in support of Mr. Miles's motion. The ludicrous result of that "sham" motion rather embarrassed the managers of the meeting. Mr. R. Baker read a long story of how, in consequence of a communication received from the "Central Society," a deputation of the Essex "Society" had gone to London, having previously invited all the members from Essex to meet them at the "room in Bond-street;" how most of the members fought shy of that suspicious rendezvous; and how not a few of them contrived to elude altogether an interview with the deputation.

Mr. Bramston, Sir John Tyrell, and Mr. C. G. Round were the only members present at Chelmsford. There was a long pause after the chairman had read his very encouraging narrative, and called for any gentleman who had "observations to make upon the subject before the meeting," but nobody was inclined to begin. At last Mr. Tower, a squire, and a rampant protectionist, began with the following passage, aimed at the county members:—

"If it was possible to conceive a more important occasion than that on which they were met to-day, he was at a loss to guess it; for he was sure such an occasion never happened in Essex before; and he would rather it should be met by the tenant-farmers than attempt to give a direction at all to the course they should pursue; but at the same time he thought the course he should prescribe to them would be the most respectful to their representatives (hear), while it would be calculated to impress on their minds the very serious responsibility which attached to them in the high post in which they were placed, from the important subject-matter they were about to discuss. (Cheers.)"

They had met because "here was one of the greatest agricultural counties in the kingdom, he might say, with rapid, but with certain, progress, verging to a stage of ruin and unparalleled distress." Now, this being interpreted, means that the owners of undrained clay land, "heavily encumbered," are rather frightened about rent. That this was uppermost in the speaker's mind is obvious, for he said:—

"For if the cultivator of the soil sunk, what was to become of the sleeping partner, the landlord, who was only to take in rent the surplus derived by the tenant from the land; and if the tenant made no profit, where was the surplus to come from? Therefore, the interest of the landlord followed the interest of the occupier, and the occupier must be supported."

Ay, but the Corn Laws have not supported the occupiers; just the reverse. Mr. Tower having raved and rambled through the usual nonsense about the Canada Corn Bill, the tariff, and so on, and then said:—

"And was it not clear that as much injury might be produced to the farmer by thus attacking him gradually as by taking protection from him all at once? It was as hard to die of a lingering consumption as of a raging fever. (Cries of 'Woe!') When on a former occasion the Corn Bill and the other measures of the Government were discussed in that room, he (Mr. Tower) said that Lord John Russell opened an artery, and they died on the spot; but Sir Robert Peel was opening veins in all parts of their body, and they would as surely bleed to death as if he had opened an artery. (Cheers.)

Then, having pitched into Peel right and left, he said:—

"He knew that the agricultural members were placed under great difficulties in Parliament; those who acted on the principles of Free Trade, and those who supported the Ministry, flattered themselves they had all the talent of the country, and they sneered and pointed the finger of scorn at the little band of Mr. Miles, amongst which seventy-eight he was proud to say all our members were found. (Cheers.) They knew what the finger of scorn would do; but they knew also that a sense of responsibility would induce a man to stand forth and say, 'No man shall make me desert my duty—I am supporting the interests and the industry of our domestic cultivation, and I will not be deterred by sneers and ridicule.' (Cheers.)"

Sneers and ridicule are sharp weapons when pointed by truth, and this has made poor Miles and his seventy-eight so obnoxious to the "finger of scorn." We wonder any one calling himself an English gentleman can submit to be placed in such a humiliating position. Next followed Mr. Ducroz, a farmer; and his speech proves that in Essex, as elsewhere, farmers are beginning to think for themselves. He said:—

"Their object had in a great degree been defeated after the decision had been taken on Mr. Miles's motion, for that object was to represent their difficulties to their members previous to that motion coming on. As to what had fallen from Mr. Tower, he did not wholly agree with him as to the position of things, and that the whole difficulty of the question was with the tenant-farmers; but it appeared to him, from what he was going to state, that they no longer ought to throw all the difficulty on the tenant-farmers for them to rebut them, for he thought that body was placed in such a position that shortly they would have little interest indeed in the question. The great difficulty was to look into their own position themselves."

"It appeared to him, with respect to the price of wheat, that when the tithe commutation act passed it was believed 56s. would be the ruling price, and the tithe commutation was fixed at that. Sir Robert Peel, in passing his measure on the Corn Law, certainly made no pledge that we should have a ruling price of 56s., but he led the whole country to expect that 56s. would be the general average. He laid down the rent of land throughout the kingdom at 20s. per acre, which he believed was correct; but even suppose he took it at 25s., and the tithe at 6s. 6d., which it was not throughout the country, that would bring it to £1. 11s. 6d. for rent and tithe. Then 3½ quarters of wheat he thought was about the average produce; four quarters was too much, and three quarters too little; but, taking the rent at 25s. and the tithe at 6s. 6d., he thought they might take the average of such land at 3½ quarters per acre. Now, the difference in this 3½ quarters, between 56s., the price they were led to expect, and 45s., the average of the last four months, was £1. 16s. 6d. while the whole rent and tithe on the land was only £1. 11s. 6d. Now, from that average he wanted to know how they were to put anything into their pockets? When they were losing £1. 16s. 6d., what was 25 or 50 per cent. difference in the rent? (Cheers.) It appeared to him that with this state of things they could not possibly continue in their farms; and therefore it was the landlords and men of property that must come forward, and he should like to see men of higher standing in the county speaking on this matter, for they were as much interested in it as the tenant-farmer."

Here we have a tangible statement from a practical man; and it is perfectly plain that rent must be lowered and produce increased before the farmer's business can be in a sound and wholesome state. Mr. Ducroz states 3½ quarters, or 28 bushels, of wheat to the acre, to be the average produce of Essex; whereas, with moderately good farming, 4½ quarters, or 36 bushels, would be obtained throughout the county. Now, suppose rent and tithes reduced from £1. 11s. 6d. per acre to about £1. 1s., and another quarter of wheat, or £2. 5s., added to each acre of the farmer's produce, how would the case stand then? And this will happen when the Corn Laws have been repealed. Then followed Mr. Low, another farmer, an active protectionist, and he said:—

"He had always had reason to believe, that, in the administration of the affairs of this mighty empire, agriculture maintained a position in the first rank, which it now seemed was denied to it, and the finger of contemptuous scorn was held out against the county members, who before were always treated with the greatest respect and deference in the House of Commons. The interests of commerce were well represented, and when any measure affecting that class was introduced into the House of Commons, the case was well combated, and the objectionable clauses were immediately altered in the way they wished, as they had seen was the case with regard to sugar. But the agriculturists were not regarded: the representations of their members were not listened to even by Sir Robert Peel; and they heard it asked in the House of Commons, on Mr. Miles's motion, was it all a sham? He (Mr. Low) did not attach much importance to the results of that motion; but he thought the object of Mr. Miles, and the object of those who acted with him, was to recognize the importance of agriculture, and to show the House of Commons and the country at large, that agriculture was still of that importance that it used to possess in the estimation of the empire. But they saw the real position in which Mr. Miles was placed. He did not reflect on our county members for reflecting on the county members generally, because they were not found at their post to protect the interest they were sent to protect, and thereby thwarted the measure, and supported the plan which the Minister had introduced. The end of all this must be a system of Free Trade."

Mr. Low thought the county members should rally round the "little remnant of protection which was left to them," but,

"As to what they could do, he knew there was a difference of opinion; and they were asked by Mr. Cobden and others in the House of Commons, 'What do you want? what will you have done?' That was an embarrassing situation; but he thought they did not ask too much when they said that they ought to be considered in any remission of taxation."

Here Mr. Low admits the monopolists know not what they want, or dare not openly avow it.

Mr. BRAMSTON, M.P., of lard-and-grease fame—

"Certainly felt some little disappointment at not seeing a larger meeting of this great and respectable society on the present occasion."

And—

"He could not help thinking that it would have been more advantageous to the interest which they all had at heart not to have held that meeting, although subject of great importance had been brought forward, but which could not take any other aspect than that of general distress amongst the agricultural classes. He allowed that he should have been glad to have heard that very difficult problem solved, What is to be done for the agricultural interest? He had listened to the excellent observations of Mr. Ducroz, as well as to those which fell from Mr. Tower, and agreed with much which they had said. No man could live in this country or occupy land, either as landlord or tenant, who could be ignorant of the depression of the farmers, and entirely so from the question of prices. (Hear, hear.) The question naturally suggested itself—how was this to be remedied?"

It was useless to take up their time with discussions on the Canada Corn Bill and the tariff, "for it would be perfectly impossible to repeal those measures." By such topics they only served those who would destroy protection. He said also:—

"Another thing which did harm to the case was, the introducing of statements which could not be borne out by facts," and showed the absurdity of some of Mr. Tower's statements about the tariff, &c. He thought Mr. Miles's motion could lead to no practical good, but he had supported it because he had voted for a similar motion in 1836.

Next, Mr. Holt White said:—

"He agreed with Mr. Bramston in the astonishment he had expressed, that the gentlemen who had preceded him had not in their speeches alluded to some measure that was to be taken for the future, and pointed to some course which they could adopt. He came there in utter ignorance as to the course of business to be pursued, and having heard four gentlemen speak, he must say he was now in the same state of ignorance. He had heard four excellent speeches, but they related to bygone matters. As far as Mr. Miles's motion went, his opinion was that, though there was no harm in it, there was marvellous little good; and he could not but agree with Sir James Graham, that there never was so small a boon asked for by so large a body. (Hear.) He really thought, it was all they were to get in the present Parliament—it was what they were to get by the orders from Bond-street to sign petitions and back up Mr. Miles's motion—he begged to say that the finger of scorn should not be pointed at him in connection with the matter, for he would have nothing to do with it. He thought they were in an 'awkward fix,' as the Americans said; it seemed clear to him that the agriculturists very frequently had not only the finger of scorn pointed at them, but that they deserved it; and he would beg of the meeting to pay attention to what Mr. Bramston had said, that they too often erred in the statements they made relative to protection."

He thought the use of misstatements and fallacious arguments only injured their cause; and in reference to a document put forth by the Central Society, he said:—

"He must confess when such papers as that he held in his hand were published by the society (referring to a list of the articles in the new tariff which affect agriculture), he could not agree to the putting out such a document as that; for if they were to try to exclude these things, and to impress upon the members that under no circumstances were they to allow such a list as that to pass—that was to be the principle upon which they acted, he not only doubted the policy of it, but he regarded it as not fair to the members or to the country at large that, if they had the power to do this, they should use that power, for by this means they would be day by day falling into a worse position, and they would be actually cutting the ground from under their own feet. He would not go into the various articles which that list contained, for there was such a feeling of the ridiculous in it that he had thought it must come from some other body than the Protection Society, and when the paper was first shown to him he was asked whether it was not a joke."

Then followed this most significant dialogue:—

"The Chairman said that paper was not intended for general circulation, but only to show the agriculturists the articles that affected them. It was not put into circulation, but was for the use of the committee."

Mr. Holt White: He must say that, backed up as this paper was by a petition to Parliament, it conveyed an impression to his mind that it was sent out as a cue to the great injury done to the agriculturists by the present alterations in the tariff. If it was not sent out for that, what was the use of it at all?

Mr. H. Bullock: It was not sent out—it was only for the use of the committee."

The Chairman: That paper was in accordance with the instructions of the Central Society, as many of the articles would greatly tend to reduce the labour of the poor. Amongst the articles alluded to were tithes, and all other seeds not enumerated; and it was thought that the growth of seeds materially affected the interests of the farmers in this country. (Cheers.) That was the only explanation he could give."

After all, nothing has ever damaged the monopolists like their own sayings and doings. Mr. Holt then resumed, and thus illustrated the validity of Mr. Cobden's argument, that farmers are injured by protection, some in one way, and some in another, more than any one else:

"Take tithes, for instance; he doubted whether they should not be all benefited by having tithes cheaper. He had the greatest doubt in the world on this being a disadvantage to them, but if they could prove to him that they were interested in having tithes dear instead of cheap, they being year by year buyers of tithes and seldom sellers—if they could show him that they were benefited by this, still the great majority of the farmers of England were buyers of tithes, for in the north of England the climate would not allow them to grow them. If this subject had been brought forward to discuss at the meeting he thought it would have been better. And further, he would ask, were there not two sides to the argument on every article they could pick out of that paper? There appeared to him to be only one safe mode for persons to take, both on private and public occasions, and that was to be careful that in any step they took they should keep themselves absolutely in the right. (Cheers.) He anxiously wished that they would come to a distinct decision on some one article, and let the members know what they wished they should do on it, or else leave them to the unfettered exercise of their own judgment, and not afterwards blame them because they might conceive that the course they pursued would be prejudicial to interests of their own. (Hear.) And let him give them this piece of advice—it was not any individual parish or particular locality that they had a chance of protecting—they had no chance if they could not show that what they sought was for the general interest of the whole body of the agriculturists of England, and not for the south against the north, or for the grazing against the plough farmer, but the interest of the whole agricultural body. (Cheers.)"

Now, all this shows a more rapid spread of sound and rational views of protection amongst the monopolists themselves than existed a year ago. He said he had been intrusted with the getting up a petition:—

"They could not doubt the feeling of Rochford Hundred in connexion with agriculture—they could not doubt that the inhabitants there were deeply interested in the question; yet in the petition sent the interest was marvellously small: he could only get three persons to meet on it, and they could not conceive what it was to petition about; and if the committee had not sent an express for it, he doubted whether the petition would ever have got here at all."

The Rochford Hundred farmers have been made fools of so often by the monopolists that they have become shy of petitions. And on the same topic Mr. White afterwards added:

"What was it to petition for? Was it worth while to petition for Mr. Miles's motion, and for so little a boon to make such a fuss? The agriculturists of Rochford Hundred felt little interest in it, and he approved them for their good sense; but when they gave them something worth petitioning for, they would beat themselves. As to tithes, he had no doubt they were very good food indeed, and he only said it was a doubtful case; but when this was the only matter they could select out of that long list, he thought there was great dry and little wool. He did not know what this meeting was for, except that they might furnish good food for the League to laugh at them."

Well, we do think our readers will have to thank the Essex Protection Society for a little fun. But the meeting is as instructive as it is funny, and it will not be lost upon our agricultural readers. Sir John Pyrell ended a long and, of course, a wise speech by saying:—

"And he believed they all felt with him, that what the agriculturists wanted was real substantial protection, equivalent to the burdens and taxes that they had to bear."

Of course Sir John meant peculiar burdens, and we ask him what are they? and he would possibly say with Mr. Low, "that is an embarrassing question."

Mr. Round, M.P., said:—

"He could not help suggesting to them whether what had passed in that room to-day was not matter for serious reflection, and if it might not tend to something like difference of opinion amongst themselves. Let them beware of that, and whatever they did let them be united. (Cheers.) One gentleman impugned that paper on the table; another defended it. One undervalued the petition of Rochford Hundred; another went so far in favour of it that he (Mr. Round) really thought he was going to move a vote of censure on Mr. Holt White. (Laughter.) Mr. White touched on tithes; another gentleman disagreed with him. Was it well that these differences of opinion amongst them on minor matters should go forth to the world? Would it not be better to discuss these matters with closed doors—but not that they had anything to conceal? One honourable gentleman touched on clover-seed, and he (Mr. Round) would say, 'Let no gentleman object to what a large body of the agriculturists asked for—do not let us fall to pieces in that way.' They knew that the reduction of the duty on clover-seed was insisted on by a large body of farmers in the north of England, and they had reason to be thankful that it was not entirely swept away at their request. And let him say that the speech of the member for Stockport suggested serious matter for reflection: it was not all the farmers that wished clover seed, and cheese, and other articles to be protected; and he would therefore say, let us agree on these things as well as we can, and act for the general good. (Cheers.)"

Now, all this indicates that the end of protection draweth nigh. But perhaps the best thing of all was the speech of the once voracious Mr. Robert Baker, the chairman, who thus comforted the meeting and the monopolists at large for doing nothing:—

"They had heard there was some difference of opinion as to the course they should pursue; Mr. Holt White had made some remarks as to their not having reduced their propositions to a particular motion; but they had no proposition to offer, for the committee, after having done all they could, came there to confer with them as to what further was to be done. And he trusted the objecof the meeting had not been lost, for, though they might not get much this session, they might be laying the foundation for something in future."

How comfortable! What a foundation for future proceedings! Mr. Miles's motion and the butter, grease, and lard debates prove!! Even from this test the magnanimous auctioneer shrunk not. Speaking of caraway seeds and so forth, he said:—

"These items, though small individually, were the source and summit of protection, for it depended upon them in the aggregate; and it was on this principle that he so much admired the motion made in the House of Commons on the subject of lard and grease. Perhaps they were not aware that what we produced here was quite a different article to the lard of America, for they melted down the whole animal and converted it into lard; and thus they saw how we might be overwhelmed by it in this country, so as to render it impossible to fatten that animal which had been such an assistance to agriculture."

There is no disputing about taste; but to hear a man confess to "admiring" the lard and grease motions, passes all our preconceived notions of the ridiculous.

FARMERS! HELP YOURSELVES.

In political matters as in private affairs, fortune helps those only who can help themselves. Of this the tenant-farmers are everywhere becoming sensible, and are talking of acting accordingly. As, for instance, in Sussex,—

"We are informed, upon good authority, that, in consequence of recent events, so much dissatisfaction has been created among the agricultural interest in this county that it has been determined to bring forward two tenant-farmers as candidates for the representation of East Sussex upon the occasion of the next election. The names of two gentlemen have been mentioned, who, we understand, have consented to stand in the event of no other candidates among the tenant-farmers being found more eligible. We are not, however, at liberty at present to disclose the names of the parties alluded to."—Sussex Advertiser.

This must not be mere talk. It may be difficult, at first, to get farmers to combine for the purpose of putting the squires out of the county representation; but when an earnest movement in that direction has been made by the tenant-farmers, the thing will have been accomplished. We have seen by the figures the monopolist squires cut in Parliament what poor creatures they are morally, and intellectually; and if the farmers select sensible men of real business talents for their candidates, and will act in concert, they will soon have the protectionist squires sufficiently submissive.

THE GAME-LAW VICTIM.

Our readers will recollect the case of Stephens, which we stated from the Western Times, and who, when before the bankrupt court, showed that he had been ruined by his landlord's game. Here we have a report of the final consummation of this poor farmer's ruin, who "is now working as a common day labourer."

END OF THE RABBIT CASE.

Mr. JAMES STEPHENS.—The insolvent had been a farmer of Mawgan, Cornwall, and came up for his final order. He was examined by Mr. Stogdon as to a bill of sale given to his landlord of all his property in July last. A sale took place in October. He was to receive £20; he received four five-pound notes, but he paid them back again towards the rent, after holding them a few days. He got no receipt for the money. The bill of sale stated that he owed to his landlord £210 on notes, with interest. He was now working as a common labourer. His crops had been damaged by rabbits to the amount of £75 in the last year, and the landlord refused to allow more than £2 on fourteen acres of wheat as consideration. Final order granted. — Western Times.

THE GAME LAWS.

The following petition was presented to the House of Commons, on Wednesday last, by Mr. Bright, signed by 92 tenant-farmers of the county of Edinburgh:—

"UNTO THE HONOURABLE THE COMMONS OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED; The petition of the undersigned proprietors, tenant-farmers, and others connected with agriculture, in the county of Edinburgh, "Humbly sheweth,—That your petitioners feel much aggrieved by the extent to which game is preserved, and the consequent destruction to their crops thereby, while not only are they deprived by the present game laws of all power of killing game of any kind, and thereby preserving their crops, but, although they take out a game certificate, they are not shot even over their own farms without incurring the risk of being prosecuted criminally for so doing, and of either paying a fine and expenses, or, on failure, to be sent to prison, and treated as felons for a period not exceeding two months; and not a few instances are on record where tenant-farmers have been so prosecuted, and interdicted from killing the game which were destroying the source from whence alone they could pay their rents.

"That the present game laws are calculated to create, and do create, heartburnings between landlord and tenant; and being administered by justices of the peace, who, in many instances, are landlords, and have game preserves themselves, and are members of game associations, it is almost impossible, even although these functionaries were conversant with law, they can be unbiased judges, or the law fairly and properly applied; and hence great distress exists, and not a few illegal convictions, it is believed, have taken place.

"Your petitioners, therefore, trust that your Honourable House will abolish the present game laws, and enact that every tenant farmer shall, on qualifying, have the right to kill game, and make rabbits his own absolute property. And, further, that justices of the peace shall have no jurisdiction in offences committed against any game law to be hereafter enacted; but that the same shall be tried by the sheriff, with a jury of five to be chosen by ballot.

"And your petitioners shall ever pray, &c."

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadaby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, May 3, 1845.

As this is our last publication before the opening of the Bazaar, we have devoted the greater part of our space to the subject. The ladies who have taken upon themselves the duties of secretaries have been indefatigable in their exertions to provide for the comfort and convenience of those who are to attend the stalls, and they will assemble in the Theatre on Tuesday, to complete the distribution of the stalls, and the general arrangements for the supply of attendance. It is desirable that as many of the ladies secretaries from the country as possible, or a lady from each town to which a stall is allocated, may attend this meeting, the last of the kind that can be held before the opening of the Bazaar; and that any who may not be able to attend, but may have information to afford, should address their communications to the Committee of Secretaries at the Theatre. The immense quantities of goods that have arrived this week will require so much time and labour for their arrangement that it will be necessary to limit the admissions strictly to those who have official duties to perform. The arrangements for the trains will be found in another part of this paper.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—In the Chamber of Deputies, on Saturday, M. Dozon brought forward his proposition for preventing, by fine and imprisonment, the practice of duelling, and asked the Chamber to appoint a day for his bringing the matter before it formally. The Minister of Justice opposed the proposition, on the ground that the common law was sufficient for all the purposes which the hon. deputy sought.

The report of the committee on the fortifications of Paris has been published. It appears that the armament for the walls will amount to 1226 pieces of cannon, and for the forts an additional number of 982; making a total of 2208 pieces. The salient parts of the wall are to be defended by a newly-invented gun, called the canon-obusier of 80, calculated to throw masses of grape to a thousand yards with the greatest precision. Between the wall and the forts there will be numerous field works for covering the roads and villages, supporting the external operations and sorties, maintaining provisions for those corps who might be obliged to take refuge under the walls, for providing artillery for menaced points; all which will require a powerful central reserve, but which will be made the subject of a special law.

The Moniteur publishes the following royal ordinance, dated Sunday:—"Considering that M. Guizot, our Minister Secretary of State of Foreign Affairs, has need, for his health, of some repose, we have ordained and do ordain as follows—the Count Duchatel, Minister Secretary of State for the Interior, is charged ad interim with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

A meeting of the principal silk-manufacturers of Lyons took place a few days ago in that city, to consider the propriety of petitioning the Chamber of Peers against the introduction of Chinese silks into France. The petition was accordingly drawn up, and has just arrived at Paris, bearing 300 signatures. It states, that the Lyons manufacturers consider the importation of Chinese silks as certain to cause the complete ruin of their business, and contains tables, showing 35 to 40 per cent. difference in favour of the Chinese in all the markets where the silk goods of the two countries enter into competition.

MADRID.—On the 19th of April the Chamber of Deputies was engaged in discussion on the supplies for the Finance Department, when, in answer to a question from Senor Llorente, relative to the large expense of the coast guards, the Minister of Finance said great services had been rendered by that body and the Carabineros in preventing smuggling. Not fewer than 91 felons, laden with contraband goods, had been captured by them since February, on the coast of Huelva and Motril. With regard to any alteration in the tariff, he observed, that considering the state of the manufactures, and the serious interests connected with them, he had refrained from submitting any reforms to the appreciation of the Cortes during the present session. The question, however, had been under consideration, and would be brought forward at some future period.

SWITZERLAND.—Accounts from Lucerne of the 23rd ult. state, that a great number of persons had been condemned by the council of war to five years' imprisonment for not having answered the call to arms, and for having joined the five corps; for which latter offence, moreover, they are to be tried by the civil tribunals. The commissioner of Lucerne, and those of Berne, Soleure, Bale, Compagne, and Argovie, have concluded a treaty for the liberation of prisoners on condition of an indemnity fixed at 350,000fr.

The New Zurich Gazette of the 28th has the following from Lucerne, of the 27th:—"Yesterday the Grand Council unanimously ratified the treaty, concluded on the 23rd, relative to the ransom of the prisoners; but has issued a decree, imposing certain obligations on the Governments of the four cantons as regards the persons belonging to them who took part in the attacks upon Lucerne. The presence of the Foreign Ambassadors at Lucerne had for its object the promotion of the proceedings of the Federal Commissioners on behalf of the prisoners. They have advised the Government to grant a general amnesty."

We read in a letter from Mentz (Grand Duchy of Darmstadt), April 20:—"The criminal tribunal persists in its jurisprudence against duelling. It has just pronounced sentence of imprisonment for one year, with hard labour, in a fortress, against a merchant's clerk, who killed a sub-leutenant of dragoons in a duel about a year ago."

WEIMAR, April, 21.—The Government paper states that a commercial treaty has been finally concluded between this duchy and the kingdom of Portugal.

BRAZIL AND THE ZOLLVEREIN.—MANHEIM, April 20.—It is understood that the negotiations with the Brazilian Envoy, M. D'Abrantes, are so far brought to a result that a certain number of propositions have been drawn up, which either have already been, or will immediately be, submitted to the Governments of the Zollverein states for their approval. At the next Zollverein conference in Carlsruhe, it is probable that something more positive on this subject will be made known.—Manheim Zeitung.

ITALY.—Private letters from Romagna announce that the military commission sitting at Ravenna had condemned to death three political prisoners, and a number of others to the galleys. Among the former was a young man under 18 years of age. The Sacra Consulta at Rome has pronounced in the case of M. Galetti, a lawyer of Bologna, and sentenced him to the galleys for life. M. Serpieri, of Rimini, was to be imprisoned during 20 years, by order of the same exceptional tribunal.

A letter from Milan of the 21st ult. states that the Pope, a few days previously, had called together a congregation or meeting for secular purposes in Rome, at which it was determined not to allow railways within the Papal states, either those having their origin there, or as connecting links with the adjoining countries.

ATHENS.—Athens letters of the 10th of April mention that the anniversary of the declaration of Greek independence was celebrated on the 6th by a mere religious ceremony, in the church of St. Ireneus, and a general illumination at night.

CIRCASSIA.—It is announced that Count Woronzow, who has been appointed Governor of Circassia, left Odessa about the middle of March. One of the measures that will be taken by the Count, on his arrival at Teflis, seems to be more important than would be thought at the first glance; the Circassians, as we are aware, are accustomed to carry on a white slave trade, disposing of their children to the Turks; the Russian Government had attempted to abolish this traffic, and had even established cruisers to suppress it. Count Woronzow has determined to change this system, and proposes to authorize anew the commerce in Circassian slaves.—Augsburg Gazette.

DAMASCUS.—Advices from Damascus of the 26th of March stated, that the Mecca caravan had been this year more numerous than ever, and that no less than 3000 Persians accompanied it. The celebrated Sheikh Mahmoud, who exercised so great an influence in the Hauran, died at Damascus on the 20th ult.

BRAZIL.—According to commercial letters of the 1st of March, received from Rio Janeiro, the Brazilian Ministers had come to the resolution of fixing the import duties on British cotton manufactured at 20 per cent. advance on the old tariff. The following is a literal translation of the resolution submitted to the Chamber on the last day of February, and no doubt was entertained but that it would be passed by a large majority:—

"The Finance Committee proposed that, from and after the 1st July next, all articles of cotton manufacture in and of the produce of Great Britain, and her dominions, shall pay in the customs of Brazil, when cleared for consumption, 1-5th, or 20 per cent. over and above the amount of duties payable by tariff; and furthermore that the Government be authorized to suspend the payment of this differential duty so soon as the English Government will extend to Brazil the same reduction in the duty on her sugars as was recently adopted by the legislature of that nation with respect to foreign sugars generally."

UNITED STATES.—The Washington Constitution repeats the rumour that the British Minister, Mr. Pakenham, is charged with the negotiation of a treaty with the United States, "based upon reciprocal advantages to the products of each country in their respective markets." It states that it was current and generally believed at the capital.

FRIGHTFUL STEAM-BOAT ACCIDENT.—News has been received by the Waterloo, American packet-ship, which reached Liverpool on Thursday evening, of a frightful steam-boat disaster which occurred last month. The steam-boat Swallow, having on board about 350 passengers, left Albany for New York, and when opposite Hudson struck a rock and broke in two. The accident was the more appalling as it occurred at night. The helmsman of the boat brought the fire of the furnace in contact with the wood, and the vessel was soon wrapt in flames. The terror seemed to be at its highest when the boat broke in two: the water put out the fire, and the stern sank. At this critical moment the steam-boats Express and Rochester came up, and immediately got out all their boats, to pick up those who were in the water, and save the residue who were clinging to the wreck—of these the Rochester took on board 150, and the Express 30. Many were known, however, to have reached Hudson and Athens, as boats were promptly despatched from both places. The bodies of several passengers were found, and many others are missing. The loss of life is supposed to have been great.

DOMESTIC.

Prince Albert has forwarded to the Mechanics' Institution, in Southampton-buildings, the sum of £20, in aid of the fund now collecting to improve the library of that institution.

Viscount Loftus has been elected for the Duke of Marlborough's close borough of Woodstock, vice the Marquis of Blandford.

The late William Johnston, Esq., long a merchant and shipowner in Kirkcubright, has, by his will, bequeathed the magnificent sum of £3500 sterling for the immediate erection and endowment of a free-school.

The potters at Brettell Lane are suffering very much on account of the rise in the price of coal, but we are happy to say that the masters are bearing the whole of the burden, and thus showing a sympathy for the condition of their workmen, which reflects upon them much credit.—Worcester Journal.

On Saturday evening last a most destructive fire took place at Withersfield, where everything on the farm was consumed, including six score of sheep. It is not yet ascertained whether it is the work of an incendiary or not.— Ipswich Express.

The total number of deaths registered in the metropolitan districts during the week ending on Saturday, the 26th of April, amounted to 904, a return exhibiting an increase on the averages of the last five springs, and a decrease on those of the last five years, the numbers being respectively 888 and 963.

On Tuesday afternoon a meeting was held in the great room at Exeter hall, to receive from the Rev. Dr. Wolff a narrative of his mission to Bokhara to ascertain the fate of Colonel Stoddard and Captain Conolly. Admiral Sir E. Codrington was in the chair, supported by Lord De Mauley, Lord Gage, Sir T. D. Acland, M.P., Assayd Kayat, Chevalier Dillon, Captain Grover, Dr. Yates, Dr. Major, the Rev. Dr. Goodchild, Captain Randall, Mr. H. Pownall, and a great many other military officers, clergymen, and civilians. The Rev. Dr. Wolff (having been introduced to the meeting by Captain Grover) gave a narrative of his mission, which occupied two hours and a half in delivery. The main facts have already appeared in the public papers. Some confusion was caused by the Rev. G. Stoddard, a relative of Colonel Stoddard, accusing Captain Grover of casting false imputations on the character of the deceased colonel and his relatives. Captain Grover replied that the only insinuation to which the rev. gentleman could possibly allude was that the relatives of his poor friend mourned for him before his fate was ascertained. After some further discussion, the thanks of the meeting were voted to Dr. Wolff, and it was agreed that a national subscription should be opened to present the rev. gentleman with some suitable testimonial.

We learn from good authority that flax will be grown this year, more or less, in every county of England, and, it is expected, somewhat extensively in Sussex. One gentleman will sow nine acres.—Brighton Gazette.

During the last two or three days the arrival of homeward bound vessels—more especially those in the foreign trade—in the river has been very great, and the pool and the docks now present an exceedingly crowded and bustling appearance. The tide of Tuesday brought up a large fleet—amongst which were no less than eight large East Indians.

Very numerous meetings are holding at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, in order to protest against the increased grant proposed by the Government to be given to the College of Maynooth. They are composed of persons delegated by congregations of various religious denominations throughout the empire, the great majority being from dissenting bodies.

Mr. Searge has withdrawn from the British and Foreign School Society because it has accepted pecuniary assistance from the Government.

From statistical information gathered by the active secretary to the Accident Relief Society, from the various hospitals and other sources, it appears that very nearly 50,000 of all descriptions occur annually, the great majority of which falls, of course, among the working classes.

The annual meeting of the Association for the Aid and Benefit of Dressmakers and Milliners was held, on Friday, the 25th ult., at the Hanover-square Rooms. Lord Ashley, as president, took the chair. The secretary read the report, which stated that the sum expended in pecuniary assistance amounted to £119. 16s. 1d.; whilst the expense for medical attendance, and medicines, for procuring change of air, was £54. 13s. 11d., and of money advanced as loans £13, making a total of cash expended in relief of £187. 10s.

On Monday morning last the unfortunate culprit Hocker was executed in front of the Old Bailey in the presence of an immense crowd of spectators. To the last he persisted in denying that he was the actual murderer of De la Rue, alleging that another party had committed the act, and charging him with being guilty of a double murder in permitting him (Hocker) to fall a sacrifice.

The Dublin Evening Mail of Friday week says:—"We repeat, in terms the most emphatical—and we would not venture upon the assertion in such a tone of confidence if we had not more than ordinary grounds for making the statement—that there is no intention on the part of her Majesty to visit Ireland this summer. It is probable that ere many days elapse an official announcement will be made of a determination, on the part of the Queen and Prince Albert, to go up the Rhine, with a view of paying a visit to the family of the illustrious Prince Consort."

On Monday the usual weekly meeting of the Repeal Association was held at the Conciliation-hall, Dublin, Mr. Nicholas Maher in the chair. Mr. Smith O'Brien brought forward the address of the committee of the Repeal Association to the electors of the county Down, urging upon them to return, as their representative, one who, in Parliament and elsewhere, would defend their rights. The honourable gentleman, having moved the adoption of the address, said that during the course of the late debate Mr. May had declared that the repeal of the union would be fatal to England, and that the English people would never consent to it, were they even threatened with an united attack from France, America, and Spain. Firm as was that language, he would assert that no less firm was the determination of the people of Ireland. Mr. O'Brien seconded the adoption of the address, which was carried. Mr. Grey Porter addressed the meeting. Mr. O'Connell, in a speech of considerable length, moved the adoption of the following resolution:—"That the committee of the Loyal National Repeal Association be instructed to consider what will be the most appropriate manner of receiving the Queen to give her Majesty should visit Ireland, taking care that, while the greatest respect is paid to our Sovereign, she may not be allowed to remain in ignorance of the intention of the Irish people to persevere, under all circumstances, in their demand for the legislative independence of Ireland." Agreed to. The rent for the week was announced to be £117. 10s. 6d.

The Armagh Guardian states, on the authority of a Clones correspondent, that an attempt was made on Sunday last to burn the town of Clones. The reason T. O'Brien, it appears, was removed on Sunday night, and so it is that six houses were totally consumed. The loss of property is said to be considerable; some of the sufferers being deprived even of their clothes.

LOWELL AND ITS FACTORIES.—On entering Lowell, a stranger is naturally struck with the contrast presented by that place, to an English manufacturing town. Here, in Bradford, for example, every building is of stone, or brick, solid, substantial, with little of the freshness that might be looked for in so rapidly an increasing town: there, in Lowell, though the mills and boarding-houses are generally of brick, the chief part of the other buildings, houses, hotels, and even churches, are of wood, and nearly the whole as fresh-looking as if built within a year. Here, with us, everything, externally, is discoloured with smoke; buildings, streets, and causeways, alike bearing a sooty covering; the mud of the streets, in colour and consistency, like blackish grey paint, and the air of heaven darkened as by a dense cloud: there, nothing is discoloured, neither houses, nor mills, nor trees—the red brick factories and boarding-houses, and the other edifices of wood painted in light colours, look as fresh as if just finished; the streets—dusty enough, indeed (for a deep dry covering of dust was on them when I was in Lowell)—were yet not black like ours; and the sky, unshrouded by smoke or cloud, was brilliant and clear—the sun darting down its unobstructed rays with dazzling and scorching power. There the trees and plants which, with us, soon become dingy after their foliage bursts out, and which, in some places, as in the churchyard of St. Peter's, being ever leafless, appear like the black stumps of the forest in America, the residue and remnants of the fire—there, in Lowell, were fresh and flourishing; the trees, with which some streets or mill precincts were screened and adorned, being verdant in their summer's foliage, and the neatly-kept gardens, here and there seen about the factories, being amply adorned with floral beauty. Hence, as to Lowell, large as it has grown, it is yet rural in its appearance, and, notwithstanding its being a city of factories, is yet fresh and cleanly.—American Factories, &c., by the Rev. W. Scoresby.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, April 28.—The supply of English Wheat this morning was very moderate, and it was taken off readily at the prices of this day week. The demand for Foreign Wheat was only to small quantities at former rates. Though the supply of Malting Barley was not large, it was fully equal to the demand; the sale was slow, without alteration in price. Beans and Peas were scarce; the former were 1s. to 2s., the latter 1s. per qr. dearer. The supply of Oats altogether was only moderate; there was an increased inquiry from the country, but the advance for which Oats were held had the effect of checking business; there was, however, a fair sale at fully 6d. per qr. advance on the prices of this day week.

FRIDAY, May 2.—Since Monday's return there is a fair arrival of wheat. The trade continues dull without any alteration. Some of the Wheat left over from Monday is still unsold. In Barley nothing is doing. There are 10,000 qrs. of Irish Oats fresh up this week, but the supplies of Foreign are trifling, and prices are fully 6d. dearer than Monday; but the business done is not extensive. No alteration in Beans and Peas. The duty on Beans declined 1s. yesterday. S. H. LUCAS and SON.

BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY.—Sir, The sample of Patent French Distilled Brandy you sent me I have accurately examined; and having instituted a series of experiments on it and on the finest French Brandy, I have, in these comparative trials, been able to discover so little difference, either in their composition or effects, that they may be considered as identical; excepting that your Brandy is free from uncombined acid and astringent matter, which exists, more or less, in most of the Brandy imported from France.
I remain, Sir, yours respectfully,
John Thomas Cochrane, Lecturer on Chemistry.

To Mr. Betts. John Thomas Cochrane, Lecturer on Chemistry. Betts's Patent Brandy is prescribed by the highest medical authorities, in preference to French Brandy; and is exclusively used at Guy's, St. George's, St. Thomas's, the Westminster, and other Hospitals, and at the Manchester, Bristol, Brighton, and other Infirmarys. Quantities of not less than two gallons supplied at the Distillery, in stone jars at 18s. per gallon, exclusive of the jar; and in caped bottles at 20s. per gallon, bottles and case included, and not returnable.—J. T. BETTS, Jun., and Co., 7, Smithfield-lane, London.

ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE.

PATRONISED BY HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN, THE ROYAL FAMILY, AND THE

SEVERAL SOVEREIGNS AND COURTS OF EUROPE.

A FRAGRANT WHITE POWDER, prepared from Oriental Herbs of inimitable virtue for preserving and beautifying the TEETH.

It eradicates the facitious formation of tartar and thus leads a salutary growth and freshness to the gums. It removes from the surface of the teeth the spots of incipient decay, polishes, and preserves the enamel, imparting the most pure and pearly whiteness; while from its salubrious and disinfecting qualities, it gives sweetness and perfume to the breath, being an anti-scorbutic, the gums also share in its corrective powers; scurvy is eradicated from them, a healthy action and redness are induced, so that the teeth (if loose) are thus rendered firm in their sockets. As the most efficient and fragrant aromatic cleanser of the mouth, teeth, and gums ever known, ROWLAND'S ODONTO has now for a long series of years occupied a distinguished place at the toilette of the SOVEREIGNS and the NOBILITY throughout Europe, while the general demand for it at once announces the favour in which it is held by the public at large.
Price 1s. 3d. per box, duty included.

CAUTION
To protect the Public from Fraud, the Hon. Commissioners of Stamps have directed the Proprietors' Signature to be engraved on the Government Stamp, thus:—

A. ROWLAND and SON, 92, RATTON GARDEN, Which is affixed to each box.

ALL OTHER ODONTO'S ARE PRADULENT IMITATIONS.

PILBROW'S ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY

and CANAL PROPULSION COMPANY (provisionally registered). Capital £400,000, in 80,000 Shares of £5 each. Instalment £1 per share.

Since the issue of the former Prospectus, the Provisional Directors have considered it desirable to negotiate with the Patentee for his whole right of Patents, instead of confining themselves to the United Kingdom and Ireland, as originally proposed; and the Directors have now the satisfaction of announcing to the public that they have agreed for the purchase of the British and Foreign right of Pilbrow's Atmospheric Railway and Canal Propulsion Patents. By this extended arrangement the Directors have obtained the patents upon much more advantageous terms for the propriety, in consequence of which the amount of call necessary to carry out the object and intention of the Company will be greatly diminished, and the prospect of immediate return considerably increased.

In lieu of Five Pounds, One Pound per share is considered ample to cover the expenses of purchase, and to lay down a line of sufficient length to prove the superiority of Pilbrow's Atmospheric principle.

The arrangement of this undertaking, however, necessarily involves many changes in the amount of capital and the number of shares must be considerably augmented, but the shares will still be continued at the same amount, viz., Ten-Pound shares, to meet the wishes of the original applicants.

An instalment of One Pound per share will be required on the signing of the deed of settlement.

DIRECTORS.
The Right Hon. the Earl of Essex, Chairman.
The Right Hon. the Earl of Beaconsfield, Captain Lubbock.
George Buckley Bolton, Esq.
George Herbert, Esq.
Lieutenant-Colonel Giffels.
Resident Director—Dr. John Glegg Hewlett.
Auditor—Thomas Edwards, Esq.
Consulting Engineer—James Pilbrow, Esq.
Engineers—Alex. Gordon, Esq., M. Inst. C.E.; Fred. Braithwaite, Esq., C.E.
Standing Counsel—Thomas Webster, Esq.
Solicitors—Messrs. White and Horrett.
Secretary—Charles Collins, Esq.

Bankers—London Joint Stock Bank, City Branch; Messrs. Cochrane, Bid- dolph, Huddell, and Co., 41, Chancery-lane, London.
Offices—6, King William-street, London.

The prominent advantages of this system of atmospheric traction are, that the continuous valve is dispensed with; roads are crossed upon a level without interruption of motion; one atmospheric railway can be intersected by another, thus saving bridges, approaches, and lockways; and it is confidently expected that a stationary engine every ten miles will be sufficient.

The system combines extreme simplicity with perfect efficiency, and that obtained with a small comparative expense in working and construction. It is estimated that a saving altogether upon the other plans of atmospheric railways (having the continuous valve) would be nearly £2,000 per mile; two miles or more can, on this plan, be laid for little more than the cost of one upon the other plans; and a saving in working or annual expenses of two-thirds.

Increased safety is ensured, also obstruction and destruction by weather and other sources are placed beyond probability by the motion being buried, &c.

The objects of the Company will be to dispose of Foreign patents; to grant licences to Railway and Canal Companies to use the invention, or lay down the works under contracts with the different companies, and to lay down an experimental line in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, by agreement with any existing company or otherwise.

The income derivable from these sources offers considerable advantages, while the expenses, with the exception of the purchase of the patents, and laying down the experimental line, are obviously small.

A Model, upon a scale of one inch to the foot, may be seen at work on Wednesdays and Thursdays, between twelve and three o'clock at the Company's offices, by application to the Secretary or officers of the Company.

Form of Application for Shares annexed to this Prospectus.

To the Directors of Pilbrow's Atmospheric Railway and Canal Propulsion Company.

Gentlemen, I request you to allot me Shares of each in the above Company, and I undertake to accept the same, or any smaller number of shares that may be allotted to me, and to pay the deposit thereon, and to execute the deed of settlement.

Signed this day of 1845.

CLERICAL, MEDICAL, AND GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

In addition to Assurances on Healthy Lives, this Society continues to grant Policies on the Lives of Persons subject to gout, asthma, rheumatism, and other diseases, by their paying a premium in proportion to the increased risk. The plan of granting Assurances on unhealthy Lives originated with this Office in the early part of 1824.

Every description of Assurance may be effected with this Society, and Policies are granted on the lives of persons of all ages.

The sum accumulated and invested, for the security and benefit of the assured (exclusive of the proprietors' paid-up capital), already exceeds half a million sterling; and the income, which is steadily increasing, is now £201,500 per annum.

The two first divisions averaged 212 per cent. on the premiums paid. The third bonus, declared in January, 1842, averaged 228 per cent., and the future bonuses are expected to exceed that amount.

Further information may be obtained of GEO. H. PINCKARD, Actuary, 74, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, London, or of any of the Society's agents.

WANTED, by a Chemist and Druggist in London,

a respectable Youth as an APPRENTICE. Premium moderate. Corent-garden, London.

STOOPING of the SHOULDERS and CON-

TRACTION of the CHEST are entirely prevented, and gently and effectually removed, in Youth and Ladies and Gentlemen, by the occasional use of the PATENT ST. JAMES'S CHEST EXPANDER, which is light, simple, easily employed outwardly or invisibly, without bands beneath the arms, uncomfortable restraint, or impediment to exercise. Sent post paid, by MR. A. BIRNOK, 40, Tavistock-street, Strand, London, near the Bazaar; or full particulars on receiving a postage stamp.

GROWTH OF THE HAIR.—No great change can be permanently brought about without going to the root of the evil. The root of the evil in defects of the hair, as in other cases, lies beneath the surface; mere ungents may gloss over, but will not remove the cause. The only preparation that acts unerringly, because in accordance with the principles, is OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA, which prevents the hair from turning grey, and the first application causes it to curl beautifully, frees it from scurf, and stops it from falling off, and a few bottles restore it again. Price 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle. No other prices are genuine.—Oldridge's Balm, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand.

HOLYLANDS, 150, Strand (two doors west of Somerset House), invite Gentlemen who desire the best description of Clothes at moderate prices, for cash payments only, to their very superior MODEL OUTSIDE COATS, for Spring wear, just now prepared in the most approved style, altogether better and more adapted for appearance and durability than are generally to be met with; called Verona Elastic Cloth, Sultans and Gotha Coats. Every article waterproofed.

LIGHT SUMMER WATERPROOF OVER COATS

and WRAPPERS, from 50s. to 45s.—Messrs. BURCH and LUCAS, Tailors, &c., 51, King William-street, City, respectfully invite Gentlemen and Families to view their stock of Superior Cloth, Cashmeres, and Zephyrs, for Coats, Fancy Vestings, and Frockings, for the present season. The style and make of every garment guaranteed equal to any house in London, and at the very lowest remunerative prices. All garments of a slop description are excluded from this establishment.—Messrs. Burch and Lucas, Tailors, &c., 51, King William-street, City, opposite the statue.

WHAT'S THE MATTER AT MOSES AND SON'S?

(A WHITESUNDA CHAT.)

"I say," said a gentleman, not along ago,
"What's the matter at MOSES and SON'S? Do you know?
No house in the City is crowded like this;
The people are thronging the steps and the stairs, Look! look! every part of the wonderful Bait is crowded with persons—it seems a 'rum start';
And I ask, as I did a few minutes ago,
What's the matter at MOSES and SON'S? Do you know?"
"Yes, I do," said his friend, "and I'll tell in a minute.
For I'd have you to know that there's no racket in it;
These multitudes there, who so eagerly pass,
Are thronging the warehouse for Whitesunda dress.
E. MOSES and SONS have distinguished their Mart
By choice summer dresses, exceedingly smart.
You can judge for yourself, from the crowds that you see,
What capital bargains these garments must be.
Is it likely the public would crowd the Mart so,
If the dresses of MOSES were faulty? No, no!
The people take notice when justice is done—
And that's why they go to E. MOSES and SON."
"Well done!" said his friend, "you're a famous logician,
I think I shall go and amend my condition;
I want a new suit, which is not at all dear,
As the Whitesunda holidays now are so near."
With this he stepped in, and obtained in a trice,
A beautiful suit for a very low price.
Let the reader do likewise, and quickly make one
At the delectable-through Dress-Mart of MOSES and SON.

THE LEAGUE.

SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1845.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quintin Dalmtryple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Birmingham and the neighbourhood are respectfully informed, that Subscriptions may be paid by Free-Traders to Mr. Charles Geach, Midland Bank, Union-street, Birmingham, the local Treasurer.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

Contributions to the Bazaar will continue to be received during next week.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRATION.

The Council of the League finding that more than half of the persons whose names are on the Middlesex Register have claimed since the last contested election in 1837, they have directed circulars to be sent to them requesting an answer as to whether they will support Free-Trade candidates in the event of an election. As it is not considered that those who return censure pledge themselves to support ANY PARTICULAR man, but only that they are willing to support the principle of Free Trade, it is hoped that ALL who have received letters, and are favourable to the principles the Anti-Corn Law League advocate, will consider it a duty to return their letters answered, as it is important that the Council should be able to know their supporters from their opponents.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

SUCCESS!

THE FREE-TRADE BAZAAR IS OPEN.

Of the scene now presented by the interior of Covent-garden Theatre we confess we know not how to speak but in words that will seem to our readers at a distance extravagantly hyperbolic; while, to those who have witnessed that scene, any words will appear tame and feeble. We, elsewhere, record such of the particulars of this marvellous creation of the industrial genius of Great Britain as are capable of being rendered into language; but proceeding to an adequate idea of the magnificent whole, and no language can picture an exhibition every variety of that industry which has made this little island a queen among the nations. The brilliant success which now crowns the efforts of those thousands of our countrymen and countrywomen who have resolved to show what British industry, British skill, and British taste are capable of achieving —a success concentrating on a single focal point of time and space the work of many months, and of every part of the United Kingdom—is such as really startles with its splendour even those who had watched the undertaking through every step of its progress, who had seen it growing under their hands day by day and week by week, and personally superintended every detail of its execution. Familiar as we have long been with this great work, both in its plan and details, we can hardly say that we knew much more, until the present week, than our readers at the other end of the kingdom, of what the final and total result would show. We had but most imperfectly realized to our minds that vast conception which the zeal of the Free-Traders of Great Britain gave us to execute, and which now stands before the world in all its finished magnificence, a spectacle without precedent and without rival.

But it is not as a mere spectacle that we can speak or think of our League Bazaar. It is not as a mere spectacle that it has been called into existence. We English are a serious people, with no especial fondness for shows, and little given to spend time, strength, and money on pageants. It is not for a piece of pageantry that our great manufacturing and mining capitalists have obeyed the suggestion of the women of Great Britain, and sent the bulkiest and costliest products of the loom, the forge, and the steam-engine to be exhibited under one roof with the fairy-like creations of woman's exquisite taste and delicate handiwork. This Bazaar is a very earnest business. It is business, and not sport. It is fraught with moral meaning. There is a deep, true soul in it all. It is the embodiment of a profound conviction. It is the utterance of a stern and inflexible determination. It is the product of a vast power. It is the national expression of a nation's idea and purpose. It is a nation's attestation of a grand truth. It is a nation's protest against an enormous wrong. It is a nation's manifesto against a gigantic iniquity. It is the British people's display of the might, and assertion of the rights, of that industry which a selfish and cruel legislation manacles and starves. Dazzling as our Bazaar is by its brilliancy, bewildering as it is by its complexity and vastness, there is still moral unity and simplicity in it—the unity and simplicity of that great idea which the beholder sees, at every turn, expressed in the word "FREE" that meets his eye, wrought in with every artistic decoration of the edifice, and reminding him, at each step he takes, of the sober Saxon purpose that is in and under all the material magnificence of the Norman-Gothic Hall.

Yes! British industry must, shall, and WILL be free—free to produce and exchange, to labour and enjoy, to earn and eat—free to replenish the earth with the products of its million-fold ingenuity, its ceaseless activity, its indomitable energy and perseverance—free to subdue the earth to its uses, and render all nations willing tributaries to its needs. If ever this were doubtful, it is doubtful no longer. The argument now presented, not to the mere logical understandings, but to the senses and souls of men, is of a kind that there is no gainsaying. The power of which this spectacle is the expression and embodiment is a power which not all the Richmonds and Buckinghams in creation can hinder from ruling Great Britain. There is no confuting nor resisting this mutely eloquent plea for the rights of industry. It would, we verily believe, convince and convert the Richmonds and Buckinghams themselves, if they would but come and see. Its effect on public opinion will be prompt and decisive. Its effect on that legislation which, sooner or later, reflects and expresses public opinion will be, though less prompt, not less decisive. Again and again do we congratulate the Free-Traders of Great Britain on the splendour of a success which is a worthy reward of nearly seven years of exertion and endurance, as it is the pledge of that complete and crowning victory which is already visible, not in the distance.

As a piece of pageantry, our Free-Trade Bazaar will fare, of course, very much like other pageants. It will be a nine-days' wonder—the gaze of the metropolis, the talk of the world—and it will pass away, and give place to other and newer wonders. In a few days the varied treasures which the labours of many months have slowly accumulated will all vanish from the public eye, and be dispersed for ever to the four corners of the empire. But the result of those labours will endure: as a moral demonstration, an utterance of national conviction and purpose, our Free-Trade Bazaar will live. It will live in the hearts and souls of those who, in it and by it, have testified the depth and strength of their determination to realize the rights of industry. It will live in the recollections and hopes that will ever be associated with those visible memorials of its magnificence which will find an honoured place in thousands and tens of thousands of British homes. It will live in the renewed efforts against monopoly that will be sustained by its pecuniary proceeds, and stimulated and cheered by the national sympathy of which it is a pledge and assurance. It will live eventually in the statute-book of this great empire, which will, ere long, record the liberation of industry from every fetter of monopoly. It will live in the industrial ameliorations and commercial reforms which the example of the first industrial and commercial people of the world will call forth in every country under heaven. It will live in the happy homes of the emancipated millions of these islands, and in that peace on earth and goodwill among men of which extended and permanent commercial relations are the most efficient guarantee. True, the "Aladdin's palace" will go, some of these mornings, as it came, and men will see it no more; but the genius that willed this gorgeous structure into being—a genius more potent than any fabled spirit of lamp or ring—will live to work new wonders; first beating down the monstrous tyranny that shackles his giant limbs, and then expending his disenthralled energies in the godlike task of subduing universal nature to the obedience and service of universal humanity.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Thirteenth Week, ending Saturday, May 10.

Up till Easter, FREE TRADE was the absorbing question in the Legislature. Never in any former session were its triumphs in debate so brilliant, the frequency of its discussions so rapid, the admission of its principles so frequent, the humiliation of its opponents so extreme and judicious. A child might have perceived that its doctrines had passed from the mind of the nation at large into that of the House of Commons; and that we were but waiting the moment when that which has been established axiomatically in the minds of all men with the smallest portion of political intelligence shall become a primary principle in our legislation.

Since Easter, Free Trade has experienced a comparative lull in the House of Commons. Not, however, from any indifference—quite the reverse. Another question, that of Maynooth, is at present absorbing the public mind; and, though the Free-Traders in the House are prepared and preparing for discussion, they cannot command circumstances. Last week Mr. Ward's motion was postponed, in consequence of there being "no House;" this week there was again "no House," being the second Tuesday in succession on which this has occurred. After Whitsuntide, however, when other exciting matters are disposed of, FREE TRADE will resume its prominent place in the debates of the House of Commons.

There was, however, on Thursday night, a very amusing and a very instructive debate, which, though not arising on a direct Free-Trade proposition, indirectly raised the entire question, and exhibited the "Agricultural Mind" in a very whimsical state. Mr. HURR, in an able speech, proposed a resolution, the substance of which was, that corn from Australia should be admitted into the United Kingdom on the payment of the same duty as corn from Canada, namely—one shilling. It was a significant fact that the proposition was seconded, from the Government-side of the House, by Sir Walter James; nor less significant was it that Captain Rous, the Tory member for Westminster, should have enforced the claim by arguments such as any Free-Trade might use.

Sir George Clerk was put forward to oppose a proposition which, in its simplest and driest form of statement, might appear to be a demonstration. The one-shilling boon was given to Canada on specific grounds, and as a special favour; the benefit to Australia would be so small as not to make it worth the giving; and it was unadvisable once more to "tamper" with the Corn Law of 1842, and disturb the sensitive agricultural mind!

Mr. Labouchere, who followed, declared that our whole system of protection was rotten and vicious, and must be ultimately done away. But, though he had opposed the Canada Bill on principle, he could not see why, having granted a favour to one colony, we should refuse it to another.

Captain Rous then declared from the Ministerial benches, that those who had voted for the Canada Bill could not consistently oppose this proposition; and protested that it was the worst possible policy, in the world, not to admit Australian wheat duty free, seeing that it was much esteemed by our millers, its dry qualities rendering it peculiarly suited for mixing with the damp wheat of England. After the gallant officer, rose

Mr. T. M. Gibson, who thought the honourable gentleman who had just spoken had taken a very sound view of the question submitted to them by his honourable friend; and knowing, as he did, how much the honourable gentleman was looked up to by the agriculturists of Suffolk, and how much weight they would attach to his opinion, he was quite sure that his assent to his honourable friend's proposal would tend to remove their alarm. He could not help suspecting that the right honourable gentleman the Vice-President of the Board of Trade was a little premature in his opposition to the motion; and he hoped that, after the speeches they had heard from the other side of the House, the right honourable gentleman the first Minister of the Crown would give his assent to its adoption. He was the more induced to this hope from knowing that such a course was not unusual with him. He remembered well that when his honourable friend the member for Lambeth brought forward a reasonable proposal, supported by sound arguments, the Vice-President of the Board of Trade then, as now, was rather precipitate, and gave it a premature opposition ("hear," and a laugh); that his negative was afterwards rescinded by the right honourable gentleman at the head of the Government, and that the motion was carried. He hoped that precedent would be followed on this occasion by the right hon. gentleman. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) The Vice-president of the Board of Trade, it appeared to him, had shown symptoms of decided distress during the time of making his speech. He had certainly made use of some very extraordinary arguments. They might be official arguments; they might be found in the pigeon-holes of the Board of Trade, which his hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton once alluded to; but they were hardly arguments which, in the present state of commercial intelligence, would go down with the country. ("Hear, hear.") To talk of its being a reason for keeping out Australian corn, that none would come in, was of all strange delusions the most ridiculous. The right hon. gentleman had talked of the alarm of the agriculturists. Even if some few ignorant persons at a market ordinary did express apprehensions that a measure of this House might affect the agricultural interest, he submitted that was not a ground for altering their legislation. They were bound to do what was right; if persons chose to be alarmed, they could not help it; such persons must take the consequences of their own folly. The right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government had, on a recent occasion, used this identical argument; he said it was difficult to do anything without giving rise to a panic, but, if he were satisfied in his own mind that the measure he proposed was a good one, he would not be deterred by the fear of awakening any unfounded apprehensions; he would do his duty, and take the consequences of passing the measure. ("Hear, hear.") Any one who had considered this question dispassionately must see that it was for the general welfare, not only of the colonies, but of the United Kingdom, that we should admit the colonial corn duty-free. It was a strange argument of the right hon. gentleman when he said that he would not give his consent to his honourable friend's motion, because it was not large enough, and did not embrace all the colonies, or lay down any great general principle. He (Mr. Gibson) was in favour of letting in corn from all the colonies, and also from foreign parts, free of duty. He must admit that there was force in the argument of the right hon. gentleman the late President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Labouchere), when he said there was danger in admitting it only from the colonies, because, by so doing, you gave the colonial growers a partnership in the monopoly, and, by extending the sphere, made it more difficult ultimately to get rid of the restrictions; but he (Mr. Gibson) thought that the advantages of doing so balanced the disadvantages. He was in favour of extending the field from which our supplies might be drawn, and would lend his assistance to remove every commercial restriction, and every obstacle interposed in the way of a free interchange of commercial commodities. Although they might make the Australian colonies in some measure opposed to the admission of corn into the United Kingdom free of duty, he would take the chance of that, because he knew that every step in favour of relaxation was, in fact, a step towards the object he had in view, that of an unrestricted trade in corn. He hoped that the right honourable baronet, if he were not prepared to agree to his honourable friend's motion, would explain clearly to the House what was the advantage obtained by keeping out Australian corn from the British market. It appeared a very natural demand, on the part of the colonists, that they should be allowed to sell their grain in the best market; and it was incumbent on those who denied it to them to show to demonstration what was the national advantage to the United Kingdom of maintaining such a restriction. They were often told of the necessity of planting colonies, in order to afford a field for our manufactures; but how could it be expected that our manufactures would find such a field if we refused to take the products of those colonies? ("Hear, hear.") He would implore the House not to proceed to such a course of folly and injustice as would be the consequence of rejecting the motion of his honourable friend.

Mr. Darby, Mr. Francis Baring, and Mr. Stuart Wortley followed, the latter opposing the resolution on the "agacious plea, that corn from Chili might be carried across the Pacific to Australia, and then reshipped, as colonial, to recross the Pacific, and undergo the Atlantic voyage, in order to be introduced into England."

Mr. Baring said, the hon. member who had just resumed his seat concluded his speech by saying that with these views he should, however reluctantly, give his vote against the measure. But what were the views of the honourable gentleman he (Mr. Bright) could not in any way find out. He thought he might, without running much risk, say that nine out of ten of those honourable members who had heard that speech were unable to say, distinctly, what the views of the honourable gentleman were upon this question. ("Hear, hear.") He (Mr. Bright) always watched the rising of that hon. member, because he wished to learn what was the sort of speech he intended to make; for although he confessed that, as a rule, he found the greatest difficulty to tell, while hearing the speech of the honourable gentleman, what opinion he had formed upon the subject under discussion, yet he had not the smallest difficulty in telling which way the honourable gentleman would vote. From the honourable gentleman's speech of to-night it would appear that his faith had been very much shaken. He (Mr. Bright) did not expect that the honourable gentleman's speech would give much satisfaction to the large party whom he was supposed to represent. The honourable gentleman had said that it would have been as well, if not better, if the Corn Laws had never existed; yet he concluded by expressing a wish to nurse these infant colonies in Australia by the introduction of a law in corn. His honourable friend the member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) had very happily described the speech of the right honourable baronet the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and the honourable member for Suffolk (Mr. Darby) had come forward as his commentator; and he (Mr. Bright) should say that the commentator was worthy of the text. ("Hear, hear.") From the speeches which had been made on both sides of the House he was enabled to gather this fact, that the real ground of opposition to the present motion was an indisposition to make any further change in the laws affecting the importation of corn, the impression being that such change might have some dangerous effect upon the agricultural mind. He wished to know what that agricultural mind was (laughter); or rather what this alarm was which was to form the guiding principle for legislation by that House. Some years ago the East India Company contemplated importing from India an article known by the name of "cutch," which was used for purposes of tanning. The agricultural mind of that day was alarmed lest it should interfere with the sale and price of their bark; and they intimated to some members connected with the East India Company that they had better not attempt to introduce cutch, or the agricultural interest might keep a sharp look-out the next time the East India Company's charter came to be considered by the Legislature. Then, in the case of the reduction of the duty on wool in 1824, a state of alarm in the agricultural mind was exceedingly prevalent, and yet the result showed that there was not a single thing to justify that alarm. Again, in 1812, when the right honourable gentleman (Sir R. Peel) altered the Corn Law, great alarm was felt by the agricultural mind, but there had not since been any proof that such alarm was well founded. So, in respect to the reduction of duty on cattle: that created great alarm in the agricultural mind; yet he thought the agriculturists would themselves admit that they still received a very fair price for their cattle. Again, the Canada Corn Bill created a great panic; and yet the returns showed that there had been larger importations of Canadian corn into this country before the passing of that act than had taken place in any year since. The article of wool last year became again the subject of alarm, by the Government abolishing the duty altogether. Certain individuals thought it would be injurious to the wool-growers of this country and the Australian colonies; and yet it was now unanimously allowed that the abolition of that duty had done no harm either to one interest or the other. He should like to know, then, how long this alarm of the agricultural mind—an alarm certainly created because that mind was not much enlightened upon questions of geography or of political economy—but he should like to know how long this ignorant alarm was to be brought forward in Parliament, either in support of measures which were decidedly bad, or in opposition to measures that were decidedly good? ("Hear, hear.") The question which the House ought to decide was, whether it was more important that the alarm of the agricultural interest should by no means be excited, or that the bread-eaters of the country should be allowed to obtain bread from every part of the world. He believed that the present state of the agricultural interest of this country illustrated the line of the poet, and that—

It had come so often to Parliament for help that it did not know its own power. He would say to them—"Take off your bandages, and form a just estimate of your own strength." He rejoiced that two hon. members on the Ministerial benches—the hon. and gallant member for Westminster (Captain Rous), and the hon. member for Hull (Sir W. James)—had spoken in favour of this question. He was glad to see this, and to see that parties were breaking down, and that, instead of honourable members being led by one man on this side of the House, or by one man on that side of the House, they were anxious to judge of each measure by its own merits. ("Hear, hear.") He did not wish to overrate the importance of the present motion, but he should vote for it because it proposed a measure in the right direction, and he was ever ready to accept everything that would tend in any degree to benefit the people.

Mr. Stafford O'Brien next spoke, and was answered by Mr. H. G. Ward, who referred to the immense admissions made on the other side in the course of this debate, especially by the hon. member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. S. Wortley), who had said that it would have been much better for the country had no Corn Laws been in existence. ("Hear, hear, hear.") On this point alone he had been clear, and on others his views were so obscure and clouded that it was not wonderful that the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Bright), in endeavouring to follow him, had wandered from the immediate question into the general subject of the Corn Laws. The hon. member for Northampton (Mr. S. O'Brien) had stated that the cotton mind had been once needlessly alarmed. This was true, but its alarm had produced no effect. The cotton mind did not assemble its forces in the rear of the Minister of the day, consequently it had not been listened to, and it was left to get over its fears as well as it could. The hon. member had also said that he would not pledge himself to an eternal refusal of justice; he was satisfied with a refusal of justice at the present moment, and year after year, when the justice of any claim was made as apparent as now, he would have an opportunity of assuring the House that he was not for eternal injustice, but thought that the time for a remedy had not yet arrived. ("Cheers.") It seemed, according to that hon. member, that the agricultural mind was at present in an unsettled condition—in a state of doubt and fluctuation; and for this reason he would not yet listen to the claims of Australia. Would he listen to them next year? ("Hear, hear.") Another point he had urged was, that the question was too narrow; that it embraced only one colony; that the motion asked too little. This might be called a Pebleshire sort of argument. ("Cheers and laughter.") The boon required ought not to have been confined to one colony; it was too insignificant a matter; it was not like a huge grant of £25,000 in one sum, or the Pebleshire mode of arguing might have been got rid of altogether. ("Cheers.") The honourable member for the West Riding of Yorkshire had talked about noxious and injurious supplies of corn; while the population was rapidly augmenting every day did not seem exactly the fittest time to speak of importations of corn as noxious and injurious. ("Hear, hear.") He (Mr. H. G. Ward) recollected the time when the opposite side of the House was eternally lauding ships, colonies, and commerce. Colonies were then to be admitted to a large share of the protection enjoyed by some interests at home; but now it appeared as if only those colonies were to be favoured which grew nothing that could be brought into competition. Coffee, cotton, or sugar might be admitted; but the moment they produced corn for export their produce was to be strictly excluded. Seeing the present temper of the other side of the House, he could not but wonder how the Canada Corn Bill had been permitted to slip through Parliament. He was happy to be able to tell honourable members that the predictions he had made were likely to be completely fulfilled, for preparations were making for an extensive trade in corn from the United States through Canada. Such was the prospect, and honourable members sitting behind the Prime Minister did not dare to ask him to repeal the act, however noxious and injurious, as well as abundant, might be the importations under it. It was all very well for some of them to talk of such a thing to their constituents two or three hundred miles off, but they could not talk of it in the House of Commons. It had been proposed and passed by the Government of the right hon. baronet, because the Canadians made it very intelligible that their contiguity to the United States might render it expedient to conciliate; and what an example did this course set to Australia! Sooner or later, what was now asked must be conceded; not this year, perhaps, as the hon. member for Northampton had said; but whether it took two or three years to force the claims of justice on the House, they must in time be heard, and the hon. member for Gateshead, by persevering in his motion, would at length shame his opponents into compliance. The time had not yet arrived, but it would unquestionably arrive, and then the right hon. baronet, according to his wont, would step forward and say—"It is no longer possible to resist these demands founded upon such plain and obvious truths, and the agricultural mind, like the cotton mind, must be prepared to abandon its foolish apprehensions; party or class interests cannot now be regarded, and we must consult the benefit of the great body of the Queen's subjects, by granting what is required by Australia." The right hon. baronet would not use such language to-night; he did not look as if he would (cheers and laughter), but he must use it ere long. He might balance for a year or two longer between right and wrong, but the hon. member for Gateshead might feel assured that his motion was virtually carried. ("Cheers.")

This speech brought up Sir Robert Peel, who really made the poorest and most pitiable speech that ever dropped from his lips. It was painful to listen to a man of his capacity talking in the way he did. It was with perfect truth and justice that Viscount Howick wished to ask the House whether any hon. gentleman who had listened to the speech of the right hon. baronet, had not felt for him the greatest compassion under the severe and painful task which had been put upon him that night? ("Cheers.") He owned that, in the course of the whole of his experience in that House, he had never yet heard a speech by a right hon. gentleman standing in the position of the right hon. baronet who had just delivered. ("Hear, hear.") What were the grounds upon which the motion had been resisted by the right hon. baronet? After having listened to his speech—knowing his ability, knowing with what power he could bring to bear in that House every thing which had the semblance of an argument affecting the case which he might have in hand—knowing this, he would ask, after they had listened to the right hon. baronet's speech, could they entertain a doubt as to the real justice of this case? ("Cheers.") The noble lord, then, in his clear and able way, exposed the fallacy of the arguments against the proposition; and, after some farther debate, the House divided:—

For the motion .. .. .	93
Against it .. .. .	117
Majority .. .. .	24

In the House of Lords, the Duke of Richmond had been muttering thunders, threatening what he would do, and what he wouldn't do, when the financial measures of the Government, which have passed the Commons, came on for discussion in the Lords. But from time to time he postponed his threatened demonstration; until Monday night last, when, to preserve the appearance of bare decency, he was under the necessity of getting up the faux pas of a Farmers' Friend opposition to the Government. On the occasion of the Auctions Duties Repeal Bill going through committee, he raised a feeble agricultural whine, repeating the Miles-and-Banks story about the county and poor rates. In the House of Commons there was a little freshness about the contemptible demand of relieving the landlords (not the tenant-farmers, as Mr. Milner Gibson ably showed) from contributing their quota to those local burdens which everybody has to bear; but the second or third edition of this demand in the House of Lords has nothing whatever in it to redeem its utter meanness and impudence.

The Duke of Richmond's speech, however, raised a brief discussion, noticeable as bringing out the fact, that though Sir Robert Peel has made some tolerable advances in the direction of Free Trade, all that has yet been done has been mere pottering and trifling when contrasted with the exigencies of the country.

The Earl of Dalhousie showed that any injury from the importation of foreign cattle was a laughable and ludicrous pretence; Lord Montagu approved by figures that any injury to the Canadian wheat and flour was literally as nothing when compared with the daily rapid multiplication of our population; and Lord Stanley stated that the importations of wheat from the United States was—decreasing! All this is both melancholy and absurd. National man,

CONTRIBUTIONS AND CORRESPONDENCE.

"MY DEAR SIR,—We yesterday forwarded to your address, Covent-garden, eighteen packages of goods for the Halifax stall, an inventory of which I herewith enclose to you. The goods will be delivered early on Monday morning. The total value of goods sent is, according to the prices attached, £493. 19s. 3½d. Since they were sent we have received several contributions more, and I have not the least doubt that it will be increased to £500. We have not yet completed our Bazaar purse, but I feel confident it will contain from £160 to £170. Be so good as write me by return, saying whether the goods have arrived safe; and also state the time you would wish the purse to be sent in.

OPENING OF THE BAZAAR.

We extract the following from the Bazaar Gazette, which will appear daily during the continuance of this great exhibition:—

Covent garden Theatre, where the Bazaar and Exhibition are held, is a structure of the present century, erected on the site of a former theatre, which was burned down on the morning of the 28th of September, 1808. The present edifice was erected from the designs of Sir Gilbert Smirke, within a period of ten months from the laying of the foundation-stone, at an expense of £150,000, not including the cost of scenery, theatrical properties, and similar decorations. The principal front is in Bow-street, and its design was pretty closely imitated from that of the Doric Temple of Minerva, in the Acropolis at Athens. Though magnificent in itself, the architecture is of too solemn and massive a character for the front of a theatre, and the proportions of the noble portico utterly fail in producing the desired effect, from the narrowness of the street in which they are situated; and for the same reason, the fine basso-reliefs representing the ancient and modern drama, situated above the windows, too often escape observation.

Under the portico is the vestibule, through which is the entrance to the Bazaar. Visitors ascend a wide staircase, decorated on each side with statuary, to the Shakspeare-hall or saloon. On the left side of this hall is the exhibition of tapestry, shawls, and carpets, and in the corners next the passage are displayed a splendid mirror and a stall of chemical preparations. Passing through this hall, and turning to the right, visitors enter the box-lobby, the side wing of which will be closed during the Bazaar. On the left will be a stall for Miller's glass-works. Visitors will proceed to the left, and on coming opposite the central box of the dress circle, they will reach the entrance to the Grand Gothic Hall. The first view at the entrance is very imposing: the illuminated roof, with its Gothic mouldings and richly decorated arches, the two vistas of pillars extending along each side, and the gorgeous painted window at the remote extreme seem to realize the imaginary halls in the palace of Aladdin. The elevation of the dress circle above the level of the pit enables the visitor to take in the whole at the first glance, and hence the effect of the coup d'œil is most striking and imposing. There is a descent of a few easy steps into the body of the hall, where the stalls are situated, and we shall first describe those connected with the range of boxes on the right-hand side of the visitor at entrance.* The boxes next to the entrance are themselves stalls, and are approached by a raised platform; they are divided between the towns of Northampton and Rochdale. The pillars projecting into the body of the hall extend from this point to the proscenium, and the stalls allocated to Yorkshire are placed between the pillars, the boxes behind serving for the display of goods, and also as magazines for the supply of the stalls. These four stalls are assigned to Halifax, Leeds, and Bradford; the towns being named in the order that the stalls follow from the entrance. In the centre of the hall is a double row of stalls, but we shall only describe that row now which is opposite and nearest to the box-stalls we have mentioned. Next the entrance are the stalls of Bolton, Stockport, and a Scotch burgh; then follow those of Swansea, Carlisle, York, Stockton-on-Tees, Hull, Beverley, Bristol, and Newcastle.

The stalls we have enumerated occupy half of the semi-ellipse which forms the part of the theatre in front of the stage, and which is usually compared to a horse-shoe. The stage itself being quadrangular, admits of a different arrangement. From the central line of stalls, adjoining that allocated to Bristol, there springs a series of stalls in the shape of a reversed L, the extreme of the letter joining the central stalls. The Newcastle stall is continued at right angles; then follow those of Huddersfield, Barnsley, Wakefield, and Bloomsbury, on the perpendicular side of the L; and at the top is the Kentish-town stall. Opposite to these, forming the right-hand side of the Gothic Hall, is first an ornamented door, and then two recesses, each richly illuminated with transparencies, painted to imitate stained glass: the first of these is the Peckham stall; and the second the Islington stall.

The right side of the upper part of the stage fronting the entrance is appropriated to the Metropolis, and is divided into three stalls, named in their order, from the right-hand corner, the City, Kensington, and Camden stalls. Returning again to the reversed L, which joins the central table, and which forms a recess of stalls just in front of the Camden (the reader will remember that as he turns into this recess he faces the door of entrance), at the turn next to the Kentish-town is the Sussex, and then the Norwood stall; at the horizontal line of the L are the Pentonville and Hoxton stalls; and we then again turn our back to the entrance, passing the St. Martin's and the Savoy stalls. The curved top of stalls, which unites the two central lines of stalls, is assigned to the contributions of the ladies of Sheffield.

Before we go down the other side of the hall we must enter, what would in ancient times be regarded as 'a chamber of dials,' a large recess at the extreme of the Gothic Hall, and forming itself a hall of superior decoration, illuminated by a large transparency, representing a Gothic window of the richest stained glass. The whole length of this magnificent apartment is laid out in refreshment-stalls, and the right-hand side as you enter is the book-stall, and opposite is the Post-office.

Returning to the stage, and turning to the right, we have to examine the remaining half of the Bazaar which is arranged on the same plan as that just described. At the stage end of the Bazaar there are three stalls next the wall assigned to Manchester, equal in extent to the London stalls on the opposite side; and there are in the side wall three recesses, each illuminated by a transparency, representing a window of stained glass, also occupied by stalls connected with Manchester. In the recess formed by the second reversed L, and the centre table, are the stalls assigned to Gloucester, Norwich, Exeter, Dudley, Warrington, Preston, and Lancaster. The outer side of the L, beginning at the top, opposite Manchester's stalls, are allocated to the contributions from Liverpool, Staleybridge, Ashton, and Bury; the end facing the body of the house is assigned to the Blackburn stall.

Crossing back from the stage to the body of the house, we have the boxes on our right, and the second central line of stalls on our left. This central line is given to the Midland Counties, and the stalls are assigned in the following order, beginning from the stage, to Nottingham, Leicester, Derby, Coventry, Birmingham, and Wolverhampton. Near the top is a Scotch stall, and at the top is a stall for contributions from Colebrookdale, in addition to those in the saloon, to be described hereafter. The stalls on the right hand, between the pillars, in front of the boxes, are assigned to Scotland, and are distributed, beginning from the stage, to Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Paisley. The stalls in the boxes, next to the place of exit are given to the contributions from Shetland, Dunstable, and Luton.

The door of exit is separated by a thin partition from the door of entrance; it leads into the box lobby, from which visitors pass into the lower saloon. This noble room is divided into a central hall, and two spacious wings. The wing through which we enter is occupied by the Sheffield stall, and exhibits a gorgeous display of the articles for the manufacture of which that town has long been celebrated. In the central hall are arranged the contributions from the iron works of Colebrookdale, equally remarkable for the exquisiteness of their artistic design and the extraordinary finish of their execution. The remaining wing is assigned to the contributions from the Potteries, which consist of porcelain, chinaware, and similar products of the plastic art.

We next ascend the staircase leading from the central saloon to the upper boxes, and may at our choice go on to the upper saloon, or take a view of the Gothic Hall from the second circle of boxes. The upper saloon is the only part of the Exposition to which daylight is admitted. It has been papered and fitted up for the present occasion by Messrs. Hennell and Crosby, who have here introduced a novel style of decoration, which we deem likely to be very extensively popular. Free-Trade mottoes, selected with great taste and ingenuity, are enclosed in rich medallions, which form part of the design of the paper-hangings, and produce a most pleasing effect. We think that this style of decoration might be very effectively introduced into nurseries and schools, and be thus rendered subservient to the purposes of education. The upper saloon is designed for the exhibition of machinery, models, and works of art, and also as a place for promenade and conversation.

Leaving the saloon, visitors will obtain a very fine view of the Gothic Hall, and of the busy scene below in the body of the house, from the circle of the upper boxes. The lobby leads out on a winding staircase, which conducts to the hall in Prince's-place and the gate of exit. Visitors will not be allowed to retrace their steps through the house, as this would produce great inconvenience from crowds crossing in contrary directions.

We must now venture behind the scenes. At the Manchester side of the stage is a door leading to a gallery of apartments fitted up as dressing-rooms for the ladies; these are six in number, and are furnished with all suitable conveniences. At the end of the gallery is a large saloon, commonly called the king's-room, where refreshments are provided for the ladies attending stalls. The private boxes at each end of the house are also reserved for their use, and will be available for the meetings of sub-committees of stall-keepers.

On the opposite side of the house is a similar gallery of apartments, which includes two dressing-rooms for gentlemen, a refreshment-room, a committee-room (the old green-room), the superintendent's room, the chairman's room, the secretary's room, and the clerk's room. Opposite to the latter is a flight of stairs, descending to a suite of rooms on a level with the street, and in this range is situated the editor's room and the printing-office of this journal.

All necessary information respecting the means and cost of conveyance to and from the theatre will be found in the "League Guide to London," which, as we have already mentioned, may be purchased (price 6d.) at the door of the theatre.

The arrangements of the theatre and decorations were not completed, until late in the day of Wednesday, to such an extent as would admit the laying out and display of the goods in the greater part of the stalls; but by the zealous exertions of the ladies and their assistants, many of whom remained up the whole night, nearly all the stalls were completed when the doors were thrown open to the public, a little after twelve o'clock. We shall now name the stalls in the order in which they are numbered, briefly describing the chief contents of each.

No. 1, or first box on the entrance, is the NORTHAMPTON Stall. It contains a large assortment of boots and shoes, executed in better taste, and with finer finish, than any that have been ever produced in Paris. It affords a striking proof that no protection is necessary to British industry and ingenuity, and that our artisans, if allowed to contest with foreigners on equal terms, would have no reason to dread competition.

Nos. 2, 3, and 4. ROCHDALE.—This stall is very rich in decorated articles of furniture, the work of the ladies of Rochdale. There are several pieces of flannel, which is the staple manufacture of the town, and a large supply of plain calicoes. Among the Rochdale contributions, the most complete of their kind, though not the most showy, are several night-dresses for ladies, made of Irish linen, and beautifully trimmed.

No. 5. HALIFAX.—The contributions which have been forwarded to Covent-garden Theatre, for the Halifax stall, show that the skillful and industrious people of that important district are as zealous as ever in the good cause of Free Trade; and also that they are not a whit behind other manufacturing towns in the variety, the beauty, and the ingenuity of their productions. To begin with royalty—for your true Leaguers are as loyal as they are patriotic—we must first notice the Queen's aprons. Some time ago Messrs. Thomas Gregory and Brothers, of Shelf, in the parish of Halifax, manufactured, and presented to her Majesty, a royal apron. It was made from the fleece of a favourite alpaca belonging to the Queen; and was most graciously accepted by her Majesty. The design, which was suited to the occasion, was exceedingly well executed. At the bottom of the apron is a handsome border, on which are the royal arms, and on each side of them is a beautiful figure of Britannia; the remainder of the space being filled with elegant drapery and flowers. In the centre of the apron is the royal crown, illumined by the rays of the sun, and surrounded by a truly national wreath composed of the rose, thistle, and shamrock. On each side of the apron is a border composed of various devices, flowers, &c.; and the whole is a magnificent specimen of what the jacquard engine is able to produce. Thirty of these aprons, made from the finest alpaca wool, have been presented to the Bazaar, by Messrs. Gregory; and will, we doubt not, be eagerly bought up by our fair countrywomen. Several carpets and rugs, of most exquisite workmanship and surpassing beauty, have been contributed by Messrs. John Crossley and Sons, of Halifax. These carpets are manufactured by a patent process; and, for richness of colour, elegance of design, and durability of texture, are, we believe, equal, if not superior, to anything of the kind ever exhibited in this country. From the spirited and wealthy firm of Messrs. James Akroyd and Son, there is a splendid and valuable collection of dresses and damasks, as novel in pattern as they are exquisite in texture and in colour. The artists of the town have also contributed some of their productions; and amongst the most prominent we may notice the Halifax coat of arms, painted for the occasion by Mr. G. Hedley; "Reading the LEAGUE," a shoemaker at his work, and his daughter reading to him the LEAGUE newspaper, painted by Mr. S. Baldwin; "an Algerine waiting to attack a Caravan," painted by Mr. Joshua Horner; and a very pretty water-colour landscape, by Mr. Elijah Crabtree, who, in contributing it, jocosely signs himself Crabtree. Several books have been presented, with the autographs of the writers; and there is a goodly array of needlework, and other fancy articles, from the industrious hands of the gentler sex. In concluding this notice, however, we must not omit to mention one peculiar feature of the Halifax contributions, viz., twenty fine home-fed and home-cured Yorkshire hams, enough to tempt the most fastidious epicure of "the land of Cockayne," and proving beyond a doubt, that, if they can promote the great object of the League, the good people of Halifax are not careful to "save their bacon."

No. 6. LEEDS.—This great metropolis of the ancient staple manufacture of England is well represented by a splendid variety of woollen goods, which completely fill the box in the rear. The front of the stall displays a great variety of needlework, and packets of thread, sewing cottons, &c.

Nos. 7 and 8. BRADFORD.—The principal contents of this stall are merinos for ladies' dresses, of which there is an almost overwhelming variety. In texture they are superior to any that have been produced on the Continent, and they fully equal the merinos of France in richness of colour. We were much struck with the taste manifested in the display of the article; they are festooned with very picturesque effect.

No. 9. PECKHAM.—The ladies of the Camberwell and Peckham stall have sent us the following list:—A most splendid specimen of penmanship, consisting of an extract from a sermon delivered at the New Meeting (Kidderminster) on the demise of the much-lamented Princess Charlotte, beautifully executed in the form of a funeral urn; contributed by Miss Linthorne. Elegant table-covers, beautifully constructed, of a rich cloth, with worked borders and bouquets of flowers in the centre, with sumptuous ottomans to match; from Frome; contributed by Mrs. Wood. A most elegant solid carved rosewood chair, covered with rich striped tabinet; manufactured and contributed by the workmen at Mr. William's furniture manufactory, Union-street, Borough. A very unique and ancient specimen bottle of sack (the friend of Calatoff), bearing date 1642; contributed by Mr. Bell. A very beautiful wrought purse, ornamented with silk flowers, brought from Constantinople. Very curious and beautiful specimens of art (the Norman Peasant Girl), accurately dressed in the costume of her country, brought from Normandy; contributed by Mr. W. S. Shove, of Blackheath. An elegant specimen of silk flower work, beautifully wrought on a ground of rich black satin, with bouquet of flowers and wheat in the centre; contributed by Mrs. Heywood. Two most exquisitely finished pencil drawings (The Gleamer, and Spanish Boy), designed and contributed by Mrs. Donkin. A very handsome music-stool, with rich covering, &c., contributed by Miss Fisher. A beautiful quilted shawl, with rich border; executed and contributed by Mrs. Williamson, of Rippon. A beautiful specimen of silk patchwork; executed and contributed by Mrs. Martin.

No. 10. ISLINGTON.—The gem of this stall, and one of the most interesting articles in the entire exposition, is a copy, in needlework, of Landseer's celebrated picture of "Hawking," which is in the possession of Lord Francis Egerton, and which many of our readers will remember to have seen displayed at one of the exhibitions of the Manchester Mechanics' Institute. There are also some exquisite water-colour drawings, one of which, "A View of Dover Castle," exhibits extraordinary mastery over the effects of light and shade in realizing the ideas of depth and extent.

No. 11. CITY.—This is a very miscellaneous stall, but its principal contents are embroidered articles, manufactured by ladies.

No. 12. KENSINGTON.—In addition to articles of embroidery, this stall contains a very elegant assortment of children's dresses.

No. 13. CAMDEN.—This is a very miscellaneous stall. In its front is a copy, in glass, of the Nelson pillar, in Trafalgar-square, with a beautiful thermometer attached; a revolving clock, of very singular workmanship, to which we shall direct more attention in a future number; a copy of Chantrey's statue of Watt, executed in ivory, by the Cheverton process (a recent discovery, by which busts and statues can be copied in any size, and in any material, with the most perfect mathematical accuracy); a skeleton clock, and some beautiful specimens of embroidery, contributed by the Ladies Bouverie. Above the stall are suspended some splendid Indian kincaubs, from the shawl manufactory of Delhi; and some printed Cashmere shawls, from Crayford, in Kent. These shawls are scarcely inferior either in texture or colour to the celebrated shawls and scarfs of the vale of Cashmere itself.

We must defer, for the present, our notice of the book-stall and refreshment-room, which are not yet completely arranged; and we may here add, that we shall revert more particularly in future numbers to articles of taste and vertù, displayed upon the stalls; but for the present we must confine ourselves to generalities. We may, however observe, that Miss Martineau's contribution, "Dawn Island," may be had at the book-stall.

Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18 and 19. MANCHESTER.—The great metropolis of the manufacturing districts, and cradle of Free Trade, has occupied six large stalls, and has sent contributions sufficient to supply three times as many more.

No. 14 contains, among other valuable articles, a copy of the Nautilus cradle, that was manufactured for the Prince of Wales. A likeness of the infant prince, executed in wax, accompanies the cradle. There are also two models of beds, which will be highly appreciated by those who are furnishing a doll's house. Suspended against the wall is a bed-cover, which is the most extraordinary specimen of knitting we have ever seen. On each side of this, and continued to the two adjoining stalls, are some fine specimens of Manchester goods, including furniture chintzes, mousselines de laine, printed cashmeres for ladies' dresses, and balzorines.

In No. 15 we were much struck with a handsome case of stuffed birds, and a feather pelorine of very beautiful workmanship.

No. 16 contains a hundred children's dresses, contributed by one lady; a Free-Trade table-cloth, ornamented with portraits of Cobden and Bright, wrought into the damasking; and an abundance of patterns, of Free-Trade waistcoats, wrought of the richest silk, and decorated with the League pattern of the wheat-sheaf.

At stall No. 17 we noticed a beautiful collection of purses, mounted with gold, and decorated with real stones; a splendid chain, most richly embroidered, and a great variety of elegant shawls.

At No. 18 is the finest embroidered chair in the whole exposition; several covers for ottomans and sofas; and a great display of fancy needlework.

No. 20 is the first of the Scotch stalls, nearly all of which are filled with useful articles. This, the first of the series, is almost wholly occupied by contributions from Dunfermline, consisting of diapers, linens, &c.

DUNDEE and PAISLEY, occupy stall 21, which, however, only displays the name of the latter town, probably because its magnificent shawls overshadow other contributions. These are suspended in very tasteful festoons from the two higher arches of boxes, and when seen from the opposite side of the stage have a most pleasing and ornamental effect. Considerable skill and ingenuity have been displayed in their arrangement.

No. 22 is the EDINBURGH stall.—The front counter exhibits a very rich and varied collection of fancy articles, while the boxes behind are covered with pictures, painted teatrays, and handkerchiefs; festoons of Shetland shawls and embroidered scarfs are suspended from the boxes above, and have a light, airy effect, from the peculiar folds taken by the fleecy material.

Nos. 23, 24. GLASGOW.—This stall is one of the most thoroughly utilitarian in the Bazaar. It has a very rich variety of printed dresses for ladies, including muslin, balzorines, and mousselines de laine, all of which are ticketed at manufacturers' prices, and considering the fineness of their texture, and the beauty of their patterns, are wonderfully cheap.

The DUNSTABLE stall, No. 26, is a miscellaneous assortment of fancy work, and is not, at present, complete.

The LUTON stall, No. 27, is wholly occupied by straw-bonnets, so that the box at the entrance provides for the feet, and that at the exit for the head.

We should have been glad, had our space permitted, to have given in full the reports which appeared in all the daily papers of Friday of the opening of the great League Bazaar. The Sun and Globe of Thursday, the Times, the Morning Chronicle, the Advertiser, the Post, and the Morning Herald of Friday, have generally done impartial justice to the exhibition, and, with the exception of slight inaccuracies on matters of little importance, we have no fair grounds of complaint. The following report, in full, from the columns of the Morning Herald, is, perhaps, the best testimony we can give to our readers of the general effect of an exhibition which has commanded so much commendation at the hands of an avowed adversary:—

"The Anti-Corn-Law League Bazaar, which has, for several months past, occupied the heads and fingers of all the male and female members of the League, was opened this day at noon, at Covent-garden Theatre. Notwithstanding the very unfavourable weather and the high price of the tickets of admission, the attendance at the doors was very numerous, and the staircase, saloons, and lobbies—even the body of the house itself,—was soon full to overflowing. The arrangements to prevent confusion appeared, however, to be very excellent, and to be well carried out by the stewards, so that, although visitors were almost subjected to the peine forte et dure during their transit, there was no complaint, but each appeared content to groan and bear it. The public were admitted only through the chief entrance in Bow-street, from whence they ascended, as during the dramatic exhibitions at the theatre, up the grand staircase to the Shakspeare saloon, now fitted up with tapestry, carpets, shawls, &c., so agreeably to resemble the show-room of a mercer. In this place also is a magnificent mirror, one such as giants only should survey themselves in, also an interesting stall of chemical preparations; and a box from Darlestone, in Staffordshire, containing coal and iron, the latter in its various stages from the rudest ore to the most polished and tempered metal, which is capable of being wrought by human ingenuity. In the box lobby on the left is a stall for Miller's glass-works, containing many remarkable curiosities, and also the apparatus at work by which they are produced, and glass thread is woven into soft and beautiful fabrics. Passing on to the centre of the lobby we find two boxes are removed, and come suddenly upon a scene so novel and romantic, so incongruous and grotesque, that for a moment we could fancy ourselves transported to the east, and about to deal with Turks and Mussulmans instead of the demure 'Friends,' in drab or lilac, who officiate at the stalls or throng so thickly below us. Certainly, in its palmy days, no visitor to Covent-garden ever witnessed on its stage a more complete transformation. The whole area of the pit and stage is boarded over, and transformed into a 'Norman-Gothic hall,' with an arched roof, gaily decorated, and supported on each side by rows of ornamental pillars. The sides are covered with imitation panelling, with grotesque ornaments and devices, and numerous Free-Trade mottoes. At the extreme end is a large Gothic window so prepared and lit up as to resemble stained glass; there are also similar windows at the sides, and from the roof are suspended rows of illuminated lamps, which cast a rich but subdued light over the hall, and add very much to the beauty of the spectacle. We understand the whole of these arrangements were devised by Mr. Sloman, the machinist of the theatre, and Mr. Grieve, the well-known scenic painter, and carried into effect, under their superintendence, by Mr. Edwards, of Manchester. Descending a few steps we find ourselves in the body of the hall, which is 150 feet long by 50 feet wide, and is occupied by four rows of stalls, each about a yard in width, but divided into various lengths, in proportion to the wants of the occupants, and the value of their merchandise. Upon the stage, where the hall is wider, and in the refreshment room, there are additional stalls. The length of the counters is said to be 900 feet, and the whole appears to have been used to the best advantage. The stalls are not numbered, nor are the holders' names affixed to them, but they appear to have been allotted according to certain localities, the names of which are hung over them. Thus, on passing the slips in the centre boxes, we find the boxes on each side converted into stalls, the one being allotted to Northampton, and the other to Dunstable, and respectively filled with the staple commodities of these places—shoes and bonnets. Upon entering the hall we saw the stalls on the right allotted to Rochdale, Halifax, Leeds, and Bradford. These, as they are first in order, appeared to us also to be first in merit, both as to the quality of the articles displayed, and the taste shown in their arrangement. They contained chiefly fancy articles of needlework, toys of various descriptions, carpets, shawls, materials of various kinds for ladies' dresses and curiosities, among which may be mentioned a piece of muslin, printed by the late Sir Robert Peel, and a pen-and-ink portrait of the Queen, the lines of which, instead of being blank, are written words, and comprise the whole contents of a book which is attached to, and descriptive of, it. This singular specimen of ingenuity is to be raffled for at 2s. 6d. a head, and, strange to say, we saw several Quaker ladies pressing forward to have their names set down as gamblers for it. Opposite these stalls, and on the right centre of the hall, are the stalls allotted to Northampton, Stockport, Swansea, Carlisle, York, Stockton, Hull, Beverley, and Bristol. Then comes, at right angles, the Newcastle stall, followed by those of Huddersfield, Barnsley, Wakefield, and Bloomsbury, and the Kentish town stalls. Opposite these, and on this side the stage, are the stalls appropriated to the metropolitan districts, which are described as Peckham, Islington, City, Kensington, Camden-town, Sussex, Norwood, Pentonville, Hoxton, St. Martin's, and the Savoy. The stalls in the curved line at the top, which unites the two central lines of stalls, are allotted to Sheffield. The refreshment room is appropriately allotted to refreshment-stalls, with the single exception of a book stall, and is much resorted to by visitors, who really need some refreshment after their toil.

some and tedious passage to it. But, next to the creams and ices vended there, the chief object of attraction is a huge plum cake,—a cake, the idea of which could, we think, have occurred in a dream only to some imaginative schoolboy,—so vast in its expanse, so ponderous its size, so rich its ingredients, so delicious its fragrance. It is a Bury Simnel, and measures, we should think, some five feet in diameter, weighs 280lbs., and bears upon its broad surface a sheet of iced sugar so large as to have inscribed upon it nearly all the maxims which embody the religion of the League, and so sweet and richly ornamented as to almost induce the visitor to swallow them. We hear that it is to be cut up and distributed on the last day of the exhibition; but let the League beware how they previously admit a school to their Bazaar, for to resist the combined temptation of this cake and its Free-Trade inscriptions is, we think, beyond the possibility of schoolboy nature. In this room is also the 'post-office,' an ingenious device for (among other purposes) raising money, and disseminating Free-Trade doctrines. It is suggested to the visitor to knock and inquire if they have a letter for him, and upon his supplying them with his name and address, he is himself, in due time, supplied with a packet (not pre-paid), which, on receiving, he finds filled with League tracts and other Free-Trade publications. The scheme was so successful that the arrival of a 'foreign mail' was soon notified, and of course it brought with it a despatch for every applicant, and at the foreign rate of postage. Leaving the refreshment-room, but not before examining at the book-stall an ancient mass-book, printed at Madrid, with the music on the old system of notation, we return to the stage, and see before us on the right centre the stalls of Gloucester, Norwich, Exeter, Dudley, Warrington, Preston, and Lancaster. At the Dudley stall were some interesting fossils and mineral specimens from that place. The Lancaster stall, among other articles of interest, exhibited a miniature bedstead in mahogany, of very elegant construction; and the chief object of interest at the Preston stall was a model carriage made by the Preston Guild, which was certainly a pleasing exhibition of the taste and ingenuity of our countrymen. It was complete in all its appointments, and was offered for £35. Near to these was the Liverpool stall, at which was exhibited, together with miscellaneous fancy articles, as baskets, lace collars, book markers, &c., 'a lock of Sir Walter Scott's hair,' price £3. 3s.; and a wax medallion 'Portrait of R. R. Moore, Esq., with autograph,' price 15s. Of the latter there was a large supply at many of the stalls, but we are unable to speak as to the demand for them. There were also autographs, ad libitum, of Mr. H. Smith's 'Stanzas on the Bazaar,' and of the most renowned Free-Traders. Near these, and returning on the right, are the six stalls assigned to Manchester, three of which are in recesses illuminated by transparencies representing stained glass windows. These stalls contain a very elegant assortment of fancy articles, chiefly made by ladies. Among others, we particularly noticed some elegant painted satin and velvet cushions. One or two magnificent chairs having backs and seats covered with beautiful needlework, some elegant shawls and children's fancy dresses. There was also a nautilus cradle, in imitation of that made for the royal nursery, which excited general admiration. Opposite the Manchester stalls were those of Staleybridge, Ashton-under-Lyne, and Bury. At the Ashton stall were several curiosities, from an old black-letter volume of 1568, entitled 'The Dial of Princes,' price £6, to a prize shoe made without seam or stitch by some ingenious local artist. Bury, also, was not without its curiosities, for it contributed a huge bear's paw, with a goodly collection of children's frocks, carpeting, and paintings and engravings. Returning still, we have on either hand the Scotch stalls and those of the Midland Counties. The tributary towns in Scotland are Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Paisley, Shetland, and Dunfermline. Edinburgh sends chiefly miscellaneous toys, Paisley shawls, and the others ladies' work, toys, shawls, and table-linen. On the other hand, the Midland Counties also send chiefly their staple manufactures, as Nottingham, lace; Leicester, lace and hosiery; Coventry, ribbons, and a newly-invented gimp for bonnets; Birmingham, a handsome collection of hardware and fancy goods, in every respect of very superior quality; Bolton supplies a number of handsome footstools, slippers, and articles of that description, with autograph letters of the 'Rev. J. Fletcher,' and other eminent personages. Having thus traversed the body of the hall, we again ascend the steps through the boxes and, availing ourselves of the ample directions posted about, soon find our way through the lobby into the lower saloon, where we find collected the contributions of Sheffield, Colebrookdale, and the Potteries. And here, in our humble judgment, is to be seen the best portion of the exhibition. The Sheffield department contains contributions of the staple manufactures of that place, and the specimens are in the highest degree creditable to the enterprise, ingenuity, and skill of our manufacturers and artisans. Here are instruments and tools of almost every description, both of material and quality, and workmanship, from the revolving saw, which cuts through steel bars or gnarled oaks as easily as a knife divides a twig, to scissors, needles, and other things appurtenant to a lady's work-box, so minute, yet so highly finished and exquisitely modelled, that one might imagine them 'made to order' for Titania and her attendant fairies. There are also instruments of various kinds, so highly polished as to reflect the countenance like mirrors; and such a collection of knives, forks, spoons, surgical instruments, and ingenious tools of all descriptions as are rarely seen in London. Many of these, too, were much admired for their admirable finish, and the beautiful execution of several ornaments and devices adapted to the occasion, among which we may particularly mention a large pair of shears, on which were exhibited excellent full-length portraits of Mr. Bright and Mr. Cobden. The exhibition from Colebrookdale, in the centre of this saloon, was no less attractive and no less worthy of attention. It consisted chiefly of ornamental iron works, in some of which our native artists appeared to have attained perfection. There were vases, fountains, bronzes, striking portraits of Messrs. Cobden, Bright, and Villiers. American rocking chairs, and iron chairs of several descriptions, garden seats, and similar articles in great profusion, almost every one of which had round it a knot of admirers, who were loud in their eulogiums. At the other end of the saloon were china and earthenware from the Potteries; but as these were only partially unpacked we saw but little of them. The upper saloon has been newly decorated for the occasion, having Free-Trade mottoes enclosed in medallions, on the hangings, the effect of which is novel and interesting. Stepping from this saloon into the upper circle, to take a bird's-eye view of the whole exhibition before leaving it, the spectacle is very fine and animating. The effect produced by the softened light of the rows of illuminated lamps, both upon the splendid roof and pillars, and the busy scene below, was very beautiful. It was also amusing to see the diligence in business of the amateur shopkeepers, and the difficulty with which, from the pressure of the crowd, a customer maintained his ground until he could complete a bargain. The impression produced was that the place was much too small both for the satisfactory exhibition of the goods, and for the accommodation of visitors. Probably to this cause we should attribute the absence of much of that taste in the arrangements of the stalls that is customary on such occasions. As it was, the articles generally were rather heaped together than displayed, which made the counters more resemble those of the wholesale than the retail dealer. There was also a palpable want of variety in the articles exhibited, more than three-fourths of the stalls consisting of miscellaneous articles of fancy needlework, which, however pretty in themselves, lost their interest when the view of them was so frequently repeated. As a Ladies' Bazaar, however, the experiment on the whole appeared to be successful. But as a great 'national exhibition' of our arts and manufactures by those of our manufacturers and artisans who are interested in Free Trade, which some of the Free-Traders affect to call it, the affair must be pronounced a total failure. With the exceptions we have particularly noticed, even those exhibitions of staple manufactures that were made contained very little in them peculiarly worthy of remark; and we feel satisfied they would never have been sent to that of France in this country. As to the attendance, it was, throughout the day, extremely numerous, a great number of the visitors being evidently from the country, brought up, probably, by the double inducement of the Bazaar and the May meetings. Among the persons present we noticed Sir J. C. Hobhouse, M.P., Sir De Lacy Evans, Mr. Pitterson, M.P., Mr. Bright, M.P., Mr. M. Gibson, M.P., Mr. Brotherton, M.P., Mr. Hutt, M.P., Mr. Wilson, Mr. P. A. Taylor, and other noted Leaguers. The attendance of members of the Society of Friends, both male and female, was also very numerous. The prices of the various articles appeared to be quite as high as is customary on such occasions. We should add that a musical band was in attendance throughout the day, and played a number of popular airs very effectively."

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW BAZAAR.

Internal Arrangements for the Bazaar.

The prices of admission are as follows:—

	s.	d.
Saturday, May 10, day of Exhibition	5	0
Monday, " 12, Sale of Articles	2	6
Each succeeding day, do.	1	0

The theatre opens on the days of exhibition and sale at twelve o'clock—noon.

The entrance for the public is from Bow-street, up the Grand Staircase, and along a passage cut through the centre boxes of the Dress Circle into the body of the Theatre, thrown into the form of a "GOTHIC HALL;" and the visitors then pass along the stalls, and retire by the Hart-street side of the Theatre, so that the in-coming and out-going streams of visitors do not come into collision.

The Entrance for ladies attending the stalls, and the members of the Committee of Management, is at the Stage-door in Hart-street. Tickets are provided for all persons who are entitled to admission at the private entrance, without which no individual can, under any circumstances, be allowed to pass.

Carriages are to set down in Bow-street, and take up in Prince's-place, Hart-street.

THE SPECIAL RAILWAY TRAINS.

From Manchester, &c., to London.

The following arrangements are now completed:—The Trains for the convenience of parties residing in Manchester, Oldham, Bury, Stockport, Ashton, Stalybridge, Bolton, Rochdale, &c., will leave the Station of the Manchester and Birmingham Railway Company, London-road, Manchester, on the following days, each morning at Eight o'clock precisely:—

Saturday, May 10th, returning on Saturday, the 17th, giving six clear days in London.

Monday, May 12th, returning on Wednesday, the 21st, giving eight clear days in London.

Wednesday, May 14th, returning on Monday, the 26th, giving eleven clear days in London.

Arrangements have been made by which the whole journey will be performed in nine hours.

The RETURN TRAINS to Manchester will leave the Euston-square Station, London, on the above-named days, each morning at Nine o'clock.

Fares—For First-class Carriages (both ways), 38s. Second-class do., 29s.

From Liverpool to London.

Arrangements have been made for two Special Trains between London and Liverpool. One will leave Liverpool on Saturday, the 10th of May, at Eight o'clock A.M., and return on Saturday, the 17th of May, at Eight o'clock A.M. A second Train will leave Liverpool on Thursday, the 15th of May, at Eight o'clock A.M., and return on Monday, the 26th of May, at Eight o'clock A.M.

Applications for tickets must be made at the office of the Anti-Monopoly Association, 7, Water-street, Liverpool.

First-class (up and down inclusive) . . 42s.
Second-class (ditto) . . 30s.

From the West Riding of Yorkshire to London.

Arrangements have been made with the Midland and the London and Birmingham Railway Companies for Three Special Trains to London, namely:—

Saturday, May 10th, to return on Thursday, the 15th.

Wednesday, May 14th, to return on Monday, the 19th.

Saturday, May 17th, to return on Saturday, the 24th.

These trains will take up passengers at the places named, at the following scale of fares:—

	First Class.	Second Class.	Time of Departure.

And will arrive in London at 7 P.M.

The Down Trains will leave London at 9 30 P.M., and will occupy the same time in returning as in going up.

Tickets from Leeds to London may be had of Mr. T. MORGAN, 20, Commercial-buildings; and as the number by each train is necessarily limited for each town of the West Riding, and it has been arranged with the Railway Companies that the sale of tickets for each train shall close two days before the starting of each, it is earnestly requested that parties intending to avail themselves of these trains will apply as early as possible.

N.B. Luggage to each passenger limited to 50lbs., both first and second class; and it is to be distinctly understood that the Midland and the London and Birmingham Railway Companies, respectively, will not be liable, under any circumstances, for any passenger's luggage.

From Preston to London.

The Preston Train will start early on Whit Monday morning, and join the Liverpool one at the Warrington Junction. First-class fare, there and back, from Preston to London, not to exceed £2. 6s. 6d.; Second-class, £1. 15s.

From Derby, Nottingham, and Leicester to London.

Special Trains, containing a limited number of first and second class carriages, will leave Derby, Nottingham, and Leicester for London, on Saturday, the 10th, returning on the 15th; on Monday the 12th, returning on the 17th of May, there and back for one fare.

Passengers may exchange Return Tickets with each other as may suit their convenience.

Bath . .	11.35 a.m.	28s. 6d. 19s.

The Return Trains will leave Paddington at half-past two o'clock in the afternoons of the 14th and 15th instant.

As the company can only undertake to provide a limited number of carriages for these excursions, the tickets must be taken and paid for at the respective stations on or before Saturday the 10th instant, to secure places.

Any passenger wishing to return by the regular passenger trains on any day during that week, will be allowed the half cost of the excursion ticket, upon paying up the difference of fare for the journey back.

Further information may be obtained at the abovementioned stations on the Great Western Railway.

By order of the Directors,
1st May, 1845. CHAS. A. SAUNDERS, Secretary.

Gloucester, Cheltenham, &c.

Special Trains will run from Cheltenham, Gloucester, Stroud, and Cirencester, both on Monday and Tuesday, the 12th and 13th of May, returning on Thursday and Saturday; fare, there and back, 21s.

Newcastle, Sunderland, Shields, &c., to London.

A Special Train will leave Gateshead, for London, on Thursday, the 15th inst., at six o'clock in the morning. Passengers from Shields and Sunderland will be taken up at the Brockley Whins Station, and from Durham at the Belmont Station.

Owing to the great demand for tickets, and to guard against delay on the line, and inconvenience to passengers, there will be no third-class carriages, but the fares will be reduced to the following low scale:—Fares, there and back—

First-class passengers . . . £2 14s.

Second-class passengers . . . 1 18

Passengers from Sunderland and Shields must be at these stations in time for the train leaving at a quarter before six, for Brockley Whins, where they will join the train from Gateshead.

A train will leave Durham at a quarter before seven.

As the train will consist of a limited number of carriages, tickets cannot be had at the intermediate stations after Tuesday, the 13th; and it is, therefore, particularly requested that parties will apply in time to prevent disappointment.

The carriages will leave the Euston-square Station to return on Friday, the 23rd.

The hour of departure will be announced before that day at the Euston-square Station, and at the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street.

DANIEL LIDDELL, Agent to the League.

LAMENTABLE DELUSIONS IN NORFOLK AMONG SOME FARMERS WHO HAVE HEARD TELL OF THE LEAGUE.

The following letter was written by a friend visiting in Norfolk, in the summer of 1844, and sent at that time to a London morning paper, in which, however, it was not inserted.

The culture of Norfolk flax, mentioned in this letter, is an interesting subject. But I wish more particularly to present to draw attention to a topic which arises incidentally out of the flax question; one which the members of the League have no doubts upon, but in respect of which the Norfolk flax growers seem to be deplorably deluded; namely, whether the manufacturers of flax, being Free-Traders, are, or can be, friends of the Norfolk farmers.

I need say nothing of the Messrs. Marshall, of Leeds, in addition to what they say for themselves to Mr. Warnes, of Norfolk, in their letter here quoted. Neither need I offer to refute farther than it is done in the following letter, the stupid—yes, the absurdly stupid—assertion which the Flax Society of Norfolk puts forth, that the Free-Traders are the "enemies of agriculture, the advocates of national bankruptcy!" and of the application of the sponge to the national debt!"

Yet, though such nonsense is known to be nonsense, it may be a question how far it is proper to allow it to circulate without its antidote among the imperfectly informed farmers and timid owners of small landed property, who look upon such men as the heads of the Norfolk Flax Society as oracles of wisdom and truth.

Upon the other hand, if such people will not read anything but the selected contents of their own county newspaper,—got up for their party, to support it, and it solely, not to enlighten them with public facts,—there seems to be little hope of informing them of what is good for them to know.

In a little book, to be sold for one shilling, entitled "A Brief History of the Rise and Progress of the Anti-Corn-Law League, with Personal Notices of above Three Hundred of its leading Members, the kind of Business they are engaged in," &c., which is just published, and which will be found at the doors of Covent-garden Theatre during the Bazaar (or as advertised in the LEAGUE), an array of names and facts appear together, which will afford a curious commentary on the assertion of the Norfolk Flax Society, that the Free-Traders are the advocates of national bankruptcy.

I would refer particularly to the matter descriptive of factories and factory work, and of commerce, which follows the first names in the alphabetical list, "Ashton," "Ashworth," &c. These notices of manufacturing and commercial interests must make that singular notion of the owners of such interests being advocates of national bankruptcy appear to be a very singular notion indeed.

The comparative value of factory and farm labour, in respect of enabling the labourers to consume the products of the English farms, will also be found stated at some length. I may remark, that the names of manufacturers to which lengthened articles descriptive of their business are appended have been chosen, not that they are in any way remarkable above others, but that it was necessary to make a selection, and that the first names in alphabetical order were preferred.

I am, &c.,

REUBEN.

THE LETTER FROM NORFOLK.

"I am exceedingly anxious that public attention should be universally directed to the flax movement. We only need a ready market for the fibre to make it surpass all crops that ever grew from English soil for profit. Even now, merely for the seed to mix with barley, or peas, or potatoes, or hay, or turnips, or parts of all these combined, to fatten cattle and sheep, and reproduce fertilizing manures for the wheat crops, the growth of flax is equal in profit to anything else.

"But when we add the value of the fibre, when properly prepared so as to suit our manufacturers, the worth of this plant to British agriculturists is of vast and, as yet, unspeakable price.

"But the growers must not, as in Norfolk, expect and attempt to bring down the manufacturers of it to their level; they must endeavour to rise to the level of the manufacturers. They must not expect the redemption of the labourers and the re-establishment of profitable employment in Norfolk, by attempting to march backward to the customs and feeble appliances of two hundred years ago. They must turn their faces, their hands, and their hopes forward.

"In most of the speeches made at the meetings, and in all the published pamphlets, I find the Norfolk Flax Society, so long as it existed, was devoted more to class warfare than to the encouragement of the growth of flax. It is difficult to say whether the pamphlets were circulated by the society for the purpose of decrying the Free-Trade party known by the name of the "League," or for the purpose of supporting the growers of Norfolk flax. To warn others I shall point out a few of the suicidal mistakes of that society.

"In one of its reports, dated March, 1843 (page 8), its chief writer speaks of Free-Trade advocates as 'that party which would delight to revel in the ruins of agriculture and in the application of the sponge to the national debt.'

"Now, first of the sponge to the national debt. Does any person seriously believe that commercial men have not the greatest of all interests at stake in the credit and stability of the nation? Are such capitalists as Samuel Jones Lloyd; as William Brown, who could borrow two millions sterling from the Bank of England on his own note of hand, and who transacted business in a single year to the extent of ten millions sterling; are such men as the Gunneys of Norwich, and a hundred more throughout the kingdom, who are capitalists like them, and advocates of Free Trade; are they not interested in the stability of national credit?

"If there is one thing that more than another secures England from revolution, it is the vast complication of her commercial interests. The landed property, merely as such, might undergo revolutions every year and be little the worse; it would remain in its place, and the plough and the harrow would make it next year what it was the last year. But commercial credit and the vast intricacies of trade, and the refined and complicated mechanism of the factories, could not survive internal warfare and political convulsions. Those nations where property is only in land, as in Spain, can afford to have a revolution every six months, and be little the worse. If the Yorkshire and Lancashire factories were on strike for a single month, England would receive a shock greater than Spain or any other purely agricultural country has felt in any of their revolutions for these last thirty years.

"No, gentlemen of Norfolk; so far from the Free-Traders being advocates of sponging out the national debt and blasting national credit, they have, of all other people in these kingdoms, the greatest desire to preserve national credit. And I am afraid you must be charged with having knowingly and wilfully calumniated them when in the proceedings of your society you charged them with this design. Surely you would not have the world believe that you are so ill-informed and so weak of mind as to have believed that you were speaking the truth.

"But let that ill-considered flying shot of yours at the Anti-Corn-Law League pass. Here is something of far more practical importance.

"The League is spoken of as that party which 'would delight to revel in the ruins of agriculture.'

Now, you know well that the best friends your flax-growing projects have yet had are the Messrs. Marshall, of Leeds. You know that, unsought for and unknown to you, the Messrs. Marshall, on hearing that an attempt was making to grow flax in Norfolk, volunteered their advice and services to assist you. They offered to procure for you, through their agents at Riga, the best seed for sowing on such soils as yours, and the best advice for preparing the soils, as also instruction in the dressing of the flax. And they did more: they encouraged you by their opinion that good flax could be grown in Norfolk; and promised that if you produced it they would buy it.

Was this conduct on their part like that of persons who would delight to revel in the ruins of English agriculture?

Yet, of all the subscribers to the great League fund, the Messrs. Marshall subscribed the highest. The firm subscribed £500, and the chief partner added to that amount £300 as his personal subscription. He who would, according to the flax-growers of Norfolk, be at the very head of those who delighted to revel in the ruins of your agriculture, asked, by writing to Ireland, the address of a gentleman in Norfolk to whom he might write a letter. He got the address, and in the name of the firm he thus wrote:—

Leeds, Nov. 28, 1842.

"Sir,—We have been favoured with your address by Mr. Skinner, secretary of the Society for Improving Flax in Ireland, and take the liberty of writing to you on the subject of flax-growing, as we observe from your speech at the dinner at Belfast, that you have lately set on foot a society for encouraging the growth of flax in Norfolk.

"As we import a considerable quantity of flax yearly from Belgium and Holland for our establishment here, we are, of course, much interested in the success of any plan for increasing the quantity grown in England. We have lately paid a good deal of attention to the different modes of cultivation, &c., of the plant abroad, with the view of ascertaining which was the best, and of then endeavouring to get a better system introduced in those parts of England where flax is now grown, so as to make the flax crop a more valuable one to the farmer, and induce him to extend the cultivation of it.

"We believe both the soil and climate are suitable for the plant. At one time the flax grown in the east of Yorkshire was of as good quality as that grown in Belgium; but the growth since then has very much fallen off, chiefly owing to the farmers managing the cultivation and preparation of their flax in a slovenly manner, and partly owing to the landlords having a prejudice against the crop as an exhausting one, which would not be the case if your plan was adopted of using the seed for feeding cattle on the farm where the flax is grown. * * *

The formation of such a society as you describe will be of great assistance to the farmers; and we shall have great pleasure in forwarding your views, by communicating any information that we have acquired with regard to the management of flax, &c.

"We remain your obedient servants,

"MARSHALL and Co."

This letter, coming, as it did, unasked, is surely not like a letter from those who would revel in the ruins of agriculture!

The Messrs. Marshall again wrote on the 3th of December, 1842, giving much valuable information to the Norfolk farmers on the subject of flax-growing.

But the same forgetfulness of who are the makers of the markets for beef and mutton, butter and cheese, and for corn, distinguishes not only the Norfolk Flax Society, but most other societies throughout the kingdom which are in any way related to agriculture.

In the proceedings of the Norfolk Society we have it stated, for instance, that £6,000,000 are paid every year to foreigners for flax, linseed, and oilcake, and that all this is a dead loss to the British farmer and the British nation. Whether the amount is exactly correct or not is a secondary question. The principle laid down by all the leading men of the Flax Society is this, that money sent out of the nation is a loss to the nation to the full amount of that money. They forget that it is sent abroad in exchange for something that the nation needs. They forget that the money comes from the countries in exchange for a native product to our merchants in exchange for manufactured goods which our merchants had to sell. They forget that the gold or silver not grow on their estates, and that if it had grown in Norfolk or in England, or had been dug from the mines of England, it would have been valueless to those who held it, unless they could have sold it. They forget, or they do not know, that the gold or silver is useless, either as an article of food, or of raiment, or of furniture, or for any use connected with human necessities, if it cannot be exchanged. It is neither fit for the shires nor for threshing-mills—even if it were as plentiful as our iron. They forget, or do not know, that the value of every article of commerce decreases as it becomes plentiful; and that, if gold could pour into this country without being sent out of it in payment for articles of necessity and luxury, the result would simply be, that we would have a great deal of gold of little value, with few articles of necessity and luxury; they might as well say that a shopkeeper, by selling a shilling's worth of sugar for a shilling, is sending his money out of his shop at a dead loss to himself, when he sends the shilling to another shopkeeper in payment for another article which he is in need of, but has not got in his own shop. If he has got the article in his shop or in his garden, or if he could produce it for himself at less expense than it costs him to buy it, then he is sustaining a loss in buying it.

So with the Norfolk farmers. If they can produce linseed on their own farms to fatten their own cattle while they still send abroad for it, they sustain a loss. But their loss only amounts to the difference of expense of the foreign linseed over the expense of growing their own; taken from which, however, must be the value to them of having more people employed and lower poor-rates to pay.

The members of the Norfolk Society seem to have forgotten that the gold which they pay for linseed to fatten their cattle, and to produce manure for their cornfields, came to them in payment of cattle and corn which they sold. And it came to those who purchased the beef and the bread made of the cattle and corn, because those who sell beef and bread have been paid for the work they perform as master artisans, manufacturers, merchants, and so forth. They seem to forget that they would have neither gold nor silver if they could not sell their corn and cattle. And most assuredly they do forget that, after a man's own wants are supplied, the entire value of everything he possesses is his being able to find a market for it.

Throughout the proceedings of the Norfolk Society we see them making comparisons between the labourers and gentlemen of England and the labourers and gentlemen of countries abroad. They say, "The inevitable result must soon be the fall of English gentlemen as well as English labourers to a level with foreigners, if the designs of that party be accomplished which would deprive us of the right to revel in the ruins of agriculture and in the application of the sponge to the national debt."

Now, wherefore is it that either the English gentleman or the English labourer is superior to the foreigners? Why is it that the produce of the English soil sells for so high a price, while the soil itself is not richer, a great deal of it is much inferior to the soils of continental Europe? It is neither more nor less than because the countries of continental Europe are nearly all purely agricultural, without the great manufacturing communities that England has to consume and pay for the agricultural produce.

The Norfolk Society begins in the first sentences of its pamphlets to put the cart before the horse, and though there are occasional symptoms during their proceedings that the principles of nature and common sense are about to vindicate themselves, and the horse is about to get, as it should be, before the cart, it is immediately put back again.

The raising and selling of farm produce with them is the primary question; the power of consuming and paying for it is but a secondary consideration. The actual ability of the consumers to purchase and pay is seldom mentioned; the presumed ability of Parliament to compel consumers to pay certain prices is never lost sight of.

Sir Edward Stacey says:—

"Till the middle of the reign of George III., flax was cultivated, and assistance was given by the Legislature to its cultivation; but about the middle of the reign of George III. cotton was introduced, and the consequence was, that flax vanished from use; and what had the cotton manufacture done? It had subjected the agriculturists of this country to the payment of enormous sums of money for foreign food used in fattening cattle; and had besides transferred our trade to Russia, which country now supplied us with flax and hemp for cordage."

Does Sir Edward Stacey know what the price of beef was up to the middle of the reign of George III., and what it is now?

The following, from another distinguished member of the society, is plainer. Page 9, of Report, 1843:—

"Between twenty-five and thirty millions of money were paid to foreign nations last year for grain and seeds of various kinds, hemp and flax, oilseeds and manure, and manufactured goods, &c. &c., whilst the foreign demand for, as well as the home consumption of, our own manufactures has most materially decreased. Hence the melancholy state of the operatives in the manufacturing towns. Had a few only of those millions been paid to British, Scotch, and Irish farmers, for grain and provisions, the money would have circulated at home, and a portion of the benefits been conveyed to both town and country labourers."

Now, this is plain speaking—there is no mystery here.

It is simply, "You are Peter and I am Paul; Peter should be robbed to make Paul rich!"

Many more selections might be made from the proceedings of this society; but I shall only select one more.

At a meeting of the North Walsham Farmer's Club, out of which grew on the same day the Norfolk Flax Society, Mr. F. Clowes, in seconding a resolution proposed by Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, to the effect that subscriptions should be collected in aid of the growth of flax, thus spoke:—

"He thought, in considering all the bearings of the subject, the question of leases must not be lost sight of, for under the present stringent covenants there were many who dared not venture to grow linseed, although he was ready to admit there were some who would be allowed to do so. * * * Liberal landlords, it should be recollected, made liberal tenants; and liberal covenants, they would find, was the only way by which the British farmer would be enabled to meet the competition of the foreigner." * * *

Several lords and squires listened to this speech. But not a word did they say then, or since, about giving leases, nor of liberalizing the covenants of leases already existing. But landlords must relax some of the old feudal customs still retained in the management of land, if they would see their property improved and agricultural science keep pace with the progressive spirit of the age we live in. The culture of flax promises well; the preparation of the fibre for the manufacturers being conjoined with the feeding of cattle on the seed. But all the nonsense about restoring the distaff and the spinning-wheel must be for ever discarded. The flax must be prepared in the shortest and cheapest method to ensure its ready and extensive consumption. Machines in Norfolk must compete with machines elsewhere. It is an absurd fiction that machinery used in manufacturing throws people out of employment. The steam-engine and power-loom employ ten times the number of persons in making and in working them, and in preparing and disposing of the materials of the various manufactures, than ever could have been employed had nothing superior to the spinning-wheel and the hand-loom existed. Besides which there is the advantage—and a great, good, and glorious one it is—of cheaper clothing and other domestic furnishings for the great bulk of our population; and such domestic advantages are companions of improved morality and civilization.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND THE AUCTION DUTIES.

(From the Times.)

The Duke of Richmond must have determined to do what has been oftener talked of than done—to sacrifice himself on the altar of the agricultural interest. His speech against the repeal of the auction duties is a clear case of self-immolation. A man who pleads a cause, both hopeless and contemptible, on grounds that are sure to be scouted by everybody of common sense and information, must be acting from some unrevealed motive. It is well for the Duke that he is above the imputation of a cross—a hired defeat; but he must be victimizing either himself or his party, and we have no alternative but to choose between Quixotism and treachery.

His Grace's leading argument against the repeal of these duties was, that the tenant-farmer had been already exempted from them, and, therefore, that others should not be exempted; that the duties, in fact, should be retained, because the tenant-farmer had no longer a selfish interest in their repeal. The alleged fact in this argument is a gross misstatement; the avowed principle is as gross an injustice and absurdity. The tenant-farmer is not exempted more than others. The amount of sales by auction exempted from duty in the year 1840 was £36,511,409, while the only item in which the tenant-farmer is particularly concerned, viz., "sales of cattle, live or dead stock, corn stock, or unmanufactured produce of land, whilst they continue on the land," is £2,891,112, that is, not one-twelfth of the whole. But with the addition of woods, coppices, &c., and every other admissible item, the special exemptions of the agriculturists are not a tenth of the whole. As for the principle of the above argument, it must speak for itself. Every special exemption is a legitimate reason against the continuance of a tax, not for it. If the agriculturists first get themselves out of the scrape, and then, on that ground, do their best to keep others in it, we shall take good care for the future how we give them a special exemption. We shall find it necessary, for our own sakes, to leave them interested in the removal of the general burdens.

His Grace then draws up the case of the agriculturists in the following ingenious form:—

"If the noble lord had asked the question of the farmers of the country, many of them would say, 'Give us an entire repeal of the malt-tax.' But if they asked for that the Government said, 'How can we make up for so large a deficiency?' If, again, the farmers asked to be relieved of a portion of the county-rate, it was asked what would be the use of £200,000 or £300,000 spread over all the counties of England? Thus, in one case they were told they asked too much, and in the other that what they asked would be of no use at all."

And why are not both answers quite legitimate? If a hundred of his Grace's agricultural friends in smock-frocks came to his door and asked for a fat ox, he would very probably reply that he could not spare it from his own purposes. If they immediately lowered their demand to a barndoor fowl, the most obvious reply would be,—what use was that to a hundred hungry men? When the noble patron of the Agricultural Protection Society next attempts a dilemma, he must remember not to carry his horns quite so wide apart. The object of his onslaught escapes between them.

His Grace proceeds:—

"They wanted justice to be done them; on what principle was the landed interest of the country required to pay for the apprehension of every prisoner, for his maintenance in prison, and for the prosecution?"

It is unnecessary to answer the question on what principle the landed interest does this? because it does not do this, or anything like it. The county-rates do this; and the rates are not merely on land, but on all real property, of which land is only just about half. But we cannot stop. The Duke plunges on:—

"The Government paid half the expenses of the assizes and the sessions; but why should the counties pay anything towards the assizes? The county had no control whatever of this expenditure."

The county no control whatever! Why, who are the authorities that send prisoners to the assizes? If the county had not a special interest in keeping down the expenses of the assizes, it would transfer to them the work of the sessions. The county can control this expenditure by reducing the committals, not to speak of certain influences which the aristocracy are supposed to possess over the moral condition of the country. If Government were to undertake the whole cost of the assizes it would be obliged, in self-defence, to take with it the whole responsibility of committals. What would then become of the great "unpaid?"

The next sentence solicits our attention:—

"The land was very properly made to support a clergyman in every parish; but why was it forced to supply a chaplain in every workhouse and gaol? Why should the expense be thrown exclusively on the land?"

Properly or improperly, the land does neither. Only a small portion of the land is liable to a rent-charge in lieu of tithes, which the tenant-farmer merely pays to the resident clergyman, instead of the perhaps non-resident landowner. With much more justice may it be said that the land is made to support a landlord. If, too, there happens to be no ancient endowment, what becomes of the Duke's universal burden? As for the land being forced to supply a chaplain in every workhouse and gaol, we can only repeat that all real property does this. The expense is not thrown exclusively, but only half, on the land.

This error is persisted in to the last. "The land had also to bear the whole expense of maintaining the wives and children of those confined in prison, and of men transported." We never before heard that the land possessed a monopoly of crime, and that towns did not contribute their quota of prisoners and convicts, whose wives and children they have occasionally to maintain. Houses, quarries, mines, iron-works, fisheries, canals, railways, and a thousand other forms of property divide with agriculture the supply of crime, and the expense of its consequences. And when it is remembered that more than half the inmates in many of our gaols are there for offences against the game laws and the poor laws, and have been sent there with the ultimate intention of keeping down wages, and keeping up game, it is not unreasonable that the landowner should contribute rather handsomely to the expensive expedient. The Duke, however, in the heat of his noble argument, is not content with fighting against the burden of crime, he demands for land the profit on convicts:—"If a criminal who had any property was transported, whom did that property go to? It did not go towards the county-rate, but to the Crown. When recognizances were exalted, they also went to the Crown. Was it fair that one should bear all the loss, and the other take all the profit?" We must confess that for once the Duke has the better of us. He is right here. Certainly there ought to be a county ledger of the profit and loss on criminal causes; with the prison and assize charges on one page, and per contra the felon's pigs, and chairs, and crockery. Now and then a convict does not "cut up so ill." Justice ought to be assimilated to the habits of a mercantile country. But there is an important item we are astonished to find omitted in his Grace's list of agricultural grievances. When a man is hung, whatever charges "the land" has been at on account of his confinement and trial, his clothes all go to Jack Ketch. This is monstrously unfair. The "tenant-farmers," who have been at all the loss, have an undoubted right to the profit, viz., the wretch's smockfrock and boots.

One is tempted onwards. "There was not a session that did not throw some additional expense on the land, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not care how much the county-rates were burdened." The Chancellor of the Exchequer, of course, has no sympathy with rate-payers. If the opportunity offered, he would not hesitate to sell all the landowners and tenant-farmers in the country to the Turks, and apply the proceeds towards the redemption of the national debt. But what additional expense has been thrown on the land this session? To continue. "He wished the Consolidated Fund was charged with 15 or 20 per cent. of the poor-rate; the counties would still have enough to pay to make them look after the expenditure, and by the Government bearing part of it justice would be done." In the present state of the poor law, if Government paid 15 or 20 per cent. of the expense, the only result would be, that the Duke of Richmond would send 15 or 20 per cent. more of his labourers, their wives, and children, to the union-workhouse, and screw down wages 15 or 20 per cent. lower. If this answered, he would soon begin to ask 50 per cent. from Government, that he might send 50 per cent. more to the union, and get his labourers at 3s. 6d. a week instead of 7s.

We are forced to deny ourselves a few general remarks we had intended on this unique piece of dual eloquence. The running commentary must suffice. This, however, we will say:—we never yet read anything so uniformly, so compactly, so commendably erroneous. His Grace has never once stumbled on common sense or veracity. Not a principle, not a sentiment, not a fact is within sight of truth or propriety. The speaker flounders along through the mud of his argument without finding one stepping stone, one bit of terra firma. It reminds us of a story we have heard of a distinguished vocalist, remarkable for the painful accuracy of his ear. He was at a public dinner, where a concealed amateur volunteered a song. As soon as it was over the professional gentleman gave vent to his agonized feelings in a complimentary address. "Sir," said he, "I thank you. You have given me a greater treat than I ever enjoyed or expected to enjoy. You went through that song without being once in tune. Every note was wrong."

ADVANCE OF WAGES TO CABINET-MAKERS.—The cabinet-makers of Liverpool have made an advance of ten per cent. in the wages of their workmen. This is another practical proof of the fallacy of the monopolist's cry, "Cheap bread means low wages."—Lancaster Guardian.

Second Edition, containing an improved Plan, with the numbers and names of the stalls, and references, price 1s. 6d.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXIX.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF RICHMOND.

(SECOND LETTER.)

MY LORD DUKE,—Each of the wise men of Greece rendered himself memorable by a single saying; your Grace, being the chief of our modern cunning men of "Grease," and seeing that no more apophthegms can be imported from that quarter, is solicitous to take advantage of the non-competition, and make a home-grown maxim for the market. Your success is splendid. The inspiration of protection was on your soul, when on Monday evening you interrupted Lord Dalhousie's laudation of the late financial measures by your never-to-be-forgotten ejaculation,

"We do not grow glass, and we do grow timber." That sentence deserves to be the response of a monopolist litany. Its truth is undeniable, its purpose is characteristic, and its selfishness is most transparent. It should be the motto of that sordid section of speculators in legislative partiality which your Grace represents. Do you grow the article? that is your first question; and then you are ready to legislate accordingly. Why, then, taxer of other people's trades for the advantage of thine own; thou Duke of dirty dealings, thou Charlemagne of chandlers, wouldst thou have nothing cheap but what thou buyest, nothing dear but what thou sellest? Make out an inventory of all the items in which thou art interested: turbot for thy table, and greaves for thy greyhounds, may be untaxed; "love me, love my dog;" but the wheat and the salmon, the whisky, the wood, and the lard,—there lay it on. Let no foreign interloper show himself in rivalry with our shop. Tax him out, and tax us up. Your inventory should be a schedule to every budget. On your catalogue might be framed a fiscal catechism for the House of Lords. Block up every chink through which the light of hope may penetrate to pinning millions. But for the Royal Oak of Boscobel there might never have been a Richmond: let its branches obstruct the remotest prospect of relief; success to wooden heads, and may no honest man be allowed a window in his breast, for

"We do not grow glass, and we do grow timber." In stating the fact, that glass is not grown by English landowners, your Grace has thrown light on the history and spirit of our taxation. Glass is a home manufacture in which, with fair play, we should have surpassed the world. The duties upon it were so much extracted from industry and trade, to save the pockets of the tax-eating and tax-levying classes. There are as many glassmakers in the country as there are landowners; but the one class belongs to those who have little to do with the taxes but to pay them, and the other to those who have little to do with the taxes but to enact them. From the latter part of the last century to 1831 the average duty on glass was quadrupled. In 1793 it was 8s. 8d. per cwt., and in 1831 it was 35s. 7d. per cwt. During that period the population increased sixty per cent. The quantity taken for use did not increase in proportion. It did not increase at all. It ought to have increased from 407,203 cwt. to 663,740 cwt., and it diminished to 374,361 cwt. Such was the mode in which you, or your class, dealt with British interests and British industry. The worth of glass is in the labour and skill bestowed on the materials. They are cheap and abundant; for the healthiness of dwellings its use is of the first importance. As an article of export it goes mainly to our own possessions; more than half the trade it occasions is (including India) colonial. You love the labourer, my Lord Duke; and he needs it for the window of his cottage and the cucumber in his garden. I will not urge that, however; your Grace is still so sore on the salmon that we will cut the cucumber. It is difficult to thread one's way amongst the articles, my Lord Duke, in which you deal and huckster. I was just going to mention Glenlivet. But, alas! the Scotch drink it out of wooden quaighs; this reduction of the duty will make them take to glasses; and, you know,

"We do not grow glass, and we do grow timber."

What a shortsighted person you are; only a pettifogger after all. Did you see Sir Robert Peel's glass balance wheel? The curious thing; as delicately adjusted as his sliding scale. Your tenants will get cheaper watches, my Lord Duke; they will have a little more left to pay in rent. Watches will scarcely be worth taking. There will be less robbery on Goodwood race-course, my Lord Duke; and more custom for the gambling-booths. This invention is one of a thousand novel uses to which glass will be rapidly applied. Don't you see, my Lord Duke? More glassblowers will be born and bred; and they will want to buy something, besides timber, which you grow. People who earn, can pay. That is the sort of customers you need; and Peel's glass, like Banquo's, "shows you many more," whose food you may tax if you can; but which, untaxed, will yield you an honest profit. Besides, what said Lord Dalhousie to your ejaculation? "With respect to glass, relief to the amount of £400,000 had been afforded to the agricultural interest, and this was not merely a pounds, shillings, and pence benefit, but it would tend to improve the moral and social condition of the labouring population." You do not grow morals, my Lord Duke; and your gratitude is not excited by this relief. You opposed the repeal of the auction duty, which only bears upon the comparatively poor; your own class having long ago secured its own exemption. Your coadjutor, Lord Winchelsea, "certainly does not regard with indifference the importation of salted meat from America." You and he grow pigs. You are "not indifferent" to the "miserious labourer" having the chance of a bigger bit of bacon. No man is "indifferent;" only other folks are interested that he should get it; your lordships are interested in his not getting it. And then you have the face to come as a bold beggar upon the Consolidated Fund, for a portion of the county rates, which portion would be forthwith transmuted into rent, already from double to quadruple what it was fifty years ago. Now, reckon up the classes towards whom your opposition on the Auction Duty Repeal Bill and the Customs Duties Bill is an act of hostility. Besides others, the list specially includes the peasantry and the tenants; it proves the utter selfishness of the whole proceeding. You are for all remission that will grow into rent; you are for no remission that will not grow into rent. No matter that the farmers must buy timber; no matter that the labourers must buy lard, not being able to reach the price of butter. Do "we grow it?" That is all. If labourers were to live in houses of glass, and tenant-farmers fed on timber, it would be all the same: you would grudge the remission on glass, and grumble for greater protection to your trees, for

"We do not grow glass, and we do grow timber." In the "grand old times," my Lord Duke, people did without glass. "Of old time" (says Harrison's "Description of England," 1584) "our country houses did use much lattice, and that made either of wicker [we grow osiers] or fine rifts of oak in checkerwise [we grow oak]." I read also that some of the better sort, in and before the time of the Saxons, did make panels of horn [we grow horns]; and fix them in wooden calves" [we grow timber]; but all this was changed by the encasement and convenience of glass; and do you not think you are entitled to compensation? The selfishness of your class has impeded and limited the change which it could not prevent. You have taxed it back, and levied your tolls on the progress of civilization. Your order was first chivalric; then luxurious; and has now sunk into sordidness. Pierre de Blois, who wrote in the twelfth century, complains that the horses of the knights were more frequently loaded with implements of gluttony and drunkenness than with arms fit for battle. "They are burdened," says he, "not with weapons, but wine; not with javelins, but cheeses; not with bludgeons, but bottles; not with spears, but spits." And what burdens now, not your horses, but yourselves, when you go down to the House? The memory of what you have to sell, and what they do not grow; of what you have to sell, and what you have not to sell; of what you wish to buy, and what you do not wish to buy; of what can, if bestowed on the tenant, be squeezed out of him as rent, and of what cannot be squeezed out of him

Go to the Free-Trade Bazaar, and learn from that splendid exhibition a lesson of more wisdom, justice, and liberality than you have yet attained. See what industry can accomplish, and respect its rights. You will find none of your pitiful distinctions there. Venetian goblets will rest on plates of British oak; and your own plantations may have furnished the framework in which glassy fibres have been woven into regal mantles. The hewers of wood and drawers (drinkers too) of water are not forgotten there, nor in the objects at which the League is aiming; neither are they dissociated from those who twine the filiciest silk, or fashion the earliest metals. British industry, with its energy and enterprise, its capital, skill, and taste, can work for the world, and requires the world for its remuneration. Go, my Lord Duke: and as the varied light falls on the varied products, blending them into the harmony of usefulness and beauty, be not particular in picking out what grew on your own estates in Sussex or Argyleshire. Look beyond and above both. Think of the riches which Providence has stored up in nature, and of the faculties with which it has endowed humanity to render those riches subservient to common profit and enjoyment; nor turn away, sullenly muttering to yourself, "We do not grow glass, and we do grow timber."

GAME LAWS.

PETITIONS FROM FARMERS.

Last night Mr. Bright presented three petitions against the Game Laws, from proprietors, tenant-farmers, and others, of the county of Fife, in Scotland; one from the Dunfermline district, one from the Kirkcaldy district. These petitions are signed by a very large number of farmers, and may be taken to represent the general opinion of the tenantry of Fife on the subject to which they refer. We subjoin a copy of the petitions:—

"That, in the opinion of your petitioners, great injustice is done to all classes by the present Game Laws. That it seems to your petitioners highly unjust to extend the rights of private property so as to include the wild animals of the field, without at the same time making the owners liable for any damage they may do; for many parts of the crops of the farmers are very seriously injured, while, by the present law, it seems to your petitioners doubtful whether they can recover damages for the injury done. That it is the opinion of your petitioners that these laws have a highly demoralizing effect upon the labouring population, who, from their open injustice, cannot be expected to regard their infringement as any crime. May it, therefore, please your Honourable House to abolish these laws; or, if the rights of private property are extended to wild animals, to make the owners of these animals liable for all damages they may do. And your petitioners will ever pray, &c."

DECISION.

Baxter v. Newman.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.—Chief Justice TINDAL delivered the judgment of the court as follows:—In this case there were thirty-seven persons who claimed the right of voting for the ward riding of the county of York, in respect of the qualification described in the list of freehold shares in a mill, houses, and lands. The revising barrister found that the amount of the share possessed by each of the claimants in the real property in the company was sufficient to confer a vote, provided the interest acquired by such share could be considered as an interest in the real property. The objection taken before the court was that the interest acquired by the several claimants, the owners of such shares, was an interest in the property only, and not in land; but the revising barrister overruled this objection, as well as another which appeared to the cases of two of the claimants, Bateman and Brookbank, to which objection we shall afterwards refer, and he allowed the votes of all the other claimants. We are of opinion the revising barrister was right in his decision, and that the votes of the particular claimants ought to be allowed. That the claimants took a legal interest in the real property is placed beyond doubt. The freehold land was purchased with the money contributed by the several claimants, and by other shareholders, and conveyed to trustees, unto and to the use of the claimants, and assigns absolutely; the trusts under which the trustees were seized being declared in the partnership deed subsequently executed by the claimants and the several members of the copartnership created. The only question, therefore, is, whether the claimants take such an equitable interest in the property as will, by law, give them a right to vote; for the provisions of the 7 & 8 Wm. IV., 18 Geo. IV., and the 6 Vict., a person seized in equity of a freehold estate of the value of 40s. by the year, or the ground upon which we consider these claimants to be seized is this, that the property of which the claimants are seized in trust for the benefit of the shareholders who form the copartnership is freehold land, and that the copartnership by their committee are in possession thereof; that the trusts declared by the deed under which the copartnership was created entered into the deed by the means of such land and the mill erected thereon, and are not trusts which are inconsistent with the equitable seizure of the freehold in the copartnership; and that it is found by the revising barrister that the amount of the shares of each of the claimants in the real property in the company is sufficient in value to confer a vote. It is undoubtedly true, as was urged at the bar, that the trusts declared by the copartnership deed are such as that a court of equity would deal with the real property as personally, so far as it was necessary to carry the intention of this trading copartnership into execution. In general there can be no question but that, for all purposes necessary to effectuate the intention of the parties, personal estate may be considered as real, and real estate as personal, by a court of equity, as in the ordinary instance of money agreed or directed to be laid out in land; so in the instance of a real estate under an absolute trust or direction to sell: and against the general rule our decision in the present case will not in any manner militate. But, notwithstanding this acknowledged doctrine of the court of equity, no one can deny that the land still remains land and nothing else; and there is no authority or decision that for the collateral purpose of giving a vote, which has no bearing on, or reference whatever to, the subject, that the deed of copartnership or the rights of the cestui que trusts should not remain just as they would have been without such declaration of trusts. For as to the declaration by the copartners in the deed, that the lands and buildings should be deemed and considered as of and in the nature of personal estate, and not real estate, we think the generality of these words must necessarily be limited by the subject-matter of the trusts declared by the deed, and that they can extend no farther than the object and purposes that the deed required. And, further, we think it may be considered to be a very doubtful question, whether the previous agreement of parties, or any authority short of an act of Parliament, can deprive the owner of a freehold of the right of voting for a member of Parliament, which is a right inherent in the owner of the freehold, not for his own benefit, but for that of the community of which he forms a part. But, however that may be, it appears to us such right is left altogether untouched by the objects and purposes for which the trusts of the deed now under consideration are created and declared. This deed declares no trust whatever of the freehold. If, as it appears by the statement of the case, that the land was purchased with the money of the several shareholders or copartners, it follows that under the present deed there was a resulting trust of the fee-simple inheritance for their benefit, so that each of them would be entitled to his share in the beneficial interest therein proportioned to his share of the purchase-money. The partnership deed does not alter the proportions in which the partners are interested, nor does it confer upon any stranger any portion of the interest in the land: it only regulates the mode in which the property shall be managed and enjoyed according to the quantity of interest of each shareholder therein. "And the estate,"—to use the language of Lord Eldon, in Crawshaw v. Maule, 1 Swanstone 521, when speaking of a freehold estate purchased by a partnership for trading purposes,—"the estate, though personal in enjoyment, is freehold in nature and quality;" and it is to the nature and quality of the estate we are to look, and not to the mode of enjoyment, when we have to decide whether it confer a vote. It was objected on the part of the appellant that the case of Bligh v. Brett, 2 Young and Collier, was an authority against the claimants, inasmuch as it proved that the shares of the company and profits thereof, if derivable from land, would be personal property, not real; but we think it sufficient to advert to a broad ground of distinction between that case and the present. In the case referred to the company, that of the Chelsea Water-works, was a corporation, created by act of Parliament and chartered from the Crown, of which the shareholders individually were co-proprietors; the whole of the legal property was vested in the corporation aggregate, which had the sole management and control of the real estate, having power to convert it into personalty, and then back again into realty; and that no person or individual copartner—having as an individual no more interest in the freehold than a perfect stranger—has an interest in the surplus profits of the concern until they are actually received. In the present case the freehold is in trustees for the benefit of the individual copartners in the trade, managed and conducted by a committee appointed by themselves. In the two other cases of shareholders in joint-stock companies, where the company has been incorporated by act of Parliament, the Legislature has expressly declared that the shares shall be deemed personal estate and transmissible as such, and not of the nature of real property. Such was the case of the Vauxhall Bridge Company, the Lancaster Canal Company, and others: in which cases it may be conceded there could be no freehold interest in the several shareholders as to entitle them to vote; whereas, in the case before us, there is no other than a voluntary declaration by the parties themselves, that the real estate shall be considered as personal. Upon the principle, therefore, that land, and mills built thereon, are the basis and subject-matter of the declaration out of which the profits arise which are to be distributed amongst the shareholders; that the trusts related only to the management and conduct of the land and mill, and the trade carried on by means of the same, and that there is no trust declared which is inconsistent with an equitable interest in the respective copartners; that the copartners are, by their committee, in possession; and, lastly, that the share of each man is sufficient to enable him to vote;—we think that the shareholders have an equitable seizure in a sufficient estate to entitle them to vote for the county. As to the objection raised against the right of the two claimants, Bateman and Brookbank, we see no ground whatever for considering the money borrowed by the trustees on bonds and notes as having the effect of a mortgage upon their shares, and, indeed, this objection was little relied on in argument. On the whole, we think the decision is right, and ought to be affirmed.—Judgment for the respondent.

A NEW SUGAR-ROOT.—The Journal du Commerce of Antwerp has a paragraph, stating that beet-root is threatened to be dispossessed of the empire it has for some years past usurped in Europe. A substitute has, it seems, been discovered in Austria, which unites all its virtues, without having any of its numerous faults. This substitute, which the Germans call saccharula, does not exhaust the soil, since it is attached only by a few very minute feeders, and it contains as much of saccharine matter as beet-root. It grows upon the surface of the earth, and acquires a very large volume.

REVIEW.

The British Quarterly Review, No. II. London: Jackson and Walford.

This number contains an admirable article on commercial reform, from which we shall make a few extracts, without adding any comment of our own, which would in truth be superfluous. The following argument in favour of Free Trade, derived from the late Population and Occupation Reports, though not altogether new, has the freshness of novelty from the striking light in which it has been put:—

"On the national policy of Free Trade we need add little, in point of general principle, to what has been said in the foregoing pages. But, before passing to those wider and higher considerations which it is impossible to dissociate from this question, we must advert to those results of statistical investigation which have recently demonstrated in so striking a manner—not the policy, merely, of Free Trade, which had been abundantly demonstrated before—but its urgent and instant necessity, as a condition of our national life. The occupation returns presented to Parliament last year by the census commissioners, have been frequently quoted in the Free-Trade controversy. They cannot be quoted too often—their practical results cannot be too perseveringly obtruded on public attention—while a shred of monopoly remains on the statute-book. That the population of this island increases at the rate of 230,000 annually—an increase which, as Mr. Chadwick has calculated, requires a new Manchester and Birmingham annually for shelter, and a new county of Surrey annually for sustenance (or their equivalents)—was known already, and is, of itself, sufficient comment on the madness of a legislation which restricts the demand for labour, and lessens the supply of food. It is now known that the whole of this annual increase of population is dependent for work, wages, and food, on trade and manufactures. Agriculture does not need, cannot employ, one of the 230,000 human beings yearly added to the British people. Agriculture employs not only a smaller relative proportion of the population than it did (comparing 1841 with 1831), but a smaller absolute number.* The increase—the large, rapid, and steadily prosperous increase of commerce and manufactures, is thus a condition, not merely of national wealth and power, but of national existence. The mere preservation of the status quo is not enough. To merely preserve the status quo, would be to throw 230,000 of our people every year on the poor-rates, or to reduce the wages and subsistence of the existing population of workers to a beggary and starvation point, by a destructive competition. Our commerce and manufactures must not only not decline—they must grow; they must grow as fast as our population grows; they must grow faster than population, if there is to be any improvement in the condition of the people as to rate of wages and mode of living. From the hour that commerce and manufactures cease to grow at the same rate with population, comes revulsion and distress. Should growth ever be exchanged for retrogression and decline, the revulsion would be fearful, the distress calamitous and horrible, beyond description or conception. More demand for manufacturing and commercial industry, more room for the profitable employment of manufacturing and commercial capital, are henceforth necessities of national life. The peace and safety of the country require that commerce and manufactures should be perpetually wanting more hands, and offering more wages. But wages can only come out of profits of capital; and capital can only find increasing profits in an increasing export demand; and exports cannot be without imports:—and here monopolist legislation interposes—obstructing the imports, limiting the exports, curtailing the profits, cutting down the wages, stopping the demand for labour, and pauperizing the labourer.

"The coincidence of the economies of the Free-Trade questions with its morals and humanities is here obvious. No charity can be compared for extent and efficiency, with the justice of leaving industry to seek its own markets and earn its own bread. All mere charities are palpably and pitifully inadequate to meet the case of a labouring class, whose supply of labour has outgrown the demand for it. To improve the condition of a people which every year adds 230,000 to its numbers, except by, or in conjunction with, arrangements for giving a higher value to labour and securing a more ready and easy access to food, were a problem before which the philanthropy of a whole nation of Howards and Clarkson would sink abashed and confounded. The only power on earth capable of providing for a growing people in a full old-settled country, is wages of labour, paid out of profits of capital—the capital and its profits growing as fast as the people grow. Already has the recent revival of trade in the manufacturing districts—a revival produced by the operation of a beautiful harvest temporarily repealing the Corn Law—extended and diffused a larger amount of physical and moral good, than all the charities of the empire could have accomplished, had they funded their income for half a century, and then poured out their accumulated savings in one prodigious boom. Charity is good, but the paucity, central, all-comprehensive charity, were that which should widen the field of profitable and reproductive employment, make labour valuable, bring the labouring man into request, give a growing people room to grow, add Poland and the United States, Brazil and China to our territory, and make England a cheap and easy country to live in."

The absurdity of the differential duties on sugar are thus ably exposed:—

"Our first objection to the principle of moral differential duties, as adopted in 1844, and confirmed by the measure of the present session, is its impracticability. It may be right or wrong, wise or foolish, in the abstract, to make a custom-house distinction between free-labour sugar and slave-labour sugar, but, practically, it is impossible. By acts of our own, not now to be recalled, we have parted with our free agency in this matter. As a case of principle and national conscience, the question is taken out of our hands by circumstances now beyond our control. Our commercial treaties, with the 'most favoured nation' clause, over-ride our acts of Parliament. Legislate as we will in favour of free-grown sugar, and against slave-grown sugar, slave-grown sugar will come into our consumption—has come already. We need not remind the reader of the Venezuela importation. It is certainly a startling comment on our anti-slavery sugar legislation, that its first result has been the introduction of slave produce. It is not a little singular, too, that Lord Sandon, the head of the anti-slavery opposition of 1841, was the medium of communication in the business between the importing merchants and the Ministry whom that Opposition placed in office.* While we write, another arrival of slave sugar has taken place from Louisiana, likewise admissible into consumption by virtue of a 'most favoured nation' treaty. What with the most favoured-nation treaties, and the false or fraudulent certificates which deception or bribery will easily obtain for the produce of slave-holding countries adjacent to those thus privileged, it is probable that a not inconsiderable portion of our future supplies will be drawn from polluted sources.

"The objection of impracticability would certainly be greatly weakened, as regards the moral influence of our legislation on other countries, could we plead that we do our best to maintain the distinction—that we are as consistent as our treaties will allow—that we act on principle up to that point at which our free agency and our responsibility terminate together. But we do nothing of the kind. We do not make it a principle of custom-house law to criticize the institutions of other countries, and exact certificates of moral origin as a condition of commercial intercourse. This fiscal morality is not a rule with us, but an exception; an exception limited to the single case of sugar, and to one class of transactions relative to sugar. We do not apply it to the hemp and tallow of Russia, though produced by the labour of slaves under the terrors of a worse instrument of torture than the cart-whip. We quietly ignore it in our dealings with Turkey and Africa. We make no difficulty about slave-grown rice and tobacco. We have just abolished all duty on slave-grown cotton. Twice, within three years, have we reduced the differential duty on slave-grown coffee. We ask no questions of gold and silver, the product of a far more cruel description of slave labour than that of the sugar-mill. We have lowered the duty on slave-raised copper ore; and Lord Sandon, the author of our saccharine morality, has headed a deputation to urge on the Government the policy of lowering it still further. We are moral only in sugar—and, in sugar, only by halves. With an exquisite nicety of conscience, we decline tasting slave-grown sugar (that of the most favoured nations excepted); but we do not refuse to make money by it. We import it, refine it, and export it—export it to our own colonies—feed our own freedmen with the product of their brethren's slavery. Certainly, there are excellent reasons why this singular exception should not be made the rule of our commercial policy. The consistent adhesion to the principle of refusing to trade with those nations who retain an immoral institution which ourselves have but recently relinquished, would throw the empire into confusion. But the question remains, What is the value and authority of a moral principle which no sane man would dare to recommend for consistent practical adoption? What moral weight or influence can be expected to attach to this exceptional and anomalous piece of legislation, at variance, as it is, with the whole of our daily acts, and with the fundamental conditions of our national existence?

"To suppose that the cause of negro emancipation can be advanced by this expedient, seems to us as unreasonable a hope as ever deluded good and sincere men. Not to dwell on the obvious consideration, that our demand for foreign free-labour sugar creates a vacuum in the market of the world which slave produce (if really the best and cheapest) will rush in to supply, by as sure a law as that by which water finds its level—we would remind our anti-slavery friends that this fiscal war against slave labour is a practical declaration of its economical superiority. It is an admission that, economically, our act of emancipation is a failure. This is a part of the subject which we feel most painfully. By excluding the labour of slaves from competition with that of freemen, we tell slave-holding nations that they have the advantage of us; that all that our philanthropists have for so many years been saying, of the superior economy of free labour, is a mistake; that, after trying both, we find slave labour to be the best. We do all that legislation can do, to justify the slaveholder's taunt, that one of our noblest moral acts has turned out a political blunder. We make our philanthropy a warning to other nations, instead of an example. By the same act by which we irritate the slaveowner's passions, we confirm him in his prejudices. We give ourselves the appearance of grudging him the possession of an advantage which ourselves have weakly and unthinkingly thrown away. A policy more fatal to hope for the negro race could not be. Slavery will never be abolished so long as the experience of the first commercial country of the world can be quoted in proof of the rashness of the experiment. Until it can be demonstrated, by rois de fait, that free labour can grow as good sugar crops as slave labour—which never will be demonstrated while protection exonerates the free cultivator from the necessity of thrift and pains-taking—slave-owners and slave-traders will, like Mr. Clay, the late candidate for the United States Presidency, treat the doctrine of the sinfulness of man claiming a property in man as a 'visionary dogma' and 'speculative abstraction.' Do our philanthropists sufficiently consider that the slaves of Brazil and the United States cannot be emancipated as ours were, by the force of public opinion and feeling in a European nation, invoking the overruling powers of an imperial legislature? Brazil and the United States have no mother country to fall back upon for compensation-money and protection. Their emancipation acts must be their own work, uncompelled and uncompensated—the result either of their sense of Christian justice, or of their perception of commercial interest. Our legislation is equally unfavourable to the action of either influence. By the irritating non-intercourse policy, we cast away those moral influences of nation over nation, which naturally grow out of and accompany the relations of commerce, and close our best means of access to the public opinion and feeling of slaveholding communities: while, at the same time, our professed inability to compete with the slaveholder is a virtual confession that the commercial interest is on the side of injustice and oppression. There is but one way in which we can ever hope to emancipate the slaves of Brazil and the United States—we must meet and beat their masters in the open market of the world.

"A yet worse evil of our anti-slavery protectionist policy is its tendency to realize the melancholy hypothesis on which it is based. Protect free labour, and it will infallibly need protection. Legislate on the assumption that it is intrinsically inferior in productive power to slave labour—and it will be inferior. 'Protection is the bane of agriculture,' in our West India sugar plantations, as in our British corn-fields—as it is the bane of every sort of industry that has ever been taught to trust to it. What, precisely, would be the effect on our sugar islands, of the extinguishment of their monopoly, we can only learn by experience, though our past fiscal and commercial history supplies abundance of analogies from which the general outlines of that experience may be tolerably well anticipated. It is quite certain what is the effect of the existing monopoly—an absentee proprietary, a costly, slovenly, unscientific agriculture. To what extent emancipation has made a difference to the planter's disadvantage—if to any extent—may be matter of controversy; it is clear that emancipation is not that which makes the difference between the British West Indian and the Brazilian. Before emancipation, the 'interest' was as distressed and complaining, as deeply embarrassed and mortgaged, as unable to compete with foreigners, as it has ever pretended to be since. It is notorious that the twenty millions of pounds sterling which accompanied the emancipation (and which somehow are always forgotten in this question) saved not a few mortgages of West India property from the ruin with which they were menaced by the previous depreciation of their securities and insolvency of their debtors. It does not seem necessary to look deeper for the cause of West India distresses and inability to compete, than the fact—authenticated by evidence now sufficiently familiar to the public to entitle us to assume it as known and undisputed—that there has been no material alteration in the process of sugar-making for the last three centuries. The steam-engine is unknown in our sugar islands, and the vacuum-pan a rarity. Actually, at the commencement of this fourth century of our colonization of those islands, we are told that great progress is making with the use of the plough.* That agriculturists who never go near their estates, and keep up an expensive staff of overseers, attorneys, and assistants, to grow sugar-canes on unploughed land, and manufacture sugar without the steam-engine and vacuum-pan, should want to be protected, is a state of things which one can quite well understand without any more explanation."

In the following passage is a forcible exposition of the moral influences of political economy:—

"The sort of antagonism which the supporters of commercial restriction are in the habit of assuming, between political economy and Christian morality, will be regarded by future generations with similar feelings to those with which we look back on the old theological objections to the Copernican astronomy. Even apart from the circling advocates of Christianity rank high as expositors of economical science, the assumption of a contradiction between doctrines of social philosophy verified by an adequate induction of facts, and those principles of social duty which Providence has authenticated as the laws of human action, is, in any case, sufficiently strange. Economical truth is not less divine than astronomical truth. The laws which govern the phenomena of production and exchange are as truly laws of God, as those which govern the phenomena of day and night. To ascertain, by inductive inquiry, the natural conditions of commercial and industrial prosperity is to ascertain the will of Deity with regard to a certain department of human conduct: to act in conformity with those conditions, so ascertained, is to act religiously. All truths of science become, when viewed with reference to their Author, religious truths, and draw after them religious duties.

"It is not difficult, we think, to discern a moral beauty and nobleness even in those special results of economical science which are most decried for selfishness and inhumanity. The familiar formula of Free-Trade

"* The Governor of Jamaica, not many months since, in his address to the House of Assembly, congratulated them on the increasing use of the plough as a bright feature of the period of his administration! In the Morning Chronicle of the 21st of February last, we find the following extract from a Barbadoes newspaper:—"It is a most remarkable fact, that the art and practice of manufacturing sugar in the colonies should have been so long stationary, or should have made so little progress towards perfection, while almost every other branch of manufacture has been so greatly benefited by the discoveries of science, and by the application of the principles of scientific fact, the process of making sugar has proceeded in nearly the same undeviating course for centuries, and still continues to exhibit the rudest and most destructive features, involving a principle which, in its operation, subjects the planter to an enormous loss, the full amount of which he has been unable to estimate, because the absence of a better system has left him without the means of comparing its results. Three centuries have now completed their revolution since the sugar-cane was first introduced into the island of Barbadoes, from the Brazils. Considerable improvement appears to have been made in the quality of Jamaica first fell into the possession of the British; at which period, it is said, there were only three small sugar plantations established in this queen of the English Antilles. After the lapse of three centuries of practical experience in the manufacture of sugar has effected so little in the shape of improvement, it strongly tends to confirm the assumption, that the system hitherto pursued is radically defective, and that the evil is inherent and inseparable."

policy—"Buy in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest,"—certainly savours more of vulgar commercial prudence, than of philanthropy; yet what is it, but a brief vernacular description of the very course of conduct that the most enlarged and comprehensive philanthropy would dictate. Cheapness means abundance—excessive and extraordinary cheapness, superfluity. Dearth means scarcity in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest. To buy fact and effect, to take the products of the earth, and the creations of the human hand and brain, from the place where they are least wanted, to the place where they are most wanted—to bring need and superfluity together for mutual adjustment. That definition of trade which is the best rationale of it we know—the 'mutual relief of wants by the exchange of superfluities'—and of which the rule (i. e., relieving the wants that press most, by supplies drawn from where they will be least missed, is the obvious corollary, is something more than the dry formula of a dry science. It is warm with the humanities. It tells of human misery alleviated, human happiness increased and diffused, divine bounty so applied and improved as to yield the maximum of human good. Those laws which interpose between the respective wants and superfluities of such countries as Great Britain and the United States, of America—countries each possessing a power, practically unlimited, of supplying that which the other most needs; which forbid American corn to meet British manna; which forbid the boundless fertility of Ohio's prairies from feeding the hunger of Lancashire, and the boundless productiveness of Lancashire looms from clothing the nakedness of Ohio; which crowd the warehouses of Manchester with unsaleable shirts, and cover the quays of New Orleans with putrescent beef,—are laws whose mere impolicy and absurdity one almost overlooks in view of their sin against civilization and humanity."

We may probably return to this number of the Review again.

THE PROTECTIONISTS AND THEIR ALLY THE "Herald."—Mr. Miles is a truly estimable and respectable man. England has scarcely a more competent person to fill the post of county representative: but he neither added an iota of dignity to his own character, nor forwarded in the least degree the interests of the agriculturists, when he raised a debate in the House of Commons on the reduction of duty on "grease." The Duke of Richmond occupies a similar rank, and commands the esteem and respect of the farmers of England in a more than ordinary degree. But what imaginable object was gained by his fruitless resistance of the remission of the duties on auctions? Truth to tell, we do not see wherein the agricultural interests are especially concerned, either in "auctions" or in "grease." Nor do we understand in what way the landed interests are to be called upon to be grateful for remissions on coffee and glass, inasmuch as grease and auctions, coffee and glass, are things belonging alike to all classes of the community.—Morning Herald.

ALLOTMENTS OF LAND.—Earl Ducie, since Michaelmas last, has carried out the allotment system upon a large and generous scale in the parish of Wickwar, where to 71 cottagers he has caused to be allotted half-an-acre of land each, as close to their residences as the situation of the noble earl's property will permit. Each half-acre is measured to the tenant free from loss by roads, hedges, rows, or fencing, and the rent charged is 25s. per annum, payable half-yearly, when, if paid punctually, one shilling is returned, thus making the actual payment 21s. the half-acre; the tithe and all other parochial charges being paid by the landlord. About three years ago, the proposition was started of forming a reading society at Wickwar. On this coming to the knowledge of the Earl, he, as the largest landed proprietor in the parish, expressed much pleasure on hearing of the project, and, with the view of aiding its being carried into effect, he sent a cheque for £20 and a present of books. This society, we are happy to be informed, continues to flourish, and to be productive of much good. It consists of from 80 to 100 members, is going on remarkably well, and a subscription of 6d. per month from each member has been found sufficient to keep it in a state of prosperity and usefulness.—Hereford Journal.

CURED PROVISIONS.—There has been issued, by order of the House of Commons, an account of the quantities of cured provisions of all kinds imported into the United Kingdom from foreign countries and from the colonies, from the 5th day of January, 1843, to the 5th day of January, 1845; specifying the different kinds, the countries whence sent, the quantities of each kind entered for home consumption, and the amount of duty paid on the same respectively. Also the quantities of each kind re-exported, and whether taken for the use of the ship or for merchandise, the place to which the same were re-exported, and the number of bonds passed with regard to the same. The cured provisions imported in the year 1843 were as follows:—Salted beef, 60,633 cwt.; salted pork, 27,114 cwt.; hams of all kinds, 6919 cwt.; and bacon, 418 cwt. In 1844 the same articles were imported in the following quantities:—Salted beef, 106,766 cwt.; salted pork, 30,780 cwt.; hams of all kinds, 6732 cwt.; bacon, 36 cwt. In the latter year the following quantities were taken for ships' stores:—Salted beef, 77,218 cwt.; salted pork, 16,987 cwt.; hams of all kinds, 1298 cwt.

"† We could have wished, had our space allowed, to make some use of the valuable pamphlet lately published under the title, 'American Corn and British Manufactures,' which places in a most striking light the enormous folly of that system which raises a barrier between the one of these and the other. The whole case was, however, stated in two lines. The figures of the occupation returns made by the census commissioners of each country, sufficiently indicate the boundless possibilities of that mutually beneficial interchange which monopoly prohibits:—

"How suggestive are these statistics, of relief of wants mutually sought and offered by the exchange of superfluities! How perfectly is the one country the complement and complement of the other!"

AGRICULTURE.

WOLVES IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING.

Tenant-farmers are rapidly finding out that the League is their best friend. What other body of men ever asserted the right of the industrious tiller of the soil to have his interests considered? Who ever ventured to inquire into the oppressions of the game laws, until Mr. Bright successfully enforced the farmers' view of that question? And now from whom do the farmers look for political emancipation, to whom do they turn when most severely pressed by the landlords' screw, but that great and powerful body of Free-Traders, the League?

In every direction we find the most devoted adherents of protection amongst the tenant-farmers, yielding more and more assent to the doctrines of the League; and the time is not far distant when the industrious capitalists who are engaged in the production of food will fully admit that a common interest exists between themselves and the industrious classes who are engaged in producing clothing and so forth. Farmers will soon sympathize with traders and manufacturers, as is natural, instead of being made catspaws by the owners of land. To those who have observed the working of the "protective" system, and the actual relations of tenants and landlords, it is matter of surprise that the farmers have submitted to be led blindfold so long, and that by a class with such an obvious interest in deluding them.

Nothing, in fact, but fear, as unfounded in reality as that created by their own scarecrows, has prevented the tenants of England from discovering the frauds which have been put upon them by their rent-loving landlords. The slightest examination of the circumstances of their own business would have told them the truth, and saved them from that severe lesson through which they are now making the discovery. Indeed, the very arguments used by the monopolist legislators, who arrogated to themselves the title of "farmers' friends," are entirely founded upon the interest of the landowners in monopoly, and the remedies they propose go altogether to "protect" rents. When amongst the farmers they deal largely in fictitious statistics, and raise the most ridiculous alarms and the most unfounded expectations; but when they get to Parliament these false pretences are thrown aside, and the landlords' interest is solely and broadly urged.

This is strikingly illustrated by the sham debate raised by the Duke of Richmond in the House of Lords, on Monday night, when he opposed the removal of the auction duty, in order to apply the £300,000 or £400,000 towards the payment of the county rates. Now, what is the county rate but a fixed burden, not varying greatly in amount from year to year, which every prudent farmer takes into his calculation before he undertakes to pay a given sum as rent? But farmers are just now in a state of distress, because, after making an estimate of the amount of county rates and all similar burdens, they have been led into the error of expecting prices considerably higher than they have obtained, and of promising to pay rents according to the expected, not the real, scale of prices. The simple remedy for this would seem to be a reduction of rent; but, somehow or other, our landlord legislators cannot see that sort of remedy. Instead of that, they propose a direct transfer of £100,000 now paid as county rates into their own pockets, upon the shallow pretence of benefiting the farmer!! It is not the county rate which now oppresses the farmer more than when prices were higher, but the rent. The farmer is merely the hand which pays the rate; it is strictly a charge upon rent. And because landlords see they must lower their rents, they are trying to get some indemnity for themselves beforehand, by grabbing the county rates.

The Duke's motion was met by the President of the Board of Trade, who enumerated the benefits conferred upon the agricultural classes, in common with all others, by the reductions of duties upon articles of necessity and convenience, which Sir Robert Peel has made, and in so doing he said, "If the noble duke could see no benefit to the agriculturalist from the reduction of the timber duties, he could, no doubt, also deny that the reduction of the glass duties would do so." This drew from the monopolist Duke an avowal of that intense selfishness, which is the key to all our landlord legislation, and to the spirit of which we would especially direct the attention of tenant-farmers. The Duke said, "We do not grow glass, and we do not grow timber."

Now, had the Minister defended his measures by showing that if they had reduced prices they had also lowered rents, then the Duke would have exclaimed, "We receive rents, and do not pay them." And this spirit pervades every act of our monopolist landowners. In the same debate Lord Malmesbury, referring to the same question, the timber duties, said:—

"That [the tariff, &c.] was the first step which the Government took; what was the second? A heavy blow to the agricultural interest; he meant the remission of the timber duties. The noble earl had talked of that measure as if timber were not the produce of this country; did not the noble earl know that in a bad year, when the seasons were unfavourable, the landed proprietor might redeem his loss by a fall of timber? And as to repairs, why, wretched and poor indeed must that estate be which was obliged to go abroad for timber for repairs."

