selling in Smithfield the other day at about £15 or £16 per head, paying only about seven and a half per cent. duty; but he has not admitted the raw material out of which these fat cattle are made. Mr. Huskisson did not act in this manner when he commenced his plan of Free Trade. (Hear.) He began by admitting the raw material before he permitted the manufactured article; but in your case you have commenced at precisely the opposite end, and have allowed free trade in cattle instead of that upon which they are fattened. I say, give free trade in that grain which goes to make the cattle. (Hear.) I contend, that by this protective system the farmers throughout the country are more injured than any other class in the community. I would take, for instance, the article of seeds, beginning with clover-seed. The hon. member for North Northamptonshire put a question the other night to the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government. He looked so exceedingly alarmed, that I wondered what the subject was which created the apprehension. He asked the right hon. baronet whether he was going to admit clover-seed into this country? I believe clover-seed is to be excluded from the schedule of free importation. Now, I ask for whose benefit is this exception made? I ask the hon. gentleman the member for North Northamptonshire, whether those whom he represents, the farmers of that district of the county, are, in the large majority of instances, the great sellers of clover-seed? (Hear, hear.) I will undertake to say they are not. How many counties in England are there which are benefited by the protection of clover-seed? (Hear.) I will take the whole of Scotland. If there be any Scotch members present, I ask them whether they do not in their country import the clover-seed from England? They do not grow it. I undertake to say that there are not ten counties in the United Kingdom which are interested in the exportation of clover-seed out of their own borders. (Hear.) Neither have they any of this article in Ireland. But yet we have clover-seed excluded from the farmers, although they are not interested as a body in its protection at all. Again, take the article of beans. There are lands in Essex where they can grow them alternately. I find that beans come from that district to Mark-lane, and I believe also that in some parts of Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire they do the same; but how is it with the poor lands of Surrey or the poor down land of Wiltshire? Take the whole of the counties. How many of them are there which are exporters of beans, or send them to market? You are taxing the whole of the farmers who do not sell their beans for the pretended benefit of a few counties or districts of counties where they do. (Hear.) Mark you, where they can grow beans on the stronger and better soils, it is not in one case out of ten that they grow them for the market. They may grow them for their own use; but where they do not cultivate beans, send them to market, and turn them into money, those farmers can have no interest whatever in keeping up the money price of that which they never sell. (Hear.) Take the article of oats. How many farmers are there who ever have oats down on the credit side of their books as an item upon which they rely for the payment of their rents? (Hear.) The farmers may, and do generally, grow oats for feeding their own horses; but it is an exception to the rule—and a rare exception too—where the farmer depends upon the sale of his oats to meet his expenses. (Hear.) Take the article of hops. You have a protection upon them for the benefit of the growers in Kent, Sussex, and Surrey; but yet the cultivators of hops have no protection in articles which they do not themselves produce. (Hear.) Take the article of cheese. Not one farmer in ten in the country makes his own cheese, and yet they and their servants are large consumers of it. But what are the counties which have the protection in this article? Cheshire, Gloucestershire, Wiltshire, part of Derbyshire, and Leicestershire. Here are some four or five dairy counties having an interest in the protection of cheese; but recollect that those counties are peculiarly hardly taxed in beans and oats, because in those counties where they are chiefly dairy farms—where they are most in want of artificial food for their cattle—there are the whole of the hilly districts; and I hope my honourable friend the member for Nottingham is here, because he has a special grievance in this matter: he lives in Derbyshire, and very commendably employs himself in rearing good cattle upon the hills; but he is taxed for your protection for his oats, Indian corn, and any thing which he wants for feeding them. (Hear.) He told me only the other day that he should like nothing better than to give up the protection on cattle, if they would only let him buy a thousand quarters of black oats for the consumption of his stock. (Hear, hear.) Take the whole of the hilly districts, and the down county of Wiltshire; the whole of that expanse of downs in the south of England; take the Cheviots, where the flock-masters reside, or the Grampians in Scotland; and take the whole of Wales without exception,—they are not benefited in the slightest degree by the protection on these articles; but, on the contrary, you are taxing the very things they want. They require provender as abundantly and cheaply as they can get it. (Hear.) Allowing a free importation of food for cattle is the only way in which those counties can improve the breed of thin stocks, and the only manner in which they can ever bring their land up to anything like a decent state of fertility. I will go farther and say, that farms with thin soil,—I mean the stock farmers, which you will find in Hertfordshire and Surrey, farmers with large capitals, arable farmers,—I say, those men are deeply interested in having a free importation of food for their cattle, because they have thin poor land. The land of its own self does not contain the means of its over-increased fertility; and the only way is the bringing in an additional quantity of food from elsewhere, that they can bring up their farms to a proper state of cultivation. I have been favoured with an estimate made by a very experienced clever farmer in Wiltshire—probably honourable gentlemen will bear me out, when I say a man of great intelligence and skill, and entitled to every consideration in this House. I refer to Mr. Nathaniel Atherton, Kingston, Wilts. That gentleman estimates that upon 400 acres of land he could increase his profits to the amount of £280, paying the same rent as at present, provided there was a free importation of foreign grain of all kinds. He would buy 500 quarters of oats at 15s., or the same amount in beans or peas at 11s. or 15s. a sack, to be fed on the land or in the yard; by which he would grow additional 160 quarters of wheat, and 230 quarters barley, and gain an increased profit of £300 upon his sheep and cattle. His plan embraces the employment of an additional capital of £1000; and he would pay £150 a year more for labour. I had an opportunity, the other day, of speaking to a very intelligent farmer in Hertfordshire—Mr. Lattimore, of Wheathampstead. (Hear.) Very likely there are hon. gentlemen here to whom he is known. I do not know whether the noble lord the member for Hertford is present, because if so he will, no doubt, know that Mr. Lattimore stands as high in Hertford market as a skilful farmer and a man of abundant capital as any man in the county. (Hear.) He is a gentleman of most unquestionable intelligence; and what does he say? He told me that last year he paid £230 enhanced price on his beans and other provender which he bought for his cattle;—£230 of enhanced price in consequence of that restriction upon the trade in foreign grain, amounting to 14s. a quarter on all the wheat he sold upon his farm. Now, I undertake to say, in the names of Mr. Atherton, of Wiltshire, and Mr. Lattimore, of Hertfordshire, that they are as decided advocates for free trade in grain of every kind as I am. (Hear.) I am not now quoting merely solitary cases. I told hon. gentlemen once before that I have probably as large an acquaintance among farmers as any one in the House. I think I could give you from every county the names of some of the first-rate farmers who are ardent Free-Traders as I am. (Hear.) I requested the secretary of this much-dreaded Anti Corn-Law League to make me out a list of the farmers who are subscribers to that association, and I find there are upwards of 100 in England and Scotland who subscribe to the League Fund, comprising, I hesitate not to say, the most intelligent men to be found in this kingdom. (Cheers.) I, myself, went into the Lothians, at the invitation of 22 farmers there, several of whom were paying upwards of £1000 a year rent. I spent two or three days among them, and I never found a body of more intelligent, liberal-minded men in my life. Those are men who do not want restrictions upon the importation of corn. (Hear.) They desire nothing but fair play. They say, "Let us have our Indian corn, Egyptian beans, and Polish oats as freely as we have our linseed cake, and we can bear competition with any corn-growers in the world." (Hear.) But by excluding the provender for cattle, and at the same time admitting the cattle almost duty free, I think you are giving an example of one of the greatest absurdities and perversions of nature and common sense which ever was seen. We have heard of great absurdities in legislation in commercial matters of late. We know that there has been such a case as sending coffee from Cuba to the Cape of Good Hope in order to bring it back to England under the law; but I venture to say, that in less than ten years from this time people will look back with more amazement in their minds at the fact that, while you are sending ships to Ichaboe to bring back the guano, you are passing a law to exclude Indian corn, beans, oats, peas, and everything else that gives nourishment to your cattle, which would give you a thousand times more production than all the guano of Ichaboe. (Loud cheers.) Upon the last occasion when I spoke upon this subject, I was answered by the right hon. gentlemen the President of the Board of Trade. He talked about throwing poor lands out of cultivation, and converting arable lands into pasture. I hope that we men of the Anti Corn-Law League may not be reproached again with seeking to cause any such disasters. My belief is—and the conviction is founded upon a most extensive inquiry among the most intelligent farmers, without stint of trouble and pains—that the course you are pursuing tends every hour to throw land out of cultivation, and make poor lands unproductive. (Hear.) Do not let us be told again that we desire to draw the labourers from the land in order that we may reduce the wages of the workpeople employed in factories. I tell you that, if you bestow capital on the soil, and cultivate it with the same skill as manufacturers bestow upon their business, you have not population enough in the rural districts for the purpose. (Hear.) I yesterday received a letter from Lord Dufferin, in which he gives precisely the same opinion. He says, if we had the land properly cultivated there are not sufficient labourers to till it. What is the fact? You are chasing your labourers from village to village, passing laws to compel people to support paupers, devising every means to smuggle them abroad to the antipodes; if you can get them there, why, you would have to chase after them, and bring them back again, if you had your land properly cultivated. I tell you honestly my conviction, that it is by these means and these only that you can avert very great and serious troubles and disasters in your agricultural districts. Sir, I remember, on the last occasion when this subject was discussed, there was a great deal said about disturbing an interest. It was said that this inquiry would not be gone into because we were disturbing and unsettling a great interest. I have no desire to undervalue the agricultural interest. I have heard it said that they are the greatest consumers of manufactured goods in this country; that they are such large consumers of our goods that we had better look after the home trade and not think of destroying it. But what sort of consumers of manufactures think you the labourers can be with the wages they are now getting in agricultural districts? Understand me: I am arguing for a principle that I solemnly believe would raise the wages of the labourers in the agricultural districts. I believe you would have no men starving upon 7s. a week if you had abundant capital and competent skill employed upon the soil; but I ask what is this consumption of manufactured goods that we have heard so much about? I have taken some pains, and made large inquiries as to the amount laid out in the average of cases by agricultural labourers and their families for clothing; I probably may startle you by telling you that we have exported in one year more goods of our manufactures to Brazil than have been consumed in a similar period by the whole of your agricultural peasantry and their families. You have 960,000 agricultural labourers in England and Wales, according to the last census: I undertake to say they do not expend on an average 30s. a year on their families, supposing every one of them to be in employ. I say manufactured goods, excluding shoes. I assert that the whole of the agricultural peasantry and their families in England and Wales do not spend a million and a half per annum for manufactured goods, in clothing and bedding. And, with regard to your exciseable and duty-paying articles, what can the poor wretch lay out upon them, who out of 8s. or 9s. a week has a wife and family to support? (Hear.) I undertake to prove to your satisfaction,—and you may do it yourselves if you will but dare to look the figures in the face (loud cheers),—I will undertake to prove to you that they do not pay upon an average each family 15s. per annum, that the whole of their contributions to the revenue do not amount to £700,000. Now, is not this a mighty interest to be disturbed? I would keep that interest as justly as though it were one of the most important; but I say, when you have by your present system brought down your agricultural peasantry to that state, have you anything to offer for bettering their condition, or at all events to justify resisting an inquiry? (Hear.) On the last occasion when I addressed this House I recollect stating some facts to show that you had no reasonable ground to fear foreign competition; those facts I do not intend to reiterate, because they have never been contradicted. (Hear, hear.) But there are still attempts made to frighten people by telling them, "If you open the ports to foreign corn you will have corn let in here for nothing." One of the favourite fallacies which is now put forth is this: "Look at the price of corn in England, and see what it is abroad: you have prices low here, and yet you have corn coming in from abroad. Now, if you had not 20s. duty to pay, what a quantity of corn you would have brought in, and how low the price would be!" This statement arises from a fallacy—I hope not dishonestly put forth in not understanding the difference between the real and the nominal price of corn. The price of corn at Dantzic now is nominal; the price of corn when it is coming in regularly is a regular price—that is the real price. Now, go back to 1838: in January of that year the price of wheat at Dantzic was nominal; there was no demand for England; there were no purchasers except for speculation, with the chance, probably, of having to throw the wheat into the sea; but in the months of July and August, when apprehensions arose of a failure of our harvest, then the price of corn in Dantzic rose instantly, sympathizing with the markets in England; and at the end of the year, in December, the price of wheat at Dantzic had doubled the amount at which it had been in January; and during the three following years, when you had a regular importation of corn from Dantzic, during all that time, by the averages laid upon the table of this House, wheat at Dantzic averaged 40s. Wheat at Dantzic was at that price during the three years 1839, 1840, and 1841. (Hear.) Now, I mention this just to show the fact to honourable gentlemen, and to entreat them that they will not go and alarm their tenantry by this outcry of the danger of foreign competition. You ought to be pursuing a directly opposite course—you ought to be trying to stimulate them in every possible way—by showing that they can compete with foreigners, that what others can do in Poland they can do in England. I have an illustration of the fact with reference to a society of which the hon. member for Suffolk was chairman. We have lately seen a new light spreading amongst agricultural gentlemen. We are told the salvation of this country is to arise from the cultivation of flax. There is a National Flax Society, of which Lord Rendlesham is the president. This flax society state in their prospectus,—a copy of which I have here, purporting to be the first annual report of the National Flax Agricultural Improvement Association,—after talking of the Ministers holding out no hope from legislation, they avow their inability to meet the difficulty; and then the report goes on to state that upon these grounds the National Flax Society call upon the nation for its support, on the ground that they are going to remedy the distresses of the country. Now, I observe that Mr. Warner was paying a visit in Sussex. I take a lively interest in what is going on in that county. I observe Mr. Warner paid a visit to Sussex, and he attended an agricultural meeting at which the honourable baronet the member for Shoreham presided. After the usual loyal toasts, the honourable baronet proposed the toast of the evening, "Mr. Warner and the cultivation of flax." (Laughter.) The right hon. baronet was not aware, I dare say, that he was then furnishing a most deadly weapon to the lecturers of the Anti Corn-Law League. We are told you cannot compete with foreigners unless you have a high protective duty. You have a high protective duty on wheat, amounting at this moment to 20s. a quarter. A quarter of wheat at the present time is just worth the same as one cwt. of flax. On a quarter of wheat you have a protective duty against the Pole and Russian of 20s.; upon the one cwt. of flax you have a protective duty of 1d. (loud cheers); and yet I did not hear a murmur from hon. gentlemen opposite when the right hon. baronet proposed to take off that protective duty of 1d. totally and immediately. (Hear, and laughter.) But we are told that English agriculturists cannot compete with foreigners, and especially with that serf labour that is to be found somewhere up the Baltic. Well, but flax comes from the Baltic, and there is no protective duty. (Renewed cheers.) We are told that you may admit some other things. Hon. gentlemen say we have no objection to raw materials where there is no labour connected with them; but we cannot contend against foreigners in wheat, because there is such an amount of labour in it. Why, there is twice as much labour in flax as there is in wheat (cheers); and yet the right hon. baronet favours the growth of flax in order to restore the country, which is sinking into this abject and hopeless state for want of agricultural protection. (Renewed cheers.) The right hon. baronet will forgive me—I am sure he will, he looks as if he would (laughter)—if I allude a little to the subject of leases. The hon. gentleman on that occasion, I believe, complained that it was a great pity that farmers did not grow more flax, and I saw it in a Brighton paper a week afterwards. I do not know whether it was true or not, that the right hon. baronet's leases to his own tenants forbade them to grow that article. (Cheers and laughter.) Now, it is quite as possible that the right hon. baronet does not exactly know what covenants or clauses there are in his leases. (Hear.) But I know that it is a very common case to preclude the growth of flax; and it just shows the kind of management by which the landed proprietors have carried on their affairs, that actually, I believe, the original source of the error that flax was very pernicious to the ground was derived from Virgil; I believe there is a passage in "Virgil" to that effect. From that classic authority, no doubt, some learned lawyer put this clause into the lease, and there it has remained ever since. (Laughter.) Now, I have alluded to the condition of the labourers at the present time; but I am bound to say, that while the farmers at the present moment are in a worse condition than they have been for the last ten years, I believe the agricultural labourers have passed over the winter with less suffering and distress, although it has been a five months' winter, and a severer one, too, than they endured in the previous year. ("Hear, hear," from the Ministerial benches.) I am glad to find that corroborated by hon. gentlemen opposite, because it bears out, in a remarkable degree, the opinion that we who are in connexion with the Free-Trade question entertain. We maintain that a low price of food is beneficial to the labouring classes. We assert, and we can prove it, at least in the manufacturing districts, that whenever provisions are dear wages are low, and whenever food is cheap wages invariably rise. We have had a strike in almost every business in Lancashire since the price of wheat has been down to something like 50s.; and I am glad to be corroborated when I state that the agricultural labourers have been in a better condition during the last winter than they were in the previous one. But does not that show that, even in your case, though your labourers have in a general way only just as much as will find them a subsistence, they are benefited by a great abundance of the first necessaries of life? Although their wages may rise and fall with the price of food,—although they may go up with the advance in the price of corn and fall when it is lowered,—still, I maintain that it does not rise in the same proportion as the price of food rises, nor fall to the extent to which food falls. Therefore, in all cases the agricultural labourers are in a better state when food is low than when it is high. (Hear, hear.) Now, I am bound to say that, whatever may be the condition of the agricultural labourer, I hold that the farmer is not responsible for that condition while he is placed in the situation in which he now is by the present system. I have seen during the last autumn and winter a great many exhortations made to the farmers, that they should employ more labourers. I think that is very unfair towards the farmer; I believe he is the man who is suffering most; he stands between you and your impoverished, suffering peasantry; and it is rather too bad to point to the farmer as the man who should relieve them. (Cheers.) I have an extract from Lord Hardwick's address to the labourers of Haddenham. He says,

"Conciliate your employers, and, if they do not perform their duty to you and themselves, address yourselves to the landlords; and I assure you that you will find us ready to urge our own tenants to the proper cultivation of their farms, and consequently to the just employment of the labourer."

Now, I hold that this duty begins nearer home, and that the landed proprietors are the parties who are responsible if the labourers have not employment. (Hear.) You have absolute power; there is no doubt about that. You can, if you please, legislate for your labourers or yourselves. Whatever you may have done besides, your legislation has been adverse to the labourer, and you have no right to call upon the farmers to remedy the evil which you have caused. (Cheers.) I have a very curious proof with regard to what is done for the agricultural labourers by the landlords, which I will read to you. It is a labourer's certificate, seen at Stowupland, in Suffolk, in July, 1841, which was placed upon the mantel-piece of a peasant's cottage there:—

"West Suffolk Agricultural Association, established 1833, for the advancement of agriculture and the encouragement of industry and skill, and good conduct among labourers and servants in husbandry. President: The Duke of Grafton, Lord Lieutenant of the county. This is to certify that a prize of £2 was awarded to William Burch, aged 82, labourer, of the parish of Stowupland, in West Suffolk, September 25, 1840, for having brought up nine children without relief, except when their mother was very dear; and for having worked on the same farm twenty-eight years."

(Signed) "Rt. RUSHBROOK, Chairman."

(Cheers and laughter.) Now, I need not press that point. It is admitted by the hon. gentlemen opposite—and I am glad it is so—that after a very severe winter, in the last of great distress among farmers, when there have been a great many able-bodied men wanting employment, and there have been fewer in the streets and workhouses than there had been in the previous year. But the condition of the agricultural labourer is a bad case at the very best. (Hear.) You can look before you, and you have to foresee the means of giving employment to those men. I need not tell you that the late census shows that you cannot employ your own increasing population in the agricultural districts. But you say the farmers should employ them. How can they give employment to them? Will not this evil—if evil you call it—press on you more and more every year? What can you do to remedy the mischief? I only appear here now because you have proposed nothing. We all know your system of allotments, and we are all aware of its failure. What other remedy have

(Cheers.) What do you propose to do now? That is the question. Nothing has been brought forward this year, which I have heard, having for its object to benefit the great mass of the English population; nothing I have heard suggested which has at all tended to alleviate their condition. You admit that the farmer's capital is sinking from under him, and that he is in a worse state than ever. Have you distinctly provided some plan to give confidence to the farmer, to cause an influx of capital to be expended upon his land, and so bring increased employment to the labourer? How is this to be met? I cannot believe that you are going to make this a political game. You must set up some specific object to benefit the agricultural interest. It is well said, that the last election was an agricultural triumph. There are 200 county members sitting behind the Prime Minister, who prove that it was so. What, then, is your plan for this distressing state of things? That is what I want to ask you. Do not, as you have done before, follow me, and quarrel with me, because I have imperfectly stated my case: I have done my best; and I again ask you what have you to do? I tell you that this "Protection," as it has been called, is a failure. It was so when you had the prohibition up to 80s. You know the state of your farming tenantry in 1821. It was a failure when you had a protection price of 60s.; and you know what was the condition of your farm tenantry in 1835. It is a failure now with your last amendment, for you have admitted and proclaimed it to us; and what is the condition of your agricultural population at this time? I ask, what is your plan? I hope this is not a pretence; a mere political game that has been played throughout the last election, and that you have not all come up here as mere politicians. There are politicians in the House; men who look with an ambition—probably a justifiable one—to the honours of office. There may be men who—with thirty years of continuous service, having been raised into a state from which they can neither escape nor retreat—may be holding office, and high office, maintained there, probably, at the expense of their present convictions, which do not harmonize very well with their early convictions. I make allowances for them; but the great body of the hon. gentlemen opposite came up to this House, not as politicians, but as the farmers' friends, and protectors of the agricultural interests. Well, what do you propose to do? You have heard the Prime Minister declare that, if he could restore all the protection which you have had, that protection would not benefit agriculturists. Is that your meaning? If so, why not submit to it; and if it is not your conviction you have falsified your mission in this House, by following the right hon. baronet out into the lobby, and opposing inquiry into the condition of the men who sent you here. (Cheers.) With mere politicians I have no right to expect to succeed in this position. But I have no hesitation in telling you, that if you give me a committee of this House, I will explode the delusion of agricultural protection. (Cheers.) I will bring forward such a mass of evidence, and give you such a preponderance of talent and authority, that when the blue book is published and sent forth to the world, as we can now send it, by our vehicles of information, your system of protection shall live in the public opinion for two years afterwards. (Hear, hear.) Politicians do not want that. This cry of protection has been a very convenient handle for politicians. The cry of protection carried the counties at the last election, and politicians gained honours, emoluments, and place by it; you cannot set up for any such. Now, that old tattered flag of protection, tarnished and torn, is already, to be kept hoisted still in the counties, for the benefit of politicians, or will you come forward honestly and fairly to inquire into this question? Why, cannot believe that the gentry of England will be made mere drumheads to be sounded upon by others to give forth unmeaning and empty sounds, and to have no articulate voice of their own. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) You are the gentry of England who represent the counties. You are the aristocracy of England. Your fathers led our fathers; you may lead us if you will go the right way. But, although you have retained your influence with this country longer than any other aristocracy, has not been by opposing popular opinion, or by fighting yourselves against the spirit of the age. In other words, when the battle and the hunting-fields were the scene of mainly vigour, why, your fathers were first and foremost there. The aristocracy of England were not the aristocracy of France, the mere minions of a court; nor were they like the hidalgos of Madrid, who would not show a want of courage and firmness when all has been made upon you. This is a new era. It is the age of improvement, it is the age of social advancement, not the age for war or for feudal sports. You are in a mercantile age, when the whole wealth of the world is poured into your lap. You cannot have the advantage of commercial rents and feudal privileges (hear, hear); but you may be what you always have been, you may identify yourselves with the spirit of the age. The English people look to the gentry and aristocracy of this country as their leaders. (Hear, hear.) I, who am one of you, have no hesitation in telling you, that I am in your favour in this country. But you never let it, and you will not keep it, by obstructing the way of finding employment for your own peasantry; and by found obstructing that advance which is calculated to knit nations more together in the bonds of peace and of commercial intercourse; if you are obstructing the way to the discoveries which have almost breathed life into material nature, and setting up large and obstructive of that which the community has decreed shall go on, why, then, you will be the gentry of England no longer, and others will be found to take your place. (Hear, hear.) And I have no hesitation in saying that you stand just now in a very critical position. There is a wide-spread suspicion that you have been tampering with the best feelings and with the honest confidence of your own country in this cause. Everywhere you are doubted and suspected. Read your own organs, and you will see that this is the case. (Hear, hear.) Well, now this is the time to show that you are not the mere party politicians which you are said to be. I have said that we shall be opposed in this measure by politicians; they do not want inquiry. But I ask you to go into this committee with me. I will give you a majority of country members. You shall have a majority of the Central Society in that committee: I ask you only to go into a fair inquiry as to the causes of the distress of your own population. (Hear.) I only ask that this matter may be fairly examined. Whether you establish my principle or yours, good will come out of the inquiry; and I do, therefore, beg and entreat the honourable, independent country gentlemen of this House that they will not refuse, on this occasion, to go into a fair, a full, and an impartial inquiry.

The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst loud cheers.

GREAT FREE-TRADE MEETING AT HULL.

On Wednesday the Free-Traders in this town assembled together in greater force, and manifested far more zeal for the cause, than on any previous occasion since the agitation commenced.

Although, from unavoidable causes, the announcement that addresses would be delivered by an influential deputation from the League was made but a very short time prior to the day of meeting, yet on the Wednesday our large Town-hall was filled with an audience of the most respectable inhabitants of the borough, deeply attentive to the powerful arguments of the eloquent speakers, Robert R. Moore, Esq., and Thomas Flint, Esq., and, as we have said, evincing far more enthusiasm in the cause of Free Trade than on any previous occasion.

In the evening a tea-meeting was held at the Victoria Rooms. The Rev. Mr. Aspinall and Mr. Moore spoke at great length, and were much applauded.

Active measures were taken to forward the local exertions in favour of the Great League Bazaar.

The pressure on our space prevents us giving further particulars, especially the eloquent speech of Mr. Aspinall, a full report of which has been forwarded to us by the Hull Advertiser. We shall endeavour to give it in our next.

THE INCIDENCE OF PROTECTIVE DUTIES.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

The proceedings in the House of Commons on Friday evening were enlivened by a smart debate on the incidence of protective duties, arising out of some remarks made by Mr. Cobden on the sugar question. It will be seen from our parliamentary report, that, previously to the House going into committee on the sugar duties, the hon. member for Stockport called the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the fact, that "they were going to vote avowedly an amount of money to the colonial proprietors," which, according to his estimate, would not be less than £2,400,000; a sum which would suffice for the repeal of the window tax, the duty on soap, and various other duties which press severely on the labouring classes. By way of reply to this startling appeal, the Chancellor of the Exchequer merely remarked that "he did not acquiesce in the reasoning of the honourable gentleman;" upon which Lord Howick reiterated the statement of Mr. Cobden, and contended that a point of so much importance ought to be fairly settled before they proceeded any farther with the discussion of the sugar duties. This drew out Sir Robert Peel, who attempted to put an extinguisher on the debate, by the following characteristic specimen of sophistry:—

"In the course of the last week 3000 quarters of foreign corn were brought in at 20s. duty. The consumption of wheat in this country is estimated at not less than 20,000,000 of quarters a year; and, with the exception of about 1,000,000, the whole, or 19,000,000 quarters, are derived from domestic supply. Does the noble lord contend that, because 3000 quarters are brought into the market at a duty of 20s., therefore there is a tax of £19,000,000 levied on the British public, because 19,000,000 of quarters were the home supply consumed within the last year? And how does the noble lord reconcile the statement he now makes with the statement that was made the other night, that, if you were to remove the duty upon foreign corn, it does not follow that the price of corn in the British market would be diminished, because it was shown that in Guernsey and Jersey, where the trade in corn is free, the price of wheat is not lower at this moment than it is in this country? Does the noble lord, then, contend that there will be a tax levied to the amount of £19,000,000 upon the British public, because 3000 quarters of foreign corn were brought into the market in the last week?"

How can any fair parallel be drawn between the operation of a fixed duty on sugar and that of a fluctuating duty on corn, when the latter is varying nearly every week, while the former may remain for years without any alteration? In 1839 we imported 2,500,000 quarters of foreign wheat at an average duty of about 6s. per quarter. Are we, therefore, to infer that the tax which the landowners "levied on the British public" in that year, with wheat ranging from 70s. to 80s. per quarter, was only one-fourth of what it is now with wheat at 45s.? No one knows better than Sir Robert Peel that such is not the case; no one is more fully aware than he is, that the amount of protective duty levied under the operation of a sliding scale cannot furnish the slightest ground for estimating "the tax levied on the British public" by the food monopoly.

The Standard of Saturday, alluding to the discussion in the House of Commons, displays its wonted ignorance and presumption in the following passage:—

"If we were to write a library, we could not better answer Mr. Cobden's absurd proposition, that differential duties always cause a rise in price exactly to the amount of the duty levied, than it was answered by Sir Robt. Peel. We will therefore repeat the Premier's answer, changing merely the material. Mr. Cobden's printed cottons are protected by a differential duty of 30 per cent. Would Mr. Cobden sell his printed cottons thirty per cent., or nearly fourpence in the shilling, cheaper if the differential duty were repealed? If Mr. Cobden says no, where is his argument? If he says yes, he must be making a good thing of his trade, inasmuch as he has, by his own confession, a clear profit of 30 per cent. from the differential duty, plus all other profits."

Before replying to the choice reasoning contained in this paragraph, we must say a few words as to that ignorance of the most generally-known facts which marks the Standard, and which is so disgraceful to a journal setting itself up as an organ of the Government. The tax on the importation of printed cottons is not 30 per cent., but, as everybody acquainted with the subject knows, and as the editor of the Standard may learn on reference to class 12 in the tariff of 1842, just one-third of that amount, or 10 per cent. So much for the Standard's facts; now for his argument.

Does the Standard require to be told that Great Britain exports annually upwards of £16,000,000 worth of manufactured cotton goods, the price of which, in the open market of the world, must rule the price of those sold in the home market? If he is aware of this fact, he must also know that a "differential duty of 30 per cent. on printed cottons" can have no more effect in increasing Mr. Cobden's profits, than a duty of 30s. per ton on the importation of foreign coal into the Tyne and the Wear could have in increasing the profits which the Marquis of Londonderry derives from his collieries. Raise the duty, in either case, to 30,000 per cent., and it will not put one farthing into the pocket either of the noble marquis or of Mr. Cobden. As regards sugar, the case is altogether different. Instead of producing double the quantity which Great Britain requires, the colonies cannot raise enough for our consumption, or why should the Chancellor of the Exchequer contemplate our purchasing 20,000 tons of foreign sugar, at an extra duty of 10 guineas per ton? As this extra supply is necessary to meet the demand for British consumption, it is quite clear that every shilling of additional tax laid upon it will raise the price of British colonial sugar.

But will the price be raised to the full extent of the protecting duty? Here, we think, Mr. Cobden's proposition requires some qualification. It is an unquestionable fact, as we have had occasion to show on former occasions in reference to a fixed duty on corn, that discriminating duties, by diminishing the demand for the higher taxed commodity, tend to lower its price abroad, and, to the extent of the depreciation, counteract their own effect upon internal prices. If Cuba sugars were admitted here on the same terms as colonial, the increased demand consequent upon the equalization would raise the price in Cuba,—very little, perhaps, but still something; and, if we would correctly estimate the effect of the present protecting duty on the price of colonial sugar, we must allow for the depreciation which it now causes in the price of foreign sugar. That depreciation is probably too small to be of any practical importance; but, in laying down principles and general rules in the House of Commons, it is well to state the qualifications to which they are liable.

A BUNDLE OF INCONSISTENCIES.

(From the Leeds Mercury.)

Sir Robert Peel has combined in his measures some of the most glaring inconsistencies that ever disfigured the policy of any Minister. The following specimens, arranged in parallel columns, illustrate the assertion:—

A Tariff, whose express object is declared to be to cheapen the necessaries of life.

Great concern professed to relieve trade and commerce, for the sake of which a Property Tax is imposed.

The Repeal of duties on raw materials.

Total and Immediate Relief to small taxes.

Taxes for the mere purpose of Revenue.

Repeal of the Duty on Slave-Grown Cotton.

Encouragement of Brazilian Coffee and Cotton.

Admission of cheap Slave-Grown Sugar, to be refined in England and supplied to the Continental nations.

Encouragement of the United States Slave Trade.

Corn and Provision Laws, whose sole object is to make the chief necessaries of life dear.

A still greater concern to uphold the Rent of land, for the sake of which trade and commerce are loaded with a Bread Tax.

The taxation of the greatest of all raw materials, namely, that of labour.

A Sliding Scale for the heaviest tax of all.

Taxes for the mere purpose of Protection.

Prohibitory Duties on Slave-Grown Sugar.

Refusal of Brazilian Sugar.

Prohibition of the selfsame cheap Sugar to our own working people.

Discouragement of the Brazilian Slave Trade.

ANTI-CORN-LAW LECTURES IN SUSSEX.—Mr. Falvey lectured in the Town-hall, Brighton, on the evenings of Monday and Tuesday last. Mr. John Hilton was unanimously called to the chair, and introduced Mr. Falvey to the meeting. There was a good attendance of ladies, especially on the second evening. Mr. Falvey demonstrated the injustice and impolicy of the corn and colonial restrictions; and at the close of his second address the cheering of the meeting was kept up for a long time. When it had subsided, an intelligent-looking working man stood up, and said that he had been so much impressed with the truth of the statements brought forward by the lecturer, and such was his desire to forward—though in a small way—the glorious cause of Free Trade, that he intended to contribute some natural curiosities, which he had been a long time collecting, to the Anti-Corn Law Bazaar. His statement was received with loud cheers. Votes of thanks were then carried by acclamation to the chairman, lecturer, and Council of the Anti-Corn Law League.—Mr. Falvey lectured at Shoreham, on Wednesday evening, to an attentive and respectable audience.—A joint committee of ladies and gentlemen was formed at the Town-hall, Brighton, on Tuesday, to superintend the collecting and forwarding of contributions to the Anti-Corn Law Bazaar.

RAILWAY DEPOSITS.—The amount of deposits paid into the Bank of England by the various railway companies exceeds £1,500,000. The total sum paid into the Bank of Ireland is upwards of £200,000.—Irish Railway Gazette. Joseph Lind, a substantial farmer at Cockfield, Durham, being liable, by a change of owners, to expulsion from his farm, on which he had expended considerable sums, without compensation, committed suicide by hanging.

ANTI-CORN-LAW BAZAAR.

MANCHESTER LADIES' COMMITTEE.—A meeting of the Manchester Ladies' Committee, for forwarding the preparations for the Bazaar about to be held in Covent Garden Theatre, was held in the Council Room of the League, Newall's-buildings, on Tuesday morning, when upwards of sixty ladies were present. Mrs. Woolley took the chair. Mr. George Wilson addressed the committee, and explained at considerable length the arrangements already made by the Council. Mr. Leadbetter then presented £5 on behalf of Mrs. Leadbetter, who was unable to render personal services. Mrs. Woolley addressed the committee with the view of ascertaining their opinions on the best means of furnishing the Manchester stalls at the Bazaar, and suggested that the town should be divided into districts, and that the ladies of the committee should undertake to canvass for contributions to the Bazaar. Mrs. Massey and other ladies approved of the suggestion, which was ultimately adopted. Mr. Prentice addressed the committee, offering various suggestions to the ladies. He suggested the getting of contributions of other articles besides ladies' work,—such as models, minerals, old coins, fossils, and vegetable remains, &c. A conversation afterwards arose, in which the question was considered—“What was to be done with money donations?” The opinion came to was that on no account should such sums be spent in articles for furnishing the stalls, but that it should be kept entire and separate. Mrs. Woolley suggested the desirability of ladies giving their names who were willing to take the charge of stalls, and who were willing to be responsible for goods and articles to be forwarded. Several names were given which, of course, will be published in due time. Arrangements were then made for the canvass. Mrs. Cobden, Mrs. Woolley, and Mrs. Higgins being appointed for the Broughton district; Mrs. J. B. Smith, and other ladies, for Pendleton; Mrs. Armstrong and other ladies for Stocks, Cheetham; Mrs. Swindell, and other ladies, for Victoria-park and Long-sight; Mrs. Rawson, Mrs. Potter, and other ladies, for Ardwick and Stockport-road; and several ladies were named for other districts. Before the committee adjourned it was resolved that an advertisement should be inserted in the newspapers, announcing that a canvass was to be forthwith commenced.

THE BAZAAR.—The history of Bazaars and Fancy Fairs, albeit, patronized by rank, fashion, beauty, and wealth, affords no parallel to the great Free-Trade Bazaar. Never has there been, and never could there be, witnessed, but for the vastness of the object and the mighty interests involved in it, such a combination of the various products that the wealth of our merchants, and the endless resources of our national skill, industry, and research, are enabled to contribute, as will be concentrated into one focus in May next. It will be a truly national spectacle, and it will indeed be a marvel if its contemplation do not impress upon thousands of the countless numbers who will visit that scene the irresistible conviction that skill so varied, and industry so applied, need only be freed from the cruel trammels of a legislation, as unwise as it is unjust, to render England's sons as prosperous in the markets of the world as their consummate combination of skill, industry, enterprise, and perseverance entitle them to be. No one—not even the sternest protectionist breathing, can visit the Free-Trade Bazaar without arriving at the inward, though unwilling, conclusion, that England's commerce, once unfettered, could never suffer from the most unrestricted competition that the world could oppose. We are happy to find that Sussex adds its mite to the good work, and that contributions to the Bazaar will be forwarded from various parts of the county.—Sussex Advertiser.

LOUISIANA SUGAR.—Since our last, other specimens of this kind of sugar have been received in Liverpool, two of which were shown us by a gentleman connected with the sugar trade. He informed us that they were of excellent quality, and well suited for this market. Indeed they are samples of a lot shipped before the present change in the law, and which may be expected in Liverpool shortly. The last letters arrived from America estimate the present year's growth of cane sugar at 160,000 blds.—a quantity little short of half the present consumption of the united kingdom; and they state that this quantity is likely to be rather increased than diminished, sugar being at present a more profitable article of growth than cotton. The reduction of the duty on foreign molasses to 8s. 3d. per cwt. will also have the effect of bringing considerable quantities of that useful article from Louisiana.—Liverpool Times.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXIII.

TO “THE UNTAXED FOREIGNER.”

GREAT UNKNOWN!—Who are you? Where are you? Why does the mere sound of your name frighten the British farmer? What is the mode of your existence, and the source of your terrors? How are you able to ruin “farmers' labourers and their families” in the receipt of only 7s. a week? Are you “raw head and bloody bones” dug up from the grave by the Protection Society? Amongst African monopolists is your name Mumbo Jumbo? In what dreadful form do you become visible? Is it that of a cargo of wheat, or a stave of beefwood? By what incantations are you raised from the infernal regions? Must we first sup on Richmond's salmon, then drink Richmond's whisky, and finally read Richmond's speeches, to see and feel your incubus presence? To evoke you, must we say the Lord's prayer backwards, especially the petition for daily bread? By what magic does the “coronetted fishmonger” and gin-spinner render you palpable and powerful, thus disproving the suspicion of his being no conjuror? Has “Granny” ever seen your awful presence? Can you be made a show of, for the benefit of distressed landlords, with a pole and a placard, and the duke to stir you up, as a creature “never to be tamed by the art of man?” “O answer me; let us not burst in ignorance;” I should rather say “starve in ignorance,” for while the panic of your name is so potent, there will be little bursting amongst the peasantry, save the bursting out of flames and curses.

I should like to ferret you out. May “the untaxed foreigner” be chased and caught, without infringing the game laws? Is there no poaching upon his grace's manors in using your name for any other purpose than that of terrifying the farmer and taxing the public? Do tell us where you live? Remember, we have some power of annoyance. Your letters shall be opened at the Post-office, and your untaxedness, which is a species of treason, reported to your own Government. The duke shall propose a heavy duty upon you, in his threatened emendation of the Tariff. Your position is perilous! To be “untaxed” is to be a monster in the world, which all legitimate tax-eaters, all lords of the Treasury, like one of the duke's brothers and one (in expectancy) of his sons, all functionaries of the Foreign-office, like another of the duke's sons, and all grooms of the Bedchamber, like another of the duke's brothers, should combine to extirpate, and, as Lord Bacon says, to “damn and send to hell for ever all facts and opinions tending to the support of the same.” And yet—that must not be. You are too valuable to be destroyed. You are as useful to the monopolists as “the Corsican,” whose name first income-taxed us, was to the Anti-Jacobins. You are “untaxed,” for our taxation. You must live for the life of the Corn Laws. The Central Protection Society will protect you over the world's circumference. Only come not here. The slave that touches British ground is free; but the foreigner that touches British ground is taxed.

There is not a country in Europe where the land does not bear a larger share of the burdens of the state than in Great Britain. At the commencement of the last century the proportion, here and abroad, was nearly equal. The land-tax then produced 38 per cent. of the total revenue of the country. Our Richmonds have worked it down to less than four per cent. Even in the United States the agricultural section of the people is at a disadvantage so long as their tariff lasts, in comparison with the manufacturing section. There our cotton-spinners are “the untaxed foreigner.” The loom is protected at the expense of the plough; and in relation to us, every foreigner who has ought to sell, is necessarily taxed by the cost of transit. A natural tax is upon him, and ocean levies its fiscal dues unrelentingly. You are only a chimera after all. “There's no such thing.” You are invented by the selfsame ingenuity that discovered or fabricated monopolist principles in Adam Smith's “Wealth of Nations.”

What the items are, in the 430 minima of impost, to the repeal of which exceptions will be taken, does not yet appear. They have to be sought for by the microscopic eye of class cupidity.

* After the pledges he had given in that House, and which he intended to fulfil, he was bound, when the measure for remitting taxes came up to their lordships, to move to expunge all those clauses which were for the benefit of the untaxed foreigner and brought ruin upon farmers' labourers and their families.—*Speech of the Duke of Richmond in the House of Lords, March 4. This celebrated and unequalled whisky, produced in Glenlivet, upon the estate of His Grace the Duke of Richmond, is now for the first time publicly introduced into London, under the patronage of His Grace.—Andrew Usher and Co. of Edinburgh, established there for 25 years, the sole consignors, beg to announce that they have established at 1, Northumberland street, Strand, a depot for the sale of the above unequalled whisky in its native purity and strength. By His Grace's permission the ducal arms on the seal and label will distinguish the real Glenlivet from all others.

Will that of greaves be amongst the number? It ought; for why should not British hounds be dieted exclusively on British produce? At present, the proposition stands for allowing you to feed the duke's dogs, although you are forbidden to feed the labourer's children. A nice distinction: the dogs and their families will not be ruined by your intervention. The free supply of food is only perilous to humanity.

If the farmers would but look at you steadily, their nerves would soon recover. A proverb says, "the devil is not so black as he is painted;" and they might find you not so very dark. The worst you can do is to perpetuate the present cheapness. It was a paying price fifty years ago, and would be a paying price again were rent to retrograde to what it was at that period. The untaxed landlord is much more formidable to the farmer than the "untaxed foreigner." All this abuse of you is simply the trick of the pilferer who cries "stop thief!" the loudest. You are the friend of all who cannot afford to buy as much food as they desire; and they are no small number even at this comparatively prosperous season, when the Duke of Richmond presents petitions against cheapness, and argues that the manufacturing population is doing too well to be relieved from taxation. Your supplies would stimulate trade and enlarge consumption. You would teach the millions who still "rejoice upon potatoes" to require wheaten bread. You would thus make customers for our home producers. The farmer and the farmer's labourer would be all the better for you: they would have an ampler and richer market, and no longer be indebted to Corn Laws for that support which the Duke of Richmond says they yield, but which, if it be so, can be only a beggarly and dishonest subsistence.

When the Corn Laws were originally proposed, it was argued that they would so stimulate production as to induce abundance and permanent cheapness. That pretext is finally abolished. Cheapness is now petitioned against and denounced. The mask is worn out. Another has replaced it. With a million and a half of persons helped by the poor-rates, we are told that provisions are too cheap. The merest trifles are not to be sold duty free, if such trifles can be produced on the property of his Grace of Richmond. He will "bear no rival near" the shop. And these dirty and odious pretensions are veiled under the pretext that you will damage the labourer and his family. The reasoning is too flimsy for analysis, and the hypocrisy too palpable for exposure. It stares detection out of countenance.

But they will work you awhile yet, these hardy asserters. You will be trotted out in the Commons, as you have been in the Lords. You will be traversed in tracts and reiterated in reports. Your worth is known, and you will be clung to as the last plank of Monopoly. The very factory children will learn to laugh at seeing how your shadow terrifies the farmers. And at length, for all such deceptions must come to an end, the game will be up by agricultural industry resolving to be humbugged no longer. Rubbing its eyes and raising its voice, it will exclaim, "Avaunt, thou Bugaboo!" After that, we shall hear no more of "the untaxed foreigner" as the demon who necessitates taxed bread for Britons.

VICTIMS OF PROTECTION.—LETTERS TO INDIVIDUAL SUFFERERS.

THIRD LETTER.

To my old Master, Mr. W. T., of B.

Sir,—Last week I published two letters, addressed to you, in which I spoke of what you, as a landowner's son and as a farmer, have suffered from what is falsely called "protection." Also, upon what my father, as a farm-labourer, and his family suffered on your farm by that Corn-Law famine in the dear years, which pinched us with a small allowance of bad food, and made our backs bare, while it professed to protect you, and all the while deceived you; that protection which insinuated itself into your confidence by the plea of friendship, and secretly put its hand in your pocket and smiled in your face as it took your purse; that protection which bade you go to the bank and get a few more hundreds to make up the rent of £3 per acre; which whispered you to go again, and again, always telling you in the most bland and insinuating terms that the Corn Law would do the duty expected of it—that you would get all your money back again; that protection which so unnaturally sets man against man, class against class, by filling the rich man's pocket full when the working man's belly is empty.

I do not write these letters without reluctance and much diffidence. I feel the delicacy of personal affairs being thus written of. But all public affairs are composed of innumerable personal circumstances, just as the great globe is formed of atoms. To learn and elucidate the operations of nature the chemist must analyze; to understand and explain a nation's welfare or its woe, we must particularize. And have I no right to deal with this subject? He shall obliterate from my memory the famine years of my boyhood, and their consequences? And have I no right to expose to nakedness and shame the causes of such famine if I can?

But my present object is with what the farmers suffer, not the labourers alone. And first, of fluctuating prices.

To glance over a table of prices for fifty years we see the "ups and downs" of corn to be very frequent and very abrupt. An eminent publisher of maps in London has given to the world a map of the prices of wheat from 1790 to 1840. The map also contains the fluctuations of the public funds; and the amount of bank notes issued in each year; the revenue and expenditure of the Government; the value of the goods exported out of, and imported into, the United Kingdom; together with remarks of peace or war, or other circumstances causing fluctuations. The map was not published for or against the Corn Law; but it is nevertheless eminently useful as an assistant expositor of the national disasters arising from famine. I shall here endeavour to give you a view of it.

The lowest average of a year's prices of wheat between 1790 and 1810 is 40s. per quarter. This was the average of 1792 and of 1835. And that is taken as the base line divided into fifty parts: one part for each of the fifty years. From each year there rises a pyramid, or a small mound, or, as the case may be, a gigantic tower, shooting up abruptly from a deep valley, and the top of each elevation rises to the point to which the average prices of that year rose. The scale of ascent being by intervals of 5s. per quarter; each advance of 5s. measuring about the twelfth of an inch on paper.

All persons interested in securing equal prices, and in putting agriculture on a sure foundation, should study this map. The causes that affected prices before 1815 are not precisely the same as those after; but it was to perpetuate the high unequal prices that preceded 1815 that the Corn Law of that year was enacted.

And first, you must admit that equitable prices are of the greatest value to the farmer. To know in any given year what the price of his corn will be the next year, or that time five years, or that time ten or fifteen years, would be worth much more to him, as regards his rent, his plans for making a profit, and his plans of improving his land than any chance, however sure, that at some time or other, yet not knowing when, some year of high prices will occur.

Move with me in imagination over an uneven space of ground, and let us compare it with the passage of the farmers over the space of time between 1790 and 1845.

Let us suppose ourselves at the cove just above the seabeach, and that we have to journey westward to the sands at Thorntonlosh. There is a good, smooth, hard, level road, if we choose to turn into it. Common sense would suggest to us that our comfort and convenience, and even the safety of our lives, would decide us in favour of the even road, instead of going down among the rocks and precipices which lie on the other side of us.

It is pointed out to us that everything comes to a level at last, that all nature adjusts itself to an even scale in course of time, however much men in their folly may disarrange it; but another "friend" advises us to go the other way. We stand, as it were, upon the ground of 50s., the price of 1790, and we are going to the point of 45s. in 1845. There is not much difference in altitude between the two; and we would never have known there was any difference at all had we come by the even road.

But we submit to the guidance of our very kind friend. Our first movement is down. The year '91 gives us 45s.; the year '92 gives us but 40s. We next rise, and '93 gives us 45s. "Come on," says our friend, "the year '91 will give you more." And it does so; it gives us 50s. And now for a lift. All at once, in '95, we are up to 75s. How we love our friend, and shout for him and vote for him now! And the next year, '96, is the same. We may fancy ourselves secure, and sure for ever of 75s.; but we are only on one of those abutting precipices which lie in our road, as if some fairy had lifted us from the level and put us there. We are all at once dashed down to the level of the beach, and there we sprawl for two years, '97 and '98, at 50s. We sprawl only because we are bruised by the fall. Had we never been higher we would have known no fall, and had no bruises.

I have a shrewd suspicion our friend had his hand in our pockets while we were prostrated; but he befriends us again, and we rise in '99 to 65s. We begin to rejoice once more, and are so full of spirits that we rejoice to mount on the top of one of those fantastic pinnacles of rocks that have been erected on the line of our rough road in some great convulsion of nature. You have seen the pinnacles near Bilsdean shore. Well, we are on one of them in 1800, and its height is 110s. Five pounds ten shillings! How we shout now, and wave our hats, and dine, and drink, and dance, and hunt, and vote, and raise the price of corn. And next year, in 1801, we rise a step higher, and stand on the giddy pinnacle of 115s. The year 1802 is before us, and we cannot miss it. We got up; how are we to get down? The famine-stricken labourers—such as my father and his family—the hecatombs of famine victims gnash their teeth and cry in vain for bread. But, secure in our guide, we heed them not; when, all at once, we are in that gorge below, which is 50s. deep, though still 15s. above the point we first started from. Yet to leap from this wild turret of convulsed nature the whole depth of 50s. is a leap indeed. But down we must, and down we come. We plunge from 115s. to 65s.

Bruised and broken, we groan and cry of our distress. Our pockets are turned inside out while we lie there helpless. All our plans are frustrated. Our farms go to weeds and wreck; not because sixty-five shillings would not pay, but because we have been hurled from one hundred and fifteen shillings, upon which we reared our lofty heads.

And now our bruised bodies are rolled into a deeper gully of the broken rocks in 1803. Here we once more sink to 55s.

Every penny that we got in our glory we have lost in our humiliation. We crawl to our feet, still holding by our guide, and we move a step. In 1804 we reach 60s. Our guide tells us to cheer up, he is always our friend; and we do cheer up, and reach the point of 85s. in 1805. Once more we rejoice; but once more we are rolled down. The fall, however, is more moderate: 75s. in 1806; 70s. in 1807; and 75s. in 1808. In 1809, we take a flight to 95s.; and in the following year, 1810, we get five above the even hundred. Five pounds five shillings the quarter is again the price; and we hope to go higher, but go the other way. Not so far, however, as we fell from some other precipices. We are caught on a ledge of the rocky point. We have only fallen in 1811 to the distance of 95s.

But here stands 1812 before us, the pinnacle of the temple. And Bonaparte or the Devil, or both together, with our particular friend, our guide, take us to the pinnacle of our glory, one hundred and twenty five shillings.

Now, thought the men of money, is the time to take farms and buy estates. Branxton was bought at this time. Consols, which were at 98 when wheat was 50s. in 1790, were now at 64; that is, the public debt or credit of the nation sunk to 64.

We fell, first to 105s. in 1813; and then, oh what a fall! to 70s. in 1814; and we writhed in our agony into 65s. in 1815.

It might have been supposed we had broken bones enough in this rough road, and that we would have been glad to get out of it. But no. Gambling has a mysterious charm in it, especially to those who have lost and have still something to lose. We got the Corn Law of that year to perpetuate what we had suffered in the previous twenty-five years, and in 1816 we reached 75s. This was the first bad harvest in my recollection; and that of the year following, 1817, was still worse. Wheat now rose to 95s.; and that it no rose for the last time, let us pray to God and give thanks.

Then, with this Corn Law we rolled down to 85s. in 1818; to 70s. in 1819; to 65s. in 1820; to 55s. in 1821; and to 45s. in 1822.

There we groaned and cried aloud; not complaining of the mad career we had pursued; but because we having gone aloft in our journey had to descend.

The year 1823 gives a slight rise, and things look up. The Legislature promises a rise, and rents are calculated accordingly. You believe, and contract to pay £3 per acre for Branxton, which is not worth more than £2 per acre. In any county of England south of Yorkshire, such a farm as Branxton would not be taken at more than 30s. per acre, including tithe and poor-rates. Such is the difference between Scotch contracts and English; between the value of land where security of tenure and equality of rent and prices are comparatively good, as in Scotland, and where they are bad, as in England. Rents paid by the prices of corn protect the Lothian farmers from excessive loss by fluctuations; and leases secure them in the profit of their improvements, and give to them an improving spirit. They accordingly pay rents from 50 to 100 per cent. higher than the same quality of land pays in England.

But you made the mistake of contracting to pay a fixed money rental, without regard to the prices of corn. I know you put faith in the promise of future high prices. You were deceived: 1824 gave a price of 60s.; 1825 gave 65s. But 1826 gave only 55s.; and 1827 the same. 1828 and 1829 gave respectively 60s. and 65s.; 1830 and 1831 continued the last amount. But 1832 and 1833 gave only 55s. each. 1834 saw you running to the bank to draw out your money to pay the laird his rent, because wheat was only 45s.; and the following year, 1835, with wheat at 40s., saw you do the same.

Now, bear in mind, you had the old Corn Law, which engaged that you should never have less than 64s. You had your guide, that farmers' friend, "protection." And it protected you in your rough road, by getting you down on your back, and rifling your pockets, and by compelling you to go to the bank with your deposit receipts to draw out your money to pay the high rent which protection induced you to promise.

But the impossibility of investing money in the cultivation of the soil was the greatest disadvantage. From 1835 prices rose to 60s. in 1836; to 65s. in 1837; to 60s. in 1838; to 70s. in 1839; and fell to 65s. in 1840. With varying changes we have wheat now at 45s., or from that to 50s.

We have arrived at the point I bade you look to. Would it not have been better to have travelled by the even road, instead of coming over the precipices so often raised up to be as often knocked down and robbed, and left with broken head and empty pockets?

The more extensive the space from which supplies to market are brought, the more equal will the supply of the market be.

And remember, the prices of food depend upon the ability of the consumers of food to buy it and pay for it, as well as upon the quantity supplied to market.

Whenever corn has fallen to a moderate price, the national trade has flourished and wages have advanced. So also has the revenue of the country. When people have not to pay all their money away for bread, they buy butchers' meat, and sugar and tea, and the various other things that make commerce profitable and the Government strong and rich.

The liberation and extension of commerce is the true conservatism of England, and the best protection to agriculture. I am your old servant, and

NOTES OF A TRAVELLER.—No. XVIII.

BERLIN EXPOSITION OF MANUFACTURES.

The lower saloon at the exhibition impressed me, as I said, with a conviction which the remaining apartments fully confirmed. It was impossible to deny that the Germans are as well able to devise and to execute machinery and all other objects of art as their neighbours. What impedes their efforts is, in most cases, the want of the raw or half-manufactured material. Is it not a serious drawback to the machinist, to the cutler, and every higher branch of industry depending on a supply of iron, that raw iron cannot be produced excepting under a protecting duty of £1 per ton, in addition to the cost of carriage from abroad, while bars and rods suitable to the manufacture of machinery are loaded with a duty of £3 per ton, and rolled wheel tires, so much in demand for railroad carriages, are subject to the same burden?

If we trace this evil to its root, it will be found so intimately interwoven with the social habits of the people, and even with the financial policy of the Government, that a rapid change cannot be deemed practicable. The Governments, however, have it in their power to facilitate and hasten the change; and such a policy, besides its useful influence on the habits and interests of the people, would improve the revenue far more rapidly than their present system. I have in former letters drawn attention to the bad economy in the distribution of the power employed in agriculture. The vast number of hands employed in raising food is what diminishes the supply of metals and of other raw materials, and renders it difficult to prepare them cheaply for the finishing branches of manufacture. Since there can be little doubt that Germany, even now, would annually consume double the quantity of iron, and of nearly every other product that is now in use there, if they were furnished at a moderate price, and in shapes suited to the wants of the people, it is clear that a great privation on the part of the consumers, and a serious loss to the revenue, result from the present system of excluding supplies from abroad that cannot be obtained at home. The most striking illustration of the truth of this assertion was given me some days back, in conversation, by an engineer, who was deputed by one of the larger states to examine and report upon the Dalkey and Dublin Railway. He declared that the only objection that he could find to the immediate adoption of the atmospheric pressure tube in his country was, the additional quantity of iron which accompanied it. "This," he added, "may do very well with your prices, but with ours it is out of the question." This gentleman, at least, felt the inconvenience attaching to the protective system, as it is called, but evidently wanted courage to submit it in that light to his Government.

That the root of the evil lies in the agricultural system has been pointed out by many German writers, and has of late formed a theme of declamation in the Augsburg Gazette, for the notorious Dr. Litz. The remedy proposed by this writer, who seems proud of standing alone in the opinions he puts forth, is, that under the wing of protection manufactures can be brought up that will afterwards bear the brunt of competition. It seems more natural to allow the industrious classes to choose their own way of proceeding, which would exactly invert the process of the protectionists, and, by admitting half-manufactured products at the lowest duty that the revenue can afford, would foster the artistic turn for which the nation is celebrated.

In the central compartment of the upper story, the earthenware manufacture was displayed. A remarkably beautiful vase from the Royal Atelier (it cannot be called a factory) at Berlin, six feet six inches in height, with gilt arabesques in relief, and richly covered with flowers painted on a purple ground, was the most conspicuous object. Two other vases, with battle scenes, and some imitations of Majolica, testified to the skill of the artists. Some of these objects, it was said, were intended as presents for England. The show, on the whole, although the Saxon factory at Meissen contributed, was anything but brilliant. The forms of cups and dessert services were rather ancient, and showed that the demand for such is very limited. The few earthenware services that were exhibited had still less to recommend them in point of shape, and in price betrayed the lulling influence of the prohibitive duties that are levied on these objects. The duty on white earthenware is 10s. per cwt., on coloured 30s. per cwt., or about 100 per cent. Hardtmuth and Co., of Vienna, exhibited tableware glazed without metallic ingredients. In glass the show was far less brilliant than might have been expected. Only one Bohemian manufactory sent specimens. The rest were from Steglitz's factory on the Bavarian side of the Bohemian Forest, and from Count Schöngers's factory in Silesia. This article furnishes the most striking proof of the artistic turn which the German industry would take if not meddled with by the Legislature, which, however, by no means precludes the chance of rivalry in England, if our excise taxation were less absurd than it is. The white glass appeared to me to be all inferior to our own, which notoriously finds an extensive sale in Germany, the duty on uncut glass being but 9s. per cwt. Plate glass was exhibited in looking-glasses of all sizes; this is also a protected article, and is decidedly inferior to the plate glass of both France and England. For an article indispensable in this manufacture the English are tributary to the Germans: the foil used for covering the glass being produced in large quantities in the neighbourhood of Nuremberg, and exported from Hamburg; the sale of this article is, of course, impeded by the restrictions on the sale of the glass. In this apartment the ornaments in the newly-invented materials for decorating rooms, and for other architectural purposes, were displayed. Figures and bas-reliefs from antique designs, or compositions of the artists Rauch and Schinkel, were exhibited in carton pierre, and other compositions. M. Cantian, the royal statuary, exhibited a splendid pillar and plate of polished granite, made out of one of the bowlers that are frequent upon the plain of northern Germany. Marbles were also displayed from Limburg, in the duchy of Nassau, where a branch of industry followed in the prison at Dietz is cutting and polishing this stone. The prices are moderate for these ornamental works, handsome plates not exceeding half-a-crown per square foot. The new manufacture of polished agates, onyxes, &c., established near Creutznach, on the Rhine, exhibited stones prepared for intaglio and cameo cutting in the antique manner, by which the various veins were used to give greater effect to the sculpture. This art is almost lost for modern industry, but will probably be revived now that the materials are made accessible and abundant. Some attempts at galvanic plating and gilding on iron gave no high idea of the skill of the workman; nor were there any specimens shown that gave a notion of the progress which this branch of manufacture has made in Germany. Were the cheapness of hand labour any symptom of its superabundance, this description of manufacture, which requires manual application, would have the best field in these countries; but some experiments in this line would soon clear up the confused notions that prevail on this head in Germany, and that have even spread to England.

Amongst the musical instruments, pianofortes were most numerous exhibited; but in point of quality there was nothing that could rival the tones of the productions of Hertz and Broadwood. Instruments of middling quality are cheaper than in England; and plain grand pianos of fair tone were marked 250 to 400 dollars (£42 to £60). Cabinet and upright forms are less in use in Germany than the plain long grand shape. One organized piano of six octaves, with remarkably good organs, was played upon by the manufacturer. The price was moderate, £25; for it would have served instead of an organ in a middling-sized church.

In striking contrast, both in appearance and in price, to the architectural ornaments that I have mentioned, were the more useful implements required in fitting up houses, such as locks, hinges, bolts, and the thousand necessities that give an appearance of elegant finish to doors and windows. Only one house in Remscheid, near Solingen, had sent anything approaching to English patterns in this description of wares. Were the common run of these articles (that are excluded by the highest rate of duty) exposed at the British Museum, they would excite the wonder of an ironmonger from their primitive shapes and the waste of labour and of materials which they betray. "But," objected a friend, to whom I endeavoured to explain the pleasure it afforded to open a lock by means of a round handle that turned easily in the hand, "you would throw all our locksmiths out of work if these things were made in factories." This is the eternal argument of the advocates of restriction: they beg the whole question by assuming that the present is a sufficient supply.

The conflict between hand labour and machinery is most rife in Germany in those provinces where linen-weaving has for centuries been a constant occupation of the peasant population. It was a curious spectacle that the linen stalls presented, on which nearly the whole history of this branch of fabrication could be traced. The places which sent the most numerous specimens indicated the situation of the rich soils suited to the growth of flax. Silesia furnished mostly hand-spun linen, although samples of machine yarn were sent from three flax-spinneries: that at Landshut, near Leignitz; that of Patzschky, near Dels; and that of Frieberg, near Breslau. The second-named factory exhibited the numbers 30, 40, and 60. There was no lack of half-linen cloths; and in general, in fineness, the Westphalian linen had the advantage. I chatted with a dealer from Bielefeld, in Westphalia, who had some of the finest pieces shown. He was in great place, because two of the best had just been bought by the King in person, who was making a round of the exhibition at the time. The price given was 115 dollars for the piece of 50 ells, or 46 yards, being upwards of 8s. 6d. per yard. Notwithstanding the fineness of the thread, the cloth felt waxy and stiff; as the continental linens usually do. He had some good cloths for which he asked £3, and a piece of cambric that he wanted 40 dollars for (£6). He told me that the greatest attention was now paid by the landowners and peasants in his neighbourhood to the growth and treatment of flax, which was managed in the Belgian fashion. He did not anticipate the speedy increase of machine-spinning, although a commencement has been made there; but acknowledged that his trade could only be carried on upon a small scale, as long as it depended upon hand-spinning. The coarse sorts of linens and drilles, of which so large a quantity is manufactured in Hanover for exportation, were not represented at the exhibition. The Saxon damask manufacturers, on the other hand, contributed richly to adorn it. Beautiful specimens of jacquard weaving in tablecloths and napkins, as well as in unbleached table-covers, were displayed upon the walls. In this field the handloom weaver has probably for a long time a sure refuge against the encroachments of machinery. Fine table-linen is a favourite object of luxury with the richer classes in Germany, and many of the noble families have cards with their arms pierced, lying at the factories, to be worked when they give orders. The Saxons have shown their usual ingenuity in being the first to appropriate this branch of industry, which, like all other fine fabrics, would receive an impulse from the cheapening of the half-manufactured material. In this case the interest of the German landowner combines with that of the manufacturer against the argument of Dr. Litz; but the views entertained on this subject are too indistinct on all sides to be pressed with energy on the Legislature of the Zollverein states.

The most melancholy object exhibited was yarn of inferior quality from several spinning-schools, for it is impossible not to anticipate suffering from the direction of hand industry to a competition with machinery.

Damasks of mixed linen and cotton were marked at low prices, £1. 10s. to £3 for table-cloth with set of twelve napkins, the former three yards long. Damask of pure cotton did not seem to be exhibited, although manufactured extensively and cheaply in Saxony.

That fine linens, and especially the rich products of the Jacquard loom, would not lose in value if the greatest facility was afforded to the trade in yarn, and in the lower qualities of linen cloths, is best proved by the experience that the increased consumption of cotton has afforded. In this exhibition the two rival products hang side by side, of which fifty years ago many wise men of Gotham no doubt prophesied that the rapidly increasing production of the one would drive the other from the market. There is now little doubt that, if the fine German linens and damasks find a limited sale, it is rather because cotton wares are not cheap enough, than because their cheapness interferes with the consumption of linen. It is a curious fact that, in Germany, the number of cotton and flax spinneries increase in a parallel ratio. The number of cotton-spinning establishments was, in

1840 ..	160 .. 153,497 ..

The flax-spinning mills numbered,

1837 ..	6 mills, with 14,546 spindles.
1840 ..	2 .. 15,844 ..

At the same time the increase of imports over exports on yarn and coarse linens was considerable. In the three years 1837, 1838, and 1839, the average was, as compared with the three following years, yarn,

	Plain.	Bleached and dyed.	Twist.	Unbleached linen.
1837-39..	7,413 ..	2600 ..	5127 ..	8,920 cwt.
1840-42..	12,657 ..	4888 ..	6506 ..	21,522 ..

The quantity of fine bleached and dyed linen exported exceeds the imports in the same periods, a result with which the country had the best reason to be satisfied:—

1837-39..	Excess of exports 81,137 cwt.

That the result has been an increased demand for cloths, which without a facility for obtaining yarn could not have been gratified, is evident from other returns than the list of exports. The number of handlooms worked for trade increased from 1837 to 1840 by 2091 in Prussia alone. Those worked as secondary to other occupations increased by 8147. The stocking looms for thread hose increased by 280. An addition to the handlooms for linen weaving is, perhaps, in the present state of machinery, unavoidable. If hand-weaving took, as in Saxony, a higher department, the hand-weavers would, in every branch of weaving, avoid the competition with machinery, which they cannot support. But the additions stated to have been made to the handlooms for weaving cotton of 9216, between 1837 and 1840, being an augmentation in the ratio of 100 to 121, cannot be viewed with the same satisfaction. When we hear that the greatest increase has been in the circles of Breslau and Liegnitz in Silesia, and in Westphalia, we are not at a loss to explain the distress that led to the riots of last summer. These figures and statements are taken from the recently published work of M. Diederich, the president of the statistical bureau at Berlin. I have gone somewhat at length into them from the supposition that the work will not so speedily reach England. It surpasses in interest the former volumes that emanated from this bureau, both in completeness of the details and in the candour which pervades all the statements. I had the pleasure of making the author's acquaintance during my stay at Berlin, and was delighted with the liberal views and statesmanlike bearing of a man called to one of the most important offices of the Government. The following notices are interesting respecting the progress of the cotton manufacture in the Zollverein

1840-42 ..	65,829..	31,378..	21,590..	85,791 ..

We see here the natural efforts making to appropriate an important branch of industry, while the circumstances are such that the price will not allow of exportation. The country is evidently better supplied than it was formerly with clothing, but the high price the consumer has to pay for the benefit is shown by the diminished exports to countries that can supply themselves on better terms.

The state of cotton-spinning is shown in the following list of spinning-machines now at work within the Zollverein. M. Diederici remarks that many of these machines are on a small scale, and are worked by hand. Steam and water power are only used in Silesia and Rhenish Prussia, at Ethlingen in Baden, and at Augsburg. The returns are only complete and official for Prussia:—

The distribution of these mills has been chiefly fixed by the industrious habits of the people in the various localities where they are situated. Natural advantages have been overlooked in some of the largest, as, for instance, in Augsburg, where the severe winter prevents the use of water power for several months in the year, and no coals are found in the neighbourhood. The means of transport have nowhere been well calculated. Chemnitz, in Saxony, lies nearly a three months' voyage up the Elbe from Hamburg; Augsburg has 150 miles of land carriage from Mannheim, the nearest point of unloading on the Rhine. Ethlingen, and the Silesian mills, are somewhat better situated, and the latter are near the eastern markets. But all the establishments in central Germany are so disadvantageously placed that no English factory could subsist under the circumstances. The people, on the other hand, are too poor to be able to pay for these abuses, which have their source in the protecting system; and the result is nothing but loss to capitalists, and false inducement to journey men to embark their labour, which is their capital, in weaving at prices that leave them no profit.

The cotton manufacture of Germany was not brilliantly represented at the exhibition, but perhaps on that account the more fairly. The great printing establishments in Elberfeld, Augsburg, Silesia, and the Saxon mountainous districts, all sent specimens. The calicoes and ginghams were nearly all imitations of French patterns, which they equalled in neatness and brilliancy of the tints. In the shops in the streets newer patterns from Alsace certainly formed no favourable point of comparison; but by the spinning Leipzig and Frankfurt fairs these patterns will be domesticated in Germany. The French, like the German, printer is forced, by the difficulty he finds in obtaining the cloth on moderate terms, to work for a small market. The limited number of pieces that he prints off, in order to keep an courant with the fashion, necessarily increases his outlay in the designing department; for the finished product is, as the statistical returns prove, too dear for exportation. Instead of raising the limit of protection, which thus becomes necessary from year to year, it would be wiser policy to allow a free current of trade in the under regions, by which the printer would be enabled to compete with his neighbours, and to extend his sale.

The only novelty in the cotton manufacture was the introduction of panels of gold ground into a furniture piece exhibited by the old establishment, Schaepler and Hartmann, of Augsburg. A second specimen came from Beckmuhl and Co.'s factory at Elberfeld. The price of this article, which is understood not to be as yet in the market, was stated at 18l. 20s. for the Drabant ell, or about 2s. 10d. per yard. Furniture chintzes, of tasteful patterns, and of the French width (1½ yard), ranged from 4s. to 9d. per yard. Muslins (Jaconets) were marked at the same, which, as a wholesale price, just equals the sum to which the duty raises English prices. In general, I have found the objection to English prints lie in the pattern, for which the French are preferred, even at a higher price. The muslins exhibited on this occasion, however, allowed of no comparison, either for variety of texture or for beauty of colouring, with the products of the English loom in the season of 1844, when for the first time they had a decided advantage over the French. This I cannot but attribute to the difficulty which the French must feel in competing with our manufacturers, now that attention is drawn to the importance of taste in design. A bias given to the education of factory directors and their assistants would allow our manufacturers to reap the full benefit, from the excellent organization which they have achieved in other respects.

O that branch of the cotton manufacture which employs 150 000 handlooms, and numberless diminutive dyeing and hand-printing establishments, in Germany, under the aegis of the protecting duties, there were no specimens exhibited. The last link to which village costume now holds in this lilliputian manufacture, in which the dyes of the neighbouring villages that custom has prescribed for head-gear and neckerchiefs, can be studied. The skill of the German dyers has opened them a market in the Levant; and brilliant specimens of Turkey red, both in cottons and woollens, distinguished some lots that were said to be destined for the Levant trade.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

University Club, March 11.

SIR,—Strange as it may seem, the following passage is to be found in the last number of the "Westminster Review":—"The British duty upon foreign wool has been gratuitously given up at a moment when it might perhaps have been held more advantageously in reserve as a concession to be made for some equivalent; so that on this view we have thrown a benefit away." What benefit have we ever derived from a bad system, and what equivalent do we want for a good one? The principle here involved is that of economical restriction and retaliation. Bentham never lashed anything more posterous than what is here recommended by a Benthamite. "So long," says the same writer, "as no well-defined treaty of commercial reciprocity between the Zollverein and England exists, so long can the latter feel no security that the duties on British exports to the Zollverein states will not be still further augmented, unless we, on our part, show ourselves prepared to negotiate upon terms of a really liberal, comprehensive, and enlightened policy." If a butcher were to sign a reciprocity treaty with a baker, would it be an enlightened policy to any one but the lawyer who was paid for drawing up the contract? What is reciprocity but protection with another name? "If we will not do this," he adds, we have assuredly no right to make it a reproach to the Zollverein that it pursues its own course, without reference to our own interests," &c.; and he claims a sort of right to be put on the same footing with the most favoured nations, as if it were a crime in Prussia to neglect our interests, and no crime to neglect those of other nations; as if we could reasonably ask her to do to others the very thing we blame her for doing to us; or as if "self-love and social are the same," were not as true of communities as of individuals. We may thank fiscal philanthropy for this twaddle. Would it be believed that the first article in this number of the review contains an able and elaborate exposition of that system for which "Pigot and Say" contended in vain? We are told by this reviewer that the balance of trade is against Germany because she imports more than she exports, justifying the complaint so often made by German writers, that we would inundate them with goods without taking anything in return—a sort of generosity somewhat irreconcilable with the selfishness they impute to us. But this is not all. The reviewer declares that, if our overtures for a commercial treaty were rejected, we should be "justified in charging the Zollverein with systematic hostility to British commercial interests," and that an injustice has been inflicted on our iron-masters by the preference accorded to Belgian iron. Here we see the blunders of nations made the causes of universal enmity. If what is here asserted be true, of England in relation to Prussia, it must be true of every nation similarly situated. In other words, it must be true of all nations, for all governments are foolish enough to think that they can do business for their merchants better than the merchants themselves. If other countries grumble, they are enemies; if their own, they are rebels. This may be satisfactory doctrine with diplomats and soldiers, but it will hardly be relished by manufacturers, who are to pay for both these luxuries. After this—and there is plenty more of the same stuff—we need not be surprised that the editor should be a friend to the sugar duties. Humanity pleads for the sugar-grower, and the sugar-grower pleads for humanity. Utilitarians and Conservatives are at last reconciled to each other. "Class interests" are found to promote "the greatest happiness of the greatest number;" and Mr. Goulburn is as much the "labourer's friend" in Jamaica as Mr. Banks in Dorsetshire. The planter has a right to demand "facilities, yet withheld, of obtaining a needful supply of free labour, &c.—the rights of man have the right of precedence even of Free Trade." What equitable facilities have been denied? We have no more right to take part with capital against labour in our dependencies than with labour against capital at home. Rights of man, indeed! Why! this begs the whole question. The monopoly of the planter violates these rights. The immigration loan is doubly unjust. It is voted by those it benefits, and is paid by those it injures. It is a pity that Lord John Russell was misled by Mr. Goulburn's fallacy on this point. Colonial duties upon exports fall ultimately on the negro. They raise the price of imports, and lower the wages of labour. Thus he who is to suffer by competition is taxed to promote it. Our conduct is equally ridiculous and despicable. The humanity of our Custom-house is more absurd than the sumptuary laws of old; and the statute of wages was less iniquitous than the immigration project of our colonies.

I have the honour, &c., E. S. A.

SUGAR DUTIES.

Hall of Commerce, Feb. 24.

SIR,—I regret to see, by what passed in the House of Commons on Monday week, that Sir Robert Peel adheres to the high differential duties on sugars which he announced on bringing forward his financial statement. I was, with a great many others, in hopes that he had only thrown over the S. d. as a lure, which on more mature consideration, or by strong pressure from without, he would have been prepared to reduce.

It is decidedly a move in the wrong direction from his proposition of last year, as 9s. 4d. to 14s. is a much greater protection than 10s. to 24s. If he had proposed that it should have been 7s.—say 14s. to 21s.—it would have been much more palatable.

Our possessions in what are called the West Indies may be classed in three divisions—Jamaica, Barbadoes and contiguous islands, Trinidad, and Demerara, &c. Jamaica has been in our possession for nearly two centuries; Barbadoes and most of the others for very long periods; but Trinidad and Demerara, where the Gladstones have large possessions, were conquered by us during the last war; and neither by the terms of their capitulation, nor from any other cause, are they entitled to levy "black mail" on the people of Great Britain.

The Mauritius was conquered by us about thirty-five years ago. Its trade was then, and had been for many years, at the very lowest ebb; and it continued in pretty much the same state until we thought proper, as an act of grace and charity, to equalize the duties on their sugar with that imported from our old colonies in the West Indies. From that time their produce has rapidly increased, from the average of five years preceding the reduction of about two thousand tons up to forty thousand tons which Sir R. Peel states we are to have from thence this year. During the twenty years since the reduction of duties we have imported from the Mauritius about 125 thousand tons of sugar, for which, in consequence of the monopoly, we paid at least £20 a ton more than we ought, making an aggregate amount of two millions and a half of money, or probably twice the value of the island.

As they can now obtain Hill Coolie labourers in any numbers, we may consider that the forty thousand tons with which we are threatened this year may be indefinitely increased, so that the discriminating duties, if they should be continued, will extract from the hard earnings of our own people about half a million per annum.

But it may be said, look at your exports; see what a portion of them is consumed in the Mauritius. Well, let us look at them, and what do we find? That in the last twenty years they amounted in round numbers to five millions sterling, which, at £20 per cent. profit, would give one million; but as the expenses of our military and other establishments, leaving out of consideration any proportion of our naval expenses, would amount in the same period to at least a million and a half, it seems that we are thus minus a half million in addition to the five millions that we have paid as an extorted price for their sugars. It may be very well to talk of "ships, colonies, and commerce," but such a colony as this under the protective system cannot but be a heavy drag upon our prosperity.

From its position on the highway from the Cape of Good Hope to India and America, and the excellence of its harbour, it may be of some value to us as a naval station, but we found it very troublesome to us in the last war; and we had better be at the expense of an occasional reconquest, than to be annually mulcted as we are and are likely to be.

If we are to continue the possession of it, we are fairly entitled to call on the Mauritians to defray all their internal expenses, whether civil or military, when they would probably find that many salaries and charges with which they are now burdened might be either dispensed with, or very considerably reduced.

I also see, by Sir Robert Peel's statement, that we are to expect 70 thousand tons of sugar from the East Indies. Up to the time of the assimilation of the duties, we used to import about 60 thousand cwt. We have thus increased the quantity to about 2½ times that amount, which, as they have free labour at the very lowest cost, ought to satisfy the planters without their exacting from us the additional £700,000 a year, that the differential duties will give to them.

I see with great pleasure that the planters are beginning to stir themselves in making improvements in the manufacture of sugar: I have no doubt that they will find it can be produced at a very considerable reduction of expense; and if some of those proprietors, such as the Earl of Harwood, the Duke of Buckingham, Lord St. Vincent, the Marquis of Sligo, &c. &c., would go out and live on their estates, it would no doubt add to the respectability of colonial society: we could very well spare them for a longer or shorter time from old England.

St. Pancras, Chichester, Sussex, Feb. 19.

SIR,—In order to give you some idea how petitions in favour of the existing Corn Laws are got up in the neighbourhood of Chichester, I will relate the inducements held out by a Mr. Carpenter, who is employed by the farmers in procuring signatures to them, to an industrious milkman named Thomas Scatterfield, and which can be verified on oath if required.

Carpenter.—"You are just the man I wanted to see. The farmers have now found out their men are not sufficiently paid, and cannot live on their wages. A labourer said to me the other day, 'I have only two pence per head to keep my family upon for six days, allowing nothing for Sundays.' The farmer says, 'How is this, John?' The man told him the number he had in family, and the amount of his earnings. The farmer replies, 'Bless my soul, you are right; this must be altered.' So we have got up this petition, and, as you cannot write, if you will let me put your name, something will be done for you."

These are the plain facts of the case, of which you can make any use you think proper.

I remain, Sir, yours respectfully,

JAMES WILKINSON.

COMMON SENSE & PROTECTION.—The protectionists are fully satisfied that their days are numbered. The Mark-lane Express says:—"The Premier, in his financial statement, has corroborated our oft-repeated views of his determination to carry out the principles of 'common sense.'"

JEWISH DISABILITIES.—On Monday night, the Lord Chancellor moved, in the House of Lords, the second reading of a bill for removing the disabilities from members of the Jewish persuasion elected to municipal and corporate offices. There was no opposition to the measure, and several noble lords, including the Chancellor, bore warm testimony to the humanity and loyalty of the Jewish body generally. The bill will doubtless pass, and may be regarded as but a preliminary step to the final admission of Jews to the same civil rights and privileges possessed by other denominations of citizens.

REVIEW.

The Supplement to the "Penny Cyclopædia" of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. Article "Agriculture." London: Charles Knight.

The "Penny Cyclopædia," so called from the original form of its publication, is a truly national work, equally creditable to the enterprise of those by whom it was undertaken, the age in which it has been produced, and the zeal by which it has been supported. There is no need of pronouncing any eulogy upon a work which is known and valued wherever the English language is spoken, but as the publication of a supplement may lead some to suppose that it was required in consequence of some deficiency in the original work, we think it desirable to have it known that this supplement is principally designed to mark the progress which knowledge has made since the Cyclopædia was commenced, with special reference to geographical discoveries and scientific improvements. The editors have also taken the opportunity of elucidating topics which have taken a great hold on the public mind, and excited much anxious discussion while the Cyclopædia was in progress, and to one of the articles belonging to this category, which most ably examines the effect of protection on agriculture, we shall, for the present, confine our attention. The writer begins by examining a question raised first by the French economists, as to the relative value of agriculture and manufactures, which he shows to be a mere worthless play upon words. Both agriculture and manufacture are employments of labour in giving value to that which is worthless, or nearly so.

"Those agricultural products which are articles of food—as bread, the chief of all—are essentials, and the industry of every country is directed to obtaining an adequate supply of such articles, either from the produce of the country or by foreign trade. Some of the various kinds of grain which are used as food are the prime and daily articles of demand in all countries. Agricultural articles which are employed as materials out of which other articles are made, such as cotton, are only in demand in those countries where they can be worked up into a new and profitable form. The varieties of soil and climate render some parts of the world more fit to produce grain, and others more suitable for cotton. Ever since the earliest records of history the people of one country have exchanged their products for the products of other countries; and, if the matter were simply left to the wants and wishes of the great majority of mankind, no one would trouble himself with the question of the relative superiority of the process by which he produces grain or cotton, and the art by which his cotton is turned into an article of dress in some other country, and sent back to him in that new form to be exchanged for grain or more raw cotton. He might not perceive any essential difference in the process of turning the earth, committing the seed to it, and reaping the crop at maturity; and the process by which the raw material which he has produced, such as flax or cotton, is submitted to a variety of operations, the whole of which consist only in giving new forms to the material or combining it with other materials. In both cases man moves or causes motion; he changes the relative places of the particles of matter, and that is all. He creates nothing; he only fashions anew. The amount of his manual labour may be greatly reduced by mechanical contrivances, and perhaps more in what are called manufactures than in what is termed agriculture; so that if the amount of the direct labour of hand is to be the measure of the nature of the thing produced, agricultural products are more manufactures than manufactured articles are. Some branches of agriculture, such as wine-making, indeed belong as much to manufactures, in the ordinary sense of that term, as they belong to agriculture. The cultivation of the vine is an essential part of the process of wine-making; but the making of the wine is equally essential. Indeed there are few agricultural products which receive their complete value from what is termed agriculture. Corn must be carried to the market, it must be turned into flour, and the flour must be made into bread, before the corn is in that shape in which it is really useful. Agriculture, therefore, only does a part towards the process of making bread, though the making of bread is the end for which corn is raised. It is true that in agricultural countries the processes by which many raw products are fashioned to their ultimate purpose, are often carried on by agriculturists, and on the land on which the products are raised. But agriculture, as such, only produces the raw material, corn, flax, grapes, sugar-cane, or cotton. If any agriculturist makes flour, linen, wine, sugar, or cotton-cloth, he does it because he cannot otherwise produce a saleable commodity; but the making of flour or wine or cloth is a manufacturing operation, as the word manufacture is understood."

The fattening of sheep, swine, and bullocks is as much a trade and a branch of manufacturing industry as the fabrication of twist, calico, or cloth; the fatted cattle have little value on the spot where they are produced, but they obtain their value by being transported to a place where they are wanted, by those who are not feeding cattle, but who are producing something which they can give in exchange for meat. In the same way the value of calico and cloth is not estimated in the weaving shed, but is measured in the place where calico or cloth is wanted by those who have produced something else to give in exchange for clothing. Value, in fact, is nothing more than market price; and every legislative interference with a market unfairly depresses the price of one set of commodities and raises that of another.

"Now, if the question be, which of all these branches of industry adds most to wealth, or, in other words, is most useful to mankind, the answer must be,—they are all equally useful. If it be urged that some are of more intimate necessity than others, inasmuch as food is essential, and therefore its production is the chief branch of industry, it may be replied, that in the present condition of man it is not possible to assert that one branch of industry is more useful than another: each depends on every other. Further, if food is essential to all men in all countries, clothing and houses are equally essential even to the support of life in most countries; and the production of clothing and the building and furnishing of convenient houses comprehend almost every branch of manufacturing industry which now exists. It is an idle question to discuss the relative value of any branches of industry, when we found the comparison upon a classification of them which rests on no real difference, and leave out of the question their aptitude to minister to our wants. One might discuss the relative value of the manufacture of scents and perfumes, and the manufacture of wine and beer; and the foundation of the comparison of value might be the number of persons who use or wish to use the two things, and the effect which the consumption of scents and perfumes on the one hand, and of wine and beer on the other, will have on the consumers and the condition of those who produce them."

If artificial means are employed to raise the price of an article in the production of which the least amount of labour is employed, then the price of labour as a general commodity must be lowered. There is far less of manual labour engaged in the production of a quarter of wheat than in the production of a piece of cloth or a piece of furniture. The Corn Laws then, by raising the exchangeable value of food, depress the exchangeable value of labour; they are a tax upon industry in favour of the idle proprietors of brute matter. They produce that state of things which poor Hood has stated with equal force and simplicity—

"Oh God! that bread should be so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap."

"If those who possess political power were free from all prejudices and all motives of self-interest, or what they suppose to be their interest, there would neither be encouragement nor discouragement given to any branch of industry, and least of all to agriculture. If taxes must be raised, they would be raised in such way as would least interfere with the free exercise of all branches of industry; and they would not be raised upon raw products of any kind. It is the business of a State to find sufficient means, at the least possible cost to the whole community, for defence against foreign aggression, for the administration of justice, and for all such matters of public interest as require its direction and superintendence. To ascertain what these matters may be, and how they are to be effected, belongs to the subject of government; and the sphere to which the State should limit its activity cannot be exactly defined. But there is one principle which excludes its interference from many matters; which is this:—If men are not interfered with, they will employ their labour and capital in the way which is most profitable to themselves; and each man knows better how he can employ himself profitably than anybody else can, or any government can, whether such government is of one or many. Agriculture is no exception to this general principle; and there is no reason of public interest why a government should either encourage it or discourage it. In order that the agriculture of a country may attain its utmost development, it is necessary that it be free from all restraint, and that it be also free from the equally injurious influence of special favour or protection."

"But no governments have ever let the things alone which they ought not to have meddled with; and agriculture has been subject perhaps to more restrictions than any other branch of industry. The interference with agricultural industry lies deeper than at first sight appears. Land is an essential element of a state: it is the basis on which the structure is raised. Now, the political constitution of every country is intimately connected with the nature of the landed property; and if we would really trace the history of any nation from the earliest records to the present time, we must begin with the fundamental notions of the law of property in land. In this country, for instance, it is easily shown that the present mode in which land is held and occupied is the result of those feudal principles which were established, or confirmed and extended, by the Norman conquest of England. The various modes in which land is held by the owner and occupied by the cultivator, the modes in which it may be alienated or transmitted by will or by descent, the burdens to which it is liable either on any change of owner or in any other way, are all important elements in estimating the degree of freedom which agriculture enjoys. The political constitution of a country also materially determines whether the land shall be cultivated in large or in small portions, whether owned by a numerous body or owned by a few; there may also be positive laws which affect the power of acquiring land or disposing of it; and these circumstances materially affect the freedom of agriculture and its condition. The political constitutions of countries, so far as we know them, have not been the result of design. We of the present generation find something transmitted to us which our predecessors have been labouring to amend or deteriorate; they in like manner received it from their predecessors; but the beginning of the series we cannot ascend to. Still every existing generation can do something towards altering that which has been transmitted to it; and every act of legislation which interferes with the mode in which land is acquired or enjoyed materially affects the condition of agriculture. No sufficient reason has ever yet been shown why a man should not, as a general rule, acquire as much land as he can, and dispose of it as he pleases either during his lifetime or at his death. Though this general principle must be admitted, it may still be laid down as a safe rule that there are limits within which a man's power over his property in land ought to be circumscribed. He should not be allowed, for instance, to determine for generations to come what persons or class of persons shall enjoy his land, and to limit the power of alienating it; unless it may be when his property is given for public purposes of unquestionable utility. For with this limitation, it follows that when the purposes cease to be of unquestionable utility, the State ought to apply the property to new and useful purposes. There are therefore limits which ought to be placed to a man's power over his land. But such limits should not in any way limit the productive use that can be made of the land; one object of fixing such limits, whatever they may be, is to prevent any large amount of land from being withdrawn permanently out of the market. In a rich country, where great fortunes are acquired by commerce and manufacturing industry, there are always men who wish to invest money in land, and it is for the public interest that there should be opportunities of making such investments."

The difference that really exists between agriculture and manufactures, is that there is a natural limit to the productive powers of the former and not of the latter:—

"A time will come in all countries which contain a large population not employed in agriculture, when foreign grain can be imported and sold at a lower price than grain can be produced on poor soils; and, if there is no restriction placed on the importation of grain, experience will soon show when it is more profitable to buy what is wanted to supply the deficiency of the home produce than to attempt to raise the whole that is wanted by cultivating poor soils. No country of large extent with a great population could obtain the whole supply of corn by foreign commerce; such an instance is not on record. But a manufacturing country, which has up to a certain point produced all the food that is required for its population, will be stopped short in the development of its manufacturing power, if from any cause whatever it cannot obtain an increased supply of food. An increased supply of food and an increased supply of raw produce are the two essential conditions, without which the manufacturing industry of a country must ultimately be limited by its own power to produce food. If the increased supply of food can be obtained from foreign countries, it is a matter of indifference to all who consume the food where it comes from; and the agriculturist himself, as far as he is a consumer of food, is benefited with the rest of the community by the greater abundance of food caused by the foreign supply and by the increased productive powers of the manufacturer. It is not necessary to determine how the increased supply of food will operate on wages or on profits, or on both: it is enough to show, that a time must come when there can be no increase in manufacturing power, if the supply of food is limited to what the country produces; and that by an addition to the supply of food an additional power is given towards the production of those articles which have reached their limit because the supply of food cannot be increased."

Our limits compel us to break off here, but we shall resume the subject.

TEETH are included in the list of small articles to be freed from duty by Sir R. Peel's proposed measure.

Three hundred articles and odd
Peel's tariff will release from duty;
And Commerce lifts her drooping head
To contemplate the offer'd booty.

And thus the Premier's scheme is rated:—

"Fool!" exclaims Commerce, full of scorn,
"Teeth" are in your financial fiction;
Grant me instead Free Trade in corn,
And deal no more in contradiction.

"Reverse your plan," the Goddess said,
And smiling stood in all her beauty;

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—By a parliamentary document it appears that the estimate of the total cost of the Westminster New Palace, according to the latest approved plan, is £928,913. 6s. 3d.

GAME FROM SCOTLAND.—It is stated, on the authority of a correspondent in one of the Dumfries papers, in alluding to the increase of poaching in Scotland, that the incredible quantity of nearly twelve tons of game left Kircudbright in one day! and that game to the amount of £400 is weekly exported by the steamers from the two counties of Kircudbright and Wigton.

INCENDIARISM.—Incendiary fires are raging to an alarming extent in Bedfordshire. About a fortnight since, a most diabolical act was perpetrated at the little village of Wingfield, near Hockliffe (where not more than three months since an incendiary destroyed two cottages, a farmhouse, a large quantity of corn, and all the farm-buildings). This fire began at a cottage outbuilding, and soon extended itself to six other cottages, two farm-houses, and all the farm-buildings, corn, &c., the whole of which were destroyed. On Saturday last an attempt was made to fire some farm buildings belonging to Mr. Smith, situated in the town of Toddington. A barn was discovered to be on fire, which fortunately was extinguished before it spread to any extent. Had it not been seen in time, nothing could have saved one-half of the town from its ravages. Two policemen are on duty in the town every night, and lodge close to the spot.—Brighton Herald.

On Tuesday evening last, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock, an alarm of fire was brought to Abington by a messenger from Llangrwyney. The engine was immediately sent, but unfortunately did not arrive till nearly all of two risks had been consumed. They were the property of Mr. Wulow, of the paper mill, Llangrwyney. It appears to have been the work of incendiaries, and suspicion attaches to two individuals, who will, most probably, be examined.—Monmouthshire Merlin.

We understand that an incendiary fire took place on one of Lord Hardwicke's farms, at Morden, in this county, on Saturday night. We have been unable to learn the particulars.—Cambridge Advertiser.

AGRICULTURE.

A CHAPTER ON LEASES.

It is now universally admitted that the condition of British agriculture is relatively much lower than that of any other department of national industry. And it is almost universally conceded, that increased security of tenure—security that where the husbandman sows he shall also reap—is a condition precedent to any general improvement in the husbandry of this country. Hence we find farmers, land-agents, and the more intelligent landowners insisting on the revival of the practice of granting leases. From the same conviction proceeds the partial advocacy of that makeshift substitute for a lease, a legal tenant-right, which has here and there appeared. So some of the best farmers' clubs and agricultural associations have discussed the advantages of leases, and the stipulations such contracts should contain, with much apt business-like talent.

The subject, however, requires much more consideration than it has yet undergone, before it can be said to have assumed any definite and practical shape. And we feel it a duty to point out to tenant-farmers the risks they run when they are induced to enter into the engagements commonly contained in leases now in use. We shall suggest some of the circumstances under which the present forms of leases have been adopted, and show the utter inadequacy of those forms to secure to the skilful farmer of the present day that full remuneration for his outlay and industry to which he is entitled.

The ordinary lease is substantially the same as that in use previously to the rise of prices and the impulse to agriculture which commenced about 1792, and it seeks by a series of minute regulations to bind the tenant to a prescribed system of cultivation which is assumed to be beneficial to the owner of the land. It goes on the assumption that the tenant, with profit to himself, exhausts the fertility of the soil, and return it to the owner exhausted and deteriorated. We by no means say this is physically impossible, but it is highly improbable; and the occurrence of such an event must be guarded against by means very different to the restrictive provisions of ordinary leases. Up to 1792 the art of husbandry had done little more than to adapt systems of management to the peculiar varieties of soils, so as to take advantage of the natural fertility of each, and to avoid as much as possible the dangers to which they were respectively exposed from variations of seasons. Thus our light lands, which by means of turnip husbandry have now become, on an average of seasons, our most productive lands, were chiefly used for the cultivation of rye and oats, or as natural pastures; while the heavier soils were as permanent pasture applied to dairy farming, or as arable land to the growth of wheat and beans. Wheat, beans, and a naked fallow was then the ordinary rotation amongst the best farmers of heavy lands, and the great object of the restrictive clauses in leases was to prevent successive grain crops without the intervention of a fallow. And up to this day the system of cultivating strong, deep land has not materially improved. The improvements which have been made, and they are considerable, have been chiefly on the lighter soils. There, however, much remains to be done to develop the real capacity of the soil for producing food.

From 1792 to 1814, a period of exorbitant and constantly advancing prices, the struggle was to get possession of land upon any terms, and no improvement in the frame of leases took place. From 1814, leases have been gradually falling into disuse, partly because the art of agriculture had outgrown the system enforced by the "usual covenants" inserted in leases; but principally on account of the fearful and ruinous consequences of the attempt, commenced in 1815, to keep up a high scale of prices by an artificial scarcity. The farmer, who, having calculated on obtaining from 80s. to 100s. a quarter for his wheat, had engaged to pay a rent estimated according to those prices, was but too glad to be able to retire from his business with the wreck of his capital when he found prices falling to less than one-half of the sums on which he had relied for profit. That state of things has continued down to the present hour, when our farmers are actually writhing under monopoly rents and natural prices. Thus, there has been no opportunity for the revision of leases; and now, it having become obvious that the Corn Laws are doomed, leases will again come into use, in some form or other, but those taken from the dusty pigeon-holes of the lawyers of 1792 are to be met with. This is particularly applicable to England, for in Scotland leases are far more rational instruments. Mr. Bacon, in his very able "Essay on the Agriculture of Norfolk," mentions the usual clause requiring the tenant of heavy land to give his land a certain number of ploughings as a main obstacle to the improved cultivation of such lands in that county; and the same sort of difficulty will be met with in some form or other in nearly every rural district.

And though farmers feel the trammels of these restrictions, so accustomed have they been to their imposition, that they scarcely venture to require the complete abrogation of them. Yet it will be found that leases must be framed upon principles altogether different from those hitherto in use. In the language of the Harleston Farmers' Club, "Skill and science must be left as much as possible unfettered, remembering that it is the interest of all parties, and more particularly of the occupier, to earn the greatest possible produce from the land at the smallest possible expense." Now, large produce at small expense is only to be obtained by one of two methods, both of which require leases, and on which the ordinary restrictions are either mischievous or inoperative. The first method is the application of large capitals by men of energy and skill, who will bring the land into a state of almost garden cultivation, and force it, by means of high farming, into a degree of fertility of which the framers of existing leases never imagined the possibility. Here all restrictions are positively mischievous; except, perhaps, a limitation of the breadth of grain to be grown during the last four years of the term. We believe that from £12 to £15 per acre will be the least amount of capital required for this method of farming. Large stocks must be kept, much artificial food purchased, and feeding for the butchers will be the chief purpose to which the farmer will direct his attention. Vast crops of grain, at a low rate of cost, will be an incident to this system. Such farmers will require to throw open their land by getting rid of timber and hedgerows; they will undertake extensive drainages, improvements by means of amalgamations of soils, and so forth. In a word, they will bring to the cultivation of land that combination of capital, energy, and knowledge which have been so largely and profitably applied to manufactures and commerce. And these are the farmers who, having proper leases, will give the highest rents.

The other way in which large produce will be obtained at small expense is merely a different application of the same principles, suitable to occupiers of less capital and enterprise. They will adopt longer rotations, and, by increasing the growth of green, root, and artificial grass crops, will be able to maintain a considerable stock of sheep and cattle on the produce of the farm alone, and thus have a much larger force of manure than at present for their grain crops. For instance, instead of one-fourth of the farm being in wheat every year, and another fourth in barley or oats, a sixth or a seventh part only will be cropped with such grain, and the remainder of the farm will be applicable to the growth of food for stock. On this system a much greater produce of wheat and barley per acre will be raised at less expense, less seed will be wanted, fewer horses required, while by a larger breadth of root crops more manual labour will be profitably employed. This is the way in which most of the present occupiers will act when prices have become natural by the abolition of the Corn Laws, and they will find their advantage in so doing. But to this course of husbandry a long lease is indispensable, and all the usual restrictive covenants are totally inapplicable. This is well known to practical agriculturists: for instance, Mr. Bacon, in his essay above mentioned, gives a comparative statement of the results of a four-course and six-course system, in the same kind of land, on a farm of 300 acres, the capital employed being the same in both cases; and the annual difference in favour of the six-course rotation amounts to £113. 15s. We believe that an eight-course rotation would on many farms be still more beneficial. This furnishes a complete solution of the difficulty by which the monopolists try to frighten farmers from the consideration of the Corn-Law question, viz., by asserting that the present race of tenants must be ruined. Never was anything more false. They have only to insist upon long and rational leases at fair rents, and then lengthen their rotations.

Under the latter system the stock kept will be principally breeding stock, and there is no way in which a farmer of moderate means can, by the exercise of judgment and care, work his farm more profitably. A comparatively small outlay in the purchase of good animals, adapted to the peculiar circumstances of his soil and climate, and care and attention in breeding from them and in rearing the produce, will very soon convince him that the avidity for grain-growing, into which the Corn Laws have betrayed him, is not the surest road to profitable farming. We had purposed some comment upon a form of lease circulated by the Vale of Evesham Agricultural Association, with a copy of which we have been favoured, and in so doing to have indicated our own views of the stipulations which should be contained in a modern lease; but want of space compels us to defer such comment until another week, when we shall give a second chapter on leases.

A LAND-AGENT ON THE GAME LAWS.

Amongst the intelligent land-agents will be found some of the most important witnesses as to the effects of the game laws on agriculture. As a specimen we extract the following passages from a letter addressed by Mr. James

Dean, of Tottenham, to the Mark-lane Express, upon the subject of Mr. Bright's committee. He says,—

"Many of the instances quoted by Mr. Bright, of injury done to crops by game—particularly hares and rabbits—would, no doubt, appear to many as exaggerations, but which, on examination, will be found to be strictly true. My own experience could abundantly prove many of them."

And he then proceeds to give several instances, saying:—

"I will state a case that has lately been arbitrated upon; one, I am sorry to say, of almost daily occurrence. A farm of 300 acres was let to a tenant from year to year, to be managed on the four-course system; the game was not reserved; 200 acres arable, 100 acres meadow and pasture. The arable adjoined the wood of a noble lord, not the owner of the land in question. The hares, and rabbits, coming from the wood, destroyed 15 acres of the wheat crop in the last year; the tenant broke it up, and sowed it with barley, keeping a tenter to protect it for some weeks. This occasioned a derangement of the four-course shift. The landlord gave the tenant notice to quit, and brought an action for damages for over-cropping, cross-cropping, and want of fallow for turnips; the damages were laid at one thousand pounds; the matter was referred to arbitration. I was referee for the landlord, and could not avoid awarding £220, chiefly because the pleadings were defective in limiting the period to a later period than was consistent with equity; had they gone a year back, the tenant could have shown 80 acres fallow, occasioned chiefly by the game. The landlord having, from the investigation, learned the true state of the case, remitted half the damage awarded, and paid all the costs. I have at this time three cases in hand: one in Sussex, one in Wiltshire, and the other in Essex; two of them for tenants, one for a landlord: but, of course, can give no particulars."

Here we have a sample of the past year's injury as occurring in the practice of one gentleman only. Mr. Dean then refers to another case in which the game became the subject of litigation in Chancery:—

"Another I may mention, about which Mr. Villiers could give the whole history, because, in his capacity of an Examiner in Chancery, he had to take the answers of myself and a great many land-surveyors to interrogatories on the matters in question. They were these: a large landowner entered into an agreement in writing with the Hon. ——— for the right of sporting over a certain manor or manors; the agreement was for a lease, in which agreement it was stipulated that the lease should contain all usual and necessary covenants. From some cause, the lessee allowed the hares and rabbits to increase to such a degree—particularly the rabbits—that the landlord became alarmed, fearing his whole rent would be absorbed in damages to his tenants; and therefore caused the rabbits to be slaughtered extensively. The lessee filed his bill for a specific performance of the agreement, which in due course was referred to the Master; when the question arose, under the term 'usual and necessary covenants,' if some limit might not be put to the accumulation of rabbits in particular. My own evidence, and that of the other parties examined, went to show that the lease should limit the excess, by reserving power to the landlord to destroy the excess, after seven days' notice to the lessee to reduce the number. At this point of the suit the landlord died, and thus put an end to the lease altogether."

Here we see the evil consequence of the existence of game and game laws. Why should a landlord, after letting his farm, retain a power of letting to a stranger a right to feed hares on the tenant's crop more than a right to feed sheep? But for the game laws, the one would be thought as unreasonable as the other. Besides do we ever hear of a landlord letting the game on a farm in his own occupation? We believe many cases will be mentioned before the committee on the game laws where landowners do not preserve on their own land, but rent a manor and the game on some other estate, whose tenants' property is destroyed without mercy. Such is the morality of game-preserving. The demoralization caused by the game laws is not confined to the agricultural labourer and the humbler classes. But, perhaps, Mr. Grantley Berkeley has, by writing under his own hand, rendered evidence on that point superfluous.

A BLOW FOR MR. BRIGHT!

(From Punch.)

The select Parliamentary Committee to be appointed at the instance of Mr. Bright, to inquire into the operation of the game laws, will probably make the grand discovery, already well known to everybody, that they tend to the demoralization of the country. Hence, we conjecture, the cry, already raised by some short-sighted people for their abolition, will be heightened. It is to be hoped, however, that the wisdom of Parliament will be in no greater hurry to reform this so-called abuse, than it has shown itself to be in to reform any other; in other words, that it will maintain it as long as ever it can. Repeat the game laws, and, as their defenders wildly ask, What are country gentlemen to do? Why, want of employment will drive them to the writing-desk or the library; and the time that might have been devoted to shooting, will be sacrificed to intellect! They will thus be degraded to the level of literary, scientific, and the like low persons. As it is, how greatly have they degenerated since the days of chivalry, in being able to read and write! But the fact is, that the demoralization of the country is the finest thing in the world for it; that is to say, for those who have any stake in it; and as for people who have not even bread—let them poach and take the consequences. Think of the vast number of labourers whom demoralization provides for in the prisons and the hulks, besides the multitudes of whom it rids the country altogether. Then, look at the large class of persons who are interested in the maintenance of the game laws. Together with the landed proprietor, we may enumerate, besides the gamekeeper, the common informer, and that most respectable sort of man vulgarly nicknamed the pettifogger—with those useful and much underpaid officials, magistrates' clerks. Let Aristocracy and its minions unite with Law and its limbs in defence of their fun and their bread against the grasping talons of Humanity. Let them strike for their rights; that is, let them give their common enemy a good "punch on the head," and let their champion, Grantley Berkeley, begin with Bright.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, March 15, 1845.

The sincerity of those who call themselves the friends of the farmer was put to the test on Thursday night, when Mr. Cobden moved for a "Select Committee to inquire into the causes and extent of the alleged agricultural distress, and into the effects of legislative protection upon the interests of land-owners, tenant-farmers, and farm-labourers." This motion afforded the members of the protection societies a fair opportunity of substantiating the assertions which they made to the farmers on the hustings and at agricultural meetings, and must have been eagerly accepted if right honourable and honourable gentlemen believed what they said. It will be remembered that, when this subject was first introduced, Mr. Stafford O'Brien declared that he would not only vote for the committee, but serve on it should the motion be granted. Since that time "a change has come o'er the spirit of his dream;" for though Mr. Cobden embodied in his motion the amendment of which Mr. Stafford O'Brien himself gave notice, that gentleman abandoned the farmers for the Premier, and voted against the motion. The love professed to the farmers was manifest to resist the soft seductions of the Treasury; Mr. S. O'Brien, like a political Lothario, abandoned his agricultural flirtation for a Ministerial courtship, and left Ceres to bewail in abandonment the superior attractions of her rival in Downing-street. The prudential morality of the old song was forgotten. Mr. Stafford O'Brien did not observe the precept—

"Tis well to be merry and wise;
Tis well to be honest and true;
Tis well to be off with the old love,
Before we are on with the new."

"The new love," or Ministerial policy, which has thus superseded the antiquated agricultural interest, manifested on Thursday night the practised arts of a finished coquette. Without metaphor, the course of the debate exhibited "the farmers' friends" in the most deplorable and pitiable condition. The command of this division of the supporters of the Ministry was given for the night to Mr. Sydney Herbert on the same principle as the junior corporal is appointed to drill the awkward squad. He was interposed to prevent the county members from exposing themselves to the hazard of debate. In the course of his speech the Secretary at War gave a very significant hint to the Commons of the constitutional weight of the opinion of Parliament in the deliberations of the Cabinet; he described the investigations of parliamentary committees as mere farces, and, as the Premier has given a pretty strong hint of his dislike of long speeches, it seems probable that the legislative functions of Parliament will sink down to the mere registration of Ministerial edicts; inquiry is declared useless and debate proscribed as inconvenient; the new gush to etiquette in the House of Commons is taken from the New Englanders' ballad at the commencement of the American war:

"Jolly men of Boston make no long orations;
Jolly men of Boston drink no strong potations;
How, wow, wow."

It is new in our parliamentary history to find all inquiry scouted as dangerous. In order to avoid any suspicion of wishing for such an investigation as would tend to the establishment of any particular opinions, Mr. Cobden distinctly offered to place the leading members of the protection societies on the committee. Mr. Stafford O'Brien, however, declared that such a committee would not be "for farmers and labourers, but for political economists." The force of this objection passes our powers of comprehension; every committee that ever sat or will sit to elicit facts must be a committee for political economists, whose chief object is the collection of facts; so that Mr. Stafford O'Brien's words simply mean that a committee cannot be for farmers and labourers if it collects facts and elicits truth. This is rather an awkward confession for the chairman of the publication-committee of the Central Protection Society, though it is in perfect accordance with the principle observed in some of their publications, and particularly in Mr. Cayley's gubbing of Adam Smith.

By their vote on Thursday night the pretended farmers' friends have declared that the farmers have no case meriting the attention of the Legislature; and they have thus given a full contradiction to the cry of agricultural distress, which they have themselves fostered and encouraged. Mr. Stafford O'Brien severely felt this dilemma, and more than once solited the great wizard of Tamworth to extricate him from his difficulties. But Sir Robert Peel took a malicious pleasure in witnessing the embarrassment into which the county members were brought by their mutinous murmurs at agricultural meetings; the agriculturists found themselves in the condition described by Hudibras:—

"And as a dog, committed close
For some offence, by chance breaks loose
And quits the clog; but all in vain,
He still drags after him the chain.
Thus, though their ankles had been quitted,
Their hearts continue still committed."

The Premier laid fast hold of the chain on Thursday night, and the hounds that had broken loose were dragged back, after some ludicrous struggles, to the Ministerial kennel. Lord Ripon, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, declared that "the whole science of Government is a perpetual struggle with difficulties;" in this science the Premier is giving a very efficient course of instruction to the farmers' friends, for he leaves them to struggle with increasing difficulties between practice and profession, unsurpassed by those which he has himself displayed in his political career.

Comment on a debate where all the argument was on one side would be superfluous. When the wife and children of Sir Walter Raleigh implored King James, on their knees, to spare the remnant of their fortunes, that they might at least have the means of subsistence from their inheritance, the reply of that despicable monarch was, "I maun ha' the land: I maun ha' it for Carr" (the basest of his minions). Sir Robert Peel has adopted the course of the profligate pedant, and when wives and children apply for remission of taxes on their food, his answer is "I maun ha' this share of your earnings: I maun ha' it for the monopolists." When such a resolution is adopted, it is no wonder that all debate should be stifled, and all inquiry resisted.

FRANCE.—DEFEAT OF THE FRENCH MINISTRY.—From the Paris papers of Monday, received by express, we learn that on a ballot on the Pension Bill that day in the Chamber of Deputies, there were for the bill, 188; against it, 201; majority against Ministers, 13.

A duel with pistols took place in the Bois de Boulogne, on Tuesday morning, between M. Dajarrier, manager and proprietor of La Presse, and M. Beauvallon, one of the editors of Le Globe, in which M. Dajarrier was mortally wounded. He expired before he could be brought home.

PORTUGAL.—A project of law for the abolition of slavery in all the Portuguese possessions, in the case of children born after the date of the promulgation of the proposed law, has been presented to the Chamber of Peers, and referred to the special anti-slavery committee. The finances of the country are stated to be in such a condition that the Government is on the eve of bankruptcy.

