SCENE, the Seraglio at Jerusalem.

“Zaïre” was written and produced in 1732. During its composition Voltaire wrote to a friend: “Everyone here reproaches me that I do not put more love into my pieces. There shall be love enough this time, I swear, and not mere gallantry. My desire is that there may be nothing so Turkish, so Christian, so amorous, so tender, so infuriate, as that which I am now putting into verse for the pleasure of the public. . . . The names of Montmorenci, Saladire, Jesus, Mahomet, will be in it. There will be mention of the Seine and Jordan, of Paris and Jerusalem. We shall love, we shall baptize, we shall kill, and I will send you the outline as soon as it is done.” The piece was a great success, despite J. B. Rousseau’s adverse criticism. It was played at Berlin, and Geneva; and at Rome on the hundredth anniversary of Voltaire’s death.

ZAÏRE.

---

AN EPISTLE DEDICATORY TO MR. FALKENER, AN ENGLISH MERCHANT, SINCE AMBASSADOR AT CONSTANTINOPLE, WITH THE TRAGEDY OF ZAÏRE.

You, my dear friend, are an Englishman, and I am a native of France; but lovers of the fine arts are fellow-citizens: men of taste and virtue have pretty nearly the same principles in every country, and form one general commonweal: it is no longer, therefore, matter of astonishment to see a French tragedy dedicated to an Englishman, or an Italian, any more than it would have been, in the days of antiquity, for a citizen of Ephesus, or of Athens, to address his performance to a Grecian of some other city; I lay this tragedy before you, therefore, as my countryman in literature, and my most intimate friend.

I shall, at the same time, have the pleasure of informing my brother Frenchmen here in what light traders are looked upon among you, what regard the English have for a profession so essential to the welfare of their kingdom, and the honor which they have to represent their country in parliament, in the rank of legislators; though trade is despised by our petits-maitres, who, you know as well as myself, both in England and France, are the most contemptible species of being that crawl upon the face of the earth.

My further inducement to correspond with an Englishman, rather than any other man, on subjects of literature, arises from your happy freedom of thought, which never fails to inspire me with bolder ideas, and also with more nervous expression.<sup>1</sup> 'Whoever converses with me has, for the time at least, my heart at his disposal; if his sentiments are lively and animated, he inflames me: if he is strong and nervous, he raises and supports me: the courtier, who is all dissimulation, makes me insensibly as affected and constrained in my behavior as himself; but a bold and fearless spirit gives me sentiment and courage: I catch fire from him, just as young painters, brought up under Lemoine or Argilière, catch the freedom of their masters' pencils, and compose with their spirit: thus Virgil admired Homer, followed his steps, and, without being a plagiarist, became his rival.'

You need not be apprehensive of my sending you, with this piece, a long apology and vindication of it: I might indeed have told you why I did not make Zaire more determined to embrace Christianity before she knew her father; why she keeps the secret from her lover; but those who have any judgment, or any justice, will see my reasons without my pointing them out; and as for those critics that are predetermined not to believe me, it would be lost labor to give them any reasons at all.

All I can boast of is that the piece is tolerably simple; a perfection, in my opinion, that is not to be despised.

<sup>1</sup> The passages marked thus ' ' are, in the original, written in a familiar kind of verse, consisting of eight syllables, which M. Voltaire is, in most of his letters, fond of intermingling with his prose: the reader will easily perceive that, however agreeable those rhymes might be to a French ear, both the subject and style, in the greater part of them, are of such a nature, as not to admit of poetical translation into English.

'This happy simplicity was one of the distinguishing beauties of learned antiquity: it is a pity you Englishmen don't introduce this novelty on your stage, which is so filled with horror, gibbets, and murders: put more truth into your dramatic performances, and more noble images: Addison has endeavored to do it: he was the poet of the wife, but he was too stiff: and, in his boasted "Cato," the two girls are really very insipid characters: imitate from the great Addison only what is good; polish a little the rude manners of your mild muse; write for all times, and all ages, for fame, and for posterity, and transfuse into your works the simplicity of your manners.'

But I would not have your English poets imagine that I mean to give them "Zaire" as a model: I preach simplicity to them, and easy numbers, but I would not be thought to set up for the saint of my own sermon: if "Zaire" has met with success, I owe it not so much to the merit of the performance, as to the tenderness of the love scenes, which I was wise enough to execute as well as I possibly could: in this I flattered the taste of my audience; and he is generally sure to succeed, who talks more to the passions of men than to their reason: if we are ever so good Christians, we must have a little love besides: and I am satisfied the great Corneille was much in the right of it, not to confine himself, in his "Polyeucte," merely to the breaking of the statues of Jupiter by the new converts: for such is the depravity of human kind, that perhaps 'the pious soul of Polyeucte would have but little impression on the audience, and even the Christian verses he declaims would have been received with contempt, if it had not been for his wife's passion for her favorite heathen, who was certainly more worthy of her love than the good devotee her husband.'

Almost the same accident happened to Zaire; my friends, who frequent the theatre, assured me, that if she had been only converted, she would not have been half so interesting: but she was in love with the most perfect religion in the world, and that has made her fortune. I could not, however, expect to escape censure.

'Many an inexorable critic has carped at and slashed me, and many a remorseless jester has pretended that I only filched an improbable Romance, which I had not the sense to improve; that I have lamed and spoiled the subject; that the catastrophe is unnatural: they even prognosticated the dreadful hiss with which a disgusted public salutes a miserable poet: but I despised their censures, and risked my play upon the stage; the public was more favorable than they expected, or I deserved: instead of hisses, it received shouts: tears flowed from almost every eye: but I am not puffed up with my success, I assure you I am no stranger to all its faults. I know very well it is absolutely indisputable, that before we can make a perfect work, we must sell ourselves to the devil, which was what I did not choose to do.'

I do not flatter myself that the English will do "Zaire" the same honor they have done to "Brutus," a translation of which has been played at London:<sup>1</sup> they tell us here, that you have neither devotion enough to be affected by old Lusignan, nor tenderness to feel for Zaire; you love a conspiracy better than an intrigue; upon your stage, they say the word

“country” is sure of getting a clap, and so is “love” upon ours; but to say the truth, you have as much love in your tragedies as we have: if you have not the reputation of being tender, it is not that your stage heroes are not in love, but that they seldom express their passion naturally: our lovers talk like lovers; yours like poets.

But if the French are your superiors in gallantry, there are many things, which, in return, we may borrow of you: to the English theatre I am indebted for the liberty which I have taken of bringing the names of our kings and ancient families upon the stage: a novelty of this kind may perhaps be the means of introducing amongst us a species of tragedy hitherto unknown, and which we seem to want. Some happy geniuses will, I have no doubt, rise up, who will bring to perfection that idea, of which “Zaire” is but a slight sketch: as long as literature meets with protection in France, we shall always have writers enough; nature every day forms men of talents and abilities; we have nothing to do but to encourage and employ them: but if those which distinguish themselves are not supported by some honorable recompense, and by the still more pleasing charm of admiration, all the fine arts must soon perish, even though so many edifices have been raised to shelter and protect them: the noble plantation of Louis XIV. would die away for want of culture: the public might still have taste, but there would be no eminent masters: the sculptor in his academy would see a number of indifferent pupils about him, but never have the ambition to imitate Girardon and Pujet: the painter would rest satisfied with excelling his contemporaries, but would never think of rivalling Poussin: may the successor of Louis

XIV. always follow the example of that great monarch, who inspired every artist with emulation, encouraged at the same time a Racine and a Van-Robais: he carried our commerce and our glory to the farthest part of the globe, and extended his bounty to foreigners of all nations, who were astonished at the fame and rewards which our court bestowed upon them: wherever merit appeared, it found a patron in Louis XIV.

Where'er that bounteous star its influence shed,
 Fair merit raised her long-declining head;
 His royal hand spread honors, wealth, and fame,
 Then Viviani, then Cassini came:
 Newton refused a gift from France's throne,
 Or Newton too, thou knowest, had been our own:
 These are the deeds that raise our Gallia's fame,
 These, Louis, will immortalize thy name,
 And truly make thee, what thou wert designed,
 The universal monarch of mankind.

You have no foundations equal to the munificent donations of our kings; but then your people supplies the want of them: you do not stand in need of royal favor to honor and reward superior talents of every kind. Steel and Vanbrugh were comedy writers, and at the same time members of parliament: the primacy given to Dr. Tillotson, Newton honored with an important trust, Prior made an ambassador, and Addison a minister of state, are but the common and ordinary consequences of the regard which you pay to merit, and to great men: you heap riches on them while they live, and erect monuments and statues to them after their death: even your celebrated actresses have places in your churches, near the great poets.

'Your Oldfield, and her predecessor, Bracegirdle, in consideration of their having been so agreeable to the public when in their prime, their course finished, were, by the consent of your whole nation, honored with a pompous funeral, and their remains carried under a velvet pall, and lodged in your church with the greatest magnificence: their spirits, no doubt, are still proud of it, and boast of the honor in the shades below; while the divine Molière, who was far more worthy of it, could scarcely obtain leave to sleep in a churchyard; and the amiable Lecouvreur, whose eyes I closed, could not even so much as obtain two wax-tapers and a coffin; M. de Laubiniere, out of charity, carried away her corpse by night in a hackney-coach to the banks of the river; do you not even now see the god of love breaking his arrows in a rage, and Melopomene in tears, banishing herself from that ungrateful place which Lecouvreur had so long adorned?

But everything, in these our days, conspires to reduce France to that state of barbarism from which Louis XIV. and Cardinal Richelieu had delivered her: that a curse on that policy knows not the value of the fine arts! the world is peopled with nations as powerful as our own; how happens it then that we look on them with so little esteem? For the same reason perhaps that we despise the company of a rich man, whose mind is tasteless and uncultivated. Do not imagine that this empire of wit, this glory of being the universal model for mankind, is a trifling distinction, it is the infallible mark of the grandeur of a kingdom: under the greatest princes the arts have always flourished, and their decay is often succeeded by that of the state itself: history will supply us with ample proofs of it; but this would lead me too far out of my subject: I shall finish this letter, which is already too long, with a little performance, which naturally demands a place at the head of this tragedy: an epistle, in verse, to the actress who played the part of Zaïre; I owe her at least this compliment for the manner in which she acquitted herself on that occasion.

‘For the prophet of Mecca never had Greek nor Arabian in his seraglio so beautiful or so genteel: her black eyes, so finely arched and full of tenderness, with her excellent voice, mien and carriage, defended my performance against every auditor that had a mind to be troublesome: but when the reader catches me in his closet, all my honor, I fear, will be lost.’

Adieu, my dear friend, continue to cultivate philosophy and the Belles-lettres, without forgetting to send your ships to the Levant.

I have the honor to remain, &c.

VOLTAIRE.

A SECOND LETTER TO MR. FALKENER, THEN AM-BASSADOR TO CONSTANTINOPLE.

From the Second Edition of the Tragedy of Zaïre

My dear friend,

For your new dignity of ambassador only makes our friendship more respectable, and shall not prevent my making use of a title even more sacred than that of minister; the name of “Friend” is much above that of, “your Excellency.” I now dedicate to the ambassador of a great king and a free nation what I had before addressed to a plain citizen, and an English merchant: those who know how much commerce is respected in your country must know that a tradesman is there sometimes a legislator, a good officer, and a public minister.

Some ridiculous people who had fallen in with the fashion of paying respect to nothing but nobility, thought proper to laugh at the novelty of a dedication to a man who had nothing but merit to recommend him: who took the liberty, on a stage sacred to calumny and bad taste, to insult the author of that dedication, and to reproach the gentleman to whom it was addressed for being a merchant:<sup>1</sup> but we must not, sir, impute to our whole nation an affront so gross and illiberal, that people, ever so uncivilized, would have been ashamed to commit. The magistrates of our police, who are constantly employed in rectifying abuses of this kind, were, to the last degree, surprised at it: but the contempt and ignominy with which the public have branded the acknowledged author of this indignity, are, I hope, a fresh proof of French politeness: those virtues, which form the character of a whole people, are often contradicted, and, as it were, called in question by the vices of an individual: there were some voluptuaries, we know, even at Lacedæmon: there have been low and foolish fellows in England; men without taste, or good breeding, at Athens; and so there are in Paris.

You will, I hope, forget them, sir, as they are forgotten by the world, and receive this second mark of my respect: they are due to you still more than they were before, as this tragedy has made its appearance at London. It has been translated, and acted with so much success, and the author of it spoken of with so much regard and politeness, that I ought to return my public thanks to the whole nation.

I do not know how to acquit my obligations to you by any other means than acquainting my countrymen here with the particulars of the translation, and representation of "Zaire" on the English stage.

Mr. Hill, a man of letters, and one who seems to understand the theatre better than any English author, did me the honor to translate this piece, with the design of introducing something new on your stage, both with regard to the manner of writing tragedies, and of repeating them. I shall speak, by and by, of the representation.

The art of declaiming was for a long time among you entirely unnatural; most of your tragic actors expressed themselves more like poets seized with rapturous enthusiasm than like men inspired by a real passion. Several of your comedians were even more intolerable; they roared out their verses with an impetuous fury that was no more like the natural tone than convulsions and distortions are to an easy and noble carriage. This air of riot and tumult seemed entirely foreign to your nation, which is naturally sober and grave, even to such a degree, as frequently to appear cold and unanimated in the eye of a stranger. Your preachers never indulge themselves in a declamatory tone, and you would laugh at a pleader at the bar, who should work himself up into a passion: the players were the only outrageous set of people in the kingdom. Our actors and actresses also, particularly the latter, were guilty of this for many years. M. Lecouvreur was the first who broke them of it: thus an Italian writer, a man of great sense and parts, speaks of her:

*La legiadra Couvreur sola non trotta
Per quella strade dove i suoi compagni
Van di galoppo tutti quanti in frotta,
Se auvien ch'ella pianga, o che si lagni
Senza quelli urli spaventosi loro
Ti muove si che in pianger l'accompagni.*

The same change which Lecouvreur affected on our stage, Mrs. Cibber brought about on yours, in the part of Zaïre: how astonishing it is that in every art it should be so long before we arrive at the simple and the natural!

A novelty that must appear still more extraordinary to a Frenchman is, that a gentleman of your country, a man of rank and fortune, should condescend to play the part of Osman. It was an interesting circumstance to see the two principal characters represented, one by a person of condition, and the other by a young actress not above eighteen years of age, who had never repeated a line before in her life. This instance of a gentleman's exercising his talents for declamation, is not singular among you; it is perhaps more surprising that we should wonder at it: we ought certainly to reflect, that everything in this world depends upon custom and opinion: the court of France have danced on the stage with the actors of the opera, and we thought there was nothing strange in it, but that the fashion of this kind of entertainment should be discontinued. Why should it be more extraordinary for people to write than to dance in public? is there any difference between these two arts, except that the one is as much above the other as the perfections of the mind are superior to those of the body; I have said it before, and I say so still, none of the polite arts are contemptible; and to be ashamed of talents of any kind is of all things the most shameful.

I come now to the translation of "Zaïre," and the change which has been made among you with regard to the drama.

You had a strange custom, which even Mr. Addison, the chastest of your writers, adopted, so often does custom get the better of sense and reason; I mean, the ridiculous custom of finishing every act by verses in a different taste from the rest of the piece, which verse usually consisted of a simile. Phædra, as she leaves the stage, compares herself to a bitch; Cato to a rock, and Cleopatra to children that cry themselves asleep. The translator of "Zaïre" was the first who dared to maintain the rights of nature against a custom so directly opposite to her. He proscribed this custom, well knowing that passion should always speak its own language, and that the poet should disappear, to make room for the hero.

Upon this principle he has translated plainly, and without any unnecessary ornaments, all the simple verses of the piece, which must have been entirely spoiled by an endeavor to render them beautiful, such as;

On ne peut désirer ce qu'on ne connoît pas.

J'eusse été près du Gange esclave des faux dieux Chrétienne dans Paris, Musulmane en ces lie ux.

Mais Orosmane m'aime, & j'ai tout oublié

*Non, la reconnaissance est un foible retour
Un tribut offensant, trop peu fait pour l'amour.*

Je me croirois haï d'être aimé foiblement.

Je veux avec excès vous aimer & vous plaire

L'art n'est pas fait pour toi, tu n'en a pas besoin,

L'art le plus innocent tient de la perfidie.

All the verses that are in this fine taste of simplicity, are rendered word for word into English: they might very easily have been adorned, but the translator judged in a different manner from several of my countrymen; he liked the verses, and retained therefore all the simplicity of them; the style indeed ought always to be agreeable to the subject; "Alzira," "Brutus," and "Zaïre," for example, required three different kinds of versification: if Berenice complained of Titus, and Ariadne of Theseus, in the style of "Cinna," neither Berenice nor Ariadne would please or affect us; we can never talk well of love, if we search after any other ornaments but truth and simplicity.

This is not the place to examine whether it be right or wrong to put so much love into our dramatic performances: I will even allow it to be a fault, but it is a fault which will always be universal; nor do I know what name to give that fault, which is the delight of all mankind: of one thing I am satisfied, that the French have succeeded better in it than all other nations, ancient and modern, put together: love appears on our stage with more decorum, more delicacy, and truth than we meet with on any other: and the reason is, because of all nations the French are best acquainted with society: the perpetual commerce and intercourse of the two sexes, carried on with so much vivacity and good breeding, has introduced among us a politeness unknown to all the world but ourselves.

Society principally depends on the fair sex: all those nations who are so unhappy as to confine their women are unsociable: the austerity of your manners, your political quarrels, and religious wars, that rendered you savage and barbarous, deprived you, even down to the age of Charles II. of the pleasures of society, even in the bosom of liberty: the poets, therefore, neither of your country, nor of any other, knew anything of the manner in which love ought to be treated.

Good comedy was utterly unknown amongst us till the days of Molière; as was the art of expressing our sentiments with delicacy till those of Racine, because society had not attained to any degree of perfection before that time: a poet cannot paint in his closet, manners which he has never seen; and would sooner write a hundred odes and epistles than one scene where nature must speak: your Dryden, who was in other respects a great genius, put into the mouth of his heroes in love either high-flown strains of rhetorical flourish, or something indecent, two things equally opposite to tenderness.

If Mr. Racine makes Titus say:

*Depuis cinq ans entiers chaque jour je la vois
Et croi toujours la voir pour la première fois.*

Your Dryden makes Antony say:

—————how I loved,
Witness ye days and nights, and all ye hours,
That danced away with down upon your feet,
As all your business were to count my love,
One day passed by, and nothing saw but love;
Another came, and still 'twas only love:
The suns were wearied out with looking on,
And I untired with loving————

It is very difficult to conceive that Antony should ever really talk thus to Cleopatra. In the same play, Cleopatra speaks thus to Antony:

Come to me, come my soldier, to my arms,
You've been too long away from my embraces;
But when I have you fast, and all my own,
With broken murmurs, and with amorous sighs,
I'll say, you were unkind, and punish you,
And mark you red with many an eager kiss.

It is not improbable that Cleopatra might frequently talk thus, but indecencies of this kind are not to be represented before a respectable audience: some of your countrymen may perhaps say this is pure nature; but we may tell them in answer, that if it be so, it is that nature which ought carefully to be concealed: it shows but little knowledge of human nature, to imagine that we can please the more by presenting these licentious images; on the contrary, it is shutting up the avenues to true pleasure: where everything is at once discovered, we are disgusted; there remains no more to look for or desire; and in our pursuit of pleasure we meet with languor and satiety: this is the reason why those who are truly qualified for society, taste pleasures far more exquisite than grosser appetites can have any idea of: the spectators, in this case, are like lovers who are satiated by too quick possession; those ideas which, when brought too close, would make us blush, should be seen, as it were, through a cloud. It is this veil to which, to a right mind, they are indebted for all their charms: there is no pleasure without decorum.<sup>1</sup> The French are certainly better acquainted with this than any other nation upon earth; not because they are without genius and spirit, as the unequal and impetuous Dryden has ridiculously asserted; but because, ever since the regency of Anne of Austria, they have been the most sociable and the most polished people in the universe: and this politeness is not an arbitrary thing, like what they call civility, but a law of nature, which they have happily cultivated far beyond any other nation.

The translation of Zaire has, almost throughout his whole piece, strictly observed those decencies of the stage which are common to us both; but there are, at the same time, some places where he has entirely adhered to ancient customs.

For instance, when in the English piece Osman comes to tell Zaire that he can no longer love her, she answers him by rolling upon the ground: the Sultan is not moved at seeing her in this ridiculous posture of despair, and yet the moment after is astonished at Zaire's weeping, and cries out, "Zaire, thou weepest." He should have said to her before; "Zaire, thou rollest upon the ground."

Insomuch that those three words, "Zaire, thou weepest," which have so fine an effect on our stage, have none on yours, because they were displaced: those familiar and simple expressions derive all their power from the manner in which they are introduced. "My lord, you change countenance," is nothing of itself: but when these words are pronounced by Mithridates, we shudder at them.

To say nothing but what we ought to say, and that in the manner in which it ought to be said, is a point of perfection which the French have come nigher to than the writers, myself excepted, of other countries: on this subject we have, I think, a right to dictate to them: you can teach us perhaps greater and more useful things, we ought to acknowledge it. The French, who have written against Sir Isaac Newton's discoveries, with regard to light and colors, are ashamed of it; those who oppose his system of gravitation will soon be still more so.

You ought to submit to our rules of the stage, as we submit to your philosophy: we have made as good experiments on the human heart, as you have in physics: the art of pleasing seems to be the art of Frenchmen; the art of thinking is all your own. Happy are those, sir, who like you, can unite them.

I am, sir, &c.,

ACT I. SCENE I.

ZAÏRE, FATIMA.

FATIMA.

I little thought to see the lovely Zaïre,
In all the pride of youth and beauty, thus
Calm and resigned submitting to her fate :
What sweet delusive hope hath pierced the cloud
Of grief that hung upon thee, and revived
Thy drooping heart? this peace of mind hath given
New lustre to thy charms : no longer now
Thy eyes are bathed in tears, no longer seek Those blissful climes where brave Nerestan promised

To guide our steps ; thou talkest not, as of late
We heard thee, of those seats of happiness
Where women reign, by willing slaves adored,
The queens, the idols of a polished people,
Though free yet chaste, and wise though unrestrained,

For social converse fit, and not to fear
Indebted for their virtue : sighest thou, Zaïre,
No more for this gay land of liberty?
Seest thou within these solitary walls
Aught that is lovely? is the name of slave
So grateful now, that to the banks of Seine
Thou wouldst prefer the gloomy Solyma?

ZAÏRE.

We cannot wish for joys we never knew :

'Twas heaven's supreme degree to fix us here;
 Custom hath made restraint familiar to me:
 I look not now beyond the narrow bounds
 Of this seraglio; every hour it grows
 More pleasing to me, and the world beside
 Is lost to Zaïre: to the noble Osman
 I yield myself, to live beneath his power;
 To honor and obey my royal master
 Is my soul's utmost hope, and its ambition,
 All else is but a dream.

FATIMA.

Hast thou forgot
 The kind Nerestan, he whose generous friendship
 Promised so oft to free us from the yoke
 Of bondage? how did we admire his virtues,
 His matchless valor, and intrepid zeal!
 The glory he acquired beneath the walls
 Of Damas, where so many Christians fell
 By Osman's mighty hand! the conqueror then,
 Thou mayest remember, pitied his brave foe,
 And, on his word, permitted him to leave
 The banks of Jordan; we expect him still
 To pay the ransom of our liberty,
 And set us free: must all our hopes be vain?

ZAÏRE.

Perhaps his promise might exceed his power;
 Two years are past, and yet he's not returned:
 Alas! my Fatima, a captive stranger,
 To gain his liberty, might promise more
 Than he could e'er perform: he talked, thou know-est,
 Of bringing ransom for ten Christian slaves,
 Would break their fetters, or resume his own:

I was too credulous, and much admired
His forward zeal, but I shall think no more on it.

FATIMA.

If yet he should be faithful, and return
To keep his plighted faith, then wouldst thou not—

ZAÏRE.

It is not as it was, my Fatima,
The time is past.

FATIMA.

What sayest thou?

ZAÏRE.

I'll not hide
The secret from my friend; perhaps the Sultan
May yet conceal it, but thy Zaïre's heart
With safety may repose on Fatima:
Know then, some three months since, when thou
wert absent,
Removed with other slaves from Jordan's banks,
Kind heaven, to put a period to our woes,
Raised up a powerful friend—the mighty Osman—

FATIMA.

Well, what of Osman?

ZAÏRE.

He, the Sultan's self.
The Christian's haughty conqueror, is the slave
Of Zaïre; yes, he loves me, Fatima;
Nay, blush not, (for I understand thee well)
Think not I mean to stain my spotless honor,
Or stoop to be the mistress of a tyrant;
That I will ever hazard the quick change
Of transitory passion: no, my friend,

I am not so far lost to modesty,
 And native pride, as to forget myself;
 Rather than fall so low I would embrace
 The milder fate of slavery and death;
 But I shall more astonish thee: for know,
 I have subdued his haughty soul to love
 Most pure, and most refined: amidst the crowd
 Of rival beauties that contend for Osman,
 I, I alone have fixed his wandering heart,
 And Hymen soon, in spite of all their deep
 And dark intrigues, shall make the Sultan mine

FATIMA.

It is a conquest worthy of thy charms,
 And of thy virtues: I am much surprised,
 But more delighted; may thy happiness
 Be perfect! I shall rank myself with joy
 Amongst thy subjects.

ZAÏRE.

Be my equal still,
 And share my fortune; royalty with thee
 Divided will make Zaïre doubly happy.

FATIMA.

Pleased with thy choice, long may indulgent heaven
 Smile on thy nuptial bed; may never grief
 Intrude to poison the sweet cup of grandeur,
 By us called happiness! alas, how little
 Doth it deserve the name! but tell me, Zaïre,
 Art thou at ease, and feelest thou naught within
 To check thy joys? hast thou forgot that once
 Thou wert a Christian?

ZAÏRE.

Ha! what sayest thou? why
 Wouldst thou recall my sorrows, Fatima?

Alas ! I know not who or what I am,
Not even who gave me birth.

FATIMA.

Nerestan oft

Hath said, thou wert the daughter of a Christian ;
The cross, which in thy infant years adorned thee,
Confirms it ; still that sacred pledge remains
Perhaps but to remind thee of the faith
Which thou hast quitted.

ZAÏRE.

I've no other proof ;

Shall that alone persuade me to embrace
A faith detested by the man I love ?
Our thoughts, our manners, our religion, all
Are formed by custom, and the powerful bent
Of early years : born on the banks of Ganges
Zaïre had worshipped Pagan deities ;
At Paris I had been a Christian ; here
I am a happy Mussulman : we know
But what we learn ; the instructing parent's hand
Graves in our feeble hearts those characters
Which time retouches, and examples fix
So deeply in the mind, that naught but God
Can e'er efface : but thou wert hither brought
A captive at an age when reason joined
To sage experience had informed thy soul,
And well-confirmed its faith : for me, a slave
Even from my cradle to the Saracens,
Too late the Christian light broke in upon me ;
Yet far from wishing ill to laws so pure,
Spite of myself, I own to thee, that cross,
Whene'er I looked upon it, filled my soul
With reverential awe, and oft in secret
Have I invoked its holy aid, ere Osman

Possessed my heart: thine is a noble faith;
 I honor much those charitable laws
 Which old Nerestan many a time hath told me
 Would wipe off every tear, and make mankind
 One sweet united family of love:
 A Christian must be happy.

FATIMA.

Wherefore then
 Wouldst thou become their most inveterate foe,
 And wed their proud oppressor?

ZAÏRE.

Wouldst thou have me
 Refuse so fair a present as the heart
 Of Osman? no: I will confess my weakness;
 But for the Sultan, Zaïre had long since Embraced thy faith, and been, like thee, a Christian:
 But Osman loves me, and 'tis all forgotten:
 My every thought, my every hope is fixed
 On him alone, and my enraptured soul
 Can dwell on naught but Osman: O, my friend,
 Think on his lovely form, and graceful mind,
 His noble deeds, his glory, and renown:
 The crown he offers is not worth my care;
 The poor return of gratitude would ill
 Repay his passion; love would spurn the gift:
 'Tis not to Osman's throne, but Osman's self,
 That I aspire: perhaps I am to blame;
 But trust me, Fatima, if heaven had doomed him
 To Zaïre's fate, if he were now, like me,
 A wretched slave, and I on Syria's throne,
 Or love deceives me much, or I should stoop
 With joy, and raise him up to me and empire.

FATIMA.

But hark, they come this way; perhaps 'tis Osman.

ZAÏRE.

It is; it must be he; my fluttering heart
Speaks his arrival; for these two long days
He hath been absent, but propitious love
Restores him to my wishes.

SCENE II.

OSMAN, ZAÏRE, FATIMA.

OSMAN.

Virtuous Zaire,
Ere Hymen join our hands, permit me here
To pour forth all my honest heart before you:
I follow not our eastern monarchs' laws,
Nor act by their example; well I know
How wide a field is left by Mahomet
For luxury to range in, that at pleasure
I might command a crowd of kneeling slaves,
Receive their incense, and return their love;
From the Seraglio's peaceful seats deal forth
My laws, and in the arms of indolence
Govern my kingdom; but that well I know
How sloth deludes us, tempting are her charms,
But fatal is their end: a hundred kings
Have I beheld, her tributary slaves,
Our prophet's most unworthy successors,
Caliphs that trembled midst the splendid pomp
Of visionary power, and only held
The name of kings, who might have lived the lords
Of all mankind, the conquerors of the world,

Had they but been, like their great ancestors,
The masters of themselves: then Solyma
And Syria fell beneath the valiant Bouillon,
But heaven, to chastise the impious foe,
Upraised the arm of mighty Saladin:
My father conquered Jordan, and to him,
Unequal to the weight of empire, next
Succeeded Osman, the disputed lord
Of a weak kingdom: whilst the haughty Christians,
Thirsting for blood, thick from the western coast,
Pour in upon me; whilst the voice of war,
And the shrill trumpet heard on every side,
Call us to arms, shall Osman waste his hours
In the loose dalliance of a soft seraglio?
No, Zaïre, love, and glory, bear me witness,
To thee alone I swear eternal truth,
To take thee for my mistress, and my wife;
To live thy friend, thy lover, and thy husband;
Zaïre alone shall with the toils of war
Divide my heart: think not I mean to trust
Thy honor to our savage Asian guards,
Those shameless pandars to the lawless pleasures
Of their imperious masters; I esteem
As well as love thee, and to Zaïre's self
Its fittest guard, commit my Zaïre's virtue.
Thou knowest my heart, on thee alone thou seest
Osman has placed his hopes of happiness:
I need not add how wretched it would make
My future life, shouldst thou repay my fondness
With the poor cold return of gratitude;
I love thee, Zaïre, yes, with rapture love thee,
And hope to find in thee an equal claim:
I own, whate'er the heart of Osman seeks,
It seeks with ardor; I should think you hated,
Did you not love me, with excess of passion:

Such is my nature ; if it suits with thine,
 I am thy husband, but on this condition,
 And only this, if marriage did not make
 Thee happy, I were most supremely wretched.

ZAÏRE.

Wretched, my lord? O if thy happiness
 Depends on Zaïre's truth, and Zaïre's love,
 Never was mortal half so blest as Osman.
 Yes ; the fond lover, and the tender wife,
 All thou canst wish for, shalt thou find in Zaïre,
 For thou hast raised her far above her sex,
 Above her hopes ; O what excess of bliss
 To hold my life, my happiness from thee,
 Such envied bounties from the man I love,
 To be the work of thy creating hand !
 But if among the crowd of rival hearts
 Thy partial favor has selected Zaïre's,
 O if thy choice——

SCENE III.

 OSMAN, ZAÏRE, FATIMA, ORASMIN.

ORASMIN.

My lord, that Christian slave,
 Who, on his promise given, had thy permission
 To visit France, is thence returned, and begs
 An audience.

OSMAN.

Let him enter.

FATIMA.

Gracious heaven!

OSMAN.

Why comes he not?

ORASMIN.

My lord, he waits without ;
I did not think a Christian might approach
Your royal presence in this sacred place.

OSMAN.

In every place access is free to Osman ;
I hate our eastern policy, that hides
Its tyrants from the public eye, to screen
Oppression : give him entrance.

SCENE IV.

OSMAN, ZAÏRE, FATIMA, ORASMIN, NERESTAN.

NERESTAN.

Generous Sultan,
Whose virtues even thy Christian foes admire,
I come, as bound in honor, to discharge
My vows, and bring with me the promised ransom
Of beauteous Zaïre, the fair Selima,
And ten more Christian prisoners ; I have done
My duty to the captives, do thou thine,
And set them free ; I have bestowed on them
My little all, and naught remains for me
But noble poverty ; Nerestan still Must be thy slave ; I have preserved my honor,
Unblemished, and fulfilled my sacred word.

OSMAN.

Christian, thy virtue merits my best praise ;
But think not Osman e'er will be surpassed

In generosity ; receive thy freedom,
 Take back thy treasures ; take my bounty with them ;
 I promised thee ten Christian slaves, I'll give thee
 A hundred more, demand them when thou wilt ;
 Let them depart, and teach their countrymen,
 That even in Syria's plains some virtues dwell ;
 Thence let them judge, if they or Osman best
 Deserve to reign in Solyma ; but know,
 Old Lusignan must still remain a captive ;
 It were not safe to give him liberty ;
 Sprung from the royal blood of France, he claims
 A right to govern here, and that alone
 Condemns him to perpetual slavery,
 To groan in chains, and never more behold
 The light of day : I pity him, and yet
 It must be so ; cruel necessity
 Compels me to this rigor : and for Zaire,
 She must remain with me ; not all thy gold
 Can purchase her ; not the whole race of Christians,
 With all their kings, shall ever force her from me :
 You may depart.

FATIMA.

What do I hear ?

NERESTAN.

My lord,

She is a Christian born ; I have your word,
 Your honor, and her own, that she should go
 When I returned : poor Lusignan ! could he Offend thee ? wherefore wouldst thou——

OSMAN.

Christian, hence :

It is my will ; therefore no more : thy pride
 Offends me ; go, and ere to-morrow's sun
 Shines on this palace, leave my kingdom.

FATIMA.

Heaven

Assist us now!

OSMAN.

Go, Zaire, and assume
 Thy empire o'er my palace; there command
 As my Sultana; I will hence, and give
 My orders for our nuptials.

SCENE V.

OSMAN, ORASMIN.

OSMAN.

Didst thou mark,
 Orasmin, that presumptuous slave; he sighed,
 And fixed his eyes upon her.

ORASMIN.

O my lord,
 Beware of jealousy.

OSMAN.

Ha! jealous, sayest thou?
 Thinkest thou the pride of Osman will descend
 So low! to love as if I hated her?
 Suspicion but provokes the crime it fears;
 Zaire is truth itself; and O Orasmin
 I love her to idolatry; if e'er
 I could be jealous—if my foolish heart—
 But I will think no more on it; let my soul
 Dwell on the sweet idea of her charms:
 Haste, my Orasmin, and get all things ready
 For the dear happy moment that unites
 Thy sovereign to the object of his wishes:

One hour I will devote to public cares,
The rest shall all be given to love and Zaire.

End of the First Act.

ACT II. SCENE I.

NERESTAN, CHATILLON.

CHATILLON.

Joy to our great deliverer, the brave,
The generous Nerestan, sent by heaven
To save thy fellow Christians! O come forth,
Appear amongst us, and receive the tribute
Due to thy virtues; let the happy few,
Whom thou has blest with freedom, clasp thy knees,
And kiss thy gracious hand: they crowd to see
Their benefactor, do not hide thyself
From their desiring eyes, but let us all United——

NERESTAN.

O Chatillon, talk not thus
Of my deservings, I have done no more
Than was my duty; circumstanced like me,
Like me thou wouldst have acted.

CHATILLON.

Every Christian
Should sacrifice himself to his religion:
To leave our own, and think on other's good,
Is our first happiness; how blest art thou,
By gracious heaven appointed to perform
This noble duty! but, for us, the sport
Of cruel fortune, slaves in Solyma,
By Osman's father left in chains, and long

Forgotten, here for life we had remained
 In sad captivity, nor e'er beheld
 Our native land, had not thy generous aid
 Stepped in to save us.

NERESTAN.

'Twas the hand of heaven ;

I was but its unworthy instrument ;
 Its providence hath softened the fierce soul
 Of youthful Osman : but a bitter draught
 Is poured into my cup of joy ; his mercy
 Is cruel and oppressive : God, who sees
 My heart, will bear me witness that I meant
 To serve his cause, and act for him alone ;
 For heaven I had reserved a youthful beauty,
 Whom fierce Nouraddin had enslaved, what time
 The proud contemners of our holy faith
 Surprised great Lusignan, myself long-time
 A captive with her ; I at length regained
 Short liberty, on promise of return ;
 And now had fondly hoped, delusive dream !
 To bring back Zaïre to that happy court
 Where Louis and the virtues reign : already
 The queen, propitious to my friendly zeal,
 Forth from the throne stretched her protecting hand ;
 But now alas ! the wished-for moment near
 That should have freed her from captivity,
 She must not go ; what did I say ? she will not ;
 Zaïre herself forsakes the Christian faith
 For Osman, for the Sultan, who, it seems,
 Adores her—but we'll think no more of Zaïre,
 Another cruel care demands our grief,
 Another base refusal ; O Chatillon,
 The wretched Christian's hope is now no more.

CHATILLON.

Accept my all, my liberty, my life,
If it can save them, 'tis at thy disposal.

NERESTAN.

Alas! old Lusignan is still a slave,
The last of his great race, a race of heroes,
Descended from the valiant Bouillon; he,
Whom fame has made immortal, still must groan
In chains, for Osman never will restore him.

CHATILLON.

Then all thy goodness, all thy cares are vain:
What soldier, who e'er held his honor dear,
Would wish for freedom whilst his chief remains
In slavery! Thou, Nerestan, couldst not know
The gallant Lusignan as I have known him,
For thou wert born, so gracious heaven ordained,
Long after those sad times of woe and slaughter,
When I beheld our city fall a prey
To these barbarians: O if thou hadst seen
The temple sacked, the holy tomb profaned,
Fathers, and children, husbands, daughters, wives,
In flames expiring at the altar's feet;
Our good old sovereign, bent beneath the weight
Of years, and murdered o'er his bleeding sons!
Then Lusignan, the last of his high race,
Revived our drooping courage; terrible
He stood, amidst the carnage of the field,
His right hand grasped a falchion wet with blood,
And with the left he pointed to the cross;
Then cried aloud, "Now countrymen be faithful."
The power divine, that favored us this day,
Protected him in that tremendous hour

Beneath its friendly wing, and smoothed his path
 To safety and repose: Cæsarea then Received our poor remains, where Lusignan
 Was by the general voice proclaimed our king:
 O my Nerestan, the Almighty power,
 To humble haughty man, withholds from him
 Fair virtue's prize till life's short race is run;
 We fought long-time for heaven, but fought in vain;
 The sacred city, smoking in its ruins,
 Still lay, when by a treacherous Greek betrayed
 In our asylum, we beheld the flame
 That raged in hapless Sion reach to us,
 And over Cæsarea's walls with fury spread;
 There, bound in ignominious chains, I saw
 Great Lusignan, superior to misfortune,
 And only weeping for his country's fate;
 E'er since that fatal hour the good old man,
 The Christians' father (he deserves that name)
 In a dark dungeon lies, by all neglected,
 By all forgotten: such is the hard fate
 For us he suffers, and whilst he is wretched
 Tell me, Nerestan, how can we be happy?

NERESTAN.

Unless we were barbarians: O I loathe
 The destiny that keeps us from each other;
 Thou hast recalled the times and sorrows past;
 I shudder at the sad remembrance of them:
 Cæsarea buried in her smoking ruins,
 Thy prison, and great Lusignan in bondage,
 Were the first objects that my eyes beheld;
 I know thy woes, with them my life began;
 Midst shrieking infants, ravished from the breasts
 Of trembling mothers, was Nerestan borne
 To this seraglio, with my fellow-captive,

The lovely Zaïre, who, forgive my sighs,
For this barbarian now hath left her God.

CHATILLON.

It is the glory of these Mussulmans
Thus to seduce the minds of captive Christians;
Blest be the hand of heaven that saved thy youth
From their delusions; but, my lord, this Zaïre, Though she renounced the Christian faith, may serve

The Christian cause; her interest with the Sultan,
Who loves her, may be useful; by what arm
God sends us help, it matters not; for justice
With wisdom oft conspires to draw advantage
Alike from our misfortunes, and our crimes:
The beauteous Zaïre's influence may subdue
The stubborn heart of Osman, and persuade him
To give us back a hero whom himself
Must needs admire, and whom he cannot fear.

NERESTAN.

But thinkest thou Lusignan would condescend
To take his liberty on terms like these?
Or if he would, how can I get from Zaïre
A moment's audience? Osman will not grant it:
Will this seraglio's gates, for ever barred,
Open to me? nay, grant I gain admission,
What can I hope from an apostate woman?
Nerestan's presence would reproach her falsehood,
And she must read her shame upon my brow:
'Tis most ungrateful to the generous mind
To sue for aid of those whom we despise:
If they refuse, it sorely hurts our pride;
And if they grant, we blush to accept it of them.

CHATILLON.

Yet think on Lusignan, and strive to serve him.

NERESTAN.

I must : but how to get at this false woman——
We're interrupted ; ha ! who comes ? 'tis Zaïre.

SCENE II.

ZAÏRE, CHATILLON, NERESTAN.

ZAÏRE.

[To Nerestan.]

Be not alarmed ; by Osman's leave I come
To thank the brave Nerestan ; do not look
So sternly on me, nor with bitter words
Reproach my weakness ; I have wished, yet feared,
To meet thee ; why I know not, but my heart
Still flutters at thy presence ; from our birth
We have been subject to one common fate ;
One prison held us in our infant years ;
Together have we felt the galling yoke
Of slavery, still by tender friendship made
Lighter to both : at length thy kinder fate
Led thee to France, and I was left to mourn
Thy absence ; whether it arose from pity,
From nobleness of soul, or partial fondness,
I know now, but thy generous ardor fought
And gained a ransom for the hapless Zaïre ;
But heaven hath counteracted thy kind purpose,
And I am doomed for ever to remain
In Solyma : long time a slave unknown,
And undistinguished, Zaïre lived, till Osman
Look'd down upon me ; but tho' fortune smiles
Propitious now, and offers all her charms

Of pomp and grandeur, yet I cannot leave
 Without regret my fellow-captive: oft
 Shall I reflect on thee, and on thy goodness,
 And cherish the remembrance of thy virtues:
 Like thee, I will endeavor to relieve
 The wretched, ever will protect the Christians,
 And be a mother to them; for thy sake
 They will be always dear to Zaïre.

NERESTAN.

You

Protect the Christian! you who have forsaken them?
 You, who have trampled on the sacred ashes
 Of Lusignan's great ancestors!

ZAÏRE.

O no:

I hold their virtues in most dear remembrance,
 And come even now to give you back your joy,
 Your hope, the last and greatest of their race:
 Your Lusignan is free, and comes to meet you.

CHATILLON.

And shall we see once more our honored father,
 Our best support?

NERESTAN.

And shall we owe to Zaïre
 A life so precious?

ZAÏRE.

When I asked the favor
 I did not hope it, but the generous sultan,
 Beyond my wish, consented, and they soon
 Will bring him here.

NERESTAN.

How my heart beats, Chatillon!

Zaire.

ZAÏRE.

I weep his fate, Nerestan, for, like him,
 I too have languished in captivity;
 Woes which ourselves have felt we always pity.

NERESTAN.

Good heaven, what virtue in an infidel!

SCENE III.

 ZAÏRE, LUSIGNAN, CHATILLON, NERESTAN,
Several Christian Slaves.

LUSIGNAN.

Who calls me from the dark abode of death?
 Am I with Christians? O support me, guide
 My trembling footsteps; I am weak with age
 And with misfortunes: am I free indeed?

ZAÏRE.

You are, my lord.

CHATILLON.

You live to make us happy,
 Us wretched Christians.

LUSIGNAN.

Sure I know that voice:
 Can it be you, Chatillon? do I see
 My friend, my fellow martyr to the faith
 Of our forefathers? where am I? O aid
 My feeble sight!

CHATILLON.

This is the palace, sir,
 Built by your royal ancestors, but now
 The seat of fierce Nouraddin's son.

ZAÏRE.

Great Osman,
 Its noble master, is a friend to virtue :
 This generous youth,

[Pointing to Nerestan.]

To thee unknown, from France
 Is late arrived, and kindly brings with him
 The ransom of ten Christian slaves ; the sultan,
 Resolved in honor's path to tread with him,
 To crown their wishes, has delivered thee.

LUSIGNAN.

The sons of France are in their nature noble,
 Beneficent, and brave ; I know them well,
 And have experienced their humanity.

[Turning to Nerestan.]

Hast thou then passed the ocean to relieve
 These wretched captives' woes, and set us free ?
 Say, generous stranger, whom am I to thank
 For this unequalled goodness ?

NERESTAN.

I am called
 Nerestan ; almost from my birth a slave
 In Solyma ; I left in earliest years
 The Turkish empire, and with Louis learned
 The rugged talk of war ; beneath his banner
 Long time I fought ; to him I owe my rank
 And fortune, to the first of monarchs, famed Alike for valor and for holy zeal
 To heaven and its true faith : I followed him
 To Charent's banks, where the fierce English, long Unconquered, bent beneath the Gallic power.
 Haste then, and show the venerable marks
 Of thy hard slavery to the best of kings ;

He will reward thee ; Paris will revere
 A martyr to the cross, and Louis' court,
 The asylum of oppressed royalty,
 With open arms receive an injured sovereign.

LUSIGNAN.

I knew the court of France in all its glory ;
 When Philip conquered at Bouvines, I fought
 With Montmorency, Melum, and d'Estaing,
 With valiant Nesle, and the renowned Coucy,
 But never shall behold it more ; alas !
 Thou seest I am descending to the grave,
 To seek the King of Kings, and ask of him
 The due reward of all my sufferings past.
 Whilst I have life, yet hear me, thou kind witness
 Of my last moments, good Chatillon, thou
 Nerestan, too, and this fair mourner here,
 Who honors with her tears the wretched fate
 Of dying Lusignan : O pity me,
 Pity the most unhappy father sure
 That ever groaned beneath the wrath of heaven !
 Time has no power o'er miseries like mine :
 Still I lament a daughter, and three sons,
 Torn from me in their infancy : Chatillon,
 Thou must remember it.

CHATILLON.

I do, my lord,
 And shudder at it now.

LUSIGNAN.

A prisoner with me,
 Cæsarea then in flames, thou sawest my wife
 And two of my dear sons expire.

CHATILLON.

I did;
Loaded with chains I could not help them.

LUSIGNAN.

O

I was a father, and yet could not die :
O ye loved infants, from your heavenly mansion
Look down propitious on my other children,
If yet they live, O succor and protect them !
To this seraglio, even where now we stand,
That daughter and that son whom I lament
Were by the hands of vile barbarians borne,
And here condemned to bear the shameful yoke
Of slavery.

CHATILLON.

'Tis too true : your daughter then
Was in her cradle ; in these arms I held her,
And scarce had time to sprinkle o'er her face
The holy water, and pronounce her Christian,
E'er the rude hands of bloody Saracens
Rushed in, and tore her from me : thy last son,
Scarce four years old, just capable of feeling
His early sorrows, to Jerusalem
Was carried with his sister.

NERESTAN.

How my heart
Beats at the mournful tale ! about that age
I was a prisoner in Cæsarea ; thence,
Covered with blood, and bound in chains, I followed
A crowd of Christian slaves.

LUSIGNAN.

Didst thou ; O heaven !
And wert thou brought up here in this seraglio ?

[Looking earnestly at them.

Alas! perhaps you might have known my children,
Your age the same; perhaps these eyes—O madam,
What foreign ornament is that? how long
May you have worn it?

ZAÏRE.

Ever since my birth:

Why sigh you, sir?

LUSIGNAN.

Permit my trembling hands—

ZAÏRE.

Whence is this strange emotion? O my lord,
What look you so intently on?

LUSIGNAN.

O heaven!

O Providence! O eyes, do not deceive
My fearful hope—'tis she—it was a present
To my dear wife; my children always wore it
Upon their birthday: O I faint, I die
With rapture.

ZAÏRE.

Ha! what do I hear? my soul
Is lost in doubt; O say, my lord—

LUSIGNAN.

Great God,
Who seest my tears, forsake me not; O thou
Who on this cross didst perish, and for us
Didst rise again, this is thy work, O haste,
Complete it, gracious heaven!

[Turning to Zaire.
And hast thou kept it

Indeed so long? and were you prisoners both,
Both in Cæsarea seized, and brought together?

ZAÏRE.

We were, my lord.

NERESTAN.

Can it be so?

LUSIGNAN.

  Their speech,
Their features, all confirm it; every look
Brings their dear mother to my eyes: O heaven,
Restore my feeble senses thus o'erpowered
With joy! O madam, O Nerestan, help,
Chatillon, to support me! O Nerestan,
If yet I ought to call thee by that name,
Once thou wert wounded, by a desperate hand;
I saw the villain strike thee; hast thou not
The scar upon thy breast?

NERESTAN.

I have, my lord.

LUSIGNAN.

Just God! blessed moment!

NERESTAN.

  [Kneeling.
O my lord! O Zaïre!

LUSIGNAN.

Come near, my children.

NERESTAN.

Am I then your son?

ZAÏRE.

My lord!

LUSIGNAN.

O blessed discovery! happy hour!
My son! my daughter! O embrace your father!

CHATILLON.

Trust me, Chatillon's heart rejoices with you.

LUSIGNAN.

I know not how to force me from your arms,
My dearest children! do I then behold
Once more my wretched family? my son,
Thou art the worthy heir of Lusignan:
But say, my daughter, O dispel the doubts
That rise to check my happiness! O God,
That guidest our fortunes, thou who hast restored
My daughter, have I found a Christian? Zaïre,
Alas! thou weapest, and thy dejected eyes
Are turned aside from me: unhappy woman!
I understand thee but too well: O heaven,
O guilt! guilt!

ZAÏRE.

Yes: I'll not deceive my father:
Brought up in Osman's court, and to his laws
Obedient; punish sir, your wretched daughter;
I own I was a Mussulman.

LUSIGNAN.

The wrath
Of heaven pursues me still: and but for thee,
My son, that word had ended my sad being:
For thee, O God! and in thy glorious cause,
These threescore years old Lusignan hath fought,
But fought in vain; hath seen thy temple fall,
Thy goodness spurned, thy sacred rites profaned:

For twenty summers in a dungeon hid,
With tears have I implored thee to protect
My children; thou hast given them to my wishes,
And in my daughter now I find thy foe:
I am myself, alas! the fatal cause
Of thy lost faith; had I not been a slave—
But, O my daughter! thou dear lovely object
Of all my cares, O think on the pure blood
Within thy veins, the blood of twenty kings,
All Christians like myself, the blood of heroes,
Defenders of the faith, the blood of martyrs:
Thou art a stranger to thy mother's fate;
Thou dost not know, that in the very moment
That gave thee birth, I saw her massacred
By those barbarians, whose detested faith
Thou hast embraced: thy brothers, the dear martyrs, Stretch forth their hands from heaven, and wish to embrace

A sister; O remember them! that God
Whom thou betrayest, for us, and for mankind,
Even in this place expired; where I so oft
Have fought for him, where now his blood by me
Calls loudly on thee: see yon temple, see
These walls; behold the sacred mountain, where Thy Saviour bled; the tomb whence he arose
Victorious; in each path where'er thou treadest
Shalt thou behold the footsteps of thy God:
Wilt thou renounce thy honor and thy father?
Wilt thou renounce thy maker? O my Zaire,
Thou weapest; the blood forsakes thy cheek; I see
Thy heart is softened to repentance: truth,
Sent by indulgent heaven, already beams
On thy enlightened soul; again I find
My daughter; from the hands of infidels
To save her thus in happiness and glory.

NERESTAN.

Do I indeed once more behold a sister?
And is her soul—

ZAÏRE.

Dear author of my life,
My father, speak; what must I do?

LUSIGNAN.

Remove
At once my shame and sorrow with a word,
And say thou art—a Christian.

ZAÏRE.

Then, my lord,
I am a Christian.

LUSIGNAN.

'Tis enough, O God!
Thou hearest, receive, and ratify her vow!

SCENE IV.

ZAÏRE, LUSIGNAN, CHATILLON, NERESTAN, ORASMIN.

ORASMIN.

Madam, the sultan wills me to inform you,
You must this moment leave the place, and quit
These Christian slaves: you, Frenchmen, follow me.

CHATILLON.

What dreadful stroke is this?

LUSIGNAN.

Our courage, friends,
Must now support us.

Zaïre.

51

ZAIËRE.

O my lord!

LUSIGNAN.

O thou,

Whom now I dare not name, remember me,
And swear that thou wilt keep the fatal secret.

ZAIËRE.

I swear.

Farewell! the rest be left to heaven.

ACT III. SCENE I.

OSMAN, ORASMIN.

OSMAN.

Orasmin, 'tis not as thy groundless fears
Suggested to thee; Louis turns no more
His arms against us; his disgusted people
Are wearied with the unsuccessful search
Of climates, which heaven ne'er designed for them:
They will not leave their seats of ease and plenty
To languish in Arabia's sultry deserts,
And wet our verdant palms in Christian blood:
Their ships are spread indeed o'er Syria's sea,
And Asia trembles at the sight; but know,
Towards fertile Egypt Louis bends his way,
In search of Melidor, my secret foe:
Their quarrels fix but on a firmer base
The throne of Osman: I have nought to fear
From Egypt or from France; by their division
My power is strengthened: prodigal of blood,

I thank them for it, they destroy each other,
 To save my subjects and avenge my cause.
 Release those Christians; I would please their master,
 And therefore they shall live; let them be sent
 To Louis; it may teach him to respect
 Our holy faith, and know me for his friend:
 Tell him I give him Lusignan, the man
 Who claims by birth alliance to his throne,
 Whom my brave father twice subdued, and kept
 In chains, nor whilst he lived, would set him free.

ORASMIN.

His name so dear to Christians—

OSMAN.

For his name

I heed it not.

ORASMIN.

O but, my lord, if Louis—

OSMAN.

'Twere needless to dissemble now, Orasmin,
 'Tis Zaïre's will, therefore no more; my heart
 Yields to its conqueror, and Lusignan
 Is given to her; I had not else released
 My pris'ner: Louis is not worth my care;
 But I would make atonement for the wrongs
 Of injured Zaïre and her Christian friends;
 I've been too harsh with them: 'tis but an hour
 Before our happy nuptials, and meantime
 I would oblige my Zaïre; she desires
 Some private conference with the brave Nerestan,
 That generous Christian—

ORASMIN.

And have you complied?

OSMAN.

I have, Orasmin: they were slaves together
 Even from their childhood, and perhaps may ne'er
 Behold each other more; she asks, in short,
 Who must not be denied: the rigid laws
 Of our seraglio were not made for Zaïre;
 I hate its cruel, its severe restraint,
 That binds the free-born soul in shameful bonds,
 And makes a virtue of necessity.
 I am not sprung, thank heaven! of Asian blood,
 But, midst the rocks of Tauric Scythia born,
 From my forefathers boast a Scythian heart,
 Fiery and bold, yet generous and humane:
 I would have all partake of Osman's joy,
 And therefore let Nerestan see her: go,
 Conduct him to her, he attends without;
 Let Zaïre be obeyed.

SCENE II.

ORASMIN, NERESTAN.

ORASMIN.

Please you to rest

A moment here, till Zaïre comes.

SCENE III.

NERESTAN.

[Alone.]

Just heaven!

And must I leave her? cruel fate! to whom,
 To what is she reserved? alas! my father,
 Religion, virtue—but she's here.

SCENE IV.

ZAÏRE, NERESTAN.

NERESTAN.

My sister,
At length we may converse; but what a time
Hath heaven appointed for our meeting! ne'er
Wilt thou behold thy wretched father more.

ZAÏRE.

Not Lusignan? O God!

NERESTAN.

His end is nigh:
His feeble powers, oppressed with sudden joy
At the unexpected sight of his dear children,
Are quite exhausted, and the springs of life
Will soon be motionless; but, O my sister,
Think how the wretched state of his last moments
Will be embittered by his cruel doubts
Concerning thee; uncertain of thy faith
He dies, and asks with his expiring breath
If Zaïre is a Christian.

ZAÏRE.

Am I not
Thy sister? thinkest thou I will e'er renounce
Thy faith and mine, forgetful of the tie
That binds us?

NERESTAN.

Yet thou art a stranger to it;
'Tis but the morning of that glorious day
Which must enlighten thee; thou hast not yet
Received the precious pledge, the sacred stream

That copious flows to wash our crimes away:
 Swear by our miseries, by our family,
 By all those holy martyrs whence we sprung,
 Thou wilt this day receive the mystic seal,
 The mark distinctive of the living God.

ZAIËRE.

I swear to thee, by him whom I adore,
 That God whose laws unknowing I revere,
 Henceforth, Nerestan, to embrace thy faith
 And be a Christian: but, O tell me, what Doth it require of Zaïre?

NERESTAN.

To detest
 Thy tyrant master, and obey the God
 Of our forefathers, that benignant power
 Who died to save us, who conducted me
 To my dear sister, and restored to thee
 Our long-lost father; but, alas! Nerestan
 Cannot instruct thee, mine's a soldier's zeal,
 Devoid of knowledge; soon a holy priest
 Shall visit thee, and open the fair book
 Of wisdom, clear thy mind's obstructed sight,
 And give thee liberty, and life: remember
 Thy oath; take heed that baptism lead thee not
 To curses and to death: but how, my sister,
 Shall I gain leave to bring him to thee? whom
 Must I apply to in this vile seraglio?
 O heaven! that thus the blood of twenty kings,
 The daughter of great Lusignan, that thou,
 Nerestan's sister, and a Christian, thus
 Should be the slave of Osman! but, no more;
 You understand me, Zaïre: gracious God!
 Were we reserved for this at last?

ZAIËRE.

Go on,

My cruel brother, and pursue thy triumph
 O'er Zaïre's weakness; O thou knowest not yet
 Her secret faults, her sorrows, and her crimes:
 Pity, Nerestan, an unhappy sister,
 Misled, betrayed, and dying with despair:
 I am a Christian, and impatient wait
 The holy water that must purge my heart,
 And wash its stains away: I will not live
 Unworthy of my brother, of myself,
 Of my great ancestors, of thee, my father,
 Afflicted Lusignan! but tell me all,
 What will your Christian laws require of Zaïre?
 How will they punish an unhappy woman,
 Left to repine in sad captivity?
 What, if amidst her sorrows she should find
 A generous patron in a brave barbarian,
 Warmed by his goodness, what if she should feel
 A grateful passion, and give up her heart
 To him that saved her?

NERESTAN.

Ha! what sayest thou? rather Might instant death—

ZAIËRE.

Strike, and prevent thy shame;
 For know——

NERESTAN.

O heaven! couldst thou, my sister?

ZAIËRE.

Yes;

I stand condemned, I am my own accuser:
 Osman adores me, and I meant to wed him.

NERESTAN.

To wed him? to wed Osman? can it be?
 Couldst thou, descended from a race of kings,
 Couldst thou, my sister?

ZAÏRE.

Strike; for know, I love him.

NERESTAN.

Shame as thou art to our untainted blood,
 Now, did I listen to the voice of honor,
 Did not the law of that all-saving God
 Whom yet thou knowest not, did not my religion
 Withhold my arm, this moment would I rush
 Into the palace, and there sacrifice
 This vile barbarian, this imperious lover;
 Would plunge the dagger in thy guilty breast,
 Then turn it on my own: O infamy!
 Whilst Louis, the world's bright example, bears
 His conquering legions to the affrighted Nile,
 But to return on wings of victory
 To free thy captive God, and give him back
 His native walls, meantime Nerestan's sister
 Renounces all, and weds an infidel:
 And must I tell the good old man, his daughter
 Hath chosen a Tartar for her God? alas!
 Ev'n now thy dying father kneels to heaven
 For Zaire's happiness.

ZAÏRE.

O stay, my brother,
 Perhaps thy Zaire still deserves thy love;
 Thou dost not know me; spare thy keen reproaches,
 For, O, thy cruel scorn, thy bitter wrath,
 Is worse to me even than the death I asked,

Which yet thou hast refused me: O Nerestan,
 I know thou art oppressed, I know thou sufferest
 For my misfortunes; but I suffer more:
 Would that kind heaven had taken my wretched life,
 Before this heart glowed with a guilty flame
 For Osman! and yet, who that knew his virtues
 Would not have loved him! he did all for me;
 His generous heart from crowds of fond admirers
 Selected Zaïre; she alone subdued
 His fiery soul, and softened his resentment:
 He hath revived the Christian's hope; to him
 I owe the dear delight of seeing thee,
 My brother: O Nerestan, thou shouldst pardon,
 Indeed thou shouldst, for I am truly wretched:
 My oath, my duty, my remorse, my father,
 My fatal passion, and thy cruel anger,
 Are punishment enough: repentance fills
 All Zaïre's soul, and leaves no room for love.

NERESTAN.

I blame, yet pity thee: kind heaven, I trust,
 Will never let thee perish in thy sins;
 The arm of God, that makes the weakest strong,
 Will cherish and support a tender flower
 That bends beneath the fury of the storm:
 He will not suffer thy divided heart
 To fluctuate thus 'twixt Him and a barbarian;
 Baptism will quench the guilty flame, and Zaïre
 In the true faith shall live a pious Christian,
 Or die a martyr: promise then thy father,
 Promise thy king, thy country, and that God
 Whose powerful voice thou hast already heard,
 Thou wilt not think of these detested nuptials
 Before the priest hath opened thy dark mind,

And, in Nerestan's sight, pronounced thee Christian:

Say, wilt thou promise, Zaïre?

ZAÏRE.

Yes; I promise:

Make me a Christian, make me free; do what
Thou wilt with Zaire: but haste, close the eyes
Of my dear father: would I could go with thee,
And die before him!

NERESTAN.

Sister, fare thee well!

Since I must leave thee in this hated palace,
Farewell! remember, I shall soon return
To save thee from perdition, from thyself,
And from the powers of hell, by holy baptism.

SCENE V.

—
ZAÏRE.

[Alone.

I am alone: now hear me, gracious heaven!
For what am I reserved? O God, command
This rebel heart not to relinquish thee!
Am I the daughter of great Lusignan,
Or Osman's wife; a lover, or a Christian?
Ye sacred oaths, my father, and my country,
All shall be heard, all shall be satisfied!
But where's my friend? where is my Fatima?
In this distressful hour the world forsakes me:
Deserted, and forlorn, how shall I bear
The galling weight of these discordant duties!
O God! I will be thine, and thine alone;
But, O! preserve me from the sight of Osman,

The dear, the generous Osman! did I think
 This morn, that ere the day was past, my heart
 Should dread to see him; I whose every hope
 And joy, and happiness, on him alone
 Depended? O! I had no other care,
 No pleasure, but to listen to his love;
 To wish, and wait for, and adore my Osman!
 And now it is a crime to think of him.

SCENE VI.

ZAÏRE, OSMAN.

OSMAN.

Come forth, my love! for my impatient soul
 Is on the wing, and will not brook delay!
 The torch of Hymen casts its sacred light
 On happy Osman, and the perfumed mosque
 Invites us; Mahomet's all-powerful God
 Propitious hears and answers to our vows;
 My people on their knees, in fervent prayer,
 United sue for Zaïre's happiness;
 Whilst thy proud rivals, who disputed long
 My heart with thee, at length confess thy power,
 Pleased to submit, and happy to obey:
 The rites attend thee, and the throne's prepared;
 Haste then, my love, and make thy Osman happy.

ZAÏRE.

O grief! O love! O wretched Zaïre!

OSMAN.

Haste.

ZAÏRE.

O hide me!

OSMAN.

Ha! what sayest thou?

ZAÏRE.

O my lord——

OSMAN.

Give me thy hand, come, beauteous Zaïre, deign——

ZAÏRE.

What can I say to him? assist me, heaven!

OSMAN.

O! I must triumph o'er this tender weakness,
 This sweet embarrassment; it makes me love thee
 With double ardor.

ZAÏRE.

O!

OSMAN.

Those sighs, my Zaïre,
 Endear thee more to Osman; 'tis the mark
 Of modest virtue thus to shrink from love;
 But haste, my charmer, and repay my fondness,
 My constancy——

ZAÏRE.

O Fatima, support me!

My lord——

OSMAN.

Well, what? O heaven!

ZAÏRE.

That heaven's my witness,
 All Zaire's hopes of happiness were placed
 On thee; my soul desired to call thee mine:

Not that I sought the splendor of a throne ;
 Thoughts distant far and nobler filled my breast :
 I could have wish, to thee and to thy virtues
 United, to have lived in solitude,
 With thee despised the pomp of Asia's pride,
 And spurned her crowns and sceptres at my feet :
 But O ! my lord, these Christians——

OSMAN.

What have they
 To do with Osman, or with Osman's love ?

ZAÏRE.

Old Lusignan, oppressed with age and sorrow,
 Now touches his last moments.

OSMAN.

Be it so ;
 What is that Christian slave to thee, or why
 Feelest thou for him ? thou art not of his faith,
 But from thy infant years hast followed mine,
 And worshipped Osman's God ; shall Zaïre weep
 Because an old man pays the debt of nature ?
 At such a time as this shall Zaïre mourn ?
 Should she not rather centre all her cares
 In Osman now, and think of naught but love ?

ZAÏRE.

If ever I was dear to thee——

OSMAN.

If ever !

O God !

ZAÏRE.

Defer, my lord, a little while
 Our nuptials, let me——

OSMAN.

Ha! what sayest thou? heaven!
Can Zaïre speak thus?

ZAÏRE.

O I cannot bear
His anger.

OSMAN.

Zaïre!

ZAÏRE.

O forgive, my lord,
These sighs! alas, I have forgot myself,
Forgot my duty, all I owe to thee:
I cannot bear that look—permit me, sir,
But for a moment to retire, to hide
My tears, my grief, my love, and my despair.
[She goes out.]

SCENE VII.

OSMAN, ORASMIN

OSMAN.

Amazement! dumb and motionless I stand
With horror: did I hear aright, Orasmin,
Was it to me that Zaïre spoke, to Osman?
Does she avoid me; fly from me? O heaven!
What have I seen, and whence this wondrous change?
She's gone, she's lost; I know not who I am,
Or what, or where.

ORASMIN.

You are yourself the cause

Of your complaint, and but accuse a heart
Where you and you alone in triumph reign.

OSMAN.

But why those sighs, those tears, that sudden flight!
Whence that deep sorrow, in her downcast eyes
So plainly written? O if that wily Frenchman—
Horrible thought! how dreadfully the light
Breaks in upon me! 'tis impossible;
A vile barbarian; O, it cannot be
Orasmin; thinkest thou that the heart of Osman
Will e'er descend to fear a Christian slave?
But tell me, thou perhaps couldst mark her features,
And understand the language of her eye;
Am I betrayed? nay, do not hide thy thoughts,
But let me know my misery: ha! thou tremblest;
It is enough.

ORASMIN.

I would not rive thy heart
With fond suspicions: I beheld her weep,
But nothing more; saw naught that could alarm—

OSMAN.

Was I reserved to bear an injury
Like this? had Zaire meant to play me false,
She would have done it with more art; would ne'er
Have openly avowed her treacherous purpose:
O no; she must be innocent; but tell me,
This Frenchman—he, thou sayest too sighed and wept;
And what of that! he might not sigh for her;
It was not love perhaps that made him weep;
Or if it was, why should I fear a slave,
One who to-morrow parts from her forever?

ORASMIN.

Against our laws, my lord, you gave him leave
To see her twice; he came.

OSMAN.

The traitor! yes,
I know he did; but if again he dares
To visit her, I'll tear the slave to pieces,
And mix his life-blood with the faithless Zaïre's.
Pardon, my friend, the transports of a heart
So deeply pierced; it is by nature warm,
And has been wounded in the tenderest part:
I know my rage, Orasmin, and my weakness,
Know 'tis beneath me to be thus disturbed;
But Zaïre—O I cannot, will not think it:
Her heart could ne'er be guilty of such baseness,
It was not made for falsehood; nor shall Osman
Stoop to complaint or mean submission; no:
It were unworthy of a king to wait
For explanations of this strange conduct:
I will resume that empire o'er my heart
Which I had lost, forget the very name
Of Zaïre: yes; henceforth let my seraglio
Be shut forever, fear and terror reign
Within my palace; let despotic power
Rule unreluctant o'er a race of slaves!
Osman henceforth shall be an eastern king,
And reign like them: perhaps we may forget
Our rank a while, and cast an eye of favor
Upon our vassals; but to stand in awe
Of a proud mistress, is most shameful; no:
To western climes we leave such fond submission:
The dangerous sex, ambitious to enslave

Our easy hearts, and bend them to their will,
In Europe rule, but here they must obey.

End of the Third Act.

ACT IV. SCENE I.

ZAÏRE, FATIMA.

FATIMA.

How I admire, and how I pity thee!
The Christian God inspires thee; let not then
Thy soul despair, for he shall give thee strength
To break the powerful chains of mighty love.

ZAÏRE.

When shall I make the glorious sacrifice?

FATIMA.

Thou suest to heaven for pardon, but mayest claim
Its justice; God will guard thy innocence,
And shield thy virtue.

ZAÏRE.

Zaïre never wanted
His kind protection more.

FATIMA.

The God thou servest
Will be a father to thee; he shall guide
Thy wandering steps, speak to thy doubting heart,
And take thee to his bosom: though the priest
Dare not attend thee here—

ZAÏRE.

Alas! my friend,
How have I pierced the soul of generous Osman,
And driven him to despair! a dreadful task!

But 'tis thy will, O God, and I obey :
Zaïre had been too happy.

FATIMA.

Wilt thou then
Hazard the victory after all thy toil?

ZAÏRE.

Unhappy victory, and inhuman virtue!
Alas! thou knowest not, Fatima, how dear
They cost me; all my hopes of happiness
Were fixed on love, and Osman: take my heart,
Accept my guilty tears, subdue my passion
Eternal God, and make me all thy own!
But O my friend, even now the lovely image
Of my dear generous Osman steps between
My God and me; that form is still before me,
Forever in my sight: ye race of kings
From whom I sprang, my father, mother, country,
And thou, my God, since you have taken him from me,
Finish a life that is not worth my care
Without him; let me die a blameless victim,
Let Osman close the eyes of her he loved!
But he has left me, left the wretched Zaïre,
Inquires not, thinks not of me; O I faint,
My Fatima, I never can survive it.

FATIMA.

Remember thou art the daughter of a king,
The favorite of heaven, the chosen of God;
And will not he protect thee?

ZAÏRE.

Will he not
Protect my Osman too? a God of mercy

Can never hate, can never persecute
 A heart so just, so brave, so good as Osman's;
 What could he more, had he been born a Christian?
 O that this holy minister would come,
 This blest interpreter of heaven's high will,
 To ease my wounded heart, and give me comfort!
 Still I have hope that kind benignant God,
 Whose darling attribute is clemency,
 Will not forbid our union, will forgive
 The struggles of a heart so torn as mine;
 Perhaps by raising Zaire to the throne
 Of Syria he might serve the Christian cause:
 Great Saladin, thou knowest, whose potent arm
 Robbed us of Jordan's empire, who, like Osman,
 Was famed for mercy, from a Christian sprung.

FATIMA.

Alas! thou seest not that, to calm thy soul,
 Mistaken as thou art——

ZAIRE.

I see it all;
 See that my father, country, friends, condemn me;
 See that I follow Lusignan, yet love,
 Adore my Osman; see that still my life
 Is linked with his: O I could wish to see him,
 To throw me at his feet, and tell him all.

FATIMA.

That would destroy thy brother, and endanger
 The Christians, who have no support but thee;
 Thou wouldst betray that God who calls thee back
 From error's paths, and bids thee follow him.

ZAIRE.

O didst thou know the noble heart of Osman!

FATIMA.

He is protector of the Mussulman,
 Therefore the more he loves thee, doubtless, Zaïre,
 Less willing must he be to have thee worship
 A God his faith has taught him to abhor.
 The priest, thou knowest, will visit thee in secret,
 And thou hast promised——

ZAÏRE.

I will wait for him;
 I've promised to preserve the secret still
 From Osman; cruel silence! but to make
 My woes complete, I am no longer loved.

SCENE II.

OSMAN, ZAÏRE.

OSMAN.

There was a time when thy deluding charms
 Inflamed my soul; a willing captive then
 I gloried in my chains: I hoped indeed,
 Vain hope! a sovereign sighing at thy feet
 Might claim some kind return, and thought myself
 Beloved by Zaïre: but I am undeceived:
 Yet think not, madam, I will ever stoop
 To mean complaints, or with the whining race
 Of vulgar lovers vindicate my wrongs
 By loud reproaches; no: I am above
 Dissimulation, and am come to tell you
 I mean to treat it with that just contempt
 Which it deserves; think not by female arts,
 Or subtle arguments, to color o'er
 Thy conduct, I disclaim thee, know thee not;

And, for I would not make thee blush, desire
 The hated cause may be a secret still ;
 I would not wish to know it : all is past :
 Another may be found to fill the throne
 Which you despise ; another may have eyes
 Perhaps for Osman's merit, and a heart
 For Osman's love : I know 'twill cost me dear
 To part from Zaire, but I am resolved :
 For I had rather lose thee, rather die
 With anguish and despair, than make thee mine,
 If but a sigh escaped thee for another,
 And not for Osman : fare thee well ; these eyes
 Must ne'er behold thee more.

ZAÏRE.

It is thy will
 O, God, to reign unrivalled in my heart,
 And thou hast robbed me now of all :—my lord,
 Since you no longer love me—

OSMAN.

'Tis too true ;
 Honor commands it ; I adored thee once,
 But I must leave thee, must renounce thee, 'twas
 Thy own request—beneath another law—
 Zaire, thou weepest !

ZAÏRE.

O think not, I beseech you,
 Think not, my lord, I shall regret the pomp
 And splendor of a throne ; it is decreed
 That I must lose thee, such is my hard fate :
 But punish me forever, angry heaven,
 If there be aught on earth I shall regret
 But Osman's heart !

Zaire.

71

OSMAN.

Zaire, thou lovest me!

ZAIRE.

Love him!

O God!

OSMAN.

Amazement? Zaire said she loved me:
Why then thou cruel maid, why tear the heart
Of faithful Osman thus? in my despair,
Alas! I thought I could command myself
To love, or hate; but 'tis impossible:
Zaire can never be forgotten; no:
Osman could never harbor such a thought,
To place another on his throne; forgive
My rage, my madness; 'twas affected all,
All false; I could not leave, I could not hate thee;
It was the only scorn thy tender heart
Ever experienced: O I love thee still,
And ever must: but wherefore thus delay
My happiness? speak, was it fond caprice,
Or was it fear, or artifice? but art
Was never made for thee; thou needest it not:
Even where it is most innocent, it looks
Like falsehood, and perfidiousness: O Zaire,
Let it not break the holy tie that binds us:
I ever have abhorred it: Osman's heart
Is full of naught but truth.