Here we have clear definition of what these "farmers' friends" mean by the "agricultural interest," namely—"the growers of timber." Now, farmers certainly grow timber, but for whose benefit? Why, one of the greatest grievances of which farmers complain is hedgerow timber. Not long ago we walked round a farm with its tenant and the landlord, when they were marking timber, and the constant remark made by the tenant when the landlord was unwilling to remove a particular tree was this—"For every shilling you gain by the growth of that tree I shall lose a pound." And yet, forsooth, the keeping up a high protective duty on timber, "that when seasons are unfavourable the landed proprietor might redeem his loss by a fall of timber," is a benefit to the "agricultural interest." From such benefits farmers may well pray to be protected. We have never heard the damage done to the farmer by timber, where the fields are not very large, estimated at less than 4s. or 5s. an acre; and that excellent farmer, Mr. Huttley, of Essex, on one occasion said, at an agricultural meeting, "that he would not leave a stick large enough for a labourer to hang his bag upon."

If farmers will examine their business in all its details, and watch the effects of the landlord legislation upon each portion, they will find that the interest of the landowners and that of the tenants are directly opposed to each other, and that all the laws made professedly to protect the "agricultural interest," in truth, protect nothing but high rents. How is it that rents have been kept up for the last thirty years, but through the unrequited industry, or out of the capital, of the tenant-farmers? Every successive period of low prices since the war has been met by increased exertions on the part of farmers to meet their monopoly rents. The improvements which have taken place, and the consequent increase of production since 1814, are very considerable, and have all had their origin in the efforts of tenants to fulfil during periods of low prices the engagements made in the hope of monopoly-promised prices. It is not correct to say that much money has not been made by farming during the last thirty years, for large profits have been made; but then they have all gone to the landlord, while the farmers, as a body, have scarcely been able to hold their own. This is solely the consequence of the Corn Laws, and the system which has grown out of monopoly.

The working bees have been sucked dry by the drones, and all the while the drones have been pretending to legislate for the especial protection of the bees.

THE USES OF ADVERSITY.

There can be no doubt that the farmers of England have been most grievously deluded by their landlord leaders in all that relates to agricultural politics; and we sincerely hope they will inflict a full measure of justice upon those leaders at the next election. But they must beware of continuing in the delusion after they have discovered the dishonesty of their political deceivers.

In many cases which have come before us, the disappointment of farmers, because their representatives have not done the impossible things they promised to do, takes the form of a threat to get some others to promise to perform the same impossibilities. This is absurd. The existing county members may justly be cashiered, because they knowingly, and for their own party objects, promised to do that which they knew they could not perform. But, in slinking off the political false pretenders, let farmers not cling to the false pretence. Such reflections naturally arose on reading a letter addressed by a Surrey farmer, Mr. Goldhawk, to Mr. Trotter, M.P. for West Surrey, in which the farmer denounces the deluder, but hugs the delusion. This has called forth a letter from Mr. Henry Drummond, a protectionist, in which he fairly admits that the game of monopoly is up, and that farmers must give up all that craving for artificial prices, which for thirty years past their political leaders have told them is a natural and a wholesome appetite the Legislature ought to gratify.

Mr. Drummond says:—

"All the persons, who by talents and position can ever become Ministers of the Queen, are unanimous in thinking that any fetters upon trade are injurious to the interests of the community; sooner or later, therefore, all restrictions will be abolished, whether they assume the name of 'fixed duties,' 'sliding scale,' 'protection to agriculture,' or any other. It is possible that, by raising and continuing a clamour against the words 'Free Trade,' those words may never make part of a law; but the thing will be equally effected."

This is true: the Corn Laws are doomed, and it is only a question between the two great parties of the State which shall give the final stroke to monopoly. Nobody affects to doubt this, except such antediluvian politicians as poor Lord Stauhope, or such men as the Duke of Richmond, who, having brothers and poor relations to provide for, keep up the sham opposition of "central protection societies." Farmers should understand the truths contained in the following passage of Mr. Drummond's letter, where he says:—

"The only object I have in view is to prevent tenant-farmers from being deceived into the fancy that wheat can ever be in future on an average dearer than £10 a load, and to urge them to enter upon no lease calculated at a higher rate than that. Various modes of deception are practised upon them, not intentionally, but still the result is equally that they are deceived. It is deceiving to impute that they can go on paying rent calculated on wheat at £20 a load by becoming chemists, by purchasing artificial manures, by clamouring for remunerating prices, by the labours of agricultural protection societies, or by any other such nostrums."

What a host of landlord nonsense is dissipated by the above paragraph!

Mr. Drummond then admits that the landowners have hitherto made the laws, and for their own peculiar benefit, but that henceforth the House of Commons will be more and more influenced by the trading and industrious classes; and he adds:—

"The tenant-farmers are in very great distress, and being strongly excited, and ill-informed of the causes of that distress, are easily led by any one who promises them hope of relief from any source, however absurd it may be. They have no longer capital sufficient to cultivate their land: few have the capital wholly their own with which they are carrying on their business, but are paying interest for it, if not to some money-lender, at least to some of their own relations. If they will save themselves from total ruin, they must give up as much of their land as they have not sufficient free, unencumbered capital to manage; they must bestow more labour on that which they retain, for, through insufficient tillage, it is getting more and more exhausted."

This seems to throw the blame of want of capital too much upon the farmer; whereas, in three cases out of five, if the landlords would grant their farms on secure tenures and fair terms in other respects, there would be no lack of the required capital. But who will lend to a yearly tenant to improve his landlord's farm? Or what yearly tenant will sink much of his own capital in the land?

RETRIBUTIVE PROVIDENCE.—So sure as there is a Providence above, is it written that there shall be always ways in which those who wrong and defraud their neighbours shall in the end find out that they have made a rueful bargain.—Col. T. P. Thompson.

CORN-RENTS AND LEASES.—We think it desirable to give prominence to the following resolution, unanimously agreed to at the last monthly meeting of the Halesworth Farmers' Club:—"That a more general adoption of curren-rents, in connexion with permanent and modified leases, would place the tenant-farmers of this district in a comparatively better position than when under the liability of fixed money payments."—Ipswich Express.

MODEL FARMING.—Some time since J. Garratt, Esq., of Bishop's-court, a distinguished protectionist, gave up his model farm. This week, also, there has been a sale of stock at Powderham Farm, Lord Devon having retired from the business of practical farming. Lord Devon's farm is said to have brought a rent of £400 a year; it is reported that last year the noble lord, so far from getting his £400 a year out of it, was £60 out of pocket, which may be placed either to the account of bad farming, or bad prices.—Western Times.

FIRE INSURANCES.—From a return obtained by Colonel Sibthorp, M.P., relative to fire insurances, it appears that during the year 1844, the gross total amount of the sums insured by all the fire-offices, in town and country, on farming stock, exempt from duty, was £54,927,572, namely—£16,375,817 in the quarter ending the 25th of March, 1844; £5,080,772 in the quarter ending the 24th of June, 1844; £3,199,208 in the quarter ending the 29th of September, 1844; and £25,271,775 in the quarter ending Christmas Day, 1844.

INCENDIARISM.—About eight o'clock on Saturday evening week, considerable alarm was caused in the peaceful neighbourhood of Messing by the cry of "fire." It was soon ascertained that the scene of conflagration was in a wood at a short distance from the village, called "Fane Wood," in the occupation of Mr. Daniel Smith, of Easthorpe-hall, and belonging to the Hon. Col. Onslow. The wood in question measures about twenty acres, and is remarkable for the quantity of long dry grass with which the ground is covered, and this circumstance appears to have been taken advantage of by the incendiary to commit this almost unheard-of act of mischief, by which about one-twentieth of the wood was consumed.—Ipswich Express.

A fire broke out about nine o'clock on Tuesday evening, at a farm called "Roper's," in the parish of Bures St. Mary, about six miles from Sudbury, which destroyed the dwelling-house, two barns, a stable, cart-shed, horse-shed, sheep-yard, and the piggeries. Three horses, three colts, three cows, eight sheep, seven pigs, and all the fowls perished. One road-wagon, one harvest-wagon, three tumbrils, all the farming implements and harness, twenty-six sacks of barley, seven sacks of tares, and about two tons of hay were also destroyed. There can be no doubt but that the fire was the work of an incendiary. Three men, who were formerly in Mr. Taylor's (the occupier) employ, and who were discharged last week on suspicion of dishonesty, are now in custody on a further suspicion of having from revengeful motives fired the premises.—Ibid.—We lament to state that a most destructive fire took place on Friday night last, on a farm at Hanchet-end, in the parish of Haverhill, about two miles from the town, held off-hand by Mr. Frederick Olley, of Withersfield, on the boundary of which parish it abuts. About nine o'clock the farming man, who resided in the house, was going to bed, when he perceived a light proceeding from a straw-stack on the windward side of the premises, and the flames very quickly extended to a large and almost new barn, and other farm buildings, the whole of which, together with the farm house, inhabited by Miss Olley and a labourer's family, about 40 combs of threshed wheat and some beans, and a drill, were destroyed; and, shocking to relate, 136 sheep, 22 lambs, enclosed in a yard with hault walls, and 9 pigs were burnt to death. A considerable part of the furniture, the horses, and the cart-shed and carriages were saved; but with these exceptions the whole of the homestead and its contents fell a prey to the diabolical malice of the incendiary.—Norfolk News.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, May 10, 1845.

The sensitive agricultural mind has been much alarmed by Mr. Hutt's motion for the admission of corn from the Australian colonies on the same terms as the corn of Canada. There was no shadow of argument adduced, beyond the plea for the panic terror into which the patrons of high rents and short leases would be thrown, if New Holland should send wheat into the English market. Agricultural minds being, unhappily, uninformed in geography, the nature of Australian competition could not be comprehended; the great parochial intelligence of Darby led him to believe that Australia was somewhere close at his doors, and Van Diemen's Land in the immediate vicinity of Mark-lane. Nature had granted him the protection of fifteen thousand miles of distance, but his imagination was either above or below the power of conceiving so much space: he candidly declared that "he did not know what the colonies were asking for," and insisted that a differential injustice should be perpetuated, for the enlightening of Mr. Darby's ignorance is an event reserved for the millennium. Mr. Stafford O'Brien pleaded timidity,—an excuse quite as valid as his worthy compeer's plea of ignorance. May Heaven send intelligence to the one, and courage to the other!

There was an important admission made by Mr. Wortley: he told the House that "it would be better for the country if it never had a Corn Law." Mr. S. O'Brien singularly illustrated the futility of protection, by referring to the cotton trade; the cotton-manufacturers sought protection in their days of ignorance, but, fortunately for themselves, were left without the imminence of exposure to competition sharpened their skill and stimulated their energies, and hence the manufacturers of cotton have attained a height of prosperity which may well be envied by the growers of corn.

The manifestations of the agricultural mind in this debate will excite contempt rather than indignation in the country; the miserable spirit that would exclude the little corn that could be grown in a colony scarcely wrested from dingoes and kangaroos belongs rather to the lowest class of backsters than to the country gentlemen of England. Sir Robert Peel was clearly ashamed of the course which his agricultural supporters compelled him to pursue, and his defence was so obviously a mere palliative that there can be little doubt of his meditating a great change, and probably a complete surrender of the entire question.

FRANCE.

FRANCE.—There has been a debate in the Chamber of Deputies on the subject of the Jesuits in France. It was commenced by M. Pons, who insisted on the necessity of at once putting in force the laws against that body. The Government replied, that they were prepared to do so as soon as the proper moment appeared to have arrived. M. Dupin spoke very strongly against the Jesuits, and M. Berryer and M. Lamartine on their behalf. Ultimately, M. Thiers moved, that, in the confidence that the Government would execute the laws, the Chamber would proceed to the order of the day. This was agreed to, and the discussion terminated.

The Constitutionnel says that the French Minister for Foreign Affairs has sent out an order to M. Perrin, the French Consul at Bolivia, to proceed to the Sandwich Islands, and enter into treaty with the authorities there. The Minister of the Marine has placed a ship of war at the disposal of M. Perrin, on the occasion of this mission.

BRUSSELS, May 1.—The King presided to-day in a Council of Ministers. The Chamber of Representatives did not terminate yesterday the debate on the convention. The project of law, as it now stands, retains the statu quo for rice, barley, and oats. It increases the number of the regulating markets to 22, which is at present 12. Wheat, when it rises to the price of 20 francs per hectolitre, may, according to the existing law, be imported into Belgium free of duty; in future it will pay 12s. 50c. per 1000 kilogrammes when the average is between 20s. and 22s. and 3s. when the average is between 22s. and 24s. Such are the changes at present contemplated in our corn laws.

SWITZERLAND.—A letter from Lucerne of the 1st informs us that the elections for the Grand Council of that state had commenced, and were proceeding in favour of the Liberals. In the town of Lucerne, out of seven members returned, six are of the Liberal party. The same letter gives an account of a curious sentence, at Nidwald, upon a Lieutenant Neroni who had joined the free corps in the attack upon Lucerne. He is condemned to stand in the public market-place for four hours afterwards to be imprisoned for six months, during which he is to receive "religious instruction."

According to the Frankfurter Journal, the official reports of the damages caused by the recent inundations in Bohemia contain the most disastrous accounts. Five districts in particular have experienced immense losses. In that of Leitnitz alone not less than 49 villages were destroyed. Out of the 170 houses in the village of Kehl, not one was spared; and half of the hamlet of Lieben, principally inhabited by Jews, was carried away.

THE JEWS.—A letter from Warsaw, of April 23, states that the Emperor of Russia has published a ukase, declaring that all Jews must lay aside their costume and assume the national one. No one can escape from the effects of this decree longer than for five years from the present time, and even till then only by paying a sum of money.

GREECE.—Accounts from Athens describe the state of this country as anything but satisfactory. A great agitation prevailed in all parts of the kingdom, and the people were becoming more and more dissatisfied and irritated with the arbitrary and violent system pursued by the Government.

ALGERIA.—The Akhbar, of Algiers, of the 27th ult., gives the following from Blidah:—"While General de Bar was receiving the authorities of that town, on his arrival within it, a Morocco marabout took advantage of the occasion to preach the holy war in the market-place. Excited to fanatic frenzy, he armed himself with a yatagan, and rushing upon an army-agent engaged in purchasing cattle for the Government, killed him. Another person was wounded in attempting to arrest him, but he was promptly secured and put in prison."

AMERICA.—The ship Sea, which arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday evening, brings New York papers to the 14th of April. They contain an account of a frightful conflagration in the town of Pittsburg, which originated accidentally in the frame building of an ice-house. The destruction of property is said to be about 20 squares, and comprising from 1000 to 1200 houses. Many of the warehouses contained goods of immense value—they were grocery, dry goods, and commission houses, and their spring stocks had been just laid in.

It appears that an increased quantity of salted provisions may be expected from America during the approaching season. One house, that of Mr. N. C. Baldwin, of Cleveland, Ohio, is said to have killed and put up 3138 head of beef cattle for the English market, making a shipment from this one establishment of over 5000 tierces of beef. No doubt this will be laid hold of by the over sensitive and dissatisfied agriculturists, and made to frighten our timid farmers. The real fact is, that every ounce of this meat will be consumed by those who, but for such a timely addition to our own home stock, would have been destitute of meat altogether.

The Great Western steam-ship, Captain Matthews, has again reached Liverpool, on Friday morning early, with her usual punctuality. Her news from New York is to the 21st ult. The principal topic of interest in the papers is the effect of the speeches of Sir Robert Peel and Lord Aberdeen on the Oregon question upon folks in the United States, and it is with great pleasure we announce that, so far from any warlike feelings being excited, the very opposite was the case. War seems to be the most distant from their thoughts. No apprehension seems to be entertained of any war between Mexico and the United States. From the one-sided statements in the American papers it would appear that the Texans are rather favourable to the annexation project.—Herald.

WEST INDIES.—The royal mail steamer Clyde arrived at Southampton on Monday night. From Jamaica her dates are to the 24th ult. We learn from Jamaica, that the ex-President of Hayti, Herard had sailed from that place for Hayti, in the Colombian (schooner) El Grenadina, purchased for the purposes of the expedition. His motives are strongly suspected, and it is much to be feared that this enterprise will once more plunge that unhappy country in all the horrors of a civil war. The inhabitants of Barbadoes were in a state of constant alarm from the attempts of incendiaries to destroy property. In one or two instances plantations had been discovered on fire, and but for timely assistance would have endangered a vast amount of property. Yellow fever had made its appearance, but there was no fear that it would become general or prove fatal to the natives attacked. Coal had been found in some parts of Barbadoes at no greater distance than five feet underground. It was reported to be of superior quality. Sufficient time having elapsed to allow the news of the reduction of the sugar duties to spread through the different islands, it may be supposed, from what appears in the various journals, that the merchant and planting interests are perfectly satisfied with the consideration they have received from the government.

MEXICO.—The Clyde also brings advices from Mexico, down to the 2nd of April. The whole country is represented as being in a most unsettled and disturbed state. Nothing is yet decisive as to the ultimate fate of Santa Anna. He was still confined in the Castle of Perote, the existing Government being by far too insecure, and on too fragile a footing, to adopt any measures regarding his future destiny. Nearly the whole population are much disappointed in the advantages which they anticipated from the deposition of Santa Anna. They had begun to lose confidence in their present rulers. The mercantile community, in particular, were highly dissatisfied in regard to the promised alterations in the tariff, which had not yet been ceded to them. A large military force was ready to support any movement—in short, another civil war was considered inevitable, unless a more energetic Government came into power. A plot had been discovered amongst a portion of troops for declaring in favour of Santa Anna and a federal government: it was, however, suppressed for the present.

NEW GRANADA.—We have been favoured with the following extract from a letter received by a mercantile house in this town, dated Barranquilla (a town at no great distance from Carthagena), March 15, which is probably the latest intelligence in this country from the which it describes, appears to have been one of the most extensively fatal, as well as most destructive to produce and property, of which we have any record:—"An awful day's journey thence Bogotá, at the head of the Magdalena. A part of one of the snowy mountains gave way, and a torrent of snow, mud, gravel, &c., overflowed the plains for six square leagues, burying everything under it. It was, as its first outbreak, to have topped the highest trees, and that a thousand souls have perished. I do know that this will affect commerce at all; but I am sadly afraid that the greater part of the tobacco plantations are ruined pro tem." The plains of Maraquita, which are near the city, and in the province of that name are tablelands on the middle range of the Andes, which slope down to the city of Maraquita. The plains are on the western bank of the River Magdalena, and at a great distance from the peak of Tolima, which is 13,500 feet above the level of the sea.—Manchester Guardian.

INDIA AND CHINA.—The overland mail from Bombay arrived on Tuesday. The dates are, from Bombay to the 1st of April; from China to the 7th of February; from Calcutta to the 21st. The troubles in the southern Mahratta country were over, a vast number of prisoners having been taken. The chiefs at length surrendered themselves. The troops are now nearly all withdrawn. The expedition which Sir Charles Napier led into the territories of the Jackranees, Doonkies, and Boogies, lying in the mountainous tracts to the westward of Poona, has been successful.

The Panjab continues the scene of outrage, treachery, and intestine war. The events during the past month have been of the most extraordinary nature that can be imagined, even by the reader of Oriental history. At the date of our last, troops were marching towards Jumbou to attack Goolab Sing. Rajah Lall Sing had been appointed commander of the assailing force, which amounted to about 10,000 in all, with about 50 guns. About the third week in February, negotiations were in progress to avert a conflict. Goolab Sing undertook to give an immediate gratuity of £5,000 to the soldiers, promising a gift of half a million to be afterwards received by the state. The deputies sent to Jumbou had received the money, and were on their way back again, when they were set upon, robbed, and murdered, by order of Goolab Sing! As might have been imagined, this act of unparalleled treachery infuriated the army, who resolved to proceed immediately to punish its perpetrator. They were met, however, on their way, attacked or defeated by the Jumbou troops, with the loss of about 2000 killed and wounded. Afraid that victory might desert him, Goolab Sing forwarded a sum of money as a peace-offering to the defeated soldiers, who readily accepted it, and agreed that no further notice should be taken. The Governor-General maintains a strong force along our frontier, but seems determined that the British Government shall not, until compelled by the most imperative necessity, interfere.

From China there is nothing of importance.

FALL OF YARMOUTH SUSPENSION BRIDGE, AND IMMENSE LOSS OF LIFE.

A most awful calamity occurred at Yarmouth, on Friday afternoon, by the falling of the suspension chain bridge across the Were. Nelson, the clown to Cooke's company of equestrians, quartered in the town, was exhibiting the feat of being drawn up the river in a tub by four grooms. There was an immense concourse of persons assembled on the bridge (report says 500), when, suddenly, the centre of it gave way, and the whole mass were precipitated into the river.

The Norwich Mercury, of Saturday, says:—"It is with an almost overwhelming feeling of awe that we attempt to draw upon our faculties for a description of a scene of horror it has never yet been the lot of any journalist in the county, it in England, to record. In vain do we endeavour to select words which may, in the most fitting manner, portray the agony of mind which, alas! affects half the venerable population of Yarmouth."

It appears that thousands of spectators had assembled on both banks of the river to witness the voyage, leaving the bridge comparatively clear. "The clown," says the Norwich Mercury, "commenced his feat with the flood tide at the drawbridge, and had entered the North River. There were many persons on the bridge, and as he drew near the multitude rushed upon it to obtain a full view as he should pass underneath. Already had he reached Bessey's-wharf, not far from the bridge, when one or two of the rods were observed to give way. An instant alarm was given to quit the bridge. Alas, the caution came too late! The chains broke, and, quick as the passing thought, one entire side fell, and the whole mass of human beings, whose numbers were estimated at from 300 to 600, were swept into the river below. The bridge, which but an instant before was horizontal, had become perpendicular."

The scene which followed is not to be described. Amongst those on the balustrade were multitudes of children, who, with men and women, were all mingled in one death-struggle. Quick as thought, almost, twenty-seven children, all girls, were snatched from the water. Others, more exhausted, followed, and several who were insensible were, by proper treatment, quickly restored. Some of the men and women struggled to the bank, but multitudes perished, and, at length, those who were exerting themselves to save drew nothing forth but dead bodies. "In every street," says the paper above quoted, "are to be seen one or more bodies extended on biers, returning to those homes from which, but some short minutes before, they had passed in health and life. The consternation, the agony of the town, is not to be described. It is as if some dread punishment was felt to have fallen upon its inhabitants. Every face is horror-stricken, every eye is dim!"

The inquest on the bodies is in course of being held. The actual number of those identified amounts to 75, and four are still missing, making a total of 79; a number much less than was at first supposed.

The Morning Post of Saturday says, it is generally believed in well-informed circles that her Majesty will certainly visit Ireland about the latter end of July, and subsequently proceed to Germany for a short period.

The number of petitions presented against the May-moath endowment, according to the latest return, was 7629, which were signed by 982,862 persons; the number for the grant was 46, signed by 15,483 persons.

The barristers of the Oxford circuit have passed a resolution prohibiting all members of the bar from reporting for any newspapers; and the "Law Magazine" states that the example is to be followed by other circuits. The reason is stated to be the systematic exclusion of Sergeant Talfourd's name from the law reports of the Times, most of which are furnished by barristers.

The Hampshire Chronicle states that guano is being manufactured in immense quantities in Liverpool, from sand, tanners' waste, sulphate of ammonia, and a brown substance. This rubbish, costing a mere trifle, is sold to careless country people at £4 to £5 per ton, while the genuine guano is worth between £7 and £8.

The total number of explosions in the Northumberland and Durham collieries, from January, 1743, to June, 1845, inclusive, was 91, attended with the loss of 1247 lives, averaging 13 for each explosion.

The steam-vessel Tiger, which arrived on Monday afternoon in the River from Cork, was run into by a large brig on the night of Sunday last, off Dover. A man who, with his wife and child, was asleep on the side on which the collision took place, immediately snatched the infant away from its mother, and was following the rest when he put out his hand to grasp hold of the bulwarks, not knowing, in the darkness which prevailed, that they had been carried away, and in one moment both he and the child were precipitated into the waves, and were never seen more.

On Sunday morning, about ten o'clock, a frightful murder was committed at the residence of Mr. John Drake Finch, of South-street, Greenwich, solicitor, by Martha Bricksey, aged 18 years, the under-nursery-maid in Mr. Finch's family. The victim was a child of Mr. Finch, aged ten months, whose head she almost severed from its body with a bread knife. The wretched girl immediately acknowledged the deed, alleging that it was done entirely through a momentary impulse, and for which she could not in the remotest degree account. She has been committed for trial.

The usual weekly meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday in the Conciliation Hall, and was numerously attended. Mr. M. J. Barry, a barrister, presided. Mr. O'Connell addressed the meeting at some length, chiefly with reference to an expression made use of by Sir James Graham, to the effect that the conviction of the conspirators in Ireland was quashed in the House of Lords on merely technical points. Mr. W. S. (O'Brien, M.P.), announced that he had received a letter from Mr. Porter, in which he tendered his resignation as a member of that association. He had joined them probably with some precipitation, and had withdrawn from amongst them with equal precipitation. The rent for the week was £406. 3s. 6d.

Vast quantities of vegetables, especially broccoli and leeks, besides greens and cabbage plants, are twice a week imported into the Clyde from Dublin, which are reasonable supplies at this season of the year. A great quantity of ground adjoining Dublin is now exclusively devoted to the cultivation of kitchen vegetables for supplying the Scotch and English markets in the early part of the spring.

For the last fifty years the potato crop was never known to be so widely sown in the south of Ireland, at so early a period of the season as in the present year. This important branch of husbandry, which used to extend to the month of June, will be completely finished before the second week of May.—Limerick Chronicle.

Another dreadful murder has been committed in the county of Leitrim. The unfortunate victim upon the present occasion was forced from his bed in the dead of the night, dragged out into the open air, and shot in the presence of his wife and children.—Dublin Mail.

A very great number of vessels have arrived daily for more than a week past from all parts of the globe, and particularly of the larger class, from the East and West Indies, China, and the Mauritius, bringing immense cargoes of every description of merchandise. The General Steam Navigation Company's steam-ship Columbine, which reported on Monday from Rotterdam, had on board 11 oxen, 16 cows, 29 packages of fish, about 350 packages of butter, a large quantity of cheese, and other articles of Dutch produce and manufacture.

On Wednesday afternoon a numerous meeting of the friends of education was held in the theatre of the Mechanics' Institution, Chancery-lane, for the purpose of promoting the erection of a new reading-room and an increase of the library of that institution. Lord Brougham was in the chair. Amongst the ladies present was Miss Martin. The Chairman said that the managers of the institution had convened the present meeting as an appeal to the public to relieve them from some difficulties into which they had fallen. The institution had had an average of 1000 members for many years, but a few months ago that number was found to have sunk to 600. That diminution was to be attributed to the smallness of the library, and the want of sufficient accommodation for the readers. The meeting was next addressed by Lord Ronald, Mr. Ewart, M.P., the Bishop of St. David's, Mr. Knight, Mr. J. S. Buckingham, and others, and resolutions expressive of the importance of the prosperity of the Mechanics' Institution were carried unanimously, as also a motion for opening a fund to make additions to the library. The following were amongst the subscribers announced:—Prince Albert, £20; the Marquis of Lansdowne, £25; Charles Knight, Esq. (the publisher), £20; the Hon. C. P. Villiers, £5; Earl Darnley, £5; the Bishop of Durham, £5. 5s.; and G. Gore, Esq., £5. Thanks were then given to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

Within the last few weeks a new disease has been very prevalent in the dairies in and around the metropolis. It chiefly attacks cattle in the hinder extremities, paralyzing the limbs, and presents many of the ordinary symptoms of pleuro-pneumonia. The disease with which cattle have been generally affected for the last three years, although not extinct, have very greatly diminished.

Wednesday afternoon a respectable dressed man, having the appearance of a mechanic, was observed by the police walking in large letters on the pavement, between the fountain in Trafalgar-square, the words "Napoleon for ever." Upon being desired to desist, he positively refused, and they immediately proceeded to take him into custody, when he broke from their grasp and threw himself into one of the reservoirs. The water was, however, too shallow to drown him, and the police having drawn him out, he was carried on a stretcher to the Gardner's-lane station. He is supposed to be insane.

REVIVAL OF TRADE AT MERTHYR.—An advance of 10 per cent. has taken place in all the surrounding works. This is considered only as a beginning—a step to something still better. The spirit in which this is received by the workmen generally is that of gratitude, while the sun-shine all around them, and the further early advance is cherished, apart from all discontent. It is a favourable circumstance that the principal streets of Merthyr are now opening their eyes, after a deep and protracted sleep. The dreary appearance of bill-boarded shutters and doors is effectually giving way to exhilarating signs of life and business.—Merthyr Journal.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, May 5.—The supply of Wheat this morning was moderate, and last Monday's rates were readily obtained. There was a very limited demand for Free Foreign at former rates. The supply of Barley was rather short, and though the trade was not brisk the prices of this day week were obtained without difficulty. Beans and Peas were 1s. dearer. The supply of Oats was very moderate, and an advance of 6d. per qr. from that day week was established on all descriptions; though it had at the same time the effect of checking the demand. S. H. LUCAS and SON.

LIFE OF THE REV. JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE:
 written by himself. With Portions of his Correspondence. Edited by JOHN HAMILTON THOM. 3 vols. post 8vo., with Portrait, price 3s.
 "This book will improve the life (Blanco White's) reputation. There is much in the peculiar construction of his mind; in its close union of the moral with the intellectual faculties, and in its restless desire for truth, which may remind the reader of Doctor Arnold."—Examiner.
 John Chapman, 121, Newgate-street.

LIFE OF JEAN PAUL FR. RICHTER, compiled from various Sources. Together with his Autobiography. Translated from the German. Two vols. paper cover, 7s.; cloth, 8s.
 "Apart from the interest of the work, as the Life of Jean Paul, the reader learns something of German Life and German thought, and is introduced to writers during its most distinguished period—when Goethe, Schiller, Herder, and Wieland, the great stars of Germany, in conjunction with Jean Paul, were there, surrounded by beautiful and admiring women, of the most refined and exalted nature, and of princely rank. It is full of passages so attractive and valuable that it is difficult to make a selection as examples of its character."—Liquor.
 John Chapman, 121, Newgate-street.

THE WELCOME GUEST OF EVERY HOME.
THE FAMILY HERALD.—The cheapest and most extensively circulated of English Periodicals. THE PERFECT SUBSTITUTE FOR SILVER.
 The high estimate formed by the public during the ten years NIPPON and BURTON'S chemically purified material has been before it, made into every useful and ornamental article usually made of silver, particularly into cutlery, the characteristic purity and durability of silver, has called into existence the deleterious compounds of "Albino Plate," "Royal Silver," and others so called substitutes; they are at best but imitations of the genuine articles manufactured, with the view of satisfying the purchaser, by Nippin and Burton, and sold only by them.

NICKEL ELECTRO-PLATED—THE REAL NICKEL SILVER. Introduced and made only by Nippin and Burton, when plated by the patent process of Messrs. Wilkinson and Co., is beyond all comparison the very useful and ornamental, and the high character of the method of plating, (the by them only) are, as it regards wear, immeasurably superior to what can be supplied at any other house, while by no possible test can they be distinguished from real silver.

CLERICAL, MEDICAL, AND GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

In addition to Assurances on Healthy Lives, this Society continues to grant Policies on the Lives of Persons subject to goit, asthma, rupture, and other diseases, by their paying a premium in proportion to the increased risk. The plan of granting Assurances on unhealthy Lives originated with this Office in the early part of 1824.

Every description of assurance may be effected with this Society, and Policies are granted on the lives of persons of all ages.

Table of Premiums for Assuring £100 on a Healthy Life.

Age.	For One Year only.	For 7 Years at an Annual Payment of	For 14 Years at an Annual Payment of
25	1 1 0	1 2 2	1 3 8
30	1 2 1	1 4 1	1 6 1
35	1 5 2	1 7 2	1 9 2
40	1 8 9	1 10 4	1 13 6
45	1 12 2	1 14 8	2 1 0
50	1 16 11	2 3 10	2 13 11

The sum accumulated and invested, for the security and benefit of the assured (exclusive of the proprietors' paid-up capital), already exceeds half a million sterling; and the income, which is steadily increasing, is now £101,500 per annum.

The two first divisions averaged 42 per cent. on the premiums paid. The third bonus, declared in January, 1812, averaged 428 per cent., and the future bonuses are expected to exceed that amount.

Further information may be obtained of Geo. H. PINCKARD, Actuary, 78, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, London, or of any of the Society's agents.

A SHOWER BATH, with curtains, 12s. 6d.; ditto, with copper conducting tubes, from 50s.; sponging baths, 12s. 19s. 21s.; hip do., 19s. and 20s.; toilet can, 5s. 6d.; foot-tubs, 5s. 6d. Also, every description of Japan Ware thirty per cent. under any other house.—R. and J. BLACK beg to call attention to the quality of their baths, as they are all manufactured on their premises, they can confidently warrant them for durability. The illustrated Catalogue of Baths, and every description of furnishing ironmongery may be had gratis, or sent post free.—Richard and John Black, 316, Strand, opposite Somerset House. Established 1814.

FRYER'S WASHING MACHINES.—These Machines entirely supersede the necessity of the laundry brush, and the still more destructive rot of washing powders. No family is now safe from these evils without home washing. All washing may be done in these Machines in one quarter of the usual time, producing a far better colour, and with not one hundredth part of the wear of hand-washing. Laundresses may save 75 per cent. in the cost of labour, and every family one-half of their future outlay for linen, who have their washing done in them. The prices are from 24s. to 112s. Also a Machine, price 21s., that will wash, wring, and mangle equally well. Prospectuses, with numerous references to persons who have long had them in constant use, may be had at the Manufactory, 1, Brown's-lane, Spital-square.

THE ATRAPILATORY, or LIQUID HAIR DYE;
 the only dye that really answers for all colours, and does not require re-doing but as the hair grows, as it never fades or acquires that unnatural red or purple tint common to all other dyes. ROSS and SONS can, with the greatest confidence, recommend the above dye as infallible, if done at their establishment; and ladies or gentlemen requiring it are requested to bring a friend or servant with them, to see how it is used, which will enable them to do it afterwards without the chance of failure. Several private apartments devoted entirely to the above purpose, and some of their establishments having used it, the effect produced can be at once seen. They think it necessary to add that, by attending strictly to the instructions given with each bottle of dye, numerous persons have succeeded equally well without coming to them.
 Address: Ross and Sons, 120 and 122, Bishopsgate-street, the celebrated Perfumers, Perfumers, Haircutters, and Hairdressers.—N.B. Parties attended at their own residences, whatever the distance.

BARTLE and JARVIS, 203, STRAND, supply a splendid PROOK COAT, with silk facings, from 35s. to 60s.; Dress Coat, same quality, from 32s. to 55s. Fit warranted, being cut upon a peculiar plan entirely their own, calculated to fit every shape and size without difficulty, and at the same time, it may be observed, the prices are the same as those charged by the puffing coppersellers.

OUTFITS TO AUSTRALIA, INDIA, and the COLONIES.—Parties leaving England will find it greatly to their advantage to purchase their Outfits at E. J. MONNERY and CO.'S, 165, Fenchurch-street, City, where a large assortment of Shirts, Clothing, Hosiery, Gaiters, Boots, Under Shirts, &c., adapted for each particular colony, as well as for the voyage, is kept ready for immediate use, and at prices far more reasonable than usually charged for the same articles. Bedding, Military Accoutrements, Cabin and Camp Furniture of every description.—Liste, with Prices added, forwarded by post.

THE ECLIPSE OF THE SUN.

Our subject (the recent eclipse of the sun) is, certainly, rather a singular one; and yet we will endeavour to show by and-by, that the theme we have chosen will clearly apply. When we saw the dark shadow which partly concealed the beautiful lustre which Phœbus reveals! We thought of that marvellous "illumination" the trade, and which never as yet has been "cast in the shade." Competition may constantly strive to "eclipse" the manner which MONNERY'S warehouse eclipses! But still the sun's dress must of MONNERY and SON will "enlighten" the trade as it ever has done. Competition, in fact, is no more than a "spark." Which will "go out" and remain "in the dark?" But the warehouse of MONNERY—the "Temple of Fame"—"Resplendently shines" with a "glorious fame." Thus, reader, we've humbly endeavoured to throw a "light on the subject," whose truth all should know: And now we request that you'll come to the work. And wisely make purchase of "light" dress or "dark." We've all "shades" of colour in every perfection, and none on our clothing can "cast a reflection." Wherever you go you will find there are none To equal the garments of MONNERY and SON.

The new work entitled "The Monarch's Mant," with full directions for self-measurement, may now be had on application, or forwarded "post-free."

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL
 PATRONIZED BY HER MAJESTY "THE QUEEN,"
 H. H. PRINCE ALBERT,
 THE ROYAL FAMILY.

SEVERAL SOVEREIGNS AND COURTS OF EUROPE.
 This elegant, fragrant, and transparent Oil, in its preservative, restorative, and beautifying qualities, is unequalled over the whole world. It preserves and reproduces the hair, even at a late period of life; prevents it from falling off or turning grey; restores grey hair to its original colour; frees it from scurf and dandruff, and renders it soft, silky, curly, and glossy. Facts abundantly proved by innumerable testimonials, which are even for inspection at the Proprietors'. It preserves its virtues unimpaired by change of climate, and is alike in use from the frigid to the torrid zone—from the assemblies of St. Petersburg to those of Calcutta and the remote West. For children it is especially recommended, as forming the basis of a beautiful Head of Hair.
 Price 2s. 6d., 7s., family bottles (equal to four small) 10s. 6d., and double that size, 21s.

CAUTION.
 Each genuine bottle has the words ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL engraved in two lines on the wrapper; and on the back of the wrapper small lines, containing 22,000 letters.
 Sold by the Proprietors, A. ROWLAND and SON, 25, Market-garden, London, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quintin Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Birmingham and the neighbourhood are respectfully informed, that Subscriptions may be paid by Free-Traders to Mr. Charles Gough, Midland Bank, Union-street, Birmingham, the local Treasurer.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

Contributions to the Bazaar will continue to be received during next week.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRATION.

The Council of the League finding that more than half of the persons whose names are on the Middlesex Register have claimed since the last contested election in 1837, they have directed circulars to be sent to them requesting an answer as to whether they will support Free-Trade candidates in the event of an election. As it is not considered that those who return answers pledge themselves to support ANY PARTICULAR MAN, but only that they are willing to support the principle of Free Trade, it is hoped that ALL who have received letters, and are favourable to the principles the Anti-Corn-Law League advocate, will consider it a duty to return their letters answered, as it is important that the Council should be able to know their supporters from their opponents.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

THE WESTERN STATES OF THE AMERICAN UNION.

The Times of Thursday last, in its American intelligence, has one passage more fraught with significance to the Free-Trader, more deeply condemnatory of monopoly, and more fitted to stimulate the efforts of every philanthropist and Christian in the cause of commercial liberty, than anything that could have been written by the sternest foe to land-hold legislation. Our contemporary's American correspondent, who signs himself "A Genevese Traveller," is speaking of the temper of different sections of the people of the United States with reference to peace and war, says—"Unfortunately, many of the western people, as I believe, are not only willing, but anxious, to embark in a war with Great Britain, with or without cause: it would open a new and enlarged market for their agricultural products, and cause a great expenditure of public money among them."

We do not consider it necessary to assume the absolute and unqualified correctness of this writer's statement, which, we would fain hope, conveys at least an exaggerated account of the belligerent dispositions of the western people of the American Union. But there is, we fear, no reason for doubting that it is from the western states that the peace of the world is, at this moment, most seriously menaced. It is to that section of the Republic that peace presents the fewest attractions, and that war holds out the most seductive temptations. It is there that those ties of a common ancestry, a common language, and a common faith, which ought especially to unite all the members of the Anglo-Saxon family of nations, are least felt and likeliest to be snapped asunder on slight occasion. The "small cloud" lowers the most darkly and densely over the valley of the Mississippi. When we add that these western states are rising into social and political importance, at a rate of growth of which there is scarcely another example in history; that it is thither that the stream of emigration from the older states of the Union flows the fastest and most steadily; that it is there that population increases the most rapidly; that it is these states whose influence must eventually, and at no very remote period, preponderate in American politics;—we have said enough to show that the state of things described by the Times' correspondent, or any state of things at all approaching to that, is charged with the worst perils to every interest of civilization and humanity. The present "cloud" may pass away. Already it seems to be passing away, like so many preceding ones that have of late years appeared on the western horizon. But deep-seated feelings of hostility to Great Britain, festering at the heart and centre of the American Union—a permanent interest, or supposed interest, in war, on the part of those states which are rapidly advancing towards political ascendancy in the councils of the Republic—must, if long allowed to operate unchecked, produce not "small clouds" merely, but hurricanes and tornadoes.

And this is monopoly's doing. Those western people ought to be, would be, were it not for monopoly—are, in the obvious plan of Nature and Providence—the great peace-party of the American Republic; bound to us in closer and firmer ties of mutual interest, affection, service, and dependence than ever before united nation and nation. Peaceful traffic with those western people ought to be, to them as to ourselves, a first necessary of life—a thing, in no case or contingency, for no imagined interest or honour, to be put in hazard. Those western people abound and superabound in the things which we most need; they are bare and poor in the things which we produce and over-produce. They are richer in the raw material of life, and (relatively to their wants and powers of consumption) poorer in everything else, than any other people under heaven. They are the agriculturists of the Union. Their country is the wheat-growing country of America—the finest wheat-growing country of the world—with a salubrious climate, a virgin soil of unrivalled fertility, and (for an inland region) unequalled facilities for cheap and rapid transit. Take Ohio, as a specimen of the immense resources, the marvellous progress, and the prospective political importance of these Western States. The territorial surface of Ohio is upwards of 40,000 square miles—i. e., about one-fifth part larger than Scotland. At the close of the last century, this territory was an Indian hunting-field; and when, in 1802, it became a member of the Union, its estimated population was but 50,000. At the last census, in 1840, it numbered 1,515,160 souls. Its surplus wheat produce, in 1842, was 14,000,000 of bushels; yet, of its 20,000,000 of acres of arable land, little more than one-third are yet brought under cultivation. The total value of its exported produce, in 1840, was 19,670,981 dollars. And this noble state—we quote from the publication to which we are indebted for the preceding statistics—"forms but a small portion of that magnificent country which stretches from the Alleghenies to the Rocky Mountains; a country through which the mightiest rivers roll, where an unimpeded navigation of a few days interchanges the productions of the tropics for those of the frigid zone; a country which, at the close of the present century, may be supporting a population of 50,000,000; in whom the predominating political influence of the Union must be centred, and whose resources as a producing country must cause its commerce to be sought for by all nations."

Such is the region to whose resources we refuse the development for which God and nature designed them, and whose people we are allowing to shoot up into social predominance and political ascendancy, filled with all the rancorous bitterness consequent on a non-intercourse policy that is even more ruinous to ourselves than to them. "Unfortunately," indeed! They would, if we would only let them, feed us out of their exuberant and overflowing stores, and set and keep the whole industry of our empire busy working for them at handsome wages. As matters stand, they are longing to fight us; waiting and watching for a quarrel with us; "not only willing, but anxious," we are told, "to embark in a war with Great Britain, with or without cause." The connexion of cause and effect is here obvious. The "new and enlarged market for their agricultural products,"—which they must have somewhere and somehow, which they cannot have in Lancashire and London,—they hope to find in the United States' Admiralty and War-office.

Can there possibly be a more emphatic condemnation of monopoly than this—a more significant and melancholy illustration of its suicidal impolicy, its downright madness and wickedness? Bitter and reckless enmity, where there might have been cordial and zealous friendship! The fiercest repulsion, where nature designed the closest union! Arsenals of war ready to spring up, where there might have been granaries of wheat and warehouses of commerce! A great and powerful people, of our own race and language, growing up to hate us, willing and anxious to pick quarrels with us, "with or without cause!"

The present precarious and dangerous state of our political relations with the American Republic loudly calls on all Free-Traders to urge forward their great work with every energy that they are capable of exerting. We do not speak with reference to the Oregon question merely. The difficulties of this will probably be surmounted;—mainly, however, by the aid of those commercial interests and ties which still continue to exist despite the influence of an anti-commercial legislation, and whose pacific power was recently so manifest in the equanimity with which the mercantile community of New York received a startling and warlike piece of political intelligence. But it is plain that nothing can eventually save civilization and humanity from the hideous disaster of a war between the two great nations of the Anglo-Saxon race, but a radical reform of our commercial code—a wide and rapid extension of our commercial relations. It is cheering to know that in all our efforts towards this end we have the sympathies and co-operation of the best minds of the American people themselves. There, as here, the moral and religious aspects of Free Trade are recognized no less clearly than its bearings on economical interests. America has statesmen and legislators as deeply imbued as ourselves with the conviction, that all the nations of the earth have a common interest in the work of the Free-Traders of Great Britain. It is with heartfelt satisfaction that we record, from time to time, the utterance, by distinguished public men of the United States, of such sentiments as those recently expressed by General McDuffie:—"A SYSTEM OF FREE-TRADE, ADOPTED BY ALL NATIONS, WOULD BIND THEM TOGETHER BY BONDS OF COMMON INTEREST AND MUTUAL GOODWILL, WHICH THE AMBITION OF RULERS COULD NEVER TEAR ASUNDER; EVERY NATION WOULD REJOICE IN THE PROSPERITY OF ALL NATIONS, AS BEING ESSENTIAL TO ITS OWN."

THE BAZAAR.

The public interest during the past week has continued with daily accumulating force. On Tuesday, the first day of admission at one shilling, long before twelve o'clock, crowds of respectable visitors thronged the portico and parapets in front of the theatre; and within a very short time after the doors were opened every part of the vast hall was rather blocked than filled with an eager and wondering multitude. This overwhelming pressure, outside and in, continued without any apparent abatement during the whole day. The doors were repeatedly closed,—indeed they were hardly open for more than a few minutes at a time throughout the day,—and thousands of persons, crushed and wearied with the heat and pressure of the throng, returned to their homes despairing of admission. The same degree of pressure and excitement continued throughout the whole of Wednesday; and in the afternoon of that day the ladies attending the stalls sent a strong representation to the Council of the League, declaring that they were unable to bear the pressure of the overwhelming crowd, which had filled every inch of available space in the body of the hall, and effectually put an end to all facilities for buying and selling. At the same time those in charge of the doors sent in the most anxious reports of the fearful amount of pressure from without, declaring that there was peril to life and limb in its continuance. Under these circumstances, the Council resolved, though with great reluctance, to raise the price to half-a-crown, and at the same time to place such restrictions on admission as would effectually prevent too severe a pressure. Advertisements and placards were immediately issued, apprising the public of this necessary change in the arrangements. On Thursday the pressure was considerably relieved by the increased charge; and throughout the day the theatre, though occasionally too overcrowded for any thing like comfortable locomotion, was upon the whole not inconveniently thronged. The half-crown charge for admission will be continued only for a day or two, by which time it is hoped that the pressure will have sufficiently abated to ensure the safety and convenience of visitors by a recurrence to the lower charge.

Amidst the multitude of visitors from all ranks and classes it is impossible to give anything like a complete list of the more distinguished personages whom interest or curiosity has induced to visit the Bazaar. We subjoin, however, the names of such of our visitors as we have personally recognised in the throng—whether eminent from mere position, or noticeable for their zealous attachment to, or prominent services in, the cause of Free Trade:—

Large additions have been made to all the stalls since the first opening, and the articles displayed have been rendered more characteristic of their several localities.

The Shakspeare-room is that part of the Bazaar to which the largest additions have been made. It may be regarded as a new Manchester stall for the exhibition and sale of printed goods, but it also contains some splendid specimens of drapery, contributed by Messrs. Dewar and Co., of Dunfermline, which have surpassed all former productions of the loom in similar materials.

One of these is a communion cloth, having the Bible and Crown damasked in the centre, and a crucifix on each side; the damasking is of silk, and the ground unbleached flax; this difference of material gives a strength and depth to the shading, which throws out the pattern in high relief. Opposite to this is a table-cloth, manufactured by the same gentlemen, Messrs. Dewar and Co., of Dunfermline, containing a coat of arms, similarly damasked. Around the room are printed ladies' dresses, of muslin, and similar materials, contributed by Messrs. Hoyle and Co., Swanwick and Johnson, Cobden, and several other manufacturers. Mr. Hertz has sent several dresses of printed lace, a new style of dress, of such light and gossamer texture that it seems as if it had been woven by fairy hands. Certainly Titania herself could not have desired more unsubstantial and, at the same time, more graceful robes.

The Shakspeare-hall also contains a large collection of very splendid table covers, sofa covers, and curtain hangings, some of which are marked as contributed by the Messrs. Dewar, while others bear the name of Rawson and Co., Curtis and Madeley, and some other firms, whose names we shall publish in a future number. We noticed also some velvets, contributed by Messrs. Ramsay and Co.

The entrance through the lobby into the theatre has been decorated with portraits of Messrs. Cobden and Bright, exhibited for sale.

Instead of proceeding into the body of the hall, we shall on the present occasion proceed to the lower saloon, for the purpose of inspecting the Sheffield stall, and its wondrous display of cutlery. Amongst the articles displayed, we were amused to find a coffin for the Corn Laws, with a proper mortuary plate, a blank being left for the date of the death.

Some beautiful specimens of table cutlery, in handsome cases, are exhibited, from the manufactory of Messrs. Hargraves; the exquisite style in which they are finished, and the taste displayed in the handles, ferules, and other fittings, have attracted universal admiration. Several splendid pairs of scissors, of universal richness, in an elaborate style of ornament, have been contributed by Mr. Prior, Mr. Peach, and Messrs. Rudd and Wainwright. Those sent by the last-named gentlemen have for ornament admirable likenesses of Cobden and Bright, cut in the solid steel.

In the midst of so much that is beautiful it is difficult to know where to commence a more detailed account of the Sheffield stall. We will, however, in the first place, draw especial notice to the superb specimens from the extensive manufacturing establishment of William Greaves and Sons, Sheaf works, Sheffield. These consist of a selection of carpenters', curriers', and ship-builders' tools and files, and steel articles not ordinarily (as it would be thought) possessing the capability of much display. We assure our readers, however, that this intractability is overcome by a splendour of finish only inferior, as we are credibly informed, to their solid intrinsic qualities.

William Greaves and Sons have furnished one specimen which we will attempt to describe. It is a solid bar of steel, showing at one extremity about six inches of the steel in its first crystallised state after fusing.

The next six inches exhibit the same bar of steel, drawn out under hammers, into a round suitable for dies for coining.

The next six inches into a square for edge tools, &c.

The next octagon, for chisels and turning tools.

The next triangular, for machinery purposes.

The next flat, for razors, table knives, &c.; and, finally, the bar is elongated into a spear blade about 11 inches long; the whole highly polished, and ornamented in exquisite etching, save only the first six inches of the raw unhardened steel, which is left in its virginally rough state, as an interesting contrast to the finished blade at the other extremity. It is not easy to convey in words a correct idea of this unique and, to the inquiring mind, very interesting specimen of the staple manufacture of Sheffield. To be correctly judged of it must be seen. The same establishment (W. Greaves and Sons) exhibits specimens of carriage springs, remarkable alike for exquisiteness of workmanship and high finish.

Two new stalls have been erected in the upper box lobby. The first of these are Millar's glass works, with specimens of spun and woven glass, and an immense variety of vitreous ornaments, executed with great taste and skill. We could not avoid noticing an elaborate hunting piece, in which fields, trees, horses, hounds, and huntsmen are all of glass. There has been a very successful effort to give character and expression to the figures of the dogs and men, by studying the effect of attitude and position.

We particularly noticed a gold-backed knife, valued at twenty guineas, and several cases of table knives and forks, sent by Messrs. Nowill and Sons; an exquisite model of a steam-engine, executed with equal taste and accuracy, so as to be at once a handsome ornament in a drawing-room, and a valuable teacher of mechanical science. This model was contributed by Messrs. Chesterman and Co. There are also several telescopes, and an assortment of powder-flasks. There is a very rich and varied assortment of plated ware, including trays, stands for bottles, and liqueur cases.

Among the many additions made to the Bazaar, one of the most interesting is a potter's wheel, displayed in actual operation. The "thrower," as the pottery-worker is technically designated, has appeared at nearly all important exhibitions of mechanical products and skill in the north of England; and, in addition to his great manual dexterity, he has the power of describing the processes of throwing and moulding, so as to render them perfectly intelligible to spectators. His name is Thomas Mollart, and he has come up to the Bazaar from the factory of Francis Morley, Esq., of Shelton, in the Staffordshire Potteries.

The art of throwing is one which requires great delicacy of touch and dexterity of manipulation, because the slightest impression on the plastic material, during the rapid revolution of the wheel, produces an instantaneous and unalterable effect.

The china and porcelain stall at the upper end of the saloon exhibits some noble specimens of Wedgwood's unrivalled jasper vases, from New Etruria, in the Staffordshire Potteries. Among them is a fine copy of the Portland or Barberian vase, so recently broken in the British Museum.

We noticed several new contributions in the Gothic Hall. We may mention a lady's scarf, formed of the feathers of the peacock and Guinea fowl, worked into flower patterns, and producing an effect equally gorgeous and unique; there is a smaller scarf similarly worked with feathers, but we did not ascertain from what birds they were obtained. These curious articles were sent to the Lutington stall by Mrs. Hobson, of 5, Hamilton-place, New-road.

While we stood at the Camden stall, a very curious and interesting contribution was brought by Mrs. J. Gadsby. It was a series of card-medallions, each containing a lock of the hair of some celebrated leader of the League. We were glad to find that Mr. George Thompson's locks are in the collection, our clever contemporary Punch having led us to fear that all the hair of his head had been long since exhausted.

A new stall has been erected for Barnley, at the left-hand side of the entrance of the refreshment-room. It displays a large assortment of druggists and table-cloths, the patterns of which afford the most gratifying evidence of the progress that has been made in the art of design. No Jacquard goods of similar materials exhibited in Paris, during the great national exposition of last year, approached even remotely the excellence of those on the Barnley stall.

In addition to the monster stunnel cake, from Dury, displayed in the refreshment-room, a splendid cake, most tastefully ornamented, was exhibited on Monday. It was sent to the Bazaar by Mr. Wedderspoon, of Dundee.

Among other novelties, we must not omit to mention a monster sheet of pottery tissue paper, displayed in the outer hall. It is a mile long, and has been manufactured entirely from the old ropes of a coal-mine.

A whimsical illustration of the game laws is displayed on the Bristol stall. A case of stuffed birds exhibits partridges and their young brood, most admirably preserved, and so well wired into their natural position that at a distance they might be mistaken for life. Above them is a very excellent emblematic type of a vigid game-keeper, in the shape of a fox; and the stuffing of this animal is not less artistically executed than that of the birds. By the cleverness of the preserver, the fox has been given the most roguish look and attitude that can well be imagined. It would require a very slight exertion of imagination, to fancy that Reynard was just returning from having played his pranks on Bruin the Bear.

At Stall 25.—Besides the elegant display of fine Shetland shawls, handkerchiefs, and other knitted work, there are some curious oriental articles, chiefly collected by Mr. and Mrs. Anderson, during a tour in the East. Among these are—a beautifully embroidered scarf, worn by the Egyptian ladies as a nuptial veil. It was made by Arab girls, of the Protestant Missionary School at Grand Cairo, conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Leider.—An Oriental fan, from Constantinople. Turkish ladies' embroidered slippers, from do.—Ratcatlacoomb, a favourite Turkish sweetmeat, from do.—A handsome Egyptian pipe, and embroidered tobacco pouch.—Egyptian fly whisks, made from the leaves of the palm date tree.—Petrified wood, from a petrified forest in the desert of Suez.—An Indian hammock, made of dried and coloured grass.—A piece of the rock of Gibraltar, beautifully polished.—Lisbon caskets, &c. &c.

Visitors to the Shetland stall should not omit to possess themselves of a small pamphlet, entitled "A Letter to the Duke of Richmond," &c., which states a fact of the oppression of the Corn Laws on the poor fishermen of the Shetland islands, more severe, perhaps, than any other on record. Bound-up files of a Shetland newspaper, also to be found there, may be considered by many as a literary curiosity.

THE MODEL ROOM.—The first article in this room we have to notice is Budding's machine for cutting grass plots, pleasure grounds, bowling greens, &c., manufactured by John Ferrabee, Phoenix Iron Works, near Stroud, Gloucestershire. The use of this machine offers many important advantages over the ordinary method of cutting grass plots, &c., with a scythe. It may be so adjusted as to leave the grass passed over by it of any regular length at the pleasure of the operator, and it leaves a more even and uniform surface than can be produced by the most skilful mower. The grass cut off may be collected in the box, rendering sweeping afterwards unnecessary; and, as the machine can be used best in dry weather, the gardener is enabled to cut his lawns at the most convenient time, instead of being obliged, as with a scythe, to wait for rain or heavy dews. It is very durable, easily sharpened and kept in order, and its management is extremely simple; printed directions for which are sent out with every machine.

Mr. W. Gover's removable window-sash: this is an ingenious contrivance to obviate the danger of exposing servants or glaziers on the outside of windows; and, from the facility it affords of cleaning upper windows in season, we hope the plan will receive from builders and the public generally that attention which so important a matter as the safety in life and limb of a large number of our fellow-creatures unquestionably demands. Mr. Gover, we believe, has been at considerable trouble and expense in preparing and improving his apparatus, which, it will be perceived, reduces the friction of the sashes very materially, and thus facilitates their movement, besides preventing them from shaking or rattling when closed.

By the principle of this patent, the sashes may be taken with facility into the room, by merely casting off certain metal stops fitted to each; the width of the sash is only equal to the distance between the pulley-stile and the front of the opposite bead, which is five-eighths or three-quarters of an inch thick, the difference being made up by the four stops when fixed upon the side corners of the sash. The two upper stops of each sash are so constructed that the pulley-rope is fixed to the stop on each side; the stops fix with a screw into metal plates, secured on the four corners of the sash. The sashes may thus be taken into the room at pleasure, by merely unscrewing and removing the stops, which (to prevent them from running to the top of the window-frame by the falling of the weight in the box) are hung on the studs at the side of the window, the weights being thus suspended till wanted again for the sashes, when the stops are replaced on the sides of the sash. The five-eighths are, of course, gained in the breadth, which again becomes equal to the entire width of the sash-frame.

The removable sash offers an excellent opportunity for ventilating, particularly in hospitals, public offices, &c.

The small double washing machine.—This machine will wash the most delicate, as well as every other description of linen, without the possibility of injury or wear, cleaner, and of a better colour than when washed by the hand, it being cleansed not by rubbing one part against another, which wears out linen very much, but by alternate pressure and by forcing the water through the linen.

By J. Haywards.—Specimens of furnishing iron: wougey, brass curtain rods and cornice poles, purified wrought nickel silver finger-plates, and models of self-acting kitchen ranges, stoves, fenders, and fireirons.

By Wall and Cooper, of Sheffield.—Specimens of saws: machine, straw, tobacco, and snuff knives, machine plane irons, ledger blades, spiral cutters, and calico webs.

An ancient lock from the strong box of Turlton's Hall, Wolverhampton, manufactured by Messrs. Moreton and Langley, Wolverhampton. The lock is of somewhat larger dimensions, and contains much curious workmanship, and possesses 14 bolts, the whole of which are moved by a single key, working from the centre.

By Messrs. Bentumple and Clark, &c., Albany-street, Regent's-park.—A working model of a frame for making spermaceti, moulded wax, and composite candles. The moulds are made entirely of pure Cornish tin, without a particle of alloy.

A model of the cast-iron framing employed in the extension of the London Brewery belonging to Messrs. Truman, Hanbury, Buxton, and Co., in the support of their large fermenting tuns, as well as some of their vats. The first of these circular frames was erected in the month of September, 1832. On the 25th of October following, the vessel which it had to support was finished, and, in order to form some idea of the size of this vessel, it may be interesting to know that upwards of eighty persons dined very comfortably at the bottom of it: an account of the dinner appeared in the Morning Advertiser on the following day. To the curious it will be interesting to know that this vessel cannot have had less than 1,200,000 barrels of beer fermented in it, amounting in weight to about 200,000 tons.

A group of alabaster figures on a marble slab, which is sure to attract attention; in front of it are models of the Eddystone Lighthouse, and Cleopatra's Needles. A case of horsehoes, constructed on a new principle, by Mr. Rogers, veterinary surgeon; a collection of beads used in the African markets for the purchase of slaves; a collection of shells, ores, &c., from Cornwall, contributed by J. Parry, Esq., of Devonport; and several specimens of the effects produced on various articles by the great fire of Hamburg, are among the miscellanies in the room.

The following machines are shown in full work:—Pillows for lace-making, worked by females; a very beautiful stocking frame; Dyer's patent machine for making and fixing teeth in cards; an engine for striking coins or medals; a warp-lace machine; and, as we have already mentioned, a potter's wheel on the lobby.

Along the table are seen, the model of the front of a ship, constructed for the purpose of developing the principles of the lever applied to the working of the windlass in raising the anchor; several models of steam-engines exhibiting some new and ingenious improvements in construction; two air-guns, and several fowling pieces; an electrical machine; a varied assortment of carpenters' tools; and several fossils. We must direct particular attention to a chest of tools from Leeds, designed for gentlemen amateurs of carpentry; it is as beautiful as a lady's cabinet, and the contrivances for saving room are equally simple and ingenious. It has been constructed by the best manufacturer of tools in Great Britain, and has been contributed to the Bazaar by Mr. Bewley, of Leeds. We were much struck by two surface plates, on which so smooth a surface has been gained that when one is laid upon the other the upper plate will hold the under suspended by mere atmospheric pressure.

In a case are shown the varied products that can be derived from potatoes and from wheat. A very interesting case exhibits all the stages of manufacture through which two sorts of flax pass from the raw state to the perfect cloth; and two other cases similarly illustrate the processes of the wool and cotton manufactures.

There are several beautiful models of ships and steamers; religious associations give peculiar interest to that of the missionary ship, the John Williams.

Davy's patent elastic and repellent India rubber saddle and collar, contributed by the inventor and patentee, Mr. Edward Davy, of Crediton, near Exeter. The peculiarities in the construction of this saddle consist, first, in the substitution of India rubber elastic webs for the hempen webs commonly used in the formation of the seat of the saddle, whereby great ease and comfort is afforded to the rider, and much relief from pressure to the horse. The degree of elasticity on the seat may be tempered according to pleasure, by straining the elastic webs more or less tightly across the saddle-tree, and, in either case, a flatter and better seat is obtained than by means of any of the numerous plans which have been devised for rendering saddles elastic. This saddle possesses many other advantages which we need not particularize.

In consequence of the large contributions received from Clackmannanshire, including the towns of Alloa, Kellerahar, Alva, Tillinultrie, Gallsbiele, &c., the stall originally allotted to Dunstable has been assigned to the Clackmannanshire display of tartans, shawls, and tweeds. The sales were placed under the able management of Mr. Robert Halliday, of Erie-street, Cheapside, London, and Mr. John Archibald, of Kellerahar. The great success of this stall was well tested by the amount of receipts; and the success was richly merited, for the tartans and shawls were equally novel in design and tasteful in execution. It should be mentioned, as a proof of the public spirit of the contributors, that the patterns were designed for the autumnal season, and that they have risked the danger of having them imitated and pirated by prematurely displaying them at the Bazaar. Nor must we omit the patriotic sacrifice made by the gentlemen attending this and the other Scotch stalls: with them time is money, and from the tact, talent, and skill which they exhibit as salesmen, the value of their services cannot be estimated by comparison with any amount of pecuniary contribution.

A new stall has been erected for Dundee at the end of the stage, adjoining the other Scotch stalls: it is occupied by fine specimens of sheeting; duck prepared without starch, a new and valuable process, for which a patent has been obtained; check dowlas, very well suited for shooting jackets; striped bedding, and sailcloth. Though these articles do not possess the brilliancy of the articles displayed on the fancy stalls, they well deserve the attention of visitors who wish to make themselves acquainted with the staple manufactures of the country. But Dundee is not unrepresented in the higher departments of taste and design; an exquisite model of the magnificent triumphal arch erected on the occasion of her Majesty's visit to that town, is displayed on the table in the outer lobby, and it is highly creditable to the architect.

We must briefly mention some new and valuable contributions to the Sheffield stall. One of these is a statue of Hercules slaying the Nemean lion; the attitude of the hero is particularly fine, and has been skillfully chosen so as to bring out most forcibly the muscular development of superhuman strength. The countenance expresses a consciousness of power, unalloyed with any trait of ferocity, and the swing of the massive club is given with such startling effect that it almost seems to be in motion, and the imagination is strained to conceive what has checked the fall of the blow. A very splendid collection of files has been contributed by Messrs. Vickers and Co., set in a frame of polished steel, which could not be surpassed either in beauty or temper. It is only justice to the stall, the zeal and attention of the gentlemen attending the Sheffield stall are above all praise, and we are bound, in mentioning them, to add, that their labours began before the Bazaar was opened, and their exertions ever since have been indefatigable.

Passing from one great mart of metal manufactures to another, we shall now say a few words of the Birmingham stall, which is situated in the body of the hall. Our attention was first drawn to some magnificent specimens of glass dishes, of a delicate amber colour, with the ornamental parts plain. These are fully equal to any articles of the same description exhibited at the Parisian exposition, and, indeed, we can safely say that we nowhere in France met with such crystalline purity in glass as we have seen in the contributions from Birmingham. We may instance, on this very stall, a pair of elegant single lustres, the drops of which are as pellucid as that

When a dew drop lies
On its leaves of a summer's morning.”

A bronze candelabrum, of exquisite design and finish, also demands attention; there is a totality in the original conception which we have often found wanting in modern candelabra, particularly those which are constructed in the style of Louis Quatorze or Louis Quinze. The designer, in this instance, has kept steadily in view the great principle of decorative art—that ornamentation must be connected with adaptation, and that every detail, however minute, must have some reference, not necessarily direct, to the object and purpose of the article, as well as the original thought developed in the design. The neglect of this law at the Parisian exposition was equally lamentable and flagrant. We saw there candelabra and vases, the designs of which reminded us of Lord Roscommon's couplet describing French epic poems—

“Such are these things, which, like a sick man's dreams, Vary all forms, and mingle all extremes.”

Among other articles on this stall we noticed a very fine sword for an infantry officer, of the pattern ordered in the new regulations; the temper of the blade could not be surpassed; and, however averse we may feel to weapons of war, we cannot avoid admiring the skill displayed in their manufacture. We also noticed three paper maché trays, the shapes of which are newly-registered patterns, and the colouring perfectly gorgeous. Not the least interesting part of the exhibition on the Birmingham stall is a series of specimens of the beautiful results that have arisen from the recent application of galvanism, or voltaic electricity, to plating; that is, covering one kind of metal with a thin plate or coating of another kind of metal. Electro-plating will, no doubt, produce a great revolution in the application of the fine arts, in increasing the mercantile value of industrial production in England; the coating which it deposits is imperishable. We have seen silver electrically plated on an iron surface, which could not be cut by the best engraver's tool. It is gratifying to the true friends of humanity to learn that the process of electro-gilding involves no process injurious to the health; while that which it is about to supersede exposed the workmen to the inhalation of the most noxious and deleterious of all gaseous exhalations, the fumes of sublimated mercury.

We must not omit to notice two beautiful finger-plates of glass, cut into a rich design of floral wreaths; the finish of which is far beyond any that could be obtained elsewhere at such moderate expense.

At the adjoining stall of Wolverhampton we found a very fine collection of spurs, bits, and stirrups, manufactured for the South American market, by Messrs. Moreton and Langley. And also a new species of horse-shoe, designed chiefly for hunters; the lower plate, being angular instead of horizontal, gives firmer footing, does not clog with snow or soft clay, and greatly lessens the danger of cutting the corner of the forefoot in leaping or galloping, by the overreach.

The Preston stall is filled with beautiful articles. It seems invidious to particularize; but we are at once attracted by the broad, good-humoured countenances of “Tumulus and Meary,” two Lancashire peasants, who have come purposely to see the Bazaar, and who have certainly had as many admirers as any of the country arrivals. There is also a beautiful little carriage, price £30; and an exquisite screen, representing a German fortune-teller kneeling before a beautiful girl, for whom she is unravelling the future. There is a splendid hearth-rug, and several sets of miniature four-post bedsteads, completely furnished for their wooden and waxen inhabitants. There are also portraits of Messrs. Cobden and Bright, in elegantly gilt frames; and many other valuable articles too numerous to name.

Next to Preston is Lancaster stall, which has contributed its quota, and sent two sturdy Highlanders, a beautiful painting, and many other interesting things.

The Exeter stall is very rich in minerals and fossils. It also exhibits some beautiful stuffed birds, a hearth-rug of exquisite beauty, made by a blind lady, &c.

Next is the Dudley stall, well stocked, and contains, amongst other valuables, a fender and fireirons of exquisite workmanship, mounted with silver, very cheap at £20.

The Bazaar was densely crowded throughout the whole of Tuesday; and this circumstance, in the early part of the day, prevented the sales from being so brisk as on the previous days. About two o'clock the crush was a little abated, and the sales became very brisk in every part of the hall. We have not been able to ascertain the number of visitors or the amount of money received. The Council have decided to publish a full statement at the conclusion of the Bazaar, before which time it would be very difficult to obtain anything like perfect accuracy.

Several new stalls have been opened. We shall begin by mentioning an additional table placed in the Shakspeare-hall, for the exhibition of lawns, printed goods, and the other manufactures of South Lancashire. Near them we observed a pile of a new material, silk embroidered on woollen, which admits of the most ingenious and beautiful designs of the jacquard loom, being exhibited with a strong effect of light and shade, so as to give the appearance of something like high relief to the most prominent parts of the woven devices. This new and beautiful material is chiefly designed for waistcoat patterns. Those exhibited in the Shakspeare-saloon are decorated with Free-Trade devices, artistically designed and cleverly executed. In connexion with the Free-Trade waistcoats we may notice the Free-Trade pocket-handkerchiefs displayed at the Bury stall; and we do so the more readily because the rapidity with which they are being sold will probably exhaust the stock before our paper appears in print.

We cannot pass the Bury stall without noticing a literary curiosity. A copy of the original edition of Tim Bobbin's etchings is there exhibited. It is an invaluable record of Lancashire character and costume, in a state of society which is fast passing away even from the memory of tradition. Tim Bobbin's humour as a caricaturist, though sometimes coarse, or at least such as would be deemed coarse in this fastidious age, is always natural.

We sincerely hope that this rare and precious work will fall into the hands of some one by whom it will be appreciated. Sure we are that its fortunate possessor could turn it to good account, by having copies taken either on stone or zinc, or having impressions multiplied by the new process of anastatic printing.

Another Free-Trade article attracted our notice at a very rich stall, divided between the contributions of the ladies from Coalbrookdale and the cloths from Gloucestershire. We allude to a Free-Trade sofa cushion, richly embroidered with ears of wheat in heavy gold, and most tastefully formed and fringed. On inquiry, we learned that this beautiful article, though left for exhibition, is already sold, and that the price received for it was ten guineas.

The first new stall we have to notice is erected in the hall between the Shakspeare-saloon and the entrance lobby of the dress circle of the boxes. It is designed for the display of rugs and carpets.

A second stall has been erected in the hall between the exit lobby of the dress circle and the lower saloon. It is intended for hats, children's caps, &c.

A third stall in the same hall is nearly completed, which is intended to be an armoury, for the display of the guns, swords, pistols, &c., which have been sent up from the iron districts.

The Leeds stall has been a scene of activity since the opening of the Bazaar, and very considerable sales have been effected. The variety of ornamental furniture is rich and extensive; and although much has been sold, yet we are happy to state, for the advantage of those who may not yet have visited the Bazaar, that numerous beautiful articles are still on hand; amongst which we would particularly recommend to notice a splendid banner-screen, embroidered on white satin; and a choice screen, with the royal arms in beautiful needlework. There are several chairs and ottomans finished in very superior style. Indeed, it is impossible to give anything like an adequate idea of the diversified display at this stall,—worked hearth-rugs, counterpanes, table-covers, pictures, models, and a beautiful assortment of foreign trifles. We can but regret the limited space allowed for showing to advantage the valuable and liberal contributions which have been sent from Leeds.

In the model-room may be seen a beautiful steam-engine, of one-horse power, also sent from Leeds, and for which a raffle is being got up in 10s. shares. There is a curious collection of relics from the fire at Hamburg, in the year 1812, to be seen in the lobby, which, for want of space, cannot be placed upon the stalls. This applies to many other articles of manufacture and curiosity dispersed in different rooms, also belonging to Leeds.

We have to notice, among recent novelties, an improved register stove, registered by F. Brown, Luton, Beds. This stove possesses advantages of no ordinary character, being constructed in manner securing the greatest amount of heat with the smallest amount of fuel; producing a remarkably cheerful and pleasing effect; being exceedingly simple, and requiring no extra attention; which, combined with a perfect control of the draught, and the certainty of its being an effectual preventive for a smoky chimney, cannot fail to secure its general adoption.

In the hall, between the second box lobby and the lower saloon, is another interesting novelty. It is J. Crowther's stone self-acting filter, for rendering water beautifully clear, bright, and sparkling, without any trouble or inconvenience whatever. The advantages which this apparatus possesses are, extreme simplicity, and low price; facility of cleansing when foul (cleansing not being required oftener than once in twelve months); capability of being made of any form or size, and of being fixed in any situation; and lastly, the filtered water may be drawn off either by tap or pump, as circumstances require. The quantity they are capable of filtering depends entirely upon the superincumbent pressure of water to be filtered. When the outer vessel is fully charged, it will filter at the rate of 100 gallons per diem; but in proportion to the diminution of the weight of every square inch, so will it diminish in the quantity filtered, and become more limpid and slow in its working.

In the saloon, on a long range of tables, are arranged for sale a large variety of curiosities—fossils, minerals, geological specimens, petrifications, &c. &c. There are also three large autograph books, distinguished as the Queen Elizabeth Book, the Queen Victoria Book, and the George III. Book; they are superbly bound, each containing from sixty to seventy autographs, and ornamented with illuminated borders of different designs. Many of the signatures are rare and curious; those of the Anti-Corn-Law leaders are in each volume. The estimated value is thirty guineas each, and they will be raffled for separately. The tickets, 10s. each, may be had in the saloon, where the books are exhibited. Many curious autographs are also mounted on cards, and are sold separately.

The piece of needlework, copied from a painting by Landseer, “The Return from Hawking,” alluded to in a previous number of the Gazette, was worked by Mrs. Fenton, of Moorgate-street, and took her eighteen months in working. It contains seven hundred and fifty thousand stitches; therefore, the needle had to be passed through the canvas fifteen hundred thousand times. It is what is called the “tent stitch,” and is considered a very superior specimen of this work, and shows to what perfection it may be brought. There is also a smaller one at the same stall (No. 10), the subject “John Anderson,” which is considered very superior, and well worth attention. It is worked by the same lady.

As an instance of the variety of articles to be met with, we may mention that on the Kensington stall are exposed for sale two sets of clergymen's bands, and some medals, beautifully executed by Clint, commemorative of the abolition of the Test and Corporations Act, in 1825. At this stall may shortly be had a very few copies of the last work of that amiable man, consistent politician, and graceful poet, Leigh Hunt, “Imagination and Fancy,” with his own handwriting on a leaf of each book, written expressly for this occasion. We have reason to believe that the writing will consist of a few lines of original poetry, having reference to the great cause in which we are engaged.

The price of Miss Martineau's work has been reduced to 2s. 6d., and is now to be had at most of the stalls.

Some very beautiful verses, on the season, and on the operation of the Corn Laws, have been contributed by a lady, and they have been set to music by her sister. We have the authority of Mr. W. J. Fox, through whom both contributions have been received, to say that the music is fully equal, if not superior, to the poetry. The music has been engraved expressly for the Bazaar, under the superintendence of Mr. Novello, and is only to be had in the theatre.

Turning to a very different subject, we call attention to the marmalade, a large quantity of which has been received from Mr. James Keillers, of Dundee; and we can say from personal experience, that it is very much superior to what is ordinarily sold at the shops in London. It is to be had at the confectionary stall, at the usual price of 1s. the jar, and some abatement is made for a quantity.

CONTRIBUTIONS AND CORRESPONDENCE.

Of the new contributions, the following letter from William Brown, Esq., of Liverpool, the eminent merchant, deserves public notice and earnest study. It will be seen that the Bazaar is to be enriched by a quantity of sugar, slave-grown. It may seem a misapplication of the term to say enriched, yet, if this Bazaar is rich in anything, it is rich in articles made from raw materials slave-grown; and it is rich beyond any one's power to cavil at. And more, it is rich in the products of those who have been slaves, and are but now emerging from bondage, in company, as we may truly enough say, with commerce and manufactures. Mr. Brown's letter is as follows:—

“MY DEAR SIR,—I send you an order on my bankers for £100 towards the League Fund, and Mrs. Brown has contributed to the Bazaar here, £25. Many thanks to you, and our other active friends, for the exertions you are making for the good of our common country and the benefit of all mankind. Every day I am more and more convinced that the public mind is better informed, and coming round to the inestimable advantages of Free Trade. Their will must soon be irresistible. I send also a sample of 15 hogsheads of New Orleans slave-grown sugar. What an absurdity our admitting it for home consumption from the United States, and refusing it from Brazil! Can we expect anything but hostile retaliation from the latter? Slavery I deplore as much as any man; but it is not by trying to coerce other nations that we are to get rid of it. I will come to London, if I can, after the Halifax steamer comes in, to see what you are all about; how the Bazaar comes on. The samples of the sugar are duplicate; pray give one to Mr. James Wilson, and the other, when you have done with it, to Mr. McGregor, of the Board of Trade. Ever yours respectfully, “Geo. Wilson Esq.” “W. BROWN.

The following letters announcing donations have been received:—

“Brouty Ferry, near Dundee, April 24, 1845.

“As a friend to Free Trade and to the Anti-Corn-Law League, and as my income has been extremely limited for several years past, the only donation I can offer at present is a copy of one of my works, entitled ‘The Sideral Heavens,’ which, small as the gift is, will not, I trust, be refused, as a small token of my approbation of the principles of the League, and an expression of my wish that the objects it proposes to accomplish may be speedily attained. “THOMAS DICK, D.D.”

“Hackney, May, 1845.

“MY DEAR SIR,—I have been from home several weeks, but now beg to transmit to the Bazaar copies of two of my works; regretting only that some others of a more general kind are not in my possession and out of print. I am, yours faithfully,

We have been requested to insert the following copy of a letter addressed to George Wilson, Esq., by the author of ‘The Origin of Sunday Schools,’ &c.:—

“Birmingham, May 13, 1845.

“SIR,—I have instructed my publishers to forward to you (as my humble contribution to the Free-Trade Bazaar) the few copies remaining unsold of my ‘Origin of Sunday Schools,’ and ‘Letters on the New Postage Plan.’

“Sunday schools may be regarded as typical of Free Trade in Education, whilst the new postage plan embodies the principle of Free Trade in ideas, or (as the poet beautifully expresses it) in ‘thoughts that breathe and words that burn.’

“As an ardent well-wisher to the great cause which you and your coadjutors have so nobly espoused, I beg to subscribe myself, Sir, yours very respectfully,

“THOMAS CLARK, Jun.”

“To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

“Wagon and Horses, Thomas street, Manchester.

“SIR,—Not having an opportunity of attending the Bazaar, and being desirous of assisting in carrying out the benevolent suggestion of supplying a few of the many distressed agricultural labourers with beds, as suggested in No. 83 of the LEAGUE, we herewith send you cash to purchase six beds, you having the power to present them to any deserving objects of charity.

“Manchester.

“DEAR SIR,—As Mr. Bailey is not going to the Bazaar, and as I may be too busy to see Mr. Thompson to-morrow, I wish you to purchase for me, and get forwarded to some of the most needy of the Dorchester labourers, as many of the beds we before spoke of as £5 will purchase; for I can scarcely believe that anything in the shape of a bed can be had for 3s., therefore I fix no quantity. I thought to have gone up and spent considerably more, but sickness in the family and other circumstances forbid both.

“Yours truly,

“Mr. Barratt, Manchester.” “THOM. CLARK.

HONITON.—Among the various contributions received, we have to thank our friends at Honiton, Devon, for some very beautiful specimens of Honiton lace articles, a splendid silk pillow, &c., all of which have come safe to hand, and will, we doubt not, meet with a ready sale.

BLACKBURN.—The names of some of the contributors to the Bazaar having been omitted in our last week's paper, we have been requested to insert the following instalments:—The mechanics and tuckers at Messrs. W. Eccles and Co.'s mill, one power-loom, £50; Wm. Eccles, Esq., a steam-engine, complete, £15; Mrs. Wm. Eccles, a bed-quilt, 40; Mr. and Mrs. Ashburn, in cash and articles, £3. 8s.; Mr. and Mrs. Shaw, £1. 3s.; Mary Walmsley, 2s. 6d.; Betsy Walmsley, 5s.; E. Leaver, 5s.; E. Thornley, 3s.; Mrs. Carr, 5s.; E. Thompson, 7s. 6d.; T. Taylor, 2s. 6d.; P. Broughton, 5s.; S. Butterworth, 2s. 6d.; Mrs. Leaver, 3s.; E. Aspdon, 2s. 6d.; Jane Jackson, boxes, 4s.; Mr. Haworth, 5s.; J. Hindle's family, 6s.; M. Southworth, 2s. 6d.; Henry Taylor, 1s.; Mrs. Birtwistle, 3s.; Mrs. Cornelia, 3s.; E. Smith, 1s.; Friends, 5s.; Miss Tetley, baby's cap and hood, 3s. 7d.; two pair fancy clogs, by Ann Walsh, 4s.; Abraham France, one pair elegant satin shoes, 10s.; a friend, 5s.; Mrs. P. and J. V., 10s.; Thos. Wilkinson, shoes, 10s.; Mrs. Towers, work and knitted articles; Miss Baillie, articles, value 9s.; Mrs. Shorrocks, box and cash, 7s.; Mr. Hacking, £1; Mr. Railton, £1; Mr. Pickup, 10s.; Mr. and Mrs. Baron, bag and cash, £1. 17s.; Mr. G. Baron, work, £2; Mr. Knox, shawl, £1. 12s.; Mr. Hutton, do., £1; Miss Thwaites, a frock; Miss Swithenbank, a hassock; Mr. Brindle, two work-boxes; Mrs. Hargreaves, a velvet brush; Mrs. Pickering, brushes, £4. 16s.; Fisher, Liverpool, several articles; Mrs. Dickinson, £1; Mr. Robt. Barton, £1.—Blackburn Mercury.

KIRKALDY.—On Wednesday, last week, there were sent off to the Anti-Corn-Law League Bazaar in London, as free-will offerings from the friends of Free Trade in Kirkaldy, a goodly number of useful, ornamental, and fancy articles, consisting of books, pictures, ladies' fancy work, curiosities, &c. &c., with specimens of the cloth manufacture of the place, such as bed-tick, table linens, towelling, canvas, &c., of superior quality; also two chairs of antique workmanship, made especially for this purpose, from part of the timber of the celebrated Adam Smith's house, besides twelve ladies' purses valued at £5 each, and about £30 in money, amounting in all to about £160 sterling, which, we think, shows that Free-Trade principles are not losing ground in Kirkaldy.—Fife Herald.

We have received from Dundee a long list of contributions and subscriptions, which we cannot insert this week, owing to the lateness of the hour at which it reached us.

THE ROCK HARMONICON AT THE BAZAAR.—The performances of the Messrs. Harrison on the rock harmonicon, at the Anti-Corn-Law League Free-Trade Bazaar, having created quite a sensation, some account of the harmonicon itself may not, perhaps, be uninteresting to our readers. The rock harmonicon is composed, in the first place, of a wooden frame, with four horizontal bars of wood crossing it from right to left, on which (being properly padded) are placed stones or portions of certain sorts of rock, properly cut into sizes, &c., and regularly arranged in musical order, like the keys of a pianoforte. The performers, of whom there are three, are each provided with two wooden hammers, with which they strike the stones, and thus make them discourse most excellent music. The manner in which the Messrs. Harrison perform is really astonishing, and proves that they must be accomplished musicians, thoroughly versed in the principles of their art, for unless they understood the principles of harmony it would be impossible for them to perform as they do on this the most perfect rock harmonicon that has ever yet been exhibited. It has a complete chromatic scale from the top to the bottom, and its compass is so great that it is capable of performing any operatic music, however difficult. The arrangement of the keys is most ingenious, and, whether as a beautiful musical instrument, or as an ingenious piece of mechanism, it is well worth attention and inspection. The stones from which the notes are produced were brought from the mountain of Skiddau, in Cumberland.—Sun.

THE BAZAAR AND THE PRESS.

(From the Spectator.)

If it seem like reversing the usual order of things to be going to a theatre in broad daylight, the scene that meets the eye on entering is far more startling. Instead of the horseshoe sweep of boxes with Grecian scrolls terminating at the massive pillars of the proscenium, the long perspective of a Gothic hall stretches across pit and stage, the vista column and Tudor arches terminating in mimic painted window. The roof is bright with gay colours, produced by transparent paintings; and, in lieu of heraldic blazonry, escutcheons charged with a bunch of wheat-ears on an azure field, and inscribed with the motto “Free,” the badge of the League, are seen in every direction. Gothic lanterns of gay colours shed light upon the moving throng that now fills the gangways, and on the heaps of manufactured articles piled up and hanging down on every side. The coup d'œil is novel and striking: a bazaar held in a baronial hall; Paisley shawls streaming from the walls instead of banners, and the triumphs of manufacturing industry and skill taking the place of trophies of war; and, instead of painted beauties, living eharms, glowing with health and cheerfulness, animate the scene. The contributions from each town occupy a separate stall, above which its name is described, and occasionally the arms of a civic corporation appear. Manchester requires three stalls; and some of the suburban districts of the metropolis furnish forth a counter. The multifarious articles exhibited for sale defy description; and we may venture to say that such a variety never was got together in a bazaar before. For instance, at the head of the staircase is an enormous mirror, in a superb frame, priced at £200, while in the lobby are grindstones and sacks of wheat; at one stall an elegant gilt chair, covered with embroidery in needlework, attracts admiration of the lady's taste and industry; while at another a dissection of a horse's head, with the nerves and blood-vessels properly filled, excites attention. Dolls of large size, richly dressed, or laid in coats of beautiful workmanship, with satin coverlets, are conspicuous in the toy department; embroidered cushions, and smaller fancy articles of female workmanship, also abound. Manufactured goods of every description, from shoes and neckerchiefs to dresses and table-covers, mostly the best of their kind, form the staple; books also find a place; but the only pictures we caught sight of were those painted on iron for screens and tea-boards. The lower saloon is appropriated to cutlery and metal-work; and the upper to porcelain and other sorts of hardware.

(From the Economist.)

The most important and stirring sensations, in the presence of this great national exhibition, will probably be viewed altogether apart from the place and its gorgeous display, though necessarily excited by them. We see stalls bearing the inscription of nearly every important town and neighbourhood in the kingdom, containing the richest specimens of all that art and ingenuity and taste can display, presided over by the votaries of a great principle, and by those who have been moved to a compassionate sympathy for the sufferings of the great masses of our fellow-countrymen in the recent years of scarcity and distress;—who, now that those clouds are passed, and a more happy and prosperous period accompanies a time of plenty, are still willing to make any personal effort or sacrifice to save their neighbours and their country from a recurrence of such scenes as have stricken with grief and sorrow the hearts of the stoutest during the late years of suffering. We see in all that there surrounds us a silent but eloquent proclamation of the will, the persevering and untiring determination of a people expressed in a way that no statesman can safely overlook. A visit to this scene, with a knowledge of all that has preceded its construction, and a knowledge of the objects and principles which it demands, is well calculated to produce an impression and conviction on the mind of any reflecting man, whatever his previous opinions may have been.

(From the Sun.)

This is the first attempt at anything like an exposition des arts et des métiers in this country. The Governments of the Continent, to encourage the ingenuity of their subjects, have such an exposition every three years. That which the Government has neglected to do here the energy, enterprise, and assiduity of the men of the Anti-Corn-Law League has done for us, and done it infinitely better, in all probability, than it would have been done by the Government. Even should the Corn Laws be totally repealed this session, we hope that the National Anti-Corn-Law League will form itself into a committee for the purpose of giving, at stated periods, an exposition in the metropolis of the arts and manufactures of the country. The thousands who congregate in the metropolis every season, and who will flock to this Bazaar because it is the fashion, will become acquainted, many of them for the first time, with the skill and ingenuity of their fellow-subjects in the manufacturing districts. This cannot but be productive of good, and, therefore, we hope that this exposition will be, if not annually, at least triennially continued. Should such be the case this will be another obligation which the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League will have conferred on this country.

(From the Patriot.)

The glittering scene which, for several days, has been attracting thousands of visitors to Covent-garden Theatre, will be found, on subsequent reflection, a fertile source of moral instruction. The first thought that occurs to the ruminating spectator, after escaping from the dazzling blaze of unwonted splendour and the bewildering variety of the fruits of womanly ingenuity and industry, is something of this sort:—“Well, it is all over with the Corn Laws.” Never, indeed, was doom written in such distinct or in such gay characters. It is impossible to pass through the heaped-up piles of worsted-work, and all sorts of knick-knackery, without bearing away the impression, that a cause which has elicited so many myriads of voluntary offerings from so many myriads of the fair women of England, has passed that period in its history when the least doubt remained of its ultimate and even speedy triumph. But what the spectator sees is, in reality, only a small part of the affair. For once, the power-loom and the spinning-jenny, with the tread-chivalry, have given way to the primitive manufactures of the sisters of Penelope. Upon those stalls we see scarcely anything but what has been manufactured with the ivory mesh, dexterously whisked about by still whiter fingers; but, in the lobbies and ante-rooms around, there are bales upon bales of every sort of manufacture in wool, silk, and cotton, the result of that stupendous power which really sustains the greatness of our country, and before which the “agricultural mind” is now in the last throes of agonizing dread.

Yes, the League is a great fact; but this Bazaar is a greater fact still: and it affords us no little satisfaction to have entered the lists in this grand rivalry of devotion to the cause of the people. Our fair friends have made contributions more ingenious and more beautiful, and our great manufacturers have presented offerings more splendid and more costly; but we confidently challenge the whole array of contributors to produce one which could be viewed with greater interest by any well-constituted mind, than that which we venture to claim as, in some sort, our own contribution. In some obscure corner of the theatre, probably where no eye can see them, or where, if seen, they will be passed by wholly unregarded, lie some huge bundles of stocks, sufficient to make 500 beds, together with sundry bales of quilts, blankets, and sheets; the design of which is, to enable benevolent persons to purchase, at the nominal price of five shillings, a perfect bed-suit for gratuitous bestowment upon the poor peasants in Oxfordshire and Dorsetshire. How poor peasants in Oxfordshire and Dorsetshire. How came they there? In the Patriot of March 20 there appeared, from that indefatigable friend of the poor, the Rev. W. Ferguson, of Bicester, a letter addressed to Mr. Harcourt, one of the members for Oxfordshire, which we inserted at the writer's request. (A shire, which we inserted at the writer's request. A picture turning to that letter it will be found to convey a picture of misery in the midst of plenty not to be surpassed by the most destitute or squalid court or alley in the city of London, or any part of the empire. This harrowing description of utter destitution found its way from our columns into those of the LEAGUE and the Economist, and, whether owing to its original insertion in the Patriot, or to its transcription by our contemporaries, those interesting contributions to the League Bazaar which we have noticed are the gratifying result. We are sure that it must rejoice the heart of our excellent friend Mr. Ferguson, in the midst of his own deep domestic affliction, to find that he has been the means of inducing the friends of Free Trade to provide some relief for the miserable and neglected peasantry among whom he labours. Mr. Ferguson may be heard of by application at our office, and we will be happy, we are sure, to be made the medium of relieving the distresses of those whose miserable condition his benevolent researches have brought to light.

(From the Sentinel.)

The moral teaching of the League Bazaar will give a new definition of the word “destructive.” It is labour, the source of all wealth, he who fetters labour is the real destructive. Hitherto, we have legislated solely for the protection of property, and those who have made the laws have narrowed the significance of the term into exclusive limits; according to them, “Property simply denotes the possessions held by those who make the laws. The disfranchised are the mere tributaries of the property class. The pheasant of a squire is sacred; the labour of a working man is a fit subject of spoliation. A poacher is qualified for a gaol; a taxer of bread is qualified for the senate. A poacher steals game, because the owner of game has stolen his labour. The League Bazaar is an announcement to the world that labour is property, and its protection freedom. When these views are popularised and generalised—when the middle ranks can understand them as intelligibly as the operative ranks do understand them—we shall have a new interpretation of the word "destructiveness," and the mask will be torn from the face of imposture.

(From the Christian Examiner.)

Reader! have you seen the Bazaar? If not—for once we say—go to the theatre! We have been there, and still would go. The sight is magnificent; and the moral impression produced by it most salutary. We have no intention to attempt any description of a scene so splendid. No language we could use would convey any adequate conception of it. As a display of taste and of artistic skill, the arrangements are perfect; and, as a moral demonstration of the power of public opinion, when concentrated on a just and benevolent object, it will produce a powerful impression on the national mind. All honour to the ladies of England—no—but to the ladies of the United Kingdom—for the wisdom, and energy, and zeal, with which they have commenced and perfected this admirable scheme! And all honour to the wise heads and warm hearts of that band of brothers who have originated and sustained the mighty movement, for the promotion of Free Trade. As we stand in that splendid hall, we could not but feel that the doom of monopoly is sealed!—die it must—die it shall. May its exit be peaceful!

THE PROVINCIAL PRESS.—Many of our provincial contemporaries have devoted no small portion of their space to graphic descriptions of the Bazaar, accompanied by a large and accurate engraving of the interior of the theatre. We must particularly mention the Bristol Gazette, which has given an entire supplement, containing the most copious details and a fine engraving of the theatre.

WHITFIELD EXAMPLE FARM.

How to make the Labourer and the Landowner thrive together.

In again referring to Mr. Morton's book on the "Nature and Property of Soils," and to that portion of it descriptive of Whitfield Example Farm,—what it was and is; what it was when little labour and small capital were employed upon it; and what it is now, when a comparatively large number of people and a really large capital are employed upon it,—I give one or two passages to begin with, which formed the conclusion of the extracts before given. Their repetition is necessary to introduce the details of expense under the old system which follow. Mr. Morton, writing of the farm as existing up to 1839, and as a large portion of England and Wales exists up to the present month of May, 1845, says:—

"There is no fixed system of cropping, nor is there any plan for executing the work which must be performed. No arrangement is made for the performance of any one set of husbandry; all is left to chance; if the work be done soon after his neighbour's, the farmer thinks that all is well. We need not be disappointed, therefore, at the result of such management.

"The whole of the potato crops belonging to the labourers is of course carried off the land; and the little straw which the wheat crop produces is made into hulk, as it is called, for thatch. Some of this is kept for part, therefore, of the produce of the arable land which is reserved on the farm is the barley straw, the hay from the river, and the potatoes and wheat which the family consumes; all the rest is taken off the land.

"The expenses attending this mode of farming are not very great. The workmen employed are two men, a cowman and ploughman, a boy and two women in the house to manage the dairy. In harvest there are sometimes two mowers and two men to make the hay. There may be thus four additional men for ten or twelve weeks during the hay, corn, and potato harvests. The expenses of the labourers may, therefore, be stated as follows:—

Two men by the year, at 9s. per week, one boy at 3s., two women at 4s. each	£75 8 0
Say 4 men in harvest for 10 weeks, at 12s. each	24 0 0
Tradesmen's bills, carpenter, blacksmith, &c., house and cow doctor's bill	15 0 0
Housekeeping, say for four, at 4s. per week each	41 12 0
Forty bushels of malt, at 7s.	14 0 0
	£170 0 0

"The value of the produce of this farm may be taken as under, which is as near as can be obtained:—

For the last 21 years the cows have not averaged 2½ cwt. of cheese each, which gives 62½ cwt. for 25 cows, which, at 50s. per cwt., is	£156 5 0
The butter of 25 cows, at 30s. per cow	37 10 0
A fat pig sold for every five cows, five pigs, at £3	15 0 0
Eighteen calves, at 10s. each	9 0 0
Seven old or young heifers and calves, at £9	63 0 0
"Sold:—
Wheat, 168 bushels, at 7s.	58 16 0
Barley, 80 bushels, at 4s.	16 0 0
Eight acres of potatoes, dunged, at £7	56 0 0
Ten acres of potatoes, not dunged, at £4	40 0 0
Eight acres of teasels, at 30s.	12 0 0

"This estimate of the expense and of the produce is taken from Mr. Thomas's statements and my opinion of the crops.

"The amount of capital which Mr. Thomas may have employed on this farm can only be estimated by calculating the value of his live and dead stock, and the expense of labour for one year; and it may be stated thus:—

Twenty cows, at £10 each	£250 0 0
Seven two-year olds, at £7 each	49 0 0
Seven year olds, at £4 each	28 0 0
Seven calves, at £2 each	14 0 0
Five horses, at £15 each	75 0 0
Two sows and pigs, say	10 0 0
Two waggons, two carts, two ploughs, one drag, two harrows, one roller, harness	60 0 0
Dairy and household furniture, say	70 0 0
One year's expense of labour	170 0 0
	£726 0 0

"The profits, if any, will appear by deducting from the value of the produce—

The expense of labour	£170
The rent and taxes	265
	435 0 0
Leaving only, as interest on the capital employed	28 11 0
	£463 11 0

TRUTHS FOR FARMERS.

(From Mr. Mechi's Letters.)

WEEDS.

"Flax is an instructive crop; for any agriculturist, to attempt such cultivation, will find out by dear-bought experience that it is of no use to attempt to grow flax and weeds: these must all be plucked out, let the cost be what it may. This would probably lead to a weed-reform in our own crops, wanted badly enough."

SAVE A SHILLING AND LOSE A POUND.

"We are too apt to attach such vast importance to the importation of foreign meat and corn that we overlook other products of equal or greater pecuniary amount, and neglect producing our own flax, oil-cake, and oils."

WHY SEND OUR WORKING POPULATION TO CULTIVATE OTHER LANDS, AND NOT OUR OWN?

"Whilst we are studying emigration to get rid of our surplus population—the sinews of our strength—we have several millions of acres praying to be cultivated. Add to these at least another million or two occupied by useless fences and unprofitable timber—what a field for investment of labour and capital! with a considerable portion of our cultivated land merely half-farmed!!"

WHAT DOES GOOD CULTIVATION DO FOR OUR LABOURERS?

"I employ permanently on my farm and the adjoining one I rent (together 173 acres landlord's measure) ten men and four boys, with a considerable amount of casual labour; besides occasionally hiring some ploughs and cartage. I consider it wretched policy to allow your work to get into arrear for the value of a little extra labour. Formerly £2 per week paid all the wages on this farm."

LAND OF THE SAME QUALITY DIFFERENT IN VALUE; WHY?

"The immovable or stationary propensity of our farmers is strongly illustrated by the comparative rent and value of land of the same quality in different counties. In one 20s., or more, per acre; in another, 10s. or 12s. It is too frequently the case that low rents and bad farming go together; and that the higher the rent (irrespective of the quality of the land) the better and more profitable the farming; the more comfortable the position of the labourer. This fact suggests a great many considerations; be an acre difference in rent is thought much more of than the loss by mismanagement or bad farming of one sack of wheat per acre, which is worth 28s."

AN ARGUMENT FOR DRAINING.

"Strange as it may appear to those unacquainted with chemistry, it is a fact that the air we breathe contains all the elements or materials of solid matter: the earth and its inhabitants, the sea and its fishes, the birds of the air, the diamond and the feather, the granite rock or plastic clay, are alike formed from air, and resolvable into air. The Almighty wisdom, by the laws of attraction, cohesion, gravitation, and compensation, prevents any alteration in their relative positions. A magazine may explode, a city may burn away to air, an island disappear, but the general economy of nature is undisturbed: order reigns in tranquil grandeur. If air, then, is so important a material, how essential is it that by perfect drainage we should admit its passage through our sodden and, at present, impervious soils, and so render available to vegetable production our subterranean territory."

BUY FOOD FOR CATTLE, AND SAVE MANURE.

"In fact I have a great notion that it pays uncommonly well when corn, &c., is cheap, to lay out £1000 per annum, or £10 per acre, in purchasing food for pigs or other stock, provided we can make them return that amount, or near it, over and above their prime cost, and leave us their manure as a profit. This at present I have succeeded in doing with pigs. But whilst abundance of stock must be the farmer's sheet anchor of manure, we be to the unfortunate wight who neglects to keep them warm, dry, and well fed; and who wastes their manure by washing it down the brook. His account-book, if ever such a man kept a correct one, would show him a ruinous pecuniary loss."

With these extracts I at present close Mr. Mechi's instructive little book. The subject of the last extract is one that has been treated of in this paper already, and will be so again. If the reader finds Whitfield Example Farm introduced in this number of the LEAGUE, the introductory remarks will contain the continuation of the subject now attracting so much attention—the purchase of food for cattle to make manure at home, rather than the purchase of manure abroad.

I beg to acknowledge, with thanks, the receipt of a pamphlet from Burton-upon-Trent, by M. T. Bass, Esq., on "the Advantages of employing a greater Amount of Manual Labour in Agriculture." But I have not yet had the pleasure of reading it.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

SALISBURY FREE-TRADE READING ROOMS.

The first annual meeting of the subscribers was held at the rooms in St. Thomas's Churchyard, on Thursday evening, the 8th instant, when C. SQUAWBY, Esq., was called to the chair.

The SECRETARY read the Committee's report, by which it appeared that the subscriptions for the past year amounted to £54. 9s. 2d. Among the donations received were £5 from the Earl of Radnor; £5 from C. B. Wall, Esq., M.P.; and £2 from the Hon. E. P. Bouverie, M.P.

The average number of subscribers during the past year has been about 165, and upwards of 160 applications are received every week for papers to read at home.

The subscribers were indebted to the National Anti-Corn-Law League for occasional supplies of newspapers containing intelligence of the movements of that great Free-Trade Association.

The report having been received, thanks were voted to the Earl of Radnor, the Honourable E. P. Bouverie, M.P., and C. B. Wall, Esq., respectively, for their donations and subscriptions; to W. Burrows, Esq., the proprietor of the Wills Independent, for his kindness in furnishing the rooms since their opening with his valuable paper gratis; to the National Anti-Corn Law League, for contributions of papers; to the Committee of past year, for their successful exertions; to Mr. T. Griffin, the treasurer; and to Mr. W. Dawkins, the secretary.

A considerable sum was raised towards the debt on the establishment, before the close of the meeting, by the voluntary contributions of the persons present; and the meeting separated with every demonstration of pleasure and satisfaction.

FREE-TRADE DEMONSTRATION AT MIDDLESBRO' ON-TUES.

(From a Correspondent.)

On Tuesday, 29th of April, the inhabitants of Middlesbro' and its vicinity met together at a social tea party, which was held in the long room at the Exchange, for the purpose of assisting the Bazaar Fund, and more fully disseminating a knowledge of Free Trade principles.

The meeting was of the most enthusiastic character, receiving a double interest from the fact that the provision, which was most ample, was the free gift of the ladies, who so kindly assisted and presided on the occasion.

Upwards of 300 persons sat down to a substantial and elegantly furnished repast in high spirits and good humour, which continued throughout the whole evening.

The endeavours of the Committee were most kindly seconded by the owners of the various manufactories, which, with many of the principle shops in the town, were closed at an earlier hour. The really splendid appearance of the tea tables was much assisted by the uniformity and elegance of the services, which were all lent by Mr. Isaac Wilson, earthenware manufacturer; and also by the tasteful decorations of the room, which were highly creditable to the workmen who superintended them.

The table being cleared, H. Holkew, Esq. (of the firm Holkew and Vaughan, large ironmasters, resident in Middlesbro', and whose works have much contributed to the prosperity of the town), was unanimously called upon to preside.

The meeting was addressed at considerable length, in speeches at once humorous, argumentative, and convincing, by George Crawshaw, Esq., of Gateshead; Henry Pease, Esq., of Darlington; the Rev. J. M'Dowell; Mr. J. Whalley; Mr. W. Ainsworth, of Stockton; the Rev. C. Bingley; Mr. Wm. Fallows, of Middlesbro'; and Mr. Wm. Taylor, who, in a well-turned and complimentary speech, thanked the ladies for their valuable services; which was responded to by three hearty cheers from the whole company.

The evening was enlivened in the pauses between the speeches by many well-executed glee and duets, the Middlesbro' Glee Club having handsomely volunteered their services for the occasion.

Second Edition, Third Thousand, containing an improved Plan, with the numbers and names of the Stalls, and References, price Sixpence.

THE LEAGUE GUIDE TO LONDON, containing ample directions for all persons visiting the Metropolis to find their way from the various railway stations to all parts of the town; lists of the principal places of amusement and exhibitions; a minute description of the arrangements made for the great Free Trade Bazaar; and coach and cab fares, omnibuses, &c., from the theatre to all parts of the town. A variety of miscellaneous information, connected with the most remarkable places in London, will be interspersed so as to enable visitors to blend amusement with instruction during their stay. An authentic lithographed plan of the Theatre, as laid out for the Bazaar, with references for the guidance of visitors, will be prefixed to the titlepage.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXX.

TO THE HON. C. P. VILLIERS, M.P., &amp;c.

SIR,—The Free-Traders of Great Britain are expecting your annual motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws with that full reliance upon your doing justice to their cause which you have earned by so many years of able and consistent advocacy. They await the repetition of your effort quietly, but not indifferently. That you should obtain a majority is not in their dreams; nor will your dividing in a minority darken their hopes. They know that the time is not yet; but they also know assuredly that it is coming. They look to see you at your post; and you will be there. An important duty is to be done; and it is a matter of course that you discharge it faithfully and zealously. Meetings are not held, nor petitions forwarded, to strengthen your hands; for encouragement is known to be needless, and there is no discouragement to call for counteraction. The work goes on, noiselessly and surely. The silence is that of mutual confidence which cannot be shaken, and of conscious power which cannot eventually fail.

Whether much progress, or little, or none at all, be made as to numbers, upon a division, in the House of Commons, is a very subordinate concern. No great question is carried there by individual conversions. The margin of independent and convertible members is too small to allow the transmutation of a minority into a majority by any process of argument or persuasion. You speak, not for immediate impression, but for an ulterior result. Every triumphant debate helps forward the time when Free Trade must be consistently adopted by the Government as the policy of the country. The altered tone of party leaders, on both sides of the House, is a surer mark of advance towards that period than any votes of individual members. Majorities will be forthcoming when they are required. The rats will run when the ship founders. Future Muckenzies will discover that they are voting for monopoly, because Free-Trade propositions are not sufficiently comprehensive. The men of majorities can cut dirt when they are hidden; and find "to the right-about face" amongst the easiest of evolutions. You can afford to disregard visible movement towards a Parliamentary majority. You are laying the rails on which any Government that can be formed must consent to run, if it would long escape the danger of upsetting the coach.

One advantage attends this return of your annual motion: you will encounter opponents who have more thoroughly exposed themselves than in any former year. The name of "farmers' friend" is become a byword. Tenants and labourers see what their patrons are. The mask of "protection" has fallen from the features of Rent. Agricultural associations are angry debating societies. The world makes merry with Miles, laughs at Lord, and takes Richmond to be another term for the ridiculous. All plausibility and coherence is gone from the cause of monopoly. Its game is up of oppressing one class by duping another class. The last Corn Law has more rapidly falsified its promises than did preceding Corn Laws. Those who, as yet, fail to see what is wrong, bitterly feel that something must be wrong. There is talk, on market days, of corn-rents and leases. The phalanx of hostility which formerly presented itself is divided, disheartened, and full of mutual recriminations. One principle has been let slip, and no other principle has been laid hold of. You will only find a mob of sophisms opposed to your array of arguments. It is not in the nature of a chaos to be permanent: order must triumph over disorder. "Protection" has led agriculture into the confusion; but what can "protection" do for its extrication? Free Trade, from high vantage-ground, calmly watches the storm below; beholding not an armament to be destroyed, but shipwrecked sailors to deliver.

Although no demonstrations of support are offered you in the form of meetings or petitions, yet Free-Traders are not idle. They are maturing a more efficient co-operation. They are experimenting on the degree of electoral power which the constitution has placed within their reach. One name on the registration list is worth many names at the tail of a petition. For the present, you and your co-adjutors in the House of Commons represent multitudes who are only (but will not continue to be only) virtually represented. This is a better way of backing our friends than by mere words. "Speak, hands, for me," said Cæsar, as he struck down the usurper while others were kneeling. "Speak, votes, for us," say the Free-Traders, while others are petitioning. The legal emancipation of industry must be won by the electoral emancipation of the industrious. Fagot votes have been made heretofore; but our votes will make the fagot that typifies the strength of union.

Another indication of the feeling that is with you, in your repeated and untiring efforts, may be seen in the Banner at Covent-garden Theatre. I pass over all other lessons taught by that extraordinary exhibition: its display of skill, taste, and industry, and its many pleadings on behalf of their rights whose works it represents. Take only this fact, a most important one, it evinces determination. What a mass of contributions! What huge piles, yet unpacked, awaiting the clearing of the loaded stalls, and ready to fill that large space again and again! And from what a mass of contributors they come. Those contributors are of all classes, followers of all occupations, spread through all the gradations of society,—from the wealthy who give of their abundance, to the poor whose mites show the contrast of disposition and of means. This munificent supply is the supplement of similar local efforts, and of repeated money contributions. The purchasers, moreover, act under the same motives as the contributors. Buying is another form of subscribing. Here is evidence of the earnestness of multitudes. No opposition can crush, nor any delay wear out, a spirit that shows itself in such manifestations. It has a strength of will that must prove resistless. The people are determined on the destruction of monopoly. They pray for it, and they work for it; they give for it, and they buy for it; they devote to it their time, their money, and their goods; and they will have it. Else were there no laws of cause and effect in human action; no reasoning from the past to the future; no power in perseverance or in truth; and no guidance of a beneficent and impartial Providence.

We are at our posts as you, Sir, are at yours; and, while putting our own shoulders to the wheel, we note with satisfaction how steadily you pursue the course you have marked out for yourself in Parliament, undiverted either to the right hand or the left by any political or personal inducement. Your public career is identified with this great cause. You adopted it in its feebleness, and you are one with it in its might. Your name is inwoven into the record of the struggle, and will be emblazoned in the glory of the triumph. Compared with the pure fame which you will achieve, how worthless is the transitory power of party leaders, pursuing crooked paths, surrounded by suspicions, guided by no principle, and, even when they are the inconsistent agents of benefit to a nation, conquered into the good they do by better men, whose perseverance has made the expediency to which they succumb.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

STATE OF TRADE IN BELFAST.—The Banner of Ulster gives a most gratifying account of the continued and increasing prosperity of the commerce and manufactures of Belfast. New flax-spinning mills are in progress—new factories for the manufacture of machinery are erected—the house of Newton and Taylor, of Leeds, have taken a piece of ground for an extensive factory of this kind—new streets for the residences of the operatives are laid out, and the import and export trades are steadily increasing.

THE SUGAR TRADE.—A circular of an eminent firm in Liverpool says:—"Since the reduction of the duty on sugar, the deliveries have exceeded by 10,000 tons those of last year to the same period, yet up to the 14th of February, when the reduction was first announced, the consumption of this nutritious, wholesome, and favourite article of food differed but little in quantity to that of former years, thus showing that the humbler classes of society have become consumers of it, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer will find the loss of revenue not so large as he contemplated."

SUGAR DUTIES.—Application has been made on the part of the Government of the United States of America, the State of Venezuela, and the United States of Mexico respectively, claiming under treaties the admission of sugars, the growth of those countries respectively, at the duties of £1. 8s. and £1. 3s. 4d. per cwt. Her Majesty's Privy Council have ordered that, from henceforward, such shall be the case, subject to the production of the like certificates and the same declarations as are in the act required with respect to sugars the growth of China, Java, or Manilla.

THE LATE EARL OF DURHAM AND THE CORN LAWS.—Mr. George Harcastle, of Sunderland, has forwarded to the League Banner a framed and glazed portrait of the late Earl of Durham, engraved by Turner, after Lawrence's celebrated picture in Lambton-castle. It will be extremely interesting and gratifying to the admirers of his lordship, and to the friends of Free Trade, to be reminded of the facts recorded in the following memorandum, with which Mr. Harcastle's contribution is indorsed:—"On the 3rd of March, 1816, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a motion for the second reading of the Corn-Law Amendment Bill, Mr. Lambton opposed it, and moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months. He deprecated the haste with which the measure was hurried through its stages, and declared that he never would vote in support of a bill against which the wishes of the people had been so strongly, so generally, and so unequivocally expressed, as they had been against the present. Mr. Lambton's motion was lost by a majority of 162—56 voting for his amendment, and 218 for the original motion. Three days afterwards, while the bill was still before the House, the approaches to which were occupied by an armed military force, Mr. Lambton rose and stated that he considered such occupation contrary to the principles of the constitution, and moved that the House adjourn. He said, that, in coming to perform his duty in the House, he found himself menaced by a military force, and had been nearly ridden down by a squadron of horse, formed in front of the door of the House, all the avenues to which were beleaguered by soldiers under arms. Such were the circumstances under which the Corn Laws were forced upon the country, in spite of the prayers of the people and the indignant remonstrances of patriots like the noble-hearted John George Lambton." An autograph letter, written by the late Lord Durham, accompanies the portrait; and Mr. Richard Halcro, of Sunderland, has presented to the Banner a framed and glazed engraving of the monument to the Earl of Durham, erected on Peasmarsh-hill.—Gateshead Observer.

REVIEW.

Sybil; or, the Two Nations. By B. Disraeli, M.P. Author of "Coningsby." London: Colburn. This is a work of higher purpose and more finished execution than "Coningsby"; it teems with suggestive philosophy, equally deep and extensive, and affords so much scope for the exercise of reflection and the development of novel axioms into their results that we seem to have read more volumes than we have perused pages. The great characteristic of the work is its revelations of maxims, which must live for ever in the political world like the laws of the Medes and Persians, which change not, because their truth is felt the very moment that they are enunciated, and the only wonder is that they have not been familiar in our mouths as household words from the very dawn of history. The basis of this fiction—if that can properly be called fiction which deals in the evolution of those great realities that lie beneath the superficial appearances which men vaguely but usually call facts—is the condition-of-England question; and this question arises from the neglect of the stern reality that England consists of two nations—the rich and the poor; to which we may add that the history of both nations, in all its parts and forms, remains to be written. Mr. Disraeli's views of historical persons and events must be thoroughly understood before entering on the consideration of the ultimate aim and tendency of his political philosophy. We shall, therefore, begin by quoting a few of those sketches, reserving all comment until we have enabled our readers to see the direction in which they are likely to be led; for the passages we are about to quote may be regarded as guide-posts erected in a country that has been very imperfectly explored. There is much truth in the sketch of the rise of one of the new aristocratic families that sprung from the Reformation:—

"Egremont was the younger brother of an English earl, whose nobility, being of nearly three centuries' date, ranked him among our high and ancient peers, although its origin was more memorable than illustrious. The founder of the family had been a confidential domestic of one of the favourites of Henry VIII., and had contrived to be appointed one of the commissioners for 'visiting and taking the surrenders of divers religious houses.' It came to pass that divers of these religious houses surrendered themselves eventually to the use and benefit of honest Baldwin Greyhound. The King was touched with the activity and zeal of his commissioner. Not one of them whose reports were so ample and satisfactory, who could baffle a wily prior with more dexterity, or control a proud abbot with more firmness. Nor were they well-digested reports alone that were transmitted to the sovereign; they came accompanied with many rare and curious articles, grateful to the taste of one who was not only a religious reformer but a dilettante; gilded candlesticks and costly chalices; sometimes a jewelled pix, fantastic spoons and patens, rings for the fingers and the ear; occasionally a fair-written and blazoned manuscript—suitable offering to the royal scholar. Greyhound was noticed; sent for; promoted in the household; knighted; might doubtless have been sworn of the council, and in due time have become a minister; but he was a discreet ambition—of an accumulative rather than an aspiring character. He served the King faithfully in all domestic matters that required an unimpassioned, unscrupulous agent; fashioned his creed and conscience according to the royal model in all its freaks; seized the right moment to get sundry grants of abbey lands, and contrived in that dangerous age to save both his head and his estate."

"The Greyhound family, having planted themselves in the land, faithful to the policy of the founder, avoided the public gaze during the troubled period that followed the Reformation; and, even during the more orderly reign of Elizabeth, rather sought their increase in alliances than in court favour. But at the commencement of the seventeenth century, their abbey lands infinitely advanced in value, and their rental swollen by the prudent accumulation of more than seventy years, a Greyhound, who was then a county member, was elevated to the peerage as Baron Minney. The heralds furnished his pedigree, and assured the world that, although the exalted rank and extensive possessions, enjoyed at present by the Greyhounds, had their origin immediately in great territorial revolutions of a recent reign, it was not for a moment to be supposed that the remote ancestors of the Ecclesiastical Commissioner of 1530 were by any means obscure. On the contrary, it appeared that they were both Norman and baronial, their real name Egremont, which, in their patent of peerage the family now resumed."

Mr. Disraeli believes that the new aristocracy founded by the Tudors, and enriched by the spoils of churches and religious houses, gradually formed themselves into an oligarchy resembling that of Venice, and that the Revolution established them in preponderance of power; for after that the power of the Crown was a mere nullity, and popular representation little better than a popular delusion. George III., at his accession, made an energetic effort to emancipate himself from the yoke of the oligarchy. The political revolutions that followed are thus powerfully described:—

"The situation of the Venetian party in the wane of the eighteenth century had become extremely critical. A young king was making often fruitless, but always courageous, struggles to emancipate his national royalty from the trammels of the factious dogship. More than sixty years of a Government of singular corruption had alienated all hearts from the oligarchy; never indeed much affected by the great body of the people. It could no longer be concealed, that, by virtue of a plausible phrase, power had been transferred from the Crown to a Parliament, the members of which were appointed by an extremely limited and exclusive class, who could no responsibility to the country, who debated and voted in secret, and who were regularly paid by the small knot of great families that by this machinery had secured the permanent possession of the King's treasury: Whiggism was rampant in the nostrils of the nation; we were prostrated on the eve of a bloodless yet important revolution; when Rockingham, a virtuous magnifico, alarmed and disgusted, resolved to revive something of the pristine purity and high-toned energy of the old Whig connexion; appealed to his 'new generation' from a degenerate age, arrayed under his banner the generous youth of the Whig families, and was fortunate to enlist in the service the supreme genius of Edmund Burke.

Burke effected for the Whigs what Bolingbroke in a preceding age had done for the Tories: he restored the moral existence of the party. He taught them to recur to the ancient principles of their connexion, and suffused those principles with all the delusive splendour of his imagination. He raised the tone of their public discourse; he breathed a high spirit into their public acts. It was in his power to do more for the Whigs than St. John could do for his party. The oligarchy, who had found it convenient to attain Bolingbroke for being the avowed minister of the English prince with whom they were always in secret communication, when opinion forced them to consent to his restitution, had tacked to the amnesty a clause as cowardly as it was unconstitutional, and declared his incompetence to sit in the Parliament of his country. Burke, on the contrary, fought the Whig fight with a two-edged weapon: he was a great writer; as an orator he was transcendent. In a dearth of that public talent for the possession of which the Whigs have generally been distinguished, Burke came forward and established them alike in the Parliament and the country. And what was his reward? No sooner had a young and dissolute noble, who with some of the aspirations of a Cæsar officer realized the conduct of a Catiline, appeared on the stage, and after some inglorious tergiversation adopted their colours, than they transferred to him the command which had been won by wisdom and genius, vindicated by unrivalled knowledge, and adorned by accomplished eloquence. When the hour arrived for the triumph which he had prepared, he was not even admitted into the Cabinet, virtually presided over by his graceless pupil, and who, in the profuse suggestions of his teeming converse, had found the principles and the information which were among the chief claims to public confidence of Mr. Fox.

Hard necessity made Mr. Burke submit to the yoke, but the humiliation could never be forgotten. Nemesis favours genius: the inevitable hour at length arrived. A voice like the Apocalypse sounded over England, and even echoed in all the courts of Europe. Burke poured forth the vials of his hoarded vengeance into the agitated heart of Christendom; he stimulated the panic of a world by the wild pictures of his inspired imagination; he dashed to the ground the rival who had robbed him of his hard-earned greatness; rendered in twain the proud oligarchy that had dared to use and to insult him; and, followed with servility by the haughtiest and the most timid of its members, amid the frantic exultation of his country, he placed his heel upon the neck of the ancient serpent.

The character of Lord Shelburne—which, by the way, Mr. Disraeli has been the first to appreciate, and the delineation of which is one of the best pieces of political portraiture we have ever seen—is thus powerfully traced:—

"The name of the second Pitt remains, fresh after forty years of great events, a parliamentary beacon. He was the Chatterton of politics; the 'marvellous boy.' Some have a vague impression that he was mysteriously moulded by his great father; that he inherited the genius, the eloquence, the state craft of Chatham. His genius was of a different bent, his eloquence of a different class, his state craft of a different school. To understand Mr. Pitt, one must understand one of the suppressed characters of English history, and that is Lord Shelburne.

"When the fine genius of the injured Bolingbroke, the only peer of his century who was educated, and proscribed by the oligarchy because they were afraid of his eloquence, 'the glory of his order and the shame,' shut out from Parliament, found vent in those writings which recalled to the English people the inherent blessings of their old free monarchy, and painted in immortal hues his picture of a patriot king, the spirit that he raised at length touched the heart of Carteret, born a Whig, yet sceptical of the advantages of that patrician constitution which made the Duke of Newcastle, the most incompetent of men, but the chosen leader of the Venetian party, virtually sovereign of England. Lord Carteret had many brilliant qualities: he was undaunted, enterprising, eloquent; had considerable knowledge of continental politics; was a great linguist, a master of public law; and, though he failed in his premature effort to terminate the dogship of George II., he succeeded in maintaining a considerable, though secondary, position in public life. The young Shelburne married his daughter. Of him it is singular we know less than of his father-in-law, yet from the scattered traits some idea may be formed of the ablest and most accomplished minister of the 18th century. Lord Shelburne, influenced probably by the example and the traditional precepts of his eminent father-in-law, appears early to have held himself aloof from the patrician connexion, and entered public life as the follower of Bute in the first great effort of George III. to rescue the sovereignty from what Lord Chatham called 'the Great Revolution families.' He became in time a member of Lord Chatham's last administration; one of the strangest and most unsuccessful efforts to aid the grandson of George II. in his struggle for political emancipation. Lord Shelburne adopted from the first the Bolingbroke system: a real royalty, in lieu of the chief magistracy; a permanent alliance with France, instead of the Whig scheme of viewing in that power the natural enemy of England; and, above all, a plan of commercial freedom, the germ of which may be found in the long-maligned negotiations of Utrecht, but which in the instance of Lord Shelburne were soon in time matured by all the economical sciences of Europe, in which he was a proficient. Lord Shelburne seems to have been of a reserved and somewhat stately disposition; deep and ardent, he was however brave and firm. His knowledge was extensive, and even profound. He was a great linguist; he pursued both literary and scientific investigations; his house was frequented by many of letters, especially those distinguished by their political abilities or economical attainments. He maintained the most extensive private correspondence of any public man of his time. The earliest and most authentic information reached him from all courts and quarters of Europe; and it was a common phrase, that the minister of the day sent to him often for the important information which the cabinet could not itself command; Lord Shelburne was the first great minister who comprehended the rising importance of the middle class; and foresaw in its future power a bulwark for the throne against 'the Great Revolution families.' Of his qualities in council we have no record; there is reason to believe that his administrative ability was conspicuous; his speeches prove that, if not supreme, he was eminent, in the art of parliamentary disputation, while they show, on all the questions discussed, a richness and variety of information, with which the speeches of no statesman of that age except Mr. Burke can compare.

"Such was the man selected by George III. as his champion against the Venetian party after the termination of the American war. The prosecution of that war they had violently opposed, though it had originated in their own policy. First minister in the House of Lords, Shelburne intrusted the lead in the House of Commons to his Chancellor of the Exchequer, the youthful Pitt. The administration was brief, but it was not inglorious. It obtained peace, and, for the first time since the Revolution, introduced into modern debate the legitimate principles on which commerce should be conducted. It fell before the famous Coalition with which 'the Great Revolution families' commenced their fiercest and their last contention for the patrician Government of royal England.

"In the heat of that great strife, the King, in the second hazardous exercise of his prerogative, intrusted the perilous command to Pitt. Why Lord Shelburne on that occasion was set aside, will perhaps always remain a mysterious passage of our political history, nor have we space on the present occasion to attempt to penetrate its motives. Perhaps the monarch, with a sense of the rising sympathies of his people, was prescient of the magic power of youth in touching the heart of a nation. Yet it would not be an unprofitable speculation if for a moment we paused to consider what might have been the consequences to our country if Mr. Pitt had been content for a season again to lead the Commons under Lord Shelburne, and have secured for England the unrivalled knowledge and dexterity of that statesman in the conduct of our affairs during the confounding fortunes of the French Revolution. Lord Shelburne was the only English minister competent to the task; he was the only public man who had the previous knowledge requisite to form accurate conclusions on such a conjuncture; his remaining speeches on the subject attest the amplitude of his knowledge and the accuracy of his views; and in the rout of Jena, or the agony of Austerlitz, one cannot refrain from picturing the shade of Shelburne haunting the cabinet of Pitt, as the ghost of Canning is said occasionally to linger about the Speaker's chair, and smile sarcastically on the conscientious mediocrities who pilfered his hard-earned honours.

"But during the happier years of Mr. Pitt, the influence of the mind of Shelburne may be traced throughout his policy. It was Lansdowne-house that made Pitt acquainted with Dr. Price, a dissenting minister, whom Lord Shelburne when at the head of affairs courageously offered to make his private secretary, and who furnished Mr. Pitt, among many other important suggestions, with his original plan of the sinking fund. The commercial treaties of '87 were struck in the same mint, and are notable as the first effort made by the English Government to emancipate the country from the restrictive policy which had been introduced by the 'glorious Revolution' memorable epoch, that presented England at the same time with a Corn Law and a public debt. But on no subject was the magnetic influence of the descendant of Sir William Petty more decided, than in the resolution of his pupil to curb the power of the patrician party by an infusion from the middle classes into the Government of the country. Hence the origin of Mr. Pitt's famous and long-misconceived plans of Parliamentary Reform. Was he sincere, is often asked by those who neither seek to discover the causes nor are capable of calculating the effects of public transactions. Sincerely? Why, he was struggling for his existence! And when baffled, first by the Venetian party, and afterwards by the panic of Jacobinism, he was forced to forego his direct purpose, he still endeavoured partially to effect it by a circuitous process. He created a plebeian aristocracy, and blended it with the patrician oligarchy. He made peers of second-rate squires and fat graziers. He caught them from the alleys of Lombard-street, and clutched them from the counting-houses of Cornhill. When Mr. Pitt, in an age of bank restriction, declared that every man with an estate of ten thousand a year had a right to be a peer, he sounded the knell of 'the cause for which Hampden died on the field, and Sydney on the scaffold.'

"In ordinary times the pupil of Shelburne would have raised this country to a state of great material prosperity, and removed or avoided many of those anomalies which now perplex us; but he was not destined for ordinary times; and, though his capacity was vast and his spirit lofty, he had not that passionate and creative genius required by an age of revolution. The French outbreak was his evil demon: he had not the means of calculating its effects upon Europe. He had but a meagre knowledge himself of continental politics; he was assisted by a very inefficient diplomacy. His mind was lost in a convulsion of which he neither could comprehend the causes nor calculate the consequences; and, forced to act, he acted not only violently, but in exact opposition to the very system he was called into political existence to combat; he appealed to the fears, the prejudices, and the passions of a privileged class, revived the old policy of the oligarchy he had extinguished, and plunged into all the ruinous excesses of French war and Dutch finance."

No preface is necessary to introduce the sketch of the Duke of Wellington:—

"The Duke of Wellington brought to the post of first minister immortal fame; a quality of success which would almost seem to include all others. His public knowledge was such as might be expected from one whose conduct was already formed an important portion of the history of his country. He had a personal and intimate acquaintance with the sovereigns and chief statesmen of Europe, a kind of inspiration in which English ministers have generally been deficient, but without which the management of our external affairs must at the best be haphazard. He possessed administrative talents of the highest order.

"The tone of the age, the temper of the country, the great qualities and the high character of the minister, indicated a long and prosperous administration. The only individual in his cabinet who, from a combination of circumstances rather than from any intellectual supremacy over his colleagues, was competent to be his rival, was content to be his successor. In his most aspiring moments, Mr. Peel, in all probability, aimed at no higher reach; and, with youth and the leadership of the House of Commons, one has no reason to be surprised at his moderation. The conviction that the duke's government would only cease with the termination of his public career was so general, that the moment he was installed in office the Whigs smiled on him; political conciliation became the slang of the day, and the fusion of parties the babble of clubs and the tattle of boudoirs.

"How comes it, then, that so great a man, in so great a position, should have so signally failed? Should have broken up his government, wrecked his party, and so completely annihilated his position, that, even with his historical reputation to sustain him, he can since only reappear in the councils of his sovereign in a subordinate, not to say, equivocal character?

"With all those great qualities which will secure him a place in our history, not, perhaps, inferior even to Marlborough, the Duke of Wellington has one deficiency which has been the stumbling-block of his civil career. Bishop Burnet, in speculating on the extraordinary influence of Lord Shaftesbury, and accounting how a statesman, so inconsistent in his conduct and so false to his confederates, should have so powerfully controlled his country, observes, 'HIS STRENGTH LAY IN HIS KNOWLEDGE OF ENGLAND.'

"Now, that is exactly the kind of knowledge which the Duke of Wellington never possessed.

"When the King, finding that in Lord Goderich he had a minister who, instead of deciding, asked his royal master for advice, sent for the Duke of Wellington to undertake the Government, a change in the carriage of his grace was perceived by some who had the opportunity to form an opinion on such a subject. If one might venture to use such a word in reference to such a man, we might remark, that the duke had been somewhat daunted by the selection of Mr. Canning. It disappointed great hopes, it baffled great plans, and dispelled for a season the conviction that, it is believed, had been long maturing in his grace's mind; that he was the man of the age, that his military career had been only a preparation for a civil course not less illustrious; and that it was reserved for him to control for the rest of his life undisputed the destinies of a country, which was indebted to him in no slight degree for its European pre-eminence. The death of Mr. Canning revived, the rout of Lord Goderich restored, these views.

"Napoleon, at St. Helena, speculating in conversation on the future career of his conqueror, asked, 'What will Wellington do? After all he has done, he will not be content to be quiet. He will change the dynasty.'

"Had the great exile been better acquainted with the real character of our Venetian constitution, he would have known that, to govern England in 1820, it was not necessary to change its dynasty. But the Emperor, though wrong in the main, was right by the by. It was clear that the energies that had twice entered Paris as a conqueror, and had made kings and mediated princes at Vienna, would not be content to subside into criminal insignificance. The duke commenced his political tactics early. The cabinet of Lord Liverpool, especially during its latter term, was the hotbed of many intrigues; but the obstacles were numerous, though the appointing fate, in which his grace believed, removed them. The disappearance of Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning from the scene was alike unexpected. The Duke of Wellington was at length prime minister, and no individual ever occupied that post more conscious of its power and more determined to exercise it.

"This is not the occasion on which we shall attempt to do justice to a theme so instructive as the administration of his grace. Treated with impartiality and sufficient information, it would be an invaluable contribution to the stores of our political knowledge and national experience. Throughout its brief but eccentric and tumultuous annals we see continual proof, how important is that knowledge 'in which lay Lord Shaftesbury's strength.' In twenty-four months we find an aristocracy estranged, without a people being conciliated; while on two several occasions, first, the prejudices, and then the pretensions of the middle class, were alike treated with contumely. The public was astonished at hearing of statesmen of long parliamentary fame, men round whom the intelligence of the nation had gathered for years with confidence, or at least with interest, being expelled from the cabinet in a manner not unworthy of Colonel Joyce, while their places were filled by second-rate soldiers, whose very names were unknown to the great body of the people, and who under no circumstances should have aspired beyond the Government of a colony. This administration which commenced in arrogance ended in panic. There was an interval of perplexity; when occurred the most ludicrous instance extant of an attempt at coalition; subordinates were promoted, while negotiations were still pending with their chiefs; and these negotiations, undertaken so crudely, were terminated in plique—in a manner which added to political disappointment personal offence. When even his parasites began to look gloomy, the duke had a specific remedy to restore all, and, having allowed every element of power to escape his grasp, he believed he could balance everything by a beer bill. The growl of reform was heard, but it was not very fierce. There was yet time to save himself. His grace precipitated a revolution which might have been delayed for half a century, and never need have occurred in so aggravated a form. He rather fled than retired. He commenced his ministry like Brennus, and finished it like the tall Gaul sent to murder the rival of Sylla, but who dropped his weapon before the undaunted gaze of his intended victim.

"The Reform Act has not placed the administration of our affairs in other hands than conducted them previously to the passing of the measure, for the most efficient members of the present cabinet, with some very few exceptions, and those attended by peculiar circumstances, were ministers before the Reform Act was contemplated. Nor has that memorable statute created a Parliament of a higher reputation for public qualities, such as political ability, and popular eloquence, and national consideration, than was furnished by the old scheme. On the contrary; one House of Parliament has been irretrievably degraded into the decaying position of a mere court of registry, possessing great privileges, on condition that it never exercises them; while the other chamber that, at the first blush, and to the superficial, exhibits symptoms of almost unnatural vitality, engrossing in its orbit all the business of the country, assumes on a more studious inspection somewhat of the character of a select vestry, fulfilling municipal rather than imperial offices, and beleaguered by critical and clamorous millions, who cannot comprehend why a privileged and exclusive senate is required to perform functions which immediately concern all, which most personally comprehend, and which many in their civic spheres believe they could accomplish in a manner not less satisfactory, though certainly less ostentatious.

"But, if it have not furnished us with abler administrators or a more illustrious senate, the Reform Act may have exercised on the country at large a beneficial influence. Has it? Has it elevated the tone of the public mind? Has it cultured the popular sensibilities to noble and ennobling ends? Has it proposed to the people of England a higher test of national respect and confidence than the debasing qualification universally prevalent in this country since the fatal introduction of the system of Dutch finance? Who will pretend it? If a spirit of rapacious covetousness, desecrating all the humanities of life, has been the besetting sin of England for the last century and a half, since the passing of the Reform Act the altar of Mammon has blazed with triple worship. To acquire, to accumulate, to plunder each other by virtue of philosophic phrases, to propose a Utopia to consist only of wealth and toil,—this has been the breathless business of enfranchised England for the last twelve years, until we are startled from our voracious strife by the wail of intolerable serfage.

"Are we then to conclude, that the only effect of the Reform Act has been to create in this country another of those class interests, which we now so loudly accuse as the obstacles to general amelioration? Not exactly that. The indirect influence of the Reform Act has been not inconsiderable, and may eventually lead to vast consequences. It set men a-thinking; it enlarged the horizon of political experience; it led the public mind to ponder somewhat on the circumstances of our national history; to pry into the beginnings of some social anomalies which they found were not so ancient as they had been led to believe, and which had their origin in causes very different to what they had been educated to credit; and insensibly it created and prepared a popular intelligence to which one can appeal, no longer hopelessly, in an attempt to dispel the mysteries with which for nearly three centuries it has been the labour of party writers to involve a national history, and without the dispersion of which no political position can be understood and no social evil remedied."

We shall conclude, for this week, with the description of the death of William IV. and the accession of Queen Victoria:—

"Hark! it tolls! All is over. The great bell of the metropolitan cathedral announces the death of the last son of George III. who probably will ever reign in England. He was a good man; with feelings and sympathies; deficient in culture rather than ability; with a sense of duty; and with something of the conception of what should be the character of an English monarch. Peace to his manes! We are summoned to a different scene.

"In a palace in a garden—not in a haughty keep, proud with the fame, but dark with the violence of ages; not in a regal pile, bright with the splendour, but soiled with the intrigues, of courts and factions—in a palace in a garden, meet scene for youth, and innocence, and beauty—came the voice that told the maiden who must ascend her throne!

"The council of England is summoned for the first time within her bowers. There are assembled the prelates and captains and chief men of her realm; the priests of the religion that consoles, the heroes of the sword that has conquered, the votaries of the craft that has decided the fate of empires,—men grey with thought, and fame, and age; who are the stewards of divine mysteries, who have encountered in battle the hosts of Europe, who have toiled in secret cabinets, who have struggled in the less mercurial strife of aspiring senates; men too, some of them, lords of a thousand vassals and chief proprietors of provinces, yet not one of them whose heart does not at this moment tremble as he awaits the first presence of the maiden who must now ascend her throne.

"A hum of half-suppressed conversation which would attempt to conceal the excitement, which some of the greatest of them have since acknowledged, fills that brilliant assemblage; that sea of plumes, and glittering stars, and gorgeous dresses. Hush! the portals open; she comes! The silence is as deep as that of a moonlit forest. Attended for a moment by her royal mother, and the ladies of her court, who bow and then retire, Victoria ascends her throne; a girl, alone, and for the first time, amid an assemblage of men.

"In a sweet and thrilling voice, and with a composed mien which indicates rather the absorbing sense of august duty than an absence of emotion, the Queen announces her accession to the throne of her ancestors, and her humble hope that Divine Providence will guard over the fulfilment of her lofty trust.

"The prelates and captains and chief men of her realm then advance to the throne, and, kneeling before her, pledge their truth, and take the sacred oaths of allegiance and supremacy.

"Allegiance to one who rules over the land that the great Macedonian could not conquer; and over a continent of which even Columbus never dreamed: to the Queen of every sea, and of nations in every zone.

"It is not of these that I would speak; but of a nation nearer her footstool, and which at this moment looks to her with anxiety, with affection, perhaps with hope. Fair and serene, she has the blood and beauty of the Saxon. Will it be her proud destiny at length to bear relief to suffering millions, and with that soft hand which might inspire troubadours and guerdon knights, break the last links in the chain of Saxon thralldom?"

MORE COMFORT FOR COUNTY MEMBERS.

In politics, as in other affairs, the easiness with which dupes are deceived forms no excuse for the deceivers; and perhaps none of the deceived are more angry, when they have discovered the deception, than those who have been more than half consenting to the fraud. The man who obtained the folk's money to see him get into a quart bottle must have doubtless chuckled at his own ingenuity and the gullibility of his dupes, so long as tickets for the show were selling and the day of the promised performance was distant; but how was it when the wonder-mongers found that the exhibitor had no more power to get into the bottle than they had? It was no use for the luckless conjuror to say men cannot get into quart bottles; that it was physically impossible; the laws of nature forbid it: for the instant response was, You promised to do it, you took from us what you wanted, our money, to enable you to do it, and do it you shall, or we will find somebody else who will; at all events return us our money, obtained from us under false pretences. And suppose that, in answer to this hubbub, the conjuror should calmly say, "True, I did promise to get into the bottle, but I find it impossible to do so; but I think you will be quite as much gratified if, instead of getting into the bottle, I show you how I can swallow its contents. As for returning the money,—that is out of the question, it is contrary to my sense of my public duty." The aspect of the relations between the conjuror and the non-conjured spectators would, at this stage of the controversy, be somewhat threatening. Now, this very neary represents the relative positions of the monopolist county members and their Pro-Corn-Law agricultural constituents. The county members, when elected, promised to do that which most of them then knew, and all now admit, to have been impossible; and they have no more right to expect that the farmers, whom they tricked out of their votes, are to be appeased by demonstrating the impossibility of performing the things promised, than the conjuror had to expect his constituents to be quieted by the same argument. The farmers fairly enough say, Possible or impossible, you promised to do it, and do it you shall; or at all events give us back that which was the payment for its performance, the county representation. The following extracts from the Morning Post's report of the Exeter District Agricultural Protection Society puts this in a strong light. The society met "For the purpose of considering the propriety of memorializing the county members on the present depressed condition of the agricultural interest."

The meeting is said to have been attended by "a large body of tenant-farmers,"—though the reporter judiciously abstains from mentioning the number,—while a few squire and clergymen are specified by name. Sir R. W. Newman (in the chair) read the excuses of the county members for non-attendance.

Wm. Porter, Esq., opened the first fire on the county members, though it was not a very raking one:—

"He regretted very much that a necessity should have arisen for convening this special meeting, and he did think it reflected somewhat upon the members for the county that they had not acted up to the professions they had made on their election. (Hear, hear.) He did think, when they had occasion to ask their representatives to give their strenuous support to the agricultural interest, it did look a little as if those representatives had not given that strenuous support which they ought, and which they promised to give. (Cheers.) He recollected, at the last election, that many of them had come forward, and had stated certain measures which they were prepared and anxious to support; but it had been with them as it had been with many other members, as soon as they had been elected they had ceased to recollect those measures—they had gone with their party, and, forgetting the measures to which they were pledged, had remembered only the men. (Cheers.)"

The remedy for all this is to elect members who are of the people, and of no party; and Mr. Porter concluded by moving the following resolution:—

"That this meeting, viewing with serious alarm the great depreciation in the value of agricultural produce which has taken place within the last few years, respectfully but firmly call upon the members for the county to urge on the Ministers the necessity of supporting the agricultural interest, and by every means in their power to seek to place agriculture in a better position."

This is sad nonsense, and means only that the monopolist landlords have not yet quite exhausted their pretences for deluding the farmers into the support of high rents. Mr. Porter only hinted doubts and hesitated dislike of the tariff and the Canada Corn Bill, while Mr. Trood, a farmer, proposed to "urge upon the county members the necessity for revising those laws;" a suggestion about as practical as if they had been "urged to revise" the law of gravitation. Mr. Trood and his fellow-tenants, however, may fairly say they "promised as much and more, when we elected them."

J. Palk, Esq.—another squire—followed, who, amidst much Canada-Corn-Bill absurdity, gave the following testimony to the uncertainty the Corn

Laws had brought into the business of a farmer. He said:—

"He believed that the feeling of the landlords throughout the country was to meet the tenants in a fair and liberal spirit, not only with respect to the expenditure of capital in permanent improvement, but with reference also to the duration of leases. But so long as they found in every session some new theory, unjust towards the agriculturists, and wholly unfounded in fact, broached and favourably received, it was very difficult for any landlord to know what lease he could grant, and very difficult for any tenant to determine what lease he ought to take. (Hear, hear.)"

Let tenants assume that prices will be moderate, and then insist upon long leases, and then they need not be alarmed at the buggaboo story of any mortgaged squire about foreign competition. Mr. Palk concluded with a true landowners' resolution, to shift the local taxation which falls on rent—and little enough it is—upon the shoulders of the industrious community:—

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, land has to bear, in addition to the land-tax, peculiar burdens in the shape of rates (more particularly the poor, highway, and county rates), and it would be a great relief to agriculture to make them a national charge, to which property of all descriptions should contribute."

To accomplish this truly landlord-patriotic scheme

"The landlords and tenants must act together. (Cheers.) Day by day they must strengthen the bonds which united them. (Hear, hear.) It was folly to say that either could exist without the other—together they must rise or together fall. It would never do for the landlord to be lukewarm or the tenant distrustful. The landlord must be active, and the tenant must have full confidence in him, if they would hope to force upon the Legislature those measures which were absolutely necessary to the existence of agriculture."

The contrary of all these pretences is the truth. Has not the tenant had "full confidence" in the landlord the last thirty years? And has not the result of that confidence been to strip the tenant of his capital to uphold the landlord's rent?

Mr. George Turner, a farmer, who formed one of the deputation of the "Central Protection Society" to Sir Robert Peel, bore testimony to delusions under which the tenant-farmers brought the present Ministry into power, and he ended with this notable bit of logic:—

"He had been an extensive practical farmer for a great number of years, and he declared to them that he had never paid so much upon his estate as he had done within the last three years, and he had never received so little income. (Hear, hear.) If that was not a clear case for demanding some assistance from the Legislature he did not know what was."

Did it never occur to Mr. Turner that monopoly rents and natural prices, together with restrictions upon the import of cheaper cattle provender, might have something to do with the diminution of his income from farming? We should like to know what practical measure of "assistance" the Legislature could give him, save one, namely—Free Trade.

Mr. Chapple, a farmer, then, in a fierce speech, said:—

"Every man who was farming land at twenty shillings an acre at the present price was losing money. (Hear, hear.) What, then, was to be done? It might be that the members would say, 'Tell us what to do.' His answer to them would be, 'Let them go to Sir Robert Peel and tell him plainly that they will not support him to ruin us.' (Hear, hear.)"

And he wound up with this peremptory resolution:—

"That the secretary be directed to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of the county members, with a request that he will use his most strenuous exertion to force on the attention of her Majesty's Ministers the principles contained in them."

Now, if farmers would look reasonably at the history of our Corn-Law legislation, and the alternations of high and low prices by which it has been accompanied; and if they would notice that all the gains of monopoly—if any gains there have been—have gone into the landlords' pockets in the shape of high rents, they could not fail to perceive that all these topics urged at protection only serve to misdirect their attention from the real remedy. Let them get their business on a safe foundation, and farming, when skilfully conducted, will become as profitable as any other business.

Sir R. W. Newman, in returning thanks, remarked on some of the passionate sentiments of the previous speakers, saying:—

"That, however efficient their county members might be, and however efficient other county members might be, he almost doubted whether justice would be done them, unless they were prepared to suggest, or to assist them, members in pointing out, some ill which should be taken; and this they had hitherto neglected to do. ('We are very ready to do it.') Although these meetings were all very proper, no doubt they could hardly have had as- perimented of late."

He thought there should be an inquiry:—

"All he wanted was fair play. (Hear, hear.) He thought they had had very foul play. (Hear, hear.) There was nothing like truth; and truth was not to be elicited by hearing only one side. Let them have a fair opportunity of stating before a competent tribunal that which they believed to be the truth, and let those who thought differently have the same opportunity. The legitimate mode of proceeding would be by an inquiry before a parliamentary committee; and before that committee every interest in the country should take a full opportunity of expressing its own views; then let the evidence on either side be collected, and let the Parliament decide. Let those who said the agriculturists had peculiar burdens prove their assertion if they could."

Now, this is in effect what Mr. Cobden and the Free-Traders have been asking for, without success, at the hands of the squirearchy. The only change we would make in the proposition is, that the landowners should prove their peculiar burdens if they can, for no one can be honestly asked to prove a negative.

"HEAVILY ENCUMBERED ESTATES."

We have often had occasion to quote from the Morning Post some very simple confessions by landlord correspondents, that the chief object of the Corn Laws is to save the nominal owners of "heavily encumbered estates" from the necessity of cutting their coats according to their cloth; but, perhaps, the most forcible illustration of the shifts to which some of the mortgaged proprietors are driven to save appearances will be found in the following advertisement, which appeared in the Post of Monday:—

"To Sportsmen.—Shooting over about 5000 acres, nearly 500 of which are covered full of game. It is an exclusive right, and has been constantly preserved for above a century. Capital rook-shooting also.—Any nobleman or gentleman of the highest respectability (married or single, without children) desirous of sharing in the above sport, might board and lodge with the family for any period from the 1st of July to the 1st of February, to include wines, ices, fruit, and nearly every luxury. The mansion is recently and elegantly furnished with a (Taverton's) modern full-sized billiard-table, pianoforte, &c. &c., situate near a railway station, two hours' journey from London, from which it is under fifty miles. Letters pre-paid, addressed to A. Z., at Mr. Mudie's Library, Upper King-street, Bloomsbury. N.B. Use of two carriages and three horses, and a pew in the church."

What a combination of meanness and profusion, of real poverty and seeming luxury, does the above advertisement suggest! How harmoniously the spirit of huckster and the fashionable and extravagant idler blends! Imagine the condition of the occupying tenants of 5000 acres, "full of game," and "preserved for above a century," the nominal owner of which advertises to "board and lodge any nobleman or gentleman of the highest respectability"—meaning one who will pay well—"married or single"! !!

AN UNANSWERED ARGUMENT.

The following paragraph, from the Sussex Advertiser, exposes the utter hollowness of one of the now nearly exploded monopolist false pretences:—

"The emptiness of the threat, for it is no less, that agriculture will deteriorate—in short—that land will go out of cultivation if low prices continue, has been daily and hourly exposed. The most practical and unanswerable reply to such an assertion, however, was lately given by a poor labourer at a county meeting. A certain baronet was declaring his conviction that not only would rents be annihilated, under Free Trade, but that the land could not be cultivated, rent free, to a profit; upon which a labourer called out 'Give I five acres, Sir John, give I five acres.' The worthy protectionist asserted, that if he did the peasant could not cultivate it; but his sturdy petitioner only reiterated 'Try I, Sir John, Try I,'—a request the honourable baronet thought fit to decline, though wholly unable to rebut the argument it contained."

SECURE TENURES.

Every agricultural authority has repudiated the nonsense we used to hear some months since of the "mutual confidence" between landlord and tenant being equivalent to a lease. The following passage from the Mark-lane Express leading article of last Monday shows how indispensable secure tenure for a considerable period is to success in farming; and how mischievous the Corn-Law system, with its ups and downs and perpetual failures to secure permanently high prices, has proved:—

"A state of doubt and uncertainty as to the impost, alteration, or repeal of custom duties upon any article is always prejudicial to the interests of the parties engaged in that trade, be it what it may. In many branches of business, where the nature of them is such as not to require a large stock to be kept, the inconvenience is less, and the loss may be reduced by getting out of stock; but, when it is essential to have a large stock, the 'getting out' is almost tantamount to breaking up the business. Now, the farmer—especially the arable land farmer—is a manufacturer in the real, although not in the ordinary, acceptance of the term. Unless he is so fortunate as to obtain a farm in good working order—a circumstance which occurs but rarely—it takes him years to 'get into stock,' that is, to bring his land into a proper state; and, should occasion require that he should quit his farm, it will take him some years to 'get out,' that is, to obtain such a return from the soil as the out-let he has made entitles him to. He then, above all men, most stands in need of security of tenure and steadiness of price. The very nature of his occupation, so influenced by weather and seasons, necessarily exposes him to a degree of variation in prices which is unavoidable; but these are vicissitudes over which he has no control, and at which it becomes us not to reprove. These remarks, however, do not apply to the alterations in prices occasioned by legislation; and hence it is of vital importance to him that his interests should not be exposed to the caprices of a minister, or the changes of political party. The stand made by the Government, in the last week, against the proposition for letting in Australian corn upon the same terms as Canadian, will doubtless be taken by some as an earnest of their determination to stand by the present Corn Laws, and they may do so for a short time; but it is not security of two or three years, it is security for several rotations of cropping, that the farmer requires. Those persons who wilfully mislead, or who, knowing it, screen the truth from the farmers who have not such opportunities of learning the advance Free-Trade principles are making, are not only guilty of a dereliction of principle, but of a moral fraud."

Now, can any one doubt that the Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham, and the 17, Bond-street clique of monopolists, are, upon the showing of one of their own organs, guilty of a moral fraud? Don't they tell the farmers that the present Corn Laws shall be maintained, and don't they well know that such maintenance is absolutely impossible?

FARMERS' GRIEVANCES; HEDGEROW TIMBER.

When Lord Malmesbury let out, the other day, in the House of Lords, that the object of preserving timber was to enable the owner of land to save himself in bad years from loss of income by means of a fall of timber, he could scarcely have known how deeply this subject is affecting the minds of the tenant-farmers. The following passages, from a discussion which occurred upon the subject a few days ago at the Farmers' Club House, will serve to show what farmers—most of those present were protectionists—think of the matter. Mr. Knight, who opened the discussion, said:—

"He believed that, with regard to the tenant-farmers, this subject came next in importance to game—it was, in fact, the next greatest nuisance. He regarded game as nuisance number one, and hedgerow timber as nuisance number two. In order to show the disadvantages to the landlord from growing hedgerow timber, let them take, for example, 200 acres of land divided into enclosures of from five to fifteen acres each, and suppose the land to be worth 30s. an acre. Now, there was no tenant who would object to pay a shilling an acre more for the land, on condition that no timber was grown in the hedgerows; and this would answer the purpose of the landlord very well, for, in the course of fifty years, the additional rent put to compound interest would amount to a much larger sum than the timber would realize, and the tenant would, at the same time, be greatly benefited."

He assumed land to be worth only 1s. an acre more without timber, and then the landlord would be a gainer. As to the use of timber, he said:—

"It might be argued by some that it was not desirable entirely to get rid of the timber from a farm, as a certain quantity was required for repairs and other such purposes; but the fact was, that it was much cheaper in the end to buy whatever timber you wanted for repairs, than to cut timber from the hedgerows and work it up. He was himself under a repairing lease, and was allowed what timber he wanted; but he rarely cut any, except in the way of knocking down an old tree which might happen to stand in the way."

This is quite true, and an excellent Free-Trade argument it is, Mr. Knight. He then added:—

"Another advantage in getting rid of timber was, that you also got rid of a very great obstacle to draining presented by the roots, which frequently choked the drain up altogether; and good draining was a permanent advantage to the landlord. He now came to the consideration of the second part of the subject, namely, the interests of the tenants; and, in approaching that, he had no hesitation in saying that there were very few who would not readily meet their landlords upon the question of a small increase of rent for getting rid of so great a nuisance."

And he referred to various private and published statements in corroboration of his views.

Mr. Anderson, a land-agent, also said:—

"That he had discussed the subject with the late Lord Spencer, and the present Duke of Bedford when Marquis of Tavistock. On the Duke of Bedford's estate the rule was to cut down the timber every ten years. On each side of the rows were a hedge and ditch; and what was the consequence? Why, that there was an absolute loss of land on both sides. He remembered Lord Spencer getting up and stating his objection to hedgerow timber. His lordship stated that a pole and a half or two poles of land were always injured. He (Mr. Anderson) regarded the growing hedgerow timber as the greatest curse which could be inflicted upon the tenant farmer. It might be thought that, connected as he was with the interest of the landlord, he was advocating the rights of the tenant too strongly; but he thought that, in speaking up for the tenant, he was doing the greatest service to the cause of the landlord. If the mutual interests of the landlord and tenant were properly looked to, it would be a great advantage to all parties."

Mr. Ellman said, that—

"In some parts of Surrey and Sussex so much timber was grown that draining was impossible. He had had some experience in the tenacious lands, which were supposed best for growing oak; but, by removing the timber and draining the land, the soil was completely changed. Mr. Ellman dwelt strongly on the prejudicial effect of copyhold tenure in increasing the growth of hedgerow timber."

Copyhold tenure is a remnant of feudalism, and, like every offshoot of that upas tree, injures all within its influence. Mr. Dixon said:—

"That a relation of his paid his landlord 30 per cent. more for his farm since the removal of the timber."

Mr. F. Hobbs said:—

"That five out of every six trees growing in hedgerows might with advantage be levelled with the ground. He thought there ought to be some rule laid down as to the number of trees which should be allowed in a given number of yards; he was of opinion that, if this club came to some conclusion on the subject, it would be doing a great deal of good, and the landlord would see that it was to the interest of the country at large that the great portion of the trees should be levelled on land applied to farming purposes."

Mr. Knight concluded by proposing the following resolution:—

"That it is the opinion of this meeting that the growth of hedgerow timber, especially in small enclosures, is highly detrimental to cultivation, and exceedingly injurious to the occupier; that the benefit obtained therefrom by the landlord is quite inadequate to the damage accruing to the tenant, who would be enabled to compensate for its removal by an increase of rent; that in scarcely any instance is the growth of timber equivalent to 2s. per acre as rent, and that on the average it does not exceed 1s. per acre; and that, upon the whole, the growth of hedgerow timber is highly injurious to the interests of both landlord and tenant, as well as to the country at large."

Which was unanimously agreed to.

FIRST STEPS TO KNOWLEDGE.

We have, of late, been glad to see that organ of the ultra-monopolists,—the owners of heavily encumbered estates,—the Morning Post, has acquired some of the rudiments of a real agricultural knowledge. On a recent occasion it said:—

"Let our own people be employed in raising an additional quantity at home. No intelligent person disputes that, by the application of more labour to our own land, ten times the additional quantity might be raised; let us then employ our own people (who want employment) in raising it."

Most true, O Post! You have laid down one premiss correctly. So again, in another leading article, it is asked:—

"What do the labourers really want? They want:—First, more certain and regular employment. Secondly, the means of better maintenance, either by generally increased wages, or some other source of a supply of food. Thirdly, better houses to live in, and freed from those nuisances which are offensive to decency, and prejudicial to health."

Spoken like a Christian and a Free-Trader. And in a subsequent part of the same article it is said:—

"In some places the labourers are half-starved for half the year, because, though it is palpable and notorious that a great deal of beneficial work might be done upon the land, that work is not done. The land is there, and intelligent people know very well that if labour were applied the increase of produce would more than feed the labourers, but the labour is not employed. The labourers are half-starved, and wholly idle for months together, and the land remains unimproved. A remedy of that state of things would affect immediately the condition of the labourer."

True—most true.

Let us briefly enumerate a few of the more prominent causes of those evils which the Post laments so naturally that, but for its antecedents, it might be supposed to be in earnest. The fertile cause of the non-employment and the uncertain employment of labour is rent fixed according to monopoly prices, and the absorption of the farmers' capital to pay the rent instead of the wages of labour. Another set of causes is the insecure tenure on which the farmer holds his land; the burdens by which he is oppressed, such as game, timber, absurd covenants, and so forth; and the state of political thralldom into which he had allowed himself to fall through his foolish expectation of benefiting by the Corn Laws. Now, how much of these things lies at the door of the monopolist patrons of the Post? Nay, more: but for those patrons would the evils exist a month?

"THE AGRICULTURAL MIND."

It is with vexation we see that the squire, beginning to be ashamed of their own exposed sordidness, are trying to show that the protective system must be maintained out of deference to the fears of the "agriculturists." Now, the truth is, the alarm exists principally in the "landlord mind," and the fear is that rent will fall, for farmers are very generally beginning to say, "Let us have Free Trade at once, and then we will have rents adjusted." This is the present source of squirearchical sensitiveness. The pitiful figure Sir Robert Peel made on the Australian wheat debate has given occasion to the following pungent remarks by the Times on this subject. The following goes to show the groundlessness of the alarm:—

"It must never be forgotten that wheat, so far from being a thing naturally abundant, is one of the most difficult and the most costly of all common and useful productions. In the average of years, allowing even a short average, there never will be too much corn on this earth, or in any part of it. This, of course, ought to mitigate the alarms which the sensitive agricultural mind is so prone to conceive, from whatever quarter they be inspired. There is not a country, not a river, not a part in Europe, or any other quarter of the world, which may not be shown utterly unequal to those overwhelming efforts of production which the British farmer has been taught to imagine. With want of implements, want of cattle, want of roads, want of drains, want of warehouses, want of skill, want of money, want of a good social system, want of everything, the finest climate, soil, and people will very soon be thrown in the rear of agricultural competition."

Perhaps the most absurd bugbear ever invented by English politicians is that of foreign agricultural competition. This is the way in which the Times deals with Sir Robert's argument on the point:—

"Then comes the Ministerial reason,—the principle of Conservatism,—the one remaining sentiment which makes Sir Robert not a Whig, and retains his three hundred supporters on his side of the House. It ran a watchword from mouth to mouth, and was passed on as the darling link from hand to hand in the torch race of antiquity. Spare this agricultural mind! Why awake those venerable terrors for so slight an advantage? Why throw Richmond into agitation, and Buckingham into despair? Why summon Kent to Penenden-heath, and put the men of Essex on their mettle, merely for a few scrubby colonies at the world's end, who know not registration courts, and hustings, and members, and pledges, and the violations thereof! It is unwise, says one, to tamper with this interest. If you once begin, says another, you must go on. Consistency will require more. Or even if you attempt to stop, the mischief is done. The precarious agricultural mind is unshaken, and Conservatism totters on its agricultural basis. The agricultural mind bears not gradual change, it cannot bear protracted agony, it cannot contemplate slow decay. Here then is the Premier's vocation. He nurses, and soothes, and coaxes this delicate being, blindfolds it to its fate, humours it for a while, worships himself into its confidence, angrily warns off its disturbers, lulls its suspicions, and throws it finally asleep, and then a moment of panic and necessity does the work of years. For our own part, we should prefer a growth more in analogy with the course of nature in this temperate clime. If the agricultural mind is something so irrational, so abrupt and impetuous, as to be incapable of moving, living, thinking, and feeling, step by step, there is no help for it. But, it must be said, that in this case it has more affinity with the boar constrictor of the forest, which gorges itself once a month and is torpid in the interval, than with the oxen, horses, and sheep of our own climate."

DESTRUCTION OF GAME.—The Duke of Sutherland has given permission to destroy the hares on the farms of his tenants in the parish of Treutham, where they are injurious to them.

ADVANCE OF WAGES.—The master cotton-spinners of Bolton have agreed to advance the wages of the operative spinners another 5 per cent., which has been gratefully accepted. The heat feeling appears to exist on both sides.—Bolton Free Press.

IMPORTS OF CATTLE.—Two hundred and thirty-nine head of horned cattle and three calves have arrived at Hull, from the Continent, by the Hamburg and Rotterdam steamers, since our last week's publication. Many of the beasts were excellent in appearance, and some of the beef shown in Hull market not inferior to that of the general run of English oxen.—Hull Packet, May 9.

A "GRAT FACT" FOR THE PROTECTIONISTS.—Mr. Austin, the eminent Queen's Counsel, informed one of the parliamentary railway committees, the other day, that it had come out in evidence before another committee, that strawberries were sent from Cologne to Manchester, and that water-cresses were imported by the ton! What is the Agricultural Protection Society about to allow the Manchester Free-Traders to luxuriate on foreign strawberries?—Worcester Chronicle.

THE CATTLE TRADE.—Now that the season has advanced we have to report a great increase in the number sent from the north to the London and Edinburgh markets. The Duchess of Sutherland sailed from Inverness on Monday last, and not the least remarkable of her cargo were two enormous fat bullocks, of the Aberdeenshire breed, the property of Lord Lovat, and intended for the London market. On Monday last 252 were refused for these superior animals. At Banff, vessels were loading last week for London, and several were ready for their cargoes. It is stated that about 600 cattle would be shipped from the port, for Smithfield, during the week.—Ross-shire Advertiser.

DUTCH CATTLE, &c.—The Dutch steam-ship Batavia, which arrived at the St. Katherine Steam Wharf on Wednesday afternoon from Rotterdam, had on board sixty-two oxen and cows and one calf, three baskets of fruit, twenty-three baskets of fish of different descriptions, four baskets of poultry, and two hundred casks of butter, besides other articles of Dutch produce and manufacture. Two other vessels which reported on the same day had no less than 28,375 cherries on board, besides a great quantity of articles of Dutch produce of every description, for consumption here. The Emerald Isle, which reported at Hull on the same day from Rotterdam, had six cows, ten oxen, and three calves on board, besides a variety of other Dutch produce, &c. On the same day one vessel reported at London, one at Liverpool, and two at Hull, as arriving from the island of Ichaboe, bringing between them upwards of 1200 tons of guano, the produce of that place.

SCARCITY OF SHEEP.—During the past few days the provision market in this town has been very scantily supplied with mutton. Two causes are assigned for this: first, the farmers at this season always hold back their stock from the market in consequence of the great improvement they make; and secondly, the wholesale butchers here find the demand so great in London as to send all they can to the metropolis. The scarcity thus produced is almost beyond all precedent. At the Barton market, on Monday, there were nearly as many buyers as sheep, and at the Beverley fair, on Wednesday, the demand was wholly inadequate to the supply. As a natural consequence, the prices have much increased. This scarcity has been felt in many other places; but in Liverpool the supply, considering the time of the year, has, we learn, been extraordinarily and unaccountably heavy, there being on Tuesday no less than 4319 sheep for sale.—Hull Packet.

FOREIGN POTATOES.—A new article of import has been introduced by the Trent steamer from the West Indies, in new potatoes, which have been successfully cultivated in the Bermudas, for the early supply of the English market, from the best seeds. The climate and soil are well suited for their growth, and about a ton has been brought over as a sample by the above steamer. In boiling they are said to be of even superior quality to those of home produce, being less watery. The same vessel has also brought over a quantity of pineapples, preserved in their own juice in bottles, which are likely to be a valuable addition to the kitchen.

THE LAND COMMISSION.—AN IRISH LABOURER.—We have not space for our usual extracts from the evidence, which we give in another place. We shall merely denote those who would have a true picture of the trials and privations of an Irish labourer, to read the evidence of Michael Sullivan. He, poor fellow, makes "no complaint for himself"—and yet he lives from year's end to year's end on "dry potatoes, and has no means of getting a drop of milk." Even he, wretched as he is, is cursed by the evil of want of security; for when asked, where is the pig kept, he answers, "He must be kept in some part of the house, in a corner," and he adds, "I might make room for the pig if I was sure of the house for a second year, but I do not mean to go to the trouble, and many, like me, do not do so, not being sure of the house for a second year." Truly may we add, God help the poor.—York Examiner.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, May 17, 1845.

Remarks have been made that the Bazaar is not so complete an Exposition of National Manufactures as all have wished and many have anticipated. But the Bazaar itself will not be complete until it is concluded; the goods are in the theatre, but were the building five times its present size, it would not admit of the display of the varied contributions at one time. It is one of the undesigned attractions, because it is a physical necessity of the Bazaar that it must have a fresh display of novelties every day, and that the immense quantity of goods in store cannot possibly be brought out until the sale of others has made room for their exhibition. It will be seen, from the ample details which we have elsewhere given, that, even under existing circumstances, the exposition of the products of combined art, skill, and taste is superior to anything that has ever been seen in Great Britain, and, if allowances be made for the limited space, which alone the Council can command, is fully equal to the National Expositions got up at the expense of the public exchequers by the Governments of the Continent. The public press of London, with all but universal voice, has borne testimony to the beauty of the decorations and the excellence of the arrangements; the provincial papers have added their testimony to the opinions of their metropolitan brethren, and with unusual unanimity declared that the Exposition is in the best sense of the word truly National.

Of the success of the Bazaar we have only to say that it has far exceeded the most sanguine expectations. So great was the pressure of the crowds on Tuesday and Wednesday that thousands went away unable to obtain admission; and it was found necessary to raise the charge of admission to half-a-crown, in order to prevent the danger of accidents to life or limb. The higher price has very slightly diminished the number of visitors, for while we write the Hall is closely crowded, and the sales are proceeding with great activity and spirit. To prevent any inaccuracy, it has been resolved not to publish any statement of receipts until the close of the Bazaar.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—M. Ledru Rollin presented to the Chamber of Deputies, on Saturday, a petition signed by 25,000 persons, who prayed that an inquiry be instituted into the condition of the labouring classes of France.

It appears from a report made by the committee on the Paris fortifications that the total sum expended since their commencement in 1841 is 108,000,000*fr.*, about £4,000,000, and that thirty-two millions voted in addition to that sum by the Chamber remain in the hands of the Government.

The bill for arming the fortifications of Paris has been adopted in the Chamber of Deputies, by a majority of 227 to 131—majority, 96. The clause for depositing the artillery in the town of Bourges, not to be removed but in the event of war, was agreed to with the consent of the Government. The affair is thus settled to the satisfaction, apparently, of all parties.

ALGERIA.—A letter from Algiers of the 6th inst. states that the insurrection is complete in the mountains of the Ouarsenis, and that several of the Arab chiefs who had received appointments from the Governor-General have been sacrificed. It is also stated that nearly 2000 mounted Arabs appeared on the 28th ult., before Orleansville, and menaced an attack, but withdrew on a sortie being made by the garrison, supported by the cannon of the camp. On the 30th, a serious engagement took place in sight of Orleansville, between the hostile Arabs and a French detachment. The Arabs were defeated, with a loss of 20 killed. The French had only two men killed, and six wounded.

DREADFUL MINING EXPLOSION IN BELGIUM.—A frightful accident has just happened at Bousu, near Quivrain. A formidable explosion of fire-damp took place at the bottom of a coal-mine at full work. About 200 men were at work at the time, of whom it is feared the majority have been killed. We know nothing precise as to the number of persons who have perished; some accounts raise the number to 140, but this estimate is not official. Since the moment the deplorable catastrophe happened they have not ceased drawing mutilated corpses from the shafts of the mine. The families of the miners are in a most pitiable state of suspense—every corpse which is drawn to the mouth of the mine occasions a scene of perfect desolation.—Belgian paper.

BERLIN.—The Augsburg Gazette of the 6th inst. states, that an opinion prevails at Berlin that the import duty on linen and cotton thread will be considerably increased, and that in consequence several new cotton-spinning mills will be established in Prussia. An English engineer of considerable celebrity had arrived at Berlin, and had been engaged by a commercial company to build a cotton-mill at Bromberg. A wealthy proprietor in Pomerania has likewise the intention of establishing cotton-mills on his estates.

VIENNA.—The Vienna journals of the 2nd inst. announce that a serious accident had occurred on the Vienna and Glanzthal Railroad, in consequence of a rail having been displaced, by which a train was upset; four persons were killed on the spot, besides a vast number seriously injured.

The Franconian Mercury contains a letter from Munich, May 2, which states that a duel having taken place there between a Portuguese and an attaché of the French Embassy, about a lady to whom the former was betrothed, the attaché has been suspended by M. Guizot from his functions, and his passports having been delivered to him, he had taken his departure from Munich.

THE GERMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.—The Government of the Grand Duchy of Hesse has declared in favour of the new Catholic communion at Offenbach. The Ministry having first applied to the Bishop of Mentz to authorize the Catholic curé of Offenbach to administer the different sacraments of the new communion, the bishop declined doing so, and thereupon the Government has invested the Protestant pastor with the necessary powers to perform those acts until further provisions are made.—Augsburg Gazette.

SNOW-STORM IN RUSSIA.—In the south-west province of Russia a violent snow-storm occurred about the middle of March, which continued for six days. It extended over the Governments of Volhynia, Podolia, and the province of Bessarabia, and caused the greatest destruction to life and property. Seventy-six persons are reported to have perished.—Hamburg Zeitung.

LOCUSTS.—The locusts, which had appeared in swarms on different points of the African coast, showed themselves, for the first time, near Algiers on the 30th ult. At Khadrah, to the west of the Foudouk, they devoured all the grass and leaves of the trees. Several flights alighted early in the morning of that day near the Maison Carrée, and numbers fell in the Place Royale; at two o'clock in the afternoon, however, they had completely vanished. Those insects are yellow, a couple of inches in length, and maintain themselves and direct their course in the air as easily as birds.

UNITED STATES.—The steamer Caledonia arrived at Liverpool on Tuesday night, with 60 passengers, and papers to the 30th ult. from New York, and the 1st inst. from Boston. The news is important. As regards the Oregon question, the present arrival goes entirely to confirm the pacific accounts of the probable settlement of that question without any recourse to hostilities; it is even said that Mr. Polk and the Cabinet have resolved to send an ambassador to England to mediate the question, and Mr. Van Buren is named to this office. Between the United States and Mexico matters do not wear so pacific an aspect, and from the official correspondence between that Government and the United States Minister, Mr. Shannon, hostilities are highly probable; Senor Cuevas had closed the correspondence abruptly by declining any further intercourse, and Mr. Shannon had quitted the capital, waiting only for despatches, known to be on the way, before he took his departure for the United States. The city of Mexico had been visited by an earthquake, which had destroyed much property, though, fortunately, few lives were lost. The Bowery Theatre, New York, had been destroyed by fire.