Poor Dr. Kaley came from Madeira to Lisbon, but failing to enlist the sympathies of Lord Howard in his cause, he betook him to his last resource, viz., to throw himself on the mercy of the Portuguese Government, to avert the impending sentence of the Relagio Court, and here he was more successful. He obtained of Senhor Gomez de Castro, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, an assurance that he might return to Madeira without fear of molestation, provided he entirely desisted for the future from disturbing the island with preaching or proselytizing; and with this assurance in his pocket, in the shape of a letter to the Madeira authorities, he set sail in the Zargo. A reprint of the Bible, in monthly parts, is announced for publication. It is the translation by Padre Antonio Pereira de Figueiredo, accompanied with notes and the Latin text; and the same that Borrow met with in the little schoolhouse at Colhares, but to be illustrated with lithographs by Portuguese artists.—Times' Lisbon Correspondent.

SWITZERLAND.—Accounts from Switzerland state that the question of the appointment of a committee of the Diet to decide on the measures to be adopted on the dispute about the Jesuits, has been carried by a majority of 124 to 94.

PIRATES IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.—OSPEND, March 5.—The Comite, De Boumge, which arrived here from Messina, 2nd inst., was fired into by pirates in three lateen-rigged craft, on the 9th ult., about 15 miles off Cape Santa Maria.

GERMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.—A deputation of the Catholic clergy of Leipzig and Dresden, headed by their Bishop, having waited on the King of Saxony to obtain the intervention of his authority against the German Catholic Church, recently formed, the King refused to interfere, stating that 19 20ths of his subjects were Protestants, and that, as the King of a constitutional state, he had sworn to secure full and entire liberty to persons of every faith.

TRUCKY.—By the latest account from Lebanon it appears that the Druses and Maronites have come to open war. The Maronites, with a force of 2000 men, attacked the Druses, and a great number of lives were lost on both sides, without any decided result either way. It was thought probable that England would be obliged to consent to the proposition, made by the Porte, of sending an armed force into the country.

LOSS OF THE PREMIER EAST INDIAMAN, AND CAPTIVITY OF THE CREW.—SINGAPORE, Dec. 26.—A communication from Sir Edward Belcher, K.C.B., of her Majesty's surveying ship Samarang, dated at Manilla, 5th inst., to the Honourable the Governor, states that a letter had reached Manilla from the commander of the Premier, which Sir Hong-Kong for Betty Balong on the 22nd of June last, for the, with a considerable quantity of copper cash on board, mentioning that the Premier had been wrecked on the 25th of July, on Palo Payang (east coast of Borneo), and that the commander and the whole of the crew were captive. The Sultan of Borneo took the commander, six Europeans, and six lascars; and the Rajah of Baloongan, as his share, had sixteen lascars. The commander attempted to escape with the six Europeans, but was retaken. The Sultan was disposed to murder him unless he ransomed the crew. The six lascars were purchased from the Sultan by a Sooloo trader, and taken to that island, where they were ransomed by Com. Wyndham of the Velocipede for 100 dollars each, and they reached Manilla by that vessel on the 30th ult. They state that the commander set fire to the vessel to prevent her falling into the hands of the pirates. Sir Edward Belcher meant to leave Manilla on the 10th inst., to proceed to the relief of the remainder of the shipwrecked persons. Sir Edward further mentions that a schooner, with a cargo worth 18,000 dollars, was cut off near Manilla (from Batangas) just before his arrival, and that accounts from Sooloo stated a brig to have been cut off. An officer and four men of the French corvette Sabine had been killed at or near Samboangan by the pirates, and that these seas were much infested by the pirates generally.

LOSS OF THE RUNNYMEDE AND THE BRITON.—The following letter from Captain Doutty of the Runnymede, referring to the loss of these vessels, previously reported, has been received by W. Dobson, Esq., the Secretary to Lloyds:—"Runnymede, South Island, off east coast of Andaman Islands.—I beg to state for your information, that on the 10th, 11th, and 12th of November, one of the most terrific hurricanes raged in this vicinity, perhaps ever experienced by man; it was totally beyond description, which, after diastimating and rendering the ship an unmanageable wreck, with only one boat saved, threw us ashore on the above island, at one o'clock in the morning of the 12th, and through the providence of Almighty God, without the loss of life. At daybreak, we saw in shore, a large bark up among the trees, which proved to be the Briton, of the Clyde, from Sydney to Calcutta, with 311 soldiers, 31 women, and 51 children, with a crew of 36 men, boats all gone. The carpenters of both ships set to work on our boat, which has been raised two streets, false-keeled, and decked, and leaves this day for assistance. We are here in all 630 people, short of provisions, and those more or less damaged. The water flows in at every tide, and everything is destroyed; in fact, one half of us have no shoes, and are without a change of linen. No lives have been lost in either case, except one man who attempted to swim ashore."

LOSS OF THE SHIP MELLISH.—Accounts were received at Lloyd's on Saturday, of the total loss of the above vessel, from China to London.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT BARBADOS.—At Southampton, on Tuesday, the Tay arrived with the Mexican and West India mails. The Tay brings accounts of the taking and trial of Santa Anna, whose sentence, it is expected, will be banishment for life; also particulars of a most destructive fire at Bridgetown, Barbadoes; nearly half the town is supposed to be destroyed; the damage is estimated at nearly half a million. The fire in Bridgetown broke out on the morning of the 4th or 5th of February, in the house of a Jew storekeeper, and was caused by a little girl, about nine years of age, playing with lucifer matches. It commenced in the part of the town principally devoted to commerce, and where the stores and houses are thickly studded. The buildings being built principally of wood, old and worm-eaten, it may be readily imagined that the fire spread with the greatest rapidity, and defied all human efforts to suppress it.

MEXICO.—The accounts of Santa Anna are, that after his attack upon Puebla he had fled with 1600 cavalry to San Antonio, and from thence he stole away in the night, with four attendants only, and left his followers in the lurch. He attempted to reach his farm, that is, his private property at Encerro, but on his way was caught by a small party of Indians, who captured and made him prisoner. He was shortly afterwards removed to the Castle of Perote. The general impression is, that he will be shortly put upon his trial, afterward banished from the country, and the whole of his property confiscated to the State.

ENGLISHMEN REDUCED TO SLAVERY AT MADAGASCAR.—The last accounts from the Mauritius state that the English Captain Croft, and his mate, Mr. Heppick, had been reduced to slavery by the Queen of Madagascar (Ranavalona), on a trumped-up charge of man-stealing. They were sold to certain slaveowners for 30 dollars each, and afterwards ransomed at that sum. Captain Kelly, in the Conway frigate, endeavoured to investigate the matter and obtain satisfaction, but the Queen boldly avowed the act, and declared that she would repeat it under similar circumstances.

DOMESTIC.

Mr. Packington has been appointed chairman of the select committee appointed to inquire into the validity of the return of Mr. Soames, for Dartmouth. The members are General Lygon, Mr. Darby, Mr. Hayter, and Mr. Parker.

We have heard upon good authority, that the Bishop of London has actually commenced proceedings against Mr. Oakeley, and that a formal notice to that effect has been sent to Mr. Oakeley by the Bishop's order.—Morning paper.

On Wednesday a commission de lunatico inquirendo was opened before Mr. Commissioner Winslow and a special jury, at the Sheriff's Court, Red Lion-square, to inquire into the state of mind of William Austin, late of the city of Milan, but now residing at Blacklands-house, Chelsea, gentleman." Evidence of the most satisfactory character having been given as to his unsound state of mind, the jury immediately returned a verdict "That William Austin was of unsound mind, and incapable of managing his affairs, and had been so since the 16th of September, 1841." The unfortunate gentleman was accepted when a child by the late Queen Caroline, and to him she bequeathed by will a portion of her property.

The third annual meeting of the Metropolitan Dispensary Association, whose chief object is to put an end to "the late-hour system" of shopkeepers, was held on Wednesday evening, in Exeter Hall, when Lord J. Russell presided. Dr. Lauckner, Mr. Payne, the Rev. B. Noel, Mr. C. Buller, M.P., and others, moved and seconded resolutions, and spoke in condemnation of the evils, physical and mental, of the late-hour system.

On Friday morning, the 7th inst., a box, containing two bars of gold, value £1000, was stolen from the luggage-train station of the Dover Railroad, at the Bricklayers Arms. The box arrived between three and four o'clock in the morning, and was deposited amongst other luggage, and at six o'clock it was missed.

A statue is to be erected to the memory of Dr. Watts, author of hymns, &c., in Abney Park Cemetery. It will be eight feet in height, exclusive of the pedestal, and will cost £300.

On Monday evening an inquest was held before Mr. Gell, at St. James's Workhouse, Poland-street, on the body of Mary Ann Thompson, aged 75. Mr. F. Tohill, surgeon, said, that on Saturday afternoon last, he was called to see the deceased, at her lodging in Hopkins-street. He found her lying upon an old mattress, covered with a few filthy rags, and in a room almost destitute of furniture. She was quite dead, and apparently had been so for eight or ten hours. His decided opinion was that she died from want of the necessities of life, viz., proper and sufficient raiment and food. From some inquiries and witness made, he learned that the deceased had been in the habit of getting her living by begging at the door of a chapel in Warwick-street, until she and other poor persons were driven away. The jury returned a verdict of "Died from want of the necessities of life."

It is the intention of the banks in Manchester to close their establishments at three o'clock, and it has been suggested that this plan might be adopted throughout the country.

The final examination of T. H. Hoeker for the murder of Mr. Delarue, took place on Tuesday. Some new evidence of importance was given by Mr. Joseph Nash, who swore that on the night of the murder he was coming in the direction of the Avenue-road, near to which it was perpetrated, when he heard the cry of "Murder," and in ten minutes after he saw the prisoner running towards him, apparently in a "flurry;" that he (Nash) asked him if he had heard the cry, to which he gave no answer, but ran on. The prisoner was fully committed for trial.

A meeting of the handemployed by Mr. Robert Gardner, at his mill in Preston, was held last week in that town, and was presided over by an operative; the object being to ascertain the results of a regulation adopted about a year ago by Mr. Gardner, of working his mill eleven hours a day instead of twelve, paying the same wages for the stinted time. From the statements made by some of the operatives and the book-keeper, it would appear that the new system had proved highly favourable to all parties. To the operatives it gave an increase of health, and caused no diminution of wages; to the master better work, and less waste on the part of the spinners. Thanks were voted to Mr. Gardner for having adopted the new system, and a resolution was carried to celebrate the event by a festival to be held on the 22nd of April next.

It is intended to hold a fancy fair and bazaar on a grand scale in the Thames Tunnel, on Monday the 17th inst., and two following days. The arches are to be illuminated with gas and variegated lamps, and various fancy devices in Chinese lamps. The shafts will be decorated with flags and evergreens, and a ball will take place in one of the arches every evening.

One of the most extensive conflagrations that has occurred for a considerable period near Kingston, took place on Monday night, on Tolworth-common, Surrey, and resulted in the destruction of from twenty to thirty acres of forest, the property of Messrs. Baker and Fuller.

The trial of John Lawell, for the murder of Sarah Hart, commenced at Aylesbury, on Wednesday, before Mr. Baron Parke. The court was densely crowded in every part, and special accommodation was provided for the reporters of the London and local press. Mr. Serjeant Byles stated the case for the Crown; and went minutely over the various particulars (already given to the public) of the circumstances attending the death of the deceased by poison, as sworn to by the surgeons who examined the body and contents of the stomach; the connexion existing between her and the prisoner; his visit to, and sudden departure from, her dwelling at Slough on the evening when she was found by her neighbours in a dying state, and other corroborative details. The examination of witnesses, and cross-examination by Mr. Fitzroy Kelly on behalf of the prisoner, lasted the whole day, and greater part of Thursday, when Mr. Kelly delivered a powerful and feeling address in his client's defence. After the examination of a number of witnesses, who gave him a good character, the court adjourned at a late hour to Friday. On Friday, after an elaborate charge from the judge, the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," and the unhappy man was sentenced to death.

The usual weekly meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday in the Conciliation Hall. The number of persons present was unusually small, and, probably in consequence of the scantiness of the attendance, the proceedings did not commence until long after the hour named in the advertisement announcing the meeting. Mr. O'Connell, Mr. O'Brien, and others, took part in the proceedings, which presented no feature of novelty or particular interest. The rent for the week was £477. 15s. 3d.

The Belfast Protestant Operative Association has met and denounced Sir Robert Peel's proposed increase to the Maynooth grant. A large body of the clergy of Armagh have petitioned against the measure; and it is expected that other meetings will be held, and petitions adopted by the Ultra-Protestants to the same effect.

The judges, now on circuit in Ireland, in their charges to the grand jury, are bearing testimony to the tranquillity that prevails; the county of Tipperary being the only striking exception to this happy state of things; but even in that county there is a decided improvement.

An action for libel was tried at the Waterford assizes last week, before Mr. Baron Lefroy and a special jury. The plaintiffs were the Messrs. Malcolms, the extensive cotton manufacturers of Portlaw, and the defendants were the proprietors of the Dublin Warder newspaper. The libel complained of consisted of a series of letters and statements published in that journal, ascribing acts of oppression to the plaintiffs in the conduct of their factory. An apology was subsequently printed in the Warder, but it was deemed unsatisfactory to the aggrieved parties. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs of £500 damages and 6d. costs.

Four persons were killed in Cork on Thursday evening last, by the falling down of a corn store on Patrick's Quay, belonging to Messrs. Burke brothers. The persons killed were Timothy Hanlon, aged 69, lard welter; James Walsh, aged 24; John Binn, 19; and Honora Griffin, 25.

THE RECIPROCITY FALLACY EXPOSED BY THE PREMIER.—In his speech on the sugar duties, on the 24th ult., Sir R. Peel, thus spoke on the subject of commercial reciprocity treaties:—"If other countries will not enter into these treaties, all that remains for us to do, is to take our own course. Without making any stipulations whatever, let us go on reducing our own duties: we may make the reductions for our own interest, trusting to the force of common sense and good example to effect that which negotiations have hitherto failed to accomplish. If in this we prove to be in error, it must be recollected that in that error we do not stand alone—we are in that respect following the example set us by other administrations. Whenever foreign countries may be induced to take that course so often and so strenuously recommended to successive Governments in this country, we shall then enjoy a double advantage; meanwhile, let us proceed as we are now doing in the important work of reducing our duties. I ask, ought we to postpone a great and important benefit to ourselves, merely because other nations do not see the advantages which they themselves would derive from following our example?"

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK LANE, Monday, March 10.—There was rather a large supply of English Wheat during last week, and we had a good supply fresh up to this morning's market; the best samples were taken off at about last week's rates, but other descriptions met a very slow sale, and some quantity remained unsold at the close. Foreign Wheat sold in retail on late terms. There was a dull sale for Malting Barley, but there was rather an improved demand from the country for other kinds at former rates. Beans and Peas the same as last week. The supply of Irish Oats was moderate, but a considerable quantity of Scotch arrived during last week; though there was a little improvement in the demand, last Monday's prices were scarcely maintained.

FRIDAY, March 14.—The supplies of English Wheat and Barley, and of Irish Oats, since Monday, are moderate. But 10,000 quarters of Oats have arrived from Scotland. There is but little stirring in the Wheat trade, though prices are on the whole firm. Barley is a dull sale, at Monday's rates. The large arrivals of Scotch Oats cause a dullness in the Oat trade generally; and for this description a reduction of 6d. per quarter must be noted. There is, however, no alteration in the price of Irish. Beans and Peas are the same as on Monday. The duty on Barley rose 1s. yesterday.

LETTERS TO THE CLERK OF THE WEATHER.

Mr. "Clerk of the Weather," don't take it amiss. That we trouble your honour with rhyme such as this; We were tempted to string a few verses together, On account of the singular state of the weather. Father Winter for such a long time has been king, That we almost began to despair of the Spring. Don't you think, "Mr. Clerk," if you tried the right stride, You could cause Father Winter to give up his reign? It thus were effected, much good would be done, And you'd greatly oblige Messrs. Mosses and Son. Then let us persuade you to make the endeavour, You know, "Mr. Clerk," you're remarkably clever; Tell Winter the next time you meet in the sky, That thousands are longing to bid him "good bye;" And pray don't forget, Sir, to lay a great stress, On Mosses and Son, and their present Spring dress. Explain, while the various facts you are stating, That the dresses for Spring are in readiness waiting! And while you descend on the dresses of Mosses, Tell Winter we all shall be glad when he closes. Of course, "Mr. Clerk," you are fully aware, That Mosses's Spring suits are remarkably rare; Yet none can assume, till the Winter is done, The charming Spring garments of Mosses and Son.

According to this statement every sliding scale has been no better than a mockery and a delusion to the producers of corn, while to the consumers each successive scheme has produced such intolerable injury that it could not be endured. No more convincing argument could be used to prove that what is vicious in its essence and its principles can never be accommodated to safe and practical working by any clever details and artistic modifications. Mr. Miles complained of the limited advances that have been made in the direction of Free Trade since the present Ministry came into power; but he unconsciously admitted the unsoundness of the protective principle by cautiously abstaining from even a hint that the Government should retrace its steps. He complained of Sir Robert Peel's change in the sliding scale, of his tariff, and of his Canada Corn Bill; yet he did not ask for the repeal of any one of these measures, but, to the great amusement and amusement of those who were not in the secret of his counsels, proposed that a portion of the county-rates should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. If these expenses should be removed from the sphere of local taxation, the management and direction of them must necessarily be taken from the local magistracy; public money must be managed by public officers, and we are far from believing that such a change would be undesirable; but sure we are that, had the Minister consented to such a change, he would have had to encounter fierce opposition from those who put Mr. Miles forward as their representative. The proposal was in fact "a sham," and nothing else; for every one knows that the last thing which the squires will part with is the system that ensures them the profits of local jobbing, the pleasures of local patronage, and the power of local influence.

Mr. Miles set himself to establish a claim to compensation for the agriculturists because the protection promised to them neither had been nor could be maintained. The answer to his motion by Sir James Graham was, in effect, that the transfer of the county-rates would give no relief to the agriculturists, and that their claim for compensation was nugatory, inasmuch as they had not been injured by the loss of the protection of which they have been deprived. On this point the Secretary for the Home Department adopted the sentiments advocated by the League, and urged the great principle on which the whole question may be said to rest, that "no amount of protection given to agriculturists could compensate the agriculturists for the lowering of wages in the manufacturing districts." In fact, the following passage from his speech is a mere echo of what has been often stated at the League meetings in Covent-garden:—

"It so happened that where he resided, and about the estate with which he was connected, though distant from either Liverpool or Manchester, all the surplus produce of the country, by the magic power of steam, could now be sent from the north of England, in a space of time incredibly short, into the very heart of the manufacturing districts. With the produce in that part of the country this state of things had given rise to a very important question, and the question with them now was, what was the state of trade throughout the country? and not what was the amount of cattle imported? He was satisfied that, as related to the great body of the graziers and producers of fat cattle in this country, it was not the apprehension of importation from abroad which should arouse their fears or disturb their feelings, but that which they had to fear was, lest the great body of the manufacturers should be reduced to poverty and destitution, which poverty and destitution were certain to reflect upon the farming interests that distress which could not exist in the experience of one class without affecting another."

Add corn to cattle, and this is a fair statement of our entire case. How Sir James Graham can reconcile it with his subsequent declaration of continued attachment to the principle of protection is a riddle of more difficult solution than any which the Sphinx ever propounded.

Lord John Russell very ably showed that all the details to which Mr. Miles had referred, tended to demonstrate the utter inefficiency of Corn Laws as a means of securing high prices. The law of 1815 failed; that of 1828 failed; and the whole of Mr. Miles's reasoning went to prove that the law of 1842 had been an equal failure. "The lottery of legislation" has given the farmers nothing but blanks. Added to this failure we must consider the ungracious position in which the lords of the soil have placed themselves; Lord John Russell dealt very tenderly with this part of the subject, but he manifestly felt how odious and even dangerous it is for the rulers of a land to be speculators in famine and traffickers in starvation. To those who live by the wages of labour the cry, "Where is our promised fifty-six shillings per quarter?" is a declaration that their food is too abundant and their comfort too great,—a demand that their meals should be stinted and their remuneration abridged in order to give the monopolist his own price for articles of consumption.

The exposure of the inconsistency—not to use any harsher term—of the pretended farmers' friends was crushing and complete; he announced to the protectionists the unwelcome fact, that the farmers and labourers were no longer deluded by the professions and sophisms of selfish monopolists:—

"But the truth was, the farmers and the labourers had a much deeper and closer intuition into these things than some of their representatives were inclined to give them credit for; they knew that the trade of farming, like other trades, could flourish only in the general prosperity of the country, and that any attempt to prop up agriculture at the expense of the rest of the community could only ultimately tend to the destruction of those who lived by their labour upon the land."

The heaviness of a debate in which men complained of distress, and at the same time declared their resolution to support the very system to which they ascribed that distress, was relieved by Mr. Disraeli's sarcastic onslaught on Sir Robert Peel's dalliance with Free Trade. Every one felt the truth of his declaration that "Protection is in the same condition now that Protestantism was in 1828," and that the emancipation of industry is as certain as the emancipation of the Catholics.

Nor was Sir Robert Peel's equivocating reply at all calculated to efface this melancholy conviction from the minds of the monopolists. The contempt with which he spoke of the Central Protection Society, and the scorn he expressed for their circular appeals, gave deeper mortification to the taxers of food than anything that has occurred this session. He, too, showed that to increase the prosperity, and therefore the powers of consumption in the manufacturing districts, was the greatest service that could possibly be rendered to the agricultural interest. His reply to the complaints of the protectionists was worthy of a Leaguer, and had he consistently maintained the principle, would have entitled him to national gratitude.

"When you say, therefore, that our measures may be calculated to increase manufacturing activity, but that the benefits of them are confined to manufacturers only, I offer you a conclusive proof that there has been a corresponding benefit conferred upon agriculture, because I show you that the demand for your produce—that portion of it too which is of the utmost importance to agriculture, namely, wheat—has been extended in a proportionate degree to the increased activity and prosperity of your manufactures."

He, in plain terms, avowed that protection was utterly indefensible on the ground of principle; and excused his own continuance of protection to colonial sugars and British corn on the score of expediency. Sir Robert Peel was too wily to point out the necessary inference from such a declaration; principle is permanent—expediency is the mere creature of circumstances, and must vary when they alter. We have, therefore, the Premier's own declaration that the sugar and corn monopolies have only a precarious existence; and we are prepared to show that the uncertainty thence arising is far more injurious to the producers than any advantage they can ever hope to derive from protection.

The whole debate gave most gratifying evidence of the progress which the doctrines of Free Trade have made; no one has ventured to reproduce any of the fallacies which were recently so fashionable—that "cheap bread would lead to low wages" has been abandoned; "dependence on foreigners" has been consigned to oblivion, and "reciprocity" is flung to the winds; the conviction that "protection is the bane of agriculture" is rapidly spreading, and taking a deeper root in the public mind. Mr. Cobden's unanswered and unanswerable speech on the evils which the system of protection has wrought to farmers and labourers has produced an incalculable effect within and without the walls of Parliament. A retrospect of the labours of the portion of the session that has been closed by the Easter recess must give great satisfaction to every lover of truth and justice: the income-tax continues a "bitter extract of sugar," and the corn monopoly is maintained by "a tyrant majority;" but the pretences which concealed their impolicy and iniquity have been demolished. No man believes them worth a three year's purchase; and even the most speculative of insurance-officers would hesitate to guarantee their existence for twelve months.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Seventh Week, ending Saturday, March 22.

There have been many memorable debates in the House of Commons between Monopoly and Free Trade; but the debate of Monday night last was, in its peculiar way, the most noticeable of them all. Had moribund Monopoly taken counsel with Free Trade, in what way it could most effectually expose its inherent meanness, shabbiness, ay, and its atrocity, no more effectual advice could have been given to it, than to proceed with the motion of Mr. WILLIAM MILES, member for East Somerset. Let no reader who did not witness the display suspect this to be the language of exaggeration. It was, indeed, a scene (as Lord JOHN RUSSELL well remarked) which all who entertain the smallest particle of regard for the aristocracy of this country might heartily wish had never been exhibited. It was not an exhibition of mere imbecility, at which superior intelligence could have smiled and turned from with pitying contempt. Mr. William Miles is not an ignorant man, nor a bad man, nor a tyrant, nor an oppressor, nor a fool. Yet he was placed (or rather had placed himself) in a position in which he was compelled to show himself as possessing all those characteristics; and in pleading the cause of agriculture he was driven to the sad necessity of evincing that organised SELFISHNESS, perceiving its pauperising indulgences eluding its grasp, is, in its last hours of despair, the dirtiest, the paltriest, and the cruellest thing that ever mocked the creation of God, or insulted the intellect of man.

The protection societies, not yet disabused of the notion that they possess influence, have been fuming and fretting themselves into the idea that they can check the tortuous advances of Sir Robert Peel towards Free Trade. They have been meeting, speaking, scribbling letters, and overawing the members who, in the House of Commons, represent the "agricultural interest." Mr. William Miles is avowedly a bovine chieftain, and a leader of the long and the short horns. He has been latterly very much on his trial with his constituents. They have suspected that underneath his waistcoat the word "SHAM" was written large. Annoyed by this suspicion, he has avowed himself resolute; and, as Sir Robert Peel, in his Budget, gave away too much to the sugar-growers to have anything to spare for the corn rack-renters, he protested that he would make such a motion as would scare the Prime Minister into a compliance with their demands.

Monday night last was the appointed day. Before the motion came on, an attempt was made to coax off Mr. William Miles, and get him to keep over his motion till after Easter. Sir Walter James said he had consulted with the "senior" member for the city of London, who had assured him that any delay in the passing of the resolutions respecting the reduction of the customs duties would be seriously detrimental to commerce and trade. When the laughter suggested by the idea of "seniority" had subsided, Mr. Masterman, the banker, got up, and avowed that he was the "elderly gentleman" referred to. But the entreaties of the elderly juvenile and the elderly gentleman were unavailing. The bold Miles knew that he had got himself into a "fix." The protection societies were watching him. No 17, Bond-street, had come down to the House, in expectation of big results. Paltering their must be none; and his motion must go on.

The equable voice of the SPEAKER was heard repeating, "That I do now leave the chair." Up rose Mr. William Miles. His motion was to this effect:—

"That it is the opinion of this House, that, in the application of surplus revenue towards relieving the burdens of the country by reduction or remission of taxation, due regard should be had to the necessity of affording relief to the agricultural interest."

A fair enough motion in its way. If the agriculturists be in distress, and be entitled to relief at the expense of the community, is it fitting and right that their case should be stated by Mr. William Miles, or any body else. The House of Commons should be the great kan of the nation; the appellate court of social wrong and distress. In a healthy body, the pain of the smallest member causes uneasiness to the whole; in a well-regulated state no class should suffer without every other class finding out the cause, and rectifying it—by placing all classes on the same equality in the eye of the law as they are in the sight of God.

Mr. William Miles made his speech; and for its purposes it seemed a very clever and a very artistic speech. There was a great display of figures. The calmness of investigation appeared to mark it. Statistics was its staple. Yet Mr. William Miles proved that figures may become edgedtools—shells that may explode in the hands of those who wish to throw them. The engineer was literally "hoisted with his own petard."

Listening to Mr. William Miles, the effect was very curious, with the eyes open, and the eyes shut. With the eyes open, you saw a comfortable-looking man, verging on fifty years of age, and whom you would not suppose capable of hurting a fly, addressing a body of gentlemen, whom you had every reason to believe constituted the HUMANITY House of Commons of the year 1845, and who would reprobate even the slightest hint of harshness or cruelty. Shutting the eyes, and "abstracting" one's self from all recollection of place or time, you heard words which might have been fitly spoken in a house of ghosts, feeding, not on dead, but, on living bodies of men. The burden of all Mr. William Miles's elaborate figures and deductions was this:—

Corn and cattle are too cheap, therefore we are in distress. EAT LESS, poor man, or we will be ruined. PAY MORE, poor man, or we can't recover from depression. CONTRACT TRADE, or we shall have to earn our own bread, instead of having to take it out of the bread of the community. CRIPPLE COMMERCE, or else agriculture must stand on its own legs, and we shall have to be content with the fair prices of honest competition. But, though we are in distress, I shan't ask you to repeal the Tariff or the Canadian Corn Act, or the other measures which we say have so lowered prices. No! that is—hopeless. But we must try and mummify the farmers a little longer. I can't for the life of me discover how relief is to be afforded, but some scheme I must discover. (Oh, I have it! Take about £250,000 off the county-rates, and put it on the Consolidated Fund, and then I can go back to Somerset, and say to the farmers (winking all the time) "Much good may it do you!")

In support of his views, Mr. William Miles went into an extensive series of figures, comparing the annual importations of foreign grain, and the average prices in low-priced years, under the Corn Act of 1823, with the average prices and the importations under the act of 1842. The present low prices of cattle and corn he traced to the measures of the Government—an opinion which coincided with that of the farmers, who, thanks to the gentlemen of the Anti-Corn-Law League, had been taught to think, and were able now to draw accurate conclusions as to the causes of their distress. In 1842 the harvest was good, but a heavy importation of foreign and colonial corn, suddenly thrown on the market in the autumn, threw down prices ruinously low. In 1843 there was a deficient harvest, and prices which, measuring the deficiency, should have been 63s., were only 48s. In 1844 the harvest was above an average, and there was no chance of the market recovering. The fall in prices, both in meat and corn, was not attributable to any panic, as he showed, by quoting

Mr. Long carried the question to a division, and was defeated by 73 to 27.

Mr. Grogan moved the omission of lard, on which a discussion arose, during which

Colonel Wyndham said he was sorry to see his agricultural friends imitating the example of the representatives of the manufacturing interest, ever jumping up, like jacks-in-the-box, preferring their claims, to the disgust of the country. The agriculturists would share in the reductions proposed by the Government; and he was surprised and sorry at their clamours. Happening to sit beside an agricultural friend when Sir Robert Peel made his financial statement, he was asked what was for them, when he replied, "There's nothing for you!" There were three Parliaments sitting outside these walls—the Conciliation humbug in Dublin, the Covent-garden League, and the little "House of Commons" at 17, Bond-street. From the latter, edicts were issued to the representatives of agricultural constituencies—which was a very great liberty. He would not bate one inch on behalf of protection: but a farmer, in the midst of his fields and cattle, could not be expected to take a comprehensive view of public interests; and therefore, at their command, he would not vote for Mr. Miles. "I am not speaking to you, gentlemen!" he said, addressing the Opposition side of the House—"I am speaking to my constituents!" If they could get a better man to represent them, as no doubt they might easily do, he would place his trust in their hands, but while he was in the House he would not be dictated to. Let us analyse this Bond-street club: it is composed of a number of country gentlemen; and a certain lord duke who pulled the strings, and moved all the "little goes." Like Polyphemus, the agriculturists had but one eye, and could see nothing but a turnip-field. He begged them to take a larger view of the interests of the country.

Lord A. Lennox, as a constituent of Colonel Wyndham's, did not think that such sentiments were likely to lead to his re-election.

Mr. Ward thanked Colonel Wyndham for the good humour, good sense, and impartiality which marked his speech. He repeated his feeling of contempt for the palsy, peddling opposition of the agriculturists.

Mr. Stafford O'Brien treated Free Trade as a system to reduce commodities to the lowest price—its only principle was cheapness.

Mr. Cobden replied that they sought abundance, which was not always synonymous with mere cheapness. In the Prayer-book they were used as convertible terms. The monopolists, on the contrary, wished for dearth and scarcity. [Being met by repeated cries of "No," he asked, "What is it, then, you do want?"] There had been lately a great improvement in the knowledge and manners of the representatives of the agriculturists; they had learned more in the last two months than in the preceding two years. How, then, had Sir John Tyrrell so lost his usual good humour as to make a personal attack? Because he was maddened by the utter absence of all argument—the consciousness of a very bad case. What a plight had the landed interest placed themselves in by their recent conduct in that House! He was going down to Lancashire, and he was sure that he would be stopped at the corner of every street with exclamations as to the pitiable exhibition of the great landed interest. He besought them to look at it themselves: all their whining and entreaties could not induce the Prime Minister to get up and defend them; and surely it was not worth their while to endure all this obloquy for any benefit they reaped from it. For his part, nothing could bribe him to submit to similar taunts and obloquy.

After some remarks from Mr. Darby, Sir Robert Peel regretted to see personal feeling mixing itself in the discussion. He defended members on his side of the House in making motions respecting matters in which their constituents were interested. Good arose from all these discussions, as they brought out explanations.

Lord John Russell admitted the propriety of this, but what was applicable to lard was equally applicable to every other article of protected agricultural produce. If the representatives of the agricultural interest wished to act honestly, they should either surrender the principle of protection to native industry, or resolutely stand by it in and out of Parliament.

Mr. Gladstone would not worry the agricultural interest with nibbling changes in order to obtain infinitesimal degrees of cheapness in articles of food. But he looked on lard as a raw material in trade and manufactures, as it might be made a substitute for sperm oil, the supply of which was diminishing, as well as other oils used for machinery, in the manufacture of soap, and so forth.

Mr. Grogan withdrew his opposition, and lard was added to the articles to be admitted duty free.

With this most amusing and instructive "divertissement" the discussion closed, leaving the "agricultural interest" in certainly the most deplorable, the most pitiable, and the most contemptible state in which it has ever yet been seen.

Both Houses of Parliament have risen for the Easter holidays—the House of Lords adjourning on Tuesday, the House of Commons on Thursday. We shall take advantage of the Easter recess to review the truly important proceedings which have taken place since the opening of the session.

THE REV. MR. ASPINALL'S SPEECH AT THE GREAT FREE-TRADE MEETING AT HULL.

The following is the eloquent speech of the Rev. James Aspinall, rector of Althorpe, at the great Free-Trade meeting at Hull, on Wednesday week, the proceedings of which occupy fourteen columns of the Hull Advertiser.

The Rev. JAMES ASPINALL, rector of Althorpe, Lincolnshire, on coming forward was hailed with enthusiastic applause. Repeated rounds of hearty cheers prevented him for some time from commencing his address. He said:—Sir William Lowthrop, Mr. Mayor, ladies, and gentlemen. Regarding the present gleam of prosperity which the country is enjoying, but as, if I may so phrase it, a kind of parenthesis in the history of the Corn Law, I shall, in the remarks which I am about to address to you, speak generally of its effect, as it was felt under the pinch from which we have just escaped, and as it will be felt again as soon as ever there is a change in the seasons and a falling away of the harvests. (Hear.) And the more deeply and seriously I ponder over the merits and objects of the great cause which we are here met to forward, the more thoroughly convinced am I that it is one which every Christian man should do his utmost to promote, and one especially for which every minister of the Church of England should most anxiously labour, unless he repudiates and rejects those portions of her services and her prayers which supplicate the Most High for "comfort" and for "plenty" for the people, and implore Him not only to give them "the fruits of the earth," but also to "increase them by His heavenly benediction." (Loud cheers.) With this conviction fully impressed upon my mind do I row, in obedience to the call of your committee, stand forward to address you on the all-important question which has brought you together. (Cheers.) And I will begin by confining my remarks, in the first instance, to the inhabitants of this great mart of commerce. Sitting with the map before me, and seeing how large a share of the increased trade with the north of Europe which the repeal of the Corn Laws must bring with it will inevitably fall to the lot of the port of Hull, I should have naturally concluded that, when you entered upon the work of agitation for Free Trade, you would have begun by being unanimous on the subject. (Hear, hear.) Or that, if there had been any exception, it might have been some solitary corn-merchant, who preferred the lottery of speculation to the steady profits and commissions of his business, or some individual warehouse-owner, who had learned to look with pleasure on rents derived from foreign wheat while waiting for the juggling tricks of the sliding scale in its operations upon the averages. (Laughter and cheers.) But beyond such specimens of selfishness—even, in their case, mistaken selfishness I believe—I should have thought that you would all have been as one man with one mind in the port of Hull. (Cheers.) The advantages which you would gain from Free Trade cannot be too highly estimated. Run them over for a moment in your own minds. Your merchants would have become the great carriers between this country and northern Europe. (Hear.) The shipping interest would be greatly benefited by it, and, to a seaport town, I need not say that the shipping interest is what the soul is to the body: it is the breath of life, life itself to it. (Cheers.) Good for the shipping interest means, then, good for everything: good for all who are connected with it, employed by it, supported by it. (Cheers.) Carpenters, sailmakers, riggers, painters, lodging-housekeepers, mechanics, artisans, labourers, all these depend directly upon it, and are, therefore, interested in its prosperity. ("Hear," and cheers.) Tradesmen and shopkeepers of all kinds are equally interested in it, although more indirectly, the only difference being that they are supported by those whom it supports. (Cheers.) Even professional men, lawyers, and doctors—(laughter)—must have a share in the harvest of the general advantage, as, with a greater population and increased wealth, there will be a wider field for the exercise of their talents and a better remuneration for them. (Hear, hear.) But, especially, as the town increases from the new impulse given to its trade, the owners of land required for building must be immense gainers. I marvel that they are not Free-Traders to a man. (Cheers.) To take land out of cultivation to sell it in building lots is positive gain.

(Hear, hear.) If you have not a gold mine, the next best thing you can have is land when it is selling, not by the acre, but by the yard. And look a little further. Those owners of the soil in a more extended circle who cannot come in for this advantage instantly will have some pretty pickings wherewith to amuse themselves in the meanwhile. ("Hear," and laughter.) As the town expands and embraces within the area of its streets fields which are now let out at enormous rents either for the grazing of cows for your supply of milk, or for feeding cattle for the butcher, their property will come in for these benefits, until, in its turn, it is swallowed up by the extending vortex of brick and mortar. These things, observe, are not possibilities and probabilities, but certainties, if the Corn Laws were repealed. (Hear, hear.) And the more I reflect upon them the more puzzled and perplexed am I to make out why there is not perfect unanimity amongst you on this point, or a unanimity only disturbed by the exceptions to which I have before alluded. But it will, I hope, come presently. (Hear, hear.) You have made a beginning, at all events, and that is a great point gained in everything. I was looking at the statue of your Wilberforce on my way hither to-day, and a thought struck me at the moment that I had read somewhere a letter describing the impression made upon the writer by the first speech he ever heard from that illustrious man. I have forgotten the exact words, but they were to this effect:—"A little man, like a shrimp, stood forth upon the table, but presently he began to speak, and then the shrimp grew, and grew, and grew until it became a whale." (Laughter and cheers.) Now, I want to see a similar growth in the Hull Anti-Corn-Law Association. (Hear.) I want to see it expand until it attains the dimensions of a leviathan, and I believe I shall before long. (Cheers.) From what I can see and hear, the cause is gaining ground among you every day. (Hear.) But it is not sufficient that you enrol your names as members of an Anti-Corn-Law Association. It is all very well to meet, and talk, and cheer each other on. But there should be a practical result. (Hear.) You must, as many of you as can manage it, become freeholders of the East Riding, so that, at the next election, you may wrest its representation from Toryism and monopoly. (Hear, hear.) Does some timid old gentleman say that such a consummation is impossible? I tell him that there is no such word as "impossible" in the vocabulary of determined men. (Cheers.) Look at Lancashire and at what has been effected there. I am a freeholder of South Lancashire myself, and, as a landowner and one living by the land, I went down at the last election to vote and protest against protection as being what Lord John Russell (honour to him for the phrase) so happily called it, the other night, "the bane of agriculture" (cheers); but I hope to go thither again before long as part and partner of the triumph which is certain to be achieved. Look also at the West Riding. One more registration, and the work will be done there also. Now, it is for Hull to head a similar movement in the East Riding; and I heard a little bird singing, but a few days ago, that if the men of Hull will only help themselves in this matter, they will have plenty of co-helpers both from the West Riding and from Lancashire itself, who will give you a very different registration before another election from that which now holds you down under the yoke of your Tory monopolists. (Cheers.) May of Hull! you must look to this forthwith. You should strengthen yourselves in the number of your freeholders that you may be sure to make a good fight of it whenever another struggle comes. Nay, you should so strengthen yourselves that there may be no fight at all, but that your opponents, appalled at the very reading of the registration, may leave you an uncontested field. (Hear.) You have, doubtless, all of you, heard the story of the poor woman who called upon an officer, not too famous for his love of the smell of gunpowder, to thank him for having saved the life of her son in some great battle. "How my good woman?" said the delighted warrior, beginning, man; "How did I save your son's life?" "Why, please your honour," was the reply, "you ran away, and he ran after you." (Loud laughter.) The moral of this is plain, I think. You must, as I observed before, so strengthen yourselves on the registration of the East Riding, that whenever an election comes, one of your opponents may run away and the other run after him, and so both of them save their time and money. (Cheers.) But, to pass generally, our cause is, I believe, rapidly making its way into the favour of the country, and public opinion in its behalf has almost reached that point when it can no longer be resisted by any Ministry. In the long run it is public opinion which decides everything, both in the Legislature and out of the Legislature, in this country. (Cheers.) There is an ancient Greek epigram on a statue of Niobe, who, according to the legend of heathen mythology, was bereft of her children and turned into a stone by the angry deities, which has been translated thus:—

"To stone the gods have chang'd her—but in vain—
The sculptor's art has made her breathe again."

This beautiful idea is an exact type of what is passing in this country on the subject of the Corn Laws at the present time. The Lords and Commons have, by class legislation, ignorantly we hope, and ignorantly we believe, doomed our trade, like Niobe, to perdition. "But in vain," Public opinion, like "the sculptor's art," in the epigram, has stepped forth to the rescue, and will, making the intended victim "breathe again," before long, we confidently trust, induce it with new life and vigour. (Cheers.) Light is even forcing its way into the darkest recesses of the rural districts. It is true that the agriculturists have now for some time been attempting on their side, by public meetings, to thwart and arrest the progress of our cause. So much the better. (Hear.) It is only by the conflict of sentiment that truth can be elicited. Besides for other reasons likewise, I looked upon it as a matter of great congratulation when I heard that the advocates of monopoly had begun to meet and to talk. (Hear.) As long as they kept a prudent silence, there might be some inclined to give them credit for some secret store of arguments, which they could produce, if they would. (Laughter and cheers.) But they have opened their mouths, and that dream has vanished. (Laughter.) For my part, after reading, and I have read, most of the speeches delivered at the Pro-Corn-Law gatherings, I should, upon a careful analysis, say, that, dividing them into twenty constituent parts, fifteen-twentieths are made up of vituperation, four of false impressions and groundless fears, and the remaining one of delusion, mistaken argument of the strongest character. (Laughter and cheers.) Now, as to the first point, that is, the vituperation which the agricultural orators are pleased to cast upon the advocates of Free Trade, I like to hear it. When a man takes a desperate language, it is a clear proof that he has a desperate cause to defend. (Cheers.) It always reminds me of people talking about the weather when they have nothing else to talk about. Goldsmith makes his Vicar of Wakefield observe, when his wife was getting the worst of it a discussion with Mr. Burchell, "The dispute grew hot while poor Deborah, instead of reasoning stronger, talked louder, and was at last obliged to take shelter from a defeat in clamour." (Laughter.) And thus it is with the Deborahs who figure at the monopolist meetings. (Laughter and cheers.) Like the excellent Mrs. Primrose, "endeavour to overwhelm us by clamour and loud talking, but, as I said before, I love to hear it. (Hear.) Captain Marryat, too, in his Diary in America, has a story that Sir Isaac Coffin once made a bet that he would have given number of gigantic lobsters of the weight of three pounds. It happened not to be in the lobster season, and the monsters were not forthcoming on the appointed day. Sir Isaac, however, not liking to lose his money, sent certain depositions to the stakeholders from fishermen on the coast, stating, that they had frequently met with lobsters of the required weight, to which this pithy answer was returned, "Depositions are not lobsters." (Laughter and cheers.) And, we may add, neither is vituperation an argument. (Cheers.) But the Deborahs of monopoly are not satisfied with loading us poor Free-Traders with the abuse. They are impartial in this line of acting. While their hand is in they even include their own leader, Sir Robert Peel, in the outpourings of their wrath. (Laughter.) Their cry against him everywhere is, "the voice of Jacob's voice, but the hands are of the hands of Esau." (Loud cheers.) As long ago, I remember, as at the Cambridge meeting, in the first array of last year, and the same sort of thing has been going on ever since, Mr. Adeare insolently told the assembled farmers that Sir Robert Peel's recent pledge, on the opening day of Parliament, that he would stand by the sliding scale, was their pledge, not his, and that they should force it from him. And then, again, there was a meeting at York, somewhere about the same time, which Lord Beaumont performed in these parts recollecting style—(laughter)—as you must all in these parts recollect that York meeting was a most terrible and tremendous affair. You have no idea how the rural swains in a neighbourhood triumphed and exulted in it. (Laughter.) With what a flourish of trumpets did they tell me, before I saw the report, that when it came out I should see what I should see and read what I should read. To me, their own phrases of Arcadian simplicity, which as I finished me that I cannot help repeating them to you. Was to be a finisher, a settler, or, as they say among the Atlantic, much more expressively, however, than actually, a tee-total snasher of us and our hopes for ever. (Laughter.) Well, at last this marvellous report of the marvellous meeting did make its appearance, and I was positively inundated with newspapers containing it, by good-natured friends, who did me the honour of thinking either that I was worth confabing or worth conversing (Laughter.) But shall I confess my ingratitude? As I have been through the proceedings, my terror and dismay have gradually evaporated, until, at length, I found myself exclaiming, in the language of the great poet of

"Now is the winter of our discontent Made glorious summer by this sun of York," to which I was base enough to add, in plain prose of my own. "I like these meetings, for the oftener such people open their mouths the more completely will they expose their weakness and badness of their cause." (Cheers.) At the meeting, also, Sir Robert Peel came in for a full share of the vituperation which was poured upon the Anti-Corn-Law Leaguers. "His Ministry," Lord Beaconsfield observed, amidst the cheers of the assembled multitude, "was an expediency Ministry," to which, with unparalleled ungraciousness, he added, that "they must look up the opinion and statement at last wrung from the Prime Minister of his intention to stand by the present law," and, farther, that they must try by all means "to keep him up to his point." Mark those three phrases—

"Back up," "Wrung," "Keep him up to his point." (Laughter.) Are they not three sweet flowers of rhetoric, any Deborah of them all to throw into the teeth of the man who is their very head and front, the very breath of the only source of strength to the party who presume to speak of him in such terms? (Hear.) But, leaving the refractory and ungrateful monopolists to settle their own differences, I would also warn the timid and the nervous and the credulous, on our side of the question, never to be led away into error by this brilliant master of language and rounded periods; never to suppose for a moment that he heartily loves Free Trade and things liberal because he now and then coquettes with them under the influence of a place-keeping expediency. (Loud cheers.) His friend, or rather his colleague, Lord Stanley, says of him, "that there is no man like him for dressing up a statement for the House of Commons." There is hardly a fallacy, however transparent, which he cannot so adorn as to make it pass current as a truth. There is hardly a sophistry, however shallow, to which he cannot impart the appearance of an argument by his fatal eloquence. Eloquence! What is eloquence when so employed? (Hear, hear.) I would rather be an automaton than possess his gift and so abuse it. (Hear.) Eloquence, all-powerful as it has ever been in directing and controlling the affairs of this world, has unhappily as often been the champion of evil as the advocate of good. It has, by turns, riveted, or snapt asunder, the chains of slavery. Its tongue has been the trumpet of glory to those who have been under the galling yoke of slavery, or it has assisted the oppressor in confirming his dominion. It has reared or cast down the ladder of ambition. It has been employed to rescue the innocent from unjust persecution, or perverted to baffle the power of the law, and snatch the criminal from his due punishment. However, therefore, it may dazzle, however it may delight, never surrender up your own sober judgment and reason to its ignis fatuus, a meteor which may lead you you know not whither, and plunge you into errors the most dangerous and opinions the most pernicious to the welfare of the country and the happiness of the people. (Cheers.) But I now pass on to another component part of the staple of the oratory delivered at the meetings of the monopolists, namely, the delusions which they promulgate under the idea that they are arguments of the most resistless character. (Hear.) One specimen will, perhaps, suffice to expose their hollowness. Some very clever person among the opponents of Free Trade, in alluding to the rapid progress of Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and other gentlemen connected with the League, from place to place, through the country, was pleased, a little time ago, thus to address his friends upon the subject: "Do not mistake ubiquity for numbers." This was at once voted by them to be "a bit, a palpable hit," the very essence and quintessence of all wisdom, and, accordingly, like a joint roasted one day, taken cold the next, and hashed the third, it has since been cooked and served up at all their meetings in every shape and way. (Laughter and cheers.) "Do not mistake ubiquity for numbers." Let us give a moment's consideration to this splendid conception. (Hear.) It is true,—and honour to them for the enthusiasm, the earnestness, the zeal, the energy, the devotion, with which they have embarked in the good cause (cheers)—it is true that the mischievous influence of monopoly, at times appeared to possess the attribute of ubiquity ascribed to them, as, with marvellous and almost miraculous celerity they have passed from town to town, and district to district, and seemed to have been here, there, and everywhere at one and the same time. (Cheers.) Still, the riddle remains unsolved. "How does ubiquity make numbers?" Do they bring you and me and all of us in their pockets to set up and bowl us down like ninepins, and then pack us up again, to carry with them for exhibition at the next place which they may visit in their tour? ("Hear," and cheers.) Do they move about, as a marching company to attend their steps, the hundreds and thousands who hail their arrival in every town, who flock to listen to them, who are drunk in their soul-thrilling and brilliant eloquence with pleasure and delight; whose minds weigh and appreciate the resistless arguments with which they address themselves to the understanding; whose hearts, as they listen upon the enthusiasm of the speakers, catch up a sympathetic and kindred spark; and whose tongues, as they raise the cheer to the very echo, proclaim that mighty is the truth, and that it shall at last prevail against every opposition? (Loud cheers.) No, no; our cause has, indeed, realized the idea of ubiquity attributed to them by its enemies; but it has numbers also—thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands, millions of the people of England enlisted in its behalf. (Loud cheers.) I will next proceed to a review of the misapprehensions and groundless fears under which the Anti-Corn-Law labour on the subject of Free Trade. To the point to be here decided is, whose question is it—of the law in its present shape carried on? (Hear, hear.) The speakers at the various agricultural meetings through the country tell us, in glowing and, as they think, triumphant language, that the question is, whether the three classes, the landlords, tenants, and labourers, if they do not exactly derive a have, according to their several stations, a coequality of interest in maintaining them. This is a pretty theory to look at. (Laughter.) I have met with something like it before. When the lion in the fable condescended to hunt in company with the other animals, and they had run down the prey, he took, in the division, the lion's share, that is, the whole. (Cheers.) Sir Walter Scott also, in his tale of the "Pirate," describes two men as drinking brandy and water together, the one, however, swallowing all the spirit and the other only sipping at the element. (Laughter and cheers.) And, in like manner, of the advantages, real or imaginary, to be obtained from the Corn Laws, the landlords, generally speaking, look for the lion's share and all the spirit. (Laughter and cheers.) Try the thing. First of all, is the question a labourer's question? Consult the great organ of Toryism, the Times newspaper. Go into Mr. Bankes's paradise, Dorsetshire, or into Devonshire, where a man's wages do not amount to more than seven or eight shillings a week for himself and his family, and where the people, to use the emphatic expression of one of themselves, do not live, but linger. (Cheers.) It is not, then, a labourer's question. But is it a tenant's question? Is draining the pond a pump's question? (Laughter and cheers.) In the story of "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves," indeed, we do read of some of the gold cleaving to the sides of the measure through which it was passed, but that is only in a tale of fiction. When we come to realities I much fear that no very great weight of the precious metal abides with the farmers of England in its passage from the land to the landlord's pockets. (Laughter and applause.) How should it, when their profits are regulated by market prices between harvest time and spring time, while their rents are fixed by the averages worked up by the blessed sliding scale between spring time and harvest time, when, in the generality of years, the speculator and the foreigner have the markets at their mercy. (Applause.) It is, then, no more a tenant's question than it is a labourer's question. (Hear, hear.) It is a landlord's question altogether, and with them is the great struggle for the overthrow of monopoly to be carried on, and tremendous will be the energies and desperate the efforts which they will put forth in its behalf. (Hear, hear.) They have made up their minds to that, you may depend upon it. They are quite determined never to be persuaded to give way. Expose any error which they have embraced on this subject, and they will straightway clasp the dear, darling, misshapen bantling to their hearts with fonder affection than ever. Drive them from any fallacy, and they will forthwith return to it and intrench themselves within it again as the very citadel of truth, admirable illustrations of the saying, that "The man convinced against his will

Is of the same opinion still,"

(applause), and firmly resolved to emulate and imitate the hero immortalized in the ballad of "Chevy Chase":—

"For Witherington needs must we wall,
As one in doleful dumps;
For, when his legs were smitten off,
He fought upon his stumps."

(Laughter and cheers.) But let me not be misunderstood when speaking of the landed gentry. I have lived much in the country, and ever found them a class worthy on many occasions of respect and admiration. Frank, noble, and free, open-hearted and open-souled, kindly neighbours, liberal and generous, I know not whither I should go beyond them for the best specimens of Englishmen, or of the human species itself, within the circle of the globe. But, nevertheless, on the subject of the Corn Laws they are blind, stone blind. (Cheers.) To them, therefore, I would now address myself for a few moments, only premising that, as a copartner in the land and agriculture of the country, I am embarked in the same ship with them, and that, sink or swim, I must meet their fate and share their lot, and that, moreover, I have no more fancy than they can have for exchanging the stout vessel of safety for a storm, a shipwreck, and the chance of escape upon a plank. (Loud applause.) I would begin, then, by observing, that the landlords generally fall into a great error by looking at the present state of things as if they had existed from eternity and would abide with us for ever. With regard to the past, they forget that it is the increase of the trade of the country which has made the land what it is in value. With reference to the future, they never consider that, if, under the mischievous influence of class legislation, the trade of the country should decline and fall away, land—that is the landed interest—will be involved in the same common ruin with it. (Applause.) It has been sometimes said that there are persons—the gluttonous and greedy ones of the earth—who "live to eat." The great majority, however, of mankind undoubtedly eat to live. (Hear.) But the manufacturing and trading population of this country not only eat that they may live themselves, but that we of the agricultural districts may live also; and the more they do eat, the better living shall we make out of them. You may, perhaps, bring the landowners up to this point with you; but their chief terrors have yet to be combated and removed. These are all centred in the idea of the fearful competition which corn of home growth will have to undergo against that of foreign countries, where land and labour are at a low figure, and where corn is, consequently, cheap, and whence it can be brought to the English market at very small freights. Now, in the face of these fears, I would ask, with Earl Spencer, "Is it not just as likely, with a Free Trade established, and the increased consumption occasioned thereby, that continental should rise to the level of English, as that English should fall to the level of continental prices?" (Cheers.) Take the points separately. "The price of land," they say, "is low." But it is advancing already, I am told, in the north of Germany, on the very strength of the agitation for Free Trade in this country. We may not doubt, then, what will be the result when Free Trade is actually achieved. "But wages are low." As land increases in value, and more of it is, consequently, brought under cultivation, the price of labour will increase with it. (Hear, hear.) "But corn is low, beyond anything with which we can compete." And why? Because the foreign growers of it can only look forward to a kind of bumper or chance trade with us for four, or five, or six weeks in the year, and that only in case the weather here should be too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry, for our own crops. (Applause.) But abolish the Corn Laws, and carry on a constant trade with them, and you will soon find a difference. (Hear.) The foreigner will no longer give away his agricultural produce when he has a steady and regular market opened to him for it in this country. (Cheers.) "But last of all, look at freights, how low they are." Yes, they are. The incubus of monopoly has done its work here also, and pressed and crushed our shipowners, at times, into such a ruinous competition that they have been almost driven to the point to which, it is said, before the introduction of railroads and steam-carriages, the opposition coaches on some of the roads were, at one period, reduced, when they would carry you fifty or a hundred miles for nothing, and give you a dinner and a bottle of wine into the bargain for honouring them with the preference. (Laughter.) But once make wider the borders of commerce, and there will be an end of such things. (Hear, hear.) Shipowners know how to take care of themselves as well as other people, and they will stand out for remunerating freights the very moment that Free Trade increases the demand for vessels. So that, in whatever point of view I look at the subject, I still and still come back to the conclusion, that the apprehensions of my brother-agriculturists and landlords, as to the overwhelming influx of low-priced foreign wheat which the repeal of the Corn Laws would bring upon us, are apprehensions founded, if I may so say, altogether upon misapprehension. (Cheers.) And, then, we must take into the account in our favour the abolition of the sugar and other monopolies which would instantly follow that of corn; while the blister of the Peel-pet income-tax would also be withdrawn, as that crutch of the deformed cripple, Monopoly, would no longer be required, if trade, standing on its own stout and healthy legs, were allowed, without let or hindrance from class legislation, to bring its contributions to the revenue from every region of the earth. ("Hear," and cheers.) And while, as I look at the question, the repeal of the Corn Laws would inflict damage upon none, upon how many would it confer advantages of inestimable value! (Hear.) The merchant, the manufacturer of every kind, the tradesman in every branch, the shopkeeper, the mechanic: all these would derive great and immediate benefit from the change. ("Hear, hear," and applause.) But, above all and before all, it would be a gain and a blessing to the masses of our working and manufacturing population. By increasing the demand for labour, it would stimulate energies which are now too often rusting from the want of employment, and give occupation to industry, which at times is useless, because unused, like gold hid in its mine in the bowels of the earth. (Hear, hear.) And with this individual happiness national security is closely allied. There is an old proverb, telling us, "that when poverty comes in at the door love flies out of the window," which Cobbett, somewhere in his "Cottage Economy," has thus expressed in his own emphatic Saxon: "Food in a house is a great source of harmony." (Laughter and cheers.) It is and, upon a more extended scale, it has the same effect in a country. (Hear.) It is the best police you can have. (Cheers.) There is no standing army equal to it. (Cheers.) The masses of the population can never remain discontented under a Government which bombards them, not with joints of meat "in theory" and loaves "in the abstract," but with bond fide, real beef and mutton, and actual bread: that is, in other words, which, by increasing trade, brings the means of obtaining such things within their reach. (Loud cheers.) But the picture expands before me. Free Trade would not only be a national good, but it would be more: it would be a benefit conferred upon mankind at large. (Hear.) Trade has ever been the pioneer of civilization, which has followed closely in its track, as it has won on its way from nation to nation in its progress through the world. (Hear.) It is, moreover, the herald and harbinger of Christianity wherever it appears. (Hear, hear.) Let it penetrate, with its white sails, to the farthest isles of the ocean; let it reach, in its spirit of undaunted enterprise, the most remote recesses of the desert and the wilderness, there forthwith will the missionaries of the Gospel stand side by side with it, and, unfurling the banner of the Cross, proclaim the way of truth and life to the heathen and the savage, who, before, have only,

"With untutor'd mind,
Seen God in clouds, or heard him in the wind."

(Cheers.) Trade also, in the end, with a power more resistless than that of kings and an influence which puts to shame all the diplomacy of statesmen, will prove itself to be the great pacificator and harmonizer of the world. (Applause.) Encircling the globe with a chain of self-interest and mutual advantage united, of which every nation will form a link, it will bind all mankind in friendship and amity together, so that at last they will be persuaded "to beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks," and no longer war one against another, as in days gone by, at the bidding of pride or the call of wild and frantic ambition. (Cheers.) Such, so various and so many, are the advantages which are involved in the success of the great question which we are all so anxious to promote. And here, while on this part of the subject, I would claim—and I speak not only of the men of the League, but of all those illustrious names whose hearts are with us here—I would claim their due praise for those who have led us on to the point which our cause has reached, and who will, we trust, continue to lead us until final success has crowned their efforts. (Cheers.) Upon them, when that time comes, will the blessings of the people be showered as the real and most substantial benefactors of their country. (Applause.) There will be a distinction far beyond the blaze of titled rank or worldly honours; theirs will be an abiding and never-fading renown and glory, in comparison with which the laurel of the conqueror becomes as a chaplet of sear and yellow leaves, and the sceptre of the monarch shrinks into an empty bauble; theirs are the names which deserve the reverence of their fellow-men, and to be written in letters of gold in the best and brightest page of the history of nations. (Cheers.) But, to return to the question before us in the few more words which I shall address to you. Are not the benefits and blessings which Free Trade promises to bestow upon the country worth struggling and striving for to the very utmost of our energies and exertions? They are, they are, indeed. (Cheers.) And, in preparing to make the efforts which our cause deserves, let us at the same time fairly take into our calculations the difficulties which yet remain for us to overcome. (Hear, hear.) Many, however, and great as they are, they are trifling, weighed against those which have been already surmounted, and they are as nothing when compared with the magnitude of the prize which is at stake. (Cheers.) They are enough to inspire zeal, but not to excite fear. They are sufficient to stimulate activity, but not to awaken despair. Despair! Who talks of despair, when even to doubt would be treason to our good and righteous cause? (Cheers.) It would be to distrust that Omnipotent Being who gives His sun to shine upon us, and sends the former and the latter rain to fertilize the earth, and crowns the year with the coming harvest, to suppose that He will always look on, an unconcerned spectator, while short-sighted mortals arrogate to themselves the power of controlling His providence and limiting His mercies to mankind. (Cheers.) Yea, it would be to disbelieve and reject the heaven-taught prayer, for "our daily bread," to imagine, for a single moment, that He, who sits on His throne on high, and who, of old, fed His people in the wilderness with manna, and sent the ravens to carry meat to His prophets, will for ever allow the supplications of His servants to remain unanswered and His promised gifts to be intercepted by—shall I say, the more than mischievous or less than impious legislation of men? (Loud cheers.) Let us, then, not only with every aspiration for success, but with every trust and confidence that it is not now far off, press on to achieve it. We have, as I said before, struggled against mightier odds than those which are now opposed to us. We have toiled through the desert, where all was dreary and desolate around us, and where we should have sunk down in despair but that the star of hope, like the sacred fire on Horeb, shone through the darkness to guide and cheer us on our way. (Applause.) We have held on our course until we have climbed the lofty elevation of the mount from which we behold the land of promise spread out before us in all its inviting loveliness and fertility, and with the descent to it comparatively easy. (Cheers.) Forward, until we plant our feet firmly upon its rich and luxuriant soil. (Cheers.) Forward, until the banner of success floats in triumph over it. (Cheers.) The fruits of victory are even now almost within our reach, and, presently, our outstretched hands will grasp them. (The eloquent and rev. gentleman then sat down amidst the most rapturous cheers, which were continued, at intervals, long after he had resumed his seat.)

MEETING AT STEYNING.

On the 17th inst., Mr. Falvey delivered an address in the Market-room, Steyning, Sussex. We cannot find room for a report of the proceedings; but a correspondent who was present has written to us, and from his letter we extract the following:—

"Brighton, March 18.

"I cannot let this morning's post go without a line to tell you about our glorious meeting at Steyning last night. It was the two-weeks market, and many of the farmers stopped. The room was well filled by ten minutes after six; and when Falvey began he was received with hisses, and 'Oh, oh!' &c. &c., and it was some time before he could obtain a hearing. The hubbub, however, gradually subsided, and the people became attentive, when he was determinedly interrupted by a young man, a farmer Hampton of Appleton, who wished to put questions to him. It was ultimately arranged that Falvey should not exceed one hour more in delivering his address, and that then he would enter upon a discussion with any one the farmers present chose to appoint. At the conclusion of his address each party nominated a chairman, and Mr. Hampton was appointed to conduct the defence. Both parties were limited to a quarter of an hour each. The discussion was conducted with good feeling; and it was gratifying to see how ably Falvey met the arguments of his opponent, and how well his replies told upon the meeting. Their champion managed their cause very well for a bad one. He is evidently used to speaking at protection meetings, and writes articles for the Sussex Express, the county protection organ. The room, which was the Market-room, was crowded—I should suppose at least 300 people—and, with the exception of the seventeen who went from here, nearly the whole were farmers and farm-labourers, and many large, substantial men amongst them. At the conclusion a good sweeping Free-Trade resolution was carried triumphantly, about a dozen or a score of hands only being held up against it, and a crowd for it; after which we had a vote of thanks for Falvey, which he had fully earned; then three good cheers for the League; and the meeting separated at half-past nine, many of the audience requesting him to come again. It was decidedly the best meeting ever held in Sussex, and the most likely to have effect. I have much pleasure in bearing my testimony to the cool, deliberate manner in which Falvey meets opposition, and the able way in which he defends his arguments. He has given great satisfaction in these parts."

MONOPOLIST DOINGS AT GLOUCESTER.

At the meeting of farmers and others held last year at Gloucester, attended by Mr. Cobden, and presided over by Lord Dule, the former gentleman stated that the expense of importing a quarter of wheat from Dantzic, including freight, insurance, and all other charges, amounted on an average to 10s. Mr. Biddle, a protectionist dealer and, we believe, miller of the neighbourhood, stoutly asserted that the expense of freight and insurance averaged only 5s. a quarter; and he publicly challenged Mr. Sturge, the eminent corn-merchant, who had corroborated Mr. Cobden's statement, to refute him, offering to stake £50 on the issue. This piece of empty swagger was exactly calculated to captivate those two notorious personages, Messrs. Peter Matthews and John Long, who commenced a subscription amongst their followers to reward Mr. Biddle with a piece of plate, which was presented to him at a meeting, the proceedings at which drew the following letter from Mr. Sturge:—

"To the Editor of the Gloucester Journal.

"My attention has been called to the proceedings of a meeting held at the Spread Eagle, on Tuesday, the 25th ult., as reported in Saturday's Gloucester Chronicle. I think it is due to an impartial public that I should make a few observations, that they may not be misled by the statements there made, as one object of the meeting appears to have been to make an attack upon me. As to the remarks of Peter Matthews and John Long, the chairman and vice-chairman, and their imputations, they are so unworthy the station in life they profess to fill that I should feel it as a degradation to enter into any controversy with them; besides, I suffer from their aspersions in good company, for the truly noble Earl Ducie has fared no better at their hands; and they have their reward, for it cannot be doubted that the recent dissolution of the Farmers' Club was in a great measure caused by the violent language and conduct lately exhibited by these parties. As respects my friend John Biddle, the case is very different,—I have received nothing in the shape of insult from him; but his much-talked-of challenge was, that the freight and insurance on wheat from Dantzic was only 5s. per quarter. In this we are exactly agreed, and of course there could be no dispute between us about it; but, mark me, he will not admit there are any other expenses or charges in importing foreign wheat than freight and insurance; on this, we are at issue; but, such being the case, any farther argument with him on the subject would be an idle waste of words. But I am fully prepared to prove the accuracy of my statements of cost in the freight and other charges of importing Dantzic wheat, to the satisfaction of any impartial persons. The actual charges on a large quantity of Dantzic wheat imported into Gloucester last summer were as under:—

	Per Quarter.
Freight	s. d.
Sound dues	4 6
Insurance	0 6
Shipping charges, mats, dunnage, &c.	0 6
Canal tonnage	0 9
Landing charges at Gloucester	0 6
Interest on advances before the wheat can be sold	0 6
Loss from salt-water, damage, not covered by insurance, heating during the voyage, and short measure	0 3
Merchants' commission in Dantzic and in England	2 0

"Besides this, I suppose no sane person can be ignorant that the wheat does not grow on the quays or in the warehouses at Dantzic! It is brought from the interior of the country, at distances of from three to seven hundred miles from the place, and further expenses to the amount of many shillings per quarter are incurred after it leaves the estates where it grows; so that the home grower possesses advantages in prices, in his own market, over the foreign producer to a far greater extent than the sum above stated. I am, very respectfully,

"Gloucester, March 3."

"T. M. STURGE."

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

The following is the list of "Farmers' Friends" who voted against Mr. Cobden's motion for inquiry into the causes of the agricultural distress which they pretend to deplore, but dare not investigate.

LONDON BAZAAR PROCEEDINGS.

LONDON LADIES' BAZAAR COMMITTEE MEETING.

On Wednesday last a general meeting of ladies from the various local committees of London was held at No. 20, New-street, for the purpose of forming a general committee of superintendence for the metropolitan districts. There were upwards of fifty ladies present. Interesting reports were made of what was doing in some of the suburbs of the metropolis and many of the central districts, from which it appeared that great activity and zeal were manifesting themselves, and the ladies were busily at work in efficiently promoting the success of the Bazaar.

Plans of the Theatre Royal, Covent-garden, with the coloured designs of the intended decorations, were exhibited, the splendour and beauty of which excited great admiration.

The necessary arrangements for systematizing operations in the various districts were discussed and determined upon; and the ladies seemed to vie with each other in their anxiety to give practical effect to the proposed means of organization and cooperation. (Canvasing committees were formed to wait upon and solicit contributions from the friends of the cause, in most of the suburban districts of the metropolis. The following are the names of ladies who have engaged to act as secretaries in their own localities, and to receive contributions from, or give information to parties who may be desirous of aiding in any way the success of the Bazaar.)

Mrs. Bauer, Balham-terrace, Balham.

Mrs. Cogan, Upper-mall, Hammersmith.

Miss Eckett, Argyle-square, New-road.

Mrs. William Hampton, Albany-street (Regent's-park).

Mrs. Jenkyns, Byng-place, Torrington-square.

Mrs. Lucas, Pembroke-square, Kensington.

Mrs. Lewis, 113, Strand.

Miss Linthorne, 15, Vassal-road, North Brixton.

Mrs. Price, 7, Highbury-terrace.

Miss Phelps, Winchester-place, Pentonville.

Mrs. Poulter, Harder-lane, Peckham.

Miss Rhoades, Vine-street, Minories.

Mrs. Taylor, 38, Arlington-street, Camden-town.

Mrs. P. A. Taylor, jun., Cheapside.

Mrs. J. L. Wheeler, 45, Gloucester-place, Kenilworth.

LADIES' MEETING AT PECKHAM.

A morning meeting of ladies, resident in Camberwell and Peckham, was held on Thursday, in the lecture-room, Hill-street, Peckham, for the purpose of hearing an address from Mr. George Thompson, in explanation of the objects of the Free-Trade Bazaar, to be held in Covent-garden Theatre, in May next. The meeting was most respectable and numerous. On the motion of Mr. Farrah, a member of the Society of Friends, Mr. J. A. Lyson, of Camberwell, took the chair. Mr. George Thompson delivered an eloquent and impressive address on the great national objects which the League have in view in promulgating the principles of Free Trade with the nations of the world. He impressed upon his auditory that the time for holding the Bazaar was fast approaching, and that, as the intervening space was short, the necessity for active co-operation on their part was in proportion great. Mr. A. L. Saul, of the League, then spoke, and further elucidated the advantages which would arise to the country from the adoption of Free Trade, whose principles he explained. A ladies' committee for the districts of Camberwell and Peckham, with power to add to their number, was then formed, and the meeting separated.

LONDON GENERAL BAZAAR COMMITTEE.

On Thursday evening a meeting was held in the Grand Room of the League Offices, 69, Fleet-street, for the purpose of forming a General Bazaar Committee for London. The large room was crowded; and amongst the gentlemen present were observed Major-General Briggs, Captain Cogan, Ralph Ricardo, Esq., Samuel Lucas, Esq., W. Wilson, Esq., Samuel Hickson, Esq., David Deane, Esq., and many of the principal friends of the League from the different boroughs and districts of the metropolis.

Mr. A. W. Paulton took the chair, and opened the business of the meeting by shortly explaining the plan of operations that had been adopted in Manchester, and other large towns of the kingdom. The accounts from all parts of the country justified the most sanguine expectations. A spirit of zeal and emulation existed that promised to make the exhibition one of the most brilliant and attractive ever witnessed on any similar occasion, and it was hoped that the Free-Traders of London would contribute to its success and magnificence on a scale worthy of the metropolis of the empire.

The main business of the evening was the formation of sub-committees of gentlemen to undertake the canvass of the various trades, and request contributions of their respective articles of sale or manufacture. Ten committees were formed, each taking a separate trade, and engaging to canvass them systematically.

It was resolved, also, that a circular should be addressed from the Committee to the chairmen and secretaries of each of the Metropolitan Anti-Corn-Law Associations, requesting them to convene a special meeting of their members and friends, to institute a similar organization within their respective districts, and appoint canvassing committees to wait upon and solicit contributions from the various trades and manufactures throughout the different boroughs.

As it is obvious, however, that there are many manufactures and trades carried on in the neighbourhood of London capable of supplying articles well suited to the Bazaar, for which no canvassing committees have yet been appointed, it is requested that all persons able and willing to render assistance in this way will attend the next meeting of the committee. Gentlemen who are not able to attend, but who are willing to join canvassing committees, are requested to send their names to the Committee, at 67, Fleet-street, together with any suggestions they may think useful, which will receive every attention.

The Committee will meet again on Thursday next, at seven o'clock.

MEETING AT UXBRIDGE.

On the 12th inst., a numerous and respectable Anti-Corn-Law meeting was held at Uxbridge. The chair was taken by HENRY HULL, Esq., who made some forcible remarks on the question of Free Trade.

Colonel THOMPSON, who, on coming forward, was loudly cheered, spoke with his usual felicity on the general question, and enforced the claims of the Bazaar, especially on the female portion of his auditory.

ROBERT WILKINS, Esq., proposed the appointment of a committee of ladies.

GEORGE THOMPSON, Esq., in an eloquent speech, seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

A committee of ladies, consisting of the wives and daughters of some of the most influential men in the town, was then formed; and after the usual votes of thanks the meeting separated.

Colonel Thompson's speech gave so much pleasure and satisfaction that the Uxbridge Association have concluded to publish it.

BRADFORD.

On Monday night a meeting of Free-Traders was held in the large room of the Exchange-buildings, for the purpose of meeting a deputation from the Anti-Corn-Law League, consisting of Colonel Thompson and Mr. Robert R. Moore, who attended to afford information as to the operations of the League, and especially respecting the Bazaar. The meeting was numerous and respectfully attended. George Oxley, Esq., was voted to the chair, and in commencing the meeting announced the object which had called them together.

Colonel THOMPSON and Mr. MOORE severally addressed the meeting, and were loudly cheered.

The Rev. WALTER SCOTT proposed a resolution, nominating a committee of gentlemen to collect subscriptions of articles or money for the Bazaar.

T. BRAUNTON, Esq., seconded the resolution, which was agreed to.

After a vote of thanks to the chairman, which that gentleman duly acknowledged, the meeting broke up.—Abridged from the Bradford Observer.

LEEDS.

On Wednesday evening there was a well-attended meeting held at the Music-hall, Leeds, to forward the Bazaar. HENRY STANFIELD, Esq., presided. Able speeches were delivered by Colonel Thompson, Robert R. Moore, Esq., and others; and a resolution to support the Bazaar was passed with acclamation.

TEA PARTY AT HALIFAX.

A tea party, in aid of the Great League Bazaar, was held in the large and handsome room of the Odd Fellows' Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 19th inst. The room was splendidly and tastefully decorated for the occasion, and the tea, cakes, &c., were provided by the ladies of the committee, each lady furnishing one tray for twelve persons. A party of about 150 sat down to tea; and the proceedings were enlivened by the attendance of Mr. W. Taylor and an excellent quadrille band. After tea visitors were admitted, at sixpence each, and the room was most respectably filled. The chair was ably occupied by Jonathan Akroyd, Esq., president of the Halifax Anti-Corn-Law Association; and the meeting was addressed by W. Morris, Esq.; Francis Crossley, Esq.; the venerable "Cavalier," Colonel Thompson; T. Flint, Esq., of Leeds; Robt. R. Moore, Esq.; Joseph Thorp, Esq.; J. T. Clay, Esq., of Rattrick, &c. &c. Numerous contributions to the Bazaar were promised, and a ladies' committee formed. It was announced that the committee would meet on the following afternoon for despatch of business. The most enthusiastic feeling in favour of the great object of the meeting was manifested throughout the evening. The meeting broke up about ten o'clock, after having passed a vote of thanks to Colonel Thompson, Mr. Moore, and Mr. Flint, for their attendance and speeches; having also given three cheers for the chairman, and three cheers for those ladies who had furnished the trays.

THE MINISTRY, THE FREE-TRADERS, AND THE FARMERS' FRIENDS.

(From the (Delft) Northern Whig.)

A debate of an extraordinary and very important kind took place in the House of Commons, on Thursday evening. Mr. Cobden appeared as the advocate of justice to the agriculturists; and the bucolic gentlemen utterly deserted the cause of that party.

At an early period of the session, the member for Stockport referred to the numerous complaints which were made about the depressed and distressing condition of the farmers; and stated, that he hoped some of the gentlemen belonging to the agricultural interest would move for an inquiry, promising, at the same time, that if, after a reasonable interval of delay, the matter were not so taken up, he would himself move on the subject.

In accordance with this promise, and as the agricultural members appeared to be "fighting shy," Mr. Cobden proceeded, on Thursday evening last, to fulfil his promise, by moving for a committee to inquire into the causes of the alleged existing agricultural distress, and into the effects of legislative protection upon the interests of landowners, tenant-farmers, and farm-labourers. Here was a proposition which, one would have supposed, must command the acquiescence of every man in the House who holds that the farmers, and so forth, are suffering, from whatever cause. And if the country gentlemen in general believe what they say, they hold that it is in the power of the Legislature to alleviate, or even remove, the distress of which they complain. They assume, also, to be especially concerned for the prosperity of the farmers, and still more, if that be possible, for the comforts of the farm-servants. Well, here was just the case for them. What are the causes of agricultural distress? Do those gentlemen wish to have them investigated, and stated, with a view to their removal? We must not, of course, doubt this. Do they wish the farmers to prosper? Oh! as to that, their own interests, if we are to believe themselves, are of a merely secondary description. Well, then, they could not object to having the unfortunate case of such parties examined. Lastly, do they desire that the hard-worked and honest farm-servants should be made more comfortable? The answer is, according to themselves, that there is scarcely one thing on this wide earth that they desire so much. Behold, then!—here is an inquiry: will they consent? Not they! They at once object, and vote stolidly and doggedly against it.

But, perhaps, as the motion was made by a Free-Trader, there was something dangerous in it. That can scarcely be urged, seeing that the Free-Trader was quite willing to let the matter be taken up by one of the agricultural gentlemen themselves—one of the "farmers' friends." No such person, however, seemed disposed for the work; and, of course, there was no good ground for suspicion, when Mr. Cobden at length interfered. Still, as he was the mover, perhaps the committee would have been a partial one—a committee packed with Free-Traders. Even if it had been so, it would have been practicable and easy for the agricultural party to produce their witnesses, and make out their case, which they would have us believe is so strong. But what was the proposal actually made? That the majority of the members of the committee should be chosen, not from among the Free-Traders, but from the opposite side.

"Let them," said Mr. Cobden, addressing himself to the agricultural party, "place a majority of their own members upon that committee—he would assent at once to that." This was taking away all plausible excuse or pretext from them, if they were not prepared to put themselves in a position in which they must stand before the country, either as betrayers of the farmers of England, or as men who know that inquiry and truth are not convenient, because they believe that their case is bad. But, in this position they have placed themselves. They talk loudly, at farmers' dinners and from the hustings, about their determination to right the wrongs of the farmers and labourers; yet, here, when they are challenged to inquiry—when the sufferings of the agriculturists are admitted by Mr. Cobden—for that admission is a part of his case—they shrink back, and refuse to afford an opportunity for having witnesses called forward, in order that the whole matter may be impartially and fully investigated; and that, too, when it is proposed to them to have the nomination of the majority of the members of the committee!

Mr. Cobden tried, though in vain, to arouse the spirit of the agricultural members:—"He could not believe that, after the experience they had had, the country gentlemen would longer remain a mere drum-head in the hands of the Premier, giving out empty sounds as he struck, but having no voices of their own. No, they were the aristocracy of England, whose fathers had led the country for many centuries; and they might themselves long continue to lead it, if they only took the right way." They were not to be roused by any such appeal into a manly bearing. They are a crouching, spiritless set, trembling at the apprehension even of fair and full inquiry; and, whilst they privately rail at Sir Robert Peel, they cower before him. Mr. Bright described the Premier and them, very well, by repeating the story of the Irish horse-tamer:—

"He thought the right honourable baronet exercised too much influence, in taming down honourable gentlemen opposite. At agricultural meetings, they could speak out most valiantly; but in that House they were mute. Surely it was no enviable reputation they were thus acquiring—that of being great in the field, and little in the Senate. The influence the right honourable baronet had over the hon. gentlemen by whom he was supported reminded him (and he could compare it to nothing else) of an Irish story, of a man who had a great talent for taming horses. When he went to tame a horse, he went into the stable, and it was supposed he whispered in the animal's ear; and, such was the influence of his voice, that, however vicious, however fiery and ungovernable before, he immediately afterwards became the most docile, tractable, and useful animal possible. ('Hear,' and laughter.) And so it was with the right honourable baronet, and the country gentlemen around him; when they were in the country, they were most fiery and untractable; but the moment they came into that House the influence of the right hon. baronet's voice was such, that the most tractable and useful supporter any Minister could wish to have was, a thorough-going agricultural member. (Cheers and laughter.)"

The truth seems to be so proved and proclaimed, with respect to those tamed gentlemen, that it will be wonderful, indeed, if the public place further confidence in them. They are either the most arrant of fiction-mongers, in their intercourse with the agricultural population, deluding and delving them with respect to their condition and its causes, or they are most heartless betrayers of them, to suit the political convenience of themselves and their master. This debate will do more, we believe, than anything that has for a long time occurred, to blow up the imposture of protection, and the injurious influence of those individuals who falsely lay claim to the title of "farmers' friends," whilst in fact they are their worst foes.

A most remarkable circumstance connected with this debate, is the course taken by Ministers. Notwithstanding the ability and effect—an effect acknowledged on both sides of the House—with which Mr. Cobden brought forward his motion, and notwithstanding the eloquence and power with which Lord Howick, Mr. Bright, and

Mr. Villiers supported it, the only official man who spoke on the other side was the new Secretary-at-War, Mr. S. Herbert, who spoke after Mr. Cobden; and if his speech was valuable for anything, it was for showing the strength of his opponents, and his own weakness. In his difficulty, he turned petulantly (it might be deplorably) upon the agriculturists, and said:—"He must confess, as the representative of an agricultural constituency, that there was something to him very distasteful in the agriculturists coming whining to Parliament on every occasion when any distress befel them."

The "whining" agriculturists will not fail to appreciate this compliment from the only member of the Government who condescended to speak in the debate. And if they do come "whining to Parliament," who taught them to do so? Men like Mr. Sidney Herbert, who, from a blind, stupid desire to put money into their own purses, told the farmers that their prosperity depended upon protection. How dare he first join in teaching them this lesson, and then turn insolently round upon them with his exasperating taunt? We hope, however, that the taunt will not be lost upon them; but that it will lead them to think, at the same time, of the hollowiness of their professing friends, and of the necessity of turning away from men who have so misled and deceived them, and trusting to their own freed energies.

THE BAZAAR.

WHITEHAVEN.—This great device in aid of the League funds—and which will be at the same time a grand display of the mechanical skill of our artisans, and of the natural resources of the country—is to open in May. Though, in this locality, there may not be much done in the way of combined effort, yet we may remind the friends of Free Trade that individual contributions will be acceptable. The mineral and marine resources of the county, which abound in this locality, may furnish something; and there are various ways in which the great object in view may be promoted, especially by our fair readers, which if sent to our office will be duly forwarded to the committee of management.—Whitehaven Herald.

OPERATIVES' CONTRIBUTIONS.—As we understand there are many operatives who would willingly give their time in preparing specimens of their genius for the Bazaar, but who at the same time cannot afford to purchase materials, we may state that the Preston committee are willing in such cases to furnish the materials that may be required. And, as the committee meet every Monday night, we would recommend the operatives to make application for such help.—Preston Guardian.

SHEFFIELD.—We have the pleasure to state that, at the meeting of the committee on Wednesday evening, Mr. Hargreaves handed in the handsome sum of £20, contributed in aid of the League by a voluntary subscription among the table-knife grinders. This liberal trade contributed last year, in the same manner, £25. The committee acknowledged the donation by a unanimous and hearty vote of thanks.—Sheffield Independent.

LEEDS.—We understand that during Thursday Mr. Moore and Mr. Birchall were canvassing some of the leading manufacturers and merchants of Leeds, and that there is every reason to expect that Leeds will not be behind the other towns in the West Riding. The Bazaar, as an exhibition of national resources, is of national importance, and should receive national support.—Leeds Mercury.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.—The ladies of Ashton-under-Lyne, Stalybridge, Dukinfield, Denton, and the surrounding neighbourhood, are at present fully engaged in their endeavours to maintain their position for liberality to the cause of Free Trade. The towns and villages in this part have been divided into districts, and ladies appointed to each, to solicit contributions in money, work, &c., for the forthcoming Bazaar, shortly to be held in London.

BRIGHTON.—A mixed committee of ladies and gentlemen has this week been formed in Brighton to promote this national undertaking.—Brighton Guardian.

CONVICTION OF A FARMER FOR POISONING GAME.

—At York Castle, on Friday last, before John Clough, Esq., and W. D. T. Duesbery, Esq., John Reynard, of Skipwith, farmer, was charged with having put arsenic in a certain field called "Hag Field," in his occupation, as tenant to Lord Wenlock, with intent to destroy the game thereon. The field adjoins upon two woods, in the parish of Easingwold, which were well stocked with pheasants. On the 8th of January last, the defendant was seen by John Remison, one of the gamekeepers, to be sowing wheat on the field, and subsequently he found several pheasants, which had died from the effects of the poison. The crop of corn had been drilled several weeks previously to the defendant scattering this wheat. On the 12th of January, Remison gathered up some of the wheat, and gave it, along with the dead pheasants, to Sigus, another of his lordship's gamekeepers, who also found some dead game. —Mr. Barker, of York, surgeon, proved that he had examined the wheat taken from the crops of the dead game, and also that gathered in Hag Field by Remison; he found it strongly impregnated with arsenic, so that any bird eating it would die in six or eight hours afterwards. The magistrate convicted the defendant, who was fined £10 and costs; in default of payment within ten days, to be imprisoned in Bevelley House of Correction for three calendar months to hard labour.

INCENDIARY FIRES.—Thursday afternoon the inhabitants of Clapham were suddenly alarmed by the outbreak of a fire upon Clapham-common, known as Battersea Manor. It originated in one of the plantations of furze, the property of Earl Spencer, and before it could be extinguished nearly two acres of furze, very thick, and some eight feet high, were consumed. A number of workmen, with a strong muster of the police belonging to the V division, hastened to the scene of conflagration, and at once set to work in cutting a roadway, in which they succeeded, and thereby prevented the flames from making greater havoc. That the fire was the work of some evil-disposed person, not the least doubt remains.—On Monday night, a wheat-mow, belonging to Mr. Pike, of Lewsey, Wilts, was maliciously set on fire, and from which the flames afterwards communicated to another mow standing on an adjoining farm, in the occupation of Mr. Allen. The devastation also extended to other property contiguous situated, and before it could be arrested the destruction was considerable. A man was apprehended the following day on suspicion of being the incendiary, and was taken before the magistrates at Devizes, and remanded for further inquiry.—Bath Chronicle.

NORTH LONSDALE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—A correspondent writes:—"The North Lonsdale Agricultural Society is all but dead; the tenant-farmers cannot be persuaded to put down their cash, and the circular lately sent from the Central Society has been of no effect."—Lancaster Guardian.

FUNCTION OF PARLIAMENTARY OPPOSITION.—We cannot help thinking there is some mistake as to the function of honest Opposition. That function, in our view, is, on all occasions, to put forth the right principles of measures. They cannot expect, and need not desire, to supersede those of the parties officially responsible, or even to alter them much in detail. They may fairly expect, in those measures. But they should sacrifice no jot of their principles, by supporting policy founded on other principles. They should miss no opportunity of presenting them in contrast, wherever they are contrasted. Only in this way can the public ever be taught preference for those which are really preferable. The function of Opposition is neither paltry nibbling, nor factious obstruction. But it is steady declaration of general views, on every subject involving them. Numerical strength, or immediate prospects, should have no influence on this mode of action. While a minority, they have simply to consult their convictions what course of policy is the best practicable.—Globe.

COTTON FACTORIES IN THE UNITED STATES.—A large factory commenced operations in St. Louis, Mobile, during the month of January, being the pioneer in that quarter. John Bull is respectfully informed that the Yankees have established one at Buffalo, New York, for supplying the British Colonies on the lakes with cheap sheetings. It is moved by steam power. The company has a capital of 50,000 dollars. The building is 50 by 90 ft. exclusive of the engine-house. It will give employment to 200 persons, and the cotton will be brought to the factory, from the west, through rivers, canals, and lakes. The company promise to furnish brown sheetings, batting, and wicking, as cheap as the Eastern manufacturers. They will turn out 15,000 yards of cloth per week. Miscellaneous also has entered the list of manufacturing states; together with Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina. What does honest John Bull think of his Corn Laws now?—New York Sun.

DEATH OF SIR THOMAS POTTER.

Just as we were going to press we received, with deep sorrow, the account of the death of that long-tried friend of the people, Sir Thomas Potter, who expired at his residence, Buile-hill, near Manchester, on Thursday morning. For more than thirty years the name of this estimable gentleman was associated, in Manchester, with every object of local or national advantage;—his time, his toil, and his purse were freely given to forward the cause of truth and justice, and to defend the rights of the poor when menaced by private oppression or public wrong. Through evil report and through good report he maintained the great principles of civil and religious liberty, and of commercial freedom; exhibiting the same firmness in the dark days of Sidmouth and Castlereagh that he displayed in the later season of comparative liberality. He has gone down to his grave full of years and of honour, respected by the wise, mourned by the good, and eulogised by the honest. A new generation in Manchester enjoys the fruits of his toils, for to him that town is mainly indebted for the best part of its municipal institutions. But his richest boon to his townsmen was his noble example of unswerving integrity and uncompromising rectitude; through this, "being dead he yet speaketh;" for, to use the words of Grattan, "the example of the patriot, like the preaching of the prophet, will not die with the holy man, but will survive him."

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXIV.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD HOWICK, M.P., &c. &c.

MY LORD,—Your able speech in support of Mr. Cobden's motion for a Committee of Inquiry into the effects of Legislative Protection upon the interests of landowners, tenant-farmers, and farm-labourers, has excited peculiar attention with many readers, by its allusion to the state of your own mind upon the subject of the Corn Laws. Always averse to the policy of "protection," and convinced of its inexpediency, you nevertheless describe yourself as not having been, until lately, adequately impressed with the deep and fearful character of the mischief which that system produces, and its incompatibility with the precepts of religion. Discussion has not been lost upon you. The multitude of facts brought to light has not been disregarded. Your own reflectiveness has not been idle; and you have continued to study the question, not only as a legislator responsible to your constituents, but as a moral agent responsible to the most awful tribunal. To your views, thus elevated, impolicy has darkened into wickedness. While you gazed, the mask of "protection" fell off and exposed cupidity; and even cupidity itself proved but another mask of the system, which fell off and exposed the guilty features of injustice. The speech to which I refer is not only one of the most cogent of arguments against a fallacy, but also one of the most solemn protests against a crime.

The sincere and earnest manner in which you indicate the progress of your mind, as to its perception of the real character of the question at issue, is most likely to be appreciated by putting your own words before the reader. They demand more than that fugitive attention commonly bestowed on newspaper reports, and will sink into the minds of many whose habitual modes of thought dispose them rather to moral and religious views of a question which is often only presented amid a mass of statistical details:—

"It was in vain that they could hope to benefit, still less to vindicate, the owners of land, if they refused to go into a committee for the purpose of meeting and rebutting the charges made against them. They never could stand acquitted before the world if they refused to meet their adversaries hand to hand in the close quarters of a committee. If they refused that, they would lay themselves open to the charge of contending that the 'labourer was not worthy of his hire.' Ever since he enjoyed the honour of a seat in that House he had always held the opinions to which he had that night given expression; but it was not till within the last two or three years that he had begun to view them in so very serious a light as they now presented themselves to his mind. It was not until lately that he had seen how grievously these laws infringed the sacred precepts of the divine law. When, however, he looked a little more closely at the state of the matter—when he viewed the awful phenomena which society in this country presented—he could not but see that one of the worst symptoms of our daily-increasing misery was the violent contrasts between the higher and the lower classes—between the condition of the wealthy and the poverty of the mass. If hon. gentlemen opposite doubted the existence of that poverty, let them agree to a committee. It was too hard that, while the rentals of the country gentlemen were doubled—as they had been within the last century—while the whole scale of living in almost every class of society had been inconceivably improved—while those of the middle ranks enjoyed luxuries to which that class were strangers 50 years ago,—though rents were doubled and trebled, the agricultural labourer was now in a worse condition than he had ever been—plucked by want and enduring every physical privation. When he looked at these things—when he remembered that gentlemen opposite were bent on keeping up men" while they kept down wages—he could not help asking them whether the awful words applied to the rich man, in the days of the Apostles, might not now be applied to the ruling classes in this country—“BEHOLD THE HIRE OF THE LABOURERS WHO HAVE REAPED DOWN YOUR FIELDS, WHICH IS OF YOU KEPT BACK BY FRAUD, CRIETH; AND THE CRIES OF THEM WHICH HAVE REAPED HATH ENTERED INTO THE EAR OF THE LORD OF SABAOOTH.”

There is a double process, my lord, in society, by which many have arrived at this combined conviction of the impolicy and the iniquity of monopolist legislation. Some have traversed a similar route with your lordship. They began with the economy of the question, and advanced towards its morality. Perhaps, in the first instance, they merely felt the personal pinching of a particular grievance. The Corn Laws diminished their business, and distressed their work-people. They found law, as the idler found a lion, in the way, and shouted to scare it from the path of their industry. The very resistance stimulated their minds to farther inquiry. They soon encountered fellow-sufferers, more than they had calculated, and antagonist classes stronger than they had anticipated. Like a blind man tracing with his hand the form of some unexpected obstacle, they groped this way and that, up and down and around, until the monstrous dimensions and heavy pressure of the mischief were embraced in their contemplation. In this process they have studied the statistics not only of exports and imports, but of pauperism and disease, crime and mortality. The discussion has been an intellectual and moral training, qualifying them to sympathise with your solemn appeal as a Christian legislator. Others, unaccustomed to the disquisitions of political economy, have started from the opposite point of the compass. It shocked them that any human beings should deprecate the bounty of Divine Providence, that plenty and cheapness should be gloomily regarded and artificially avoided; that food should be repelled from our shores while multitudes were famishing; and that fertile lands abroad should lie uncultivated lest the price of produce at home should be diminished in the market. This class of thinkers had a different set of fallacies to surmount. Bewildered awhile about “national independence,” the “untaxed foreigner,” “steadiness of price,” &c., they have been prevented, by the continued discussion, from settling in a patched-up compromise between the laws of morality and the laws of monopoly. They have learned that the right is not the impracticable; that justice for the poor is not ruin to the rich; that unrighteous privileges are not a wise policy; nor political economy at any variance, but in full accordance, with the dictates of religion and humanity. These two classes are the main divisions of the Anti-Corn-Law League; the one represented by the great manufacturers of the North, and the other by the (WM) preachers of the Gospel who assembled in Manchester to testify their co-operation. The commercial intelligence of society responds to the one, and its religious principle to the other. Their combination is the moral strength of the League. And the heart of both thrills with one common feeling of satisfaction at your lordship’s truly statesmanlike and Christian declaration.

It is an unseemly exhibition, that in a British House of Commons the serious and reverent citation of scripture, on a moral topic, should be rudely put aside as cant of the Cromwellian age, and only characteristic of the ranters; and yet this is merely the natural tendency of the inverted morality of Monopoly. Four nights afterwards, Mr. Miles was reckoning up as grievances and evils that the quantity of meat in the country had been increased by a few hundred head of foreign oxen; that so much corn had found its way into the country; and that the price of wheat had not been higher than it actually was by some 25 per cent. What stuff the man’s heart and conscience must be made of, who affirms the people to have more meat and more bread than they ought to have, and at a cheaper rate, I will not pretend to say. The reason is obvious why such persons, or their coadjutors, should dislike the citation of scripture. They transpose its blessings and its curses. They ask a legislative defence against the bounty of Providence. They murmur that food can anywhere be produced cheaply. They make it dear should it approach our shores. They do so, in the hope of making their own produce dear also, although the purchase of a sufficiency be still beyond the reach of multitudes. They obstruct that increase of home-grown food which might be stimulated by foreign competition. The labourer starves under their system, and the farmer is bankrupt; still they persevere. Between the Christian’s prayer, and the earth’s Saviour, their perceptions are dulled to the difference between the word of God and the cant of Cromwell.

“The foreigners are now bringing their cattle to market,” says Mr. Miles dolorously. He has not seen that the labouring millions have too much meat. What is this paltry addition, compared with the notorious want of the means of subsistence? The farm-labourers rarely taste meat. Importation has brought it an inch nearer to their mouths, leaving it still at the distance of a mile. Our supply of the necessities of life is deficient. And yet the law is framed for the diminution of supply. You have applied this argument, my lord, to the sugar duties. You have shown that the country pays as much for 18 tons as would purchase 28 tons. “There is a diminished supply of sugar, of coffee, of meat, of timber for building the poor man’s cottage—of everything that the poor man wants; and this went through the whole circle of our protective duties. In that way, there is a diminished supply, and thus are the labouring population pinched.” True, my lord; and if not pinched for the profit of the landlord, then assuredly for the benefit of no one living being in the wide world.

The tone which your lordship has taken in this discussion is the more gratifying because a degree of confidence is felt in your earnestness, consistency, and superiority to party spirit, which is rarely rendered to public men, especially of late years. Your political career has afforded honourable instances of an adhesion to principle at the expense of a disregard of Parliamentary tactics. The expediency you consult is that broad expediency which coincides with right. Your arguments are truths to your own mind, and not the counters of a game to be played with political opponents. Entitled by your position and proved ability to look forward to high office hereafter, you lay out no lines to catch support from different classes by ambiguous promises. By straightforwardness, you win reliance for the present, and hope for the future. The confidence attracted by your personal qualities and conduct is enhanced by the prestige of hereditary character and patriotism. The country is not unmindful of one whose word was ever held of more worth than oftentimes would have been the affidavits of a whole cabinet. It gratefully remembers the struggles and the triumphs of the Father for political reform; and hopefully rejoices to see the Son championing commercial reform. Persevere, my lord, in this noble warfare; continue to identify the morality of the question with its policy; and demand of the House of Commons its allegiance to eternal justice, as well as its regard for the public interest. You have created a power which looks to you for guidance. You have excited an expectancy which promises for the nation a much-needed deliverance, and for yourself the purest glory. The path is open before you to a prouder eminence than mere party leadership could ever attain. Rest not till the laws of the land are reformed, and the laws of Heaven are obeyed, by the abolition of an unjust, pestiferous, and demoralizing monopoly; and then inherit the blessings of a thankful people. From no hands would that good be received more gladly, as by none could it be more fitly bestowed.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

VICTIMS OF PROTECTION.—LETTERS TO INDIVIDUAL SUFFERERS.

FOURTH LETTER.

To the Rev. Thomas Skipworth, Rector of Pickwell, in the county of Leicester.

REVEREND SIR,—“Protection is the bane of agriculture,” so says Lord John Russell; “Protection is a delusion,” so says many an agriculturist who once believed in its truthfulness; “Protection is the will-o’-the-wisp, which is ever deluding the farmers, and leading them where they should not go, deterring them from following the lights they should follow—the light of agricultural science,” so says your humble servant.

Sir, you are, it is exceedingly probable, a reader of the Church organ, the Standard, and of such papers only; you are probably a believer in the so-called “protection,” and a believer in whatever the newspapers of your party say of the opponents of protection. I will, therefore, in sending you a copy of the LEAGUE paper which contains this letter, send you the previous number of it, containing the speech of the honourable member for Stockport, delivered in the House of Commons on the 13th inst., descriptive of the evil effects of protection; and I beg of you to read that speech. As a practical agriculturist myself, and acquainted with the state of agriculture and the condition of the farmers in almost every county of England, I agree with everything said in that speech. You will see from it, should you not have already learned the fact, that the Free-Traders are the best friends of agriculture. You will perceive that it proves that to be true of all England generally, which you allege to be true of your own glebe particularly—that a larger expenditure of money in changing the culture of the soil would enlarge the profit of the cultivator. You will see that the doctrine taught by Mr. Cobden, as regards the evil of restricting the enterprise of the cultivators of the soil, by making them entirely dependent on the will and caprice and ignorance of the men of law who manage most of the English estates as agents under the landlords—you will see that this doctrine, laid down on Thursday night in the Commons’ House of Parliament, was the same as you sought to establish next day, on the Friday morning, in the Rolls’ Court, before Lord Langdale. The only difference between you and the honourable member is, that he attempted to (do that for twenty millions of acres of land which you attempted to do for twenty acres. He attempted to liberate from the thralldom of insecurity and poverty, and bad cultivation, the major part of all England and Wales. You attempted to do the same for your own glebe.

It seems you were appointed to the living in 1814; that, subsequent to that period, the Duke of St. Alban’s purchased the patronage of the living. It seems the glebe has been used as a pasture; but has become next to worthless, being overrun with moss and weedy foulness. You asked the advice of a skilful agriculturist, who very properly advised you to plough it up; to clear it of weeds; to crop it for some years; to manure it, and again lay it down in grass. It is quite possible, indeed I think it very likely, that a different course of treatment might have been used more effectually, seeing that your design was to restore the glebe to pasturage. Being overgrown with moss it is very likely that an application of hot lime, applied as a top-dressing, would have eradicated the moss by destroying all vegetation for a year; or it is possible that some other kind of top-dressing might have effected the same end. But this cannot be alleged positively unless one had a local knowledge of the soil, the subsoil, the rocks beneath, and such like matters. And here I may remark that the difficulty of determining what is right and what is wrong, in such cases, is one of the reasons why the occupiers of land should not be subjected, as they now are, to rules laid down by lawyers who have no practical knowledge of agriculture; to rules which apply to whole estates of great magnitude, the soils and subsoils and requirements of which are exceedingly various, and the treatment of which should be as various; rules which are the offspring of law, and not of agricultural science, even though administered by agents who are sometimes professed agriculturists.

Lord Langdale, in your case, seems more inclined to judge it by the rule of common sense than by any rule of the statutes. He inclines to follow Liebig, the chemist of agriculture, rather than Blackstone, the commentator of law. His lordship is thus reported:—“He had (himself) had occasion to obtain agricultural advice; and he could say that, having followed it, he had found it most advantageous.” That is, his lordship had used the science of agriculture instead of the science of law to his land, as you attempted to do to your glebe. This good sense is creditable to his lordship as a lawyer. But Mr. Parkinson, agent of the Duke of St. Alban’s, being accustomed to rule the culture of the duke’s estate by law, and not by agricultural science; being accustomed to keep the tenantry in leading-strings by protecting them; being accustomed to keep everything out of their reach that might lead to enterprise and experiment, by laying down the law to them as to what they shall do on their farms, and what they shall not do; being accustomed to threaten them that they will not be protected if they dare to think or act as cultivators for themselves;—being accustomed thus to treat the tenantry, he has proceeded thus to treat you, though you are a life freeholder of your glebe.

The law of the case as applied to the incumbent of a living I shall not inquire into. While I write, Lord Langdale has not given his judgment. But he has remarked that, though the case be of no great importance in itself, it is of great importance as regards the effects its decision will have on the occupiers of other glebe lands. He said: “If the law was as alleged, it would prevent the incumbent from making a potato ground or an orchard upon the glebe when he could not show that at some former time the grass land had been broken up.”

But this case opens other questions to our view of infinitely greater importance, as regards the laws under which the farmers are bound and held down, powerless to do good for themselves, for the land they occupy, and for the multitudes who must be content with the small amount of food they produce.

Law is the primary subject for an English farmer to study. It is the Alpha and Omega of English agriculture. The late James Hogg, the “Ettrick Shepherd,” left Scotland at one time to take charge of an agricultural project in England, but did not remain long. When asked why he had left it, he said he was not qualified to manage a farm in England. And when it was said that he had surely as good a knowledge of the best manner of breeding and feeding flocks as any man in either Scotland or England; and as good a knowledge of farming matters in general; he replied that such might be true, but the first thing required in England to make a successful farmer was not a practical knowledge of breeding and rearing and feeding sheep and cattle, of manuring and cropping land. Every qualification, he said, of an agricultural kind, was entirely subordinate to a knowledge of law. And he said the laws affecting the cultivator of the soil were so numerous, so completely interwoven into everything which a farmer could do; and the lawyers were so keen-scented and so plentiful—the estates being almost entirely committed to the management of lawyers,—that it was next to hopeless for a stranger to learn the laws which beset him and hindered him in all his actions; utterly hopeless, before a stranger, led by common sense and agricultural science, would break through them and incur ruinous penalties.

In this way you have been caught by the net-work of the law. Mr. Parkinson, the duke’s agent, heard that your glebe, being overgrown with worthless moss and weeds, was about to be restored to fertility and usefulness; full of that spirit of protection which controls the tenant-farmers, he stepped forward to protect your weeds and worthless moss; to protect your glebe from being made fertile and profitable. He stood forward to protect it from having moneyed capital and manure applied to its cultivation. He stood forward to protect those labourers whom you would have employed in ploughing and digging and weeding, from being employed to plough and dig and weed. He stepped forward to protect the paupers, who, it may be, are now living on prison fare within the workhouse walls, from being liberated and elevated to the dignity of working for honourable bread by honourable and useful labour. He, full of protection, and in the full flow of protection, the everyday current of the protective spirit, arrested you, by an injunction of a court of law, from raising more human food from your acres than they now produced.

The advantage to the occupier of the land; the advantage to the labourers who have not enough of work, and who, being more plentiful than their work, are obliged to submit to the lowest amount of pay and of food which will sustain life; the advantage to the general consumers of agricultural produce, who augment their consumption as the supply and their ability to buy increase;—all these, and also the advantage to agricultural science, were at once arrested by Mr. Parkinson, the duke's agent, who brought the law which binds the tenant-farmers to arrest and bind and tie you, and make you powerless and helpless, as the tenant-farmers are, miserable men!

He who is, at the duke's instance, as other agents are at the instance of other dukes and of other landlords, the man who is first to lead the tenants to the hustings to vote for protection; who is the first to bid them declare in dolorous whine, that they cannot cultivate their land if they be not protected; who bids them cry out that they are in distress, and who, to make them cry the louder, pinches them behind as the whining beggar pinches the alleged motherless baby whom he has stolen, and professes to fondle to impose on the public: this same Mr. Parkinson, and those whose office is like his, are the first to prevent the farmers from cultivating their land to relieve themselves from distress.

It was laid down as an axiom by Sir John Sinclair in his "Code of Agriculture," and repeated by Brown of Markie, the first and long-continued editor of the "Farmer's Magazine," a thoroughly practical and successful tenant-farmer; repeated also by Jackson of Pennyquick in his excellent treatise; repeated and acted upon by the best experimentalists in England, and most successful practicalists in Scotland;—the axiom is this:—

"Assuming always that the expenditure on a farm be directed with judgment, it will be found that the profit upon the outlay increases in more than a proportionate degree to its amount. Thus, suppose that £5 be the lowest and £10 the highest sum that can be employed in the common culture of the same acre of land; it is more than probable that, if the £5 return at the rate of five per cent., the £10 will yield twenty per cent., or any intermediate sum at the same progressive ratio. Now, admitting this to be true—and it is to be presumed that no experienced agriculturist will doubt it—it follows that £1000, expended in the cultivation of 200 acres, will only yield a profit of £100; while if applied to no more than 100 acres it would produce £200. For this reason, although a farmer of limited capital may not be driven to the extremity we have already supposed, and although he may be able to carry on his business with a certain degree of advantage, it is quite evident that his profit would be increased by diminishing the quantity of his land."

(See "Treatise on Agricultural and Dairy Husbandry," by James Jackson, of Pennyquick; the successful competitor for some of the Highland Society's prizes as a practical writer. This valuable treatise is published in the "People's Edition," by the Messrs. Chambers, at the low figure of 2s. 3d. It should be carefully read wherever a spade or a plough penetrates the ground, or wherever a scythe or a cow crops the grass. And particularly where the Mr. Parkinsons of England interfere with their absurdity to keep moneyed capital out of agriculture, and lay enterprise prostrate.)

But what is the use of either knowledge or money upon such estates as that of the Duke of St. Alban's? The tenants are not rich in knowledge and moneyed capital. They have had no means of obtaining either. But had they both they could not use them. All their attention is turned to protection by act of Parliament. They are but puppets in the agent's hands. He leads them by the nose and squeezes them, and bids them whine and cry out for help.

If they would help themselves, they would break up some of their wet meadows to drain the wetness from them; to eradicate the rushes and make the soil sweet and fertile which is now sour and barren. But the agent steps up and says, "No, you mustn't. Let the wetness and sourness and rushes alone."

The tenants may see the huge banks between the double hedges; also the ditches and superfluous hedgerows: they may see that all of them are nurseries of stagnation, touthers, and vermin; and exceedingly wasteful in horse labour in ploughing, by the frequent turnings and unavoidable trampling of the ground. But if they offer to cut a branch of the hedge, or build and cover in a ditch, or dig down a useless bank, the agent comes and says, "No, you mustn't."

They see their old pastures overgrown as your glebe is with moss, and like you they may be told by skillful agriculturists to plough them up and clear them of weeds, and crop and manure them and lay them down to grass again.

But the agent says, "No, you mustn't." And if he found them offering to do it he would not go to the expense of getting an injunction at law, as in your case: he would at once expel them from the land. Had your reverence been a rector-at-will, removable by the duke, your case would never have come before Lord Langdale. You would have been at once turned out of your parish, a terrible warning to all rectors.

Should the tenantry see the trees standing round their fields, and in their fields as they very frequently do, injuring five acres out of twenty, defrauding the crops of the requisite sunshine and free air; and should they seek leave to cut some of them down, or to lop their branches, the agent says, "No, you mustn't."

Should they be persuaded of the truth of the established fact, that to feed cattle in the yard to produce manure, is the foundation of all good husbandry; and that cattle should not waste their grass, their manure, and their fat by running at liberty in the fields—save milk cows and young cattle; and the latter may be more profitably reared on farms unsuited to the culture of corn;—should the tenantry be convinced of these established truths, and offer to raise food for yard-feeding where they now have meadows, the agent says, "No, you mustn't."

Should the farmers say the liquid manures they can thus save from their cattle will be equal—over all England in one year—to the whole of the guano of Ichaboe when the first ship loaded at it; and, further, that they require the erection of cisterns or tanks to preserve the whole accumulations, or some chemical apparatus to extract the ammonia; and that they will apply one year's or two years' rent to such works, the agent says, "No, you mustn't."

If they say that they are too poor to erect such works at their own expense; or that, having the money, they cannot venture to expend it on works of improvement without the security of a lease; and that they must have leases to enable those to obtain money who have it not to improve their land, and to enable those to lay plans for future profit who have money, the agent says, "No, you mustn't."

If the farmers urge that they could thus employ many more labourers than they now employ; that they could give full work and better wages to every labourer, had they leave to do to their farms what they think best, the agent says, "No, you mustn't."

If the farmers urge that all other persons engaged in trade conduct their business as they think fit, adopting any improvements they may deem advantageous, trying any experiments they may deem profitable; on the same principle that the tailor makes a coat from whatever cloth he thinks best fitted for a coat, and makes one in a new style when he chooses; or on the same principle that a manufacturer works up his raw material into whatever kind of goods there is most demand for;—if the farmers urge that the whole success of trade, and of tradesmen of every degree, depends on their freedom of enterprise, and the comparative security with which their money is invested in business; and they, the farmers, ask to be secured in the profits of their own business in a similar way, the duke's Mr. Parkinson, or any other landlord's Mr. Parkinson, says, "No, you mustn't."