ZAIRE.

Despair, and horror!

O thou art dear to me, indeed thou art,
Believe me, Osman; and the tender love
I feel for thee makes me supremely wretched.

OSMAN.

Explain thyself: O heaven! and can it be?
But thou wert born to make me wretched.

ZAÏRE.

Why

Must I not speak?

OSMAN.

What dreadful secret, Zaïre,
Dost thou keep from me? have the Christian slaves
Conspired against me? speak, am I betrayed?

ZAÏRE.

Who would betray so good so kind a master?
No, generous Osman, thou hast naught to fear;
Zaïre alone is wretched: but her griefs
Are to herself.

OSMAN.

Great God! is Zaïre wretched?

ZAÏRE.

Permit me on my knees, my lord, to ask
One favor of thee.

OSMAN.

Were it Osman's life,
Thou mightest command it: speak, and it is thine.

ZAÏRE.

O would to heaven we could have been united!
But O, my lord, permit me this one day
To be alone; leave me to meditate
On my misfortunes, and to hide my griefs
From thee; to-morrow all shall be revealed:

OSMAN.

O heaven! what woes dost thou inflict upon me!
Canst thou——

Zaïre.

73

ZAÏRE.

If love still pleads for Zaïre, grant her
This one request! do not refuse me.

OSMAN.

Well;

It must be so; I have no will but thine:
Remember that I sacrifice to thee
The dearest, happiest moments of my life.

ZAÏRE.

O talk not thus, my lord, it wounds my heart
Too deeply.

OSMAN.

You will leave me, Zaïre?

ZAÏRE.

Yes:

I must; farewell.

SCENE III.

OSMAN, ORASMIN.

OSMAN.

So soon to seek retirement!

It is an insult o'er my easy heart;
The more I think, Orasmin, on her conduct,
The more am I perplexed; I cannot find
The hidden cause of this mysterious sorrow:
By Osman's partial fondness raised to empire,
Even in the bosom of that happiness
Her soul desired, thus loving and beloved,
Yet are her eyes forever bathed in tears:
I hate her fond caprice, her discontent

And causeless grief—yet was not I to blame?
 Did I not slight her? did I not offend
 My Zaïre? wherefore then should I complain?
 I must atone for my injurious transports
 By double kindness, by indulging her
 In every wish: it is enough that Osman
 Is loved by Zaïre: her untainted soul
 Is void of art; hers is the tender age
 Of innocence and truth, when simple nature
 Guides every thought, and dictates every word:
 I will rely on her sincerity:
 I know she loves me; in her eyes I read
 The tender tale; whilst her impatient soul
 Flew to her lovely lips and told me all:
 Can there on earth be hearts so base as e'er
 To boast a passion which they never feel?

SCENE IV.

OSMAN, ORASMIN, MELIDOR.

MELIDOR.

My lord, the guards have stopped a letter sent To Zaïre.

OSMAN.

Give it me: who sent it to her?

MELIDOR.

One of those Christian slaves whom you released,
 Who, as he strove to enter the seraglio,
 Was seized, and put in chains.

OSMAN.

Ha! what do I read!

Leave me—I tremble——

SCENE V.

OSMAN, ORASMIN.

ORASMIN.

This may clear up all,
And set your heart at ease.

OSMAN.

Ha! let me read
Again; this letter must determine all,
And fix my fate—"Dear Zaire, now's the time
To meet us; near the mosque thou wilt perceive
A secret passage; unsuspected thence
Thou mayest escape, and easily deceive
Thy keepers; we must hazard all; thou knowest
My zeal: I wait impatient for thee; haste,
I cannot live, if thou shouldst prove unfaithful
What sayest thou, my Orasmin?

ORASMIN.

I, my lord?
I'm shocked, astonished at her.

OSMAN.

Now thou seest
How I am treated.

ORASMIN.

O detested treason!
You must resent an injury like this:
You who so lately but on slight suspicion
So deeply felt the wound; a deed so black,
I hope, my lord, will cure you of your love.

OSMAN.

Haste, my Orasmin, fly this instant, show her

That letter—let her tremble, and then plunge
 The dagger in her faithless breast—no, stay,
 Not yet—that Christian first—let him be brought Before her—stay—I can determine nothing,
 My rage o'erpowers me; O I faint, support me,
 Orasmin.

ORASMIN.

'Tis indeed a cruel stroke!

OSMAN.

'Tis all unfolded now, this dreadful secret,
 That sat so heavy on her guilty heart:
 Beneath the specious veil of modest fear
 She left me for a while; I let her go;
 She wept at parting; wept but to betray me;
 O Zaïre, Zaïre.

ORASMIN.

Everything conspires
 To make her doubly guilty: O my lord,
 Fall not a victim to her arts, recall
 Thy wonted courage, and deep sense of wrong.

OSMAN.

This is the gallant, boasted, brave Nerestan,
 The Christian's hero, that proud son of honor,
 So famed for his sublimity of virtue;
 Admired, nay envied by the jealous Osman;
 Who could not bear a rival in a slave,
 And now he stoops to this vile treachery,
 This base imposture: O but Zaïre—she
 Is far more guilty, O a thousand times
 More vile, more impious—a poor Christian slave,
 I might have left her in her mean estate,
 And not debased her; well she knows what Osman
 Has done for her; ungrateful wretch!

ORASMIN.

My lord,
 If midst the horrors of thy troubled soul
 I might be heard—forgive me—but if—

OSMAN.

Yes :
 I'll see, and talk to her—go, fetch her hither ;
 Fly, bring her, slave.

ORASMIN.

In this distracted state
 What can you say to her ?

OSMAN.

I know not what ;
 But I must see her.

ORASMIN.

To complain, to threaten,
 To make her weep, to let your easy heart
 Again be softened by her tears, to seek,
 In spite of all your wrongs, some poor pretence
 To justify her conduct : trust me, sir,
 'Twere better to conceal this paper from her,
 Or send it to her by some hand unknown ;
 Thus, spite of all her arts, thou mayest discover
 Her inmost thoughts, and unsuspected trace
 The secret windings of her treacherous heart.

OSMAN.

Dost thou indeed believe that Zaïre's false ?
 But I will tempt my fate, and try her virtue ;
 I'll try how far a bold and shameless woman
 Can urge her falsehood.

ORASMIN.

O my lord, I fear,
A heart like thine——

OSMAN.

Be not alarmed : alas !
Osman, like Zaïre, never can dissemble :
But I am master of myself, and know
How to restrain my anger : yes, Orasmin ;
Since she descends so low—here—take this letter,
This fatal scroll, choose out a trusty slave,
And send it to her—go :—I will avoid her :
Let her not dare approach—just heaven ! 'tis she.

SCENE VI.

OSMAN, ZAÏRE, ORASMIN.

ZAÏRE.

I have obeyed your orders, and attend you,
But own they much surprised me : whence, my lord,
This sudden message ? what important business——

OSMAN.

Business of moment, madam, of much more
Than you perhaps imagine ; I've reflected
On our condition, Zaïre : we have made
Each other wretched, and 'tis fit we come
To explanations for our mutual interest :
Perhaps my care, my tenderness, my bounty,
The confidence my soul reposed on Zaïre,
My pride forgot, my sceptre at thy feet,
All my officious services demanded
Some kind return from Zaïre ; nay perhaps

Forever courted, and forever pressed
 By a fond lover, thy reluctant heart
 Might yield, mistaking gratitude for love:
 Let us be free and open to each other,
 Answer with truth to my sincerity:
 If love's supreme unconquerable power
 Pleads for another, if thy doubtful heart
 Uncertain wavers 'twixt his claim and mine,
 Avow it frankly, and I here forgive thee;
 But pause not, let me know my rival, quick,
 Now whilst I'm here, whilst I am speaking to thee,
 A moment more will be too late for pardon.

ZAÏRE.

Is this a language fit for me to hear,
 Or you to speak, my lord? I've not deserved it;
 But know, this injured heart, which heaven hath tried

With sore affliction, could defy thy power,
 Did it not feel its foolish weakness still
 For Osman; were it not for my fond love,
 That fatal passion, which I ought no more
 To cherish, never should I thus descend
 To justify my conduct: whether heaven,
 That still hath persecuted wretched Zaïre,
 Decrees that we shall pass our lives together,
 I know not; but, whatever be my lot,
 By honor's sacred laws, that in my heart
 Are deeply graved, I swear, were Zaïre left
 To her own choice, she would reject the vows
 Of powerful monarchs kneeling at her feet;
 All would be hateful to her after Osman:
 But I will tell thee more, will open all
 My foolish heart, will own it sighed for thee
 Long ere thy passion justified my own:

Never did Zaïre own another master,
 Nor ever will: here, bear me witness, heaven!
 If I offended, if I have deserved
 Eternal wrath; if Zaïre has been guilty,
 If she has been ungrateful, 'twas for thee.

OSMAN.

Good heaven! she talks of tenderness and love,
 Though I have proof before me of her falsehood;
 O black ingratitude! O perjured Zaïre!

ZAÏRE.

What says my lord? you seem disordered.

OSMAN.

No:

I am not, for thou lovest me.

ZAÏRE.

That fierce tone,
 And wild demeanor, suit not with thy words;
 Thou talkest of love, yet fillest my heart with terror.

OSMAN.

Thou lovest me?

ZAÏRE.

Canst thou doubt it? yet thy eyes
 Are red with anger; what indignant looks
 They cast upon me; furies in thy aspect!
 Thou dost not doubt me?

OSMAN.

No: I doubt no longer:
 You may retire: be gone.

SCENE VII.

OSMAN, ORASMIN.

OSMAN.

Didst thou observe her
Orasmin? how she braves it to the last
She glories in her crime; so artful too,
So calmly, so deliberately false:
But say, my friend, hast thou dispatched that slave,
That I may know the worst of Zaïre's guilt,
And Osman's shame?

ORASMIN.

I have obeyed your orders;
Now I may hope you will no longer sigh
For Zaïre and her treacherous charms; henceforth
You must behold her with indifference,
Unless you should at last repent your justice,
And love resume his empire o'er your heart.

OSMAN.

Orasmin, I adore her more than ever.

ORASMIN.

Indeed, my lord? O heaven!

OSMAN.

Methinks I see
A dawn of hope before me: this young Christian,
This hated rival, bold, presumptuous, vain
Full of his country's levity, perhaps,
But thinks that Zaïre listened to his vows,
One look from her might easily deceive him:

He thinks himself beloved ; and he alone
 May be to blame, they may not both be guilty :
 She never saw that letter, I have been Too ready to believe myself undone.

Orasmin, mark me—at the dead of night,
 When darkness lends her sable veil to hide
 The crimes of mortals, soon as this Nerestan
 Comes to the palace, instant let the guard
 Seize him, and bound in fetters bring him to me :
 Leave Zaïre free : thou knowest my heart ; thou
                   knowest

To what excess I love ; thou knowest how fierce
 My anger is, how cruel my resentment ;
 I tremble but to think on it myself ;
 O I have been most shamefully deceived ;
 But woe to those who have offended Osman.

End of the Fourth Act.

ACT V. SCENE I.

OSMAN, ORASMIN, a Slave.

OSMAN.

They've told her of it, and she comes to meet him ;
 False wretch !—remember, slave, thy master's fate
 Is in thy hands : give her the Christian's letter ;
 Observe her well, and bring me back her answer ;
 Let me know all—but soft, she's here, Orasmin,
   [To Orasmin.

Come thou with me, and let thy tender friendship
 Teach me to hide my rage and my despair.

SCENE II.

 ZAÏRE, FATIMA, a Slave.

ZAÏRE.

Who can desire to speak with wretched Zaire,
 At such a time, when all is horror round me?
 If it should be my brother! but the gates
 Are shut on every side; yet heaven's high hand,
 To strengthen my weak faith, by secret paths
 Might lead him to me: but what unknown slave—

SLAVE.

This letter, madam, trusted to my hands,
 Will speak my errand.

ZAÏRE.

Give it me.

[She reads.]

FATIMA.

[Aside, whilst Zaire reads the letter.

Great God!

Send down thy blessing, and deliver her
 From barbarous Osman!

ZAÏRE.

Fatima, come near me,
 I must consult with thee.

FATIMA.

[To the slave.

You may retire;
 Be ready when we call for you: away.

SCENE III.

ZAÏRE, FATIMA.

ZAÏRE.

Read this, my Fatima, and tell me what
I ought to do: I would obey my brother.

FATIMA.

Say rather, madam, that you would obey
The will of heaven; 'tis not Nerestan calls,
It is the voice of God.

ZAÏRE.

I know it is;
And I have sworn to serve him: but the attempt
Is dangerous, to my brother, to myself,
To all the Christians.

FATIMA.

'Tis not that alarms you,
'Tis not their danger that suggests thy fears,
'Tis love: I know thy heart would judge like theirs,
Like theirs determine, did not love oppose it:
But O reflect, be mistress of thyself;
You fear to offend a lover who has wronged,
Who has insulted you; thou canst not see
The Tartar's soul through all his boasted virtues:
Did he not threaten even while he adored?
And yet your heart preserves its fond attachment,
You sigh for Osman still.

ZAÏRE.

I have no cause
To hate him, Osman never injured me;

He offered me a throne, and I refused it ;
 The temple was adorned, the rites prepared,
 And I, who ought to have revered his power,
 Despised his offered hand, and braved his anger.

FATIMA.

And canst thou in this great decisive hour
 Neglect thy duty thus to think of love ?

ZAÏRE.

All, all conspires to drive me to despair :
 No power on earth can free me : I would quit
 With joy these walls so fatal to my peace,
 Would wish to see the Christian's happier clime,
 Yet my fond heart in secret longs to stay
 Forever here : how dreadful my condition !
 I know not what I wish, or what I ought
 To do, and only feel myself most wretched :
 O I have sad forebodings of my fate,
 Avert them, heaven ! preserve the Christians, save
 My dearest brother !—when Nerestan's gone,
 I will take courage, and impart to Osman
 The dreadful secret ; tell him to what faith
 This heart is bound, and who is Zaïre's God ;
 I know his generous soul will pity me :
 But, be as it will, whate'er I suffer,
 I never will betray my brother : go,
 And bring him here—call back that slave :

SCENE IV.

—
 ZAÏRE.

[Alone.
 O God

Of my forefathers, God of Lusignan,

And all our race, O let thy hand direct,
Thine eye enlighten Zaire!

SCENE V.

ZAÏRE, a Slave.

ZAÏRE.

Tell the Christian
Who gave thee this, he may depend on me,
And Fatima is ready to conduct him.

[Aside.

Take courage, Zaire, yet thou mayest be happy.

SCENE VI.

OSMAN, ORASMIN, a Slave.

OSMAN.

How lingering time retards my hasty vengeance!
He comes:—well, slave, what says she? answer me,
Speak.

SLAVE.

O my lord, her soul was deeply moved:
She wept, grew pale, and trembled; sent me out,
Then called me back, and with a faltering voice,
That spoke a heart oppressed with sorrow, promised
To meet him there this night.

OSMAN.

[To the slave.

Away; begone;

It is enough.—Orasmin, hence, I loath
The sight of every human being; go,

And leave me to the horrors of my soul ;
I hate the world, myself, and all mankind.

SCENE VII.

OSMAN.[Alone.]

Where am I? gracious heaven! O fatal passion!
Zaïre, Nerestan, ye ungrateful pair,
Haste, and deprive me of a life which you
Have made most wretched: O abandoned Zaïre,
Thou shalt not long enjoy—what ho! Orasmin.

SCENE VIII.

OSMAN, ORASMIN.

OSMAN.

Cruel Orasmin! thus to leave thy friend
In his distress! this rival, is he come?

ORASMIN.

Not yet, my lord.

OSMAN.

Detested night, that lendest
Thy guilty veil to cover crimes like these!
The faithless Zaïre! after all my kindness—
Alas! unmoved, and with an eye serene,
I could have borne the loss of empire, kept
My peace of mind in poverty and chains,
But to be thus deceived by her I love—

ORASMIN.

What purpose you, my lord? may I request—

Zaïre.

OSMAN.

Didst thou not hear a dreadful cry?

ORASMIN.

My lord!

OSMAN.

Methought I heard some noise: they're coming.

ORASMIN.

No:

No creature stirs, the whole seraglio's wrapped
In sleep: all is silent; night's dark shade—

OSMAN.

All sleeps

But guilt, that wakes and spreads its horrors round me:To urge her baseness to a height like this!
O Zaïre, thou couldst never know how much,
How tenderly I loved, how I adored thee;
One look from her, Orasmin, guides my fate,
And makes her Osman blest or cursed forever:
Pity my rage, away! ungrateful woman!

ORASMIN.

And dost thou weep? did Osman weep? O heaven!

OSMAN.

'Twas the first time I ever wept, Orasmin;
But they are cruel tears, and death ere long
Will follow them; thou seest my shame, Orasmin:
Now, Zaïre, weep, for they are tears of blood.

ORASMIN.

I tremble for thee.

OSMAN.

Tremble for my love,
For my hard sufferings, for my vengeance: hark!
They come; I cannot be deceived; I hear them.

ORASMIN.

Close by the palace wall they creep along.

OSMAN.

Fly, seize Nerestan, bring him here in chains
Before me.

SCENE IX.

OSMAN, ZAÏRE, FATIMA.

[In the dark, at the bottom of the stage.]

ZAÏRE.

Fatima, come near me.

OSMAN.

Hark!

What do I hear? 'tis the enchanting voice
That hath so oft seduced me, that false tongue,
The instrument of guilt and perfidy:
But now for vengeance—O 'tis she, 'tis Zaïre,
I cannot strike,

[He takes out a dagger.]

The uplifted poniard drops
From my weak hand: O heaven!

ZAÏRE.

  This is the way,
Come on, support me, Fatima.

FATIMA.

He comes.

Zaïre.

OSMAN.

That word awakes my slumbering rage : she dies.

ZAÏRE.

I tremble every step I take ; my heart
Sinks down with fear : Nerestan, is it you ?
I've waited a long time.

OSMAN.

[Runs up to Zaïre and stabs her.

'Tis I, false woman !

'Tis Osman, whom thou hast betrayed : thou diest.

ZAÏRE.

[Falling on a sofa.

O, I am slain ; great God !

OSMAN.

I am revenged :
What have I done ? punished the guilty : here
I'll leave her :—Ha ! her lover, too—now fate
Completes my vengeance.

SCENE the last.

OSMAN, ZAÏRE, NERESTAN, ORASMIN, Slaves.

OSMAN.

Bring the villain hither :
Approach, thou midnight plunderer, who comest
To rob me of my all : now, traitor, take
Thy due reward ; prepare thyself for torments,
For miseries, almost equal to my own :
You have given orders for his punishment ?

ORASMIN.

I have, my lord.

OSMAN.

A part of it thou feelest
 Already in thy heart; I see thou lookest
 Around thee for the partner of thy crimes,
 The wretch who has dishonored me—look there.

NERESTAN.

What fatal error—ha!

OSMAN.

Look, there she lies

NERESTAN.

What do I see? my sister! Zaire dead!
 O monster! O unhappy hour!

OSMAN.

His sister?

Impossible!

NERESTAN.

Barbarian, 'tis too true:
 Haste, Osman, haste, and shed the poor remains
 Of Lusignan's high blood; destroy Nerestan,
 The last of our unhappy race: know, tyrant,
 That Lusignan was Zaire's wretched father:
 Within these arms the good old man expired:
 And sad Nerestan brought his last farewell,
 His dying words to Zaire: yes, I came
 To strengthen her weak heart, direct her will,
 And turn her to the Christian faith: alas!
 She had opposed the will of heaven, and now
 Our God hath punished her for loving thee.

OSMAN.

Did Zaire love me, Fatima?—his sister?
Did she love Osman, sayest thou?

FATIMA.

Tyrant, yes:

That was her only crime, and thou hast murdered
A lovely innocent who still adored
Her cruel master; still had hopes the God
Of her forefathers gracious would receive
The tribute of her tears, and pity her;
Would have compassion on her artless youth,
Forgive her weakness, and perhaps one day
Unite her to thee: O to that excess
She loved thee, that her heart was long divided
'Twixt Osman and her God.

OSMAN.

It is enough;

I was beloved: away, I'll hear no more.

NERESTAN.

Who next must fall a victim to thy rage?
Thine and thy father's hand have spilt the blood
Of all our race, Nerestan only lives
To brave thee; haste, and send him to that father
Whose guiltless daughter thou hast sacrificed:
Where are your torments? I despise them all:
I've felt the worst thou canst inflict upon me:
But O if yet, all savage as thou art,
Thou canst attend to honor's voice, remember
The Christian slaves whom thou hast sworn to free:
Speak, hast thou yet humanity enough
To keep thy sacred promise? if thou hast,
I die contented.

OSMAN.

Zaïre!

ORASMIN.

O sir, go in,
Let me entreat you—let Nerestan—

NERESTAN.

Speak,
Barbarian, what is thy will?

OSMAN.

[After a long pause.

Take off his chains,

Orasmin, let his friends be all set free;
Let the poor Christians have what'er they wish:
Give them large presents, and conduct them safe
To Joppa.

ORASMIN.

Sir!

OSMAN.

Reply not, but obey me,
I am thy sultan, and thy friend; no more,
But do it instantly—

[To Nerestan.

And thou, brave warrior,
Brave but unfortunate, yet not so wretched
As Osman is, leave thou this bloody scene,
And take with thee that victim of my rage,
The dear, the guiltless Zaïre: to thy king,
And to thy fellow Christians, when thou tellest
Thy mournful story, every eye will shed
A tear for thee; all will detest the crime,
And some perhaps lament the fate of Osman:
But take this dagger with thee, which I plunged
In Zaïre's breast; tell them I killed the best,

The sweetest, dearest innocent, that heaven
Ever formed; this cruel hand destroyed her: tell them

That I adored, and that I have revenged her:

[Stabs himself.

[To his attendants.

Respect this hero, and conduct him safe.

NERESTAN.

Direct me, heaven! 'midst all my miseries,
And all thy guilt, I must admire thee, Osman;
Nay more, thy foe Nerestan must lament thee.

ACT I. SCENE I.

---

CÆSAR, ANTONY.

ANTONY.

Yes, Cæsar, thou shalt reign ; the day is come,
Propitious to thy vows, when haughty Rome
At length shall know, and shall reward thy virtues,
Long time unjust to thee and to herself,
Shall hail thee on the throne her great avenger,
Her conqueror, and her king : on Antony
Thou mayest depend, who never felt the sting
Of envy, but still held thy honor dear,
Even as his own : thou knowest I formed the chain
Which for the neck of Rome thou hast prepared,
Content to be the second of mankind ;
Fonder to bind the wreath on Cæsar's brows
Than rule myself : thou answerest me with sighs,
And the fair prospect that elates my soul
Depresses thine ; the master of the world,
The king of Rome complains : can Cæsar mourn ?
Can Cæsar fear ? what can inspire a soul
Like thine with terror ?

CÆSAR.

Friendship, Antony :

But I must open all my heart to thee.
Thou knowest that I must leave thee, fate decrees

We must transport our arms to Babylon,
To wash out, in the savage Parthian's blood,
The shame of Crassus, and the Roman people:
My touring eagle to the Bosphorus
Shall wing his way, my faithful legions wait
But for the royal wreath around my brows,
The wished-for signal: wherefore should not Cæsar
Subdue a kingdom Alexander conquered?
The Rhine submitted, why should not Euphrates
To Cæsar's arms? that hope shall animate
The bosom of thy friend, yet blind him not;
Fortune perhaps, grown weary of her favors,
At length may leave me; Pompey she betrayed,
And may quit Cæsar too; the deepest wisdom
Is oft deceived: where faction reigns, our fate
Suspended hangs, as on the battle's edge,
'Tis but a step from triumph to disgrace.
Cæsar, thou knowest, these forty years hath served,
Commanded, conquered, seen the fate of empires
Lodged in my hands, and trust me, Antony,
In every action the decisive stroke
Depended on a moment: but whate'er
Chance may bring forth, my heart has nought to fear,
Cæsar shall conquer without pride, or die
Without complaint: but from thy tender friendship
One precious boon I must demand of thee;
My children, Antony, will find a friend,
I hope, in thee: I hope that Rome, by me
Defended, and by me subdued, will own
Thy power; thou shalt, with my sons, enjoy
The name of king, and rule o'er all mankind;
Remember, 'tis the last request I make,
That thou wilt be a father to my children;
I ask not for thy oaths, those idle sureties

Of human faith ; thy promise is sufficient ;
 For purer is thy word than sacred altars,
 Oft stained with human perjury and falsehood.

ANTONY.

It was enough to leave thy Antony,
 And seek for death in foreign climes without him ;
 To Asia's plains when glory calls my friend,
 That I must stay in Italy to plead
 My Cæsar's cause, but it afflicts me more
 To see thy noble heart dejected thus,
 Distrusting fortune, and presaging ills
 That ne'er may happen : wherefore talkest thou thus,
 Of Antony's dividing with thy sons,
 Thy fortunes, and thy fame? thou hast no son
 But thy Octavius, no adopted heir.

CÆSAR.

I can no longer hide from thee, my friend,
 The griefs that prey upon a father's heart ;
 Octavius, by the laws, is made the son
 Of Cæsar's choice, I have appointed him
 My successor ; but fate (or shall I call it Propitious, or unkind I know not which)
 Hath made me father to a real son,
 One whom I love with tenderness, alas !
 But ill repaid by him.

ANTONY.

Can there be one
 So base and so ungrateful, so unworthy
 The noble blood from whence he sprang?

CÆSAR.

Attend,

And mark me well : thou knowest the unhappy
 Brutus,

Instructed in the school of savage virtue
 By the stern Cato, he whose furious zeal
 Defends our ancient laws, the rigid foe
 Of arbitrary power, who, still in arms
 Against me, gives my enemies new hope
 And new support, who in Thessalia's plains
 Was late my captive, whose life twice I saved
 Spite of himself, was born amongst my foes,
 And bred up far from me.

ANTONY.

Could Brutus, could—

CÆSAR.

Believe not me, but read this paper.

ANTONY.

Gods!

The fierce Servilia! Cato's haughty sister!

CÆSAR.

The same; a private marriage made us one.
 Cato, when first our public discord rose,
 Indignant forced her to another's arms,
 But her new husband, on the very day
 That he espoused her, died; and Cæsar's son
 Was brought up in the name of Brutus, still
 Was he reserved, ye gods, to hate his father!
 But read, this fatal scroll will tell thee all.

ANTONY.

[Reads the paper.]

*Cæsar, I die; the wrath of heaven, that cuts
 My thread of life, alone can end my love.
 Farewell: remember, Brutus is thy son:
 And may that tender friendship for his father,
 Which at her latest hour Servilia felt,*

Live in his mind, and make him worthy of thee.
 Has cruel fate to Cæsar given a son
 So much unlike him!

CÆSAR.

Brutus hath his virtues :
 His haughty courage, though it angers me,
 Flatters my pride ; I feel a secret pleasure,
 Though it offends me : his undaunted heart
 Rises superior, and even conquers mine ;
 I am astonished at him, and his firmness
 So shakes my soul I know not how to blame him,
 When he condemns the arbitrary power
 I have assumed : his genius towers above me :
 As man and father, some bewitching charm
 Deceives me still, and pleads his cause within ;
 Or, born a Roman, still my country's voice,
 Spite of myself, breaks forth, and calls me tyrant :
 Perhaps that liberty I mean to oppress,
 Stronger than Cæsar, forces me to love him :
 Nay, more : if Brutus owes to me his life,
 The son of Cæsar must abhor a master ;
 For in my early years I thought like him,
 Detested Sulla, and the name of tyrant :
 Myself had been like him, a citizen,
 The partisan of liberty and Rome,
 Had not that proud usurper Pompey strove
 To crush my fame beneath his growing power ;
 For I was born ambitious, fierce of soul,
 Yet brave and virtuous ; if I were not Cæsar,
 I would be Brutus—but we all must yield
 To our condition : Brutus soon will talk
 Another language, when he knows his birth :
 Trust me, the royal wreath that's destined for him
 Will bend the stubborn temper of his soul :

For manners change with fortune: nature, blood
 My favors, thy advice, united all
 With interest and with duty, must restore him.

ANTONY.

I doubt it much; I know his savage firmness;
 The sect he follows is a sect of fools,
 Perverse and obstinate, whom nothing moves,
 Intractable and bold; they make a merit
 Of hardening minds against humanity,
 Whilst angry nature falls subdued before them;
 To these he listens, and to these alone.
 The horrid tenets which these sons of pride
 Call duty, hold dominion absolute,
 And lord it o'er their adamantine hearts.
 Cato himself, that wretched stoic, he
 Who fell at Utica, that brain-sick hero,
 Who spurned thy proffered pardon, and preferred
 A shameful death to Cæsar's tender friendship,
 Even Cato was less stern, less proud, than he,
 Less to be feared than this ungrateful son,
 Whom thy good heart would thus endear to thee.

CÆSAR.

What hast thou said, my friend? thy words alarm
 me.

ANTONY.

I love thee, Cæsar, and must not deceive thee.

CÆSAR.

Time softens all things.

ANTONY.

I despair of it.

CÆSAR.

What! will his hatred—

ANTONY.

Trust me.

CÆSAR.

Well, no matter :

I am a father still : I oft have served,
Nay saved, my bitterest foes : I would be loved
By Rome and by my son ; my clemency
Shall conquer every heart ; the world subdued,
Shall join with Brutus to adore my power.
Thou must assist me in the great design ;
Thou, Antony, didst lend thy useful arm
To aid me in the conquest of mankind,
Thou too must conquer Brutus ; try to soften
His spirit, and prepare his savage virtue
For the important secret which my heart
Dreads to reveal ; yet he must know it soon.

ANTONY.

I will do all, but cannot hope success.

SCENE II.

CÆSAR, ANTONY, DOLABELLA.

DOLABELLA.

Cæsar, the senators attend your pleasure.
Wait your supreme command, and crave admittance.

CÆSAR.

They've staid too long already ; let them enter.

ANTONY.

They come, with hatred and sour discontent
On every brow.

SCENE III.

CÆSAR, ANTONY, BRUTUS, CASSIUS, CIMBER, DECIMUS, CINNA, CASCA, ETC., LICTORS.

CÆSAR.

[Seated.

Welcome, ye pillars of immortal Rome,
And friends to Cæsar: Cimber, Decimus,
Cassius, and Cinna, and thou, dearest Brutus,
Come near: at length behold the important hour
When Cæsar, if the gods shall smile upon me,
Goes to complete the conquest of the world,
To seize the throne of Cyrus, and appease
Our Crassus' angry shade: the time is come
When what remains of universal empire,
Still unsubdued, shall yield to Rome and me:
Euphrates calls; to-morrow I depart.
Brutus and Cassius follow me to Asia;
Antony's care is Gaul and Italy;
Cimber must rule o'er the subjected kings
Of Betis' borders, and the Atlantic sea;
Lycia and Greece I give to Decimus;
Pontus to thee, Marcellus; and to Casca
All Syria's wide domain. Our conquests thus Protected, and Rome left in happiness
And union, naught remains but to determine
What title Cæsar, arbiter of Rome,
And of the world, shall wear: by your command
Sulla was called Dictator; Marius, Consul;
And Pompey, Emperor: I subdued the last,
Let that suffice; new empires will demand
New names; we must have one more great, more sacred,

Less liable to change; one long revered
 In ancient Rome, and dear to all mankind.
 'Tis rumored through the world, that Rome, in vain,
 Wars on the Persian; that a king alone
 Must conquer there, and only kings can rule:
 Cæsar will go, but Cæsar is no king,
 An humble citizen alone, but famed
 For his past service, subject to the will
 And fond caprice of an uncertain people,
 Who yet may thwart—you understand me, Romans,
 You know my hopes, my merit, and—my power.

CIMBER.

Cæsar, I'll answer thee. Those crowns, and sceptres,
 That world you give us, to the people's eye,
 And to the senate, jealous of their rights,
 Appear an injury, not a favor done,
 On such conditions: Marius, Pompey, Sulla,
 Those proud usurpers of the people's power,
 Never pretended thus to canton out
 Rome's conquests, or to dictate thus, like kings:
 We hoped from Cæsar's clemency a gift
 More precious, and a nobler treasure, far Above the kingdoms which thy bounty gave.

CÆSAR.

What wouldst thou ask of Cæsar?

CIMBER.

Liberty.

CASSIUS.

It was thy promise; thou didst swear thyself
 Forever to uproot despotic power.
 I thought the happy moment now was come,

When the world's conqueror should have made us
happy:

Rome bathed in blood, deserted, and enslaved,
Found comfort in that hope: we were her children
Before we were thy slaves—I know thy power,
And know what thou hast sworn.

BRUTUS.

Be Cæsar great,

But Rome still free: the mistress of the world
Abroad, shall she be manacled at home!
Rule o'er the universe, be called a queen,
And yet be fettered! What will it avail
My wretched country, and her sons, to know
That Cæsar has new slaves to trample on?
Perhaps the Persians are not our worst foes,
We may have greater. I've no more to offer.

CÆSAR.

And thou, too, Brutus!

ANTONY.

[Aside to Cæsar.]

Mark their insolence;
And see if they are worthy of thy favor.

CÆSAR.

And dare ye thus, ungrateful as ye are,
Abuse my patience, and exhaust my love?
My subjects all, by right of conquest mine,
I bought you with my sword; ye spurned indeed
At Marius, but ye were the slaves of Pompey,
And only breathed till Cæsar's wrath, too long
Restrained already, bursts with fury on you.
Ye vile republicans, by mercy taught
But to rebel, ye dared not thus have talked
To Sulla; but my clemency provokes

Your base ungrateful spirit to insult me:
 Cæsar, you think, will never condescend
 To take revenge, this makes you talk so bravely
 Of Rome and of your country, and affect
 This patriot pride, this grandeur of the soul,
 Before your conqueror: to Pharsalia's plains
 You should have brought them; fortune now has placed us
 At distance from each other: henceforth learn,
 Who knows not how to conquer, must obey.

BRUTUS.

No: Cæsar we shall only learn to die.
 Who begged his life in Thessaly? Thou gavest
 What was not asked indeed, but to debase us,
 And we abhor the gift on such conditions.
 Obey thee? No: pour forth thy wrath upon us;
 Begin with me; strike here, if thou wouldst reign.

CÆSAR.

Brutus attend—you may retire.

[To the senators, who go out.

What words

Are these? away! They pierce my very soul;
 Cæsar is far from wishing for thy death:
 Leave this rash senate, I entreat thee—stay,
 Thou only canst disarm me; thee alone
 Cæsar would wish to love: stay with me, Brutus.

BRUTUS.

But keep thy promise, and I'm thine forever:
 If thou art a tyrant, I detest thy love;
 I will not stay with Antony or thee:
 He is no Roman, for he wants a king.

SCENE IV.

CÆSAR, ANTONY.

ANTONY.

What says my friend? Did Antony deceive him?
 Thinkest thou that nature e'er can move a soul
 So fierce, and so inflexible? No: leave,
 I beg thee, unrevealed the fatal secret
 That weighs upon thy heart: let him deplore
 The fall of Rome, but never let him know
 Whose blood he persecutes: he merits not
 His noble birth, ungrateful to thy goodness,
 Ungrateful to thy love; henceforth renounce him.

CÆSAR.

I cannot, for I love him still.

ANTONY.

Then cease
 To love thy power, renounce the diadem,
 Descend from the high rank which thou hast borne;
 Mercy ill suits with thy authority:
 It checks thy growing power, and mars thy purpose.
 What! Rome beneath thy laws, and suffer Cassius
 To thwart thee thus; and Cimber, too, and Cinna;
 Shall senators like these, obscure and low,
 Talk thus before the sovereign of mankind?
 The vanquished wretches breathe, and brave their master?

CÆSAR.

My equals born, they yielded to my arms;
 Too much above to fear them, I forgive
 Their trembling at the yoke which they must bear.

ANTONY.

Marius had been less sparing of their blood,
And Sulla would have punished them.

CÆSAR.

That Sulla

Was a barbarian, born but to oppress:
Murder and rage were all his policy,
And all his grandeur: amidst sighs and groans,
And punishments and death, he governed Rome:
He was its terror, I would be its joy,
And its delight: I know the people well;
A day will change them; lavish of their love
And of their hatred; both are gained with ease:
My grandeur galls them, but my clemency
Attracts them still: 'tis policy to pardon
The foe that cannot hurt us, and an air
Of liberty will reconcile their minds,
And make their chains fit easy: I must cover
The pit with flowers, if I would draw them to it,
And soothe the tiger ere I bind him fast.
Yes, I will please them, even whilst I oppress,
Charm, and enslave them, and revenge myself
On every foe by forcing him to love me.

ANTONY.

You must be feared, or you will never reign.

CÆSAR.

In battle only Cæsar would be feared.

ANTONY.

The people will abuse thy easy nature.

CÆSAR.

I tell thee, no; the people worship me.

Behold that temple there, which Rome hath raised
To Cæsar's clemency.

ANTONY.

They'll raise another
Perhaps to vengeance: thou hast cause to dread
Their rancorous hearts, still cherished by despair,
Cruel by duty, and the slaves of Rome.
Cassius alarmed foresees that Antony
This day shall place the crown on Cæsar's head,
And even before thy face they murmured at it.
'Twere best to gain the most impetuous of them,
And win them to our interest: to prevent
All danger, Cæsar must constrain himself.

CÆSAR.

Could I have feared, I would have punished them;
Advise me not to make myself detested:
Cæsar has learned to fight, has learned to conquer,
But knows not how to punish: let us hence,
And, strangers to suspicion and revenge,
Rule without violence o'er the conquered world.

End of the First Act.

ACT II. SCENE I.

BRUTUS, ANTONY, DOLABELLA.

ANTONY.

This bitterness of hate, this proud refusal,
Breathes less of virtue than of savage fierceness:
Cæsar's indulgence, his high rank and power,
At least deserved a milder treatment from you,
And more complacency; you might at least

Have talked with him: did you but know with whom
You are at variance, you would shudder at it—

BRUTUS.

I shudder now; but 'tis at hearing thee;
Foe to thy country, which thou hast betrayed
And sold to Cæsar, thinkest thou to deceive
Or to corrupt me? go, and cringe to him,
Fawn on your haughty lord. I know your arts,
You long to be a slave; you want a king.
Yet you are Roman.

ANTONY.

Brutus, I'm a friend,
And boast a heart that loves humanity:
I am contented with this humble virtue:
But thou wouldst be a hero, yet art naught
But a barbarian; and thy savage pride
Grew fond of virtue, but to make us loathe her.

SCENE II.

—
BRUTUS.

[Alone.]

What baseness, heaven! what ignominious slaves!
Behold, my wretched country, your support,
Horatius, Decius, and thou great avenger
Of sacred laws, Brutus, my kindred blood,
Behold your successors; just gods, are these
The noble relics of our Roman grandeur?
We kiss the hand that binds us to the yoke;
Cæsar has ravished even our virtues from us:
I look for Rome, but find it now no more.
O ye immortal heroes, ye who fell
In her defence, whose images now strike

My soul with awe, and fill my eyes with tears,
 The family of Pompey, and thou Cato,
 Thou last of Scipio's glorious race, I feel
 A lively spark of your immortal virtues
 Rebound from you, and animate my heart:
 You live in Brutus still, and in his breast
 Have left the honor of the Roman name
 The tyrant would have stolen. What do I see,
 Great Pompey, at thy statue's foot? a paper.

[He takes the paper and reads.]

Brutus, thou sleepest, and Rome's in chains.

O Rome,

My eyes are ever open still for thee;
 Reproach me not for chains which I abhor.
 Another paper! No: thou art not Brutus:
 Cruel reflection! Tyrant Cæsar, tremble,
 This stroke must end thee: no: thou art not Brutus,
 I am, I will be Brutus; I will perish,
 Or set my country free: Rome still, I see,
 Has virtuous hearts: she calls for an avenger,
 And has her eyes on Brutus; she awakens
 My sleeping soul, and shakes my tardy hand:
 She calls for blood, and shall be satisfied.

SCENE III.

BRUTUS, CASSIUS, CINNA, CASCA, DECIMUS,
Attendants

CASSIUS.

'Tis the last time we may embrace, my friends.
 Buried beneath the ruins of his country,
 Cassius must fall; Cæsar can ne'er forgive me;
 He knows our hearts, he knows our resolution;

Our souls, untainted by corruption, thwart
 His purposes; in us he will destroy
 The last of Romans: yes, my friends, 'tis past;
 Our laws, our country, and our honor's lost;
 Rome is no more; he triumphs over her,
 And o'er mankind; our thoughtless ancestors
 But fought for Cæsar, but for Cæsar conquered:
 The spoils of kings, the sceptre of the world,
 Six hundred years of virtues, toils, and war,
 Were spent for Cæsar; he enjoys the fruit
 Of all our dear-bought victories: O my Brutus,
 Wert thou, too, born to crouch beneath a master?
 Our liberty is gone.

BRUTUS.

It will revive.

CASSIUS.

What sayest thou? hark! did you not hear a shout?

BRUTUS.

'Twas the vile rabble: think not of them, Cassius.

CASSIUS.

Didst thou say, liberty—that noise again!

SCENE IV.

BRUTUS, CASSIUS, DECIMUS, CIMBER.

CASSIUS.

Ah! Cimber, is it thou? speak, what hath happened?

DECIMUS.

Some new attempt on liberty and Rome?
 What has thou seen?

CIMBER.

Our shame. When haughty Cæsar
Came to the temple, he looked down upon us
Even like the thunderer, Capitolian Jove;
Then proudly told us of his bold design
Of adding Persia to the Roman empire:
The people knelt before their idol, called him
Rome's great avenger, conqueror of the world;
But Cæsar wanted yet another title
To gratify his insolent ambition;
When, lo! amidst this scene of adulation,
Came Antony, and bustled through the crowd
That stood 'twixt him and Cæsar; in his hand
A crown and sceptre: when, O shameful act,
Disgraceful to a Roman! whilst we stood
In silent admiration, unabashed,
He placed the crown on Cæsar's head; then knelt,
And cried out, "Cæsar, live and reign o'er us,
And o'er the world:" our Romans, as he spake,
Turned pale, and with their cries tumultuous wrung
The temple's vaulted roof: some fled with terror,
Whilst others blushing stood, and wept their fate.
Cæsar, who read resentment in their looks,
And indignation but too visible,
With well-dissembled modesty, took off
The radiant crown, and rolled it at his feet.
Instant the scene was changed, and every Roman
Welcomed with smiles returning liberty,
Ill-founded hopes, and momentary joy!
Antony seemed astonished: Cæsar still
Blushed and dissembled; and the more he strove
To hide his grief, the more was he applauded.
By moderation he would veil his crimes,
Affects to scorn the crown, and spurn it from him:
But, spite of all his efforts to conceal it,

Was galled within to hear the people praise him
 For virtues which he never will possess.
 No longer able to conceal his rage
 And disappointment, with contracted brow
 He left the capitol, and in an hour
 The senate must attend him: an hour hence
 Shall Cæsar change the state of Rome: thou
     knowest,

O Brutus! half our senate is corrupted,
 Have bought their country, and will sell it now
 To Cæsar: they are far more infamous
 Even than the people, who at least abhor
 The name of king: Cæsar, already vested
 With regal power, yet wishes for the crown;
 The people have refused him, but the senate
 Bestow it on him: what remains?

CASSIUS.

To die;

To end a life of misery and reproach:
 I've dragged it on whilst yet a ray of hope
 Dawned on my country, but her latest hour
 Is come, and Cassius never shall survive her.
 Let others weep for Rome, I can't avenge
 My country's cause, but I can perish with her.
 I go where all our gods—O Scipio, Pompey,
 'Tis time to follow you, and imitate
 Great Cato.

BRUTUS.

No: we'll not be followers,
 But bright examples: the world's eye, my friends,
 Is fixed on us; be it our part to answer
 The great expectance of our bleeding country.
 Had Cato taken my counsel, he had fallen
 More nobly, and the tyrant's blood had flowed

Mixed with his own: he turned his blameless hand
 Against himself; but little did his death
 Avail mankind: Cato did all for glory,
 And nothing for his country: there, my friends,
 There only erred the greatest of mankind.

CASSIUS.

What can we do in this disastrous crisis?

BRUTUS.

[Shows the paper.]

See what was wrote to me, and learn our duty.

CASSIUS.

The same reproach was sent to me.

BRUTUS.

It shows

We had deserved it.

CIMBER.

Quick, the fatal hour
 Approaches, when a tyrant shall destroy
 The Roman name: one hour, and all is gone.

BRUTUS.

One hour, and Cæsar—dies.

CASSIUS.

Ha! now thou art

What Brutus should be.

DECIMUS.

Worthy of thy race,
 The scourge of tyrants; thou hast spoke the thoughts
 Of my own heart.

CASSIUS.

O Brutus, thou revivest me ;
 'Twas what my sorrows, what my rage expected
 From thy exalted virtue ; Rome inspires
 The great design ; thy voice alone decrees
 The death of tyrants : O my dearest Brutus,
 Let us blot out this infamous reproach
 On all mankind, and whilst Jove's thunder sleeps,
 Avenge the capitol. What say ye, Romans,
 Have ye the same unconquerable heart,
 The same desires ?

CIMBER.

Cassius, we think with you,
 Despise the thought of life, abhor the tyrant ;
 We love our country, and we will avenge her.
 If there's a spark of Roman virtue left,
 Brutus and Cassius will revive it.

DECIMUS.

Born

The guardians of the state, the great avengers
 Of every crime, too long the oppressive hand
 Of power hath galled us, and 'twere added guilt
 To spare the tyrant, or suspend the blow :
 Say, whom shall we admit to share this honor ?

BRUTUS.

We are ourselves enough to save our country.
 Emilius, Dolabella, Lepidus
 And Bibulus, are all the slaves of Cæsar.
 Cicero may serve us with his eloquence,
 And that alone ; he can harangue the senate,
 But is too timid in the hour of danger :
 He'll talk for Rome, but is not fit to avenge her :
 We'll leave the orator who charms his country
 The task of praising us when we have saved it.

With you alone, my friends, will I partake
 This glorious danger, this immortal honor:
 The senate are to meet him an hour hence,
 There I'll surprise, destroy him there: this sword,
 Deep in his bosom buried, shall avenge
 Cato, and Pompey, and the Roman people:
 I know the attempt is perilous and bold:
 His watchful guards are placed on every side:
 The changeful people, fluttering and inconstant,
 Are doubtful whether they should love or hate him.
 Death seems, my friends, to be our certain fate:
 But O how glorious such a death will be!
 How much to be desired! how noble is it
 To fall in such a cause, to see our blood
 Flow with the blood of tyrants; with what pleasure
 Shall we behold this last illustrious hour!
 Yes, let us die, my friends, but die with Cæsar;
 And may that liberty his crimes oppress
 Rise from his ashes, and forever flourish!

CASSIUS.

Debate not then, but to the capitol
 Let us away; there he has injured us,
 And there 'tis fit he should be sacrificed:
 Fear not the people, though they are doubtful now,
 Whene'er the idol falls, they will detest him.

BRUTUS.

Swear then with me upon this sword; all swear
 By Cato's blood, by Pompey's, by the shades
 Of those brave Romans who in Afric's plains
 Fell glorious; swear by all the avenging gods
 Of Rome, that Cæsar by your hands shall die.

CASSIUS.

Let us do more, my friends; here let us swear
 To root out all who, like himself, shall strive

To govern here: sons, brothers, fathers, all,
 If they are tyrants, Brutus, are our foes:
 A true republican has neither son,
 Father, nor brother, but the commonweal,
 His gods, the laws, his virtue, and his country.

BRUTUS.

Forever let me join my blood with yours;
 All linked together in one sacred knot,
 The adopted sons of Liberty and Rome,
 We'll seal our union with the tyrant's blood.

[Advancing towards the statue of Pompey.]

By you, illustrious heroes, who excite
 Our duty and inspire the great design,
 O Pompey, at thy sacred knees, we swear,
 Naught for ourselves we do, but all for Rome,
 We swear to be united for our country;
 We swear to live, to fight, and die together.
 Let us be gone: away: we've staid too long.

SCENE V.

 CÆSAR, BRUTUS.

CÆSAR

Stop, Brutus, I must talk with thee; attend:
 Where wouldst thou fly?

BRUTUS.

From tyranny, and thee.

CÆSAR.

Lictors, detain him.

BRUTUS.

Thou wouldst have my life,

Take it.

CÆSAR.

No: Brutus, had I wanted that,
 Thou knowest, I could command it with a word,
 And thou hast merited no better fate:
 It is the pride of thy ungrateful heart
 Still to offend me; and I find thee here
 Amongst those Romans whose dark perfidy
 I most suspect, with those who proudly dared
 To blame my conduct, and defy my power.

BRUTUS.

They talked like Romans, gave thee noble counsel:
 Hadst thou been wise, thou wouldst have followed it.

CÆSAR.

Yet I'll be calm, and bear thy insolence,
 Will stoop beneath myself, and talk to thee.
 What layest thou to my charge?

BRUTUS.

A ravaged world,
 The blood of nations, and thy plundered country;
 Thy power, thy specious virtues that gild o'er
 Thy crimes, thy fatal clemency, that makes
 Thy chains so easy, a destructive charm
 To soothe thy captives, and deceive mankind.

CÆSAR.

Reproach like this had suited Pompey well;
 He whose dissembled virtues have betrayed thee,
 That haughty citizen, more fatal far,
 Would not admit even Cæsar as his equal.
 Thinkest thou, if he had conquered, his proud soul
 Had left secure the liberty of Rome?
 He would have ruled you with a rod of iron,
 What then had Brutus done?

BRUTUS.

He would have slain him.

CÆSAR.

Is that the fate which Cæsar must expect
From thee? thou answerest not. O Brutus, Brutus,
Thou livest but for my ruin.

BRUTUS.

If thou thinkest so,
Prevent my fury. What withholds thee?

CÆSAR.

[Giving him the letter from Servilia.]

Nature,
And my own heart: read there, ungrateful, read
And know whose blood thou hast opposed to mine;
See whom thou hatest, and if thou darest, go on.

BRUTUS.

[Reading.]

What have I read? where am I? do my eyes
Deceive me?

CÆSAR.

Now, my son, my Brutus.

BRUTUS.

Cæsar

My father, gracious gods!

CÆSAR.

Ungrateful, yes,
I am thy father: whence this deadly silence?
Why sobbest thou thus, my son? Why do I hold thee
Thus in my arms mute and insensible?
Nature alarms, but cannot soften thee.

BRUTUS.

O dreadful fate! it drives me to despair:
 My oaths! my country! Rome forever dear!
 Cæsar—alas! I've lived too long.

CÆSAR.

O speak,

I see thy heart is laboring with remorse
 And anguish: O hide nothing from me: still
 Thou art silent: does the sacred name of son
 Offend thee, Brutus? art thou fearful of it?
 Fearest thou to love me, to partake my fortunes?
 Is Cæsar's blood so hateful to thee! Oh,
 This sceptre of the world, this power supreme,
 For thee alone, that Cæsar, whom thou hatest,
 Desired them: with Octavius and thyself
 I wished but to divide the rich reward
 Of all my labors, and the name of king.

BRUTUS.

O gods!

CÆSAR.

Thou canst not speak: these transports, Brutus,
 Spring they from hatred, or from tenderness?
 What secret weight hangs heavy on thy soul?

BRUTUS.

Cæsar—

CÆSAR.

Well, what?

BRUTUS.

I cannot speak to him.

CÆSAR.

Thou seemest as if thou durst not call me father.

BRUTUS.

O if thou art my father, grant me this,
This only boon.

CÆSAR.

Ask it: to give it thee
Will make me happy.

BRUTUS.

Kill me then this moment,
Or wish no more to be a king.

CÆSAR.

Away!

Barbarian, hence! unworthy of my love,
Unworthy of thy race, thou art no more
My son: go, henceforth I disclaim thee;
My heart shall take example from thy own,
And stifle nature's voice; shall learn of thee
To be inhuman: hence, I know thee not.
Think not I mean again to supplicate,
No, thou shalt see I've power to crush you all:
I will no longer listen to the pleas
Of mercy, but obey the laws of justice;
My easy heart is weary of forgiveness:
I'll act like Sulla now, like him be cruel,
And make you tremble at my vengeance: go,
Find out your vile seditious friends, they all
Insulted me, and all shall suffer for it:
They know what Cæsar can do, and shall find
What Cæsar dare: if I am barbarous,
Remember, thou alone hast made me so.

BRUTUS.

I must not leave him to his cruel purpose,
But save, if possible, my friends, and Cæsar.

ACT III. SCENE I.

CASSIUS, CIMBER, DECIMUS, CINNA, CASCA,
with the rest of the Conspirators.

CASSIUS.

At length the hour is come when Rome again
Shall breathe, again shall flourish; unoppressed
By tyrants, soon the mistress of the world
To freedom and to fame shall be restored.
Yours is the honor, Decimus, and Casca,
Cimber, and Probus, but one hour and Cæsar
Shall be no more: what Cato, Pompey, all
The power of Asia, never could perform,
We, my brave friends, alone shall execute;
We will avenge our country: on this day
Thus may we speak to all mankind: "Henceforth Respect the state of Rome, for she is free."

CIMBER.

Behold thy friends all ready to obey thee;
To live or die with thee; to serve the senate;
To take the tyrant's life, or lose their own.

DECIMUS.

But where is Brutus, Cæsar's deadliest foe,
He who assembled, he who made us swear,
Who first shall plunge the dagger in his breast,
Why comes he not? The son-in-law of Cato
Should not have tarried thus; he may be stopped;
Cæsar perhaps may know—but see he comes;
Gods! what dejection in his aspect!

SCENE II.

To them BRUTUS.

CASSIUS.

Brutus,
 What sinks thee thus? what new misfortune? say.
 Doth Cæsar know it all? is Rome betrayed?

BRUTUS.

He knows not our design upon his life,
 But trusts to you.

DECIMUS.

What then hath troubled thee?

BRUTUS.

A dreadful secret, that will make you tremble.

CASSIUS.

Cæsar's approaching death! perhaps our own!
 Brutus, we all can die, but shall not tremble.

BRUTUS.

I will unveil it, and astonish thee.
 Cæsar thou knowest is Brutus' foe; I've sworn
 To kill him, fixed the time, the place, the moment
 Of his destruction: 'tis but what I owe
 To Rome, to you, and your posterity,
 Nay, to the happiness of all mankind,
 And the first blow must come from Brutus' hand:
 All is prepared; and now let me inform thee,
 That Brutus is—his son.

CIMBER.

The son of Cæsar!

Cæsar.

CASSIUS.

His son!

DECIMUS.

O Rome!

BRUTUS.

Yes: Cæsar and Serviliæ

Married in private, Brutus was the fruit
Of their unhappy nuptials.

CIMBER.

Art thou then

A tyrant's son?

CASSIUS.

It cannot, must not be:
Thou art too much a Roman.

BRUTUS.

'Tis too true;

Ye see, my friends, the horror of my fate:
But I am yours, for sacred is my word:
Which of you all hath strength of mind sufficient,
With more than stoic courage, far above
The common race of men, to tell me how Brutus should act? I yield me to your sentence:
All silent! all with downcast eyes! thou, Cassius,
Wilt not thou speak? no friendly hand stretched out
To save me from this horrid precipice!
Cassius, thou tremblest; thy astonished soul—

CASSIUS.

I tremble at the counsel I must give.

BRUTUS.

Yet speak.

CASSIUS.

Were Brutus one amongst the crowd
 Of vulgar citizens, I should have said,
 Go, be a brother tyrant, serve thy father,
 Destroy that country which thou shouldst support;
 Rome shall hereafter be revenged on both:
 But I am talking to the noble Brutus,
 The scourge of tyrants, whose unconquered heart
 Hath not a drop of Cæsar's blood within it:
 Thou knewest the traitor Catiline, whose rage
 Was well nigh fatal to us all.

BRUTUS.

I did.

CASSIUS.

If on the day when that abhorred monster
 Levelled the blow at liberty and Rome,
 If when the senate had condemned the traitor
 He had acknowledged Brutus for his son,
 How wouldst thou then have acted?

BRUTUS.

Canst thou ask me?

Thinkest thou, my heart, thus in a moment changed,
 Could balance 'twixt a traitor and my country!

CASSIUS.

Brutus, that word alone points out thy duty:
 It is the senate's will, and Rome's in safety.
 But say, hast thou indeed those secret checks
 Which vulgar minds mistake for nature's voice,
 And shall a word from Cæsar thus extinguish
 Thy love for Rome, thy duty, and thy faith?
 Or true or false the secret that he told thee,
 Is he less guilty, art thou less a Roman,
 Art thou not Brutus, though the son of Cæsar?

Is not thy hand, thy heart, thy honor pledged
 To us and to thy country? If thou art
 The tyrant's son, Rome is thy mother still,
 We are thy brothers. Born as Brutus was Within these sacred walls, the adopted son
 Of Cato, bred by Scipio and by Pompey,
 The friend of Cassius, what wouldst thou desire?
 These are thy noblest titles, and another
 Would but disgrace them: what if Cæsar, smit
 With lawless passion for the fair Servilia,
 Seduced her to his arms, and gave thee birth,
 Bury thy mother's follies in oblivion:
 'Twas Cato formed thy noble soul to virtue,
 And Cato is thy father; therefore loose
 The shameful tie that binds thee to another:
 Firm to thy oaths and to thy cause remain,
 And own no parents but the world's avengers.

BRUTUS.

My noble friends, to you I next appeal.

CIMBER.

By Cassius judge of us, by us of Cassius:
 Could we think otherwise, of all Rome's sons
 We were most guilty: but why ask of us
 What thy own breast can best inform thee? Brutus
 Alone can tell what Brutus ought to do.

BRUTUS.

Now then, my friends, I'll lay my heart before you,
 With all its horrors; O 'tis deeply wounded,
 And tears have flowed even from a stoic's eye:
 After the dreadful oath which I have made
 To serve my country, and to kill my father,
 I weep to see myself the son of Cæsar,
 Admire his virtues, and condemn his crimes,

Lament the hero, and abhor the tyrant,
 Pity and horror rend my troubled soul;
 I wish that fate you have prepared for him
 Would fall on Brutus: but I'll tell you more,
 Know, I esteem him, and 'midst all his crimes,
 His nobleness of heart has won me to him:
 If Rome could e'er submit to regal power,
 He is the only tyrant we should spare.
 Be not alarmed; that name alone secures me,
 Rome and the senate have my faith, the welfare
 Of all mankind declares against a king.
 Yes, I embrace the virtuous task with horror,
 And tremble at it, but I will be faithful:
 I go to talk with Cæsar, and perhaps
 To change and soften him, perhaps to save
 Rome and himself: O may the gods bestow
 Persuasive utterance on my lips, and power
 To move his soul; but if in vain I plead
 The cause of liberty, if Cæsar still
 Is deaf to my entreaties, strike, destroy him,
 I'll not betray my country for my father.
 The world, astonished, may approve or blame
 My cruel firmness, and this deed hereafter
 Be called a deed of horror, or of glory;
 My soul is not ambitious of applause,
 Or fearful of reproach; a Roman still,
 And independent, to the voice of duty
 And that alone I listen; for the rest,
 'Tis equal all; away; be slaves no longer.

CASSIUS.

The welfare of the state depends on thee,
 And on thy sacred word we shall rely,
 As if great Cato and the gods of Rome
 Had promised to defend us.

Vol. 19—9

SCENE III.

BRUTUS.

[Alone.]

Cæsar comes

Even now to meet me, 'tis the appointed hour,
 And this the place, even in the capitol,
 Where he must die : let me not hate him, gods !
 O stop this arm uplifted to destroy him,
 Inspire his noble heart with love of Rome,
 And if he is my father, make him just !
 He comes : I have not power to speak, or move,
 Great spirit of Cato, now support my virtue !

SCENE IV.

CÆSAR, BRUTUS.

CÆSAR.

Brutus, we're met : what wouldst thou ? hast thou yet
 A human heart ? art thou the son of Cæsar.

BRUTUS.

I am, if Cæsar be the son of Rome.

CÆSAR.

Was it for this, thou proud republican,
 We met together ? comest thou to insult me ?
 Not all my bounties showered upon thy head,
 Glory and empire, and a subject world,
 Waiting to pay thee homage, naught can move
 Thy stubborn heart : what thinkest thou of a crown ?

BRUTUS.

I think on it with horror.

CÆSAR.

Prejudice

And passion blind thee, I excuse thy weakness ;
But canst thou hate me ?

BRUTUS.

No : I love thee, Cæsar ;

Thy noble deeds long since inclined my heart
To reverence thee ; before thou hadst disclosed
The secret of my birth, I wept to see thee
At once the glory and the scourge of Rome :
Would Cæsar be a Roman citizen,
I should adore him, and would sacrifice
My life and fortune to defend his cause ;
But Cæsar, as a king, I must abhor.

CÆSAR.

What dost thou hate me for ?

BRUTUS.

Thy tyranny.

O listen to the counsel, to the prayers,
The tears of Rome, the senate, and thy son ;
Wouldst thou desire to be the first of men ?
Wouldst thou enjoy a right superior far
To all that war and conquest can bestow ?
Wouldst thou be more than king, nay more than Cæsar—

CÆSAR.

What's to be done ?

BRUTUS.

Thou seest the world enslaved,
Bound to thy chariot ; break their chains in sunder,
Renounce the diadem, and be a Roman.

CÆSAR.

What hast thou bade me do?

BRUTUS.

What Sulla did
 Before thee ; he had waded in our blood.
 He made Rome free, and all was soon forgotten ;
 Deep as his hands were dipped in deadly slaughter.
 He left the throne, and washed his crimes away.
 Thou hadst not Sulla's cruelty and rage,
 Adopt his virtues then ; thy heart, we know,
 Can pardon, therefore can thy heart do more ;
 'Tis Rome thou must forgive : then shalt thou reign
 As Cæsar should, then Brutus is thy son :
 Still do I plead in vain ?

CÆSAR.

Rome wants a master,
 As one day thou perhaps mayest dearly prove.
 Brutus, our laws should with our manners change ;
 That liberty thou dotest on is no more
 Than the fool's right to hurt himself, and Rome,
 That spread destruction round the world, now seems
 To work her own ; the great Colossus falls,
 And in her ruin buries half mankind :
 To me she stretches forth her feeble arm
 To aid her in her perils. Since the days
 Of Sulla, all our virtue's lost ; the laws,
 Rome, and the state, are naught but empty names.
 Alas ! thou talkest in these corrupted times
 As if the Decii, and Æmiliï lived ;
 Cato deceived thee, and thy fatal virtue
 Will but destroy thy country, and thyself ;
 Submit thy reason to the conqueror
 Of Cato and of Pompey, to a father
 Who loves thee, Brutus, who laments thy errors ;

Give me thy heart, and be indeed my son :
 Take other steps, and force not nature thus
 Against thyself : not answer me, my Brutus,
 But turn thy eyes away ?

BRUTUS.

I'm not myself :
 Strike me, ye gods ! O Cæsar—

CÆSAR.

Thou are moved,
 I see thou art, my son ; thy softened soul—

BRUTUS.

Thy life's in danger ; knowest thou that, my father ?
 Knowest thou, there's not a Roman then but wishes
 In secret to destroy thee ? let thy own,
 Thy country's safety, plead my cause : by me
 Thy genius speaks, it throws me at thy feet,
 And presses for thy welfare ; in the name
 Of all those gods thou hast so late forgotten,
 Of all thy virtues, in the name of Rome ;
 Shall I yet add the tender name of son,
 A son who trembles for thee, who prefers
 To Cæsar Rome alone, O hear, and save me !

CÆSAR.

Leave me, my Brutus, leave me.

BRUTUS.

Be persuaded.

CÆSAR.

The world may change, but Cæsar never will.

BRUTUS.

This is thy answer then ?

Cæsar.

CÆSAR.

I am resolved;
Rome must obey, when Cæsar hath determined.

BRUTUS.

Then fare thee well.

CÆSAR.

Ha! wherefore? stay, my son,
Thou weepest, can Brutus weep? is it because
Thou hast a king? dost thou lament for Rome?

BRUTUS.

I weep for thee, and thee alone; farewell!

[Exit Brutus.]

CÆSAR.

Heroic virtue! how I envy Brutus!
Would I could love like him the commonweal!

SCENE V.

CÆSAR, DOLABELLA, ROMANS.

DOLABELLA.

Cæsar, the senate, at the temple met
By thy command, await thee, and the throne
Already is prepared, the people throng
Around thy statues, and the senate fix
Their wavering minds; but, if I might be heard
If Cæsar would give ear to one who loves him,
A fellow-soldier and a friend, to augurs,
To dreadful omens, to the gods themselves,
He would defer the great event.

CÆSAR.

Away:

Defer such glorious business ! lose a crown !
 What power shall stop me ?

DOLABELLA.

Nature doth conspire
 With heaven to blast thy purpose, and foretell
 Thy death.

CÆSAR.

No matter, Cæsar's but a man ;
 Nor do I think that heaven would e'er disturb
 The course of nature, or the elements
 Rise in confusion, to prolong the life
 Of one poor mortal ; by the immortal gods
 Our days are numbered ; we must yield to fate ;
 Cæsar has nought to fear.

DOLABELLA.

Cæsar has foes,
 And this new yoke may gall them ; what if these Conspire against thee !

CÆSAR.

O they dare not do it.

DOLABELLA.

Thy heart's too confident.

CÆSAR.

Such poor precautions
 Would make me look contemptible, perhaps
 Would do me little service.

DOLABELLA.

For Rome's safety
 Cæsar should live : at least permit thy friend
 To attend thee to the senate.

Cæsar.

CÆSAR.

No: why alter
Our first resolve? why hasten the decrees
Of fate? who changes only shows his weakness.

DOLABELLA.

I quit thee with regret, and own I fear.
Alas! my heart beats heavily.

CÆSAR.

Away.

Better to die than be afraid of death:
Farewell.

SCENE VI.

DOLABELLA, ROMANS.

DOLABELLA.

What hero better could deserve
The homage of mankind? O join with me,
Ye Romans, to admire and honor Cæsar;
Live to obey, and die to serve him—heaven!
What noise is that, what dreadful clamors!

The CONSPIRATORS.

Die,

Die, tyrant: courage, Cassius.

DOLABELLA.

Fly, and save him.

SCENE VII.

CASSIUS, a dagger in his hand, DOLABELLA, ROMANS.

CASSIUS.

The deed is done: he's dead.

DOLABELLA.

Assist me, Romans,
Strike, kill the traitor.

CASSIUS.

Hear me, countrymen,
I am your friend, and your deliverer,
Have broke your chains, and set the nation free:
The conquerors of the world are now the sons
Of liberty.

DOLABELLA.

O Romans, shall the blood
Of Cæsar—

CASSIUS.

I have slain my friend, to serve
The cause of Rome; he would have made you slaves,
And therefore have I slain him: is there one
Amongst you all, so base, so mean of soul,
As to be fond of slavery, and regret
A tyrant's loss? is there one Roman left
That wishes for a king? if one there be,
Let him appear, let him complain to Cassius;
But ye are fond of glory all, I know
Ye are, and will applaud me for the deed.

ROMANS.

Perish his memory! Cæsar was a tyrant.

CASSIUS.

Preserve these generous sentiments, ye sons
 Of happy Rome, ye masters of the world;
 Antony means, I know, to tamper with you,
 But you'll remember, he was Cæsar's slave,
 Bred up beneath him from his infant years,
 And in corruption's school has learned from him
 The tyrant's art; he comes to vindicate
 His master, and to justify his crimes;
 Contemns you all, and thinks he can deceive you:
 He has a right to speak, and must be heard,
 Such is the law of Rome, and to the laws
 I shall submit; but in the people still
 Is lodged the power supreme, to judge of Cæsar,
 Of Antony, and me: ye now once more Possess those rights which had been wrested from you,

Which Cæsar took, and Cassius hath restored:
 He will confirm them: but I go, my friends,
 To meet great Brutus at the capitol;
 To those deserted walls once more to bring
 Long absent justice, and our exiled gods;
 To calm the rage of faction, and repair
 The ruins of our liberty: for you,
 I ask you but to know your happiness,
 And to enjoy it: let no artifice
 Deceive you, but beware of Antony.

ROMANS.

If he speak ill of Cassius, he shall die.

CASSIUS.

Romans, remember these your sacred oaths.

ROMANS.

The friends of Rome shall ever be our care.

SCENE VIII.

ANTONY, ROMANS, DOLABELLA.

First ROMAN.

But Antony appears.

Second ROMAN.

What can he dare

To offer?

First ROMAN.

See, his eyes are bathed in tears;
Hark, how he sighs, he's deeply troubled.

Second ROMAN.

Oh,

He loved him but too well.

ANTONY.

I did indeed;

I loved him, Romans, would have given my life
To save my friend's; and who amongst you all
Would not have died for Cæsar, had you known,
Like me, his virtues? to the laws he fell
A noble sacrifice: I come not here
To gild his memory with a flattering tale,
The world was witness to his deeds, the world
Proclaims his glory; I but ask your pity,
And beg you to forgive the tears of friendship.

First ROMAN.

Cassius, you might have shed them for your country,
For Rome in slavery; Cæsar was a hero,
But Cæsar was a tyrant too.

Second ROMAN.

A tyrant
 Could have no virtues: Cassius was our friend,
 And so was Brutus.

ANTONY.

I have naught to urge
 Against his murderers; they meant, no doubt,
 To serve the state; whilst generous Cæsar poured
 His bounties on their heads, they shed his blood;
 But, had he not been guilty, Rome would ne'er
 Have acted thus, he must have been to blame:
 And yet, did Cæsar ever make you groan
 Beneath his power? did he oppress his country?
 Did he reserve the fruit of all his conquests
 But for himself, or did you share the spoil?
 Were not the treasures of the conquered world
 Laid at your feet, and lavished all on you?
 When he beheld his weeping countrymen,
 From his triumphal car he would descend
 To soothe their griefs, and wipe their tears away.
 What Cæsar fought for, Rome in peace enjoys;
 Rich by his bounty, by his virtues great;
 He paid the service and forgot the wrongs
 Which he received; immortal gods! you knew
 His heart was ever ready to forgive.

ROMANS.

Cæsar was always merciful.

ANTONY.

Alas!
 Could his great soul have ever stooped to vengeance
 He yet had lived, and we had still been happy.
 Not one of all his murderers but shared
 His bounties; twice had he preserved the life

Of Cassius—Brutus—horrible to think!
 O heaven! my friends, I shudder at the crime,
 The base assassin, Brutus, was—his son.

ROMANS.

His son! ye gods!

ANTONY.

I see, it shocks your souls,
 I see the tears that trickle down your cheeks:
 Yes; Brutus is his son: but you, my friends,
 You were his children, his adopted sons:
 O had ye seen his will!

ROMANS.

What is it? tell us.

ANTONY.

Rome is his heir; his treasures are your own,
 And you will soon enjoy them: O he wished
 To serve his Romans, even beyond the grave:
 'Twas you alone he loved, for you had gone
 To sacrifice his fortune and his life
 In Asia's plains: "O Romans," oft he cried,
 "You are my sovereigns, I am the world's master,
 And you are mine." Could Brutus have done more,
 Or Cassius?

ROMANS.

We detest them.

First ROMAN.

Cæsar was

The father of his country.

ANTONY.

But he's gone;
 Your father is no more: the pride, the glory
 Of human nature, the delight of Rome,

Cut off by vile assassins ; shall he go
 Unhonored, undistinguished to the tomb?
 Shall we not raise the funeral pile to one
 So dear, the father, and the friend of Rome?
 Behold, they bring him here.

[The farther part of the stage opens, and discovers the lictors carrying the body of Cæsar, covered with a bloody robe; Antony descends from the rostrum, and kneels down near the body.]

ROMANS.

O dreadful sight!

ANTONY.

Behold the poor remains of Cæsar! once
 The first of men, that god whom you adored,
 Whom even his murderers loved, your best support,
 In peace your guardian, and in war your glory,
 Who made whole nations tremble, and the world
 Bow down before him: is this he, ye Romans,
 This bleeding corse, is this the mighty Cæsar?
 Mark but his wounds: here Cimber pierced him,
 there

The perjured Cassius, and there Decimus ;
 There, with unnatural hand, the cruel Brutus
 Deep plunged the fatal poniard: Cæsar looked Towards his murderer, with an eye of love
 And mild forgiveness, as he sunk in death
 He called him by the tender name of son ;
 "My child," he cried——

First ROMAN.

The monster! O that heaven
 Had taken him hence before this fatal deed!

[The people crowd round the body.]
 The blood still flows.

ANTONY.

O it cries out for vengeance:
From you demands it: hearken to the voice;
Awake, ye Romans, hence, and follow me
Against these vile assassins; the best tribute
That we can pay to Cæsar's memory,
Is to extirpate these usurpers: haste,
And with the torch that lights his funeral pile
Set fire to every traitor's house, and plunge
Your daggers in their breasts: away, my friends,
Let us avenge him; let us offer up
These bloody victims to the gods of Rome.

ROMANS.

We follow thee, and swear by Cæsar's blood
To be revenged: away.

ANTONY.

[To Dolabella.]

We must not let
Their anger cool, the multitude we know
Is ever wavering, fickle, and inconstant:
We'll urge them to a war, and then perhaps
Who best avenges Cæsar may succeed him.

ACT I. SCENE I.

---

EUPHEMON, RONDON.

RONDON.

Come, come, cheer up, my old, melancholy friend, how happy will it make me to see you merry again! and merry we will be: what a pleasure it is to think my daughter will revive your drooping family! But this same son of ours, this Master Fierenfat, seems to me to behave strangely in the affair.

EUPHEMON.

How so!

RONDON.

Puffed up with his presidentship, he makes love by weight and measure: a young fellow putting on the gray beard, and dictating to us like a Cato, is, in my opinion, a mighty ridiculous animal; I would prefer a fool to a coxcomb at any time; in short, brother, he is too proud, and self-sufficient.

EUPHEMON.

And let me tell you, brother, you are a little too hasty.

RONDON.

I cannot help it; it is my nature: I love truth, I love to hear it, and I love to speak it: I love now and then to reprove my son-in-law, to rate him for his coxcombial, pedantic airs: to be sure, you acted like a wise father, to turn your elder son out of doors; that gamester, that wild rake-helly profligate, to make room for this prudent younger brother; to place all your hopes on this promising youth, and buy a presidentship for him. O 'twas a wise act no doubt: but the moment he became Mr. President, by my troth, he was stuffed up with vanity and impertinence: he goes like clock-work, walks and talks in time, and says he has a great deal more wit than I have, who, you know, brother, have a great deal more than you: he is—

EUPHEMON.