SOUTH AMERICA.—Brazilian papers to the 23rd of March state that the civil war in the province of Rio Grande do Sul, which had wasted the resources of Brazil for the last nine years, was at an end. The pacification of Rio Grande was to be celebrated with a solemn Te Deum and great rejoicings at Rio on the 23rd of March. On the 13th of March the treaty between Brazil and Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave trade, which authorized the searching of Brazilian vessels by British cruisers, terminated by effluxion of time, the period of its duration having been fixed at 15 years. There are now no obstacles to the slave trade in Brazil, except such as the Brazilian laws impose. Those laws are sufficiently strong, but the Government has very little power of enforcing them.

DOMESTIC.

We have much pleasure in stating that Lord Willoughby de Broke, of Compton Verney, Warwickshire, has caused his tenants to be called together, and has intimated to them his intention of making a return of 20 per cent. upon their rents.—Gloucestershire Chronicle.

A dispute has taken place between the operative sawyers of Glasgow and their employers on a question of wages, in consequence of which about 200 of the workmen are at present idle.—Glasgow National.

The town council of Yarmouth have refused to accede to the request of the coroner's jury, to assist them with the funds of the corporation in conducting the inquiry relative to the deaths caused by the late fatal accident, and enabling them to have the evidence of some distinguished civil engineers from London. The jury have since memorialized the Government on the subject. On Thursday the adjourned inquiry was resumed, but no further evidence was taken; the time of the inquest was occupied by a dispute between the coroner and one of the jurymen, who had reported the coroner's speech for a local paper. The inquest was then adjourned sine die, until a reply has been received from the Home Secretary to the memorial.

A most painful and dreadful accident, which, we regret to say, was accompanied by loss of life, occurred in King-street, on Thursday last. It appears that Mr. Walter Morgan, one of the firm who lately purchased the extensive brewery, formerly the property of the Messrs. Tompson, in this city, was engaged, on Thursday morning, trying the strength of some liquor which had been lately brewed, and by some accident was drowned in the gulle-tub. The jury returned a verdict that "The deceased was found drowned in the gulle-tub of the brewery."—Norwich Mercury.

Tuesday week last, a woman at Huddersfield murdered her infant, and afterwards committed self-destruction. The name of the unfortunate woman was Betsy Rushworth, wife of John Rushworth, a mason. For some time past she had been in a low desponding state of mind, induced, it is said, by the landlord having distrained for rent.

The Field Gardens Bill, as amended by the committee, to promote the letting of field-gardens to the labouring poor, has been printed. There are now twenty-two clauses in the measure, which is only to extend to England and Wales. The amendment by the committee is to the effect that, if a meeting is not called on a requisition to promote the letting of field-gardens in a parish, the requisitionists may themselves call a meeting, and proceed to put into force the provisions of the law.

On Saturday evening last, a fire broke out upon the farm premises belonging to Mr. Brown, of Barking, in the occupation of Mr. Joseph Elliott. It raged with considerable fury for some time, consuming a barn, out-buildings, two stacks, part of a clover stack, and a few implements. The loss is covered by insurance in the Suffolk Fire-office.

The family of a gentleman named Stoddart, of Lambeth-road, Southwark, have been greatly distressed by the mysterious disappearance of Mr. W. Stoddart, 30 years of age. It appears that Mr. Stoddart's brother went, on the 7th instant, to the Paddington terminus of the Great Western Railroad, and proceeded by railway into Berkshire. When Mr. Wm. Stoddart took leave of his brother he stated to him that he should immediately return home, but he has not since been heard of.

Since the recent excitement on the subject of the Spa-fields Burial-ground, the number of interments has decreased every Sunday, the average number not exceeding three, whilst previously they were twenty, and often approached to forty. The grounds, which were previously kept carefully closed, except on the entrance of visitors, are now open on Sunday afternoon for the admission of visitors. Much interest is attached to the coming trial at the Court of Queen's Bench, which will take place during the present sittings after term.

On Tuesday afternoon, as the Waterman steamer No. 5 was conveying from 300 to 400 passengers from Woolwich to Greenwich, she met with a serious accident by a billy-boy from Goole, Yorkshire, running her bowsprit across the bow of the steamer, knocking all the passengers within her sweep flat on the deck. Unfortunately, a gentleman of the name of Williams, fringe-manufacturer, had his collar-bone and one arm broken, and the other arm much injured; his son, aged 10 years, was killed on the spot; and his daughter, aged 14 years, was much injured, and had one finger broken; two other persons received severe contusions, and two gentlemen were knocked overboard, but were fortunately saved by the crew of the Waterman No. 5.

At the Central Criminal Court, on Thursday, Joseph Connor, aged 20, was tried before Mr. Baron Alderson, for the murder of Mary Brothers, alias Tape, in St. Giles's, on the 31st of March. The prisoner was found guilty, and was sentenced to death in the usual form.

The number of deaths during the week ending May 10, for the metropolis, is the smallest that has appeared for many months, being only 829, showing a decrease of 54 as compared with the previous, and 434 less than the average of five years.

The fifteenth meeting of the British Association will be held at Cambridge, commencing June 19. The time was fixed thus early in order to suit the "Commencement," which brings a large concourse to the University. The great feature of the ensuing meeting will be a congress of the observers at the different magnetical observatories stationed throughout Europe. Sir J. Herschell is president this year.

The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association, held at Dublin, on Monday, was densely thronged. Mr. O'Connell, on entering the hall, was loudly applauded. The hon. and learned gentleman was accompanied by Mr. John O'Connell, Mr. Robert D. Browne, and several other gentlemen. Mr. O'Connell, in the course of his speech, declared his determination to resist the Speaker's warrant, should a call of the House be enforced, as threatened by Mr. Hume's motion. He was not alone in this determination, for the other Repeal members were equally resolved to adopt a similar course. The hon. gentleman, in referring to the scheme of Sir James Graham for endowing three new colleges for secular education in Ireland, declined to express any decided opinion on the measure until the Catholic bishops met and expressed their views upon it, by which he should be wholly guided. Mr. R. D. Browne denounced the measure; Mr. Davis, one of the editors of the Nation, defended it in part. The rent for the week was £120, 13s. 1d.

The Drogheda Argus contains the following account of a murder committed within a few miles of that town:—"A murder was perpetrated, last Saturday, in the neighbourhood of Drumeconra—the victim was a man named Clarke—the cause was that fruitless source of crime in this country, the taking of land. The deceased man and his brother had a dispute about a field, when a labourer in the employment of his brother killed him with a spade in the presence of his brother. The homicide has escaped from justice. The remains of the deceased were interred last Tuesday."

The Drogheda Journal says:—"We have just learned that Mr. O'Connell will hold a levee on the 30th of May, for the purpose of receiving addresses, congratulating him on the result of the late prosecutions, and renewing the pledge of the Irish people to continue, under his guidance, their struggle for the repeal of the legislative union. The corporations of Ireland will attend in their robes; members of the '82 club in their uniform; all others in evening dress. The trades of Dublin will have a public procession on that day."

The Rev. Dr. Burke, parish priest of Clonmel, has subscribed £500 towards the establishment of a parochial school in that town. On presenting this most munificent subscription, at a meeting on Sunday last, this admirable priest said—"It comes from you, my friends, and I hold any property I may be possessed of in trust for the poor of my parish; my family shall never have any legacy from me."—Dublin Evening Post.

We have great pleasure in being able to state that Sir Robert Peel has granted to the widow of the late John Buntin £50 from the Royal Bounty Fund, and has further engaged to place her name on the pension list when a vacancy occurs. This relief has been granted on the application of a body of Irish members of Parliament, at the head of whom was E. B. Roche, Esq., the member for Cork.—Kilkenny Journal.

The sheriff of Cork, with a military and police force, took possession, under habere, of the lands of Curragh, near Killybreen, the estate of Philip Monerville, Esq., on Wednesday last; but not before the evicted tenants had fired all the houses on the property, and left nothing but walls standing.—Limerick Chronicle.

The Lord Mayor of Dublin entertained the members of the corporation and a circle of friends at dinner on Tuesday week in the Mansion-house. The cloth having been removed, the Lord Mayor proposed the health of the Queen, and stated that that very evening he received a poem of intelligence from a most authentic quarter, which left it beyond all doubt that her Irish subjects would have the happiness of seeing their Sovereign in the country in the course of the summer. Whenever she came she would be welcome, and the reception she would receive would be one becoming alike the monarch and the people. (Cheers.) The toast was received with every demonstration of loyalty, nine times nine and enthusiastic applause.

Colonel Shelton, of the 44th Regiment, was thrown violently from his horse on Saturday last in the square of the Royal Barracks, Dublin, and expired from the effects of the injuries he received on Tuesday night.

HUDDESFIELD.—Such is the activity of trade in this locality that there is a great scarcity of workmen in most of the domestic trades unconnected with the prevailing manufactures of the district. The building branch, which for a long time has been partially depressed, is now revived, whilst most other branches are equally flourishing.—Leeds Mercury.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, May 13.—The supply of English Wheat during the past week was large, and to this morning's market a liberal addition is on sale; this, with two or three cargoes from Rostock, has caused a great heaviness in the trade to-day; and although a reduction of 1s. per qr. on the prices of this day week is submitted to, a considerable quantity remains unsold. The quantity of English Barley is small, but with a large arrival of Foreign this trade is dull at about the prices of last week. We continue to receive very few English Oats, and have only a moderate supply of Scotch and Irish; but of Foreign the arrivals are fully equal to the demand, which is, however, sufficient to maintain late prices. We have only a small supply of Beans and Peas, which sell readily on as good terms as last week.

FRIDAY, May 16.—The arrivals of English Wheat since Monday are moderate, and of Foreign a cargo or two have arrived. In the former there is no alteration, but there is a little inquiry for Foreign in bond for exportation. The business done is not, however, extensive. There is not much demand for Flour of any sort; prices are not lower, though 12,000 qrs. have arrived from abroad. There are several cargoes of English Oats fresh up to day, and Foreign continue to come in large quantities; the trade, notwithstanding, remains dull. No alteration in Beans and Peas. The duty on Peas declined 1s. yesterday.

BEAVER, MOSSAMER, and FRENCH VELVET HAT MANUFACTORY, 50, Old Change, Cheapside, London.—Purchasers of Hats are respectfully informed, that at this establishment they may be supplied with every description of HATS, CAPS, &c., manufactured on the most improved principles of strength adapted to all sorts of wear and shape, varied and most modern. The choice from a large stock of newly-manufactured goods is offered, and the prices will be found very low for the various qualities. Parties visiting London will find it advantageous to purchase as above.—50, Old Change, one door from Cheapside. May 1, 1850.

SILVER SUPERSEDED, and those corrosive and injurious Metals, called Nickel and German Silver, supplanted by the introduction of a new and perfectly matchless ALBATA PLATE. O. Watson, 41 and 43, Barbican, and 14, Norton-towgate, aided by a person of science in the amalgamation of Metals, has succeeded in bringing to public notice the most beautiful article ever yet offered, possessing all the richness of Silver in appearance, with all its durability and hardness, with its perfect sweetness in use, undergoing, as it does, a Chemical Process, by which all that is noxious in mixed Metals is entirely extracted, leaving all acids may be cleaned as silver, and is manufactured into every article for the Table and Sideboard.

C. LERICAL, MEDICAL, AND GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

In addition to Assurances on Healthy Lives, this Society continues to grant Policies on the Lives of Persons subject to gout, asthma, rupture, and other diseases, by their paying a premium in proportion to the increased risk. The plan of granting Assurances on unhealthy Lives originated with this Office in the early part of 1831.

Every description of assurance may be effected with this Society, and Policies are granted on the lives of persons of all ages.

Table of Premiums for Assuring £100 on a Healthy Life.

The sum accumulated and invested, for the security and benefit of the assured (exclusive of the proprietors' paid-up capital), already exceeds half a million sterling; and the Income, which is steadily increasing, is now £101,500 per annum.

The two last dividends averaged £12 per cent. on the premiums paid. The third bonus, declared in January, 1850, averaged £28 per cent., and the future bonuses are expected to exceed that amount.

Further information may be obtained of Geo. H. PINCHAM, Actuary, 78, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, London, or of any of the Society's agents.

MR. HAYES, DENTIST, has the honour of informing his Friends that he has REMOVED from May's buildings, St. Martin's-lane, to 13, ROYAL-SQUARE, where, ONLY, he may be consulted on all cases of Dental Surgery.—Terms, moderate.—13 Soho-square.

STOOPING of the SHOULDERS and CONTRACTION of the CHEST are entirely prevented, and gently and effectually removed, in Youth and Ladies and Gentlemen, by the occasional use of the PATENT ST. JAMES'S CHEST EXPANDER, which is light, simple, easily employed outwardly or inwardly, without bands beneath the arms, unobtrusive restraint, or impediment to exercise. Sent post free, by Mr. A. BIRSON, 40, Tavistock-street, Strand, London, near the Bazaar; or full particulars on receiving a postage stamp.

FREE-TRADE BAZAAR IN MAY.—All Persons coming to London may save their expenses by going to the CITY FOOT and HORSE DEPOT, 17, St. Martin's-lane-Grand, opposite the General Post-office. The Proprietor having bought the stocks of several manufacturers retired from business, at a tremendous reduction, for cash, is enabled to offer them to the public at extraordinarily low prices; they are well worth the attention of shopkeepers, families, persons going abroad, and others of large consumption, being 20 per cent. under any other warehouse in the Kingdom. All warranted; and should any work give way the same made good free of charge.

Visitors to the Bazaar are respectfully invited to inspect the Elastic Boots at Mrs. Lewis's Stall—contributed by Mr. J. Sparkes Hall.

ELASTIC BOOTS—THE QUEEN'S BOOTS.

The Patent Elastic Ankle Boots require neither lacing, buttoning, nor tying; they can be put on and off in a moment, without trouble and loss of time. The elegant appearance of laces breaking, buttons coming off, holes wearing out, and many other imperfections in the ordinary modes of fastening, suggested the improvement which is now submitted to the public. No boots ever exhibited such variety of play and motion to the feet and ankles, or corresponded so exactly to their natural and anatomical form.—J. SPARKES HALL, Elastic Bootmaker to the Queen, and the Queen of the Belgians, 309, Regent-street, opposite the Polytechnic Institution.

Ladies and gentlemen at a distance may be fitted by forwarding a pattern boot.

TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. REDUCTION ON

NELSON'S PATENT GELATINE for making blancmange, jellies, &c., less than one-third the price of isinglass. Sold in packets only, from 6d. to 10s., by most respectable chemists, oilmen, and grocers in town and country. Each packet bears the patentee's signature.—N.H. A. 6d. packet makes one quart of Jelly.—Extract from Dr. Trevelyan's testimonial, June 6, 1849:—"I had Mr. G. Nelson's Patent Opaque Gelatine to be at least equal in strength and purity, if not superior, to the best isinglass for every culinary purpose. It is entirely free from any impregnation of acid, such as I have found to exist in other kinds of gelatine in the London market." These gelatines are well adapted for hotels, taverns, cabin use and ship stores, and a safe and profitable commodity for exportation.

"TIME WORKS WONDERS"

"He said that 'Time works wonders'—that is true; The fact is seen in everything we view. Where'er we look—above, beneath, around, Some most surprising 'wonders' may be found. Look at those vessels which in triumph ride, In opposition both to wind and tide. Look at those carriages whose wheels seem scarce Needs not the efforts of the noble horse— These, with a thousand others 'wonders' say That 'time' is working 'wonders' every day. Another wonder, brought about by time, Claims special mention in this humble rhyme. MOSES and SON'S huge warehouse is display'd A mighty wonder in the sphere of trade. Was there a 'house' a few years ago Like MOSES'S celebrated Dress Mart? No. But 'Time works wonders' in the works of art. And hence, that noble 'wonder'—MOSES'S MART. The hand of time will still work 'wonders'—yes, 'Wonders' will still be brought about in dress; And all will own, while thus each day discloses, That 'Time works wonders' at the house of MOSES.

The new work, entitled "The Monarch Mart," with full directions for self-measurement, may now be had on application, and forwarded "post free."

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quintin Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Birmingham and the neighbourhood are respectfully informed, that Subscriptions may be paid by Free-Traders to Mr. Charles Geach, Midland Bank, Union-street, Birmingham, the local Treasurer.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRATION.

The Council of the League finding that more than half of the persons whose names are on the Middlesex Register have claimed since the last contested election in 1837, they have directed circulars to be sent to them requesting an answer as to whether they will support Free-Trade candidates in the event of an election. As it is not considered that those who return answers pledge themselves to support ANY PARTICULAR MAN, but only that they are willing to support the principle of Free Trade, it is hoped that ALL who have received letters, and are favourable to the principles the Anti-Corn-Law League advocate, will consider it a duty to return their letters answered, as it is important that the Council should be able to know their supporters from their opponents.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

THE BAZAAR—ITS MORAL RESULTS.

The gratifying task of summing up, and detailing to our readers, the financial results of the Free-Trade Bazaar, must of course await now the rapidly approaching period of its termination, which will have taken place ere we again address them. But it is not premature to speak of those less direct, but more important, moral results which this magnificent demonstration of the strength of the Free-Trade cause has produced or indicated—of that deep change in public feeling and opinion of which the success is a sign—of the accession of moral strength which it has brought to that great work to whose accomplishment its pecuniary proceeds will be devoted. Though not one shilling of net profit the League exchequer should appear on our balance-sheet, we hesitate not to say, that the immense expenditure of time and toil lavished on this exhibition has already yielded an adequate return. The past fortnight has added incalculably to that confidence of hope, that resolute vigour of action, that quiet assurance of strength, that moral and social prestige, which—far more than the hundred thousand pounds sterling—constitute the "League Fund."

To those who shared or witnessed our struggle

during its earlier years, nothing can be more striking than the evidences afforded by the history of the past fortnight, of that total change which has taken place in public feeling and opinion since the time when the Free-Trade question was first introduced to the attention of this metropolis. This is especially apparent in the recent tone of the newspaper press. Four years ago, or two years ago, our Bazaar not only would not have succeeded—it could not have been held. Even if all the other requisite conditions had been at our command, we could not and would not have asked the women of Great Britain to subject themselves to the ribald insults with which they would have been unscrupulously assailed by journalists who libelled the League leaders as assassins premeditated, and charged designs against social order on men whose all in this world is staked on the maintenance of public tranquillity. How different is the tone of this same press now! Not one scurrilous paragraph; no one unmanly jest; not a word of misstatement that can fairly be held wilful. In all quarters, candour and courtesy; in nearly all, eulogy, more or less earnest and hearty. We confess we were scarcely prepared to expect the total absence of those ebullitions of malignity and insolence which, at a former period, would infallibly have been poured forth against women that dared to manifest their sympathy with plundered and famished industry. In treating this gratifying improvement in the tone of the press as the sign of a vast change in public opinion—which would now be utterly intolerant of the sort of outrage to which we allude—we do not wish to deny to the conductors of the press individually any credit that may be justly due to them. They have probably themselves participated in that change.

Altogether, the revolution in metropolitan opinion and feeling is as signal as it is cheering. The grand difficulty of moving London—a difficulty which, in our early militant days, our best friends were least sanguine of their and our ability to overcome—is fairly subdued. The enormous size of this mighty metropolis; the unceasing excitement of business, or of pleasure, in which its multitudes are breathlessly whirled along; the metropolitan jealousy of provincial "interference" and "dictation;" the circumstance of London being the last place in Great Britain to feel the operation of that giant monopoly whose proceeds are expended on its shopkeepers and artisans;—all these obstacles are vanquished. London is penetrated, possessed, conquered by Free-Trade opinion. The heart of the empire is now the heart of the movement for the liberation of the empire's industry and commerce. The apathy, indifference, and contemptuous rather than bitter hostility of which the delegates of 1839, 1840, and 1841 must even yet retain a lively recollection, exist now only in recollection. Then, a small room in Palace-yard was too large for the strangers who came up on the forlorn hope of leaguering the metropolis of British commerce in common cause with the northern hives of British manufactures. Now, the largest of our theatres is too small—needs to be guarded by detachments of police, to check the rush of the eager multitudes that crowd to pay the homage of their admiration to the achievements of manufacturing industry, and to aid in the work of its enfranchisement. Statesmen of the highest parliamentary rank have not deemed it beneath them to testify, in common with those multitudes, their interest in this exhibition of the industrial resources of the empire whose government they have been, and may be again, called to administer. The time was, when a nobleman high in the councils of the State called our project a "mad" one—as, in truth, it then seemed, looking at the greatness of the end and the smallness of the visible means. Some of that nobleman's then colleagues in office have now been interested and gratified spectators of a scene which must have convinced them that this same "madness"—by which they are themselves already more than half infected—must, at no distant date, become act-of-Parliament truth and soberness.

The moral results of our Bazaar are equally cheering, whether we look to the past or to the future. It sets the stamp of success on the labours of seven years; and it gives assurance of a strength that will hold out for seven, or any other number of years more that may be needed for the completion of the work so nobly begun, and so far advanced towards its maturity. The exertions whose products are now concentrated within the walls of Covent-garden Theatre evince a moral force, to which success stands in the same sort of relation that the shadow does to the substance. The amazing number and variety—not to speak of the pecuniary value—of the contributions that have filled, and filled again, the interior of one of our largest metropolitan buildings; the number and variety of contributors—of every class in society, every occupation in life, every religious denomination and political party; the prodigious outlay, not of money only, but of time, thought, and toil;—these are evidences of a depth and extent of public conviction, a strength of public will, which can no more be defeated of their aim than the earth can be turned back in its orbit. The zeal of the Free-Trade public, no one ever doubted. But mere zeal is apt to cool, and evaporate in mere words. Here is something beyond zeal. Here is persistency, patience, a talent for hard-working and long-waiting, such as never, since the world began, was foiled in any just and noble enterprise. "Agitation" is a poor word to apply to the action of the moral and social forces of which our Bazaar is the embodiment. The agitation which is the superficial sign of our movement is, to the movement itself, that which the foam and spray are to the tide.

The indications of strength, and presages of final victory, afforded by the present state of the Free-Trade cause, are the more decisive, because the original impulse of the movement has been long since withdrawn. It began with manufacturing distress; it goes on without the distress—better without than ever it did with it. It began with bad harvests and dear bread; we have had good harvests, and we have cheap bread—still it goes on. Manufacturing capital is making handsome profits; manufacturing labour is earning fair wages; wheat is at 45s.; the commercial mind of the country is distracted by railway speculation; the political mind of the country is excited by important public questions unrelated to our own;—still, on it goes. Prosperity or distress makes no difference; cheap bread or dear bread makes no difference; political excitement or political repose makes no difference. Our cause needs now no fostering aid of circumstances—it lives a life of its own. In the midst of circumstances so well calculated to allay agitation, and which no mere agitation ever did or ever could survive, the Free-Trade movement has just given the most startling sign of its vitality and potency. It is plain that industrial emancipation is now a part of Englishmen's faith—a profound conviction, an unconquerable resolve, an inextinguishable moral craving—as independent of any mere change of time and circumstances as religion itself. It never can expire but in the euthanasia of victory.

In speaking the language of triumph, so amply justified by the results of the past fortnight, we scarcely feel that we are triumphing over any class or party of our countrymen. The coarse, harsh tones of exulting antagonism would ill befit the quality of our recent success. We triumph, not over any of our fellow-countrymen, but for them—would that we could say, with them all. Such of them as ignorantly, or worse than ignorantly, oppose us and our work, have no real, permanent interest at variance with us or it. They will by-and-by be rejoicing with us, over the demonstrated futility of their own efforts at obstruction. To one and all of our readers—friends and opponents—we speak the same language of heartfelt congratulation. To those who, by their sleepless activity, unrelaxing perseverance, and open-handed munificence, have won this great success; to those vast multitudes, who have been led, by a curiosity more or less thoughtful and reflective, to visit a scene that must have given them an elevating and inspiring sense of the industrial grandeur of their country; to those of our opponents, who have, for the first time, trodden on League ground, under that shield of neutrality which art and female patronage have spread over this great national exhibition, and who have, we trust, in very many instances, gone thence with more serious thoughts of the claims of that industry whose achievements they have admired, and with altered feelings towards a cause which has gathered around itself so many elements of moral worth and nobleness; to those, even, who have coldly kept aloof from a scene whose true character they are as yet unable to understand, and with whose spirit they are unprepared to sympathise;—to ALL our countrymen and countrywomen we tender our earnest and hearty congratulations on a triumph in whose substantial fruits they will, one day, all participate.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Fourteenth Week, ending Saturday, May 24.

Since the re-assembling of Parliament, after the Whilsunside recess, nothing has occurred bearing on the question of Free Trade, and those collateral questions which are noticed in this place. But the absorbing subject of Maynooth is now disposed of, so far as the House of Commons is concerned, the bill having passed its third reading by a majority of 133. The coast is now, therefore, clear; and Monday next being the day fixed for the commencement of the debate on Lord John Russell's resolutions on the Condition of the People, we will, doubtless, have interesting matters to record under this head.

Mr. Stafford O'Brien has received a significant hint that his Malt Drawback Bill will not pass. On moving its second reading on Wednesday, he was told by Mr. Cardwell, the Secretary to the Treasury, and by Sir Robert Peel, that there were serious objections to it on the part of the Government; and the second reading was consequently postponed.

THE BAZAAR. (From the Bazaar Gazette.)

Were we to describe adequately the beautiful contributions from Colebrookdale, we should have to devote to them more than one number of this journal; but as we purpose to examine the importance of iron in the decorative arts, and its susceptibility as a material for realizing ideal form, at a greater length in another journal more especially devoted to the fine arts, we shall on the present occasion do little more than give a catalogue of the valuable articles sent by the Messrs. Darby to the Bazaar. It is not necessary in this place to enter into any comparison of the relative merits of iron and bronze as materials for casting; but the discovery of figures of cast iron at Pompeii and Herculaneum sufficiently proves that the Greek colonies, and their descendants in Southern Italy, had overcome the difficulties of manipulation, which have led many to describe iron as the most intractable of metals. The statues, figures, and ornaments wrought in iron by the artists of Berlin have for some years enjoyed a European reputation, and we believe that the Messrs. Darby are the only British manufacturers who have as yet been their successful competitors.

The first object to which we should wish to direct notice in this splendid collection, occupying almost the entire of the centre of the lower saloon, is the beautiful table that has been constructed for the exhibition of the articles. It is of wood, with richly-ornamented legs, having successive rows of ranges for the display of articles, rising one above the other like the steps of stairs, the back of each range being formed of plate glass, so as to render the exhibition of the figures more complete and effective. We believe that this table will be on sale at the close of the Bazaar, and it would certainly be a valuable acquisition to any shop where it was desirable to make an effective display of ornamental goods.

Nearly opposite to this is a bronze fountain, seven feet six inches high, and three feet eight inches in diameter at the base. The outline of form combines, in varying proportions, the cylindrical and pyramidal, with figured details. The dominant figures in the design are the crocodile and the water-snake, the plications and flexions of the latter being so judiciously managed as at all times to complete the details of general outline in a manner exceedingly creditable to the taste and skill of the artist.

Near to this is a polished register-stove, set in a beautiful chimney-piece of white marble, with a telegraph back for regulating the draught of the chimney. The hearth-plate is peculiarly remarkable for the elegance of the workmanship, and the radiating ash-pan of polished steel is one of the most effective specimens of ornamentation applied to a domestic article, rarely brought within the range of decorative art, to be seen in the whole Bazaar.

We have next to notice the garden and hall chairs. Though made of iron, they have an appearance of elegance and lightness which must commend them to general use. This is not the place to show that the distinction absurdly made between comfort and ornament is utterly without foundation, but we must say that the exhibition of Mr. Darby's contributions has established a truth on which we have often preached elsewhere, that beauty is as cheap as ugliness, and rather more agreeable.

A stand of flower pots may well deserve mention, for we have had elsewhere occasion to say that there seems to have been some supernatural perversity in the manufacture of these articles, art having been most ugly when provided for that which nature had made most beautiful. It is really an elegant stand in its general design, but we will not vouch for all the details; and we may say the same of the chandelier, though, in its details, there is far less scope for criticism.

And here we must observe, that the æsthetic principle which ought to regulate suspended light has been sadly pushed out of view since the introduction of gas. A light above the head should always have something of a meteoric character; and whatever is pendulous from a roof should never convey the idea that there was either danger or difficulty in securing its fixity. The latter requisite is certainly fulfilled in the chandelier under consideration; it has a graceful ease and lightness, which few of our modern metallic chandeliers have attained.

The vases open too wide a field for discussion to be examined in a publication like the present. Nearly all who have written on the æsthetics of art have found vases the most illustrative subjects of what they have termed the æsthetic archetypes which existed in the mind of the designer, and which it is the perfection of art to suggest forcibly, and yet not thrust ostentatiously on the observance of the spectator. This perfection is attained in the Warwick vase, and in some copies of Grecian vases; but in one instance we feel that elaborate and multiplied details have overlaid the original design.

On many of the fancy castings we should gladly have dilated at great length, for they are suggestive of artistic thought, and lead at once to the consideration of the great question which lies at the foundation of all the higher departments of art, namely—how far an artist ought to be a creator, and aim at the realization of his own idealities, and how far he must be a copyist, and aim at accurate reproduction of the works of nature. We shall take an illustration from the grotesque in art, to show that the true artist creates rather than copies. One of these castings represents a bear drawing the tooth of another bear. In the design the ursine character is completely preserved, and yet the expression of passion and feeling is completely human. We know not by whom the original model was designed, but it is fully equal to anything which Grandville has done pictorially in his celebrated "Scenes from the Public and Private Life of Animals," not even excepting the Banker Turkey cock, the Sailor and Marquis Cat, the Literary Raven, the Penitent Rat, or the Lion and Tiger of Paris.

Now, the grotesque is just as much an idealism as the sublime, and, if the realization of the one belongs to high art, it is impossible to name any principle by which the other can be excluded. In the group of wild horses, and of the lion and bear, there is to the full as much of idealism as in the tooth-drawing bear. It is an idealism to fix animals in the moment most favourable for the display of their muscular development; the artist renders perpetual that which nature had only made instantaneous. In the group of the lion and bear there is an artistic contrast of the very highest order; the whole force of the lord of the forest is in play; every sinew at work, every nerve strung, every muscle in action; but the victim is in every detail helpless and collapsed; there is even an apparent consciousness in his whole frame that the struggle is over, and his fate sealed.

We insert a catalogue of the castings from Colebrookdale Ironworks:—One show table of wood, with ornamental legs, and covered with crimson-coloured cloth, valued at from £20 to £25; bronzed ornamental fountain, 7ft. 6in. high, and 3ft. 8in. diameter at the base, weighing about 9½ cwt., price £70; polished register-stove, with telegraph back for regulating the draught of the chimney, hearth-plate, and radiating ash pan, price £35; large bronzed vase and pedestal for pleasure ground; hat and umbrella stand, white and gold; ditto, ditto, bronzed; flower-pot stand, with iron pots; five fancy tables, with painted tops, "Interior of Ely Cathedral," "Wreath of Flowers, and Reapers in Ayrshire," "Inlaid Pearl Flowers," "Lassie tending Sheep," and "Palace of Francis I.," microscopic table, with top to turn round, and painted to imitate satin wood; table, with inlaid pearl chess top; two garden seats, 4ft. long, with cushion; garden chair, painted oak; six hall and garden chairs, assorted patterns, and painted morocco and gold, blue and gold, and green and gold; three pole fire screens, with portraits, painted on iron of Cobden, Bright, and Villiers, value £6. 6s. each; ornamental iron chandelier, with eight burners and fancy glasses, value £20; two pictures, enamelled and painted on iron, and in gilt iron frames—the subjects from Collins's "Happy as a King" and "Rustic Hospitality," price £20 each; Elizabethan vase, bronzed, to stand on a chiffonniere or in a hall; two white and gold Grecian vases; two easy chairs, with japanned and ornamented frames, and velvet fittings; Warwick vase, white and gold, £6. 6s.; Grecian vase, with fancy paintings, and inlaid pearl ornaments; two white and gold flower bowls, to stand on a table; one black and gold flower bowl, to stand on the floor; two fenders and sets of fire-irons, with twisted shanks; and sundry fancy castings, viz., candelabra, candlesticks, taper stands, inkstands, card stands, wafer dishes, fruit baskets and plates, card plates, watch stands, small jugs, hand bells, pastile burners, pin cushions, small vases, statue of Goethe, boys and wine skins, Joan of Arc, a hermit, statues of Wellington and Napoleon, bust of Franklin, two pairs of dancers, French peasants, musicians, dog and child, the Crusader, prancing horses, setter dog, pointer with hare, greyhound with hare, dancing bear and lamp, bear dentists, casowaries, eagles, the Florence bear, cigar case and lamp, with two French actors, supper plate and frame, together with sundry specimens of iron ore, pig iron, and rolled iron. Also two porcelain vases, from Rose, of Colebrookdale, with glass shades, value £27. 6s.

Five fancy tables of cast iron, and two table tops of decorated slate (contributed by Messrs. Allen and Co., of Augustus-street, Regent's-park), afford signal proof that new varieties of materials, susceptible of a high grade of decorative art, may be added to our means of domestic comfort and enjoyment. It is not necessary to mention the subjects of the paintings with which these tables are decorated; they are all executed with great spirit and taste. Artists, indeed, complain that, in all these examples of painting on furniture, whether the material be iron, slate, or papier maché, the style of painting must of necessity approach the sign-board school; but we do not quite coincide with this sweeping declaration. When we remember how many paintings from the hands of the first masters have appeared on coach-panels, we believe that the multiplication of materials susceptible of art will extend the empire of art. We have seen very gratifying evidences in support of this opinion in the Poteries. Since the time of the great Wedgwood, both sculpture and painting have been laid under contribution to advance the decorations of fictile products; and we have seen some paintings on porcelain, produced at the establishment of Mr. John Ridgway, which were little, if at all, inferior to the boasted enamels of Italy. His success has raised up a host of emulous, but honourable, imitators; and we believe that at this moment there is no part of the empire where the highest efforts of the fine arts are better appreciated, and the æsthetic principles of decoration more ardently investigated, than in the localities where the Poteries are situated. The very room of which we are speaking furnishes striking examples. The collection of vases at the lower end exhibits a range of inventive thought, both in form and pattern, such as we never expected to see developed. Without making any invidious distinction, we must say that the vases sent by Mr. Rose have not been surpassed, indeed have scarcely been equalled, by any similar products of the fictile art we have seen, whether belonging to ancient or modern times. And we say this with our examination of the magnificent display at the Louvre, Sévres, and the Parisian Exposition, still vivid in our recollection.

So many complaints have been made by the Rochdale ladies of the scanty notice bestowed on their stall, that we have sent down a special reporter to their locality, and shall give his account, which we have received by express. The contributions consist of a beautiful gilt cheval screen, value £21; three splendid chairs, crimson velvet and needlework, in gilt frames, £21 each (sold); rosewood easy chair, covered with needlework, value £21 (sold); elegant papier maché drawing-room chair, with beautiful work, £7. 7s. (sold); rosewood drawing-room chair, £6. 6s. (sold); rosewood ottoman, with exceedingly beautiful raised needlework, £15. 15s. (sold); ottoman, on purple velvet, made up in white and gold, embroidered in a design appropriate to the occasion, consisting of the cotton plant twining round branches of coral, £15. 15s. (sold); ottoman, in white and gold on black velvet, with splendid group of flowers in needlework, £12. 12s.; pair of rosewood ottomans, £14. 14s.; cheval screen, made up in rosewood, with beautiful group of flowers, £15. 15s. (sold); two screens worked in black cloth. These are rather striking pieces of furniture, and are much admired, being in the form of banners; £8. 8s. each (one is sold). A pair of splendid pole-screens, most elegantly designed, the frame-work gilt. The needlework of these is exceedingly good; on one is represented the young chief-tain's first ride; on the other is a parrot, beautifully worked. The pair are valued at £14. 14s. A pair of splendid sofa cushions, designated Paul and Virginia, sold for £10. 10s.; a sofa cushion, elegantly embroidered in silk and beads, £5. 5s. (sold); a sofa cushion, with branch of roses, £5. 5s. (sold); sofa cushion in needlework, £5. 3s.; several beautiful and useful sofa cushions, in crochet and knitting (most of them are sold); two most splendid couvre-pieds in satin patchwork; and a beautiful patchwork quilt, value £10. 10s.

We also observed at this stall a variety of other articles of great beauty, so numerous that it is impossible to remark them separately; but we must particularize some pairs of hand-screens, which are quite unique, and for beauty of design cannot be surpassed. We believe some of them were sold at £5. 5s. the pair. Also several pairs of painted hand-screens deserved attention. A music-stool; baby clothes; ladies' night dresses; purses; work bags; a beautiful embroidered cambric handkerchief, which met an immediate sale at £5. 5s. We must not omit to mention a Greek cap, intended, we suppose, for a gentleman's smoking cap, but which is certainly too elegant for the purpose. We imagine there will be some competition for this article. Many embroidered aprons were soon sold, we understand, as well as worked stands for tea and coffee urns; netted window curtains, and anti-macassars, in great abundance, with d'oyleys, &c. &c. Among other striking objects at this stall was a beautiful pier table, in cast iron, with marble top, sold for £31. 10s.; a smaller one, gilt, which brought £6. 6s.; a model of Mr. Bright's works at Rochdale; and several globes of fine gold fish.

We believe the greater part of these articles are the work of the Rochdale ladies, but the contributions of the Todmorden ladies are exhibited at the same stall. Nor should we forget to mention the beautiful specimens of the different local manufactures, which we believe were made expressly for the occasion, and seemed to be fully appreciated by the visitors to the Bazaar, as they commanded a ready sale. The calicoes and sheetings were sent by Messrs. Munn, of Bacup; and Whitehead, of Holly-mount. The flannels are the contributions of Messrs. George Ashworth, and Archer, and we believe other Rochdale manufacturers. Messrs. Briggs and Bright, too, have contributed many cases of excellent hats, which, however, are not exhibited at the Rochdale stall. Among the manufactures from Todmorden is a splendid Poncho cloth, generally exported to the Greek islands, but which in England is used for table-covers, and is certainly very handsome.

In the model-room we have already noticed a handsome case of highly-finished and beautifully-modelled horse-shoes, manufactured by Mr. Alfred Josias Rogers, veterinary surgeon. There is also Rodway's patent double concave safety shoe, which retains the grit of the road in the shoe, and thus prevents slipping on any surface, and possesses many other advantages over the ordinary shoe now in use, at no additional expense. Each shoe is accompanied by a label, explaining its peculiar uses and advantages, which must prove highly interesting to sportsmen and agriculturists.

On the Kensington stall there is a superbly-finished flute, price £8. 8s. It is made of ebony, and mounted with gold. A. Binyon, 40, Tavistock-street, Covent-garden, is the maker.

At the Leeds stall are to be seen two autograph letters of General Washington, and we have been kindly permitted to copy the shorter of the two:—

"Sir,—The applications for liberty to go to the lines are so frequent, that they cause much trouble. You will, therefore, Sir, grant passes to such as you may think proper; at the same time, I would recommend to you, that the officer who will attend upon these occasions be a person of sense, and one who will carefully attend to the conversation of those who meet on the lines.

"I am, Sir, your most H. St.

"G. WASHINGTON.

"Cambridge, 17th Decemr., 1775, Major-General Ward."

In the second box lobby is exhibited an interesting relic of Napoleon, with the following description attached:—
"This remnant of silk formed a part of the mattress-covering of the Emperor Napoleon Bonaparte; and the black cloth is a portion from that which lined the illustrious hero's tomb. These relics were presented from Mr. and Mrs. Boorman, residents of James-town, St. Helena, after performing, jointly with others, the funeral rites of the Emperor, who now lies entombed in that island.

"Born 15th August, 1769. Died 5th May, 1821."
The authenticity of the relic is attested by the following affidavit:—

"I, Richard Draper, of Fenchurch-street, engraver, do certify on oath, before the Right Honourable John Garratt, Lord Mayor of the City of London, that the remnant of silk is part of the mattress-covering of the Emperor Napoleon Bonaparte, and the black cloth is a portion from that which lined the hero's tomb, presented, as stated on the other side, by Mr. and Mrs. Boorman, who performed part of the funeral rites.

"Richard Draper.
"Sworn at the Mansion-house, this 14th day of July, 1825, before me, John Garratt, Mayor."
We have hitherto said nothing about the book stall, although it is one of the most important in the Bazaar. It is situated in the chamber of deais, or ground beneath the main room, on the right-hand side of the entrance. The upper part of the counter is occupied by pamphlets and fancy stationery. On the stall there is a great variety of books, including some of great rarity and antiquity. We may mention the "Free-Trade Bible," a copy of the first edition published after the overthrow of the Bible monopoly in Scotland; a copy of the rare edition of the Bible, known to bibliomaniacs under the name of the edition of 1656; a valuable missal in folio, with the musical notation of the chants and antiphones; a copy of the aical notation of the vases, both Etruscan and Italo-Grecian, preserved in the Vatican, with plates, and descriptions in Latin and Italian; copies of works by Dr. Bowring, Dr. Pye Smith, Dr. Cox, Dr. Cooke Taylor, &c., with the autographs of their respective writers; "The League Guide to London," containing a ground plan of the Bazaar, with references to the different stalls; and Miss Martineau's tale of "Dawn Island," written expressly for this occasion. Amongst other curiosities at this stall are four manuscript sermons by Dr. Watts. To the sermons is prefixed a letter, in his own handwriting, of which the following is a copy:—

"To my honoured and dear Mother, Mrs. Sarah Watts. Dear Mother,—At your command these four Sermons are transcribed; not as written in my own notes, in brief hints in short-hand, but as taken from my mouth, when I preached ym., by one yt. heard em; and therefore more at large, yet not very uncorrect.

"If they shall be useful to your meditations, and faith, and support, and growth in grace, under your continued afflictions, as they have been to many of my friends at London, give all the honour to the God of grace, and continue to love and pray for "Your obedient and affectionate son, and willing Servant in the Lord,

"London, Novr. 2, 1702." I. WATTS."

There is a copy of Hogarth's works, splendidly bound; "Faden's Illustrations," "Lodge's Portraits," "Audubon's American Ornithology," "Book of Costumes," with MS. memoranda by the Queen, and a sketch in pencil by Prince Albert; "Lewis's Topographical Dictionary," "Jamieson's Scottish Dictionary," and the "Free-Trade Quadrilles," composed and contributed to the Bazaar by Miss Novello, the title-page of which is one of the finest specimens of decorative printing that has yet been produced. There are two splendid volumes of "Sketches of Costume," by Coke Smith, Esq., which are to be disposed of by raffle. These sketches, 126 in number, were submitted to the Queen previous to the masked ball given at Buckingham Palace in May, 1842. On some of them are memoranda made by her Majesty. There is one sketch in pencil made by his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

We extract the following morceau, from Leigh Hunt's autograph, in a copy of his recent work on Imagination and Fancy, contributed to the Bazaar:—

"IMAGINATION (of one's own rights) and FANCY (for those of others).

"AN APOLOGUE.

"A man bred in a great, but not very good, school, issued forth one day to carry out the principle of doing what he liked with his own. He abused every body with his own tongue, picked as many pockets as he could with his own fingers, was very near being the death of a policeman with his own dagger, and was at length brought before a jury of his countrymen in his own proper person; but the jury unanimously acquitted him. 'For how,' said they, 'can a man who professes an opinion so preposterous be held responsible for his own actions?'"

Among the articles contributed to the Bazaar, there is none superior, in elegance and rich fancy, to the fairy glass, exhibited at the Edinburgh stall. It was manufactured in Paris, for the purpose of being presented to the Queen, at a cost of more than £200. The decorations are of the early style of Louis Quatorze, before the heavy florid taste had superseded the light and graceful ornamentation which the French derived from northern Italy. The general effect is, indeed, Florentine, rather than French, and the design appears to have been suggested by the noble specimens of decorative art produced under the patronage of the princely merchants of the house of the Medici. The ornaments are real stones, and are singularly lustrous when lighted up. This magnificent contribution is to be disposed of by raffle, in shares at 2s. 6d. each.

One of the most recent novelties is a spiritedly-executed woodcut, which contains a smart hit at the Corn Law. It is headed "The Shetland Arms." On the escutcheon appear, on a rock in the sea, a half-starved-looking fisherman, his wife, and some children of equally wretched and hungry appearance. The fisherman is in the attitude of presenting a fish towards a figure which appears approaching from the opposite side on the prow of a vessel, boding towards the fisherman a loaf of bread. Between the two appears a demoniacal-looking figure in the attitude of preventing the exchange of the fish for the bread, exhibiting in each hand a scroll—one labelled "Monopoly," the other "Corn Law." Motto, "Starvation of the many for the luxury of the few." This cut illustrates the oppressive operation of the Corn Law on the poor Shetlanders, in preventing them from exchanging their staple commodity, cured fish, with the Spaniards and others for bread, which the islands cannot produce. A striking instance of this oppression is detailed in a small pamphlet, to which this cut is an appropriate accompaniment. Both are to be had at the book stall and at the Shetland stall.

The following articles have been added to the Wolverhampton stall, by Messrs. T. and C. Clark:—Door porters, coffee mills, Italian irons, box irons, crimping machines, umbrella stands, cork squeezers, and tobacco pots.

We invite attention to the Savoy stall, where we find that Mr. Lewis, of 113, Strand, has produced a valuable steel pen. Mrs. Lewis also has contributed numerous fancy articles, but her chef-d'œuvre is a splendid group of wax flowers, rivaling Nature herself. This group and vase is about three feet high, the vase being placed on a stand resembling a mossy bank, from which violets, primroses, and other modest and retiring flowers peep forth; and here and there a snail-shell most judiciously placed, give it the reality of life. The vase is a fine specimen of terra cotta, and contains a large group of dahlias, roses, camellias, honey-suckles, and other splendid flowers, while sprigs of liburnum, wistaria, and clusters of passion-flowers droop over the vase in graceful harmony, down to the mossy bank. This beautiful production, which has excited much attention, was bought within an hour after the opening of the Bazaar on the first day, by a lady from Liverpool, for £7, who kindly allowed it to remain for a time for public inspection. Many other productions at this stall are worthy of particular attention, especially "The Anti-Corn-Law and Free-Trade Cluster of Eschol," which we may perhaps notice in a future number.

On Wednesday morning the senior students of the Government School of Design, in Somerset-house, were admitted to see the Bazaar, at nine o'clock, and were accompanied by two of their masters, who explained to them the merits of the most striking designs in the various articles of manufacture, and commented on their general effect. The gentlemen of the model class were much interested by the potter's wheel, the artisan by whom it is worked having kindly consented to come at this early hour to exhibit it for their gratification. He produced in their presence, with a rapidity which was perfectly astonishing, accurate copies of the most celebrated Egyptian and Etruscan vases, to illustrate the variety of beautiful forms that may be produced by the simple machinery of the potter's wheel, aided by the plastic finger. They spent a long time in the lower saloon, minutely examining the castings from Colebrookdale: they unanimously declared that they had seen nothing equal to them at the Paris Exposition; and they further agreed that the figures on the great show table were equal to any bronze castings that have been produced in modern times. They were much struck with the splendid porcelain vases presented by Messrs. Wood and Brownfield, of the Potteries, to the Bazaar, and also by the beautiful specimens of glass sent up from the works of Birmingham and Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The prize carpet from Glasgow, in the outer hall, was more than admired; it was viewed with wonder as well as approbation. The copy of Rubens's celebrated "Descent from the Cross," which is worked in tapestry, and suspended in the hall of entrance, excited feelings of satisfaction, from the proof it afforded of the great progress which the fine arts have made in the manufacturing districts. The Manchester printed cottons, muslins, and velvets afforded equally cogent evidence of the great advance of the arts of design in Lancashire. The very handsome carriage sent to the Bazaar, by Mr. Andrews, of Southampton, was an object of great attraction; its beauty of form is not less remarkable than its lightness and convenience.

In consequence of the early hour at which this visit was made, very few of the stalls in the great Gothic-hall were uncovered. Fortunately, the keepers of the stall assigned to Newcastle-upon-Tyne (which now occupies the place previously ceded to the contributions from Duxfordshire, all of which have been sold off) were early in their attendance, and afforded an opportunity of examining the contributions sent from that spirited and enterprising locality. Amongst others, are twelve carvings upon the nut of the vegetable ivory, executed in the most beautiful style, by R. S. Scott, of that town; a bust in wax, of Mr. Cobden; and an exquisite model in gold, of a Northumberland cobble, one of the seats being made of the hair of the late Grace Horsley Darling, executed by C. Dinale, of Newcastle. There are also some very fine specimens of the crystals of alum, prussiate of potash, and sulphate of copper, from the Felling Alkali Works.

Several new and important additions have been made to the models in the upper saloon, but none more worthy of attention and admiration than two beautiful models sent by Mr. Henry Ashworth, of the Oaks, near Bolton, to illustrate the economy of Lothian farming. The first exhibits the arrangement of the fields, with the different crops grown on each, and the order of succession in which the crops are varied. The second exhibits the economy of the farmhouse, with its various out-offices, barns, yards, stables, &c.; the roofs of the houses are moveable, so as to display the internal arrangements. We believe that these exquisite models, which are executed with the most minute accuracy, are not for sale, but are designed for preservation in the League-rooms in Manchester. There are also exhibited several very interesting models of houses, that may be sent out in frame to the colonies or to Africa. A singular proof that such articles are wanted by the African chiefs is afforded by the throne of one of the slave-trading kings exhibited on an adjoining stall, which is nothing better than a very ugly stool. In contrast with this barbarism, we may notice a very beautiful specimen of Tshiti cloth, exhibited at the Bristol stall, which rivals the produce of the best looms of Christendom. Connected with this stall, we may also mention two Chinese screens, which have been suspended from the second circle of boxes, and which do great credit to the ingenuity, though not to the taste, of the artisans of the Celestial Empire.

We give a description of a mahogany boat, copper and brass fastened, exhibited in the hall of entrance. The timbers are cut out of oak grown to the shape, the planks vary from two to three inches in breadth, and are from a quarter to three-sixteenths of an inch in thickness. It is adapted either for a two-oared gig, or four-oared skiff, with a coxswain, or might be used as a two-oared skiff with a rower in the centre seat. It is French polished, and the rollocks, footholds, and bottom boards are on a new plan.

At the Bolton stall is a pair of silver knee buckles, which were worn by Dr. Franklin; and a silver stock buckle, worn by General Washington. These buckles were presented by the late Matthew Johnson to the Doncaster Lyceum Museum, and were returned to T. Johnson when the Museum was broken up. They belonged to the late George Hammond, Esq., merchant, of Liverpool.

Among the curiosities presented, we must notice a watch and chain, with an inscription stating that they, together with a gig, which was disposed of by public auction, a quantity of silver plate, and a writing desk, valued altogether at £20, were seized under warrant of distress for non-payment of 13s. 6d., overcharge of income-tax, from Mr. Robert Smallwood, carrier, &c., of Birmingham. This being the first and only actual seizure made in the neighbourhood of Birmingham on account of overcharges by the income-tax collectors, Mr. Smallwood determined to mark his sense of the outrage, by making a presentation of the watch and chain, with an additional sovereign, to the Bazaar.

We are indebted to a contributor for the following particulars of the Savoy stall. He says, "First let me satisfy the curiosity of many of our visitors as to the denizenship of the 'Savoyards' in attendance. The question is asked a thousand times a day, 'Savoy! what, are you sent from Savoy,—are you really Savoyards?' And when informed that the fair attendants are truly English girls, and the articles offered for sale of English manufacture, the inquirers are much astonished; and their surprise is much increased when told that the Savoy is that mountainous district of the Strand lying on this side the Thames. In reality, it forms a portion of the Duchy of Lancaster, and is part of the appanage of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. It is now particularly remarkable for the great exertions made in so small a place in the cause of Free Trade. I mentioned a compilation entitled 'The Anti-Corn-Law and Free-Trade Cluster of Eschol.' It is a beautiful branch of purple grapes, and is accompanied by a well-written address, which refers the reader to Num. xiii. 23, for the meaning of the term 'Cluster of Eschol.' It appears that each grape contains a text of scripture bearing against the horrid systems of Corn Laws and monopoly; and I refer the reader to the address for a condensed exposé of the immorality and irreligious tendency of those systems. I also find a desirable acquisition for bachelors fearing to take unto themselves a wife. Here is a beautiful babe in a bassinet, which is to be disposed of by raffle, twenty members at 2s. each. Haste, therefore, ye anti-benedicts, while there is yet time! Another contribution which has caused much laughter, is a likeness of Lord Brougham, 'supposed to be contributed by Lord Campbell.' The likeness of this nondescript (with nine bills instead of tails) is very faithful. There is also a beautiful set of satin d'oyleys, embroidered in silk, fit to grace the table of our gracious Queen, price four guineas, and very cheap at the money. There are also a variety of articles in worsted and Berlin wool. One patriotic friend has contributed a stand containing thirty dozen pairs of infants' shoes, in satin and leather, which have met with a ready sale; and let us hope, for the giver's sake, that they will be trodden in by a worthy set of future Leaguers. Another article which has met with a ready sale is a portrait of the Queen, woven by the Jacquard loom, which possesses almost all the delicacy of touch and finish of the finest pencil."

On Tuesday evening, at the Bayswater stall, there was raffled for a very beautiful hearth-rug, worked, we understand, by two young ladies (the Misses Melhuish, Bedford-street, Holborn), from a design furnished by a friend. Great praise is due to all concerned, more especially to the ladies who executed such a piece of work in a space of time so short (a few weeks only), as to appear, upon close inspection, to be almost impossible. This contribution is indeed no solitary instance of industry and perseverance, quietly exerted, amidst domestic occupations, for the advancement of our great and noble cause. Many hundreds of fair hands have alike worked, unnoticed and unknown, day after day, and night after night, with the knowledge that their labours were for the cause of humanity; this, alone, was sufficient to cheer them on and recompense them, until the hand had satisfactorily accomplished what the heart so freely and generously dictated. We understand that a gentleman holding No. 9 ticket is the fortunate winner—fortunate not only in having an article worth ten or twelve guineas for five shillings, but as possessing that which, with care, will serve to remind even his children's children that the head, hand, and heart may join with as much energy and resolution, and equal zeal be evinced in the cause of philanthropy, amongst the retiring and humble, as amongst the more popular and elevated.

We must not omit to mention a very beautiful muslin, printed in gold by a galvanic process, by the patentees, Messrs. Vane and Co., of Manchester, and presented by Messrs. Watson, of Holborn-hill. This new system of gold printing is intended to supersede the more expensive mode of embroidering fabrics with gold and silver for window-curtains, and other descriptions of furniture. It is peculiarly adapted for long drawing room draperies. The brilliancy of the gold is rather heightened than impaired by washing; and the fabric is as economical as it is elegant.

On the York stall will be found a great number of curious and interesting articles, a few of which we will here enumerate. Among the principal are twelve copies of native lays, containing an historical and descriptive sketch of the city of York, beginning with the conquest of Severus. These books also contain other poetical sketches of considerable merit. They have been presented by the author, Mr. Thomas Holmes, a native of York. By the side of these are a variety of snuff-boxes, pearl stands, paper knives, decanter stands, ladies' thumb cases, carved candlesticks, &c., made out of the remnants of the old oak burned by the last fire at York Minster. There are also a set of glass flower vases, paintings, original drawings, engravings of York Minster, and other interesting places in the city; several beautiful cushions, crucifixes, and portfolios; and fancy needlework, &c., furnished by some of the fairest of old Ebor's wives and daughters. There are a few specimens of the manufactures of the city, consisting of planes, from the manufactory of Mr. Summers Varvill; shoe thread, from Messrs. Fletcher and Noddings; gloves, &c. &c. The planes are of a superior and first-rate character, and for excellence cannot be surpassed.

On Thursday morning it was agreed by several gentlemen, that it would be very desirable to have the splendid fountain from Colebrookdale, exhibited in the lower saloon, purchased for the Free-Trade-hall, in Manchester, to be preserved there as a permanent memorial of the Bazaar. It was agreed that it should be raffled for in six hundred shares of half-a-crown each, and at the very moment the proposition was made, several gentlemen put down their names and their money. Eight shares each were taken by George Wilson, Esq.; Samuel Lucas, Esq.; and Doctor Cooke Taylor; four shares each by Messrs. T. Plint and Robert R. Moore, Esq.; and two shares by Mr. Harbottle. Subscription papers have been sent round to the different stalls, and we have no doubt that before the end of the week, the requisite number of shares will be taken; for it is an object well worthy of laudable ambition, to have the honour of presenting such a splendid piece of workmanship, and one so highly creditable to British art, to the Free-Trade-hall.

We have been requested to insert the following announcement:—"Autograph. Mr. Horace Smith's original manuscript of stanzas on the Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar will be sold to the highest bidder. Persons desirous of securing it are requested to give their name and address, in writing, specifying the amount they offer for it, and to put such card or paper into the box at the Sussex stall, which box will not be opened until the close of the sale, when the purchaser will be informed where the MS. may be had, on payment of the price offered for it, and the purchaser's name will be announced in the League paper."

CONTRIBUTIONS AND CORRESPONDENCE.

BEDS FOR AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.

"HONOURABLE SIR.—Six years ago I addressed a letter to you condemnatory of the Corn and Provision Laws. That letter was published in the Anti-Bread-Tax Circular. As I have spent six years of my life in Oxfordshire, I have had many painful opportunities of witnessing the awful and heart-rending effects of what is called 'protection to the farmer.' I have done what I could in my own neighbourhood to hasten the downfall of that protection; and it is to me a source of great consolation to know that I have not laboured in vain. I appeared before a committee of the House of Commons about three years ago, and there pleaded the cause of the starving thousands in Oxfordshire. I have made much use of the columns of the Patriot, the Oxford Chronicle, and the Aylesbury News, to call the attention of the public to the wretched and impoverished state of the rural peasantry. Many thanks to the editors of these newspapers; for I have always found them not only willing, but most anxious, to give publicity to my letters, and to encourage me in my humble efforts in the cause of humanity and righteousness. I have had to encounter great opposition, and to endure my full share of odium and persecution; but I have held fast in my ardent and honest desires and endeavours to benefit my poorer brethren, and now I have received a part of my reward. Yes, Sir, a letter published in the LEAGUE of the 3rd inst., in which I read that some generous manufacturers have resolved to give a great number of beds to the degraded and half-naked field labourers of Dorsetshire and Oxfordshire, has dried my tears and cheered my heart. A gift of beds, &c., to field labourers will do more to accelerate the everlasting overthrow of monopoly, in the rural districts, than a thousand speeches and lectures could do; and it will tell a tale which will inspire the famishing peasantry with hope, and clothe the monopolists with shame.

"I have received £5 from Luke Howard, Esq., that well-known and benevolent friend of mankind, with which he has instructed me to purchase 20 beds, &c., for the poor in my own neighbourhood. I am of opinion, Sir, that, if we manage this business prudently and with care, the good effect produced by the gift, upon both farmers and labourers, will be such as has never been produced before in England by any single act of charity.

"George Simmons, Esq., 203, Upper Thames-street, London, will act on my behalf, and pay you for 20 beds, sheets, and quilts, at the nominal price of 5s. each, which will be given to the most deserving of those starving men, women, and children in whose cause I have often, and for many years, 'toiled all night,' and over whose untold miseries I have wept in the day time.

THE SUGAR MONOPOLY.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures, Manchester, April 30, 1845.

SIR.—I take leave to draw your attentive consideration to the annexed copy of a petition which the Directors of this Chamber caused to be presented to the House of Commons, on the 11th inst.

The history of British legislation in reference to sugar is most instructive, and displays with forcible accuracy the effects of protection upon the comforts and employment of our own people; and, although this petition touches only upon the single article of sugar, yet the reasoning employed is equally applicable to every other protected commodity. It is seen that, within the space of the last ten years, upwards of thirty-one millions of money have been wrong from that portion of our people which can permit itself to use sugar, more than it would have had to pay if there had been no protective duty: apply the same course of examination to the other imported articles on which differential duties are imposed, and how appalling would be the result! I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS BAZILEY, Junr., President.

"To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled;

"The Petition of the Directors of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures at Manchester:—

Showeth,

"That your petitioners have seen with extreme disappointment and regret, that your honourable House has lately adopted measures in reference to sugar to be admitted for consumption in this country, which, in their opinion, are opposed to every principle of wise legislation, and involve so much injury and injustice to the people as to render any long continuance of them impossible.

"That your petitioners deprecate in the strongest terms frequent changes in the rates of duties upon important articles of consumption, for they disturb commerce and inflict injury on every side; the increasing intelligence of the age calls, indeed, more earnestly, year by year, for a revision of that mischievous system of commercial policy which has so long abridged the comforts and employment of the industrious, but it seeks that changes be made on such basis, only, as shall secure permanence through the justice and wisdom on which they ought to be founded.

"That, in the opinion of your petitioners, the regulations lately adopted in reference to the import of sugar are neither just nor wise: they are not just, because they compel, by the mere force of law and without reciprocal advantage, one portion of her Majesty's subjects to pay to another a higher price for an article than it is worth in the other markets of the world, or to abstain from the use of it altogether; they are not wise, because by an attempt to perpetuate and multiply high discriminating duties, they deprive the revenue of that increase which it would assuredly receive from sugar being permitted to come within the reach of the great bulk of the people, and they continue an injurious war of tariffs with foreign powers, whereby the employment of our people is rendered uncertain and precarious; whilst by re-establishing a system of classification not indeed new in principle, for it existed before and had been abandoned in 1825, but aggravated in extent and difficult of enforcement in practice, many evils will be incurred:—quality will be deteriorated, encouragement to fraud will be held out both to the importer and to the officers of customs, and involuntary, if not voluntary, acts of injustice will be perpetrated, through the absence of that simplicity which is desirable in the levying of customs duties.

"That your petitioners hold with the First Lord of her Majesty's Treasury, that the best interests of a nation will be found in 'buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest markets;' and with another member of her Majesty's Government, 'that the principles of Free Trade are the principles of common sense;' they therefore deplore, that no approach to doctrines so wisely and emphatically enunciated are to be found in the propositions submitted to and adopted by your honourable House respecting sugar.

"That your petitioners believe, that to admit all sugars, whatever their origin, to consumption in this country at one and the same rate of duty, is the only wise principle of legislation, and that no other can be adopted without injustice and loss to the people. Society has outgrown the pretences on which discriminating duties were ignorantly defended in former times, and facts must, in a short time, dissipate the pretences on which the continued application of them is sought for from Parliament. A consideration of a document lately laid upon the table of your honourable House (Sess. No. 80) gives strong evidence of the working of protection as regards the colonies themselves, and of the deprivation which it causes to the mass of the population at home. By that return it is shown that the average importation of West Indian Muscovado sugar for

The first two years, 1820 and 1821, was 3,838,110 cwt.

The average of the first 10 years, 1820 to 1829, was 3,834,032 cwt. per year.

Whilst the average of the last ten years, 1835 to 1844, was only 2,858,069 cwt. per year.

"During five and a half of the first ten years, West Indian sugar enjoyed a preferential duty of 10s. per cwt. over the sugars of both the Mauritius and the East Indies; the aggregate of Mauritius and East Indian sugar imported during five of those years, 1820 to 1824, was 252,838 cwt. per year. In 1825 the differential duty between West Indian and Mauritius sugars was abolished, but it was retained against that of the East Indies, to the extent of 10s. per cwt., until July, 1830, and of 8s. per cwt. until a subsequent change in 1836.

The import of Mauritius sugar in 1825 was 93,723 cwt.

The average of the three succeeding years, 1827 to 1829, was 321,209 cwt. per year.

Whilst the import of the still burdened East India sugar, which in 1825 was 145,995 cwt., gives for the four following years a yearly average of only 155,832 cwt.

"The relative position in point of duty between the sugars of the Mauritius and the East Indies continued from 5th July, 1830, to the 13th of August, 1836.

The import of Mauritius sugar, which in 1825 had been 93,723 cwt., gives an average for the years 1830 to 1835, of 531,414 cwt. per year.

That of East Indian, which in 1825 had been 145,995 cwt., gives for the same years, 1830 to 1835, an average of only 125,535 cwt. per year,—an instructive demonstration of the effect of a differential duty of 8s. per cwt.

"From these statements your honourable House will perceive, that the point of idleness or incapability, which protection engenders, had been already attained in the West Indies in 1820; subsequent examination will show that the Mauritius had reached the same point in 1835; for the average import of that sugar for the nine years, from 1836 to 1844, has been only 580,104 cwt. per year, whilst precisely the same process has been going on in our East Indian possessions. It has been shown that, whilst differential duties pressed upon East Indian sugar,—

The average import for the five last years of the existence of those differential duties was 125,535 cwt. per year.

The average of the four first years after the remission of the discriminating duty, viz., from 1837 to 1840, was 431,820 cwt. per year.

The average of the four last years has been 1,095,765 cwt. per year.

But an inspection of each year's import gives reason to apprehend that, as in the West Indies and Mauritius, so has the point of idleness been attained in India; for the import of 1841 was 1,239,738 cwt., but the same quantity has not been reached in any subsequent year.

"Another view of the details supplied by the return will manifest to your honourable House how invariably and progressively, the pressure upon the people, and loss to the revenue, are connected with monopoly. The following table, divided into periods, during which no change occurred either in the participants in the monopoly or in the rates of duty, and marking separately each year of change, is respectfully submitted to the consideration of your honourable House.

Table showing the Import of Sugar from British Possessions, the Consumption Gazette Price of Muscovado, and Amount of Revenue for each Year from 1820 to 1844, separating those Years in which changes of the Law occurred, and taking an average in the periods between each change.

"These alternations have taken place during a period when the population has been constantly on the increase whilst an immense accession has been made to the wealth of the country, and a consequent large addition to that class of society whose consumption of sugar is not absolutely controlled by price. The population of the United Kingdom in 1822, the middle year of the period to which the first paragraph of the preceding table refers, was 21,500,000; that of 1842-3 the average of the period referred to in the last paragraph was at least 27,000,000 giving an increase of 54 millions, or 26 per cent.

The average import for the years 1820 to 1824 as shown above was 4,016,851 cwt. per year. Add 26 per cent. .. 1,044,381

Would, without providing for any increased power of consumption in the people, but taking only the standard of consuming power of 1822, give as an equivalent import for 1842-3 .. 5,061,232 cwt.

But the average of those two years was only .. 4,110,681 cwt.

Leaving a comparative deficiency of supply amounting to no less than .. 950,551 cwt.

to meet that large increase of demand which has accompanied the increase in the number of those whose consumption is not entirely regulated by price.

"That your petitioners humbly submit to your honourable House that, under the system hitherto pursued of retaining monopolies to favoured portions of our empire until the diminished supply of the protected commodity forces an admission of other portions into the confederacy, severe suffering and privation are entailed upon the mother country. The following comparison of the difference in price between colonial and foreign sugar will, in some degree, but not to the full extent, illustrate this position. It is drawn from the paper presented to your honourable House already named, and corresponds with the periods adopted in the preceding table:—

So that, during the last ten years only, the United Kingdom has paid an excess in price to the colonial interest amounting to £31,197,041 for sugar alone.

The frightful annual sacrifice which this table exhibits indicates only one portion of the effects of monopoly; the extra amount paid by those who can consume is shown, but it is not seen from how many all power of consumption is taken away. Your petitioners have no means of estimating to what extent the profits which monopoly in corn leaves to farmers, or the wages paid to their labourers, could bring either class into the number of consumers; but they can show what effect this baneful system of monopoly has had upon commerce and manufacturing industry. In considering this question as it relates to sugar, your petitioners do not conceive that any other portion of her Majesty's empire than the West Indies need be brought into contrast, for the differential duties imposed upon the introduction of foreign manufactures into the East Indies will not be claimed as a ground for specially taxing the mother country in their favour. The attention of your honourable House is humbly entreated to the following table, showing the amount of exports from the United Kingdom to the British West Indies compared with those to the two sugar-growing countries in their own vicinity, viz., the foreign West Indies and Brazil, and compiled from the earliest and latest official documents, to which your petitioners have access:—

or more than 2½ per cent. upon the aggregate amount of exports which they took during the 16 years, the sugars of our better customers being, all the while, charged with a differential duty amounting to 163 per cent. more than the rate charged on West Indian sugar.

"The facts exhibited by this table ought, in the opinion of your petitioners, to receive the calm consideration of your honourable House. It is seen that even under a repulsive system, which has deprived the people of the power of consuming the staple articles produced in Brazil and the foreign West Indies, those countries have taken from us a greater amount of produce and manufactures than have the whole of our West Indian possessions; whilst the extra cost inflicted upon the consumers of the single article of sugar in this country shows, only in a partial degree, the oppression which has been practised under the plea of protection. The extra cost which the system of differential duties compels the consumers of coffee to pay in this country is, your petitioners believe, not less than £300,000 per year; so that, without taking into consideration any portion of the cost of the government of the West Indies, or regarding the comforts of the great bulk of our own people, but looking only to the effect of the protective system upon the labour of the country, it is clear that, for several past years, it would have been more beneficial had your honourable House made an eleemosynary grant out of the Consolidated Fund to the West Indian proprietors, to the extent of about double the amount of the produce and labour which they take from us, rather than have continued so baneful a system.

"That your petitioners are anxious to place this view of the effects of protection before your honourable House, because the measures which have lately received the sanction of your honourable House, though different in form and in the amount of duties leviable, do not differ essentially in principle from the system which they now represent. For the first time in the history of commercial legislation, your honourable House, by the measures brought in your session of last year in reference to sugar, has rendered the labour and comforts of the United Kingdom dependent upon the policy which particular foreign Governments might think it right to pursue, not towards us, but towards their own people. The continuance of slavery was the plea on which this cruel system was attempted to be justified; but the extra cost of the application of the principle, that the forbiddance to trade fell chiefly upon those foreign countries to which Great Britain is most indebted by a demand for manufactures. Your petitioners cannot but remark, that this partial war of tariffs was begun by an act of the Legislature was, and still is, in execution of the United Kingdom, in order that the revenue may be swelled by the import of slave-grown tobacco; whilst, under the sanction of your honourable House, slave-grown coffee supplied about one-third of the consumption and one-half of the revenue derived from that article; and whilst slave-grown cotton furnished so much employment to our cotton manufacturing population, as enabled it, after supplying our wants at home, to contribute half of the amount of the exported industry of the country.

"That your petitioners have seen with regret, that, in the arrangement of sugar duties lately adopted by your honourable House, the principle of which they complain in the measures of last year has not only been retained, but a system of classification has been added, which, if it could be permanent, would bring with it a new train of evils. But your petitioners believe that the system of classification bears the germs of early abandonment in itself, and will, in the meantime, only serve to deprive our people of a sufficient supply of sugar, and cause much chicanery amongst merchants and trouble to the Custom-house. The continuance of distinctive duties between the Muscovado and clayed sugars of our own colonies, and those of the favoured foreign nations, can only be operative for one season, or so long as the existing stocks of clayed, or equal in quality to clayed, sugars are unconsumed; those countries which hope to be able to participate in the supplying of sugar to Great Britain will discontinue any process which will subject their produce to the higher duty; and the British Legislature will find that its measures have only tended to confine the supply of its own people to a narrow insufficiency, and to cause a deterioration in the quality of the sugar which it permits to be consumed. The whole import will eventually consist of Muscovado, or 'a quality inferior to clayed' sugar, and the relative duties, until a new change, will be 14s. for colonial, 23s. 4d. for favoured foreign sugar, and 63s. for that which it is intended to prohibit.

"That, whilst your petitioners express their gratitude for the reduction which has been conceded in the duty upon colonial sugar, they respectfully but energetically remonstrate against the differential duties imposed upon the other classes. They believe that the best mode of ensuring the profitable cultivation of the West Indies, and our other colonial possessions, will be found in the abandonment of every incentive to extravagant mismanagement; and that a relinquishment of all protection would best serve the lasting interests of both the mother country and the colonies. Your petitioners do not complain that sugar is made to contribute to the exigencies of the State, but they claim a right for the people of this country, that the duty levied from it shall go to the service of the State, and not into the pockets of favoured individuals. But to frame two rates of differential duties, on grounds proposed to be fixed, but which cannot be made to act distinctively, —to admit some slave-grown sugar at 23s. 4d., whilst the charge upon other similar sugar is 63s. per cwt., —adds grievously to the mischiefs which such legislation is calculated to create; —it carries on a war of tariffs unequally, and makes the application pointed and almost isolated. It assumes a power in this country to interfere in, and to legislate for, the internal government of foreign states, and, in case of non-submission, punishment is made to fall, not upon the offender, but upon the unoffending consumer at home, by creating scarcity, enhancing prices, and forbidding labour. These consequences would result from the system of duties last adopted by your honourable House, if that system could be permanent. But the high prices which a short supply will establish in this country will probably attract higher sugars which have heretofore been sent to other markets; —countries which have endeavoured to improve the quality of their sugar may be induced to forego improvement, and deteriorate the quality, in order to meet the wishes of our Legislature; but the vacuum thus created will be occupied by slave-grown sugar, and the only object which such policy will have accomplished will be, to have given a new and different direction to the produce of slave labour.

"Confirmed by study and experience in the opinion that duties levied for protection are injurious to the sections which they are intended to serve, and oppressive to the consumer at home; observing that the measures passed by your honourable House during the present session are based professedly upon a principle which your honourable House suffers to be violated in the very act itself, by admitting some slave-grown sugar at one rate of duty and some at another; finding that the intended prohibition is partial in its operation, and directed against those countries from which the most copious supply might be drawn, and which are already amongst the largest foreign consumers of British produce and manufactures; believing that the object of those measures is to produce scarcity, in order that higher prices may be obtained for colonial sugar than it is intrinsically worth in the open markets of the world; convinced that such legislation is neither wise nor just, for it oppressively enhances the cost of an important article, the larger consumption of which would, more than any other, produce an increased consumption of several other foreign products which themselves contribute to the revenue, whilst, at the same time, it restricts the labour by which alone any of them can be obtained; convinced, also, that the principle which your honourable House endeavours to establish, and itself infringes, cannot be worked out by the measures which it has adopted; and that, if effective at all, those measures will only tend to aggravate the hard fate of the slave, by encouraging owners to attain greater cheapness by increased production, either through or without a relative increase of means; and that in every other respect they will be illusory, and not permanent.

"Your petitioners earnestly and humbly pray, that your honourable House may revise its policy, and by admitting all sugars, whatever their origin, to consumption in the United Kingdom at the same rate of duty, fix a correct and unchangeable principle of legislation, and provide extended comforts and increased employment for our industrious and patient people."

FREE-TRADE CLUB.

A general meeting of the members of the above institution was held on Tuesday last, at the Club-house, No. 27, Regent-street; to take into consideration the best means of rendering its advantages more extensively available to the friends of Free Trade, both among residents in the country and inhabitants of the metropolis.

The chair was taken by Major-General Briggs, and among other gentlemen who were present were John Bright, Esq., M.P., T. M. Gibson, Esq., M.P., Captain Cogun, Messrs. G. Thompson, Robert R. Moore, W. J. Fox, Hamer Stansfeld, Ralph Ricardo, J. Wilson, Dr. Prendergast, Lawrence Heyworth, R. L. Twerdale, S. Pryme, Henry Hall, John P. Bull, R. Stone, B. Boothby, Wm. Leaf, E. Beveridge, Wm. White, Charles Sedgwick, — Crowley, W. A. Wilkinson, John Lambert, Wm.

Brown (Liverpool), W. Clark, Summers Harford, J. Ivimey, John Barclay, C. Swaisland, A. Mongredien, J. Armstrong, &c., including, as will be seen from the above list, many gentlemen who may be considered as representatives of numerous bodies of provincial Free-Traders. Letters of apology for absence, but cordially acquiescing in the proposed object, were received from Lord Radnor and R. Cobden, Esq., M.P.

An animated discussion took place upon the various plans suggested for the attainment of the desired object. The advantages presented by the institution, especially to country members, in the opportunity afforded, during a temporary residence in London, of intercommunication with their metropolitan friends, combined with the general conveniences of a club, were clearly pointed out.

The spacious house in Regent-street, which the managers have recently taken, presents ample scope for this purpose; containing, as it does, a reading-room, supplied with the daily and weekly journals, and all the leading periodicals of the day, large and handsomely-furnished coffee and dining rooms, and a library of reference upon every branch of the Free-Trade question, including the best works upon social and economic sciences.

The object of the club is, as was stated by Mr. Bright and Mr. G. Thompson, not to form a luxurious establishment for the enjoyment of the aristocratic portion of society, but an institution for the convenience of commercial and manufacturing gentlemen, and the middle classes generally, favourable to commercial freedom, and the union of all classes of the friends of Free Trade.

Mr. R. R. Moore stated, and the statement was corroborated by the hon. member for Durham, that in their journeys throughout the country they had found numerous supporters of their cause exceedingly desirous of supporting such a club in the metropolis.

Hitherto the entrance fee has been ten guineas, and the annual subscription five guineas; but, with a view to extend the benefits of the institution to the utmost possible limits, upon the motion of Mr. James Wilson, seconded by Mr. Bright, M.P., the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

"That it is the opinion of this meeting, that in order to extend the usefulness of this club and its number of members, in future the terms of admission for resident members shall be an entrance fee of five guineas, and an annual subscription of two guineas; and for members resident beyond a distance of 50 miles, an annual subscription, only, of two guineas; but that, in order to secure the trustees against existing liabilities which they have undertaken on the faith of the present amount of subscriptions being paid by the existing members, the same shall continue to be paid for the second year; after which all annual subscriptions shall be two guineas, unless the finance committee shall declare, at the end of the first year, that the additional three guineas from existing members will not be absolutely required to indemnify the trustees from existing liabilities."

Thanks having been voted to the chairman, the meeting separated.

STOCK FARMING IN THE AUSTRALIAN BUSH.

(From the Dumfries Standard.)

Many of our readers have friends in that far country, formerly the land of the banished, towards which the tide of emigration set in, six or seven years ago, with an impetus of hopefulness which swept all obstacles away. The now-come people were dispersed widely, and discovered that the green earth was not all rich in deep soil and running water, and that life has its hardships on the other side of the world as well as at home. The settler from whose letters we collect a few heterogeneous extracts, has tried his hand at various modes of turning a small capital to account, and for the last two years has been engaged on a farm which is counted a good run for bullocks—having the unwonted advantage of a stream which dries up only in the severest droughts, while streams in general run for three months, then dwindle into chains of ponds for six months, till at length nothing remains but thirsty pebbles and cracked clay at the bottom, waiting for winter and heavy rains.

Keeping stock together, or at least in view, is no easy matter where animals are wild, country hilly, and "runs" wide. The writer, however, says, when they are well mounted, it is sometimes as good fun riding after bullocks with the help of dogs, as fox-hunting used to be at home—all but the gentility of the thing.

September, 1844.

"I returned from Sydney in July (between two and three hundred miles west); found things going on smoothly; no disputes among the men, or grumbling. The stockman's time was out, and the cattle were to be mustered and taken off his hands. After two or three weeks of hard riding, we made a pretty good muster, which, in mid winter and in cold rainy weather, is no easy matter, for the beasts get away in twos and threes, in queer gullies and nooks in the hills, and do not trouble themselves to come down to the swamps and summer watering places.

"The said stockman is as clever a little fellow as ever mounted a horse; good-humoured and civil, too; and he had been on the station ever since the cattle came here. But I determined not to keep him, he had such a multitude of cronies always about his hut—had so much riding and trucking to do on his own account; and he took some pains to keep me out of the knowledge of my own affairs, and to be the man to be consulted, and to manage with neighbours, about stray cattle and all other things. He had got a wife too, to us well behaved, civil and quiet, but of a bad kind, connected with all sorts of rascals; so that he could not be kept, though I doubt if the cattle will ever be so well mustered again.

"Against one side of our house is built a large store. But perhaps you do not know that it is the custom of the country for all stockholders to have in their stores every thing their people may want in the way of dress. This arose out of the prison labour, when the master clad his men. When they got free and were hired, they still looked to the same quarter for clothing, as there are no shops in this thinly-settled country. The articles were sold at a very large profit; and, notwithstanding the laws of England against the truck system, a man brought his master before a bench of magistrates, complaining that he did not keep a shop for his freedmen; and the bench decided that the master must do so, there being no shop accessible. You will not wonder, then, that they took a good profit, particularly when wages were so high.

"Tobacco, if good, is better than gold here; the (el-low as all smoke, and do not grudge 100 per cent. profit on good stuff—it will buy anything. By adding the amount of cash paid to any individual to the amount provided from the store, you will see the rate of wages of each, which last year was not high, and this year is rather lower. We have now a man for cook, because single women's wages are higher than men's. Besides, after bringing them all the way, the girls are married immediately, and we are tired of transporting wives here for the people.

"Here is a specimen of our accounts, Dr. and Cr. :—

Paid in Cash.
Eliza Collis—11 months' service ..	£5 0 0
John Turnbull—1 year ..	4 0 7½
Robert Gibb—1 year ..	7 10 0
Paid out of Store.
Eliza Collis—11 months ..	£10 0 0
John Turnbull—1 year, and his wife for washing ..	16 9 6
Long Tom—10 weeks ..	6 6 0
Robert Gibb—1 year ..	14 10 0
Wm. Batson, stockman—1 year and 6 weeks ..	28 10 0

[To this the writer has appended a list of stores, comprising a complete shop; that is, ready-made clothing for men and women, the smallest articles, such as garters and braces, included; and a complete Scotch country Willy o' thing shop, from a grindstone, saw, and axe, down to an ounce of tea or quid of tobacco.]

"What we get for cheese and butter at Goulburn is a mere bagatelle; but milking is incalculably beneficial to the herds, and should be done, if the expense is not too great. The price of bullocks is so low that I have sold none; nor have I heard any account of the success of the salting operations. I hope your next letter will give me some information as to the persons in London or Liverpool to consign salt beef to, as also anything you may have learned as to the value of it. A company in Sydney are, I believe, trying fairly the making of gelatine for soup; but the result of our experiments as to the market value of our produce in other countries is long of being proved; and waiting requires capital, a sort of thing that does not grow here now.

"I have felt the purchase of wheat and flour a heavy item up to this time, but we have twelve acres now coming up that I hope will turn out well. Last year I sowed some on an old paddock, but it was too late, the spring was wet, and it turned out all smut—so that the labour cost three times its market value; yet we have always had enough to eat on the station."

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

May 22.

DEAR SIR,—When I wrote to the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law-League, requesting that I might have a copy of the LEAGUE sent to my address, that by its circulation in this neighbourhood, where landlords' serfs (farmers) need enlightenment, I fully anticipated that I should be the means of doing good. My fullest anticipations have been realized. I regularly get the LEAGUE read and pondered over by a goodly number of the enfranchised, and the sound political education which is thus obtained every week is doing a vast amount of good. Several, who hated all Free-Trade principles, now anxiously long to peruse the LEAGUE, being soundly converted to the principle they so lately hated. I speak of the enfranchised, with whom lies our work. My efforts in this glorious cause have cost me much estrangement, &c., but is my motto. I can truly aver that, by the circulation of the LEAGUE among my villages, the people have been aroused to think,—the first and most essential element of action. A great many of my friends went to London since the Bazaar was opened, and for the first time in my life I heartily counselled them to go to a theatre. I also just whispered in their ears, "Remember that every article there is contributed by those who are helping to dig Monopoly's grave." O that I could but chant its requiem. Most gladly would I say, "Earth to earth," &c., over the monster's corpse. But I cannot tell what to do with one LEAGUE. It was one too much in the beginning, but now three or four or five would be greatly needed. I have influence in (because they are my bishoprick) sixteen or seventeen parishes, containing a large number of tenant-farmers, as well as small proprietors, and could now most beneficially circulate three or four or five LEAGUES, and among monopolists willing to read it. What better can you do with your funds than to meet my wishes? Had I means I would soon order them, but I have not. Some farmers, who have lately abandoned "protection" nonsense, are requesting me to get more LEAGUES among their class.

Indeed, one poor farmer, who read my copy, said, "Do, Sir, get more; I will willingly pay 10s. per annum for one." Send me, therefore, one more at least; but, could you go with me among my congregations, you would at once say, "Send the man half-a-dozen." I will forward the 10s. as before mentioned, when next I see my friend who offered it.

Go on, brethren. Ours is the cause of right—the cause of man.

With respect, your fellow-worker,
A HOME MISSIONARY, IN DEVON.

THE AMERICAN PRESS.

FREE TRADE.

(From the Washington Constitution.)

It is truly gratifying to perceive, that the anti-monopolists in England continue to press, with unabated spirit and energy, those doctrines of reason and justice whose principles must finally regulate the commercial intercourse of the world. Under the slow but mighty workings of public opinion, those bloated and unjust systems of monopoly, which have so long crushed the energies of the people, and their oppressive burdens, must finally give way. And the monarchy itself—the royal monopoly—will ultimately yield to the force of the principles, by the principles and truths, as well as the blessings and benefits, of republican institutions. The industrial system, which have enabled the few to control the many—by which the labour and property of the masses have been made to enrich and pamper those who oppress them—are tottering and gradually disappearing before the efforts of the long-enduring people, who have at last become aroused to a proper appreciation of their wrongs. Societies, associations, and leagues have, therefore, been formed in England and elsewhere, for the purpose of disseminating wholesome political truths, of enlightening the body of the people upon the subject of their just rights, and of arousing them to a proper sense of their wrongs, and of their power to redress them.

Such is the character of the Anti-Corn-Law League. Mr. Thompson, a prominent member of the League, occupies the same ground, and advocates the same principles, in England, as those sustained by the opponents of a protective tariff—or, in other words, the advocates of Free Trade—in the United States. It is impossible that the monopolists can long withstand the truths of this doctrine, either there or here. Selfish ingenuity is being driven to its last shifts, and, finally, it must yield. When the great statesmen of England are beginning to relax, surely we need have no fears of ultimate success here.

The repeal of the present high rate of duties, and the reduction of the tariff to the revenue standard, were great questions put in issue during the last presidential election. Mr. Polk was elected upon them—himself being one of their strongest and most consistent advocates, amongst all our distinguished statesmen. And it is true, as Mr. Thompson says, that a large proportion of those who voted for him, and placed him in the presidential chair, "were avowedly Free-Traders." Under these circumstances, the people of this country confidently expect to see such a modification of the present tariff, at the next session of Congress, as will relieve its oppressive effects and tend to give to the planter, the farmer, and agriculturist a more extended market for his valuable surplus products.

INDIAN CORN IN ENGLAND.

(From the Washington Constitution.)

The efforts of Dr. Bartlett, of the New York Albion, to induce the British Government to introduce Indian corn extensively into England, and to encourage the consumption of it by the English people, deserve to be noticed in the warmest terms of approbation. A letter upon the subject, addressed to Lord Ashburton, was published in a recent number of the Albion, in the course of which, the writer (probably Dr. Bartlett) earnestly urges upon the attention of British statesmen, the importance of admitting Indian corn from the United States into Great Britain, free of duty. Wheat now, he says, forms no part of the diet of the labouring classes; so that the free admission of maize would not considerably impair the consumption of English wheat flour. Nor can this corn be cultivated in England by reason of the coldness of the climate. Indian corn, more than any other grain in the world, can be made a luxury for the labouring classes, by being prepared in a great variety of ways; and it is said now to be relished by the great body of the labouring people of America beyond any other article of consumption. The writer urges the impossibility of the English farmer's labourer being able, with his 8s. a week, to feed his family with wheaten bread, even at its reduced rate of duty; and thence enforces the necessity of throwing corn into Great Britain, as a cheaper article of food than any now in use. Its cost to the English consumer, when imported from the United States and ground into meal, need not be over a dollar a bushel, allowing 25 cents. for retail profits; and it could always, he says, be on sale at 1d. sterling per pound. A single pound would furnish breakfast for a family of four persons; in addition to its greater cheapness, he says it is greatly superior, in its nutritive and healthful properties, to any other grain in use.

PROTECTION FALLACIES.

It has been a favourite argument with the friends of the protective duties, that England has grown great and prosperous by their aid, and that, if we mean to be great and prosperous, we must follow her example. Yet the people of England are not quite satisfied with the sort of prosperity to which it has given birth. Every arrival from that country, for years past, has brought accounts of the progress of that great effort which is making by her people to shake off the fetters of that system, although they have grown into the very flesh, and cannot now be removed without pain. We are glad to see that even the journals in this country friendly to the protective system, admit that in England it has been regarded as an experiment which has failed. The National Intelligencer says:—

"The time appears to have gone by when protection was the order of the day in England. We do not here use that word in its limited sense, as applied to a protective tariff in behalf of domestic manufactures only, but in its most comprehensive meaning, when it extended to almost every interest in the nation, and to almost every class of the people."

If we want a prohibitory tariff for anything, it is one which will exclude such follies of the old world as the protective system. We import enough of the frivolous novelties of Europe; let us not be guilty of gathering up and introducing among us her cast-off absurdities. If a system of regulations in regard to commerce has been tried there, and found to have the effect of impoverishing and oppressing the larger class of the people, let us avail ourselves of the experience thus gained, and beware of purchasing our wisdom at the same price. Let the tariff go with the Catholic disabilities, and the rotten boroughs, and other abuses which have been abolished in England—all excellent things in the opinion of some, and defended by able and ingenious champions, but which few would be hardy enough to propose transplanting into this country after they have been uprooted there.

The tendency of men's opinions everywhere is towards freedom of trade and liberty of occupation, as the best condition of things for the comfort of individuals and the prosperity of communities. For ourselves, we have only to keep to that state in which we began our career as a nation. What is an exploded barbarism in England, is a preposterous novelty here.—New York Evening Post.

PROTECTION.—One of the chief characteristics of the protective policy, is the taking and fascinating garb in which it is always dressed when presented to the public. If some great manufacturer is desirous of making more money from the capital invested in his business, and asks Congress to impose heavy burdens upon the masses for this object, he invariably disguises his real motives, and insinuates that such a policy will encourage American industry, and protect the farmer, the mechanic, and the labourer. The reason, then, which he urges for the adoption of the measure is not the real one; for, if that were frankly avowed, he has the sagacity to know that he might ask in vain for the imposition of duties upon foreign fabrics which come in competition with his own. The farmers, mechanics, and labourers are, by far, the most numerous in this country, and to keep them quiet under the exactions which high and protective duties impose upon them, charms them with the pretty idea of "protection to home industry."—Ulrica (N. Y.) Democrat.

FREE COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.—Whenever the markets of Europe, or any other part of the world, are opened without restriction to the products of our country, we cannot refuse foreign commerce on similar terms. Every observer must perceive that the facilities of trade and its consequent profit are at once enlarged by the peaceable and unrestricted interchange of commodities. The moment that the finances are built up by means of taxation upon industry, that moment a system of plunder is promoted, and the public welfare subsists by unnatural artifice. But when all nations shall in friendly intercourse open their ports to the commerce of each other, the blessings of a proper reward of labour will be the consequence, and the fictitious value which monopolists enforce must vanish before the more natural principles of demand and supply. Sir Robert Peel's budget displays the beginning of a new era in the affairs of the Government; and it is only necessary for him to place the Corn Laws upon the same footing with the repeal of the cotton duty, to ensure a serious modification of the revenue system not only of the United States, but of every enlightened nation.—Philadelphia Keystone.

AMERICAN INDUSTRY.—The south has been an extensive market for the manufactures of the north; but the fleecing process which a partial tariff enables manufacturers to practise on the consumers of their goods, will, in self defence, drive the south into manufacturing. The manufacturers will find in time that their policy will be turned upon them, by the great number of competitors who will take the field with them. We should not wonder to hear the manufacturers themselves asking for a repeal of the tariff, to save them from the disasters of an over-productive and glutted market. South Carolina and Tennessee will soon be in the field with their productions, and the whole south and west will soon tell the north that they want no more of their manufactures—that they cannot afford to devote their whole attention to agriculture, which pays only from 1 to 3 per cent. profits, and pay from 13 to 30 per cent. on the manufactures they consume—that they must manufacture their own goods, and have a home market of their own.—American paper.

PUNCH'S SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

(From Punch.)

The great event in the political sporting world has been the match between little Jack Russell and Bob Peel, the former known as the Whig Pet, and the latter as the Carlton Slasher. The subject of the contest was a race to decide the speed of the two men, in getting to Free Trade, which was fixed upon as the winning-post. Considerable interest had been excited by the announcement of the match, for, though the parties had often spurred together in the Parliamentary prize-ring, a race in the same direction between the two men was a bit of sport which none but the very knowing ones had ever dreamt of witnessing.

Before the match, betting was in favour of Jack Russell, who knew something of the ground, and had been over a part of it before, though he never had the courage to try his powers to any extent, so that it was really difficult to say how he would get along over it. Bob Peel, on the contrary, had invariably walked in quite an opposite direction, and the ground was so new to him that many wondered at his boldness in undertaking a match where every step must be quite out of the track he had all his life been accustomed to. What, however, he wanted in the way of habit, was more than compensated by his hardihood—or, as it is technically termed, "pluck;" and as Jack Russell had sometimes shown himself timid in going on when he had once started, his antagonist became rather the favourite. At a given signal the men went away, but the Carlton Slasher made one or two false starts, and it was for some time doubtful whether he was really in earnest, and intended to complete the match, or whether he had been merely trifling. At length, however, he slipped off, and though the Whig Pet was a little beforehand with him, the Carlton Slasher struck away at such an unexpected speed, that his own backers were more surprised than any one. Jack Russell now began to step out, and managed to get side by side with Peel for some little time; but the latter soon distanced the former, who was allowed by his own friends to have been fairly beaten in the Free-Trade foot-race by the Slasher.

REMARKS.—The race was on the whole a very good one, and Jack Russell might have had the best of it if he had gone fairly and honestly to work at once, instead of wavering, as he did in several instances. Bob Peel showed considerable game, and a good deal of tact, for he evaded consummate skill in getting to the right side at the right time, and turning so as to make the very best of his ground that was possible.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MR. AINSWORTH, M.P.—We experienced considerable gratification on finding Mr. Ainsworth's name in the list of the minority that voted for Mr. Hutt's motion for the admission of Australian grain on the same terms as Canadian, namely—1s. per quarter. We trust this is an indication of a conviction, on the part of Mr. Ainsworth, of the necessity of enlarging, to the greatest possible extent, the field from whence the teeming population of these islands is to derive its supply of the first necessary of life; and that he will henceforth be found a steady and unflinching advocate of the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.—Hull Free Press.

RETIREMENT OF LORD FRANCIS EGERTON.—Lord Francis Egerton has intimated that he does not again intend to offer himself as a candidate for South Lancashire, and that, probably, ere long, he will vacate his seat. This intimation is of first-rate importance to the Free-Traders of this division of the county, who have thus an opportunity afforded them of organizing an effective blow at the most iniquitous system that ever was devised. The Free-Traders must be up and doing. To be confident of success is a great and alarming evil. In the slightest degree, it tend to make men believe that arduous exertions are unnecessary. Come w. the consideration of every Free-Trader should be prepared to work as if success depended upon himself alone. As Free Trade is of no party, all party considerations should be at once given up. There is no question at present occu-ping the attention of the public, equal in magnitude and importance to that of Free Trade. It is the cause of the industrious classes of the universal world. When it is adopted by England all nations will follow her example, and every man will then be enabled to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. It will make war—that temporary suspension of all the principles of virtue—all but an impossibility; for it will bind all nations together by the ties of mutual interest. It is emphatically a Christian and an intellectual question; for its practical application is the necessary precursor to the moral, religious, and intellectual improvement of the masses of the population.—

Bilton Free Press.

DINNER TO MR. FALVEY.—Mr. Falvey was entertained, on Tuesday evening last, at the White Hart, Myddelton-street, Clerkenwell, by a number of zealous Free-Traders, who met to testify their respect for his character, and their appreciation of his talents as an advocate of Free Trade. About fifty sat down to dinner; M. J.
 Lewis, Esq., presiding.

PLYMOUTH FREE-TRADE ASSOCIATION.—On Tuesday evening last, a lecture was delivered to the members and friends of this association, in the hall of the Plymouth Mechanics' Institution, by C. B. Calmady, Esq., the president of the association, on the subject of Free Trade and Equitable Taxation. The attendance was not so numerous as on some former occasions, but it was highly respectable, and the discussion again gave evidence of the usefulness of the law which the society has adopted of not allowing the discussion of extraneous topics. The chair was taken by George Leach, Esq. Mr. Calmady's lecture was able and interesting, embracing much valuable information, historical and statistical, illustrative of the complexity and violation of sound economical principles involved in our present system of taxation. He proposed, in a second lecture, to develop a simpler and more equitable system; and concluded amidst loud expressions of approbation.

THE CORN LAWS.—CONTINENTAL LANDOWNERS BECOME DISTILLERS.—A correspondent sends us the following:—"Being engaged in the City, I was the other day inquiring of a German and Baltic merchant the price of German spirits (Dantzig, &c.), and in the course of conversation, said to him, 'How is it the landowners on the other side of the water, instead of growing wheat, have taken to distilling spirits, by which they can obtain but a very miserable profit?' He answered, 'If they did not distill spirits they would have no profit at all, or even a subsistence, from their land, as they can obtain no market for their wheat, and have, therefore, turned their old cattle into distilleries, taken up the wheat and planted potatoes and turnips (for distilling) in its place.' I would ask, Mr. Editor, is it not a melancholy thing to contemplate, that whilst thousands are crying for bread in this country, foreigners are obliged to displant wheat, and sow potatoes and turnips, for making the worst and commonest of spirits? We not only are prevented by the monopolists from receiving their wheat, but are actually the means of reducing the foreign producer of wheat to this miserable alternative of getting his living, injuring both ourselves and our neighbours. The only consolation is, 'it cannot last'; and, by the gigantic efforts of the LEAGUE, we may yet see the day when common sense and justice will ride over ignorance and prejudice."

RENT.—The burden of rent is becoming more and more felt, and, having possessed itself of "the agricultural mind," is now being presented to us under various phases.
 At a meeting of the Staffordshire Agricultural Protection Society, held last week at Stafford, Viscount Ingestre,
 M.P., in the chair, Mr. Fryer, who formerly represented Wolverhampton, spoke out about high rents. The noble chairman said he did not agree with Mr. Fryer, believing that if rent were entirely abolished that would not materially benefit the tenant. "Try it," exclaimed a farmer, and in an instant the room rung with cries of "hear, hear," and approving shouts. The astounded chairman rejoined, "Perhaps you would like the landlords to be entirely without money; if so, what are we to do?" The sturdy farmer had a ready answer,—"Same as we do, my lord; make shift." The storm of cheers and laughter that ensued put the noble rent-owner out of countenance.

GIVE THE FARMERS LEASES.—Unless farmers had leases, it could not be expected, nay, it would not be safe for them, to carry on experiments. He had visited East Lothian, which he had just heard Liebig, at the Glasgow dinner, pronounce the first agricultural district in the world. Well, there the farms were let on nineteen years' leases. On those farms were steam-engines, and every sort of machinery and implement. There the tenant-farmers originated the proposition to give £600 a year to Professor Johnson, to act as their agricultural chemist. He hoped it would not be taken amiss if he said that Scotland was fifty years in advance of England in agriculture. Why? Because the Scotch farmers had leases. (Hear, hear.) Two-thirds of the land in England was under strict entail or settlement. So it was in Scotland, but that was no barrier to improvement there.
 Hear, hear. The Duke of Richmond and himself, not to mention other proprietors, tenants for life, were engaged in improvements on a range of above 50 miles between the Murray Firth and the river Don, and were enabled to carry out these improvements in Scotland, because they could charge two-thirds of the expense on the next heir.
 That system encouraged tenants for life to lay out their money freely. (Hear, hear.) Scotland had enjoyed the act called the Montgomery Act, since 1769, and entailed estates were equally well cultivated, arranged by exchange, and leased with those in fee. (Hear, hear.) The English landlords of entailed estates and their farmers were fettered, but the Scotch were not. Hence the latter were able to do great things. He had heard, "Really you Scotch do things we English cannot." But why not? Give Englishmen the same advantages as the Scotch, the same powers of leasing, and exchanging, and charging, and then every farmer in England would be able to do as much or more than the East Lothian farmers. (Hear, hear.) When landlords talked of putting their shoulders to the wheel, it was natural for them to reply, "At least do you M.P. landlords put a little legislative grease to the axle, to make it work freely." (Hear, hear, and laughter.) He considered the cause of agriculture was not best protected by the circulation, or rather the accumulation, of pamphlets, "one-half of which was not believed; the other never read;" and that the money so laid out would be more beneficially employed in such prizes as were given that day, and useful experiments.

 Let their representatives in Parliament make good their cause against all comers, by getting sound and simple laws for drainage, leasing, exchanging, building farm-houses, steddings, dykes, walls, planting, roads, enclosing and schools, as Scotland had enjoyed for about 70 years; by which all the venom of entails had been extracted, and improvements encouraged in that happy country; while here, landlord and farmer were, as it were, bound in the legal fetters of the unmitigated mortmain of entail and settlement. Then it would be seen whether the English farmers were a whit behind their brethren of the north.—*Mr.
 Gordon's Speech at Tring.*—Polytechnic Review.

THE WHEAT CROP.—It is very fortunate that the winter and spring of the present year were so cold, for since the weather became somewhat milder, that most destructive insect, the wireworm, has begun to make great ravages amongst the wheat. It has never, within our recollection, been so mischievous in this county as this year.
 There are very few wheat-fields in which it has not done more or less damage, and in some the gaps which it has made are too large ever to be filled up. In one of the finest fields in the township of Barton, the wheat plant is nearly destroyed. From a letter of Mr. Charles Hildyard, in the Mark-lane Express, and from a private letter from Lincolnshire, we learn that this insect is doing great damage in those counties. This is not surprising, as their custom of growing wheat after clover, though good in other respects, renders them much more subject to the ravages of insects than the Lancashire farmers are, who always grow it either after a root crop or a bare fallow.—
Liverpool Times.

LAND IS UP.—Notwithstanding the enormous sums of money invested in railways, and the immense capital embarked in trade, and in spite of the everlasting cry of agricultural distress, land still rises in value. A short time ago several small farms were sold by auction at Chapel-en-le-Frith, for sums far exceeding even the most sanguine expectations of the owners, or the romantic calculations of the auctioneer. One or two instances in illustration of these remarks are here given, viz., a farm of enclosed land, situate about midway between Chapel-en-le-Frith and Buxton, lying on the side of one of the highest heath-crowned hills in the hundred of High Peak, was sold for nearly £10 an acre, including cost of conveyance, &c., which, at the present rental, will pay about 24 per cent. At Hayfield, in the same neighbourhood, a chief rent was sold at about sixty years' purchase, and a plot of land for farming purposes, which, when conveyed, will cost £168 per acre. Now, as this land is let at its full value, and can only be used for farming purposes, the extravagant prices realized can only be accounted for upon the supposition that real property is, in the eyes of many, considered the only safe investment for capital. Suppose, then, for the sake of argument, that that principle is conceded, how does it happen that, while land maintains its full value, the poor man's labour employed thereon is gradually sinking? It is well known that labourers in the agricultural districts are working for 7s. or 8s. a week, while the labourers in the manufacturing towns are receiving various sums of from 2s. to 3s.
 a day. The obvious reason for this strange anomaly is, that while the rural population is rapidly increasing, the land upon which the people seek to be employed, having no elasticity, remains the same, and hence the low rate of wages paid by farmers for labour. Let there be free imports and exports, and then all the surplus population will be drawn from the agricultural to the manufacturing districts, where they will find constant employment at re-munerating wages. The agricultural labourers, being thus reduced in number, will command better wages. The question has been recently put, "Why is it that the produce of the English soil sells for so much higher a price than the same commodities command in other countries?"
 It is neither more nor less than because the countries of continental Europe are nearly all purely agricultural, not having the great manufacturing communities that England has to consume and pay for the agricultural produce.
 It is clearly, then, the interest of both farmers and farm-labourers to assist the Free-Traders in their efforts to place agriculture and manufactures on a more solid and sure foundation.—A Correspondent of the Macclesfield Chronicle.

PROGRESS OF MANUFACTURES IN AMERICA.—The manufacturing interest of the United States, at the present time, is extending itself faster than at any period since we have begun to manufacture for ourselves. From Maine to the extreme west and south-west, every spindle and loom is at work,—many of the mills with orders for their works for months ahead. Water is no longer the sole motive power of factories, and in the most favoured localities, at the east, for manufactures, this power has long been exhausted, and the never-failing power of steam has been resorted to. In Newburyport and Boston, factories of this class are now in course of erection, and even Lowell has now more factories building which are to be propelled by steam than by water. The growth of Lowell has been the most rapid and, at the same time, the most sound of any city of New England. In 25 years, it has risen from a spot of ground almost useless, to be the second city in New England; and at no time has there been more new mills building, or the old ones more active, than at present; four new mills of the largest size are to be erected this summer, and large additions made to the old ones,—in all not less than 2,000 looms. The new "city of looms on the Merrimack," at Haverhill, will soon begin to show signs of life. Already active preparations are making to commence their dam, which, when completed, will furnish a water-power that will not be exhausted in half a century of prosperous manufacturing.
 In New Hampshire and Maine there is the same tendency to invest capital in manufacturing; cotton mills are the favoured stocks, but other articles are not forgotten or neglected. In Maine, charters have been granted for thirteen cotton and woollen mills, and two iron factories;
 the old companies have also added largely to their capital stocks, and at no time has Maine been so decidedly in favour of manufacturing as at present. At Buffalo, in this state, there has been a large mill started, with every prospect of success. At St. Louis, and numerous other points in the west, in Mississippi and Georgia, notices of new mills often are seen. At Baltimore and Georgetown several flour mills have been altered to cotton mills; and all through the country there is seen a general wish to make investments in this way.—New York Express.

"DEAD MEN TELL NO TALES."—It is for this reason, we suppose, that the Agricultural Protection Societies are now so mute. The Salisbury Herald, a Conservative paper, gives the following laconic report of a recent meeting of monopolists:—"The annual meeting of the South Wilts Agricultural Protection Society was held on Thursday last, at the Red Lion Hotel." This meeting, we have no doubt, bore a striking resemblance to one that was recently advertised and held in this district, a few months ago. A reporter from our office attended at the appointed hour, and, after waiting some time, was joined by an honest old farmer. A few words were exchanged, and not a few minutes wasted, until the "gentleman of the press" grew tired. He therefore sauntered out—made a circuit of the town—returned to the inn—and found the old farmer reinforced by the secretary. "Oh," said the farmer, "this is the gentleman I told you of, as was here afore!"—Gateshead Observer.

PROGRESS OF THE FREE-TRADE CAUSE.—The Sunderland Times, a Conservative journal, surprised us lately, in a leading article, with the following observations:—"The honourable member for Gateshead, who, with a highly praiseworthy perseverance, has repeatedly brought before the House of Commons the claims of our colonies, generally, to be placed on an equal footing with Canada, in respect to the importation of corn into this country, has at length, we perceive, given notice that he will move for a committee of the whole House, to take into consideration 'the expediency of assimilating the duty imposed on wheat and flour, the produce of the colonies of Australia and South Africa, and of British India, to that levied on the similar productions of the Canadian colonies.'
 This proposition of the hon. member has our cordial approval. We hold it is highly proper to admit the corn of Canada at the duties fixed by the Canada Corn Bill; and, entertaining that opinion, we cannot perceive how the produce of other colonies can be made an exception. Nay, more: there is great force in the argument that the corn of these other colonies should be admitted on easier terms.
 Imagine the immensely greater distance than Canada of our Australian and African colonies, and the corresponding greater expense of transit, and we can hardly avoid the conclusion that if the corn of Canada be admitted at 1s. duty per qr., the corn of these more distant branches of our empire should be admitted duty free. * * * We hope that the motion of Mr. Hutt will meet the acquiescence of Government." We will not inquire how far these views are consistent with the former professions of our contemporaries. We are only too glad to accept them as an evidence of the progress of the Free-Trade cause.—
Gateshead Observer.

PENNY POSTAGE.—The finance accounts just published show a large increase in the revenue of the Postoffice. The gross revenue for the year 1844 was £1,705,067, giving an increase of more than £81,000 as compared with 1843; the net revenue was £719,957, giving an increase of nearly £80,000 as compared with 1843. The apparent increase in 1844, taking the Postoffice returns for 1843 as the standard of comparison, is, in each case, more than double the amount here given;
 but, as we stated at the time, those returns gave the revenue both gross and net too low by about £85,000. The actual increase of net revenue in 1844 is greater than for any year since the war, except 1825, when it was £92,900, and 1836, when it was £81,000. From 1840 (the first year of penny postage) to 1844, the increase of net revenue is nearly 50 per cent.

"PLEASE THE PIGS."—A thousand years hence antiquarians will derive the vulgar saying, "Please the pigs," from the Corn Laws. In Australia and the United States pigs are fattened on corn, because men are not allowed to eat it in England. The bread which a poor wretch wants in this favoured country, a pig is devouring in the grain in Van Dieman's Land. If the Corn Laws, then, are preserved for no other end, it cannot be denied that they serve to please the pigs of Australia and America. In the Free Trade Bazaar, an Australian pig, well fattened on wheat, should be exhibited in juxtaposition with a Dorset-shire labourer, in exemplification of the blessed working of the protective system, which gives the beast what it refuses the man. Certainly our lawmakers have a secret sympathy with the pigs.—Examiner.

LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—Notwithstanding the reduction altogether of 25 per cent. in the passenger fares, and as much in their goods charges, the last week's traffic is £2800 over the corresponding week of last year. This is pretty forcible evidence of the results of low fares and quick trains, combined with a skilful adaptation of them to the public wants. We have given it in one week, but if carried over the year it will exceed £110,000 per annum.—Herapath's Railway Magazine.

IRISH RAILWAYS.—We have received a well executed map, published by the Irish Railway Gazette, "showing all the lines of railway, completed or in progress, especially laid down by their respective engineers." To those who are interested in any of the numerous railway speculations on foot in the sister country, this map will afford, at a single glance, a definite idea of the extent and peculiar situation of the several lines.

SAWKYNS' STRIKE.—Several of the master sawyers at Glasgow and neighbourhood have agreed to the increase wages asked by their workmen, and a number of the men have again resumed their wonted employment.

ADVANCE OF WAGES.—At a time when silk manufacturers are reducing wages, it gives us peculiar satisfaction to have to notice an increase which has just been voluntarily made to the cotton spinners of Leigh. The manufacturers have announced that they will give an additional five per cent. to their spinners.—Manchester Guardian.

MURDER BY TYRANNY.—The men employed at the different iron works have, at length, been paid according to 10 per cent. advance in their wages. Trifling as this is, we regret to state that it is more than many are able to manage. The scenes of drunkenness in our streets are truly disgusting, notwithstanding the fines inflicted by the magistrates and by the ironmasters, especially on Saturday and Sunday nights. A farmer, from the adjoining parish, fell from the stairs of a public-house whilst in a state of inebriation, it is said, last week, and died in a few hours, leaving a wife and several children. The weather continues very cold, yet the improvement perceptible in vegetation is manifest all around us. Downais is already a town of itself, and is likely to increase again. One new blast furnace and a rolling-mill are to be erected there forthwith. Hay and meal, owing to their scarcity, continue to be sold at very high prices.—Correspondent, Liverpool Mercury.

CLOSE OF THE BAZAAR.

The Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League beg to announce that the Bazaar will close on Tuesday, the 27th instant, up to which time the price of admission will continue to be ONE SHILLING, and the Theatre will remain open UNTIL TEN O'CLOCK EVERY EVENING. The stalls will be replenished with many costly and elaborate specimens of art and workmanship which have not hitherto been exhibited on account of the want of space. THE MODEL ROOM is now complete, and in addition to an almost endless variety of improved AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS and machines, exhibiting the latest discoveries in arts and manufactures, there are working models of a POWER LOOM, from Bradford, a BLOND LACE MACHINE, from Nottingham, a machine for weaving cotton velvet, a machine for making patent cards, a stocking-frame from Nottingham, &c. There is also a POTTER'S WHEEL, with operatives at work, from the Potteries, and bobbin lace workers, from Honiton, &c.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXXI.

TO VISCOUNT INGESTRE, M.P., &amp;c.

MY LORD,—The renowned knight of the buck-basket exulted in being not only witty himself, but the cause of wit in other men. Your lordship and the Duke of Richmond, rolled into one, would constitute the Sir John Falstaff of Agricultural Protection. He makes maxims, and you cause the farmers to make them. To his Grace we owe the memorable saying, "We do not grow glass, and we do grow timber;" while your lordship's pathetic inquiry of what the landlords are to do without their tenants' money, elicited the pithy answer from a farmer at the late Staffordshire meeting, "Same as we do, my lord,—make shift."

Take this reply to heart, my lord. The farmers are not the only people from whom you are liable to hear it. You belong to a triumphant party. You helped to win the battle of monopoly at the last general election. The country is governed by a Ministry of that party's making. You and they are dragged through the dirt by the creature of your own hands and voices. The Tariff and the Canada Corn Bill had the support of your votes. You are an unit in the majority of a Premier who, according to your own description, "always maintains the strictest silence respecting measures which he has in contemplation; and it was not until the last moment that his supporters were made acquainted with Ministerial propositions." And why should he tell you beforehand? It would only subject you to so much the more debasement. You must vote all the same. A consistent thorough-going Monopolist Ministry is beyond your reach. The time is past for its possibility. The country cannot be so governed. Sir Robert Peel is your necessity. When his measures are ripe, you must eat the leek; but why nibble it before the cudgel is over your heads? No wonder you were so embarrassed at the meeting as to decline to "enter further into your reasons for giving those votes." Doubtless you have often looked wistfully at your brother protectionists in the House of Commons, to see if they had any spare arguments or apologies. Your lordship is alert at catching the windfall of a rotten argument, even in a Peeblesshire orchard. But your compeers have nothing for you. "The hungry sheep looks up, and is not fed." Were your pitiful appeal made to the Cabinet, "Perhaps you would wish the landlords to be entirely without" reasons; "if so, what are we to do?" The farmer's answer would be all you got: "Same as we do, my lord,—make shift."

Why can you not look a little further into the real difficulty of a monopolist policy? A repeal of the Tariff and of the Canada Corn Bill you very justly treat as an impossibility. What makes it an impossibility? No difficulty of obtaining a Ministerial majority, were Sir Robert Peel to propose such repeal to-morrow. Your class would be only too glad to walk at his heels in the division. Nor would their seats be endangered with the constituents who returned them at the last election. The ground of the impossibility is deeper than this. A politician dares not do many things in which he would be sure of the support of a majority. He cannot disregard public opinion, and ascertained public interests. These are the motive power to your monopoly-created Minister. These make him boastful, even before your faces, of what he has already done for Free Trade. These will make him go further in the same direction; and they will make you make shift. There is no help for it. He may keep his own secret, as to particular measures, but you may see their certain character and tendency, only by opening your eyes. And you cannot make another Ministry. Any man with the least pretensions to statesmanship will serve you the same. He must, my lord. You are doomed to eat your words. Joining protection societies will not avail you. The future, on which you draw, will not accept. Sir Robert Peel has not been, as you say, "deceived in the results of the Canada Bill;" nor you either; nor anybody else. But you deceive yourself if you dream of stopping there. You must go on, and "make shift."

And why should you not, my lord? As protection laws have not prevented the fall of wheat to 45s. the quarter, why should they prevent the recurrence of rents to what they were when wheat was 45s. the quarter before? The farmers begin to tell you that you must "try it." They have right and reason on their side. Your only stated objection is that the reduction would not be large enough to help them. They are not satisfied with that logic. It was urged that they could not go on as they are for three years longer; that they pay rent out of their capital; that the present race of tenants must become extinct. Perhaps some landlords will think it may be replaced by another; to be deluded, fleeced, and ruined, in like manner. This game must be nearly up, whatever becomes of rents.

There is a bill before the House of Commons for facilitating the enclosure of all the waste lands in the country. Fifteen millions of acres of arable land to be added to that already in cultivation, and the produce of which, we are told, cannot be sold at a remunerating price. The landlords who support this measure are subjecting the tenantry to a more formidable competition than that of the foreigners. You bring the competition home to their barn-doors. The produce of every new-tilled acre competes in the market with that of the old acres cultivated by the existing tenantry. You are preparing for the cultivation of new land at the moment when you whine over the prospect of old land going out of cultivation. What transparent hypocrisy! Thus it is that you protect your tenants from rivalry. The wheat of this new soil will pay no duty. It will be subject to no peculiar cost of transport. It will pay rent; and that seems the chief thing about which some landlords care.

Do you read, my lord, of the Scotch clearings now in progress? The unhousing of the peasantry in Glen Calvie, and other localities, to perish on the hill-side, and make room for larger sheepwalks, without any poor upon them? You will be made to hear of them, my lord; for the Times has its correspondent there. This is a landlords' war upon an honest and self-supporting peasantry. A war of which rent is to be the prize. The cruelty of these clearings will not pass so quietly now as in former times. They will be regarded in their true light—as a war of extermination against the peasantry. There are, indeed, other countries for them; they may fly, if they can, to the colonies. And what awaits them there? Monopoly is at war with our own colonies. The petition adopted by the Staffordshire meetings treats the colonists as foreigners. So did the majority of the House of Commons when it rejected Mr. Hutt's motion. Competition with the colonies is identified with competition with the foreigner. You drive them out for the sake of rent; and then, for the sake of rent, you pursue them with restrictions to Australia. Here, they are cleared off that the soil may be rendered more profitable; there, their expatriated industry renders the soil more profitable, and you tax its produce in addition to the heavy natural tax of transit. Yet these people are the labourers whom you so profess to love; and those colonies, however distant, are part and parcel of the empire. Their agriculture is British agriculture. And you wage war on it and them. The protection you support, my lord, is manifestly neither that of agriculture nor of the cultivators.

Ever since the peace there has been a succession of attempts, by the landlord class, artificially to keep up prices to the war standard. The attempts have only so far succeeded as to keep up rents, while prices have been subjected to ruinous fluctuation. The promise of every Corn Law has been falsified. Each has held good for the tenant's bargain with the steward, and has held good for nothing else. You cannot wonder that the system is coming into universal odium. Some farmers still cry for "a little more duty," forgetting that much more duty was equally a deception. Others see that a little less rent would be a much surer relief than a little more duty. You were wiser to try that course than persist in the perversion of legislative power to the supposed interests of a class. I say supposed interests; for it is only the nominal landlord, whose estates are mortgaged, that would really find himself the worse for Free Trade. Landed property must rise in value with the progress of national prosperity. The bona fide proprietor of land would be benefited. As for the rent, your friend the farmer tells them what it is their duty to do—"Same as we do, my lord,—make shift."

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

THE CANADA CORN BILL.—A letter from Upper Canada, dated about the end of March says:—"The decline of price in flour makes us very anxious here, and, though we shall send over some thousand barrels, nothing but a change in the market will make it other than a tight match to make both ends meet. The present English price of flour is evidently running the Canadian exporters hard."

A FOX HUNT IN DORSETSHIRE.

On visiting the Bazaar the other day, and having my attention drawn to the beds for the Dorsetshire labourers which are there, I called to mind some of the scenes I had witnessed in Dorsetshire; some which I had written but not published. The following account of a fox hunt, at which I was present, is, as nearly as can be written, literally what I saw. The introductory dialogue supposed to occur on the previous night, is also a sketch from fact.

"Bill?" "Well, Jack, what be it?" "The hounds be coming to draw Gorse-hill cover to-morrow." "Be they? Sha'n't I be after them?" "And sha'n't I." "Bill?" "Well, Jack, what be it?" "Give up one of them tatoes thee be's a doing on in the ashes." "Na; they ben't for to-night, they be a doing on for breakfast. We ha'n't no bread, and father be to go out at five. He be gone to bed now; and I be doing his tatoes for him. Mother be laid down as well, and all of them. Why ben't thou, Jack?"

"Why ben't I a-bed? I been with old Tom and young Harry a stopping the holes. Them foxes be all out at night, seeing what they can get. We have stopped their holes for them; and won't they find it queer when they go home and cannot get in, and have the puck come on them in the cover. I do so wish, Bill, to-morrow morning was come."

"I wishes, Jack, this precious cold night were over. We be a-starved up in that topmost room, with no things almost on us. There be such a lot on us in our house, we haven't got no money to get bread enough, let alone things to cover. See how us be obliged to stick them tatoes into our insides. It be a terrible cold night. I be afeard to go to bed for the cold."

"What I be most afeard on as to cold, Bill, be's this; that it be frosty, and squire won't hunt. I wouldn't lose it for ever so much. Would thee, Bill?"

"Na, Jack, I shouldn't like to. Wilt thou go to cover first thing? or wilt thou go to work and chance the hounds coming down where thou be's a-doing that job on the road. I shan't go to work myself. I would rather lose half a day than not have the sport. Half a day's pay ben't much to win, and it ben't much to lose. What says thee, Jack?"

"I say this. I wouldn't think on it. Five shilling a week, for half a day be only sippence. And then the chance of a something to pick up. Morris got half-a-crown to open a gate the last time squire hunted over here; and when young Lord What-do-ye-call-him fell off his horse that time, Courtney and Mason and Jones and What's-his-name got two sovereigns for carrying him on a litter, and had such a blow out of drink and victuals on the head on't as thes never seed. Besides, there be the digging out of the fox, if he run to earth, and twenty more chances to get a trifle. But for my part I would go after the hounds for the sport. Split me if I wouldn't."

"So would I, Jack. And so would any one."

Such may never have been the precise words of any two men in Dorset. But these words are indicative of what may be seen or heard in every village of Dorset where hunting is known. And few counties are more remarkable than this for the spirit of the inhabitants, rich and poor, in running after a piece of diversion.

There are more people by half than get profitable employment in the county. So sporting is not much loss of time to them. It is sometimes a loss of shoes in the mud; but the shoes are always found again. Sometimes a loss of skin and clothes in scrambling and tearing through bushes; but skin grows on again, and clothes are tacked together somehow. The greatest advantage it does is, that while the mounted men who dined late last night ride to-day to find their appetites, the men on foot who did not dine at all are running to lose theirs, and for a while forget them.

Let us suppose the morning come. The meet is at some gate—I need not say what gate. From east, from west, from every side, horses and men, scarlet coats and green, jog along at a trot. What jolly, happy-looking fellows they are, every one of them. Who could believe for a moment that, mounted on such nags, with such bright stirrups and shining boots; white leathers and well-fleshed limbs to swell them out; such broad chests and ruddy faces, the faces wearing a hue which may indicate either last night's wine or this morning's early rising and fresh air, just as you think fit to imagine—for there is a mixture of both; who could think that any of these are "farmers in distress"? But farmers they are, many of them.

This gentleman nearest us, on the bay mare, is not a farmer—not strictly speaking. He has land, and he farms it, and he also complains at public meetings of agricultural distress and hard times; so he is doubtless an agriculturist. But he is also a clergyman. And that is the reason why young Sparks, the whipper-in, swears so. Sparks was once a lad in a smock-frock and round hat, and leggings just the same as those lads sitting on the stile; but he was taken notice of and put into the stable, and in time mounted into office, and got up to where he is now. The fineness of his clothes and polish of his boots astonish those who recollect his old leggings and smock-frock. But his great card is to swear at the dogs, and at anything else so close to the parson, as to make them wonder that he is not afeard.

Here comes a farmer. One precisely after Squire Bankes's heart, the squire having declared a landlord's pride to be, "when he knows that his tenant is the best mounted in the troop of yeomanry, and that he now and then takes a good gallop with the squire's hounds."

Who better mounted than this tenant? Who oftener galloping? He even subscribes to another pack of hounds that hunts in another district. Yet this gentleman is one of Squire Bankes's own tenants, and he is not able to tell what the squire says—continuing the sentence already quoted as the greatest joy of a landlord—namely, "Proud, above all, if the farmers shall tell him, 'there is not on my farm nor in my parish one single able-bodied man out of employ.'"

This well-mounted tenant may, I say, do the squire's heart good as far as horse flesh, horsemanship, and a good spurred, hooted, and scarlet-coated turn out can go. I believe he has never been in arrear with his rent; that must be another matter of satisfaction. But in his parish there are rather more than the half of the able-bodied labourers out of work and out of wages. And the wages of those in work—in work to this farmer—are 5s. a week to able-bodied men—young men, so able-bodied that they are five feet eight inches high, can carry a sack of wheat with any man in Dorset, and eat bread and bacon with any man in England, if they could get it to eat. The wages of those in work who are married and have families are more. They are as high as 6s. and 7s., in two instances as high as 8s., and in one as high as 9s.

Are any of the children of these highest paid men here—here at the gate—at the meeting of the hunt? No; this is not in their locality. Here are young ones enough, and old ones too, but not from Mr. Bankes's.

Here are two officers of the army, and three lords, two of them members of Parliament, but neither belonging to this county. All are well mounted. The master of the hounds, the squire himself, meets them.

Who would not be a farmer, even in hard times? One of the lords has nodded to one of these farmers, and the squire himself has introduced them. Is that nothing?

Here comes old Bob the shoemaker. The Gorse-hill covert has not been drawn once these twenty years but old Bob has been at it, he and all his apprentices for the time being. He had work to do to-day, shoes to make which were wanted; but who would work and the hounds out? Who, indeed, but some thresher or ploughman that must.

And though old Bob is only on foot, he is somebody here. A farmer nods to him, just as a lord nodded to a farmer.

And here is a sporting draper mounted on the butcher's horse. And here is the butcher himself on the young horse that he thinks of buying. Here is the landlord of the inn where the magistrates hold their sittings. He is a high man, and mounted, of course. He is so high a man, permitted as he is to take the field with lords, and with squires richer even than the lords, that he looks upon all those foot people with the most thorough contempt. But on none more so than on that man who is a beer-shop keeper. "The impudence of some persons! that a mere beer-shop keeper should pretend to take an interest in fox-hunting! and, though on foot, to make his appearance within the same paddings with the landlord of the head inn!"

Here is a jolly good fellow on a jolly good horse. And one of these bystanders says that he hasn't come away without his breakfast this morning. Another adds, "No, nor without knowing that everybody else had a good breakfast. He be a trump to his men, he be."

Another parson comes up and joins the one already arrived. Young Styles and Norman have been so fascinated with the manly courage of young Sparks, the whipper-in, who swore in the parson's face, that they swear also. They cannot help feeling themselves to be more than mere eaters of dry bread and cold taters warmed on the gridiron, already. They call one another B.'s and D.'s, close to the clergymen's horses' tails; and do not doubt but such courage may elevate them into the stable some day, if not into a whip's saddle.

Here is little Josh Something, with his little smock-frock all in tatters, and his toes, cold day as it is, bare and red, through the old shoes he has on. He had no time to eat his taters, hearing of the hounds, so he brought them with him, and is eating one in each hand now; he calls one bread and one cheese. He is an original in his way, that little Josh.

But the time is up, and the principal men have come. It is considered the best field of the season. There have been more numerous fields quite as well mounted; but there has been no such brilliant company as this. The officers, the three lords, two of them county members, one or two baronets, and not less than half-a-dozen landed squires. The farmers, butchers, drapers, and innkeepers, who hunt in such company, are up in the stirrup indeed, and they feel it.

"Get out, you young rascal; why don't you at home, and not come here to be rode down; get out with you!" This is from the butcher to little Josh and his cold taters. It is accompanied by a cut of a whip sharp enough to have made Josh cry on ordinary occasions. But he only dives into a bush and says, "There ben't no squire; thee be nought but a butcher!"

There is an old fox in the covert who has known what a hunt is before to-day. He is alleging to an inexperienced companion, that there is no danger; that, though the holes were closed up when they came home from the pleasant preserves or the hen-roosts, or wherever they were

this morning, there is no danger. Now, they hear dogs and men, and the young one cannot believe but there is danger. The old one still denies its existence, if the young one will only take his advice. The young one knows not what to do. But the hounds come nearer, and he is surer than ever that there is danger. The old one admits now that there will be, if the young one does not get up and run. But if he runs at once he will be safe; he, the old one, will keep between him and the hounds, if hounds there be. The young fox starts up and runs accordingly; the hounds see him; they seek no farther for another. They open their mouths; lay down their heads; join in the cry and the pursuit; and as the old fox hears them leaving the wood, and going off at a greater and greater distance, he says, or thinks the saying, which is all the same, "I wish you no harm, young friend; but that was good policy of mine. Better you before the hounds than me."

There is no time here to moralize, and compare, and make suppositions. Yet it may be that this old fox, at some feast in the covert, had called himself the "foxes' friend," ever ready to protect the young ones, and ever regardless of himself.

But we are in haste. The young fox has discovered, as other creatures have to their cost, that the protection of his "friend" was simply to turn him out into the front of the danger; and, now that he is in it, he tries to leave it as far behind as he can.

First of all, he tries to find how the wind blows, that he may run with it. But he has no time to make experiments. Unluckily he is out on the wrong side. He is off at a great dash; but he knows his course to be wrong. So does old Bob the shoemaker. He can tell already that this is a young fox; and he can tell that, before long, he will turn; he will wind by the upper heath, and come down upon the Stour by the common. And old Bob breaks away in a different direction from that taken by the fox and hounds and hunters, assured that he will meet them again. Save a few of the very rawest of the mob—the young foxes of it, who run the wrong way, because it is the way the hunters went—the whole follow Bob, who has had twenty years' experience.

And now for the chasing and racing. The racing first. The swiftest soon take the lead from even the most experienced in short cuts. Mr. Hurst's meadow-gate is opened in almost no time. If Mr. Hurst were there he would give it to some of them, to run through among his sheep and cows, yelling that way, and then over the fence through his young tares and wheat. But he is not there; he is with the hounds, and riding by this time through somebody else's fields. It would have been much worse for his sheep and cows in the meadow, and young tares and young wheat, if all the pack and fifty horsemen had gone over his fences and lands. But then it is an honour to have one's fences broken and one's farm trampled by the hunters, saving always such men as the sporting draper, butcher, innkeeper, and two or three more who have no land of their own to be trampled by others.

Then ensues the running to earth in a drain, the digging out, the new chase, now fields of wheat scoured over, ewe sheep great in lamb driven about in terror, and all the "farmers in distress" hallooing and rejoicing with voices loud and joyous as they, in the company of the lords and squires, break down each other's fences, cut up each other's newly-sprung wheat, and scare and drive in terror each other's breeding ewes and cows and fattening sheep.

OLD AUTHORS ON FREE TRADE.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—In the grand Bazaar, Covent-garden, the other day, a friend took from his pocket a piece of written paper, and said he would add it to his contributions to the Bazaar, or to the columns of the LEAGUE paper, if he could see the Editor. I undertook to send it or give it to you. The first portion is said to be an extract from Franklin.

I am, &c.,

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.—"Suppose a country, X, with three manufactures, as cloth, silk, and iron, supplying three other countries, A, B, C, but is desirous of increasing the vent and raising the price of cloth in favour of her own clothiers. In order to this she forbids the importation of foreign cloth from A; A, in return, forbids silks from X. Then the silk-workers complain of a decay of trade. A and X, to content them, forbid silks from B; B, in return, forbids iron ware from X. Then the iron-workers complain of decay; and X forbids the importation of iron from C. C, in return, forbids cloth from X. What is got by all these prohibitions? Answer:—All four find their common stock of the enjoyments and conveniences of life diminished."

Extract from a book upon political economy, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, supposed to be by Mr. Stafford:—"Surely common reason would that one region should help another when it lacketh; and, therefore, God hath ordained that no country should have all commodities, but that which one lacks, another brings forth; and that that one country lacketh this year, another hath plenty thereof commonly the same year, to the intent men may know that they have need of one another's help, and thereby love and society to grow among all men the more. But here we would do as though we had need of no other country on earth, but to live all of ourselves, and as though we might make the market of all things as we list ourselves. For though God is bountiful to us, and sends us many great commodities, yet we could not live without the commodities of others."

REVIEW.

The North British Review, No. V. May, 1845.
Kennedy, Edinburgh.

Amongst various articles of interest, the recent number of the "North British Review" contains one of paramount importance: it is on "The Improvement of Land as an Investment for Capital." The accumulated capital of this nation is great beyond all precedent. The public securities give an interest of only three per cent., and so large a portion of our permanent debt is absorbed by investments of trust funds, which must necessarily remain so invested as being alone recognised by our courts of equity, that there is no prospect of Government securities becoming more tempting to capitalists; nor is it desirable that they should, for the worst administrator of a nation's wealth is its government.

The field for the employment of capital which mercantile and manufacturing pursuits offer is, at present, extremely and unnaturally narrowed by our restrictive system, of which the Corn Laws form the base; but its value is fully understood by our capitalists, and whenever British commercial industry shall have emancipated itself from the ignorant legislation of feudal selfishness, its most gigantic efforts will be well seconded by British capitalists. How different is the state of the landed interests of this country! Labourers in husbandry are thought to be so superabundant that to many benevolent persons emigration to the colonies appears to be their sole resource; and, moreover, some of our best labourers are turning their thoughts anxiously in the same direction. The farmers, the agricultural capitalists—though to apply that term to many of them sounds almost like mockery—are, on all hands, admitted to be in a state of distress, and too many of them see nothing before them but absolute ruin. Then, the landlords are by no means in an easy position. With habits of expenditure which rather exceed than fall within the limits of their available incomes, they find, after a thirty years' struggle to keep up their rents by a tax on the community, that their whole scheme has been founded on false principles, and that under the existing system an enormous fall of rent seems inevitable. The outcries and forebodings of land going out of cultivation, of the annihilation of rents, and of the universal ruin of farmers, which as we hear at "protection meetings" will come to pass if prices of agricultural produce be not kept up by legislative protection, all bespeak a sad want of knowledge on the part of those most directly interested in land. Commerce and manufactures may and do offer great prizes to capitalists, but they are surrounded by great risks; whereas we have no hesitation in saying that the greater part of the land of this country affords a field for the investment of capital, both by the landlord and the tenant, which, with ordinary skill and prudence, is not only free from risk, but will be absolutely certain of an ample return. It is the purpose of the able article we have referred to, and from which we propose to make some full extracts, to demonstrate the proposition that the land of this country, now by courtesy called cultivated, is capable of returning ample profit for great outlays of capital by proprietors and occupiers.

One of the chief obstacles to the larger investment of capital upon the land consists in the ignorance of its owners and the majority of their agents. The writer says:—

"Passing by, for the present, the wide field which the colonies present for the application of labour and capital to land, we shall in this article endeavour to convince the moneyed interest how safe and profitable an investment is afforded to them in the improvement of the soil of the United Kingdom."

"This is the more necessary, because impressions of a contrary kind have been made on their minds by the cry of agricultural distress, which has been so frequently and so loudly heard during the last thirty years; and by the ignorance of the majority of landowners, and of those intrusted with the management of landed property, as to the intrinsic value of land. These are the parties on whom moneyed men usually rely, when seeking a landed investment, for the profits of successful commercial industry; considering themselves safe under the guidance of what they call practical men. Those, however, who bear this title are, almost invariably, opposed to innovations on their established practice; and to consult one of these inveterate adherents to routine, on the merits of the new system of draining, or any other improvement in agriculture, is like asking the opinion of a mail-coachman or guard on the advantages of railway travelling."

There is, comparatively, little unenclosed waste land in England, "but there is a vast quantity in a state of half cultivation, requiring a large amount of capital to call forth its productive powers;" and, after some statistical statements showing the actual condition of land in Great Britain, it is estimated that the additional tenants' capital on 34,000,000 acres of cultivated land required is, at least, £5 per acre, or £170,000,000, and that 20,000,000 acres require to be drained by the landlords, which, at £6 per acre, would amount to £120,000,000. It seems, also, that there are 9,000,000 acres of reclaimable waste land, which will require £20 per acre to bring into cultivation, or £180,000,000.

Here, then, on what every one acquainted with the agriculture of this country must admit to be a very moderate estimate, no less than £470,000,000 may be profitably invested in the improvement of the soil of Great Britain. To this must be added an enormous sum for Ireland.

The writer then goes into the question of the profit of such an investment, and in so doing, glances at that phantom of the agricultural mind, a "remunerating price":—

"The next question, therefore, is, whether capital can be profitably employed in the improvement of the soil of Great Britain; or whether there are peculiar circumstances affecting this country, which prevent agriculture from being a remunerating occupation, except at prices only to be maintained by artificial means, which the spirit of the times, and the demands of the non-agricultural classes, now the preponderating interest, daily render more untenable.

"Let us first consider what is meant by a remunerating price for agricultural produce. This, as fixed by the practical authorities, to whom allusion has been made, appears to accord very nearly with that definition of a competency, which fixes it at a hundred a year more than the possessor of any given income actually enjoys. The remunerating price for wheat appears to lie always something below the highest price which it has ever borne during the preceding twenty years, and always considerably above that which the farmer is actually receiving.

"It was proved, to the satisfaction of the two Houses of Parliament, in 1815, by the host of agriculturists and land agents who were examined under the first Committee on Agricultural Distress, that wheat could not be grown in Great Britain, except at a loss to the farmer, at a lower price than 80s. the quarter. The remunerating price subsequently fell to 70s. and 60s. Now, when the averages range between 40s. and 50s., the most inveterate grumbler, of a class proverbial for grumbling, would be satisfied with 50s. We must conclude from this that the price of agricultural produce is an important element in the cost of its production. Divest that portion of the produce used for seed, and in feeding the cattle employed in cultivation, of its money value, and it will be found an invariable quantity, on the same soil and under the same system of cultivation. The shares of the landlord and the labourer are usually money payments, which, remaining stationary while prices are falling, require a larger amount of produce for their discharge, than was contemplated when their money value was fixed. These, however, ultimately adjust themselves to the reduced prices. While the adjustment is in progress, agricultural distress prevails; when it is complete, the price once considered ruinous becomes remunerative."

Legislative enactments have not secured this "remunerating price" to farmers, as their present position too surely testifies.

The great agricultural problem of the day is—How the clay soils are to be made productive; and upon its solution mainly depends the future condition of British agriculture. This will render apology for the length of the following extracts needless:—

"The result of the alteration in the duties on foreign cattle and provisions under the new tariff has disappointed the hopes of the consumers—or would-be consumers—of meat, and the fears of our breeders and graziers, and has shown, that neither in quantity nor quality are the supplies of live stock from Europe, and of provisions from America, likely to affect our markets, at any rate for a long time to come, to any appreciable extent. It is obvious, therefore, that, if our augmented numbers are to be consumers of animal food, it can only be by means of large supplies of beef and mutton, raised upon our own soil. Greater quantities of these can be produced upon arable land, by the culture of turnips and other forage crops, than upon an equal extent of pasture; and if, by any process, the clay soils of England can be rendered sufficiently dry and friable to admit of the union upon them of stock husbandry with tillage, another agricultural revolution will be effected; not only will the equilibrium be restored between the strong and the light soils, but the preponderance will again belong to the former, from the artificial fertility which increased supplies of manure will induce upon their naturally superior fertility, now freed from its accompanying and countervailing disadvantages. That process has been discovered, and was described before the Committee on Agricultural Distress in 1836. Few of the great improvements in agriculture have originated with practical farmers. When application was made to Lord Leicester for a farm by one who pleaded that he had followed the plough all his life, and must therefore know something about farming—"about ploughing, you mean," was the reply; "the best farmer I ever knew was a retired tallow-chandler." The new system of draining—the capital improvement of modern times—destined to exercise so important an influence on the welfare of this country, was invented by Mr. Smith, a cotton manufacturer, of Deanston, in Perthshire. Having about 200 acres of almost worthless land, he applied himself to the improvement of it, by means of draining and loosening the subsoil, by a process called subsoil ploughing. The two methods previously employed for draining land were designed, the one to free it from surface-water, by means of open drains and furrows, the other to remove, by means of covered drains, superfluous moisture issuing from below. In order to carry off the water from arable land retentive of moisture, it has long been usual to plough it in ridges, varying in breadth according to the wetness of the soil; and the furrows left between these ridges were crossed, in the lowest parts of the field, by others called grips, or water-furrows, which were enlarged and deepened by the spade, every time the land was under a winter crop. Where the land had sufficient declivity, the rain was thus carried off as it fell, without being allowed to stagnate on the soil.

"Under drains, designed to relieve the land from the effects of springs, were narrow trenches, rarely more than 18 inches deep, in which a channel for the water was kept open by means of tiles, stones, bushes, or straw, which were covered with earth. Springs are occasioned by atmospheric water, which, having fallen on land at a higher level, percolates the strata, and bursts out at the point where the resistance is least. These under drains are, therefore, directed irregularly, through the lower portions of the ground, to those parts at which there are indications of springs. The peculiarity of the Deanston system of draining consists in this, that by parallel drains from thirty inches to three feet deep, arranged at regular and frequent intervals, and discharging themselves, at certain distances, into larger transverse drains of the same kind, it seeks, not only to intercept springs, but to allow the rain water to pass off by percolation through the soil, instead of flowing off the surface. These drains are filled, to within eighteen inches of the surface, with stones, broken small—their smallness constituting one of the peculiarities of the system. Where stones cannot be conveniently procured, or where the land has very little declivity, tiles are employed. The use of straw or bushes is rejected. The object of the old system of draining was to cause the water to enter the drains from above as quickly as possible, and therefore, when tiles or stones were used, some more porous material, such as straw or bushes, was placed over them. The object of the Deanston system is to cause the water to enter the drains from the side, and the tiles or stones are therefore covered with the most clayey portions of the soil, thrown out of the drains. The rapid entrance of water from above being thus prevented, the obstruction of the drain by earth carried into it with the water is avoided; and other advantages are secured which attend the filtration of the rain water through the soil."

The land having been drained, the water which percolates through it is beneficial to its fertility. Then follows the subsoil ploughing:—

"After the interval of a year, the operation of subsoil ploughing is performed. This consists in loosening the subsoil to the depth of sixteen inches, by means of a strong plough, drawn by four or six horses, which follows in the furrow made by the ordinary plough, and, having no mould-board, breaks up the subsoil without bringing it to the surface. The direction of the ploughing is transverse to that of the drains, towards which the water filtering through the soil is thus conducted; and, during its slow passage, the chemical and mechanical changes are effected, which are so beneficial to vegetation; while, by the loosening which the subsoil receives, a wider range is afforded to the roots in which to seek for nourishment. The land is now rendered so porous that it is no longer necessary to plough it into ridges with intervening furrows, but it may be laid as flat as those soils which lie upon a naturally absorbent subsoil. Water-furrows may now be dispensed with. The texture of the soil is moreover improved, in most cases, by blending clay and sand, which were before arranged in separate layers. A stiff clay, difficult to work, is thus converted into a friable loam; and, even in those cases where no intermixture of siliceous matter takes place, the expansion of the water which percolates the soil has a tendency to separate its particles, and render it more friable. After the lapse of a few years, when the chemical and mechanical changes are sufficiently advanced, and the subsoil, previously sterile from want of exposure to the atmosphere, is sufficiently improved, portions of it are brought to the surface by means of deep ploughing with the ordinary implement; and thus a cultivated soil is obtained, of twice or thrice the depth of that previously turned over by the plough."

This system has been extensively adopted in Scotland; and though, as the writer truly says, it has been much talked about in England, still the actual work of draining proceeds but slowly, while much of that which is performed is done very inefficiently. But wherever any of the land has been drained and subsoiled properly—and the instances in England have been little more than experiments—the result has been complete success. Innumerable cases are cited from the Journals of the Royal Agricultural Society, where, by an outlay of from £6 to £7 per acre, land worth, to rent only, from 2s. 6d. to 5s. an acre has been permanently increased to 20s. and 21s. The magnificent improvements of Lord Ducie on Whitfield Example Farm, and the profitable results, are fully stated in this article. The increased productiveness of the land of that farm is thus shown:—

"The farm now consists of 270 acres, of which 120 are annually under wheat—the only description of grain grown upon it—120 under root crops and clover, 20 in permanent pasture, and the rest roads and buildings. The crop of wheat for the last four years has averaged 40 bushels an acre, with the prospect that the yield of the crop now being thrashed will be superior to any yet obtained. Forty bushels an acre, on 120 acres, amount to 4800 bushels. The 168 bushels of wheat and 80 bushels of barley, obtained from the arable portion of the farm by the former tenant, may be considered equal to 208 bushels of wheat. The farm, therefore, now produces full twenty-three times as much corn as it produced under the old system of management; while the half of it, under roots and clover, maintains more live stock than were kept upon it while it was in grass.

"The labourer has benefited by the change, as well as the landlord and the tenant. The number of labourers employed on it, as a dairy farm, was equivalent to three men, two women, and one boy for the whole year. The average number employed now is twelve men, nine women, and five boys. The wages of a man under the former tenancy were 9s. a week, with wheat at 56s. the quarter. The present tenant pays 12s. and 14s. a week, with 50s. as the average price of wheat, being satisfied, from what he has seen in Lincolnshire, that the work of a well-fed labourer is the cheapest.

"Let us now turn our attention to the amount of surplus produce derived from this farm under the two different systems of cultivation, above the wants of the labourers employed in producing it. In making this comparison, we shall consider the number of men employed in each case, as representing so many families of five individuals each, no member of which derives any portion of his subsistence from any other source than agricultural labour; and we shall take the annual consumption of each individual at six bushels of wheat. We have already stated that the grain produced on Whitfield, under the old system, was equal to no more than 208 bushels of wheat. Deducting the seed sown from this at the rate of three bushels the acre, and supposing that the five horses kept on the farm consumed no corn, as they probably did not, there would remain 145 bushels, 90 of which would be the annual consumption of 15 persons contained in three families. The surplus is 55 bushels; which would be equal, on a farm of the present size of Whitfield, to 63 bushels, or the consumption of little more than two families.

"Deducting from the 120 acres now under wheat, 20 acres as necessary to produce the corn for the horses employed in cultivating the farm, and deducting seed at two bushels the acre—though no more than a bushel and a half is sown to obtain the present splendid crops—we shall have still 3760 bushels, and the surplus produce, after deducting six bushels each for the 60 persons contained in the 12 families supported by labour on the farm, will be 3100 bushels, or sufficient for the consumption of 113 non-agricultural families.

"It may perhaps be objected, that, in comparing the corn raised on a dairy farm with that raised on an arable farm, the estimate above given of the much larger surplus produce of the latter is fallacious. Let us, therefore, endeavour to compare the relative produce of live stock in each case. The produce of the pasture land of old Whitfield was sold in the form of cheese and butter, a few calves, and fat pigs, and the heifers and old ewes not required to keep up the dairy 'pack.'

"The produce of the live stock now maintained upon that portion of the farm devoted to roots and clover, goes to market in the shape of mutton, beef, and wool. In order to compare the amount in each case, we must reduce each description of stock to sheep, according to the rates stated in Mr. Morton's first report, allowing 12 sheep for a cow, 10 for a fatting ox, 8 for a three-year-old heifer, &c. At this rate, deducting the horses in each case at the rate of 8 sheep each, and allowing that the clover now keeps 10 sheep to the acre (which it does), for the six summer months, and that the root crops keep the same number for the winter, we shall find that the former pasture of the farm was equal to the support of 384 sheep, or 416 on a farm of the present size of Whitfield, and that its present green crops are equal to the support of 700 sheep all the year round. The balance, therefore, is again greatly in favour of the present system, as regards the production of animal food as well as grain. If, however, we suppose the amount of live stock in each case to be only equal, we have the important and undeniable fact, that Whitfield, as an arable farm, supplies 120 more families with food than it fed before, nine of which have obtained increased employment on the farm by its conversion from pasture, and 103 are dependent on other occupations."

We pass over some most conclusive passages showing that the landlords must be as much benefited as the rest of the community by receiving their rents through abundant produce rather than from high prices, in order to extract a passage demonstrating the futility of the monopoly-raised fear of Free Trade:—

"The advocates for the maintenance of artificial remunerating prices, by means of restrictions on the free interchange of the produce of the earth between nations—an object which, with all their legislation during the last thirty years, they have not been able to accomplish—frequently put forth statements to show how rent would be entirely annihilated by a reduction of the average price of wheat, 10s. a quarter, below that which, for the time being, is fixed on as the remunerating price. We will, therefore, on the other hand, endeavour to show the efficacy of an increased produce, obtained by the application of an additional dose of capital, in enabling the tenant to meet such a reduction. We will take the case of strong wet land, yielding, on an average, three quarters of wheat, and paying a rent of 20s. an acre, with the average price of 60s. A reduction of the price to 50s. diminishes the returns on the wheat crop 30s., and thus both the rent and 10s. of the tenant's profit are gone. Let the landlord, however, expend £10 an acre in draining and deepening the soil, charging the tenant five per cent. on the outlay, and let the tenant increase the capital employed by him in cultivation, by £5 the acre, and the average produce will be increased, as we have seen it increased at Whitfield, to five quarters an acre. The difference in value between a crop of three quarters and a crop of five quarters, at 50s., amounts to £5, and the tenant gains by this increased produce as follows:—

The old rent and the profit destroyed by the reduction of the averages from 60s. to 50s.	£1 10 0
Additional rent, at five per cent. on the landlord's outlay	0 10 0
Ten per cent. on the tenant's additional capital of £5 the acre	0 10 0
Five per cent. to cover casualties on his increased stock	0 5 0
	£2 15 0
Additional profit	2 5 0

"There would be no increased expense of cultivation, except that of harvesting, thrashing, and marketing five quarters instead of three, which is too insignificant to be taken into account; while, on the other hand, the labour previously required to work the soil will be diminished one-fifth by the greater friability induced.

"The great obstacle to improvements, by which such an increased produce might be obtained as would more than counterbalance any diminution of price which would follow a repeal of the Corn Laws—if such repeal would have the effect of reducing the averages below their present level—consists in the want of capital on the part of landlords and tenants to carry these improvements into effect. It is notorious that, as a body, the landed gentry are worse off for ready money than any other class of the community; and it may be safely affirmed, that they are the poorer for the high prices of the war. The rapid increase of their incomes, which they supposed would be indefinitely progressive, tempted them into expensive habits, of which they have been unable to divest themselves, now that the golden tide has ebbed from beneath them. The tenants are no better off than the landlords. They prospered for a time, while the advance of price was progressive, but their rents were soon advanced in proportion, and when the revolution came, the first brunt of it fell on them; and they could obtain no reduction of rent till it became evident that their resources were nearly exhausted. Many of them had borrowed a large portion of the capital required to stock their land; that stock was depreciated in value full 30 per cent.; and fixed money engagements of this kind requiring, as well as their rents, one-third more produce for their discharge than was necessary when they were contracted, have drained them so effectually that, instead of possessing capital for permanent improvements, which are the proper work of the landlords, though too often thrown upon tenants-at-will, the tenants, taken as a body, do not possess half the capital necessary for the ordinary purposes of cultivation.

"There are many tenants who, in the present state of the money market, would be able to borrow sufficient capital to effect those improvements which pertain both to landlord and tenant, if they had the security of a lease, or an agreement that, on quitting the farm, they should be repaid their outlay, subject to deductions, increasing for every year that had elapsed since the expenditure was incurred."

The law of entails and the plan of English settlements greatly impede the improvement of settled estates; and so sensible have the landowners become of this that the Lords have appointed a committee to investigate the subject.

The writer, who is obviously a practical and skilful farmer, thus testifies to the soundness of the views enforced by Mr. Cobden in his late speech on agricultural distress:—

"While this article was passing through the press, we received the report of the speech made by Mr. Cobden, in moving for a committee to inquire into the causes of agricultural distress. In that speech, which appears to have made a strong impression on the House of Commons and the public, we find the same principle urged, which has been insisted upon in the preceding pages,—that CAPITAL is more wanted by the landed interest than legislative protection. From the tone of the leaders of the two political parties, it is clear that protection will soon be numbered with the things that have been. We would, therefore, exhort the landed interest no longer to pursue this ignis fatuus—this purse of money under the end of the rainbow—but to apply themselves in earnest to the sure and safe process of increasing their rent-rolls by the improvement of their estates. If unable or unwilling to do this, let them, at any rate, not deter the moneyed interest from investing individual or collective capital in the purchase and improvement of such landed property as may be in the market. It must be obvious that competition for the possession of land will be beneficial to themselves. It will raise the value of that which they want to sell, or on which they want to raise money. The infusion of a little commercial enterprise, energy, and calculation into agricultural operations will increase their rents, without any exertion on their part, by the effect which will be produced on their tenants from the influence of example, spreading over wide circles from a number of centres. The day for cattle shows is gone by. It has done its work. A little good is to be expected from local discussions which have local practices for their subject. To the agriculturists of the most advanced districts belongs the work of carrying agriculture on to higher degrees of perfection by the aid of science; and nowhere is this work taken up with such zeal and success as in Scotland; none of our men of science are adding to their science so much acquaintance with the practice of agriculture as Professor Johnston. Even in the most highly cultivated districts, and on the richest land, an increase of produce may be obtained by such aid, at a comparative reduction of cost, as will more than compensate for the present depreciation of price. But there are wide districts, in which may be included a large portion of the southern, midland, and western counties of England, with the whole of Wales, in which agriculture still stands very few degrees above zero. These require the constant exhibition before their eyes of established, though comparatively modern, improvements, undertaken with a view to profit, and proved to be profitable. Talk in a farmers' club of what is doing in Lincolnshire, Northumberland, or Derwickshire, and you are met with the objection of undefined local peculiarities of soil and climate, which render such practices unsuited to other localities. Let their practical working, in all seasons, be exhibited, and, though much criticized and ridiculed at first, sound sense and impartial judgment will eventually triumph over the regnum Præmii cæli of local prejudice, and they will be adopted. The very collision of opinions which such exhibitions produce, exert a powerful influence in expanding the agricultural mind. It may safely be affirmed, that the much-derided operations of Tiptree Hall, if they occasionally manifest too great an eagerness to rush into untrodden paths, have done as much to rouse to thought the strong, though dormant, intellectual powers of Essex, as they have to increase the productive powers of Tiptree Heath. They will have more effect in improving the agriculture of Essex than all the ploughing matches which ever took place in that county."

We recommend this article to the diligent perusal of landowners, who will find topics suggested which, if followed out, must lead them to that they most want, namely—knowledge of their own affairs.

Free Trade in the Treasures both of the Body and the Mind, the Interest and Duty of Christians. A Sermon, preached in June, 1842, by Joseph Hutton, LL.D. London: Chapman.

The celebrity of the preacher and the interest of the subject render it a superfluous task to recommend this sermon. We shall merely extract one passage, descriptive of the accordance of the intercourse of nations with the manifest designs of Providence,—its force and beauty require no comment to point them out:—

"Look at the surface of the earth,—how evident is it that to unite the various tribes that dwell upon it is a primary object of the great Creator! See how the ocean—the dissociating ocean an ancient classic calls it, but never in poetry or prose was an epithet more erroneously applied—unites the most distant realms, and the most different climates, and renders the interchange of their productions not merely possible, but easy:—

"This band remotest nations joins."

"Well has the Psalmist, in speaking of the great and wide sea as full of the riches of God, adverted to the blessings of navigation—'there go the ships.' They are works of human art, it is true, but there cannot be a doubt that they exist by Divine appointment, and that the sea was as much designed to carry man over its surface as to nourish the scaly brood within its depths. Over the vast plain of ocean we wend our easy way to every point of the circling shores, and, as we approach them, we see rivers without number offering their aid to conduct us, by roads not less easy, into the very heart of the distant lands in which our brethren dwell. These liquid paths God makes, and man imitates; and canals extend the blessings, while they testify to the value, of those rivers which hurry seawards, to lend their assistance in completing the work of love which the ocean has begun. Was the sea designed to separate us, then? Ignorance only can imagine it. It joins the remotest races of the human family, as no other expedient that we can think of could have joined them.

But what shall we say of the rocky barriers that separate land from land—of the mountains interposed, that make enemies of nations, which had else, like kindred drops, been mingled into one? Are not they, at least, meant to divide us from each other—to portion us off into distinct regions, holding little or no communion? I doubt it much. The sublimities of nature serve rather to attract than to repel—the curiosity of the traveller is excited, his admiration is kindled, his energies are called forth by them, and many a mountain ridge is climbed with painful steps and slow, for the sake of the feelings which the traveller experiences when he dives into its deep dells, wanders by its lonely tarns, looks upward to its towering cliffs, or down upon the wide-spreading prospect which its heights command,—where a mere lowland district, even though rich and beautiful, would have been left untraversed. Do the Pyrenees, the Alps, the Apennines, serve only for division? To say nothing of their physical uses, amongst which let us not forget that they are the needful sources of those very rivers of whose uniting power we have spoken, have they not an attractive power upon minds? Does not the stranger often turn his longing eyes to them from afar, and for their sake has he not frequently been known to make his first acquaintance with men of strange aspect and of unknown tongue, whom yet he has soon learned to love, because he has found that they have human hearts, and minds formed, like his own, in the image of the Deity? It is by no means an unknown, or even uncommon case, that to see mountains has been the first object, and the last result to find friends and brethren in men.

"Talk not then of barriers—the sublimities of nature are meant to draw us to each other. In accents that echo from one mountain summit to another, the Alps invite us to trace the steps of Carthaginian Hannibal and French Napoleon, and acquaint ourselves with the mighty nations that spread wide at their base, and the simple people that dwell in their verdant valleys, or on their rocky sides. With the voice of many waters, Niagara calls us to hold communion with our Transatlantic brethren; and, in sounds more familiar, Snowdon invites us to converse with the simple-minded descendants of the first dwellers of our land; Ben Lomond would fain persuade us to confer with Scotia's hardy sons and lively daughters; and Mangerton, to learn by our own experience that Irish hearts are warm."

"No, my friends; mountains interposed are no more designed to estrange the human family from each other, than seas or rivers. On the contrary, if the earth were a dead flat, or a smooth ball, we should want many powerful inducements, which we now have, to traverse its beautifully varied surface; and, in gratifying our curiosity respecting its grand physical phenomena, to make ourselves acquainted, at the same time, with the mental and moral characteristics of its inhabitants."

"Again, from the surface of our globe turn your attention to its productions. Does the consideration of these supply us with any reason for believing that the universal Father meant to make each particular district sufficient for itself? Has He cooped up his children like tame cattle, in their separate fields, and spread out before them an unvaried but satisfying repast, and bade them to feed there in happy, but selfish and unsocial, ignorance of their brethren in neighbouring enclosures? Has He not, on the contrary, given them wants without number that they cannot supply, and tastes that they cannot gratify, without ranging far and wide, and imparting of their own that they may receive of others' wealth? Instead of forming them, as an ancient author expresses it, 'prone and obedient to the belly,' with downward looks and minds that cannot range, any more than their eyes, beyond the spot of ground immediately beneath and around them, has He not given them an erect posture, and far-darting vision, and large desires for distant good, and minds that leap all obstacles, and prompt and assist the body to do so too, in the pursuit of those objects on which their hearts are fully set?"

"And are these the beings whom we would limit to the produce of the spot on which, for the time being, they chance to dwell? They will not be so limited. In the state of barbarism they will seize, like un instructed children, upon what they have not, but desire to have. As civilization advances, and the ungovernable cupidity of the child yields to the reason-regulated wishes of the man, commerce will succeed to war, exchange to robbery, and they will learn to barter what they want not, or less highly value, of their own, for those coveted possessions which others can be induced, by the price they offer, to impart. Free Trade is the expedient which reason suggests, and God approves, for gratifying honestly the various and strong natural desires which He has implanted in the breasts of His children, for superseding that spirit of mutual aggression, violence, and plunder, to which, in the savage state, or childhood, of the species, those desires lead; and for introducing to each other, in the character of mutual benefactors, men who, in less enlightened days, were known as envious witnesses of each other's prosperity, or lawless invaders of each other's rights."

¶ We shall give our second notice of "Sybil" next week.

DEVON AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The annual exhibition and show of stock of this society took place in the Castle-yard to-day. In consequence of the great scarcity of keep, the show was not so large as in former years, but most of the animals were of first-rate quality. A great number of improved agricultural implements were shown.—Western Luminary, of Tuesday.

"LES CONTRABANDIERS."

THE SMUGGLERS.

(Translated from the French of Beranger by Thomas Doubleday, Esq., Newcastle.)

CHORUS.

"The devil take the Commissaire!
As we grow rich may he grow poor,
A fellow that seems only made
To watch a road or shut a door!
To watch a road or shut a door!
Let that for ever be his care.
What reek?—the people are our friends—
The devil take the Commissaire!"

'Tis midnight now,—so let us hie,
All ready we, whate'er befall;
Our pistols clean, our powder dry,—
Be sure we shan't forget the ball!
Hark!—'Tis the watchers' stealthy tread:
Their numbers let the recreants bring;
Our pistol balls are made of lead,
Our eyeballs are another thing!

Up! Comrades of a noble strain!
Let dastard laws ne'er shame the bold.
Our girls shall smile when we shall rain
Upon their laps the ruddy gold.
In hall, in castle, and in cot,
Shall welcome still our steps attend;
Who cares what Governments may plot,
The while the people is our friend?

'Mid snowy cliffs, whence torrents leap,
Our very slumbers have a charm;
Though keen the wind that seeks the steep,
What then? our courage still is warm!
Our palaces yon summits proud,
We share them with the chamois fleet;
Our home is in the mountain cloud,
And Fate is far beneath our feet!

Oh! man was born to traffic free,
But law still stops the path he made:
We reek not! In our right hands we Still clutch the balance of our trade.
In Providence we place our hold,
And worship that diviner will,
That snows down wealth upon the bold!
And riches—riches scatters still.

The wise on earth must madmen be;
The very gifts of Heaven they spoil;
They nip the fruit upon the tree,
They paralyze the arm of toil.
Mad as they are, what! know they not Wherever man is placed below,
The power, who placed him, ne'er forgot
To bid the fount of plenty flow?

Comrades! against such laws we war.
Away such fond allegiance goes!
They who twist nations place the bar,
Can only be of both the foes.
But us such wiles shall not deceive,
Their chains we scorn, their laws we detest;
We weave the woof we list to weave,
And drain the wine that likes us best!

You freeborn bird, he laughs at all!
Where'er he listeth, there he'll go!
He heeds no paltry frontier wall,
Nor stops to hear if kings say "no!"
So let us to our tyrants say,
"Our kingdom is where'er there's ground;
Free blood, by blood, shall make its way,
And clear your frontiers at a bound!"

Come! 'mid the champagnes let us sing:
Still ready let the musket be;
And when the mountain echoes ring,
May they awake thee, Liberty!
And oh! if e'er our country fail,
By civil strife or foreign war,
Let "death or freedom" be the call;
And comrades, we shall not be far!

WOOLLEN MANUFACTURES AND WOOL.—Returns upon this subject were issued on Saturday, by order of the House of Commons (on motions of Mr. Maisterman and Mr. Aldam). It thence appears that the declared value of the British woollen manufactures exported from the United Kingdom in 1844 was £8,204,836, of which £2,444,789 worth was exported to the United States of America. During the same year 65,079,524 lbs. of sheep and lamb's wool, foreign and colonial, were imported into the United Kingdom; of which 1,924,826 lbs. were re-exported from the United Kingdom, chiefly to Belgium. Of British sheep and lamb's wool, 8,947,619 lbs. were exported to foreign countries; and 8,271,906 lbs. of British woollen and worsted yarn, including yarn of wool or worsted mixed with other materials. There were also imported into the United Kingdom 635,357 lbs. (of which 47,848 lbs. were re-exported) of alpaca and llama wool; and 1,290,771 lbs. of mohair, or goat's wool, of which 97,529 lbs. were re-exported.

AUSTRIAN NATIONAL EXHIBITION.—The Emperor of Austria, wishing to offer to Prince Metternich a mark of his consideration, ordered that the Grand National Exhibition should be opened on the day on which the Prince accomplished his 72nd year. The Arch-Chancellor was born on the 15th of May, 1773, and has had the direction of the affairs of the Austrian empire for 39 successive years. The Austrian Lloyd's, in giving a preliminary account of the articles sent from all parts of the empire to the exhibition, adds a statistical summary of the produce of the general industry of the nation, and which it makes amount in value to 1,000,000,000 florins (the Austrian florin is equal to 2s. 5½d. French money). The linen and hempen goods stand at the head, and are put down at 75,000,000 florins; the next are the woollen cloths, at 71,740,000 florins; then follow articles of leather, 64,500,000 florins; silk and silk cloths, 59,000,000 florins; chemical preparations, 54,804,000 florins; cotton goods, 45,000,000 florins. Bohemia is the province which stands highest in the amount of its produce, which is put down at 110,344,000 florins; and then comes Lombardy, valued at 69,546,000 florins.

AGRICULTURE.

THE FARMERS' REFUGE.

When from low prices, failing harvests, or disturbances amongst the peasantry, farmers are subjected to any of the various difficulties to which an artificial system gives rise, it is common with landowners to make temporary reductions of rent. In fact, this has grown into a part of the ordinary plan of management on English estates. Let prices fall below the act-of-Parliament rate at which rents have been set, causing in some instances a loss to tenant-farmers greater than the whole amount of their rents, and we find their landlords coming forth with fresh promises to legislate for high prices, and making temporary reductions of 10, 15, or at most 20 per cent. on their rents. By such means farmers have hitherto been partly deluded and partly pacified into quiescence. So again, when, as in 1830, incendiarism and rural insurrection were rife in the southern counties, similar abatements were made upon the understanding that some one or two shillings a week of increased wages should be given to each agricultural labourer. But farmers always get the worst of such arrangements, for in no case do they receive any reduction of rent at all equivalent to the losses they suffer, and the moment the extreme pressure has passed away, rents fly up again to their old point.

Now, there is nothing which so quickly and so strongly operates upon the sensitive landlord mind as anything like a combined movement amongst the rural labourers; and it is plain from the following paragraph, taken from a local paper, that the farmers of Dorsetshire are not ignorant of the fact. This is the statement of the provincial journalist, and it is most significant:—

"STRIKE OF FARM LABOURERS.—Last week the labourers at Nether and Over Compton, Dorset, were informed by their employer that their wages would henceforth be reduced from 7s. to 6s. a week. The reduced wages were offered to the Nether Compton men on Saturday night, but refused, and on Monday morning, as early as six o'clock, the men, who had arranged their plans, started off in a body to the residence of the landed proprietor, taking with them the Over Compton men, who (their wages not having been then curtailed) had gone to work as usual. The men, to the number of thirty or forty, passed through Yeovil, and after some arrangement made with them, returned to their work. It appears that at an audit or two ago the landlord took off ten per cent. from his tenants' rents, but at the last audit he put on five per cent. on that amount. The farmers declared that they were unable to pay an advanced rent on these terms, and to continue the same wages as formerly. The consequence was the reduction of the labourers' wages as above stated. The tenants are willing to pay the men at the usual rate if the increase of five per cent. is taken off. The matter is at present unsettled. The tenants are determined not to give the customary wages unless they obtain a concession from their landlords."—Sherborne Journal.

Nor is connexion between high rents and low wages at all remote. Rent can only be paid from that surplus which remains of the year's produce after the expenses of the farmer, including the wages he has paid, have been returned to him. Farmers have had their rents fixed upon the expectation that a certain price for their produce—say, at present, 56s. a quarter for wheat—has been secured to them by the act of Parliament which excludes the importation of foreign grain; they have adapted their whole scheme of cultivation to a high range of prices, and have hoped to obtain a profit by means of small capitals spread over great breadths of land. This mode of farming is that which employs comparatively few labourers, and reduces the wages of the few labourers employed to starvation point. In Dorsetshire, and all the south-west of England, such a mistaken system of farming is in the fullest operation, and there the agricultural population is greater than the land, as at present managed, can employ. The competition of labourer with labourer has reduced Dorsetshire wages to the miserable pittance of 7s. a week. Then let the farmers' calculations fail, let the price of wheat fall from 56s. to 45s. a quarter, as has happened now, and it is quite clear that, if tenants pay their rents, they must sell some of their stock or diminish the number, or lower the wages, of their labourers. Probably in most cases farmers have to some extent done all these things in order to make up their rents, for the landlords have the law of distress, which enables them to sweep off the whole of their tenants' property. Ay, and these rents are rigidly exacted, for the mere per-centages thrown back scarcely afford any present relief to the farmers. The Corn Laws operate in various ways adversely to the interests of rural labourers. In the first place they lead to a system of farming which gives but little employment, and of course renders the ordinary rate of wages low. That is the case when prices are up to the act-of-Parliament rate. Next, by enhancing the cost of food and other necessaries, the Corn Laws render the real value of the wages the rural labourers actually receive less than it would be in a natural state of things. But when the use of agricultural distress comes, when all on which farmers have calculated from a high range of prices has vanished, except their high rents and labour charges, then comes the time of screwing and pinching, then labourers are dismissed, wages are lowered, and the capital of the farmer permanently diminished to meet the imperative necessity of paying the monopoly-price—rent. Rent, instead of being, as it ought, the last demand on the farmer, becomes the first, and the capital which should have been productively employed in payment of wages is unproductively sunk in discharging the rent. Is it unnatural, then, that farm-labourers should strike when their pittance of 7s. a week is attempted to be screwed down to the starvation rate of 6s., or that "tenants should determine not to give the customary wages unless they obtain a concession from their landlords"? Let this combination or co-operation or reaction amongst farmers and farm-labourers proceed to any great extent, and that "annihilation of rent" of which the landed monopolists are fond of talking is not unlikely to take place.

It is impossible, however, to contemplate the extension of such a state of things without alarm, for the agricultural population, driven to desperation, will inevitably resort to courses of which we have had too much experience during the last fifteen years. The case of the tenant-farmers must indeed be difficult when they can only hope to act upon their landlords through such fearful means as the reductions of such wages of their labourers. The first effect of such a course, too, must inevitably fall upon the farmers; for, although the landowners and the landowners' laws have in fact caused the evil, the sullen peasant will be too apt to deem his master, whom the necessity of paying the rent has compelled to reduce wages, the oppressor of the poor. Are the farmers, then, to submit quietly to have their capital abstracted from them to pay monopoly rents? And while so doing are they ready to stand between the outraged labourers and the landowners as the ostensible oppressors of the peasantry? Nay, more: are they, whilst so situated, willing to remain the political catspaws and the blind dupes of the monopolist landocracy? Will they be amused and deluded by sham motions about county rates and auction duties, or empty vapourings about the repeal of the Canada Corn Bill and the Tariff, until another period of scarcity and high prices arrives, and their fancied "protection" is hastily surrendered by their coward landlord leaders amidst the execrations of the nation?