It is "No, you mustn't" to everything asked or attempted. "You are protected," say the Parkinsons. "You must get more protection if you can; or at all events cry lustily about your distress and keep what you have got." And, to say the truth, the great bulk of the tenantry follow this advice, and are exceedingly well contented to live without an effort to make themselves independent and their farms fruitful and profitable.

They might very well ask what protection has done for them; they might point out the fact that the Corn Law allows corn to come in, if it comes at all, just at harvest when prices are highest, and the English farmer cannot take advantage of such prices. They might show that under the Corn Law their losses are greater by sudden fluctuations than they ever could be by steady prices, even though those prices stood at what they are now—45s.; they might very well point to the ruinous price they pay the landlords for their protection, by being bound as they now are hand and foot, led by the nose by one agent, pinched behind their backs by another; obliged to pay high poor-rates to maintain a pauper population whom they cannot employ; compelled to endure game, and pay for the crimes and punishments arising from game, because they dare not complain; compelled to be put to all manner of mean uses in political prostitution; and, worst of all, while everybody else advances with the intellectual spirit of the age, they remain hopelessly and helplessly behind.

POSTSCRIPT.—LORD LANGDALE'S DECISION.
His lordship decided the case, "The Duke of St. Alban's v. Skipworth," on Monday. And he has removed the injunction, affirming the right of an incumbent to break up his glebe, should it be in old grass, if he so chooses.

What a blessing to England if Cheshire and some ten or twelve other counties could be so broken up, and put to profitable uses!

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

TO MOTHERS OF FAMILIES.

No. 1.—To the Wife of Francis Horlock, of —, in Dorsetshire.

Mrs. HORLOCK.—You are the wife of an industrious man, who loses no time—wastes no money. You have kept an exact account of your incomings and outgoings for a year; and as you have allowed that excellent clergyman, the Honourable and Reverend Sidney Godolphin Osborne, to make the items public, I shall take the liberty of addressing you thus publicly, as the first of several mothers, in different parts of the kingdom, to whom I shall probably write a series of letters.

You live in a county remarkable for its production of butter—Dorset. The Vale of Blackmoor is said to produce the best butter in England. At all events, "Dorset butter" is well known.

Now, butter is what is called "protected;" that is, no foreign butter is allowed to come into England, lest it should reduce the price of English butter. It may be introduced, and is introduced, in large quantities; but before it leaves the docks where it is landed from the ships which bring it across the sea, it is mixed with tar, to prevent its being used as human food.

I perceive that, from the 1st of January to the 11th of December, 1843, just forty-nine weeks, you paid the following sums for butter, for the use of yourself, husband, and four children. On the 15th of January you paid 81.; 9th of February, 4d.; 13th of March, 4d.; April, nothing; 3rd of May, 6d.; June, nothing; 5th of July, 6d.; August, nothing; September, nothing; 23rd of October, 6d.; 13th of November, 4½d.; 3rd of December, 6d. Total, 3s. 8½d.

Three shillings and eightpence halfpenny, Mrs. Horlock, is the sum of what you contribute to the "butter interest" of Dorset. At 9d. per lb. this is very nearly five pounds weight; but you are well aware that, as a general rule in Dorset, you cannot buy butter at 9d. per lb. It costs you from 11d. to 13d., fully one penny per lb. more than the same butter is retailed for when it reaches London. This, to many people, seems a mystery; but it is accounted for in this way, that the dairy-farmers will not sell quarter pounds and half pounds of butter, such as you buy once a month, or once in two months. You must get it from the village shopkeeper, who, selling small quantities, and few of them, must charge a higher price, and must often give uncertain credit.

Your reason for buying so little butter is simply that all the family earnings are spent on something else, which with you is more absolutely requisite than butter. Butter is an absolute necessary of life to everybody who can afford it. And in such a family as yours we need not doubt that it would be an indispensable necessary were you able to get it, and use it always.

Butter is, what the lords and gentlemen who come out of Dorset to Parliament call protected. And it is protected for the sake of the labourers,—so those lords and gentlemen say,—that is, the tar is mixed with the butter which comes in ships to make it unfit to be eaten, and all for the sake of you and your family, and such as you.

The gentlemen of the Parliament were making a law on this subject on Wednesday last. One of them Mr. Bramston, of Skreens, in Essex, was afraid that if grease was admitted free of duty, butter would come into this country in the disguise of grease. Sir George Clerk, of Pennyquick, in Scotland, who is one of the Government members, said, to console Mr. Bramston,

"That, so far from the agriculturists" (I am now giving his words as reported in the daily newspapers of Thursday morning) "being injured by the remission of this duty (on grease) they would be benefited, seeing that the uses to which it was put were agricultural. For instance, large quantities of it were made use of by the sheep-farmers of the north, for the purposes of smearing their sheep as a precaution against the effects of cold. The honourable gentleman need not fear that the article would be made use of as food ('hear, hear, hear,' from the Opposition benches); the Custom-house officers took effectual means to prevent fraudulent traders selling the article to the poor as food (renewed cries of 'hear, hear,' from the Opposition benches.) He did not understand what the gentlemen opposite were cheering; but he would repeat that the Custom-house officers took care that the article introduced as grease should not be sold as butter by mixing a quantity of tar with it before it passed the Custom-house."

Sir George Clerk means that the butter which is to be admitted duty free as grease has tar mingled with it in the Custom-house, after which it is unfit for human food, and is called grease.

Now, Mrs. Horlock, you know well that 7s. a week is the full average of men's wages in Dorset; you know that unmarried men only get 4s. and 5s. a week. You know that, at this time, many men have no work at all. You know that fully one-half of the whole are out of employment for several months every year. Yet your husband with 8s. a week in 1843, and you, with your careful housekeeping, could only spend 3s. 8½d. on butter during forty-nine weeks. In cheese you expended 7s. 3d.; your total expenditure in butter and cheese was 10s. 11½d. And your total for butchers' meat was 10d. just temperance. So that those great staple products of your county which are protected for the especial benefit of the labourers, as Lord Ashley, Mr. George Banks, and Mr. Sturt, your county members say, were purchased and used by your family of six persons to the amount of 11s. 9½d.

I know well that every other family were not in a condition to buy so much; but assuming that they did, 48,000 men, women, and children, which is the full amount of those employed in agriculture, or unemployed, and calling themselves dependent on it, would annually support the beef, mutton, butter, and cheese interests thus:—

Beef and mutton .. ..	£ 316 13 4
Butter and cheese .. ..	4383 6 8

Those families who feed a pig sell it, more frequently, to pay for shoes and rent, than they eat it. Thus, in a manner, they may be said to be in competition with the farmers, rather than supporters of them by the consumption of their farm produce. But in many parts of Dorset no pigs are allowed to be kept by labourers. The dictum of the father of Sir John Tyrrell, in Essex, is understood and acted on in Dorset—"No labourer can be honest and feed a pig!" But if every labourer's family did feed and eat, which they do not, a pig eight or nine score weight in a year, it would be no reason why they should not eat beef and mutton, butter and cheese, if they could afford them. A working man in London, or Liverpool, or Manchester, who has meat for dinner every day with his family, consumes more than a pig of nine score weight in the shape of bacon or ham for breakfast and supper, in addition to the beef or mutton from the butcher's shop for dinner; so that we have it proved that consumption is only limited by the power to purchase; and consumption is the true protection to agricultural produce.

If we take fifteen journeymen printers in London employed, say on the Times newspaper, whom we shall suppose to be all steady men and not drunkards—else they would not be employed there; and suppose them to have each a wife and four children, as Francis Horlock, your husband, a steady agricultural labourer, has;—those fifteen working men and their families, according to the London style of living and expenditure amongst people earning so much wages as theirs, will consume as much butcher's meat in 52 weeks as the whole 48,000 men, women, and children fed by protected agriculture in Dorset consume. A family man, like Francis Horlock, receiving from 30s. to £2 a week in London, will, for six of a family, give an average of about 8s. a week for butcher's meat. At 8s. per week it will be found to amount to as much for 90 persons as the consumption of 48,000 in Dorset.

I may tell you, Mrs. Horlock, that at the beginning of this session of Parliament, a great many lords, and squires, and farmers, all of them persons who live by selling cattle, some of them from your own county, came to London, and went before the Prime Minister and complained of distress—of being poor—of not getting such a good market for their produce as they once had. One of them dwelt especially on the fact, that in the great Smithfield Market of London there were occasionally some foreign cattle, one hundred or so, to 2000 home-fed cattle, and to 18,000 or 21,000 sheep; and that prices fell because of these occasional cattle. And it was urged that, as cattle were what the farmers so much depend upon—and especially the farmers in such districts as the Vale of Blackmoor—the foreign cattle should be prevented from coming to London.

Now, Mrs. Horlock, there is a mode of doing business vulgarly called "Robbing Peter to pay Paul," or taking money out of one pocket to put it into another pocket. The system by which the lordly cattle dealers of Dorset wish to make the nation prosperous is by robbing Peter to pay Paul; by taking money out of one person's pocket and putting it into another person's pocket; they represent Paul, and somebody else representing Peter. They say if the Londoners pay dear for butchers' meat for the sake of making them, the lauded gentry, rich, they go back to London to spend their money on the Londoners.

Now, according to this logic, they might with as much propriety, and certainly far more humanity and benevolence,—and your Dorset lords and gentlemen are prodigiously humane and benevolent: you of course know your noble county member Lord Ashley,—they might with as much propriety and more humanity give their labourers the wages paid to printers per week to buy butter, and cheese, and butcher's meat. Fifteen journeymen printers in London, with their families, patronizing such farming interests as are involved in Smithfield Market to as great an extent as the whole 48,000 men, women, and children, dependant on agriculture for their existence in Dorset, affords a wide scope for speculation. What would be the demand for cattle and sheep if, proceeding on the system of robbing Peter to pay Paul, the lords of Dorset should give the 48,000 men, women, and children money enough to buy and eat as much beef and mutton as the same number of journeymen printers with their wives and children buy and eat in London?

But you might as well put your husband's 8s. a week first into one pocket and then into another, three times over, and say that he has 24s. a week, as say that the robbery of Peter enriches Paul. But the lords of Dorset do say so when they ask people, and compel them, to pay high prices to them, that they may return the high prices to their lordly expenditure.

Wealth is only produced by giving a greater value to something by labour than it had before it was laboured at; or by exchanging something of which we have too much for something else of which we have too little.

And the only way to make the butter interests of Dorset richer—the Vale of Blackmoor more thriving, and its native population better customers for its native produce—is to direct money and skill and industry to its better cultivation.

I have already occupied too much space by another letter in this paper; but all that is said in that letter of mismanaged land, and the loss thereby to labourers, tenants, and landlords, applies most appallingly to the butter county of Dorset. All that Jackson declares to be absolutely requisite to profitable farming is absolutely wanting in Dorset. And it is certainly remarkable that Sir George Clerk, of Pennyquick, the political landlord, should be professing to protect the butter-makers by assuring them that foreign butter will be mixed with tar when it comes to this country to prevent its use as human food; while Mr. James Jackson, of Pennyquick, the practical agriculturist, is showing that such farmers as the butter-makers of Dorset would be enriched by doing the reverse of most of that which they now do.

I will resume the subject in a letter to some of your neighbours next week. Mrs. Horlock, your sugar-basins and tea-kettles want looking into. Meanwhile, I am a sympathising friend well acquainted with the struggles of poor mothers, and

REVIEW.

Remarks upon Recent Commercial Legislation. By the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P. for Newark. London, Murray.

The late President of the Board of Trade has successfully employed his leisure in preparing a comment on the expository statement of the Customs Revenue which was laid before Parliament at the opening of the session. It is unfortunate that Mr. Gladstone no where definitely states the principles by which the imposition or remission of taxes should be regulated, though something like a rule is intimated by the distinctions pointed out in the following passage:—

"Speaking generally, the reductions and remissions have been far from inconsiderable. For instance, on the three great articles of sugar, timber, and corn, the diminution made, though it cannot be estimated with strict accuracy, may be said to amount nearly to one-half of the duties previously subsisting.

"11. At the same time it is undeniable that, whatever may be the extent of these measures in reference to trade, in reference to the whole amount of revenue which we raise from imported commodities, they have been secondary. Four articles of the first class, with respect to the amount of duty levied from them, have been left wholly untouched. They are the articles of

1. Tea, yielding in 1844 ..	£1,521,000
2. Tobacco .. ..	3,977,000
3. Wine .. ..	1,991,000
4. Spirits .. ..	2,211,000

or more than half of the entire revenue derived from the customs.

"With respect to this topic, it is enough to say that no considerable part in the country appears to contemplate any fundamental change in the system by which we supply a very large part of the wants of the Treasury through the medium of indirect taxation; and so long as this is the case, any reductions of duty, which may be conceded from time to time, must always bear but a small proportion to the amount still continuing to be levied. But the four articles which I have quoted as the most conspicuous and productive among those unaffected by the recent alterations, are none of them articles of the first rank in our trade. The aggregate values of the whole four, independent of duty, do not equal the value, taken singly, either of the cotton or of the sugar, or, in most years, of the grain, which we import.

"There are only six other articles of any considerable importance to trade, which remain, like the four above specified, subject to the same duties as those payable upon them before the Act of the 5 and 6 Vict. c. 47. They are these:—

1. Tallow, which in 1844 yielded ..	£174,000
2. Butter .. ..	136,000
3. Cheese .. ..	117,000
4. Raisins .. ..	159,000
5. Pepper .. ..	81,000
6. Silk manufactures of Europe ..	277,000

£944,000

"If, then, we divide our imports according to the revenue they yield, the major part have remain untouched; but, estimated according to value, that is, according to their commercial importance, they are a small fraction of the whole with regard to which this can be asserted."

Mr. Gladstone underrates the strength of public feeling in favour of direct rather than indirect taxation. The income-tax is endured because people are afraid that they could not maintain the property-tax without it; and the property-tax is admired because it allows for the remission of those taxes which pressed on the industry of the country. The rules by which Sir Robert Peel professes to be guided in his tariff are thus stated and elucidated:—

"In 1842 it was attempted to make a general approach to the following rules:—

1. The removal of prohibitions.
2. The reduction of duties on manufactured articles, and of protective duties generally, to an average of 20 per cent. ad valorem.
3. On partially manufactured articles to rates not exceeding 10 per cent.
4. On raw materials to rates not exceeding 5 per cent.

"The duties were then reduced on about 650 articles. Many changes were made which were of great importance to the consumer or to some branch of trade, but which cost little to the revenue, or were even, in some cases, positively profitable. I allude particularly to the changes affecting cattle, salt meat, seeds, oils, manures, leather, and ores, as belonging to these two classes.

"It is very difficult to form any general estimate of the effect of the measures of 1842 upon the import trade of the country, which shall even approach to precision. Still I think a rude view of this important subject may be presented by means of the tables of official valuations, which reduce the quantities of articles imported to a common measure. We have these valuations printed for the years 1841, 1842, 1843.* I reject 1842, which was almost equally divided between the old law and the new; and I take 1841 as the latest full year of the old law, and 1843 as the first full year of the new one.

"The official values of imports into the United Kingdom were—

For the year 1841 .. ..	£64,377,952
" 1843 .. ..	70,093,353

Increase .. £5,715,401

But there are two articles of importance which it may be better to exclude from this comparison, cotton and corn, inasmuch as the quantities of them which we receive in one year as compared with another depend much more upon the respective crops of those products in America and England than upon any increased facilities in the means of exchange. The official values imported in 1841 were—

Of cotton .. ..	£15,918,384
Of corn .. ..	5,238,389

£21,156,773

And in 1843—
Of cotton .. ..	£22,282,365
Of corn .. ..	2,048,768

£24,331,133

Deducting these amounts from the respective totals, we have the official values of imports—

For the year 1841 .. ..	£43,191,139

Increase .. £2,571,081

This is a rude, but I do not think by any means an excessive, statement of the increase of general trade which had been realized in 1843, and of which a considerable part may be considered due to the alterations of the law. It is likely that the returns for 1844 may bear a stronger testimony to its influence."

The most interesting part of the pamphlet is that which relates to the effect produced by the repeal of protective duties; and here the importance of the subject must excuse the length of our extract:—

"Most of these were articles, with regard to which the very greatest apprehensions had been expressed. It is within my own recollection that, in the month of August, 1842, the people of a rural district of Scotland, thirty or forty miles from any focus of foreign trade, were much excited on the subject of some salt meat which had been exposed for sale at 3d. per lb., in consequence, as was professed, of the new tariff: the fact being that the change in duty on that article amounted only to the small sum of 4s. per cwt., and that this change did not take place until the 10th of October, two or three months after its miraculous results had been palmed upon the public. Nor was it an uncommon thing in the streets of London to see advertisements of goods purporting to be cheapened by the new tariff, with regard to which no change either was made or had ever been proposed.

"But the most remarkable example of this recession after a first experiment was in the case which, of all others, excited the greatest alarm and apprehension—namely, the importation of live animals for food. Arguing in Parliament against the exaggerated apprehensions which were entertained with respect to the effects of that measure, I protested against an estimate that had met my eye, according to which it was shown, that in the course of a few years there might be 300,000,000 pigs disposable for importation into England from a single country; but I, somewhat weakly, admitted the possibility that within a short time we might have from abroad, as a maximum of addition to our supplies, 50,000 head of cattle annually. The importations of the first six months were—

Swine and Hogs .. ..	4104

But the parties engaged in them apparently (as it is termed) burnt their fingers; for in the whole year 1843 there were only imported—

Cattle .. ..	1182
Swine and hogs .. ..	361

There is, indeed, a revival in 1844, sufficient to save the results of the measure from becoming ridiculous. In that year we obtained from the whole world—

Cattle .. ..	4865
But of swine and hogs only ..	271

"An argument, however, has been frequently advanced to the effect, that the foreign prices have acted powerfully in reducing British prices to their own level, although when they had reached that level no extended opening could remain for importation. My answer is twofold: first, it is impossible that foreign prices could have exercised a depressing influence upon the immense market of England to any considerable extent—say, for instance, 1d. per lb.—without having held out such opportunities of profit by actual importations from abroad as must have led to very much more extensive operations than those which have actually taken place; secondly, there are two modes in which prices may be lowered—either by addition to supply, or by subtraction from demand. An addition of 3000 head to supply will have no greater effect upon prices than a diminution of 3000 head in the demand. The new tariff is responsible for the addition of 3000 head to the supply; but commercial distress—affecting immediately, perhaps, four or five millions of the people, nearly all of whom were consumers of animal food—is responsible for contracting the demand to an amount nearer 300,000 head than 3000. If fall of price took place, it appears to me more rational to ascribe it to the latter cause than to the former one.

"The result seems to be that there is no likelihood, for some considerable time at least, of our obtaining a supply of cattle from abroad at all sufficient to meet the steady increase of our population. Nor is this, in my view, an unsatisfactory result. On the contrary, what has taken place is highly cheering, for this reason, at least, that it shows this most important branch of agricultural industry in our own country to be pursued with an economy and skill which need not shrink from competition, and which,

† Paper No. 43, Session 1845.

Indeed, has now defied it; and it may teach us not to regard, so much as we are apt to do, the low nominal prices which commodities may bear in some other countries, while, notwithstanding, it may be, and is often true, that, when quality is considered, the Englishman gets the cheapest article.

"I must quote, however, as a last class of illustrations, one or two cases of manufactured commodities, for the very striking manner in which they contrast the anticipations of persons bewildered by their fears with the actual results of changes in duties upon imports.

"Amidst predictions of ruin, the duty on the candles termed stearine (a refined tallow) was reduced from 63s. 4d. to 23s. 4d. per cwt. The quantities entered were no more than 1000 lbs. (of the value of perhaps £50) in the first year, and 2000 (or £100 in value) for the second.

"The duty on heavier hats was lowered from 10s. 6d. each to 2s. 6d. each. Foreign hats had been introduced in 1840 to the number of 240. In the first year of the new act they were but 135, and in the second 191.

"The duty on cordage and on cable-yarn was reduced from 10s. 9d. per cwt. to 6s. per cwt. The first proposal was only 5s. This duty touched upon a very important trade, and a great mass of hand labour. We are importers of 700,000 cwt. of hemp annually, of the value of about a million sterling. There was submitted to the Government the most complete invulnerable paper demonstration, that our trade in cordage must pass bodily into the hands of Russia. Export duties, low wages, employment in the long Russian winters for hands otherwise idle, and therefore costing next to nothing, saving in freight and insurance—all these arguments and many more were duly marshalled. It was shown by a price current from St. Petersburg that the change meditated in England had excited attention in that market. Moreover, all this was not only urged by traders of intelligence and character, but they were led on by one of the most distinguished among the many distinguished men of business in the city of London, thoroughly acquainted with the trade from former connexion, but then, I believe, retaining little or no interest in it. The prophecies of such men made, I confess, a deep impression on my mind, which has become deeper still since I have witnessed their issue.

"However, the stroke descended; and the importations of cordage and cable-yarn, taken together, which had reached 451 cwt. in 1838, and 294 cwt. in 1840, rose to 333 cwt. in 1842-3, and to 1032 cwt. in 1843-4; the trade in the manufactured article thus appearing to be in extent about one six-hundredth part of that in the raw material.

"The case of corks, on some accounts, was still more remarkable, because it was one of those commonly quoted at the time by such persons as chose to cast upon the Government the imputation that, while they dealt gently with great interests, they dealt most severely with small ones; and I am bound to add, because, as I believe, the journeymen employed in this trade were, in some instances, actually dismissed from work in anticipation of the change. They therefore, no doubt, had good reason to believe the predictions that were freely delivered on all hands of the total and certain loss of our trade in cork-cutting; and, I must admit, it was distressing to receive from persons in such a class remonstrances so piteous, delivered in a manner the most candid, simple, and sincere.

"Their case attracted an uncommon degree of attention, and perhaps not less than ten or twelve deputations attended various members of the Government upon it, to say nothing of a voluminous correspondence, while a most lively interest in their favour was excited in the House of Commons.

"But I think it is manifest that three parties, and those who supported them in Parliament, were deceivers, as being themselves deceived. I arrive at this conclusion from the figures before me. The change was postponed until July, 1843, so that there was plenty of time to prepare large importations of the manufactured article. The old duties were on the wood £4 per ton, and on corks 7s. per lb. The uniform declaration of the parties in the trade was, that no duty less than 4s. per lb. would protect them. The rates were reduced to 1s. per ton on the wood, and 8d. per lb. on corks. The importations of the first year, under the altered system, were as follows:—

Corks, 81,683 lbs.	.. ..	364 tons.
Cork-wood .. ..	.. ..	4271 ..

Or the import of the manufactured article from abroad was about the one-hundred-and-eighteenth part of the import of the material to be manufactured in this country. But there is much refuse in cork-wood. If, then, we allow each ton of corks to represent in value two tons of cork-wood, still the proportion remains one to fifty-nine. If, further, we ought to allow for the excess in the delivery of cork-wood for the period in question, because of the reduction of the duty charged on it, then we find the average delivery of two years—from July, 1842, to July, 1844—to be only 2973 tons,* instead of 4271 tons; and the proportion of the trade in the manufactured article becomes one in forty-one, or somewhat less than 2½ per cent. of the whole. This is a change, no doubt; but, if it be a violent and cruel one, then it is difficult to conceive what change is not violent and cruel; and it remains a memorable example of the difference, in such matters, between anticipation and experience.

"I must add, however, that I had long ago been informed that the trade was in a small number of hands, and was conducted with something of the manner of monopoly, and that English corks were very inferior to those of French manufacture. I learn, upon recent inquiry, that the price of wine corks has been reduced from 8s. to less than 6s. 6d. per lb. by the change; but the bulk of the trade, it is manifest, has been retained in British hands.

"I shall draw a concluding illustration from the occurrence of last year. The same words, I might almost say the same formulae, of sinister prognostication were then used, malum mulieris, by the manufacturers of vinegar, including persons of the very highest respectability, which had been employed in 1842 by many scores of other classes. I ventured to refer, at a conference, to the falsification of the previous omens in so many instances. I was answered by a distinguished member of Parliament (friendly to the abolition of the Corn Law), who accompanied the deputation, that it would be no consolation to the vinegar manufacturer, when he should find his apprehensions realized, to know that other traders had discovered theirs to be baseless. It afforded, however, some presumption that his demonstrations and his prophecies might prove to be of the same family as theirs, and to be destined to the same limbo.

"The trade declared a duty of 1s. per gallon on foreign vinegar to be necessary in order to enable them to subsist. It was reduced (from 1s. 6d.) to 4d. I subjoin the result:—

"Quantities of Foreign Vinegar entered for Home Consumption.

In the year 1841 .. ..	22,205 gallons
In 1842 .. ..	18,139 "
In 1843 .. ..	14,144 "
In 1844 (new duty from June 6) ..	49,574 "

"Now, the quantity of British vinegar charged with excise duty appears to have been about 3,000,000 gallons,—so that the foreigner has at most obtained (up to the present time) but one-sixtieth part of the trade, and fifty-nine parts remain with the British manufacturer.

"That in some few instances, among alterations so numerous, the British producer may have been subject to inconvenient pressure, I can readily believe: that increased importation has produced benefit to the public almost follows, as a general rule, from the fact that it has taken place. That the degree of increase has ordinarily been so limited appears to me, on the whole, to be a fact full of instruction: and gives rise not only to the supposition that foreign competition has often stimulated improvements which have enabled the British producer to repel or to endure it, but also to the inference I have already named,—which, if true, is very important,—namely, that British industry—even when it is not supported by superior machinery, by the application of capital on a large scale, or by great physical advantages—is able to meet the industry of foreign countries upon a footing of less inequality than we have been apt to suppose."

After reading this passage we were anxious to discover by what argument Mr. Gladstone would justify the continuance of protecting duties on important articles of consumption. All that we can find is the following passage:—

"I am a deliberate adherent of that policy which is described in contemptuous terms as halting between two opinions: between the opinion which regards commercial restriction as being permanently and essentially a good, and the opinion which deals with it as an evil necessarily greater than that of a sharp and violent transition to freedom; as the source of all our economical difficulties; and even as a violation of the laws of God. Nor is it a fearful and languid mean, a mere neutrality, of which the observance is here implied: it is only that reasonable circumspection, that regard to the lessons of the past, in their detail, as guides for the future—that just comparison of conflicting considerations and care to elicit their compound result, which in almost every branch of legislation constitute the universally acknowledged rule of statesmen, and which have alike marked the genius of the institutions of this country as a whole, and the character of its people.

"For the desire to realize, under these conditions, a just liberty of trade, I can deem no apology requisite from any adherent of a party which follows in the main Mr.

Burke and Mr. Pitt as its guides among the luminaries of a former generation, and which has reckoned Mr. Caning, Lord Liverpool, and Mr. Huskisson among its members within the memory and the experience of our living statesmen. The disposition, by which that desire is balanced, is a disposition to respect the subsisting distribution of capital and labour, to preserve it from all violent and sudden shocks, and from the worrying agitation of incessant change; to maintain a confidence, not in the absolute immobility of law, but in the determination of the Legislature to deal temperately and dispassionately by all; to adopt no change except for some good and positive reason, and to confine it when adopted within the limits which such reason prescribes. For this disposition I find an ample defence, alike in the writings of economists, in the acts of commercial statesmen and in the analogies which all legislation, and especially which all British legislation, supplies."

Now, the arguments which Mr. Gladstone has used respecting cattle apply with infinitely greater force to corn. The English farmers would have no reason to dread foreign competition if they had fair opportunities of applying skill, industry, and capital to the cultivation of land; but the landlords, in order to keep them politically subservient, refuse to grant them any security for their investments, and maintain the Corn Laws to obviate the necessity for a better system of tenure. We do not wish here to enter into a full discussion of this question; but we wish to show that Mr. Gladstone's principles, if consistently maintained, must lead to the abolition of those monster monopolies which so severely press on the energies of Great Britain. He has himself demolished the common argument for maintaining these taxes as a retaliation for the duties imposed upon our manufactures by foreign states. In reference to these, he says:—

"There remains, I think, only one course—it is to use every effort to disburden of all charges, so far as our law is concerned, the materials of industry, and thus to enable the workman to approach his work at home on better terms, as the terms on which he enters foreign markets are altered for the worse against him. I do not believe that this will be a losing game; but, on the contrary, that if we steadily pursue it, then although the prohibitory policy of foreign states, or, as I should rather say, although the forced concessions of foreign governments to the anti-commercial spirit of particular classes of their subjects, may indeed and will diminish the aggregate trade of the world, they will not diminish the share of it which falls to the lot of England. They may smite, from time to time, some branch of our commerce, and it may fall as a lily tree falls in the forest. We hear the crash, and we deplore the void; but we forget that a thousand more are lifting their heads and spreading forth their arms with an insensible but constant growth. Even so it is in our commerce with other nations. If a new tax is laid in Germany upon the iron which our bounteous earth yields us in profusion, that tax cripples the power of the country imposing it to compete with us in every one of the hundred branches of trade to which iron is an accessory. If France doubles the duty on our linen yarns, she stimulates us to economy, and bids the smuggler thrive; she taxes her consumer, and fetters that ingenuity and taste on the part of her weavers, which are the main support of her commercial strength.

"I do not mean that what is undoubtedly injurious to us is to be viewed with satisfaction because it is yet more injurious to others; but let other nations come to be convinced that such is the tendency of their present policy, and they will spontaneously save us the trouble of expostulation, and will hasten to reverse it, for the just and natural reason which alone would warrant their reversing it—namely, not our interest, but their own. How are they to be brought to that mind? As I think, by seeing that although we may, by one act and another, be crippled in detail, yet our aggregate commerce even with them maintains itself, and even gains further augmentation; that while they obstruct the channel at one end, yet, as we clear it at the other, the waters find their way in reflux as well as flux: that their purchases from us, in despite of adverse legislation, have increased with their sales to us, and that with a rapidity that none but the most sanguine would have ventured to expect. Let us have a few more years of experimental instruction, such as that which is afforded by the figures of the statement I have given of the relative growth of our trade with Europe and the world: such results cannot fail to exercise a powerful influence on the intelligence and the will of governments, and of the nations whom they rule.

"It is this regard to the course of commerce and of commercial legislation in the world at large which convinces me of the wisdom of pushing further than might otherwise be necessary, or even desirable, our efforts to relieve the materials of industry from fiscal burdens, and also of endeavouring to diminish (as is just now being done in the case of sugar) the impositions upon articles of consumption, as the state may be able to afford it, and our own industry and capital, immediately engaged, to bear the operation, I do not say without alarm, but without real and substantial derangement."

But we are adopting a worse policy than that which Mr. Gladstone denounces in France and Germany. Food is the most important raw material of all manufactures, for it is wrought into the thews and sinews of the manufacturers; we must provide our workmen with bread or they will seek support as a remuneration for their industry in foreign lands. To one branch of the Free-Trade argument Mr. Gladstone gives decided confirmation: he shows that our imports must be the measure of our exports, and that we cannot sell our goods to foreign nations unless we are prepared to take the payment which they have to offer.

AGRICULTURE.

PROTECTION THE BANE OF AGRICULTURE.

When, some seven or eight years ago, the Corn Laws began to be subjected to that close examination which has nearly led to their repeal, it was commonly believed that the farmers as well as the landowners were benefited by the monopoly at the expense of the rest of the community. A wrong so obvious called into existence that now powerful body the League. The leaders of that body having gained their experience of the working of the Corn Laws in the manufacturing districts, naturally directed their first efforts to the exposure of the injuries inflicted by the landed interests upon the commercial, manufacturing, and trading classes. The farmers were tacitly assumed to be partakers of the spoil, as they were clearly active in upholding the injustice.

But when the movement became a national one, and was joined by Free-Traders whose opinions had been formed by observations made exclusively in the rural districts, it was found that, great as had been the evils inflicted upon the trading classes by the Corn Laws, they were trifling in comparison with those the farmers and farm-labourers had endured from the same cause. This has now become so plain that men wonder they ever overlooked it. That view of the Corn-Law question which affects the farming classes is the only one wherein there is now any opportunity for further exposition; and one course that exposition must take was indicated in Mr. Cobden's admirable speech of the 13th instant. We propose to assist the farmers of the empire in, to them, the most vital inquiry of how much they lose by restrictions on the corn trade, and artificially high prices upon those articles which enter into their own consumption; and, for the benefit of Mr. Sydney Herbert, we will begin with the class of farmers who may be represented by the tenants of South Wiltshire. These may be called light-land farmers, for though there is some deep strong land in the valleys, the prevailing characteristics of the district are those of the chalk formation. Moreover, we find in the recent Prize Essay of the Royal Agricultural Society, on Wiltshire farming, some authentic published statistics of that district. And further, we have, by the aid of Mr. Pusey's article on the Agricultural Improvements of Lincolnshire, in a previous number of the same society's Journal, the means of comparing the low farming of Wiltshire with the high farming of Lincolnshire, upon soils of very similar natural character. The farms of South Wilt are generally large, the majority of them varying from 600 to 1200 and 1500 acres, while a few reach as high as 2000 acres. The rotations and plans of cropping vary with the natural qualities of the soil, though the system of farming, allowing for the difference in the land, is the same upon all. On the deep soils, which are clay marls and sandy loams, or what the writer of the prize essay calls "heavy white lands," the course is a three-field one, namely:—1st year, wheat; 2nd year, clover, beans, oats, peas, and swedes in certain proportions; 3rd year, clover, —fed, summer-tilled, or sown to green crop; early turnips or rape; and rape, summer vetches (tares), or a naked fallow. Beans and oats used to be grown for sale more than at present, railroads having greatly diminished the number of coach horses, and little more of either is grown than is required for the farmer's own use. It is clear that, even where he grows all the oats and beans he consumes, protection upon those articles is at most useless to him; while, wherever he has to buy them, the extra price caused by the Corn Laws is just so much direct loss to him.

On the lighter lands the four-course rotation is adopted; and on the lightest, called "down, or beak-land," a five and six field course prevails. Here wheat and barley are grown for sale, and the horse corn, a heavy item, is usually purchased. Now, let us take the case of a farm of 800 acres, a very common size in South Wilts, of which perhaps one-fourth, or 200 acres, may be down or natural hill pasture land, on which the flock of sheep is fed during the day, to be folded on some part of the arable land at night. As three horses are commonly used in each plough, at least twenty horses will be required for the 600 acres of arable land. Now, if each horse has only a bushel and a half of corn per week, the extra price paid upon the farmer's horse corn alone will amount to little less than £100 a year, equal to an increased rent of 3s. 4d. upon every acre of his cultivated land. So, again, upon his seed wheat,—being at least two, and more frequently three, bushels to the acre,—his seed barley, his seed tares, his household and farming consumption of flour, cheese, bacon, and so forth, the farmer pays the monopoly prices exacted by means of protective duties. Let him fairly calculate the amount of all such items, and let him add to them the additional rent he pays in consequence of his rent being estimated according to act-of-Parliament prices, and the increased burden of the poor from enhanced prices, and he will find that, even when he gets his monopoly price—which has been only about three years out of five—for the grain he sells, he is an actual loser by high prices. But the greatest disadvantage to the South Wiltshire farmer from the high cost of pulse and the inferior grains consists in deterring him from a higher system of farming. At present, a vast mass of straw is either trod down by the cart-horses into mere rotten straw, or carried out at once into the fields and spread abroad in the sheepfolds; whereas, if cattle food were cheap, this straw would be consumed by beasts in the yard, and an immense force of rich manure obtained. The Wiltshire farmer employs too little capital per acre to farm successfully, and nothing but a conviction that prices of wheat will be permanently low can force him into a better system. A little corn given to the breeding flock would not only improve the size of his sheep, but would wonderfully enrich the corn land of the South Wiltshire farmer, and, if he adopted the plan of fattening off a portion of his wethers and draft ewes, he might cultivate all that tract of down pasture which now serves merely for a sheepwalk.

This is not in any degree speculative, for it is all in practical operation in Lincolnshire, on land certainly not superior to the now almost waste downs of South Wilts. Mr. Pusey says that the Lincolnshire farmers cannot spare their turnips from their sheepfolds by reason of the weakness of the land; so, instead of drawing home turnips, "they purchase large quantities of oilcake (80 tons, perhaps, on a large farm, costing £600), by the aid of which their beasts thrive on the straw, and the manure is at the same time enriched." Now, bean or pea meal, or barley, would be at least as good for this purpose as oilcake, and the admission of pulse and common grain without duty would lower the price of oilcake in the same proportion as that of beans and peas. Whichever kind of food the farmer preferred, he would be equally benefited by Free Trade.

Mr. Pusey says, that on a farm of 1000 acres in Lincolnshire, from 70 to 100 or more beasts are thus wintered. If cattle food could be bought at one-third less than its present price, as it might with a Free Trade, what a saving would not such spirited farmers as those of Lincolnshire effect, and how much more easily might other farmers follow their example. At present these cattle only just pay, when sold out in the spring, for the cake they have consumed, even if they do so much; but the manure repays the cost tenfold, even if only one-half of the expense of the oilcake is got back by the additional value of the cattle when sold. That high farming can become general without the most free importation of cattle-food is out of the question; and none but high farming, in some form or other, can ever again be profitable farming. Let us conclude by presenting to our readers Mr. Pusey's picture of the striking contrast between the high farming of the north-east and the low farming of the south-west of England. He, speaking of a farm in Lincolnshire of 700 acres of a light yellowish sand only six inches deep, says:—

"The peculiarity is in the number of dressings purchased and successively applied to the crops of turnips, barley, clover or grass seeds, and wheat. The ordinary number of dressings varies in other districts where the four-course system prevails. Thus, on a farm of my own, the land during the four-year rotation only received a little poor dung, or rather rotten straw, at wheat sowing. The turnips, if any turnips grew, were fed off by breeding ewes, who sometimes obtained rough hay, and who in one season, as I found, obtaining only mouldy pea-straw, had lost one-half of their sucking lambs, which they could not sustain. A better treatment (in the west) is to give dung to some of the turnips, and to buy woollen rags for part of the wheat. A further step would be to fatten off the young sheep when they are a year old, giving them corn with their turnips; and this could not be called bad farming, if the soil had any depth or natural strength. But the farm at Temple Bruer has neither depth nor natural strength; and I will state how those two defects are supplied by its tenant, beginning with the turnip crop as the foundation. This crop is sown with sixteen bushels of bones, and it is fed off on the land by sheep receiving oilcake, which may be regarded as a dressing for the following barley crop. In the next year, after the barley is mown, follows a dressing which will surprise many farmers. The dung of the whole year, which I saw in a vast mass, cleared out of the yard in October, enriched with the oilcake that had been purchased for sixty beasts wintered there, is laid at Christmas on the barley stubble, for the benefit of the artificial grasses which follow. Of these grasses only one-third is made into hay and carried off, two-thirds are depastured and return again to the ground.

"Observing, too, that troughs were set out upon these seeds last October, I found, on inquiry, that they contained oilcake for fattening ewes; and that this is a growing practice, the ewes receiving each a pound of cake daily. Last follows the wheat-sowing; and not content with having spread the whole of his oilcake dung upon the seeds at the previous Christmas, or with having fed off two-thirds of these seeds upon it in the summer, and so restored to the ground what it had brought forth, or even with having given oilcake to his ewes in October upon it, this practical farmer buys rapeseed, which he throws on his land at the rate of four cwt. to the acre, when he has ploughed the ground and pressed it for wheat-sowing. The result is noble crops upon land from which a few years since the rent was paid by two rabbits an acre. The yearly outlay, indeed, on manures may well amount to a second rent; but the tenant (who occupies other farms also) is regarded as a prosperous man."

Another tenant-farmer had bought 80 tons of oilcake to feed 110 beasts through the winter.

"This expenditure," says Mr. Pusey, "is not in diminution of the investment in sheep, the ordinary stock of such land. Indeed, it appeared to me, on the contrary, that the flocks of sheep were unusually numerous; and the following statement seems to bear out that impression:—A farm of 500 acres, having 125 acres of turnips, is said to winter from 10 to 12 sheep per acre, that is, from 1250 to 1500 sheep. The breed, too, is the improved Lincoln, which, though inferior to the Down sheep in quality, exceed them in weight, and consequently in their demand for food, in the proportion of five to four."

Now, let any practical farmer say, whether the precarious and occasional high price gained upon their wheat can be any compensation to these Lincolnshire farmers for the loss sustained upon the purchase of artificial food? Mr. Lattimore, who feeds pretty much in the same way as these example farmers mentioned by Mr. Pusey, estimates that the loss he sustains by the monopoly-price of food for stock amounts to 14s. upon every quarter of wheat he sends to market!!

FALLEN FROM THEIR HIGH ESTATE.

"Now every puny whipsnapper takes my sword."

That those farmers who have been really deluded into the belief that they were ever benefited by the Corn Laws should be most indignant with the monopolist members for counties is but natural. The honest—that is the ignorant—protectionists have been made most vile "utensils" by their political landowners, and, now having served their turn, the monopolist M.P.'s give the farmers the go-by. Mr. Sydney Herbert, who is a "farmers' friend" of the first water down in Wiltshire, while giving Mr. Stafford O'Brien a hint to pocket his amendment on Mr. Cobden's motion, sneered at "the delicate nerves of the agriculturists," and lectured them for "coming whining to Parliament for protection." In the House this was of course completely successful, for Mr. Stafford O'Brien, like a good boy, said no more about his amendment; and all the rampant protectionists of the Central Society divided with the Minister against an inquiry into the depression of agriculture with the meekness of pet lambs. Truly might Mr. Bright say that the Prime Minister had no supporters in the House more docile than the protectionist county members. But this sort of thing cannot last long. Farmers are getting irate, and are beginning to see that they have been made cat's-paws for the political squires. At the West Surrey Protection Society, Mr. Trotter, M.P., one of the county members, was rather roughly pulled over the coals for his support of Ministers; while Mr. Denison, the other member, did not venture to show at all. Poor Mr. Trotter tried to make excuses, but he was thus extinguished by Mr. Goldhawk, a farmer, who, as reported by the Morning Post, said:—

"He firmly believed that all the distress the farmers of West Surrey had now to complain of arose from the support Mr. Trotter and other gentlemen similarly situated had given to Sir R. Peel. (Hear, hear.) At a meeting held at Guildford some time since, to resist the Anti-Corn-Law League, he (Mr. Goldhawk) had stated that everything depended on the members they sent to Parliament to represent their interest. (Hear, hear.) He believed the present rate of protection wholly inadequate, and he declared his opinion openly, that the member who had supported Sir R. Peel in his recent measures affecting agriculture, was no longer a fit representative for West Surrey. (THIS LATTER OBSERVATION OF THE SPEAKER WAS LOUDLY CHEERED BY THE MAJORITY OF THOSE PRESENT.)

"Mr. Currie urged the necessity of unanimity among the farmers, and said a few words in defence of the Premier."

And a petition strongly condemnatory of Peel's policy was agreed to, which Mr. Trotter and Mr. Denison, the members for West Surrey, were earnestly requested to support. This is significant. The members for Cambridgeshire, too, have a rather unpleasant meeting with some of their duped protectionist constituents hanging over their heads. We wish them a pleasant vacation! But, perhaps, the richest scene in which the prostration of the once powerful and fierce Parliamentary monopolists has hitherto been exhibited was when, on Friday week, Mr. Miles gave notice that he would move a real amendment in favour of agricultural protection. Laughed at by the House, he was patronised by Mr. Ferrand, and sharply rebuked as a deluder of the farmers by Mr. Borthwick!!! Is there a "lower depth" for the champions of the Central Protection Society? Let our agricultural readers see what sort of a figure the redoubtable Mr. Miles cut on this occasion. He said, "All sorts of aspersions had been thrown out against that bench" (on which the Parliamentary "farmers' friends" sat), "and he, and those who agreed with him, had been accused of acting a sham fight," at which the House assentingly shouted "Hear, hear." "Now," bravely said Mr. Miles, "he, at any rate, wished to show that there were at least one or two individuals who really wanted to have a fair stand-up fight." At which bravery the House again cheered derisively, and "hear, hear"ed vociferously.

Now, if Mr. Miles had really intended to have gone into the question of agricultural distress in spite of the wishes of the Ministry, he ought to have persisted in some amendment on Mr. Cobden's motion, which, had it gone for inquiry in almost any shape, would assuredly have been carried against Sir Robert Peel. But, then, the valiant Mr. Miles was dumb. Now, he knows Sir Robert Peel will be assisted by the whole Opposition, besides his own adherents, Mr. Miles pretends to make "a stand-up fight." Farmers, will you be deluded by such nonsense? Why, the protectionist members themselves admit that, if Sir Robert Peel would assent to a total and immediate free trade in corn, there would not be more than 70 members, out of the whole 638, found to divide against him. Mr. Hume naturally asked Miles the brave, "What his stand-up fight was about;" when up rose Ferrand, and expounded the approved protectionist objections to the tariff and the Canadian Corn Bill, and called on his friend "to stand firm, and not allow her Majesty's Government to taunt him with coming whining to the House." But it was reserved for Mr. Borthwick to give poor Mr. Miles his quietus. After stating that he (Mr. Borthwick) had offered a single-handed opposition—he could not accomplish a division—to the Canada Corn Bill, he said:—

"Why did gentlemen, who supported the Government on that occasion, now come forward with motions which they knew it was impossible to carry? These were the gentlemen who told the farmers of the country to look to them for protection. (LAUGHTER.) It was now too late—it was a day behind the fair—to bring forward this question. Did they not all vote with her Majesty's Government on the occasion alluded to? What, then, was the meaning of the resolution which the member for Somersetshire had proposed to the House? He might as well propose that two and two made four. The resolution merely proposed that in any scheme for adjusting the taxation of the country due deference should be had to the agricultural interest. Now, the hon. member for Stockport might affirm—and it was probable that he would affirm—that proposition. It was also probable that her Majesty's Government would affirm that proposition. It was a vote that might be unanimously carried by the whole House. What, then, did the hon. gentleman mean by that proposition? Was it meant for any practical purpose under heaven? (Hear.) He (Mr. Borthwick) had voted with the hon. member for Somersetshire on every motion brought forward in favour of the agricultural interest, and he (Mr. Borthwick) was prepared to vote in behalf of that interest whenever a practical motion should be submitted to the House. He was sure the right hon. gentleman (Sir R. Peel) would give him credit, at least for this, if for nothing else, that he was not addicted to whining, cringing, or flattery. (LAUGHTER.) If the hon. member for Somersetshire intended to support the agricultural interest, he should recollect that he was now proposing a proposition which the hon. member for Stockport would affirm. Suppose the hon. member for Somersetshire carried his resolution, what would be the effect of it? The House of Commons would have affirmed that, whenever the budget was before the House, the agricultural interest was deserving of consideration. What would be gained by such a motion? Not one practical result. On that account, although he should continue to support the agricultural interest on practical grounds, he should vote against the proposition. Whatever might be the intention with which that proposition was brought forward, he (Mr. Borthwick) was sure it could have no other effect than to mystify and delude the farmers and the people of England. Alas! for the poor farmers of England, they were perishing through the assistance of their friends. (Hear, hear.) On all the mockeries that had ever been thrown against the farmers of England, the most consummate mockery would be a resolution of the House of Commons in the form proposed by the hon. gentleman. (Laughter.)

This was followed up by Sir Robert, who, with ludicrous mock gravity, said:—

"He did not intend to put the same construction on it as his hon. friend behind him—that it might be understood as conveying a truism in which he (Sir R. Peel) could concur. He thought it would be impossible for the House to affirm that resolution, without implying an opinion that the measures proposed by her Majesty's Government might not be carried. (Hear, hear.) Although the resolution might appear to be abstractedly true, yet the construction put upon it by agriculturists out of doors must certainly be, that there ought to be some remuneration of taxation immediately bearing on the agricultural interest. If the House voted that resolution without following it up by measures of that nature, it appeared to him they would be practising a deception. (Hear, hear.) As he intended to adhere to those remissions of duty proposed on the part of her Majesty's Government, on cotton, wool, glass, customs, &c., it was totally out of his power to confirm that resolution, whether abstractedly true or not."

Now, if Mr. Miles can persuade himself that his motion could be anything but a "sham," surely he must be the only man in the three kingdoms gifted with such an amount of credulity.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, March 22, 1845.

"Monopoly exposed by the Monopolists" would be a very proper title for a narrative of the proceedings in the House of Commons on Wednesday night. Never did any member of the League charge the protectionists with such mean and mercenary motives as they themselves unwittingly avowed; never did we conceive that any Legislature could exhibit such a scene of peddling, huckstering selfishness, confessing its preposterous purpose of limiting the food of the poor in order to swell the purses of the rich, as was displayed in the debate on the Customs duties. Grease and lard were the subjects for which the monopolists claimed the continuance of protection, because the removal of the duty on these articles might possibly limit the demand for their kitchen-stuff and their dripping. Mr. Bramston opened the debate by expressing a fear that the removal of the duty on grease might afford an opportunity for the introduction of butter under that title,—butter, in the opinion of the Bramston class, being far too great a luxury for the stomachs of operatives and labourers. With amiable simplicity, so perfect as to be beyond the consciousness of the ridicule it provoked, Sir George Clerk expounded the paternal care which the Government exercised in the abridgment of the food of the labouring classes. He assured the House that when butter was imported under the name of grease, it was immediately mixed with tar, so as to render it utterly unfit for human food. In this state, however, he declared that it was very fit for greasing the backs of sheep; and he dwelt with great complacency on the scientific merits of the process which thus kept butter from the stomachs of the poor to improve the flocks of the wealthy sheep-owners. Poisoning of food seems to have become an important part of our financial system ever since Gladstone expressed his approbation of the policy of the Chinese in poisoning their wells; the senior Gladstone, in the name of the West India interest, demands the adulteration of sugar; Sir George Clerk dwells upon the filthy process by which butter is rendered unfit for food, as if he were describing not merely the most innocent but the most laudable thing in the world. Artistic starvation and scientific famine are the avowed objects of the policy of monopoly. As arsenic is to be imported duty free, and as the use of it is about as cheap as tar and rather more effectual, we suggest to the friends of the labourers and the patrons of the distressed needlewomen, that the mixture of arsenic with foreign butter would be an improvement on their plans for confining the labourers to limited quantities of dry bread, and preventing the needlewomen from adding a relish to their taxed loaves.

The bleatings of the sheep-owners, which might have been mistaken for those of the sheep, softened those hearts which were steeled against the supplications of the labourers and the needlewomen. Full assurance being given that the beneficence of the Legislature had no reference whatever to humanity, and that the policy of starvation should be preserved in tact so far as grease was concerned, Mr. Bramston withdrew his opposition, in which he and his class would undoubtedly have persevered if they thought that one atom of the grease would be abstracted from the backs of the sheep to feed the English peasant.

This favour shown to English sheep led some gentleman who rejoices in the euphonious name of Grogan to appeal to the House on behalf of Irish pigs. The reporters have cruelly burked the arguments by which this gentleman maintained the cause of Irish pigs versus the English people; but they must have been of some weight, for they won him English support. The hucksters of kitchen-stuff and dripping declared that the admission of lard would deprive them of the pence and twopences which they obtain from the sale of their culinary refuse to the distressed peasantry; and they contended for the preservation of this petty, miserable source of gain with as much zeal as ever hero showed for the success of his cause, or martyr was their zeal, that it quite ran away with their logic. Sir John Tyrrel, who very appropriately set himself forth as the patron of the kitchens of Essex, replied to Mr. Villiers's indignant denunciation of such petty cheating of the poor, by charging him with the possession of a sinecure. If the charge were as true as it is notoriously false, no animal possessing intelligence above the average of the calves of Essex could find out any earthly connexion between a place in Chancery and the abstraction of lard from the poor man's bill of fare, that he might be forced to purchase the squire's kitchen-stuff and dripping. Mr. Villiers's reply was crushing. But infinitely more galling to the protectionists was the reproof which they received from Mr. Peter Borthwick—this was the ass kicking the dead lion with a vengeance; it was a proof of their fallen estate infinitely more galling than the castigation which they received from Major Wyndham.

A desperate effort to retrieve his party was made by that lady-like gentleman, Mr. Stafford O'Brien; he avowed that the object of the Protection Society was to prevent cheapness of provision. Now, as cheapness is the result of abundance, and dearthness of scarcity, the obvious meaning of the worthy member's words is that the Protection Societies have been instituted to produce high prices by artificial starvation.

From the proposition thus nakedly stated by Mr. Cobden the protectionists loudly dissented, and thus exposed themselves to the bitter taunt of supporting a system of policy so palpably and detestably bad that they could not dare to face a definition of its principles. The patrons of the Irish pigs and English kitchen-perquisites felt themselves so completely damaged that they would not venture on a division; and so lard is to be admitted for the use of machinery in the north and men in the south of England. It would have been too great an elevation for the peasants and agricultural labourers to be placed on a level with the sheep of the Cheviots: let them be grateful for being raised to the same rank as the wheels and turning-shafts of the mills of Lancashire.

When Mr. Disraeli tauntingly asked on Monday night "where are the country gentlemen of England now?" he could not have anticipated that on Wednesday night their condition would be not merely deplorable, but utterly contemptible. From our souls we pity them; our sorrow over their fallen estate is too potent for our indignation. They have been the victims of "the organized hypocrisy" which established a Government of false pretences, a tariff that has unsettled everything and almost settled nothing, a system of protection the existence of which its author refuses to guarantee for a single year, and a social condition of uncertainty which has destroyed all confidence in public men and almost in public principle. Raised to power for the purpose of maintaining monopoly, Peel has loosed its foundations by peddling with minor articles which may serve as clap-nets for popularity, while he conserves the giant monopolies of corn and sugar. The protectionists see "the handwriting on the wall" in this abandonment of principle: the menace of the Premier on Mr. Miles's motion "that he is not prepared to maintain the present amount of protection" was received as an ominous hint of future change. The protectionists have acted like rogues servants escaping from a falling house, each striving to carry off the bit of plunder most convenient to his hand: Mr. Bramston seizes the butter-bait, Mr. Stafford O'Brien the dagger, and Sir John Tyrrel the dripping-pan; and spectators fail to raise the cry of "Stop thief!" because they are choked with laughter at the ridiculous figure which the fugitives cut while wielding such implements.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Journal des Débats states that a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between France and the Imam of Muscat was signed on the 17th of November at Zanzibar.

THE LATE FATAL DUEL IN PARIS.—The Paris papers publish the details of the funeral of M. Dujaquier, one of the gerants of La Presse. From those particulars it appears that a very large concourse of persons, friends of the deceased, including nearly the entire corps of writers and editors of journals and other periodicals of Paris, were present on the melancholy occasion. The pall was held by MM. Emile de Girardin (member of the Chamber of Deputies, and editor in chief of La Presse), Alexandre Dumas, De Balzac, and Mery. The coffin, having been lowered into the grave, M. Emile de Girardin, in a voice which betrayed the deepest intensity of feeling, pronounced over it an affecting discourse, in the course of which he quoted the words of the deceased: "I am about to fight a duel for the most absurd and futile of causes," written with a firm and unshaken hand an hour before he was mortally wounded. I well know," said the speaker, "that to me belongs less than to others to use here the words 'religion' and 'reason'; and I am not about to employ that elevated language, but that which becomes me." What I may here say is, that neither this duel (of which I had no previous knowledge) nor other duels not less grievous, would ever have been to be deplored, if it and they had been prefaced by a statement, precise in its details, going back to the origin of the pro-vocation, and containing all the explanations given by the two parties, and such statement, well digested and drawn up by the four customary seconds, had been deposited in the hands of a third party." It is worthy of note that it was Girardin who, in 1836, fought a duel with and killed Armand Carrel, the celebrated republican editor of the National.

THE CONSULATE AND THE EMPIRE.—The first edition of the "History of the Consulate and Empire," by M. Thiers, which appeared in Paris on Saturday, was completely exhausted in the course of a few hours. At four o'clock 10,000 copies had been sold, and 6000 of a new edition, then in the press, were bespoken.

DREADFUL CALAMITY AT ALGERS.—The Moniteur Algerien of the 10th inst. announces the occurrence in that city of a dreadful catastrophe. At ten o'clock in the evening of the 8th, the gunpowder deposited in the stores of the park of artillery took fire, blew up that building, and occasioned the destruction of various others situated between it and the Admiralty, which was fortunately spared. Those magazines contained but a small quantity of gunpowder, which could not have produced so destructive an effect, and it was supposed that some unknown depot of gunpowder, buried there previous to the conquest, may have contributed to give additional intensity to the explosion. 43 workmen of the artillery, 31 pontooners, 10 artillery soldiers, and 2 engineers, were found dead in their quarters, and 30 were more or less desperately wounded. The sergeant-major of the armours and his wife and child equally perished. The controller, M. Piron, expired after undergoing the amputation of his leg. Five other sub-officers suffered the same fate. Commander Palard was also among the victims of the terrible accident.

BRUSSELS, March 16.—In consequence of the continuance of the cold, vegetables are extravagantly dear, and so scarce that many persons, residing in the distant quarters, find it difficult to procure any. The farmers sell their cattle, being unable to feed them. The supply of milk in the city is insufficient; great fears are felt for the crops; as for statistics of pauperism, we dare not touch on that subject. The average price of wheat in the week ending the 22nd of February, was 16s. 30c., and that of rye, 10s. 28c. per hectolitre.—Brussels paper.

PORTUGAL.—The Government Diario of the 6th inst. gives an account of some serious disturbances which have taken place in the neighbourhood of Felgueiras, in which the military have come into collision with the country people, and some blood has been spilled. The affair grew out of the resistance of the people and the wine-growers to an additional impost upon green wines.

The Times correspondent, writing from Lisbon, says:—"In the midst of the wonderful impetus which the forward movement has undeniably taken in this country, and which is so unlooked-for that many very worthy but old-fashioned people are still incredulous and shake their heads, the price of agricultural produce alone are keeping on their downward and ruinous course. Here we have a country, comparatively speaking, untitled, and with high protective duties, yet, with such a lavish abundance of grain in the market, that it has turned unsaleable, holders being driven to re-export, and the agricultural classes left penniless. How can they pay their tributes? It is a subject which calls loudly for the investigation of the Legislature—enlightened and untiring investigation, not the lazy 'thank Heaven for cheap bread and all its other blessings!' Hitherto the attempts made to sound the depths of this mystery have been most futile, and left it in more vexatious perplexity than ever."

Official intelligence had been received at Madrid by the Spanish Government, from Portugal, of the breaking out of an insurrection, supposed to have a political tendency, at Felgueiras, in the province of Mino, which borders on Galicia and Old Castile. The insurgents and the troops had had a contest, and it was reported that there were several killed and wounded on both sides, but no further details had transpired.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Feb. 26.—Information was received here by the last steam-packet from Trebizond, of the expulsion of the Capuchin missionaries, sent by the French Propaganda into Georgia. The alternative was offered to, but rejected by, them, of submitting to the authority of the Greek Patriarch. Dr. Wolff arrived here by the same packet from Trebizond. The rev. gentleman has, in great measure, recovered from the fatigues of his journey. He has been accompanied here by an ambassador from Bokhara, whose original destination was to the Court of London, but who, having been informed by Colonel Shiel that he would on no account be received there, will proceed no further than Constantinople. He is the bearer of letters to the Sultan and the Grand Vicer.

UNITED STATES.—The Hibernia arrived at Liverpool on Monday, bringing news from Boston to the 1st inst. Mr. Polk, the new President elect, had arrived at Washington. He was to deliver his inaugural address on the 4th inst. The Texas question has engrossed nearly all the attention of both houses of Congress; but, besides

THE "CLERK OF THE WEATHER,"
TO
E. MOSEN AND SON.
Dear Sir, in reply to the verses you wrote, I have taken occasion to send you a note. I certainly think you have a good reason To be quite out of patience with winter's long season; But, gentlemen, much brighter days are at hand, When a beautiful Spring will conquer the land. You asked me, you know, Mosen and Son, To speak with the Winter, and this I have done. I inquired how long he intended to stay, And I said you were all in a terrible way. I told him the birds were all in a terrible way, And that you had prepared your new stock for the Spring. I explained that the dresses of Mosen and Son Could never be worn till the Winter is done; And when I had talked with the King for awhile, I succeeded in making him merry and smile. And, Sir, he assured me, before I had done, That he'd not disappoint Mosen and Son, From this I conclude that your opportune rhyme Will produce its effect in a very short time; And now, in the hope that you'll long trade together, I remain, yours sincerely, THE CLERK OF THE WEATHER.

THE Public are respectfully informed that HENRY PENNY'S ORIGINAL METALLIC PAPER MEMORANDUM BOOKS are to be had of any respectable Stationer in town or country; and the Trade can be supplied by any of the wholesale houses in London. Nine years' extensive sale has proved that the writing on METALLIC PAPER (when chemically prepared) is not to be obliterated, neither will the friction of the leaves at all deface it as with the common paper and lead pencil. H. P. would take this opportunity of cautioning the Public against the many spurious imitations bearing the name of Metallic, but which in fact are not in any way prepared, and are written on with common lead (made like Metallic Pencils), but are no better than red wax. In order to protect the public from such impostures, H. P. has recently commenced making METALLIC BOOKS of a Second Quality of Binding, which causes a Considerable Reduction in Price, so that now can be obtained the original books in the Best and Second Bindings. H. P. has ascertained that many books have been sold bearing the name "Penny" in Gold Letters on the back, which were not made by him, all his Best Books have H. PENNY'S IMPROVED PATENT, with the No. of the book in Gold Letters on the back (obverse H.). And his Second Quality have a label inside, printed, H. PENNY'S Second Quality.

ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE.
PATRONISED BY HER MAJESTY "THE QUEEN," THE ROYAL FAMILY, AND THE SEVERAL SOVEREIGNS AND COURTS OF EUROPE.
A FRAGRANT WHITE POWDER, prepared from Oriental Gems of inestimable virtue for preserving and beautifying the TEETH. It eradicates the facitious formation of tartar, and thus lends a salutary growth and freshness to the gums. It removes from the surface of the teeth the spots of insipid decay, polishes, and preserves the enamel, imparting the most pure and pearl-like whiteness, while from its calcareous and disintegrating qualities, it gives sweetness and perfume to the breath. Being an anti-scurbutic, the gums also share in its corrective power; scurvy is eradicated from them, a healthy action and redness are induced, so that the teeth (if loose) are thus rendered firm in their sockets. As the most efficient and fragrant aromatic essence of the month, tooth, and gums ever known, ROWLAND'S ODONTO has now for a long series of years occupied a distinguished place at the tables of the SOVEREIGNS and the NOBILITY throughout Europe, while the general demand for it is so once announced the favour in which it is held by the public at large.
Price 2s. 6d. per box, duty included.

CAUTION.
To protect the Public from Fraud, the Hon. Commissioners of Stamps have directed the Proprietors' Signature to be engraved on the Government Stamp, thus:—

NEGLECTED GUARANTEES OF PEACE.

It is no part of our business to discuss questions of foreign politics. The matters, in particular, which form the subject of the recent intelligence from America are such as we could be quite contented, so far as their intrinsic importance is concerned, to pass over in silence. Whether the Government of Oregon be administered by Lord Charles Fitz, or Sir John That, in the name of Queen Victoria, or by plain Mr. or Messrs. Somebody in the name of the people and state of Oregon itself,—and whether Texas shall remain a separate and independent member of the family of nations, or enter into federal alliance with the adjacent states of the American Union,—are questions, in themselves considered, of very subordinate moment. The only interest which Great Britain and humanity have in connexion with them, is that Oregon and Texas should be governed by the power that can govern them best—should possess the internal institutions, and be placed in the external relations, best fitted to promote the development of their natural resources, and to render them the abodes of happy, well-ordered communities of human beings. With the special arrangements most suitable for this end we have, as Free-Traders, no immediate concern—as Englishmen, no concern worth the thought of a moment, in comparison with the vast national and human interests involved in the maintenance of the peace of the world.

It is impossible, however, to receive such tidings as those which this week has brought, and to contemplate their menacing aspects with regard to the highest interests of Christian civilization, without being bitterly reminded of the monopoly against which we are leagued. Landlord legislation has now brought us, to all appearance, on the very brink of the most fearful calamity that could befall Great Britain and humanity. That we are, at this moment, in danger of war with the United States; that there is a real, and a not remote, probability of two of the first Christian nations of the earth—nations the most closely allied in blood, language, interests, laws, and religion—rushing into the mad wickedness of wholesale and organized fratricide, is the doing of monopoly. But for the Corn Law, such a war would rank, by this time, in the highest class of moral and political impossibilities. Were the commercial relations of Great Britain and America what they might be, what God and nature plainly designed that they should be—what, without the Corn Law, they infallibly would be—such questions as those of Texas and Oregon might arise, indeed, from time to time, but they would be utterly incapable of imperilling the peace of the two countries. Any sort of settlement or unsettlement of such matters would be cheerfully acquiesced in by either people, as preferable to the crimes and horrors of a conflict ruinous to both.

What are the natural commercial relations of Great Britain and America? We cannot better indicate these than by simply copying the figures of the occupation returns made by the census commissioners of each country. They stand thus:—

	Agriculture.	Commerce, Trade, and Manufactures.
United States, 1840 .. ..	3,719,951 ..	909,356
Great Britain, 1841 .. ..	1,215,264 ..	3,110,376

Can anything more palpably show that these two countries are made for one another—made each to be the complement of the other's existence. Granary and workshop; plough and loom; boundless natural fertility, and boundless mechanical skill and invention; agriculture and manufactures, whose respective powers of production and capacity of consumption may be said to be practically infinite;—was there ever, since the world began, such a case of fitness for mutual help, service, and dependence, such a provision for perpetual amity and brotherhood? That war between two countries so posited and related, so deeply pledged, by the fundamental conditions of their respective modes of existence, to peace and friendship, should war become so much as a possibility, is a burning disgrace to that legislation which has done its uttermost to convert a civilizing and humanizing mutual dependence into mutual "independence" and isolation. Which country is right, and which wrong, in the particular questions now at issue, we care not to ask. That any such questions should involve the hideous possibility of a bloody issue is our wrong. The trembling anxiety with which we now await every arrival of news from America is the penalty—Heaven grant it be the worst penalty—of our slavish tolerance of landlord legislation, with its savage and stupid dogma of "Independence of Foreigners."

Nothing can be more disastrously complete than the way in which we have rent asunder, to the utmost of our power, those securities for peace provided for by the natural relations of the two countries. We have called into existence, in the northern and eastern states, a monopolist manufacturing power directly interested in war and high prices. We have left the central and western agricultural states without any visible and strong interest in peace. And the cotton-growing states of the south—the only section of the Union which has still a vital commercial interest in the maintenance of peaceful relations with us—we have grievously irritated, by our unjust, offensive, palpably hypocritical, and pitifully futile devices for the repression of slavery and the slave trade. As our corn monopoly has raised up rivals in the north, and left us without friends in the west, our sugar monopoly, with the pretences on which it is founded, has, so far as commercial interests allow, cooled and alienated the south.

While we cannot overlook the fact that the connexion of the Texas question with the anticipated extension and perpetuation of slavery gives it an importance far beyond what attaches to any Oregon or boundary dispute, we must also express our conviction that the evils which humanity has to apprehend from the meditated annexation are fatally aggravated by our own monopolist policy. By protecting free labour against the competition of slave labour, we tell all the world that slavery is good industrial economy—that we, who have tried both, and are therefore able to speak from experience, have discovered slave labour to be the better of the two. We at once confess an economical blunder, and boast a moral superiority. By one and the same act we confirm the slaveowner in his prejudices and wound him in his pride. Is it possible to provide with more deadly effect for the extension and perpetuity of the detestable institution, in whose favour we thus enlist both the cupidity and the passions of its defenders? This Texas question need have no terrors for philanthropy, if philanthropy would but have faith in the doctrine which it once so strenuously preached, of the intrinsic economical superiority of the labour of freemen over that of slaves. Only demonstrate that—and Texas and the States may do as they like. Abolish the West Indian monopoly; rescind that "protection" which all our recent information shows to be the "bane" of colonial as it is of home agriculture; demonstrate, in the facts and figures of the London Price Current, that freedom and science can grow cheaper sugar than slavery and barbarism,—and slavery dies a natural death. Do this, and we may recall our cruisers from the African coast, burn our right-of-search treaties, and look on with perfect complacency while the two independent powers of Texas and the Union enter into such federal relations as they may deem mutually advantageous.

Notwithstanding the alarming complexion of the intelligence of this week, we still cherish the hope and belief that war between Great Britain and the United States is at present morally impossible. The wide, deep, various, old-established interests created and cemented by that commercial intercourse, which not all our miserable monopolist restrictions have been able to put down, constitute a power which, in conjunction with the intelligence, civilization, and Christianity of the two countries, will, we trust, be strong enough to avert so horrible a calamity. But let the friends of peace beware. The danger is real, permanent, and growing. Of late years, questions more or less imperilling our pacific relations with the United States have arisen with ominous frequency. Some of these have been set at rest by diplomacy—others have died away in the course of events: but new ones continue to make their appearance, and each successive crisis of hostile discussion seems to bring us nearer to war than the one that preceded it. It is hardly in the nature of things that this perpetual talk of war, this mischievous and perilous familiarity with the idea of war, should always be found consistent with the actual maintenance of peace. We much fear that, without the timely administration of that corrective which free commercial intercourse can alone supply, out of all these recurring and accumulated irritations war will come at last—a war more disastrous to the interests and more disgraceful to the character of the belligerent nations—more ruinous to the best hopes of civilization, freedom, and humanity—more outrageously foolish, and more horribly wicked than the worst war yet known to history.

THE GREAT KITCHEN QUESTION.

Monopoly, always odious, has become utterly contemptible: Sir George Clerk's description of the filthy process by which butter is rendered unfit for human food has disgusted every man, woman, and child in the empire unconnected with the base interests of protection. He has rendered the injustice of monopoly level to the meanest capacity,—we beg pardon, it was not obvious to his own; but official capacities and natural capacities, however mean, are not always convertible terms. There is what Mr. Gladstone calls "a great principle" in the monopolies of sugar and corn: they have the grandeur of Jack Sheppard or Claude du Val; but the petty peddling in butter and lard descends to the level of Bill Smees or Ikey Solomons;—we come down from the highway-robber to the pickpocket. "Where is our 60s. per quarter?" had something of majesty in the melancholy of its interrogation; but "where is my penny on the dripping and my farthing on the grease?" is so utterly mean and despicable, that contempt actually overcomes indignation, and we cannot hate because we thoroughly despise. The stolid complacency with which Sir George Clerk assured the country gentlemen of England that he would continue to gratify them by limiting the luxuries of the nursery, and the gusto with which he described the disgusting process of pollution by which the policy of artificial famine makes infancy contribute to swell the luxuries of monopolists, have revolted the common sense and good feelings of all classes. It has been asked, what must have thought of the hearts and heads of the persons whom he hoped to gratify by his filthy revelations? If such policy is to be consistently carried out, Tawell instead of being sent to the scaffold, should have been appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. Venetian is said to have consoled himself for the unpopularity of a dirty tax by declaring that the money did not retain any scent of the source from which it was derived; and a similar consolation may be used by those who eke out the enjoyments of the drawing-room by the sale of the petty savings of the kitchen. If butter were admitted free there would be little sale for kitchen-stuff and dripping. The old story of the "Three Bears" has been whimsically realized:—"Who has been meddling with my porridge, and taken away the promised 56s. per quarter?" shouts Lord Beaumont; "Who has been meddling with my porridge, and lowered mutton a penny a pound?" roars Mr. Miles; and "Who has been meddling with my porridge—the kitchen-stuff and dripping—and eaten it all up by admitting lard?" whines Sir John Tyrell. But, while we cannot forbear laughing at the absurdity of the farce which the newspapers have reported under the title of "the grease-and-lard debate," we cannot but feel vexed at the utter disregard for public opinion manifested by the actors. Plotting in the face of the nation to raise the price of food by an admixture of poison or disgusting trash with supplies of provisions, would, we should have thought, have been considered too odious a performance to be hazarded in public. We have been mistaken: a Minister of the Crown takes credit for skilfulness in poisoning food, and more than one member for a county claimed the honour of becoming the champion of the greasy perquisites of kitchen-stuff and dripping. When Sinbad had the Old Man of the Sea on his back—that lively prototype of Monopoly bestriding a nation—he suffered most pain when the monster was in one of his farcical moods and inclined to display a little humour; we, too, must confess that monopoly has become more intolerable since it has become utterly contemptible, and that the Corn Laws have become to us tenfold more odious since Sir George Clerk has explained their connexion with the mixture of tar and butter. A bad punster ascribes this policy to Peel's anxiety to become an imitator of Canning: the liberation of classic Greece was effected by a British tar—Sir Edward Canning; and Peel has applied the precedent by requiring British tar for the liberation of that grease which is anything but classical.

In the next discussion on the tariff we trust that some member will raise the question of the admission of cheese and butter. No ogres will be more dreaded in the nurseries than those who enforce upon the children the eating of dry bread. Monopoly in juvenile imaginations will take the place of Blue Beard; Sir George Clerk will be the wolf in the tale waiting for Little Red Riding Hood's pot of butter, and his taking the place of "the Grandmother" will be explained by his occasional contributions to the Morning Herald; what old foggy shall become Old Bogie we do not venture to predict.

It is impossible to discuss the great kitchen question with seriousness; ludicrous associations beset us on all hands. The figure of Sir John Tyrell scraping off the butter from the bread of a squalling child; the image of Mr. Stafford O'Brien dealing out pennyworths of dripping; Sir George Clerk armed with the tar-stick; Mr. Bramston deliberating on the perquisites of the cook; and Peter Northwick reading them all a moral lecture on the shabbiness of such petty pickings, force themselves upon the imagination, and form themselves into grotesque groups more ludicrous than all the combinations of Gilray's caricatures. The Premier can neither keep his face nor his temper when the reminiscences of the "great kitchen debate" rise in his mind; for he knows that when protective policy becomes a scramble of hucksters, no plausibilities can ever again raise it to the dignity of a principle. Amusing as was the spectacle afforded by the representatives of the kitchen interest, we cannot avoid regretting that such a degradation befel the country gentlemen of England. "How are the mighty fallen!" Pity appeals against scorn; and we are therefore induced for the present to bestow upon them the charity of silence.

THE BAZAAR.

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say at last there seems to be getting a right feeling respecting the intended Bazaar, here; and I have just had a friend of mine with a very curious Indian hammock, a most beautiful article, that he wishes to send to your Bazaar; and I intend to exhibit it in my shop to try and induce others to send curiosities. Please let me know when it will be necessary to forward it, and any other things that can be got. Waiting your reply,
"I am, dear Sir, your obedient servant,
"G. Wilson, Esq." "R. ANDREWS."

"DEAR SIR,—My object in writing you just now is, to say that I regretted that we had no movement here to aid the Bazaar which is to take place in London in favour of the League; and to endeavour to remedy this lack of zeal—which arises not from indifference to the cause, but from parties being mostly of one way of thinking as to the repeal of the Corn Laws—I communicated with some of the woollen manufacturers in this district, suggesting the propriety of having a table with goods of their manufacture: they would consist chiefly of woollen tartans, shawls, plaids, dresses, vest pieces, blankets, &c. For this object we had a meeting at Alton yesterday, at which it was agreed to take up subscriptions in goods or money; and local committees were appointed to carry the resolution into effect. I am, &c. &c."

"George Wilson, Esq." "ROBERT SMITH."

"DEAR SIR,—We have received offers of aid from various quarters, principally in pecuniary donations. Last week I sent a note to Dr. Lingard, with whom I have the honour to be privately acquainted, suggesting that a work of his, with autograph, would be acceptable; and I had the gratification to receive in answer a copy of his "History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church," 2 vols. 8vo., with autograph in each volume. It is no small fact for the League, that one of the most honest and learned divines of the age has thus again recorded his approbation of the course they have taken for the promotion of Free-Trade principles. Yours, very faithfully,
"J. Hickin, Esq." "THOS. JOHNSON."

"SIR,—I have much pleasure in forwarding my annual subscription to the League; also in informing you that my son (who is a shipbuilder here) is employing his leisure hours in preparing a draught for a ship, to register about 400 tons, which he intends to present to the League Bazaar. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
"A. W. Paulton, Esq." "THOS. TURNBULL."

"SIR,—I have observed in the letters of several of your Bazaar correspondents that autographs and papers of celebrated men, to some extent, are promised to be forwarded to you. I have prepared a variety of ornamental coloured borders, which, if approved, may be used to mount such autographs, as well as any choice drawings, &c. The designs are my own, and, being all coloured and finished by hand, they all vary.

"As a humble contributor to the great national cause, I beg to present sufficient designs for one book, which, when bound, I flatter myself will be found worthy of a place amongst the numerous and more valuable productions of British art and industry.

"I shall be happy to take charge of any selection of autographs, &c., for arrangement and mounting, if you so wish.

"I also beg leave to add that, should any parties feel inclined to make similar donations, I shall readily submit additional specimens, to the extent of three or four books, for their inspection.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
"RICHD. A. HARRISON."
"Geo. Wilson, Esq., Chairman, &c. &c."

[From the kindly offer contained in the above letter we beg to remind those friends who have promised to send valuable autographs to the Bazaar, that now would be the appropriate time for so doing, as the promised assistance of our correspondent would enable us to present them to the public in the most tasteful and elegant form.]

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

REVIEW OF THE DEBATES ON THE BUDGET.

The "Budget" is a term at once familiar and expressive. It is now becoming superseded by the less significant but more verbally correct phrase of "Financial Statement;" and therefore young politicians (who are apt to be as puzzling in their questions as young metaphysicians) will no longer be in danger of supposing that, on Budget night, the Chancellor of the Exchequer enters the House of Commons with a wallet on his back, or carrying "a little coffer or trunk of wood, such as the women of old time carried at their saddle-bows containing their jewels, attires, or trinkets when they rode into the country; or as the box or till of the cabinets of the gentlemen, wherein they keep their money." Nevertheless, we are partial to the use of the term "Budget." It has an old English sound about it; and in a single word conveys the idea of that opening of the state of the country which is revealed when we learn how much money we collect, and how much we expend; what taxes are to be remitted, or what laid on; how it fares with commerce in the returns of the customs; how with the consumption of the people in the state of the exchequer: in short, whether, as a nation, we are commercially and pecuniarily prosperous, or are incurring the risk of being unable to maintain our establishments and sustain our credit.

The financial year closes on the 5th of April; and it is usually a few days, or even a week or two, after that date, before the Budget is opened. But this year it has been brought forward unusually early. It having been announced in the speech from the throne that the income-tax would be proposed for renewal, in order to afford the means of making reductions in indirect taxation, the First Lord of the Treasury very judiciously resolves on making his "financial statement" on an early day, in order to set speculation at rest; and Friday the 14th of February was fixed for that purpose.

Ordinarily the Budget is an affair interesting only to politicians and commercial men; the rest of the world professing indifference to a dry statement of figures and accounts, the nature of which they very imperfectly comprehend. But this year the anxiety and the interest respecting the Budget have taken a much wider range. There seems to be a much larger number of people who feel a sharper concern in official facts and figures. A vague notion is afloat that something extraordinary is to be proposed; and members are literally besieged with applications for orders of admission to the strangers' gallery in the House of Commons. At four o'clock on the appointed day the lobby is crowded; depend upon it there are two or three hundred more in that crowd than the little gallery can accommodate. Even members are not indifferent to the necessity of coming down early in order to be in their places; and the absent have already secured their seats by affixing their cards. Along the side gallery facing the Treasury bench there is a throng who prefer it because it enables them with greater comfort and facility to hear the statement, which is to be made by the First Lord of the Treasury, instead, as is usual, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Public business is to commence at half-past four; and it is now five-and-twenty minutes to five. Sir Robert Peel enters, and takes his place. A member carries a little square scarlet-covered box, which he hands to the Prime Minister, who places it on the table; it contains his official documents. Sir Robert Peel rises, and, addressing the SPEAKER in an under tone, moves the first "order of the day," which is, that the House resolve itself into a Committee of Ways and Means. The question is put,—"As many as are of that opinion say Ay, on the contrary, No; the ayes have it." The SPEAKER then descends from the chair; a clerk rises, and lifts the mace, which is placed under the table; and a member, in plain clothes, takes his seat in a chair in front, but on the right side of the Speaker's chair, which is left empty; and the House is in committee.

Sir Robert Peel rises, and addressing the chairman of committees by name—Mr. Greene—commences his financial statement. He tells you what the Government had calculated on receiving into the Exchequer during the past year, and what they actually did get; how much they have expended; what they expect, and what they mean to expend; the reasons for increased expenditure; and why there can be no reduction in our establishments. The national debt is so much, and faith must be kept with the public creditor. The Civil List is a contract, and cannot be touched: nay, her Majesty deserves credit, for, with four children, and much additional expense in receiving the visits of Sovereigns, she contracts no debt, and makes no new demand. The Army is also unassailable: our colonies are now forty-five in number, and require adequate protection, and our troops are under the amount requisite for effectual relief; while, instead of diminishing the Navy, we are going to increase it, in order to protect our commerce adequately, and to enable our steam marine to keep pace with improvements. There will, therefore, be little or no money in hand at the end of the year. But renew the Property and Income Tax, and we will have a surplus; and with it we will reduce the duties on sugar; abolish duties on exports; take away import duties on raw materials; let the cabinet-maker and the cooper have their wood and their staves at a cheaper rate; permit oils, minerals, dye-stuffs, and drugs to come in without paying dues at the Custom-house; enable the cotton manufacturer to get his cotton wool free of duty; take off the auction duty; and, by abolishing the excise on glass, set a beautiful manufacture entirely free from inquisitorial inspection and the payment of heavy rates, and you may thus rival the glass-manufacturers of France, Belgium, and Bohemia, make glass springs for chronometers, or glass pipes to convey water; and with our coke, our alkali, and our capital, supply the world, benefit science, improve the habitations of the humbler classes, and immensely benefit all classes. "I will lose nearly four millions of revenue by the experiment," says the Prime Minister; "but give me the Property and Income Tax for three years more, and I will do it."

He sits down; the House rings with cheers; you look at the clock, and are amazed at the fact that the speech to which you have listened has occupied nearly three hours and a half. In itself, this is a great physical effort; yet it has been gone through without much apparent distress to the utterer, and without tedium or pain to the listeners. This is the great charm of Sir Robert Peel's eloquence. He neither startles nor tires you; he does not work you up to enthusiasm, but he preserves you from all consciousness of fatigue. Whenever, as on this occasion, it is his purpose and his wish to make his meaning clear, the object is accomplished by the ars est celere artem—the art which conceals its art. There is not a man who has listened to that speech of more than three hours—dealing with dry facts and figures—who does not go away with a perfect comprehension of it all. No member of the present House of Commons surpasses Sir Robert Peel in that artistic management of his topics, and that level clearness and facility of expression, which imprint on the mind a fac-simile of the speech. He is continuous without monotony, fascinating without fire, and calm (at least on all ordinary occasions) without feebleness. Rarely ascending, he scarcely ever descends; when he attempts the higher flights of oratory he becomes turgid, and therefore fails; but he may be said never to open his mouth without addressing himself to the apprehension of his hearers, and gathering together, in business-like order and lucid arrangement, the scattered topics of a debate. There are, indeed, times when it is his object to speak beside the question; or when he desires to direct attention from a particular topic; and then he can confuse nearly as well as he can enlighten. But his great quality is that combined uniformity of mind and voice which carry him through a long statement at a sustained level, without exhausting his own powers, or those of his auditors.

Lord Stanley has far more fire, is much more rapid, and is quite as clear, but his oratory, though it be higher, is more fitful and less continuous. Sir James Graham can make what is called "a heavy pounding speech," when the topic is a party one, and he is excited; but in delivering a calm official statement his manner is tame, and his voice is frequently indistinct and low. Mr. Macaulay is grand and stately in his diction; but his nervous anxiety in every speech to keep himself up to the mark hurries him too impetuously on, and a huskiness of voice combined with rapidity detract from his orations, which read better than they are spoken. Mr. Sheil is nothing unless he is artistically rhetorical; when speaking in ordinary phraseology, his shrillness, littleness, and mercurial movements are amusing rather than striking. Lord John Russell is very greatly improved as a speaker, and frequently throws out sententious phrases, which arrest, and leave an impression. Though Lord Palmerston has a fine figure, a good presence, and can deliver a speech which will rise higher in oratorical pretension, he is the inferior of Sir Robert Peel in readiness of mere elocution, and promptitude in command of topics and words. Mr. Gladstone might rival the Prime Minister in business-like clearness of style, did he not frequently overlay his subject with too many words.

Official men have a great advantage over independent members of the House, in opportunity for exhibiting and establishing a reputation. Heavy, uphill work it is, to "conquer a position"—to compel an unwilling assembly to listen to topics ungracious to its ears—to compel it not merely to listen to the subject, but to treat the subjecter with decent respect. Mere oratorical power is not enough, though without that it cannot be done. There is no happier detector of a fallacy or readier retorter in debate than Mr. Villiers—his pleasant sarcasms (sarcasm free from any taint of the malignant) animate sometimes a discussion drooping from want of vigorous opposition. With what felicity does Mr. Cobden seize on all the topics of his case, exhibiting the old in new lights, bringing out the question in fresh and novel aspects, and sustaining a continuous interest in it! Yet the terseness and humour of Mr. Villiers—the perspicacious felicities of Mr. Cobden—the unflinching courage of Mr. Bright—or the telling manner and spirit of Mr. Milner Gibson—even though aided by the explicitness of Howick, or the practicalism of Ricardo—would not have sufficed to give the Anti-Corn-Law League its present position in the House of Commons. Talent can command respect: but moral power is the result of faith in earnestness and singleness of purpose—a purpose which will never swerve from the pursuit of a great object, believed to be as necessary as just.

THE RESULTS OF THE BUDGET.

In the first week of the session, two leading men uttered their dicta on the subject of Protection. "I believe," said Lord John Russell, "that protection is not the support but the bane of agriculture." "The restoration of protection," said Sir Robert Peel, "is impossible." These were the heralds of the new state of things, which the discussions on the Budget more fully disclosed.

The Budget was brought forward on Friday the 14th; and on the following Monday the Free-Trade view of the sugar duties was opened by Mr. Milner Gibson, in a speech admitted by all who heard it to have been delivered with great vigour, and to have thoroughly exhausted the question. In this debate Messrs. Ricardo, Villiers, Cobden, Bright, and Lord Howick were the chief speakers, feebly opposed by Sir George Clerk, Mr. Gladstone, and one or two West India proprietors. On the following Wednesday, Mr. Macaulay pronounced that brilliant oration which so completely disposes of the moral argument. But though large majorities disposed, in their arbitrary way, both of arguments and amendments, the sugar duties afforded opportunities, none of which were lost, for renewed illustrations of the folly, the absurdity, the uselessness, and the mischief of differential duties; and the public, which some two or three years ago scarcely comprehended the nature or the meaning of a differential duty, has become so familiarised with the idea and the fact as to require no farther enlightenment on the subject. The debates on the sugar duties, therefore, constitute a part of that education of the public mind which forms a main portion of the public duties of the Anti-Corn-Law League. Through the Legislature it is acting on the public opinion of every mercantile country in the world; for there cannot be a doubt that these sugar duties debates are exercising an influence wherever sugar is grown as an exportable commodity—and that constitutes no small portion of the habitable globe.

But though sugar may be termed the staple of the Free-Trade discussions produced by the Budget, abundant opportunity has not been wanting for other exhibitions of its principles. Mr. Bright's committee on the Game Laws is not treble on two grounds—an evidence that the League is not exclusively devoting its attention to one view of one topic, and a proof that it now occupies an important position in the Legislature as well as in public opinion. Mr. Charles Buller's amendment on the income-tax also furnished evidence of a disposition to take a large view of the question; while Mr. Cobden's memorable motion for a committee to inquire into the causes of agricultural distress elicited who are the true farmers' friends. The number, variety, and interest of the discussions raised so early in the session would afford signal demonstration of the progress of public opinion; if more were wanting, it has been amply furnished by the agricultural interest themselves, on whose prostrate condition a generous antagonist need not press.

GAME LAWS.—TESTIMONIAL TO MR. JOHN HORNCASTLE.

A very important display of the feelings with which the tenant-farmers regard the existing rigorous game laws took place on Wednesday at St. Alban's. A numerous assembly of the tenant-farmers of Hertfordshire was held for the purpose of entertaining Mr. John Horncastle, of Gammon's Farm, at a public dinner, and presenting him with a testimonial of the admiration with which they regard the independent and truly English spirit in which he expressed his opposition to the very stringent preservation of game, within the last few years adopted by his landlord, the Earl of Essex, on his estates in Hertfordshire. The feeling of opposition to the game laws which was evinced by the farmers present was of the most decided character. They see clearly that their interests are in this matter not sufficiently attended to; and they are beginning to feel that in other matters which affect their prosperity it is necessary for them to look to themselves. Mr. Bright, M.P. for Durham, attended by the invitation of the committee, and was loudly cheered on his entrance.

At half-past five o'clock about 120 sat down to dinner in the Town-hall, Mr. C. H. Lattimore, of Wheathampstead, in the chair.

The usual loyal and patriotic toasts having been proposed,

The CHAIRMAN said he rose to propose the toast of the evening, and in doing so he felt it necessary to preface the health of their guest with a few observations relative to the purpose for which they had assembled on that occasion. They had met to present a testimonial to Mr. Horncastle expressive of their approbation of the course which he had pursued with respect to a subject of great importance to the farmers, namely, the game laws, and it was worthy of remark that not a single landlord or land-agent had subscribed to that testimonial (hear, hear), so that it might truly and fairly be taken as an expression of opinion on the part of the farmers of Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire on the subject of the over strict preservation of game. He found that the testimonial, which they were about to present to their respected guest, was subscribed to by 316 persons, of which number no less than 241 were tenant-farmers (hear, hear), and those farmers occupied an area of land covering an extent of at least 65,000 acres, so that the assembly might be justly looked upon as an indication of the opinions entertained by the farmers on this important subject. (Cheers.)

In alluding to the cause which led to this expression of feeling towards Mr. Horncastle he should, he trusted, avoid any personal or unnecessary allusion, as nothing could be farther from his intention than to give pain to the feelings of a single landowner or preserver of game; but he should at the same time feel himself unworthy of the position which he occupied if he for a moment shrunk from discharging, in a faithful manner, the duty which devolved upon him on that occasion. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) He should discharge that duty fearlessly, and without giving expression to the slightest degree of bad feeling towards any party. (Hear, hear.) In 1831, Mr. Horncastle became the occupier of Gammon's Farm, which he still held. It was rather an extraordinary, but they would find it a very appropriate, name. (Laughter.) The farm, which contained 250 acres, was taken in 1831 from the late Earl of Essex; and when Mr. Horncastle took it, at that period, the game was moderately preserved, the tenant being allowed for his own amusement to keep greyhounds, and also permitted to have the privilege of ferreting and shooting rabbits. (Hear, hear.) Things thus went on until the death of the late earl in 1839, when the present Earl of Essex became the owner of the estates; but no sooner had that nobleman come into the possession of his property than a new order of things took place, Mr. Horncastle being deprived of those privileges with respect to game which he formerly possessed, orders having been given for the strict preservation of the game upon the noble earl's property. In 1840, Mr. Horncastle found the increase of game so injurious to his interests that he, in conjunction with two or three other tenant-farmers, who were similarly situated, caused a survey to be made in order to ascertain the amount of injury done to their crops by the game, as they felt that such a course was absolutely necessary in justice to their families. The result of that survey was, that Mr. Horncastle ascertained the injury to his property from game in that year to have been of an extent equal to £63. 10s. in money; and, after some squabbling and objection on the part of Lord Essex, that nobleman consented to pay £40 to the farmer as a remuneration for the losses that year; but it was accompanied with a remonstrance and an intimation that if he brought forward such a claim again his rent would be raised. (Hear, hear.) The effect of this intimation naturally was, that he forbore to press his claims for compensation in the following years, although he continued to suffer injury to his property from the damage done by the game. In the year 1844, however, the damage from the game becoming still more oppressive, or at all events more conspicuous, than it ever had been before, Mr. Horncastle got a survey made of about forty acres of his land, consisting of twenty acres of wheat, and twenty acres of clover and rye; the survey left an estimate of a loss of £71. 10s. on those forty acres from game alone. (Hear, hear.) The remaining portion of his farm was not surveyed; but it was very easy for the practical farmers assembled in that room to calculate the loss which must necessarily have been caused on the whole farm, when forty acres left an average of loss to an amount of £71. 10s. (Hear, hear.)

The next point worthy of attention, in connexion with this subject, was a correspondence, which was published in the local papers, between the Earl of Essex and Mr. Horncastle, and with the contents of which all those around him were doubtless perfectly acquainted. The noble earl certainly in those letters displayed a good deal of courage in defending the system on which he acted; he expressed his opinions fearlessly and openly; but to attempt to defend the practice of such a strict preservation of game was in reality a kind of forlorn hope (laughter): it was a very clear proof of the truth of what he (the Chairman) stated, that there was only one other man in England found willing to come forward in defence of the system in addition to the Earl of Essex, he meant Mr. Granville Berkeley. (Laughter and cheers.) The letters of Mr. Horncastle in reply to the Earl of Essex, his landlord, reflected upon him the highest credit, and had earned for him the approbation of the tenant-farmers of Hertfordshire; but the result of their being published was, that he at length received notice to quit his farm. ("Hear, hear," and "Shame.") He mentioned these circumstances briefly because such a statement of them was appropriate to the occasion; and because he felt that it was impossible such proceeding could take place without calling from the tenant-farmers of Hertfordshire an expression of their opinion on the subject. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) They had now assembled for that purpose, and he was sure they all felt with him that it was quite impossible a system, fraught as that was with injustice to the farmers and demoralization to the peasantry, could be perpetuated. (Loud cheers.) It was high time that the tenant-farmers of England spoke out on the subject of the game laws (cheers), in order that their landlords should not labour under any mistake, either as to the effect of the stringent observance of those laws on the property of the farmers, or the feelings with which the farmers viewed the injustice of their operation. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Lattimore then dwelt on many of the evils inflicted by the preservation of game; and again reverted to the correspondence which had taken place between the Earl of Essex and Mr. Horncastle. The Earl of Essex admitted the mischief that was likely to arise from a very stringent preservation of game, but the defence which his lordship set up was, that the preservation of game on his estates was not so strict as to cause any mischief to the farmers. That was, however, answered by Mr. Horncastle, who clearly proved that the preservation of the game on the estates of the Earl of Essex was of that strict nature which was calculated to cause loss to the farmer. It was a remarkable admission from the noble earl, although he attempted to throw the blame of the loss of property which occurred on the bad farming which was practised in Hertfordshire, and he went on to give an instance of two fields in which corn was sown, one of the fields being in good heart and well cultivated, and the other in poor heart and badly cultivated. He said that in the latter case no sooner did the corn come over the ground than it had to commence a struggle for existence, its growth being checked by various circumstances, besides having it exposed to the attacks of the enemy. He (the Chairman) thanked the noble earl for that admission—he thanked him for admitting that the enemy was permitted to attack the corn, and he should say that it was an important admission. Mr. Lattimore then rebutted the earl's allegation that the abolition of the game laws would cause the landlords to absent themselves from their estates in the country. He ably exposed the battue system; and alleged that the farmers were not averse to sporting, but to that strict preservation of game which proved so detrimental to their interests. The recent alteration in the game laws had increased the evil. They had made game the property of the landlords, and the result of that was, in some cases, most unjust to the tenant. He knew one case in which a Mr. Hailey took a farm, on condition that the landlord should not sport upon the ground, but after the change in the law the landlord came on his ground and sported in spite of him. Mr. Hailey had no redress, for it was the landlord class that had legislated upon the subject (hear, hear); and so anxious were the landlord class to secure their own privileges that they trampled under foot the rights of the farmers. The landlord, therefore, sported on Mr. Hailey's ground in spite of Mr. Hailey, who was obliged to resort to a measure which gave him great pain, namely, digging pitfalls and setting traps in the fields to prevent the possibility of sporting over his grounds. The game laws had now been some time without alteration, but there was a storm brewing in this country with respect to them, and he was quite sure that the tenant-farmers of the country felt deeply indebted to the honourable member for Durham (Mr. Bright) on his left, for the exertions which he made to bring forward that subject before the House of Commons, and for the eloquent speech which he made in moving for the committee on the question. (Cheers.) Mr. Lattimore then proceeded to give further details of the injury caused by game. In one case with which he was acquainted the loss upon 100 acres of wheat by the ravages of game was £100 in one year; and he had been informed that in another case the loss upon 36 acres had been £10 an acre, or £360 in one year. (Hear, hear.) That statement appeared to describe an extraordinary amount of loss, but the man who suffered the loss was prepared to verify it on oath. He was acquainted with another case in which a man who held a small farm of 180 acres lost for several years no less than ten shillings an acre by the ravages of game. That was an immense loss to a man who had merely a small farm—it was so very large an amount in proportion to the man's property that he calculated it, and found he must have lost in that manner £1800 in twenty years. (Hear, hear.) What a different condition would not that man and his family have been in if they had now in their possession that £1800 which they had so lost! He would mention one other instance of the great loss which had been sustained by the same cause. Mr. Bates, of Luton Farm, took 843 acres, at a rent of £200 a year, and it was stated, when he was about to enter on the farm, that the game were not preserved, which was strictly the fact at the time at which he took it; but Mr. Bates was only two years in possession of it when the Duke of Wellington, happening to go on a visit to the Marquis of Dute, asked the marquis if he preserved his game; having answered in the negative, the duke said it was a pity that the game was not preserved in a place so well calculated for its preservation. It was a strange thing how little persons thought of any loss which did not immediately affect themselves. It could not hurt the Duke of Wellington to have the game preserved on the estate of the Marquis of Dute, but it was seriously injurious to Mr. Bates. The game was accordingly preserved on the estate, and the damage to the agricultural property became so great in consequence that Mr. Bates gave notice to quit in order to avoid a recurrence of such losses. The speaker next adverted to the evils of poaching. In the village of Wheathampstead several young men were absolutely trained to poaching, and the effect upon the labourers around them was very injurious. Not only was such a pursuit of an evil nature, but it had a most injurious influence on the mind of the honest industrious labourer, who often must compare his condition with that of the poacher, who had frequently more money to expend than the humble, honest labourer. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Lattimore then went on to show that of the number of prisoners in various agricultural districts the greater number, in comparison to other crimes, were for offences against the game laws. The chairman concluded a very able speech by presenting a handsome testimonial to Mr. Horncastle. It consisted of the following tributary inscription, beautifully executed with the pen, and elegantly framed, and of a purse of 60 sovereigns:—"Testimonial presented to Mr. John Horncastle, of Gammon's Farm, Watford, in the county of Hertford, testifying the esteem and regard entertained by a large number of friends and farmers occupying many thousand acres of land in Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire, more especially to mark their high approbation of his public character and private worth, and the spirited, manly, and intelligent manner in which he, in a public correspondence with his landlord, the Earl of Essex, exemplified the evils of excessive game-preserving, and its ruinous results—Nov. 16, 1844. This testimonial, in conjunction with a sum of money, invested for the benefit of his younger son, when he comes of age, was presented to Mr. John Horncastle at a dinner at the Town-hall, St. Alban's on Wednesday, March 26, 1845." The chairman then proposed the health of "Mr. John Horncastle."

The toast was drunk in a most enthusiastic manner. Mr. HORNCASTLE returned thanks. It afforded him the most sincere gratification to find that his conduct had met with such a flattering approval. He disclaimed all feelings of a personal nature in the course which he had taken with respect to his landlord's views on the subject of the preservation of game, but he considered it his bounden duty to protest against the mode in which that nobleman thought fit to preserve the game on his (Mr. Horncastle's) farm, and he perceived by the flattering testimonial which he had that night received that his conduct was in consonance with the opinions of the tenant-farmers and the public at large. He would not cast any reflection upon the course which his landlord had pursued, for that nobleman had, he had no doubt, acted in the manner which he thought most correct. He begged sincerely to thank them for the high compliment they had paid him, and to assure them that it should never be forgotten by him.

The CHAIRMAN then proposed the health of the hon. member for Durham, who, though he had often been malignantly as the enemy of the farmers, had done more for them than their professed friends—"Mr. Bright, M.P."

This toast was drunk with immense cheering, which was reiterated again and again.

Mr. BAIGER, upon rising, was again greeted with rapturous applause. The hon. gentleman said:—Gentlemen, I need scarcely say that when I received the invitation to be present at this meeting I felt it as an exceedingly gratifying proof that the trouble I have recently been taking in connexion with the question of game-preserving had not passed unnoticed by the farmers of this district of the country. But, whatever pleasure I felt at receiving the invitation, I may acknowledge with the utmost sincerity, that it has been far surpassed by the gratification I have had in being present here to-night. I have been delighted to see so many of the farmers from this part of the country assembled for the purpose of expressing their opinion of the conduct of one of their brother farmers in connexion with one of the most important questions which can bear upon the prosperity of the agricultural portion of the community. I was delighted to see, from the public papers, the spirited manner in which Mr. Horncastle came forward for the purpose of speaking what was known to be the opinions of nineteen out of twenty of the farmers of the kingdom; and not to the public only, but in direct opposition, and with personal application, to the very man upon whom a farmer is generally supposed to be most dependent. (Cheers.) But it must now be a matter of satisfaction of the very highest kind that the effort which he then made,—and which hundreds of farmers ought to have made, and which, I believe, hundreds will soon be prepared to follow,—that the efforts which he has made have been so highly appreciated by his brother farmers. (Hear, hear.) I think a farmer ought not so much to cultivate the good opinion of landowners as that of farmers; and though I have no wish that there should be that class spirit amongst us which would lead to the supposition that we hold together for peculiar privileges or party interests of our own class, yet I do think that man is a craven-hearted and mean spirited man who, when his own class is attacked, as the farmers have been through the operations of this system of game-preserving, would not come forward and speak on behalf of his own class and of that vast body of men with whom he is constantly associated, and whose interests are so bound up with his own. (Cheers.) It is well that you should testify your high estimation of such men as your brother farmer whom you have met to-night to honour. Independent farmers, men who dare speak and dare come out, are not so abundant in this country as that you can afford to think lightly of any of them. (Cheers.) Probably under no conceivable circumstances can it be expected that there should not be somewhat more dependence between the occupiers and the owners of land than there is between some other classes in society; but it is of the utmost consequence that a system like this,—which was against the prosperity of the farmers, which blights all their hopes, and makes it utterly impossible that their industry should procure its reward,—it is, I say, of the utmost possible consequence that there should be men who dare speak out, and that when such individuals are found they should receive honour, and be repaid with the gratitude of their brother farmers in every part of the kingdom. (Cheers.) We have heard a good deal within the last year or two of farmers' friends (laughter); but I take it that Mr. Horncastle is a true farmers' friend, and, if it were not that fortunate circumstances have placed him in some degree independent of those who would be likely to injure him, he would not only be the farmers' friend, but he would be likely to become a martyr for farmers. (Cheers.) I am delighted to see this meeting, because I take it to be a sign of the times, and a sign of better times,—an evidence that farmers are about to think, act, and do something for themselves. (Loud cheers.) I conceive there is no delusion so great as that of believing that the great and the mighty of the earth will ever be the true, sincere, and disinterested friends of the middle classes, either in this or any other kingdom. (Cheers.) I have heard men say that there is no spirit amongst farmers;—I never believed that statement. I have felt that there has always been spirit, but that it has been slumbering. It has not been dead, but it has been less active on account of many circumstances; but circumstances may arise, and now I believe have arisen, to make that spirit appear not only existent, but to show it active, resolute, and determined. (Cheers.) The real object of this meeting is to give an expression to the opinions of the farmers in this district with respect to what is now commonly called the game nuisance. (Hear.) It is a protest against a mischievous and unjust system. The time will come, and that, too, before the children of some of our present aristocracy are old as we are, when people will look back with astonishment at what farmers have suffered in connexion with this question of game. Look at the position in which you now stand. The landowner lets his land, and the farmer, a capitalist to some amount, takes it. Well, every body who was not acquainted with the circumstances of this country, and who was not puzzled with the extraordinary things he sees round him, would suppose that, when the landowner lets his land, then, for the term for which it was let, he gave up its ownership. That is, he let the land to the tenant, the tenant having the right to possess fully all the produce of the land, and the whole of the animals and stock which live upon it. (Cheers.) Now, look at the position of the farmer when he takes his farm. It is said he himself makes half his bargain; he is uncommonly fortunate if he does so. (Hear, hear.) Is it not notorious that in every county of Great Britain there is, and has been for years past, a competition for land so fierce that nearly all the bargain is in the hands of the landlord? (Cries of "True, true.") The effect of this competition is to bid up rent to the very highest point at which it can be hoped to be paid, and to bear down every covenant and right which, under other circumstances, the farmer might reasonably expect to be granted to him for the preservation of his interests. (Cheers.) Now, the farmer gets possession of his land; it becomes the centre of the hopes of himself and his family; his capital is more or less invested in it—some sunk in permanent improvements, and some in the stock, implements, and materials upon the surface of the farm. He hopes that it may turn out well for him; he gets up early, works hard and late—thousands of farmers with their hands, and thousands more with their heads. He gives his skill, industry, and perseverance to the soil; he is subject to the vicissitudes of seasons, against which no human foresight can altogether prevail, and he stands the chance and hazard of the markets. He has to contend also against the effect of the ignorance of landowning legislators, in which ignorance, unfortunately for him, there are no vicissitudes. (Enthusiastic cheering.) The result is but a very moderate compensation for his expenditure and labour, and that compensation is in many cases altogether destroyed, and in very many more very much lessened, by a system which does no good to any human being whatever, which exists solely for the amusement of the rich and powerful class at the expense of the interests of the tenantry and peasantry, and at a very great and enormous sacrifice to the whole community. There can be no success to the farmer under a system of game-preserving. (Hear, hear.) In moving for a committee in the House of Commons, two or three weeks ago, I brought forward cases which were laughed at in that assembly, and which I was told were not true. I did not bring before them my worst cases, for I was afraid that had I done so they would not have believed them; but, now we have obtained that committee, I will produce cases infinitely worse than the very worst of those I then cited. (Cheers.) I would call before them farmers, who would prove, on oath were it necessary—which it is not before a committee of the House of Commons—that they had sacrificed at least £500 a year for a succession of years. I can bring forward a tenant who can show that for a number of years he has expended £1000 annually in the purchase of artificial manure, and yet so completely was his farm ravaged by game that he found it useless to toil and sacrifice his capital, and to farm in this manner, and he therefore discontinued this large purchase of artificial manure, and thus to a very great extent diminished the employment of labourers, and consequently lessened their chance of a fair remuneration in the parish in which that farm was situate. By this system of game-preserving the landlords are made the greatest enemies of a class in whose real well-being they have the truest and greatest interest; for of all men in the world the landlord is the most interested in having his tenants contented and prosperous (hear); not only because he lives among them, occasionally meets them, and hears from and about them, but his own pocket interest is involved in it, if he could but see it in its true light; for where you find the tenants most prosperous, enlightened, and satisfied, there you find the soil best cultivated, the amount of its produce the greatest, poor-rates the lowest, and rent invariably highest, paid with the greatest certainty and security. (Cheers.) But the landlords take extraordinary means to make their farmers suspect them. (Hear.) I maintain that there is not, and never has been since the time when man first peopled this earth, if history may be relied on, any race of beings so unsuspecting and confiding as the tenantry of this country. (Hear, hear.) During the last year the landlords have been asking the farmers—nay, in some cases threatening to compel them—to employ more labourers. A landed proprietor, a member of the House of Commons, told me only a week ago, when discussing this very question, that he forced all his tenants to employ a certain amount of labour upon each of his farms. (Hear.) Why, if a man preserves game, refuses security of tenure, talks all sorts of nonsense to his tenants if he ever gets them round him, and discourages about everything but their real grievances and the true way by which a man can become prosperous, and then, when he finds that some labourers are not employed, and that there are not sufficient means for the farmer whereby he can pay a high rent and a high rate of wages also,—and he comes and forces them by covenants in their leases, that they shall employ an amount of labour over and above that which they would otherwise be willing to employ,—I say that all this introduces a system which is most destructive to the interests of the landowners themselves, and most degrading and ruinous to the independence and interests of the tenantry. (Cheers.) Capital must yield profit, or labour will not thrive. Men do not take farms merely for the pleasure of paying rents or employing labourers. (Hear.) I am a manufacturer in a considerable way of business, but I never professed to keep on my manufactory for the benefit of my work-people, or for the sake of clothing my customers. My object is, by the expenditure of capital, and by giving labour to a business, to procure for myself and family a comfortable income, with a hope of realizing something like a competency at a late period of my life. (Hear, hear.) I apprehend that the tenant-farmer takes his farm with a precisely similar view; and yet I am convinced that there is no class of capitalists in this country who, for the last thirty years, have obtained so small a return for the amount of capital and labour they have employed as have the cultivators of the soil. (Hear.) If the landowners are interested in the well-being of their tenantry, the tenantry are also interested in the prosperity of the landowners. I have been in some of the northern parts of this kingdom, where I have seen a very different condition of the agricultural labourers to that which is to be noticed in the southern counties: a state in which the labourers seem to be interested in the success of the farmer and the prosperity of the soil. The same condition might exist all over the kingdom. Get rid of this infamous trifling with the interests of the farmer; do not let the amusements of a small class be put in competition not only with the prosperity, but with the very existence of a much larger class. (Cheers.) Let us, if possible—I say "us," for, although I am not a farmer, I am deeply interested, as every man must be, in the prosperity of agriculture—I say, let us get a system of farming, of agreements, of managements, from one end of it to the other, placed on the same understandable, rational, business-like footing, and then we shall have landowners respected because they are just, and tenants independent because they are prosperous. (Enthusiastic and prolonged cheering.) I have said that by this system the amusements of the rich are put in the balance, and actually weigh down considerations of much greater importance—the prosperity of farmers, the well-being of the labourers, and the true interests of the community. (Hear.) Why, who does not know that from 1838 to 1842 we had, for nearly five years, harvests which were under the average; that the consequence was great scarcity of provisions with very high prices? Some men may think that this is a very desirable state of things. I will not argue for a moment with any individual who maintains that scarcity can be beneficial either for individuals or nations. (Hear.) During that period we had an importation from abroad to a considerable extent, such as the law allowed; but we had at the same time millions of heads of game of every description—game which, in a country densely peopled like this, must soon come to be considered as vermin; and yet there they were throughout the whole of that period devouring probably as large a quantity of the produce of the soil of England as the whole amount that we imported from abroad. (Hear.) The community, then, have a claim upon the landowners, if not upon the tenant-farmers. They have made themselves by law, though we are not here to discuss that law, and we should very likely greatly differ, and you might not agree with us, on that question; but they have made themselves the purveyors-general—that is they supply the food, or profess to do so—for the 27,000,000 of people who inhabit Great Britain and Ireland. If they do thus think it desirable for state purposes that the population should be restricted to the food they are willing to supply them with, they are not to deem it unreasonable if some portion of the population, who sometimes do not get enough, should ask them why it is that while they maintain this system of restriction they also maintain a practice by which a large portion of the produce is devoured by game kept solely for their own amusement? I believe—indeed I know—that at the end of last session, when I gave notice of my intention to bring forward this question of the game laws in Parliament, it was thought to be rather an odd and somewhat impertinent meddling with a matter not precisely within my province. (Laughter.) I remember, when I read the notice that I should move the House upon the subject of the commencement of the present session, that there was a little titter, a little derisive laughter, from the opposite side of the House. The landowners were not well acquainted with the condition of the farmers, or the state of the country in which they live. (Hear.) I believe they do not know much about the mischief which game does to their tenants and themselves. I think I may venture to say that I know more about the state of the tenantry of this country than the majority of those to whom the tenants pay their rents. (Hear.) When this case was brought forward, unless my statements could have been altogether denied, it was utterly impossible for the House to refuse the committee. There were the cases of damage well authenticated—injury to the tenant, destruction to the allotments of the labourers, the insolence, depredations, and irritation caused by gamekeepers (loud cries of "Hear, hear"), the demoralization of the labourers, the thousands in gaol, the hundreds transported, and the scores murdered—by the House of Commons would have been infinitely worse than its greatest calumniator or enemy has ever dared to brand it, had it refused the investigation which I demanded, founded upon the cases which I was then able to submit to them. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) The committee which has been appointed, I believe, will be a tolerably fair one. I chose seven of its members myself, and the Government selected the remaining eight. I am bound to acknowledge that throughout the whole of this matter Ministers have behaved in the most honourable and handsome manner (hear, hear); that there was not the slightest objection to any one person proposed by me as a member of that committee; and I believe that, if the Government had dared to have done it, they would have put upon it from their side of the House men more favourable to the interests of the tenantry than those who were eventually placed there. (Cheers.) Well, we are going to meet next week, for the first time, for evidence. (Cries of "We wish you success.") I have had an amount of correspondence which it is almost impossible to get through. I have written for the last fortnight or three weeks not unfrequently from thirty to fifty letters a day, nearly all of which have been to persons connected, more or less, with the cultivation of the soil, and having reference to the question of game. I have here a large number of names of persons who will come up and give evidence before the committee. (Hear.) I do not think the other party will call many witnesses (hear); for he would be a very bold man who would come up and say that game-preserving was advantageous, or not positively injurious, to agriculture. They will probably content themselves by cross-examining the witnesses that we shall bring up. But what we want is specific and accurate statements of damage, and opinions formed upon experience of the past, by men who have had the best possible opportunities of judging. I do hope that when this evidence is brought out to the public, as it will be before or about the close of this session, that we shall then have this grievous abuse fairly exposed; and when that is done we may be certain that there is no man out of bed-lam, no individual who does not wish to bring down upon himself the ridicule or, what is worse, the execration of the public, will ever say another word in favour of this grievance of preserving game, which has been practised for so many years past by a great portion of the landed proprietors in most parts of the kingdom. Now, what I want is, that farmers everywhere should seriously consider their position. There are farmers who yet believe that I am their enemy, inasmuch as I have been prominently connected with the agitation of another question. It may be that those farmers are right and that I am wrong. I believe they are honest; I am quite sure that I am. (Cheers.) Upon that question we must agree to differ until one or the other be converted. (Laughter.) I trust that all discussion upon it may be carried on in a rational and kindly spirit, such as becomes men who wish only for the truth, and then I am quite sure that the time is not far distant when that which is true will be discovered, and not only discovered, but established. (Hear, hear.) But upon this question of game ninety-nine farmers out of every hundred would shake hands and agree with me entirely. (Cries of "All, all!") I had a letter from Wiltshire the other day, from a gentleman connected very closely with farmers, and whose family are all similarly situated. He says, "Your name is a household word with the farmers in this district; and they literally swear by you!" (Laughter.) If we agree upon this point we will work harmoniously; we will go together as far as we can, and do all the good we can in company. I wish the farmers in this county—and there are some who are well able to do it—would put themselves still more in communication with me upon this question. (Hear.) Let us have from every county where game-preserving has been carried to any serious extent, a body of witnesses who shall for ever settle the question, as respects the particular county. It is not sufficient that I should prove that game-preserving has done alarming mischief in Suffolk or in Wiltshire, for to prove that there is a local malady would not perhaps justify Parliament in applying that which may be termed a general remedy; but what I want is to bring out as much as possible the truth from every county where this nuisance has been oppressive. They should come up now before the committee, and that will be infinitely better than petitioning Parliament. (Cheers.) Let them come up now and state before the committee what they know and what they have seen, and you may rely upon it, such is the intelligence and determination in the public mind of England, that when an abuse is fairly exposed and brought out to demonstration so that nobody can deny that it is an abuse, the time is near at hand when Parliament will be forced to abate it. (Cheers.) It will be a fine thing for this country when farmers lose a little bit of that overweening confidence they have in the farmers' friends. (Cheers.) I would not to-night say a syllable against any landed proprietor—I believe in my conscience that many of their errors are errors of judgment and not of heart. (Hear, hear.) I believe that they have been living amongst circumstances the most unfavourable to a discovery of what is their true interests (hear, hear, hear); and their ignorance of their own affairs has made them most officious in offering advice, which was wholly valueless to their tenants when assembled at dinners and meetings of various kinds. What I want farmers to do henceforth is this, to take nothing upon credit. (Cheers.) I would not take anything for granted. Do not believe anything that I say, or which my friend Mr. Colclough may utter (cheers); do not, for a moment, think it worth anything, until you have reasoned it out and examined the facts, and made yourselves sure; but apply the same rule to the landowners. (Cheers.) I want you to apply it to all. Candidates come before you at the hustings, and they pledge themselves to all sorts of impossible things. (Laughter.) It is notorious that half the things which men say they will do when they go to Parliament that assembly has no more power to perform than it has to prevent the sun rising to-morrow. (Hear, hear.) These men come, and they promise a variety of impossible things; they go to Parliament and cannot perform them, and then those who sent them there are disappointed, and fancy they are betrayed. Why, if the tenantry of this country, powerful as they are now in numbers on the county registers, would look a little to their own rank, and not quite so much to another rank and order, they would find more real attention to their true interests on behalf of county representatives than they do at present. (Enthusiastic cheering.) I bought the Times newspaper at the station as I was coming down, and I find a paragraph in it which may be worth reading. It is extracted from the Western Times, a Devonshire paper. It states, "A regulation is actually determined on, to invite three eminent renting farmers to stand as candidates for the next Parliamentary election. The farmers of Devon are determined to have men who pay rent to look after their interests in the House of Commons. We do not anticipate much immediate success from such a step, but it will teach the aristocracy a lesson, and open the eyes of the tenant-farmers to their power, if they choose to act in concert." (Cheers.) How would it be if a tenant-farmer were to put up for some county? In my neighbourhood there used to be a little jealousy about manufacturers. They had a notion that nobody should go to Parliament but a man who had no other occupation to fill up his time, and who had moreover a great deal of money to bear the expense of a life in London, which was supposed to be enormous. But now they have found out their mistake, and they take a man here and another there, who is not a Lord, and whose ancestors we do not know exactly what they were, but a man who has common sense and common honesty (cheers); and those two things I suppose are called "common" for the very reason that they are so rarely to be met with. (Renewed cheers.) We have heard frequently—I have read repeatedly, at the proceedings of agricultural meetings of various kinds, that the toast has been proposed of "agriculture and commerce" by men who despise commerce but yet sell game ("Hear, hear, and laughter"); they have had the audacity to toast commerce and agriculture together. There is and ought to be a real union between these two great branches, by which nations subsist, but heretofore it has been only nominal, and never real; legislation has prevented its being so, for legislation has been foolish in commerce as it has been in agriculture. Speeches made at meetings such as I have referred to have also had the effect of making this union unreal. I hope that to-night is the beginning of a new era. ("Hear, hear, and cheers.") No man here will believe for a moment that individual in this country, who is the possessor or the cultivator of a single acre of its soil. There never can be any country prosperity while all the numerous cultivators of the soil are permanently depressed and injured; there can be no doubt that under all circumstances the vast bulk of the subsistence of our people must be derived from our own soil, and from the direct labour, as cultivators, of a vast portion of our own countrymen. There can be no doubt whatever that any law passed in Parliament for any particular benefit of commerce, unless it be a just law,—and being just, which can be permanent,—must be injurious to the prosperity of agriculture itself. In the county from which I come, Lancashire, the most prominent in the world for manufacture and commerce, there is at this time a condition of prosperity, when contrasted with what we saw three years ago, so remarkable that it appears to be nothing less than a miracle. I say it is that miracle which we see every day, and yet are unobservant of it: the miracle that the sun shines, and that the showers fall in due season, the earth is prolific, and the great and bountiful Benefactor of our species gives abundance to the people; and that abundance having come for two or three years in succession, the prostrate millions of workmen who were idle and pauperised are now standing erect, and are employed and well paid, and independent, as much so as I have ever seen them at any former period. (Loud cheers.) Whilst I see that with this abundance there is that prosperity in the most numerous classes of the people, I cannot for a moment suppose that the prosperity of a nation can in any degree depend upon the foolish fallacies which ignorant men of all parties have spread in connexion with these subjects. (Cheers.) But with reference to this game movement I must ask this meeting to bear in mind that when a man connected with the district which I come from—having no claim by long standing in the House of Commons, nor by lengthened service anywhere—when he comes forward upon a question like this, you must be certain that to carry it to a successful issue it needs far more than my own individual efforts: it requires the assistance of intelligent, independent, and experienced men in all parts of the country. (Hear.) There are some in this meeting who within the next month will give evidence on your behalf before the Game Committee, and I trust that the names I already have down here will be increased before that time, so that—at least—half-a-dozen good witnesses may go from this district, I mean from this particular county. (Hear.) So far with respect to this Game Committee. There is one more topic to which to call your attention. An attempt was made only a fortnight ago to procure a committee to inquire into other distresses of the agricultural portion of the community; that committee was refused; but from the altered tone which I have seen in the House, even within the very short time that I have been a member of it, I am persuaded that the time is hastening on when all parties in that House—the highest protectionist and the most active and prominent Free-Trader, with all that are between those points—will be anxious to come to a real and honest investigation into the circumstances which do affect the prosperity of the cultivators of the soil. When once there comes that spirit over the minds of men,—a spirit which repudiates party—which seeks not to gain advantage here by the spoliation of somebody there—but a spirit which wishes the truth to be fully discovered and established;—when once that spirit prevails upon both sides of the House, as I believe it will before long with reference to some of these matters, then the farmers of this country, and every class, may look upon that day as the dawning of a better era, when the cultivators of the soil, the honourable, ancient, numerous, and most necessary of all classes of the community, shall no longer be made the shuttlecock of political parties, but be treated as rational men, and their interests considered in a rational manner. (Vehement cheering.) I will say, in conclusion, that I am delighted with this meeting. I have met now, for two years past, with large bodies of farmers in different parts of the country; many have been friendly and others hostile to my views; I have always gone from them with this conviction, that wherever they have erred, as I believe they have often done, it has been from mistaking their way, and because either they have followed blind leaders, or are themselves unsuspectingly blind. (Hear.) But I come more and more to this conviction, that there is no class of men in this country who, if they know what is right, and have the power to follow their convictions, will make a more unanimous and determined effort for the attainment of that right than will the tenant-farmers of this kingdom. When I see what my friend Mr. Horncastle has done, and the manner in which you have received his services, and expressed your approbation of his conduct, I cannot but think that, as there are thousands who can applaud his conduct, there must be great numbers ready to imitate it. (The honourable gentleman resumed his seat amidst enthusiastic and prolonged cheering.)