Nay, nay, what a strange humor this is! must you always be—

RONDON.

Well, well, no matter; what does it signify? all these faults are nothing when people are rich: he is, as I was going to say, covetous, and every covetous man is wise: O it is an excellent vice for a husband, a most delightful vice. Come, come, this very day he must be my son-in-law; Lise shall be his: it only remains now, my dear sorrowful friend, that you make over all your goods and chattels, hereditary or acquired, present and future, to your son, only reserving to yourself a moderate income: let everything be signed and sealed as soon as possible, that this same young gentleman of yours may throw a good fortune into our laps, without which my daughter will most certainly look another way for a husband.

EUPHEMON.

I have promised you, sir, and I will keep my word: yes, Fierenfat shall have everything I am possessed of: the sad remainder of my unhappy life shall glide away silently in some distant retreat: but I cannot help wishing that one, for whom I design my all, was less eager to enjoy it: I have seen the mad debauchery of one son, and now behold with concern the soul of the other devoted to interest.

RONDON.

So much the better, man, so much the better.

EUPHEMON.

O my dear friend, I was born to be an unfortunate father.

RONDON.

Let me have none of your lamentations, your sighs, and your groans: what! do you want your elder hopeful to come back, that prodigal spend-thrift, to spoil all our pleasure at once, and drop in like a trouble-feast on the day of marriage?

EUPHEMON.

No, no.

RONDON.

Would you have him come, and swear the house down?

EUPHEMON.

No.

RONDON.

Beat you, and run away with my daughter, with my dear Lise; my Lise, who—

EUPHEMON.

Long may that charming maid be preserved from such wicked fellows!

RONDON.

Do you want him to come again to plunder his father? Do you want to give him your estate?

EUPHEMON.

No, no: his brother shall have it all.

RONDON.

Ay! or my daughter will have none of him.

EUPHEMON.

To-day he shall have Lise, and all my fortune: his brother will have nothing of me but the anger of a father, whom he hath grievously injured: he has deserved my hatred; an unnatural boy!

RONDON.

Indeed you bore with him too long; the other at least has acted with discretion: but as for him, he was a profligate: my God, what a libertine! Do you not remember, ha! ha! that was a droll trick enough, when he robbed you of your clothes, horses, linen, and movables, to equip his little Jourdain, who left him the very next morning. Many a time have I laughed at that, I own.

EUPHEMON.

O what pleasure can you find in repeating my misfortunes?

RONDON.

And then his staking twenty rouleaux upon an ace; O dear! O dear!

EUPHEMON.

Have done with this.

RONDON.

Don't you remember, when he was to have been betrothed to my little Lise in the face of the church, where he had hid himself, and upon whose account, too?—the debauched rogue!

EUPHEMON.

Spare me the remembrance, good Rondon, of these unhappy circumstances, that only set his conduct in the worst light: am I not already unfortunate enough? I left my own house, the place of my nativity, on purpose to remove as far as possible from my thoughts the memory of a misfortune, which, whenever it recurs, distracts me. Your business led you to this place; we have entered into a connection with, and friendship for, each other; let me entreat you, Rondon, make the proper use of it. You are always repeating truths of some kind or other; but let me tell you, truth is not always agreeable.

RONDON.

Well, well, it is agreed; I say no more; I ask pardon; but surely the devil was in you, when you knew his violent temper, to make a soldier of him.

EUPHEMON.

Again!

RONDON.

Forgive me, but really you ought—

EUPHEMON.

I know it: I know I ought to forget everything but my younger son, and his marriage: but tell me sincerely, Rondon, think you he has been able to gain your daughter's heart?

RONDON.

O no doubt of it: my girl is a girl of honor, and will be obedient to her father: if I tell her she must fall in love, her little docile heart, which I can turn and wind just as I please, falls in love immediately, without any arguing about the matter: I know how to manage her, I warrant you.

EUPHEMON.

I have notwithstanding some doubts about her obedience in this affair, and am greatly mistaken if she answers your expectation: my elder son had a place in her affections: I know how strong the first impressions of love are upon a tender heart; they are not worn out in a day; indeed, my friend, they are not.

RONDON.

Nonsense, nonsense.

EUPHEMON.

Say what you please, that wild fellow knew how to be agreeable.

RONDON.

Not he indeed: he was nobody: a poor creature: no, no; never you fear that: after his behavior to you, I bade my daughter never to think of him any more; therefore set your heart at rest. When I say no, who shall dare to say yes? But you shall see, here she comes.

SCENE II.

EUPHEMON, RONDON, LISE, MARTHA.

RONDON.

Come hither, my dear: this day, my dear, is a grand holiday for you, I am sure; for this day I intend to give you a husband: now tell me, my little Lise, be he old or young, handsome or ugly, grave or gay, rich or poor, shall you not have the strongest desire to please him? have you not already an inclination for him? are you not in love with him?

LISE.

No, sir.

RONDON.

How, gipsy—

EUPHEMON.

O ho! my liege: why, your power is a little on the decline. What is become of your despotic authority!

RONDON.

Ha! how is this! what, after all I said to you, have you no passion for your future husband? no inclination? no—

LISE.

None in the least, sir.

RONDON.

Don't you know your duty obliges you to give him your whole heart?

LISE.

No, sir; I tell you, no. I know, sir, how far a heart, obedient to the dictates of virtue, is obliged by the solemn tie of marriage. I know, sir, it is a wife's duty to make herself as amiable as possible, and to endeavor to deserve a husband's tenderness; to make amends by goodness for what she wants in beauty; abroad to be discreet and prudent; at home, affable and agreeable; but, as for love, it is quite another thing: it will not endure slavery: inclination can never be forced, therefore never attempt it: to my husband I shall yield up everything—but my heart, and that he must deserve before he can possess it: depend upon it, that the heart will never be taught to love by the command of a father; no, nor be argued into it by reason, nor frightened into it by a lawyer.

EUPHEMON.

In my opinion, the girl talks sensibly, and I approve the justice of her argument: my son, I hope, will endeavor to make himself worthy of a heart so noble and so generous.

RONDON.

Hold your tongue, you old doting flatterer, you corrupter of youth: without your encouragement, the girl would never have thought of prating to me in this ridiculous manner.

[To Lise.]

Hark ye, miss, I have provided you a husband, perhaps he may have a little of the coxcomb, and take upon him rather too much; but it is my business to correct my son-in-law, and yours to take him, such as he is: to love one another as well as you can, and obey me in everything, that's all you have to do: and now, brother, let us go sign and seal with my scrivener, who will give us a hundred words where four would be sufficient: come, let us away, and rattle the old brawler: then will I come back, and scold my son, and your daughter, and yourself.

EUPHEMON.

Mighty well, sir: come along.

SCENE III.

—

LISE, MARTHA.

MARTHA.

My God! what an odd mixture it is! how strangely the old gentleman jumbles his ideas together!

LISE.

I am his daughter still; and his odd humors, after all, don't alter the goodness of his heart. Under this violence of passion, and air of resentment, he has still the soul of a father; nay, sometimes, even in the midst of his freaks, and while he is scolding me, he will take my advice: to be sure, when he finds fault with the husband he has provided for me, and tells me of the hazard I run in such a marriage, he is but too much in the right: but when, at the same time, he lays his commands on me to love him, then indeed he is most miserably wrong.

MARTHA.

How is it possible you should ever love this Monsieur Fierenfat? I'd sooner marry an old soldier, that swears, gets drunk, beats his wife, and yet loves her, than a coxcomb of the long robe, fond of nobody but himself; who, with a grave tone and pedantic air, talks to his wife as if he was examining her in a court of justice; a peacock that is always looking at his own tail, who bridles under his band, and admires himself; a wretch who has even more covetousness than pride, and makes love to you as he counts out his money.

LISE.

Thou hast painted him to the life; but what can I do? I must submit to this marriage: we are not the disposers of our own fate: my parents, my fortune, my age, all conspire to force me into the bonds of wedlock. This Fierenfat, in spite of my dislike of him, is the only man here who can be my husband: he is the son of my father's friend, and I can't possibly shake him off. Alas! how few hearts are bestowed according to their own inclinations! I must yield: time and patience perhaps may conquer my disgust of him; I may reconcile myself to the yoke, and come at last to pass over his faults as I do my own.

MARTHA.

Mighty well resolved indeed, my beautiful and discreet mistress: but your heart, I am afraid, is not quite so open—O if I dared—but you have forbidden my ever mentioning—

LISE.

Whom?

MARTHA.

Euphemon—who, spite of all his vices, I know, had once an interest in your heart; who loved you.

LISE.

O never, never: mention no more a name which I detest.

MARTHA.

[Going off.

Well, well, I say no more about him.

LISE.

It is true, his youth did for a little time betray me into a tenderness for him; but was he formed to make a virtuous woman happy?

MARTHA.

[Going.

A dangerous fool indeed, madam.

LISE.

He met with too many corrupters to lead him astray, unhappy youth! he took his round of pleasures, but knew little, I believe, of love.

MARTHA.

And yet there was a time when you seemed to think you had caught him in the toils.

LISE.

If he had really loved, it might have reformed him; for, believe me, a real passion without disguise is the best curb on vice; and he who feels it, either is a worthy man, or soon will be so: but Euphemon despised his mistress, left love and tenderness for folly and debauchery. Those worthless villains, who pretended to be his friends, and drew him into the snare, after having exhausted all his mother's fortune, robbed his unhappy father, and laid it upon him : to complete his misery, those vile seducers took him away from his father's protection, and snatched him from me ; hid him forever from these eyes, which, bathed in tears, still lament his vices and his charms. I think no more about him.

MARTHA.

His brother, it seems, succeeds to his fortunes, and is to marry you ; more's the pity, I say : t'other had a fine face, fair hair, a good leg, danced well, sang well, in short, was born for love.

LISE.

What are you talking of ?

MARTHA.

Even in the midst of all his freaks and follies, all his strange conduct, one might see a fund of honor in his heart.

LISE.

There was ; he seemed formed for virtue.

MARTHA.

Don't think, madam, I mean to flatter him : but to do him justice, he was not mean, nor servile ; no railer, no sharper, no liar.

LISE.

No : but—

MARTHA.

Away : here comes his brother.

LISE.

Nay : we must stay now, it is too late to get off.

SCENE IV.

LISE, MARTHA, FIERENFAT, the President.

FIERENFAT.

To be sure, madam, this augmentation of fortune must make the match more agreeable: increase of riches is increase of happiness, and, as I may say, the very soul of housekeeping: fortune, honor, and dignity will not be wanting to the wife of M. Fierenfat. At Cognac, madam, you will have the precedency of the first ladies of the beau-monde, let me tell you, madam, no little satisfaction: you will hear them whispering as you go along, "There she goes, Madame la Presidente": really, madam, when I reflect upon my rank, my riches, the privilege of my high office, and all the good qualities I possess altogether, with my right of eldership which will be made over to me, I assure you, madam, I pay you no small compliment.

MARTHA.

Now, for my part, I am of another opinion: always to be talking of your quality, your rank, and your riches, is extremely ridiculous: a Midas and Narcissus at once, blown up with your pride, and contracted with avarice; always looking at yourself and your money; a petit-maitre with a band on; the most unnatural of all human creatures: a young coxcomb may pass off, but a young miser is—a monster.

FIERENFAT.

I believe, sweetheart, it is not you whom I am to marry to-day, but this lady; therefore, you will please, madam, to trouble your head no more about us; silence will become you best.

[Turning to Lise.

You, madam, I hope, who in an hour or two are to be my wife, will, I hope, favor me so far as, before night, to dismiss this blustering body-guard of yours, who makes use of a chambermaid's privilege to give rein to her impertinence: but I would have her know I am not a President for nothing, and may, perhaps, lock her up for her own good.

MARTHA.

[To Lise.

Speak to him, madam, and defend me: if he locks me up, he may lock you up, too, for aught I know.

LISE.

[Aside.

I augur ill from all this.

MARTHA.

Speak to him then, and don't mutter.

LISE.

What can I say to him?

MARTHA.

Abuse him.

LISE.

No: I'll reason with him.

MARTHA.

That will never do, take my word for it; t'other's the better way.

SCENE V.

RONDON, FIERENFAT, LISE.

RONDON.

Upon my word, a pleasant affair this.

FIERENFAT.

What's the matter?

RONDON.

You shall hear. As I was tramping to your old gentleman with the parchments, I met him at the foot of this rock, talking with a traveller who had just alighted from a coach.

LISE.

A young traveller?

RONDON.

No: a toothless old fellow leaning on a crutch. I observed them rubbing their gray beards against each other for some time, shrugging up their hump-backs, and sighing most piteously; then they turned up the whites of their eyes, and fell to snivelling together: at last Euphemon, with a crabbed face, told me he had met with a great calamity, that at least he must have time to weep before he could sign the articles, and at that time could not talk to anybody.

FIERENFAT.

O I must go myself and comfort him: you know I can manage him as I please; besides, the affair is really my own concern; but as soon as he sees me with the contract in my hand, he will sign immediately. Time is precious, and my new right of eldership a matter of importance.

LISE.

There is no hurry, sir, you need not be so impatient.

RONDON.

But I say he shall be in a hurry: all this is your doing, madam.

LISE.

How, sir! mine!

RONDON.

Yes, yours, madam. All the crosses and disappointments that make families unhappy, come from undutiful daughters.

LISE.

What have I done, sir, to disoblige you?

RONDON.

What have you done! turned everything topsyturvy; put us all in confusion: but I'll let these two wiseacres lay their heads together a little, and then marry you off in spite of their teeth; in spite of yourself, too, if you provoke me.

End of the First Act.

ACT II. SCENE I.

LISE, MARTHA.

MARTHA.

I see this matrimony frightens you a little: this noise and bustle of preparation has something terrible in it.

LISE.

To say the truth, so it has ; and the more I think on the weight of this yoke, the more this heart of mine trembles at it. Marriage, in my opinion, is the greatest good, or the greatest evil ; there is no such thing as a medium in it : where hearts are united, where harmony of sentiment, taste and humor strengthen the bonds of nature, where love forms the tie, and honor gives a sanction to it, it is surely the happiest state which mortals can enjoy. What pleasure must it be to own your passion publicly, to bear the name of the dear beloved object of your wishes ! your house, your servants, your livery, everything carrying with it some pleasing remembrance of the man you love ; and then to see your children, those dear pledges of mutual affection, that form, as it were, another union : O such a marriage is a heaven upon earth : but to make a vile contract, to sell our name, our fortune, and our liberty, and submit them to the will of an arbitrary tyrant, and be only his first slave, an upper servant in his family ; to be eternally jarring, or running away from one another, the day without joy, and the night without love ; to be always afraid of doing what we should not do ; to give way to our own bad inclinations, or to be continually opposing them ; to be under the necessity either of deceiving an imperious husband or dragging out life in a languid state of troublesome duty and obedience ; to mutter, and fret, and pine away with grief and discontent ; O such a marriage is the hell of this world.

MARTHA.

The young ladies of this age have certainly, they say, some little demon, some familiar, to inspire them! Why, what a deal of knowledge this girl has picked up in so short a time! the most expert, artful widow in Paris, that ever comforted herself with the thought of having buried three husbands, could not have talked more learnedly on this head than my young mistress here; but we must have a little éclaircissement with regard to this marriage, which it seems is so mighty disgusting: you don't approve of Monsieur le President, pray how should you like his brother? Come, unriddle the mystery to me. Has not the elder brother supplanted the younger? Come, whom do you love, or whom do you hate? Tell me the truth at once, and speak honestly.

LISE.

I know nothing about it: I cannot, dare not tell you the cause of my dislike. Why would you search for a melancholy truth at the bottom of a heart already but too deeply afflicted? We can never see ourselves in the water, whilst the tempest is howling around us; no; first let the storm be hushed, the wind calm, and the surface smooth.

MARTHA.

Comparisons, madam, will never pass for argument: it is easy enough sometimes to see the bottom of a heart, it's clear enough: and if the passions are now and then a little tempestuous, a young lady of understanding can generally guess from what corner the wind blows that has raised the storm. She knows well enough—

LISE.

I tell you, I know nothing; and I am resolved to shut my eyes, and see nothing. I would not wish to know whether I am still weak enough to retain a passion for a wretch whom I ought to abhor, nor would I increase my disgust for one man by regretting the charms of another. No: let the false Euphemon live happy and content, if he can be so; but let him not be disinherited; never will I be so cruel and inhuman as to make myself his sister on purpose to ruin and destroy him. Now you know my heart, search into it no further, unless you mean to tear it in pieces.

SCENE II.

LISE, MARTHA, a Servant.

SERVANT.

Madam, the baroness of Croupillac waits below.

LISE.

Her visit astonishes me.

SERVANT.

She is just arrived from Angoulême, and comes to pay her respects to you.

LISE.

Upon what occasion?

MARTHA.

O upon your marriage, no doubt.

LISE.

The very subject I would wish to avoid. Am I in a condition to listen to a heap of ridiculous compliments, a register of commonplace cant, and hypocrisy, that tires one to death; where common sense is murdered by the perpetual exercise of talking without saying anything? What a task I have to go through!

SCENE III.

LISE, MME. DE CROUPILLAC, MARTHA.

MARTHA.

Here her ladyship comes.

LISE.

Ay, I see her but too well.

MARTHA.

They say she wants vastly to be married, is apt to be a little quarrelsome, and almost in her dotage.

LISE.

Some chairs here. Madam, you will pardon me, if—

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

O Madam!

LISE.

Madam!

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

I, madam, must likewise beg—

LISE.

Pray be seated.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

[Sitting down.]

Upon my word, madam, I am quite confounded.

and wish, from the bottom of my soul, it was in my power to—

LISE.

Madam!

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Yes, madam, I heartily wish I could steal your charms; it makes me weep to see you so handsome.

LISE.

Pray, madam, be comforted.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

No, madam, that's impossible. I see, my dear, you may have as many husbands as you please. I had one, too, at least I thought so; only one, and that's a melancholy consideration; and trouble enough I had to get him, too, and you are going to rob me of him. There is a time, madam—O dear! how soon that time comes about!—when if a lover deserts us, we lose our all, and one is quite left alone: and let me tell you, madam, it is very cruel to take away all from one, who has little or nothing left.

LISE.

You must excuse me, madam, but I am really astonished both at your visit and your conversation: what accident, pray, has afflicted you so? Whom have you lost, or whom have I robbed you of?

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

My dear child, there are a great many wrinkled old fools, who fancy that, by the help of paint and a few false teeth, they can stop the course of time and pleasure, and fix wandering love; but, to my sorrow, I am a little wiser: I see too plainly that everything is running away, and I can't bear it.

LISE.

I am sorry for it, madam, if it be so ; but I can't possibly make you young again.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

I know it ; but I have still some hopes : perhaps to restore my false one to me, might, in some measure, give me fresh youth and beauty.

LISE.

What false one do you mean ?

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

My ungrateful, cruel husband, whom I have run after so long ; and little worthy he is of all my care. The President, madam.

LISE.

The President !

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Yes, madam : when Croupillac was in her bloom, she would not have talked to presidents ; their persons, their manners, their everything was my aversion, but as we grow old, we are not quite so difficult.

LISE.

And so, madam—

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

And so, madam, in short, you have reduced me to a state of misery and despair.

LISE.

I, madam ? how ? by what means ?

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

I'll tell you. I lived, you must know, at Angoulême, and, as a widow, had the free disposal of my person: there, at that very time, was Fierenfat, a student, a president's apprentice, you understand me: he ogled me for a long time, and took it into his head to be most villainously in love with me. Villainously, I say, most horrid and abominable; for what did he make love to? my money. I got some people to write to the old gentleman, who interested themselves too far in the affair, and talked to him in my name: he returned in answer, that he would—consider it: so you see the thing was settled.

LISE.

O yes.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

For my part, I had no objection: his elder brother was at that time, so I was informed, engaged to you.

LISE.

[Aside.

Cruel remembrance!

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

He was a foolish fellow, my dear; but had then the honor to be in your good graces.

LISE.

[Sighing.

Ah me!

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

This silly fellow, my dear, as I was telling you, being quite out at elbows, kicked out of doors by his father, and wandering about the wide world, dead, perhaps, by this time (you seem concerned), my college hero, my President, knowing extremely well, that your fortune was, upon the whole, much better than mine, has thought fit to laugh at my disappointment, and go in quest of your superior—portion. But do you think, madam, to run in this manner from brother to brother, and engross a whole family to yourself? I do here most solemnly enter my protest against it: I forbid the banns: I'll venture my whole estate, my dowry, and everything; in short, the cause shall be so managed, that you, his father, my children, all of us shall be dead, before ever it is put an end to.

LISE.

I assure you, madam, with the utmost sincerity, I am very sorry that my marriage should make you miserable: I am sure, however, you have no reason to be angry with me; but I find we may make others jealous without being happy ourselves: look no longer, madam, I beseech you, with an eye of envy upon my condition; he is a husband I shall not quarrel with you for.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Not quarrel for him?

LISE.

No: I'll give him up to you with all my heart.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

You have no taste then for his person? you don't love him?

LISE.

I see very few charms in matrimony, and none at all in a lawsuit; and so, madam—

SCENE IV.
—

MME. DE CROUPILLAC, LISE, RONDON.

RONDON.

So, so, daughter, here's fine work; protests, declarations, and lawsuits, enough to make one's hair stand on end. Ouns! shall Rondon be talked to thus? but I'll ferret them out, the impertinent rascals.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Must I suffer more indignities! Hear me, M. Rondon.

RONDON.

What would you have, madam?

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Your son-in-law, sir, is a false villain, a coxcomb of a new species, a gallant, and a miser, a widow-hunter, a fellow that loves nothing but money.

RONDON.

He's in the right of it.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

In my own house has he a thousand times vowed eternal constancy to me.

RONDON.

Promises of that kind, madam, are very seldom kept.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

And then to leave me so basely.

RONDON.

I believe I should have done the same.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

But I shall talk to his father in a proper manner.

RONDON.

I'd rather you would talk to him than to me.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

'Tis a wicked thing, so it is; and the whole sex will take my part, and cry out shame upon him.

RONDON.

They can't cry louder than yourself.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

I'll make the world know how they should treat a baroness.

RONDON.

I'll tell you how: laugh at her.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

A husband, look ye, I must have; and I will take him, or his old father, or you.

RONDON.

Me?

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Yes, you.

RONDON.

I defy you.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

We'll try it: I'll go to law with you.

RONDON.

Ridiculous.

SCENE V.

RONDON, FIERENFAT, LISE.

RONDON.

[To Lise.

Pray, madam, what's the reason you receive such visitors in my house? you are always bringing me into some scrape or other.

[To Fierenfat.

And you, sir, Mr. King of Pedants, what nonsensical demon inspired you with the thought of courting a baroness, only to laugh at and abuse her? A pretty scheme indeed, with that flat face of yours, to give yourself the airs of a flighty young coxcomb; with that grave sorrowful countenance to play the gallant: it might have become the rake your brother, but for you—fie! fie!

FIERENFAT.

My dear father-in-law, don't be misled: I never was desirous of this match; I only promised her conditionally, and always reserved to myself the right of taking a richer wife, if I could get one; the disinheriting my elder brother, and coming into immediate possession of his fortune, have given me pretensions to your daughter: come, come, money makes the best matches.

RONDON.

So it does, my boy; there you're in the right.

LISE.

Now that right I take to be quite wrong.

RONDON.

Pshaw ! pshaw ! money does everything, that's certain ; let us therefore settle the affair immediately : sixty good sacks full of French crowns will set everything right, in spite of all the Croupillacs in the universe. How this Euphemon makes me wait ! I'm out of all patience ; but let us sign before he comes.

LISE.

No, sir, there I enter my caveat : I will only submit on certain conditions.

RONDON.

Conditions ! impertinence ! you pretend to say—

LISE.

I say, sir, what I think : can we ever taste, can we enjoy that guilty happiness, which springs from another's misery ? and you, sir, [to Fierenfat] can you in your prosperity forget that you have a brother ?

FIERENFAT.

A brother ? I never saw him in my life : he was gone from home when I was at college, hard at my Cujatius and Bartole. I've heard indeed of his pranks since ; and, if he ever comes back again, we know what we have to do, never fear that ; we shall send him off to the galleys.

LISE.

A brotherly and a Christian resolution ! In the meantime you'll confiscate his estate ; that, I suppose, is your intention : but I tell you, sir, I detest and abhor the project.

RONDON.

Heigh! heigh! very fine; but come, my dear, the contract is drawn, and the lawyer has taken care of all that.

FIERENFAT.

Our forefathers have determined concerning this matter; consult the written law: let me see, in Cujatius, chapter the fifth, sixth, and seventh, we read thus: "Every debauched libertine that leaves his father's house, or pillages the same, shall, ipso facto, be dispossessed of everything, and disinherited as a bastard."

LISE.

I know nothing about laws or precedents, nor have ever read Cujatius; but will venture to pronounce, that they are a set of vile unfeeling wretches, foes to common sense and without humanity, who say a brother should let a brother perish: nature and honor have their rights to plead, that are more powerful than Cujatius and all your laws.

RONDON.

Come, come, let's have none of your codes, and your honor, and your nonsense; but do as I'd have you: what's all this fuss about an elder brother? there should be money.

LISE.

There should be virtue, sir: let him be punished; but leave him at least something to subsist on, the poor remains of an elder brother's right: in a word, sir, I must tell you, my hand shall never be purchased at the price of his ruin: blot out, therefore, that article in the contract which I abhor, and which would be a disgrace to us all: if lucrative views induced you to draw it up thus, it is a shame and a dishonor to us, and therefore, I desire it may be expunged.

FIERENFAT.

How very little women know of business!

RONDON.

What! you want to correct two attorneys-at-law, and make a contract void: O lud! O lud!

LISE.

Why not?

RONDON.

You'll never make a good housewife; you'll let everything go to rack and ruin.

LISE.

At present, sir, I cannot boast my knowledge of the world, or of economy; but I will maintain it, the love of money destroys more families than it supports; and if ever I have a house of my own, the foundation of it shall be laid on—justice.

RONDON.

She is light-headed; but let us humor her a little: come, give him a little portion, and the business will be over.

FIERENFAT.

Ay, ay, well—I give to my brother—ay, I give him—come along—

RONDON.

Not a single farthing.

SCENE VI.

EUPHEMON, RONDON, LISE, FIERENFAT.

RONDON.

O here comes the old gentleman. Well, I have brought my daughter to reason; we want nothing now but your hand to the contract. Come, come, let's have no more delays, cheer up, put on your jovial countenance, your wedding looks, man; for in nine months' time, I'll lay my life, two thumping boys—come, come, let us laugh and sing, and cast away care: sign, my boy, sign.

EUPHEMON.

I can't, sir.

FIERENFAT.

You can't?

RONDON.

Ay, here's another now!

FIERENFAT.

For what reason, pray?

RONDON.

What is all this madness? Are all the world turned fools? Everybody says no. Why how is this? what's the meaning of it?

EUPHEMON.

To sign the contract at a time like this, would be flying in the face of nature.

RONDON.

What! is my lady Croupillac at the bottom of all this?

EUPHEMON.

No: she's a fool, and wants to break off the match for her own sake: 'tis not from her ridiculous noise that my uneasiness arises, I assure you.

RONDON.

Whence comes it then? Did that fellow out of the coach put it into your head? Are we indebted to him for all this?

EUPHEMON.

What he told me must at least retard our happy marriage, which we were so eager upon.

LISE.

What did he tell you, sir?

FIERENFAT.

Ay, sir, what news did he bring?

EUPHEMON.

News that shocked me: at Bordeaux this man saw my son, naked, friendless, and in prison, dying with hunger; shame and sickness leading him to the grave: sickness and misfortunes had blasted the flower of his youth; and an obstinate fever, that had poisoned his blood, seemed to threaten that his last hour was not far off: when he saw him, he was then just expiring: alas! perhaps by this time he is no more.

RONDON.

Then his pension's paid.

LISE.

Dead?

RONDON.

Don't be frightened, child, what is it to you?

FIERENFAT.

Ha! the blood hath forsaken her cheeks; she looks pale as death.

RONDON.

The jade has a little too much sensibility about her, that's the truth of it: but as he's dead, I forgive thee.

FIERENFAT.

But after all, sir, do you mean—

EUPHEMON.

Don't be afraid; you shall have her; it is my desire you should: but to choose a day of mourning for a wedding-day, would be highly unbecoming. How would my griefs interrupt your mirth! how would your chaplets fade when wetted with a father's tears! no, my son, you must put off your happiness, and give me one day to indulge my sorrow: joy so ill-timed as this would be an affront to decency.

LISE.

No doubt it would: for my part, I had much rather share with you in your affliction, than think of marriage.

FIERENFAT.

Nay, but, my dear father—

RONDON.

Why, you're an old fool: what! put off a wedding, that has been the Lord knows how long upon the anvil, for an ungrateful young dog, who has been a hundred times disinherited: a p—x on you and your whole family!

EUPHEMON.

At such a time a father must still be a father; his errors, his vices, and his crimes always made me unhappy; and it hurts me still more to think, that he is dead without ever repenting of them.

RONDON.

Well, well, we'll make that matter easy: ha! boy, let us give him some grandsons to make him amends: come, come, sign, and let's have a dance: what nonsense this is!

EUPHEMON.

But, sir—

RONDON.

But—ouns! this makes me mad: to be sorry for the luckiest accident that could happen, ridiculous! Sorrow is good for nothing at the best; but to whimper and whine, because you have got rid of a burden, intolerable absurdity! This eldest son, this scourge of yours, to my knowledge, two or three times had like to have broken your heart; sooner or later he would have brought you to the grave: therefore, prithee, man, take my advice, and make yourself easy; the loss of such a son is the greatest gain.

EUPHEMON.

True, my friend; but it is a gain that costs me more than you think: alas! I lament that he died, and I lament that ever he was born.

RONDON.

[To Fierenfat.]

Away, follow the old gentleman, and be as expeditious as you can; the dead, you see, has got hold of the living; so take the contract, I'll not be haggled with any longer; take his hand, and make him sign. For you, madam [to Lise] we shall expect you to-night; everything will go well, I warrant you.

LISE.

I'm in the utmost despair.

End of the Second Act.

ACT III. SCENE I.

EUPHEMON, the Son, JASMIN.

JASMIN.

I have served you, sir, now two years, without knowing who or what you are: you were then my master; permit me now to call you my friend: you are now, like myself, thrown upon the wide world, and poverty has put us on a level: you are no longer the man of pleasure, the gallant and gay Euphemon, treated and caressed by the men, surrounded and courted by the women. Every stiver you had is gone to the devil; and you have nothing now to do but to forget you were ever worth a shilling; for surely the most insupportable of all evils is the remembrance of happiness which we no longer enjoy: for my part, I was always plain Jasmin, and therefore the less to be pitied: born as I was to suffer, I suffer contentedly; to be in want of everything is only natural to me; your old hat there, for instance, and coarse ragged waistcoat, was my usual garb; and you have great reason to be sorry that you had not always been as poor as myself.

EUPHEMON.

How shame and ignominy attend upon misfortune! how melancholy a consideration is it to reflect, that a servant shall have it in his power to humble me! and what's worse, I feel that he's in the right, too; he endeavors to comfort me, after his manner; he keeps me company; and his heart, rough and unpolished as it is, is sensible, tender, and humane: born my equal—for as a fellow-creature so he was—he tried to support me under my affliction, and follows my unhappy fortune, while every friend I had, abandons me.

JASMIN.

Friends, did you say, sir? Pray, my good master, who are they? how are those people made whom they call friends?

EUPHEMON.

You have seen them, Jasmin, coming into my house whenever they pleased, troubling me forever with their importunate visits; a crowd of parasites, who lived upon my bounty, complimented my fine taste, my elegance, my delicacy; borrowed my money, then praised me before my face, and stunned me with their ridiculous flattery.

JASMIN.

Ay, poor devil! you did not hear them laughing at you as they went away, and making a joke of your foolish generosity.

EUPHEMON.

I believe it; for in the beginning of my misfortunes, when I was arrested at Bordeaux, not one of those, on whom I had lavished my all, ever came near me, or offered me his purse; and when I got out sick and friendless, I applied to one of them, in this poor ragged condition, and almost famished, for a little charitable assistance to lengthen out my wretched life, he turned away his unrelenting eye, pretended even to know nothing of me, and turned me out like a common beggar.

JASMIN.

Not one to comfort or support you?

EUPHEMON.

Not one.

JASMIN.

Such wretches! friends indeed!

EUPHEMON.

Men are made of iron.

JASMIN.

And women, too.

EUPHEMON.

Alas! from them I expected more tenderness; but met with even a thousand times greater inhumanity: one of them in particular I well remember, who openly avowed her passion for me, and seemed to take a pride in obliging me; and yet in the very lodgings, which she had furnished at my expense, and with the money I had squandered upon her, did she procure every day new gallants, and treat them with my wine, while I was perishing with hunger in the street: in short, Jasmin, if it had not been for the old man, who picked me up by chance at Bordeaux, and who, he said, knew me when I was a child, death had by this time put an end to my misfortunes: but knowest thou, Jasmin, whereabouts we are?

JASMIN.

Near Cognac, if I am not mistaken; where, they tell me, my old master Rondon lives.

EUPHEMON.

Rondon! the father of—whom did you say?

JASMIN.

Rondon, a blunt, odd fellow; I had the honor of belonging to his kitchen once; but being always of a roving disposition, chose to travel; and after that was an errand boy, a lackey, a clerk, a foot-soldier, and a deserter; at length in Bordeaux you took me into your service. Rondon perhaps may recollect me: who knows but in our adversity—

EUPHEMON.

How long is it since you left him?

JASMIN.

About fifteen years. He was a character; half pleasant, and half surly; but at the bottom a good honest fellow: he had a child, I remember, an only daughter, a perfect jewel; blue eyes, short nose, fresh complexion, vermilion lips; and then for sense and understanding, quite a miracle. When I lived there, she was, let me see, about six or seven years old, by my troth a sweet flower, and by this time fit to be gathered.

EUPHEMON.

O misery!

JASMIN.

But why should I talk to you about her? It can be of no service to you; I see you are concerned, and the tears trickle down your cheeks: my poor master!

EUPHEMON.

What unhappy fate could guide me to this place!
O me!

JASMIN.

You seem in deep contemplation, and as if the sight of this place made you unhappy; you weep, too.

EUPHEMON.

I have reason.

JASMIN.

Do you know Rondon? Are you any way related to the family?

EUPHEMON.

O let me alone, let me alone.

JASMIN.

[Embracing him.]

For pity's sake, my dear master, my friend, tell me who you are.

EUPHEMON.

[In tears.]

I am—I am a poor unhappy wretch, a fool, a madman, a guilty abandoned criminal, whom heaven should punish, and earth detest: would I were dead!

JASMIN.

No: we must live. What, die with famine while we can help ourselves! we have our hands at least, let us make use of them, and leave off complaining: look on those fellows yonder, who have no fortune but their industry, with their spades in their hands, turning up the garden; let us join them: come, work, man, and get your livelihood.

EUPHEMON.

Alas! those poor beings, mean as they are, and approaching nearer to animal than human nature, even they taste more pleasure and satisfaction in their labors, than my false delicacy and idle follies could ever afford me; they live, at least, free from trouble, and remorse, and enjoy health of body and peace of mind.

SCENE II.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC, YOUNG EUPHEMON, JASMIN.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

What do I see? or do my eyes deceive me? the more I look on him, the more I think it must be he. [She looks steadfastly at Euphemon.] And yet surely it cannot be the same; it can never be that gallant squire of Angoulême, that played so high, and seemed to be lined with gold: it is he: [She comes forward] but the other was rich and happy, handsome, and well-made; this fellow looks poor and ugly. Sickness will spoil the finest face, and poverty makes a still more dreadful alteration.

JASMIN.

What female apparition is this that haunts us with her malignant aspect?

EUPHEMON.

If I am not mistaken, I know her well enough; she has seen me in all my pomp and splendor: how dreadful it is to appear mean and destitute in the eyes of those who have seen us in affluence and prosperity! let us be gone.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

[Coming up to Euphemon.

What strange accident, my dear child, hath reduced thee to this pitiful plight?

EUPHEMON.

My own folly.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Why, what a figure dost thou make!

EUPHEMON.

Ay, madam, the consequence of having good friends; of being robbed, and plundered.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Plundered? by whom? how? when? where?

JASMIN.

O from mere goodness of heart: our thieves were mighty honest creatures, persons that figured in the beau-monde, amiable triflers, gamesters, bottle-companions, agreeable story-tellers, men of wit, and women of beauty.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

I understand you: you have squandered away all you had in eating and drinking: but you will think this nothing when you come to know the distresses I have undergone, and the losses I have suffered with regard to—matrimony.

EUPHEMON.

Your humble servant, madam.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

[Stopping him.

Your servant indeed; no, no, positively you shall stay, and hear my misfortunes; you shall be sorry for me.

EUPHEMON.

Well, well, I am sorry for you; good by to you.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Nay, now I vow and swear you shall hear the whole story. One Monsieur Fierenfat, a lawyer by profession, got acquainted with me at Angoulême, about [she runs after him] the time when you beat the four bailiffs, and ran away; this Monsieur Fierenfat, you must know, lives not far from hence, with his father, Euphemon.

EUPHEMON.

[Coming back.

Euphemon!

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Yes.

EUPHEMON.

For heaven's sake, madam, that Euphemon mean you, so celebrated for his virtues, the honor of his race, could he—

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Yes, sir.

EUPHEMON.

And does he live here?

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

He does.

EUPHEMON.

And may I ask you, madam, how is he? how does he?

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Very well, I believe, sir: what the deuce ails him?

EUPHEMON.

And pray, madam, what do they say—

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Of whom, sir?

EUPHEMON.

Of an elder son he had formerly.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

O an ill-begotten rogue, a rake, a rattle-pate, an arrant sot, a madman, a fellow given up to every vice; hanged, I suppose, by this time.

EUPHEMON.

Indeed, madam—but I am ashamed of interrupting you in this manner.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

To proceed then: this Monsieur Fierenfat, as I was telling you, his younger brother, made strong love to me, and was to have been married to me.

EUPHEMON.

And is he so happy? have you got him?

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

No: would you think it, sir, this fool, puffed up with the thoughts of stepping in to all his mad brother's fortune, growing rich, and wanting to be more so, breaks off this match, which would have been so honorable to him, and now wants to lay hold of the daughter of one Rondon, a vulgar cit, the cock of the village here.

EUPHEMON.

Going to marry her, say you?

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

And here am I most dreadfully jealous of her.

EUPHEMON.

That beautiful creature—Jasmin here was just now giving me a picture of her—would she throw herself away—

JASMIN.

[Aside to Euphemon.

What are you about, sir? this husband is as good as another for her, I think: but my master's a strange man, everything afflicts him.

EUPHEMON.

[Aside.

This is beyond all bearing.

[Aloud to Mme. de Croupillac.

My heart, madam, is deeply sensible of the injury you have received; this Lise should never be his, if I could prevent it.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

You take it rightly, sir; you lament my unhappy fate; the poor are always compassionate; you had not half the good nature when you rolled in money; but mind what I have to say, in this life we may always help one another.

JASMIN.

Help us then, dear madam, I beseech you.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

You must act for me in this affair.

EUPHEMON.

I, madam! how is it possible for me to serve you?

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

O in a thousand ways! you shall take my cause in hand: another dress and a little finery will make you still look tolerably handsome: you have a polite, insinuating address, and know how to wheedle a young girl: introduce yourself into the family, play the flatterer with Fierenfat, compliment him on his riches, his wit, his dress, everything about him, get into his good graces, and while I enter my protest against the unlawful procedure, you will do all the rest; by this means I shall at least gain time.

EUPHEMON.

[Seeing his father at a distance.

What do I see? O heaven!

[He runs off.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Hai! hai! the fellow's mad sure.

JASMIN.

He's afraid of you, ma'am, that's all.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

A blockhead! here, you, stop, hark ye, hark ye. I must follow him.

SCENE III.

OLD EUPHEMON, JASMIN.

EUPHEMON.

Even the imperfect glance I had of that poor wretch, whoever he is, has, I know not why, filled my heart with anguish and disquietude: he had a noble air, and a turn of features that, somehow or other, affected me: alas! I never see a poor creature of that age, but the sad image of my unhappy son recurs to me; I have still a father's tenderness for him: but he is dead, or only lives with infamy to disgrace me: both my children make me miserable: one by his vice and debauchery is my eternal punishment, while the other abuses my indulgence, and knows but too well that he is the only support of my old age: life is a burden to me, and I must soon sink beneath it. Who art thou, friend?

[Perceiving Jasmin, who bows to him.]

JASMIN.

Honored sir, noble and generous Euphemon, don't you remember poor Jasmin, sir, who lived with Rondon?

EUPHEMON.

Ah, Jasmin, is it you? time alters our faces, as you see by mine: when you lived here I had a good fresh complexion, was hearty and well; but age comes on, my time is almost over: and so, Jasmin, you are come back to your own country at last?

JASMIN.

Yes, sir: I grew weary of such a fatiguing life, of rambling about like a wandering Jew, so I even came home. Happiness is a fugitive being, I am sure it has been so to me. The Devil took me out, I believe, led me a long walk, and now has brought me back again.

EUPHEMON.

Well, I may assist you perhaps, if you behave yourself well: but who was that other poor wretch you were talking with, he that ran off just now?

JASMIN.

A comrade of mine, a poor wretch, half-starved like myself, without a farthing; he's in search of employment as well as I.

EUPHEMON.

Perhaps I may find some for you both: is he sober and sensible?

JASMIN.

He ought to be so: he has very good parts, I know; can write, and read, understands arithmetic, draws a little, knows music; he was very well brought up.

EUPHEMON.

If so, I have a place ready for him: as for you, Jasmin, my son shall hire you; he is going to be married, to-night perhaps: as his fortune is increased, he'll want more servants; and one of his is going away, too, and you may step into his place: to-night I'll present you both; you shall see him at my neighbor Rondon's; I'll talk to him there about it; so fare thee well, Jasmin; in the meantime, here's something for you to drink.

SCENE IV.

JASMIN.[Alone.]

The good man! blessings on him! Could I ever have thought in this vile age to meet with so good a heart? his air, his demeanor, his benevolent soul, form together a speaking picture of the integrity of former ages.

SCENE V.

YOUNG EUPHEMON, JASMIN.

JASMIN.

[Embracing him.]

Well, I have got a place for you; we are both to serve Euphemon.

EUPHEMON.

Ay! Euphemon!

JASMIN.

Yes, if you like it: you seem surprised: why are your eyes turned up in this manner, as if you were going to be exorcised? what is the meaning of those deep sighs, that will not let you speak?

EUPHEMON.

O Jasmin, I can no longer contain myself; tenderness, pain, remorse, all press upon me.

JASMIN.

What! has my lady there said anything to you? what has she told you?

EUPHEMON.

She told me nothing.

JASMIN.

What's the matter then?

EUPHEMON.

My heart will no longer suffer me to conceal it from you: in short, that Euphemon—

JASMIN.

Well, what of him?

EUPHEMON.

O he is—my father.

JASMIN.

Your father? sir?

EUPHEMON.

Yes, Jasmin; I am that elder son, that criminal, that unfortunate, who has ruined his unhappy family. O how my heart fluttered at the sight of him, and offered up its humble prayers! O with what joy could I have fallen down at his feet!

JASMIN.

Thou, Euphemon's son! forgive me, sir, forgive my rude familiarity.

EUPHEMON.

O Jasmin, thinkest thou a heart, oppressed as mine is, can be offended?

JASMIN.

You are the son of a man whom all the world admires; a man of a million: to say the truth, the reputation of his son shows to no great advantage when placed near his father's.

EUPHEMON.

'Tis that which gives me most uneasiness. But tell me, what did my father say?

JASMIN.

I told him, sir, we were two unfortunate youths, very poor, but well educated, and would be glad to serve him: he lamented our fate, and consented to take us. This evening he will introduce you to his son, the President, who, it seems, is to marry Lise; that fortunate brother, to whom my old master Rondon is to be father-in-law.

EUPHEMON.

And now, Jasmin, I will unfold my heart to you: hear the history of my misfortunes, and think how wretched I must be, to draw upon myself, by a variety of follies, the just indignation of a beloved parent; to be hated, despised, disinherited; to feel all the horrors of beggary and want; to see my fortune given to my younger brother, and forced after all, in my state of ignominy, to serve the very man who has robbed me of everything: this is my fate, a fate I have but too well deserved. But would you believe it, Jasmin, in the midst of all my calamities, dead as I am to pleasures, and dead to every hope, hated by the world, despised by all, and expecting nothing, I yet dare to be—jealous.

JASMIN.

Jealous! of whom?

EUPHEMON.

Of my brother; of Lise.

JASMIN.

So, you are in love with your sister! well, that's a stroke worthy of you, the only sin you had never yet committed.

EUPHEMON.

You are to know, Jasmin—for I believe you had then left Rondon—that we were no sooner out of our infancy, than our parents promised us to each other: our hearts readily obeyed, and were united: the conformity of our ages, our taste, our manners, our situation, everything conspired to strengthen the tie; like two young trees, we grew up together, and were to have joined our branches: time, that heightened her charms, improved her tenderness, and love made her every day more lovely: the world at that blest time might have envied me; but I was young, foolish, and blind; linked in with a set of wretches, who seduced my innocence; intoxicated with folly and extravagance, I made a merit of despising her passion for me, nay, even affronted her: O I reflect on it with horror. The crowd of vices, that rushed in upon me, carried me away from my father and my friends; what was my fate after this I need not inform you. Everything is gone; and heaven, which tore me from her, has left me nothing but a heart to punish me.

JASMIN.

If so it be, and you really love her still, notwithstanding all your distress, Mme. de Croupillac's advice was good, to insinuate yourself, if possible, into Rondon's family. Your purse is empty, and love perhaps may find means to fill it again.

EUPHEMON.

Could I ever dare to look upon her, to come in her sight, after what I have done, and in this miserable condition? No. I must avoid a father and a mistress; I have abused the goodness of them both and know not—but it is too late to repent—which should hate me most.

SCENE VI.

YOUNG EUPHEMON, FIERENFAT, JASMIN.

JASMIN.

O here comes our wise President.

EUPHEMON.

Is it he? I never saw his face before; my brother, and my rival!

FIERENFAT.

Come, come, this does not go amiss. I have pressed, and rated the old gentleman in such a manner, that I believe we shall be able to finish the affair in spite of him. But where are these fellows who are to serve me?

JASMIN.

We are come, please your honor, to offer ourselves—

FIERENFAT.

Which of you two can read?

JASMIN.

He, sir.

FIERENFAT.

And write, too, I suppose?

JASMIN.

O yes, sir, and cipher, and cast accounts.

FIERENFAT.

Ay, but he must know how to talk, too.

JASMIN.

He's a little modest, sir, and but just recovered from a fit of sickness.

FIERENFAT.

He looks bold enough, I think, and as if he knew his own merit. Well, sir, what wages do you expect?

EUPHEMON.

None, sir.

JASMIN.

O sir, we have a most heroic soul.

FIERENFAT.

Well, upon those conditions I take you into my service: come, I'll present you to my wife.

EUPHEMON.

Your wife, sir?

FIERENFAT.

Yes, I'm going to be married.

EUPHEMON.

When, pray?

FIERENFAT.

To-night.

EUPHEMON.

O heaven! pray, sir, forgive me, but are you deeply in love with her, sir?

FIERENFAT.

Certainly.

EUPHEMON.

Indeed?

FIERENFAT.

Yes.

EUPHEMON.

And are you beloved?

FIERENFAT.

I hope so. A droll fellow, this! You seem extremely curious, sir.

EUPHEMON.

[Aside.

How I wish to contradict him, and punish him for his excess of happiness!

FIERENFAT.

[To Jasmin.

What does he say?

JASMIN.

He says, he wishes with all his heart he was like you, formed to please.

FIERENFAT.

The ambition of the coxcomb! but come, follow me: be diligent, sober, prudent, careful, clever, and respectful. What, ho! la Fleur, la Brie, you rascals, where are you all? follow me.

[He goes out.

EUPHEMON.

Now could I like to salute him with two good boxes on the ear, to make that lawyer's face of his twinge again.

JASMIN.

I find, my friend, you are not mended much.

EUPHEMON.

I'm sure it is time to be so; and I assure you, I intend to be wiser for the future: from all my errors I shall at least reap this advantage, to know how to suffer.

End of the Third Act.

ACT IV. SCENE I.

---

MME. DE CROUPILLAC, YOUNG EUPHEMON, JASMIN.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

I have taken care, my friend, by way of precaution, to bring two sergeants from Angoulême; have you performed your part as well, and done as I desired you? Shall you be able, think you, to put on an air of consequence, and sow a little dissension in the family? Have you flattered the old gentleman? Have you looked forward a little?

EUPHEMON.

No.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

How?

EUPHEMON.

Believe me, madam, I long to throw myself at her feet.

The Prodigal.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Pray then make haste and do it ; begin your attack as soon as possible, and restore my ungrateful seducer. I'll go to law for you, and you shall make love for me : cheer up, man, put on your best looks ; assume that air of importance and self-sufficiency, which is sure to conquer every heart, which baffles wit, and triumphs over wisdom : to be happy in love, you must be bold ; resume your wonted courage.

EUPHEMON.

O I have lost it all.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

How so, man ? what's the matter ?

EUPHEMON.

I had courage enough when I was not in love ; but at present—

JASMIN.

There may be other reasons why he should be rather bashful ; this Fierenfat, you must know, is our lord and master, and has taken us both into his service.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

So much the better ; a lucky circumstance : to be a domestic in your mistress' family, let me tell you, is a singular happiness : make your advantage of it.

JASMIN.

Yonder's something pretty, and coming this way, too, to take the air, I suppose : she seems to come out of Rondon's house.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

'Tis she: come, my dear lover, make haste, now's your time: pluck up your courage, and speak to her: what! sighing and trembling, and pretend to love her, too? O, fie, fie!

EUPHEMON.

O if you knew the situation of my heart, you would not wonder at my trembling and confusion!

JASMIN.

[Seeing Lise at a distance.

Sweet creature! how beautiful she looks!

EUPHEMON.

'Tis she: O heaven! I die with love, with remorse, with jealousy, and despair.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Adieu: I will endeavor to return the obligation.

EUPHEMON.

All I ask of you is, if possible, to put off this cruel marriage.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

That's what I shall immediately set about.

EUPHEMON.

Alas! I tremble.

JASMIN.

We must try to get her by herself; let us retire a little.

EUPHEMON.

I'll follow you: I scarce know what I have done, or what I am going to do. I shall never be able to face her.

SCENE II.

LISE, MARTHA, JASMIN, at the farther end of the stage, and YOUNG EUPHEMON behind him.

LISE.

In vain do I go in and out, backwards, and forwards, endeavoring, if possible, to hide myself from myself; in vain do I seek for solitude, and examine my own heart: alas! the more I look into it, the more am I convinced that happiness was never made for me. If I do at any time enjoy a momentary comfort, it is from that old ridiculous creature Croupillac, and the thought of her preventing this detested match; but then all my apprehensions return, when Fierenfat and my father urge it upon me with repeated importunities: they have gained over the good Euphemon.

MARTHA.

In troth, the old man is too good-natured, and Fierenfat governs him most tyrannically.

LISE.

I pardon him, he's fond of an only child; his elder, poor man, gave him a great deal of uneasiness, and now he relies entirely upon the other.

MARTHA.

But after all, madam, notwithstanding everything that has been reported, it is not clear that the other is yet dead.

LISE.

Alas! if dead, I must lament; if living, I must hate him: cruel alternatives!

MARTHA.

The news of his danger, however, seemed to have a powerful effect upon you.

LISE.

One might be sorry for his misfortunes without loving him, you know.

MARTHA.

But one may as well be dead as not be loved : and so you are really to be married to his brother ?

LISE.

My dear child, I am distracted at the thought of it : you have long known my indifference for Fierenfat ; it is now changed to horror and detestation : marriage with him is a potion most dreadfully bitter, which, in my present desperate case, I must swallow much against my will, I assure you ; though my hand, at the same time, rejects it with horror and indignation.

JASMIN.

[Pulling Martha by the sleeve.

Hark'ee, fair lady, will you give me leave to whisper a word or two in your ear ?

MARTHA.

[To Jasmin.

Most willingly, sir.

LISE.

[Aside.

O cruel fate ! why didst thou prolong a life, which an ungrateful, guilty lover has made so truly miserable ?

The Prodigal.

MARTHA.

[To Lise.

One of the President's servants, madam, but just now hired to him: he says, he should be glad to speak to you.

LISE.

Let him wait.

MARTHA.

[To Jasmin.

Friend, my lady desires you would wait a little.

LISE.

Always teasing me thus! even when he is absent I can have no peace for him. O dear! how weary am I of this marriage already!

JASMIN.

[To Martha.

My dear girl, procure us this favor, if you can.

MARTHA.

[Coming back.

Madam, he says he must speak with you.

LISE.

So! I see I must go.

MARTHA.

There is a person, it seems, who is very desirous of seeing you; he must speak to you, he says, or die.

LISE.

I find I must go in and hide myself.

SCENE III.

LISE, MARTHA, YOUNG EUPHEMON leaning on JASMIN.

EUPHEMON.

I can neither walk nor speak ; my sight, too, fails me.

JASMIN.

Give me your hand ; we'll cross her as she comes.

EUPHEMON.

O I feel a deadly coldness at my heart [to Lise] will you permit—

LISE.

[Without looking at him.]

What would you, sir?

EUPHEMON.

[Throwing himself on his knees.]

What would I? that death which I deserve.

LISE.

What do I see? O heaven!

MARTHA.

Amazing! Euphemon! good God, how changed!

EUPHEMON.

Changed indeed: yes, Lise, you are avenged of me. Well may you wonder, for I am changed in everything: no longer do you behold in me that madman, that false wretch, so feared and detested here; he who betrayed the cause of nature and of love: young and thoughtless as I was, I fell a prey to every passion, and adopted every vice from my loose companions: but O the worst of all my crimes, which never can be blotted out, never atoned for, was my offending you: but here I swear, by thee, and by that virtue, which, though I have forsaken, I yet adore, I have found my error. Vice, though I admitted it, was a stranger to this heart, which is now no longer stained with those guilty blemishes that obscured its native lustre; that pure, that sacred passion, which is still reserved for you, hath refined it; that tender passion, and that alone, brought me hither, not to break off your new engagements, or oppose your happiness, that would ill become a poor abandoned wretch like me: but since the misfortunes, which I so well deserved, have brought me, even in the prime of life, to the brink of the grave, I could not help seeking you, to be a witness of my last moments; and happy, thrice happy shall I be, if he, who was once destined to be your husband, at length shall die, and not be hated by you.

LISE.

I am scarce myself: can it be Euphemon? can it be you? O heaven! in what a condition too, and what a time is this: wretch as thou art, what cruel injuries hast thou done to both of us!

EUPHEMON.

I know it: at sight of thee, every folly I have been guilty of appears doubly inexcusable: they were dreadful, and you know they were, that is some punishment, but not so much as I deserve.

LISE.

And is it true, unhappy man, that thou hast at last repented of thy follies; that your rebellious heart is at length subdued, and misfortune hath pointed out to you the road of virtue?

EUPHEMON.

Alas! what will it avail, that my eyes are opened, when it is too late! In vain is that heart subdued, in vain is my return to virtue, since I have lost in you its best, its only valuable reward.

LISE.

Yet, answer me, Euphemon; may I believe you have indeed gained this glorious victory? consult your own breast, and do not again deceive me: can you yet be prudent and virtuous?

EUPHEMON.

I am so; for still my heart adores you.

LISE.

And dost thou still love, Euphemon?

EUPHEMON.

Do I love? by that I live, that alone has supported me. I have borne everything, even infamy itself; and a thousand times I would have put an end to my wretched life, but that still I loved it, because it belonged to you: yes, to you I owe my present sentiments, my being, and that new life which now dawns upon me: to you I owe the return of my reason: with love like mine, would to heaven I may be able to preserve it! O do not hide from me that charming face: look at me: see how changed I am: see the cruel effect of care and sorrow: the roses of youth are withered by remorse and misery: there was a time when Euphemon would not thus have affrighted you: do but look on me, 'tis all I ask.

LISE.

If I see the thinking, the reformed, the constant Euphemon, it is enough: in my eyes he is but too amiable.

EUPHEMON.

What says my Lise? gracious heaven! she weeps.

LISE.

[To Martha.

O support me, my senses fail. Can I ever be the wife of Euphemon's brother?

[Turning to Euphemon.

But tell me, have you yet seen your father?

EUPHEMON.

O I blush to appear before that good old man, whom I have so dishonored: hated as I am, and banished from his presence, I love and reverence, but dare not look upon him.

LISE.

What then is your design?

EUPHEMON.

If heaven should graciously prolong my days, if you must be my brother's happy lot, I propose to change my name and profession, serve as a soldier, and seek for death in the field of honor; perhaps success in arms may acquire me some glory, and even you may hereafter shed a tear over the unhappy Euphemon. My honor at least will never suffer by the employment ; Rose and Fabert set out as I shall do.

LISE.

'Tis a noble resolution ; and the heart that was capable of making it must be above guilt and meanness : sentiments like these affect me much more even than the tears you shed at my feet. No, Euphemon, if I am left at liberty to dispose of myself, and can possibly avoid a hateful match proposed for me, if it is in my power to determine your fate, you shall not go so far to change your condition.

EUPHEMON.

O heaven ! and does thy generous heart melt at my misfortunes ?

LISE.

They affect me most deeply : but your repentance hath secured me.

EUPHEMON.

And will those dear eyes, that looked on me so long with indignation, will they soften into love and tenderness ? O thou hast revived a flame in the breast of Euphemon, which his follies had almost extinguished. Fond as my brother is of riches, though my father has given him all that inheritance which nature had designed for me, he still must envy my happiness. I am dear to you ; he alone, and not Euphemon, is disinherited. O I shall die with joy.

MARTHA.

Deuce on him, here he comes.

LISE.

Be upon your guard, Euphemon ; keep in those struggling sighs, and dissemble.

EUPHEMON.

Why should I, if you love me?

LISE.

Consider my relations, consider your own father. Your brother saw us together, saw you at my feet; and all that we can now do is, not to let him know who you are.

MARTHA.

I can't help laughing, to think what a passion his gravity will be in.

SCENE IV.

LISE, MARTHA, JASMIN, FIBRENFAT, at the farther end of the stage, YOUNG EUPHEMON turning his back to him.

FIERENFAT.

Either some devil has impaired these eyes of mine; or, if I see clear, I most certainly beheld—O yes—it is so—it's all over with me.

[Coming forward towards Euphemon.

O it is you, sir, is it? traitor, rascal, forger.

EUPHEMON.

[Enraged.

I, I could—

JASMIN.

[Placing himself between them.

Sir, sir, this—this is an affair of importance that was going forward, and you interrupt it, sir; an affair of love, sir, tenderness, respect, gratitude, and virtue—for my part I'm distracted when I think of it.

FIERENFAT.

An affair of virtue! O yes, and kissing her hand, too! call you that virtue? rascal, slave.

EUPHEMON.

O Jasmin, if I dared—

FIERENFAT.

No: this is a gallant indeed with a witness: had he been a gentleman, but a servant, a beggar—if I was to sue him in a court of justice, it would be only so much money flung away.

LISE.

[To Euphemon.]

Be calm; if you have any regard for me, I beg you will.

FIERENFAT.

The traitor! I'll have you hanged, you dog.

[To Martha.]

You laugh, mistress.

MARTHA.

I do, to be sure, sir.

FIERENFAT.

And why do you? what do you laugh at?

MARTHA.

Lord, sir, 'tis such a comical affair.

FIERENFAT.

You don't know, madam, the danger you are in: you little think, my good friend, what the law inflicts on such delinquents as you, and how often you may be—

MARTHA.

Pardon me, sir, I know it mighty well.

FIERENFAT.

[To Lise.

You, madam, seem to be deaf to all this, faithless woman! with that air of innocence, too, to play me such a trick: your inconstancy is a little premature on our very wedding-day, and just before we are married: 'tis a wonderful mark of your chastity.

LISE.

Don't be in a passion, sir, nor lightly condemn innocence on bare appearances only.

FIERENFAT.

Innocence indeed!

LISE.

Yes, sir: when you know my sentiments, you will esteem me for them.

FIERENFAT.

You go an excellent way to gain esteem.

EUPHEMON.

This is too much.

LISE.

[To Euphemon.

What madness! for heaven's sake be calm, restrain—

EUPHEMON.

No: I will never suffer him to cast reproach on you.

FIERENFAT.

Do you know, madam, that you lose your jointure, your estate, your portion, everything, as soon as—

EUPHEMON.

[In a passion and putting his hand on his sword.]
Do you know, sir, how to hold your tongue?

LISE.

O forbear.

EUPHEMON.

Come, come, Mr. President, lay aside your assuming airs, be a little less fierce, and haughty; a little less of the judge, if you please: this lady has not yet the honor to be your wife, nor is she even your mistress, sir: what right have you then to complain? your claim is void: you should have known how to please, before you had a right to be angry: such charms were never made for you, and therefore jealousy sits but ill upon you. You see she's kind, and forgives my warmth; it will become you, sir, to follow her example.

FIERENFAT.

[In a posture of defence.]

I'll bear no more: where are my servants? help here.

EUPHEMON.

How's this!

FIERENFAT.

Fetch me a constable here.

LISE.

[To Euphemon.]

Retire, I beseech you.

FIERENFAT.

I'll make you know, sir, the respect that's due to my rank and profession.

EUPHEMON.

Observe, sir, what you owe to this lady: as to myself, however things may now appear, the respect perhaps is due to me.

FIERENFAT.

You, sir, you?

EUPHEMON.

Yes, sir, me, me.

FIERENFAT.

This is a pure impudent fellow: some lover, I suppose, in the disguise of a servant. Who are you, sir? answer me.

EUPHEMON.

I know not who I am, nor what will be my fate: my rank, condition, fortune, happiness, my very being, all depend on her heart, her kind looks, and her propitious bounty.

FIERENFAT.

They may soon depend upon a court of justice, that I assure you. I'll go this instant, prepare my records, and hasten to sign the instrument. Begone, ungrateful woman, and dread my resentment; I'll bring your relatives, and your father; then your innocence will appear in its proper light, and they will esteem you accordingly.

SCENE V.

LISE, YOUNG EUPHEMON, MARTHA.

LISE.

For heaven's sake, conceal yourself; let us go in immediately; I tremble at the consequence of this. If your father should find out it was you, nothing will appease him: he will conclude that some new extravagance brought you back here on purpose to insult him, and to sow division between our families; and then you will be confined perhaps, even without being so much as heard in your own defence.

MARTHA.

Let me conceal him, and I'll warrant they shan't easily find him out.

LISE.

Come, come, you must away; I must endeavor to reconcile your father: the return of nature shall, if possible, be the work of love: you must be concealed awhile—take you care [to Martha] he does not appear: begone immediately.

SCENE VI.

RONDON, LISE.

RONDON.

Well, my Lise, how is it? I was in search of you and your husband.

LISE.

[Aside.]

Thank God! he is not so yet.

RONDON.

Where are you going?

LISE.

Decency, sir, at present obliges me to avoid him.

[She goes out.]

RONDON.

This President is a dangerous man, I find: now should I like to be incog. in some place close to them, only to see how two lovers look when they are just going to be married.

SCENE VII.

 FIERENFAT, RONDON, Constables, etc.

FIERENFAT.

Where are they, where are they? ha! gone; the subtle villains have escaped me: where have the rascals hid themselves?

RONDON.

Your reverence seems out of breath? what are you in such a hurry about? whom are you hunting after? what have they done to you?

FIERENFAT.

Made a cuckold of me, that's all.

RONDON.

Ha! ha! a cuckold! ha! how! what is all this?

FIERENFAT.

Yes, yes, my wife, heaven preserve me from ever giving her that name! Yes, sir, a cuckold I am, in spite of all the laws in the kingdom.

RONDON.

My son-in-law!

FIERENFAT.

Yes, my father-in-law, 'tis but too true.

RONDON.

Well, but the affair—

FIERENFAT.

Is as clear as possible.

RONDON.

You try my patience too far.

FIERENFAT.

I'm sure they have mine.

RONDON.

If I could believe—

FIERENFAT.

You may believe it all, sir, I assure you.

RONDON.

But the more I hear, the less I understand.

FIERENFAT.

And yet it's very easy to comprehend.

RONDON.

If I were once convinced of it, the world should be a witness of my resentment, I would strangle her with my own hands.

The Prodigal.

FIERENFAT.

Strangle her then by all means, for the thing is fairly proved

RONDON.

Something no doubt is wrong, by my finding her here in that condition ; she hung down her head, and could scarce speak to me ; seemed frightened, and embarrassed too. Come, my son, let us in, and surprise her. This is a case of honor, and where that is concerned, Rondon listens no longer to reason. Away.

End of the Fourth Act.

ACT V. SCENE I.

LISE, MARTHA.

LISE.

What a desperate situation is mine ! scarce can I believe myself safe, even with you. Think what it must be for a soul so pure, so delicate, as mine, to suffer even for a moment such injurious suspicions : Euphemon, thou dear but fatal lover, thou wert born but to afflict me ; thy absence was worse than death to me, and now thy return exposes me to infamy : [turning to Martha] for heaven's sake, take care of him, for they are making the strictest inquiry.

MARTHA.

O never fear ; I shall put them to their trumps, I warrant you : I defy all their search-warrants : I have some certain little cunning holes in my cabinet which these ferrets can never get at ; there, madam, your lover lies snug, safely concealed from the inquisitive eyes of long-robed pedants. I have led the hounds a pretty good chase, and now the whole pack is at fault.

SCENE II.

LISE, MARTHA, JASMIN.

LISE.

Well, Jasmin, how stand our affairs?

JASMIN.

O I have passed my examination most gloriously, gone through it like an old offender, grown gray in the profession, and answered every question without fear or trembling. One of them drawled out his words with all the solemnity of a pedagogue; another put on a haughty air, and would have brow-beaten me; a third, in a pretty, silvery tone, cried out: "Child, tell us the truth:" while I, with most laconic brevity, and unalterable firmness, fairly routed the whole group of pedants.

LISE.

They know nothing then.

JASMIN.

Nothing: to-morrow perhaps they may know all: time, you know, brings everything to light.

LISE.

I hope at least Fierenfat will not have time to prejudice his father against me: I have a thousand fears about it: I tremble for him, and for my own honor : in love alone I have placed my hopes, that will assist me—

MARTHA.

For my part, I'm in a sad quandary about it, and wish everything may not go wrong : consider, madam, we have against us two old fathers, and a president, besides scolds, and prudes innumerable : if you knew what haughty airs they give themselves, what a supercilious sneer, and severe tone, their proud virtue puts on upon this occasion, with what insolent acrimony they have persecuted your innocence, believe me, madam, their clamors, with their affected zeal, and most religious fury, would raise your laughter, perhaps even make you tremble.

JASMIN.

I have travelled, madam, and seen noise and bustle enough, but never before was I witness to such a hubbub : the whole house is turned topsy-turvy ; they are all knaves, fools, or madmen ; whispering lies against you, and adding one untruth to another ; telling the story a hundred different ways ; the poor fiddles are sent back without receiving a farthing, or a drop of drink : six tables prepared for the wedding feast, full of the finest delicacies, overset in the confusion : the people run backwards and forwards ; the footmen drink and laugh ; Rondon swears, and Fierenfat is employed in writing the case out.

LISE.

And what does the worthy father of Euphemon do amidst all this bustle ?

MARTHA.

O madam, in his dejected aspect we may read the sorrow of afflicted virtue : he lifts up his eyes to heaven, and cannot bring himself to believe that you have stained the honor of your spotless youth with so black a crime: he defends you to your friends by the strongest arguments: and when at length he is staggered by the proofs they bring against you, he sighs, and says, if you are guilty, he will never again depend on any mortal breathing.

LISE.

The good old man, how his tenderness affects me!

MARTHA.

Here comes another, of a different kind, Master Rondon; let us avoid him, madam.

LISE.

By no means; my heart is innocent, and should be afraid of nothing.

JASMIN.

But I am, I assure you.

SCENE III.

—
LISE, MARTHA, RONDON.

RONDON.

O thou subtle gypsy, thou forward, thou unnatural girl! O Lise, Lise. But come, madam, I must know the bottom of this vile proceeding: how long have you been acquainted with this robber, this pirate? Tell me his name, his rank, his profession; how got he into your heart? Whence comes he, and where is he? Answer me, madam, answer me. You condemn me, madam, and laugh at my resentment; are not you ashamed?

The Prodigal.

LISE.

No, sir.

RONDON.

Always no, no, to me: am I never to hear anything but no? It increases my suspicion: when I am injured, I expect at least to be treated with respect. I will be feared, madam, and obeyed, too.

LISE.

And so you shall, sir. I will discover everything to you.

RONDON.

Well, that's saying something at least: when I begin to threaten, people will mind me a little, and—

LISE.

I have only one favor to beg of you—that, before I say anything to you, Euphemon will be so obliging as to let me speak a few words to him.

RONDON.

Euphemon! why, what has he to do with it? I think I am the proper person to be spoken to.

LISE.

My dear father, I have a secret to intrust to him: let me beg you, for the sake of your own honor, to send him to me: permit me—but I can tell you no more.

RONDON.

I must even yield to her request; she wants to explain herself to my good old friend, and I think I may safely trust her alone with him; and then to a nunnery with the little hussy immediately.

SCENE IV.

LISE, MARTHA.

LISE.

O that I may be able to melt the good Euphemon!
How my heart flutters and leaps within me! my life or death depends on this important moment. He comes. Hark'ee, Martha.

[Whispers to her.]

MARTHA.

I'll take care, madam.

SCENE V.

OLD EUPHEMON, LISE.

LISE.

A chair here—pray, sir, be seated. Oh! [Sighs]
permit me, sir, on my knees—

EUPHEMON.

[Raising her up.]

You mean to affront me, madam.

LISE.

Far from it, sir; my heart esteems and reveres
you; I have ever looked on you as a father.

EUPHEMON.

Are you my daughter?

Vol. 19—15

The Prodigal.

LISE.

Yes, sir. I flatter myself I have not been unworthy of that name.

EUPHEMON.

After the unhappy affair, madam, that has broken off our connection, I must own—

LISE.

Be you my judge, sir, and look into my heart; that judge, I doubt not, will one day be my protector: but hear me, sir, I will speak my own sentiments, perhaps they may be yours also.

[She takes a chair and sits by him.]

And now, sir, tell me; if your heart had for a long time been bound by the purest and most tender regard to an object, whose early years gave the fairest promise of all that is amiable, who every day advanced in beauty, merit, and accomplishments; if, after all, his easy and deluded youth gave way to inclination, and sacrificed duty, friendship, everything, to unbridled licentiousness—

EUPHEMON.

Well, madam.

LISE.

If fatal experience should teach him what false happiness he had so long pursued, should teach him that the vain objects of his search sprang but from error, and were followed by remorse; if at length, ashamed of his follies, his reason, instructed by misfortune, should again light up his virtues, and give him a new heart; if, restored to his natural form, he should become faithful, just, and honest, would you, sir, could you then shut up that heart which once was open to receive him?

EUPHEMON.

What am I to conclude from this picture, or what has it to do with our affair, and the injury I have received from your conduct? The wretch who was seen at your feet is a young man, utterly unknown to everybody here: the widow says indeed she remembers him six months at Angoulême: another tells me he is a hardy profligate, with a head full of dark intrigues, and every kind of debauchery; a character which doubles my astonishment: I shudder with horror at it.

LISE.

O sir, when I have told you all, you will be much more astonished; for heaven's sake, hear me then: I know you have a noble and a generous heart, that never was formed for cruelty: let me then ask you, was not your son Euphemon once most dear to you?

EUPHEMON.

He was, I own to you, he was, and therefore it is that his ingratitude calls for a severer vengeance: I have wept his misfortunes and his death; but nature, in the midst of all my anguish, left my reason but the more sensible of my injuries, and more resolved to punish them.

LISE.

And could you punish him forever? could you still be so unhappy, so miserable, as to hate him? could you throw from you a repenting child, an altered son, whose change would bring back to you the image of yourself? could you repulse this son were he now in tears at your feet?

The Prodigal.

EUPHEMON.

Alas! you have forgotten, you should not thus open a wound that bleeds too fresh, and inflict new torments on me: my son is dead, or far hence remains still hardened in his follies. O if he had returned to virtue, would he not come, and ask forgiveness of me?

LISE.

Yes, and he will come to ask it; you shall hear him; and hear him with compassion, too, indeed you shall.

EUPHEMON.

What say you?

LISE.

Yes, sir: if death has not already put an end to his shame and grief, you may perhaps see him dying at your feet with excess of sorrow and repentance.

EUPHEMON.

You see too well how deeply I am affected: my son alive!

LISE.

If he yet lives, he lives to love and honor you.

EUPHEMON.

To love and honor me! impossible! how can I ever know it? from whom must I learn that?

LISE.

From his own heart.

EUPHEMON.

But, do you think—

LISE.

With regard to everything I have said concerning him, you may depend on my veracity.

EUPHEMON.

Come, you have kept me in suspense too long; have pity on my declining years. Alas! I am full of hopes and fears: I did indeed love my son, these tears speak for me: I loved him tenderly. O if he yet lives! if he is returned to virtue! explain, I beseech you, speak to me, tell me all.

LISE.

I will: it is time now, and you shall be satisfied.

[She comes forward a little, and speaks to young Euphemon behind the scene.]

Come forth.

SCENE VI.

OLD EUPHEMON, YOUNG EUPHEMON, LISE.

OLD EUPHEMON.

Good heaven! what do I see?

YOUNG EUPHEMON.

[Kneeling.]

My father! O sir, know me, acknowledge me, decide my fate, for life or death depends upon a word.

OLD EUPHEMON.

What could bring you hither at this time?

The Prodigal.

YOUNG EUPHEMON.

Repentance, love, and nature.

LISE.

[Kneeling with young Euphemon.]

At your feet behold your children. Yes, sir, we have the same sentiments, the same heart.

YOUNG EUPHEMON.

[Pointing to Lise.]

Alas! her tender kindness has pardoned all my offences: O gracious sir, follow the example which love has set, and forgive your unhappy son; driven as I was to despair, all I hoped for was to die beloved by her and you; and if I live, I will live to deserve it. You turn away from me; what is it, sir, that transports you thus? I see your heart is moved: is it with hatred? is your wretched son condemned—

OLD EUPHEMON.

[Raising up his son, and embracing him.]

'Tis love; 'tis tenderness: I forgive thee: if thou art restored to virtue, I am still thy father.

LISE.