We know that the tenant-farmers will not be satisfied to be so used and deluded by their political landlords much longer; but it is of great importance to the occupiers of land that their present state of uncertainty and suffering should soon be brought to an end; that the state of transition should be got over quickly; and there is one way, and one only, by which that can be done. Let the tenant-farmers frankly throw themselves into the arms of the League; let them note their own helpless social and political position, betrayed and deceived by those whom in public affairs they have blindly followed and trusted, and designedly kept from taking that station in society to which, when emancipated from feudal trammels, their skill and industry would entitle them. The League, an association of the industrious, is their natural ally, and is the only power which can assist them in forcing commercial principles into the dealings with landed property. Protection is virtually gone. Free Trade is inevitable. Then why should the farmers dream over a departed delusion, and in so doing miss an opportunity, which may not again occur, of striking down that feudalism of which they are the victims? Let the farmers join the League, and one-half the counties of Great Britain may be represented in the next Parliament by men whose sympathies and whose interests are identified with the industrious tenant-farmers, and not with the unscrupulous seekers of high rents. Let them bear in mind the lesson afforded by the committee on the game laws. That committee, the only Parliamentary inquiry ever instituted upon a real tenant-farmers' question, was forced upon an assembly of adverse landlords by the energetic, practical, and conclusive statement of Mr. Bright, a Leaguer. Between the landlords and the tenant-farmers there can be no real community of interests; between the farmers and the League there can be no real antagonism, for both require that the reward of industry should be steady and certain. A farmer who had attended the St. Albans dinner, at which Mr. Bright addressed the farmers upon the game laws, afterwards remarked: "We farmers ought to have such men as Mr. Bright to represent us, for he understands more of what is necessary to the success of a farming man of business than all the squires in the House of Commons." So true is it that the interests of the industrious, whether engaged in manufacturing corn or calico, are identical, and that those interests will never be understood or honestly represented by the unproductive consumers of rent.

GAME-LAW MISCHIEFS.

Even now, while the Game-Law Committee is receiving the most convincing evidence of the noxious effects of game laws and game-preserving, the system flourishes in full vigour. Here is a specimen of the sort of ruffians kept by game-preservers for the protection of their sport!

"DICKENS PARTY SESSIONS.—Monday last.—Present, Rev. A. H. Matthews and R. Prettyman, and W. Style, Esq.—A LAWLESS GAMEKEEPER.—James Andrews, of Lower Heyford, a gamekeeper for the Earl of Jersey, was charged by David Tuffrey, of Weston-on-the-Green, with having, on the 5th inst., assaulted him at the latter place. It appeared that the complainant, a lad of fourteen, went into a 'spinney' to cut a stick, and there found a whip belonging to Andrews, who beat the boy when he went to carry it to him, saying he had no business in the spinney. Convicted in fine 2s. 6d., and costs 10s. 6d., and in default of payment, 21 days' imprisonment. Paid. This game-preserving servant of the Jersey's Earl was then charged by Thomas Brain, of Weston, with having, on the same day, assaulted him. It appeared that he was at Howe's, the public-house at Weston; that complainant, a lad, went into the yard with a fish, which Andrews said he had taken from a pond of theirs. This the lad denied. Andrews knocked him down, beat him, and almost strangled the boy by pulling his neckcloth. He also searched him, and found some wires on him. These the lad said he had just picked up; they were not adapted to take fish with. For the second offence the ruffianly fellow was fined 8s. 6d., and costs 11s. 6d. In default of payment, one month's imprisonment. Paid.—Aylesbury News.

This is the sort of justice dealt out to the poor by our game-preserving magistrates. The ruffian who commits atrocities of the most violent kind on persons he suspects of poaching is fined 2s. 6d. and 8s. 6d.—sums which are of course entered in his master's next weekly bill—while, if his unhappy victims are brought up before the same justices for the more venial offence of poaching, fines of 40s., or three months' imprisonment, would be the most merciful sentence they could expect. And in their case, let it be remembered, the imposition of a fine is certain imprisonment, for they have no lordly master to pay their fines. From the same journal we have an instance of the way in which such cases of suspicion are dealt with by the magistrates:—

"On Wednesday last, Charles Fryer was committed for fourteen days, for trespass at Moor-wood, the property of Sir W. R. Clayton, Bart. Fryer was searching the woods for pheasant eggs, a custom very prevalent at this season in this neighbourhood."—Aylesbury News.

Here we have immediate imprisonment, and no mistake. At the same time it is satisfactory to find that many of the more sensible owners of land are becoming alive to the wrongs and crimes of game-preserving. We have had occasion to record many cases of landlords who have wholly or partially abandoned game-preserving; and here we find the career of one of those most noxious persons, the renters of game, shortly put an end to by the awakened common sense of the owner of the land:—

"GAME SLAUGHTERING.—We understand that the Rev. G. Chetwode and his friends killed 1500 hares, besides birds, on the White Cross Green preserves last season. They were rigidly preserved by keepers. The tenantry consider that they were not half requited for the damage done them by the reverend gentleman's stock on their farms, and they in consequence complained to their landlady, Lady Croke, of whom Mr. Chetwode rented the shooting. In consequence of this, an important alteration, as regards the tenantry, has been made. Mr. Chetwode has now nothing to do with it. The tenants have agreed to pay Lady Croke the same sum for the right of shooting as Mr. Chetwode did, and have now the opportunity of destroying it."—Aylesbury News.

Now, it is neither fair nor honest to make the tenants pay game rents over and above full and ordinary rents for their land: still they would in most cases gladly pay a game-law "blackmail" to escape the ruinous losses caused by "renters of shooting." This clerical game-preserver has almost weekly appeared in the local journals as a prosecutor of poachers on his own account, and a rigid enforcer of the uttermost penalties of the game laws against the Duke of Buckingham's poachers.

RURAL HELPLESSNESS.

The following passage from the letter of an agricultural correspondent of the Chelmsford Chronicle—a high protectionist organ—whose object was to disparage Mr. Mechi's most useful rural improvements, bespeaks the hopeless want of self-reliance into which the Corn Laws have beguiled the less intelligent farmers. He says:—

"I inquired of an experimental farmer in this neighbourhood how he approved of subsoiling, knowing he had tried it on various soils. His answer was not a favourable one: he complained that the land so loosened promoted the growth of thistles, and, to use his own words, the twitch worked so deep in it, it was impossible to eradicate it. I can readily believe it, for to destroy couch it must be exposed to the sun."

This is probably true; but why was there any couch or "twitch" left to "work down"? The removal of this thief of the soil is a condition precedent to good farming, and we know, from experience, that upon the strong lands, which most require subsoiling, no exposure to the sun can be relied on for the destruction of couch grass. It must be picked off by hand; and, when once the land is thoroughly cleaned of this weed, a moderate share of constant attention will easily keep it clean. If the slovenly farmer thinks to succeed by subsoiling and so forth, he will probably find that all his intended improvements only increase his growth of weeds. The same thing applies to manure. Let a foul field be highly manured, and the farmer will get a fine crop of "twitch," but probably a very moderate one of corn. In farming, especially on strong land, it is necessary that all the processes should be well performed. Superfluous moisture must be got rid of by draining, weeds must be totally eradicated, the subsoil must be loosened by subsoil ploughing, and manure and good tillage must be abundantly and seasonably supplied; then, but not till then may the farmer expect an ample return for his care and outlay.

Depend upon it there is no royal road to good farming. It must be the result of a judicious and considerable expenditure continued over several years. How can this be done by yearly tenants, or by farmers harassed by game-preserves. We would strongly advise farmers never to enter upon a farm as yearly tenants; but to those who are in that forlorn condition we would say, don't subsoil or undertake any other expensive improvements, which your tenure won't justify your following out, until the Corn Laws are repealed and you have secured rational leases. The day is not far distant. Partial improvements, like those of the Essex farmer, will probably only "make the twitch work deeper," while the belief that the tenants are improving will make the landlords cling to their high rents.

AGRICULTURAL UNANIMITY.

The following passage, from an article in "Fraser's Magazine" for April, on Sir Robert Peel, happily exposes the state of hopeless imbecility to which the monopoly-loving landlords are reduced. When the rogues fall out honest men get their own.

"Nobility will dispute the fact that the agriculturists of Great Britain are at this moment in a high state of duddgeon. They vote with the Government, it is true; but you never hear one of the body speak for it; and out of doors their language is intelligible enough: they believe that their chief has betrayed them. It is not for us to determine whether he has or has not; but this much we take upon us to hint, that if they be betrayed, and their interests sacrificed, they have themselves very much to thank for it. They came into his opinions in reference to the tariff of 1812 with marvellous facility. They did so trembling, that we freely admit; but not a man among them had the courage to say, 'We won't march through Coventry with you; we will rather break up the party again than make ourselves a laughing-stock to the world.' Well, they permitted the wooden horse to be carried within their citadel, and broke down a portion of the wall that it might pass; and now they see, with amazement, troops of armed men descend from its sides, whom they are too timid or too daunted among themselves to attack, though they join in the cry of treachery. What was their behaviour at the commencement of the present session? They knew that the finances of the country were in a very flourishing condition, that there would be an immense surplus of revenue to be disposed of. They were not ignorant that Sir Robert, delighted with his income-tax, was resolved to render its repeal difficult, if not impossible, by appropriating the surplus produced by it to the repeal of other taxes. How did they act? They proceeded by deputation to Privy-gardens, and, setting forth in general terms the depressed condition of their interests, they besought him, in his plan of reduction, not to overlook them. Well, Sir Robert heard them, as he hears everybody, with patience, and requested them to point out any particular burden which, pressing heavily upon them, he might be able to remove. 'Shall we repeal the malt-tax?' 'By all means,' replies the representative of a barley-growing portion of the kingdom, 'that's the very thing we want.'

"I beg your pardon," interposes the owner of a large estate on which a blade of barley never grew since the deluge, 'that may answer your purpose exceedingly well, but it won't do good either to me or my neighbours.'

"Suppose, then, we take the beer-tax?" observes the Minister.

"That's your dodge," whisper the members for Kent, and Sussex, and Shropshire; 'get rid of the odious beer-tax, and we shall do well.'

"Very likely," observe the representatives of the northern and midland counties; but, as we don't grow hops in our part of the world, we shall gain nothing by the increased facilities afforded for the brewing of beer."

"And thus it came to pass that a deputation, which entered the Minister's study united as one man to wring from him a boon for the agriculturists, broke down in the Minister's presence, not because he resisted or snubbed them—quite the reverse, but because he appeared as eager as themselves to fall into their views, and to tender them efficient aid, provided they would tell how to apply it. So much easier is it to make speeches about the wrongs of the agriculturists than to suggest a definite cure for the evil."

INCENDIARISM.—Our readers will learn with satisfaction, that the constabulary force for this county are in possession of most important information in connexion with a number of the late fires wilfully occasioned in this county, and that several suspected parties are already in custody. The force have been privately engaged in tracing the authors of the diabolical acts, and have at last succeeded in obtaining information which will convince all that, however secretly such acts are effected, as the parties concerned may imagine, sooner or later the perpetrators will be brought to justice.—Chelmsford Chronicle.

DISCUSSION OF THE CORN LAWS.—We rejoice that a full discussion of the Corn Laws will soon take place in the House of Commons. Not that we have any hopes of success from the present Parliament, but every thorough sifting of the question helps to bring it nearer and nearer to a prosperous issue, not only by making the goodness and strength of the cause more and more manifest, but also by exposing the folly and weakness and selfishness of its opponents. It scatters the seed for the future harvest. It spreads conviction through the country. It rouses the people to a fuller sense of the mighty and monstrous injustice under which they have been so long suffering. It stimulates friends. It kindles enthusiasm in the trading and manufacturing community. Above all, it dispels the errors, doubts, and delusions by which the farmers and labourers in the rural districts have been imposed upon by the advocates of monopoly, and teaches them to know and feel that they can only hope to thrive by the prosperity of their customers, and that the demand for food must always be regulated by the state of the trade and manufactures of the country. In short, everything is working well, and will be well for us in the end.—Liverpool Advertiser.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, May 24, 1845.

As the period for closing the Bazaar approaches, popular excitement seems to increase; the number of visitors on Thursday was larger than on any previous day, and the sales were proportionately great. It is a very gratifying proof of the civilizing effects of Art,—that equally lovely and valuable handmaid of civilization,—that no instance of wanton injury or defacement has occurred, though myriads have passed through the Bazaar. Not less gratifying is the courtesy which is uniformly manifested in the crowd; there never was an assembly in which greater forbearance was exhibited by all and to all, and never so dense a multitude in which women and children were so kindly and tenderly treated. Interesting as is the Exhibition in its material aspect, it is still more beautiful to the reflective mind as a manifestation of refined moral feeling. The pretence that has been set up for excluding the English people from the great depositories of our works of art—their supposed tendency to do mischief—has been set at rest for ever. Lord John Russell, who very attentively examined every part of the Bazaar, very justly observed, that the greatest spectacle was the spectators.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Tuesday state that the health of M. Guizot is so much improved that it is expected he will be able to attend to his Parliamentary duties in a few days. M. Guizot will, it is said, take an active part in the discussion of the budget. The Commerce publishes letters from Algeria, which give a less favourable account than has hitherto transpired of the state of affairs in that colony. The insurrectionary movements are stated to be far more serious than had been supposed.

At the sitting of the Central Agricultural Congress on Monday, a long discussion took place, on the mode in which the corn averages are struck in France, and it was resolved to recommend to the Government some changes in the divisions, so as to secure a more equal estimate. It was also resolved to recommend the adoption of precautionary measures, for the purpose of checking frauds in the sale of the different manures for land.—Galignani.

SPAIN.—Accounts from Madrid of the 12th instant state that an official intimation had been received from Rome, announcing that the concordat had been signed on the 27th of April. It is understood to contain the acknowledgment of Isabella as Queen of Spain, and of the validity of such sales of church property as had so far been effected. A courier had also arrived from Gibraltar, with the ratification and text of the treaty of peace concluded between Spain and Morocco. The Chamber of Deputies had voted the budget of receipts, and the bill authorizing Government to raise a loan for the opening or improvement of the various public roads.

PORTUGAL.—The patriarch of Lisbon, Cardinal Saraya, died on the 7th instant, at the advanced age of seventy-nine. His funeral was attended by the Queen and court, who were present at the church of St. Vicente de Fora, in the vaults of which the body was deposited.

M. Meneses, a magistrate of the town of Villa Ponca, in Tras-os-Montes, was assassinated on the 30th ult., having been shot through the head as he was returning home at night, by some person unknown.

SWITZERLAND.—According to a letter from Switzerland, in the Constitutionnel, the Catholic cantons are preparing to carry into execution the decree for the introduction of the Jesuits. The Catholic conference at Lucerne had addressed a note to the Governments of Soleure and Fribourg, inviting them to make common cause for the re-establishment of the convents.

The case of Dr. Steiger was heard by the superior tribunal at Lucerne on the 17th. Dr. Steiger made an eloquent defence, but the tribunal confirmed the sentence of death that had been pronounced upon him, by a majority of seven to three.

A letter from Coburg, dated May 11, in the Manheim Journal, states that an English courier had just arrived with the intelligence that Queen Victoria was to arrive on a visit to her husband's august relatives in the course of the month of June. The letter added that preparations had already been commenced at the Court for her Britannic Majesty's reception.

VIENNA, May 11.—The exhibition of the productions of national industry will take place on the 15th. About 1600 individuals have already forwarded their articles. A deputation from Lloyd's, in Trieste, has already arrived.

SWEDEN.—ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.—The Diet of Sweden has responded to the appeal of the King in such a manner as to secure the abolition of slavery in the island of St. Bartholomew, in voting 10,000 rixdallars yearly, for five years, to be expended in redeeming the slaves of that island, and compensating the loss of their masters.

THE WAR IN CIRCASSIA.—Accounts from Odessa of the 18th ult. state that the Russian Government was daily sending off warlike stores towards Circassia. The different corps of Russian troops on this side and beyond the Caucasus are said to amount to 150,000 effective men.

According to a recent census of the Russian empire, it appears that the population consists of 62,500,000 souls, of whom 2,000,000 are Tartars (Mahomedans), and 182,000 Jews.

Poland is still in a disturbed state; at Warsaw the prisons are daily increasing the number of their victims. The espionage is more rigorous than ever; and the danger of correspondence by letters is greatly augmented.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—Accounts from Constantinople of the 30th of April announce that official intelligence had been received that a body of Greek soldiers, headed by an officer of the name of Platoniki, had made an irruption into Thessaly. It appears that the Turkish Government had anticipated such an act of aggression, and had placed an officer with a division of troops in a defile, to watch his movements. A collision took place, and after an obstinate combat the Greeks were driven back. Sixteen men were killed, and a number wounded on both sides. The Porte, in consequence, had addressed a strong note to the Greek Government on this wanton aggression, for the affair took place on the Turkish territory; and unless ample reparation is made, it will be followed by a declaration of war.

ENGLISH MANUFACTURES IN TURKEY.—On the 19th ult. the Sultan, accompanied by Riza Pacha and his favourite Minister, set out, amidst the firing of guns, on a little excursion to Izmidt, to inspect the English factories there now completed, for the production of broad cloth. The whole of the machinery being of the most modern and improved invention, such establishments were well worth examination, and it is said that the Sultan not only greatly admired them, but gave golden proofs of his satisfaction by the distribution of a large sum of money among the workmen.—Morning Chronicle.

SLAVE TRADE.—An important letter, from which the following is an extract, has been received by the Secretary of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. It is written by a gentleman well known to the society, who has been for some time travelling with philanthropic objects. It is well, for the sake of humanity, that the British consul is Sir Thomas Reade, who has always been the strenuous advocate of freedom:—"Tunis, April 17. My dear Sir,—On the 14th instant I had the pleasure of being again introduced to his Highness the Bey of Tunis, when we had some conversation on the abolition of the slave trade in North Africa. On mentioning to his highness what I was compelled to encounter in Morocco, and that the Emperor himself was afraid to entertain the question of the abolition of slavery on account of the fanaticism of his people, his highness observed, 'Ah! those people are very obstinate, and want some one to instruct them.' I then told the Bey that a French writer and deputy, M. Desjobert, had published a book, in which he said that 'Tunis was more advanced in the work of the emancipation of negro slavery than France herself, with all her boasted civilization;' when his highness, smiling, replied, 'I have opened the way, I have abolished the sale of slaves, and I will never leave the work of emancipation whilst a slave remains in my dominions.' It is highly probable that the Bey of Tunis contemplates some measure to be immediately put in force for the liberation of all slaves in this country, the Bey having given a similar intimation the other day to Sir T. Reade, when the consul thanked his highness, in the name of the British Government, for his continued perseverance in the humane and glorious work of negro emancipation. Having informed the Bey of my journey to Tripoli in a few days, I took leave of his highness, who wished me all success in my future efforts."

"John Scoble, Esq."—R. J. INDIA.—Intelligence from Bombay to the 5th of April, Calcutta the 7th, and Madras the 14th, has arrived. It is not of importance. Sir C. Napier's expedition against the Pindarees had been crowned with complete success. The Punjab remained in an unsettled state. Cholera was prevalent at Calcutta, but was not of a nature to create more than customary alarm. From China there is no news of interest.

DOMESTIC.

The London Association for the Protection of Trade have got up and extensively circulated a petition to Parliament for a repeal of the act of last session, abolishing imprisonment for all debts under £20. The petition also prays for the adoption of some better means than at present exist for the recovery of debts under £20, contracted previous to the passing of the late measure.

The will of the Marquis of Westminster has just been proved. The personal estate in England, and within the province of Canterbury, is sworn under £350,000. He bequeaths to his wife an annuity of £6500, in addition to her property under settlement. His estates at Westminster and the manor of Ebury are bequeathed to his eldest son, the present Marquis; his estates in Chester, Flint, and Denbigh, as well as the presentation to the rectory of Prestwich, Lancaster, to his son, Thomas, Earl of Wilton; his Moor-park estate, and a legacy of £170,000, to his son, Lord Robert Grosvenor. He leaves the pictures, &c., in the gallery and elsewhere, at Grosvenor-house, together with the Nassau diamond, weighing 357 grains, the magnificent brilliant earrings, weighing 223 grains, and the round brilliant, weighing 125 grains, as heirlooms.

On Friday last, the steam boiler at the cotton mills of Messrs. Smallpage and Lord, Burnley, blew up with a terrible explosion, and completely demolished a fire-proof building of three stories, containing the cotton warehouse, the scutching-rooms, and the boiler-house.—Liverpool Standard.

The Erebus, Captain Sir John Franklin, and the Terror, Captain Crozier, discovery vessels, left Greenhithe on Monday for their destination. Each ship has been supplied with 200 tin cylinders for the purpose of boring papers, which are to be thrown overboard with the statement of the longitude and other particulars worthy of record, written in six different languages, and the parties finding them are requested to forward the information to the Admiralty.

A public meeting of the friends and supporters of the National Temperance Society took place on Monday evening at Exeter-hall, and was attended by a numerous assemblage; Mr. Samuel Bowley in the chair. On the platform were Mr. Silk Buckingham, Dr. Oakley, Mr. Janson, Rev. J. Burnes, Mr. G. W. Alexander, Mr. Henry Vincent, &c. The secretary read the report which gave a favourable account of the progress of the society's labours.

Mr. Edward Hughes, aged 60, the mayor of Llandudno, put a termination to his existence, by piercing his right under the left ear with a penknife, on Friday night. The deceased carried on a very extensive business as a flannel manufacturer, &c.—Cumbrian.

A duel took place late on Tuesday evening, at Brown's down, near Anglesey, Portsmouth. The principals in the affair being a Mr. Seaton, a gentleman of fortune, formerly in the army, but at present residing at Southsea, and Lieut. Hawkey, belonging to this division of Royal Marines. In this rencontre Mr. Seaton has been dangerously wounded, his adversary's ball striking him a little above the hip joint, and passing through his body. The unfortunate gentleman was conveyed back to Portsmouth, and taken to the nearest hotel, the Quebec, at Point, where he now lies, attended by Drs. Mortimer and Stewart, with, we understand, little hope of recovery. Mr. Seaton was attended to the field by a lieutenant of the navy on half-pay, and Lieut. Hawkey, by an officer of his own corps, both of whom, with Lieut. Hawkey, have, it is said, proceeded to the Continent. Both gentlemen are married, and the occurrence has occasioned much mental distress to the families and friends.—Herald.

Mr. James Walker, civil engineer, is commissioned by the Home Office to inquire into the causes connected with the falling of the suspension-bridge at Yarmouth.

The season for the mackerel fishery has commenced, beginning generally in May and ending in July. There are about 65 luggers employed in it. Besides the luggers there are four companies of boatmen, with about 28 ferry-boats, yaws, and gigs, employed to bring the fish on shore. There are also seven cutters that attend the luggers, and take the fish away directly to the London and other markets.—Norfolk Chronicle.

The sixth annual general meeting of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade throughout the world, was held on Saturday, at the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street. The room appropriated to public meetings was nearly filled by a highly-respectable assemblage, about two-thirds being ladies. The chair was taken by Mr. J. J. Gurney.

On Wednesday night the members and friends of the Metropolitan Complete Suffrage Association held a tea party and soirée at the Crown and Anchor, Strand; Sharnam Crawford, Esq., M.P., the president of the association, was in the chair. He was supported by a number of the most eminent advocates of the extension of the suffrage. The meeting was numerously attended, and there were amongst the company a number of ladies. Able speeches were delivered by the chairman, the Rev. Mr. Spencer, Dr. Epps, Laurence Heyworth, Esq., the Rev. G. Dawson, Colonel Thompson, Dr. Price, Mr. E. Mill, Mr. H. Vincent, &c.

On Tuesday there was a sale of fourteen baskets of new potatoes from the Bermudas, brought over by the Trent steamer, at Monument-yard. The quality was pronounced very good, and the prices realized were under 2d. per lb. The speculation having proved thus successful, and the root having been obtained in very good condition, there is no doubt but that these islands will in future furnish the first supply of this useful food to our markets.

The friendship between England and France has just been further consolidated by a treaty in reference to the slave trade, of which that honest statesman the Duc de Broglie and her Britannic Majesty's Government have, we hear, definitively settled the conditions. It requires at present only to be reduced to official form, to be initialed, then signed, and submitted for the ratification of the respective sovereigns. While speaking of the relations between the two countries, it gives us much pleasure to add that there is not the slightest foundation for the rumours recently circulated of the retirement of the Comte de St. Aulaire from the Embassy of France at this Court.—Post.

A correspondent informs us that the Hon. Sydney Herbert has settled £100 per annum upon the parish priest of Irishstown, and the like sum upon the parish priest of Booterstown, in both of which parishes he is the principal proprietor, and that this voluntary endowment has been vested in the Commissioners of Donations and Charitable Bequests, under the act of last session, to be held in perpetuity for the Catholic pastors of the parishes named. Mr. Sydney Herbert, who is a Cabinet Minister, has set an admirable example to the landed gentry of Ireland, by this practical adoption of the system earnestly recommended by Sir Robert Peel, when introducing the Maynooth Bill.—Dublin Evening Post.

James Gallagher, the banish of Colonel Enery, and under-agent to Captain Bennison, was shot last night, near Ballyconnell, about duskish, by two men as yet unknown. He pursued them, but fell with loss of blood.—Fermanagh Reporter of Saturday.

In allusion to the scheme propounded by the Government for the establishment of academical institutions in Ireland, the Kilkenny Journal says—"If they dare insult our eyes with any of those stews of Government corruption under the name of colleges, we will level them with the ground."

The Repeal Association met as usual on Monday, in the Conciliation Hall, Dublin. Mr. O'Connell announced that he had received a letter, accompanied with a song, set to music, by Mr. O'Callaghan; but the letter was totally inconsistent with the principles of the Association, and highly dangerous in its tendency, and the song which accompanied it was a war-song—a fighting song. Now, so much was he opposed to the adoption of physical force, that he would not consent to accept of the repeal of the Union at the expense of one drop of human blood. The learned gentleman postponed giving his views on the new scheme of academical education until the Catholic bishops had pronounced their decision upon it. He lauded the Maynooth grant; and concluded by giving notice of various motions he purposed bringing forward at the next meeting of the Association. The rent for the week was £132. 10s. The Catholic bishops have met, but have not as yet announced their decision on the education scheme: it is understood, however, that they object to the absence of any provision for religious instruction.

GRANO.—The imports of American guano at Liverpool, in the course of the past week, have been only 675 tons. The sales have exceeded 2000 tons, at from 4s. 15s. to 4s. 10s. A small quantity of Peruvian had been sold at from 27. 12s. 6d. to 28s. The stock of Ichaboe at Liverpool is still about 70,000 tons.

THE CATTLE MARKET.—The effects of the extraordinary drought experienced last summer, and the consequent want of food for cattle, are now beginning to be felt in the vicinity of sheep, and the necessarily high price of mutton in the market. This has advanced fully 20 per cent., and promises to be maintained for some weeks about the country. Two causes are assigned for this: first, the farmers at this season always hold back their stock from the market in consequence of the great improvement they make; and secondly, the wholesale butchers find the demand so great in larger towns as to send all they can to them. The scarcity thus produced is almost beyond all precedent.—Cardiff Journal.

TURN-OUT.—On Monday morning last, the bricklayers' labourers in Rochdale and the neighbourhood turned out for an advance of 3d. per day. They held a meeting at the Rope and Anchor, Cheetham-street, when a deputation was sent to the masters, who, with one exception, agreed to the prices asked; but when they went to their work on Tuesday morning, the masters objected to employing some of the men, and they did not resume their work. On Monday, the bricklayers gave notice that they should leave their work at the end of a fortnight, unless their wages were advanced from 4s. to 4s. 4d.; they held a meeting at the Weavers' Arms, Yorkshire-street.—Manchester Guardian.

FRENCH AGRICULTURE.—The Presse publishes some extracts from a work presented to the Agricultural Congress now sitting at the Palace of the Luxembourg, by the author, M. Catinéau Laroche, and entitled, "France and England compared with respect to Agricultural, Manufacturing, and Commercial Industry, and the Consequences to be deduced from this Comparison." It appears from this work that England, in comparison with the extent of its surface, possesses four times more cattle than France. And as it is not possible to pursue a judicious system of agriculture without manure, and as the feeding of cattle is the most productive of supplying manure, it follows that, before France can compete with England in agricultural wealth, she must increase her stock of cattle, but in order to do so she must increase her pasture lands or meadows. "France," says M. Laroche, "possesses but 4,200,000 hectares of natural meadows, or only 1-16th of her cultivated soil. From this calculation it may be easily comprehended how insufficient is her supply of green food, and that it becomes absolutely necessary that she should substitute another for the triennial system at present in use." M. Laroche concludes by stating that, "if the alternate system of cultivation pursued in England was introduced into France, the produce of corn would be doubled within 20 years. Fifty-five years since, the produce of Great Britain was estimated by Arthur Young at three milliards. At present it is estimated at 5 milliards 725 millions."

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, May 19.—The show of English Wheat fresh up to this morning's market was pretty good; the finest samples sold readily at an advance of 1s. per qr.; for other qualities more money was not realized. The demand for rounded which we noticed on Friday is increased, and such descriptions are 1s. to 2s. per qr. dearer. There was not much English Barley on sale, but Foreign continues to arrive freely; there is no alteration to notice in the price of this article. Both Irish and Foreign Oats are in good supply, but there are not many English and Scotch; there is a fair country demand, and prices are well supported. The supplies of English Beans and Peas are short, and the prices are well maintained; several cargoes of Foreign Beans have arrived, but their bad condition prevents their having much effect on the trade.

FRIDAY, May 23.—Since Monday the arrivals of all kinds of grain have been short. For fine samples of English Wheat 1s. per quarter advance is realized over the prices of that day; inferior qualities sell readily at late rates. The Belgium demand for Wheat in bond, which was brisk in the early part of the week, appears to be satisfied for the present, and the trade is, consequently, not so brisk. Barley continues dull. There are very few fine Oats on sale, and such descriptions fetch rather more money: other sorts are firm at Monday's prices. Beans and Peas are both scarce, and maintain late rates. There was no alteration in the duties yesterday.

THE LEAGUE.

SATURDAY, MAY 31, 1845.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quintin Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Birmingham and the neighbourhood are respectfully informed, that Subscriptions may be paid by Free-Traders to Mr. Charles Geach, Midland Bank, Union-street, Birmingham, the local Treasurer.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRATION.

The Council of the League finding that more than half of the persons whose names are on the Middlesex Register have claimed since the last contested election in 1837, they have directed circulars to be sent to them requesting an answer as to whether they will support Free-Trade candidates in the event of an election. As it is not considered that those who return answers pledge themselves to support ANY PARTICULAR MAN, but only that they are willing to support the principle of Free Trade, it is hoped that ALL who have received letters, and are favourable to the principles the Anti-Corn-Law League advocate, will consider it a duty to return their letters answered, as it is important that the Council should be able to know their supporters from their opponents.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

REGISTER, REGISTER, REGISTER!

The coming registration will in all probability determine the character of the next Parliament, and decide the fate of our question for several years. We should have called attention earlier to this all-important subject, but the universal interest excited by the Bazaar, and the attendance of a large proportion of our friends from all parts of the country in London, during the last month, rendered all allusion to the subject useless. The triumphant issue of that metropolitan demonstration will give new life to our friends everywhere, and stimulate the men of the League to redoubled exertions in the labours of registration. The Bazaar was the work of our countrywomen, and nobly have they done their part. But the battle of the League must still be fought in the registration courts; and there the ladies can take no share in the conflict. Up, then, men of the League, to your duty, and prove yourselves, everywhere, worthy of those fair colleagues who have, by their toils and their smiles, not only replenished your exchequer, but won for your cause its present triumphant moral position. Let every parish in England and Wales have, if possible, its "Free-Trade Registration Committee." Or at least, let every man be found who will devote his energies to the business of registration. As, during the ensuing four months, the attention of the Leaguers must be exclusively devoted to this vital part of our agitation, we shall continue to give them the fullest instructions, beginning to-day with the counties:—

The first step which requires to be taken is that of the claims for counties. The time for making these claims is from the 20th of June to the 20th of July, inclusive; any claim made after the latter date will be too late.

The county franchise is divided into four important classes of qualification:—

"1st. Freehold, which includes the ancient 40s. freehold of inheritance for ever; and property held under a lease for lives, which should be described as freehold in the notice of claim.

"2nd. Leasehold for a term of not less than 60 years, originally of £10 annual value; or if for a term of not less than 20 years, of £50 annual value.

3rd. Copyhold of £10 annual value.

4th. Occupiers of land, or building and land under one landlord, subject to a bona fide rent of £50 a year.

In the first class, the owner of a 40s. freehold for ever must have been in possession from the 31st of January of the present year; and the same in the case of the owner of leasehold for lives of 40s. a year, provided he be himself in the occupation of the property. If the owner of the lease for lives do not occupy, the property must be of the annual value of £10.

In the second class, the owner must have been in possession from the 31st of July, 1844.

And in the third class, the occupation must also be from the 31st of July, 1844.

It will be obvious that the first thing to be done by our friends is to ascertain how many Free-Traders there are in each parish possessing qualifications, and who are not now on the register; and this should be set about forthwith, that the notices of claim may be made in proper time.

There are various means of obtaining this information, as, for instance—

In all those districts where the purchasing of qualifications, as recommended by the League, was taken up systematically, lists of the names will have been kept by those who made the conveyances.

The poor-rate books may be examined carefully to ascertain the names of owners of property, and also £50 occupiers therein, who are not registered.

Overseers, and collectors of rates and income-tax; builders; building and land agents, who are friendly, may also give much information.

In the neighbourhood of large towns, such as Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, &c., there are merchants, manufacturers, and others, who occupy large houses and premises in the suburbs at a rental of £50; these, if not within the parliamentary borough, will be qualified, and, if not on the county register, should claim. Last year, on a careful examination of the rate-book of a township just over the boundary of the borough of Manchester, from forty to fifty occupiers of this description were found who were not then on the register for South Lancashire.

The next thing to be done is to take care that the claims are made out in proper form, and served in due time.

It is most convenient to use printed forms of notice; and these should be filled up with the greatest care, the following particulars being closely attended to:—

The name of the claimant to be written at full length.

The place of the claimant's abode (not the place where his business only is carried on).

The nature of the qualification must be correctly described in the third column. Any misdescription here will be fatal if the vote should be objected to. Leasehold or copyhold must not be described as freehold; or freehold as leasehold.

The situation of the qualification must also be accurately given as required in the fourth column. In cases of successive occupation, as, for instance, where the voter has removed from one farm to another since the 31st of last July, each set of premises must be set forth in the claim.

A correct copy of each claim must be kept, and the claim and the copy must each be signed by the claimant himself.

Should any of our friends desire to be furnished with further information on any particular point, they will please to address their inquiries to Mr. Paulton, League-office, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. Hickin, Secretary to the League, Manchester.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S RESOLUTIONS AND SPEECH.

Lord John's Russell's speech of last Monday night, introductory to his resolutions on the improvement of the condition of the labouring classes, was of an excellence which we feel much pleasure in frankly and cordially acknowledging. It was a speech indicative of generous sympathies and enlightened opinions. It was an able review of the causes which have depressed and degraded the industrious millions of the community, a spirited protest against the injustice and folly of the laws "usually called protective," and an earnest demonstration of the necessity of commercial and industrial reform to the social and moral elevation of the labouring classes. This speech has the high merit of being the first attempt made by the head of a parliamentary party to bring before the Legislature the whole condition of the labouring classes, together with a definite proposal of ameliorative measures based, so far as they go, on sound economical principles. It is the first systematic effort made by a man of the highest parliamentary standing, to work out the objects of philanthropy by the light of the truths of political economy. We cannot but award high praise to the statesman who, in the face of a reluctant and hostile House of Commons, formally adopts, as the great end of his policy, the permanent improvement of the condition of the labouring classes; and, as the first and foremost of his means, the emancipation of their labour.

As a Free-Trade speech, this of Lord John Russell's is of great value. It contains the whole of our case. Nothing could be better than his lordship's broad and emphatic assertion of the principles of industrial and commercial liberty, and of the inseparable practical connexion of these principles with every interest nearest to the heart of the philanthropist and the Christian. He vindicates, in the strongest language, the right of labour to choose its own market. He condemns the protective system as "altogether vicious and unsound." He denounces the Corn Law—in terms which show that Mr. Cobden's arguments, of this and last session, have not been lost upon him—as especially injurious to the agriculture which it pretends to protect, as cruelly deluding the farmer with perpetual promises which it perpetually breaks. He gives up his eight-shilling fixed duty, as a thing not to be thought of for a moment, "after all the discussion which has occurred." And, what is more, he gives up every one of the grounds on which a fixed duty can, with any decent show of reason, be defended. A fixed duty for revenue he will not hear of; for "corn is one of the worst articles you can tax." A fixed duty for protection is out of the question, of course, for "protection is the bane of agriculture." "Peculiar burdens" are put out of court by a very summary process: we can look into the peculiar burdens, says his lordship, when we have done away with the other peculiarities of the landlords' case. And, best of all, the Whig leader would do at once what he has to do: "He sees the folly and madness of waiting for another crisis of national distress. Now is the time, he urges, to enfranchise trade and industry—now, with political tranquillity and leisure, with bread at Free-Trade prices, with revived commerce and prosperous manufactures—now, with population growing at an almost fearful rate of increase—now, before another bad harvest brings 'the cry of hunger up to these walls.'"

After this, is it not pitiful to find Lord John Russell still busy at "security-grinding" (which he last year promised to leave off)—still clinging, with desperate fidelity, to the phantom of a dead and buried fixed duty—still haggling over a few miserable shillings of "unnecessary taxation"—still haunted by imaginary terrors of "sudden alteration;" when, as all the world knows, the real mischief is not in sudden alteration, but in the everlasting liability to alteration incident to a false and artificial system—when, as he himself so well showed, by reference to former passages of our commercial history, the danger is a nullity. Never was a more lame and impotent conclusion to a great argument. Four, five, or six shillings of "bane to agriculture"! Four, five, or six shillings of "unnecessary taxation"! Four, five, or six shillings of deduction from the "efficiency of labour"! Four, five, or six shillings of the worst sort of revenue! Four, five, or six shillings of obstruction to trade, and delusion to the farmer! Never was there a more fatal contradiction between premises and conclusion—never a more doleful self-stultification—than this. This minikin fixed duty—which, after all, is not to be fixed, for "there may hereafter come a time," &c.; this four, five, or six shillings, with a perhaps; this shadow of a shade of a terminable contingency; this thing without a reason—stripped bare of every shred and tatter of a reason ("sudden alteration" excepted) by which a fixed duty was ever attempted to be justified before;—really is one of the most egregious absurdities that a good and able man ever condescended to patronise. We are sorry for it.

Lord John Russell does himself infinite injustice by this small trifling with a great question. He has a sort of inchoate title to the honour of being the first Free-Trade Minister of Great Britain, which we would gladly see him perfect. The statesman who gained London and lost office in the first battle against monopoly, has claims to the honour of giving the monster its quietus, which it is really melancholy to see him hold thus lightly. However, if it be so, it must be so. "After all the discussion which has taken place," Free Trade and Free-Traders need not go begging to any man. If Lord John Russell really has made up his mind (we do not believe he has) to this most inglorious martyrdom; if he chooses to throw himself away in the pursuit of a shadow; if he declines to accept the post which, at present, is ready waiting for him, but which will not be kept waiting for him in particular, one hour after an occupant can be found willing and able to fill it; if he prefers the nominal headship of a beaten and broken party, to the grandest work that a statesman was ever called to do; if he really means to let history sum up the record of his and his party's career with a verdict of felo de se;—we can only say again, we are heartily sorry for it. We have done our best to prevent it. But, if Lord John Russell positively will hold the door open to Sir Robert Peel, it will be no fault of ours if Sir Robert Peel walks in.

We do not recollect an instance in which the debilitating effect of one little piece of hesitation and inconsistency was more conspicuous and decisive, than in the debate of Monday and Wednesday nights. This one flaw was fatal. By narrowing the difference between himself and Sir Robert Peel to a mere variation as to the import of the words "cautious and deliberate," Lord John Russell spoiled all. He actually allowed the wily Premier to interpret the censure implied by his resolutions into a sort of compliment. Opposition of principle, strictly speaking, there was not. Both took the same facts, both used the same logic, both drew the same conclusions "in the abstract." Both adopted the same principles, and deprecated a sudden application of them. Protection is "vicious and unsound," says the Whig leader. No doubt of it, answers the Premier; "protective duties are in themselves evil"; these second and third resolutions of yours are admirable; "to the principle which they involve I cannot but give my ready assent." Population grows at a fearful rate, says his lordship; we must do something to feed and employ the people. It does, indeed, replies the Home Secretary; why, would you believe it, we have another million and a half added to the people since we took office; it is "a fact with reference to which all our commercial and financial legislation must be directed." Positively, something must be done, urges the Opposition leader, to relieve industry, by widening its field of employment, and enlarging its supply of food. Most certainly, responds the Minister; we have been doing nothing else these three years past. But we must not go on too fast, suggests the noble lord; we must be "cautious and deliberate," and beware of "the evil that is produced by a sudden alteration." Oh! trust us for that, retorts the Home Secretary; we will do nothing "hastily and rashly." Of course, adds the Premier; we are well aware it is a matter that "calls for the utmost consideration." But I think, rejoins his lordship, that "caution and deliberation" mean a four, five, or six shilling duty, contingent and terminable. Well, so you think, is the implied response of the Minister; but, after all, that is a matter of opinion; we think "caution and deliberation" mean waiting a little, and coming out by-and-by as total and immediate repealers.

We do not, for a moment, offer this representation as the whole of the truth. We are not insensible to the real and wide differences that exist between Lord John Russell and Sir Robert Peel, with reference to their conduct on the Free-Trade question; to any other question, the neutrality of our column forbids our alluding here. We cannot overlook the vast superiority of the Opposition leader to the Minister, in point of earnestness and sincerity; nor can we disregard the prodigious difference which there is between the attempt to do nearly everything, and the obstinate refusal to do anything. But we must say, that if Lord John Russell cannot make his opposition to the monopolist Cabinet more distinctly visible to the naked eye than it was in the late debate—if he cannot make it, broadly and palpably, an opposition of principle, a war of la France of Free-Trade against Protection—he cuts the ground from under his feet, as a public man.

For the rest, the debate of this week was, from first to last, a triumph, or series of triumphs, to the Free-Trade cause. Every principle for which we have ever contended was fully admitted—every fallacy that we have ever demolished was resolutely ignored ("caution and deliberation" excepted)—by the leaders of both the great parliamentary parties. Tory vied with Whig in making out our case; we need not add, that our own parliamentary leader took excellent care that the moral of the whole should be properly expounded. The imperative necessity of chapening the food and unchaining the industry of a growing people on a limited soil; the inseparable connexion of dear bread with low wages, deficient employment, pauperism, crime, and mortality; the effect of cheap bread in raising wages, lowering poor-rates, making life easy, and diffusing the blessings of education, virtue, and religion; the desperate impossibility of permanently improving the condition of the labouring classes, except by, or concurrently with, the enfranchisement of labour;—these great and simple truths, which we have been battling for these seven years, are now the openly declared convictions of every man in public life who has intellect enough to open his lips without making himself the laughing-stock of the House of Commons.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Fifteenth Week, ending Saturday, May 31.

On Monday night Lord JOHN RUSSELL brought forward his announced motion on the GENERAL CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE. His views are embodied in nine resolutions, which, though we have given them on a previous occasion, it may be as well to place before our readers, as they stand on the notice paper of the House of Commons. They are in this form:—

"Lord JOHN RUSSELL.—Resolutions respecting the labouring classes in England and Wales:—

"1. That the present state of political tranquillity, and the recent revival of trade, afford to this House a favourable opportunity to consider of such measures as may tend permanently to improve the condition of the labouring classes.

"2. That those laws which impose duties usually called protective tend to impair the efficiency of labour, to restrict the free interchange of commodities, and to impose on the people unnecessary taxation.

"3. That the present Corn Law tends to check improvements in agriculture, produces uncertainty in all farming speculations, and holds out to the owners and occupiers of land prospects of special advantage which it fails to secure.

"4. That this House will take the said laws into consideration, with a view to such cautious and deliberate arrangements as may be most beneficial to all classes of her Majesty's subjects.

"5. That the freedom of industry would be promoted by a careful revision of the law of parochial settlement which now prevails in England and Wales.

"6. That a systematic plan of colonization would partially relieve those districts of the country where the deficiency of employment has been most injurious to the labourers in husbandry.

"7. That the improvements made of late years in the education of the people, as well as its more general diffusion, have been seen with satisfaction by this House.

"8. That this House will be ready to give its support to measures, founded on liberal and comprehensive principles, which may be conducive to the further extension of religious and moral instruction.

"9. That a humble address be presented to her Majesty, to lay the foregoing resolutions before her Majesty."

To these resolutions, the following amendments have been exhibited:—

"Mr. SHARMAN CRAWFORD.—To move an amendment on Lord John Russell's first resolution, that after the word 'opportunity,' in the second line of said resolution, the following words be inserted:—'To give immediate attention to the claims so repeatedly urged in the petitions of the people for an extension of the parliamentary suffrage, as well as'—(here follow the remaining words of the original resolution).

"Also to move that resolutions Nos. 4, 5, 6, and 8, be omitted."

And another by

"General JOHNSTONE.—To move amendments upon the 5th and 6th resolutions proposed by Lord John Russell:—

"5. That all salutary measures of improvement in the condition of the people, by a system of education or otherwise, should be accompanied by an immediate and entire revision of the Poor Law Amendment Act, it being proved beyond all controversy, that the object to be obtained by the promoters of those measures, namely, improving the condition of the labouring poor, by causing higher wages, and establishing independence of character, have signally failed.

"6. That it is repugnant to the feelings of Englishmen to be the object of compulsory emigration, which places the honest labourer in the same class with the reckless criminal, and implies the absence of one of the most congenial sentiments of the human mind, namely, the love of country, engendering at the same time an opposite feeling, and disregard of its laws and institutions."

Lord JOHN RUSSELL's speech occupied about two hours and a half in delivery. It was calm and grave in tone, marked by apparent earnestness of opinion and thought; and though, during its progress, it did not elicit any enthusiastic feeling, or spontaneous bursts of approbation, it was listened to with great attention, and on sitting down the noble lord was greeted with cheers from both sides of the House. Novelty of view there could scarcely be any, for the leading topics, arguments, and facts which compose Lord John Russell's speech, have been urged on the House of Commons again and again by Mr. Villiers, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, Mr. Milner Gibson, and the other able advocates of Free Trade in the House. But the speech was characterized by something of more importance than mere novelty of view; it is strikingly indicative of PROGRESS. Doctrines which three or four years ago were sneered at as falsehoods and fallacies, are now laid down by statesmen on both sides of the House of Commons as indubitable truths and facts. The advocates of Free Trade are no longer vulgar clamourers, seeking only their own selfish advantage. The cause has become identified with the largest and the highest interests of the empire; and if, in success, there be a godlike revenge for by-past contumely and reproach, Messrs. COBDEN and BRIGHT are receiving satisfaction—a satisfaction which will be ampler ere long—for the endurance, the toil, and the self-denial which led throughout the country, to sow those seeds which are now so fast ripening in the Legislature. Even the only objectionable portion of Lord John Russell's speech—that part where he clung to his fixed duty—is itself strikingly indicative of progressive movement. It proclaims the fact that the eight shillings which the landlords spurned in 1841 is now utterly beyond their reach; and that, ere long, both sliding scale and fixed duty will vanish into the "thin air" of the past.

Lord John Russell, in his speech, went back anterior to the Revolution; traced the origin and progress of the national debt; pointed out the effect which Pitt's Bank Restriction Act of 1797 had on the condition of the labouring classes; sketched the history of our modern protective system, especially as applied to corn; and showed the benefits which had resulted from partial relaxations of our restrictive policy. He then looked at the condition of the labouring classes; showed that wages did not rise and fall with the price of corn, but that employment was most plentiful, wages highest, and the state of the working classes, in the agricultural as well as the manufacturing districts, best, when corn was abundant, and prices low:—

"We do not find," said the noble lord, "that where corn is high wages are high, or where corn is low wages are low. Among other evidence on this subject, I may mention a pamphlet written by a gentleman of the name of Kent, who advances a number of theories which I consider mistaken; but he gives a table, founded mainly on his own experience, which shows the amount of wages from the commencement of the war in 1792 to the present time. He proves that when the price of corn was high the increase of wages was very small; and, on the other hand, that when the price of corn fell, wages were higher in proportion than at any other time. I have in my hand his statement on the subject, and he supposes that a labourer ought to have the value of six pecks of wheat per week. This is very much the same as the calculation of Malthus, who tells us that in the middle of the last century, from, I believe, 1733 to about 1770, wages enabled the labourer to command nearly a peck every working day, or about six pecks per week. Mr. Kent informs us that, in 1792, when wheat was 42s. 3d. per quarter, the wages paid were 8s. 6d. per week. In 1795, when wheat had risen to 82s. 9d. per quarter, wages were still only 8s. 6d. per week. Thus when the labourer was able to command six pecks in 1792, in 1795 he wanted 12 additional wages to enable him to procure as much corn. In 1801 the price of wheat rose to 118s. 3d. per quarter, but did the price of labour rise in proportion? Certainly not. It rose only from 8s. 6d. to 10s. (Cheers.) In 1803 the price of wheat was 53s. 6d., and the wages 9s. 6d. a week. So again in later years. In 1831 the price of wheat was 42s. 2d., and wages 8s. In 1835 wheat was 39s. 4d., and wages still 8s. In 1840 wheat was 66s. 4d., and wages 10s. In 1841 wages were only 10s., while the price of six pecks of wheat was 12s. I believe that this statement will be borne out in most agricultural districts; and although wages have generally risen with the high price of wheat, and fallen with a low price, they have neither risen or fallen at all in proportion to the value of food. But let us consider what would be the probable effect of the introduction of foreign corn. My belief is, that the introduction of foreign corn to any considerable extent would lead to such an increase in our manufactures, that, although at first the price of corn would be low, there would soon be established a steady, fair, average price, quite sufficient to remunerate the farmer. It what I have stated be the effect of the Corn Law—if it injures all classes of the community—if it deprives the consumer of his bread—if it disappoints the farmer of his price—if it leads to careless and slovenly cultivation of the soil—and, finally, if it obliges the labourer to pay for his food a sum which he does not recover in the increase of his wages, I ask, what system can be worse, and what system will you adopt instead of it? (Cheers.) Various propositions at various times have been brought before the House. I have said that, in introducing my resolutions, my object has rather been to show the Government that they ought not to leave the Corn Law in its present state, than to offer any suggestion of my own. If I had any proposition to make, it would not be that I supported in 1841; but at the same time it would be a proposition for a fixed duty. (Cheers.) My opinion is, that, after all the discussion which has occurred, we could not now fairly and reasonably propose the 8s. fixed duty of 1841."

Sir J. GRAHAM: How much then?

Lord JOHN RUSSELL: The right hon. baronet asks how much? My answer is, that it is no great matter; 8s. would certainly be more than I should now propose; nobody has gone lower with a fixed duty, I think, than 4s.; and 4s., 5s., or 6s. would be the duty I should recommend. (Cheers.) Other propositions have been—first, to have an entire remission of all duties at once; an immediate abolition of all Corn Laws; another was that there should be a vanishing scale of duties—say a duty of 10s. or 8s. per quarter, which should go down in a year until it became a duty of 1s. or 6d. In the inquiry into the case of the hand-loom weavers, Mr. Jones and Mr. Senior were the principal parties, and they gave their reason against the present Corn Law; they afforded evidence as to the feelings and interests of the manufacturing classes, and particularly as to the effect of the Corn Law upon the hand-loom weaver. They said that the best way to alter it would be by a vanishing scale, and another way would be by a smaller fixed duty; and they mentioned 4s. as a duty that might be proposed. Upon comparing those two propositions, my own opinion is, that a small fixed duty would be the preferable proposal of the two, because a vanishing sea has the disadvantage of change in the amount every year. However, if I were asked whether I think that it is desirable to have any duty on corn at all, I should say, as an abstract question, that it certainly is not. (Cheers.) Corn is one of the worst articles you can tax; but in making changes in your commercial policy, I know the evil that is produced by a sudden alteration. It is said, if this is an evil, why not at once abolish it? The same argument might be used with respect to a person who for many years of his life, perhaps until he has reached sixty or seventy years, has been in the habit of using a stimulating diet, and indulging in intoxicating drinks. Nobody would say that was a wholesome mode of living; every one, on the contrary, would say that if he had begun by abstaining from intemperance he would have been a stronger man; but the skilful physician would not advise his being taken entirely and at once from his long-accustomed habits. (Hear.) That there may hereafter come a time, as there has done with regard to wool, when the population, and commerce, and manufactures may require a total abolition of all duty, I should not deny; but I should say the scale you could adopt with a view to the interests of the country, and that which would at once give the greatest relief, and inflict the slightest amount of evil, would be such as I have mentioned. (Hear.)

After going through his various propositions, and showing that, without improving the physical condition of the people, we could do but little to elevate their moral or intellectual state, Lord John Russell concluded in the following manner:—

"Whether I may be right in the propositions which I bring forward or not, one thing I do ask of you is, to consider this matter in a time of calm, and with that view I call upon the House to adopt this first resolution, which I now, Sir, place in your hands:—That the present state of political tranquillity, and the recent revival of trade, afford to this House a favourable opportunity to consider of such measures as may tend permanently to improve the condition of the labouring classes." (Cheers.) Adopt that resolution, and add to it any further resolutions you may think fit, according to your own principles and your own views of what the interests of the country require. But, whether you do so now or not, my thorough belief is, that our laws will not remain long in the state in which they now are—that the condition of the people of this country does require legislation, not for a purpose which I should think a most inconsiderate attempt of this House—to provide directly for the well-being of all, but for the purpose of relieving, as far as you can, the people from all the restraints and all the evils which your own legislation has imposed. (Hear, hear.) It is for this purpose, then, that I now put this first resolution, Sir, into your hands." (The noble lord resumed his seat amidst loud applause from both sides of the House.)

After Mr. Sharman Crawford had proposed his amendment,

Sir James Graham rose, and made what, in technical or official language, would be called a "reply" to Lord John's speech. Yet the House Secretary was very tedious in enforcing the noble lord's views. A large portion of his speech was occupied in proving that Sir Robert Peel's partial relaxations of the restrictive system had been of great benefit to the working classes—that the lower prices of bread, beef, sugar, and so forth, brought about by good harvests and new tariffs, were of signal service to the community at large! In one portion of his speech Sir James Graham enforced, with redoubled effect, one of the well-known Free-Trade arguments which Lord John Russell had used—namely, that drawn from the fact of the rapid increase of the population. Said the House Secretary:—

"The noble lord had truly stated that the increase of the population of the country had been absolutely miraculous. The noble lord said that the rate in the increase of the population was 200,000 a year, but he (Sir James Graham) believed that it was proved by the last population returns that the population was increasing at the rate of 381,000 a year. (Hear.) He believed that, since her Majesty's present Government accepted office, not less than 1,500,000 had been added to the population of this country. He begged the House to reflect on this. The population of the two Canadas did not exceed one million, the population of Holland was 2,800,000, and the population of Switzerland was about 2,100,000. There had then actually been such an increase during the four years in which we have been charged with the conduct of affairs. He merely alluded to this to show the effects that would arise from this cause, and he wished to show that it must add to the difficulties in the government of this country. This was a fact in reference to which all commercial and financial legislation must be directed, and a fact which they would fail in their duty if they did not admit as bearing on the future policy of this country. (Hear, hear.) He repeated, that the increase in the population, during the last four years, had been an increase of more than one half above the population of Canada, and of more than one-half of the whole population of Holland or Switzerland. It was impossible not to admit that the wants of such an increasing population must also increase, and that care should be taken to adopt such steps as would adequately increase the demand for labour, and in such a way as not to lead to the lowering the rate of wages."

The right honourable baronet then proceeded to contrast the condition of the manufacturing districts and the labouring classes in 1811-42, years of scarcity and dearth, with the past and present years of "cheapness and plenty." The facts are so important, and so clearly establish the case of the Free-Traders, that we give them unabridged:—

"I will recede to the recollection of the House the condition of the manufacturing districts when her Majesty's present Ministers came into office. I will not dwell upon the year 1811. I will not go especially to the year 1842, when, as my right hon. friend at the head of the Government has more than once told you, nearly the whole of the population of the town of Paisley was out of employment, and when it was our painful duty to be under the necessity of administering to the wants of the population: That is but a single instance of the distress which prevailed in the years 1811 and 1812. The town of Stockport was in a condition hardly less painful than that of Paisley. I will just advert for one moment to the report which I hold in my hand, showing the state of affairs in 1841, and then contrast it with the state of the manufacturing districts at the moment when I am addressing you. In the report of the factory commissioners, in 1841, I find the following statement:—'I regret to say that the depression which I stated in my last report to be prevalent among the mill occupiers and their workpeople has in no degree abated, but, on the contrary, has, I fear, increased. Wherever I have been I have heard the same sad tale, with very few exceptions, that trade is in a state of extreme depression, and without any distinct prospect of improvement. Within the last four months several bankruptcies have taken place among the mill occupiers in my district. In four of these cases the aggregate number of persons suddenly thrown out of employment amounted to 1720, and a sum of £850 paid weekly in wages was withdrawn.' I will not go through the whole of the statement, but will now turn to another passage, showing the state of affairs in the district generally. The following letter was from Mr. Horner, dated May 1, 1844:—'The cotton trade is in a state of great activity; new mills are building, others long unoccupied have been taken by new tenants, and in some places it is difficult to find workers. There is also a much more prosperous state in the woollen mills. It is otherwise in the flax-spinning mills; there we have great complaints of bad trade; some are working less than twelve hours a day, and some are entirely stopped. There is great activity in the factories, especially in the cotton-mills. In many places large additions have been made both of buildings and machinery to existing mills, and several entirely new mills have been built and are now in progress. I not only do not hear of any persons being out of employment, but that in some places hands are scarce. One mill occupier, who employs a large number of hand loom weavers, has stated that he is paying them fully 30 per cent. more than he did twelve months ago, and that this advance is general for most descriptions of work.' In January last Mr. Horner was in Oldham, and visiting a large factory, the owner said to another large millowner who came with Mr. Horner (the subject of a school), 'I wish you could send me some hands, for I have 12 looms standing idle for want of them.' Mr. Saunders, in a letter to Mr. Horner, dated Halifax, the 12th instant, although unable to give any information as to 1840, sends some statistical tables relating to the Yorkshire part of his district, from which it appears that, while in 1838 there were 81,510 persons of all ages employed in the factories there under his inspection, of whom 11,179 were children, in the same factories there are now employed 114,838 persons of all ages, of whom 15,483 are children—showing an increase of above 33 per cent. in the case of the children, and about 37 per cent. in the case of persons of all ages. Mr. Clements states in his letter:—'First, as regards cotton-mills, a friend of mine has inspected the books of a good average mill in Burnley, from which the following result appears:—

"During the five weeks ended May 3, 1845, the mill hands worked 30 days, and received

"During the five weeks ended April 30, 1842, the same number of hands worked 19 days and received

"Difference caused by working short time £138 1 7"

In addition to this the House ought to take along with this improvement the decrease in the price of the necessary articles of life. The measure of flour, which in Birmingham cost 5s. 2d. last year, costs now but 4s., exhibiting a decrease of 20½ per cent. I can assure the House I have instituted very copious inquiries upon the subject of mill-labour and the labourers' condition, and I find that the wages received by them and their families have increased on an average from 40 to nearly 45 per cent.; and, with the exception of one or two towns, I am informed there is a pretty general average increase. The returns received from Newcastle were varying but encouraging. The wages of artisans and labourers have altered very little; any change there has been in the last five years has been in the way of increase, and workmen generally are now well employed. The shipping trade is good. Customers complain that their concerns are not profitable; over-production is the obvious cause. The following was an extract from Sheffield:—'The years 1840, 1, 2, and 3 were eminently years of bad trade. From 1500 to 2000 workmen, with their families, were upon the poor-rates. Trade revived in 1844, and in most of the trades the prices given for work have advanced; but the time during which the men are allowed to work by the unions has been greatly diminished; most of the trades working only seven hours a day, many not more than six.' The following letter had been received from Liverpool, dated April 24, 1845:—'In the years from 1840 to 1844, we could get hundreds of workmen at any wages we had the conscience to offer; now we have scarcely an application. To give you a better idea of the state of the mechanical population, I send a statement of wages paid by us during the six years for the nearest weeks to April 20:—

Week ending April 18, 1840	£303
16, 1842	260
22, 1843	242

I have had a statement put into my hands by an official gentleman, stating, on an average, the amount of wages paid in one factory, in a corresponding week of each of the six last years. In 1840, it was £303; in 1841, £195; in 1842, £260; in 1843, £250; and, in 1844, £399; being the amount of wages paid to the same number of hands. In all these cases, too, hon. members should look to the considerable advantages these working people were deriving from reduced prices of articles of necessary consumption. In the agricultural districts, too, wages had been rather improving, and in the greater number of the agricultural counties the wages had increased so as to afford the labourer a great command over many of the essential articles of living. The noble lord has well observed, that the sun had more to do in these matters than legislation. I admit, certainly, that a population like ours cannot be afflicted by a greater curse than a failing harvest, and I am as ready to acknowledge that, without the blessing of Providence upon our seasons and harvests, all legislation must prove comparatively inoperative; yet, when I read to you from the list of articles their prices in the year before this Government came into office and in the present year, I am disposed to believe you will permit me to trace much of the present low prices to the effect of legislation. It is a statement of prices in London, in the first week of April, in the years 1840 to 1845 inclusive, exemplifying the comparative expense of living in those years of the artisan and labouring population:—

Wheat, per qr.	s. d. 68 7	s. d. 46 5
Barley, per qr.	.. .. 40 0	32 6
Oats, per qr.	.. .. 25 9	21 4
Flour, per quartern.	.. .. 0 11	0 8½
Oatmeal, per quart.	.. .. 0 6	0 5
Beef, per lb.	.. .. 0 6½	0 5½
Mutton, per lb.	.. .. 0 6½	0 6
Pork, per lb.	.. .. 0 7	0 6
Bacon, per lb.	.. .. 0 7	0 6
Lard, per lb.	.. .. 0 7	0 7
Sugar, per lb.	.. .. 0 7	0 5
Coffee, per lb.	.. .. 2 0	1 4
Ten, per lb.	.. .. 5 0	4 0
Treacle, per lb.	.. .. 0 5	0 3½
Currants, per lb.	.. .. 0 10	0 6
Raisins, per lb.	.. .. 0 6	0 6
Candles, per lb.	.. .. 0 7	0 6
Coals, per cwt.	.. .. 1 8	1 4

There has been a very material decrease also in respect to the prices of clothing for all classes, with which I shall not trouble the House in detail, only to say that I find no increase in any one article.

Two-thirds of Sir James Graham's speech might have been spoken, with a very slight modification, by a second of Lord John Russell's motion. This fact is still more strikingly exemplified by the way in which the Government met it. Sir James Graham moved, as an amendment, "the previous question." It is by this loophole that the House escapes from any proposition to which honourable members dare not say "No," and are unwilling to say "Ay." The "previous question" neither expresses assent nor dissent. It simply declares that it is not convenient to put the motion to the vote at the present time. The whole House might be convinced of the truth contained in Lord John Russell's first resolution, yet, by the "previous question," a majority may be enabled to say "No," when the SPEAKER asks "That that question be now put." And this is the way in which the Government evade a "great fact."

Mr. Labouchere enforced the views of Lord John Russell; and, amongst two or three other speakers, there was a speech from Sir John Tyrell, whose "baldernash" was less amusing than usual, though proclaiming his want of confidence in the Government. The only other speech of the evening was one by Mr. Villiers, who spoke with much point and effect to the following purport:—

Mr. C. VILLIERS had listened with great anxiety to hear some answer from the right hon. gentleman (Sir J. Graham) and hon. members opposite to the resolutions of his noble friend, or some reason why he (Mr. Villiers) should not, as he proposed to do, outtrade himself upon the attention of the House, on some future occasion, as he had often done before; but he had heard nothing, either in the answer made to the resolutions, or in any intimation on the part of the noble lord, that would relieve him of the duty of again calling attention to what he believed to be the great cause of the distresses of all classes of the people. No one could dispute the great question his noble friend had raised as to the subject of protective duties—the question of the system of protection. (Hear, hear.) That was the question the noble lord had raised, however, when he said he wished to bring before the House the state and condition of the labouring classes, and then the remedy by which he proposed to improve that condition; and having alluded to many things which he said had tended to deteriorate the condition of the labouring classes, but over which Parliament had no control, he proceeded to point out the system pursued by the Legislature, which, he said, had contributed in a great degree to produce this result, and declare his opinion that on the Legislature, therefore, he depended for measures of improvement. (Hear.) He (Mr. C. Villiers) agreed with all that had been said as to the system of protection being the main cause of the evil; but he had looked to have that system defended, or, at least, that it would be attempted to be proved that the remedy proposed was impracticable. The right hon. baronet (Sir James Graham) had laboured to prove the great advantage to the community and the labouring classes, which he contended resulted from the diminution of the restrictive system. His arguments that restrictions were for the benefit of the labouring classes, were indeed arguments, as the hon. baronet opposite (Sir J. Tyrell) said, for the consumption of the House. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) The right hon. baronet the House Secretary had borne testimony in the House of Commons that night what were the effects of low prices, and had shown that low prices were a proof of abundance; and it he (Mr. C. Villiers) desired now to produce a witness at the bar, as was once proposed, to prove the same fact, he could not possibly have more satisfactory evidence than that which the right hon. baronet had that night given. (Hear, hear, hear.) They (he advocates of the repeal of the Corn Laws) wished to show what was the effect of low prices, which hon. gentlemen opposite told them was the terrible consequence of Free Trade upon the community generally; and the right honourable baronet had come forward and told them to-night (hear, hear)—the right honourable baronet told them that he was happy to announce that the labouring classes generally were well off; and he had contrasted the present period, when prices were low, with the years 1810 and 1811, when the price of food was high; and, having described the amount of distress and misery that existed in those years, had shown the effect of low prices in diminishing them, and in adding to the comforts and happiness of the poor. (Hear, hear.) The right honourable baronet had shown them that crime had diminished since food had become cheap, and crime, he had stated truly, was necessarily connected with poverty; and he had shown them, also, that wages had increased, not only in the manufacturing, but also in the agricultural districts (loud Opposition cheers); and he had shown them that in every village and in every parish the rate for the relief of the poor had diminished; that there were fewer people receiving parish relief, fewer out of employment, and much less destitution in the country than when the price of food was high. The right honourable baronet actually proved the case of the advocates of Free Trade (cheers), and he gave them the prices of the various articles of consumption, namely, of wheat, flour, meat, and sugar, and had shown the reduction in the price of each, and how that reduction affected beneficially the condition of the labourer. And this was the argument by which the question, whether the total abolition of all protective duties was not the means of improving instead of deteriorating the condition of the people, was met. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord (Lord J. Russell) had proved that the people were not advancing relatively with the wealth and prosperity of the country, and had told them that this was owing to their legislation, and it was in their power, by altering the system upon which they had legislated, to improve their condition. Now, this statement of the noble lord was useful, for it came at a time when many, from fear or benevolence, were always talking in that House of the poor, and suggesting some crotchet or remedy for the distresses of one branch of industry or another; but the noble lord said, "Away with all this pretence and affected sympathy for the poor, unless you relieve yourselves from the charge that for the purpose of promoting your own interests you are the cause of their deterioration." (Hear, hear.) The noble lord told them fairly that they upheld the present system because they believed it to be most conducive to their own interests. He said, "You, the Legislature, are the cause of the misery and distress of the poor, by passing laws to keep up the price of food." (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. C. Villiers) did not defend the noble lord's conclusion, in one respect, but he thanked him for having advanced, and given the weight of his authority to, the very measure which he (Mr. Villiers) would recommend for the benefit of the labouring classes, and of the people generally. (Hear.) The noble lord had shown that when they compelled the people to pay high prices for food, they were deprived of the comforts of life, and were rendered altogether incapable of providing education for their children. The noble lord had shown that by raising the price of food they injured and deteriorated the condition of the working classes, while on the other side no man upheld the price of food, he believed, except for the purposes of protection. (Hear, hear.) They raised the price of food by these protective duties, that was their purpose (hear, hear); and the right honourable baronet the House Secretary had told them what was the consequence of success in that object. He had shown them, that if they had high prices they would return to the state of 1810 and 1811, and if they did not succeed by their legislation in raising prices, and that was their grievance—that they did not get so much for their wheat by 10s. a quarter as the right honourable baronet had promised the present law would give, then they were disappointed, and complained of the Government. Those who advocated high prices, and those who witnessed the results of low prices, were mixed together—let them solve the question, they would, the country would look on and judge between them. The advocates of high prices were now about to withdraw their confidence from the Ministry, and why? Because they got 46s. a quarter for their wheat instead of 56s. (Hear, hear.) Did anybody doubt that that was the reason? (Hear.) And what was the natural and only conclusion?—that they could withdraw their confidence from a Ministry because they had not produced misery enough, crime enough, disease enough, and death enough. (Loud cheers.) He had expected to hear from the honourable baronet opposite, who had stood up as the advocate of high prices, that low prices had thrown the land out of cultivation and the labourers out of employment; but what did he say? Why, he told the House that the labourers were never better off; that he paid seventy labourers every week; that they had good wages, and were never in a better condition; and that this was at the period when wheat was at the low price that induced the hon. member for Essex to withdraw his confidence from the Government. (Renewed cheering.) Why were not protective duties to be abolished, and abolished immediately? Could anybody find any rational ground for upholding the protective system at all? If he collected anything from the noble lord's speech, it was that those duties should be abolished entirely and immediately. The whole of the noble lord's argument (though he did not say it in words) was to that conclusion. For what had he told them? He had shown that the result of the reduction of duties on wool and silk had been utterly groundless, and that none of these evils that had been expected from those measures had resulted, but, on the contrary, that all parties had been benefited. And was there anything in the wool duty that did not apply to corn? The noble lord was ready to abolish protection on manufactures. Why was he not equally ready to abolish protection on agriculture? That protection had led to the depression of agriculture was certain, for there was no interest more frequently complaining. They were complaining now; and he believed the farmers were ill used and deceived, but not by the Government or the House. That was an affair they must settle with their landlords. Agriculture had been depressed with 50 per cent. protection, as compared with 20 per cent. to other interests. With regard to a fixed duty, no one, he believed, would now say that a 1s. fixed duty would be more satisfactory than what he proposed—total abolition. (Hear, hear.) He was obliged to his noble friend for bringing forward this question; it required some courage to do so, for the House was not prepared or not disposed to entertain any such motion; but he thanked him for having brought the question forward, as he had prepared the way for his motion, when he should propose entire abolition to agriculture, and the removal of all that obstacle to the rest of the country which resulted from the present system. (Hear.)

As Thursday was Queen's birthday, the debate and the House were both adjourned to Wednesday.

THE DEBATE ON WEDNESDAY NIGHT.

Monday night was indicative of progress; but Wednesday night exhibited it in a more marked and striking manner.

But, before we notice the adjourned debate, we may briefly state a matter which preceded it.

Mr. Stafford O'Brien's bill for giving a drawback of the duty on malt used for fattening cattle stood for second reading. The member for Northamptonshire having urged his bill, as a great boon to the farmers, Mr. Cardwell, the Secretary to the Treasury, produced various communications from eminent scientific authorities, to show that the utility of malt for food had been greatly overrated, and that there was no means of securing the revenue by preventing such duty-free malt from being applied, not to fattening cattle, but to purposes of distillation. A short debate followed. Lord Howick advised the agriculturists to concur in admitting Egyptian beans and Indian corn duty free, which would effect all the objects desired, without injury to the revenue or to anybody. At last, seeing the feeling of the House decidedly against him,—even Mr. Bickham Escott denounced the bill as one of those petty schemes which "the farmers saw through and despised,"—Mr. Stafford O'Brien withdrew his bill, and so ended what, in the language of the member for Winchester, was another of those "delusive measures" intended to humbug the agricultural tenantry, for the vain purpose of making them believe that certain "friends" of theirs in the Legislature are still able to do a little special business for them.

The adjourned debate was then resumed, and brought out this same Mr. Bickham Escott in a somewhat remarkable way. It is of importance that our Free-Trade readers should be reminded of what and who Mr. Bickham Escott is. He is one of the Duke of Buckingham's members, and was brought in for Winchester on the interest of the high agricultural protective party. But though thus closely allied with the landed interest, and even dependent on it, he has always evinced a disposition to think and act for himself. It is clear that the Anti-Corn-Law debates have done much to enlighten his understanding, for he used to pay great attention to them. From time to time he has rebuked the protective zealots for the fatality of their conduct, the absurdity of their arguments, and the selfishness of their actions. But on Wednesday night he came out in a way which entitles him to be enrolled as an honorary member of the Anti-Corn-Law League. Turning to the agricultural members amongst whom he was sitting, he told them that they themselves had been mighty instruments in knocking out the keystone of the arch of protection. The whole country, he said, had been disgusted by the utter selfishness of their appeals to their own pockets, from Sir Edward Knatchbull and his marriage settlements, down to the Duke of Richmond with his salmon. Van, too, were their efforts, during the present session, to prop up the tottering fabric of protection, "by grace twigs for timber, and bad for cement!" If protection was not the means of raising the largest supply at the cheapest rate for the good of the community, then it could not be defended at all. But the most remarkable part of the speech of Mr. Escott was, where he showed that protection was a most serious injury to the farmer. The scarcity of keep for cattle was the present cause of agricultural distress. But, if the farmers were permitted to have all kinds of needs imported duty free, they might be enabled to supply themselves with abundant fodder, and thus accomplish one of the objects of good farming, that of easily maintaining a large quantity of live stock, whose carcasses would repay them in the market, and their manure on the farm. Yet, for instance, if the seed could be imported duty free, could be sown with little trouble, and scarcely any expense, and would supply abundant green crops at the very time when keep for cattle becomes scarce and dear. Warning with his subject, Mr. Bickham Escott told Ministers that they had not yet gone far enough in the direction of Free Trade; finality on such a subject as the welfare of the community was not merely ridiculous and absurd, but injurious and cruel; and all class legislation must give way before that increasing light, which was giving senators wisdom, filling the land, and penetrating even the cottage of the humble labourer! All this was spoken, not merely from the Ministerial but the Acquiescent benches—from the place where Stafford O'Brien, Miles, Banks, and others "of that ilk" are in the habit of congregating!

With the exception of a long and able speech from Lord Howick, in favour of immediate and unlimited Free Trade, the debate was not otherwise remarkable, until

Sir Robert Peel rose. And his speech was the crowning event of the debate. Sir John Tyrell had said, on Monday night, that the Prime Minister had forfeited the confidence of the agricultural party. Turning, therefore, to the agricultural benches, Sir Robert Peel, not in tones of timidity, but with a gesture of almost haughty defiance, told the landed interest that he did not know whether or not the Essex baronet was warranted in speaking as the organ of a great and powerful party, but, whether he did or not, he would not "exaggerate their confidence by any expression of regret or repugnance for the course he had pursued!" Those who recollect the debates in the dark and dreary years of 1841 and 1842, will remember that, before Parliament separated in the latter year, Mr. Cobden, in one of his remarkable speeches, exclaimed in tones which thrilled through the House, that the country was "drifting on to confusion without rudder or compass!" Sir Robert

Peel has now caught up the distant echo of that prophetic warning. On Wednesday night he told the landlords that in 1842 the State was in danger of convulsion, and their estates in risk of confiscation. "God grant," he almost shouted, "that similar times may not return again!" Boasting that, since he accepted office, instead of increasing he had diminished protection, he contended that the Corn Law and the Tariff of 1842, and the other measures which have since been adopted, relaxing the prohibitive system, were mainly instrumental in saving this country from a fearful crisis. But he went farther than this. The fourth and fifth of Lord John Russell's resolutions affirmed that Protective Duties were EVILS. To that proposition, said Sir Robert Peel, "I GIVE MY MOST CORDIAL ACQUIESCENCE." He agreed with Lord John Russell that the removal of Protection was a mere question of present expediency and of time. The Prime Minister concluded by declaring his firm conviction that the Free-Trade principles which he had partially endeavoured to carry out were perfectly sound, and to which they were determined to adhere; and, said he, "the most wise, the most prudent, and the most just course to be pursued, was not rashly or hastily to move forward, but to apply good principles with caution and deliberation, and thus most securely recommend them to all classes of this great country."

Thus, in 1845, Protection has its death-knell rung in Parliament by the Political Chiefs of the two parties into which the House of Commons seems to be divided; and the last heal is the most sonorous of all. Yet, in 1841, Protection was the Tree of Life in the midst of the lost lords' paradise. Protection was the vivifying sap which gave immortality to the British constitution. Protection was the huge elephant which bore the world on its back; it being forgotten that the gigantic beast stood on the humble tortoise, and the tortoise upon—nothing! Who, after the debate of Wednesday night, would ever despair of the ultimate triumph of great truths and principles, even though, for a time, they have the most fearful odds to fight against?

On the termination of the debate there were two divisions; but the numbers, on such an occasion, are the most minor part of the whole affair. It is the debate not the division, which is of prime importance. Nevertheless, we may mention that for Mr. Shannon Crawford's amendment there were 33, and 253 against it—majority 220; and on the "previous question" (i. e., that Lord John Russell's motion should not be put), there were 12 to 104—majority 78. A number of members, who had been out in the lobbies, the Library, and elsewhere, complained that they had been shut out from both divisions. But, as we have said, it is the debate not the division, which is of importance.

CLOSE OF THE BAZAAR.

The Bazaar, which for nearly three weeks continued to be the most attractive spectacle ever displayed in London, has finally closed; the decorations are taken down, and the goods removed. As all the accounts are not yet closed, we cannot state the results with perfect accuracy; but we have ascertained that rather more than £20,000 have been obtained for admissions and sales, independent of about £5000 in money contributed from various lighthouses, and of the unsold goods, which are reserved to stock the Bazaar that will be held at a later period of the year, in the Free-Trade Hall in Manchester. We copy from the Times a notice of the splendid festivities of the closing scene, which, regarded simply as a spectacle, was one of the most gorgeous ever exhibited in London, but which, as a manifestation of moral power, is without a parallel in the world's history. There were aggregated there ladies who, for 17 days, had devoted their time, their toil, and, we fear, their health, with unwearied assiduity, to advance the great cause of humanity and justice; ladies who had manifested an intelligence, tact, and spirit of self-sacrifice which cannot be too highly estimated or too gratefully remembered. They were not conscious of the capabilities they possessed until they found them developed in action by the force of circumstances. Everybody was willing to contribute everybody; and there was no need for administrative functions when all minds were animated by the same feelings, guided by the same principles, and directed to the same object. Collected together from all parts of the British islands, those who had never seen or heard of each other in their lives found themselves encircled by friends though separated by strangers, community of feeling becoming the basis for community of affection. Never was there such a perfect illustration of the Sallustian rule, "Idem velle atque idem nolle, eademque facere verba." (To like the same things, and to dislike the same things, that indeed is firm friendship!) for the best feelings of the heart were at once called into action by the mere force of association in the same glorious cause.

No one could gaze, as we have done for hours together, on the continuous stream in which the crowd flowed through the Hall, without being deeply impressed by the order, the forbearance, and the conciliatory demeanour of every individual in the vast multitude; women went about fearless of insult and children without danger of injury. It was a striking evidence of the improved culture and higher tone of moral feeling which the discussions and instructions of the League have infused into the public mind. It was a manifestation of the intellectual and ethical character which a great political movement assumes when kept free from the exacerbations of party. All who visited the Hall, whatever their former opinions may have been, left it with a conviction that the objects of the League are neither selfish nor partial, but tend equally to raise the physical comfort and the spiritual character of the British nation. It has been officially announced that the artistic character of the Exhibition will be discussed in the ART-UNION, by the gentleman who wrote the account of the Paris Exposition for that journal; and that two eminent artists have been engaged to prepare drawings, illustrating the most important articles of manufacture that have been displayed. We shall not interfere with this part of the subject farther than to say that, if the Bazaar answered no other purpose than showing the great advance which British artists and artisans have made in design within the last few years, it would have been worth ten times the cost and trouble of its preparation. But it subserved higher purposes even in relation to art; it showed manufacturers how much they may learn from each other in relation both to beauty of form and taste of pattern. The worker in iron has found that he can study with profit the productions of the manufacturer of lace; the printer has received valuable hints from the weaver; and the artist for the loom has profited by the artist for the hammer. The Exhibition gave overwhelming evidence of the immense value of the industry which we seek to set free from the fetters of monopoly. To emancipate such powers of production as those which here give proof of their existence and their importance would be to open a new field of greatness for the English nation, and to place Britain onward in that career of destiny to which our land has been specially called by Providence, as the great civilizer of the world, and the true benefactor of the human race. The voice of truth has declared that "Glory to God in the highest" can only be promoted by "Peace on earth, good will towards men;" but the common interests developed by Free Trade are the bonds of peace, and the common justice established by equal commerce is the firmest cement of good will.

This is the last number of the Bazaar Gazette, and we cannot devote it to a better purpose than pointing out to our readers the variety, the extent, and the importance of the industry which we seek to emancipate from the fetters of monopoly.

From the time we pass the splendid tapestry and carpets in the entrance hall, until we arrive at the less attractive, but not less useful, display of agricultural implements and other utensils on the landing-places of the staircase of departure, the visitors have constantly before their eyes evidence of the double blessing which commerce confers, by providing employment for producers and comfort for consumers. It is scarcely possible to avoid reflecting on the consequences that would follow, if the looms which weave these cloths, carpets, and dresses were stopped; if the furnaces that produced those magnificent castings of iron were blown out; if the hammers that wrought this splendid iron ceased to sound; or if the spindles that spun this yarn ceased to turn. How many families would at once be reduced to the deplorable condition of the risk-taker's home! We speak of no imaginary scenes; we have ourselves witnessed "the siege of Bolton," when monopoly blocked all the passages of food, and all the sources of employment, as effectively as a hostile army; we have seen the desolation of Stockport, when the strong men, willing to work, found that unjust laws prevented the making use of the primal property of nature, his thews and sinews, by withholding food to be given in exchange for the produce of his toil. The behest of that Almighty Being who, "in the midst of justice remembers mercy," is addressed to man after the fall, was, "In the sweat of thy brow thou shalt eat bread." Around us are proofs that the British artisan sows not the sweat of his brow; for our statute-book continues disgraced by laws which withhold the promised remuneration, and withhold the reward of bread. We feverishly ask those who have voted the Bazaar, ought the hands that have produced the wondrous fabrics you behold to be withered for want of remuneration? Ought the heads that have conceived and executed such rare specimens of beautiful conception and artistic execution to be turned from creating those forms of loveliness, which add no less to the general intelligence than they do to the material wealth of the country, to enter into a miserable scramble for a precarious existence? Every form of beauty displayed in the hall is a contribution to the general education of the country. It is as much said by the Roman poet,

"Ingenus didicisse libenter artes, Ensolit mores nec sinit esse ferus;"

which, for the benefit of the ladies, we translate:—
My noble art is intelligently refined,
And every coarse sense blotted from the mind.

There has not been one of the thousands who passed through the Bazaar that did not leave it wiser and better for the display he or she had just witnessed. In the machinery, they had seen the material strength of the country; in the exquisite designs wrought on the various articles, they saw its moral beauty developed; and in the casual observations made by the spectators around them, they must have been peculiarly unfortunate if they did not hear much which tended to increase their sense of the high average to which public intelligence has been raised. We were much gratified by finding that a large number of children had been brought by their parents to the Bazaar; not merely because this was a spectacle of unparalleled brilliancy, the like of which they may never see again in their lives, but because with their reminiscences of its brilliancy and its beauty will be permanently associated the great and good cause for which such unequalled exertions have been made. Monopoly has made itself felt and understood in the nursery; the memorable grange-and-lard debate has taught all the children who cry for butter on their bread that they are doomed to eat dry crusts, for the purpose of maintaining the kennel at Goodwood, and starving off the mortgages that impend over Stowe. The child who is stunted in his toffee and cut short in his allowance of sugar-plums can easily understand that this is done to maintain the sugar monopoly and swell the coffers of the lords of Mining-lane. If the Bazaar served no other purpose than to stimulate the curiosity of its juvenile visitors, and lead them to inquire the purpose and object of such a great National Exhibition, it would more than repay the time, toil, and money bestowed upon its preparations and management.

The subscription which has been commenced for the purchase of the beautiful fountain in the Colebrookdale collection, displayed in the lower saloon, has made considerable progress; and there is now little doubt that this splendid production of British art will become the permanent decoration of the Free-Trade Hall in Manchester. As this hall is now a very productive source of revenue to the League, it is the interest of Free-Traders to render it as attractive as possible. There are ample means for ensuring a supply of water, so as to exhibit the fountain in full play whenever it may be desired; and we deem it our duty to impress on all Free-Traders, but especially on those of Lancashire, the desirableness of securing for the League an article not only valuable in itself, but likely to become the fruitful source of permanent income.

The following is the description of Newhouse Farm, North Berwick, in the occupation of Mr. James Miller, which, as we mentioned in a former number of the Gazette, has been presented to the Bazaar by Mr. Henry Ashworth:—This farm, consisting of 39½ statute acres, is situated in one of the finest districts of East Lothian. It has a fine climate, with western aspect, and possesses very important features and conveniences, such as should belong to every farm, viz., fine central situation of the farm steading, houses, &c.; three well-distributed branches of public roads, leading out from farm offices, making easy access to all the fields; a fine large drain of water running the whole length of the farm, from east to west, with a considerable fall and supply of water, so that most of the fields may have have a watering-place for cattle. Every foot of the farm is arable, and upon a close subsoil; it is capable of carrying wheat, grass, oats, and barley, and only part of the land turns up soil. The rotation of crops is summer fallow, or turnips; dunged wheat; grass one or two years, and depastured both years; oats and wheat, on respective portions of the land; beans or turnips; dunged wheat. The farm has been all drained with tiles, in parallel drains, eighteen feet apart, previous to which turnips could not be grown, but now they are good. Thorough draining is the foundation of all improvement; without this essential, nothing on wet land can be well done. Mr. Miller, in a letter, states as follows:—"We are all in this district of country thriving on low prices of corn; if prices are low, rents are low in proportion; ill-regulated rents are at the root of all the mischief." Leases and corn-rents are essential to good husbandry.

In the model room is an improved chaff machine, by James Richardson, the justly celebrated agricultural implement manufacturer, of Manchester. This really useful and valuable machine, mounted on a neat cast-iron frame, is so simple and effective in its construction that it may be put into the most inexperienced hands without the liability of getting out of repair; the improved construction of the wheels increasing the power of the machine, and very much decreasing the labour—objects so essential in machines of this kind. The toothed rollers are worthy of notice; they have the advantage over all others in drawing forward the feed without intermission, for which Mr. Richardson deserves the greatest encomiastic from agriculturists. This masterpiece of a machine is registered, and is applicable either for hand, horse, water, or steam power. There is also a mill for kibbling beans, oats, &c., invented by the same gentleman. The merits of this mill consist principally in the construction of the rollers, which are cut diagonally, and made of the best wrought iron, case-hardened; they will stand re-cutting any number of times, and be equal to new, an advantage which cannot be had in mills made with cast-iron rollers. The feed is regulated by a small fluted roller, which conveys the grain between the other rollers, and prevents choking, and will kibble a bushel in ten minutes.

The model of a stith, or system of machinery for loading vessels with coal, sent to the model room from Stockton-on-Tees, is one of the most interesting articles in the whole Bazaar. The coals are brought by railway to the stith, and then lowered down, without being removed from the carriage until they come over the hold of the vessel, when the lower part of the carriage opens, and they are at once shot into the hold. By this ingenious contrivance a vessel is as easily laden as it has been hitherto to the mouth of the pit.

The agricultural contributions are found in the upper lobby, and on the staircase which lead the departing visitor to the door of exit, in Prince's place. They consist of "chaff cutters," which should be called "straw cutters," or "chaff makers," of "beam crushers," and "out crushers;" of churns—the hand churn and the upright churn—moved by wheel and lever power, a great improvement on what used to be. The "crushers" and "cutters," and several other valuable machines, are contributed by Mr. Richardson, of Manchester. Here there is coopers' ware for farmers—bushel measures, and such like; and near at hand there are contributions of different kinds of grain for the bushel measures. The Welling Free-Trade Club, near St. Albans, has sent two sacks of the best pile Ware malt; the Wheathamstead Free-Trade Association contributes a sack of fine white Bristol wheat, and also a sack of other white wheat. Charles Lattimore, Esq., of Wheathampstead-place, Hertfordshire, contributes two sacks of red wheat, of first-rate quality. On inquiring what was the particular recommendation of these contributions, or if they had any, we were informed that the wheat, so superior in quality, was grown on land which is by most farmers considered unfit for wheat, and that such land was made to produce it by cultivators who advocated Free Trade and feared no competition with the foreign corn grower.

The manuscript copy of Dr. Watts's sermons, transcribed with his own hands from stenographic notes, for the use of his mother has been sold at the book stall for 6s.

On Friday, the doors being opened at twelve o'clock, there had passed in and paid, at a quarter past one, 985; at two o'clock, 1634; at five minutes past three, 2651; at ten minutes past four, 3872; at five o'clock, 4452; at five minutes to six o'clock (rain pouring), 5051; at seven o'clock (rain still pouring), 5872; at five minutes past eight o'clock (the rain still coming down in torrents), 6783; at nine o'clock (the rain abated, but still dripping), 7222; at ten o'clock, when the doors were closed, 7337; add to which 300 persons admitted by free orders, and the total is 7657.

During the first hour on Saturday, 1030 persons passed into the body of the hall; fresh crowds continued to pour in throughout the day.

On Monday and Tuesday respectively, the numbers were greater than on any previous day, having each averaged 10,000 visitors.

Several lotteries came off on yesterday (Friday) morning, in the presence of W. J. Fox, Esq., of London; S. Lees, Esq., of Manchester, and others.

The Books of Costumes were won by (No. 31) Mrs. Clark, 33, Wood-street, Cheapside, London.

The Autograph Books by (No. 13) Miss Seale, London, and (No. 111) Mr. Edwards, Manchester.

The five Paintings by (No. 2) Mr. James, (116) Mr. Scott, (190) Miss Phillips, (31) Mr. Jackson, and (195) the Chairman of the League.

The Gold Watch was won by (No. 60) Mr. R. Soyle.

The Leeds Steam engine by (No. 135) Mr. F. P. Bankart, Clement's-lane, London.

The Fairy Glass was won by Mr. Watkins, Regent-street, London.

(From the Morning Chronicle of Monday.)

The brilliant and novel spectacle which now fills the interior of Covent-garden Theatre is deserving of some other kind of notice than that which, as journalists, we give, in our columns of news, to every public exhibition, in proportion to the amount of public interest that it may excite. The Free-Trade Bazaar—a somewhat unfortunate designation, perhaps, as it fails of conveying the idea of the absolute uniqueness characteristic of this exhibition—is not a mere spectacle, though, merely as a spectacle, it is not surpassed in beauty, attractiveness, and interest by any that our metropolis affords. It is a great social and political fact. It marks the breadth, depth, and force of public conviction on a question of profound social and political importance. It is by far the most decisive sign that the history of the Free-Trade movement has yet shown, not only of the resources, zeal, and sound judgment of the extraordinary association under whose auspices it is presented to the world, but of the extent and thoroughness with which Free-Trade principles have leavened the public mind.

We consider this Bazaar, taken in connection with the singular political movement of which it forms so conspicuous a feature, as a sign of the times well worthy of the attention of our statesmen of every party. As an indication of the progress of opinion, as a pledge of earnestness and determination in the assertion of opinion, it is more impressive than any kind or quantity of what we ordinarily call "agitation." No amount of public meetings, parliamentary petitions, or popular noise and excitement, could give so significant a demonstration of genuine power. The immensity of contributions, even yet continuing to arrive in quantities that far exceed the ability of the most skilful management to find room for them in the over-crowded stalls; the number and variety of the contributors, from the wealthy manufacturing and commercial capitalist, who gives by wholesale, as he makes and trades by wholesale, to the acts of household economy representing the toil of spare hours, painfully saved out of laborious days and short nights; the completeness with which all branches of our national industry—agricultural, manufacturing, domestic, and literary—are represented in this extraordinary museum; the evidences that everywhere meet the eye of the lucky interest which the women of Great Britain feel in a question which even the well-known contributions of their sex to the literature of political economy have scarcely yet withdrawn, in common estimation, from the category of the abstract sciences; the enormous expenditure of time, money, labour, and thought which must have been devoted to this undertaking, for many months past, in every part of Great Britain; indicate a quiet earnestness and force of purpose, of a kind such as has never before been displayed on any public question. The destination of the large pecuniary proceeds of this enterprise—to the carrying on of that business of agitation in which its promoters have attained so conspicuous a proficiency—is a consideration scarcely worth adverting to as an element of its political importance. Mere agitation, conducted with whatever talent, or sustained by whatever amount of money power, is not, in this country, by any means so formidable an agent of social and political change as many persons imagine. Here is the true "agitation" that which gives reality and potency to those external efforts to which the name is commonly restricted. In the settled purpose and conviction of the multitudes of whose zeal, money, and working power the Covent-garden Bazaar is the embodiment. The spirit which has animated all this mass of sustained and concentrated exertion is a spirit which no opposition can subdue, no failure dishearten, and no delay tire out. The writers and speakers of the League have laid much stress on the significance of this spectacle as an expression of our national industry, and a practical appeal to society against the monopoly and injustice of laws that narrow the market of that industry, and abridge its earnings. It amply deserves to be thus characterized, and cannot fail of having, to a large extent, the intended effect on public opinion. If, during the first few days of the exhibition, there seem something for a hypercriticism to object to on this head, in the pre-eminence of those better wares which represent only the industry of the hyndair, the criticism has long since become inapplicable. From day to day the Bazaar has increasingly assumed its higher and more interesting character, as a display of the resources and capabilities of British industry. The useful and intellectual are daily in larger proportion to the merely ornamental. Some of the most interesting and beautiful processes of our national manufactures, with which, except in the districts to which they are indigenous, the public are little acquainted, are shown in actual operation. The chefs d'œuvre of manufacturing skill and ingenuity are exhibited in saloons decorated with devices suggestive of the folly and injustice of artificial legislative restrictions on the capital and labour whose combination has produced them. The most substantial implements and products of the rougher descriptions of industry; sacks of wheat of a quality, and grown at a cost, to mock protection; ploughs with Free-Trade mottoes, and all sorts of nameless novelties in the machinery of farm labour, bear silent but impressive attestation to the doctrine that "protection is the bane of agriculture." Of course, the higher meaning of all this is, in a great measure, lost on a large proportion of the multitudes that crowd to this spectacle as they would to any other that was sufficiently advertised. On most minds the impression produced is merely one of transient curiosity and wonder. Yet it is impossible that this extraordinary scene should not, to a considerable extent, and more or less rapidly, accomplish its designed effect on public opinion. Every thoughtful Englishman who visits the Bazaar must leave it with a somewhat heightened and enlarged idea of the industrial greatness of his country, of the wonderful wealth of resources, fertility of invention, and energy of perseverance that distinguish the people of this island. He will learn something that he did not know before, of the dignity and national importance of those branches of manufacturing industry which are most injuriously affected by the influence of fiscal restriction; and he will be less than ever disposed to credit assertions of the need of protection to agriculture itself. Without venturing to prophesy that this Bazaar will make even as many as a hundred useful and immediate converts to Free Trade, we are perfectly sure that it will put many thousands on the way to conversion. People may come out, as they go in, with the notion that the sliding scale is somehow the cause of the wealth and greatness of England; but they will be in a most excellent frame of mind for hearing argument to the contrary.

(From the "Art-Union" for June.)

Although it was the leading intention of the late exhibition at Covent-garden Theatre, which opened on the 12th and closed on the 27th of May, to obtain a large sum of money to advance the object of "the Anti-Corn-Law League, there can be no doubt that it has answered a purpose far more important and universal; for it has gone a long way to make the public acquainted with the capabilities of British commercial art, and to show that place of art which has immediate reference to trade. No circumstance has ever occurred in this country so directly tending to augment "the Mercantile Value of the Fine Arts." The occasion not only brought to London a large mass of wealthy and influential individuals, influential as in a great degree guiding the tastes of hundreds of thousands of persons, but it brought them into intimate connexion with those whose opinions ought to have weight with the producers of manufactured articles; while, therefore, on the one hand, there is largely increased information as to what is doing, and what may be done—in the Manufacturing Districts, on the other there is an advanced appreciation of excellence and added desire to adopt the safest and surest means of attaining it. We deplore, indeed, that the Government of this country, declining, or at least delaying, to do that which has been so nobly, so effectively, and so profitably done in France; but we are willing to accept so great a boon from any hands; and we are bound to consider that, be the motive what it may, this "Bazaar" will have given a great impetus to British Manufacture as deriving value from British Art.

It was utterly impossible for any visitor to move about the living mass which thronged the theatre without computing every now and then some proof that, after all, they do not "manage matters so much better in France." France, at its national "Exposition," fostered by the King, patronized by the nobility, and aided by the people, "pour le plaisir," furnished no "stalls," so unimpeachably excellent as some of those to which we refer. We must, for the present, be content to leave this assertion unsupported by proof; but the proof we shall have to supply next month.

It is our intention to publish with our next number an ample Report of the "Industrial Art" contained in this Exhibition; we design to issue it in the manner of those parts of the Art Union which we last year devoted to the Exposition in Paris, and which gave very general satisfaction; having proved indeed practically useful to several English manufacturers, by suggesting valuable hints for the improvement of their productions.

We shall largely illustrate this article, introducing into it wood engravings of all the principal objects which derive value from the influence they receive from fine Art; and, at the same time, we shall endeavour to render the report interesting, by engraving several of the "stalls" at which the more important of the manufactured productions were arranged and exhibited.

We shall thus, we trust and believe, be pursuing that plan which, of all others, is the best calculated to advance the interests of the Fine Arts, by showing how continually and how effectively they may be made to advance the Useful Arts, augmenting the value of manufactured articles sometimes a hundred fold.

We know that the manufacturers, generally, are now perfectly aware of the immensely beneficial they may derive from the artist. It shall be our duty to make this manifest more and more; to reiterate the important truth again and again, labouring unceasingly to obtain for Great Britain the advantages which have followed the alliance between the Fine Arts and the Useful Arts in every other country of Europe.

We have only to add that the descriptive matter will be written by the gentlemen to whom we are indebted for the articles published from time to time in our journal.

under the title of "The Mercantile Value of the Fine Arts," and the Report of the Exposition in Paris, which occupied two extra numbers of the Art Union last year. The Engravings will be drawn on the wood by Mr. J. A. Hammersley and Mr. William Stewart, Assistant Masters of the Government School of Design; engraved principally by Mr. J. Bastin.

FREE-TRADE PROMENADE.

(From the Times of Thursday.)

The glories of the Anti-Corn-Law League Bazaar have departed. Last night witnessed a final muster of its patrons, before the dispersion of its manifold attractions at the call of the more customary, if not more "legitimate," occupants of Covent-garden Theatre—the scene-painter, the musician, and the ballet-master. In a word, the Free-Traders held a sort of soirée, or "final promenade," as it was called on the tickets, in the arena which has during the last few weeks been the scene of their great display. The proceedings of the League Bazaar, which began with business, ended in festivity; and many hundreds—perhaps thousands—of persons assembled yesterday evening in the theatre, as a sort of final triumph of mutual congratulation on the success of this last gigantic scheme of the enemies of the Corn Laws. It should be said that this meeting differed from all the previous ones of the same promoters, in being—albeit such numbers were there—private. The public generally were not admitted on payment of money, but only the friends and the friends' friends of the Leaguers were allowed on this occasion to participate in their final glorification. Nominally, we believe, the fête, or promenade, was given in honour of the fair dances and dances who, since the opening of the Bazaar, have, for the sake of the good cause, stood the gaze of the miscellaneous public in the performance of their duties as saleswomen at the different stalls. With this object perhaps it was that the entertainments were of a somewhat more gay and trivial character than might suit the taste or harmonize with the prejudices of the prim-sectarians who form a large proportion of the constituency of the Anti-Corn-Law League. To the same fair influence we may attribute the engagement of the ubiquitous Jullien and his band, and the performance of profane music and all sorts of polkas and other shocking things of that kind. Nay, to the attractions of the fair objects of the fête, or perhaps of the fête itself, even the most prim and rigid of them all seemed to succumb. There were to be seen among the gay throng the sadly of all sects, even the most ungodly. Side by side with the Independent minister might be seen the Unitarian, and in a far corner was to be detected a Wesleyan looking on with astonishment at the profane vanities above and around him; but worse than all seemed to be those who in the tariff of sanctity stand at the highest rate of import duty when the gaieties of life are concerned—shocking to relate, there were to be seen a dozen or so of dashing young Quakers, in "cut-away" coats with diminished collars, white waistcoats, and unexceptionable kid gloves; and these were really the exponents of the assembly, meeting their reward in the smiles and sly gaiety of their proverbially pretty partners. Of such materials was this Free-Trade fête composed; even the age of iron felt abashed from the obligations of their sanctity by the superior virtue of the Anti-Corn-Law agitation—the broad shield of the League covered them all. And to say truth, in spite of some few incongruities, and some singular varieties of the social animal presented by the different groups, the affair went off extremely well. The body of the hall had been cleared of the different stalls, their place being supplied by Jullien's band, and also by a very pretty fountain, which diffused a pleasing coolness through the looser or stiffer end of the throng. A very few of the most remarkable objects which have been exhibited during the existence of the Bazaar were retained, but the greater part of the boxes were filled with company. The Chinese lanterns, however, still shed their light upon the Gothic hall. In addition to these sights, and to the sounds produced by Mr. Jullien and his party, there were the more substantial attractions of tea, coffee, ices, lemonade, and other more satisfying sundries, all provided at the expense of the promoters of the festivity. The chief occupation of the guests was in walking about, listening to the music, or gazing at the chiefs of the League, who were scattered among the gay crowd—the Dr. Boxings, the Thompsons, the Moores—not to omit Mr. Fox, Dr. Price, and some other well known gentlemen. All this occupied from about 7 until nearly 11, when some one more light-hearted than the rest proposed dancing. The proposition was received with very general acquiescence, and the fair portion of the guests were in a decided flutter. But, alas! there is a sliding scale, it seems, in society, though the Leaguers do not recognise it in corn. Some of the guests who had been induced to enter a theatre to them synonymous with the scene of sin and its penalties—because it bore the name of a Bazaar, had taken care to secure their own eternal welfare by leaving before the music began. Others, less rigid, had stopped to hear the music, and to see and wonder at Mr. Jullien's energetic fantasies, but felt their hearts sink within them at the bare idea of a dance. So there was some debate as to the proposed gaiety. Dr. Price was the spokesman of these anti-saltatory scruples, mounting the platform so lately occupied by the fiercely graceful Jullien and his band, and suggesting that there were many present who ought to be dancing, and would be obliged to leave. A sensible cry of "Let them leave, then," was unheeded, until Mr. Fox, like a true peace-maker, declared himself a friend to "free trade" in "hops," which joke immediately brought harmony in its train. Miss Scholla Novello, Mr. Novello, and some other vocalists, then volunteered songs, to the great delight of the party, and these were kept up till nearly midnight; after which, pursuant to a suggestion of Mr. Fox, those who were for a dance renewed their clamour, the conventional having left the theatre, and for aught we know they may be dancing to this hour. Altogether the promenade went off very well, and proved an appropriate finale to this great experiment of the Anti-Corn-Law League—an experiment which it is said, has attracted to the theatre nearly 10,000 persons daily since the opening of the Bazaar.

BAZAAR STEWARDS' DINNER.

On Thursday last the Stewards of the Bazaar, and other friends of Free Trade, dined together in the large and elegant room of the Pier Hotel, Cheyne walk, Chelsea, to celebrate the recent successful exposition of British industry in Covent-garden Theatre. G. Thompson, Esq., presided. Mr. T. Falvey occupied the vice-chair. The dinner and wines were of the first description; and the whole arrangements were highly creditable to the proprietor of the establishment, Mr. G. Field, steward of the Free-Trade Club.

The CHAIRMAN (after the usual loyal toasts) proposed the health of the ladies and gentlemen who had assisted in the recent demonstration; and, in the course of an eloquent address, pointed out the important influence which the Bazaar would exercise upon the great cause in which they were all engaged.

The CHAIRMAN proposed "The Council of the League," and called upon Mr. Falvey to respond to the toast.

The VICE CHAIRMAN proposed the health of the Chairman, and took an able review of the career of that gentleman as the successive advocate of popular education, negro emancipation, Free Trade, and the rights of British India; and stated the determination of the Free-Traders of Southampton to avail themselves of his services in the Senate upon any future occasion.

The CHAIRMAN, in returning thanks, attributed his success to having resolved in early life never to advance any cause that was not based upon the eternal principles of truth and justice. Mr. Thompson then proposed the health of the Vice Chairman.

Mr. FALVEY returned thanks, and proposed the health of Mr. Jenkins.

Mr. JENKINS, in returning thanks, entered into an interesting description of the cheering prospects of the Free-Trade cause in Wales.

The VICE CHAIRMAN proposed "Success to the Free-Trade Club."

Mr. EVANS (Secretary of the Free-Trade Club) returned thanks.

The CHAIRMAN, at the request of several gentlemen present, entered into a statement of the advantages presented by the club to metropolitan and provincial Free-Traders.

"Mr. Cox and the Free-Traders of Sussex," "Mr. Lyons and the Free Traders of York," "The Commercial Value of the Fine Arts," and several other appropriate toasts having been drunk, the meeting separated.

THE AGRICULTURAL MIND.

(From the Paris Charmant.)

There is at this moment an Agricultural Congress sitting in the Luxembourg. M. Decazes is the president, because M. Decazes is an owner of ironworks.

It has been said that agriculture is a calm and tranquil profession, the friend of repose, not wishing to be talked of. There are many academicians who invent this, when speaking of people devoted to tillage—the pragmatic agriculturists.

It is high time to reduce this pastoral paradox to its true value.

I know nothing less calm, less tranquil, less the friend of repose, than a farmer. If the Government wish to charge me with the execution of a statue of Agriculture for the Luxembourg-gardens, I would request her with a head-dress of serpents, like Typhon of Egypt.

No poet has ever thought of saying "the peaceful farmer," the peaceful peasant, the peaceful husbandman, and yet what a difference between these and farmers!

Did you ever hear a locksmith complaining? See what phlegmity the peasant eats his morsel of cheese, and drinks his wine at noon! The blacksmith, on the other hand, ever set your foot into it—once without hearing his merry song amidst the crash of his hammer?

Those are what I call peaceful people.

The farmer, on the contrary, is a Vesuvius, an Etna, a Chimborazo, ever in eruption. He has always something or something to abuse: now it is the rain, now the seed, and now the sun. What one sells him to-day, he pays for dear for, and what he sells is always too cheap. I end by believing that beans and barley infect men with hydrophobia.

If a man becomes connected in any way with the earth, he grows instantly fierce and monomaniacal. The husband who lives up to the elbows in blood, has a puffy face and a smile full of goodness; the labourer is sensible, rose, taciturn, a man who never laughs.

If the farmer is capacious, discontented, and jealous, what shall we say of Agriculture herself? The history of the science, which Virgil celebrated in soft strains in the "Georgics," is nothing but a long string of faults and mistakes—we will not say crimes, if we did our peasant agriculturists would tilt at us with pitchforks.

Agriculture as represented by Agricultural Congresses, has always tried to hamper all advances in the world.

When tobacco appeared, an agricultural congress decided the plant was poison! Coffee was poison, potatoes were poison.

The congress now sitting has not had the face to do for us a new theory of poison.

As a general rule, then, Agriculture is always crumbling.

If the King of the French were to go and sow the corn of St. Denis every spring after the Chinese fashion, Agriculture would still find out that honour enough to attend to it.

This year Agriculture demands the erection of a Ministry for herself. She could not think of being regarded with half a Ministry. In its two last sittings the Government has decided on submitting the following propositions to the Government:

1. No third melodramatic theatre, for that would hurt Agriculture.

2. No treaty against Belgian pirated editions, for that would hamper Agriculture.

3. No completion of the Place de la Concorde, for that would retard the progress of Agriculture.

It is only against the fortifications, which have encroached such a large space from Agriculture, that M. Decazes and Durbly have nothing to protest. As matters stand, they seem to these gentlemen a sufficient recompense, they have demanded that crosses or bouquets and gold medals be awarded to prize even and larded calves.

We, in our turn, demand that a cross crown of gold be decreed to the two chiefs of the Agricultural Congress.

PROMISE NOT TOO MUCH.—Let me not promise too much, nor raise too high expectations of my undertakings. I had rather men should complain of my smallness than of my short performances.—Blackie Hall.

THE CONDITION OF THE LABOURER.

(From a Correspondent of the Times.)

The following case conveys some insight into the mode in which agricultural labourers are "managed."—At the Belper petty sessions this week, Mr. J. Hickman, farmer, of Belper, appeared to his summons, to show cause why he refused to pay Mark Burgess, a labourer, 5s. 8d., claimed of him as wages due. Burgess said he was 27 years of age, and appeared to be an able-bodied labourer. For the last fortnight he had been working for defendant at 5s. per week wages, Sundays included, and had left a few days before. Defendant said he had engaged him at the above wages till hay time, and his having left before was the reason of his refusing to pay him. Burgess declared that he had not engaged himself for any particular time.

Mr. Hickman was ordered to pay the 5s. 8d. claimed, with magistrates' clerk's fees, 9s. 6d., which were paid.

It appeared that Burgess had been "a'lotted" at the beginning of last winter to Mr. Hickman, by the parish vestry, at three shillings per week wages, and that he had worked for him till a few weeks back. Three shillings per week was the price put on all single men at the said "a'lotment."

Mr. Matthews, one of the magistrates, thought such wages temptations to crime; it was not enough for a man to live on, and he was offered that or the poor house.

Mr. Style, the other magistrate present, expressed his disapprobation at such low wages being paid. He said, none people would do almost anything rather than go into a workhouse. He did not know why they should, but so it was.

Burgess—"I'd rather work at low wages than go into the house."

Hickman said he knew the wages were not enough, but it was the same as the rest paid.

Mr. Matthews—"There is no wonder at workhouses and evils being full; you drive people to crime—you hold out a temptation to it."

The Belper Association for the Protection of Property regularly keeps bloodhounds for the purpose of detecting sheep-stealers.

THE CONDITION OF THE LABOURING CLASSES—FOOD AND RAIMENT.

(From the Economist of May 21)

In the speech which Lord John Russell addressed to Parliament at the close of last session, when he first indicated his intention to draw the attention of the House to the condition of the labouring classes, and which resulted in the resolutions which the noble lord will propose on Monday night, he said:—

"If we look to the labouring classes—if we look to the condition of the soil or labour in the factories—if we look to the quantity of necessities which their wages will buy in the middle of the last century, and that which they can buy now—I think we must be convinced that they have not participated, in an equal degree, in the advantages which civilization and improved knowledge have conferred upon us."

The deterioration of the physical condition of the labouring classes has been long a subject of observation and regret on the part of all reflecting and humane men.

There has been, however, for more than half a century, a very extraordinary feature in the progress of the deterioration, and which Lord John Russell appears to have alluded to when he especially referred "to the quantity of necessaries which their wages will now buy." It has, during the whole of that period, been observed, and never more strikingly than of late years, that, notwithstanding the constantly increasing difficulty which the labourer has experienced in procuring a sufficient quantity of food, the general character of his clothing has been steadily improving. As the necessities of life have become scarcer and dearer, and more difficult to obtain, all articles of dress have become more abundant, cheaper, and of easier acquisition than at any former time; until at length this country presents a labouring population the worst fed, but the best clothed, of any in the world. And this, too, at a time when there are many countries in the world which are in every respect the exact reverse—who have grossly neglected dress, and clothing in great deficiency.

Accompanying this relative change during the last century, while provisions and food have been becoming continually dearer, and while clothing has been growing steadily cheaper, it is not the least remarkable fact, that the employed in producing the dear class of commodities have been constantly poor, complaining, and distressed, while one manufacturer, who have been every day making their articles cheaper and reducing their prices, have grown wealthier beyond any precedent in this or any other country. While the farmer has made so little progress in his art, that even the increasing prices of his produce have not made him rich, the manufacturer has improved so rapidly that, first and great as the reduction of the price of his goods has been, the reduction of their cost, and the increase of their consumption, have been even greater.

In alluding to this subject some eighteen months since, we took occasion to illustrate it by a reference to the value of the value of the leading articles of agricultural produce, and the value of the leading articles of manufactured products, as exhibited by the difference between the official and the real or declared value of the goods entered at our Custom-house for exportation. As it may not exactly understand the difference between the two rates of value, it may be well to explain it. In 1694, the value at the time of every article was ascertained as nearly as possible, and an account of every article exported was taken at that period, calculated at that rate. In the century which followed, it was found that prices had so much risen, that the entries made by that rule, would not represent the actual value of our exports. To remedy this, merchants were compelled to declare the actual value of their goods at the time of shipment; and the two rates of value have been continued to the present time.

We have already understood that the official value, being a value calculated at the same rate, is a correct criterion of quantity, while the real value shows the changes of price in relation to quantity; and consequently the difference between the two rates of value at any time will show whether an article has risen or fallen in price, and by how much. For example: in 1842 the whole of our exports amounted to £115,488,012, according to the official rate of value; but the same by the "real or declared value" amounted only to £47,012,651; showing that the goods that in 1694 were worth the former sum are now reduced to the latter sum, being a fall in price 58 per cent. While this affords us a criterion of the change of value of all our products, it also affords us an opportunity of comparing the relative changes of the value of particular articles.

For the purpose, then, of comparing the progress of the price of articles the produce of agriculture, and of the products of our manufacturing skill, we have constructed the following table from the official accounts of our exports in 1840, 1841, and 1842, showing:—

The Official and Declared or Real Value of the Chief Articles of Agricultural Produce, and of Manufactures and Minerals, exported in the years 1840, 1841, and 1842—Showing the Change which has taken place in each, since the Official Value was fixed.

Articles of Produce.	Official Value.	Real declared Value.
Wheat and Flour	150,000	200,000
Barley	100,000	150,000
Oats	50,000	75,000
Rye	20,000	30,000
Peas	10,000	15,000
Beans	10,000	15,000
Linseed	10,000	15,000
Turneps	10,000	15,000
Other	10,000	15,000
Total	300,000	400,000
Percentage of real value on official value		133 per cent.
Articles of Manufacture and Minerals.	Official Value.	Real declared Value.
Cotton manufactures	100,000	150,000
Woolen manufactures	100,000	150,000
Iron manufactures	100,000	150,000
Other	100,000	150,000
Total	400,000	600,000
Percentage of real value on official value		150 per cent.

We have thus taken out of the list of exports the leading articles of agricultural produce for three years, 1840, 1841, 1842, the value of which we find would have been, in 1694 (150 years ago), £1,577,993, but which have now increased to a value of £3,778,321, being an advance in price of 143 per cent.

We have also taken out some of the leading articles of manufactures for the same time, the value of which we find would have been, in 1694, £267,636,717, but which are now reduced to a value of £207,173,382, being a reduction in price of 60 per cent.; thus showing that, while manufactured goods and minerals have fallen considerably more than a half, agricultural produce has much more than doubled its value.

The following are the accurate results:—A quantity of agricultural produce which, in 1694, was worth £100, would, at the present price, be worth £243; while a quantity of manufactured goods which, in 1694, was worth £100, would now only be worth £60; so that a quantity of agricultural produce which, in 1694, would have exchanged for £100 value of manufactures, would, at the present relative value, command the same quantity that would, at that period, have sold for £160. Or a quantity of manufactures which, in 1694, could have exchanged for £100 value of agricultural produce, would, at the present relative value, command only the quantity which would then have been worth £160. 9s. 2d. These are the general results of the investigation. It may be curious and interesting to examine a few of the articles separately.

Butter and cheese have risen in price during that period 193 per cent.

Corn, flour, &c., have risen 161 per cent.

Cows have risen in price 209 per cent.

Horses have risen in price 267 per cent.

Wool has risen in price 169 per cent.

While cotton manufactures have fallen in price during that period 78 per cent.

Coals have fallen in price 60 per cent.

Iron and steel have fallen in price 45 per cent.

Linen manufactures have fallen in price 36 per cent.

And what is very curious, while wool has risen 169 per cent., woollen manufactures have fallen 10 per cent. in price.

It must be remarked that these calculations are in no way disturbed by any changes in the value of money during the interval, for whatever change in this respect has taken place refers as much to one class of articles as to the other. The comparison is equally true, whatever changes have taken place in the value of our currency.

Now, we have every reason to believe that, had the same progress in improvement been made in agricultural pursuits that we have seen in those of manufactures, a similar beneficial result would have been experienced, both as regards the producer and the consumer. There is no reason why skill, industry, ingenuity, and capital should not, at one and the same time, have given to man greater abundance of the fruits of the earth at a lower price, and with a larger profit to the producer, as the same combination of causes has done in the case of manufactures. And surely the attention of the Legislature could not be occupied with a more important inquiry than that which would determine the true cause why these highly-protected interests in all that respects improvement and progress, form so strange a contrast to those pursuits which do not rely upon protection.

But the facts to which we have now referred are well calculated to induce a more interesting and important comparison. During the period that manufactured goods have been so rapidly reduced in price, and while agricultural produce has been nearly as rapidly rising in price, the rent of land has been rising even more rapidly. We had occasion, a short time since, to examine the title deeds of an estate in the neighbourhood of Leeds. In 1719, the annual rental was £310. 8s. 4d.; it is now £2050. The land is altogether used for ordinary agricultural purposes, and the present value of the estate is estimated at £150,000. The actual rental of the property has increased during that period about 600 per cent.; but the relative rental, that is, its power of purchase of manufactured goods, has increased much more. The original rent of £310. 8s. 4d. would now purchase, at the present prices, as much manufactured goods as would then have been worth £850, and the present rental of £2050 is, therefore, worth as great a quantity of manufactures as could have been purchased in the beginning of last century for the sum of £5100. So that, in fact, the relative increase of rent during that time, reckoned in its power of purchase of the products of manufacture, is as £310. 8s. 4d. then, to £5100 now. This is certainly an extreme case, but it serves to illustrate how much the progress of manufactures has added to the otherwise rapid increase of the income of the landowner; how much commerce and industry have done to render cheaper everything the landowner has to buy; how much legislative restriction, indolence, and ignorance, have rendered dearer everything he has to sell.

THE POTTERIES: STATE OF TRADE.—We hear, from all quarters, that the staple trade of this district—the manufacture of china and earthenware—is in a very prosperous and healthy state, the operatives in the numerous branches being in full employ at remunerative wages. With the revival of trade, the spirit of building has also revived; in all parts of the neighbourhood houses spring up, and, what is better still, there seems a demand for them the moment they are finished.—Staffordshire Mercury.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE SUGAR TRADE.—Since the alteration of the duty on sugar, our market has got a decided turn to the better; and its present prospects are such, as we expect, in a few weeks, to be able to report that the demand will be greater than the refiners can supply. On Wednesday last, the large sugar refinery occupied by Messrs. Cornall and Parker, in Roxburgh-street, with the range of dwelling houses to the west of the sugar house, were exposed by public roup, within the Twelfth hour, here, and, after a spirited competition between the present tenants and Mr. Archibald Kerr, writer, Glasgow, the great lot for the purchase of the whole was knocked down to Messrs. Robson and Co., tea merchants and general grocers Glasgow. We understand the new proprietors are shortly to take possession of the premises, for the purpose of manufacturing their own sugar for their various establishments in Scotland.—Glasgow Advertiser.

THE GAMP LAWS.—John Grantham, of Garscott, is imprisoned "during her Majesty's pleasure" in Bockingham borough goal, for not having paid a surcharge of £8 1s. 8d., made on him as double duty for having killed game without a certificate. He has already been in the goal three months. Some months since he was charged before the magistrate by one of the Duke of Buckingham's gamekeepers with having entered a hare in the hounds of Leamington, in the above borough. He was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of £5. 10s. After a fortnight's imprisonment the amount was paid, and the man liberated. A surcharge in double duty was then made on him for having killed game without a certificate, and a distress warrant issued for the amount, £8 1s. 8d. This money his goods would not realize, and he was in consequence committed till it was paid.

SENSE AND NONSENSE.—At a meeting of landowners and tenant-farmers recently held at Stafford, for the purpose of petitioning Parliament for protection to agriculture, the following conversation took place between a farmer and Lord Ingestre:—"He (Lord Ingestre) agreed with the sentiment of the resolution, that if rents were entirely abolished, he did not think they would materially benefit the tenant. A Farmer: Try it, my lord.—Viscount Ingestre: Perhaps you would wish the land-lords to be entirely without money; if so, what are we to do?—A Farmer: Same as we do, my lord, make shift." (Lord Ingestre). Of course, there was loud laughter. "Ha! ha! Who ever heard of a nobleman making shift? The man will be the death of us. Ha! ha! We cannot help laughing at such an absurd notion, even on paper. How would Mr. Hodges, or Jackson, or whatever the farmer's name is, have a nobleman make shift? Perhaps he would wish him to alter his family livery, put his servants into some common dress, and go without hair powder. To economise, like a person of limited means, in way lights, and even to study when and where he might burn composition instead. Actually to regard expense in giving a dinner party or a soirée. Positively to consider the price of furniture. Absolutely to stint his lady in jewellery. Possibly this humphrey would expect him to reduce his stud, or put down one or more of his carriages. Now, for plebeian society has no limits—we should not wonder if he were to think, as something not altogether out of the question, that a nobleman might give up his box at the Opera! What then would become of the splendour of our country—exhibited in Rotten row? What of music and the ballet—how could we execute a festin or a pas de deux in case of a reduction of their country salaries? Alas, states, indeed! As if our nobility were like distressed needlewomen. Let us contrast this rustic's senseless speech with the self-evident wisdom of Lord Ingestre's speech: "If rents were entirely abolished I do not think they would materially benefit the tenant." Of course not. What advantage would it be to the tenant to put the few trifling thousands which he pays his landlord into his own pocket?—Punch.

"2 Taylor's-court, Bow-lane, May 20, 1845.

"DEAR SIR,—You will please receive £1, the description of myself and family, for the purpose of warding four beds, &c., to our wretched brethren agricultural labourers. Many thanks to those philanthropic gentlemen that have afforded us the opportunity of doing good at so small a charge.

"Your very humble servant,

To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—To prevent all mistakes, I wish it to be distinctly understood that all the beds which will be given to the needy and deserving field-labourers in my neighbourhood will be forwarded to me by G. Simmons, Esq., 23, Upper Thames-street, London, and by no other person. I have just learned that there are persons in the neighbourhood who think that any person sending 5s. to the "League Fund" may have a bed, &c., sent to him. This is a mistake. The end which those benevolent gentlemen who have sent the beds have in view, and the end which those who have engaged to distribute them have in view, is to supply the most needy and deserving field-labourers in the neighbourhood of Bicester, Oxon, in Dorsetshire and other counties, with something better than either straw or chaff, on which to rest their hungry bodies at night. This is a great and good work, and it must be begun, carried on, and finished with prudence and great care. The following are the sums which have been sent to the editor of the Patriot, and to my friend Mr. Simmons, to enable me to purchase beds, &c., for the poor in my own neighbourhood.

THE CORN LAWS.—Tuesday, the 10th of June, 1845, day that is at present fixed by Mr. Villiers as the day which he will bring before the House of Commons an annual "motion on the Corn Laws," as it is briefly described in the official books. That motion was previously fixed for Tuesday the 3rd, but the hon. member, on the day, altered it to the day now stated. The same day, it is the occasion upon which Sir Valentine Black and others in the House has "motion respecting members." The latter motion, however, takes precedence of that of Mr. Villiers.

THE CORN LAWS.—The most specific suggestion in Lord John Russell's multifarious address on Monday night was on the Corn Laws. The only addition he made to the public stock of information on this subject, that he has descended from his 8s. fixed duty of 1844, 4s., or perhaps 5s., or perhaps 6s. It is difficult to comprehend why his original proposition should be so much corrected for so doubtful a result. As his lordship is rather winning adherents than choosing a course, he may prefer to content himself with the least possible show of change. Let him, however, save himself the trouble of an exact decision of a point which evidently costs so much labour. Peel will underbid him. "The day will come," he inevitable day, "when Peel will make a clean breast of the Corn Laws, offering up what the Irish Catholics call "an unqualified and uncontaminated gift" to the Free Traders. He will not do things by halves. Cannot Lord J. Russell see this in time? Henceforth it is his duty to be behindhand in the market. While he is haggling for the odd shillings, and thinking to allure the purchaser by the doubtful tone of his denials, a more desperate and determined salesman interposes, and throws him out of the market.—Times.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXXII.

TO THE LADIES WHO ATTENDED THE STALLS
IN THE FREE-TRADE BAZAAR.

Good, true, and brave, in their gentleness and delicacy, are the women of England. Historians have chronicled their virtues, poets sung their loveliness, and every form of suffering has borne witness to their charity. In the annals of literature and art they have won an honourable place; and the hourly enjoyments of the household are their unrecorded but blessed creation. Whatever fascination may be conceded to the beauty of other climes and races, it is something better than the mere partiality of patriotism which says of them, "Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all."

The duty and beneficence of woman, like that of man, must adapt itself to times and circumstances. The work of the day is to be done, and the wants of mankind indicate the service to be rendered to mankind. We are continually invited to new regions of useful endeavour. The assistance already rendered by the women of England to the Anti-Corn-Law League, in various ways and on various occasions, demonstrates their perception of the cruel injustice and demoralizing tendency of monopoly. They feel that where privation is to be mitigated, or despair and guilt prevented, there it is woman's mission to interpose. Hence, her presence at the meetings of the League, her contributions to its funds, her canvassing for the material of its Bazaars, and her personal services, formerly at Manchester, and now in this metropolis, to complete the success of these experiments, and enhance their importance, not only in the augmentation of funds, but in relation to those higher objects of public economy, knowledge, morals, and progress, which identify themselves with the end for which the League is constituted.

Your seventeen days at Covent-garden Theatre will long be remembered. But it is not enough gratefully to acknowledge their importance, to recognise the service rendered by all of you during portions of that time, and the energy of those who returned each morning to the arduous task. There is a wider and deeper feeling which also requires expression. You have opened and led the way in a new path of female beneficence. You have combined in a public agitation for the redress of wrongs, without any compromise of gentleness or grace. You have mingled in business and bustle, refining them by your interposition. In sales and bargains you have been "sisters of charity." In the shape of shopkeeping women, you have shown the spirit of angels of mercy. You have stooped to conquer; and, in doing the work of an inferior station in society, have risen, and raised your sex, to a moral height above all station. No other agency could have achieved what you have done for human welfare. In this same cause some "poor old hand and ocean without rest;" but "they also serve who only stand and wait," and they enhance the sanctity of more extensive service. You impart a purer and nobler character to the efforts of others, be they orators, writers, or statesmen. Your active sympathy is a halo of sacredness around their toils. The thousands who thronged the theatre felt, perhaps, unconsciously, a new sentiment of respect in your presence. They had a vague sense that your humble occupations, and the principles which placed you there, were a development of power and beauty; and the heart bowed before you. This will not pass away with the closing of the Bazaar. A new and better element henceforth blends in reformatory struggles. The influence of woman has a new, a purer, and a loftier enthronement. You have made the stalls of a Bazaar not less holy than the stalls of cathedrals.

It is for this you deserve the blessings of humanity. You have come to its aid daringly; but with that boldness which purest feelings and purposes inspire; and which, therefore, cannot err, even in demerit. The ribaldry which oppression has often lured for its ruffian work stood rebuked before you. Amongst yourselves, and those who gathered round you, were many who, politically, religiously, or socially, are parted by stern barriers. For the time, at least, those barriers were annihilated. Every heart beat kindly, for all breathed the same moral atmosphere. It was the gleam of a renovated age, such as poets tell of in the past, and Utopians in futurity. O, you have done a good work; but one that, while its memory will brighten your future lives, develops a power that extends over them great and solemn responsibilities.

Little of statesmanship or philosophy can there be in the man who should regard the Free-Trade Bazaar as an idle show or merely a money-getting contrivance. It has a profounder significance. Ladies zealously serving at stalls, amid Gothic adornments of scenic art,—those stalls richly furnished by spontaneous contributions in every department of industrial ingenuity,—tell of the commercial spirit having succeeded to the heritage of feudal splendour; of its having allied itself with munificence, taste, and intellect; and how the "Store of ladies, whose bright eyes Rained influence and adjudged the prize," at knightly tournaments, while the millions pined in unpitied vassalage, are now the herald geni of Providence, pointing to a coming period of impartial justice, and therefore of universal good and prosperity. The funeral eulogists of the age of chivalry saw plainly that a commercial age must follow; but they deprecated its coarseness, sordidness, and rapacity. Vain apprehensions! There might have been something in them, had not commerce been forced into a hard struggle for its rights. Cast into the furnace, it found there the fires of purification. Its turn has come to win and wear "the spoils of vanquished Time." Such changes are never retrogressive. In each, the real good of the past is retained and enhanced. Each change is a struggle between departing and coming principles; a struggle to qualify the new power in the ascendant, for promoting the progress of mankind, and confirming the next step in the march of civilization. People talked of "magic" in the transformations which the theatre itself underwent: it was the magic that promises a new and nobler form to society, by the invocation—

"Spirits of beauty, spirits of power,
Up to your duty, now is the hour."

Many a one of you, maid or matron, has doubtless gone, simply and cheerfully, to her unwonted task, day after day; smiling in fatigue, carefully setting forth her wares, sharing the excitement of the scene, counting proceeds which were her addition to the common treasury, and with only an indistinct feeling that there was something in all this, besides the eventual good to labouring millions, much beyond the fancy fairs of superficial charity. It is the looker-on who sees what is doing; and to him the scene is full of suggestiveness. But that indistinct feeling will grow into clear thought, as it has with others of you; and those passing days will indicate their relation with years, generations, centuries of the past and future. In that contemplation you will perceive the importance of your own work. You will see, also, that its fitting acknowledgment is not in light phrases of meaningless praise, not in the commonplace flatteries of gallantry, but in serious and earnest words, and "thoughts that wander through eternity."

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the League.

Glasgow, May 26.

SIR,—Permit me, through the medium of the LEAGUE, to give your readers a sample of the destructive working of Sir R. Peel's partial Free-Trade principles. The case is so glaring that it needs only to be mentioned that its absurdity may be seen.

For instance, it is pretty generally known that we have a most useful establishment in Scotland, whose jurisdiction extends to England, called the Board of Fishery, the duty of whose officers it is to see that all casks or barrels, in which herrings are cured, are of the proper size, and that they are not made of fir. In fact, the law is, that herrings cured in fir barrels are liable to be seized. This is a very great hardship to our trade,—one that which nothing can better illustrate the necessity there is for abolishing all laws which press with severity on the trade or commerce of the country, but especially those which favour foreigners at the expense of British subjects.

It is well known that several cargoes of herrings, made up in fir barrels, have this year been imported into Ireland from Norway; while no fish curer in England or Scotland can cure herrings in barrels of this description without having his property liable to confiscation.

We have quite enough to do to compete with the Norwegians, without our Government giving them a premium of this kind. I hope Mr. Cobden, or some other influential M.P., will take up this matter, and help to rid us of the mischievous law referred to, as well as of the establishment whose duty it is to put it in force. I am sure Mr. Hunt, who has on former occasions been of such signal service to the copper trade, will lend a hand.

You may hear from me soon again on this subject. Meantime, I am, respectfully, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

A NORLAND COOPER BOY.

PROSPECTS OF THE FARMERS.

(From the Brighton Herald.)

Though long convinced of the impolicy and injustice of Corn Laws, it has never been our wish to deride or condemn in severe terms the farmer. We do not regard the Corn Laws as a farmer's question, but one between the governing portion of the landed aristocracy and the consumers—the public.

If all things were equal, it would not matter a jot to the farmer whether prices were high or low; but as rates, tithes, and taxes, and, above all, to him, rents are high, he thinks the Legislature bound to do that which it has no power to do—produce him high prices for his produce.

The Legislature, believing in its "omnipotence" (the word is not ours), passed Corn Laws with the view to produce high prices, and every one of those laws has in practice proved a total failure. No law can procure high prices for farmers with a contracted and contracting currency; as the present prices prove, and will prove far more clearly in less than two years.

If, therefore, the farmers are, as they state and we believe, in a state of great distress—if that distress this year has been very much increased, and we fear will be further, we are less disposed than ever to deride them, or say one word more towards them than the truth, as it appears to us, requires.

We have recently been across a good deal of this county, not by railroad or coach, but in the rural districts and among the farmers and country people; and we learn from their own lips—

1st. That the tithes are felt most oppressively, because, in computing them, the average price of corn being taken for the last seven years, the farmers are now paying as much as when corn fetched considerably more than its present price.

2nd. That the poor-rates are again on the increase.

3rd. That the rural police is expensive and useless.

4th. That they suffer more than ever from the increase of game, and are deprived of the privilege of taking any, which they used to enjoy.

5th. That the timber in the hedgerows injures the crops, now of greater consideration than formerly, because, by the Tithe Commutation Act, the tithe is assessed over the hedges and waste to the centre of the common turnpike-road.

6th. That the drought of last year put them, during the winter and the present spring, to great expenses for fodder, and during a long period for water; that to cover the expense of keeping stock they sold much of it off, and the land in consequence will be thrown back for a year or two to come.

7th. That sheep and lambs, but more especially sheep, have died off in great and unusual numbers. This, according to some, has been owing to casual disease; but others attribute it to the state of the grass, and previous condition of the sheep. They had been ill kept, frequently on hay and dry food, till the rains came; and when these came and the grass grew, it was sour and rank for the want of sun. Mutton in consequence is excessively dear, and veal comparatively cheap, on account of the number of calves hurried to market.

8th. This year a new disease has appeared among the cattle. One large farmer, a short distance from Brighton, has lost all his cows except five; another has just lost four, and expects to lose more, out of a much smaller number which he kept compared with the above large farmer.

9th. The wheats are looking bad over immense tracts of the country, and from this state they can scarcely recover. In the first place, they suffer from the unusual frosts—any one may see from the rail or common road scores of fields in which the seed "missed"—that is, it never germinated. But a more serious evil is the wire-worm, which is sure to make its appearance in cold springs like the present. In warm springs, the worm gets down far below the roots of the wheat; in cold weather, it comes to the surface and attacks the plant; and when the wire-worm gets among the wheat it is impossible to destroy it, and it will sometimes entirely destroy the crop. The usual way of endeavouring to get rid of this scourge is to roll the land with heavy rollers made for the purpose; but rolling this year has been found to be utterly useless.

10th. With the loss of cattle and sheep (and consequently manure) and the ravages of the wire-worm, the farmer asks what, with bad and short crops and low prices, is to become of him?

He knows there will be no remission of rent; no remission of taxes, rates, tithes; and wages cannot be reduced lower than they are. The prospects before him are, therefore, certainly most gloomy.

If the crop should be short, as it must be, and prices were to be raised a very little, it would pour the foreign wheat. The farmer would then be driven back upon low prices, and must sell his corn for whatever it will fetch, be the quantity as small as it may. "What," said a large farmer to us the other day, "is to become of us, then, God only knows."

Knowing that there are thousands and tens of thousands of farmers in this position, most of them with families dependent upon them, we should not envy that man his feelings who could think their condition one for mirth or derision.

But from what source are they to look for relief? Who can assist them?

It is too absurd to talk about legislative enactments—Corn Laws—they have them now, and what relief do they give to the farmer?

"Yes," they may say, "but Parliament can prevent foreign corn from coming in, by raising the duty in case our crops fail." Foolish men! Do you suppose for an instant that Parliament, besieged as it is by the Free-Tradeers, can make another law to raise the price of food? Besides, if the home crops fail, are the millions to be half starved that you may get a high price for the little and bad corn you may grow? If good corn and at a moderate price is to be obtained from abroad, do you suppose that the people will not demand it, and that, if refused, a state of things may arise to which we have no wish to allude? A Government exists as well for the corn consumer as for the corn-grower; and if the home grower cannot supply the consuming millions at a moderate price, others must and will. Indeed, it is in vain to look to the Legislature for relief. It cannot, however disposed, give it you.

Your rent is a matter between you and your landlords, and if you pay, or agree to pay, more than you can afford more than the land is worth—it is the result of a private agreement, with which no one can interfere.

Gentlemen, we desire to avoid saying any thing offensive; but we cannot but remind you that most the majority of you have been drinking Church and State all your lives, and never more vehemently than at the last election. Your stunning rejoinders, because you got in Peel and the Tories, yet ring in our ears. And, therefore, if the tithes are found oppressive, it is no fault of the Liberals, nor on this point can you be relieved unless you also are now disposed to rebel against poor old Mother Church, who has work enough on her hands without a war against tithes.

The extreme poverty of the humbler classes has made a rural police necessary. No relief can, therefore, be expected from either of these burdens, the poor-rates and county-rates; and thus, whilst it would seem that there is no source from which or by which you can be relieved, we must again remind you that you Are Corn Laws, and Mr. Russell Gray says that 20s. a quarter is ample protection; but no protection can secure you against bad and short crops. Nor can consumers be compelled to give high prices if corn on moderate terms can be obtained from abroad.

We lament that the farmers of "morrie England" should be in such a state as they are; but they will soon see, with the majority of the public, that all is the consequence of misrule and oligarchic government, from which we say, "Good Lord deliver us."

REVIEW.

Sybil; or, the Two Nations. By B. Disraeli, Esq., M.P. London: Colburn. (Second notice.)

In our first notice of "Sybil" we principally dwelt on Mr. Disraeli's powers as a moral anatomist in developing the character of statesmen. We shall in our present number confine ourselves to extracting illustrations of Mr. Disraeli's graphic powers as a describer of peculiar localities and peculiar populations. Our reason for reserving all criticism until we can give our final notice is the same as that which induces a judge to withhold his charge until the whole case is before the jury. We give the evidence before we make our comment: and the first witness we adduce is the town of Wodgate, which those who are acquainted with Mr. Horne's report will be at no loss to identify:—

"Wodgate, or Wogate, as it was called on the map, was a district that in old days had been consecrated to Woden, and which appeared destined through successive ages to retain its heathen character. At the beginning of the revolutionary war, Wodgate was a sort of squatted district of the great mining region to which it was contiguous, a place where adventurers in the industry which was rapidly developing, settled themselves; for though the great veins of coal and ironstone cropped up, as they phrase it, before they reached this bare and barren land, and it was thus deficient in those mineral and metallic treasures which had enriched its neighbourhood, Wodgate had advantages of its own, and of a kind which touch the fancy of the lawless. It was land without an owner; no one claimed any manorial right over it; they could build cottages without paying rent. It was a district recognised by no parish; so there were no tithes, and no meddling supervision. It abounded in fuel, which cost nothing, for though the veins were not worth working as a source of mining profit, the soil of Wodgate was similar in its superficial character to that of the country around. So a population gathered, and rapidly increased, in the ugliest spot in England, to which neither Nature nor art had contributed a single charm; where a tree could not be seen, a flower was unknown, where there was neither holly nor steeples, nor a single sight or sound that could soften the heart or humanize the mind.

"Whatever may have been the cause, whether, as not unlikely, the original squatters brought with them some traditional skill, or whether their isolated and unchequered existence concentrated their energies on their craft, the fact is certain, that the inhabitants of Wodgate early acquired a celebrity as skilful workmen. Their reputation so much increased, and in time spread so far, that for more than a quarter of a century, both in their skill and the economy of their labour, they have been unmatched throughout the country. As manufacturers of ironmongery, they carry the palm from the whole district; as founders of brasses and workers of steel, they fear none; while as makers and looksmiths, their fame has spread even to the European markets, whither their most skilful workmen have frequently been invited.

"Invited in vain! No wages can tempt the Wodgate man from his native home, that squatters' seat which soon assumed the form of a large village, and then in turn soon expanded into a town, and at the present moment numbers its population by extending thousands, lodged in the most miserable tenements in the most hideous hugh in the ugliest country in the world.

"But it has its endearing spot. Notwithstanding the spread of its civil prosperity, it has lost none of the characteristics of its original society; on the contrary, it has jealously preserved them. There are no landlords, no lords, no masters, no butlers in Wodgate. No church there has yet raised its steeple; and as if the pale spirit of Woden still haunted his ancient temple, even the conventional scarcely dares show a humble front in some obscure corner. There is no municipality, no magistrate, no local acts, no vestries, no schools of any kind. The streets are never cleaned; every man lights his own house; nor does any one know anything except his business.

"More than this, at Wodgate a factory or large establishment of any kind is unknown. Here Labour reigns supreme. Its division indeed is favoured by their numbers, but the interference or influence of more capital is instantly resisted. The business of Wodgate is carried on by master workmen in their own houses, each of whom possesses an unlimited number of what they call apprentices, by whom their affairs are principally conducted, and whom they treat as the Mandrills treated the Egyptians.

"These master workmen indeed form a powerful aristocracy, nor is it possible to conceive one apparently more oppressive. They are ruthless tyrants; they habitually inflict upon their subjects punishments more grievous than the slave population of our colonies were ever visited with; not content with beating them with sticks or flooring them with knotted ropes, they are in the habit of felling them with hammers, or cutting their heads open with a file or lock. The most usual punishment, however, or rather stimulus to increase exertion, is to pull an apprentice's ears till they run with blood. These youths too are worked for sixteen and even twenty hours a day; they are often sold by one master to another; they are fed on excrement, and they sleep in latrines or cellars; yet when it is that they are hardened by brutality, and really wear a look of their degradation and unusual sufferings, or when they are supported by the belief that their day is to be a day of oppression will surely arrive, the day of Wodgate is by no means so unpopular as the aristocracy of most other places.

"In the first place it is a real aristocracy; it is privileged, but it does something for its privileges. It is distinguished from the main body not merely by name. It is the most knowing class at Wodgate; it possesses indeed its own complete knowledge; and it imparts in its manner a certain quantity of it to those whom it guides. Thus it is an aristocracy that leads, and therefore a fact. Moreover the social system of Wodgate is not an unvarying course of infinite toil. Their plan is to work hard, but not always. They seldom exceed four days of labour in the week. On Sunday the masters begin to drink; for the apprentices there is dog-fighting without any stint. On Monday and Tuesday the whole population of Wodgate is drunk; of all stations, ages, and sexes; even babes, who should be at the breast; for they are drugged with Godfrey's cordial. Here is relaxation, excitement; if less vice otherwise than might be at first anticipated, we must remember that excesses are checked by poverty of blood and constant exhaustion. Scanty food and hard labour are in their way, if not exactly moralists, a tolerably good police.

"There are no others at Wodgate to preach or to control. It is not that the people are immoral, for immorality implies some forethought; or ignorant, for ignorance is relative; but they are animals; unconscious; their minds a blank; and their worst actions only the impulse of a gross or savage instinct. There are many in this town who are ignorant of their very names; very few who can spell them. It is rare that you meet with a young person who knows his own age; rarer to find the boy who has seen a hawk, or the girl who has seen a flower. Ask them the name of their sovereign, and they will give you an unmeaning stare; ask them the name of their religion, and they will laugh; who rules them on earth, or who can save them in heaven are alike mysteries to them."

Let us turn from this dismal scene to a lovely landscape:—

"A bloom was spread over the morning sky. A soft golden light bathed with its fresh beam the bosom of the valley, except where a delicate haze, rather than a mist, still partially lingered over the river, which yet occasionally gleamed and sparkled in the sunshine. A sort of shadowy lustre suffused the landscape, which, though distinct, was mitigated in all its features—the distant woods, the clumps of tall trees that rose about the old grey bridge, the cottage chimneys that sent their smoke into the blue till air, and their clustering orchards and gardens of flowers and herbs.

"Ah! what is there so fresh and joyous as a summer morn! That spring time of the day, when the brain is bright, and the heart is brave; the season of daring and of hope; the renovating hour!"

The happy factory we know to be no fiction: it is realized at Hyde, Turton, Quarrybank, and many other places which we have personally examined. Let us view it in Mr. Disraeli's picture:—

"A few days after his morning walk with Sybil, it was agreed that Egremont should visit Mr. Trafford's factory, which he had expressed a great desire to inspect. Gerard always left his cottage at break of dawn, and as Sybil had not yet paid her accustomed visit to her friend and patron, who was the employer of her father, it was arranged that Egremont should accompany her at a later and more convenient hour in the morning, and then that they should all return together.

"The factory was about a mile distant from their cottage, which belonged indeed to Mr. Trafford, and had been built by him. He was the younger son of a family that had for centuries been planted in the land, but who, not satisfied with the factitious consideration with which society compensates the junior members of a territorial house for their entailed poverty, had availed himself of some opportunities that offered themselves, and had devoted his energies to those new sources of wealth that were unknown to his ancestors. His operations at first had been extremely limited, like his fortune, but with a small capital, though his profits were not considerable, he at least gained experience. With gentle blood in his veins, and old English feelings, he imbibed, at an early period of his career, a correct conception of the relations which should subsist between the employer and the employed. He felt that between them there should be other ties than the payment and the receipt of wages.

"A distant and childless relative, who made him a visit, pleased with his energy and enterprise, and touched by the development of his social views, lent him a considerable sum, at a moment too when a great opening was offered to manufacturing capital and skill. Trafford, schooled in rigid fortunes, and formed by struggle, if not by adversity, was ripe for the occasion, and equal to it. He became very opulent, and he lost no time in carrying into life and being the plans which he had brooded over in the years when his good thoughts were limited to dreams. On the banks of his native Mow he had built a factory which was now one of the marvels of the district; one might almost say, of the country: a single room, spreading over nearly two acres, and holding two thousand work-people. The roof of ground arches, lighted up by ventilating domes at the height of eighteen feet, was supported by hollow cast-iron columns, through which the drainage of the roof was effected. The height of the ordinary rooms in which the workpeople in manufactures are engaged is not more than from nine to eleven feet; and these are built in stories, the heat and effluvia of the lower rooms communicated to those above, and the difficulty of ventilation insurmountable. At Mr. Trafford's, by an ingenious process not unlike that which is practised in the House of Commons, the ventilation was also carried on from below, so that the whole building was kept at a steady temperature, and little susceptible to atmospheric influence. The physical advantages of thus carrying on the whole work in one chamber are great; in the improved health of the people, the security against dangerous accidents for women and youth, and the reduced fatigue resulting from not having to ascend and descend and carry materials to the higher rooms. But the moral advantages resulting from superior inspection and general observation are not less important; the child works under the eye of the parent, the parent under that of the superior workman; the inspector or employer at a distance can behold all.

"When the workpeople of Mr. Trafford left his factory they were not forgotten. Deeply had he pondered on the influence of the employer on the health and content of his workpeople. He knew well that the domestic virtues are dependent on the existence of a home, and one of his first efforts had been to build a village where every family might be well lodged. Though he was the principal proprietor, and proud of that character, he nevertheless encouraged his workmen to purchase the fee: there were some who had saved sufficient money to effect this; proud of their house and their little garden, and of the horticultural society, where its produce permitted them to be annual competitors. In every street there was a well; behind the factory were the public baths; the schools were under the direction of the perpetual curate of the church, which Mr. Trafford, though a Roman Catholic, had raised and endowed. In the midst of this village, surrounded by beautiful gardens which gave an impulse to the horticulture of the community, was the house of Trafford himself, who comprehended his position too well to withdraw himself with vulgar exclusiveness from his real dependents, but recognised the historical principle reviving in a new form and adapted to the softer manners and more ingenious circumstances of the times.

"And what was the influence of such an employer and such a system of employment on the morals and manners of the employed? Great; infinitely beneficial. The connection of a labourer with his place of work, whether agricultural or manufacturing, is itself a vast advantage. Proximity to the employer brings cleanliness and order, because it brings observation and encouragement. In the settlement of Trafford crime was positively unknown; and offences were very slight. There was not a single person in the village of a reprobate character. The women were well clothed; the women had a blooming cheek; drunkness was unknown; while the moral condition of the softer sex was proportionately elevated."

"It was night: clear and serene, though the moon had not risen; and a vast concourse of persons were assembling on Mowbray-moor. The chief gathering collected in the vicinity of some huge rocks, one of which, pre-eminent above its fellows, and having a broad flat head, on which some twenty persons might easily stand at the same time, was called the Druid's Altar. The ground about was strewn with stony fragments, covered to-night with human beings, who found a convenient resting-place amid these ruins of some ancient temple or relic of some ancient world. The shadowy concourse increased, the dim circle of the nocturnal assemblage each moment spread and widened: there was the hum and stir of many thousands. Suddenly in the distance the sound of martial music; and instantly, quick as the lightning and far more wild, each person present brandished a flaming torch, and a chorus of cheers, that renewed and resounding floated far away over the broad bosom of the dark wilderness.

"The music and the banners denoted the arrival of the leaders of the people. They mounted the craggy ascent that led to the summit of the Druid's Altar, and there, surrounded by his companions, amid the enthusiastic shouts of the multitude, Walter Gerard came forth to address a torch-light meeting.

"His tall form seemed colossal in the uncertain and flickering light, his rich and powerful voice reached almost to the utmost limit of his vast audience, now still with expectation, and silent with excitement. Their fixed and eager glance, the mouth compressed with fierce resolution or distended with novel sympathy, as they listened to the exposition of their wrongs, and the vindication of the sacred rights of labour—the shouts and waving of the torches as some bright or bold phrase touched them to the quick—the cause, the hour, the scene—all combined to render the assemblage in a high degree exciting."

We shall conclude for this week by extracting a description of the mystic and mischievous mummery of a trades union:—

"Conducted by masked guides, it seemed to Mick that he was traversing interminable rooms, or rather galleries, for once stretching out the arm, while one of his supporters had momentarily quitted him to open some gate or door, Mick touched a wall. At length one of the masks spoke, and said, 'In five minutes you will be in the presence of the SEVEN—prepare!'

"At this moment rose the sound of distant voices singing in concert, and gradually increasing in volume as Mick and the masks advanced. One of these attendants now notifying to their charge that he must kneel down, Mick found he rested on a cushion, while at the same time, his arms still pinioned, he seemed to be left alone. The voices became louder and louder; Mick could distinguish the words and burden of the hymn; he was sensible that many persons were entering the apartment; he could distinguish the measured tread of some solemn procession. Round the chamber, more than once, they moved with slow and awful step. Suddenly that movement ceased; there was a pause of a few minutes; at length a voice spoke. 'I denounce John Briars.'

"Why?' said another. 'He offers to take nothing but piece-work; the man who does piece-work is guilty of less defensible conduct than a drunkard. The worst passions of our nature are enlisted in support of piece-work. Avarice, meanness, cunning, hypocrisy, all excite and feed upon the miserable rotatory who works by the task and not by the hour. A man who earns by piece-work forty shillings per week, the usual wages for day-work being twenty, robs his fellow of a week's employment; therefore I denounce John Briars.'

"Let it go forth,' said the other voice; 'John Briars is denounced. If he receive another week's wages by the piece, he shall not have the option of working the week after for time. No. 87, are to John Briars.'

"I denounce Claughton and Hicks,' said another voice.

"Why?' 'They have removed Gregory Ray from being a superintendent, because he belonged to this lodge. Brethren, is it your pleasure that there shall be a turn out for ten days at Claughton and Hicks?'

"It is our pleasure,' cried several voices. 'No. 34, give orders to-morrow that the works at Claughton and Hicks's stop till further orders.'

"Brethren,' said another voice, 'I propose the expulsion from this Union, of any member who shall be known to boast of his superior ability, as to either the quantity or quality of work he can do, either in public or private company. Is it your pleasure?'

"It is our pleasure."

"Brethren,' said a voice that seemed a presiding one, 'before we proceed to the receipt of the revenue from the different districts of this lodge, there is, I am informed, a stranger present, who prays to be admitted into our fraternity. Are all robed in the mystic robe? Are all masked in the secret mask?'

"All!" "Then let us pray!" And thereupon, after a moment which intimated that all present were kneeling, the presiding voice offered up an extemporaneous prayer of great power and even eloquence. This was succeeded by the Hymn of Labour, and at its conclusion the song of the neophytes were unlearned, and they by the way were bandaged.

AGRICULTURE.

WHY SHOULD OUR FARM-LABOURERS
EMIGRATE?

In his late speech on the condition of the English labourers, Lord John Russell said "that in East Canada the wages of a farm-labourer are 2s. 6d. a day, and in West Canada 3s. a day," and he enlarged upon the "improved position of the labourer" who, by emigrating to Canada, secured that rate of wages. True it is that there are very few districts of this country in which farm-labourers obtain 2s. 6d. or 3s. a day, and that fourteen, sixteen, or eighteen pence a day forms much more commonly their actual rate of wages; but it is no less true that the wrong-headed prejudices of our landowners, individually and collectively, alone prevent the ordinary rate of agricultural wages, for the best labourers, from rising in England to the Canadian rate. And let it be remembered that none but the best labourers can hope to succeed as emigrants. The two great causes of the prevalence of bad farming, which is the sole cause of the present low rate of rural wages, are the Corn Laws and the semi-feudal principles upon which English landowners manage their estates.

The Corn Laws lead farmers to expect prices for their produce higher than they actually obtain; and, having engaged to give rents calculated according to expected instead of real prices, in three years out of five they are compelled to apply a portion of their capital in payment of rent. This is a direct and permanent reduction of the fund which ought to be devoted to the payment of wages. Of course the ill effect upon the labourers is instantaneous. Moreover, it is a growing evil; for the farmers employing fewer labourers in consequence of an undue portion of their capital having been absorbed by the rent, the condition of their farms will be deteriorated, so that the following year a still further draught upon their capital, and a fresh diminution of employment for labourers, will take place.

So far as the farmers are concerned this is partially corrected by increased frugality, and perhaps by the high prices which those of them who are men of capital get in seasons of scarcity. But to the farm-labourers the evil has no mitigating circumstances. The farmer may adopt improved machinery, or buy guano or other portable manures, which, without any increase of labour, may enable him in part to meet the rent by larger produce. Starvation prices wrung from the suffering artisan may stay for a brief season the downward progress of the occupier under his monopoly rent. But how fares the labourer? His wages have been reduced, when prices are low because the farmer's substance has gone to "make up the rent"; and when prices have risen, when an artificial scarcity has been produced by the Corn Laws, employment is not more plentiful, while the purchasing power of the labourer's weekly pittance is fearfully lessened. Another way in which the Corn Laws reduce wages is by inducing slovenly and inferior cultivation. Farmers are told by their rent-loving political leaders that they cannot compete with the foreigner, and they abandon all effort in despair. They are satisfied to grow twenty-four bushels of wheat to the acre upon land which would grow twice that quantity if properly cultivated, because thirty years ago a most extraordinary combination of circumstances produced prices which rendered such a half crop "remunerating"; and until lately they have believed the monopolist landowners who promised to bring about a return of such "remunerating" prices by means of acts of Parliament. But while farmers have been lingering on false hopes, and have been gradually transferring to their landlords the capital they or their fathers acquired during the war, the agricultural population has been increasing with great rapidity. More labour is in the market, though farming has been stationary as regards the employment of labourers. These facts are now universally admitted, though some politicians still shrink from attributing them to the right cause—the Corn Laws. No one, however, really acquainted with the state of agriculture will deny these propositions.

Then, the bastard-feudalism to which landlords still cling with a tenacity, as noxious as it is childish, greatly lessens the employment of rural labour. From this source spring yearly tenancies, obsolete and restrictive covenants, game preserves, political servitude, and all those evils which deter hundreds of men of education and capital from embarking in farming as a business, and which prevent existing farmers from obtaining that aid from capitalists which men in all other industrious occupations readily obtain.

Now, the concurrent testimony of all practical agriculturists goes to show, that if anything approaching to a general adoption of those improvements, which are so much talked about, should take place, there would not be a sufficient number of labourers in the country. Take, for instance, a pamphlet by Lord Torrington, descriptive of an improved set of farm-buildings he has lately erected in Kent, and there we meet with this passage:—"A thorough draining of the whole of Kent would employ, for a long period, the whole population; and that, in addition to clearing away of all superfluous timber and hedges, would not only afford endless employment, but reduce to a mere nothing the poor-rates of this district, which now press most heavily on the tenantry, and add to their distresses." And this is applicable to great part of the country.

So, again, let the reader go into any neighbourhood where an enterprising farmer is to be met with,—take, for instance, Mr. Lattimore, in Herts, Mr. Huttley, in Essex, and men of that stamp,—and ask the first intelligent labourer he meets with what would be the state of things in the district if all the farmers, ay, or half the farmers, employed as large a proportion of labour on their farms as their more enterprising neighbours; and we know that he will receive some such response as this—"Lord bless you, Sir, there would not be men enough to do the work!" We have constantly received some such answer from labourers; and it is perfectly true. There are not rural labourers enough in this country to cultivate one half of the land in the best manner.

And there is another reason why the wages of rural labour would rise with such an increased employment as Free Trade and its sequents would give, which is, that the labourers would themselves improve. None but those who have had actual experience would believe the difference which exists between different labourers. As a matter of profit it would be cheaper to employ some farm-servants at 3s. than others at 1s. a day. And as nothing has such an injurious effect upon the labourer—nothing renders him so inferior as a workman—as irregular employment, so there is no way in which the inferior labourers can be improved but by constant work. There are few of them who cannot perform all the ordinary work of a farm well enough if they will; with the stimulus of constant and good wages the will to work effectively is seldom wanting.

Independently of the great demand for workmen which Free Trade would create in the manufacturing districts, agriculture itself, when relieved from "the bane of protection," would demand the labour of all, and more than all, the rural population. We see no reason why 2s. 6d. or 3s. a day should not be the current rate of wages for the best farm-labourers throughout the country; and we know that labour so remunerated would be really cheaper to the employer than the low priced labour of Dorsetshire and Wiltshire is at present. Let us as practical farmers offer a hint to Lord John Russell: that we farmers don't want any half measures. We don't require our best labourers to be drafted off to the colonies, and let the real value of Free Trade to be intercepted by a peddling protection of 4s. or 5s. on a quarter of wheat, with proportionate fixed duties on other grain. So long as any "protection" remains there can be no final settlement for the farmer; and there will be no general improvement in agriculture, for all the effects we have referred to as arising from a Corn Law will happen as certainly under a fixed duty as under a sliding scale. Let him discard his untenable figment of a fixed duty, and try to learn something of the real state of agriculture, not from landlords or land-agents, but from some of our best practical farmers, and he will find that all protection is indeed the bane of agriculture; and that our farm-labourers may be enabled to earn Canadian wages without enduring the rigour of a Canadian climate, or being expatriated from the homes of their youth, an absolutely Free Trade in grain is indispensable.

IMPROVEMENTS IN AGRICULTURE.

We have been favoured with the following communication, addressed to Mr. Cobden by a practical and highly intelligent agriculturist in Sussex:—

"TO RICHARD COBDEN, ESQ., M.P.

"Cathed house, May 19.

"SIR.—The result of an experiment in the reduction of seed detailed in my letter to you of February 10 having proved acceptable, I am induced to bring under your notice the mode of tillage I have adopted, in the hope that, where the soil will permit, others may be stimulated to give a fair trial to a similar rotation of crops.

"The four-course system is general in this part of Sussex. The land is manured for wheat, which is followed by oats, beans and a fallow, occasionally taking a crop of peas or turnips. But few turnips, however, and scarcely any barley or beans, are grown in this neighbourhood.

"A waggon-load of lime (about 130 bushels) per acre is here applied indiscriminately to all descriptions of land. Doubtless, lime may from time to time be put on stiff soils with good effect; but I very much question the propriety of its frequent use in such quantities, and think it injurious to light land, which it renders still more friable, and therefore less adapted to the growth of wheat.

"The land in my occupation is all light, being part of the formation denominated by geologists 'Hastings sand.' On manuring the different fields when taking pasture, six years ago, I determined to discontinue the use of lime, and to try other manures that would have a tendency to consolidate, as well as enrich, the soil. Rape cake appeared suitable, and I used it successfully for corn crops until guano was introduced, to which I have since given the preference. Rape dust was also tried for turnips, but, as it did not promote their growth sufficiently, cracked bones were substituted, and having lately become acquainted with the process of dissolving them in sulphuric acid, I hope to make trial of that method another year.

Mick found himself in a lofty and spacious room, lighted with many tapers. Its walls were hung with black cloth. At a table, covered with the same material, were seated seven persons in surplices, and masked, the president on a lofty seat, above which, on a pedestal, was a skeleton complete. On each side of the skeleton was a skeleton robed and masked, holding a drawn sword; and on each side of Mick was a man in the same garb, holding a battle-axe. On the table was the sacred volume open; and at a distance, ranged in order on each side of the room, was a row of persons in white robes and white masks, and holding torches.

Michael Radley, said the president, "do you voluntarily swear in the presence of Almighty God, and before these witnesses, that you will execute with zeal and alacrity, as far as in you lies, every task and injunction that the majority of your brethren, testified by the man, in the name of this grand committee, shall impose upon you, in furtherance of our common welfare, of which they are the sole judges; such as the chastisement of nobles, the assuaging of oppressive and tyrannical masters, or the demolition of all mills, works, and shops that shall be deemed by us incorrigible? Do you swear this in the presence of Almighty God and before these witnesses?"

"I do swear it," replied a tremulous voice.

"Then rise and kiss that book."

Mick slowly rose from his kneeling position, advanced with a trembling step, and, bending, embraced with reverence the open volume.

"Immediately every one unmasked; Devil-dust came forward and, taking Mick by the hand, led him to the president, who received him, pronouncing some mystic themes. He was covered with a robe, and presented with a torch, and then ranged in order with his companions. Thus terminated the initiation of Dandy Mick into a trades union."

GRAVESEND.—We have received the following resolutions, accompanied by the subscriptions which appear advertised in our list of this day:—"We, the undersigned inhabitants of the borough of Gravesend, being convinced that the present Corn Laws are oppressive to the poor, destructive to commerce, and injurious to every portion of the community, with the exception of an interested and monopolist class, are of opinion that they ought as soon as possible to be repealed. We observe with much satisfaction the great and untiring efforts made by the Anti-Corn-Law League to accomplish such repeal, and believing its operations can only be sustained by a vast expenditure of money, as well as personal exertion, we subscribe the sums affixed to our names for the purpose of assisting in so desirable an object."

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—The school for the instruction of naval officers and others, in the economy and use of steam, and the management of steam-engines, at this institution, is, we are glad to find, in a flourishing condition. It is indeed a sign of the times that so many of our distinguished naval men should devote their leisure moments to the study of steam navigation, and that the Admiralty should insist upon such a step prior to granting an appointment to a steamer. We find also that the spread of railway locomotion has aroused among all classes a desire to understand the powers of the steam engine, and therefore are not only the private courses of instruction given by Professor Ryan numerously attended, but also his public lectures on the steam engine are crowded by ladies and gentlemen, who anxiously listen to his popular explanations of its wondrous powers. It is not generally known that Doctor Ryan's course includes practical instruction on the Croydon Railway, and also on the river.

GATESHEAD FREE-TRADE SOCIETY.—On Monday evening last, the Free-Trade Society of Gateshead held a public meeting at the Grey Horse Inn, at which it was stated, "the result of the Free-Trade canvass would be announced, and the prospect of the next registration." Mr. James Hewitt presided. Mr. George Crawshaw, chairman of the society, stated the result of the canvass to ascertain the sentiments of the electors. The total number of electors canvassed was 333, which was all they had been able to find at home. Of these, 100 had signed a pledge, affirming their conviction that the Corn Laws, and all other protective duties, ought to be entirely and immediately abolished; and declaring that they would work together to effect that object. Twelve said the pledge was not strong enough; and therefore, he took it. There were 112 electors of the borough who might be depended upon to do their utmost to procure the return of a good Free-Trader. The rest they divided as follows:—"The prevailing feeling among them, he might say, was one of hesitation; but they found 45 decidedly against them; 8 who supported a fixed duty upon principle; 85 who doubted; 50 who did not appear to care about the matter; and 33 who were Tories, and, in fact, monopolists. He hoped they should be able to gain over a good many of the doubtful. Besides this, they should be able to place 80 new votes on the register; and to strike off 50 bad ones.—The meeting was subsequently addressed by Mr. W. Cook, Mr. Blighburn, a stranger, and again by Mr. Crawshaw, in explanation; and then separated.—Tyne Mercury."

COMMON HOUSEHOLDERS' ASSOCIATION, BETHNAL GREEN.—The members and friends of this association assembled on Monday, May 19, at the Norfolk Arms, William street, to celebrate, by a supper, their success during the past year in obtaining the electoral qualification, and to concert measures for the current year to further extend the possession of the franchise. About ninety persons were present. Mr. James Savage, a working man, presided, and addressed the meeting. Mr. Benjamin Mealy made a report, by which it appeared that the association, which was founded in 1841, had enabled a considerable number of householders to register their votes, and had practically established the right of occupiers of houses, the taxes of which were paid by the landlords, to possess the Parliamentary qualification. It was especially successful that every claimant should see that his landlord paid the poor-rate due on his dwelling on or before the 25th of July in each year. The report having been passed unanimously, Mr. Dean moved, "That, in the opinion of this meeting, all persons residing in houses for which the rates are compounded, and which will confer the elective franchise, should, without delay, claim to have their names placed upon the poor-rate book, in order that they may become registered electors." Seconded by Mr. Gasson, and adopted unanimously. Several other resolutions in connection with the objects of the association were unanimously agreed to.

"Having observed that farmyard manure, however much decomposed when ploughed in, prevented that compactness of soil which it was so desirable to obtain, and very much facilitated the working of the wireworm, I resolved to employ artificial manure only for wheat crops. I am now enabled to commit the seed to the ground without delay or interruption, and the worm has since done me very little injury. It soon also became evident that a fallow was not only disadvantageous in the loss of a crop, but that the repeated ploughings requisite to keep down weeds brought the soil into such a state of pulverization that it was unfitted for bearing wheat. My attention was then directed to the best mode of consolidating the ground, and that has been accomplished to a very satisfactory extent by the following treatment.

"A field sown with wheat in the autumn of 1839; clover and ryegrass added in the spring of the ensuing year, the wheat reaped in 1840; the seeds sown in 1841, and afterwards fed off until the beginning of October, when the sward was turned over by the plough, in wide breadths, and immediately pressed close with a heavy roller, and the surface harrowed, and sown with wheat. This second sowing of wheat was reaped in 1842, followed with peas in 1843, which were twice hoed and kept clean. The ground was once ploughed in the autumn of that year, and sown with wheat, and this third sowing was reaped in 1844. Seeds were added in the following spring, which, considering the season, are looking well, and after being mown will be fed off as before, and a fourth sowing of wheat will take place in October next, to be reaped in 1846. Turnips will probably follow, and a fifth sowing of wheat succeed them; thus growing wheat alternately with a green crop for ten years. With the exception of two fields, the whole of my arable land is now under a course of this description; so that, out of 90 acres in tillage, 42 are at this moment bearing wheat. This mode of cropping can only be carried out by using considerable quantities of artificial manure; but I have no doubt of its success, and feel confident, from experience, that the returns will be proportionably large.

"Farmers who occupy stiff land deny the practicability of growing wheat in alternate years; but my reply is that most, if not all, stiff soils can be so much improved by thorough or parallel draining that 'a season' for wheat sowing may be obtained in nine out of ten autumns, while the produce will be greatly augmented and the harvests will be earlier. Surely it is worth a trial when, by such an alteration in the course of husbandry, nearly double the quantity of food may be grown, and our rapidly increasing population fed better and cheaper, at the same time that the occupier of the soil will be fairly remunerated for his skill and capital. Liberal supplies of manure, and draining where requisite, are indispensable to success; but neither one nor the other is likely to be extensively practised whilst the yearly tenancy of farms continues. It is useless, it is quite absurd, to talk of the good understanding between landlord and tenant, of the honour of the former and the faith of the latter; for no man who has common sense will use land which he only occupies from year to year, as he would use it if he had a long lease. A lease of 21 years, and not less, will justify a capitalist in sinking money in improvements, and it would be only infatuation to imagine that they will be made without that security. Give the English farmer the encouragement that the Scotch farmer has, and we shall see the same rapid strides in draining, reclaiming, and fertilizing.

"The neighbouring farm to mine, most of which is also light land, was let at Michaelmas last; and the new tenant has since told me that he was charged with five ploughings, and sundry harrowings, on a portion of the fallows, being an expense of about 70s. per acre for preparatory work on his wheat tilth, of a worthless soil, I may add, injurious kind. How can the farmer possibly prosper while labour is so recklessly applied; and does not such a circumstance show the viciousness of a system in which so palpable a fraud can be openly practised?

"Permit me to say, with great deference, that I entirely coincide with you in opinion as to the freedom from restriction that should be the groundwork of leases. The only covenant in my lease implying restraint is worded as follows:—'From breaking up or converting into tillage any of the meadow or pasture land; but to use the same and all the other lands in a proper and husbandlike manner; and to keep the same clean and in good heart and condition, so that the same may not be injured or deteriorated by the management or mode of culture thereof.' I objected to any other stipulation whatever, and doubtless owe these terms to the liberality of a discerning landlord, and of those who acted for him.

"Now, how does this work? There is a ready and good market for hay within a moderate distance, and I find my account in highly manuring the meadows, and so apply almost all my farmyard-manure, keeping quite as much stock as the land will carry. In the last five years I have purchased artificial manure to the amount of £325, and sold hay and straw for £310; but £125 worth of the manure was used for turnips, which were consumed in fattening cattle, from which a profit was derived of £280, an equal sum for profit being taken for grazing; and this shows that all the artificial manure used upon the farm was paid for by the sale of surplus hay and straw, and the profit arising from that portion of the manure employed in raising turnips for fattening stock. The land has improved in condition every year, the produce has considerably augmented, and the present crops look well. The number of acres in wheat last year averaged eight sacks and two bushels, or 41 quarters per acre, the clever all bold, and so good that there was only one bushel of fall to a load of five quarters. Under these circumstances I am surely entitled to recommend this plan of cropping; and I entreat owners and occupiers to make choice of one field at least for the experiment next autumn. Some of my neighbours have already acted partially upon this system, and I hear rumours that others are about to try it. The probability of successfully growing wheat every other year, on the same land, will, doubtless, urge many to make the attempt; and, if an example should be set by a few intelligent persons, the result will assuredly be all that we can wish.

"The use of artificial manures is becoming more general, and, as experience proves their value, will be still wider diffused. Draining, reduction of seed, manures, leases, and the application of chemistry to agriculture are now so much the subjects of earnest attention that they must inevitably produce a great and permanent increase in the quantity of home-grown corn—sufficient, perhaps, to feed our own population; and I believe that object can be accomplished at Free-Trade prices.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your very obedient servant,
"W. WILLIAMS."

THE GAME LAWS.

The following letters, which have appeared in the Times, show how little the tenant-farmers understand the nature of the warfare which on their behalf is being carried on against the game laws. How little must they have studied the character of their oppressors, the game-preserving landowners, if they suppose that any mere statement of the evils of the game laws can prepare the way for their amendment in our landlord Houses of Parliament! No, there must be evidence—abundant, full, demonstrative evidence—such as the whole class of squires, from those whose wits have been sharpened on the turf, to the "punch-in-the-head" game-preservers, cannot gainsay. This is being done quietly and laboriously before Mr. Bright's committee. That committee is a select one, and therefore we of course know nothing of what takes place there, except what we have heard from witnesses who have been examined; but from the statements we have heard from several of those witnesses, as to the demeanour and course of examination adopted by the game-law supporters, we have reason to believe that the evidence will be not merely conclusive against the game laws, but will be a striking exposure of semi-feudal landlordism. The following are the letters we refer to:—

"MR. BRIGHT AND THE GAME LAWS.