Mr. WELFORD, in a brief but forcible speech, proposed "The health of the Vice-President, Mr. R. Bailey Smith, the first tenant-farmer who subscribed to the testimonial." In the course of his speech the learned gentleman stated that the farmers must take their political affairs out of the hands of the men to whom they were at present intrusted, or else their county members must act upon different principles. (Cheers.) He would, with all sober, serious earnestness, recommend them to turn their attention to selecting such a talented, business-like man as their present chairman as their future county representative—a man of their own class, and understanding and zealously promoting their interests. (Vehement cheering, and cries of "We will, we will.")

The Vice-CHAIRMAN in returning thanks said, that he was very desirous of avoiding giving offence to any nobleman or gentleman; but he felt bound to come forward, notwithstanding his disinclination to take any part in public matters, and declare that excessive preservation of game, and the system of the six months notice to quit, were two of the greatest bars to the improvement of agriculture.

Mr. JOHN BRYCE, in responding to the toast of "Success to the tenant-farmers of England," entered into an interesting detail of the treatment he had received from the Marquis of Bute's agent. In 1831 he took a farm under that noble lord; and in 1842, after having, in the meantime, brought the land into a high state of cultivation, and sunk £6000 in its improvement, he suddenly received notice to quit, without any alleged reason, but, on the contrary, coupled with an admission from his lordship that he was the best tenant on his estate. He considered that nothing short of a twenty-one years' lease would give the farmer a fair security of tenure.

The CHAIRMAN then proposed "The health of Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.," which was drunk with the most vehement applause, renewed again and again.

Mr. BRIGHT (having been loudly called for) returned thanks on behalf of the hon. member for Stockport, and expressed his deep satisfaction at the altered tone of feeling of the farmers of England towards that hon. gentleman and himself. He believed that they now considered them not as the enemies but the friends of the farmers. (Cheers.)

The toast of "Success to Mr. Bright and his Committee" having been proposed, and responded to by a young farmer who avowed himself a Conservative, the meeting separated at half-past ten o'clock.

NOTES OF A TRAVELLER.—No. XIX.

Berlin, Nov. 8, 1844.

Two subjects of conversation attract all the attention of the politicising public. The report of a coldness between the courts of Hanover and Prussia, arising from the offence said to be taken by the King of Prussia at the treaty of commerce recently concluded between Hanover and England; and the sufferings of the poor labourers in Silesia and the adjacent districts. On the former point the public has rather felt itself mystified than satisfied by the appointment of new Ministers at both courts in the place of those that were recalled; nor does the conversion of the former Hanoverian Minister to the Catholic Church, which is ascribed to the Berlin Puseyites, appear to the public at large a sufficient reason for his recall. They insist upon pitting King Ernest against Frederick William as the champions of two distinct lines of commercial policy.

The writers of Dr. List's party, who form a powerful body in the service of the daily press, are fond of representing the King of Hanover as under ties to his party in England, which bind him to facilitate the introduction of English manufactures, by hook and by crook, into Germany. Some of these lights of the age ought to know that the party in England which his Hanoverian Majesty swears by has very little sympathy with manufacturers, and is inclined to undervalue their co-operation both in raising rents, and in providing employment for the labouring classes. The experience of the last session of Parliament must have shown all Europe that our corn monopolists look to agricultural societies to improve their revenues, and to ten hours' of labour bills to ameliorate the workman's condition, far more than to the opening of new or the extension of old markets for the sale of English manufactures. Nevertheless, must the King of Hanover abroad bear all the obloquy that can be poured upon him as a traitor to the interests of German manufacturers, and the firm ally of his industrious countrymen.

Whether the indirect satire that such a false position was likely to arouse was justly dreaded, or the "sweet breath" of these stentors of the scribbling host was deemed worthy of a conciliatory step to gain, the court of Hanover has taken a very wise step, and one that, for the moment, has had the desired effect of silencing the obnoxious clamour. It has published the official correspondence that took place between the Ministers of Prussia and Hanover during the late negotiations on the subject of the junction of Hanover with the Zollverein. From this document it is apparent to all the world that the King of Hanover had no occasion to seek sympathies with his fellow-subjects in Leeds and Manchester to cause him to hesitate before he abandoned the commercial system adopted by his predecessor. The royal revenues have alone been appealed to in the course of the negotiation, and the fear of diminishing them has alone influenced the decision that has been come to.

The document in which the financial problem is solved by evidence taken from experience, that by raising the duties on many articles of consumption the revenue would lose, is a valuable contribution to financial science, and is the more valuable to the world at large as giving ground to hope that Kings and Ministers will eventually adopt as a standard in these matters the calculations that promise the best yield for their coffers. There will be some hope for humanity when its interests are identified with correct calculations of any kind. This state paper is addressed to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs at Berlin, which did not attempt a reply in detail. It proves, from official sources, that the consumption of most articles of necessity that are imported into Germany have a far greater consumption in Hanover than in the Zollverein.

Wine, it states, is returned in the Prussian lists as being only consumed to the extent of 96-100ths cwt. per head in the Zollverein; whereas in Hanover and Oldenburg the consumption is 4 54-100ths cwt. per individual of the population. The duty now charged in the Hanoverian League is 3 dollars per cwt. In Prussia, foreign wine pays 8 dollars per cwt., and home-grown wine an excise duty.

The consumption of coffee in Hanover and Oldenburg is 3 62-100ths cwt. per head, and in the Zollverein but 2 41-100ths cwt. per head. According to the Prussian tariff, coffee would have to pay 6½ fl., whereas the Hanoverian duty is but 3 dollars. The duty on sugar is lower in Hanover than in Prussia; but this does not appear to have made much difference in the consumption, a circumstance that may be accounted for by the extreme poverty of great part of Hanover; whereas Prussia counts, in its Rhenish provinces, in Saxony and Silesia, some of the most fertile districts of Germany. Treacle is, however, mentioned as being more extensively consumed in Hanover than in Prussia.

From the circumstance of the respective resources differing so much in Hanover from the rest of Germany, it might reasonably be expected that to impose heavy duties upon colonial productions in so poor a country would be tantamount to prohibiting their consumption. On the other hand, the experience to which all would refer led to the conclusion that a reduction of the rate of duty in the Zollverein would cause an increased consumption that would infallibly raise the revenues of all the united states. Hanover, therefore, proposed, as one of the conditions of joining the Zollverein, a reduction of colonial duties on the following scale:—

	Proposed duty.	Zollverein duty.
Wine .. ..	4 dols. per cwt.	8 dols. per cwt.
Coffee .. ..	3 do.	6½ do.
Tea .. ..	6 do.	11 do.
Refined sugar ..	5 do.	11 do.
Raw sugar ..	4 do.	9 do.
Do. for refining ..	2½ do.	5 do.
Treacle .. ..	2 do.	5 do.
Tobacco .. ..	3 do.	5½ do.

The Hanoverian Government, it was further suggested, would be no gainer by the adoption of this moderate tariff; whereas, Prussia would unquestionably gain by the increased consumption that must ensue. But as Hanover would have, in case of a junction, the benefit of all duties that it now raises on its inland frontier, a demand of a præcipuum, or extraordinary allowance of half-a-million of dollars, was added on this account, and on account of the transit duties, which Hanover then would also lose.

The year 1839 was chosen for the comparison above made, the new data down to 1842 not having then been officially made public. Had the Hanoverian Minister been furnished with more recent data he might have made his case still stronger. A Frankfurt correspondent of the Angsbury Gazette has played that paper the trick of getting it to print a comparative statement of the importations into the Zollverein in the first quarters of the years 1843 and 1844, from which it appears that the importation in the present year of many important articles had a tendency to diminish. The following are some of the instances:—

Wine .. ..	17,315 cwt.	15,602 cwt.
Coffee and cocoa	130,576 "	123,473 "
Rice .. ..	36,172 "	27,421 "

From these statements it would indeed appear, that even the Zollverein had overstrained the point at which its duties are likely to be most productive.

Besides the figure of the rate of duty in the Prussian tariff, Hanover in the paper before mentioned, protested against the severe measures adopted by Prussia, in its frontier districts, as a preventive against smuggling. The Hanoverian Minister justly remarked that such severe control, which places a large district under martial law, was induced by those high duties, which showed themselves as unproductive, and which were of themselves a penalty for the consuming population, without subjecting them to a vexatious control.

Again, the utility of a union between the two states would be nugatory if an assimilation in the excise duties on articles of domestic production did not take place. Foremost amongst these stands salt, which is a royal monopoly in both countries, but under very different circumstances. The Hanoverian Government furnishes salt at a price that admits of its being distributed at 1½ dollar per cwt.; in the remotest parts of the kingdom the price does not exceed 1½ dollar, or 5s., per cwt. In Prussia, on the other hand, the Government demands 3½ dollars per cwt. for salt, being a charge equal to 10s. The Hanoverian Minister on this point remarked that, even if the King desired to introduce so serious a change in the taxation of the poor, the Estates would probably refuse to assent to such a treaty.

The last proviso demanded by Hanover, in the event of a junction, related to the State duties, which it was remarked was a part of his Majesty's pocket money, and could not be abandoned without compensation. One would have thought that this must have proved the relating point, and that Prussia would never consent to have its chief avenue to the sea blocked up by a toll that was abolished by the treaty of Vienna. How differently diplomatic agents view these matters from persons accustomed to use common sense in judging them, appears from the fact, that on this point alone has an agreement been concluded, and the treaty concluded between England and Hanover only recognises the toll agreed to last year by Prussia and Saxony in the congress at Dresden. Although no answer was returned by Prussia in detail to the statement of the greater consumption in Hanover, yet the demand of an extraordinary allowance was rejected, and the negotiations were broken off.

Thus, in the whole matter, English manufactured goods, on which the Hanoverian duty is very much lower than the Prussian, were never once alluded to, and would have been given up as of no importance to any party, if Prussia had consented to lower her duties on colonial wares, and to grant the præcipuum demanded.

On the other hand, it cannot be denied that our Ministry has let another opportunity slip of at once uniting all Germany into a prosperous commercial league, and of establishing the policy which our own conduct and the

of a few charlatans keep up.

We needed no treaty with Hanover, and have gained nothing by the negotiations but the recognition of the State duties, which we never ought to have recognised, and which can only be looked upon as the price paid by the party in power for the votes and support of the Duke of Cumberland. But, if we wished to mark our recognition of the liberality of the Hanoverian tariff, we ought, unasked and without any stipulation, to have granted to Hanoverian vessels, not the paltry concession of bringing German produce from the Baltic and Dutch ports to England, but the acknowledged right to trade from all parts of the world to English harbours in the same manner that English vessels can trade to Hanoverian harbours from all parts of the world. This species of concession, freely granted to Hanover and the Hanse Towns, would long since have given weight to that sound party in Germany which sees that the interests of all parties would be consulted by the adoption of the Hanoverian tariff by the Zollverein; and this party, I am happy to say, is strongest at Berlin. The Hanse Towns under such an arrangement might be left as free harbours, such as they ever have been and desire to continue, and Prussia would have the merit of consolidating all Germany, excepting the Austrian states, with a powerful commercial union. When the last treaties were made by Lord Melbourne's Cabinet with the Hanse Towns, this view of the matter was suggested, but was rejected by the Cabinet; and it has not been taken up by the present Ministry on the present occasion. It would be worth an observation, when the Hanoverian treaty is laid before Parliament, if it were only to show that the commercial world follows these Ministerial proceedings with anxiety, and to record a protest against thus sacrificing the prospect of a good understanding with Germany to the anxiety to replenish the privy purse of a peer of the British Parliament.

Some of the pleasantest hours I spent in Berlin were those in which I had an opportunity of discussing these matters with men high in office; and it was with real pleasure that I found just and reasonable views entertained by the majority. Almost the last remnant of the advocates of restrictions on trade is still in a very influential position. I allude to M. Beath, who has long filled an office in some respects analogous to our President of the Board of Trade. There is some talk of the establishment of a Ministry of Trade and Manufactures, and there is no want of able men well fitted for the office. It was easy to see, without a direct confession on the part of any one, that all would have rejoiced if a little tact and knowledge of the ground had been displayed by our Ministry on the occasion of the Hanoverian treaty, and the liberal party in Prussia had thus been strengthened in its resistance of the clamorous demands of the South Germans for what they so absurdly call protection. A refusal on the part of the House of Commons to sanction this treaty would do more to forward a good understanding with our German neighbours than all the intrigues that diplomatic cunning could devise. The reduction in the State tolls is of so little importance, in comparison with the principle which is conceded in their recognition, that the one will not for a moment weigh against the other.

This publication on the part of the Hanoverian Government has induced other countries which the Germans were desirous of persuading to join their league to look at the matter from the same point of view. Denmark has long been an object of singularly marked attention on the part of that side of the press which covertly represents the "Jeune Allemagne." The efforts of these writers have gone near to sow the seeds of civil war in Denmark; and their professed object is to unite, politically and commercially, Schleswig and Holstein with Germany. The reply to this strange solicitation cannot be very flattering to those who deemed that they were holding out offers of advantage to their neighbours across the Elbe. As far as the consumption of many imported articles is allowed to indicate the state of prosperity of a country, the Danes have reason to be better satisfied with their condition than the states of the Zollverein, although they sacrifice nothing to force premature manufactures.

Iron is admitted in bars at a moderate duty into Denmark, and the duty on forged iron and parts of machines is 2½ dollars R.B. per cwt.; whereas in the Zollverein it is now 5 dollars for the Danish weight. Cast iron is successfully manufactured in Denmark for local use without a protecting duty. The cotton manufacture consumes annually a large quantity of yarn, which is imported at a low duty, cheaper than it can be spun at home.

The following are the results of a comparison of the duties levied on, and the consumption of, colonial wares in Denmark and the Zollverein:—

	Duties per lb. in R.B. shillings.		Consumption per head.
	Danish.	Zollverein.	Danish.	Zollverein.
Raw sugar ..	2.5	6.4	10 lbs.	4.5 lbs. Danish.
Refined do. ..	6.4	12.8	4 lbs.	2.1 lbs. "
Coffee .. ..	2.8 & 3	8.3	0.23 lbs.	0.13 lbs. "
Tea .. ..	10.0	14.1	0.83 lbs.	0.37 lbs. "
Rice, in bulk ..	0.98	2.86	1.87 lbs.	0.60 lbs. "
Rice, shelled ..	1.5	3.36
Tobacco leaf ..	1.5	7
Do. prepared ..	5.76	14.08
Wine .. ..	4.81.92	10.21	1.38 pott.	0.33 pott.

The Danes, as well as the Hanoverians, have no consuming power to throw away in order to enjoy the luxury of trying venturesome systems of political economy. While the figures retain the above proportions, there is little chance of their abandoning their present policy, even if the project of extended unions between several states could be adopted without sacrificing the end for which duties ought alone to be levied—that of raising a revenue.

To these interesting illustrations of the effect of low duties on the revenue of a country a highly interesting contribution has been added by the Austrian Government, which has just published a survey of the foreign trade, and customs duties levied, in the last ten years, ending with 1842. As this work is official, the following passage, with which one of the first chapters commences, is an important declaration.

"The internal industry of a country cannot possibly be forwarded by the aid of high duties and prohibitions. These render articles of consumption expensive; and the raising the price of such articles is a burden that falls heavier on the consumer than on the foreign merchant or manufacturer."

As a proof of this, the following statement from the customs accounts is added. It shows a considerable increase in the duties levied on manufactured goods only, exported and imported since the slight relaxation of the prohibitive system that took place in 1836.

Year.	Import duty.	Year.	Import duty.
1831 ..	514,530 florins.	1836 ..	568,285 florins.
1832 ..	574,042 "	1837 ..	633,957 "
1833 ..	557,094 "	1838 ..	823,781 "
1834 ..	557,327 "	1839 ..	974,741 "
1835 ..	538,465 "	1840 ..	744,430 "

2,741,458 florins. 3,745,194 florins.

In the relaxation allowed in 1835 no reduction of the duties on cottons, woollens, or silks was made; the increase here noted is, therefore, to be sought in the improved consumption of a few articles of secondary importance.

The high duty on coffee (although not exceeding 6d. per lb.) caused so great a difference as the following in the consumption between Austria and the Zollverein:—

	Inhabitants.	Consumption.
Austria ..	33,000,000	10,938,400 lbs.
Zollverein ..	27,000,000	56,728,500 lbs.

In the consumption of sugar a similar disproportion reigns:—

	Consumption.
Austria, 1836 ..	43,832,634 lbs. raw.
" .. ..	282,200 " refined.
Zollverein, " ..	98,681,000 " raw.
" .. ..	797,000 " refined.

The difference to the revenue caused by the prohibitive duties in Austria was the following:—

	Duty paid.
Austria. Cotton wares, 1836 ..	105,914 fl.
Linen do., " ..	6,412 "
Silk do., " ..	2,620 "
Woollen do., " ..	17,568 "
Zollverein. Cotton wares, one year's average, 1836-7 ..	1,107,633 fl.
Linen do., " ..	36,885 "
Woollen do., " ..	950,997 "

When a government voluntarily publishes such evidence against itself, it must be seriously disposed to mend its ways. We may therefore hope that our diplomatic agents were more alive while M. Hummelauer was learning his lesson with us in the last two years than they were in 1838; and that the new Austrian tariff, that is looked forward to, will not prove a "pendant" either to the treaty of Milan, or to our recent Hanoverian treaty, with respect to the concessions that it contains.

BAZAAR MEETINGS.

CAMBERWELL.

A special meeting of the Camberwell Anti-Corn-Law Association was held on Wednesday evening, at the Romney Branch, Southampton-street; W. A. Wilkinson, Esq., of North-terrace, in the chair.

The Secretary informed the meeting that a Ladies' Committee for the League Bazaar had been formed for Camberwell and Peckham; that Mrs. Poulter, of Hards-road, Peckham, had consented to act as secretary, to whom contributions might be sent; and that, as the district was very extensive, another lady would probably assist her in Camberwell. The Secretary also stated that a very considerable collection, consisting of articles both useful and ornamental, including some pecuniary contributions, had already been made.

It was resolved that the following gentlemen of the Committee of the Association shall form a Bazaar Committee for Camberwell, to receive contributions, and to communicate with the Central Committee of the League. Mr. W. A. Wilkinson (Chairman of the Association), North-terrace, Camberwell. Mr. Clarke, 1, Grove-villa, Camberwell-grove. Mr. J. Doukin, C. E., Old Kent-road. Mr. J. Poulter, Hards-road, Peckham. Mr. J. A. Lyon (Hon. Secretary to the Association), Old Kent-road.

CARLISLE.

Colonel Thompson and Mr. Robert R. Moore visited Carlisle on Saturday last. In the afternoon, at two o'clock, they held a farmers' meeting at the Athenæum, over which George Saul, Esq., of Braustock, presided. In the evening there was a well-attended general meeting in the same place, when John Dixon, Esq., presided. The principles of the League, and the objects and claims of the Bazaar, were ably set forth by the deputation, and resolutions in accordance with those objects were passed with acclamation.

At the evening meeting, on rising to acknowledge a vote of thanks, Colonel Thompson said:— "Let me take the opportunity to remark on the debates which have lately occupied our minds. First, then, came lard; it was wanted to strike lard out of the Prime Minister's list of liberated articles. But when it was urged on the agriculturists that nobody but their own labourers ate lard, because the manufacturing operatives could eat what was better (loud cheering), they admitted the tender appeal, and lard was permitted to be free. Next came a weightier question. Inferior butter was allowed to pass, under the denomination of grease. (Laughter.) An agricultural member rose in an agony to say that people would eat it. A great officer of state, the President of the Board of Trade, rose and protested that they should not eat it, because care should be taken to mix tar with it. (Cheering and groans.) The House of Commons laughed out, and the great officer of state could not comprehend the reason. One piece of advice to the manufacturing interests. When the act-of-Parliament schools are established throughout the factory districts, and the rising generation have answered to "Who was the strongest man," and "Who was the wisest man," let them be asked, "What is a government for," and let them pipe out in reply, "To put tar into our butter." (Much cheering and laughter.)

NEWCASTLE.

On Thursday evening, the 20th inst., a very numerous meeting was held in the Lecture-room, Nelson-street, to hear addresses from Colonel Thompson and Robert R. Moore, Esq., a deputation from the Anti-Corn-Law League, in support of the Bazaar to be held in Covent-garden Theatre. Sir John Fife was called to the chair, and briefly stated the objects of the meeting.

Colonel Thompson, who was received with great applause, then addressed the meeting in one of his telling speeches, concluding with an appeal on behalf of the Bazaar. He said:—We come here to invite you to send something towards our successful forage. What you will send must be best known to yourselves. I don't know whether you can send coals; I dare say you may. But it has occurred to me that you might send samples. I really do not know why you should not send a large sample of beautiful coals, and on it a written order for fifty chaldrons. (Laughter and applause.) A lady—an economical housekeeper—may go there, and, seeing this sample, buy the coals, which might be visible in their proper person in some of the outskirts of Covent-garden Theatre. But that is for you to consider of. I am quite sure you will find yourselves able to send something that shall be inviting and assistant. If you were in so desperate a case that Newcastle really produced nothing that could be taken, there is one thing you could send: you could always send them money. (Laughter.) You could not, for instance, send a coal barge out of the Tyne, nor could you send them one of your merchant brigs; but, if you sent them the price of one, you would set their vessel afloat just as effectually as if you had transmitted them the other. I am sure you have at home those counsellors who will earnestly impress upon you the desirableness of showing that you are not behind other towns in this great race of generosity. And let me beg of you to hear their "gentle counsel sweet." Let them have their way, as they often have had before. Don't let this be the time when you shall undertake to check them with grave, masculine airs of importance, as how you cannot exactly afford it—you must wait till you are better off—and so forth. Take the present moment to make times better. And I wish they would also recollect and bring you to confession, when the time shall come that we shall all rejoice in liberty of trade, and the consequent happiness, whether they were not right when they counselled you to such a proceeding. (Loud applause.)

Mr. Moore followed in an able address, which was loudly applauded.

Captain WEATHERLY moved a vote of thanks to the deputation, and "that the meeting pledge itself to do the best it could to furnish the Bazaar in the most efficient manner." (Applause.)

The Rev. Mr. BROWNING said he had great pleasure in seconding the motion.

The motion was carried by acclamation.

Colonel Thompson briefly returned thanks, and proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was seconded by Mr. Moore, and carried amidst loud cheers.

Mr. BLAGBURN, of Gateshead, rose in the body of the hall, and moved, "that the thanks of the meeting be given to Mr. Richard Cobden for his able exhibition of the hypocrisy of the pretended 'farmers' friends' in Parliament, in his unanswerable speech when introducing his motion for an inquiry into agricultural distress; and also to Mr. Bright for his speech in moving for a committee to inquire into the game laws." Mr. Blagburn said, that protection reminded him of a man who used to chalk his face to keep the cold out. Once or twice it created an artificial heat, but in the end it rubbed the skin off. (Laughter.)

Sir JOHN FIFE, in returning thanks, said that he did not intend to make any observations, as he wished the important facts they had heard to remain impressed upon their minds. He assured them that on all occasions he would be ready to forward and support their cause. (Loud cheers.)—The meeting then separated.

GALASHIELS.

Colonel Thompson and Robert R. Moore, Esq., as a deputation from the Council of the League, had a crowded and enthusiastic meeting at Galashiels on Monday night, in the Relief Church, the Earl of Buchan in the chair. Resolutions were unanimously passed for supporting the Bazaar. Towards the close of the meeting the Hon. John Elliot was called upon by the audience; and commended with much force on the inconsistency of members of the Government in defending the admission of foreign corn on the ground of the benefit to the consumers, and opposing the application of the same principle to the more important article of corn. The Earl of Buchan, after the meeting, gave £2 for a contribution towards the Bazaar; and said he was preparing to send a miniature carriage.

THE NEW COMMERCIAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH CHINA.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

For some time past the public have had no satisfactory information respecting the working of the commercial arrangements made with the Chinese Government under the treaty concluded by Sir Henry Pottinger. For a short time after the trade was opened under the new regulations we heard, as might naturally have been expected, some complaints of difficulties experienced in consequence of the trade having been driven into fresh channels; but, for some months past, little or nothing has been said upon this subject in the communications from China which have been made public in this country. We have now, however, the satisfaction of being enabled to state, on the best authority, that, for some months prior to the date of the last advices, these difficulties had been entirely overcome, and the regulations had been found to work exceedingly well. Not only had the moderate duties established been cheerfully paid both by British and native merchants, but they had been found profitable by the Chinese Government, whose interests appear to have been not quite so well cared for formerly as those of the functionaries who were employed in the regulations of the trade. We learn that, notwithstanding the reduction of duties, and the removal of a portion of the trade to the northern ports (more particularly Shanghai), the amount of duties paid through the British consul at Canton into the Imperial treasury during the first six months of 1844 exceeded 800,000 taels (£250,000 sterling); being more than had been paid in during any one entire year when the duties went through the hands of Hong merchants and subordinate Chinese officials. And this cannot be considered a mere temporary augmentation, as the amount has since been increasing, and will most probably be doubled in a short time. Indeed, there is every reason to believe that the good effects resulting from the treaty will be of a permanent character, as the Chinese authorities are neither uninfluenced by the additional receipts in the Imperial exchequer, nor insensible to the zealous and sincere efforts made by the British consuls and other officers to preserve order and to enforce a due compliance with the established regulations on the part of their fellow-countrymen. Probably, after a longer experience of the advantages of these regulations, a still more extended commercial arrangement with the vast empire of China, and a more intimate and confidential diplomatic intercourse between the two nations, may result from the working of the treaty concluded by Sir Henry Pottinger.

On one point, at least, something like European courtesy appears to have extended itself to a Chinese diplomatist. We learn that Ke Ying, the Chinese commissioner who negotiated the treaty, has sent his portrait, painted by an eminent Chinese artist, to Sir Henry Pottinger, as a mark of his friendship and esteem. This picture, which was shipped by the Duke of Bedford from Canton, has not yet reached this country. When it arrives, no doubt the portrait of an eminent Chinese statesman and diplomatist, painted by the Lawrence of the Celestial Empire, will excite no small degree of interest and curiosity.

A CHEAP TRAIN TO LONDON IN MAY.

(From the Eastern Counties Herald.)

On Whit-Monday, the 12th of May, cheap trains to the metropolis are to be started from all the principal towns of the midland and manufacturing districts. Measures are already taken for securing cheap trains from Manchester, Leeds, Liverpool, Birmingham, Nottingham; and, although no definite arrangements are yet made with the directors of the Hull and Selby Railway, there is no doubt whatever that a cheap special train will start from Hull in conjunction with the above, at a cost for going and returning not much greater than the ordinary fare by one way.

This great movement is set on foot by the Anti-Corn-Law League, in order to increase the number of spectators and customers at their Bazaar for the exhibition of National Manufactures, to be held in Covent-garden Theatre, in May. Inasmuch, however, as it is not pretended that taking a seat in this train identifies the traveller with the opinions of that body, or places him under any obligation to them, we may reasonably expect that these special trains will convey to London thousands of persons on various errands of pleasure and business. The Chartists, who are not particularly friendly to the League, will avail themselves of the cheap trains to attend the conference of the consolidated trades' unions. The religious world will go up to the May meetings, to celebrate the anniversaries of societies with the varied objects of home benevolence and discursive philanthropy. And as the agriculturists are under no compact, either express or implied, to go to Covent-garden when they get to London, the special trains will doubtless take their proportion of honest well-fed farmers, who will go up to look about them, and return to the joys of a country life with a new zest after a fortnight's sojourn in the great wen. The interior of Covent-garden Theatre will doubtless present an attractive and splendid sight, filled as it will be with the countless products of English manufactures and industrial enterprise, arranged with taste and with an eye to effect. Our country friends will probably go to town with the firm determination not to go to the League Bazaar. But we warn them beforehand, that if they take a wife or daughters their resolutions will be void, and of none effect. They will be glad to escape under cover of Paley's expediency maxim, that the sin is in making and not in breaking such rash vows. For, in the first place, all the world will be there. Do not the Leaguers tell us that there never were so many people in London before (the coronation no doubt drew together great crowds) as there will be during the Bazaar in May? Then the papers will be filled with astonishing accounts of the brilliancy of the scene. Fairy land will be ransacked for comparisons, and Aladdin's palace be declared poor and mean by comparison with the interior of Covent-garden. And what female head could stand out against such temptations, on a bare question of principle? Or how can Mr. Bull reasonably expect to convince his wife and daughter that it can make the smallest difference to the fate of the Corn Laws, whether they go to Covent-garden or stay away. It is easy to see that Mr. Bull will go, and that the particular shape which the sophistry will take will be, that a national exhibition of British manufactures is a very proper thing; that the manufacturers of this country are, after all, very fine fellows, so far as industry and ingenuity go (although of course sadly mistaken on the question of the Corn Laws). In the end John Bull will be so pleased with what he sees that he will long to take every man in the theatre by the hand who looks like a Leicester-lacemaker, a Nottingham stocking-maker, a Birmingham hardware or paper machine workman, a Wolverhampton smith, a Dudley nailmaker, a Leeds cloth-dresser, a Sheffield cutler, a Coventry ribband-weaver, a Manchester cotton-mill operative, or even the employer and directing intelligence of any of these. Bull will be so delighted that he will loudly exclaim that no other country in the world could parallel a similar display of the products of human industry and material excellence, and that our manufacturing artisans are men to be proud of, and who deserve to eat the very best beef and mutton and wheaten bread that he, Bull, can produce for them. The end of these transports it is easy to foresee. Mr. Bull's pockets will be emptied, and clean swept, unless he take the precaution of leaving his purse at home, and even then he may reckon upon the ignominious fate of being sent to the hotel in a cab for it. Thus we see no hope for an agriculturist who may set out for the metropolis by these trains preserving his equanimity unimpaired until his return. Perhaps, however, the worst that may be looked for as the result of his trip may be a stupendous perception on his part that the feuds between agriculture and manufactures are amazing mistakes on both sides, and that the sooner the two great interests of the country shake hands and be friends the better for both. "God bless the manufacturers!" he will say to his neighbours when he returns. "Fetch that splendid Paisley shawl you bought at the Bazaar, my girl! and mother! show us that clothes-basket full of table-covers, damasks, lace pillow-cases, woollen, silk, and cotton hosiery, ribbands, and other gimeracks that you brought away with you! There! should not we be proud of having the manufacturers for fellow-countrymen? For my own part I am determined never to abuse the manufacturers again as long as I live. Let them only give us time (he will add) and they shall be fed with plenty of beef and bread and eggs and butter and cheese, as such industrious and ingenious fellows deserve to be fed!"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

(From the Times.)

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—I am the wife of a county member of the old school, and little did I think 30 years ago, when I married one of the first "landed properties" in the county, that I should live to hear it said, "It is ruinous to possess land;" yet it is proved to me every day that the land has been our ruin; to be sure it is mortgaged for more than its value, and that may have something to do with the matter, but I do not understand political economy; my husband says none but "radical rascals" do; if that means that they get their canvassing, and dinnering, and all that, done for nothing (to say nothing of votes for nothing), I only wish Sir T— did understand it, and restricted himself to it. I have practised domestic economy rigidly for years, and we managed to get on very well till the land only brought in two per cent., and Sir T— borrowed at five per cent.,—which shows how unfairly land must be burdened. Now, every weekly check he draws is done grumblingly; I only wish Sir Robert Peel had to ask for the checks instead of me.

Domestic economy is not a man's province, they never think of it at the dinner table; nor, to do him justice, did I ever hear Sir T— grumble about venison and turbot, and the delicate little entrées we have at our own table; but it is, as he says, those extravagant kitchen joints that mount up so. He told me that Sir Robert's tariff would reduce these things one-half, but in fact no perceptible difference can I find, except in his reducing my house-keeping allowance in proportion to what he fancied the difference would be.

How he got his information I know not, but to my horror he has grown very learned about "grease;" it is enough to make one ill to hear such subjects discussed, as if "grease and dirty butter" were things used in my kitchen. I am afraid he will shorten my allowance again on this farthing per pound in lard passing the House; but we never use it—none but poor people do; and really I do think Sir Robert Peel need not set a whole parcel of gentlemen disputing about things which concern none but the poor. What can the House of Commons have to do with the poor? The unions manage their affairs.

Upon my word, if Sir Robert makes any more trouble with his tariffs, we country members' wives must give up house-keeping altogether, in order to set a good example of distress; what with mortgages, and fortunes for daughters, and keeping up game and other county duties, I am so straitened I have been obliged to give up all my little charities, because that is the only way I ever spent money unnecessarily. I cannot give up what I have been used to, nor can Sir T—. I think sometimes we might do without the Opera-box, but my daughters cannot; they think their brothers need not keep so many hunters, to say nothing of Newmarket and Ascot; we cast about from one to another the duty of retrenchment, but find we are all so economical there is nothing to retrench. I cannot introduce board wages in—shire, though the servants are on them in town; my cook is never satisfied with the wages I give, and if she (I have discharged the man) did not sell her grease (as I often tell Sir T—, who thinks they might eat it instead of butter in the kitchen), I must pay her £10 per annum more—so I am the true economist there, for we could not for shame sell our own dripping! A rich banker near us sells his skim milk to his own labourers, and in the mandatories I suppose this is illegal; but, as Sir T— says, "Thank God! we are not so mean?" we only sell them our butter, and out of charity 1d. per lb. cheaper than the farmers can. I assure you I have no profit from the dripping except its saving the cook's wages. I can add no more, as I have a large dinner and ball to the county this Easter. Really, when a member like Sir T— spends £1000 at once in this way, from a sense of duty to his country, he deserves himself and his party to be supported by the Minister—a good old Tory Prime Minister would do it—and not suffer country gentlemen to be browbeaten in dirty disputes about farthings' worth of grease. Yours, &c.

CONFERENCE OF TRADES' DELEGATES.—A numerous body of delegates from the various trades met together on Monday afternoon at the Parthenon Club-room, St. Martin's-lane, for the purpose of forming an association for their mutual protection. T. S. Duncombe, Esq., M.P., was called to the chair, and opened the proceedings. On the conclusion of the chairman's address, Mr. Barratt, the secretary, read the report of the committee, which stated that they were deeply sensible that such an organization was necessary, in order to resist oppression from any legislative enactment; also to promote a good understanding between employers and employed, which was the main object of that conference. The meeting was addressed by several of the delegates; and it was finally agreed that an association should be formed for the protection of their rights, and to prevent any advantages by legislative enactments from again taking place.

Treasury: your landlord members have all these to secure, touching them much more nearly than the concerns of the tenant-farmers. They want your votes, indeed, to make them important with the Ministry, and put them in the way to get these good things; and your votes they have by asking for—through their stewards, perhaps—"or else—"

That you have been grossly deceived and abused is certain. The present Parliament and Ministry are of your making. How the promises of the hustings have been kept in the House I need not tell you. A more barefaced violation of pledges the world has never beheld. Perhaps you were not less duped in the promises so liberally made than in the performance so unceremoniously forgotten. Be that as it may, you must be very confiding indeed if you trust any more. Trust yourselves only, for the future; or you will be greener than your own grass.

Mark the conduct of your self-appointed patrons. Have they battled for any one measure that can benefit you? Did they not refuse the inquiry that might have thrown light upon your actual condition and the means of its improvement? Was not their squabbling about grease and lard calculated to render you as ridiculous and contemptible as themselves? While they terrify you by threats of "the untaxed foreigner," have they relieved you from any taxation? And what would become of the cash had they done so? How long would it have taken to squeeze the surplus out of you by the rent screw? Have the Corn Laws enriched any of you? What farmer's profits have doubled while the landlord's rents were doubling? With members of your own in the House of Commons there would be a chance of getting at the truth. There is none now. It is essential to the cause of agricultural industry that you should be there. It is due to you, as a distinct body with peculiar interests, that you should be there. The landlords know this. Have they ever moved a finger to send any of you there? Not they: and you may reckon upon a fiercer opposition from that quarter than from any other whatever, when you begin the attempt at having a representation.

This fact alone is a test of their sincerity when they affect to identify themselves with you. They put lawyers and soldiers into their pocket boroughs; any clever adventurer whom they can keep dependent will serve their turn. But see how they will look when it is suggested to them that a tenant-farmer would be an acceptable candidate for a county. You have a tough job before you. The endeavour to work it out will teach you many a lesson yet unlearned. That ugly thing called notice to quit will soon be flying over your grounds, and perching on your homesteads. The battle will be a long one, and many of you must be martyrs. Consider whether you have pluck enough. The leaders of the rebellion will never be forgiven. Ruin stares you in the face. Had you not better pay up your rents quietly out of your capital, as long as your capital will last, and then go to New Zealand or the poorhouse? The power of habit in yourselves will be against you. It has always been your way to vote for or with your landlords. You are traitors to yourselves by long custom, whose chains are hard to break. Look before you leap, and then, if you do resolve to spring, God speed you.

Not that I imagine any of you will go into Parliament Free-Traders. At first you may, perhaps, be more protectionist than your landlords: but you will not stifle investigation, as they do; you will not emit about being the guardians of others' interests, as they do; you will not confound high rents with profitable cultivation, as they do; you will not mask the real objects of policy under false pretences, as they do; you will not look one way and row another, as they do; and you will not, by departing from the avowed, simple, and manful championship of your rights and interests, bring the very name of agriculture into odium, as they do. That is why every Free-Trader would rather see you there than those who are as unfaithful to you as they are unjust to society at large. Try it, then; by all means try it. If Corn Laws are to be maintained, you are the men by whom alone the country can be reconciled to their continuance; and if not, it is well that your stout hearts and strong arms should help to strike down a pernicious monopoly by which you are victimized in common with the industrious millions of your fellow-subjects and fellow-sufferers.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

A FACT.—A requisition is actually determined on to invite three eminent renting farmers to stand as candidates for the next Parliamentary election. The farmers of Devon are determined to have men who pay rent to look after their interest in the House of Commons. We do not anticipate much immediate success from such a step, but it will teach the aristocracy a lesson, and open the eyes of the tenant-farmers to their power, if they choose to act in concert.—Western Times.

THE ANNUAL AVERAGE PRICES OF GRAIN.—In the year ended 1844, wheat was 51s. 3d. per quarter; barley, 35s. 6d.; oats, 20s. 7d.; rye, 33s. 11d.; beans, 34s. 3d.; and peas, 32s. 3d.

A "dust of sugar for baby."

No. 2.—To the Wives of Charles Cooke, Thomas Dummer, John Chevis, John Gravatt, Edward Goble, Henry Eade, John Carver, Henry Glazier, James Larbey, Nicholas Souter, Thomas Trusley, Elijah Glazier, Harry Quinell, Thomas Glazier, and James Knight,—all of the parish of Easebourne, near Midhurst, in the County of Sussex.

WIVES AND MOTHERS.—Besides your husbands, there are several men with motherless families, and some men with no families, working at parish work in Easebourne; there is also a considerable number of young men in the workhouse, who, not costing so much to the rates in the house as they would cost out of the house, are kept within the walls on the same principle that the men with families, your husbands, are kept out of the house, because, having families, they would cost more in than they cost out. The average expense for each individual was last year in the house 2s. 6d. a week. Some years 3s. and 3s. 6d. is the weekly expense per head; but, food being cheaper this year than usual, the workhouses are more cheaply furnished, and provisions are lower than usual.

None of you wish to go into the house. You dislike it—despise it—hate it. Knowing this, the guardians offer your husbands work on the roads, which is paid for out of the poor-rates. Knowing that you will almost suffer anything rather than break up your homes and go into the house to be separated from your husbands and children, they offer relief to your unemployed husbands by giving them one week's work in the fortnight at 9s., which is, so far as you are concerned, nothing more than 4s. 6d. a week, out of which you have to pay house rent, buy food to eat, clothing to wear, and fuel to burn. The whole of the husbands and fathers who were thus employed under the waywarden at Easebourne last autumn numbered, with their families, one hundred individuals.

This number of persons is a portion, but only a fractional portion, of those inhabitants of Sussex who are numbered and published to the world as labourers in agriculture. You are the best judges yourselves of the extent to which agriculture maintains you. You may not know so well how far you contribute to the maintenance of agriculture; nor how far those great national interests called the "sugar trade," the "tea trade," the "cotton trade," the "home market for English manufactures," the "revenue of the Government," and such like, constituting the greatness of the British empire, are maintained by you.

It is curiously worthy of remark that, when we speak to your rich neighbours the Duke of Richmond, and Lord Egmont, at your own doors, and regret that all the sugar you buy, as one of you expresses it, is only "a dust on Saturday night to baby to sweeten his sop, poor little dear, for he really cannot live on the crust of dry bread and the potato,"—or when we regret that most of you have no clothing, but what is on you, and that what is wholly insufficient for winter weather, and that the children are shirtless and shoeless, and that at night the clothes of the day must be put on the beds to supply the place of better covering,—when at, or near, your own doors, to your own rich neighbours we express such regrets, they tell us that you are not used to anything better, and do not feel the want of sugar and abundant changes of clothing.

But when the same rich men come to London to Parliament to make laws, they tell all the other lawmakers that you are the supporters of the "home market" for manufactured cloth, and many other things; that you are the support of the commercial imports—to wit, sugar, tea, and other articles that come from abroad; that, if the monopoly which they possess of being the sole dealers in corn and cattle is taken away from them, agriculture will not support you, and you will not support the "home market." They forget all about the "dust of sugar for baby" being the extent of your support of the great West India sugar interests; and they, so forgetting, tell the West India members of Parliament that if the Corn Laws, which are intended to make corn dear, are not kept up by the assistance of the West India members, they, the English landowning members, will not keep up the sugar laws which make sugar dear.

And thus they go on telling it to the world that agriculture supports you, and that you support the great national interests. You cannot get employment in agriculture at home, yet your husbands and selves and children are proudly published by the Protection Society of Sussex as persons maintained by agriculture.

Also your sons, the young unmarried men, who have been compelled to go into the union-house or starve, or be tempted to commit a crime to keep off starvation,—they are numbered and published to the world as workers in agriculture.

Also the men who refuse to go into the house, and because they refuse get no relief out of it, and who live without work and without—God in his mercy or the devil in his mischief only knows how they live! they are numbered as agricultural labourers, and published as such.

Also those of the married men, who, being willing to go into the house, and who, having few children or none, are admitted within, instead of being sent to the roads at 4s. 6d. a week with your husbands,—they are set down as agricultural labourers, and published as such to the world.

Also the aged of both sexes taken into the house because they cannot labour, they are published to the world as labourers in agriculture, and as "residue" dependent on agriculture.

And in addition to all these, that society which has its head-quarters in Sussex, and which has for its object the making corn scarce and dear, or what they call "protection to agriculture," and "protection to the labourers in agriculture," that is to you and your families and neighbours,—protection to you by making your bread scarce and dear!—that society which has the Duke of Richmond, your neighbour of Goodwood at its head, and a gentleman, Stafford O'Brien, Esq., M.P., whom none of you know, but who is a great friend of yours, so he says,—that society, in addition to all who have been numbered and published in the Government tables of the population as labourers in agriculture, has set down a great many more as labourers—above one million more!

Now, you good women of Easebourne are not likely to know much about this subject. Corn Laws and sugar laws, and population tables, and "occupations of the people," and protection societies, and chairmen of the societies, and secretaries who publish the documents of the societies, and gentlemen who falsify Government returns in support of the societies, to say that agriculture employs one million of persons more than it does employ,—you are not likely to know much of those things and of those persons.

You, perhaps, do not know what agriculture is. But I will tell you what it is; and when I have told that you shall hear something more.

Agriculture is the employment of those who plough and sow and reap the land. It is also the employment of those who hire men to do those things. It is also the employment, or profession, or means of living of those who own the land, and who let it to those tenants who hire men to plough and sow and reap.

But agriculture is not the employment of those who fill the workhouses, or who job on the roads at 4s. 6d. a week, as your husbands have done this winter and last to keep them out of the workhouses. Neither is agriculture the employment of the million of imaginary beings whom the secretary of the Protection Society has made on paper for the sake of "protecting" them.

And now for the other things which I am to tell you.

Some of you have pieces of land—small allotments, rented at the rate of £3 per acre, tithe and rates included, on which you plant potatoes and a few other vegetables; on which you would plant more vegetables, and certainly gather more for household use, were it not for Lord Egmont's game, which lives on you and on what else the game can get at the expense of the farmers.

Now, some of your husbands who have allotments have kept an exact account of all the work they have performed, or which you, their wives, and your children have performed on each allotment; and rating the produce at the common market price, as it sells in Petworth, Midhurst, or Chichester market,—rating it by the same rule as the farmers rate their produce,—each allotment has returned four shillings a day for the labour devoted to it; and paid all its local taxes and rent, amounting to £3 per acre.

Indeed, it would have been impossible to have lived on your income of 4s. 6d. a week without the allotments. And this will doubtless make many people exclaim, "How blessed is the allotment system!"

Yes; an allotment of land is good for a family, if there be good wages along with it. But to you it is not one whit better than a substitute for wages. The allotments are made a substitute for poor-rates by those who pay the rates. And this is so far good. I believe that all paupers, save the helpless young, the helpless old, and the sick, might, in all rural districts, such as that part of England where you dwell, be maintained by the allotment of land, or by their employment on the land by others.

But if this be true—and your own allotments prove its possibility—there need be no paupers at all of an age and strength of body fit for work. All other land of the same quality of your allotments might be made equally fruitful. But it will require very different treatment from what the farmers now give it.

On this point I refer you to a letter which will appear in this paper, addressed to the farmers of your parish. In addressing you, the wives of the working men, I shall adhere to other topics. Your allotments of land were mentioned here to show the readers of this letter who do not know you, how you manage to make both ends meet—both ends of the 4s. 6d. per week.

You are not worse, those of you who have the ground, than the farm-labourers in full employment who have none. In estimating your income and expenditure, your support of the great interests of sugar, tea, home manufactures, Government revenue, and last, not least, the interests of the dealers in cattle and sheep, I should only express the condition of the majority of the labourers throughout Sussex. But to take you as illustrative of their condition might be deemed unfair. So, having addressed myself to your case merely to show that all who are published to the world as labourers in agriculture are not really what they are said to be, let us turn to some one who is in full and constant employment as a real labourer on a farm.

(On looking to notes of information, carefully collected in your parish, I find the average expenditure of families

In full employment to be within a fraction the expenditure of the family of the Horlocks, in Dorsetshire, mentioned last week in this paper; because, though 9s. a week is the sum of a labourer's weekly earnings with you, and 8s. that of Francis Horlock in Dorset, the latter had no cottage rent to pay, while the labourers of Easbourne pay from 1s. to 1s. 6d. per week.

The average expenditure for tea and sugar, in support of the great West and East India interests, is, per family of six, 9s. per annum. Mrs. H.'s account for these articles stood thus:—

	Tea.	Sugar.
January .. .. .	8d.	2d.
February .. .. .	8	0
March .. .. .	0	0
April .. .. .	8	0
May .. .. .	8	2
July .. .. .	8	0
August .. .. .	8	4
September .. .. .	8	0
October .. .. .	8	2½
November .. .. .	8	0
December .. .. .	8	0
	7s. 4½d.	10½d.

This being for a period exclusive of the last three weeks of December, add 4½d. to the sugar amount and 4½d. to the tea amount for Christmas, and the sums will stand—sugar, 1s. 3d.; tea, 7s. 9d.—together, for the East and West India interests, 9s. per annum. Where coffee is used tea is dispensed with.

Let us suppose the full extent of all the labourers, and of their wives and families (called in the census "residue"), to be 95,000 in Sussex, which includes paupers and all such as those working on the roads at Easbourne, the consumption of sugar in that county among that class will be, per annum, 33,928 lbs. at 7d. per lb. Taking the whole of the labourers in agriculture, with their "residue" of wives and children, in England and Wales at 2,700,000, which is certainly above their actual number, their consumption of sugar at the rate of Sussex will be, at 7d. per lb., 414 tons 16 cwt. 74 lbs.

This is about the cargo of one ordinary West India brig or barque. The whole of the great agricultural interest of England and Wales—protected for the sake of its labourers! protected because it supports other interests; protected for the benefit of commerce and that West India interest which clings to it for help, saying, "Help me and I'll help you"—supports the sugar trade to the extent of the cargo of one vessel under 450 tons burden.

The consumption of tea by the whole of the labourers in agriculture and their families in England and Wales amounts to 321 tons 13 cwt. 54 lbs., at the retail rate of 5s. per lb. This is a patronage of the East India and China interests to the extent of about one-third of the cargo of one ship, such as is called an East Indiaman, and that not one of the largest ships.

Captain Shirley, at a meeting in Midhurst in 1841, when Lord John Russell made a hopeless effort to reduce the price of sugar, told you that sugar would not be one farthing per pound cheaper were there no duty upon it at all than it was then; and farther, that if it were cheaper nobody would be benefited.

The captain was applauded for saying this; and being a respectable gentleman and a very amiable man, save that he ventured to assert such things on a topic of which he was evidently uninformed, he was believed. Some of your husbands were at the meeting; and, if I am rightly informed, they signed a petition to Parliament, praying that the proposals of Lord John Russell might not be carried into law: in other words, that you might not have cheaper sugar; that you might not have more than a "dust for baby;" that the whole of the labourers in agriculture in England and Wales might not do more for commerce than employ one middling-sized West Indiaman, and a third part of one East Indiaman, each one voyage in the year, to bring home their tea and sugar.

The petition which some of you signed at the same time prayed also that corn might not be more plentiful and bread cheaper than it was at that time. If any of you really believed that dear bread was good for you, there could be no harm in thus petitioning; but you know very well that your "dust of sugar for baby," and your tea without sugar for yourselves, were 1s. when bread was dear, than now when it is cheap; you know, and none know better, that high prices do not raise your ability to buy. You get no more work and no more wages. If Captain Shirley and the other gentlemen who led that meeting, and who got some of you to sign their petition, really believed, as doubtless they did, that any alteration in the corn and sugar laws would injure them and their friends, they did right to sign their own petition with their own hands, but not to compel others to sign it.

But a change of circumstances has come over them since that time. The farmers of Easbourne parish are not so happy with their "friends" as they were then; and I do not despair of being able to convince them that they would have been better with no Corn Law at all.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

A LETTER TO G. G. HARCOURT, ESQ., M.P.
(From the Patriot.)

SIR,—Though the following letter is long, you will, I am confident, make room for it. Its contents are of no ordinary character. A word or two in explanation, and I have done for the present. I published some letters in the month of December, 1844, through the medium of the Patriot and of the Oxford Chronicle, calling attention to the real condition of too many of the peasantry in our own county. Mr. Harcourt, who is, I believe, a worthy and feeling gentleman, saw these letters, and felt anxious to inquire into the truth of my statements. He paid a visit to Bicester, in order that he might see and hear for himself. I was out at the time, and therefore did not see the honourable member; but he left his address at the inn. I wrote to him, and received a very polite answer. I am now immersed in domestic afflictions, and consequently have neither the time nor the inclination to address a private letter to the worthy gentleman, and to prepare a manuscript copy of it for the press; and, therefore, I am resolved to put our representatives and the public in possession of my sad tale of woe through the same medium. I have not attempted either to argue upon it, or to clothe my statistics in light drapery; but simply to state naked and incontrovertible facts. They are of age, and will speak for themselves. Many heartfelt thanks to certain friends through whose kindness I have been enabled to assist many of the poor in our neighbourhood.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

W. FERGUSON.

Bicester, King's-end, Feb. 28, 1845.

"TO G. G. HARCOURT, ESQ., M.P."

"HONOURED SIR,—Your kind letter addressed to me on the 8th of January, 1845, in relation to the condition of the field-labourers in our district, must be my apology for the liberty which I have taken by calling your serious attention to the following statistics, which are confined to the state of things in two parishes in our own neighbourhood. I shall begin with the hamlet of Arncliffe, in the parish of Ambrosden, Oxon. But in doing so I beg, in justice to others, to say that I do not blame either the farmers or the tradesmen for the state of things which I am about to describe. It is well known that tradesmen in districts purely agricultural are not doing well at present; and farmers, many of whom are groaning under an absurd system of yearly tenancy, in general have enough to do to pay their rents, rates, and taxes. They cannot, therefore, be expected to employ more labourers than they can afford to pay. The truth is the labour market is glutted, and must remain so—especially in the rural districts—under a system of partial and unequal legislation.

"The following facts will demonstrate the extent to which too many of the labouring poor are suffering in the very county which you, Sir, in conjunction with others, represent in Parliament. Many of the mud hovels in Upper Arncliffe have been built, from time to time, by the peasantry themselves. The height of some of these hovels, from the floor to the ceiling, is from four feet eight inches to five feet six inches. They are cold and damp. In several of them from five to nine persons sleep in the same low attic! The poor inmates of these wretched habitations have no other water to drink than what they take from the ponds, in which ducks swim, and from which cows and horses may drink their share! I have no doubt that the muddy and filthy water which the poor of Arncliffe drink is more than prejudicial to their health. I am not alone in this opinion.

"On the 15th of January, being the day on which our beloved Queen arrived at Buckingham, I took an experienced tradesman with me, and we visited a number of cottages, occupied by field-labourers, in our own neighbourhood. We took an inventory of all the beds, bedsteads, chairs and stools, &c., which we found in the cottages at which we called.

"In the first cottage there was something in the shape of a bed and bedstead, and another bed on the same floor, and some straw in a corner of the room. Six or seven persons sleep there, two of whom were ill and confined to their beds when we called. Their furniture was made up of three broken chairs and one table. In the second cottage at which we called we found three broken chairs, one small table, and a pot. There was something on the damp floor in the shape of a bed, but not a bedstead, on which four persons sleep! In the third cottage visited by us we found two chairs, two stools, and two small tables. The poor man has a wife and three children to provide for. They pay 1s. 3d. a week rent. They had a bed and some bedclothes, but the sober and industrious man had not a day's work to go to. In the fourth cottage we found three stools, some chairs (but they were useless), and two small tables; there were two beds and bedsteads, such as they were, and another bed on the floor. Eight persons sleep in the same room. In the fifth cottage we found a mixture of boiled flour and water on the table for dinner! The quantity of flour was one pennyworth! The family are eleven in number, and they all sleep in one room or attic. They pay 1s. 6d. a week rent. They had only one young man in work: his wages were 4s. 6d. a week. In another cottage visited by us the inmates are seven in number. They pay 1s. 3d. a week rent. The poor man had no employment, but they had some old beds and a little furniture in the house. We visited another cottage on the 17th of January, 1845, the miserable inmates of which are six in number. The man had nothing to do. They pay, or rather have promised to pay, 1s. 3d. a week rent. They had one straw bed on a low bedstead, and some straw in a corner of the room, covered with coarse sackcloth, on which the children sleep. They had neither food nor firing in the house when we called. I said to the man, 'Why do you not go into the workhouse with your family?' His answer was, 'I have my hands to work, and I am willing to work; but if I cannot get work, sooner than I shall submit to be shut up in that house and separated from my wife and children, I will go to the Oxford Gaol!' I called a few days afterwards at the same cottage, and found the children in bed at one o'clock at noon! They had no firing, nor yet the means of procuring any; and, consequently, the children were kept in bed to keep them warm. I have since had the poor man employed for a few days in my garden, and a more skilful and industrious labourer I have never had about my premises. Is not this fact a proof that the labour market is glutted, and that the labourers are suffering? The poor, whose miseries I have attempted to describe above, were not receiving any parochial relief at the time we visited them.

"On Thursday, the 20th inst., my friend the tradesman and myself visited some of what are called parish cottages or houses, in villages near Bicester, and in the county of Oxford. The facts which I am about to state will serve to show the wretched and degraded condition of many of the working class in that parish. The first house at which we called is without a roof. Three poor creatures, including an old woman, live there, and sleep just behind the door, on a damp floor, to catch the rain-water which falls during a wet day through the broken ceiling. The broken ceiling is the only roof over their devoted heads! I declare solemnly and emphatically that I never entered so wretched a place, inhabited by human beings, in any part of the Highlands or Islands of Scotland, as I have visited in the above village. The second hovel, at which we called is so small that a man, his wife, and their four children are compelled, for want of room, to do with one bed and bedstead; and their attic is so low and narrow that one of them must get into bed before another can follow. Some of their children sleep on the floor close to the bed. All the light glass about six or eight inches square. In the third hovel, and three children; they have no attic in the hovel; and, as there is no room within its humble walls for a single bedstead, they are compelled to sleep in another hovel. Eight iron bars fixed in a hole in the end of the hovel, and about one quarter of an inch apart from each other, make up their only window. In the fourth hovel we found a poor, though not an old, man, who has been ill for twenty weeks. He suffers from pains in his arms, &c.; and those who have seen his damp habitation do not wonder that he is afflicted. Both he and his aged mother receive parochial relief; and they might take shelter in the union workhouse, but they will not enter the house; no,—they hate it. In the last hovel at which we called there is a family of eight or ten persons. They have not a sufficient number of either chairs or stools on which to sit by the fire, when they have any; and, consequently, they have taken some stones out of the inside of the wide fireplace, and thus have made themselves holes in which they sit by the fire. The poor people live rent-free in these dens of woe and wretchedness, but, like the poor of Arncliffe, they drink the muddy and filthy water with which the ponds supply them. The general rate of wages paid in our province is: boys at from ten to fourteen years of age, 2s. to 2s. 6d. a week; single young men receive from 3s. to 5s. a week; married men who have no children, 6s. a week; and married men who have families, 8s. a week.

"The following statement of facts will give you an idea of the way in which some of the most frugal of the field-labourers lay out their money.

"J. has a wife and five children. He is in constant work. His wages are 8s. a week. He has neither a garden nor any potato land. His wages are laid out as follows:—

	s.	d.
To house rent, per week .. .. .	1	4
To half a hundred weight of coals, per week ..	0	9
To potatoes, per week .. .. .	0	6
To ten loaves of brown bread, per week, at 5½d. per loaf .. .. .	4	7
To lard, per week .. .. .	0	2
To coffee, per week .. .. .	0	1
To sugar, per week .. .. .	0	3
To bacon, per week .. .. .	0	2
To soap and candles, per week .. .. .	0	2
Total .. .. .	8	0

"Thus we see, Sir, that seven persons must be content, if they can be content, with less than a loaf and half for each for seven days! Or, if they should get more bread, the baker must be the sufferer. The sober and plain truth is, the poor people are, to use a homely phrase, frequently put to their shifts. They are driven sometimes to leave the baker or the landlord, or both, unpaid, that they may have a few pence to buy beer or a few yards of cotton, to drown their sorrows or to hide their nakedness. Many of the peasantry earn a shilling or two weekly by lace-making. But what they earn by lace-making is not half sufficient to furnish them with shoes and clothes. I asked a labouring man the other day, how much bread he could consume in seven days? His answer was, 'Three loaves and a half, if I had potatoes and some vegetables.' What, then, must be the state of those labourers who cannot get a loaf and a half for seven days to support nature? And what must be the condition of those labourers who have but a few days' work now and then, during the winter half-year,—just work enough to tempt them successfully to keep out of the workhouse, but not half enough to save them from starvation and ruin. I was told by a respectable gentleman, a few weeks back, that there are thousands starving in Oxfordshire.

"We have kind and charitable persons in our town, among whom are the worthy magistrates and the bankers, who do much to alleviate the sufferings of their poorer brethren. But charity can never reach an evil which has its seat, life, and strength in the heart of legislative enactments. And, therefore, those who are the real authors of the evil, and who have inflicted the curse of poverty, are the proper persons to provide a remedy. I have felt it to be my duty to communicate these facts to you, Sir, because I have thought, and because I still think, that those who represent our counties, &c., in Parliament should be well acquainted with the real state of things in counties of which they are the representatives. You will, I doubt not, excuse the liberty which I have taken in addressing this letter to you, and do what you can to alleviate the miseries of those whose prosperity you are pledged to promote. In making the inquiries which I have made into the present and real condition of the peasantry in our neighbourhood, my own conscience has been my prompter, and the motives by which I have been swayed may be found in the example set before us by Him who said 'I was hungry and ye gave me food, naked, and ye clothed me, sick, and ye visited me.' I do not, however, take any credit to myself for the humble efforts which I have made in the cause of humanity; neither shall I be disappointed if others should throw upon me. The naked facts which I have stated in this letter are terrible, but true; and therefore I court the most searching and unflinching investigation into my statistics, the strict accuracy of which I am prepared to verify upon oath before a committee of the House of Commons. I have taken the liberty to add to this letter the attestation of one who knows more of the real state and condition of the peasantry of our province than any other man in the county.

"I have the honour to be, honoured Sir,

Your humble and obedient servant,

W. FERGUSON,

Minister of the Independent Congregational Church,
Bicester, Feb. 28, 1845.

"P.S.—The bedsteads and beds of which I have said so much in this letter are stump bedsteads, and the beds are almost all made up of straw. The cry of the field-labourers will soon become an eclipse upon the prosperity of those who despise the poor and uphold the laws which stand between them and their daily bread. "W. F."

"I do hereby certify that I visited the cottages described in Mr. Ferguson's letter, in company with him, and that his statements are perfectly correct; and, as a dealer in furniture, &c., I further declare, that I would not give more than £2. 10s. for all the goods found in twelve cottages occupied by able-bodied men. "SAMUEL ROLLS.

"TO THE REV. W. FERGUSON.

"DEAR SIR,—You have requested me to state my opinion as to the state of the field-labourers and poor in this neighbourhood at the present time. I beg respectfully to inform you that I know numbers of them are ruined in their morals, and in a most deplorable state of wretchedness and poverty. The wages of those who are in constant work are not more than half sufficient to support their families; what, then, must be the condition of those (and there are many of them) who go many weeks, and some even for months together, without any work, and that in the depth of winter? And what must be the condition of those who, finding their homes so miserable and wretched, go and spend a part of their earnings at a public-house, to escape for a little while the miseries of their own fireless and wretched habitations? Numbers of young girls, many of whom have been taught in our Sunday-schools, and consequently know better, are driven to prostitution for a morsel of bread; and many have pledged all they have got, so that they have nothing left. Some come many miles to pledge for a very trifle; the trade, too, of those who deal in goods such as the poor usually buy, is very much decreased. I sincerely hope your efforts will be crowned with success; and that you will go on in your praiseworthy endeavours to do the poor good, and to save them, and those who live by them, from impending ruin. "I am, yours respectfully,

"Feb. 21, 1845."

"SAMUEL ROLLS.

It is not generally known, in some parts of the country, that boys at from ten to fifteen years of age leave their wretched homes at this season of the year soon after four o'clock in the morning, and return about seven or half-past seven in the evening. They have to assist the men who feed the horses before they are led out to the fields. Thus, it will be seen that boys receiving 2s. or 2s. 6d. a week wages, and young men who are paid at the rate of 5s. a week wages, are engaged during fourteen or fifteen hours every working day,—when they are fortunate enough to get work,—and some of them have to attend to the horses, &c., a part of the day on Sundays. Many of these boys and working men have nothing but a piece of dry bread to eat during the many hours they are from home. I add no more. W. F.

FREE-TRADE LECTURE AT BLACKROD.—On Thursday evening last, a lecture, on "Sugar and other Monopolies," was delivered by Mr. Pinnigan, of Manchester, at the Red Lion Inn, Blackrod, about four miles from Wigan, to a more crowded audience than probably was ever witnessed before in the township. The large room of the inn was crowded to overflowing. Mr. Pinnigan was very frequently and warmly applauded. The interest excited may be judged of by the fact, that the lecturer has been particularly requested to deliver another lecture on the same subject, which he accordingly announced.

ANTI-CORN LAW LECTURES IN SUSSEX.—Mr. Falvey lectured at Hurst, in the large room of the White Horse Inn, on Tuesday evening last. The room and passages were quite full of farmers and farm-labourers, and the greatest interest was taken in the proceedings. At the close of the lecture several questions were put by Mr. Davey, an extensive and intelligent farmer, and answered satisfactorily amid the cheers of the audience. Mr. Falvey then moved a Free-Trade resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Vallance, and carried unanimously.—Mr. Falvey lectured in the Town-hall, Worthing, on Wednesday evening, to a numerous and respectable audience. There was a fine Free-Trade feeling manifested throughout; and a resolution to that effect was carried without a single dissentient.

A "GAME" INTERPRETATION OF DOING AS YOU WOULD BE DONE UNTO.—A Lover of Justice says:—"As Mr. Bright, by his indefatigable exertions, has succeeded in obtaining a committee of the House of Commons to inquire into the effects of the game laws on the interests of the farmers and the morals of the rural population, I beg leave to send you the following facts for publication, which will tend, in some measure, to illustrate the pernicious effects of those laws on the interests of the farmers, and the narrow-minded selfishness engendered by their unbalanced influence on some of the owners of the soil in South Lancashire. In the neighbourhood of Rainford there is a certain farm, and whether the different occupants of the said farm retired from the business after having acquired an independence by their industry, or lost the capital they had invested in its cultivation, is foreign to my present object; suffice it to say that the owner thought proper to take it into his own possession and cultivate it, and, as the farmers say, during the last 'back end,' when the turnip crops were in the ground, and the farmers were expecting to reap the reward of their industry, lo! there was a man employed to go about the farm from six o'clock in the evening until six in the morning, driving the game on to the neighbouring farms. Thus the poor farmers in the neighbourhood of Rainford were compelled quietly to witness the destruction of their crops to fatten the game for a splendid battue for the amusement of the élite of the aristocracy, whose health, no doubt, was improved, and their purses rendered more valuable, by the murderous onslaught on the Rainford game. Surely, if the farmers are compelled to feed the game, they ought to be allowed to destroy it." Our correspondent gives the name of the farm and that of the master employed, as well as his own address; and yet we are unwilling to believe such a story to be true, though we have heard of similar doings in other places.—Liverpool Mercury.

REVIEW.

Third Annual Report of the Liverpool Anti-Monopoly Association. Liverpool, Baines.

This association is too intimately connected with the League to allow of our neglecting to notice the good service which its members have rendered to the cause of Free Trade by their exertions collectively and individually. The report which they have just issued is replete with valuable matter, and had we not so many urgent and pressing calls upon our space we should republish it at full length. The following passage ably states the circumstances which have given to our cause a rapidity of progress such as was never before witnessed in any political movement:—

"Events have spoken trumpet-tongued in our favour. Every fallacy which a selfish policy had endeavoured to impress on the public mind is at this passing moment in process of refutation. Cheaper food was to lower wages! We have had cheaper food, and in a great number of trades even money wages have been actually increased, in some cases voluntarily, by the employers; in others, at the demand of the operatives, and the combinations of the latter have, in almost every instance, been successful. Everywhere real wages—the amount of comforts for which money wages stand as only the representative—have advanced; and we believe that the working classes are becoming more and more convinced, that the only permanent and true protection for the labourer is in the active demand for his labour.

"Our late distress was said to be owing to over-production of manufactures and the use of machinery! Returning prosperity has been accompanied by increased production; while an unexampled extension of machinery has led to a like extension in the employment of manual labour.

"Cheaper food was to injure the revenue! The revenue, which had declined in years of scarcity, has flourished in seasons of abundance.

"We turn to the agricultural districts with the like result. The Corn Law was said 'to gild the thatch of the cottage and the dome of the palace!' Its lingering beams may, indeed, be still seen to brighten the latter, but the former lies in the deepest shade. It is proved beyond controversy, that the interest of the agricultural labourer in agricultural protection is comprised within 6s. or 7s. per week, while capable of labour, and the reversion of the parish workhouse in his old age! Can we wonder at the natural discontent that prevails?"

The association pays the following well-deserved tribute to the services of our meritorious contemporary, the Economist:—

"There is yet one other instrument in producing this change to which we would gratefully refer: it is the successful continuance of that most able weekly paper, the Economist. To the Economist we are indebted for a great number of the most valuable facts contained in this report. This journal supplies a want which had long been felt in the commercial world. Earnestly devoted to the cause of Free Trade, it supports it by the inductive method of an appeal to facts as the only sure test of truth. The laborious research displayed in its management, and the singular talent with which the most intricate calculations are wrought into the clearest results, by which it is shown that all national interests are suffering from our restrictive policy, are above all praise from us. It is quite evident that profit is only a secondary consideration. Its efforts are rather inspired by the conviction that no permanent improvement can take place in the condition of the people but through extended trade, and, consequently, better remunerated labour; and hence it is patiently treading the successive steps of evidence which demonstrate that these two objects must ever be inseparably connected with each other. Its monthly tables of exports and imports, drawn from official sources—its reviews of the current commercial questions of the day, and its practical application of politico-economic science to their solution—render it a most valuable guide to the mere trader; but it is yet more valuable to the philanthropist, who knows that it is upon the right and speedy settlement of the Free-Trade controversy that so much of the happiness or misery of his country must depend."

The concluding paragraphs of the report contain an able exposition of the present state of the Free-Trade question, too simple to need any introduction, and so complete as to render comment superfluous:—

"From the point of time on which we now stand, we regard the aspect of European affairs as most encouraging. If we look backward with a shudder at the exterminating wars which twenty-nine years of peace have almost obliterated, save from the page of history—we look forward with the more exulting hope that the adoption of Free Trade will render their recurrence impossible. National jealousies will be extirpated, interests created utterly incompatible with war, and hostile nations knit into one wide brotherhood of humanity. Free Trade will thus be the herald of peace and the guardian of civilization!"

"And if we look at our own internal condition, we are not the less encouraged. While our powers of production are as great as ever, the problem of a wiser distribution is forcing itself upon the attention of all thinking men. There is a growing conviction that the productive classes must be better fed—better clothed—better housed—and, above all, their social and intellectual wants more amply supplied. Society is stirred to its very depths by the discussion, and every scheme and every failure are but as the waves that mark the heaving of the mighty ocean!"

"We know, indeed, that there is much that is evil in the structure of society—that its charity is too often a cold substitute for justice—that its benevolence too frequently aggravates the suffering it was intended to remove. But we know also there is much that is good—which is even now visible and tangible to us—how much more that is latent and concealed! It is the inevitable tendency of trade rightly pursued to repress the evil and elicit the good."

"Of all the influences which regulate society, that of trade is naturally the most democratic in its character—the most conservative in its results. It is the most democratic, because it recognises an equal right to its privileges in all men. It is the most conservative, because all men feel their best interests promoted by this recognition, and dread changes which may by possibility disturb it.

"Hence freedom of commerce becomes another term for mutual justice. The superfluities of each supply the wants of all, and in this interchange of commodities is found the strictest bond of union."

"But let monopoly be admitted, and all the relations are disturbed. The union is thenceforth dissolved. On one side range the privileged classes, on the other the oppressed: discordant elements distract the peace of society, and the rights of property and the rights of industry become antagonistic words."

"The order of Providence in the history of human governments has indeed been the reverse of our proposition—Monopoly has been the rule, Freedom the exception. The Free-Trade agitation of the present day is but a later chapter of the same work, that records the struggles of our forefathers against feudal tyranny. Engaged in the peaceful pursuits of industry, they united for mutual protection against aristocratic aggression. Towns and cities arose. Civil freedom—liberty of the press—law and order—a deeper and a warmer glow of purity and power to our Christianity—in a word, modern civilization—have emanated from civic association."

"But feudalism still exists—has only changed its weapons—wields an act of Parliament instead of the sword, and seizes its 'black mail' by legal process, instead of open violence. Thank Heaven, the spirit which banded together the burghers of old also survives in the hearts of their descendants. It is the spirit which has animated the League in their six years' unwearying struggle with the Corn Law—it will sustain them till they witness its final abrogation—it will never die out but with the last remnant of our class legislation."

"There is a constant dependence—a ceaseless interchange in the material world. Air, sea, and land exchange their elements, and the thousand forms of beauty and life which everywhere surround us, are manufactured from the great storehouse of nature, and diffused in the spirit of a free commerce throughout the globe. The laws of trade are not less inflexible in their operation, or beneficial in their result. Prices not less surely tend and struggle to their level, than do the waters returning to the ocean. Let them flow on in their natural course—they irrigate and bless. Interrupt or tamper with their great law, divert them into the narrow channels of a selfish monopoly, and the banks, which would otherwise have smiled with fertility and happiness, become the scene of desolation and dismay."

The Royal Phraseological English-French and French-English Dictionary. By J. C. Tarver, Esq. London, Dulau and Co.

This is more than a dictionary: it is a comparative analysis of the structure of the French and English languages, exhibiting the correct equivalents of their phrases, idioms, and peculiarities; it is the only existing dictionary which can guide an Englishman to write colloquial French, or a Frenchman to write the English of ordinary life and business. The greatest difficulty which English students have to encounter is the ascertaining of the right case or mood governed by the verb or adjective they have occasion to use; former lexicons furnished them with little or no assistance in this constantly-recurring perplexity, and they had in general no other guide than the loose analogies suggested by their recollection of the phrase-book. It is only when we converse with foreigners that we recognise the difference between grammatical and idiomatic English: the former then appears to us stiff, pedantic, and inflexible, while the latter possesses a flexibility and power of adaptation which fits it for all the purposes of life. To Frenchmen this difference between abstract language and colloquial language is far more striking and more painful: the genius of the French language is essentially conversational, and therefore it is strongly idiomatic. But the difficulty of French idioms is increased by their having rigid rules pervading all their apparent anomalies,—rules which, though seemingly capricious, have a real foundation in the philosophy of language; this is peculiarly marked in the laws that regulate the use of particles, and more especially the prepositions. Locke, in his "Essay on the Human Understanding," declares that the right use of particles is the very essence of good writing in all languages: it is so in French more than in any other; but until the publication of Mr. Tarver's work students had no guide whatever to this most essential element of composition. It is not easy for a reviewer to convey an adequate notion of the value of such a work as the present, for a quotation would be as imperfect a specimen as the brick which the old Greek displayed as a sample of the house he had to sell. It must suffice to say that, in addition to the mere verbal significations, which Mr. Tarver has given more completely and accurately than any former lexicographer, this work contains guidance for the structure of sentences and the purport of phrases. The difference between the old dictionaries and that of Mr. Tarver may be described best by comparing composition to building: they gave the materials of an edifice rough from the quarry, to be put together as best we could; he supplies the stones smoothed and squared, with the artistic marks that point out their proper places.

On the Application of Electro-Metallurgy to the Fine Arts. By Messrs. Elkington and Co. London: Elkington and Co.

We are induced to notice this brief description of a new and important process, not only in the ornmental but the useful arts, by the proof it affords of the philanthropic results of science. Economically viewed, electro-metallurgy seems likely to confer the same advantages on workers in metal that improvements in machinery have produced in other industrial pursuits; the metallic coating deposited by galvanic agency covers the inferior substance more perfectly than the old process of plating, and, so far as it has been tested, appears to possess much greater durability. The cost of production is not as yet lessened to an extent that greatly enlarges the consumption; but one element of that cost, the sacrifice of the life and health of those engaged in the old process of gilding, has been completely removed.

Before the introduction of electro-deposition, the only method of gilding was by forming an amalgam of gold and mercury, which, at the consistence of a thin paste, was brushed upon the articles over a strong heat; the mercury being gradually dissipated, the gold remained fixed upon the articles. This process is most pernicious, and destructive to human life, the mercury, volatilized by the heat, insinuates itself into the frames of the workmen, notwithstanding the greatest care, and those who are so fortunate as to escape for a time absolute disease, are constantly under salivation from its effects; paralysis is common among them, and the average of their lives very short: it has been estimated as not exceeding thirty-five years. It is difficult to believe how men should engage in such a business, reckless of the consequences so fearfully exhibited before them, and it would naturally be thought they would hail with pleasure the introduction of any process which would put a stop to such a dreadful sacrifice of human life; but interest and prejudice, in many cases, seem yet too strong, even where the alternative is so fatal.

As many other metals could be amalgamated with the mercury in this process, the temptation was great to use the inferior metals mixed with the gold, and which accounts for so many different tints and colours in mercurial gilding. In operating upon richly-chased articles, the gilding being brushed on whilst in a semi-fluid state, the more prominent parts (those most exposed to wear) were least covered with gold, whilst the indentations received an unnecessary quantity, sometimes to the injury of the work.

We merely design to call attention to this new illustration of the important fact that science is the true friend of the operative, and that every improvement in manufactures, whether chemical or mechanical, serves to advance the general cause of humanity.

The Old Forest Ranger. By Captain C. Campbell, H.E.I.C.S. London: How.

This handsome volume very appropriately appears at a time when there seems a probability of England being disforested and delivered from that remnant of feudal barbarism which commanded the preservation of wild animals to the prevention of cultivation. Captain Campbell consoles the lovers of true sport by opening to them "fresh fields and pastures new," where the sportsman will be welcomed as the friend of the husbandman, and where preserves are jealously guarded by the heat of gamekeepers—the tiger and the boa constrictor. His exciting descriptions of oriental sport make us ashamed of our battues, which are no better than slaughter in a poultry yard, and our coursing matches, in which war is waged against helplessness and timidity. Now that steamers regularly traverse the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean, and that the transit of the Egyptian desert presents no little difficulty as a journey from London to Edinburgh some twenty years ago, we may be allowed to hope that tiger-hunting will occupy the place of the fox-chase, that the encounter with the wild boar will be preferred to the pursuit of the timid hare, and that a few heads and skins of bears will be regarded as more honourable trophies than brushes and scents. Captain Campbell's spirited descriptions of oriental sport are so inviting, that we should not be surprised to hear of parties being formed in London for Bengal jungles instead of Scottish moors, and the monthly mail being waited for with the same anxiety to hear of the locale of wild elephants as Scottish letters are expected to tell the prospects of grouse.

The Game Laws.—Our worthy member for East Suffolk, Lord Rendlesham, is wise in his generation.—An order has been given to destroy and extirpate all hares and rabbits off the Rendlesham estate. It is a pity that the noble lord should have waited to issue such an order till Mr. Bright had obtained a committee of inquiry—till a searching investigation into game-preserving in Suffolk should have been at hand, and till Sir Robert Peel had thrown out the hint that the best way to defeat Mr. Bright would be for gentlemen to assume the appearance of a little moderation, and to "extirpate" their rabbits and hares. Lord Rendlesham is a very good tactician. He is quite prepared for the inquiry now. It will look very well in evidence that an order has been given to destroy and extirpate all hares and rabbits off the Rendlesham estate. Pray let the date of the order be added to it.— Ipswich Express.

AGRICULTURE.

A SECOND CHAPTER ON LEASES.

WHAT A LEASE SHOULD BE.

We resume the important subject of leases in continuation of our article of the 15th instant. We have shown that the leases now in use are in substance identical with those of 1792, and they are nothing better than fetters on an intelligent agriculturist. Even farmers of eminence still recommend the insertion of minute regulations as the means of improving the system of particular districts. Thus, Professor Low, in his excellent work "On Landed Property," says:—"It has been sometimes contended that the real interests of the landlord and tenant being the same with respect to preserving the productive state of the farm, it is unnecessary to lay the tenant under any restraints during the first period of his lease; and that restrictive covenants should be confined to the latter years of it, when the interests of the parties become different. The tenant's interest, however, is not in all cases a sufficient guarantee to the landlord that a farm will be properly managed; we cannot know what the condition of a tenant may become during the course of an extended term, and no power ought to be given to the lessee of injuring at any time the subject intrusted to him." And he afterwards adds—"And there can be no hardship in binding the lessee to follow a suitable course of management;" and he then goes on to prescribe various modes in which stipulations enforcing good and restraining bad courses of cropping, according to present notions, may be framed. Now, doubtless, this looks, at first sight, somewhat plausible; but, notwithstanding the eminent authority from which it proceeds, it is mere fallacy. On this point we must go a little into detail. The great difference between the old form of lease and that recommended by Mr. Low is, that the one attempts to prescribe a course of good husbandry by positive regulations, the other attempts the same thing by negative rules. The former required so many ploughings to be given, so much lime or manure to be spread on particular portions of the land, or at particular times, and so on; while the latter directs that the tenant shall not have less than a certain quantity of grass or fallow, or other than a certain succession of grain crops, and so forth. Now, the principle of these plans is the same; the mode of carrying them out only being different. Both seek to induce, by minute regulations, what the framer of the lease deems to be good farming, and both are founded upon the same apprehension that some permanent injury can be done to the land by a tenant during the currency of the lease. We freely admit that the negative regulations are in most respects far better than the old positive rules; but that is simply because they are practically less restrictive. We say distinctly, that all restrictions as to the course of cropping, except during the last four years, or perhaps, in some cases, during the last six years of the lease, are quite unnecessary for the landlord's protection, and are positively injurious to the tenant. If the tenant is bound during each of the last four years of the term to have one-fourth of his arable land under a proper state of fallow cropping, the landowner is amply protected. Without such a stipulation it is just possible that during the last two years—it could scarcely be longer—the tenant might have all his land under corn crops, and for a year or two afterwards there would be no land in proper course for grain. We shall presently show that this is the only consequence which by the present scheme of leases can be guarded against. Except for the last few years of a term, no tenant can, with the slightest prospect of benefit to himself, scourge his land by too frequent repetitions of grain crops; and nothing but the chance of an extravagant price, promised by the Corn Laws, could have ever induced occupiers so far to forget their own interests as to make such attempts. Now, however, no reasonable man would undertake a lease without assuming that the Corn-Law delusion is at an end, and that none but moderate prices can henceforth be expected. Quantity of produce is now on all hands admitted to be the farmer's only security; and to grow a large quantity by a system scourging to the land is impossible.

But a little reflection will show those acquainted with practical farming that none of the regulations by which it is attempted to bind "the lessee to follow a suitable course of management" will protect the land from any injury it can receive from bad farming, or induce a bad farmer to farm well.

Mr. Low says:—"A general rule to be inserted in every lease is, that no two crops of white corn, or any two crops of the same kind, shall follow one another in immediate succession." And other modern agriculturists have proposed that the tenant shall be simply required in every case to grow a corn crop and a fallow or green crop alternately. Upon the greater part of the soil of this country, and in the lands of the great majority of occupiers, such a course of alternate husbandry is that which the tenant's own interest would dictate. But the rule is by no means invariable, nor is the absolute superiority of the alternate system of husbandry so proved to be universally applicable, as to make its adoption a binding "rule to be inserted in every lease." We will give two instances, which have occurred within our own observation, on soils of a directly opposite character, in which the rule has been departed from with great advantage.

Upon a stubborn and tenacious clay soil a very skilful farmer has adopted the following rotation with most complete success:—First year, wheat; second year, oats—one-half of which is sown with clover; third year, one-half clover, the other half fallowed for turnips; fourth year, the clover ley is sown with winter tares, which are fed off with fatting sheep, and then follows a bastard fallow; the turnips having been fed off by fatting sheep and cattle, are followed by spring tares or coleseed, also eaten off by sheep. Then the land is ready for wheat again. The peculiar advantage of this rotation is that most of the working of the land is done in the autumn, and the action of the atmosphere through the winter effects that disintegration of the soil which alone can ensure the fertility of tenacious land.

The other case is that of a farm on a light gravelly soil, but which is farmed highly. By means of high farming and heavy dressings of chalk and clay it has assumed the appearance of rich garden ground; and there the tenant—following in other respects the four-course system of turnips, barley, grass, and wheat—often, though not always, takes a crop of oats immediately after the wheat. Here are two instances in which first-rate farmers find it to their interest to depart from this assumed general rule of alternate cropping; and in each case the landlord is not injured, for both farms are immeasurably higher in fertility than any others in their respective districts, on which the alternate system is strictly observed.

Again, on the light-land farm last mentioned, its skilful tenant intends this year to sow barley and clover-seeds in the same field on which a moderately good crop of barley was grown last year; and the particular scheme of the farm in connexion with its high state of tillage, renders such a departure from a rule generally binding, not merely justifiable, but affords proof of the farmer's knowledge of his business. Here we have distinct violations of each particular comprised in the rule Mr. Low thinks should be "inserted in every lease;" and we hesitate not to say that in each instance the non-observance of his rule would meet the approval of that able writer.

On the other hand, the grain crops, the grass, and the fallows may follow each other in the most approved order, and by the most scientific proportions, yet the fertility of the land shall be low, the soil full of weeds, and altogether out of condition; and still all the express regulations of the old lease and the implied rules of its modern prototype shall have been observed. It is quite obvious, therefore, that, though leases at present in use may restrict the operations of tenants injuriously, they do not secure, or even promote, good farming. Does not this indicate that the principle on which leases have hitherto been framed is erroneous? Let us try this by an inquiry as to what are the objects and wants of modern husbandry? These will all be found to be comprehended under the term capital. The great want of agriculture is larger capitals than are usually applied in working farms; the main object of all successful farmers is to increase the acreable produce. The man who farms with a capital of £5 to the acre would probably farm at a loss the same land on which a farmer with £10 to the acre would make a fair profit; while a man bringing £15 to the acre would obtain gains beyond the other greater in proportion than the amount of his capital. This is not a matter which admits of dispute; it is not disputed. The problem, then, is, how to attract capital to agriculture.

The frame of a lease will do much either to advance or retard that object. It should contain no restrictions which are not indispensable for the security of the owner of the land; and these will be found much fewer than are commonly supposed. First, the provisions for payment of rent may be made as stringent as is consistent with the ordinary course of business; as, for instance, if not paid within a month after the fixed day of payment the landlord might be entitled to resume possession. So, if the buildings be allowed to fall into dilapidation, the landlord might fairly be entitled to eject the lessee. Again, if the land be permitted to become waste, or in bad condition, it would be only equitable to enable the owner to determine the term. In either of the above cases it would be the withdrawal of capital from the land, which would give the owner a title to put an end to the lease. But, besides relieving the lessee from restrictions which prevent him from freely applying his capital to the soil, it is desirable that the land in his hands should have a commercial value. He should be able to sell, or to mortgage, or to settle his interest in the term; and if it were made a condition in the lease that every acignee of the term, whether absolute as a purchaser, or qualified as a mortgagee, should enter into a direct covenant with the landlord for the due performance of the stipulations of the lease, the performance of the lease would be benefited rather than injured by landlord would be benefited rather than injured by repeated transfers of the lease, because he would obtain the guarantee of each successive assignee for the strict performance of its conditions. This is analogous to what takes place with respect to house property in populous towns. Leases of land might thus become objects of speculation and investment. Mr. Hayter, M.P., in the fourth volume of the "Royal Agricultural Society's Journal," gives details of improvements effected by him on a farm of his own in Buckinghamshire, where, by an outlay of something less than £2000 on 250 acres of land, for which 20s. an acre had been asked without finding a tenant, he obtained an increased yearly value of £117. Now, suppose a tenant had taken that farm, and, in order to effect the improvements, had wanted £500 or £1000 above his own capital, there would have been a beneficial interest available as a security. And this, let it be remembered, is besides and beyond the improvements which would be effected by a long-continued course of good husbandry. In all other businesses many of those who have skill and activity borrow some portion of their capital from those who merely wish for interest without personal exertion; and why should not this take place in agriculture? Such transactions would be universally beneficial. Farmers would have opportunities of increasing their profits, landlords would find their rents secure, capitalists would have a new and secure field for investment opened, while the public would benefit by the general increase of production.

FARMERS ACTING FOR THEMSELVES.

A very remarkable meeting took place at St. Albans on Wednesday last, which denotes most forcibly the waning influence of landlordism. Our readers will recollect a correspondence between the Earl of Essex, a game-preserver, and Mr. John Hornecastle, one of his lordship's tenants, a victim to the game nuisance, with reference to the damage done by game on his lordship's estate in Hertfordshire. And no one who adverts to that correspondence—which appeared in the LEAGUE of the 28th of December last—can fail to observe the contrast between the shabby sentiments and disingenuous sophistries of the peer, and the straightforward and convincing statements of the tenant-farmer. Probably nobody felt this more than his lordship, for he forthwith served Mr. Hornecastle with a notice to quit his farm.

The tone of Lord Essex in defending the game laws and the practice of game-preserving was peculiarly offensive, not merely to the occupiers of his own farms, but to the tenant-farmers of the county at large; and Mr. Hornecastle's spirited exposure of his lordship was therefore deemed, and justly deemed, by the tenant-farmers of Hertfordshire to be a service rendered to their order. They accordingly commenced a subscription for the purpose of presenting to Mr. Hornecastle a testimonial of the esteem in which they held his right yeomanly service. No less than 241 tenant-farmers of Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire, occupying altogether 65,000 acres of land, contributed to this testimonial, which was presented to Mr. Hornecastle, on Wednesday, at a public dinner.

That true friend to agriculture, and ornament of his order, Mr. C. H. Lattimore, occupied the chair upon the occasion; and in his practical speech will be found some striking illustrations of that most noxious remnant of feudalism—the game laws.

Mr. Bright, too, was present, having been invited by the committee. A report of the proceedings will be found in another column, and to which we must refer the reader for details. But the composition of the meeting, and the spirit which animated it, require to be especially noticed. First, then, it must be noted that the subscribers to the testimonial consisted of men of every shade of opinion. Protectionists and Free-Traders, Whigs, Tories, and Radical politicians, cordially united to do honour to the tenant-farmer who had with so much credit to himself vindicated his order from the aspersions of a haughty landed magnate. This sentiment pervaded the meeting. And although such men had some tale to tell of wrongs endured by himself or his connexions, or his neighbours, at the hands of the landowners, not a syllable indicative of personal hostility, spleen, or irritation was uttered. Nothing approaching to vituperation appeared in any of the speeches. On the contrary, the utmost anxiety to render a full share of respect to rank and station, wherever accompanied by any personal qualities worthy of respect, was manifested. Even the Earl of Essex himself was referred to with that tone of abstinent moderation which declines to visit upon an individual the indignation a vicious system has excited. And no sentiment was more generally responded to than that the farmers as a body would with pleasure maintain enough game for real sport, provided their landlords would confide in them by not making reservations of the right of sporting. Yet this very moderation only rendered the determination of the meeting to think and act for themselves the more conspicuous. They felt that by doing honour to their spirited neighbour they proved their determination to emancipate themselves from the thralldom of landlordism; and they exhibited that feeling in a manner which gave the lie to all the calumnies uttered by the landlords, their agents, and their tools against the class of tenant-farmers. The meeting was composed of men of experience and intelligence, most of them occupiers of large farms, men not easily led to join in public agitation or political conflict. There was scarcely a man present who did not regret the existing necessity for denouncing the system of feudalism they were met to put down. It was a body of men compelled to assert their own rights against the oppressions of the landowners, for whom they entertained an instinctive reverence, which they regretted to discover their reason could not sanction. We have reason to know that amongst those present there were some who did not regard the presence of Mr. Bright altogether without misgivings. They had listened to the landlords' aspersions of the League, and they did not feel absolutely certain that there was not a little truth in the political landlords' assertion that the Free-Traders sought to advance the interests of their own class at the expense of the industrious agriculturists. But Mr. Bright had not spoken twenty sentences before these doubts and misgivings cleared away like mists before the sun. The earnest, direct, ay, and the business-like reasoning of the middle-class legislator carried conviction to the honest minds of the tenant-farmers, that the interests of those who employ their capital and their industry in manufactures are identical with those who by their skill and capital seek to gain a competence by the cultivation of the soil.

We never saw such a decisive effect produced upon an audience as by that speech. It was certainly a masterly effort—lucid, eloquent, and earnest. But its power over the meeting arose mainly from its obvious truthfulness. The farmers saw at once that the game-nuisance by which they suffered so severely is only part of a system of wrong founded upon the dominancy of a landed aristocracy; and that the tenant-farmers have been the main instruments in upholding the wrong, and the first victims of its oppressions. So palpable was this, that though Mr. Bright strictly abstained from direct reference to the Corn-Law question, yet, in proving the case against the game laws, the incidental application of the same reasoning against the Corn Laws as another part of the same system, became so strict that the audience instantly drew the right conclusion. A great number of gentlemen distinctly declared that they entered the room protectionists, but should leave it Free-Traders. And this is the conclusion to which the game-law question will ultimately lead farmers. They are beginning to see that the landlords, who, having ravaged their tenant's crops to support game, compensate them by a paltry present of the dead vermin; and those who, by means of a Corn Law, secure for themselves permanently high rents, though the tenants get only occasionally high prices, are guilty of wrongs in principle the same. Nor will this meeting—which was the spontaneous act of the tenant-farmers, one in which, as the chairman remarked, neither a landlord nor land-agent had taken part—prove fruitless. Nothing was more warmly responded to than the suggestion made by more than one speaker, that the farmers must act for themselves in public affairs, and elect some of their representatives in Parliament from their own class. We believe that this will be done or attempted to be done in more than one county at the next election; and when the first tenant-farmer appears at the table of the House of Commons as the representative of an agricultural constituency, the emancipation of rural industry from the oppressions of landlordism will be at hand. That will, indeed, "be a day of jubilee and rejoicing for the tenant-farmers." The political and social fate of the tenant-farmers of England is in their own hands. Are they equal to the emergency? Having marked the spread of sound opinion amongst them during the last six months, and bearing in mind the temper of the late meeting at St. Albans, we say deliberately they ARE.

WEEKLY HALF HOLIDAY IN A MILL.—Messrs. G. and J. Smith, silk manufacturers, Lower Mosley-street, Manchester, have commenced giving their workpeople a holiday on Saturday afternoon. We are informed that the greater part of the hands, 900 in number, are paid weekly wages.

GAME PRESERVING ABANDONED.—We are informed that our late High Sheriff, Joseph Yorke, Esq., of Northampton-court, near Towkesbury, has abandoned game-preserving and broken up his staff of keepers. This is a tribute to the "spirit of the age," which we are happy to have an opportunity of recording. The horrible conflicts which the preserving system has lately given rise to make one shudder; while there can be no doubt that the land can be made incalculably more valuable in a cultivated state, which, both to the owner and the public, is worthy consideration.—Gloucester Journal.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, March 29, 1845.

The preparations for the Bazaar are now in a state of forwardness which enables us to announce positively that it will open about the first week in May; and we therefore earnestly recommend our friends to exert themselves vigorously during the brief interval that is available. The ladies of the London Committee report very favourably on the general interest which the prospect of the Free-Trade Bazaar has excited; and though the size of the metropolis offers great difficulties to anything like a general canvass of all the friends of our cause, yet so eager have been the several persons engaged in the task that we believe there will be few metropolitan districts left unvisited by those ladies who have volunteered their services. They feel that they are engaged in a work of true charity and genuine philanthropy; they know that the removal of restrictions on commerce will bring employment to those who are reluctantly idle, and food to those who are inadequately fed; and they are thoroughly convinced that the Corn Laws inflict a double curse, by increasing the price of food, and diminishing the means of earning its price. The reports which these ladies give of their reception in the houses they have visited are very gratifying; the recent exhibition of monopolist rapacity in the grease-and-lard debate has confirmed the zealous Free-Traders, has fixed the wavering, has won over many opponents, and shaken the confidence of more. The approaching demonstration has thus assumed an interest and importance as great as ever attached to any former movement of the League. It will be a manifestation of the strength of sympathy for those whose labour is cheap and whose bread is dear; of anxiety for the welfare of a generation rising into active life with restrictions placed on the means by which that generation is to be maintained and subsisted, and of honourable zeal for the general prosperity of their common country.

The mission of woman is the establishment of peace, love, and unselfishness; it is, therefore, opposed to a system of incessant strife for paltry and petty gains, which wars against humanity for the sake of a penny on the poor man's loaf, or a farthing on the infant's butter—it is opposed to a system which prevents the growth of affection by permitting one class to profit by unjust exaction, and fills the other class with just resentment against such preposterous injustice—it is opposed to a system which trains the children of monopoly into a selfishness that stoops to investigate every item in the poor man's larder, to complain that his flour is too cheap, his meat obtained at too low a rate, and the farthing he uses as a substitute for butter, exonerated from the tax it paid to support the hounds of noble dukes and illustrious squires. In any way, in every way in which God and man can be served, it is the mission of woman to serve gracefully, peaceably, and efficiently. God points the way; His angels have declared that "Glory to God in the Highest" is conjoined with "Peace on earth, good will towards men." Let His missionaries follow; let them seek peace and pursue it—let them by their example stimulate, by their energies advance, by their sympathies comfort, and by their influence save. It is the cause of human nature; it is the cause of their own children claiming their birthright at their hands.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

SWITZERLAND.—A despatch from Prince Metternich had been received by the President of the Swiss Diet, after its sitting of the 20th, intimating the intention of Austria, in conjunction with France and England, to interfere in suppressing any further insurrectionary movement which might threaten to disturb or annihilate the act which constituted Switzerland a body politic recognised by Europe. The Diet had, on the 19th, adopted the first only of the four articles proposed by the commission relative to the free corps, the forming and arming of which, without the consent and co-operation of the cantonal governments, was declared to be inconsistent with the sense and aim of the Federal Compact. The Diet, having closed its deliberations, stands adjourned sine die. According to the Nonnulliste Vaudois, the free corps stationed in the neighbourhood of Aarau, in Argovia, had ten pieces of artillery, and would certainly invade the territory of Lucerne, if the Diet should separate (as they have done) without decreeing the expulsion of the Jesuits. In the canton of Vaud the Methodists were "cruelly" persecuted by the Protestants, and at L'Aigle, Morges, and Lausanne they had even been expelled from their meeting-houses.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—Letters from Constantinople of the 7th inst. mention that a serious mutiny had broken out among the Albanian recruits who had recently arrived in that city, in consequence of their pay having been withheld. The mutiny was at length put down; but not until several of the regular troops had been wounded. Five of the mutineers were ordered to receive five hundred strokes of the bastinado upon their feet.

ACCOUCHMENT OF THE GRAND DUCHESS OF RUSSIA.—Her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess of Russia was safely delivered of a prince on the 10th instant, at St. Petersburg. This happy event has been productive of unmixed joy to the Imperial Family. The infant prince has received the name of Alexander.

THE LATE ACCIDENT AT ALGIERS.—The Akbar of Algiers, of the 13th instant, states that the clearing of the ruins of the late disastrous explosion was still going on. On the 11th the labourers in this sad duty discovered a party of nine soldiers, who were crushed while playing at cards. Some of them still held the cards in their hands. Galliani.—The Débat publishes a letter from Algiers, which throws a sort of confirmation over the report that the explosion was a wilful act. It is stated that the body of an unknown Moor or negro was found in the ruins. If this be true, this man must have devoted himself to destruction under the influence of fanaticism against the French.

UNITED STATES.—The packet ship George Washington, which left New York on the 6th instant, arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday afternoon, bringing important intelligence from the United States. The bill for the annexation of Texas passed the Senate on the 27th of February, by a majority of two only; the Representatives on the 28th; and was returned, with the signature of the President, on the 1st inst. It seems to have created but little excitement, and all parties are awaiting the result of its reception by the Texas Government. The Mexican Minister has, in the interim, declared his intention of protesting against the measure. An express has been forwarded to his Government to announce the passing of the bill. The Oregon Occupation Bill was moved in the Senate on the 3rd, and on a vote was lost by 24 yeas and 21 nays. The cause of this is stated to be the intimation from Mr. Tyler, that matters were in a fair way for a speedy settlement with Great Britain. The Reduction of Postage Bill has passed both Houses amid a perfect storm of opposition. The rate for letters is fixed at five cents under 300 miles, and double that sum for a farther distance. Florida and Iowa have been admitted formally into the Union as states, swelling the number of states to twenty-eight, and, as the papers remark, "not including Texas." On the 14th of March, James K. Polk, in the presence of some 30,000 people, entered upon his career as President of the United States. His inaugural address is tempered with moderation, and has evidently been written to gain favour with both parties. He goes for Texas, Oregon, and every other territory that can be gained constitutionally. A revenue tariff is recommended, protection to be the contingent only; but no specific alteration is threatened. He goes against abolition and a national bank, and condemns repudiation, expressing a hope that the defaulting states will "pay up" as the late pressure of circumstances under which they have laboured shall have died away. The concourse of people at Washington is stated to have been greater than on any previous occasion.

HAYTI.—The brig Republic, Captain Smith, arrived on the 5th instant at New York from Port Republic, whence she sailed on the 21st ult. It appears that Hayti cannot remain quiet. With elements enough to become a comparatively wealthy republic, she is rapidly going to ruin. Another revolution was on the eve of breaking out when the Republic sailed. It was expected that the ex-President Riviera Herard would return from Jamaica, in order to regain the power he once possessed. Preparations were making to receive him with open arms by his friends, and on bayonets by those opposed to him. If taken, he will of course be shot.

WEST INDIES.—The royal mail steam-ship Severn arrived at Southampton, from the West Indies, on Saturday night. Her dates are, from Jamaica to the 23rd of Feb., Hayti the 25th; St. Thomas the 1st, and Falmouth the 15th, of March. From the very favourable season, as well as from the improving cultivation, a larger crop of sugar will be produced in the West Indies than has been obtained for many years. Jamaica, it is said, will make 50,000 hhds., Dominica 15,000, and the other islands one-third to a half more than usual. Agricultural improvements are paid considerable attention to, and the plough and other implements of husbandry are fast coming into use, beneficially replacing manual labour, and no doubt will in the end enable the West India planter to compete with slave-grown sugar.