And I thy wife. O sir, long since our hearts were united; permit us at your feet to renew our vows: it is not your riches he asks of you, he brings you now a heart too pure for such a wish; he wants nothing: if he is virtuous, I have enough for both, and he shall have it all.

SCENE VII.

To them RONDON, MME. DE CROUPILLAC, FIERENFAT, Bailiff's Follower, Attendants.

FIERENFAT.

Yonder he is, talking to her still ; let us show ourselves men of courage, and take him by surprise.

RONDON.

Ay, let us be bold, we are six to one.

LISE.

[To Rondon.

Now, sir, open your eyes, and see who it is I love.

RONDON.

'Tis he.

FIERENFAT.

Who?

LISE.

Your brother.

OLD EUPHEMON.

The same, sir.

FIERENFAT.

You are pleased to jest, sir: this scoundrel my brother?

LISE.

Yes, sir.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

Upon my honor ! I am very glad to hear it.

The Prodigal.

RONDON.

What wonderful metamorphosis ; why, this is my droll valet.

FIERENFAT.

So, so, I play a pretty extraordinary part here : why, what brother is this ? ha !

OLD EUPHEMON.

He is your brother, sir ; I had lost him ; but heaven and repentance have restored him to me.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

And luckily enough for me.

FIERENFAT.

The rascal is come back only to take away my wife from me.

YOUNG EUPHEMON.

[To Fierenfat.

'Tis fit, sir, that you know me ; and let me tell you, sir, 'twas you took her from me, not I from you. In better days I had her heart : the folly of rash and unexperienced youth deprived me of a treasure which I did not know the value of : but on this happy day I have found again my virtue, my mistress, and my father : the rights of blood and the rights of love are at once restored to me, and perhaps you envy me the sudden, the unexpected blessings. But take my inheritance ; I give it you freely : you are fond of riches, and I of her : thus shall both be happy ; you in your possessions, and I in my Lise's heart.

OLD EUPHEMON.

His disinterested goodness shall not be thus rewarded. No, Euphemon, thou shalt not be so unworthy of her.

RONDON.

Very good; very fine indeed!

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

For my part, I'm astonished, and yet not displeas'd: 'tis a comfort to me to think the gentleman is come on purpose to avenge, as it were, my charms.

[To Euphemon.]

Quick, quick, sir; marry her as soon as possible; heaven is on your side, and, to be sure, made that lady on purpose for you; you were born for each other; and, by this lucky accident, 'tis ten to one if I don't recover my President.

LISE.

[To Rondon.]

With all my heart. You, my dear father, will permit my faithful heart, which can be given but to one, to return to its right owner.

RONDON.

Why—if his brain is not quite so much turned, and—

LISE.

O I'll answer for him.

RONDON.

If he loves you; if he is prudent—

LISE.

O doubt it not.

The Prodigal.

RONDON.

And if Euphemon will give him a good fortune, why—I agree.

FIERENFAT.

To be sure, I am a great gainer in this affair, by finding a new brother; but then I lose my wedding expenses, my fortune, and a wife into the bargain.

MME. DE CROUPILLAC.

For shame, thou sordid wretch, forever in pursuit of riches! have I not, in notes, bonds, and houses, enough to live upon, and more, much more, than you deserve? Am I not your first love? Didst thou not swear fidelity to me? Have I not it all under your own hand? your madrigals without sense, your songs without wit, your promises without meaning? But we'll try it at law, sir: I'll produce them in a court of justice; and the parliament, in such a case, I am sure, ought to make an act on purpose to punish ingratitude.

RONDON.

My good friend, take care of yourself, and tremble at her resentment: let me advise you to marry, if it be only to get shut of her.

OLD EUPHEMON.

[To Mme. de Croupillac.]

I am surprised at the passion you express for my son; methinks even the suit you threaten him with must soothe his vanity; the cause of your anger does him too much honor: but permit me to address myself to the dear object that has restored my son. Be united, my children, and embrace as brothers: and you, my friend, [turning to Rondon] must return thanks to heaven, whose goodness hath done all for the best. And henceforth,

Of youth misguided, let us learn, whate'er
Their follies threaten, never to despair.

End of the Fifth and Last Act.

PREFACE TO MARIAMNE.

---

I have printed this piece not without fear and trembling; the number of performances which have met with applause on the stage and contempt in the closet give me but too much reason to apprehend the same fate with regard to my own. Two or three agreeable incidents, together with the art and management of the actors, might conciliate an audience in the representation; but a very different degree of merit is necessary to make it shine in the full glare of publication. Little will avail the regular conduct of it, and even, perhaps, as little the interesting nature of the subject. Every work that is written in verse, though it may be unexceptionable in all other respects, must of necessity disgust if every line is not full of strength and harmony; if there is not an elegance running through the whole; if the piece has not, in short, that inexpressible charm, which nothing but true genius can bestow upon it; that point of perfection which knowledge alone can never attain to, and concerning which we have argued so poorly, and to so little purpose, since the death of M. Despréaux.

It is a great mistake to imagine that the versification of a dramatic performance is either the easiest or the least considerable part of it. Racine, who, of all men upon earth, after Virgil, best knew the art of verse, did not think it so: he employed two whole years in writing his "Phædra." Pradon boasts of having composed his in less than three months. As the transient success of a tragedy depends, with regard to the representation, not on the style, but on the incidents and the actors, the two seemed at first to meet with an equal degree of applause; but the publication soon determined the real and intrinsic merit of each of them. Pradon, according to the usual practice of bad authors, came out with an insolent preface; accusing all those who had attacked his piece as unfair and partial critics; a trouble which he might as well have spared himself; for his tragedy, puffed as it was by himself and his party, soon sank into that contempt which it deserves; and if it were not for the "Phædra" of Racine, the world would not know at this day that Pradon had ever written one.

But whence then arises the vast difference between these two performances? the plot is nearly the same in both. Phædra dies, Theseus is absent in the two first acts: he is supposed to be in the shades below with Pirithous. Hippolytus, his son, wants to leave Trezene, and to fly from Aricia, with whom he is in love; he declares his passion to Aricia, and listens to Phædra's with horror; he dies the same kind of death, and his governor relates the manner of it.

Add to this also, that the principal personages in both pieces, as they are in the same circumstances, say almost the same things; but this is the very place which distinguishes the great man from the bad poet; when Racine and Pradon have the same sentiments, they differ most from each other; for proof of this, let us take the declaration of Hippolytus to Aricia. Racine makes him talk thus:

I who so long defied the tyrant's power,
Smiled at his chains, and made a mock of love;
Myself on shore, I saw weak mortals wrecked,
And thought I safely might behold the storm

At distance rage, which I could never feel:
 And must I sink beneath the common lot?
 I must; this haughty soul at length is conquered,
 And hangs on thee: for six long months despair
 And shame have rent my soul; where'er I go,
 The wound still rankles: with myself long time
 In vain I struggled, reasoned, wept in vain:
 When absent seek thee, and when present shun:
 Thy image haunts me in the sylvan shade:
 The daylight's splendor and the evening's gloom
 All bring the loved Aricia to my eyes:
 All, all, unite to make this rebel thine.
 O! I have lost myself: the bow unbent,
 And useless arrows lay neglected by me;
 Thy lessons, Neptune, are no more remembered:
 The woods re-echo to my sighs alone
 Responsive, and my idle coursers now
 Forget the voice of their Hippolytus.

Now observe how this Hippolytus expresses himself in Pradon.

Long time, too long, alas! with lips profane,
 Laughing at love did I adore Diana;
 A solitary savage long I lived
 And chased the bears and lions in the forest;
 But now more pressing cares employ my time,
 For since I saw thee I have left off hunting,
 Though once I took delight in it, but now
 I never go there but to think of you.

It is impossible to read and compare these two pieces without admiring one and laughing at the other; and yet there is the same ground of thoughts and sentiments in both; when we are to make the passions speak, all men have pretty nearly the same ideas; but the manner of expressing them, distinguishes the man of wit from him who has none; the man of genius from him who has nothing but wit; and the real poet from him who would be a poet if he could.

To arrive at Racine's perfection in writing, a man must possess his genius, and withal must polish and correct his works as he did: how diffident then should I be, born as I am with such indifferent talents, and oppressed by continual disorders, who have neither the gift of a fine imagination, nor time to correct laboriously the faults of my performances! I am sensible of and lament the imperfections of this piece, as well with regard to the conduct as the diction of it; I should have mended them a little, if I could have put off this edition for a little longer; but still I should have left a great many behind. In every art there is a certain point beyond which we can never advance: we are shut up within the limits of our talents; we see perfection lying beyond us, and only make impotent endeavors to attain to it.

I shall not make a formal and regular critique on this piece; the reader will probably save me that trouble; but it may be necessary to say something concerning a general objection to the choice of my subject. As it is the nature of Frenchmen to lay hold with rapidity on the ridicule of things in themselves the most serious, it has been said that the subject of "Mariamne" is nothing but an old amorous brutal husband; whose wife, being out of humor with him, refuses him the return of conjugal duty; to which it has been added, that a family quarrel could never make a good tragedy. I would only beg these critics to join with me in a few reflections on this strange kind of prejudice.

The plots of tragedies are generally founded, either on the interests of a whole nation, or the private interests of the sovereign. Of the first kind are the "Iphigenia in Aulis"; where all Greece, met in full assembly, demands the blood of the son of Agamemnon; "The Horatii," where the three combatants are to decide the fate of Rome; and "Œdipus," where the safety and prosperity of Thebes depend on the discovery of the murderer of Laius. Of the latter kind are "Britannicus," "Phædra," "Mithridates," etc. In these all the interest is confined to the hero of the piece and his family; all turns upon such passions as the vulgar feel equally with princes, the plot may be as proper for comedy as for tragedy: for, take away the names only, and Mithridates is no more than an old fellow in love with a young girl; his two sons are in love with her at the same time: and he makes use of a very low artifice to discover which of his sons the lady is fond of. Phædra is a step-mother, who, egged on by her confidante, makes love to her son-in-law, who is unfortunately pre-engaged. Nero is an impetuous young man, who falls precipitately in love, and immediately wants to be separated from his wife, and hides himself behind the tapestry to overhear the conversation of his mistress. These are all subjects which Molière might treat as well as Racine: nay, the whole plot of "The Miser" is exactly the same as that of "Mithridates;" Harpagon and the king of Pontus are two old fellows in love: each of them has a son for his rival; both of them make use of the same artifice to discover the intrigue carried on between the son and the mistress; and both pieces end in the marriage of the young men.

Molière and Racine met with equal success; one made the world laugh, amused, and entertained them; the other moved, terrified, and made us weep. Molière exposed the folly of an old miser in love; Racine painted the weakness of a great man, and so contrived, as at the same time even to make that weakness respectable.

Were we to order Watteau and Lebrun, each of them, to paint us a wedding; one would give us the representation of a group of peasants in an arbor, full of vulgar joy and jollity, placed round a rustic table, where drunkenness, riot, debauchery, and immoderate laughter reigned without control; the other would paint the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, the feast of the gods, with all their solemn and majestic celebration of it. Thus both of them would reach the highest degree of perfection in their art, by means entirely different.

We may fairly apply every one of these examples to "Mariamne"—the bad temper of a woman; the love of an old husband; the malicious tricks of a sister-in-law; are subjects in themselves inconsiderable, and seem rather adapted to comedy; but at the same time a king, whom all the world has honored with the name of "Great," passionately enamored with the finest woman in the universe; the rage and fury of a monarch so famous for his virtues and his crimes, his past cruelty, and his present remorse; that perpetual and rapid transition from love to hatred, and from hatred to love; the ambition of his sister; the intrigues of his ministers; the distressful situation of a princess whose virtue and beauty have been so often celebrated and talked of to this day, who had seen her father and brother doomed to death by her husband; and to complete her misfortunes, saw herself beloved by the murderer of her family. What a field is here! What an opening for any genius but mine! Can we say this is a subject unfit for tragedy? Here we may indeed aver, that, according as things turn out, they change their names.

PREFACE TO ORESTES.

A LETTER TO HER MOST SERENE HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF MAINE.

---

MADAM—

You have seen that noble age, which is at once the model and the reproach of the present, and will be so of future generations, and have yourself made a part of its glory, by your taste and by your example; those illustrious times, when your ancestors, the Condés, crowned with laurels, cultivated the polite arts; when a Bossuet immortalized heroes, and instructed kings; when a Fénelon, the second of mankind in eloquence, and the first in the art of making virtue amiable, taught justice and humanity in the most charming manner; when Racine and Boileau presided over the belles-lettres, Lulli over music, and Lebrun over painting; all these arts, Madam, met together in your palace: there I first had the happiness, a circumstance which I shall never forget, of hearing, though I was then but a child, that excellent scholar, whose profound learning never obscured the brightness of his genius, cultivating the fine understanding of the Duke of Bourgogne, the Duke of Maine, and yourself: that happy labor, in which he was so powerfully assisted by nature. Sometimes he would take up a "Sophocles" or "Euripides" before you, and translate off-hand one of their tragedies. The admiration and enthusiasm that possessed his soul, on reading those noble performances, inspired him with expressions that answered the manly and harmonious energy of the Greek, as nearly as it was possible to reach it in the prose of a language just emerging from barbarism, and which, polished as it now is by so many fine authors, is still very deficient in point of force, copiousness, and precision. It is impossible to convey through any modern language, all the power of Greek expressions; they describe, with one stroke, what costs us a whole sentence. A single word was sufficient for them to express a mountain covered with trees, bending beneath the weight of their leaves; or a god throwing his darts to a vast distance; or, the tops of rocks struck with repeated thunderbolts. That language had not only the advantage of filling the imagination with a word, but every word, we know, had its peculiar melody, which charmed the ear while it displayed the finest pictures to the mind; and for this reason all our translations from the Greek poets are weak, dry, and poor; it is imitating palaces of porphyry with bricks and pebbles. M. de Malezieu notwithstanding, by the efforts of a sudden enthusiasm, and a vehement forcible manner of reciting, seemed to make up for the poverty of our language, and infuse into his declamation the very soul and spirit of the great Athenians. Permit me, Madam, to give you his thoughts with regard to this inventive, ingenious, and sensible people, a people from whom the Romans, their conquerors, learned everything, and who, a long time after the fall of both their empires, had yet the power to raise modern Europe from ignorance and barbarism.

He knew more of Athens than many of our travellers in these days do of Rome, after they have seen it over and over. That vast number of statues, by the greatest masters ; those pillars which adorned the public market-places ; those monuments of taste and grandeur ; that superb and immense theatre, built in the finest situation, between the town and the citadel, where the works of Sophocles and Euripides were heard by Pericles and Socrates ; and the youth of Athens attended, not standing up, or in perpetual riot and confusion, as they do with us ; in a word, everything which the Athenians had done in every art and every branch of knowledge was ever present to the mind of M. de Malezieu. He was far from falling in with the opinions of those ridiculously rigid critics and false politicians who blame the Athenians for having been too sumptuous in their public entertainments, and do not know that this very magnificence greatly enriched Athens, by attracting crowds of foreigners, who came from all parts to admire and to receive lessons from them on eloquence and virtue.

This extensive and almost universal genius engaged by you, Madam, to translate the "Iphigenia in Tauris" of Euripides ; a task which he executed with equal elegance, strength, and fidelity. It was represented at an entertainment which he had the honor to present your Highness, an entertainment worthy of him who gave, and of her who received it. You, I remember, Madam, played the part of Iphigenia, for I was present at the representation ; and as at that time I had no acquaintance with the French stage, it never entered into my head that gallantry could ever have been mingled with so tragical a subject. I gave myself up to the manners and customs of Greece, perhaps the more easily, because I was then acquainted with no other. I admired the antique in all its noble simplicity : it was this which first suggested to me the idea of writing my tragedy of "Œdipe," without ever having read Corneille's. I began, as an essay of my abilities, by translating that famous scene from Sophocles, of the double confidence of Jocaste and Œdipus. I read it to some of my friends, who frequented the theatre, and to two or three actors; they assured me it would never succeed on the French stage, and advised me to read Corneille, who had carefully avoided that part of the plot, and all agreed, that if I did not follow his example, by putting in a love intrigue, the players would never undertake it. I then read the "Œdipe" of Corneille, which, though it was not ranked with "Cinna" and "Polyeucte," had, notwithstanding, met with some applause. I must confess, their opinions ran directly counter to mine, from the beginning of this affair to the end; but I was forced to submit to example, and the evil power of fashion. In the midst of all the terror of this masterpiece of antiquity, I brought in, not absolutely a love intrigue, but the remembrance of an extinguished passion,<sup>1</sup> which appeared to the last degree absurd; but I will not repeat here what I have already said on this subject.

Your highness may remember that I had the honor of reading my "Œdipe" to you; the scene from Sophocles was not condemned at that tribunal; for you, the Cardinal de Polignac, M. de Malezieu, and your whole court, unanimously condemned me, and with great reason, for having so much as mentioned the word love in a work which Sophocles finished so completely, and so successfully, without that unhappy foreign ornament; and yet the very fault which you blamed me for was the only thing that recommended my performance to the stage. The players were, with the greatest difficulty, prevailed on to perform my "Œdipe," which they imagined could never succeed; the public, however, were entirely of your opinion; every part of it that was written in the taste of Sophocles was generally applauded, and the love scenes condemned by the most judicious critics; to say the truth, Madam, while parricide and incest are destroying a family, and a plague laying the whole country waste, is it a season for love and gallantry? There cannot, perhaps, be two more striking proofs of theatrical absurdity, and the power of habit, than Corneille, on one side, making Theseus cry out,

*Quelque ravage affreux qu'étale ici la peste,
L'absence aux vrais amans est encor plus funeste.*<sup>1</sup>

And on the other, myself, sixty years after him, making old Jocaste talk of her old love; and all this only in compliance with a taste the most false and ridiculous that ever corrupted literature.

That a Phædra, whose character is, perhaps, the most truly theatrical that ever was exhibited, and almost the only person whom antiquity has represented in love, should express all the power and fury of that fatal passion; that a Roxana, confined within the walls of an idle seraglio, should abandon herself to love and jealousy: that Ariadne should complain to heaven and earth of cruelty and inconstancy: that Orosmenes should destroy a mistress whom he adored : all this is truly tragic ; love, either raging, or criminal, or unhappy, or attended with remorse, draws such tears from us as we need not blush to shed ; but there is no medium ; love should either command as a tyrant, or not appear at all ; he can never act an under part ; but that Nero should hide himself behind the tapestry to overhear the conversation of his mistress and his rival ; that old Mithridates should make use of a comedy trick to discover the secret of a young woman beloved by his two sons ; that Maximus, even in "Cinna," a piece of so much real merit, should act the part of a villain, and discover so important a conspiracy, only because he was weak enough to be in love with a woman whose passion for Cinna he must have known, and allege by way of reason, that "Love excuses all,"—for the true lover knows no friends ; that old Sertorius should fall in love with a strange Spanish lady, called Viriate, and be assassinated by his rival Perpenna ; all this, we will be bold enough to assert, is little, mean, and puerile ; such ridiculous stuff would degrade us infinitely below the Athenians, if our great masters had not made amends for these faults, which are merely national, by those sublime beauties which are entirely the product of their own genius.

It is indeed astonishing to me, that the great tragic poets of Athens should dwell so much on those subjects where nature displays everything that is great and affecting ; an Electra, an Iphigenia, a Méropé, an Aicmæon ; and that our illustrious moderns, neglecting all these, should treat of scarcely anything but love, which is generally much more proper for comedy than tragedy : sometimes indeed they have endeavored to enrich and adorn it by politics ; but that love which is not violent is always cold, and all political intrigues that do not rise to the height and fury of ambition are still more cold and insipid; political reasonings and debates are very agreeable in Polybius or Machiavelli; gallantry is very fit for tales, or comedies; but nothing like this is suitable to the grandeur and pathos of true tragedy.

A taste for gallantry in our tragedies was carried to such a ridiculous excess that a great princess, whose high rank and fine understanding might in some measure excuse her believing that all the world would be of her opinion, imagined, that the parting of Titus and Berenice was an excellent subject for a tragedy: she therefore put it into the hands of two of our best writers;<sup>1</sup> neither of them had ever produced a performance wherein love had not played the principal or at least the second part; but one of them had never touched the heart, except in those scenes of "The Cid" which he had taken from the Spanish; the other, always tender and elegant, endowed with every species of eloquence, and above all, master of that enchanting art which draws forth the most delicate sentiments from the least and most unpromising incidents: one therefore made of Titus and Berenice as contemptible a piece as ever appeared on the stage; the other found out the secret of interesting the spectator for five acts without any other foundation but these words, "I love you, and I leave you." It was indeed nothing more than a pastoral between an emperor, a king, and a queen; and a pastoral withal infinitely less tragical than the interesting scenes of "Pastor Fido." The success of this, however, persuaded the public and the poets, that love, and love alone, was the soul of tragedy.

It was not till long after, when he was further advanced in life, that this great poet found out that he was capable of something superior to this: when he was sorry he had enervated the drama by so many declarations of love, and sentiments of jealousy, and coquetry, much worthier, as I have already ventured to assert, of Menander, than of Sophocles and Euripides. Then he wrote his masterpiece, "Athalie"; but though he was undeceived himself, the public was not; they could not bring themselves to conceive that a woman, a child, and a priest, could make an interesting tragedy; a work that approached nearer to perfection than any which ever came from the hand of man, remained for a long time in contempt, and its illustrious author had to his last hour the mortification of seeing the age he lived in, though greatly improved, still so corrupted with bad taste as never to do justice to his noblest performance.

It is certain, if this great man had lived, and cultivated those talents which alone made his fortune and his fame, and which therefore he should not have deserted, he would have restored to the theatre its ancient purity, and no more have degraded the great subjects of antiquity with love intrigue. He had begun an "Iphigenia," and there was not a word of gallantry in his whole plan: he would never have made Agamemnon, Orestes, Electra, Telephus, or Ajax, in love: but having unhappily quitted the stage before he had reformed it, all those who followed him imitated, and even added to his faults, without copying any of his beauties. The morality of Quinault's operas was brought into almost every tragic scene: sometimes it is an Alcibiades who assures us that "in those tender moments he has always proved by experience that a mortal may taste of perfect happiness"; sometimes it is an Amestris who tells us that the daughter of a great king burns with a secret flame without shame, and without fear; in another, Agnonis follows the steps of the fair Crisis in every place, the constant adorer of her divine charms; the fierce Arminius, the defender of Germany, protests to us, that he comes to read his fate in the eyes of Ismenia, and goes to the camp of Varus, to see if the fair eyes of his Ismenia will show him their wonted tenderness. In "Amasis," which is only "Méropé," crowded with a heap of romantic episodes, the heroine, who, three days before, at a country house, had just got sight of a young stranger, and fallen in love with him, cries out, with a great deal of regard to decency and decorum: "This is the same stranger; alas, he hath not concealed himself so much as he ought, for my repose; for the few moments when he chanced to strike my eyes I saw him and blushed, my soul was deeply moved at him." In "Athenais," a prince of Persia disguises himself, in order to make his mistress a visit at the court of a Roman emperor: we fancy, in short, that we are reading the romances of Mademoiselle Scudéri, who described the citizens of Paris under the names of the heroes of antiquity.

To confirm and establish this horrid taste among us, which renders us so ridiculous in the eyes of all sensible foreigners, it unfortunately happened that M. de Longepierre, a warm admirer of antiquity, but not sufficiently acquainted with our stage, and who besides was careless in his versification, gave us his "Electra." We must confess it was written in the taste of the ancients, no cold ill-placed intrigue disfigured this subject full of terror; the piece was simple, and without any episode. This procured for it, and with great reason, the patronage of so many persons of the first consideration, who flattered themselves that this valuable simplicity, which constituted the principal merit of the great geniuses of Athens, would be well received at Paris, where it had been so long neglected. You, Madam, with the late Princess of Conti, were at the head of those sanguine friends; but, unhappily, the faults of the French piece were so numerous, in comparison with the beauties which he had borrowed from the Greek, that you yourself acknowledged, at the representation, that it was a statue of Praxiteles disfigured by a modern artist. You had resolution enough to give up a thing which was not in reality worthy of being supported, well knowing, that favor and protection, thrown away on bad performances, are as prejudicial to the advancement of wit and good sense as the unjust censure of real merit; but the downfall of "Electra" was a terrible stroke to the partisans of antiquity. The critics availed themselves of the faults of the copy, the better to decry the merit of the original; and to complete the corruption of our taste, we persuaded ourselves it was impossible to support, without love and romance, those subjects which the Greeks had never debased by such episodes; it was pretended that we might admire the Greek tragedians in the reading, but that it was impossible to imitate them without being condemned by our own age and nation: strange contradiction! for, surely, if the reading really pleased us, how could the representation displease?

We should not, I acknowledge, endeavor to imitate what is weak and defective in the ancients: it is most probable that their faults were very well known to their contemporaries. I am satisfied, Madam, that the wits of Athens condemned, as well as you, some of those repetitions, and some declamations with which Sophocles has loaded his "Electra;" they must have observed that he had not dived deep enough into the human heart. I will moreover fairly confess, that there are beauties peculiar not only to the Greek language, but to the climate, to manners and times, which it would be ridiculous to transplant hither. I have not copied exactly therefore the "Electra" of Sophocles, much more I knew would be necessary; but I have taken, as well as I could, all the spirit and substance of it. The feast celebrated by Ægisthus and Clytemnestra, which they called "The feast of Agamemnon;" the arrival of Orestes and Pylades; the urn which was supposed to contain the ashes of Orestes; the ring of Agamemnon; the character of Electra, and that of Iphisa, which is exactly the Chrysothemis of Sophocles; and above all, the remorse of Clytemnestra; these I have copied from the Greek tragedy. When the messenger, who relates the fictitious story of the death of Orestes, says to Clytemnestra, "I see, Madam, you are deeply affected at his death;" she replies: "I am a mother, and must therefore be unhappy; a mother, though injured, cannot hate her own offspring." She even endeavors to justify herself to Electra, with regard to the murder of Agamemnon, and laments her daughter. Euripides has carried Clytemnestra's repentance still further. This, Madam, was what gained the applause of the most judicious and sensible people upon earth, and was approved by all good judges in our own nation. No character, in reality, can be more natural than that of a woman, criminal with regard to her husband, yet softened by her children; a woman, whose proud and fiery disposition is still open to pity and compassion, who resumes the fierceness of her character on receiving too severe reproaches, and at last sinks into submission and tears. The seeds of this character were in Sophocles and Euripides, and I have only unfolded them. Nothing but ignorance, and its natural attendant, presumption, can assert that the ancients have nothing worthy of our imitation; there is scarcely one real and essential beauty and perfection, for the foundation of which, at least, we are not indebted to them.

I have taken particular care not to depart from that simplicity so strongly recommended by the Greeks, and so difficult to attain, the true mark of genius and invention; and the very essence of all theatrical merit. A foreign character, brought into "Ædipus" or "Electra," who should play a principal part, and draw aside the attention of the audience, would be a monster in the eyes of all those who have any knowledge of the ancients, or of that nature which they have so finely painted. Art and genius consist in finding everything within the subject, and never going out of it in search of additional ornaments: but how are we to imitate that truly tragic pomp and magnificence which we find in the verses of Sophocles, that natural elegance and purity of diction, without which the piece, howsoever well conducted in other respects, must after all be but a poor performance!

I have at least given my countrymen some idea of a tragedy without love, without confidants, and without episodes: the few partisans of good taste acknowledge themselves obliged to me for it, though the rest of the world withhold their approbation for a time, but will come in at last, when the rage of party is over, the injustice of persecution at an end, and the clouds of ignorance dissipated. You, Madam, must preserve among us those glittering sparks of light which the ancients have transmitted to us; we owe everything to them; not an art was born among us; everything was transplanted; but the earth that bears these foreign fruits is worn out, and our ancient barbarism, by the help of false taste, would break out again in spite of all our culture and improvement; and the disciples of Athens and Rome become Goths and Vandals, corrupted with the manners of the Sybarites, without the kind favor and protection of persons of your rank. When nature has given them either genius, or the love of genius, they encourage this nation, which is better able to imitate than to invent; and which always looks up toward the great for those instructions and examples of which it perpetually stands in need. All that I wish for, Madam, is, that some genius may be found to finish what I have but just sketched out; to free the stage from that effeminacy and affectation into which it is now sunk; to render it respectable to the gravest characters; worthy of the few great masterpieces which we already have among us; worthy, in short, the approbation of a mind like yours, and all those who may hereafter endeavor to resemble you.

PREFACE TO CATILINE.

(This "Advertisement" is prefixed in the first edition.)

---

[This tragedy differs in many respects from that which appeared at Paris under the same title in 1752, when it was transcribed from the representation by some vile copyists, who most shamefully disfigured it; the parts then omitted were filled up by other hands, and over a hundred verses interpolated not written by the author of "Catiline." From this imperfect copy was published a surreptitious edition, full of errors from beginning to end, which was followed by another in Holland, still more faulty. The present edition was carefully inspected by the author himself, who even altered several whole scenes in it. It is certainly a most flagrant abuse, which calls every day for redress, that the works of authors should be printed in spite of themselves. A bookseller is in a hurry to publish a bad edition of a work that falls into his hands, and this very bookseller will afterward complain most bitterly, when the author whom he has injured gives us the performance as it really is. Such is the miserable condition of modern literature.]

PREFACE.

Two motives induced me to make choice of a subject for tragedy, which seemed on the first view of it but ill adapted to the manners and customs of the French theatre. I was willing to endeavor once more, by a tragedy without any declarations of love in it, to put an end to the reproaches so often thrown out against us in the learned world, of filling our stage with nothing but gallantry and intrigue, and at the same time to make our young men, who frequent the theatre, better acquainted with Cicero. The amazing grandeur of Rome in past times still commands the attention of all mankind; and modern Italy derives part of her glory from the discoveries she is every day making of the ruins of the ancient. The house where Cicero lived is shown to us with some degree of veneration, his name is echoed by every tongue, and his writings are in every hand. Those who are unable to inform us who presided at the courts of justice within these fifty years in their own country, can tell you when Cicero was at the head of Rome. The more light we have into the last period of the Roman commonwealth the more do we admire this great man; though it must be confessed that most of our too lately civilized nations have entertained very false and imperfect ideas concerning him; his works indeed made a part of our education, but we remained still ignorant of his true merit; the author was superficially studied, the consul almost utterly unknown; the lights which we have since acquired let us into his real character, and set him far above all those who ever were employed in the affairs of government, or were distinguished by their eloquence.

Cicero might, perhaps, have been anything, and everything that he chose to be; he gained a victory in the town of Issus, where Alexander had conquered the Persians; it is very probable, that if he had applied himself entirely to the art of war, a profession which requires a good understanding, and extraordinary industry, he would have shone among the most illustrious commanders of his age;

but as Cæsar would have been but the second of orators, Cicero would have been but the second of generals: he preferred to all other glory that of being the father of Rome, the mistress of the world; and how extraordinary must have been the merit of a private gentleman of Arpinum, who could make his way through such a number of great men, and attain, without intrigue, the most exalted place in the whole universe, in spite of the envy and malice of so many Patricians, who at that time bore sway in Rome!

What we have still more reason to be astonished at is, that amidst a thousand cares and disquietudes, and during a whole tempestuous life, burdened as he was both by public and private affairs, this wonderful man could yet find leisure to acquaint himself with all the various sects of religion in Greece, and shine forth one of the greatest philosophers, as well as orators, of his age. Are there many ministers, magistrates, or lawyers, now in Europe, of any eminence, who are able, I will not say to explain the discoveries of Newton, or the ideas of Leibnitz, in the same manner as Cicero illustrated the principles of Zeno, Plato, and Epicurus, but even to solve any difficult problem in philosophy?

Cicero, a circumstance which very few are acquainted with, was withal one of the best poets of the age he lived in, when poetry was yet in its infant state; he even rivalled Lucretius. Can anything be more beautiful than these verses yet remaining of his poem on Marius, which make us still regret the loss of that excellent performance?

*Hic Jovis altisoni subito pinnata satelles
Arboris e trunco, serpentis saucia morsu,
Ipsa feris subigit transfigens unguibus anguem*

*Semianimum, et varia graviter cervice micantem:
 Quem se intorquentem lanians, rostroque cruentans,
 Jam satiata animos, jam duros ultra dolores
 Abjicet efflantem, et laceratum affligit in undas
 Seque obitu a solis nitidos convertit ad ortus.*

I am thoroughly persuaded that our language is incapable of expressing the harmonious energy of Greek and Latin verses; I will, however, venture to give a slight sketch from this little picture, painted by the great man whom I have characterized in my "Rome Preserved," and whose Catiline I have imitated in some parts of the tragedy.

Thus wounded by an earth-born serpent flies
 The bird of Jove, and in his talons bears
 His struggling foe; the dying reptile wreaths
 His tortured scales that glitter in the sun:
 Till the fierce eagle drops his bleeding prey,
 Soars to the skies, and seeks his native heaven.

Those who have the least spark of taste will perceive, even in this imperfect copy, the force of the original; whence comes it then that Cicero should pass for a bad poet? Simply because Juvenal has thought fit to say so, and imputed to him that ridiculous verse,

O fortunatam natam me consule Roman!

So ridiculous that the French poet, who was desirous of pointing out the absurdity of it in a translation, could not succeed in it:

O Rome fortunée sous mon consulat née

does not express half the nonsense of the Latin.

Is it possible the author of those fine verses I just now quoted could ever write anything so ridiculous! there are follies which a man of sense and genius can never be guilty of: but the real truth is that prejudice, which will never allow two species of excellency to one man, denied Cicero's ability to make verses, because he himself thought fit to renounce it. Some low buffoon, who envied the reputation of this great man, wrote that foolish verse, and attributed it to the orator, the philosopher, the father of Rome. Juvenal, in the succeeding age, adopted this popular error, and handed it down to posterity in his satirical declamations. I believe many a reputation both good and bad is established in the same manner. These two verses, for instance, are imputed to Malebranche:

*Il fait en ce beau jour le plus beau tems du monde
Pour aller a cheval sur la terre et sur l'onde.*

To which it is added, that he made them purposely to show that a philosopher could be a poet whenever he had a mind to. What man, with common sense, could ever be persuaded that Malebranche was capable of writing anything so absurd? Yet let a retailer of anecdotes, or a literary compiler, transmit this idle tale to posterity, and in process of time it will gain credit: and though Malebranche was one of the greatest of men, it will be said one day or other that this great man turned fool when he got out of his sphere.

Cicero has been reproached for too much sensibility, and too much dejection in adversity; he imparts his well-grounded complaints to his wife and friends, and his frankness is imputed to cowardice; but let who will blame him for pouring into the bosom of friendship that grief which he concealed from his persecutors, I love him the more for it; the virtuous soul alone is capable of feeling. Cicero, fond as he was of glory, had no ambition of appearing to be what he was not. We have seen men in our own times dying with grief at the loss of very trifling emoluments, after a ridiculous pretence of not regretting them at all. What is there then so mean or cowardly in acknowledging to a wife or friend that a man was unhappy at being banished from his country, which he had served, or at being persecuted by a set of ungrateful and perfidious villains? Surely we ought to shut our hearts against the tyrants who oppress us, and open them to those we love.

Cicero was free and ingenuous throughout his whole conduct; he spoke of his afflictions without shame, and of his thirst after true glory without disguise: this character is natural, at the same time that it is great. Shall we prefer to this the policy of Cæsar, who tells us in his "Commentaries," that he offered peace to Pompey, and yet in his private letters vows that he never had any such intention? Cæsar was a great man, but Cicero was an honest man: but his having been a good poet, and philosopher, an excellent governor, or an able general, his having had a feeling and a good heart, are not points that concern our present purpose. He saved Rome in spite of the senate; one-half of which at least opposed him, from motives of the most inveterate envy and malice; even those whose oracle, whose deliverer and avenger he was, were among his worst foes; he laid the foundation of his own ruin by the most signal service that man ever performed for his country. To represent this is the principal design of the tragedy; it is not so much the ferocious spirit of Catiline, as the generous and noble soul of Cicero, which I have there endeavored to describe.

. It has always been asserted, and the opinion gains ground among us, that Cicero is one of those characters which should never be brought upon the stage.

The English, who hazard everything without knowing what they hazard, have given us a tragedy on the conspiracy of Catiline, wherein Ben Jonson has made no scruple of translating seven or eight pages of Tully's oration: he has even translated them into prose, not imagining it possible to make Cicero speak in verse. The consul's prose, to say the truth, mingled with the verse of the other characters, forms a contrast worthy of the barbarous age of Ben Jonson; but to treat a subject so grave, and withal so totally void of those passions which generally captivate the heart, we must have to do with a serious and cultivated people, worthy in some measure of having the manners of ancient Rome exhibited before them. I acknowledge at the same time that this subject is not well adapted to our stage: we have much more taste, decorum, and knowledge of the theatre than the English, but our manners for the most part are not so strong. We are only pleased with the struggle of those passions which we ourselves experience; those among us who are best acquainted with the works of Cicero and the Roman republic are not frequenters of a play house, they do not in this respect follow the example of Tully himself, who, we know, was constantly there. It is astonishing that they should pretend to more gravity than he; they have only less taste for the fine arts, or they are withheld by a ridiculous prejudice. What progress soever those arts may have made in France, those gentlemen of distinguished genius and abilities who have cultivated them among us have not yet imparted true taste to the whole nation. We are not born so happy as the Greeks and Romans, but frequent the theatre more out of idleness than from any real regard to literature.

This tragedy seems rather to be made for the closet than the stage; it met with applause indeed, and even more than "Zaïre," but it is not of such a species as to support itself on the stage like "Zaïre:" still it is written with more strength. The single scene between Cæsar and Catiline was executed with more difficulty than half those pieces which are filled with nothing but love; but to these the heart returns with pleasure, whilst our admiration of the ancient Romans is quickly exhausted. In our times nobody enters into conspiracies, but everybody is in love. The representation of Catiline requires withal a large company of actors, and a magnificent apparatus.

The learned will not here meet with a faithful narrative of Catiline's conspiracy; a tragedy, they very well know, is not a history, but they will see a true picture of the manners of those times: all that Cicero, Catiline, Cato and Cæsar do in this piece is not true, but their genius and character are faithfully represented; if we do not there discover the eloquence of Cicero, we shall at least find displayed all that courage and virtue which he showed in the hour of danger. In Catiline is described that contrast of fierceness and dissimulation which formed his real character; Cæsar is represented as growing into power, factious, and brave; that Cæsar who was born at once to be the glory and the scourge of Rome.

I have not brought on the stage the deputies of the Allobroges, who were not the ambassadors of Gaul, but agents of a petty province of Italy, subject to the Romans, who only appeared in the low character of informers, and were therefore not proper persons to appear in company with Cicero, Cæsar, and Cato.

If this performance should appear tolerably well written, and to give us some idea of ancient Rome, it is all that the author pretends to, and all the reward which he expects from it.

PREFACE TO MÉROPE.

A LETTER FROM THE JESUIT TOURNEMINE TO FATHER BRUMOY, ON THE TRAGEDY OF MÉROPE.

REV. FATHER.—The Mérope which you desired to be returned last night, I have sent you this morning at eight o'clock. I have taken time to read it with attention. Whatever success the fluctuating taste of Paris may think proper to bestow on it, I am satisfied that posterity will applaud it as one of our best performances, and indeed as the model of true tragedy. Aristotle, the legislator of the stage, has allotted to Mérope the first rank among the fine subjects for tragedy. It is treated by Euripides, we know, and in such a manner, as we learn from Aristotle, that whenever his Cresphontes was exhibited at Athens, that ingenious people, who were accustomed to the finest dramatic performances, were struck, ravished and transported in the most extraordinary manner. If the taste of Paris should not correspond with that of Athens, we know which is to blame. The Cresphontes of Euripides is lost; M. Voltaire has restored it to us. You, my dear sir, who have given us an Euripides in French, exactly as he appeared to admiring Greece, have acknowledged in the Mérope of our illustrious friend, the natural, the simple, and the pathetic of Euripides. M. Voltaire has preserved the simplicity of the subject, has not only disencumbered it from superfluous episodes, but from many unnecessary scenes also; the danger of Ægisthus alone fills the stage; the interest increases from scene to scene, till we come to the catastrophe, the surprise of which is managed and prepared with the greatest art. We expect it indeed from the grandson of Alcides. Everything passes upon the stage as it did in Mycenæ. The theatrical strokes are not forced and unnatural; nor such as, by their great degree of the marvellous, shock all probability: they arise entirely from the subject; it is the historical event represented to us in the most lively manner. It is impossible not to be deeply moved and affected by that scene where Narbas arrives, at the very instant when Mérope is going to sacrifice her son, on a supposition that she is about to avenge him: or by that scene, where she has no other means of saving him from inevitable death, than by revealing him to the tyrant. The fifth act equals, if not surpasses, any of those few excellent last acts, which our stage has to boast of. Everything passes without; notwithstanding which the author has so artfully and judiciously contrived, as to bring all the action before us; the narration by Ismenia is not one of those studied artificial pieces which are foreign to the subject; where the poet's wit is made to shine out of its place, such as throw an air of coldness and insipidity over the whole fable. This is nothing but action throughout. The trouble and agitation visible in Ismenia are expressive of the tumult she describes. I say nothing of the versification, which is more clear and beautiful than any I remember to have seen, even in Voltaire, who is certainly an excellent poet; all those, in short, who feel an honest indignation at the corruption and depravity of our present taste; all who have at heart the reformation of our stage; who wish, that, by a careful imitation of the Greeks, whom in many perfections of the drama we have surpassed, we might endeavor to obtain the true end and design of it, by making the theatre what it might be made, the school of virtue: all those, who think thus rationally and seriously, must be pleased to see so great and celebrated a poet as Voltaire employing his fine talents in such a tragedy as this, without love in it.

He has not imprudently hazarded the success of so noble a design; but in the place of love has substituted sentiments of virtue, which are not less forcible. As much prejudiced as we are in favor of tragedies founded on love intrigues, it is nevertheless true—and we have often observed it—that those tragedies, which have met with the greatest success, were not indebted to their love scenes for it: on the other hand, all our good critics allow that romantic gallantry has disgraced and degraded our stage, and some of our best writers also. The great Corneille was sensible of this: he submitted, not without reluctance, to the reigning taste of the age; not venturing to banish love entirely, he went at least so far as to banish successful love; he would not permit it to appear weak or mean, but raised it even to heroism, choosing rather to go beyond nature than to sink it into a too tender and contagious passion.

Thus, reverend father, have I sent you that judgment of which your illustrious friend seemed desirous; I wrote it in haste, which is a proof of my regard; but the paternal friendship which I have had for him, even from his infancy, has not so far prevailed as to blind me in his favor. You will let him see what I have written. I have the honor to be, my dear friend, my dear son, the glory of your father, as I ever must be, sincerely yours,

Dec. 23, 1738.

TOURNEMINE.

PREFACE TO THE PRODIGAL.

---

It is pretty extraordinary, that this comedy should never yet have made its appearance in print, as it is now almost two years since it was first played, and ran about thirty nights: as the author of it was not known, it has hitherto been attributed to several persons of the first character; but it was indisputably written by M. de Voltaire, though the style of the "Henriade" and "Alzire" are so extremely different from the style of this, that we cannot easily conceive them to be the product of the same pen.

In his name we have here presented it to the public, as the first comedy ever written in verses<sup>1</sup> consisting of five feet; a novelty which may perhaps induce other authors to make use of this measure: it will at least be productive of variety on the French

<sup>1</sup> It is astonishing that it should ever enter into the head of a dramatic writer to put his comedies into rhyme; but it is still more astonishing that the sensible and ingenious Voltaire should adopt a custom so ridiculous; confining his verses to five feet has certainly nothing but the novelty to recommend it; they are even perhaps more faulty than if they had fifteen, by the quicker return of the same sounds to our ear. What pleasure a French author, or a French audience, might take in them we cannot pretend to determine; but they are certainly very perplexing to a translator, who finds it extremely difficult to reduce poetic language and high-flown metaphors to easy and familiar dialogue, without departing too much from the original. The English reader will frequently, I am afraid, meet with a stiffness of style in this comedy, which, with all the pains I have taken, it was impossible to avoid: add to this, that the names of Fierenfat, Lise, Martha, etc., sound but uncouthly to us; and to change them was a liberty which I thought a translator had no right to take.

If comedy should be an exact representation of manners, this piece has sufficient merit to recommend it: we see in "The Prodigal" a mixture of the serious and pleasant; the comic, and the affecting; thus the life of man itself is always checkered, and sometimes even a single incident will produce all these contrasts. Nothing more common than a family, wherein the father grumbles, the daughter, who is in love, whimpers, the son laughs at them both, and the relatives take different parts as it happens to suit their inclinations; we often make a joke of that in one room, which we cry at in the next: nay, the same person has often laughed and cried at the same thing within a quarter of an hour.

A certain lady of fashion, being one day at the bedside of her daughter, who lay dangerously ill, with all the family about her, burst into a flood of tears, and cried out: "O my God, my God, restore me my dear daughter, and take all my other children." a gentleman, who had married one of her daughters, came up to her immediately, and taking her by the sleeve: "Pray, madam," says he "do you include your sons-in-law?" The arch dryness with which he spoke those words had such an effect on the afflicted lady that she burst into a loud laugh, and went out; the company followed her, and laughed too; and the sick person, as soon as she heard the cause of their mirth, laughed more heartily than all the rest.

We don't mean to infer from this, that every comedy should have some scenes of humor and drollery, and others serious and affecting; there are a great many good pieces where there is nothing but gayety, others entirely serious; others where they are mixed, and others where the tender and pathetic are carried so far as to produce tears. Neither of these different species should be excluded from the stage; and if I was to be asked, which is the best of them, I should say, that which was best executed.

It would perhaps be agreeable to the present taste for reasoning, and not unsuitable to this occasion, to examine here, what kind of pleasantry that is which makes us laugh in a comedy. The cause of laughter is one of those things easier felt than expressed; the admirable Molière, Regnard, who is sometimes almost as admirable as Molière, and the authors of several excellent shorter pieces, have contented themselves with raising this pleasing sensation without explaining to us the reasons of it, or telling their secret.

I have observed, with regard to the stage, that violent peals of universal laughter seldom rise but from some mistake: Mercury taken for Sofia; Menechmes for his brother; Crispin making his own will under the name of old master GÉRONTE; Valère talking to Harpagon of the beauty of his daughter, whilst Harpagon imagines he is talking of the beauty of his strong box; Pourceaugnac, when they feel his pulse, and want to make him pass for a madam; in a word, mistakes of this kind are generally the only things that excite laughter: Harlequin seldom raises a smile, except when he makes some blunder, and this accounts for the propriety of the name of Balourd, usually given to him.

There are a great many other species of the comic, and pleasantries, that cause a different sort of entertainment; but I never saw what we call laughing from the bottom of one's soul, either on the stage, or in company, except in cases nearly resembling those which I just now mentioned;

there are several ridiculous characters which please, without causing that immoderate laughter of joy. Trissotin and Vadius, for example, are of this kind: "The Gamester", and "The Grumbler" likewise, give us inexpressible pleasure, but never cause any bursts of laughter.

There are besides other characters of ridicule, that have in them a mixture of vice, which we love to see well painted, though they only give us a serious pleasure; a bad man will never make us laugh, because laughter always arises from a gayety of disposition, absolutely incompatible with contempt and indignation; it is true, indeed, we laugh at Tartuffe, but not at his hypocrisy; it is at the mistake of the good old gentleman, who takes him for a saint: the hypocrisy once discovered we laugh no longer, but feel very different impressions.

One might easily trace the spring of every other sentiment, and show the cause of gayety, curiosity, interest, emotion, and tears. It would be a proper employment for some of our dramatic authors to lay open these secret springs, as they are the persons who put them in motion: but they are too busy in moving the passions, to find time for an examination into them; they know that one sentiment is worth a hundred definitions, and I am too much of their opinion to prefix a treatise of philosophy to a dramatic performance. I shall content myself with only insisting a little on the necessity we are under of having something new. If we had never brought anything into the tragic scene but the Roman grandeur, it would have grown at least very disgusting; and if our heroes had breathed nothing but love and tenderness, we should by this time have been heartily sick of them:

O imitatores servum pecus!

The works which we have seen since the times of Corneille, Molière, Racine, Quinault, Lulli, and Lebrun, all seem to me to have something new and original, which has saved them from contempt and oblivion: once more therefore I repeat it, every species is good but that which tires us: we should never therefore say, such a piece of music did not succeed, such a picture was not agreeable, such a play was damned, because it was of a new kind; but such or such a thing failed, because it was really good for nothing.

PREFACE TO NANINE.

This trifle was exhibited in the summer of 1749, at Paris, among a number of entertainments which each year constantly produces in that city; in the still more numerous crowd of pamphlets, with which the town is overrun, there appeared at this time one extremely well worthy of notice, an ingenious and learned dissertation, by a member of the Academy of Rochelle, on a question which seems for some years past to have divided the literary world, namely, whether we should write serious comedies? The author declares vehemently against this new species of the drama, to which, I am afraid, the little comedy of "Nanine" belongs: he condemns and with reason, everything that carries with it the air of a city tragedy; in reality, what can be more ridiculous, than a tragic plot carried on by low and vulgar characters? it is demeaning the buskin, and confounding tragedy and comedy, by a kind of bastard species, a monster, that could only owe its birth to an incapacity of succeeding either in one or the other: this judicious writer blames, above all, those romantic forced intrigues which are to draw tears from the spectators, and which we call, by way of ridicule, "the crying comedy;" but into what species of comedy should such intrigues be admitted? Would they not be looked upon as essential and unpardonable faults in any performance whatsoever? He concludes by observing, that if, in a comedy, pity may sometimes go so far as to melt into tears, they should be shed by love alone;

he cannot certainly mean by this the passion of love as it is represented in our best tragedies, furious, barbarous, destructive, attended with guilt and remorse; but love, gentle and tender, which alone is fit for comedy.

This reflection naturally produces another, which I shall submit to the judgment of the learned: that among us tragedy has begun by appropriating to itself the language of comedy; we may observe that love, in many of those performances where terror and pity should be the chief springs, is treated as it should be treated in comedy. Gallantry, declarations of love, coquetry, archness and familiarity, are all to be met with among the heroes and heroines of Greece and Rome, with which our tragedies abound: so that, in effect, the natural and tender love in our comedies is not stolen from the tragic muse; it is not Thalia who has committed a theft upon Melpomene, but, on the other hand, Melpomene, who for a long time has worn the buskins of Thalia.

If we cast our eyes on the first tragedies that had such amazing success in the time of Cardinal Richelieu, the "Sophonisba" of Mairet, "Mariamne," "Tyrannic Love," and "Alcyone," we shall remark that love, in every one of them, talks in a style quite familiar, and sometimes extremely low; no less ridiculous than the pompous tone and emphasis of their heroism; this is perhaps the reason why, at that time, we had not one tolerable comedy, because the tragic scene had stole away all its rights and privileges; it is even probable, that this determined Molière seldom to bestow upon his lovers any strong, lively, and interesting passion for one another; tragedy, he perceived, had anticipated him in this particular.

From the time when the "Sophonisba" of Mairet appeared, which was our first regular tragedy, we began to consider the declarations of love from our heroes, and the artful and coquettish replies of our heroines, together with strong pictures of love and gallantry, as things essentially necessary to the tragic scene: there are writings of those times still extant which quote the following verses, spoken by Massinissa after the battle of Cirta, not without great eulogiums on their extraordinary merit.

By mutual flames I find my flame approved
 And love the more, the more I am beloved;
 Sighs grow by sighs, and wishes wishes form,
 As waves by waves are lashed into a storm;
 When two fond hearts indulgent Hymen chains,
 Alike should be their pleasures and their pains.

The custom of talking thus about love corrupted even some of our best writers; even those whose manly and sublime geniuses were made to restore tragedy to its ancient splendor could not escape the contagion; in some of our finest pieces we meet with, "an unhappy face, that subdued the courage of a Roman knight."<sup>1</sup> The lover says to his mistress: "Adieu, thou too virtuous, and too charming object;"<sup>2</sup> to which the heroine replies: "Adieu thou too unhappy and too perfect lover."<sup>3</sup> Cleopatra tells us, that a princess, "who loves her reputation, if she owns her love, is sure to be beloved;"<sup>4</sup> and that Cæsar, "sighs, and in a plaintive tone acknowledges himself her captive, even in the field of victory;"<sup>1</sup> adding, that she alone must be cruel, and make Cæsar unhappy. Her confidante replies: "I would venture to swear that your charms boast a power which they will never make use of."<sup>2</sup>

In all those pieces of the same author, which were written after his "Death of Pompey," we are sorry to find the passion of love always treated in this familiar manner; but, without taking the unnecessary trouble of producing more examples of these glaring absurdities, let us only consider some of the best verses which the author of "Cinna" has brought on the stage as maxims of gallantry. "There are certain secret ties, and sympathetic feelings, by whose soft affinity souls are linked together, attached to, and struck by each other by I know not what charm, which it is impossible to account for." Would one ever conceive that these sentiments, which are certainly highly comic, come out of the mouth of a princess of Parthia, who goes to her lover to ask her mother's life? In such a dreadful crisis, who would talk of the "sympathetic feelings by whose soft affinity souls are linked together?" Would Sophocles ever have produced such madrigals? Do not all these amorous sentiments belong to comedy only?

That great writer, who has carried the harmony of verse to such a point of perfection, he who made love speak a language at once so noble and so pathetic, has, notwithstanding, brought into his tragedies several scenes which Boileau thought much more proper for the elevated style of Terence's comedies, than suitable to the dignity of the great rival of Euripides, who is even sometimes superior to him. One might quote more than a hundred verses in this taste; not but that this familiar simplicity has its beauties, and may serve by way of preparation for the pathetic; but if these strokes of simplicity belong even to the tragic muse, with still more reason do they suit high comedy: this is the exact point where tragedy descends, and comedy raises itself; where the two arts meet, as it were, and touch each other; here their several limits are confounded: and if Orestes and Hermione are permitted to say:

“O do not wish for the fate of Pyrrhus; I should hate you too much—you would love me still more: O that you would look on me in another manner! You wish to love me, and yet I cannot please you: you would love me, madam, by wishing me to hate—for, in short, he hates you; his heart is otherwise engaged; he has no longer—”

“Who told you, my lord, that he despises me? do you think the sight of me inspires contempt?”

If these heroes, I say, express themselves in this familiar manner, with how much greater reason should we admire the Misanthrope speaking thus with vehemence to his mistress?

“Rather blush you, for so you ought, I have too sure testimony of your falsehood—it was not in vain that my love was alarmed, but think not I will tamely bear the injury without being revenged—’tis a treason, a perfidy which cannot be too severely punished; yes, I will give a loose to my resentment, I am no longer master of myself, passion entirely possesses me: mortally wounded as I am by you, my senses are no longer under the government of reason."

Certainly, if all "The Misanthrope" was in this taste, it would no longer be a comedy; and if Orestes and Hermione talked throughout in the manner they do in the lines above quoted, it would be no tragedy: but after these two very different species met thus together, they fall back each into their proper sphere; one resumes the pleasant style, and the other the sublime.

Comedy, therefore, I repeat once more, may be impassioned, may be in transport, or in tears, provided at the same time that it makes the good and virtuous smile; but if it was entirely destitute of the vis comica, if, from beginning to end, it had nothing in it but the serious and melancholy, it would then be a species of writing very faulty and very disagreeable. It must be acknowledged that there is no small difficulty in making the spectators pass insensibly from tears to laughter, and yet this transition, hard as it is to manage in a comedy, is not the less natural. We have already remarked in another place, that nothing is more common than accidents that afflict the mind, some certain circumstances of which may, notwithstanding, excite at least a momentary mirth and gayety: thus, unhappily for us, is human nature framed. Homer represents even his gods laughing at Vulcan's awkwardness, while they are deciding the fate of the whole universe. Hector smiles at the fears of his son, Astyanax, while Andromache is shedding tears. We often see, that even amid the horror of battles, conflagrations, and all the disasters that mortals are subject to, a good thing, luckily hit off, will raise a laugh, even in the bosom of terror and pity. In the battle of Spire, a regiment was forbidden to give quarter, a German officer begged his life of one of ours, who answered him thus: "Sir, ask anything in the world else, but as to your life, I can't possibly grant it." This dry and whimsical answer passed from one to another, and everybody laughed in the midst of slaughter and destruction; why therefore should not laughter follow the most serious and affecting scenes in a comedy? Don't we sympathize with Alcmene's distress, and yet laugh with Sofia? How ridiculous it is to dispute against experience! if those who still contest this matter love rhyme better than reason, let them take the following verses:

O'er this strange world still reigns the tyrant love,
And all by turns his powerful influence prove;
Sometimes a mighty empire he o'erthrows,
Now soars in lofty verse, now creeps in prose;
Sometimes in tragic garb his passion mourns,
Sometimes the humbler comic muse adorns:
Fire in his eyes, and arrows in his hand,
He spreads or pains, or pleasures through the land:
In plaintive elegy his carols sweet
Now sings, now jocund laughs at Sylvia's feet:
For ever varying, and for ever new,
From serious Maro down to gay Chaulieu:
Bound by no laws, and to no verse confined,
He rules o'er every state, and every mind,
The universal idol of mankind.

'PREFACE TO SOCRATES.

---

The original footnote shows that Voltaire wrote this as "Mr. Fatima." For some unknown reason, or as a mere whim.

---

It has been said by one author, and repeated by another, that the simple representation of a merely virtuous man, without passion or intrigue, cannot possibly meet with applause on the stage, which I look upon as an injurious reflection on human nature, and the falsehood of it is sufficiently proved by this performance, written by the late Mr. Thomson. The famous Mr. Addison was a long time in doubt as to whether he should make Socrates or Cato the subject of his tragedy; he thought Cato a virtuous man, and as such a proper object of imitation; but that Socrates was much superior to him: the virtue of the latter, he observed, had more softness and humanity in it, and was withal more resigned to the will of God than that of the former: the Grecian, he used to say, did not, like the Roman, imagine that he was at liberty to destroy himself, or to quit the post which God had allotted to him; Addison, in short, considered Cato as the victim of liberty, and Socrates as the martyr of wisdom. Sir Richard Steele, however, persuaded him that Cato was a subject better adapted to the theatre than the other, and at the same time likely to prove more agreeable to the nation, while it was in a political ferment. To say the truth, the death of Socrates would perhaps have made very little impression in a country where no man is ever persecuted on account of his religion; where a general toleration has so prodigiously enriched and peopled the community; as it has also in Holland, my native country. Sir Richard Steele says expressly, in his Tatler, that the subject of a dramatic piece should always be the reigning vice or foible of the nation where it is represented. The success which Addison met with in his Cato encouraged him to sketch out the death of Socrates, in three acts. The place of secretary of state, which he had some time after, prevented his finishing this work; he gave the manuscript to his pupil, Mr. Thomson, who was afraid to hazard on the stage a subject so extremely grave, and at the same time void of all those fashionable embellishments which had then taken possession of the English theatre.

---

He began therefore with some other tragedies, "Sophonisba," "Coriolanus,"<sup>1</sup> "Tancred," etc., and finished with the "Death of Socrates," which he wrote in prose scene by scene, and showed to his illustrious friends, Mr. Doddington and Mr. Lyttleton, persons deservedly ranked among the first geniuses in England. These two gentlemen, whom he always consulted, advised him to follow the example of Shakespeare; to introduce the whole body of the people into his tragedy; to print Xantippe, the wife of Socrates, just as she really was, a peevish, cross-grained city madam, scolding her husband, and yet fond of him; to bring the Areopagus on the stage; and, in a word, to make the whole piece a simple representation of human life; one of those pictures that exhibit a view of every state and condition. This is an undertaking attended with some difficulty; and though the sublime continued throughout is a species of writing infinitely superior to it, this mixture of the pathetic and familiar has its degree of merit. One may compare them to the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey." Mr. Lyttleton would not suffer the piece to be played, because the character of Melitus too closely resembled that of Sergeant Catbrée, to whom he was related; besides, that the whole was rather a sketch than a finished performance.

He made me a present of this drama when he last came to Holland. I translated it immediately into Dutch, my mother tongue. I did not, however, think proper to bring it on the stage at Amsterdam, though, thank God, among all our pedants, we have not one there so hateful or so impertinent as Sergeant Catbrée. The great number of actors which this play requires, deterred me from any thoughts of exhibiting it. I translated it afterward into French, and shall let this translation pass, till I have an opportunity of publishing the original.

AMSTERDAM, 1755.

Since this "The Death of Socrates" has been represented at London, but that was not the play written by Mr. Thomson.

---

N B. There have been some people ridiculous enough to endeavor to refute the palpable truths advanced in this preface; pretending that Mr. Fatima could not have written it in 1755, because he died in 1754: if it was really so, what a foolish reason! The fact is, he died in 1757.

NOTE ON MAHOMET.

---

[By the First Editor.]

---

The literary world will perhaps think themselves obliged to me for publishing the tragedy of "Mahomet," which had been barbarously mangled in two surreptitious editions. I can venture to assure the reader that it was written in 1736, and a copy of it then sent by the author to the Prince Royal, now King of Prussia, who at that time cultivated the belles-lettres with astonishing success, and continues to make them his principal amusement.

I was at Lille in 1741, where M. de Voltaire came to pass a few days; there was then the best company of actors in the town that had even been in Provence, who presented this piece to the satisfaction of a very numerous audience. The governor and the intendant were several times present at the performance. A tragedy written in so new a taste, and on so delicate a subject, treated with such judgment and discretion, induced many prelates to have it acted in a private house by the same persons. Their opinion confirmed that of the public. The author was at the same time so happy as to get his manuscript presented to one of the first men in the church, and indeed in all Europe,<sup>1</sup> who supported the weight of public affairs with firmness, and judged concerning works of genius with true taste, at an age when few men have, and still fewer preserve their wit and delicacy. He decided that the piece was written with all proper decorum and circumspection, and that it was impossible to handle with more prudence so dangerous a subject; but that with regard to the poetry, there were many things in it that wanted correction; these the author, to my knowledge, afterward retouched with the greatest care. This was also the opinion of another eminent personage of equal rank, and of equal abilities.

At length this excellent performance, which had been licenced according to form in many other places, was exhibited at Paris on August 9, 1742: a whole box was filled with the principal magistrates of the city; the ministers were also present, and all were of the same opinion as the excellent judges above mentioned. There were, however, some persons at the first representation who disapproved of it: whether it was that in the hurry of the action they did not sufficiently attend to the gradual process of it, or that they were little versed in stage matters,<sup>1</sup> they seemed shocked at Mahomet's ordering a man to commit murder, and making use of his religion to stir up an innocent youth, the instrument of his crimes, to an assassination. These gentlemen, struck with the horror of the action, did not sufficiently consider, that this murder is represented in the tragedy as the most atrocious of all crimes, and that indeed it was morally impossible it should be otherwise. The truth was, they saw indeed but one side, the usual method which men take to deceive themselves. And as they considered that side only, it was no wonder they should take offence, which a little more attention would easily have removed: but in the first heat of their zeal they cried out that it was a dangerous performance, and fit only to produce Ravailacs and Jacques Cléments. A most extraordinary piece of criticism which these gentlemen no doubt are by this time heartily ashamed of. This would in effect be to affirm that Hermione teaches us to assassinate kings, Electra to kill our mothers, Cleopatra and Medea to slay our own children: that Harpagon makes misers, the Gamester gamesters, and Tartuffe hypocrites. The censure of Mahomet would carry with it even more injustice than this, because the iniquity of that false prophet is represented in a light more odious and detestable than any of the vices or follies satirized in those performances. The tragedy was written directly in opposition to the Ravailacs and Jacques Cléments, insomuch that, as a person of excellent judgment lately observed, if "Mahomet" had been written in the time of Henry III. and Henry IV. it might have saved both their lives. Would one think it possible that the author of "La Henriade" would ever have met with such a reproach, he who has so often in that poem, and in other parts of his works, lifted up his voice, not only against such crimes, but against all those pernicious maxims which are the causes of them? The more I read that writer's works, the more have I always found the love of public good their distinguishing characteristic: every part of them inspires horror and detestation of rebellion, persecution, and fanaticism.

<sup>1</sup> The true state of the case was that Abbé Desfontaines and some others as malicious as himself, decried the tragedy of "Mahomet," as a wicked and scandalous performance: the affair made so much noise that the prime minister, Cardinal Fleury, who had long before read and approved of it, was obliged to advise the author to withdraw it.

Is there a good and worthy citizen who would not adopt all the maxims of "La Henriade?" Does not that poem inspire us with the love of virtue? "Mahomet" appears to me to be written in the same spirit, and this, I am persuaded, the author's greatest enemies will frankly acknowledge.

He soon perceived that a formidable party was raised against him; some of the most violent among them got the ear of a few great men, who not having seen the piece themselves believed everything that these gentlemen thought proper to report concerning it. The celebrated Molière, the glory of France, was once in nearly the same condition, when his "Tartuffe" was first exhibited; he had immediate recourse to Louis the Great, who knew and loved him. The authority of that monarch soon put an end to the sinister and malevolent misrepresentations of "Tartuffe," but times are changed; that protection which is given to arts in their infant state cannot be expected to continue after those arts have been cultivated for a length of time: besides one man may not have interest to obtain that which another has procured with ease; hence some instruments must be set to work, some discussions made, some new examinations passed through, before anything can be done in his favor. The author therefore thought it most advisable to withdraw his piece, after the third representation, in hopes that time would get the better of prejudice, which must inevitably happen among a people so sensible and judicious as our own.<sup>1</sup> It was stated in the public papers, that the tragedy of "Mahomet" had been stopped by order of the government, which was an absolute falsehood; no such order was ever given; and the first men in the kingdom, who had seen this tragedy, unanimously concurred in their admiration of it. Some persons having hastily transcribed a few scenes from the actors' parts, two or three imperfect editions crept into the world; it is easy to see how much they differ from the true work which I have here given. Prefixed to this tragedy are several interesting pieces; one of the most curious among them, in my opinion, is a letter written by the author to his majesty, the King of Prussia, on his return through Holland, after a visit to him. In papers of this kind, which were not originally designed for the public, one sees the real sentiments of men: I flatter myself they will afford the same pleasure to every true philosopher which they gave me in the perusal.

---

PREFACE TO JULIUS CÆSAR.

A LETTER FROM SIGNOR ALGAROTTI, TO SIGNOR
FRANCHINI, ENVOY AT FLORENCE.

(On the Tragedy of "JULIUS CÆSAR," by M. de Voltaire.)

---

SIR: I have deferred sending you the "Julius Cæsar" which you desired, till now, that I might have the pleasure of communicating to you the tragedy on that subject, as written by M. de Voltaire. The edition of it printed at Paris some months ago is extremely faulty; one may easily perceive in it the hand of some of those gentlemen whom Petronius calls "Doctores Umbratici." It is even so shamefully defective as to give us verses that have not the proper number of syllables. This piece, notwithstanding, has been as severely criticized as if M. de Voltaire himself had published it: would it not be cruelly unjust to impute to Titian, the bad coloring of one of his pictures, that had been daubed over by a modern painter? I have been fortunate enough to procure a manuscript fit to be sent to you; you will see the picture exactly as it came out of the hand of the master: I will even venture to accompany it with the remarks which you desired of me.

Not to know that there is a French language and a French theatre, cannot show a greater degree of ignorance, than not to know to what perfection Corneille and Racine carried the drama. It seemed, indeed, as if, after these great men, nothing remained to be wished for, and that all which could be done was to endeavor to imitate them. Could one expect anything in painting after the "Galatæa" of Raphael and yet the famous head of Michelangelo, in the little Farnese, gave us an idea of a species more fierce and terrible, to which this art might be raised. In the fine arts, we do not perceive the void till after it is filled up. Most of the tragedies of the great masters I just now mentioned, whether the scene lies at Rome, Athens, or Constantinople, contain nothing more than a marriage concerted, or broken off: we can expect nothing better in this species of tragedy, wherein love makes peace or war with a smile. I cannot help thinking that the drama is capable of something infinitely superior to this. Julius Cæsar is to be a proof of it. The author of the tender "Zaire" breathes nothing here but sentiments of ambition, liberty, and revenge.

Tragedy should be an imitation of great men; it is that which distinguishes it from comedy; but if the actions which it represents are likewise great, the distinction is still better marked out, and by these means we may arrive at a nobler species. Do we not admire Mark Antony more at Philippi than at Actium? I am apprehensive, notwithstanding, that reasonings of this kind will meet with the strongest opposition. We must have very little acquaintance with human nature not to know that prejudice generally gets the better of reason; and above all, those prejudices that are authorized by a sex that imposes laws upon us, which we always submit to with pleasure.

Love has been too long in possession of the French theatre to suffer any other passions to supplant it, which inclines me to think that Julius Cæsar will meet with the fate of Themistocles, Alcibiades, and many other great men of Athens, that of being admired by all mankind ; while ostracism banished them from their own country.

In some places M. de Voltaire has imitated Shakspeare, an English poet, who united in the same piece the most childish absurdities and the finest strokes of the true sublime. He has made the same use of him as Virgil did of Ennius, and taken from him the last two scenes, which are, doubtless, the finest models of eloquence which the stage ever produced.

Quum flueret lutulentus, erat quod tollere velles.

What is it but the remains of barbarism in Europe, to endeavor to make those bounds which power and policy have prescribed to separate states and kingdoms, the limits also of science, and the fine arts, whose progress might be so widely extended by that commerce and mutual light which they would throw on each other ; a reflection which may be more serviceable to the French nation than any other, as it is exactly in the case of an author, from whom the public expect more in proportion to what they have already received from him. France is so highly polished and cultivated that we have a right to demand of her, not only that she should approve, but that she should adopt and enrich herself with everything that is excellent among her neighbors :

Tros Rutulusve fuit, nullo discrimine habeto.

There is one objection to this tragedy, which I should not have mentioned to you, but that I heard it made by many, that it has but three acts ; this, say the critics, is against all the rules of the stage, which require that there should be exactly five. It is certainly one of the first rules of the drama that the representation should not take up more time than the real action. They have therefore very rationally limited that time to three hours, because a longer would weary the attention; and, at the same time, would prevent our uniting in the same point of view, the different circumstances of the action. Upon this principle, we have divided the play into five acts, for the convenience of the spectators, and of the author also, who has leisure to bring about, during these intervals, any incident necessary to the plot or catastrophe. The whole of the objection, then, is no more than that the presentation of "Julius Cæsar" lasts but two hours instead of three; and if that is no fault, neither can the division of its acts be esteemed as one; because the same rule which requires that an action of three hours should be divided into five acts, will require also, that an action of two hours should be divided into three only. There is no reason why, because the utmost extent of the play is limited to three hours, we should not make it less; nor can I see why a tragedy, where the three unities are observed, which is interesting, and excites terror and compassion, which in short does everything in two hours, that others do in three, should not be equally good. A statue wherein the fine proportions and other rules of the art are observed, is not a less fine statue, because it is smaller than another, made by the same rules. Nobody, I believe, thinks "The Venus de Medici" less perfect in its kind than "The Gladiator," because it is but four feet high, and "The Gladiator" six. M. de Voltaire, perhaps, gave his "Cæsar" less extent than is usually allowed to dramatic performances, only to sound the opinion and taste of the public by an essay, if we may give that name to so finished a piece. It would have made a kind of revolution in the French theatre, and had been, perhaps, too bold a venture, to talk of liberty and politics for three hours together, to a nation that had been so long accustomed to see Mithridates fighting and whining, when he was just on the point of marching to the capitol. We are surely obliged to M. de Voltaire for his conduct, and should by no means condemn him for not bringing love or women into his play; born, as they are, to inspire soft and tender sentiments, they would have played an absurd and ridiculous part between Brutus and Cassius, atroces animæ. They make indeed such conspicuous figures elsewhere, that they have no reason to complain of being excluded from "Cæsar." I shall pass over the many detached beauties to be met with in this piece, the strength of its numbers, and the variety of images and sentiments scattered throughout. What might we not expect from the author of "Brutus" and "La Henriade" The scene of the conspiracy is one of the finest we have ever seen on any stage: it has called into action that which we never met with before but in dull narration.

*Segnius irritant animos demissa per aures
Quam quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus et quæ
Ipse sibi tradit spectator.*

Even the death of Cæsar passes almost in sight of the spectators, and thus prevents a recital of it, which howsoever beautiful, must have been comparatively cold and languid; events of this kind, together with every circumstance attending them, being already known to all the world.

I cannot sufficiently admire this tragedy, when I consider what a variety of incidents there are in it, how great the characters are, and how finely supported; what a noble contrast between Brutus and Cæsar! What makes this subject most difficult to handle is the great art required to describe, on the one hand, Brutus with a savage, ferocious virtue, and even bordering on ingratitude, but at the same time engaged in a righteous cause, at least to all appearances, and conformable to the times he lived in; and on the other hand, Cæsar, full of clemency and the most amiable virtues, heaping favors on his enemies, and yet endeavoring to destroy the liberty of his country. We are strongly interested for both of them during the whole action of the piece, though it should seem as if the passions must hurt and destroy each other reciprocally in the end, like two several weights equal and opposed to each other, and consequently could produce no effect but that of sending the spectators back disgusted, and without any emotion. Some such reflections most probably induced a brother poet<sup>1</sup> to declare, that he looked upon this subject as the rock of dramatic authors, and that he would gladly propose it to any of his rivals. But M. de Voltaire, not content with these difficulties, seems desirous of creating more, by making Brutus the son of Cæsar; which, however, is founded on history. He has even, by these means, found an opportunity of introducing some charming scenes, and throwing into his piece a new interest, which is united to the action, and brings on the catastrophe. The harangue of Antony produces a fine effect, and is, in my opinion, a model of seducing eloquence. Upon the whole, we may with truth assert that M. de Voltaire, in this tragedy, has opened a new path, and, at the same time, trod in it with the highest success.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE TO THE LISBON EARTHQUAKE.

If the question concerning physical evil ever deserves the attention of men, it is in those melancholy events which put us in mind of the weakness of our nature; such as plagues, which carry off a fourth of the inhabitants of the known world; the earthquake which swallowed up four hundred thousand of the Chinese in 1699, that of Lima and Callao, and, in the last place, that of Portugal and the kingdom of Fez. The maxim, "whatever is, is right," appears somewhat extraordinary to those who have been eye-witnesses of such calamities. All things are doubtless arranged and set in order by Providence, but it has long been too evident, that its superintending power has not disposed them in such a manner as to promote our temporal happiness.

When the celebrated Pope published his "Essay on Man," and expounded in immortal verse the systems of Leibnitz, Lord Shaftesbury and Lord Bolingbroke, his system was attacked by a multitude of divines of a variety of different communions. They were shocked at the novelty of the propositions, "whatever is, is right"; and that "man always enjoys that measure of happiness which is suited to his being." There are few writings that may not be condemned, if considered in one light, or approved of, if considered in another. It would be much more reasonable to attend only to the beauties and improving parts of a work, than to endeavor to put an odious construction on it; but it is one of the imperfections of our nature to put a bad interpretation on whatever has a dubious sense, and to run down whatever has been successful.