"To the Editor of the Times.

"Sir,—Can you inform me what has become of Mr. Bright's committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the game laws? From the statements made by Mr. Bright, on asking for that committee, and the readiness with which its appointment was concurred in by Government, I had hoped long before this to have seen some practical result come of it. However, I have been woefully disappointed as yet.

"But though the committee are doing nothing, I am sorry to say such is not the case with the vermin called hares and rabbits on the farm I am unfortunate enough to hold, and on many others in the same neighbourhood. There they are, night and day, eating and destroying (yes, they destroy double what they eat) my crops to a dreadful extent. 'All's fish that comes to net' with them—vetches, rye, the young wheats, all are nibbled off or trodden down as soon as they appear above ground. And the worst of it is that, do what damage they may to my crops, my only property, I dare not touch one of them; if I knocked one on the head, I should get a notice to quit on my plate at the next audit, to help in digesting my dinner. While the tenant-farmer is being ruined in this way, the demoralization of the labouring classes goes on; poaching, allways with keepers, and other grave offences are on the increase; and while they in prison suffer for their breaches of the laws, we are being further taxed to support their families in the work-house. Yes, Sir, it is all very well for gentlemen to preserve game for their amusement, but it is hardly honest to do this at the expense of the hardworking tenant-farmer, and at the cost of the morality of the lower classes; indeed we may truly say, with the fable of the frogs, 'What's fun to you is death to us.' And if Mr. Bright fails to help us out of our misery with the excellent start he has got, I can only say he is not the man I take him for.

"Trusting to learning soon what is likely to be done in this matter for relieving the tenant-farmers,

"I am, Sir, your humble servant,

"A TENANT-FARMER.

"Pershore, Worcestershire, May 22."

Let us remind the tenant-farmers that they must not be satisfied with looking to Mr. Bright or any one else to "help them out of their misery," but must put their own shoulders to the wheel. The bonds in which they are held by landlordism are not silken ones, and require not only the efforts of their true friends, but their own also, to strike them off. Let them remember at the next election, that a few tenant-farmers in the House of Commons would wonderfully strengthen the hands of those who are now endeavouring to ameliorate the laws by which tenant-farmers are oppressed.

The following is Mr. Bright's reply to the above letter:—

"To the Editor of the Times.

"Sir,—In your paper of Friday last, a 'Tenant-Farmer,' writing from Pershore, in Worcestershire, asks what has become of the committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the game laws? and expresses his great disappointment that he has hitherto heard of no practical result from its labours. I suspect the 'Tenant-Farmer' is but little acquainted with the progress of inquiries before select committees, especially on questions which affect the interests or amusements of the rich, or he would not have been surprised that no proceedings of the Game Laws Committee have yet been laid before Parliament and the country.

"For his information I may state, that the committee sit generally three days in each week, and that evidence has already been received from the counties of Middlesex, Hertford, Buckingham, Sussex, Wilt, Hants, and Dorset, and witnesses are in readiness from all the counties where game-preserving has been practised to a serious extent. The county of Worcester offers a good field for inquiry, and, for anything I know to the contrary, your correspondent himself, or one of his neighbours, will give evidence as to the game grievance in the parish of Pershore. I am not at liberty to enter into particulars of what passes in a select committee, or I could give satisfactory reasons why the progress of the inquiry has been less rapid than was expected. I hope, notwithstanding all obstacles, something may be done to expose the true character of the laws which game proprietors have made for the preservation of their amusements. If your correspondent, the 'Tenant-Farmer,' will bear in mind that, for a generation past, the crops of his brother farmers have been more or less destroyed—that tens of thousands of the peasantry have been sent to gaol—that many hundreds of them have been transported from their native land—and that scores of human lives have been sacrificed—that game might abound—that men who have not the ability or the manliness to make themselves of some use in the world might not expire of actually doing nothing—and that whilst all this has been going on no landed proprietor, no farmers' friend, no protector of agriculture has raised his voice against it,—I say, if your correspondent will bear all this in mind, he will perhaps have a little patience with me, and make some allowance if I have not yet succeeded in relieving his class from the 'misery' in which he describes them to be. I have done something to expose the heartlessness and tyranny of the game laws, and, when the exposure is as complete as I can make it, it must depend in part upon the spirit and independence of the 'tenant-farmers,' but more, I fear, upon the sense of right which prevails among the mass of the English people, whether an effectual remedy shall be applied. "I am, respectfully,

"64, Jermyn-street, May 25."

A ROYAL GAME CASE.

WHO CAN TOUCH PITCH WITHOUT DEFILEMENT?

It was with feelings of no ordinary sorrow that we read the report of a game-law conviction, which recently occurred at Windsor, at the instance of Prince Albert's gamekeepers. It is a very bad case. All concerned in it, from the entrapping keeper to the convicting magistrates, exhibit the demoralizing effects of the game laws. Prince Albert has acquired the affectionate respect of the people of this country, no less by his private virtues than by his careful abstinence, in what may be termed his public character, from all that could offend public opinion. But there is one rock ahead upon which, if his Royal Highness does not think for himself, there is some danger that his fair fame may be damaged, if not wrecked. The Prince has the misfortune to be fond of game-preserving and battue-shooting, and of course his dependents spare none of the accustomed means of obtaining and maintaining and defending "a large head of game." Battue-shooting is a sadly puerile amusement, while it is the foster parent of much crime and oppression. For the indulgence of it by Prince Albert there are, however, some excuses. He comes from Germany, where great numbers of wild animals are maintained in extensive forests, or slightly-cultivated districts, which are in the occupation of the proprietors. Skilful farming is unknown, little capital is employed in culture, and the value of agricultural produce is low for want of markets, and so forth. There, probably, game does little mischief, and what it does falls on the property of the owner of the game, the soil, and its produce. There are no tenants who have paid rent for the land in order to grow grain for their own profit, which is afterwards devoured by their landlord's game. Neither is the state of the rural population in that country such as to render game-preserving seriously detrimental to them. Then, Prince Albert's immediate personal associates in this country are many of them game-preservers. His Royal Highness visits the Duke of Buckingham, where he is treated with a wholesale butchery of pheasants and hares, and is shown, at the same time, a contented, well-dressed, and well-fed peasantry, which was a fraud and a sham; while he hears nothing of the poachers' wing of the county prison at Aylesbury, —a sad, too sad, reality—which his Grace of Buckingham's preserves help to keep so constantly occupied. The Prince—if he thought about it—might easily have supposed, from what he saw and from what he did not see or hear of, that game-preserving at Stowe is consistent with the well-being of the labourers and the farmers. Then, his own preserves are kept on land occupied by himself or by the Queen, and though we may regret to see land so misapplied by the highest personages of the realm, none can deny that if the Prince prefers hares, pheasants, and rabbits as farming stock, to sheep and cattle, he has a clear right to pursue such unthrifty farming.

But, though his Royal Highness's preserves may not be the means of plundering and oppressing any tenants, yet, if not a head of his game ever wanders from the land in his own occupation, his preserves inflict cruel moral and physical evils upon the population of the district. Let any one who doubts that assertion read and ponder over the following case. The scene of this "conviction" was the private office in Windsor of Mr. Secker, the clerk to the county magistrates. This is the substance of the report as it appeared in the daily papers:—

"THE GAME LAWS.—On Thursday last, an old man, named James Dean, between 60 and 70 years of age, a shoemaker, of East Hampstead, was charged before P. H. Crutchley, Esq., and Captain Bulkeley (county magistrates for Berks), on the information of George White, one of Prince Albert's gamekeepers for the Swinley district, with having unlawfully offered for sale four pheasants and six pheasants' eggs.

"Mr. C. S. Voules, solicitor, appeared for the Crown, and Mr. J. J. Williams, barrister-at-law, for the defendant.

"The case excited considerable interest, in consequence of the method which has been adopted to charge the defendant.

"Charles Milley, gamekeeper to Sir John White, of Warfield, examined by Mr. Voules. On the night of Monday, the 19th instant, the defendant came to my house at Winkfield, in consequence of a letter I had written to him that morning. When I returned that evening I found James Dean at my house, and saw me. I let a person, named John Dean, who was safely in at the back door to hear what was said, and Dean told me he had only three pheasants' eggs by him just then, but that he had three hares and a cock pheasant, and a hen pheasant."

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, May 31, 1845.

We have devoted so much space to the Bazaar that we have little to spare for any other subject. Still we are so deeply impressed with the importance of Mr. Ward's motion, on Tuesday next, for a committee of inquiry into the last pretence of monopoly—the peculiar burdens borne by the land, that we must call attention to its present position. It is absolutely necessary that the Free-Trade members should be punctual in their attendance, so as to prevent the repetition of the trick of counting out the House. We know that the monopolists are very anxious to prevent the exposure of their last miserable subterfuge, and that they will try to avert it by every means in their power. What they are most eager to suppress we are most anxious to have made known; and we trust that our parliamentary friends will submit to any personal inconvenience rather than allow this most important motion to fall to the ground.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Tuesday are occupied with the letter from Queen Poincaré to the King of the French, in which she details the treatment she has received from time to time from the French authorities, and calls for his Majesty's interposition in her behalf. A special envoy reached Paris on Monday, for the purpose of announcing to the King of the French the abdication of Don Carlos in favour of his son. This communication is said to have been accompanied by a demand to be freed from his present bondage, "there being no longer any reason for continuing him in captivity." It is added that the Prince of Asturias had demanded passports to enable him to proceed to Spain "as a faithful subject of her Majesty Queen Isabella II." The Journal and the Revue, in referring to the refusal of the Emperor Napoleon to ratify the treaty concluded by his envoy with France, states that the chief ground of his determination originated in the refusal of that person of a large extent of the territory of his empire, which had never belonged to the Regency of Algiers. Despatches had been received by the Minister of War from Marshal Bugeaud, dated the 9th and 10th instant, in the former of which he announced his arrival in the Oued-Sahel, and in the latter he gave the result of two affairs on the 15th between the remainder of a convoy and a body of 500 Kabyles, who had attacked it. The enemy were beaten off with a loss of several men killed and 20 made prisoners, and 300 head of cattle. Another affair of even less importance took place on the ensuing day. On the evening of the 14th the Marshal received the submission of several minor tribes.

We learn, in addition to what has been published respecting the expedition of the Aurès (Algiers), that in the affair of the 3rd the French had 25 men wounded, and General Bugeaud was struck by a musket ball in the leg, but received no injury, as the ball did not penetrate the bone. The loss of the enemy is said to have been great. The Ouled-Daouds had 30 killed, of whom four were chiefs. — Paris paper of Tuesday.

At a late agricultural meeting the following striking circumstances were related by the mayor of a commune in the department of Cantal:—He applied to the commune, having some years ago resolved to let out its lands on farming leases, and that the payments should be either made in money or produce, according to the will of the lessee, the good effects of this resolution were such that persons presented themselves in increasing numbers every year for land; whereas, previously to this act, the poor classes, not having land to cultivate, resorted to the number of 40 and 50 a family to the large cities north and south of France. In the second year from the period when the communal lands were let out, the mayor had only to grant half the number of passports; on the third, but 25; and the fourth, 10. This example will, without doubt, be followed by other communes.

SPAIN.—A telegraphic despatch from Bayonne, dated the 26th, has announced from Madrid that the session of the Spanish Cortes was closed by the Queen in person on the 23rd, and that the new constitution was promulgated on the same day.

BAVARIA. May 21.—The royal sanction respecting the new Corn Law has not yet appeared in the Moniteur. It is stated in well-informed circles that the execution of the measure will be delayed for some time. The conclusions of the various railways have to English companies have received the royal sanction. The Society of St. Sebastian of Brussels has just received a present of a splendid vase from the Queen of England, in commemoration of her visit to that society whilst passing through the above city. — St. 26. In consequence of the further rise in the price of corn, a Bazaar was held on Monday, the 26th, the greatest on any Bazaar, viz., three centimes in a loaf of one kilogramme (two pounds), and four centimes in a loaf of one kilogramme and a half. The Gazette of Mons says, the price of corn continues to rise in an alarming manner. At the market at Mons, on the 21st, there was a rise of two francs four centimes per hectolitre on wheat, and one franc three centimes on rye. The Beau de Luxembourg says, at the last market at Arlon there was a rise in the price of corn greater than we have before known. In the market of the 15th the double hectolitre of wheat was sold at 31 and 32 francs; in the last market it was sold at 38 and 39 francs, and there is no doubt that the rise will continue. We repeat, without any disguise, everything relative to the rise in the price of corn, in order to assist the resolution which the Government is to take relative to the promulgation of the Corn Law. According to the information which we have received, it may be considered as decided that the promulgation shall be adjourned.

SWITZERLAND.—Eight of the political prisoners confined in the tower of the Hohenrat, have effected their escape by breaking the bars of the window, and letting themselves down by means of a rope.

The Basle Gazette has stated that Dr. Steiger had received his pardon; but a letter from Lucerne of the 23rd affirms that such is not the fact. The Executive Council have, however, been called upon to report in what manner he can be prevented from disturbing the tranquillity of the country, should his life be spared.

AUSTRIA.—A Vienna journal of the 15th inst. says:—"The exhibition of the progress of the useful arts in Austria was opened this day. Our Society of Industry has invited the exhibitors to a grand supper in the Hall of the Redoubt. The Court has already visited the exhibition. The report of the operations of our Savings Bank during 1844 is extremely satisfactory, particularly as it shows an increasing system of economy among the lower orders of society."

STUTTGART. May 19.—The booksellers of this city, and of Frankfurt and Augsburg, have agreed to hold a book fair alternately in the three places, if the Austrian book trade should not object to the last. If so, the fair will be held in the other two only.

DARMSTADT.—The Second Chamber has unanimously agreed to petition the Government to employ all their efforts to obtain, at the approaching Commercial Congress, a system of protective duties for the linen and cotton industries.

MUNICH. May 18.—In consequence of the rainy weather all sorts of corn have become dearer, and, judging by the eagerness with which purchases are made by parties from Württemberg and Switzerland, it would appear that apprehensions of a deficient harvest are not confined to this country. A cattle disease has just broken out in a neighbouring village.

According to a letter from Naples of the 8th, in the Augsburgh Gazette, the Neapolitan Government has signed a treaty of commerce with France and England, and the ratifications are to be exchanged within three months.

BERLIN. May 16.—A lieutenant has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for fighting a duel at Königsberg with a civilian, who was mortally wounded. The seconds of the former were sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

FRANKFURT. May 16.—An archiepiscopal circular, issued a few days ago to the deacons of the archdioceses, enjoined on all the clergy of the diocese that Professor Dr. Schreiber, by joining the so-called German Catholics, is excommunicated. — German paper.

TREATMENT OF THE JEWS IN POLAND.—WARSAW, May 15.—An ordinance of the Council of Administration directs that, after the 1st of July this year, no Jew of either sex should be permitted to have a public house in the villages, nor to manufacture, distil, or sell, any home-made liquors, either under their own names, or the names of others, as partners, factors, or assistants; nor, after that day, shall any Jew reside in a public-house, distillery, or brew-house. — Hamburg paper.

CHEAP POSTAGE IN INDIA.—It is a positive fact that the natives of the north-west carry the spirit of economy to such a degree of intensity that ten letters are often sent under one cover, which does not weigh more than the tenth of an ounce. This cover, which often contains all the letters despatched from a town during the day, is, according to the last privilege, conveyed a hundred miles for half an anna, or less than the tenth of a penny, each. What is the penny postage to this? — Allen's Indian Mail, May 24.

DOMESTIC.

On Tuesday morning, shortly before one o'clock, a fire, involving a serious destruction of valuable property, broke out upon the well-known and extensive range of premises termed Raggett's Hotel, Dover-street, Piccadilly. The discovery appears to have been made by police-constable 41 C, who observed smoke issuing through the windows on the southern corner of the first floor. Several persons quickly made their appearance at the front and back windows in their night-dresses. Such a strong hold had the fire obtained, that in less than ten minutes the flames were shooting forth from the windows with great fury, and extending nearly half-way across the road. Notwithstanding twelve engines, including those from the neighbouring parishes, the London Establishment and those of the West of England and County companies, were upon the spot, copiously supplied with water, and energetically worked, the flames continued to burn with ungovernable fury, until, by the time the roof fell in, they obtained so great an altitude that the horizon was illuminated to its most distant verge. Meanwhile the fire-escapes of the Royal Society for the Protection of Life from Fire rendered essential service in saving life. It was not until the fire had been burning upwards of three hours that it was clearly ascertained that any one had perished. Several half-breath escapes were experienced by the parties on the premises. Two ladies were saved by rushing from the blazing building in their night dresses, and making their escape from the balcony over the door of the hotel on the shoulders of the populace; two others were rescued by the fire-escape, while one or two others escaped by the roof. Lord Huntingdon and his lady had just returned from the theatre, when, surprised by an unusual noise, he went to the nursery, where he found a terrible fire raging. He succeeded in rescuing his child, but before he could return to the room again the nurse, Mrs. Jones, had been burned to death. Mrs. Raggett, in attempting to descend by the fire-escape, lost her balance, fell into the street, and soon died from the effects of the fall. The body of Mrs. Round, the wife of John Round, Esq., M.P. for Maidon, and others have been found, as also those of Mr. William Raggett, and a female unknown. The fire originated, it is supposed, in the apartment of Miss King, a lady who was sleeping at the hotel. At the time of the outbreak of the fire, besides the parties connected with the hotel, the following persons were present:—The Earl of Huntingdon, and his sons, their son, Lord Hastings, with his nurse, Mrs. Jones (her ladyship and suite not having long before arrived in London); Colonel Bouverie, of the Guards; Lord Lowth; Mrs. Round, wife of the member for Maidon, Essex (who, with her daughter, had in ended to be present at the Queen's drawing-room on Tuesday); Mr. King, a merchant of Bristol, his wife and daughter, and their servants. The following is the official report of the damage:—Nearly one-half of the front of building and greater part of the back and contents destroyed; exposed cause of fire, curtain becoming ignited from a candle; five lives lost; insurance: unknown. No. 42, Lord Gardner, slight damage to furniture; insured in the Sun Office. No. 44, Mr. E. Moxon, publisher, slight damage to building. Fire extinguished by eight brigade engines, with those of the County and West of England Offices, and two belonging to the parishes.

The speculators in railway shares have been somewhat startled by a clause in the income-tax papers just issued, which enumerates the profits made by "buying and selling shares in railways," among the items of income. Some, who have made their thousands during the railway mania, will find this a most inconvenient clause, if it is put in force; but there will be the difficulty, for there is sure to be a great deal of evasion on the subject.—Sun.

From a return made lately, it is stated that in London and the metropolis alone, there are 1793 omnibus conductors, 1662 drivers of cabs, and 4516 drivers of hackney carriages and omnibuses.

Mr. Seton, the gentleman who was wounded in the duel near Portsmouth, is not yet considered out of danger. For the last few days he has remained nearly the same; indeed it is said the appearance of the wound has not been quite so satisfactory; still the surgeons have great hopes of his ultimate recovery.

The number of deaths in the metropolis during the week ending May 24 is the smallest, we believe, on record since the establishment of the Registrar-General's office, being only 810—less than that of the previous week by 25, and than the average of five springs by 78, and showing a diminution, in less than two months, of about 500. The number about the beginning of March exceeded 1300.

It is calculated that the fees to counsel during the present session, in connexion with railway bills, will exceed £100,000.

On Saturday afternoon, between three and four o'clock, while a number of men were engaged at Cripplegate workhouse in removing bricks, preparatory to taking down part of the building, the weight of bricks piled up in the upper floor caused it to give way, carrying with it the three floors below. Two men were found buried in the ruins. One of them, named David Cauty, was taken out dead, and another, named George Bedford, was severely injured that his recovery is doubtful.

A number of noblemen and gentlemen, admirers of the late Thomas Hood, have set on foot a subscription for the purpose of making a provision for his widow and children. Sir Robert Peel has contributed the sum of £50.

On Saturday last, 18 additional clerks were taken into the Money-order service of the General Post-office, making a total of 88 extra officers for this department within the last quarter. Twelve messengers have also been appointed. The increase in money-orders is now about thirty-fold; and the expense of this section of the service upwards of £12,000 per annum.

Between ten on Saturday night and daylight on Sunday morning, no less than three attempts at suicide were made by females, by precipitation from London bridge into the river, and which, in two instances, terminated in death, their bodies not having yet been recovered. The other was rescued by the watchman of Fishmongers'-hall, who, at the peril of his own life, jumped into the river, and succeeded in bringing her ashore. She was taken to the station-house at Giltick-hill in a state of insensibility, and on her recovery gave the name of Isabella Ratcliffe.

The reduction in the price of coal at Newcastle, consequent on the abolition of the vend regulation, has been less than many persons anticipated would have taken place. The best Wall's-end coal has fallen about 2s. 3d. a ton, and the second-rate coals have been reduced 9s. and 1s. 3d. a ton, but several collieries still maintain their old price.

The polling at the vestry meeting of St. George-in-the-East closed at four o'clock on Saturday last, when the votes stood thus:—For the rate, 30; against it, 161.

Tuesday, being the Queen's birthday, was celebrated with the usual rejoicings, and a grand drawing-room at Buckingham-palace.

The execution of Joseph Connor is fixed to take place on Monday morning next.

On Saturday last, Henry Woods, driver of one of the Fulleran carrier's carts, was charged by the Duke of Wellington, at Marlborough street Police-office, with furious driving, having run against the duke while the latter was walking out of Park-lane into Piccadilly. The driver was convicted of an assault on his grace, and fined £4, or one month's imprisonment.

An American negro, named George Augustus, of the Ontario, in the port of London, was charged at the Thames Police Court, on Friday, with having in his possession 42 lbs. of foreign-manufactured tobacco. He was fined £100 by Mr. Ballantine, and told to make the best use he could for the Commissioners of Customs.

The Protestant Dissenters' Conference have issued an address to the Irish people, in which, while expressing their strong sympathy with them, as suffering under many grievances, especially from an alien Church establishment, they denounce the Maynooth grant as hostile to the voluntary principle.

At a recent meeting of the Free Church Assembly, Dr. McFarlan, in referring to the efforts and success of the Free Church, said that instead of 470 congregations, corresponding to the number of outgoing ministers at the time of the disruption, there were now in connection with the Free Church upwards of 700 congregations, and 600 ministers; and the total number of adherents, old and young, might be fairly estimated at about a third part of the whole population of Scotland. About 100 churches had been built, and the whole expense of their erection had in many instances been defrayed by the congregation. On Wednesday a deputation from the assembly jewellers of Birmingham waited upon Prince Albert, at three o'clock, with a number of specimens of their skill in this species of manufacture, which is said to employ above 21,000 persons in Birmingham alone. Their object was to request the patronage of his Royal Highness, and that he would accept some articles of British jewellery, and, by wearing them, improve the prospects of the trade, which are at present much depressed. His Royal Highness entered into a general conversation with the deputation, and expressed his admiration of the elegance and beauty of the articles.

The Repeal Association met at the Conciliation-hall on Monday. The chief point of interest was the Government scheme of academical education, which Mr. O'Connell and Mr. H. Grattan denounced in unmeasured terms. Mr. S. O'Brien, Mr. M. J. Barry, and Mr. Davis, of "The Young Ireland" party, defended the Government scheme, but in other respects they condemned it. Mr. O'Connell replied, and took occasion to deny that there was any such party as "Young Ireland"—a name assumed by a few individuals. He was for Old Ireland, and he was sure Old Ireland would stand by him. The rent for the week was announced to be £310.

The Irish Catholic Bishops have come to the following resolution on the new education scheme:—"Resolved—That having maturely considered the bill now pending before Parliament for the extension of academical education in Ireland, and giving credit to her Majesty's Government for their kind and generous intentions, manifested in the endowment of the College of Maynooth, we find ourselves compelled, by a sense of duty, to declare that, anxious as we are to extend the advantages of education, we cannot give our approbation to the proposed system, as we deem it dangerous to the faith and morals of the Catholic people." On this resolution they have based a memorial to the Lord Lieutenant, in which they claim that the power to appoint certain professors, viz., of history, logic, metaphysics, morals, philosophy, geology, and anatomy, should be vested in a board to consist in part of the Roman Catholic Bishops of the province in which the college may be erected, such board to have also the power of removing any professor proved to be guilty of attempting to undermine the faith, or damage the morals of any student.

A dreadful accident occurred near Tintrim, in the county of Mayo, on Wednesday, at the house of a man named Hallinan, who had been engaged in illicit distillation. A keg of the spirits was on the floor of the house, in which there were three girls, when a man named Garvey, who was drunk, came in, and calling for a light to prove the spirits, set fire to the whole, and caused a terrible conflagration. One of the girls was burned to death; the two others were dragged out, but were much injured.

CAPITAL FOR FARMING.—The late Mr. Coke, when tenants came to him for farms, said, "How much money have you got in your pocket? I have farms of every size, from £1000 to £10,000; how much money have you got? Here is the list."—"I have £100."—"There are ten farms, take your choice." He had a farm for any man, with any amount of capital; and he used to say to them, "If you have got £1000 you must only have 100 acres. You have not enough to stock more. You must have £10 an acre, or you cannot manage your farms." And that, gentlemen, is at the bottom of the poverty which is so abundant in many parts of this country; it is ambition that prompts a man to attempt more than he can carry out, and with £1000 in his pocket to take a farm with which he ought to have £2000.—Dr. Buckland.

WAGES AND FOOD.—To the Editor of the Bolton Free Press.—Sir, I am a boiler maker, and within the last twelve months my wages have been raised from 20s. to 24s. a week, and the 20s. would now go as far as the 24s. would have done three or four years since. This state of things has seemed curious to me, to see that my wages should have risen so much while the price of food has fallen so much; because in those bad and dear times I used to go to meetings against the Anti-Corn-Law League, and the speakers used to tell me and others to beware of the League, as they wanted to have cheap food that they might have us in their power and drop our wages. Well, cheap food has come; my masters are Free-Traders, and my wages have risen from 20s. to 24s. a week. Some weeks I could not get work even at those low wages, and then we had to pinch for it and eat porridge. When we could get flour we had to pay 2s. 6d. a dozen for it; now we can get as good for 1s. 6d. This surprises me altogether. I thought I would see what wages I should have been receiving now, if cheap food reduced wages. I made a rule of three sum of it, and I find I should have been receiving 12s. a week at this time; instead of that I get twenty-eight shillings! Your constant reader, NOISY HAMMER.—Little Bolton, May 20, 1845.

THE "AGRICULTURAL MIND."—AXMINSTER.—A farmer in this neighbourhood has lately discharged one of his labourers on the sole ground of his wife being a witch. The discovery was made on this wise:—The son of a poor neighbour of the farmer alluded to having been seized a few weeks since with a paralytic attack, recourse was had by the boy's parents to the "white witch" of the neighbourhood, who forthwith imputed the affliction to the operation of the "evil eye" of some female neighbour. This neighbour was, therefore, believed by the sick parents to be the wife of the labourer whose discharge we have mentioned. The poor fellow, we hear, is on the sole account thrown out of work and unable to obtain any employment whatever. The very ignorant farmer who discharged him is deaf to all remonstrance, and congratulates himself on having got rid of a workman whose better half he believes to possess such dangerous supernatural powers. So much for the march of intellect.—Western Luminary.

THE CONDITION OF THE PROTECTED.—We hear from every side bitter complaints of the condition of the farmers. With present rents, present prices, present systems of cultivation, and the maintenance of the landlords' present "head of game," it is plainly impossible that the protected tenants can live. To a vast extent, they are paying rent out of their capital, and there can be no doubt that another good harvest will be the ruin of thousands. A review of these things has converted many of the most intelligent to the principles of Free Trade. But there are masses to be found as blind as oxen. They are dying of protection, but, instead of discarding the bane, they shut their eyes to all the past, and say that they are suffering from the Canadian Corn Bill and the new Tariff. Ridiculously wrong as they are in this, it might afford them some hope to imagine they knew the cause of the mischief, if they could indulge any idea of its removal. But when they apply to their members, the men whom their insensate voices returned to defend protection, they have no better consolation than the assurance that the concessions which have been made to Free Trade are irrevocable. They are told that the idea of retracing their steps is altogether absurd, and that it is almost hopeless to maintain the ruinous protection which yet remains.—Sheffield Independent.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, May 26.—Since this day week a considerable quantity of rain has fallen: within the last day or two the wind has changed to the south-west, and the weather is consequently more genial. There is not much wheat in the market to-day, and the show of land carriage samples is small; the finest samples are 2s., and other sorts 1s. to 2s., dearer than this day week. Barley, of which the arrivals are scanty, maintains its price without a free sale. The country demand for Oats is larger than usual at this time of the year, and notwithstanding we have very fair supplies, prices remain quite firm, and in some instances more money is obtained. Beans and Peas arrive in trifling quantities, and sell readily at higher prices. S. H. LUCAS and SON.

THE LEAGUE.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. James Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Birmingham and the neighbourhood are respectfully informed, that Subscriptions may be paid by Free-Traders to Mr. Charles Geach, Midland Bank, Union-street, Birmingham, the local Treasurer.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRATION.

The Council of the League finding that more than half of the persons whose names are on the Middlesex Register have claimed since the last contested election in 1837, they have directed circulars to be sent to them requesting an answer as to whether they will support Free-Trade candidates in the event of an election. As it is not considered that those who return pledges themselves to support ANY PARTICULAR candidate, but only that they are willing to support the principle of Free Trade, it is hoped that ALL who have received letters, and are favourable to the principles the Anti-Corn-Law League advocate, will consider it a duty to return their letters answered, as it is important that the Council should be able to know their supporters from their opponents.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

REGISTER, REGISTER, REGISTER!

We entreat every Free-Trader to read, and read again, the subjoined instructions with regard to the approaching registration, and to give himself and his neighbours no rest until he and they shall have committed themselves to the grave, social, and moral issues to which those instructions relate. They have been prepared with the utmost care; their accuracy may be entirely relied upon; and the matter of which they treat is of the most vital and urgent moment. Let no one be disgusted or repelled by the dry, lawyer-like look. That dry-looking volume of small type is the most important article, and all comparison, in this number of our paper, is made with nothing better for the Free-Trade cause than that one and all of our readers should read it with the most interesting one.

It is to be utterly impossible to exaggerate the importance of the work which Free-Traders will be called upon to do, from and after the 20th day of this month. We cannot more fitly express our sense of the importance of this work, than by begging our friends to look at the day with as earnest and active an interest as they can. It was to be the date of the annual meeting for the instant assembling of a Free-Trade Parliament. It will be that, virtually, though not formally. The approaching general registration will, essentially and really, be a general election. It will, in all probability, decide the character of the next Parliament. The next Parliament will, to a certainty, decide, for many years to come, the fate of the Free-Trade question, and of the vast national and human interests which that question represents. On what is done or left undone, now, it depends whether Great Britain shall, or shall not, escape the recurrence, in a fearfully aggravated form, of the miseries and horrors of the years 1841 and 1842.

Registration is now really almost all that we have to do. Public opinion is sufficiently made up. To call public meetings for discussion were now only to invite opponents who will not come, to reiterate arguments by which all the world has been long ago convinced, and to explode fallacies and absurdities at which the world is almost tired of laughing. Parliamentary agitation is, no doubt, still useful, and will be still vigorously maintained. Yet its uses are not exactly for the purpose of parliamentary conviction: the landlord mind will not be convinced—the Ministerial and ex-Ministerial mind is convinced already. All our doctrines are now formally endorsed by the leaders of both the great parliamentary parties, Whig and Tory. If the conversion of statesmen to Free-Trade principles were all that is needed to settle the question, the League might have safely dissolved itself last week, after the debate on Lord John Russell's resolutions. But opinion, parliamentary or popular, goes for little, except so far as it takes that shape in which statesmen are constitutionally bound, and politically necessitated, to recognise it. It is not more true that both Whig and Tory hold Free-Trade doctrines, than it is true that neither Whig nor Tory can or will carry Free-Trade doctrines into effect, without a certainty of support from the constituencies. Unregistered opinion is, at this time and in this country, among the feeblest of political agents. Opinion, to be effectual, must become active. Opinion, to make itself heard, must take a voice—the voice provided for it by the constitution. Opinion must study now, not Adam Smith, but electoral and registration law. Opinion must get itself on the registry, in good voting condition. Opinion must be ready to come to the poll, the instant it is called, or it will never find its way to the statute-book.

As registration business is a thing, of all others, which demands business energy, and business promptitude and vigilance, we beseech our friends and constituents, the Free-Trade public, to lose no time. Begin at once your preparations for the 20th of this month. We would emphatically repeat the advice we gave last week:—Let every parish in England and Wales have forthwith its "Free-Trade Registration Committee." Wherever there are half-a-dozen, or two or three, good Free-Traders, with their hearts in the cause, let them meet together and organize themselves to work this matter thoroughly. Look over the lists most carefully, to see who is not there that ought to be there—and who is there that ought not to be there. Be ready with your claims and your objections, duly signed and duly served; and, for every kind and degree of information, advice, and assistance that may be necessary, communicate immediately with the Chairman or Secretary of the League, either in London or Manchester, and rely on the promptest and fullest attention being given to your application. Wherever there is one Free-Trader, in the remotest district of Great Britain, able and willing to work in this cause, let him not for a moment fancy himself isolated and alone. He is of the League, and he may count on the League's aid. Let him ask, and the League will answer—let him call, and the League will come. The experience, the organization, the resources, the prestige of the League are a national property, held in trust for the nation's use, and may be freely commanded by any and every man who invokes their help in the work of enfranchising the nation's industry.

The first step which requires to be taken is that of the claims for counties. The time for making these claims is from the 20th of June to the 20th of July, inclusive; any claim made after the latter date will be too late.

The county franchise is divided into four important classes of qualification:—

"1st. Freehold, which includes the ancient 40s. freehold of inheritance for ever; and property held under a lease for lives, which should be described as freehold in the notice of claim.

"2nd. Leasehold for a term of not less than 60 years, originally of £10 annual value; or if for a term of not less than 20 years, of £50 annual value.

3rd. Copyhold of £10 annual value.

4th. Occupiers of land, or building and land under one landlord, subject to a bond fide rent of £50 a year.

In the first class, the owner of a 40s. freehold for ever must have been in possession from the 31st of January of the present year; and the same in the case of the owner of leasehold for lives of 40s. a year, provided he be himself in the occupation of the property. If the owner of the lease for lives do not occupy, the property must be of the annual value of £10.

In the second class, the owner must have been in possession from the 31st of July, 1844.

And in the third class, the occupation must also be from the 31st of July, 1844.

It will be obvious that the first thing to be done by our friends is to ascertain how many Free-Traders there are in each parish possessing qualifications, and who are not now on the register; and this should be set about forthwith, that the notices of claim may be made in proper time.

There are various means of obtaining this information, as, for instance—

In all those districts where the purchasing of qualifications, as recommended by the League, was taken up systematically, lists of the names will have been kept by those who made the conveyances.

The poor-rate books may be examined carefully to ascertain the names of owners of property, and also £50 occupiers therein, who are not registered.

Overseers, and collectors of rates and income-tax; builders; building and land agents, who are friendly, may also give much information.

In the neighbourhood of large towns, such as Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, &c., there are merchants, manufacturers, and others, who occupy large houses and premises in the suburbs at a rental of £50; these, if not within the parliamentary borough, will be qualified, and, if not on the county register, should claim. Last year, on a careful examination of the rate-book of a township just over the boundary of the borough of Manchester, from forty to fifty occupiers of this description were found who were not then on the register for South Lancashire.

The next thing to be done is to take care that the claims are made out in proper form, and served in due time.

It is most convenient to use printed forms of notice; and these should be filled up with the greatest care, the following particulars being closely attended to:—

The name of the claimant to be written at full length.

The place of the claimant's abode (not the place where his business only is carried on).

The nature of the qualification must be correctly described in the third column. Any misdescription here will be fatal if the vote should be objected to. Leasehold or copyhold must not be described as freehold; or freehold as leasehold.

The situation of the qualification must also be accurately given as required in the fourth column. In cases of successive occupation, as, for instance, where the voter has removed from one farm to another since the 31st of last July, each set of premises must be set forth in the claim.

A correct copy of each claim must be kept, and the claim and the copy must each be signed by the claimant himself.

Should any of our friends desire to be furnished with further information on any particular point, they will please to address their inquiries to Mr. Paulton, League-office, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. Hickin, Secretary to the League, Manchester.

PROTECTION THE BANE OF THE COLONIES.—MONOPOLIST OPPRESSION OF THE NEGROES.

We are constantly hearing complaints from the colonial monopolists of the losses and ruin they have sustained by the abolition of slavery, of the idleness of the emancipated negroes, of the falling off in the production of sugar and coffee, and of the impossibility of competing with slave labour, because of the high wages demanded by the free negroes. These statements are eagerly caught hold of by slaveowners to show that, by the confession of the proprietors themselves, the experiment of the abolition of slavery in the British colonies has proved a failure. We regret to find that statements like these, in which the enemies of emancipation rejoice, are not confined to the planters, but that the Bishop of Barbadoes* has lent the high authority of his name to the calumny, by declaring in a sermon which he has thought proper to preach twice, and which has been published in the newspapers, that, in consequence of some reports respecting the labouring population, "freedom was a curse rather than a blessing to them."

We rejoice to be able to state, from a very full knowledge of what is passing in our West India colonies, that, though the success of emancipation has been retarded by that bane of the colonies and of the abolition of slavery-protection, there never were more encouraging evidences that free labour will finally triumph over slavery than exist at present; and we are prepared to prove that there is not the slightest foundation for the complaints of the colonial planters, or for the daring assertion of the Bishop of Barbadoes.

We showed, in our article of the 8th of February last, that the falling off in the production of sugar during the period of apprenticeship was the consequence of the unjust and infamous treatment of the negroes by the planters. The flogging of females was continued, and "during the short period of two years, in Jamaica alone, 60,000 apprentices received in the aggregate 250,000 lashes, and 50,000 other punishments by the tread-wheel, the chain-gang, and other means of legalized torture." After the period of emancipation, when the planters could no longer compel the negroes to work by the whip, they endeavoured to compel them to work at such wages as they chose to dictate; and, in cases of refusal, unroofed and even demolished their cottages; trod their provision grounds underfoot with oxen; increased their rent double, treble, and even fourfold; distrained their goods, and imprisoned their persons. This spirit of persecution, with the view to compel labour on their own terms, is not extinct, but it has assumed another form. Open oppression became dangerous—it was necessary to disguise it under the forms of law; and so the colonial Legislatures (composed of planters)—under the pretext of there being a short supply of labourers, and the public welfare (the welfare of the said planters) requiring an increase—have passed laws to encourage the immigration of foreign labourers, not by every planter importing at his own expense any such labourers he may need, but to remedy the evil of high wages by taxing the bread and other necessities of the negroes, for the purpose of providing a fund for bringing rival labour into competition with theirs. We do not recollect any instance of such barefaced legislative tyranny since the time of Edward III., when a statute passed for regulating or keeping down wages, whereby it was enacted that—"Every servant or labourer shall be bound to serve him that doth require him at certain accustomed rates of wages (fixed by act of Parliament), or else he committed to gaol until he find surety to serve." Again, in the time of Richard II., the landlord legislators passed another act to lower wages, candidly assigning as the reason, that "on account of the high price of labour, the tenant-farmers cannot pay their rents!" and it was therefore ordained that a pair of stocks should be provided for every town, and that such servants and labourers as would not serve and labour without "outrageous and excessive hire" should be set in the stocks.

There is a striking resemblance in monopolist legislation all the world over: it is the offspring of selfishness, and its degree of oppression is proportioned to the ignorance or weakness of its victims. Our own landlord legislators are not satisfied with merely taxing the corn and provisions of a whole people for their own supposed exclusive benefit, but they take care in making laws to shift the burden of taxation from their own to other shoulders, and then set up the cry of "exclusive burdens" to divert attention from the robbery, as thieves are loudest in their cry of "stop thief" when retreating from their plundered victim. Thus the duty on personal property, accumulated by a life of toil and care, is taxed with probate and legacy duties; but property in landed estates is transferred from generation to generation without the payment of one farthing of either of these taxes! A tax is levied upon fire insurance on merchandise, and every other kind of property, except farming stock! Horses used for trading purposes pay a duty; but when used in husbandry they pay none! Dogs used to protect property are taxed; but shepherd's dogs are exempt from taxation! Lime and dung only pay turnpike tolls when used for trading purposes; when used for land they pass toll free!

Lord Sandon has reason to be proud of his colonial friends, for they appear equally to possess that nice sense of legislative justice which the noble lord has so long supported in Parliament, and which has been his chief recommendation to his wooden-bible supporters.

The Rev. W. Kuibb, from Jamaica, in a speech at a recent meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society, which will be found in another column, gives some details of Jamaica legislation, which show that the sugar monopolists have taken care to secure the like protection of their precious selves from taxation with the corn monopolists of the mother country. Jamaica is almost entirely dependent upon foreign supplies for food. The duty on flour has been raised from 4s. to 6s. per barrel. Corn meal is an article of great consumption by the labouring population. In the time of slavery, when purchased by the planters to feed the negroes, the duty was threepence per barrel. Now that the free negro has to purchase it for himself, the duty has been raised to three shillings! When the slave-owners fed their negroes with rice, the duty was one shilling per cwt.; now that the negroes have become buyers of rice, the duty is four shillings per cwt. Salt fish, for slaves, paid a duty of 6d. per cwt.; for free negroes it now pays 2s. per cwt. Turtle, which the negroes do not eat, is duty free. Pork, imported to feed slaves, paid only a trifling tax; now that it is imported to feed the free negroes, it pays 20s. 6d. Soap, to wash the hands of slaves, paid 9d. per box; to wash freemen, it must pay 2s. per box.

Since emancipation, the negroes have purchased little freeholds, and a great demand has arisen for timber to build their houses. Before freedom, the tax on white and pitch pine was 4s.; but since, it has been raised to 8s. for white, and 12s. for pitch pine, and the tax on shingles has in like manner been raised from 1s. to 4s. and 8s. But whilst the duties on all necessary articles consumed by the negroes have thus been raised since they became freemen, the duty on staves for sugar hogsheads, which they do not use, has been kindly reduced from 12s., the duty during slavery, to 2s.; and the tax on wooden hoops, which was 4s., has been reduced to 1s. 1. The sum expended to import other labourers at the expense of the negroes, up to 1844, amounted to £128,271, besides £95,000 voted for the same object during the present year.

Now, will it be believed, in the face of this outcry about the scarcity of labourers, and the high price of labour, that the average rate of wages in Jamaica is only 1s. per day out of crop, and 1s. 6d. per day during crop? Yet this is the fact; and, so far from there being a scarcity of labourers, in most cases the earnings of the labourers have not been more than 4s. per week, because during the last two or three days of the week they have had no labour. In these circumstances, to import additional labourers at the expense of the negroes, and with the threatened purpose of reducing their wages, is sheer folly and wickedness, and can have no other effect than to produce animosity and heartburnings; whilst on a population just emerging from licentiousness, the introduction of Coolies in the proportion of 100 men to 8 females cannot fail to be the source of fresh crime and immorality to an alarming extent.

It is amusing to hear those who put their trust in acts of Parliament, instead of trusting to their own exertions for prosperity, attributing their want of success to every cause but that which appears most obvious. Our corn monopolists we find ascribing their present distress to the Canada Corn Bill, or the new sliding scale—to Peel's tariff, or the admission of foreign cattle. In like manner the sugar monopolists complain of the abolition of slavery and of their inability to compete with slave labour, because of the high price they are obliged to pay for free labour. But if they had labour for nothing it is evident that their condition would not be improved. They give little enough for labour; but it is quite as much as it is worth. A labourer that cultivates the ground with his hands and nails can earn no wages, because he would probably not be able to produce more than would supply his own wants. A labourer who scratches the ground with a hoe (which is the Jamaica system of cultivation) must necessarily earn a small amount of wages when placed in competition with those who, with better tools, raise four or five times the quantity of produce. The rude state of cultivation in Jamaica sufficiently accounts for all their difficulties. A recent writer* observes—"Almost the only implements of husbandry in common use are the hoe, the bill, the cutlass, and the axe. Manure is conveyed to the field on the heads of labourers in baskets or trays filled by the hoe; exhibiting in these respects no improvement on the rude usages of our Saxon forefathers! Little is done in the way of drainage, alternate crops, artificial grasses, or manuring. Soils are usually wrought until exhausted; after which they lie fallow for several years. 'The farmer may form some idea of the waste of labour in the West Indies,' says an intelligent American traveller (Dr. Hovey), 'by supposing his lands to be all cultivated with Indian corn, and no agricultural implements allowed him, except a mule, a pack-saddle, a wooden tray, and a stab-hoe.' The old methods of cultivation are the rule—the improvements the exception. The hoe, the cutlass, and the tray, and others of equal antiquity, still usurp the place of the plough and spade, the muck-fork, the wheelbarrow, and the tumbril; whilst the practical knowledge of the last century is still regarded by many as superior to the experience and science of the present day."

To bolster up a wretched system like this by protection is nothing less than offering a premium on ignorance and idleness, alike injurious to the planters and the negroes. To spend large sums in the importation of rival labourers, and to tax the negroes for the purpose of paying the expenses, are flagrant cruelty and injustice, whilst it will fail to accomplish the relief which the planters seek. It is calculated that, in planting cane, a pair of horses and a plough will do the work of thirty free men. WHAT IS WANTED, THEN, IS NOT AN IMPORTATION OF HILL COOLIES, BUT AN IMPORTATION OF HORSES AND PLOUGHS, AND MACHINERY, to make labour more productive. We have lying before us the most abundant evidence that sugar can be—ay, that it is—made by free labour as cheap in Jamaica as in any other country, and that it can be made cheaper. Happily there are even in Jamaica a few intelligent and enterprising planters, and these, like our most intelligent agriculturists, repudiate protection and desire to see it abolished. Among this number is Mr. George Price, of Worthy-park, St. John's, who has addressed an interesting letter to the Jamaica Times, dated April 12, 1845, in which he expressly states "that, if the cries for protection and immigration could be overcome by a general cry for the one thing needful, capital, to be expended in improved cultivation, the crops would be doubled in five years; that they would exceed the largest crops ever made in the island, without the addition of one single labourer; and that they would afford a large net profit to the proprietor."

This is important testimony, coming from a planter who makes five hundred hogsheads of sugar per annum, and ought to make a deep impression on the Anti-Slavery Society, who have hitherto given their countenance and support to the monopolists, and who tell us that, if the protection on free-labour sugar be removed, "the planter will withdraw from the production of sugar; the labourer will lose his employment and his wages; the merchant and shop-keeper will find their resources suddenly cut off; and, lastly, the abolitionist will discover, to his dismay, that a fresh impetus of vast force is given to slavery and the slave trade."

It is vain to expect capital to flow into our colonies till the monopoly is abolished. We must, however, recur to this important subject hereafter; but we cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of communicating a piece of intelligence which we are persuaded will gladden the heart of every friend to emancipation. We are told that no stimulus but the whip will induce the negro to work like a white man. The experiment has been for the first time fairly tried on the railway now making in Jamaica, and, we are happy to say, with the most complete success. The stimulus of a just reward for labour and kind and honourable treatment has proved equally efficacious in Jamaica as in England. The negroes on the line are employed on piece-work, and, notwithstanding the exhausting heat of the climate, they have performed daily an equal amount of labour with labourers engaged in the same kind of work in England; indeed, the engineer declares "he prefers the negroes to Irish and Scotch labourers." Their earnings on piece-work amount to 2s. per day. Here is an important and gratifying fact, proving the superiority of free over slave labour; and we trust our anti-slavery friends supporting the sugar monopoly will ponder it before they presume again to raise the cry that free labour needs protection.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Sixteenth Week, ending Saturday, June 7.

The week has been a heavy one in both Houses of Parliament. The Maynooth College Bill has led to that rare event in the House of Lords—an adjourned debate; while in the House of Commons, the subject of acedemical institutions for Ireland, as well as other topics, have produced animated discussions. In addition to this, the railway and other committees absorb the time of members during the day, and naturally indisposes them to late sittings at night; and no subject that is not of immediate interest or of pressing importance is likely to be attended to.

Yet in the face of these disadvantages Mr. WARD was enabled to bring on his motion for a Committee of Inquiry into the PECULIAR BURDENS alleged to be borne by the landed interest. This fact is creditable to the zeal and determination of the Free-Traders in the House of Commons. In their minds no change of circumstances affects the great question. It is the same great truth and great fact, whether the season be good or bad, the times prosperous or adverse. This is the true way to effect their object, for discussion keeps the subject fresh until its truth has pervaded every nook and cranny of the public mind, and it is then carried into full effect, as a simple matter of course. In this point of view, the Free-Traders are the true and most constant CONSERVATIVES in the House of Commons, for they are the main agents in working out a policy which will place this country on a higher and prouder position than it has ever yet attained—that position which secures capital, manufactures, labour, and enables all interests and all men to "flourish and be free." Mr. WARD very ably treated the proprietors of that great change which has come over Parliament as well as public opinion, in relation to PROTECTION; and good-humouredly bantered the landed interest about the very "peculiar" condition in which they find themselves. He said:—

"He did not observe on the opposite benches the antagonists whom he was in the habit of seeing there upon all agricultural questions. There certainly was one of them in the gallery (Sir John Tyrrell) of whose presence they had had a most unequivocal indication. (Much laughter.) [The worthy Essex baronet was sound asleep, and emitting most sonorous intonations of the fact.] He was sorry to be obliged to allude to that hon. gentleman in his absence (renewed laughter); and also that he was compelled to bring forward his motion notwithstanding the paucity of his usual opponents. ('Hear, hear,' and a laugh.) The notion of there being peculiar burdens on land was now the last of the agricultural fallacies. The right hon. baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in his speech the other night, had proved that wages had risen as the price of bread had fallen; he had shown that cheap bread did not produce low wages; and he had also told his agricultural friends pretty distinctly that employment did not depend on the home market. The hon. baronet had, in fact, swept away all the minor fallacies like so many cobwebs, and had left this great master fallacy of the peculiar burdens upon land, as a solitary remnant of the wreck, to tell of the disappearance of its former comrades. ('Hear, hear,' and a laugh.)"

Proceeding for some time in this style, Mr. Ward addressed himself afterwards to his main argument in the following way:—

"When the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel) introduced the foundation of the present legislation in February, 1842, he said,—1. 'You are entitled to put such a duty on foreign corn as is equivalent to the special burdens which you impose upon agriculture. 2. But an additional protection to agriculture can be vindicated only on the ground that it is for the interest of the country in general.' But the interests of the country gentlemen had been of late completely given up by the right hon. baronet the Home Secretary. (Hear, hear.) If hon. gentlemen were capable of following the argument of the right hon. baronet, they must perceive that it went to the extent which he alleged. They appeared, however, not to be willing to believe either the right hon. baronet or him (Mr. Ward), but he would tell them that their case was equally damaged by themselves in refusing inquiry, and in the extravagance of their own pretensions—pretensions which were most absurd and untenable. (Hear, hear.) He would just recall some of the arguments. Lord Abingdon said that 'the land bears all the burden of taxation,' and when he was interrupted in his remark by some expression of surprise, he qualified the statement by adding, 'at least, in the ratio of four to one.' Then came the hon. member for Somersetshire, who asserted that 'the land pays half of the income-tax; and he was followed by the hon. member for Norfolk, who contended that the land paid the whole of the poor-rates. The Duke of Richmond said that the land paid all the charge of the church and of the administration of justice, from the constable to the workhouse chaplain. 'On what principle was the landed interest required to pay for the apprehension of every prisoner, for his maintenance in prison, and for his prosecution?' The landed interest did not do this, the county-rates did it, and the county-rates were part of the poor-rates, one-half of which was paid, not by the land, but by other real property. Then came the Duke of Newcastle—the premier that is to be, 'the coming man,' who thought that, 'as far as my recollection serves me, not one good measure has passed since the entrance into office of the present administration. The amor patriæ extinct—the amor sui its substitute. Land utterly neglected..... The cultivator of the soil is in utter despondency and alarm. He has long been the most ill-used and most neglected of our fellow-subjects. He knows not how to act. He feels, from sad experience, that he, who is the mainstay of the country, is buffeted about in bewildering uncertainty, knowing that he is not protected or encouraged, but milked like his own cows, or shorn like his own sheep, to pay, mayhap, some Popish endowment or other misapplication of his contributions.' That was a touching picture, wanting nothing but truth to give it sublimity. ('Hear, hear,' and laughter.) But was it the fact that the land paid all the burden of taxation? On referring to the gradual increase of the Customs, he found that the account in the following years stood thus:—1596, Elizabeth, £50,000; 1613, James, £118,000; 1689, William III., £781,000; 1763, George III., £4,000,000; 1816, £11,000,000; 1842, £22,850,000; giving a rise from £50,000 to £23,000,000 in two hundred and fifty years—a pretty effective contribution to revenue. But they were told that land paid more than half of the income-tax. By the papers moved for by the honourable member for Wolverhampton he was able to ascertain the following analysis of the income-tax:—

REAL PROPERTY—ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND—ANNUAL VALUE.
Land—England and Wales ..	£10,167,088	5 7½
Scotland ..	5,586,527	13 3
	£15,753,615	18 10½

Mr. Culloch stated in his last work on 'Taxation' that schedules A having produced £2,160,412. 10s. 9d., at 7d. per £1, must have been assessed on £73,728,480; instead of which, the real property return proves the annual value of property included under schedule A to be £95,284,497; of which land paid as nearly half as possible.

Schedule A—Net duty received April 5, 1843 ..	£2,150,412	10 9

So that land, instead of paying all the income-tax, or half, actually pays less by £143,016 than the amount received from trades and professions. Then came the argument of his honourable friend the member for Norfolk, respecting the poor-rates being paid by the land. In the last report of the poor-law commissioners he found it stated that 'there is no doubt that the yearly produce of the rateable property of England has undergone a very great increase since 1813; and that its annual progress is now rapid. The total annual value of real property assessed to the property-tax in 1815 in England and Wales, was £51,848,423, whereas the amount in 1843 was £85,802,735. It is further to be observed, that the increase in the annual value of rateable property arises, not only from the improved cultivation of the land, and its consequently increased productiveness, but also, to a great extent, from the large number of new houses and other buildings (such as manufactories and warehouses), as well as railways, canals, wharves, &c., which are constructed from year to year. Accordingly, land, as such, pays a smaller proportion of the local rates in each successive year; and a larger proportion falls on the other sorts of rateable property. This fact appears from the table inserted in our Ninth Annual Report, par. 27, which shows, that whereas the proportion of the poor's rate falling upon land was 69 per cent., and that falling on other property was 31 per cent., in 1826; the proportion falling on land was only 52 per cent., and on other property 48 per cent., in 1841.' By a reference to the present year, he was told it would appear that the proportion paid by the land was still smaller. Mr. McCulloch, in his recent 'Treatise on Taxation and the Funding System,' has the following remarks:—'Exclusive of tithe, the land is burdened with an extra weight of other taxes. Poor rates and county rates of all descriptions have always fallen much heavier on it than on any other species of fixed property; and though within the last few years some of the more striking anomalies in their assessment have been removed, they still continue to press with disproportioned severity on the land. Moneyed fortunes also, and funded and other moveable property, are exempted from all local burdens. An individual may have £100,000 engaged in trade, or vested in the public funds, in mortgages, or in stock of the Banks of England or Scotland, without being subject to tithe, or to any of those taxes for the poor and other local objects that fall on the owner of the smallest patch of land, as well as on most other descriptions of fixed property. There may be reasons to justify this exemption; but the fact of its existing presses so heavily on the land and other fixed property are peculiarly affected by taxation. It will be afterwards seen that the malt-tax, though of course it falls directly on the consumers, is, in its indirect operation, particularly injurious to agriculture; and, being a grievance peculiar to this department, it would entitle the agriculturists, had they no other claims to urge, to a countervailing duty on the importation of foreign corn. Such being the case, the agriculturists are clearly justified in demanding, in the event of the free importation of corn being permitted, that it should be burdened with a fixed or constant duty sufficient to countervail the peculiar charges that would fall on the land, were the ports unconditionally opened. It is impossible to refuse them this, without trampling on every fair principle. Such protection is not given to the agriculturists as a favour, but to keep them where they have a right to be kept—on the same level as the other classes of their countrymen. If they be relieved from these peculiar burdens, the necessity for the countervailing duties will of course cease, and they may, and indeed should, be repealed forthwith; but the equalization of taxation at home should, in all cases, precede the repeal of duties on importation. It is not possible, perhaps, to form any very accurate estimate of what the countervailing duty should amount to; but it would not, we apprehend, be difficult to show that, by fixing it at 5s. or 6s. a quarter on wheat, and other grain in proportion, the justice of the case would be satisfied, and the interests of the agriculturists and those of the public conciliated, and most effectually promoted. A duty of this amount would preserve all parties in the same relative situation after the opening of the ports as previously; and would treat them, as they should ever be treated, with equal and impartial justice.' As to the tithes, he would leave it altogether out of the question, for he regarded it as a charge to which the land was liable before the title of the oldest Norman baron commenced. He trusted, therefore, that he would never see the example of Ireland followed, and 25 per cent. of this tax sacrificed to the landlords, who had no claim to it. With respect to the malt-tax, that certainly was a very fair subject for inquiry. As for the poor-rates, he differed entirely from the opinion of Mr. McCulloch, and he saw nothing that justified such a distinction being drawn. The valuations and the deductions for poor-rates were the same on different descriptions of property, and if landed property paid more it was because that description of property was more valuable. He had gone over this subject with great care, and he had been most anxious not to deceive himself on the point, and had made the strictest inquiry into the matter. He would take a parish with which he was connected, and which was partially agricultural, and which contained a comparatively large town, namely, Ware, in Hertfordshire, where a great trade in malt was carried on, and he found that the same principle as regarded rating existed with respect to both descriptions of property. He found that farms containing 697 acres were assessed at £725, and were rated at £670. 14s., deductions being made for insurance, repairs, &c. There had been for the last two years three poor-rates at a shilling in the pound each year, being for each rate

£28. 16s. 8d. for the year, or £86. 10s. for the whole period. The surveyor's or highway rate, at eightpence in the pound, one rate each year, was £19. 4s. 6d.; church-rates, at fourpence in the pound, £9. 12s. 8d.; the county-rate, assessed at 1½d. in the pound, was £3. 12s. 2d.; the police-rate, assessed at 1½d. in the pound, upon the rental of £725, was paid out of the poor-rates. Another farm, containing 148 acres, was assessed at £219. 10s. 6d., and rated at £174. 5s. 6d.; and the rates amounted to £34. 17s. 6d. On the other hand, he would take a malting establishment in Ware, belonging to the same owner as the former property, which was rated at £202. Another malting house was rated at £149. 10s.; and a third at £135. Now, it appeared these paid £40. 19s. rates per annum. Maltings were rated according to the quantity, the steep at £2 per quarter, so that if a malting steeps 50 quarters, it was rated at £100. Malt steeps were rated at about £2 per steep, of which 110 belonged to one firm, and were rated at £220. Now, this certainly might be considered equal to the rating of land in the neighbourhood. On inquiry, also, he found that the same was the case in the neighbouring districts of the county. The tendency, however, was rather to benefit the land unduly at the expense of the other interests. For instance, this was particularly the case as regarded railways. The rates upon that description of property had become an enormous abuse, and the spread of the evil could only be prevented by expensive legal process. Indeed, in assessing railways, the first principle seemed to be that a railway had no remedy. The rating was taken on the profits of capital and stock. This was different from other interests; for all other stock in trade was specially exempted. He would instance what he meant, in the case of the Birmingham Railway, with respect to which the rates were arbitrarily increased in 1843 not less than £18,000 a year. The average rateable value of the land in parishes through which it runs was 30s. 3d. per acre. The whole rate per mile for the railway was from £800 to £2000 a year, or from £80 to £200 per acre. He would take the parish of Milton, where the railway paid £2000 per mile, or on ten acres, while the rate on the whole of the rest of the parish was £1355. Again, take the Great Western: he found that in the parish of Burnham, Bucks, the railway paid rates of £2940 per mile, or £292 per acre. This was a double injustice, for the county and all the other rates increased in proportion with the increased assessment in the poor-rates, and the tithes also increased in the ratio of the increase of the other rates. As for the highway-rate, he would ask any gentleman connected with land whether he could imagine an instance of any man who would take a farm which had not a road to it. Need he then say that these roads improved the value of land, and the landowners certainly met with more than an equivalent advantage for the expenses of this rate. But if they took all the rates chargeable on land, and charged them on the Consolidated Fund, they must do the same with regard to all rates payable in towns. Why was the agricultural county of Kent to be exempted from the payment of its police, and this not done in Marylebone? Why were the inhabitants of London, where, indeed, all the members of the House resided for a certain portion of the year, to be made to pay sewer and other local rates, while you exempted the country districts from any such payment? It was clear, if you adopted the principle, you must apply it equally to both parties. When the Duke of Richmond complained of the expense to the counties of the administration of justice, and that that charge ought to be defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund, was he aware that, if this were adopted, they must change the whole system which now existed? If the Government were charged with the expenses of the gaols, they certainly must have the control over those who filled the gaols; and the whole system of unpaid magistrates must be put an end to; and they must have stipendiary magistrates throughout the country, as in France and Prussia. This might be a very good suggestion, and the arrangement might be desirable, but he did not believe that the noble duke calculated on such a result. But even supposing that they could make out some part of their case, and show that some inequalities existed which fell on them more than on others, and that there were some little disparities which ought to be equalized, the committee, into which he hoped they would consent to go, was a proper place to investigate the matter. But they must satisfy him that these claims of protection by the landed interest, in consequence of the existence of such burdens, really existed before he could come to Mr. McCulloch's conclusion. But now he must really refer to the exemptions which existed as regarded landed property from burdens which are imposed on other interests. He did not like to trouble the House again in going into this subject at length, as he had so often gone into it on former occasions, but they should recollect that there never was a country in which land was so excepted from heavy burdens, which fell upon other interests. Take, for instance, the legacy and probate duty. There was none on real property. The total amount raised since 1797 upon other property was about £60,000,000, and of this amount not one shilling was derived from the land. (Cheers.) Then, again, take the house duty. In 1825 there were 527,000 houses assessed, and 136,000 farm-houses were excepted. If subject to the same payment of duty from 1803 to 1831, when this tax was repealed, the revenue would have received £5,000,000 more than it had. (Hear, hear.) Again, there was formerly a tax upon horses used in husbandry; this duty was repealed in 1822, and the revenue lost £470,000 a year. There were also a great number of other exemptions to the payment of the duty on horses belonging to those connected with the land. In the first place, the exception from the duty was made on horses ridden by occupiers of farms at less than £200 a year. Then this exception was increased to those under £500 a year rent; then for all horses ridden by bailiffs; then for all horses occasionally let out for hire; then upon all brood mares. Another exception from taxation was in connexion with fire insurances; 3s. in the pound was the ordinary fire insurance duty, but there was no duty on insuring farming stock. Again, £1 11s. 6d. was charged as a tax upon each saddle horse used in any other trade, but on farmers' horses there was none. Again, with respect to servants, farmers paid no charge for husbandry servants occasionally used as domestic servants. They had also been relieved from the duties on sheep dogs, tax-carts, and horses drawing them. There were also no tolls on lime, manure, &c. They had been exempted from the tax on tiles used for draining; they had also been exempted from the tax on stewards, overseers, bailiffs, and clerks employed under them. No window duty was charged under £200 a year rent. The total reduction, then, of taxes affecting the agricultural interest between the years 1816 and 1834, according to the able table made out by the honourable member for Montrose, amounted to nearly £13,000,000. (Hear, hear, hear.) According to the same document, if they had been made to pay the probate and legacy duty since 1797, the exemption from taxation would have amounted to from 70 to 72 millions. Now, what were the burdens? Why was labour employed on land entitled to exemption not given in any other business? (Hear, hear.) He might be told that they should not touch this particular branch of industry—that it was unwise to tax the means and the elements of production. No doubt this might be sound; but then the exemption should be universal, and they should extend it to labour employed in manufactures, in mines, collieries, factories, and all equally valuable, but not equally encouraged, because they had not got the ear of the Legislature. (Hear, hear, hear.) If there were exemptions they should be fair and equitable between one interest and another, and not, as now, standing out in odious contrast. Now, with respect to the land-tax, the revenue of the country was £51,000,000; the land-tax amounted to £1,817,000. This tax was originally imposed at the rate of 5s. in the pound on the rental. If they now took the rental of the country at the amount generally taken, namely, £47,000,000, this tax would now produce upwards of £9,000,000. (Hear, hear, hear.) Last year they would find that the customs, the excise, and stamp duties, with half of the assessed taxes, produced £46,042,135, out of a total income of £57,137,991, including £5,397,455 property-tax, of which land did not contribute more than £1,323,969, including the charge of the tax on tenants' profits. (Hear, hear, hear.) It was obvious from these facts that the landed interest had exemptions from taxation to a much larger amount than was their due proportion."

Mr. Sidney Herbert was put up by the Government to answer Mr. Ward, making the usual official reply, and was followed by

Mr. CONNELL: The right honourable gentleman who had just sat down said there was no one in that House who had not a distinct opinion on the question under discussion. Judging from the speech of the right honourable gentleman, there was one exception to that rule—the right hon. gentleman himself. (Much laughter.) He must acknowledge he was completely at a loss to determine what was the drift of the right honourable gentleman's argument. He could not tell at that moment whether the right honourable gentleman maintained that tithes belonged to the landlord or the church. The right hon. gentleman argued the question of tithes as if they were still collected under the old system; but, as at present commuted, tithes were no more a burden on the landlord than on the shopkeeper. He had found himself in cathedral cities defending the right of the clergy to the tithes, as opposed to the landlords. Again, as to the poor-rates: if the manufacturer did not pay rates on the straps of his machinery, neither did the landlord on his standing corn. The honourable member for Essex cast a jealous eye on such establishments as Storr and Mortimer, and asked why they were not assessed to the poor. Let the honourable baronet go into any shop in the Strand, and ask the owner what proportion his taxes (he left out his assessed and window taxes, which were paid to the state)—what proportion his payments for paving, lighting, watching, and sewerage bore to the rental, and he challenged the hon. baronet to say that the shopkeepers of the towns did not pay local burdens to quite as great an extent as the farmers. (Hear, hear.) He should recommend his hon. friend (Mr. Ward), if he made this motion next year, to omit the word "exclusive," as applied to burdens on the land, for the common sense of the country treated such a proposition as nothing more than a thing to be laughed at. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Herbert) played a part which did not sit well on him, that of a sophist, and his fallacies were perfectly transparent; and, if the Government had no better case than that presented by the right hon. gentleman, they must suffer as great a disaster that night as on any previous debate during the session, and that was saying a great deal. (Laughter and cries of "Hear, hear.") Granting that agriculture paid all the burdens, still the protection they claimed was no advantage to them. If protection was admitted to be an impediment to trade, and to the development of the resources of the country, it could not be a benefit to agriculture. The noble member for London proved, as one of the leading principles of his resolutions, that protection was the bane of agriculture. The right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government gave his unqualified approval to that proposition. He believed that amongst enlightened agriculturists two opinions would not be held on the subject in twelve months hence. (Hear, hear.) He hoped that higher ground would be soon taken than this bandying of injustice from one interest to the other. He knew the opinion was spreading rapidly (and he did not speak from any public demonstration), that manufacturers, merchants, shopkeepers, and landowners had but a common interest. He could never believe that a system which tended to restrict trade, and to retard the increase of wealth and population, could be beneficial to farmers and landed proprietors. (Hear, hear.) He should conclude by a remark as to Mr. McCulloch, who had been quoted by the right hon. gentleman. He wished to speak with respect of men of science, and he was willing to admit that, as a painstaking statistician, Mr. McCulloch had done considerable service; but, as an authority on political economy, he was not aware that that gentleman had added a single new idea to the science. He had been a commentator on Adam Smith, and, like the commentators of Shakespeare, he made dark what was light before. ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) On the Bank of England, and on the Corn-Law question, this gentleman had a strange facility in shifting his views to the exigencies of parties and politicians. And when he was quoted as an authority on political economy, he begged to be understood that he, at all events, did not bow down to such authority. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. MURDOCH and Mr. Vernon Smith both spoke afterwards. Mr. John Tyrell denied that he shrank from investigation, and Dr. Bowring enforced the main argument.

The House then divided, when the numbers were—

JAMAICA LEGISLATION—OPPRESSION OF THE NEGRO POPULATION.

The following important statement of facts was made at a recent meeting at Exeter Hall, by the Rev. W. Knibb, the celebrated Baptist minister, of Jamaica:—

"I do not wish to say one word against the legislators of Jamaica, except so far as it is necessary to speak the truth, for I am confident that their actions will far more fully denounce their characters than any epithets that I could apply to them. I should not so fully enter into this discussion had not the truth of my statements been called in question by the honourable members of the House of Commons. (Hear, hear.) When I was traversing the bosom of the mighty deep a paper was put into my hands called the Spectator. In the slave-contaminated isle of St. Thomas, a person said to me, 'Have you any connexion with, or do you know the individual who is called, Knibb—he whom Lord John Russell spoke about?' (Laughter.) I said, 'I am the man.' (Loud cheers.) I will just read this extract from the Spectator, because I do think that, if the House of Commons choose to cast a slur upon the veracity of a missionary without any just occasion, knowing that they are shielded, and expecting that he is 5000 miles off, the people ought to know that all the truth is not confined within its walls—that a missionary may speak the truth though he has not as yet the word 'honourable' attached to his name. 'Lord John Russell admitted,' and you will excuse me reading an extract from the paper, 'that the West Indies had a considerable claim upon us owing to the recent abolition of slavery, but he denied that the plan would benefit the labourers in the colony. After emancipation they enjoyed a considerable degree of prosperity; that is quite true, the first two or three years. But now their wages have been reduced to 7s. per week. Taxes to support immigration purposes have been made to press heavily upon the labouring population, with the rise in the price of provisions; that taxation has gone to reduce their supply of food, and attempts are made to introduce vast numbers of labourers from the shores of Africa, entailing great danger lest civilization in the West Indies should be swamped by that inroad of people of a barbarous condition.' He made these statements on the high authority of Mr. Knibb. This avowal was greeted with loud cries of 'Oh! oh! oh!' (Cheers.) I will now, Sir, with your permission, let this respectable company know where the 'Oh! oh! oh!' ought justly to lie. It is necessary to state, that in Jamaica we are almost entirely dependent upon a foreign supply for food to eat, and so long as the cry shall be heard, that Jamaica cannot live unless the inhabitants make sugar and rum—so long as her fruitful soil is exhausted by these articles of export—we must find something to eat from other countries. I have the imports of Jamaica for the last three years, an account of everything that has come into that colony, and the duties paid thereon; but I will only call your attention to the year 1844, as showing the extent to which we are indebted to foreign powers for the food we eat. During the past year, 130,614 barrels of flour were brought in. They came from the United States of America, and the recent tariff has imposed upon each barrel a tax of 6s., the former tax being 4s. (Hear, hear.) Of corn-meal, which is very much consumed by the labouring population, and especially by the children, there were 32,337 barrels imported. In the time of slavery it was purchased by the planter to feed his negroes, and was then subject to a tax of 3d. per barrel. At the time of freedom, when this law was passed, when the free peasant had to purchase it, the tax was raised to 3s. per barrel. (Cries of 'Shame!') Of rice, which is consumed—and there is no difference in the tariff between slave-grown and free-grown rice,—rice, which is consumed very considerably by the people, there were 14,077 bags brought in, each bag weighing, I should think, about two cwt. The tax, when the slaveowner had to feed his slave, was 1s. per cwt. It is now 1s. per cwt. (Cries of 'Shame!') Salt fish, which is another article of food very generally consumed, and of which 150,000 cwt. were brought in last year, was without a tax at all, or at most a very trifling one, not amounting to more than 6d. per cwt., but that has been increased to 2s. Pork, and especially American pork—that which the better classes of peasants use, and indeed it is their staple food with which to savour their yams—was subjected to a trifling tax during the time of slavery. They have now raised it on American pork to the tune of 20s. 6d. (Renewed cries of 'Shame!') There were brought into Jamaica last year 29,803 barrels of pork, and to show you the difference between that brought from England and that from America—and I have been very particular in my statistics—I must state that 4718 barrels came from Great Britain and Ireland, which were brought in at a tax of 15s., and 27,106 were from America, and these were taxed by the House of Assembly at 15s. per barrel; the English tax laid by the British House of Commons is 3s. per cwt., or 5s. the barrel. So that from this single article alone, consumed by the peasants, or nearly so, at any rate the lower classes, a tax has been raised of nearly £29,000. This same principle runs through the whole. They will not allow the freeman to wash his hands without taxing the soap to a larger amount than they did before. The tax on soap was then 9d. per box, now they have made it 2s. And when I tell you that 30,930 boxes were imported last year, you will see how, in this article, the freeman is made to feel it. (Hear, hear.) I was afraid that my friends in England were not fully aware, as I believe they were not, of the extent of the necessity of providing food from another part of the world, and by the wicked conduct (for I cannot designate it by a weaker term) of these men who, while they were proclaiming their own distress, fastened such a bond upon their hapless victims. Taxes were made to press heavily upon the labourer that was brought in, though the effect has not been so severe as that arising from the taxes on food they must eat every day. But to show the anxiety of these men, as soon as the freeholds had been purchased there was a demand for white pine, and pitch pine, and lumber shingles. The tax was taken off, or nearly so, from white and red staves, with which puncheons and hogheads were made, and the hoops with which they were bound. (Hear, hear.) Before the introduction of freedom the duty on staves was 12s.; they have kindly reduced it to 2s. The tax on wooden hoops was 4s., and they have reduced that to 1s. (Hear, hear.) The fact is, they use them, and the people do not; while upon the white pine and the pitch pine, which the individuals wanted to build their houses with, that which was 4s. before is made into 8s. for white pine and 12s. for pitch pine. (Hear, hear.) Those who have been in the colonies know full well that if the emancipated labourer wished for a comfortable home, instead of thatching it, he must have shingles, almost the whole of which come from America. Before freedom the tax on shingles was 1s., but that has been raised to 4s. and 8s. Now, there is just as much more wood in one white oak stave as there are in two shingles, so that on the same amount of wood they have taken off 12s., and put 2s. on; and with respect to shingles, which were formerly 1s., they have now put on 4s. and 8s. The imports of shingles have been 7,526,293 feet of white pine and pitch pine, while of staves imported for the planter there have been 827,262. The whole taxes raised on imports, principally from the articles to which I have referred, have been as follows:—

1843 .. .. .	190,250	9	3

making a total of what is raised by the House of Assembly, chiefly on the food which the peasant eats, and the lumber he purchases, during three years, of £510,589. 16s. 4d. Now, then, who is right—myself, or the gentlemen who say, 'Oh! oh! oh?' (Laughter and cheers.) Perhaps it will be said that I ought to tell you how the money is spent. We have to deplore a spirit in the islands of the west, which appears never to be satisfied when matters are doing well; and hence there has been, especially during the last two or three years, a combined and well-directed effort to deluge Jamaica with other labourers at the labourers' expense. Lord John Russell stated that this was the fact. There has been expended in immigration, chiefly from 1835 to 1844, for premiums, or salaries, or bounties on ships, the sum of £105,514. 9s. 6d., and to erect houses, £22,757. 6s. 11d., making a total of £128,271. 16s. 5d.; and to keep up the tale, they have this year, in the midst of the whole of their distress, voted no less a sum than £95,000 for bringing in labourers, when I could prove, and have stated in Jamaica that I could prove, to a demonstration, that they had not work enough for the labourers they possess. (Hear, hear.) You will say, How could they be so blind to their interests? Why, every act they pass puts something into their pockets. There is Mr. Commissioner this, and Mr. Comptroller that, and Mr. Superintendent the other, and snug berths for themselves; and ruin for the colony is the motto on which they appear to act."

THE ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE BAZAAR.

(From Douglas Jerrold's Magazine.)

Within the walls of Covent-garden Theatre the drama of fiction has long found a bright abiding place and home. Within these walls for years and years has genius spoken to the people—solemn in the sombre robe of tragedy, or sparkling in the gayer vestments of her more mirthful sister, in art. Within these walls have enthusiastic assemblages, by turns mirthful and tearful, come to cast aside, for the hour, the sordid things of life, and revel in bright scenes, and among fair beings, poet-created. Within these walls have the high thoughts and grand imaginings, joyfully conjured up by genius in its solitude, found a living voice, and pealed into the beating hearts of thousands—rousing them to honest wrath, or, in more gentle mood, murmuring in whispers to be best answered by tears. Within the walls of Covent-garden Theatre the dramatic glory of our literature has been long enshrined—a mighty temple reared to a mighty power. For the present these things exist not. The worship has paused, and the worshippers have left the fane. We trust and believe that the power of the one has not ceased—that the others will yet return—that our great national theatre will be again what it was, and what it ought to be.

But the dramatic interregnum is not all barren. The theatre is not left mouldering, and dark, and empty. On the contrary, it has been as instinct with life—as teeming with admiration as in those olden days when crook-backed Richard dreamed his fearful vision, or Miranda listened to the song of Ariel, and entranced audiences shuddered at the one, or hung upon the melody of the other. And now there have been acted in Covent-garden Theatre—not scenes from the drama of fiction—but great scenes from the still more dread drama of reality. We have seen triumph within its walls—not fictitious stage kings, but true popular leaders. We have seen a demonstration of a power which does not fade with the glare of footlights—of a power mighty in its justice—of a power which will create a great, but a bloodless, social revolution—of a power which will restore to labour its just rights without depriving property of its just privileges—of a power which will link men of all climes together in a blessed brotherhood—of a power which will triumph over the earth, and bless all it triumphs over—which will enlighten and improve, and extend human happiness, and promote human comfort, as assuredly as God has decreed that what is good shall prevail, and as assuredly as all which life has decreed shall be accomplished!

The scene which, during the last month, Covent-garden Theatre exhibited, was a great demonstration—a great fact. The sight which it exhibited to the country was one to make it think. Within a spacious area were collected innumerable triumphs of industry and skill—mute parliament of labour. And these thousand objects imagined by ingenuity—created by toil—planned in all the eloquence of silence for the rights of those who fashioned them. The workman was represented by his handicraft; the tolling city was shadowed forth by rich stuffs, or glancing metals; and the fabrics, purposed from the loom, or darning from the furge, cried aloud, although they spoke not:—"Let us accompany our maker; let us go forth over the earth, civilizing, shingling, the forlorn man; and bringing, in return, plenty to the board, and peace to the hearth, of the toll-ward men and women who have fashioned us!"

A "Banner"—a title word for a banner—something—often an idle word for children's trophies, but foolish goods brought forth of laborious idleness. But an idea can ennoble anything. Nobility, in its true sense, is an idea; and how grand is the idea which ennobles our Bazaar—which, even apart from its claims as an industrial exposition, makes it a great and holy thing. "Free Trade." These words form a spell by which the world will yet be governed. They are the spirit of a dawning creed—a creed which already has found altars and temples worthy of its truth.

The Anti-Corn-Law-League Bazaar has raised thoughts in the national mind which will not soon die. As a spectacle, it was magnificent in the extreme; but not more grand materially than it was morally. The crowd who saw it, thought as well as gazed. It was not a mere huge shop for selling wares; but a great school for propagating an idea. And the pupils were not Londoners alone. From every part of the land monster trains hurried up their visitors. From the tracts where tall chimneys stand like forests—from the districts where the plough, not the engine, labours—where the farm-steading takes the place of the factory—where the "mill" means not that weaving yarn, but that grinding corn—from town and country—shipping port and inland city—steam has whirled its tens of thousands to one common centre—to see a great demonstration—to take a great lesson, and then to narrate and teach what they have beheld and learned to others.

Nevertheless, these pages may fall into the hands of many who have not seen at all, or have heard little of, the Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar. For their behoof we shall attempt a sketch in outline—it must be a rude and a hurried one—of the last grand demonstration of the League.

And first—not pausing on the threshold, not dwelling over the treasures piled in the lobbies—let us enter the Grand Hall, the inner and principal temple reared to Free Trade.

Let the scene burst at once upon us. Where are we? In a theatre? Where are boxes, and pit, and stage? It seems a sainted cathedral of old, through which the eye glances amid long vistas of pillars and of groined arches; a shadowy dim fane, into which light comes clothed with rich colour through the frosted windows; over which fretted arches, vaulted and echoing, extend; pillar, and roof, and oriel, rich with chiselling and the pomp of heraldry, and the gorgeous blazoning of old. Yet all this is but painted canvas and cut pasteboard. The art of the scenic decorator has been called into play, and in a few short weeks he has turned the theatre into a Norman-Gothic hall. The illusion is as complete as an illusion, which you know to be one, can be. Carved stone and oak are mimicked with rare skill. Mr. Grieve is another genii, who can conjure up a palace in a night.

But then the furniture—the tenants of our Norman-Gothic hall—what do they consist of? Taking up our station at one end, glance through the vista of pillar and arch, and see.

Long rows of tables extend away into the dim distance—two in the centre and one on either side. They are piled with rich merchandise, curiosities, miracles of art, wonders of nature. They comprehend the treasures of the warehouse and the museum. Rich stuffs and drapery arise from the walls, and the eye travels over seemingly never-ending masses of costly articles of every variety; for ornament, for use; for the boudoir, for the wardrobe; toys to please the eye, to minister to the very wantonness of luxury; things of necessity not so pretty, but much more useful; holiday bravery and every-day apparel; a sort of huge collection, not of one, but of all classes of social objects; of furniture for our homes, garments for ourselves, and ornaments for both; things to make us comfortable and make us gay; a never-ending, still beginning, panorama of the products of the labour of every artisan; the staples of every district; the wares of every factory; the goods of every shop!

Let us, however, be still more particular; and, pushing amid the thronging, chaffering crowd, make our way along the extending lines of tables, divided into stalls, each stall representing a city, or an industrial district, and, courteously informed by the fair and good ladies who preside, each over her peculiar charge of wares, examine more closely this great social museum.

Turning to the right on our entrance, we find ourselves among the productions of the stuff-manufacturing towns of the north. Yorkshire and Lancashire, these two grand bives of industry are, of course, well represented. Rochdale has its warm flannels, and rich winter clothings. Halifax sends light woollen goods of gay hues and soft fleecy texture; and Bradford is not behindhand in a similar way. On the opposite side of the theatre are the variegated prints which busy Manchester pours forth in a profusion which would clothe the world. The products of the swarming manufacturing towns which dot the north of England, and from among which the great wave of Corn-Law repeal first went forth over the land, are all represented here by the fruits of their numerous branches of industry. Nor are the far-off cities of Scotland mute. Glasgow sends carpets soft as velvet—elastic to the foot as living turf, glowing with colours bright and shining as the plumage of oriental birds—real romances of the loom. One of these, of large dimensions, is woven without a seam—a gorgeous piece of glowing texture. And Glasgow's neighbour, Paisley, sends shawls—delicate as Cachemire's—the fit vestments of beautiful forms. The north against the east for the oriental garb! The Land of Cakes against that of Roses! Galashiels, too, contributes plenty of her peculiar fabrics—variegated tartans and shepherds' hoddin grey. Galashiels is a classic brook; the ancient minstrel sung of its "braw, braw lads." In olden times the moss-trooper, reeking from the foray, plunged his panting horse through its gurgling rapids. Now there are mills upon the banks, where feudal strongholds stood, and their inhabitants are Free-Trademen, not free-booters. The times of modern reality are far better than those of ancient romance.

Leicester—the town of the three spires—of peeping Tom—we see your ribbons glancing and glittering like so many rainbows condensed into shot silk. Leicester is here in her rich boniary, and the busy hand of Nottingham is shown forth by her stores of gloves. Houlton sends—being of opinion that there is nothing like leather—tributes boots and shoes, for all occasions and places—from the muddy field through which the labourer picks his minding way. From the busiest centre of our manufacturing industry, to its remotest outskirts, have arrived offerings. Our great English and Scotch towns, surrounded by railways—swarming with artisans—ringing and shaking with the clatter of engines, forges, and looms —and the remote islands of the Orkneys, placed "far amid the melancholy main"—have all of them done their duty to the Free-Trade Bazaar. These last out of the world specks of barren rock and bleak moor, dotting the wild northern sea beyond Cape Wrath, have offered their knitted hosiery—worked in smoky cabins in long winter nights—delicate fabrics—warm and fleecy—congenial to the bleak northern clime.

Then, turning from the products of the loom to those of the forge—from clothes and silks to iron and steel—let us see what the skill of cunning workmen in metals has done for us. Sheffield gives us knives of every sort—swords, axes, razors, scissors, all of the most exquisite finish, which the most consummate skill can impart to the most perfect material. Steel here glitters like burnished mirrors; there, dazzles like frosted silver. Weapons of offence and tools for industry lie side by side, all fashioned as never were tools or weapons since first the sparks flew from Tubal Cain's anvil. Birmingham offers as much iron-work; locks which would defy the "Forty Thieves;" specimens of mechanism, perfect labyrinths of wheels, and levers, and cranes. Darlston affords us the model of the mine, whence the raw materials of these wondrous triumphs of industry and science, ore and coal, are wrought from the earth. Colebrookdale proves that iron may be made ornamental as well as useful; it moulds the stubborn metal into forms rich and graceful as ever sculptor fashioned from clay; it works out statues, and vases, and fountains; goblets as delicately moulded as those which the potter, stationed near at hand, turns from his wheel. Then there are models by the dozen of the steam-engine—that glorious thing—the wizard which has formed half the wonders which surround it—which has put towns upon desert wastes, steamers in unknown seas, and which, labouring for the matter immediately in hand, has whirled tens of thousands to London, from every province of the empire, to gaze upon this accumulated treasury of industry.

But we might go on for days and weeks enumerating the contents of the League Bazaar. Let us content ourselves with drawing from them their obvious moral, with recording their silent pleading.

They represent Industry; they demand Industry's rights. Here, in this island, are hands and mouths; the labour of the one should be the food of the other. The spirit of Selfishness, powerful for a time, has said "No!" The people may not exchange what their hands have made, for the food which it would bring them. The struggling, honest, willing labour of the masses is paralysed for the luxurious, selfish idleness of the few!

Here, in England, is ingenuity to invent, and strength to execute, industrial achievements such as the world never before saw. Abroad there grows teeming food, the gift of the Deity. We would barter the products of our hands for the products of our neighbours' fields.

Selfishness forbids the bargain: backs in one land shall be kept bare, in order that stomachs in another may be kept empty; food shall rot in the fields in this country, because it may not be exchanged for merchandise, mouldering in warehouses in that.

But common sense, common humanity, common justice, call aloud, and with a God's voice proclaim, that God's gifts to all men shall not be marred by the foul will of a few; that the industrious shall not starve when there is food; that trade shall be as free as the sun, and the breeze, and the rain; that the great religion of commerce, which is civilizing, humanizing, fraternizing the world, shall no longer have a custom-house for its church, or a hostile tariff for its bible!

(From Dolman's Magazine.)

But what are the grandest productions of modern Gothic workers in stone, compared to that splendid canvas hall, with its arches, and pillars, and mouldings, and roof of the middle ages? The mind is bewildered by the magnificence of the scene; and wanders, half-distracted, from the hall of Westminster to the Valhalla of Germany; from the cathedral of Lincoln to the courts of the Alhambra. Portions from each meet our gaze by turns, and produce a splendid whole, which we are unwilling to scrutinize too closely, even by the light of the Chinese lamps that so gorgeously illumine it. A Free-Trade Bazaar!—a shop erected by our traders to exhibit and to sell the wares which they have presented, in the hope of attaining the proud privilege of being permitted to compete, without fear or favour, with the manufacturers of the world! It is a noble thought. It is a noble ambition.

Ay, and it is an interesting and an attractive sight to boot, to mark the different productions poured forth by our great marts of industry:—the iron works of Colebrookdale, the potteries of New Etruria, the draperies of Dunfermline (even the communion cloths, with the Bible and crown in the centre, and the crucifix on each side!), and the knives and beautiful model steam-engines from Sheffield! It is an exhibition that shows that the most active part of our population is big with thought and intention; that it is bent upon the attainment of an object. The history of the world, and of individuals who constitute the world, prove to us that, whatever man is firmly bent upon, that he will sooner or later attain. When the thousands who visit this Bazaar see the slave-grown sugar of the United States freely exposed on these stalls, can they continue blind to the hollowness of the pretence that excludes the sugars of Brazil, on the plea that they are produced by similar iniquitous means? When they hear that our own manufacturers, who have created the other articles that so much interest them will, in the course of two years or so, by the ordinary revolutions of English commerce, be clamouring for bread, while their warehouses are blocked up with store of goods for which there is no market; and that our fellow-subjects in Australia are feeding their pigs with wheat, while they themselves lack the comforts of civilised life—will they not see the hollowness of that plea which refuses to admit corn in England in exchange for our manufactured goods, lest we should be overwhelmed with Australian corn, and lest Australia should not have any corn to send us? We are sorry to be obliged to indite arguments so contradictory; but our colonists know too well that Government has refused their application on the two several grounds we have stated:—first, because the importation of their corn would overwhelm the British farmer; secondly, because they grow so little corn that a reduction of duty upon it could be no possible benefit to the colony.

(From the Illuminated Magazine.)

Bazaars and fancy fairs for class purposes have been common enough, but the Bazaar at Covent-garden has for its distinctive feature the union of all classes; perhaps not all the people of all classes, but still supporters from amongst all classes, all shades of politics and religion. A free interchange of the gifts of Providence and the fruits of man's labour throughout the earth we inhabit, is deemed by a constantly increasing number of the community to be the best insurance against failure of production in any particular district. A merchant, who has only one, or but a few ships, insures them; but if he has many ships he does not insure; his risk is so divided that a loss does not seriously affect him. And precisely thus must be the position of a community whose wants are supplied, not from one, but from many districts in many and various climates. Whatever be the ultimate decision of the Legislature, whether for or against Free Trade, of one thing we are quite satisfied,—that English land will continue to rise in value as it ever has done. Population will continue to increase with the increase of food, and with the increase of population the land on which they dwell will become more desirable. And the richer the population becomes by extended commerce, the greater will be the price they will be enabled to pay for the land they require to use, whether it be for corn or cattle, or building or manufacturing purposes. We never yet heard of people in business thriving by the aid of poor customers, or of house-owners thriving by poor tenants; and, so far from anticipating that land can fall in value by the process of extended commerce, we are well assured of the contrary. Were we disposed to vent capital in land, it is not Polish or Russian, or American, Canadian, or Australian soil we should seek, but English; for the same reason that would induce us to prefer land near London to land near the Lizard—condensed population.

Antagonism of all kinds is very painful; and it was with extreme pleasure that we mingled in the smiling crowd thronging the theatre for a twofold purpose—to testify to a great question of political economy, and to triumph in the exhibition of the results of British skill and perseverance—an "Exposition" of British arts and manufactures; a kind of thing common enough in France, but rare in England, where the genius of production is stronger than that of exhibition. We had understood that we were to enter a Norman-Gothic Hall; but the aspect of Shakspeare's statue at the head of the stairs, surrounded by examples of manufactured wealth, prepared us for a different scene.

It was in truth a gorgeous Eastern Bazaar that burst upon us when we entered the body of the theatre, resplendent with artificial light. The days of Haroun Al-Raschid seemed to have returned. It was not as in other bazaars—a series of shops, but as though wealth of all kinds had been profusely heaped together without thought of cost, and without individual ownership; as though a barbarian conqueror had gathered together the plunder of many cities. The sound of the rock music ringing from the upper boxes added no little to the effect. The work-day world was all shut out, and we were in a region of pleasure, where all tastes were to be gratified by a simple act of volition; where people had nothing to do but to walk about, or sit down and enjoy themselves. It was like a first view of Aladdin's cave, the profusion of objects distracting the attention and forbidding either choice or criticism amidst the bewildering glare. Near an hour elapsed ere we could begin to make distinct observation and analyse the component parts of the scene before us, dividing it into distinct portions.

Crowds have attended this Bazaar from its first opening, and continued to attend it, though it was necessary at times to raise the price in order to keep them from crushing. This caused much disappointment, but unavoidably; and if there be a case in which people should bear disappointment with heroism, it is in the reflection that they make way only to swell the funds for a great public good. One poor woman feelingly deplored her loss. "I have come ten miles with my four children to pay my five shillings to the cause, and now I am asked for twelve-and-sixpence, which I have not to give."

It is a great public cause, and we never witnessed so much and such widely-spread conviction in any other. There has been a soul of devotion, a heroism in individuals of all classes, an amount of excitement no selfish feelings could have produced. Small tradesmen and tradeswomen in London have given away their goods out of their own shops to the Bazaar as a patriotic offering; giving away their stock and their trade at the same time—quiet, unostentatious offerings to the spirit of good, and with no hope of their names being published in the newspapers. Women have made presents of their jewels, toys, and trinkets, as well as their time; and we have no doubt that had such a proposal been made, and a Free-Trade use found for it, thousands of women would have been found to shear away the hair from their heads, as is recorded to have been done in one of the sieges of old to furnish cordage for the engines of death. We could almost wish that such a use had been found—not in the cause of war, but of peace—and we are sure that there are thousands of high-minded women who would have considered it a reproach to be seen adorned with the beautiful hair which might help to purchase freedom from misery to millions of their fellows. The distinctive mark of Free Trade would have been written on their brows in the unmistakable character of self-sacrifice.

THE PROTECTIVE SYSTEM.

(From the Examiner.)

Sir Robert Peel admits that the system is bad, but objects the dangers of change. Why, how much greater an alteration has he made than he contemplated, and with safety and advantage, as he now avers! When he re-adjusted the sliding scale he reckoned on an average of 50s., and it has been 10s. below the mark. What encouragement it is to him to proceed more boldly, it being seen that the protecting system has been so considerably (and as boasted), so safely, and beneficially relaxed, beyond the intention of the framers of the new law. It was always an injustice to talk of the protective system, but it is now a mockery to boot, for the difficulty is to find any portion of society acknowledging the benefit of protection. One half of the country complains of the mischief of the partial restrictions, and the other that the benefit of them has been so cut away that they are valueless. Like the Irishman in the sedan without seat or bottom, shuffling along with scraped shins, who had as lief walk, the farmers, with wheat at 45s., are beginning to think they might as well have Free Trade. The present state of things most unhappily combines the detriment of restriction to manufacturers with the detriment of delusion and false reliance to the farmers. It turns the candle at both ends. Manufactures remain under their artificial disadvantages, and agriculture is further depressed. It is high time to decide which principle is sound—Free Trade or Monopoly, and to advance or fall back accordingly. The greatest absurdity is to condemn the principle, as the Premier does, and to adhere to it for fear of the change from bad to better. The evil of the protective system is confessed, as we have before shown: but in this sort of case the great tenderness and anxiety is not for the sufferers under an oppression, but for those who have had the undue benefit of it. When it appears that A has the title to an estate, of which B has had the possession and enjoyment, the law does not say, "This is wrong, but let us beware of sudden change, and B will be ruined if abruptly deprived of the estate which he unrightfully holds, and he has many dependents who would be thrown out of bread." Justice, in such instances, only looks to the claim of the wronged party: Parliament mainly considers the party profiting by the wrong. And yet, if estates were withheld from the rightful claimants to spare the unentitled holders distress and reverse of fortune, the extent of the evil would be the injustice; but in denying the rights of industry from tenderness for the classes profiting by its wrongs, there is, besides, the flagrant injustice, the loss to the country consequent on the restriction of its commerce and labour. There are, however, practically vested rights and vested wrongs: the first for the few, the other for the people. To yield to the poor advantages unjustly stolen from them, by taking from the rich advantages they never ought to have possessed, is an idea not to be endured. Yet the full exercise of industry is as much the right of the poor, as the undisturbed possession of his estate is that of any proprietor in the land. To swell their rents the landlords have stolen a part of the poor man's property (his field of employment), and Sir Robert Peel, confessing the wrong, trembles at the danger of restitution: for to give back to the plundered what has been unfairly and injuriously taken from him might seriously deteriorate the condition of him who has had the wrongful enjoyment. In dealing with every established oppression the first cure is for the oppressor.

CITY OF LONDON FREE TRADE REGISTRATION SOCIETY.

An adjourned meeting of electors from the various wards of the city of London was held on Thursday, at the Guildhall Coffee-house, for the purpose of adopting measures of preparation for the ensuing registration, and also for election purposes.

On the motion of Councillor JOHNSON, Mr. P. A. TAYLOR was called to the chair.

The minutes of last meeting were read and confirmed. The secretaries of the various ward committees gave in lists of their members, and of the chairmen and secretaries.

Mr. BAIGT, M.P., addressed the meeting relative to the importance and the details of registration, and particularly dwelt upon the great moral effect produced upon the various constituencies of the empire by the result of elections for the city of London.

Some conversation ensued upon the importance of attending to the election of parish overseers and churchwardens, and of narrowly looking to the appointment, and watching the conduct, of vestry clerks.

On the motion of Mr. PARKER, of Portoken, seconded by Mr. REED, of Cripplegate Without, it was agreed that the ward committees should immediately commence operations in examining and procuring information relative to the registry, in so far as it embraced their wards respectively; and that they should put themselves in a state of organization to act efficiently when the new list should be published.

Thanks having been voted to the Chairman, the meeting adjourned.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE REGISTRATION.

A meeting of the Registration Committee of the League, for the Manchester polling district, was held at the League offices, in Newall's buildings, on Wednesday evening. At the hour appointed for the meeting the room was filled by a large number of the most active and energetic of the Free-Traders of the district. Among those present were, Messrs. J. Brooks, J. Graham, H. Rawson, Alderman Armitage, John Shawcross, J. Barrett, B. Syddall, J. Simpson, R. M. Shipman, E. Worthington, S. P. Robinson, W. Shuttleworth, J. Barker, M. Mawson, J. F. Royle, W. McCall, R. Rumney, James Shawcross, J. Swallow, C. Duffield, &c. &c. G. Wilson, Esq., the Chairman of the League, presided, and stated the object of the meeting to be, to adopt measures for an immediate and thorough canvass of the district, to ascertain the number of persons qualified to claim for the county at the approaching registration, and to obtain the necessary information for objections to monopolists who are disqualified. He then went through the list of townships seriatim, and each of them was at once appropriated to the gentlemen who undertook to canvass them, each canvassing party receiving a township list from the printed register of the present year, and also a book containing a written street list of the same names; to which are added the voters residing in each township, but having qualifications elsewhere. With these they also received forms of the notice of claim, to be filled up at the proper time.

It was then resolved that circulars should be sent to all who are known to have purchased new qualifications, to inform them when and where they may obtain forms.

It was also resolved that the committee should meet on each Tuesday and Friday evening, at six o'clock prompt, to receive the reports of the canvassers, and to manage the general business of the district.

AMERICAN WHEAT AND ITS MARKET.

(From the Cincinnati Herald.)

In "Hunt's Magazine" for April, Mr. Williams, of Michigan, has an article on wheat and the importance of a home market. It contains the usual statistics designed to show how unimportant is the foreign market to the producers of the west and north-west, and how absolute is their dependence upon what is called the home market. The object is to enlist them in the support of the system of protection. Like other papers of the same kind, it is loose in its calculations, and short-sighted in its views.

Our annual export of wheat to all the world, it is said, is 4,600,000 bushels, equal to but a twenty-second part of the crop of 1843. This presentation of the subject does not lessen the importance of wheat, viewed as an article of export. The proceeds are something like six or seven millions of dollars, and an advance of ten cents would be about half a million of dollars gain to the producers. This certainly is something.

Massachusetts, it is stated, "is a better market for flour than all the world beside." This is a small mistake. She consumes nearly 3,500,000 bushels of wheat, while our average export to foreign ports is 4,600,000.

As for Massachusetts affording an adequate market for the west, it is grossly absurd. Say that the crop of wheat in Ohio is but 20,000,000 bushels; the population is 2,000,000, which, allowing five bushels to each person, consumes 10,000,000—leaving 10,000,000 for export. Now, suppose Massachusetts drew her whole supply from Ohio, her consumption would amount to a little more than one-third. But when we recollect the vast amount of wheat raised by New York, and the incalculable capacities of the wheat-growing region in Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and the territories on our north-west, one cannot but marvel at the coolness with which these home-market men attempt to impose their narrow notions and false statistics upon the people of the west.

Again, it is continually reiterated, that, even were Britain to remove her tariff on grain, it would do us no good—we could not compete with the grain-growing regions of Europe. It is forgotten that the demand in Britain, with the tariff removed, would go on increasing indefinitely—that the grain-raising districts of the north of Europe are limited in their power of production—and that our own wheat-growing region knows no limit. Let Britain change her system, and we would not fear to trust the energy and skill of our farmers, conjoined with advantages peculiar to their position, against the competition of the world.

In 1843, the Home Industry Convention issued a report, designed to show how futile were all hopes of a profitable foreign market for American produce. Statistics were given, of course, from which it appeared that, while our agricultural products had been increasing immensely, the exportation of them had been steadily falling off. In fifty years, the report said, our exportation of beef had diminished "nearly one-half, and that of pork about one-fourth." This was deemed conclusive, and the American agriculturist exclaimed—

"Surely our grain-growing and meat-producing states must see great encouragement for the future in the increasing demand from abroad of northern and western staples. It is quite unreasonable, so deem the abstractionists and politicians, that the farmers should think of seeking an outlet for their products among their own manufacturers, who are willing to take them in exchange for whatever they produce themselves, which we have found, after 50 years' experience, Europeans will not do."

The British Government had before that modified its duties on provisions, but the results had not been embodied in an official form. Meantime, all the home-market prints were ridiculing the idea of the West receiving any benefit from the change. The farmer and stock-breeder of the West would scarcely feel the difference. But what are the facts? Examine for yourselves.

	Dollars.
Beef, tallow, hides, horned cattle, &c.	623,373
Butter and cheese	210,749
Pork, bacon, live hogs, lard, &c.	1,894,894
Total	2,729,016

During the year ending September 30, 1842, the values of the following exports stood thus:—

	Dollars.
Beef, tallow, &c.	1,212,638
Butter and cheese	388,185
Pork, bacon, lard, &c.	2,629,403
Total	4,230,226

For nine months, ending June 30, 1843, the values were:—

	Dollars.
Beef, tallow, &c.	1,092,919
Butter and cheese	508,968
Pork, bacon, lard, &c.	2,120,020
Total for nine months	3,721,937

There can be little doubt that the total amount of exports for the whole of the year 1843, including the last quarter, must have been near five millions of dollars; and by this time the amount is probably more than double that of 1840.

These are facts against theories. That the late removal by the British Government of the duties from lard, oil, &c., will prove of vast additional benefit to our agricultural interests, no reasonable man can help believing. The effect of these changes on prices is everywhere felt, especially by the householder, who, without thinking of the cause, sometimes wonders why he should now be compelled to pay 6½ cents for beef that he bought a year or two ago for 3 and 4 cents per pound.

Let Great Britain remove her duties on grain, and although similar effects might not follow so soon, they would take place just so soon as the conviction became universal, that, no matter how large the quantity of wheat raised, the farmer might calculate upon a certain market for the whole of it. In view of these considerations, we certainly are opposed to all commercial regulations on our part, calculated to awaken a spirit of retaliation, and thus retard the progress of nations towards the only safe, stable, truly beneficial, and Christian policy—Free Trade.

MUTUAL DEPENDENCE OF MEN.

(From Dr. Hutton's Discourse on Free Trade.)

It must be obvious to every one who considers for a moment the state of things as it is, that God never intended any body of men, any more than any individual man, to be self-dependent. He has separated obviously that He might unite us. He has made our wants and our means of supplying them various, that we might supply each other. He has portioned the earth among us, and variously tempered the atmosphere and soil of each separate district, that each, rejoicing in its own peculiar productions, might have its acceptable contribution to make to the common store of all. Look at your tables covered with food conveyed to you from every various region of the world, even the poorest amongst you seasoning their humble meal with condiments from different lands, refreshing themselves occasionally with foreign fruits, sending to the Indies for their sugar, and to China for their tea. Consider your clothing, often wrought for you by foreign artisans, or, even when native hands have wrought it in native looms, fabricated nevertheless from materials of foreign growth. But, so far as the absolute necessities of life are concerned, some one may, perhaps, inquire, May not, and ought not, nations to be independent—can we not always draw our bread at least, the staff of life, from our own soil? Let us not be too certain that we can. The God of the seasons may not be always willing that we should. He may withhold the early or the latter rain; He may send his mildew or His blight, and reward our self-confidence with famine. Admirably has it been said by an enlightened statesman that, "To confine the consumer of corn to the produce of his own country, is to refuse to ourselves the benefit of that provision which Providence itself has made for equalizing to man the variations of season and of climate."

If the great families of the earth will live together in peace and love, in friendly and familiar intercourse, absolute destitution need never come on any; for the hand of God, mercy-restrained, smites only partially, and He loves to see us ministering for each other to the sorrow. He has sent, healing for each other the wounds that He has inflicted.

"Why" (asks a poet), "does the will of Heaven ordain
A world so mixed with woe?
Why pour down want, disease, and pain
On wretched men below?"

Not less truly than beautifully does he answer his own question—

"It was the will of God to leave
These ill for man to mend,
Nor let affliction pass the crave
Before it found a friend."

MISCELLANEOUS.

MR. VILLIERS'S MOTION.—Sir Valentine Blake having withdrawn his notice of motion which stood first for Tuesday next, Mr. Villiers has precedence, and his motion will certainly be brought forward on that day. We feel assured that the Free-Trade members will do justice to the deep interest felt by their constituents, by attending in their places and supporting the motion.

MR. WARD'S MOTION.—Four of the supporters of Government voted in favour of Mr. Ward's motion, viz., Lord John Manners, Lord Newport, Mr. Repton, and Mr. B. Escott. Lord Ashley paired off in its favour with Mr. Baird.

The next aggregate meeting of the League will be held on Wednesday evening, the 18th inst., when the receipts and other particulars of the Bazaar will be announced.

BAZAAR LOTTERIES.—The large Wedding Cake was drawn for on Saturday last, and won by (No. 64) Mr. Edward Lucas, Croydon.—The list for Audubon's Birds is still open. Subscribers' names will be received at the offices in London or Manchester.—At the Leeds stall:—Chest of Joiners' Tools—won by Mr. J. Hirst, Eldon-terrace, Leeds. Timepiece—won by Mr. Edwin Eddison, Leeds. Rosewood Chair—won by Mr. James Bischoff, Highbury-terrace. Portrait of the Queen—won by Mr. C. Reynolds, Northwich. Captain Wm. Ball's Works—won by Mr. Stephen Unwin, Cuggeshall. Picture of Smoker—won by The League.

CARRIAGE OF GOODS TO THE BAZAAR.—We have to acknowledge the liberality of Messrs. Newcombe, Chaplin, and Horne, who conveyed the Sheffield goods to the Bazaar free of expense. The instances of similar liberality on the part of other companies are numerous, and to all highly creditable.

GRAVESEND.—THE REGISTRATION.—The Free-Traders of Gravesend are about to adopt active measures to forward the registration of persons qualified to vote. For this purpose they intend holding a meeting next Thursday evening in the town-hall, when the Mayor will preside. The meeting will be addressed by Mr. Falvey, from the Anti-Corn-Law League.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. FALVEY.—On Friday last, a testimonial, which had been subscribed for by about sixty gentlemen, was presented to Mr. T. Falvey, at the White Hart Tavern, Myddelton-street, Clerkenwell, as an expression of admiration of the talent and intrepidity evinced by him as a lecturer of the Anti-Corn-Law League, both in the manufacturing and agricultural districts. The testimonial consisted of a handsome silver snuffbox, richly chased, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented to Mr. Timothy Falvey, by Metropolitan Free-Traders, as a mark of respect for his urbane and gentlemanly deportment, and his able and consistent advocacy of the principles of truth and justice. May 30, 1845." The testimonial having been presented by M. J. Lewis, Esq., in an able address, Mr. Falvey returned thanks in a speech of characteristic eloquence and power.—Weekly paper.

IMPROVING THE CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE.—At a meeting of the Leicester Complete Suffrage Association, a meeting of the Leicester Complete Suffrage Association, held on Tuesday evening, at the Townhall, the Rev. J. Bloodworth in the chair, a discussion took place as to the best means of enabling the working classes to "labour the best means of enabling the working classes to labour less and enjoy more;" during which Mr. Manning advocated perfect Free Trade as essential to the end desired. "For more than a century," he said, "the food of the goods had been falling in price, while the food of the people had practically risen. They wanted food to fill in a fair proportion. It had been said, on a former evening, that there were parties who would be injured by Corn Law repeal. He maintained that none would be injured but those who deserved it. There was a section of the aristocracy whose extravagance had led them to mortgage their estates. They might be injured, but was all the rest of the population to suffer for their benefit? (Hear, hear.) They wanted to have their cake and eat it; but it was impossible: they had eaten it, and they must go without. Should all the country be injured for the sake of those babes crying for their milk? (Cheers.) They must have perfect freedom of trade, and then the condition of the labouring classes would be improved."

IRON, &c.—At Friday's meeting in Birmingham the great ironmasters of the district resolved that the workers of the iron districts, notwithstanding the reduction of the price of the manufactured staple articles of South Staffordshire, should have the price of labour which they claimed. At West Bromwich the striking iron-continues amongst the puddlers, no arrangement having been come to between the masters and the men.—Worcester Journal.

ADVANCE OF WAGES.—On Thursday week, a general meeting was held in the Old Schoolroom, Duffield, to appoint a deputation to solicit the firms of Brettell and Co. and Ward and Co., both of Belper, for an advance of sixpence per dozen upon all salvage gloves. On Monday, a deputation waited upon both firms, when that of Brettell and Co. promised to give the advance on all common salvage gloves, but not on supers. This caused a standstill amongst the super workmen, who declared they would not work till their request was complied with. On Messrs. Ward being solicited, they agreed to give the advance on all salvage gloves for one month, independently of any other house, making no distinction between common and supers. At the expiration of one month, should the trade remain in the same flourishing condition, the advance is to be continued.—Derby Mercury.

THE GAME LAWS.—The following is an abstract of Lord Dacre's Bill "for the further amendment of the laws in England relative to game." According thereto, no person is to sell game except a licensed dealer in game, &c.; but occupiers of land need not take out certificates. Dealers in game are to keep a book, entering the names of sellers thereof, the description of game sold to them, &c.; and such book is to be open to inspection at any time by justices of the peace, or persons having their warrant. Persons in possession of game are to account for it, and also for the possession of snares. Damage done by game is to be apportioned among the neighbouring proprietors, the amount being assessed at petty sessions, power of appeal being given to quarter sessions. The provisions of the former act, as regards all penalties and forfeitures, are proposed to be extended to this act.

BOLTON.—DINNER TO THE WORKMEN OF MESSRS. KNIGHT AND WOOD.—On Friday evening last, a dinner was given in the Townhall, Little Bolton, to the workmen employed at the Victoria Foundry, by Mr. John Wood, on occasion of his becoming a partner with Mr. Knight in that establishment. About 130 persons sat down to dinner. On the removal of the cloth, Joseph Peat, Esq., was called to the chair, and Mr. John Holt officiated as vice-president. After the customary toasts, the chairman proposed "the health of Mr. Wood, and health and prosperity to him in his new undertaking." The toast was drunk with three times three, and loud and long continued cheering. Mr. Wood returned thanks, and in doing so congratulated the company on the prosperity of trade, which kept all hands employed, and enabled the masters to give good wages. It might now be said, he thought, with truth, that the workmen employed in foundries had plenty of work for their wages, but plenty of wages for their work, and he trusted that such a state of things would long continue. After a great number of other toasts, interspersed with songs, recitations, &c., the party finally separated at a late hour, highly delighted with the entertainment.

PUBLIC PARKS IN MANCHESTER.—The park committee of Manchester have, within the last seven weeks, purchased sites for three public parks. For the last purchase, which consists of 31 acres of freehold land in the township of Bradford, the price was £6200, or about 10d. per square yard. The two sites previously purchased (Bulham-hall and Lark-hill estates) cost, the former £4250, and the latter £7000. As upwards of £31,000 have been collected, the committee have still a considerable sum at their disposal.

PRICE OF MEAT.—The Monia Herald, in recommending the Isle of Man as a place of residence, &c., gives the following as the prices of necessaries:—Beef, from 1d. to 6d. per lb.; pork 3d. to 4d.; fowls, 16d. to 2s. per pair; eggs, 4d. per dozen; mutton, 5d. to 6d. per lb.; veal, 3s. to 3d.; ducks 2s. per pair; herrings, 3s. per hundred, and all kinds of fish low. Brandy, 10s. per gallon; rum, 5s.; Geneva, 7s.; brown sugar, 3d. per lb., refined do. 6d.

FOREIGN PROVISIONS.—The General Steam Navigation Company's vessel Ocean, from Rotterdam, which arrived at the Custom-house on Monday, had 49 cows on board, 11 oxen, and seven calves, in excellent condition. She had also eight baskets of yeast, four baskets of sturgeon, and 32 baskets of other description of fish; 13 packages of cucumbers, and a large quantity of butter, cheese, and other articles of Dutch produce. The Company's vessels Princess Royal, from Hamburg, Sir Edward Banks, from Ostend, and James Watt, from Havre, all reported the same day, with a large quantity of poultry, butter, eggs, and other descriptions of provisions for consumption in this country.

AGRICULTURAL PROSPERITY.—The following advertisement appeared in the Cambridge Independent of May 21:—"Farms to let, the property of the Right Hon. the Earl of Hardwicke,—first, Eversden-hill Farm, situate in the parish of Great Eversden, containing about 113 acres of arable land—immediate possession may be obtained; second, Wragg's Farm, situate in the parish of Arrington, late in the occupation of Messrs. Wragg and Russell, containing about 300 acres of arable and pasture land, with immediate possession; third, Victoria Farm, situate in the parish of Hardwicke, now in the occupation of Mr. Dearlove, containing about 240 acres of arable and pasture land, with possession at Michaelmas; fourth, Wimpole-valley Farm, situate in the parish of Wimpole and Arrington, now in the occupation of Mr. Rowley, containing about 250 acres of arable and pasture land, with possession at Michaelmas."

AGRICULTURAL MEMBERS.—We are far from attributing to the agricultural members any tendency to theatrical exhibition. A more staid, deliberate, matter-of-fact body of gentlemen the House does not boast; but, of late, they have somewhat usurped the characteristic of a celebrated actor—Linton; and their appearance on the stage of St. Stephen's would now seem to be the acknowledged signal for general laughter. Few who have seen that irresistible comedian in Mawworm can forget the pious unctious with which he enunciated, "I like to be despised;" and few, we imagine, can have witnessed the exhibition of agricultural members in the recent land-and-grass debates, without having the style and the sentiment of Mawworm's declaration forcibly recalled to their recollection. Between the comedian and the "agricultural" county members there exists, however, a broad distinction. Linton exposed, with unerring truth and force, the follies and hypocrisies of others. The debaters on grass and land, perhaps with equal truth and great sincerity, simply expose their own.—Exeter Advertiser.

FAILURE IN THE IRISH FLAX CROP.—It is announced that the flax crop has proved a ruinous failure in the flax-growing district in Ulster. A Belfast paper says,—"The Riga seed was generally the favourite in this country, but, owing to the unfavourable state of the season for saving it in Russia, it is thought the growers and venders have resorted to the nefarious practice of kiln-drying it. This would of course give it a firm and fair appearance to the eye of the purchaser, but the process destroys almost all probability of vegetation. We have been assured that between four and five thousand acres of land sown with this seed have missed, and that the ground is being prepared for potatoes and barley. The American and Dutch seeds, with the Egyptian lately imported to this country, are doing well, and promises a fair average crop, although later in growth and appearance than at this period in former seasons."

OPERATION OF THE NEW TARIFF.—The mean annual produce of duties in two years preceding the establishment of the new tariff, amounted to £22,637,494; and in the two years following the establishment of the new tariff, £22,720,886, comprising 813 articles.—Newcastle Advertiser.

THE AMERICAN TARIFF.—The Washington Union states that the Secretary of the Treasury is preparing for Congress a body of useful statistics, which will enable the national Legislature to form the best and wisest system of revenue reduced to the proper standard, and to do away with the unequal operations of the present system. It is certainly desirable for the benefit of manufactures to have a fair and permanent protection in preference to high duties subject to constant changes; but, while the information of the Secretary will be valuable to Congress and the people, the great unsettled questions with foreign nations and the falling off of our revenue may interpose serious barriers to any immediate and important changes, unless there is a sure prospect of our advances being reciprocated abroad. The duties on iron, coal, salt, hemp, coarse cottons and woollens, are doubtless too high; but are not the pledges made to Pennsylvania that these articles should remain at their existing rates, at least for the present, in some respects binding? There is a disposition at present, in the unsettled state of our foreign relations, not to meddle with the tariff.—New York Sun.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—The new treaty between Great Britain and France for the suppression of the slave trade, has been signed respectively by Dr. Lushington and the Duke de Broglie, and awaits the ratification of the two Governments. By this treaty England and France agree to maintain each a naval force on the coast of Africa within a certain latitude, and which forces are to co-operate in harmony in the maintenance of a strict surveillance. Treaties solely for the suppression of the slave trade will be negotiated with all the native princes and chiefs of the above-named coast of Africa, according as it shall appear necessary to the commanders of the French and English stations. These treaties will be negotiated either by commanders themselves, or by officers to whom they will give instructions to this effect. The right of mutual search, as between the two countries, is to expire after a given period. These are the principal features of the treaty.

EVILS OF A FIXED DUTY.—A fixed duty would in scarce years artificially raise the price of corn here by a sum equal to the duty higher than it otherwise would be. It would make the expense of growing corn greater by enhancing the price of all the necessaries of life. It would keep up rent and keep down wages. It would at all times limit trade, for there always must be an immense mass of exchange, which a rise of 4s., 5s., or 6s. a quarter in the price of corn would prevent. The fixed duty would always narrow the sources of our supply. At the same time it would exclude our agriculturists from any market but our own when the harvests were very abundant, till the price here had fallen below the remunerating and proper market price, by a sum equal to the duty. While it increased the cost of growing corn on the average, therefore, it would prevent the farmer getting on the average and long run a remunerating price, and would be as injurious to him and the country as a sliding scale. Our purblind lawmakers see only a very small part of the social phenomena. They see, for example, the fact, that the country has not latterly produced enough for the increasing population; but they cannot see the possibility of the agriculturists growing as much and sometimes more in favourable years than would suffice for the people. They make their law, which is to be general and durable, with a view to the single contingency of the country never growing enough for its own people. For our parts, we believe in the possibility of the country growing more in favourable years than our own people can consume. In such years a fixed duty would cause irremediable injury to the farmer, by shutting him out from the foreign market till the price had become ruinously low. Lord John Russell therefore, while he declines against protection, would inflict all its evils on the community under the name of a fixed duty. A fixed duty would be protection disguised, and as gross an injustice and as heavy a curse as a sliding-scale duty of equal amount.—Brighton Guardian.

SCOTCH PROVISION TRADE.—Last week no fewer than 731 head of mostly large fat cattle were landed from Scotland. Upwards of 600 pigs, and several hundreds of sheep, in addition to about 100 tons of dead meat, came by sea from the North during the week. At the present prices these vires would realize £20,000, and yet would not furnish one hour's deglutition on a Sunday afternoon to the maw of this immense metropolis.—Advertiser.

EXPORT OF MACHINERY.—The exports of all descriptions of machinery from Hull continue large from week to week. They include the most costly, substantial, and ingenious works for numerous new manufactories on the Continent, including spinning and weaving mills, and steam-engines to work seed-crushing and saw-mills, gas, and other works of almost interminable variety. This machinery is to a considerable extent made on the spot, and within a few miles of the town, but the greater part comes down from the great iron works, and the seats of engineering industry in the interior and the opposite side of the island; Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Newcastle, Wolverhampton, Sheffield, and many other towns, independent of the huge castings from such foundries as those of Low-moor and the Buttery Company, all contribute towards the heavy machinery traffic to this great depot of exports for the North, and from hence issue, in countless ships, with companies of skilled artisans for all sides of the continent of Europe, whence they penetrate hundreds of miles into the interior, to become centres of the busy hum of industry. Rails, chairs, engines, tenders, and carriage wheels for new railways forming all over the Continent, are also among the exports from Hull. There is, however, a marked change in the ports of destination of these important exports, which formerly went chiefly to Hamburg, Dunkirk, and the near ports of the Netherlands, to which places the supply appears to have almost if not entirely ceased—partly in consequence of the numerous manufactories already erected by British art in the neighbouring states, and partly through the erection there of British engineering works, with large capital, consequent upon the heavy duties formerly imposed upon the export of machinery from this country. This duty, as our readers are aware, since the erection of those works, was, about two years ago, entirely repealed, and the result has proved the policy of that experiment, in the impetus given to our native engineering manufactures, and the vastly increased amount of exports of machinery which now proceed to Russia, via Petersburg, more than by any other route; whilst Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, and other Continental nations, are continually making similar draughts upon us. The immense cases of cotton-spinning machinery, fifty to sixty feet long, which weekly lie upon our quays, or are trans-shipped at once from the railway to the sea-going ship, speak with a voice irresistible and impossible to be misunderstood, calling upon the skill, the labour, and the capital of Old England for redoubled competitive energy.—Eastern Counties Herald.

GERMAN INDUSTRY.—The Presse (Paris paper) states, that MM. Legentil and De Goldenberg, who were despatched on a special mission by the Minister of Commerce to examine the exposition of German national industry, which was held at Berlin in the month of September last, have furnished an account of their mission to the Minister, from which the following is an extract:—"The states of the Zollverein were not alone permitted to exhibit their manufactures. The productions of Austria, Hanover, Luxembourg, and Dutch Limburgh, the Hanse Towns, Holstein, Mecklenburgh, and Oldenburgh, were admitted, although not forming part of the German union. The entrance to the exposition was not free to the public, as in France. The Prussian Government covered the expense of preparing the buildings for the reception of the articles to be exhibited by an entrance-fee, demanded of each visitor, of six silver groschens (6d. British). Notwithstanding this charge, the crowd of visitors during the entire period of the exposition was immense. After having visited at the French exposition last year, it was impossible not to have observed the numerous deficiencies in that of Berlin." The report of the commissioners adds, "that they in vain sought for those handsome and ingenious machines which replace and increase a hundredfold human force; those exquisite productions in bronze, jewellery, gold and silver, and cabinet work; those splendid carpets, and that infinite variety of stuffs, whose execution has exhausted every difficulty of machinery, without demanding any sacrifice from good taste. In general, German manufactures, compared with those of France, are far from being perfect. Their progress has been less rapid than ours. It is true that they commenced but a few years since. It is in France that the German manufacturers supply themselves with foremen, painters, and chemists. When visiting the principal manufactories through Germany, the two commissioners met a number of Frenchmen directing the most extensive works. Without speaking of the French colony at Berlin, where several manufacturers maintain the character of their original country, they found a Frenchman at Chemnitz directing a manufactory for the construction of machinery; and at Elberfeld, the principal silk factory is directed by a native of Lyons. The cotton spinning mills at Ettlingen, in the Grand Duchy of Baden, and at Augsburg, the most considerable in the Zollverein, have been established by one of the principal manufacturers in Alsace. The same fact was observed in the flax spinning mills in Wurtemberg. With some exceptions, according to the report, the object of the German manufacturers is to produce a vast supply, and at a low cost. They regard cheapness more than elegance in their produce. The German, in his habits, seeks comforts. But what he considers to be comforts are not the superfluities, but the necessities of life. His tastes are simple, because his means of satisfying them are limited. There are not many great fortunes in the Zollverein, which in this respect differs considerably from Austria. This, perhaps, is the real cause of the inferiority which is to be remarked in their produce compared with ours. Although the introduction of machinery, and the centralization of labour in large manufactories, have made remarkable progress within a few years, the old habits and customs are still practised in certain provinces. Woollen cloth, for example, is manufactured in Silesia and in Saxony by a number of small artisans, who, assisted by their wives and children, spin the wool which they grow themselves. The cotton spinners employ but 815,000 spindles; that is, only the fifth of what we possess, and only the third of what would be necessary if the supply of the Zollverein were equal to its consumption. If we had a treaty with the Zollverein, our cotton manufacturers would find in Germany an immense market, which at present is monopolized by the British manufacturers, and from which they derive enormous profits. We shall continue the examination of this report, happy to give publicity to a document which is distinguished by an incontestable character of utility."

INCENDIARY FIRES.—We regret to state that an incendiary fire took place at Norton, near Emswell, on Wednesday night, by which a boarded and thatched barn containing a quantity of straw, belonging to J. Joacelyn, Esq., of Sproughton, and in the occupation of Mr. W. M. Bridges, was totally consumed. The alarm was given about ten o'clock, at which time the barn was in a blaze. The inhabitants were instantly on the spot, with Superintendent Smith, and a number of men belonging to the West Suffolk Police; and in the course of a short time Lord Thurlow arrived with two of his powerful engines from Ashfield and Wetherden. All parties rendered every assistance in their power, but all was of no avail. The fiendish act of the villainous incendiary was deeply deplored by the whole of the population, and especially by the labourers, Mr. Bridges having been long esteemed as a kind and indulgent master.—Ipwich Express.—On the 23rd of May, Mr. Taylor, of Botsough, had two wheat stacks, the produce of forty acres, consumed by fire. There is no doubt of its having been the work of an incendiary.—Norfolk News.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXXIII.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

GENTLEMEN,—On Tuesday next it will again devolve upon you to discuss and decide whether food from abroad shall be freely admitted, for supplying the wants and remunerating the industry of the people of this country. Allow one of the many to entreat your calm and serious consideration of the course to be adopted on that occasion. I do not appeal to you in your collective capacity; nor as members of either of the great political parties; but as men who are conscious of the claims of truth and justice, and who feel the moral responsibility inseparable from the possession of legislative authority.
 Though I may only "tell you that which you yourselves do know," let me not, I pray you, be therefore unheeded. It is on your own thoughts that I rely; my purpose being to hold up a mirror wherein you will perceive what portion of those thoughts is most distinctly and strongly reflected in other minds.
 On that portion I would fix your attention, that you may estimate its relative weight, and its claim to preponderate in the practical direction of your conduct, as legislators, on the question again submitted for your decision.

Could taxation upon food be treated as an isolated topic, there would probably be little difference of opinion, or of action. Who would ever dream of stopping a cargo of corn, coming as payment for manufactured goods, from a New York merchant to a Liverpool merchant, if this were "the be-all and end-all" of the transaction? It would stand on the same ground as any other case of honest barter, with which a third party has no business to interpose. The right is apparent; and as such exchange presupposes the wants, thus mutually supplied, of food in the one locality, and of manufactures in the other, the advantage and humanity of the transaction are apparent also. Hence few of you profess hostility towards Free Trade "in the abstract." The opposition arises, not from the essence, but from the adjuncts and accidents, of the question. Considerations of national policy, of class interests, of party tactics, of public revenue, or of temporary expediency, surround and smother the main question, and determine many of you to vote, for the present at least, against the untaxed interchange of products which, whether in England or America, and whether from the land or the loom, are alike obtained by the application of capital and the exercise of industry.

There is, then, gentlemen, in favour of Free Trade, that clear and prompt decision which results from the most elementary moral principles. The antagonist considerations are all only different forms of a temporary expediency. They are questions of "how far" and "how long." Sooner or later, they must wear out. Are they not worn out already?
 Is not the time come for all such considerations to yield, when once the question is commonly mooted on the higher ground? The case for Corn-Law repeal is simple and complete. You concede the right. It cannot be disproved. It has laid firm hold on the public mind. Against it are only disputed facts, and motives of a subordinate character.
 Every year has made them less forcible and less plausible. Every year makes them less satisfactory as a reason for delay. The dying expediency cannot resist the ever-living truth. The time is ripe for decision. It must be so with all who become conscious of only balancing between a class or party convenience and a principle. That consciousness is itself a signal for dismissing the idea of further procrastination.

Party ties extend not to such questions as this.

Like that of slavery, it is beyond their limita. It disregards the customary division, and creates a demarcation of its own. There is always a suspension of party when men are in earnest on a philanthropic object. The measures which Lord Ashley has made his own for protecting women and children, and lightening the hours of labour, are irrespective of Toryism and of Whiggism. He asks not whether they promote or embarrass the party policy of one or the other. Similar disregard is asked of you, of every thoughtful, just, and humane man in the House, on this paramount topic of the supply of food for the population. He will not compromise his generous impulses and beneficent purposes for the minor objects of party. Be you as uncon-promising on a matter which is not only more momentous, but which must impede, by its delay, all other projects for meliorating the condition of the people. All are compromised, endangered, perhaps sacrificed, so long as this is unsettled.

Lord John Russell, who has declared that "protection is the bane of agriculture," still clings to a fixed duty. Sir Robert Peel, who justly boasted of having done more for Free Trade in ten months than the Whigs in ten years, still upholds the last modification of the sliding scale. Party leaders are not the best judges of the fitting time for great measures of the description now proposed. They look too much to Parliamentary strength. They are cautious of risking the adherence of any great section of their supporters. They overstand the time. Sir Robert Peel has committed this error more than once; to say nothing of similar mistakes on the part of his opponents. Public agitation is the child of Ministerial procrastination. The too-late measure brings weakness, which, at an earlier period, would have been the source of strength. At such junctures, it is for followers to lead their leaders. They can render no better service than by thus stepping out in advance. When Tory Free-Traders speak plainly, Tory Protectionists will capitulate. The position of Sir Robert Peel requires this, from those of his party who share in his convictions, and who are unfettered by his ties to the antagonist portion of his followers. They must say for him—he cannot so well say it for himself—that the time is come. If they announce "the hour," he will show "the man." And, however long postponed, by a policy which thus far may find some palliation in the peculiar circumstances of his party, but which now has reached its proper boundary, a proud day will it be for him which shall (though by voting against him in the first instance) consign his name to history as the first Free-Trade Minister of the British Empire.

Gentlemen, it is believed there are many of you who clearly see how this agitation must end. You are prepared for the only termination of which it is capable. Your decisive conduct now would avert many of the evils which must attend that termination if it be still postponed. The leaders of the House might not be outvoted by your support of Mr. C.
 Villiers's motion; but they would be taught that the game of compromise was up. Nothing would remain but to provide decently for the funeral of "Protection." It would become defunct by your independent action. Sir Robert Peel would soon do the rest. The turmoil out of doors would be allayed. You would have no more votes and words to swallow down on some future occasion. The rapidly growing distrust of all political professions and integrity would be checked. The farmer would know on what terms to treat with his landlord. There would be a closing of the gulfs, some widening, and others newly opening, between different classes of society. And above all, that awful revulsion would be averted, that recurrence of worse than Paisley horrors, which perhaps a single bad harvest, certainly two bad harvests in succession, must bring upon the country. Strong nerved must be he who dares to look that calamity in the face. Providence has granted an interval of breathing time; but left the future discernible without the gift of prophecy. Is it wise to wait? Is it right to devote your responsibility on Sir Robert Peel, or on any party leader? Can you so deliver your own con-sciences, in the sight either of God or man? You hold the balance. Your votes may be in a minority, but the impression of your conduct will be not less decisive than any majority. But if you sacrifice this great question to a supposed and paltry political expediency, you cripple Sir Robert Peel in the practical application of his avowed principles; you provide for the not very distant breaking up of your party; you prolong a growing agitation; you expose the country to fearful chances of discontent, distraction, and confusion; you neglect the most favourable opportunity of settling a question alike urgent and momentous; you tamper with that which is highest and purest in your own minds, and postpone to "a more convenient season" your full conformity with the sacred duties and solemn responsibilities of legislation. These are not words of course, or topics of rhetorical pervasion. Their reality is felt by him who writes them; who feels them in common with the million to whom he belongs; and who laments the inadequate power of expression to transfer that feeling from his own mind to yours. No petitioners ever humbly prayed your honourable House with half the earnestness with which you are now individually besought to discard all fear and favour, all party ties or petty expediency, and to vote for the free supply of a nation's food, and the free exercise of a nation's industry.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

WHAT MAY NOT THE LANDED INTEREST DO FOR ITSELF? LOOK AT ESSEX.

There appeared, a few weeks ago, in the Agricultural Gazette, an article descriptive of certain practical experiments carried out on the farm of Mr. John Biggs, near Colchester, in Essex. I think the article is worth the attention of all persons interested in the reformation of agriculture; and especially those who have some lingering dread that the withdrawal of protection would injure agriculture.

It seems that Mr. Biggs, being situated near a town where there is a gas manufactory and other public works, has an advantage not common to inland farmers, in getting chemical ingredients. So that it may be justly enough said that other farmers cannot do what he does. To reply to this, I would observe that it is neither necessary nor desirable that all other farmers should do as he does. Except in the neighbourhood of large towns, where manures can be obtained in great abundance, it is unquestionably the most profitable course for a farmer to take—that of feeding a large quantity of stock to produce manures free of cost. The importation of beans, oats, barley, Indian corn, &c., duty free, to be added to the turnips, wurzel, carrots, and other roots, grown at home, would facilitate the fattening of stock, and the production of farmyard manure, far beyond anything yet known.

The description of Mr. Biggs's experiments will show what can be done upon a farm even when manures are purchased. What we of the Free-Trade party urge is, that the farmer should be able, and would be able with Free Trade, to feed a far larger amount of stock, and so fertilize his land free of expense; the profit on the stock paying for the manure, and the labour of preparing and applying it.

We say that full employment, at good wages, creates new markets, and enlarges old ones for butcher's meat. When ten or eleven millions of the population have barely enough of bread and potatoes, they do not eat beef and mutton and bacon. When they have enough of bread and potatoes, and some money to spare, they buy beef and mutton and bacon. The consumption of these articles in towns where the population, say in Brighton, is able to procure them, proves that the demand would be prodigiously increased all over the kingdom, beyond what it is or ever has been, if the people were able to use such articles continuously.

When a district of country previously depressed attains to a temporary prosperity, we see the consumption of butcher's meat increase rapidly. Look at any single town in Lancashire at the present time, compared with what it was in the five years preceding 1844; or look at the whole of the northern and midland counties. But temporary prosperity does not do for the cattle market what continued prosperity does. The continued ability of a family to obtain any article of food confirms the use of it into a habit, and it is sought for and used regularly. Not so when the family falls into periodical distress by reduced employment and reduced wages—losing clothes and furniture in their distress, and struggling when reviving trade comes round to restore their clothes and furniture.

If any man more than another has an interest in liberated trade and liberated agriculture it is the farmer. To feed his cattle and sheep and pigs rapidly; to produce great abundance of manures; to be free from the thrall of political services by tenancy-at-will, for political purposes which do him much harm and no good; to permanently improve the value of land by holding it on a tenure of security; to be able to ascertain through equitable prices what he can and should contract to pay for land; to be able to pay what he contracts for, and thus to create and sustain upon the firmest foundation a good feeling between himself and landlord;—these are a few of the substantial benefits which will accrue to farmers from Free Trade—from the abolition of that delusive and pernicious monopoly which, like will-o'-the-wisp, at once blinds their eyes and lead them astray.

I was particularly pleased with the beauty and deeply impressed with the instructiveness of the woven fabrics of silk and wool, and cotton and wool, and of wool in almost every possible variety of texture, displayed at the Bazaar in Covent-garden Theatre. Have not the growers of wool been scared out of their good sense and good nature since cotton came first into this kingdom? And since silk came in cheap? And flax? And foreign-grown wool? Yet is there not now a high and steady price for wool of home growth? Though the flocks of England and of Scotland increase year by year, and the importation of wool increases also, as also cotton and flax and silk, does not the wool of home growth maintain its price?

It does so. And it maintains its price because of the new uses it is put to in union with other materials, and because of the new shapes it takes at the hands of productive industry.

What, then, is there to fear from the union of bread and meat, of flour and sugar, and butter and fruit? With the multitude the adornment of the body is secondary to the gratification of the appetite. Let the prime material of food, wheaten flour, come within easy reach of every family, as the prime materials of clothing are now allowed to come within easy reach of every factory, and the use of one will rapidly lead to the extensive use of the others. The pot, the pan, the oven, the roasting-jack, the picking tub, the cupboard with the sugar bason and the tea caddy, and all the jars and dishes,—all will come into play if the sack of flour be present, and another ready to supply its place when that is empty. These will do far more for farmers, if within the easy reach of families, even though some of the flour be foreign, than the factories have yet done for farmers, even though some of the wool they work up be foreign; and the factories, in respect of wool, have done a great deal for farmers.

I now beg to draw attention to the means taken by Mr. Biggs to increase the supply of flour and the employment of the population, reminding the reader that the manures which this farmer buys should be produced on the farm free of expense; and would be so under a system that would favour the feeding of a large quantity of live stock—a system of Free Trade. And I beg to subscribe myself,

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

Mr. Biggs, near Colchester—Wheat after Wheat—Ammoniacal Water—An Opinion on Smut, Seed Wheat, &c.

"In the latter end of June, 1844, I happened to be at Colchester, in Essex, and hearing of Mr. John Biggs, a farmer, occupying land within three miles of that town, I paid a visit to him on his farm. He is a tenant on the estate of Earl De Grey, and though only a tenant-at-will, and without the security which a good lease confers, he has been, and is now, a great improver of the soil. Yet, it must be remarked at the outset, that, though a tenant-at-will, he is not holding his farm on the ordinary terms. He pays the usual rent in the usual way, but his occupancy is the result of good service to Earl De Grey in another capacity. So that his tenure is probably as safe for his own life as if it were provided for on parchment. The personal kindness of his lordship has also been extended to Mr. Biggs, through his agent, to allow him to depart from the usual rotation of cropping on parts of the farm, in order to make certain experiments.

"Thus far, it is necessary to premise, to show why Mr. Biggs has been allowed to depart from the agricultural customs around him, so stringently enforced on others. He has been allowed to grow wheat successively on the same ground. On one piece of land he has grown the fifth crop of wheat in seven years. And as he has favoured me with an account of the produce of the crop which I saw in June since it has been threshed out, and that produce being 5 quarters 3 pecks per acre, I think it worth while to draw attention to the farm, the farming, and the farmer.

"Passing over several farms north of Colchester, whose gravelly soils last summer were afflicted with the long drought, and which faced the southern sun and the dry west winds, with but little shade or shelter, I reached the neighbourhood of Mr. Biggs's farm, some of which had been woodland within the last three years, some within six years and ten years; and nearly all of which, with other farms near it, had been woodland within the memory of younger persons than 'the oldest inhabitant.' The soil was generally tending to clay; much of it might be called thin and cold. None of it was of a natural richness to warrant such excessive cropping as it was compelled to undergo. Without vigorous and intelligently applied stimulants, the results at harvest would have been different. The adjoining farms, possessing quite as good a soil, but being very differently farmed, prove this. I found the farm-fields lying somewhat scattered, several small portions of land having been united into one farm by Mr. Biggs at different times. I believe the farm is still extending in size, by grubbing up the woodlands, and putting odd enclosures into one. The aspect was north and easterly, the shelter good, approaching in some parts to suffocation in summer time. It was exposed also to the game a good deal. The hedges had been cut down, and were kept clean at bottom, and only as high as would be a fence. These hedges and their bottom ditches employed one man at 11s. a week all the year, save harvest; and Mr. Biggs assured me that he saved this man's wages by the reduced number of small birds and other depredators, and foul seeds which resulted from the trimming of the hedges. He had two or three acres in separate places under seeds, colewort, turnip, &c. The advantage of a good fence and free air, where the plantations tended, as these, to suffocation, was also valuable. The first thing I noticed was the greater number of men he had at work, for such a moderate breadth of land, than is usual in that part of England. He pays £400 in wages on the same breadth of land upon which other farmers pay but £250 in wages. And last year they reduced their payment of wages to about £150. They say that the high farming of Mr. Biggs will not pay with present prices. He says that, however desirable it may be to have higher prices, he will make a better profit by the expenditure of £400 in wages, for such work as he executes on his farm, than they will from £150 or £200 in wages for such work as they execute on the same extent of land. Having his authority to use his name publicly, I do so that he may be personally referred to. Looking to my notebook I find that in front of his house, on the opposite side of the public road which passes his door, there is a small enclosure of two acres. He had obtained leave to raise wheat on this for seven successive years; the soil was naturally thin, and (my notes do not state so, but I think my memory is correct) a rather tenacious clay. At all events it was what would be called a poor soil. The design of treating it was to have a full crop of wheat alternately with a half crop of wheat. Last year's crop was the second of the system, and was the half crop, or fallow. He has one particular kind of manure which he calls 'ammoniacal water,' procured from the refuse of the gas works at Colchester. He tries every other kind of manure, and on these two acres had tried no fewer than eight different fertilizers, but had nothing to equal his 'ammoniacal water.' He thinks that, by sowing just half the quantity of seed every second year, he will give the soil breathing-time under its burden of continued wheat. He proposes this instead of fallowing, as is the custom around him, every fourth year. His half crop looked but indifferently on the 24th of June, save on the portion watered with ammonia; that is, it struck me as being an indifferent crop before it was explained that it was only intended to be a half one. The manures used were these:—1st. Liquid composition of Pigeon's dung. 2nd. Pigeon's dung, without mixture. 3rd. Ammoniacal water, Mr. Biggs's own composition, upon which the wheat was dark in the blade and strong, and more full of promise than on any of the other manures. 4th. The same material applied as a powder. The wheat not looking as well, because, as Mr. Biggs thought, of the continued drought. The first rain of the summer fell next day; but I did not again see the crops. The cost of the liquid ammonia was 25s. per acre; the powder half that sum, owing to the lesser amount of labour bestowed upon it. The 5th was a composition of salt. The 6th, farmyard drainings. The 7th, chamber-ley; and the 8th, soot and lime. I have since received a note of the produce of this half crop; it was, upon an average of all the manures, 3 quarters per acre, weighing 65½ lbs. per bushel; being an increase in weight of 3 lbs. per bushel over the full crop on the same ground in 1843.

"I next passed to a field of wheat after mangold wurzel. In one or two places it was scorched by the drought; but as a whole looked exceedingly well. A compost, made from the gas-work's refuse, had been applied to the wurzel; before that it was wheat—his first crop on that piece of ground—and that wheat was 'after some of the worst farming in England,' for poverty and foulness.

"Next, we passed to a potato-field; where, with the aid of a compost, potatoes were growing for the fifth year, the previous crop being 3 bushels per rod—this crop also looked well. The ground was declared to have been so poor as not to yield over a peck of small potatoes per rod, before the application of the ammoniacal compost. Next, we came to wheat on a light gravelly soil, one acre dressed with the ammoniacal water; another piece of the same field dressed with a mixture of chamber-ley and farmyard manure—this looked exceedingly well. In this field there was a blank spot, which had been poisoned by the barrel containing the chemical fertilizer standing there, and spreading around more dribbles than enough. Next, we came to some colewort-seed in the very highest perfection; this had been manured, at an expense of 30s. per acre, by the compost. Mr. Biggs had been offered the market-price for it, at the rate of 12 coombs per acre (6 quarters); he did not take it, being sure it would yield more. Adjoining it was wheat, as good as any I had seen, judging wheat by its looks in June, between Yorkshire and Essex; and this was on land which did not yield over 3½ coombs per acre when he first got it; did not pay its labour, though that labour was of small amount—probably because it was of small amount. The crops of wheat on it now were usually 13 and 14 coombs per acre—wheat growing every second year. There used to be a ditch, the nursery of filth, across this field, occupying in breadth half a rod; the good it did was now performed by one of 18 inches, and all the evil was avoided.

"In another field, which bore wheat and looked well, a ridge had been manured with 'a material never before used as a manure,' but Mr. Biggs declined to say what it was until he had further proved it. At this part of the farm we found a large heap of compost, which men were conveying to the furrows of the ploughs, then at work preparing for turnips; the ammonia in this compost was strong beyond anything I had ever seen on a farm-field. The number of hands employed did not allow any unnecessary exposure to the air. Mr. Biggs considered that the saving of wages, by fewer hands, would have been a great loss in handling this manure. The heap had been carefully covered with earth, to suppress the ammonia while it lay there; the main ingredients were all from the gas-works.

Near this we saw 7 acres of grass, which had been mown for hay; the previous crop was wheat, and the one previous to that a rough copse-wood. The 7 acres cost £125 before the wheat was sown, for grubbing the roots and preparing the soil; the produce of hay was estimated at 9 tons on the 7 acres. It had suffered by drought, yet was much better than the usual crops of hay of last year. Wheat grew near this, on land which should have been fallow. Three ridges, manured with compost, had the full promise of 10 coombs per acre; the rest of the piece not more than seven. Next we came to the wheat, after wheat, for the fifth time in seven years; the produce of this, when threshed, Mr. Biggs writes to me, was 5 quarters 3 pecks per acre. Near this we saw clover which had been sown in the spring of 1843 with wheat. In September of that year, the wheat being reaped in August, the clover was mown on the stubble, and yielded 1 ton per acre. In June following, the period of my visit, the hay crop was 11 tons, the drought having affected it. The second crop, however, of 1844, was 3 tons. He expects to have fine wheat after this clover in 1845. Near this was wheat sown after wurzel, and after turnips. In regard of manure and soil, each had an equal chance; but that which followed the wurzel lingered hopelessly behind the other. Mr. Biggs sows no oats. Being able to grow wheat at will, he finds it more profitable to buy oats for his horses. He grows some beans. As some of his manures were mere experiments, but all less or more successful, he intends experimenting further this year. The farm contains 150 acres. He thus concludes a letter written to me in the latter part of last year:—"I would caution the inexperienced in farming, to be sure not to sow damp wheat for seed, as it will, in all probability, grow smutty or blighted. Having been forced, by being damp already, it will be weakened, and rendered unable to bear the changes of temperature which it will meet with. It should be a good dry sample, properly dressed, either with salt, lime, or blue vitriol. If we were to pay proper attention, the smuts would not be grown as they are. I had a proof of that this year. A poor man had about an acre of wheat, and he sowed it with damp seed, and it was in a most shocking state; and, in my opinion, this was the only cause. I grow my seed wheat in a particular manner; I add to the quantity I want for seed a large portion of carbon, phosphate of lime, and sulphate of ammonia, which make it stronger than usual, and will give it a dark colour in the sample. But this does not matter, as it is the better, and will endure greater hardships. In my practice for several years I have discovered that faint wheat is not fit for seed—the difference is very great."

"So much for a sketch of the mode of farming which

Mr. Biggs has devised for himself, seemingly with considerable success. Some other matters which I observed on his farm, and in his neighbourhood, deserve a few remarks, more particularly his method of reforming ill-behaved men; for he does not only turn to a good agricultural purpose the elements of fertility which other farmers neglect and despise, but he turns to a good moral purpose the erring men whom others cast out and proscribes, and punishes, by refusing them employment—the means of being honest; he adopts these men, puts confidence in them, pays them the highest wages of the district, and makes them sensible that they are elevated as high as the best-conditioned labourers, and higher than they ever were before. But I have not room to enter more largely into this subject at present.—Pilgrim.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND "THE LEAGUE."

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

A few weeks ago, the Duke of Richmond made a speech in favour of protection to agriculture, in which he contrived to do nearly as much damage to the cause of monopoly as could have been effected by the most eloquent oration in favour of Free Trade. Smarting under the severe censures which his unfortunate exhibition has called forth from all parties, and especially from the Tory press, his grace attempted, on Monday evening, to redeem his character as the leader of the protectionists, by making a vulgar and unprovoked attack upon the leaders of the Free-Trade party. It appears that, on the evening in question, the Marquis of Normanby had presented a petition from the working men of Manchester, praying that the Legislature would lend its aid in promoting such sanitary improvements as are required; and calling the attention of their lordships to the fact that, "While in the district of Manchester the demand for labour had been good and wages high, yet the mortality in Manchester, and all the adjoining districts, had greatly exceeded the average mortality of England." Now, although this was not a new fact, it is one which cannot be brought too prominently forward, in order that all requisite measures of improvement may be promptly and effectually carried into execution. But what is the lesson which the Duke of Richmond wishes to draw from it? He appeared to think that the statement regarding the sanitary condition of this town might be converted into an excellent argument against the Free-Trade agitation; and, therefore, he thought proper to say that "he believed the state of Manchester to be in part attributable to the Anti-Corn-Law League, and recommended those connected with the League, instead of agitating against the Corn Laws, to look at home, and take more care of their own people." What a humane and disinterested remark to fall from the lips of the chairman of the Central Agricultural Protection Society! Of course his grace was ignorant of the notorious fact that, ever since public attention has been directed to the question of sanitary improvement, the town of Manchester has stood prominently forward in promoting every measure by which the public health might be improved. We question if there be a city or town in Great Britain, we might even say in the whole world, in which there has been manifested so strong a desire to improve the condition of the labouring classes as has been evinced by the middle and wealthier classes of this town. Singularly enough, at the very moment when the Duke of Richmond was charging the manufacturers of Manchester with signal neglect of their duties in this respect, Mr. Girdling, in his lecture at the Athenaeum, was making the following remarks on the same subject:—

"It was only yesterday that, in visiting many of the crowded districts of this great city (Manchester), I was gratified more than I can express, to observe, in so many directions, the evidence of amendment and amelioration: courts flagged and provided with drains; narrow streets, formerly full of mud and holes, now paved, and comparatively cleaned; and, more than all, as I learnt in several quarters, active and personal inquiries on the part of the local authorities into the actual condition of the labouring population. Seeing all this, and knowing what great measures are in actual progress,—and I allude more especially to the magnificent plan, for such, as far as I can learn, it is, for increasing the supply of water,—we may, without indulging in over sanguine expectations, fairly anticipate an amount of sanitary improvement of which every individual, be he high or low, will not fail to reap the advantage. I should neither be doing justice to my own feelings, nor to the municipal and other public bodies of Manchester, if I did not express my entire and unbiassed conviction, formed after some practical experience, that 'in no town in the kingdom, not excepting the metropolis, has so much been accomplished for the relief and comfort of the suffering poor, as in this town; and that too without the aid of those pecuniary resources which are possessed by so many of the civic corporations, and which, it must be added, are so often misapplied.'"

Now, if all this be true,—and we challenge any one to say that it is an exaggeration,—what becomes of the Duke of Richmond's charge against the Anti-Corn-Law League, seeing that many of the most active members of that association have been the most zealous in their efforts to effect those improvements which were necessary for the purpose of diminishing the mortality of the town?

In our endeavours to promote the cause of sanitary improvement in Manchester and elsewhere, we have generally discussed the subject on its own merits, and apart from any other public question. Such, however, is not the mode adopted by the chairman of the Agricultural Protection Society; and, as he chooses to view it in connexion with the Corn Laws, it may be worth while to inquire in what degree the evils arising from the overcrowded condition of our manufacturing towns are fairly attributable to the food monopoly, and to the manner in which the landowners have neglected their duty to the agricultural labourers under their charge? Of the 340,000 individuals who, according to Sir James Graham, are added to the population of Great Britain every year, not one-tenth part can find employment on the land, even although they should offer to work for eight shillings a week. The consequence is, that the remaining nine-tenths must look for employment and food in the towns and villages; and it has frequently been no easy task for the manufacturers to create profitable work for them all, under the operation of laws which cripple trade. What wonder, then, that the "working aristocracy" should for many years have paid little more attention to the well-being of the manufacturing operatives than the "idle aristocracy" have paid to the condition of the agricultural labourers! It is no doubt true that the average duration of life in the country is much superior to that of the inhabitants of Manchester; but no one will say that the labourer is indebted for his robust health to the kindness or the liberality of the landowner; and as little reason is there for asserting that manufacturing capitalists are less humane than any other wealthy class in the country, simply because the rate of mortality in manufacturing towns has hitherto been greater than it is in the rural districts.

If the manufacturers of Manchester and other large towns are to be made responsible for the health of the population to whom they furnish employment, it is surely not too much to ask that the food monopoly, and all other restrictions on commerce, should be immediately abolished. The man who is only half-fed is ten times more liable to be struck down by some deadly contagious disease, than he who obtains an adequate supply of wholesome food. The man whose employment is precarious—who can earn 20s. a week when wheat is 45s. a quarter, and is unable to earn more than 10s. or 12s. a week when wheat is 70s. a quarter—will not be easily taught to study the laws which regulate health. It seems to us, therefore, that, considered merely as a sanitary movement, the agitation for the abolition of the Corn Laws is one of the most effectual modes of promoting the health and comfort of the community, and that, so far from meriting the censure bestowed on them by the Duke of Richmond, the manufacturers of Manchester deserve praise for their indefatigable exertions in the cause of Free Trade.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S RESOLUTIONS.

(From the Weekly Chronicle.)

Having made a vow, when we took to public writing, to speak of all things without fear or favour, and to make the Weekly Chronicle a faithful record of our own impressions, we shall not pretend to adopt the conventional tone in which the Morning Chronicle and the Globe have thought it politic to talk of Lord John Russell's resolutions, and of their reception in the House of Commons. We deal with things as they are, not with things as they might be, or as we should wish them to be. If a man make a mistake, in our judgment, we tell him so, instead of expatiating upon his brilliant success with somewhat more than poetical license; and never, certainly, was a mistake more palpable, than that committed by the Whig leader, when he brought forward a motion at once so complicated, and so insignificant, that nothing but his high character, and the respect in which he is held personally by all parties, enabled him to escape the mortification of seeing the House counted out, from the utter impossibility of exciting an interest in the proposition which he had deliberately submitted to it.

Our readers, therefore, may regard as purely imaginative the glowing picture drawn by the Morning Chronicle of "the deep attention" and thrilling interest with which all parties hailed the speech of the Liberal leader; and as to the essay of the Globe upon "Practical Statesmanship," few things can be more absurd than such a eulogy from such a quarter. "Practical Statesmanship" in connexion with the Anti-Maynooth Journal! the only avowed organ of Liberal opinions that disgraced itself by an alliance with the bitterest bigots! The League may, indeed, hide its diminished head when twitted with the want of "practical statesmanship" by the Globe newspaper!

Lord John Russell's speech, however, was unquestionably a speech of much merit. It was calm, temperate, suggestive, full of excellent matter,—the sort of speech that a man of cultivated mind might make to a perfectly impartial and philosophical audience on a long winter's night, if asked to favour them with his views upon the general condition of the country. But when we have said this we have said everything. There was little novelty; no change of position. From first to last the House of Commons seemed to feel that if "Hamlet" were really performing, by particular desire, the part of Hamlet was unfortunately left out; that the great discovery which had been announced was somehow or another, not forthcoming; and that Lord John Russell himself, instead of the buoyancy and life displayed in his last speech on the Maynooth Bill, was tolling in vain to extricate himself from "the great Serborian bog" of his own motion.

This we had foreseen and foretold as inevitable. No man ever yet succeeded in condensing nine subjects into one, or in confining within reasonable limits a discussion so prolific in new matter. Mr. Sherman Crawford thickened the mass, by throwing the suffrage question into the caldron, though, thanks to Chartism, it occupied a very small corner; and such was the boundless latitude afforded by the debate, that nothing seemed misplaced in it, from gaol returns or Ribandism, which Lord Clements took for his text, to the sowing wheat stubbles with vetches, upon which Mr. Bickham Escott, the member for Winchester, very learnedly and convincingly expatiated.

But was this all that we had a right to expect from a man in Lord John Russell's position, after six months of painful gestation? What new light has his motion thrown upon the questions to which it more peculiarly related? What new principle has it laid down, to which the Whigs are pledged as a party? What practical result does it promise—no matter how distant, so it be good—which we may, henceforward, look to and labour for, as the consequence of their return to office? What broad line of demarcation has it drawn between them and the powers that be—we will not say to warrant immediate change, but to make its advantages clear and intelligible to the country?

We wish that we could answer these questions satisfactorily; but, with the single exception of "protecting agriculture" by means of a fixed duty in lieu of a sliding scale, there is rather a distinction than a difference between Lord John Russell and Sir James Graham. It is a question of degree, not of principle. Both would educate—both colonise—both speak of the New Poor Law as greatly preferable to the old one—both declare protective duties to be bad in the abstract, but leave it doubtful to what extent they are prepared to part with them practically; for Lord John Russell advocates "cautious and deliberate change," and Sir James Graham says that we must do nothing in a hurry;—both praise the legislation of the last four years, and assert its beneficial operation upon the labouring classes, for whose special benefit Lord John Russell's motion was intended; and the only cause of disagreement left seems to be the precise extent to which these remedial measures ought to be carried.

This is not the sort of contest in which Parliament or the country can take much interest; and nothing, certainly, could exceed the general apathy, from the moment that Lord John Russell's views about the Corn Laws had been ascertained,—the only point that excited the slightest curiosity. For just as the Free-Traders reproach Sir Robert Peel with his inability to give the country the benefit of his own principles, so long as he allows his freedom of action to be fettered by a pledge not to interfere with the food of the people, so the Whig leader will find the same causes operating against him, while hampered in his onward course by the same unhappy reservation. How can he work out his own declaration, that "protection is the bane of agriculture," while, out of deference to the "rump" of the agricultural Whigs, he says that he means to "protect," to the extent of four, or five, or perhaps six shillings a quarter,—if, as Sir Robert Peel hinted, the Conservative malcontents would only give him a little encouragement? And why show his cards in this imprudent manner? Why not leave himself the benefit of doubt, when he has so little to offer in reality? Four, five, or six shillings a quarter! It is not even a decent bid for power, much less a basis for that united action by which alone an Opposition can expect to effect that change in the public mind which must precede the adoption of its principles.

But, say our Whig contemporaries again, it is not by Lord John Russell's speech, or individual views, that the importance of his motion is to be measured. Look to what it has produced! Look to the declarations of the Ministers;—the large and liberal views propounded by Sir James Graham—the immense admissions of Sir Robert Peel—the growing conviction on the Conservative side, that the benefits of "protection" have been greatly overrated, and that the abolition of the Corn Laws themselves need not be contemplated with any great alarm by the agriculturists, the question evidently having two sides, and the farmers, as was frankly acknowledged by Lord Pollington and Mr. Bickham Escott (who made a Free-Trade speech that might have been heard with pleasure at Covent-garden), having quite as much to gain by cheapening the price of their seeds, and the food for their cattle, as they can lose by a fall in the price of their wheat—even supposing its value to be materially altered. All this, says the Morning Chronicle, "is our thunder," or rather Lord John Russell's thunder in particular. He has brought it out! But for him this latent liberality might have continued "to bluish unseen," and "waste its sweetness" in the bosom of the Premier!

Never was there so fond a fallacy! The greater the change,—the larger the admissions amongst the former opponents of Free Trade; the greater the disposition now to recognise as indisputable truths, principles which were scouted in 1841 as delusive and dangerous,—the more shame is it for the Liberal leaders that they dare not take advantage of a state of things so propitious to the opinions which they profess to hold, and that they should allow their Conservative competitors to distance them in the race, upon which, four years ago, they somewhat reluctantly entered. We do not say that they are not sincere—we do not say that they are not honest; but we fear that they have little of that generous warmth about them—that ardour of conviction, that steady perseverance in purpose—by which the real apostles of Free Trade have been so pre-eminently distinguished. It is not in the House of Commons alone that the work has been done. The League—the Press—the indefatigable labours of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Villiers—the writings of Mr. Deacon Hume and Mr. McGregor—the results of recent experience—the gradual exposure of past mistakes, even where sanctioned (apparently) by the authority of such men as Mr. Huskisson—the growing conviction of present benefits from every approximation to sounder principles;—all these things have helped to work that change of which the speeches of Sir James Graham and Sir Robert Peel afford so remarkable a testimony.

The question is, now, who shall consummate it? And what is there in the late debate to induce a belief that that honour is reserved for the Whigs, rather than for their political rivals? We see nothing—absolutely nothing! Lord John Russell has not extricated himself from the grasp of that small section of Whig landowners who seem to exercise a benumbing influence upon his faculties;—he has not seized the opportunity of moving on, or announced his determination to do so. It was Mr. Villiers, not Mr. Labouchere, who closed the first night's debate by that masterly analysis of Sir James Graham's speech, which will rivet upon it the attention of every thinking man, and force even the most doubtful to admit that there is no gainsaying the conclusion to which it comes, namely, that cheapness and plenty are the basis of every improvement in the condition of the people of this country. It was Sir Robert Peel who proclaimed that, far from repenting of the course which he had pursued, he would not go back one step in order to regain the lost confidence of his agricultural supporters; that the welfare of the proprietors of land did not depend upon the price of corn; that the state of things which prevailed in 1842 could not have continued without imminent peril to all classes; and that no system of "protection" which they could devise would half so effectually promote their own interests as such a relaxation of our commercial code as would secure to them, in the manufacturing districts, a perpetual supply of "rich and hungry customers."

REVIEW.

Sybil; or, the Two Nations. By B. Disraeli, Esq., M.P. London: Colburn. (Third notice.)

The extracts given in our previous notices of this work sufficiently illustrate the peculiar powers of the writer—his comprehensive range of thought, his graphic talents in description, and his skilful analysis of motives and impulses which would escape the notice of one less trained in moral anatomy. We have now to view him as a politician and a philosopher; and in so doing we cannot avoid making reference to "Coningsby," of which the present work is the supplement and completion. Mr. Disraeli believes that political power in England passed from the hands of the feudal aristocracy into the possession of an anomalous oligarchy, not unlike in its constitution to that of Venice; and he believes that this great change was worked out under the Tudors and the Stuarts: its commencement was the Reformation, its completion the Revolution. This oligarchy, equally arrogant and selfish, assumed to itself the titles, functions, and social position which are only due to a generous and enlightened aristocracy; and in the possibility of such an aristocracy being developed from existing materials Mr. Disraeli is a firm believer. But, in the meantime, the country suffers under the oligarchy: it is fettered in its commerce, shackled in its trade, impeded in its industry, and forcibly prevented from developing its resources. The oligarchy seems to be a hostile garrison of different races, banded together for repressing the energies and stinting the enjoyments of the English people. That oligarchy forms, in effect, a distinct nation, having all the vices of an ascendency aggravated by the hypocrisy of fraudulent title.

The lower nation of workers has naturally developed itself into the form and character which the superincumbent pressure was calculated to produce. In some districts, a fraudulent system, similar to the Corn Laws, was devised by employers under the name of Truck, being an humble imitation of the compulsion by which all the working classes are forced to purchase provisions from English landlords exclusively.

The exposure of the oligarchy—its heartlessness, its selfishness and its meanness—is much more complete than the delineation of the lower nation: in the first case, Mr. Disraeli has had personal experience; in the second, he has been, for the most part, indebted for his information to Blue Books and Parliamentary Reports. He has been thus led to set forth exceptional cases as average results, and to represent the condition of the manufacturing community as far more wretched and dangerous than it ever has been. One important fact seems to have escaped his notice, and that is the civilizing effects of machinery: when multitudes are aggregated together pursuing their several avocations separately, there is much more of vice and social disorganization than when they have a common bond of union in the mill or factory.

As a politician, Mr. Disraeli has very ably portrayed the existing relations between the oligarchy and the people of England; as a philosopher, he has deduced from these relations aphorisms of great value, which must, for the future, take a permanent place in the social sciences: but we think that he has but faintly indicated the remedies which our present position imperatively requires. This is the more to be regretted as there is abundant proof in these volumes that the writer has not only a keen perception of the evils in our existing system, but that he has traced back their historical causes, and investigated their nature. He very justly remarks:—

"If the history of England be ever written by one who has the knowledge and the courage—and both qualities are equally requisite for the undertaking—the world would be more astonished than when reading the 'Roman Annals,' by Niebuhr. Generally speaking, all the great events have been distorted, most of the important causes concealed, some of the principal characters never appear, and all who figure are so misunderstood and misrepresented, that the result is a complete mystification, and the perusal of the narrative about as profitable to an Englishman as reading the 'Republic' of Plato, or the 'Utopia' of More, or the pages of Gaudenzio di Lucca, or 'The Adventures of Peter Wilkins.'

"The influence of races in our early ages, of the church in our middle, and of parties in our modern history, are three great moving and modifying powers, that must be perceived and analysed with an untiring, profound, and unpassioned spirit, before a guiding ray can be secured. A remarkable feature of our written history is the absence in its pages of some of the most influential personages. Not one man in a thousand, for instance, has heard of Major Wildman: yet he was the soul of English politics in the most eventful period of this kingdom, and seemed more than once to hold the balance which was to decide the permanent form of our government. But he was the leader of an unsuccessful party. Even, comparatively speaking, in our times the same mysterious oblivion is sometimes encouraged to creep over personages of great social distinction as well as political importance."

Now, the history of England is in truth, during the last three centuries, little more than a record of the struggle between the oligarchy and the people; or, to use Mr. Disraeli's language, between the upper and lower nations over whom Victoria holds sway. The upper nation has in its favour the exclusive grasp of political power, hereditary privileges, and, what is more important, hereditary prejudices; a large share in the direction of national education, and consequent training of the public mind; and that habitual talent for administrative functions naturally formed by the exclusive exercise of such functions. To all this the lower race has only to oppose the strength which the gradual progress of society daily adds to the industrial classes, and the consequent growth of substantial equality in spite of fictitious distinctions.

Since the overthrow of feudalism, the relation between lord and vassal first passed into the relation between patron and client, and is now rapidly changing into the more simple relation between employer and employed. Between the capitalist and the operative there is little more connexion than between buyer and seller; if the operative looks for a greater degree of countenance and protection beyond wages, he must purchase it by a greater share of obedience than the mere labourer for which he is paid. All rights and duties between masters and men are reciprocal, and the flagrant errors into which the Chartists have fallen are all to be traced to ignorance of this simple truth. The landlords claim rights without the performance of corresponding duties; the Chartists demand duties without the concession of corresponding rights. Between both stands the political economist, who says—Simplify your relations so as to make them clear and intelligible, and then you will soon see how they are to be rendered equitable and equal. When the landlord demands a fixed price for corn, meaning thereby a high rent for land, he claims for himself a right over the industry of the country, the duties corresponding to which are impossible to be performed unless we can discover means of regulating the seasons and controlling the elements; when the Chartist insists on a fixed rate of wages, he claims a right to which equally impossible duties are attached, for it would be as easy to legislate for the whirlwinds as to fix the relations of demand and supply in the world's markets. The want of our age is simple justice: permission to exchange freely in the open market, so as to satisfy our mutual wants, advance our mutual interests, and cultivate our mutual affections.

Douglas Jerrold's Magazine. No. VI.

From this very interesting periodical we take part of an article on "The Law of the Land," which deserves serious attention. We have watched this magazine from its commencement, and, though we have occasionally lamented the appearance of some distorted views of the factory system, we are delighted to find Mr. Jerrold a zealous labourer in the cause of enlightened philanthropy, and a firm supporter of the demand for justice—not charity—to the industrial classes:—

"THE LAW OF THE LAND."

"A common phrase this—the 'Law of the Land.' Most familiar and household-like its sound—grave and dignified in its meaning, and sonorous in its twang. People talk of the law of the land solemnly and sententiously, as of something perhaps a little mystic and obscure; but good, great, just, benevolent as a God, and mighty as a God.

"The law of the land! It comes glibly off the tongue. Orators prate of it fluently; judges lay it down solemnly. It is a received and venerated phrase; a most hallowed collocation of words. And no one seems to know or to think of the world of satire it contains.

"Yes, satire,—keen, biting, trenchant satire. It tells a mighty and a sad truth most unconsciously; reveals the nakedness of the deformity it would cover; tell our laws and our law-makers what they are—how they have cheated us—and in all this most unsuspected formula of words.

"The law of the land. Interpret the sentence—the law for the land—the law so affectionate to the owners of the land—the law which is proud to surround acres with a triple shield, while it leaves weak industry unprotected—the law made by landowners for the benefit of landowners—the law, their willing tool, their useful slave—the law which stints out the food of the poor for the 'landed interest,' which creates fictitious crime for the landed interest—the law made by land for land—exalting land, lavishing upon it all tenderness, blessing it with all humanity,—verily, the law of this country is the 'Law of the Land!'

"Ages ago, when England was little but a broad forest—when deer, and wolves, and wild-boars ranged where cities now stand—the law of the day, such as it was, was made by landowners for their order. Feudal castles—those chivalric receptacles for stolen goods—started up. Banditti, as ignorant as brutal—the titled thieves from whom our aristocracy are proud to trace their descent—waged war upon honesty, and industry, and weakness; and made laws too, enacted measures especially designed for their own disinterested purposes, established criminal codes as enlightened as themselves, and administered them as humanely as they were conceived philosophically.

"Such were our first legislators. From the land sprang our national code. In the land it is still rooted, and the land it still shelters. Nations suffer from hereditary legislation as individuals from hereditary disease; the first feature of acre legislation is its hereditary character. The landowners took care not only to make laws, but to leave their descendants the privilege also. The right of plunder was a precious heirloom. It has descended from those who imposed the forest laws to those who imposed the Corn Laws; from the tyrant of white serfs to the holder of black slaves. It is the spell which crushes the many to exalt the few; it is the hereditary curse; the evil which clings to us; cramping our energies, blighting our prospects.

"Class legislation means no more or less than robbery committed under the sanction of forms of law. And in the long head-roll of our laws, how few there are to be found which do not spring from class legislation—from one class legislation—from land legislation? Landowners have always been our legislators; the inevitable consequence has been that our laws have been framed for the benefit of land. True, this is what was to have been expected. Man is selfish—selfishness, like other bad passions, grows by what it feeds on. Our original legislators had a tolerably fair stock when they commenced operations, and, God knows, it has had plenty of food to batten upon since.

"I have no property myself," said a lordling, explaining his 'expectations' to the father of a lady he had wooed and won, 'but I have family connexions with the Grenvilles.' Of course this was quite satisfactory. We have heard of an 'order' naturally intended for the service of the state. It would be more correct to talk, an order naturally intended for the plunder of the public. The army, the navy, the church have all one grand object besides the three great ones—they are severally destined to serve. Livings, ships, and regiments are bought and sold. There is nothing that the spirit of aristocracy cannot convert into property. It has made the wild things of the earth property. It deals and traffics in the souls of men. It batters upon what was to be taught without money and without price. It makes the church of God the profit and the property of man. But let the church take care. Aristocracy professes for it a great reverence and a great love. The church is wealthy. It was more so once, and aristocracy and royalty fell jointly upon it—upset the fabric, and divided the spoil. Pleasant occupation—and a richer pleasure still—they said they did it for religion's sake! As they fed upon the church, they feed upon the state. The peerage drains upwards of three millions of money in pensions and places. Well may we be a 'pensive public.'