INDIA AND CHINA.—The intermediate Indian mail, bringing dates from Calcutta to the 8th ult., and from Madras to the 21st of December, has arrived. The political news is exceedingly unimportant, being confined to an announcement that a rather considerable British army is concentrating near the Sutlej, to provide against any contingencies which may spring out of the present disturbed state of the Punjab. The mercantile accounts continue unfavourable, especially from Calcutta, where the prices of English manufactures were still low. Great loss and inconvenience have been experienced by parties engaged in the opium trade, from the flagrant adulterations practised by the growers of, or the dealers in, Malwa opium. These have been carried to such a length that the article is almost entirely unsaleable.—In Seinde some abatement had, happily, taken place in the ravages of disease and death. According to a writer in the Friend of India, the authorities have prohibited, by the severest restrictions, any officer from communicating the amount of loss to which the British troops have been subjected by the diseases peculiar to that land of pestilence.—Reports received, via Lahore, represent Afghanistan, which was recently infected by the plague, as now visited by famine. Dost Mahomed had recently narrowly escaped assassination. When out riding a band of conspirators suddenly fell upon him; they wounded him severely, but he escaped with life.

DOMESTIC.

The execution of John Tawell, for the murder of Sarah Hart, took place yesterday (Friday) morning at Aylesbury, in the presence of an immense concourse of people. He appeared not to have died for at least five minutes after the fatal drop had fallen. It was expected that the wretched man would be received with groans and execrations by the crowd, but we are pleased to be able to say that no such disgraceful proceeding took place. On the contrary, a most decorous and becoming silence was observed, and not a word escaped to distract him in his last moments. It appears that Tawell drew up a confession some days since, of which he made a copy at a quarter to five o'clock on Friday morning. This statement he placed in the hands of the Rev. Mr. Cox, the chaplain, which he begged of that gentleman to keep, but said that he had no objection to the substance of it being made known to the public. The statement will be so far satisfactory to the public that it takes away all doubt as to the guilt of the deceased. He confessed that he was guilty of the murder of Sarah Hart, and also that he was guilty of the attempt to murder her on the previous occasion, in September last, as stated on the trial. He also confessed that he did not commit the murder from pecuniary motives, but from the dread that the relation in which he stood towards Sarah Hart would transpire and come to the ears of his wife.—Sun.

The increased grant to Maynooth will be proposed by Sir R. Peel on the 3rd of April. Mr. Ward has given notice of an amendment, "That all further money grants for the purpose of religion be made out of the funds appropriated for the maintenance of the Protestant Episcopal Church."

On Saturday afternoon an explosion took place in the manufactory belonging to Messrs. Robeson and Highams, patent signal-light manufacturers, near Poplar, by which a fine young girl, and a young man named Henry Jones, lost their lives.

A butcher at Nottingham has succeeded to a fortune, variously estimated at from £4000 to £16000, by the death of his mother, who was transported for uttering base coin about 30 years ago, but afterwards reformed, married again, and amassed considerable wealth.—Globe.

The Council of Manchester, on Monday last, resolved, by a unanimous vote, to purchase of Sir E. Mosley, the lord of the manor of Manchester, all the manorial rights and properties, for the sum of £200,000; of which £5000 only is to be paid down (as a deposit), and the corporation is not to be compellable to pay in liquidation of the purchase-money more than £1000 a year, but with an option on their part to increase that payment to £6000 a year. The corporation is to pay interest on the unpaid amount, at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum; the payment of the principal being secured by mortgages.

The first cargo of Java sugar with a certificate of origin has arrived in London from Batavia, imported by Messrs. Thornton and West. Under the new act this will be admitted at a duty of 23s. 4d. per cwt., instead of 35s. 9d., as regulated last year. A destructive fire broke out on Thursday evening, in the Apothecaries-hall, Colquitt-street, Liverpool. The story in which it broke out was filled with an immense quantity of castor oil, almond oil, and balsam of capivi, all highly inflammable substances. In the top story there was a large quantity of empty castor-oil picking cases, whilst the other stories contained a vast variety of chemicals and drugs more or less inflammable. It need scarcely be wondered then that the flames progressed with the greatest rapidity and intensity. The loss is roughly estimated, including building, stock, and machinery, there being a graining-mill and steam-engine on the ground-floor besides other valuable pieces of machinery, at £50,000.—Liverpool Mercury.

Saturday the wretched man, Thomas Jennings, suffered the extreme penalty of the law for the murder of his daughter at the village of Thatcham, in front of the new gaol, Reading, Berkshire, in the presence of nearly six thousand persons.

Some day a lengthened inquiry took place in the board-room of Chelsea workhouse, before Mr. Wakley, on view of the body of Mary Ann Murray, aged 32, who destroyed herself by cutting her throat whilst in a state of phrenzy, having been detected in the act of shoplifting on the premises of Mr. Saunders, haberdasher, of King's-road, Chelsea. Verdict—"Temporary insanity, from the dread of prosecution."

On Monday morning the unfortunate young man, Jas. Topping, who, at the last session of the Central Criminal Court, was convicted of the wilful murder of Emma Whittier, at Bethnal-green, by shooting her with a pistol, expired his offence by suffering on the drop in the front of Newgate, in the presence of a concourse of some five or six thousand persons. During some of his conversations with the Rev. Mr. Davis, the Ordinary, he expressed his deep regret at having frequented the beer and singing houses, in the neighbourhood of Bethnal-green, and said he was convinced that to them were to be attributed the misfortune and ruin of both himself and the unhappy girl. The present destitute state of the culprit's family has excited a feeling of much commiseration, and a subscription has been set on foot amongst the tradesmen in Bethnal-green to in some way alleviate their sufferings.

The Rev. R. Toxley, a native of Lancaster, and who was ordained a minister of the Church of England about four or five years ago by the Bishop of Chester, has lately left the Church, and, it is said, taken nearly the whole of his congregation with him. The sect to which he has joined himself are called Salomonites.—Liverpool Chron.

A society is about to be established for the purpose of raising the condition of governesses, and of improving the means of preparatory education, which is to enable them to undertake the instruction of others. Among the ladies of rank at the head of this society are the Countesses of Mount Edgumbe and Rosebery, Dowager Lady Lyndalton, Lady Noel Byron, and the Hon. Miss Murray.

At the Middlesex sessions, on Wednesday last, an indictment was preferred by Mr. Wakeling, on behalf of the parochial authorities of Clerkenwell, against the persons engaged in the perpetration of the outrages on public decency at the Spafelds burial-ground, which are at present exciting so much attention. The grand jury returned a true bill against Robert Vinnal, William Lang-Green, Francis Green, William Charles Bird, William Green, Tom Smith and Stephen Bishop, labourers, for opening the graves, removing the dead bodies, destroying the coffins, and interring in the burial-ground a greater number of deceased persons than the place could decently contain, in violation of public decency, and against the public health. The trial, it is understood, will not take place this session.

The Dublin Evening Post says:—"Our London correspondent informs us in a letter dated Saturday, that Sir Robert Peel does not at present contemplate the abolition of bank notes under £5 in Scotland or Ireland, but that the banks in those countries are to be strictly limited in their issues of small notes to an average of three or five years up to the end of 1844."

A memorial has been received by the Lord Lieutenant from the grand jury and magistracy of the county of Tipperary, praying that some effective measures may be taken to check the outrages at present prevailing to such an alarming extent.

A Repeal banquet was held at Kilkenny on Tuesday, which was attended by Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Smith O'Brien, and other leading Repealers, who all appeared in the new costume of the '82 Club.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE CORN LAWS.—An important and interesting return, as regards its bearing upon the operation of the laws affecting the importation and consumption of corn, grain, meal, and flour, has been printed by order of the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. W. Miles, M.P. It appears from this paper that during the year 1844, ending the 5th of January, 1845, the gross total quantity of wheat and wheat flour imported into this country amounted to 1,381,875 quarters; viz., 1,145,883 quarters of foreign, and 235,992 quarters of colonial, produce and growth. The quantity entered for home consumption during the same period amounted to 1,026,976 quarters, of which 791,385 quarters were of foreign, and 235,591 quarters of colonial, growth and produce. The quantities remaining in the warehouse at the close of the year 1844 amounted altogether to 439,823 quarters. The largest importations of wheat and wheat flour appear to have taken place in the months of May, June, July, August, and September, and the smallest in the months of February and December. The quantities thrown upon the market, or, in other words, entered for home consumption, amounted in the month of July to 427,623 quarters, and in that of August to 187,504 quarters, or about two-thirds of the whole quantity entered for home consumption in 1844. The monthly average price of wheat in England and Wales was, in January, 1844, 51s. 1d.; in February, 53s. 5d.; in March, 56s. 3d.; in April, 55s. 4d.; in May, 55s. 6d.; in June, 55s. 8d.; in July, 54s. 4d.; in August, 50s.; in September, 46s. 4d.; in October, 46s. 2d.; in November, 45s. 11d.; and in December 45s. 3d. per quarter: thus showing that the price of wheat was never higher than 42s. 16s. 3d., nor lower than 42s. 5s. 3d. per quarter, giving opportunity for a difference between the two extreme prices of only 11s. a quarter. The total quantities of barley imported in 1844 amounted to 1,022,076 quarters, of which 1,029,021 quarters were entered for home consumption; the total quantity of oats and oatmeal imported to 301,757 quarters, of which 264,854 were entered for home consumption; the total quantities of rye and rye-meal imported to 26,591 quarters, and the total quantities entered for domestic consumption to 28,777; the total importation of peas to 109,176 quarters, and the quantities entered for home consumption to 122,984 quarters; and the total importation of beans to 154,552 quarters, and the total quantities entered for domestic consumption to 225,680 quarters. It further appears, according to this return, that the total quantity of corn, meal, and flour, the growth of Ireland, imported into Great Britain from the former country, amounted to 2,801,206 quarters, of which 410,153 quarters consisted of wheat and wheat flour, and 2,424,310 quarters of oats and oatmeal alone.—Times.

IRISH WHEAT.—We have been informed of a new branch of trade, which has of late sprung up in this country, and one which threatens to be of vast injury to the country at large. We are told that it is carried on to a great extent throughout all Ireland; and if it be true, of which we have no doubt, having means of proving the fact, it demands the most serious attention of the Government and all agriculturists. It is said that there are certain parties who make a trade of buying up wheat in its pure and unadulterated state in the markets. They at the same time purchase from the great mill-owners, who deal so extensively in flour for exportation, all their mill screenings, which is the small wheat, and dirt and offal of the wheat, for the purpose of mixing it up with the pure wheat, and sending it over to England. There can be no doubt that this is a downright swindle, and that they who practise it ought to be made, if they are not, amenable to the laws.—Dublin Evening Mail.

THE PAST AND THE FUTURE.—The times behind us are junior: the times before us, senior. The seniority of the world is to come; the juniority of the world is passed. Why do we attribute perfection to the world backward, and to a man, forward?—Witcher's Aphorisms.

LORD HOWICK.—As a further proof of Lord Howick's attachment to sound commercial principles, we may mention that, in a letter on another subject addressed to a gentleman of this town, his lordship thus writes:—"I am happy to hear that my constituents approve of the part I have taken in the debates on the sugar question, and upon Free Trade generally; and I trust the time is approaching when public opinion will be strong enough to get rid of all those mischievous restrictions upon the freedom of industry which are misnamed protecting duties."—Sund. Herald.

THE FALLOW MINN.—The mind that lies fallow but a single day, sprouts up in follies that are only to be killed by a constant and assiduous culture.—Addison.

REDUCTION OF THE HOURS OF FACTORY LABOUR.—The proceedings at the meeting of Mr. Gardner's factory hands have created, as we expected, a lively interest not only throughout the whole of the manufacturing community, but among members of the Legislature. We also hear that Mr. Horner, the inspector of factories for this district, is about to visit Preston, to inquire into the circumstances, so that it is probable an official statement of the results of this important experiment will be laid before Government. We understand that Messrs. Horrocks, Jackson, and Co., of this town, are about to reduce the hours of labour in their mill to eleven daily, as Mr. Gardner has done; and we believe some others of our influential manufacturers will speedily follow in this march of improvement.—Preston Chronicle.

BEETROOT SUGAR.—Beetroot sugar is now manufactured at Portaferry, and the produce last year (its first attempt) was 115 cwt., subject to 25s. per cwt. duty, same as colonial sugar.

REVOLUTIONS.—The most disastrous revolutions are produced by the extreme of physical want; the most happy by wants of a moral kind, physical want being absent. There are many reasons why this should be so, and this amongst others: that extreme physical want is unnatural; it is a disease which cannot be shaken off without a violent and convulsive struggle. But moral and intellectual cravings are but a healthful symptom of vigorous life: before they were felt no wrong was done in withholding their appointed food, and if it be given them when they demand it, all goes on naturally and happily.—Dr. Arnold.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—The influx of company at this place shows that the public are not unacquainted with the merits of the exhibition provided by the proprietors, or with the intelligence which is to be gained by the attendance at the lectures of Dr. Ryan and Professor Bachhoffner. The galleries were crowded during the week by an assemblage not only of the common holiday makers, but by that class of persons who, having but a few hours to spare, take the proper advantage afforded them of visiting places in which the useful and the agreeable are united. There was the exhibition of innumerable specimens of scientific and artistic skill; machinery and models almost without number, and lectures on subjects intelligible to all. For those who went there for mere amusement there were the diving-bell and the experiments connected with it, which, leaving science out of the question, were sufficiently odd to astonish and delight; there was the physico-mathematical, the chromatope, and the dissolving views, all good in their kind; the electrical machine, and so many novelties of a smaller scale that it would be tedious to enumerate, and bad taste to dismiss with a hackneyed quotation. This institution has been gradually rising in reputation; it has deserved its success; and the more it is visited by the inquirers after science, the more extended will be the benefits derived from it by the general community.

THE PREMIER AND THE FARMERS.—At a late market dinner at Wickham, Mr. Godrich, of Wickham-mill (in the chair), and 42 farmers and others interested in the land being present, after the usual loyal toasts, one of the party proposed the health of Sir Robert Peel, when all the company, excepting the chairman and the proposer, turned down their glasses and refused to drink it! The chairman remonstrated in vain; he said he himself had intended to give the toast, knowing that four-fifths of the company voted to place Sir Robert Peel where he was; still, however, the agriculturists were inexorable; they would recognise their idol no longer.—Times Telegraph.

CENSURE.—Censure is the tax a man payeth to the public for being eminent.—Swift.

NORWICH WEAVERS.—On Saturday evening, the handloom weavers of Norwich met at the Bath-house, St. Martin's-at-Oak, to hear a further report of the deputation appointed to wait upon the manufacturers relative to an advance on the present rate of wages. The report set forth that the deputation had waited upon Mr. Willett, who declined to give the advance of 2d. per dozen, but expressed his willingness to give a penny. It was unanimously resolved to accept Mr. Willett's offer, not only as respected him, but the other manufacturers.—Norwich Mercury.

REDUCTION OF THE GLASS DUTY.—A proposal has been made in Manchester to roof with glass two streets, in the neighbourhood of the Exchange, for the convenience of the congregated merchants.—Newcastle Journal.

QUEBEC.—SHIP-BUILDING.—Great efforts are making to keep up the mercantile interest of Quebec, particularly in ship-building. In consequence of the cheapness of the quality of timber, as well as of labour, vessels are now building at that port by orders from England. There are now 27 vessels on the stocks, estimated at 1,250 tons, and 2300 men employed. It is supposed that ships are built in Canada at a third less than they are in England.—New York Sun.

CORN MARKET.—We regret to learn that a large failure has occurred in the Corn-market, the liabilities being estimated at £30,000 in Mark-lane, and £20,000 elsewhere. The firm was very extensively engaged in the flour trade, and is said to have suffered considerably by the speculation of 1841. Some parties think that the amount of the liabilities, from the known magnitude of the business done, must be higher than above stated.—Globe.

THE INCOME-TAX.—In spite of a score or two of well-founded remonstrances, the income-tax is thrust down the throat of the nation in one hard, unbroken, globular mass, with as little delicacy as a bolus is driven down the gullet of a sick horse.—Times.

FACTION.—A great faction is many persons, yet but one party, and that is but one opinion. Such a faction is but one man in point of judgment. One free-spirited man is, in this particular, equal to a whole faction.—Wicksford.

INCENDIARISM.—A fire, supposed to be the work of an incendiary, was discovered in a barn belonging to Mr. Harris, of Bletchley, four miles from Drayton and Hodnet, Shropshire, about eight o'clock on the night of Wednesday, the 12th inst., which in a very short time destroyed the barn and some cow-houses attached. Fortunately, there being but little wind, the cattle were all saved. A man in custody, supposed to be the person who set fire to the premises.—Shropshire Conservative.

—(4) Thursday the 6th inst., a thatched outhouse in the occupation of Mr. I. Baker, Bovey Tracey, was maliciously set fire to, and but for prompt discovery the consequences would have been most disastrous.—On Thursday last, a shed near the wayside at Huxham, near Mr. J. Heyward's, was set on fire, but fortunately soon extinguished.

LARGE BREAD.—We observe by our market note, that Mr. Hughes, Donegall-street bakery, has added 8oz. to his shilling loaf, and has reduced the price of his second quality 4lb. loaf to 5d., thus giving the public the advantage of the recent reduction in the price of flour.—Belfast Commercial Chronicle.

IMPORTATION OF CATTLE UNDER THE TARIFF ACT.—From the operation of the Tariff Act, from the 19th of July, 1842, to the 5th of January last, there were imported into the United Kingdom 7980 oxen and bulls, 2561 cows, 164 calves, 3645 sheep, 33 lambs, and 1042 swine and hogs.

PRE-REQUISITES AND CAUSES OF SOCIAL AMELIORATION.—Private "repentance," individual moral energy, deep personal faith in some great conception of duty or religion, are the pre-requisites and causes of all social amelioration.—J. Martineau.

A FAIR OFFER.—Sir Robert, we will change with you, if you please. Instead of Free Trade in 430 articles, let us have Free Trade in four only, and we will not bother you any more for a long time to come. These are corn, animal food, butter, and cheese. We ask no more, and we beg to say, we will take no less.—Yours truly, —TWENTY-SEVEN MILLIONS OF PEOPLE.—The Struggle.

MACHINERY.—The importation of machinery into Russia has augmented, in the last three years, from the value of half a million to one million of roubles, which serves to show that the industrial activity of Russia is greatly advancing.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK LANE, Monday, March 24.—A moderate quantity of Wheat, Barley, and English Oats, and a good supply of Irish Oats, have arrived since this day week. There is not much activity in the Wheat trade, and the advance noted last Monday is barely supported, except on the best qualities. Barley supports the prices of last week. There is no alteration to notice in the price of Oats; to effect extensive sales rather lower rates must be accepted, but holders are not generally willing to submit to a reduction. The arrivals of Beans and Peas are short, but higher rates are not obtained. The frost has broken up, and a good deal of rain fell yesterday, but to-day the weather is fine.

FRIDAY, March 28.—The supplies of English Wheat and of Irish Oats since Monday are considerable. Of the former 11,000 quarters have arrived, most of which having gone direct to the millers, the show here is not great. The business doing is quite on a limited scale. Prices remain the same as on Monday. There is still a good deal of English Barley left over from the beginning of the week, and the value is nominally unaltered. 65,000 quarters of Irish Oats, more than appeared in Monday's return, have come up to this day's market. To effect sales a reduction of 6d. to 1s. must be taken. In Beans nothing doing. No alteration in the duty on any article.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 82.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1845.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quinlan Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Birmingham and the neighbourhood are respectfully informed, that Subscriptions may be paid by Free-Traders to Mr. Charles Gough, Midland Bank, Union-street, Birmingham, the local Treasurer.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRATION.

The Council of the League finding that more than half of the persons whose names are on the Middlesex Register have claimed since the last contested election in 1837, they have directed circulars to be sent to them requesting an answer as to whether they will support Free-Trade candidates in the event of an election. As it is not considered that those who return answers pledge themselves to support ANY PARTICULAR MAN, but only that they are willing to support the principle of Free Trade, it is hoped that ALL who have received letters, and are favourable to the principles the Anti-Corn-Law League advocate, will consider it a duty to return their letters answered, as it is important that the Council should be able to know their supporters from their opponents.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

THE BAZAAR.

Our readers will have observed, from time to time, with much satisfaction, the signs that our columns have afforded of the heartiness and energy with which the conductors of the Free-Trade portion of the country newspaper press interest themselves in the undertaking. Particular acknowledgments of the services rendered by individual members of this most important and influential class of our contributors will be least desired by those to whom they are most due; where the obligations are so numerous and varied, selection would be embarrassing, and distinction invidious. But we must beg to assure our friends of the Free-Trade press in general, that we are deeply sensible of the worth of the aid they have rendered us by their labours as journalists, and (in places where this kind of assistance was especially requisite) by their personal services in charging themselves with the receipt and transmission of contributions. The knowledge that their co-operation is both valuable and valued will, we trust, induce them to improve to the utmost the brief period of time that remains, in stimulating the zeal and quickening the activity of their several localities. We are greatly dependent on them. They speak directly to thousands and tens of thousands, to whom we can only speak indirectly, through them. The brilliant success which will attend the great national demonstration of next month—and which it is even yet not too late to render more brilliant still—will be very largely owing to the ability and vigour with which we have been throughout supported by the directors of the local organs of Free-Trade opinion. We thank them most warmly; and earnestly invite them to crown their and our common work by an industrious use of the very few opportunities that are now left.

To our friends generally we have little to say on this subject, except to renew our recent appeal for prompt and active exertion, with the increased emphasis required by the rapid contraction of the interval during which exertion will be available. There is now little more than a fortnight remaining. The evening of Wednesday, the 7th of May, will be the term of those efforts which are to render this exhibition worthy of the cause which it is designed to promote, and of the nation whose million-handed industry is about to protest, in the face of the world, against the oppression that chains and starves it. On the morning of the 8th, our Free-Trade Bazaar will open for public view, and on the Monday following the sale will commence. We trust there is not a Free-Trader in Great Britain who will consent to inflict on himself the future mortification of having neglected to aid, either by personal effort or pecuniary contribution, the grandest demonstration of the rights of our national industry, and the most effective and imposing assertion of its rights, that this country has ever witnessed.

One exceedingly desirable species of contribution we can scarcely believe it necessary to solicit very strongly. It will, we cannot doubt, wherever practicable, be rendered spontaneously. We speak of the personal attendance of our friends from the country. All contributors, whose avocations allow of their visiting London next month, will, we hope, complete their services to the good cause by contributing themselves. Let them come and see that magnificent success for which they have laboured with us, and which they have a right to enjoy with us. We assure them it will be worth their coming to see. That "British Museum" of the products of the industrial genius of this island, which has been accumulating these many months past, and will in a few weeks be dispersed for ever to the four corners of the empire, will, during the brief period of its entireness, afford an exhibition worthier of intelligent curiosity, tasteful admiration, and delighted national pride, than any other that this metropolis offers to the gazing and wondering stranger. A collection of specimens of the very best of everything: that the looms, forges, farms, mines, and drawing-rooms of Great Britain have to show—exhibited to view in that temporary Aladdin's Palace into which artistic taste and talent will convert one of our noblest metropolitan edifices—will be a spectacle worth coming to behold from the farthest west and the remotest north. It is without parallel or precedent in the history of public spectacles, and may be long without a successor. That, in several of the large towns which have contributed to our Bazaar, local exhibitions of the articles about to be sent have been found highly attractive to the public, may be taken as some presage of the splendour of that aggregate collection which will next month be displayed to the world in Covent-garden Theatre. We trust that the facilities to be afforded to visitors, by the arrangements which will be made with the different railway companies, will be very largely improved by the Free-Traders of all parts of the country. We have never looked on the Bazaar only, or even chiefly, as a pecuniary resource. We would make it the occasion of a national Free-Trade jubilee. We would have a grand congress of Free-Traders from north, south, east, and west; that those who are labouring together in one common cause may see and know each other, may rejoice in witnessing the victorious strength of a principle which has all the best heads and hearts of the country on its side, and may mutually give and receive stimulus to redoubled exertions in the great work of industrial emancipation. Nor can there be a fitter occasion for family gatherings, and meetings of old friends under hospitable roofs, than that which will be afforded by the opening of the Free-Trade Bazaar. With peculiar appropriateness may domestic reunions and rejoicings celebrate the triumphant success of an effort consecrated to the aim, not only of making life in England easy, but of uniting closer the bands of universal human brotherhood, widening and deepening the foundations, and strengthening the securities, of peace on earth and good will among men.

For such is the great and sacred object for which we are working—which, by franchise and registration machinery, aggregate meetings, bazaars, and other modes of action, the Free-Traders of Great Britain are aiming to realize. It is no narrow sectional and class interest—no merely national interest even—that we are labouring for. Our cause is that of humanity and civilization. Monopoly and Free Trade may be respectively characterized in the words with which Miss Martineau has entitled the initial and closing chapters of that volume, the manuscript of which she has munificently contributed in aid of the cause already so deeply indebted to her pen—"NATURE AND MAN AT WAR"—"NATURE AND MAN AT PEACE." The words are there used with reference to another class of topics than those with which we have to do in these columns: but they are most aptly suggestive of the opposite characters and tendencies of the wrong against which we are struggling, and the right for whose assertion and realization we are leagued. Monopoly is "nature and man at war;" human ignorance and selfishness intercepting Divine bounty, obstructing the flow of nature's benefactions to humanity, dooming half the earth to artificial barrenness, smiting fruitful fields as with a curse of perpetual desolation—ready and willing, had they the power, to prohibit fertilizing April showers, and put out bright August sunshine, as authors of "depression" and "distress." Free Trade will be "nature and man at peace;" nature's resources developed to the uttermost by man's industry, her best gifts thankfully accepted, skilfully improved, freely and widely diffused—the earth replenished with the works of man's hand, and subdued into peaceful obedience to man's will.

MR. MACGREGOR'S SCHEME OF COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

It is not in the nature of governments to increase the production of wealth, except so far as they may protect others whilst producing it, and thus, by securing every man in the enjoyment of his property, give a stimulus to its acquisition and accumulation. It is the legitimate province of governments to afford this kind of protection to the pursuits of industry, and it is the interest of the people to pay for it, taking care that the expenditure of the government is not larger than it need be; but, unfortunately, governments are not satisfied with the only protection which it is their proper province to afford: they impose restrictions in the shape of protective duties upon some trades, and they give bounties for the encouragement of others, and by thus taking from one to give to another they irrationally suppose the national welfare is promoted.

It is incalculable the enormous sacrifices which the people of this country (especially the working classes) have been called upon to make to the ignorance and folly of our rulers. Here is a country such as the world never saw, producing every year an amount of wealth of which history affords no parallel, but owing to its unequal distribution, the consequence of unjust and selfish laws, the great mass of the people are pining in ignorance and poverty.

The social evils resulting from our unwise commercial and financial legislation have recently presented themselves in such an alarming aspect as to excite the anxious interest and inquiry of all who love their country and value its institutions. Like causes produce like effects: a vast body of our people have long been sinking into a state of wretchedness resembling that of the people of France previous to the Revolution, and, probably, nothing but the relief to the destitute afforded by our poor laws has saved us from social convulsions. The returns of the poor-law commissioners for 1842 show that there were no less than 1,429,356 paupers in England and Wales alone (besides Scotland and Ireland), and of these 407,576 were able-bodied adults. We fearlessly assert that there exist means of employment and comfortable subsistence for every able-bodied labourer in England, provided all restrictions on the free exercise of his industry be abolished, and the burdens of taxation be equitably apportioned to every class. Mr. Pitt is the only Minister who appears to have understood and acted on the principles of Free Trade. In 1786 he negotiated with France the most liberal treaty of commerce and navigation which has ever before or since been entered into by this country with any other. The ignorance of our statesmen on this important question subsequently sufficiently accounts for the appointment of Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the Board of Trade, with one or two bright exceptions (Huskisson and Thomson), possessing no information or experience to qualify them for the posts in which they were placed by the Minister of the day for the mere purposes of political support.* The mischief arising from these appointments during the last twenty years would have been much more extensive had not the subordinate officers of the Board of Trade, the working men, fortunately been men of sound views, great intelligence, and independence of character. Their labours have probably done more to advance the principles of Free Trade than those of previous writers, because they have brought home to the apprehension of common minds such a variety of practical details, illustrative of the evils of monopoly, as to render plain a subject on which the public had previously very confused notions. The letters of H. B. T., on the Corn Laws, by the late James Deacon Hume, Secretary of the Board of Trade; "The Progress of the Nation," by G. R. Porter, of the Board of Trade; and the elaborate "Commercial Statistics of the Resources, Commercial Legislation, Tariffs, &c., of all Nations," by John Macgregor, the present Secretary of the Board of Trade, do the greatest honour to the intelligence and independence of their authors, since nothing can afford a stronger condemnation of the ignorance exhibited by their masters, in their policy and practice in matters relating to trade and finance, than the above works, together with the celebrated evidence of these gentlemen before the Committee of the House of Commons on import duties, in 1840.

Mr. Macgregor has recently published a pamphlet for private circulation, of which we have been favoured with a copy, entitled "Commercial and Financial Legislation," containing his views on a question of no small importance, viz., on the manner in which the necessary taxation of the State can be levied with least injury to the people. It may be that Sir R. Peel has taken some hints from Mr. Macgregor, for we observe that every duty which he proposes to repeal in his budget is suggested in the pamphlet; but, as will be seen hereafter, Mr. Macgregor does not confine his repeal of duties to hides, hocks, beefwood, divi-divi, and a host of other articles which the people cannot eat, and of which they never before heard the names: he proposes the total repeal of the duties on corn, butter, cheese, and meat of all kinds. The following observations are very apposite to our present relations with the United States. The repeal of our Corn Laws will be the best security for peace with America.

"A great nation is a great community, and all the nations of the earth, if the intercourse and trade between them were as free as between the individuals of a municipality, would then actually enjoy a peaceful and profitable system of common intercourse, based upon common interests, which it would be ruinous to any one of the nations concerned to disturb. The greater the commercial relations between the nations, the more disastrous would be the consequences of a war which would interrupt their reciprocity of interests. In proportion as this commercial and reciprocal interest has been of long standing and of great extent, the greater would be the securities for the maintenance of peace, and the more disastrous would be the calamity of continuing a war between two or more countries so circumstanced.

"A WAR OF MATERIAL INTERESTS, or, more properly speaking, of MATERIAL INJURIES—that is, a war of custom-houses or fiscal forts, with their garrisons of revenue officers and servants, has long been declared and carried on between most European nations. This warfare of interests or injuries has not ceased with the wars of bloodshed, and, if we may ever expect security against a recurrence of the calamities attendant on and consequent to the latter, it will be in destroying the elements of the former,—in short, by the extension of Free Trade between all nations."

This war of material interests has unhappily been kept up not only by every state in Europe, but even by the United States; the policy of each country appearing to be founded on the selfish and mistaken idea that they could best benefit themselves by injuring their neighbour. There can be little doubt that the course pursued by the greatest commercial nation in the world has led other countries to suppose that our wealth was the result of the restrictions we placed upon our intercourse with them, rather than of the peculiar advantages we enjoy.

"Other countries (says Mr. Macgregor) either did not understand, or would not admit, that England attained her prosperity, not by the aid, but in defiance, of her illiberal commercial system; that England owed her wealth and power, and even her liberty, to her geographical position—to her many commanding harbours—to the vast power of production yielded by her mines of coal and iron interstratified, and conveniently disposed for cheap use and transport,—and to the enterprising and industrious character of her people. England also escaped, on her own soil, the perpetual wars which devastated, and prevented the manufacturing industry of, the continental states of Europe; and although her taxation and her public debt have been carried to an incredible height, and her people compelled to pay far higher for maintaining existence than those of any other country, yet her earlier invention of more perfect machinery, especially of the steam-engine and spinning-jenny, and other circumstances which existed during war, enabled her, in defiance of Napoleon's wars and decrees—in spite of high taxation and dear food—to enrich herself so far as to bear all her war burdness. Her people were enabled to do all this, and to pay those high prices for bread and butchers' meat, which served to yield high rents to the landlords of the United Kingdom; not by restrictive legislation, but by a most profitable carrying trade, and by throwing her manufactures with great gain into all the markets of the world, while the industry of other countries was paralyzed by the insecurity occasioned by desolating invasions."

* It is not long since a merchant waited upon a Vice-President of the Board of Trade, then recently appointed, to consult with him upon an important question; he found an utter ignorance of the commonest commercial principles on the part of the official, and to his surprise the candid acknowledgment that his mind on the question under discussion was like a blank sheet of paper, and that he would be glad of any information that could be furnished to him.

Mr. Macgregor lays down the following as the just principle of imposing taxes on articles of consumption:—

"If commodities which enter into home consumption are to be taxed, the equitable scale of levying this tax would be, to levy exactly the same duty upon an article produced at home as upon a similar article imported from abroad.

"There can be no other equitable scale of taxing commodities, whether produced at home or imported from abroad, for domestic consumption.

"The difference between the natural price of an article imported from abroad, and the higher price of a similar article produced at home, is a tax imposed upon the whole community in order to put the amount of that difference into the pocket of the producer of the home-made article; it is also a far greater burden upon the nation, which is further taxed to the value of so much of the labour production, trade, and navigation, which the protective tax restricts."

Mr. Macgregor proposes to abolish all the assessed taxes and the income-tax, and assigns, we think, very satisfactory reasons for substituting in their stead a direct tax on all realized property, which he thinks in equity should be extended to Ireland. The stamp duties he proposes to retain, except those on fire and marine insurances, but acknowledges that they require an equitable adjustment. The Post-office, he thinks, "should be regulated not with a view to revenue, but to the purposes of covering all the expenses required to convey letters and intelligence with security and with rapidity." The present rates of postage to be continued, but any surplus revenue to be applied to increasing the number of mail steam-ships.

The whole of the Excise duties he proposes to abolish, except those on malt and spirits. The whole of the Custom duties, including the abolition of the corn and provision laws, are also proposed to be abolished, except those on eight articles.

The following is Mr. Macgregor's

"PRO FORMA FINANCIAL SCHEME:—

"Pro forma view of equalizing the annual Revenue and Expenditure, presuming that the Excise and Assessed Taxes, and the Stamps on Marine and Fire Assurances, and also the Duties of Customs (except on eight articles) should be abolished, and adding Distilled Spirits and Malt, now under the Excise, to the Customs, and Excise, Licenses to the Stamps: abolishing all other of the Assessed Taxes, and the whole Excise establishment.

First. Assuming the total annual expenditure, not to exceed .. .. .	£50,000,000
Revenue necessary to meet this expenditure, to be raised as follows:—
I. From uniform duties on (1) Tea; (2) Sugar and Molasses; (3) Coffee and Cocoa; (4) Tobacco; (5) Distilled Spirits; (6) Wines; (7) Dried Fruits; (8) Spices .. .. .	£21,500,000
II. Home-distilled Spirits .. .. .	25,000,000
Malt, whether made at home, or imported from abroad (5,000,000) .. .. .	10,000,000
III. Stamps, leaving out Marine and Fire Assurances, and including Licenses now under the Excise .. .. .	7,500,000
IV. Unredeemed Land Tax .. .. .	1,200,000
Deficit to be provided for during the first year .. .. .	9,800,000
	£50,000,000

"This deficit to be levied, not by doubling, or rather more than doubling, the present income-tax, but by the less inquisitorial and more direct and equitable plan of an annual assessment, in the pound, upon the annual value of all realized property. And surely £11,000,000, including the unredeemed land-tax, out of £50,000,000 of total taxation, forms but a small proportion of the total sum to be levied directly. But if we may form an estimate, founded on the experience of the past, the ordinary sources of revenue would annually increase; and the amount of direct taxation would be proportionally diminished, at least so long as peace shall continue.

"The reason that we include only eight articles, in the Customs Duties, is on the sound principle, that, if an article is to be taxed when consumed, it should be so taxed without any difference being made as to the place where produced: the consumer always paying the full market price of the article he consumes, including every tax upon it."

Several other modified schemes are given in addition to the above, but none present the like simplicity, which we think its great recommendation: it reminds us of the penny-postage scheme. The proposed abolition of duties on the multitudes of articles of all kinds which encumber our tariff, and which impede industry in every shape, would doubtless be a great benefit; and that this scheme is practicable is sufficiently apparent if it be once decided to levy a tax on realized property of about five per cent., instead of the existing mode of taxation.

Another advantage attending this scheme would be the great saving in the cost of collecting the revenue, which in 1844 amounted to no less than £4,362,225, besides the expenses attending the national debt.

Mr. Macgregor's scheme is founded on an expenditure of £50,000,000 per annum. Now, we are of opinion that this expenditure might be very considerably reduced without at all impairing the real efficiency of our national establishments. When the question of Free Trade is disposed of, those will render an essential service to the country who will undertake a searching investigation into the enormous expenditure of the Government. How is it that in 1832 the expenditure only amounted to £46,300,000, and in 1844 to £55,704,709? Our limits prevent us from entering into the consideration of the important question of adopting direct in preference to indirect taxation. Mr. Macgregor appears in favour of the former, and we think would be inclined to extend it if the public were prepared to sanction the principle. This is a question that needs discussion. The equitable principle of taxation is that every man should pay to the State for the security of his property, in the same way that he pays for its insurance from fire, in proportion to its amount.

Mr. Macgregor has earned additional claims to the thanks of Free-Traders for his important and excellent pamphlet, especially for the sound principles which pervade every page; and we hope he will be induced to make it public.

RELIGIOUS ASPECT OF FREE TRADE.

While every political party in the State manifests signs of disruption and disunion, it is gratifying to find that the Free-Traders, who belong not to party but to principle, are at once increasing rapidly in numbers, and becoming more perfect in unity. Free Trade is not a question between one set of men and another; it is not even a question of one community, one nation, or one age: it belongs to all time and to all mankind. It was admirably said by Mr. Fox, in his most eloquent address at the late Covent-garden meeting:—

"Our principles are not merely as old as political economy, they are, in truth, as old as the history of mankind, the facts of which are the materials of political economy. They are intertwined with the records of the prosperity and the calamity of nations. We can trace them through the long annals of ancient and modern times. We trace them back beyond this even to the very constitution of nature and the globe itself. They are the dictates of philosophy, interpreted by the system of things in which we live, and of which we form a portion; for when that mighty Power who spread abroad the heavens fixed suns in their central position, and rolled the planets in their orbits, surrounded them with belts and satellites, measuring the course, limitless as it seems, of the wandering comet, which, in its wild career, moves from the intensity of light to the deepest darkness; binding all together by the principle of gravitation, and thus united it to other systems through all the infinity of being,—when that Power fashioned this earth of ours, it made a reflex of the combined, harmonized, and mutually dependent system which is exhibited to the astronomer when he gazes on the heavens,—it endowed one climate with one species of fertility and another with another, and surrounded the earth with those zones—temperate, torrid, and frigid—constituting climates, sunny or moist, in all their diversities, and gave the luscious vine to grow upon the banks of the Rhine and the Rhone, and enriched the spice islands with their fragrant products,—it spread the broad and vast prairies of America, sufficient to grow corn for the whole world's consumption; planted the tea groves of China; endowed the sugar-cane with its sweetness; and gave to Britain its coast, minerals, and industry: and by these, as by the mutual dependence of the heavenly bodies, it said, 'All these belong to each other! Let their influence be reciprocal: let one minister to another: be the interest of each the interest of all, and let all minister to each: they are one in wisdom and beneficence, and show forth as resplendently as the starry heavens the glory of a benevolent Providence.'"

To the great truths developed in this magnificent passage, sufficient attention has not been paid. A monopoly in food is an audacious interference with the Divine government of Providence; it is an open revolt against the ordinances which the wisdom of the Creator has affixed to the rule and constitution of that nature which He called into being; it is a setting up of the stunted intellect of selfishness as a rival to Omnipotence. There is a feeling of horror which creeps over the mind instinctively when we look upon the ranks of the monopolists, and see how are the creatures that proffer us a better system than that which was devised by "the Father of lights, in whom there is no variableness nor shadow of turning;" in them there is indeed enough of "variableness;" for they have shifted their Corn Law from one form to another as miserable interests seemed to dictate; and their sliding scale is one vast "shadow of turning," presenting to us all the vicissitudes of of turning," from the faint twilight of partial prosperity gloom, from the faint twilight of partial prosperity gloom, to the dark midnight of absolute despair. The legislation of the monopolists is virtually an effort to take the moral government of mankind from the hands of Providence, and transfer it to the traders in famine and the traffickers in starvation. The Christian refutes the atheist by pointing out the evidences of benevolent design in the physical and moral universe; the monopolist arms the atheist with fresh weapons of scepticism when he declares that the Divine arrangements for the mutual dependence of the saved masses of mankind require to be amended by protections and restrictions. "If God bless us, the earth shall yield her increase."—"No," exclaims Lord Beaumont, "the earth shall not freely yield her increase to Englishmen, or where is my promised 56s. per quarter?" If the nurturing soil, the invigorating rain, and the ripening sun confined their genial influences to one land, Nature might then be said to have furnished a precedent for protection and restriction; but Providence has diffused the vegetative principle over all the countries of the earth, and appointed ocean to be the highway of nations that they might interchange their mutual products. Those who stop the interchange of merchandise on the Queen's highway are punishable as criminals; but it is a far greater evil to interrupt the interchange on God's highway, and to place barriers of protective duties to close the roads over the waters as effectually as the feudal castles of titled banditti closed the commercial highways in the middle ages. Monopoly is unnatural; it stands in broad and open contradiction to the whole order and course of nature; and he who supports it adopts the blasphemy of the Portuguese monarch, who said, in reference to the Ptolemaic system, "I could have constructed a better world than the Almighty Creator." Well might we exclaim with the Psalmist, "O God, how long shall the adversary do this dishonour; how long shall the enemy blaspheme Thy name for ever?"

But, "verily there is a God that judgeth the earth;" this rivalry of legislation to Providence has brought its own punishment by exposing us to wars and rumours of war, for monopoly is itself a declaration of hostility. We cannot refuse to ourselves and our readers the pleasure of reperusing the eloquent and convincing proof of the peaceful tendencies of Free Trade given by Mr. Fox in reference to a question which now occupies a large share of public attention: it forms a part of the memorable address from which we have already quoted. After referring to the brutal complacency with which some pious scribe in the Morning Herald described the probable massacre of our brethren in America, "bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh," if any dispute should arise about the Oregon territory, Mr. Fox continued:—

"Why, what is this territory they are disputing about? There are some 350,000 square miles of it, of which it seems we are claiming a barren 100,000 or thereabouts. What are they worth? What is the value of all the land that exists without man upon it, with his industry and products? Much of this Oregon territory is a desert; the great Sahara of America; the Botany Bay of the red man's banishment. There are now upon it some few hundreds of Indians and half castes connected with the Hudson's Bay Company; there are certain trappers, hunters, and squatters from the United States. Then there are some Indian tribes there who rejoice in such names as 'Flat-head,' 'Siltnose,' 'Pointed-heart.' The buffaloes are the lords of the soil, unless when the game laws of these Indians interfere. A great portion of it is mere lava, the overflowing of volcanoes; a 'city' is talked of; but scarcely any settlement makes it, as territory, of any value. Quarrel about this! Why, we might just as well be invited by Peel and Polk to fight about mountains in the moon. But let men have something to do with it; let those who have found no preferable home go there, and see what effect they can produce upon the best portions of the soil; as their numbers increase, and their exertions tell, it will soon become more valuable. And when man has occupied it, when industry has driven its car, of peaceful conquest around the borders of that vast land; when towns have arisen and cities appeared with their thronging numbers; when the rocky mountains are tunnelled, and rail and canal have united the Atlantic and Pacific; when the waters of the Columbia swarm with steamboats;—why, then will be the time to talk of the Oregon territory. Then, without a regiment or line-of-battle ship, without bombarding any town whatever, Free Trade will conquer the Oregon territory for us, and will conquer the United States for us also,—as far as it is desirable either for us or them that there should be any conquest whatever in the case,—Free Trade will establish there all the insignia of conquest. When their products come here, and those of our industry return, there will be scarcely a labourer upon the pine forest that he is clearing but will wear upon his back, to his very shirt, the livery of Manchester. The knife with which he carves his game will have the mark of Sheffield upon its blade, as a testimony of our supremacy. Every handkerchief waved upon the banks of the Missouri, will be the waving of an English banner from Spitalfields. Throughout the country there will be marks of our skill and greatness, and tribute paid for us, received not by warriors or governors, not coming directly into the national treasury, but flowing into the pockets of the industrious poor and toiling, refreshing trade, and enriching those who pursue it, giving them an imperial heritage beyond the wide Atlantic. Why, they will be conquered, for they will work for us; and what can the conquered do more for their masters? They will grow corn for us, they will grind it, and send us the flour; they will fatten pigs for us upon the peaches of their large wooded grounds; they will send us whatever they can produce that we want, and without asking us to put our hand in our pocket in order, by taxation, to pay a governor there for quarrelling with their representatives, or soldiery to bayonet their multitudes. There is nothing upon earth worthier the name of empire than this; it is a nobler kind of dominion, less degrading both for the one party and for the other, less debasing, than any sovereignty that was ever won by armies; and, being so won, reluctantly awayed by sceptres."

We make no apology for reprinting this long extract from our last week's report: its eloquence, its truth, and its everlasting importance more than justify the repetition. Would that all those who profess themselves the friends of peace were influenced by its sentiments! The peace of nations cannot be secured by parchment treaties; the bonds of union between separate countries are not formed of red tape. Mutual harmony is the result of mutual interest; universal peace can come only from universal freedom of intercourse. Every restraint on commerce is a provocative to war, every relaxation of restriction is an invitation to unity. To obtain this brotherhood of nations is the great object for which the League was formed: Nature invites to it, God has ordained it; when the Saviour was born into the world it was proclaimed, when he was taken away it was bequeathed. "Tell it out among the heathen that the Lord is King," and that His royalty must not be contravened by an aristocracy either of acres or sugar-hogsheads; "He bringeth forth grass for the cattle, and green herb for the service of men, that he may bring food out of the earth, and wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make him a cheerful countenance, and bread to strengthen man's heart." The object of the League is to restore the administration of Providence, with which the selfishness of man has interfered; and we may therefore with hopeful confidence exclaim, "Show Thy servants Thy work and their children Thy glory; and the glorious Majesty of the Lord our God be upon us; prosper Thou the work of our hands upon us, O prosper Thou our handwork!"

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Tenth Week, ending Saturday, April 19.

FREE TRADE was to have raised great and important discussions this week; but they have been postponed, as all other business has been, in order to allow the debate on the second reading of the Maynooth Bill to be carried on continuously. But though, in devotion to one paramount object, we restrict our Parliamentary survey to Free-Trade debates, it would be almost fatality not to "point the moral" of what is now transpiring in the House of Commons while we write. With the bill itself we have, as Free-Traders, no direct concern, and distinctly disclaim the expression of an opinion; it may be wrong or it may be right to endow the College of Maynooth with a permanent grant of money out of the Consolidated Fund—that is, out of the taxes; but we cannot help calling the attention of the advocates of Free Trade to the marvellous scene now passing before their eyes, and to bid them hopefully "lift up their eyes," for assuredly the end "draweth nigh."

In the House of Commons "chaos is come again." There is, as Lord John Manners termed it, a general "shipwreck of parties." No man knows his political antagonist or his political friend. Like those irruptions of land and ocean which are said to precede a new formation, the House is in a state of volcanic excitement, heaving with a strange and wild frenzy. The people out of doors have broken away from their political leaders; and in doors the cry is—not "Who shall lead us?" for in the excitement of the hour that has sunk to a very minor consideration—but "Where shall we be led, and whither are we going?" The moral which we draw is, that out of the confusion worse confounded we can discern a brighter and a better prospect for the community at large. If parties are broken up, it is to be hoped that the party pretexts and hypocrisies will perish with them; and in that case there may be nearer at hand than we imagine a "new (political) heavens and a new earth," in which sound PRINCIPLE will reign predominant over mere personal considerations, and the first thought of a legislator will not be, "How will it affect my party?" but "What real good will it do to the country?" Let the Free-Traders be prepared to take advantage of the opportunity, in order to assert the adequate importance of their views, and the necessity for their immediate and complete realization. The fitting moment is coming when it will be in their power to say to COMMENCE, "One step more and thou art free—free as the air!"

What the Maynooth Bill is our readers very well know. In substitution for the annual grant of £3000, Sir Robert Peel has proposed a permanent one of £26,000, with an addition, for the first year, of £4000 (that is, £30,000 for the first year), in order to put the buildings of the College of Maynooth into a proper state of repair, and to enlarge and improve them. The introduction of the bill was carried by a large majority. Meantime the country began to stir. And in the House of Commons there was a danger of Ministers being signally defeated, owing to a somewhat singular circumstance. Mr. WARD, who approves of the increased grant, but thinks that it should come out of the revenues of the Irish Protestant Church, gave notice of an amendment to that effect—this being in accordance with his well-known views on the subject. It would be necessary that the House should go into committee, in order to pass a resolution declaring that the increased grant should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. The question would be put by the SPEAKER, "That I do now leave the chair." To this, even while approving of the increased grant, Mr. Ward and his friends would have said "No." But then all those who disapproved of the grant, whether on high church or on voluntary principles, could have said "No," also. That this course was determined on, and would have been pursued, shows how completely the Ministerial party especially is breaking up—how thoroughly the estrangement between the men and their masters, begun by tariffs and Canada corn bills, carried on in "grease" and "lard," is consummating by such questions as this of Maynooth. Mr. Ward, who very good-humouredly avowed that, though he had been many years in the House, he was, in this particular instance, "scandalously ignorant" of its forms, was forewarned, it is said by Lord John Russell, of the way in which his amendment—or rather the technical form preliminary to his amendment—would be used. Now, Mr. Ward, whatever may be thought of his views respecting the Irish Established Church, has at least the merit of having always avowed them, and always acted on them. Rising superior to party considerations, he resolved to postpone his amendment, rather than make it a rallying point for politicians of the most opposite principles. So the "ministerial crisis" was averted for the moment; and the debate of the last six days has been on the simple question of whether the second reading of the Maynooth Bill should be affirmed or negatived.

The debate was commenced on Friday week. Nothing noticeable occurred on the first night, except the peculiar speech of Mr. Gladstone. But by Monday night the result of the excitement out of doors was manifested within the House. Members attended in crowds, loaded with piles of petitions. Thus has it been in the early part of each night's sitting during the entire week. But not alone for the presentation of petitions have members attended. Each man knows he has a constituency; and therefore almost every man has been anxious to address his particular constituency, through the medium of the House of Commons. Night after night have expectant orators sat patiently through the lvelong hours, in the anxious hope that they might be lucky enough to catch the SPEAKER'S eye. The sounds indicative of the close of one speech were eagerly waited and watched for; and the gesture which marked sitting down was the signal for twenty or thirty hats to wave in twenty or thirty hands, and twenty or thirty voices to shout out "MR. SPEAKER!" The orators lost almost all sense of that politeness which characterizes gentlemen, in their nervous anxiety to outstep one another. The dexterity, too, with which members tried to eclipse one another was most amusing—the tall men overtopping their neighbours, the shorter ones projecting forward. Men spoke, who seemed never to have spoken before, whose oratory, as yet unknown to fame, has been inspired by the Maynooth question. Not seldom, also, have speeches been rudely interrupted in the very middle by the loud calls of rival claimants for the "attention of the House." A man busily engaged in arranging his own thoughts may be excused for not paying attention to the words of another; and may therefore have no other clue to the conclusion of a speech than the cessation of voice. Yet there were many speeches of which it was difficult to say which was the middle and which was the end; when a man paused, whether to gather breath, or to recollect an argument, or to look at a note, one could not tell whether he was half done or whole done; and this inartistic treatment deceived even the wary eye of the SPEAKER himself. For once, at a pause in a member's speech, there was immediately a flock of jumpers, like leaping fish on a sunny day; and the SPEAKER, deceived into the notion that he who was addressing him was done, singled out another from the crowd, and named him. But his time was not yet come; the other had still to finish. All this, however, has been taken very good-humouredly; cheers and laughter covering over the amusing interruptions.

But where are now the Ministerial and the Opposition sides of the House? Not on the right, not on the left, of the Speaker's chair. There are individuals who have a passion for betting; and they cultivate their equivocal art with so much assiduity as to be able to decide, almost with precision, on the particular spot on which a fly in movement will alight. They would be puzzled in the House of Commons. No man but a man's own self can tell which way he is going to vote; and no man can tell with what companions he will be associated when it goes to a division. Both sides, for and against the Maynooth Bill, will be a Noah's ark. On one side are the highest churchmen with the most decided advocates of the voluntary system, the staunchest Tories and the truest Liberals. On the other side will be found Liberals as true with Tories as trimming; Whigs faithful to their old principles, and considerate Conservatives, who have come round, or have always been of the same way of thinking. How varied, too, the arguments on both sides of the question! One votes because the question involves a great principle; another, because no principle at all is involved. The bill is, indeed, a puzzler and a perplexer to the House, whether it be advocated on expediency, or necessity, or justice, or principle; whether it will destroy the Church, or save the Church; destroy Protestantism, or propagate it; confirm the Irish Roman Catholics in their faith, or allure them to the Reformed; endow Popery, or ultimately subvert it; bring the Pope into amicable relations with England, or lead him to think that by-and-by England may be made over to him in perpetual fee. All these consequences have been deduced; and on the same side and on both sides. Marvellous, too, is the scene which finds Mr. Bright in reluctant but necessary association with Sir R. Inglis; which dissociates Lord Ashley and Lord John Manners; which throws Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham on Lord John Russell and Mr. Macaulay; and separates Mr. Fox Maule and Mr. P. M. Stewart from their party. The Tories are split; the Conservatives are split; the Ministerialists are split; the Whigs are split; the Free-Traders even, on this question, are split; the House of Commons is split; and "a House divided against itself cannot stand."

The circumstances attending this remarkable debate offer the most convincing proof of the wisdom of the plan upon which the League was founded: viz.—an uncompromising adherence to the principle of Free Trade, asking no pledges on any other subject, and requiring no uniformity in any other particular. On this perplexing question of the Maynooth grant, we believe men equally intelligent and whose perfect honesty is above suspicion, will vote for and against the grant; and it is to us a matter of rejoicing that amongst so large a number of individuals so perfectly independent, while they differ widely on many important subjects, there is complete harmony and unity of action in all questions connected with Free Trade, and on every part of the policy to which the League is pledged. From the temporary excitement of such a subject as the one now under discussion, the question of Free Trade will emerge, and, as heretofore, will go on ever strengthening in its progress; and the very dislocation of parties which is now taking place will serve more and more to prostrate those who have opposed it.

We just stop the press to announce the Division on the Maynooth Bill, which took place this morning:—

BIRMINGHAM DENUNCIATION OF MONOPOLISTS.—A correspondent calls our attention to the following passage from the works of Bishop Hall:—"How few Agurs are there who pray against too much! Hence it is that ye courtiers grate upon poor trades with Aard monopolies. Hence ye great men wring the poor sponges of the commonalty into your private purses, for the maintenance of pride and excess. Hence ye cormorant cormongers hatch up a dearth in time of plenty. God sends grain, but many times the devil sends garners. The earth hath been no niggard in yielding, but ye have been lavish in transporting and close in concealing. Never talk of extreme frosts; we see God's hand, and kiss the rod. But if your hearts were not more frozen than even the earth was, mean housekeepers should not need to beg, nor the meanest to starve for want of bread. Hence, lastly, our loud oppressions of all sorts cry to Heaven, and are answered with threats, yea with variety of vengeance. Take this with thee yet, thou worldling, who hast the greedy worm under thy tongue, and never hast enough. Thou shalt meet with two things as insatiable as thyself—the grave and hell; and thou, whom all the world could not satisfy, there be two things of which thou shalt have enough—enough mould in the grave, enough fire in hell."—Hall's Works, folio, p. 381.

CORN AGAINST CATTLE; CATTLE AGAINST CORN.

Resuming the pursuit of the question, farmer against farmer; corn-grower against grazier; grazier against corn-grower; right-hand pocket against left-hand pocket; one end of the purse against the other end of the purse; or whatever the mutual impoverishment of the farmers may be called, let us take a glance at food for cattle for the graziers, and manure for the corn-growers.

Here we are in 1845, past the middle of April, in a cold backward spring. This year has not yet given a leaf nor a blade of grass. Last year produced deficient hay and turnips, which makes the denial of early vegetation this year all the worse. "There is corn in Egypt;" beans, plenty of them, which would have brought our cattle over the winter, and sent them fat to market; but no, they must not come. And the manure must not be made to produce heavier crops of corn and heavier turnips for the ensuing season.

Instead of sending for beans to Egypt and for oats to Poland, the cattle must be sent to market only half fattened; and many farmers must sell, as perhaps one-half of all the renting tenants in England have done during the last autumn and winter, a large portion of their live stock at a dead loss to save a greater loss. And while doing this they must buy guano for manure. They may buy from one part of Africa the manure ready made to fertilize the land at home; but they must not bring from another part of Africa food for cattle to manufacture manure for themselves and get the profits of it to themselves!

If they completed the fattening of their cattle on Egyptian beans, and paid thereby all expenses of purchase and labour, and had the manure for nothing, would it not, saying nothing of actual profit on the cattle and sheep and the saving of the actual losses, be a great advantage over their present condition?

In the last number of the Mark-lane Express the complaint—unfortunately too well founded—is reiterated of the heavy losses sustained from deficient winter food for cattle. And a correspondent of that paper, who joins in the cry of hard times for farmers, has the following passage:—

"Sir Robert asks the agriculturists what they want. He is a modern Isaac, who blesseth, not Jacob, but the manufacturers; and says, 'Yea, and they shall be blessed.' The agriculturists say unto him, 'Bless us also, O our father.' He answers, 'Thy brothers came with subtilty and stole away thy blessing.'"

Now, if Sir Robert Peel were to quote the words of Jacob when he himself was a patriarch and gave law unto his sons, and apply the words to the distressed farmers, viz., "Why do ye look one upon another? Behold, I have heard that there is corn in Egypt; get ye down thither, and buy for us from thence, that we may live, and not die."

That our cattle and our sheep may be fed, and that the millions of our population who do not now taste of their flesh may eat, and repay you abundantly. Such should be Sir Robert's addition to the admonition of Jacob.

What would the farmers who "stand and look one upon another," say to this? In all likelihood they would say, "It requires a large outlay of money to buy food for cattle. Though we might have more manure by so doing, we would have to be at the expense of more labour to prepare it. As it is, the money paid for guano gets it for us direct and ready for use." And they might add most consistently and truthfully, "It would do us no good to produce manures ourselves; we lose the greater part, certainly all the best, of what we now produce."

Suppose a manufacturer of cottons took the same position with regard to his business that a farmer takes, who would rather have the ammonia of the excremental offal of the birds of Africa brought to his land, than the ammonia of the excremental offal of his own bullocks fed on the beans of Africa, that manufacturer would say, "Cotton costs me money; it is bulky in ships; it takes carriage expenses from me; I must pay for coals for a steam engine; and for the engine and all that expensive machinery which is its offspring; I must pay for many people to make all these things, and for many people to work them, and to spin and weave the cotton. No; I will not send to Egypt (or America) for cotton. I will rather sell off such of my looms as are now standing, and such of my premises as are now empty."

The position of the farmer selling off his half-fattened cattle as he now does, and of this manufacturer as he would then be, is the same.

Let not the farmers deny it by putting forth the plea that manufacturers' profits from the use of an imported raw material to make cloth are larger than his would be from the use of an imported raw material to make beef. Were the question of profit or no profit on the importation of Egyptian beans and Polish oats raised, it would be easily demonstrated to be a real profit, and that too not a small one. Such food with grass cut in summer, and with turnips, and straw in winter,—for hay should then be sparingly made, the grass being more valuable as grass joined with corn-feeding than as hay,—such food, I say, would produce an undoubted profit.

But our protectionists halt at an earlier stage than the question of profit. They deny the soundness and practicability of the principle of getting food from foreign shores even for cattle. Yet strangely enough they will let all their liquid manures run to waste, let the precious gases escape into the air from their manure heaps, and yet they will buy the same substances that they have themselves wasted from a foreign shore.

For the present I leave them to turn this matter over in their own minds.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE FLOUR.

[The following letter was written soon after the Ladies' meeting in the Hanover-square Rooms, in London, to a daily paper, in which, from the pressure of Parliamentary debates and other matter, it has not found an early place. If it is of any use at all it must be of use now. I offer it to the Lancet. You have the writer's name in private. I beg to draw notice to a note which I have added to the letter. More especially I ask the attention of a certain party in Stroud, who has been sending printed circulars to some of the ladies whose names are upon the published list of the Bazaar Committee, purporting to be printed by "J. P. Britley, Stroudwater Printing-office," and bearing the Stroud post-mark of April 13.]

A LETTER ON THE DUTIES OF ENGLISH WOMEN TO ONE ANOTHER.

To Maria Frampton, of Woodvates, Dorsetshire.

Mrs. FRAMPTON,—What is your opinion of the duties of Englishwomen to one another? The people of London cannot agree upon an answer to this question. Can you afford any answer? Let us see.

You are William Frampton's wife, and his wages are 7s. per week. He is one of Mr. Goddard's men, on one of the Earl of Shaftesbury's farms. You have six children:—George, who earns 1s. 6d. per week for seven days' work, from four in the morning to eight at night each day. Maria, who goes out stone-picking with yourself, to gather and carry flints for the parish roads at 4d. per load; the two of you earning, in the winter days, in which season only this is your work, about a load and a half, or the price of one loaf of bread, or one pound of sugar. Next is Jane, next William, next Sarah, lastly James—your "little dear baby James."

These four are left at home, Jane having the charge. She puts on the kettle to have boiling water when you and Maria come home to make your tea. You have no money to buy sugar, and your tea is drunk without sugar. You have no money to spare to buy tea, save four pennorth of very doubtful leaves, called tea, once a fortnight. So your tea is in most cases made without tea. You come all home cold and wet, and want something to warm you, and in the absence of tea and sugar you make the best shift you can, pour some boiling water over some bread in a basin, with a little salt to give it a taste. Happy you when a bit of lard comes in your way; but that is seldom. Dorset is a butter county, but you do not presume to eat butter; for this reason, that you cannot get it. You therefore take bread and hot water and salt for your tea.

Maria, having no clothes but what she wears, goes to bed when she comes in, because she is tired gathering stones all day, and because you are desirous of getting her clothes dried for her in the morning.

Your own are as wet and as much daubed with mud as hers; but you have no change and cannot go to bed so soon. When I saw you the mud was above your ankles, your poor shoes turned and twisted until the soles were nearly uppermost; a piece of old sacking thrown off your shoulders pinned in front, in the same fashion as the ten-guinea shawls of London, to keep the drizzling rain from your skin; which, however, did go to your skin.

I was told that neither you nor your daughter (your Maria, aged 12) need stay out on such a day unless you chose: nobody compelled you. But you told me that, though nobody compelled you to stay out, you were compelled nevertheless. Your potatoes were all done. You had four children at home—Jane, William, Sarah, and "the dear little baby James." You had no bread at home. You had divided the only loaf you had in the morning, giving each a share, and taking with you and Maria a piece which, with a drink of water from the ditch, was to last you until evening.

So there you were compelled to stay out by "nobody," yet compelled because there was no bread in the house, because the potatoes were all done, and it was only the last day of December—the winter no farther gone—the potatoes all done so early in the winter; compelled, too, because there was no fuel at home to make a fire. I went to your house and saw your four children all huddled together among the ashes on the hearth, the redness of fire not visible, though it was dusk outside and nearly dark within; you were compelled to stay out to be wet and bedaubed with mud and chilled just because, in addition to an empty cupboard, there was no fire to warm and dry you at home.

"Nobody" compelled you to stay out; yet you stayed, and rose from the bed on the floor in the corner of the room where all the eight of you were nightly laid together under the only dry spot of the roof of your house,—every morning you rose from this and went out shivering with your breakfast of hot water and bread and salt ("thank God," said some of your neighbours to me, all of them as poor as yourself, "salt ben't dear"); you went out and stayed out day after day, "nobody" compelling you. And you said that with all that toll you would be a happy woman to get enough of bread for your dear children, but you could not. As for butcher's meat of any kind, or bacon, you never dreamed of getting such a thing. If you got a little "taste" of sugar for the dear little baby, it was all the sugar you could hope for, it is so dear and your money is so scarce. And if you could get an ounce of tea once a fortnight it was a great relief to your headache; for stooping down so much to pick up stones day after day affected your head, and you "were none of the strongest of women."

Well, there you were, "nobody" compelling you to stay out at such work in such weather, yet compelled by something—a tyrannical necessity which would take no denial. And there you were, when I saw you, carrying your basket of stones from the centre of the field to such places as the waggons or carts would get them without coming on the ground to cut it up.

Poor Maria was not able to carry the basketful, so you carried it, the heavy basket against your side, your body went to the other side to preserve the balance; your feet sinking in the mud, your ankles twisting, your shoes almost worn off your feet, the soles uppermost, your clothes wet through; your piece of sacking over your shoulders falling off in your struggles to get along: and all this from morn to night, from day to day, to get a loaf of bread by your united labour—Maria's picking and your carrying—one loaf of bread and a penn'orth of lard for two loads of stones; more by the penn'orth of lard than the day's work of you both.

But you thanked God piously that bread was so cheap as to get a loaf and a penn'orth of lard for two loads of stones. They were only paid 4d. a loaf when flour was nearly double the price of what it was last December. And when it was nearly double the price your husband, and all such as him, had only 1s. a week more wages. So you thanked God piously that there had been a good harvest and bread was cheap.

You could not get your house thatched to keep out the rain, so had to put up a bit of canvas in one corner to keep out the rain, and under that all the eight of you slept huddled together.

You could get no straw for thatch. The house was held on a life. The farmers had combined together to prevent any straw being got for thatch to such houses. No straw nor timber could be got for love or money to repair such houses. Lord Shaftesbury, to whom you paid your quit-rent, would not repair them because they were held on lives and only brought him a nominal rent. And all were resolved not to let them be repaired that they might fall to pieces and the poor inhabitants might be compelled to leave them and go out of the district, and thus reduce the population; you did not get your house repaired because you only paid a nominal rent for it. Yet, when complaint was made to the head steward that on some farms on Lord Shaftesbury's estate 8s. a week were paid as wages, and only 7s. a week in this parish, which entirely belonged to his lordship, the reply was that you had no house rent to pay in this parish; therefore, 7s. was as good to you as 8s. elsewhere.

Your stone-picking in the field, hard as it may seem, was a privilege granted to you. Other women, who would have been glad to have gone out to the same kind of work, were not permitted, because their children were fewer, and if they went to the workhouse they would not be so expensive as your family.

All the parish belonged to one landlord, and in his own time had been taken from the common called Cranbourne Chase. Your husband and others had been possessed of common rights, but all was taken from them. Most of the land was good; some of it rich, growing four quarters and a half of wheat to the acre, though choked up with weeds and foulness; and choked up with weeds and foulness because too few labourers, far below the proper number, were employed. I saw them ploughing down weeds in wide extensive fields in December, that had seeded there and battled and overcome the crops all the summer. I saw the manures of the farm running to waste, and men going idle who should have been employed in applying them to the land. And, deplorable to add, upon all this good land, in a wide parish with two villages, all belonging to the Earl of Shaftesbury,—the father of such an eminent son as Lord Ashley, and within an hour's walk of their residence, and all obtained from Cranbourne Chase at the cheap purchase of an enclosure act of Parliament,—deplorable to add, there was no school, nor provision of any kind for education. Your children were all growing up, among a whole parishful of children, without knowing a letter, save indeed what a thresher, who worked with your husband for 7s. a week, taught the children on Sunday evenings. There was only one service in the church; and many of you were so literally in rage that you could not go to that one church service.

And save, perhaps, the absence of all education, and the single church service, the condition of your family and of your parish is characteristic of the whole county in which you live, and of all your class in many other counties.

Now, Mrs. Frampton, what is the duty of one English woman towards another?

On Friday last, upwards of 1000 women met in a well-known place in London, called the Hanover-square Rooms. They were called together to listen to the speeches of two gentlemen, who proposed to tell them how they might lead you, and such as you, some assistance in getting something else than hot water and salt for your tea, or your tea, when you do get it, without sugar.

Many of them knew, personally, what it was to have families, and high-priced bread and flour, high-priced tea and sugar and butter and cheese, though none of them had ever suffered what you suffer; but they had heard of such as you, and, grieving for such sufferings, they met in the Hanover-square Rooms by the thousand to give their countenance and support to the struggle now going on, not to give you some single loaf of bread, or single pound of sugar, or single calico sheet, or small shoulder of mutton, or half-pound of raisins (you understand what I mean by these items)—not to give you these once in a year, some of them only once in two years—but to procure for you, daily and permanently, a supply of all these—to procure the abolition of the cruel monopolies which make all these things dear, and work scarce and wages low,—the absurd monopoly, to maintain which such a slovenly system of agriculture as Mr. Goddard's is perpetuated, to the detriment of all the population of your parish.

Some of those who are nearest and dearest to me went to the meeting at the Hanover-square Rooms, but they have been attacked in certain newspapers in London—papers which tell us of your great comforts, your enjoyments, of your fresh, flowery felicity in rural England—these papers tell us that our wives and sisters are engaging in politics unbecoming to women, and they try to frighten the timid yet generous-hearted women of London from letting themselves be seen in this matter.

They say it is political, and therefore discreditable to our wives, sisters, and daughters to take any practical steps towards helping such as you into a position not to be obliged to carry stones, not to be obliged to drink your tea without sugar, and oftentimes your hot water without tea. They might have met in Hanover-square Rooms, or at Exeter-Hall, for any other purpose without challenge—they might have met and sighed over the tales of distress and ignorance, the degradation of women in other lands, of black women and little black children, and they would have been lauded for so doing;—but the little creatures who call you mother are not black—untaught, half-clad, and half-fed though they be; therefore our wives, sisters, and daughters are assailed by somebody—a man perhaps, or an "old woman" in the disguise of a man, a hard-hearted old woman, a cruel old woman, an impudent old woman—as having done something unworthy of their sex in trying, by fair and honest means, to get more work, better wages, and more bread, and sugar and tea, butter, bacon, cheese, and beef and mutton, and (Heaven send it) may come before another winter!) more clothing for you; they are assailed for this in a way that only an unmanly man, or base "Grandmother" of the press would assail them.

If it be political and wrong for women to try to get those things you are so much in want of, Mrs. Frampton, what do you think of politics?

I am, &c.,

THE HUSBAND OF AN ENGLISH WOMAN.

Note to the foregoing Letter.

The writer of this letter shows, at least, one line of good argument why ladies should assist in raising funds to abolish the Corn Law, and enlarge our national prosperity. There are many other arguments. I, for one, admit that it is a fair subject for newspaper discussion whether women are in their proper place in taking part in this Bazaar or not. I blame no person for arguing to the contrary. Their attempts to prove the negative but strengthens our affirmative. They say, in the Post, that the London ladies might find something humane to do in trying to shorten the toil of the factory children. I say the more shame to the Post's side of the question that factory children should be working for bread and meat, and when they have worked hours enough to get sufficient, the Post's people should say, "No, you must work three hours longer to feed us—to procure for us the delicacies and elegancies of life; you shall not get your bread and meat until you work three hours longer."

Moreover, their attempts to prove the negative but stir the question, and we see in its discussion that the farm children on the very estates of the so-called friends of the factory workers are totally uncared for.

I myself was, whatever I may be now, a "farm-child." I know, from bitter experience, what such children and such a mother as Mrs. Frampton, of Wood Yates, in Dorset, have to endure at farm work, poorly fed and poorly clad. What this mother is—and she is only like her neighbours in respect of hardship and suffering, for I have myself seen them,—what she is in 1845, my own mother was years gone by. What her son is—a boy rising at four in the morning, and only getting done with work between eight and nine at night, never off his feet all day, tralling his earthen-loaded shoes after him in the ploughed land or in the muck in the farmyard: out wet and dry; and, whether wet or dry, always hungry when he is out;—what he is I was; I who now write these remarks. The awful recollections of "dear years," which I have heard my father and mother tell of, when we were enduring the famines of other "dear years," and telling of the first because they blessed God that the last were not so cruelly famine-stricken as the first—though even the last were so bad as to fix in me, to write in me—within me—with the sharp point of famine, that which is never to be obliterated but by its consummation—"Repeal the Corn Laws."

In the year that I was born my father's wages were 2s. 6d. a day, the very topmost wages of a day labourer in his district. And the average price of wheat—everything else being in proportion—was 15s. 7d. per bushel, 12s. per quarter. Having had occasion in after years to make inquiry whether my name was in a certain parish register or in another, my father, then broken down to the verge of the grave by his hard and lowly-paid toil, told me, with mournful recollections, "No, you had the misfortune," said he, "to be born in one of the dear years. It would have been a shilling to have had ye entered with the parish clerk; but, though we had all the rest done so, we had no shilling to spare when ye was born; a shilling was a shilling in that year: bread was bread. I worked hard and did not get enough of it."

Seeing, as I have since seen, that the farmers and even the landowners themselves suffer by subjecting the nation to periodical visits of excessive dearth; and by subjecting their land to the withering influence of that political machinery which mars all good agriculture, and out of which arises the Corn Law, is it any wonder, that I should be somewhat earnest on this subject? Would it not be a wonder if I were anything else?

And if one or more of the females connected with my family should be members of the Bazaar Committee, does it follow that they must be persons involving themselves in political agitation—that they must become politicians, as is charged against them by the writers hostile to us?

The Corn Laws have sprung from a political root and have been sustained by political influence. But the opposition to them has had its birth in empty cupboards, empty stomachs, and empty dishes. Let those who have reasons to offer produce them, and say, the cupboard and the dishes be empty, and children's stomachs be empty too, whether it is not a subject for wives and mothers to take an interest in; or, if we, who have known such wants, tell those who never knew them what it is to endure famine, and they feel humanely for those who do suffer, is it unworthy of generous-hearted women to do so? Still it is a legitimate subject for discussion; and, all the right and the reason being on our side, I for one am always pleased to see something in the shape of an objection from the other side, because the act of contradicting it does good.

"G, New Compton-street.
"SIR,—In reply to your circular, we have to inform you that, as hearty well-wishers to Free Trade, believing that it contains the best principles of civilization, we purpose contributing some articles to the Bazaar, feeling persuaded they will prove full of interest. We have prepared, in neat frames,

Twelve portraits of Mr. Cobden.
Ten of Mr. Bright.
Three of the Hon. C. P. Villiers.
Three of Colonel P. Thompson.
"Many will, we believe, rejoice to possess these authentic portraits, and feel their principles strengthened by the daily silent influence of these best friends of mankind."

"The retail price of each frame and glass is about 12s., and each portrait is published at 5s. One or two other ornamented articles will accompany them."

"CRAWFORD and LEAPARD."

"Park, Crediton.
"DEAR SIR,—I shall have much pleasure in contributing to your Bazaar at Covent-garden specimens of what I conceive to be the best kind of "protection." Having experienced in the working of my own horses the evils frequently arising from their being galled and chafed, it occurred to me to try the effect of India-rubber as a remedy; and after taking considerable pains in the preparation, adaptation, and application of this material, I succeeded in constructing with it a saddle and collar, which proved such an effectual "protection" against the injury to which I have alluded that I was induced to secure a patent for my invention.
"I remain, dear Sir, yours truly,
"A. W. Poulton, Esq." "EDWARD DAVY."

"Pontefract.
"SIR,—I feel great pleasure in having again to inform you, that I have this morning received from B. Smith and Son, of Knottingly Pottery, a beautiful scent jar of their own manufacture, as a present, to be sold at the Bazaar. I am also glad to state that the Free-Traders of Knottingly have commenced a subscription, and agreed to join the Free-Trade labourers of Pontefract with liquorice cakes. I have received several small but beautiful presents from young ladies in Pontefract, which shall be forwarded to London in due time.
"I remain, your obedient humble servant,
"George Wilson, Esq." "W. KIPP."

London market averaged throughout the year 10d. to 13d. per lb. Irish and English sells from 9d. to 11d. only. The dairy farmers in this country had the opportunity, when the 20s. per cwt. duty was first levied, of preventing the increased importation, if not of quite shutting out the foreigner from the London market; but in many counties they preferred turning their pasture into arable land; the dairy was neglected, and the old English farmer's wife that formerly superintended the butter and cheese department is nearly extinct—the dairymaid is superseded by the housemaid.

With these facts, ought the public to be taxed at the rate of about £100,000 a year (the cheese and butter duty), and the poor deprived of these essential articles for their comfort? To call the duty a protective one is perfectly ridiculous; let such protection be tried as an experiment in any business in the city of London, the result would be distracting the attention of the party engaged in it from industrious business habits to theoretical protection, thus producing a sort of sliding scale which he would not understand, and which would ultimately lead to ruin.

Looking to the health and comfort of the poor, experience has shown that animal fat is almost necessary for food in cold climates, producing greater warmth to the system, and enabling the human frame to bear up against cold more than any other description of food. To exemplify this fact, look to the provision of nature in the cold and hot climates—the Esquimaux and Russian will be content with blubber and train oil—the least quantity of fat is repulsive to the taste of the Indian: one meal of fat bacon or butter per diem to the half-fed English labourer would be of greater service to him than all the beer he could obtain, if the duty was taken off malt.

Another great advantage attends the use of butter and cheese—it does not require any expense in preparing; it enables the labourer to take his frugal meal either at home, in the field, or at whatever occupation he may be engaged in without trouble.

The result of high prices leads to the use of unwholesome substitutes, such as common animal fat, rancid lard and other grease, boiled potatoes, and boiled peas, coloured to represent butter: these ingredients are extensively used in common pastry for the poor in the low neighbourhoods in and about London; and, to show the extent of this trade, some individuals engaged in it make 20,000 to 30,000 pies per week. Yet, in the face of this, we hear from Liverpool, no later than the 3rd. instant, that part of the butter now in stock from the United States will have to be "tarred," in consequence of the quality not being good enough to enable the importers to pay the 20s. duty, therefore a large proportion must be cleared for grease, after being subject to the revolting process of destruction by being mixed with "tar," when this quantity, at a duty of 10s. per cwt., would have been consumed for the purpose originally imported—namely, butter.

The effect of the improvement in the trade of the manufacturing districts is shown, as regards importation and consumption, by comparing the stock on hand the past two years. The stock of butter in London—

do. do. 1845, was 5,620 do.

So that from this time to May and June (termed by the trade the end of the season), the price of butter will be 20 to 30 per cent. above the usual price at that period of the year; and, with the present state of the meadow-land in this country, combined with the limited stock of butter on hand, were it not for the foreign importation, butter would be worth 2s. 6d. to 3s. per lb. between this time and the end of May, which would act as a prohibition to its being used by the middling and poorer classes of society.

The union workhouses are almost all supplied with low-priced foreign cheese, being from 10s. to 15s. per cwt. under the lowest price of home-made.

The following is an abstract of the return to an order of the House of Commons, moved by Mr. Ewart, of the quantity of butter destroyed in the United Kingdom, by the admixture of tar, the past four years:—

	Cwt.	qrs.	lbs.
1841 .. .. .	8,461	1	27
1842 .. .. .	3,373	0	25
1843 .. .. .	5,641	0	17
1844 .. .. .	2,305	1	13

Total .. 19,781 0 26

And, calculating the average as above for the period of ten years, the loss to the revenue will amount to £45,000, being the difference of duty as paid on tarred butter to pass as grease, instead of the original article butter.

RENT OF SUSSEX.

(From the Brighton Guardian.)

Since our remarks last week on the burdens on agriculturists, we have seen the official returns of the property-tax, which mention the whole amount of the rent paid in Sussex. We can now, therefore, speak with more accuracy than last week on this subject; but we can throw no additional light on the principle. We learn from the population returns that there are in Sussex 4042 farmers and graziers, and 30,679 agricultural labourers, each farmer employing on an average something more than seven labourers. That indeed is a high average; for in the whole empire each farmer employs much fewer labourers, the accurate returns disclosing at once the notion that agriculture gives so much more employment than manufactures to the labourer. From the property-tax returns we learn that the rent of land in Sussex is £455,373, and the amount of tithe £44,509. The total income of Sussex under Schedule A is £1,076,999, the difference between that total and the two sums mentioned being the rent of houses, mines, quarries, manors, &c. We shall, therefore, take as the basis of our remarks only the two first sums, which give us the amount of the rent paid by the farmers of Sussex to the squire and the parson.

Now, the two sums together of rent and tithe make £500,882, paid yearly by the farmers to the owners of land and tithes. Dividing the whole of that amongst the 4042 farmers, it would give to each farmer £233 for his share per year; and nobody, we presume, would say that he might not, were that burden removed, sell his wheat at more than its present price, and still receive an ample reward for his labour. Dividing the whole sum amongst the agricultural labourers, it would give to each one £231 a year; or dividing the sum equally between the two classes, each farmer would receive an addition to his income of £116 and each labourer of £15. 10s. per year. It is perfectly and unanswerably clear, therefore, that the greatest burdens on the agriculturists are rent and tithe—rent-charge, perfectly clear that the landowners and the titheowners are the causes why the farmers have not sufficient profit and the labourers sufficient food. The rent-owners and the titheowners, then, intercept the bounties of Providence, and keep from the labourer the ordained rewards of industry. To support squires and parsons and their families in splendid idleness is the greatest burden on the working agriculturists, and the greatest curse of both farmers and labourers. The Almighty, we repeat, blesses the labour of the husbandman with a rich abundance; but the two classes who pretend to teach and to protect him carry off his grain and flour, and leave him little or nothing but the husks and the bran.

We would not, we repeat, say one word on this important, delicate, and tender subject, would the squires and the parsons only allow us to have freedom: Free competition would give them and other men their rights, and their rights only. Free competition, the unlimited higgling of the market, would make every penny they might get a plain and palpable free-will offering. However much it might amount to, we should regard it, like the gains of the merchant and the manufacturer, as the due and proper reward for some services rendered to other men, of which they alone are the proper judges, and for which they are willing to pay. Perfectly free competition would preclude any one from having an advantage over another, and it would soon reward every man according to his deserts. As long as the parsons and squires resolutely stand in the way of free competition, as long as they uphold the law to extort high rent and starve the labourer, so long shall we speak of their income as an unjust extortion, and hold up its amount as the chief burden and curse on the industrious classes.

REGISTRATION.—CITY OF LONDON.

A preliminary meeting of gentlemen, from the various wards of the city of London, was held on Thursday last, at the League Council-room, 67, Fleet-street. It was attended by members of the Court of Common Council, and other gentlemen who had rendered active support to the Free-Trade candidate at the last election, and also by Messrs. Cobden and Bright and Colonel T. P. Thompson.

On the motion of Mr. W. A. WILKINSON, seconded by Councillor JOHNSON, Mr. P. A. Taylor was unanimously called to the chair.

The CHAIRMAN detailed to the meeting the measures which had been in operation for the last eighteen months, to place the registration in a satisfactory position for the return of Free-Trade candidates. The lamented death of their revered friend Mr. John Travers, followed so rapidly by that of their respected and efficient fellow-worker Mr. George Heppel, had effected a breach in their organization which it became necessary to supply by timely preparation. It was, therefore, thought desirable to call them together, that they might be informed of the state of the labours of the Registration Committee, and have an opportunity of considering collectively what steps it would be desirable to pursue to guard against being taken by surprise on any sudden emergency.

The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Lowe, Gibbs, Tait, Holt, Parker, Johnson, and Read.

Mr. COBDEN, M.P., also made a few observations.

Ultimately, on the motion of Councillor JOHNSON, seconded by Mr. Gibbs, the thanks of the meeting were unanimously passed to the City Registration Committee of the League; and they were requested to continue their labours.

On the motion of Councillor HOLT, seconded by Councillor READ, it was resolved that the gentlemen present from the various wards pledge themselves to organize Free-Trade election committees in their respective wards, and to report the lists of such committees, and of the chairmen and secretaries, to the next meeting.

It was then agreed that the next meeting should be held on Thursday, the 15th of May.

On the motion of Mr. HOLT, seconded by Colonel T. P. THOMPSON, thanks were voted to the chairman, and the meeting adjourned.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE PEOPLE'S HALL, BIRMINGHAM.—This monument of the enterprise and good taste of the working classes of that town was opened on Monday week. It will accommodate about 1500 people, and is well adapted for the delivery of lectures, meetings, &c. A bust of Major Cartwright is its only ornament.

TIME.—Time is like a creditor, who allows an ample space to make up accounts, but is inexorable at last. Time never sits heavily on us but when it is badly employed. Time is a grateful friend; use it well, and it never fails to make a suitable requital.

LIGHTING BY ELECTRICITY.—Mr. Weekes's plan for lighting towns by electricity is about to be carried into effect in America. The editor of the Cincinnati Mechanic states that an experiment he lately witnessed was perfectly successful, that the apparatus is by no means costly, and that for lighting Cincinnati two towers, if considered, will be sufficient to illuminate the whole city. Mr. Weekes's plan was first published in this country as far back as 1831.—The Builder.

THE TRADE AND COTTON MANUFACTURE OF MANCHESTER TWO CENTURIES AGO.—In a curious old book entitled "The Treasure of Traffic, or a Discourse of Foreign Trade," &c., by Lewis Roberts, Merchant and Captain of the City of London, published in 1611, we find the following early notice of the cotton manufacture of this town:—"The town of Manchester, in Lancashire, must also be herein remembered, and worthily for their encouragement commended, who buy the yarn of the Irish in great quantity, and, weaving it, return the same again in linen into Ireland to sell: neither doth their industry rest here, for they buy cotton wool in London, that comes first from Cyprus and Smyrna, and at home work the same and perfect it into fustians and velvets, dimities, and other such stuffs; and then return it to London, where the same is vended and sold, and not seldom sent into foreign parts, who have means at far easier terms to provide themselves of the said first materials."

EXPORT OF FLOUR FROM IRELAND TO THE WEST INDIES.—We have seen a letter from a house at Cork, dated Saturday last, from which it appears that flour is at present shipping to some extent from that neighbourhood to the West Indies, on terms which enable the shippers to compete successfully with the Americans. The following is an extract from the letter in question:—"A few of our millers have been working to some extent at barrelled flour, for export to the West Indies, within the last few months; and I do not despair of seeing operations of this nature form a very important feature in the milling trade, under the advantages held out by the Grinding-in-bond Bill. At present flour can be sold here free on board, to the West India merchant, at a price which will leave him a fair margin for profit, and enable him to undersell the Americans in most of the islands. I can speak positively of Barbadoes. One firm connected with that island has lately purchased 1500 barrels from a miller in this city. At first, of course, there is some little difficulty and prejudice to overcome; but, in good harvests, there is little doubt of the Irish millers being able to cut out the Americans, as it goes in free of the imperial duty, and freights are less from Liverpool or this country than from the United States. The flour already sent out from hence is considered in Barbadoes much superior to the American manufacture." Of course it will be understood that the flour so exported is made virtually from foreign wheat, the price of which is often low enough to enable the English or Irish miller to compete with the produce of the United States; especially with the difference of freights arising from the fact that, under ordinary circumstances, many vessels leave England in ballast for the West Indies, whilst American vessels generally earn their freight principally by the outward voyage. Yet this is a trade which the ultra-protectionists would gladly have kept out of the hands of British millers and shipowners, without even a shadow of advantage to themselves.—Manchester Guard.

EDUCATION AND CRIME.—The calendar for the present Salford sessions contains the names of 48 persons for trial on charges of felony, of whom 18 can neither read nor write, 26 can read or read and write imperfectly, and 4 only can read and write well. There are also 7 persons for trial on charges of misdemeanour, and of these 4 can read or read and write imperfectly, and 3 can neither read nor write.

NEWSPAPER STAMPS.—The following return has just been issued by the order of the House of Commons, showing the number of stamps issued for newspapers in Great Britain from Jan. 1, 1842, to Jan. 1, 1845:—

England, 1d. .. ..	50,145,912	51,282,000	53,933,848
Do. 4d. .. ..	1,474,064	1,893,782	3,738,124
Scotland, 1d. .. ..	4,977,344	5,293,726	5,747,585
Do. 4d. .. ..	113,530	213,150	217,620
Wales, 1d. .. ..	410,200	426,043	440,700
Do. 4d. .. ..	10,830	2,000	7,000
Ireland, 1d. and 4d. ..	6,099,030	6,501,032	7,018,017
United Kingdom .. ..	63,591,156	65,767,033	71,213,408

This exhibits the remarkable fact that, while the aggregate increase of 1843 over 1842 was only 2,175,879 stamps, that of 1844 over 1843 amounted to 5,446,463, or very much more than double the increase of the preceding year. About one-fifth of this increase is due to halfpenny stamps for supplements.

BARNSELY.—TURN-OUT OF MASONS.—The masons in this town struck for an advance of wages on Monday last; the advance required was 3s. per week, and the matter was compromised the same day on the masters agreeing to give an advance of 1s. 6d. per week, and work was commenced the next day.

MR. COBDEN'S SPEECH.—We are glad to find that upwards of 9000 of Mr. Cobden's speech, in the House of Commons, on Agricultural Distress, revised by Mr. Cobden, and published by Mr. Gadsby, Manchester, have already been sold. Mr. Gadsby states that there has been no demand for any speech published by him equal to this, since Mr. Cobden's first speech in St. Stephen's.

GOVERNMENT.—Government is a great good, and essential to human happiness; but it does its good chiefly by a negative influence, by repressing injustice and crime, by securing property from invasion, and thus removing obstructions to the free exercise of human powers. It confers little positive benefit. Its office is not to confer happiness, but to give men opportunity to work out happiness for themselves. Government resembles the wall which surrounds our lands: a needful protection, but rearing no harvests, ripening no fruits. It is the individual who must choose whether the enclosure shall be a paradise or a waste. How little positive good can government confer! It does not till our fields, build our houses, weave the ties which bind us to our families, give disinterestedness to the heart, or energy to the intellect and will. All our great interests are left to ourselves; and governments, when they have interfered with them, have obstructed much more than advanced them.—Channing.

INCENDIARISM.—On the afternoon of the 3rd inst. a wood, in the parish of Nutley, Hunts, called Oadnaw-copple, the property of Mr. George Patey Jervoise, was wilfully and maliciously set on fire; and again on the night of the following day (Friday), part of Nutley-copple was also set on fire by some person or persons unknown. A reward of 40 guineas, in addition to the reward of ten guineas allowed by the Almshouse Association, has been offered. On the 6th instant some evil-disposed person or persons maliciously set fire to and destroyed about 100 yards of a hedge in the road leading from the Warwick-road to Hay-bull-house, in the parish of Yardley, Worcestershire, belonging to Mr. Edward King, farmer. Early on Thursday morning, the 10th inst., a fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Wootton, at Sturry, near Canterbury. The whole of the out premises were destroyed, and with them a cart, two milch cows, two pigs, and various other property. No doubt exists of the calamity being occasioned by the hands of incendiaries, as no light had been taken on the premises during the previous evening, and the fire was not discovered till between two and three o'clock in the morning.

ERRATA.

In LEAGUE No. 81, for Rutter, William, Castle-street, Bristol, 21, 1s., read Butler, William. And for Rickard, Matthew, 25, Broughton-road, Salford, 10s., and Rickard, Mrs., do., do., 10s., read Pickard, Matthew, and Pickard, Mrs.

GENERAL M'DUFFIE.

A bound copy of the LEAGUE having been forwarded to General M'Duffie by George Wilson, Esq., Chairman of the Council of the League, the former has returned the following acknowledgment:—

"Washington, March 11, 1845.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have just received your friendly and flattering letter, requesting me, in the name of the 'Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League' of Great Britain, to accept of a copy of the first volume of the LEAGUE, as a testimony of their esteem, founded upon the services I have rendered to the great cause of Free Trade with all nations. In accepting this gratifying token of their consideration and regard, I beg the Council to be assured that none other could have been selected more acceptable to me than this authentic record of the early and successful labours of an association which, from its commencement, I have regarded with the deepest interest, as being destined to produce a fundamental change in the commercial policy of Great Britain, which cannot but be followed by a corresponding change in the policy of all the commercial nations of the earth. Since the Saviour of our fallen race sent forth his chosen apostles to preach the sublime doctrine of 'Peace on earth and good will to all men,' no human association has been formed, in my opinion, better calculated to promote the peace, prosperity, and happiness of all nations than the Free-Trade League of Great Britain. A system of Free Trade, adopted by all nations, would bind them together by bonds of common interest and mutual good will, which the ambition of rulers could never tear asunder. Every nation would rejoice in the prosperity of all nations, as being essential to its own.

"And here the remark may be appropriately made, that there are no political communities on the face of the earth to which these views so forcibly apply as to Great Britain, France, and the other manufacturing nations of Europe on the one hand, and the agricultural staple states of the North American confederacy on the other. As a representative of the great exporting interest of these states, I habitually look upon the prosperity of Manchester with as much interest and gratification as I do upon that of Charleston or New York, and much more than I do upon that of Boston, which I am constrained to regard as the fruits of an unjust and oppressive system of legalized plunder, which confiscates at least one-fifth of the annual income of the cotton-planters to sustain a mercenary moneyed aristocracy of pampered and bloated monopolists.

"In conclusion I beg you to assure the League that they shall have my constant prayers for their success; that the time may speedily arrive when the banner of Free Trade shall wave in triumph over the whole world, and that, beneath its ample folds, 'the nations of the earth may pitch their tents in peace.' Accept for yourself, personally, the assurance of my high consideration and regard.

"Geo. M'DUFFIE.

"Geo. Wilson, Esq., Manchester, Great Britain."

ANTI-CORN-LAW LECTURE IN SUSSEX.—Mr. Falvey lectured at Hailsham, on Wednesday evening last, in the large market-room at the Crown Inn. There was a good attendance of farmers and labourers; and the statements of the lecturer in proof of the injustice of the Corn Laws were listened to with the most respectful attention, and frequently applauded. At the close of the lecture, a large number of Mr. Cobden's speech on agricultural distress, and Mr. Bright's on the game laws, were distributed, and eagerly sought for by the assembled farmers.

THE CORN LAWS.—John Villiers Shelley, Esq., writing from Torquay to the editor of the Sussex Agricultural Express, says:—"However much it may suit party purposes to conceal the fact from the farmers, few are the persons who have studied the subject, who do not feel that the question of Free Trade is but a question of time. For my own part, as an owner and occupier of some of the poorest land in the county (Sussex), I do not fear the result. On the contrary, I am convinced that Lord John Russell hit the right nail on the head in saying that protection is the bane of agriculture."

AMERICAN WHEAT.—The Ohio Statesman estimates the surplus amount of wheat raised in that state the present year, after supplying their wants, at 20,000,000 of bushels.

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW BAZAAR.

The Council of the League, having determined upon holding a Bazaar in the Theatre Royal, Covent-garden, London, in aid of the One Hundred Thousand Pounds Fund, beg to announce that it will open on Thursday, May 8th, for exhibition, and that on the succeeding Monday, the 12th of May, the sale of the articles will commence.

Many of the large manufacturing towns having intimated that they intend to furnish their stalls with articles illustrative of their staple manufacture, such contributions will not be removed at the period of sale, but remain on view till the close of the Bazaar.

Contributions may be forwarded, from the present time to the 1st of May, addressed to George Wilson, Esq., Chairman, at the Theatre Royal, Covent-garden, London, where all the requisite arrangements will be made for their reception.

As the inquiry is repeatedly made as to whether the articles sent to the Bazaar should have the prices affixed by the contributors, or by the Committee of Management in London, it is respectfully requested that, wherever practicable, the contributors themselves will affix their own prices to the articles according to the known cost of the raw materials, and the additional value given by the labour subsequently expended upon them.

Upon application the Council will be happy to forward to any of the local committees, or individuals, who are preparing contributions, labels, on which may be placed the description of the article—the price—and the name of the contributor.

The Council also would earnestly urge upon their friends in the smaller towns and rural districts, where, from a variety of causes, it may not be practicable to obtain contributions in the shape of manufactured goods, or articles of taste or fancy, that efforts should be made to collect money contributions, and forward them before the 1st of May, as Bazaar purses in aid of the League Fund.

Such of the local committees as intend to furnish a stall, are earnestly requested to communicate with the Council without delay.

By order of the Council.

GEORGE WILSON, Chairman.

5, Newall's-buildings, Manchester,
April 3, 1845.

QUERIES RESPECTING THE BAZAAR.

We have received an immense quantity of letters, to which it is physically impossible to return separate replies; but, as the same information is applicable to all, we have resolved to classify the various heads of inquiry, and state under each the arrangements that have been fixed by the Council.

1. Are stalls to be assigned to towns and districts? It is of the utmost importance that the Bazaar, in addition to its immediate purpose, should serve as a classified exposition of the products of British industry, with a sufficient indication of the localities in which the various articles of manufacture are produced. The committees of all the towns intending to furnish stalls should forthwith communicate their intentions to the Council, and when two or more towns combine to furnish a district-stall,—a union which in many cases would be very desirable,—it is of importance to complete the arrangements for the junction as speedily as possible, and to communicate the result to the Council.

2. When will the arrangements made for the administration of the stalls and general management of the Bazaar be announced?

There will be a general meeting of the Ladies' Committee in the Theatre on Wednesday, May 7, when all the arrangements will be detailed; and during the interval the London Secretaries and those of the metropolitan districts will frequently meet to discuss details. It is desirable that local secretaries, as they come up from the country, should attend these meetings, and in the meantime transmit to the general Secretary for London such information and hints as they deem likely to be useful.

3. Have accommodations been provided for ladies attending the stalls?

A sufficient number of dressing-rooms and refreshment-rooms will be reserved for the exclusive use of the ladies attending the stalls; and the number of ladies who have promised to undertake this duty is sufficiently great to allow of their being relieved from time to time, so as to prevent their finding the duty of attending to the sales onerous or inconvenient. On this point it is impossible to lay down fixed rules beforehand, because every day will bring its own special exigencies; but on all sides we find that there is an anxious desire to make every effort for mutual accommodation. We believe that there will be always a sufficient number of volunteers at hand to take the place of those ladies at stalls who may desire temporary relief from attendance.

4. Have any arrangements been made respecting lodgings?

It is found impossible for the Committee of Management in London to undertake the task of providing lodgings for the ladies who come up from the country. Tastes vary so much respecting the choice of localities, the nature and amount of accommodations, and various other circumstances, that it would be impossible to arrange any general plan. Such members of local committees as have friends in London, would act wisely in getting them to secure apartments, and to make all other preliminary arrangements at their earliest convenience.

The London Secretaries met in the green-room of Covent-garden, on Thursday last, and resolved to commence a canvass for attendants on the stalls, so as to ensure a sufficient number of relays, to prevent fatigue or too much exertion. They expressed great anxiety for the early appearance of their sister secretaries from the country, that they might have the benefit of their advice and assistance.

Great interest was excited by the advanced state of the preparations, which were minutely examined by the lady secretaries, and very much admired.

NOTICE TO CONTRIBUTORS.

We respectfully request our friends in the country, who are forwarding contributions to the Bazaar, to transmit a separate note per post, intimating that their packets have been despatched. If this request be complied with, we shall be able to ascertain whether all the contributions which our friends may kindly forward arrive to hand. We would also further beg that contributors will cause to be marked on the exterior of their packages, either their names or some initials or numbers by which such packages may be distinguished; and that they will state in their letters of advice by what external marks their parcels may be identified.

PRESTON.

The contributions in Preston are going on well. The town has been partially canvassed this week, and donations and promises of aid have been made by persons of all classes. The Ladies' Committee are zealous and active, hold their meetings regularly, and have received some handsome gifts, which will be hereafter specified. Among the contributors this week are—Mr. Blackhurst, North-road, four dozen of smelling salts; Mr. Livesey, articles to the value of £10; Mr. George Smith, articles to the value of £20; Mr. Jacobs, a box of fancy bread; Mr. Ascroft, articles to the value of £10; Mr. Charnley, twenty autograph copies of Dearden's "History of Teetotalism;" Mr. Penny, corner of Lune-street, £1; Mr. Hargreaves, Salmon-street, goods, value £1; Mr. Cliff, Hill-street, £1; Mr. Ord, £1; Mr. Croft, to the value of £1. 5s.; Mr. Bromfitt and others, a beehive, value £3; Mr. Brotherton, Cross-street, a piano workbox; Mr. Atkinson, chain and other fancy articles; Mr. Brown, Church-street, a drum of figs; Mr. and Mrs. Critchley, Church-street, bottles and a French workbox; Mr. Maudo, three German lucifer-boxes; Mr. Huffman, some clogs; Mr. James Starkie, a handsome birdcage; Mr. Bradley, a model of an improved hose; Mr. Swindlehurst, a crimping machine, value £5. 5s.; Mr. Jones, an improved power-loom, recently patented, expected to sell for £20; Mr. Dawson, brass-founder, brass ornaments, value £5; Mr. Higson, fancy knives and other articles, and donations in money of sums less than a pound, £4. 13s.; Miss C. Wright, Kirkham, a splendid rug, value £4.—Preston Guardian.

WHITEHAVEN.

We remind the Free-Traders of this locality, that the time during which they can prepare to aid the great Free-Trade demonstration—an act which they will look back to with satisfaction through all their future lives—is very brief. Though it is not required that the carriage of contributions be paid, yet this should be done, and, by a number of parties in the same locality arranging together, the expense will be very small. We shall be happy to receive contributions at our office.—Whitehaven Herald.

THE POTTERIES.

We understand that contributions, amounting to nearly £1000, have been promised to the earthenware and china stall of the League Bazaar, by manufacturers and residents in the Staffordshire Potteries.—Staffordshire Mercury.

PLYMOUTH AND DEVONPORT.

We are glad to find that both Plymouth and Devonport will be represented in this great and important gathering. From Plymouth there will be many models of the Breakwater and Lighthouse, composed of some of the finest specimens from the Breakwater marble quarries; models of the Eddystone Lighthouse of the same material; engravings and drawings, among which will be some contributions from the most celebrated men of the neighbourhood. Besides these there will be letter presses, slabs, wafer presses, rulers, wafer stands, all made from a collection of some of the finest marble that Devonshire produces, and they are remarkable for their extreme beauty and neatness of manufacture; vases of serpentine stone; fossils, shells, and minerals of Devon and Cornwall; ladies' ornamental and fancy work in great variety, besides pecuniary contributions. Many ladies are working silently, but most industriously, in promoting this great object in our own locality.

The Free-Traders of Devonport are working well; they have already a number of models of ships quite rigged and ready to put to sea for the great mart in Covent-garden Theatre. We have no doubt on their arrival in town they will meet with a gallant salute. It will be seen from what we have stated that this locality will do its duty. It cannot boast, perhaps, of its individual residents, who, like those in the north of England, ask for a Bazaar stall for a contribution of goods to the value of £500; but it does boast of men and women who are hearty in the cause, and ready to give to it the aid of their purse, and the labour of their hands. Those who may be desirous of contributing to the Bazaar, may forward their articles to Mr. Symons, the Secretary of the Plymouth Free-Trade Association, who will be most happy to receive them. We hope he will have to put on an extra waggon for their conveyance to town.—Plymouth Journal.

LEEDS.

We have much pleasure in stating that there is every prospect of the Leeds stall, at Covent-garden, being creditable to this important town; but we hope this announcement will not slacken the zeal, or diminish the liberality, of the Free-Traders. In other towns the spirit and energy appear to increase, as the time for exertion diminishes, and contributions come in with accelerated rapidity. We beg to remind our readers that all may serve the cause who will.—Leeds Mercury.

BIRMINGHAM AND SHEFFIELD.

A manufacturer, writing to the Manchester Guardian, says:—"I have had occasion to visit Birmingham and Sheffield, and have been surprised and delighted at the magnificent preparations making by various manufacturers in those towns for that event. Instead of contenting themselves with presenting articles out of their stock, many of them are at a very considerable expense, really exhausting their skill and ingenuity, and that of their workpeople, in the production of articles which, for design and execution, shall be exhibited to the scrutiny of all who visit the Bazaar, as productions upon which they are willing to stake their reputation. I had the pleasure of seeing one or two of the articles so prepared, and certainly, judging from these as specimens of the rest, I shall not grudge a visit to London for the purpose of inspecting the contents of these two stalls alone."

NOTTINGHAM.

We again remind the friends of Free Trade in this town and neighbourhood, that their contributions to the forthcoming Bazaar, in aid of the League fund, which is to be held in Covent-garden Theatre on the 8th of May, should, on no account whatever, be delayed beyond the 30th of April. Mr. S. Bean, of Clinton-street, and Mr. W. Cripps, of Mount-street, have, we understand, agreed to receive all contributions that may be forwarded to

THE BAZAAR.

PORTOKEN WARD.

At a numerous and highly respectable meeting of the members of the Anti-Corn-Law and Free-Trade Association of the Ward of Portoken, held the 2nd of April inst.—Mr. Thomas Rhoads in the chair,—it was proposed by Mr. Wilde, seconded by Mr. M. T. Levitt, and unanimously carried:—"That this association pledges itself to carry out to the utmost extent in their power the views of the League with respect to the Bazaar."—Mr. J. G. Rhoads reported that the business committee them on or before that day. We cannot but think that the Nottingham stall ought to be one of the most attractive and profitable in the Bazaar; and surely the friends of humanity and sound commercial legislation will exert themselves to render it worthy of the town, and of the cause to which it is consecrated. There will, we trust, be a contribution of lace from nearly every manufacturer, the costlier and finer the better; and our hosiery establishments should make a point in forwarding, in addition to the more staple goods, the finest specimens of frame-work-knitting that have been produced. It would be superfluous in us to attempt to argue the desirability of such a course; suffice it to say, that there is no town more interested in the triumph of Free-Trade principles, comparatively speaking, than Nottingham. The manufacturers and artisans of Leicester are alive to this important undertaking; so are the Free-Traders of Derby. Is Nottingham to be left in the rear? A word in season to our fellow-townsmen will not, we are sure, be deemed intrusive or out of place.—Nottingham Review.

BRADFORD.

Many of our townspeople and neighbours intend availing themselves of the special trains to behold this unparalleled sight; there will, indeed, be for a few days quite a depletion of the crowded population of the borough. We should be glad if, in the meantime, some of the intended visitors would become liberal contributors. There is great apathy on the part of many well disposed to the cause of Free Trade, and well able to afford it valuable support, who ought not only to give "in kind," but in effort, to this brilliant enterprise; and we beg respectfully to remind those whose services and contributions to this great national work exist as yet only in intention, to remember that they will be unavailing if allowed to remain in so intangible a form many days longer. Some contributions have already been received; and those who have promised to aid will see that but little time remains for them to fulfil their engagements.

Now, it is not necessary that anybody should decline giving because he has not much to give: it will be the multitude of little things which will make up the great whole; and the shoemaker who sends a pair of slippers or child's shoes, on which he has expended his ingenuity and toil, does virtually as much to help on the good cause as the wealthy manufacturer who gives "of his abundance." We cannot help hoping, notwithstanding present appearances, which are certainly unfavourable, that Bradford will not be behind neighbouring towns in the value and variety of its contributions to the Bazaar.—Bradford Observer.

EDINBURGH.

As appears by an advertisement in the Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle, "It has been resolved to exhibit the elegant collection of articles, supplied by the ladies of the metropolis of Scotland (they are worthy of the taste and fingers that framed them), on Tuesday the 29th, and to send the whole off to London, per steamer, on the following day. Ladies and gentlemen of Edinburgh, Leith, and surrounding district, interested in this Bazaar (who have not already done so), are especially requested to send in their contributions on or before the 28th instant."

ROSCOMMON.—HUMAN INDUSTRY AND HUMAN BLOOD.

(From the Morning Advertiser.)

TO THE BELIEVERS IN PROTECTION TO AGRICULTURE.

Ireland is at present the scene of a species of human strife, perhaps matchless in the history of the world. At all events, it has never been witnessed in England nor in Ireland. Agrarian outrages have been common in the latter country, and of great variety. So have they been at different periods in England. Last year they took the form of England of stock and farm-yard burning. The disaffected destroyed property to intimidate its owners and occupiers, and some of them were convicted and transported. In Ireland they have seldom set fire to farm-yards, but they have occasionally indulged in "wrecking" the houses of unfriendly parties. They have pulled down gates and fences, or have prevented such from being set up. More frequently they have sought to fulfil their purpose of retaining possession of land, or of renewing possession, or of being revenged when the land was lost, by attacks on human life. But, in whichever shape the outrage may have been committed, the agrarian crime, in England or in Ireland, has been destructive either of life or property.

Not so the new crime now prevalent in the county of Roscommon, in Ireland. Three hundred men associate together to make land worth more than it is lying in grass, without cultivation; they insist on the land being brought into cultivation. The police are sent to hinder them. They will not be hindered. They defend themselves from arrest with the implements of their labour. A collision takes place; the police fire upon them, and some are shot dead and some wounded. The strife is called the conacre war, and is common in different parts of the west of Ireland, this being the season for planting potatoes. The latest collision is thus reported in the Londonderry Journal, a Tory paper:—

"On Wednesday last an unfortunate occurrence took place at Ballinacra, near Strokestown, in which one man lost his life. A party of six policemen were out on patrol at mid-day, and came on a party of upwards of 300 men, in the act of turning up a large grass field. They ordered them to desist, but they would not. The police then made prisoners of some of the fellows, on which one of them made a blow at one of the police with his toy, and fortunately struck only his cap, and another of the police seeing his comrade in such danger, discharged his piece and shot the fellow dead and wounded two others. The police and military in that district are dreadfully harassed, patrolling night and day, and are still unable to prevent the peasantry turning up whole fields of grass land, they declaring that they must have conacre. We have heard that there are to be a hundred additional police, four head constables, and two sub-inspectors sent into the country."

The English reader must bear in mind that the police in Ireland are all armed, armed to the teeth.

The Roscommon Journal says, "This county has never been so disturbed a state, owing, unfortunately, to the wickedness of the peasantry, and their anxiety to raise food for themselves and their starving families. Many a time and oft, we told the landed proprietors of Roscommon that their depopulating system, and anxiety to clear their lands in order to occupy them themselves, or let them to some rich grazier, would create a reaction," &c. &c.

Let us compare this competition for conacre (land rented for the potato season, and usually rented at a prodigious price, running in most parts of Tipperary, where the system is at its height, from £7 to £12, and even £14 per acre!)—let us compare this competition for land in Ireland with what some of us do and say in England. I mean those of us who contend for their Corn Law,—or for what we call—most unjustly call—"protection to agriculture."

We say land will be thrown out of cultivation, rents will not be paid, capital will recede from the soil, and fertile England will become one great grass pasture, if the Corn Law be abolished.

I do not now halt to refute this unfounded nonsense in all the ways in which it may be refuted; but I may here remark that nothing but the depopulation of a country can put land out of cultivation. As the population increases, so does the profit of the land. Market-gardens and farms near towns, or in thickly-peopled districts, prove this; not, perhaps, by the amount of profit pocketed by the market-gardeners or farmers, but by the high rents paid from good ready-money markets and excessive competition.

More employment, better wages, and more bread for the people generally, would greatly increase the demand for all kinds of animal food in England, and much of the soil would, with a Free Trade in corn, be profitably used in providing for the fattening of animals for the butchers. The enlarged quantities of manure thus provided (science and good sense saving much of that which is now lost) would make the cultivation of grain crops more easy and more profitable, even at a lower price than they are now selling at.