In a word, it was the opinion of many, that the axiom, "whatever is, is right," was subversive of all our received ideas. If it be true, said they, that whatever is, is right, it follows that human nature is not degenerated. If the general order requires that everything should be as it is, human nature has not been corrupted, and consequently could have had no occasion for a Redeemer. If this world, such as it is, be the best of systems possible, we have no room to hope for a happy future state. If the various evils by which man is overwhelmed, end in general good, all civilized nations have been wrong in endeavoring to trace out the origin of moral and physical evil. If a man devoured by wild beasts, causes the well-being of those beasts, and contributes to promote the orders of the universe; if the misfortunes of individuals are only the consequence of this general and necessary order, we are nothing more than wheels which serve to keep the great machine in motion; we are not more precious in the eyes of God, than the animals by whom we are devoured.

These are the inferences which were drawn from Mr. Pope's poem; and these very conclusions increased the sale and success of the work. But it should have been seen from another point of view. Readers should have considered the reverence for the Deity, the resignation to His supreme will, the useful morality, and the spirit of toleration, which breathe through this excellent poem. This the public has done, and the work being translated by men equal to the task, has completely triumphed over critics, though it turned on matters of so delicate a nature.

It is the nature of over violent censurers to give importance to the opinions which they attack. A book is railed at on account of its success, and a thousand errors are imputed to it. What is the consequence of this? Men, disgusted with these invectives, take for truths the very errors which these critics think they have discovered. Cavillers raise phantoms on purpose to combat them, and indignant readers embrace these very phantoms.

Critics have declared that Pope and Leibnitz maintain the doctrine of fatality; the partisans of Leibnitz and Pope have said on the other hand that, if Leibnitz and Pope have taught the doctrine of fatality, they were in the right, and all this invincible fatality we should believe.

Pope had advanced that "whatever is, is right," in a sense that might very well be admitted, and his followers maintain the same proposition in a sense that may very well be contested.

The author of the poem, "The Lisbon Earthquake," does not write against the illustrious Pope, whom he always loved and admired; he agrees with him in almost every particular, but compassionating the misery of man; he declares against the abuse of the new maxim, "whatever is, is right." He maintains that ancient and sad truth acknowledged by all men, that there is evil upon earth; he acknowledges that the words "whatever is, is right," if understood in a positive sense, and without any hopes of a happy future state, only insult us in our present misery.

If, when Lisbon, Moquinxa, Tetuan, and other cities were swallowed up with a great number of their inhabitants in the month of November, 1759, philosophers had cried out to the wretches, who with difficulty escaped from the ruins, "all this is productive of general good; the heirs of those who have perished will increase their fortune; masons will earn money by rebuilding the houses, beasts will feed on the carcasses buried under the ruins; it is the necessary effect of necessary causes; your particular misfortune is nothing, it contributes to universal good," such a harangue would doubtless have been as cruel as the earthquake was fatal, and all that the author of the poem upon the destruction of Lisbon has said amounts only to this.

He acknowledges with all mankind that there is evil as well as good on the earth; he owns that no philosopher has ever been able to explain the nature of moral and physical evil. He asserts that Bayle, the greatest master of the art of reasoning that ever wrote, has only taught to doubt, and that he combats himself; he owns that man's understanding is as weak as his life is miserable. He lays a concise abstract of the several different systems before his readers. He says that Revelation alone can untie the great knot which philosophers have only rendered more puzzling; and that nothing but the hope of our existence being continued in a future state can console us under our present misfortunes; that the goodness of Providence is the only asylum in which man can take refuge in the darkness of reason, and in the calamities to which his weak and frail nature is exposed.

P. S.—Readers should always distinguish between the objections which an author proposes to himself and his answers to those objections, and should not mistake what he refutes for what he adopts.

AN INQUIRY INTO THE MAXIM, "WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT."

OH WRETCHED man, earth-fated to be cursed ;
Abyss of plagues, and miseries the worst !
Horrors on horrors, griefs on griefs must show,
That man's the victim of unceasing woe,
And lamentations which inspire my strain,
Prove that philosophy is false and vain.
Approach in crowds, and meditate awhile
Yon shattered walls, and view each ruined pile,
Women and children heaped up mountain high,
Limbs crushed which under ponderous marble lie ;
Wretches unnumbered in the pangs of death,
Who mangled, torn, and panting for their breath,
Buried beneath their sinking roofs expire,
And end their wretched lives in torments dire.
Say, when you hear their piteous, half-formed cries,
Or from their ashes see the smoke arise,
Say, will you then eternal laws maintain,
Which God to cruelties like these constrain ?
Whilst you these facts replete with horror view,
Will you maintain death to their crimes was due ?

*The great earthquake occurred on November 1, 1755.
The ruin was instantaneous. Between 30,000 and 40,000 lives were lost in the shock and in the fire.

And can you then impute a sinful deed
To babes who on their mothers' bosoms bleed?
Was then more vice in fallen Lisbon found,
Than Paris, where voluptuous joys abound?
Was less debauchery to London known,
Where opulence luxurious holds her throne?
Earth Lisbon swallows; the light sons of France
Protract the feast, or lead the sprightly dance.
Spectators who undaunted courage show,
While you behold your dying brethren's woe;
With stoical tranquillity of mind
You seek the causes of these ills to find;
But when like us Fate's rigors you have felt,
Become humane, like us you'll learn to melt.
When the earth gapes my body to entomb,
I justly may complain of such a doom.
Hemmed round on every side by cruel fate,
The snares of death, the wicked's furious hate,
Preyed on by pain and by corroding grief
Suffer me from complaint to find relief.
'Tis pride, you cry, seditious pride that still Asserts mankind should be exempt from ill.
The awful truth on Tagus' banks explore,
Rummage the ruins on that bloody shore,
Wretches interred alive in direful grave
Ask if pride cries, "Good Heaven thy creatures save."
If 'tis presumption that makes mortals cry,
"Heaven on our sufferings cast a pitying eye."
All's right, you answer, the eternal cause
Rules not by partial, but by general laws.

The Lisbon Earthquake.

Say what advantage can result to all,
From wretched Lisbon's lamentable fall?
Are you then sure, the power which could create
The universe and fix the laws of fate,
Could not have found for man a proper place,
But earthquakes must destroy the human race?
Will you thus limit the eternal mind?
Should not our God to mercy be inclined?
Cannot then God direct all nature's course?
Can power almighty be without resource?
Humbly the great Creator I entreat,
This gulf with sulphur and with fire replete,
Might on the deserts spend its raging flame,
God my respect, my love weak mortals claim;
When man groans under such a load of woe,
He is not proud, he only feels the blow.
Would words like these to peace of mind restore
The natives sad of that disastrous shore?
Grieve not, that others' bliss may overflow,
Your sumptuous palaces are laid thus low;
Your toppled towers shall other hands rebuild;
With multitudes your walls one day be filled;
Your ruin on the North shall wealth bestow,
For general good from partial ills must flow;
You seem as abject to the sovereign power,
As worms which shall your carcasses devour.
No comfort could such shocking words impart,
But deeper wound the sad, afflicted heart.
When I lament my present wretched state,
Allege not the unchanging laws of fate;
Urge not the links of the eternal chain,
'Tis false philosophy and wisdom vain.

The God who holds the chain can't be enchained ;*
By His blest will are all events ordained :

*The universal chain is not, as some have thought, a regular gradation which connects all beings. There is, in all probability, an immense distance between man and beast, as well as between man and substances of a superior nature; there is likewise an infinity between God and all created beings whatever. There are none of these insensible gradations in the globes which move round our sun in their several periods, whether we consider their mass, their distances, or their satellites.

If we may believe Pope, man is not capable of discovering the reason why the satellites of Jove are less than Jove himself; he is herein mistaken, such an error as this may well be overlooked in so fine a genius. Every smatterer in mathematics could have told Lord Bolingbroke and Mr. Pope, that if the satellites of Jove had equalled him in magnitude, they could not have moved round him; but no mathematician is able to discover the regular gradation in the bodies of the solar system.

It is not true, that the world could not exist if a single atom was taken from it: This was justly observed by Mr. Crousaz, a learned geometrician, in a tract which he wrote against Pope. He seems to have been right in this point, though he was fully refuted by Mr. Warburton and Mr. Silhouette.

The concatenation of events was admitted and defended with the utmost ingenuity by the celebrated philosopher Leibnitz; it is worth explaining. All bodies and all events depend upon other bodies and other events. That cannot be denied; but all bodies are not essential to the support of the universe, and the preservation of its order; neither are all events necessary in the general series of events. A drop of water, a grain of sand more or less, can cause no revolution in the general system. Nature is not confined to any determinate quantity, or any determinate form. No planet moves in a curve completely regular; there is nothing in Nature of a figure exactly mathematical; no fixed quantity is required for any operation: Nature is never very strict or rigid in her method of proceeding. It is, therefore, absurd to advance, that the removal of an atom from the earth might be the cause of its destruction.

This holds, in like manner, with regard to events. The cause of every event is contained in some precedent event; this no philosopher has ever called in question. If Cæsar's mother had never gone through the Cæsarion operation, Cæsar had never subverted the commonwealth; he could

He's just, nor easily to wrath gives way,
 Why suffer we beneath so mild a sway :*
 This is the fatal knot you should untie,
 Our evils do you cure when you deny ?

never have adopted Octavius, and Octavius could never have chosen Tiberius for his successor in the empire. The marriage of Maximilian with the heiress of Burgundy and the Low Countries, gave rise to a war which lasted two hundred years. But Cæsar's spitting on the right or left side, or the Duchess of Burgundy's dressing her head in this manner or in that, could have altered nothing in the general plan of Providence.

It follows, therefore, that there are some events which have consequences and others which have none. Their chain resembles a genealogical tree, some branches of which disappear at the first generation, whilst the race is continued by others. There are many events which pass away without ever generating others. Thus in every machine there are some effects indispensably necessary towards producing motion, and others which are productive of nothing at all. The wheels of a coach make it go; but whether they raise more or less dust, the journey is finished alike. Such is the general order of the world, that the links of the chain would not be in the least discomposed by a small increase or diminution of the quantity of matter, or by an inconsiderable deviation from regularity.

The chain is not in an absolute plenum; it has been demonstrated that the celestial bodies perform their revolutions in an unresisting medium. Every space is not filled. It follows then, that there is not a progression of bodies from an atom to the most remote fixed star. There may of consequence be immense intervals between beings imbued with sensation, as well as between those that are not. We cannot then be certain, that man must be placed in one of these links joined to another by an uninterrupted connection. That all things are linked together means only that all things are regularly disposed of in their proper order. God is the cause and the regulator of that order. Homer's Jupiter was the slave of destiny; but, according to more rational philosophy, God is the master of destiny. (See Clarke's Treatise "Upon the Existence of God.")

* Sub Deo justo nemo miser nisi mereatur.—St. Augustine. The meaning of this ipse dixit of the Saint is, no one is miserable under the government of a just God, without deserving to be so.

Men ever strove into the source to pry,
Of evil, whose existence you deny.
If he whose hand the elements can wield,
To the winds' force makes rocky mountains yield ;
If thunder lays oaks level with the plain,
From the bolts' strokes they never suffer pain.
But I can feel, my heart oppressed demands
Aid of that God who formed me with His hands.
Sons of the God supreme to suffer all
Fated alike ; we on our Father call.
No vessel of the potter asks, we know,
Why it was made so brittle, vile, and low ?
Vessels of speech as well as thought are void ;
The urn this moment formed and that destroyed,
The potter never could with sense inspire,
Devoid of thought it nothing can desire.
The moralist still obstinate replies,
Others' enjoyments from your woes arise,
To numerous insects shall my corpse give birth,
When once it mixes with its mother earth :
Small comfort 'tis that when Death's ruthless power
Closes my life, worms shall my flesh devour.
Remembrances of misery refrain
From consolation, you increase my pain :
Complaint, I see, you have with care repressed,
And proudly hid your sorrows in your breast.
But a small part I no importance claim
In this vast universe, this general frame ;
All other beings in this world below
Condemned like me to lead a life of woe,
Subject to laws as rigorous as I,
Like me in anguish live and like me die.

The vulture urged by an insatiate maw,
Its trembling prey tears with relentless claw :
This it finds right, endowed with greater powers
The bird of Jove the vulture's self devours.
Man lifts his tube, he aims the fatal ball
And makes to earth the towering eagle fall ;
Man in the field with wounds all covered o'er,
Midst heaps of dead lies weltering in his gore,
While birds of prey the mangled limbs devour,
Of Nature's Lord who boasts his mighty power.
Thus the world's members equal ills sustain,
And perish by each other born to pain :
Yet in this direful chaos you'd compose
A general bliss from individuals' woes ?
Oh worthless bliss ! in injured reason's sight,
With faltering voice you cry, "What is, is right" ?
The universe confutes your boasting vain,
Your heart retracts the error you maintain.
Men, beasts, and elements know no repose
From dire contention ; earth's the seat of woes :
We strive in vain its secret source to find.
Is ill the gift of our Creator kind ?
Do then fell Typhon's cursed laws ordain
Our ill, or Arimanius doom to pain ?
Shocked at such dire chimeras, I reject
Monsters which fear could into gods erect.
But how conceive a God, the source of love,
Who on man lavished blessings from above,
Then would the race with various plagues confound,
Can mortals penetrate His views profound ?
Ill could not from a perfect being spring,
Nor from another, since God's sovereign king ;

And yet, sad truth! in this our world 'tis found,
What contradictions here my soul confound!
A God ~~once~~ dwelt on earth amongst mankind,
Yet vices still lay waste the human mind;
He could not do it, this proud sophist cries,
He could, but he declined it, that replies;
He surely will, ere these disputes have end,
Lisbon's foundations hidden thunders rend,
And thirty cities' shattered remnants fly,
With ruin and combustion through the sky,
From dismal Tagus' ensanguined shore,
To where of Cadiz' sea the billows roar.
Or man's a sinful creature from his birth,
And God to woe condemns the sons of earth;
Or else the God who being rules and space,
Untouched with pity for the human race,
Indifferent, both from love and anger free,
Still acts consistent to His first decree:
Or matter has defects which still oppose
God's will, and thence all human evil flows;
Or else this transient world by mortals trod,
Is but a passage that conducts to God.
Our transient sufferings here shall soon be o'er,
And death will land us on a happier shore.
But when we rise from this accursed abyss,
Who by his merit can lay claim to bliss?
Dangers and difficulties man surround,
Doubts and perplexities his mind confound.
To nature we apply for truth in vain,
God should His will to human kind explain.
He only can illumine the human soul,
Instruct the wise man, and the weak console.

Without Him man of error still the sport,
Thinks from each broken reed to find support.
Leibnitz can't tell me from what secret cause
In a world governed by the wisest laws,
Lasting disorders, woes that never end
With our vain pleasures real sufferings blend ;
Why ill the virtuous with the vicious shares ?
Why neither good nor bad misfortunes spares ?
I can't conceive that "what is, ought to be,"
In this each doctor knows as much as me.
We're told by Plato, that man, in times of yore,
Wings gorgeous to his glorious body wore,
That all attacks he could unhurt sustain,
By death ne'er conquered, ne'er approached by pain.
Alas, how changed from such a brilliant state !
He crawls 'twixt heaven and earth, then yields to fate.
Look round this sublunary world, you'll find
That nature to destruction is consigned.
Our system weak which nerves and bone compose,
Cannot the shock of elements oppose ;
This mass of fluids mixed with tempered clay,
To dissolution quickly must give way.
Their quick sensations can't unhurt sustain
The attacks of death and of tormenting pain,
This is the nature of the human frame,
Plato and Epicurus I disclaim.
Nature was more to Bayle than either known :
What do I learn from Bayle, to doubt alone ?
Bayle, great and wise, all systems overthrows,
Then his own tenets labors to oppose.
Like the blind slave to Delilah's commands,
Crushed by the pile demolished by his hands.

Mysteries like these can no man penetrate,
Hid from his view remains the book of fate.
Man his own nature never yet could sound,
He knows not whence he is, nor whither bound.*
Atoms tormented on this earthly ball,
The sport of fate, by death soon swallowed all,
But thinking atoms, who with piercing eyes
Have measured the whole circuit of the skies ;
We rise in thought up to the heavenly throne,
But our own nature still remains unknown.
This world which error and o'erweening pride,
Rulers accursed between them still divide,
Where wretches overwhelmed with lasting woe,
Talk of a happiness they never know,
Is with complaining filled, all are forlorn
In seeking bliss ; none would again be born.
If in a life midst sorrows past and fears,
With pleasure's hand we wipe away our tears,

* It is self-evident, that man cannot acquire this knowledge without assistance. The human mind derives all its knowledge from experience; no experience can give us an insight into what preceded our existence, into what is to follow it, nor into what supports it at present. In what manner have we received life? What is the spring upon which it depends? How is our brain capable of ideas and memory? In what manner do our limbs obey every motion of the will. Of all this we are entirely ignorant. Is our globe the only one that is inhabited? Was it created after other globes, or at the same instant? Does every particular species of plants proceed from a first plant? Is every species of animals produced by two first animals? The most profound philosophers are no more able to solve these questions than the most ignorant of men. All these questions may be reduced to the vulgar proverb: Was the hen before the egg, or the egg before the hen? The proverb is rather low, but it confounds the utmost penetration of human wisdom, which is utterly at a loss with regard to the first principles of things without supernatural assistance.

Pleasure his light wings spreads, and quickly flies,
Losses on losses, griefs on griefs arise.
The mind from sad remembrance of the past,
Is with black melancholy overcast ;
Sad is the present if no future state,
No blissful retribution mortals wait,
If fate's decrees the thinking being doom
To lose existence in the silent tomb.
All may be well ; that hope can man sustain,
All now is well ; 'tis an illusion vain.
The sages held me forth delusive light,
Divine instructions only can be right.
Humbly I sigh, submissive suffer pain,
Nor more the ways of Providence arraign.
In youthful prime I sung in strains more gay,
Soft pleasure's laws which lead mankind astray.
But times change manners ; taught by age and care
Whilst I mistaken mortals' weakness share,
The light of truth I seek in this dark state,
And without murmuring submit to fate.
A caliph once when his last hour drew nigh,
Prayed in such terms as these to the most high :
"Being supreme, whose greatness knows no bound,
I bring thee all that can't in Thee be found ;
Defects and sorrows, ignorance and woe."
Hope he omitted, man's sole bliss below.

PREFACE TO THE POEM ON THE LAW OF NATURE.

---

IT is generally known that this poem was not intended for the public; it long remained a secret between a great king and the author. About three months ago a few copies were handed about in Paris, and soon after several impressions of it were published, as incorrect as those of other works by the same hand.

It would be no more than justice to be more indulgent to a work forced out of the obscurity to which the author had condemned it than to a work offered by the writer himself to the inspection of the public. It would also be agreeable to equity not to pass the same judgment on a poem composed by a layman as on a theological thesis. These two poems are the fruits of a transplanted tree. Some of these fruits may perhaps not be to the taste of certain persons; they come from a foreign climate, but none of them are poisoned, and many of them may prove highly salutary.

This work should be considered as a letter, in which the author freely discloses his sentiments. Most books resemble those formal and general conversations in which people seldom utter their thoughts. The author, in this poem, declares his real opinions to a philosophical prince, whom he then had the honor of living with. He has been informed that persons of the best understanding have been pleased with this sketch: they were of opinion that the poem on the "Law of Nature" was intended only to prepare the world for truths more sublime. This consideration alone would have determined the author to render his work more complete and correct, if his infirmities had permitted it. He was at last obliged to content himself with correcting the faults which the first edition swarm with.

The praises bestowed in this work upon a prince by no means solicitous about praise should not surprise anybody, they came from the heart; they are very different from that incense which self-interest-edness lavishes upon power. The man of letters might not perhaps have deserved the praises or the favors poured upon him by the monarch, but the monarch was every way deserving of the encomiums bestowed upon him in this poem by the man of letters. The change which has since happened, in a connection which does so much honor to learning, has by no means altered the sentiments which gave occasion to these praises.

In fine, since a work never intended for publication, has been snatched out of secrecy and obscurity, it will last among a few sages as a monument of a philosophical correspondence, which should not have ended, and if it shows human weakness throughout, it, at the same time, makes it appear that true philosophy always surmounts that weakness.

To conclude, this weak essay was first occasioned by a little pamphlet which appeared at that time. It was entitled, "A Treatise on the Sovereign Good," and it should have been called "A Treatise on the Sovereign Evil." The author of it maintained that there is no such thing as virtue or vice, and that remorse of conscience is a weakness owing to the prejudice of education, which a man should endeavor to subdue. The author of the following poem maintains, that remorse of conscience is as natural to us as any passion of the human soul. If the violence of passion hurries man into a fault, when come to himself he is sensible of that fault. The wild girl who was found near Châlons, owned, that in her passion she gave her companion a blow, of the consequence of which the poor wretch died in her arms. As soon as she saw her blood, she repented, she wept, she stopped the blood, and dressed the wound with herbs. Those who maintain that this relenting of humanity is only a branch of self-love do that principle a great deal of honor. Let men call reason and conscience by what names they will, they exist, and are the foundation of the law of nature.

THE LAW OF NATURE.

---

THOU by whose works, deeds, reign with wonders fraught,

The brave and wise their duty shall be taught,
Who with unaltered brow alike look down
On life and death, the cottage and the crown ;
With force like thine my wavering soul inspire,
Spread o'er me rays of that celestial fire,
Which owes to sacred reason all its light,
By prepossession dimmed and turned to night.
On darkness which o'erspreads the world below,
Let's strive some light however faint to throw.
Our first of studies in our early age,
Was courtly Horace with Boileau's chaste page.
In them you sought with philosophic mind,
The true and beautiful at once to find ;
Oft with instructive and with moral lines,
Brightly each finished composition shines ;
But Pope possessed of genius more refined.
What lightly they skimmed knew how to find.
Light into the abyss of being first he brought,
And man by him to know himself was taught.
A trivial now, and now a useful art,
Verse is in Pope divine, it forms the heart.
What need we know that Horace hired to praise
Octavius in vile, prostituted lays,
When from the night's polluted joys he rose,
Insulted Crispinus in measured prose ?

That pensioned Boileau satire's venom shed
 On Quinault's lyre and Tasso's laureled head ;
 Could paint the hurry, bustle, and the throng
 Of Paris, where men scarce can pass along ;
 Or at a wretched feast what passed rehearse,
 In flowing numbers and harmonious verse.
 A soul like thine to higher views aspires,
 Far other information it requires ;
 The essence of our spirit you explore,
 Its end, beginning, but its duty more.
 On this important theme what others thought,
 What error has to vulgar doctors taught,
 Let's scan and balance with those truths divine,
 Which heaven suggests to such a soul as thine.
 God we should search for in ourselves alone,
 If He exists the human heart's His throne.
 The God whose power from dust could mortals raise,
 Must we then seek in learning's winding maze ?
 You trust not Origen's or Scotus' page,
 Nature instructs us more than either sage ;
 Systems let's drop, those follies of the wise,
 And into self descending, learn to rise.

PART THE FIRST.

God has given men ideas of justice and conscience to admonish them just as He has given them everything else necessary. This is that Law of Nature upon which religion is founded. This is the only principle herein discussed. The author speaks only of the Law of Nature, and not of religion and its awful mysteries.

Whether a self-existent* being laid
 The world's foundations, out of nothing made,

* As God is an infinite being, His nature must of consequence be unknown to all men. As this is a philosophical work, it was judged necessary to cite the opinions of philosophers. All the ancients, without exception, looked on matter as eternal; this is almost the only point on which they agreed.

If forming in matter o'er it he presides,
And having shaped the mass, directs and guides ;
Whether the soul, that bright ethereal spark
Of heavenly fire, too oft obscure and dark,
Makes of our senses one or acts alone ;
We all are subject to the Almighty's throne.
But at His throne round which deep thunders roar
What homage shall we pay, how God adore ?
Can jealousy affect the eternal mind ?
Will adulation there acceptance find ?
Is it that warlike race of haughty brow,
Who to their power made famed Byzantium bow,
The phlegmatic Chinese, the Tartar rude,
Whose arms so many regions have subdued,
That rightly knows to praise the Power divine,
And offer grateful homage at His shrine ?
Various in language and religious lore
A different deity they all implore ;
Then all have erred, let's therefore turn our eyes
From vile impostors who delight in lies :*
Nor let us vainly make attempt to sound
Awful religion's mysteries profound,
To reason let researches vain give place,
Let's strive to know if God instructs our race.
Nature to man has given with bounteous hand
Whate'er his nature's cravings can demand ;
Sense's sure instinct, spirit's varied springs,
To him each element its tribute brings.
In the brain's foldings memory is placed,
And on it nature's lively image traced.

* Confucius should not be confounded with these; he confined himself to natural religion, and discovered everything that could be discovered without the light of revelation.

Ready at every motion of his will,
His call external objects answer still;
Sound to his ear is wafted by the air,
The light he sees without or pains or care.
As to his God, the end of humankind
Is man to ceaseless errors then confined?
Is nature then displayed to mortal's eyes,
While nature's God obscure and hidden lies?
Is succor in my greatest need denied?
Must my chief craving rest unsatisfied?
No, God in vain has not His creatures made,
The hand divine on every brow's displayed,
My Master's will can't from me be concealed;
When He gave being He His law revealed.
Doubtless He spoke, but spoke to all mankind;
To Egypt's deserts He was ne'er confined.
In Delphi, Delos, or the Sibyl's cave,
No oracle the godhead ever gave.
Morality, unvaried and the same,
Denounces to each age God's holy name.
'Tis Trajan's law, 'tis Socrates', yours,
By nature preached, like nature it endures;
Reason receives it, and the keen remorse
Of conscience strengthens it, and gives it force;
For conscience makes the obstinate repent,
And hardest bosoms at her voice relent.
Think you young Ammon, mad ambition's slave,
Not like you moderate, although as brave,
In a friend's blood, when he his hands imbrued.
By augurs to soft pity was subdued?
Religious rites for gold they had profaned,
And washed the monarch's hands by murder stained:

But nature's instinct could not be suppressed,
It pleaded powerful in the monarch's breast;
He could not his impetuous rage forgive,
But thought himself a wretch unfit to live.
This law which bears in China sovereign sway,
To which fierce Japanese due reverence pay,
Fired Zoroaster's genius unconfined,
And shed its sacred light on Solon's mind.
It cries from Indus to cold Zembla's shore,
"Be just, thy country love, and God adore."
The Laplander, amidst eternal snows,
His God adores, and what is justice, knows;
And sold to distant coasts the negro race
With joy in others negro features trace.
No slanderer vile, no murderer ever knows
The mind's calm sunshine and the soul's repose;
Nor ever thus his secret thoughts expressed,
He who destroys the innocent is blessed;
Blessed he by whom his mother's blood is spilt,
Great the attractions and the charms of guilt.
Believe me, mortals, man, with dauntless brow,
Would openly such sentiments avow,
If there was not a universal law
Crimes to repress, and keep the world in awe.
Did men create the sense of guilt or shame?
Their soul and faculties did mortals frame?
Whether in Peru or in China flame
The golden heaps, their nature is the same:
From the artist's hands new forms the ingots take,
But he who shapes unable is to make:
Thus God, to whom each man his being owes,
In every heart the seeds of virtue sows.

True virtue by the Almighty first was made,
 By man its counterfeit, and empty shade ;
 He may disguise the truth with errors vain,
 His feelings an attempt to change restrain.

PART THE SECOND.

Containing answers to the objections against universal morality, with a demonstration of that truth.

Cardan and famed Spinoza both reply,
 This check of conscience, Nature's boasted cry,
 From mutual wants and habit take their rise,
 'Tis these cement our friendships and our ties.
 Foe to thyself, sophist both weak and blind,
 Whence springs this want? Why did the sovereign mind

Make in the bosom of all mortals dwell,
 Instincts which to society impel?
 Laws made by mortal man soon pass away,
 The varied, weak productions of a day.
 Jacob of old, as inclination led,
 Two sisters of the Hebrew race could wed ;
 David, exempt both from restraint and shame,
 Could to a hundred beauties tell his flame,
 Whilst at the Vatican, the pope distressed,
 Can't without scandal be of one possessed.
 Here successors are chosen by the sires,
 Whilst birthright there the whole estate acquires.
 If but a whiskered Polander commands,
 All public business suspended stands.
 Electors must the emperor sustain,
 The pope has dignity, the English gain.
 Worship, law, interests, variations know,
 Virtue's alone unchangeable below.

But whilst this moral beauty we admire,
See on a scaffold Britain's king expire.
Borgia the blade against his brother drew,
And stabbed whilst to his sister's arms he flew.
There the Dutch rabble roused to frantic rage,
Two brothers tear, the worthies of their age.
In France Brinvilliers constant still at prayers,
Poisons her sire, and to confess repairs ;
The just is by the wicked's force subdued,
Hence do you virtue but a name conclude ?
When with the baleful south wind's tainted breath,
All nature sickens, and each gale is death,
Will you maintain that since the world began,
Health never yet was known to dwell with man.
The various pests that poison human life,
Effects that spring from elemental strife,
Corrupt the bliss of mortals here below,
But quickly vanish both their guilt and woe.
Soon as our passions fierce subside and cool,
Our hearts assent to every moral rule.
The source is pure, the furious winds in vain
Disturb its waves, and rushing torrents stain ;
The mud that on its surface flows refines,
And by degrees the watery mirror shines ;
The worst man there fierce as the storm before,
His image sees when once its rage is o'er.
The light of reason heaven gave not in vain
To man, but added conscience to restrain.
The springs of sense are moved by her command ;
Who hears her voice is sure to understand :
To minds by passion swayed though free before,
She still an equilibrium can restore ;

She kindles in each breast a generous flame,
And makes self-love and social love the same.
This was the demon Socrates' guide,
Ordnained o'er all his actions to preside,
The God whose presence could his fears control,
Who made him dauntless drink the poisoned bowl.
Was to the sage its influence confined?
No; heaven must sure direct each human mind.
By this for five years Nero's rage was quelled,
Five years the voice of flattery he repelled.
His soul to this Aurelius still applied,
Like a philosopher he lived and died.
Julian, apostate by the Christians named,
Adhered to reason, whilst he faith disclaimed,
The Church's scandal, but of kings the pride,
Ne'er from the law of nature turned aside.
But cavillers truth's force will never own,
They cry to infants, "Reason is unknown;"
The power of education forms the mind,
Man still to copy others is inclined;
Nothing peculiar actuates his heart,
Others he apes, and acts a borrowed part;
Justice and truth with him are words of course,
But machine-like he acts by instinct's force.
He's Turk or Jew, Pagan or Child of Grace,
Layman or Monk, according to his race.
I know example influence acquires
O'er man; that habit sentiment inspires.
Speech, fashions, and the mind's unbounded range
Of mad opinions, subject still to change,
Are feeble traces by our sires impressed,
With mortal signet on each human breast.

But the first springs are made by God's own hand,
Of source divine, they shall forever stand.
To practise them the child a man must grow,
Their force he cannot in the cradle know.
The sparrow when he first beholds the light,
Can he unfledged feel amorous delight?
Do new-born foxes prey to seek begin?
Do insects taught by nature silk to spin,
Or do the humming swarms, whose artful skill,
Can wax compose, and honey's sweets distil,
Soon as they see the day their work produce?
Time ripens and brings all things into use,
All beings have their object, and they tend
At a fixed period to their destined end.
Passion, 'tis true, may hurry us along,
Sometimes the just may deviate into wrong.
Oft man from good to hated evil flies,
None in all moments virtuous are or wise.
We're told that man's a mystery o'er and o'er;
All nature as mysterious is or more.
Philosophers sagacious and profound,
The beasts' sure instinct could you ever sound?
The nature of the grass can you explain,
That dies, then rising spreads a verdant plain?
This world a veil o'erspreads of darkest night.
If through the deep obscure the glimmering light
Of reason serves to guide us on our way,
Should we extinguish it, and go astray.
When God first filled the vast expanse of sky,
Bid oceans flow and kindled suns on high;
He said, "Be in your limits fixed contained,"
And in their bounds the rising worlds remained.

On Venus laws and Saturn he imposed,
The sixteen orbs of which our world's composed ;
On jarring elements that still contend,
On rolling thunders that the ether rend,
On man created to adore His power,
And on the worm that shall man's flesh devour.
Shall man audaciously, with effort vain,
His own laws add to those the heavens ordain ?
Should we the phantoms of a day at most,
Who scarcely can a real being boast,
Place ourselves on the throne at God's right hand,
And issue forth (like Gods) supreme command ?

PART THE THIRD.

Shows that as men have for the most part disfigured, by the various opinions which they have adopted, the principle of natural religion which unites them, they should mutually bear with each other.

The universe is God's eternal shrine,
Men various ways adore the power divine.
All of their faith, their saints, their martyred host,
And oracles unerring voice make boast.
On numerous ablutions one relies,
He thinks heaven sees them with propitious eyes,
And that all those who are not circumcised,
Are by his God rejected and despised.
Another thinks he Brahma's favor gains,
Whilst he from eating rabbits' flesh abstains,
Amongst the blessed above he hopes a seat,
The just reward of merit so complete.
Against their neighbors all alike declaim,
And brand them with the unbeliever's name.

The jars amidst contending Christians bred,
More desolation through the world have spread,
Than the pretext of statesmen weak and vain,
Midst Europe's powers a balance to maintain.
See an inquisitor, with air benign,
His neighbor's body to the flames consign;
Much sorrow at the tragic scene he shows,
But takes the money to assuage his woes.
Whilst touched with zeal religious crowds advance,
And praising God, around the victim dance.
Blind zeal could oft good Catholics incite,
At leaving mass to hurry to the sight,
And threatening each their neighbor loudly cry,
"Wretch, think like me, or else this moment die."
From Paris, Calvin and his sect withdrew,
Their effigies the bloodless hangman slew.
Servetus born in torments to expire,
By Calvin's self was sentenced to the fire.
Had but Servetus been of power possessed,
The Trinitarians had been sore oppressed,
Quickly had ended all the warm dispute,
For halts can the obstinate confute.
Thus sectaries who 'gainst Arminius rose,
Bent all his tenets warmly to oppose,
In Flanders gained the martyr's glorious name,
In Holland executioners became.
Why for so many years with pious rage,
Religious wars did our forefathers wage?
From nature's law allegiance they withdrew,
Or added others dangerous as new;
And man to his own sense an abject slave,
To God his weakness and his passions gave.

To him men give the faults of humankind,
They paint him fickle, false, to rage inclined :
But reason, thanks to Heaven, in these our days
O'er half the globe diffuses kindly rays ;
Man at her voice persuasive grows humane,
No piles are lighted, blood no altars stain.
If bigot fury should again be known,
Those fires would soon to tenfold rage be blown.
So oft opinion does not pass for guilt,
By man his brother's blood's more rarely spilt,
More rarely horror acts of faith inspire
At Lisbon, fewer Jews in flames expire ;*
Less oft the Mufti cries in furious strain,
"Slave, follow Mahomet, from wine refrain."
But Christian still the furious Mufti names
Dogs, and condemns them to eternal flames.
The Catholics again from bliss exclude
The Turks, who have so many realms subdued ;
They to damnation northern realms consign,
The curse great king affects even worth like thine.
In vain your goodness is each day displayed,
In vain all mankind you protect and aid ;
You people and improve the barren plain,
Arts cultivate, asylums build in vain :
For confidently may doctors say
That you from Beelzebub derive your sway.
The Pagan virtues were but crimes at best,
All generous souls such maxims must detest.
Journalist base who with malignant mind
Thinkest thyself authorized to damn mankind ;

* When this poem was written, the author could not foresee that flames were to destroy a great part of that unhappy city in which fagots were too often kindled.

Thou seest with joy God human beings frame,
To glut the devil and burn with endless flame.
Is it not enough that you at once consign
Montaigne and Montesquieu to wrath divine?
Shall Aristides, Socrates the sage,
Solon the guide and model of his age;
Aurelius, Trajan, Titus dear to fame,
Against whom you with bitterness declaim,
All be cast into the abyss of hell,
By the just Being whom they served so well?
And shall you be in heaven with glory crowned,
While crowds of cherubim your throne surround;
Because with monks a wallet once you bore,
In ignorance slept and greasy sack-cloth wore?
Be blest above, with souls no war I wage,
But why should Newton, wonder of his age,
Leibnitz profound, and Addison whose mind
With learning fraught was by true taste refined:
Locke who could spirits' properties explain,
And understanding's limits ascertain;
Men whom the God supreme deigned to inspire—
Wherefore should these be doomed to penal fire?
In judging be more temperate and cool,
Teach not eternal wisdom how to rule;
To judge severely such great men beware,
And those who ne'er condemned you learn to spare.
Religion well observed will quell your rage,
And make you mild, compassionate and sage;
Drown others not, but try the port to find,
He's right who pardons but the angry blind.
Sons of one God, in these our days of woe
Let's live like brothers whilst we dwell below.

Let's strive to lend each other kind relief,
 We groan beneath a load of woes and grief:
 Against our lives a thousand foes lay wait,
 Our lives which we at once both love and hate:
 Some guide, some prop our wavering hearts require,
 With languor chilled, or burned with strong desire.
 Tears by the happiest mortals have been shed,
 All have their share of anxious care and dread.
 If kind society her succors lend,
 Her joys awhile our grief and cares suspend:
 Yet even here a weak resource we find,
 'Gainst grief that ever rankles in the mind.
 Dash not the cup in which our comforts flow,
 Do not corrupt the balm of human woe.
 Felons, methinks, I in a dungeon spy,
 Who at their fellows' throats with fury fly;
 And though they could relieve each other's pains,
 Forever jar and combat with their chains.

PART THE FOURTH.

Proves that it is the business of the government to put an end to the unhappy disputes of the schools, by which the peace of society is disturbed.

I oft have heard it from your lips august,
 'Tis the grand duty, doubtless, to be just;
 And the first blessing is the heart's repose.
 How could you, where so many sects oppose,
 Amidst incessant wrangling and debate,
 Preserve a peace so lasting in the state?
 Whence is it Calvin's sons, and Luther's, tell,
 Deemed by the Papists Satan's offspring fell,
 The Roman, Greek, who will not own the power
 Of Rome; the Quaker, Anabaptist sour,

Who in their law could never yet agree,
 Are all united in the praise of thee?
 'Tis because nature formed you for the throne ;
 Like you to rule had the first Valois known,
 A Jacobin had not, with fury fired,
 To rival Judith and Aod, aspired ;
 Ne'er on the king his hands profane had laid.
 But Valois edged the church's* murderous blade,
 That blade by which, though subject crowds stood round,
 Great Henry after fell. for worth renowned.
 Such cursed effects from pious quarrels flow,
 Or soon or late all factions bloody grow ;
 Quickly they spread and strength acquire, if prized,
 But quickly sink to nothing, if despised.
 He who can armies lead against the foe,
 To govern refractory priests should know.
 Yet could a Norman confessor persuade
 A king who prowess in the field displayed,
 That Quesnel, Jansen threatened much the state,
 The monarch by his greatness gave them weight.
 Then rose a hundred factions filled with ire,
 Blind zeal made judges, pleaders, clerks conspire ;
 Then Jesuits, Capuchins, and Cordeliers,
 The kingdom filled with scruples and with fears :
 Ridiculous once by the regent made,
 They quickly sunk into oblivion's shade.
 The master's presence and his care suffice
 To scatter bliss, thence general good must rise.

* We are not by the word Church, in this place, to understand the Catholic Church. Nothing is here alluded to but the abominable fanaticism of some ecclesiastics detested by the Church in all ages.

Who cultivates within the well-fenced field,
The treasures which the spring and autumn yield,
Can water, earth, sun's various gifts bestow,
Upon the trees that in his gardens grow ;
On slender props he feeble branches rears,
And from the ground the useless plants uptears ;
Or prunes them when they too luxuriant shoot,
And drain of needful sap the trunk and root.
His lands afford him all he can desire,
The laws of nature with his toil conspire ;
A tree which he has planted with his hand,
Is sure, with others, to enrich the land ;
And all the planter's cares are well repaid
With luscious fruits and with a grateful shade.
A gardener never could, by vengeance led,
Make heaven upon it baleful influence shed ;
Could ne'er, by curses, make his fruits decay,
Or vines and fig-trees wither quite away.
Wretched those nations where laws still contend !
'Their jarring factions never can have end :
The Roman senate, watchful o'er the state,
Morals and rites intent to regulate,
Set to the vestals' number its due bound,
Nor suffered bacchanals to range around.
Aurelius, Trajan, princes of renown,
The pontiff's bonnet wore, and emperor's crown :
The world depended on their care alone,
And the schools' vain disputes were then unknown ;
Those legislators, with sage maxims fraught,
Ne'er for their sacred birds with fury fought.
On the same principle Rome now holds command,
The throne and altar by their union stand ;

Her citizens enjoy serene repose,
More blessed than when they vanquished numerous foes.

Not that I think kings should the mitre wear,
And the cross jointly with the sceptre bear,
Or when they come from council should, aloud,
Utter their benediction to the crowd ;
But I assert that kings, when they are crowned,
To maintain order are by duty bound,
That their authority's o'er all the same,
That all their fatherly protection claim.
On various orders well-formed states depend,
Merchants enrich them, warriors defend.
Religious ordinances level all,
The rich and poor, the great as well as small ;
Equal authority has civil law,
This keeps both citizens and priests in awe.
Law in a state should equal sway extend
O'er all ; all to it equally should bend.
Farther to treat of such points I decline,
Heaven ne'er for government formed souls like mine ;

But from the port where now my life I close,
In tranquil happiness and calm repose,
Seeing the storms that all around me rage,
I with your lessons moralize my page.
From this discourse what inference shall we draw ?
That prejudice to fools alone gives law ;
We should not for it with fierce rage contend,
Earth teems with error, truths from heaven descend ;
And amidst thistles which obstruct the way,
The sage finds paths that cannot lead astray.

Peace, which man wishes, whilst he from it flies,
As much as sacred truth should mortals prize.

PRAYER.

Great God, whose being by thy works is known,
My last words hear from Thy eternal throne :
If I mistook 'twas while Thy law I sought,
I may have erred, but Thou wert in each thought.
Fearless I look beyond the opening grave,
And cannot think the God who being gave,
The God whose favors made my bliss o'erflow,
Has doomed me, after death, to endless woe.

THE TEMPLE OF TASTE.*

---

THAT cardinal o'er all the realm†
Revered, not he who holds the helm,
But he who o'er Parnassus reigns,
Renowned for his harmonious strains ;
The patron whom all bards respect,
Who can instruct them and protect,
Whose eloquence we all admire,
Who with a true poetic fire,
In Latin verse can reason right,
Plato with Virgil can unite,
Who vindicates high heaven to man,
And quite subverts Lucretius' plan.

That cardinal, whom every one must know by this picture, desired me one day to accompany him to the Temple of Taste. " 'Tis a place," said he, "which resembles the Temple of Friendship, which everybody speaks of, which few visit, and which most of those who travel to it, have never thoroughly examined."

* Jean Baptist Rousseau, in exile, became embittered against Voltaire, who had said of the former's "Ode to Posterity," that it was not likely to reach its destination. He circulated several unflattering criticisms on Voltaire's recent productions, including "Zaire," the tragedy which placed the young author at the head of the dramatic poets. Voltaire took a merry revenge in this variegated piece, "The Temple of Taste," which set the town laughing at the good-humored badinage he so freely distributes among his literary and fashionable contemporaries.

† Cardinal de Fleury.

I answered frankly, I must own,
To me taste's laws are little known,
To favor you that God inclines,
He to your hands the keys consigns ;
You are his vicar here deputed,
And o'er his Church pope constituted.
In furious fret all Rome may rage,
And rave at this my honest page ;
But there's a difference very plain,
'Twi'x't you and Rome's pope, I'll maintain ;
For Sorbonne's doctors all aver
God's vicar upon earth may err :
But when I hear you reason strong,
I think you can't be in the wrong ;
So just your reasoning, wit so bright,
You seem infallible outright.

"Ah," replied he, "at Rome infallibility is confined to things which men do not comprehend: in the Temple of Taste, it concerns what all think they understand. You must positively come with me." But, continued I, if you carry me with you, I will make it my public boast.

I shall be importuned I'm sure,
To write a volume on this tour :
Voltaire's account shall be at best,
But a short narrative in jest.
But town and court will, without fail,
Loudly at the relation rail ;
The court will murmur, and the town
Will, as a fibber, run me down ;
As one who talks with serious air
Of places, when he ne'er was there,

And readers better to engage,
Tells a flat lie in every page.

However, as we should never refuse ourselves an innocent pleasure, for fear others should think ill of us, I followed the guide who did me the honor to be my conductor.

Abbé with taste and genius fraught,
With us the sacred shrine you sought ;
You, who with sage enlightened mind,
At once both knowing and refined,
Have, by example, shown the way
Which we may take, nor fear to stray,
When in pursuit of taste we go.
That God which wits so seldom know.

In our journey we had many difficulties to encounter. We first of all met with Messrs. Baldus, Scioppius, Lecicocrassus, Scriblerius, and a crowd of commentators, who made it their business to restore passages, and compile volumes upon a word which they did not understand.

Dacier, Salmasius the profound,
With learned lumber stored I found ;
Their faces wan, their fire quite spent,
With pouring o'er Greek authors bent.
Soon as the squalid troop I spied,
I raised my voice, and to them cried,
"To Taste's famed Temple do you bend?"
"No, sir, we no such thing intend.
What others have with care expressed,
With accuracy we digest,
On others' thoughts we spend our ink,
But we for our part never think."

After this ingenuous confession, these gentlemen would have had us read some passages of Dictys, of Crete, and Metrodorus of Lampsacus, which Scaliger had spoiled. We thanked them for their kind offer, and continued our journey. We had not walked a hundred steps, when we met a person surrounded with painters, architects, carvers, gilders, pretended connoisseurs, and flatterers. They turned their backs to the Temple of Taste.

With air important, pride reposed,
His face with gravity composed,
Then Crassus, snoring, cried: "I've store
Of gold, of wit and genius more:
With taste, sir, I am amply fraught,
I know all things, yet ne'er was taught;
I'm skilled in council and affairs,
In spite of tempests and corsairs;
My vessel safe to port I've brought,
With pirates, and with winds I've fought,
A palace, therefore, I shall raise,
Which every man of taste will praise,
Where every art shall be displayed,
Which shall with wonder be surveyed.
The money's ready, no delay,"
He said and slept. They all obey:
This is no sooner said than done,
To labor all the workmen run.
To a Vitruvius pride erects
One of our modern architects,
Resolving to do something new,
A plan too much adorned he drew;
No porch or front the pile could show,
But your eye meets an endless row,

The Temple of Taste.

Your walls not thick, your closets great,
 Your salon without depth complete ;
 Windows each one of which appears,
 Like a church door and little peers ;
 Gilt, wainscoted, and painted white,
 It shall with wonder strike the sight.
 "Wake, sir," a painter cried aloud,
 Be to my art just praise allowed ;
 The skill of Raphael ne'er was such,
 He had not half so soft a touch.
 To nature I can give new grace,
 And cover all the ceiling's space,
 With various figures, which the sight
 Beholds at distance with delight."
 Crassus awakening, took the plan,
 And to examine it began :
 Having at length the whole inspected,
 At random he its faults corrected ;
 Then glass in hand a connoisseur
 Said, "Look upon this picture, sir ;
 Buy it, sir, 'twill your chapel grace,
 God in His glory suits the place ;
 The taste alone's enough to show,
 That 'tis the work of famed Vatau."
 Meantime a bookseller, a cheat,
 Whom wits are often forced to treat,
 Opens tomes which the works contains,
 Of Gacon, Noble, Desfontaines ;
 Miscellanies of journals store.
 My lord begins to read and snore.

I thought we should meet with no further delay, but that we should approach the Temple without encountering any other difficulty ; but the journey is more dangerous than I imagined. We soon after fell into a new ambushade.

Thus in the path which to salvation
Leads, devotees meet much temptation ;
And with the devil oft contend,
Before they reach their journey's end.

This was a concert given by a gentleman of the long robe, infatuated with music, which he never learned, and chiefly with the Italian music, which he had no knowledge of, but from some indifferent airs which were never heard at Rome, and which are very badly sung in France by some girls belonging to the opera.

He then caused a long French recitative, set to music by an Italian, who did not understand our language, to be performed. It was to no purpose to remonstrate to him, that as this sort of music is nothing more than noted declamation, it is of consequence, subjected to the genius of the language ; and that nothing can be as ridiculous as French scenes sung in the Italian taste, except Italian ones sung in the French taste.

Nature ingenious, fertile, wise,
Earth with gifts various beautifies ;
She speaks to all in language fit,
They differ both in tongue and wit ;
Their tone, their voices suit ; each note
Is by the hand of nature wrote ;
And every difference must appear
To a refined, judicious ear.
Music to charm in France, the tone
Of France must imitate alone.

Lulli could to our taste descend,
Not strive to alter but amend.

No sooner were these judicious remarks made, but the pretended connoisseur, shaking his head, cried, "Come, come, you shall soon see something new." We could not refuse to enter, and immediately after, the concert began.

The rivals then of Lully's fame,
Their taste and skill in art the same,
French verse most dissonantly played
With the Italian music's aid :
A lady, with distorted eyes,
Acted a thousand ecstasies.
A coxcomb, of his dress quite vain,
Quavered and thrilled a frantic strain,
And beat time false, which made them soon
All equally play out of tune.

We left the place as rapidly as we could, and we did not arrive at the Temple of Taste, until after we had met with many adventures of this kind.

On basis firm, in ancient days,
Greece did this famous temple raise :
The building, with revolving years
Increased, to menace heaven appears.
The world, upon its altars laid,
Incense and adoration paid :
To own the power Rome long delayed,
At length to taste she homage paid.
The Turk, a more inveterate foe,
In dust the edifice laid low.
The ruins, by the Goths neglected,
Were all in Italy collected.

Soon the first Francis, nobly bold,
 Raised a new temple like the old ;
 But his posterity despised
 An architecture once so prized.
 Next Richelieu made it all his care
 The abandoned temple to repair.
 Lewis adorned the sacred shrine,
 Colbert invited all the nine ;
 Each art, in which the wise excel,
 Beneath the temple's roof to dwell.
 By this the first shrine was surpassed,
 But much I doubt it will not last.
 Here might I in descriptive verse
 The beauties of the shrine rehearse ;
 But let us not, to show our skill in
 Description, simply write for filling ;
 Let us prolixity avoid,
 By which Felibien's readers cloyed ;
 Whilst he each trifle to explain,
 Launches into rhetoric strain.
 This noble building's not disgraced
 With heaps of rubbish round it placed ;
 For thus our sires, but little skilled,
 Their Gothic structures used to build.
 The shrine from all the faults we see,
 In Versailles Chapelle famed is free ;
 That gewgaw which strikes vulgar eyes,
 But which all men of taste despise.

It is much easier to give a negative than a positive idea of this Temple. To avoid so difficult an attempt
 I shall only add,

The structure's of a simple taste,
 Each ornament is justly placed ;

The Temple of Taste.

The whole's arranged with so much care,
 Art seems to copy nature there ;
 The beauteous structure fills the sight,
 Not with surprise, but with delight.

The Temple was surrounded with a crowd of virtuosos, artists and connoisseurs of various kinds, who endeavored to enter, but did not succeed.

For criticism, severe and just,
 Still stood before that shrine august,
 Repelling all the efforts rude
 Of Goths, who would in crowds intrude.

How many men of quality, how many persons in high vogue with the public, who dictate so imperiously to little clubs, are refused admittance into that Temple!

There the cabals of wit no more
 Have the same power they had before ;
 When they could make an audience praise
 Pradon's and Scudéri's* wretched lays,
 And think their writings did excel
 Those of Racine and great Corneille.

The obscure enemies of all-shining merit, those insects of society, which are taken notice of only because they bite, were repelled with equal rudeness. These would have envied the great Condé the glory he acquired at Rocroi, and Villars the reputation he gained at Denain, as much as they envied Corneille for having written "Polyeucte." They would have assassinated Lebrun for having painted the family of * Scudéri was the declared enemy of Corneille. He had a party, which greatly preferred him to that father of the stage. He boasted that four doorkeepers were killed when one of his pieces were represented, and said he would never yield to Corneille till there were five doorkeepers killed at the representation of the Cid or the Horatii.

Darius ; and they in fact forced Lemoine to lay violent hands upon himself for having painted the admirable salon of Hercules. They always hold in their hands a bowl of aconite, like that which men of the same character caused Socrates to drink.

Pride mixing with envy in odious embrace,
Gave birth to this cursed and detestable race,
Suspicion, self-interest, malignant detraction,
And of devotees a most dangerous faction,
These often in secret confederacy combine,
And to the cabal ope the gates of the shrine.
There a Midas' eyes they impose on with ease,
Knaves yield them support, and fools glut them with praise ;

True merit, indignant, a sad silence keeps ;
Time alone wipes his tears, whilst in secret he weeps.

These persecuting wretches fled as soon as they saw my two guides. Their precipitate flight was followed by something of a more diverting nature ; this was a crowd of writers of every rank, age and condition, who scratched at the door and begged of Criticism to permit them to enter. One brought with him a mathematical romance, another a speech made before the Academy ; one has just composed a metaphysical comedy ; another held in his hand a poetical miscellany long since printed, with a long approbation and a privilege ; another presented a mandate wrote in an affected and over-refined style, and was surprised to find that all present laughed instead of asking his blessing. "I am the reverend father," said one : "Make room for my lord," said another.

A prating sir, with voice acute,
 Cried, "I'm the judge of each dispute,
 I argue, contradict and prate,
 What others like I'm sure to hate."
 Then Criticism appearing, cried,
 "Your merit is by none denied ;
 But since Taste's godhead you reject,
 Do not to enter here expect."

Bardou then cried out, "The world's in an error, and will always continue so; there's no God of Taste, and I'll prove it thus." Then he laid down a proposition, divided and subdivided it; but nobody listened, and a greater multitude than ever crowded to the gate.

Amidst the various coxcombs chased
 By judgment from the shrine of Taste,
 La Motte Houdart amongst the rest
 Approached, and words like these addressed :
 Receive my Œdipus in prose ;
 Roughly, 'tis true, I verse compose ;
 I must with Boileau hold converse,
 And rail against all sorts of verse.

Criticism knew him by his gentle deportment and the roughness of the two last lines, and she left him awhile between Perrault and Chapelain, who had laid a fifty years siege to the temple, and constantly exclaimed against Virgil.

At that very moment there arrived another versi-fier supported by two little satires, and crowned with laurels and thistles.

"I come hither to laugh, to sport, and to play,
 And make merry," said he, "till the dawn of the day."

“What’s this I hear?” said Criticism. “ ’Tis I,” answered the rhymer; I am just come from Germany to visit you, and I have chosen the spring of the year to travel in.

Spring, the season in which the young Zephyrs dissolve

The bark of the floods, and to fluid resolve.”*

The more he spoke in this style, the less was Criticism disposed to open the door to him. “What,” said he, “am I then taken for

A frog, who from his narrow throat

Still utters, in discordant note.

Boekekex, roax, roax?”

“Heavens,” cried Criticism, “what horrible jargon is this!” She could not immediately guess who the person was that expressed himself in this manner. She was told it was Rousseau, and that the Muses had altered his voice as a punishment for his misdeeds. She could not believe it, and refused to open the door. He blushed and cried out,

“A rigor so extreme abate,

I come to seek Marot, my mate;

Like him, ill luck I had awhile,

But Phoebus now does on me smile;

I’m Rousseau, and to you well known;

Here’s verses against the famed Bignon.†

O thou, who always didst inspire

My bosom with thy sacred fire,

Kind Criticism a welcome give

To one who elsewhere cannot live.”

* Rousseau’s lines.

† A privy counsellor; a man whose merit was acknowledged all over Europe. Rousseau had written some bad verses against him.

Criticism, upon hearing these words, opened the door and spoke thus :

“Rousseau, my temper better know,
 I'm just, and ne'er with gall o'erflow ;
 Unlike that fury, whose fell rage
 Suggested thy malicious page ;
 Who poured her poison in your heart,
 And armed you with the deadly dart.
 The calumnies you strove to spread,
 Drew Themis' vengeance on your head ;
 Your muse was into banishment*
 For certain wicked couplets sent.
 And for a wretched, ill-writ case,
 Which added to your dire disgrace ;
 But Phœbus quickly did pursue
 Your malice with the vengeance due ;
 Your soul of genius he deprived ;
 Genius which you from him derived,
 Of harmony he robbed your lays,
 Which by that only merit praise ;
 Yet you the scribbling itch retain,
 Whilst Phœbus disavows each strain.”

Criticism, after having given this advice, adjudged that Rousseau should take place of La Motte as a versifier ; but that La Motte should have the precedence whenever genius or understanding were the subjects of dispute.

These two men, so different from each other, had not walked four steps, when the one turned pale with rage, and the other leaped with joy, at the sight of a man who had been a long time in the temple, sometimes in one place, and sometimes in another.

* It is universally known, that Rousseau was condemned to make an amende honorable, and banished for life, on account of certain infamous verses, which he wrote against his friends, and laid to the charge of Mons. Samin of the French Academy.

This was the learned Fontenelle,
Who could in all the arts excel,
And on each branch of science threw
A light that pleased, because 'twas new;
He from a planet came post-haste
Back to the sacred shrine of Taste;
Reasoned with Mairan, with Quinault
Trifled away an hour or so;
And managed with an equal skill
The lyre, the compass and the quill.

"What!" cried Rousseau, "shall I see that man here, that man against whom I have written so many epigrams? What! shall Taste suffer in her temple the author of the Chevalier D'Her's letters, of an 'Autumnal Passion,' of 'Moonlight,' of 'A Brook in Love with a Meadow,' of 'The Tragedy of Aspar,' of 'Endymion,' etc."

"No," answered Criticism. "'Tis not the author of those works that you see before you; 'tis the author of the plurality of worlds, who composed 'Thetus and Peleus,' an opera that excites your envy, and the history of the Academy of Sciences, which you are not capable of understanding."

Rousseau was going to write an epigram, and Fontenelle looked upon him with that philosophical compassion which every man of an enlightened mind must have for a mere rhymmer, and then went and seated himself with great composure between Lucretius and Leibnitz.*

I asked how Leibnitz came to be there. I was told that it was because he had written tolerably good Latin verses, though he was versed in both metaphysics and geometry, and that Criticism admitted him into her temple to soften by such an example the austerity of his scientific brethren.

Criticism then turned to the author of the "Plurality of Worlds" and said: I shall not reproach you with some of your juvenile performances, as these zealous cynics have done; but I am Criticism; you are now in the presence of the God of Taste, and I must thus address you in the name of that god, the public and myself; for we all three agree in the main.

Your sportful and instructive muse
Of art should not be so profuse;
Her charms are not quite so faint,
As to require the aid of paint.

As for Lucretius, he blushed as soon as ever he saw the cardinal, his adversary; but no sooner did he hear him speak than he conceived a friendship for him; he ran to him and accosted him in very fine Latin verses, which I translate into indifferent French ones.

*Leibnitz was born at Leipsic, on the 23d of June, 1646, and died at Hanover on the 14th of November, 1716. He was the greatest ornament to learning that Germany ever produced; he was a more universal genius than Newton, though, perhaps, not so great a mathematician. To a profound knowledge in every branch of natural philosophy, he added a refined taste for polite learning; he even wrote French poetry. He owed his fortune entirely to his reputation. He enjoyed considerable pensions from the emperor of Germany, the emperor of Russia, the king of England, and many other sovereigns.

Misled by Epicurus' lore,
 I thought I Nature could explore,
 And as a god the man admired,
 Who, with presumptuous fury fired,
 Dared impious war with heaven to wage,
 The gods dethroning in his rage.
 I thought the soul a transient fire,
 Dissolved the moment we expire;
 I now no more with truth contend;
 The soul shall never have an end;
 But of existence always sure,
 Shall like your deathless verse endure.

The cardinal answered this compliment in the language of Lucretius. All the Latin poets present, from his air and style, judged him to be an ancient Roman; but the French poets are highly displeas'd at authors composing verses in a language which is no longer spoken; and they affirm that since Lucretius, born at Rome, wrote a Latin poem upon the philosophy of Epicurus, his adversary, born at Paris, should have written against him in French. To conclude, after several such amusing delays, we at last arrived at the Temple of the God of Taste.

I saw the god, whom I in vain
 Implore for aid in every strain;
 That god, who never was defined;
 Whose essence escapes the searching mind;
 To whom just service few can pay,
 Though they with such devotion pray;
 Who animates La Fontaine's strain,
 And Vadius searches for in vain.
 The Graces he consults, whose ease,
 With native beauty joined, can please;

Graces which other nations own,
Are best to the French writers known;
Which others oft to copy tried;
Which by strict rules are never tied;
Which reigned at court in times of yore,
With which love crowns the Gallic shore.
Around the god the tender band
Of Graces still obsequious stand;
They to adorn the god attend;
He pleases by the charms they lend;
They crown him with a wreath divine,
Where Phœbus self took care to twine;
Laurels, which once famed Maro crowned
For epic poetry renowned.
Myrtle and ivy leaves, which graced
Horace supreme in wit and taste;
The roses, which in times of yore
The lyric bard Anacreon wore.
His front, the mirror of his mind,
Showed wisdom by true taste refined;
Wit sparkled in his eyes, his air
Was such as might his soul declare.
To prove his beauty is divine,
Silvia, his face resembles thine;
I thus conceal your real name,
Lest envious beauties should declaim
Against you should it once be known,
Your charms are greater than their own.
Rollin not far, with action grave,
To youth his learned lessons gave.
And though in his professor's chair,
Was listened to, a thing most rare.

Meantime in an apartment by,
Which Girardon and Puget vie
With statues to adorn, where taste
As well as just expression's traced ;
Poussin upon stretched canvas showed
What genius in his bosom glowed.
Le Brun with elevated mind,
And genius nobly bold, designed.
Le Sueur, in his art complete,
Between both painters took his seat ;
None murmured to behold him there,
All owned him worthy of the chair.
The god, who with a critic eye
Could every pencil's stroke espy,
Grieved, whilst he much admired their art,
They could not to their works impart
Those vivid colors, whose bright glow
On nature's self new charms bestow.
A crowd of loves before him played,
And to his touch new force conveyed,
And raised each beauty to its height,
By adding Rubens' colors bright.

I was surprised that I did not meet at the sanctuary several persons, who, sixty or eighty years ago, passed for the greatest favorites of the God of Taste. The Pavillons, the Benserades, the Pellissons, the Segraises, the St. Évremonds, the Balzacs, the Voitures, were no longer in possession of the first places. They possessed them heretofore, said one of my guides ; they made a figure before the bright period of the learned world ; but they have at length given place to men of real genius. At present they are but little considered; and, in fact, most of them had only the wit peculiar to their age, and not that species of wit which reaches posterity.

The graces of their feeble lays
 Are tarnished, and they lose their praise;
 None them as geniuses admit,
 But all agree to praise their wit.

Segrais attempted one day to enter the sanctuary at the same time, repeating the following verse of Boileau:

Que Segrais dans l'églogue en charme les forêts.

Let Segrais charm the woods with rural lays.

But Criticism having, unhappily for him, read a few pages of his "Æneid" in French verse, dismissed him a little roughly, and in his place admitted Madame de la Fayette, who published the delightful romance of "Zada"; and the Princess of Cleves, under the name of "Segrais."

Pellisson is not easily excused, for having in his history of the French Academy gravely related so many puerilities, and cited as strokes of wit things which by no means deserve that name. The soft, but weak Pavillon, humbly pays his court to Madame Deshoulières, who is placed far above him. The unequal St. Èvremond does not presume to speak of poetry. Balzac, with his long-winded hyperbolic phrases, tires the patience of Benserade and Voiture, who answer him by antitheses and quibbles, which they are presently after ashamed of themselves. I went in quest of the famous Count de Bussy. Madame de Sévigné, who is beloved by all who dwell in the Temple, told me that her dear cousin, a man of great wit, but a little too vain, could never succeed so far as to make the God of Taste entertain the same favorable opinion of Mons. Roger de Rabutin, which the Count de Bussy had of him.

Bussy for pride and self-love famed,
Is by the god severely blamed ;
Because too much a slave to fame,
Himself he often made his theme ;
His son with every talent graced,
Is always well received by taste ;
He flatters none, of none speaks ill,
His conversation pleases still ;
He shows that wit and eloquence,
To which his father makes pretence.
Chaulieu, who gay and void of care,
Rising from table sang an air ;
Addressed the god-head as a friend,
With freedom which could not offend.
His lively and luxuriant vein
Roves unconfined, nor hears the rein ;
His muse disdaining all control,
With native beauties charms the soul.
La Farre, with softness tempering fire,
Tuned to a lower note his lyre,
And poured forth in his mistress' praise,
His incorrect, but sprightly lays ;
Which might from ease and pleasure spring,
Though Phœbus had not taught to sing.
There Hamilton, whose darts ne'er fail
To wound, at all mankind did rail ;
There St. Aulaire, who for old age,
Surpassed Anacreon, the sage ;

Could all love's joys and cares rehearse,
 In softer and more pleasing verse ;
 Cytherian chaplets graced his head,
 With hoary honors overspread.

The god had a great affection for these gentlemen, especially for those who piqued themselves upon nothing. He hinted to Chaulieu that he should look upon himself as the first of careless and negligent poets, not as the first of good poets.

They conversed with some of the most amiable men of their age. Their conversations were equally free from the affectation of the Hotel de Rambouillet, and from the confusion which reigns amongst our young fellows.

From here with equal shame are chased
 The affected and pedantic taste,
 The stiff and syllogistic air,
 The rage which strives to overbear.
 There gracefully we see unite,
 Learning profound with humor light ;
 And with precision close we find,
 The follies of the human mind.
 Genius takes various forms there,
 It jests and knows a jest to bear ;
 For fear of tiring there the wise,
 Put on even pleasantry's disguise.

Chapelle was there ; that genius more debauched than delicate ; more natural than polite ; an easy versifier, incorrect in his style and licentious in his thoughts. He constantly answered the God of Taste in the same rhymes. 'Tis said that God once answered him thus ;

“Chapelle henceforward less admire,
Reiterated rhymes they tire ;
Those strings of syllables displayed
By Richelet, ill a poet aid ;
That author’s dictionary gleaning,
In double rhymes you’ll have no meaning.”

In this agreeable company I met the President de Maisons, a man of a very different character, not at all used to utter words without a meaning ; a man as solid as agreeable, and equally a lover of all the arts.

“Dear Maisons, is it thee I then embrace?”
Cried I, while trickling tears bedewed my face ;
“Thou who wast snatched from me by cruel death,
Who in my arms when young resigned thy breath.
Deaf to my prayer, inexorable fate
Was bent two dearest friends to separate ;
Ah! since its rigor either death required,
Thou shouldst have lived, and I should have expired.

Since my sad eyes first opened on the sphere,
'Twas heaven’s decree I should be wretched here ;
Thy path of life by heaven was strewed with flowers,
And heart-felt joy winged all thy golden hours.
With pleasures and with honors compassed round,
In arts your wisdom full contentment found ;
Weakness is not of worth, like thine the source,
O’er such a mind opinion ne’er had force ;
Man’s born to err, the potter’s forming hand,
Soft earth is far less able to withstand.
Than can the mind resist the potent sway
Of prejudice, which mortals still obey.

To such vile slavery you refused to bend,
 Your time you gave to study, and a friend ;
 And in your nature were at once combined,
 A tender heart, and philosophic mind."

Among these wits we met some Jesuits. A Jansenist would say upon this that the Jesuits intrude everywhere, but the God of Taste receives their enemies too; and it is diverting to see in this Temple Bourdaloue conversing with Pascal upon the great art of uniting eloquence and close reasoning. Father Bouhours stands behind them, setting down in his pocketbook all the improprieties and inelegances of language which escape them. The cardinal could not help addressing Father Bouhours thus :

The care each little fault to spy,
 That pedants diligence lay by ;
 Let us in eloquence respect
 Each careless phrase and bold defect.
 Were I to choose, I should prefer
 Wild genius, and like great men err,
 Rather than be the wight who dwells
 On syllables, who scans and spells.

This reprimand was expressed in terms, much more polite than those which I have made use of; but we poets are sometimes guilty of deviations from good breeding for the sake of a rhyme. When I visited this temple my attention was not entirely engaged by the wits.

Harmonious verse and prose refined,
 To you alone I'm not confined ;
 I scorn a taste that's fixed on parts,
 And now invoke all pleasing arts.

Music and painting, arts divine,
With architecture's great design,
Graving and dancing all unite
My soul to ravish with delight ;
From all art pleasure must arise,
None then are slighted by the wise.

I saw the muses by turns place upon the altar of the god, books, designs, and plans of various kinds. The plan of that beautiful front of the Louvre (for which we are not indebted to Bernin, who, with great expense and to no purpose, was brought into France, it being the work of Perrault and Louis la Vau, great artists, whose merit is too little known) is to be seen upon that altar. There also is the plan of St. Denis's gate, the beauty of which most Parisians are as insensible of, as they are ignorant of the name of Francis Blondel, the architect, to whom they owe this monument.

That admirable fountain, so little taken notice of, which is adorned with the precious sculptures of John Gougeon, but which is in every respect inferior to the admirable fountain of Bouchardon, at the same time that it seems to upbraid the rude taste of all the others. The porch of St. Gervais' church, a masterpiece of architecture, to which a church, a proper situation and admirers, are wanting, and which should immortalize the name of Desbrosses, still more than the palace of Luxembourg, likewise was built by him. All these monuments, neglected by the vulgar, ever barbarous, and by people of the world ever inattentive, often attract the observation of the deity. The library of this enchanted palace was next shown us ; it was not very big. It will be readily believed that we did not find in it

A heap of manuscripts most rare,
Which greedy bookworms seldom spare ;
Nor on those shelves are ever found
Those writings which so much abound ;
Writings by no man ever read,
The lumber of an author's head.
In person here the tuneful nine,
Their proper place to books assign ;
To books where genius may be traced,
Combined with elegance of taste.

Most of the books there have passed through the hands of the muses, and been by them corrected. The work of Rabelais is to be seen there, reduced to less than half a quarter of its bulk.

Marot, whose only merit is his style, and who in the same taste, sings the Psalms of David, and the wonders of Alix, has but eight or ten leaves left. The pages of Voiture and Sarrasin together, do not exceed sixty in number.

The whole genius of Bayle, is to be found in a single volume, by his own acknowledgment ; for that judicious philosopher, that enlightened judge of authors and sects, often declared that he would never have written more than one volume in folio, if he had not been employed by booksellers.

We were at last admitted into the innermost part of the sanctuary. There the mysteries of the God were unveiled : there I saw what may serve as an example to posterity : a small number of truly great men were employed in correcting those faulty passages of their works, which would have been beauties in those of inferior geniuses.

The amiable author of "Telemachus," retrenched the repetitions and useless details of his moral romance, and blotted out the title of epic poem, which the indiscreet zeal of some of his admirers had given it; for he frankly owns that there is no such thing as a poem in prose.

The eloquent Bossuet was ready to strike out some familiar expressions, which had escaped his vast, impetuous, and free genius, and which, in some measure disgrace the sublimity of his funeral orations; and it is worthy of remark, that he by no means vouches for the truth of all he has said concerning the pretended wisdom of the ancient Egyptians.

Corneille the great, and the sublime
 Who pleased not by the charms of rhyme;
 But waked the soul by strokes of art,
 Which filled with wonder every heart;
 Who with a pencil ever true
 Both Cinna and Augustus drew;
 Cornelia, Pompey brave and great,
 Who fell by too severe a fate;
 Into the flames Pulcheria threw
 Agesilaus, Surena too,
 And sacrificed with no remorse,
 The fruits of genius without force:
 Productions of declining age,
 And quite unworthy of the stage.

The Temple of Taste.

Racine more artful and refined,
 Who touched with gentle woe the mind;
 Who still profound attention draws,
 And never breaks dramatic laws;
 His lovers' parts with critic eye,
 Remarks, but in them can't descry
 Those various touches which in nature,
 Distinguish character like feature:
 In all the same perfections meet,
 They're tender, gallant, and discreet;
 And love whose power o'er all prevails,
 Believes them courtiers of Versailles:
 La Fontaine, poet born to please,
 By happy negligence and ease;
 Whose careless style, with bold neglect,
 Pleases us more than if correct.
 Your own opinion freely tell
 Of works, which in their kind excel:
 We'd gladly be informed by you,
 About your tales and fables too.

La Fontaine, who retained the simplicity of his character, and who in the Temple of Taste joined acuteness and penetration to that happy instinct, which inspired him during his life, blotted out some of his fables. He abridged almost all his tales, and tore the greater part of a collection of posthumous works, printed by those editors who live by the folly of the dead.

There Boileau reigned who taught his age,
 By reason roused to satire's rage;
 Who framed with care poetic laws,
 And followed them with just applause:

Severely now his works he views,
 One quibbling poem shames his muse ;
 The verses now he can't endure,
 Written on the taking of Namure ;
 He blots them out with hasty hand,
 And cries, "Your genius understand."

Boileau, at the express command of the God of Taste, was reconciled to Quinault, who may be considered as a poet, formed by the graces, as Boileau was by reason.

But Boileau, satirist severe,
 Whilst he embraced could scarce forbear,
 The lyric poet to revile,
 Yet Quinault pardoned with a smile.

"I'll never be reconciled to you," said Boileau, "except you acknowledge that there are many insipid lines in those agreeable operas." "That's very possible," answered Quinault, "but you must at the same time acknowledge that you were never capable of writing Atys or Armida."

Your poems labored and exact,
 May general esteem attract ;
 My operas composed with ease
 May surely be allowed to please.

After saluting Boileau, and tenderly embracing Quinault, I saw the inimitable Molière, and I made bold to accost him in these terms :

Terence the sage, and the polite,
 Could well translate, but could not write ;
 His elegance is cold and faint,
 He could not Roman manners paint :

You the great painter of our nation,
 Have drawn each character and station;
 Our cits with maggots in their brain,
 Our marquises as pert as vain,
 Our formal gentry of the law,
 All by your art their likeness saw;
 And you would have reformed each fault,
 If sense and virtue could be taught.

“Ah,” said he, “why was I ever under a necessity of writing for the people? Why was I not always master of my time? I should have invented much more happy intrigues; I should have seldom descended to low comedy.”

‘Twas thus these masters, in their several arts, showed their superiority, by owning those errors to which human nature is subject, and from which the greatest geniuses are not exempt.

I then found that the God of Taste is very hard to be pleased, but that he is never pleased by halves. I perceived that the works which he criticises the most are those which he likes best.