"For land then, and by land, has the whole fabric of our laws and constitution been built. For land, does the Corn Law furnish its yearly victims; for land, does the game law demoralize districts; for land, does the law of primogeniture set aside the law of nature; for land, does the law of entail defeat the plain rules of justice; for colonial land, are we hampered by numberless paralyzing fiscal restrictions; for land, is the absurd distinction drawn between personal and real property—always careful to protect the one at the expense of the other; for the sake of land, the goods of a sub-tenant may be seized for the non-fulfilment of a contract to which he was no party; for the benefit of land, the scraped up pittance devised to widows is pillaged, while the princely estate passes free from fire to son; for land, we live, move, and have our being; land governs us; land taxes us; Atlas-like, the land weighs us down. Judge-made law may be bad, but landlord-made law is worse. Morally, we are still adscripti glebe—

"The Law of the Land is the Law for the Land!"

THE PEOPLE HAVE NOT BREAD.

(From the National Anti Slavery Standard.)

A wide and fertile world is ours,
A world where every rood,
Obedient to the Maker's word,
Yieldeth his creature food.

Unnumbered fields with yellow grain
And mellow fruit are spread;
God gives enough for all—and yet
The people have not bread.

The ocean swarms with food for man,
The rivers, like a hand,
It-teeming fulness bear into
The bosom of the land.
And petty streams, that velvete through
The mighty inland thread,
Yield up their fluky stores—and yet
The people have not bread.

Earth, ocean, rivers, even the air,
Their riches freely yield;
The proudest grove, yet ripened grain
Lies trodden in the field.
The rich men smile and count his gains;
The labourer's shock are fed:
God gives enough for all—and yet
The people have not bread.

THE WHEAT CROPS.—We regret to say that we hear from our correspondents in all quarters, that the prospects of the wheat crops are most unpromising. In many places in the eastern and midland counties, the wireworm has done immense mischief, and in others the plant has suffered so much from the long frosts and cold weather that hundreds of acres are being ploughed up altogether. One of our correspondents assures us, that an eminent agriculturist told him only two days since, that the amount of this year's harvest would not reach half of last year's. This, we think, is speaking prematurely, but it shows that great alarm exists on the subject.—Liverpool Chronicle.

FOREIGN COUN.—The following fact proves we have nothing to apprehend this year from any importation of corn from the Baltic. A letter from St. Petersburg, of the 18th May, says:—"On the report of the council of Ministers, the Emperor has authorized the importation, duty free, into the ports of Riga and Pernau, to the 15th of July this year, of rye, wheat, barley, oats, potatoes, beans, and peas from foreign countries, and his Majesty has prohibited the exportation of the said articles by sea from Riga and Pernau, and from other Russian ports, during the whole period of the navigation there this year."

IRISH RAILWAYS.—It must be gratifying to every man who is anxious for the improvement of his country to find that what we may call the emergency exists of a great number of Irish companies obtaining acts this session. A year ago, who would have thought of ten or twelve, or even fourteen, Irish railway companies, with capital subscribed by solvent proprietors, obtaining acts in this session of Parliament? The mere notion would have been scouted, yet the prospect is before us—the fact, we might say, is certain—that some twelve companies, at least, will obtain acts. Just think of the stimulus that will thus be given to Irish industry—to Irish improvement—to Irish prosperity.—Irish Railway Gazette.

AGRICULTURE.

PECULIAR BURDENS ON LAND.

WHAT ARE THEY, AND WHO BEARS THEM?

The monopolist landowners say that they are entitled to "protection"—that is, to have the price of the produce of their land kept up artificially—because "the land" is subject to many peculiar and special burdens. If they believed that statement to be true, there can be no doubt that the representatives of our squirearchy in the House of Commons would have readily acceded to Mr. Ward's recent motion for a committee to inquire what those burdens are, and where they fall. But no one believes the assertion, and, consequently, a great majority of the House decided that no inquiry is necessary. Those who thus reject inquiry must be content to have it henceforth understood that the pretence of peculiar burdens on land, in the sense of an unequal share of taxation, is a fraud and a sham. Still it is a subject that courts investigation. The owners and occupiers of land are unquestionably subjected to burdens which do not attach so universally to the owners of other property. The questions to be considered are, what are those burdens? whence do they proceed? and what is the remedy? We agree with the majority of the House of Commons, that no further evidence on the subject is required. The facts are patent; they are undenied and undeniable by any rational person. But it is most true that error and fraud take refuge in generalities: and to arrive at the truth with respect to the peculiar burdens of land, it will be necessary to examine them with some accuracy, and in detail. These burdens are of two classes—those which affect the owner of the soil, and those which fall upon the tenant. We will arrange and examine them separately. First, there are the landlords' burdens. These have been stated by Lord Mountcashel, Sir Edward Knatchbull, Mr. George Banks, Mr. William Miles, the Duke of Richmond, and other "protectionists" of authority, as mortgages, jointures and portions for younger children, poor-rates, county-rates, and highway-rates. Now, what is a mortgage but a debt incurred by the owner of land for his own pleasure or profit, and charged upon the estate? It is a consumption of the substance of the property—a mere deduction from its amount. Such a charge made by a former owner no more entitles a landlord to require his income to be enhanced at the public expense, than would the fact of his father or grandfather having sold a farm and spent the money. No doubt it is much pleasanter to succeed a saving, accumulating paternal line than a spending one, but that is entirely a family affair with which the public and the Legislature have nothing to do. Mortgages, therefore, afford no valid plea for "protection." Then, do jointures and portions form any sufficient reason why landlords should seek an equivalent by a tax upon the food of their fellow-countrymen? Let us answer that question by two others. Are landowners under the natural obligation of maintaining their wives and providing for their children? If they are—and even the high "protectionist" Duke of Richmond only claims to quarter his brother on the Treasury—why is it incumbent on the public to pay the jointures and portions charged on the estates of unproductive consumers? Let the majority against Mr. Ward's motion for an inquiry into peculiar burdens furnish the reply!

The poor-rates and county-rates fall upon landowners only in common with the owners of houses and other real property, while the regulation of those rates have been entirely in the hands of the owners of land. It was the landlords who, in 1794, when prices of agricultural produce began to rise, devised the scheme of partially paying wages of agricultural labourers out of the rates, which has entailed so much misery and degradation upon the labourers, and made the poor-rates so burdensome. If this be a burden peculiar to land—which it is not—it has been created by the owners of the land for their own advantage. The county-rates are exclusively managed by the owners of land, and are wholly applied to purposes which increase the value of their own property, or in punishing delinquencies for which they are mainly answerable. What are the crimes most common in the rural districts, but such as are the direct offspring of the poverty of the population, and of game-preserving? Nothing but the obstinacy of the landowners perpetuates these evils. They prevent the improved cultivation of the land which, by giving full employment to the rural labourers, would reduce the poor-rates most materially, and raise the agricultural population out of their present depressed condition. All practical agriculturists agree in this. Mr. Turner, a Devonshire farmer (and a protectionist), said lately at an agricultural meeting in that county:—

"Talk about emigration and over-population, there was land enough in England to support double the population. If the landlords would come forward and aid their tenants in carrying out those important improvements."

Again, at the Stockbridge (Hants) cattle show,

Mr. Spencer, a farmer, in enlarging on the advantages of such exhibitions, said:—

"Whenever an agriculturist took an interest in the improvement of his stock, and felt that generous emulation which prompted him to bring them from so great a distance in order to exhibit them, the natural result would be, that for the furtherance of his object he would so farm his land as to be able to procure a plentiful supply of food for them, and adopt a system of management which was sure to improve the estate—the property of the landowner—which showed that the latter was an interested individual, and ought to do all in his power to support such societies as the present, from which he would ultimately derive so much benefit. The labouring classes had also an interest in the success of such institutions; for wherever an improved system of management took place, a much greater amount of manual labour would be performed. This, at the present time, when so many of our fellow-creatures were, for want of employment, either driven to a union workhouse or to subsist upon the charity of others, would have a most beneficial tendency, and many an able-bodied man would become an honest and useful member of society who was now only a burden to it."

This goes directly to the point. And we could adduce similar evidence without limit, all showing distinctly that the landlords and the landlords' laws are the chief causes of pauperism and poor-rates. How, then, stands their plea for protection on this ground? Lastly, we have highway-rates. Now, if there be a greater benefit to landed property than another, it is that which gives facility of communication with markets. Let the reader take the first half dozen advertisements of farms to let, and he will find good roads to neighbouring markets, where they exist, set forth as a pre-eminent advantage. The produce of land is all bulky, and has to be taken to market by the grower, who, if he brings back manure, has a still heavier back-carriage. It would be about as reasonable for a landowner to ask the public to repay him the expense incurred in putting up good gates and fences on his property as to treat the rates for the maintenance of roads as a peculiar public burden on land!! What is deemed more cogent evidence before the numerous railway committees now sitting in favour of any particular line, than that it will facilitate the carriage of agricultural products to the great markets of consumption, and so enhance the value of land?

But, even had all these payments really formed burdens on landed property, have the landowners no special exemptions? How is it they pay no probate or legacy duties? Their manures and building materials are free from tolls; there are no assessed taxes on servants in husbandry; there is no tax from which they can be exempted which has not been repealed in their favour? And yet they pretend to allege peculiar burdens as an apology for "protection." Thus it is plain that there are no peculiar burdens affecting the owners of the land but such as are of their own creation, or which they continue for their own benefit, or by their own mismanagement.

Let us next inquire what are the peculiar burdens of the occupiers of land, and we shall find that they are all directly or indirectly the result of landlord legislation or landlord systems. The farmer is usually a yearly tenant, and is, therefore, unwilling or unable to farm to advantage. (On this point we will merely quote a passage or two from the letter of a correspondent in the last Mark-lane Express, which expresses the opinion of all farmers upon the subject:—

"This [insecure tenure] is one of the great barriers to improvement; for what sensible man will expend his capital in bones and guano, when the next year he may have a six months' notice to quit, without a shilling compensation? The custom is becoming more common. I could enumerate several instances where the tillages have been taken from tenants within the last few years."

And he afterwards says:—

"If a tenant wishes to adopt the economical system, and has forty head of cattle, but only convenience for the milking of twenty, what is he to do? He must either build conveniences, or pursue the old plan. And what security has he for building under a yearly tenure? Why, none; but a pretty good surly that his landlord will either send his agent or valuer, who will not take these matters into consideration, but raises the rent."

Again he says:—

"As long as landlords have such advantages over their tenants, so long will agriculture be kept in the background; so long must the labourer endure a scarcity of labour; and so long will the system be a public evil. With yearly tenures, the landlord would always have a great advantage over his tenants, if the tenants were paid for improvements."

And the only real security to a farmer is a twenty-one years' lease.

Here we have a pretty clear view of a "peculiar burden" on the tenant, one which makes him fear the competition of foreign corn-growers, and one which effectually prevents him from obtaining the fair and ordinary rate of remuneration for his capital and industry. But who dares to say that the public must be taxed to protect him from such burdens? Relief can come from the landlord, and the landlord only. Then there are game preserves; obsolete stipulations to follow unprofitable courses of culture; prohibitions to break up any grass land, though its conversion would be most advantageous; and hedgerow timber—fit emblem of a monopolist landocracy—overshadowing and blighting acre upon acre of land, for which the tenant pays a full rent. Nobody denies that there are "peculiar burdens" on them as pleas for "protection"? What say the majority against Mr. Ward's motion?

Then there is the "peculiar burden" of protection itself. Let us trace a few of its effects. At a recent meeting in Berkshire, when some question between the titheowner and the parishioners came under discussion, a gentleman said, "their tithe had been advanced within half a century from £545 a year to £1000, and now to £1500." Now, that is pretty nearly the ratio in which rents have increased during the same period, while prices of farm produce are about the same as they were fifty years ago. At the meeting above referred to the following statement was produced. The speaker said:—

"He had been furnished with documents proving this from a gentleman in the parish, whose predecessors had kept an account of sales of farm produce there. The prices were,

In 1794-5—	In 1844-5—
Wheat .... 47s. 0d. to 52s.	45s. to 47s.
Barley .... 33s. 6d. — 35s.	35s. — 36s.
Beans .... 45s. 0d. — 0s.	44s. — 45s.
Peas .... 36s. 0d. — 42s.	39s. — 40s.

It was rather singular that the difference was so very slight between the prices of the two periods."

And while farmers are receiving only the prices of 1795, and are subjected to insecurity and fluctuations, and evils altogether unknown at that period, they have engaged to pay rents which are based upon a greatly increased produce, the result of greater skill and more capital furnished by the tenants, and calculated upon prices 20 per cent. higher than actual prices. Here, then, protection has failed, and in failing has caused one of the most intolerable burdens under which the occupiers of land suffer.

Such, then, are the "peculiar burdens" to which land is, in reality, subject; and, when their nature is clearly explained, perhaps it will occasion no surprise that those who are now receiving rents under false pretences should be shy of inquiry into those burdens about which they talk so largely and so loudly on their own dunghills—the protection societies.

GAME-PRESERVERS' MERCY.

The following instances of the merciful administration of the game laws are reported in the last number of the Aylesbury News:—

WINDLOW PETTY SESSION, Thursday, May 22.—Present—W. S. and E. W. S. Lowndes, Esqrs., and the Rev. S. Wright.

Joseph Chapman, labourer, of Shipton Lee, appeared to a summons charging him, on the information of Pinfold, gamekeeper to G. G. Pigott, Esq., of Doderhall, with having trespassed on that gentleman's estate, in search of game, on the 10th inst. Chapman pleaded guilty, and as this appeared to be his first offence, the bench intimated that they should deal leniently with him. Ordered to pay £1. 10s., and allowed three weeks to pay it in."

If that be game-law leniency, what must its severity be? Picture the leniency which fines a man, who is fortunate if he earns 7s. a week, four weeks' wages, and two shillings over!! But then he is allowed three weeks to pay it. Now, what is the natural, the necessary consequence of such a sentence but that, in order to pay the fine, the man does more than "search for game," or else steals some one's property. Thus it is the game laws make criminals—not poachers merely, but real criminals.

At the same petty sessions, another labourer, Reuben Roads, who did not appear to the summons, was convicted, on the evidence of Mr. G. G. Pigott's gamekeepers, of setting snares on their master's property. Roads was, of course, convicted in his absence, and "in the full penalty," for he had been before convicted of poaching. This man has probably absconded, and will become a vagabond, and most likely be found, ere long, a confirmed criminal. Yet all this wrong and misery is perpetrated that empty-headed squires may enjoy the absurd sport of killing tame pheasants!

A similar course of game-law justice was pursued in another part of the same district.

ASHENDON PETTY SESSIONS, Monday, May 19.—Present.—Rev. G. Chatwoode, T. Martyn, and J. S. Baron, and T. T. Bernard and John Stone, Esqrs.

William Jakeman, a poor inoffensive but poverty-stricken-looking labourer, of Grendon Underwood, was charged by Thomas Brookless, one of the Duke of Buckingham's gamekeepers, with having taken two pheasants from a nest on the farm of Mr. W. Bear, in that parish. The poor fellow, with tears in his eyes, pleaded guilty. "He said he took the eggs to suck!" From the sequel it appears very natural that he should so have done. An inquiry was made as to his character. It was found to be good. The keepers knew no harm of him, and the constable said his character was very good. When asked about money, he said he had none; he had a family of five small children to keep out of his labour. He was a Sunday man, and in consequence had the increased wages of 10s. per week. Ordered to pay a fine of 2s., and allowed a fortnight to pay in."

And to this fine, let it be remembered, there must be added some 7s. or 8s. in the shape of costs. Again we ask, why are the peasantry to be made offenders against the law, and to be fined and imprisoned, for the sport of dukes and squires?

FOOD v. RAILWAYS.

The following letter from a correspondent is an argument of the same sort as those which monopolist squires use when they complain that highway-rates are a special burden on land, when in fact the highways, to keep up which the rates are levied, form a prime element in the value of the neighbouring lands.

So our correspondent will find that the comparatively small portion of land taken from actual production of food for the purpose of constructing railways will give an additional productive power to that which remains far more than equivalent to that of the land abstracted:—

"To the EDITOR of the LEAGUE.

"Darwen, June 3.

"SIR,—You have shown us that the population increases above a thousand a day, who require a proportional increase of food. Show us, on the other hand, the quantity of land that must be taken out of cultivation to supply house-steads, factories, &c., for this increasing population; and again, the land that has been and is about to be taken from agricultural purposes for railways, &c. Without having any certain data before me, I cannot doubt that there are, or will be, 4000 miles of railways in England, which, averaging the width at 30 yards, will show 40,000 acres recently cut off for ever from producing food.

"Yours, &c., A WORKING MAN."

It is not the mere extent of land under cultivation which determines the amount of produce, but the method of its cultivation. There is not a doubt amongst those best acquainted with British agriculture that the production of food in this country might be at least doubled, if the owners of land were subjected to the wholesome competition of a Free Trade, and the occupiers relieved from the burthen of protection, and other landlord-imposed burdens. There need, therefore, be no fear lest ample area should not be left for cultivation. Besides, railways facilitate communication, equalize the prices of food and raw products in different parts of the country, and economize the use of horse labour thereby leaving a greater amount of agricultural produce to be applied in raising food for man. Let our correspondent examine any district in which the population is dense, and consequently much of the land is taken from agricultural purposes for roads, &c., and compare it with the thinly-peopled purely agricultural districts, and he will find that, from superior cultivation in the populous district, there is no loss, but a gain, from the abundance of roads.

THE RENT IS THE BURDEN.

Landlords have been so accustomed to delude the tenant-farmers, who, until lately, received all the absurdities of the squires in alliance if not with acquiescence, that they imagine there were no limits to farmer gullibility. This was tried at the late "Protection Society" meeting at Stafford, where a Mr. Locker, and afterwards Lord Ingestre, tried to persuade the farmers that reduction of rent would not relieve them, and that the maintenance of the landlords' establishments was to be a paramount consideration with tenants. His lordship may "tell that story to the marines," but we opine he will not tell it upon the farmers again.

Mr. Locker said:—

"He felt quite sure that, at the present prices of agricultural produce, the tenant-farmers could not exist for three years. (Hear.) As for a reduction of rents meeting the difficulty, that was a complete fallacy. (Hear.) To strong lands, if the tenants had them rent free, they could not cultivate except at a positive loss. (Hear, and roar.) He was not of opinion that the land would ever go out of cultivation, but, should the depression continue, the present race of tenantry would be annihilated. (Hear.) Capitalists would be found ready to take the rich lands, but the poor strong lands would go out of cultivation."

Mr. Locker is so far right that strong land, held from year to year, and undrained, as is the case with nineteen-twentieths, must be cultivated at a loss in ordinary seasons and with moderate prices. But that is only because of the tenure and the want of draining. Strong land is that—and we speak from actual experience—most capable of improvement under a long lease, and in the hands of a farmer of competent skill. The idea of such land going out of cultivation is ridiculous. When the trade in grain becomes free, strong land will repay its cultivators at least as well as any other.

Mr. Locker then said:—

"Meetings like the present were never intended to set tenants against their landlords. He could safely assert that the tenants had now as great confidence in their landlords as ever, and that they were never upon more friendly terms. (Hear.) He did not see why a gentleman should reduce his income from £5000 a year to £3000 a year, merely because the Parliament had been legislating in a wrong principle. (Hear.) They should recollect, that if rents were lowered, gentlemen must reduce their establishments, and numbers of persons would be thrown out of employ. The rental of land had been recently coming down, and could not now be said to be at a standstill."

This is a very rich specimen of land-agent logic; for, from his language, we presume Mr. Locker to be.

Afterwards Lord Ingestre adopted the same strain, and a plain sensible farmer, in a couple of sentences, brought his lordship's theory and his speech to a hasty conclusion:—

"Mr. Locker had talked about a reduction of rents. He (Lord Ingestre) quite agreed with the observations of the squires who had seconded the petition. They must consider that the landlords had many and heavy burdens. Their expenditure was great in the keeping up of their establishments. They employed much labour, and consumed large quantities of manufactured articles; but it would be impossible for them to do so with reduced means.

(Hear.) A great reduction of rent would go a very little way towards alleviating the distress.

"A FARMER: Try it for one year, my lord. (Roars of laughter.)

"The CHAIRMAN: If rents are much reduced the landlords will have no money. Then what are they to do?"

"FARMER: DO AS WE DO MY LORD,—MAKE SHIFT. (Renewed laughter.)

"The CHAIRMAN, after a few concluding sentences, which were but imperfectly heard, resumed his seat."

But the landlords have got the law of distress, and so forth, for the express purpose of preventing the necessity of "making shift," even though their tenants are shifted into the workhouse. The following remarks of the Times on this meeting are pungent and just:—

"We cannot, indeed, wonder that puny and envious minds, incapable of appreciating moral greatness, or understanding the true standard of magnanimity, should venture to assign motives, or impugn those assigned. Thus, alas! it ever was; and thus, only Wednesday last, at a meeting of landlords and farmers at Stafford, under the auspices of that absolutely philanthropic society already referred to, strange tokens of incredulity and disaffection were exhibited, and chairman and landowners were scandalized at the daring array of opposition they encountered. And, who would believe it? one speaker, pretending to advocate the cause of tillage and benevolence, scrupled not to recommend a reduction of rents. A reduction of rents indeed! Are noblemen and gentlemen to toil and sag for the welfare of the community, and to be out of pocket for their trouble? Is it not enough that they are scared nearly out of their intellects by the hideous phantasm of an Anti-Corn-Law Bazaar at Covent-garden? Must they further be told of reducing their rents, diminishing their expenditure, clipping their establishments, curtailing their entertainments, decimating their dishes, discharging their supernumeraries, and, in short, abridging in every unnatural manner the necessary comforts of their very existence? Well might the noble chairman manifest a tremulous anxiety for their fate, if such a scheme were ever matured. Well might he demand what was to become of them?—what were they to do? Unjust and cruel extremity, suggested by the plain-spoken farmer in reply, 'Same as we do, my lord,—make shift!'"

"Genius of aristocracy, what an idea! What language! What a comparison! Enough to make one shudder. But, to bring this proposal for bettering the condition both of tenant and labourer by reducing rents to its proper issue, as there is nothing like the practical test of an argument, we cordially urge the adoption of the farmer's advice—'Try it.'"

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

A correspondent writes to us, because "many farmers read the LEAGUE," to lay down what he designates as "a very simple theory of manure, which may tend to protect farmers from these new and most absurd quackeries called chemical or artificial manures." We insert the letter for the purpose of showing how much farmers have been stimulated to think and reason upon their own business by the recent course of events; not as acceding to his views, which are in some respects crude.

"1. In the first place, What is manure? It is either animal or vegetable matter in the process of decay, or the excretions of animals or plants.

"2. Plants, like animals, can only subsist and grow by the consumption of something that has grown or lived.

"3. The longer any substance intended for manure has been allowed to decay before it is applied, the less effect it will have in producing a good crop.

"4. No animal or vegetable substance, after it has been petrified or otherwise chemically changed, is any longer capable of supporting either plants or animals, and therefore it is no longer a manure.

"There are a great many substances used in agriculture: such as lime, acids, alkalis, &c. Are they manures? Certainly not. And, but for the very limited space I can expect to have of your paper, I should have treated of these substances separately. I will confine myself to the first, which is best known to farmers, viz., 'Lime.' This substance is petrified animals, and now a mineral substance perfectly incapable of supporting animals or plants. It is a strong caustic alkali. It is used by agriculturists with a twofold intention: first, as a pulveriser of stiff clay land; and second, as a 'stimulant' to the land. As to the first, there can be no doubt but, as long as it is a dry power, it will act as a separator of the adhesiveness of clay; but whenever it is slaked or saturated with water, it is inferior to sand as a pulveriser. It is therefore by its other effects that lime can be useful to farmers. It is used to kill roots, weeds, worms, &c., which, while they lived, took away support from the crop the cultivator wished to grow; which roots, &c., being killed, become manure. Our friend Mr. Williams goes along with this theory; he says:—'The indiscriminate use of lime to all kinds of land is bad.' And I shall add, it is hurtful to all kinds of land, unless used with the above objects. Lime is poisonous to land, the same as physic is poisonous to our bodies; and both ought to be used with skill and caution,—having a reason for its use, not to use it as experiments or indiscriminately. The calculation should be, whether a greater good could not be attained by the evil: lime is certain evil to the soil. I would have farmers to have a theory. In place of talking about 'lime,' as a quack doctor would talk about his universal cure for all diseases, it is requisite farmers should understand the qualities of substances they put into their land, so that they had an end in view to be produced by them. To cut my letter short, a theory of manures, &c., would save farmers from the modern chemical quackeries, by which large sums of money are paid for 'chemical manures' of no use; the very name expresses the absurdity. It is just as ridiculous to talk of chemical manure as to talk of a chemical dinner; yet farmers are quocked out of large sums for acids, soda, guano, and the like, which are generally bad for the land, and apply these substances without any attention, just as ignorant people take drugs from quacks, and without having learned as much chemistry as to know how very little use it ever can be to a farmer."

"AN OLD FARMER."

We agree with the "Old Farmer" that there is a vast amount of quackery abroad about artificial manures, as well as that much caution and discrimination are required on the part of farmers before they lay out their money upon such matters. But amidst the quackery there is much error, and some really useful suggestions. The landowners are the great originators of the error, when they urge their tenants to buy and use artificial manures, which they believe will enable larger crops to be grown, and consequently rents to be kept up, without much more of security to the tenant, or permanent investment of capital, to which that security is a condition precedent.

As an occasional aid towards bringing a farm into a high state of cultivation, and to help forward particular crops, some of the foreign manures, such as guano, may certainly be useful. But no farmer should place any material reliance upon them. His chief dependence for manure must be on stock, which, moreover, ought—and with free trade in grain, certainly would—pay him a good profit besides. He must not "go to the barn's door for everything." Stock of some kind or other must be made to contribute to the farmer's income something more than as mere machines for making manure. And mere manuring alone will not bring the farmer success. It is of no use to supply what may be termed the food of plants, if the mechanical texture of the soil is not first rendered favourable to their growth. This must be done by draining, by subsoil and deep ploughing, and by dressings of lime or chalk on the heavy lands, and by claying, chalking, and treading with sheep and cattle on the light soils. All these things will only become general when the Corn Laws have been repealed, and the landowners have been driven out of their system of semi-feudalism.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

(From the Scotsman.)

EAST LOTHIAN.—Bold easterly winds have steadily prevailed during the month until this the last day of it, when, changing to the west, it has given rise to hopes of weather more favourable for vegetation. On the whole, however, it has been dry, and the few light occasional showers which have fallen, and even the smart rain on the 26th, were all serviceable than otherwise to the working of the turnip land, rendering it at the same time moist enough to ensure a rapid braird—a matter of considerable importance. At this season turnip sowing engages the undivided attention of the farmer; and, being the commencement of a rotation, much depends on the manner the land is wrought for this crop. A large proportion of the Swedish turnip has been already sown, and, generally speaking, the labour is as far advanced as in ordinary years.

Considering the cold, untoward weather, the crops look remarkably healthy, particularly broad-land wheat, which has a most luxuriant appearance. It may be a little later than last year, but it has seldom promised to be a more bulky crop. Both oats and barley are thriving, there being none of those half-brained fields so common last season. Beans came up thick and vigorous, but latterly their progress has been slow. Grass has not grown much either; wherever pasture-fields have been fully stocked, they are very bare indeed.

A very great rise has taken place in the price of fat cattle and sheep, the advance on beef being from 1s. to 1s. 6d. per stone, and nearly 2d. per pound on mutton. This has been occasioned by the demand for England. South country dealers have been through the county, and have bought up almost every fat beast in it.

The supply of grain in the Haddington market has lately been much smaller, and wheat, oats, and beans have risen from 2s. to 3s. per quarter. At this busy period, farmers have little time for thrashing or carting grain to market. Whether after this is over the advance will be maintained, depends altogether on the weather.

Guano has fallen in price within these few weeks about 30s. per ton. The large arrivals during the spring were all bought up by speculators, who are now anxious to sell, as the principal season for its use is getting on. It is being extensively used to the turnip crop, at the rate of from three cwt. to five cwt. per acre, with about ten or twelve carts of dung, and there is no doubt but this management pays well. A number of individuals are trying the experiment and to have been successfully made by Mr. Forster, of Fimdrassie, near Elgin, of promoting vegetation by atmospheric electricity, obtained by means of common wire. Some of these trials were commenced above a couple of months ago, but hitherto without any perceptible effect on either the wheat or barley to which they were applied. The all but universal impression is, that the whole concern is a complete hoax on the "agricultural mind." It certainly looks suspicious that Mr. Forster's experiment, made in Scotland, and with such wonderful results, should be given to the public first through the columns of the Bristol Mirror newspaper, where it was noticed in October last, and again in February, and without stating it to be on the authority of that gentleman himself.

At the Whitsunday term there were fewer changes than usual amongst the hinds or married farm-servants. Some allusions have been made in these reports to the new and improved cottages recently built by several proprietors in this county. But will it be believed, that within two miles of Haddington families are being reared to men and women in small hovels not larger than a farmer's dining-room, with the cow coming in at the same door as the family, and occupying a portion of the room? Yet such is the fact.—May 31, 1845.

PONNION BRIDS.—On Monday, June 2, the duties now chargeable upon the importation of the following foreign seeds into this country ceased and determined, and they will be added to the list of free goods agreed to by the House of Commons in their resolution of March last, and embodied in the act just passed, 18th Vic., cap. 12, enacting the same, viz.:—Acorn, aniseed, burnet, colchicum, cumina, fenugreek, forest, garden (assumed), lentils, lettuce, linseed and flax seed, lupine, maw, millet, parley, quince, shrub or tree, and worm.

chambers before mentioned. The fire originated in the lower part of the premises, and spread with great rapidity, resulting in the most strenuous efforts of the fire brigade to extinguish it. All the inmates escaped, save two, a Mrs. Satchell, wife of one of the partners of the premises, and her infant, a boy about 18 months old: they were discovered, when the fire was got under, burned to death in a frightful manner in Mrs. Satchell's bedroom. The fire originated in the shop, but how it occurred has not been exactly ascertained. Several neighbouring houses suffered much damage. We regret to add that Mr. Satchell died on Tuesday afternoon, the shock he received from the awful calamity having proved fatal to him.

On Monday night, between 11 and 12, a fire, attended with a considerable destruction of property, broke out in No. 11, Mount-street, Westminster-road, within a few doors of the National Baths. Mr. Todd, with his wife and child, and a female servant, were in their beds at the upper part of the building. There were likewise upon the premises Mr. Brooks, a lodger, with his wife and mother; and all had a narrow escape. The result was the destruction of the building, with the greater part of the furniture, stock in trade, &c.; but no injury was done to surrounding property.

Wednesday evening a meeting of the "merchants, manufacturers, and traders," was held in the Corn Exchange, Manchester, for the purpose of "considering the working of the act of last session which abolished imprisonment for debts under £20." Mr. John Brooks occupied the chair. The meeting was addressed by several small tradesmen, and a series of resolutions passed condemnatory of the measure; after which, a committee was appointed to collect information, and also to watch the progress of the bill now before Parliament on the same subject.

The Kentish Observer states that an officer of a dragoon regiment, a few days ago, was found dead in his quarters, it being supposed that he had committed suicide in consequence of losses sustained at the Derby.

From a return just issued, on the motion of Mr. Hume, it appears that the number of soldiers belonging to regiments of the line and the depôts in England and Ireland who have been corporally punished between January 1, 1839, to the 31st of December, 1841 (the last three years), is 1160; of whom 1014 were flogged once, 119 twice, 24 three times, 2 four times, and 1 five times. In the course of the same period 15,133 have suffered imprisonment. The number of soldiers corporally punished in the Royal Marines during the same period is only 31, and 891 imprisoned. In the Royal Artillery 62 men have been flogged during the same period, and 1281 imprisoned. In our regiments abroad 2109 have been flogged, and 9202 imprisoned. The corporal punishments inflicted in the Royal Navy were—in 1839, 2007; in 1840, 2028; in 1841, 2066; in 1842, 2472; and in 1843, 2170.

On Monday morning Joseph Connor, the wretched man who was convicted at the last session of the Central Criminal Court for the murder of Mary Brothers, in George-street, St. Giles's, expiated his horrible crime on the gallows in front of Newgate, in the presence of a large concourse of persons. It appears that the prisoner made an ample confession of his guilt on the morning after his conviction, and stated that, had the sheriffs not been so good as to employ counsel for his defence as they did, it was his intention to have pleaded guilty to the indictment, and save the Court all trouble in the matter.

Mr. Selon, the unfortunate gentleman wounded in the sad affair with Lieut. Hawkey, of the Royal Marines, has terminated his earthly career. He died at Portsmouth, on Tuesday evening, from the effects of the wound.

Two hundred and eighty-two books have been given to the guardians of the Greenwich union for the pauper library recently established. It is gratifying to perceive the excellent moral effect the trial of this scheme has had upon the inmates. Good order and good humour proceed from the practice; and, after the day's work is concluded, groups may be seen listening to some one reading, while others are employed in reading by themselves. Since the establishment of the library, the general conduct of the inmates has much improved.

On Wednesday, about noon, Mr. William Baker, a tradesman, living at Whitehall-place, Forest-gate, West Ham, Essex, died under an attack of hydrophobia, brought on from the bite of a dog six weeks ago. The unfortunate man was in the yard of Mr. Robert Ransom, a wheelwright of the neighbourhood, when the animal, which was of the terrier breed, bit him while he was patting it.

The total number of deaths registered in the metropolitan districts during the week ending Saturday, May 31, was 903, an amount something above the vernal, though considerably less than the annual averages, in which the numbers are respectively 888 and 963.

The most extraordinary popular demonstration ever perhaps witnessed, was that which took place on Friday, in Dublin, to commemorate the anniversary of the imprisonment of Mr. O'Connell and the other defendants in the state prosecutions. The procession through the streets might be considered as a "monster meeting," far surpassing any of those assemblages which preceded the state trials. The trades of Dublin, with the rural population for 20 miles around, marched in the procession, with flags and music, and with all the order and precision of well-drilled troops. There could not have been less than a quarter of a million of persons in the streets, but not a single accident occurred. The Repeal Association met at the Conciliation Hall on Monday. The meeting was a crowded one. Mr. E. O'Mahoney gave in his resignation, on the ground of treatment he had received from the '82 Club. Mr. O'Connell denied that there was any connexion between the two bodies. Mr. O'Connell, in his speech of the day, expressed his admiration of the proceedings of the previous Friday at the levee, and of the conduct of the people; both of which were indicative of the rapid progress of Repeal. The honourable member, having discussed a variety of topics, gave notice of several plans he intended proposing for the furtherance of the Repeal cause. The rent for the week was announced to be 2412 10s. 6d.

The following are extracts from the 11th Report of the Commissioners on National Education (Ireland) for 1844:—"We had at the commencement of it 2913 schools, which were attended by 355,320 children; at the close of it the schools amounted to 3185, and the children in attendance upon them to 395,650. We have also to state that we have undertaken to make grants towards the building of 277 schoolhouses, which are yet to be completed, and which, when the whole are finished and opened, we expect will be attended by about 25,000 additional children; we, therefore, calculate upon having altogether between 400,000 and 500,000 poor children receiving the blessings of education under us in the course of the present year. Altogether the national schools have about doubled, and so have the children in attendance upon them, within the last five years. We had 1581 schools at the close of 1839, and the number of children amounted to 205,000; at the close of the last year we had, as we have already stated, 3153 schools, and the number of children amounted to 395,000."

On Saturday an affray took place in the vicinity of Mohill, a disturbed district in the county of Leitrim. A party of police were out in search of some delinquents, and seeing a number of armed men, "Molly Maguires," in a field, they rushed upon them. The Molly Maguires fired, and the police returned the discharge, but with a sure aim, shooting one man through the heart and wounding others. The Molly Maguires fled and the police gave chase; but the country people got out of their reach. The police subsequently returned to the field, and were removing the body of the man who had fallen, when the country people, greatly reinforced, came up, rescued the body of their fallen companion, and put the police to flight.

Captain Broderick, secretary of the '82 Club, and chairman of "the levee" committee, has an advertisement in the Dublin papers, requesting authority to affix signatures to the Repeal pledge, agreed to on the 30th ult. in the Rotunda. It is said that the document has already received the signatures of upwards of twenty members of Parliament, in addition to those of the municipal authorities who presented addresses.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, June 2.—There was a moderate supply of English Wheat to this morning's market, but the weather having undergone a most favourable change during the last two days, there was less firmness in the trade. For the finest samples last week's prices were obtained, but rather lower rates were accepted for other descriptions. There was very little demand for Foreign, either in bond or free, but lower prices were not accepted. The supply of English Barley was short, and there was but little Foreign offering; the demand however was slow, and prices remain the same as last week. The supply of Beans and Peas was short, and former rates were fully maintained. The supply of Oats was short from Ireland, and moderate from abroad. Fine Corn of all descriptions was in request at fully last week's rates; and though the demand for the inferior qualities was not brisk, former prices were maintained. S. H. LUCAS and SON.

THE LEAGUE.

SATURDAY, JUNE 14, 1845.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND, £100,000.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUND FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for three months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that remittances will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quintin Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Birmingham and the neighbourhood are respectfully informed, that Subscriptions may be paid by Free-Traders to Mr. Charles Gosch, Midland Bank, Union-street, Birmingham, the local Treasurer.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

REGISTER, REGISTER, REGISTER!

The first step which requires to be taken is that of the claims for counties. The time for making these claims is from the 20th of June to the 20th of July, inclusive; any claim made after the latter date will be too late.

The county franchise is divided into four important classes of qualification:—

1st. Freehold, which includes the ancient 40s. freehold of inheritance for ever; and property held under a lease for lives, which should be described as freehold in the notice of claim.

2nd. Leasehold for a term of not less than 60 years, originally of £10 annual value; or if for a term of not less than 90 years, of £50 annual value.

3rd. Copyhold of £10 annual value.

4th. Occupiers of land, or building and land under one landlord, subject to a bond fide rent of £50 a year.

In the first class, the owner of a 40s. freehold for ever must have been in possession from the 31st of January of the present year; and the same in the case of the owner of leasehold for lives of 40s. a year, provided he be himself in the occupation of the property. If the owner of the lease for lives do not occupy, the property must be of the annual value of £10.

In the second class, the owner must have been in possession from the 31st of July, 1844.

And in the third class, the occupation must also be from the 31st of July, 1844.

It will be obvious that the first thing to be done by our friends is to ascertain how many Free-Traders there are in each parish possessing qualifications, and who are not on the register; and this should be set about forthwith, that the notices of claim may be made in proper time.

There are various means of obtaining this information, as, for instance—

In all those districts where the purchasing of qualifications, as recommended by the League, was taken up systematically, lists of the names will have been kept by those who made the conveyances.

The poor-rate books may be examined carefully to ascertain the names of owners of property, and also £60 copyholders therein, who are not registered.

Assessors, and collectors of rates and income-tax; building and land agents, who are friendly, may also give much information.

In the neighbourhood of large towns, such as Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, &c., there are merchants, tradesmen, and others, who occupy large houses and premises in the suburbs at a rental of £50; these, if not within the parliamentary borough, will be qualified, and, if not on the county register, should claim. Last year, on a careful examination of the rate-book of a township just over the boundary of the borough of Manchester, from forty to fifty occupiers of this description were found who were not then on the register for South Lancashire.

The next thing to be done is to take care that the claims are made out in proper form, and served in due time.

It is most convenient to use printed forms of notice; and these should be filled up with the greatest care, the following particulars being closely attended to:—

The name of the claimant to be written at full length.

The place of the claimant's abode (not the place where his business only is carried on).

The nature of the qualification must be correctly described in the third column. Any misdescription here will be fatal if the vote should be objected to. Leasehold or copyhold must not be described as freehold; or freehold as leasehold.

The situation of the qualification must also be accurately given as required in the fourth column. In cases of successive occupation, as, for instance, where the voter has removed from one farm to another since the 31st of last July, each set of premises must be set forth in the claim.

A correct copy of each claim must be kept, and the claim and the copy must each be signed by the claimant himself.

Should any of our friends desire to be furnished with further information on any particular point, they will please to address their inquiries to Mr. Paulton, League-office, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. Hickin, Secretary to the League, Manchester.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

THE DEBATE.

Could we forget the anxious uncertainties which the prospect of a late harvest, and the possibility of a deficient one, cast over the country—and could we look only with contempt on the conduct of men who sacrifice their strong individual convictions, and risk the gravest national interests, for the sake of the paltriest of party expediences—we should now address our readers in the language of triumphant exultation. The debate of Tuesday night on Mr. Villiers's annual motion was one unbroken series of triumphs for the Free-Trade cause. Again was every principle for which we have been contending these seven years past formally authenticated by the leaders of both the great Parliamentary parties, Ministerial and ex-Ministerial. The urgent necessity and duty of providing enlarged supplies of food for a growing population, and of giving (we use the Home Secretary's words) "a free and uninterrupted current to the flow of national industry;" the tendency of cheapness and plenty to raise wages, abate pauperism, and diminish crime and mortality;—were again pointedly affirmed by the chiefs of a monopolist Cabinet. All our premises are once more deliberately admitted to be sound; and not one of our conclusions is denied, except the practical one—that morality and policy demand that legislators should do that which they know, feel, and say ought to be done.

The "mind of the House"—as Mr. Villiers said, in the commencement of his admirable and masterly speech, and as every point of the debate strikingly confirmed—is altogether with us. In truth, we can scarcely speak of Tuesday night's discussion as a "debate." Debate there was none. Monopoly has long left off debating—has now ceased to attempt getting up a show of debate. Monopolists had not a syllable to say—did not make so much as a make-believe resistance to the Premier, when he quietly disclaimed their doctrines, and contemptuously disowned their arguments as unworthy even of the compliment of a refutation. And not only were all the principles of the League affirmed to be sound and just, but—a still more decisive indication of which way things are going—the League itself was treated with respect. There was no attempt, this time, to get up a stupid laugh at bad Ministerial jokes about "Covent-garden performers." The temper of the House with regard to us and our work was rather severely tested, when Mr. Bright so boldly alluded to the Bazaar—alluded to it precisely in that tone, and with an emphatic reference to those connected topics, which, according to all the ordinary House of Commons conventionalisms, might be deemed most provocative of ridicule, and which, but twelve months back, most assuredly would have been received with every sign of contempt and derision. He dared their sneers—and he dared them safely. All felt that the member for Durham was on sure ground, when he said—"There was one member opposite who would not sneer at these things, and that was the right hon. baronet who led the party." When we add, that the division (in itself a very secondary matter) showed a diminution in the monopolist majority—as compared with last year, of 74—as compared with 1842, of 181,—we have said enough to impart to every Free-Trader in the empire the renewed stimulus which we feel ourselves, to pursue, with unfaltering faith and patience, those exertions which have placed our cause in its present proud position.

Yet we are little inclined to indulge in the tone of triumph. Exultation is not the predominant feeling with which any earnest and honest mind can view a result which exhibits the shameful spectacle of men deliberately refusing to do that which they deliberately say ought to be done, and must be done—knowingly and wilfully risking the fate of millions of people on the chances of the next six weeks' weather. The position in which the Government have now placed themselves is the most profoundly humiliating that any set of public men ever submitted to. They have again—for the second time within a fortnight—raised their voices in Parliament as witnesses against the policy to which they still so pertinaciously cling. Again has their good sense borne testimony against their integrity. Again have they spoken the truth, to their own shame and condemnation. This was most powerfully pressed by Mr. Villiers. The Home Secretary had, as all the world remembers, in the debate on Lord John Russell's resolutions, admitted every one of our facts and principles—especially with reference to the necessity of finding more food for a fast-growing population, and the effects of plenty and cheapness on wages, employment, morality, and public health. He not only admitted our facts and principles—but enforced, illustrated, and insisted on them. "Founding himself on these admissions," "feeling what a strong position he occupies," Mr. Villiers now asks Sir James Graham if he persists in them—and, if so, when and how he means to act up to them. He "claims from him"—as he has a right to claim, if there is meaning in words—"an alteration in the Corn Laws." The admissions are not retracted, but—with some incoherent and feeble attempts to pacify the agricultural mind—distinctly reiterated. The Home Secretary again says, that "an abundant supply of food is, after all, the matter of primary legislative importance." And yet, with a law on the statute-book for artificially contracting the supply of food, he leaves this matter of primary legislative importance to the chances of the barometer. Sir Robert Peel the same. He, too, talks of "sound principles," which he refuses to do anything with; distinctly recognises, as possible, a "better condition of society," to which he will not make even those "cautious and gradual" approaches which he professes to desire; and, while repudiating every argument by which the Corn Law has ever been defended, leaves it untouched. He says the Corn Law ought to be changed, and must be changed—only "cautiously and gradually," not suddenly—and he keeps it unchanged. A more disgraceful sacrifice of principle and duty to the most trumpery expediences of party, was never made, by public men. Sir Robert Peel is in the position of a man retaining office for the purpose of doing that which he expressly says is wrong, and obstructing that which he expressly says is right. A flatter contradiction between words and deeds was never exhibited to the disgust and indignation of all honest men. And, we must add, a more tremendous responsibility than that with which Ministers now charge themselves, in braving the consequences which THEY KNOW will ensue on the first deficient harvest, was never assumed by statesmen. No rashness can surpass that which Sir Robert Peel is now guilty of, under the name of "caution and deliberation."

We abstain from detailed comment on a debate every word of which will be read with deep interest by Free-Traders. We cannot, however, refrain from expressing our thanks to Lord John Russell, and such of his party as have on this occasion, for the first time, given their votes in favour of Mr. Villiers's motion. The Premier showed, both by his petulant allusion to his rival's previous votes, and by the tone in which he thought it necessary to bid for the support and hopes of the Free-Traders, that he appreciated the importance of the frank and manly move in advance made by the noble member for London. We sincerely rejoice to see Lord John Russell thus practically recognising that the real question is now between all and nothing—that compromise is past seriously hoping for—and that the particular opinions which he individually entertains, as to the most desirable mode of working out a great principle, are not worth a thought as compared with the principle itself.

For the rest, the result of the discussion of Tuesday night was excellently summed up by Lord Howick. Suppose the word "gradual" interpolated in Mr. Villiers's motion—and all the Ministerial speeches are speeches in its favour. The Corn Law, by universal consent, is doomed. "No man can doubt, after hearing the speeches of the Ministers, that in their consciences they are convinced that a repeal of the Corn Law would be advantageous to the country."

It now only remains for the industrious classes to pronounce, in the registration courts, their judgment on the morality of men who tamper with their consciences, falsify their convictions, and stultify their most deliberate professions, for the sake of party—who postpone the acknowledged rights and interests of a people, to the miserable exigencies, or supposed exigencies, of a false party position.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1845.

Seventeenth Week, ending Saturday, June 14.

On Tuesday, the 10th of June, the motion of Mr. VILLIERS, pledging the House of Commons to the total and unqualified REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS, stood first in order of precedence on the "notice paper." This position, so difficult to secure, was favourable to the probability of a grave and serious discussion on the most important practical question of the day. But there were other circumstances which, to the superficial observer, would have been unfavourable. In the former days of our ignorance, when prosperity made us stupidly satisfied, and adversity ignorantly impatient, we were too apt to set down good and bad harvests, and good and bad times, to a kind of fatal necessity which we could neither anticipate nor prevent. If this spirit prevailed now, the motion of Mr. VILLIERS might have fared very badly. What with prosperity, and railroads, and shares, and speculation, and committees, and counsel, and witnesses, there is enough to divert and distract; but when to this is added the fact that, after a long period of fluctuating and peculiar weather, Tuesday, the 10th of June, was the first of a series of days on which the sun shined from the heavens with tropical intensity, Mr. Superficial might almost have been justified in exclaiming, "Pooh, pooh, there will be 'no House' to discuss a mere abstract motion!"

Much, however, to the surprise of Pooh-pooh, there was a House; and a most excellent one. The members of the Government were present; the agricultural members showed themselves, wedged in unhappy endurance to their seats, or sitting uneasily about the side galleries; while a full phalanx of Free-Traders crowded the Opposition benches. The strangers' gallery was packed; and it is a fact worthy of notice, that many of these "strangers," who sat from between four and five o'clock in the afternoon till two in the morning, enduring what might be considered a heat and a pressure approaching that of the Blackhole of Calcutta, were so enthusiastic in the cause that they were with difficulty restrained, by the calls of the messenger and the fear of the Serjeant-at-Arms, from testifying their approbation of telling points in Free-Trade speeches, by hands, feet, and voice. Altogether, the scene was as animating as encouraging; and dull must be his organs of observation, perception, and reflection, who does not feel satisfied that FREE TRADE is nearing the point when it will be what the French call un fait accompli.

The speech of Mr. VILLIERS, opening what may most emphatically be termed his case, occupied between two and three hours; and, though all novelty of point may be fairly considered as long since exhausted, there were repeated portions of that most elaborate and admirable address in which the solid and reiterated argument was relieved by that playful railery by which Mr. Villiers gives pungency to his sarcasm, without leaving behind the sting of personality. The particular stage, too, at which the question now stands in the agricultural mind, afforded much room for novelty, both of point and wit; and Sir Robert Peel fairly laughed outright at the picture of the deplorable condition of the agricultural societies, with their landlord condition of "no politics." Historical, descriptive, and prophetic, the speech of Mr. VILLIERS exhibited the question of the Corn Laws as it has been, as it is, and as it shall be; and such a speech, coming from the man who has for years tolled on, from the period of the dreariest indifference and ignorance to the present moment of all but universal assent and conviction, will be received in the country, as it was in the House, with the just respect which is due to talent, perseverance, and undeviating consistency.

Mr. VILLIERS then rose, pursuant to notice, and said—He believed there was a general admission of the propriety of his motion being made—or at least it was acknowledge that, such was the importance of its object and the necessity of its being settled, that some member was expected to test the opinion and, if possible, elicit the views of the leading members of this House upon it. This duty had hitherto unworthily devolved upon him; and reference had been so distinctly made to his resuming the task, that, for the first time he believed, he should occasion disappointment if he had not done so. (Hear.) He agreed with the noble lord the member for London that there could not be a more favourable moment to legislate on the subject than the present; and he was happy to learn that many members on the opposite side now agreed with the gallant member for Broom (Col. Wood), that the next time it was thought expedient to alter the law it would be far wiser to abolish it altogether. (Hear.) He trusted, then, that he should escape the charge of bringing forward an extravagant measure at an inconvenient time; for no party was satisfied with the present law, and nobody believed it would endure. He was glad to observe that her Majesty's Ministers were each year getting more confidence in the principles for which he was contending, and he thought they must now see that nothing was gained by a timid and partial application of them. The interests assailed are not less offended, while the satisfaction to the public is less than if their measures were complete. (Hear.) He thought he saw in the House a preference for measures that settled great questions rather than small disturbances of them. His friend the member for Gateshead had hoped to conciliate the House the other day by a very moderate measure, on the subject of bringing corn from Australia; but he did not see that he was treated with more respect, or that he had more success, than if he had proposed the measure now before the House. (Hear.) He thought that his noble friend the member for London had not received much encouragement to reproduce the measure by which he had hoped to reconcile conflicting interests, and all men would say that he was justified if he never on this account mentioned it again. (Hear.) He observed, also, that in other measures, whenever the Government had acted with boldness, they had received the support of the House. Even the member for Essex had given his approbation to a total and immediate repeal of the duty on cotton; and, though he objected to the same principle being applied to the more important subject of corn, others in the House would support it. (Hear, hear.) He indeed hardly knew now, before a Corn-Law debate was over, with whom he was differing on principle. Wherever any responsibility was felt for the consequences of the law, or any disinterestedness existed, there he observed there was either apology for, or abuse of, the law. (Hear, hear.) There had been, in the course of this session, two or three noble lords, who had before supported the law, avowed one, that he wished it had never existed; the other, that he was sorry it was now necessary; and a third, that he was not afraid of its repeal. (Hear.) He believed that if the leading members of the Government, and those of the last Government, and the leaders of the League, were to retire into a committee to consult on the matter, they would find that they differed very little (laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear"); and if they reported to the House, the report, if not in the language yet in substance, would be the same as what he asked the House to agree to, namely, that it was a law wholly unsuited to the present circumstances of the country; that it never had had any very laudable object in view; that it had been very injurious to the working classes; that the sooner it was abolished the better. (Hear, hear, hear.) If there was such a thing as the mind of this House, he should say that this was the impression that would be found upon it; but it was well known that it was not the mind of the House, but the votes, that determined its legislation; and that there was no doubt of there being yet great difficulty in procuring their repeal. He had learnt only last night that the Society for the Protection of Native Agriculture was yet living (laughter); and they knew that the interests that that society represented preponderated in both Houses of Parliament—the majority in the Legislature approved of the purpose of the law; they were not quite satisfied that it had failed, and were not sure that it was yet unsafe or unadvisable to maintain it. With regard to this latter object it was the purpose of that very useful body, the Anti-Corn-Law League, to relieve their minds. (Hear, hear.) What the purpose of the law was, he believed there was no doubt: it might be simply expressed as intending to make land dear. (Hear.) Such had been the original object, and all subsequent legislation had had this object in view; and it was curious to observe the decided character of the legislation on this subject from the time that the proprietors of land became dominant in the State. He referred that period to the Revolution in 1688; and in that very year, when William III. accepted the constitution, and was at the mercy of the proprietors, they began boldly to deal with the subject. In that year a committee was appointed for the simple purpose of inquiring into "the cause of a fall in rents" (hear); and before the committee made their report they imposed a tax upon the people to enable them to pay the costs of conveying the produce of their land to other countries, thereby raising the price at home; this they called a bounty upon exports (hear); and this scheme lasted until the latter part of the last century, when, from the increase of the population, and the general discredit of the other tax, the most effectual way of raising the price was supposed to be in a tax imposed upon food coming into the country; and this policy has continued till the present hour—the same object of raising the value of land being always in view. (Hear.) Fortunately, though the constitution was the same, men's minds were not constituted as they were when the law passed. The people, in relation to their rulers, are numerically and intellectually far stronger than they were, and he did not believe that, when their opinion was strongly expressed against any grievance, it would long be maintained. (Hear.) This deference to opinion had been shown by the landlords on this subject, for they had spared no pains to influence opinion and delude the minds of the people on the matter, and he was bound to say that they had done so with considerable success. They had addressed themselves particularly to two classes, hoping by their countenance to maintain the system—one were the cultivators of the soil, and the other the working population (hear, hear); and he admitted that they had, to a considerable extent, deluded both these classes—they had attempted to show that the law was necessary for their interest, and that it had generous and national objects in view. (Hear.) He was not sure that their task had been difficult, but he thought it would be so in future. (Hear.) They had heard this year, from the gallant member for Sussex, a description of the farmers of the country. He had told them that they were men whose vision was so contracted that they could hardly see more than one object at a time; that their whole attention was engrossed with the cattle that they reared, or the vegetables that they grew; and that they were apt to measure the world's affairs by the markets they got for those objects. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) He said he could not submit to learn from them how this country was to be governed. (Hear.) If this was a true picture of such men it was not wonderful that they had been deceived by others (hear), or that they had been deluded into confusing the effect of price with that of profit, and that, when they were assured that they would be secured a high price for their produce, it was the same thing as a high profit upon their capital; or that, having their eye only upon one thing, they should forget that, if there was to be a large profit obtained from the land, there would be many who would desire to have the land, and that the land would fetch a high price in consequence. (Hear, hear, hear.) This they overlooked in their bargains; and they listened to men who called themselves their friends, and who told them that, if they would send them to Parliament, they would uphold the law that would give them a good price for their produce; and resist the men who told them that if they trusted to such a law they would be deceived: that they would pay more for the land in proportion to this promise of price, and that if the price failed them they would be ruined. (Hear, hear.) However, they believed their professed friends, and members are sitting in this House now upon no other pledge than that of keeping up the law that would keep up the price and give a high profit to the farmer. (Hear.) His position, then, to-night was, to call the attention of the farmers to this circumstance, and to ask them to say who were their friends and who were their enemies, and how far their supposed enemies had been wrong in advising them not to trust to this law, for that they would only be induced by it to give a high rent for the land? (Hear.) The member for Somersetshire had said that, thanks to the League, the farmers saw things much clearer than they did before. He trusted such was the case. (Laughter.) One of his objects in bringing forward this motion was, to procure for the farmer some explanation from the leaders of the Protection Society of his present condition—how he came, with so many friends, to be in his present plight. (Hear.) He saw the member for North Northamptonshire in his place. He had charge, he believed, of the library of the Protection Society (laughter); he knew, therefore, all that was known upon the matter probably; perhaps he would be good enough to explain matters a little to them: he hoped he would tell us what the real relation of the farmer was to the landlord, and how it came to pass that it was to the farmer's interest to pay dearly for the raw material out of which he was to get his profit, while the rest of mankind considered it an advantage to pay as little as possible for the thing they wanted. (Hear.) Would the hon. member tell them how it was the interest of the farmer to pay a high rent for land, and for the hon. member himself to pay a low interest for money? (Hear, hear.) He could not see the difference himself. If the land to the farmer was the material on which he employed his capital, it would appear at first that his object would be to get it as cheap as possible, as requiring less outlay; money was a thing that any capitalist might also require, and all men, he believed, considered it was fortunate when they paid a low rate of interest for it. (Hear, hear.) He assured the hon. gentlemen that it was a farmer himself who had particularly requested him to endeavour to get the gentlemen of the Protection Society to explain this matter to the House (hear), for they knew that the Protection Society only cared for the farmer, and had closely studied his interest. (Laughter.) He would only venture to put the hon. member on his guard in one respect, which was, that he was precluded from alleging two things with respect to the matter—one was, that the farmers' position was occasioned by the late measures of the Government; the other was, that the landlords were suffering as well as the farmers, or were in the same boat with the farmers. (Hear.) The first they could not say, because the farmers' friends in the House had all supported the measures of the Government. But what was more important was, that the condition of the farmer was no novelty; that he had frequently been in the same state, and that under each of three laws passed for his protection after the same fashion (hear); and, what was curious, he had been worse off when the land was most protected. (Hear.) He was worse in 1836 than he was in the present year; and, though he was told then it was owing to the Whigs being in power, he remembered that he was still worse in 1822, under the law of 1815 and when the Tories were in power, than at any other time. (Hear, hear.) He thinks, therefore, that there must be something wrong in the principle of such a law. But the other thing that the hon. member must not say was, that the landlords were badly off as well, for he believed that which was called the landed aristocracy were never better off; that they never made more display of their wealth; that they never were spending more money than they were now in London, and he was sure that the Protection Society could not prove that they had put down a dog or a horse, or turned off a groom or a footman, in consequence of the unparalleled distress, as they called it, of agriculture. ("Hear," and a laugh.) Now, really it would be a great advantage if the protection leaders would explain the case to the farmer, and tell him and tell the House what was the matter with him, and how it came that he had been so often indisposed in the same way. Lastly, whether it might not be that there was something that the landlord could himself do for him. ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) Judging from the report of different meetings in the country, he could not help thinking that the agricultural interest, as it was called, was not altogether agreed upon the matter. He wished to call the attention of the hon. member to this subject. He had observed, in his endeavour to understand the case, that there were two kinds of meetings; one called meetings for the Protection of Agriculture, and headed "Agriculture," and the others held at the farmers' side, and headed "Farmers' Interests were discussed." Now, he believed that at these meetings there were very different views expressed, and he thought, at the first, and what he thought was and clergy assembled, he observed plenty of abuse of the Ministry, great complaints of protection withdrawn, threats of withdrawing confidence, and a desire that the Canada Act and the new Corn Law should be repealed. (Hear.) But when he turned to the farmers' meetings they seemed to be talking of something else that would set them all straight again: they seemed to be sure that they could do very well if rents were adjusted to prices, if they were rendered secure in their tenures, and if other things, like game-preserving and useless timber in their hedges were to cease: in short, their hearts seemed to be full of something that the landlord could do for them; while the more respectable meetings (laughter) talked more of Ministerial treachery and protection lost. (Hear.) I see the member for Shropshire seems to doubt all this. Then let me give him some proof. I have a little evidence on the point. Here was a report from the Exeter Agricultural Association. The society met "for the purpose of considering the propriety of memorializing the county members on the present depressed condition of the agricultural interest." The meeting is said to have been attended by a large body of tenant-farmers—though the reporter judiciously abstains from mentioning the number—while a few squires and clergymen are specified by name. Sir R. W. Newman (in the chair) read the excuses of the county members for non attendance. Wm. Porter Esq., opened the first fire on the county members:—"He did think, when they had occasion to ask their representatives to give their strenuous support to the agricultural interest, it did look a little as if those representatives had not given that strenuous support which they ought, and which they promised to give. (Cheers.) He recollected, at the last election, that many of them had come forward, and had stated certain measures which they were prepared and anxious to support; but it had been with them as it had been with many other members, as soon as they had been elected they had ceased to recollect those measures—they had gone with their party, and had remembered only the men. (Cheers.)" Mr. Porter concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That this meeting, viewing with serious alarm the great depreciation in the value of agricultural produce which has taken place within the last few years, respectfully but firmly call upon the members for the county to urge on the Ministers the necessity of supporting the agricultural interest, and by every means in their power to place agriculture in a better position." Then J. Palk, Esq., addressed the meeting, and said:—"That, in the opinion of this meeting, land has to bear peculiar burdens, particularly the poor, highway, and county rates), and it would be a great relief to agriculture to make them a national charge." To accomplish this truly patriotic scheme, "The landlords and tenants must act together. (Cheers.) Day by day they must strengthen the bonds which united them. (Hear, hear.) It was folly to say that either could exist without the other—together they must rise or together fall. It would never do for the tenant to be distrustful; and the tenant must have full confidence in him, if they would hope to force upon the Legislature those measures which were absolutely necessary to the existence of agriculture." (Laughter.) Then followed Mr. George Turner, who formed one of the deputation of the Central Protection Society to Sir Robert Peel, and bore testimony to delusions under which the tenant-farmers brought the present Ministry into power, and he ended with this notable bit of logic:—"He had been an extensive practical farmer for a great number of years, and he declared to them that he had never paid so much upon his estate as he had done within the last three years, and he had never received so little income. (Hear.) If that was not a clear case for demanding some assistance from the Legislature, he did not know what was." (Laughter.) Then came one Mr. Chapple, who said:—"Every man who was farming land at 20s. an acre at the present price was losing money. (Hear, hear.) What, then, was to be done? It might be that the members would say, 'Tell us what to do.' His answer to them would be, 'Let them go to Sir Robert Peel and tell him plainly that they will not support him to ruin us.' (Hear, hear.)" He wound up with this pre-emptory resolution:—"That the secretary be directed to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of the county members, with a request that he will use his most strenuous exertion to force on the attention of her Majesty's Ministers the principles contained in them." He would now read what farmers said when they were among friends. (Hear.) This was a meeting given to a real friend in Herefordshire. The chairman, in giving the health of Mr. Powell, said that, "This is not a meeting for any class of dependents to pay homage and respect which they do not feel, or to bend the knee to the rich aristocrat or grandee; but to show our worthy guest that his public utility, as well as his private worth, is not only felt but acknowledged by us." Mr. Powell said, in reply:—"The farmers in general look upon the newly-formed protection societies with a cautious eye. You will rarely see the name of a tenant-farmer attached to either of their lists—they know their own position too well. The only protection they want is to be put in a position to be able to protect themselves (cheers); and this they could easily do if farms were let on leases and corn rents." He would now read what occurred at a mixed sort of meeting in which a marquis had been in the chair, but where a farmer had been very bold, and had, after making very free remarks, said:—"Would the landlords help them in reality? Would they pledge that they will not take advantage of improvements when they are made? Would they guarantee leases? Would they take care that the crops were not devoured by game? If so, then the landlords might come to these societies with sincerity, shake hands with the tenants, and go to help the labourer. (Cheers.)" Here the reporter says, the lord, who had long been seditiously, became furious, declared he would leave the chair, tried to stop the farmer's remarks (laughter)—which seem to have been too much to the point—and relied upon the meeting to support the chair. The majority of the meeting, however, seemed more disposed to support the farmer, who said:—"He bowed to the chair, but he would add, that if landlords were sincere they should give security to their tenants. (A voice—'No politics, and great noise.') He was sure that all thinking people must admit that a hopeless despair was not the best hypodermic to support agriculture on any other than sound and just principles. (Cheers.)" The noble chairman, after rapidly giving one or two complimentary remarks, made his escape, when of course all the rest of the landlords likewise departed. Now, he would read an extract from a farmers' meeting at a place in Derbyshire, where one Mr. Binns discusses the condition of farmers:—"Mr. Binns said, I am aware that, in most of the farmers' clubs which have been established in different parts of the country, great anxiety has been evinced by certain parties to exclude the discussion of what they call (and I believe them) 'obnoxious subjects'—such as rents, leases, and game. (Loud cheers.) But somehow or other, in almost every club of whose proceedings I have seen any account, these 'obnoxious subjects' have crept in. The farmers ought to use every effort to improve their condition, considering the diminished price of corn and cattle. If landlords would come forward when tenants were in difficulties, and say, 'We will meet your case by reducing the rent' (loud cheers), their struggles would meet with some alleviation. But such was not the case. Instead of meeting them with sympathy, on a tenant's complaining, the answer, in a majority of cases, was, 'If you do not like to stay on the farm, you may leave it; we have plenty waiting for it. (Hear, hear.) Let the farmers then, in future, depend more upon themselves. He knew there were some landlords who acted upon the principle, 'Live and let live,' but unfortunately they were few, comparatively. (Hear, hear.)" Then here is a meeting, invited for the purpose of both parties meeting on friendly terms, at which the honourable member for Sussex presided, but where the reporter says he could only count, including reporters and Mr. Darby, eleven persons, but one farmer among them, however, spoke to this effect:—"No one can regret more than myself the absence of the influential men. Whether the landlords are ashamed to meet the tenants as a humble body, or whether they are afraid of hearing something that would not be palatable, I cannot say; but I can guess which works in their breast the most. The cause of their absence is this—they deem the treatment of the aristocracy of this neighbourhood to be anything but what it ought to be towards them. I cannot imagine that they can be afraid of hearing any stupid tomfool like myself speak. I am at a loss to know their reason for absenting themselves; but, from what I hear in the market, when they attend these meetings there is nothing but recommendation of great landowners to set labourers to work, manure, drain your lands, but they omit one principal feature—they never tell tenants how they can afford to pay for it." These meetings, he (Mr. Villiers) thought, bore out what he had said on this point—that farmers are wanting one thing, while the landlords want another. This was, however, most important to those who complained of the present system. This had induced his friend the member for Stockport to move for inquiry, in order to prove that agriculture was suffering from the present system, and that freedom in this trade, like every other, was essential to its success (hear), which success would only be proved by the people having a plentiful supply of food. But to this the Secretary—who was appointed to meet the complaints of all sides, and who seemed to speak with the authority of one whose judgment was superior to that of other people, though he hardly knew on what ground—he told them that the remedy for all this was not to talk about it (hear); that, if his own friends would be quiet, they would not suffer; and that, if they on that side would be silent also, they would see that they would have no reason to complain (laughter): which was all very convenient, but not very conclusive. (Hear, hear.) The story was, that if everybody was quiet, improvement would go on, and that there would be no scarcity; but unfortunately nobody was convinced of that, and the agricultural gentlemen only withdrew their confidence and not their complaint. (Hear.) Now, he begged to draw attention to the matter of improvement which was to feed them all better than they had been. This was how it stood. The farmers say we can do nothing without leases or security for our capital, without rents being in some way adjusted to prices, without liberty to destroy game, without being more free in many respects than we have been. (Hear, hear.) The landlords say they can do nothing unless they have more protection, or unless the protection is restored to them that they used to have; they say they cannot improve unless favour is shown to them. Well, the landlords appeal to the Government in this House about this protection, and what do they say? Why, they tell them that protection never did them any good; that they should not get back what they had lost, and that it was possible that more might be taken from them. (Laughter.) Then the farmers ask the landlords for what they consider is necessary to make the land more productive; but the landlords say—"If you understood your business you would not ask for these things; they can't be conceded, and there are plenty ready to take the land if you are not satisfied." And so it stands: certain things are necessary for these improvements to be made, according to the opinion of the only people who can give them effect, and these things have not a chance of being conceded; but they were told that, if they would hold their tongue, there would be plenty of food, and enough to meet the wants of an increasing population, owing to the vast improvements that would be made. (Cheers.) He asked if they had any reason to expect that they should be satisfied with such a state of things? or whether they had not a right to inquire particularly into all that affected the property of land, and to examine if there was a prospect under the present circumstances of the community being supplied? (Hear, hear.) This inquiry had been made, and the result was, that numberless impediments exist in this country to the capital and skill that was required for the due culture of the soil being applied. Land was seen to be desired and possessed for many other reasons than that of producing food for the people. Land was valuable for pleasure, such as preserving game; for acquiring political influence by means of the franchise given to tenants-at-will; for acquiring consequence in a county by the estimation in which it is held; and also made especially subservient to creating and perpetuating families: all of which may be very desirable objects, but they are all notoriously injurious to agriculture,—all impediments in the way of progress and improvement, and opposed to what is essential to turn the land to the most account. (Hear.) They may answer the purpose of some owners, for a tenant-at-will may pay better at a contested election than a good crop of wheat. (Laughter.) And all these things the proprietor has a right to do if he likes—he has a right, and should be allowed, as far as legitimate interference went, to deal with or waste his property just as he likes; but let him acknowledge the same right to the labourers over their only property, namely, their labour. (Cheers.) In one of the cases that he (Mr. Villiers) had mentioned, the importance was very great—he meant that of the mode of settling property, which was with the view to the custom of primogeniture. This led to the estate being held by the proprietor only for life: it was with the view to the eldest son being secured in the inheritance of the fee till the resettlement of the property was again made. The importance, however, to agriculture was, that the owner being tenant for life, and having usually a large family besides the eldest, he felt little interest in laying out his life income to improve the estate, feeling that he had other claims in the younger children for any money he possessed for this purpose. In consequence of the discussion on these matters, a noble duke, in the other House, had proposed an inquiry, and he believed a bill had been introduced to enable the tenant for life to charge the estate with improvements. Still, he must be an ardent improver who would consent to pay the interest out of his life income for this purpose; though, if he felt that he was increasing the value of an estate to be equally divided among his children, he doubtless would do all he could to improve the value of the inheritance. (Hear, hear, hear.) The general result of the system, as it was observed, was that the owner of the land was tenant for life, and the occupier was tenant-at-will, which were precisely the circumstances under which it was most unfavourable to good agriculture that the land should be held (hear, hear); and the consequence was that there was not that free, abundant, and certain supply of food for the people of this country that there might otherwise be. (Hear.) It was impossible to overrate the importance of this circumstance in the present state and progress of our population: that now would be seen and understood far better than it had been, for he asserted with confidence that the delusion under which the people had been silenced before, on the influence of the price of food on their condition, had been exploded, by what they had so recently experienced. (Hear, hear, hear.) He considered that, after the official statement made by the right hon. gentleman the other night on this subject, it was placed beyond all future dispute that the employment of the working classes was greatly and directly affected by the amount and cost of food in the country; it was impossible, therefore, in future that working men could be deceived by the silly fallacy that their condition was benefited by food being dear. (Hear.) He did, then, call upon gentlemen opposite, especially those connected with the Protection Society, to acknowledge that either they had been in error themselves, or prove that they were not parties to a deception (hear); for he asked how it was that they justified deliberately circulating what was so foreign to the truth? He thought it a serious charge, considering the interest they had in doing so. It was a deception practised upon the humblest, the most defenceless, the poorest of their fellow-creatures, for the purpose of augmenting their own pecuniary interest. (Hear.) He spoke of this seriously, because it had not been lightly done. It had been done coolly and purposely, and, he should suppose, at much cost. He had read the works that had been published by the Protection Society, issued with all the authority of men of rank and wealth and influence. He found this fallacy was the leading topic of all their speeches and pamphlets, and while it was endeavoured to be shown that the poor would benefit by food being dear, they sought to prove that the manufacturers had an object in injuring the working people by making trade in the great necessary free. ("Hear, hear," from the member for Devonshire and others.) Was he to understand then, that there were still some persons in that House who maintained the doctrine? (Hear.) Then he did deliberately call upon the members for Devonshire and Lincolnshire to prove in what way dear food was of advantage to the working class. (Hear, hear.) He asked them to stand forward to-night, as they ought to have done the other night, and reply to the statements of the Secretary of State, which established the fact that the employment of the people, and with it their whole well-being, depended upon the abundance and cheapness of provisions. (Cheers.) I ask them this night to vindicate the proposition which they have helped to circulate and endeavoured to make the poor believe. They are bound, after acknowledging those views, to speak out on the subject this evening. He should watch well what they said on the subject, and the House would draw its own conclusion if they shrank from the proof of what they had said. Till they had spoken on the subject he would say no farther, and would not make other observations which he had intended upon the conduct of persons in the highest station lending their names and authority to what he considered deceiving the poor and uninformed and unthinking portion of the people, with the full knowledge that the law that they were encouraging them to support was subjecting them to the severest privations. (Hear.) He, however,—knowing well that the truth was that, whenever food as the first necessary was abundant, there was an increased demand for labour, and when it became deficient, millions must become miserable,—he considered that too much attention could not be invited to the fact, for it would at least explain the variations which had taken place in the condition of the people before, and which might occur again. (Hear.) Let it only be remembered what was alleged on the other side during the period of severe distress, and when each man was taxing his brains to devise the cause for it, or rather to find an excuse other than the real one. If any one will turn to the debates, they will see that it was ascribed to machinery, to over-production, to over-population, to greedy capitalists, to joint-stock banks, to the want of emigration, and the want of reciprocity with other nations. These were the things alleged in 1842; when they on that side kept reiterating that it was owing to a deficient supply of food during four years together, and to obstructions placed by themselves on the trade with the countries from which they could draw their supplies. (Hear, hear.) Now, then, let them deny the fact if they can,—that there is much more machinery in use now than ever (hear); that there are more people by a million than there was; that production is much greater than it was; that joint-stock banks are as they were; that money never was more plentiful; that credit is generally good, and that there is not one state with which we had important trade at that time that has not raised its tariff since against us. (Hear.) How is all this to be explained? (Hear.) The honourable gentleman who seconded the address this session remarked upon it, and said he should like to hear it accounted for in some way. The Ministers have had an opportunity of stating their views on the subject; and what are they? They told them the other night. They ascribe it to two circumstances: one is to the great fall in the price of food; the other is to the reduction in the protective duties, and chiefly on the articles of necessary consumption. (Cheers.) The Government of the country are asked to explain the prosperity of the country, and they proclaim it, that England's recent prosperity has been occasioned by an abundant supply of the necessities of life, and to the reduction of the protective duties that had long existed. (Hear, hear.) The first Minister is jealous of any cause being referred to but that of his own legislation especially for this purpose. We might say it was owing to the seasons if we pleased, but he said it happened together with his attack upon protective duties, and with his object, by so doing, of reducing the cost of living. (Hear, hear.) Here, then, was the authority for our present improvement. Here was his (Mr. Villiers's) justification for calling for the repeal of the law which yet existed to obstruct the supply of food. (Hear, hear.) Now, then, if the gentlemen opposite thought that dear food was an advantage, and made the country prosperous, they had reason, he granted, for opposing him, but they had reason also for complaining of the right hon. gentleman (hear, hear); and they should settle that matter with him to-night (hear); they should show him how he was wrong, and attempt to prove themselves in the right. He, however, had the same right to condemn the Government, with their views and experience, for not going farther, and suffering such a law as this to remain another day. (Hear.) Is it, however, a debatable matter? Is it possible that we are doubting about the advantage of cheap food? Have they ever given it thought, on the other side, what depended upon it in all economical arrangements of society? Why, the division of labour, the source of all our wealth, depends upon it. Men only devote themselves to other employments than producing food when they feel sure that food will be provided. (Hear, hear.) They only produce other articles upon the faith that other people will have the means of consuming what they produce (hear), but which they cease to have immediately upon those means being absorbed by something of higher importance to life than comfort or luxury. (Hear.) Let food become scarce, or require great sacrifice to obtain it, and the means for consuming manufactures are absorbed, and the producers without employment; and they must either produce food directly themselves, or become dependent as paupers upon the property of the country. This is, then, what actually occurs immediately that the customers of those who produce other things than food are withdrawn or impoverished; and in the present state of the country this is a matter of the highest importance. It is the tendency of any progressive country that fewer people should be employed in agriculture and more people in manufactures than in the earlier stages, so that the only vent now for our increasing population is in manufacturing employment. (Hear.) The market for their industry is at home and abroad (hear): impair either, by increasing the cost of food or obstructing the trade, and you throw people out of employment. (Hear, hear, hear.) They talk glibly here of producing this effect, because they suppose that the people do not starve, having the parish to go to; but have hon. gentlemen ever considered what is the effect of one of those crises in manufacturing industry which is produced by injuring the market either at home or abroad,—what moral as well as physical ruin it brings, what loss of station, what temptations, what degradation are occasioned by those extreme depressions? Be assured that you are producing evils that you can never repair by your laws, when you occasion a deficiency in the supply of food. You have complete power over the people when you undertake to regulate the supply of food; you can give or take vitality from their business and their bodies, as completely as you may from an animal in the receiver of the air-pump. You may exhaust or restore life at pleasure, and that by depriving them of their employments. (Hear.) The right hon. gentleman was indeed right when he said that scarcity was the greatest curse that could be inflicted upon us; what he questioned was, how far he had the right to ascribe that curse to Providence. He remembered hearing an eloquent gentleman speaking on this matter during the scarcity, and he said that we should examine our own conduct first in the matter, before we could consider ourselves qualified to blaspheme the Creator for what we called his curse upon us. (Hear, hear.) Do they remember that, at the time that they were calling their distress for food a visitation of Providence, in one of the Atlantic cities a pestilence was raging owing to the stores of provisions becoming putrid from remaining in the warehouses for want of a market; and that, had we not forbidden that food from entering our ports, we should have been properly supplied, and they would have been spared that visitation? (Hear, hear.) With such laws as that which he was discussing, they should indeed pause before they ascribed their distress to anything but their own cupidity. Providence fills the earth with good things, and has endowed us with reason to enable us to obtain them. It was their own folly then, and no want of God's beneficence, that caused us to suffer. (Hear.) But these things were all appreciated by the Ministers. After the speech of the right honourable gentleman, the other night, it was clear that they took the same view as on this side, of the enormous advantages of having a regular plentiful supply of food: they differed from their friends the members for Lincolnshire and Devonshire, who consider that food should be restricted in its supply. But the Government are fully prepared for what must recur if again we are visited with scarcity—they are officially acquainted with what was endured, and what was apprehended, in the most populous parts of the country on the last occasion. (Hear.) They can hardly bring themselves to allude to what they know, for fear of shocking the feelings of that House. (Hear.) Then he did ask how they could reconcile it to themselves to suffer this moment to pass by without taking some security against its recurrence? Why, it was the only thing in which they did not agree with him on that side—they do not deny a single principle they maintained: they say that food ought to be abundant; that protection was an evil; that in every way you ought to open the field for commercial enterprise; that you ought to facilitate the means for manufacture; that the raw material and those which are essential for manufacture ought especially to be relieved. All this they agreed to, but they refuse to deal with the law which restricts the supply of food; for he contended that what alleviations were made in those laws were avowedly not for the purpose of relieving the distress of the people, or to increase the quantity of food,—they were accompanied by arguments to show that that was not the purpose for which they were altered. There have been two alterations—one of the English Corn Law, the other of the Canada law. The right hon. gentleman opposite did not refer the distress of the people to the Corn Law, and appeared to alter the law in a way not opposed to the interests of those for whose benefit it exists; and the noble lord the Secretary of the Colonies said distinctly, that whoever imagined it was his object to pass the Canada Act as a Free-Trade measure, or as a mode of diminishing the protection of landowners at home, would be grievously mistaken (hear, hear); and from all he (Mr. Villiers) heard he was not sure that he was in error. (Hear.) What, then, was his position in demanding now that legislation should proceed upon this subject? The right hon. gentleman opposite admits an annual exigency in providing for the increase of the population. Each year 380,000 persons are added to those that existed in the preceding year that must be fed. He tells them, also, that last year there were upwards of 1,500,000 paupers, which mean destitute persons, and that in England and Wales only—nearly one in nine of the population; and says that there are not many more only owing to the accident of good harvests, and what he has done in reducing protective duties. (Hear.) He (Mr. Villiers) then asked that some fresh means should be given to our people to exchange their skill and industry for food. If nothing is done what will be the inference wherever it is known, but that our people are impoverished by the selfishness of our legislation, and that we have the means of improving them in our hands, but that we refuse to act. (Hear, hear.) That is already the impression abroad wherever our circumstances are known. British wealth, British pauperism, and British Corn Laws (hear, hear), whenever this country is discussed, these things are mentioned together with wonder and reproach. (Hear.) There is a general belief that the riches of our aristocracy and the poverty of millions of our people are connected with the Corn Law, and it brings scandal on our name wherever it is known. (Hear.) He asked if any thing ever occurred in these debates to disabuse the minds of foreigners on this subject? What can be more calculated to confirm their impression than the right honourable gentleman's speech the other night, and the probable result of this debate? (Hear.) He wished honourable gentlemen could hear and know what is said abroad about the British aristocracy, owing to these Corn Laws; foreigners see that no intelligent man of independence defends them, and that all experience discredits them and that they are maintained for no one earthly purpose but that of making men richer whose wealth is enormous already. (Hear.) If this law is to remain unaltered after the admissions of the Ministers upon all the material points connected with their mischief, their responsibility will be enormous (hear), and that they must expect to meet—they cannot hope to escape it. (Hear.) They must, in the first place, remember that they cannot repair the mischief when it occurs by merely changing the law when it suits them; and whatever happens from not having altered the law now, they must answer for. In the next place, if a deficiency was to occur, they must know that there are circumstances likely to make the pressure much more severe at a future time than it has been. The surplus available for our use is likely to be much less on account of the greater consumption of wheat throughout Europe; within these few years countries have become importing countries that used to export, and the population here and abroad have much increased. (Hear.) At this moment Belgium is obliged to relax her Corn Law, and all the manufacturing districts are in a state of fever at the change not being sufficient to meet their wants. A petition to the Chambers has been sent to me from Liège, representing the feeling that exists upon the subject; and I find that it echoes every sentiment and opinion that is expressed against the Corn Law in this country, and shows to what an extent already they feel the increasing wants of their population. In Holland they enacted a Corn Law in 1831 in imitation of ours, and under the same pretence as ours—for the benefit of agriculture; and a person in the Consul's office at Amsterdam told him that every evil in every way that had been traced to our sliding scale, had been experienced under the Corn Law that they had, that it gave general dissatisfaction, and that the price of food was enormously high in consequence. In parts of France they do not grow enough for their own consumption; and he had been informed that the Canada Act, passed three years ago, had only added to the uncertainty of our market in the corn-growing countries of Europe. (Hear.) He should also mention another circumstance that would cause the pressure to be more severe when large importations were required, which was the Banking Act of last year. (Hear.) He was not going to discuss the general merits of that measure—he was not going to deny, in some respects, it might make banking establishments more careful in the conduct of their business; but he did conceive that it would be the means of causing greater sacrifices to be made to export the only commodity, namely, bullion, which it was possible suddenly to export to procure the food we required; it would sooner and more suddenly cause that disturbance in business which ended in a ruinous reduction of prices, by which manufactures could alone be exported for food. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, he did apprehend that, when a revulsion did occur from scarcity, it would be both more severe and hazardous than before. (Hear, hear.) They certainly had the moment to avert it. What reason could they set against such ordinary prudence? (Hear.) Surely they were not to have that wretched plea of local taxation set up again this evening, as opposed to the enormous advantage consequent on the free exchange of their industry for food. Why, such a plea from the Government was quite inexcusable, with their eyes open to the evils of restricting food. Why, it only shifted the responsibility of the law from the proprietors to the Government. (Hear.) They could do what they please; they have a majority for relieving themselves and their supporters if they are oppressed. (Hear.) If there is any injustice at present in the distribution of these local taxes, let them be borne more equally. (Hear.) He and others denied it altogether, and they knew opposite that they did not believe it, for they did not prove it, and they shrank from the inquiry that would ascertain it. (Hear, hear.) When the Government announces that pauperism and crime are increased by dear food, what an excuse is it for the continuance of a law that makes food dear, that the charge for these misfortunes has to be borne by the property of the country! (Hear.) Give up making food scarce and you will diminish the charge, and do not spread poverty and crime throughout the country to favour the rich,—to favour the idle and unproductive classes, moreover,—the classes who, if they swarmed in the country, would never add to its wealth, deriving their livelihood from the sources they do. (Hear.) He did not impute that to them as a fault: they inherited their property, and did not acquire it for themselves; but they spend it usually unproductively,—their expenditure is usually in consumption that has not reproduction in view. (Hear.) Nobody grudges it to them, nobody wishes to interfere with the disposition of property in this country; but, in the name of justice and common sense, do not sacrifice the industrious and useful to the idle and unproductive. (Cheers.) This House does not act with the same carelessness in any other case that he knew of. What was it that was engaging so much of the time and attention of the House this year? Why, providing for the cheap and rapid communication of the country. (Hear.) Observe first the object had in view—the cheap transit of goods—to enable the consumer to have his goods cheap; very much to enable the distant produce to come into competition with the land, that hitherto had engrossed a superior market, and to enable persons to travel cheaply. Observe the jealousy with which you regard monopoly in these cases. You admit competition in the first place; for you examine the merits of rival lines; and then, when you give privilege, you take security that they shall perform what they undertake: you restrict their charge, and retain a power of regulating their business. (Hear, hear.) You do not trust them implicitly; you expect that they would attempt to serve themselves and neglect the public if you did;—but how do you act with respect to the company that undertakes to perform the most important duty to the people and the State that can be fulfilled—to supply the markets adequately with food? (Hear, hear.) Why, you do trust them implicitly; you expect that they will, of their own accord, increase the quantity at great outlay with the view to sell at the lowest price; and, when the people complain that they do as all monopolists ever have done, you have a Secretary at War who tells them to be silent, to say nothing, and that all will be well—to leave them alone, and there will be no cause to complain. (Hear, hear.) Why, he (Mr. Villiers) told him that this experiment of leaving them alone had been made: it was made from 1831 to 1838, when nobody disturbed them; they were fully trusted, and we know the result. In the month of March, 1838, he brought this motion forward, and he was little encouraged either in or out of the House to do so. He was told that he had better leave it alone—it did no good; he referred to this in his speech, and he said then, "I make this observation somewhat in anticipation of that reproach usually offered to those who incur the odium of meddling with this matter—that it is introduced at an unreasonable time—that there is no excitement on the subject—that the country is in a healthy state, and that it is mischievous to moot the subject at all: reasoning which, if I comprehend, I cannot admit. I do not understand the morality or the wisdom which would postpone the consideration of a difficult question, till we are precluded from entering upon it with calmness and caution. And, with regard to the want of excitement which appears necessary to procure interest and attention for this subject, I cannot help surmising that the day is not far distant when there may be more excitement attaching to it than may be convenient to those who now complain of its absence; for I cannot admit that exceeding healthiness of the country which is urged by some as conclusive against the discussion of this matter. When I look around and observe the numbers that are now dependent on the public relief for existence; when I see a commission now commencing its inquiry into the cause of the distress pervading six or seven hundred thousand of our fellow-subjects; when I see that funds are being raised to assist our fellow-subjects to emigrate from their country; I cannot help thinking there is some great fault in our economical arrangements." (On this occasion Sir Wm. Molesworth, then member for Leeds, seconded the motion, and he said, "Great improvements have taken place in agriculture in Ireland. Those improvements, together with abundant harvests, have produced, to a certain extent, nearly the same effect, in extending the field of production, as if the Corn Law had been repealed; hurtful competition has in some degree abated; wages and profits have risen; and the people have been more contented and peaceable. But this effect is only of a temporary kind—population and capital will again grow up to the field of employment; hurtful competition will again take place; wages and profits will fall; and the bulk of the community will be discontented and uneasy, unless the field of employment again increase in proportion to the addition to capital and population. Repeal the Corn Law; new markets will be created. With our perpetually increasing and inexhaustible means of purchase, our importations of food from other countries might go on increasing." This was said in 1838, and in about six months afterwards said they had the melancholy satisfaction of seeing all that they had the melancholy satisfaction of seeing all that they had foretold verified. (Hear, hear, hear.) He remembered that he was at Lambeth at the time when the accounts came of the bad harvest in this country; and he was astonished to hear the confidence with which the distress we should have to experience was spoken of there; they had the account of all the grain then in the Baltic they had the account of all the grain then in the Baltic, and it was unusually small; and the price did, as ports, and it was unusually small; and the price did, as they said it would, rise enormously as soon as they were informed of our harvest. There was but one feeling then, that this arose from not allowing the grower in Europe to look to England as a market. He knew of nothing that had altered the prospect of affairs since; and even the misery and suffering which had been seen to follow from our bad harvests had apparently made no impression upon gentlemen opposite. (Hear.) How long would they go on in this perilous course? It surely could not be contended that we were in a healthy state at this moment. There was a bill before the House, forced upon it by the reports officially made of the extreme dearth in parts of Scotland—a bill to afford public relief upon a larger scale. (Hear.) A report had been laid upon a table, also, respecting Ireland, in which a most frightful picture had been drawn of the state of a large portion of that people. Surely there was distress enough to call for a case for further legislation in the direction pointed out by the Government, as being conducive to the employment of the people, and the diminution of crime and pauperism. (Hear.) Will anybody pretend that to restrict supply of food which comes to them from customer for British industry can be a mode of benefiting those who want custom for labour, and are without food? (Hear, hear.) Surely it is a natural right for the people of this or of any country to have the freest access to the means of subsistence which honest industry can offer to them. (Hear.) Sooner or later that must be conceded. (Hear.) Why delay it? (Hear.) Was it that he asked too much? How could that be said, when two measures in different degrees of moderation had been received with as little favour as any motion that he ever had made. (Hear.) The noble lord proposed a fixed duty: he did so to meet the scruples of those who might object to this measure. How was he treated? (Hear.) The member for Gateshead asked you to add to the stock here by a little grain from the antipodes. He was told that he ought to deal with the general question. Well, here was the general question. How are you going to deal with it? (Hear.) Your experience recommends you strongly to abolish the law. Your recommendation is a reduction of price here; yet how had that operated? You expected that corn would be at 56s.; it has been at 45s. You say every advantage has followed from this circumstance, even in the agricultural districts. (Hear, hear.) You say that our consumption is 20 millions of quarters, and you tell us that 10s. a quarter has been saved upon it. Well, that is ten millions sterling paid less out of the general means for one article, and has of course left so much more to be expended on the consumption of other articles the result of British industry. (Hear.) How would it have been otherwise than an additional blessing, had the price been reduced sufficiently as to cause another ten millions to be saved? (Hear.) The whole financial policy of the hon. gentleman is founded, if I understand it, on the ground of lowering the cost of living; he expects that we shall not feel additional taxation, if provisions essential to life are cheap. (Hear.) Considering what the taxes are in this country, how is it possible that the cost of living can be too low? (Hear, hear.) A short time since the right hon. gentleman was horrified at being informed that a body of great men in the north had combined to raise the price of an essential to the poor man's comfort, by making the article scarce. (Hear.) He reproved them publicly in the House; he called upon them, as good citizens, to cease to employ such unhallowed means for the oppression of the poor. This he said with respect to coal. How was it that he did not apply this to corn? (Hear, hear.) The poor could procure fire without coal more easily than they could get nourishment without corn? (Hear, hear.) He would only add one word more, which was as to the appropriateness of the moment at which he made the proposition: it was rendered so peculiarly by the lowness of the price. (Hear.) He had been astonished that the Home Secretary the other night—so shrewd a reasoner in this matter—should have supposed that, when the price was low in this country, the landlord wanted high protection most; why, it was the time when he wanted it least, for the price itself made the market so much worse for the foreigner that the slightest addition to the difficulty of bringing the grain so far was felt. It was therefore precisely at such a time that such a duty as 4s. would operate: it might keep out all American grain just by that amount, if the price here was very low (hear); but when the price was very high, the duty might be double that amount, and the community here would not be worse off. It was the difference of price here and abroad that determined the operation of a duty (hear): when the price here was low, this country was more on a level with foreign countries, and then the distance was a great protection. (Hear.) Now, if the law was changed, the price might fall a little here and rise a little abroad, and there would be but little come in; and at present there was but little wanted. (Hear.) He would now say no more. He would not conclude by any appeal to the interest supposed to be favoured by this law, and who preponderate in the House so greatly. (Hear.) Everything had been addressed to them by able men that could touch their feelings of honour, honesty, justice, prudence, and humanity; and, if that was still unavailing, he was sure that he could add nothing that would have more effect. He would only say, that, if they resisted all concession now, he should regret it more than he had done at any other time, because never had the time been so fitting for the change, or would they appear in future to have been ever so wrong in refusing it. (Cheers.)

Mr. OSWALD, one of the members for Glasgow, seconded the motion of Mr. Villiers, in a short speech; and then Sir James Graham, who had been busy taking notes, and who rose to reply, was intercepted by

Mr. CHRISTOPHER, well known as one of the representatives of North Lincolnshire, but whose change of name somewhat interferes with our recollection of his identity. He is of the famous Dundas family, which contrived to accumulate so many official honours and emoluments as to afford a standing target for the sarcasms of southerners against the "cannibals" Scots—being grandson of Lord President Dundas, the brother of the first Lord Melville. He changed his name to Christopher, in compliance with a will by which he inherited great property. Our readers may recollect that at the beginning of 1842, just before Parliament met, at a meeting of his constituents in Lincolnshire, he made some statements which were instantly taken up as a "pilot balloon," preparatory to the change of the old sliding scale for the new one. Mr. Christopher has P.R.S. appended to his name; but it is no injustice to his scientific acquirements to intimate that, though he took the lead in speaking against the motion of Mr. Villiers, he really not only said nothing, but less than nothing. The gist of his argument was this: the landlords are nailed to their land, and must grow corn, whether they will or no; but a manufacturer, after realising enormous profits in times of prosperity, can evade any time of adversity by locking his mill, and putting the key in his pocket! This comes of getting estates like Blaxham-hall, on the simple condition of changing one's name. Had Mr. Christopher received a mill full of delicates and complex machinery on the simple condition of paying attention to it, and had any tangle or fibre of the agricultural mind advised him to lock the door and put the key in his pocket, doubtless his rather saturnine countenance would have taken a blacker hue.

Mr. MITCHELL, one of the members for Bridport, then rose; and, as he happens to be a speculator in foreign corn, he gave the House information of a practical nature, which told exceedingly well. Whenever the country suffered from a bad harvest, the manufacturers were frequently unable to meet their bills; and so, to protect themselves from such losses, his firm engaged in the corn trade, as a "hedge" to their other business. The country did not grow enough of corn for its population—that was an indisputable fact; and therefore somebody must import foreign corn. Under the Corn Law of 1842 the corn trade was confined to London; and of course the corn-traders of London were all in favour of the existing law. But how did it work? This Mr. Mitchell showed; and the importance of his statements were not owing to the fact of their novelty, but because they were urged with much point and effect by one engaged in the trade, and who was, therefore, practically acquainted with what he was stating. Bad harvest; sudden rise of price; drain of bullion; screw turned by the Bank of England; trade crippled; and a few lucky speculators in foreign grain enabled to realize immense fortunes at the expense of the entire community. The sliding scale drove us to the nearest and the dearest markets, and shut us out from the natural market of the United States; and it so happened that at the present moment there is a very short supply on the continent of Europe, so that, if we happened to have a late and deficient harvest, and required large importations, the sudden demand would suddenly elevate prices, cause a drain of bullion, and, in the present state of our railroad speculations, derange the money market, and convulse all commerce and trade. Well did Mr. Mitchell show, that to keep this great country dependent on such a state of things was as disgraceful as it was ludicrous. He ridiculed, too, the idea of corn being brought from the Continent at the absurdly low prices at which the fears, the ignorance, or the knavery of "farmers' friends" pretend it can be. Here was a practical man declaring that he could not ship and bring over grain to this country at a lower average charge than 12s. or 15s. per quarter—a sufficiently high protection in itself; while he showed, from the case of flax, how futile was the pretence by which the sliding scale was sustained. Altogether, the speech of Mr. Mitchell was very effective, and made a marked impression on the House.

Mr. BUCK, one of the members for North Devon, then spoke on behalf of the protectionists, urging nothing but the stock arguments; and Mr. Mark Philips, in a neat speech, took up the foolish averment of Mr. Christopher, as to locking mills and putting keys in pockets; and, as he is a landowner as well as a manufacturer, his position enabled him to give a calm and practical turn to the debate. Following him

Sir James Graham rose, and his speech was eagerly waited for and watched, in the hope on the one side, and the fear on the other, that he would make some new declaration in favour of Free Trade. Nor did he disappoint expectation.

"He would not shrink from again repeating all those principles which, on former occasions, he had avowed. (Hear, hear.) It was decidedly his opinion that the prosperity of agriculture must always depend on the other branches of the native industry of this country (hear,)—and that the public prosperity would be best promoted by giving a free and uninterrupted current to the natural flow of national industry. (Hear, hear.) He would go farther, and would say that it was his opinion that, by safe, gradual, and cautious measures, it was expedient to bring our laws respecting agriculture into a nearer relation to the sound principles which regulated our commercial policy with respect to other matters. (Loud cheers from the Opposition benches.) He might go still farther, and tell the landlords and farmers of this country that their prosperity would depend upon the wealth, comfort, and ease of the main body of the people."

Having made these admissions, the right hon. baronet proceeded to contend against any sudden alteration in the protective policy hitherto pursued by Parliament and the present Government. He urged that it was a delusion to hold out the expectation to the people of this country that by a repeal of the Corn Laws they would, in a series of years, be gainers in the price of food, or, as bearing on their interests, that they would gain any advantage. He admitted, however, that the rate of wages did not depend on the price of food:—

"He thought it had been truly observed by the hon. member for Bridport, who had addressed the House with great ability, that the price of bread had very little to do in any particular year with the rate of wages. He admitted that the greatest authority on this subject—he meant Mr. Locke—had said that in a long series of years the price of corn would materially affect the rate of wages, but in a short period of time the price of bread could not be said to rule the rate of wages. The rate of wages was decided, like every other commodity, by the demand for it and the supply; and the supply of labour had a tendency constantly to outstrip the demand. (Hear, hear.)"

He next dwelt on the artificial state of society, which, with other considerations, required the utmost caution in dealing with so great a source of employment as agriculture. He combated the doctrine that under the present system improvement in agriculture had not taken place:—

"He believed that it was an indisputable fact that, notwithstanding the population of this country had nearly doubled within the last half century, the supply of food at this moment was more easily obtained in Great Britain and Ireland for the double population than it was formerly. (Hear.) He could speak from personal knowledge of the immediate neighbourhood and county with which he was connected. Within his memory that county, which thirty years ago did not produce sufficient food for the maintenance of its inhabitants, by enclosures, improvements, and successful industry, was now a county which exported largely in aid of the manufacturing population."

The hon. baronet glanced at the question of peculiar burdens on land, but neither admitted nor denied the existence of any such. He agreed with Mr. Villiers that an abundant supply was all-important:—

"The hon. member for Wolverhampton said truly, that an abundant supply of food, after all, was the matter of primary legislative importance. He (Sir James Graham) admitted that, and the point at issue was, what system of law would in a series of years give, with the greatest certainty, this abundant supply of food to this large population. If the hon. gentleman could show him that upon the whole, in a series of years, Free Trade and open ports would most certainly secure that object, all other considerations, looking at the amount of population of this country, would be secondary. (Cheers from the Opposition benches.) If such proof was adduced it would make him a decided convert to the doctrine of Free Trade. (Renewed cheers.) He did not attach any importance whatever to the offer of a protecting duty of 4s. (Hear, hear.) He thought by such a proposition they would still incur all the obloquy that could be heaped upon them as protectionists (hear, hear, hear); and the question therefore was, would they adhere to the present scheme of protection, or adopt a perfectly Free Trade. (Cheers from the Opposition benches.)"

If, as Mr. Tooke had stated, two millions of quarters could be annually imported at 45s., this would displace one-eighth of the quantity grown at home in ordinary years, would compel the conversion of heavy clay soils now growing wheat into grass lands, and would thus be the cause of the displacement of much manual labour:—

"He was, therefore, opposed to such a sudden alteration of the existing system, for he anticipated that if it were carried it would be found to produce the most disastrous consequences to those who sat on the opposite side, as well as that side of the House—disastrous consequences immediately to agriculture, and indirectly to the manufacturing interest—it would injure the home market, and be equally pernicious, if not fatal, to the agricultural and the manufacturing interests. (Cheers from the Ministerial benches.)"

Mr. BRIGHT said, that, from recent discussions both in that House and elsewhere, he could form but one conclusion as to the probability of the maintenance of protection. (Hear, hear.) To the first portion of the right honourable gentleman's speech he gave his cordial assent; but he was at a loss to know whether, as a whole, it was intended to afford hope to his (Mr. Bright's) side of the House, or consolation to the other. (Laughter.) He appeared, during the delivery of his speech, to have been endeavouring to say one thing at one part of it, and to unsay it at another part; so that it would have been impossible for any member of that House, if he were not acquainted with the right hon. baronet's opinions from former speeches and previous passages in his life, to ascertain to which side of the question he was most inclined to lean. (Laughter and cheers.) He said that the change in the Corn Laws ought to be gradual and easy—that they ought gradually to diminish protection, and advance towards Free Trade by bringing corn into a nearer relation with other articles which the Government had already interfered with; and after that he proceeded to show that, if there were any further alterations made, it ought to be an entire repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) He showed with great force that the opinions of the noble lord the member for London were utterly untenable, and he would have said aloud, but that, from the noble lord's ability and character as a statesman, it was impossible he could apply that term with propriety to any opinion of the noble lord. The right hon. baronet, however, demonstrated that there existed no arguments in favour of a fixed duty; so that, having repudiated a fixed duty and demonstrated that the next change in the Corn Laws should be repeal, he then fell back upon the fallacies of some of the supporters of the Government in that House (with which fallacies the right hon. baronet notoriously did not agree); and he went on to speak as if he really thought that the statement of placing this country in dependence on foreigners for corn ought to have any weight in the discussions on this question. (Laughter.) There was a note of exclamation from the side of the House at which he (Mr. Bright) sat, when the right hon. baronet referred to that argument, for they supposed that they would never have heard such an argument at this time of day, and from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who had such long experience in Parliamentary life. (Cheers.) They were astonished when they heard such an argument brought forward by a member of a Government whose policy had been characterized by many advances towards Free Trade, and whose principles were avowedly based on a gradual and steady approach towards that consummation. (Cheers.) The right honourable baronet, when he stated that they ought not to suddenly shock the agricultural interest, reminded him (Mr. Bright) of something which he had seen in that excellent paper, Punch. It was an advice from an old lady to a young lady who had been recently married, and it recommended the young lady, in order to obtain a complete mastery over her husband, to cultivate her nerves. (Laughter.) It appeared that the right hon. baronet took a similar view of this question to that which the old lady entertained. He encouraged the agriculturists to be sensitive, to be shrinking, in fact, to cultivate great tenderness of the nerves, and then he used that sensibility as an argument against the advocates of free trade in corn, and stated, that in consequence of it the present system of Corn Laws was not to be touched, although it starved thousands of the population of the country. ("Hear, hear," and loud cheers.) The right hon. baronet had asked the advocates of Free Trade—what House for some proof that Free Trade would give more food to the people; and he said that he felt with great force the responsibility of the question, whether he, as a Minister of the Crown, was to be in existence, and which restricted the supply of food to a population which was increasing at the rate of 400,000 every year. Did the right hon. baronet want any proof to convince him that the true source of a certain and unfailing and abundant supply in the article of corn was to permit the laws of nature to take their course with respect to it, and to repeal at once those restrictive laws which ignorant men had made in direct contradiction to the laws of nature? (Hear, hear.) If the right hon. baronet did not know that, then he must have studied the condition of this nation to little purpose indeed. (Hear, hear.) How were the people of this great city fed? Here was a population of two millions, and during the last few weeks there was an addition of a hundred thousand or more persons to it, and all those individuals were supplied with provisions every day without the intervention of a Secretary of State, and without inconvenience or uncertainty. (Hear, hear.) In the street in which he lived he was delighted every day with the song of a lark, which sung as if it were not in a cage, and a boy every day, for a halfpenny, brought that lark a piece of green turf: thus on the principle of supply and demand was that bird supplied with an article so essential to its comfort; and that was the principle on which the monarch in the palace was supplied—on which the highest and the lowest received their supplies (cheers)—and they might rest assured that there was no principle of supply so secure as that which was allowed to regulate itself by the wants of the community. (Loud cheers.) The right hon. baronet said that if our ports were opened he thought there would be a larger quantity of corn imported than had been estimated by Mr. Tooke; and yet he immediately afterwards asked, where was the security of a larger supply in years of deficiency? Was he not aware that, in all those articles of consumption which we required, and which were not protected, though the produce of other countries, there was usually a good stock on hand? Corn was the produce of most countries; and how could he suppose such a deficiency when we were enabled to have a stock on hand of commodities, some of which were almost entirely the produce of one country, such as cotton. (Hear, hear.) There was more than six months' stock of cotton in Liverpool, although it was chiefly produced in the United States; and there was a similarly large stock of everything which we required which the unhallowed finger of protection had not touched. (Cheers.) Of all the articles which were not protected we had a large supply, and our experience on that head formed a conclusive argument as regarded the fears of the right honourable baronet (hear, hear, hear)—an argument which was a thousand times more conclusive than the prophecies of the right hon. baronet as to the dreadful effects which might be expected to follow the abolition of the monopoly in corn. The right hon. baronet spoke of the results of a panic, and persons being thrown out of employment, until he (Mr. Bright) had begun almost to think that times were changed, and that the right hon. baronet was sitting on the Opposition side of the House, and was striving, as of old, to get to the Ministerial benches. (A laugh.) He spoke as if he believed that, in consequence of the abolition of the Corn Laws, there would be a suspension of labour. Did the right hon. baronet know that the whole number of persons who were engaged in producing the 2,000,000 quarters of corn, which he spoke of, was not as great as the number of persons who were thrown out of employment probably in one town in this country by the state of things caused by this monopoly (hear), like Sheffield, Leeds, or Stockport? But he was certain he could name two towns at least in which a number of the population were thrown out of employment in 1841 and 1842 greater than the whole number of individuals who were directly employed in producing 2,000,000 quarters of corn. They could not find 25,000 persons in any part of England employed directly in the cultivation of 2,000,000 quarters of wheat, and yet that number of persons had been thrown out of employment in one or two towns in 1841. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. baronet talked of the improvement of agriculture, as the source of our future supply; every one knew that improvement had been going on, but was it such an improvement as would go faster than an increase in the population of 380,000 every year? (Cheers.) If it were not, then, should we be in a better position in a few years, through any effect of that improvement, than we are in at present (hear, hear), when it was notorious that there were three or four millions of persons in Great Britain and Ireland who had not the means of obtaining bread as a common article of food? (Hear, hear.) With respect to the argument of the right honourable baronet founded on the assumption that an abolition of the Corn Law would make us dependent on foreigners, he did not feel it necessary to follow it; and he alluded to that portion of his speech, because it exhibited the right honourable baronet in the most extraordinary position in which he could be placed, holding Free-Trade opinions, and defending Corn Laws like these. (Loud cheers and laughter.) The right honourable member for Newark had stated last year that the price of corn was steady under the present law, and on that ground he defended the law. Well, it was steady for the last twelve months, and the parties for whose protection it had been established were disappointed. As regarded the steadiness of prices under this law, the prices of wheat were more steady, and for a longer period, in 1833 and 1834, under the former law, whilst the right honourable baronet had admitted that the existing law had not yet been tested by a bad harvest, which was the test of legislation on the subject of corn. He expected that the motion of his honourable friend the member for Wolverhampton would have been resisted by the Government, not on grounds of principle, but on the ground that it was not expedient to take such a step at once; that it would be better to advance only in such a degree as the country might be found prepared for; and, when a member of the Government came to address them, he anticipated that he would have addressed himself a good deal to his supporters, the agricultural members at the lower part of the House, in order, as was very desirable, to break their fall. (Laughter.) As the right honourable baronet had not taken that course, perhaps he (Mr. Bright) would be permitted to address a few words to the gentlemen who represented the agricultural interest in that house. (Laughter.) Though the speeches of the honourable member for Lincolnshire and Lincolnshire had been very good, he had begun to think, had he not been so much interested in the results which would be produced by the repeal of the Corn Laws, that he would have applied himself mainly to the results which he (Mr. Bright) had had with persons connected with agriculture, members of that House, he found that they were rather willing to receive any arguments which went to show them that their fears had been greatly exaggerated. He would ask them, was not the article of wheat in its nature the same as any other article of consumption and commerce, such as tobacco and cotton? (Hear, hear.) Would not the same rules apply to wheat as regarded competition which applied to other articles of agricultural produce? The Legislature had already admitted a large number of articles into this country which competed with agricultural produce, and the result was, that the agriculturists had not suffered evil, but obtained good from those changes. Take bark, for example. It appeared, by a report presented to that House, that during the last ten years the importation of bark had been 7,130,626 cwt., and yet, he would ask, had any grower of timber in this country suffered in consequence, by finding a difficulty in disposing of his bark (hear), or had it varied in its price more than other articles? Then hides were another description of import which was permitted by the Legislature; and the imports of foreign hides for the last ten years were 3,811,759 cwt., notwithstanding which the graziers and butchers found no difficulty in disposing of their hides. Suppose that a contrary system had prevailed for the last ten years, and that foreign hides were not allowed to be imported to this market, how were the people of this country to be supplied? They might be independent of foreigners in that case for their supply of hides, but they would also be independent of boots and shoes. (Laughter.) It was by carrying the principle of protection to its full extent that its advocates could bear so how untenable it was. That was the way in which to judge whether the advocates of Free Trade or Protection were in the right, and he was satisfied to abide by such a trial. The next article he would mention which was admitted by the Legislature, and which might be supposed to interfere with agricultural produce, was tallow; and he found that in the period which he had mentioned the quantity of tallow imported into this country was 12,054,257 cwt., all of which came into the country without any injury to the agricultural interest. The import of foreign flax in the last ten years was 12,057,286 cwt., and of wool 490,545,447 lbs., notwithstanding which the price of wool had been very fairly remunerative to the wool-growers of this country during that period, in fact, better than that given to the growers of wheat. The next articles to which he came were silk and cotton, which, though not articles of home agricultural produce, might be supposed to interfere with the growers of wool; and the importation of those articles in the same period was, of silk 52,839,571 lbs., and of cotton 4,300,721,655 lbs. Who could suppose, in 1810, when the importation of cotton was only about 90,000 000 of pounds, that within so short a period as had since elapsed it would have arrived to such an amount, that its consumption would be doubled and tripled within that period, and yet that the grower of English wool has not suffered from the competition to which he has thereby been exposed? The next article which came into competition with agricultural produce, and to which he would refer them, was rice—an article which would be admitted to enter into that competition, inasmuch as a rice pudding might fill the place of a bread pudding; and the amount of rice imported in the last ten years was 1,694,817 cwt. in a clean state, and 1,418,407 bushels with the husks. Of other articles within the same period, the importation was—clover-seed, 971,382 cwt.; rye, 207,107 quarters; beans and peas, 1,821,143 quarters; barley, 2,011,602 quarters; oats, 2,376,343 quarters; wheat, 12,390,991 quarters; flour, 5,317,815 cwt.; grain of all kinds, being thus upward of 19,000,000 quarters; of butter, 2,070,696 cwt.; cheese, 1,939,568 cwt. That was the amount of importation on articles which affected the agricultural interest, and it did not appear that it had produced the slightest injury to them. (Hear, hear.) The honourable member for Lincolnshire talked of a famine price, and stated that there had not been a famine price in the country during the last 25 years. He could tell the honourable member that they had had famine prices, and these laws were relaxed when it was feared that they were stretched so much that they would break with any greater tension. The honourable member, and other members of that House, might not, perhaps, know of a famine price, but to the poor man there was in this country still periodically a famine and a starvation price of corn, as if God had visited the earth with sterility, and that this country had been afflicted with one of those terrible disasters which they read of as having taken place hundreds of years ago. But it was not a famine of that nature,—the famine was caused by that House by legislation, and it was high time that the extraordinary imposition which caused it should come to an end. (Loud cheers.) The country now regarded it as such, for he and those who acted with him had not travelled through every county, and most of the towns of England, without constantly exposing it (renewed cheers), and as long as it continued there would be found to exist a soreness on the subject, a "foulness of breath," as Dr. Chalmers termed it, a non-acquiescence in the system, and a desire to have it abolished. There was no reason why the agriculturists should be afraid that evil consequences would arise to them from the importation of wheat, any more than from the importation of the other articles which he had named. (Hear.) If during the years 1838 to 1842 the price of 6s. a quarter was not able to cause a larger annual importation than 2,250,000 quarters of corn, how could 45s. or 50s. produce such an importation as they appeared to dread? He would not go into the question of the import of cattle and lamb, but he might say that there was a feeling in the country, that with respect to the subject of grease and butter, which had been lately discussed in that House, the magnanimous gentry and aristocracy had stooped somewhat in seeking to maintain protection on those articles; but the question of protection now was one of time, and he was willing to score off the whole of the speech of the right hon. baronet opposite after that part which contained his allusion to Free Trade. The right hon. baronet admitted that the principle of Free Trade was the keystone of the policy of his right honourable friend at the head of the Government. (Cheers.) He (Mr. Bright) hoped that the agricultural members would remember that statement, and ponder on it, and that they would not tell the farmers that they could resist the principles of Free Trade, for they (the agricultural members) were altogether in the hands of the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government, and what he said must be law, for they had no power to prevent it. (Laughter.) The right hon. baronet was from day to day doing something to break down the system of protection; and there was a very large and influential party in the country strongly opposed to it, who would not relax their exertions. (Cheers.) They were active, as hon. members opposite knew—they were honest, as he (Mr. Bright) knew—and they would do every thing in their power to break down a system which was so injurious to the industry of this country. The opponents of protection were determined to continue their exertions. They began with collecting £5000, they then got £7000, last year they had collected more than £100,000; the people of Lancashire and Cheshire and Yorkshire were called on to adopt a means that would give them great influence in the return of members of Parliament, by increasing the county register, and in this way about £250,000 had been expended in the purchase of qualifications in the space of three or four months. He did not give this upon his own authority, but he would suggest to gentlemen to ask publicly, or privately, the gentlemen who had been last elected for South Lancashire, what prospects he had, with his present principles, of again representing that county. There were other counties on the list to which the attention of the League would soon be turned. They had put out a project for holding what is called a Bazaar, for want of a better name, for it did not exactly describe the exhibition. Many gentlemen opposite had visited it, and if any of them would give the House a short detail of what he saw there, he thought it would be a very good Anti-Corn Law speech. The amount of money taken at the door and from sales was more than £20,000. The amount of money subscriptions sent in, almost without solicitation, was between £4000 and £5000, and the amount of material left—valuable stock—made the whole contribution approach the sum of £30,000. Many persons had seen bazaars held under the auspices of duchesses, countesses, and patronesses of high rank; but they had never heard of one-tenth of that sum being collected. And this was a middle-class Bazaar, supported by persons into whose hearts Free Trade principles had sunk, and became a very religious question. (Cries of "Oh, oh.") There was a passage in the Mahometan bible which he recollected reading—the Koran—in which the man whom the world regards as an impostor laid it down as a maxim that "one hour of justice is worth seventy days of prayer." It would be well for those who ought to be familiar with the Christian maxim of doing unto others as they would be done by, to abstain from depriving the poor of food in order to put money into their own pockets. It would be better for them to endeavour to make their opinions intelligible to the country, than object to the statement he had made. He was speaking of the Bazaar and Exhibition, and was about to say that there were ladies at it, many of whom, when at home, lived just as sumptuously, just as independently, and just as respectably in every way, as the bulk of those gentlemen whom he saw opposite; and yet so firmly were they persuaded of the truth of the principles which the League held, and which the gentlemen opposite affected, but did not dare, to despise, that they came up to this metropolis, and for three weeks performed the arduous duty—for it was an arduous duty—of attending at the Exhibition and Bazaar. It was easy to sneer at these things, but there was one member opposite who would not sneer at them, and that was the right hon. baronet who led their party. He knew better than to sneer at the opinions of a vast body of the middle classes. He might not feel it right, with the responsibilities of his office, to do exactly that which he (Mr. Bright) or others wished; but coming from that county from which he derived his birth, and knowing the feelings, the wants, and the condition of the middle classes, he would be the last man to sneer at the efforts they were making for the abolition of this law. An honourable member opposite had lately given to the world a book in which he represented the monarch of this country as reigning over two nations—the rich and the poor; and there was a deal of truth in that. Others talked of the widening of the gulf which separates the very rich and the very poor. The Corn Law created nothing, it blighted almost every thing. There was an abundance of capital, of labour, and of material in this country; but there wanted an honest distribution of it, and that honest distribution could only be given upon those just, true, and immutable principles which the great Creator had given for the regulation of the ordinary affairs of life. He knew that on going to a division his party would be in a minority; but he also knew that minorities in that House often became majorities; but if a man advocated a sound principle, and knew that millions out of doors supported it, let him not be deterred because the teller gave a majority against it, instead of in its favour. They had seen good principles growing and strengthening until everybody supported them, and bad principles fading away, and those who formerly adhered to them ashamed to recal them. If they wanted this law to be maintained, if it were resolved to continue a system so barbarous and unjust, their ancestors should have prevented Caxton from erecting his press in Westminster Abbey, they themselves should place an interdict upon the labours of William and Robert Chambers, proscribe Knight's Weekly Volume, and put down all newspapers, and, above all, put a stop to those locomotive engines which came up from Manchester to the metropolis in four hours and a half.

Mr. Stafford O'Brien followed Mr. Bright, and confessed that he had visited the Anti-Corn Law League Bazaar held at Covent-garden Theatre, and had felt constrained to do homage to the skill, ingenuity, and industry of his fellow-countrymen, of which he saw there such accumulated and substantial evidence. After him came Dr. Bowring, Mr. G. H. Cavendish, and Lord Ebrington—all in support of the motion of Mr. Villiers; and, as no one on the agricultural side ventured to get up, a loud cry arose for a division. As the gallery was clearing, Mr. Conden rose, the SPEAKER called "Order, order," the "strangers" resumed their seats, and the hon. and busy in the House instantly subsided into a dead calm. The member for Stockport, always efficient, did not appoint his audience now. Ranning rapidly through Mr. James Graham's arguments, he combated them all; and the concluding portion of his speech was very telling. They were charged with maintaining in seeking to abolish the Corn Law during the present period of distress, and comparative prosperity; but on that the House the change he retorted the charge, and on the Government and their followers he cast the responsibility of whatever might hereafter happen from the present absurd and anomalous state of our law.

Mr. CORDEN rose, and said he should detain the House but a short time, but he was anxious to make a few remarks, in order to recal the attention of the House to the subject really before it, and to remind the House, and probably the country, that the question mooted by his hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton had not been met, but systematically evaded. The question was not as to met, but systematically evaded. The question was not as to the comparative cheapness or dearness of corn—it had nothing to do with the tariff—it had nothing to do with agricultural or manufacturing prosperity. The question was simply whether it was just to impose a law to restrict the supply of food. That question had not been met. He said more—it never would be met. (Cheers.) It was an argument that could not be answered, either there or elsewhere. Was there truth in the proposition of his honourable friend, that we had a law restricting and diminishing the supply of food? He asked, if the Corn Law was not to effect that, what was its purpose? Would any agricultural member say, that the country did not forget—that their former pleas for protection, on the ground of exclusive burdens, admitted that protection raised prices; and how could prices be raised but by restricting and diminishing the supply? But it was asked what proof there was that in this country the law restricted the supply of food—that the people were insufficiently fed? Would any agricultural member say, that in the county from which he came, in the south of England, the labouring classes and their families were sufficiently and wholesomely fed? If the hon. member for Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, or Somersetshire would pledge his honour that in the county which he represented, as a general rule, the labouring classes and their families were sufficiently and wholesomely fed, he (Mr. Cobden) would give up the whole of his hon. friend's proposition. It was argued by the right hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department, that the people of this country were now in a sound and satisfactory state of prosperity. He (Mr. Cobden) denied that altogether. He said that the great mass of the labouring classes were in a condition which permanently was one disgraceful to the Government of the country; and the House happened at that moment to be inundated with proofs from commissioners and authorities describing the degraded state of the people. Look at Ireland: gentlemen talked of Ireland as if it was not an integral part of the empire; and when he mentioned that there were five millions of people in Ireland who never touched wheaten bread but as a luxury, he was answered, "Oh, if you come to Ireland!" But still Ireland was a component part of the empire, and there, as well as in England, the Corn Law restricted the supply of food. When three-fourths of the people were living upon roots, that was owing to the prohibitory law. Look at Scotland: the commissioners stated that in the Highlands the condition of the people was almost as degraded as in Ireland. There was also a report from the midland counties, where the people were employed in the hosiery trade, not a small district he observed, a district 70 miles by 60, and where the net wages earned in frame-work knitting were 7s. a week. That was not the result of political economy. Such a state of things was produced under their blessed system of protection—that system of which they boasted. Such a state of things was produced under the operation of those laws which they so benevolently and considerately passed for feeding the people of this country. (Hear, hear.) The system of protection had produced nothing but misery to the labouring population of this country, and until it was removed misery would continue to be their inheritance. (Hear.) He would meet the opponents of the motion with this simple proposition—they could not benefit the condition of the mass of the people of this country but by the admission of more food. (Hear.) He did not talk of prices—he did not care about prices, and he wished the word "price" was not mentioned in that House; but he would repeat it, that unless a greater quantity of food were introduced into this country the condition of the mass of the people could not be benefited. (Hear, hear, hear.) What the people of this country were in want of was more of wholesome nourishment. He cared not whether that nourishment came from foreign countries, or was procured at home—he cared not from what source it was procured; but, unless the quantity of food for the supply of the country's wants were augmented greatly beyond what that quantity at present amounted to, all other devices—all the increase which they might be able to effect of the poor's rate—all the shiftings and changings of their plans and expedients could not have the effect of permanently raising the condition of the mass of the people. (Hear, hear.) He cared not if they doubled the income of every individual in this country, from the Queen herself down to the meanest beggar in the land; all this might take place—but the condition of the people, relatively speaking, would be no better than it was at present if they did not introduce at the same time a greater quantity of food. (Hear, hear.) And how was this additional food to be obtained—whence was it to come? That was a point on which parties and individuals in that House, as well as out of it, very widely differed. They (the protectionists) said that this additional food was to be procured by improvements in agriculture, consequent upon the maintenance and permanence of protection. (Hear, hear.) But had they not already tried that expedient for thirty years (hear, hear)? and was not the present condition of the people of this country the result of a thirty years' experiment? (Hear, hear.) Was that result not yet sufficiently deplorable to shake the faith of hon. gentlemen in their favourite expedient of protection? (Hear, hear.) If they had not strong grounds indeed—and what were they?—to resist the simple and straightforward proposition of the Free-Traders, why should they not now try the plan which that proposition embodied? (Hear.) They had failed in their own expedient, and they were compelled to admit it, and it was now high time—for the sake of the people, to say nothing of the comfort and welfare of the country—that they should try the plan which the Free Trade party proposed to them, and which they had hitherto so obstinately slighted. In reference to this question the House was favoured with a great many and very confident prophecies. The speech of the right honourable gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department was altogether an argument in the future tense.

The right honourable gentleman said that if they admitted 2,000,000 quarters of corn, this, that, and the other thing might follow. But he would say, let in these 2,000,000 of quarters, admit into the country the full quantity of wheat which it would consume, secure to the people their fair and proper supply of food, and he was confident that no consequence would follow which might alarm even the most timorous; at any rate, the country would not, and could not, be in a worse state than that in which it was under the present system. (Hear, hear, hear.) They had heard that evening, as well as on former occasions, a great deal about panic. But, as regarded panic, do not let that be used as an argument to him. Both he and his honourable friends around him had done their best to dissipate that alarm. They never told the farmers that they had anything to fear from Free Trade, or from the commercial changes which they sought to introduce. If there was alarm in the minds of the farmers, it was to those sitting upon the opposite benches that their fears were to be attributed. (Hear, hear, hear.) They had predicted that farmers without protection could not carry on their business, and that, deprived of that protection, land would be thrown out of cultivation. The right honourable gentleman the Home Secretary spoke of clay lands being thrown out of cultivation, but he (Mr. Cobden) maintained that, if heavy clay land was drained, it was the very description of land which, for wheat culture, of all others ran the least danger of successful competition. (Hear, hear.) Tired of their old, the protectionists had now taken up with a new story. The old story was, that, if they passed laws establishing Free Trade, they would throw the lighter soils—the sandy and chalky soils—out of cultivation. (Hear.) That argument the Free-Trade party had met. He had recently seen an eminent agricultural gentleman from the south, who told him that the farmers upon poor soils could not now cultivate their land unless a free trade were established in the inferior kinds of grain used in the rearing of cattle. (Hear, hear.) As to land, especially good land, being thrown out of cultivation, he would venture to offer an opinion, without wishing it to be taken as an argument, that land of every quality would be better cultivated if the Free-Trade policy were adopted (hear, hear); and that by the adoption of that policy they were likely to have much more land than at present put in cultivation. (Hear.) In reference to this point, he would put Lord Spencer, Lord Ducie, the late Lord Leicester, and other eminent men of their way of thinking in competition with the right honourable gentleman (Sir James Graham); and, however much he respected the talents of the right hon. gentleman, he could not take his predictions as worth one farthing more than the prophecies of those eminent individuals whose names he had just introduced. They did not fear the same dismal consequences which the right honourable gentleman anticipated, or which he affected to fear; nor were they apprehensive of that reduction of rent, which was such a bugbear to many honourable gentlemen, as the supposed necessary consequence of the introduction of Free Trade. His own belief was, that better rents could be paid under a system of unrestricted trade than under the present system of protection. (Hear, hear.) Some honourable gentlemen, in common with many agriculturists without, were afraid of their mortgages and marriage settlements. He would not join with them in that panic. He believed that every mortgage and every settlement would be much safer, and could be far more easily paid, had we a system of Free Trade, in the room of our present system of restriction. (Hear, hear.) The system which they at present tolerated, and which so many were desirous of perpetuating, was injurious to the community at large, and injuriously affected every portion of the community. (Hear, hear.) The present moment was eminently suited to put an end to this system, and to put an end to it without inflicting injury upon any class or individual. (Hear, hear.) The abolition of the Corn Law would produce no shock upon prices at the present moment. If they abolished the Corn Law that night, provided the newspapers took no notice of the fact, the farmers would not feel the change, with the exception that, after a short time, they would perceive it in the greatly increased comfort and prosperity of all classes around them. (Hear, hear, hear.) If, then, there were a suitable moment to select for making the change, how much had they to answer for who hesitated to take advantage of the occasion? The right honourable gentleman talked of the Free-Traders being rash. The same argument, if argument it might be called, had been used the last time that his honourable friend (Mr. Villiers) brought forward his motion. It was one of the stock arguments of honourable gentlemen opposite. (Laughter.) Was it rashness to propose the change now? Were they not rather the rash men who were passing over this opportunity of effecting it? (Hear, hear, hear.) They were themselves preparing by their present hesitancy to invest the Free-Traders with an amount of moral power of which they were extremely jealous. The time would yet come when they would have a recurrence of those scenes which had been often witnessed within the memory of the youngest of them. (Hear, hear.) When that time did arrive, who then would be regarded as the rash men? (Hear, hear.) Would it be the men who, like his honourable friend the member for Wolverhampton, had the foresight to urge upon the Government to prepare for the inevitable revolution; or would it be those who had avowed themselves Free-Traders, who alleged that this was a question only of time, and yet who were willing to put off this occasion, and to walk with their eyes open—not blindfolded—to the very brink of a precipice, and into that gulf out of which thousands of miseries and dangers might arise? (Hear, hear.) There was every danger—there was great rashness in slighting the present opportunity. (Hear, hear.) What was the danger which they had to fear from another scarcity? There were, at this moment, only 300,000 quarters of foreign corn in this country. The next harvest would, in all probability, be perhaps some weeks later than previous ones, and before next harvest the people of this country would have eaten closer up the amount of corn on hand than in former years; yet there were only at the present moment 300,000 quarters of foreign corn in bond! (Hear, hear, hear.) Was there ever such rashness, as for 27,000,000 of people, who were possessed of a capital that could grasp the produce of the whole world, and who could mortgage it before it was grown, to leave themselves in this dilemma! (Hear, hear.) Under a different system, what would have been the position of the country? Instead of having 300,000 quarters of foreign wheat in the country, they might have 4,000,000 or 5,000,000. That would be brought in, not by the Government, but by the application of capital; and could the country more legitimately apply its capital than for the purpose of providing against a scarcity of food? (Hear, hear.) The Dutch, in ancient times, held 700,000 quarters of foreign corn in their granaries. That was probably sufficient for a year's consumption. What were the Dutch as capitalists compared with the capitalists of England? They might as easily hold 20,000,000 of quarters as the Dutch held 700,000 two centuries ago. The restrictive system which they had fostered and bolstered up, had brought us back to the barbarous position in which this country was placed five or six hundred years ago, with this sole difference that then, from the bad state of the roads and the want of the means of communication, counties used to suffer from famine; whereas now they were setting at defiance all the lights of science, all the discoveries of modern times, and all the improvements founded upon these discoveries, and were bringing us into the same peril as a nation, as we formerly had to encounter only by counties. (Hear, hear.) Why were they making these amazing strides in physical science, laying nations alongside of each other, as provinces had been united before? Why were they to have railways and steamboats? Why were they to go on, uniting nations together by all the discoveries of modern times, if legislation was to lag behind, and prevent them from availing themselves of those advantages which it was the interest and the birthright of the people to derive from these discoveries, and the consequences to which they led. (Hear, hear.) He would not allow the right honourable baronet, with his proverbial caution, to take from the honourable member for Wolverhampton what he considered his due. He (Mr. Villiers) was a man of cautious foresight. He was the man of prudence and forecast, who would make provision for future evils; and on the Government and on those who led them, when they should lead their followers—on the Government rested the responsibility of anything which might happen from the present absurd and anomalous state of our laws. (Cheers.)

It was now between twelve and one o'clock, and the House, with heat and numbers, was like a beehive about to swarm. Up started Mr. GEORGE BANKES, much to the annoyance of his own side of the House, by which he is considered as being a very particular bore. He, however, compelled the Ministerialists, who were exceedingly noisy and impatient, to submit to the infliction of his speech, by threatening to move the adjournment of the debate; and, obtaining a partial attention, he gave a sketch of the history of protection, which Lord John Russell, who followed him, termed "curious specimens of historical erudition," creating thereby much laughter. But, as the reporters have been more tender of the public than Mr. Bankes was of the House, we shall no farther advert to his speech than to say that, amid much impatience, he defended the agricultural interest and opposed the motion.

The two LEADERS now followed, one after the other, Lord JOHN RUSSELL and Sir ROBERT PEEL; and it was amusing as well as interesting to mark the operation of public opinion in their speeches. Lord John Russell was exceedingly spirited, and spoke out in a way which compelled Sir Robert Peel to run a race with him. He thus happily disposed of one of Sir James Graham's fallacies, upon which the latter had laid much stress:—

"The right hon. gentleman said, that, if they abolished protection, there would be 1,500,000 quarters of wheat admitted into the country; that agricultural labourers must therefore be thrown out of employment, and a consequent increase of misery. But the right hon. gentleman admitted, the other evening, that since the present Government came into office the population had increased 1,500,000; and, if they excluded foreign corn, they would require an additional 1,500,000 quarters of corn to supply their wants. If that was the natural result, therefore, the freer the intercourse they had with foreign countries, the cheaper would they be able to get that corn, and the better the supply."

Addressing himself to the Prime Minister, the noble lord said:—

"If the right honourable gentleman disapproves of my proposal of a moderate fixed duty, let him then diminish the sliding scale (hear, hear, hear); let him diminish it to 10s., and from 10s. to 1s. Even that might be a great relief to the country. But what I do believe is, that the Corn Law, as it now stands, cannot be long maintained. (Cheers.) I say that it is fully signified, not only by the ability of the attacks made on the law, but also by the manner in which it is defended in this House. I cannot conceive, unless it is better defended than it has been hitherto, that it can last for many years to come. ('Hear, hear, hear,' and cheers.) And if that be the case, why should not the landed gentry take advantage of the present state of things, the present moment of calm and quiet, to make the necessary alteration with coolness and deliberation. If they are determined not to do so, they must run the risk, in case of any inflammation of the popular mind, of being exposed to obloquy and reproach. No one can deny that the present Corn Law is intended to, and does in the opinion of political economists, add to the rent of the landlords. Only conceive the effect of this impression working on the minds of the people for many years. Here is a law which clearly adds to the income of those who legislate for the country. It is the business of those who legislate to prove that, though it adds to their incomes as legislators, it benefits the other classes of the community in the same proportion. Now, they cannot deny the effect of the law to be, that it adds to their rent, but they totally fail in proving that it confers a corresponding benefit on the rest of the community. (Loud cheers.) Let them consider the consequences of such an argument going on for many years with the sharp and intelligent eye of this community fixed upon them; and let them be wise in time. (The noble lord sat down amid loud cheering.)"

Sir ROBERT PEEL could not stand this, and very emphatically announced that—

"Though I shall vote against the present proposal, I cannot do so in some of the arguments we have heard to-

ERRATUM.—Amongst the subscriptions for the pur-

 10s., should have been T. Haddison, Drury-lane, 10s.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—SHIPPING WANTED.—We want shipping to take our produce to England. There are at this moment several thousands of tons of corn, and many hundreds of tons of bark, ores of precious metals, gum, and other productions ready for shipment, but there are no vessels. The effects upon the wheat market are peculiarly prejudicial, for the merchants cannot buy, and the banks cannot make advances so long as there are no shipments made. Thus everything is at a stand still. The same may be said of the mining operations. We trust that the attention of British shipowners may be called to these simple but most important facts. In consequence of the superior quality of the silver, lead, and copper ores, and their extensive dissemination throughout this province, it is the opinion of the most intelligent men throughout the colonies and in England, that South Australia must speedily become one of the most important of the British settlements. This will not be surprising when it is considered that, throughout the wide extent of the British dominions, this is the only colony which exports these valuable minerals. Looking, therefore, to this circumstance alone, it is high time that the British Government should attend in earnest to the wants of the colonists.—South Australian.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XXXIV.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

(SECOND LETTER.)

GENTLEMEN,—My last week's letter had especial reference to those among you who generally support the present Administration, but whose personal convictions are believed not to be in favour of continued restrictions upon the supply of food for the people. I endeavoured to show you that the time had come for giving distinct expression to those convictions; and that Mr. Villiers's annual motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws afforded the appropriate opportunity. The petition has been partly granted, and partly refused. The minority remains as it was; the majority exhibits a decrease of no less than 74 votes in addition to the decrease last year of 53 votes. At this rate, two years must witness the extinction of the Corn Laws. You, gentlemen, could have saved us those two years of agricultural confusion and manufacturing agitation. Was it too much to expect of you that, instead of "expressive silence," you would have taken the bolder course of more expressive voting? Must there be a sliding scale in parliamentary conduct? Is the intermediate step of absence from the division an essential preliminary to the transfer of the majority? So it appears; and that you have done thus much, to so decisive an extent, demands its due acknowledgment.

And now allow me to remind you of the new position in which you are placed by the late discussion and division. Monopoly, which you allow to retain a majority, although you retire from the ranks of that majority, is stripped of all its excuses and pretensions. Sir Robert Peel has scarcely left a rag upon its nakedness. One after another, he trampled with remorseless heel upon the pleas by which your former votes were vindicated. He demolished his own sophisms as unsparingly as those of other people. High prices have nothing to do, he says, with high wages. If permanent, he affirms them to be a disadvantage to the industrious classes. There goes the ground for some scores of votes annually. Incumbrances on estates, and the pecuniary obligations of interests of a class, are next repudiated as a reason for the law. There goes the ground for another batch of votes. Then "the hope to make ourselves entirely independent of foreign supply is out of the question." A forest of support for monopoly is levelled by that blow. In short, all principle whatever is abandoned. The mischievousness of the system is confessed by most distinct implication. "The gradual abatement of purely protecting duties" is declared to be the policy of the Premier. And the only question is how to arrive at what is broadly acknowledged to be "a better condition of society and the establishment of better principles."

The etiquette of Sir Robert Peel's position prevented his voting with Mr. Villiers; unless he had done so, it was scarcely possible for him to go greater lengths than he did. He left not a syllable to be pleaded for the Corn Laws beyond the bare fact of their existence. They do not exist for the labourer, they ought not to exist for the landlord, and adequate home supplies of food, their professed object, are not only beyond their power, but an absolute impossibility. Gentlemen, you judged rightly that you could not vote against Mr. Villiers after such a speech from the Premier. Only an official person, or the voluntarily blindest of blind followers, could have done that. It was no speech to catch votes. Sir Robert Peel knows too well how to handle the net and line for it to have been so intended. He spoke, gentlemen, as your representative. He excused his absent friends. He showed cause for this wholesale secession from the ranks of monopoly. It would not have amounted to a rebuke had you been present and divided on the other side.

It is difficult to understand what are to be the degrees in that gradual abolition which is announced as the Ministerial policy. The only conceivable gradations are a fixed duty, or another Corn Law with a sliding scale upon a lower pivot. But these expedients are both discountenanced by Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham. A third is scarcely within the compass of human ingenuity. All are liable to the fatal objection of their temporary employment being previously understood. The term "gradual" is deceptive. Ministers talk of graduation, and mean delay. They do not propose to divide the descent into minute steps, but to procrastinate the one step a little longer. What will be gained by this delay?

What we lose by it is evident. We forego the opportunity of finally settling this question in a period of comparative quiet and prosperity. We risk its compulsory settlement in a period of scarcity, alarm, and comparative confusion. Did Sir James Graham read the first sentence of Burke's "Thoughts on Scarcity" before he cited that work? It is well worth bearing in mind:—"Of all things, an indirect tampering with the trade of provisions is the most dangerous, and it is always worst in the time when men are most disposed to it; that is, in the time of scarcity." Yet, for the chance of this worst of times, he would have us wait. Burke concludes as he began:—"My opinion is against an over-doing of any sort of administration, and more especially against this most momentous of all meddling on the part of authority; the meddling with the subsistence of the people." The question is now of ceasing legislatively to meddle with the subsistence of the people. And the argument against commencing interference is not less strong against continuing that interference until the time of scarcity may come. Every syllable of self-gratulation in which Sir Robert Peel indulged, as to the state of the country since his Corn Bill passed, is a reason for prompt adjustment. These are golden months, if not moments, for the purpose. The contingencies of another harvest are fast approaching. They defy human calculation. If they turn out unfavourably, will you not bitterly reproach yourselves that your conduct was not more decided? And what is gained should the result be favourable, and the fields be again laden with abundance? The cry of agricultural distress will swell louder, and the embarrassments and entanglements of the question be worse than ever.

Sir Robert Peel has left very undefined certain "peculiar and special relations," which he says have grown up under the present unsound system. What these may be it is difficult to divine. Not the family settlements of Knatchbull notoriety; for he distinctly throws them overboard. Nor the connexion formed by leases between landlord and tenant; for leases are the exception and not the rule; nor can it be otherwise till the provision trade is allowed its free and natural course. Not the expensive style of living into which the notion of high rents secured by act of Parliament may have seduced the landowners; for that interpretation, too, is refuted by another portion of the speech. It is "something which does not rest merely on pecuniary considerations." It is a "moral relation." A moral relation constituted by monopoly! A friend-and-fatherhood of farmers, which would be desecrated by honest dealing towards the rest of the community! Make the most, gentlemen, of this shadowy reason for delay; catch it if you can, and ascertain its power; and pity the straits to which the Premier must have been reduced when he evoked it from the unsubstantial regions of its abode.

The whole speech is a cry for help; and you are the only people who can help. Unless you come to the rescue, it must be sought for, and it will be sought for, in a new Parliament. Cannot you take a hint? And given so plainly too? Sir Robert Peel is determined to proceed with the destruction of protective duties, and the practical establishment of the Free-Trade principle. His difficulty, declared in express terms, is the "necessary caution for the purpose of ensuring its general acceptance and stability." You can materially lessen that difficulty. Something you have done. The session, far as it has advanced, will yet afford opportunities for your doing something more. The course may be cleared for Sir Robert Peel against next year. Your absence has encouraged his progress. Desert him not at this critical point. One direct demonstration, and the work is done. It is due to him; due to yourselves, and now more than ever. It is needless to add that I deem it, above all, due to the country. By silence and absence you have won applause and gratitude. Come forward to cut short the dreary and perilous season of delay, and you will win the blessings of millions.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

DEATH OF JOHN MARSHALL, ESQ., OF LEEDS.

We have to announce, with sincere regret, the death of Mr. Marshall, of Leeds, whose eminence as a manufacturer was not more conspicuous than his energies as a patriot and his zeal as a philanthropist. By the honourable exertion of his industry and talents he acquired a princely fortune, and he employed it in establishments that have furnished comfort to thousands of operatives, and greatly added to the material wealth of the nation. Few manufacturers have more nobly illustrated the great importance of the capitalist to the labouring community; his great resources enabled him to work his mills during seasons of depression, and thus to save his men from those alternations of stagnation and suffering which have produced so much of misery in the industrial districts of England. Mr. Marshall was a zealous Free-Trader, and a member of the Council of the League. Though for some time in Parliament, he did not take a very conspicuous part in political life; but he was far from being an uninterested spectator of public events, and he was ever ready to aid largely and liberally in all efforts made to promote the cause of truth and justice. He has left behind him a large fortune, but, what is much more, he has left behind him an honoured memory and an unsullied reputation.

THE LABOURERS IN WILTSHIRE.

UPAVON, WILTSHIRE.

This is a village 16 miles from Andover on the east, 18 miles from Salisbury on the south, and 10 from Devizes on the west. The chalky hills are near it on every side, and on the south-west begins the high and bare stretch of country, called Salisbury Plain.

This village and another called Rushill stand in a rich valley of alluvial soil, through which comes the upper branch of the river Avon. In winter it is said to flow through this valley; but at present it creeps, and often it seems to be so overpowered by the hot sun as to have fallen asleep in the meadows; while again escaping from the heat which threatens to dry it up, and from the plebeian hands that catch its fish when it sleeps in the meadow, it retires into the shade of the thick woods, leafy and leafy, where the shade cools it, and where no vulgar fishermen dare to trespass on its banks.

Sixty houses in a cluster, with a church tower and some trees among them in one part; farm-fields, broad and rich, around the houses; a gentleman's park, deeply wooded, in the bosom of the farm-fields; and another church tower and village of houses, the latter not so much clustered, the trees and the gardens giving them more of space and shelter and beauty,—these are the villages of Upavon and Rushill.

It needs but a small stretch of fancy to suppose that this valley, within a circuit of four miles, was once the Garden of Eden. There is the original richness of soil; there is the loveliness that once was and still lingers; there is the fruitfulness associated with foulness and rankness; and there is—strongest resemblance of all—the curse upon humankind in its heaviest form. If it differs at all, it differs in being heavier than the original: that was, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." But here it is, "Thou shalt sweat and live upon potatoes, and have less than enough of them." "Thou shalt sweat in the broiling sun in the month of June, 1845, mowing hay, and shalt only have bread and water, and not enough bread." "Thou shalt sweat for 7s. a week if thou hast a family of children, and for 5s. a week in summer, and 3s. in winter, if thou hast none." "Thou shalt pay 3s. a year of house rent, and the rain shall drop on you and the wind blow on you through the roof, but the house shall be propped up with poles to keep it from falling with every gust of wind, yet to keep you in constant terror and expectation that it will fall."

These seem to be a few of the forms in which the primeval curse manifests its presence here. The ground, as regards its richness of soil and fruitfulness, is certainly not cursed: for never did the month of June display finer crops of wheat, though at the same time the ground seems to have brought forth its "thistles," and also its chortles and nettles, and couch and docks, and sundry other plants called weeds, in very great abundance. In a field of about ten acres, of the best soil in the valley, there are at the moment as many thistles growing as would have supplied all Eden with seed, had Eden been as large as all Wiltshire. On a space not more than the tenth part of an acre I counted 150 thistles. In some fields close by the chorlock is one vast sheet of yellow bloom, the corn crop utterly suffocated below the triumphant weed. But in other fields here the wheat has got the mastery of all contending foulness, and nobly does it keep it. Every person on being talked to, says, that never, within their memory, was there a better promise for harvest than there is now.

Owing to the early closing of the post I must stop at this point. I shall resume in another letter.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

COUNTY REGISTRATION.

On Monday last, a meeting of the professional and other agents of the League, with a number of other gentlemen engaged in the registration of South Lancashire and the neighbouring counties, was held at the League Office, Manchester. Mr. Wilson took the chair. Among those present were the following resident members of the Council:—Messrs. W. Rawson, J. B. Smith, W. Bickham, S. Lees, H. Rawson, and Alderman Roston. There were also present Messrs. E. Worthington and R. Webb, Manchester; J. Ascroft, Oldham; R. Johnson, Southport; H. Garsdale, Ashton-under-Lyne; W. Roberts, Rochdale; W. Ascroft, Bury; J. Shawcross, Stockport; R. Ascroft, Preston; and T. Johnson, Lancaster, solicitors; Messrs. C. E. Rawlins, jun., Liverpool; A. Taylor, Oldham; T. Wall, Wigan; C. Walker, Rochdale; J. Davis, Staleybridge; D. Knott, Bolton; T. Plint, Leeds; and several others. The members of the various local committees. The chairs addressed the meeting on the nature and importance of the duties which lay before them, and called upon the representatives of the several districts to state what had already been done by their committees. These statements ready been done by their committees. These statements occupied considerable time; but they were highly satisfactory, and all aided abundant evidence that, so far from relaxing in their efforts, the Free-Traders in the various localities are more anxious than ever to co-operate with the League in this important work. Copies of the rate-books have been very generally obtained, and a number of examinations have been instituted to ascertain the number of Free-Traders who are entitled to be registered. The meeting was occupied until after ten o'clock in discussing the various details and points to be attended to in the coming months. A circular letter, urging the most energetic action, and containing instructions to committees similar to those which have appeared in the LEAGUE, was ordered to be printed and issued forthwith.

VALUE OF LAND IN MANCHESTER.—A small piece of land adjoining the churchyard was lately sold at the rate of £425 per acre. The same individual also, not long since, disposed of a piece in the centre of the city at about £1200 per acre.—Sp. M.

FREE-TRADE MEETING AT GRAVESEND.

On Wednesday last a lecture upon the principles of Free Trade was delivered by Mr. Falvey, at the Town-hall, Gravesend, the Mayor (—Saddington, Esq.) in the chair.

Notwithstanding the extreme pressure of the heat of the weather, and the temptations presented to outdoor promenading upon a fine evening in that favourite locality, the meeting was numerous and respectfully attended.

Mr. FALVEY addressed the assemblage, for nearly two hours, in an able and eloquent speech, elucidating the pernicious influence of the Corn Laws upon the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests of the country; and enforcing the necessity of systematically attending to the electoral registration in order to attain commercial freedom.

Mr. Alderman OAKES (ex-mayor) then rose and expressed his opinion—which was warmly responded to by the meeting—that the inhabitants of Kent, and the country at large, were exceedingly indebted to the Anti-Corn Law League; but, great and successful as had been their exertions, much yet remained to be done, and he would, therefore, urge the electors and friends of Free Trade in that neighbourhood to immediate co-operation with that body. He concluded by proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Falvey.

Mr. FALVEY briefly replied, and moved a vote of thanks to the chairman, which, having been seconded by Mr. Alderman Oakes, was carried by acclamation.

The CHAIRMAN returned thanks, and the meeting separated.

THE PECULIAR BURDENS UPON LAND.

(From Punch)

Mr. Ward has lately brought forward an unsuccessful motion for an inquiry into this subject. We quite agree with the majority that rejected it—there is no reason for any inquiry into the matter. We can save the House a blue-book (so called from its effect upon the looks of hon. members while engaged in its perusal) by a succinct account of these "peculiar burdens" for each of the three divisions of the united kingdom.

ENGLAND.

Imprimis, we should say a very peculiar burden upon the land in England is—

1. A sporting landlord, in whose eyes partridges are of more consequence than paupers, and who in all his schemes of amelioration spells "peasant" with a "ph."
2. An ill-paid, overworked labourer, with a mind as bare as his body, a doghole for a dwelling, and an union-house for a refuge.
3. An ignorant tenantry, with a confidence in Sir Robert Peel and a blind dependence on protection and the landlord.
4. A non-resident rector, with a taste for Cheltenham waters, and a notion that the working clergy are composed of curates at £80 per annum.

IRELAND.

1. An absentee proprietor, who considers hedge-shooting the natural amusement of the Irish peasantry; believes the only "gentle" residence for a man of taste to be an English watering-place; and holds the duties of property to be all on the side of the tenant.
2. A Protestant ascendancy parson, who looks on Orange lodges as a development of the Christian church; "Boone Water" as a hymn; and a national school as a favourite parade-ground for the Evil One.
3. A rack-renting agent, whose favourite argument is a policeman's bayonet.

SCOTLAND.

1. A Highland landholder, with a preference for sheep-walks over small holdings, and a tendency to promote emigration on a large scale by driving out forty families in one clearing.
  2. A population of paupers depending on what the heathons like to give them.
- Let England, Ireland, and Scotland rid themselves of these burdens respectively, and we should not despair of even more wonderful results than a repeal of the Corn Laws, a millennium in which the Duke of Buckingham should play in Mr. Cobden's drying grounds, and Villiers sport over Sir John Trevellick's preserves; when Sibthorp should exchange the kiss of peace with Bowring; and Home and Herbert sit cheek by cheek on the Treasury bench, with the smile of brotherly love upon their faces, and their arms round one another's necks.

FARMERS' PETITION.

The following petition was presented by Mr. Cobden in the House of Commons on Tuesday. Amongst the signatures are those of seven farmers who occupy upwards of 5000 acres.

The humble Petition of the undersigned Farmers, frequenting the market at Salisbury, in the county of Wilts, "Humbly sheweth,

"That, in the district in which your petitioners dwell, food and provender for cattle, now and for some months past, have been so scarce and expensive that the cost of maintaining stock during the present year has, in many instances, been greater than its actual value.

"That, owing to such scarcity and dearth of provender, cattle and stock are stinted in food, and thereby not only rendered liable to disease, but much diminished in value both as regards their flesh and their manure.

"That, whilst your honourable House has reduced the protective duties on the importation of cattle, and thus exposed your petitioners to foreign competition in that respect, no steps have been taken to enable your petitioners to feed and fatten their stock at the same cheap rate as the foreigner is enabled to do.

"Your petitioners, therefore, pray your honourable House at once to repeal the duties payable upon the importation of foreign beans and oats, and other articles consumed by cattle, and which said duties, owing to the present scarcity of provender, are now actually paid by your petitioners, and others similarly circumstanced, out of their own pockets."

Enclosure.—An excessive multiplication of smugglers is produced by the enactment of laws, whose object is not revenue, but the exclusion of foreign productions for the supposed benefit of domestic industry. Whatever may be the thought of the expediency of those laws with a view to national wealth, all must agree that the extension of smuggling must produce the most demoralizing effects.—Morning Chronicle.

THE RAILWAY EXCITEMENT AT THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The great excitement which is exhibited at this time in the committee-rooms of the House of Commons presents so unusual a scene that some little account of it may not be uninteresting.

The committee-rooms of the House are situated in the cloisters, and in the immediate vicinity of the House; but, owing to the immense pressure of business arising from the numerous railway projects now before Parliament, various additional rooms have been constructed on the Thames side of Westminster-hall. The galleries leading to these rooms being temporary, are all made of wood: their appearance altogether impresses you with the sudden nature and extent of the business which demands this great increase of accommodation.

At 12 o'clock the committee commence their sittings, when the rush begins, and a busy scene presents itself: the ruddy squire, the hardy-looking farmer, the country draper and cheese-monger wend their way through the mêlée to their appointed room, the scene of their hopes and fears.

These are mixed up with the merchant, big with importance; the sinister-looking and well-satisfied lawyer, followed by his train of surveyors, traffic takers, and traffic provers—of engineers, burly contractors, and a host of others. And by no means an unimportant personage appears under the powdered wig of the barrister, numbers of whom dot among the hundreds of heads which the eye glances upon in that motley group.

Every town and district, nay, almost every village in the country, appears to send its contingent, from the braw Scot to the Cornwall miner. The Green Isle itself seems to be fully alive on the subject, by the numbers of her sons who are present.

So great is the crowd that, though the galleries are wide, policemen have great difficulty in keeping open a passage, the order to "move on" being rigidly enforced. What an extraordinary scene it is! and, as one looks at that strange assemblage of anxious faces, the idea cannot help presenting itself, that in many cases what a sad reckoning will come for all this turmoil; and how many a poor fellow, now full of importance, will rue the day when railway business, which now brings him to town, first directed his attention from his counter or his counting-house!

There have not been probably more than two or three cases for many years when any business in the House of Commons itself created half the sensation or excitement which every day appears in those railway committees.

But let us pass to the committee-rooms appropriated to railway business: they are numbered 1 to 20 respectively—each committee having consigned to it the fate of a group of railways.

The committee consists of five gentlemen, members of Parliament, who sit at a table covered with green baize which extends across the end of the room—with side tables running down the room, at which reporters are seated.

In the centre are the shorthand writers, who take accurate notes of the proceedings and of the evidence; and facing the committee—who, by the way, are the only gentlemen who wear their hats—is the line of barristers: gentlemen who, whatever be the fate of the bills before them, are reaping a golden harvest.

Some idea may be formed of this by the statement that one or two of the leading counsel will pocket upwards of £20,000 each in fees for their labours in this session alone; indeed, so much have they to do that, although some of them are retained in half the cases which have come before Parliament, they cannot, in effect—unless, as the Irishman says, he were a bird, and could be at two places at once—do their duty in any.

Behind the barristers are seated the swarm of attorneys, directors, witnesses, parties interested, and lookers on; and, as the rooms are crowded to excess, the heat is most oppressive. How those poor members of Parliament endure it is difficult to say, only that to sit for four hours every day in such an atmosphere, listening to the tedious details which are brought before them, is, indeed, a heavy penalty to pay for the honour of being a member of Parliament. They do look wretchedly jaded, and well they may; they really deserve great credit for the patience and attention which is admitted on all hands they give to the matters before them.

Surely no schoolboy listens with more pleasure to the sound of the bell which releases him from the "durance vile" of the school-room than those poor members greet the welcome announcement at four o'clock that the "Speaker is at prayers." Then each room pours forth its numbers into the crowded passages, and the loud hum caused by the anxious inquiry, the expressions of condolence or of congratulation, is heard along the galleries; the eager countenances of the crowd, within and without, show with what anxiety the various decisions are expected.

It is indeed a strange scene, and one which probably will not occur again for years; yet although its consequences will, it is to be feared, be in many cases disastrous, it is difficult to say whether speculation, if it must exist, could on the whole have taken a direction which would be more conducive to the general interests of the community, than the attempt to increase by means of railways the facilities of communication through the various parts of the country.

TRADE WITH INDIA.—The City writer in the Times reports that the merchants construe the commercial news from India favourably. "Some time ago, the accounts were invariably to the effect that the markets were overstocked with British goods, and that the trade with our important possessions promised to be anything but remunerating. Now, the demand for our manufactures appears to be on the increase, and prices are reported as having an upward tendency. The advance of freights at Calcutta shows the expectation of an increased export trade, on account of the reduction in the sugar duties."

PENNY POSTAGE.—The usual Post-office returns have just been issued; they show results which must be highly gratifying to the friends of penny postage. The total number of letters delivered in the United Kingdom in the year 1844 was 242 millions, which is an increase of nearly 23 millions on the previous year. (The number before the reduction of the rate, it may be necessary to remark our readers, was 76 millions.) But the most remarkable fact is the great increase in the London district, or old twopenny post, the letters of which have more than doubled since the penny rate was established.—Morning Chronicle.

THE AUSTRALIAN AGRICULTURISTS.

(From the Adelaide Observer of December 7, 1844.)

The commencement of harvest has recalled to our thoughts more forcibly, if possible, than heretofore the personal toils and mental anxieties to which non-agricultural settlers mainly owe their present measure of prosperity, and of which the agriculturists themselves may now, we hope, safely anticipate the well-earned reward.

The determination of the South Australian Company in England to become importers to the extent of their corn-paid rents, and so far relieve our own market of its depressing surplus, is one important step in advance; and, although the boon be only a negative one, it will have the effect of establishing a sort of protective minimum (for want of which the market has hitherto been an appalling one), and tend to the introduction of a more moderate scale of corn freight to England.

The over-sea markets this side the Cape of Good Hope have been successively tried with an alternation of good and bad fortune, of which the balance of results has tended to exculpate our own merchants from any charge of extortion in the way and apparently grinding prices at which alone they could (at one period especially) be induced to purchase. When the prices of articles of the first necessity become extremely depressed, holders are apt to attribute the depression to any cause but the right one; and it is not to be wondered at if the corn-growers of South Australia in 1843 charged a large measure of their disappointment against the merchants in 1844; whereas, the case was one of a glutted market, and nothing more.

We believe we have passed through a distressing era—and if, as we imagine, the former coexisting obstacles, political, mercantile, and competitive, which, singly or together, have marred our corn-exporting endeavours in so many instances,—if all these obstacles are actually in course of rapid removal (and the political hindrances cannot stand), the healthy current of reciprocity will supersede the stagnant, one-sided condition of our former exchanges, and produce the uniformity of interests so much desired and wanted.

The more wealthy cultivators may speculate upon the desirableness of shipping cargoes of grain, flour, and other produce in concert, and of superseding the services of the merchant; they may talk of this market, or of that, and determine beforehand what their returns shall consist of; but we candidly confess we are not sanguine as to the successful termination of such adventures, although abstractedly they would be productive of infinite benefit to a community which has so much to learn. But, if we may venture again to suggest any amongst the foreign markets yet untried, we frankly confess a predilection for one of the newly-opened Chinese ports north of Hong-Kong, and should rejoice sincerely in a united effort to introduce to the vast population of the Celestial Empire some proofs of our superabundance and successful cultivation.

The first steps to be taken in order to bring about a better state of things, are the establishment of a regular corn market, and a pledged adherence to routine.

With respect to our cultivators as a body, our sentiment is one of unmingled admiration and pride; we are at a loss to find any (unbackneyed) expression strong enough to give utterance to our own sense of obligation; and we are sure we interpret aright the views of our fellow-citizens, as well as those of absent friends and proprietors, when we declare that they have nobly performed their important, self-imposed, and arduous task.

It is our wont to admire the progressive metropolitan improvements, as well as the industry and inventive faculty of which it is our province to record such oft-recurring instances; but we should never wish to forget the agrarian labours which have occasioned the substitution of brickwork, solid masonry, and refined architecture for canvas and pine and paling; and we shall never cease to acknowledge that (humanly speaking) we are mainly indebted to the farmers for all our present prosperity, and the bright future which is dawning upon us.

* * A typographical accident, which occurred a short time previous to our going to press, having caused some considerable delay, we trust that, should any of our country subscribers be disappointed on receiving their paper by a later post, they will be good enough to attribute it to the circumstance mentioned.

EXTRAORDINARY MONETARY SPECULATION.—For some time past the copper coinage of William IV. had been eagerly purchased up by persons who are stated to be Jews, and a report has in consequence gained ground that gold is contained in it. What reason there may be for this it is impossible to say; but it is a well known fact that agents have been at work for the last two months buying up those particular coins in Westminster, and they now fetch double the price of their legal issue. The mania has extended eastward, and twopences for a penny piece, and a penny for a halfpenny, &c., is now asked for the "precious issue."—Morning Chronicle.

INCENDIARY FIRE.—On Sunday night last a valuable rick of wheat and another of straw, the property of Mr. T. Moore, of Palmer's-cross, were discovered to be on fire, and, in a short time, were totally destroyed. We are sorry to say that there can be little doubt of this destruction of property being the act of an incendiary. Two men, whose names are William Dudley and Thomas Coxall, are now in custody on suspicion of having been concerned in setting fire to the above property, as they were found loitering about the premises.—Birmingham Pilot.

TRUTH'S PROMISE.—When a great truth is to be revealed, it does not flash at once on the race, but dawns and brightens on a superior understanding, from which it is to emanate and to illuminate future ages. On the faithfulness of great minds to this awful function, the progress and happiness of the race have been men, who, having risen to great truths, have held them as a sacred trust for their kind, and have borne witness to them amidst general darkness, under scorn and persecution, perhaps in the face of death. Such men, indeed, have not always made contributions to literature, for their condition has not allowed them to be authors; but we owe the transmission, perpetuity, and immortal power of their new and high thoughts, to kindred spirits, which have concentrated and fixed them in books.—Monday.

REVIEW.

The White Boys; a Story of Ireland, in 1822. By Mrs. S. C. Hall. London: Chapman and Hall.

Mrs. Hall has been the most faithful, because the most sympathetic, delineator of the Irish peasant since the days of Miss Edgeworth: her pictures of Irish life never degenerate into caricature on the one hand, nor exhibit the dull lifelessness of the Daguerreotype on the other; her figures live, move, and have being; they feel as well as act; and it is her triumph that feelings in her skilful portraiture have all the reality of deeds. The secret of her success is simple: she has a heart; generous in her feelings, large and liberal in her sentiments, uniting philosophic acuteness of perception to woman's most perfect susceptibility of soft emotion, she has devoted her energies to pleading the cause of a country and a people, whose worst sufferings have originated from the best intentions, whose direct crimes have been based on noble principles, and whose greatest evils have been perpetrated by those who aimed at accomplishing the greatest good. The evils of Ireland are social, not political; it is true that these social evils originated in a perverse political system, which divided Ireland into a serfdom and an ascendancy—giving to the one the vices of the slave, and to the other the still more aggravated vices of the master. The old poet declares that "the hour which makes a man a slave takes half his worth away;" and more sober history records that the hour which establishes a class in the ascendancy takes away a far larger proportion of moral worth from every individual cursed with this exclusive privilege of abuse. The double action of this system—the blight which it casts on the serf, and the perversion to which it dooms the superior—forms the main subject of the work before us. As it is not yet complete, we must defer to a future occasion any analysis of the story, which, like that of the Eastern reciters, pauses at the moment of most intense and exciting interest; but we shall extract a few graphic sketches, drawn to the life and from the life with a vigour and fidelity which has never been surpassed. The description given of Ireland by one of the writer's favourite characters, Dean Graves, to a young proprietor coming from England to enter into possession of his estate, is worthy the attentive study of all who wish to understand the real condition of the Emerald Isle.

"The country is fearfully disturbed just now," said the Dean, "and I am almost sorry you are coming among us at such a time."

"I have not the least fear," replied Edward. "Lady Mary declares there is no instance on record of their injuring a stranger."

"But you are a landholder, and they may fancy you composed of ejectments and latitudes," said Mr. Graves, smiling.

"No fear of that: I have forgiven them all arrears; and as I shall put every thing to rights myself—hear with my own ears, see with my own eyes, and act from my own judgment—I do not think I, for one, shall be injured."

"Mr. Graves again smiled at his brave words, but made no allusion to them, simply saying, 'Not in person I hope and believe. Even I have no fear of that; but take care you are not injured towards the people in heart and spirit. I dread the reaction upon such a mind, as I am told you possess. I dread the dissolving of your dream, for all knowledge of Ireland, acquired only by hearsay, leads to dreams. I dread the effect of the certain quantity of disappointment you must experience more than I do the evil whisperings or daring proclamations of those who will seek to win you to their several modes of thinking. I dread it because Ireland wants men like you—not to stand by a party, but by the country. Men with sympathies and capital, men also with memories, capable of tracing back the various causes of the people's discontent to bygone times and bygone events, which, however forgotten or overlooked in England, are still freshly kept in mind in Ireland—freshly as if they were but growths of yesterday; for they are continually revived, not only by agitators of the moment, but by a higher and holier class,—of feelings as well as of men; men who love their country and honour its patriots. You may imagine that in visiting Ireland you are visiting only one people; you are visiting two."

"Two!" repeated Edward, remembering at the moment Lady Mary's words.

"It is even so,—two! Protestant Ireland and Catholic Ireland, Saxon Ireland and Celtic Ireland; but the blood of the Irish Saxon is as hotly boiling as that of the Irish Celt. They boil against each other; and, perhaps, the chief motive of union between the Saxon Irish and your country is the Church establishment; that is the bond which binds the Irish Protestant to England; but for that both might overboil against you, as they do now against each other."

"Mr. Graves paused, and Edward for some time made no reply: he was thinking."

"I dare say," said he at length, "that what you observe is quite true; and perhaps we deserve it should be so. We have protected a party, and not a people.—I have often heard my poor uncle say as much."

"You are right in that opinion," observed Mr. Graves; "whatever party has been dominant in England, has, to a certain extent, protected that nearest to itself in Ireland; but as the peasantry, the very, very poor, have no party, no covenant with their country, the population of Ireland have had only occasional friends. Strangers frequently, like yourself, come among us, with generous and large desires of usefulness, and kindly and extensive sympathies, but, insensibly drawn into the vortex of party, they either become accustomed to the misery which at first appalled them, or are so overwhelmed by its extent that they turn away altogether from the voice of the weeper, and join in the common cry of want of care and providence in a population, who, even when able to obtain employment, have only existed on what, in your country, would have caused a hundred rebellions, under the name of starvations. A few speak loudly of, and feel keenly, the moral degradation that want creates; the cry of the multitude is echoed by them; and initiated by others—by others who augment evil by misdirecting agitation; yet, all the while they argue that the fruits of peace may be thus gathered—grapes from thorns and figs from thistles."

"The country sadly wants repose," said Edward Spencer.

"Most true," replied Mr. Graves, "but the deep sea-calm of starving multitudes, sinking by hundreds into the grave, is not, I am certain, the sort of repose which you would wish to see continued in my poor country." Neither spoke for some moments, and then Mr. Graves resumed: "Let me," he said, "again caution you against harsh judging in any case! Do not suffer the Orange party of the North to persuade you that their warmer brethren of the South are all violent and bigoted; nor the Roman Catholics of the South to impress you with the idea that the Orangemen of the North are all bitter and fierce destroyers; in all you hear you must take into account the quick beatings of our hearts, and our universal habit of exaggeration; not from a desire to falsify, but as issuing out of a rich imagination that converts us into a nation of poets. We think what we say, while we speak; but we feel strongly, and do not prepare our words before we utter them. We want judgment rather than genius."

Mrs. Hall is a zealous Protestant, and her testimony to the character of the Catholic clergy is therefore above suspicion:—

"There are few things in the actual world so touchingly beautiful as the respect and affection subsisting between the Roman Catholic priest and his flock; those who know and observe the people, cannot wonder at their strength and endurance; from the cradle to the grave the priest is the peasant's adviser and his friend; he knows all his concerns—not only the great business of his life, but its minutiae; his private cares and sorrows, his faults and his crimes, are all in the priest's keeping; his judge, his advocate, his punisher, he is also his protector—very, very rarely his tyrant. Those who talk of the luxury of priests' fare now-a-days, and of its being drawn from the misery of the people, know little of his way of life; his narrow means, or the very limited number of his enjoyments. The pomp and circumstance of the Roman Catholic creed take hold of the Irishman's imagination; and the sympathy and kindness of his priest win and keep his heart. When an ignorant Irish Roman Catholic becomes 'bad to his priest,' he must be utterly lost to good; for he holds no other faith, and has put aside all that stands between him and destruction. Such, at least, things were five-and-twenty years ago!"

"Press of matter obliges us to defer further extracts from this interesting work till next week."

ON THE USE OF BREAD.—Bread is the most common and the most wholesome of all the food which our beneficent Creator has given us for the support of life. At the delicate table of a prince it is as necessary as at the table of the labourer. It is of great use and importance both in sickness and in health. It appears to be designed as the principal food of man, for the plant which produces it will grow almost in any climate, and it is difficult to find an inhabited country where wheat, if properly cultivated, will not ripen. Though we eat bread every day we do not tire of it, which is an evident proof that we cannot do without it. It we make too frequent use of those costly and dainty dishes, which pride and luxury have invented, they soon cease to please our palates; but we always eat bread with pleasure: and the man who has made it his daily food for seventy years, still relishes it, though he may have lost his taste for all other food. Ought we not, then, daily to look up to God, as we eat bread, and to praise Him for granting us this blessing? If we would choose the best food, can there be any more natural, more wholesome, or more nourishing than bread? It refreshes more than the smell of the most precious aromatics. They may, indeed, fly more to the head and be more heating; but even the smell of good bread, though simple, may serve to convince us that it contains what is essentially proper to form and repair the nervous fluid. Its quickly dissolving when moistened shows its nutritive quality, and that it is easy to digest. We may here reflect on the visible care of the Creator for our health in appointing us this food. Bread is the best adapted to resist corruption, which our best juices are liable to. It has an acid quality in it, and is an excellent preservative against putrefaction. We are certainly unworthy of the bread that daily feeds us if we be insensible of its being a blessing granted to us from God. Surely we should love and adore that kind Father who causes the earth to produce bread for our support. What! shall we, like brutes, receive our food without thinking of Him from whom it comes? Surely not. Is it not enough that we receive our food in our infancy without being able to express our gratitude for it? O God! now I know the hand that supports me, let me ever adore Thee for it. Help me to prove the sincerity of my gratitude by sharing the bread which I possess in abundance with those who are in want! Many of Thy dear children possess much less, though they deserve more than I. They are pinched with hunger, while I have enough and to spare. Lord, it comes from Thee, and I would share it with my fellow-creatures, who have the same natural right to Thy favours.—Sturm's Reflections.

A WORD TO REVOLUTIONISTS.—The criticism and attack on institutions which we have witnessed have made one thing plain, that society gains nothing whilst a man, not himself renovated, attempts to renovate things around him; he has become tediously good in some particular, but negligent or narrow in the rest; and hypocrisy and vanity are often the disgusting result.—M. W. Emerson.

CHARITY.—I cannot condemn a man for ignorance but behold him with as much pity as I do Lazarus. It is no greater charity to clothe his body, than apparel the nakedness of his soul.—St. Thomas Brown.

"THIS IS THE WAY THE MONEY GOES."—In the year 1843, £8,001,449. 1s. 4d. were spent by the people of this kingdom in tobacco: a tolerably round sum to "and in smoke." If the weed had been worked into pigstall, rather more than half-an-inch thick, it would have formed a line 90,470 miles long—long enough to go nearly five times round the world!

FREE-TRADE A LANDOWNERS' QUESTION.

It is impossible for the advocates of monopoly to deny that the object of the Corn-Law makers was to keep up rents. This is proved by the debates of 1814 and 1815 on the subject. But it is no less true that the restrictive system then established by the owners of land was founded upon a narrow and partial view of their own interests. Their gain, if any, was temporary and precarious; while their anxiety to support the laws intended to keep up rents has ever since placed them in a false position with relation to the rest of the community. Already are the tenant-farmers beginning to acknowledge their obligations to the League, for exposing the errors and mischiefs of the protective system; and the day is not far distant when the landowners will admit that the efforts of the Free-Traders have materially aided the owners of the soil to regain a position of real usefulness.