When there was no further false reed to lean to for support, the farmer would strengthen his own energies. When there was no longer a Corn Law, prices would be kept more equal by the extended sources of supply, and farmers could thus calculate with much more certainty than they can now, what they could afford to give for and do to land. When there was no Corn Law, nor landlord supremacy to maintain in the House of Commons, there would be less disposition on the part of landlords to refuse to give leases to their tenants. When leases become common, capital would flow to the cultivation of the soil. At present it recedes from it: capital shrinks from uncertainty. The agriculture of England is the very essence of uncertainty; it suffers accordingly.

Now, capital, as applied to the culture of land, consists of anything that promotes fertility. It is not necessarily cash. Ploughs are farming capital, so are horses and cows, so is manure, so are drains which draw off the water, and the spades which dig drains, and the hands which wield the spades.

Moneyed capital will procure all these things, but they sometimes exist and seek investment in the land—seek to make the land fertile, when they could not be converted into money.

Thus a farmer may have a family to house, able and willing to work on their farm—they are as good to him as so much moneyed capital. In this respect they are like the competitors for the conacre in Ireland.

The latter exclaims, in effect, if not in words, "the land is now thrown out of cultivation. We will give a higher rent for it than it pays now that it is in grass. We will make it produce a greater abundance of human food than it now produces. Let us labour at it—let us devote capital to its cultivation—the capital of sinew and sweat."

The owners of this land, who are amongst those most ready to exclaim that the withdrawal of protection would throw land out of cultivation, say, "No, you shall not give capital to the cultivation of our land. We will not have you. If you insist we will shoot you. We have got rid of you already; we have thrown our estates out of cultivation, and so they shall remain; they give us least trouble this way—less profit, but least trouble. Besides, we have got rid of the Catholics by laying the land in grass: it requires few people to manage it. Stand off; you shall not bring the land into cultivation! Stand off, or we will shoot you!"

The peasantry, or the human capital of the land, as they may be called, rejoice, "Then shoot us! We must cultivate the land or die. If we must die either way, slay us now!"

It is not long since an agricultural baronet was telling a meeting of tenants and labourers in England, that if the Corn Law was repealed no rent would be paid. A labourer, in a smockfrock, exclaimed, "Then give I five acres, Sir Charles."

Sir Charles replied, "You could not live on it; you would have no capital to cultivate it."

"Ees would I," rejoined the labourer. "I and my family would make capital of our hands. Us would live on it, and have surmount good to sell also."

Land would never go out of cultivation but by depopulation; and there is no limit to the productive power of land as science and population advance. So far the threats of farms going out of cultivation, in the absence of the Corn Law, are the reverse of true, if trade and employment increase with the increasing population.

But a lesson may be learned from Ireland. From the competition for land there is a lesson of another kind, a lesson which teaches the fearful results of a country having little trade; of the agricultural population so far outnumbering the manufacturing and trading population as it does in Ireland.

What would England be if her trade was as small, and her struggle for conacre as much a matter of life and death, as in Ireland?

Above all, if England were in this condition, who would buy and pay for the cattle fed on the grass lands of Roscommon?

Were there no Lancashire, nor port of Liverpool, to swallow up the half million of Irish pigs annually imported, and the whole million of other live animals, what would be the use of the Roscommon county constabulary to protect the grass? Who would pay them? Where would they come from?

Let the landlords of Roscommon try to make it a Lancashire, though at an humble distance, and the grass fields will not be lavished as now by hostile spades. Human industry will not be wasted as now. Human blood will not be spilt as now.

Rhetoric without logic, is like a tree with leaves and blossoms, but no root.—Selden.

REVIEW.

History of the Consulate and Empire of France under Napoleon. By M. A. Thiers, late Prime Minister of France. Translated by D. Forbes Campbell, Esq. London, Colburn.

The campaign of Marengo was one of the most interesting in its events, and important in its results, that can be found in the annals of war. It was Napoleon's reply to the ungracious and impolitic letters addressed to him by the English Ministers, when they rejected his proffers of peace. Mr. Pitt believed that the French finances were too disorganized to allow of the Republican Government affording effective relief to its armies in Italy and Egypt; the Austrian Government adopted the same opinion: and it must be confessed that the position of Massena in Genoa, and of Kleber at Cairo, afforded some justification for this error. Napoleon craftily increased the delusion of his adversaries by assembling a mock army of reserve at Dijon, while he secretly brought the entire strength of France to the foot of the Alps by a series of movements which, from their apparent want of unity and system, never awakened the slightest suspicion. The plan of the campaign was based on the possibility of getting into the rear of the Austrians, and enveloping them in a net similar to that in which they actually held Massena; for this purpose it was necessary to force a passage over the Alps, and after some brief discussion it was resolved that this should be attempted by the perilous track, rather than road, which then passed over the Great St. Bernard. Some notion of the difficulties to be encountered may be formed from the following extract:—

"One of the divisions of the army was to pass every day. The operation would, therefore, last several days, especially on account of the matériel, which it was requisite to forward with the divisions. While the troops were successively coming up, others fell to work. The provisions and ammunition were moved off first. For this part of the matériel, which might be divided, and placed on the backs of mules in small chests, the difficulty was not so great as for the rest. It consisted only in the insufficiency of the means of transport; for, notwithstanding the lavish expenditure of money, there were not so many mules as were required for the enormous weight that was to be carried to the other side of the St. Bernard. However, the provisions and ammunition having crossed along with the divisions of the army, and with the assistance of the soldiers, the artillery at length demanded attention. The gun-carriages and the ammunition waggons had been taken to pieces, as we have said, and placed upon mules. The cannon themselves were still left, and their weight could not be reduced by the division of the load. With the twelve-pounders, in particular, and with the howitzers, the difficulty was greater than had been at first expected. The sledges upon wheels, constructed in the arsenals, could not be used. A method was contrived, tried immediately, and found to answer: this was, to split the trunks of fir trees in two, to hollow them out, to encase each piece of artillery within two of these half trunks, and to drag it thus covered, along the ravines. Owing to these precautions, no collision could damage it. Mules were harnessed to this singular load, and served to draw several pieces to the summit of the Col. But the descent was more difficult: that could only be effected by strength of arms, and by incurring infinite dangers, because it was necessary to keep hold of the piece, and, while holding, to prevent it from slipping down the precipices. Unfortunately, the mules began to be knocked up. The muleteers, also, a great number of whom were required, were exhausted. It was then proposed to have recourse to other means. The peasants of the environs were offered so much as a thousand francs for every piece of cannon which they should agree to drag from St. Pierre to St. Remy. It took a hundred men to drag each, one day to get it up and another to get it down. Some hundreds of peasants came forward, and actually took several pieces of cannon across, under the direction of artillerymen. But even the allurements of gain was not strong enough to induce them to repeat the effort. All of them disappeared, and though officers were sent in quest of them, and made large offers to bring them back, these were of no avail, so that it was found necessary to ask the soldiers of the divisions to drag their artillery themselves. From such devoted soldiers anything might be obtained. To encourage them, they were promised the money which the disheartened peasants would not earn; but they refused it, saying it was a point of honour for a body of troops to save their cannon, and they laid hold of the forsaken pieces. Parties of one hundred men, successively quitting the ranks, dragged them, each to its turn. The hard played culleving airs at difficult points of the passage, and encouraged them to surmount obstacles of so novel a nature. On reaching the summit of the mountain, they found refreshment prepared by the monks of St. Bernard; and they took some rest before they made greater and more perilous efforts in the descent. In this manner Chamberlain's and Monnier's divisions dragged their artillery themselves; and, as the advanced hour did not permit them to descend the same day, they chose rather to bivouac on the snow than to leave their cannon. Luckily the weather was serene; so that they had not its inclemency to endure, in addition to the difficulties of the ground."

But after having crossed the mountain an unforeseen obstacle presented itself: the fortress of Bard blocked the defile through which alone they could pass into Italy; it was strongly fortified, defended by a brave garrison, and the efforts made to take it by storm totally failed!—

The First Consul directed his attention to the fort of Bard. The French were in possession of the only great composing the town, but could only pass through it by such a power of bulls that it would be scarcely possible to get through with artillery, though the distance was but two or three hundred fathoms. The consequence was that the French were in possession of the only great composing the town, but could only pass through it by such a power of bulls that it would be scarcely possible to get through with artillery, though the distance was but two or three hundred fathoms. The consequence was that the French were in possession of the only great composing the town, but could only pass through it by such a power of bulls that it would be scarcely possible to get through with artillery, though the distance was but two or three hundred fathoms. The consequence was of Vienna, which had kept them under such fatal illusions, and thus plunged them into an abyss."

It was the influence which he obtained by this brilliant campaign that enabled Napoleon to effect the internal tranquillization of France, and thus remove every plausible pretence for foreign powers to interfere with the Consular Government. The British expedition to Egypt, by forcing the French army in that country to a capitulation, removed another obstacle to a general peace; and the restoration of Christianity in France conciliated those who had hitherto regarded the Revolution as inconsistent with all principles of social order. Peace was, however, delayed by the insanity of George III.; that monarch, whose attacks of mania were far more frequent than is generally supposed, was visited by this disease at the moment when the union between England and Ireland was formed. There were persons who attributed this calamity to the eagerness with which Mr. Pitt pressed on the reluctant mind of his royal master the justice of the claims of the Irish Catholics to a full participation in the rights and privileges of the British constitution, while others saw in the obstinacy with which the King resisted these claims, evidence of the continued aberration of intellect from which George III. was rarely, if ever, entirely free. The conduct of all parties at this crisis has won the hearty approbation of M. Thiers:—

"The feeble intellect of George III. was unequal to bear the violence of the political crisis. He was seized with a fresh attack of insanity, and during a month was incapable of fulfilling the functions of royalty. Mr. Pitt had sent in his resignation. Mr. Addington and Lord Hawkesbury were the ministers appointed to succeed him, but had not yet received the seals of office. Mr. Pitt, although he had ceased to be minister, was still, in fact, King of England during this crisis of nearly a month's duration, and was so by the consent of the whole nation. Explanations took place upon the subject in the House of Commons. They were of a very delicate nature; they were demanded by Mr. Sheridan, and given in noble, statesmanlike language by Mr. Pitt. The various motions usually made in the English Parliament upon the state of the country were postponed, and it perhaps occurred to some distrustful minds that Mr. Pitt prolonged, without reluctance, the sort of royal authority which he enjoyed. He trusted it would be believed, to use his own language at the time, that in the event of Ministers being no longer able to receive the commands of his Majesty from his own mouth, they would propose measures to which it was unnecessary to allude more distinctly, but which they should not delay for one single day. They found themselves placed by their duty in an unprecedented situation, which they should not wish, on any account, to prolong one instant more than strict necessity required."

Mr. Sheridan replied to this, by expressing the utmost confidence, that neither Mr. Pitt nor any other minister would ever presume to take advantage of the unhappy condition of the King's health, to prolong, for one moment, a power equal to that of the sovereign himself.

"The most delicate reserve was observed. The word which characterized the real condition of the King, that of madness, did not escape the lips of any one; and the nation waited with anxiety, but with perfect composure, the issue of this extraordinary crisis. During this period, Mr. Pitt induced subsidies to be voted, which no one opposed; the English fleets were got ready for sea, and Admirals Parker and Nelson left Yarmouth with forty-seven sail, and proceeded towards the Baltic."

For the present we shall conclude with a statement of the circumstances that hastened the conclusion of the peace of Amiens:—

"All sensible, reflecting men in England were in favour of peace. This feeling had the powerful support of the King and the people. The pious and obstinate King of England, who refused the emancipation of the Catholics to Mr. Pitt, out of fidelity to the Protestant cause, did not the less rejoice at the restoration of Catholicism in France, a re-establishment which was expected soon to take place. He viewed in that the triumph of religious principles, and was content. He had a great aversion to the French Revolution, and, although General Bonaparte had thwarted and seriously counteracted the policy of England, he was greatly pleased with him for the reaction against that revolution, and, for reinstating true social principles in public opinion. France, which possesses in such an eminent degree the power of communicating to other nations the feelings she herself experiences, being now calmed down, brought back to sound notions, King George III. regarded the blessings of social order as preserved to mankind. If with Mr. Pitt the war had been one of national ambition, as respected George III. it had been a war of principle. General Bonaparte might, therefore, consider him as a friend, but a friend of a very different stamp from Paul I. Having recovered from the attack which had obscured his reason during several months, he was now decidedly inclined to peace, and pressed his ministers to conclude it. The English people, fond of novelty, looked upon a peace with the French as the greatest of novelties; for they had slaughtered each other, during the last ten years, in every quarter of the world; attributing also the prevailing scarcity to the sanguinary struggle which desolated both land and sea, they called loudly for a reconciliation with France. Moreover, the new Prime Minister, Mr. Addington, unfit to aspire to the same glory as Mr. Pitt, to whom he was greatly inferior in talents, in celebrity, and in general administrative capacity, had but one plain intelligible object in view, which was to make peace. He accordingly desired to bring it about, and Mr. Pitt, still powerful in Parliament, counselled him to this step as the most expedient. The events in the north, far from swelling the pride of England, disposed her, on the contrary, to seize a very convenient and very honourable opportunity of negotiating. The new Minister had determined upon this on the day he assumed office; and he was only confirmed in his resolution when the intelligence reached him of what had taken place at Copenhagen and St. Petersburg. Going still further, he decided upon making a direct overture to the First Consul, which would correspond with the initiative taken by the latter towards England upon his accession to power.

"Lord Hawkesbury, who presided over the Foreign-office in Mr. Addington's administration, sent for M. Otto. This gentleman transacted in London, as we have already seen, the diplomatic business relative to the prisoners, and had been six months before intrusted with the duties connected with the naval armistice. He was, therefore, the natural medium of fresh communications which were about to take place between the two Governments. Lord Hawkesbury informed M. Otto, that the King had confided to him a most agreeable task, the knowledge of which would no doubt cause as much pleasure in France as in England, and this was to propose peace. He said that his Majesty was even ready to send a plenipotentiary to Paris, if it were so desired, or to any other city more agreeable to the French Consul. Lord Hawkesbury added, that the conditions which it was his intention to propose were perfectly honourable to both countries, and as a proof of the sincerity of this reconciliation, he declared that, from that day, every design directed against the present Government of France should be discountenanced by the British Cabinet. He expected a full reciprocity on the part of the French Republic."

"This was disavowing the antecedent policy of Mr. Pitt, who had always pretended to aim at the re-establishment of the Bourbons, and who had unremittingly fomented the attempts of the emigrants and Vendéans by English gold. The negotiations could not have been opened in a more dignified manner. Lord Hawkesbury, however, required a prompt reply."

We do not think it just to M. Thiers to enter into any discussion of his political theories until his work is farther advanced. There is, however, one topic which we shall take an early opportunity of noticing—his decided approbation of Napoleon's policy in invading Egypt, and endeavouring to make that country a colony or dependency of France. Murray's recent publication, "The French in Algiers," will serve as a good text for discussing the value of African possessions to Frenchmen; and we the less scruple taking leave of M. Thiers for the present, as we are certain to have him brought before us as the historian of a period still more exciting than that to which this volume relates, and nearer to our own times.

STOCKPORT.

According to previous announcement, the friends of Free Trade, and the promoters of the projected Bazaar, in support of that object, held a meeting in the hall of the Mechanics' Institution, Nelson-street, Park-street, on Friday evening, the 11th instant. The Mayor presided; and on the platform we observed, J. D. Fernley Esq.; T. Carrington, Esq.; J. J. Moody, Esq.; E. Walmesley, Esq., and others. Mr. Moore, Esq., attended on behalf of the League, and addressed the meeting at some length. Having referred to the registration and to other branches of the question, Mr. Moore proceeded to call their attention to the practical object of the meeting, viz., the Bazaar. He said it had been his custom to call upon every manufacturer in the towns he had visited. Leeds would contribute £400 worth of goods to the Bazaar; Nottingham, £500; Coventry and Birmingham, a considerable sum each; Sheffield, £800; Colerbrookdale, £500, and many other places in Yorkshire; Scotland would also contribute very liberally. After mentioning other details in reference to the promised contributions, Mr. Moore concluded by a very eloquent appeal on behalf of the object, and almost immediately left the meeting, having that night to go by the train to London. On the motion of Mr. J. D. Fernley, thanks were voted to Mr. Moore, amidst general applause.—Mr. Carrington afterwards moved, and Mr. Walmesley seconded, a vote of thanks to the Mayor, for his conduct in the chair, which was suitably acknowledged. A contribution of £10 was announced, from the Mayor; and also £15 from the workpeople employed by Mr. Edward Hollins, in sums all under 5s. each, and in less than two hours' time. More money is promised from the same source. LEAGUE newspapers would, it was announced, be sent for every £1 subscribed. The meeting then dispersed; the general impression being that something handsome will be sent from Stockport.

TURN-OUT BRICKMAKERS.—The brickmakers of Rochdale and the neighbourhood struck work last week for an advance of wages, of about 7d. per thousand. At some places they have succeeded in obtaining the advance.

DURHAM COUNTY PROTECTION SOCIETY.—A correspondent, writing from Bishopwearmouth, gives us some particulars relative to this society. He says:—"The thoroughly rural village of Stalldrop, you will be aware, is almost under the shadow of the princely walls of Raby, the property in it mostly belonging to the Duke of Cleveland, who is chairman of the 'Durham County Agricultural Protection Society,' which so misnamed protection society sent a petition in support of its views for the signatures of the duke's villagers. It arrived last week to the care of a gentleman of independent property residing in 'the hall,' and who married into a titled family. He lost no time in settling about his mission, and quickly found his way into the shop of a Conservative, whom I presumed he made sure of; but he was disappointed: the Conservative reads the LEAGUE every week, and refused to sign. After this rebuff he seems to have suddenly thought a man might be found to procure names; and a decent old man was accordingly sent forthwith round the village, and, what is more, to another village about a mile or so off, and of course to all the farmers in the immediate vicinity; and what was the result? Why, of course, his grace's tradesmen and tenants-at-will would not be expected to refuse; but to their credit be it proclaimed, and Mr. Ackland, who first broached Free-Trade doctrines in this preserve, will rejoice to learn, that on excellent authority I can assure you that about ten persons only could be induced to sign the Durham county protection petition: viz., two squires, the clergyman, the duke's agent, one surgeon, two tailors, a carrier, a shoemaker, and the saddler to the duke's cart horses,—and, as I really believe these were all, and not a farmer among the lot."

AGRICULTURE.

SECONDARY SYMPTOMS.

RETRIBUTIVE JUSTICE ON MONOPOLISTS.

In the body politic as in the natural body, the use of unwholesome and deleterious stimulants for the purpose of preserving a state of unnatural excitement is invariably followed by a painful reaction. The political monopolists will at this moment assent to that proposition, for they are now beginning to reap the fruits of their own misrepresentations and delusions. Everywhere the dupes of the political landlords are calling upon them for the performance of those impossibilities they promised from 1841 downwards. This was strikingly manifested at one of those lugubrious reunions called "protection meetings." The first annual meeting of the "Herts Agricultural Protection Society," held at Hertford, afforded a spectacle which should be a lesson to all public men who trade in political false pretences. It is now pretty generally known that the farmers, upon whom the political landowners called last year to stand between them and the League, are acting, somewhat too literally for the monopolists' case, upon the oft-repeated injunction to act for themselves. At the Herts Society, however, one would have supposed the most timid monopolist squire might have appeared without fear or danger; for full two-thirds of the party consisted of landed magnates, squires, squireens, and land-agents. Moreover, the chairman, the Marquis of Salisbury, is one of those who rule their followers with the strong hand. Yet, in spite of these things, the symptoms of a disruption of the monopolist union were many and urgent. Nor was this altogether unexpected by some of the monopolists, for Mr. Abel Smith was conveniently engaged on a Parliamentary committee, and the Earl of Essex, who was to have performed the part of vice-president, wrote to say he was confined at home by tic douloureux! We do not wonder that this monopolist game-preserver should have been visited with painful nervous-twitchings at the mere idea of meeting a party consisting in part of tenant-farmers, even though presided over by the strong-handed marquis. The lesson lately read to the Earl of Essex by Mr. Horncastle's dinner at St. Albans has not been altogether without effect. We are glad of it: a sense of shame is the first step towards amendment.

The speech of the noble chairman, a hard and a shrewd man, showed his belief that his presence would keep down any ebullition amongst the farmers present, for he ventured to address to them some often-exposed falsehoods, and to try to console them with the vaguest hopes. He so far presumed upon his hearers' ignorance of all that is passing around them as to say, "a powerful body, which styled itself the Anti-Corn-Law League, had then (at the formation of the Protection Society) got together, and promulgated the doctrines of what they called 'Free Trade,' but which meant giving a measure of protection to each and every interest except the interests of agriculture." Now, there could not have been a man in the room who must not have known that it is the principle of protection, as applied to any and all interests, which is denounced by the League, and that his lordship was telling a grand untruth. But landlords' assertions and landlords' promises to tenant-farmers have hitherto been of about the same value as lovers' vows. Possibly his lordship may have left the meeting with a notion that new feelings have been excited amongst his hitherto obedient followers.

His lordship congratulated the meeting that the protection societies "had put an end to all hope of repeal of the Corn Laws during the present session!" Cold comfort that for his monopolist dupes. He told them they must not abandon their exertions, and recognised the successful action of the League upon some of the county constituencies. He thought, if the representations of the deputation of the Central Protection Society to Sir Robert Peel "did not produce an immediate effect, which he regretted, they might be assured that they must ultimately have their proper weight." Though the auditors were civil enough to listen to these platitudes of the great man in silence, they afterwards proved that they had drawn their own conclusions on all these matters. Then his lordship thus intimated his substantial adherence to Peel,—the Queen is going to Hatfield, and marquises may be made dukes:—"It would be unfair to say, so early in the day, that the policy pursued by her Majesty's Government might not in the end be the most beneficial to the country." And he afterwards indicated his apprehension of the spread of sound opinion amongst the farmers by saying, "he entreated them not to be led away by the false doctrines of the League," overlooking the fact that the "doctrines" of her Majesty's Government in respect to Free Trade do not differ very materially from those of the League, the great difference being that the League would reduce doctrine into practice, whilst the Government measures mean to halt between two opposite principles. The next speaker, Lord Grimston,—who has been appropriately designated the representative of the ignorance of the county,—gave evidence that the farmers are giving ear to Free-Trade "doctrines." When he said they wanted subscriptions "in order to prevent the fallacious doctrines of the League from becoming the opinions of the large body of farmers of the county," Mr. Lewis, a land-agent also, ventured to say, "They (the League) had encouraged in their efforts—seeing that every measure introduced by the Government had the effect of lessening agricultural protection;" and he excited the first signs of applause by these remarks:

"They might have expected better things of what had been called an 'agricultural Parliament,' and of a Government said to be their friends (loud cheering);—if they were so, he felt they must call them candid friends (renewed cheering); and Sir Robert Peel had told them in what light they must consider that description of friends. (Hear, hear, and loud cheering.)"

Yet he afterwards said, "This meeting was not called to consider the existing distress of the agriculturists, and the discussion of that subject might lead to a difference of opinion which it was desirable to avoid." Though Mr. Lewis, like a well-trained spaniel, was called in from his too wide range, "difference of opinion," as we shall presently see, was not avoided. Mr. Passingham, a hybrid farmer, said he "was sorry he could not congratulate the meeting on the prospects of agriculture—they were particularly gloomy; and he was the more sorry that their gloomy position had been brought about by what was considered a peculiarly agricultural Parliament, and by a Minister brought into power on the back of the agriculturists;" a statement which was received with loud plaudits. Verily, Sir Robert, the effects of your pleasant political vices are beginning to assume a somewhat threatening aspect. Then followed a genuine farmer, a real dupe, and who, probably smarting under low prices and a monopoly rent, thus gave vent to his wounded feelings:—

"Let them depend upon it, Sir Robert Peel was no friend of the agricultural interest (vehement applause, and cries of 'true!'); and unless they collected themselves together in one great mass, and held themselves together in one powerful body, to protect and defend their rights, they must expect to go to the wall. (Loud cheers.) Sir R. Peel, at heart, was as much a Free-Trader as Mr. Cobden himself, and so were the party to which he belonged (vehement applause); and so should he (Mr. Roberts) be, if he could get Free Trade altogether fairly and fully. (Hear.) But Sir Robert Peel was like a cripple on one leg, and fell all on one side (deafening applause); he was not a fair Free-Trader, as he (Mr. Roberts) would be, and as they would all be, if they could get a fair and full measure of Free Trade."

And he subsequently intimated that the farmers would deem the repeal of the malt-tax an ample equivalent for free trade in grain; and the suggestion was generally assented to by the farmers present. Next Mr. Delmo Ratcliffe, a squire known to be what the Post calls "heavily encumbered," made a fierce onslaught on Peel, and rated the county members for "a desperate fidelity to party;" and his tirade was rapturously applauded. Then a Mr. C. Phelps, an ambitious squireen, volunteered a defence of the Peel Government; and got little but "loud murmurs of disapprobation" for his pains. The speech of Mr. D. Ratcliffe had, however, put the two county members who were present upon their defence, and Lord Grimston got through by reviving some of his school "learning," and talking about Rome, her "sheep pastures and her barbarian foe;" and the audience heard the good-natured simpleton with a laugh. Mr. Dudley Ryder, the other member, however, is a man of more mettle, and he felt it was necessary to say something. And what does the reader suppose he said? Why, he used the following Free-Trade illustration of the utter delusiveness of protection at all:—

"He did not think that the alteration which had taken place in the sliding scale had produced their distress, for when they looked back to 1822, when there was a very high protective duty, the average price of wheat was 43s. per quarter, while in 1844 it was 51s. In 1835 the price of wheat was 39s. 4d., and of barley 29s. 11d., while in 1844 wheat was 51s. 3d. on the average of the year, and barley 33s. 8d. Therefore, it was evident, that, under the higher protective duties, the price of grain was much lower than it is now, under the sliding scale, as modified by Sir Robert Peel. These were absolute and incontrovertible facts, and we must have regard to those in discussions of this kind."

And he showed the absolute impossibility that importations of foreign cattle, meat, or Canada flour could have produced the present moderate price of wheat and other provisions. He justified the measures taken by Government on the ground of the distress which existed in the populous and manufacturing districts in 1842, and thus candidly dealt with "peculiar burdens":—

"When it was understood that the Ministers had a surplus, and that it was intended to remit a portion of the existing burdens of the country, he (Mr. Ryder) and others looked carefully over the list of those burdens, and he confessed that they could not lay their fingers upon one which specifically bore upon the agricultural interest (hear).—at least there was but one,—the malt-tax! (Hear, hear.)"

Now, this is just what Free-Traders say; yet no one was more vehement in his promises to protect agriculture at his election in 1841, and at the protection meeting at St. Albans last year, than Mr. Dudley Ryder. And, even after giving utterance to the above really Free-Trade sentiments, he indulged himself in unmeasured and unmeaning abuse of the League. Does Mr. Ryder imagine the farmers are insensible of the pitiful figure he makes by such inconsistencies? He fully admitted that farmers are now suffering, and then concluded by alluding to the "delicate subject" of game. He said:—

"He felt that some landlords had not acted fairly, and with due consideration for their tenants, as regarded the game. (Cheers.) * * * He thought that it must be an arrangement between the landlords and the tenants. (Hear, hear.) But he must say that the landlord who did not make a full and fair compensation to his tenants for the corn eaten by his game—corn which was the produce of the farmer's anxious labours by night and by day—was not an honest man. (Loud cheers.) * * * He would repeat that the landlord who did not make a full and fair compensation to his tenants for the injury done them by his game, was not an honest man. (Loud cheers.) He, however, warned them against the interference of the League with this question."

The last sentence looks like that "desperate adherence to party" against which Mr. Ratcliffe protested; and Mr. Ryder may be assured that the farmers not only appreciate the movement made in their favour by the Free-Traders against the game nuisance, but are daily becoming convinced that the Leaguers are the real "farmers' friends." If Lord Essex had got an inkling of what Mr. Ryder meant to say about game-preserving landlords, we don't wonder his nerves were dolorously affected.

Another landlord, Mr. Gausson, an unscrupulous game-preserver, said:—

"He had one remark to make in reference to the game laws; he was fond of sport, but he should be sorry to see his game eating up the crops of his tenants without making them ample compensation. (Loud cheers.) He had always said to his tenants, that if ever they could prove real damage he would pay them (hear, hear, and a cry of 'oh!'); and he had never had but one application since then, and that was a case where certainly a considerable amount of damage had been done."

Possibly the Game-Law Committee may have some evidence of what Mr. Gausson's "ample compensation" means. The "proving real damage" where the judge is the party who had done the injury, and has to pay the cost, is not a very easy task, as some of Mr. Gausson's game-devoured tenants can testify.

Mr. D. Ratcliffe, in proposing the "tenant-farmers," said:—

"He was sure that the landlords present would join with him in drinking success to the tenant-farmers; for if they had had, as he had had, some of their farms in their own hands, they would not much want that charge to be increased. (Loud cheers.)"

Let farmers recollect the truth so naively admitted by Mr. Ratcliffe, and refuse to take or hold farms except upon fair terms, and they may soon bring the landowners to reason. Landlords are far more indebted to tenants than tenants are to landlords.

The last speech we shall notice is that of Mr. Hainworth, who did the fictitious statistics at the formation of the "society at St. Albans;" but he now said:—

"They had been told that they had reaped results from the formation of this society, but he could not himself say that the results had as yet been very great. They had been told that they were not to discuss at these meetings the causes of the distress they suffered, or the remedies that were applicable for that distress; he begged leave to differ from the gentleman who laid down that rule. He conceived that the agriculturists had not been fairly dealt with."

And then he fell foul of the tariff, the Corn Laws, the Canada Corn Bill, the income-tax, and the Tithe Commutation Act. He said:—

"Another thing to which he wished to allude, was the system on which the tithes were exacted. The Tithe Commutation Bill was brought in about the same time as the new Corn-Law Bill, and by the former measure tithes were made payable on an average of the last seven years; so that at the very time when their protection was taken away, and the price of their corn diminished, they were required to pay their tithe on the average of higher prices than they received, which was equivalent to giving five bushels of wheat where there would only have paid three under the previous Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) Some little exertion was required on the part of the agricultural interest to make a proper representation of these facts, and he hoped that they would be laid before the House in a decided way, and not in an indirect manner as Mr. Miles had done. (Hear.) He begged leave to ask whether, if the manufacturing interest had been in such a condition, their case would have been treated in such a manner; and whether their representatives would not have pressed it upon the House, month after month, till they had obtained a remedy for the injustice under which they suffered? (Hear, hear, and cheers.)"

Does Mr. Hainworth not believe that when the agriculturists can go with clean hands to the House of Commons, and by means of representatives identified in interest with themselves, that their complaints will also receive due consideration? But while the bees are represented by the drones, industry has no chance. The mixture of perplexity, dissatisfaction, and groping in the dark which the above passages indicate in the ranks of the best disciplined band of monopolists is sufficiently instructive to political charlatans. We believe the day is not far distant when the political landowners would gladly bury in oblivion all the absurdities with relation to the Corn Laws to which they have given currency during the last five years. But, as one of their body said in Parliament, the League—ay, and the protection societies—have taught the farmers to think, and they are rapidly arriving at a clear perception of the truth, that the Corn Law forms only one of the subjects upon which they have been bamboozled by their landlord leaders. And the discovery is being made in a way which gives rise to much bitterness, distrust, and alienation.

FOOD FOR OUR STOCK.

The following letter, addressed to the Mark-lane Express by "A Farmer of Light Land," shows that the monstrous absurdity of imposing duties on grain, of which farmers are themselves the main consumers, is becoming understood. The writer says:—

"Your paper, some months since, contained a very sensible letter on the impolicy of relying on the capricious turnip crop as a means of feeding stock in winter; and for some time past a discussion has been kept up on the supposed advantages of malt as food for stock. No one believes that Sir Robert Peel will lay the revenue open to the risk of fraud by making malt available for cattle-feeding, whilst the Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham and Mr. S. O'Brien know full well that they might easily get all duties repealed on the importation of beans, peas, lentils, linseed, oil cake, Indian corn, and anything else that cattle will eat, keeping at the same time their duties on wheat, barley, and oats."

"Instead, then, of pottering about the malt duty, why do they not take the bolder and better course?"

"The growers of beans and peas might, and ought, to consume their own; whilst the occupiers of grass lands and light poor soils would be benefited beyond description by such a measure. Do, Sir, act the part of the real farmers' friend, and enforce this mode of affording relief, or give some good reason against it."

"How are the Norfolk occupiers of poor soils (Mr. Hudson and others) to compete with foreigners in Smithfield? or how are they to grow wheat at 22s. a sack, unless the means are afforded them to fatten their beasts at a cheaper rate, and to grow eight or nine instead of six or seven sacks of wheat to the acre?"

Now, impudent and ignorant as is the class to which the Duke of Buckingham and Mr. S. O'Brien belong, we do not believe they would dare in these days to ask for the repeal of the duties on pulses and Indian corn, retaining those on wheat, barley, and oats; the whole system will, therefore, stand or fall together. Farmers will continue to find one pocket robbed in an attempt to enrich the other, but which, in fact, never has succeeded, because the landlords intercept the extra price, when there is any, on the human food, while the farmers sustain all the loss upon the food for stock.

SOFTENING DOWN THE FARMERS.

Our readers will remember the correspondence between Messrs. Acland and Dickinson, the members for West Somerset, and their rural constituents, on agricultural protection; and the following passage from the Dorset County Chronicle—Mr. George Banks's organ—shows the childish twaddle with which the squires fancy they can smooth down the angry backs of their deluded tenant-farmer constituents:—

"It would be highly indiscreet on the part of the agriculturists, and be very like the temper we frequently see manifested by a child who, because the piece of toast offered is not so large as it desires, refuses to have any at all. It is better to take the diminished protection accorded, and to abide as patiently as may be the term of suffering transition, until things shall have again attained a level, and in the assurance that improvement will be gradual and certain, than to rush into the arms of those who have loudly and repeatedly declared their determination to remove every remnant of protection. Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Acland, and Mr. Dickinson are, unquestionably, well-disposed towards the agricultural interest. Sincere though mistaken friends, they injure from erroneous impressions, not from wilful desire. Not such are the Leaguers and Free-Traders, who constitute the alternative, and who are, we presume, the 'implacable enemies' spoken of in Mr. Sealey's letter."

"Let the conduct and proceedings of the members for West Somerset be carefully and candidly reviewed from their first appearance on the hustings; and we think there will be little reason for diminished confidence. There may be—doubtless there are—important questions on which they have acted adversely to the opinions and wishes of the majority of those whose votes placed them at the head of the poll. But there is no room to question the integrity of their course, or to doubt that they have been guided by a sincere conviction that they were acting for the best. They have broken no promise; forfeited no pledge; departed from no principle; and it would savour little of justice towards them were those who have hitherto supported them to turn aside under the pressure of temporary impulse, and, on account of differences on questions, not of principle but of degree and detail, to prove unkindly of those just claims to confidence which may be based upon their general conduct and their maintenance of the principles they have declared."

"The position of the agriculturists is certainly a painful and difficult one; and, in whatever direction they look, forbearance is required; but the question to which we have called their consideration is one of easy solution."

It is wonderful with what calm and philosophical minds the political landlords call upon their tenant-farmer dupes "to abide patiently a term of suffering until things have attained a level," while the said political squires are basking in the sunshine of Ministerial patronage!

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, April 19, 1845.

A sack of Australian wheat has been sent to us, accompanied by a note requesting us to advocate the claims of the South Australian colonies to be allowed to send corn to England on the same terms as Upper and Lower Canada. On examining the specimen, and comparing it with the corn imported from Germany and the United States, we are convinced that the South Australian colonies could come advantageously into the British market as sellers of corn under a system of perfectly Free Trade. The Australian farmers do not ask for the maintenance of discriminating duties in their favour; they declare that, if they had an open market, they could rival and more than rival the American, the German, and the Russian, in the cheap production of food; and they very naturally ask why the favour shown to Canada is not extended to the British possessions in the Southern Ocean. To the grazing agriculturists of England the Australians proffer an important advantage: they declare that their climate is peculiarly favourable to the growth of maize, an article of the highest importance in the feeding of cattle. Not only does our wicked protective system injure one colony for the advantage of another, but it gives unfair protection to one set of agriculturists at the expense of another: all those who are engaged in the breeding and fattening of cattle are limited in their markets for the purchase of food and fodder. As fatted cattle are to all intents and purposes manufactured articles, the graziers may justly complain of the tax that is imposed on the raw materials of their manufacture.

The agricultural societies of India are also pressing their claims for the admission of Indian wheat into the ports of Great Britain on the same terms as Canadian; but it is the misfortune of our fellow-subjects in India that their voice can only reach the Legislature through the avenues of Lendenhall-street, and there is not a more mercenary body of monopolists on the face of the earth than the Court of Directors. To save their own infamous monopoly of salt, they would without hesitation sacrifice the interests and the honour both of Great Britain and India. It is the obvious dictate of common sense that there should be no differential duties between colony and colony, but that all should be allowed to share alike in the favour and markets of their common country. But the Lords of Lendenhall-street dread the full development of the great agricultural resources of British India, and submit to the preference displayed to Canada from sheer dislike of any improvement in Hindustan.

It used to be the constant excuse for the vast sums of money annually voted to defray the expense of colonies, that these colonies would furnish growing and profitable markets for British manufactures;—we may at some future time expose the hollowness and invalidity of this pretence, but let us admit it for the present, and inquire why this professed policy is violated by preventing these colonies from becoming purchasers of our goods, by excluding their produce from our markets? The Australian colonies purchase chiefly from Great Britain, but they neither can, nor will, continue to do so if their powers of purchase are fettered and restricted by the continuance of discriminating duties. It is not generally known that great numbers of Germans annually emigrate to Australia, chiefly from Mecklenburgh, Bremen, Holstein, East Prussia, and the Polish frontier. These men have no hereditary prejudices and no old associations to render them enamoured of British rule or of British goods; should fiscal regulations render our sovereignty odious, or our articles of exchange inconvenient, they are very likely to look for their supply of administrators and manufacturers in another direction.

It is gratifying to find the principles of Free Trade ably advocated and warmly greeted in all the agricultural associations that have been formed in South Australia. The principles of economic truth are spreading over the whole face of the globe; and the only spot that seems yet involved in gloom is that on which the Houses of Parliament are erected.

REASON AND KINDNESS. The language of reason unaccompanied by kindness will often fail of making an impression: it has no effect on the understanding, because it touches not the heart. The language of kindness unassociated with reason will frequently be unable to persuade: because though it may gain upon the affections, it wants that which is necessary to convince the judgment. But let reason and kindness be united in a discovery, and seldom will even pride or prejudice find it easy to resist it.—Globe.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—A discussion took place in the French Chamber of Peers on Monday, relative to a petition presented from 93 inhabitants of Marseilles against certain doctrines professed in the College of France against the Catholic religion. Count Montalembert said, "M. Quinet, one of the teachers, had published a work in contradiction with history, the Catholic religion, and real Christian philosophy, and when such doctrines were used, was it to be wondered at if the heads of families got alarmed for the instruction of their children?" Another peer accused the Government of being the cause of the scandals on religion. After some remarks by the Minister of Public Instruction, disapproving of the course pursued by certain of the professors, the Chamber rejected the petition, and proceeded to the order of the day. The Chamber of Deputies, on Tuesday, was occupied with the Savings' Banks Bill, to which much opposition is made. The chief clauses are, to diminish the amount of weekly deposit; to lower the maximum that any one depositor could hold; and to enlarge the time of notice of withdrawal. The latter clause is proposed with a view to prevent any derangement of the finances by a sudden withdrawal of deposits in case of a money panic.

The Chamber of Peers, on Friday the 11th inst., after a warm debate, agreed to the clause in the Negro Emancipation Bill, by which a negro slave in the French colonies is in future to be permitted to purchase his freedom on certain conditions. An amendment proposed by Count Beugnot was also carried, by which an enfranchised negro slave is permitted to choose the employer for whom he is to labour for hire during five years after his emancipation. The Débats shows that, from the smallness of a day's wages and the large price fixed upon the slave, this privilege is not likely to advance, save to a very small extent, the freedom of the negro in the French colonies.

In the Chamber of Deputies the proposition of M. Larlandier for putting an end to duelling has been read, and the 26th fixed for taking it into consideration.

The Patrie states that a letter has been received from a gentleman attached to the embassy to China, which removes all doubt of M. Maynard having been murdered by the Malays. According to this letter, Admiral Cécille has taken vengeance on the offenders. The chief and a great number of Malays are said to have been killed.

The Constitutionnel publishes a second note addressed by M. Guizot to the Swiss Vorort, in which he expresses a friendly disposition towards Switzerland, and his profound respect for the independence of the Confederation.

SPAIN.—It is stated that a bill recognising Isabella II. as Queen of Spain, and approving the sale of church property, is to be published at Rome on the 28th instant.

BRUSSELS.—On Friday last the Tribunal of Correctional Police of Brussels sentenced Count Goblet and Baron d'Hooqvorst to two months' imprisonment, and 200fr. fine, for fighting a duel. The seconds were also tried, but were acquitted. M. Goblet is the son of one of the Belgian Ministers.

DRESDEN, April 6.—The members of the Dutch Catholic Church assembled here to day, in public worship, for the first time. The sermon was preached by the celebrated Herr Ronge. The congregation received communion under both species.

Princess Esthery has established at Vienna a society for the reception and reformation of convicts of both sexes, after their liberation from prison. It is the first institution of this kind organized in Germany, and more than two thousand of the Austrian nobility have subscribed towards its formation.

UNITED STATES.—The royal mail steam ship Cambria arrived at Liverpool on Sunday from Boston and Halifax, after a passage of little more than nine days from the latter port, bringing 121 passengers, and letters and papers from New York to the 31st ultimo, Boston to the 1st, and Halifax to the 3rd inst. Annexation, and the measures likely to grow out of it, continued to absorb a large portion of public attention. Advice had been received from Texas, which state that the Texian executive is hostile to annexation as selected by the United States, with President Tyler at its head. The intelligence of the passage of the resolution by the Senate had been received at Galveston, and it was received with much disapprobation by the people generally, and the press was particularly strong in its denunciations of the proposition, whilst the National Register, the official organ, publishes an article said to have been written by the President of Texas, positively denying that Texas will be annexed to the United States upon any terms. The New York papers state that commissioners will be immediately despatched from the United States to meet others from Texas, for the purpose of negotiating a treaty, which, if successful, must be ratified by two-thirds of the members of the United States Senate, which in the present state of affairs it is impossible to obtain. Respecting the Oregon question there is nothing in the papers now before us. The intelligence carried out from England by the Cambria, of the new tariff proposed by Sir Robert Peel, had given a great impetus to American commerce, and had very much raised the price of cotton and other commodities, the duty on which was repealed.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH ENGLAND.—It is now certain, from the best information, that Mr. Pakenham, the British Minister, has received instructions to open negotiations for a new commercial treaty with this country, and we really hope our Government may meet him half way at least. No doubt the next arrival from Europe will bring us a general explosion from the Opposition benches in Parliament, against the letter of Mr. Calhoun, and the Queen's speech may have some reference to the same subject; but, as Mr. Calhoun has now left the Cabinet, nothing can grow out of it to mar the successful issue of these negotiations, and the formation of a new treaty, beneficial to our agricultural, and without any adverse bearing on our manufacturing, interests.—New York Herald.

CANADA.—The new Customs Duties Bill had been passed again in the Canadian Ministry. Parliament was to be prorogued on the 24th ultimo.—A riot, accompanied with loss of life, had taken place at St. John's. The military were called out. Religious jealousies are said to have caused it.

THE KING OF PRUSSIA.—The Manheim Journal publishes a letter from Berlin, of the 7th inst., which states that much excitement prevailed in that city, in consequence of an attempt having been made by an individual, who has been arrested, to wound the King, by striking him with a stone when leaving his palace.

The small but industrious town of Graus, in Arragon, is threatened with annihilation. A portion of the corn, rock at the foot of which it is seated has, from the effects of the thaw after the long-continued frost, begun to separate to the extent of 15,500 cubic metres, or 20,000 cubic yards. The whole of the inhabitants, seeing the impending danger, have left their houses, many of them taking their furniture with them. An engineer, employed by the municipality, has surveyed the mountain, and reported that there are no means of preventing the fall.

INUNDATIONS IN GERMANY.—The Revue de Paris states that the greatest inundations of which Germany has during two centuries preserved the recollection were those of 1655 and of 1784; nevertheless, neither of those events was so disastrous as the inundations of the present year. The entire Germanic confederation, a part of Austria, and of Poland, have been literally under water since the 30th of March. The Rhine, the Maine, the Neckar, the Danube, the Elbe, and the Vistula, have in succession overflowed their banks, not in a day, but in an hour. Frankfurt, Mentz, Cologne, Dresden, Prague, and a number of other towns, and several thousand villages, were covered with water. The magnificent bridge of Dresden has been carried away, and many edifices have been destroyed. In the midst of the general desolation, public charity has not remained inactive. Committees have been formed in the cities, and assistance has been afforded in every direction. At the head of the committees are inscribed the names of kings, princes, ministers, generals, provincial governors, and bishops. One committee collected at Berlin, between the 1st and 7th of April, 104,792 thalers (£16,000 British).

DOMESTIC.

PUBLIC PARKS IN MANCHESTER.—A deputation from the Manchester committee for providing public parks and walks, last week waited on Sir Robert Peel to solicit a grant of public money in aid of the subscription being raised in that town for that purpose. Sir Robert Peel declined to propose to Parliament any fresh grant, but offered them the sum of £3000, which they considered so inadequate that they respectfully declined to accept it until they had consulted the body by whom they were delegated.

A man named Couchman, styled the Sussex Prophet, is effecting, it is said, wonderful cures among the people near Horsham. It is asserted that as many as fifty persons flock to him a day, and that he sends them all away cured, or at least believing themselves to be so. The lame walk, the deaf hear, and the dumb speak; surely, Mr. Greatorex walks the earth again! The Mesmerists should hide their diminished heads, or make common cause with Mr. Couchman, who bids fair to outdo them all.—Times.

A woman, named Jane Bell, has been committed to Lincolnshire gaol on a charge of causing the death of her husband, Edward Bell, a carrier, by arsenic. The parties lived at a village called Lacey, near Grimby, in Lincolnshire, where the deceased died on the 25th ult., as was proved by a post mortem examination, from arsenic. The evidence against the accused is altogether circumstantial. She is to be tried at the next assizes.

At the Central Criminal Court, Margaret Dooley was convicted of stealing a child named John Swan, aged 11 weeks, and transported for seven years.

On Thursday, the 10th inst., a melancholy accident occurred at Thoruley Colliery, Durham. A cage, containing nine men, was ascending the pit, when, instead of being stopped as soon as it had reached the bank, it was raised to the top of the crane, or beam, with which it came forcibly in contact, and two men were thrown out and precipitated down the shaft, and dashed to pieces. The other seven persons, by clinging to the cage, were providentially saved from the impending danger.

Prince Albert has composed a new anthem, entitled "Out of the deep have I called thee." It was rehearsed for the first time on the 26th ult. in St. George's Chapel. Her Majesty was present, and expressed her delight at the composition; and of course everybody praised it as a chef d'œuvre.

As a proof of the decrease of pauperism, there was not one application for relief at Ecclethall Bierlow union workhouse on Wednesday for that township, which contains a population of 30,000, and only five re-applications for the whole of the Ecclethall union, which comprises seven townships.—Derby Mercury.

Of the children employed in the mill of Mr. Gardner, of Preston, when the hours of labour were twelve daily, the average number who attended an evening school was twenty-seven. At the present time, when the working hours have, for a year, been only eleven, the number attending school in an evening is ninety-six.—Preston Guardian.

The warehouse connected with the flax and tow mill occupied by Mr. Foster, in Caton, near Lancaster, was, with nearly all its contents, consumed on Friday morning by fire.

The cotton factory occupied by Mr. John Heap, Brook-street, Macclesfield, was destroyed by fire last week. The loss of property destroyed is estimated at £10,000.

Prince Albert is expected to lay the foundation-stone of the agricultural college at Cirencester.—Gloucester Chronicle.

Sheep-stealing is greatly on the increase in Somersetshire.

Wednesday forenoon, the Dutch steam-packet Batavier, Captain Dunlop, arrived alongside the St. Katharine's steam-packet wharf, east side of the Tower, from Rotterdam. She had a considerable number of cabin passengers, and an excellent cargo, principally consisting of 47 live cows and oxen in prime condition, and a large quantity of Dutch salmon and turbot, poultry, &c.

Sarah Freeman, the perpetrator of the hideous murders at Shipwick, will be executed on the 23rd. On being removed from the dock, the prisoner broke out into furious invectives against the witnesses, the jury, and the judge, deprecating, in coarse terms, the sentence pronounced upon her. globe is fixed upon the proceedings of the League, because they believe that in that body is the chief hope of the friends of humanity for effecting the removal of those restrictions on industry which have ever been the chief source of hostilities between nations, and substituting for these unfriendly relations the bonds of mutual interest, uniting nations in amity by the ties of equal justice and equal advantage. The first claimant of fellowship in the holy cause of Peace and Civilization, which the League has been formed to promote, is Mr. Biddle, of Philadelphia, who claims their acquaintance in the following letter of introduction:—

24, Regent-street, April 17, 1845.

MY DEAR SIR,—I beg leave to enclose a draught for £10, which has been remitted to me by my esteemed friend C. C. Biddle, Esq., of Philadelphia, as his contribution to the Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar.

Mr. Biddle, in his letter to me dated the 29th ult., says—"For more than a quarter of a century I have believed and contended that nothing can be of greater moment to the human family than enlightenment on the subject of political economy, or 'Free Trade' as its master principle. I, therefore, claim fellowship with your noble efforts in England in this great cause, and ask to be allowed to throw in my humble mite to the common treasury, and request you to subscribe for me the amount of the enclosed bill, £10 sterling, as a contribution to the Free-Trade Bazaar, to be held in May next at Covent-garden, in London. I have already received most ample returns for this investment, in the perusal of the richly-freighted numbers of the LEAGUE and ECONOMIST you so kindly send me, and to which I also endeavour to give all the circulation within my reach."

Mr. Biddle writes in great admiration of the exertions which you, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Bright, and others are making in the promotion of Free Trade; and I shall be obliged if you will address a note to me, which I may send to Mr. Biddle, in acknowledgment of his very handsome donation.

Believe me, dear Sir, very truly yours,

THOMAS THORNTON.

Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.

The next letter to which we have to direct attention is from Hobart Town, in Van Diemen's Land; it relates to the exclusion of Australian corn by our present iniquitous tariff,—a subject which we discussed in the Postscript of our last paper, and which Mr. Hunt has undertaken to bring under the consideration of Parliament:—

Hobart Town, June 14, 1844.

SIR,—Having engaged to make a cargo, and the first shipment, of wheat flour from this colony to England, I am prompted to address you on the subject of duty now levied on all flour entering British ports, excepting from Canada.

Undoubtedly the product of the wheat of Tasmania will equal in quality any that can be produced in any part of the globe, and in every Australian market it commands the highest price; but in consequence of our younger colonies raising their own supplies, which hitherto they obtained from us, the energies of our settlers are wasted by producing an abundance of one of the chief necessities of life, which brings them no return from not having a market to offer it for sale or barter.

I may, ere I proceed further, give you a brief statement of the prices of wheat in this colony from the year 1838 to 1841. Wheat averaged in 1838, 8s. 9d. per bushel; 1839, 26s.; 1840, 9s.; 1841, 7s. The impetus given by the high price of 1839 to the clearing of land for wheat increased the quantity under crop in 1838, which was 41,759 acres, to 63,731 in 1841, being an increase in that period of more than fifty per cent. of land under wheat, in the short space of two years; while our population, bond and free inclusive, only increased 5412 during the four years above named, which will easily account for the enormous surplus stock of wheat for which the agriculturist had no consumer. On my arrival in the colony in Nov. 1841, wheat was selling at 7s.; but from that period to the present it has gradually declined in price, till it has settled at 3s. 6d. for the best samples; but wheat may be purchased at 2s. 9d. per bushel of 64lbs.

This state of things has compelled the settler, to enable him to meet his engagements, to go on increasing his breadth of wheat, till we have now a surplus of nearly one million bushels! and the question is—Where shall we find a market for our wheat? "Ship it to England," says one; but we cannot insure it under 10s. or 12s. "Then, grind it into flour," says another; but there we are met by that brazen barrier the tariff, and we know not how to break it down, for until it is demolished we cannot get our flour into an English market. The object of the merchant is not so much to make a profit as to make remittances at par, in produce, instead of bills, which are too often doubtful. The mutual benefit of this mode of payment is too obvious to admit of an argument in its support, and it would be unpardonable to take up your valuable time in enlarging on this point. From the present reduced rate of wages, our colonists can compete with any wheat-growing country, taking quality into consideration, which may be accounted for by the peculiar congeniality of the climate to mature the ripening process, and also its freedom from humidity of atmosphere.

The question now is, Sir—Will you help us to get our flour into London on the same terms as Canadian flour?

We want no protection or favour of any kind, but to be placed on an equal footing with our brethren of the northern hemisphere—Canada.

The cargo to which I allude will be shipped, per Gazelle, for London, and will sail from hence in about two months, when I will again take the freedom of addressing you.

My apology for this intrusion, being an utter stranger to you, is the almost despairing circumstances of the agriculturists of Van Diemen's Land.

Leaving the matter in your hands, and entreating your consideration,

I beg to subscribe myself, Sir, your humble servant,
Richard Cobden, Esq.

GEO. REES.

The third letter relates to one of the many monopolies established during the most disgraceful period of British history—the reign of Charles II. It is dated, as our readers will perceive, from the Sandwich Islands, and affords at once a proof of the wide surface over which monopoly has extended its grasp, and the equally wide diffusion of hope and confidence in the League, as the great means by which Free Trade and equal justice are to be obtained. It is through this company alone that we have any connexion with the Oregon territory; and before this nation permits its rulers to involve the country in war for the sake of a trackless waste, it would be well to consider whether the retention of the Oregon involves the profits of a monopolist company, or the general advantage of the British nation.

Wahoo, Sandwich Islands, August 1, 1844.

SIR,—It has often been to me a matter of surprise that none of our manufacturers have taken notice of the Hudson's Bay Company's monopoly. At the present time, when our manufacturing poor are so badly off for want of employment, I should suppose that the attention of every one connected with manufactures would be looking out for a market where they could dispose of their goods; and yet no one has ever, as far as I can learn, turned their attention to the monopoly of that rich and influential company. It is well known that the charter granted to the "Company of Adventurers of England trading to the Hudson's Bay," by Charles II., has never been confirmed by Act of Parliament. By that charter they were allowed the exclusive privilege of trading to the countries whose waters emptied into the Hudson's Bay. They have now extended their trade to the shores of the Pacific, from whence they have driven all other traders. The public derive no benefit from their monopoly; on the contrary, the revenue suffers, as a great proportion of the peltry brought from the Colombia River, where they have one of their principal establishments, is purchased from the American hunters and trappers, and entered in London as coming from British possessions. The profits of their trade have been enormous, as may be proved by the dividends and bonuses. They appoint their own Governor, who is always a partner in the association; his will is law, and all disputes in the territory claimed by the company are settled according to his dictum. The magistrates in that vast extent of territory (equal to two-thirds of Europe) are also partners; and it is not to be supposed that in cases of dispute they will lean towards the party or parties opposed to the interests or caprice of the company. If this trade was thrown open to the public, and a governor and magistrates were appointed by the Crown, the quantity of British manufactures consumed by the Indians would be ten times as much as at the present period: there being no competition, the company pay the Indians just what they think proper, and the latter are obliged to get their supplies from them. There are many of our enterprising countrymen in Canada who would (if the trade was open) soon form trading companies, and would be joined by many who are at present clerks in the service of the company, and who are well acquainted with the habits and customs of the Indians; thus a profitable and lucrative trade would be soon opened. Not only the manufacturer, but the shipowner would also be benefited by the opening of this trade. On the score, also, of humanity, something requires to be done; and there is no doubt, if an inquiry were to be made into the acts of the company's servants during the last twenty or thirty years, many circumstances would be brought to light which would show the necessity of our Government appointing a governor and stipendiary magistrates for the protection, not only of the aborigines, but of the common people in the company's service.

I have taken the liberty of addressing you in hopes that you, or some of your friends, will bring the subject before the House of Commons, and that the monopoly enjoyed by the company may be repealed, and the trade, hitherto scarcely known, thrown open to the public.

I am, Sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

RICHARD CHARLTON.

A British subject residing at the Sandwich Islands.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Tenth Week, ending Saturday, April 26.

The Maynooth Bill has once more absorbed the attention of Parliament, to the exclusion of everything else, with the exception of private business, and some debate in both Houses on railway legislation. The division on Saturday morning, in favour of the second reading of the Maynooth Bill, was larger than had been generally anticipated; and there was also a large majority on Thursday night against the proposition of Mr. Ward, that the increased grant should be taken from the funds of the Irish Protestant Establishment. We see nothing, however, which calls for our special notice, or to add to our observations of last week under this head. The present Parliament can never resume its former position; and though, undoubtedly, public feeling may subside on this question before another general election, still Free-Trade should not for a moment forget that with them is the resolution of the great fact, whether or not the next general election carries Free Trade.

THE BAZAAR.

CONTRIBUTIONS AND CORRESPONDENCE.

Norman Wilkinson, Esq., 15, Regent-street, has presented to the Free-Trade Bazaar two handsomely-bound volumes of Sketches, of which he says,—"These sketches, 126 in number, were submitted to the Queen previously to the Masked Ball given at Buckingham Palace in May, 1842. On some of them are memoranda made by her Majesty. There is one sketch in pencil made by his Royal Highness Prince Albert."

"GENTLEMEN,—Enclosed is my contribution of £10, either to the League Fund or to the Bazaar, as you may think the most proper. I wish it were in my power to give twenty times the sum for helping forwards the fall of that wicked and mischief-working Babel Tower against which you are so nobly leading the conflict."

"My own publications are all theological, except one upon geology. It has been honoured with the favourable opinion of the most distinguished geologists both in our country and in the United States, and has gone through three London editions and one American. As soon as I can go to town this week, I propose to order six copies, and to write in each, for your Bazaar."

"That the mercy and justice of the Most High may grant glorious success to your efforts for the good of our country and of all other nations, is the heart's desire and prayer of,

Your friend and fellow-servant,
J. P. SMITH.
Geo. Wilson, Esq., or other gentlemen directing the A.-C.-L. League."

"MY DEAR COBDEN,—I send you my humble contribution to the Free-Trade Bazaar (10). My children will furnish some work.—Yours truly, R. COBDEN, Esq., M.P."

We have received from the ladies of Cleckheaton, through Mrs. Dixon, a beautiful silk purse with sixteen sovereigns enclosed, as a contribution to the Bazaar.

"DEAR SIR,—In this district of London we go on with great vigour, and, I am happy to say, with the best success. The kind of goods to be sent from hence will, in most part, consist of fancy cabinet work, uniting both usefulness and elegance; and, as we are to have a stall for this district, we hope to make a good figure in this branch of national skill and industry."

"Several kind friends, who did not find it convenient to make anything themselves, have been pleased to give pecuniary contributions, to enrich our Hoxton stall with additional specimens of beautiful workmanship, which I am procuring for it. Others have contributed other articles. Dr. Baker, of the New North-road, has given perfumery; Mrs. Wells, of Pittfield-street, embroidery, &c. &c.; the workmen of our neighbour, Mr. Stevenson, will give gratuitous workmanship for a variety of elegant articles; my own people are busily at work, taking a day now and again, and generally two or three hours of each day, to work for the Bazaar; and since I undertook the duty of ladies' secretary for the district of Hoxton, I have lost no time in exhorting friends, and reasoning with the unwilling. The last, however, is uphill work; and it is surprising to see persons, whose whole business depends on the prosperity of trade, so unwilling to understand the duty they owe to themselves and to their neighbours."

"We shall not equal the magnificent contributions of the great towns of the steam-engines and the factories, where your richest inhabitants are doing what we of the humbler kind are doing here; yet we of the humbler kind are resolved for the good of trade, upon which we are wholly dependent, and for the honour of our part of London, to do our best."

"We are not political; but in the cabinet-making trade we feel that the reduction of the duties on the finer kinds of wood in 1812, and the abolition of the duties in 1843, have done us great service. Whoever may speak ill of Sir Robert Peel, the cabinet-makers should be grateful to him. He is always well spoken of in my house."

"We are not political, and care not who are in or who out; but we know when we have good trade, and when we have bad trade; and we do presume sometimes to inquire why it is that we have not always good trade."

"We are not political; yet we can feel the difference between bread at sixpence a loaf and bread at a shilling a loaf: the more so as we have always had trade when bread is dear. And we do presume to ask why it is that trade is sometimes so very bad and provisions so very dear."

"We are not political; yet somehow, when sugar and tea have to be got, and we find the prices rising or falling, we do presume to inquire why the prices that have to be paid out of our own pockets rise and fall: the more especially as we make articles, the raw material for which comes from sugar-making countries, which articles go back there to be sold in considerable quantities, and would go in greater quantities if they could pay for them in sugar. And, though not political, we do presume to think that sugar good and cheap, and trade steady and good, would be good for us."

"And lastly, though not political, we can see that all people who live by their own industry are better customers to the butchers' shops which support the farmers, and to the grocers' shops which support somebody else, when bread is of moderate price, and trade good."

"Not to add to the bustle at Covent-garden, and to save our goods from the chance of being injured by rough handling, which will hardly be avoided in every case, we shall keep them here until the stalls are allotted, and then take them and put them on our Hoxton stall, without trouble to the servants of the League.—I am respectfully,

"A. W. Paulton, Esq."

"H. BINKS.

"3, Helmsley-terrace, Hackney.
"DEAR SIR,—Cordially approving the objects of your League, and admiring the wisdom of its plans in educating the public mind on the question of monopoly, I am anxious to contribute something to its Bazaar. Some time ago my honoured friend, Rev. Dr. Thompson, of Coldstream—to whose untiring energy we mainly owe the abolition of bible-printing monopoly in Scotland,—presented to me a splendid copy of the 'Self-interpreting Bible,' produced by the labours of the Free Scottish Bible Society. That bible, with the cordial permission of my esteemed friend the donor, I now place at your disposal; and I hope it may come into the hands of some person who, amid other advantages from its perusal, shall learn to carry out the principles of its sublime morality into every department of civil and social life.

"This voluntary offering—with an assurance that your cause shall have, as you are aware it has had, the earnest and constant advocacy of the 'Christian Examiner'—is the only mode in which, at present, I can testify my approval of the benevolence of your objects, and the wisdom of your plans.
"With sincere respect and esteem,
"Yours very truly,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq."

"JAMES CARLILE.

"66, Red Lion-street, Clerkenwell.

"DEAR SIR,—Believing, as we do, that the inhabitants of this division of the great metropolis are fully unprejudiced, independent, and enlightened enough to be hearty Free-Traders, it would have gratified us to have seen one stall in the forthcoming exhibition devoted to the sale of samples of the vast amount of jewellery, plate, and watch manufacture for which the district is so widely and justly celebrated.

"As an offering to the Free-Trade Bazaar, it is the intention of our firm to present you with a specimen of a gold watch of a somewhat novel construction, lately registered by Mr. W. H. Jackson (it is styled the 'registered solitaire watch'). The prominent features of its peculiar merit are, flatness, and greatly superior economy in the expense of construction, in combination with the most recent excellent improvements of principle.

"With the hope that this attempt to illustrate a particular article of manufacture (for which, London, and this locality especially, has ever been famous) may be the means of inducing others in the same branch of production to enrich your Bazaar with the efforts of their talent,
"We beg to remain, your obedient servants,
"H. JACKSON and SON.

"Geo. Wilson, Esq."

"Brown's-lane, Spital-square.

"SIR,—As an humble tribute to the good cause of Free Trade in which you are engaged, I intend to send to the Bazaar for exhibition and sale, a small double washing machine, price £6, the excellency of which I believe to excel everything of the kind yet invented for that purpose; in proof of which I have received from numerous respectable customers most flattering testimonials in its favour. As a specimen of this most useful domestic machine must be acceptable to all parties, I hope it will be favourably received. I have larger and smaller machines on the same excellent principle.
"I am, most respectfully, &c.,
"George Wilson, Esq."

"R. FRYER.

"DEAR SIR,—I shall have much pleasure in contributing to the Bazaar a new machine, which, although of a scientific nature, will, I am sure, interest many; it is called a spirometer, and is the production of a Dr. Hutchinson, of London, an intimate friend of my brother the object of this instrument). I, perhaps, had better give a short outline of its use. I believe it is to ascertain the amount (in cubic inches) of air which can be expired, and by this means ascertain whether disease exists in the lungs. Dr. Hutchinson, I understand, has made a large number of experiments, and has been able to establish pretty accurately the amount of air which should be expired by a person in health.—I mean one whose lungs are not affected,—and I believe he has invariably found this to be a most certain one in consumption and other chest diseases. The chief beauty of this instrument appears to me to be that it will enable the medical attendant, or even the parent of the delicate child, to detect whether any disease does exist in the lungs, and thereby be enabled to adopt preventive means to stay off the disease before it has commenced.

"Being ignorant of the medical science, I trust the above rather original attempt at an explanation will be pardoned. I mean to send, also, a number of copies of a paper which Dr. Hutchinson has published on the matter; and I may, perhaps, be allowed to add, how important an effect the existence of perfect Free Trade, and the free communication of nation with nation, would have in disseminating this, and the innumerable valuable discoveries which are daily made in this country, in France, and elsewhere. Believe me ever yours, very faithfully,

"WM. GRAMAM.

"Brighton.

"RESPECTED FRIEND,—It is with much pleasure I can report that four ladies from this town have kindly consented to assist at the Sussex stall during the Bazaar, and that Mrs. E. Goulty has been appointed secretary to the Ladies' Committee. Our contributions will consist chiefly of useful and ornamental ladies' work, wax flowers, cases of Sussex algae, mosses, chalk fossils; a quantity of shell-work beautifully made up into work-baskets, cushions, cases; and water-colour sketches of local views. In addition for the occasion, by Horatio Smith, Esq. (lithographic facsimiles of the original), in an envelope with an appropriate design, and twelve copies of Mrs. Loudon's valuable work on 'Philanthropic Economy,' which have been presented to our committee by the authoress, with a line from our friends at Hastings and Hoveham, where they will forward their contributions direct to London, which, with those from other parts of the county, we have requested to be directed for the 'Sussex stall,' which I hope will prove that an agricultural county, though boasting itself of the names of Richmond and Wyndham, takes as lively an interest in the national prosperity as the commercial and manufacturing towns of the north, though its contributions may not be on so grand a scale.

"Geo. Wilson, Esq."

"I am, respectfully,
"ISAAC GRAY BASS.

"SIR,—In marking a very small lot of timber on my little farm, at Battle, I have selected an oak, which, in addition to my other small aids to the League and its Bazaar, I intend to contribute.

"As I cannot well forward it to Covent-garden, I will account with the Committee for its value on sale. Grown in the shade of protection, and fetching only a protection price, I cannot promise that it will realize much. It is not a very large tree, but a very fair-grown one, and no discredit to its county, Sussex.
"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq."

"G. DUKE.

"Stockport.

"SIR,—It is not in our power to say exactly, at the present moment, what this town will do in aid of the Bazaar; but, as near as we can estimate, it will contribute, in money and articles, to the amount of about £300. The Mayor has given £10, and we expect several others to give the same; J. D. Fernley, Esq., £5, and we have many smaller sums. The hands in the employ of Mr. Hollins have subscribed above £20, besides giving labour to the amount of £10, in bleaching cloth given by several manufacturers. In several manufactories subscriptions have commenced, and will do in others before this week ends.

"Mr. Hollins gives fifty pieces of long, broad, fine cloth, of a valuable description. Mr. Orrell, Messrs. Eskridge and Co., Messrs. Woolley and Co., Messrs. Higson and Littlewood, Mr. H. Hunt, Mr. T. Stewart, and other manufacturers, give quantities of cloth. Mr. Moody gives about £10 worth of thread, in boxes of convenient size; Mr. Orrell, in addition to cloth, gives an elegant box, containing cotton, in all its stages of manufacture, at his mill; Mr. M. Clare, a fan, (used in the cotton manufacture) worth £5; Mr. Johnson, a dressing-case, and other articles; Mr. John Hamer, some shawls of his own manufacture.

"Besides the above, we hope to furnish many other articles of taste, elegance, and value.

"With best wishes that the Bazaar may answer every purpose contemplated by its promoters,
"I am, Sir, yours obediently,
"G. Wilson, Esq."

"HENRY W. SEFTON, Sec.

"Parkfield-cottage, near Stone, Staffordshire.

"DEAR SIR,—I this day send, in a parcel by railway, a damask table-cloth, which, according to the date marked in one of the corners, and which I have every reason to believe is correct, is 181 years old. It came into my possession as part of the property of a gentleman of Bristol, Mr. William Ford, with whom I resided from about two years old till his death; and who, through his mother, was the last representative of a respectable Quaker family of the name of Tyley, some of whom were living in Bath in the early part of the seventeenth century. I have also an old silver pepper-box, with the initials C T, Caleb and Love Tyley, who were probably the descendants of T T, the owners of the cloth.

"These circumstances are mentioned as rendering it probable that the date on the cloth, 1661, was the real date at the time of marking. I have myself a perfect recollection of the table-cloth for 60 years, in consequence of the impression made upon my mind as a child, by the figures represented upon it from Scripture history.

"Perhaps some of the manufacturers of modern table-linen may like to possess this ancient specimen of their craft; and I therefore with great pleasure send it, and the enclosed £5 in aid of the funds of the Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar.

"With the sincerest wish for the success of the great undertaking in which you are engaged, I am, dear Sir,
"Yours respectfully,
"SUSANNA MORGAN."

"Old Market, Halifax.

"DEAR SIR,—It is not in my power to do much in furtherance of the objects of the Bazaar, but in addition to my subscription, which has been the same this year as last, I have sent in to the receivers in this town a small contribution of Free-Trade silver thimbles, of beautiful workmanship, which I hope will be found useful in adding something to the common stock. Wishing you and your noble band of coadjutors complete success,
"I remain, dear Sir,
"With sincere respect, yours truly,
"Geo. Wilson Esq."

"JOSEPH WILSON.

"Mayerbold, Northampton.

"MY DEAR SIR,—In continuation of my note of the 11th, I beg to inform you I have canvassed Daventry, and succeeded in obtaining the contributions of three of the largest boot and shoe factors to the Bazaar, in addition to those of a number of manufacturers in this town.

"I am going to Wellingborough to-day. I enclose a list of the manufacturers who are preparing articles, and of parties who are using their energetic zeal for the promotion of this great cause, which is the object of the present extraordinary exertions making amongst the intelligent portion of the community.

"Twelve months ago I could not have believed such progress could have been made in this agricultural district; at that period I scarcely dare make myself known amongst the agriculturists; at the present time my society is looked upon with a more friendly eye, and their conversation more interestingly earnest and unprejudiced. I am sure, from all outward appearances, the time cannot be far distant of our success.
"Yours very truly,
"George Wilson, Esq."

"JOSEPH JONES.

"Dewsbury.

"DEAR SIR,—Referring to your several favours respecting the approaching National Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar, I have now the pleasure to inform you that, in aid of this excellent cause, both pecuniary contributions, and others of the staple manufactures of the town and neighbourhood, will be transmitted from this place. The enclosed resolutions passed at the last meeting, will show the estimation in which the eminent services of yourself and your distinguished colleagues are held. I cordially participate in them, and remain,
"Dear Sir, yours respectfully,
"George Wilson, Esq."

"THOMAS TOWN.

"Barnard Castle.

"SIR,—I am instructed by the committee of the carpet weavers in the employ of Messrs. Monkhouse and Co. to inform you that two splendid carpets are in progress, and expected to be finished in a few days, which they intend to present to the Bazaar. They are the production of the weavers, with the assistance of a few friends in the town; we trust you will reserve a place for them. You may rely upon us forwarding them in time, as you will receive them in London without any trouble, according to our arrangements.
"Yours most respectfully, for the committee,
"George Wilson, Esq."

"JNO. MONKHOUSE.

"Phoenix Iron Works, Stroud.

"DEAR SIR,—As intimated in our letter of yesterday, we have to-day sent off, carriage and delivery paid, a small box containing one each of 10-inch, 14-inch, and 18-inch 'improved screw wrenches,' the several prices of which are, 8s. 6d., 11s. 6d., 14s. 6d.; we have put tickets with price on all.

"The grass-cutter sent yesterday had no price marked on it, it should be called 'a 19-inch grass-cutter, price £7.' We hope the above will aid in wrenching the Corn Laws from those who maintain them; and are,
"Dear Sir, yours faithfully,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq."

"JNO. FERRADAT and SON.

"Bath.

"SIR,—I shall be happy to further the benevolent cause of Free Trade by presenting for your magnificent Bazaar 100 copies of the 'Manual of Phonography,' bound in roan, and gilt, price 2s. each; also 200 double sheets of phonographic wafers, from a very beautiful steel engraving,—value of the wafers £2 10s. Both of these articles having a good sale, I doubt not you will readily dispose of this number.

"As you express a wish that all books should have the autograph signature of the author, I shall be happy to attend to this injunction.
"Geo. Wilson, Esq."

"ISAAC PITMAN.

"Inverleith-row, Edinburgh.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your circular of the 3rd instant. I do most cordially wish that the efforts of yourself and colleagues in the war against monopoly may be crowned with complete success; and, as I cannot otherwise aid to ensure that most desirable result, I beg to enclose a post-office order for £5, as a contribution towards defraying the expenses of the approaching Bazaar.
"I am, my dear Sir, yours very truly,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq., &c. &c."

"A. ROSS.

"Leith.

"SIR,—I received your circular letter of the 3rd inst. When the appeal was made for the £100,000 fund I expected that no further contribution would be necessary to accomplish our object. In February, 1844, I subscribed £1, which was for me a large subscription, but I gave it with hearty good will, not wishing to be behind in so glorious a cause; and my doing so induced some to give more than they would otherwise have done. It was with regret that I found myself unable to reply to your former circular requesting a renewal of my subscription. Though I have not much in my power, yet, when I reflect upon the mass of destitution and misery in our land, and the deep responsibility that lies upon every man promptly and earnestly to do all he can to afford a remedy, I conceive I would not be doing my duty did I return no answer to your last letter; I therefore, though with an effort, yet with much pleasure, beg to hand you, enclosed, a post-office order for £1, as a contribution to the Bazaar.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
"George Wilson, Esq."

"JAN. DIOR.

On Monday a great demonstration in furtherance of the above truly national and patriotic design, which is to be carried into effect early next month, in Covent-garden Theatre, took place amongst the Free-Traders of the eastern district of the metropolis, at the New Globe tavern, Mile-end-road, on which occasion the gardens and pleasure grounds of that delightful place of recreation were thrown open, and its musical and other attractions put in requisition, to diversify and give effect and animation to the scene. The attendance of ladies was exceedingly numerous, and great interest was evinced by them in the "coming event," in which they were destined to take the most influential, if not the most active and laborious, part. After the promenade a soirée was held in the theatre attached to the grounds, at which refreshments suitable to the season were liberally dispensed.

The chair was taken by William Coates, Esq., supported by Colonel Fox, M.P., one of the representatives of the Tower Hamlets; Col. Thompson, Mr. Moore, and several of the most influential inhabitants of the district. Letters of apology from Dr. Bowring, M.P.; Mr. Bright, M.P.; Mr. Ewart, M.P.; Dr. Pye Smith, and several others, stating the various unforeseen circumstances which caused their absence, were read by the Chairman, who announced a donation of £10 from Dr. Pye Smith, towards the funds of the Bazaar, as well as several contributions in saleable articles, by Mrs. Smith. He then dwelt in an able speech on the objects of the Bazaar, which, he said, for extent and magnificence, would be unprecedented in the history of public exhibitions. He was aware that travellers were on their way from every part of Europe, anxious to communicate with the Free-Traders of this country, and to give effect to the mighty demonstration.

Colonel Fox next addressed the meeting, and said that, although he had never actually belonged to the Anti-Corn-Law League, yet he had long made up his mind on the subject of Free Trade, as he had shown by voting for the total and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) It would be remembered that he had had some hesitation on this subject at first, but that hesitation arose only from the question of time—but the time was long gone past—and he had voted as he described now, upwards of two years since. His object in coming among them this evening was partly on account of the very excited state of public feeling in that borough, and in other parts of the country, and partly from a desire to state explicitly his opinions on this subject. It was very far from his wish to introduce any other topic to their notice than that which they had met specially to consider; but he wished to show that, as far as lay in his power, he was anxious to co-operate with his friends and constituents in any matter in which they felt interested. (Cheers.)

Colonel Thompson, Mr. Moore, and other speakers, who ably enforced the principles and views of the Anti-

Corn-Law League, were heard with warm and unanimous applause.

A series of resolutions, pledging the meeting to co-operate in the furtherance of the Bazaar, were adopted; and the meeting separated, highly pleased as well as instructed by the proceedings.—Morning Advertiser.

BIRMINGHAM.

As the opening of the Bazaar is now near at hand, we would urge on manufacturers, and the friends of the cause generally, the necessity of forwarding specimens of their products to the parties appointed to receive them in Birmingham. We have much pleasure in stating that seventy manufacturers of the town and district have already sent some beautiful specimens of the industrial resources of Birmingham, and, with those which we hope this good example will yet call forth, we have no doubt the Birmingham stall in Covent-garden Theatre will be one of the most attractive.—Birmingham Journal.

BRIGHTON.

We have already announced that a committee was formed in this town for the purpose of collecting and receiving articles to be forwarded as the Brighton contribution to the "Sussex stall" at the forthcoming Bazaar to be held in Covent-garden Theatre. The committee, we are happy to say, have been successful in their efforts; they have enlisted the sympathies of the ladies, whose fair hands have produced many specimens of taste. Some of these consist of work-bags splendidly embroidered, pin-cushions of various shapes, but all exceedingly neat, work-baskets of velvet and shells got up in a pretty style, miniature houses of the same material, flower-stands, and numerous other articles, which, as the auctioneers say, are "too numerous to mention." They are all collected in a room in Prince Albert-street, to which we recently paid a visit, and where, in addition to what we have named, we saw many articles deserving of honourable notice. Amongst these was a case of fossils of the chalk formation, specimens of the European mosses, neatly arranged in books, and the various kinds labelled, and specimens of English mosses arranged in a similar manner; a tastefully got up marine grotto made of pebbles and shells and enclosed in a glass case; several small boats, one of them being a fakimite of a mackerel boat, with nets and rigging complete; a collection of Brighton pebbles polished, and a great variety of nic-nacs, which it would be tedious to describe. We must not, however, omit the mention of an original poem on Free Trade by Mr. Horace Smith, which has been lithographed so as to imitate the author's handwriting. Altogether the collection is a very creditable one; but we understand it will not be completed for several days. Contributions from Hastings and that neighbourhood are expected to the value of about £100.—Brighton Guardian.

ROCHDALE.

On Thursday last, a tea party and meeting were held in the Borough-hall, in aid of the League Bazaar. Mr. Fox was expected to attend, with Mr. Flint, of Leeds. The latter gentleman was present; but the former was prevented by illness. About 300 ladies and gentlemen sat down to tea. After tea, John Petrie, Esq., was called to the chair. The meeting was addressed by Mr. Thomas Flint, of Leeds, in a good practical speech; and by Messrs. William Littlewood and Charles Walker, of this town. The meeting broke up soon after nine o'clock.

The preparations for this great national exhibition have for some months past been making considerable progress in Rochdale. The inhabitants are as zealous as ever in the cause of Free Trade, and it is expected that their stall at the approaching Bazaar will far surpass the one they furnished at the Manchester Bazaar in 1842, and which then created so much attention. Cotton and woollen forming the great staple of Rochdale manufacture, the exhibition of articles in illustration of the ingenuity and industrial energies of the people will be of smaller variety, and of less novelty in their character, than those which many other towns will afford; but the inventive minds and active fingers of the ladies have more than compensated for this unavoidable deficiency. They have supplied a rich assortment of fancy articles: in these, everything which true taste can effect in the arrangement and choice of colours has been accomplished, and the rich forms which were made to assume all but equal the more fantastic beauties of nature. Articles of this description have not, however, been produced to the exclusion of those of a more useful kind; the necessities of the wardrobe may be supplied as well as the decorations of the drawing-room; in fact, goods of every description will be found at the stall, and it is believed that it will equal the anticipations of the most zealous friends of the cause. As many persons have assisted in this object who cannot attend the general Bazaar in Covent-garden, it has been determined to offer the whole of the contributions to view previous to forwarding them to London. This exhibition will take place in the Public Hall, Bailie-street, on Monday and Tuesday, the 28th and 29th inst.—Manchester Guardian.

LEEDS.

Among the vast and numerous contributions which are being got up for this grand national manifestation, our townsmen, Messrs. Dickenson and Son, brush-manufacturers, are preparing a considerable number of handsome fancy clothes-brushes, the first fancy clothes-brushes which we understand have been manufactured in this town,—with appropriate words on them, such as "Cobden," "Bright," "League," &c., ingeniously and neatly formed with black and white bristles. We have seen specimens of the brushes, and think them worthy of the object for which they are intended, and creditable to the manufacturer of them. We perceive that the ladies intend to exhibit the result of their labours at the Music-hall, on Tuesday and Wednesday, the 29th and 30th inst.; we shall be glad to see, in addition, a liberal supply of Yorkshire broad cloth.—Leeds Mercury.

LANCASTER.

It is now placed beyond a doubt that the Bazaar will be one of the most successful hits ever made by the League. Primely contributions have been promised from all the leading towns in the empire, and arrangements made for superintending their exhibition and sale in Covent-garden Theatre. The friends of Free Trade in Lancaster are actively engaged in making preparations, and the ladies are very zealous in the good cause.—Lancaster Guardian.

BRISTOL.

A public exhibition of the articles prepared in this city, for the approaching League Bazaar, will take place on Friday and Saturday next.—Bristol Mercury, 19th inst.

WHITEHAVEN.

The friends of Free Trade in this locality, who may be disposed to share in the honour and the satisfaction of aiding in this important national demonstration, but who have not yet carried their wishes into practical effect, will excuse our reminding them that they have but a very brief time in which to decide. Parties who know of no articles they can present may equally serve the cause by pecuniary contributions of even the smallest amount, which may be sent to our office. In this way parties may help to defray the necessarily large expenses of the Bazaar, in order that its receipts may, as far as possible, be paid, without deduction, into the great League Fund.—Whitehaven Herald.

BURNLEY.

The ladies of Burnley held a Bazaar here on Thursday, the 17th inst., the proceeds of which are to go to the great Bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre.

PRESTON.

The friends of Free Trade in this town have been busily engaged this week in procuring contributions for the Preston stall. The ladies' committee are indefatigable in their exertions for the promotion of a cause which possesses such numerous and important domestic associations. Amongst the donors of money and goods this week are—A Friend, by Mr. Hawkins, £5; Mr. Dixon, Friargate, £1; Mrs. R. Benson, netted German caps, value £2; Mr. Edmondson, a ream of letter paper, with engraving of Tulketh-hall, value £2; Mr. Chambers, Norwich crape; Mrs. Stones, ottoman and fancy basket; Mr. J. Jackson, Calder-vale, £4; Mr. Holden, Church-street, £2; Mrs. Holden, fancy goods; Mr. Wrightson, musical box and fancy picture frame; Mr. Kay, portrait of Dr. Johnson; a Friend, an elegant fire grate paper, value £1; Mr. Frankland, to the value of £1; Mr. Park, Cross-street, to the value of £4; Mr. Hawkins, money and goods to the value of £20; Mr. M'Guffog, £5; Mr. Evans, model carriage and first donation made into £10; Mr. Pearson, two pictures and frames, value £1; Mrs. Salts, basket of wax fruit; Miss Birchall, basket of wax fruit and pair of screens; Mrs. Harrison, Glover-street, spectacle wipers, value 18s.; Miss Niebot, Calder-bridge, a worked quilt; Miss Smith, a pair of beaufets; Mr. Dixon, currier, £5; Mr. Eccles, Bamber-bridge, £20; Mrs. Hibbert, twenty pounds of plum cake; a Friend, to the general fund £10, and to the Bazaar, £6; subscriptions in small sums amounting to £1. 12s. 6d.; Mr. Goodier, £5. 5s.. The committee have decided on exhibiting, in the Corn Exchange, on the 1st of May, all the articles given.—Preston Guardian.

EXETER.

There was a good meeting at Exeter on Wednesday night. The attendance of ladies was numerous. Addresses were delivered by Colonel Thompson, Robert R. Moore, Esq., and others; and a resolution to support the Bazaar was carried with acclamation.

BRADFORD.

A week only remains for preparation for this great National Exhibition; and if any of our readers are still undetermined what or what quantity of goods to send, or if any have procrastinated and have not sent what they once intended, we remind them, there is just a week for preparation. Pecuniary contributions will be available to the last, and the committee hope to receive from some of their zealous friends donations in this most exchangeable of all shapes. We are glad to be able to announce the receipt of several beautiful and valuable contributions—some magnificent ones—and some very pleasing ones from young people. We would record with especial pleasure the gift of some knitting by a factory girl. We see that in Leeds and Halifax, in Manchester and Rochdale, it is proposed to exhibit the articles to be sent from those towns previously to their departure. This course will not be followed in Bradford, simply because there is not variety enough in the articles contributed: £1000 worth of our finest Bradford textures will go into an amazing little compass.—Bradford Observer.

DONCASTER.

We perceive Mr. R. Milner and Mr. Haatic, of this town, have kindly undertaken to receive contributions for the Bazaar to be held in Covent-garden Theatre, in May next. The contributions already received principally consist of such fancy articles as are usually met with at similar exhibitions. Amongst the more valuable presents are several excellent specimens of Berlin wool-work, especially one entitled "The Defence of Saragossa," and a valuable oil painting—"A Scene in Pontefract Castle." There are also a number of preserved birds, the gift of W. Chadwick, Esq., of Arksey. We understand the articles presented are to be sent to London on Monday next.—Doncaster Gazette.

STOURBRIDGE.

Messrs. Wood Brothers, of the Lye, have prepared, and in a few days will forward to the Bazaar, to be held in Covent-garden Theatre, in aid of the League Fund, a dozen complete sets of gardening tools, and an assortment of anvils, vices, chains, and various other articles, in the manufacture of which they have obtained celebrity. Persons who are desirous to aid the cause of Free Trade, will oblige by forwarding the articles they purpose to send as speedily as possible. Mr. Akroyd will take charge of, and forward to their destination, any articles from Stourbridge and its neighbourhood.—Worcester Chronicle.

SOUTH SHIELDS.

On Monday and Tuesday the contributions given by the Free-Traders to the League Bazaar of South Shields were exhibited at the residence of Mr. James Bell, when numbers of individuals availed themselves of the opportunity, and expressed themselves highly gratified. There are still many friends of the cause who have not yet contributed to it; it is hoped, however, that they will yet render their pecuniary support to this great cause.—Tyne Mercury.

ARBROATH.

A respectable establishment here—Renny, Sons, and Co.—are affording to their fellow-townsmen an opportunity of sending in goods for the League Bazaar.

DUNDEE.

We beg to remind our readers that Saturday next is the latest day fixed by the committee for receiving contributions for this object. The time required for proper arrangement of the numerous articles contributed from this district renders this necessary. Let each Free-Trader remember and act in the spirit of the adage so applicable in this case, "He gives twice who gives soon."—Dundee Advertiser.

GLASGOW.

On Saturday we paid another visit to the office of the Anti-Corn-Law Association in this city, and were highly gratified to observe the progress which had been made towards obtaining a large and valuable collection of articles of manufacture for the great League Bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre. In a former article we stated that many ladies were busily at work, and the result has since shown at once the ardour of their zeal and the elegance of their taste. We were perfectly bewildered and dazzled among the profusion of satin and lace pin-cushions; silk and bead purses; velvet and bead reticules; and reticules sewed with Berlin worsted. There is also a numerous array of dolls for children, dressed by the hands of ladies, after the most elegant and approved forms. Many packages of beautiful fabrics have been forwarded, including shawls of exquisite workmanship, dresses of various kinds, and, generally speaking, samples of almost every description of manufacture which the city can produce: but as yet they form but a small proportion of the total amount which will be contributed. Several valuable contributions of books have been made, including atlases, poems sent by their authors, and no less than 47 copies of a lithographed facsimile of Burns's "Jolly Beggars." The sight which the chambers exhibit makes them well worth a visit; but we hope no delay will take place in forwarding those articles which are known to be in course of manufacture, as it is of importance that the collection should be in London in proper time to be arranged for the Bazaar.—Glasgow Argus.

KIRKALDY.

We are glad to learn that the Committee of the Kirkaldy Anti-Corn-Law Association resolved, at a meeting held on Monday evening last, to do what they can to promote the object of the League Bazaar, by stirring up their fellow-citizens, and especially the ladies, to contribute of their substance, handywork, and specimens of the manufactures of the place, as donations to the Bazaar. They, therefore, by the means of placards, call upon the friends of Free-Trade and fair-play to contribute to this worthy object, and hand in such articles as they may think of bestowing, by the time specified in the handbills, at the Public-rooms, where a person will be in readiness to receive them, as all contributions must be in London before the 8th day of May ensuing. It is expected that the people of Kirkaldy and neighbourhood will not be behind in their usual liberality on the occasion.—Fife Herald.

COMMON SENSE IN ESSEX.

Mr. Mechi, of Leadenhall-street, has republished his letters descriptive of his farm on Tiptree-heath, in Essex, and has added a variety of remarks and other documents which did not appear in the first issue.

The first were noticed in this paper by Mr. Adam Brown. Mr. Mechi having forwarded a copy of his enlarged edition to that gentleman, I have been requested to acknowledge the same, and to make such extracts from them as may seem useful.

I can only say that the whole are good. I hope Mr. Mechi is beginning to see that some of the best friends of agriculture are those whom he sneered at in his earlier letters, as connected with the Anti-Corn-Law League. I hope he will soon see and acknowledge that agriculture is not best befriended by those who have laid it prostrate and are rifling its pockets, and giving it blows on the head to keep it in submission. It is to set agriculture on its feet, to enable it to walk by itself, to work for its own living, to strengthen itself by its own exercise, that we strive now to liberate it.

It lies on its back, and groans and struggles, yet cannot rise. It sleeps and dreams, but its sleep is not rest. It could wake and rise and be healthy, and enjoy health, it would do so. Its very dream has reality enough in it to show that it should not lie thus. But that incubus which sits upon it, that horrid something which is distinct enough to be seen and felt, yet which has neither shape nor name that the sufferer can tell it by or call upon, keeps it down. Now it has dreams of surfeits long gone by, and again visions of hunger. Bulls that have fed and roared, and have glorified the meadows, and have taken the shape of beef, and have passed away, come back again as if they would trample and gore the prostrate sufferer to death; and then their bare bones are seen; and beardless skeletons prowl upon the cropland; and agriculture sees its own image in the bare bones.

Oh! thou horrid nightmare, and let the struggler rise! It is to awaken the prostrate sleeper, and free him from that helplessness which now encircles him, that we ask for freedom to trade and freedom to agriculture.

Neither mind nor matter is stationary by the law of nature. The whole universe is in motion. Everything that has human action in it advances from a higher to a lower condition. Commerce sees the sciences, pioneers of civilization and human well-being, advancing, and it moves with them. But it is restrained. It asks why, and looks back and finds agriculture yoked to it, and all the lumber of antiquity, musty law, and feudal customs yoked to agriculture.

It is to liberate it, Mr. Mechi, and give it freedom of action, that we are now striving. Let us see, from your own evidence, if there be not a pressing necessity for so doing.

I have put a heading of my own to most of the paragraphs quoted here. The quotations have not been made to afford strong contrasts. I might have so selected them: but they have been rather chosen so as to give the progress of improvement on Tiptree-heath, and the obstacles surrounding it.

DESCRIPTION OF TIPTREE-HEATH.

"Tiptree-heath is what its name imports—a waste and wild country (shame it should be so with a superabundant, unemployed, but willing agricultural population!) covered with furze, with here and there an immense excavation of gravel-pits. The poverty-stricken grass struggles, in patches, for a precarious existence among the monopolising furzes. The few half-starved animals, that search there for a living, walk many a mile ere their cravings are satisfied. The country is elevated, forming a sort of table-land between two rich valleys; consequently it is extremely bleak, and, like most high lands, very wet and springy. Without well-sheltered yards, no stock can be fattened here. Here are all the indications of common rights and poverty—irregular and decayed buildings; a numerous but scattered population; plenty of geese, donkeys, bad fences, and beer-shops; a few windmills, and not a few cross-roads and sign-posts. Judicious but stealthy encroachments here and there appear; in fact, Tiptree has a very bad name, in spite of the races held there; and a common saying in Essex on hearing it mentioned is, 'Tiptree-heath! God help you!' My farm is, perhaps, on the best part of it; but on each side the heath almost reaches it. An Irish gentleman who visited it said of the neighbourhood, 'I have seen nothing in all Ireland so bad.' My farm is six miles from the parish church."

REASONS FOR BUYING SUCH LAND.

"I am frequently asked, 'Why did you not purchase better land?' I reply, 'I do not want any better when I can get it into proper tillage; all that such land requires is the removal of the springs and top water by perfect drainage, a deep clean tillage, surface burning, and a regular system of stocking and cropping.' There is no credit in farming on a naturally rich soil; but there is a proud triumph and a good example in reclaiming neglected wastes."

ALLOTMENTS TO THE LABOURERS BETTER THAN COMMON RIGHTS.

"I hope I may live to see the time when the whole of Tiptree-heath shall be in a state of cultivation,—growing corn instead of furze, and affording employment to the surrounding population. Those who consider the poor derive much benefit from common land, are, in my opinion, sadly mistaken. It is certainly a trifle better than no land at all, but can bear no comparison with well-enclosed and deeply-cultivated allotments. I shall exert all my energies to get the copyholders to enclose and cultivate it, if I can, believing it to be a public benefit; and as an example I shall devote a portion of my own land, in allotments of forty poles, to the industrious labourers on my farm, at a moderate rent, so that their leisure summer evenings may be innocently and profitably employed."

OLD-FASHIONED FARMERS DISLIKE ALTERATIONS.

"This Mr. C— is, evidently, one of the old school, satisfied with things as they are, convinced there is no room for improvement—the advocate of huge fences, timber, wet land, and pauperism. There are, unfortunately, plenty of Mr. C—s in Essex, and every other county. * * * Probably in a year or two, when Mr. C— sees the land in condition, he may be inclined to make honourable amends for his present rather sweeping condemnations."

THE FARM IS NOT YET IN CONDITION.—WHAT HAS BEEN DONE?

"As to the condition of the farm, I will put the question in this form to every farmer:—First, cut down and remove 200 timber trees; then remove 5000 yards of fences; fill up all the old ditches; cut new ones; alter the shapes of your fields; make new roads; dig between seventy and eighty miles of drains, and spread their nasty contents on your surface soil; cart 300,000 drain pipes; 60,000 bushels of stones; make common roads of your fields; pull down all your old buildings and build up new ones, and cart for that purpose 400,000 bricks, sand, lime, timber; remove immense heaps of earth, excavated from the tanks;—do all this in eighteen months, on 12 acres of land; grow your crops, and wonder that the land is not in first-rate condition! Why, our drainage was on the land till April last."

THE OLD SCHOOL STILL GRUMBLES.

"But, no; in Mr. C—'s eye it is a crime to erect new buildings, to drain the land, to save the manure, to give warmth, dryness, and employment to human beings, and to shelter your cattle from the cutting blast; with him the rotten thatch and dripping eaves are the very beauty ideal of rustic landscape. Oh! how he will miss the brown and trickling stream of liquid dung! No idle labourers now to watch the pitiless storm as it rushes past the shivering steer."

EXPERIENCE OF DRAINAGE AND THE WANT OF IT.

"But he had not visited the farm in its original condition. He might then have felt keenly for the misfortunes of the honest and worthy labourer, who still remains with me,—he, who in the old wretched house lost by fever, in one short month, his affectionate wife and two daughters. He might have seen in those rooms peas in a corner growing from moisture. He would have walked along the land in a wet September day up to the knees in bog (were him right too), or be struggling in the siltier soil with solid encrustments of birdlime-like clay."

ESSEX HOMESTEADS.

"I say now, and will maintain the position, that the homesteads of Essex are, in too many instances, not creditable to so wealthy a county; and that disgrace is more pungent when contrasted with the extensive, durable, and well-arranged receptacles for its unemployed paupers."

PART OF THE CROP OF 1844.

"September 7.—Perils attend the brave. Mr. Cunningham's charge was furious, but unfortunate; facts are about to harass him in his retreat. * * Fact 1st.—My late tenant, Mr. Foster, who now manages for me, writes thus, under date 6th of September:—'I feel anxious to inform you the result of our threshing. It is all put up dressed.'"

Quantity of wheat:—		qrs.	bush.
Best .. ..	..	32	3
Second and tail, ..	..	1	2

(On 6½ acres, after potatoes and swedes, all drawn off.)

This is such a crop as was never grown on the notorious Tiptree-heath before. The governor [his father] and self are highly gratified, as I know you will be. Such a disgraceful crop I should like the 'Cunning-man' to know about; rather more than five quarters per acre, as there are but 6½ acres. * * By-the-by, it was a wonderfully fine sample, part of it realized 46s. (red wheat), this last week being top price in the market."

COST OF MANURE FOR THIS FIELD.

"The manure for this and the preceding root crop cost, with charge for cartage and putting on, £4. 8s. per acre; that is, for two years' crops. * * * Of all the farmers who have estimated this crop, none set it higher than four quarters. So much for estimates of standing crops. Something is owing to my clean threshing-machine, and to the fullness of the sample."

FARMERS DETERMINED NOT TO IMPROVE.

"I see, with great pain, a tendency on the part of many farmers to find fault with agricultural improvement. They call it innovation, and yearn with delight over their misshapen and wooded fields; their wee!/, wet, and sour land; their wastes, their rotten buildings, and unemployed labourers."

FARMERS DO NOT KNOW WHAT IS RIGHT.

"I can afford to let folks grumble when I see that there are scarcely two farmers agreed on any one point in agriculture. So I will only try to grow good crops, and please myself and those numerous and scientific practical agriculturists who have honoured me with their cordial and hearty concurrence in my views."

MR. HUTLEY, NEAR WITHAM.

"I must express my hearty and sincere approbation and admiration of that gentleman's proceedings. His sentiments are, 'Employ the labourer, pay him well, farm high and clean, and thus farm profitably.' In expending £15 per acre in improving land, on a sixteen years' lease, he has given a noble example to others. His success, his wealth, and his tenure of 1509 acres amply prove the correctness of his views and calculations; and I wish him all the profit he deserves."

EXPECTED PROFIT FROM TIPTREE-HEATH.

"I shall not be satisfied until Tiptree-hall farm produces, at fair average prices, at least £10 to £12 per acre, landlord's measure. I shall try to make it more. The way in which that sum will be applied is—per acre—

Labour and beer ..	£1 10 to £2
Rent .. .. .	3 0
Guano, bones, &c. ..	2 0 perhaps more.
Rates and tithes ..	0 14
Tradesmen's bills ..	0 5
Seed .. .. .	0 5
Wear and tear in horses, implements, and stock .. .. .	0 8
Horse labour ....	1 10
	£9 12
Farmer's profit....	1 8 I hope much more.

ALWAYS MAKE A SHILLING.

"I think it very likely I may spend much more for manure, my plan in every business being to lay out an extra pound wherever it will bring twenty-one shillings."

MUCH OF THE FEEDING IS NOW WASTED BY FARMERS.

"But then my root and green crops will not be three-fourths trampled down, and one-fourth fed. They will be all cut up fine, and consumed in the yard or stall-mangers. There is no excuse for destroying so much food, except the improper state of most farm-yards, which allow the liquid manure to be washed away or evaporated."

CATTLE THRIVE WITH CLEANLINESS.

"Imagine our own eight weeks' meals spread uniformly on a limited space, on which we must not only tread, exercise, and repose, but must also use for depositing our excrements: I can see no distinction in the case between animals and Christians. It is a wasteful and improper practice, which common sense and decency tell us should be abolished. The cost of cutting, pulling, and cartage, in well-arranged farms of easy access, is nothing in comparison with the saving. I have found four acres and a half of our rape afford ample food to a hundred lambs for nine weeks, cut up with wheat-chaff."

WHEN OUR SOIL IS POORLY, LET US CONSULT THE CHEMIST.

"I hope the time is fast approaching when we shall, for complaints of the soil, get advice from proper analytical chemists as readily as we would for ourselves; so that they may investigate the disease and prescribe a proper remedy, depending on the patient's constitution and the nature of the ailment, whether chronic or transient; whether arising from plethora, starvation, or dropsy, or too much water without the means of escape—a very usual complaint in earthy patients."

EVERY MAN HIS OWN DOCTOR IS DANGEROUS IN THE PRESENT STATE OF AGRICULTURE.

"Farmers make frequent mistakes when they trust to their own notions of doctoring. They readily perceive by the external symptoms that their patient is in an unsatisfactory state, but make sad havoc with their nostrums. How frequently do we see a dressing of dung forced on an already satiated patient, who cries out for an alternation of chalk or cold clay. Another administers a strong stimulant of lime, where the sufferer is already exhausted by previous excitement, and requires a tranquillizing tonic of good old mellow manure. A third gives alkalis where acids and phosphates can alone avail. They do not consider that, if troubled with stone, gravel, or density of the substratum, a gentle operation with the subsoiler might give ease by causing a loosening of the parts; or that, in cases of scurviness and poverty, light, air, cleanliness, exercise, and good feeding might prove a restorative."

ONE IMPORTANT CAUSE OF NON-IMPROVEMENT IN AGRICULTURE.

"I had occasion to visit the son of a friend of mine, at a school of great respectability in a wealthy agricultural district. The master, a very intelligent person, showed me the details of his well-arranged establishment, which was certainly a pattern in every respect. On entering the well-filled school-room, he observed that most of his scholars were farmers' sons. Glancing at his library, I inquired what books on agricultural subjects it contained. The master seemed struck with surprise, as if the thought of such books had never occurred to him, and replied, 'With shame I acknowledge, not one.'"

Mr. Mechi proceeds to say that this case might be multiplied by a thousand. To which I would add, by many more than a thousand.

I shall make one other series of extracts from these interesting and instructive letters. Meantime the reader—he be of the shop, or of the farm; of the castle or of the cottage; thoughtful or thoughtless—is invited to ponder over these passages, and not to throw down this paper, or turn over another leaf in search of something else to read, the moment he has glanced at these paragraphs, and only read the title which is prefixed to each. Read them; and recollect as you read, that the Corn Law is the companion, ay, and the conservator, of that style of farming which Mr. Mechi deprecates.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

CAN A FARMER BORROW MONEY? IF NOT, WHY?

In the last number of that special organ of the farmers and dealers in corn, the Mark-lane Express, there is an article on the Currency, in which the writer quotes largely from the Bankers' Circular of Friday last.

What this Bankers' Circular is I know not. I think I have heard of it as a paper representing the opinions of those "Bow Bell-men" who buy and sell money, or who make imaginary sales of money, on the Stock Exchange, and who think that the welfare of the nation is comprised in what they do or do not do—in their being thriving "bears," or thriving "bulls," and in their being something more respectable than "lame ducks." Whether the industry of the nation would cease to move were there no stockjobbers, and no jobbing—no imaginary sales of money—is a question of equal importance to that of whether the Thames would cease to flow from Oxford to London if all the ducks that dabble in it were "lame ducks."

This Bankers' Circular is represented to have said—and the farmers paper adopts the words and their meaning—

"Here we are in that state when a Northamptonshire farmer pays about double the usance for the use of money that is paid by a Manchester manufacturer or a railway speculator. The farmer gets it with so much difficulty that nine out of ten of the entire class are altogether excluded from the advantage. The manufacturer gets it with so much ease that men, never worth £5000, have managed to borrow scores of thousands upon that slender foundation."

Much more is said to the same effect, and the reason given for the difference between the farmer and the manufacturer as regards their facilities for borrowing money is, that Sir Robert Peel has restricted the country banks in their circulation of notes.

On the good or evil of Sir Robert Peel's legislation on the currency, now and heretofore, I say nothing. Whatever he did was done for or against Lancashire as much as for or against Northamptonshire. The reason why the manufacturer gets money at a lower rate of interest, when he requires it, than the farmer, is one altogether different from anything stated in the Bankers' Circular.

What is the difference between the credit of the one and the credit of the other? If the writer in the Circular be himself a banker and a lender of money, which, in charity,

I cannot suppose him to be, else he would never have written what he has written,—yet, suppose him to be a lender of money, and that a farmer from Northamptonshire, and a manufacturer from Lancashire, apply to him each for a loan, what would he say?

Taking the manufacturer into his private parlour, our banker would say, or would think, to this effect:—"He wants £20,000; he wants to spin finer yarn; he wants to go into a new market with his yarn; he wants new machinery, and is extending his works generally. He conducts his business with great accuracy: calculates his expenses and profits with precision. He offers me a name as good as his own as guarantee; or I may have a lien on the factory itself. He wants the money at 2½ per cent.: I will offer it at three. Yet, his security being good, I must not part with him; for if I do not lend to him, others will."

Then, taking the farmer into the private parlour, our banker thus speaks or thinks:—"He wants £2000 to drain his farm, and make new ditches less wasteful of his land. He talks of paring and burning and liming, and has hopes of making his farm highly productive, which it is not at present. He says he will improve his turnip culture, and feed more sheep in winter; he will have new gates put up to his fields, and train up the fences, letting nothing hurt them. So far all is well. But he is only a tenant-at-will. He does not know that, after expending the £2000, he will be allowed to remain in his farm. He thinks his landlord is to be depended upon. I do not doubt the landlord's honour; but I would not lend money to the landlord himself on his word of honour. He may die, and then the tenant may be differently dealt with; he may change his land-agent, who might be no friend to this tenant, and cause him to lose the farm; an election might be contested, and the tenant-at-will might be dismissed from his land for voting against, or for not voting for, the landlord's or agent's side of the contest. He has no lease, consequently he can give no security; if he gives me other names, and if they be the names of farmers, they are as bad as his own."

"Moreover, if he had a lease it is not the best security. The landlords, in Parliament assembled, have made laws for themselves, so that they come first upon the tenantry as creditors for rent, to the exclusion of all others until they are paid. Then, again, this farmer does not possess the power to improve his land to the best of his judgment, or as other skilful persons might instruct him. He must not uproot his old straggling fences with banks and double ditches; nor the trees which overshadow the fields, and throw out their roots so as to stop the drains that would be made near them. He may erect gates, and strive to keep up his fences, but both will be broken down at the first fox-hunt. He is in a situation just the reverse of the cotton-spinner, to whom I have lent £20,000. Nobody rides or runs into the factory for amusement, breaking the threads of cotton in the process of being manufactured, and trampling under foot the materials which are spinning or are already spun. Hunters and hounds, and the crowds that follow them, stop not at sheepfolds, nor gates; nor at fields with cows in them; nor at enclosures newly sown, or newly sprung and wet. Northamptonshire is a great hunting county. Moreover, this farmer does not know within twenty shillings a quarter what his prices of grain will be the next year or the next again. If the prices of grain were less variable it might be easier for him to calculate how he is to repay £2000 to me; and, consequently, it would be safer to lend it to him. But he cannot approach to a calculation. If I lend him £2000 it must be at high interest; and I must have all the names of every friend he can get as security for him. I shall certainly not give him the money, even with all these names, at less than five per cent."

Herein is the difference between the farmer and the manufacturer, as regards their power to borrow money. It is nothing less than humiliating to see how mean the intelligence is of many persons who occasionally put themselves in print. The newspapers, which are the receptacles of the farmers' complaints, form at best but melancholy reading. At present they are deplorably dolorous. But certainly the sympathizing sorrow that one feels at seeing the real distress of the farmers, is deepened and mingled with sorrow of a less plying kind when we read their own accounts of themselves.

In the same number of the Mark-lane Express, in which is the quotation from the Bankers' Circular, appears a letter from A "Yorkshireman." (What a libel upon the intelligence of Yorkshire!) and he thus writes:

"What is the like of me to do? I read none of the League papers; never did, and never wish to. I have faith in nobody." Yet he is asking if it be true what he has heard tell of, that "those Free-Trade men" have said that the present scarcity of food for cattle can be alleviated by the introduction of Indian corn, Egyptian beans, &c., free of duty. The farming Yorkshireman (again I say, what a libel upon Yorkshire!) will not read the papers that give him information of whether or not there be such things as he is in quest of, yet he would like to know. He says "I have the misfortune to be a farmer; the greater misfortune to be a stock farmer; and the most confounded misfortune of all to be one whose grass and hay and turnips failed last year." And then he goes on:—"If there be any truth in what these Free-Trade men say," and so on, he would "like to know," and so on.

Should not it be added to this man's description of what he has the misfortune to be, that he is unhappily encrusted in ignorance and prejudice? Thus:—"I have the misfortune to be a farmer; the greater misfortune to be a stock farmer; the most confounded misfortune of all to be one whose grass and hay and turnip crops failed last year; and I have in addition the misfortune triply confounded of being blinded by ignorance and by prejudices, for which I pay so dear, that I have to sell my sheep and cattle before they are fat to pay for my prejudices."

A Yorkshireman who is engaged in manufactures and commerce will ransack the great globe, will search unto the uttermost ends of the earth, for materials to extend the number and improve the quality of his products. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the manufacturing districts to know if there be or be not any calicoes printed in Yorkshire. But in an authentic history of our amazing progress in manufactures, which I have just perused, I find that the materials which form a piece of the commonest print, such as the wife of the farmer's labourer can buy at sixpence per yard, are brought together from the four quarters of the world,—cotton from America; gum from Africa; indigo from Asia; and madder from the continent of Europe. The manufacturer without protection, and with that enterprise which is always excited in the absence of monopoly, can thus bring materials from the four quarters of the world to clothe the wife and children of the labourer, at 6d. per yard. While the labourer's master, with his monopoly, hampered and hemmed in with all the feebleness of action that belongs to such a system as his, cannot produce mutton and beef from the materials raised upon his own farm—and that only because he is confined to those raised upon his own farm—cheap enough for his labourers and their wives and children to eat; and consequently they never taste either mutton or beef.

What is it that gives the almost universal market to the products of our looms, putting clothes upon the humblest hind's wife surpassing in fineness of texture and beauty of pattern the clothing of the lady Plantagenets of the days of the distaff 300 or 400 years ago? What but the cheapness of production. And what gives the profit to cheapness but the universality of consumption. But the farmer who will not produce beef and mutton cheap, nor learn how and where he might get the materials to do so, because he chooses to look to what his monopoly will do for him, has but a limited market; and he can neither pay his labourers high enough wages to buy his beef and mutton, nor can he produce it cheap enough to meet their wages.

But, from what I have seen upon a recent tour in some of the factory districts, the unprotected manufacturer not only clothes the families of the farm-labourers cheaply; he enables his own work-people to eat beef and mutton—the farmer's produce—every day.

Such facts are clear as the sun at noonday, and patent to all the world. And yet a paper called the Bankers' Circular, which we might suppose to be reflective of the highest commercial knowledge, speaks of the British farmer and British manufacturer as if they could offer to a banker equal security for advances of money.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

I may remark that in Scotland the difference between a farmer and commercial man, in regard of getting money on loan, is less. If the Scotch farmer offers one or two names as good as his own, the security is complete. They are all leaseholders. They are commonly paying corn-rents; and are therefore in less danger of insolvency by the fluctuation of markets.