The God takes every author’s part
 Of pleasing, if he has the art:
 No anger he in censuring shows,
 With transport in applauding glows.
 The muse displayed her charms divine,
 And brought her heroes to his shrine;
 The power benign can scarce forbear,
 Seeing their faults to drop a tear.
 That wretch should be to woe consigned,
 Who’s not to tenderness inclined:

By such our nature is disgraced,
He flies the sacred shrine of taste.

When my company was going to retire, the God addressed them in terms to this effect, for I am not permitted to use his own words.

Farewell, my much loved friends, farewell,
Since you in poetry excel ;
Let not to Paris, dire disgrace,
My rival there possess my place.
False taste I know, from your keen eyes,
In terror and confusion flies ;
If ever you should meet that foe,
You'll him by this description know :
His tawdry dress, is void of grace,
His air's affected, and his face,
He forces oft a languid smile,
And talks in the true coxcomb's style ;
He takes my name, assumes my shape
Of genuine taste, the awkward ape ;
For he's the son of art at most,
Whilst nature as my fire I boast.

THE TEMPLE OF FRIENDSHIP.

---

SACRED to peace, within a wood's recess,
A blest retreat, where courtiers never press,
A temple stands, where art did never try
With pompous wonders to enchant the eye;
There are no dazzling ornaments, nor vain,
But truth, simplicity, and nature reign:
The virtuous Gauls raised erst the noble shrine,
And sacred vowed to Friendship's power divine.
Mistaken mortals who believed their race,
Would never cease to crowd to such a place!
Orestes' name, and Pylades' appear,
Wrote on the front, names still to Friendship dear:
Pirithous' medal of uncommon size,
Those of soft Nisus and Achates wise.
All these are heroes, and as friends renowned,
These names are great, but still in fable found:
The power to this remote retreat retired,
Nor Tripod boasts, nor priests with truth inspired;
She miracles but seldom can effect,
No popish saint e'er met with such neglect.
Still in her presence faithful truth attends,
And to the goddess needful succor lends:
Truth's ever ready to enlighten all,
But few on truth for kind assistance call.
In vain she waits for votaries at her shrine,
None come, though all at wanting her repine;

Her hand holds forth the register exact,
Of every generous, every friendly act ;
Favors in which esteem with friendship vied,
Received not meanly, not conferred with pride :
Such favors as those who confer forget,
And who receive, declare without regret.
This history of the virtues of mankind,
Within a narrow compass is confined ;
In Gothic characters all these are traced
Upon two sheets, by time almost defaced.
By what strange frenzy is mankind possessed,
Friendship is banished now from every breast ;
Yet all usurp of Friend the sacred name,
And vilest hypocrites bring in their claim.
All that they're faithful to her laws maintain,
And even her enemies her rights profane :
In regions subject to the pope's command,
Thus we see beads oft in an atheist's hand.
'Tis said the goddess, each pretended friend,
Once in her presence summoned to attend ;
She fixed the day on which they should be there,
A prize proposing for each faithful pair ;
Who with a tenderness like hers replete,
Amongst true friends might justly claim a seat ;
Then quickly came allured by such a prize,
The French who novelty still idolize :
A multitude before the temple came,
And first, two courtly friends preferred their claim,
By interest joined, they walked still hand in hand,
And of their union Friendship thought the band :
Post-haste a courier came and made report,
That there was then a vacancy at court ;

The Temple of Friendship.

Away each friend polite that moment flies,
Forsakes at once the temple and the prize;
Thus in a moment friends are turned to foes,
Each swears his rival warmly to oppose:
Four devotees next issue from the throng,
Poring on prayer-books as they pass along;
Their charity to mankind overflows,
And with religious zeal their bosom glows.
A pampered prelate one with fat o'ergrown,
Triple-chinned, much to apoplexy prone;
The swine quite gorged with tithes, and overfed,
At length by indigestion's force lies dead:
Quick the confessor clears the sinner's score,
His soles are greased, his body sprinkled o'er,
And spruced up by the curate of the place,
To go his heavenly journey with good grace;
His three friends o'er him merrily say prayers,
His benefice alone excites their cares:
Devoutly rivals grown, each still pretends
Attachment most sincere to both his friends;
Yet all in making interest at the court,
Their brothers downright Jansenists report.
Two youths of fashion next came arm in arm,
Their eyes and hearts, their mistress letters charm:
These as they passed along they read aloud,
And both displayed their persons to the crowd;
Some favorite airs they sing, while they advance
Up to the altar, just as to a dance:
They fight about some trifle, one is slain,
And Friendship's altar hence receives a stain;
The less mad of the two with conquest crowned,
Left his dear friend expiring on the ground.

Next Lisis, with her much loved Chloe came,
From infancy their pleasures were the same ;
Alike their humor, and alike their age,
Those trifles which the female heart engage ;
Lisis was prone to Chloe to impart,
They spoke the overflowings of the heart ;
At last one lover touched both female friends,
And strange to tell ! here all their Friendship ends ;
Lisis and Chloe Friendship's shrine forsake,
And the high road to Hatred's temple take.
The beauteous Zara shone forth in her turn,
With eyes that languish, whilst our hearts they burn :

"What languor," said she, "reigns in this abode !
By that sad goddess, say what joy's bestowed ?
Here dismal melancholy dwells alone,
For love's soft joys are ever here unknown."
Leaving the place, crowds followed her behind,
And struck with envy, twenty beauties pined :
Where next my Zara went, is known to none,
And Friendship's glorious prize could not be won :
The goddess everywhere so much admired,
So little known, and yet by all admired ;
With cold upon her sacred altar froze—
Hence hapless mortals, hence derive your woes.

THOUGHTS ON THE NEWTONIAN PHI-LOSOPHY, ADDRESSED TO THE MARCHIONESS DU CHÂTELET.

---

EMILIA, whose deep genius all admire,
You like a muse my laboring breast inspire ;
I wake at your command, I dream no more,
But virtue's laws and nature's paths explore.
Melpomene, the theatre I quit,
No more I idolize a crowded pit :
Let Rufus, son of earth, in hobbling verse,
To life's last verge a foolish thought express,
And aim at me the darts which he designed
To level at the rest of human kind.
Four times a month the Zoilus of the age,
May pour in fierce invective senseless rage ;
Their cries by hatred formed I will not hear,
Nor mind their tracks which in the dirt appear :
Divine philosophy's all powerful charms,
Fell envy of her darts with ease disarms ;
Wrapt in his heaven, great Newton scarcely knows
Amongst the sons of men that he has foes :
Of mine I think not, to my ravished eyes,
Truth shows how I may to that heaven rise ;
Those vortices which run so strange a race,
Heaped without order, moving without space.
Those learned visions pass like smoke away,
Motion's restored, I see a brighter day,

Space which contains the universal soul,
Sees in its bosom vast creation roll;
God speaks, and at His voice old Chaos flies,
All things towards a common centre rise;
The spring of nature, by dark ignorance night
Concealed, had long lain hid from mortal sight:
Newton the compass takes, he lifts the veil,
He makes truth's light o'er ignorance prevail:
With learned hand he to my eye displays
That star's bright robe which seasons rules and days;

The sparkling diamond's variegated dyes,
With gorgeous lustre dazzle human eyes;
Each ray's pure substance to spectators show
The various colors of fair Iris's Bow;
Blended, they light impart to mortal eyes,
They vivify the world, and fill the skies.
Ye ministering angels to the king of kings,
Ye burning seraphs, who with constant wings
Cover the Almighty Power's eternal throne
Of men, would you not envy him alone?
He rules the sea, I see the humid deep,
Time ever with attracting Cynthia keep;
Its efforts strong a central power restrains,
Ocean rolls back, and in its bed remains;
Comets which men as much as thunder fear,
To terrify the world at length forbear;
In an ellipse immense your wanderings end,
Rise near the star of day and near descend;
Your fiery tresses shake, returning strive,
Exhausted, drooping nature to revive.
Sister of Phœbus, star which in the skies,
Long time deceived the inquirer's erring eyes:

Newton has fixed the bounds of thy career,
Move on, and rule the day, the month and year :
Earth change thy form, and let thy masses weight,
Sinking the Pole the Equator elevate ;
Pole, which seem motionless to every eye,
The Bear, that frozen constellation, fly ;
And let your long protracted periods last,
Till numberless revolving years are past.
What noble objects these ! what high delights !
Feels the rapt soul filled with such glorious light !
The mind let loose from its corporeal chains,
A conversation with its God maintains.
How couldst thou say, whilst yet in tender youth,
Receive these treasures of eternal truth,
Shun pleasures which consume our youthful days,
And to such views sublime thy genius raise ;
With Newton tread paths ne'er trod before,
And nature's winding labyrinth explore ?
May I with you her temple penetrate,
And to all France these truths sublime relate ;
Whilst Algarotti, whose instructions please,
This stranger to the Tiber's shore conveys :
Let him with flowers adorn her beauteous face,
Compass in hand, her lineaments I'll trace :
With my rough pencil I'll express each line,
None can embellish beauty so divine.

ON THE DEATH OF ADRIENNE LECOUVREUR, A CELEBRATED ACTRESS.

---

WHAT sight of woe thus harrows up my soul!
Must those love-darting eyes in anguish roll?
Shall ghastly death such charms divine invade?
You muses, graces, loves come to her aid.
Oh! you my gods and hers assist the fair,
Your image sure must well deserve your care.
Alas! thou diest, I press thy corpse alone;
Thou diest, the fatal news too soon is known.
In such a loss, each tender feeling heart
Is touched like mine, and takes in grief a part.
I hear the arts on every side deplore
Their loss, and cry, "Melpomene's no more:"
What exclamations will the future race
Utter, at hearing of those arts' disgrace?
See cruel men a burying place refuse,
To her whom Greece had worshipped as a muse;
When living, they adored her power divine,
To her they bowed like votaries at a shrine:
Should she then, breathless, criminal be thought,
And is it then to charm the world a fault?
Seine's* banks should now no more be deemed profane,
Lecouvreur's sacred ashes there remain:
At this sad tomb, shrine sacred to thy shade,
Our vows are still as at a temple paid.

*She was buried on a bank of the Seine.

I don't revere the famed St. Denis more,
 Thy graces, charms, and wit, I there adore
 I loved them living, incense now I'll burn,
 And pay due honors to thy sacred urn.
 Though error and ingratitude are bent,
 To brand with infamy thy monument.
 Shall Frenchmen never know what they require,
 But damn capriciously what they admire?
 Must laws with manners jar? Must every mind
 In France, be made by superstition blind?
 Wherefore should England be the only clime,
 Where to think freely is not deemed a crime?
 Oh! London, Athens' rival, thou alone,
 Could tyrants, and could prejudice dethrone;
 In that blest region, general freedom reigns,
 Merit is honored, and reward obtains:
 Marlborough the greatest general of his age,
 Harmonious Dryden, Addison the sage,
 Immortal Newton, charming Oldfield there,
 The honors due to real genius share.
 The farce of life had there Lecouvreur closed
 With heroes, statesmen, kings she had reposed:
 Genius at London makes its owner great,
 Freedom and wealth have in that happy state,
 Procured the inhabitants immortal fame,
 They rival now the Greek and Roman name.
 Parnassian laurels wither in our fields,
 And France no more a crop of merit yields:
 Wherefore you gods do all our glories fade,
 Why is not honor due to genius paid?

TO THE KING OF PRUSSIA ON HIS ACCESSION TO THE THRONE.

---

AT LENGTH arrives the blest auspicious day,
Which sheds its kindest influence on thee ;
A day which fills thee only with dismay,
Whilst others wish thy exalted state to see.

Fly hence you fanatic, ye fraudulent bands,
Ye persecutors, who enslave the mind ;
Whose souls implacable and frantic hands,
Delight in carnage, and destruction find.

Shall odious calumny still lift her head ?
Monster thou didst, with cursed rage inspired,
On famed Descartes and Bayle thy venom shed,
On Wolfe who Leibnitz to approach aspired.

You from the sacred altar took a sword,
Whose point you turned against each far-famed sage ;
By the same weapon shall your breast be gored,
Your blood shall expiate your frantic rage.

He strikes, you die, his arm asserts truth's cause ;
Truth is restored, and error disappears ;
Philosophy is freed from tyrant laws,
The face of nature glorious freedom cheers.

To the King of Prussia.

And you, your odious rules, by Borgia taught,
The art in governing mankind to oppress ;
The art of crimes with vilest maxims fraught,
The art which tyrants openly profess.

May you to oblivion ever be consigned,
With too much ease men learn the dangerous art
The crafts of policy show a narrow mind.
The best of statesmen has a generous heart.

The annals of all nations amply show,
That tyrants never tasted sweet repose,
But suffer all their lives unceasing woe,
As they on others bring a load of woes.

They died with infamy, they died with rage,
But Trajan, Titus, Antoninus wise ;
The ornaments and blessings of their age
Lived blest, and calmly closed their dying eyes.

In thee those heroes shall again arise,
Virtue with happiness shall still be crowned ;
You may with justice claim fair virtue's prize,
Since in you every royal virtue's found.

Upon the throne we now behold a sage,
A blessing which men rarely can obtain ;
He who is able to instruct the age,
Is doubtless worthy o'er mankind to reign.

Presumptuous ignorance long has spurned the head
Of patient merit, which defenceless lay ;
The fury dared on sciences to tread.
And virtue's self was forced to bear her sway.

To the King of Prussia. 81

Immersed in soft delights, the courtly train
Think man was never born the truth to know;
All knowledge they despise as weak and vain,
Though science can content of mind bestow.

Dunces to truth can scarcely ope their eyes,
Their souls are wrapt in darkness black as night;
Behold a northern Solomon arise,
Approach barbarians to the source of light.

FROM LOVE TO FRIENDSHIP.

---

IF YOU would have me love once more,
The blissful age of love restore ;
From wine's free joys, and lovers' cares,
Relentless time, who no man spares,
Urges me quickly to retire,
And no more to such bliss aspire.
From such austerity exact,
Let's, if we can, some good extract ;
Whose way of thinking with his age
Suits not, can ne'er be deemed a sage.
Let sprightly youth its follies gay,
Its follies amiable display ;
Life to two moments is confined,
Let one to wisdom be consigned.
You sweet delusions of my mind,
Still to my ruling passion kind,
Which always brought a sure relief
To life's accurst companion, grief.
Will you forever from me fly,
And must I joyless, friendless die?
No mortal e'er resigns his breath
I see, without a double death ;
Who loves, and is beloved no more,
His hapless fate may well deplore ;
Life's loss may easily be borne,
Of love bereft man is forlorn.

'Twas thus those pleasures I lamented,
Which I so oft in youth repented ;
My soul replete with soft desire,
Vainly regretted youthful fire.
But friendship then, celestial maid,
From heaven descended to my aid ;
Less lively than the amorous flame,
Although her tenderness the same.
The charms of friendship I admired,
My soul was with new beauty fired ;
I then made one in friendship's train,
But destitute of love, complain.

THE WORLDLING.*

---

OTHERS may with regret complain
That 'tis not fair Astrea's reign,
That the famed golden age is o'er
That Saturn, Rhea rule no more:
Or, to speak in another style,
That Eden's groves no longer smile.
For my part, I thank Nature sage,
That she has placed me in this age:
Religionists may rail in vain;
I own, I like this age profane;
I love the pleasures of a court;
I love the arts of every sort;
Magnificence, fine buildings, strike me;
In this, each man of sense is like me.
I have, I own, a worldly mind,
That's pleased abundance here to find;
Abundance, mother of all arts,
Which with new wants new joys imparts
The treasures of the earth and main,
With all the creatures they contain:
These, luxury and pleasures raise;
This iron age brings happy days.
Needful superfluous things appear;
They have joined together either sphere.

* This poem was written in 1736. It is a piece of humor founded upon philosophy and the public good.

See how that fleet, with canvas wings,
From Texel, Bordeaux, London brings,
By happy commerce to our shores,
All Indus, and all Ganges stores ;
Whilst France, that pierced the Turkish lines,
Sultans make drunk with rich French wines.
Just at the time of Nature's birth,
Dark ignorance o'erspread the earth ;
None then in wealth surpassed the rest,
For naught the human race possessed.
Of clothes, their bodies then were bare,
They nothing had, and could not share :
Then too they sober were and sage,
Martialo* lived not in that age.
Eve, first formed by the hand divine,
Never so much as tasted wine.
Do you our ancestors admire,
Because they wore no rich attire ?
Ease was like wealth to them unknown,
Was't virtue ? ignorance alone.
Would any fool, had he a bed,
On the bare ground have laid his head ?
My fruit-eating first father, say,
In Eden how rolled time away ?
Did you work for the human race,
And clasp dame Eve with close embrace !
Own that your nails you could not pare,
And that you wore disordered hair,
That you were swarthy in complexion,
And that your amorous affection
Had very little better in't
Than downright animal instinct.

The Worldling.

Both weary of the marriage yoke
You supped each night beneath an oak
On millet, water, and on mast,
And having finished your repast,
On the ground you were forced to lie,
Exposed to the inclement sky:
Such in the state of simple nature
Is man, a helpless, wretched creature.
Would you know in this cursed age,
Against which zealots so much rage,
To what men blessed with taste attend
In cities, how their time they spend?
The arts that charm the human mind
All at his house a welcome find;
In building it, the architect
No grace passed over with neglect.
To adorn the rooms, at once combine
Poussin, Correggio the divine,
Their works on every panel placed
Are in rich golden frames incased.
His statues show Bouchardon's skill,
Plate of Germain, his sideboards fill.
The Gobelin tapestry, whose dye
Can with the painter's pencil vie,
With gayest coloring appear
As ornaments on every pier.
From the superb salon are seen
Gardens with Cyprian myrtle green.
I see the sporting waters rise
By jets d'eau almost to the skies.
But see the master's self approach
And mount into his gilded coach,

A house in motion, to the eyes
It seems as through the streets it flies.
I see him through transparent glasses
Loll at his ease as on he passes.
Two pliant and elastic springs
Carry him like a pair of wings.
At Bath, his polished skin inhales
Perfumes, sweet as Arabian gales.
Camargot at the approach of night
Julia, Gossin by turns invite.
Love kind and bounteous on him pours
Of choicest favors plenteous showers.
To the opera house he must repair,
Dance, song and music charm him there.
The painter's art to strike the sight,
Does there with that blest art unite ;
The yet more soft, persuasive skill,
Which can the soul with pleasure thrill.
He may to damn an opera go,
And yet perforce admire Rameau.
The cheerful supper next invites
To luxury's less refined delights.
How exquisite those sauces flavor !
Of those ragouts I like the savor.
The man who can in cookery shine,
May well be deemed a man divine.
Chloris and Ægle at each course
Serve me with wine, whose mighty force
Makes the cork from the bottle fly
Like lightning darting from the sky.
Bounce! to the ceiling it ascends,
And laughter the apartment rends.

The Worldling.

In this froth, just observers see
The emblem of French vivacity.
The following day new joys inspires,
It brings new pleasures and desires.
Mentor, Telemachus descant
Upon frugality, and vaunt
Your Ithaca and your Salentum
To ancient Greeks, since they content them :
Since Greeks in abstinence could find
Ample supplies of every kind.
The work, though not replete with fire,
I for its elegance admire :
But I'll be whipped Salentum through
If thither I my bliss pursue.
Garden of Eden, much renowned,
Since there the devil and fruit were found,
Huetius, Calmet, learned and bold,
Inquired where Eden lay of old :
I am not so critically nice,
Paris to me's a paradise.

ON CALUMNY.

---

SINCE beautiful 'twill be your fate
Emilia to incur much hate,
Almost one-half of human race
Will even curse you to your face ;
Possessed of Genius' noblest fire,
With fear you will each breast inspire ;
As you too easily confide
You'll often be betrayed, belied :
You ne'er of virtue made parade,
To hypocrites no court you've paid.
Therefore, of calumny beware,
Foe to the virtuous and the fair.
Expect from every fool at court
Those squibs thrown out in evil sport ;
Those jests which each on others makes,
And suffers freedoms which he takes.
The cursed licentiousness of tongue
From indolence and self-love sprung.
The monster of each sex appears,
Her prate the crowd attentive hears.
The scourge of man and man's delight
She o'er the world asserts her right.
Wit to the dullest she imparts,
The wise repel her from their hearts.
The fury, with malignant sneer,
Attacks mankind in every sphere.

But these three ranks she most devours,
 And on them all her venom pours :
 Wits, beauties, and the haughty great,
 All are the objects of her hate :
 When merit strikes the public eye,
 Against it, she her darts lets fly.
 Whoever genius has displayed
 Is ever satire's object made.
 Adorned with trinkets, full of airs,
 Young Ægle to the priest repairs :
 She goes to be consigned for life
 To one she never saw as wife ;
 The next day she's in triumph seen
 At court and ball, before the queen.
 And next by Paris ever kind
 A gallant's to the bride assigned.
 Roy in a ballad sings her fame,
 And the town echoes with her name.
 Ægle's incensed, her cries are vain :
 Ægle, excuse the poet's strain.
 Your case you'll bitterly deplore
 When men shall speak of you no more ;
 A beauty you can scarcely name
 Who never suffered in her fame.
 We find it in Bayle's learned page,
 Blessed Mary* could not escape its rage ;
 Lamponer's rage was unrestrained,
 And even her sacred name profaned.

*This calumny, cited by Bayle and the Abbé Houteville, is taken from an old Hebrew book, entitled "Joldos Jeseut," in which Jonathan is given to this sacred person as husband; and he who raises Jonathan's suspicions is called Joseph Panther.

Through all the nations of the world
Fierce satire has her vengeance hurled :
Has been to Jews and Christians known,
But she in Paris holds her throne.
A crowd of idlers every night,
Of idlers called the world polite,
Wandering about the town is seen,
Still followed by that fiend, the spleen.
There, jilted baggages abound,
And jades of quality are found ;
Who nothings like mere parrots say ;
Who ogle fools, and cheat at play.
Amongst them sparks we likewise find,
Who seem much more of womankind.
Their heads with trifles are well filled ;
In trifles they are deeply skilled.
With forward air, and voices pert,
They sing and dance, behave alert ;
And if some man with sense endued,
Should in their presence be so rude
To speak like one who books has read,
And show he wears a learned head,
With anger fired they on him fall,
He's persecuted by them all.
Envy, each drone to combat brings,
Against the bee they point their stings ;
Of ministers, and monarchs still,
Inferior mortals will speak ill ;
From Cæsar to our Louis down,
Name we one king of high renown,
From famed Mæcenas' days produce
A favorite who could escape abuse.

Colbert, who, vigilant and wise,
 Enriched us still with new supplies ;
 Who found means to replace the stores
 We lost by minions, priests, and whores :
 That worthy, to whose cares we owe
 A greatness we no longer know,
 Against him saw the state conspire ;
 Saw Frenchmen rage with furious ire,
 Disturb* his urn, insult his shade,
 To whom they once such honors paid.
 When Louis, who bravely could oppose
 Death's terrors, like his fiercest foes,
 At length, by the decree of fate,
 Was to St. Denis borne, in state.
 I saw his people prone to changing,
 Quite mad with wine and folly ranging,
 Follow the mighty monarch's horse,
 And curse him after death in verse.
 You've known a regent at the helm
 Turn upside down the Gallic realm :
 He for society was born
 Arts to promote and to adorn.
 Great without pride, replete with wit,
 Though loose, he could no crime commit ;
 And yet, most curst, most black of crimes !
 All France has seen atrocious rhymes
 Outrageously that prince defame
 And give him every odious name.
 Philippics† wrote in unchaste strain
 Scandalous chronicles remain ;

* A mob would have taken Colbert out of his grave at St. Eustache's Church.

† A libel in verse, written against Philip duke of Orleans, regent of the kingdom.

And will no Frenchman's generous rage
 Refute the vile, detested page?
 When any make a false report,
 All will conspire in its support:
 If truth's discovered in the end,
 All men are backward to defend.
 But will you from the great at court
 To objects turn of meaner sort?
 Leaving the court, all grandeur's centre,
 Into wit's temple let us enter;
 That shrine, which always I admired,
 To whose view Bardus self aspired,
 Where Damis never could repair
 Let's enter, see curst envy there,
 Daughter of verse, to verse a foe,
 Who drawing emulation's bow,
 Can pride inflame and rage excite
 Amongst fools who for glory write.
 See how they're bent to fight till death,
 All to secure fame's idle breath;
 Upon their rivals they let fall
 The blackest and the bitterest gall:
 Jansenist eager to devour
 Molinist could not blacker pour.
 The casuist Doucin n'er so well
 Bedaubed famed Pasquier Quesnel.
 The old rhymer, whom all men despise,
 Organe, impure, of many lies,
 That wretch, who all the town offends,
 Who punished often, never mends;
 That Rufus* who your fire befriended,
 And from the attacks of want defended,

* Rousseau.

On Calumny.

Whose serpent sting soon after bored
The bosom that had life restored ;
The wicked Rufus, who in court
Made against innocence report ;
Who would have hid had he been wise,
His guilt and shame from mortal eyes,
We see at Brusseis Marshes strive
The flame of discord to revive :
He strives on me to throw the shame
Which must forever brand his name.
What will that satire then avail,
With which he dares the world assail,
Pieces in French and German wrote,
Wherein he apes the old Marot,
In which his vices all are seen,
So dull they almost give the spleen.
What great effect then do we see
From all those heaps of calumny ?
Subjected to all mortals' hate,
He to his poisons owes his fate.
Let us not fear the slanderer's strain ;
Boileau lashed famed Quinault in vain,
Quinault, whose beauties charmed his age,
Laughs at, whilst he forgives his rage.
I, whom a cursed cad would blast,
And foul aspersions on me cast,
In spite of bigots live at ease,
Both court and town my verses please.
From all this what shall we conclude ?
Ye French, censorious, though not rude,
Severe, although polite and kind,
Amongst you must we ever find

Things which so very ill agree
As graces and severity?
You, who the sex, in charms excel,
You know this dangerous people well;
With them we live amidst our foes,
Boldly their malice sly oppose.
Amidst them all your charms display,
Discreetly follow your own way,
Follow your innate virtues lore,
And slanderers then shall prate no more.

THE KING OF PRUSSIA TO M. VOLTAIRE.

---

If all histories were written like that which you sent me, we would be better acquainted with the manners of all ages, and less imposed upon by historians. The longer I know you, the more I admire your abilities. No style can, in my opinion, be finer than that in which the "History of Louis XIV." is written. I read every paragraph three or four times over, to such a degree do I admire it: every sentence is striking, it everywhere abounds with admirable reflections: there is not a false thought in it, there is nothing in it any way puerile, and its impartiality is unexceptionable. When I have read the work through, I shall send you a few remarks on it, amongst the rest, on the German names which you have a little disfigured, this might render the work somewhat obscure, as some of them are so disguised that we are puzzled to guess at them.

I wish every work capable of conveying instruction, was to come from your pen. We should then be sure of being improved by the books we read.

I sometimes am vexed at the puerilities, the trivial remarks, and the dry style of certain books. These things readers are often obliged to digest. You spare your readers that trouble. Let a man have judgment or not, he is equally improved by your works: he has no occasion for anything but memory. Pray, my dear friend, tell me how you pass your time at Cirey, 'tis a retreat which I envy you.

THE ANSWER.

You ask me, and I'll tell in rhyme,
How we at Cirey pass our time :
What need I to you this relate,
Our master, you we imitate :
From you we've learned the wisest rules,
Taught in famed Epicurus' schools.
We here all sacrifice like you,
To every art and nature too.
And yet we but at distance follow
Your steps, though guided by Apollo.
Thus when the brilliant god of day
Casts from heaven's height a shining ray,
Upon some chamber dark as night,
Of those blest rays the shining light,
The chambers deep obscure pervades
And dissipate the gloomy shades,
Then the spectators cast their eyes on
A miniature of the horizon.
Such a comparison may show
That some philosophy I know,
That I've read Newton and Kirkherus,
Authors both learned, profound and serious.
Perhaps my muse this tone assuming,
May be by many thought presuming ;
Perhaps I spoil at the same time
As well philosophy as rhyme,

But novelties have charms for me
From laws poetic I'd be free ;
Let others in their lyric lays
Say the same thing a thousand ways,
The world with ancient fables tire,
I new and striking truths admire.
Ye deities adored by swains,
Naiad and nymphs that trip the plains,
Satyrs to dancing still inclined,
Ye boys called Cupids by mankind,
Who whilst our meadows bloom in spring,
Inspire men love's soft joys to sing,
Assist a poet with your skill,
The charms 'twixt sense and rhyme to fill.
The enchanting pleasures well I know
Which from harmonious numbers flow ;
The ear's a passage to the heart,
Sound can to thought new charms impart ;
But geniuses I must prefer
Though even nobly wild they err,
To pedants whose exact discourse
Is void of genius as of force.
Gardens where symmetry's displayed,
Trees which in rows yield equal shade,
Who thus arranged you on the plain
May boast his art and skill in vain :
Gardens from you I must retire,
Too much of art I can't admire.
The spacious forest suits my mind,
Where nature wanders unconfined,
Its shades with awe spectators fill,
They baffle all the artist's skill.

But in my free and artless strain,
Nature I imitate in vain,
Though wild, I can't like nature please,
I can't boast charming nature's ease.
This rhapsody, great prince, excuse,
'Tis but the folly of my muse,
Reason had o'er me lost her sway,
When I composed this hurried lay,
Judgment was from my breast expelled,
For fair Emilia I beheld.

ON THE ENGLISH GENIUS.

---

TO AN ENGLISH FRIEND WHO HAD COMPARED VOL-TAIRE TO THE SUN.

THE glow of genius is old England's sun,
Inspiring love of glory and her race,
And pride in freedom which her people won
These, more than all the Arts, her 'scutcheon grace.
The sacred fire which rash Prometheus stole
Illumes not climates, but the mind's flame feeds ;
The north winds chill not the true Briton's soul,
Nor quench the sparks that shine in mighty deeds.
This love of country gives the ardent thrill
In sober statesman—speech and pulpit plea,
That fires the patriot heart with steadfast will
To make its country great and keep it free.

WHAT PLEASES THE LADIES.

---

Now that the brilliant God of Day
Burns Afric' up with forcing ray,
Now that the tropic in a sphere
Oblique contracts his bright 'career ;
Whilst slowly lags each winter's night,
My friends, this story may delight.
'Tis of a knight, as poor as bold,
The adventure's worthy to be told.
'Tis Sir John Robert that I sing,
He lived when Dagobert was king.
A trip to holy Rome he made,
Less splendid when the Cæsars swayed ;
From that famed capital he brought
Not laurels plucked in fields well fought,
Of dispensations, pardons, store,
Indulgences he plenty bore ;
Of money little had he ; then
Knights errant were poor gentlemen,
Then, to the Church's sons alone
Were affluence and riches known.
A suit of armor, which, with rust,
Revolving years must needs incrust,
An ambling steed, a dog was all,
Robert his property could call ;
But what's more precious he possessed,
With youth's bright gifts our knight was blessed ;

Alcides' strength, Adonis' grace,
Gifts prized in every age and place.
Robert, near Paris, chanced to ride
By a wood, on Charenton's side;
Marton he saw, the blithe and fair,
A ribbon tied her flaxen hair:
Her shape was easy, dress so light,
Her leg it hid not from the sight.
Soon Robert's eyes such charms explored
As even saints might have adored;
The lily, with the blushing rose,
Combine a nosegay to compose,
Whose variegated hues are seen
Two panting globes of snow between;
Which never fail loves flame to raise
In all who on their beauties gaze;
Whilst her complexion's charms divine
The lustre of the flowers outshine.
To tell what was not told before,
A basket this fair creature bore,
And with attractions various graced
Made to the neighboring market haste
Of eggs and butter to dispose,
Which all her little stock compose.
Robert, who felt the amorous flame,
Leaped forward and embraced the dame;
"I've twenty crowns, my dear," he cried,
"Take them, and take my heart beside,
Take all I have, and take the donor."
Said Marton, "Sir, 'tis too much honor."
But Robert still so briskly plied her,
That down she fell, he fell beside her,

And, oh disaster dire to tell!
He broke her eggs as down he fell.
His courser started at the sight,
To the next thicket took his flight.
An honest monk, as people say,
Happened, just then, to pass that way,
The steed his monkship quickly strides,
And, post-haste, to his convent rides;
Her cap, which was become a fright,
Marton's first care, was to set right.
To Robert turning then she said,
"My twenty crowns where are they fled?"
The knight, in hesitating strain,
Seeking his purse and steed in vain,
Excuses offered, all were lame,
For no excuse would serve the dame.
Being thus injured, straight she went
To tell the king her discontent:
"A knight has robbed me, Sire," she said,
"And ravished too, but never paid."
Wisely the king replied, "'Tis clear
A rape is what has brought you here:
Before Queen Bertha plead your cause,
In these points well she kens the laws;
She'll hear attentive what you say,
And judgment pass without delay."
Marton, with reverence bowed the head,
And to the queen her way she sped.
The queen was quite humane and mild,
Looked on each subject as a child;
But she was still severely bent
To punish the incontinent:

Of prudes her council she assembled,
The knight uncapped before them trembled ;
With downcast eyes ne'er dared to stir,
He then had neither boot nor spur ;
The court by no chicane delayed,
But ample full confession made ;
That taking by Charonne his way
He was by Satan led astray ;
That he repented of his crime,
Would ne'er offend a second time :
But that the first might prove the last.
Sentence of death was on him passed.
Robert had so much youthful grace,
So fine his person, fair his face,
That Bertha and assessors all
Awarding sentence, tears let fall.
Pangs of remorse sad Marton felt,
And every heart began to melt :
Berthe to the court then made it plain,
That the knight pardon might obtain,
And that if ready witted, he Might from all punishment be free ;
Since by the laws established there,
Who tells what pleases all the fair,
Has to his pardon a just claim,
Acquitted by each virtuous dame ;
But then he must the thing explain
Completely, or his hopes are vain.
What thus had been in council started
Quickly to Robert was imparted.
The good Queen Bertha bent to save him,
Eight days to think upon it gave him ;

He swore in eight days he'd appear,
And strive to make the matter clear ;
Then for this favor unexpected,
Thanked Bertha, and went out dejected.
Then thus the matter he debated
Thus he his difficulty stated ;
How can I in plain terms declare
What 'tis that pleases all the fair,
And not her majesty offend?
She mars what she proposed to mend.
Since to be hanged must be my lot,
Would I'd been hanged upon the spot.
Robert, whene'er in road or street,
He chanced a wife or maid to meet,
Her he in urgent manner pressed
To say what 'twas she loved the best.
All gave evasive answers, none
The real truth would fairly own.
Robert, despairing e'er to hit,
Wished him in hell's profoundest pit.
Seven times the star that rules the year
Had gilded o'er the hemisphere,
When under a refreshing shade,
Which trees with winding boughs had made,
He saw a score of beauties bright,
Who danced in circling mazes light ;
Of their rich robes the wavy pride
Their secret beauties scarce could hide.
Soft Zephyr sporting near the fair,
Played in the ringlets of their hair ;
On the green turf they lightly danced,
Their feet scarce on its surface glanced.

Robert draws nigh, in hopes to find
Ease from perplexity of mind.
Just then all vanished from his sight,
Scarcely had day given place to night;
A toothless hag then met his eyes,
Sooty in hue and short of size,
Bent double, and with age oppressed,
She leaned upon a stick for rest.
Her nose, prodigious, long, and thin,
Extended till it met her chin;
Her eyes with rheum were galled and red,
A few white hairs her pate o'erspread;
A scrap of tapestry was her gown,
It o'er her wrinkled thigh hung down.
At such an odd and uncouth sight,
A sort of terror seized our knight.
The beldame, with familiar tone,
Accosts him thus: "I see, my son,
By your dejected, thoughtful air
Your heart feels some corroding care:
Relate to me your secret grief:
(To talk of woes gives some relief)
Although your case be e'er so bad,
Some consolation may be had.
I've long beheld this earthly stage,
And wisdom must increase with age.
The most unhappy oft have sped
To bliss by my directions led."
"Alas!" replied the knight, "in vain
I've sought instruction to obtain:
The fatal hour is drawing nigh,
I must upon a gibbet die!

Unless I can the queen tell right
What 'tis gives women most delight."
"Courage, my son," the dame replied,
" 'Tis God has to me been your guide,
'Tis for your good ; then straight to court,
Boldly proceed and make report.
Let's go together, I'll unfold
The secret which must there be told ;
But swear that for the life you owe,
Becoming gratitude you'll show ;
That from you I shall have with ease
What never fails our sex to please.
An oath then from you I require
That you'll do all that I desire."
Robert, who scrupled not to swear,
From laughter could not well forbear.
"Be serious," cried the ancient dame.
"To laugh shows want of grace and shame ;"
Then moving onward, hand in hand,
Before Queen Bertha now they stand.
The council met without delay,
Robert, asked what he had to say,
Cried, "Ladies, now your secret's out,
What you love most admits no doubt :
What, at all seasons, can content ye,
Is not of lovers to have plenty ;
But woman, of whate'er degree,
Whate'er her qualities may be,
Desires to bear both night and day
O'er all about her sovereign sway :
Woman would always fain command,
If I lie, hang me out of hand."

Whilst thus harangued our doughty spark,
All present said he hit the mark.
The queen's hand Robert kissed when cleared ;
Then straight a haggard form appeared,
The hag of whom we spoke before,
With rags and dirt all covered o'er,
Crying out, "Justice," forward pressed,
And in these terms the queen addressed :
"Oh lovely queen, thy sex's pride,
Who always justly doth decide,
To whom fair equity is known,
Whilst mercy dwells beside thy throne ;
By me this knight your secret knew,
The life I saved to me is due :
He swore, nor should the oath prove vain,
That I should what I wished obtain ;
Upon your justice I rely,
And hope you won't my right deny."
Says Robert, "I deny it not,
I never a good turn forgot ;
But, bate my armor, all I had
Was baggage, twenty crowns, and pad.
A monk, when Marton I caressed,
With pure religious zeal possessed,
As lawful prize seized on the whole,
For 'twere a sin to say he stole.
Though honest, since I'm broke outright,
I can't this friendly turn requite."
The queen replied, "What you have lost
Shall be repaid to friar's cost ;
All parties shall be satisfied :
In three your fortune we'll divide ;

For her lost eggs and chastity,
The twenty crowns shall Marton's be ;
The steed I to this dame consign,
The armor, Robert, shall be thine."
"Most generously you've decreed,"
Said madam, "but I want no steed ;
'Tis Robert's person I desire,
His grace and valor I admire :
I o'er his amorous heart would reign,
That's all the prize I wish to gain ;
Robert with me must pass his life,
This day must take me for a wife."
Her purpose being thus declared,
Robert stood motionless, and stared :
Then o'er her rags and figure strange,
His rolling eyes began to range ;
With horror struck, he back retreated,
Crossing himself, these words repeated :
"Why should this ridicule and shame
With foul dishonor blast my name ?
With the de'il's dam I'd rather wed
Than to that beldame go to bed ;
The hag must doubtless be run mad,
Or else she dotes, and that's as bad."
The hag then tenderly replied,
"My person, queen, he can't abide ;
He's like the whole ungrateful crew
Of males, but soon I'll bring him too ;
I feel love's flame so brightly burn,
He needs must love me in his turn.
The heart does all, I can't but say
My charms begin to fade away ;

But I'll more tender prove and kind;
'Tis best to cultivate the mind.
We find e'en Solomon declare
The wise by far exceed the fair.
I'm poor, is that so hard a case?
Sure poverty is no disgrace.
Can't one enjoy content of mind,
Except on ivory bed reclined?
Madam, in all this regal pride,
When you lie by our monarch's side,
Do you enjoy more kindly rest?
Does love sincerer warm your breast?
You've read of old Philemon's flame
For Baucis, though an ancient dame.
Those jealousies by old age bred,
Dwell not beneath the rustic shed;
Vice flies where luxury is unknown,
We equal kings, serve God alone;
Your country's glory we support,
We furnish soldiers for the court:
In rendering populous the state,
The poor by much outdo the great.
If heaven should to my chaste desire
Refuse the offspring I require,
Love's flowers without its fruits can please,
Upon love's tree those flowers I'll seize."
While thus the ancient dame descanted,
All the court ladies were enchanted.
Robert was to her arms consigned,
Disgust was vain, for oaths must bind;
The dame insisted on her right
Of riding with her much loved knight

To her thatched hut, where wedlock's bands
Were to unite their hearts and hands.
Robert his steed begins to stride,
With sorrow takes his future bride ;
With horror seized, and red with shame,
He often strove to throw the dame,
Or drown her, but was by the law
Of chivalry still kept in awe.
The lady with her knight delighted
To him her race's deeds recited,
How the great Clovis' royal sword
The bosoms of three monarchs gored,
Who were his friends, yet could obtain
Pardon and heaven's high favor gain.
From heaven she saw the famed dove bring
To Remi, that illustrious king,
The flask and oil so highly prized,
Which he was smeared with when baptized.
With all her narratives she blended
Thoughts and reflections well intended,
Sallies of wit, remarks refined,
Which, without calling off the mind,
Attention in who heard excited,
And both instructed and delighted.
Still does our knight with eager ears
Devour the stories that he hears ;
Charmed when he heard his wife, but when
He saw, the unhappiest of men.
At length the ill-matched couple came
To the thatched cabin of the dame ;
Preparing things with eager haste,
The table for her spouse she placed ;

Such fare might suit with Saturn's age,
'Tis now but talked of by the sage.
Three sticks support two rotten boards,
Such table that poor hut affords ;
At this our couple sat at meat,
Each oddly placed on narrow seat ;
The husband sadly hung his head,
The bride a thousand gay things said ;
Wit she combined with graceful ease,
Uttered bons mots which pique and please,
So natural that to those who hear,
Said by themselves they must appear.
So pleased was Robert, that a smile
Escaped him, and he thought a while
His wife less ugly than before,
But she would fain, the supper o'er,
Have her spouse go with her to bed ;
He raves, he wishes to be dead :
He yields, though not with a good grace,
Since without remedy his case.
Foul clothes our knight but little matters,
Quite gnawed by rats and torn to tatters,
On pieces of old wood extended,
And frequently with packthread mended ;
All this the knight could have digested,
But Hymen's rites he quite detested.
Of these, indeed, he much complained ;
"Good heaven," cried he, "is't so ordained !
At Rome, 'tis said, grace from on high
Can both the power and will supply ;
But grace does for the present fail,
And I for my part am but frail ;

My wife can by her wit impart
Delight, she has a feeling heart ;
But when with sense there's conflict dire,
Can heart or head true joy inspire?"
Our knight benumbed like ice, this said,
Threw himself flat upon his bed ;
And, to conceal his anguish, tries
To feign asleep, sleep from him flies.
The beldame, pinching Robert, cried,
"Do you then slumber by your bride?
Dear but ungrateful spouse, you see
I am subdued, now yield to me ;
The timid voice of struggling shame
Is stifled by my amorous flame ;
Reign o'er my sense without control,
Since you reign powerful o'er my soul ;
I die! just heaven say to what end
With virtue must our love contend?
I'm quite dissolved in love's bright flame,
Pleasure thrills through my vital frame ;
Must I, alas! without thee die?
'Tis to thy conscience I apply."
Our knight was complaisant and kind,
Religion, candor, graced his mind ;
He took compassion on the dame ;
"Madam," said he, "I wish my flame
Like yours, might strong and brightly shine,
'The power to effect it is not mine."
"You can effect it," said his wife,
"A great heart, at your stage of life,
By fortitude, by art, and care,
Performs with ease achievements rare :

Think how the ladies will approve
At court this miracle of love.
Perhaps I your disgust excite,
Wrinkles are shocking to your sight ;
Heroes magnanimous despise
Such trifles, only shut your eyes.”
Our knight of glory fond would fain
This conquest of himself obtain ;
Obedience then became his choice,
Listening alone to honor’s voice,
Finding in vigorous youth alone
What could for beauty’s want atone,
And love’s supply, he shuts his eyes,
And, to perform his duty, tries.
“Enough, enough,” then said the bride,
“I ask no more ; I’m satisfied ;
My influence o’er your heart I know,
That influence to me you owe ;
Acknowledge then, as matters stand,
The wife will still at home command.
Robert, all that I ask of thee
Is to be always ruled by me ;
My love enjoins an easy task,
Now view me well, ’tis all I ask.”
Then Robert looks, and sees in clusters
A hundred flambeaux placed on lustres,
In a proud palace, which he saw
Before a cabin thatched with straw.
There underneath rich curtains graced
With fringe of pearls in highest taste.

A beauty bright appeared to view,
Such as Apelles never drew ;
E'en Vanloo's colors would prove faint,
That heaven of charms divine, to paint ;
No Phidias nor no Pigall e'er
Could carve a busto of the fair.
Her form like lovely Venus showed,
Whose golden tresses graceful flowed,
Whose melting eyes appeared to languish,
Whilst soothing Mars's amorous anguish,
"Myself," she said, "this palace, all
This wealth, your own, dear Robert, call :
You did not ugliness despise,
You therefore merit beauty's prize."
But now, methinks, my readers claim
To know what was this fair one's name,
Whose heart our knight had won ; why then
'Twas fairy Urgelle, gentlemen,
Who, warriors, in her time, caressed,
And knights assisted when distressed.
Happy the age ! thrice blessed mankind,
When tales like these belief could find,
Of spirits hovering in the air,
Of demons who make men their care !
In castle close by roasting fire,
The daughter, mother, husband, sire,
The neighborhood and all the race,
Attended with a wondering face,
Whilst, by the almoner, were told
Deeds done by sorcerers of old.

We of the marvellous are rifled,
By reason's weight, the graces stifled,
Have to the insipid men consigned
The soul by reasoning is confined ;
Still hunting after truth we go ;
From error too some good may flow.

THE EDUCATION OF A PRINCE.

---

SINCE the bright God of Day, in the course of his race,

In Aquarius resides with a sorrowful face,
Since tempests so loudly on our high mountains blow,

And our meadows are all covered over with snow,
By the fire I'll a new story tell in new style,
Amusements the time that hangs heavy beguile.
I am old, I must own it, and will therefore descend
To the pleasures of children, since near my life's end.
A prince erst reigned at Beneventum, 'tis said,
Quite mad with his power, and in luxury bred,
To knowledge a stranger, and not ill-educated,
By his neighbors despised, by his own subjects hated.
This small state to govern two arch-knaves combined,

They exerted themselves their young master to blind ;

In this project they were by his confessor aided.
They by turns succeeded, he by all was persuaded
That his talents, his virtues, and his great reputation,
Could insure perfect bliss to the mightiest nation :
That when once their duke had to manhood attained,
He was dreaded and loved, and in all men's hearts reigned :

That his arms could both France and Italia confound ;

That with wealth his exchequer would ever abound ;

That Solomon ne'er had so much wealth of old,

Though the torrent of Kedron o'er golden sands rolled.

Alamon—for by that name this prince we must call—

Still was dupe to gross flatteries, for he swallowed them all,

With pastimes delighted, court buffoons he caressed,

And when he had dined thought his people were blessed.

One valiant old general at court still remained,

Ernon, greatly esteemed when the duke's father reigned,

Who not being bribed spoke his mind uncontrolled,
And undaunted, the government's ruin foretold.

To jealousy roused, those who bore supreme sway
Soon found means to remove Ernon out of the way ;

Unknown to the prince he to exile was sent,

But there at a farm the old man lived content ;

There with friends he lived happy, resigned to his fate,

And he wept for his master as well as the state ;

Whilst with sloth and with pleasure the young duke content,

On the down of soft ease both his days and nights spent.

The murmurs by which oft his subjects expressed

Discontent, would however sometimes break his rest,

But that distant din, which he hardly could hear,

Grows weak in its course, and scarce beats on his ear ;

Whilst with woe overloaded men groaned through the realm,

Alamon led a languishing life at the helm.

Then was tyranny's triumph, but the heavens took his part,

And to work reformation with love touched his heart.

Young Amida he saw, he both saw her and heard,

His heart felt emotion, and to live he appeared ;

He was handsome, and might with assurance address her,

But the mystery soon was smoked by his confessor ;

In his penitent's breast straight he scruples excited,

Superstition and ignorance are easily frightened :

And the two wicked rulers who feared lest the lover

Might one day their sinister proceedings discover,

Were for making Amida like Ernon depart :

Her all to pack up she prepared with sad heart.

The weak Alamon all this insolence bore,

His reluctance was vain, from his charmer he tore.

He doubted and wavered, for just in that season

His soul was but faintly illumined by reason.

When Amida was going there were heard loud alarms,

The cry was, "All's lost, let us die and to arms,"

On Allah, St. Germain, Christ, and Mahomet loud,

They called, and on every side fled a crowd :

A warrior turbaned, who led on a band

Of Mussulmans holding their falchions in hand,

Over heaps of the dead, or expiring, who lay

All reeking in gore, with his sword cut a way,

With sword and with fire to the palace he flew,

The women he seized on, their husbands he slew.

From Cuma this general marched to Beneventum,
But the rulers ne'er dreamed he would thus circum-
vent them ;
Desolation and ruin up to Rome's walls he spread,
And St. Paul and St. Peter were both seized with dread.
My dear readers, this chief was Abdallah the Proud,
Who, by God, to chastise his own church was allowed.
When the palace he entered, in chains all were cast,
Prince, monks, lackeys, ministers, and chiefs were made fast,
As calves tied in couples upon sledges are laid,
And to the next market sad victims conveyed.
Thus appeared the young duke and each worthy assessor,
All laid by the heels with the father confessor,
Who crossed himself often, and with fervency prayed,
And preached resolution, though sorely dismayed.
The victors then shared when the vanquished were tied,
The booty the emirs in three parts divide ;
Of men, and of horses, and saints they dispose,
And first from their captives they strip off their clothes.
In all ages have tailors disguised human nature,
So that man to man always was a most unknown creature.
Dress changes men's figures and their characters too,
To judge of man rightly we should naked him view.

The Mussulman chief had the duke, at that time,
As already was said, he was in his youth's prime ;
Since he seemed to be strong, muleteer he was made,
And soon he was highly improved by that trade.
His nerves, which by sloth and by ease weak were grown,

Inured to hard labor, acquired a new tone ;
His sloth, by adversity taught, he subdued,
And valor in him sprung from mean servitude.
Valor, when without power, makes the state of man
worse,

His impotence then is the heavier curse.
Abdallah to pleasure began to resign
His soul, and in spite of his prophet drank wine.
The court and townladies, all prone to adore him,
Were by the black eunuch each night brought before him ;

By beauties attended he prepares for repose,
And she's happy to whom he the handkerchief throws.

Whilst the chief led a life of unceasing delight,
Whilst joy winged each hour, and love triumphed
at night,

In the stable much hardship and woe the prince bore,
Those his comrades were now who were subjects before.

His mules all his care and attention required,
He combed them each day till his hands were quite tired.

His woe to complete, and to make him quite rave,
He beheld fair Amida led by the black slave

To share, in her turn, the fell conqueror's bed :
Fired with rage at the sight, to the eunuch he said,
"To make me quite wretched, there but wanted this stroke."

Wonder seized on the slave at the words which he spoke ;

In a language quite different, fair Amida replied,
With affection and sorrow her young lover she eyed ;
Her eloquent looks her full meaning express,
They meant, "Bear your woes, live my wrongs to redress ;

Your present mean station I do not despise,"
Your sufferings give you new worth in my eyes.
Alamon took the meaning which her looks thus expressed,

And heart-cheering hope was revived in his breast.
Amida with beauty transcendently bright,
So dazzled the chief of the Mussulmans' sight,
That, transported with passion, by Allah he swore,
He enjoyment had known, but ne'er knew love before.

The fair one resisted to increase his desires,
Resistance served only to fan the chief's fires.
A woman's head still with invention is fraught.
Said she, "Sir, your conquest I well may be thought ;
You're unconquered in love as in warlike alarms,
All fall at your feet, or rush into your arms ;
But the honor you mean me defer for three days,
And grant, to console me for such sad delays,
Two things, which as proofs of your love, I require :"
"I'll grant," said the pirate, "whate'er you desire."

"Then make three Beneventers," said she, "undergo
A couple of hundred sound lashes, or so ;
This discipline for their transgressions is due ;
This, Sir's, the first favor I hope for from you.
The second, Sir, is, that you two mules would spare
me,

Which may on a litter from time to time bear me ;
And to drive them a muleteer of my own choosing ;"
"Your requests," said Abdallah, "there is no refusing."

'Twas done soon as said, and the hypocrite vile
With both courtiers who joined their lord's youth to beguile,

Received each their full quota, which pleased all of the nation,

Who had often complained of maladministration,
And the duke was the happiest mortal alive,
Since permitted his mistress in litter to drive.

"All's not over," said Amida, "you must conquer and reign,

Now's the time, or to die, or your crown to regain ;
You're not wanting in courage, Ernon's faithful, and I

Am resolved to serve you and my country, or die.
Then make no delay, but to Ernon repair,
To ask pardon for all he has suffered take care ;
To serve you what remains of his life he'll expose,
Return in three days, and then fall on your foes ;
There's no time to be lost, for Abdallah is bent
To accomplish in three days his lustful intent.
In love and in war, time is precious, you know."
Alamon with alacrity answered, "I go."

Ernon, whom Amida had informed of all,
Loved his prince, though ungrateful, and lamented
his fall;

His generous, brave friends all stood ready at hand,
And of soldiers he headed a most resolute band.

Ernon tenderly wept when his prince he had found,
They armed in secret, marched in silence profound.
Amida addressed them, and her words could impart
The love of true glory to each abject slave's heart,
Alamon could both conduct and courage unite,
And a hero became when he first went to fight.

The Turk plunged in luxury, who nothing mis-trusted,
Surprised by the vanquished, in his turn was worsted.

Alamon to the palace had in triumph advanced
At the time when the Turk by soft pleasure entranced,

Not having yet heard the dire turn of his fate,
Was with hopes of enjoying fair Amida elate.

His right he asserted, and took the Turk's place;
Then straight there appeared with a confident face,
The priest in whose air there appeared much resign-
ment,

And the two knavish courtiers just broke from confinement;

Boasting that they did all, though their boasts were quite vain,

The influence they once had they hoped to maintain.
To prove cruel and spiteful cowards but seldom have failed,

The monk was for having Abdallah empaled.

The prince then replied with a resolute tone, “Vile wretch, such a punishment should be your own;

By a shameful repose you to ruin had brought me,
This Turk and my mistress true courage have taught
me;

By your precepts misguided, false zeal I adored,
But misfortunes and love have my virtues restored.
At peace, brave Abdallah, and in freedom depart.
'Tis you have reformed both my mind and my heart :
Then in freedom depart, no more trouble this state.
And if ever it should be so ordered by fate,
That o'er your dominions three knaves should bear sway,

Send directly for me, I'll your favor repay.”

THE EDUCATION OF A DAUGHTER.

---

WINTER still lasts, my friends, and my greatest delight
Is by telling long stories to amuse you at night.
Let us talk of dame Gertrude, I ne'er yet knew a prude
With charms more attractive or more various en-
dued ;
Though thirty-six years had passed over her head,
The graces and loves were not yet from her fled.
Though grave in behavior, she was ne'er seen to frown,
Her eyes had much lustre, yet she ever looked down ;
Her breast white as snow was with gauze covered o'er,
Through which curious eyes could its beauties explore.
A few touches of art, and a little red lead,
Gave a delicate glow to her natural red :
Her person neglecting more brightly she shone,
Her dress struck the eye by its neatness alone.
On her toilet a Bible was always displayed,
And near Massillon was a pot of paint laid ;
The devotions for Lent she still read o'er and o'er,
But what made zeal in her respected the more,
Was that she in woman excused each rash action,
For Gertrude the devout was no friend of detrac-tion.

This dame had one daughter alone, seventeen
Was her age ; a more bright beauty never was seen ;
Of this lovely creature Isabel was the name,
More fair than her mother, but her beauty the same.
They appeared like Minerva and like Venus the fair,
To breed up her daughter was Gertrude's chief care.
Like a flower newly blown she her child kept a stranger

To this wicked world's contagion and danger.
Cards, public diversions, and gay conversation
To each innocent soul direful baits of temptation,
The true snares of Satan which the saints ever fly,
Were pleasures which Gertrude's house ne'er durst come nigh.

Gertrude had a chapel whereto to repair,
When minded to heaven to put up a prayer ;
There her leisure she oft passed in good meditations,
And her soul breathed to heaven in ejaculations.
Resplendent with richest of furniture shone
This retreat, to the eye of the public unknown :
A pair of stairs where the profane ne'er durst tread,
To the garden and from it into the street led.
You all know that in summer the sun's scorching ray

Makes night oft more agreeable far than the day ;
By the moon's silver light then the heavens are o'er-spread,
And girls take no pleasure to slumber in bed.
Isabel, whilst with pleasing pain throbb'd her soft
breast,

(As girls at seventeen can't be always at rest)

Passed the night under shelter of some cooling shade,

Yet scarce ever thought for what use it was made
Unmoved she saw nature, and never admired,
But rose, went and came, just as caprice inspired ;
No object impression could make on her mind,
She knew not how to think, yet to think was inclined.
At the chapel she chanced to hear one day some stir,
That moment she felt curiosity's spur ;
No suspicion she had which could justly raise fear,
Yet trembling and with hesitation drew near ;
One foot putting forward, on the stairs she ascended,
One hand she held back, and the other extended ;
With eye fixed, outstretched neck, and heart throbbing fast,

Herself she exerted to hear all that passed.
The first thing she hears is the voice of soft anguish,
Words half interrupted, sighs of lovers that languish.

"My mother's oppressed by some pain or some care,"
Cried she, "in her troubles I should have my share."
Approaching she heard these soft words, "Dear Andrew,

For the bliss of my life I'm indebted to you."
Isabella this hearing took heart, and she cried :
"My mother is well, I should be satisfied."

At length Isabella retires to her bed,
But for sighing can't sleep, strange things run in her head :

Bliss Andrew bestows, but how, by what art ?
'Tis sure a rare talent happiness to impart.

Thus she argued the case by herself all the night,
And impatiently wished the return of the light.
Isabel the next morning showed some inquietude,
Her concern was quickly perceived by Gertrude.
To Isabel silence proved a task too severe,
To ask prying questions she could not forbear.
"Who's this Andrew," said she, "madam, who's said to know

The way upon woman true bliss to bestow?"
Gertrude started, as justly it might be supposed
That all was discovered, yet herself she composed :
Then with perfect assurance to her daughter replied,
"O'er every family a saint should preside ;
I've made choice of St. Andrew, to him I'm devoted,
By him is my temporal welfare promoted :
I invoke him in secret, his assistance implore,
He often appears to me whilst I adore ;
There does not one saint in all Paradise dwell,
Who in holiness can my St. Andrew excel."
A well-shaped young man whom we Denis shall name,

Soon of fair Isabella enamored became.
From Isabel Denis most kind treatment found,
And their loves with enjoyment were frequently crowned.

Gertrude to every stir in her turn giving ear,
Chanced the anthems sung by Isabella to hear.
And the prayers which she made whilst she Denis
caressed,

In ecstasy straining him to her soft breast.
Surprising our lovers, Gertrude was enraged :
Her passion the daughter by this answer assuaged :

“Dear mother, excuse me, for patron I claim
St. Denis, as your saint St. Andrew you name.”
Gertrude then grown wiser greater happiness knew,
Retaining her lover, she to saints bade adieu,
She dropped the vain project of deceiving mankind :
They’re not to be cheated, for Envy’s not blind ;
With piercing eye Envy will see through your mask ;
To conjecture is easy, to feign a hard task ;
To live free is a blessing, but all pleasures are faint
To the wretch who lives under perpetual constraint.
The fair Isabel lived no longer retired,
In charms she increased, by the town was admired.
Those pleasures which Gertrude had excluded before,
She agreed as companions of love to restore :
There the most polite people in joy passed their days,
Naught is found in good company undeserving of praise.

THE THREE MANNERS.

---

How formed were the Athenians true joy to impart!
How their genius delights and enlivens my heart!
How under their fictions ingenious I trace
Truth's likeness, and soon grow in love with her face!

But of all their inventions that which strikes me the most

Is the stage, of Athenians the pride and the boast;
Whereon heroes renowned, and the chiefs of old times,

Could act over again both their good deeds and crimes.

You see how all nations in this present age
Adopt their example, and would rival their stage.
No folio instruction like the drama conveys,
Perish, perish the wretches who would censure all plays;

When that vile, abject race first existed below,
A heart Nature on them forgot to bestow.

At the Greeks' solemn games, 'twas the custom to crown

Men of eminent virtue and chiefs of renown;
Before the people justice was done to their merit,
Thus oft I've seen Villars and Maurice, whose spirit
And conduct from courtiers met with censure severe,
When they went to the opera receive laurels there.

Thus when Richelieu victorious returned from Mahon,

Which he bravely had taken, as cursed envy must
own,

Wherever he passed he received loud applause ;
Not greater Clairon from the crowded pit draws.
Before buskins were known in old Æschylus' time,
Ere Melpomene trod the stage with steps sublime,
To young lovers was granted a much-envied prize,
Whoever, inspired by his mistress' bright eyes,
In the year had done most, and most tenderness shown,

That man was before all the Greeks crowned alone.
The cause of her passion was by each fair one pleaded,

Her lover's claim she by her eloquence aided,
Having first made an oath to abstain from all art,
Nor like orators aim at misleading the heart,
Without exaggeration their cause to support ;
A hard task to women as to lawyers at court.
Still extant remains one of these fine debates,
Which took rise from the leisure of Greece's free states.

Eudames being archon, if my memory is right,
Three beauties appearing filled all Greece with delight :

Ægle, Apamis, and Teone were their names ;
The wits of all Greece ran in crowds to the games :
Though great talkers, they then kept a silence profound,

Attentively listening as the stage they went round.

In a golden cloud Venus with young Cupid descended,

To all that the disputants uttered attended.

First began youthful Ægle, who had graces and art,
Which, charming eye and ear, found a way to the heart.

“Her motimes, my much-loved, my much-honored sire,

Throughout his whole life felt true genius’ fire,
He attached himself always to those gifts of the mind,

Those elegant arts which have polished mankind ;
To science devoted, from all honors he fled,
And life unambitious with his family led ;
His daughter he would to no husband consign,
But to one who like him felt the influence divine,
Who best knew to sing to the lyre, and to paint
The few charms nature gave me, which indeed are but faint.

Young Lygdamon loved me ; natural genius alone,
By art unassisted, in him brightly shone.
Discreet and ingenuous, both refined and polite,
He ne’er spoke as a scholar, but, always spoke right ;
He no talents possessed, yet could judge of each art,
Every grace his mind formed, and soft love filled his heart ;

He knew to love only ; in that art he excelled :
My heart soon to learn it from him was compelled.
When my sire would have acted a tyrannical part.
And have torn me from him who possessed my sad heart,

And would with some painter have caused me to wed,

Some genius to music and poetry bred,
How incessant the tears trickled from my sad eyes.
Despotic power o'er us parents would exercise!
Since we owe life to them, o'er our lives they have power

Like gods, so for death I prepared in sad hour ;
Confused and despairing, wretched Lygdamon fled.
And sought some asylum where to shelter his head.
My sire meant in six months to dispose of my hand,
That delay was expected by the whole amorous band.
No room had they then their sad talents to show,
I was grown a mere picture of sorrow and woe.
The moments swift flying increased my alarms,
My loved Lygdamon had retired from my arms ;
When my lovers should meet I expected my doom,
To escape them, I wished to sink into my tomb.
Twenty rivals' productions were exposed to men's eyes ;

To a thousand debates their productions gave rise :
I who had not seen any for none could decide,
My father impatient would have made me the bride
Of the proud Harpagus, whose works greatly were prized,

To him I was going to be sacrificed.

A slave then, who seemed to arrive in post-haste,
The work of a stranger full in their view placed :
All present then fixed on the canvas their eyes,
'Twas my picture, so like that it caused much surprise.

In the picture I seemed both to breathe and to speak,
And sigh as my heart were just going to break ;
In my air, in my eyes perfect love was expressed,
Art appeared not, 'twas nature represented at best ;
On the canvas appeared by art wondrous and new,
The soul and the body at once to the view ;
There deep shade was united with light's mildest
gleams,

As at morning we see the sun dart his bright beams
Athwart our vast forests circled round with thick shades,

And gild fruits and harvests, green meadows and glades.

To find fault was only Harpagus' desire,

The rest all stood silent and were forced to admire.

'Who's this,' cried out Harpagus, lost in amaze,

'That painting to such high perfection could raise ?

To whom at last shall I my daughter consign ?'

Lygdamon then appearing, said, 'Shall she be mine ?

'Tis love that's the painter, love alone on my breast

Has this lively image of my Ægle impressed.

'Twas love's power on the canvas directed my hand,

What art is not subject to that god's high command ?

'Tis his power alone that can all arts inspire.'

Then to voice soft and tender attuning his lyre,

Of tones and notes various he made music so fine,

All thought themselves seated at a concert divine ;

Like Apelles he painted, and like Orpheus he sung,

With rage and with fury was Harpagus stung ;

Fire flashed from his eyes, and his anger suppressed,

His visage inflamed, and boiled fierce in his breast.

Then seizing with frenzy a javelin, he flew,
 In Lygdamon's blood his fell hands to imbrue;
 My lover to slay the barbarian intended,
 And over two lives dire destruction impended.
 Lygdamon, who perceived him, was no way dismayed;

But with the same hand that so skilfully played,
 Which the hearts and the minds of his hearers had charmed,

He raised his foe whom he had fought and disarmed.
 Then sure to love's prize he may justly lay claim,
 Permit me to grant the reward of his flame."

Thus spoke the fair Ægle. Love applauds her discourse,

And the theatre rang, the Greeks clapped with such force,

To hear this applause drew a blush from the dame,
 And her passion for Lygdamon fiercer became.

Then rose Teone, nor her speech nor her air
 Were formed by art, or seemed studied with care;
 The Greeks when she rose, for a time seemed more
     gay,

Her adventure with smiles she began to display
 In verse of less length, and a different measure,
 Which runs with great ease, and is heard with much pleasure:

'Twas in such the gay Hamilton still chose to write:
 Such nature has often been known to indite.

TEONE.

Young Agaton you all must know;
 His charms like those of Nereus show;

His cheeks glowed with a lovely red,
And scarce with down were overspread ;
His eyes like Venus' are sweet,
His voice like hers with love replete.
Lilies united with the rose
The tincture of his hue compose ;
The ringlets of Apollo's hair
Are not so graceful, long, and fair.
When of fit age to be a wife,
I chose him as my own for life,
My heart was not his captive made
By outward charms which quickly fade ;
Like Paris, he can strike the eye,
In strength with famed Achilles vie.
One evening as I with my aunt
Took on the Ægean Sea a jaunt,
Near one of those delightful isles
On which kind heaven forever smiles,
A Lydian vessel, great of size,
Seized on our sloop as lawful prize.
Long had the corsair, then grown gray,
Cruised near those isles in quest of prey,
Girls in the bloom of youth he sought,
These to his governor he brought.
He wanted one about my age,
Saw something in me to engage ;
He let my ancient aunt go free,
And as men sparrows catch, seized me ;
With haste then to his master goes,
Of his new booty to dispose.
My good aunt then with clamorous cries
And bosom swollen with sorrow flies

To the Pyreum, there to tell
Whome'er she met of what befell ;
How her Teone was the prey
Of a corsair that roved the sea ;
Of one who dealt in female ware,
And meant to sell me at some fair.
Think you was Agaton content
With tears that happened to lament,
On canvas with a brush to trace
The various features of my face,
To tune his lyre, his voice to raise,
To sing my loss and beauties praise ?
To arms my lover had recourse,
Resolved to get me back by force :
Not having wherewithal to pay
Those that engage in every fray,
He to his youthful figure trusted,
And like a girl himself adjusted,
With petticoat and stays when dressed,
He hid a poniard in his breast ;
Then in a sloop he braved the main,
Bent or to die or me regain.
The youth arrived soon thus arrayed,
To where Mæander winding played.
So bright his charms were, he seemed born
The court of some prince to adorn ;
He seemed a sheep made for the fold
To which I just before was sold.
When he began on shore to tread,
To my seraglio he was led.
No girl before was ever blessed
With joy like that which filled my breast,

When I in my seraglio spied
My Grecian lover at my side,
And that within my power it lay
All that his love dared to repay ;
Him I accepted as my own,
The deities appeared alone
At nuptials in such hurry made ;
No priest was by in robes arrayed ;
And those who to a master bend,
Have seldom servants to attend.
At night the amorous satrap came
To my bedside, talked of his flame,
His lust to gratify he thought.
But one fine girl was to him brought,
On seeing two, with great surprise,
“I can't too many have,” he cries,
“Your lovely friend I much admire,
Company's all that I desire ;
Though two, I'll find means to content you,
Let no cursed jealousy torment you.”
When thus he had his mind expressed,
He both his mistresses caressed,
His word preparing to make good,
To do as he had said he would ;
For Agaton I was afraid,
But my brave Greek quite undismayed
Upon the lustful satrap flew,
Seized on his hair, his poniard drew,
Discovered that he was a man,
And boldly thus to speak began :
“Your doors this instant open throw,
Out of the house let us three go ;

By signs your whole attendant band
Not to follow after us command ;
To the shore let us take our way,
And there embark without delay.
I'll watch you with attentive eyes,
If word or gesture I surprise,
If the least doubtful sign I spy,
That very instant you shall die ;
Your corpse into the river thrown
Shall to the bottom quick go down.”
The satrap, though a noble peer,
Was very liable to fear ;
He with great readiness obeyed ;
The man is gentle that's afraid.
Then in the little bark with haste
With us the governor we placed.
Soon as in Greece we all were landed,
The vanquished's ransom was demanded ;
A round sum in good gold was paid,
This money was my dowry made.
Acknowledge then my lover's deed
Does that of Lygdamon exceed ;
That just had been my sad complaint,
Had he amused himself to paint
My face, or in elaborate verse
My various graces to rehearse.

Her passion delighted, Greece heard her display
With ease unaffected, with simplicity gay,
All that Teone said was with fire animated,
Grace in telling has more force than what is related.

They applauded, they laughed, laughter Greeks never tires,
When man's happy what signifies what he admires.
Apamis then, her eyes with tears flowing, advanced,
Her sorrows enchanted and her charms enhanced.
The Greeks when she spoke took a more serious air,
No heart in her favor delayed to declare.
In moderate measure she related the woes
Which from her unhappy love's adventure arose ;
The smooth-running syllables gave delight to each ear,
And arranged with much art quite careless appear.
The melody of this easy metre's divine,
The long oft tires the ear, though acknowledged more fine.

APAMIS.

Though some cursed star then ruled the earth,
'Twas Amatonte first gave me birth,
Blessed region ! where in Greece, 'tis said,
The mother of the loves was bred,
Her cradle to that happy shore
The ever-smiling pleasures bore ;
Though born the human race to bless,
Me she has loaded with distress.
From her pure law no ill could flow,
She poured down only good below,
Whilst her law nature's law remained ;
Cursed rigor has her altars stained :
The gods are merciful and kind,
But priests to cruelty inclined.
A law they made severe as new,
That any nymph that proved untrue,

Her life should in that water close
From whence Love's goddess once arose,
Unless her forfeit life to save
Some lover chose a watery grave.
Can nothing then but punishment
Inconstancy in love prevent?
Should woman, weak and prone to change
From love to love, inconstant range?
We'll own 'tis bad, but cannot see
Of drowning the necessity.
Oh, Venus, beauty of the skies,
From whom my woes and joys took rise,
Whom I with so devout a care
Served with young Batilus the fair,
I upon you as witness call
Of my love's force, you know it all;
You know if e'er my flame to feed
My passion stood of fear in need;
With love reciprocal delighted,
Our two souls were as one united;
I and my lover felt that fire
Which once the goddess did inspire.
The sun when he began his course,
Was witness of our passion's force;
And when his setting rays the vale
Began to gild, he heard our tale;
But most the sable shades of night
Were conscious of our soft delight.
Arenorax, by love disclaimed,
Whose heart to every vice was framed,
Loved me, but 'twas through spite alone,
This all his words and deeds made known:

Still he was jealous, for by fate
The wretch was preordained to hate ;
Envy's cursed passions he let fall,
His tongue distilled vile slander's gall.
Hateful informers, monsters dire,
To hell, which gave you birth, retire ;
To hurt me so much art was used,
That e'en my lover was abused,
And innocence a victim fell
To fraud, the offspring cursed of hell.
Do not require to have displayed
The horrid plot this monster laid ;
Such thoughts no place have in my soul,
My lover there still claims the whole.
In vain I to Love's goddess prayed,
By all I found myself betrayed ;
Condemned to end my life and woes
In the sea whence fair Venus rose.
To death I was a victim led,
Tears, as I passed, by all were shed,
With unavailing sorrow all
Lamented my untimely fall ;
When to me Batilus addressed
A letter, which my fate reversed,
Dear fatal note, which with it brought
Tidings that worse than death I thought !
I almost sank in endless night,
When words like these first struck my sight :
"Though to my love you were not true,
I'm yet resolved to die for you."
'Twas done as said ; my life to save,
My lover plunged into the wave.

All at his boldness were amazed,
They wept, and much his courage praised.
Oh, death! thy aid I then required,
To end my woes alone desired:
To follow Batilus I meant,
But cruel friendship would prevent;
By force kept from the shades below,
I was condemned to life and woe.
The cursed impostor's hellish spite,
Although too late, was brought to light;
He in his turn death underwent,
I gain not by his punishment.
Lovely Batilus is no more,
For me he sought the Stygian shore.
To you, O judges, I repair,
Grant to my sighs and tender care
Such needful aid, such kind relief
As may but mitigate my grief:
Grant the youth who resigned his breath,
The prize he merited by death;
'Twill cheer him in the shades below,
But I shall comfort no more know:
Then let your generous hearts once more
Force to this trembling hand restore,
That on his tomb before your eyes
It may write, "Athens gives this prize."
Sobs stopped her when she thus had said,
Ceasing, a flood of tears she shed.
Compassion touched each judge's breast;
They first took Ægle's side,
With Teone laughed at each jest,
With Apamis they cried.

I'm sorry that I cannot find
To whom the laurel was assigned.

My friends, close by the fireside seated,
These tales for you I have repeated ;
I to an ancient author owe them,
And hope you will some favor show them ;
You of their merit must decide,
I by your judgment will abide.

THELEMA AND MACAREUS.

---

THELEMA'S lively, all admire
Her charms, but she's too full of fire ;
Impatience ever racks her breast,
Her heart a stranger is to rest.
A jocund youth of bulky size
This nymph beheld with tender eyes,
From hers his humor differed quite,
Black does not differ more from white.
On his broad face and open mien
There dwelt tranquillity serene ;
His converse is from languor free
And boisterous vivacity.
His sleep was sound and sweet at night,
Active he was at morn like light ;
As day advanced he pleased still more,
Macareus was the name he bore.
His mistress void of thought as fair
Tormented him with too much care :
She adoration thought her due,
And into fierce reproaches flew ;
Her Macareus with laughter left,
And of all hopes of bliss bereft.
From clime to clime like mad she ran
To seek the dear, the faithless man :
From him she could not live content,
So first of all to court she went.