Landowners have grasped at a mere shadow, and in so doing they have lost the substance of much real wealth and enduring influence; and the result has been alike unsatisfactory to themselves and injurious to the community. We have repeatedly shown the various modes in which the tenant-farmers have been injured and depressed by the Corn Laws and their consequences, direct and indirect; that agriculture has been for thirty years past the only business into which men of capital and enterprise have entered reluctantly; that it has been one in which ordinary skill and ordinary means would not secure the usual rate of remuneration; and, as a necessary consequence, that, while all other arts have advanced with unexampled strides, the art of husbandry has been nearly stationary. We have been accustomed most frequently to expose the evils to which tenant-farmers and farm-labourers have been subjected by this state of things, because they have been the victims of legislation intended by the legislators for their own benefit; and because the monopolists have of late years contrived to use as a stalking-horse the alleged interest of the industrious agricultural classes in the monopoly. But has protection really benefited the landowners? Without hesitation we say it has not. It is true, that the Corn Laws created a belief amongst farmers that a certain high range of prices could be maintained by means of acts of Parliament, and induced them to engage to pay rents calculated upon such prices; and that rents so calculated have proved to be higher than, according to the existing state of agriculture and actual prices, the lands are worth. At first sight this looks like an advantage to the landowner,—an unfair and unrighteous one certainly, but still an advantage. Let us examine the subject, however, and we shall find that, as in all other cases of unjust gain, there have been more than equivalent losses. In the first place tenants, in expectation of obtaining the prices promised by act of Parliament, have adopted a style of farming far lower than they would have done had no artificial enhancement of prices been attempted. They have produced much less than they would have produced had the trade in grain been regulated only by the natural laws of supply and demand; and though the landlords have probably obtained, through the Corn Laws, a larger proportion of the gross produce of the soil, there is not the slightest doubt that, if Free Trade had been permitted in 1815, the actual rents of agricultural land would at this moment have been much higher than they are, because the gross produce of land would have been immensely greater than it now is. And, what is even more important to the landowners, their rents would have been safe. They would have been paid by tenants obtaining living profits. What landowner can at this time say so much of his rents?

On every side we hear of abatements of rent. That miserable plan of giving up ten, fifteen, or twenty per cent. upon the rental, because the tenants are unable to pay in full, is in operation. If there be anything in which farmers are unanimous it is that landowners must make sacrifices to meet the time. And all the time everything relating to farming is in a provisional state. There is much talk of improvements in husbandry, and undoubtedly the art is making considerable advances amongst a small number of intelligent persons; but, as regards the majority of average farmers, little has been done, and it may be safely said, little will be done until the Corn Law question has been settled; and it is upon the state of average farmers that the rentals of the landowners depend. The question, then, which has to be resolved is—How will Free Trade affect the ability of ordinary farmers to pay present rents? This is of necessity, the most anxious consideration of the landowners. We believe there is also an earnest desire with most landowners that their present tenants should be enabled to continue in their farms. We have often had occasion to tell the landowners many unpleasant but wholesome truths, and we feel that we are doing them a service in telling them that the majority of landowners are kindly towards their tenants. Little that of many tell

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

THE NEXT AGGREGATE MEETING of the LEAGUE, in the THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN, will be held on WEDNESDAY next, the 18th inst. GEORGE WILSON, Esq., will take the Chair at SEVEN O'CLOCK precisely.

The Meeting will be addressed by RICHARD COBDEN, Esq., M.P.; JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., M.P.; and W. J. FOX, Esq.

Tickets of admission to all parts of the House may be had as usual at 67, Fleet-street.

Seats will in future be reserved for all Farmers who may make application at the Offices of the League, up to the hour of meeting; and their attendance, whether favourable or opposed to Free Trade, is especially requested.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"J. C., Old Brentford."—Sir,—I take the liberty of calling your attention to a statement in the LEAGUE of this week under the head Registration, viz., that to qualify a person for the county by rent, it must be £50 per annum under one landlord; ought not that last sentence to be left out? Does it make any difference whether the rent be paid to one, two, or three landlords? I know a man who has voted, and is still a registered voter, and yet pays a rent in two parishes, and to two landlords. I, myself, also pay rent to two landlords, and was registered without opposition; so that I think the words referred to cannot stand as part of the law. I should like to have this matter understood, else it might be a stumbling-block to some, for there are many paying £50 rent, but not all to one landlord; and some such I know who intend to register this year.—I remain, yours truly.—June 9, 1845.

[The Court of Common Pleas, last Michaelmas term, in the appeal of Gadaly and Barrow, South Lancashire, decided, "A party occupying two sets of premises, under two landlords, one at £40 a year and the other at £10, cannot be said to occupy any premises at a rent of £50; it must be one holding at a rent of £50, under one landlord, to entitle the claimant to vote."

"A West of England Free-Trader must be of age before he can legally claim to vote.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, June 14, 1845.

One of those singular and important meetings of the labourers of Wiltshire, which evince the most rooted hatred of the Corn Laws in the class for whose benefit they are audaciously said to have been enacted, has just been brought under our notice, by our able contemporary the Wiltshire Independent, in his paper of Thursday last:—"The meeting was held at Upavon, a populous village in the fertile 'Bourne,' a district purely agricultural, and where, if any where, the farm-labourers might be expected to be in favour of that 'protection' which so many land-owners and farmers declare to have been devised for their especial benefit. But even here, 'protection,' such as is afforded by the Corn Laws, is sadly at a discount, and hundreds of men, spite of the threats of the farmers, their masters, to discharge them if they attended the meeting, wended their way to it after a hard day's toil, to discuss their grievances and to make them known to the public. Upwards of 1000 persons, chiefly consisting of agricultural labourers, some of them accompanied by their wives and elder children, were present, and formed an imposing and interesting scene, assembled, as they were, under a fine old tree on the green. The meeting was conducted in the most orderly manner, and the deepest interest was exhibited by all present in the proceedings."

The chairman and the speakers all belonged to the class of farm-labourers, and they described their grievances with a natural eloquence which was clearly the result of thorough conviction united to plain common sense. David Keele, the chairman, declared that the labourers after a hard day's work could earn no better subsistence than potatoes and salt, and his hearers responded, "We don't get half enough of that." His illustration of the coercion used by the protectionists to stifle the complaints of the labourers was equally clever and characteristic:

"Our opponents, in my part of the country, serve the people like as the carters used to do the ploughboys when I was a boy. They would give the boys the whip, and threaten that they would give it them again if they told their parents; and so it went on from day to day. The case is the same with the labourers. Your masters say, if you come forward to tell your case, you shall be turned out of employment (hear, hear), and thus they keep you in fear; and you will never be better as long as you are kept down in this way. But if you come forward boldly and tell your case, you can't make it worse. ('That's true.') If the ploughboy had told his father of the carter, the carter would have been punished, and that is what he was afraid of. Your are prevented coming forward by the arbitrary conduct of your opponents (hear, hear), but fear not their frowns: they are in the hands of the Lord, and can only go so far as he permits. Always remember, however, that, whatever law is issued by the Legislature, we are bound to obey; whoever resists the powers that be, resists the ordinance of God. It is the arbitrary Corn Law that has done all the mischief, and we believe Free Trade will be beneficial to ourselves and families. (Loud cheers)."

Mr. Westell dwelt with great force on the injury which the Corn Laws inflicted on the farmers by affording an excuse for the exaction of oppressive rents, and thus forcing tenants to stint the wages of labour. Abundant proof was given of the utter inadequacy of the wages of the farm-labourers to procure sufficient sustenance, to say nothing of comforts. One man with five and another with eight children declared that their earnings were only 7s. per week. The examples given of "the short and simple annals of the poor" were equally graphic and affecting:—

"The children," said Ozias Lealey, "would jump across the house if they saw a couple of potatoes, and quarrel which should have them. It was enough to drive a man mad. When he came home at night, and found them crying for food, and he had none to give them, it almost drove him mad; he could not stand it another winter. What would the gentlemen think of this, filled as they were with their roast beef and sherry wine; when the poor man was happy in heaven he knew not where the rich would be. [Several people exclaimed that every one with a family was in the same state, and many others would have come forward to speak, but were kept back by fear.]"

At the conclusion of the meeting three cheers were given for the League, and three for the repeal of the Corn Laws. These are significant facts: they show that, where the labourers are allowed to think and act for themselves, the artificial scarcity superinduced by restrictive laws is as indignantly denounced, because it is as severely felt, as by other classes of the community.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Minister of Marine presented to the Chamber of Deputies on Tuesday the demand of a credit for reinforcing the squadron stationed on the western coast of Africa, in virtue of the convention lately concluded for the repression of the slave trade. M. Guizot entered the hall while his colleague was reading the exposé des motifs of the bill, and was surrounded and complimented by his friends. The Minister of Marine next deposited on the table copies of the convention, signed in London on the 29th of May last, and of the instructions to be given to the superior officers in command of the respective stations. M. Thiers afterwards ascended the tribune, and reminded the Chamber of its recent decision relative to the enforcement of the laws against the Jesuits, and trusted that the Ministry had taken it into serious consideration. The Minister of Justice replied, that no new fact had occurred in the interval to require the enforcement of those laws. He felt, he said, all the importance of the question, and would give it a prompt solution when necessary.

The Akhbar of Algiers states that on the 2nd instant, Marshal Bugeaud had an engagement with the Arabs near Orleanville, and defeated them, killing 50, capturing 150, and taking a considerable quantity of cattle.

SPAIN.—The Castellano announces that the troops and carabinieri who had marched from Murcia for Algeiras on the 19th, to intercept a convoy of smuggled goods on its way to this last town, had returned without being able to effect their purpose. The entire population of the district had taken arms to protect the smugglers, and several musket shots were exchanged between the people and the military force. The parish priest, however, having interfered, hostilities ceased, and the troops and carabinieri were obliged to retire, without executing their orders.

HOLLAND.—A petition to the Second Chamber of the States-General has been drawn up, and signed by a number of wholesale and retail dealers at Amsterdam, representing the injury done by the existing excise laws, especially the excise duty on sugar; they show that while the sale diminishes the consumption increases; this they affirm is owing to the great extent to which smuggling is carried on, especially on the eastern frontier of the kingdom, so that not only the commerce in refined sugar from Amsterdam, the centre of its production, to the province of Drenthe, Overijssel, and Groningen is stopped, but, contrary to the natural course of things, large quantities are constantly sent from these provinces to Amsterdam.

BERGUM.—From the information received from several parts of the kingdom, we learn that the appearance of the corn, especially rye, promises an abundant harvest; the country has not for many years looked so well. Even the rapeseed, which it was thought would wholly fail, has a very favourable appearance in several places. A letter from Antwerp, of the 4th inst., says:—"We have observed that for some days past the price of wheat has fallen in several markets. Since yesterday it is free from import duty. We expect a large supply of wheat from London; three vessels loaded with wheat have arrived this morning, and others will arrive this afternoon. There have been violent storms in several parts of the country, with torrents of rain, and in some instances with hail, which caused considerable damage. Some buildings were struck by lightning, but no very serious injury was done."

AMERICA.—The packet-ship Queen of the West arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday morning; she sailed from New York on the 21st ult.; the news supplied is trifling, and of very little importance. Nothing new had transpired in reference to the Oregon question. We have advices from Texas to the 7th ult., which state that opposition to annexation had almost entirely disappeared. Public meetings in favour of the measure are held throughout the country, and the Houston Star of the 3rd thus speaks of the position of the Government with regard to it:—"We rejoice to say that we have the most positive evidence that the President and a majority of the members of the Cabinet are anxious to act with the utmost harmony with the people, and will cordially co-operate with them in their efforts to consummate this great measure at the earliest practicable period."

THE RIVER PLATS.—The brig Chilmark arrived at Liverpool on Monday evening from Buenos Ayres, bringing advices to the 5th of April, and Government despatches. Private letters mention that on the 30th of March official despatches were received at Buenos Ayres from General Oribe, dated the previous day, announcing the complete defeat of Rivera by General Urquiza on the 27th, at a place called India Rivers, 90 miles north of Monte Video, after an action of two hours, with the loss of all his infantry, artillery, and baggage; 1000 men were said to have been killed, and 500 prisoners taken, including a great many officers. Rivera is reported to have escaped with eight men. Great rejoicings were made at Buenos Ayres on account of this triumph, which, the advices state, no one doubted to have been a serious affair, from which results of importance would probably arise.

TAHITI.—The Sydney papers of the 6th of February, received on Tuesday, state that the accounts from Tahiti of the 29th of December last left Queen Pomare residing in a fortified place at Raiatea, refusing to hold any communication with the French. According to their own accounts, the French were going on quietly in the island.

DOMESTIC.

The Board of Trade have issued a return of the number of railway accidents for the quarter ending April 1st, 1845; by which it appears that 22 persons were killed, and 17 injured more or less seriously. Of the fatal accidents, all, except four, happened to persons connected with the lines, and the others in a similar proportion.

It is rumoured that Mr. Milnes Gaskell, now a Lord of the Treasury, will be made Secretary to the Board of Control, in the place of Mr. Emerson Tennent, who goes out to be Colonial Secretary in Ceylon; and that Sir Charles Douglas, M.P. for Warwick, will succeed Mr. Milnes Gaskell. Let the electors of Warwick be on the look-out.—Globe.

It is a very extraordinary circumstance that Mr. Thomas Bowles, who was on board the Royal George when she sunk, and who is now, probably, the only survivor, should have been on the Yarmouth Suspension-bridge during the late accident. He was precipitated into the water, but was once more providentially saved. He is, we hear, about 83 or 84 years of age.—Bury Post.

In the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal green, the board of guardians have issued an order, offering rewards for the apprehension of no less than ten persons who have deserted their children, nearly thirty in number, and left them chargeable to the parish.

On Monday morning, the Waterman steamer No. 3, which had taken in several passengers at the Westminster-bridge floating pier, was rounding from the landing-place, and had arrived opposite the Duke of Buccleuch's mansion, about 200 yards distant, when she struck violently upon a barge laden with 50 tons of gravel, which had sunk during the night. The iron plates on the larboard side of the Waterman were driven in by the violence of the shock, and the water rushed into the fore cabin and soon filled it, but the vessel being divided into compartments by watertight bulkheads, it could not penetrate further.

In the western districts of Perthshire the epidemic among cattle is very prevalent, and one farmer has lost seven cows within the last fortnight. The symptoms of the disease are similar to those which have been manifested elsewhere; and, unless where proper treatment has been adopted early, it seems to be generally fatal in its effects.—Perth Courier.

Twenty-four farmers, whose stock, it is supposed, will sell for £600 each, are known to be preparing to emigrate from Bodedern and the adjoining parishes.—Shrewsbury Chronicle.

At a meeting in Edinburgh, on Saturday, Sir James Forrest presiding, an association was formed "for protecting the interests of the poor, and for preventing or lessening, chiefly by moral influence, the ejection of numbers of small tenants, especially in the Highlands, and for mitigating the distress consequent on such ejections," to be called "The Scottish Association for the Protection of the Poor." Several cases of grievous, if not fatal, distress were mentioned, arising from ejections or inadequate parochial relief; and the "commission" sent down by the Times to inquire into the clearances of Sutherland and Ross was alluded to and loudly applauded.

Mr. O'Connell is making a repeal tour in the south of Ireland, and is every where received with enthusiasm by vast crowds of the poorer classes.

The Repeal Association met at the Conciliation-hall, Dublin, on Monday. Owing to the absence of Mr. O'Connell the attendance was very scanty. Mr. John O'Connell brought forward a petition against the 10th clause of the new Irish Colleges Bill, which gives the right to Government to appoint the professors. The petition was agreed to. The rent for the week was announced at £370.

Since the recent fatal fires the vestrymen of the parish of St. Marylebone have taken the subject of fire-escapes into their consideration, and in order that no delay may take place, should a fire occur in that parish, of having fire-escapes at hand to rescue the inmates, have caused to be printed and exhibited all over the parish large bills, stating where the fire-escapes are to be found at all hours.

The 13th Light Dragoons, while en route, had a talk on Sunday at Maryborough, Major W. D. Hamilton in command. The major stopped at Fallon's Hotel, and not having called for any attendance during the forenoon, suspicion was excited, the more so as his bed-room had been made fast on the inside. The proprietor of the hotel with others forced open the door at two o'clock, when to their astonishment and horror they found the major lying on the broad of his back waltering in his blood. It seemed that the unhappy gentleman had cut the veins and arteries of his sword arm with a razor. Surgical aid was in immediate attendance, and the arteries were tied up. The major is a native of Bath, and attained the majority only a few months ago. He is better.—Freeman's Journal.

Since Saturday last the arrivals of shipping in the river Thames from foreign ports have been exceedingly numerous, and the respective docks now present an extraordinary bustle, furnishing for a time employment to many labourers, who previously had been without the means of supplying themselves and their poor families with the common necessities of life. The arrivals from foreign countries, independent of coasters, amount to 128, many of which are richly laden.

On Wednesday last the ship William arrived from Hobart Town in the West India Dock, with a cargo of sugar and rum, and a number of passengers. The ship has ever been reported into this country, and is one of the world. The wheat is of a superior quality, and grain being the size of a pea, and it is supposed to be ceptible of great improvement when subjected to our improved mode of culture. The William Jardine, in addition to the wheat, brought 1400 bales of wool and a quantity of tallow.

During the last few days several gentlemen's houses have been robbed, chiefly at the west end of the town, by persons who, it is supposed, have watched the owners from home, and taken that opportunity to inquire for them. It is then their custom to request the liberty of the house, which finished, they get the servant to writing a note, which they seal it, and, during their absence, fetch them a light to seal it, and, during their absence, percolate any article within their reach. Several valuable watches and time-pieces have been thus abstracted, besides other descriptions of property; and the rogues have actually acknowledged in their notes the immense benefit the trifle they have taken will be to them.—Globe.

From a return just made to Parliament, we learn that plans and sections for the formation of no less than 8080 miles of railway in Great Britain and Ireland have been deposited with the Railway Department of the Board of Trade.

A dreadful explosion from gunpowder took place in a respectable tradesman's shop, named Steele, at Durham, on Monday last, which was attended with very lamentable results. Two or three persons were buried in the ruins, but happily extricated without loss of life. Others were seriously injured.

There is a bill now before the House of Commons to make the stealing of dogs a misdemeanor. For the first offence, before a magistrate, the party may be committed for a period not exceeding six months, or be fined above the value of the dog a sum not exceeding £20; for the second offence to be indicted, and may be transported for seven years; or imprisoned, or fined and imprisoned. A penalty of £20 may be levied for having possession of stolen dogs or their skins.

We understand that the Belfast Repealers have a requisition to Mr. Dr. O'Connell, jun., in course of signature, requesting him to become a candidate for the representation of Belfast, on the expected vacancy.—Northern Whig.

The report circulated last week that Mr. Satchell had died in consequence of the shock he received at the fire in Fenchurch-street, in which his wife and child perished, is contradicted; that gentleman, we are glad to say, is reported alive and well.

A decision of considerable importance, connected with the opening of Trinity College, was pronounced in the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, on Tuesday. In the present term, Mr. O'Hagan, on behalf of Mr. D. C. Heron, a Roman Catholic student of Trinity College, moved the Court that a peremptory mandamus should go to the visitors, the Primate and the Archbishop of Dublin, requiring them to hear Mr. Heron's appeal against the decision of the Provost and Senior Fellows, who had refused him a scholarship, because he was a Roman Catholic, and would not take the Sacramental Test. The Chief Justice gave, this day, the unanimous decision of the court, that the peremptory mandamus should go, notwithstanding the return of the visitors. "This (the Dublin Evening Post remarks) is a judgment of the last importance. It raises the question distinctly as to the right of the Catholics of Ireland to scholarships—of which they have been so long deprived. The law is with them. High legal authorities at the bar and in the college are such that, and we confidently anticipate that justice will at last be done. We congratulate the country on this great step in advance towards it."

A GAME-LAW FACT.—For the last three months, one John Grantham, a glove-maker, of Gawcott, who has a wife and five children, has been suffering under game-law proceedings, at the instance of that very feeling nobleman, Buckingham's Duke. We find that John (the glove-maker) having the fear of Richard's (the Duke's) vengeance before his eyes, did, as the latter's gamekeeper avowed, make a hare in the hamlet of Lisborough. The working man was charged by Buckingham's factotum in game matters with having taken the said hare, whereupon the justice, before whom he was so charged sentenced him to pay by less a sum than £5. 10s. fine and costs, or to be imprisoned. After a fortnight's imprisonment the said £5. 10s. were raised by Grantham, and he was liberated. This was a disappointment to his prosecutors. Fresh proceedings were determined upon. Grantham was surcharged in double duty for having killed Richard's hare without a certificate; a distress warrant was issued against him for £28. 1s. 6d., the double duty. This amount his goods and chattels would not realize, and he was in consequence conveyed to the above prison to await her Majesty's pleasure, or till the amount was paid. In consequence of his having an interest in two mortgaged cottages, which he has offered to any one who will pay the money and release him, the parish refuse to assist his wife and family.—Oxford Chronicle.

A PROHIBITION TARIFF.—The Gibraltar Chronicle of May 6th contains an official translation of the new tariff imposed on all goods imported into the Emperor of Morocco's dominions, from which it would appear that that potentate is no great friend of Free Trade. Most of the duties are nearly prohibitory, and some of them are altogether so. Woollen cloths imported into Morocco must pay 2s. 1d. per yard; raw silk, 4s. 2d. per lb.; cotton goods, from 10 to 12 yards, 1s. 0d. per piece; from 20 to 24 yards, 2s. 1d. per piece; 36 to 40 yards, 3s. 1d. per piece; which is equal to from 35 to 50 per cent. ad valorem. Raw cotton and refined loaf sugar, which formerly paid 4s. 2d. per cwt., will now pay 2s. 10d. Nothing is said in the Gibraltar paper as to the probable cause of the alterations, which appear to have excited considerable interest. The British merchants residing there, who trade to Barbary, are said to be making a representation of their case to the Board of Trade, with a view to obtain some relaxation of the prohibitory system. It is considered not unlikely, that when the Emperor finds out, as he is sure to do ere long, that in the arithmetic of the custom-house, two and two do not always make four, he will deem it necessary to make another alteration of the tariff. It is reported at Gibraltar that, in the treaty at present negotiating between France and Morocco, by M. Delarue, there is a clause to the following effect:—"That all articles, the produce of Barbary, are to be admitted into Algeria duty free; and, in return, French manufactures are to pass free from Algiers to Barbary."—Manchester Guardian.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MARK-LANE, Monday, June 9.—The supply of English Wheat fresh up to this morning's market is moderate. It has been taken off readily at the prices of this day week. In Foreign Wheat there is not much doing; but one or two cargoes of fine Dantzic have been purchased on speculation. Some extremely fine Australian has fetched as high as 60s. per quarter. Barley, of which the arrivals are not large, continues to have a very limited sale. Oats are in fair supply, and sell easily at last Monday's rates. There are scarcely any Beans or Peas offering, and both are fully 1s. per quarter dearer.

FRIDAY, June 13.—The weather this week has been uninterruptedly brilliant. This, together with a fair arrival of English Wheat since Monday, has made the trade flat. There is, however, some demand for fine Dantzic Wheat, at about late rates. No English Barley has arrived this week; but the trade continues very dull. The supplies of English and Foreign Oats are quite trifling; and there are no Irish fresh up this week. All descriptions are held at higher rates, and the little business doing is from 6d. to 1s. advance from Monday. Beans and Peas sell in retail quantities at high prices; the duty on both these articles declined 1s. yesterday.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 91.]

SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1845.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing a acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quintin Dairymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Birmingham and the neighbourhood are respectfully informed, that Subscriptions may be paid by Free-Traders to Mr. Charles Geach, Midland Bank, Union-street, Birmingham, the local Treasurer.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

REGISTER, REGISTER, REGISTER!

The first step which requires to be taken is that of the claims for counties. The time for making these claims is from the 20th of June to the 20th of July, inclusive; any claim made after the latter date will be too late.

The county franchise is divided into four important classes of qualification:—

1st. Freehold, which includes the ancient 40s. freehold of inheritance for ever; and property held under a lease for lives, which should be described as freehold in the notice of claim.

2nd. Leasehold for a term of not less, originally, than 99 years, of £10 clear annual value; or if for a term of not less than 20 years, of £50 clear annual value.

3rd. Copyhold of £10 annual value.

4th. Occupiers of land, or building and land under one landlord, subject to a bonâ fide rent of £50 a year.

In the first class, the owner of a 40s. freehold for ever must have been in possession from the 31st of January of the present year; and the same in the case of the owner of leasehold for lives of 40s. a year, provided he be himself in the occupation of the property. If the owner of the lease for lives do not occupy, the property must be of the annual value of £10.

In the second class, the owner must have been in possession from the 31st of July, 1814.

And in the third class, the occupation must also be from the 31st of July, 1814.

It will be obvious that the first thing to be done by our friends is to ascertain how many Free-Traders there are in each parish possessing qualifications, and who are not on the register; and this should be set about forthwith, that the notices of claim may be made in proper time.

There are various means of obtaining this information, as, for instance—

In all those districts where the purchasing of qualifications, as recommended by the League, was taken up systematically, lists of the names will have been kept by those who made the conveyances.

The year-books may be examined carefully to ascertain the names of owners of property, and also £50 freeholders, who are not registered.

Quakers, and collectors of rates and income-tax; building and land agents, who are friendly, may be consulted for information.

In the neighbourhood of large towns, such as Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, &c., there are merchants, bankers, and others, who occupy large houses and farms in the suburbs at a rental of £50; these, if not within the parliamentary borough, will be qualified, and, if not on the county register, should claim. Last year, on a careful examination of the rate book of a township just over the boundary of the borough of Manchester, from forty to fifty occupiers of this description were found who were not then on the register for South Lancashire.

The next thing to be done is to take care that the claims are made out in proper form, and served in due time.

It is most convenient to use printed forms of notice; and these should be filled up with the greatest care, the following particulars being closely attended to:—

The name of the claimant to be written at full length.

The place of the claimant's abode (not the place where his business only is carried on).

The nature of the qualification must be correctly described in the third column. Any misdescription here will be fatal if the vote should be objected to. Leasehold or copyhold must not be described as freehold; or freehold as leasehold.

The situation of the qualification must also be accurately given as required in the fourth column. In cases of successive occupation, as, for instance, where the voter has removed from one farm to another since the 31st of last July, each set of premises must be set forth in the claim.

A correct copy of each claim must be kept, and the claim and the copy must each be signed by the claimant himself.

Should any of our friends desire to be furnished with further information on any particular point, they will please to address their inquiries to Mr. Paulton, League-office, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. Hickin, Secretary to the League, Manchester.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

LOOK TO THE REGISTER!

We again entreat our friends to be vigilant, active, and prompt in the business of that general election whose initial process commenced yesterday, and will continue until the 20th of July, inclusive.

We cannot call it by any other name; no other word would adequately represent the fact. This is the distinctive peculiarity of the constitution under which we have been living, in this country, since the year 1832:—Registration is virtual election. It is not wonderful that the people of Great Britain have taken thirteen years to learn this, and have not quite learned it yet. Such a constitution as that of 1832 is perfectly new, and without precedent in the history of nations. The world has had ample experience of all varieties of forms of government—monarchical, aristocratic, democratic, and mixed—this alone excepted. But a government by registration; a government which gives so much to democracy, and so little to democratic enthusiasm and impulse; a government where the popular will is practically everything, if it express itself through the medium of certain complicated technical forms, compliance with which must precede, by months or years, the actual exercise of the powers which those forms authenticate—and next to nothing, if those forms are neglected; a government where popular elections take place by anticipation, under another name, noiselessly, indirectly, almost privately, and in the entire absence of all the ordinary excitements of popular feeling;—this is something quite new. There never was a constitution, resting ultimately on a popular basis, which exacted from the people so large an amount of what may be called the unpopular virtues—forethought, patience, calculation, dogged determination and perseverance, sleepless attention to minute and tiresome details. It is no business of ours here to criticise this constitution. We must take it as it is, good or bad, and do the best we can with it. Through the medium of this same constitution—by the large popular powers which it confers, exercised under the technical conditions which it imposes—must the national industry now work out its emancipation. The battle of Free Trade must, like every other political conflict of this generation, be fought in the registration courts.

Everywhere, except in the registration courts, the battle has been fought, and the victory won. But that victory is, and must remain, barren, until the constituencies are ready to make it their own. We trust this will be quite understood. The Parliamentary triumphs of which we boast—and most justly boast—are a reason, not for slackened, but for redoubled popular exertion. Were the leaders of the great Parliamentary parties still advocates of protectionist principles, there might seem less occasion for solicitude about registration. There would be room for hoping something from their conviction and conversion. But they are convinced—and we are none the better for it. We have got their conversion—and we see what it is worth. Sir Robert Peel understands our question perfectly—as well as we understand it ourselves. He "believes" the Free-Trade principles "to be sound," and he even "claims the liberty of continuing the application of those principles." Yet he deliberately leaves this country to face the fearful contingencies of a backward and deficient harvest, with the granaries of the world barred against us. What can more impressively show that registration is the one thing now to be done? The openly and emphatically avowed Free-Trade convictions of the Cabinet, and their obstinate maintenance of a monopolist policy, afford together the most powerful incentive that can be imagined to a decided and energetic expression of the will of the constituencies. They tell us that a successful registration is absolutely necessary, and that it will be infallibly effectual.

We beg our friends and constituents, the Free-Trade public of Great Britain, to work in this matter, not only with activity and patience, but with faith—a faith hearty, entire, and undoubting. On the most desperate-looking registration list of the most monopoly-ridden county, look not despairingly. Though it should seem that your utmost efforts can only avail to effect an inappreciable reduction of a monopolist majority, make those utmost efforts. No effort can now be quite hopeless. In the present state of parties and opinions, there is no saying, of any electoral district, that Free Trade will to a certainty be in a minority at the next general election. "Whig" and "Tory," as parties, are, to all practical purposes, extinct. Monopoly is a house divided against itself, and the division daily widens. Protectionists are beaten and broken at all points, distrustful of their cause and of one another. The great bubble of 1811 is burst. The "organized hypocrisy" is disorganized past all hope of redemption. The mere number of actual and avowed converts to Free-Trade principles gives no adequate measure of the altered position of our cause in districts now represented by monopolist members. The number of such converts may be comparatively small; but the number is immense of those who will flintily refuse ever again to waste time, strength, enthusiasm, or money in promoting the election of men that seek their confidence by making promises whose fulfilment is a demonstrated and experienced impossibility. When the next election comes, it will find Whiggism and Toryism faded into historical traditions, and landlordism little more than "the wretched remnant of an expiring faction." The Free-Trade principle will be the only principle—the Free-Trade party will be the only party—with which any prudent public man will dream of identifying his tenure, or his hope, of office. Now, now is the time for Free-Traders to get themselves ready for grasping as magnificent an opportunity as was ever placed within a nation's reach.

We rejoice that it is in our power to enforce and illustrate our precepts, by pointing to the admirable example which has been set—especially to counties containing large and populous trading towns—by the Free-Traders of the very important electoral district of EAST SURREY. The subjoined address, just issued by the "East Surrey Free-Trade Qualification and Registration Society," is a most cheering manifestation of a spirit, which, were it general and active through the country, would soon place monopoly among the things that have been:—

"The objects of the society, which has been established by a body of the constituency of Surrey, are to qualify and register Free-Trade electors for the Eastern Division of that county. The population of East Surrey numbers 490,758 souls, of which 377,876 form the commercial and manufacturing communities of the great urban districts of Lambeth and Southwark, while 112,872 only are embraced in the more rural division of the county. Yet so watchful have the landed interest been of their political rights, that of 112,872 inhabitants of the country districts, 8483 have acquired the franchise, while trade, with its town population of 377,876 souls, is represented by only 2823 electors. The Chaudon clause has been worked to its last available vote, while the forty-filling freehold has been comparatively neglected. Land has used the instrument which the law placed in its hands—Trade has refused to listen to the very call of the constitution, which placed within its reach, and for its protection, a compensating political balance. In East Surrey freehold qualifications are easily obtained; and, by certain arrangements of this society, the law and other expenses are rendered as small as possible. In Southwark and Lambeth there are at least 2000 persons already qualified to vote for the county, who are not on the register; and it only requires zeal and industry to convert a majority of 1000 into a majority quite as large. The great object of the society is to secure for the large town populations in the county their fair share of influence in the choice of its representatives. That in Buckingham or Dorsetshire political power should rest exclusively with the landowners may be unavoidable; but this society is resolved, that in East Surrey such a state of affairs shall exist no longer. To enforce this resolution, it is therefore proposed to apply to East Surrey on a large scale those operations in the qualification and registration of electors, which in Lancashire, Yorkshire, Cheshire, and Middlesex have been so signally successful; and the society is enabled to announce that it will receive the cordial co-operation and assistance of the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League."

And we may announce, that the cordial co-operation and assistance of the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League may be freely invoked, and confidently counted on, by ALL constituencies and sections of constituencies that are determined to "listen to the call of the constitution," and to seize and use the powers which the constitution gives for the efficient assertion of rights that are antecedent and superior to all constitutions. The co-operation and assistance tendered by us to the East Surrey electors are given quite irrespectively of the mere circumstance of the local vicinity of East Surrey to Fleet-street, London. The League has no topographical partialities. Wherever Free-Traders are, there is the League. Every Free-Trading constituency, or section of a constituency, throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain, has the League for its neighbour, and may ask and have the League's best and heartiest services in the great national work of the enfranchisement of national industry.

METROPOLITAN AGGREGATE LEAGUE MEETING.

On Wednesday evening the first metropolitan meeting of the League, since the Bazaar, was held at Covent-garden Theatre; G. Wilson, Esq., Chairman of the League, in the chair. The resumption of these meetings, after a cessation of two months, appeared to give an additional zest to the audiences attending them, and, coupled with the announcement of Messrs. Cobden, Bright, and Fox as the speakers for the evening, led to so great a demand for private boxes that the Council were compelled to appropriate the dress circle to that purpose. The unusually large attendance of ladies consequent upon this arrangement, and the setting apart of the orchestra stalls for the accommodation of farmers, many of whom were present, gave to the theatre a somewhat novel and interesting appearance. Several foreigners were present, and among the rest the celebrated American poet, W. C. Bryant, whose name was hailed with loud applause. The announcement of the receipts of the Bazaar, and the realization of £16,000 beyond the £100,000 proposed to be raised during the past year, with the large surplus of unsold goods, was received with most enthusiastic cheering.

Among the gentlemen present were:—Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P.; James Pattison, Esq., M.P.; Arthur Pattison, John Bowring, Esq., LL.D., M.P.; the Hon. C. The CHAIRMAN then came forward and was greeted with loud and prolonged applause, which having subsided he addressed the meeting as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, it is no great novelty to us to see this theatre filled to overflowing; but certainly, looking at the complexion of the stage and every part of the house, I must say it never has been my lot to behold a more brilliant assemblage than that which I now look upon. (Cheers.) It will very naturally be expected that some allusion should be made this evening to those proceedings which have for a time of necessity superseded our nocturnal meetings, only to give place to others of a continuous, more agreeable, and, I believe, equally gratifying description. I mean the Bazaar. (Cheers.) It is not necessary to refer to the immediate reasons for holding it: it was no secret twelve months ago that the League had determined, for the purpose of meeting the current pecuniary wants of this organization, as well as to convey to the country the expression of intense interest which Free-Traders felt in the abolition of all monopoly, to collect a fund amounting to £100,000. (Cheers.) It is also well known that from the first ladies have attended our meetings, and have countenanced by their presence the greater portion of our public proceedings; that, in a time of great distress in our manufacturing districts, when our petitions to the Legislature failed, they memorialized her Majesty, praying that it might please her to look upon the sufferings of the people, and to mitigate them by admitting corn, which was then in bond, duty free. The ladies obtained signatures to those memorials by a personal canvas from door to door, and in the depth of winter, throughout the manufacturing districts of the north of England. (Cheers.) They did more. In 1841 they held a Bazaar in Manchester, which realized the sum of £10,000 sterling; and further, they proposed, in order that they might show their unaltered and unchanged interest in this movement, to complete the £100,000 by holding a Bazaar during the past year in this theatre, which, however, was subsequently postponed until the present year to make way for other movements, perhaps of a more important character. This exhibition has been recently held; and with what success I shall presently show. (Cheers.) As I have said before, if procuring pecuniary contributions alone had been the object to be sought for, a Bazaar in all probability is the last thing to which a powerful body like the League would have committed itself, depending as it does on such a multitude and such a variety of assistance, in order to give it the fullest prospect of success. In the first place we proposed to make it national, and it became so. We received contributions from Shetland at one end of the kingdom, and from Cornwall at the other; and I dare say those who had an opportunity of visiting it will agree with me, that there never was presented to the eye of man in England so great a profusion of every thing which was valuable and beautiful, and that did such credit to the industry and skill of the working men and manufacturers of this country, as in that Bazaar. (Loud cheers.) It is not my intention to enter into details respecting pecuniary considerations connected with the Bazaar, beyond this statement, that, from many districts where it was difficult to forward contributions in goods, small purses were sent (hear); that from many other districts both the one and the other were contributed; and that from every county in England some little acknowledgment was made of the interest which was felt in the Free-Trade cause. (Cheers.) From Devonshire we received in money contributions £41. 5s. 9d., from sales £96. 13s. 6d., making a total of £136. 3s. 9d. From Northamptonshire we received in money £17. 10s. 6d., for sales £121. 0s. 8d., making a total £141. 11s. 2d. From Wales we received in money £32. 4s., for sales £131. 1s. 6d., making a total of £163. 5s. 6d. From Cheshire and Derbyshire in money £72. 13s. 6d., from sales £157. 2s. 8d., making a total of £172. 15s. 8d. From Nottinghamshire we received in money contributions £27. 1s., from sales £205. 6s. 1d., being a total of £232. 7s. 1d. From Gloucestershire we received in money £1. 15s. 6d., from sales £239. 2s., making a total of £240. 17s. 6d. From Staffordshire we received in money contributions £31. 15s., from sales £192. 15s. 5d., making a total of £223. 10s. 5d. From various agricultural counties we received, in money £102. 13s. 6d., from sales £69. 6s. 11d., making a total of £252. 0s. 5d. From Sussex, the money contributions amounted to £33. 12s. 6d., and we received from sales £230. 17s. 4d., making a total of £264. 9s. 10d. (Cheers.) From Leicester we received £58. 17s. 6d. in money, and £238. 18s. from sales, being a total of £297. 15s. 6d. From Cumberland, Northumberland, and Durham, we received, in money £70. 7s., and from sales £253. 1s. 1d., being a total of £323. 8s. 1d. From Warwickshire we received, in money contributions £28. 10s., from sales £387. 10s. 10d., making a total of £416. 0s. 10d. (Hear, hear.) From Shropshire, more particularly from Colebrookdale (loud cheers), we received, in money contributions £30. 16s., from the sale of goods £519. 5s. 4d. (cheers), making a total of £550. 1s. 4d. From London, we received in money contributions £270. 17s. 3d., from the sale of goods £1688. 4s. 5d., making a total of £1959. 1s. 8d. (Loud cheers.) From Scotland we received in money £200. 9s., from sales £1744. 5s. 2d., making a total of £2001. 14s. 2d. (Renewed cheers.) From Yorkshire we received in money contributions £517. 14s. 10d., from sales £3573. 17s. 9d., making a total for Yorkshire of £3891. 12s. 7d. (Loud cheers.) From Manchester we received in money £695. 3s. 1d., from sales £1513. 4s. 11d., being a total of £2208. 8s. (Cheers.) And from the other towns of Lancashire, in money £2209. 12s. 3d., and from sales £2398. 8s. 2d., making a total from Lancashire, including Manchester, of £4610. 8s. 5d. (Immense cheering.) The receipts from the smaller stalls amounted to £1721. 19s.: being from the post-office (laughter) £113. 7s. 6d.; confectionery, £428. 1s.; book-stall, £571. 5s. 2d.; model-room, £213. 3s. 2d.; glass-stall, £80. 18s.; toy-glass, £140. 10s.; medals, £99. 15s. 10d.; curiosities, &c., £77. 18s. 4d. The amount received at the doors was £4815. 17s. 6d.; there was received also for beds for the agricultural labourers £123. 8s., and small subscriptions £233. 6s. 6d.: giving altogether £25,010. 10s. 11d., as the total amount received from the Bazaar. (Immense cheering.) And, notwithstanding this, we have remaining by us as many contributions undisposed of as will furnish another Bazaar equal to any that has ever been held for any other purpose in this country. (Cheers.) But, ladies and gentlemen, there is another very gratifying feature in connexion with the Bazaar. It is the conclusion of our exertions on account of the £100,000 fund. (Hear, hear, hear.) We class the contributions and the fund after this manner. On December 31st, 1844, the public receipts in favour of the fund amounted to £266,009. 7s. 3d. Since received, £3632. 5s. 2d.; Bazaar, £26,046. 10s. 11d.; making a total of £110,687. 13s. 4d. (The audience here rose en masse, and cheered for a considerable time.) But it is not merely in a pecuniary sense that we can congratulate each other on the results which have attended this Bazaar. We were visited the first day we opened by upwards of 8000 persons; and 180,000 individuals passed through from first to last, being an average of upwards of 7000 a day, the Bazaar lasting 17 days from beginning to end, and the receipts averaging more than $1200 per diem. (Cheers.) We feel, then, that the special thanks of the friends of Free Trade are due to those alone who have at this juncture completed the large fund we originally proposed to raise, and have given an earnestness to the country of an interest which was never surpassed upon any other question of the same class—I mean the ladies. (Cheers.) The moral effects of that demonstration will be referred to and felt for many years to come. I have heard but one opinion expressed in the country by those who visited the exhibition, namely, that they never in their lives saw so great a multitude collected together, nor the same order and decorum preserved during the whole of the time they visited it. (Hear.) Your contributions are now diffused throughout the empire, doing your work; and when other things shall take place, which for a time may appear more congenial to the taste of the more energetic Free-Traders, the simple relics of the result of the labours of those who contributed to the Bazaar will be reading a quiet lesson in the domestic circle for years to come. (Cheers.) I have now great pleasure in calling upon Mr. Cobden to address you.

Mr. COBDEN then came forward amidst loud and reiterated cheers, which having subsided, the honourable gentleman spoke as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, I could not help thinking, as my friend the Chairman was giving you those interesting and somewhat novel statistics, that I am following him at some disadvantage, inasmuch as I fear there is little chance of my being able to communicate anything so new, or even so agreeable, to you as he has done. He has just returned from the north, where he has been making up his accounts; I have just come from a railway committee, where I have been on the tread-wheel for the last three weeks (a laugh); as much a prisoner as though I were in Newgate, and with the disadvantage of being conscious that I am in a place where there is more time wasted than even in that distinguished goal. Yet even under the roof of St. Stephen's there has been something of late passing of rather a cheering character, and I think I may say, I do bring good news from the House of Commons. It is not such a bad place after all, especially for agitation. (Laughter.) Last year we made a little mistake at the beginning of the session: we laid our heads together, and came to the conclusion that we could employ ourselves better out of doors in visiting some of the counties and rural districts, and agitating a little in the country; this year we changed our tactics, and we thought that Parliament, after all, was the best place for agitating. You speak with a loud voice when talking on the floor of that house; you are heard all over the world, and, if you have anything to say that hits hard, it is a very long whip, and reaches all over the kingdom. (Laughter.) We determined to confine ourselves during this session to Parliament, and I think the result has shown that it is the best field for our labours. We brought forward a succession of motions. We began with one, in which we challenged our opponents to meet us in committee and examine the farmers and landowners, to show what benefit the Corn Laws had done them; they refused our proposal, and I have no doubt the country put the right interpretation upon their motives. (Hear, hear, hear.) Then my friend Mr. Bright, who is an active-minded man, looked about and thought that, amongst all these burdens upon him, he did not think there was one greater than the game that was eating up its produce. (Cheers.) He felt anxious, it possible, to point out to the landowners where they could find a margin in their account-books to turn a penny, and compensate themselves for repealing the Corn Laws, by abolishing the game laws. And, therefore, he moved for his committee, and was more lucky than I had been, for he has got it; and I have no doubt that in due time, when the secrets of that prison-house come out at the end of the session, he will be able to show you, from the mouths of the most intelligent farmers in the country, that there is one burden which they consider heavier than all their local taxes, county-rates, highway-rates, and even their poor-rates—and that is the burden of these excessive game preserves. (Cheers.) Then we had our friend Mr. Ward's motion, by way of sweeping the ground clear for Mr. Villiers to pass over with his great annual motion. Mr. Ward proposed that they should give a committee to inquire what was the amount of these special burdens of which we had heard so much, in order that we might compensate them, pay them off, and have done with them. They said they would not have any inquiry made into it. (Laughter.) Now, you who are Londoners know an old trick called a "dodge," which is sometimes practised on the credulous and the philanthropic in your streets. A mendicant is sometimes seen walking about with his arm bandaged up; he has a special burden (laughter); it is a grievance, and he makes money by it. But sometimes, if one of the Mendicity Society's officers come and ask him to let him undo the bandage to see what this special damage is, you find these artful dodgers very loth to comply. (Cheers and laughter.) Now, that is the case with our landlords (hear)—I mean the protectionist landlords—only the protectionists; they have been going about extorting the benevolent feelings of the community upon the plea that they are labouring under some serious disadvantage or great and heavy burden; and when Mr. Ward comes forward and offers to undo the burden to let them go free, and take the bandage away, they are like the impostors in your streets—they take to their heels and run away. (Cheers and laughter.) Those were our motions in the House of Commons; that was our place of agitation: but I must admit that we have not done so much for our cause as has been done by our opponents. I must say that I think their motions, resolutions, and amendments have been of much more importance to us than anything we could have done. (Hear.) They had the great and mortal grease debate; and they brought forward their local motion for the relief of farmers by repealing their local burdens; and what do you think one of their very first heard it with my own ears or I would not have believed it—that in the maritime counties, where shipwrecks and accidents occur, dead bodies are washed on shore, and they have to hold inquests on them, and the expense is charged to the county-rates. (Laughter.) Now, that is the argument of the great landed interest. They will not allow a debate, brought forward by Mr. Villiers with his accustomed talent and earnestness. (Cheers.) They heard a rumour in the House, that they had been deceived, known, because they are conscious of their own weakness.

know what the dodge is in the House,—we heard a rumour, before the debate began, that they did not intend to have any discussion on the other side: it was determined they would not talk; and I believe, if my friend Mr. Villiers had not dexterously alluded in the course of his speech—pointedly alluded—to three of their county members in such a way that they were forced to stand up and speak,—I really believe not one of them would have opened his mouth. (Laughter.) But, however, there were three or four of them that spoke. The most significant part of what they said was, as an Irishman would say, what they did not say. (A laugh.) They did not say a word about the farmers upon this occasion; not a syllable about their farmers being interested in the Corn Laws. Why, what a change! Three or four years ago, to my knowledge, they talked of nothing else but the farmers; how they would stand by them, and how they came there to protect the interest of the tenant farmers. I do not know whether it was our challenge to discuss that point in committee, or whether it was from the fact that we happen to have some of the best and most extensive farmers with us,—for I found myself just now seated between Mr. Houghton on one side and Mr. Lattimore on the other (loud cheers),—I do not know whether we may take credit to ourselves, or whether we ought to give the honour to our excellent agricultural friends who have come amongst us; but so it is that nothing is now said in the House of Commons about the farmers having an interest in the Corn Laws; nothing is said about special burdens, for fear we should ask them to undo the bandage. (Laughter.) But the most significant part of that discussion was in the declarations of opinion by the leading men on both sides of the House—by Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham on one side, and Lord John Russell on the other. (Hear.) I was very curious to know what Sir James Graham would say upon the occasion. He had spoken a few nights before on Lord John Russell's motion, and he then brought out in a most gratuitous manner,—I feel deeply indebted to him for it, though I did not see that it was quite relevant to the occasion,—but he then brought out voluntarily, from official sources, some of the most startling proofs that ever I have met with in my experience, showing the extensive evils, physically and morally, that arise from scarcity of food, and the great blessings that overspread the country when food is abundant and cheap. (Hear.) He showed, by the statistics of pauperism, crime, disease, and mortality, that all the best interests of our nature are identified with an abundance of the first necessities of life. My friend Mr. Villiers followed him, and with that promptitude for which he excels, and in which he has no rival, I would venture to say, in the House (cheers), he turned to account every fact that the Home Secretary had dropped, and applied them instantly and with immense force as proof of the truth of the doctrine which he had so long been arguing. And when my friend brought forward his motion a few nights afterwards, he again pinned the Home Secretary to the inference which naturally followed from his speech of the previous evening. I was curious to hear what Sir James Graham would say: I listened with great anxiety to what he would say to the public when he spoke upon the subject. I thought he must draw back a little to please those who sat with blank faces behind him; but no: he got up and reiterated all he had said before. He stated that he did not withdraw one word of what he had uttered; that he did not recant one syllable of what he had said; that those were his principles, and he would abide by them. Sir Robert Peel followed and though he has been going at rather a quick pace lately (laughter and cries of "Punch")—I hear somebody calling out "Punch," well, he is an admirable authority to quote—an excellent commentator, an admirable critic, is Punch—he is never wrong, he is infallibly right: Punch represented Sir R. Peel as going last ahead of Lord John Russell on this occasion;—but I must say that, just as he had been travelling before, he seemed now to have quickened his pace. What a contrast did the speech of Sir Robert Peel present to that which he delivered last year on the same occasion! (Hear.) Then everything was said for the purpose of exhorting the men behind and below him on the same benches; and everything that could be uttered was said to insult the Free-Traders (hear, hear): but he had not then had the grossest debate, nor had he found out the quality of the men then. He has had a twelvemonth's experience: they have set up for themselves; they have found out their weakness, and, what is more, they have let Sir Robert Peel find it out also; and now he can afford to treat them as he likes. The right honourable baronet tells them that he intends to carry out the principles of Free Trade gradually and cautiously; but still that they must be carried out. We had Lord John Russell, and he voted with us. (Hear, hear.) I wish he had done so without any qualification; but, however, as we have got him amongst us, I hope we shall amend him. (Hear, hear.) Lord John Russell proposes a very little fixed duty; but in the same speech in which he propounds this, he tells us he does not approve of a tax on corn: he thinks it is one of the most objectionable taxes that could be raised. Then why does he propose it? He does not intend to keep it; he merely proposes it just to put those people in the wrong who refuse even to put a little tax on corn. I have no doubt next year he will give up that inconsistency, and will be in favour of total repeal. (Hear.) Well, ladies and gentlemen, we came forward, as far as words could convey it, the votes were for us; but that cannot last long. In this country we must be governed by one of two methods: you must be ruled either by moral or physical force. Moral force means governing according to right principles, when those principles are acknowledged to be true. They may govern by a species of moral force when they can manage to persuade men that, while they are governing wrong, they are governing right; but you never can rule by moral force when you yourselves avow that you are carrying on principles which you believe to be unjust and untrue. I think you ought to feel deeply indebted to such meetings as this, which have stood by this question; which have offered on public men in its advocacy; which have aided in disseminating the knowledge that has gone forth from this vast building, in which we have brought the public mind on to show that they are bound to acknowledge the justice of our principles. (Cheers.) Now, there is but one universal opinion—that it is a question of time. Three or four years ago everybody used to tell me that it was a question of time to think of carrying this principle of total repeal.

Now everybody says, "There is no doubt you will effect the total repeal; the only question is as to the time." We have narrowed the controversy; we have reduced it down to one little word. The whole question hinges upon one monosyllable—"when?" I think the Times newspaper put out a very fair challenge to the League the day before yesterday, in a very beautiful article, in which it said we were called upon to argue this question upon that ground; to show the justice, expediency, and policy of our doctrine of "immediate repeal." I have no objection to answer that appeal (cheers); and in doing so, if I am matter-of-fact and dull, you must bear with me, and that patiently, because I shall be followed by those who can treat the subject with greater interest. Mark me, it is quite right, if I am to lay the basis of a matter-of-fact argument, that I should come first. I will be the heavy foundation-stone; and here behind me are the Corinthian capital and the gorgeous pedestal—the architectural beauties that are to grow upon this foundation. It is right, too, that we should have this kind of variety; because one of the boasts of the League is this, that we can find audiences such as could only be assembled in ancient Rome to witness the brutal conflicts of men, or that can now be found in Spain to witness the brutish conflicts of animals (cheers);—we can assemble multitudes as great to listen to the dry disquisitions of political economy. That is our boast. Now, to our argument. As Sir Robert Peel would say, "there are three ways of dealing with this question." (Laughter.) Firstly, you may acknowledge the justice of the principles of total repeal, and you may defer it until it suits your party, or until circumstances compel you to abolish the Corn Laws totally and immediately. Secondly, you may abolish it gradually by a vanishing duty, putting an 8s. tax, and sliding off 1s. a year till it comes to nothing. That may be done by an act of Parliament, and would involve the principle of total repeal. Or, thirdly, you may adopt our principle of total and immediate repeal. (Laughter.) Now, firstly of the first. The policy of our present Government appears to be this—"We will acknowledge the principle; that will stave off debate. We could not meet them in debate if we did not acknowledge the principle; if we took the same ground as the members for Essex, Somerset, and Sussex, we should be rolled over and over in the mud in debate by these Leaguers, and be hoisted and hauled at the corners of the streets, when we walked out of the House." (Laughter.) Well, they give up the principle of protection. But they say, we will not apply our principle of Free Trade; we will tell them, this is not the time; and more, we will not tell them (we will take care of that) what is the time. That shall be as it suits our party. What would be found in the innermost hearts of these men? or, if you could get to their private conferences when they are behind the scenes, what are they thinking about as to the repeal of the Corn Law? I know it as well as though I were in their hearts. It is this: they are all agreed that this Corn Law cannot be maintained—no not a rag of it—during a period of scarcity prices, of a famine season, such as we had in 1839, 1840, and 1841. (Hear.) They know it. They are prepared when such a time comes to abolish the Corn Laws, and they have made up their minds to it. There is no doubt in the world of it. Is that statesmanlike, think you? (Cries of "No, no.") First, for the farmers. They have told them, with all the high authority that belongs to their life and station, that the Corn Laws will be abolished; they tell their tools, the papers, like Grandmamma, to deal out in their diurnal twaddle, the argument that if the Corn Laws are abolished the farmers will be ruined even if they paid no rent. (Laughter.) That is the language of Grandmamma to-day. That is the sort of slip-slop in answer to the admirable article in yesterday's Times. How does this work? In the first place the farmers are told by Sir James Graham and Sir Robert Peel that the Corn Laws must be abolished and Free Trade be established; but it must be done gradually and cautiously. Now, I appeal to my friends Mr. Lattimore and Mr. Houghton, both experienced and able men, whether they could put the farmers in a more disadvantageous position than that in which they are now, under the pretence of benefiting them? They hang them up on the tenter hooks of suspense. These party newspapers are alarming them with all sorts of raw-head-and-bloody-bone stories of what Free Trade is going to inflict on them; and the Prime Minister is telling them that, notwithstanding all that, he is prepared to carry out Free Trade. Nothing could be worse for the interest of the agriculturists, whether farmers or labourers—for the welfare of any class of capitalists, especially for one having such a vast amount of capital and so large an interest at stake as the farmers—to place them in the position which these pretended friends of theirs do by their present policy. Now, what is that policy morally? They will not deal with this question now, when they can do it calmly and deliberately: they wait for a period of excitement and clamour. They are calculating on repealing these Corn Laws some day when Palace-yard is crowded with famishing thousands. What is the effect morally of such a proceeding as that? It is to induce the belief among the people of this country, that moral influence has no effect whatever on their legislation. (Hear, hear.) May they not, after such an example as that, appeal to their countrymen upon any future occasion, when a body of men shall be found willing to exert themselves through a period of years, as the League has done, to effect a great and benign change in our laws,—may they not appeal to such an example as that, and say, "What is the use of your agitation? or what is the use of your printing, passing resolutions, and sending petitions to Parliament? The League tried that for years; they persevered for seven, eight, or nine years; but when 10,000 people met in the street, called aloud in the voice of man-ee, and threatened with danger the persons of their legislators, then they yielded, but never dreamed of doing so till then." (Loud cheers.) Now, the second plan of doing this work is the passing a fixed duty of 8s., and diminishing it 1s. every year. What is the effect of such a change as that on the farmers? They begin with a fixed duty of 8s., or any sum you please. The farmer is told by the land-agent or by the landlord himself, "Well, we have passed a duty of 8s., but you know you have only been getting an average protection of 6s. or 7s. for the last ten years for corn imported; we must try and see what the effect of this will be. We need not talk anything about game laws, under-draining, sub soil ploughing, clearing away these hedgerows, or adjusting rents; wait and see how this law operates." The consequence is, nothing is done, but all must wait. The farmer goes on; next rent day comes; the landlord or his agent says, "Well, Farmer Hobbins, I don't think much harm is done by this change in the Corn Laws: it does not seem to have been of so much good to us after all. We will wait a year or two; I don't think there will be much harm." And so nothing is done: the farmer goes on, in the meantime, exerting himself to meet the coming danger which is apprehended when duty is low. What is going on abroad in the meantime? Why, the foreigner is told, as soon as that 8s. duty comes down to 2s. to 3s., then there will be a wide door opened for grain in England. The foreigner is induced to increase the production every year more and more, expecting to find a market, and when the low duty does come, he is prepared to pour into this country corn, swamping the farmer at the end of this seven or eight years, just as he is now swamped in the month of May or June by an inundation of corn under this sliding scale. (Cheers.) Then we come to our principle of total and immediate repeal. In answer to the word "when"—we say "now." (Loud cheers.) The landlord says it will create a panic, and, in order that that argument may not wear out, they set their newspaper organs to frighten the farmers and keep the argument alive. Well, but what is there to be feared from this total and immediate repeal? We are told there are vast quantities of corn lying somewhere abroad ready to be poured into this market when we repeal the Corn Laws. I think this argument was dealt with so admirably by the Times newspaper that I will just read an extract from its columns of the day before yesterday:—

"Count up every quarter of corn in every one of earth's richest granaries; track all her winding shores, penetrate every creek, and every stream; measure every diluvial delta and every sheltered valley, the natural fertility of the plains and the artificial productiveness of the hills; take the sum of all the warehouses, all the heaps, and all the standing crops; and we entertain no doubt whatever that reasonable and candid men will be astonished above measure at the 'universal nakedness of the land.' The Baltic and the Euxine, the Gulf of Genoa, the St. Lawrence, the Mississippi, and even the rivers that flow under our feet, are names of terror to some minds, as if they flowed with corn. But rivers of corn are as pure and impossible a fiction as rivers of gold. Once you begin to investigate, to measure, and to count, you find the most formidable accumulations dwindle into a few months' or a few weeks' sustenance for such living and growing multitudes as London, Manchester, or Glasgow. There is not too much corn on earth, nor will there ever be till the saddest and awfallest words that ever were spoken are finally unsaid, which they never will be in this mortal world."

Now, there is the profoundest philosophy presented in all the charms of poetic language. But I like to go to experience: I never like to deal in the future, or to argue on what will happen; but let us take the lights of experience to guide us in our paths for the future. (Hear.) We have had occasions in this country, when we have had a sudden demand for corn all over the world for this country as though we had a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. In 1839, 1840, and 1841, during all those three years, the average price of corn in this country was 67s. We ransacked the world for corn during those three years; our merchants sent everywhere for it; we swept over the face of the earth, bringing every nation to send their corn to this rich market, and gain this high price for their produce. I will give you a list of places from which we received corn in one year during that period: from Russia, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Prussia, Germany, Holland, Belgium, France, Portugal, Spain, Gibraltar, Italy, Malta, Ionian Islands, Turkey, Egypt, Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, Morocco, Cape of Good Hope, Mauritius, East India Company's territory, Australia, Canada, United States, Chili, and Peru. Every region on the face of the globe—Europe, Asia, America, Africa, and even Australia—were ransacked for corn. How much do you think we got in the course of that year,—bringing the nations of the earth with the high price of 67s. a quarter? In 1839 we received in wheat and flour together equivalent to 2,875,605 quarters, about 1-8th of the annual consumption of the wheat of this country. In 1840, when we had given them a year's stimulus, the imports were 2,432,765 quarters of corn. In 1841, 2,783,642 quarters. During those three years we imported 8,091,972 quarters, being an average each year of 2,700,000 quarters. Now, mark me, that corn was sent out for by our merchants with a knowledge that the price in this country for corn was nearly 70s. a quarter, and was brought here with the belief and under the conviction that every quarter of it would be admitted into this country under a 1s. duty. There was, therefore, during those three years virtually a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws; and you see the result in the supply for this market. Now, we say, pass an act for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, and you do not put us in the same position that we were in during those years in stimulating other countries to send us corn; for now our corn is 46s. a quarter instead of 67s., as it was then; and, therefore, if you were not inundated with corn in those dear seasons, where is the corn to come from that is to inundate you now? (Loud cheers.) No; there is no such thing as a store of corn abroad in the world; there is no provision made by people for a contingency that they do not expect to arise. There is no cultivator on the face of the earth that has ever put a plough into the ground, or a yoke upon his horse, with the idea of producing one bushel of wheat in order to meet the demands of this country consequent on the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. There is no stock abroad, therefore no supply, except that which has been provided for a known and expected market; and if we repealed our Corn Law tomorrow, there is literally not a quarter of wheat provided in order to meet the demands in consequence of such an abolition of our Corn Laws. But it is our opponents who want to introduce an unnatural and artificial inundation of corn in this market: they by withholding the time, by promising that it shall come, by telling foreigners abroad that when it does come they can compete with our farmers, though they do not pay a shilling of rent,—or, who say to the foreigners, "Wait until Sir Robert Peel is pressed on by the cry of distress to repeal the Corn Laws, and then you may supply all England with corn, for our farmers cannot compete with you."—these are the men who are inviting this inundation of corn; who are not content with circulating fallacies at home, are trying to spread delusion through the Ukraine and in the valley of the Mississippi, over all the face of the habitable globe, and wherever their false and delusive influence can reach. (Cheers.) Now, I have argued this question as it there were only farmers concerned in it; I have dealt with it with a view to the interests of the parties supposed to be likely to be injured by it: but are there no other parties to this question? Why do we advocate the removal of this bad law?—because it is destructive to the interests of the great body of the people. (Hear, hear.) This movement has not taken place, this agitation has not had its origin or been sustained by the vast proportion of the intelligent and humane population of this country because it is an error in political economy—it is opposed because the Corn Law is intended to restrict the supply of the food of this country and to put the nation on short commons. (Cheers.) That is why we oppose this Corn Law; and we do so in the name, not merely of farmers and landowners, but of the great body of the people. If we can show that the law is unjust as respects the interests of the great majority of the people, then, though its total and immediate repeal did involve injury to that class for whose benefit it has been unjustly maintained, it is not an argument that would weigh one instant with me in opposing its total repeal. (Loud cheers.) Whoever said this law was passed for the great body of the people of this country? We have never heard any attempt to show that. We have heard it urged that it was good for the landlords, to compensate them for the peculiar burdens that I have described just now; but you know we have found out that that was an imposture (laughter): we sent the Mendicity Society officer after them. We have heard it maintained that it was for the benefit of the farmer; but farmers are only 250,000 people out of the 27,000,000 inhabitants of these islands: that is their proportion in Great Britain, but whoever heard them argue that it was for the benefit of the great body of the people? They have given up that case, when they say the law ought to be abolished at some time; for I maintain that if this law, which has been in existence for the last thirty years, is not a law for the benefit of the people, they never ought to have passed it; and it is a shame to themselves, and they ought to hide their faces for ever, for having maintained it, if it is not for the benefit of the great body of the people. (Loud cheers.) I say, if it is not for their benefit—and it never was—why on earth should they come forward and say that it should ever be repealed? And if it is to be repealed at all, I say, let it be repealed immediately, as it is an unjust law. (Hear.) They may set up other interests. I believe Sir R. Peel is frequently talking of a due consideration to the great and important interests that have grown up under this law. I plead for the vastly greater and more important interests that have been crushed to the earth under this law. (Cheers.) If they want any proof of this I bring their own Home Secretary, with his prison report and the statistical tables, into the witness box, to prove what the law has done. Now, then, for the sake of that class—the most numerous of all—for the sake of all the unprivileged classes of this country—I plead for the total and immediate repeal of this Corn Law. (Cheers.) I do it upon the ground of expediency, as being better at this moment than any other time in which you could repeal the law. I do it on the ground of justice, because I say if it is not a good law you have not a right to retain it one instant. (Hear.) What will be the effect on the great body of the people when the time comes at which we believe Government contemplate the repeal of the Corn Law? They are going to repeal it, as I told you—mark my words—at a season of distress. That distress may come; ay, three weeks of showery weather when the wheat is in bloom or ripening would repeal these Corn Laws. But how? We had a taste of it in 1839, 1840, and 1841. Are the people of this country to be subjected to another ordeal before this Corn Law is repealed? What provision is made against that calamity? For here is probably the most important consideration for us at the present moment. Divine Providence has repealed the Corn Laws for this year by an abundance at home. He has in a great degree repealed the Corn Laws; but He has not given us the benefit we should have if we had an unlimited range over all which He designed for the good of his creatures over this earth's fair surface; but still we have a mitigation by His bounty of the rigours of the landowners' Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) Suppose another such reverse to take place as we have witnessed in this country within the last six years—such a revolution as the youngest man amongst us has beheld during the period of his life—or supposing it to come this year, what provision is made against such a calamity? I have told you how much corn could be got here in 1839 after our failing harvest of 1838; but there is no such supply available now, as those nations are increasing in numbers along the whole of the maritime districts of Europe. They are wanting more and more of the corn of the interior. The Atlantic states of America are increasing and consuming more and more of the corn of their interior; and we offer them no inducement to spread themselves out from the cities—to abandon their premature manufactures—in order to delve, dig, and plough for us; and they are more and more in a condition to consume all that they produce. (Hear.) I heard in the House of Commons, from Mr. Mitchell, a gentleman himself practically acquainted with the subject, who in an admirable speech that riveted the attention—as all practical speeches in that place do, where men will content themselves with speaking only upon what they do understand (cheers).—I say, in an address which riveted the attention of every one in that House, Mr. Mitchell exposed the bankrupt condition of this country, so far as its future provision of food goes, looking to the whole world as our resources. We have now 300,000 quarters of foreign corn in this country. Where is the supply to come from? Ought we be called upon to answer that question? Not but it ought to be answered by our Government. That is a question which ought to be thrust upon them. (Hear.) I do not believe they have nerve enough to bear the responsibility that will be cast upon their shoulders, if that argument is pressed upon them. Then look at the position in which our unprivileged middle classes and capitalists will be placed, as well as the poor who first suffer from famine, for want of bread. They are not allowed to starve in this country: they have a right to relief, and justly so, from those above them; and, if you have a scarcity, it is the middle classes who must have to support the lower and working classes, and at the same time maintain themselves, with a very inferior business to do it with. Look at our capitalists, who go down to the House of Commons, and into the lobbies; go into one of those places where I dare the misfortune to be at present. Bear in mind that the League has a plan in store, by and breadth of the land. What would be the effect of a bad harvest upon those men who have subscribed their thousands and ten of thousands to some new railway scheme, and have signed the parliamentary contract? It is all very fine and plain sailing now when everything is at a premium, everything is up; get shares to-day, sell them tomorrow, pay for them the next day, and get 20 per cent. (Laughter.) But these shares will be held by somebody; and if we have a failing harvest, whenever it comes, then the day of reckoning for the holders of these shares and scrips will arrive. I would advise every speculator in railway shares to keep a sharp eye on the barometer. He should take in two papers—a railway paper, and the Mark-lane Express; and when he has seen the price of shares, then let him go and observe the price of wheat in Mark-lane. But if a bad harvest comes, and a rise in prices takes place, they are a class that will suffer; and not merely they and their families, but it will entail misery and disasters on every section of the community. Now, these are the points that I want to see urged upon the Government at the present moment. Throw on the Government—as a Government, do not let us be misunderstood—throw on them the whole of the responsibility of this state of things. (Loud cheers.) Now, gentlemen, that is about the completion of my case at present in favour of the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. As the lawyers say,—"Gentlemen, that is my case." But I want to know, if there is nothing to be said in answer to this, why we should not carry the repeal of the Corn Laws, and carry it now? It is merely partisanship. These men cannot make up their minds to admit that they may have been wrong at some former time. What I want to do is this—to open a door as wide as possible for the conversion—the avowed conversion—of our opponents. (Hear.) I wish we could burn Hansard, and all the debates that have ever taken place, in order to let these statesmen be at liberty to adopt a new course of policy, dictated by their present convictions. But they are afraid of being taunted with having said something different before from what they are ready to say now. We have all said something different before from what we have said now. Have we not all grown wiser? Have we not all learned something by the discussions for seven years? (Hear.) I want to see these men get up in the House of Commons and avow that they have learned something by our discussions in that assembly. I set myself up to teach people years ago; I have been learning more than anybody else every day since; and why should not they make that frank and free admission? If they would make an admission and make a clean breast, and confess that they did not know so much formerly as they do now, they would never be taunted afterwards. Now, I have only one word to say, before I sit down, upon another subject. I want to see the people of this country feel alive to the ensuing registration. (Hear, hear.) This next registration will, in all probability, decide the fate of the Corn Laws. Most likely we shall have a dissolution next year. I want every man to make that his business as much as he makes his ledger or his counter his business—every man who is convinced that the Corn Law ought to be abolished to feel it his paramount duty to look after his votes and the votes of his neighbours before the next registration. The work begins on the 20th of this month for the counties. This is the time for men to look after their own votes, and to find everybody else they can that have got votes and will support Free Trade. There is another duty: there are a which we intend to prepare the counties and to conduct them; and I entreat from this place every man interested in this question, that he will make it his paramount duty, from this time, for the next two months, to give his attention to the subject of registration. If we do this, we shall totally repeal the Corn Laws yet, before a famine comes. In doing so you will set a glorious example to all future times, of the way in which such questions ought to be carried. I really hardly regret, though it has been attended with very heavy sacrifice, that the agitation has lasted so long. If we had carried the repeal of the Corn Laws by a multitudinous shout in 1839, 1840, and 1841, it would have been something like yielding to brute force and clamour; but now, why—besides the advantage of repealing the Corn Laws—our agitation will have been attended with many other advantages. We have been teaching the people of this country something more, I hope, than the repeal of the Corn Laws. (Hear.) We have taught the farmers, I trust, to begin to think for themselves; we have made landlords and farmers think of improving their lands; we have taught the middle classes, I hope, that they have a moral power, if they choose to exercise it, and a power of applying it as great as the monopolists, if they will but avail themselves of it; but I hope, in addition, that we shall set an example of truth to the working classes, showing them that these questions can be carried by moral means, and that, if they will accomplish anything for their benefit, then they will adopt precisely the same organization which we have before done to accomplish our object. (The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst most enthusiastic and long-continued cheering.)

The CHAIRMAN came forward and said, Mr. Bright will now address you.

Mr. BRIGHT then came forward, and was received with loud applause. The honourable gentleman addressed the meeting as follows:—Upon every occasion of our meeting in this theatre it has appeared to me that we have been able fairly to find topics of rejoicing and congratulation from the occurrences which have transpired since a previous meeting. To-night, I think, we are in this position more decidedly than at any other time. We have been two months without holding a meeting here with all the formality of a chairman, advertised speakers, and the common routine of a public assembly; but I cannot help looking back to that extraordinary and prolonged meeting which was held from day to day, for seventeen or eighteen days, within this hall. It may fairly be called a monster meeting. If 100,000, or 120,000, visited this building during the holding of that meeting, and became a portion of it, I take it that it was the very largest and the most important assemblage of Free-Traders that has been witnessed since the first organization of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Hear.) We had specimens of the industry and ingenuity of our countrymen engaged in almost every trade; and the vast variety of the products of their skill seemed to me to make, though it were a mute, yet a powerful appeal to the Government of this country on behalf of the millions by whom they were contributed to that great exhibition. We had Free-Traders from every part of the kingdom, and some from foreign countries, who met here face to face, and shook hands with each other—who talked over the progress of this great cause in which we are all so deeply interested, and who renewed again, and solemnly renewed, the pledge which we have made before our country and the world, that the organization of which we are a part, and the agitation with which we are connected, shall never cease so long as there is a law upon the statute-book of this country which interferes with the free exchange of the products of this most industrious people, and makes our country, boasting of its freedom, a laughing-stock and scorn to the world. (Cheers.) I need not here enter into any panegyric on the exertions of those of our countrymen by whose extraordinary sacrifices the late exhibition and Bazaar were carried to a successful issue. In another place, where their virtues and their sacrifices in this cause are not so much regarded, I have spoken in their praise. (Cheers.) Here it may be enough to say, on behalf of this meeting, that from our hearts we thank them for what they have done: we take it also as a pledge of what they are still willing to do: we know that it is through them that this question is not now a question merely of statisticians and political economists, but that it is a question of a deep and overpowering interest at the hearths and in the domestic circles of thousands of homes in this united kingdom. (Cheers.) I am disposed to ask your attention for a few moments to one of the commonest charges which are now brought against all who are anxious speedily to carry out the principles of Free Trade. Many arguments are gone and never will come back, except the dark ages should return upon us. But it is common for people to say that we exaggerate the evil of the Corn Laws, and greatly overstate the advantages which may be expected from their repeal. These statements are made by men who admit the principle for which we contend, but who are for the most part nearly as bad as open opponents, inasmuch as they are but lukewarm friends. Now, I am ready to maintain that no man, however great his power of description, can overstate or exaggerate the evil, the wickedness, and the deep and horrible criminality of the principle on which the Corn Law is based. (Hear.) It is intended perpetually, or, if not perpetually, as often as it may be safe, to give us, and to spread over this land, a partial famine for the sake of private profit. The men who passed the law would not have sent their wives and children to report to Government thereon, if they had believed in their consciences that they were passing a law which was not based on a reference and regard to private profit, but wholly and solely to the public good. (Hear.) It is a law that dooms a portion of the greatest property in this country to partial confiscation. It may or may not give a small increase to the rate of land; it may or may not give a small power to landlords; but one thing is certain, and it is that it does continually and incessantly restrict and interfere with the free exchange and sale of the only property of the vast bulk of the population, which is their labour and skill. (Cheers.) I am not one who pay any undue regard great number of bad votes on the list for counties. Some say we want to disfranchise the people. I do not want to disfranchise any one; but this I do say, that if we are to fight fairly we must fight on equal terms. If we put on false votes our opponents strike them off; we cannot fight them with our legal votes against their illegal votes, and, therefore, we must strike them off. (Cheers.) I have no hesitation in telling you that there are counties where there are many bad votes. I will be bound to say that in Buckinghamshire, for instance, you will find at the very least 1000 I have heard competent people give a surmise that there are 2000 spurious votes on the register in that county. (Hear.) There they are; nobody looks after them; nobody ever thinks of going and objecting to them. Everybody is afraid, because they hear there is some man they call the Duke of Buckingham. (Laughter.) Why, if they would only consider these things a little more rationally, they would see that the Duke of Buckingham, as I assure you, is not a more formidable man in the registration court than any of you here. You, who are Leaguers, consider yourselves as united with a body that can protect you morally, legally, and pecuniarily, against 150 dozen Dukes of Buckingham. (Loud cheers.) Now, there is East Surrey: what a scandal it will be if that county should return two monopolists at its next election. There is not 1 man in 100 in Southwark and Lambeth that is upon county lists, and yet, if you go down into the agricultural districts, you will find one in 30 or 40. It is one in 30 in the agricultural parts of East Surrey, but only 1 in 100 in the metropolitan districts. (Hear, hear, hear.) Now, I say it is the duty of every man to get himself on the list, and his neighbours likewise. There are thousands, I believe, qualified to be there who have not thought of it: it will be a scandal to the people on that side of the river if they do not see to this. We will take care of Middlesex; we have it in hand, and will look after it. (Cheers.) There are a few more counties which we will give you a good account of in due time. I do not consider any county hopeless. I will tell you that we have something else in view besides registration: we will apply our organization to contesting counties as well as registration. (Hear.) Now, why should not the principle of co-operation that we have exercised so long and so usefully be carried out in the work of contesting counties where there is a chance of winning them? Why not have in each parish in every populous county an earnest man who will devote himself, as far as he can, to bringing persons to vote, and appealing to their patriotism and good feeling to vote without putting the candidate to one shilling expense. I say we can contest counties, ay, at one per cent. of the expense of that which it costs our opponents, if we adopt our organization. Why, how can monopolists contest a county without expense? What motives can they appeal to? Where is their organization? It is gone. They are all backbiting each other in their counties. One of their members is accused of voting with Sir Robert Peel, and another voting against him. When they meet in committee they are all pulling each other to pieces just like so many village gossip. (A laugh.) Bear in mind that the League has a plan in store, by to authority; that is, to the opinions and sentiments of men who have lived before us. I think we are foolish if we disregard what they have left us which is wise; but it would be no less foolish if we were to throw away the lessons of our own experience, and go back to rely only on that which they have left us. But I will quote the opinion of a man who is held in great esteem by many who widely differ from us; a statesman, who is acknowledged to have been a far-seeing one, and whose eloquence and power in the senate and as a writer were perhaps never surpassed. Burke says of this very question—"Monopoly is contrary to natural right. Free Trade is the same thing as the free use of property." Well, we have maintained often on this stage, and in every part of the kingdom, that the poorest man in this realm has as much right to his labour and to the whole of its proceeds as any man who wears a coronet or rules with undisputed sway over half a county. (Cheers.) If the property which is in the industry and skill of the people of this country could be placed in a balance, and weighed against the property in jewels, land, plate, pictures, and all the things with which the great of the earth delight themselves, would not the property of those who are called poor be infinitely more—would it not be infinitely more valuable, and infinitely more to be relied upon, infinitely less to be parted with, than the so-called property of the rich? (Cheers.) Then it appears easy to understand this proposition, that Free Trade is the same thing as the free use of property. There can be no justice, and nothing but a hideous wrong in preventing a weaver, smith, or labourer of any kind from freely exchanging that which his labour has created for that which he may want more. I have long held the opinion that in this and in most other lands industry and freedom will give man at least enough of the comforts of life;—in this country above all others, where, in some respects, all classes have a better chance, or have some advantages which are, perhaps, not enjoyed in any other country. But if the law steps in,—if it comes down on the poor, if it oppresses the poor because they are poor—if it denies them the commonest, most obvious, simple, and natural rights,—I know not how we should have other than a vast body of the lowest classes of society sunk continually in the lowest and most degrading suffering. (Cheers.) The case which we bring before the public we believe not to be a vague and fanciful one. We do not deal very largely in the prophetic; we rely on facts—facts that are passed and are upon record, and well authenticated; and facts, speaking with an equally loud voice, passing around us on every side. I would wish to ask your attention especially to some facts with respect to one town in this kingdom, to show that we do not exaggerate the evil of the Corn Laws, nor picture in too high colours the advantages that we should derive from their abolition. I allude to the town of Bolton, in Lancashire. I may state that the circumstances which I am about briefly to bring before you were collected by gentlemen of high statistical knowledge and of great information, and most painstaking men on all these subjects. They were collected for the use of Mr. Villers, for a motion of which he had given notice, but which motion he did not go on with for the simple reason that the whole case was given up in the House of Commons, and that Sir J. Graham proved his case most satisfactorily. (Cheers.) This case of starvation, with respect to Bolton, extends from the year 1835—a period of ten years. In the three years, 1834, 1835, and 1836, the average price of wheat was about 44s. 8d. At that time in this town there was a gradual and steady increase of prosperity. All branches of trade were active, population was fully employed, and machinery was standing for want of hands. Wages rose in every trade; and, for the first time in the history of the cotton trade, the wages of the mule-spinners rose 10 per cent. Poor-rates were very low; and in Little Bolton—that is one portion of this large town of 60,000 or 70,000 inhabitants—no poor-rate was laid for more than a whole year, cottages were well tenanted, rents well paid, shopkeepers were thriving, schools were well attended, and general improvement was visible everywhere. So far for a period of low prices. From 1838 to 1842, during those five years, the average price of wheat was about 61s. 4d., being nearly one-half more than from 1834 to 1836. That was attended with a gradual decay of trade. During 1839 and 1840, mills, foundries, machine shops, and other branches of trade were working short time—three, four, or five days in the week. Many large establishments were entirely stopped, some from insolvency, and others from increasing losses; and nearly all these remained idle till 1842 and 1843. In March, 1841, it was estimated that during the year 1839-40 (that is, in twelve months within those two years) the diminution of wages owing to mills and other works running only short time, or being wholly at a stand, amounted to £130,000; and that the increased cost of food to the 100,000 inhabitants of the Bolton district, as compared with the years 1834-35, was not less than £195,000: making together a loss of £325,000; or a difference of £1000 for every working day in 1839-40, as compared with 1834-35. By 1841 there were 1500 houses and shops untenanted; and thousands of people were thrown out of employment, and the wages of those employed fell from 10 to 15 per cent. In 1840 the out-door relief to the poor of that town was three times as great as the average of the three years ending 1838. In Great Bolton, in the year ending March, 1840, the sum paid for the relief of the poor was £1558; and in the year ending March, 1841, it was £2259—an increase of more than fourfold. Soup kitchens and charities, &c., of various kinds were opened in the month of January, 1842, and 6127 persons were relieved by the "Bolton Poor Protection Society." It was observed, also, that the consumption of animal food (butcher's meat) diminished enormously, and it was very commonly purchased by the working classes in pennyworths. Shopkeepers and all classes of tradesmen were in great difficulties, and many became insolvent. Places of worship were less attended, schools became forsaken, and the whole town presented a picture of appalling misery. It was about that time that Colonel Thompson wrote a letter from Bolton, in which he described the state of the town, and headed his letter "The Siege of Bolton." This went on till 1842, when the harvest was better, and the prices of provisions rapidly fell. From that time to this, wheat has averaged about 50s. the quarter. Mills, foundries, machine shops of every kind have again been set in motion, some of them after standing two or three years; workmen are again fully employed; and wages are from ten to fifteen per cent. higher than in 1841. (Cheers.) In 1844 occurred, for the second time in the history of the cotton trade, an advance in wages of the mule hand-spinners. I ought to state with respect to those wages, that the men engaged in that particular business are those who from the commencement of the cotton trade have been most highly paid; and there has been, therefore, a desire to get into that particular branch of employment, and the fact of this striving for the highest rate of wages has always prevented the highest rate from going higher. And when fluctuations have come, and these periods of depression have arrived, then these wages have, on several occasions, fallen; but in 1835, in 1844, and again, I believe, this year, in consequence of the extraordinary impulse given by the greatly reduced price of provisions throughout the country, even this payment of the highest paid hands has been able to overcome the competition of those who have wished to get into that rate of payment, and these hands have had their wages raised with the rest who are employed in that extensive trade. (Cheers.) In Bolton untenanted houses and shops have fallen in number from 1500 in 1841, to 381 at the beginning of this year, and those that are unoccupied are gradually being filled with tenants. Poor rates are again diminishing; shopkeepers and all classes of tradesmen are again prosperous; iron foundries, engineering and machine making trades are now paying more by £1159 weekly than they were in 1841; cotton-mills, more or less standing from 1839 to 1841, are now employing (including only one new erection) 2090 persons, whose wages, averaging 10s. 9d. per week each, men, women, and children, make £1123 a week—showing an increase of wages paid weekly in these two branches of trade alone in one town of £2282. The increase of wages in other branches of trade is estimated at £700; total weekly increase of £2982, or an annual increase of £155,061. But if 100,000 persons in that town and district, saving only 1d. each in cost of food per day compared with the dear years of 1839, 1840, and 1841, it would, with wheat at 48s. instead of 61s., amount annually to a saving of £151,666, which, added to the increased wages, make a total of £306,730, by which sum they are better off in wages and cost of food than in the years when protection was doing its highest or worst for working men. Now, I have not taken Bolton because there is anything peculiar about it; every manufacturing town in the kingdom can tell the same tale, and there are some towns that could show even a greater contrast than that which I have just now read to you. It is not only true of the manufacturing towns, but it is true to a very considerable extent of the condition of the labourers in the agricultural districts. We had a Parliamentary committee whose evidence, taken in 1836, gives us some light on this subject. Out of nearly forty farmers examined, thirty, I think, or more, declared that never in their lifetime had they known a period when the labourers on the farms were able to obtain so large a share of the produce of the farm in return for their labour as they were at that period of low prices. We know that from 1838 to 1842, poor-rates were constantly increasing in the agricultural counties, able-bodied pauperism was gradually increasing, and there was a state of things arising which foretold a greater evil than Free Trade to squires and lords who are owners of the soil. (Hear.) Well, then, what is the case now? I have had an opportunity lately of seeing a great many farmers: I generally have a sort of levee three days a week, from about nine o'clock in the morning till twelve; and I see some of the most intelligent farmers that come up from the country. They come up either to discuss matters connected with the game question, or to give evidence on the game committee, and they tell me,—I may state only what they say in private, because what they state before that committee is not to be told till it is printed for the use of the country,—but they tell me—and I think one and all of them would admit—that the condition of the agricultural labourer in employ is now much more satisfactory than it was four or five or six years ago. Now, whence this change in Bolton, Stockport, Paisley, and the rural counties? Ay, and whence the change that has taken place in this metropolis? What does it come from? There must be a cause for something that is so extraordinary and limitless in its results, and which strikes every one with wonder. It cannot be any little Parliamentary juggle that has been going on in the country. It is not that Sir Robert Peel is in power instead of Lord John Russell. Your particularly improved state of things cannot have arisen, because especially Sir James Graham is at the Home-office. (Laughter.) It is because during those years to which I have referred, when so much suffering existed, we had monopoly with very little adulteration. It was doing then its work actively: it was subservient to its masters in the horrible purposes for which it was intended. Now, monopoly has vanished, not because the League has driven it away from us, but because a benignant Providence has not willed that this country should be given up to destruction and desolation. (Cheers.) If monopoly be a good thing, I should like it to be carried out; if protection to agriculture be an advantageous thing for the working classes, let us not be afraid of applying it—let us see how far it may be carried, and what will be its results when it is carried out. Why, from the experience we have of the results, we are certain that, if such a state of things could exist in the country for ten years together, as the Corn Law intended should exist perpetually, there is no Government, no force or cohesion in society, which could hold the population together in common order. There can be no doubt whatever that this island would present a spectacle more fearful and dreadful than any which is recorded in the pages of history. Now, this shows it cannot be carried out; their principle cannot last. There is something in the nature of every man that revolts at the idea of benefiting himself or his country by putting them all on a short allowance of food. (Cheers.) But, then, if plenty be a good thing—and I take plenty to be the result of Free Trade—why cannot we make it perpetual? No one now proposes to make protection perpetual; we propose to make Free Trade instant, constant, and lasting for ever. Does not Sir R. Peel acknowledge that the great improvement which has taken place has resulted partly from good harvests, and partly from his legislation? (Laughter.) He is not particularly modest to set up for a partnership with Providence in giving all these blessings upon earth. (Renewed laughter.) But if it be true that his legislation has done anything to produce it—and I will not deny that it has been in the right direction—yet is it not a testimony to the truth of everything that we have advanced; does it not show that his policy so far has been in the direction of that which the much-despised science of political economy teaches, and that where he is going in the direction of Providence—lagging, it may be, very far behind—he is doing that which Providence does in so much greater degree—showing blessings upon the remotest corners of the kingdom? (Cheers.) Well, if this case of Bolton be true—and it may be taken as a type of many towns in the kingdom—I think that we have not overrated the evils which we have attributed to the operation of the Corn Laws. (Hear.) If what we see now round us in this state of prosperity, which has come on us with only three good harvests, be the result of that abundance of food, I ask you if we have too highly coloured the Free-Trade picture when we say that, on the abolition of the Corn Law shall commence a period of greater, constantly-increasing, and more lasting prosperity to this kingdom than these people have hitherto known? (Cheers.) But we talk about food. No doubt food is to be the foundation; but if we look back to six years or five years past, and see what all that poverty meant—if we see that it involved the loss of independence to millions, want of education to a whole generation of children, criminality to thousands who but for it would have been untainted with crime, and premature death to vast multitudes who, but for famine, the infliction of this law, might have grown up to have been useful, honourable, and excellent members of society (hear, hear, hear).—if we see that these were the results—and we have the authority for the Home Secretary to the fact—that in 1836 the commitments in England and Wales were 20,000, and in 1842 they were 32,000: there was a gradual increase while the price of wheat was rising, whilst in 1843 they had fallen to 29,000, in 1844 to 26,000; and I doubt not, if this harvest be good, and the present state of the country should remain unchanged, that we shall find, when the accounts are made up at the close of this year, that the number of commitments have again diminished; if all this be true, then where is your philanthropic society like this League? (Loud cheers.) It is good to sympathize with the criminal, and to visit him in his cell; it is good to educate and to offer him an asylum; and I honour every man and woman who is engaged in such a godlike work; but I recollect how little one man or woman, or a single mind or intellect, can do in a matter of that kind. But look what an association like this can do! The unlocking, as it were, the granaries of the world; inviting from all parts of the earth everything which this dense population requires; giving them all that God intended they should have as a reward for their industry (loud cheers); and placing them on that fair stage whereon they can work out their own redemption and save themselves from dependence, ignorance, crime, and a premature death, brought about by the starvation of the law. (Cheers.) Now, what is there opposed to us at present? Argument we look for in vain: it is even difficult now to catch a fallacy. Look at the recent debate—Sir Robert Peel, who, without exception, I take to be, as regards his own supporters, the most cruel and remorseless leader that men ever had (loud cheers);—he got up and said he must oppose the motion of the hon. member for Wolverhampton; not that he could vote against it on the grounds stated by some hon. members near him, for he certainly thought the time was gone by when this country could pretend for a moment to be independent of foreigners for its supply of food. Now, that fallacy was taken to be entombed. He said again, that he thought that recent experience had demonstrated that a low price of food was not accompanied by a reduction of wages; that in fact there was very little, if any, connexion between the price of food and the rate of wages. That may be considered as settled. He said, moreover,—and it was a very unkind thing in him to bring up ideas which had once been cherished so fondly, and especially unkind to dash them away so suddenly,—he said he thought this law could not at all be defended on any ground of mortgages or encumbrances upon land. (Laughter.) He said it could not be defended upon any ground of class interest; and that, certainly, is a very great change from what was said in 1828, when he defended the Corn Law upon the ground that it was a part of the constitution of this country to support the magistracy, landowners, and gentry. The special burdens, I believe, never were once mentioned in the debate. It was so recently that Mr. Ward had come forward with his motion, and they had so little to say on these special burdens, that it was not thought desirable to bring that plea up at that time; and I dare say that by this time twelve months that will have gone with all the rest. (Cheers.) I want to know how soon this imposture is to come to an end? (Laughter.) I think it is sensibly breaking up. I have heard from a gentleman on the platform that the Royal Humane Society, which saves people from drowning, have a dinner annually, and after the cloth is removed, wishing to get up a subscription, they have a procession round the room of those—I was going to say unfortunate, but, perhaps, fortunate—individuals that have been preserved from drowning by this society; and they go round the table in procession, and no doubt it is a very affecting and solemn sight. (Hear.) When the sympathies of the audience—of those who have had dinner—are fairly roused, I believe it ends by sending the subscription book round. (Laughter.) Now, these protectionists consider themselves as a sort of Royal Humane Society for the purpose of saving farmers from Free Trade and ruin. (Laughter.) They had a dinner at Freemasons' hall. I wish they had got up such a procession (cheers and laughter)—that they had advertised throughout the whole of Great Britain and Ireland for all the farmers that had been saved from ruin by them. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) How many do you think there would have been in the procession? I am sure they would not have been difficult to count. (Laughter and cheers.) No; the defence of the Corn Laws is a matter now which men of intelligence will not meddle with. In the House of Commons no man who is not drawn to it by the fact of his foolish pledge out of doors, or some peculiarity of position, no man who is known for the possession of a cultivated mind, will ever stand up to say anything in favour of the Corn Laws. The position of the landowners is becoming truly pitiable. I have a great respect for all my countrymen, and I have some regard even for the landowners; but I do feel commiseration for them when I see them becoming an isolated class, and the sympathy of their countrymen is being rapidly withdrawn from them. Their labourers have no fellow-feeling with them whatever; nor is it very likely they should have. A meeting was held last week at Upson, in Wiltshire, at which a great many persons were present—a large number of them agri-having been the occasion of distress and suffering; and, if we look from his admission to the facts, we may accumulate on his head yet more and heavier crimes. It has accumulated guilt; it has plundered the honest, the poor, and the industrious; it has entrapped children and bred them up in theft and fraud, and made them its victims, and has even been accessory to murder, and sent one after another to the grave: in fact, it has done as much iniquity on a broad scale, as Fagan, the Jew, is depicted by Mr. Dickens, in "Oliver Twist," as having conducted on a small scale. Now, the very same defence is set up for it. "The law has lived 150 years," says Sir Robert Peel. What said Fagan in court? "I am an old man!" The appeal did not avail him in his guilt. The scene is told by Dickens in one of those expressive passages which go to every imagination and heart, realizing at once to us the cunning of the man as well as his criminality, and the feeling also of others, in a way which may well rank amongst the masterpieces of that fictitious writing—the only great fiction which is founded upon truth—the truth of human nature, and which he has thus described in the work to which I refer:—"Guilty!" says the jury; and the building rang with a tremendous shout, and another, and another, and then it echoed deep and loud groans, that gathered strength as they swelled out like angry thunder. It was a peal of joy from the populace outside, greeting the news that he should die on Monday. The noise subsided, and he was asked if he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed on him. He resumed his listening attitude, and looked intently at the questioner while the demand was made; but it was twice repeated before he seemed to hear it, and then he only muttered that he was 'an old man, an old man—a very old man'; and so dropping into a whisper, he was silent again." Age did not save him, nor shall it save the Corn Law; his day of doom arrived, and so shall theirs; and louder shouts than Dickens has described shall ring the peal of its condemnation, and hail with iterated joyousness the fact, that at last there shall come its black Monday for this old black Monopoly. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) This is not the place in which political matters or political characters not necessarily involved in our own peculiar topics are to be discussed. I, therefore, go not into my opinion of the career of Sir Robert Peel, or of the many reasons that would present themselves to my mind why I might prefer that the country received this great retribution from other hands than his. (Hear.) But there are some reasons why it would be better that he—why it would be better that he than any other man whatsoever—should at last grant this great measure, and become its author, and that, after having in various ways gradually led forward the adoption of Free-Trade principles in the various bearings of our commercial legislation, he should at length crown the whole with this; and the commercial blood in his veins run the more rapidly as he lived to see how much good could be accomplished in the nation, and what a bright scene of peace, joy, and prosperity would follow from the complete carrying out of this principle; and in that learn a moral lesson to be taught him in no other way: for all my animosity towards Sir Robert Peel would be gratified, and the worst vengeance I may wish inflicted on him would be this,—that in the contemplation of the blessings of Free Trade to the country by him conferred, he might read how much better is one single simple act of right, than a whole life of parliamentary tactics and political expediency. (Loud cheers.) As the great event we anticipate is coming, so it will have passed by; and looked back upon, and through the following, years of time, this agitation will be revolved in people's minds; and it will be desirable that they should not forget it, and that no lapse of time whatever should obliterate the period from their memories. (Hear, hear.) I trust that means will be taken in furtherance of this purpose; and that when her Majesty shall have reigned some half century, in her age she should call to mind the splendid amusements of her youth, and fancy to give them a passing glance before she left the world, it may make them the means of imprinting a wholesome lesson on the mind of the Prince of Wales; and perhaps then the recollection of her old sports may lead her to give another salvatore, of which the adornments will be the costume of the Corn-Law period, and the peculiar effect which it had on the dress and manners of the population, (Hear.) Should she do so there will be a curious assimilation: very unlike either the grotesque drapery of George II., or the heroic costume of the Elizabethan era. There may be jewels and splendour there; but they will have to be ticketed—those bright diamonds—as the result of the tears and groans shed by the labouring population. Members of both Houses of the Legislature may come to that Hall, and they will carry a map of the world in their hands, on which they will intently look to show how their country is peered on them in order to discover any corner, however remote, of the globe, from which a single handful of agricultural produce might be imported into this country in competition with the growth of their own estates. Farmers will be there with the garb and look in which they told the labourer not to come for relief if he had the opportunity of earning anything like as much as 6s. a week. In the corner of the splendid room may be seen "a woman, in her unwomanly rage," striking "The King of the Shire." And in the opposite corner, perhaps, a noble with a petition for the continuance of protection in one hand, and in the other a proposition for subscriptions to relieve these poor sempsters, and plans of charity bales; he sustaining the character of a charity-monger; for in our country, there are charity-mongers as well as chess-mongers and fishmongers. (Cheers and laughter.) Throughout the whole there would be large groups of ragged peasants, some of them dressed up like the double figures one occasionally sees in burlesque ballets. A peasant with a shawl hat and green ribbons on it in front, and a great hole in that same hat behind; a clean smock, frayed for covering a coat out at the elbows, and dropping from his limb in rags. There would be whole tribes of lean lanks in workhouse jackets and felons' jackets; and interspersed amongst them individuals as poseurs, with their sword-guns; and incendiaries with their tar-pentine balls and lucifer-matches. It would be a sort of dance of death, which, in the recollection that this was all a thing of the air gone by, might be met with on the marble floor, the umbrellas of defunct Monopoly, and would tell that death had long since gathered his "harvest home" from artificial famine, and had only empty gleanings left; while over him they would dance to those Free-Trade quadrilles, whose merry sound anticipated the period when that gladness shall have its exuberant outpouring. And not then—oh no, never! not while the world stands, shall the cruelty of that Corn-Law system be obliterated from the memory. Some (were such a scene as I have imagined ever to take place) might be present at it who would not have been living but for the repeal of the laws whose deadly operation might also have sent them where it has sent so many others: for it is the peculiar cruelty of this system that it wars on the young; it obstructs the young man's prospects in life; it makes the choice of occupation and professions the great difficulty of a parent; with those yet young it annihilates all chance of that education which should be the sole business of their tender years. And babes—what is their food? Their milk, butter, bread, sugar—all heavily taxed, or else their prices raised by the influence of taxation; as if not even the babe at the breast was to be spared, but there was the hard hand of Monopoly interposed to dry up the resources of its nourishment; to stop whatever could be administered to it from without to advance its growth; to show its own unholy and infernal character, by keeping up that degree of mortality which, even in this country, makes life in such numerous instances but a short prelude to the grave. Never let it be thought that this agitation is so limited as only to refer to a question, or a series of questions; that it is only one particular matter, or that it is an abstraction that is in conflict. There is much more in it than this: the aim and tendency is that Free Trade should become the policy of this nation; and in its becoming the policy of the nation how much is involved. For as different nations in ancient and modern times have had each their characteristic policy,—as one was democracy, and another absolutism, and another conquest,—so is it desirable that Free Trade should be the characteristic of the national policy of this great industrial people to which we belong; and that being so it should not only direct this or that particular measure, but affect, as it must and will eventually, all institutions, all proceedings, arrangements, operations of society, all home legislation, and all foreign relations. What an amicable position with all the world would a nation be in—one whose policy was Free Trade! What jealousy could it excite? If it is said abroad, "England arms, let us arm too," this implies expense, trouble, violent dispositions, an outbreak of passion, on both sides insult and injury; but to say, "England trades, let us trade also," involves no harm to anybody, but much good to all. There would be no talk then of bombarding, none of invading, our country. Invading! What would the invasion be? Why, the landing of cargoes of corn would be the only invasion we should look for; and we should return it by the invasion of cotton on other shores. Countries may go on thus invading one another without any mischief. There is this great difference as to the champions of the one sort of warfare and the champions of the other—that military heroes are paid by the country for spreading desolation; but commercial heroes pay the country for leave to minister to its enrichment. (Loud cheers.) A Free-Trade policy would give an advance to civilization; we should import other things besides food; we should require luxuries as well as necessities; and we should send abroad luxuries too as good as those which we obtained. Enjoyment would be diffused amongst us; libraries and museums would rise in augmented numbers; parks and pleasure grounds would extend themselves, and pay a better rent than a wheat field under monopolist protection. Through all ranks and classes a taste for refinement, knowledge, and truth would pursue its course; and if for a while we take the start of the majestic world, the world would soon advance with us: humanity would rise into a proper enjoyment of its nature, and society would assume a condition more truly elevated and more replete with good than the world has ever yet witnessed. To carry all this out there must yet be a continuous effort, and not effort in this country only. These meetings are often graced by the presence of foreigners. There are some such, I believe, here to night; there always are some, and led, I hope, not by mere curiosity,—nor departing merely with the satisfaction of that curiosity,—but with some impulse of sympathy, some stimulus to make exertion. I would say to any and all such, "Help us, help us; for it is the world's cause; it is yours as well as ours. Whence-soever you come, and whithersoever you may go, (Oh! help, help in this matter, for it is the cause of humanity. It has no respect of language, government, or country; it is for the well-being of all; and join you with us in exertion for its promotion.) (Cheers.) To the gallant Frenchman, if such be here, I say let not our national rivalry pursue its old course. There has been enough in the long line of our warfare, from the time of our Henrys down to recent years; let that suffice. Look not only at our dockyards, but at our manufactories; not merely at our ships of war, but at our merchantmen, and the stores they take out with them. Wherever your tricolour is, be it the rainbow of peace; and thus may it become unto you a promise of a more glorious career—more glorious for yourselves and others than that which you gained even when your victories were most important, and one capital after another surrendered to your conquering arms. (Cheers.) I would say to the Germans—men of a nation of deep and far-reaching thought; of mind wide-spreading as your own unbounded forests, let that thought turn its direction to the things of earth as well as air; to commercial principles as well as to antique legends. Be not the slaves of any system of monopoly, however its extension within German limits may seem to secure it from that term which bears a hostile aspect to the policy of the rest of the world. Be not the tools of your Zollverein; but learn that custom-houses should have their proper places, as fortresses of exclusion and repulsion, not at the boundary of any particular state, but at the very ends of the earth, and mark only the difference of land inhabited by humanity, and that bounded by the wild beasts of the forest. To Holland, I would say, remember the old lesson which you taught the world. You, primeval missionaries of Free Trade, stick to your ancient principles and practices; and Belgians, however severed from you, be one with you in this interest, the interest of all enlightened and industrial nations. (Cheers.) Italy, fair and fertile, where so many fine minds have indulged in speculations that were ages before the world—you, whose Broccaria taught legislation to humanity as relates to punishment, learn you to legislate for humanity as relates to trade and commerce. Let Rome sustain higher glories than its ancient period of conquest, in that mild conquest that carries the victories of civilization and peace, truth and justice. And you, poor exiles from Spain and Poland, or whatever country has cast you out—you who sojourn with us, and can only call yourselves citizens of the world—why, there is that in Free-Trade principles which makes the world worth being a citizen of, demolishing so much of the ancient barriers between nation and nation. We offer you them, here, as some consolation in your time of exile and proscription; and when your turn comes—as come it will, I trust, for all exiles in the cause of freedom—when it comes on you or your children, may this lesson be borne back with you, a glad and happy remembrance of that terrible time; and installed with you in the honours which you may then wear, and the institutions which you may have to form and carry on. To the Americans I need say but little: they feel how much the battle is theirs as well as ours. A century and a half ago, we imported corn for the sustenance of your forefathers: I trust they will have the opportunity soon of amply repaying the compliment, with liberal interest upon the length of time that has elapsed. The independence you have achieved is one which needs no severance of relations as to the interchange of whatever other countries can produce; and in your own vast regions and growing population you see that which should unite you with all the world, showing the old and the new world one at least in this, that they have learned the lesson of a common interest, and can unite heart and hand in promoting the good of common humanity. Your own Channing, with prophetic voice, in almost, if not the very last publication he issued, described Free Trade as one of the great tendencies of the human mind—as one of the principles of the age which was sure to make its way—by a rapid progression into universal practice. And were I to lack reasons for describing my feeling of this subject, as something infinitely above the manufacturing, agricultural, or money questions of any country,—as something even above a national policy,—were I to require words to express its sacred and religious character, as tending to realize in the condition of society that benevolence which is a holy bond between man and man—as almost partaking of the character of worship—seeing that that is worship in which the sacrifice of true and loving hearts is offered, and in which kindly and benevolent actions are wrought,—why, I should give such a description in the words of a fellow-countryman of Channing, and a kindred genius, who describes, in solemn strain, the divine presence as not merely realized amid the beauties and the wonders of nature, but as also capable of being seen by the mind amidst thronging cities and in aggregated crowds. [After citing some beautiful lines to this effect, Mr. Fox continued:]—

Such is the language which the sight of an immense assemblage such as this, animated by one heart and mind, is calculated to impress on one's soul—not the less acceptable that it is the language of an American poet, of a living poet; and, as the person of Mr. Bryant is not known here, though his name and his poems are well known, I trust I do no offence to the modesty of genius when I say, of a present poet, whose presence is most welcome. (Loud cheers.) And that from other countries, as well as from our own, the poet and the artist, in all their different modes of appealing to taste and developing genius, have shown themselves amongst us, as well as statesmen, merchants, and politicians, is one of the peculiar and high gratifications of these meetings, is one pledge that the great mind of humanity is going along with us;—that the power which has been created belongs to the elements of nature, works in their way, and produces analogous results. Our agitation, like some of those mighty elementary principles, not merely overturns, but creates; not only destroys, but fertilizes. It is like, if we may rely on some late discovery, the electric matter of the atmosphere, which may be conveyed by rods into the soil, and will render that soil fruitful. It is like that power, that electricity, of which the thunder is the voice before which the guilty tremble; which strikes down whatever obstacles impede its course, though they be lofty towers, feudal or ecclesiastical, the warrior's column, or the ancestral oak, which has braved the storms of ages; yet, while it is so relentless, guided by the rod of science, it plays on the grass and sinks into the ground: and there the grass springs up the greener; the stem of corn is the sturdier, and bears a fuller ear; the sun looks down calmly from that blue sky which is over all; and richer fields waving for the harvest raise man's gratitude to heaven, and send him on his earthly course thankful and rejoicing. (Mr. Fox resumed his seat amidst loud and prolonged cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN then came forward and said:—I have once more to thank you for the great order which has marked this meeting; and as the next business of the League will be that which will occupy a considerable portion of our time, I beg to propose that we end this meeting with three cheers for the registration.

The call of the Chairman having been heartily responded to, with "one cheer more," the meeting separated at twenty minutes to eleven o'clock.

MR. VILLIERS'S MOTION.

Some few inaccuracies having been pointed out to us in our analysis of the votes last week, the following is a more correct statement of the number of Free-Trade members of the House of Commons who have supported Mr. Villiers's motion for a repeal of the Corn Laws in the several following years, viz:—

LETTERS ON AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

LETTER II.

I resume my correspondence from Upavon and the villages near Pewsey, in Wiltshire. It was my intention to write at considerable length about the meetings of the farm-labourers last week; but being a stranger in that district of country, and knowing not a single individual, I thought it best to defer until I made some inquiries as to the truth of the statements made at the Upavon meeting.

First, as to the remarks I made last week about the richness and foulness of the farm-fields in this district, it must be said, in justice to some farmers, that the charge of negligence does not apply to them. Even where specimens of very bad agriculture are seen on good land, I am told that they should be set down to the score of poverty on the part of the farmers, rather than to the want of skill or attention.

Well, if farmers are too poor to cultivate properly, we may be at least excused for asking why they are so poor, and why such poor farmers should be occupying from 600 to 1200 acres of land each; why sufficient labour should not be employed when labourers are so abundant, and their work so cheap—so very cheap.

And, once for all, let me remark to those who deny the right of a stranger to come into their district to get information of, and pass remarks upon their style of farming, on their carelessness or their wastefulness, that the right is given to such stranger by themselves. They say they cannot cultivate their land without an artificial price for their produce—not without "protection." If they said, "We rely solely on the natural prices of common markets, and solely on our own resources," then there might be some ground for saying to the stranger who visits them on behalf of the public, "You have no right to interfere with us; we do not call upon the public to pay any of our expenses; so the public has nothing to do with our private affairs." Instead of this, the agriculturists will not allow their affairs to be private: they come to seek public relief; we must inquire into their right to receive it.

But, apart from this view of the case, I contend that it does good to let one part of England know how the other lives; one section of society know how the other struggles. The farmers of Wiltshire have struggled all winter and all the spring to keep their flocks alive, and their cattle. They are now somewhat relieved by good pastures and new hay; yet still they struggle. They are clipping their sheep, and getting light fleeces of wool—fleeces light in weight and inferior in quality—which is the result of the flocks having been half-starved. This indicates a continuance of their struggles to pay their rents. Is it then doing no good to ascertain these truths and make them known?

But the labourers are also struggling, and the farmers do not like to hear their labourers talked about. This is the real ground of the objection to strangers. The farmers do not object to their own complaints being heard. They are very much offended, indeed, when told not to complain. Mr. Sidney Herbert bade them attend to the cultivation of their farms, and not come whining to Parliament with their complaints. And they were so vexed at Mr. Herbert, who had just before been their idol, for saying this, that some sixty of them or more went over to Warminster three weeks ago to hiss him when he marched into that town at the head of the Salisbury troop of yeomanry cavalry. He got intimation of this intention, however, and sent the troop in under command of a junior officer, Cornet Earl Nelson, and went himself into the town quietly in the evening.

All this may be precisely as I relate, or it may not. It is related precisely as I have heard it from the lips of farmers who claim a right to tell their grievances; who are grieved that Sidney Herbert forbids them to do so, and who say that they would have hissed him at Warminster had he shown himself to the crowd. So that I infer strangers or any one else are quite at liberty to write about the farms and the farmers and all their complaints, so as nothing hurtful to their sensitiveness about their poor labourers, nothing opposed to their prejudices, is said.

Whatever I may write of the farmers or of their labourers is intended to be fairly and even kindly written. I may differ from many of them in opinions on certain subjects. But they must bear in mind that it has been, and is now, customary with them to read only such newspapers, or such statistical evidence as agrees with their own opinions, or their own agricultural politics; and they must not be surprised if persons who look at every side of every question, and ransack the whole world—the geographical, physical, moral, social, and political world—for facts; they must not be surprised if such persons should come to different conclusions from theirs.

For instance, many persons believe—and I am one of them—that the starvation of the sheep flocks and the cattle, during last winter and spring, would not have occurred had the farmers been allowed to purchase provender from Egypt or the continent of Europe, to assist in feeding their stock, which they were prevented from doing by that Corn Law which is said to be for their "protection."

Many persons think—and I am one of them—that, rather than pay large sums of money for foreign manures to grow corn at home, our farmers should feed a greater amount of live stock at home, even by the assistance of foreign provender, and thus have, besides the profit on stock, an abundance of the best manures to grow corn and employ labour at home.

These, and twenty similar topics of the most vital interest to the farmers, are what we want to discuss with them, and that in a friendly manner: they disagreeing from us when not convinced, we disagreeing from them when not convinced. But hitherto their policy has been to shut their eyes, and put their fingers in their ears. The policy of those who profess to be, and who in reality are, their political guides, is to hide from them the truth, or to distort facts by misstatements, so as to make such facts pernicious as falsehoods.

The time has come, let the farmers and their political instructors believe it or not, when they must open their eyes and their ears to both sides of the Corn-Law question, and both sides of other questions arising out of that. In a journey through this and adjoining counties, which I am now upon, I shall study to deal as fairly and respectfully as it is possible to deal with such things as may come under my observation; yet I say it candidly, that the farmers, and those who bid the farmers shut their eyes, and bid them put their fingers in their ears and make themselves deaf, shall be compelled to look up and listen. We shall do it good-naturedly. The winking man's nose shall be tickled with a straw, that he may withdraw his fingers from his ears to catch a fly; then, when he catches a straw and not a fly, he will have to open his eyes to see who tickles him. Eyes and ears once opened, we shall take care to keep him, or any one else, from closing them again.

Local circumstances affecting his own, his landlord's, and his labourers' condition will be found sufficient for this purpose. And as a beginning I proceed to give some account of the meeting of 1000 labourers at the village of Upavon on Tuesday evening, the 10th of June, and of the condition of the persons attending it, which I learned by subsequent inquiries.

LETTER III.

It may be as well to give the statements of the three farm-labourers who addressed the Upavon meeting. Two or three other persons spoke, and so far as I could hear them, not being near enough to hear distinctly, they spoke sensibly. But I understand their addresses were mostly urged against the Corn Law. The readers of the LEAGUE are already familiar with such arguments. What was most interesting to me, and will be I suppose to others, were the statements made by the farm-labourers themselves.

The first who spoke was David Keele, an elderly man, who was chairman on the occasion. I did not arrive in time to hear him address the meeting. Mr. Westell, a schoolmaster, from Marlborough, was speaking when I arrived; and with him I afterwards found David Keele, and had some conversation with him. He seemed to be a sensible man of retiring manners. He is said to be a man of strict moral character, and a good labourer. He had once been at a labourers' meeting on the Corn-Law question in another village some months ago, and in consequence was discharged from his employment. He has been taken into work again. He was asked to come and be chairman at the Upavon meeting, as it was feared no labourer there would dare to make himself so prominent. And this was supposed, because twelve months ago the head agent of an estate there had said, in the name of himself and master, that no Anti-Corn-Law meeting should ever be held in Upavon; and, further, because it was threatened, that this very meeting should be prevented. A consultation among the farmers and gentry was held, however, on the previous Saturday, and it was then resolved to let this take its course, and not to interfere with it.

When I got there, I saw a temporary stage raised against the gable of a cottage, and facing to an open space of ground in the centre of the village. A very large tree,—elm, if I remember rightly,—prodigious in trunk and branches, overshadowed the space; and underneath it, and from it up to the cottage gable, there were at least one thousand men and women and children standing. The men constituted about two-thirds of the whole; and the greater part were in smockfrocks or fustian coats, just as they had come from their work. Two policemen stood in one part of the crowd, and two more stood singly. David Keele sat on the little stage, wearing a clean white smock; but the crowd in front made it difficult for me to see him. The persons who had invited him to the meeting had undertaken to his wife that they would bring him safe home. She said she did not care how far he went out of her sight to do good, as she hoped the meeting was to do good; but it would be the end of her if anything happened to him.

His opening address was as follows—a reporter from the Wiltshire Independent being present to report—

"He said he was glad to see so many of his fellow-labourers assembled. He wished it to be understood that it was not their intention to break the laws of the country, for whatever laws were made by their legislators they were bound to obey as far as they could according to the dictates of their consciences. Neither did he wish them to break the laws of their masters; it was their duty to follow their employment diligently, and if their masters did not give them sufficient wages to support their families, that was no reason why they should leave their employment. If John, or Thomas, or Harry stole my shirt, that is no reason why I should steal his. They were not to speak of those arbitrary laws called the Corn Laws; and he would ask their opponents, or any reasonable man, if the Legislature issued a law which did not work according to just expectations, whether they had not a right to lay to rest the Corn Laws? It was the law of

Free Trade they were met to advocate—a law which would be every way beneficial to them, to their wives, and to their families. (Hear, hear.) It was very evident that distress existed among the labouring population; he knew it by experience, and he doubted not many of them did also. (Cries of 'Yes, yes, we feel it.') There is many a man who goes out to work with a little bit of bread, and, after working all day, returns home to potatoes and salt. ('We don't get half enough of that.') Was it not right, then, that they should seek out for something better? The poor man had an equal right with the rich to attempt this, and to send his petitions to Parliament, to endeavour to get his grievances redressed. They would recollect the case of the four lepers, whom they read of in the Bible, that sat in the gate. They said, 'If we sit here we shall die, and if we go to the Assyrians perhaps they will save us alive; and if they kill us we shall but die.' You and I (said Keele) are in the case of starvation (cries of 'Hear, hear,' and 'That's true enough'), and if we remain quiet much longer starved we shall be. If we petition Parliament, it is more than a peradventure that we shall be heard; and if we are not we can but starve. (Cheers.) Our opponents, in my part of the country, serve the people like as the carters used to do the ploughboys when I was a boy. They would give the boys the whip, and threaten that they would give it them again if they told their parents; and so it went on from day to day. The case is the same with the labourers. Your masters say if you come forward to tell your case you shall be turned out of employment (hear, hear), and thus they keep you in fear; and you will never be better as long as you are kept down in this way. But if you come forward boldly and tell your case, you can't make it worse. ('That's true.') If the ploughboy had told his father of the carter, the carter would have been punished, and that is what he was afraid of. You are prevented coming forward by the arbitrary conduct of your opponents (hear, hear), but fear not their frowns; they are in the hands of the Lord, and can only go so far as he permits. Always remember, however, that whatever law is issued by the Legislature we are bound to obey; whoever resists the powers that be resists the ordinances of God. It is the arbitrary Corn Law that has done all the mischief; and we believe Free Trade will be beneficial to ourselves and families. (Loud cheers.)

After this Mr. Westell spoke, and then William Perry, a labourer, from Charlton, a village distant about a mile and a half, offered to make a statement. Perry, as I have since ascertained, is a man of the best moral character; a steady good labourer, and deeply imbued with a sense of religion. He is, I think, a Baptist, but of that I am not sure, as I did not ask him. But, having heard him speak reverentially of his hopes and trust being in God, I mentioned it to some of his neighbours, and they told me that he was a man of strict piety, who "never ate a mouthful of bread without asking a blessing on it;" who "never went to bed at night without kneeling down by the bed of his children to pray." I had a lengthened conversation with him and some of his neighbours two days after the meeting, but I then confined the subject to their social condition.

Perry appeared to me to be about 35 years of age. He was of middling stature; wore a straw hat, red neckerchief, and a fustian coat. The following was his address, as reported; and having myself heard it I think it is fairly reported, except, perhaps, that it does not convey to the reader that he was rather agitated at first, and hesitated so much as to make some of his neighbours call "Don't be afraid to speak, William." It was to this that he alluded in saying that he had no reason to be afraid to speak. The report proceeds thus:—

"William Perry, a labourer, living at Charlton, then said he was come forward to speak to his fellow-labourers, and he had no reason to be ashamed to speak before any man. He had five children, the eldest 10 years of age, the others of the age of 8, 6, 4, and 3. He had 7s. per week to maintain his family. If any person present could tell him how to manage this for all to have enough he should be glad. There were 21 meals to be provided out of 1s.; leaving no provision for clothes, firing, candles, and soap! When he came home two or three of the children were generally gone to bed, but when he came in, they began crying, 'Father, bring me up a piece of bread.' He had often heard this cry during the winter, and even within the last week. What could he do?—he had no bread to give them. Then there was rent and shoes to be paid for at Michaelmas. How could he do this in an honest manner? His desire was to live honestly, in a godly way, but he could not do it. Perhaps he met a man to whom he owed money; of course he did not like to meet him; there were not the feelings of an honest man; but what could he do? If there were not some good and charitable people in the country he should be starved. (Voices—'The same here,' and 'Tis too true.') He was thankful God had spared him and his family to the present moment. This day he had walked three miles and a half to his work. He took a bit of bread with him, and had a drink of water; and had a little when he got home. ('We all know that's true.') A voice—'What make's you tremble so?' If, said Perry, I had been home to a good supper and a quart of good ale, I should not tremble. He wished every labouring man to have three or four acres of land at the same rent as the farmers gave. They would pay this, and gladly. (Loud cheers, and cries of 'Yes, yes; and we don't mind 10s. an acre more.') Yes, said Perry, we don't mind 10s. an acre more. (This speech was received with loud marks of applause, and repeated confirmations of the truth of the statements contained in it.)

Next came a labourer, also of Charlton, named Osias Seeley. His address is not reported, nor was it easy to do so, as it was rather long and not very well connected. It took well with his hearers, who understood the topics introduced. This man, it seems, some years ago was a widower, with a family of children. He then married a widow with children; and now they have a third family, in all seventeen children, eight of whom were during the winter dependent on his wages for support. His address was a mixture of the pathetic and ludicrous. He told of how he had one night in the previous week had only two potatoes in the house, and how eight children "scrambled" for them for supper over forms, stools, &c.

Here I may remark that, owing to the unmarried men receiving the inferior wages of 3s. a week in winter and only 4s. and 5s. in summer; and also, as they are most commonly sent to the workhouse to prevent men with families being sent there, they strive to get married as soon as they can; and, if a young man finds a widow with children willing to have him, he involves himself eagerly with a ready-made family, that he may not be compelled to go again to the workhouse. Moreover, the inferior payment of the young men renders a provision for marriage by economy and good conduct utterly out of the question. Hence they rush into marriage without furniture, or a lodging, or clothes, or without any hope but that of soon having a family, which will compel the farmers to give them employment.

All the worst features of the old poor law are retained here, and the best banished. At the meeting complaint was made of the parish-road system common here, of men getting relief from the parish by being sent to work at under wages.

Several little incidents attracted my attention. One of the speakers was telling the labourers that they must tell their masters this, and must tell their masters that. A labourer called out, "But how be we? Masters never gives us a chance to speak to them." This was subsequently explained to me to mean that some of the farmers always communicated through the bailiff with their men; never spoke to them themselves. Again, there was a point made by one of the speakers which seemed to be well understood about "pitting potatoes," to keep them until required. On inquiry I found this to refer to a farmer who had said that he did with his labourers as he did with his potatoes: he did not keep all the potatoes out for use every day; and he did not, like some farmers, try to find work for the men all the year round. When he did not need them he put them in the workhouse until they were needed.

All such topics as had bitterness in them against certain local ruling powers were warmly welcomed; and I could not help feeling, and also saying, that I thought such topics were most improperly dwelt upon by some of the speakers.

I was glad to hear that the bulk of the men assembled gave earnest and loud shouts of "No, no!" when they were asked if they would ever again submit to be marched into Devizes at an election to drown the voices of any of the candidates. It seems that from this very place, at the last Devizes election, more than a thousand men, many of them those comprising the Upavon meeting, were paid a day's wages and supplied with beer to go into Devizes to make such a noise when the Free-Trade candidate or any of his friends offered to speak as to completely prevent him or them from being heard. They did this successfully, being marshalled and led on and signalled to when to make a noise and when not, by the very agent and gentlemen near Upavon who threatened to prevent them from holding this meeting, and from making their grievances heard.

I saw a labourer the other day in the village of Charlton eating a rhubarb pudding. He kindly offered me a piece of it, which I declined. He again offered it, saying, "It be made of good flour and good rhubarb; I grew the rhubarb myself. The only thing as be against it is the want of sugar. Rhubarb want a good bit of sugar to make it sweet; and sugar be terrible hard to get by the like of we."

"You were one of the band of men," I said to him, "who went last year to Devizes to prevent the Free-Traders from being heard at the election; now, do you know that you prevented those men from being heard who would have told you how you might get sugar to your rhubarb puddings, and you did all you could to prevent them from getting sugar, plentiful and cheap, for you and such as you. Do you know that?"

"Why, you see," said the man, "it was not of our doing, as you may say; we was forced to it like. We had nobody to tell us what was right. And they said Mr. Sotheron was a good sort of gentleman, and we was all to help him."

"Well," said I, "what would you have thought if a number of men had been brought to the Upavon meeting last night, paid a day's wages, and furnished with beer to hollow and make a noise to drown the voices of such honest men as William Perry from being heard? Would you not have thought that those who did so were afraid to hear the truth, and afraid to let you who listened hear the truth?"

"Ah!" said the man, "we been told many times since the election that we did terribly bad to go there. They said we made terrible fools of ourselves."

This man's remark relative to Mr. Sotheron, one of the county members, is, I believe, well founded. That gentleman is highly spoken of as a kind-hearted, good man, and as such he must surely disapprove of the means taken to stifle all discussion upon the momentous question which gave that election all its importance.

LETTER IV.

It does not follow that every poor man down here is poor, despite his efforts to the contrary. Some are quite willing to shift on any way rather than work. One of these spoke rather candidly to me. He said, "What we wants, master, is victuals and drink, and a little work—over so little work." The listeners exclaimed, "That be just your sin!"

The land about Charlton is the property of Lord Normanton, so remarkable for his game-preserves thirty miles farther down the country. He has not had this estate long, and there is no game preserved on it. I asked some men if there was, and they said no, they wished there was. They said, they would not be so hard run up for victuals then. "But the gaol," said I; "you might be caught and sent to gaol?"—"Well," they replied, "the gaol itself ben't so bad as the workhouse; and better do anything than starve."

Having ascertained that William Perry was a man of good character, I took occasion to see him and some others, to hear from their own lips an account of their income, expenditure, &c.

First I went to Perry's house. This was on the day after the meeting, at about 12 o'clock. Perry, being with other five men at a distant part of the farm mowing, did not come home to dinner. They had bread and cheese and a bottle of ale (small beer) with them. It must be always borne in mind that in Wiltshire and the West the liquors which in London are called strong ale, are called beer; and the small beer or table beer of London is ale in Wiltshire. Thus Perry in his address, speaking of his desire to have a "quart of good ale" to his supper, meant a quart of good small beer.

I saw his wife and some of his children. She told me that Mr. Wansborough, the farmer for whom Perry worked, had been to her in the morning, and complained that her husband should have gone to the meeting on the previous night. And then asked if she meant to say that she and her family were badly off? She told him yes. That there were seven of them—the eldest child only ten years old, and that a girl—who could not go out to do anything; and they had only 7s. a week to pay house rent and get food and clothes.

Mr. Wansborough then reminded her that she herself might have been at out-field work when she did not go. The woman told me that she replied, that she was, with so many young children, not always able to go out to work in the fields. Whereupon Mr. Wansborough told her that she must go out that afternoon; that he needed hands to the hay; and that, since they complained of poverty, she must go out and work or her husband must leave his employment. He then repeated what he had before said, that "he wished he could only find out which of his men it was that spoke first at the meeting; he would find means to make them regret it."

The woman told me this; and subsequently Perry himself. And both he and his neighbours said that, had any of them gone to the meeting prepared to tell their grievances, all might have done so, and more would have done so than did. They said it could do them no harm publishing what had occurred; they thought they were as bad as they could be.

Perry's wife was accordingly out at work in the afternoon. He and the five other men were mowing vetches—the clover of last year having failed for hay this year. Mr. Wansborough was making hay of the vetches. The men told me that when they asked how much an acre they were to have he said 1s. 6d. They said they could not do it at that; and at last they went to work without any bargain. They said they would try to get 2s. per acre if they could, but perhaps he would only give them 1s. 6d.

This is one of Lord Normanton's farms. This tenant has not been long in occupation of it. He manages the land much better than some of the farmers near him. He may pay low wages—yet not lower than others; but he employs everybody he can get at this season of the year in keeping the farm clear and orderly. His crops look splendid. If anything is what it should not be, the wheat is too thick. It seems as if it would suffocate itself. Thick sowing, I understand, is common thereabout; but it is surely a great loss both of seed and of crop.

The chalky downs which rise above the village have rich crops of fine dark-bladed wheat upon them. Mr. Wansborough's farm extends between three and four miles into Salisbury Plain. A portion of it on the plain was broken up two or three years ago, and has borne heavy crops every year since. Last year the crop was of the prodigious magnitude of fifteen and sixteen sacks of wheat to the acre; and the wheat, as also the straw, of superior quality.

Talking of this, the men who reaped it said they had to walk 3½ miles out to the downs in the morning, and the same back at night, and reaped that prodigiously heavy crop at 8s. per acre.

If any of these statements are incorrect I shall be glad to publish a correction from Mr. Wansborough himself. But I believe them to be correct; and moreover, when he and his neighbours do all they can to prohibit inquiry and stifle complaints, and still ask the public for the thing called "protection" to themselves, they must allow us to publish such statements as we find presented to us.

One great grievance of the labourers is, that there being such large farms, and consequently so few farmers, two or three of the latter rule a whole parish. If a man gives the slightest offence to his master he is paid away, and a message is sent to the other farmers not to employ him; and he is not employed save at hay time or harvest, when they cannot do without him.

If large farms are to continue, and the Corn Law also; or rather, if the smaller farms are to be swallowed up by the larger ones, as is yearly the case now, what do the farmers expect to do with their families? They cannot get farms to their sons, nor get farming husbands to all their daughters. Must they not go into trade? or follow some profession? Whether has the farmer with 1000 acres and a large family most interest in—the Corn Law, which, in seasons like the last winter and spring, starves his stock; or in a fine flourishing trade which will afford outlets for his family?

Men of fewer years than forty have worked in the parish of Charlton when there were six farmers in it; and a man still living there remembers when there were fifteen farmers. Now there are only two. And now the labourers are worse off and fewer of them employed than at any former time.

Here I should give the details of their style of living now; but I have perhaps gone far enough until next week.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

MEETING OF LABOURERS.

(From the Wiltshire Independent.)

A public meeting of labourers residing in Lynham and its neighbourhood was held on Tuesday evening last, on the Green. In spite of the strenuous exertions of the monopolists to prevent their men attending the meeting—many of the farmers having threatened to discharge their labourers if they did so—nearly 800 were present, many of them accompanied by their wives and children.

WALTER MATTHEWS was called to the chair. He said they were met for two purposes: first, to see what the Goutiere Reform Society had been doing, and to receive their report; and, secondly, to consider the best means of getting rid of the Corn Laws. The report of the committee was then read. It stated, that during the past year meetings had been held, and resolutions in favour of Free Trade unanimously carried, at the following places:—Goutiere (3); Avebury, Brambury, Upavon, Wootton Bassett, Lynham (2); Brinkworth, Stratton St. Margaret's, Highworth, Clack (3); Spithill (2); Clatford, and Stocklane—in all 19 meetings, at which about 14,000 people have attended to protest against the Corn Laws. The committee call on the inhabitants of North Wilts to compare the statements contained in the report of the North Wilts Protection Society with the above facts.

GEORGE AWDRY, of Marlborough, then addressed the meeting, and concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That the Corn Law, the object of which is to make food scarce and dear, is the primary cause of the distress of the labouring poor of North Wilts." This was seconded, and carried unanimously.

CHARLES MAUMONT moved the second resolution—"That this meeting is fully convinced that whatever the Corn Laws may have done towards keeping up rents, they have done nothing, in North Wilts, towards keeping up wages; for the employment furnished and wages given, now we are under the protection of those laws, are insufficient to keep us in health and strength." Carried unanimously.

After giving three cheers for Free Trade, the meeting separated.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the LEAGUE.

SIR,—I hold stock in the Government funds which paid my father 5 per cent., and now pays me 3½, and in nine years will pay only 3 per cent.; or, in other words, I receive 65s., and shall soon receive but 60s., instead of 100s.

I am acquainted with parties having money out on mortgage, who are obliged to take 3½ and 3 per cent. on the security which, not many years ago, yielded 4½ and 4 per cent.

There are hundreds, and I may say thousands, similarly circumstanced; for the debt-burdened Governments of Europe are seeking to reduce their dividends, and the deeply-mortgaged landed gentry are equally eager in availing themselves of the state of the money market to lessen their interest payments. We, the recipients, know that this state of things is a natural consequence of the accumulation of property, and of the unvarying laws of supply and demand; and our only consolation is that to a certain extent, though not entirely, we are compensated by the decrease in the expenses of living. At the same time we cannot help inquiring why it is, that the owners of land, which is but another species of invested property, have not during the same period suffered a similar decrease of income; and, indeed, we may ask why, on the contrary, have their annual returns increased?

You, Sir, and your coadjutors, have demonstrated that the uncalculated agricultural protection is injurious to tenant farmers and farm-labourers; it only exists, then, for the landowners; and I deny that, while their incomes are free from the diminutions to which the possessors of other realty are compelled to submit, they have a shadow of a claim to protection at the expense of the rest of the community. I maintain that landlordly distress, where it exists, arises from increased expenditure, and not from diminished receipts; and I challenge those who dispute my position to produce the rental of any considerable estate for the last 25 years.

I do not object to the landlords possessing all the advantages that their position in the midst of the best food market in the world naturally gives them; but I do most strenuously protest against the continuance of a system of legislation which aims at increasing or even keeping up their incomes, while the influence of the times occasions a falling off in mine.

I am, Sir, yours very truly,

London, June 16, 1845.

FAIRPLAY.

To the Editors of the LEAGUE.

SIR, I have been very ill, and from home. I write this almost with a dying hand; and my best hope is, that the holy League will help the fatherless children and widows to their right, that the man of wealth be no longer exalted against them—may triumph within the present year.

Yours, &c.,

CENTURION.

IMMEDIATE ABOLITION OF THE CORN LAWS

(From the Times.)

The Ministry having now surrendered every point, except one, to the gentlemen of the League, it devolves on the latter to address their arguments and their inquiries to the present turning point of the controversy. They have to make out a good case for their belief that an immediate abolition of the duty will not prove disastrous to the parties interested in maintaining the price of corn. The question is simplified by the admissions of the Premier and the Home Secretary. They have limited it to the present—the immediate. There is a slight difficulty perhaps in defining the present, which, strictly speaking, has no existence at all. But the difficulty is more metaphysical than practical. We have Swift's authority for assigning to the Present as distinct and comprehensive an idea as to the Past and the Future. In the Battle of the Books, when Jupiter wishes to set at rest the controversy between ancient and modern learning, he calls for the three Books of Fate containing the records of time under the above three convenient heads. Our readers are acquainted with another and a more familiar page in which the same image occurs. We presume, therefore, that in the question of vested interests there is no difficulty as to the chronological meaning of the present time. We shall not be far wrong, perhaps, in considering that Ministers have restricted the proposed inquiry to ten or a dozen years. If, after that period, corn should settle down to as low an average as 35s. or 40s. a quarter, it is no concern of theirs. They profess to be anxious only for the present result.

Now, we must say that of all the rash assertions that can be hazarded on the subject of the Corn Laws, no one seems to us more gratuitous, and more likely to be disproved by fact, than this, to which Ministers now fall back as if it were the most obvious and unquestionable part of the question. We can much more readily believe that, in the event of a total repeal of the duty, corn will become ultimately and permanently cheaper, than that it will become immediately cheaper. To us it seems the extreme of ignorance and presumption to anticipate any one immediate result of a decided character. The commodity is one the fluctuations of which Providence has especially placed beyond the reach of human forethought, adding uncertainty to the primeval curse—the reeling brain to the sweating brow. The vicissitudes of nature and of man conspire to thwart calculation, and to warn us from presuming too far in guessing results which Heaven has reserved to its own inscrutable counsels. But we may fairly and piously call attention to certain facts likely, so far as they go, to produce certain results. And we think the facts of the case indicate a greater probability of a rise in the price of corn than of a fall; i. e., taking the average of the next ten or dozen years.

The repeal of the duty, setting the question at rest for ever, would undoubtedly bring into the market, and literally into the field, a large accession of wealthy persons, ready to speculate both by buying and selling, and by actually producing the commodity. Once remove those most vexatious elements of uncertainty, the accelerated fluctuations of the sliding scale, and the ups and downs of the political question, and we shall infallibly see many more men, much more money, much more skill and forethought, applied to emancipated material. Often as this expectation has been expressed, we have never yet seen a shadow of a doubt thrown upon it. But, on the other hand, it is still more certain, for it is an ascertained fact, that the amount of this material—the probable subject of an increased competition of men, mind, and money—is limited, exceedingly limited; not only so, but singularly incapable of being suddenly multiplied to meet an increased demand.

Count up every quarter of corn in every one of earth's richest granaries; track all her winding shores, penetrate every creek, and every stream; measure every diluvial delta and every sheltered valley, the natural fertility of the plains and the artificial productiveness of the hills; take the sum of all the warehouses, all the heaps, and all the standing crops; and we entertain no doubt whatever that reasonable and candid men will be astonished above measure at the universal "nakedness of the land." The Baltic and the Euxine, the Gulf of Genoa, the St. Lawrence, the Mississippi and even the rivers that flow under our feet, are names of terror to some minds, as if they flowed with corn. But rivers of corn are as pure and impossible a fiction as rivers of gold. Once you begin to investigate, to measure, and to count, you find the most formidable accumulations dwindle into a few months' or a few weeks' sustenance for such living and growing multitudes as London, Manchester, or Glasgow. There is not too much corn on earth, nor will there ever be till the saddest and awfulest words that ever were spoken are finally unsaid, which they never will be in this mortal world.

Now, this is a simple inquiry for which there are abundant materials. Nothing would be easier than to lay before the British people an exact and all but authentic statement of the quantity of accumulated corn in the whole world. There are merchants who would very speedily have the information in their desk, if they thought that it answered their purpose to know what are really the facts. It does answer their purpose, and the purpose of the British nation, to be fully informed upon this point.

Nor is it less capable of proof that the commodity does not admit of rapid and certain multiplication. All attempts to produce corn cost corn. Present quantity is sacrificed to a hundred ways to future increase. The production of 100,000 quarters of corn over and above the present supply is as expensive an undertaking—i. e., it costs as much food—as the building of a fortification or of a fleet, as a military expedition, or any other important work. Nations which in other respects are poor and ineffective, are so also in the production of corn. It is as costly and difficult an affair to feed the world as to conquer it. The nations of Europe whom we subsidize against the arms of France, will stand in equal need of British capital to compete with the British agriculturist. A simple account of the roads, conveyances, implements, cattle, dwellings, habits, strength, and skill of those whom our farmers have been taught to regard as formidable rivals will show how much is to be done before the foreigner can compete with us on a large scale; and how difficult it will be for nature's most favoured climes and soils to keep pace with the fast increasing wants of mankind.

COLONIAL VIEWS OF "PROTECTION."

(From the Nelson Examiner and New Zealand Chronicle of Feb. 8, 1845.)

The English newspapers which have reached us by the late arrivals contain little matter of interest, except what relates to the affairs of New Zealand. The visits of the Czar and the King of the French, however pleasing they may have been to the actual spectators of the pomp and circumstance attendant upon them, are but flat, stale, and unprofitable when retailed in the columns of a newspaper 15,000 miles from the place of their occurrence. The admirers of legitimacy have, however, the cheering news of the birth of a new acion of royalty; while the hungry bread-consumer, who left his native land in the hope that "seven halfpenny loaves would be sold for a penny," may congratulate himself on being where he is when he reads that the efforts of the League have not yet succeeded in throwing open foreign markets to the half-starved companions whom he left pining in unemployed wretchedness in Paisley or Glasgow. The League has, during the year, been making great efforts to disseminate its opinions, holding frequent monster meetings at Covent-garden Theatre, and thrusting its pioneers into the very heart of the agricultural districts.

For ourselves, there are few subjects discussed in the columns of the English papers, at present, which have more interest than the last we have mentioned.

Nor is the interest altogether confined to the state of the question at home. It is barely a year since our Australian neighbours were engaged in a contention whether the experiment of a corn-grower's protection should be tried among them; and, if we remember rightly, it was by a very small majority that the Legislative Council (after some very able debates, which would not have discredited the English House of Commons) decided against it. And in our opinion they decided wisely. Even such as were in favour of protection looked at it only as a means of relief from the temporary distress of the landed interest; and surely it would have been madness in order to cure a temporary evil to create another, which, after a few years' growth of vested interests, experience has taught us acquires a hold which can scarcely be shaken off.

It is contended by some that the question of protection assumes a different aspect in a colony from that which it bears in an old country; and the arguments used in support of this view are two. First, that many productions in the new country require fostering; and secondly, that protection (particularly in the matter of food) tends to keep capital in the colony.

As regards the first argument, we are willing to admit that there may be some few articles of production which, being very gradual in their progress to maturity, can scarcely be undertaken by parties possessed of the moderate capital ordinarily found in the hands of colonists, and which may nevertheless be perfectly adapted to form a staple of the country when arrived at maturity. Such is the production of wine, which, we believe, cannot be effected in less than six or seven years from the planting of the vineyard; such also is tea, which requires some years to come to perfection; during which period the limited capitalist will not be induced to forego his profits unless he has the prospect of something more than an ordinary return on his outlay. If protection is afforded in such a case, it must stand on the same ground as the legalized monopoly of patents; and we do not deny that cases might occur in which such a protection might be desirable in a new country, and, if we remember rightly, Adam Smith excepts them on his condemnation of the principle. It may, however, even in these cases, be doubted whether it is advisable to foster the growth of any particular trade by protection, when we remember that whatever protection is given to it is in fact so much of somebody else's capital applied in aid of it by the Legislature,—and, if it be a necessary of life, we may say forcibly applied. This capital thus abstracted would no doubt be profitably employed by its owner in some way or other, if the protection afforded to his neighbour's trade did not deprive him of it; and it should be the subject of grave consideration whether the future importance of the trade intended to be protected is such as to justify an interference with the natural employment of capital by its true owner.

As regards the other argument, that protection keeps capital in the colony, we cannot see the use of its doing so if that capital is only kept there to promote a trade which cannot (with reference to the permanent facility of obtaining foreign supplies) be profitably carried on, and from which it must after a few years be withdrawn, or the public continue to buy dear, to keep it in its forced channel, instead of buying cheap elsewhere. The real question is whether the protected commodity is one which the country can prospectively hope to grow cheaper than it can import. If it can, let it grow it, and, if protection be necessary for a little while, as in wine or tea, let it have it circumspectly. But, if the commodity is not such, then the protection can do no real good. It will merely induce capital into a channel where it would not flow without an unnatural inducement, and whence it will retire, leaving many a "scarfed bark" high and dry, the moment that inducement is withdrawn.

If a colony is not capable of producing the necessities of life as a continuing staple with reference to other markets, but is capable of producing some other staple which may be exchanged for them, it ought not to be founded without a sufficient supply of necessities brought from the home country, or of capital intended to be appropriated to their purchase from other countries. Such a course would at once place it on a sound footing. The capital beyond that appropriated to the purchase of necessities would at once find its proper channel, namely, production of the staple of the country; but whatever capital is forced or induced into unnatural channels will either remain in them at a continuing loss to the public, or will eventually be withdrawn to the monopolists' probable ruin.

Suppose that it was intended to found a colony in Australia, of which wool is the natural staple, but where corn cannot be grown for less than (say) twice the cost at which it can be imported from Valparaiso. The colonists start with a capital of £300,000. Whether will they turn it to most account if they invest £100,000 in the purchase of Valparaiso flour, while with the other £400,000 they are producing wool for future exchanges (which wool, being their natural staple, they will for ever produce and exchange at the best advantage); or if they only invest change at the best advantage; or if they must do so in £300,000 in wool and £300,000 (which they must do) in not in the latter case £100,000 for ever sunk and lost in corn, which might have been for ever growing and reaping, which might have been for ever growing and reaping? doubling itself in wool if the corn had been imported? What better is the colony for its being retained in it? No better than a man would be whose servants consumed more than they produced.

REVIEW.

The White Boy; a Story of Ireland, in 1822. By Mrs. S. C. Hall. London: Chapman and Hall.

We conclude the extracts from this interesting work, which, from want of space, we were compelled to omit in our last number.

The stern fidelity of the portraiture of an Irish "middleman" will be recognised by all who have had an opportunity of studying a class characterized by Grattan as "a subordination of vultures":—

"Take Abel Richards as a specimen of the class—and, believe us, there have been many worse; a keen, cunning man—a steward's son, inheriting his father's earnings and his mother's vices—crawling about 'the big house' with a bland smile, a quick ear, a ready invention—a few pounds ever in his purse—to lend, when profit could be made—to buy, at every seizure for rent, either cow or pig, potato or kish, by which he could make a guinea, a shilling, or a penny—a bow and an obliging lie always at the service of his rich neighbour—a blow and a bite for his poor one. Not but that Abel shirked 'the ruffian' whenever he could, especially in his latter days; for he was not given to open strife—it did not answer his purpose. He knew that land—the bit of land—is the peasant's existence; he has, in nine cases out of ten, no regular employment to look too; he must have 'the bit of land,' no matter what he promises to pay for it; he must have it, or beg and starve; if ejected, he dare not seek for ground elsewhere, for if he eject another holder, his own doom is sealed. Richards knew this—he had grown up in the knowledge, and to the calculations which such knowledge brings: at first he got twenty or thirty acres of land into his possession, which he let, re-let, divided, subdivided, until it was said he made the district 'a place of poverty and potato-gardens.' Then he was only an under 'middleman';—the middleman of a middleman, who perhaps (the case was by no means rare) was a middleman under yet another middleman. The wretched beings who called him 'Master Abel' (that was his first public step) were subject to have their pig, and their bed if they had one, 'canted' by landlords—one, two, three, or more. But Abel never 'got on swimmingly' until he became a convert—turned his back upon his old faith, and adopted a new, under the fostering patronage of Mrs. Spencer. This, for a time, gave him a push—a lift with the gentry. All the ill-will his avarice and cruelty had earned, it was very convenient to attribute to 'his changed faith.' He had been so hated previously, that we may doubt if his 'turning coat' increased the ill-will; but he made people believe it did, and managed to obtain a considerable augmentation of land from an absentee landlord, who had some zeal—and much need of the money, which Mister Richards did not fail to procure.

"In due course he made some speeches at meetings in Dublin, which 'told' with those who have a sufficient quantity of charity to 'know' that all who believe as they believe must be saved, while those who believe otherwise will be—the contrary. While Dean Graves, and other of his acquaintances received his confessions, and professions, and tales of persecutions, with mistrust—in Dublin, he dined with titled ladies, learned to eat with a silver fork, obtained various presents of bitterly-worded tracts from those who had the reputation of sanctity among their own 'set'; while more timid votaries bestowed on him blue and pink book markers, embroidered with words, which, strange to say, were at decided variance with their practice—thus a lady who would not suffer a 'popish' domestic to enter her service, selected the motto, 'Charity suffereth long and is kind'; and another, the simple word 'peace,' worked in orange silk, as a token of her hatred of the green. At all the little 'tea-parties' got up by this mistaken body, Abel Richards was introduced with much ceremony as 'that suffering saint from the south.'

"He returned to the neighbourhood of Spencer-court with added interest in the eyes of his mistress; for there are persons in the world, who, seeing others 'get on,' take it for granted they deserve to prosper. Abel's system, under his improved fortunes, was that of the higher grade of middleman—the agent between the necessities of one class and the necessities and vices of another. Some three or four acres, or even one—never of course less; the tenant had to build his own dwelling; this in itself stamps the place in the poor cottier's affection—he has kneaded the clay with his hands and his spade; he has raised the stones; he has cut the sods; he has carried the wattles; and, if his roof be straw, he and his wife and children have borne it—perhaps as a free gift from a 'strong farmer'—on their shoulders, and wrought it into a shelter beneath which he is to spend, he hopes, his life. Few think of this natural love which all men have to the work of their own hands, when they read of an experiment, and the consequences which follow; but Abel Richards knew it, and understood it—and knew its value, when it was to be turned to account. There are some who joy to see the harrow passing over the freshly-tilled field; to whom the husbandman's whistle is sweeter than that of the wild bird; who pause in the fresh pure air to bless God that He permits them to hear the music of hopeful hearts; and to see the seed cast into the earth—a type of immortality. But Abel Richards would bite his lips with bitterness at the labourer's whistle, and inveigle the tenant who could pay and wished to pay, into his debt, that so he might have power to raise his rent or cast him forth."

Let us now extract part of a scene, aptly entitled "the Induction to Outrage." We shall not weaken its effect by a word of comment:—

"Some little time before his arrival at Macroom traces of the fatal disturbances he had heard of were but too distinctly visible. The blackened and still smouldering walls of a cabin, which had evidently been burnt by the military, arrested his attention. A ghastly-looking dog, of large size, wounded and bleeding, sat gasping at the ruins, perhaps the only survivor of the wretched household. Farther on was a still more distressing evidence of martial law; a group of women were wringing their hands, howling, and weeping most bitterly over the lifeless form of a man, who had evidently met with a violent death."

"Edward ordered the driver to stop. 'They murdered him like a dog, without judge or jury, for nothing,' was the only explanation he could receive. 'They murdered him under the tree his father planted, and where his children played.' He inquired the cause, but could obtain no fact. 'They took him out of his bed and murdered him—in the sight of his wife; whose arms they untwisted from round his neck—with a bayonet.' He saw that this was desperately true; for though she was in a swoon on his body, her hands were cut and bleeding."

"It was a scene that made his senses reel, and his firm heart tremble. He collected himself sufficiently to inquire the name of the place, of the man, and at what hour, and by whom, the act of violence (he could not consider it an act of justice) had been committed, and noted them down; then, leaving the weepers some money, he ordered the postillion to drive fast—fast—into Macroom. It was really agonizing to recall this scene, and contrast it with the natural beauty of the country; Edward closed his eyes, as if to prevent external objects distracting his ideas, and endeavoured to collect his senses. That there must have been provocation, he entertained no doubt; but he felt indignant at the unnatural combination of justice and cruelty."

We now turn to the speech of an Orange magistrate, whose good heart more than counterbalanced his principles. He spoke when Aby Richards gave information against the half-brother of a lady who had saved him from the pursuit of the Whiteboys, and who had learned the secret of the young man's complicity while sheltered by the sister:—

"There's none of you gentlemen here but know my principles. I'd carry fire and sword—battle—blood—murder, and sudden death through the country—for the sake of my principles. I'm Saxon to the backbone, barring my name; and yet I am as proud of my name as I am of my principles. I'm no great speaker, and would rather any day knock a man down than argue with him. But there are some things I must speak. I knew that girl's mother.' He paused—he thrust his forefinger into the ample folds of his cravat, the muslin rent at once, and the swelling of his throat, now completely exposed, proved that some violent emotion was raging within him. 'I knew Annie Cumming,' and his voice sunk while he added, 'I never forgot her. I've checked my horse in many a day's courting, when she was dead and gone, to listen to the wild singing of her child, or to see her bright smile as she'd canter along the mountain road to my friend the dean's over there. I've looked in her face as she grew towards womanhood, until I dreamt her mother was before me. I've watched her charities, and blessed her for them, though she did them to Papists. Gentlemen, you, who know my principles, will understand how I feel to have Annie Cumming's child set by such a wretch as that. Now easy, boys, and stand from about me, to give me breath."

"I am certain," said Edward Spencer, "that it is a fabrication from first to last."

"No—no!" exclaimed half-a-dozen, and one continued, unmindful of his blunder, "Lawrence Macarty is well known—rebel blood has run in his veins three hundred years!"

"It's not that," returned Mr. O'Driscoll; "I don't care if his head was over the court house to-night, before to-morrow, just for his father's sake; but have'n't you the hearts of Irishmen in your bosoms, to feel what sick did? Why, that young Irish madden performed a deed of honour which you can't match in your college books. I see it all; every soul in that house would have sent him, crouching there, to blazes, if she had but raised her finger towards his hiding-hole. Yet she preferred endangering her own and her brother's life to a breach of hospitality, or a forfeiture of her word. Glory! is there no shout in yer throats for such a girl as that?"

"The electric spark kindled, and in that very room a wild hurrah and a clapping of hands was raised for her—so loud as to be heard by the people outside the gate. It was a burst of national generosity and gallantry sweeping away all petty feeling for the moment; it was the generous impulse of generous nature. The Master of Macroom called 'Order—order,' while he wiped his eyes, and vehemently reproved the temporary clerk, who had shouted louder than any, and who, caught in the irreverent fact, sat down to plunge his pen in the ink with greater diligence than ever."

"Altho' that," said O'Driscoll, quite comforted and calmed by an ebullition of feeling which might have caused the walls of a modern mansion to tremble as with an earthquake; "Altho' that, I'll tell Aby Richards what I think of him."

Our last extract shall be a description of Irish scenery; and we shall offer no observation on the general character of the work until we receive its conclusion:—

"It is pleasant to dwell upon rugged scenery, then upon rugged truths; the lion back his ear, the fox his den, and the eagle its eyry, and there can be little doubt that our nature partake through life of the character of our early associations. Thus should be borne in mind as an act of justice towards those we judge."

"Glen Fleck, as we have said, is, like many other Irish glens, noted for the ready refuge it has frequently afforded to outlaws; in truth, to all sorts of 'boys' who, for a time, or under peculiar circumstances, found the open plain a dangerous locality. The legendary landmark of the glen is the well-known Phil a dháimh, or the demon's cliff. It is a succession of precipitous rocks, feathered, rather than clothed, with foliage, with here and there a miraculously rooted tree, gaining nutriment you hardly know how, and yet throwing its branches far and wide over the grey rock from which it seems to spring. The succession of rocks forms the face of the Crohane mountain, where the valley opens, as it were, to admit the beautiful river, and give full scope to its graceful windings beneath banks, in some places high and picturesque, at others sloping to the water's brink. The old Keamere road runs between the Fleck and the base of the mountain. Half way up this dangerous, and in stormy weather almost inaccessible, ascent is shown an iden ation in the rock, called Labbie Owen, meaning 'the bed of Owen'; the said Owen having been a most notorious rapparee and freebooter in old times. It might be imagined that this spot, once so noted as a place of outlaw refuge, would be avoided by others as likely to excite attention; but, on the contrary, the Crohane and Annemore mountains have always been the resort of such as were obliged to seek concealment; and any one who has passed a week of long summer days exploring such of the fastnesses as are attainable by lowland feet, would wonder how it is possible to discover those who seek mountain sanctuary, remembering that, no matter what the reward may be, every man, woman, and child would suffer death sooner than give up to the law any who had the least desire to escape from it; indeed, the bare fact of wishing to 'escape the law' is quite sufficient to call, not only Irish sympathy, but Irish ingenuity to the rescue. Owen the Outlaw was, it is said, betrayed by a man called Reardon, who sought, by this act, to gratify private revenge, and succeeded in 'murdering' his friend in the glens of Inveleary, to which he had enticed him. He also, with savage ferocity, beheaded his victim; and the reproach of this deed remains to his descendants, who are but little trusted, and are still reproachfully termed Reardan na ocean, 'Reardon of the head.' The whole district is full of traditions. A belief in fairy lore and witchcraft mingles with religious faith, and imparts a more than ordinary degree of wildness and superstition to the habits and feelings of the primitive residents. They know little of the worldly doings of their countrymen beyond the glens; and, as in the case almost uniformly with the peasant population of Ireland, place implicit reliance on the statements of their clergy—while exercising keen perceptions, with which they are amply endowed, in doubting and investigating whatever comes to them from any other source."

"A most commandingly placed wreck of the past—which must perpetually recall to the peasant the tales of former times—is still an object of interest to the stranger. Kollala Castle, an old fortalice of the O'Connells, was erected to guard this once important pass; and many a night had the treasure seeker spent in circling its walls, and hunting for the riches he imagined must be concealed in the immediate neighbourhood of the guard chamber, beneath which it is believed one of the race of Irish giants lies entombed. Every step through this romantic locality is full of beauty and interest, whether visited when the sun shines upon its lovely scenery, or when the storm adds its might to the majesty of the mountains; but the glensmen are grown of late so much like their neighbours that the imagination must go back to the excited Whiteboyism of our period to see them transformed into Irish Guerrillas—resolved to protect whoever sought shelter in their mountain fastnesses."

THE REGISTRATION.—The Anti-Corn-Law League have this week opened an office in this town, for the transaction of the business attendant upon the registration of voters in the Free-Trade interest, for North Lancashire.

FREE-TRADE FREEHOLDERS.—We beg respectfully to remind those who have qualified themselves as electors of the West Riding, by purchasing small freeholds, that they must state the fact in their income-tax schedule, or perhaps they may fall into trouble.—Bradford Observer.

WHEATHAMSTEAD FREE-TRADE ASSOCIATION.—The anniversary of the formation of the Wheathamstead Free-Trade Association will be celebrated on Wednesday next, June 25th, at the Swan Inn, Wheathamstead. Mr. C. H. Lattimore will take the chair.

ANTI-CORN-LAW LECTURES.—HOUNSLOW.—Mr. Edvey delivered a lecture on the corn and provision laws, and the necessity of paying proper attention to the coming registration, in the lecture room at the Nag's Head, Hounslow, on Friday evening, the 13th instant. The lecture was well attended, and resolutions condemnatory of all monopolies, and expressing a determination to co-operate with the League in improving the parliamentary register, were carried unanimously, and with acclamation. The first resolution was moved by Mr. Leslie, and seconded by Mr. Marshall. The second was moved by Mr. Barnham, and seconded by Mr. Giffield.—Mr. Edvey lectured to a crowded auditory in the theatre, Rochester, on Tuesday evening, the 17th, Mr. Young in the chair. The theatre was crowded in all parts, and the very best feeling manifested in favour of Free Trade.

THE LEAGUE versus the CORN LAWS.—The enemies of the League often ask what good has that body done, and to what purpose have all its agitation and expenditure of money been carried on? We reply it has familiarised the public to the contemplation of this subject, and has compelled our leading parliamentary men to abandon all those hollow and selfish pretences by which agricultural protection was defended. It has thrown them back upon the real merits of the question, and compelled them to acknowledge that their opponents are theoretically right, and that the time and mode of effecting the desired change is the only point now to be taken into account. Thus, we contend, is a mighty victory, and has been achieved in a much shorter time than might have been anticipated; the great difficulty has been surmounted, for when a man is once brought to confess that such and such things ought to be done, it is a comparatively easy matter to make him see that delay is both criminal and dangerous.—Kendal Mercury.

THE LATE THOMAS HOOD.—We are informed that a local subscription was last week set on foot at Manchester, by a few private gentlemen in aid of the fund now raising for the family of this distinguished writer; and that upwards of £100 were collected in the first two days. Contributions are still flowing in with a rapidity that well attests the liberality of Manchester, and the estimation in which literary genius is there held. It is probable that, in the other great towns of Britain, subscriptions for this excellent object, if started with equal spirit by individuals, would be supported with similar liberality by the public.—Times.

ADVANCE OF WAGES.—DINNER IN CELEBRATION OF THE EVENT.—On Saturday last the hands employed at the works of Messrs. Haslam and Cannon, Bolton, to the number of 120, dined together at the house of Mr. Nightingale, the Tipping's Arms Inn, Astley Bridge, in honour of the generous conduct of their employers, in advancing the rate of wages as soon as asked for. Some weeks ago, the operative cotton-spinners of Bolton and the neighbourhood applied to their employers for an advance of five per cent. upon their wages, in consequence of the improvement in trade, and the consequent demand for labour. This request was complied with by the mill-owners, but they required a fortnight's notice before making the advance. Messrs. Haslam and Cannon, however, gave the additional five per cent. forthwith.

THE ART-UNION.

As already announced in the LEAGUE, the enterprising proprietor of this well-known journal intends furnishing his readers, in the forthcoming July number, with an artistic description of the Bazaar, illustrated with numerous cuts of various objects which excited the interest or called forth the admiration of the visitors to this great national exposition of British taste and skill. We have been favoured with a few specimen cuts, the first of which will be recognised as the Birmingham stall.

The first of the two engravings which follow is an elegant card—or visiting—ticket, plate; the second is a beautiful vase richly decorated, and admitted to possess great merit as a work of art.

A PECULIAR BURDEN ON LAND.

"SOCIAL AND MORAL RELATIONS HAVE GROWN UP BETWEEN LANDLORD AND TENANT UNDER THE CORN LAW AS IT HAS EXISTED, WHICH IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO OVERLOOK."—Sir Robert Peel on Mr. Villiers's Motion.

The oracular sentence of the Prime Minister which we have quoted above bears much of that double meaning for which the oracles of old were notorious; and when the reader has scanned the document we are about to present to his notice he will not hesitate to admit that there are "social and moral relations" between landlord and tenant "grown up" under the Corn Laws which it is indeed "impossible to overlook."

Whether the conclusion arrived at will not be just the reverse of that of the procrastinating Minister remains to be seen. We have never denied, nay, we have always strenuously asserted, that land in the hands of the tenant-farmers of this country is subject to peculiar and insupportable burdens; and we have constantly maintained that some prompt and efficient remedy is necessary. But, before the remedy can be applied, the nature and cause of the burdens must be thoroughly understood. We have said that those burdens are imposed by landowning legislation in Parliament, or by landlords' edicts upon their own estates. And the connexion of the two is not very remote.

Foremost amongst the farmers' peculiar burdens stands the game, which we all know could not exist a twelvemonth if landlords did that, which the First Lord of the Treasury affected to deprecate, namely, dealt with their land upon "commercial principles;" but under the protection of the Corn Law a system of tenure has "grown up," half feudal, half commercial, by which the tenant-farmer has, in too many instances, become not exactly a serf, a bailiff, or a capitalist who has contracted to receive the produce he can raise upon the land in consideration of a definite rent, but something partaking of the character of each. In many cases the serf and bailiff largely preponderate. It seems to be so upon the estate of Lord Dinorben, in South Wales, as will be seen from the following imperious circular which has lately been addressed to his lordship's tenantry. The object of the circular is to secure the peace of his lordship's hares when fattening upon his tenants' crops. This is the landlord's edict:—

"Sir,—I feel I need make no apology for troubling you with this note, as it is the fourth or the fifth I have, without the least apparent effect, addressed to you on the same subject, viz., the disturbance of the game upon your farm by dogs.

"Lord Dinorben complains that few hares were found on your farm last coursing season, and this is in a great measure attributable to your having had your dogs going at large, or following your servants in and over the fields. It is not without great regret that his lordship, and indeed all parties interested in the preservation of game, feel themselves compelled to reiterate complaints of this kind year after year, and I again feel called upon to inform you that if the nuisance is not entirely abated by you, and that immediately, the most decided steps will be taken to have it put down in another way.

"I shall cause a survey of the estate to be made, in order to ascertain how many, and what kind, of dogs are kept upon each farm, and report to the surveyor of taxes accordingly, in order that they may be one and all taxed; and should this still fail of the desired effect, other steps still more decided will be had recourse to, to rid the estate of all such annoyance to the landlord, his friends, and those in charge of the game, and others interested in the peace and happiness of the estate; and do let me once more, in the name of your landlord, and in my own name, beseech you to attend to this letter, and save us all from further trouble in this matter.

"I remain, Sir, your sincere friend and well-wisher, "Kinmel Park, April 16, 1845." "J. MURRAY.

Can anything be more insolent than the tone of this circular? Can anything be more unfair and one-sided than its objects? "All interested in the preservation of the game" complain not that the game is destroyed—the poor subservient tenants are too spirit-broken for any such infraction of landlord private law—but that "dogs going at large or following" the farming servants disturb the game. We thought that genuine monopolist of Hertfordshire, the Marquis of Salisbury, stood alone in forbidding his tenants to keep dogs; but it seems Lord Dinorben competes with him as a protector of hares. Then, in what pathetic terms does Mr. "J. Murray" refer to the breach of the "peace and happiness of the estate," which the loose dogs occasion by annoying "the landlord, his friends, and those in charge of the game"—that is, the gamekeepers! But it seems never to have entered into the mind of the "Kinmel Park" land-agent, that the peace and happiness of the estate could be at all affected by the losses the tenants might suffer from the game. The landlord feeds his hares upon the tenants' crops, which, as "a commercial speculation," they purchased the right to grow from the landlord. Lord Dinorben has pocketed a full "commercial" rent, yet not a thought is cast upon the tenants' interests in this matter of game. The landlord, his friends, the gamekeepers are all anxiously considered, although their "peace and happiness" consist in the undisturbed enjoyment of that to which they have no right, and which Lord Dinorben has expressly sold to the tenants; while the "peace and happiness" of the tenants, the existence and well-being of their families, their labour, their skill, and their industry, are sacrificed recklessly, wantonly, cruelly to the landlord's sport, and are not deemed worthy of consideration in an estimate of the "peace and happiness of the estate"!!!

Here, then, we have a peculiar burden upon land; here we see one of the causes which prevent, if any do prevent, British tenants from competing with the corn-growers of the whole world. Will the British people consent to be taxed in order to continue such burdens?

Now, although such atrocious documents as the "Kinmel" edict do not often come before the public, it by no means follows that notices of a similar character are rarely given to tenant-farmers. It is true that most land-agents, somewhat more shrewd, if not less despoils, than Mr. J. Murray, usually contrive to convey their lord's wishes verbally or in some other guarded way, yet the system which the above circular indicates is in full operation on most large estates. "Social and moral relations" have grown up between landlord and tenant, which are utterly inconsistent with the dependence of the tenant, and with a fair and equitable Let the landlords of this country put forth the real state of these relations, and the tenants will have upon the value of their property. Do they believe that any man of spirit and enterprise would rent a farm under Lord Dinorben and others such as he is shown to be by his agent's letter? Men of capital and education—and a fair portion of each is required to farm land in the best manner—will not subject themselves to such insults as that contained in the circular. Hence it is that so many estates are occupied by farmers who, when the season is adverse or any new set of circumstances occurs, have no resource but to fall back upon the forbearance of their landlords. It is possible that some landlords may, as Mr. Villiers said, find it "more profitable to grow votes than wheat," may prefer a subservient and inferior tenantry to independent and substantial farmers; but will the public submit to the maintenance of the Corn Laws for such objects? There is now no longer any mystery left in the matter. The land of this country has been shown to be little more than half cultivated, and its more perfect cultivation is only prevented by the Corn Laws and the peculiar burdens imposed by landlords upon their tenants; the farmers' profits have been proved to be scanty and precarious from the same causes, and from those causes only; and the rents of the landowners are notoriously in peril only because they refuse to grant to their tenants complete possession and secure tenures, which are indispensable to the successful pursuit of farming as a business. The only pretences upon which the Corn Laws have been hitherto supported stand exposed to the derision of the whole world; and we put it to the landowners of this nation whether the power to issue such mandates as that of "Kinmel Park"—for we fully admit that tenants in a position to submit to such insults would not be found with a free trade in corn—be worth the hazards they are incurring in their present most vain and hopeless struggle to uphold monopoly?

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

There are various roads to the now certain goal of Free Trade. Some go by the direct way which points to their injustice and impolicy, while others arrive there by the more circuitous route which shows that their maintenance is impossible or inexpedient. The real Free-Trade has gone by the first, the Whigs and the Ministerials by the latter way; and it would seem that some of the most furious monopolists are about to reach the same point by a sort of flying leap. Thus we find in the New Farmers' Journal, usually a passionate and unreasonable organ of the monopolists, the following concluding sentence to a tirade on Ministerial "treachery":—

"All things considered, if we are doomed to see the principles now adopted by Ministers ultimately and fully carried into action, perhaps the sooner the better I ought to be the cry of all concerned."

This has, in fact, long been the cry of a great body of the farmers who are convinced that the Corn Laws cannot be maintained for more than a very brief period. And there is really much practical good sense in it; for if Free Trade was fraught with all the danger to farmers which their political leaders once asserted, it would be far better to meet it and provide for it at once and for ever. But, in fact, there is no danger to occupiers of land from full and immediate Free Trade, while every hour of delay brings with it its own particular evils, and renders all calculations for the future uncertain and hazardous.

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

EXPERIMENT IN WHEAT CULTURE.

We give the following letters addressed to Mr. Cobden, in the account of an experiment in the culture of wheat conducted by an intelligent agriculturist. It is evidence of the activity which exists amongst the superior farmers, which, when the "bane of protection" has been removed, will inevitably produce great results in agriculture. Perhaps the matter is somewhat speculative, but still the consideration of such plans will lead farmers to adopt improvements in many of their most ordinary processes. The general adoption of such a system as that of our correspondent is, of course, out of the question, for man wants meat as well as bread; but we believe that under a Free Trade, by admitting the inferior grains for stock to be imported and sold at a cheap rate, good crops of wheat might be grown more frequently on the same land than can be done under the existing system.

Yorkshire, April 23, 1845.

"Sir,—I take the liberty of sending to you a calculation of the cost of growing wheat successively on 400 acres of land, which I believe to be tolerably correct. The feasibility of accomplishing this desideratum is not yet quite proved, but I feel little doubt of its being ultimately brought about. If I am tolerably correct, wheat may be produced, according to this plan, in average years and on good fair land, at a cost of 30s. 2d. per quarter. You will observe that I have taken 50 acres extra, for the purpose of producing food for sixteen horses, necessary for the cultivation of the whole. My mode of calculation may not accord with the ideas of many; but it appears to me to be the correct method; that is, debiting the farm with all charges, and crediting it with the value of all produce, whether consumed on the farm or sold. Of these debits rent seems to form about one-sixth. I must confess that I do not see the justice of debiting the value of the produce consumed on the premises, and then saying the rent forms so large a proportion of the value of the after available produce. To a farmer I consider his rent forms an item of expense the same as any other expense incurred in the cultivation of his farm; and, according to my calculation, if the 450 acres were rent free, it would only reduce the cost of production about 6s. 9d. per quarter, which is a much smaller amount than it is frequently stated to be."

Calculation of expense of cultivating 450 acres of land, of good average quality, on the following system: 50 acres being employed in producing food for 16 horses used on the farm, and the remaining 400 acres being appropriated to growing wheat successively; presuming that it may be accomplished by restoring to the land the constituents which each crop exhausts.

"Sir,—As you appear to have taken an interest in the calculation which I sent to you, on the cost of growing wheat successively on the same land, I now beg to follow it up by sending another, of the cost of probable profit on the cultivation of the same 400 acres, on the common four-course system of husbandry. If I am tolerably correct, you will perceive that the latter is only about one-half as profitable as the former, or, as £655 is to £1266. But in the latter (four course) I have been much at a loss at what price to credit the farm with the turnips, as it is a crop which has indirectly to be converted into money, at least most commonly so, inasmuch as that crop has to be consumed by stock on the premises. In situations near a large town, considerably more might be made of the turnips by selling them at once. Again, when a farmer sells his turnips to be eaten on the land, by sheep belonging to other parties, he often obtains for them only £3 or £4 per acre, the manure left by the sheep being estimated as of considerable value. As I debit the farm with manure for the turnips, I conceive that I am correct in crediting it with the straw produced; but whether I have estimated it at sufficient value is another question. At any rate the relative position of the two calculations, as setting one mode of culture in opposition to the other, remains pretty nearly the same. As to rent, it appears that on the rotation system the landlord gets as much, pretty nearly, as the tenant, or as £540 is to £655; but on the continuous growth of wheat the proportion is as £540 is to £1266. In estimating rent I always conceive that a calculation ought to be made of the cost (independent of rent) of cultivating a farm on the most approved principle, including wear and tear of implements and interest of capital; then take a fair estimate of the probable produce, and let the excess of value of the produce be divided by three—one-third to be considered as the landlord's share, and two-thirds the tenant's. I fear, however, that few farmers so cultivate their land as to make that proportionate share for themselves; and this is mainly owing more to their own want of energy than to their having to pay an exorbitant rent. Many farmers, I believe, now acknowledge the League as having been their best friend, by stirring them up, and forcing them to exert themselves. A great deal is now said about electro-culture, that is, attracting the electric fluid from the atmosphere, by means of suspended wires, and conducting it down to wires buried in the soil, which impart it to the growing plants; thus giving them more of the subtle fluid than they would otherwise be acted upon by. I feel a little dubious of its efficacy, nevertheless I am trying it on a small scale. A Mr. Foster, in Scotland, produced, last year, on a small plot of land, after the rate of 13 quarters of barley per acre, by this means—the remainder of the field producing only 5½ quarters per acre. But the process must not be supposed to afford any food to the plant, but merely to give the power of obtaining and assimilating food when presented to it, thereby rendering the application of manure more necessary. To insist upon the plant to grow, under this process, without applying manure, would be like a doctor administering tonic medicines to a patient, thereby giving him an appetite, and then placing an empty plate before him, and telling him to eat, drink, and be merry."