At the same time it must not be lost sight of, that the Scotch banks by their issue of one-pound notes, prudently used, have done much for Scotch agriculture. And any measure that would lessen the ability of the banks to give easy advances to farmers must be looked on as perilous. While this is written Sir Robert Peel's design is unknown. Before it is read his measure affecting the Scotch banks will, perhaps, be reported, and travel to Scotland by the same post as this paper.

THE SMALL TENANTRY IN ROSS-SHIRE, SCOTLAND.—IMPENDING CRISIS.

(To the Editor of the Morning Advertiser.)

SIR,—I implore your prompt and emphatic declaration against a grievous wrong which is about to be perpetrated in a remote part of the kingdom, against a body of tenants, ninety in number, who are about to be expelled from their land, and expelled upon the most erroneous principle, and for the most doubtful of all "improvements" that were ever attempted on an estate.

The principle which is to justify their expulsion is this, that the thinner the population on any given breadth of land, the greater the profit of the land to its owner. The intended improvement is to throw the homesteads into extensive sheep-walks, plant trees, sow furze, breed game, and make the estate more valuable as ground for sportsmen.

It is situated in the shire of Ross, in the north of Scotland. The native industry—how often do we hear the plea set up for "protection to native industry!"—the native northern industry is to be banished from the estate, and the southern idleness—the gun, the dog, and the sporting man—is to be invited to it.

Little did I think, when I wrote to you the other day, of the frightful results of laying the county of Roscommon, in Ireland, in pasture, by compulsion, that the same process was being enacted in the county of Ross, in Scotland. The small tenantry of Ross—Oh, that their landlord was "the Man of Ross!"—are in a worse condition, or will be, when expelled, than those of Ireland. They are not so numerous as to be so formidable as the Irish. Their sufferings will not be used for political purposes, and will, therefore, be little heard of. In proportion to their weakness will be their suffering.

Now, let me be clearly understood. It is not to deny private property its rights that I complain of what is to occur to ninety persons on one estate in Ross-shire on the 12th of May next; although I would answer to the claim of private rights, that "property has its duties as well as its rights." My purpose is here to show that the owner of property, who is thus vindicating his private rights, is doing himself and his own land—his own property—his own pocket—a great wrong.

When the neighbouring county of Sutherland was cleared of its population in a similar manner—its inhabitants expatriated—their homes laid in ashes—merciful Heaven! what scenes of suffering and utter wretchedness there were then, when the cry of "Scotland is burning" rose with that smoke which dims the lustre of the noble house of Sutherland to this day; when that deed was done, it had at least this to be said for it, that all agricultural improvement then tended towards large sheep farms—farms of from two to five thousand acres.

Agricultural improvement, aided by science, tends now in another direction. There may be little science and less moneyed capital among the humble tenantry of Ross-shire. But sinew and sweat are the first elements of landed capital. The owner of the land should try to instruct the people in the science of cultivation, of breeding and feeding, if they do not know it, as is very likely. But do the proprietor and his factor know what should be done, or how to do it? In all probability not. Yet their ignorance does not justify their erring cruelty towards the helpless tenants.

True, they tell the tenants and their families to go abroad to Canada or Australia, or to be companions of the New Zealand savage. It has been pointed out to them that they would find land on these distant shores that would better repay their labour than the land of Ross-shire.

Better repay their labour! What is a fertile soil without a market for its produce? The direct and ready-money London market, by steam, from the north of Scotland, is the reason why the Ross-shire proprietor thinks he can do without his people. The improving market for mutton in the rich metropolis, and the love of sport on the part of the rich Englishman,—these alone induce the proprietor of Ross to look to sheep-walks and game for his rent, rather than to the well-directed industry of a thriving population.

But hear what they say in their appeal to public sympathy—these poor tenantry of Ross, who are to be ejected on the 12th of May next. "Many of your petitioners are aged and infirm, and unable to emigrate, even if provision of the most ample kind were made for their passage to America. And, although others of them are well able to work, they cannot find employment in the solitude of the most remote glen in the north of Scotland. Besides, in their forlorn and dejected state, your petitioners cannot at present leave their aged parents, wives, and helpless little children and other relatives, until means are used to obtain for your humble petitioners a place of places of residence wherein to abide and support themselves by honest labour."

This is doubtless written by some one better educated than these poor people can possibly be. But no grammatical education is requisite to make them feel the separation which is about to take place between them and the homes of many generations. They say in the petition, which I find in the Scotsman of Saturday last—"After the lawful warning given them to quit those homes to which innumerable tender ties and associations attach them, as many of your petitioners as could travel, went over the two adjoining counties in quest of small farms, or even places whereon to build temporary huts, but without success; and they now intend to take up a temporary asylum in the churchyard of the parish, underneath whose surface rest the ashes of their ancestors as well as relatives recently buried there."

And then they say of thus being laid, while yet alive, in the graveyard:—"Your petitioners are compelled to resort to a step which violates their feelings as men descended from those who defended the soil, out of which they are expatriated, from powerful invaders."

The immediate object of the petition is to ask some pecuniary assistance towards getting tents to cover them, and a temporary supply of food to those who are mere cottagers. The following gentlemen attest the truth of the statements, and offer to receive the subscriptions:—Rev. Gustavus Aird, Free Church, Bonar Bridge; Rev. Hector Allan, Free Church, Ardgay, Bonar Bridge; Rev. G. K. Kennedy, Free Church, Dornoch; Messrs. John Lusk and Co., Buchanan-street, Glasgow; and Charles Spence, S.S.C., 21, St. David-street, Edinburgh.

I have said nothing of the moral and religious view of this case. I am more desirous to speak of it agriculturally. The style of farming, which was new and an improvement 50 or 60 years ago, is behind the age now. Our best agriculturists, as Lord Dule, J. C. Mortimer Esq. (see his book on soils), and many more whom it is needless to mention, are inculcating—and practising what they inculcate—the employment of more labour. The raising of winter food for sheep is greatly extending the ability of the soil to keep sheep. Winter food cannot be produced without labour.

In some of the southern counties of Scotland, where numerous small holdings were broken up sixty years ago, and thrown into one vast farm, there is now a disposition to seek smaller farms. And were it not for the expense of building new sets of farm-buildings the farms would be broken up and divided on some estates. The sum of £15 per acre is found to return a higher profit in agriculture than any sum below £10 per acre.

Ross-shire may not be favourable to the best kinds of culture; but, if it produces grass for sheep in summer, it would produce winter food for them. Why not seek to teach the people to produce such food, and increase the flocks, rather than expel them from the soil? They are themselves capital upon an estate, if skilfully directed. To banish them is to banish capital, and make the real improvement of the property impossible.

[In reference to the foregoing subject, we learn from the Ross-shire Advertiser, "that upwards of 400 tenants have this year received notices to quit in the counties of Ross and Cromarty—making, at the average rate of five individuals to a family, a population of 2000 persons."

TRADE WITH BRAZIL.

(From the Dundee Advertiser.)

The linen trade will be amongst the first to feel the effects of the discriminating duties on British manufactures, by which the Brazilian Government threaten to retaliate for our injustice towards its great staple. The whole exports of linen were valued in 1841 at £3,200,467, of which Brazil alone took 8,075,584 yards, valued at £243,508.

Two of the principal fabrics sent from Dundee to Rio de Janeiro are Hessians and Osaburgs. Their very names show their continental origin. Machinery has enabled us hitherto to produce them cheaper than the German districts which first gave them names. The raw material still grows there, and railways will now convey it to the most favourable spots for obtaining water power. On the other hand, we are fast losing the superiority in machinery, which compensated all other disadvantages. Steam-boats have placed us within twenty-four hours of the Continent, and a German mechanic can at any time leave home and inspect the most recent improvements in the machine-shops of this country, and within a week be preparing his employer's factory for their reception. Suppose our continental rivals to have attained equality in cheapness of production, our protective laws place our merchants at considerable disadvantage in the race of competition. The German merchant can send his coffee bagging to Brazil, and the same vessel may bring his returns in sugar to the same port from which he sailed. The Dundee merchant has frequently loaded his linens in Dundee harbour for Rio de Janeiro, but no vessel has ever brought back a return cargo from that port to Dundee. The Hamburg merchant, by selling his return sugar to his immediate neighbours, may obtain a profit sufficient to compensate an occasional loss on his linens in Brazil, and may thereby also protect himself against unfavourable exchanges. The Dundee merchant possesses no such advantages unless by the paid agency of a third party at a distant port. These are the discouragements under which this commerce is presently conducted; but they will be fearfully and fatally aggravated should the Brazilians retaliate for our prohibitory duty of 63s. per cwt. on their sugar by an equivalent discriminating duty on British manufactures, a proceeding of which we could not but admit the justice, however severely we might suffer from its consequences.

IMPROVEMENTS ON ESTATES.

There are some circumstances in which the occupier of lands or houses, who has increased their value by erections or other improvements, cannot in justice be compelled to pay for the increased value if he purchases the property. A man purchases the lease of an estate, and has reason to expect, from the youth and health of the "heir," that he may retain possession of it for thirty or forty years. In consequence of this expectation, he makes many additions to the buildings; and by other modes of improvement considerably increases the value of the estate. It, however, happens that in the course of two or three years all the lives drop. The landowner, when the person applies to him for a new lease, demands payment for all the improvements. This is not just. It will be replied, that all the parties knew and voluntarily undertook the risk: so they did; and if the event had approached to the ordinary average of such risks, the owner would act rightly in demanding the increased value. But it does not; and this is the circumstance which would make an upright man decline to avail himself of his advantages. Yet if any one critically disputes the "justice" of the demand, I give up the word, and say that it is not considerate, and kind, and benevolent; in a word, it is not Christian. It is no light calamity upon such a tenant to be obliged so unexpectedly to repurchase a lease; and to add to this calamity a demand which the common feelings of mankind would condemn, cannot be the act of a good man. Who doubts whether, within the last fourteen years, it has not been the duty of many landowners to return a portion of their rents? The duty is the same in one case as in the other; and it is founded on the same principles in both. To say that other persons would be willing to pay the present value of the property, would not affect the question of morality: because, to sell it to another for that value when the former tenant was desirous of repurchasing, would not diminish the unkindness to him.—Dymond's Essays on the Principles of Morality.

SUPPLY OF GRAIN.

WINCHESTER, April 19.—The winter being now fairly over, and the principal ports in the north of Europe again free from ice, it may not be amiss to consider the probable extent of supplies of grain likely to be received from the Continent during the summer. With this view, it will be necessary, in the first instance, to endeavour to form an opinion of the result of the last harvest abroad. From all we have hitherto been enabled to learn on this important subject, it appears that throughout that tract of country where the bulk of the wheat shipped from Danzig, Königsberg, and neighbouring ports is produced, the crop of 1844 was decidedly defective, both as regards quality and quantity; and it may, therefore, be questioned whether prices will fall sufficiently low at those places to render consignments from thence to Great Britain desirable. According to the most recent advices from Danzig, we learn that speculators from the interior were paying high rates for the article, and it was not deemed probable that good high-mixed qualities would fall below 3s. per quarter. Should such really be the case, and quotations remain as low here as they are at present, it would be impossible to import without loss, and under all circumstances we are inclined to think that wheat will reach us from Danzig during the summer season at a price higher than is usual. In Pomerania, Mecklenburgh, and the Uckermark districts, as well as in all the other parts of the north, the harvest was a great deal better got in than it was further north. At present prices are relatively higher at Rostock, Wismar, Wolgast, Stettin, &c., than in this country, but they may be expected to recede at some point at which consignments may be made to England with a fair chance of profit, and we doubt not that some extent will reach us from the near ports; still, on the whole, there is not much likelihood of our being inundated with foreign wheat, more particularly as Holland and France are represented not to be in a position to export, but, on the contrary, more likely to require assistance from other countries. Should our conclusions prove correct, prices of wheat can scarcely fall here below their present very moderate range; but hitherto there are no symptoms of improvement, all parties connected with the grain trades showing the same want of confidence which has for months past been the principal characteristic of this department of business. At nearly all the leading provincial markets held during the week, buyers have acted with the utmost caution, and, though the smallness of the supplies from the growers has prevented reduced rates being submitted to, the turn has in most instances been against the seller.

As regards the appearance of the plant on the ground, the reports are mostly satisfactory, which may in some measure account for the continued want of animation in the demand.

A PUNISHED AND PENITENT MONOPOLIST.

(From the Hull Advertiser.)

A Free-Trade friend of ours is desirous that we should publish, for the especial edification of the Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham, and the members of the Central Protection Society, the following copy of an advertisement, which appeared in three of the London papers, in the month of June, in the year 1759—a few months before the accession of George the Third. The subject of it, Mr. William Margarets, was a protectionist; but it appears that the doctrine of protection was so ill understood in his day, that instead of being toasted at public dinners, like Mr. Baker, of Essex, and cried up as a farmers' friend, like Mr. Stafford O'Brien, this early and enterprising apostle of starvation was actually compelled to stand in the plight of a convicted and repentant culprit in the public market-place of the town of Ely:—"Whereas," says this primitive Corn-Law confessor, "I, William Margarets, the younger, was, at the last assizes for the county of Cambridge, convicted upon an indictment for an attempt to raise the price of grain in Ely market, on the 24th of September, 1759, by offering 6s. a bushel for wheat for which only 5s. 9d. was demanded; and, whereas, on the earnest solicitation of myself and friends, the prosecutor has been prevailed upon to forbear further proceedings upon my paying £50 to the poor inhabitants of the town of Ely, and a further sum of £50 to the poor of the town of Cambridge, and the costs of the prosecution, and upon my reading this acknowledgment of my offence publicly, and with a loud voice, in the presence of a magistrate, at the market-place of the said town of Ely, between the hours of twelve and one o'clock on a market-day, and likewise publishing the same in three of the London evening papers, all which I have done; and I do hereby confess myself to have been guilty of the said offence, and testify my sincere and hearty sorrow for having committed a crime which, in its consequences, tended to increase the distress of the poor in the late calamitous scarcity." To this abject confession of guilt William Margarets affixes his name, and it is witnessed by the then under-sheriff of Cambridgeshire. Now, the crime of William Margarets, thus penitentially atoned for, is one gloried in by the Dukes of Buckingham and Richmond. The piece of petty rascality perpetrated by William Margarets in the market-place of Ely, in 1759, was performed by a majority of the House of Commons in 1815, and repeated again in 1828 and 1842. The Corn Bill was no other than a fraudulent measure for forestalling and starving the poor. William Margarets was the prototype of the Duke of Richmond, and all those of his grace's class who endeavoured to raise the price of wheat from 40s. a quarter to 80s.—the price guaranteed by the bill of 1828. None, in his every "Everyday Book," has immortalized the repentance of William Margarets; may we indulge the hope that, in future editions of that popular and amusing work, the parallels supplied by the leading members of the Protection Society will not be overlooked? And if the champions of dirty butter and the defenders of the British grease-pot could be supplied with a niche, the group would be more attractive.

THE ENGLISH MARKET.

(From the Cincinnati Herald.)

We do not wonder at the zeal of the Free-Traders of Great Britain. The restrictive system of any country, however it may operate for a time, in the end proves mischievous. In 1805, 1806, and 1807, before the passing of the Corn Law, the exports of Great Britain to this country amounted to £8,000,000 per annum, our population then being six millions, so that the consumption of British goods was 26s. 8d. per head. In 1842 the exports hitherto had fallen to £3,528,000. The League deems an export of £1,000,000 per annum as sufficient to supply the demand at the existing rate of American duties, which, as our population is now eighteen millions, would be only 4s. 6d. per head. That paper errs in attributing this remarkable falling off in British exports to this country to the operation of the Corn Laws alone. The embargo, and many other restrictions on commerce, and the war of 1812, gave rise to American manufactures; and the circumstances of this country—its augmented population, increase of capital, growing skill, the presence of the raw material, cheapness of provisions, &c.—have all been influential in perpetuating and extending what the war gave birth to. But it must be admitted that the operation of the Corn Laws, by excluding from the British market nearly all of what we could give in exchange for her merchandise, and by provoking restrictive tariffs on our part, has vastly contributed to the efficiency of all these natural causes. A more liberal policy on the part of England would awaken a better feeling on this side the Atlantic.

The change in her tariff which took place in 1842, slight as it was by opening to some extent a new market for western produce, disposed the people of the West to liberal means of commercial policy. Let this change be followed up by such a modification of the Corn Law as will admit our corn and wheat into the English market at reasonable duties, and in a short time you would scarcely find an advocate of a high protective tariff throughout the whole West. That such a modification must be conceded sooner or later, is certain. Natural causes, steadily at work, will bring it about, if not the voluntary action of enlightened statesmanship.

Of the 57,000,000 of acres in Great Britain, 13,000,000 are reckoned incapable of cultivation, and 10,000,000 are lying waste. The present population is supplied by 34,000,000 of acres. It is calculated that, if all the waste lands were brought under cultivation, not more than 6,000,000 more of population could be supplied, so that the consumption will have reached the point of utmost production in the year 1850. As it is, on an average, one crop in seven fails in Great Britain, and from 1828 to 1839 she raised enough for her consumption only four years out of twelve! What will be the state of things, then, in 1860, when all the land capable of cultivation, under the highest culture, and the best auspices, will yield just enough for consumption—and when every year beyond that will bring more mouths than can be fed from home production? Her ports must then be thrown open to provisions from all parts of the world; but by that time, if her restrictive policy be adhered to, the United States and other countries, which under other circumstances might have constituted her best markets, will have established manufactures among themselves, supplying their own wants, so that if Britain obtain grain from them she would have to pay specie for it.

The truth is, the whole system of restrictions on commerce, by whatsoever nation adopted, is absurd, and, in the end, always ruinous.

THE GAME LAWS.

The following petition, signed by nearly 500 persons, was presented in the House of Commons, on Friday, the 4th instant, by G. Banks, Esq.:

"To the Honourable the House of Commons of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled;

"The signatures of the occupying proprietors, tenant-farmers, and others, resident in or near the towns of Wimborne and Blandford, in the county of Dorset, in this, their humble petition, sheweth—

"That they feel strongly the disinclination of the majority of the landed proprietors to lessen the quantity of game; and, on the other hand, view with deep concern its increase in most parts of the country.

"That they are perfectly satisfied, from daily experience, the preservation of game to such an exorbitant extent augments the vice and immorality of the labouring man more than anything else, by poaching and other crimes, which, if not so rigidly preserved, would not be the case.

"That the labourer, when detected in the crime, is committed to prison, supported by the county rate, the greater portion of which is borne by the tenant-farmer and trader, who also support his wife and family in his absence; after his discharge, his character being lost, employment is seldom found him, and, as a last resource, he is driven to the union-house, still a burden.

"That the destruction of crops on land occupied by tenant-farmers, in some parts of the county, is very great, being a barrier to all improvement of the soil, and, consequently, prevents many labourers from being employed, which otherwise would be the case, and is hastening the tenant-farmers to that distress which, unless some speedy means of assistance is afforded him, will ultimately prove his ruin.

"That the quantity of game weekly produced at the town and country markets, the proceeds of which, being very considerable, go direct into the pockets of the preachers, after being bred and fed at the tenant-farmers' expense, tends very much to lower the price of beef, mutton, and other agricultural produce; which, under present circumstances, is deeply felt.

"To these grievances your petitioners respectfully invite the serious attention of your Honourable House, and, as in duty bound, will ever pray."

ANTI-CORN-LAW LECTURES IN SUSSEX.—Mr. Falvey lectured to a numerous and enthusiastic audience, comprising many ladies, on Tuesday evening, the 22nd inst., in the Swan Hotel Assembly-room, Hastings. Mr. Stephen Thwaites was called to the chair, and introduced Mr. Falvey to the meeting. The lecture, which occupied more than two hours in the delivery, was listened to throughout with the most unqualified approbation.—Mr. Falvey lectured in the large room at the Cinque Port Arms, Rye, on Wednesday evening. It was market-day, and many farmers were present, who not only listened attentively, but, on the whole, appeared pleased with the proceedings. At the close of the lecture a vote of thanks was moved and seconded, and having been put to the meeting by—Hicks, Esq., was carried by acclamation.

THE INCOME-TAX AND THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.—The bill just introduced into the House of Lords by the Marquis of Normanby, "to extend the elective franchise to all persons paying the income-tax," has just been printed for their lordships' use. It consists of three clauses. The preamble recites the Acts 2 and 3 Wm. IV., c. 45 (the Reform Act), and the Income-tax Acts, and then proceeds to state that, "for the purposes of a parliamentary constituency, a simple property test, of easy and universal application, is hereby established, which will include large classes of persons who, by reason of the present local limitations and peculiar definitions of property conferring the right to vote, are now denied that privilege; and that it is just that those who are called upon to pay a direct tax on property, and testing the existence of it, should have legislative voice in the election of members of the Commons House of Parliament." The clauses then proceed to enact that every male person assessed to the income-tax shall, during the continuance of such tax, be entitled to vote at elections for members of Parliament, and Government officers duly authorised to collect the tax are to give certificates to those paying the same. The name of any person, also, who has been placed upon the list of voters is to be continued there during the existence of the act, unless he shall have ceased to be assessed.

POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—To the numerous other scientific attractions of this institution has been recently added a model of the Atmospheric Railway, which is now exciting general attention amongst those who are interested in railways.

ERROR.—The beginning of error may be, and mostly is, from private persons, but the maintainer and continuator of error is the multitude.—John Haler.

INCENDIARISM.—On Sunday night, about eight o'clock, an alarming fire broke out at Shillfanger, upon the premises in the occupation of Mr. Hammond, the property of Mr. J. Macro. It commenced in a barn. An engine from Dins was quickly on the spot, but, owing to a strong west wind that was blowing at the time, the whole of the building was quickly destroyed, as was also a small Wesleyan chapel adjoining, a double dwelling-house, pigsties, &c. A man has just been apprehended on suspicion.—Norwich Mercury.

SIR HENRY POTTINGER ON FREE TRADE.—At a public dinner, at which Sir H. Pottinger was recently entertained, at Glasgow, speaking of the great market which has been opened to us in China, he said:—"If the Chinese can only find the means of paying us, I may say the demand for our goods will be unlimited. The Lord Provost has told us that we can calculate on the consumption of above three hundred millions of people. This is, doubtless, correct; and we must remember, in looking at this subject, that every yard of manufacture, such as is fitted to clothe the Chinese, is a boon conferred on the people, inasmuch as it enables the Government to provide an additional quantity of food for the people. The great desideratum of the Chinese Government is to find food for the people; with that view they encourage every sort of manufactures, and you are aware they have no Corn Laws."

SUNDERLAND.—On Monday evening, the 14th inst., Mr. Liddell delivered a lecture in the Arcade Long Room, in this town, on the Corn and Provision Laws and Free Trade. The lecture occupied upwards of an hour in its delivery, and entered fully into the question of the Corn Laws, as those laws operate injuriously upon the leading interests of the country. At the conclusion of Mr. Liddell's address, Mr. Joshua Wilson delivered a few brief remarks, and a number of League tracts were circulated among the company. The following extract from the Journal of the Royal Society of Agriculture (the land-owners' society) was read by Mr. Liddell, and excited great amusement:—"Potatoes will ever be the peasant's standard vegetable, for, if of good nearly quality, they contain more nutriment than any other root; and three or four pounds are equal, in point of nourishment, to a pound of the best wheaten bread, besides having the great advantage of better filling the stomach. The liquor in which any meat is boiled should always be saved for the making of soup, and the bones even of fish should also be preserved; for although quite bare of meat, yet, if stewed down for several hours, they will yield a species of broth, which, along with peas, or oatmeal, will make good soup. A lot of bones may always be got from the butchers for twopence, and they are never scraped so clean as not to have some scrap of meat adhering to them. This done, the bones are to be again boiled in the same manner, but for a longer time, and the broth may be made the next day into a stew with rice. Nor is this all: for the bones, if again boiled for a still longer time, will once more yield a nourishing broth, which may be made into pea-soup, and when thus done with may either be sold to the crusher, or pouched by yourself, and used as manure for your garden."—"This was the food, said Mr. Liddell, recommended by the aristocracy for the people."

WORKING-MEN'S BATH.—The workmen of Bradford have some twenty or thirty men employed in the construction of their swimming-bath, and they expect to have it ready about a month hence. They are liberally patronized by the wealthy and influential classes in the town, having already received the promise of nearly £150 from fifteen gentlemen.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXVII.

TO JOHN HOUGHTON, ESQ.

SIR,—Your testimony, unaided by any argument, would have been important evidence in favour of Free Trade. It is a voice from the fields, in the heart of the metropolis. The meeting at Covent-garden Theatre would have received it respectfully; for that miscellaneous audience has now been trained to exercise reason, where other meetings express the dictates of passion or of preconceived opinion; and to appreciate not only the force of argument, but the value of experience. To your knowledge of the subject it was ready to render a deference which no dignity of station could there have commanded. You were heard as a man who has, for twenty years, with the stimulus of personal interest, been watching practically the operation of "protection": as the farmer of above 1000 acres of your own land, and a tenant of 2500 acres more; much of it being that inferior soil which is most thought to require "protection": as not only one of the largest arable farmers in England, but a land-agent for properties comprising more than 200,000 acres in England, Scotland, and Ireland; and thus enabled by extensive observation of its action upon proprietors and cultivators, to appreciate the real value of "protection": and as a gentleman whose evidence before the Parliamentary committee on agricultural distress, in 1836, and whose assistance at agricultural meetings subsequently had been deemed of high importance to the cause of "protection." These facts, Sir, rapidly intimated by Mr. Cobden when he introduced you to the meeting, would have sufficed to ensure you its profound attention, had you been there for the purpose of reiterating your former opinions, and not for that of declaring that further reflection and experience had convinced you of their fallacy. In proportion to the strength of this just and proper feeling, was the gratification of the assembly at the manly adhesion to Free Trade of one who can truly affirm that "all he has in the world is in land," and comes forward to confess and repudiate his long-cherished error, that the land needs any artificial enhancement by the Legislature of the price of its products, to render its cultivation profitable, or secure the cultivators from injury by the world's competition.

You are, Sir, in the honourable position of bearing what, considered simply as testimony, is perhaps of more weight and importance than that of any other witness yet called into court in this great controversy. Who should know, if not such a person as yourself? Whose opportunities have been ampler? Whose observation more extended? Whose position better for noting the influences of the system upon all classes concerned? And whose experience more decisive? It is your practice, I understand, when unable to let a farm, from the poverty of the soil or its being out of condition, to take it yourself of the proprietor; always on a 21 years' lease; to stock it well, farm high, and look for your returns, not immediately, but with eventual certainty. Such practice is the test of protection. It resembles those chemical agents, which detect the presence and nature of substances that are obscured by their combination. The farms which you take in hand are the primary argument for "protection." They are its extreme case of necessity and expediency. Your practice takes the bull by the horns. You are a living proof of the superfluity of "protection," for your own personal knowledge in this course of action has made you a Free-Trader. We have a right to tell the world to listen to you, as one who not merely reasons, believes, or speculates on the subject, but who knows. You have tried the experimentum crucis. You depose to facts. Supposing the two Houses of Legislation personified as judges on the bench, your evidence should make them say to each other, "Brother, this case is at an end."

The weight of your testimony is in accordance with the soundness of your argumentation. Every farmer in the country should ponder your question, "Have the laws of protection been of any service to you?" Who of them can lay his finger on capital that has been realized through the operation of those laws? Where are the tangible results? What little farmer became a large one by means of the first Corn Law; and a small proprietor by means of the second Corn Law; and from that has grown to a large proprietor by means of the present, or third Corn Law? Where are the lucky persons? Never did echo more dolefully answer "Where?" You may advertise for them in the Farmer's Journal or the Mark-lane Express. They will not be forthcoming. The Humane Society, at its anniversary, parades around the dinner table those who have been saved from drowning: were the Protection Society to parade the farmers whom its system has saved from difficulty, how many would it muster? What can be produced as its work beyond a bad rent-bargain? That, indeed, is its doing. In 1815, as you showed at the meeting, 40s. a quarter was guaranteed for wheat, and in seven years it was selling at 40s. In 1827 the new law promised

REVIEW.

The French in Algiers. (Home and Colonial Library, No. XIX.) London: Murray.

While we bestowed a fair meed of praise on the general spirit and execution of M. Thiers's great work, we intimated that there were some political views incidentally advocated by that able statesman which were fallacious in substance, and dangerous in consequences. England has commerce and colonies; France seeks colonies and commerce. The error of the French statesmen is, that they place colonies first in their category, and believe that if they establish settlements they can secure trade. There is no doubt that they can find plenty of English authorities to countenance them in this error; as one of our contemporaries has observed, "In the English colonial system there is a great deal of sense and a great deal of nonsense." M. Thiers discusses the question in reference to Napoleon's expedition to Egypt. He laments the expulsion of the French from that country, though he does not point out any practical or tangible advantage which would have resulted from retaining possession of it. The fruits of the valley of the Nile could be raised by native cultivators at a much cheaper rate than they could be produced by French planters; and the difference of cost would be just so much loss to the people of France—a loss aggravated by the expense of paying soldiers to protect the planters from the Arabs.

The question of the value of Egypt as a means of communication between Europe and India is beside the present issue, because steam navigation was unknown at the beginning of the present century; and without the agency of steam, the Red Sea would be practically worthless as a means of communication with India. "There are six months," say the Arabs, "when you cannot get into it, and six more when you cannot get out of it." Egypt would, at the beginning of the century, have been valuable merely as a colony; and the only question is, whether the value would be equivalent to the cost. This, however, is precisely the question which M. Thiers does not attempt to discuss, though he, having held office since France became possessed of Algeria, could easily have given an estimate of the expenditure and returns of the French colonization of Northern Africa. The nineteenth number of "Murray's Home and Colonial Library"—a series maintained with greater tact, spirit, and judgment than any other ever issued in Britain—furnishes us with the most graphic account we yet possess of the condition of Algeria under the French Government. It is translated from the narrative of Lieutenant Lamington, who served as a volunteer in the foreign legion employed by the French in Africa. The following is his brief description of the colony:—

"The whole coast, from Algiers as far as the fortified camp of Kouba, was formerly inhabited by the most wealthy Turks and Moors, who spent here in Oriental ease and voluptuous idleness the riches they obtained by piracy. Their country houses, built in a noble style of Moorish architecture, are proofs of the wealth of their former possessors. These are still in good repair, and are inhabited by Frenchmen and Spaniards, who have bought them for a trifle for the sake of the gardens of fruit and vegetables. The soil is wonderfully productive, owing to the numerous springs which rise in the mountains and water the ground throughout the year. Traces are still found both of the Roman and the Moorish method of irrigation. The bold arches of the Romans have long since fallen to decay, while the modest and simple earthen pipes of the Moors, which creep below the surface of the earth, still convey a fresh and plentiful supply of water. These few square miles on the Sahel form nearly the whole of the boasted French colony in Africa; cafés and canteens are their only possessions beyond the fortified camps and the range of the blockhouses, even near the largest towns, such as Medeah, Mihanah, Mascara, &c.; and these are only supported by the military, and may therefore be said to draw their resources from France.

"During the first years of the French occupation a considerable tract of the plains of Metidja came under cultivation. But the bad policy and worse system of defence of the French soon ruined the colonists. One morning, in the year 1839, Abd-el-Kader and his hordes poured down from the lesser Atlas range and destroyed everything with fire and sword. Those who escaped death were dragged into captivity. Since then the colonists have lost all confidence in the Government, and it will be very long before they recover it.

"Agriculture requires perfect security of property, and, above all, personal security. Setting aside the precarious condition of the colonists, the French are thoroughly bad settlers, and only know how to set up cafés. The few good agriculturists to be found here are either Germans or Spaniards. It is remarkable that the Spaniards, who in their own country are so lazy that they had rather starve than work, are here the very best agricultural labourers. Their diligence and economy almost amount to avarice."

The mode of civilizing Africa adopted by the French is sufficiently simple: it consists in retreating the brutality of the savage tribes, without taking much trouble to determine whether punishment falls on the guilty parties. An attack having been made on a French post by the Kabyles, an armed force was at once sent to destroy a Kabyle village, and, having marched all night, the soldiers were allowed to take a little rest:—

"After a short rest we started again, and the first glimmer of light showed the huts of the tribe straight before us. An old Kabyle was at that moment going out with a pair of oxen to plough; as soon as he saw us he turned a fearful howl and fled, but a few well-directed shots brought him down. In one moment the grenadiers and voltigeurs, who were in the advance, broke through the hedge of prickly pear which generally surrounds a Kabyle village, and the massacre began. Strict orders had been given to kill all the men, and only to take the women and children prisoners: for we followed the precept of 'an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth.'

"A few men only reeled half awake out of their huts, but most of them still lay fast asleep; not one escaped death. The women and children rushed, howling and screaming, out of their burning huts in time to see their husbands and brothers butchered. One young woman with an infant at her breast started back at the sight of strange men, exclaiming 'Mohamed! Mohamed!' and ran into her burning hut. Some soldiers sprang forward to save her, but the roof had already fallen in, and she and her child perished in the flames.

"We then returned with our booty, and it was high time, for other tribes of Kabyles came flocking together from every side, attracted by the noise. We were forced to retreat in such haste that we left the greater part of the cattle behind. The fire of the companies we had stationed in our rear with the field-pieces at last gained us time to breathe. We, however, had but few killed and wounded.

"A few days after, a deputation was sent by the survivors with proposals for the exchange of the women and children against cattle, which was accepted. It is a point of honour with the Kabyles not to leave their women and children in the enemies' hands. They most conscientiously ransomed even the old women, whom we would willingly have given them gratis."

As a companion picture, we extract the account of an attack of the Kabyles on the French:—

"On the night of the 4th of February, contrary to their usual custom, the Kabyles paid us a very well-meant visit. We lay in our barracks not dreaming of any danger, when we were awakened at eleven o'clock at night by repeated shots, and by some bullets which came through the deal boards of our barracks. In an instant we were dressed; each man snatched up his musket and went out. The shots came from a rock to the westward of the town, and only separated from it by a small arm of the sea. By some strange neglect no blockhouse had been built on this spot, which commanded the town. The Kabyles had stolen through the line of blockhouses in the dark, and from this rock they now fired into the town with their long rifles with some effect. The companies soon fell into rank. Lieutenant-Colonel Picolon, a cool, determined officer, made his appearance immediately, and placed all the sentinels of the town on a battery exactly opposite the rock, to answer the fire of the Kabyles, and thus to make them believe that the whole garrison was there: in the meantime we marched out at the gate in perfect silence, reached the rock unobserved, and fell suddenly upon their rear. At the very moment when they saw us and raised their wild howl, we gave them a volley and charged them with the bayonet. As the Kabyles are totally unacquainted with the use of it, they could offer us no effectual resistance, although they were double our number. Those who were not killed threw themselves into the sea, for, being mostly good swimmers, they chose rather to trust to the tender mercies of the waves than to ours. But even the very elements conspired against them. The sea was very rough, and the waves dashed the poor fellows to pieces against the rocks. But few escaped to tell the mournful tale to their kinsfolk. We remained on the rock till the following morning.

We had only taken three prisoners, for in the heat of the skirmish the soldiers cut down every one. Some, indeed, had even cut off the heads of the wounded with their own yataghans. The Commandant Supérieur rewarded these heroes with five-franc pieces, and stuck the heads over the city gates, where they remained until the stench became intolerable. Truly I almost begin to think that we have learned more of the barbarous manners of the Kabyles than they of our humanity and civilization."

Lamington gives a very lively and graphic description of one of Marshal Bugeaud's hunting expeditions in search of Abd-el-Kader. We quote a specimen of the kind of glory to be obtained in African warfare:—

"One evening, after a hot forced march, we saw on a mountain top, which formed a plateau, a great heap of stones which we knew to be a town. In two hours we were close upon it. Our battalion and several others climbed the steep hill, in order to enter the town from above, while the rest of the column attacked it from below. We were driving the Bedouins before us all the time. At length we reached the walls, which were low and battlemented, but to our astonishment no one appeared to defend them, and the gates stood wide open. Suspecting a ruse, some of us climbed to the top of the walls to look into the town. The next was empty, and the birds flown; as usual we had come just too late. The whole column poured into the town, which was I think called Callah, and the soldiers eagerly ransacked the houses. The owners could not have been gone long, for the kuskussu on the hearth was still hot. A few fowls, cats, and lambs, which the Kabyles had left behind in their hurry, and two rusty cannons, were all the spoil. A far greater godsend was a fine spring of water near the city gates. Here we made up for the thirst we had endured all day.

"After taking as much wood as was wanted to cook our supper, we set fire to the town. We then bivouacked on an eminence at a distance, where we slept as soundly as if we had performed some glorious action."

The sufferings of the soldiers on these hunting expeditions in search of the Bedouins, who almost always contrived to distance their pursuers, are very powerfully portrayed:—

"During all this time the number of sick increased fearfully; the forced marches, the excessive heat, and the quantity of meat which the soldiers ate without any other food but bad sea blouit, undermined their health. Diarrhoea and fever prevailed in every division. The mules were soon so loaded that many who could no longer drag themselves along were rejected and left to die on the road."

64s., and in nine years 35s. was all that could be obtained. In 1841 the new law did not promise—Sir Robert Peel often implies and seldom promises—but it implied 56s., and wheat is at 45s.—probably not yet at its lowest. What are all these facts but illustrations of the system as a provision for bad rent-bargains? If not its "being's end and aim," they are its inevitable result. They are all that protectionist farmers take by their motion. To this truth they will listen from you, Sir; they will "lend you their ears," which they seem to think insecure within reach of manufacturers: tell it them again, I pray you; and again.

That "the more we extend our commerce, the better will our produce sell;" that "in any part of the country where we find manufactures flourishing, and population increasing, there we find land and produce the most valuable;" and that Free Trade in sugar and timber is an item of large advantage for the farmer to take into his account, in the application of the general principle: these are truths felicitously illustrated in your speech. You have shown thereby to the agricultural classes in what consists their real interest. Another thing you have done, of yet higher importance. You have described and exemplified the spirit in which they should meet the rest of the community. You have pioneered their path towards a peaceful and honourable settlement of this agitation. The secret of such a settlement is all contained in your mode of following up your declaration of the necessity of extended trade: "Gentlemen, I say that it is necessary to do this; and I do not doubt that the landowners, tenants, and all classes will join hand in hand in carrying out so great a cause; that, like the phoenix springing from its ashes, shall we, the landowners of England, and we the tenants of England, arise and show, by our determination and by our skill, our desire to do all we can to procure for the people of this country what is necessary for them to eat." That, Sir, is what we ask, and all we ask. Produce as much as you are able; and do not bar our supplying the deficiency from other quarters. Let competition stimulate your efforts, and Free Trade complete the supply of our wants. Whatever bitterness of feeling may have been sometimes manifested, has arisen from the reaction of restrictions on the people's food. The present system obstructs their having "what is necessary for them to eat." Too many landlords, and tenants also, have evinced an apparent indifference to there being enough to eat. They support laws which tend to keep the price of produce below the natural demand. Fixing the price of produce has been their first, though vain, object; and the people's being well fed has sunk into at best a secondary consideration. Let agriculture frankly meet commerce, on your principle, and there is an end of animosity; they are at one for ever. Sir, your words tend to make Covent-garden Theatre a "Conciliation-hall," not for the repeal of a union between nations, but for the production of union between conflicting classes.

The noble effort you have made, in publicly abjuring the error of a life, implies a previous influence of no little power upon your mind. Convictions, deeply rooted and of long endurance, are not reversed without a struggle. The fact of your conversion to the cause of Free Trade presupposes volumes of practical commentary upon the restrictive system. You must have seen its pernicious results in deteriorating the permanent worth of the vast properties for which you are the agent. Such deterioration must needs become visible to the agent, before impressing itself on the mind of the proprietor; although he will speedily, if a wise man, avail himself of the knowledge and intellect which, on other points, he has found trustworthy. It is from agents that landlords must often learn their interests. And others besides yourself have doubtless witnessed such circumstances, affecting both landowner and tenant, as those which have acted on your mind. They have seen the injury to property on the one hand, and the gradual descent, on the other, towards the gulf of bankruptcy. Were landagents to speak out, they would be the fittest chroniclers of the fate of tenant-farmers. They know how and why so many have been sold up, and sent adrift on the world. The melancholy history of many a calamitous change must be preserved in their memories. It is for them to tell whether "protection" has made prosperity. They have now the example of speaking out what they know; of fairly describing what they see and feel of the condition of tenant and labourers; and may they do themselves and society the justice of following that example.

There is an Anti-Corn Law Almanac; and too many of the days in its calendar are dark with the commemoration of suffering and riot, want and crime, the terrible consequences of monopoly; but there shall be a white mark for the day when one so eminent as yourself in the agricultural interest came forward at a League meeting, amongst the first fruits of conversion in your class, to herald that harvest of opinion when laws which are a universal injury shall be abolished by universal consent.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

"The troops were so thoroughly disheartened that many of the soldiers destroyed themselves for fear of falling into the hands of the Bedouins. One of our battalions, who had been ill for some time, actually killed himself on a day of rest. On the pretext of cleaning his musket, he went down to the river side and blew out his brains."

The trophies of French valour must not be passed over without notice:—

"The prisoners, chiefly old men, women, and children, were driven with the cattle, under a special guard, in the middle of the column; it was heart-rending to see women and children, unaccustomed to walking and barefooted, and compelled to follow the rapid march of the column, over rocks and briars. Their feet were soon torn and bleeding, and they dragged themselves along with the greatest difficulty. They seldom made any complaint: only when one of their number dropped from fatigue, and was left behind, they all uttered a loud wail."

We believe that the plan of military colonies of veterans was devised by M. Thiers himself; the result of the experiment may serve to show the weight of his authority in questions of colonial policy:—

"At Coleah they have begun to form a colony of old worn-out soldiers, but I have great doubts of its success. These veterans, it is true, have the double advantage of being tolerably well used to the climate, and of knowing how to conduct themselves with prudence and coolness when attacked by the enemy; on the other hand, an old soldier generally makes a very bad peasant, and is ten times more patient of the dangers and hardships of war than of daily work with spade and plough. He usually takes unto himself some profligate woman not at all likely to attach him to his home, and then of course neglects his farm, and soon dissipates the small sum allowed him by the Government, and the end of it all is, that he sells his oxen and his plough, turns off his female companion, and enlists for a few years more. And now the old fellow who used to curse the service heartily, finds it quite a decent and comfortable way of life, and it is amusing to hear with what indignation he speaks of the life of a colonist."

Turn we now to Lieutenant France's account of his captivity with Abd-el-Kader; he is an officer of the French marine, and while making an excursion on shore he was seized by the Arabs, and, after having endured the most cruel indignities, was brought into the presence of Abd-el-Kader. The chief treated him with humanity, and promised him protection; but we must give a description of this renowned warrior:—

"Abd-el-Kader is twenty-eight years of age, and very small; his face is long and deadly pale, his large black eyes are soft and languishing, his mouth small and delicate, and his nose rather aquiline; his beard is thin but jet black, and he wears a small mustachio, which gives a martial character to his soft and delicate face, and becomes him vastly. His hands are small and exquisitely formed, and his feet equally beautiful; the care he takes of them is quite conquisitish; he is constantly washing them, and prying and filing his nails with a small knife with a beautifully-carved mother-of-pearl handle, which he holds all the while as he sits crouching on his cushions with his toes clasped between his fingers."

"His dress is distinguished by the most studied simplicity; there is not a vestige of gold or embroidery on any part of it. He wears a shirt of very fine linen, the seams of which are covered with a silk braid, terminating in a small silk tassel. Over the shirt is a haick, and over the haick two white bernouses; the uppermost garment is a black bernouse. A few silk tassels are the only ornaments about his dress; he wears no arms in his girdle, his head is shaved, and covered by three or four scull-caps, one within the other, over which he draws the hood of his bernouse."

"Abd-el-Kader's father, who died about two years ago, was a Marabout called Mahadin, who, by means of his fortune, his intelligence, and his character for sanctity, had acquired very great fame and influence among the Arabs. Twice in his life he had made the pilgrimage to Mecca, and prostrated himself before the tomb of the Prophet. In his second journey he was accompanied by his son, who was but eight years old. Young as he was, Abd-el-Kader acquired a great deal of useful experience, and learned Italian; he could already read and write Arabic. After returning from their pious journey, Mahadin instructed his son in the difficult study of the Koran, and at the same time taught him the conduct of affairs."

"As soon as we had concluded a peace with the Arabs after the taking of Algiers, Abd-el-Kader employed himself in exciting the tribes to revolt, in feeding and exasperating their animosity towards us, in stirring up their religious fanaticism, and above all in endeavouring to obtain the sovereign power over them. This, the talent, the energy, the bravery, and the cunning of the young Marabout soon procured for him; he quickly became their chief, and is now their Sultan."

He is far more cruel to the Bedouins who resist his authority, than to the French prisoners. The following instance of the punishment of one of the rebellious tribe of Beni-Flita cannot be read without a shudder:—

"Abd-el-Kader raised his hand, and the unhappy man was dragged away by the chains. One of the chains had fast his son in the battle, and had seen his head hanging to the saddle-bow of a Beni-Flita; with tears and lamentations he now implored the other chains to grant him the favour of putting the prisoner to death with his own unaided hand. He at last obtained it, and immediately rushed upon the Beni-Flita, and cut off his hands and feet with his yataghan. The children shouted for joy at this horrid sight, and the revengeful father watched with delight the hideous contortions of the victim who rolled in the dust at his feet, shrieking with rage and pain, and imploring his tormenter to cut off his head. When the Beni-Flita at length faintly from loss of blood, the chains passed a rope round his middle, and dragged him by it outside the enclosure of the camp; the children brought together a quantity of brushwood and dry branches, and set fire to them, and on this pile the chains threw the still living Beni-Flita."

"It was night, and the flames threw a lurid glare upon the dark tents: the piercing shrieks of the Beni-Flita long sounded through the camp. I covered my head with my haick, and groined when I thought that only a few leagues from this savage camp were the outposts of a noble and generous nation."

The extracts we have already given enable our readers to appreciate the nobility and generosity of the French in Africa.

We are now in a position to estimate the wisdom and policy of the system of colonization which M. Thiers deliberately recommends, and desires to see extended. He is anxious to see the Mediterranean a French lake; we should like to know why it might not as well be an Italian lake, a Spanish lake, an Austrian lake, or a Greek lake? but we are at a still greater loss to determine why it should be a lake at all. To say nothing of the question of justice, how could France acquire and secure a monopoly of this great inland sea? And, if it were acquired, what would be the value of the monopoly? Free Trade would give France as ample a share of the commodities she desires to import, and at a far less cost, than colonization and monopoly. The only advantage that France has derived from her African colonies is, that they afford places for bribes to her unworthy children, and graves to those most worthy of preservation.

American Facts. By G. P. Putnam, Esq. London, Wiley and Putnam.

The object of this work is to vindicate the character of the Americans from the charges usually brought against them by English journalists and travellers. We have felt no interest and taken no share in the bandying of reproaches and reciprocity of hard words, which have been too long maintained on both sides of the Atlantic; on the contrary, we believe that the people of Great Britain have a deep interest in the prosperity of the United States, and that the Americans are not less deeply interested in the prosperity of the British empire. A free interchange of their mutual productions is alone wanting to produce a perpetual interchange of mutual good will; commercial jealousy is the sole cause of the political irritability which is unhappily prevalent. We extract a few statistical particulars of the United States; they will help to show the extent of the markets closed against us by those Corn Laws which shut out the articles of payment which the Americans have to offer for our manufactures:—

"The United States of America occupy an area of 2,300,000 square miles; or 650,000 more than the whole of Europe, excepting Russia."

"Collectively, their greatest length is 3000 miles; their greatest breadth 1700 miles."

"They have a frontier line of about 10,000 miles; a sea-coast of 3600 miles; and a lake-coast of 1200 miles."

"Of the rivers: the Missouri is 3600 miles in length, or more than twice as long as the Danube; the Ohio is 600 miles longer than the Rhine; and the Hudson (entirely in the state of New York, and navigable for 160 miles) is 120 miles longer than the Thames."

"The territory of the United States is divided into twenty-six separate states and three territories, each of which has a separate government."

"The state of Virginia has an area of 70,000 square miles, and is about one-third larger than England. The state of Ohio contains 40,000 square miles, or 8000 more than the whole of Scotland."

"The harbour of the city of New York is the Atlantic outlet of a river, canal, and lake navigation of about 3000 miles, or distance from Europe to America."

"From Augusta, in the state of Maine, to New Orleans in Louisiana, the distance is 1800 miles; or 200 miles more than from London to Constantinople."

"Such general landmarks may be useful, perhaps, to some, in referring to the internal relations of the North American republic, and comparing it with other nations. The want of accurate outlines of its geographical extent and political divisions, frequently leads English writers into very erroneous impressions and statements,* which a few general facts would materially correct. More particular information on various points will be found in the second part of this volume, in tables, of which the following is a general summary, viz.:—

* "When Mr. Alison ('History of Europe,' vol. x.) charges 'the ardent democrats of Maine, the Ohio, and the Mississippi' with causing the Canadian disturbances, and says they would suffer little in case of a war, 'because their connexions are all inland,'—he writes, to say the least, very loosely; for he wrongly charges hundreds of thousands who live 1000 miles from Canada; and as to inland connexions, Maine happens to be the very state of the whole twenty-six which has the longest line of Atlantic coast; while the whole commerce of the Mississippi centres at New Orleans, one of the principal seaports. The English journals recently represented the Governor of New York as being obliged to call out the militia to arrest Anti-Mormon criminals; but the transactions referred to took place in a frontier state as far from New York as St. Petersburg is from London. Maunders's, Brooks's, and other Gazettes, published in London in 1844, describe New York, and other states and cities in the United States, exactly from the Gazetteers of fifty years ago! They would seem to have considered the country either as having been asleep since that time, or as too unimportant to need later description. And yet these works profess to be 'derived from the latest and best authorities.' Cincinnati, a city containing 46,000 inhabitants, is not even mentioned in these works."

descendants, probably 600,000 are natives of Europe. I should estimate the proportion in every 100 to be thus:—

Irish ..	35
Germans and Swiss ..	20
English and Scotch ..	20
French ..	15*
Others ..	10†
— 100

"How much is the country under foreign influence? Of the two millions and a half of electors, Custom-house returns will show that from 150,000 to 200,000 are natives of Europe. Compared to the whole, this number is not formidable; but, unfortunately, these 200,000, though nearly all incapable of understanding the nature and peculiarities of a republican government—and with nothing whatever at stake in the national councils—have yet been permitted to enjoy privileges which give them in fact a controlling power in public measures: for their numbers are sufficient to turn the scale of the political parties, and hence they are courted and feared by each party, and they hold the balance entirely in their own hands. The evils arising from this state of things are now beginning to be apparent; and a strong effort is being made, and very properly, to limit the right of suffrage either to natives of the country, or to residents of twenty-one years."

The following particulars of American commerce will interest our readers:—

"The commerce of the United States is, in extent, second to that of no other nation except Great Britain. In 1810, the capital invested in foreign trade by importing and commission merchants, was 119,295,367 dollars; in home retail trade, 250,301,799 dollars; in the fisheries, 16,429,620 dollars. The aggregate tonnage of vessels was 2,190,615 tons, of which 136,926 were employed in the whale fishery."

"The value of exports in 1810 was—
Of domestic produce... 115,895,634
Of foreign produce... 18,190,312

Value of imports: .. 132,085,916
107,141,519

Excess of imports .. 24,944,427

"The manufactures of the United States, though inferior to their agriculture and commerce, have recently received much attention, and have largely increased in amount, both for home consumption and for exportation."

"In 1810, the amount produced of home-made or family goods was 29,023,380 dollars."

"The cotton manufactures were 1240, with 2,281,631 spindles. They employed 72,119 persons; produced articles to the value of 46,350,453 dollars; and had a capital employed of 51,102,359 dollars."

"The woollen manufactures employed 21,342 persons, and a capital of 15,765,000 dollars; and produced goods to the amount of 20,696,999 dollars."

We deem it an act of simple justice to quote the defence made for "reputation":—

"In England, it is a common remark, that the Americans have repudiated, have openly refused to pay, their just debts, and that they ought, one and all, to be removed from the society of gentlemen. The accusation of repudiation by the Americans is the constant theme in the daily newspapers, and is to be found reiterated in works of received standard utility; and it is against this wholesale condemnation, as well as to fit the saddle upon the right back, that the following remarks are written."

"Of the twenty-nine states and territories constituting the Federal Union, the following are the only defaulters: viz., Pennsylvania, Maryland, Mississippi, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Louisiana, Arkansas, and the Florida territory; and the only one of the above which may justly be accused of the damnable doctrine of repudiation, is Mississippi."

"Many extenuating circumstances can be urged for each of the states separately; but as the limits of this article will not permit of their being dwelt upon, it will be only requisite to mention that four out of the seven, namely,

* "Including the people of Louisiana."

† "The descendants of the original Dutch settlers of New York are among the most respectable and wealthy of the present population of that state."

‡ "The imports in 1836 were about 180,000,000. This was the year of over-trading. The American vessels generally are noted for their superior models and sailing qualities; but the New York packet-ships, in particular, have long been famous in Europe, in these respects, and for their size, beauty, and appointments. Great improvements have been made recently; and there are now, in regular lines from New York, twenty-four packet-ships to Liverpool; twelve to London; and twelve to Havre. All these are built at New York—the size varies from 600 to 1200 tons. A New York packet sails to and from England and New York eight times a month. A considerable amount of American capital is invested in the South sea whale fishery. The small town of New Bedford (12,000 inhabitants) owns no less than 120 whaling-ships, and Nantucket sends out about fifty whalers. The town of Salem (Mass.), with 15,000 inhabitants, is probably the wealthiest place of its size in the world. It is largely engaged in the India trade, and has a valuable Museum, collected by navigators from its own port, in different parts of the world."

§ "Some hundred packages of American cotton goods, consigned to an eminent English house for re-exportation a year or two since, were temporarily seized at the docks in London, because they were marked 'Stark Mills, Manchester, N. H.,' thus being supposed a fraud on the Manchester manufacturer. It appeared, on inquiry, that the suspicion was groundless. There are some five or six Manchester in the United States, and there N. H. is the usual abbreviation for New Hampshire. Travellers say that they buy in New York a better hat, a better boot, and even a better pocket coat, than they usually can obtain in London; and this is not altogether an idle boast. It is ascertained that no less than 60,000 American cheap clocks have been imported and sold in England within one year. Only four or five years since large numbers of German clocks were sent to New York. Some Connecticut artisans took up the subject, and the same clocks at Hamburg and Bremen, who formerly exported clocks to the United States, now receive the American article for the German market. The annual fair of the American Institute displays a very remarkable progress in home manufactures in the last ten years."

AGRICULTURE.

THE STATE OF THE FARMERS.

There is no doubt that the most excessive distress at this moment exists amongst the tenant-farmers of England. Not a protectionist opens his mouth without proclaiming the fact. No provincial or metropolitan newspaper can be glanced at without affording some indications of the same melancholy truth. In the Morning Advertiser of last Tuesday the subject formed the topic of a leading article, in which the writer says, "as a class, the tenant-farmers of England are now on the brink of ruin." And after referring to twenty-one announcements of extensive sales of agricultural stock, which appeared in one week's paper, in Staffordshire, the property of farmers "giving up the farm," or "retiring from business," and so forth, the writer says:—

"There is a world of meaning in all this. The advertisements we have quoted most probably are those of men who, foreseeing what must inevitably happen if they cling longer to their farms, are giving them up before they are entirely ruined. They are 'retiring from business,' with whatever they can recover from the wreck of their little fortunes. How many thousands there are who cannot retire at all, because they have not a farthing remaining to retire with, can only be known when their landlords lay their clutches on them, and unceremoniously eject them from their farms."

So we find in the Brighton Herald, under the head Stealing, the following gloomy paragraph:—

"It has been communicated to us as a fact, in illustration of the state of the farming interest in this neighbourhood at the present time, that there is almost an uninterrupted series of farms reaching from Washington to Worthing—a distance of eight miles—now to be let, or about to be let. The first, which has been advertised, is Highden farm; for some time past used by the owner, who is reported to have lost hundreds of pounds by the cultivation of it. The next is North farm; and the third, Cobden farm—a name suggestive of important considerations. The fourth, the property of a mercantile gentleman, we believe, well known in the city of London, carries the tract of land alluded to, to Findon Turnpike-gate. The fifth farm, a large one, touching Salvington on the south and Durrington on the north, is said to have been very unprofitably held by the late and present tenants; a great portion of whose losses are attributed to the strict preservation of game and rabbits on the estate of the owner. The sixth and last farm, for the future tenancy of which some unsuccessful negotiation has been carried on, takes this extent of agricultural and pastoral domain to South farm, in the environs of Worthing. The maintenance of the game laws, in the case of the farm last alluded to, is charged with inflicting pecuniary injury on the tenant so severe as, with other circumstances depressing the condition of the farmer, to make the continued occupation of the land the inevitable cause of unsustainable losses to the holder. Besides the causes which are obvious to the public, as those operating to disturb existing arrangements between landlord and tenant, there may be in the cases adverted to, as it is but fair to allow, other influences of private and peculiar nature; such, perhaps, as at the best of times for the agricultural interest might come into operation. These, however, if any such there be, are as nothing compared to the great moving circumstances of the day in agriculture, which must necessarily affect landlord and tenant in this district as well as all others. The remark will bear general reference that the public are far from being wholly acquainted with the disturbances in farming arrangements which the present era (as it may, in respect to the agitation upon agrarian matters, be called) has produced. A number of unfavourable circumstances besetting the farmer, to which, although they might be truly described, it might be thought invidious, and would certainly be inexpedient, to allude; and, not least, the dispersed location of the farmers, combine to render their condition only partially apparent through the phases of things referable to the failure of agricultural pursuits. The farmers meanwhile are hastened onwards to a predicament of much diminished estate, if not insolvency; and are perforce almost ejected from the sphere of industrial occupations."

This is in a district peculiarly favourable to agriculture, and amongst a class of farmers supposed to be especially benefited by protection. Yet, behold the result of thirty years of landlord-protective legislation! Nor is this distress confined to a few districts. With certain exceptions it is universal. That the distress has been aggravated by the deficiency of last year's crops of lent corn and cattle provender, which, with Sir Robert Peel and his adherents, stands for the whole cause of distress, nobody will deny; but that is simply an aggravation of an existing evil: its sources lie much deeper.

Nor is this strange and anomalous fact to be overlooked, namely, that, concurrently and contemporaneously with the most grievous suffering amongst tenant-farmers, there exists a severe and unhealthy competition for farms,—so much so that at this moment numberless farmers will be found ready to undertake farms upon terms which render profit almost impossible, and ruin nearly inevitable! Except in cases where landlords are beginning to perceive that their own permanent interests can only be preserved by the tenant's prosperity, yearly tenancies, game preserves, restrictions on cultivation, maintenance of timber, and a multitude of other landlord-imposed burdens on the farmer are tenaciously clung to, and tenants, numerous tenants, are still found rash enough to attempt the cultivation of farms under such difficulties. As for the landlords, they are safe enough for a time, for they have the law of distress to resort to, and, whatever may become of the tenant, his family and his creditors, the rent is secure.

Whence does this distress and its accompanying symptoms proceed?

Now, as exceptions are said to prove the rule, we must observe those individuals and districts which have suffered least, in order to arrive at the causes of the distress.

There are a few men in most agricultural districts who, and there are several extensive districts in which the occupiers of land have practically disregarded the promises of high prices made to them, but not performed by the Legislature. These are the farmers who have farmed for quantity. High prices they doubtless liked; but great produce they have deemed indispensable. They have laid out large capitals in farming, and they have generally required and obtained the protection of secure tenures; for even large capital will not ensure profit in farming unless it be "sunk in the land." There are undoubtedly many men of considerable capital who occupy as yearly tenants; but it will be found that, in the great majority of instances, they tie themselves as little as possible to the soil. They keep much stock, they breed and they feed highly, they purchase much artificial food and extraneous manure, and they get as much as they possibly can from their land by mere manurance and routine cultivation. But they make no outlays which require years to get back with a profit. They do but little draining, and that little in a shallow and imperfect manner; they do not amalgamate the various soils which lie, perhaps, on their own farms; the great dressings of chalk and clay, which often give such an extraordinary increase of fertility, are never done by them; and they seldom undertake effective subsoil ploughing, which so materially ameliorates the heavy soils. And yet these improvements, and such as these, are necessary to obtain large produce. The power of manure applied in merely routine culture is extremely limited. The farmer soon finds he may grow more straw, but no more, possibly less, corn; and it is only by expensive and well-conducted ameliorations of the soil itself, continued through a considerable period, together with a full supply of manure, that the farmer can hope to reap a large return for a given outlay.

But, although the farmer who thus more permanently amends his land requires a more considerable capital at the commencement, he obtains larger crops in after years at a less yearly cost than the tenant, let his capital be what it may, who holds himself always prepared to give up his farm, whether from actual insecurity of tenure, or from his own apprehensions as to the prospects of agriculture. A price which would give the one farmer an ample profit, might be ruinous to the other, because the one may have grown forty bushels of wheat to the acre, at a cost not merely relatively, but absolutely less than the other has grown twenty-five bushels per acre. The Corn Laws have been the sole reason why farmers, who all know the truth of the above statements, have so long continued to look to profit from a high price upon a small produce. Nineteen farmers out of twenty would say they calculated on a price for wheat from 12s. to 15s. a quarter higher than the present price, which would probably be about the natural price, with a Free Trade, and a season of ordinary abundance; and in consequence, while they engaged to pay rents calculated on the same scale, they assumed a comparatively low acreable produce would save them harmless. This has led them so generally into taking farms too large for the amount of capital they employ, which now, independently of too high rents, forms the main obstacle to their adoption of a better system. At this moment the farmers' capital is being transferred wholesale into the pockets of the landowners as rent; and those who have been squeezed dry, as well as those who see that, if they go on as of late they have been going on, they also must soon be drained of their last shilling "to make up the rent," are the men who, perforce only by an unwilling choice, are "retiring from business." Heaven only knows what will become of them!

Nor is there any help for farmers but in the abolition of the Corn Laws. Then they will know, and their landlords and land-agents will know and acknowledge, that moderate prices only can be expected, and that he who would make a profit by farming must raise large produce. Many might advantageously give up a part of their land, and cultivate the rest with more care; some would borrow the additional capital they might require when farming had ceased to be a gambling trade, and the tenants were protected in their possessions by leases; and others, by lengthening their rotations, by growing grain less frequently and with better preparation, and by increasing their growth of green and root crops for stock, would find that profits are in no degree dependent upon high and artificial prices. Let farmers consider these suggestions, which result from a deep sympathy with their distress and a strict identity with their interests, and they will soon fully understand, what they are beginning to perceive, that they have been made

Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Florida, are all of them of such recent origin, that difficulties might reasonably be expected. Nevertheless, each of these states has been exerting itself to get out of its difficulties. Illinois has succeeded very recently in raising in this city a loan of 1,600,000 dollars, of which sum 200,000 dollars are now in the hands of the London banker: this money is to be applied to the finishing of her canal, and as soon as it is finished the farmers will be able to send their produce to market, and then they will be able to pay their taxes.

"Indiana offers to pay 60 per cent. on the amount due annually for her interest, the principal being acknowledged in full.

"Michigan pleads that she is ready to pay the interest on every dollar which she has received; but is unable to pay on the amount of which she was robbed by the United States Bank, who received the subscription on the loan, and only paid the states one-fourth of the money.

"Florida territory alone is inert.

"Maryland, with its small extent of territory and large canal, has had much to contend with, more especially as the downfall of American credit has prevented the further advance of those funds which were absolutely requisite to finish the canal to the coal region, from whence the chief source of profitable returns is to be expected.

"Louisiana can hardly be called a defaulter, inasmuch as she continues to pay regularly on the larger portion of her loans, and has only failed in those bonds issued to two of her banks.

"Pennsylvania, since February, 1842, has not paid any dividends, at least not to any who did not come under the denomination of small holders; but never was satire more misplaced, or ignorance more completely shown, than when 'the drab-coloured men of Pennsylvania' were held up to public odium; for the fact stands forth, simply thus: the 'drab-coloured men' are almost entirely limited to Philadelphia, and the city of Philadelphia never for an instant defaulted: its five per cent. stock, even during the worst times, never fell below ninety-eight in America. The really blameable parties are the agricultural German settlers, who possess a majority in some of the counties; many of them cannot either read or write in any language; almost all are unable to understand the English language, and place a ban upon any descendant who should so far forget the manners of his forefathers as to make any attempt to assimilate himself, by his acquisitions, to those people among whom he dwells. At present there are nearly as many German newspapers published in Pennsylvania as English ones; now, however, that the Germans have been made to understand that deep dishonour has fallen upon their state, and that Vaterland sees with sorrow the contempt into which they have fallen, they have readily come forward with their hard dollars, and contributed to remove the stigma.

"By condemning in one fell swoop the entire of the states, those states which have made efforts to uphold their honour derive no credit from their exertions; and here let me point out some of those whose actions are deserving of praise.

"Ohio, which was nearly falling into the same error as Pennsylvania, took a very summary course for paying the interest: the legislature of that state placed the power of raising the requisite taxes in the hands of the auditor; he was to name the per centage on the property in the state required to pay the interest; and, if any irregularity occurred, he was to be held answerable.

"Alabama went yet further to uphold its credit; she laid sundry taxes on billiard-tables, cotton, brokers' commissions, and finally, an unmitigated poll-tax, without reference to age, sex, or condition: this was twelve months ago, and up to this time a second Wat Tyler has not been heard of.

"New York State has raised its property-tax, so that, if a citizen of the state has £1000 in New York stock, he pays a tax of £1 per annum; while, if he has the same sum in British Consols, he would only pay 17s. 6d. per annum, or three per cent. on his income. A holder of property in England pays 7d. in the pound sterling, on the income produced by it; but a holder of property in Ohio or Pennsylvania pays 1s. on every £100 of capital; and if he did not obtain a better interest for his money than the holder of Consols obtains, this tax would then be equivalent to 2s. in the pound, or ten per cent. of his income; and yet these very Ohioans, who have endured this heavy taxation, are classed in the same category as the repudiating Mississippians.

"In fact, all these states have made many stringent laws to fulfil their engagements; and recent circumstances indicate that the same course of policy will continue to be pursued.

"The only state in the Union against which the scorn of civilization can be justly directed, on the ground of entertaining the doctrine of repudiation, is Mississippi. This state is rich in resources, and cannot plead poverty; but even here a few words might be urged in mitigation. By the last accounts of voters there, we find that the number of persons in that state who were for payment of the bonds were 18,665, and against paying them 21,036; and there can be no question but that the minority contains the wealth, the talent, and the respectability of the state; but unfortunately they are outvoted by those who are neither the tax-payers, nor have any deep interest in the commonwealth.

The extracts which we have given sufficiently indicate the nature of the contents of this volume. We must, however, remark that there are traces of haste and carelessness in the composition which greatly deteriorate the value of the work, and that the author is obviously unacquainted with the principles of economic science. He has put forward a defence of the American system of protection so exquisitely absurd and inconsistent, that it would seem as if he had intended to save critics the trouble of refutation, by taking the task upon himself.

THE TRADE OF RUSSIA.—Letters from St. Petersburg place the commercial movement of Russia at 250,000,000 of silver roubles per annum: the number of vessels engaged exclusively in the exportation of Russian products amounting annually to 5000, and the value of their cargoes to 180,000,000 of silver roubles. The coasting trade employs 7000 vessels, the cargoes of which are estimated at 10,000,000 of silver roubles per annum.

the dupes, the catspaws, and the victims of the most selfish clique of monopolists the world has ever seen.

NEW TURN OF THE GAME-LAW SCREW.

The following game-law case should serve as a caution to Mr. Bright, and those legislators who act with him in the endeavour to relieve the farmers from the oppression of game laws, not to be content with any mere modification of those laws. The axe must be laid at the root of this agricultural Upas-tree, and the modern feudalists and barbarian squires must have no rest until all game laws have been expunged from the statute-book.

IMPORTANT DECISION ON A GAME SURCHARGE.

At the Devises petty sessions, on Monday, Wm. Coleman and Thomas Hayward, both of Great Chiverell, appeared to a surcharge made upon them by the surveyor of taxes, for killing game without having previously obtained a game certificate. It appeared by the evidence of a witness, William Sloper, that he was in company with Coleman and Hayward, at Chiverell, on the 8th of November last, and saw Hayward, agreeably to a previous arrangement, take a gun from under his coat, and shoot a hare, upon lands in the occupation of Coleman's father. The hare ran a short distance from the spot where shot, when Coleman ran after it, kicked it over, and carried it away. To rebut this testimony, one witness for the defendant swore that he was present, and heard Hayward shoot, but could not see what he killed, though he was only a few yards distant, and saw Coleman stoop and pick up something; and another witness, who was also present, swore that what Hayward shot at was a rabbit, and not a hare. Coleman's father proved that the land where the offence was committed was in his occupation, and, being much infested with rabbits, he had given permission to Hayward and his son to kill them whenever they pleased. It appeared also that Coleman had been previously convicted of the same offence under the game law. The allegation that the animal shot was a rabbit, and not a hare, did not serve the defendants, who were much surprised on finding that they were equally liable in either case. The magistrates confirmed the charge of double the certificate duty against both defendants, it being held by the judges that the exemption in the Assessed Taxes Act, enabling 'the taking and destroying conies by the tenants of lands either by himself, herself, or themselves, of by his, her, or their direction and command,' applies only to the destruction thereof as vermin, and not as to the present case, by way of sport. The mere permission, therefore, of the tenant is insufficient to exonerate a person killing rabbits from liability to the certificate duty; and, however hard this decision might appear, the magistrates have no alternative but to confirm the charge in every case, whenever it appears that the alleged offence was committed by way of sport, and not by the order or command of the tenant, and for the bona fide purpose of destruction.—Provincial paper.

RURAL GRATITUDE.

The protectionists of Worcestershire have shown a thankfulness for "small mercies" which cannot be too much commended. Unlike their dissatisfied co-monopolists elsewhere, they have thanked Mr. Miles for his late motion in the House of Commons. Lest we should be doubted, here is the evidence of the fact:—

"MR. MILES'S MOTION.—The Worcestershire Agricultural Protection Society have passed a vote of thanks to Mr. Miles, M.P., for the motion he recently brought forward in the House of Commons, and have likewise expressed their unreserved opinion in favour of 'no surrender.'"—Morning Post.

If such services deserve the thanks of protection societies, surely the Free-Traders have no right to be dissatisfied, for probably no single motion ever did more to hasten the abolition of protection than that of Mr. Miles.

We cannot help asking, however, why the monopolists of Worcestershire did not include Mr. George Banks and Mr. Bramston in their vote of thanks, for of a certainty the determined stand taken by those gentlemen against the "surrender" of grease and lard, and so forth, was worthy of all praise. We, the Free-Traders, at all events, give our most cordial thanks to both the latter gentlemen, as well as to Mr. Miles, for the monopoly-damaging debates which they originated. We hope these ardent protectionists will make more such motions; and they had better do so this session, as it is probably the last in which squararchical ignorance and landlord rapacity will have the opportunity of making such displays.

POLITICAL DESTITUTION.

One of those hard cases of political destitution which are occasionally heard of, has recently come before the public. The unfortunate politician whom the world has passed by is Earl Stanhope, who being a thorough "protectionist" thus bewails, from "Botzen in Tyrol," the desperate condition of monopoly, and the unkind way in which he has been treated by the present leaders of the monopolists. His lordship says:—

"I am deeply impressed with the conviction that the measures which have been adopted by the present Ministers to depress prices and to discourage British industry of almost every description, are ruinous in their nature, and may become revolutionary in their operation. It gives me very sincere satisfaction to reflect that I strenuously opposed those measures; but I had no success, for I did not receive sufficient support from my fellow-citizens, although great numbers of them concur entirely in my opinion, and ought to have cordially united in a common cause. Without their active support my exertions could be of no avail, and it would be useless to address those who, being guided by party spirit, would not be convinced by arguments; or who, even if they were so, might not assist me by their votes. As I have during many years been well known to be a faithful and zealous friend of the agricultural interest, and of all the other productive classes of the community, I had much reason to be surprised when the agricultural movements took place some months ago at finding that no communication whatever was made to me upon the subject, from any district, even from those with which I am connected, and my advice and assistance might have been of no service, as they had not been solicited. I have been deserted by those whose rights I was most anxious to defend, and whose support I was justly entitled to expect, and, under such circumstances, I cannot be blamed for discontinuing my exertions. I have for the present retired from public life, in which I do not intend to engage again unless patriotism and public spirit should be revived, or until those who suffer from the effects of Free Trade should act with much more energy and union than they have hitherto shown."

And he afterwards says:—

"If I had been consulted in regard to the 'Protection Society' which has been formed, I would have represented that it ought not to have been confined to the agricultural classes, but to have included all those who are engaged in any branch of British industry, as all of them have a common interest in opposing Free Trade, and that they ought not to be satisfied with resisting further encroachments, but that they ought to insist upon 'full and effectual protection,' which they have an undoubted right to demand."

His lordship is plainly one of those acute persons who suppose that the way to make a nation right and prosperous is to set each interest to rob every other interest, and we have no doubt the cunning men of "No. 17, Bond-street," well knew that his lordship is much too honest for their purpose. They want to protect rents, and they know well enough all other protection laws are mere delusions; hence a well-meaning man, who sincerely believes that general robbery of each other is the true road to national prosperity, would have been a sad stumbling-block in the present state of monopolist infirmity. Richmond and Buckingham are cunning enough to see that poor Earl Stanhope's highflying protectionist notions—we had written nonsense—won't do at this day. This reminds us of a story told of a celebrated translator of Plato, who in his enthusiastic admiration of his author had expressed concurrence in his theological, or rather mythological, belief. Of course these opinions were entertained in a speculative sense. It happened, however, that a Frenchman got hold of the learned translator's work, and being himself an admirer of Plato, and a more literal believer in his creed, came over to this country and proposed to the astonished Greek scholar that they should join in publicly sacrificing a bull to Jupiter!! This was too much for the Englishman's Platonic fervour, and the enthusiastic Frenchman was dismissed with a short answer. Now, the known desire of Lord Stanhope to "protect" everybody at the expense of everybody, must have had about the same repelling effect in the minds of the leaders of the "Central Protection Society"—whose real object is to "protect" the landlords against all the community—as the proposal of the mad Platonist to sacrifice a bull to Jupiter, had on his more sober co-believer.

There is one passage in Lord Stanhope's letter, however, which shows how the truths which Mr. Cobden so admirably developed in his late speech, are gradually working into the minds of those least accessible to argument. His lordship's letter is addressed to "Mr. A. Wing," of Buckinghamshire, in reply to one from that gentleman; and he says:—

"I think that the difficulties which have been experienced on dairy farms have arisen much more from the extraordinary deficiency in the crops of grass and hay after a drought of very unusual duration, than from the low prices of grain, which, when it is grown principally for the consumption of the tenant, cannot have such an injurious effect as in the case under other circumstances."

Here we have the admission from the ne plus ultra of protectionists, that low prices of those articles consumed by the farmers do them no harm. Let the intelligent farmers follow out this train of argument by reference to the facts and circumstances of their own business.

RESULTS OF THE NEW SUGAR DUTIES IN IRELAND.

—The recent alteration in the sugar duties, and the corresponding reduction made by the grocers to the consumers, is working admirably for the poor; and, so far from being a serious loss to the revenue, there is an opinion amongst our merchants that, as far as Ireland is concerned, the revenue will be improved. The demand for this article has already increased upwards of 30 per cent. on the general average of what it was, say a year ago; and this is accounted for by the classes which were unable to obtain better than milk or salt, now using low-priced tea, shell cocoa, &c. Taking, therefore, the increased consumption of sugar with the increase in the revenue arising from tea and the other exciseable articles, the loss to the revenue, on the whole, will not be so serious as even Sir Robert Peel anticipated in his speech on opening the budget.—Dublin Correspondent of the Herald.

GAMBLING IN RAILWAY SHARES.—This is a most dangerous practice, for share-gambling is, like all other gambling, seductive, uncertain, and almost necessarily sure to lead by small successes to large losses and irretrievable ruin. Few know how to gamble prudently—the winnings of to-day may be converted into overwhelming losses to-morrow, and that too while the gambler is quite satisfied in his own mind that he is proceeding cautiously, prudently, and with winning cards in his hands. Already have we heard of some parties in Dublin having suffered such heavy losses that they have been forced into retreat. The case of one young man who had a stated salary, and some money saved, has been mentioned to us. He was induced to embark in the purchase of some scrip, and succeeded in making a profit. Again and again he risked and won; then, hazarding deeply, he lost his all and was forced to leave the country. Such cases as this are scarcely ever heard of publicly, and thus it is that affliction and misery visit many private families before the great crisis arises that deranges the circulation, convulses trade, and shakes the commercial prosperity of the country.—Irish Railway Gazette.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, April 26, 1845.

The preparations for the Bazaar are now so far advanced, that the general effect of the decorations can be correctly estimated. The transparent ceiling is completed, and the coup d'œil, from the entrance, is the most gorgeous that can be imagined. The Committee of the Ladies Secretaries met on Thursday at Covent-garden to make arrangements for attendance at the stalls, and the number of volunteers to superintend the sales was found to be amply sufficient to ensure a constant supply. Since Monday large quantities of packages of contributions have been received in the theatre, and the variety of the articles sent will render the task of classification one of no ordinary difficulty. Viewed merely as an exposition of the products of British industry, the Bazaar will be the most interesting exhibition ever opened in this country, and in some of its features will not only rival but surpass the recent expositions on the Continent. The gothic hall into which the theatre has been converted is equally novel in its design, and gorgeous in its execution: the transparent ceiling and illuminated windows seem rather like the fabled palace of the "Arabian Nights" than the work of ordinary mortal hands. From the correspondence which we have published, and the extracts we have given from the country papers, it will be seen that the different towns of England and Scotland are zealously seconding the efforts of the London Committee; and it is only justice to the Ladies Secretaries in London to declare that they are indefatigable in their exertions to have all arrangements for the pleasure and convenience of visitors as complete as those for the despatch of business.

As it would be impossible for us to record in our limited space the proceedings of the Bazaar, arrangements have been made for the daily publication of a Bazaar Gazette, which will contain descriptions of the most valuable articles displayed, and a notice of the most interesting incidents that occur. We shall but briefly notice the proceedings at the Bazaar, but we feel assured that they will be of a character certain to advance the success of our righteous cause. The Bazaar, viewed merely as an exposition, will be an unrivalled display of British skill, industry, and ingenuity; and it will show to our rulers the magnitude of the interests that are staked on their recognition of the principles of sound policy and common justice.

FRANCE.—The Chamber of Deputies commenced on Monday last the discussion on the proposition of M. Murat de Bord, for converting the Five per Cent. stock into Four-and-a-Half. The five per Cent. rose upwards of 1-3rd per cent., from a conviction that the King was averse to the proposed reduction, and that the bill would be rejected. M. Guizot, who was suddenly taken ill on Saturday, is now convalescent.

Another émulate had broken out in the Polytechnic School, which had led to the committal of 21 of the students to the prison of the institution, and 11 more to the Abbaye.

The Moniteur Algérien of the 15th instant announces the departure of the Governor-General for Blidah on the preceding day. That journal states, that the Arabs residing on the southern frontier of the regency had of late sent parties into the interior to excite the friendly tribes to revolt or desert. A "dowar" of the Beni Amira, yielding to the suggestions of these emissaries, having effected their escape at night, Colonel Vinola, commander of the post of Sidi Bel Abbes, marched in pursuit of the fugitives, a "goum" of the Ouled Selmann and Djaffras. But, just as the latter had come up with the emigrants, they encountered 150 horsemen of Abd-el-Kader, who were protecting their retreat. An engagement ensued, in which the French remained masters of the field; but they lost five killed and twelve wounded, and were unable to bring back the "dowar." The same symptoms of hostility manifested themselves in the province of Medeah. The Khalifat of Laghouat was lately repulsed to Medeah, bringing to General Murey some cattle in payment of the contribution of his district, when he was attacked at night in the desert by a hostile chief of the Ouled Nails, named Tedly. His small escort was dispersed; he lost his cattle, tents, and baggage, but succeeded in reuniting at Medeah the greater number of his men.

BRUSSELS, April 19.—A youth aged only 17, who had been found guilty of parricide, was guillotined yesterday at Namur, in presence of an immense crowd. About six in the morning the criminal, barefooted and with his head covered with a black veil, was conducted from his prison to the place of execution, accompanied by the chaplain, and by the confraternity of the Miséricorde, who recited the prayers for the dead. After he had ascended the fatal instrument, he kissed for the last time the crucifix which was presented to him, and endeavoured to speak, but his voice failed him. In a minute or two the work of human justice was completed. He appeared to have been very repentant, and passed the whole of the preceding night in prayer.

SWITZERLAND.—The Presse (Paris paper) says:—"We have received a private letter from Switzerland, containing news which we give with reserve, although coming from a good source. According to this letter, the check received by the free corps has not discouraged the Radicals, who will not renounce their design of destroying the federal compact of 1815. We are informed that Berne, Vaud, Soleure, Argau, and Bale country entertain the project of separating themselves from the Confederation, and constituting together a Helvetic Republic, one and independent. It is believed, however, that M. Neukaus, the avoyer of Berne, to whom in great part this extreme resolution is attributed, will think twice before he makes any attempt on a compact guaranteed by the great powers, and which cannot be annulled without the consent of all parties." The Helvetic Diet adopted no decision on the 16th inst. The committee was of opinion that the Assembly should abstain from decreeing any measures until the deputies, called to sit in the ordinary Diet, should have received their instructions. The demand of Lucerne, that the remains of the free corps should be disarmed wherever they existed, had not been acquiesced in by the majority. A letter from Berne of the 17th inst. mentions that, the greatest insubordination prevailing among the militia, the Government had been obliged to disband the ninth battalion, which kept garrison at Berne.

The Helvetic Diet resolved, on the 19th inst., to refer the consideration of the Jewish question to the ordinary Diet, which is to meet in July.

CONSTANTINOPLE, April 2.—The state of European Turkey is such as to excite serious misgivings as to the maintenance of tranquillity—a tranquillity upon which the peace of Europe itself is in some measure dependent. This is now threatened from several quarters, and various causes of disorganization are simultaneously at work. Rebellion, which was never completely suppressed, has again raised its head in Albania. A force, consisting of upwards of 2000 men, have attacked the town of Yendi, and burnt the church. The Caimakan of a district in the neighbourhood of Monastir is said to be at this moment surrounded and besieged by a band of insurgents. The precautionary measures taken by the Porte, and, in some measure sanctioned by the representatives of the Protecting Powers of Greece, have been communicated by Sir Stratford Canning to Sir Edmund Lyons. Despatches, containing an account of these proceedings, were transmitted by her Majesty's steam-sloop Virago on the 29th of March. 200 Greek transport-ships have been engaged by the Russian Government to assist in conveying troops and stores to the coast of Circassia. From this fact, as well as the unusually formidable levies which have been made for the ensuing campaign in the Caucasus, it would appear that Russia is meditating some decisive blow in that quarter. In the meanwhile the Turks cannot witness the mustering of such mighty armaments in their immediate neighbourhood without some secret alarm and uneasiness.—Correspondent of the Times.

THE INTENDED ATTACK ON ADEN BY THE ARABS.—Extract of a letter received at Lloyd's, from their agent at Aden, dated March 29:—"The attack threatened by the Arabs has not taken place. They had assembled in force to the number of 20,000; but, as usual, they quarrelled amongst themselves, had a fight, and the whole force may be said to be broken up."

INDIA.—The usual extraordinary express, in anticipation of the overland mail from India by way of Calcutta, reached London on Monday, bringing news from Calcutta to the 8th of March, Madras to the 11th inst., and China to the 4th of February. The news brought by this conveyance is destitute of interest. The Punjab remained perfectly quiet, and was not likely to be disturbed until the arrival of the cold weather. The Sindh campaign appears to have been at an end, Bajar Khan, the only remaining mulctant, having offered to surrender, on the condition that his life would be spared, and some land allotted to him. The war in the Mahratta country appears also to have burnt itself out. With regard to the Punjab, the Government was on the alert, but had evidently no intention to act on the aggressive. The Governor was at Calcutta promoting the cause of education and internal improvement. Afghanistan was quiet. Akbar Khan remained, when last heard of, inactive at Jellalabad.

CHINA.—Accounts from Shanghai reach to the 22nd inst. The trade carried on was almost wholly by barter for raw silk and tea, principally green. It was believed that during last year transactions to the amount of nearly one million sterling (including exports) had taken place. The correct amount will only be known when the consular accounts are published, but in the meantime, if this estimate is at all a near approximation, it shows a very favourable progress for the first year that port has been opened. Hong-Kong Register, Feb. 4.

WEST INDIES. The Trent, Royal Mail Company's steam-ship, Captain Fuller Boxer, which left Jamaica on the 24th of March, arrived at Southampton on Tuesday, with the usual mails and a large number of passengers. She has had a very favourable passage, on the whole; since leaving Fayal, however, she has experienced contrary winds, which accounts for her being two days overdue. The accounts from the island of Jamaica are very cheering. Although the weather had been exceedingly hot, the prospects of a fine sugar crop are very good. The information conveyed by the steamer of the alteration in the sugar duties was, as might be expected, well received, and gave great satisfaction to the growers. The Jamaica Morning Herald says:—"We regret to state that a serious drought has for some time prevailed in this portion of the island, which we fear will tend materially to affect the interests of the planters. We regret to find that there continue to be ineffectual attempts to set fire to the city of Bridgetown, Barbadoes. Three of these attempts were made at our premises, but no discovery of the guilty incendiaries has been made. The weather had been dry and dusty, but had undergone a pleasing change, there having been cool light showers. Up to the 7th inst. more than 5000 hog-heads and several hundred barrels of sugar had been shipped, and the utmost activity prevailed."

BRESON AYUK. Accounts have been received from Buenos Ayres to the 7th of February. Nothing of consequence had occurred before Monte Video, but the English and French naval commanders still refused to acknowledge the close blockade which Rosas had ordered to be established. Letters received by the Chile state that the Governments of Brazil and Paraguay had concluded a treaty, offensive and defensive, in which, amongst other things, they stipulate for a mutual right of navigation on the Parana and the other rivers which flow through the territories of both. This news, if true, is a death-blow to Rosas's designs on Paraguay.

SPAIN.—The Madrid Gazette publishes a royal decree for the classification and general management of the convents, in order that they may be turned to such account as the Government may think proper. The decree consists of three articles, and is dated the 13th of April.

We read in the Phare of Bayonne:—"Several Carlist refugees, who were bearers of passports en regle to enter their own country, have been obliged to return to France, the Governor of Irun not having permitted them to continue their route. It is generally believed that it is in consequence of some misunderstanding in the transmission of orders that this latter determination has been taken. But, if it has emanated from the Government, it seems to us that it ought to have been made public."

DOMESTIC.

On Tuesday her Majesty and Prince Albert paid a visit to the Great Britain steam-ship, at Blackwall. Her Majesty and the Prince, accompanied by several members of the Royal Household, were received at the landing-place, at the Fishmongers' Wharf, by the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and other civic officers. The royal barge was towed down the river by the Waterman Company's vessel, 10. Her Majesty and the Prince were shown over the Great Britain by Lieutenant Hoskings, to whom they expressed the pleasure they felt at witnessing the magnificent vessel.

The great annual meeting of the Art-Union was held on Tuesday, at Drury-lane Theatre. The Duke of Cambridge presided; and, in a brief opening address, said that in the last year the subscriptions had increased £600. This year the subscription amounted to £15,400; while last year it amounted to £14,800.

On Thursday, the 17th inst., Mr. Walter Baine was elected member for Greenock, in opposition to Mr. Alexander Dunlop, by a majority of six. The numbers were—for Mr. Baine, 350; for Mr. Dunlop, 344—majority, 6.

A painful rumour is afloat, which is unfortunately too well founded, that a junior clerk to the firm of Messrs. Miles, Harford, and Co., bankers in this city, has absconded with a considerable sum, the property of his employers.—Bristol Journal.

A neatly-designed and well-executed pedestal, fourteen feet in height, surmounted by a striking resemblance of Sir Walter Scott, has recently been erected at Perth.

On Friday morning, the 18th inst., the unfortunate man Crowley, who was found guilty of the murder of Mr. Tilsley, and left for execution by Mr. Justice Maule, underwent the extreme penalty of the law at Warwick.

At the Bucks quarter sessions, on Thursday week, Dr. Lee gave notice that he intended to present memorials at the next sessions for the consideration and adoption of the magistrature: the first addressed to the Lord Lieutenant of the county against the game laws; the second to the Bishop of the diocese against the clergy participating in the sports of the field; and the third to the Secretary of State, to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors on the Sabbath.

Some person or persons last week feloniously broke and entered, and also endeavoured to set on fire, the parish church of West Wycombe, in Buckinghamshire. A reward of £100 has been offered for the apprehension and conviction of the offenders.

Three new writs were moved for in the House of Commons on Tuesday night. The first was in the room of Sir W. W. Wynn, who seems tired of Parliament; the second in the room of Mr. Forbes Mackenzie, who has been appointed a Lord of the Treasury, in the place of Mr. Pringle, and will no doubt again offer himself to the electors of Peeblesshire; and the third for Leominster, in the room of Mr. Greenaway, who, in a letter to his constituents, alleges urgent private business as his reason for retiring from Parliament.

A public meeting of the Metropolitan Drapers' Association was held on Friday evening, in the National School-room, Marlborough road, Chelsea. The Reverend Richard Burgess, B.D., rector of the parish, took the chair, supported by the most influential clergy of the district, and other gentlemen favourable to the cause. Various resolutions expressive of sympathy with the objects of the association, and pledging the meeting to aid in carrying them out, especially by abstaining from making purchases after six o'clock in the evening, were then moved and seconded, and unanimously adopted.

An accident of a most alarming character, and attended by great destruction of human life, took place on Saturday afternoon, at the branch of the Sheffield, Ashton, and Manchester Railway, which passes through Ashton-under-Lyne. The railway to this town from the junction with the main line at Guide-bridge is incomplete, and workmen are at present employed in forming the branch to Staly-bridge. The work is of an exceedingly difficult character, the roadway being in the course of formation upon a large number of stone arches, which cross and recross the river Thame and canal two or three times in the course of the route to Stalybridge. The men were at work as usual on Saturday afternoon, when one of the arches on the Lancashire side of the river, owing to some unexplained cause, fell down with a tremendous crash; a man named Samuel Smith, who was at work on the crown of the arch, was hurled in its ruins. The other arches, having been deprived of the lateral support which they received whilst the former arch was perfect, fell one after another in succession, until at last no less than nine of them were a heap of ruins. Several of the arches had only just been made, as is supposed safe, and the centres of three other of the arches had been loosened. The loss of life was very great; nine men were killed on the spot. Hundreds of labourers have been employed in clearing away the ruins in search of others who are missing. Three were taken out alive, and many are more or less injured. An inquest was held on Monday, and, after several witnesses had been examined, was adjourned until Wednesday, April 30, in order to afford time for a searching inquiry to be made into the cause of the accident.

On Tuesday evening a fashionably dressed young man, about 22 years of age, was observed to run at a quick pace down Earl-street, towards Blackfriars bridge, closely pursued by Constable Benbow, of the City police, in his flight he dropped a bundle, and during the time the constable was securing it he ran with all speed down the steps leading to the steam boat pier, and it being low water, waded into the river up to his middle, when he lay down. A working-man rushed in after him, and succeeded in bringing him on shore. On being searched a large quantity of valuable articles, consisting of gold watches, chains, rings, and other jewellery, were found upon him, and the bundle consisted of coats, gowns, and other wearing apparel.

The murrain has broken out with great violence in Ross-shire and Caithness, both in cattle and sheep, from which it has been conveyed to Edinburgh by stock from the north, many of which have been obliged to be carried from the ship to be slaughtered; this has made the trade dull there. Every precaution should be used by dealers and farmers to keep the infection out of their locality.—Montrose Standard.

The report of a barn being destroyed by lightning, on Monday the 14th, at Peeling, is correct; and not only was the barn destroyed, but four men who had taken shelter in it were placed in jeopardy of their lives. Two named Paul, rather seriously, but we are happy to say are now doing well. The electric fluid, it appeared, passed down the chimney of the farm-house and escaped again, blackening some pictures. A hop-pole had a piece torn out of its middle as though a chisel had been applied.—Brighton Guardian.

During the heavy gale of wind from the north-east, which prevailed on the night of Friday and Saturday morning, two vessels got on that terrible bank, the Goodwin Sands; one became a total wreck, and the other subsequently floated into deep water, and it is too strongly feared that both crews met with a watery grave.

In the possession of a man named Harrison, convicted of a highway robbery near Leeds, and sentenced to transportation, a diary has been found, consisting of a record of all his robberies! The book is small and neat, is gilt-edged, and forms, in fact, a sort of robber's album. It would appear, from one of the entries, that a man named White, convicted of highway robbery at the same assizes, was in reality (as he himself solemnly protested) innocent of the crime, and that Harrison was the robber.—Lancashire paper.

Sir James Graham received a deputation, a few days since, consisting of the representatives of more than 100 parishes in the metropolis, headed by Lord Kenyon, as churchwarden of his own parish; whose object it was to pray for some amendment of the laws against Sunday trading. The Home Secretary was considerably struck by the unanimity of feeling manifested, and by the case made out for the interference of the Government; and he promised to direct the attention of the law officers of the Crown to the subject without delay.—Herald.

The Rev. F. Cox has forwarded a copy of Tawell's confession to Sir James Graham, and one also to the judge who tried the culprit found guilty of poisoning.

We hear that the colliers in Loughton and the neighbourhood are in an unsettled state, although their wages have been advanced, in some instances, as much as twenty-five per cent.—Staffordshire Advertiser.

On Tuesday week, Michael Murphy was executed at Waterford, for the murder of Margaret McKeown, alias Murphy. He made a full confession of his guilt some days previously, and also on the scaffold.

Several 12-pounder carronades, for the use of the phinices on the Shannon, at Athlone, are ordered from Dublin by the Board of Ordnance.—Globe.

The Poor-law Commissioners for Ireland have signified their approval of the formation of libraries in workhouses.

The Repeal Association met in the Conciliation Hall, Dublin, on Monday. The attendance was numerous. Mr. Roche, M.P., presided. Mr. O'Connell, in handing in a subscription from the Catholic Bishop of Elphin, read a letter from that prelate, in which, referring to the Maynooth grant, he said that the Catholic clergy "would receive every good measure with gratitude, but the wealth of Croesus would not purchase, or tempt them to abandon, the interests of their flock in the cause of nationality." The hon. member, in referring to the measure, praised Sir James Graham for having expressed his regret, in the recent debate, that he had ever uttered words offensive to Ireland. He said "he was pleased with Sir James Graham's speech; it was a manly speech, a repentant speech; and he thought they should send him absolution from Conciliation Hall." He also eulogized Sir Robert Peel, and strongly censured the English Dissenters who had opposed the bill. The week's rent was announced to be £355. 10s. 6d.

The Marquis of Blandford has vacated his seat as representative for Woodstock. This course has, it is said, been forced upon the young lord by his noble father, in consequence of the vote he gave in favour of the second reading of the Maynooth Endowment Bill. The Duke of Marlborough maintains his right to do what he will with his own son as well as with his own seat.—Globe.

On Tuesday the noble steam-ship City of Aberdeen arrived in the river, having brought to market 322 chests of eggs, value £1200, the largest quantity that ever came from Scotland in one bottom; 199 head of fine fat cattle, 15 tons of fresh meat, 10 tons of pickled pork, 70 boxes of fresh salmon, a considerable number of live pigs, and a large quantity of manufactured goods, butter, haddocks, and other provisions. Nearly 1000 chests of eggs, from Ireland, were landed on Monday.

A correspondent of the Limerick Reporter gives a fearful account of the depopulating system in Tullyrinne, from whence twenty families, numbering eighty-four individuals, have been recently ejected. In this case the victims are the reclaimers of the land; that is to say, they made the barren waste productive, and when it became valuable to themselves it was taken possession of by the landlord.

The total number of deaths from all causes within the metropolitan districts during the week ending the 19th of April was 924—an amount considerably higher than the average of the last five springs, which was 888, but less by 35 than that for the last five years.

A sensation was created on Thursday by the announcement that a young man, who accused himself in a letter to the wretched Hocker of being the murderer of Helenus, was taken into custody. He gave his name as Allen Bruce, and on examination admitted having written the letter, which the governor, Mr. Cope, had opened, but could assign no motive for having done so. He is still in custody. At present the authorities believe the whole affair to be an effort to obtain a reprieve of the execution of Hocker, in order that in the meantime public sympathy may be excited in his favour, so as to lead to a commutation of the sentence of death into transportation for life. On Tuesday evening the operatives employed in the at-maize cotton mills of Mr. R. Gardner, justice of the peace for the county of Lancaster, held their first anniversary to celebrate the introduction of the short-time system in that establishment; the hours of working having been only 11 hours, instead of 12, during the last year. Upwards of a thousand tickets were sold, and so great was the demand, that the billets d'entree rose to a high premium. The mayor of the borough, Mr. J. Paley, also present, granted the use of the Corn-exchange as a large millinery, and the spacious apartments were tastefully decorated. Many speeches were made in praise of the short-time system established by Mr. Gardner, who was warmly eulogised.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PRINCE ALBERT'S FARMS AT WINDSOR.—Some idea may be formed of the great falling off in the produce of the Windsor-land during the past season, compared with the produce of 1843, in consequence of the drought which prevailed in the spring and summer of last year, when it is said that, in 1843, there were grown on the farms of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, at Windsor and the Home-park, 750 loads of hay of an extremely superior quality, while last year not 50 loads were cut and carried.

SLAVE FACTORIES ON THE CONGO.—The Times of Saturday publishes the following extract of a letter addressed by Mr. Robert Jameson, of Liverpool, to Col. Edward Nicolls, the late governor of the island of Fernando Po, showing a frightful increase of slave factories to have taken place on the river Congo:—"I have just received a letter from the captain of a merchant vessel in the Congo river, in which he represented the banks of that river to be covered with slave factories, and the British flag to be held in such detestation by the slave-dealers that he did not consider his vessel and cargo in safety amongst them, they actually threatening to destroy both. Their number must be great (chiefly Spaniards and Portuguese), for there are not less than twenty or thirty factories upon the banks of the river, the short distance the captain of the vessel alluded to has ascended; and he is under positive apprehensions for his safety were he to proceed further. If any doubts be entertained of the truth of this statement, they will be removed by application to Mr. Horsfall, of Liverpool, who is the owner of the vessel and cargo. How comes this to be the case when the Government have so many steamers on the coast? Is it that by treaty there is no power of capture south of the equator? If so, why keep steam-vessels cruising on that part of the coast? If otherwise, why not anchor one of them at the entrance of the river, and thus prevent the ingress and egress of slave ships? Until this be done, and protection be given to the legitimate trader, there is no chance of honest commerce getting a footing in that river (which, with suitable protection, presents a better field for it than any river of Western Africa), and in the absence of legitimate trade, the natives have nothing but slave-dealing to follow. Slave-trading has been suppressed by legitimate trade in the Bights of Benin and Biafra; and the greatest good that can now be done for Africa is to commence measures in the hope of bringing about some happy results in the Congo (now the principal mart on the west coast of Africa); but to do this the slave-trade must be discouraged and the legitimate trader protected."

PROCESSIONS.—At noon, on Monday last, upwards of 200 persons assembled in Union-square, Bury, and soon after, a procession, consisting of coal-miners, turn-out iron trade, and turn-out power-loom weavers, was formed in the above order, headed by a band of music and three flags. The procession, which consisted of about 1000 persons, was joined by a number of colliers, 200, and another band of music. The procession, then consisting of upwards of 2000 persons, proceeded through the Lever, to the Farnworth station of the Bolton Railway, where they met Mr. Roberts. At nine o'clock the procession arrived in Bury-square, Bury, where it broke up, and the parties went home.—The power-loom fustian weavers at Messrs. Walker and Lomas's, Bury, who turned out eleven weeks ago for an advance of one farthing per pound, are going to their work this day (Wednesday) and to-morrow (Thursday). According to one account, they have obtained the desired advance, but we have not ascertained whether it is correct or not.—The hands at several cotton mills in the vicinity of Redditch, who have joined the General Protective Trades Association, have given notice to their employers, unless they obtain an advance of wages, they will work at an early period.

SHORT TIME.—Messrs. Barker and Co., of Thorne, near Wakefield, have, for a long time, worked their power-loom less per day than most of the mills in the neighbourhood, yet they have liberally granted them a further respite of half-an-hour per day, and at the same time advanced their wages.—Leeds Times.

HIGHLAND TENANCY.—We understand that upwards of 100 tenants have this year received notices to quit in the counties of Ross and Cromarty—making, at the average of five individuals to a family, a population of nearly not less than 2000 persons. Whether this extension of removals is partly or in the whole mere removals of the occupants for the purpose of improved agriculture, or the entire ejection of small tenants, we are not ascertained, but the fact of the notices being issued is undoubtedly correct.—Ross-shire Advertiser.

AGRICULTURAL CONGRESS IN PARIS.—An agricultural congress, after the fashion of the scientific associations which meet yearly in England and in various parts of the Continent, is to assemble in Paris for the first time, on the 8th of next month, under the presidency of the Duc Decazes. The meeting is intended to last a year. The present session will last for six weeks, and the grand référéndaire will open to the country the grand conservatory of the Luxembourg.

PROPERTY OF THE FARM-LABOURERS.—At the Bedfordshire Sessions, held April 12, John Goodman, of Great Bedford, labourer, was summoned for the non-payment of a sum amounting to 7s. The defendant pleaded poverty, and that his weekly earnings were only 8s., but of which he had to keep himself and a family of eight children. The case was ordered to stand over for a fortnight, in order that the matter might be brought under the notice of the parish authorities.—Bedford Mercury.

PARISH ESTIMATION.—On Monday last, six families, consisting of 38 individuals, from the parishes of Great Bedford, Bedford, and Colworth, left Bedford for Liverpool, from which port they were to embark, with the passengers, for Port Phillip. We understand that these poor people were well provided with comfortable clothing and other necessities, at the expense of their respective parishes, and that, on reaching their destinations, employment will be provided for those who are able to work. Whatever their future destiny may be, it is impossible to say that they can be in a worse condition than that of the agricultural labourers of this "happy land!"—Bedford Mercury.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, April 21.—The supply of English Wheat this morning was rather short, and an advance of 1s. per qr. was obtained for the best samples, but other descriptions were not dearer than last week; though the demand for Foreign Wheat was not brisk, last week's prices were fully maintained. In addition to a fair supply of English Barley, several cargoes of Foreign have arrived; fine samples for Malt were sold with difficulty at the prices of this day week, but no progress could be made in the sale of other qualities, though they were offered on lower terms. The supply of Beans and Peas was short, and both these articles were 1s. dearer. The supply of Irish and Foreign Oats was large, but there was sufficient demand from the country to induce factors to hold firmly, and the business done was at the prices of this day week.

FRIDAY, April 24.—The supplies of Wheat and Barley are moderate since Monday; though the trade is in a very inanimate state, lower prices are not accepted. The supplies of Irish Oats are small, and of Scotch and English quite trifling; a few cargoes of Foreign from the near ports have arrived, but the quantity altogether does not exceed 10,000 quarters. A rather better demand was experienced on Wednesday, and to-day an advance of 6d. is obtained on all descriptions, though more readily for fine than for the inferior qualities. Beans and Peas are scarce, and the few on sale bring rather better prices.

BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY.
 Sir.—The sample of Patent French Distilled Brandy you sent me I have accurately examined, and having instituted a series of experiments on it and on the best French Brandy, I have, in these comparative trials, been able to discover a little difference, either in their composition or effects, that they may be considered as identical; excepting that your Brandy is free from uncombined acid and acrid matter, which exists, more or less, in most of the Brandy imported from France.
 I remain, Sir, yours respectfully,
 JOHN THOMAS COCHRAN, Lecturer on Chemistry.
 Betts's Patent Brandy is prescribed by the highest medical authorities, in preference to French Brandy; and is exclusively used at Guy's, St. George's, St. Thomas's, the Westminster, and other Hospitals, and at the Manchester, Bristol, Brighton, and other Infirmarys. Quantities of not less than two gallons supplied at the Distillery, in stone jars at 18s. per gallon, exclusive of the jar; and in coppered bottles at 20s. per gallon, bottles and case included, and not returnable.—J. B. BETTS, Junr., and Co., 7, Southfield-lane, London.

THE ATRAPILATORY, or LIQUID HAIR DYE.
 The only dye that really answers for all colours, and does not require re-dyeing, but as the hair grows, it will never fade or acquire the unnatural red or purple that is common to all other dyes. ROSS and ROSS, with the greatest confidence, recommend the above dye as an infallible dye for their establishment; and if a lady or gentleman requiring it are requested to bring a friend or servant with them, to see how it is used, which will enable them to do it afterwards without the chance of failure. Several private apartments devoted entirely to the above purpose, and some of their establishments having used it, the effect produced can be attested. They think it necessary to add that, by attending strictly to the instructions given with each bottle of dye, numerous persons have succeeded equally well without coming to them.
 Address Messrs. ROSS and ROSS, 119 and 121, Bishopsgate-street, the celebrated Perfumers, Perfumers, Haircutters, and Hairdressers.—N.B. Parties attended at their own residences, whatever the distance.

THE SONG OF THE SUN.

Once more I return to the beautiful earth,
 While nature receives me with welcoming mirth.
 See, ere what a wonderful change I have brought!
 No longer with rage are the elements fraught;
 But genial warmth through the atmosphere reigns,
 While flowery beauty appears on the plains.
 Let those who rejoice at my happy return,
 A lesson from nature's own manuscript learn.
 The meadows a new verdant garment assume,
 And the trees are decked with their vernal costume.
 And thus they remind the whole of mankind
 Of choice summer dress, which you know where to find.
 Let the hint be sufficient, with all as with one,
 While multitudes flock to E. MOSES and SON.
 Where your brilliant light on your clothing reflects,
 You know very well that it shows all defects;
 Yes, I'm sure to discover each crease and each spot,
 Each fraction, and blemish, each hole—am I not?
 Then take a kind hint from "The Song of the Sun,"
 And hasten to MOSES as thousands have done.
 While I shew 'tother day on your wonderful waist,
 I found it was crumpled with habitations smart;
 Fine Dress coats and Frock coats, and Trousers and Vests,
 Whose elegant style in an instant arrests;
 The Blouses—but stop! It is time I had done.
 I'll leave you to bargain with MOSES and SON.

On Friday week Sir ROBERT PEASE stated the leading provisions of his measures respecting Paper Currency in Scotland and Ireland, a separate bill being introduced for each country. They are supplementary to the measure passed last year regulating the Bank of England, and banks of issue in England. As he has abstained from interfering with the small note currency, respecting which such lively fears were expressed, especially in Scotland, and as he has given considerable satisfaction in Ireland by abolishing the exclusive privileges of the Bank of Ireland, less opposition is manifested than had been anticipated. The leading principle of these bills is the same as that of the English act of last session. All banks dealing in Paper Currency are to be limited to a given amount of issues upon securities, though they may issue to any extent they please, provided that all they issue in excess is represented by gold and silver actually in deposit in the coffers of the respective banks.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL, at the close of last session, announced his intention of bringing under the deliberate consideration of the Legislature the subject of the condition of the LABOURING CLASSES of the UNITED KINGDOM. A grave, a great, a vast subject! All thinkers, for the last thirty years, have pointed to the GREAT FACT that, in spite of all our extraordinary progress in material improvement, "wealth accumulates, and men decay," not in numbers, but in social standing and individual happiness. With CAPITAL accumulating enormously—with LANDED PROPERTY continually advancing in value—with a PEOPLE multiplying rapidly—we have for years been encountered by the difficulty which surrounds us on every side, that the toiling millions are more and more circumscribed and hemmed in; their individual value lessening; their power over their own position crippling dailing; and masses of wretchedness perpetually confronting the wealth, the resources, and the greatness of this country, like mud hovels surrounding every marble palace. It is this, the "CONDITION-OF-ENGLAND question," which called into existence the ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE. Its earlier operations were opposed by knavish or unreasoning working men, who were either hired or taught by monopolists to repeat the parrot cry, that the repeal of the Corn Laws was sought for by the masters in order more effectually to enslave the men. That has all evaporated now. Common sense tells the common mind that the immediate impelling motive of any employer, when he asks for an enlarged sphere for the employment of his capital, must be his own immediate interest. But this cannot be done on the principles of FREE TRADE, without leading to the benefit of everybody else. Enable the most selfish master freely to exchange, in the open market of the world, the industry and the INGENUITY of Great Britain against the produce of any or of every other, and immediately the state of things will be brought about, so well described by the hand-loom weaver, when he stated that monopoly caused two or four men to run after one master, whereas Free Trade would lead to one master running after two or four men.

Lord John Russell intended to have brought on his motion on Thursday night. But on Wednesday night a conversation arose, in which the noble lord professed his unwillingness to interfere with the progress of the Maynooth Bill, by a debate which, in all probability, would be an adjourned one. It was then arranged that it should be brought forward on Monday the 26th of May.

The following are the resolutions to be proposed by Lord John Russell:—

1. That the present state of political tranquillity, and the recent revival of trade, afford to this House a favourable opportunity to consider of such measures as may tend permanently to improve the condition of the labouring classes.
  2. That those laws which impose duties, usually called protective, tend to impair the efficiency of labour, to restrict the free interchange of commodities, and to impose on the people unnecessary taxation.
  3. That the present Corn Law tends to check improvements in agriculture, produces uncertainty in all farming speculations, and holds out to the owners and occupiers of land prospects of special advantage which it fails to secure.
  4. That this House will take the said laws into consideration, with a view to such cautious and deliberate arrangements as may be most beneficial to all classes of her Majesty's subjects.
  5. That the freedom of industry would be promoted by a careful revision of the law of parochial settlement which now prevails in England and Wales.
  6. That a systematic plan of colonization would partially relieve those districts of the country where the deficiency of employment has been most injurious to the labourers in husbandry.
  7. That the improvements made of late years in the education of the people, as well as its more general diffusion, have been seen with satisfaction by this House.
  8. That this House will be ready to give its support to measures, founded on liberal and comprehensive principles, which may be conducive to the further extension of religious and moral instruction.
  9. That a humble address be presented to her Majesty, to lay the foregoing resolutions before her Majesty.
- On Monday night a conversation arose on the unhappy policy which has been pursued by this country with the Brazils; but as this will probably be made the subject of a specific motion, we need not notice it farther now.
- Mr. S. O'Brien late one night got quietly introduced a bill called the Malt Drawback Bill. As some attention will be paid to it, we may simply state that it sets forth in the preamble "that it is desirable that barley, perfectly malted, should also be used duty free in the feeding of cattle." It enacts, therefore, "that it shall be lawful for any maltster to whom a specific license for that purpose has been granted by the Commissioners of Excise, to mix any equal quantity of malt, or any equal quantity of the meal of beans, peas, barley, or oats with ground malt, and to sell the aforesaid malt free of duty to any occupier of land, receiving from the said purchaser a certificate of the quantity of malt so sold."
- It finally dooms any person giving a false certificate, or making any of this duty-free malt for the purpose of brewing, to pay a penalty of £50.

THE BAZAAR.

CONTRIBUTIONS AND CORRESPONDENCE.

"DEAR SIR,—As honorary secretary of the Ashton, Dukinfield, Staleybridge, Hurst, Mossley, Lees, and Denton Ladies' Committee for the National Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar, I have great pleasure in enclosing you collected by the ladies mentioned in the accompanying list of contributors. It is the particular request and wish of the Ladies' Committee, that the list of contributors should be advertised in the LEAGUE of Saturday next.