There she of every one inquired,
"Is Macareus with you retired?"
Hearing that name the wiflings there
To laugh and smile could scarce forbear.
"Madam," said they, "who is this squire
Macareus, for whom you inquire?
Madam, his character display,
Or else we shan't know what to say."
"He is a man," returned the fair,
"Possessed of each endowment rare,
A man of virtue so refined,
He hated none of human kind;
To whom no man e'er owed a spite,
Who always knew to reason right,
Who void of care lived still at ease,
And knew all human kind to please."
The courtiers answered with a sneer,
"You are not like to find him here,
Mortals with such endowments rare
But seldom to the court repair."
The fair then to the city bent
Her way, and stopped at a convent.
She thought that in that calm retreat
She might her tranquil lover meet.
"Madam," then said the under-prior,
The man for whom you thus inquire
We long have waited for in vain,
To visit us he ne'er did deign.
But such a loss to compensate,
We've idle time and vigils late;
We have our stated days of fasting
With discord and divisions lasting."

A short monk then with crown shaved o'er,
Said, "Madam, seek this man no more;
For I'm by false reports misled,
Or else your lover's long since dead."
What the monk insolently said
Made Thelema with rage grow red:
"Brother," said she, "I'd have you know
The man who has caused all my woe
Was made for me, and me alone,
He's in this world on which I'm thrown;
With me he'll live and die content,
I'm properly his element:
Who aught else told you, on my word,
Has said a thing that's most absurd."
This said, away the fair one ran,
Resolved to find the inconstant man.
"At Paris, where the wits abound,
Perhaps," said she, "he may be found,
The wits speak of him as a sage;"
One of them said: "You by our page,
Madam, perhaps have been misled;
When there of Macareus you read,
We spoke of one we never knew."
Then near she to the law-court drew,
Shutting her eyes, quick passed the fair,
"My love," she cried, "can't sure be there;
There's some attraction in the Court,
But who'd to this vile place resort?
Themis' black followers needs must prove Eternal foes to him I love."
Fair Thelema at Rameau's shrine,
Where the muse utters strains divine,

The man who her so much neglected
There to meet, was what she expected.
At those feasts oft she was a guest,
Where meet gay people richly dressed ;
Such people as we all agree
To call the best of company.
People of an address polite,
She looked upon at the first sight
As perfect copies of her lover ;
But she soon after could discover,
That striving most to appear the same,
They still were wigest of their aim.
At last the fair one in despair,
Finding how vain was all her care,
And grown of her inquiries tired,
To her retreat would have retired :
The object which she there first spied
Was Macareus by her bedside ;
He waited there, hid from her eyes,
That he the fair one might surprise :
“Henceforward,” said he, “live with me,
From all inquietude be free,
Do not, like vain and haughty dames,
Be too assuming in your claims ;
And if you would henceforth possess
My person and my tenderness,
Never more make demands more high
Than suits me with them to comply.”
Who’s understood by either name,
Both of the lover and the dame,
The folks who are profound in Greek
Cannot be very far to seek.

Taught by this emblem they'll relate
What's to be every mortal's fate,
Thee, Macareus,* though all men choose,
Though much they love thee, oft they lose ;
And I'm persuaded that you dwell
With me, though this I fear to tell.
Who boasts that with thee he is blessed,
By envy oft is dispossessed ;
A man should know, to make thee sure,
How to live happy while obscure.

*The late M. Vadé has done his readers the justice to believe that they know, that Macareus is happiness, and Thelema desire or will.

AZOLAN.

---

AT VILLAGE lived, in days of yore,
A youth bred in Mahomet's lore ;
His well-turned limbs were formed with grace,
With blooming beauty glowed his face ;
His name was Azolan, with care
The Koran he had written fair ;
Was on its study ever bent,
To get it all by heart he meant.
From the most early youth his breast
By zeal for Gabriel was possessed ;
This minister of the most high
Descended to him from the sky.
"The zeal that in thy bosom glows,"
Said he, "thy guardian Gabriel knows :
To Gabriel gratitude is dear,
To make your fortune I'm come here ;
You'll in short time as first divine
Of Medina and Mecca shine ;
This, next to his place who is chief
Of all who hold the true belief,
Is the most high and wealthy station
In holy Mahomet's donation.
When you your duties once begin,
Honors on all sides will pour in ;
But you a solemn oath must make
The whole sex female to forsake ;

To lead a life most chaste, and ne'er
But through a grate to view the fair."
Too hastily the beauteous boy,
That he church treasures might enjoy,
Fell easily into the snare,
Nor of his folly was aware.
Our new-made imam was elate,
Seeing himself become so great ;
His joy the salary enhanced,
Which was immediately advanced
By a clerk of important air,
Who with him still went share and share.
No joy can dignity supply,
Nor wealth, should love his aid deny.
Amina fair by chance he spies,
With youthful bloom and charming eyes ;
He loves Amina, she in turn
For him feels love's flame equal burn.
Each morning as the day returned,
The youth, who with love's flames still burned,
Being by his cursed oath enchained,
Of his sad slavery complained,
Avowing freely in his heart,
That he had played a foolish part.
"Then, Medina, farewell," he cried,
"Mecca, vain pomp and foolish pride ;
Amina, mistress of my breast,
We'll both live in my village blessed."
From heaven the archangel made descent,
Severely to reproach him bent :
The tender lover thus replies ;
"Do but behold my mistress' eyes ;

I find of me you've made a jest,
I'm by your contract quite distressed ;
With all you gave I'll freely part,
I ask alone Amina's heart.
The prudent and the sacred lore
Of Mahomet I must adore ;
Love's joys he grants to the elect,
Nay, he allows them to expect
Aminas and eternal love,
In his bright Paradise above
To heaven again, dear Gabriel, go,
My zeal for you shall still o'erflow ;
To the empyrean then repair ;
Without my love I'd not go there."

THE ORIGIN OF TRADES.

---

WHEN with a skilful hand Prometheus made
A statue that the human form displayed,
Pandora, his own work, to wed he chose,
And from those two the human race arose.
When first to know herself the fair began,
She played her smile's enchantment upon man ;
By softness and alluring speech she gained
The ascendant, and her master soon enchained ;
Her beauty on Prometheus' sense ne'er palled,
And the first husband was the first enthralled.
The god of war soon saw the new-formed fair ;
His manly beauty and his martial air,
His golden casque and all his glittering arms
Pandora pleased, and he enjoyed her charms.
When the sea's ruler in his humid court
Had heard of this intrigue from fame's report,
The fair he sought, a like reception found,
Could Neptune fail where Mars a triumph found ?
Day's light-haired god from his resplendent height
Their pleasures saw, and hoped the same delight ;
She could not to refuse him have the heart,
Who o'er the day presides and every art.
Mercury with eloquence declared his flame,
And in his turn he triumphed o'er the dame.
Squalid and sooty from his forge, at first
Vulcan was ill-received, and gave disgust ;

But he by importunity obtained
What other gods with so much ease had gained.
Pandora's prime thus winged with pleasure flew,
Then she in languor lived, nor wherefore knew.
She that devotes to love her life's first spring,
As years increase can do no other thing ;
For e'en to gods inconstancy is known,
And those who dwell in heaven to change are prone.
Pandora of her favors had been free
To gods who left her ; happening then to see
A satyr who through plains and meadows strayed,
Smit with his mien, she love-advances made.
To these amours our race existence owes,
From such amusements all mankind arose ;
Hence those varieties in talents spring,
In genius, passions, business, everything :
To Vulcan one, to Mars one owes his birth,
This to a satyr ; very few on earth
Claim any kindred with the god of day,
Few that celestial origin display.
From parents each his taste and turn derives :
But most of all trades now Pandora's thrives ;
The most delightful, though least rare it seems,
And is the trade all Paris most esteems.

THE BATTLE OF FONTENOY.

---

WHAT! could the bard, whose famed satiric lays
Have gained a wreath of never-fading bays,
With voice inspired by energy divine,
Paint deluged o'er with blood the banks of Rhine;
Sing, how her billows, struck with horror, fled,
While her defenders round by thousands bled;
How even her god was seized with dire dismay,
And to our conquering ancestors gave way!
And when your king, in field with crimson dyed,
Sees instant death fly round on every side;
And from proud Tournay, where with ceaseless roar
His deadly engines urged the siege before,
Retires, suspending the besieger's rage,
And takes the field impatient to engage;
Whilst his great son by love of glory led,
For tented fields forsakes the nuptial bed:
Great through his valor, happy through his care,
Can you, my countrymen, to praise forbear?
Behold your monarch deathless glory gain,
Where Fontenoy extends her spacious plain.
Glory and virtue, powers divine, attend,
You, who our monarch aid, and who defend;
Bellona, goddess of the dreadful fight,
Minerva, who in wisdom dost delight,
Thou ruling passion of each generous heart,
Our country's love, your succor now impart;

My laboring breast, oh! powers divine, inspire,
 And fill the poet with a warrior's fire;
 Paint their great actions on a deathless page,
 Such as may live to every distant age:
 My soul on fancy's pinions wings her way,
 The adverse hosts already I survey;
 Their bands I see with mutual hate engage,
 I see the battle glow with tenfold rage;
 I see the haughty Saxon there advance,
 Maurice,* among us deemed a son of France:
 Hov'ring upon the brink of endless night,
 His soul was just prepared to take its flight;
 But he delayed, he stopped its flying wing,
 He could not unassisted leave the king:
 One single day to live was his desire,
 Contented after conquest to expire.
 Propitious heaven, watch o'er the hero's ways,
 For Louis's sake and ours prolong his days.
 The French forsaking, Harcourt† joins our host,
 Each danger is foreseen, assigned each post;
 Attached both to his country and the throne.
 Noailles,‡ the good of France regards alone.
 The mighty d'Eu,§ whose birth from Condé springs,
 D'Eu, whose right arm the Gallic lightning wings;

* The count de Saxe, marshal of France, being dangerously ill during the battle, was carried through the ranks in a litter, as his weakness, and the pains he felt, rendered him unable to ride. When the king embraced him after the victory, he expressed the same sentiments that are ascribed to him here.

† The duke of Harcourt had invested Tournay.

‡ A marshal of France.

§ Master of the artillery

The chief,* for youth remarked, for valor more,
 Whose great exploits the Main had seen before;
 Bouflers and Luxembourg untaught to yield,
 Depons, Bavaria, hasten to the field;
 The stroke decisive at their posts they wait,
 Their men attend with sanguine hope elate:
 Danoy,† who still with fortune favor found;
 Berenger for the Rhine's defence renowned;
 Chabanes, Colbert, and Gallerande advance,
 Du Chaila, all the hardy chiefs of France;‡
 These, in the silent horror of the night,
 Wait with impatience for the promised fight.
 Already from the East, the dawn of day
 Upon the colors darts a feeble ray,
 Colors which many different nations bear,
 That threatening death wave proudly in the air.
 The Flemings ruled by France in time of yore,
 Who then knew plenty which they know no more;
 The Dutch to whom the Indies homage pay,
 By industry and freedom raised to sway,
 Who long oppressed by Austria's laws severe,
 Now arm for those whose yoke they could not bear;
 The Hanoverian's constant, faithful band,
 To combat brave, and prompt to obey command;

* The duke of Penthièvre, who had signalized himself at the battle of Dettingen.

† Monsieur de Danoy was taken by his nurse out of a heap of dead and dying men at the battle of Malplaquet, two days after it was fought: this is a certain fact. The same woman came with a passport, accompanied by a serjeant of the king's regiment, in which he was then an officer.

‡ The lieutenant-generals in their several departments.

The haughty Austrians of past greatness vain,
And the long glories of their Cæsar's reign ;
Chief the aspiring nation that with pride
Beholds her greatness swell on every side,
And of the Gallic glory jealous still,
Thinks Europe's balance subject to her will ;
All these pour on us eager to engage,
By hope seduced, by hatred fired to rage.
The never-conquered genius of the state
Attends our monarch, and defies their hate.
Roused by the din of war, the gods repair,
From rivers, woods, and floods, to fields of air ;
Doubtful for whom their silver stream shall flow,
And in whose fertile plains their harvests grow.
Fortune displays a laurel wreath on high,
And hovering near them wings the azure sky,
Provoked that independent of her sway,
Valor alone shall win the glorious day.
Cumberland, who the allied hosts commands,
To firm array draws out his hardy bands ;
Not where Scamander flowed in many a round,
Under those walls in ancient song renowned,
Did the great heroes of that famous age,
Like these with order in the field engage ?
But such was Scipio, such the chief whose fate
In ruin plunged the Carthaginian state ;
Skill, equal to their courage, they displayed,
Each to his rival's worth due homage paid.
Ruin and death in various forms appear,
But Louis's dauntless bosom knows no fear.
With their rude throats a hundred cannon gave
The signal, then marched forth the squadron brave ;

With firm and speedy pace, in just array,
Towards our ranks they took their hostile way;
Before them terror stalks, a phantom dire,
Onward they march, environed round with fire;
Thus a thick cloud by winds is borne on high,
Whence lightning, thunder, and destruction fly.
They come, those rivals of our monarch's fame,
More fierce than we, their worth perhaps the same.
Still proud of their exploits in times of yore,
Bourbons avenge whate'er the Valois bore.
With direful shock the hosts three times engage,
Thrice change the ground, yet meet with equal rage;
The French, whose fire the leader strove to rein,
With art to prowess joined, their posts maintain;
The cruel hand of death strikes either side,
And constant carnage swells the bloody tide.
By the sword's edge, or by a leaden death,
Chiefs, soldiers, officers, resign their breath;
Swept by one common fate, confusedly die,
And in promiscuous heaps expiring lie.
Their parting groans now pierce the wounded air,
And heaven's vengeance they implore by prayer.
Gramont for valor and for worth renowned,
Covered with wounds lies prostrate on the ground:
Blest, had he known ere sunk in endless night,
That Louis was victorious in the fight.
What now avail his titles of command,*
The warrior's truncheon which once graced his hand,
Honors on which the great in vain presume,
With them forgotten in the silent tomb?

* He was upon the point of being created a marshal of France.

Craon,* you fall, may heaven grown less secure,
Make your brave brother's fate its chiefest care.
Say! much-loved Longaunay, what art can save
Such worth as thine from an untimely grave?
Those sons of Mars, who at their chief's command
Darted like lightning on the hostile band,
Stopped in their course impetuous, breathless fall,
Their speed overtaken by the murderous ball;
As birds when shot, in many an airy round,
Descend and palpitate upon the ground.
D'Avray is by a hostile sabre slain,
Daubeterre beholds upon the ensanguined plain
Close by his side his dauntless chiefs expire,
Victims to the hostile sword or fire;
Warriors whom Chabillant, with Brancus leads,
How many English slain appease your shades?
Mars, sanguinary god, our thanks we pay,
That Colbert's noble race escaped that day;
Even war's fierce god in virtue takes delight,
Since Guerchy escapes uninjured from the fight;
But thou, brave Dache, what shall be thy fate?
'Tis heaven's to shorten, or protract our date.
Hapless Lutteaux, with wounds all covered o'er,
Striving to cure thee adds but tortures more;
You die in torments, while with ceaseless prayer,
We importune the gods your life to spare.
How many virtues does the tomb devour!
How brilliant youth is nipped, e'en in its flower!
What tears our bloody laurels should bedew
Conquests so dearly bought, how should we rue?

* Nineteen officers belonging to the regiment of Hainault, were either killed or wounded. The prince de Beauveau, brother to Craon, afterwards served in Italy.

Those valiant leaders perish in the field,
Our happy lives each day new pleasures yield;
Voluptuous ease and luxury unite
To glut our souls with every soft delight.
This bliss our sovereign purchased at the head
Of armed hosts, for this our warriors bled;
Upon their tombs let's strew each fragrant flower,
Let's save their names from black oblivion's power.
You who the thunder rolled, who felt its rage,
Thrice-honored chief, live in our grateful page.
Is there a man with heart unfeeling cursed,
Sparing to praise, and prone to think the worst,
Who led by sordid jealousy astray,
Can envy them the tribute which I pay?
If there is one whose breast ne'er learned to glow
At public good, or feel for public woe,
Who hears this praise with a neglectful ear,
Ungrateful men, for Louis learn to fear;
The fiery torrent spreading as it goes,
Fed with new fuel, still more furious grows;
Not winter inundations, swelled with rain,
Not tides impetuous of the roaring main,
Are half so rapid in their headlong course,
Or rush precipitate with such a force,
As the battalion which in close array,
Against our adverse legions took its way;
They marched with sabres brandished o'er their
head,
And cut a passage through the heaps of dead;
The god of battle for their side declared,
Our monarch saw the danger and repaired.
His son, his only hope—loved prince, forbear,
Where do you haste? is life not worth your care?

The dauphin's danger only can inspire
Louis with dread, the son fears for the sire ;
For both our warriors fear, that fear alone
Touches their hearts, all other dreads unknown.
Guards of the king, protectors brave of France,
Nation of heroes who in crowds advance,
Haste to the fight; 'tis yours to fix our fate,
Save Europe, save the king, the prince, the state.
March, household troops, vanquish without delay,
Your chiefs to certain conquest lead the way.
You hardy veterans, whose experienced hands
Launch distant death upon the hostile bands ;
Advance, you chosen troops, our army's boast,
With balls of fire annoy the adverse host ;
Squadrons of Louis, crush those haughty foes,
Courage like yours they're worthy to oppose.
Richelieu, who flies where'er the hosts engage,
Valiant with knowledge, and with ardor sage,
Favorite of Love, by Mars to combat taught,
By wisdom's goddess to express each thought ;
He calls your bands : his soul discerning knows
From whence your enemies' success arose ;
Depending on your valor Richelieu flies,
And shows where you may win the victor's prize.
La Mark, la Vauguion, chiefs renowned in fight,
Valiant Choiseul endowed with matchless might,
A turf intrenchment's weak defence oppose
Against the fury of their warlike foes ;
Yet thus they stem the hostile torrent's force,
And stay an army in its headlong course.
D'Argenson, whom his father's presence fires,
Whose bosom ardent zeal for France inspires,

Struck with the danger of the best of kings,
Excited by the blood from whence he springs,
Attacked three times that formidable band,
Which like a fiery rampart seemed to stand ;
Stopped, he undaunted to the charge returns,
And with redoubled rage his bosom burns.
Thus battering rams with strokes redoubled plied
A town, whose ramparts shook on every side.
That brilliant regiment, well known to fame,
With which famed Catinat the foe o'ercame,
Came, saw, and fought ; the glory they had gained,
More glory still acquiring, they maintained.
Young Castilmoron, glorious was thy part,
In tender years you showed a manly heart ;
Your feeble arm from the stern English bore
The bloody standard which they took before.
But Chevrier falls a victim to their ire,
And Love, with sighs, sees Monace expire.
Ye English, twice Du Guesclin feels your rage ;
Shrink at that name, to you of dire presage.
What brilliant hero, 'midst the horrid fray,
Falls, and then rising, cuts himself a way ?
Biron, thy ancestors on Ivry's plain
Thus fought great Henry's empire to maintain.
Such Grillon was, in worth and rank supreme,
Amongst the valiant a distinguished name ;
Such were Daumonts and Créquis, chiefs renowned ;
The Montmorencys still with conquest crowned,
Heroes who brightly shone in former days,
The sons now emulate their fathers' praise.
Such was Turenne, who in the field of fame
Was taught by arms to win a deathless name,

Under another chief of Saxon birth,
Whose conquering arm with terror shook the earth,
When in another Louis's glorious days,
Justice and Mars at once conspired to raise
Gallia to grandeur never known before,
And make the Austrian eagle cease to soar.
Can polished courtiers, used to soft delight,
Thus rush like lions furious to the fight?
How grace and valor happily combine!
How Boufflers, Meuze, d'Ayen and Duras shine!
At Louis's voice intrepid troops advance;
Led by their king, how great the sons of France!
They'll surely conquer, headed by their sire,
No headlong instinct does his soul inspire;
Free from all passion, he, with mind serene,
Can o'er himself and over fortune reign;
His vigilance can suffer no surprise,
No error cast a mist before his eyes;
He marches like the cloud-compelling sire,
Hurling at Titans heaven's vindictive fire,
Whose boisterous rage he guided by a nod,
And in the storm, with brow unruffled trod.
He marches thus; beneath his hosts the ground
Groans, and the noise is echoed all around;
The ocean roars; the Scheldt its fountain's head
Astonished seeks; with darkness heaven's o'er-spread.

Beneath a cloud, which with a hideous roar
From northern caves the winds impetuous bore,
The Valois' conquerors enraged descend;
"On you, great duke,"* they cried, "we all depend;

* The duke of Cumberland.

Rally your hardy legions to the fight.
 Dutchmen, defend your barriers and your right.
 Since peace, you English, fills you with alarms,
 Against a king who loves it, turn your arms ;
 Will you his valor as his friendship fear?"
 In vain they urge, for Louis soon draws near.
 Their genius fails, the English lose the field,
 Fierceness* to valor is constrained to yield.
 The valiant Clare, who heads Hibernia's powers,
 At once defends his country's cause and ours.
 Happy Helvetians, faithful race, and sage,
 With France united during many an age,
 Drawn up in close compacted, firm array,
 You follow where fierce Neustrians† lead the way.
 That Dane, that hero of immortal fame,
 Who from the frozen north to Gallia came,
 Beholds our nation with astonished eyes,
 When suddenly he hears a thousand cries,
 "Or die, or to our force superior yield,
 Louis at length has won the bloody field."
 Go, brave d'Estrées,‡ the mighty work complete ;
 Go, chain the foes who have escaped from fate.

*This reproach of ferocity is levelled at the soldiers alone, not at the officers, who are as generous as ours. I have been informed by letter, that when the English battalion filed off from Fontenoy, many of the soldiers belonging to that body cried out, no quarter.

† The Norman regiment, which charged the English battalion a second time, at the same time that the household troops, the gendarmes, the carbineers, etc., poured down upon it.

‡ The count d'Estrées at the head of his division, and M. de Brionne at the head of his regiment, had forced the English grenadiers sword in hand.

Let them implore his aid whom they defied,
To yield to him will scarce abate their pride.*
Swift after them these rapid warriors ride,
Who like the dragon, formerly their guide,
Are prompt to fight on foot, or urge the steed
Against the foe, and noted for their speed.
Thus in Numidia's plains, with rapid race,
Intrepid bands of hunters urge the chase ;
Across the field the foaming coursers bound,
They climb the hills, the forests they surround ;
The snares are spread, the hunters watch with care,
And balls and pointed javelins pierce the air ;
With wounds the bloody leopards covered o'er,
Make the wide forests echo with their roar,
Then to some shady wood's recess repair,
To hide their rage, and howl in secret there.
Enough our foes as well as friends have bled,
Too long you walk on mountains of the dead.
Noailles, † retire with your triumphant bands,
Mars overjoyed sees their victorious hands ;
Draw to our camp those tubes for ruin framed,
Whose thunder at our heads so long was aimed.
Come, turn 'gainst the foe their hostile balls,
And with them batter Tournay's lofty walls,
Tournay, ‡ the Dutchman's barrier and retreat,
Which was of Gallic monarchs once the seat.

* Since the reign of St. Louis, no king of France had in person defeated the English in a pitched battle.

† The count de Noailles attacked the battalion of English infantry with a brigade of horse, which afterwards took their artillery.

‡ Tournay was the principal city belonging to the French under the first race of their kings. The tomb of Childeric was found there.

Tournay surrenders, terrors Ghent* invade.
 Disturbed and restless the first Charles's† shade
 With dismal cries makes from the town retreat,
 Where he was born to be by conquest great.
 He flies, but what beholds the frightened ghosts?
 Those spacious plains all covered by our hosts;
 Routed and broke he sees the English bands,
 Leaving their standards in our soldiers' hands;
 The Dutch in vain retiring from the stroke,
 Whilst on the ground Ghent's ruined ramparts smoke,

The place that gave the first‡ of Cæsars birth,
 By Louis's car triumphant crushed to earth.
 Thrice happy France, 'tis not your only boast,
 That to sure conquest Louis led your host;
 That bearing death and terror through the field,
 He could with brow serene his thunder wield;
 His greatest triumph is, that, mild as brave,
 He wept the slaughtered foe he could not save;
 That victor, modest, with heroic mind,
 Lavish in others' praise, he praise declined;
 And that he strove, at once humane and brave,
 To snatch the wounded warrior from the grave.
 Those mangled captives, by our soldiers borne,
 From hungry death's devouring jaws scarce torn,

*The city of Ghent was surrendered to his majesty on July 11th, after M. de Chaila, at the head of the brigades of Crillon and Normandy, the regiment of Graffin, etc., had defeated a body of English.

† Charles the fifth was born at Tournay in the year 1500, on the 25th of February. Philip, archduke of Austria, was his father, and Joan of Castile, heiress to the crown of Spain, his mother.

‡ Of the modern Cæsars, i.e., the emperors of Germany.

The fury of the battle over, find
In the mild victors, benefactors kind.
Oh, real greatness! Conquest ever blest!
Can any foe have such a ruthless breast,
Our monarch's royal virtues not to own,
And wish to be the subject of his throne?
The empire soon with peace his arms shall bless,
Germans and English both his worth confess.
Bavaria wondering his exploits surveyed,
And grieved at having lost his powerful aid.
Naples is safe, and Turin in alarms,
The kings, his allies, triumph by his arms;
To Seine from Elbro 'tis by all confessed,
The first of heroes is of kings the best.
Kind heaven, our monarch with that title grace,
Dear to himself and to the human race,
That prize of virtue, highest pitch of fame,
The peacemaker's august and holy name;
And may a life, on which our lives depend,
Be blessed with ease, and to late time extend.
You warriors brave, who emulate your king,
The hero to his grateful people bring;
Palms in their hands, your fellow-subjects burn
For your long wished-for prosperous return;
Your wives and children, with your past distress
And danger terrified, around you press.
They haste with ardor to your loved embrace,
With tears of joy to bathe each manly face.
Your wished return no longer then delay,
Kind love prepares the prize of worth to pay.

THE MAN OF THE WORLD.*

AN APOLOGY FOR LUXURY.

AT DINNER, 'twas one day my case
By a rank bigot to have place,
Who said, I on it might depend
That hell would have me in the end;
And he an angel heaven's host in
Would loudly laugh to see me roasting.
Roasting for what? "Why for your crimes;
You've told us in some impious rhymes
That Adam, ere the days of sin,
Was oft with rain wet to the skin;
That he his time most dully spent,
Ate fruit, and drank the element;
That he his nails could never pare;
And that he was not over fair.
You Epicurus' doctrine teach,
And for luxurious pleasures preach."
Having these words in passion said.
He swallowed wine like amber red;
Wine, which by its taste confessed
The grape from whence the juice was pressed.
And I, while crimson stained his face,
Addressed the saint brimful of grace:

* This piece was written as a defence of the "Mondain"
(see "The Worldling"), which had been prosecuted

“Religious sir, whence comes this wine?
I own its gusto is divine.”
“This wine is from Canary brought,”
Said he, “and should be nectar thought ;
It is in every respect
A liquor fit for the elect.”
“That coffee which when full refection
The feast has given, so helps digestion,
Whence comes it?” “It from heaven descended,
A gift by God for me intended.”
“But sure ’twas in Arabia sought
By men, and thence with trouble brought.
Both porcelain and chinaware
For you men labor to prepare ;
’Twas baked, and with a thousand dyes
Diversified, to please your eyes ;
That silver, where such art’s displayed,
Of which cups, salvers, plates are made,
Which with mild lustre faintly shines,
Was dug from Potosi’s rich mines.
For thee the world at work has been,
That thou at ease might vent thy spleen
Against that world, which for thy pleasure
Has quite exhausted all its treasure.
Thou real worldling, learn to know
Thyself, and some indulgence show
To others, whom so much you blame
For vices, whilst you have the same.
Know luxury, which destroys a state
That’s poor, enriches one that’s great ;
That pomp and splendor deemed so vain,
Are proofs still of a prosperous reign.

The rich can spend his ample store ;
The poor is grasping still at more.
On yon cascades now fix your sight,
In them the Naiads take delight ;
See how those floods of water roam
Covering the marble with a foam.
These waves give moisture to the fields,
Earth beautified more rich crops yields.
But should this source be once decayed,
The grass would wither, flowers would fade.
Thus wealth, in France and Britain's states,
Through various channels circulates.
Excess prevails, the great are vain,
Their follies oft the poor maintain ;
And Industry, whom opulence hires,
To riches by slow steps aspires.
I hear a staunch, pedantic train
Of pleasure's ill effects complain,
Who Dionysius, Dion cite,
Plutarch and Horace the polite,
And cry that Curius, and a score
Of consuls ending in "us" more,
Tilled the earth during war's alarms,
And managed both the plow and arms ;
That corn which flourished in the land,
Was sown by a victorious hand.
'Tis well, sirs, and I am content
To such relations to assent.
But tell me, should the gods incite
Auteuil against Vaugirard to fight,
Must not the victor from the field
Returning home his land have tilled?

Rome the august was heretofore
A hole like Auteuil, nothing more.
When those chiefs, from god Mars descended,
Attacked a meadow or defended,
When to the field they took their way,
Their standard was a truss of hay.*
Jove's image wooden under Tullus
Was beaten gold when lived Lucullus.
Then don't bestow fair virtue's prize
On what from poverty had rise.
France flourished by wise Colbert's care,
When once a dunce, intent to spare,
Presumed the progress to oppose
Of arts, by which famed Lyons rose,
And by cursed avarice possessed
Had industry and arts suppressed ;
That minister, as wise as great,
By luxury enriched the state.
He the great source of arts increased,
From north to south, from west to east.
Our neighbors all with envy fired
Paid dear for genius they admired.
A monarch's portrait here I'll draw,
Rome, Paris, Pekin, such ne'er saw ;
'Tis Solomon, that king who shone
A Plato, while he filled a throne ;
Who all things was to know allowed,
From hyssop to the cedar proud ;
In luxury he surpassed mankind,
With glittering gold his palace shined.

* A handful of hay at the end of a pole, called Manipulus, was the first standard of the Romans.

All various pleasures he could taste,
A thousand beauties he embraced.
With beauties he was well supplied;
Give me but one, I'm satisfied.
One's full enough for me; but I Cannot with sage or monarch vie."
Thus speaking, I perceived each guest
To approve of my discourse professed.
Sir Piety no more replied,
But, laughing, still the bottle plied,
While all, who well knew what I meant,
Seemed to my reasons to assent.

THE PADLOCK.*

---

I TRIUMPHED, love's victorious power
Prevailed, and near approached the hour
Which should have crowned our mutual flame,
Just then your tyrant husband came.
That hoary Jailer was too hard,
To love he all access has barred,
And all our wishes to defeat,
Secures the key of pleasure's seat ;
For such strange matters to account,
Our tale to ancient days should mount ;
Ceres must to you sure be known,
Ceres one daughter had alone,
Who much resembled you in face,
Beauteous, adorned with every grace,
To the soft passion much inclined,
And guided by a Cupid blind.
Hymen, a god as blind as he,
Treated him as he treated thee ;
Pluto, the rich and old, in hell
Made her his wife, and forced to dwell ;
But she the jealous miser scorned,
And Pluto, though a god, was horned ;
Pirithous, his rival bright,
Young, handsome, generous, and polite,

* This poem is of ancient date: the author was but eighteen when he composed it, and it was occasioned by a lady who was in the circumstances here spoken of.

Found means to get to hell ere dead,
And clapped huge horns upon his head.
This as a fable you'll deride,
But love a man to hell may guide ;
In hell, as here, by some strange spite,
Intrigues are always brought to light ;
In a hot hole a spy concealed,
Saw all, and all he saw revealed ;
And added, that the royal dame,
With half the damned had done the same.
The horned god on this report
Convokes at his infernal court,
Each odious, black, and cursed soul,
Sainted below for actions foul,
Each cuckold's soul, who during life
Did all he could to plague his wife.
Then thus declared a Florentine,
"Most mighty monarch, I'd opine
For death, for once a wife is dead,
She can't defile the marriage bed ;
But ah, sir, an immortal wife
Can never be deprived of life ;
A padlock, therefore, I'd invent,
Which should such accidents prevent ;
She must be virtuous, of course,
When under the restraint of force ;
Not to be come at by her elf,
You're sure to have her to yourself ;
Would I had thought before I died,
Such a convenience to provide."
This sage advice a loud applause
From all the damned assembly draws ;

And straight by order of the state,
Was registered on brass by fate.
That moment in the shades below,
They anvils beat, and bellows blow ;
Tisiphone the blacksmith's trade
Well understood, the locks she made.
Proserpina, from Pluto's hand
Receiving, wore it by command.
Sometimes the hardest hearts relent,
Even Pluto's self some pity felt,
When spouse's virtue he made fast,
And said, "you'll now perforce be chaste."
This lock which hell could frame alone,
Soon to the human race was known ;
In Venice, Rome, and all about it,
No gentleman or cit's without it ;
'Tis always thought a method sure,
All female honor to secure.
There husbands, though some sneerers mock,
Keep virtue safe and under lock.
But now to bring the matter home,
Your spouse, you know, lived long at Rome ;
With bad men few infection 'scape,
He has learned the Roman modes to ape.
But all his jealous care is vain,
Love always knows his ends to gain ;
That god will sure espouse our cause,
He still protects who keeps his laws ;
For you have given me your heart,
And can't refuse me any part.

IN CAMP BEFORE PHILIPPS- BURG, JULY 3, 1734.

---

WITHOUT a bed we now sleep sound
And take our meals upon the ground;
And though the blazing atmosphere
Must dreadful to the eye appear,
The air though roaring cannons rend
While warriors with fierce rage contend,
The thoughtless French drink, laugh, and sing,
And with their mirth the heavens ring;
The walls of Philippsburg shall burn,
And all her towers to ashes turn
By fifty thousand Alexanders,
Who all deserve to be commanders,
Though they receive the paltry pay
Of only four poor sous a day.
Lavish of life, with high delight
I see them rushing to the fight;
They all appear both gay and jolly,
Quite covered o'er with fame and folly.
The Phantom, which we Glory name,
Spurs them to the pursuit of fame;
With threat'ning eye, and front all o'er
Bedusted, marching still before,
She holds a trumpet in her hand
To sound to arms, and cheer the band,

Before Philippsburg.

179

And loudly sings, with voice sonorous,
Catches, which they repeat in chorus.
Oh! people brilliant, gay, and vain,
Who drag with patience glory's chain,
'Tis great, an honorable grave
To seek, Eugene and death to brave.
But what will be your mighty prize?
What from your prowess will arise?
Regret your blood, in vain you spilt it;
At Paris cuckolded, or jilted.

ANSWER TO A LADY, OR A PERSON WHO WROTE TO VOLTAIRE
AS SUCH.*

---

THE highest praises you bestow me,
And finish with desires to know me ;
You'll praise me less when I am known ;
But what I am I'll freely own.
Three revolutions of the sphere
Will bring about my fortieth year ;
Phœbus presided at the time
That I was born, I lisped in rhyme ;
The potent god approved my wit,
And to his presence did admit ;
My heart was by the god subdued,
I worshipped him through gratitude.
Their inclinations some excite,
But fate ordained that I should write.
My soul was by each taste possessed,
Each noble art inflamed my breast ;
Painting delights me ; oft I've been,
At the king's or duke's palace, seen
Gazing on works with raptured eye,
Where art with nature seems to vie ;
Paul Veronese's noble fire
And skill divine I much admire ;

*In 1732, a gentleman of Brittany, for a frolic, wrote letters to several of the wits of Paris, and signed them with a woman's name. This artifice imposed upon everybody, and gave occasion to the present answer.

Poussin and Raphael, my sight
Ravish with exquisite delight.
From those rooms to the opera, I
Upon the wings of pleasure fly ;
What there gives pleasure, from me draws
The tribute of deserved applause.
In music, Mauret's sprightly strain,
Destouches's grace, my praise obtain,
Pelissier's art, le More's fine voice,
Pleasing by turns, suspend my choice.
Sometimes I to that science soar
Which teaches nature to explore,
Following great Newton through the sky
I to find natural causes try ;
I'd know if Cynthia in her course
Is by a changeful central force
Towards us made to gravitate,
And coming near acquires new weight ;
I read philosophers profound,
Who nature by their reason found ;
I see Clairaut, Maupertuis, rise
By calculation to the skies ;
And I indeed too often find
Such studies but perplex my mind.
Obscure researches set apart,
I study next the human heart.
I often Pascal's works review,
A genius singular and new ;
That satirist, devout and sage,
Against mankind too prone to rage.
I, his austerity oppose ;
He'd have men to themselves be foes.

A friend to man, I strive to show
How he to love himself may know.
I'm free from passion, care, and strife;
The muse diversifies my life;
My day begins with joy, and ends
In cheerful suppers with my friends.
I now no more of love complain,
Reason at last has broke my chain;
I follow Cupid now no more,
The happy age of love is o'er;
With love's flame must I no more burn?
Each art I cultivate in turn,
Indolent languor to avoid;
But all this can't fill up the void,
For notwithstanding all my pains
Still there a craving void remains.

ENVY.

---

IF MAN is free, he o'er himself should reign,
Attacked by tyrants, should their rage restrain.
Vices are tyrants of the human mind,
And we no vice more fierce and cruel find ;
None more capricious, furious, and more base ;
None which all goodness does so much efface ;
None which envenoms more the human breast,
Or with dire rankling does so much infest ;
Whose fierce attacks 'tis harder to control,
Than envy, the tormentor of the soul.
Of pride and folly envy is the child,
Stubborn, perverse, intractable, and wild ;
Though sprung from pride, he to appear declines,
At others' shining merit he repines ;
Like to the giant, whom great Jove, in ire,
O'erwhelmed with whirlwinds of tempestuous fire ;
Who, while he panting lay, and raved below,
Strove to hurl back the flames against his foe.
At length he raved, imprisoned under ground,
And efforts made to shake earth's pits profound ;
Heaved against Ætna, which his bosom pressed,
Ætna fell back, he was again oppressed.
I oft have courtiers known, the dupes of fame,
Ready to burst at Villars' glorious name.
The arm they hated, which in fight prevailed,
He fought for them, and they against him railed.

Justly a hero once to Louis said,
 Taking the field, "Versailles alone I dread ;
 Defend me from my countrymen, I go
 Fearless in distant realms to fight the foe."
 What anguish feels the mind from envy's blast !
 In public joy it is with grief o'er cast.
 You tasteless guests, to you fine food seems vile,
 To poison 'tis converted by the bile.
 Oh, you who take the road that leads to fame,
 Must none besides you travel in the same?
 Must each competitor incur your hate?
 Would you those Eastern monarchs emulate,
 Who make the slavish Asiatics groan,
 And cannot bear a brother near the throne?
 When at the play-house some enticing bill
 Makes love of novelty the play-house fill ;
 When in Alzire or Zenobia's part,
 Pathetic Gossin touches every heart ;
 Or when Dufrene* like thunder shakes the stage,
 In acting Orasmanes' jealous rage,
 Tears at each stroke bedew the hearer's eyes,
 Tears which from truest satisfaction rise ;
 The jealous Rufus hangs his drooping head,
 Their joy constrains him tears of rage to shed.
 If this distinction frail, oh, wretch forlorn,
 If others' bliss thy envious heart has torn,
 Of this vexation try thyself to avail,
 And strive, by dint of merit, to prevail.
 "The Haughty Man" † draws crowds on every night ;
 Does this afflict thee? Better strive to write.

* Dufrene, a celebrated actor at Paris; Mademoiselle Gossin, a very graceful actress, who played Zaïre the first time the tragedy of that name was represented.

† A comedy of M. Destouches.

But if to please the audience you intend,
Your "Sires Capricious"* don't to Paris send;
Exotic characters suit not the age,
Think not to bring Rabelais upon the stage.
The burlesque writer few know how to bear,
Whose modern muse assumes a gothic air,
And in some verse, which antique guise displays,
Conceals his dulness by Marotic phrase.
This style I would not in a tale reject,
But truth requires a tone of more respect.
A sinner wouldst thou to repentance call,
Bigot, mix honey with thy sermon's gall;
Assuming the instructor's arduous task,
Thou ape of virtue, take a better mask;
If rival of some eminent divine,
Envy him not; endeavor to outshine;
Raise higher trophies to make his seem low,
Orpheus alone should dare to hiss Rameau;
Venus to criticise is Psyche's right;
But why should we in censure thus delight?
No beauty she acquires who blames a face;
Was Bayle e'er hurt by the caballing race?
Though furious Jurieu aimed prophetic lies
At Bayle, he's still respected by the wise;
Fanatic Jurieu, who 'gainst Bayle declaimed,
Is by the public with abhorrence named.
An author often prostitutes his art,
Descending to the slanderer's low part.
He helps the levees of the great to fill,
Still ready his vile malice to distil;

*The "Capricious Sires" was a comedy of Rousseau's, which so disgusted the audience, that they would not suffer it to be acted through.

Impiety's reproach he casts on all,
Whoe'er maintains this planet is a ball ;
Or says, that the ecliptic with the line
An angle makes, has some accursed design.
Malebranche is Spinozist and Locke's "Essay,"
With Epicurus' errors leads astray.
Pope is a reprobate, whose impious pen
Presumes to show God's clemency to men ;
An impious heathen who attempts to show
That God loves all, that all is good below.
He is a wretch indeed who still for pelf
Damns others, and would almost damn himself,
Who lets his venal, prostituted page,
And to the highest bidder sells his rage ;
A satirist who resents satiric strains,
Whose dulness tires, who of the dull complains,
Who cries true taste is now from Paris flown,
Which no one's works prove better than his own :
In Boileau we excuse satiric rage,
Some beauties please in the malignant page.
That bee had honey to assuage the grief
Of those he stung, and give some kind relief.
But the unprofitable, stupid drone,
Who lives by doing dirty work alone,
All will to crush the hated insect try
At once disgusting to the ear and eye.
How great your frenzy, rash and envious band,
Ye rival painters whose presumptuous hand
Dared the French Zeuxis' picture to deface,
And impiously profaned a sacred place :
His pencil thus a new renown acquired,
The torn remains by all were more admired ;

New lustre is reflected on his name,
You are consigned to infamy and shame.
Men should so low, so mean a vice detest.
A critic nobly once his sense expressed,
When mighty Richelieu strove in vain,
To vilify Corneille's immortal strain ;
Less bold than cardinal he the task declined
Defects in such a noble work to find,
With generous rage curst envy he opposed,
And said, "I wish I had the work composed."
To France a journey when Bernini made,
He wondered at the skill Perrault displayed :
"If France," said he, "has genius so sublime,
I never should have left the Latin clime."
'Tis merit others' merit thus to own,
To a true genius envy is unknown.
What pleasure from a generous temper flows !
How great, to say with truth, I have no foes !
In every brother's welfare I take part,
We're all united by one common art.
'Tis thus the earth with joy sees woods arise,
Whose oak or fir trees seem to threat the skies ;
By the sap's circulating juice they're fed,
Each root is deep as hell, in heaven each head.
The force of winds their solid trunks assails,
They bend and the fierce tempest's fury fails.
Secure they flourish by each other's aid,
And over time itself triumphs the shade.
War at their feet the hissing serpents wage,
And the stained roots bear witness to their rage.

THE NATURE OF VIRTUE.

---

THE spacious earth resounds fair virtue's fame,
The pulpit, bar, and stage, of her declaim;
Virtue, 'tis said, can sometimes penetrate
To courts, and lurk behind the pomp of state.
Virtue's a sacred name, we always hear
The word pronounced with a delighted ear.
Mortals will ever cultivate deceit,
And sharpers, greater sharpers still defeat:
Thus the deluded French blank tickets draw,
Tickets invented by the impostor Law,
That fool from Scotland, quite engrossed by pelf,
Who duped all mankind, and then duped himself.
What's virtue? Say, great Brutus, dear to fame,
Exclaimed expiring, "Virtue's but a name."
To Zeno's followers 'twas so little known,
They thought all virtue apathy alone.
The Eastern dervish pours to heaven his prayer,
With arms erect, and with a frantic air,
Dancing like mad, he loud invokes the skies,
And naming Mahomet in circles flies;
And when awhile he has in circles run,
He thinks the noble task of virtue done.
With hempen girdle, and unblushing face,
A monk brimful of ignorance and grace,
Does through the nose his ritual rehearse,
And sings psalms rendered ill in Latin verse:

May piety like this a blessing find,
But what good hence results to human kind?
To him true virtue never sure was known,
Who does no good but to himself alone.
When He who truths divine to mortals taught,
Was before Pilate by vile traitors brought :
“What is the truth?” the Roman Prætor cried
With all the haughty majesty of pride,
The man divine, who all truth could explain,
Made no reply but silence and disdain.
This silent eloquence may serve to show
That men were never made the truth to know.
But when a simple citizen, inspired
With love of truth, his God’s advice required ;
When as a sage disciple he explored,
How God by mortal man should be adored,
The heavenly envoy, with the subject fired,
Declared the truth, the truth by God inspired,
And in one word the will divine expressed,
“Love God, and love His creatures, to be blessed.”
This is the law divine, the heavens above
Explained man’s duty when they bade to love.
The world is full of vice, the man who flies
Mankind can’t virtuous be deemed, but wise :
Man should himself and all mankind befriend.
Whither, fanatic, does thy frenzy tend ?
Wherefore that jaundiced cheek, that haggard face,
Why those convulsions, that unequal pace ?
Against the age you rave, and straight repair
To cant at leisure with some pious fair :
There saints run mad, with strange convulsions soar
To heaven, and God, like men possessed, adore ;

There, mounted on a stage, they make loud cries,
Work miracles, and tell prophetic lies;
Thither the blind repair, relief to find,
But to their mansion back return, still blind;
The lame man leaping falls; the holy band
Lead back the wretch, a crutch in either hand;
The deaf who dull and void of sense appears,
Listens attentive, though he nothing hears:
Meantime a troupe devout with transport fired,
And by the foolish multitude admired,
Preach to weak girls, who willingly give ear,
That the last dreadful day is drawing near.
Some souls in such things much delight can find,
But don't some duties still more strongly bind?
Why does thy friend in want and sickness lie,
Why do you to him needful aid deny?
With such as you salvation's for the great,
The poor alone can miss a blissful state.
This judge, they say, is upright and austere,
Nothing can mollify his soul severe:
I understand he makes mankind detest
His power, since rigor always steels his breast.
But was his hand e'er known the world to bless,
Did he e'er succor virtue in distress?
Did he e'er serve, or even protect by law,
The man who stands in court with humble awe?
His rigor to the guilty has been shown,
The man's not just who punishes alone.
The just are still benevolent. Long since,
The wicked minister of a virtuous prince
Thus dared his cursed suggestions to impart,
Timantes is a Calvinist in heart;

A work of Calvin's at his house was seen,
Such odious heretics you should not screen;
He should in prison all his life be pent,
Or sent into perpetual banishment.
This answer straight returned the prince august,
"Timantes I have faithful found and just;
That courtier's faults indeed to light you bring,
But you forget how well he served his king."
This monarch's truly noble, wise discourse
Inculcates virtue with a sermon's force.
Shall fraud and insolent pretensions claim
Even sacred virtue's venerable name?
Shall Germont, weak dispenser of the laws,
Who, when Sejanus raves, won't plead my cause;
The insipid Cyrus, he whose only care
Is to be praised, and supper to prepare—
Shall these profane fair virtue's sacred name?
Virtue with scorn rejects the senseless claim.
It is not due to these, but him who glows
With tenderness, and friendship's duties knows;
Norman and Cochin virtuous I confess,
Whose eloquence protected orphans bless;
It is not due, vile Mannori, to thee,
Who sellest thy anger for a paltry fee,
Who eloquence converted to a trade,
And not a pleading, but a libel made.
Judge, to whose zeal right reason is the guide,
In speech de Thou, a Pucelle to decide;
A tender friend, a generous patron known,
That thou art virtuous sure all men must own.
Enjoy that title, thou whom men revere,
With wisdom thou art just, but not austere:

Thou midst the dazzling pomp of awful state,
Art loved as virtuous, not maligned as great.
An author, whose prolific pen composed
Plans various, which to mankind he proposed;
Who long wrote for ungrateful men alone,
Has coined a word to Vaugelas unknown.
This word I like, this word was made to impart
Ideas of virtue to the human heart.
You pedants, you grammarians of the schools,
Who measure syllables, and frame new rules,
To you the expression may too bold appear,
But surely it must please each virtuous ear.

TO THE KING OF PRUSSIA.

---

I.

You scoffers, who sit in the critical chair;
You witlings malignant, who no man can spare;
Who, proud and loquacious, your ignorance display,
And monarchs presume in the balance to weigh;
Who in language pedantic, erroneous and vain,
That a scholar can ne'er be a hero maintain;
Ye caitiffs, on heroes and poets severe,
Ye censors of kings, to Silesia repair.
Near Neisse see a hundred battalions defeated;
Behold there the chief you so rudely have treated.
'Tis he, 'tis the man, who, with genius profound,
The circle of art and science went round;
Who could the recesses of nature pervade,
And bigots confound, whose religion's their trade;
Who, in small things as happy as great, knows to please
At a feast by politeness, and freedom, and ease;
Who knows all things, in all things alike can succeed,
Shines in sports and in fields, and rides Pegasus steed.
Turenne, nor Gustavus, nor Sweden's famed king,
E'er tasted, 'tis true, of famed Helicon's spring.
But these heroes untinctured with learned lore,
Were ne'er for that cause deemed illustrious the more.

So common a greatness brave Frederick declines,
By turns like Achilles and Homer he shines ;
The Austrians and dunces alike he confounds,
And in sarcasms as much as in projects abounds ;
Fills Vienna with dread, Rome's encroachments restrains,
And like a true hero speaks, writes, fights, and reigns.

Oh, prince famed for courage, in talents so bright,
No longer by daring fill my soul with affright ;
And with all your wisdom and knowledge reflect,
Cannon balls have for persons but little respect ;
And that, forced from a tube by explosion, base lead
May sweep at a stroke the most famed hero's head,
When, its weight still increased by so rapid a course,
It every moment increases in force.

What becomes then that spirit, that volatile flame,
Sprung from organs of sense and a perishing frame,
That being which vainly would its nature explore,
Which like fire awhile blazes, and then is no more ?
Then some surgeon accursed, one of Atropos' train,
Might dissect the remains of the brave monarch slain ;

Behold, might he say, the brain where was found
Such store of ideas, so much science profound ;
That noble heart's fibres might display to the sight,
Which in life all great qualities once did unite ;
He might cut—but such images dire must not stain
My page, which his praises alone should contain.
You deities just, noble Frederick defend,
The bliss of mankind does on Frederick depend.

Live, prince, both in peace and in war to do more
Than the princes of Europe could e'er do before;
For I'll prophesy boldly, in time 'twill appear,
That a star half so bright ne'er lighted the sphere.
But when you by conquest on conquest obtained,
Increase of your glory and empire have gained,
Forget not the bard, who dared once in weak lays Your great deeds to presage, and your virtues to praise;
Recollect that, in spite of your sovereign command.
His friend you have signed yourself under your hand.
Farewell, victor, deep versed in the statesman's famed art,
Thirty kingdoms subdued are outweighed by a heart.

TO THE KING OF PRUSSIA.

---

II.

FROM the German chief of such fame and renown,
The brightest of monarchs that e'er wore a crown,
For these three months past, a most tedious long time,

I have not heard once or in prose or in rhyme :
My muse is oppressed with a lethargy deep,
But the din of fierce war will soon rouse her from sleep ;

Surprised she will hear the loud accents of fame,
Amidst stern alarms, your valor proclaim,
With a voice so sonorous, it cannot be drowned
By the thunder of cannons and the trumpet's shrill sound.

This rambling goddess I see through the air,
With post-haste from Berlin to Paris repair,
And Frederick and Louis's glory resound
From the north to the south, and the whole world around ;

Those names, which the hand of true glory has traced

In letters of fire, which can ne'er be effaced :
Names which, while united in friendship remain,
In concord and peace can all Europe maintain.

To the King of Prussia. 197

What happy bard then shall the heavenly muse,
To sing the great deeds of these famed heroes, choose?

What poet shall strive in his well-polished lays,
The worth of these two mighty monarchs to praise?
You who bear, like Achilles, the lance and the lyre,
You only can sing your achievements with fire;
Whose soul genius warms whenever you write;
Who with ardor compose, as with ardor you fight;
And write both in verse and in elegant prose,
With the same ease you take the strong towns of your foes.

In happily copying Horace, you shine
With his gayety, wit, and his graces divine;
But your muse, in some points that come home to man's breast,

Must ever to his be superior confessed.

The emperor protected the bard in past days,
The emperor's self to protect is your praise.
Son of Mars and Calliope, favorite of fame,
Who adds a new lustre to either great name,
Europe's peace by your conquering arm maintain,
And do not to sport with the muses disdain;
And when your victorious legions shall place
The throne of the Cæsars on an unshaken base;
When the harassed Hungarians, secure from alarms,
Their vineyards shall prune, unmolested by arms;
When all nations shall drink the rich wines of To-kay,
And the peacemakers sing with hearts jovial and
gay;

Great Frederick to Berlin with speed shall repair,
And the joy of his triumphs his true subjects shall share ;

And by a new opera, of his own writing,
Himself shall exhibit his achievements in fighting.
Each author your merit will loudly proclaim,
For though we still envy each rival his fame,
That bard with applause must by all men be read,
By whom an armed host of ten myriads is led.
But by merit like yours no such aid is required,
Were you, like Homer, poor, you'd, like him, be admired.

Excuse me then if, by your goodness excited,
I oft write you letters in such terms indited,
As show that in you 'tis the wit I address,
Not the monarch whom all men a hero confess.
The North, whilst your squadrons to battle you led,
In you saw a warrior that filled them with dread ;
But I see in you, whom I have long time known,
The most amiable king that e'er sat on a throne.

TO M. DE FONTENELLE.

VILLARS, Sept. 1, 1720.

SIR:—The ladies at Villars are quite spoiled by reading your "Treatise of the Plurality of Worlds." We could have wished it had rather been by your "Pastorals," for we would much rather have seen them shepherdesses than philosophers. They spend time in contemplating the stars which they might employ to much greater advantage; and as our taste is regulated by theirs, love for them has made us all turn natural philosophers.

Each night on beds by nature made,
Whose verdure trees o'erarching shade,
Which seem by nature's self designed,
For meetings of another kind;
We out of order put the skies,
Venus seems Mercury to our eyes;
For we no telescopes have here
To bring the wandering planets near,
But to behold them we apply
Our opera-glasses to the eye.

As we pass the whole night in taking a view of the stars, we very much neglect the sun, to which we rarely pay a visit till he has run one-half of his course. We were informed a while ago, that he looked bloody the whole morning: that afterward, without the air being any way obscured, he, by insensible degrees, was deprived both of his magnitude and his light; this information we did not receive till five o'clock in the evening. We thereupon looked out at the window, and we took the sun for the moon on account of his paleness. We have no doubt you have seen the same phenomenon at Paris.

On this occasion, sir, we address you as our master. You know how to make those things pleasing which are scarcely made intelligible by other philosophers, and such a man as you was necessary in France, and indeed, in all Europe, to inform the literati, and inspire the ignorant with a taste for the sciences.

Say, Fontenelle, who took thy flight
 With rapid wings above all height,
 Who with Dædalean art could pierce
 Each corner of the universe;
 And many spheres immortal view,
 Seen by St. Paul as well as you,
 Where beauties never seen before
 He saw, but of them says no more.
 Of the sun, which you know so well,
 Can you not mortals something tell?
 Why did he red as blood appear
 In entering on his career?
 Why did he tremble and turn pale?
 Why lessen? why did his light fail?
 Upon a sight so full of dread
 What by Boulainvilliers is said?
 To many nations will he cry
 That their destruction's drawing nigh.

Shall we behold incursions new,
Edicts or war's dire terrors view?
Shall imposts over France increase,
Or branches of revenue cease?
When once upon the verdant plain
You tuned your reed, a simple swain,
Had you beheld the god of day,
A change so great to view display,
You'd thought some change must then have rise

In your nymph's heart as in the skies.
But since your Phœbus left the plains
And all the rural joys of swains,
For those important truths made known
By Euclid and by Varignon;
Since you at length have laid aside
The ribbons, Celadon's gay pride,
To take the astrolabe in hand,
You'll speak what few can understand:
You'll puzzle us with calculation,
Talk of refraction and equation.
But if you graciously should deign
These difficulties to explain,
Whenever you the truth make known,
Use the poetic style alone;
For us bright fancy more engages
Than five score deeply learned pages.

TO COUNT ALGAROTTI AT THE COURT OF SAXONY.

---

PARIS, Feb. 21, 1747.

THESE strains, O Algarotti, hear,
To Pindus and Cythera dear,
Who dost from Heaven the gifts inherit,
To love, to please, to write with spirit;
Who with each shining talent graced
Can suit thyself to every taste.
While you in lofty palace sit
A poet's weak address permit;
No art or care these lines display,
Written 'midst the giddy and the gay.
The bliss, O Saxony, we owe
To thee should make our hearts o'erflow
With gratitude, the poet's lays
Should still be lavish in thy praise;
From thee the valiant hero came,
Who France defends, the royal dame
Who makes it famous o'er the earth,
In thy blessed realm received her birth.
Know this accomplished princess still
Each day continues to fulfil
What oft your muse of her foretold,
What you could prophet-like unfold.
From this description doubtless you
Will think I've seen and heard her, too;

It is not so; I'll freely own
My muse obscure and little known,
Such charms excited to rehearse,
But tells the simple truth in verse,
Re-echoes what all mortals say,
Who homage to such beauty pay.
A dauphiness, by crowds surrounded,
With ceremony is confounded.
Prudently I at first gave place
To dames whose hoops fill so much space,
Who occupy with gaudy pride
Of the apartment every side.
Was Virgil struck with Livia's state,
Still at her toilet first to wait?
He let Cornelia pass neglected,
Nor peers nor chancellor respected;
Nobles he passed regardless by,
Pomp never once could catch his eye.
He with Tibullus and the muse
To laugh at care would rather choose.
But in my turn I shall obtain
My wish, and not apply in vain.
I to the graces every day
With fervent heart devoutly pray.
Daughters of love, I cry, oh, deign
Propitiously to aid my strain;
And when your sister you attend,
My muse present her as a friend.
But of the sacred nuptial bands,
The tie that joined the royal hands
Of the most noble pair on earth,
Renowned for virtue as for birth—

To Count Algarotti.

Venus's maids of honor may
Indeed be able to display
Those glories; but a wretch profane
Like me should not attempt the strain.
If we may credit the report
Unanimous of the whole court,
From them a race shall soon take rise,
Whose glories shall the world surprise.
To the great minister of state
Who regulates the kingdom's fate,
A bard's respects and homage pay,
I would not tire him with my lay.
Those offerings exquisite and rare
Deemed by the great and by the fair,
Who live on flattery and lies,
Such elevated souls despise.
Adieu! Inspire through Saxon plains
A taste for soft Italian strains,
And for the truths by Newton taught,
Newton! almost a God in thought!
In more sublime, more heavenly lays,
Sing fair Æmilia's deathless praise.

TO CARDINAL QUIRINI.

---

BERLIN, Dec. 12, 1751.

THE temple would you have me sing,
To which you various offerings bring?
But yet though I your worth admire,
I cannot do what you require.
How can I, on the banks of Spree,
Where Roman laws no more bear sway,
My voice before all mankind raise,
And utter forth a prelate's praise?
From Sion, distant and forlorn,
Like a good Catholic, I mourn.
My prince by heresy's infected,
Religion's not by him respected.
It fills my soul with poignant woe,
To think that in the shades below
He shall with ancients have his place,
Ancients who were quite void of grace;
We know those heroes, thrice renowned,
Are punished in the abyss profound;
With them he must be damned, because
He in this world lived by their laws.
But still I'm much more grieved to find
A shocking vice infects his mind;
A vice, by men called Toleration,
Which bears the opinions of each nation:

To Cardinal Quirini.

I'm shocked to think the Turkish crew,
The Quaker and the Lutheran, too,
The Protestant and Papist find
Alike, with him, reception kind,
If they can by their actions claim
Of honest men the glorious name.
But, crime more shocking to reveal,
He laughs at sanguinary zeal;
That hate which bigots fills with rage,
Which gentle pity can't assuage,
But which the Free-thinker, professed,
Profanely turns into a jest:
What can your eminence then hope
From me who don't revere the pope?
From me, who am the chamberlain
Of a prince obdurate in sin?
You, whose predestinated front
Bears double marks of honor on't,
Whose scarlet hat, with laurels bound,
Shows you for poetry renowned;
Who Horace and St. Austin's lore,
With equal genius could explore,
Who equally dost know to rise
To Pindus' top, and paradise,
Convert that genius; you can please,
And teach mankind with equal ease;
Of Jesus Christ, the grace divine
Does often through your writings shine,
And in them often we admire
Both Homer's grace and Homer's fire.

TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS, THE PRIN-CESS OF ***.

---

A BEAUTEOUS princess often may
Languish in pleasure's season gay ;
The empty forms of haughty state
Oft make life tedious to the great.

It must the greatest king confound,
With all his courtiers circled round,
Amidst a splendid court to find,
That grandeur can't give peace of mind.

Some think that play can give delight,
But soon it grows insipid quite ;
And monarchs have been often seen,
While gaming, tortured with the spleen.

A king oft feasts with heavy heart,
Pleasures to him no joy impart ;
While the dull vulgar contemplate,
Like gazing idiots, pomp and state,

And fondly think who is possessed
Of them with bliss supreme is blessed.
Soon as the sun's refulgent rays,
Spread o'er the hemisphere their blaze ;

The king begins another day,
Yet knows not where to take his way :
Tired of himself he straight repairs
To company, to soothe his cares.

But pleasure flies from his embrace,
It rises not from change of place ;
This day's insipid as the last,
At night he knows not how it passed.

Time's loss is not to be repaired,
Life's to an instant well compared ;
What, when life posts away so fast,
Can days appear so long to last ?

Princess, whose worth above thy age,
All hearts at two courts can engage ;
You usefully that time employ,
By youth consumed in rapid joy.

The genius given by heaven benign,
You strive to polish and refine,
By studies which at once unite
Instructions solid, with delight.

'Tis best the mind should be employed,
Indolence leaves a craving void ;
The soul is like a subtile fire,
Which if not fed must soon expire.

TO M. DE CIDEVILLE.

---

PARDON at Easter ever due
To Christians who their penance do :
Mine's done, a silence that's so lasting,
Is penance worse by far than fasting.
A pardon full you therefore owe me,
So plenary indulgence show me.
Of a true sage I long in quest
Travelled, but now I am at rest ;
No more about the world I roam,
I'm ten times happier at home.
All that I sought at length I find,
I'm blest and hid from humankind.
The throne and all its slavish pride,
Grandeurs by men with envy eyed,
Can't with my hermitage compare,
Where never enters anxious care.
Kings I have seen, who, in retreat,
Thought themselves, like Aurelius, great ;
But virtue was no more their care,
When trumpets' clangors pierced the air ;
Good resolutions then are o'er,
They still are kings, but men no more :
They scour the world with eager haste,
To seize on realms, or to lay waste ;
They all are to ambition slaves,
But my free soul ambition braves.
Princes, the grandeur of a throne
Renounced, I wish for friends alone.

TO ****.

---

DUDEFANS, Fourmont, who both unite
Solidity to graces light,
In whom wit's charms, with sense combined,
And eloquence's power we find ;
Ye pleasures, which all good contain,
Which I still labored to obtain ;
Philosophers, whose learned lore
I vainly labored to explore ;
From all the efforts I made to know,
What are the advantages that flow ?
Those squares of distances, those springs,
Atoms, inexplicable things,
That vast abyss of infinite,
Can it into my soul pour light ?
Lectures on bodies are but vain,
They can't ease mine when racked with pain :
Does great bliss my soul o'erflow ?
Better do I my duty know
When I have all the visions read
In René's roving fancy bred ?
Or when with Malebranche I've found
That I cannot the Godhead sound ?
Or when by scaling I arise
Up to truth's castle in the skies,
With the illustrious Leibnitz' aid,
And see monads alone displayed.

Fly quickly hence, deluding dreams!
Ye cold chimeras, idle schemes!
And since to error we're consigned,
Let us some pleasing errors find.
The vulgar mind to method bent,
On calculations still intent,
If pleased with such a crabbed trade,
For nothing nobler e'er was made.
From the deep caverns underground,
Where dwells philosophy profound,
Behold Æmilia, on the plain,
Advance with cupids in her train!
Had she not been by these befriended,
Who to Brussels her steps attended,
She would have lost life's brilliant stage,
In poring o'er a German sage.

EPISTLE XIII.*

---

You who the errors have reformed,
By which chronology's deformed ;
Who wandering through poetic ground,
Gathered the fairest flowers you found ;
Who could sagaciously explore
The depth of philosophic lore,
And have not misemployed your leisure,
For all the allurements of soft pleasure :
Hénaut, I beg you to impart,
The secret of the magic art
By which with glory crowned you quell,
The rage of envy, monster fell ;
Whilst I, placed in a lower sphere,
Whom envy never should come near,
The fury see, where'er I tread,
Pour all her poisons on my head :
We should not eagerly seek fame,
I weakly strove to fix my name,
On memory's temple walls, whilst you
Wisely from fools and noise withdrew :
I labored glory to secure,
Rou shunned her, but you made her sure.
An oak with leafy honors crowned,
May reign o'er all the trees around ;

* Written at Lunéville, Nov. 8, 1748.

To all its boughs is honor paid,
Men dance beneath the sacred shade :
But should a blade of grass be seen,
To rise o'er others on the green ;
Its trifling height offends each eye,
Men tear it up and throw it by.
I pity the poor author's fate,
Whom all men envy, scorn, or hate ;
The author who desires repose,
Must shun all others as his foes ;
Montaigne, who could each reader please,
By depth of reason, cheerful ease,
Retiring to his ancient seat,
From critic malice made retreat ;
Doubting of all things, laughed at fools,
Who argue gravely in the schools :
But when his pupil, Charon, famed,
With method and reserve declaimed,
And lectures upon wisdom gave,
Like a professor learned and grave ;
He narrowly escaped his fate,
Pursued by theologic hate ;
Upon occasion, time, and place,
Depend your glory or disgrace :
One day by all you're idolized,
The next insulted and despised.
Capricious Greece in former days,
To Pyrrho did a statue raise,
Whilst Socrates, who spoke so well,
A martyr to right reason fell :
Thrice happy, who to all unknown,
Lives useful to himself alone.

By friendship only man is blessed,
But envious rivals break his rest ;
Glory at rest cannot remain,
And wit is the possessor's bane :
'Tis often like a wanton wife,
A torment of the owner's life ;
The wife must have her gallant still,
Let the good man say what he will ;
A welcome all that offer find,
To every other man she's kind.
Thus she by others is enjoyed,
The husband's by possession cloyed ;
But let us change a note so sad,
Is then to please a lot so bad ?
Envy's a necessary ill,
It spurs us on to virtue still ;
The noble soul in virtue's course
Is hereby urged with double force.
Hence Hercules acquired a name
And Maro Mævius urged to fame :
For vain discourse what need I care,
It passes like the idle air,
I live thrice happy in this court
Where broils and trouble ne'er resort
No jealous cares e'er give me pain,
The monarch has no courtly train ;
With Bouflers and Æmilia fair,
Living I'm blessed beyond compare,
Their converse fills me with delight
Then I may envy well excite.

TO THE DUKE OF RICHELIEU, MAR-
SHAL OF FRANCE, IN WHOSE HONOR
THE SENATE OF GENOA HAD JUST BEFORE CAUSED A STATUE TO BE ERECTED.*

---

To THEE as her deliverer praised,
A statue Genoa has raised ;
Your uncle with less lustre shone,
His glory was not so far known ;
He doubtless would have jealous been,
If he that monument had seen,
Which you in youthful days acquired,
When universally admired,
And thought the wonder of your age,
For talents which all hearts engage.
To take a model of that face,
The court of Venus formed to grace ;
Of love he had made choice alone,
That God to changing ever prone ;
Less soft had he the features made,
Vertumnus' face he had displayed,
The graces of the young and gay
Courtier at length must pass away ;
Your glory will increase with age,
Your air will then appear more sage :

* Written at Lunéville, the 18th of November, 1748.

To the Duke of Richelieu.

At this you're not at all content,
You wish life could in love be spent,
But pleasures were not made to last,
They hurry to their period fast ;
But still your influence you'll maintain,
By wit and valor still you'll reign.
The features of Richelieu the rover,
The gallant, gay, and favored lover,
In miniature shall oft be found,
In boxes which shall much abound ;
With skill by famous Macé wrought,
For Richelieu's sake by many bought :
But those of Richelieu, the victorious,
Support of armies, hero glorious ;
Richelieu, who could protect by arms
A commonwealth in dire alarms ;
These are more pleasing to my sight,
They give me more sincere delight.
I ask your pardon, you are not quite
So sage, though still prepared to fight ;
Although you can a city save,
You're not a patriot stern and grave.
I would not have the world be told
That you are grown austere and old ;
Who did at Fontenoy display
Such courage on that glorious day ;
Against the foe your thunder lance,
And crown with victory flying France.
Lavish of life you in the field
With terror made the allies yield ;
When England, Austria, envy lay
Vanquished, you came without delay ;

To Paris Cyprian wars to wage,
Subdue by love, not hostile rage.
Love's wings and times you have curtailed,
In love and war alike prevailed;
For ladies you can break a lance,
Just as for Genoa and France.

TO MADAM DE ***, ON THE MANNER
OF LIVING AT PARIS AND VERSAILLES.

---

ROSALIA, to the world unknown,
Let us live for ourselves alone.
Friendship and blood's endearing tie,
Shall all society supply ;
So foolish, dangerous, vain's mankind,
We in the world no joy can find,
In that whirlpool they call the world
Man's through so many errors hurled,
That it can coxcombs please alone,
By whom it ne'er was rightly known.
Glycera, when her dinner's o'er,
Goes out just as the day before ;
Into her gorgeous chariot led,
She indolent reclines her head,
Embarrassed by the cumbrous pride
Of a vast hoop that fills each side ;
Visits her friend in pomp and state,
Ascends, and then repents too late,
Embracing yawns, and plain is seen
In her constrained behavior spleen ;
She seems to beg for nonsense gay,
To make her languor pass away.
They interchange some faint caresses,
They talk of weather, plays, and dresses,

Of sermons, and of ribbons' price,
And are exhausted in a trice.
Now through necessity grown dumb,
A tune they both begin to hum;
But Mr. Abbé entered soon,
Priest, gallant, sharper, and buffoon,
Endowed with various talents rare,
Who for some months was master there,
A formal coxcomb entered too,
Pleased in the glass himself to view,
Both pedants please, their jargon suits;
A captain enters; both are mutes;
The captain to recite proceeds
The great exploits and hardy deeds
Which his brave men would have performed,
How they Placentia would have stormed,
And then achieved some wonderous feat,
Had they not chose to make retreat.
To Nice, to Var, to Digne he leads,
Not a soul listens, he proceeds.
Then Ifis enters with sad air,
Her time is wholly spent in prayer,
Yet Ifis' leer is very sly,
A little Jansenist stands by,
St. Austin's works and saintly pride,
Both equally his heart divide.
Other birds too of different feather
And different tastes tune up together,
Whence various notes so much confound
That slander's voice is almost drowned.
Their jarring clack's like winds that rend
The air, and with fierce winds contend.

A chasm of silence most profound
Succeeds to all this empty sound:
All rational converse they shun
And into idle nonsense run.
Oh, David, to their succor haste,
Nor suffer them their time to waste.
Oh, David, thy most powerful ace
Engages all the human race;
Soon as upon the table green
Thy various, magic cards are seen,
The noble, prelate, lawyer, cit,
Are roused and sharpened into wit,
Above all, women take delight
In black and red spots on the white,
All are amused by hopes of treasure,
Avarice assumes the shape of pleasure
From these exploits the wise and fair
To supper by consent repair;
The insipid joy of every guest
In dullest follies is expressed,
The machine man by wholesome food
And richest sauces is renewed.
The soul and blood new force acquire,
The stomach and the brain conspire.
Then their clacks run at a strange rate,
The son of law begins to prate,
All parties he alike assails,
He damns the war, at peace he rails.
A country noble quaffs champagne,
But must of misery complain,
Of misery by his country felt,
At which even hearts of stone might melt,

And though in luxury immersed
By taxes, says, the land's oppressed.
Then the loquacious abbé tries
For histories true to pass off lies ;
His tale cut short must soon give way
To arrant chit-chat of the day ;
This, in its turn, is put to flight,
By conversation not more bright.
The jest insipid, double meaning
To obscenity and nonsense leaning,
The foolish laugh, the stupid pun,
Stale pleasantries which pass for fun,
Give this society polite,
The highest rapture and delight.
It's thus you waste, oh men unwise,
That fleeting time which quickly flies?
Which still to fools will tedious seem,
Which men who think too transient deem.
What shall I do? Whereto shall I
Far from myself for refuge fly?
Man company requires, no doubt,
He's restless with it, worse without ;
Indolent sloth's the greatest foe
That mortals ever knew below,
Tired of tranquillity at home
To court disgusted creatures roam.
At Paris babble loud prevails,
But artful silence at Versailles,
For real joy can ne'er reside
With men whose principle is pride.
Happy that man must be confessed,
Who's with his master's presence blessed.

To Madam De ***.

O'er the empyrean Jove presides,
But from mankind his glory hides ;
Heroes and demi-gods alone
Dare to approach the heavenly throne,
Must we amidst the crowds that press
Inferior deities address?
Gods who can good or ill bestow,
But ne'er love those by fate placed low,
Who on the top of fortune's wheel,
By joys intoxicated reel,
Who amidst all their pomp and show,
No tenderness or feeling know?
Rise early, at their levee wait,
And dance attendance at their gate,
Three years neglected or abused,
At last you're civilly refused.
No ; haughty courts, the sage replies,
Suit not great souls that courts despise.
From treacherous courtiers haste away
And pleasures which, like them, betray.
Make public good your only care,
And you shall public honors share.
The public, what that monster dire,
Whose hundred tongues can never tire,
That fawns and bites, that courts neglects,
That breaks the statues it erects?
Still ready those who serve to spurn
It once profaned great Colbert's urn,
That oft has vile reflections cast
Virtue and innocence to blast.
To envy merit still inclined
Faults it could in Armida find,

And has with greater pleasure seen
Vile plays than those of famed Racine.
It Athalie long despised
And wretched, ill-penned dramas prized.
Applause it foolishly bestows,
And undeserved indulgence shows.
But all its errors time repairs
At length applause true merit shares ;
'Tis true, but oft the owner dies,
Ere to his worth men ope their eyes.
Posterity may to my name
Be just ; I'd fain enjoy my fame.
When once a man is in the ground,
He hears not fame's loud trumpet sound.
A nation to his merit just,
Reveres Pope's, like a monarch's, bust,
Dead he's admired, but from his age
He bore fierce persecution's rage.
Let's lie concealed, and pass away
Calmly the evening of our day,
From malice and from envy's rage
Let us preserve declining age.
Friendship, chief bliss of human race,
My dwelling with thy presence grace,
May I for friendship live alone,
Friendship to wicked men unknown.
Distant from bigotry, whence flow
Terrors in death, life's piercing woe.