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Our attention has been drawn to an answer to correspondents given last week on the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Galsby and Barrow—to qualify for a county by the occupation of premises at a rent of £5, under one landlord. It is suggested that we should explain that the property in the case was not a single house, but a large holding, and that the holding was in several persons in common, and then the holding from several persons would be good; which would, no doubt, be the case.

A Young Free-Presser, Manchester, writes:—I should be much obliged by your answering, through the medium of the LEAGUE, the following question: I am a lodger, paying upwards of £2 per annum for two rooms, which rooms are kept for my own use exclusively. I having a key of the outer door for ingress and egress at pleasure, if the foregoing is sufficient, I shall get my name placed on the register in the rate book. Your attention will oblige myself and many more occupying rooms at the same rate as myself. [The Court of Common Pleas, upon appeal in the case of "Pettit and Smith," and in the case of "W. New and Perkins," have decided that lodgers occupying apartments in a house where the landlord resides is not entitled to vote; but in the case of "Scott and Huggitt," a larger occupied room where there was a common street door for other inmates, who each had a key, and the landlord did not reside on the premises, held entitled to vote.]

"C. M. K." A lease of a house in a borough will not confer a county qualification.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Galsby, Newell's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

As the Parliamentary proceedings of the week have contained nothing of interest or importance to the Free-Trade public, we have, therefore, omitted our usual Post-script, in consequence of the great length to which our report of the speeches at the meeting in Covent Garden Theatre on Wednesday night has extended, and in order to have more space for matter that we were unable to insert in our last number.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—In the French Chamber of Deputies, on Monday, the principal business for the remainder of the session was arranged, and the following bills will be passed: The Paris and Strasbourg, the Tours and Nantes, the Dieppe and Fecamp, and the Avignon and Aix railway bills. Several others will be postponed, but all the great lines are to be commenced without delay.

The National states that the carpenters of Paris, to the number of 5000 or 10,000, had struck for an advance of wages. They demand an increase from four francs a day to five francs, and urge that, taking the year round, the pay of an able-bodied man did not average three francs, while all the necessaries of life were rising in price.

ALGERIA.—The Moniteur Algerien of the 10th inst. brings accounts of fresh razzias. At Dileten Marshal Bugeaud, with an overwhelming force under his command, "killed" 3000 head of cattle, killed fifteen of the enemy, and possessed himself of a large booty. On the 1st inst., at Ouled Bouchemmou, he succeeded in killing 150 men, and "killing" 1000 head of cattle. These are, however, only a few of the triumphs of a similar kind which have been achieved by the force under his command during the last month.

SPAIN.—Accounts from Madrid of the 10th inst. bring no news of the least interest. Senor Prato, the editor of the Patriota, was still confined in the barracks of the Body Guards. The Castellano describes a bull fight, which took place on the 9th, as having been one of the finest of the season; twenty-four horses were killed on the occasion. Another of the same kind will shortly be exhibited by M. Torcuato to his friends, at which several of the diplomatic body are to "assist." We read in a letter from Burgos of the 8th:—"On May 10 a dreadful event occurred near this town. Five young girls, of from 18 to 20 years of age, set out early in the morning for Vascos, their native village, to pass the fête of Pentecost. The same evening they were all found lying dead on a part of the road between Pineda and Vascos. Medical men having examined the bodies, declared that they had died of cold. It is supposed that they sat down when heated with their walk, and, having fallen asleep, were struck by the cold wind and perished."

BATUMI.—Accounts from Batumi of the 16th announce the resignation of all the Ministers. It appears that the elections, both in the capital and Antwerp, had gone decidedly against the Government candidates, and eleven Liberals had been returned. These unexpected results had such an effect upon several of the members of the Cabinet, that a council was summoned, and, after some deliberation, all gave in their resignations. Baron D'Huart, Governor of Namur, and formerly Finance Minister, was immediately sent for, and intrusted with the formation of a new Ministry. The visit of the King and Queen to England has in consequence been deferred.

NAPLES.—A letter from Naples, June 7, says:—"From the 1st inst. our Government has lowered the postage of letters by one-half. This act, which was not anticipated, has been received with enthusiasm. It does not, however, extend to journals."

LISBON, June 9.—The last accounts from Madeira represent it as suffering greatly from the depressed state of its commerce. The treaty with the United States of America, from which so much was expected, has not led to any increase in the exportation of wine, the staple produce of that island. Doctor Kalley is still there, and has not met with any further molestation. At the instance of the new bishop, the Governor has issued an order against working on Sundays and holidays. The English brig Valiant, Dobson master, from the Mediterranean, homeward bound, put into Lisbon on the 25th ult., for a supply of fresh water, and though she was provided with a clean bill of health, and had been thirty-nine days at sea, without touching anywhere, or communicating with any other vessel, she was subjected to heavy quarantine charges, having been made to pay three days' fees, though she was only one day in the Tigris. It is a wonder that all trade has not disappeared from this inhospitable port!

GAZETTE.—Intelligence from Athens, of the 31st ult., gives a melancholy account of the anarchy which has been the result of the intrigues practised in that country. Colonel Strato, the commandant of the troops on the frontiers of western Greece, had been attacked by General Grivas, assailed by the brigands, and wounded. It appears from the narrative of General Grivas and his brother that the affair was a dastardly attempt to assassinate the former.

THE RUSSIAN AND CIRCASSIANS.—Letters from Odessa of the 22nd ult. bring accounts from Tiflis that the expedition against Shamyl Bey, led on by Count Woronzoff, has not been successful. The Russian troops were forced to retreat with great loss. Shamyl Bey has proclaimed that he will treat as enemies all the provinces of Circassia which do not take up arms against Russia. A chief of his nomination has been accepted by the Abas. In answer to the proclamation of Count Woronzoff, Shamyl Bey has circulated another in the Russian camps and quarters, in which he says:—"Shamyl Bey does not fear the 180,000 men sent against him by Russia, and hopes, with the help of God, to triumph over them. God has given to man the sword for conquest, and justice for his government. If Nicholas forgets to do justice, God has given to Shamyl the sword to punish him."

THE JEWS IN RUSSIA.—Accounts from St. Petersburg of the 31st ult. state that a Polish refugee, named Golezky, a native of Wollgum, had been arrested and allowed to return to his country. Andrew Anderson, the British sailor convicted of the murder of a pilot, had been publicly flogged at Riga, and was to be transported to Siberia, with a convoy of malefactors about to depart for the mines of that country. The Emperor had lately ordered that tracts of land belonging to the Crown should be assigned to the Israelites in the immediate neighbourhood of their residence, with the money necessary to enable them to purchase agricultural implements. The authorities, however, charged with the execution of the measure, throw all sorts of difficulties in the way of the Israelites who claimed the benefit of the Imperial ukase, and a complaint denouncing the ill-will of those functionaries, and signed by the heads of 150 families, had been addressed to the Emperor.

INDIA.—Letters and papers from Bombay to the 12th of May have been received. The intelligence is not of striking importance. The chief subject of interest is the continuation of the intrigues at Lahore. Ghoolab Singh was there a sort of state prisoner, for the troops were unwilling to murder him until he had disgorged the vast sums of money which he and his brother and nephew had purloined from the treasury of old Runjeet Singh. Watched by the Queen's party, lest he should find means of bribing all the Khalsa, he has been called on to give up his fortresses and his wealth. He vows that his wealth is concealed in places known only to himself, and that, unless he is allowed to return to his hill forts, he can only give a small sum.—Islam Khan, the only one of the robber chiefs who had escaped from being taken prisoner by Sir C. Napier, had returned to make a foray into Scinde, but he was attacked and beaten by the Murree tribe, by whom the British friendship is respected, and who killed two Banglee chiefs that joined him.

CHINA.—The news from China comes down to the end of March. The Emperor had received some favourable notices of Christianity, and was disposed to tolerate it. Lieutenant A. McDonald, of H.M.'s 98th Regiment, had been tried by a court-martial, for sending an insulting note to his superior officer. He was sentenced to be cashiered; but, on a revision, a milder punishment has been inflicted. The Government of Macao, whose suicidal measures have for some time past attracted attention, has at length made a bold and desperate effort at improvement; and by the establishment of new custom-house regulations, calculated to remove some of the impediments hitherto thrown in the way of trade, has sought to lure back the shipping to its well-nigh deserted port, and render the colony once more a lively and bustling resort of commerce.

WEST INDIES.—The Forth, Royal Mail steam-ship, arrived at Southampton from the West Indies on Thursday evening. The news brought by the Forth is of a rather meagre description. In Jamaica nearly the whole of the crops were in, and exceeded the most sanguine expectations of the planters. The fine season was much in their favour, and there is no doubt that the amount will be over 60,000 tons. The prospect for the future, too, it appears, is good. The island was generally healthy, but when the packer left on the 24th ult. the heavy rains had just commenced. The Bluebell, with 260 Hill Coolies, had arrived. Matters in Barbadoes are much the same; and there is little news of any consequence from the other islands. The Forth brings home 19 shipwrecked seamen from Fayal, who had abandoned the Chittam, of Liverpool, off St. George, in consequence of her foundering. The captain, thinking the vessel was likely to fill and go down, took to the boats, with the crew, about ten o'clock in the morning, and made for Fayal, at which place they arrived in safety. About sunset they observed their vessel, with all her sails set, running through the water at great speed, and apparently in safety. Night coming on, however, they lost sight of her, and the ship has not been heard of since. The crew was in a very destitute condition, and the passengers of the Forth very humanely subscribed a liberal sum to relieve their necessities.

DOMESTIC.

A frightful steam-boiler explosion occurred on Saturday last, at the foundry of Messrs. Nasmyth, Gaskell, and Co., at Patricroft, near Eccles, causing the death of the engineer, John Hurst, and inflicting such severe injuries on two others that they are considered to be in imminent danger. The buildings were dreadfully shattered by the force of the explosion. The accident is supposed to have been caused by a want of water in the boiler.

An alarming accident occurred on the Great Western Railway on Tuesday morning. The express train left Paddington for Exeter in the morning at three quarters past nine o'clock; the whole distance (191 miles), since this fast train has been established, being performed in four hours and a half. The train consisted of the engine and tender, a luggage-van, two second-class and two first-class carriages. Upon the arrival of the train at a point of the railway called Dog-kennel-bridge, the passengers experienced an extraordinary undulatory sort of motion, and before more than a few seconds had elapsed, the two first-class and one of the second-class carriages were thrown with fearful violence off the line down an embankment 12 or 15 feet in depth, with a most alarming and dreadful crash. Many of the passengers, about 30 in number, received severe contusions, but fortunately no life was lost.

On Saturday the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the grand Waterloo Barracks, opposite the north side of the White Tower, on the site of the grand store-house, or small armoury, destroyed by the great fire in 1841, was performed by the Duke of Wellington. The Barracks will be 288 feet in length, 61 in breadth, and 70 in height. The architecture will be in strict keeping with the style of the White Tower. It will be three stories high, the entrance to be between two octagon towers, surrounded by the royal arms and a clock.

On Friday night, the 13th inst., about 11 o'clock, the town and neighbourhood of Chatham were visited with a violent storm, the rain pouring down in torrents and flooding the streets. The storm was preceded by most vivid flashes of lightning, illuminating the country for miles, and accompanied by awful peals of thunder. The storm lasted about one hour. The lightning set fire to a granary and piggery on a farm in the parish of Tunstall; the buildings were burnt to the ground, and 40 quarters of wheat destroyed.

The adjourned inquest on Mr. Alexander Seton, shot in the late duel at Gosport, was again resumed, and terminated on Tuesday. Mrs. Hawkey, the wife of Lieutenant Hawkey, underwent a long examination; and from her evidence it appeared the duel originated in improper proposals made to her by the deceased. The jury brought in a verdict that the deceased came by his death in consequence of the operation which was rendered necessary by the wound he had received; and they found Lieutenant Hawkey and Lieutenant Pym guilty of wilful murder.

The total loss of life arising from the accident at Yarmouth is 79 (bodies found 77), and most providentially not one of that number had any person dependent on him or her. Only eight or ten of the deceased exceeded 21 years of age. Another bridge, on piles, has since been thrown over the river, near the site of the former suspension-bridge, the platform of this latter being used to form the roadway of the present.

The net revenue of the Post-office of the United Kingdom in the year ending 5th of January, 1839, amounted to £1,611,353; in the year ending 5th of January, 1844, to £2,237,711; and in the year ending 5th of January, 1845, to £2,610,721. It is hence manifest that the revenue of the Post-office department is gradually recovering from the discouragement given to it (for a time) by the reduction of the charge to a penny per letter. The lowest net revenue received since the adoption of the "penny" system was that received in the year ending 5th of January, 1841 (the first after the alteration), when it was as low as £1,102,028.

On Wednesday the Dutch steam-packet Batavier, Captain David Dunlop, arrived alongside the St. Katherine's Steam-packet Wharf from Rotterdam. She brought sixty-seven live oxen and cows, and upwards of 700 live ducks, geese, hens, &c. The influx of poultry from the Continent every week has considerably reduced its price in the markets.

By the returns kept by the authorities of the Fire Brigade of the conflagrations that daily occur in the metropolis, it appears that during this year, up to Wednesday evening, no fewer than 411 fires have happened in London and its suburbs.

Accounts from all parts of the kingdom represent the crops as in the most promising condition, owing to the continued warmth of the weather.

For many—very many—years (says the Dublin Evening Mail) there has not been such summer weather as we have enjoyed for the last few days. The heat has been intense, and never within the memory of man did the country or the crops present so glorious an appearance, or give promise of a more early and abundant harvest.

The Repeal Association met at the Conciliation Hall, Dublin, on Monday. The attendance, in the absence of Mr. O'Connell, was small. The business was not of any general importance. The week's rent amounted to £430. 10s. 10d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

INCREASE OF COTTON, SILK, AND OTHER MILLS.—In his last report, dated the 16th ultimo, and just printed, Mr. Leonard Horner, the factory inspector for this district, states, that in the latter part of 1843 there were 1596 mills at work in his district; and that there are now 1830. So that there are 234 more mills working at present than there were a year and a half ago. Mr. Horner's district, we believe, comprises parts of Yorkshire, the whole of Lancashire, and parts of Wales.—Manchester Guardian.

EFFECT OF PUBLIC WORKS ON WAGES.—The immense public works now in progress in all parts of the empire are drawing great numbers of workmen from agriculture to the much better paid occupation of "unemployed labour." In South Lancashire, farm-labourers were never so scarce as they are at present, and in Durham the want of men is so great that they are endeavouring to obtain labour

THE GREAT BAZAAR AT COVENT GARDEN THEATRE THE ART-UNION MONTHLY JOURNAL. OF THE FINE ARTS, THE ARTS DECORATIVE AND ORNAMENTAL, AND RECORD OF THE ARTS OF MANUFACTURE. Largely illustrated by Engravings on Wood, Steel, &c. Price One Shilling. The following is extracted from the Art-Union of the present Month—June.

It is our intention to publish, with our next number, an ample Report of the "Industrial Art" contained in this Exhibition; we design to issue it in the manner of these Parts of the Art-Union which we last year devoted to the Exposition in Paris, and which gave very general satisfaction; having proved indeed practically useful to several English manufacturers, by suggesting valuable hints for the improvement of their productions.

We shall largely illustrate this article, introducing into it Wood Engravings of all the principal objects which derive value from the influence they receive from Fine Art; and at the same time, we shall endeavour to render the Report interesting, by engraving several of the "Stalls" at which the more important of the manufactured productions were arranged and exhibited.

We shall then, we trust and believe, be pursuing that plan which, of all others, is the best calculated to advance the interests of the Fine Arts, by showing how continually and how effectually they may be made to advance the useful Arts, suggesting the value of manufactured articles sometimes a hundred fold.

The Article above referred to will be published in the Art-Union, No. 54, on the 1st of July. It will occupy 6 columns of that Journal, and be illustrated by between six and ten Wood Engravings, consisting of Drawings of the most prominent "Stalls," and the most striking and interesting objects exhibited on the occasion.

The Work (which should be ordered without delay) may be obtained of any Bookseller in town or country; or of the Publishers, Messrs. Chapman and Hall, 149, Strand, to whom all communications for "The Editor" are to be addressed.

TO BE SOLD BY AUCTION, by Mr. ABRAHAM STANFIELD, on THURSDAY, the 25th day of JUNE, 1845, at the house of Mr. GEORGE ELLIS, the White Hart Inn, in Tottenham, at Seven o'Clock in the evening, subject to such conditions as shall be then and there produced—

Lot 1. All that ancient, substantial Messuage or Mansion house called Holebottom, situated in the township of Stanfield, in the parish of Halfpenny, in the county of York; together with six Cottages the spacious Barn, Stables, and other convenient Outbuildings, and the several Closes of Land thereto belonging, called or known by the several names of the Rough, the Bark off Rough or Little Rough, the Dursfield or Little Field, the Hottenshouse, the Coldwell End, to a Coldwell Hole, the Coldwell Field, the Croft (now divided into two closes), the New, or the Lower Meadow, or Jumps Hill (now divided into two closes), with the Woody Ground, Plantations, and Stone Quarries, containing altogether, by admeasurement, 75 acres, 1 rood, and 1 perch, or thereabouts; and now in the several occupations of Jeremiah Heyworth, John Stanfield, Samuel Mitchell, John Helliwell, John Crabtree, and Messrs. Hinchliffe, or their under-tenants.

This estate abounds with stone of a most excellent quality, the sound rock is of extraordinary depth, and may be very cheaply gotten; and there being a ready and near market for stone, these mines very much enhance the value of the estate. The Barn and Buildings are very substantial structures, and the Cottages are secure of good tenants from the Holebottom Mill hands. The estate abounds with good water, and a considerable part of the meadow ground is now available for building purposes; and the land is in a state of good cultivation.

Lot 2. All that Freehold Annual Ground Rent, or sum of £4 9s., payable in respect of certain buildings and land at Meadow Bottom, in Stanfield aforesaid, belonging to Mr. Thomas Thomas.

Lot 3. All that Freehold Annual Ground Rent, or sum of £1 12s., payable in respect of certain buildings situated at Meadow Bottom aforesaid, belonging to Mr. Abraham Stanfield.

Lot 4. All that spacious Cottage or Dwelling house, situated at Stoney-brink, in Walsden, with the rights and appurtenances to the same belonging, now in the occupation of James Newall. This Lot is Leasehold for the remainder of a term of 99 years, subject to a ground rent of 10s. 3d.

Lot 5. All those three substantial Cottages or Dwelling Houses, situated, tiled, and being in Knowlwood, near Todmorden, in the county of Lancaster, and generally called the Mansion house, with the back yard and appurtenances to the same belonging, as the same are now in the several occupations of William Jackson, John Nutcliffe, and David Hartley. This Lot is Leasehold for the remainder of a term of 99 years, subject to the annual ground rent of £1.

Lot 6. All those three substantial newly erected Cottages or Dwelling houses, situated at Knowlwood aforesaid, now in the occupations of Robert Nutcliffe, Thomas Jackson, and James Stevenson, with the stable, brewhouse, and slaughterhouse behind the same, now in the occupations of James Law and Jeremiah Heyworth. This Lot is Leasehold for the remainder of a term of 99 years, and will be sold subject to the appportioned ground rent of £2 9s.

Lot 7. All those eleven several Cottages or Dwelling houses at Knowlwood aforesaid, generally called the Loom Shop, with outbuildings, gardens, yards, and appurtenances thereto belonging, as the same are now in the several occupations of John Stevenson, Robert Marshall, Thomas Hord, William Stanfield, Joshua Fielden, William Farrer, James Law, Abraham Stanfield, Samuel Kershaw, and the said Nutcliffe, and one unoccupied. This Lot is also Leasehold for the remainder of a term of 99 years, and will be sold subject to the appportioned ground rent of £1 15s.

The above Cottages are all supplied with excellent Water, and are in the immediate neighbourhood of six canals and navigations.

Lot 8. All that Annual Ground Rent of £1 10s. 4d., payable in respect of certain Land and privileges, at Knowlwood aforesaid, belonging to Mrs. Walton.

OUTFITS to AUSTRALIA, INDIA, and the COLONIES.—Parties leaving England will find it greatly to their advantage to purchase their Outfits at E. J. MONKEY and CO.'S, 10, Fenchurch-street, City, where a large assortment of Shirts, Clothing, Hosiery, Gause Merino Under Shirts, &c., adapted for each particular colony, as well as for the voyage, is kept ready for immediate use, and at prices far more reasonable than usually charged for the same articles. Bedding, Military Accoutrements, Cabin and Camp Furniture of every description.—Lists, with Prices affixed, forwarded by post.

LIGHT SUMMER COATS.—Messrs. BURCH and LUCAS beg to inform Gentlemen that they keep a large assortment of this most fashionable and agreeable Summer Garment ready made in angolas, cashmerettes, tweeds, &c., &c., of superior workmanship; and being made under the superintendence of the Proprietors, they warrant their being of better materials and lower price than any other respectable tailor's in London, viz., from 10s. to 25s. N.B. All garments of an inferior or slop description are excluded from this establishment.—BURCH and LUCAS, Tailors, 62, King William-street, London-bridge. Established 1814.

THE QUEEN'S BAL COSTUME.
The public feel rather surprised, we presume, That we've not touched before on the Queen's "Bal Costume." But, patience, good readers! It is a little late To touch on a subject so recent in date; Don't think, for a moment, that MONSIEUR and SON Would leave such a part of their business undone. At once let us call The attention of all To a few plain remarks on the Queen's recent ball. No doubt the Fair Monarch of England turned up splendid, With ladies and noblemen proudly attended. The costly adornments of eyes gone by Mus have yielded a beautiful scene to the eye; The night could scarcely deem more to admire, If decked with the beauties of MOSKIE attire. The Queen's recent ball gives a hint, more or less, As regards the essential importance of dress. May the hint thus suggested be slightly by none; May it show the advantage of MONSIEUR and SON! Choice dress (as was seen at the Queen's "Bal Costume") Makes the wearer a different aspect assume; A person looks well, or a person looks bad; Just according (of course), to the manner he's clad. Let the hint thus suggested be slightly by none, Let it show the importance of MOSKIE and SON.

The new work, entitled "The Monarch's Ball," with full directions for self-measurement, may now be had on application, and forwarded "post-free."

THE LEAGUE.

No. 92.]

SATURDAY, JUNE 28, 1845.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND, will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the Offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country, the importance of transmitting their copies of the LEAGUE newspaper, after parcel, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Glasgow and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that renewed subscriptions will be received at the chambers of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association, 92, Queen-street, Glasgow.

Subscribers to the League Fund, residing in Edinburgh and neighbourhood, are respectfully informed that Mr. Quinlan Dalrymple, bookseller, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh, has kindly undertaken, at the request of the Council, to receive renewed subscriptions to the Fund.

Subscribers to the League Fund residing in Birmingham and the neighbourhood are respectfully informed, that Subscriptions may be paid by Free-Traders to Mr. Charles Geach, Midland Bank, Union-street, Birmingham, the local Treasurer.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

REGISTER, REGISTER, REGISTER!

The first step which requires to be taken is that of the claims for counties. The time for making these claims is from the 20th of June to the 20th of July, inclusive; any claim made after the latter date will be too late.

The county franchise is divided into four important classes of qualification:—

1st. Freehold, which includes the ancient 40s. freehold of inheritance for ever; and property held under a lease for lives, which should be described as freehold in the notice of claim.

2nd. Leasehold for a term of not less, originally, than 20 years, of £10 clear annual value; or (if for a term of not less than 20 years, of £50 clear annual value.

3rd. Copyhold of £10 annual value.

4th. Occupiers of land, or building and land under one roof, subject to a bona fide rent of £50 a year. In the first class, the owner of a 40s. freehold for ever must have been in possession from the 31st of January of the present year; and the same in the case of the leasehold for lives of 40s. a year, provided he be bona fide in the occupation of the property. If the owner of the lease for lives do not occupy, the property must be of the annual value of £10.

In the second class, the owner must have been in possession from the 31st of July, 1844.

And in the third class, the occupation must also be from the 31st of July, 1844.

It will be obvious that the first thing to be done by our friends is to ascertain how many Free-Traders there are in each parish possessing qualifications, and who are not registered; and this should be set about forthwith, that the notices of claim may be made in proper time.

There are various means of obtaining this information, for instance—

In all those districts where the purchasing of qualifications is recommended by the League, was taken up by the names of the names will have been kept by the names of the conveyances.

The poor-rate books may be examined carefully to ascertain the names of owners of property, and also £50 occupiers therein, who are not registered.

Assessors, and collectors of rates and income-tax; building and land agents, who are friendly, may be consulted for information.

In the neighbourhood of large towns, such as Manchester, Birmingham, &c., there are merchants, bankers, and others, who occupy large houses and farms in the suburbs at a rental of £50; these, if not within the parliamentary borough, will be qualified, and, if not on the county register, should claim. Last year, on a careful examination of the rate-book of a township just over the boundary of the borough of Manchester, from forty to fifty occupiers of this description were found who were not then on the register for South Lancashire.

The next thing to be done is to take care that the claims are made out in proper form, and served in due time.

It is most convenient to use printed forms of notice; and these should be filled up with the greatest care, the following particulars being closely attended to:—

The name of the claimant to be written at full length.

The place of the claimant's abode (not the place where his business only is carried on).

The nature of the qualification must be correctly described in the third column. Any misdescription here will be fatal if the vote should be objected to. Leasehold or copyhold must not be described as freehold; or freehold as leasehold.

The situation of the qualification must also be accurately given as required in the fourth column. In cases of successive occupation, as, for instance, where the voter has removed from one farm to another since the 31st of last July, each set of premises must be set forth in the claim.

A correct copy of each claim must be kept, and the claim and the copy must each be signed by the claimant himself.

Should any of our friends desire to be furnished with further information on any particular point, they will please to address their inquiries to Mr. Paulton, League-office, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. Hickin, Secretary to the League, Manchester.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's numbers, may be had on application at the Offices either in London or Manchester.

CONSISTENCY.

"A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen."—RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

"I wish we could burn Hansard."—RICHARD COBDEN.

The parliamentary debates of the past few weeks—especially those on Lord John Russell's resolutions and Mr. Villiers's annual motion—have made it quite plain where the real difficulty lies. It is not Sir Robert Peel, nor the Whigs, nor the landlords that stand in our way. Ministers and ex-Ministers are all with us; and the landlords are too thoroughly cowed and dumfounded to make any head against us. Nobody believes in the sliding scale; and the "four, five, or six shillings" would find it difficult to muster four, five, or six senators to speak a kind word for them. We are not quite certain that genuine monopoly, of "the old sort," counts votes enough to make a House. There is now positively nothing between the country and Free Trade, except Hansard and "consistency." No man can doubt that, if Sir Robert Peel's speeches for the last dozen years were all fairly in the fire, the Corn Law would be repealed between now and the coming harvest.

But Hansard and "consistency" stop the way. Public men are frightened at the ghosts and shadows of their former selves. They live spell-bound by the letterpress which records their casual, careless, foolish, ignorant talk in bygone years. They dare not say, simply and plainly, "We are wiser than we were." They want to slide softly from error into truth, without being found out. They are afraid of saying what they know is true, and of doing what they know is right, because somebody may open a dusty book, and read absurd sentences out of rusty and forgotten speeches, to prove them "inconsistent." And so they talk of "caution" and "deliberation," and cautiously and deliberately leave their country to take its chance of a famine. They would have it thought that they are impervious to fact and argument. They make it a point of honour to seem to ignore experience. They cannot bear to have it imagined that they have learned anything during seven years.

We are great admirers of consistency in public men. The unity of a life begun, continued, and ended in the resolute assertion of a great and true principle, is a noble moral spectacle. We like to know where to find a man, and what to expect of him. We love to feel assured that what he means he will say, that what he says he will do, that his principles of action are stable and rooted in his convictions, and that his past gives a reliable pledge of his future. But this has nothing to do with the pertinacious dulness that never changes an opinion. If frequent and sudden changes of opinion are a presumptive indication of intellectual infirmity, an obstinate resistance to the adoption of new opinions, as new facts come to light, is downright stupidity; and the attempt to hide or gloss over one's mental changes is a despicable moral poltroonery. We know not a meaner cowardice than that which makes a man ashamed of seeming wiser at fifty than he was at forty. The true consistency for a statesman is the consistency, not of this year's words with last year's words, but of this year's acts with this year's convictions. In fact, an honest man need never trouble himself about consistency at all. His honesty will ensure his consistency, so far as consistency is a fit virtue for fallible beings. Let any man keep a clear, open mind, and habits of frank speech—seeking the truth, and speaking the truth, from day to day, and from year to year—and though he live to the age of Methuselah, without once thinking about his consistency, his life will look consistent enough at last.

It so happens that Hansard cannot be burned. But we beg to assure our statesmen, that, if they have but the courage to defy this phantom, they will find its terrors purely imaginary. We cannot remember an instance of a distinct, deliberate, and openly avowed change of political opinion—accompanied by the obvious guarantees of sincerity and earnestness—which has had any other effect than to raise, in public esteem, the man who has so decisively signalized his honesty and courage. It is only when a politician wavers and shuffles, half avows his new convictions, and half hides them, says and unsays things in a breath, that he gets twitted with "inconsistency" and Hansard. The statesman who plainly and boldly says, "Whereas I was blind, now I see," will never hear a word about Hansard. Well was it urged by Mr Cobden, at the Covent-garden meeting of last week:—

"What I want to do is this—to open a door as wide as possible for the conversion—the avowed conversion—of our opponents. I wish we could burn 'Hansard' and all the debates that have ever taken place, in order to let these statesmen be at liberty to adopt a new course of policy, dictated by their present convictions. But they are afraid of being taunted with having said something different before from what they are ready to say now. We have all said something different before from what we have said now. Have we not all grown wiser? Have we not all learned something by the discussions for seven years? I want to see these men get up in the House of Commons and avow that they have learned something by our discussions in that assembly. I set myself up to teach people years ago; I have been learning more than anybody else every day since; and why should not they make that frank and free admission? If they would face such an admission and make a clean breast, and confess that they did not know so much formerly as they do now, they would never be taunted afterwards."

Our unavowed parliamentary Free-Traders may assure themselves that Mr. Cobden here speaks the feeling, not of the Leaguers merely, but of the monopolists themselves: he speaks the honest English sense of the matter. "They never would be taunted afterwards." The sincerity and courage of this sort of avowal would be universally felt to be a new title to public respect, a new claim on public confidence. The very highest prize of honourable fame and enduring power is, at this moment, awaiting the grasp of the British statesman who shall be the first to say, in his place in Parliament, "To be sure, I did think so-and-so about the Corn Laws in such a year, but I think just the contrary now, and I shall do now what I now think ought to be done—and so, gentlemen, you may put Hansard back on the shelf again."

THE SCHISM AMONG THE MONOPOLISTS.

The morning papers of Wednesday last told the world that, on the preceding evening, Sir John Tyrell, the ultra-monopolist representative of North Essex, moved the House of Commons, "that a new writ should be issued for the election of a member for the Western Division of the county of Suffolk, in the room of Colonel Rushbrooke, deceased."

Of course the morning papers cannot tell the world quite everything, even with the aid of supplements and double supplements. We may, therefore, without any disrespect to these public instructors, inform our readers, that the above, though a perfectly true, is an extremely incomplete, account of the transaction in question. Sir John Tyrell is not, speaking generally, a very distinguished orator, but he did, on the occasion alluded to, achieve that highest triumph of eloquence, which consists in conveying an infinite deal of meaning in the fewest and simplest words. When we explain that it is customary, on a Parliamentary vacancy arising on the Government side of the House, for the new writ to be moved for by a Lord of the Treasury, or by a junior member of the Government,—and that on Tuesday evening the independent Essex baronet walked ostentatiously over to the Opposition side of the House to make his motion,—it will be understood that, though this can scarcely be called a "great fact," it is a little fact of great significance. The meaning of it is, that the monopolists of North Essex and West Suffolk are all at sixes and sevens; that Sir John Tyrell, and those who, in North Essex, West Suffolk, or elsewhere, are of Sir John Tyrell's way of thinking, have withdrawn their confidence from the Ministry; and—as political confidence and its opposite are usually reciprocal—that the friends and supporters of the Ministry have withdrawn their confidence from Sir John Tyrell and gentlemen of his cast of politics. The chasm which has for some time past existed between Sir Robert Peel and those who lifted him into office, is deepening and widening, and low-muttered discontents are rising into loud and open mutiny.

This quarrel is not, in itself considered, any particular concern of ours. But we cannot refrain from pointing out to our Free-Trade friends throughout the country, how powerfully every incident of this kind reinforces the advice and encouragement we have so urgently given them, to strengthen themselves on the registries. The anti-Ministerial feeling now existing in North Essex and West Suffolk prevails, more or less, and will prevail more and more—in every landlord-ridden county in England. The ultra-monopolists are everywhere quarrelling with the Government and its supporters—not to speak of their quarrels with one another. The party which triumphed in 1811 is everywhere splintering away in fragments, and with a force of repulsion that precludes all chance of a reunion. As the Ministerialists are going further and faster towards Free Trade, the landlords are going further and faster into opposition; and each helps the other. When the next election comes, it will find the monopolists without a leader able to save them from themselves, and Sir Robert Peel with less than half a party.

It is now for the Free-Traders to prepare themselves—there is but one way of doing so—for seizing and improving the splendid opportunity which will be theirs, when a Minister without a party asks the country to give him a parliamentary majority to go on with. In the present chaotic disruption and disorganization of all the old parties, the Free-Traders will, if they do their duty now, have the Ministry and the country in their own hands. Whoever or whatever the Ministry may be—Tory, Whig, medium, mixed, or nondescript—the party that is best organized, best compacted, and best instructed will rule the empire.

FALSE PHILANTHROPY.

We had in the Times of Friday morning a report of the meeting of a Society for the Improvement of the Condition of the Labouring Classes. Such an object is exceedingly most laudable; but before we admit the claims of such a society to public support we must know something of the adaptation of its means to the end proposed; and in this respect the report of the secretary, and the speeches delivered at the meeting, are very unsatisfactory, not to say lamentably deficient. The improvements proposed by the society are allotments, ventilated dwellings, and loans. Now, we are at a loss to discover why a society should be formed, spending one-fourth of its money in the mere expenses of management, to accomplish any one, or even all, of these objects. The question of allotments is ultimately one of profit and loss; if land can be more profitably cultivated on such a system, yielding more produce to the tenant and more rent to the landlord, it is evident that self-interest will lead to a large extension of the allotment system without any necessity arising for the intervention of a society. But if the allotment system be one of waste and extravagance, in which the labourer derives disproportionate remuneration for his toil, that is, a return of profits lower than the amount of money wages which the same exertions would have elsewhere procured, then the efforts made to extend such a system by any voluntary association are positively mischievous. We do not decide on the economic merits of allotments, but we have just ground for complaint that none of the speakers who enlarged on the advantages to be derived from allotments said one syllable about the principle by which alone its utility can be determined.

Lord Ashley, as chairman, might have been fairly expected to have stated what were the circumstances in the condition of the labouring classes which required the formation of a society for their improvement; and his lordship's own county of Dorset would have supplied abundant evidence that in that locality the condition of the agricultural labourers is deplorable in the extreme. But his lordship's charity is of a very different character from that which has stood the test of experience: so far from "beginning at home," it never approaches his domestic localities, but bounds over the misery and want of Dorset labourers to seek scope for its exercise in distant regions. We should like to have heard the success of experiments made to redeem the misery of the hovels around St. Giles's, in Dorset, as a test of the probable success of the plans for improving the sanitary state of St. Giles's in London?

We venerate charity, but there is a social element which we estimate still more highly—and that is justice. To proffer alms as a favour, when relief would be more effectually given by conceding a just and natural right, is simply to add insult to injury. Now, at the meeting of this very society, Mr. Green offered to show that the misery which his lordship and his compeers affected to compassionate was the result of a system which these very noblemen and gentlemen were combined to maintain; but he had scarcely begun to explain this proposition when the chairman dissolved the assembly under the pretence that there was no question before the meeting! It has now gone forth to the world, on Lord Ashley's authority, that securing for the labourer "a fair day's wages for a fair day's work" is a matter quite unconnected with the improvement of his condition; that the supply of food to the working population is a question beneath the notice of philanthropic societies; and that the taxation of the first necessities of life for the purpose of raising prices by artificial scarcity is a principle of so high a character that his lordship will not permit it to be questioned. Such fantastic folly, if it be not obstinate hypocrisy, needs no exposure; and we dismiss the meeting to the contempt it merits, rejoiced that its insignificance redeems it from the indignation it would otherwise have provoked.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION 1815.

Nineteenth Week, ending Saturday, June 28.

Since the great debate on Mr. VILLIERS'S motion, nothing has occurred in Parliament having a direct bearing on FREE TRADE. On Friday week a combination of circumstances caused a favourable opportunity to be lost, the reason of which it is necessary to explain.

It will be recollected that before Easter, Sir Robert Peel, who was anxious to get the Customs Bill passed, by which the reductions effected by his Budget were made law, pledged himself to Mr. Ewart, and other members, that if they suffered certain motions to drop he would give them what is called a "government night" for their discussion. Accordingly, Friday week was set apart for that purpose; and it was expected that the question of the reduction of the duties on butter and cheese, on tallow, and other articles, would have afforded opportunity for an animated debate, and another exposure of the shabby and shallow pretences by which restrictions are kept up, preventing the great bulk of the people from free access to a free supply of the main articles of general consumption.

It so happened, however, that on the early part of the evening the "battle of the gauges" was fought. So many people are now directly or indirectly interested in railways, that we do not suppose it is necessary we should explain the meaning of this somewhat singular phrase. Two great railway companies had each a "line" projected, to link Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton to London. The line proposed by the Great Western Company had necessarily a "broad" gauge; the line proposed by the London and Birmingham had, of course, a "narrow" gauge. The Board of Trade had reported in favour of the London and Birmingham; the committee on the bill in favour of the Great Western. Here, then, was practically raised the question whether, in all future railways, a "broad" or a "narrow" gauge should be patronized; and this question raised others of great pecuniary and even social importance. Intense was the interest felt on the Stock Exchange, which poured down its troops to fill the strangers' gallery. The body of the House was crowded with members all as eagerly intent as if every one was a director of the Birmingham or the Great Western, and had thousands pending on the issue. Epsom or Newmarket could not be more exciting.

Mr. COMBES "led the van," by proposing an amendment, which, if carried, would have pledged the Government to appoint a commission of inquiry into the practicability and expediency of establishing a uniform railway gauge, on all railways made and to be made. The sensible and practical speech by which he supported his motion carried the House with him. But those who were willing to support the motion as a substantive proposition declined to do so when the effect of it, as an amendment, would be the delay of a railway in favour of which a committee of the House had reported. Mr. COMBES has since brought forward this motion substantively, and the Government acceding to it, a commission of inquiry will be appointed, the House voting in favour of it unanimously. The member for Stockport has therefore the merit of accomplishing what will prove to be a great public benefit. But on Friday week, so long as the matter was in incertitude, the House was in a state of tumultuous uneasiness. No sooner, however, was the decision announced, which was in favour of the "broad-gauge" line, so far as the particular branch railway before the House was concerned, than members rushed off in crowds to dinner, the strangers' gallery was emptied, and a dead calm, and almost empty benches, succeeded the scene so exciting and amusing.

Under these circumstances, Mr. EWART was called on to bring on his motion for a reduction of the duties on butter and cheese; and he, naturally conceiving that his motion, practically of great importance, would be prejudiced by the want of support, declined to press it, hoping for a more favourable opportunity. He had scarcely spoken the words, when Mr. Villiers, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Milner Gibson, and other Free-Trade members entered the House. They had only been absent a few minutes. It is impossible to sit on a railway committee from ten till four, and in the House of Commons from four till twelve, without a restorative to exhausted nature. Accordingly, after the "battle of gauges," they had retreated, as Mr. Milner Gibson said, to get their "bread and cheese" up stairs, and then had hurried down to plead for the "butter and cheese" of the community. But the fatal words had been pronounced. Sir Robert Peel thought it would be a "bad precedent" to permit a motion withdrawn a moment before to be brought on. So the opportunity for the time was lost. We understand, however, that Mr. Ewart has renewed his notice of motion for an early day in July.

MEETINGS.

WHEATHAMSTEAD FREE-TRADE CLUB. DISTRIBUTION OF BEDS TO AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.

The anniversary of the Wheathamstead Free Trade Association was celebrated at the Swan Inn, Wheathamstead, on Wednesday last. Mr. C. H. Lattimore, the Chairman of the Association, presided, and was supported on his right by Robert R. Moore, Esq.; and on his left by — Lattimore, Esq., Mr. Burton, &c. The speaker was occupied by the Rev. Mr. Gilbert. Between forty and fifty farmers sat down to dinner, and the attendance of this class would have been much larger had not the haymaking imperatively detained them on their farms. Many who had intended to be present, and had purchased tickets for the dinner, were prevented from attending by this cause.

Dinner, which consisted of an abundance and variety of seasonable viands, was served up in a tent in the yard of the Swan Inn, and the arrangements altogether were exceedingly creditable to the worthy host, Mr. Henson.

After the cloth had been removed, and the usual course of etiquette given,

The CHAIRMAN proposed, "Prosperity to the Wheathamstead Free-Trade Association," and in speaking out at much length said,—Perhaps, in the first place, you will allow me to glance for a moment at the place in which we are assembled,—the population of the village, and their usual occupation. It is impossible to find any where a population more completely rural than exists here. There are between 6000 and 7000 acres of land, the population is about 2000, and I don't know any description of manufacture that is carried on here, or any machine that exists for the purpose of any manufacture, even to the extent of a spinning-jenny. (Hear.) It, therefore, my place can be isolated from manufactures it is this. Perhaps a more perfect antithesis to the city of Manchester cannot be found; and yet it is the opinion of persons here that this place would be as much benefited by Free Trade as even Manchester itself, and this association has been formed to demonstrate this conviction that the principle of Free Trade would be equally as beneficial to this rural village as to the manufacturing districts. (Loud cheer.) Nothing can possibly show more plainly the truth and beauty of this principle, and its universality, than the fact that districts between which there is such great contrast in point of occupation should agree to unite upon this principle; no greater proof of the truth of Free Trade can be given than that a population like that of Wheathamstead should unite with Manchester in its favour. (Cheers.) The Chairman next proposed "The Anti-Corn-Law League, the only true farmers' and labourers' friend." (Drunk with great applause.)

ROBERT R. MOORE, Esq., responded to the toast in a long and eloquent speech, in which he dwelt forcibly on the necessity of attending to the registration, and suggested that the farmers should choose a representative of their own class, who would sympathize with their wants and attend to their true interests.

At the conclusion of Mr. Moore's speech, the curtain at the back of the chairman was withdrawn, and we then observed the yard thronged with the peasantry of the district, who had come for the purpose of receiving the tickets for the beds awarded. The majority of the assembled multitude were women, whose husbands were unable to attend, in consequence of being engaged in getting in the hay harvest.

Tickets for the following articles:—30 beds, 30 counterpanes, 80 pairs of sheets, and 50 ditto children's sheets were distributed to 210 of the most necessitous and deserving labourers.

The CHAIRMAN in rising to propose "Thanks to the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League for the munificent present which they had made," turned round to the peasantry and addressed them to the following effect:—You are assembled here to receive a gift in the shape of beds and sheets, which we find it impossible to distribute to you this night. You, however, to whom the various presents have been awarded, will receive them, and the beds will be distributed this night week at six o'clock. You don't know much about Free Trade except from mere report. You are aware that population increases and employment does not; and you sometimes look at your children and ask yourselves how they can be brought up humanely. I speak to a labourer the other day, who said that he did not know what would become of his children, but he

God would help him to bring them up honestly. That was a good feeling; it is your duty to bring up your children honestly, and neither they nor you can be happy unless you do so. You have no capital but your labour, and for that there is not now sufficient demand for employment. We advocate that which will give you more employment, and also cheap food. We give you more beds and other things, not as a charity—not to degrade you. We want to elevate you. But we know your necessity, and we give you that which you want—not to depress you—not ostentatiously—but to do you good; and we are very happy to be able to assist you in this way. We shall distribute the goods without favour or affection, or regard to sex, class, or creed. All we require is, whether you are honest and industrious. We ask you to endeavour to promote the happiness of your families. There is a gentleman named Grantley Berkeley, who says that all the labourers are poachers. (Cries of "No, no.") Now, I say, that is not true; I tell him from this place that that is not the case. You are actuated by a better spirit. You are not only interested in your own happiness, but also in that of others. We have to work for all we eat or wear, and whoever lives in idleness or dishonesty takes away that which another man works for. And be you sure that, if every man lived by honesty and industry, more food would be grown, and more of everything that you want made, and all of you would have a larger share. The Anti-Corn-Law League wishes to see you better clothed and better fed. Consider this. People who never saw you, living hundreds of miles away, and having only heard of you by report, take an interest in you. They are Free-Traders: I believe that Free Trade is necessary to your happiness. I could live without it; but I don't believe the rising generation will be able to do so. Whenever you look upon those articles which will be distributed to you, let them remind you of what is the object of those who sympathize with your situation.

At the suggestion of the Chairman the multitude, as an expression of their thanks, then gave three vociferous cheers for the Anti-Corn-Law League; after which, Mr. Moore addressed them to the following effect:—
"None of the League, I am pleased to tell you how glad I am that we are able to make you this small present. Our wish is that every agricultural labourer in the kingdom should have a comfortable bed. We don't send you a charity, but as an earnest of what you will be able to get yourselves, if there were no Corn Law. We believe that you deserve them, and that you will let them yourselves if you could. We are convinced that we are working for the good of the landlord, the farmer, the labourer, and every one in the country. We say that labour does not get its own; that men work hard and don't get fairly paid. But this is not the farmer's fault, but that of the laws. He can't make a profit out of farming, and so he can't pay you as he would wish to do. But if farming were profitable he could pay you better."

The Rev. Mr. GILBERT, Independent minister of Walsingham, then addressed the labourers as follows:—
"My friends, I know most of you. I have sympathized with and endeavoured to alleviate your distresses. You have brought together to-night, and have heard of each other so clear and practical that you must have been cheered by them. You will believe that what has been said has come from the heart. I have been told by many I am out of the path of duty in taking part in the Corn Laws. Now, I do not advocate the repeal of them as a political but as a religious measure. I believe the Bible condemns him 'who holds back the corn.' If we want to get rid of the Corn Laws we must do so in a peaceable way. We shall never get rid of them by other means. My friends, I hope you will sleep peacefully upon the beds which have been given to you."
L. LUTHERMORE, Esq., proposed the health of C. H. Edridge, the chairman, which was drunk with enthusiasm.

The CHAIRMAN returned thanks in an able and eloquent speech, in which he showed that monopoly taxes were working men to the extent of 2s. per week, a sum which accumulated till his fiftieth year, would save him from the degradation and misery of a workhouse. The meeting then quietly separated, highly pleased with the novel and interesting scene they had witnessed, and there is no doubt, has left a deep and permanent impression upon the minds of all classes in the neighbourhood.

MAIDSTONE FREE-TRADE MEETING.

Mr. FALVEY addressed a numerous and influential meeting in the County Assembly Rooms, Maidstone, on Thursday evening.

RICHARD NEELMS, Esq., occupied the chair; and after the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

"That it is the opinion of this meeting that the Corn and Provision Laws are unjust; that they pervert the free action of the beneficent laws of nature in restricting the supply of food to the people, diminish the demand for labour, and deprive industry of its due reward; and this meeting, therefore, most earnestly recommends the electors of the borough not to vote for any candidate at the next election but such as will vote for a total repeal of those laws."

Mr. FALVEY, in the course of his address, mentioned that on that very day a discussion had taken place in Maidstone among the county magistrates on the propriety of erecting a new prison, when it was fully proved by the opponents of the measure, that as food had become dearer crime had proportionally decreased. Their arguments were unanswerable, and a resolution against building the prison was carried by a majority of 62 to 5. The statement was received by the meeting with loud cheers.

AVEBURY: ANTI-CORN-LAW LECTURE.

On Tuesday last a lecture on the Impolicy and Injustice of the Corn and Provision Laws, was delivered at the Red Lion, Avebury, by Mr. FALVEY, from the National Anti-Corn-Law League. Mr. Falvey delivered a lecture on the same subject, and at the same place, in December last, when Mr. Geo. Brown, the chairman of the "Wiltshire Agricultural Protection Society," attended, and, in a vain attempt to prevent its delivery, he admitted the soundness of Mr. Falvey's views, to which, after the lecture, he was invited to do so, he said he had no objection to urge. The appearance, therefore, of the "Protection Society's Report," to which Mr. Brown's name, as chairman, was attached, and in which it was stated that that society had "met the efforts of the League by corresponding exertions," "resisting its aggressive efforts," and by "arguments addressed to the understanding of the community were disabusing the public mind of erroneous impressions as to the effect of the Corn Laws;" in short, that by its exertions the Anti-Corn-Law League had been silenced and extinguished, caused no small surprise, and it was determined to test the truth of the report. The utmost publicity was given to the meeting, care being taken that Mr. Brown should not be ignorant of it. But so unanswerable does Mr. Brown consider the arguments of the Free-Traders, that he not only did not dare to attempt their refutation, but he was afraid to let his labourers hear them lest they should learn the true character of monopoly and the real meaning of "protection;" and to that end he, most unworthily, threatened his men with loss of work, and the tradesmen of the parish with the withdrawal of his custom, if they attended the lecture. Notwithstanding his threats, and the circumstance that the labourers are now fully employed in the hayfields, between four and five hundred of the villagers assembled to hear the lecture, and their hearty laughter at the discretion of Mr. Brown, and their ready appreciation of the arguments of Mr. Falvey, showed that the protectionists must look out for other headquarters than Avebury. A more unanimous meeting was never held, and the cheers for Free-Trade and for the Anti-Corn-Law League were given with a good will rarely equalled and never exceeded.

HENRY GALE, Esq., of Malmesbury, after a few remarks, proposed that John Edridge, Esq., of Bath, be their chairman—a gentleman well known in the county—having been a candidate for its representation—possessed of considerable landed property—and than whom a kinder-hearted and higher-principled man did not exist.

C. DAY, Esq., of Marlborough, seconded the nomination of Mr. Edridge.

Mr. EDRIDGE, having taken the chair, congratulated the industrious men of North Wilts upon their perseverance, year after year, in continuing to meet to make their distress known to the Legislature; these meetings also gave them a clearer insight into the causes of that distress. The causes were many, but in the few remarks a chairman ought to confine himself to, he should allude chiefly to the Corn Law. A law to prevent corn being brought into the country led to lazy, slovenly farming at home, and the most was not made of the land. In this changeable climate we suffered much when we had a bad harvest; for, from the want of a regular trade, foreigners were not prepared to supply us. The Chairman, having concluded a brief address, introduced Mr. Falvey, who delivered an able and convincing speech, which was attentively listened to and frequently applauded.

Thanks to Mr. Falvey were unanimously passed, and three hearty cheers given for the League.

Mr. FALVEY moved the thanks of the meeting to Mr. Edridge for his kindness in presiding.

Mr. DAY seconded the motion, and said he hoped the time would come when Mr. Edridge would be elected member of Parliament for the Northern Division of the county of Wilts (cheers); for it was not merely by talking about the Corn Laws, by the circulation of tracts, nor by meetings, that Free Trade was to be obtained; but by taking care to send such men to Parliament as would vote for their repeal.

Three cheers were given for Mr. Edridge, and three for Mr. Gale, Mr. Day, and other friends from a distance, and the meeting concluded.—Abridged from the Wiltshire Independent.

PLYMOUTH FREE-TRADE ASSOCIATION.—On Friday evening, the 13th inst., the second lecture on Free Trade and Equitable Taxation was delivered by C. B. Cabot, Esq., of Langdon-hall, before the members and friends of this association, at the Mechanics' Institution. The attendance was highly respectable, though, owing, perhaps, in part to the extreme closeness of the weather, and to the advance of the season, it was not so numerous as on some former occasions. The lecture was the last for the session, and Admiral Phillips presided. The Chairman, in opening the business of the meeting, said, he had unexpectedly been called upon to take the chair on this occasion, and, thinking it was a good cause for which they were met, he could not refuse. Before commencing the immediate business, he would make one observation. He had been asked that day, what good had the Free-Trade Association done? He would call attention to the fact, that the association had been in existence about two years. When it was formed, Mr. Villiers annually brought forward, which he still continued to do, a motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws. In 1843, when he brought forward this motion, their members voted against it; in 1844, they walked out of the House and did not vote at all; and now, in 1845, they had voted for Mr. Villiers's motion. Now, was not that a great point gained? And, in order to convince them more fully of the fact, he would read Lord Ebrington's speech on the last occasion of bringing forward the motion. The gallant Admiral then read the noble lord's speech from the Morning Chronicle, as follows:—"He had never before supported the motions of the hon. member for Wolverhampton. He had refused to vote for him in former years, even when he had received a threat from his constituents; he had received none this year, and he now came without any pressure from without to an earlier consideration of this question. He had hitherto opposed the hon. member lest he might render impossible a compromise between the two great parties, whose interests were identical. But when the question was declared to be between a repeal and the continuance of the present monstrous anomaly, such a compromise was impossible, and he no longer hesitated which side he should take, and would support his hon. friend." (Cheers.) Therefore they had gained two members to their cause since the association had been formed; and two votes in favour, and the loss of two against, was equivalent to four votes, which he thought was a very great gain. (Cheers.)—Mr. Calmady then proceeded to give the second part of his lecture, in which, having recapitulated the main points of his first lecture, he examined at much length the connexion which exists between commerce and the burdens which may be equitably placed thereon as well as upon other property. The lecture, which comprised many valuable details, was repeatedly applauded, and when concluded a discussion took place on some of the principles advanced by Mr. Calmady. Thanks to the lecturer and chairman having been unanimously adopted, the meeting separated.—Abridged from the Plymouth Journal.

FREE-TRADE MOVEMENT AT DARLINGTON.—A Free-Trade meeting was recently held at Darlington. It was got up principally by individuals of the working classes. It was appropriately held in a large room in a wool warehouse belonging to Henry Pease, Esq., which was handsomely decorated for the purpose with evergreens, flags, and mottoes. A highly respectable company of about 400 sat down to tea, which was provided in excellent style, and appeared to be duly appreciated. Almost immediately after tea, the chair was taken, and the proceedings commenced. The audience was all attention, and the addresses were characterized by a deep sense of the truth of the principles laid down, and the importance of that movement which has for its object Free Trade with all the world. The respective speeches embraced a great variety of topics, which were presented in different points of view, and were sustained by different arguments, yet they formed together a complete and harmonious whole. The peculiar condition of our country in regard to its population, its wants, its resources, and its laws, was ably discussed. It was shown that of necessity this must be a manufacturing and commercial country. The evils of monopoly and class legislation were forcibly dwelt upon; the advantages of Free Trade, in relation to our domestic and political economy, were anticipated, and the means explained by which the object in view is to be attained. One feeling of deep interest, cordial good will, and firm resolve appeared to pervade the whole assembly. Obtuse, indeed, must have been the mind that could listen without instruction and delight, and cold must have been the heart which could retire unmoved from such a meeting. A second, and scarcely less interesting, tea party and meeting were held in the same room on the following evening, when the cause was again ably advocated. Altogether an impression has been made which will not easily be effaced, nor will it be allowed to end in mere feeling without corresponding action.—Leeds Mercury.

FREE-TRADE LECTURES AT RIVINGTON.—On Thursday and Friday evenings, the 19th and 20th inst., two lectures were delivered on the above subject, by Mr. J. J. Finnigan, of Manchester, at the Blackmoor's Head, Rivington, to crowded audiences. The lecturer, on this occasion, visited the furthest corner of the Bolton and Wigan polling districts, his audience being made up of the inhabitants of Horwich, Rivington, Anglezarke, and the neighbourhood, none of which places are nearer than six or seven miles from a market town; and he had the satisfaction of witnessing a unanimous expression of opinion in favour of Free Trade by two numerous and enthusiastic meetings.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRATION.

On Monday evening a meeting of Free-Traders resident in the Hammersmith polling district was held at the King's Arms Tavern, Kensington, at which a deputation from the League attended. Local committees were appointed for the various parishes in the district, and arrangements made for an immediate canvass, for the purpose of placing every qualified Free-Trader on the register. The meeting adjourned to Monday evening next, at the Commercial rooms, Chelsea.

FOREIGN BUTTER AND CHEESE.

On the lowest description of cheese the duty is 100 per cent., whilst on the finer descriptions it only varies from 20 to 25 per cent.; and on the lowest description of butter the duty is 50 per cent., on the finer kinds 20 per cent.; the effect of which is a prohibition in a great degree to the importation of the inferior sorts; whereas, at a 10s. duty, the quantity now destroyed by tar for grease purposes would be used as butter, as the trade is usually without this common description during the winter months—50,000 firkins might be consumed at steady remunerating prices, from 6d. to 8d. per pound. The result of high prices leads to the use of unwholesome substitutes, such as common animal fat, rancid lard, and other grease, boiled potatoes, and boiled pease, coloured to represent butter; these ingredients are extensively used in common pastry for the poor in the low neighbourhoods in and about London; and, to show the extent of this trade, some individuals engaged in it make 20,000 to 30,000 pies per week. Yet, in the face of this, in Liverpool, that part of the butter now in stock from the United States will have to be "tarred," in consequence of the quality not being good enough to enable the importers to pay the 20s. duty. The effect of the improvement in the trade of the manufacturing districts is shown, as regards importation and consumption, by comparing the stock on hand the past two years. The stock of butter in London, on the 7th of April, 1844, was 23,480 firkins; do. do. 1845, 5,620 do.

So that, from this time to May and June (termed by the trade the end of the season), the price of butter will be 20 to 30 per cent. above the usual price at that period of the year.

The following is an abstract of the return to an order of the House of Commons, moved by Mr. Ewart, of the quantity of butter destroyed in the United Kingdom, by the admixture of tar, the past four years:—

	Cwts.	qrs.	lbs.
1841 .. .. .	8,461	1	27
1842 .. .. .	3,373	0	25
1843 .. .. .	5,641	0	17
1844 .. .. .	2,305	1	13

Total .. .. . 19,781 0 26

And, calculating the average as above for the period of ten years, the loss to the revenue will amount to £15,000, being the difference of duty as paid on tarred butter to pure grease, instead of the original article butter.

PROSPEROUS STATE OF HAWICK.—Trade is still continuing good. The mills are fully employed, and no person is idle who is able and willing to work. Many of our manufacturers are gradually extending their business, and more goods are made at present than at any former period. The population is of course increasing, and were a stranger with a family to arrive here at present, they would find it difficult to get a house to live in.—Scots Chronicle.

THE ART-UNION.

With the permission of the proprietor we present our readers with a few more of the engravings designed to illustrate the "Art-Union's" description of the Bazaar in the forthcoming July number, which will be one of the most attractive and costly that that journal has yet given to its readers, if we may judge from the great variety and richness of the engravings.

The first of the annexed cuts represents the Queen's apron, wrought of a new material, and exhibited at the Halifax stall; the second is a beautiful pattern of a lady's shawl, from the works of Mr. Swaisland, of Crayford.

The first of the remaining three cuts represents the pattern of a printed net; the second a printed drugget; and the third a beautiful vase.

PREPARE FOR FREE TRADE.

(From the Sherburne Journal.)

It is a useless endeavour to seek to avert impending danger by closing our eyes to it, and it is worse than useless to induce others to blind themselves by the same means. Lull a man into a state of perfect security, and he will be but ill prepared when danger comes upon him suddenly. Warn him of coming events, and he will "up and be doing." It is true that, in order to set him on the alert, you are often called upon to communicate disagreeable intelligence, but what reasonable man would choose to be left in the bliss of his ignorance rather than hear an unpleasant truth? We have frequently, in the course of our editorial experience, had to choose between blinding our readers, and announcing to them something extremely disagreeable; but we have never hesitated to take the latter course—at times, we may add, to our own pecuniary injury. We are again placed in this unenviable and delicate position. The debate on the Corn Laws must elicit from us some remarks for our many agricultural readers, and, if we chose to act as some of our contemporaries do, we should bid them "sleep on" in security. "But," to use the words of a great authority in these matters—the Mark-lane Express—"persons must be instructed with the most wilful blindness who do not at once admit that the question of the repeal of the Corn Laws has made some way." Let such persons turn to the recent debate, and their eyes will be opened. Not only have we Lord John Russell, who in former years supported the Government against Mr. Villiers's motion, now voting with Mr. Villiers, but we have Sir James Graham and Sir Robert Peel both intimating that the question of the repeal of the Corn Law is in truth but a question of time. Sir James thinks "that the interests of the people at large will not be promoted by a sudden removal of all protection, but by gradually and cautiously bringing the Corn Laws into a nearer relation to the sound principles which regulate commercial policy in other matters;" and Sir Robert Peel said the same thing, only more clearly, when "he confessed his inability to contend that agriculture ought not to be subjected to the gradual application of principles that have been applied to the other interests of the country." What are those "sound principles?" Why, the principle of Free Trade, acting upon which Sir Robert very lately admitted into this country, duty free, eight hundred articles, which had previously paid duty. If Lord John will support Free Trade when out of office, he will do so as a Minister, for he is a statesman of sincerity; and if Sir Robert has confessed that he cannot see why agriculturists should not have Free Trade as well as manufacturers, rely upon it that, if he is in office long enough, they will have it. So that neither to the present Tory Premier nor to the future Liberal leader must agriculturists look for protection. "Prepare, then, for Free Trade," say we. Do not believe the landlord who tells you that you will yet have 60s. a quarter for your wheat. Calculate the maximum of wheat at 45s. when you take farms, and get them, if you can, at a corn-rent. Believe no longer that there are such beings in Parliament as "farmers' friends." Try to return your own men at the next election (if Free Trade is not in operation before that), and then you will be somewhat prepared for what, in our opinion, is inevitable; and in this opinion we are not singular, for some of the most staunch friends of the farmers among the press express the same sentiments. The present Corn Laws may linger on a little longer, until the demands of the manufacturers grow louder; but a little while, we are firmly convinced, will see the sweeping measure of Free Trade carried by the very men who, a few years back, were loud in condemning it.

THE FINANCES OF MONOPOLY AND FREE TRADE.

(From the Bradford Observer.)

We find the following announcement in the papers:—"The South Derbyshire Agricultural Society met in Derby, on Friday (15th instant), twelve members present, and resolved that, as the society could not go on for want of funds, it be forthwith dissolved."

Turning over the leaf we find this corresponding, or rather contrasting, statement:—

"The following was stated to be a summary of the League Fund from the commencement of the £100,000 in 1841, independent of the past £50,000:

Dec. 31, 1844.—Amount received to	£	s.	d.
this date, as per advertised statement	86,000	7	3
Jan. 17, 1845.—Receipts to this date, as per ledger	5,632	5	2
Bazaar receipts, as per statement	25,046	0	11

Total .. .. £116,687 13 4"

This statement was made in Covent-garden Theatre on the 18th instant, at the time the duke and his capans were holding their Waterloo orgies—slaying the slain for the thirtieth time. Instead of only twelve members being present, as at the Derby meeting, the theatre was crowded to the roof; and it was intimated in the course of the evening, that the "fragments" of the Bazaar were quite sufficient to set off another bazaar more magnificent than any bazaar that has ever been set off in England, the Covent-garden Bazaar alone excepted!

So much for the comparative finances of Monopoly and Free Trade.

But, though the old swindler is bankrupt, in cash and in sense, it is still rich in the possession of an adamantine doggedness and stupidity. It is evidently possessed of "the fixed intellect of the country." It dreams that it lives in the England of King John; or, at the least, in the era of the Stuarts, and cannot bring itself to believe that England yet holds a people as distinguished from a nobility. Hence its gibbering about its "marriage settlements" and "social status."

But, after all, the English people deserve to be well whipped by their nobility. For, like the sycophants of the old, they have been ready enough to shout, "It is the voice of a god, and not of a man!" The English people have mistaken their nobility, and the English nobility have treated their English people as English dogs in all times and countries have treated theirs. "The English could not "blind the sweet influences of the sun," they could not forbid the sun to shine, and the sun and dew to fall; but they could set up the Moloch of famine in the land, and they did it.

The contrast between the stock of reason and argument in the respective exchequers of these mortal combatants bears a striking proportion to their money stock. In the resource monopoly is absolutely bankrupt; while the Free-Trade exchequer overflows. Monopoly is bankrupt; and, taking advantage of what in Scotland they call bonorum, it has fled for sanctuary to Parliamentary protection, cunningly keeping them between it and those who would have it, common sense and common justice.

It is also worthy of note, that monopoly is treated with little respect, while clinging to the horns of this altar. They are the horns of a dilemma to the poor old bankrupt. In fact, the priests who preside at this shrine have given it notice to quit. The great high priest, Peel, has prophesied that he will deliver up the fugitive some of these days, and his assistant, Graham, says, "serve it right."

It is some consolation to reflect, that the English people are beginning to call in question the divinity of their nobility. They are beginning to find out that if they are gods they are not of the most merciful sort. It is now pretty certain that Parliamentary votes—its last refuge—will not long save the Moloch monopoly from the storm which has been long gathering against it; and when we reflect upon the sacrifices which have been offered to this goddess, upon the amount of wealth, and toil, and blood which it has cost, and will yet cost, to cast him down from his bad eminence, there is some comfort in the reflection, that the remembrance of all this will remain in the public mind, a fixed idea, a sure guarantee, that never more will that slavish reverence for a landed aristocracy, which made Corn Laws possible, gain a lodgment there.

FREE TRADE THE CAUSE OF PEACE.

(From the "British Quarterly Review.")

The parallelism or coincidence of economical truth and practical Christianity, is especially manifest in the theory of commercial freedom to the preservation of the peace of the world. The cause of Free Trade is the cause of peace. The international morality of monopoly, jealousy, suspicion, and self-isolation; "independence of foreigners," for fear of war; reciprocal infliction of injuries provocative of war. Its peace is, at the best, "armed peace," which is a sort of war. Free Trade is that mutual dependence of nation on nation which creates and cements interests and habits incompatible with war. Well says the Secretary of our Board of Trade: "The greater the commercial relations between nations, the more disastrous would be the consequences of a war which would interrupt their reciprocity of interests, in proportion as this commercial and reciprocal trade has been of long standing and of great extent, the more would be the securities for the maintenance of peace." And again: "A war of material interests, or, properly speaking, of material injuries—that is, a war of custom-houses or fiscal forts, with their garrisons of revenue officers and servants, has long been declared against us between most European nations. This war of interests, or injuries, has not ceased with the war of bloodshed; and if we may ever expect security against a recurrence of the calamities attendant on, and consequent to, the latter, it will be in destroying the elements of the former—in short, by the extension of Free Trade between all nations." (Macgregor's "Commercial Statistics.") We earnestly commend these thoughts to the consideration of the Christian public of Great Britain. The securities for the maintenance of peace are just what the world's great want. It is a painful reflection—how often have arisen, and may arise again, to render our alarming and fearful one—that we have neglected to secure our peaceful relations with those two countries, both to our own national weal, and to the general interests of civilization and humanity. No nations of the earth offer us more inviting natural facilities to a more conservative of peace, than France and the United States; yet with none is our commerce more checked and obstructed by artificial restrictions, with none we have more harassing and irritating diplomatic quarrels. That we still have trade enough with the United States to render war a tremendous calamity to ourselves, is, in the present temper of a large portion of their people, our chief safeguard against being seized into wholesale and organized fratricide about the miserable Oregon or Texas question, which, were it not that it might be according to the obvious arguments of nature and Providence, would immediately result in insignificant harmlessness. We have societies for the Promotion of Permanent and Universal Peace; the most efficient Peace Society were the wide brotherhood of nations, knit together in the beneficent relations of wants mutually relieved by superfluities mutually exchanged. These are negotiators capable of attaining to a prompt and honourable termination, the worst diplomatic quarrel that ever menaced the peace of the world.

THE SUGAR DODGE AGAIN.—MORE NEWS FOR LORD SANDON.

(From the Liverpool Mercury.)

There seems no end to the complication of absurdity and self-contradiction in which we have entangled ourselves by the hypocrisies of the new fiscal morality, that we have grown tobacco, drinks slave-grown coffee, and we are doing nothing to do with slave-grown sugar—except paying, selling, and getting gain by it. One slave-holding nation starts up after another, with a "most favoured nation" clause in its hands, to mock the philanthropy of a section of the British public, and pour contempt on the simulated scrupulousness of the Ministry and Legislature. First, it was Venezuela, then, the United States; and now, it is Spain, Cuba and Porto Rico, actually slave-holding and slave-trading Cuba and Porto Rico,—islands which produced, last year, more than nine-tenths of the quantity of sugar that we imported from all our possessions in East and West,—claim to have a share in sweetening the tea of a people who are so horrified at the bare thought of doing anything with slavery sugar (making a little money by it always excepted), that they have started a new principle of fiscal law for the express purpose of keeping it at a distance.

The nature and grounds of this claim, which, as appears from Sir Robert Peel's statement in the House of Commons, has been formally advanced by the Spanish Minister, are already sufficiently known to the public. By treaties now in force between Great Britain and Spain (that of Utrecht in particular), and whose validity we have ourselves recognised so lately as the year 1837, by demanding and accepting advantages under them, Spain is one of our "most favoured" nations. Our commercial relations with that country are precisely the same with those in which we stand towards Venezuela and the United States. We must—unless the ingenuity of our diplomatists should save the credit and consistency of our fiscal moralists, by discovering some unexpected legal hitch—take the "goods and merchandises" of Spain, and of her "lands, seas, and territories," at precisely the same rates of duty which we put on those of China and Java, or any other country that our prudish and sharp-scented morality has been pleased to pronounce worthy of the honour of trading with us. We had not discovered the science of "moral botany"—nor did we learn religion out of wooden bibles—in the days of the treaty of Utrecht.

Surely, the authors and abettors of this absurdity must, by this time, be heartily ashamed of it and themselves. The thing is coming now to be too ridiculous. We take most particular and extraordinary pains to keep out slavery sugar; and it really seems as if we could get nothing else. We cry with might and main, "Out, damn'd spot! out, I say!"—but the spot will not out. "Yet here's a spot," and another, and another; and the more we rub and rub, the worse it is. And for this ludicrously abortive experiment in fiscal legislation—this despicable piece of Phariseism—we pay the enormous cost of the sacrifice of the second-best market for our manufactures.

THE SUGAR MARKET.

The position of the sugar market is one of considerable interest, and the following illustration of it, from the Public Ledger, will, doubtless, be considered well timed:—

The total quantity of duty-paid sugar, including foreign, in London, Liverpool, and Bristol, up to the 17th of June, is 94,000 tons; during the same period last year, it was 68,000 tons, showing an increase of one-third, and we assume this rate of increase will be continued; if so, then we shall deliver 270,000 tons this year, as the duty paid in 1844 was on 207,000 tons.

The highest estimate of the importations for the present year (1845) presented to the House by Sir Robert Peel, was:—

From the West Indies .. ..	140,000 tons,
— Mauritius .. ..	40,000 "
— British East Indies .. ..	70,000 "
	250,000

The importations last year were:—

From the West Indies .. ..	122,000 tons.
— Mauritius .. ..	27,000 "
— East Indies B. P. .. ..	55,000 " and, we think, if our readers "adopt the estimate of 250,000 tons, they will not find the importations exceeded it."
	204,000

HARVEST PROSPECTS AND THE CORN TRADE.

At one period of the week the weather assumed rather a threatening aspect; during two entire days there was but little sunshine and much heavy rain in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, whilst a material fall took place in the temperature; on Thursday, however, the clouds dispersed, and we have since had a clear sky, with brisk drying breezes. Had the rain continued, it would probably have done some injury; but, under the circumstances named, the crops have unquestionably been greatly benefited by the seasonable supply of moisture. The wet having been immediately followed by the required degree of warmth, vegetation has been forced rapidly forward, and we hear from all quarters that the wheat has come into ear very regularly. Thus far nothing has occurred to mar our prospects as to the future; and the reports respecting the appearance of the different grain crops are of a much more favourable character than was the case in the early part of the month. We have now, however, arrived at a critical period of the year, and a few weeks, or even days, might change the position of affairs materially: holders of wheat have, consequently, manifested a disposition to temporise; and, as they consider it perfectly possible that the article may later in the year become much more valuable, whilst there exists little chance of prices falling to any extent below their present level, they have not been very eager to sell. Buyers have, on the other hand, shown a decided unwillingness to add largely to their stocks; and what with the timidity displayed by the one party, and the extreme caution which has characterized the operations of the other, the trade has been kept in a very languid state. In point of price scarcely any change has taken place, merely purchasers having been under the necessity of paying nearly previous rates at all the principal provincial markets held since our last. —Mark Lane Express, Monday.

THE WEATHER AND THE CROPS.—Ever prone to grumble, some two months ago most of us were ready to "take our Bible oath" that there would be no hay, and that everything in the vegetable world would be extraordinarily late. But what is now the fact? Why, that there is plenty of hay, that the wheat never looked finer, and that the whole face of the country is beautiful in the extreme. Let the past, then, be a lesson to us, for the future, to trust our bountiful Benefactor where we cannot trace Him, and let us be thankful that "His thoughts are not as our thoughts." We were lately visited by a brief but heavy storm of lightning, thunder, and rain, which doubtless impeded the hay harvest, now in full operation in our locality, but it was too transient, we hope, to injure either the hay or the grain crops. Light showers had also occasionally fallen during the previous day or two. With our present prospects, wheat, before Christmas, will be under 40s. per quarter, and yet the farmers have been led by their "friends" to believe that Sir Robert will keep it at 56s. —Worcester Chronicle.—The reports of the various provincial papers all bear testimony to the rapid improvement which has taken place in the state of the crops since the fine weather has set in, affording every prospect, under Providence, of an abundant harvest.

THE SUPPLY OF CORN.—Attempts have been made in some quarters to cause an advance of corn by representing the prospect for the harvest as being gloomy. We think it right to caution our readers against such statements, which, if generally believed, would be successful in their object to the great detriment of the poorer classes. Undoubtedly injury has been sustained by the wheat both from cold and wire-worm, and in some instances, on poor land, the seed has failed to vegetate. With such favourable weather, however, as we are now experiencing, it is yet too soon to say that there will not be an average crop. At the same time, the laws which prevent any deficiency here from being freely supplied from abroad, ought to be treated with unceasing reprobation. Should such a deficiency occur, it appears that little can be expected from Russia, while in Belgium, the import duty has been suspended on account of the price, and foreign corn lying in bond in London, through the duty, now 20s., has, within the last few days, been carried over to that country. —Whitehaven Herald.

STATE OF THE CROPS IN IRELAND.—The accounts of the state of the crops in all parts of the country are most cheering, and warrant us in anticipating the richest harvest for many years. Already whole fields of fully shot wheat are to be found in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, and everywhere this stock is in an unusually flourishing condition. Barley and oats promise much more than the ordinary average return. As the weather is warm, and likely to continue fine, we may calculate upon an early harvest. Potatoes, it is said, are not rich in proportion with the other farming produce, but no complaints are made. The natural consequence of the state of the crops is, that old corn has fallen considerably in price, and large quantities are on hand here and in Cork. In Cork it is computed there are 30,000 barrels of wheat in the hands of the dealers, who cannot sell unless at a serious sacrifice. —Standard Correspondent.

THE CROPS IN BELGIUM.—We are now enabled to assert, that the severity of the winter and the cold rains that prevailed in May have not produced the injurious effects that were so much feared. It even appears that the approaching harvest presents the most favourable appearances. The rye is very fine in all our districts; the wheat has, here and there, suffered a little, but in a great number of localities it is magnificent. The cold winds of the spring have been rather favourable than injurious to these grains, inasmuch as they have contributed to strengthen the roots and give a fuller development to the plants. Besides, according to the Old Flemish proverb, "A May cold and wet brings corn to the sack." The oats and barley present a most promising appearance. The forage at first, failed, but at the present moment there is no cause for complaint. The clover is tolerably thick. The flax promises much, and a productive harvest of this plant may be expected. The hops will, in all probability, fully answer the expectations of the cultivators in the neighbourhood of Alost and Poperinghe, localities where this precious plant is almost exclusively cultivated. To resume, if the approaching harvest promises less than that of 1844, the difference will be so trifling that it will be hardly perceptible. The most exaggerated apprehensions have been entertained on this subject. —Brussels Gazette, June 22.

IMPORTATION OF INDIA CORN.

(From the Birmingham Journal.)

Sir,—The suggestion in your paper of Saturday last, respecting the introduction of Indian corn (duty free) into this kingdom for the purpose of feeding cattle, pigs, &c., ought not to be lost sight of. It would be a great advantage to feeders of stock in general, having all these nutritious and fattening qualities represented. About twenty-seven years ago, I purchased a quantity of Indian corn, the price being then low, some of which I sent to a neighbouring miller to be ground. He was naturally curious to know something about the new grain, never having seen anything of the kind before, and when informed of the use for which it was intended, he said, "Depend on it, friend, it will never do, it's all a mistake; you have made but a poor bargain." I was not surprised at the reception of the honest miller, and trusted to time and the result of my experiment to change his opinion and remove his prejudice. He ground the corn, after many admonitory strokes of his head, and, on it coming home, I mixed it with steamed potatoes in the usual way as other flour is for pig feeding, and in about a month my swine were as firm and as fat as could be desired. The miller, calling one day, could scarcely believe the evidence of his senses, and, still doubting, he observed to me, "Ay, neighbour, but it was the potatoes that did it." From that time, however, he commenced feeding his own swine with it, and recommended it to his customers and friends for the same purpose, who were equally delighted at what they considered a new discovery in the mode of feeding. I had also an opportunity of testing its fattening properties on poultry, having a large number in my yard at the time, and they thrived amazingly upon the same sort of food. It would be well if our legislators would allow its being imported (duty free) for home consumption. The crops of it are most abundant in America, and hundreds of acres are left to rot and spoil on the land, on account of its great cheapness compared with the price of labour. What a lamentable consideration to think that the bounties of Heaven should be so wasted and neglected from nothing more than the perverseness and selfishness of men who study too little the happiness and comfort of those whose well-doing would be their gain! The advantage of its introduction, untaxed, would prove of great service to the labouring class, who too often feed their swine at an enormous expense and great domestic privation. It is hoped this subject will be generally considered, and not lost sight of, and means adopted to carry out the suggestion.

A STAFFORDSHIRE FARMER.

THE "MORNING POST" AND THE LANDOWNERS.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

Sir Robert Peel having effectually demolished the grand fallacy of the monopolists, that wages rise and fall with the price of food, the Morning Post next comes forward, and demonstrates, in the most conclusive manner, that the landowners have no need of protection, as it is not to impossible that their rents can ever be permanently affected by any change which may be made in our protective system. In the debate on Mr. Villiers's motion, the Premier laid very great stress on the difference between landowners and manufacturers, and the reluctance of the former class to let their land to the highest bidder. If one might believe the right hon. baronet, the main consideration with the landlords of Great Britain is, to make their tenants comfortable and happy without much reference to their own personal or pecuniary interest. On the other hand, however, when we turn to the Morning Post, which has always been considered the exclusive and unscrupulous advocate of the landed aristocracy, we find nothing which would lead us to believe that it looks upon the majority of the owners of the soil as being a whit less selfish than any other class of the community. A short time ago, the Post, under the impression that the abolition of the Corn Laws would be followed by the total annihilation of rent, and the consequent ruin of our territorial aristocracy, endeavoured to awaken that class to a sense of their imminent danger, and to the necessity of adopting prompt and vigorous measures to repel the assaults of the Free-Traders. Falling in its efforts to excite the landowners to rebellion against Sir Robert Peel and his commercial policy, the Post now contends that their apathy is owing to selfishness, and to the conviction, fast spreading among them, that rents are secure whatever may happen:—

"If protection were of vital importance to the incomes of persons of large fortune," says the Post, "then we apprehend that protection would have been better supported than it has been. But the owners of land have far less interest in the protection of British agriculture than the tillers of land, and protection is therefore neglected. Population increases rapidly, while the land remains limited to its former extent. The natural course of things, under such circumstances, will be additional application of labour to the land, leading to increased productivity. This would be a diminishing of the proportionate interest of the owner in his land, and an increase of the interest of the labourer; that is, the owner's interest remaining the same, the cultivator's would increase. But the owner's interest remaining only the same, while the liabilities of fixed property are always greater in proportion to the increase of population, it really is not the landowner's interest (regarding him in the light of a purely selfish being) to encourage that system of cultivation and protection of cultivation which is the best for the labourer. The merely selfish landlord will prefer keeping rents as they are, and limiting the application of labour to the land. He will prefer driving the population to settle down into those masses of sin, suffering, and brutal intelligence, which compose towns. With the land limited as it is in England, and with the increased competition for its possession, in order to devote it further purposes than that of tillage, there is little fear of rents descending below their present level."

Sir James Graham's great fact, that the population has increased at the rate of 250,000 per annum "since the present Ministry came into office," appears to have made a deep and lasting impression upon the Post. It is now fully aware of the great difficulty in the way of those who would cripple trade, in their blind desire to benefit agriculture. "Population increases rapidly, while the land remains limited to its former extent." That being the case, is it not clear to every mind unbiassed by prejudice, that the first duty of Government is to remove every obstruction to the free employment of industry and capital, in order that work may be found for the thousands who are daily crowding into the labour market?

The Post, although it begins to understand the rent question rather better than it did, still continues to harp upon the wickedness and misery of the manufacturing population. The "merely selfish landlords," we are told, instead of making the labourers comfortable on the land, "prefer driving them to settle down into those masses of sin, suffering, and brutal intelligence, which compose towns." Now, had as the condition of a large portion of the inhabitants of towns unquestionably is, owing to want of education, imperfect sanitary arrangements, and other remediable evils, it is still far superior in general to that of the great mass of the agricultural labourers. It is, no doubt, true that the "brutal intelligence" of the dwellers in towns frequently leads them to buy their worst grievances before the public; but he must be a very superficial reasoner who would therefore conclude that the comparative silence of the unintelligent, and therefore apathetic, rural population arises from their being more comfortable. The late Mr. Coleridge, whom the Post is in the habit of quoting as a first rate authority on such questions, takes a very just and sensible view of the comparative merits of town and rustic life, in the following passage, which we would recommend to the special attention of our London contemporary:—

"I am convinced," says Mr. Coleridge, "that, for the human soul to prosper in rustic life, a certain vantage-ground is requisite. It is not every man that is likely to be improved by a country life, or by country labours. Education, or original sensibility, or both, must pre-exist, if the changes, forms, and incidents of nature are to prove a sufficient stimulant. And where these are not sufficient, the mind contracts and hardens by want of stimulus; and the man becomes selfish, sensual, gross, and hard-hearted. Let the management of the poor laws in Liverpool, Manchester, or Bristol be compared with the ordinary dispensation of the poor-rates in agricultural villages, where the farmers are the overseers and guardians of the poor. If my own experience have not been particularly unfortunate, as well as that of the many respectable country clergyman with whom I have conversed on the subject, the result would engender more than scepticism concerning the desirable influences of low and rustic life in and for itself."

This is certainly not quite so romantic a description of the charms of rustic life as we find in some writers, but we believe it to be very true, so far as it goes, and one which deserves to be more widely diffused among our practical philanthropists, many of whom are too apt, in looking at the vice and misery which they find concentrated in the manufacturing districts, to fancy, because the air of the country is so much more pure and wholesome than that of the town, that the moral atmosphere in the rural districts will partake of the same character.

EMIGRATION.

The extent of emigration from the United Kingdom, and the direction in which it flows, vary amazingly. They depend, of course, on several circumstances, but chiefly on the greater or less amount of distress at home, and the less or more inviting condition of the colonies or foreign countries which afford an opening:—

Average Annual Number of Emigrants.
In the 4 years ending 1828	..	22,500
" 6 years ending 1831	..	69,000
" 5 years ending 1839	..	57,500
" 3 years ending 1842	..	112,500
1843 and 1844	..	61,000

The three years of dearth and depression ending with 1842 gave a tremendous impulse to emigration, almost doubling the annual amount for the preceding five years; while the two last years of cheap corn and improved trade have again reduced it in nearly the same proportion.—Scotsman.

THE AMERICAN PRESS.

THE AMERICAN TARIFF.

(From the Portsmouth (New Hampshire) Gazette.)

Soon after the successful issue of the Presidential election was known, we alluded to the "great result" as the mandate of the people, in regard to the important democratic measures presented to them in that great contest, and more particularly the promotion of the great principles of Free Trade, so far as concerned the reduction of the tariff to a strict accordance with the revenue principle. The point of annexation seems mainly settled: that was a great measure, which could not with safety be postponed; but, that being now disposed of, the regulation of the system of taxation for the support of Government is certainly not of less importance.

It must now be the settled policy of the Democratic party to equalize the burden of taxation; and this can only be done by discarding all considerations not connected with the sole legitimate object of a tariff, which, by the constitution, is limited to the raising of revenue "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare." Let the Government confine itself strictly to this object, levying duties on imports so as to invite rather than to prohibit importation, thereby producing from every article the greatest amount of revenue than is requisite for an economical administration of the Government, reduce the ratio on every article in a corresponding proportion, until the requisite amount only is realized. Then, if a protection to the home productions be incidentally or accidentally derived from a tariff so regulated, be it so. As the old merchants of France said to Colbert, when he asked what he could do for them and for the advantage of their trade and commercial transactions, "Laissez nous faire,"—"let us alone,"—so, if our wise legislators will just let trade and commerce alone, doing nothing more than to protect a Free Trade and intercourse with all nations, and between man and man, the mass of the people will be benefited; trade will take better care of itself than legislators can do by their attempts to nurse it; the taxes will then be equalized, and the whole country will prosper, instead of particular interests.

But if, as we have heretofore said, the efforts of the people to bring about this equalization of the public burdens are to fail,—if, after having declared so plainly, as they have in the recent Presidential election, that a revenue tariff is the word,—if, after all, "this unequal system of taxes for protection is to be thus fastened upon us, we intend to go for the abandonment of import duties altogether, and advocate a resort to direct taxation for the support of Government." The tariffites may be assured it will come to this, if they do not desert from their claims for protection. The people will be brought to understand, that it is not for their interests to be taxed to enable manufacturers, or other producers, to obtain greater profits. They will soon begin to learn that in a system of direct taxation they will pay in proportion to their property only, and not in proportion to the amount of dutiable articles they consume. They will look about them and see large numbers of their rich neighbours, possessing their tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands, and may be millions, who pay no more towards the support of Government than the man of ordinary circumstances, or even the poorer sort; they will see that he who labours from day to day often consumes as much of dutiable articles in his family, and wears out as many clothes, as the richest, and, consequently, pays as large a share of the public taxes. They will begin to inquire if this be right. They will begin to calculate what amount of dutiable articles they now annually consume; they will estimate the amount of taxes on these articles, and hence judge of the annual amount of money they pay into the treasury, and will find, as a general remark, that the rich pay no more than the poor, and often not so much.

A Washington correspondent of the New York Herald, in treating of this unequal mode of taxes, alludes for example to John Jacob Astor, of New York, who, with a property of twenty-five millions of dollars, pays no more of the public expenditure than any ordinary citizen. The mass of the people will finally ascertain what no one who has given any attention to the subject denies, that this import tax is a most unequal mode of collecting the public revenue at best; and to be obliged to submit to an increase of such taxes for the express purpose of protection, or, in other words, to enable manufacturers to tax higher for their goods, is to submit to extortion; they will find that a poor man often pays twenty-five, fifty, or maybe a hundred dollars, per annum, on goods which his family consumes; when, if property were taxed, he might pay five, and a large portion would pay only perhaps a poll tax.

Then, too, in the event of war, who are to take the field to defend the property from invasion? There can be but one answer to this—the mass must do the fighting, and, under the present system of taxation, the mass must pay the expenses. What, then, will the people do when they come to make this matter a subject of serious reflection, and become familiar with it in all its bearings? Will they not rise in their might and throw off a system of taxation which has been so much abused through the insidious croaking about "protection of American industry?"

We warn these protectionists, who have been taxing the people that they may reap their 20 and 30 per cent. dividends, to be quiet and peaceable, and suffer the rates of duties to be equalized, and brought to a revenue standard, or the system of taxation by impost will be overthrown and demolished. They may think for the present that their house stands strong: they may think the idea of Free-Trade a mere theory, an abstraction, not susceptible of any practical application; that their "American system" is too strongly hedged about, to apprehend any serious inroads upon it; but so they once thought of a United States Bank; yet they have seen that institution abolished, and the hope of its renewal has become an "obsolete idea," and, if the friends of protection will not become reasonable men, the system of taxation by impost will be also reckoned among the things that have passed away.

DOES SPECIAL PROTECTION TO THE MANUFACTURER BENEFIT THE OPERATIVE?

(From the Baltimore Patriot.)

The Whig orators always contend, while advocating a high and partial tariff system, that the wages of labour depend wholly upon the fatness of the dividends upon manufacturing stocks. They say to the operative, "We look to the tariff to sustain us, and expect your vote and co-operation, that we may be able to give you better wages." The dependent is, of course led to believe that, with a prosperous season, his wages will be augmented, and that they will rise or fall in proportion as the tariff upon foreign manufactures is increased or diminished. But the promises of these electioneering Whigs are very seldom made good after they have gained the votes of their labourers. So far from the wages of operatives having been increased in proportion when high tariffs have been imposed, we venture to say they have almost invariably been reduced under the operation of high duties. Since the passage of the existing Tariff Act, in 1842, the wages of a large portion of the operatives in this city have been reduced, or additional labour has been exacted of them, without a corresponding remuneration, through a "reduction of the speed," and by various other expedients having a tendency to task the energies of labour for the sole benefit of capital. The wages of others have remained in statu quo, while those of a very small class have been increased, where it was absolutely necessary to retain them in opposition to competition from abroad.

A few weeks since we stated that in one of our large establishments the wages of a portion of the labourers had been reduced materially, while at the same time the stocks of the company were advancing in the market, and its managers were extending their facilities for production. This has served to direct the attention of our contemporaries in manufacturing communities to the subject, and we find that this forced tribute of the hard head of toil to the wealthy capitalist is a wrong which, at the present moment of manufacturing prosperity, is not confined to this city: the same process has been pursued elsewhere; which shows up the worthlessness and gross hypocrisy of the promises of Whig orators, and demonstrates pretty clearly that exclusive protection to capital does not necessarily afford corresponding protection to labour.

The Springfield (Massachusetts) Post—a very ably conducted paper, situated in the vicinity of extensive manufacturing establishments—comments with a good degree of truth and vigour upon this point. We quote a couple of paragraphs from a recent number of that paper:—

"It is a part of wisdom and justice that the wealth of the country should contribute to the support of the Government. It is as much the subject of protection as life itself, and should, therefore, bear its due proportion of the burdens of the protecting arm. Yet towards the maintenance of the Government of the country, the capital invested in manufacturing corporations does not contribute a tittle. It claims and receives greater protection than any other interest, but gives no support to the protecting power in return. The operative, whose sweat and blood and sinews are his capital, is laid under contribution every moment of his life. On almost every thing he eats, or drinks, or wears, he pays a tax to the Government. He does this, and does it cheerfully, in return for the protection it affords him of his life and limbs and family. These are all he has to be protected, and he pays liberally and cheerfully for the service. The rich capitalist does the same, but he does nothing more. For his life, his person, and his family he requires the same protection as the poor man, and for these he pays the same; but for his capital, for that which enables him to live at ease, to roll in luxury, and snap his fingers at care and want, he does not pay a cent—not a farthing. The bodily strength of the operative is his capital, and he submits to be taxed for it; the money of the manufacturer is his capital, and for that he claims exemption from taxation."

"Nay, more. The operative asks only to be protected from wrong while in the honest pursuit of his calling. The capitalist claims not only the same sort of protection as the operative, but insists on the enactment of special laws to enable him to increase his capital. For his person and family he enjoys the same protection as the poor man; his capital is exempt from a tax which is really exacted of the other, at the same time that it receives peculiar and exclusive protection. Why is this? On what ground is this gross inequality justified? Why, simply and wholly on the ground that the manufacturer is expected to atone in some way or other to the rest of the community for the exclusive exemptions and privileges conferred upon him. He says to the operative—'It is true I have twice as much to stake as you, for which I pay the same—it is true that laws are passed for my special and exclusive benefit, giving me a great advantage over you—but still these extraordinary privileges conferred upon me will enable me to confer others on you. The greater my gains the greater, of course, will be your direct protection to me is indirect protection to you, or, in other words, protection to the manufacturer is protection to the labourer.' But yet, when, through the instrumentality of these superior advantages, wealth is pouring in upon the manufacturer from a thousand avenues, we hear nothing of corresponding gains to the operative. As the dividends of the former increase, we seldom hear of an increase in the wages of the latter. While the first realizes real, certain, and substantial benefits from the system, the promised good to the last usually turns out to be a mere matter of moonshine. Prosperity makes the rich more obdurate. It stacks their hearts to the obligations of justice and humanity. An increase of their wealth produces a proportionate increase of their rapacity; and when the manufacturer's profits accumulate largely, his operatives may deem themselves fortunate if they do not find their side of the same growing light in the same proportion."

LEGENDARY FIRE.—On the morning of the 12th, a smoke out in an outhouse, containing a thrashing-machine, on the farm of Mr. Jackson, of Blackenstone, Oregon, which destroyed the machine, several drills, other agricultural implements, and communicating barn, destroyed it also and its contents, about four bushels of wheat. A stable and two shippens were also destroyed. The fire was discovered raging at two o'clock in the morning, and, by great exertions on the part of Mr. Jackson's family and his neighbours, it was prevented from extending to the dwelling-house. It is firmly believed by Mr. Jackson that the fire was the work of an enemy, as no lights were ever allowed or used on that premises where the fire occurred.—Western PATRIOTISM. When any natural propensity is consecrated into a virtue, the greatest evils ensue. Patriotism is an instance of this. We are naturally led to give undue importance to ourselves—this, when the individual is clearly the object of his own feeling, is called selfishness. But when, under the name of patriotism, each individual indulges himself in vanity, in pride, in ambition, in oratory—and yet does it as an Englishman, as a Frenchman, as a Spaniard—all these vices are reckoned virtues.—*J. ### LETTERS ON AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

LETTER V.

"It is a melancholy fact that, without any particular acts of oppression on the part of the farmers, or of dissoluteness on the part of the poor, the labourers of many parts of this country, and of the south-east district in particular, may be truly said to be at this time in a wretched condition. The dearthness of provisions; the scarcity of fuel, and above all the failure of spinning work for the women and children, have put it almost out of the power of the village poor to live by their industry; and have unfortunately broken that independent spirit which in a very peculiar degree formerly kept the Wiltshire labourers from the parish-books. The farmers complain, and with reason, that the labourers do less work than formerly, when, in fact, the labourers are not able to work as they did when they lived better."—Cooke's Topographical and Statistical Description of the County of Wilts. (Edition 1817.)

The foregoing extract is from a book published about two years and a half after the time when John Benett, Esq., of Pyt-house, M.P. for South Wilts, gave evidence before a parliamentary committee, that 90s. per quarter for wheat would only be a fair price; and that less than 80s. per quarter would be a losing price—a price at which land would go out of cultivation and labourers out of employment.

The Corn Law of 1815 followed upon the evidence which Mr. Benett and others gave; and it was effectual in the years of deficient harvests—1816 and 1817—in keeping up prices.

But how fared the labourers for whose especial benefit high prices were said to be desirable; and how acted the farmers who employed the labourers? "Without any particular acts of oppression on the part of the farmers, or of dissoluteness on the part of the poor, the labourers in many parts of this county may be truly said to be in a wretched condition. The dearthness of provisions [the 'farmers' friends' of the present day would make this read 'the cheapness of provisions'] have put it almost out of the power of the village poor to live by their own industry."

On a recent occasion the Hon. Sidney Herbert, the parliamentary colleague of Mr. Benett in the representation of South Wilts, said that he did not understand the Free-Traders; that there was no fixing them to any one argument; that on one occasion they alleged this, and on another occasion they alleged that: he really did not know what they wanted.

Yes, the Free-Traders do use different arguments on different occasions; and for this weighty reason, that the pernicious effects of monopoly are so variously distributed, so universally felt, that no single occasion serves to collect them into one statement.

In the passage extracted above we have in one sentence, "the dearthness of provisions, the scarcity of fuel, and, above all, the failure of spinning work for the women and children," given as reasons why the farm-labourers could not, in 1817, live by their own labour. In more recent years the same has been said of the working population of other counties. And it has been the practice of such men as Sidney Herbert to say that the "failure of spinning" is the cause of distress—that it is the distress itself; and that it fails because there has been too much yarn spun—much more than is wanted. And men more exalted in the Cabinet, and more distinguished for smartness in debate than even he is, have said the same thing. "It is all over-production," said Lord Stanley.

But the Free-Traders whom Sidney Herbert finds using more arguments than one,—vexing him because they do not stick to one argument; vexing him more because he is not able to answer their arguments,—they say that "the failure of spinning" is not a primary, but a secondary, cause of distress. The "dearthness of provisions" is that cause which produces "failure in spinning." The stomach must be filled before the body is clothed or adorned. If all the money that a Wiltshire labourer earned in 1816—himself upon one of the Wilton farms, and his wife and two of his children spinning for a Wilton manufacturer—was expended on dear provisions, it is quite clear that they could not add to their stock of clothes nor to their furniture; that they could not pay the shoemaker, nor tailor; nor deal with the draper as usual, nor yet with the grocer to the same extent, as when provisions were not so dear; and that in their turn the tailor did less with the draper, the shoemaker less with both, and all of them less with one another, until the Wilton manufacturer (like all other manufacturers in the kingdom) found that as he could not sell he must not weave, and as he could not weave he must not spin; and that, therefore, he must not give out any more wool to the woman whose husband worked on one of the Wilton farms, and whose two children assisted her in spinning. In short, the manufacturer felt that there was already an "over-production" of clothing, of fancy waistcoatings, or carpets, or blankets, or whatever his branch of the then Wilton trade might be,—not, however, as regarded the requirements of the wearers of clothes: he would see then in Wilton, as we are now in this blessed year 1845, that it is a great struggle on the part of the working people of that place and neighbourhood to get clothes even of the meanest and scantiest kind; but he would estimate the over-production by his inability to sell arising from the people's inability to buy, and would accordingly produce less.

Hence we have the "Statistical Description of Wiltshire," informing us in 1817, the second year of excessive prices, that "The dearthness of provisions, the scarcity of fuel, and, above all, the failure of spinning work for the women and children, have put it almost out of the power of the village poor to live by their industry."

What occurred to the manufacturing sections of Wiltshire then, in consequence of dearthness, has occurred to every manufacturing district of England since, on every occasion of dearthness and scarcity; and, by a natural revulsion, upon other sections of society and upon other interests.

These are trite arguments, and so well known to the readers of the LEAGUE that I almost regret to occupy any space with them in this paper. But I am not without hope that we may even get Mr. Herbert to read and understand and believe, though he may not at once confess that he reads, understands, and believes, that the various positions taken by the advocates of Free Trade are not taken to escape from him, or from others who argue on his present side of the question, but are taken to meet and expose to view the evil which the thing called "protection" does at every point where it makes itself felt upon society. And its inroads upon our social and political well-being are so numerous and so various, so full of evil, so deficient of good, that we must meet them by numerous and various arguments.

The "Statistical Description of Wilts," from which I have quoted, bears throughout a tone of respectful partiality for the high churchmen and landed gentry in the county; therefore it is an authority not to be questioned by them. I have produced its testimony to show that dearthness of provisions is allied with scarcity of work; that wages do not rise with the price of provisions; and that dearthness and scarcity revert with evil effect upon everybody. Witness the last sentence in the quotation with which I set out:—"The farmers complain, and with reason, that the labourers do less work than formerly, when, in fact, the labourers are not able to work as they did when they lived better."

At the meeting of 1000 labourers at a village in this county, three weeks ago, one of them named Berley said—"The farmers tell us we be lazy when they think us be doing too little work; but it be potatoes and salt makes a man lazy; or what looks like lazy—weak and not able to do a day's work;" to which several labourers called out, "That be true enough."

Sidney Herbert would here say—judging from what he has already said—"What do you Free-Traders want? You allege that the labourers are poorly paid and fed now when provisions are cheap; and you quote the 'Statistical Description of Wilts' to show us that they were ill fed and ill employed when provisions were dear; what is it you want, dear provisions, or cheap provisions?"

The answer to this is, that mere price neither indicates cheapness nor dearthness. We must take into account the ability of the consumers of provisions to buy enough, or more than enough; or their inability to get enough. In Wiltshire there are more people than can get employment. In Wilton itself the people are undergoing a process of reduction, as fast as Mr. Herbert can root them out, by purchasing up the houses and pulling them down. This may reduce the population of Wilton. But the people leaving it go elsewhere and increase the competition for work, and add, by their migration, to the general and very extensive increase of population. If they be unable to buy enough of food at any price, it matters little to them what the price of it is. What the Free-Traders seek is to extend employment, and thus add to the working man's wages; and they seek to do this by removing the causes of little employment and low wages. The chief of these causes is the excessive dearthness and scarcity which from time paralyze the population and freeze up the industrial resources of this country.

LETTER VI.

Another position which the Free-Traders take, perhaps to the bewilderment of Mr. Sidney Herbert, is, that the Corn Law does deep injury to the farmers. And, for their own sakes, I regret to say that the Wilton tenants have suffered severely this present year.

I was upon one of the farms the other day, where the tenant had been paying £20 a week for hay to a flock of sheep for two months; a lesser sum for two other months. The price of the hay was £6 and 10s. per ton. Other farmers had been paying £7 per ton. This high price of hay may appear to some to be a benefit to farmers; and if high prices were always a benefit to them, this would have been so. But if farmers buy from farmers, it is clear that there is no gain even at high prices, to them, as a class. The price of hay this year proves it. That price being excessive, no more was purchased than what barely kept the sheep and cattle alive. The result is that all flocks have suffered, and many have been dropping to the ground by disease, induced by starvation. Up to the time that I write, some flocks not many miles from Wilton, which have seen, are still pining in disease, the abundant grass of the generous summer being inefficacious to recover them.

All over the middle district of Hampshire, and through South Wilts, particularly on Salisbury Plains, the shepherds have told me within the last fortnight that the wool this year is neither so good nor so heavy, owing to the scarcity of winter feeding for the sheep, as in ordinary years. Neither have the ewes been so prolific of lambs. Nor the lambs in such good condition. I have been on a farm where 20 out of every 100 sheep had been reduced to as little as the fifth part of what they would have sold for in the summer of 1844; reduced thus by famine and disease, even though the farmer had been buying hay for them.

Now, all this has occurred while the farmers have been prevented by their own Corn Law from getting provender better and cheaper than hay. Where £200 have been paid for barely as much hay as kept the stock upon a farm alive, £100 expended in the purchase of the beans of Egypt, the maize, barley, oats, &c., to have been added to such hay and straw and turnips as each farmer had of his own in the autumn and winter of 1844, would have had the stock in good condition—that intended to be fat would have been fat, that intended for breeding stock would have been in health, and the farmer would have now had profit in his pocket instead of barren loss; a loss that he will not overcome for the next two years let the seasons be in the highest degree favourable. The stock is deteriorated; and with many of the poorer farmers—the poorest farmers not being always those who occupy least land—cattle and sheep have died, and are still dying.

The "North Wilts Agricultural Report," dated 5th June, published in the Devizes Gazette, and republished in other farmers' newspapers, has the following:—

"Keep is not very plentiful, in consequence of every one trying to mow as much as possible, as there is no stock of old hay left. We have not heard of so many casualties among stock as we expected from their low condition when turned to grass. Vetches and other kind of sheep food are in many places very bad, and many stocks will turn out of their coats in a sad plight, and the clip of wool will be very light and of inferior quality."

To what extent the agricultural reporter expected casualties to occur to the starved stock when turned to grass, does not appear. But from what I have seen and been told, by personal visits to the farms where stock was in low condition, I know that the casualties have been, and are now, most lamentable. And as to the loss upon wool, through starvation, and that at a time when the demand of the manufacturers for English wool increases as the supply of foreign wool increases, we have the direct testimony of the local agricultural reporter, that "many flocks will turn out (they have turned out) of their coats in a sad plight; and the clip of wool will be (it is) very light and of inferior quality."

A few weeks ago a petition from some farmers attending Salisbury market was presented to the House of Commons by Mr. Cobden. Seven of the farmers who signed it are stated to occupy upwards of 5000 acres of land. The petition shows the necessity of a change in those restrictive laws which strike the country, the people, the land, the very farm-yards with periodical famine. The petition has appeared in the LEAGUE already; but, as the present number of the LEAGUE will be put into the hands of some parties who may not have seen all the previous numbers, I take leave to reprint the petition. It comes from practical men, and illustrates and enforces the argument which I have been addressing—I may state it fairly—pointedly addressing to Mr. Herbert and Mr. Bennett, the representatives of monopoly and farm-yard famine in South Wilts.

"The humble Petition of the undersigned Farmers, frequenting the market at Salisbury, in the county of Wilts.

"Humbly sheweth,

"That, in the district in which your petitioners dwell, food and provender for cattle, now and for some months past, have been so scarce and expensive that the cost of maintaining stock during the present year has, in many instances, been greater than its actual value.

"That, owing to such scarcity and dearness of provender, cattle and stock are stinted in food, and thereby not only rendered liable to disease, but much diminished in value both as regards their flesh and their manure.

"That, whilst your honourable House has reduced the protective duties on the importation of cattle, and thus exposed your petitioners to foreign competition in that respect, no steps have been taken to enable your petitioners to feed and fatten their stock at the same cheap rate as the foreigner is enabled to do.

"Your petitioners, therefore, pray your honourable House at once to repeal the duties payable upon the importation of foreign beans and oats, and other articles consumed by cattle, and which said duties, owing to the present scarcity of provender, are now actually paid by your petitioners, and others similarly circumstanced, out of their own pockets."

I have marked some words in italic. They introduce an important branch of the subject which I have not yet touched upon—the non-production of manure for the re-production of crops whereby to grow corn and feed sheep and cattle this year.

These are some of the varied positions which the Free-Traders occupy to the be-puzzlement of the Hon. Sidney Herbert. He says he does not know where to find them—where to grapple with them—they take so many different positions. If the hon. gentleman would open his eyes upon the Wilton property, upon it alone; if he would open his eyes there, and inquire and judge for himself, he would see that the opponents of restrictive laws upon industry—the opponents of feudal injustice and impolicy—have grounds to occupy which as yet they have almost neglected.

Saying this, justice constrains me to say also, that as a gentleman Mr. Herbert has the local reputation of being open-hearted, open-handed, generous, and far above all selfishness. He is young, rich—very rich, talented, and ambitious of distinction. There is much to hope for in such a follower of Sir Robert Peel.

REVIEW.

Proceedings of the British Association at Cambridge.

SECTION F—STATISTICS.

The following paper, by Mr. G. S. Kenrick, on the Statistics of Merthyr Tydvil, appears to us so important that we have resolved to insert it in place of our usual reviews:—

"It is our duty, while we enjoy superior advantages of station or condition, to strive to do something for our less fortunate brethren. To do anything for them with effect we must make ourselves acquainted with them, with the circumstances by which they are surrounded, and the effects which these are calculated to produce on them, both morally and physically. With this view I have been led, however imperfectly, to make an inquiry into the statistics of Merthyr Tydvil—the condition of its inhabitants, its means of education, of religious instruction, and the result of these as seen in the manners and habits of the people.

"The mass of the population of Merthyr has been called into life and brought into this wild district by the establishment of large iron works belonging to Messrs. Crawshaw, Guest, Hill, and Thompson. The greater part of the people are supported by their daily labour at these works; and the remainder of the population consists of persons who supply them with food, clothing, furniture, beer, physic, law, and divinity. There are very few persons who reside in the black-looking village of Merthyr who are not either directly or indirectly interested in the iron works, in one of the modes mentioned above.

An Analysis of the Population of Merthyr during the spring of 1841 (exclusive of Coedcymmer, hamlet of Vayhor, Tall, and Cymon, and Forrest-hill).

Total Population	32,968
Houses	6,145	5½ persons to a house nearly.
Sleeping-rooms	10,835	Three persons to a room.
Children under three years of age	3,203
Children from three to twelve years	6,857	Age for education, 4-8th, or full one-fifth of the population.
Lodgers	6,140	One for each house, 5-3rds of the population.
English people	4,181	18 per cent. of the population.
Welsh	27,802	84 do. do.
Irish	985	3 do. do.
Persons who cannot speak English intelligibly	10,917
Children who go to day-schools, by report of their parents	1,272	Less than a fifth of those who ought to go.
Ditto by report of teachers	1,313
Pupils attending nineteen Sunday-schools at Dissenting chapels	4,581	Average attendance.
Ditto at Church Sunday-schools	350
Cause read	11,774
Can write	5,709
Persons among the labouring classes who have other books beside religious books	445
Do not go to a place of worship	11,739
Workmen occasionally intoxicated	2,587	Or a thirteenth of population.
Workmen who have houses being their own property	91
Lodging-houses	59
Children working and living with their parents	2,910
Females working	404
Churches 2, will contain Chapels, 26	15,182

"In proceeding to notice in detail the result of our census, we find, in the first place, that there are 5½ persons on an average to each house, which shows that there is more accommodation in this respect than the population to the east of the coal basin enjoys.

"The number of persons to each sleeping-room is three, being perhaps as little crowded as the generality of manufacturing towns. In some parts of the village there are houses, however, which contain far too many inmates, and where lodging-houses of a mean description are crowded with persons of different professions, including vagrants, gamblers, and men leading dissolute lives.

"In consequence of the number of unmarried men who come from Cardiganshire, Pembrokehire, and other adjoining counties, to take advantage of the high wages which are given at the iron works, the usual proportion of males to females is reversed in this parish, and the males much exceed the females; the former being in the ratio of 6 to 5 of the latter. This influx of single men from the surrounding country accounts for the great number of lodgers, viz., 6140, whom we find located in Merthyr, being one-fifth of the population, and amounting to one lodger for every house in the parish.

"It is surprising that a large village so near the boundary of an English county as Merthyr is, and having such frequent communication with it, should have so small a number of Saxons, as the English are called, among the population—only about 4000 out of a population of 33,000; and there are 11,000, or one-third, who cannot speak English intelligibly, and would not understand an English sermon. The consequence is, that the service at the chapels is generally conducted in Welsh.

"In all towns, whether large or small, there is a portion inhabited by persons in easy circumstances, which contrasts strongly with the district occupied by the poor; there is also a part where the decencies of life are generally observed, and another where these observances are not kept up: men will fix their abode and associate with those who resemble them in character and condition in life; aided to which, the effect of example is great in producing a level in moral attributes as well as in personal and domestic habits. It will be necessary, therefore, that we should visit all parts of the town, and give as faithful a picture as we can of the inhabitants—their wants, their temptations, their comforts or destitution, their virtues and their vices—that corresponding efforts may be made to encourage what is praiseworthy, and to remove what is injurious or vicious.

"It is remarkable how often crowded and uncomfortable dwellings, with unpaved and almost impassable streets, are inhabited by persons who appear to be degraded and demoralized by the unfavourable circumstances in which they are placed. We will begin with Dowlais, which does not captivate a stranger by its cleanliness or neatness, particularly in the back streets, and Longtown is one of the dirtiest streets in Dowlais. The houses consist of only one room on the ground floor, which is used for all purposes. In one of these houses were stowed ten human beings, viz., a man, his wife, and five children, with three grown-up lodgers; the beds were in a corner of the room separated from the other part by a curtain. The furniture in this street and Twyn of Wagan is of a miserable description: the people are very poor; very few of them attend a place of worship, and almost every house is visited by that scourge of the working classes—intemperance. Eighteen adjoining houses in this district contain 96 persons, and only 22 of these go to a place of worship. Two houses at the back of Bethanias-street consist of one small room each, to which there is no access except by walking up a deal plank to these miserable abodes. The one house is inhabited by nine persons, the other by seven. There is scarcely any furniture in these houses, and only one small bed at the corner of the room for all the family; the children must, therefore, be littered on the floor. In a house in an adjoining street there was little furniture, yet the house was neatly kept; but the poor woman complained that her husband was almost always drunk—that he went off on this errand a week ago and was not yet returned. Two of her children were dead; and she wished, for its own sake, the other was dead also. She seemed broken-hearted by the misconduct of her husband. These houses of one room each are said to belong to the Dowlais Company; the rent is about 1s. 6d. a week exclusive of coal.

"Adkins-row: people poor—dirty—drunken. At one house the woman said she had no Bible now; she had a valuable one some time ago, and lent it to a neighbour who pawned it for gin.

"Street No. 21. The habitations dirty and poor; there were twelve drunkards in one house, who were not at all ashamed to own it. Only two persons out of the thirteen who lived in this house went to a place of worship.

"Street No. 4. At one of these houses lives a pudler, getting 35s. a week; but he spends most of his money in drink, and his wife and five children are in a pitiable condition; she would have died for want of food during her last confinement, but for the charity of her neighbours.

"Pullythead.—A large proportion of the people are poor immoral and drunken, and not more than one-half of them attend a place of worship. One woman said four of her children under 12 years of age were working in the coal-pit, and she complained that poverty obliged the younger ones to go, at the cost of their health, because her husband was a drunkard.

"Before we leave Dowlais, and proceed to the lower part of the parish, we must make a few general observations. There are a number of houses about the Dowlais Iron Works occupied by 285 families, who mainly derive their support from those works, and we have noted their condition as follows:—

Families bearing the appearance of comfort	129
Ditto, poor	137
Ditto, miserably poor	11

Ten of these houses are used for the sale of beer, or one beer-house to 27 houses. This fact explains the cause of the poverty of the people, as one-third of the earnings of the workmen is devoted to the purchase of intoxicating drink. In two streets near this locality are 85 houses, and eight of them are used for the sale of malt liquor. These streets are filthy, the houses dirty and crowded, the inhabitants are addicted to drunkenness and immorality, and many of them never attend a place of worship. In passing through Dowlais on a Sunday morning, between seven and eight o'clock, without turning out of the main street, 62 drunken people were counted; several of them were sitting on the steps of the beer-shops waiting for the doors to be opened that they might renew the practices of the previous night.

"In proceeding to the houses in the neighbourhood of the Pendarran Iron Works there are three streets near to each other. Respecting the first we must remark, that the people appeared rather poor and dirty, and there was great complaint of drunkenness. Of the next we must report that the people seemed very poor, and intemperance existed in almost every house. In the third street the houses were poor and filthy, and there are several instances of great wretchedness and distress through intemperance. When the love of strong drink becomes prevalent it is not confined to the male population, but spreads to the females. In a house in this neighbourhood, and elsewhere in this parish, we saw five or six women, at eleven o'clock in the morning, drinking tea with rum in it. Where women follow this practice of taking spirits while their husbands are at work, their houses and families are untidy and neglected.

Unfortunately, a working man cannot be wasteful or extravagant without making others suffer besides himself. His family suffers in many ways, but not least in the children being taken at a very tender age to work underground, before they have gained sufficient strength to support the fatigue and exposure to which they are subjected. We believe that there are many children at Pendarran, whose fathers, being colliers, carry them on their backs into the colliery, where they remain all day, and some of these children are under five years of age. A boy of seven years of age was taken to work in the coal-pit by his father, and very soon a cold fixed in his limbs, and he has been for several months, and still continues, a great sufferer. No. 53, 22, 100.—Child caught cold by attending an air-door, and the lungs of these children are seriously affected. No. 19, 41, 45 bear similar testimony to the evils arising from this practice. At Twyn Rhodyn are 80 children of tender age who are at work, and there are several cases of ill health from this cause.

"Street No. 10, Cabin Twyld.—These are miserable huts, they lie low and are damp, filthy, and unhealthy; the people are ignorant and drunken. Guarawar.—The houses are ill-furnished and very dirty; and there is much drinking among the people.

"It is pleasant to turn from this dark catalogue to Street No. 9 and Llwynvigor, which were formerly remarkable for drunkenness. Persons in private houses had been selling beer without a license, when two sober families removed to this place, and there was speedily a reformation in the characters of their neighbours, many of whom are now respectable in conduct,

Now, the obvious remark on this passage is, what system of protection will "insure wheat at 4'15 a bushel," or 7s. 6d. a bushel? It is plain the present system will not do it, for wheat is now, and has for some time been, about 2s. a bushel less than the "insured" price. Neither did the late Corn Law—that of 1824—for under that law, in 1834, 1835, and 1836, wheat was less than 5s. a bushel. Nor was the previous law of 1815 more successful. But though the "system of protection" did not "insure" the promised price, it caused rents, tithes, &c., to be fixed according to that price, and it led farmers —amongst the rest the writer on whose advocacy of monopoly we are commenting—to calculate upon profit from small produce in the expectation of receiving the high “protection” price. What has been the consequence? Why, that from one end of the country to the other there is a cry of agricultural distress.

This is the so-called protectionist table:—

TABLE I.—PROTECTION.—WHEAT £15 PER LOAD.

Receipts.
50 acres of wheat, at 6 sacks per acre, deducting 1 for seed .. ..	£ 375
25 acres of barley (peas or beans in a similar proportion), 5 quarters per acre, deducting 1 sack for seed, 36s. per quarter .. ..	202
25 acres of oats, at 6 quarters per acre, deducting 1 sack for seed, half consumed on farm, the other half, deducting the 1 sack per acre, sold at 24s. per quarter .. ..	85
50 acres of upland grass or tares, feed hay and seed consumed at home .. ..	..
50 acres of turnips consumed ditto .. ..	..
Profit on 250 sheep, winter kept .. ..	120
Ditto on 100 ditto, summer ditto .. ..	30
Cows and pigs .. ..	50
Total receipts .. ..	862
Omitting pound fractions .. ..	716
Balance profit .. ..	£146

Expenditure.
2 threshers, 2 ploughmen, 1 shepherd, 1 odd man, at 12s. per week .. ..	£ 187
2 boys at 5s. per week .. ..	26
Dairywoman .. ..	12
Harvesting and hoeing .. ..	50
Thatching, hurdles, sacks, &c. .. ..	26
Women hay-making .. ..	5
Rates and tithes at 8s. per acre .. ..	80
Master's time and superintendence .. ..	40
Interest on capital (£1500), at 4 per cent. .. ..	60
Rent, 20s. per acre .. ..	200
Blacksmith, carpenter, and collar-maker .. ..	30
Omitting pound fractions .. ..	£716

If this is what the writer calls spirited farming, we should like to know what he would designate as ordinary farming. The land is assumed to be good, or what is termed “useful” land, for the rent and tithe together are at least 25s. an acre, and yet this “spirited” protectionist grows only twenty-four bushels of wheat to the acre, out of which he uses four bushels for seed!! Then on 200 acres of arable land he only employs a capital of £1500, which is one-fourth less than the lowest amount with which that extent of land can be advantageously farmed. Nor does he employ labour enough to make farming profitable: two men and a boy to each 100 acres of arable land (for the “shepherd” and “odd man” are of course fully engaged with the flock and stock) form but a scanty force for “farming with spirit.” That many farmers “drag on” in very much such a course of husbandry as that indicated by the above table we know, but that is only because they are yearly tenants, over-ridden by game, trammelled by restrictive stipulations, injured by hedgerows and timber, and, above all, hindered by rents calculated according to prices they do not obtain. Free Trade would at once relieve them from these evils, for the landlords desirous to maintain their rentals would offer to their tenants terms and tenures which would make their business a safe and a steady one.

But can any man who understands the productive powers of land seriously contemplate giving 25s. an acre as rent, and then growing only 24 bushels of wheat to the acre once in four years? And that by sowing four bushels to the acre? We do not hesitate to say that there is no land worth 25s. an acre which might not be made, by moderately good farming, to produce at least 32 bushels to the acre, and by spirited farming 40 bushels. Nor is more than two bushels of seed an acre necessary with any kind of management which deserves the name of farming. Here, then, we find that on the wheat crop, taking the most moderate estimate, a real farmer ought to save two and grow eight bushels an acre more—making a difference of 10 bushels—than this protectionist writer assumes to be the usual crop. And let it be observed that the same expense is incurred for ploughing, &c., and for rent, tithes, taxes, rates, &c., to grow the small as to grow the large crop: the difference, therefore, would be, supposing wheat to sell at 5s. a bushel, a clear gain of £125. This is just the sum which the writer, as will be seen from his so-called Free-Trade table, assumes will be lost on wheat by the abrogation of the Corn Laws.

We have confined our remarks to wheat, for the sake of simplicity in illustration; but the same thing applies to other grain, though not perhaps to quite the same extent; yet, by moderately good farming, much larger crops of barley and oats than those stated by the writer would be grown.

Next take the profit on the stock of a farm of 200 arable acres. The writer gives, as the protectionist profit of wintering 250 sheep at £120, something less than 10s. a head, and, under a Free Trade, he reduces that profit one-third, or to £80. On what conceivable ground the profit on sheep is to be reduced by reason of free trade in corn we cannot imagine. Assuming the sheep to be fed entirely from the produce of the farm, the profit must at all events remain the same, but in truth it would be increased from the greater demand for mutton which would arise from the better and steadier state of the markets in the trading districts, and the improved condition of the labouring classes generally. But, assuming the sheep to be fed to any extent on purchased corn, the lower prices of inferior grain, which would be one of the direct consequences of Free Trade, must at once increase the profit on sheep. Our own calculation is, that the profits on keeping stock of all kinds will be increased fully one-third by a free trade in corn, supposing no more stock to be kept than at present; but, in fact, much more will be kept. The monopolist writer's estimate of a profit of only £120 on wintering 250, shows the low style of farming into which he has been deluded by protection. Nor can his turnip crops have been very heavy. Mr. Pusey tells us, in his article on Lincolnshire farming, that on Lincoln-henth, originally a rabbit-warren, worth scarcely 2s. an acre, one acre of turnips will winter from ten to twelve large Lincoln sheep—double the number wintered by the monopolist. On land such as the writer mentions being, even under his system of farming, worth 25s. per acre, at all events seven sheep to an acre ought to be wintered. And if they are well wintered, independently of the profit on the sheep, a good crop of grain is insured from the manure. What the profits on the sheep may be will be shown by two instances which have this spring fallen within our own observation.

A farmer, last autumn, bought a lot of Leicester wether lambs, at 18s. a head, and having wintered them very well on corn and turnips, he sold them fat during the past spring at an average of 45s. a piece, having cut 8s. worth of wool from each, making together 53s. Now, if each sheep consumed 10s. worth of corn, which, at even the high price of oats last winter, is above the mark, there was a profit of 25s. a head.

Another farmer bought, in the autumn, a number of Southdown ewes at 21s. each, which lambed in February. He had just entered upon a farm thoroughly worked out by a preceding tenant, on which there were no turnips or other feed except some poor meadows; with the exception of a few acres of turnips purchased, and the meadows, ewes and lambs were fed entirely on corn, and both having become fat, are now weekly being slaughtered by the butcher, and each couple sells for 55s., the ewe having been shorn of 4s. worth of wool—together 69s. These sheep, therefore, allowing each couple to have consumed four bushels of oats at 12s., have returned a profit of 36s. each. Both these are instances of a good, but not very extraordinary, profit. But supposing the monopolist writer, instead of keeping his 250 sheep lingering through the winter, merely growing into a small profit of 5s. a head exclusive of their wool, had kept seven sheep to each acre of his 50 acres of turnip, or 350 sheep, and had made a profit of only 15s. by each sheep, instead of £120 profit on sheep wintered, he would have had an item of £262 10s. A free trade in corn would certainly increase the profit 5s. a head, or £47 10s.; so that his profit on wintered sheep in the Free-Trade table should have been £350 in the place of £200. The same kind of calculations are applicable to cattle and pigs, on which the profit entered in the first table is too small; and it would assuredly increase, not diminish, on the abolition of the Corn Laws.

We invite the attention of farmers to these remarks, and ask them to apply them to their own transactions, and in so doing we are satisfied they will see that they have everything to hope and nothing to fear from free trade in corn. We have carefully confined our estimates to such crops and management as would be perfectly within the means of a tenant farming 200 acres of arable land with a capital of £1500, assuming him to be a person of skill and intelligence, and to have a rational lease, and no game preserve on his farm. But by high farming, that is with a capital of from £12 to £15 per acre, the advantages would be much more decided. More stock highly fed would so increase the fertility of the soil, that year by year larger and larger crops of corn might be grown at a proportionably diminished cost. On many soils wheat, the most money-making crop, might be grown every other year, if the farmer could always purchase cheaply his required quantity of oats, pulse, Indian corn, &c.; and this will be largely done on clay land as soon as the incubus of “protection” has been removed from agriculture.

WORKING OF THE AGRICULTURAL MIND.

It is plain that the agricultural mind is just now, to use a provincial phrase, “all of a work,” and, like the beer-barrel under fermentation, though discharging occasionally some feculent and offensive matter, is undoubtedly undergoing a refining and wholesome change. This is exactly illustrated by the occurrences at the meeting of the West Suffolk Agricultural Association, lately held at Bury St. Edmund's. And it also bears out the accuracy of Mr. Villiers's remark—that, whenever the farmers assemble without the landed grandees, useful practical remarks are made, which, whether so intended or not by the speakers, plainly show the uselessness or the evils of protection. In the present instance it was clear the majority present still cling to the Corn Laws, and therefore, if any part of the proceedings which met with their approval make against monopoly, it has all the value of unwilling testimony. The first topic introduced worth noticing was that of the value of Australian corn as seed, of which Mr. Bevan said:—

“That a few weeks ago one of his neighbours said to him, ‘I think there is more to be done in farming, by the introduction of foreign seed corn (hisses), than by any of the new fangled methods we have heard of for promoting agriculture.’ This was said by a very excellent man, known to a great many of them—Mr. Thomas Fison, of Birmingham. (Hisses.) The subject was quite new to him (Mr. Bevan), but he was very willing to listen to it, as to anything which promised good to himself and his neighbours; and he asked Mr. Fison to state more particulars. Mr. Fison told him that many years ago his father introduced Moldavian barley into this country, and when it was first tried by him he grew 17 coombs per acre.”

We know not wherefore the monopolists should have received the name of Mr. Fison with disapprobation, except that so long since as 1836 he gave before the committee of that year most distinct evidence against the Corn Laws, on the ground that they did not benefit farmers. He said:—

“As a gardener, he knew from experience, that, when flower seeds were brought fresh from a foreign country, the flowers showed better colours and were of finer growth than those which we had had several years in this country, and had grown from seeds raised in our own hothouses. The climate which was best adapted to any particular vegetable produced better seed, from which the best result would be produced. To show this he had brought with him that day the samples of Australian wheat which had been landed about the room. They might be surprised to hear that, even within a fortnight, that wheat had produced 59s., 60s., 61s., and 62s. per quarter. He did not think any wheat in this country could grow so high a price, and it appeared to him that, if seed obtained from a better climate would grow more strongly and produce a better result than their own native seed, they could not do better than join together in obtaining a cargo of Australian wheat, to be landed at Ipswich, and to be distributed throughout the whole of this country. (Cries of ‘No, no.’) He thought it highly necessary at first to try it in a very small way.”

And Mr. Bevan, who, we believe, is a country banker, proceeded in this way to expatiate on the advantages of foreign seed corn, not fully comprehending the extreme sensitiveness of the agricultural mind. This called up Mr. Overman, who, in the true style of the “Central Protection Society,” of which he is one of the lesser lights, thus denounced the luckless Mr. Bevan:—

“He would attempt to find an antidote for the poison which he thought that gentleman was anxious to instil into many of their minds.”

He then said:—

“He thought he could prove that an intentional deception had been practised on Mr. Bevan, and that he had allowed his kind feelings to be misled thereby. He had first stated to them that when Moldavian barley was first introduced 17 coombs per acre were grown. He did not doubt this at all, but, at the same time, he would ask what proof Mr. Bevan had that it came from Moldavia? They all knew the Spalding wheat; did it take its origin from Spalding, in Lincolnshire, or from a person of that name? Did the Chevalier barley come from Chevallier, or was it introduced by a doctor of the name of Chevallier? They had heard of the large amount produced by Moldavian barley, but he put it to the company whether they had ever seen 17 coombs produced as the general produce of a farm? He had seen 17 coombs grown on one acre; but he never saw it on 30, or 40, or 50 acres.”

Now, this really went to prove the reverse of what this rampant monopolist intended to prove, for it showed that carefully selected seed was of great importance, and that by high cultivation on one acre a vast crop could be grown; and, the question occurs, why not cultivate thirty, or forty, or fifty acres in the same way? He then said:—

“There was another point which he wished to press upon the minds of those who heard him: they saw in what an insidious way foreign corn was to be introduced into this country. It was to be admitted for seed; but if was nothing to them what it was admitted for, so long as it was admitted. It would be giving an opportunity for the Legislature to throw this sort of language at them—when the farmers told their grievances, they would be stopped by the question, 'Do you not do it yourselves?' He did not expect that Mr. Bevan, as the first to introduce subjects of discussion, would have introduced the subject of bringing in foreign grain. It was a fundamental rule of the society that no one should start politics, and when they came to the subject of foreign grain, he would say that it ought not to be introduced."

Now, it is clearly the monopolist, not the agricultural mind that is thus sensitive; for a more decided anti-agricultural speech it has never been our lot to read. The chairman and Mr. Bevan cried peccavimus, and repeated the monopolist creed with the due devotion of suspected heretics to monopoly. Afterwards, Mr. Gedney said:—

"When a good tenant got land and farmed it well, if he had not got a lease, some shabby fellow in the neighbourhood (and they were not scarce) would go and offer for it probably more rent, and the landlord would say to the tenant, 'Bless my heart, I must have more rent of you, for the land is worth more.' 'Very true,' the tenant would say, 'it is worth more, because I made it so.' (Cheers.) But the secret of the whole matter was, that property was burdened too much, and the temptation to get higher rents was too great for many to cut asunder: many a supposed landlord must say to himself, 'I must have money, my property is mortgaged—it is no use being delicate about it—money I want, and money I must have;' and perhaps there would be a lawyer in the receipt of the rents. (Cheers.)"

Here the farmers had got upon topics about which they knew something, and they cheered vociferously. He then referred to Mr. Bevan's speech:—

"He very much admired his speech, because there was a vast deal of nice comfort in it. He bought foreign corn for seed and paid 20s. duty, but shortly we shall have it free both for seed and bread. Really to him that was delightful! (Cheers.) And now for the Suffolk farmers. He would tell them how he was going to let farms, so that they might understand how to hire theirs. He meant to let his farms (he called them his, though he was only an agent) to men of capital to begin with (cheers); and he meant to have the poor employed (cheers); and he meant also to give the tenant means to employ his capital. (Loud cheers.) He would not let the land unless he could give security to the tenant farming it. (Cheers.) He had not come yet to the idea that a corn-rent was the best rent—he was rather inclined to have a valuation of the capability of the soil, valuing the tenant in at a fair rental according to the quality of the land, and they would find little difficulty; but he would have security for both parties."

There is no doubt that fair money-rents might easily be fixed if the trade in corn was free; but till then the farmer may rightfully demand of his landlord a corn-rent.

"Mr. Murrell said, as to importing Australian wheat for seed, he would observe that he generally put in eighty acres, at two bushels per acre; this was more than his labourers eat. Now, if he imported for seed, and others did the same, it would do a vast deal of harm to the country."

This is sadly erroneous. Suppose Mr. Murrell and others bought better or cheaper corn from abroad to sow, they must plainly be gainers by all the difference in quality or price. But the monopolist mind starts at shadows, or more unreal fancies, to the injury of the monopolist pocket.

Again, Mr. Overman proceeded to eulogize the virtues of malt for feeding cattle, which he had not tried, and to question the scientific analyses of Playfair and Liebig! This reminds us of an anecdote told of Robert Hall, who, hearing a gentleman questioning the critical acumen of one of the old divines, called him "a house on the wing of an archangel." Mr. Overman then said:—

"Lord Howick told them to use Egyptian corn and maize, but how could they know that these were not wrong, or that they alone would produce benefit? They might give beasts 20lbs. of oil-cake, and they would eat it, but they would not do without hay, just as folks must eat potatoes with meat, and salt with bread."

This is sheer stupidity or worse, for who ever said Egyptian corn, or maize, or oil-cake was to be given alone? Mr. R. B. Harvey, on the subject of seed corn, said:—

"Now, he fancied they had at home the opportunity of improving their own seed corn, and they should endeavour to improve it as much as they possibly could before they went to a distant country for the article. He had paid considerable attention to this point, and he had always found that 'like produces like'—that what applied to animals applied also to corn—a large animal produced a large animal, and fine seed produces fine corn. He thought the Spalding and the Ryburgh wheat and the Chevallier barley were found very profitable, three or four years after their introduction, because the stock from which they were produced had had something like a garden culture, and the berries were larger. He could state from his own experience, that if they went to a field of Swede turnips, and found one weighing ten pounds and another five pounds (and gathered the seed of each separately and sowed it, the result would be that there would be larger roots from the seed of the ten-pound turnip than from the five-pound one. He thought that, if farmers, instead of going to Australia for seed corn, allowed a small quantity of land, say an acre, for raising it themselves, giving a thin seed, sowing plenty of manure, and paying attention to it, they would find the berries larger and more productive."

Now, this is like telling a man to make his own shoes, lothes, and furniture, when he could get them cheaper and better from the shoemaker, the tailor, or the cabinet-maker. One would not have supposed that such ignorance lurked even in the agricultural districts of Suffolk. If "large berries" produced by garden cultivation be good for seed, why should not "large berries" produced by warmth of climate be as good or better? The best speech of the evening was that of Mr. F. Denton, who, after speaking sensibly on draining and some other matters, said:—

"He confessed he had yet to be convinced that it would be wise for us to purchase colonial corn for the purpose of encouraging the emigration of our labourers, feeling convinced, after 35 years' experience, that, under a judicious management of their estates by the landlords, an abundance of employment would be found for all the labourers that could be produced for many many years to come. By dividing their best lands into occupations of from 100 to 200 acres; their second best from 200 to 300 acres; their third quality from 300 to 500 acres; and their inferior lands from 500 to 1000 acres; and by letting such farms, not to the men who would give the most money for them, but to tenants judiciously chosen for ability, in point of capital, intellect, industry, and disposition to improve both the landlords' and their own property, at equitably adjusted rents, on leases of not less than sixteen years' duration; and at the expiration of twelve years, if the landlord and tenant suited each other, not letting the tenant run his farm out in the last four years in uncertainty, but then giving him an extension of his term, when it would rarely be found that he would be unwilling to pay an increased rent for the landlord's property, improved by his own skill, capital, and industry, through having had security for the outlay thereon; by such management as this, and by taking up the poor lands of this country, he did not hesitate to say that abundant employment might be found for our increasing population. (Applause.) Let the poor pastures be converted into arable, and the waste lands be brought into cultivation, of both of which thousands of acres still remained unprofitable to landlords, tenants, and labourers; and let emigration be only adopted as a last resource. (Cheers.)"

But such management is impossible so long as the Corn Law lasts. Mr. Denton then referred to game, saying:—

"But there was another subject to which he must beg leave to allude—a subject of great grief and of great discouragement to the agriculturists of this country—the excessive preservation of game—(loud cheering)—than which, he firmly believed, taking it in all its bearings, a greater evil could not afflict an agricultural country like this. (Renewed cheers.) It was alike injurious to landlord, tenant, and labourer: to the landlord, by the destruction of his growing timber; to the tenant, by the destruction of his crops, all of which he had covenanted to receive in return for the employment of his skill, capital, and industry; and to the labourer, by abridging the means of the tenant to employ him, and, worse than all, by the demoralization of his character. (Great applause.) He spoke from the experience of 35 years spent in the neighbourhood of game preserves, and would say that on that land one half the amount of the rent which had been paid had been sacrificed to game. (Hear, hear, and great cheering.)"

Now, barring Mr. Overman's absurdities, and he said nothing of Canada corn bills and tariffs, this meeting shows that the agricultural mind is working itself out of the bewilderment in which the monopolists and political tricksters have involved it. Heaven send it a good deliverance, and that speedily!

LAUDING THE LABOURERS.

At the East Sussex Agricultural Association there was a large muster of lords, squires, and clergymen, to distribute amongst the labourers who had been recommended certain prizes for long service and so forth; and also to adjudge other rewards to the best shearers of sheep. Shearing is undoubtedly an operation in which both land and title owners must have taken much interest. The following is the local report of the meeting:—

"By about one o'clock, at which period the Earl of Chichester, accompanied by his noble guest the Duke of Richmond, had returned, the ground presented a very animated appearance, for, in addition to the large party of gentlemen, clergy, and agriculturists who had congregated, the scene was graced with the presence of the Countess of Chichester, accompanied by the youthful Lord Pelham and his sister, while the ladies of the Rev. C. Hutchinson and the Rev. E. B. Ellman were also present. Amongst the members and visitors present upon the ground we observed the Hon. Viscount Gage, the Hon. General Trevor, Sir Henry Shilliner, Bart.; the Rev. C. D. Charlton, G. P. Crofts, W. De St. Croix, W. Courthope, E. B. Ellman, G. Hall, C. Hutchinson, H. Proun, J. C. Russell, G. Shilliner, G. Shilliner, jun., J. Sampson, W. B. Stavelay, R. W. Blencowe, Esq., H. Blackman, Esq., F. Bar-chard, Esq., Walter Burrell, Esq., John Ellman, Esq., J. Fuller, Esq., J. Hoper, Esq., W. C. Mabbott, Esq., T. Haire, Esq., M.D., George Molineux, Esq., W. Nash, Esq., J. Smith, Esq., R. Trotter, Esq., Messrs. G. Baker, C. Beard, S. Beard, G. Bacon, — Berry, E. Cane, W. Catt, H. Catt, T. Cosham, Geo. Ellman, H. Ellman, G. Farncomb, — Gorrings (Sel-meston), Stephen Grantham, — Grantham, jun., H. Hart, J. King, T. Knight, S. Lowdell, — Peachey, — Rogers, C. Saxby, W. Stace, — Tompsett, — Tompsett, jun., J. S. Turner, W. Verrall, — Withers, — Wood-man, Rowland Wood, &c. &c. The sheep selected for the occasion were from the flock of Mr. Thomas Ellman, and it was a matter of general remark, that, considering the very unfavourable season, they were in very good condition. There were sixteen competitors, and the judges appointed were Messrs. A. Denman, J. S. Turner, and R. Woodman."

Sundry prizes from 5s. to £3 were then awarded to the shearers, and the party went to dinner. The grand feature of the affair was that the labourers who had been rewarded were invited to dine with the duke, lords, and squires; and the gratitude they ought to feel for such an honour formed the staple of the after-dinner speeches of the grandees. We have often said that farmers look upon most cattle shows and such exhibitions as mere landlords' playthings; but these labourer-rewarding meetings betray much ignorance and cant.

We do not deny that it might be useful for the rural classes of all grades, from the landed magnate to the labourer, to meet together, could they do so on anything like common ground; but to render the inviting a few labourers to an agricultural feast the theme of such self-glorification as that adopted in Sussex is worse than useless.

The Chairman, Lord Chichester, in presenting the premiums in form to the labourers, used the following preachment:—

"You observe that, amongst other subjects of reward, one of the most prominent—the first indeed in order—is given to those who have brought up the largest family in habits of industry, and without parochial relief. That is one of those premiums which we have great difficulty in awarding according to the real merits of the candidate, but I am bound to say that I believe it has very seldom happened that that reward has been received by an undeserving man; and I can confidently say this, that it has been very often received by most deserving, most honest, most admirable men. I do think, then, that our society would have done no small good if it had only been the means of telling those of our most excellent countrymen that they are deserving of encouragement, and, at the same time, of calling upon their neighbours to look up to them as examples. I should be detaining you a great deal too long if I was to go through the different classes of premiums, and make similar remarks upon them, but the same object runs through them all,—that of endeavouring to encourage the labourers to be industrious workmen, to be faithful and honest servants, and, above all, to be good and Christian men. It would be very presumptuous in us if we were to reward you for good conduct as such; but what we do say is this, that we do not think a man can be a good man, or a valuable member of society, unless he is a consistent servant of God; and we make it a test—a condition of all our premiums—not only of those for long service, but those for skill in husbandry—we make it a condition that each competitor shall produce a certificate of regular attendance at some place of worship. Now, my friends, you are all aware that, with the premiums you receive, are given to you printed cards, in which are your names and the subject of the premiums, put in an oak frame, in order that you may keep it as a means of instructing and encouraging the younger members of your families—those of you who are parents, at least—and that you may thus hand down to your children and to your grandchildren the record of your own industry; and I hope I may add, without any presumption on the part of the shareholders, of handing down also some grateful recollection of your masters and friends, who have felt it their duty to present it to you. My friends, I believe that many circumstances may arise in the course of the lives of some of the younger part of you, when it may be of great use to produce this kind of certificate of good conduct."

This is a sad mixture of twaddle and cant. The certificate "in the oak frame" seems to be an idea emanating from the mind of aristocratic, which often deems a bauble or a blue ribbon a sufficient compensation for surrendering the reputation of a lifetime. As motives to good conduct in labourers such things are ludicrous. Of course the inflated Duke of Richmond came in for his share of fulsome panegyric. It would have been as uncivil to have deprived him of his dose of wine as of his dose of adulation. The Chairman, in proposing his health, said:—

"I think that these associations, and the districts over which they extend, are more deeply indebted to him than to any man living. We have followed his example, perhaps I ought to say—at least he would tell me I ought to say—the example of the kindred association over which he presides in the west of Sussex,—we have followed the example of that society in many respects, especially in inviting the successful labourers to dine with us, as on this occasion. My noble friend first pointed out that plan for our adoption, and I, for one, have never regretted the experiment. If any of you had been at Goodwood, and had seen their meetings there, which are held like our own, and one of which takes place next week,—if you had seen that meeting as I have, you would have understood why the farmers and the labourers, why, indeed, all classes respect and esteem my noble friend as they do."

There was nothing here said about the low wages and cold water, which came out at the duke's meeting some months since. In returning thanks the duke showed unconsciously, no doubt, how the grandees look at themselves as the centre of the system, to whom and for whom all must bow and work.

"I ask you, then, whether as an Englishman, and as one who feels deeply interested in the welfare of his country, may I not be convinced of the great importance of the labouring classes? Gentlemen, we may have men ourselves, men who, for the sake of weekly wages, do their duty to us, but I ask you whether, when we had men who did it for love, whether we were not much better served? I say to you, then, that the farmers of West Sussex do show a good example when they ask the meritorious labourers to meet them at their festival, but I claim no other credit on that account than having been chairman of the committee which carried out that resolution. For the last seven or eight years, I have every year had the satisfaction of meeting, in West Sussex, at their dinner, nearly 100 of the labouring classes, to whom we annually give premiums. I say—to their credit be it spoken—that on not one occasion have they ever disgraced themselves after dining there. I know that they would not; I know that we had the men there who had gained the premiums; that they would feel grateful to those who gave them; and that they would know that they could not show their gratitude better than by showing they were worthy of receiving them. I will not trouble you with saying more than that I feel it to be my duty as the Lord Lieutenant of this county to attend as many of the meetings for the reward of the meritorious labourers as I possibly can do."

In giving the toast of the "Bishop and Clergy" the Chairman said:—

"I can assure you all that, without the cordial support we have received from the clergy, it would have been quite impossible for this system of giving premiums to go on. We depend very much upon them for assisting the employers of the labourers to look out the most deserving men, and, in fact, the farmers here present will confirm my assertion, that the most laborious part of the duty in preparing these certificates usually falls on the clergy."

Now, it implies no disrespect to the clergy to say, that there are no persons less fit to decide on the merits of rural labourers, or who are so likely to be misled by favouritism. They have usually little personal knowledge of them; and the most plausible person who caps the parson and goes to church will be in their eyes the most moral and deserving farm-servant. Something of this sort is shadowed forth by the Rev. Mr. Hutchinson, who called on the clergy to contribute to the association, because it "strengthened the hands of the clergy." He said:—

"They surely cannot consider the benefits of this association, and how it strengthens the hands of the clergy; for I agree with Lord Chichester, that this association is not altogether and entirely formed with the view of improving the mechanical skill of the husbandman, but also to raise and ennoble his religious feelings, to give him a higher moral character, and thus to elevate him in the social scale; and I do say that the characteristics of this association do lend a powerful aid to all the clergy in effecting these great objects. There is one thing in the association which gives the clergy great satisfaction, which is, that it looks very much in distributing rewards to the moral conduct of the labourer. It affords a practical commentary on those phrases of Scripture, that 'the race is not always to the strong, nor the battle to the swift;' for we know here that, however skilful a man may be either in using the plough, or in shearing, or in attending the sheep, or in any other thing, yet, unless he brings a certificate of his moral conduct, he will not even be allowed to stand a chance of the prize."

Now, we yield to none in our desire for the promotion of morality and religion amongst the farm-labourers; but if the sheepshearer or other competitor for a prize for rural skill must bring a certificate of his moral conduct from the parson of his parish, it ceases altogether to be a question of skill: it becomes a mere bit of clerical and squirearchical patronage; and this, in truth, is the light in which the labourers regard these things. Lord Gage said:—

"After what has been said to our good and industrious friends at the middle table, I will only add one word more of advice to them. A good deal has been said of moral conduct being its own reward, and we are all well aware that in the end it is so, but still we are all mortal and human, and, somehow or other, we like the world to know our good qualities; and it is very hard that a man should work and toil all his life for the public good, and that nobody should take any notice of it."

Gentlemen, they feel with pleasure, the notice of their superiors by their superiors. I mean those placed above them by the accident of fortune, and by nothing else—but they look up to you, gentlemen, and they naturally like to see that you regard their conduct, and take notice of it when good; and, though the value of these premiums may be trifling, still, however trifling they may be, they are rendered of ten times the value to them, because they are a proof that they, too, are not disregarded."

And he ended with this reference to the only true political friends the industrious agriculturists ever had, the Leaguers:—

"And I hope every body will induce their friends to support this institution, that we may have more prizes and larger ones, and extend their benefits over a wider range of this county. Let it spread like wild fire over the county, and bring all classes together; and then, indeed, we shall be able to make a head against those enemies who are now endeavouring to separate us."

In other words, his lordship called on the labourers and farmers to support such associations, to keep down wages and keep up rents!

And, after all, we suspect their prizes did not produce any very superior show of work, for Mr. Denman, one of the judges, on being appealed by the chairman as to the quality of the work, gave this qualified answer:—

"Readily admitting the improvement that has decidedly taken place, I dare say many present have seen better shearing than that of to-day. I beg, however, in saying this, that I may not be misunderstood: I do not, by this remark, mean to imply that there is the less credit due to the competitors; under all the circumstances, they have done their work most creditably; but I know I shall be borne out in saying that the sheep have shorn very badly, which is to be attributed to the peculiar effect of the season, &c.—in fact, to the wool not being sufficiently 'up,' nor presenting 'ground' to work upon."

Mr. Morris, one of the judges of ploughing, was also appealed to by the chairman, and he, like a 'cautious man,' gave the following conditional response:—

"Mr. Morris thought that a great deal depended upon the land. If they went upon light land, a certain description of ploughmen would, he thought, carry away prizes, who would fail in doing so on heavy land; but ploughing, generally speaking, had certainly been improved."

Success at these matches is a very uncertain test of the mode in which a farm-servant performs his work. The worst ploughman, and worst manager of his horses, we ever had in our service, was a young man who had been eminently successful at several ploughing-matches. The truth is, ploughing on bits of selected ground may be done well enough by men who are utterly ineffective when put upon land of a different or more difficult kind.

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

WHEAT SOWING.

The stalks of wheat which our correspondent has sent to us with the following note fully bear out his description. The straw is very large, of great length, and remarkably strong. The ear is also of great size, and well formed. Thin sowing of wheat is unquestionably advantageous, but it is most important that such sowing should be very regular. Indeed dibbling or planting wheat seems to be by far the most effective means of saving seed and ensuring an even plant; and the best mode of dibbling is by means of a machine for that purpose which delivers into each hole the exact number of seeds required. It at the same time presses the land, which is invariably advantageous to the wheat crop.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

1, Grove-villas, Camberwell-grove, June 21.

SIR,—Three days since, I was in company with several highly respectable and intelligent farmers at Royston, in Cambridgeshire; and in the course of conversation we discussed the question as to the saving of seed which might be effected in the present mode of sowing wheat; and it was generally agreed that a lesser quantity might be beneficially used than that which it has hitherto been the custom to sow, and, as an illustration of what might be done, I was informed that Mr. Thomas Sutton, of Bas-singbourne, near Royston, had sown a small field of wheat with somewhat more than a peck of seed to the acre, and that the present appearance of the plants was very promising.

Wishing to ascertain the facts of the case, I went the following day accompanied by a friend, who holds a farm in the same parish in which Mr. Sutton resides, and asked permission of the latter to see his field, with which he at once complied, and accompanied us to the same. The report I had heard was fully borne out, and the general appearance of the crop was superior to anything in the surrounding district. Mr. Sutton informed me that the seed was sown during the last week in SEPTEMBER, being dibbled in squares of seven inches. The size of the field is 1 acre 3 rods, and the total quantity of seed used was 18½ pints. I herewith send you some of the stalks as a sample, in order that you may judge of its present appearance.

Knowing full well the interest you take in all matters relative to the improvement of agriculture, I take the liberty of addressing this note to you, hoping that its contents may prove of some little service in the cause you have at heart.

I am, Sir, yours truly,

WM. CLARK.

A FREE-TRADER'S FARM.

The following letter from a correspondent, gives his impressions on inspecting the admirably cultivated farm of that intelligent Free-Trader, Mr. C. H. Lattimore. We can bear testimony to the strict accuracy of the description:—

"To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

"SIR,—Much and frequent discussion arises in this neighbourhood as to the relative merits of the farming of those who still cling to the 'dear falsehold' of protection, and those, on the other hand, who have unlearned the huge impostor, and are devoting their energies to its entire destruction. Being of the latter class myself, I do not pretend to hold the balance with strict impartiality, but I will pledge myself to the truth of the following statement:—I went the other day over a farm of 272 acres, of which 61 acres consist of wheat, which I found to be universally good; 63 acres of barley in a most forward and promising condition; 23 of oats, 7 of peas, and 5 of lucerne, all excellent—indeed I will venture to say, that of the lucerne there will be two loads to an acre; there are 26 acres of clover, 20 of grass, and 11 of tares—48 acres lying fallow. The trees, which are exceedingly clean and good—none better—are now being eaten off by sheep in a high state of feeding. The entire farm is deserving of the inspection and of the graphic pen of 'One who has Whistled at the Plough.' It has been wrought up to this state of perfection by judicious outlay and experienced skill. Originally it was of the worst quality of land imaginable, and was let 35 years ago for 8s. an acre. Where the land was hottest and most gravelly, the present farmer has so clayed, chalked, and subsoiled it that you may easily run a common walking-stick a foot into the ground! I challenge any protectionist farmer in this neighbourhood, nay, in the county itself, to produce a parallel case. The landlord (and I mention him with pride) is Viscount Melbourne; the tenant-farmer your old friend Charles Lattimore."

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"AN OLD FARMER,

AND AN OLD ENEMY OF THE CORN LAWS.

A NOTE ON THE GAME EDICT.

The following letter has been addressed to us upon the subject of the Kinnel Park circular we published last week, and our comments thereon:—

"To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

Liverpool, June 23.

"SIR,—In your paper of the 21st appears a copy of what is termed a 'circular,' addressed by Mr. J. Murray, of Kinnel Park, to a tenant upon the estate of Lord Dinorben, and to which are appended some very severe strictures upon Mr. Murray, Lord Dinorben, and the system of game-preserving. I quite concur in your condemnation of the game laws; but, having the pleasure of knowing Mr. Murray, I must say that he is the last person to whom your censure, and the very indelicate and improper epithets you have used, will apply. Without knowing anything of the circumstances which called forth the 'circular,' I think it is just possible that Lord Dinorben's arrangements with his tenants may entitle him to require the preservation of game upon their farms, for he is well-known as a most liberal landlord—at all events you appear to have judged upon a one-sided story. Mr. Murray is a gentleman of the highest character, is greatly esteemed for his kind and considerate conduct, and is utterly incapable of any harsh or unjust proceeding. The writer of the article in question is evidently as misinformed on this head as he is regarding the topography of Kinnel Park."

"I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

"SAMUEL TOMKINSON."

We received no information with the circular, and our remarks were founded solely on that which appeared upon its face. We have no reason to suppose that Lord Dinorben is better or worse than other game-preserving landlords, or that Mr. Murray, his agent, is not all that our correspondent states; but the vice is in the system which has insensibly led landlords, who are said to be "liberal," and agents, who are deemed "considerate," to issue such edicts as that we published. For the sake of landlords, tenants, and the rural community at large we expose and denounce that system, which, next to the Corn Laws and in connexion with the Corn Laws, has driven men of education, enterprise, and capital from the pursuit of agriculture. At this moment we know many men who would give at least as much rent as is asked for farms, which would suit them in every respect, could they be free from the nuisance of game-preservers. In one respect we bow to our correspondent's correction. North Wales has the happiness of being the locality in which this circular was issued. Happy the farmers who are subject to such paternal feudalism!!

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

Moone Mills, Ballitore, June 23.

SIR,—I could scarcely believe my eyes, when, on looking over an old Mark-lane Express, dated October 7, 1839, I met the enclosed moreau, which I instantly cut out, to send to you. It settles in a few words the whole matter.

Respectfully, your friend,

EDENKERR SHACKLETON.

"Now, what every calm and thinking man must own to be the greatest fault at the present day in the English agriculturist, is looking to and trusting to Government rather than each man to his own brains. We would assure our brethren of the plough that it is not in the power of any Government, be it Conservative or be it Radical, to bolster up the state of agriculture. A wise and good Government will not enact laws prejudicial to any part of the community, nor will it seek to break down the safeguards which our forefathers have built up; but they may be assured that it is not forcing wheat to be sold at a sovereign the bushel, or meat at 5s. per pound, that will ever make the agriculture of the country prosperous, or the farmer rich. Look at Manchester. Is it by the manufacturer selling his prints at a sovereign per yard that enormous fortunes have been amassed? No; it is the greatest quantity produced at the cheapest rate that will ever make a prosperous trade. If wheat is low in price, the farmer must bestir himself. Instead of sitting whole evenings (as many an English farmer does) soaking over a drop of cider or a little home-brewed, while he grumbles and spells the columns of an old newspaper, and abuses the Parliament for the 'great cry and little wool,' in the way of helping 'agricultural distress,' let him toss aside the speeches of our would-be patriots, and let him to his fields, and see if all be right there. Let him remember that, if he can but grow one or two quarters more per acre, he will be in a better position, even with the low price, than he was before."—Quarterly Journal of Agriculture.

To the Editor of the LEAGUE.

DEAR SIR,—In your paper of June 7, "An Old Farmer" lays down certain propositions with respect to manuring, and among others, that "No animal or vegetable substance, after it has been petrifaction or otherwise chemically changed, is any longer capable of supporting either plants or animals, and therefore it is no longer a manure." Will he or any other correspondent explain how it is, that immediately after you manure with wind ashes, which I take to be charred or a vegetable substance chemically changed, you have a growth of clover?

I ask because this fact appears to contradict his theory; and also for information as a very YOUNG FARMER.

LOUGHBOROUGH.

(From a Correspondent.)

The members of the Loughborough Agricultural Association have lately held quarterly meetings, at which some particular subject connected with the agricultural interest has been discussed. One of these quarterly meetings was held on Thursday, the 19th instant, when the discussion was "On the best and cheapest method of harvesting Hay and Corn." Amongst those who took part in the discussion was Mr. Kirby, a good practical farmer, of North Leicestershire. He recommended that wheat should be mowed, and, after pointing out the advantages of his plan, glanced at its disadvantages. One of these was that it was detrimental to sportsmen, there being no stubble for the game to shelter in. Mr. Kirby added, "If I was situated as some farmers are, I would ask my landlord to allow me to mow my wheat on that account. It keeps off things I would rather not see on." This remark was received with cheers. S. B. Wilde, Esq., vice-president of the association, who presided on this occasion, also recommended that wheat should be mowed, adding, "though it does spoil a little sport; but I sincerely think no sport should interfere with the interests of the country, and I would throw my gun aside rather than let it."

Is there not a change taking place in this part of the country which might be turned to good account?

MOROCCO WHEAT.—At a recent meeting of the council of the Royal Agricultural Society, Sir Arthur de Capell Brooke, Bart., of Oakley-hall, near Kettering, presented to the society a supply of Barbary wheat, grown fourteen years ago in Morocco, and brought by himself from that part of Africa. The cultivation of it on his return to England has been tried by his tenants in Northamptonshire, but whether owing to the unsuitableness of the soil, or an unfavourable season, it came to nothing. Thinking that some portion of the wheat might still be found good, and that on further trial its cultivation might be attended with better success, he took the opportunity of laying it before the council accordingly. Sir Arthur stated that the attention of travellers had often been attracted to the "Matamores," or granaries of Morocco, on account of their simplicity and efficacy, being merely pits dug in the ground and lined with straw at the sides and bottom; and that in these receptacles, owing to the nature of the soil and the dryness of the climate, grain was preserved uninjured for many years.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, June 28, 1845.

In another part of our paper will be found an abstract of the proceedings of a meeting at Wheat-hamstead, in Hertfordshire, held, among other objects, for the purpose of distributing 80 beds to the most distressed and deserving families of agricultural labourers in that locality. The condition of Hertfordshire, so far from being worse than that of the other agricultural counties, is rather above the average, and yet, in the limited district for which the meeting was held, it was found that 200 claimants presented themselves to compete for these beds, and that the shades of difference in their misery, as well as the shades of difference in their merit, were so slight as to render the task of selection a matter of the most painful difficulty. Here, then, is the result of agricultural protection after an existence of 30 years. The English labourer is ground down to such a state of social wretchedness that a bed is sought for as a luxury in eager and anxious competition. No wonder that the monopolists should have resisted Mr. Cobden's motion for an inquiry into the effect of protection on the condition of the agricultural labourer, even though this resistance implied the humiliating confession of the falsehood and hypocrisy of their hackneyed pretence, that the Corn Laws were proposed for the benefit of the labourer! No wonder that the Commissioners sent to investigate the condition of the agricultural districts were placed under limits and restrictions which rendered a full and fair inquiry absolutely impossible! In Hertfordshire, a fertile county one from which no serious complaints are heard, and for which no appeals have been made either to humane or sentimental philanthropy—within a limited and not over-crowded district, there are found two hundred families, literally littered like cattle, destitute of the means by which the decencies of life can be maintained, and compelled to adopt the worst barbarism of savage life in the midst of civilization. This is a fact calculated to make us ashamed of our country and our age. We live in a land where Philanthropy blows its trumpet and proclaims its universality; where appeals are daily made for voluntary subscriptions to support any and every scheme of improvement which can afford a salary to a secretary, and popular fame to a legislator; and yet, in this very land and time our peasants are in a state approaching that of the Russian serf or the Brazilian slave. Whatever the serf or slave may suffer, he is not mocked by hollow professions of sympathy; no Boyer preaches over societies for the improvement of the working classes, after having previously bound himself to the perpetration of their degradation; no Brazilian demands the elevation of the negroes on his neighbour's estate, while he continues their degradation on his own. Such spectacles of revolting inconsistency are reserved for moral England—for the land of Corn Laws imposed to pay the mortgages of the extravagance, or to save from honest industry the children of the improvident, the luxurious, and the idle.

"Can such things be,
An eye-evil as like a sunny cloud,
Without an spear of wonder?"

But this is a state of things which cannot continue; the labourers have long been conscious of their sufferings, but it is only of late that they have begun to investigate the cause. It will be found every day a more difficult task, to dupe them into the absurdity of believing, that as consumers of food they have an interest in maintaining dearth and scarcity, or that as sellers of labour they should lessen the demand for it by restricting the amount of employment in the country. The labourer has learned that it was not for him that—

"Food is made so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap."

The condition of the agricultural labourer cannot be longer neglected with impunity; to him, as to us, charity is not needed but, justice; and though pretended philanthropy may not deem the agricultural labourer worthy of a boon, the instinct of self-protection will enforce attention to his righteous demand.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Monday state that the body of carpenters who struck for higher wages yet hold out to the threatened interruption of the business of various other trades, and the consequent imposition of suffering upon the working classes. The Débats proposes, as a remedy against the return of such evils, the further extension of the system of Prud'hommes; to whose arbitration the differences between masters and workmen might be referred, before they assumed a too angry appearance. The Minister of War had received a despatch from Marshal Bugeaud, dated Algiers, 15th instant. The Marshal describes the expedition against the Ourenserris as successful, all the tribes having submitted, but admits that on the right bank of the Chelif affairs are not quite so far advanced. The Marshal bestows a high eulogium on the zeal and fidelity of the Arab troops, who have deserted from Abdel Kader and entered the service of the French.

The carpenters still persisting in their strike for wages, we gather from the Débats that Government have resolved upon permitting soldiers to be employed in their place. We need hardly remind our readers that according to the conscription men of all trades are to be found in the French army.

Yesterday morning a man, between 25 and 30 years of age, in a state of intoxication, laid a wager that he would swim across the Seine between the Pont-au Clouge and that of Notre Dame. After stripping, he jumped in to perform the feat, but, the current running very strong, he was carried under water and drowned. All attempts to recover the body were fruitless.—Galignani of Tuesday.

THE NEW SCHISM IN GERMANY.—The Journal des Débats states that "the internal divisions amongst the Dissenting Catholics in Germany assume every day a more serious character. The two chiefs of the religious movement, M. Ronge and M. Czerski, have commenced an open war. Formal proposals have been made to M. Czerski, the reformer of Schneidemühl, to declare schismatic all those who have declared for the Council of Leipzig, and in the first rank M. Ronge himself, as the representative of that council. We may observe, by the way, that the Council of Leipzig is in direct opposition with the Court of Rome, whilst the reformer of Schneidemühl does not wish to separate entirely. For this reason, Czerski's followers, in place of styling themselves simply German Catholics, have prepared to adopt the title of German Apostolic Catholics. A most dangerous rival to M. Ronge and Czerski has arisen in the person of M. Prihl, chief of a new sect of Catholic German Protestants. The entire body of German Catholics who protested against the confession of faith published by the Catholics of Berlin, are comprised under the latter name. The Catholic Protestants are more allied to the dogmas of the ancient Catholic Church than any of the other sects which divide the Dissenting Catholics; they have already replaced the crucifix on the altar, and the mitre on the head of their chief."

DR. STIGER.—Letters from Zurich of the 20th inst. announce the escape of Dr. Stiger from his prison at Lucerne, and his arrival in Zurich on that day. He remained in Zurich a few hours, after which he set out for Frauenfeld, in Thurgovie. He is said to have escaped with the aid and privacy of the three sons of a dame who professed to guard him, in the uniform of one of their body.

A letter from Zurich, of June 22, states that the escape of Dr. Stiger has caused general satisfaction, and deputations from different parts have waited upon him to offer him their congratulations. At Lutzburgh a salute of 41 guns was fired, and at Aarau the rejoicings were kept up during the whole night.

ARMY, June 7.—The Ministry begins at length to be alarmed at the fearful progress of brigandage, and Colletti has applied to the Chamber for extraordinary powers to enable him to put it down. The commander of the troops on the eastern frontier has found it necessary to arm the whole population, in order to keep the brigands in check; and the officer in command of the frontier-guard in Acronia, finding his present force insufficient to repress their audacity, has applied for reinforcements, and for full powers to act according to his own discretion, and take such measures, under the circumstances, as he may think expedient. In many places the agents of the Government have assumed these extraordinary powers, and have subjected the unhappy peasantry, men and women, to cruel tortures whenever they have been suspected, even upon the slightest grounds, of complicity with the brigands, or of knowing and refusing to disclose their lurking places. The town of Missolinghi is so closely beset that no one ventures out alone after sunset, nor in company even, unless well armed. The evil has extended to the Morea, and several acts of brigandage have lately been committed in the neighbourhood of Patras.

CONVULSIONS, June 4.—Last week a fearful tragedy took place on board the Austrian commercial steamer Imperatrice, on her way from Trebisonde to this port. She touched in coming down at Samson and Synope, and at the latter place wrecked, on Thursday night, amongst other passengers, two Cindabar dervishes, brothers, who had been expelled from Trebisonde and Samson by the local authorities, on account of their bad reputation. The day following, between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, after these individuals had allowed, it is said, a copious dose of khashkhash, or some other meddlesome drug, they said their prayers, and then arose, shouting in a tone of delirium "Hool! Hool!" (the cry of dervishes in allusion to the name of the deity). One drew forth a pistol and discharged it into the back of a Greek in the cookhouse; and both, dagger in hand, began roaming about the deck like demons, killing or wounding all who fell in their way. The firer of the pistol being seized by one of the crew, Captain Otellan, who commanded the steamer, went up to disarm him, when the brother of the fellow made a lunge at him from behind with his dagger, which fortunately passed between his left arm and his body, cutting his clothes without touching his person. The captain on this recoiled, but as arms had in the meantime been brought on deck, he seized a musket and instantly traversed one of the dervishes through the neck, whilst the other was killed by the deck by a blow from a water bucket which had been snatched up by a sturdy six feet stoker. The crew, now armed, came up, and the wretched dervishes were quickly despatched, but unfortunately rather too late, for they had already killed one man and wounded seven others, of whom two are since dead, whilst others lie in the greatest danger. Among the victims mortally wounded was Mr. Marinovich, agent of the steamers at Trebisonde, a gentleman well known here, highly esteemed, and universally regretted.

Another letter from Constantinople of the 4th instant mentions that a sanguinary battle had taken place in Syria, on the 16th, between the Druses and Maronites.

DREADFUL FIRE IN QUEBEC.—News reached Liverpool on Tuesday evening, by the packet ship Cambridge, of a dreadful fire which took place at Quebec, on the 28th of May. It originated in a tannery, and spread with fearful rapidity. "From eleven in the morning till midnight," says a letter in the New York Commercial Advertiser, "did this dread fire hold uninterrupted sway, until its career was arrested in St. Charles-street—nearly one mile from the place of its outbreak!—at the broadest point the breadth of the burnt district is about one-third of a mile. Between 1500 and 2000 houses are supposed to have been consumed, and it is calculated that 12,000 persons (one-third of the population) are this day houseless. Most of these people have lost their all, the rapid advance and sudden capricious direction taken by the flames not only rendering it impossible to save any portion of the property in the dwellings, but in a vast number of instances barely allowing the inmates sufficient time to escape." The loss of property is said to be immense, and several lives fell a sacrifice to the flames or in the falling ruins. "One painful incident was the destruction of the hospital, to which, as being considered entirely out of the reach of the conflagration, numbers of sick persons of all classes were carried, when, melancholy to relate, the building became ignited by the flakes of fire carried from the distance by the wind; the unfortunate inmates, unable to help themselves, perished miserably. The total loss has been variously estimated at from 1,600,000 dollars to 3,000,000 dollars." Large subscriptions for the relief of the sufferers had been contributed.

UNITED STATES.—The Great Western steamer from New York has arrived, bringing papers to the 14th inst., which are ten days later than those previously received. The news from Texas is interesting. President Jones is endeavouring to recede from the policy which he has been so quietly pursuing for some time past in reference to Mexico, and in conjunction with the agents of France and England. He has issued a proclamation authorizing an election of deputies to a Convention to be held on the 4th of July next, to which is to be submitted the proposition of annexation.

DOMESTIC.

The health of Sir William Follett, which for some time past has been declining, has rapidly given way during the past week or two, and he now lies in a condition so precarious that his ultimate recovery is despaired of.

On Saturday afternoon, about 30 feet in length of a wall, bounding the premises of Mr. Davies, an emery manufacturer, in Richardson-street, Bermondsey, was thrown down, in consequence of 100 tons of emery stones being piled against it. The wall was 10 feet in height, and nine inches in thickness. Several children were playing near the spot, and one, named George Beauchamp, was crushed to death, while three others received severe injury.

Mr. Smith, the proprietor of the shooting gallery in Holborn, expired on Thursday evening from an abscess caused by the wound in his back. It may be remembered he was shot last July by the Hon. Mr. Tuckey, who was tried and acquitted on the ground of insanity.

The mayor of Leeds has instituted a long proceedings against the canine race of that town. No fewer than 130 dogs were destroyed by his orders last week. Seventy were killed in one afternoon by prussic acid.

During the year 1844, 2637 lost children were found and restored to their parents by the Manchester police; and in the same length of time the police saved 22 lives.

The defendants in the Spa-fields burial-ground case have consented to plead guilty to one of the charges in the indictment against them, with a reference to Mr. Brannell, who is to direct in what manner the burial-ground is to be in future conducted. Judgment of the court is to be respited for one year, and if the directions of Mr. Brannell are complied with, no further proceedings will be taken—no costs on either side, no arrest of judgment, or writ of error. The costs of arbitration to be paid by the prosecutors and defendants, each a moiety.

George Smith, a lad of 18, residing at Rednal-green, in trying experiments in hanging, has actually killed himself. The youth was an acquaintance of Topping's, saw him executed, and had since been very curious in ascertaining what hanging was like.

Hay-making is now very general in Devonshire, and particularly near Tiverton, Exeter, and Totness, where many large mows have been made without having a drop of rain on them. The crops are so heavy that good hay is now 20s. per ton lower than it was a few weeks ago. Large quantities of old hay is shipped every week from Bridgewater to the Welsh coast.

Some fine samples of flax, grown in the neighbourhood of Northallerton, have recently been shown in the market at that place, and purchases made of it by the linen manufacturers in that vicinity.

A new bill, introduced a few nights since by Messrs. Wyse and Ewart, "for legalising art-unions" enacts, after a lengthy preamble, referring to recent circumstances connected with these institutions, that all voluntary associations, such as art-unions, for the purchase of paintings and drawings, &c., to be afterwards allotted and distributed by chance, now constituted, or which may be hereafter constituted, shall be deemed and taken to be lawful associations, provided always that a royal charter shall have been first obtained for the incorporation of such associations, &c.

Last week, an agricultural labourer, of the name of Richard Wilkins, died at Malvern Wells, of apoplexy, induced by congestion of the brain from having drunk a quantity of cider, the common drink of labourers in that district, which had been conveyed in leaden pipes from the older-house to the place where it was drawn for use. The coroner intimated that, after a fatal occurrence like this, every farmer and publican using such pipes would be subject to a verdict of manslaughter or murder, in the event of a similar catastrophe.

Mr. Joseph Somes, M.P. for Dartmouth, died on Wednesday evening, at his residence, New Grove, Mils End, after a brief illness. His death, of course, occasions a vacancy for the above-named borough.

On Thursday night a fire took place at Bunting's house, farm, Stapan, near Buntingford. There was a good supply of water and no lack of appliances, in consequence of which,