"The contributions of work for these districts I shall forward, addressed to you at Covent-garden Theatre, on Saturday next.

"I also enclose a letter, accompanying the contribution therein mentioned. Please acknowledge the receipt.

"I am, dear Sir, yours most sincerely,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "ELIZA S. GARTSIDE.
[The list of contributions arrived too late to be inserted in our present number, but will appear next week.]

"SIR,—With much pleasure I write to acquaint you with the result of our proceedings in aid of the League Free-Trade Bazaar. By the kind permission of the Rev. C. J. Middleditch, we have just held an exhibition at his house. The articles will be forwarded to you, to-morrow, by Parker's conveyances. The contributions far exceed our early expectations. The canvassers began with the determination, if possible, to obtain £50. Our money, just made out, show the amount to be £125. Our exhibition contained a fine display of ladies' needlework in a variety of broadcloth table-cover, manufactured by Mr. Wood, containing a rich centre-piece and crocheted border by Mrs. Wood and friends, together with music-stool and two ottomans to match. The set is valued at £15. The music-stool presented by Miss Fisher; table-cover and ottomans, by Mrs. Wood; a pair of very richly worked ottomans, presented by the Misses Moody, of Maiden Bradley, near Frome, mounted on polished steel frames, designed and made by Mr. E. Moody; one worked ottoman top, by the same; four worked ottomans in Berlin wool, &c., presented by Miss Porter, Miss Vin's, Miss Stevens, and Mr. Nias; one ottoman, presented by Mrs. French; six pieces of Berlin wool and silk work, on cashmere, velvet, and silk canvas, by various ladies, for pole-screens: one of these, in rich lace work, by Miss Smith, was particularly admired for its chaste design and rich lace border, as well as the beauty of the work—value 30s.; as was also a sofa-cushion, by Mrs. J. Porter, of white velvet, valued at £2; also a baby's rich white cashmere cloak, cashmere of Mr. Houston's manufacture, £3. 10s., presented by the Ladies' Committee; 18 pairs of ladies' and gentlemen's fancy shoes, some of them splendidly worked, value £7. 7s.. Baby's cashmere braided hoods, and caps, presented by Mrs. Houston, Mrs. Sims, and the Ladies' Committee, £5. 11s.; a pair of broadcloth blankets, Frome manufacture, £1. 8s.; a quilt, one side patchwork, £1. 10s.

"I must not omit a vespers chair, in a richly carved antique rosewood frame, back and seat of fine scarlet cashmere, presented to the Committee by Mr. Brittain, on which are emblematical devices in needlework. That rich corn-field, the production of Mrs. Middleditch. On the seat the ship Cobden is represented going out in full sail, under the auspices of Free Trade; worked by Miss Emma Allen. This is expected to be an attractive article in the Bazaar: its worth we estimate at £7. 7s.

"I am, Sir, with much respect,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "ELIZABETH TUCK, Sec.

"MY DEAR SIR,—The principal article from this place will be a Bury sminel, weighing about 2 cwt., in a box 6 feet 6 inches square. We think it will answer for a centre piece for the stall, and you can prepare (if you think so too) accordingly; but, of course, the arrangement must be left to you. The next will be a purse of about £100, and one from Heywood of, perhaps, £20. Also a time-piece, value £7. 7s., to go a month without winding up, made in Bury. Two or three pieces of printed carpeting, prints, de laines, shirtings, blankets, &c., the manufactures of the neighbourhood. Of course a number of fancy articles from the fairy fingers of the ladies, and a variety of other articles too tedious to mention, as the auctioneers say.

"I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "ROBERT P. GRUNDY.

"COMMITTEE-ROOM, BUCK-I'-TH'-VINE INN, WIGAN.
"DEAR SIR,—Enclosed I beg to hand you a list of subscriptions received up to this evening, amounting to £60. 17s. We are also sending articles from the following persons, viz.: Messrs. Evans, Ryley, Bone, Jolley, and Cook; Mrs. Ryley, Mrs. Cook, Mrs. Stock, Miss Martin, Miss Taylor, Miss Johnson, Miss Marshall, &c. &c.; comprising many useful and elegant articles. We have not been enabled to supply the money value of each contribution, but will endeavour to do so in our next report.

"Our canvass for subscriptions is not yet complete; and we meet again on Thursday to report further progress. With best wishes for the success of the Bazaar,
"I remain, dear Sir, yours truly,
"THOS. ACTON, Hon. Sec.

"P.S. Our good friend, Mr. Ainsworth, treasurer, will hand over the cash as per accompanying list.
"T. ACTON.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I do not know how you wish announcements to be managed, but I beg to say our firm, Courtauld, Taylor, and Co., have furnished to the Bazaar, by the hands of Mr. P. A. Taylor, jun., in sundry articles and money, £50.

"Yours, dear Sir, very truly,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "P. A. TAYLOR.

"I herewith send £5 as a Bazaar purse, and wish you all success.
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "ROBERT WANNER.

"SIR,—Looking back, as I do, some fifty or sixty years, and viewing with alarm the vast difference that now exists between those times and the present, I am perfectly convinced (from a close observation of their working) that to the Corn Laws alone is to be attributed the melancholy distress now so painfully apparent among our labouring population, and which is also most severely felt by the shopkeepers, &c., in every branch of trade. Under these circumstances, I cannot but admire the praiseworthy and untiring exertions of those eloquent champions of Free-Trade principles, Messrs. Cobden, Bright, and others, to obtain the abolition of those mischievous enactments which have produced such misery and wretchedness; and, heartily wishing success may attend their endeavours, I should be happy to have presented some article to the Bazaar about to be held in Covent-garden Theatre; but not having anything suitable for it, I beg leave to forward £5 for a portrait of each of the gentlemen above named, and the surplus may be applied to the Bazaar fund. I trust you will pardon me for troubling you with this, but I have done so because I was anxious to secure, if possible, the portraits of those talented individuals, and fearing that, if I waited until the opening of the Bazaar, I might probably be too late in the field to obtain them, doubting not but that the demand for them will be very great.

"I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "W. D. COLEBROOKDALE.

"We have received forty-six packages from Messrs. Abraham and Alfred Darby, and Dickinson, weighing five tons, value £641. 19s. 2d.

Mrs. Marcet, the celebrated authoress of several popular works, has kindly presented to the Bazaar 500 copies of her interesting and instructive little volume, "John Hopkins's Notions on Political Economy."

"SIR,—We have the pleasure to present, as an offering to the Free-Trade Bazaar, a small assortment of buttons of our manufacture, intended to be worn by the friends of the Anti-Corn-Law League.

"We are, Sir, your most obedient servants,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "HAMMOND, TURNER, and SON.

"134, Grove-street, Camden-town.
"DEAR SIR,—I transmit for the Free-Trade Bazaar a number of articles, which, at a moderate calculation, amount to about £20.

"I am, dear Sir, your most obedient,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "JOHN WHITE.

"31, Gresham-street, London.
"DEAR SIR,—We have just completed an improvement in the manufacture of French napped silk hats, and if not too late shall feel pleasure in expressing our approval of your object by presenting the first dozen to the Free-Trade Bazaar. We do not intend protecting the improvement (ventilation) by patent, but hope it will be appreciated by our Free-Trade friends; the selling price will be 15s. The goods not being quite ready, we will thank you to inform us the latest time they can be received, and oblige,
"Dear Sir, yours very faithfully,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "STAINBURN and BAUGH.

"King's-court, Lombard-street.
"DEAR SIR,—We beg to inform you that we intend forwarding in a few days, in aid of the League Bazaar, various perfumes, brushes, fancy soaps, &c., of our manufacture, prepared expressly for that occasion. We shall also send, at the same time, a few fancy articles, including a vase with wax flowers, d'oylys, and watch-pockets, contributed by some young ladies friendly to the cause.

"In the earnest hope that commerce will be speedily freed from the unjust (and, therefore, unwise) restrictions that a selfish and shortsighted policy has imposed,
"We remain, Sir, your obedient servants,
"A. W. Paulton, Esq." "JOHN GOSNELL and Co.

"338, Strand.
"SIR,—I have much pleasure in sending to the League Bazaar one of my silver lever watches, with its accompaniments of silver key and morocco case: it ought to yield you £5. 5s.; and this, without taking into account its historical character (and the occasion under which goods at your Bazaar will be purchased), a record of which is preserved by an inscription on the movements of the watch. The department of trade in which I am engaged is an example of the fallacy of protection. For years past, under a so-called protective duty of 30 per cent., the English trade in watches has languished, each year exhibiting a smaller production than its predecessor; but since the reduction of duty on foreign watches our trade has suddenly revived to a higher degree of prosperity than we have known for many years, so much so that premiums of £5 and £10 are being offered by masters as an inducement to workmen to enter into engagements for a fixed supply of work for a given time; and this gratifying result has appeared, although the revenue returns show that £50,000 per annum is now received as duty on foreign watches, where only £5000 accrued under the old tariff. Of course the smuggler and Custom must settle that account between themselves. It is clear, then, that, in this trade at least, prosperity is not the fruit of protection, but is to be found in the generally improved condition of the manufacturing districts. Other causes may also have assisted us, but they do not interfere with the above conclusion. I hope that the success which attends your present experiment of exhibiting the varied products of English industry will suggest the propriety of a future Bazaar, to which foreign nations shall be invited to become contributors, to show to our legislators what increased comforts and luxuries a more perfect intercourse between nations would give to all.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "J. JONES.

"24, Essex-street, Strand.
"MY DEAR SIR,—I have been anxiously desirous to present some little trifle to the great Free-Trade Bazaar, and I have been puzzling my head to discover what donation I could make you, or evidence the rectly of your feelings for the profession of the law is not particularly fertile in matters for Bazaars. But having, for my own part, always felt that the greatest condemnation of the present system of prohibitory and protective duties (more especially as regards corn) was the fruitful parent of wretchedness and irreligion, and quite at variance with the revealed will of God,—and that the question thus sunk into quite a secondary consideration, either as regarded its mercantile or its agricultural aspect,—I have busied myself in collecting a few of the more prominent texts of Scripture bearing against the system; and to give them an attractive form I have thrown them into that of a bunch of grapes, each grape containing a reference to a text, and I have called the whole 'The Anti-Corn-Law and Free-Trade Cluster of Esbeol.'

"This design I have had lithographed, and painted by hand, and hope it will form a pretty ornament for an album, and a useful one as regards our cause. It is my intention to present your Bazaar with 100 copies (selling price 3s. 6d.). Believe me, my dear Sir,

"Your anxious fellow-labourer,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." JAMES H. F. LEWIS.

"52, St. Martin's-lane.

"DEAR SIR,—I feel anxious to contribute my small offering towards your great undertaking, and beg you will accept what I doubt not, will be esteemed by all, and I know of nothing more likely to please, or more likely to meet with purchasers, than a representation of our great and indefatigable leader, R. Cobden, Esq., M.P.

"I purpose sending you six copies, in cement, by a first-rate artist, Mr. Thomas Smith, a pupil of the late Sir F. Chantrey: they are £2. 2s. each. The artist desires me, also, to present for him a fine copy of the bust of the late John Kemble, also one of Charles Kemble.

"Will you let me know when you are ready to receive them. I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." JOHN P. BULL.

"SIR,—We have made for the approaching Bazaar a very handsome set of shop boot-trees, consisting of thirty pieces, fitted in stand complete, with an improved method of withdrawing the keys without the use of the all-destroying hammer: the whole amounting in value to the sum of £7. 10s. The above being the first set made on the new principle, we have thought it the most suitable present we could send, more especially as we expect a large number of master bootmakers to visit your Bazaar, for whom they are particularly adapted. Hoping they will meet with a ready sale, and wishing you every success,

"We remain, yours very respectfully,

"W. DENNIS, 17, Little Pultney-st., Golden-square.

"J. DENNIS, 17, Vere-street, Clare-market.

"C. DENNIS, 10, George-court, Piccadilly.

"P.S. We also beg to hand you our annual subscription of £1 each, due on the 18th of May."

"133, Tooley-street.

"RESPECTED FRIENDS,—Feeling much interested in the success of Free-Trade principles, we are anxious to aid your patriotic exertions, and, if you consider our manufacture suitable to be introduced at your Bazaar, we shall feel pleasure in sending up, according to your direction, one gross of each size—£18 worth. Your reply will oblige,
"Your sincere friends,
"BAYANT and MAY.

"To the Bazaar Committee."

"Newington Common.

"ESTEEMED FRIEND,—The accompanying trifles, I trust, will be thought worthy of thy acceptance, being the proceeds of collections obtained personally from amongst my friends in aid of the Bazaar; though but young in years I feel, like my dear father, an interest in the great cause.

"With respect, thy friend,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." SOPHIA C. SOUTHALL.

"DEAR SIR,—I have directed Messrs. Dyer, of Paternoster-row, to send to the Bazaar, amongst other works, a small assortment of the cheapest bibles and testaments published by the Scottish Board for bible circulation. These copies of the sacred volume are presented as an evidence of the advantage arising from the abolition of monopoly, in printing and circulating that holy book, which will ultimately influence all the commerce of our world; teaching us that whatsoever things we would that others should do to us we should do even so to them.

"I am, dear Sir, with great respect,

"Yours faithfully,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." JAMES THOMAS.

"13, Hungerford-market.

"SIR,—In conjunction with two or three friends, I am completing, with the intention of presenting it to the Bazaar, a model of a stamp, with a pair of dies, to strike a small medal commemorative of the Bazaar, with which will be sent white metal blanks, for purchasers to strike their own medals, it being so simple a child may strike one. Trusting it may prove a source of assistance in wrenching from the iron grasp of monopoly the industrial energy and skill of this country,

"I remain, your humble supporter,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." GEORGE LARKIN.

"Hessle-road, Hull.

"DEAR SIR,—I send you my humble tribute to the Free-Trade Bazaar, which is 50 bottles of golden fluid for writing on all kinds of linen, cotton, &c., which I think will get a ready sale at the labelled price.

"I remain a sincere well-wisher to the cause,
"R. Cobden, Esq., M.P." R. D. MOREHEAD.

"7 Wellington-street, Strand.

"SIR,—I shall have much pleasure in presenting a copy of the Farmer's Journal newspaper, for the approaching Free Trade Bazaar, at Covent garden. Yours,
"F. CARR, principal Proprietor.
"A. W. Paulton, Esq."

"Friar-street, Doctors'-commons.

"GENTLEMEN,—We have the greatest pleasure in sending you our contribution ('Hervey's Sculpture,' more or less, elegant; 'View of Wakefield,' calf, elegant; 'Marionella on Taxation,' russia extra) to the Anti-Corn-Law League Bazaar. We think the volumes are specimens of British manufacture, and hope you will consider them worthy of your acceptance.

"In thus expressing our sympathy in your exertions for the abolition of a tax, equally revolting to human nature and injurious to the character of the people of Great Britain, we hope the time is not far distant when all will mutually have to rejoice over the destruction of this monopoly, and that the ingenuity and industry of this nation will be unfettered from all unjust restrictions.

"We are, Gentlemen, yours most truly,
"To the Committee." WESTLEY and CLARK.

"35, Tavistock-street, Covent-garden.

"SIR,—Permit me to present to your Bazaar a pearl ring, value £2, as my humble contribution towards the success of your funds.
"A strong pearl butterfly, and a few other articles of less consequence, shall be presented to you, by some of my family, if your arrangements will allow you to accept them one or two days previous to the opening of your Bazaar.

"I have the honour to remain, your obedient servant,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." W. STACY.

"Eagle-place, Sheffield.

"DEAR SIRS,—We, the apprentices of Messrs. William and J. G. Parker, feel great pleasure in presenting to you goods of Sheffield manufacture to the amount of £6, being presents collected by us from our fellow-workmen. We remain, dear Sirs, yours very respectfully,
"WILLIAM H. SMITH.
"THOMAS ATLEY.
"ROBERT M. NEEDHAM.

"To the Committee of the National Anti-Corn-Law League Bazaar."

"Maidstone.

"DEAR SIR,—Although this town is too much under the selfish ban of 'protection to native industry,' there are not wanting men who are not ashamed to avow themselves 'Free-Traders,' ay, and women too, who look upon Free Trade as a national benefit, and as an object to be achieved for the world's good; and the number, too, is 'legion,' who in their own hearts are equally so, but who dare not yet avow themselves.

"Under such circumstances, I am happy to announce that a subscription is going on in aid of the Anti-Corn-Law League Bazaar, and that I have already received £8. 18s. exclusive of articles which two of our townsmen will send for sale.

"I am, dear Sir, yours truly, "RICH. NELMS.

"Geo. Wilson, Esq."

"12, Normanton-street, Derby.

"SIR,—I belong to that long-suffering and almost despised class of operatives, the framework-knitters, and feeling deeply that the only chance we have of bettering our unhappy condition is, by an extended market for our manufactures, I have determined to lend my humble aid to support the Free-Trade League, instead of being bothered with strikes and combinations, which I am satisfied can do us no permanent good. For this purpose I have begged a little silk from a gentleman who is or was an active Tory, and has now become a good Free-Trade, and like his great leader, Sir Robert Peel, is convinced that Free Trade is common sense, and, I might add, common honesty. I have worked a part of this silk into one dozen pairs of ladies' gloves; and Mr. Richard Dalison, a fellow-sufferer, has made a dozen pairs from it also; Mr. Gee, of this place, has made six pairs very tastefully from silk of his own: they are all of the very best quality, and will be worth nearly £3. Although this is only a trifle in the great cause, I hope you will not think it unacceptable from three poor working men, for the benefits already received by them and their families from your united and indefatigable exertions. I am happy to say we have some tenant-farmers in this neighbourhood who are now convinced that stopping our trade, and starving the people, is not the best method of making a good market for the farmers. I hope to beg a few shillings from some of them to buy some more silk, and I will then endeavour to get some of my fellow-workmen to make it into something useful for the Bazaar. And all that I pray for is, that you may never be weary in well-doing until we have obtained all the world for our market, and all its inhabitants for our customers.

"From your very humble servant,
"A. W. Paulton, Esq." WM. PARKINSON.

"North-gate, Halifax.

"DEAR SIR,—As we must all endeavour, as far as lies in our power, to assist you and your worthy colleagues in the furtherance of the Bazaar, I have forwarded to the person who receives contributions in this town a foot-brush, with scraper attached, and the words 'Free Trade' worked in the bristles: the value of which is £5.

"I remain, dear Sir, yours most respectfully,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." T. FLEMING.

"Bristol.

"RESPECTED FRIEND,—I have sent to the Bristol stall, as my contribution to the Bazaar, 200 specimens illustrative of the science of geology; they have been arranged and catalogued by a scientific gentleman of this city, and comprise a complete series of rocks, from granite to the London clay; they are well adapted for the use of a lecturer giving an elementary course, and would be suitable to present to a mechanics' institution or other similar establishment, or for the use of a school or private family.

"My object in sending this information to thee is that, if it is noticed in the LEAGUE paper, it may possibly catch the eye of a party desirous of purchasing the series. £6 is the value.

"I remain, very respectfully,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." JOSEPH FRY.

"Malmesbury.

"DEAR SIR,—With the assistance of Mr. Reynolds, Mr. W. Paulton, and other warm Free-Traders of this town, I am enabled to forward the articles purchased by the contributors raised here for the Bazaar. They consist of pillow-lace, the make of our town, and a few combs, and also a handsomely worked music stool cover, given by a young lady of this place. We shall send, to-morrow, a very handsome work-table of a novel description, value £5, having on it an excellent drawing of the old Gothic market cross of Malmesbury, supposed to be equal in antiquity to our venerable abbey. Will you be so good as to retain a place for its reception, as our friends are anxious to claim a small share of the honour resulting from so varied and magnificent an exhibition as your Bazaar promises to be? From a place of so little note as Malmesbury, and with trade very depressed, it could not be expected we should raise much; nevertheless, the number of contributors is large, amounting in the whole to £22. 15s. 6d., including not only a majority of the professional men and tradesmen of the town, but also twenty-six real renting farmers, the average of whose holdings is 250 acres.

"George Wilson, Esq." H. GALE.

"Great Torrington.

"DEAR SIR,—I have the pleasure to inform you that I had, yesterday, given me, by Mr. John Buxford, jun., artificial fly-maker, of this town, a book containing patterns flies, which he will thank to have placed in a prominent place of the Bazaar. I do assure you it is a splendid lot of flies and will sell well, containing between five and six dozen, not two alike; they are for samples. I shall forward it with some other articles, which I expect to have presented for the Bazaar the latter end of the week.

"Yours very respectfully,
"A. W. Paulton, Esq." GEORGE TOMES.

"To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

"SIR,—I intend going to London to visit the Bazaar, with my wife and my sister; and, in order that we may lay out our money in the useful as well as ornamental, we have each made out a list (as if going to market) of things required by us.

"I mention this as a hint to those who intend to become purchasers, as there is little doubt there will be every useful article, and of the best quality; which, if the contributors follow out the wishes of the Council, will be offered at fair and moderate prices.

"Yours, very respectfully,
"ABRAHAM LEEKES."

"Union-place, Montrose.

"SIR,—I have an old painting which I intend to send to the Bazaar for sale; it was in the collection of the late Col. Colquhoun, and it is said to be a superior picture. I hope it will fetch a much higher price than what I paid for it, which was thought high. I will send it in a box to London. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." ALKX. WATSON.

"Dunfermline.

"DEAR SIR,—I have, with this post, sent our mutual friend, D. Dewar, Wood-street, London, an invoice of goods contributed by friends here to the Anti-Corn-Law League Bazaar, with the names of the contributors, amounting to—goods, £26. 3s. 4d.; cash, £1. 11s. 6d.; total, £27. 14s. 10d. I hope, when all the Dunfermline manufactures are got together, they will command some attention, and promote in some measure the design of the Council in holding the Bazaar.

"I am, dear Sir, yours sincerely,
"Geo. Wilson Esq." JAMES INGLIS.

"Mutterhole, near Todmorden.

"SIR,—I am happy to inform you that Mrs. Helliwell, of Todmorden, and myself, have collected upwards of £20 in money, and hope to make it into £10 before remitting it. We have also received a handsome Polish piece from Messrs. John Crossley and Sons, value £6. 5s.; one piece of superfine lasting, from Mr. John Riley, value £5. 10s.; two pieces of fancy tweed, from Mr. John Hodgson, value £2. 6s.; one piece of fancy tweed, from Messrs. J. and J. Hodgson, value £1. 15s.; one piece of fancy check hair cord, from Mr. Tawell, value £1. 17s.; and one piece of dimity, from Messrs. Robinson and Horstall, value £2. 18s.; all specimens of goods made in the neighbourhood of Hebden-bridge. In addition to the above, we have received an oil-painting of a scene in the Todmorden valley, drawn and contributed by Mr. William Dewhurst, of Todmorden, value £5; also a considerable quantity of useful and ornamental work from the ladies of the district, which, we trust, will raise £30 or £40 more. The whole of these articles have been forwarded to our Rochdale friends, and will occupy a corner of their stall in Covent-garden Theatre. The feeling in favour of Free-Trade principles is all but universal in this valley, and our contributions will, we trust, be considered pretty fair for a country district like this. With warmest wishes for the speedy success of the good cause,
"I am, Sir, yours respectfully,
"Geo. Wilson, Esq." MARY ANNE OLIVER."

"A SUGGESTION TO PROVIDE 500 BEDS FOR THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.

"Greenacres Moor, Oldham.

"DEAR SIR,—Having seen repeated accounts of the awful destitution of the labourers of Dorchester and the surrounding counties, in the LEAGUE, and recently having read the letter written by the Rev. Wm. Ferguson to Mr. Harcourt, member for Oxfordshire, which lately appeared in the Economist, giving a deplorable account of the state in which he found a number of families in villages near Bicester, in the county of Oxfordshire; and which statement is corroborated by Mr. Samuel Rolfe, who is a dealer in furniture, and who accompanied Mr. Ferguson into twelve different cottages, and who states "that he would not give more than £2. 10s. for all the goods found in the twelve cottages occupied by able-bodied men; and conversing with a few of my neighbours, engaged in the cotton business, on this truly melancholy state of things, an idea was conceived of alleviating, in a small way, a little of this distress, and also of adding to your Bazaar fund. I am hereby authorized by these gentlemen to state, that they will deliver in London, free from charge, to your disposal, ten tons of good cotton stocks, the value of which will be, in London, upwards of £130, which will be sufficient to fill upwards of 500 beds.

"Now, my dear Sir, you know a number of good, patriotic, and humane men, engaged in the manufacture of bed-ticks in Manchester, who will be happy to second the efforts of my friends, by forwarding to you a number of pieces of that article; and there can be little doubt that many in Bolton, manufacturers of bed-quilts, will also assist by forwarding to your Bazaar a number of those useful and necessary articles. I believe, also, that there are in Rosendale and neighbourhood, who are manufacturers of strong sheeting, a number of generous friends who would join in this act of charity, and, by sending a number of pieces, carry out the above laudable object.

"I have just seen my friend Edmund Wild, of High-street, Manchester, who has an establishment in White-cross-street, London. He says that he will give 20 beds, 20 Bolton quilts, and 20 Rosendale sheets; and instruct his partner in London to render any further assistance that you may require.

"Will you now allow me to suggest an easy method for their distribution. First, let Mr. Ferguson, Mr. Summerville, and a number of others that you may appoint, make out a list of about 500 or 600 of the most destitute cases. Secondly, let a bed and sheet be wrapped up in a Bolton quilt, and be exhibited in your Bazaar, with a list of names in distress attached to it. Now, Sir, as there will be thousands of visitors who can duly appreciate the comforts of a good bed, and can feel for those who do not enjoy this blessing, anybody might have the satisfaction of purchasing the above-mentioned three articles at the nominal price of 6s., and point out any one in the list to whom he would wish it to be given, the Committee promising to deliver the same according to his or her directions.

"That this may meet with your approval, and render assistance to those in distress, is the wish of

"Geo. Wilson, Esq." "Yours respectfully,
"ALEXANDER TAYLOR.

SHEFFIELD.

We have had the pleasure, within this week, to see various contributions of Sheffield manufactures to the Bazaar, all of which do great credit to the manufacturers of the town, and to the liberality and zeal of the donors. In several cases we are not permitted to particularize the parties or their contributions, but we may mention the following:—From Trafalgar Works, two beautiful satin-wood cases of ivory table cutlery, the material contributed by the employer, and the workmanship by the men; the cutlery is of first-rate quality and execution. From Mr. Isaac Read, of Lambert-street, a card of superior fancy scissors, inlaid with gold, and bearing a variety of Free-Trade inscriptions. From Mr. John Kay, St. Thomas-street, a Wharfedale knife, pearl handled, beautifully engraved, with a kneeling figure, and a sheaf of corn; motto—"Give us our daily bread duty-free." Mr. Edwin Lister has been at great pains in compiling a scrap-book: all sorts of newspapers have been laid under contribution to enrich its pages: it has also some embellishments of a more ornamental kind. Messrs. Drabble and Sanderson have contributed a valuable case of saws of the most beautiful manufacture. Messrs. Samuel Biggin and Son, of Scotland street, have contributed half-a-dozen saws of various sizes, of a most elegant description; appropriate designs are etched on the blades, and the handles are of ebony, rose, and other costly woods; and, altogether, the workmanship reflects the highest credit on the spirited manufacturers. Mr. George Cavill, of Bole-hill, Norton, has contributed an American hunter's knife of skilful workmanship. One of the contributions shown to us is deserving of particular notice, as showing the liberality of the young but zealous donors in furthering the good cause. Messrs. W. H. Smith, Thomas Atley, and Robert Needham, three apprentices of Messrs. W. and J. G. Parker, of Eyre-street, merchants, have presented a splendid assortment of various kinds of cutlery. The articles are of first-rate quality as regards workmanship and material, and are worth between £6 and £7. Mr. Wm. Martin, manager for Mr. Joseph Mappin, of Norfolk-street, has contributed a splendid case of razors; the handles are pearl, mounted with gold, and on the blades are designs beautifully chased in gold. One of the most beautiful contributions to the Bazaar which we have yet seen, is a case of scissors, manufactured by Messrs. Rudd and Wainwright, of Eyre-street, valued at £30. The card contains eighteen pairs of scissors. Two pairs are large scissors, which exemplify the perfection of workmanship; the others are small and useful sizes, as elegant and highly-finished as it is possible to conceive. The bows of the larger pair are filed out of a piece of solid steel, and represent full-length figures of Colnden and Bright, supporting a sheaf of corn, with the words, "The Free-Trade champions." We understand from competent judges, that we may safely say that a better specimen of Sheffield manufacture in scissors was never produced. Four boxes containing specimens of lead ore, and of the various preparations of lead, have been contributed by Mr. George Furniss, silver plater. They are very valuable and curious. We understand that Messrs. Greaves and Sons, of Shaf Works, contribute goods of the value of £100; and Messrs. Naylor, Vickers, and Co., files to the value of £50, with specimens of steel in various stages of manufacture.—Sheffield Independent.

PRESTON.

The ladies' and gentlemen's committee have each been active this week in procuring contributions. Amongst the contributors are:—Miss Lucas, fancy work; a friend, fancy articles, value £3; Mr. Talbot, druggist, one dozen smelling bottles; Miss Sedgwick, fancy articles; Friends, per Miss Hawkins, fancy articles, value £1. 15s; a lady, to the value of £1. 10s.; Friends, per Mr. Hawkins, £7; Mr. Siger, £1; Mr. Fishwick, Scorton, £5; a friend, per Mr. Haslam, £5; Mr. Butler, two miniature bedsteads; a friend from Manchester, three reams of paper; Mr. Heaton, Charles-street, £5; Friends, per Mr. Geo. Smith, £22. 10s.; small sums, £2 3s.; Mr. D. Wilcockson, superb scrap-book.—Preston Guardian.

LEEDS.

The articles intended for the Leeds stall at the approaching Bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre were exhibited in the Picture gallery of the Music-hall, in this town, on Tuesday and Wednesday last. The articles were displayed with great taste, and the room had a very elegant appearance, abounding with rich and varied specimens of ladies' fancy work, in contrast with a great diversity of the neatest and choicest productions of our local workshops and manufactories; the tables and walls were adorned with the productions of all classes of contributors, whose invention, curiosity, ingenuity, taste, or even eccentricity could add a novelty or attraction to the exhibition. Having previously had a private view, we were last week enabled to enumerate several articles, forming very prominent; if not the most prominent, features of the exhibition, but since that time many other very valuable and interesting contributions have been made. And we cannot refrain from again mentioning with honour Mrs. Vonn's beautiful contribution of the likeness of Queen Victoria in her coronation robes, accompanied with the unique biographical memoir, executed in minute penmanship, containing 27,000 words, in one continued line. Very beautiful specimens of the flax manufacture in a preliminary state were forwarded from the establishment of Messrs. W. B. Holdsworth and Co.; and of the worsted manufactures in their various stages, by Mr. F. W. Clapham, of Leeds. A very splendid box of mechanics' tools, valued at twenty guineas, was furnished by Mr. Bewley, of Leeds, and was greatly admired. So also was the costly and beautiful Gothic chair and screen, of carved oak, wrought with Berlin work, a present from William Empson, Esq.; and the bugle-work screen, contributed by Mrs. W. H. Birchall—the upholstery department by Messrs. Constantine. A very beautiful Elizabethan chair, from Mrs. Wier, sold for £10. But the great attraction of the exhibition was the smiling countenances and fascination of the ladies, to whom we must award all the success and honour that awaits the Leeds stall at Covent Garden. The following ladies have devoted a great deal of time and made great exertions in furtherance of the Bazaar:—Miss Stansfeld, Miss Mary Stansfeld, Mrs. Liebreich, Mrs. Unna, Mrs. Birchall, Miss Birchall, Misses Shann, Mrs. E. F. Terry, jun., Miss Fennell, Miss Mason, Mrs. Edw. Baines, and Mrs. Nunneley. From what we heard in the room, none of these ladies will find fault with us for according especial praise to the Misses Shann for their indefatigable industry in this delightful avocation: their contribution of clothing was most valuable and abundant. The refreshment table was everything that could be wished, being superintended and graced by the following ladies:—Mrs. Liebreich, Mrs. Edw. Baines, Mrs. Unna, and Miss Stansfeld. The amount realized for the League Fund is about £120 net. The visitors to the exhibition were very numerous. During the hours of admission, the gallery each day was an unbroken scene of gaiety and animation.—Leeds Mercury.

TOTNES.

Mr. John Bishop's, at the Mayoralty-house, being the depot for presents &c., to the Bazaar, we have just seen an elegant marble cheese-stand, manufactured in his best style by Mr. Woodley, of St. Mary Church, Devon, the gift of Mr. Joseph Ferris, of Totnes, called by some persons a short time ago in the Western Times (whose remarks on him seemed to wear on their brow the marks of disappointment) a nondescript, but who, it appears, may be perfectly described as an out-and-out reformer, and an indefatigable Free-Trader. The body of the cheese-stand is of white marble, beautifully inlaid on the border and in the centre with the rarest specimens of Madrepore marbles, reflecting great taste on the manufacturer, and generosity in the worthy donor.—Western Times.

FROME.

An endless and beautiful variety of costly articles, contributed by the ladies and gentlemen of Frome, towards the forthcoming Bazaar at Covent-garden Theatre, was exhibited to the public on Wednesday and Thursday last, at the residence of the Rev. C. J. Middledich, in this town, and attracted a great number of visitors. The exhibition consisted of some of the finest cloth manufactured in Frome, and worked in beautiful devices for chairs, stools, ottomans, table-covers, &c. Work-bags, children's dresses, and all kinds of fancy articles were without number, and we presume to the value of several hundred pounds. As an instance, one worked table-cover and a pair of ottomans were valued at £15. We hope it will excite the same interest when forwarded to London, and meet a ready sale in aid of the noble purpose for which it is sent.—Bath Journal.

WARRINGTON.

Great exertions are being made by the committee of the Free-Trade Association in this town, towards the furnishing of various articles of manufacture for the Bazaar about to be held in London. A meeting was called on Monday, when it was resolved that the public should be solicited for contributions. It is intended that half a stall shall be set apart for Warrington.—Liverpool Mercury.

BRISTOL.

The exhibition of the various articles contributed to the Bristol stand of the forthcoming Bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre commenced on Friday, the 25th ult., and will be continued this day at No. 43, High street. The contributions are far more numerous than the committee had anticipated, and amount in value to above £100. They comprise numerous manufactured articles, paintings, prints, specimens of needlework and embroidery, drawings, devices, china and other ornaments, books, &c. The contributions are equally creditable to the taste and ingenuity as to the liberality of our fellow-citizens, some of them being of a very costly description.—Bristol Mercury.

BOLTON.

The articles prepared in this town and neighbourhood for the Bolton stall, at the approaching National Free-Trade Bazaar, were exhibited on Friday, in the Temperance Hall, Little Bolton. There was a considerable display of articles of taste—ornamental, neat, plain, and useful; but we should have been better pleased to have found amongst them specimens of the industrial skill comprised in our machine workshops, foundries, and similar establishments. It is not too late to remedy this defect, and we hope it will be at once attended to, for the honour of our town, its population, and manufacturing credit. The sale of articles and money paid for admission realized more than £45, of which £7. 14s. were taken at the doors in sixpences. A beautifully worked fancy chair, presented by Miss Ashworth, of the Oaks, Torton, was much admired: it is valued at £20. The exhibition of two or three pairs of stout clo. caused some amusement, as no doubt they will to some of the corkneys, when they see and handle them.—Bolton Free Press.

BARNSELY.

(From a Correspondent.)

On Thursday last a tea party was held here, in the Odd Fellows' Hall, in aid of the League Bazaar, and to celebrate the completion of the contributions to the Barnsley stall. About 250 ladies and gentlemen sat down to tea; after which Mr. George Travis was called to the chair. The meeting was addressed by our ardent friend, Mr. Edward Parker, and by Mr. Plint of Leeds, who gave us a very useful and eloquent speech, replete with facts illustrative of the baneful effects of protection on both agriculture and commerce. We had also a public exhibition on the 16th and 17th ult., of the articles contributed by the friends of Free Trade here to our stall, in a room of Messrs. Harvey's linen warehouse, liberally lent by them for the purpose. The various articles were very tastefully arranged for show by two of our indefatigable lady friends, and were inspected with great interest by a considerable number of persons from the town and neighbourhood. The skilful workmanship, the ingenuity and fine taste, displayed in the useful and ornamental productions furnished by the ladies, excited general admiration. The supply of the staple manufactures of our town was also good, considering that some of our principal manufacturers are either opposed to the League, or indifferent to its success. I might give you a detailed account of the free-will offerings of the ladies, but it would be invidious to make distinctions where all have done well. All honour to those ladies who have so nobly recorded their disapprobation of that law which intercepts the bounties of Providence, depreciates the value of the poor man's labour, and then mercilessly mulcts him of a his daily bread.

SUNDERLAND.

Very liberal contributions have been made, both in money and presents, by the friends of Free Trade in Sunderland, in aid of the Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar, to be held in Covent-garden Theatre, in May. The ladies especially have laboured in this cause of love with a zeal and assiduity not to be surpassed in towns which are the very focus of Free Trade. We shall embrace an early opportunity of particularizing some of the chief tributes to the Bazaar.—Tyne Mercury.

CAMBRIDGE.

The members of the Committee of the Cambridge Anti-Corn-Law Association met at Mr. Wells's, the Bell and Crown, Bridge-street, on Thursday evening last, when several very appropriate and valuable articles were received for the League Bazaar, to be held in Covent-garden Theatre in May next. Also several subscriptions in cash were received towards the same object, which are now all transmitted to the Committee of Management in London.—Cambridge Advertiser.

WIGAN.

The Wigan committee for collecting subscriptions and goods in aid of the Free-Trade Bazaar, held a meeting on Monday evening, at the Buck-i'-th'-Vine, when the following contributions were announced as having been received:—Messrs. Taylor, £10; Messrs. Johnson and Ainsworth, £10; Mr. Evans, £5; Mr. H. Bullock, £5; Mr. Richard Ranson, £2; Messrs. J. and T. Potter, £2; Mr. John Aston, £2; Mr. Thomas Bingham, £2; Mr. Joseph Aspinall, £2; Mr. John Aspinall, £2; and other smaller sums, amounting in the whole to upwards of £20. In addition to the foregoing, contributions in fancy articles have been given from Mrs. Cook, £10; the Misses Johnson, £7; Miss Martin, £4. 10s.; Mrs. Riley, £7; and in other goods from Mr. Riley, £6. 10s.; Mr. Evans, £1. 7s.; and from Mr. Bone, several copies of original poems. Other subscriptions are in course of collection; and contributions in fancy goods have been announced from Mr. Stock, the Misses Marshall, Miss Gaskell (of Upholland), Mr. Jolley, Mr. Binns, and others; making a total in value, of upwards of £100.—Manchester Guardian.

ROCHDALE.

On Monday and Tuesday the articles contributed in Rochdale to the Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar were exhibited at the Borough Hall, and offered for sale. The stalls were furnished with a great variety of goods, which seemed to meet with a ready sale. A rosewood chair, valued at £25, attracted general attention. The cushion and back were covered with embroidery, the performance of Mrs. Cheetham, of Goose-lane. There were also some fine specimens of flannel, made of the finest wool. Among the ladies at the stalls, we observed Mrs. S. Taylor, Mrs. Gibson, Mrs. Stephens, Mrs. John Hoyle, Miss Hoyle, Miss Heape, Miss Howarth, Miss Stephens, Mrs. Barker, and other friends of cheap food. The attendance of visitors far exceeded the committee's expectations; and the total receipts of Monday amounted to about £130. Yesterday the attendance was not so numerous; yet a good many purchases were made. A splendid table, valued at £5, was amongst the collection, and a beautiful miniature steam-engine, by Mr. Petrie, attracted great attention.—Ibid.

BRADFORD.

We have had the privilege of inspecting several large and beautiful assortments of the varied fabrics of our district, prior to their being transmitted to Covent-garden Theatre. Where all have shown a munificent spirit, it is difficult to particularize without a seeming invidiousness, but we are quite sure that all the donors will excuse our mentioning a few of the principal donations. Our spirited townsmen, Messrs. Milligan, Forbes, and Co., with their accustomed liberality, have given goods amounting to upwards of £240; embracing an assortment of worsted and alpaca productions, in every variety of fabric and colour. Messrs. Russell, Douglas, and Co., Mr. Titus Salt, Messrs. Renne, Tetley, and Co., Messrs. Wm. Fison and Co., and Mr. George Rogers, have contributed on a scale equally honourable to their liberality and their Free-Trade principles. It is besides due to each of these parties to note the beauty of their contributions, expressly manufactured for the occasion. Our readers are aware that Messrs. Wm. Fison and Co. had the honour of manufacturing "the Alpaca Textures" for Her Majesty: they have therefore, very appropriately, developed the beautiful dresses to be sent to the Bazaar in a splendid emblazoned screen representing in the centre Her Most Gracious Majesty, with the arms and flag of Great Britain; on the right hand, the two pet alpacas in Windsor Park; and on the left, a very life-like representation of Windsor Castle. This engraving is the production of a local artist, Mr. Burton, and is highly creditable to his taste and skill. Messrs. Russell, Douglas, and Co. have favoured us with a view of one of their contributions, which we hardy know how to designate; perhaps in an early number of Punch there may be notice of it, worthy of the wit and humour of that most talented and witty and, be it soberly said, enlightened periodical. We feel quite assured our local manufacture will not be disparaged by its exhibition in Covent garden Theatre. But we are not yet content. There is room for others, eminently distinguished by their contributions to the League Fund of £100,000, yet to come forward, and, if it is too late to send goods, money is always acceptable, and our friends know where to send that. Some of the young ladies of Bradford have diligently occupied themselves, since Colonel Thompson was here, in working for the good cause, and we have received some exceedingly elegant and beautiful specimens of embroidered alpaca and merino from them, which will maintain an honourable rivalry with contributions from other quarters.—Bradford Observer.

DERBY.

So far, Derby has done well, but we should like to swell the stock to a still greater bulk. Already contributions in ladies' work, articles of vertu, manufactures of various kinds, spars, caricatures, drawings, paintings, &c.

amounting in value to nearly £300, have been sent in; and others, to the extent of at least £50, are daily expected—to say nothing of donations which will no doubt follow. The three counties of Derby, Nottingham, and Leicester, will contribute at least £2000.—Derby Reporter.

EDINBURGH.

The fancy work and miscellaneous articles contributed by the inhabitants of Edinburgh to the great Bazaar in furtherance of the cause of Free Trade, which is to be opened in London on the 8th of May, were exhibited on Monday and Tuesday, in Mr Taylor's Sale-rooms, George-street, under the superintendence of the Ladies' Committee. In the course of these two days nearly two thousand persons visited the rooms, which were filled with a vast number of articles of great variety and beauty, and amounting in value to about £600. Our limited space forbids us to particularize the things exhibited with anything like minuteness, but we may mention the following as specimens:—Books—from Sir George Mackenzie (who has also sent 175 ancient coins, eight of which are of gold), Mr. George Combe, Mr. Robert Carr, Mr. J. W. Willis, Mr. James Ballantyne, Mr. Wye, Captain Gray, &c. &c. Paintings and engravings—from Mr. H. McCulloch, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Currie, &c. An anatomical preparation of a horse's head, from Professor Dick. A beautiful pair of granite curling-grooves with silver mounted handles, from some Free-Traders in Falkirk (chiefly farmers). 100 pickers of gelatine, from Messrs. J. and G. C. x. An unpublished portrait of Mrs. Siddons, from Mrs. George Combe. Twelve Skenedhus, from Mr. A. Young. Implements, weapons, &c., from the South Sea Islands, of curious and beautiful workmanship, native Tahitian cloth and exquisitely carved Chinese casket, &c., from Mr. Wemyss, Southbury-road. A set of elegant trays, and various other costly and beautiful articles, from Mr. Wilshire, Waterloo-place. Black candles made of bitumen, gathered at Binny Craig, with many other articles, from Mrs. Renton. Two sets of very fine gas lustres, from Messrs. Laidlaw and Son. A very interesting contribution was made by Mr. Tutting, late of North St. David-street; it consisted of a pair of white satin slippers worn by the Princess Charlotte, which had been returned as presents for another pair, with directions in the Princess's own handwriting. We understand that ten guineas had been offered to Mr. Tutting for these interesting memorials of the lamented lady. Among the other articles were specimens of works from the various charitable institutions in Edinburgh—the House of Refuge, West Kirk Workhouse, Deacons Institution, &c.; two fine gilded cups, models of an ivory cup which belonged to Nero, a curious and elaborate model of an Etruscan tomb, a model of a gipsy camp, Scottish botanical specimens, Scotch pebbles and brooches, horn spoons, rich Eastern slippers, dolls in Highland and fancy dresses, worked cushions, shawls, scarfs, babies' dresses, &c. &c. Many of the articles bore appropriate mottoes, and, as a mark of the enthusiasm in favour of the good cause, we may mention that there were several pieces of fancy work, knitted for the occasion by a lady upwards of seventy years of age. Altogether, the exhibition was highly creditable to the taste, industry, and enterprise of the ladies' committee. The articles are to be sent to London this afternoon, and we believe that the two steam companies have in the most handsome manner agreed to share them together, and convey them free of charge; and that they have also offered a free passage to the ladies deputed to superintend the arrangement and sale of the articles in London.—Scotsman.

HAWICK.

Active steps are being taken to assist, in a manner creditable to this important manufacturing town, in rendering the National Bazaar worthy of its object; and all who are inclined to forward it will now have an opportunity of doing so, as we observe, from notices at the windows of many of our respectable shops, that articles are taken in for this grand national undertaking.—Kelso Chronicle.

DUNFERMLINE.

Some splendid samples of damask have been sent to the forthcoming Bazaar from the town of Dunfermline.—Scots Reformers' Gazette.

DUNDEE.

We have paid several visits to the collection of articles from Dundee and neighbouring towns, preparing to be forwarded to the great League Fancy Fair in London. The list is not yet completed, and we therefore do not make mention of individual contributions. We are glad to find the variety much greater than from the nature of the trades in this district could have originally been anticipated. Valuable paintings and engravings, models, carved wood-work, ladies' work, valuable coins, &c., form part of the ornaments of the Dundee stall. Lists of all degrees of fineness, from shirting to sack-cloth, and canvas, from the best sulcloth to the coarsest, will impose its groundwork. These will amply represent the industry of the district as far as it is concerned in such an occasion. Avoiding the drawing of comparisons, we would, amongst the towns well known to the public, put Arbroath as having done its duty. The articles from Laurencekirk do credit to the skill of the weavers, both as to number and beauty.—Dundee Advertiser.

THE LEAGUE AND THE COVENT-GARDEN BAZAAR.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

A LETTER TO FRIENDS IN THE COUNTRY.
FRIENDS OF FREE TRADE.—I have paid an early visit to the great League Bazaar, now forming at Covent-garden, since my arrival here, and I am so full of amazement that I cannot help writing some account of it. But I must come and see it; those who can come, and do not leave you to judge.
My inclination is, first, to give you a description of the Bazaar as done by the League in London and Manchester; but the funds to be derived from the Bazaar are so small, and so far more than fill a long letter.
At No. 67, in Fleet-street, there is the League-office, where the paper is published, some twenty thousand copies of each number being folded there, directed each to a separate address, and conveyed to the Post-office.

In another department here the business of registration is carried on. Amongst every parliamentary constituency in the kingdom some agents of the League are perseveringly though not selfishly at work enlarging the franchise. The central office in this department of business is in Manchester, as are also the head-quarters of the Council of the League. But at Fleet-street, in London, the legal business connected with the registration of electors is transacted. The applications for legal advice as to what might be a qualification to vote, and what is not, are very numerous from all parts. A lawyer of talent and experience is constantly there to give, and by the assistance of clerks to send, advice to every place from whence it is sought. "The battle of Free Trade and national well-being must be fought in the registration courts," to quote Sir Robert Peel with a slight variation; and the League will send forces into every registration court in the kingdom. They have already done so with much success; and they will do so again with far greater success.

Next, there is the money subscription department. Most of the subscriptions come to London. But all the cash is remitted to Manchester, to be banked by the treasurer there, W. Rawson, Esq., from whom it is again drawn when wanted, as the Council at Manchester may, by a vote, think fit to direct. No money is paid but by a vote of the Council; and as all accounts are first examined by the finance committee, this alone engages the gentlemen at Manchester a good deal. And it must be borne in mind, that all of them there are persons carrying on extensive concerns of their own. They attend the Manchester and Liverpool Exchanges, and some of them transact business in a day to the extent of £20,000. And then they will go to the League offices in Manchester, and investigate accounts of twenty shillings, or of twenty pence, if such come before them, and order payment only by one moving, by another seconding, and by the chairman putting it to the Council if the motion shall pass. Such is the scrupulous care with which they conduct the pecuniary part of the business intrusted to them by the subscribers to the League fund.

It therefore requires much writing and careful book-keeping, both in Manchester and in London, to preserve complete order in all the money transactions. And the business is vastly complicated by the great variety of the subscriptions; each subscriber having a certain number of League papers sent, according to the time of paying, and the amount of money paid.

The reading of the letters alone, upwards of a hundred, received each day, and the answering of many of them, also the entering of all that refers to money, or other particular business, into books, take up much time.

But I am taking too much time on my way to the Bazaar. Let me proceed thither at once; and, in imagination, take you with me.

We are at the grand portico in Bow-street, on the east side of the theatre. Here is the only entrance to be open to the public. From this door on the east side to the Queen's door on the south side, which last is to be the only way of public exit, the visitor to the Bazaar will have to travel more than three quarters of a mile, and all within the house. A few turns taken in the saloons, which are the only places where the visitors will have it in their power to walk to and fro, the mile will be completed.

Now, my friends, I shall from this, the grand entrance, up the grand staircase, conduct you through the house until you descend by the Queen's staircase, and so out into Prince's-place. But it may be as well to halt here for a few minutes.

There will be an awning erected outside to protect visitors from rain, when it becomes necessary to prevent too many from crowding into the house at once. Between this and the door in Prince's-place there will be room for a meandering stream of 3000 people, without inconvenience, not reckoning the ladies attending on the stalls, who will be in sufficient number to be relieved every two hours, or oftener if desirable; nor reckoning the stewards, of whom there will be several hundreds; nor the committee, members of the Council, and numerous servants of the League and of the theatre. There will be admission from twelve o'clock until eight in the evening, each person occupying from two to two hours and a half in making the circuit of the house. Thus there will be about ten thousand visitors, upon an average, each day. The price of admission will be 10s. 6d. each person on the 8th of May, the day of opening; 5s. on the 9th and 10th, 2s. 6d. on the 12th, and 1s. on each succeeding day for the space of, probably, two weeks.

Great as the numbers thus anticipated are, it is confidently expected that it will be necessary to stay, from time to time, "The house is full; we must not crowd it to inconvenience, you must stay for a short while under this awning until some go out."

Now, supposing us there, and still obliged to linger, let me give a description of that part of the house which we shall not see when we are within those gigantic walls that we now stand outside of.

In no part, save on the north side, does the great hall constructed for the Bazaar, large as it is, one hundred and fifty feet long by one hundred feet wide, extend to the walls of the house. Within these walls, on the east and west side, are suites of rooms, of which the League occupies about forty. Others are reserved to contain the property of the theatre. Near the north end is the ponderous, wood-ron, prodigious amount of machinery, scenery, ropes, blocks, and general tackling used in dramatic business. A landsman who sees the full-staged ship for the first time is not more amazed, and at a greater loss to understand how each rope and block, and yard, and sail, is to be handled and made to do its work, than is the untheatrical stranger who looks upon the intricate, high up and low down, of ropes, blocks, pulleys, wheels, rollers, and unnameable contrivances which occupy so large a space in this house.

Then we have passages, lobbies, and staircases, of every degree: the "grand," the noble, and royal, in positions of elegance and ease; and the lowly, the hard-working, and the mean conditioned, shrinking into darkness, and retiring far from the regions of splendour to perform their offices of usefulness.

On the lowest of the five floors, lower than daylight ever penetrates, save when stealthy gnomes, fugitives from Bow-street, come down to hide and lose themselves in darkness, are the apartments for dressing the stage soldiers, mobs, and chorus singers; and in their apartments the League stows away its lumber, packing-boxes, and such like.

Above these, on the level of Bow-street, is a range of rooms somewhat superior, but devoted to similar uses. Over these, on a level with the stage, and one story above the level of Bow-street, are the superior rooms occupied in the management of the theatre.

And going along the passage we would see on the door of a large apartment the words "Captain Rafter," and on inquiry you soon ascertain that the gallant captain has the surveillance of the decorations for the Bazaar.

Next to that is a smaller room, and the name posted on the door informs us that it is the apartment appropriated to the use of Mr. Wilson. The duties and labours of the "Chairman of the Council" are too generally known to need specification here.

On the next door appears the name of "Mr. Saul." Here it would seem that letters are received and answered, and hence general directions on Bazaar business are issued.

Further on we see the "offices," where a staff of busy clerks are deeply engaged amongst piles of papers and books.

Over these rooms is another range, which are usually occupied, if I mistake not, by the higher class of gentlemen performers as dressing rooms. These will be occupied by gentlemen connected with the League during the Bazaar.

Above these are apartments filled with some of the lumber of theatrical property; and adjoining is a large supply of water to wash the stage niggers, Ethiopians, and red-faced men white; also, I presume, to be ready in case of danger from fire.

On the opposite side of the house, the west side, there are similar ranges of rooms, in which the ladies of the theatre, from the humblest to the highest, array themselves. Here, also, is the wardrobe of the house. The rooms not retained for theatrical property on this side will be allotted to the ladies who attend the stalls, for refreshments, for dressing, for depositing cloaks and bonnets, and for chatting with one another when not on duty at the stalls. There are upwards of twenty such rooms on this side.

Let us get back to the grand entrance. Being strangers, we shall have much difficulty to do so among so many intricacies. But the numerous mechanics and artists employed upon the decoration of the theatre may, one or other of them, show us the way; or some of those porters or messengers of the League may do so. Or stay, let us speak to Mr. Sloman; that is him with the white straw hat, giving orders to the men: he is the machinist of the theatre. All the decorations for the Bazaar have been done under his immediate superintendence. He has been twenty years in the house, and ought to know it all; and while talking with him we may have an opportunity of being introduced to Mr. Grieve, the eminent scenic artist of this and other theatres, from whose designs Mr. Edwards, of Manchester, has been erecting the gorgeous Norman-Gothic hall for the Bazaar, and to take our course with the visitors round the house from the grand entrance in Bow-street.

Following the stream, we turn to our left, faces southward, up the grand staircase, and enter the Shakspeare Saloon. Here we see articles displayed which are not for sale, unless, indeed, it be those most exquisite curiosities in glass which are being made here. In this saloon, or in the next, we may see the spinning of glass thread to be woven into the richest and softest fabrics; or we may look upon that box from Darleston, in Staffordshire, and wonder and admire.

Simple-looking as that box is, only three feet long, by half that width, and four or five inches deep, we may see in it the raw and the wrought elements which more than any other enable England to be what England is, namely, iron and coal. We see the strata of the earth delineated on a map, showing where the miners go into the bowels of the earth, and where they find one kind of ore, and where another. We see the various shapes and natures which the ore takes upon itself under the hands of man, until it arrives at the perfection of the manufactures peculiar to Darleston—stirrups, bits, spurs, pistol barrels, and locks; all of them rich in workmanship and excellent in exterior polish. And here, and in other saloons, we see the iron ore and the coal once more, which lay for countless ages near neighbours to each other; and which, when brought to the light of day and the mouths of the deep pits, had no affinity. Yet the daring hands of man united them, and their products allied themselves with the skill and industry and genius of Sheffield, and received shapes there which they proudly carry into all corners of the world where they are allowed to go, telling of the place of their nativity. And because they are not allowed to go whithersoever they would, they come here to plead for Sheffield and the men that made them. Look upon them! They are mute, yet are they not eloquent? And again, look upon the men which the iron ore, and its ancient neighbour the block of coal, have been put to by human hands, and by British human hands, to perform prodigies, which even wizards in wildest dreams dared hardly claim for magic. There stands before us the steam-engine, which moves the largest ships on starboard oceans, defiant of all tides and winds; and which, though it be little past the hour of noon, brought these thousands of people, now crowding the streets of London and this great house of Covent-garden, from York and Leeds, and all the towns of the West Riding; and from Liverpool and all Lancashire; and from all the great towns of equal distance in England, the distance of from two to three hundred miles, and that since the sun rose this morning.

And is not that engine, though motionless and mute, a pleader for the men that made it, and for the hands, numbed only by hundreds of thousands, whom directly and indirectly it gives industrious scope to; and for those whom it helps to cover with clothes, numbered only by millions, does it not plead for them? It is here to plead for mankind, for leave to give more happiness, more wealth, more food, more clothing, and less hard labour to all the world.

But let us pass on. We turn to the right on leaving the Shakspeare saloon, and passing into the lobby of the dress circle, we go to the left, and reaching the back of the centre of the circle, we turn to the right to go into the circle itself. The two centre boxes have been removed, and through one of them is the passage into, and through the other is the passage out of, the grand hall. Before descending the steps to its floor we stop to gaze.

There it is—look upon it—look and be amazed—look, and try to hide your astonishment, you cannot. You turn your eyes to the roof and see the gorgeous pencilling of florid gothic illuminated from above, not to dazzle you with brightness, but to subdue your senses with the poetry of light, form, and colour, each grand and all harmonious.

Your eye wanders among the golden decorations, rich yet chaste, variegated yet simple, led on and on by these rows of gothic columns until it stops where they stop, and gazes upon the far-off splendour of the magnificent window and the recess below it, where real men and real women are eating and drinking in a scene which has hitherto belonged to dreams and the "Arabian Nights."

Below us we see the winding streams of people going down and coming up, by the long rows of stalls, and crossing behind the columns, yet never coming in contact, and we must descend the steps and mingle with them. The whole of the counters for the display of goods are nine hundred feet in length. They are variously divided, but all are of the uniform breadth of three feet. Four complete lines of them run the whole length of the house, the ladies serving the two centre lines standing back to back; and the streams of visitors going slowly down and coming up, each, in the passage ten feet wide, have a line of stalls on each hand.

Had those products of industry, which we see around us in such endless variety, been collected here as specimens of every kind of British skill, and for no other purpose, they would have simply served that purpose, and they will serve it. But that purpose is secondary. The question was asked of the British nation, "Are you in favour of Free Trade?" As many as are so are desired to send to London witnesses of their opinions and of their reasons—their industrial reasons—for asking for Free Trade. This was the question put to the nation; and behold the answer! Every conceivable variety of British industry has sent its representative here; not even excepting agriculture, which is rubbing its eyes, and sitting up in its place of sleep, asking what all this is about; and why, while it has slept, it has been fettered down?

Here is wheat, too, from Australia, claiming to be admitted into England; and but for the perishable nature, and the bulk of many articles of English farm produce, there would have been more of them here.

One thing peculiar to this Bazaar is, that the goods have been made for it. In other bazars it is common to collect goods from shopkeepers at a price, the goods to be returned if not sold, and the profits of the Bazaar to consist of the donations of purchasers; a sovereign being tendered for an article worth only half-a-crown, and no change given or expected.

Not so here: the articles were brought hither for sale; and their real selling value is asked for them, and nothing more, so far as that can be ascertained.

Of the many splendid shawls we see, there is one from Scotland, made for this Bazaar, first of its pattern, the loom for which was prepared at an expense of one thousand pounds. The laces of Nottingham, and the hosiery of Leicester and Derby, are they not beautiful? and rich as well as beautiful?

Birmingham! What wonders are worked there! Here is a bed which a traveller may carry with him in his pocket! he may spread it out whenever he pleases, and sleep softly and pleasantly on it; and, when he wakes, he may return it to his pocket, and go on his journey!

Laurencekirk having exhausted invention in snuff-boxes, has bound the bible in wood, and it is here.

There are ships, representatives of the seaports; and many are the specimens of the products of foreign shores, representatives of the ships.

The printers of calicoes in Lancashire have not only sent specimens of their goods, but have gone to great expense in producing new designs for this Bazaar.

But each visitor must look, and admire, and wonder for himself. We must pass on. And, having made this circuit of the grand hall, we return to the second of the centre boxes of the dress circle, through which we pass out, having entered by the first.

From hence we proceed to the grand saloon, where new wonders await us. Here, it may be, we shall see some of those things already noticed; but here we shall see what has not met us elsewhere. On the tables before us are specimens of the cotton manufacture in all its stages, and they are of great number and variety, from the berry of the plant to the finished muslin. So also of the flax manufacture, from the flax itself up to linen and lawn and cambric. So of the silk manufacture, from the silkworm to the regal satin. So also the paper manufacture, from the old rags to the elegant volume and the printed newspaper.

And here I may remark, there will be a Bazaar Gazette printed in the house each morning, containing the history of the previous day's business.

But the most wonderful of the processes of sciences exhibited here, are the stages by which chemistry travels in carrying our manufactures to perfection. The magic of the wizard was a valueless shadow. Not so the magic of the chemist. There is an old horn or hoof; here is the robe that may adorn a queen, confessing that its richest colour came from that old hoof or horn. The chemist did it; and you may see the process through which it is done.

It was but in the reign of George III. that nearly all our linens were sent to Holland to be bleached, and they were kept there half-a-year. They are now bleached at home. Both at home and in Holland the bleaching was slowly accomplished by steeping the cloth in alkaline lees, and by laying it out to dry upon grass, this being continued for six or eight months. But chemistry, with a new light, came in, and does the work in a space of time which it neither numbers by months, weeks, nor days, but by hours. We shall see the forms which this science, no longer a mystery, takes upon itself in the saloon.

And many things more shall we see here, not even hinted at; but for the present we must proceed onward.

Ascending these stairs we reach the upper boxes, and may sit there and look down upon the hall. And, when satiated, we go to the upper saloon. And here persons from all parts of the kingdom, and a few from other kingdoms and from America, meet and talk together, and become acquainted. They may linger here as long as they choose, and talk of the improved prospects of Free Trade, its certainty of being soon consummated in this country, and its desirableness for all nations.

The new ornaments on the walls in this saloon cannot fail to attract notice. The ornamental paper is elegant; but the aphorisms printed on it are more than elegant—they are instructive. Authors, philosophers, and philanthropists of the highest eminence, are here quoted from, not excepting Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham, both of whom have spoken in favour of Free Trade; and the latter of whom has written and printed and published that its principles are the principles of common sense.

From this saloon we proceed towards the Queen's staircase and descend by it, and going out into Prince's-place, take leave of the Bazaar—unless, as not unlikely, some of us proceed into Bow-street, and go round the magnificent exhibition once more.

Now, who is it that can and will not come to London to see this sight, which was never equalled in the world before? The railroads are carrying their thousands and tens of thousands at reduced fares; and will the friends of freedom to trade and emancipation to agriculture not come? Will the admirer of his country and all its greatness be content to stay away from this most national exhibition?

I leave each to answer into whose hands this may come, and am for the present,

REUBEN.

EXETER FREE-TRADE DEMONSTRATION.

Public meetings of the Free-Trade Association, attended by a deputation from the Council of the League, consisting of Major-General Briggs, Colonel T. Peyronet Thompson, and Robert R. Moore, Esq., were held at the Royal Subscription rooms, on the evenings of Wednesday and Thursday, the 23rd and 24th of April. The room, which will hold from two to three thousand persons, was on both evenings crowded to excess. The orchestra, with sitting space for from two to three hundred, was reserved for ladies; every seat was occupied; many stood during the whole of the time, and numbers went away unable to procure admission. Amongst others on the platform we observed J. C. Sercombe, Esq., S. Maunder, Esq., S. Haydon, Esq., Edward Davey, Esq., H. Drville, Esq., G. Sercombe, Esq., Rev. N. Hellings, J. D. Osborne, Esq., R. Holwell, Esq., and several members of the committee of the Exeter Free-Trade Association. The deputation were welcomed with the utmost enthusiasm. Samuel Maunder, Esq., chairman of the association, presided at both meetings. On Wednesday evening he stated that, without its having been arranged, it happened to be the anniversary of the election, when General Briggs, at their earnest public invitation, had come forward as a candidate for the representation of the city on Free-Trade principles. The spirit roused then had not slept nor died out; the facts and arguments advanced then had not been forgotten. The committee formed then had continued to work ever since; the register had been attended to and improved; and the enthusiastic reception of the deputation that evening by this meeting, if possible, more crowded than any former one, was proof that public opinion, without the excitement of an election, continued its earnest condemnation of the Corn Law, and he had no doubt that opinion would grow, and exertion be persevered in and increased, until the city was represented by two Free Traders.

In the course of the evening a piece of plate would be presented to Mr. Moore; it had been subscribed for shortly after the election, as a token of respect for his exertions on that occasion.

After the report had been read by Mr. Richards, the Chairman introduced to the meeting General Briggs, who was received with several rounds of cheers. He gave a brief outline of the formation, rise, and progress of the League; of their strict adherence to the one great object of Free Trade, and the confidence that their persevering consistency had won them from the country. This confidence ensured them funds for the continuance of the agitation. All were resolved to work on to the end, no matter how distant it might be, but, judging from the position of the Free-Traders and monopolists, in Parliament and out of Parliament, the end seemed near. He hoped Exeter would have its share in the triumph, by sending two Free-Traders to Parliament to represent the city; their industrial interests must prosper by freedom of trade, not by mere party contests.

Col. Thompson next addressed the assembly. He was in his happiest mood. His illustrations were full of wit and power, every word told, and his ridicule of the fears and attempted arguments of the monopolist parliamentary gentry in the late sugar, grease, lard, and tinned butter debates kept the audience laughing and cheering incessantly.

J. C. Sercombe, Esq., then rose, and in a short address, highly complimentary to Mr. Moore, presented him with an elegant silver tankard, weighing 33 ounces, and which had been subscribed for by between two and three hundred citizens of Exeter. It bore the following inscription:—"Presented to Robert R. Moore, Esq., by the admirers of his eloquent advocacy of Free Trade, in the contested election for the city of Exeter, April, 1841."

Mr. Moore, in returning thanks, said he valued their so kindly offered and handsome present not merely as a gift to himself, but as a proof of their earnest devotion to the Free-Trade cause, and of their esteem for all the workers in that cause, many of the most self-sacrificing and zealous of whom were never heard of in public. He spoke of the personal exertions of members of the Council, of the great mass of daily business to be attended to—of the magnitude of the operations of the League—of the organization for registration in boroughs and counties—and of the untimely and friendly good feeling with which, differing on many other subjects, they laboured together in the common cause of liberty to industry. He then commented upon the report of the South Devon Protection Society, and the speeches made at the meeting of that association in Exeter on the preceding Friday; and concluded with an account of the spirit with which ladies were preparing contributions for the Bazaar, and manufacturers exerting themselves to make the exhibition worthy of the national industry and skill.

On Thursday General Briggs again first addressed the meeting. He said farmers seemed to him to have been caught by the Corn Laws as they catch monkeys in India. They climb a cocoa-nut tree, make a hole in the nut large enough to let in a monkey's hand, fill the nut with sugar, up comes the monkey, very fond of sugar, smells it, thrusts in his hand, grasps the prize and tugs away; but the shut hand cannot be drawn out, and there the monkey holds and hurls. So have the farmers caught the Corn Laws: it holds them fast prisoners, hurls them over as peris to the landlords, but they won't let go. (The aptness of the application delighted the audience, and the story of the cocoa-nut-caught monkeys will be quoted often in Exeter.)

Col. Thompson accounted for Gen. Briggs and himself being Free-Traders, from their both having seen other nations and other men; from their having lived in other climates, and having observed somewhat of the undeveloped resources of the world, and the unsupplied wants of distant people. They had both ruled over other countries. General Briggs had held civil command over a wide territory and large population in India, and he had been Governor in Sierra Leone. It was impossible to have anything to do with governing, and not to see clearly the perpetual mischief of monopoly.

Mr. Moore spoke of the proofs of progress, and of the facts that established the soundness of Free-Trade reasoning, and showed that all the assertions of monopolists had been answered by the result of the last two or three years.

The Rev. FRANCIS BISHOP moved the cordial thanks of the meeting to the deputation.

Mr. BESLEY would move an addition to Mr. Bishop's resolution. There was a gentleman sitting near him to whom they owed all the gratification they had received—he meant Mr. Edward Davey, of Fordton, who was mainly instrumental in bringing the deputation down. (Loud cheers.)

The resolution passed with acclamation.

Mr. Moore called for three cheers for Mr. Andrews, of Southampton, who had found employment for Charles Snowden, who, for voting conscientiously, had been most unconscientiously discharged from his situation. (Mr. Andrews was vehemently cheered.)

Thanks were voted to the chairman; and after several rounds of cheering the meeting separated.

ANTI-CORN-LAW LECTURES.—Mr. Falvey, from the Anti-Corn-Law League, has been busy in those parts during the last week in promulgating the principles, the truth, the justice, and the equity of freedom of trade and commerce, and in exposing the gross delusion, injustice, oppression, and futility of restriction and monopoly. He held two meetings at the Swan Assembly-rooms, Hastings, one on Tuesday and the other on Friday. The first was attended by about 250 persons, the second was a bumper indeed. Both were most respectfully and, we may add, influentially attended; for many, who, though holding positions in society which render them independent, had not the moral courage to come boldly forward, were yet to be seen within earshot, applauding and admiring the zeal, intelligence, and convincing arguments of the lecturer. The meetings were also unanimous and enthusiastic in the cause, and we hail with pleasure the progress it is making in this district. The seed long sown is springing up to a healthful aspect, and a fine and beautiful harvest will be reaped. Those truths, those unanswerable facts, which are the groundwork on which the superstructure of the League is raised, but which only three years ago the farmers refused to listen to, are now sought after with eagerness. They have been heard, they have been imbibed, and have become firmly rooted in the mind. There is now no longer a violent, noisy, dangerous interruption. The agents of the League, as they are called, are now listened to with attention and respect; and the farmers are beginning to understand that it is their prosperity, and not their ruin, the League and all advocates for Corn-Law repeal seem to promote. Farmers are daily becoming more and more satisfied that they are under the ban of protection and compelled to sell at less than Free-Trade prices. They feel severely the rebate when asked, "What has protection ever done for you?" They begin to understand that protection is to them "a mockery, a delusion, and a snare," and they are just settling down to the conviction that the day is not far distant when the very semblance of protection must cease to exist. As a body they look fearfully and gloomily at the prospect before them; but in the minds of many who begin to understand the question, and who view it through its true medium, there begins to arise a desire to have the coming change. They wish the question settled; they know and feel that there will be no rest until it is obtained, and they wish it over. These are great strides accomplished in a short space of time by a body of men so isolated and so slow to move towards any new conviction; and all this has been achieved. The League have much to congratulate themselves upon as far as this locality is concerned, and Mr. Cobden will ere long cease to blush for the county which gave him birth.—Brighton Guard.

—Mr. Falvey lectured at the large room at the George Inn, Bittle, on Thursday evening the 24th ult. There was a large attendance of agriculturists and others, who appeared to take the most lively interest in the question of Free Trade, and marked their approval of Free-Trade doctrines by frequently cheering the statements of the lecturer.

PEEL TO HIS STEP-FATHER COBDEN.

(From Punch.)

MY DEAR STEP-FATHER, I write to let you know how I am getting on in the school, which you have sent me to take lessons in. I am making very rapid strides, and they say that I shall soon go as far as you, if I continue the steps I am now pursuing. It is very true that I was in quite a different walk before you adopted me, but I am now at your side, and if you will lend me a hand to drag me on, I dare say I shall keep pace with you—no matter what lengths you may wish to carry me to.

I was formerly thought a very slow boy, but since you have adopted me, I have become so quick that I am here, there, and everywhere in no time. Those who used to be at my side, are quite left behind, and are obliged to follow me, which they do at a very respectful distance, as if they don't half like it. I wish you would not pull me on quite so fast, for you forget that I find it difficult to get on as quickly as you wish with the corn, which you and I have had so much talk about. I have no doubt that in time I shall get quite as far as you can desire, and

I remain, your dutiful step-son,

ROBERT PEEL.

METROPOLITAN RELIEF SOCIETY.—At a meeting of the five District Societies of St. Mark's, held at the Court-house on Wednesday, the 31st of April, present, the Rev. G. S. Penfold, D.D., in the chair; the reports from the several districts were read, from which it appeared that, during the past year, 3782 persons had been relieved by their visitations, and that the sums distributed amounted to £1500. 6s. 11½d.

FOND OF DEBT.—The American people seem to be exceedingly fond of debt. If they would but pay as they go, they would be happier, more honest, and better off.—Christian Herald.

J. C. CALHOUN, ESQ.

The following letter has been received from J. C. Calhoun, Esq., the celebrated American advocate of Free Trade, addressed to George Wilson, Esq., Chairman of the Council of the League:—

Fort Hill, March 24, 1845.

"DEAR SIR,—I accept with much pleasure the copy of the first volume of the LEAGUE, which you transmitted to me by the direction of the Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League for my acceptance. I feel greatly honoured by this mark of their respect.

"I regard Free Trade as involving considerations far higher than mere commercial advantages, as great as they are. It is, in my opinion, emphatically the cause of civilization and peace—of wide-spread civilization and durable peace among the nations of the earth. It belongs to England and the United States to take the lead in this great cause; and I hope the day is not distant when they will set the noble example to the rest of Christendom of freeing commerce of any shackle and imposition, excepting such duties as may be laid exclusively for revenue.

"With very great respect, I am, &c. &c.,

"J. C. CALHOUN.

"George Wilson, Esq., Chairman of the Council."

SWAN RIVER.

(From the Adelaide Observer of November 9.)

By the roundabout way of Batavia and Sydney, from King George's Sound direct, we have news from Swan River to the 4th of September.

The Legislative Council had carried a Corn-Law Bill, imposing a tax of 15 per cent. upon the importation of wheat and flour, in direct opposition to the Governor, who declared, while the measure was under discussion, that, "on the imposition of a tax on any provisions he was determined to take his stand, and refuse to give any assent to such a measure." The Council persisting, however, the measure was proceeded with and eventually carried, whereupon "his Excellency instantly rose and most energetically declared that he felt glad it was not his fate to remain much longer in the colony (his six years of service being about to expire); that, by their passing of this ordinance, with the duty on provisions, they had struck a deathblow to the colony. He should advise all his friends of the circumstance, and he felt convinced, when the tidings went abroad that the article of food was taxed 15 per cent., they need not expect any further immigration. He threw the odium of such an act on their own shoulders, and was convinced they would have reason to repent of it before the ensuing year had expired: he would offer no opposition."

quantity of produce, instead of making manure free of cost to grow the large quantity of produce. He prefers to augment the rent he has himself to pay, by the very act which diminishes his power to pay it.

He prefers to make himself his own victim for his own protection! The rat, which, shut up in its hole, eats its tail off for its own sustenance, may be a very unfortunate rat, but it is not foolish. It did not blockade itself and refuse to come out, and prefer from choice to pick the flesh from its own bones.

At a time when so much is said of the labourers, the necessity of finding them profitable employment; of the farmers, the necessity of doing something to make their farms more profitable, we cannot overlook what is in process of performance by some individuals whose minds are too large for prejudice.

Let us at present refer to Whitfield Example Farm, the property of the Right Honourable the Earl of Ducie, redeemed from barrenness, foulness, and unprofitableness, to fertility, neat order, and profit, by Mr. Morton, at an expenditure of £7828. This farm is in the parish of Cromhall, in the county of Gloucester, twelve miles from Bristol, and consists of 232 acres.

It will be remembered that when the Earl of Ducie made his valuable speech at the League meeting at Covent-garden Theatre, last year, in favour of Free Trade, he gave statements of the expense of producing wheat on this farm. And it may be remembered by some that the leaders of the Protection Society immediately after endeavoured to undo his lordship's statements by asserting that the soil upon which the wheat grew was that of the old rich pastures newly broken up. The following description of the farm before it was broken up will show what its native state was. This description of it is also applicable to several millions of acres of grass land, and to much of the corn land throughout England, up to this very month of May, 1845.

I quote from Mr. Morton's first report, made, I believe, in 1838, and published together with his second report as an appendix to a valuable book on the "Nature and Property of Soils."

"1. This farm has been in the occupation of Mr. George Thomas, as a yearly tenant, for the last twenty-one years. It consists of 232 acres; 161 of which are pasture, and 69 arable. The rent is £200 a year; the poor rate £28; the tithe £33; and the road-rate £1; which, including all parochial taxes, amount to £265 per annum.

"2. The buildings on this farm are very limited. A dwelling-house, 45 feet by 35 feet, consists of a kitchen, back kitchen, dairy, and parlour below, with four bedrooms above. A small barn, a stable for four horses; a shed, with four bays sufficient for eight cows; a house for four cows, and a calves' house, form the whole of the buildings on the estate, and these are in a very bad state of repair.

"3. One is struck with the forest-like appearance which the pasture land presents when viewed from the high ground at Abbot's Side. The immense number of oaks and other trees in the hedgerows are so crowded together as to injure the pasture greatly by occupying the surface, preventing the circulation of air, destroying the fences, preventing the drainage, and shading the grass, thus making it unpalatable to stock—savouring it.

"4. Mr. Thomas keeps a pack of twenty-five cows on this farm, and rears seven calves in a year, which he keeps till they have calves; when three years old they fill up the place of seven cows, which, together in some cases with some of the heifers and calves, are sold every year. Thus seven heifers or cows in calf, being sold in the spring of the year, his live stock consists of twenty-five cows, seven heifer calves, seven year-old heifers, and seven two-year-old heifers. These, together with four working horses, a riding horse, and some pigs, are the whole of the live stock which have been kept for the last twenty-one years.

"5. The produce of the 161 acres of pasture land is wholly consumed by the above 50 head of stock. There are generally about 100 acres of it mown, and made into hay, for the maintenance of the stock during the winter and spring; and the remaining 61 are pastured during the spring and summer, until the cattle can be turned into the latter-math. That portion of the grass land which is pastured has been always pastured, and the remainder has been generally made into hay. One would naturally expect from this mode of management a gradual improvement in the land which has always been pastured; but this is not the case, owing to the wetness of the soil, and in consequence of the land being so shaded and covered with trees. The natural result, however, of mowing land every year and carrying off the produce, shows itself in the most evident light. Unless manure is laid abundantly on, such a treatment must necessarily injure any land, and particularly this, which is so wet and spongy. The crops of hay which are produced are sometimes not worth the expense of making, seldom averaging more than half a ton per acre; and then it is composed of anything but grasses of a good quality."

[Here follows a list of the wild plants which grow in the pasture field, from which the hay is in most part made, instead of grass.]

"6. There might be some manure got from the consumption of 100 acres of hay, but it is all carried to the arable land, and nothing but a little earth, taken from the grips (surface or open drains), mixed with a little lime, is put on the grass land.

"7. There never has been any underground and very little surface draining done on this farm. The fences are, therefore, in a bad state; and most of the ditches are full of the roots of the hedgerow trees, brambles, and rubbish. There is a prejudice existing against underground draining. 'Griping' (that is, surface draining) will do good on this land; but underground drains never do good on this land, Sir.' This is a common saying, not only of Mr. Thomas and the workmen, and all those who have any connexion with it, but also of some of the neighbouring tenants, without any reason being given for it. From Mr. Thomas it may be taken as an apology for his conduct. I think they might have found a good reason in the immense number of trees, the roots of which would soon stop the best and most efficient underground drainage that could be effected.

"8. The mode of managing the arable land is that which is used amongst most of the dairy farmers in the neighbourhood; potatoes and wheat for the family being the chief crops. As, however, there is a much greater proportion of arable land on this farm, than is generally the case with dairy farms in this neighbourhood, Mr. Thomas sometimes has part of the land in barley and clover, and has lately had some of the poorest of it planted with teazles. At present I find fourteen acres in wheat, which may produce twelve bushels per acre; seven acres in barley, which may produce twenty bushels per acre; seven acres in teazles, worth, perhaps, thirty shillings per acre; eight acres in clover, which may produce eighteen cwt. of hay per acre; and twenty-four acres in potatoes, which may produce five tons and a half per acre. Of the potato land, eight acres are dug, and let to the labourers at £7 per acre; and sixteen acres are not dug, which are let to the labourers at £1 per acre; and the remaining acres are for the use of the family. The whole of the arable land is full of couch, thistles, and every other weed which such land is subject to.

"9. There is no fixed system of cropping; nor is there any land fit for executing the work which must be performed. No arrangement is made for the performance of any one act of husbandry; all is left to chance. If the work be done soon after his neighbours', the farmer thinks that all is well. We need not be disappointed, therefore, at the result of such management.

"10. The whole of the potato crop belonging to the labourers is, of course, carried off the land. And the little straw which the wheat crop produces is made into hulk, as it is called, for thatch. Some of this is kept for thatching ricks, and the remainder is sold; the only part, therefore, of the produce of the arable land which is consumed on the farm is the barley straw, the hay from the clover, and the potatoes and wheat which the family consumes. All the rest is taken off the land.

"11. The expenses attending this mode of farming are not very great. The workmen employed are two men, a cowman, and a ploughman, a boy, and two women in the house to manage the dairy. In harvest there are sometimes two mowers, and two men to make the hay. There may thus be four additional men, for ten to twelve weeks, during the hay, corn, and potato harvests. The expenses of the labourers may therefore be stated as follows:—

At this point I intend to resume the subject next week. In the meantime sufficient is stated to show whether this farm had any superior natural advantages for the production of wheat, as was urged by the heads of the Protection Society, in contradiction to the Earl of Ducie's statement last year. I am, &c.,

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

COST OF WAR-PREPARATIONS.—Our best preparation for war, is the full development of our resources in times of peace. The annual expenditure of the National Government is twenty-four millions of dollars. Of this amount, seventeen are devoted to the army and navy. This makes a tax of nearly one dollar a head for every man, woman, and child in the United States. The State of Ohio pays—taxed for these expenditures—something like one million five hundred thousand dollars. We do not notice it, because it is stolen away through the indirect operations of a tariff; but it is not the less real—not the less a burden. We think our taxes heavy, and so they are. They press grievously upon our resources; but the whole of them amount to but twenty-three hundred thousand dollars. Just keep your eye on this fact—seventeen millions of dollars paid by the United States, in a time of profound peace, for war preparations! Add to this, fifty dollars for the time of each soldier or marine, if employed in agriculture, or some productive calling, and we shall find ourselves taxed to the tune of eighteen millions of dollars every year, to prepare for war.—Cincinnati Herald.

WAGES OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS IN FRANCE.—The wages of labourers seem to be lower in France, even in proportion to the low price of provisions, than in England. The General Council of the different departments fix tariffs for regulating the price at which different services shall be convertible into money. By these the prices of a day's work of a labouring man is rated generally at 10d., never higher than 12½d., and sometimes as low as 7½d.; that of a horse or mule, from 10d. to 12½d.; and the hire of a two-wheeled cart, from 10d. to 15d. These low rates of payment render the waste of labour of men and horses, so much reproached by the Scotch to their neighbours, less astonishing in France than in England, where it is sometimes carried to a greater extent. In ploughing, a man usually works three horses in Normandy, and only two men accompany the largest merchant waggons, one driving and the other sometimes asleep in front, or in the hammock below. Frequently, however, one sees strong men employed at such work as a woman, or even a child, might quite as well perform, such as weeding corn with the wooden pincers used for that purpose, or herding a few geese or sheep at the road side.—Journal of Agriculture.

INCENDIARISM. A short time before one o'clock on Sunday morning a fire, which was without doubt the work of an incendiary, was discovered in a building called the "Sun Barn," at Reepham, belonging to the Clergymen's Widows' Trust, and in the occupation of Messrs. Bireham and Parmeter. A stack of wheat, the produce of about eight acres, which had been carried into it only the day before, was completely destroyed, as well as everything else of a consumable nature, and only the bare walls are left standing. It was not long before suspicion was raised against a young man of bad character, named James Smith, who is generally supposed to have been guilty of firing a stack, the property of the same firm, in November last, but the evidence was not strong enough to convict him. He was taken before the magistrates at the petty sessions the following day, and the case having been gone into, the charge was considered to be sufficiently established to be sent before a jury. He was accordingly committed for trial.—(On Thursday last, a fire broke out in a barn at Thorne, which destroyed the barn and its contents. Although situated in the centre of other buildings, it was subdued without further injury. It was the work of an incendiary.—Norwich Mercury.)

WHITFIELD EXAMPLE FARM: WHAT SHOULD BE DONE WITH GRASS LAND OF INFERIOR QUALITY?

The farmer who buys guano or any other foreign manure for his land, and debars himself, by his support of the Corn Law, which shuts out foreign food from his cattle and sheep and pigs and horses, from producing a sufficiency of manure at home, stands in this position:—

First. He gives his land stimulants, which stimulants he must continue to administer; stimulants which are less or more expensive of the land by giving it temporary excitement, without securing for it a regular supply of the substantial elements of fertility.

Second. He thus gives the soil a value which is not real. Instead of employing more domestic labour, and those manures which the farm already produces, and should produce in far greater abundance, and which should come to him free of cost, save the labour of preparing and laying them on the land—free of cost, because the feeding of the stock which produced such manures should pay its own expense and afford its own profit; instead of fertilizing his land thus, he pays ready cash for manure. He gives the land an increased value in appearance, and must pay for the appearance in rent. If he does not use guano largely, but complies at rent time, as many have done this year, that the rent is a severe burden and should be shared, the collector tells him he has not used guano as he should have done.

Third. While thus keeping up his own rent against himself by giving the land a false value, he adds to the delusion by giving its produce a false value. He would have pulse and corn for feeding cattle and sheep were it cheap enough; and if he did he would get manures free of cost; but he prefers having the high nominal price, and prefers paying a real rent upon such nominal prices. He prefers buying manure for cash to grow the smaller

Will be ready on Tuesday next, price Sixpence.

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW BAZAAR.

The Council of the League, having determined upon holding a Bazaar in the Theatre Royal, Covent-garden, London, in aid of the One Hundred Thousand Pounds Fund, beg to announce that it will open on Thursday, May 8th, for exhibition, and that on the succeeding Monday, the 12th of May, the sale of the articles will commence.

Many of the large manufacturing towns having intimated that they intend to furnish their stalls with articles illustrative of their staple manufacture, such contributions will not be removed at the period of sale, but remain on view till the close of the Bazaar.

Contributions may be forwarded, from the present time to the 5th of May, addressed to George Wilson, Esq., Chairman, at the Theatre Royal, Covent-garden, London, where all the requisite arrangements are made for their reception.

As the inquiry is repeatedly made whether the articles sent to the Bazaar should have the prices affixed by the contributors, or by the Committee of Management in London, it is respectfully requested that, wherever practicable, the contributors themselves will affix their own prices to the articles according to the known cost of the raw materials, and the additional value given by the labour subsequently expended upon them.

Upon application the Council will be happy to forward to any of the local committees, or individuals who are preparing contributions, labels, on which may be placed the description of the article—the price—and the name of the contributor.

The Council also would earnestly urge upon their friends in the smaller towns and rural districts, where, from a variety of causes, it may not be practicable to obtain contributions in the shape of manufactured goods, or articles of taste or fancy, that efforts should be made to collect money contributions, and forward them before the 12th of May, as Bazaar purses in aid of the League Fund.

Such of the local committees as intend to furnish stalls, are earnestly requested to communicate with the Council without delay; and also to forward to London before Wednesday next the names of the ladies (if any) who intend to superintend the same during the Bazaar, that the requisite cards of admission may be reserved for them.

By order of the Council.
GEORGE WILSON, Chairman.
Covent-garden Theatre,
April 25, 1845.

Internal Arrangements for the Bazaar.

The prices of admission will be as follows:—
Thursday, May 8, day of Exhibition 10 6
Friday, „ 9, do. - 5 0
Saturday, „ 10, do. - 5 0
Monday, „ 12, Sale of Articles 2 6
Each succeeding day, do. - 1 0

The theatre will be opened on the days of exhibition at twelve o'clock—noon.

The entrance for the public will be from Bow-street, up the Grand Staircase, and along a passage cut through the centre boxes of the Dress Circle into the body of the Theatre, thrown into the form of a "GOTHIC HALL;" and the visitors will then pass along the stalls, and retire by the Hart-street side of the Theatre, so that the in-coming and out-going streams of visitors will not come into collision.

The Entrance for ladies attending the stalls, and the members of the Committee of Management, will be at the Stage-door in Hart-street. Tickets will be provided for all persons who are entitled to admission at the private entrance, without which no individual can, under any circumstances, be allowed to pass.

Carrriages are to set down in Bow-street, and take up in Prince's-place, Hart-street.

By order of the Directors,
1st May, 1845. CHAS. A. SAUNDERS, Secretary.

My DEAR SIR,—Before leaving Manchester this afternoon, Mr. Wilson wished me to forward you, for publication in next LEAGUE, an account of the Birmingham cheap trains to London during the Bazaar. I have seen Mr. Suttar, the gentleman here who arranged for the cheap trains, and he says he has only been able to get two trains, leaving Monday, May 12th, and Tuesday, 13th, and the railway people would but issue 500 tickets for each train; all these have been sold, except a few for the Monday train. He is now endeavouring to arrange for a third train on Wednesday, and has no doubt, if successful, that a thousand more tickets will be bought.

In haste, I am, dear Sir, yours truly,
A. W. PAULTON, Esq. HENRY LYONS.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXVIII.

TO THE FREQUENTERS OF THE RELIGIOUS
"MAY MEETINGS."

CHRISTIANS!—In all your diversities of faith and forms, this month gives practical evidence of the extent to which you are animated by one spirit. It summons you from all parts of the country to your metropolitan gatherings, for missionary and other purposes, as the Jews went up of old to Jerusalem for their high festivals. You forget your minor differences, and seek the aid of Heaven for your common and paramount objects. The denominations to which you belong, and the localities from which you come, are almost as varied as the tongues which found harmonious utterance on the day of Pentecost. Assemble in your multitudes, and hold your annual solemnity; but, while you ask the blessing from above upon yourselves, withhold not, I pray you, the blessing of your own sympathy and help from the poor, the needy, and oppressed—the victims of an unrighteous law that denies the labourer his hire.

The warfare against monopoly, waged by the Anti-Corn-Law League, is no mere sordid struggle for pecuniary advantage. This agitation is the result, with thousands, of the holiest principle. Their motives are in their bibles. Their warrant is contained in the Divine law, and their desire is expressed in the Christian prayer. They ask, for the labourer, his daily bread, by whomsoever or whosoever the corn may be grown of which that bread is made. They deny that the fruits of God's earth can be rightfully turned back from our shores while so many are starving; or he obstructed in their progress towards those who need them, by taxation levied for the profit of the English landowner. They have learned that the ox that treadeth out the corn shall not be muzzled, and for the man that sows or reaps they require equal consideration. They demand justice. This is a Christian movement. It is a righteous and religious cause. It deserves a portion of your thoughts and care and efforts. Leave it not undone, whatever else you do. Be not deaf to the voice of truth and mercy. In your fulness of compassion for the unenlightened, remember those, of whom numbers are your brethren and sisters in faith, and assert their claims and rights. Take advantage of your annual gathering to show your accordance with the persevering efforts made to abate the plague of monopoly in food. It is required of you in the name of that holy religion whose dominion you assemble to advance.

The food monopoly is the ally of ignorance, the occasion of crime, disease, and death. Souls are sacrificed by it at the shrine of Mammon. It has held up rents—the rich man's perquisite; and grinds down labour—the poor man's dependence. It keeps children from school, church, and chapel. It marks, by its artificial rise of prices, the multiplication of criminals for crime, and the enlarged devastations of disease. It drives away from the house of prayer into the workhouse or the gaol. The missionary to the poor complains that there seems a mockery in his mention of "the bread of life." The middle-classes are impoverished by its exactions. Their income-tax to the State is a light burden to their food-tax for the monopolists. It impairs their resources for charity and religion. What would go for the conversion of the heathen is grasped beforehand for the revenues of the aristocracy. The monopolist robs the treasury of the temple; and missionary plans are injured by Mammonite legislation.

Unshackled trade and commerce, by promoting the well-being and wealth of the industrious classes, would be propitious to every good work. In those classes it is that beneficent schemes find their best promoters, and the sinews of their strength.

Unshackled trade and commerce would abate the selfish and angry feelings which repel classes from each other, and, by removing the bone of contention, allow peace and kindness to revive. Were monopoly utterly abolished, what cause would there be for black and lowering looks between farmer and manufacturer? The law makes the Unshackled trade and commerce would promote the harmony of nations. They would extend a friendly intercourse to all regions of the earth. Prejudices would be mitigated, and a way for knowledge prepared in the wilderness. Peace, and the common use of one language, heralded the first rapid progress of Christianity. The British merchant may become a similar agent to the Roman warrior, and in a nobler spirit. Commerce is conquest and peace; and its universal language is no unapt preparation for the diffusion of knowledge, civilization, and truth.

To whom have we a better right to look for adjusting the balance between different classes of society than to the professors of religion. You have power; it has been felt and recognised by politicians. It is your function to act as the conscience of the State. Slavery was abolished by your condemnation; let not monopoly be prolonged by your connivance. There is no novelty in presenting this as a religious question. Seven hundred preachers of the Gospel, in conference at Manchester, denounced the Corn Laws, not only as an unwise policy, but as a moral offence. Still they exist. The bounty of Providence, by abundant harvests, has suspended some of the miseries they inflict, but has not changed their evil nature, or meliorated their malignant tendency. The manufacturer is relieved, but the cultivator is depressed. Such are the alternations which can only terminate in the abolition of the system. Return not to your homes and families without doing something for that "consummation devoutly to be wished."

The heritage of man to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow; the gift of earth's fruits, not to a class, but to the children of men; the prayer for daily bread; the protection, not of powerful wealth, but of helpless poverty; and the fearful anathemas on those who withhold the reward of the labourer, and oppress the needy; these we know where to find in Scripture, and he who runs may read. But exhortations to be independent of other countries, although they have food to sell, and our brethren sickened for want; admonitions to render food dearer, when it is always too dear for many to procure; precepts not to be thankful when bread is made cheap by its becoming plentiful; directions to destroy articles of human subsistence and comfort, or to render them unfit for use by filthy adulteration: where do we find these in Scripture? On what page of the sacred volume can monopoly point to such delilement? Artificial scarcity by abused legislation, is not of God; it is a work of darkness; it is a practical abjuration and defiance of Christianity.

Let this matter intermingle, then, in due time, place, and form, with the great topics that bring you together. It is of the Christian family of thoughts and deeds. It "claims kindred there, and has its claims allowed." It belongs to the second of the two great commandments. It deserves the zeal, not yet extinct, that successfully asserted the brotherhood of the negro, and cannot be met while those are wronged with whom we are identified by the ties of language, country, and religion.

What can you do? You can express opinion at your meetings, and find occasion for rebukes of monopoly as you did of slavery. You can renew, or commence, your contributions to the power which, in the League, has been raised for the destruction of this evil. You can assist that splendid exhibition of the varied power of bread-taxed industry about to be presented by the Free-Trade Bazaar. See there the skill in cunning workmanship with which Providence has endowed the people of this land; and ask yourselves whether man, in his ill-judging selfishness, should be allowed to cripple, rob, and blight the faculties which were granted from above for individual and universal good. In each or all these ways you can bear your testimony against that tax on bread which is, in its influence and tendency, a tax on industry, on education, on the amicable intercourse of nations, and on the purest efforts of philanthropy.

The diversified products of skill and toil have some affinity with the varied flowers and fruits of the earth; like them, thriving best in the free and genial air; like them, indicative of mental, and even of moral attributes; and, like them, evincing the ample sources which Providence has opened for mutual service and for universal good and enjoyment. You may derive lessons from the display which will harmonize with those you learn elsewhere, teach you "who is your neighbour," and how you can serve him; and remind you of the example of the good Samaritan, who passed not by on the other side when help could be rendered to the injured. And when it is thus practically shown what the people are, and can do, whose condition is so deeply affected by restrictive laws, how enduring their labour, how keen their ingenuity, how vast and varied their powers, and how worthy their works, the sight might well teach reflection and juster dealing even to monopoly itself, and bid it "go and sin no more."

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

REVIEW.

Dawn Island. By Harriet Martineau. Free-Trade Bazaar.

This very beautiful tale is Miss Martineau's contribution to the Free-Trade Bazaar; its object is to point out the civilizing effects of commerce, by developing the progress of social improvement in one of the islands of the Pacific Ocean. Though the work is sure to be eagerly sought by our readers, yet we cannot resist giving them the gratification of having a foretaste of its merits by extracting a few specimens. The following is a description of Dawn Island:—

"The lofty summits of the central mountains seemed to bring down to earth something of the unfathomable quietness of the tropical skies which overarched them. The transparency of the atmosphere gave an appearance of stability to every object within reach of the eye,—a clearness of outline, and firmness of position, hardly to be conceived of by inhabitants of regions where everything is seen through shifting and refracting fogs and mists. The waving of the plumb foliage of the cocoa-nut grove, and the leap and gush of the mountain streams, rather lulled than disturbed the senses of the observer; and if he turned his gaze to the shores, he could not but think that the space between them and the coral reef which surrounded the island contained the stillest waters he had ever seen. The coral reef extended to various distances from the shore, now stretching out so as to enclose a lake-like expanse of two miles in breadth, and then bending inwards so as to leave no more room than for two canoes to pass. To any gazer looking down into the clear depth of these waters, all appeared even calmer than on the surface. Fathoms deep, he saw an apparent foliage and fruitage delicate as vegetation itself—fragile-looking as the slenderest weeds, but giving way to no lapse of waters, and not stirred by the gliding of a throng of fishes, as the boughs of trees are by the flitting of birds. These many-coloured corals, sprouting and branching out from the sandy bottom, gave the idea of a luxuriant garden suddenly overflowed, and petrified by the deluge. The stillness of the land and waters within the reef was made more striking by the chafing of the ocean beyond. The long breakers rolled in, rising in height and force as if they would surmount the barrier, but clear and lovely as opal; and on the first encounter with the reef, their white crests were dispersed in showers of spray, which merely dimpled the smooth waters within, and sent a solemn sea music resounding through the nearer inland groves."

Here is a curiosity in the vegetable world:—

"This tree, much resembling the banyan, was as good an illustration as the vegetable world could furnish of the continuous being and self diffusion of the deities worshipped in Dawn Island. Every branch sending down roots to the ground, and the sources of life being thus multiplied perpetually, it seemed as if the tree must live for ever. No man could ever learn from his fathers when this grove-like tree was a sapling; and it was now a firm and universal belief that a bird had brought some seeds from the moon, and had dropped one on Dawn Island in his flight."

"While Miava, in examining the interior of the Aoa, retired out of sight beneath its pillar-like stems, the gazers little knew that he met his attendants under the shadow, to give orders fatal to one of themselves. He named the victim, and in a few minutes more the man was felled by a blow on the back of the head, as he stood on the outskirts of the crowd, jesting with a comrade. He was a young man of turbulent temper and violent habits, who could be spared better than most; yet his heavy fall, and the shrieks of his living family, penetrated with horror all who saw and heard. Such spectacles might increase their awe and dread of the gods, and certainly lessened their feeling for the sufferings of men; but he natural anguish of the moment could not be extinguished by custom and familiarity."

The rites now went forward with order and speed. The chief victim was suspended from the tree; the hogs were slain and baked,—their heads placed upon the altars, and then flesh partly eaten by the priests. The messengers of the gods, rising in the shape of birds from out of the tree, on a burst of harsh music, were dismissed to the place of shade of the deities, somewhere near the foundation of the world, to announce and invite, in the usual terms:—"There is war in the world. Come up to the place of light, and help your worshippers."

The following description of the first interview between the natives and the European visitors is very vivid and natural:—

"The Europeans heard the familiar names of these last articles, and, supposing the conference had reached a practical point, now advanced, and holding out some unknown curiosities, repeated the words denoting hogs, fowls, fruit."

"Miava looked from one to another in bewilderment. The sailors were not disposed to wait his time. One threw sticks at the cocoa-nuts on the trees, and brought down ripe and unripe at random. One cut a stalk of sugar-cane, and found it so delicious that others joined him. Two caught a hog, and put it into a sack, and then into the boat. They trusted to their commander's paying for what they took; but when he perceived how unkind Miava was to barter, how unaware of the value of the articles produced, he stopped the proceedings."

"First, he caused all the cocoa-nuts to be piled in one heap, and offered, through the interpreter, that Miava should select from his goods what he thought would pay for them. As it now, indeed, appeared that the visitors were not messengers of evil, the priest was anxious to release his companions from their terror; and Moturo and Idya came at his cheerful call. Of many articles offered, they could not at once perceive the value; but there were some which they coveted on the instant,—even before Miava could satisfy himself that they were not unhallowed. Above all, Idya, who spent many a weary hour in kindling and watching the fire of the oven, was struck and charmed by a little box whose contents would make fire in a moment. She considered it worth more than a whole grove of cocoa-nuts. But her husband thought quite as well of a powder spoon, with which he saw a sailor helping himself to the Jules out of a sugar-cane."

Motaro at once saw the use of this, and how it would aid him in his favourite occupation of feeding. The captain accommodated matters by giving the spoon in exchange for the canes. The hog then remained to be paid for.

"Miava eagerly insisted on the choice of an equivalent being his: and it was granted on a cry of delight and admiration escaping from one usually so composed. The captain had observed that the old man's sight had failed a good deal; and he placed first on his own nose, to show that they were harmless, and then on Miava's, a pair of spectacles. As soon as he could be persuaded to open his eyes, how great was his amazement! He saw distinctly the faces of all around him, and the leaves of distant trees, and the crests of the waves beyond the reef, and the blossoms of plants growing within the wood. He gazed around him, uttering new exclamations at every discovery of some long-lost object of sight, and then hurried away alone into the shrubbery, in the fear that some accident or quarrel might deprive him of his new treasure."

We have seldom seen the advantages of commerce described in more simple and striking language, than in the following brief extract:—

"When neighbours in a valley can exchange things so as to please one another, there is cheerfulness, and none of the anger and danger that there are when men snatch or steal what they wish for, without considering whether the owner likes to part with the property. If these neighbours were always to consider each what he himself would like to be done to him, and do so to the other, there would be continual peace between them. And if all in the valley were to do the same there would be peace from end to end. And if, he continued, brightening, 'it were so through the whole island, there would be no more war. And if other kinds of men and ourselves were to do the same, there would be no terror, nor blowing of thunderbolts, and we should have their wonderful gifts, and they would have our fresh fruits when they are thirsty, and our mats for a shade at noon. If everywhere men could so please one another as they would be pleased themselves, and there was peace, man would not cease for a long time yet. But then—' and his heart sank—'how could it be about the sacrificing of men to the gods? for no man likes to be sacrificed to Oro; and yet somebody must be devoted by the priests. I must think about this.'"

Our space will only allow of our giving a very hasty glance at the results attending the introduction of civilization, and the blessings of Christianity, into the island.

"The exchanges of food and foreign goods were carried on with more order than is usual on the first occasion of a newly-discovered people being one of the parties; and when even the most fortunate sellers found that, much as they had gained, there were many other desirable things which they could not have till they could offer commodities less perishable and more valuable than food, it was not difficult to bring them to a purpose of preparation for a better traffic, if the Europeans would promise to come again. Those who had axes engaged to furnish sandal-wood; and others, engaged to furnish cotton and linen cloths, and being assured that they, by industry, could produce the cotton and flax needed for such fabrics, began to inquire how they could be instructed in the art of growing them. Matting and cordage they could soon supply, to a small amount; and tortoise-shell could be added, when its European value was known. It was only the comprehensive mind of the old priest which could grasp at once all these details, and take in the prospect opened by the advent of commerce in his world. For him it was almost too much. His breast heaved, as he put the question to the captain.

"What shall I offer to our gods when I send messengers to tell them that the out-rigger canoe has come?"

"'Lay before them,' said the captain seriously, 'an axe, and a knife, and a looking-glass, and a garment of cotton. These good things come out of the spirits of men; and they will please the gods till they themselves send natural death to bring the spirits of men to them; when all the work is done that they can do in your world.'"

"The king understood Turua's words of interpretation, and looked confounded.

"No more sacrifices of men!" he cried.

"No more," said the captain emphatically, "unless you wish to offend the gods who send you, by that vessel, the changes foretold long ago."

"But how shall I deal with my disobedient subjects?" asked the king, innocently, "if I cannot rid myself of them, and keep them in fear by the sacrifice?"

"The gods will show favour very soon, and make your world happier, and your subjects more contented, and better able to pay tribute than ever before; so that there will be less need to make them afraid. And men will increase; and the more men the more tribute."

"Men will increase?"

"Yes; as surely as the forest-tree rises, and as fast as the coral branches out over the sands of the sea. But not unless you make one great change which you have never yet been told."

"Tell us now," cried the king and priest in a breath.

"I have told you that the gods will henceforth have what the spirits of men can make and do, rather than the spirits themselves; men's works and men's thoughts, rather than their bodies in sacrifice. Do you hear me?"

"Yes. Tell us the other great change."

"No one knows when the spirits of men begin to work, or when they leave off; or whether they work best when their bodies are weak, or when they are strong. Every human creature that has a spirit in him must therefore be taken care of, and kept alive as long as possible, that his spirit may do all it can in the world."

"How many spirits have we sent away too early?" exclaimed Miava.

"That was before these changes," said the captain.

"When you try the new ways that are now to begin, you will find how the spirits of old men speak wise things, and how the spirits of little children promise what they will do as men,—just as the day-spring promises what the moon will be. And then your old men, and your blind and sick people, will not be left to perish because they are weak; and no more infants will be destroyed."

The extracts we have given sufficiently indicate the literary merits of this work, which, both in story and style, is one of the most interesting and delightful we have ever read. Comment on such a publication is unnecessary; praise is the only task it leaves to the critic, and commendation of Miss Martineau is superfluous.

MORE LANDLORD LEGISLATION!

There would seem to be a combination amongst the monopolist-parliament-men to bring monopoly into contempt. There have been, during the present session, Miles's and Bankes's sham motions, and the never-to-be-forgotten lard and grease debates, which have sunk the parliamentary advocates of protection so low, and made every man of ordinary sense and feeling—monopolist though he may be—so thoroughly ashamed of such a cause so advocated, that protectionists begin to desire the final settlement of the question. Nor is that final settlement far off; for a little bill has been brought into Parliament by four great protectionists, which admits to the full the principles we have contended for. We did think that the "cause of protection" could not fall lower than the position it has occupied since the self-damaging discussions we have referred to; but it seems we were mistaken. It was reserved for Messrs. Greene, Stafford O'Brien, Pusey, and Darby to demonstrate that in the lowest depth of degradation to which monopoly had fallen there was still a lower baseness to which it could fall,—that there is a smaller littleness—a meaner meanness—to be laid to the charge of those monopolist landowners, who have made laws to keep up their own rents at the expense of all the rest of the community.

The reader will readily see that we refer to the bill "for allowing a drawback of duty on malt used for the purpose of feeding cattle," to which the four redoubtable monopolist M.P.s named stand sponsors. This bill proposes to allow "any maltster to whom a specific license for the purpose has been granted by the excise, to mix any equal quantity of oats, barley, or peas, crushed or whole, with unground malt, or any equal quantity of the meal of beans, peas, barley, or oats with ground malt, and to sell the aforesaid malt free of duty to any occupier of land, receiving from the said purchaser a certificate of the quantity of malt so sold;" and a penalty of £50 is imposed upon any person who shall give a false certificate, or who shall "mash for the purpose of brewing, any malt so sold duty free." Whether such an act would or would not open a wide door to frauds on the revenue we leave to the consideration of the excise officials; but, apart from all such questions, the absurdity of the measure is such that, but for the grave characters of the backers of the bill, we should have said it was intended as a practical joke.

Let us trace the source of this bill, and examine its operation, assuming it really to become law, and we shall find that it betrays excessive feebleness on the part of the once noisy and rampant monopolists. Soon after the landlords had stimulated their tenants to practical political agitation to keep up rents, it occurred, naturally enough, to the tenant-farmers, that, having once got their hands into politics, they might as well do a little business in that line on their own account. They, therefore, began to agitate for the repeal of the malt-tax. Now, this was at all events a large scheme and a practical object; and the tenant-farmers set about it like men of business. They saw that a tax producing four millions and a half sterling to the revenue of the State could not be repealed without a substitute, and accordingly they said, let the loss to the revenue be made good by an increased property-tax. Nor were the arguments they adduced against the malt-tax without force: they showed that while population had vastly increased the consumption of malt had actually diminished; that the duty on malt prevented labourers in husbandry from obtaining, either from their masters or their own resources, a certain portion of malt liquor, which it was alleged would add to their health and comfort; and as a subsidiary argument, that, but for the duty, malt might be usefully and economically used in feeding cattle. Now, though we believe the real value of malt liquor to working men is vastly overrated, and that the same sum expended in animal food would be of more use to them morally and physically, still it cannot be denied that farming labourers would deem any measure which enabled them to obtain a daily supply of beer a great boon; and we believe that farmers, if the commodity were somewhat less costly, would frequently give a little beer over and above the present wages. This argument, therefore, in the present temper of the public mind, when an opinion extensively prevails that the labourers, especially the agricultural labourers of this country, have been unduly oppressed by erroneous and class legislation, was calculated to make a considerable impression. To the plea for malting barley to feed cattle cheaply there was this obvious and short answer: that while you maintain a law to exclude foreign oats, beans, peas, Indian corn, and similar articles of cheap cattle food, you can scarcely expect a remission of the malt duty for that purpose. Indeed, there has been scarcely a speaker at any of the anti-malt-tax meetings who did not indignantly repudiate the mere remission of the duty upon malt as cattle food, while it should be maintained on the labourers' beer.

Yet, as if to show how small the community of sentiment is between the landowners and the farmers, four monopolist squires set their heads together and concoct a little scheme for "allowing a drawback of duty on malt used for the purpose of feeding cattle"!!!

Now, every quarter of malt used for feeding—the free importation of barley being prohibited as at present—would tend to raise the price of barley, which increase would go into the pockets of the owners of barley-land in the form of rent. And even the gain derived from increase of feeding quality, which the process of malting is said to impart to grain, would, in the present state of the farming business, find its way into the same fathomless abyss—the landlord's pocket. The whole secret, however, of the very small measure we have commented on is this. The Peelite monopolists see that the one-sided Free Trade, which admits meat and cattle, and excludes the grain wherewith our own cattle may be cheaply fed, has excited most justly the indignation of the farmers; and the petty scheme of malt for feeding cattle duty free is intended as a sop to discontented graziers. At all events it will serve to talk about to the exclusion of more awkward topics at farmers' meetings, and it cannot, in any way, lower rents; if anything, its tendency is the other way. Therefore these four very gentle Monopolist-Ministerialists try their hand at this bit of solemn humbug. That the landed gentry are reduced to such paltry shifts is in truth most wondrous pitiful.

FINDING A LEVEL.

It is surprising how rapidly the monopolist landowners are finding their level, now that their claims and their laws are subjected to strict examination. Moreover, we believe that few, except those practically acquainted with the landed gentry, had any notion how very low a level that of the squire really is. In the House of Commons Mr. Miles, Mr. Bankes, and Mr. Bramston have laid bare the nakedness of their monopolist pretensions, and the pitiable figures those gentlemen made acted strongly on the good sense of the country. Of this the following passages from the speeches at a late meeting, at Chelmsford, of the "Essex Protection Society" will give some idea. The meeting, when assembled, did not seem very well able to tell what it had met for, it having been originally intended to have taken place previous to and