TO THE PRINCE OF VENDÔME.

---

COURTIN, one of his faithful friends,
Health to the brave prince Vendôme sends ;
The meanest of the sons of rhyme
His homage pays at the same time,
From Sully, whither he was sent
By some sprite on his good intent.

You see, sir, that the desire of serving you has united two men very, very different from each other.

One fat, and fair, and in good case,
Looks pampered and replete with grace,
And seems so sanctified his air,
Predestined to an easy chair.
On his unwrinkled face still glows
The healthful color of the rose,
Which makes the abbé still appear
Youthful as in his twentieth year.
The bard by meagre visage known,
Is nothing else but skin and bone,
To occupy much space not made,
Nor quite ill-natured, as portrayed.

Our first intention was to send your highness a regular composition, half verse, half prose, as was customary with the Chapelles, the Des Barreaux, and the Hamiltons, who were the abbé's contemporaries and our masters. I should have added, Voitures, if I was not afraid of offending the abbé, who pretends, I don't know for what reason, that he is not old enough to have seen him.

As there are many bold things to be said concerning the times, the wiser of us two—I don't mean myself—did not choose to speak of them without enjoining profound secrecy.

The God mysterious he addressed
 Whose power by Normans is confessed;
 That cautious God with artful leer,
 Who whispers fearing men might hear.
 He much too often knaves befriends,
 But still to wise men succor lends.
 He does at court and church preside,
 And once was even Cupid's guide.

This god happened unluckily not to be at Sully; he was then, as we were told, engaged by —— and Madam de ——, or else we should have finished our work under his inspection.

We then had labored to display
 Your sprightly wit, your leisure gay;
 Had shown you amiable in chase
 Of pleasure, dauntless in disgrace.
 We had that period blessed related,
 Which to love's joys was dedicated;
 Love's raptures in harmonious verse
 We should have labored to rehearse;
 All Paphos' rites we had explored,
 Paphos where Venus was adored;
 Amours in the Florentine taste
 Had our description likewise graced;
 But in so artful a disguise
 As might deceive e'en bigot's eyes.

We had not failed to introduce
Bacchus flushed with the grape's rich juice,
The world had seen with what delight
You in his orgies passed the night.
Imagination by his side
Should have her utmost care applied,
To embellish with her gayest flowers
The pleasure of your blissful hours.
Ye midnight revels, feasts where joy
Yields pleasures which can never cloy ;
From you gay sonnets first took rise,
Which the young loves so highly prize ;
How much those brilliant trifles please !
They ravish with harmonious ease,
By such famed Horace was the soul
Of feasts when flowed the sparkling bowl,
When with the witty and the great,
He next Augustus took his seat.

We have here given you a weak sketch of the picture we intended to draw.

But who'd succeed should be inspired ;
We to such glory ne'er aspired,
That honor we shall ne'er dispute
With the divine, the enchanting lute
Of him who other bards excels,
Chaulieu, who at your temple dwells.
Know then that indolence and ease
Such minds as ours alone can please.

TO MADAM DE GONDOIN, AFTERWARD
COUNTESS OF TOULOUSE, ON THE DANGER SHE HAD BEEN EXPOSED TO
IN PASSING THE LOIRE IN 1719.

---

WHILST in a storm such risk you run,
Know you in Sully what was done?
The rogue Marigni, with a laugh
Malicious, wrote your epitaph;
The waves, said he, will soon restore
The body they o'erwhelmed before;
And then, said he, will be revealed
To sight what she through pride concealed:
But Espar, Guiche, la Vallière,
And Sully wept for one so dear;
Roussi did nothing else but swear,
The abbé Courtin wiped a tear;
Perceiving your last hour draw nigh,
Devoutly prayed to the Most High;
Between his lips some prayer he muttered,
And though the words he faintly uttered,
His voice devoutly in his throat
Quavered with many a thrilling note.
But what a sight, with glad surprise,
Strikes suddenly my wondering eyes,
A thousand loves on every side
Oppose the fury of the tide,

To Madam De Gondoin.

Combat the wind's impetuous rage,
And strive their fury to assuage ;
I see them round your vessel swim,
The surface of the water skim ;
Still struggling with the boisterous tide,
Your vessel to the shore they guide.
Gondoin, the time which love has lent,
Must in love's service all be spent ;
Love for himself preserved your days,
And a just claim he to them lays.
That system so much famed, by which
The farmers-general grew rich,
And did their pelfs, through pure good will,
With all the nation's money fill.
The sibyl thus, in times of old,
As in great Maro's page we're told.
No other treasure e'er possessing,
But the black art and skill at guessing,
Gives to Æneas oaken leaves,
From him the golden bough receives.
Perhaps with anguish in my heart,
I shortly shall the news impart,
That the old gouty bard is dead,
Whose works, like Chapelle's, will be read ;
Chaulieu shall quit this earthly sphere,
And soon before his judge appear ;
And if a muse, whose polished lays
And numbers smooth all readers praise,
Salvation can on souls bestow,
He surely will to heaven go.
The curate came the other day,
Whilst in the agony he lay,

And gave, with ceremonious face,
His passport to a better place.
He saw his sins washed white as snow
By a repentant word or so,
And then received, with reverence due,
That which I need not name to you ;
He made besides an exhortation,
Most highly suited to the occasion.
He pardon asked, and owned his fault,
That he too much false glory sought ;
For pride, he candidly confessed,
Reigned much too powerful in his breast.
Poets are ever slaves to fame,
They labor for an empty name ;
From vanity, all men agree,
Preachers and bards are seldom free.
Yet his pride can't the world prevent
So great a poet to lament ;
His loss will make Parnassus groan ;
For he was left, and left alone,
Of all the bards, whose deathless strain
Immortalized great Louis' reign.
But in the present age, 'tis said,
Our youths grown tasteless and ill-bred,
Have luxury exchanged for pleasure,
And idleness for that sage leisure,
Which men, with learned ease content,
In constant meditation spent.
Genonville, first of sonneteers,
Who worthy of that age appears,
Seems in great haste to quit the town,
And to your country seat go down.

The system has not soured his spirit,
He still is amiable, has merit ;
Still he has elegance of style,
He still can gayly talk and smile ;
My mistress' charms he has enjoyed,
With which I never could be cloyed ;
He makes a jest of this black treason,
And I might angry be with reason ;
But in this world, a friend with friend
For trifles never should contend.

TO THE DUKE DE LA FEUILLADE.

---

PRESERVE, my lord, with ceaseless care,
Luxuriant fancy's follies rare ;
Pleasantry and true humor too,
In which all men must yield to you ;
Your constitution boast no more,
For none think with you on that score.
A lady, who long since has known
Your person, as it were her own,
Declares you well may counterfeit ;
For, though your mind's in spring of wit,
Though earthly part even now appears
In the full autumn of its years.
Then governor of high renown
Farewell ; you rule not o'er a town,
But o'er a beauty heavenly bright,
Who charms the heart as well as sight ;
Who by her free licentious spirit,
Does honor to her teacher's merit ;
But pray, lest Venus should depute
In your place, some young substitute,
Lest she should let some lusty blade
So fine a government invade.

TO MARSHAL VILLARS.*

---

'Tis true, I had some hopes of late
Of tasting at your country seat,
Social enjoyment, sweet repose ;
But Vinache does my views oppose ;
So for a mere quack I neglected
A hero by all France respected.
I may offend by what I've said,
And should not speak of fear or dread,
To him who ne'er thought life worth care,
But instant death sought everywhere.
Do not into a passion fly,
And you shall hear the reason why.
You well may risk your life ; but I
Have no great cause to wish to die ;
For should you in your glorious course
Fall by some ball's resistless force,
Conveyed to Pluto's dreary coast,
What consolations wait your ghost !
With transport it would hear related,
How men your funeral celebrated ;
Mass on the occasion had been said,
In honor of the illustrious dead ;
And some dull prelate to the crowd
Had trumpeted your praise aloud,

* Written in 1721.

In a discourse, not written by him,
But bought, or people much belie him.
Then at St. Denis' church in state
You'd be interred amongst the great.
But should poor I, nor great nor brave,
With Charon pass the Stygian wave,
I without pomp would be conveyed;
On a vile bier my body laid,
Two priests would to the churchyard bear,
And lay it in some corner there.
My nieces, and my worthy brother,
Who for Jansenius makes such pother,
Would laugh to see me laid in earth;
My burial would excite their mirth:
And all the honor ever paid
On earth to my departed shade,
Would be some epitaph severe,
Composed my memory to tear.
From what has then been said 'tis plain,
That I should longer here remain,
Those deeds of high renown to view,
Which yet shall be achieved by you.

TO MONSIEUR GENONVILLE.

---

IMPUTE me not friend, a self-love so extreme,
Like Chaulieu, to make myself always my theme;
But let me that exquisite pleasure enjoy,
Of friendly converse which never can cloy;
When thought meets with thought, o'er the lip it
    departs,
And both utter freely what they feel in their hearts.
You remember, my friend, how my muse in weak lays,
Whilst yet I was young made some efforts for
    praise;
You saw calumny vile, all her snakes on her crest,
The spring of my genius with malice infest:
In a horrible dungeon unjustly confined,
Amidst my misfortunes with spirit resigned;
From evil I learned to gather some good,
And the strokes of adversity bravely withstood;
With a constancy which I could never presage,
From the levity common in so tender an age:
Why have I not since been as resolute found?
At slighter attacks I have oft given ground.
How often with tears love has made my eyes flow,
False rogue as you are, without doubt you must know;
You, who with an address which must needs be ad-
    mired,
The possession of what I love most have acquired;

Who seized on my mistress, and was not content
 To get her with ease, and her lover's consent :
 But I loved you, false friend, notwithstanding your fault,

I forgot and forgave as a good Christian ought.
 Ah! why do I dwell on ideas long past?
 Love once was my bliss, but that bliss could not last.
 Now a cruel disease undermines my whole frame,
 And it shortly, perhaps, will extinguish life's flame;
 The fates have, I doubt, almost spun out my thread,
 And to all sense of pleasure my organs are dead;
 I feel with surprise that I'm void of desire,
 And my heart glows no longer with love's vivid fire:
 A chaos of thought quite perplexes my head,
 My present state's bad, and the future I dread;
 To increase my affliction, my memory's employed
 On ideas of bliss that can't now be enjoyed:
 But what still is worse, I perceive it apace,
 That my mental endowments begin to decrease;
 The particle subtile of heavenly fire,
 Before my corporeal frame does expire:
 And can this then be the emanation so bright,
 Which flows from the great source of all mental light?

Which lives when our bodies are laid in the earth,
 With the organs of sense every mind has its birth;
 With them it grows up, and with them feels decrease,
 And shall its existence like theirs at length cease:
 I know not, but I have good hope it will brave
 Death, the ruins of time, and the jaws of the grave;
 And that an intelligent substance so pure,
 The Almighty intended should always endure.

TO THE COUNTESS OF FONTAINE-MARTEL.*

---

FAIR Martel you must ever seem
Worthy of most profound esteem;
'Tis at the suppers which you give,
I justly may be said to live;
For there I cannot ever miss
Pleasure, the only real bliss:
Sometimes I scold you, I must own,
But for that freedom still atone:
When I above the sex extol,
And own that you are worth them all;
In you a sight most rare we see,
A woman from all foibles free;
You by the charms of wit engage,
And reason like an ancient sage:
Your wisdom's not that harpy dire,
Whom rancor and fell rage inspire.
Envy's sad sister, that with eyes
Malignant, into all things pries:
Who like a hag with ceaseless rage,
Rails at the pleasures of the age.
But that blessed wisdom, which with ease
The humors of all men can please,
Which makes life's every moment charm,
And of its darts can death disarm.

* Written in the year 1732.

To the Countess of Fontaine-Martel. 237

On all sides, madam, you behold
Beauties, when ugly grown and old,
Because by lovers they're neglected,
Turn saints at last to be respected.
But you more knowing, justly shun
The error into which they run ;
You don't in vigils pass the night,
In cheerful suppers you delight,
The pleasing follies of the muse,
Instead of casuists you peruse,
And in the place of monk, elect
Voltaire your conscience to direct ;
Preferring still, as foe to care,
The opera house to house of prayer ;
But that which makes my bliss complete,
With you, blessed freedom, seeks retreat,
That goddess bright, whose brow serene,
And lively eyes all hearts must gain,
Whom gestures free, and easy air,
Nor prude, nor yet coquette declare ;
Decent, but not at all demure,
That can a double sense endure,
And hear those words without a frown,
Which make severer dames look down.
Her sister goddess blithe as fair,
Heart-easing mirth inhabits there,
Mirth, who in repartee delights,
Whose satire pleases, never bites,
Who sometimes into ridicule,
May turn a blockhead, or a fool,
And makes the wise in proper place,
Relax the muscles of his face.

238 To the Countess of Fontaine-Martel.

On you may heaven its gifts bestow,
And make completely blessed below.
One who even in her life's decline,
Does others in its spring outshine.

WRITTEN FROM PLOMBIÈRES TO M.
PALLU, INTENDANT OF LYONS.

---

FROM the bottom of that stony cavern I write,
Which lies between two craggy mountains' vast height ;
Where the sky is still black, and with clouds overcast,
And thunders oft burst midst the tempest's rude blast ;
Close to a hot bath, which still boils up and smokes,
Where crowds of the sick are brought wrapped up
in cloaks ;
Where the splenetic mortal, disordered in brain,
Talks of his disease in the medical strain,
Bathes himself and besmokes, and in hope of a cure,
Can exquisite tortures with patience endure.
From this cavern, where hags in crowds daily repair,
And expect to become once more youthful and fair ;
Of virgins a few, a great number who fain,
Their virginity, lost many years, would regain ;
Where their health to recover, or led by mere fancy,
Old cits in the stage coach come often from Nancy ;
And of Commercy monks, a most numerous train,
Who appear from their manners the sons of Lorraine.

From this place, where languor and spleen still resort,

By letter at Paris I make my report :

Though Phoebus forsakes and inspires me no more,
The aid of the graces and loves I implore ;

I will frankly own they scarce know me by sight,

But it is to the learned Pallu that I write :

Alcibiades, too, his injunction has laid,

Who at court so much grace and such talents displayed,

Gay, generous, and brave, but prone still to changing,

From beauty to beauty capriciously ranging ;

Who, like Cupid, possesses the dangerous art,

Of seducing by gentle persuasion each heart :

Cured by length of time, or by some serious passion,

Of falsehood, a vice that's so much in the fashion ;

In love he appears to have turned out of late,

A model in every respect quite complete ;

Who such an extraordinary change brought about,

Let me guess e'er so long I can never find out ;

But illustrious fair one, the power of your eyes

Must surely be great to have won such a prize :

Peradventure some women a choice might have made,

Of a cleverer and more promising blade.

To Hercules liker in sinew and bone,

Like Celadon to the soft passion more prone ;

But through the whole world could she ever find

One worthier of love amongst all human kind ?

For where, dearest madam, can you e'er hope to meet,

One that's like him, a friend, both reserved and discreet?

In whom the old courtier's politeness refined,
With the graces and sprightliness of youth is combined,

Whose converse all mortals must equally please,
With vivacity mixing an elegant ease;

Whose natural vein of true humor and wit,

Must the taste of all ranks and all geniuses fit:

And does he not merit the praise of the nation,

Who after three whole years of negotiation,

That formality proud, and those airs ne'er contracted,

Which envoys assume when affairs are transacted?

In this picture faithful from flattery free,

Must not every eye Alcibiades see?

THE NATURE OF PLEASURE.

---

How long shall bigots, by false zeal grown rude,
All humankind from Paradise exclude?
To virtue mortals shall they then excite,
By sermons which make even fair virtue fright?
Shall preachers then in Calvin's footsteps tread,
Who thinks God like himself by anger led?
Some tyrant minister, elate and proud,
I see methinks amidst a slavish crowd,
Dictate with savage air what rage inspires,
A milder government my soul requires.
Timon thinks virtue nothing loves below,
But Christian's nature should not sure forego.
God's mercy I adore, revere His law,
Approach Him mortals with a grateful awe.
Hark how you're called by nature's voice benign,
Through joys and pleasures to the power divine.
The treasures of His wisdom ne'er were known,
Matter by motion He directs alone;
But man by pleasure to conduct He knows,
Learn to enjoy the bliss His hand bestows.
Pleasure existence gave to humankind,
It actuates body, and inspires the mind.
Whether soft slumbers close your weary eyes,
Or morn to rouse you gilds the Orient skies,
Or if by hunger pressed, you seek for fare,
The painful waste of labor to repair;

Or if by Cupid's genial power you're led
To taste the pleasures of the nuptial bed ;
In every circumstance the power divine
Delight's blest balm can with your wants combine.
Man is impelled to act by joy alone,
All other motives are to him unknown.
Did not our souls alluring pleasure draw,
Who would submit to Hymen's rigid law ?
What Beauty would not sorely curse her doom,
Condemned a child to carry in her womb,
To bear excruciating pangs and throes,
An infant nurse, and feel a mother's woes ?
His wayward imbecility to shield,
And after to his youthful sallies yield.
Enjoying pleasure in each state and hour,
Mortals acknowledge God's eternal power.
But wherefore, said I, in your joys alone ?
Even in your woes God's wisdom is made known.
That sense so quick of danger and of harm,
That guard forever prompt to take the alarm,
Cries out incessantly of hurt beware,
Defend your lives, preserve your health with care.
No quarter self-love can with zealots find,
They style it hell-born foe to humankind.
Wretches traduce not of God's gifts the best,
Love comes from Heaven, God means to make us blest.
From self to sons, to countrymen descends
Our love ; but most of all we love our friends.
Love like a soul can even our souls inspire,
They soar to Heaven above on wings of fire.

God gives to man at once severe and kind,
Passions to raise to noble deeds the mind.
They're dangerous gifts, although 'twas Heaven that gave,
The abuse destroys, the prudent use can save.
That mortal I don't pity, but admire,
Who knows to check by reason each desire ;
Who shunning man, to God devotes his mind,
Nor asks to know perfidious humankind ;
Who loving God with all his heart and might,
Shuns lawful pleasures for more high delight.
If of his cross he's proud, of fasting vain,
Yet still in secret weary of his pain,
If he condemns the world from which he fled,
Rails at all ties, and at the marriage-bed ;
We do not in such pride and rancor trace
The friend of God, but foe to human race ;
Through his austerity and monkish spleen,
Regret of pleasure he foregoes is seen.
Heaven which bestowed on every man a heart
To animate it, must desires impart.
The modern Stoic would each wish control,
And of its very essence rob my soul.
God, we are told, rules with an iron rod,
Like a fierce Turk obeyed at every nod,
Who hires to guard his brows from dire disgrace,
Eunuchs, the outcasts of the human race.
You who at nature level all your rage,
Have you not read the ancient's moral page ?
In Peleus's daughters, Peleus worn and old,
As in a glass, your folly you behold.

They thought both time and nature to subdue,
And youthful vigor in their sire renew :
They slew, and left him weltering in his gore,
The prime of life attempting to restore.
Stoics herein behold your frightful form,
You nature murder, striving to reform.
From use of good, felicity must rise,
Ruin from its abuse, so say the wise.
Petronius's pleasures I'd avoid no less,
Than Epictetus's austere excess.
Fatal to happiness is either scheme,
Bliss never yet was found in the extreme.
Disclaimer subtle, I don't therefore say,
That man to all his passions should give way ;
I would this fiery courser's speed restrain,
And stem this torrent pouring o'er the plain,
Its headlong rage by banks and dams command,
Nor suffer it to overflow my land.
Winds purify the air, no tempest raise ;
Scorch us not sun, but light with kindly rays.
God, to all beings that exist a friend,
Your care to instincts which you gave extend.
The taste of friendship, social tie of hearts,
The love of study, solitude, and arts ;
These are my passions, at all time my mind
Could in their charms attractive comfort find.
When on the banks of Main two rogues in place,
Who often broke the laws of human race ;
When two commissioned thieves, by avarice led,
Upon me all their rage malignant shed ;
Then learned ease was my delight alone,
And cultivated arts to them unknown.

'Twas thus Jove's son his cares with music eased
His lowing herds when wily Cacus seized.
He still continued his harmonious strain,
Thieves strove to interrupt the song in vain.
That man is born to a propitious fate,
Who to the muse his time can dedicate ;
He from the tuneful art derives repose,
The muse his anguish soothes, dispels his woes :
He laughs at all the follies of mankind,
And from his lyre a sure relief can find.

THE UTILITY OF SCIENCES TO PRINCES.

TO THE PRINCE ROYAL OF PRUSSIA, SINCE KING OF PRUSSIA.

---

Few kings, my prince, can with enlightened mind
Instruct the people to their care consigned;
Few Antoninuses on earth appear,
For since that hero to all Rome so dear,
Since great Aurelius, wonder of his age,
Who shone as monarch, warrior, and sage,
Did ever king like him the truth explore,
Like him give ear to sacred wisdom's lore?
But two or three of those who wore a crown,
Were held philosophers of high renown;
Others appear as vulgar to your eyes,
The tyrant slaves of pleasure you despise,
Who burdened earth, or else destruction hurled,
Slept on the throne, or wide laid waste the world.
The world can't see them in a proper light,
To reign is the grand art, if courts say right.
But what's this art so boasted of by kings?
What are of all their policy the springs?
He speaks the word, and all around obey;
Just as he smiles or frowns, they're sad or gay.
Is it then hard to play the monarch's part?
Is then to govern slaves so great an art?

But error's cup break with a manly hand,
Repel the flattering, fawning, craving band,
Aspiring prelates' wily arts defeat,
Justice secure upon her awful seat,
From learned bodies vain debates to chase,
And make vain sophistry to truth give place ;
To instruct at once the learned, and support,
These are the glories of the Prussian court ;
High station's lustre ignorance can deface,
Which joined to grandeur makes even grandeur base.
A formal envoy of the king of Spain
Two English artists importuned in vain,
For leave, upon a mountain's top to state,
By a barometer, air's real weight.
The envoy could with ease have helped the schools,
But, though a fool, he thought the artists fools,
Shall I the folly of a pope reveal ?
Show cardinals, with apostolic zeal,
Teaching mankind in their illustrious codes,
'Twas sinful to believe the antipodes.
How many kings and sultans dire alarms
Have felt at an eclipse and dreaded charms ?
A monarch who to indolence gives way
Is by the vilest wretches led astray.
Star-gazers, chemists, and dull monks, contrive
To bubble him, and on his folly thrive.
By avarice to alchemists betrayed,
He thinks each piece with treasures will be paid ;
The astrologer he asks, if heaven benign
Permits to go to council, or to dine ;
As knavish monks direct, he God adores,
And to escape from hell gives up his stores.

Such kings we should no more than idols prize ;
Idols who see not, though endowed with eyes.
A king who has both sense and talents rare,
We justly to the Almighty may compare.
Knowledge of arts, 'tis true, should not alone
Distinguish him who sits upon a throne.
Of all the kings in sacred history named,
Who for his royal virtues was most famed ?
'Twas Solomon, by God himself inspired,
Beloved in Sion, by the world admired ;
Ruled by a sage, his subjects all were blessed,
Of all earth yields they were by trade possessed :
His navy visited each distant shore,
And still new wealth to famed Judæa bore :
Thus fleets to Bordeaux, and to London, bring
All Asia's treasures at returning spring,
To him not dazzled by so bright a throne,
The art to enjoy what he possessed was known.
'Tis thus wise monarchs o'er their subjects reign ;
Knowledge, if not to prudence joined, is vain.
A monarch should not, amidst a thousand cares,
Neglect for love of money state affairs.
To you that English monarch's history's known,
James, of that name the first who filled the throne,
Who in sad exile let his nephew die,
Though he could necessary aid supply ;
His nephew's wrongs the king should have redressed,
Relieved the German towns by force oppressed ;
He should, by force, insulting foes have quelled,
And between nations a just balance held :
Not as a doctor, labor to be great,
And tracts pedantic to Christ dedicate.

No king of parts in pedantry delights,
He justly thinks, and like a hero fights :
Such Julian was, ill-known to vulgar eyes,
Dreaded, yet loved, and though a warrior, wise :
Such Cæsar, who to all things great aspired,
Who conquered Rome, and was by Rome admired :
Your model he had been in every art,
Had he not banished justice from his heart.

EPISTLE IN ANSWER TO A LETTER,
WITH WHICH, UPON HIS ACCESSION
TO THE THRONE, THE KING OF PRUSSIA HONORED THE AUTHOR.

---

BECOME a monarch, dost thou condescend
Still to regard a poet as a friend?
Just when that happy morn's auspicious ray
To the world promises so bright a day,
A day that proves thee good as well as great,
Dost thou resolve to make my bliss complete?
Oh, truly royal soul above all pride!
By thine my want of greatness is supplied:
Superior to all prepossession weak,
The language of the heart you nobly speak.
The generous sentiments your lines express,
Show you were born the human race to bless.
Illustrious prince, whose virtues we admire,
Triumphant reign, as you have penned with fire,
Continue by thy reign the world to bless.
Prevailing vice each king swears to repress;
But you by oaths your sacred promise bind,
Arts to protect, and love the human kind.
And thou, whose worth did persecuted shine;
Deemed atheist, blessed with wisdom's lore divine;
Martyr to reason, against whom combined
Fell envy's furious rage with error blind;
Return, who speak the truth, fear nothing now;
The crown adorns a philosophic brow.

252      Epistle in Answer to a Letter.

That gold amassed, the life-blood of each state,
 Which unemployed precipitates their fate;
 Poured out discreetly by his prudent hand,
 Revives and spreads abundance through the land.
 He aims not idly to amuse the sight
 With useless soldiers of gigantic height;
 Through every clime with care preposterous sought,
 Colossuses of war too dearly bought;
 Courage and ardor used alone to prize,
 He judges not of soldiers by their size.
 Thus thinks the just, the wise thus rules a state;
 But more's required to make man truly great:
 Who does what right and equity ordain,
 Makes but a step immortal praise to gain;
 The just is oft austere, oft sad the wise,
 In other sentiments true greatness lies;
 The conqueror's dreaded, and esteemed the sage,
 But benefactors every heart engage;
 'Tis not in time their glory to deface,
 Their names renowned reach every future race.
 What fame to him can great exploits impart,
 Who reigns triumphant in each subject's heart?
 Trajan, not far from Ganges' stream renowned,
 In chains the hands of thirty monarchs bound;
 And yet from conquest he derives no fame,
 His goodness has immortalized his name.
 Ne'er for Jerusalem in ashes laid
 Was homage to the name of Titus paid.
 Beloved by all men he was truly great.
 Oh, you, who such bright virtue emulate,
 A virtue more heroic still display,
 And ne'er like Titus. weep to lose a day.

EPISTLE TO THE KING, PRESENTED TO HIS MAJESTY AT THE CAMP
BEFORE FREIBURG.

---

KING of benign, but of undaunted heart,
As brave as mild, and prudent without art,
Whither do you precipitately go?
The fever escaping you provoke the foe!
You haste to Freiburg, Peyronie in vain
Strove your impetuous ardor to restrain.
To risk your precious life, great king, beware.
Fields suit not him who wants physician's care.
When laurels bind the conquering hero's brow,
Some care of health he surely may allow.
Zeal spoke, but from you no attention drew,
Deaf to advice, you to the combat flew ;
Inclement seasons with the foes conspire,
You brave the seasons and the cannon's fire :
Your headlong courage fills with dread the state,
But your foes dread it as they dread their fate.
Give to Vienna, not to Paris fear,
Make us rejoice to whom you are so dear ;
The hero they admire and love, once more
To loving subjects graciously restore.
A sage has said the only good below,
The only solid bliss that mortals know,
Springs from the tender sympathy of hearts,
From the blest transports friendship's force imparts ;
How happy then must be the monarch's fate,
Who's loved by every member of the state !

How blessed the king whose throne's each subject's breast!

This bliss enjoy, by thee it is possessed.

To Paris's ramparts even from Alsace bound

Approach, you'll hear the voice of love resound.

Subjects you'll see whose bosoms transports fire,

Blessing the hero whom their souls admire.

Do you not see how on their knees they fall,

How on your face are fixed the eyes of all,

How our hearts leap with transport at the sight

Of our loved king? This triumph's your delight.

Kings dragged like slaves, through an insulting throng

Led to the capitol in chains along,

Those glittering chariots, priests, that warlike host,

That senate which made earth oppressed its boast.

Wretches from the procession to the tomb

Sent, were the triumphs both of pride and Rome :

Yours is love's triumph, and its glory pure,

Theirs time effaced, yours ever will endure ;

They shocked mankind, the sinking world you raise.

In you His image God on earth displays,

In the blessed age of gold you had been king,

Enjoy the days of happiness you bring,

May peace forever bless their happy course,

Peace makes blest days, the glorious, martial force.

May she still hear the victor's voice well-known,

He combated for us and her alone.

ON THE DEATH OF THE EMPEROR CHARLES.

---

THE cedar which so long defied the rage
Of winds and storms, now sinks upon the ground ;
That cedar which could flourish even in age,
And with its boughs o'ershade the states around.
The stroke is given, the cedar dies,
And on the plain extended lies.

Behold the king of kings supreme in power,
Death from his brow has thirty diadems torn ;
His power extensive's vanished in an hour,
Crowns can't preserve the men by whom they're worn.

Oh, haughty race ! oh, race august !
You now are levelled with the dust.

The tomb absorbs his very name,
He's now no longer the renowned ;
That he once reigned is all his fame,
No courtiers now his praise resound.
Thus kings, when once life's breath is fled,
Are numbered with the vulgar dead.

Ah ! wherefore did he not his squadrons head,
Where Eugene deluged deep the ensanguined field ;
His numerous cohorts by their monarch led,
Had made the allied army quit the field.

256      Death of the Emperor Charles.

    Their arms the Empire had upheld,
    And the invading Turks repelled.

Had he not idly loitered in a town,
    And none but his own chiefs with dread inspired ;
Had he to pull the haughty sultan down,
    Warm with ambition's noble flame aspired :
    Had he fell Turkish rage restrained,
    And from his subjects' blood refrained ;

All war declining like a monarch sage,
    Had he to mankind shown himself a friend ;
With virtue, arts, and plenty, blessed the age,
    And to alarms and discord put an end ;
    Revived the peace to Rome once known,
    When great Augustus filled the throne ;

Then fame had round him waved her purple wings.
    With glorious light his head encircled round :
He had been placed among illustrious kings,
    He had been as a patriot king renowned.
    Happy had been the monarch's fate,
    Esteemed not only good but great.

I don't the harmonious art of verse profane,
    I do not dip my pen in satire's gall ;
Apollo disapproves the audacious strain,
    I must not one reproachful word let fall.
    I must not by one single line
    Offend a king ; the royal power's divine.

Death of the Emperor Charles. 257

But sacred truth, impartial goddess fame,
Thou to whose orders mortals still attend;
Love of mankind, which does my breast inflame,
Your needful succor to my genius lend.
Do you my lays inspire,
Mortals I'll teach to aspire.

Monarch, death cites you to that court august,
Wherein posterity, a judge most sage,
Shall pass on you a sentence wise and just,
Trusting the depositions of your age.
'Tis to posterity alone,
The real worth of kings is known.
Vol. 36—17

TO THE QUEEN OF HUNGARY.

---

PRINCESS, descended from that noble race
Which still in danger held the imperial throne,
Who human nature and thy sex dost grace,
Whose virtues even thy foes are forced to own.

The generous French, as fierce as they're polite,
Who to true glory constantly aspire ;
Whilst obstinately they against thee fight,
Thy virtue and great qualities admire.

The French and Germans leagued by wondrous ties,
Make Christendom one dismal scene of woe ;
And from their friendship greater ills arise,
Than e'er did from their longest quarrels flow.

Thus from the equator and the frozen pole,
The impetuous winds drive on with headlong
force

Two clouds, which as they on each other roll,
Forth from their sable skirts the thunder force.

Do virtuous kings such ruin then ordain ?
A calm they promise, but excite a storm :
Felicity we hope for from their reign,
Whilst they with slaughter dire the earth deform.

Oh ! Fleury, wise and venerable sage,
Whom good ne'er dazzles, danger ne'er alarms ;
Who dost exceed the ancient Nestor's age :
Must Europe never cease to be in arms ?

To the Queen of Hungary. 259

Would thou couldst hold with prudent, steady hand,
Europa's balance, shut up Janus' shrine ;
Make feuds and discords cease at thy command,
And bring from heaven Astrea, maid divine.

Would France's treasures were dispersed no more,
But prudently within the realm applied ;
Opulence to our cities to restore,
And make them flourishing on every side.

You arts from heaven, and from the muses sprung,
Whom Louis brought triumphant into France ;
Too long your hands are idle, lyres unstrung,
'Tis time to start from so profound a trance.

Your labors are of lasting glory sure,
Whilst warlike pomps, the triumphs of a day,
Blaze for a moment, never long endure,
But soon like fleeting shadows pass away.

INSCRIBED TO THE GENTLEMEN OF
THE ACADEMY OF SCIENCES, WHO SAILED TO THE POLAR CIRCLE
AND THE EQUATOR, IN ORDER TO ASCERTAIN THE FIGURE OF THE EARTH.

---

OH TRUTH sublime ! Urania, heavenly maid !
Bright emanation of the eternal mind,
By whom all nature's secrets are displayed,
Who ranges the heavens with spirit unconfined ;

Whilst you those heroes o'er the seas attend,
Sages and ministers of thy sacred laws,
From the equator to the pole, attend
The words of one that's zealous in thy cause.

On what great business are thy sons intent ?
They mean to pull the veil from nature's face ;
On most important truths their minds are bent,
To find earth's mass, its figure and its space.

Their voyage has even roused the silent shades,
I see those Grecian heroes' ghosts arise,
Chiefs whom in Colchis the admiring maids
Beheld in times of yore with ravished eyes.

Ye argonauts, ye demi-gods of Greece,
The twins and Orpheus, thou whose sure address
Found means to win the much-famed golden fleece,
And fair Medea's charms divine possess ;

To the Gentlemen of the Academy. 261

When our famed worthies' labors you behold,
Your own exploits you view with conscious
shame ;

The brightest glories of the times of old
Are vanquished and eclipsed by modern fame.

Whene'er Greece spoke the listening world admired ;
And ever her falsehoods could regard obtain ;
Her writers were by vanity inspired
Highly to celebrate achievements vain.

Happy the first in glory's great career,
They're still successful in acquiring fame ;
Whilst those who later in the lists appear,
By all their efforts scarce procure a name.

Falsehood in memory's temple makes abode ;
Engraves there by credulity's weak hand,
Annals which must to every age be showed,
Which as the monuments of truth must stand.

Those fables, oh! Urania, heavenly maid,
Those names illustrious, usurped, deface ;
By thee be to the admiring world displayed,
Of real heroes the illustrious race.

The Genoese, who the new world first found,
Cortés who vanquished it, with great surprise
Seeing our sages earth's extent sail round,
In terms like these extolled the enterprise :

"Our great achievements were by all men praised,
Our glorious actions none could emulate,
Those to whom mortals oft have altars raised,
Were less entitled to the name of great.

262 To the Gentlemen of the Academy.

“We have done much, 'tis true ; you have done more ;
Plutus was in America our guide ;
Virtue's your leader, whilst you earth explore,
Your breasts resolved in virtue still confide.”

Whilst thus they spoke, Newton from heaven looked down,

Newton upon them fixed his piercing eyes,
And said, “your labors shall my labors crown,
Like me to glory's summit you shall rise.”

Whilst mortals, objects of contempt and scorn,
Under the yoke of prepossession bend ;
Wretches who might as well have ne'er been born,
Since ere they learn to live, their lives have end ;

To truth let your immortal spirits soar,
Pour on all minds bright truth's refulgent day ;
To you the mighty God whom you adore,
Has given of His divinity a ray.

It is His pleasure that you cultivate
The genius which He only can bestow ;
He that instructs mankind is truly great,
The noblest object we behold below.

But above all, that monster, envy, fly,
And its cursed offspring, which with hellish ire
Pursues all merit. Envy sure should die,
In those pure souls who to the heavens aspire.

Let a vile Zoilus, who carps at all,
Revile each genius who adorns the age ;
Let him his venal quill still dip in gall,
Act basely, write with rancor and with rage.

To the Gentlemen of the Academy. 263

Copy those blessed spirits—sons of light—

Who in the empyrean wear a starry crown ;
Who like the great First Mover from the height
Of heaven, on mortals look propitious down.

TO M. DE GERVASI, THE PHYSICIAN.*

---

You returned to Paris a physician renowned,
Those you cured of the plague your just praises
resound ;

Like Hippocrates' self you restored the diseased,
And the pestilence's rage by your art was appeased ;
At Maisons, meantime, I lay on a sickbed,
And thought I should in a few moments be dead.
The grim king of terrors, relentless death,
Shook his terrible scythe, I was gasping for breath ;
Old Charon pushed forward, with sail and with oar,
And I thought I should soon see the famed Stygian shore :

But like Æsculapius you came to my aid,
And death from his conqueror retreated dismayed.
Had you undertaken dear Genonville to cure,
He had from death's direful attacks been secure ;
He'd have lived, and I still had the pleasure enjoyed
Of his converse, with which I could never be cloyed,
And my eyes, which in death had been closed but for you,

Tears for a lost friend would not each day bedew.
To you and your care I own myself debtor,
That of my disease I have now got the better ;

* M. de Gervasi, a celebrated physician of Paris, had been sent to cure the plague, and at his return he cured the author of smallpox, at the castle of Maisons, six leagues from Paris, in 1723.

That now all my griefs and afflictions have end,
 That I still am beloved, and I still love my friend ;
 Maisons, my physician, I shall now see once more,
 Maisons, the physician, that cured me before ;
 Maisons, whose deep science surpasses his age,
 Who rivals in medical skill the Greek sage.
 I hope my last tragedy will not disgust
 The virtuous Sully, as brave as he's just ;
 That his generous heart may find it pleasure
 To see me revived, and intent upon measure ;
 And that famed Mariamne's distress may impart,
 Some tender sensations to his generous heart.
 You gardens of Villars, seats with bliss ever crowned,
 'Twas there I again met the hero renowned ;
 Whom peace crowned with olive to his country brings,
 Triumphant and joyous upon victory's wings :
 There I saw Richelieu gay, the delight of his age,
 Whose wit and vivacity all men engage ;
 When Richelieu appears, all my misery ends,
 He'll soon reunite me to his amiable friends ;
 And thou Bolingbroke, by Apollo inspired,
 As an orator, wit, and a statesman admired :
 You to whom I so often have listened before,
 I shall live and improve by your converse once more ;
 But what sad idea possesses my mind,
 Shall my mistress, shall my charming mistress be kind ?
 Her image was strongly impressed on my heart,
 When I thought I was ready from this world to depart ;

Her virtues, her graces, and her charms divine,
The pleasures I tasted when I once called her mine,
In my last moments cherished my amorous fire,
And my heart's love possessed when I thought to expire.

Can she then have forgot me, can she then prove un-
kind?

But wretch as I am, why so wanders my mind?
From death scarce escaped, can love still in my breast,

Be of all my affections and my reason possessed.

THE REQUISITES TO HAPPINESS.

---

A MAN must think, or else the brute
May his superior worth dispute ;
A man must love, for were it not
For love, most hard would be his lot.

A man must always have a friend,
To whose advice he may attend ;
Whose friendly sympathy still knows
Our bliss to increase, assuage our woes.

He must at the approach of night,
Still sup with freedom and delight ;
Drink the best wine, and dainties eat,
And make before he's drunk, retreat.

Each night he must his love declare,
With raptures to the yielding fair ;
Must when awake her charms adore.
And when he sleeps must dream them o'er.

My friends, you surely will allow,
That I true bliss have shown you now ;
And when my Sylvia I addressed,
I soon was of such bliss possessed.

TO A LADY, VERY WELL KNOWN TO THE WHOLE TOWN.

---

PHILLIS, how much the times are changed,
Since in a hack the town you ranged,
Since without finery or train you shone,
Conspicuous for your charms alone ;
When though you supped on sorry fare,
You nectar seemed with gods to share.
You foolishly to one consigned
Beauty which might charm all mankind :
A desperate lover, who for life
Engaged you when he made his wife.
You then no treasure did inherit,
Your beauty was your only merit,
Your bosom charms divine displayed ;
There Cupid still an ambush laid ;
Your heart was tender, and your mind
To youthful frolics much inclined.
With so many charms endued,
What woman e'er could be a prude ?
That fault, oh ! beauty all divine,
Was very far from being thine ;
Because of favors you were free,
You were the better liked by me.
How differently you live, grown great,
Your life is but the farce of state ;

The hoary porter, who still plies
At your own door, and tells such lies,
Is a just emblem of the age,
His very looks ill-luck presage ;
He thinks the duty of his place is
To drive away the loves and graces.
The tender swain's abashed, afraid
Your pompous palace to invade.
When you were young, to my amazement
I've seen them enter at the casement ;
I've seen them enter every day,
And in your chamber nimbly play.
Not all your carpets, and your plate,
Not all your proud parade of state,
Those goblets which so brightly shine,
Graved by Germain with art divine ;
Those closets nobly furnished, where
Martin's exceeds the China ware,
Your vases of Japan, and all
The brittle wonders of your hall ;
Your diamond pendants which appear
With such bright lustre at each ear ;
Your solitaires so dazzling bright,
Your pomp which strikes the gazer's sight,
Are worth one quarter of that bliss,
Which once you imparted by a kiss.

FANATICISM.*

---

ASPASIA, whose heroic mind
Nobly aspires the truth to find ;
Who in philosophy profound,
The nature of thy God hath found ;
You know that Being great, supreme,
From you His emanations beam ;
Of all His works the most complete,
Your genius shows that He is great ;
You worthy homage to Him pay,
O'er you weak error bears no sway.
But as you wisely still reject
The errors of the godless sect :
Fanaticism's rage unblest
You fly and equally detest ;
You worship the eternal power
Without false zeal, austere sour ;
False zeal, which bigot souls inspires,
And oft with rage destructive fires.
A subject thus sincere and just,
Before his monarch's throne august,
Free from all servile awe can stand,
Nor flatter like the courtly band.

Fanaticism's frantic flame
First from religion's altars came ;
That fiend profanes her rights divine,
And men with horror fly the shrine.

* This ode was written in the year 1732.

Religion, he profanes thy name,
Thy kindred he presumes to claim ;
From you, that horrid pest of earth
Pretends that he derives his birth.
Could such a mother e'er be cursed
With such a son of fiends the worst ?

Sometimes we in an atheist's mind
Humanity's fairest virtues find ;
Their error always to their heart
Does not contagion vile impart.
Desbarreaux* was with mildness blest,
Justice and candor filled his breast :
The God, with whom he strove in vain
A senseless combat to maintain,
His weakness with compassion viewed,
And with some worth his soul endued.
I own, I should be much inclined
To pity him as mad and blind,
Who in his folly should deny
That the sun's rays pervade the sky.
A man does not so much blaspheme
Denying God, the judge supreme,
As when he paints Him to mankind
As cruel, and to wrath inclined,
Taking delight in human woes,
His creatures treating as His foes.

* Desbarreaux was a counsellor of parliament; when he made his clients wait any considerable time, he paid the suit costs.

When man by error is misled,
When superstition turns his head,
When that chimera's baleful force
Has poisoned pure religion's source,
His heart relentless grows, and hard,
Access to reason is debarred;
His fury nothing can assuage,
His justice then is turned to rage;
No more compunction he can feel,
But sacrilege commits through zeal.

In that court, by the French proscribed,
Whose horrors scarce can be described,
In that cursed court where truth's profaned,
Reason by ignorance enchained;
The reverend tyrants without shame
Made Galileo truth disclaim;
Thy system, oh! illustrious sage,
Abjure, to calm their barbarous rage.

In the most silent hour of night
See Paris filled with dire affright;
See carnage raging all around,
Thousands expiring on the ground;
Brothers by brothers slain, expire,
The son assassinates the sire;
Against the husband see the wife
In frenzy turn the murderous knife;
Inhuman priests their rage excite,
In blood and slaughter they delight.

Noted for manners mild, and mirth,
Can the French owe to these their birth?
You Jansenists and Molinists, who
Each other with such hate pursue;
Who fierce disputes and contests hold,
As Grecian sophists did of old;
Fear lest your quarrels should once more
Occasion bloodshed as before.
With less of furious rage contend,
You know not where your jars may end.

The Grecian sages you despise,
Though by the world reputed wise;
Their ignorance dark as shades of night,
Is dissipated by your light:
But though such guides were weak and blind,
Though oft they might mislead mankind,
They ne'er made persecution rage;
Copy their moderation sage.
Their various errors you may blame,
But let your mildness be the same.

Ye wretches, would you comprehend
Religion's nature and its end,
Behold Marseilles, when every gale
Did pestilence and death exhale,
When the tomb swallowed up the dead,
The land when ruin overspread
The towns of citizens, the plains
Deprived of the industrious swains,
And Terror filled each neighboring state,
Lest they should share its hapless fate.

The good Belzuns* then strove to save
His flock from the devouring grave :
Langeron prodigal of breath,
Braved all the fierce attacks of death ;
While you strained hard with labor vain
Your trivial dogmas to sustain ;
And all your conferences were full
Of Father Quesnel, and the bull ;
Points, by the knowing valued not,
And which will shortly be forgot.

Must we, to instruct the human race,
Humanity itself deface ?
Must hatred's torch light on the way,
Lest we from sacred truth should stray ?
The man who can compassion show,
Whose heart can feel another's woe,
Can by example virtue teach,
Seems most persuasively to preach.
The pedant, with o'erweening pride,
Intent to argue and decide,
Who blows up persecution's flame,
A vile impostor we should name.

* M. de Belzuns, bishop of Marseilles, and M. de Langeron, the governor, in person, administered remedies to the infected; though the priests and physicians would not venture to come near them.

ON PEACE CONCLUDED IN 1736.

---

ÆTNA within its cavern dire,
Thunder conceals and liquid fire;
On earth the fiery torrent pours,
And its inhabitants devours,
Your steps, afflicted Dryads, turn
From dreary plains which always burn;
Those caverns where hell seems to breathe
In fire and sulphur from beneath;
Those gulfs which to Tartarus bend,
Their furious floods incessant send.

More fierce and terrible the Po
Makes its fierce stream its banks o'erflow;
Pours through the plain its furious waves,
Foams, and with dreadful uproar raves:
It spreads destruction through the plain,
Fright, terror, death, compose its train;
And through Ferrara's fire conveys
The spoils of nations to the seas.

This war where elements contend,
Which heaven's expanse with fury rend;
These shocks from which all nature quakes,
With which earth's solid basis shakes:
Scourges of heaven which oft appear
To hang o'er this sad hemisphere;

Are all disasters much less dire,
 Than statesmen who too high aspire ;
 From them less desolation springs,
 Than from the dangerous feuds of kings.

From India's verge to Gallia's shore,
 One family the sun rolls o'er :
 O'er this love only still should reign,
 And union amongst all maintain.
 Mortals, you're bound by sacred tie,
 Therefore those cruel arms lay by ;
 Can you advantage gain by fight ?
 Can you in havoc find delight ?
 When you're sunk in death's dismal gloom,
 What bliss expect you in the tomb ?

Those soldiers well deserve applause,
 Who combat in their country's cause ;
 But you for hire your lives expose,
 You're paid to combat others' foes :
 You die to prop some tyrant's throne,
 Some tyrant to your eyes unknown ;
 You are hired assassins to defend
 Lords, who ill pay you in the end.

Such are those greedy birds of prey,
 Those animals which man obey,
 Who can their native fierceness tame,
 And teach them to pursue their game.
 The sounding horn excites their rage,
 And makes them ardent to engage ;

They headlong pour upon the game,
Not led by interest, choice, or fame;
The victory they strive to gain,
Although no prize they can obtain.

Italy, climate of delight,
How much you suffered by the fight!
With desolation covered o'er,
You're Europe's garden now no more!
An army of confederate powers,
With greediness your crops devours;
Although the cursed, destructive band,
Vowed to avenge your injured land:
Ravaged and desolate you fight
To assert a foreign master's right.

Let kings be armed, yet discords cease,
Let them all reign like gods of peace;
Let them the thunder bear on high,
But never launch it through the sky.
The faithful shepherd, who befriends
His flock, and with due care attends;
By care and diligence obtains
The applause of all the neighboring swains:
Unpitied may that shepherd die,
Who lets his flocks neglected lie,
Who can his fleecy care expose,
To perish by the wolves, their foes.

In that king's fame, can I take part,
Whose frenzy stabs me to the heart:
A king, at whose capricious will,
My heart's blood I'm obliged to spill?

When I'm by indigence oppressed,
 Diseased, deprived of needful rest ;
 Say, shall my lot more blessed appear,
 When I our prince's glories hear ;
 Shall my distresses all be o'er,
 If German plains are drenched in gore?
 Colbert, whose praises we resound,
 Who planted arts on Gallic ground,
 France shall revere you as a sage ;
 Posterity in every age
 Shall own you born the land to bless.
 And Louvois be applauded less,
 Louvois, who with ambition dire,
 Set the Palatinate on fire ;
 And Holland to destroy aspired,
 Had with his fury fate conspired.

Let Louis, even in decline,
 Still as the greatest monarch shine :
 But may he wisely fame acquire,
 Not to the conqueror's wreath aspire ;
 Louis in peace claims just applause,
 His subjects all revere his laws ;
 Their happiness from Louis springs—
 Louis, the greatest, best of kings.

TO ABBÉ CHAULIEU.*

---

SULLY, July 3, 1717.

To THEE who dost in lyric lays
Rival the famed Anacreon's praise,
Who dost voluptuous pleasure preach,
And by your life free living teach ;
Thou blessed with such a tuneful mind,
That when to bed by gout confined,
Thy lute there yields as pleasing sounds
As at a feast where mirth abounds—

I write to you from Sully, where Chapelle lived, that is, got drunk for two years together. I wish he had left something of his poetical talent in this castle; it would be very convenient for those who undertake to write to you. But as we are told that he bequeathed it entirely to you, I was obliged to have recourse to magic, of which you have frequently made mention.

Then searching all the castle round,
Soon as the darkest tower I found,

* This epistle, consisting partly of verse, and partly of prose, is one of our author's first works. Chapelle, who is here spoken of, was a man of easy genius, and had a turn to libertinism; he had been much given to drinking, which was the vice of his age; both his constitution and his genius were greatly impaired by this practice.

I called upon gay Chapelle's sprite
From realms where reigns eternal night.
To the infernal gods I made
No offering when I called the shade,
Like knaves who erst in servile days,
Loudly sang forth their godhead's praise ;
Or Endor's witch whose cursed art
With terror struck Saul's dastard heart,
Who thought the devil before his eyes
Had made the prophet's spectre rise.
But we can raise a bard from hell,
Without a magic rite or spell :
A song alone must sure suffice,
To make a poet's ghost arise ;
I thus addressed him : "Much loved friend,
Chapelle, from Pluto's realms ascend.
A poet wants your kindly aid,
A poet now invokes your shade.
Yet we are told, propitious gods
Have raised you to the blessed abodes,
And placed you 'twixt the powers divine,
That over verse preside, and wine.
Therefore, kind Chapelle, much loved friend,
From realms above on earth descend."
This prayer familiarly addressed,
Was heard with favor by the blessed,
Though it to merit had no claim,
But being offered in your name.
Before me Chapelle stood confessed,
With transport glowed my ravished breast ;
In one hand he held forth the lyre,
Which charmed so oft the heavenly choir,

Gassendi's* works he with him brought,
With various, well-framed systems fraught ;
He on Bachaunon leaning walked,
And with him of his journey talked ;
A journey which, whilst he recited,
All those that heard him were delighted.

I asked him by what art he, during his residence in our world,

Touching his lyre could always please
With flowing numbers, and with ease,
Which nature only could impart,
Which ne'er were faulty found by art ?
He said : "By love and wine alone,
To me the power of verse was known.
To witty Chaulieu for a time,
I taught the happy art to rhyme ;
To you he should in turn impart
The precepts of the tuneful art."

*Chapelle was educated by Gassendi, and became a great partisan of the philosophical system of his master. Whenever he was intoxicated with liquor, he explained Gassendi's system to all present, and when they were gone, he continued holding forth to the steward.

ANSWER TO THE FOREGOING.

---

SIR:—I should never have thought that such a man as you could have any faith in spirits, and still less that you could believe what they say when they return from God knows where. The Epicurean philosophers, to whose sect you say I belong, have, thank heaven, enabled me to doubt of the reality of Chapelle's apparition, and equally to distrust the insinuations of his shade, of your politeness, and of my own self-love, which you have with great address endeavored to interest upon this occasion. Among many other good reasons which should induce you to distrust this apparition, you have in yourself an essential one, which should determine you to give it no sort of credit, as it did me.

Do not believe a lying shade,
Who bids you learn the poet's trade
From me, so much below you;
Such progress you have in it made,
That only Phœbus' heavenly aid
Can now new light bestow you.

This is all I can say in answer to the prettiest letter that ever was written, a letter whose flattery I should not listen to, and whose brilliancy of imagination deters me from attempting to answer it in form, as the answer would, in all likelihood, be unworthy of a pupil of Chapelle, to whom you might very possibly show it, as you have so great an intimacy with him forty years after his death.

But though I distrust my head, I am always sure of my heart, and in proof of the esteem and affection I have for you, of which you ask me a token that cannot be called in question, I shall with the sincerity which I have always professed, tell you my real opinion of the affair which you have communicated to me.

PARIS, July 26, 1717.

TO PRESIDENT HÉNAULT, AUTHOR OF AN EXCELLENT WORK UPON THE HISTORY OF FRANCE.

---

CIREY, Sept. 2, 1744.

GODDESS who dost make blessed the earth,
Health, who to temperance owest thy birth,
Who pleasures to the wife dispense,
Whose joys are governed by good sense,
Who dost with gilded rays adorn
Our youth, of life the brilliant morn ;
And oft dost cheer life's gloomy close
With calm content and soft repose ;
Oh, health-dispensing goddess, now
Listen propitious to my vow ;
By thy kind star conduct to rest
A mortal worthy to be blessed.
All other gods unite to shed
Their blessings upon Hénault's head.
Will you, who hold the place of all,
Alone prove deaf to Hénault's call ?
To sweet society once more,
And to his noble feats restore
Hénault, whose happy vein of wit
Can every taste and genius hit.
To him your needful succor lend,
For him time's rapid course suspend ;
So well he knows time to employ,
So well divides 'twixt care and joy.

Women, enchanted by his ease,
Have thought he only knew to please ;
Men, who the depth of science sound,
Have ever thought him most profound ;
The god of jollity and mirth
Thinks him the merriest soul on earth.
Immortal as his works, may he
Live late posterity to see,
Live long as all the kings, his pen
So well brings to the view of men,
Whose characters so well he draws,
Their deeds relates, explains their laws.
Since he so many ways has shone,
Restore his stomach to its tone.
Of every talent he's possessed,
With every virtue glows his breast ;
The art to please is all his own,
The art to enjoy to him is known ;
All this, however, is a jest,
If he's unable to digest.
I wonder not that Desfontaines,
Who tires all mortals with his strain,
Should in his garret midst his lumber
Of dusty books have easy slumber,
That he should still be in good case,
Though void of virtue and of grace.
Aglaia or Sylvia ne'er invite
Pedants who without genius write,
Whose heaped citations readers tire
Whose writings dulness' fumes inspire ;
His company all mortals cloy,
He is reduced to herd with boys.

Alas! to geniuses alone.

These indigestions cursed are known.

After this hymn to the goddess of health, which I have made with the utmost sincerity of friendship, permit me, sir, to add to it mentally a short Gloria Patri. I have as much occasion for it as you, but I am more solicitous about your welfare than my own. May the goddess of health first shower down her favors upon you; drink the waters of Plombières cheerfully, and return with all speed to Cirey before the Austrian hussars enter Lorraine. Such folks give no waters to drink but those of the river Styx. Do not forget that amongst the multitude of your well-wishers there are two here who desire that you should stop awhile in your journey for their sakes.

CANTO OF AN EPIC POEM.*

COMPOSED BY JEROME CARRÉ.
Found among his papers after his decease.

---

KING CHARLES was born to undergo,
Through every stage of life, much woe ;
To education naught he owed ;
Small care was on his youth bestowed ;
Burgundy's duke, † in broils and strife
Involved him in the prime of life ;
A lawyer at Gonesse would fain
Have wrought his ruin by chicane ;
Before a court a crier called him ;
An English chief in battle mauled him :
He wandered much, and, like poor sinner,
Oft missed a mass, and oft a dinner ;
Not long in the same place he stayed ;
By mother, ‡ uncle, friends betrayed,
And by his mistress ; thus unfriended
Was the poor king, and unattended.
His Agnes' heart an English page
Found means to share as to engage :

* This pseudonymous piece was used, slightly altered, in "La Pucelle." The references are to certain calumniators of Voltaire.

† The Duke of Burgundy, who assassinated the duke of Orleans ; but the good King Charles paid him well for it at the bridge of Montreuil.

‡ His own mother, Isabella of Bavaria, was his greatest persecutor. She promoted the Treaty of Troyes, by which her son-in-law, Henry V., king of England, obtained the crown of France.

A sorcerer dire, named Conculix,
By hell inspired, with magic tricks
His head quite topsy-turvy turned;
By destiny he long was spurned;
Hardships to bear was his sad case;
To bear them well God gave him grace.
The troop of lovers, proud and gay,
Took from that distant tower its way,
Where Conculix disturbed the brain
Of Agnes, Bonneau, and their train.
They marched along that forest wild,
Which now of Orleans is styled.
The spouse of Titan, queen of night,
Rising scarce streaked the shades with light;
Soldiers they saw on distant ground,
With doublets short and bonnets round;
Upon their corselets bright combined
Leopards and fleurs-de-lis shined.
The monarch halted when he spied
The cohort through the forest ride;
Dunois and Joan some space before
Advance, the matter to explore.
Agnes, her arms as lilies white
Extending, urged the king to flight;
But virtuous Joan, who straight drew nigh,
On captives chained soon cast her eye;
With downcast eyes the earth they viewed,
Each face sad consternation showed:
"Alas," said she, "it plain appears,
That these are captive cavaliers;
The voice of duty now commands
From fetters to unloose their hands:

Let's fall on, Bastard, undismayed ;
You're Dunois, I am Orleans' maid."
This said, they fell with rested lance
On those who with the chiefs advance ;
So fierce were Dunois and the maid,
Such fury, too, the ass displayed,
That all those warriors, filled with fright,
Nimble betook themselves to flight.
Joan then, transported with delight,
Accosted thus each fettered knight :
"Knights, who the chains of England wore,
Thanks to the king, you're slaves no more ;
Now follow him where'er he goes,
And wreak just vengeance on his foes."
Although this was proposed with grace,
Distrust still sat on each knight's face ;
My readers with impatience glow
Who were these doughty knights to know.
These knights were blades in Paris known
For deeds they would not choose to own,
Who were condemned to plough the seas,
Which might by all be seen with ease.
The king this seeing, deeply sighed ;
"These stab me to the heart," he cried.
"Do here the English empire claim,
Are then decrees made in their name ?
The mass is only said for them ;
They can my subjects now condemn."
The king came, by compassion led,
To him who seemed the band to head.
No felon's air could eyes shock more ;
His beard a pointed chin curled o'er,
Vol. 36—19

With strange distortion rolled his eyes
Replete, more than his mouth, with lies,
They squinted ever on the ground ;
His eyebrows red most sternly frowned ;
There sat imposture, leagued with fraud ;
Boldness dwelt on his forehead broad,
Contempt of all remorse and laws,
His teeth still gnashed, and foamed his jaws.
Seeing his prince, the knave took care
To assume an humble, contrite air,
And framed into some show of grace
The features of his shocking face.
The mastiff impudent and sour,
Hoarse-throated, eager to devour,
Thus fawns when he his master spies,
Licks both his hands, and crouching lies ;
Grows mild, although by nature rude,
And humbly cringes for his food.
Or Satan has been painted so,
When just 'scaped from the realms below ;
He horns and tail hides from the eyes,
And in an anchorite's disguise,
Like lecherous monk in secret goes,
Sister discreet to tempt, or Rose.
The king of France, by such grimace
Imposed on, pitied much his case,
And thinking him by fraud oppressed,
Words of encouragement addressed.
"What is your trade," said he, "and name ?
Say, for what deed deserving blame
Severe tribunals thus ordain
That you should plough the angry main ?"

The man condemned, with mournful tone,
 Replied: "Great Sir, my name's Frélon;*
 Nantes is the famous city, where
 These lips first breathed the vital air;
 No mortal e'er loved Jesus more,
 Some time the dress of monks I wore;
 My morals are as pure as theirs;
 The prettiest boys had all my cares;
 Urged by the love of honest praise,
 To virtue I consigned my days;
 Genius at Paris I displayed,
 Famed in the author's noble trade;
 Dearly L—— my writings bought,
 Great I at Place-Maubert am thought;
 There justice never was refused me,
 Though authors often have abused me:
 But impious malice oft would hit me,
 And with the cloister's vices twit me,
 The world's, and many cheats beside,
 But I'm by conscience justified."
 The king, when this account he hears,
 Cries: "Henceforth lay aside your fears;
 And say, are all now bound like you
 To Marseilles, valiant men and true?"
 "Oh, royal Sir," Frélon replied,
 "In all these men you may confide;

*According to the chronicles of that age, there was a fellow of the name of Frélon, who wrote pamphlets and lampoons. He played some pranks, for which he was frequently confined in the Châtelet, at Bicêtre, and at Fort l'Éveque. He had been for some time a monk, and had been expelled from the convent. Many celebrated authors have done him justice. He was a native of Nantes; and at Paris carried on the trade of satirical gazetteer.

All were alike by nature framed.
 This abbé next me, Guignon* named,
 Is, though he otherwise might seem
 To some, most worthy of esteem ;
 Nor quarrelsome nor liar he,
 Nor slanderer, but from malice free.
 An humble mien cannot conceal
 In Maucheix† true religious zeal ;
 His ardor, for the truth to show,
 He discipline would undergo.
 When Chaugat‡ talks on gloss and text,
 Rabbins themselves would be perplexed.
 That lawyer unemployed has taken
 The road to heaven, the bar forsaken.
 In Vaceras§ all virtues meet,
 He's honest, and his temper's sweet,
 He's mild, to charity inclined,
 The love of truth inspires his mind.
 All these who laurels justly claim,
 Who rival Cicero's great name,
 Oh, dire disgrace and sad to tell !
 Victims like me to envy fell.
 Unjustly to our charge 'tis laid,
 That we from truth have often strayed :
 From virtue persecution springs,
 You know this truth, oh, best of kings."

* An author who lived in the reign of Charles VI. He wrote a Roman history, which, though execrably bad, was tolerable for the age in which he lived.

† Another calumniator of that age.

‡ Another calumniator.

§ He wrote, in conjunction with Dr. John Petit, to justify assassination.

Whilst thus all faults he strove to hide,
Two persons grave the monarch spied,
Whilst each to hide his visage tries,
"Who are these bashful slaves?" he cries.
Said Frélon: "There two worthies stand,
Honest as e'er took oar in hand.
One's Fantin,* preacher of great name,
Whom neither rich nor poor can blame;
To spare the living he thought best,
The dying robbed whom he confessed.
T'other's Brizet,† who nuns directed,
No favors from them he expected,
But still their properties would take,
And only did it for God's sake:
Though money he loved not at all,
He'd not in bad hands have it fall.
A wretch there meets your royal eye,
With a long head placed quite awry,
On number three it often runs,
He looks like one of Tartuffe's sons,
All his cursed tricks his village knows,
He's pointed at where'er he goes,

* This canto of the abbé Triteme seems to be a prophecy; we have in fact seen one Fantin, a doctor of divinity and curate at Versailles, who was caught stealing a note of fifty louis-d'or from a sick person whom he confessed; he was turned out, but he was not hanged.

† Another prophecy. All Paris has seen Abbé Brizet, a famous director of women of quality, squander in secret debaucheries the money he extorted from his penitents, and which he was intrusted with for the relief of the poor. It seems highly probable that somebody, acquainted with our manners, has inserted these lines in the divine poem of Jerome Carré; the same person should have made mention of Abbé Lacoste, condemned to be branded and sent to the galleys for life, in 1759, for various impositions.

Such stories of him go about,
That some are true, I make no doubt,
But wretches with such malice fraught,
Are quite below a monarch's thought.
This noble band of worthies ends
With Meaulabelle,* my best of friends ;
This the most mean but most devoted
Of six poor dogs who for me voted ;
He oft quite rapt with thoughts high flown,
Takes others' pockets for his own :
But in his works he is so wise,
To hide strong truths from feeble eyes ;
Of truth he always had a dread,
He knows it fools has oft misled ;
Therefore he always would conceal it,
And never liked much to reveal it.
The truth I to my prince declare ;
That's dealing openly and fair.
All as a hero you excel,
This to posterity I'll tell.
The victims of black calumny
Protect, as you have made them free ;
Save the good from the wicked's snare,
To pay us, and revenge, take care,
And here Frélon his word does plight,
We all will in your favor write."
Then at the English much he railed,
Who had so long in France prevailed ;
Spoke loudly for the Salic law,
And swore that he his pen would draw ;

* Meaulabelle, another falsifier of manuscripts, well known in that age.

Would save the state by it alone,
And prop his injured monarch's throne.
The king admired his skill profound,
Looked kindly upon all around ;
Telling them with most gracious air,
They all should his protection share.
Fair Agnes sympathy expressed,
Emotions tender filled her breast :
Her heart was good ; the female mind,
By love, to mercy is inclined ;
The heroine and the rigid prude
With virtue are not so endued.
"It needs," said she, "must be confessed,
This day these wretches have been blessed ;
Since they behold your royal face,
Freedom smiles on their happy race.
Too much the judges now presume,
Without their prince to fix men's doom ;
All law my lover should ordain,
Their sentence is both void and vain."
But Joan, less tender, told the king,
They all deserved alike to swing ;
That all who were of Frélon's trade,
Public examples should be made.
Dunois, more prudent and more wise,
Like warrior deeply skilled, replies :
"Soldiers we lack to assert our right,
Limbs are most needful in a fight ;
Limbs these men have, and as things stand,
Whilst we by arms would win the land,
Whilst combats are our only care,
Writing we may contrive to spare :

Then let us lift the fraudulent band,
And with a musket arm each hand ;
Who used the pen, should henceforth wield
The warrior's arms in tented field."'
Dunois' advice the king liked well ;
The band before him prostrate fell,
They sighed, a flood of tears they shed,
Then to a yard they all were led,
Before the banquet-house, where all
The courtiers, in a gorgeous hall,
Waited on Charles, and on the fair,
And drank and feasted, void of care.
Agnes to Bonneau gave command,
With plenty to regale the band ;
And not one soul of them complained,
For well they fared with what remained.
The time of supper gayly spent,
To bed the king and Agnes went.
Next day with great surprise they rose,
Finding they all had lost their clothes ;
Her jewels Agnes sought with care,
And pearl necklace rich and rare ;
But all in vain ; yet what she most
Regretted, was Charles' picture lost.
Bonneau, the purser, could not find
The treasure to his care consigned ;
It cost him many a heavy groan,
To see plate, linen, wardrobe, flown.
The scribbling crew, to thieving bred,
Who by the gazetteer were led,
With eager haste, had in the night
Plundered the court, and taken flight.

They all with Plato were agreed,
That soldiers luxury don't need ;
Then through by-path their way they win,
And share the booty at an inn ;
There they a tract composed profound,
For morals and for doctrine sound ;
Pleasure and wealth it taught to scorn,
And showed that man for man was born ;
That, born equals, they should share
God's gifts, and all their burdens bear ;
And that, to make their lot more blessed,
Goods should in common be possessed.
'Twas soon exposed to public view,
Enriched with notes and comments, too,
Wrote with religious, good intent,
With preface and advertisement.
The royal household, quite distressed,
Was, the meantime, deprived of rest ;
Through every forest and each plain
They ran about, but all in vain.
Thus Phineus erst whom Thrace obeyed,
And thus Æneas were afraid,
When harpies, fluttering on the wing,
Seized on the dinner of each king.
Agnes and Dorothea now,
Their charms to cover knew not how :
Poor Bonneau grieved in such a strain,
From laughter they could scarce refrain :
"Ah," cried he, "we such loss ne'er bore
By war's sad fortune heretofore ;
The rogues took all ; our monarch's mind
Too much to mercy is inclined ;

Thus his indulgence is repaid ;
We gain this by the scribbling trade.”
Agnes, compassionate and mild,
Who on each turn of fortune smiled,
In answer said : “ My dear Bonneau,
Take not the thing in dudgeon so ;
Do not from hence conceive a spite
To learning, and to those that write :
For I could many authors name,
Whom Envy’s self could scarce defame ;
Who still prove faithful to the throne,
Do good, but never make it known ;
Whose song to virtue gives the prize,
Who practise it before our eyes ;
Who, on the public good intent,
To instruct as well as charm are bent ;
These are beloved, though some are drones,
Industrious bees our country owns.”
Bonneau replies : “ ’Tis mighty fine ;
But yet, methinks, the king should dine,
And I cannot, as I’m a sinner,
Without the money find a dinner.”
They comfort him, with courage rare
All strive their sufferings to repair ;
Then to the town they make retreat,
And to the castle, noble seat
Of Charles, and of his gallant knights,
Whither good cheer with wine invites.
The knights were but half-clad at best,
The ladies were but simply dressed ;
They entered harassed, sight most odd,
Bare one foot, t’other badly shod.

EPISTLE ON THE NEWTONIAN PHILOSOPHY.*

TO THE MARCHIONESS OF CHÂTELET.

---

IMMORTAL Emily, most powerful mind,
Pallas of France, and glory of thy kind ;
Surpassing age, even in the bloom of youth,
The pupil, friend, of Newton and of truth ;
Thy fires transpierce me, and thy charms control ;
I feel the force, the brightness of thy soul !
To thee attracted, I renounce the bays
Sought on the stage, while yet I lived on praise,
My wit, corrected, roves not as before,
Of vain applause idolatrous no more !
Let earth-born Rufus with resentment rave,
And drag his senseless fury to the grave.
In rhyme still straining coldly to enclose
Some trivial thoughts that would depreciate prose,
That harmless thunder let him hurl at me,
Which first his rage for others might decree.
To blast my fame let pedant Zoilus seek,
And spread unmeaning malice once a week ;
With me their envy withers in the bud ;
I see no tracks imprinted in the mud.
Philosophy, all charming, powerful queen,
Lifts the wise mind above corroding spleen.

* This Epistle was prefixed to the "Elements of Newton's Philosophy," published by M. de Voltaire, in 1738 and 1741.

Happy on high where Newton now remains,
 Knows he on earth if enmity yet reigns?
 Not more than he my enemies I know,
 While truth august invites me from below.
 Already see she opes the gate of day!
 The lists I enter, and pursue my way!
 The massy whirlpools heaving still for place,
 Heaped without rule, and moving without space,
 Those learned phantoms vanish from my sight,
 And day comes on me with her genuine light!
 That vast expanse, of being the abode,
 Space that contains the immensity of God,
 Sees in her breast this bounded system move,
 Of planets, worlds beneath us and above,
 Whose whole extent so wondrous to our sense,
 Is but a point, an atom in the immense.

God speaks, and chaos at His voice subsides,
 In various orbs the mighty mass divides;
 At once they gravitate, they strive to fall,
 One centre seeking which attracts them all.
 That soul of nature, that all moving spring,
 Lay long concealed, an unregarded thing;
 Till Newton's compass moving through the space
 Measures all nature, and discovers place.
 The famous laws of motion are surveyed,
 Drawn back the veil, the heavens are all displayed.

His learned hand unfolds the glittering robe
 That clothes yon lucid, animated globe,
 Which guides the seasons and which rules the day,
 Mine eyes distinguish each emitted ray.
 With purple, azure, emerald and rose,
 The immortal tissue of his habit glows.

Each emanation in pure substance bears
 The various colors that all nature wears ;
 Those blended tints illuminate our eyes,
 Give life to matter, fill the expanded skies.
 Eternal powers, who, near the King of kings,
 Burn with His fires, and cover with your wings
 His throne ; O say ! when viewing Newton's plan,
 Were you not jealous of that wondrous man ?

The sea, too, hears him ! with stupendous dance
 I see the humid element advance !

Towards heaven it rises ; heaven attracts it high :
 But central power, more potent, as more nigh,
 Each effort stops : the sea recoils ; it roars ;
 Sinks in its bed, and rolls against the shores.

Ye comets, dreaded like the bolts of Jove,
 In vast ellipses regularly move !

Cease with your motions mortals to affright :
 Remount, descend near the great orb of light :
 Elance your fires ; fly, and as each appears,
 Restore the vigor of exhausted spheres.

Thou, sister of the sun, who in the skies,
 Of dazzled sages mocked the feeble eyes ;
 Newton has marked the limits of thy race,
 March on, illumine night, we know thy place.
 Earth, change thy form ; let the great law of matter
 Depress thy poles, and heighten the equator.
 Avoid, thou pole, that fixed to sight appears,
 The frozen chariot of the northern bears ;
 Embrace in each of thy immense careers,
 Almost three hundred centuries of years.*

* The period of the procession of the equinoxes, which is finished in twenty-six thousand nine hundred and twenty years.

How beautiful these objects! how the mind
 Flies to those truths enlightened and refined!
 Yes, in the breast of God, it may rejoice,
 And, far from matter, hear the Eternal's voice.

Thou whom that voice familiarly invites,
 Say, even in youth, the season of delights,
 How hast thou dared, in spite of custom's force,
 To move so boldly through so vast a course?
 To follow Newton in that boundless road,
 Where nature's lost, and everything but God?
 Pursuing thee I venture to advance,
 And bring home truth, that wanderer, to France.
 While Algarotti,* sure to please and teach,
 Conducts the stranger to the Latian beach,
 With native flowers adorns the beauteous maid,
 And Tiber wonders at such worth displayed;
 I grasp the compass, and the outlines trace,
 And with coarse crayons imitate her face.
 The immortal fair all simple, noble, grand,
 Should I attempt it, my unskilful hand,
 To her, as thee, no lustre could impart,
 Above all praise, and far above my art.

* M. Algarotti, a young Venetian, was then printing at Venice a treatise on light, in which he explains attraction. M. de Voltaire was the first in France that explained the discoveries of the great Newton.
